

Scanned from the collection of Douglas Swarthout
Berry Hill Book Shop

Coordinated by the Media History Digital Library
www.mediahistoryproject.org

Funded by a donation from University of St Andrews
Library & Centre for Film Studies

Digitized by the Internet Archive
in 2013

<http://archive.org/details/boyscinema531628amal>

"THE ENEMY" and "HORSE-SHY." COMPLETE FILM STORIES
IN THIS ISSUE.

BOY'S CINEMA

2^d Every Tuesday

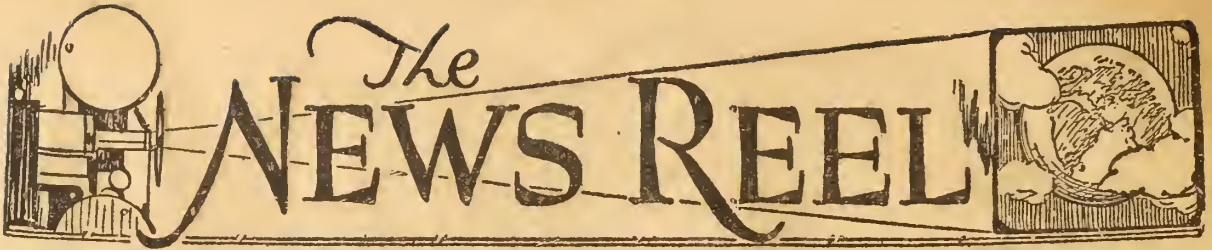

No. 531. February 15th, 1930. Weekly

A thrilling
romance of two naval cadets.
Starring
John Mack
Brown.

BRANDED A COWARD

GLOSSY PHOTO CARD OF William Boyd, FREE WITH THIS ISSUE.

The NEWS REEL

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 186, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Stutterers and Stammerers Needed.

Clear-speaking voices are apparently not all that the talking films want. Recently the First National Studios sent out a call for people who could lisp, stammer or stutter. Among those who lisped of the candidates applying was a twelve-year-old Negro girl for a part in "The Forward Pass," a football picture which shows how the American game is played. Stuttering men and stammering women were also among the applicants.

Risky Work.

In "Love Never Dies," Colleen Moore's new picture, there is a scene showing an air battle between German and English acroplanes. There were altogether sixteen machines performing all kinds of stunts, as diving, looping, and tail-spinning, and occasionally one of the planes would fall in flames to the earth. The really risky part of this scene lay in the fact that often several of the machines were so close together that had it not been for the skilful manœuvring of their pilots there might have been a serious accident.

"Branded a Coward."

Bill Dunn, John Mack Brown; Herbert Luff, Hugh Allan; Betty Allen, Jeanette Loff; "Bulge," Maurice Ryan; "Skeeter," William Bakewell; Lieutenant Dunn, Robert Bosworth.

"The Enemy."

Pauli Arndt, Lillian Gish; Carl Behrend, Ralph Forbes; Bruce Gordon, Ralph Emerson; Professor Arndt, Frank Currier; Ugust Behrend, George Fawcett; Fritz Winkelmann, John S. Peters; Jan, Karl Dane.

NEXT WEEK'S GRAND FILM STORIES.

"The ACE of Scotland Yard"

Blake again—in a most sensational and thrilling serial story of mystery, plot and counterplot. The adventures of a clever detective against the master-minds of the underworld. It is the first "talkie" serial ever made. Don't miss the opening episode next week! Starring Crauford Kent and Florence Allen.

"THE PHANTOM CITY."

The deserted city of the plains and how an intrepid cowboy was sent there on a dangerous mission. His hairbreadth escapes and amazing riding turned the tables against a gang of crooks. Starring Ken Maynard.

"DARK SKIES."

An all-talking drama of the exploits of an intrepid rum-runner versus the Revenue Patrols. Starring Wallace McDonald and Shirley Mason.

"TEMBI."

A splendid picture-supplement of wild animals, filmed at great personal risk by the well-known explorer, Cherry Kearton.

In the Long Ago.

Few picturegoers know that as long ago as 1917 the Edison company endeavoured to make talking films. Jack Muthall made his vocal debut in one of them. Ordinary gramophone records were used in synchronisation with these pictures, but they were not a success, for there were then no loud speakers, and the other mechanical devices so necessary nowadays were also unknown. Since then inventors have made big strides.

A Golden Goose.

All of us have heard of the goose that laid golden eggs. But a golden goose is a bird one would not hope to see even in a zoo. There is a golden goose, however, which will be seen in "No, No, Nanette," and the name of this strange bird is Tessie. It may be as well to explain that Nature is not responsible for Tessie's fine colouring. That was the work of studio experts, for apparently a goose of an ordinary colour was not good enough for the story.

So Tessie was well sprayed with a golden hue, but after the scene in which she appears had been filmed the director felt a bit uneasy. He thought the paint might badly affect the health of the bird, and so a property boy, armed with a hatchet, was deputed to find the goose and kill it. Meanwhile, Tessie, remembering she had another important duty to perform, laid an egg. It was not golden, of course, but the discovery of it saved Tessie's life and she was permitted to retain her golden plumage.

Barthelmess Learns Chinese.

Richard Barthelmess is learning to speak Chinese. This, we are assured, is no Press Agent's yarn, but the simple truth. His new picture is called "Son of the Gods," in which he will portray a Chinese youth, and in order that he may ably play his part, he is being tutored in one of the most difficult languages of the East. We offer him our sympathy, and wish him good luck.

(Continued on page 28.)

He accepted the blame for another's offence and nearly ruined his career. An appealing romance of two naval cadets and a charming girl. Starring Johnny Mack Brown.

BRANDED A COWARD

Annapolis.

WHEN Bill arrived at the small junction at Odenton to wait for the local train into Annapolis, he was beginning to get uncomfortable.

Three long years seemed to stretch before him like a century. During those years, almost completely cut off from his family for the best part of the time, he would have to work like fury.

He took comfort from the fact that his father was in the Navy. Because of this he would probably have a better time than most. Old man Dunn was only a junior officer himself—even though he was nearly fifty—for he had worked his way up from the lower deck of the service, and only in exceptional cases did rankers soar to the dizzy heights of commander.

Bill reckoned he had a better chance than his old man. He was starting in the senior service as a cadet, which meant that after only three years he would get what his father struggled twenty-eight years to achieve—a commission. After that the sky was the limit. The important rank of Admiral of the Fleet, the highest immediately under First Sea Lord, was within the reach of every cadet who started at the naval academy at Annapolis.

In spite of the fact that Bill felt a little lost, as though all his old associations had suddenly fallen away from him, his ambitions compared with the next fellow's very favourably. Already he could imagine himself wearing the uniform of supreme command, watching his battleships sweep past in salute on his annual inspection of the fleet, and listening to the forard six-pounders booming across the waves in acknowledgment of his authority. Already he could visualise the eight o'clock salvos from naval dockyards, which would announce to the stations that he had arrived for his periodical visits, and see the bunting being run up to the masthead of every vessel in harbour as the echoes of the gunfire rumbled away into the distance.

He smiled thoughtfully as he stood on the small wayside station, and life felt better. After all, he argued to himself, all these things were possible in time. It was just a matter of working hard and waiting patiently enough. The Admiralty could not help recognising his worth sooner or later, and then the coveted position would be won.

The fact that he had not yet even begun his training at the naval academy did not disturb him in the least. Hang it all, everyone had to start sometime, and he was starting now. But he was starting with a difference. To him, nothing was impossible. He would leave the other cadets far behind. His abilities would dazzle his superiors.

Bill's imagination had just brought him to the point where he was conducting a battle and wiping a fleet twice the size of his own completely off the surface of the seas, when he felt a touch on his arm.

"Got a match?" inquired a voice.

He turned to see a fellow about his own age standing before him, cigarette in hand.

"Sure," he replied, and brought out a lighter. He watched in silence while the other lit up, and then spoke again. "Is this the right platform for Annapolis?"

"It is," was the reply. "Are you bound for the naval academy?"

"Yes."

"So am I. We might as well go along together."

Bill liked the idea, and said so. So they exchanged names, and found that the stranger was Herbert Luff.

"It's a great life we're going to," Bill went on when they had introduced themselves. "I reckon you and I ought to be pals. What do you say?"

Herbert inspected him much as he would inspect a new suit that he was buying. He was not exactly a gracious individual, and made no attempt to be.

"Well, I suppose it's all right," he said casually. "I've certainly got to pal up with somebody, and you'll do as well as anybody else. At least, until I have time to look round."

Bill looked at him wrathfully. There was something about this chap he did not like. He seemed so superior—so cocksure that he was the only person in the world that mattered.

Bill was about to make some caustic remark, when he thought better of it. No use making enemies right at the start, he reflected. After all, this offensive way of speaking might only be an unfortunate habit, and he might not really mean to be like that.

"You and I will get on mighty well together," Bill replied, making a strenuous effort to be friendly. "I reckon I can be useful to you, too. You see, my father's in the Navy, and he knows the ropes. It's going to help a terrific lot."

"Is that so?" Herbert surveyed him once more with that sweeping stare, but this time his glance was more interested. "Well, what with your influence and my brains, we ought to be in a position to run this place very shortly. People at the top get a bit irksome unless you get some hold on them, you know."

"Er—yes." Bill was not quite sure what to say. It was obvious that Herbert was entirely unaware of the conditions of life in the Navy. He thought it best to change the subject. "I shall do well here," he went on. "I'm going to put my back into it. I want to be Admiral of the Fleet one of these days."

days, and if we're friends I'll see that you are made my chief of staff."

Herbert made a deprecatory gesture. On his face there was very nearly a sneer.

"You flatter yourself," he said ironically. "Only one man can be Admiral of the Fleet, and that's going to be me. It's brains they want—not fathers in the Navy."

Bill turned away, trying to hide his annoyance. A whistle shrieked in the distance.

"I think that is our train," he said quietly.

In the Cannon's Mouth.

"CADET WILLIAM DUNN," snapped the officer of the day.

"Sir?" replied Bill promptly.

"You are allotted to cabin number 46, ground floor. Have you any friend you would like to share the cabin with?"

"Yes, sir," Bill indicated Herbert. He did not know anyone else. "Cadet Herbert Luff, sir."

"Very well. Take him along to draw kit, and report in uniform at divisions ten o'clock to-morrow morning for inspection. By that time you will be expected to have settled down."

The officer turned away to someone else, leaving Bill to carry out his orders.

Bill beckoned to Herbert, and together they went along to the quartermaster's stores. Half an hour later, equipped with a large quantity of implements of training, they made their way to the room allotted to them.

"Darn silly way to carry on," muttered Herbert as they dumped their gear on the floor. "Why in the name of thunder did that idiot with the two gold rings round his cuffs call this place a cabin when it is nothing more than an ordinary room?"

"They always do that in naval shore establishments," Bill explained. "You see, they treat it as a ship. If you want to go out for the afternoon, you have to apply for shore leave; the skipper has his cabins on the quarter-deck—that's that house on the other side of the grounds—and the place where we eat and so on is the gun-room. It has to be like that, so as to get us used to conditions on board ship."

"Darned ridiculous," Herbert commented, overlooking the fact that the Navy had been trained at Annapolis long before he arrived, and that it had always done quite well under this system. "Well, I suppose we'd better get settled in."

"I suppose so," Bill replied, and heaved his kit on to one of the beds. "I'll have this bunk."

He had chosen it quite haphazard, and without any idea of getting hold of the most comfortable one. But Herbert was not satisfied with the arrangement. He felt the springing of the remaining bed, and then tried Bill's. The result was that he removed Bill's kit, depositing it on the floor, and placed his own on Bill's bed.

"What's the big idea?" Bill demanded quickly. "I said I was having that one."

"Quite possibly," was the calm reply. "But as your future superior I feel that I am entitled to some choice in the matter."

Bill's blood began to boil. Herbert was becoming intolerable. He was behaving as though he ran the place, and Bill did not intend to stand for it. He deliberately removed the other's kit, and starting picking up his own.

Herbert countered by dropping back on to the floor each article Bill put on the bed.

February 15th, 1920.

Bill stuck it for as long as he could, and then straightened up suddenly.

"Look here, Luff," he said quietly. "I put my stuff on this bunk first, and I'm jolly well going to have it. I don't particularly care which one I have, but I'm darned if I'm going to stand for bullying tactics."

"No?" Herbert went up to him and thrust his face temptingly close. "Well, what are you going to do about it?"

"Have the bunk I want," Bill replied, his jaw setting with sudden obstinacy.

Herbert calmly picked up Bill's kit bag and hurled it into a corner. Then he turned his back as though he had ended the argument beyond further question.

Bill strode up to him and swung him round.

"Pick up that bag," he ordered, and in his tone there was more than a hint of danger.

"Rats," was the immediate reply.

"Pick up that bag," Bill repeated. "I'll chuck you clean out of the cabin if you don't."

"Get on with it. Don't forget that you'll want three others to help you."

Bill clenched his fists, and made a sudden movement. It was arrested by a sharp voice from the doorway. The officer of the watch was looking at them with stern disapproval.

"This is a bad start," he said. He turned to Bill. "What is your name?"

"William Dunn, sir," Bill replied smartly.

"And yours?" The officer addressed Herbert.

"Herbert Luff," he replied shortly. "This egg—"

The officer held up his hand.

"I do not want any discussion upon whose fault it was," he said. "All that matters is that I find you two quarrelling almost immediately you arrive. One of you will have to go to another cabin. Who wants to move?"

"I'll go," said Bill. "You're right, sir. He and I will never hit it off properly."

That was the beginning of the enmity between Bill and Herbert. It had been brought about by nothing more than an absurd difference of opinion concerning a bunk, but from its intensity it might have been caused by some deadly insult.

The commander, who in spite of the iron discipline he enforced, had the welfare and progress of each individual cadet at heart, saw the trend of the quarrel, and gave orders that Bill and Herbert were to be thrown together as much as possible. The result was that they found themselves side by side at divisions, on parade, and even at the mess table.

A month went by. During it, the cadets were slowly trained in the use of arms, each day bringing them nearer to the great event of the first stage of their new lives—a sham battle.

Suddenly the looked-for day arrived. At divisions one morning the commander inspected the cadets and then stood before them with a map in his hand.

"We are going to carry out practice manoeuvres," he announced. "Cadets in the starboard establishment will carry out an attack in mass upon Crownsville, the port establishment defending. The two forces will be under the commands of Lieutenant-Commander Ridgley and Lieutenant Betterton respectively. Master-at-Arms."

"Sir?"

"Issue rifles, and have ammunition for the twelve-pounder landing guns loaded into limbers. The two contingents will move off at twelve, and the attack will commence at three in the afternoon."

"Very good, sir."

At three o'clock to the minute the battle opened with a crackle of rifle fire and a roar from the field gun battery. Bill and Herbert, lying side by side in the tall grass beyond the landing beach, loosed off half a magazine-full of blanks at the defending party's entrenchments four hundred yards away.

"Good stuff, this," Bill observed, smuggling his chest close to the butt of his rifle. "I wish Jimmy-the-One would arrange something of the kind every day." He laughed as the tang of burnt powder drifted across his nostrils. "I say, Luff—"

Herbert clicked home the bolt of his weapon, and looked at Bill coldly.

"My name is Mr. Luff," he said. "Your father might be in the navy, but that is no reason why you should not address me properly. Furthermore, I do not think the commander would like to be called 'Jimmy-the-One.'"

Bill flushed awkwardly. Herbert was deliberately trying to be offensive, and Bill's pride was hurt, because he had tried to make friendly advances, and so end the feud.

"Oh, rats, Luff," he replied. "Commanders are called that in every branch of the service. I heard the officer of the day using it last week." He loosed off a round absently, and reloaded. "Look here, old man, can't we be pals? We—"

"Advance to gun-point," roared the lieutenant in charge of their section, and they scrambled to their feet.

In fan order, they swooped over fifty yards of open ground, and dropped once more side by side, next to one of the guns of the field battery. Bill made a further attempt at establishing friendship.

"We can't go on like this," he said quickly. "Hang it all, we are making ourselves the laughing stock of the academy."

"You mean you are," retorted Herbert boorishly. "I do not wish to have anything to do with you. Go away and shut up."

Bill laid his rifle down. It was a deliberate movement, and it was ominous.

"Look here, Luff, I'm not going to stand for you treating me like dirt any longer," he said quietly. "You have been nothing but a pig since we first arrived, and you haven't the manners of an ape. If you can't be civil, I'm going to start trouble."

Herbert stared at him as if not understanding such accusations. He was so eaten up with his own importance that he regarded Bill's remarks as a grave injustice.

"Why, you rotten cur," he bellowed. "Who are you to say I haven't the manners of an ape? For two pins, I'd —"

But Bill had had enough. Hardly hearing the lieutenant shout "Fire, number one," and the subsequent report of the first gun of the field battery, he leapt to his feet.

"Get up," he roared. "I'll teach you to call me a rotten cur. Get up, and take what's coming to you."

Herbert needed no invitation. He threw down his rifle and jumped for Bill's head, his fist swinging heavily. Bill dodged, and they closed, swaying backwards and forwards as if they were fighting for their lives.

Someone yelled at them as they began to totter towards number four gun of the field battery. They began to fall, and at the same moment the breechworker of the gun thought the section lieutenant had given him orders to fire. He jerked at the lanyard, and a broad pencil of flame leapt from the muzzle of the weapon.

"Battery, cease fire," the section lieutenant shouted, and rushed forward through the lifting smoke.

"I'll teach you to call me a rotten cur," Bill was yelling again, aiming a deft blow at Herbert's jaw. Herbert stopped it as the lieutenant's hand fell on Bill's shoulder. He crouched low, whimpering with fear at the nearness of the field gun above them.

"Stop that fighting, you two," the lieutenant ordered. "Get up and return to your posts."

"Oh, heavens," whimpered Herbert. "It nearly got us. I saw the flash, it almost hit me, I'd have been blown to pieces."

"Come on, man," breathed Bill, forgetting his share of the quarrel with abrupt suddenness. "Don't show them you're a coward."

Herbert scrambled to his feet as if he had been stung. The word "coward" had roused him from his terror.

"I'm not a coward. I'm not—I'm not."

The section lieutenant laid his hands on their shoulders.

"Listen, you two," he said in a kindly tone, "don't you think this row has gone far enough? You nearly got killed just now, and I'm quite certain that whatever started it isn't worth a death. What about shaking hands and calling the whole thing off?"

Bill looked at Herbert, and Herbert looked at Bill. For several seconds each hesitated. Then Bill's hand shot out.

"I'm crying quits, Herbert," he said.

"So am I," Herbert replied. "Now I come to think of it, I suppose I've been a bit of an ass. Let's forget all about it."

"Sure thing we will," Bill said as their hands clasped. "But it's not you that's the ass. It's me."

"Nothing of the sort," Herbert replied. "I was entirely to blame."

"I tell you—"

The section lieutenant stepped between them. On his face was a grin.

"Don't start it all over again," he said.

"You'll be having a row over who started the other one in a minute, and we shall all be as we were before."

They both laughed. The quarrel was over.

Rammed.

THE following month's manoeuvres were of a more responsible nature. The cadets had to put a chaser barrier across the mouth of the Chesapeake River, some fifteen miles wide, and sent out five submarines that had been kept specially from the West Atlantic Fleet.

Bill and Herbert found themselves detailed to Submarine-chaser SC7, where they had to put into practice what they had learnt concerning four-inch semi-automatics—guns that could pump out high-explosive projectiles weighing sixty pounds each at the rate of thirty-seven rounds a minute. It was the most deadly weapon up to ranges of seven thousand yards that the Navy possessed.

The SC7 had not been out for more than an hour before the shout came, "Periscope on the port quarter, sir!" from the look-out. The lieutenant on the bridge promptly settled down behind the range-finder.

"Four thousand five hundred yards!" he shouted into the gun telegraphs. "Deflection one five right."

There was a clatter of feet as the ammunition hoists brought a supply of blank charges to the level of the deck, and the gun crews tensed themselves for the one order they wanted.

"Add two hundred!" came over the telegraphs. "One six right!" There was silence while the range was being corrected. "Port number one—fire!"

The immediate response was a spurt of cordite flame as the gun roared. Almost before the sound had died down the breech closed over another round.

"Steady at four thousand seven hundred, one six right!" the lieutenant went on. He looked down at the gleaming guns beneath him, and saw that all was in order. "Independent!"

There was a shattering roar as four guns broke into life simultaneously, their crews throwing themselves with zest into seeing how much ammunition they could get rid of before the order came to stop. The gunlayers, telepads over their ears, strained for the next word of command.

The light craft began to rock under the force of the firing, while aeroplanes hovered overhead watching the progress of the battle in order that their observers could judge whether the attackers or the defenders were winning.

Suddenly the submarine at which they had been firing disappeared beneath the surface.

"Check!" shouted the lieutenant, and it was repeated by the gunlayers.

The breechworkers drew out the safety handles, and the guns relapsed into silence. Almost at once the buzzer in the wireless cabin could be heard working.

A few tense seconds passed, and the operator handed to the lieutenant a slip.

"Not that time," the slip ran. "He dived and eluded you."

"Shucks," said Bill, when the message was made known to the crews. "I reckon we had him easily with our last five rounds. What do you say, Herbert?"

Herbert, who had been in charge of the sights, shifted one of his telepads.

"Sure we had him," he replied enthusiastically. "If we had been using real ammunition instead of blanks, we'd have smashed in his conning-tower like an eggshell. I reckon that umpire in the 'plane doesn't know what he's talking about."

"Change stations!" came the order.

Bill and Herbert at once left their posts and made their way to the bridge. During the course of the day they had to take a spell at every task on the vessel, and this time they had been assigned to navigation. Herbert took the wheel while Bill pored over the charts with a pair of dividers.

The guns began to roar once again as the submarine broke surface, and fell into silence at a message from the aeroplane that the craft had been adjudged sunk by gunfire. The lieutenant rubbed his hands.

"Good stuff," he commented to his second-in-command. "That's one of them. I think we'll try for another part of the channel now. We might be lucky and grab two, which would be more than the others can do." He turned to Bill. "Set a course for Hooper Strait. We'll investigate the shallows off Bloodworth Island. One of them is sure to try to get through close to the shore."

"Stop that fighting, you two!" the lieutenant ordered. "Get up and return to your posts."

"Yes, sir," replied Bill, and promptly set to work with dividers and parallel rulers. Presently he turned to Herbert. "North seventy-three degrees east!" he said in his best professional voice.

"North seventy-three degrees east!" repeated Herbert concisely, and began to ease off the chaser to its new direction. Suddenly, as if he had been struck with an idea, he looked over at the chart. "Hi, isn't that wrong, Bill?" he asked in ordinary tones. "I reckon we're not more than ten miles away from Cedar Point, and we've been going south forty-five east. The course should be very nearly due east, shouldn't it?"

Bill consulted the chart again and shook his head.

"No. According to the last D.R. position, what I said was right."

"Independent!" roared the lieutenant, spotting another periscope on the horizon.

"You're wrong!" snapped Herbert, and left the wheel to see for himself.

The SC7 careered on, the eyes that were supposed to keep it safely on its course looking elsewhere. Its engines throbbed steadily, its guns roared almost without cessation, and faintly above it all came the buzzing from the wireless cabin next to the bridge.

"Check!" the lieutenant shouted as the submarine dived.

The guns became silent, and almost simultaneously with the stopping of the noise came a horror-struck shout from beneath the bows of the vessel.

"What was that?" whispered the lieutenant, suddenly turning pale.

"Heavens, I believe we've—" He leapt to the engine-room telegraph. "Stop port and starboard!"

There was a gentle thud, and the shouting ceased. Then came the crisp order from forward: "Sea boat's crew!" The falls began to run out through the davit-blocks as a small cutter slipped downwards and rested itself on the surface of the water.

"We've rammed a small dinghy, sir," said the bosun, running up from the deck. "It's a pleasure craft with a man and a girl in it."

"Anyone hurt?"

"No, sir. Both saved. Their craft is sunk, though."

The lieutenant wheeled round on Herbert wrathfully. In his eye was an angry gleam.

"What were you doing at the time of the collision, Cadet Luff?" he asked.

"Looking at the charts, sir," replied Herbert.

"That was deliberate disobedience of orders!" the lieutenant snapped. "You know quite well that you are not allowed to take your eyes off the sea ahead while at the wheel. You might have killed everyone on this chaser if it had been a rock we'd hit. Report yourself under arrest when you get back, and remain in your quarters until defaulters' parade to-morrow."

"Very well, sir," Herbert said, and looked away as the lieutenant went to make his apologies to the victims of his carelessness.

The Commencement Ball.

BILL, this is perfectly rotten!" Herbert said when they met in cabin number forty-six a day later. He looked from his friend to two others standing by—Skeeter and Bulge, so called because the one was thin and the other fat. "Can't you fellows think up something?"

Bill shook his head. "No," he replied. "Absolutely nothing. You can't break open arrest."

"But, hang it all, man, to-night there's the Commencement Ball, and Betty's coming down specially for it." Herbert looked out of the window miserably. "She's—we're as good as engaged, and—" He broke off awkwardly. "Well, you can see how it is," he finished.

Bill nodded, but it was quite beyond his powers to help. Herbert had been remanded for three days on a charge of wilfully deserting his post during manoeuvres, thereby causing damage to private property, and the skipper was waiting to hear how much the damage would cost before dealing with the case further.

To make matters worse, the period of remand cut across the Commencement Ball, the greatest function of the season, when the cadets were allowed to invite their friends and relatives to an all-night dance. The dance seldom lasted all night, for it is not easy to keep awake when you are used to turning in promptly at ten o'clock every night, but rules were relaxed sufficiently to make the occasion really enjoyable.

"Well, there's only one thing for it," Herbert said after a pause. "I'll have to get you three fellows to look after her for me. You can explain what's happened, and tell her that if she likes to wait until the day after to-morrow I'll be able to see her. Will you do that for me?"

"Is she good-looking?" Skeeter asked quickly.

"Here's her photograph," Herbert replied, pulling one out of his jacket pocket.

Skeeter inspected it in silence, and then handed it back. His expression was sheepish.

"Leave it all to me, old man," he said. "I'll stick to her like glue all evening."

"Fine!" said Herbert. He turned to Bill. "Perhaps you'll take over her mother for me. She's not a had old girl, even if she does talk a lot."

"But—" Bill began.

"Thanks so much. I knew you would."

Bill mumbled something and went away. He could not exactly call himself a success where ladies were concerned, and he was not too cheerful about having to act as escort to one that was probably close on fifty.

Anyway, he would do what he could. After all, it was darned hard luck that Herbert should be confined to his quarters, and the least a pal could do was to put things right with his future mother-in-law.

Bill changed into his dress uniform immediately after morning watch and took the early train to a neighbouring town to have some films developed. He just managed to catch the four o'clock train back again, which would bring him into Annapolis an hour before the festivities were due to commence.

He walked down the aisle of the pull man and saw one vacant seat some paces away. Next to it was a girl.

Bill drew in his breath sharply. Her head was almost in profile as she looked out of the window at the passing scenery, and her sheer beauty almost knocked him dizzy. He stood staring at her in astonishment, hardly believing that such a glorious creature could be human.

Then he pulled himself up sharply and recollected that he was standing in the middle of a crowded car looking a perfect ass. Summoning his courage, he went to the vacant seat and sat down by her side.

The next ten minutes he spent in thinking out all kinds of devices for attracting her attention and opening up conversation. Each scheme seemed a good one until he came to try to put it into effect. Then his courage failed him completely.

He was just evolving the details of his eleventh idea when she suddenly turned.

"This is the right train for Annapolis, isn't it?" she asked. "I heard somebody behind me say that it stopped at a place called Eastport."

"Yes—er—yes!"

He cursed his tongue for having suddenly developed a tendency to cleave to the roof of his mouth.

She turned her deep blue eyes on him as if he were a new kind of lunatic.

"You don't seem very sure," she said gently.

"I am. Believe me, I am." He spoke quickly now, anxious to set her mind at rest. "You see, Eastport is the next station beyond Annapolis, and it is the terminus. I am at Annapolis myself, so I know."

"Thank you."

She turned away, interested in the scenery again. Bill tugged at his collar as if it were choking him, and ventured another remark.

"It's a nice place. Annapolis, I mean. Ever been there before?"

"Yes," the girl replied, not turning her head. "I arrived there this morning."

Bill suddenly had an idea.

"I say, you're not going to the Commencement Ball at the Naval Academy, are you?" he asked hesitatingly. "I mean, I'm at the academy myself, and if you will be there I'd like to book you for a dance." He paused, expecting a reply. When none came he blundered on: "It's frightful cheek, I know, but I—well, I thought perhaps—"

She turned round so quickly that he almost fell off his seat.

"What?" she asked.

"Eh?"

He blinked at her surprisedly.

"What did you think?"

Bill summoned the last of his will-power and prepared for immediate extermination.

"I thought perhaps you wouldn't mind my asking you, seeing that I shall be introduced to you at the ball, anyway," he explained. "You see, when all the other fellows spot you, I'm likely to get crowded out. That's why I want to fix something now."

She smiled, and her eyes danced provocatively.

"I haven't said I'm going yet," she said. "But I am, of course." She looked at him and hastily averted her head. "Why did you say you would be crowded out?" she continued softly.

"Because—because—" Bill gulped convulsively. "Well, because you're so wonderful. That's why." He became defiant now that the bridge was crossed. "The brutes will simply swarm all over you. Anybody would. If I thought you'd agree, I'd ask you for every dance on the programme."

She turned away to the window once again, and for some time neither of them said anything more. It was not until the brakes were grinding on the wheels and the guard was coming down the car calling "Annapolis next!" that she spoke.

"Cadet Dunn," cried the lieutenant, "what are you doing at this hour in full-dress rig?"

And all she said was:

"I'll give you two dances, and you shall take me into supper."

Bill wandered back to the academy in a dream. He seemed to be walking, and yet was not conscious of the fact. Once only did he wake up, and that was to hear the bad language of a taxi-driver who had narrowly missed him as he stepped off the kerb without looking.

He got it this time. It was a ease of love at first sight—so complete and overwhelming that as he walked he made plans for redoubling his energies towards becoming Admiral of the Fleet, and worked out a convincing proposal of marriage that he intended to use that same evening.

On the stroke of seven he stood by the door waiting for her to come in. His dress kit was faultless, and his gloves—an essential part of his uniform—were spotlessly white.

He saw her in the crowd and started forward to meet her. Then he observed with considerable disappointment that she was with none other than Skeeter. He drew back quickly.

"Hallo, Bill," Skeeter greeted, spotting him. "Waiting for Mrs. Allen?"

"No!" Bill snapped between his teeth. "Come over here. I've got something to say to you."

Skeeter bowed elaborately to his partner.

"Will you excuse me a moment, Miss Allen?" he said. "My friend wants me!"

"Who is she?" Bill demanded, when they were out of earshot. "Come on. Out with it!"

Skeeter looked at him with an ironical expression and then grinned. He made a warning gesture.

"Stand off," he advised. "She is not for you, Don Juan. Her name is Betty Allen, and she is as good as engaged to Herbert. He told us so himself, and he ought to know."

Bill held his hand to his head dazedly. "She's Betty Allen," he mumbled. "But I met her on the train this afternoon. She's promised me two dances, and she's going to let me take her in to supper."

"Maybe," Skeeter retorted. "But she's still Betty Allen all the same. And let me tell you this, my lad. She has been entrusted to my fatherly care, and I want no funny business. Keep off!"

"You'd better be getting back to her," said Bill, suddenly very quiet. "She won't like standing about too long."

They sauntered to the doorway of the ball-room once more, and to Skeeter's intense annoyance she had already gone.

"Some other blighter's got her!" he growled. His eyes swept the crowd of couples. "Yes, there she is. It's that confounded Bulge. You wait until I get hold of him. I'll pound his fat carcass to ribbons!"

But Bill was not listening. He had quietly slipped out into the open air.

The Quarrel.

IT was a long time before he ventured back into the ball-room again. The discovery that the girl he had met on the train was Betty Allen had hit him harder than he first realised.

He had never before been in love, and somehow he had thought that she was the sister of one of the cadets. In fact, he had taken it for granted. As a matter of course, he had allowed himself to weave all kinds of dreams about her, seeing in her a girl worth working for and fighting for.

And then Skeeter, in all innocence, had dropped his bombshell. She was as good as engaged to Herbert, which meant that she was in love with him, and only waiting for a formal announcement that they were to be married.

It almost knocked Bill over. His intense, sincere nature would never allow him to treat such things lightly, and he saw at once that all the plans that were half-formed in his brain were futile. She belonged to Herbert, and that was the end of the matter.

As he walked into the crowded room again Bulge immediately sought him out.

"I say, Bill. Betty's been asking for you," he said. "She says that you booked two dances with her, and she is wondering which ones you want." He prodded Bill in the chest. "You miserable brute, you deserve to have them cancelled. She's flatly refused to make up her engagement card more than one dance ahead in case you showed up. Jolly decent of her, I reckon. If it had been me I'd have cut you right out."

"You mean it, Bulge?" Bill said incredulously. "She's been keeping those dances for me all this time?"

"She has," Bulge replied. "Get to it, my lad."

Bill got to it.

He found her in an alcove by one of the windows, fanning herself and looking a little flushed.

"Hallo, Miss Allen!" he said, by way of opening a conversation. "I must apologise for running off earlier in the evening, but I had to—to go out somewhere."

She smiled at him, and motioned him to sit by her side.

"What a shame!" she said. "The two boys who have been dancing with me up to now have been telling me all about you. You're Herbert's friend. What a coincidence that we should have met in the train this afternoon!"

"Have you seen him?" Bill asked, not quite sure of his position.

"Who? Herbert?" She shook her head. "No, but I expect I shall later on. He sent a message to say that he had been detailed for duty at the last moment and was unable to get away."

Bill nodded thoughtfully. It was what he wanted to hear. So long as he knew what yarn Herbert had told, there was no fear of him saying anything which would upset it.

"What about those two dances?" he said. "I don't really deserve them, of course, but I'd like them all the same." "You shall have them," she replied. "Let us stop here for a little while, though. I feel so hot."

They chatted idly for a while, and were later joined by an elderly woman. "This is mother," Betty explained. "She knows you you are, too. Mother, this is Mr. Dunn, Herbert's friend."

"Mr. Dunn?" Mrs. Allen's hand went out in warm welcome. "I'm so glad to meet you. Herbert has mentioned you in his letters to Betty quite often, and I knew you must be very nice. Betty, dear, we must have him over to tea to-morrow afternoon. I expect Herbert will still be on duty, but he won't mind. They're such good friends."

Bill intervened tactfully. The last thing he wanted was to prolong his friendship with the Allens.

"I really don't think I ought to," he said awkwardly. "You see, I have such a lot to do, and—"

Betty looked at him with pleading eyes.

"Please," she begged.

Bill had no more to say. He just nodded, his hands clenched to keep himself from taking hold of her then and there and telling her what he felt.

At four the following afternoon he presented himself at their hotel. Mrs. Allen kept him to herself for the first three hours, talking incessantly about her troubles and her family until Bill could have cheerfully murdered her. Suddenly, as if she had exhausted all her gossip, she stopped.

"Well, I mustn't keep you any longer," she finished, as if she had been talking to him for only a few minutes. "I must run along to have my hair done. But don't go yet. Talk to Betty for a little while. Take her out into the garden—it will be nice in the twilight."

Bill couldn't get out of it. Dumbly he offered Betty his arm and led her through the windows that opened on to the lawn.

When they were out of sight from the hotel she led him down a short pathway to a seat. They sat down, he edging awkwardly away from her.

She turned so that she could see his face.

"Tell me, Mr. Dunn, is Herbert really on duty, or has something happened which won't allow him to leave the grounds of the academy?"

"He's on duty," Bill said loyally.

"But surely no duties last more than four hours at a time, do they?" she persisted, and Bill realised that she had been making inquiries.

"Well, no," he admitted, his brain trying to evolve some excuse. "But, you see, this—is this a very special kind. It's—it's rather important in its way. He'd come if he could."

She nodded as if she understood. All the time her eyes were fixed on his.

"Of course, I know he wouldn't stop away if he could help it," she went on. "But, you see, I know him so well. He's always getting into trouble of some sort, and I thought perhaps that might be the explanation now. He's a bit of a coward, too." She sighed. "I wish he would be more careful. I wish he were like you sometimes."

Bill's head span round dizzily. Her last sentence had been spoken so softly, and it had come so suddenly, that he had been taken off his guard.

"Why like me?" he asked unsteadily. "Why not like somebody else?"

"Because you are—" She paused, her head lowered. Something in the night air seemed to be casting a spell over them, taking them away from the February 15th, 1930.

world around them and leaving them in an eternity of their own. Neither seemed to be aware of the danger ahead.

She looked up again and faced him. Bill thought he saw in her the same mental processes that he had experienced on the train.

"Because you are not like the others," she said. "When you first met me you didn't try to make yourself objectionable. In fact, I've had an idea that you tried to avoid me last evening. You did, didn't you?"

"Yes."

"Why?"

Bill hardly knew the question had been asked. He was not even listening for it.

"Because I loved you from the moment I first met you," he replied without stopping to think what he was saying. He moved nearer, and held out his hands. "Betty, I'm sorry if I've made myself seem a rotter to you, but I just couldn't help it. I don't think I've ever met anyone quite like you before, and you sort of bowled me over." He looked away. "Of course, you'll never want to see me any more. I've made love to you when you are already in love with Herbert. I think I'll go."

He attempted to rise, but she laid her hand on his—gently, but with quiet restraint.

"I was in love with Herbert once, but not now," she whispered. "I came down here to tell him. That's why I asked you all those questions about his duty just now. I thought perhaps he knew that I would tell him everything was ended and was avoiding me."

"And you—you—"

Bill did not need to ask the question. One look, and he knew that she cared for him in return. Quickly he took her in his arms and crushed her close. His lips were pressed on hers.

A voice cut through the silence.

"So that's your game, is it, Bill Dunn?"

It was Herbert!

They sprang apart, and Betty turned away while Bill faced his friend.

"I thought something of the sort was going on," Herbert pursued angrily. "Bulge told me that you had come over here, and I guessed it was to see Betty." His eyes gleamed with cold fury. "When you first came here I told you you were a rotten cur. Well, I'm telling you it again."

"Herbert!" It was Betty who spoke. She spun round furiously. "How dare you speak to Bill like that! Apologise at once."

"Apologise, be hanged!" He clenched his fists, and brought one of them across Bill's face suddenly. There was nothing serious in the blow, except that it hurt Bill's pride. He tensed his muscles to spring.

Betty's hand fell on his arm.

"Leave it to me, Bill," she said quietly. "I can deal with him. Go back now, and come in the morning."

Bill relaxed. He knew what Herbert was going to hear, and did not want to make things worse for him.

"All right," he said. "I'll hang around for a little while until you go in, and then I'll clear off."

He hurried away, and as he walked rapidly towards the veranda where he could wait and watch without overhearing, their angry voices followed him.

A Blow in the Dark.

BULGE and Skeeter stood in the corridor outside their cabins, and on their faces were expressions of anxiety.

"What did he do it for?" Skeeter asked. "If he's not back by stand-to, he'll be for the high jump. I reckon they'll withdraw his training warrant and send him back home. It's no joke breaking arrest."

"Ho's always like that," Bulge replied. "He wouldn't be Herbert Luff if he wasn't in trouble. The bother is, he's got such a rotten temper, and a rotten mind goes with it. When he asked me where Bill was, and I told him he had gone across to tea with Betty and her mother, he walked up and down like a caged lion. He did that for two hours solid, remember. Then he suddenly started to get into his outdoor rig. I was jolly thankful when he had gone, I can tell you. I had a lot of prep. to do for old Hallam, and a fellow can't concentrate on curved trig when anybody's stumping all over the room and making an infernal row."

"Let's go to your cabin and wait," Skeeter suggested.

"Right. Come on!"

They went inside and made themselves comfortable. For a while neither of them spoke.

"I suppose this will mean more trouble between them both," Skeeter began suddenly. "The old grudge is sure to come up."

Bulge shrugged his shoulders.

"A lot I care. Anyway, Bill is a decent fellow, and it would be a good thing if a topping girl like Betty chucked Herbert ever. He's not her sort."

Skeeter glanced at his watch.

"Ten minutes to rounds," he said. "There'll be trouble if he don't hurry. By the way, I wonder if Bill's in yet. I'll go and look." He went across the corridor, and when he returned his face bore a troubled look. "No, by gosh. He's not. I hope they haven't had a fight and messed each other up."

Meanwhile out in the grounds all was still, except for the guard who patrolled to see that everything was in order.

Suddenly he stopped as he saw a figure climbing the wall over the western gate. Quickly he leaned his bicycle against a tree and began to hurry in the direction of the intruder.

It was Herbert. He had stayed quarrelling with Betty and her mother until long after the closing time of the gates, and he was doing his best to get in unobserved.

He dropped from the top of the wall to the ground, and began to move towards the buildings, keeping well under cover of some shrubbery. Suddenly he paused and looked round as Bill, following him closely, scrambled to the top of the wall behind him.

While he was still watching, the guard reached him.

"Now, then, young man, you're out after time," the guard said. "Turn round and let me see who you are."

Herbert almost froze where he stood. He was under open arrest, and this would mean expulsion. Then suddenly he realised that the guard did not know his name, and in the darkness would never recognise him from the back.

Swiftly, his whole safety depending on a desperate move, he swung round and crashed his fist into the guard's face. The old man staggered back and fell. Before he could get to his feet, Herbert was gone.

The guard mounted his bicycle and rode back to the office. He reached it just before the officer of the watch set out on his rounds, and hurriedly related what had happened.

(Continued on page 26.)

A gripping story of two chums, parted through the Great War, and how, after many horrors, they were united in Peace. Starring Ralph Forbes and Ralph Emerson.

"The ENEMY"

The War Menace.

BRUCE GORDON stood, his eyes glittering with excitement, watching the big crowd which milled about the bulletin board posted outside the café. Men were jostling one another, students from the university to which Bruce belonged, were climbing on each other's backs to read the latest news.

Heavy black lettering read:

"SERBIA REJECTS OUR ULTIMATUM; and DECLARATION OF WAR IMMINENT!"

Shouts sounded on the air, and suddenly the struggling crowd quietened as, through the uproar, there came the steady tramp of marching feet.

A company of soldiers were passing the café gardens, and Bruce leaped on to a barrel to watch them go. Beyond the moving men showed the grey, ancient stone walls of the University of Vienna, at which he was a student. They were breaking up, to-day, and Bruce was duo soon to journey home to England for the holidays.

Those old walls had seen knights in mail and armor riding to wars, now they looked on warriors of a later day. The afternoon sunshine caught the steely glitter of bayonets, and shone on the smooth barrels of rifles. The men wore full fighting equipment, overcoats rolled above their packs, pouches heavy with ammunition.

They marched steadily, hobnails clumping the cobbled surface of the road, with crowds blocking the footways, cheering them towards the train which would rush them south to the frontier. Ahead, a band blared martial music, and the sound of it set the blood leaping in Bruce's veins.

"It'll be war, Bruce!" A voice called below him, and a moment later, Carl Behrend leaped to the barrel-top and stood watching at his side.

Bruce and Carl were friends. They were the same size, broad-shouldered and clear-eyed. They were always together, closer than brothers in their friendship.

"Shall you have to go, if it is?" Bruce asked, as the last of the glittering, grim bayonets passed.

"Yes, of course!" Carl laughed, his eyes alight. "I'm an Austrian, and we're all soldiers. If we really declare war, I'll be called up. I'll have to fight—and that'll be better than studying at the university!"

"War, eh?" Bruce drove one fist into the palm of the other at the thought of it. "Gosh, I shall envy you! If England went to war, I'd have to volunteer before I'd be accepted as a soldier."

"And you'd volunteer, wouldn't you?" Carl asked.

"You bet!" Bruce exclaimed. "I say, if you have to go, couldn't I soldier with you?" They dropped off the barrel, and stood looking at one another. "I mean, we've been friends so long." Bruce went on. "We might as well fight together, if there's to be any fighting."

"That would be fine!" Carl reached for his hand, and they gripped. "But we'll wait until I'm called up first and—"

He broke off. The students in the café gardens had returned from the street, and now they were grouping about the grey-haired figure of old Professor Arndt, the most popular in the university—and father of someone whom Bruce regarded as the prettiest girl in all Vienna.

The professor mounted a box. Always before the class completely broke up, he made a little speech, wishing the fellows a good time during the holidays and thanking them for their expressions of goodwill.

Bruce and Carl joined the crowd, pushing to the front, and heard the old professor saying:

"Boys, we are living in exciting days, and they say that war will be on us in a matter of hours! Well, war is a very dreadful thing, and I trust that its horrors will not touch any of you or—"

That was about all that Bruce and Carl heard, because both saw the professor's daughter, Pauli, sitting on another box near her father. She was very beautiful, with her hair caught in ringlets, wearing a frock that was all filmy—the kind of frock that only a captivating Viennese girl could wear.

She smiled at the boys, and Bruce held her eyes. He saw her lift one finger and motion gently, while her lips formed the words:

"The tree—now!"

Bruce's heart jumped. He had been in love with Pauli for a long time—and he knew what she meant. "She was saying that she would slip away to a tree at the back of the grounds, and meet him there."

He glanced at Carl. His friend was smiling as he looked at Pauli, and Bruce took his chance to ease back through the crowd. He had a glimpse of Pauli running in the direction of the tree. It was a big, spreading oak, with a circular seat round its base, and he came up to the seated girl on tip-toe.

He heard the distant band blaring as it escorted the company of soldiers to the war, and the cheering of the crowds that lined the streets. War and excitement was in the air, but it was not this which made his blood race now.

He saw Pauli's hand resting on the edge of the seat, and she jumped a little as his fingers closed over it. She did not look up at him, but he saw the smile which curved her shapely lips.

"Pauli!" he whispered. She turned her head quickly then. Her eyes widened and her smile died. "Oh—h—you?" she breathed. "I meant—"

"Pauli, I saw you beckon to me!" Bruce exclaimed. "You're wonderful! I—Pauli, I love you! I've—"

He checked as she drew her hand away. "But—but I didn't mean you, Bruce!" she said. "I wanted—Carl! Didn't you know, we've loved one another ever since we were kiddies? I didn't think you—that you—” She stared at him. “Oh, I like you awfully, I don’t want to hurt you, but there’ll never be anyone for me, except Carl!”

Bruce’s smile died. He looked at her, then grinned a little. It hurt him to do that. He alone knew how often he had dreamed of this moment, when he would tell Pauli how deep was his regard, and he had never even guessed that Carl meant anything to her.

“That’s—all right,” he said jerkily. “So Carl’s the lucky fellow, eh?”

“He was standing next to you when I beckoned,” she said.

“And I thought you wanted me?” Bruce laughed. “I’ll find him and send him to you.”

“We’ve arranged a betrothal party,” she said breathlessly. “He wants you to be his best man when we’re married and—”

“I’ll be honoured!” Bruce exclaimed. “Look, I’ll find him and send him to you now. Forget what I just said, Pauli. Carl’s my best friend—and I’m glad it’s him!”

She caught his hand and pressed it a moment, then he turned and hurried back towards the café gardens.

“I was a silly ass to imagine that she’d ever think anything of me,” he told himself. “Anyway, it’s—Carl!” He called suddenly as he saw his chum coming towards him. “Pauli’s by the tree,” Bruce said. “And congratulations, old man! I never even guessed there was anything between you two!”

“Well, we were keeping it a secret,” Carl said. “We’ll be having a party in a few days, and we were going to announce it then.”

Bruce gripped his hand warmly, then pushed him on towards the tree where Pauli waited, and it was as Carl went that Bruce heard a sudden cheer from around the bulletin board. He ran forward, and he was in time to see a notice pasted up there:

“AUSTRIA DECLARES WAR ON SERBIA.”

Bruce did not know it, but in that moment he was watching the start of the greatest war in all the history of the world, a war which was to set France and Russia and Germany, Italy, Rumania, and America in arms, while England, too, was to fling her steely might into the great conflict which started in those summer days of 1914.

The First Blood.

A ROOM was decorated at Pauli’s home, and the table was laden with good things. Pauli was there in a pretty frock, and the old professor was wearing his best suit.

It was the afternoon of the party when Pauli and Carl were to become officially engaged. Carl’s father came—a big, bearded man who was as cunning as any in Vienna in matters of business.

There was Fritz Winkelmann, too, due to be called up with Carl some time soon, now that Austrian gunners were hammering in Serbian territory, shattering the roofs and ploughing up the streets of old Belgrade, the capital of the enemy country.

Through the open window came the hum of the excited city, the roll of drums and the stamp of marching feet as more and more soldiers poured southwards to meet the enemy.

Germany had come into it and had declared war on Russia, allying herself with Carl’s country. England had already declared war on Germany, who was at hostilities with France; but, as yet, England and Austria were not at enemy.

February 15th, 1930.

On the wall hung a photograph which Bruce had long ago given to Pauli. Two or three days before Carl had draped a little Union Jack around the frame, and the flag formed a splash of colour.

The door slammed open and Bruce entered, bringing presents for the two. “The street’s packed outside!” he called. “Some of the Guards have just gone off; they’re bound for Russia, to fight there! The people are wild with excitement.”

“I’m expecting to be called up any day now!” Winkelmann exclaimed. He was a thick-set fellow with pale blue eyes and a stiff back of a student who had already put in his peace-time military service. “My uniform’s all ready!”

“So is mine. I was brushing it this morning!” Carl said, as he shook hands with Bruce. “And are you coming into our army, or are you going over to fight for England against Germany?”

“I don’t know yet,” Bruce told him. “I suppose I shall have to go home.”

“We are Germany’s allies,” Winkelmann said. “What will happen if England declares war against us?”

“Oh, rot! That’ll never happen!” Bruce told him.

“If it did, we’d be enemies!” Carl exclaimed, and he wrung Bruce’s hand again as he laughed. “Enemies! Ha, ha, ha!”

Bruce threw back his head and laughed, too.

“That’d be a good joke!” he half yelled, as he clapped his friend on the back. “Well, it’d take more than a war to make us bad friends, Carl!”

“Don’t let’s talk about war!” Pauli broke in. “It makes me feel all cold! Sit down everybody, and let’s have a good time!”

In a little while the party was going forward. Pauli’s new engagement-ring flashed as the sunshine caught the glimmer of the diamonds set in it. Bruce took her hand and looked at it, but he wasn’t jealous of Carl’s good fortune.

He himself loved Pauli just as much as ever, but he was a sportsman and a good loser. Presently he lifted his glass and stood up.

“I can’t make a speech,” he said, “but I just want to wish Pauli and Carl all the happiness there is in the world. Carl’s always been my friend. Once when we were skating in the Stadt Park and the ice broke I’d have been drowned if he hadn’t hauled me out—”

“And who got me clear of the university fire?” Carl broke in. “Eh? Who climbed up the rainwater pipe and found me unconscious from the smoke and got me out, and was three weeks in hospital because of his burns?”

“That was Bruce!” Pauli cut in. “You two have saved one another’s lives!”

“That doesn’t matter, anyway!” Bruce said. “Well, the best of luck to both of you!”

He raised his glass just as there came a furious burst of cheering in a nearby square. They heard people shouting as they ran along the street below. Somewhere a band struck up the National Anthem, and it sounded as though ten thousand fervent voices raised with the song.

“More excitement,” Bruce said, as he sat down. “I suppose it’s much the same at home, if we’re getting ready to fight Germany.”

“I heard that your British troops had already been in action,” Winkelmann said across the table. “And a man told me this morning that war will be declared between our two countries—not that it’ll make any difference to us here!”

“We’ll never be enemies!” Carl laughed at Bruce. “It—”

He checked as the telephone bell strummed suddenly. Winkelmann was nearest, and he rose to answer it. They heard him saying:

“Hallo! No, this is Winkelmann. Yes; d’you want to speak to him? I can give— What?”

They saw his expression change suddenly as he listened to the words that came over the wire; then he hung up the receiver and turned to face them.

“The news has just come through,” he said. “That’s what all the cheering outside is about. England has declared war on us!”

“What!”

Bruce jerked from his seat. Every eye in the room was on him now, and he suddenly realised something which had never occurred to him before. He was the only Englishman in the house—all the rest were Austrians.

“I knew it would come!” Winkelmann said, and Carl’s father spoke.

“England has always been jealous of our commerce,” he said. “She’d play any dirty trick to make herself more powerful!”

“You’re wrong there!” Bruce leaned across the table. “We’ve been forced into this. Germany invaded Belgium, and we had to defend that little country. If you people are Germany’s allies, then we—”

“England didn’t have to interfere!” Carl leaned across Pauli as he spoke to Bruce. “England’s out to get more power!”

“We’ve got all the power we want; we’re only defending the weak and helpless!” Bruce spun to him, and they glared at one another across the girl. “You’re siding with Germany; she’s jealous of us and our trade; that’s at the bottom of the war!”

“And now you’re declaring war suddenly on us for no reason at all!” Carl ripped. “You—”

“Don’t—don’t!” Pauli pressed them away from one another as she rose to her feet. “What’s it got to do with us, anyhow? We’re all friends here!”

“We may be. But there’s an enemy flag in this house!”

Winkelmann lifted a quivering finger and pointed to the Union Jack which draped Bruce’s photograph. Carl thrust his chair back as he saw it, then strode towards the wall. Instantly Bruce barred his path.

“What are you going to do?”

“Tear that down!” Carl answered, and his eyes were glaring.

“That’s my country’s flag, and you’ll leave it alone!”

“It’s an enemy flag, and it’s coming down!” Carl rasped, and he leaped for it as he spoke.

He snatched it from the frame, gripping the fabric in his hands and starting to tear it to shreds. For a moment Bruce stared at him.

An Austrian was tearing the Union Jack before his eyes! The flag for which his forefathers had fought, the flag on which the sun never set, the flag which stood for freedom. His country’s flag!

He jumped at Carl, snatching it from him, for Carl’s fist to swing madly and land high on Bruce’s cheek. Bruce’s own right swung, and an instant later Carl was staggering backwards, to crash against the table.

“I won’t stand that!” he half snarled. “No cursed Englishman can hit me!”

His clutching fingers wrapped about the haft of a knife, and it shone in a steely arc as he raised it and rushed again.

Pauli half screamed, while Bruce leaped to meet his opponent, vainly trying to block the slashing blade. Something that felt like the sear of red-hot iron jagged across his wrist, and he reeled away, then stood close against the wall, still gripping the flag, while blood from the wound in his wrist soaked down to its folds.

Carl had stopped dead, with the now-stained knife still half raised.

He and all the others were staring as though petrified at the blood trickling down Bruce's fingers and dripping to the floor.

All the colour had gone from Bruce's face now. He looked at his wound—and at the first blood shed after the declaration of war!

He straightened up, and stared around the room.

One Englishman, with his own flag soaking his spilled blood, facing a group of Austrians—a group of enemies!

His voice came, shaking:

"And five minutes ago we were all friends!"

The World at War.

PAULI bound up Bruce's wound, while the others stood around, silent. Outside the excited crowd was singing, cheering, and roaring their defiance to England.

The hard, cruel spirit of war itself seemed to have entered the room, where the decorations on the walls, the feast on the table, and Pauli's pretty dress were in strong, ruthless contrast to the little pool of blood on the carpet and the bandage about Bruce's wrist.

The knife lay where Carl had now dropped it, its bright steel tarnished.

"You can get out of this house as soon as you like!" Carl said, when Pauli stepped away.

"No, no! There's no need for that!" Pauli gasped.

"What has come over you two?" the old professor's voice broke in. "Until that telephone message came, you were friends—like brothers. Now one of you has tried to kill the other—all because of a little bit of tinted cloth over a photograph."

"It's my country's flag, sir!" Bruce told him.

"And it's the flag of my country's enemy!" Carl cut in.

"And so you two—friends—must spill blood!" said the professor. "You young fools, what does—"

He broke off. Out in the street below came a deep, growling sound, made up of cheers and curses and maledictions. It was a wild, deep-throated roar which surged closer and closer, and took Pauli to the window. She looked out.

"There's a crowd downstairs, following some soldiers. They've got prisoners! They're coming here!" Pauli cried. "They've stopped outside, and two are coming in! They're after you, Bruce!"

Bruce leaped from the window and snatched up a chair.

"Then I'll fight before they take me!" he shouted. "If I'm your enemy, Carl, start in now! Come on—all of you! I'll show you how an Englishman can scrap!"

"Don't be a fool!" Carl gasped. "We'll get you away. You can escape and get back to your own country. I'll do that much for you because you were my friend. Out through the back window and down on to the shed roof—you can jump it!"

"Yes, Bruce—go!" Pauli swung to him. "Don't let them make you a prisoner—and don't fight! Oh, you're mad, all of you! Get away—they're coming up the stairs!"

Carl wrenched open the door of the other room. Winkelmann ran through it and slammed open the window through which Bruce could escape.

The young Englishman hesitated for a moment, then dropped the chair and started forward. Old Professor Arndt gripped his hand as he passed.

"Heaven keep you, my boy!" he said, and a moment later Bruce was checking where Carl stood by the door.

Bruce offered his hand. Carl drew himself up, his back stiff.

"I can't shake hands with—an enemy," he said.

"Then I'll come back, after the war," Bruce said.

"We'll all be the same again then!" Pauli called after him. "Good-bye, Bruce—good-bye!"

Bruce waved to her and plunged across the room, while the tramp of the mounting soldiers sounded loud on the stairs outside. As he climbed through the window Winkelmann snarled:

"If I meet you on the battlefield, I'll give you no quarter!"

"And I shan't ask it!" Bruce laughed at him. "Good luck to you! And Carl—good luck, old man!"

"Good-bye—enemy!" came Carl's voice, and with that Bruce jumped from the window to the shed roof ten feet below. He landed safely, then scrambled off it to the little yard beyond.

There was a door in the surrounding wall, and he snatched it open, to plunge into an alley. He turned away from the crowd in the street and hurried. In a little while he was mingling with the mob in the broad boulevard of the Franzensring.

There was nothing in his dress to mark him as an Englishman, and he spoke the language well. Wild-eyed crowds were parading. He saw moving groups of soldiers surrounded by great cheering masses of people, and still more crowds were about the huge bulletin boards which now told of successes of Austrian armies on Serbian soil.

Bruce dared not go back to his rooms. Everything there he must abandon. But he had money with him, and he decided to travel south, cross the Italian border somehow, and then make his way to England.

He saw more soldiers rounding up Englishmen in the city, and when he cautiously approached a railway station he found troops on duty there, examining the papers of all who passed through the barrier.

Bruce saw that he would be unable to get aboard a train in Vienna, so he started, then and there, to tramp southward. In an hour he was clear of the city, and in a small shop he bought bread and sausage and a raincoat, as well as a hat.

Bruce leaped to meet his opponent, vainly trying to block the slashing blade.

February 15th, 1930.

Lorries passed him, loaded with troops. Giant guns ground their way towards the frontier, and some gunners gave him a lift on a limber which followed one titanic howitzer.

They were full of how Austria and Germany would smash England between them. They themselves were bound for the raging battles in Serbia, and were full of triumph at the victories the Austrians had already gained.

They told Bruce, too, of how some Englishmen rounded up in Vienna that afternoon had been mobbed by the crowds, dragged to the Danube Canal and slung in, so that most of them were drowned. None of them suspected that they were even then talking to one of the hated British!

When the gunners camped at darkness, Bruce walked on all through the night until dawn, when he hid up in a wood and slept. He skirted the towns to which he came, travelling only by night. Everywhere people were searching for Englishmen, Frenchmen, Serbians or Russians, with all of whom Austria and Germany were at war. Such as the people found were lucky if the military ever took them over; more likely were they to be stoned until they died, or to suffer the fate of the unfortunate bunch of Britishers in Vienna—of whom, Bruce knew, he might well have been one.

He was fourteen days before he reached the Italian frontier—to find it a mass of trenches, where men stood on guard, and where barbed wire had been slung in great festoons, because the Austrians feared that Italy might come into the war, allying herself with Britain. She did later on.

Bruce lay a whole day, hidden in bushes, watching the movements of a group of Austrian sentries before him. At night, he crept forward at a point between two sentries, passed them, squirmed through the thicket of barbed wire, and an hour later he was in Italian territory, telling his story to an Italian officer who immediately gave him food, then sent him south on his journey to England.

It was on the day that Bruce reached safety that Pauli and Carl were married in Vienna. Carl had no best man; Bruce had gone—an enemy—and Winkelmann had been called up.

As Pauli and Carl came arm-in-arm from the church a regiment passed, on its way to force home Austria's invasion of Russia in the north. The troops went swinging by, rifles gleaming, boots spurning the cobbles.

But the cheers were not so hearty now. Weeping women moved in sombre groups beside their men. Casualty lists had come through; many and many a brave Viennese had fallen in the fighting. Many and many a man who now marched past would not come back.

Pauli and Carl clung to one another as they looked at the grim, grey-clad figures of the passing soldiers.

"Carl, shall you have to go?" Pauli breathed as she looked up at him.

"Not yet. They won't call me up for a long while!" Carl said. "The war won't last long enough for them to want me."

But that night, late, a soldier thumped on the door of the little flat they had taken. His fist crashed on the panels, and when Carl opened it, the man jerked to attention and saluted.

"Mobilisation order for Lieutenant Carl Behrend, sir!" the man said. "It orders you to report at dawn at headquarters February 15th, 1930.

quarters to-morrow, with full equipment, ready to move off at midnight!"

Carl took the order and closed the door.

It was a long, blue-tinted envelope, and it would tear him away from the girl he loved. He looked at the clock. It marked the hour of ten-thirty.

In seven hours he must go to the war.

In the Firing Line.

CARL'S division was attached to the German Army, to fight with them against the British. In return, a German division was sent in exchange to fight shoulder to shoulder with the Austrians against their common enemies. This was just a gesture to show how both Germany and Austria were together in the war.

While Carl, commanding a company, marched from Vienna, Bruce was racing from Italy across France and back to England, eager to get into uniform.

On his way, he had seen British wounded from the Battle of Mons. He had seen all Austria and France inflamed by war, and he realised how titanic the conflict would be. As he rode across France, he saw refugees coming in from the battle front, he heard the distant thundering of guns—a sound that was with him until he crossed the Channel.

Bruce arrived in London on the night that news came through that British troops and their French allies had driven the Germans back across the Marne, scoring a great victory.

He heard the cheering and saw the crowds. He saw two battalions of Guards marching to Waterloo to entrain for France, with bands playing and thousands lining the streets—just as they had done in Vienna.

The taxicab that took him home was held up suddenly by a titanic mass of people which abruptly swarmed, struggling and shouting, across the road, chasing some fugitive who rushed away like a wild animal.

"That's a German baker!" an excited man yelled to Bruce when he asked what was the trouble. "If they catch him they'll lynch him!" And the crowd surged on.

"That's the way they were chasing Englishmen in Vienna," Bruce thought, and he could not help feeling sympathy with the pursued man.

It was odd to think of both nations doing exactly the same thing. It was still more odd to think of his friend Carl in uniform fighting against England and her allies—but a month later Bruce himself was in uniform, a lieutenant, training for the front.

The training was long and hard, and it was a year before his battalion was sent to France, and rather more than another year before Fate decreed that Bruce's battalion should enter the line in a sector just south of Arras.

It was near Christmas. Snow clung to the thistle patches of barbed wire that marred the shell-torn stretch of No-Man's-Land. When Bruce had seen his company into position and had posted his sentries, he mounted the fire-step and looked towards the enemy lines.

He was leaner, harder and altogether tougher now. A heavy Army revolver was holstered at his belt, and his uniform was mudstained and torn. For two years the ground in front of him had been fought over, and at any moment the zone was liable to flare up into another fierce battle.

He saw the British wire ahead, a tangle of barbed strands wrapped about leaning stakes. Beyond this was the ploughed-up earth, patched with snow, then the enemy wire, from the other side of which Very lights shot up occasionally, shedding a green-white glow which came down in ghastly fashion as it illuminated the scene around.

Still further off, Bruce could see the bluish flicker of German guns against the sky. Shells droned overhead. Now and again a rifle cracked, or the silence would be shattered by the quick, vicious stammer of a machine-gun.

Boots thudded and grated on the frost-bitten floor of the trench, and a voice called loudly:

"The colonel wants to see you, sir, in headquarters' dug-out!"

"Very good!" Bruce dropped from the fire-step and made his way along the trench. In little funk-holes men crouched over small coke-filled braziers or slept in niches hacked from the walls. The glow of bayoneted rifles, the dull, rounded shapes of steel helmets and the slender, compact masses of masked machine-guns.

Bruce picked his way down a communication trench to the support line and found the dug-out he sought. Orderlies jerked to attention when he entered it and passed through to the battalion headquarters beyond.

The colonel was sitting at a rough table, papers and two trench maps before him, while the adjutant leaned over his shoulder.

"Ah, Lieutenant Gordon, I've a job for you!" the colonel said, as Bruce saluted. "I want you to make a raid to-night."

"A raid, sir?" repeated Bruce, and his heart kicked a little in his chest.

"I want you to take half a dozen bombers, go over, bring back a couple of prisoners for identification—and start within the hour!"

"Yes, sir," answered Bruce, and the colonel eyed him levelly from under his shaggy grey brows.

"The unit which held these trenches before us," the colonel explained, "took a prisoner who said that his regiment was to be relieved by battalions from some crack Austrian division. We've heard about some Austrian troops being in this part of the front, and I want, if possible, to find out just who they are. As you were in Vienna before the war you'll know something about them, and you'll be able to question the prisoners when you bring them in. If you can't get live prisoners over, get their papers and identification badges. Is that all clear?"

"Quite clear, sir," said Bruce steadily. "I take six bombers over with me and make the raid immediately."

"That's right. Best o' luck!" called the colonel, and acknowledged Bruce's salute mechanically.

Bruce returned to the fire trench, and now he viewed No-Man's-Land with different eyes. It was going to be a hard job to get himself and six men across that snow-scattered waste without being seen by the enemy.

And if he were seen it would be bullets from the rifles of Austrians which would come at him. The people in whose university he had studied, and amongst whom he had had so many friends. Standing there, he wondered what had happened to Carl, and how Pauli was getting on.

For all he knew, Carl might now be lying in a soldier's grave.

He went down the trench, asking for volunteers for the raid. He collected his half-dozen men swiftly enough, and they grouped with him in a short sap which ran out from the trench towards their own wire.

"Look here," Bruce told them. "This is going to be risky. We shan't get any artillery support at all, although machine-guns and rifles from the trench here will cover us as we come back.

"We'll crawl over, and be careful that you don't get on to the snow, because it'll show you up to their sentries. When we are through their wire we'll creep close to their parapet, and I'll give the word to rush.

"You two, and you two"—he indicated four men—"go to each side of the enemy fire-bay and chuck bombs over the traverse to prevent any of them getting at us. You other two grab a prisoner each—more if you can manage it. I'll stay on top of the parapet ready to lend a hand if anything goes wrong and to direct operations generally. Now, does everybody know what he's got to do?"

The men nodded. Because they were volunteers they were about the most courageous in Bruce's company. Each man carried a dozen bombs, in addition to trench knob-kerries and revolvers.

"Right-oh, then we may as well start!" Bruce grunted, and led the way out of the sap.

No Man's Land.

BRUCE crawled forward, his men close at his heels. The frost-rimmed wire reared before him, traced against the gun-lit sky. He reached it and went through by a narrow lane which had been specially cut to allow British patrols and listening parties to go out.

At the far side was a stretch of earth, all shell-ripped and shapeless. Broken rifles, steel helmets, torn gasmasks—all kinds of battle litter cluttered it. Amongst this were stretched the scattered figures of men who had died in the fighting; it was too dangerous to try and bring them in.

The ground was hard and icy cold. Here and there patches of grass showed grey where the frost had settled. In and out of shell-holes Bruce led the way. Now and again a shell would burst on the trenches ahead or well back on the enemy support area, breaking with a sudden spurt of lurid flame, then dying in an eruption of flying earth.

Bruce remembered, as he crawled, that it was near to Christmas. He remembered his last Christmas with Carl and Pauli in Vienna—and now he was going out to kill or make prisoner men who might even know his own haunts in Austria's capital.

A Very light quivered up into the sky, limning everything with its stark glare and shining on a coal-scuttle helmet silhouetted against the enemy barbed-wire entanglements ahead!

"Listening-post in front—go steady!" Bruce passed the word back, then whispered: "Two men come up level with me, ready to rush!"

Two of his group came at either side of him, and they went on. Now they travelled forward more and more slowly. Bruce knew that he had to knock out the enemy patrol ahead before he could get through to the trench beyond.

Nearer he crawled. Then the foot of a man behind him slipped where ice had formed in the bottom of a shallow shell-hole, making a scraping sound.

From where he had seen the helmet Bruce heard a guttural exclamation, and three helmets lifted from the ground. He glimpsed the shrouded faces of a trio, their rifles levelling.

"Rush!" Bruce gasped, and leaped with the words.

A rifle spanged almost in his face. He saw one of the three leap to his feet and start to run back. Then the two bombers were on the men, their knob-kerries smashing purposefully, dropping them.

Bruce raised his revolver, sighted on the third of the group and fired it the moment that the man would have shot. The fellow jerked, his knees bent, then he slammed down to the shell-hole in which he had been sheltering, while a Very light curved up into the air, as the men in the trench behind stared to see what had caused the shots.

"Down!" Bruce called the order.

The bombers with him flattened on the ground about the hole and the three still forms now stretched inside it. From the enemy trench a rifle spanged, then two machine-guns stammered wickedly as the gunners traversed No-Man's-Land.

The bullets clipped through the wire, showering caked snow. They plugged the frozen ground or skimmed off it and ricocheted away on the air. More Very lights went up. British weapons started in reply to the Germans. Rifle-grenades screeched on the air and plugged down.

Trench-mortar batteries thudded, hurling massive shells. A field-gun battery got into action, and for half an hour steel screeched across No-Man's-Land in a solid hail, while Bruce and the others clung to the ground and waited for the midnight battle to die down.

The firing ceased off at last, and Bruce made an examination of the three dead men. A glance showed him that they were Austrians, not Germans.

"It's all right, we shan't have to raid the trench," he said. "Get all the papers off them, as well as their shoulder straps. Keep your heads now, and work quietly!"

Five minutes later they were crawling back, pursued by occasional bullets. Within half an hour Bruce was down in the headquarters' dug-out, making his report.

"Very good work!" the colonel commented. "No casualties, eh, except to the three Austrians? Where are the papers?"

"Here, sir."

Bruce set the little bundle down on the table and the colonel looked through them, then picked up a pay-book which

He sat there, his whole body trembling, his eyes vacant and his lips quivering. "Shell-shock!" Mr. Behrend gasped.

Bruce himself had taken from one of the men.

"Look at this, Gordon! What unit did these men belong to?"

Bruce took the little book and examined the writing on the first page.

"Fourteenth Infantry Regiment—Second Vienna Division!" he gasped. "That's Carl's regiment!"

Carl sat in the front line trench, with his coat-collar turned up close about his ears, beating his hands to try and keep them warm. Near him sat Jan, who had come with him from Vienna, and who now acted as his servant.

Jan was a big fellow, above six feet in height, and strong as a lion, but now pinched with cold.

"A pretty fine Christmas this, sir," he growled.

"It's Christmas Eve to night." And Carl smiled a little. "Thank goodness the line's quiet. The English don't want to fight any more than we do just now, from the looks of it."

"It's been all quiet since they mopped up that listening party in front of us three or four nights back," Jan replied. He added suddenly: "Haven't got any—any grub to spare, have you, sir?"

"Not so much as a biscuit," Carl answered. "There's plenty of cigarettes. I'm sick of smoking."

"Cigarettes won't fill a hungry man," Jan answered. "They say the English have got plenty of grub. Why can't we make a raid and get some? I'll volunteer for it!"

"If it wasn't Christmas Eve I'd lead a raid myself," Carl told him. "But that would mean killing—and we can't kill on a day like this."

"I could kill some of those English if I thought I'd get food for doing it!" Jan snarled. "I'm sick of short rations."

"So am I," Carl said slowly. "The English are well fed. They always have been, but—" He stood up and looked over the top of the trench towards the British lines.

Hardly a gun was firing anywhere. No lights showed. There was nothing to see except barbed wire, frost and patches of snow, and the faint glow of trench braziers in the British lines.

But Carl could catch the voices of the English ringing on the frosty air, an occasional shout, and then the lilt of some chorus as the Tommies sang a lively tune:

"Take me back to dear old Blighty, Put me on the train for London Town!

*Take me over there, drop me anywhere,
Birmingham, Leeds or Manchester—
I don't care!*

Oh, I should like to see my best girl—"

It didn't sound to Carl as though the English were particularly anxious to do any fighting on this Christmas Eve. They seemed to be having a pretty good time, while he and the others went hungry in their freezing trenches.

"They've got food—we've got plenty of cigarettes," he murmured. "I wonder if—" An idea came to him, and he stood thinking it over, listening to the distant sounds.

Presently he picked up a length of board from the trench, then snatched at a piece of chalk which a man had used to scrawl the name of a dug-out. Carl knew English; Bruce had taught him. On the board he wrote: "Have you any food to spare?"

"Give me a bayonet, somebody!" he called, and snatched the weapon as a man held it up, then drove the tip into the edge of the board and mounted the fire-step again.

He held the board high above the trench parapet, switched on his flashlight, and directed the beam so that it lit up the lettering.

Instantly there came the crack of a watchful sentry's rifle, and a bullet whanged through the board. More bullets followed, but Carl still held the board high.

The fusillade stopped. He sensed that the British were now reading what he had written. He held the board up half a minute longer, and then lowered it.

He stared across No Man's Land, and presently he sighted the white beam of a torch on their side, shining on a length of wood on which someone had written: "Yes, if you've got cigarettes!"

"See that?" Carl gasped to the men around him. "They say they'll give us food for cigarettes. Give me a couple of packets, somebody, and I'll go over!"

"Let me go, sir—they're a treacherous lot!" Jan growled, but Carl caught the cigarettes a man held out to him, and a moment later he was over the parapet.

Boldly he stood upright and looked ahead. No bullets came at him, and he saw an Englishman rise from the opposite trench.

Slowly Carl went through the barbed wire out into the waste of No Man's Land to meet the figure which was coming towards him. Five yards from it he stopped.

"You have food?" he asked in English.

"Yes," came the answer from the other figure, its face concealed by the darkness. The man held out a package, and Carl stepped nearer. "You have an officer—Carl Behrend," the voice went on. "Is he with you?"

"I'm—It's Bruce!" Carl gasped. "Carl!" Bruce jumped at him. "I chanced coming out because I could speak your language. How are you? How's Pauli?"

"I don't know. I've not seen her. Things are terrible at home—no food—no money!" Carl gasped. "It's—" He broke off as he saw more British coming from their trench. He turned, and then saw that Jan was leading his own men out, bringing more cigarettes.

"They're fraternising—it's all right," Bruce exclaimed. "We shan't shoot if you don't. You haven't been wounded, Carl?"

"No, I'm fit enough—but I'm fed up with the war," Carl answered. "I didn't know you were in front of us!"

"I knew your unit was here," Bruce said. "I raided one of your listening posts the other night."

"That was you, then!" Carl gasped. He peered into Bruce's face and went on: "It's the same old Bruce! It's good to see you again!"

"And to see you!" Bruce caught his hand and wrung it. "And you don't know if Pauli's all right?"

"No, I got an hour's leave in Vienna, but I couldn't trace her," Carl answered. "I found my father, but that was all. He's doing all right—fit and well."

They talked in the middle of No Man's Land, these two old friends who wore the uniforms of their warring countries, while all around them British Tommies, imbued with the spirit of Christmastide, swapped food for cigarettes and souvenirs.

And then there came a scurrying rush on the air with the fierce whine of a shell. It burst in the heart of the waste ground, scattering its droning fragments, felling men and filling the air with smoke.

Another shell came, and another. Some artillery observer had seen movements in No Man's Land, and he was calling on his batteries to fire. More gunners joined in; British and German and the Austrian guns attached to Carl's division.

The uninformed figures broke and scattered, running back to their trenches. Carl parted from Bruce and scurried back the way he had come, Jan at his side.

It was as they ran that there came a mad blast of sound on the air, and a shell burst near them. Carl saw its red heart, saw torn earth flying, heard the colossal crash of it—and then felt as though he were hit a million times at once.

He fell backwards, his sight misted and his head spinning, his whole body numbed from the shock of awful wounds. Through the glare of other shells bursting near he saw Jan; the big man was staggering and reeling blindly, pawing the air until another shell-burst hid him from sight.

Lights flashed across Carl's eyes. He tried to get up, but he could not move. Blackness swamped across his brain, and he felt that he was dying. He tried to call out, but no sound would come.

He forced away the mistiness that cloaked his vision, but it swirled back again, and through it all he thought he heard Bruce calling his name.

A moment after the face of his old friend seemed to float before his eyes.

Carl tried to smile, then sank to oblivion.

Shell-Shock.

IN a little garret, with windows broken and bare furnishings, Pauli sat, sewing alone. There was no fire in the grate; it was a month after Christmas, and she tried to tell herself that warm spring was near, and that she did not feel cold.

The door opened, and her father came in. Professor Arndt was gaunt and thin, and he had sold his overcoat to buy an egg, which he carried wrapped in a paper packing. He carried it more gently and more carefully than he would have done a king's crown.

"An egg, Pauli!" he called. "Now we'll have a feast, my girl! It's nearly a month since I had such luck!"

"Then you eat it, father," said Pauli. "I'm—I'm not hungry."

"We'll share it," the professor said, and Pauli hurried to the stove, gathering up the sticks she had placed there in readiness to cook whatever food her father might bring home.

The professor had lost his job at the university. He did not believe in war. He thought it was all mad foolishness, and he said so. Others did not agree with him; they'd hooted him out of the place.

He had sold all his books and his little treasures. He had moved from his house to this attic. Pauli had tried to get work, but she wasn't strong enough to be a washerwoman; she had been trained to do nothing in particular, and there were many like her in Vienna these days.

No letters had come from Carl. The authorities would not let the soldiers at the front write home now, because Germany and Austria were losing the war, and they did not want the troops to know what hardships the folk at home were suffering.

For that egg the professor had sold

(Continued on page 27.)

For the sake of a girl he went riding, though he was scared stiff of horses. An amazing comedy with an unexpected climax.

Arthur LAKE

in "Horse H shy"

In Love With a Picture.

ARTHUR BRYANT gazed cautiously round the big shop before drawing a newspaper cutting from his pocket. The cutting he spread out on the glass top of the counter.

"Ah, my divinity!"

He sighed and gazed down at the picture of a girl in Red Cross uniform. A costume that Miss Marian Day had worn at a big fancy-dress ball. The outline also stated that the charming Society girl was the daughter of a wealthy financier.

The rough paper is never very complimentary to the best of features, but there was no doubt that this girl was pretty, because the paper could not conceal her good looks. Her hair was dark and shingled, but Arthur had fallen for the twinkle in the big eyes and the dimples in the cheeks.

If only he could meet her and she should fall in love with him!

Now Arthur was nineteen and that age where youth is susceptible to what some term "Calf Love." He was an assistant in the big jewellery store owned by Biggs and Higgins, but he had prospects because Biggs was his uncle.

Arthur was a likeable but a provoking youth. He had arrived at the awkward age of life. At college he was neither a success nor a failure. An average brain had always kept him somewhere near the middle of his form, but his mind had a way of wandering off on to other subjects to the detriment of his learning. In the middle of mathematics he would suddenly want to be playing baseball, and in the middle of baseball he would want to go swimming.

His small-town parents had sent him to Mr. Biggs to be trained to work for a living. At moments he was a brilliant salesman and at other times his uncle nearly tore out his hair with despair. A dreamer, who had moments of great brilliance.

Yet everyone liked him because he had a happy smile, curly black hair, a slim and well-knit body, and a certain amount of charin and personality.

Arthur was quite unaware that the revolving door had revolved and that a lady in furs had walked to the counter that he was supposed to be looking after. She had coughed and had tapped the glass top, but Arthur was away in another world. The lady frowned angrily and placed a gloved hand on his wrist.

Absent-mindedly, he stroked the glove and murmured, "Dearest!"

"How dare you!"

The falsetto voice shattered his dreams.

"I—er—beg your pardon!" spluttered Arthur, blushing like a schoolboy. "I was reading about a big jewel robbery."

"I take that paper and I saw nothing about a jewel robbery on that page!" snapped the lady. "Will you please show me some ear-rings."

Why Arthur should first produce gentlemen's dress studs, and when rebuked bring out engagement-rings is beyond understanding. The lady's exasperation brought Mr. Biggs on the scene, and that gentleman was able to pour oil on troubled waters.

"Yes, madame. No, madame. A perfect pearl, madame." And so forth, and the lady eventually left, having spent far more than she intended. The result was that Mr. Biggs, though he frowned severely, was not half so displeased as he looked.

"One day you'll go into a trance, Arthur, and never wake up," he rebuked. "Now I have a most important commission for you to undertake." He produced a small packet. "This necklace has been specially ordered over the telephone by a lady who wants the necklace to be a surprise for her daughter—the girl is eighteen to-morrow. She wants the necklace taken to her house immediately. You will take the necklace, and for the love of Mike don't lose it or yourself. The address is on the package, and you had better start at once. You have eight hours before dusk." Here Mr. Biggs chuckled. "Only eight miles to go, so you might be able to make it."

"Yes, uncle."

"Be off with you, my boy." The uncle patted him on the back. "And if you don't deliver that to-day, never darken my doors again. So if you're goofy about some gal, forget it."

"I wish I could, uncle," moaned his nephew. "I shall always carry her picture with me."

"You'll get a fat head if you don't look lively!" grunted his uncle. "And don't make any mistakes."

Trouble With a Hat.

ARTHUR BRYANT set out for the railway depot. He entered a full 'bus and went off into a trance thinking of the girl of his dreams.

The 'bus stopped, and nearly all the people got out, so that there were plenty of seats. Arthur still went on standing, until a titter and a remark from a small girl brought him back to earth.

"Has he been a naughty boy, mummy? Perhaps that's why he's standing."

Arthur frowned heavily and took a seat. Within three minutes he was dreaming again, and didn't wake up till the conductor tapped him on the shoulder.

"This is the end of the run, bo," he chuckled. "Unless you wanta go all the way back again. What's up? Your gal giving yer the chuck?"

"I have no girl," haughtily retorted Arthur, and stalked forth, realising that he had gone four streets too far. He was too dignified to return in the same 'bus, and so had to wait. Still, there were plenty of trains.

Another 'bus at last, and it would be crowded.

Somehow, he wedged his way inside and started trouble by treading on a fat lady's corns.

"Look where you're going!" complained the lady shrilly. "Ain't yer got eyes in yer head?"

"Yes, mum."

"Then why not use 'em."

This caused a general laugh, and the fat lady shook all her four chins.

In that crowd it was impossible to do much dreaming, but one could walk on people's feet and nudge neighbours in the ribs, especially as the driver was a run-and-brake merchant. In other words, the driver tore along whenever he saw a clear space, and directly a block appeared on went all the brakes. Those standing swayed backwards and forwards like a storm at sea.

Arthur butted the man next him so violently that the latter's straw hat fell on the floor.

"So sorry!" murmured Arthur, and in stooping to pick it up off came his own.

The hats were restored at last, but the man who had been butted had evidently had a row with his wife or got out of the wrong side of bed that morning, because he kept on glaring at poor Arthur.

Then Arthur got a seat at last, and looked out carefully for the depot. At last the depot and Arthur struggled to his feet.

"No, you must not give up your seat. I insist," a pretty girl said severely to him.

"But I—" began Arthur, when the bus jerked forward and he sat down heavily again.

Arthur made another attempt to get up at the next stop.

"I am quite capable of standing!" The girl was angry. "A girl is the equal of a man any day, and what a man can do we can do! Please keep your seat—I insist!"

"You can insist as much as you like"—Arthur was really angry—"but I'm getting out here."

And the girl gave him a look that would have frozen the North Pole as hard as granite.

Arthur felt better after that—he had scored that time. He marched off to the depot, and, of course, there was a queue waiting for their tickets. The youngster went into another trance as he slowly filed forward. He reached the sill, still in a dream.

What was all that banging about? He looked vaguely around to see a sea of angry faces.

"Brought yer camp stool with yer?" snarled a labourer.

"You kids oughta go to bed earlier!" said another.

"Where's his nurse?" was the worst out of all.

Feverishly Arthur bought a ticket, rammed it into the band of his straw hat, and was so anxious to get away that he ran right into a man—he of the other straw hat.

"Ugh!" grunted the little man, and staggered back. Both straw hats went flying.

"Sorry! Sorry!"

"You confounded young chump!"

February 15th, 1930.

shouted the other excitedly. "Why don't you have your eyes tested?"

Arthur was so confused that he didn't realise he had picked up the wrong hat, whilst the little man was so annoyed that he didn't realise Arthur's hat was nearly over his eyes.

Hence a gust of wind played a fine old game. The hat on Arthur's head was like a pimple and easily whisked off, whilst the wind got under the larger hat and lifted it off the small dome like a new form of kite.

Worse was to follow, because when Arthur chased after his hat that seemed bewitched it did not stop till it came to rest under the front logs of a respectable cart-horse, who was feeling in a hungry mood that day. To the boy's horror, the big teeth closed on the brim and proceeded to get busy on the straw.

No sign of the man in charge, and every time Arthur held out an uncertain hand the horse showed its teeth.

"Here—hi—steady!" cried the lad. "Chuck it, old chap!"

But the horse calmly went on munching till all one side was gone.

"Hallo, son, what's the trouble?" growled a voice, and the carter appeared. "Oh, ho, so old Ned's having a meal!"

The horse gave up the hat quite meekly.

"He's eaten my ticket!" shouted Arthur. "And I don't believe there's another train for an hour." He was feeling feverishly in his pockets to see how much money he possessed when another person arrived on the scene.

"Gimme my hat!" was the infuriated cry. "You knock off my hat and then have the impertinence to take the wrong one!" He grabbed the offending headgear and shoved it on his head without noticing the damage. His anger was so great that probably he was blinded.

"Fool! Dolt! Idiot!" he screeched, and flung Arthur's hat on the ground. "I've a good mind to stamp on it!"

"Here, you be off!" growled the carter, and the man departed muttering dire threats.

With a glad cry Arthur pounced on his hat, and there in the ribbon was the ticket.

"Thanks, old sport!" he cried. "You've saved my life. Can't stop to inquire after the wife and kids, 'cos I gotta catch that train. Cheerio! Drop me a postcard any day."

"Loco!" muttered the carter, pushing his greasy cap on one side and scratching his thick hair, whilst he stared after the running Arthur. "I wouldn't wonder what them two ain't escaped from somewhere. Corks, he'll break his blinking neck!"

The train was on the move and was gathering speed. A guard and about four porters yelled "Stand away!" but Arthur charged after the last car. A final spurt and his outflung hand gripped the rail, and with a mighty heave he dragged himself on to the step. He nearly fell off when his hat tried to do a disappearing act. The carter's heart went to his mouth as Arthur released his hands to jam on his straw hat, before desperately clinging again to the rail. Then the boy ran up the steps and gaily waved.

"Clean off his onion," muttered the carter, then looked all round. "Perhaps he was a film star—don't see no camera. No, he must be loco, as I thought first."

Trouble in a Train.

HAVING caught the train by the skin of his teeth, Arthur sought a seat, but found that the coaches were all very full. The carriage was a saloon with double seats and a gangway between. A fat lady had a seat to herself, but she was so monstrous that after vainly endeavouring to place some portion of his anatomy upon the cushion he gave it up and went elsewhere.

In the very end coach Arthur saw two spare seats—on opposite sides of the corridor, but level. On one of the double seats sat a man, and on the other a girl. Being of a nervous disposition, Arthur chose to sit next to the man.

Arthur settled himself down, but dreams were not possible. How can a chap dream when there is a peculiar odour in the air? He glanced at his companion, then became aware that the girl had a handkerchief to her nose. Another look at his companion noticed a movement of the jaws. The latter becoming aware of Arthur's gaze turned his head, and the boy nearly swooned.

"Ze garlic spearmint—verra good," said the Italian, with a broad smile. "I inventa cet myself—you takka zee piece."

"No, thanks I don't," gasped Arthur. "Phew, gimme air!"

Whereupon Arthur leaned forward and pressed a knob which was supposed to open the window about two inches. Unfortunately he pressed the bottom knob instead of the top, and the window opened quite a foot.

A torrent of air swept into the car. Can you imagine a liner with a gaping hole in her side and the seas sweeping in? Well, that was very like what happened when Arthur opened that window. People reading newspapers either had them snatched out of their hands or else were buried in their folds. Papers, handbags, hats, and other debris reposing on the tables were whisked off like straw. Glasses and cups were spilled, and among the shrieks and screams of the women could be heard a few comments by the males.

"Shut that blankety, blank window!" "Chuck him out of the car!" "My hat's ruined!" "Where's my ice-cream cornet?"—this last raised the passengers to boiling pitch. They stood up as best they could and all shouted and hooted and screamed at Arthur, who got thoroughly panicky and pressed another button, whereupon by some freak the window opened a further foot.

"Cursa de vind!" shouted the Italian. "You bigga de fool!" He managed to find the right knob, and the window shut with a clang.

Arthur sank limply in his seat and tried to imagine that all the rude things that were being said were not about him at all. He tried to dream again, and became aware that there was something in his eye—grit that must have got in when the window was open. He became aware that the person on the seat next to him was cycling him with amusement. What a surprise Arthur got when he found she was the girl of his dreams—and he could have sat next to her! Instead of which he was next to an evil-smelling Italian.

As Arthur stared at her, hardly crediting his senses, the grain of dust got busy on the nerve cells and his left eyelid flickered once, and as the girl's own eyes opened wide with indignation, so did Arthur wink again and again. He knew he was winking and couldn't stop it.

Marian Day gave him a look that would have killed, and busied herself with a book, but it was not so easy to read. Her curiosity was aroused, and he was such a nice-looking lad; she ventured a quick peep. Arthur, the picture of misery, was dabbing at his left eye. He removed the handkerchief, and noticing that peep decided upon a bold move.

He pointed to his eye, shook his head, winked twice, and then rubbed it vigorously. Marian understood at once that something was in his eye. She forgave him with the faintest twitch of the lips, and then returned to her book.

How can one dream when one's dream is sitting within a few feet of you. Marian was even prettier than her picture, but Arthur quite realised that her chin was a very determined chin. How could he frame some excuse to talk to her. He blushed uncomfortably some minutes later when he heard a whispered: "Rubberneck" from some kind person behind, denoting that his ardent gaze at the girl had not been overlooked.

The girl must have heard, because she flashed a startled look at Arthur, who had rubbed his eye so much that it was quite blood-shot—the effect was heightened by a stream of tears that he couldn't check.

"You've got something in your eye," stated the girl, who was as kind as she was pretty. "Could I get it out for you?"

"Could she?" Why Arthur very nearly leaped from his seat to her side. Did the lady miss the boy's enthusiasm—not she! At once Marian got busy with a small handkerchief, and Arthur was quite sorry that she removed the cinder so efficiently and so swiftly.

"There, that's out!" she cried triumphantly, and expected him to return to his seat.

Arthur glanced at the Italian, who saved the day by producing a very dirty handkerchief, and inside some even worse sandwiches.

The boy looked at the girl, and she looked at the sandwiches—both their nostrils quivered—and Arthur, with love in his heart for the Italian, stayed where he was.

So far so good, but in these days you can't touch a strange young woman on the shoulder and start a conversation by saying: "Where are you going, my pretty maiden?" Or words to that effect. Probably she would clout you one round the ear or hand you over to the guard with a hint that probably a bootlegger had had some influence on your present condition.

Marian would have had no objection to becoming friendly with Arthur, but she had been brought up by very strict parents, who had taught her that it was not for the lady to make advances; besides, hadn't she done him a good turn already. And Arthur, fearing a rebuke, kept a still tongue, and thus wasted a golden opportunity.

But the opportunity was soon to arrive. The nigger attendant came along the car to see if anyone required refreshments; he evidently had waited on the girl before, because he grinned broadly and produced a bottle of ginger-beer.

"I'll open it," said the girl, and went back to her book till the end of the chapter. Having turned down the page, she picked up the bottle and the opener, and wondered why Arthur had not had the common sense to offer to open the bottle. Arthur also wondered why he had been such a chump; he just sat and stared at her like one hypnotised.

Marian made one effort, but the patent top would not lever off, she made a second effort, and again had no luck.

"Could I do it for you?"

"Thank you so much!" murmured the girl, and gave the bottle and lever to Arthur.

His first effort brought no result, and, grimly determined, Arthur stood up, but still the bottle wouldn't open. In his efforts he did not realise that the bottle of ginger pop was being shaken violently, also it was a very hot day. What, therefore, might be the result when that lid-top suddenly came off?

A sudden release of gassy substance at express speed. Squirt a syphon into someone's face, and you have a good idea. Unfortunately the bottle was pointed towards Marian when the lid came off, and the girl got a shower bath.

"O-o-o-oh!" A gasp and a shudder. "Oh, you careless wretch!"

Arthur made things worse by trying to put his finger over the escaping spray, with the result that the people behind had a shower bath, and, when he altered his finger, then the spray got those in front in the back of the neck.

The light of friendship in the girl's eye had gone, because she was wearing a particularly smart two-piece dress and coat, which was, to her mind, ruined. It wasn't, but girls are strange creatures. She would arrive home for her birthday, looking stained and bedraggled, and the chick outfit would be wasted. Therefore, the dress and coat were ruined.

Arthur produced a large handkerchief and dabbed at her rather helplessly, whereupon the girl pushed him away.

"You're the clumsiest idiot I've ever met!" she snapped unkindly. "You'll only make matters worse."

"I don't think it's done any harm," began Arthur.

"You ought to be put in a place where you can't do any harm," growled a damp passenger.

Annoyed that all his good work with the girl of his dreams had been shattered, Arthur turned upon the accuser. "A bath won't do you any harm!" he growled. "You look as if you need one."

Of course that insult meant a small scene. The man wanted to get abusive, and had to be held back by several others. All this while, Marian was repairing ravages to her complexion with a powder-puff.

The man broke free and aimed a wild blow at Arthur, who drew back his head and then jerked back his arm in order to return the blow. His elbow caught the powder-box, and there was further catastrophe. A large shower of powder went all over Marian, so that it looked as if it had been snowing.

The passengers' wrath turned to laughter, and, except for Arthur and Marian, everyone doubled up with mirth. Marian jumped to her feet, said "Oh!" in a sort of strangled whisper, and then turned her back haughtily on the culprit.

The train slowing saved the situation, because Marian realised this was her home depot. She swept by Arthur like a small iceberg, without the least sign of being aware that such a person as Arthur Bryant ever existed.

Arthur stared after her dumbly, until he realised from the black porter's shout that this was his destination as well. He grabbed his hat, glared at the other passengers, and hurried down the corridor. He had better get his mission done and get back to business—this would go down as the worst day of his life.

"How dare you follow me!" Marian cried indignantly.

He alighted from the train and saw a porter.

"Do you know this address?" And he showed the parcel.

"Sure I do that!" grinned the fellow. "We all know 'em. Most generous they be and kindly disposed with their tips." He pointed to a straight road and a solitary figure. "See that young lady? You follow her."

Even at that distance, Arthur recognised the girl.

"Why follow her?" gasped he, like a fish out of water.

"That be Miss Marian Day!" laughed the fellow. "That parcel be for her mother. It be Miss Marian's birthday to-morrow." Here he winked. "That'll be a present, I suppose."

Determinedly Arthur stepped out after the girl, and there was renewed hope in his heart. Maybe there would be a chance of pacifying her ladyship.

The Lull Before the Storm.

AS the girl walked she brushed the powder from her clothes. Now she was annoyed for another reason. The car was not here to meet her, but as she had stated that she would come by a later train, what could she expect? Still, a walk might cool her fevered brow.

Something made her look back, and then her plucked eyebrows went up in an arch of indignation. That impertinent pup of a boy had had the audacity to follow her. With eyes flashing fire she waited till he drew near.

"How dare you follow me?" she cried indignantly. "If you don't go home I shall call the police."

And before Arthur could say a word she had marched away with her head very much in the air.

"Here, I say!" called Arthur, and began to hurry after her.

Marian turned, stamped her foot, and went on all the faster. Her anger increased when she looked back a few minutes later to find him following her. "Check!" she cried, and began to run.

"Confound it!" growled Arthur, and had to run as well.

After a quarter of a mile the girl paused for breath, and looked back, imagining that Arthur would be a speck on the horizon. Her horrified gaze saw a running figure that shambled to a walk even as she watched. Could he be a bad young man—one of those that held you up and stole your money? No, for all his faults she didn't think he could be as bad as all that.

Horror upon horror—he was waving to her. A gesture to stop. Then he must be a bad lad.

Marian began to run again, and sighed with relief as she saw the iron gates of her country house ahead. She glanced back at the entrance of the drive and shook her fist derisively. He wouldn't dare follow her any farther.

The sound of running footsteps made her whip round, and there he was at the gates.

"Hi!" he shouted; but Marian, in sudden panic, had taken to her heels.

Up the steps she rushed to the front door. He was following her, and she rang the bell furiously.

Watson, the butler, appeared.

"There's a man following me, drive him away!" she gasped, and darted into doors, but waited by the staircase to see what would happen. Somehow she didn't want Watson to get rough.

"What do you want?" growled the butler. "Why you following Miss Marian?"

"I've got a parcel for Mrs. Day," stated Arthur between puffs. "I inquired the way, and they said follow Miss Marian. I'm from Biggs & Higgins, jewellers."

"Oh, I see," murmured Watson. "Wait here, please."

Mrs. Day had appeared, and mother and daughter had flown to each other's arms.

"So glad you've come earlier. You do look flushed," said the mother, a trifle anxiously.

"I've been running." Marian glanced at the glass door, where she could see two figures. "I'll go and change my clothes."

"Do, darling," murmured the mother.

At the top of the stairs Marian looked down. The boy was actually in the hall and shaking hands with her mother. This looked like a mystery. She would change quickly and find out what it all meant.

Meanwhile, Arthur was explaining that he came from Biggs & Higgins, and had a very important parcel.

"Ah!" exclaimed Mrs. Day. "The pearls for Marian." Then she smiled at the boy. "What is your name?"

"Arthur Bryant, madame," said the boy.

"You don't by any means come from Pullervale, Ohio?" she asked, and at once Arthur's face lit up.

"Sure, that's my home town," he cried. "My pop sent me to Mr. Biggs to learn a trade, and it seems years since I've been away."

"Arthur, I'm delighted to meet you," was the surprising remark of Mrs. Day as she held out her hand. "Your mother and I were old school friends, and knowing I was in Chicago, she wrote asking if I could invite you round."

Here Mrs. Day hesitated.

"I have to confess I mislaid the letter, but directly I saw you I guessed at once who you were. You're the image of your mother. How very curious!"

Arthur just stood there tongue-tied, and then kindly Mrs. Day went on talking.

"You've come at a right time. It's Marian's birthday to-morrow, and you shall stay the night and come to the party. I'll ring up your uncle and put that right." Here she smiled. "We do a lot of business with him, so he won't mind. And don't say a word that you work for Biggs & Higgins, because I want those pearls to be a surprise for Marian. You will be just an old friend. Ah, here she comes! Marian!"

It was a surprise for Marian when her mother introduced the boy as an old friend of the family. Arthur looked so apologetic that all her anger vanished, and she held out her hand. Arthur clasped it in a firm grasp.

"I'm going riding this afternoon," she cried gaily. "We've got a spare horse, and you can be my escort."

"You're a quick worker, Marian," laughed her mother. "So the young folk know you're back already? All the same crowd, I suppose?"

"All those that are coming to the party," laughed Marian. "We're going to ride and think out rags—awful fun."

"I—er—can't go riding like this," nervously murmured Arthur. "Perhaps I could follow on foot?"

"Not unless you've got wings," laughed Marian. "Mums, he shall have pop's outfit."

"Of course Arthur can," exclaimed the mother. "Watson!" The butler appeared. "Take this gentleman upstairs and get out the master's riding suit."

And thus was Arthur Bryant led away to what he thought was his final doom.

The Fateful Ride.

ARTHUR tried to think of every excuse to get out of that ride, but every excuse broke down under one argument—the girl would think him a coward.

He squared his shoulders. He must go riding, and pray that if he were chucked off he would be chucked on to something soft. Don't think the lad was a coward; but when very small he was savaged by a horse, and grew up eyeing horses with mistrust. They were best left alone, hence the fact that he had never ridden a horse in his life, and he knew that it was no child's play. He didn't mind a fall so much, it was the fact that he would look a perfect idiot in front of Marian and all her young friends.

Why couldn't they go out on motor-bicycles? He'd show 'em a thing or two! But horses! He shuddered, and climbed into the breeches of Pep Day. Evidently the father must be a very tall man, because the breeches fitted nowhere. The clothes fitted well under the arms for length, whilst two of Arthur would have still given the waist line an inch or two to spare. For a moment he decided to plead that as her father's pants didn't fit, he couldn't ride with the daughter.

Cowardice again. No, he would ride even if he did look a perfect sight. His honour demanded this sacrifice.

How Marian laughed when Arthur Bryant came down the stairs. The girl was a charming picture in buff riding breeches, silk blouse, and a French beret.

"You remind me of a comic turn at the theatres," she hooted with laughter. "much to Arthur's annoyance. 'Aren't your breeches a trifle short?' she asked with gentle sarcasm.

"My temper will also be short before I'm through," rasped Arthur, whose nerves were rather on edge.

"Come on, Arthur," she cried gaily.

"All the others are here."

"I'm ready, Miss Day." He said it like a martyr.

"Cut out the miss stuff," cried the girl. "You don't think I'm going to bleed Mr. Bryant all day long, do you? Come on, my lad."

"All right, Marian," answered the ghost of Arthur. "Hope the boss ain't as large as your pop's pants."

"Only sixteen hands." An answer that meant nothing to him. It would have been just the same if she had said "sixteen feet." At any rate, Arthur decided that the horse was a darned sight too tall and big when he managed to tear himself away from the house. To his distorted imagination, Buster looked like an elephant.

Marian waved gaily to a dozen or so boys and girls that were waiting. All sat their saddles as if they were born to them. A groom appeared, and Marian leaped up as if she were a feather. Then a groom came forward with Buster—it was Arthur's turn.

The youngster approached the mount slowly and warily; it seemed to him as if he had never seen a horse with such a nasty expression. The groom gave a swift glance at the girths, just touched the stirrups and stood prepared to help Arthur into the saddle.

Now there is a wrong way and a right way of mounting a horse. You don't want to put your right foot into the left stirrup. A procedure that brought a titter of mirth. Having discovered which foot was required, Arthur managed to get same into the stirrup, but a horse usually moves slightly forward as one mounts and it is advisable to stand slightly nearer the animal's head, so that one is helped into the saddle by the forward movement. Not unlike the mounting of a bicycle.

Try and mount a bicycle and not go with it, and you land on the mudguards and the ground. Well, Arthur landed on Buster's hindquarters, and then slid gracefully to the ground.

More mirth, in which Marian joined. "Buck up, Arthur."

Arthur collected himself together, glared at the horse, squared his shoulders, and went at Buster with a rush. His foot found the stirrup and up he went into the air, so fast that he went clean over the saddle and landed in a heap on the other side.

"He's a trick rider," said one person unkindly.

Arthur summoned a grin, struggled to his feet and endeavoured to do the rush again, but not quite so fast. He landed in the saddle, clutched wildly at the pommel and again slid to the ground with a jolt that did his spine no end of good.

By this time, Arthur was considerably bruised and dusty, but he wouldn't be beaten, and he came at the horse again. This time he reduced the rush, and only half got into the saddle, another wild grab and once more he was on terra firma.

All the party yelled their approval, but Marian was annoyed that her new friend was making such an exhibition of himself. He didn't seem to be able to do a single thing without making a mess of it.

"We're meeting Winnie, Thelma and Archie on the Ridgeway," she called out. "They'll get fed up with waiting if we don't hurry."

The rest were so interested in Arthur's antics, that they didn't want to go, but Marian was a young woman who had her own way. She watched one more fruitless effort, and then turned her horse down the drive.

"You go ahead," called out Arthur, weakly. "I'll catch you up."

More laughter and the party had trooped away. The groom held the restive horse, and it says much for the man that his face never twitched.

"May I show you, sir, the best way to mount Buster?" he said. "Hosses have their fancies, and Buster likes this way best."

Therewith followed a graceful and easy movement, which Arthur watched with envious eyes.

"Let's have another try," he cried, dusting himself down, and hoping that Marian's father didn't often use his riding kit.

This time, Arthur gained the saddle, where he wobbled like a watery jelly. The groom showed him how to thread the reins between his fingers. Simple enough except that Buster would keep on tossing up his head, anxious no doubt to join the other horses. Every time that happened, Arthur was jolted forward and nearly shot over his head, only a desperate grip on the saddle saved the day.

"Buster's got a tough mouth, mister," warned the groom. "Otherwise he's as quiet as a lamb."

"Tough mouth?"

"Been ridden hard by amateurs." Perhaps the groom's mouth did twitch this time. "Always sawing on his mouth—makes 'em tough. So that if you ain't careful, Buster will get the bit between his teeth and be frolicsome. No harm in him, but likes a run."

"What ought I to do?"

"Keep a tight rein, mister," was the warning. "Never let him get his head down. In other words don't let him pry around for rabbit holes." Here he lowered his voice to a whisper. "Take my tip, mister, and trot. Let them others do all the cantering and galloping. Oh, and one thing else." He held up a finger in mysterious manner. "Hosses has a way of knowing when they're going home. A hos will go out all peaceful like, but directly ye turns his head for home, up goes his ears and whatho?"

"Whatho?" puzzled Arthur.

"Goes all out at the first chance," grinned the groom. "That's when you want to keep yer hands up. Good luck, mister."

But Arthur hadn't heard the last sentence, because Buster had grown tired of waiting, had whisked round, and gone down the drive like a streak of lightning. Actually it was only a canter, but to Arthur it seemed like lightning.

Beating the Wind.

FOR a few yards Arthur managed to grip the reins, but a sudden lurch made him feverishly grip the pommel.

Out in the roadway, and every instinct seemed to urge the boy to choose the easy way and fall out of the saddle before it was too late, but though he couldn't ride he had plenty of courage. He would stick on this plaguey horse if it killed him.

Bump, bump, bump! He tried to visualise other people that he had seen riding. Between his anguish he remembered someone telling him that one must keep in time with the horse, and that if one rose in the air at the precise moment the jolting would cease. After a lot of painful jolting, Arthur suddenly found himself rising and falling. He felt frightfully elated until he rose a trifle too far and was pitched forward, his arms enfolded Buster's neck, and, by the time Arthur had got back into the saddle, Buster had got the bit between his teeth.

If the trot had been lightning, this was greased. His hat was whisked from his head, whilst pop's large coat streamed out like a kite. He endeavoured to lie back and drag the bit from Buster's teeth, and that nearly caused his downfall—only a desperate clutch at the pommel saved him. He remembered about gripping with the knees—advice he had read in a book—but with pants that are about ten sizes too big, it was nigh impossible.

"Oh, look!" cried one of the young party.

The young folk turned to see Arthur boring down on them like an express train.

"Hi, Arthur, stop!" cried Marian.

But Arthur didn't stop because he couldn't. He had found that by lying low over Buster's neck he was able to recover his breath. Hence he looked like an out-of-work jockey as he flashed past.

Buster saw a stretch of open country, and next moment was on soft grassland.

"Help!" weakly moaned Arthur, and saw ahead a large hedge.

Like a bird the horse went up in the air, to disappear from the sight of the gaping party.

"Well, I am surprised!" gasped one youth. "That's daredevil riding, and no mistake. I say, Marian, perhaps that new friend of yours was pulling our legs."

"I expect he was," murmured Marian, forcing a smile.

Arthur gripped Slim Harris by the throat.

She had her own opinions, but was pleased that the others differed.

But let us follow Arthur Bryant and see where he is now—a good mile away. Already two more hedges have been jumped with ease. Arthur began to sit up a little, a strange exhilaration in his heart. If he survived this outing he'd learn to ride.

Why Buster should then have chosen to tear through a wood is beyond comprehension. Branches and bows whizzed over Arthur's head, dirt, twigs, and leaves bespattered his clothes, but still he clung to the saddle. A small branch whipped his cheek and made him yelp with the pain—pain that made him really angry.

"I'll learn ye, you brute!" he cried, and gripped the reins between his fingers. Back he swung in the saddle, and, to his surprise, Buster began to slow, but off went the horse again when another bough caused the boy to duck.

Clear of the wood, and once more Arthur was tugging at the reins. Buster went from a gallop to a canter, and from a canter to a jog-trot, and finally from a walk to a halt.

"Corks!" breathed Arthur. "I'm still alive!"

He decided to get back to the party and show him what he could do, but forgot what the groom had said about Buster going home. Off went Buster on another mad gallop, and, strain as he might, Arthur could not pull in his mount.

"All right, have it your own way!" shouted the lad, and, in a fit of bravado, slapped the horse hard.

Bing! The only word that can describe the amazing speed that Buster suddenly developed. Arthur had a vague idea of skimming over bushes and under trees, flashing over a stream, and then, by some miracle, being once more on the road.

The cloud of dust was spotted by the anxious Marian.

"He's coming back," she cried.

Like a whirlwind the horseman drew nearer.

"Hi, Arthur, stop!" yelled the girl.

But once again Arthur shot by, and they stared after the disappearing cloud of dust.

"Coo, I ain't ever seen Buster move like that before!" gasped a youth.

"Darned if I'd like to chance it!"

Arthur looked up and saw the iron gates ahead, and, like a flash, Buster had whipped round and pounded over the drive, to stop like a lamb before the house. The boy slithered out of the saddle, mopped his brow, and with one hand leaning against the horse's flanks, gasped for breath.

Then he began to realise the sight he presented.

"I'll teach you to play tricks with me!" he growled. "You just wait there a moment!"

Into the house flew Arthur, and was glad to find no one about. Up the stairs he raced to his room, and, forgetting all about aches and pains, changed into his own clothes.

Down the stairs he went, quite unaware that from behind a pillar a man with fierce eyes watched him.

Curiously enough, Buster was still waiting, and Arthur almost flew into the saddle.

"Now you git on down the drive," stormed Arthur, "and make it snappy!"

And Buster, recognising that something had happened to his young rider, obeyed quite meekly.

February 15th, 1930.

The Burglary.

IF Arthur Bryant hadn't been in such a tearing hurry he might have thought it curious that in so big a household there was no one about.

Actually, much had been happening. The gentleman of the straw hat, who had caused Arthur some inconvenience in the train, had also chosen the Day household for a visit. He was a gentleman of the light-fingered fraternity, who earned his livelihood by burglary and such methods. He knew that there would be valuable presents for Marian's birthday, and had come there because he felt they would be very useful to himself.

Being an expert, he had scaled a wall and found his way towards the servants' quarters. Here the sight of a gun caused those worthies to scuttle like rabbits into the cellar, where they had been locked in.

That done, Slim Harris, of the carefully-cut clothes, had walked upstairs. Mr. Day was out; Mrs. Day was asleep, whilst the latter's personal maid was also enjoying forty winks. He had found the room where all the presents were stored, had made his pick, and prepared to depart. This departure was interrupted by the appearance of Arthur, and Slim had gripped a loaded stick in readiness to deal with the boy, but it hadn't been necessary.

Arthur gone, Slim was at liberty to depart, and he decided to go by the same way that he had entered, with the result that Slim was slinking along by a high wall when a thunderbolt landed on him.

Out in the main road, Arthur turned in the direction he had last seen Marian, but, much to his annoyance, he could find no sign of them.

"Just my luck!" he grumbled, and tried the open country.

No sign of his new friends, so he returned to the main road.

A pedestrian was seen approaching, and, with a whoop, Arthur went after the man. The latter was thoroughly scared as Arthur slithered to a stop, because the youngster was so eager to find Marian that in his keenness he stopped too violently and winded himself on Buster's head.

"Have you"—gasp—"seen some"—gasp—"riders"—final gasp.

"Saw a party way back—Mrs. Day and friends," said the fellow.

"Which way were they going?" he panted out.

"Should say they were riding round the estate," was the answer. "Have you lost 'em?"

"I don't look as if I'd found 'em, do I?" growled Arthur. "Many thanks!"

Once more he was off down the road, and when the high wall that surrounded Marian's home turned at right angles, Arthur left the road and tore over brambles and hedgerows in pursuit.

Buster had decided that a joke was a joke, and that he had had quite enough for one afternoon.

Ahead Arthur saw his new friends, and whooping gaily urged the horse to renewed effort. Buster, with ill grace, responded.

His approach was heard, and the whole party pulled up to wait for him, but by this time Buster was in a bad temper. Arthur tugged like mad at the reins, but the horse tore on at a mad gallop.

The riders scattered to right and left, and Arthur gasped with horror as Buster, when close to the spot where the party had been a moment before, suddenly charged straight at the wall.

"Woo!" bleated Arthur, and the horse stuck out his front legs like bars of iron.

The result was that Arthur flew out of the saddle like a stone from a catapult, up in the air he went, to sail gracefully over the wall. To land with a crash on the shoulders of the man who slunk through the gardens.

In a heap Slim Harris and Arthur Bryant crashed to the ground.

Both were winded, whilst the black bag with the jewels burst open. Arthur was the first to recover, and how his eyes blinked at sight of the man with the straw hat, the open bag, and the loaded stick. It was the pearls that revealed the truth, because they were the actual pearls that Biggs and Higgins had given him to deliver.

Slim Harris opened his eyes and, being a crook, at once thought about safety, but directly he tried to wriggle to his feet Arthur was on him like a terrier.

"No, you don't!" he cried, and gripped him by the throat.

Desperately, the two struggled, but Arthur was grim and determined. This was his chance to get in well with Marian.

"Help, help!" he yelled.

"He's badly hurt!" wailed Marian.

"Oh, we must be quick!"

It was several minutes before they could get to the scene through a private entrance to which Marian had the key. What a surprise to find Arthur having a rough-and-tumble with a strange man, then Mrs. Day appeared on the scene.

"The pearls. Your presents, Marian!" she wailed. "Oh, hold that man, somebody!" The butler, much ruffled in appearance, charged past, and Slim Harris gave up the struggle.

Explanations followed. Mrs. Day told how she had rung for tea and got no answer, and had finally located the servants in the cellar. Arthur was patted on the back, and though he ached abominably, smiled like a conqueror.

"You brave boy!" said Marian, and that was like music in his ears.

They hustled the unfortunate Slim Harris away, and Mrs. Day and the party went off in an excited group. Mrs. Day knew that Marian would want to thank Arthur personally.

All Arthur's new-found courage evaporated when he found himself alone with Marian, who was gazing up at him in a friendly but most provoking manner.

"I'm awfully pleased, Arthur," she said. "I shall ask pops to see that you come here often. That's if you'd like to come and stay."

"Would I—you bet!" mumbled Arthur.

"I don't know how to thank you," went on the girl, and edged a little nearer. "I shan't scream."

"You won't scream!" It was a puzzler to Arthur. "What you want to scream for?"

Marian edged a little closer so that her upturned face was not many inches from Arthur's nose.

"You're very dense, Arthur!" she mocked. "I don't believe you would dare."

A great grin illuminated Arthur's face because the grey cells had suddenly functioned. She wouldn't scream if he kissed her.

And Arthur was so greatly daring that he not only kissed her once, but three times, and Marian never screamed.

(By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., featuring Arthur Lake as Arthur Bryant.)

A band of crooks try to prevent a lad inheriting land rich in oil. A brave girl and a daredevil cowboy champion the boy and risk their lives to see justice done. Starring Jack Perrin and Eileen Sedgewick.

"THE VANISHING WEST"

EPISODE 5.

"THE END OF THE TRAIL."

Wells Fargo Takes Control.

AFTER him!" Sheriff El Waldon shouted, brandishing his gun in the air. "He can't have got far, and I reckon he knows more than he will tell."

Three of the deputies made for the door, thrusting their weapons into their holsters as they ran. They were about to pass into the street when the quiet voice of Wells Fargo checked them.

"Let him go, my friends," he said. "He cannot get away, and I dare say I know where to look for him when I want him."

The sheriff immediately protested. He was feeling somewhat sore at the way he had been left in the dark.

"He's a slippery customer, Mr. Fargo," he said, half in anxiety, half in annoyance. "If he's allowed too much rope, he'll clear out altogether."

Fargo shrugged his shoulders casually. He had proceeded too far with the case now not to know what he was doing; at the same time, he was not disposed to take the sheriff into his confidence just yet.

"He'll not clear out. And if he does, who could stop him?" He looked at the sheriff shrewdly. "As I understand things, you brought him here with the others for the purpose of holding an inquiry. Actually, you had nothing against him. Am I not right?"

"I might not have had just now, but I reckon he's as good as confessed," the sheriff retorted. "He's cleared out at a time when things were getting too warm for him, and that's enough for me. I am entitled to hold him until I can complete my inquiries."

Wells Fargo shook his head.

"Tell me, what exactly have you got against him apart from the fact that he ran away?" He paused, waiting for an answer. None came. "You see, you haven't even the basis of a prosecution." He plunged his hand into his pocket once more and drew out the handful of flint arrowheads that he had shown previously. "What have you found out about these, for instance?"

"Nothing," replied the sheriff shortly. "Except that one was found on the ground after the Toyahvale stage coach was held up and the driver murdered. Another was discovered after the hold-up of the El Paso, Limited, six months ago, and two others were found on Jim Marvin."

Wells Fargo nodded slowly.

"And so you jumped to the conclusion that Jim Marvin was the leader of the hold-up gang," he murmured softly. "At the same time, you knew he was not the type that made robbery and murder his profession. You must have been in a bad state over it."

Sheriff El Waldon swung away savagely. He was quite well aware that Fargo was having a quiet laugh at his expense, and the thought did not please him. But he was unable to make any answers which would establish his standing again. When he came to think over the whole case calmly, he realised he knew as much about it as he did about battleships—exactly nothing.

"Anyway, I am entitled to hold Trent and his men for attempted murder," he said obstinately. "They tried to blow Jim Marvin and some others into small pieces down at the old silver mine."

Wells Fargo looked round slowly, as if weighing in his mind what he ought to do. Then he calmly threw aside the rug that had been tucked round his knees, climbed out of the bathchair, and walked into the centre of the group.

"That little deception was necessary," he explained. "No one ever thinks a cripple is dangerous." He studied the arrowheads in his hand for a few moments, and then looked up once more. "These things are incriminating. As they have been found after a murder, I should say that anyone who has one of them in his possession at this moment is liable to be indicted on the capital charge."

He spoke quietly and deliberately; at the same time, there seemed to be in his expression a far-away, unalert expression, as though he were talking to himself.

The ensuing silence was broken by a slight clatter. In a moment he had swung round.

"Those four men over there!" he snapped, and his whole attitude had undergone a change. "Get your hands up! I am formally arresting you for the killing of the driver of the Toyahville stage."

His gun pointed in the direction of Collins, Skeggs, Maloney, and Perrin.

If there had been any doubt that Collins was completely innocent of this accusation, it was speedily dispelled now. He went dead white, and his hands shook with fright as he held them above his head.

"I didn't—I didn't!" he blurted out. "I had nothing to do with it. I came all along that shooting the driver of the stage up was a mistake, and would land us all in the calaboose."

Fargo stepped quickly up to his side. "You're lying, Collins!" he said. "It was you that fired the fatal shot!"

"It wasn't! I swear it wasn't!"

"Then who did?"

"Jack Trent!"

Wells Fargo returned to where the sheriff was standing. A faint smile hovered about the corners of his mouth.

"A simple ruse, but it always works," he murmured. "I wonder you didn't think of it yourself. You see, those four men dumped a load of the arrowheads as soon as I said that anyone carrying any would be implicated. That's how I knew it was them."

Jim Marvin stepped forward and touched Wells Fargo on the arm.

"That clears me, doesn't it?" he asked. "I had nothing to do with the hold-up. I was at the Bar X ranch at the time it took place. My brothers and I were working at the dipping troughs, and three of those guys were with me. They denied I was there at the time, and that's how the sheriff began to get suspicious of me. Now it's been proved that they are some of Trent's men, and that they would naturally want to get rid of me, I reckon their story about me being missing at the time of the murder doesn't hold good."

Fargo held up his hand.

"One moment, young man," he said quickly. "As I see things, you are in love with Wally Lee's guardian, which means that in the event of Wally establishing his claim to those oil lands, you would practically control his money. Am I right?"

"You are."

"Then, sit tight a minute. Before I let you go, I'm having this case cleared once and for all."

Jim stood back with Betty as Fargo reached out for a chair. He carried it over to a far corner, placed it with its seat to the wall, and then sat down, his arms resting on the back.

"Mamie Trent, stand forward!" he called.

There was a stir as a door at the back of the saloon opened and she walked into the room.

The Mystery Man.

WELLS FARGO regarded her in silence for a few moments, purposely holding in his hand so that she could see two of the flint arrowheads.

"Mrs. Trent," he said at last, "I have sometimes wondered why you ever put up with your husband. He hasn't treated you too well. Anyway, he has reached the end of his career now, and I don't expect you're sorry." He indicated the arrowheads. "Perhaps you'd like to tell me about these."

She stared at him levelly, and in her eyes he could see uncertainty. Suddenly they hardened.

"I can tell you nothing," she replied coldly.

"No?" He shifted to a more comfortable position on his chair. "Well, perhaps it is not so important, after all, because I think I know all I want to. You see, I have been making a few inquiries. Your father and mother own a granite quarry up in the mountains, don't they?"

"Well, what if they do?"

"The granite got from there is exactly like that of which these arrowheads are made," Fargo went on slowly, his voice never rising above a conversational tone. "Of course, I hate to suggest it, but it might so happen that I have to take along your father as an accessory."

She looked at him wildly, as if she would like to spring on him and tear him to pieces. Then, as if the strain had become too much for her, she broke down, burying her face in her hands.

February 15th, 1930.

"There, there," said Fargo soothingly. "Don't take it like that. I'm only just trying to find out enough to establish the innocence of those who were nothing to do with the murder, and incidentally bring to justice those who were responsible." He paused again, as though remembering something else. "Let me see, your name before your marriage was Coles, wasn't it?"

She nodded, her face still hidden. "I thought so. It was the name of the guard of the Toyahvale stage who disappeared after the driver had been killed."

She looked up at that, and her eyes began to blaze recklessly. Fargo sat back, knowing that he had broken down her resistance.

"You can't implicate him," she cried. "You can't, I tell you. It would kill my father and mother if they knew. I'll admit that Dick was guard on the stage, but he fell into debt with the man who did the hold-up."

"Playing Faro at this saloon?" Fargo interposed gently.

"Yes." The word was spoken almost in a whisper as she realised the trap into which she had fallen. "You've got me to give the game away now. It was into my husband's clutches he fell. Trent had half this township in his hands at one time through gambling debts. Dick was amongst them."

"And Dick had to take the job of guard on the stage to help Trent with his hold-up?" Fargo suggested, seeing the trend of events now that he had heard so much.

"Yes, that was it." Her voice rose almost to a shrill scream. "You clever devil! You've made me squeal on my own husband. You've tied me up until I've had to put the noose round his neck."

"It's my job," Fargo said slowly. "Anyway, he never meant much to you."

He turned to the sheriff. "Sheriff, see that Mamie Trent is escorted to Barstow, where her people live. I shall not want her again. The arrowheads came from her father's quarry, where she made them under Trent's orders. She acted under coercion, and the law can't touch her."

She turned away, and quietly left the room. Her face was still buried in her hands, and she was weeping.

"I think that more or less clears up the murder case," Fargo went on. "Trent did the job, and a few more inquiries will establish the fact that he was the leader of the hold-up gang that has been working in these parts."

"What about Jim Marvin?" the sheriff asked.

"Oh, yes! Jim Marvin." Fargo's eyes flickered for a moment over Jim's face. "His case is more complicated, isn't it? Let me see now. Was Trent present when you found the arrowhead the first time?"

"Yes," the sheriff replied. "You see, Trent had knocked him down, and when I came to help him to his feet I found it lying by his side."

"That disposes of one incident," Fargo commented. "The arrowhead obviously fell out of Trent's pocket, or was dropped from it deliberately during or after the struggle. How about the second time?"

The sheriff pondered for a moment, as though trying to recall the circumstances.

"I found it in Jim's pocket when I arrested him in the deserted hotel at the oil city," he said slowly.

"I put it there without thinking," Jim put in. "It was left on the counter after the box containing Wally's papers had disappeared."

Fargo glanced at him, and then rested his chin on his hands. Dead silence prevailed for several minutes, broken only by the detective drawing in his breath sharply. His eyes were fixed on the doorway.

Everyone in the room turned. Standing before them was the mystery man, his face no longer masked. His head was still bandaged, and under his arm he carried a black tin box.

Wally stared at him dumbfoundedly, and then darted forward.

"Father!" he exclaimed. "It's you! You're not dead!"

Old Robert Lee chuckled.

"Do I look like it?" he added, putting his free arm round Wally's shoulders.

Fargo thought the occasion well worth more personal investigation. He got up from his chair and went over to where the two were standing.

"Robert Lee?" he asked.

"That's me," Lee replied.

"I am Wells Fargo, the man you have been impersonating," the detective went on. "The impersonation was partly my fault, of course, because I told some others that you were me. It distracted attention from my movements. At the moment I am looking into one or two small matters for the sheriff, and I think you can help me. Will you come over this way?"

He led Lee to where the others were standing, and resumed his position on his chair.

The Trump Card.

THE proceedings were interrupted for a while. The sheriff and Fargo held a hurried consultation out of hearing of the others, and then the sheriff went away.

As soon as he had gone Fargo turned to Lee once more.

"You've led everyone a pretty dance this last week, Lee," he said. "A whole heap of people have been looking for you, and you've been around all the time. What's the big idea?"

"Ever heard of a writ of attachment?" Lee asked.

"I have," Fargo replied. "It's an order of the court, subject to defence, attaching all your goods and money for the benefit of a creditor. In other words, if you owe someone a stiff bill and you don't pay it, they can seize all you've got and sell it for their benefit."

"If they can find you," Lee interposed. "The writ can't be enforced unless it's been served on you personally, and you have a chance either to defend yourself or to pay what you owe." Fargo uttered a low whistle of surprise.

"So that was it?" he muttered. "Trent had you as well?"

Lee nodded.

"You see, I always had an idea that those gushers would start up again sooner or later," he explained. "Oil wells don't run dry in such a short time. So, as I'd married Trent's sister, I went to him for loans to hang on when things got bad. He started to worry me for the return of the money long before I was ready to repay, and one day I heard that he had applied to the commissioner for the writ."

"I made myself pretty scarce, I can tell you. You see, if I had had that writ served on me, Trent would have taken the lands, and what I knew to be worth millions would have been sold by him in public auction for a mere few hundreds. I dared not risk that, so I just vanished from sight."

"Wally's coming down here completely took me by surprise. I had reckoned on him being safe in school at St. Louis. Then I heard about the gushers starting up again, and about Trent making desperate bids to get Wally's proofs that he was my son away from him. I decided that until I could clear myself financially I should have to remain in hiding."

Fargo nodded slowly and smiled. The whole case was resolving itself with complete simplicity, and he had a satisfied feeling that everything would turn out right for everybody. Even the sheriff would be able to have Trent's hold-up gang under lock and key.

A mere ordinary man might have put Collins and the three other confederates in irons then and there, but Fargo was not an ordinary man. On the contrary, he adopted unusual methods which always made him successful in the final issues of every case he investigated, and this one was going to be no exception.

"But why steal your son's papers?" he asked, his eyes half closed.

Lee started and looked at him closely. Fargo had a disconcerting habit of taking people by surprise.

"I suppose I ought to explain that," Lee said. "Especially as I tried to get young Jim Marvin put in the calaboose. You see, Jim was working in Wally's interests because he had fallen in love with Betty, and I knew him of old to be a stiff proposition. So when he made for the deserted hotel in the oil city I followed.

"I waited until his back was turned, and so timed things that the sheriff and his men were approaching. Then I took the box containing the papers from where he had put it on the counter, and left in its place a flint arrowhead that I had found lying on the ground some days before. I reckoned that Jim would pick up the arrowhead and be found with it in his hand when the sheriff arrived.

"Things worked out even better. Jim put the flint in his pocket, and he was arrested. But the plan failed. He escaped.

"There was nothing else to do but to keep him hanging about with me. If I surrounded myself with a certain amount of mystery by wearing a mask so as to throw him and others off the scent—I did not want Wally to recognise me, for one thing—that was all part of my game. I was mainly concerned in preventing Jim from finding out that Robert Lee was still alive, for if I had let him know he would have insisted that I showed up to the sheriff so as to establish Wally's claim. And the moment my face was seen in Black Rock the commissioner's clerk would have planted that writ on me, and the lands would have been swallowed up in my liability with Trent."

Fargo wasted no further time in considering the matter. He turned to Jim at once.

"You're free," he announced. "The sheriff never really had anything on you, only he hadn't the time or the patience to probe to the bottom of what had been happening."

Jim turned to Betty impulsively. Now that he was clear of the shadow of a crime he had never committed he wanted to say something he had been saving up ever since he had met her.

"Betty, I—"

Fargo's voice cut across the room like a knife.

"Cut it out!" he said. "Leave all that for some other time. What do you think this place is—a bower of roses?"

A yell of laughter went up from those standing around. It was followed quickly by a shout of warning, and a shot sounded abruptly. With an oath two of the deputies made a rush for the door through which Collins had vanished a split second before.

Again Fargo's voice dominated the situation.

"Let him go!" he said calmly. "See that the other three are handcuffed securely now. I don't want them to escape."

Lee stepped forward quickly. On his face was a look of alarm.

"He's gone to warn Trent and help him collect the rest of the gang," he said. "I saw them once all together, and there must be at least twenty. Unless you stop him there will be bloodshed. They'll come back and massacre the lot of us."

Fargo lit a cigar with studied deliberation.

"No doubt they will come back," he said coolly. "For one thing, Trent will want to clear this building of inermittant documents. But as for bloodshed—" He paused and a thoughtful look came into his eyes. "Perhaps you will all excuse me," he went on. "I have one or two arrangements to make. Lee, you had better take your son and Miss Kincaid to the hotel. It will be safer there."

He went to a door leading to the back of the premises and disappeared through it.

"He's got something up his sleeve," said Lee, watching him go. "What it is I don't know, but that man holds the trump card in this little game."

The Attack.

TRENT gathered his band of followers around him in the forest behind the deserted oil city. As each one passed before him he held up a small flint arrowhead as evidence of his identity.

"Things have come to a crisis, men," Trent said, addressing them. "It has been discovered that I am at the head of the hold-up organisation, and Wells Fargo, the detective, is at my saloon making inquiries. The whole of my private papers are in the building also. You know what that means."

A murmur of apprehension went up. They knew well enough. The names of all of them, together with enough evidence to send them to penal servitude, were at Wells Fargo's mercy.

"I can get you out of this if you'll stand by me to the limit," Trent went on quickly. "If you don't, then Fargo will get us. What do you say?"

A shout went up. There was no doubt as to their support. They were implicated to the hilt, and they knew it.

"Then look to your guns, and see that they're fully loaded. That saloon must be burnt to the ground so that not a particle of it remains. And Wells Fargo must burn with it. Come on."

With Trent at their head they rode out of the forest on to the trail and proceeded at a gallop towards Black Rock. Barely had they covered half the distance before Trent suddenly held up his hand for a halt. He shaded his eyes and looked down the trail at a small cloud of dust that moved towards them.

"It's Collins!" he exclaimed, and broke into a gallop once more.

Collins drew rein by Trent's side a minute later, and Trent could see that on his face was a look of fear.

"What is the matter?" he asked quickly. "Has anything serious happened?"

"That Wells Fargo is uncanny," Collins said in an agitated voice. "He's

The room was like a battlefield. Jim sprang at Trent and laid his enemy backwards across a table. Again and again he crashed his fist into Trent's face.

been asking questions, and knows that you did that murder job. He also knows all about the hold-ups and our share in trying to get Lee's lands. He's after you, Trent, and unless you're mighty careful he'll get you, too."

Trent drew back his lips in a snarl. His face was a study of ugly brutality.

"You mean he'd like to get me," he said. "We're on our way now to burn up my saloon and destroy every shred of evidence that could possibly be used against us in a court of law. If necessary, we'll clean out the whole township. You'd better join us. You'll be safer than wandering about on your own."

They rode on, gathering speed as they came within sight of the town itself. Like an avalanche of death they swept into the main street, cleared it from end to end with a fusillade of shots, and approached the saloon at a gallop.

Jim and Steve, watching side by side from the windows, saw them coming. They waited until the last moment, hoping against hope that a battle would be averted.

Suddenly they dropped behind the sill as they saw two forty-fives levelled at them simultaneously. The bullets whined in through the window and flattened themselves on the wall behind.

"Let them have it!" said Jim quietly. "Give them what they came for!"

Steve and Jim, with the remaining deputies, crowded to every available opening from which they could see the street, and their guns began to crack rapidly. Two of the bandits dropped almost immediately, and the remainder hung back.

"Keep them busy!" came Trent's voice. "Surround the building. They can't get out. Remember, if one of them gets away we're for the pen."

His men obeyed with alacrity. They spread out fanwise and closed in on all sides of the building, dismounting and taking cover behind any protection that offered.

Jim saw the move and did his best to counter it. He and his men plugged away at the attackers in the hope that they could break their formation, but their shooting was of no avail. The whole thing had been done too quickly, and Trent had so distributed his followers that fast shooting was almost useless.

"Where is Wells Fargo?" Lee asked. "He said he would see us through, but he seems to have cleared out. Has anyone seen him?"

"He left by the back way," answered a voice. "He took one of the horses from the compound and rode off in the direction of the sheriff's office."

Jim looked grave. He was watching suspicious movements outside.

"I hope he gets along pretty quickly," he said. "They're bringing up brushwood and paraffin from the store opposite. I believe they've—Yes, they've shot old Mike who runs the place and they're looting it." He lowered his voice. "They're going to burn us out!"

"Great heavens!" exclaimed Lee in an agonised voice. "I wish I had taken Fargo's advice and moved Wally and Betty to the hotel."

Jim started, and looked over to where Betty was sitting. She was struggling with Wally, who wanted to get to the windows with his catapult.

"Let me get at 'em," he was saying. "If I can only draw a bead on that chap Trent I'll bust his nose for him."

Jim went across and laid his hand on Wally's shoulder.

"Don't make things too difficult for Betty, son," he said kindly. "She's quite right in not letting you run into danger. If you showed yourself at the windows for one second someone would plug you clean, and you wouldn't even see who did it before you passed out."

"All right, Jim," Wally replied willingly enough. "Sorry. I didn't realise I was making myself a nuisance."

A shout came from Steve, who had been watching the street outside.

"There's Wells Fargo," he yelled. "Come and look."

Jim rushed to his side, and saw the detective engaged in what was apparently a pleasant conversation with Trent himself. He bore his usual calm expression, and appeared quite oblivious to the fact that at any moment someone might send a bullet into him.

"He'll pull us out of this somehow," Lee cut in. "I don't know how he'll do it, but he will. You mark my words."

Trent's Last Bid.

WELLS FARGO had made quick work of his visit to the sheriff's office, spending a quarter of an hour on the telephone. He returned to the saloon in time to see Trent's men ride up, and drew aside under cover of a pile of boxes to await developments.

Presently he watched Trent give orders for the saloon to be surrounded, and moved forward quickly. He made a wide detour until he was behind the building in which Trent himself had taken cover, and climbed in at one of the windows.

Trent, busily taking aim at a small hole in the wall of the saloon through which Steve was firing, did not hear his approach. The first he knew of his presence was when he felt his gun removed from his hand.

He spun round, and emitted a sharp oath. Fargo promptly jabbed him in the ribs with his own weapon.

"Did you think I was still inside there, Trent?" he asked. "What a pity I'm not. Your fellows could have such a cheerful bonfire, and I dare say I would crackle quite musically. But it's not my way to be caught like that. I let Collins go because I knew he would come straight to you and would tell you I was a fool. Take it from me, I'm not."

"I'll fix you, you twister," Trent ground out between clenched teeth, and made a quick movement to get hold of his gun. His hands stopped in mid-air as he heard the sharp click of it being cocked.

"Don't try anything like that," Fargo advised. "It's unhealthy."

"What are you going to do?" Trent demanded, beginning to get scared.

"Completely stonewall you," was the swift reply. "Make things so that neither you nor your men can move an inch for a quarter of an hour. At the end of that time—well, I have a little surprise for you." He motioned towards the door. "Let's go outside. It's stuffy in here."

Like one in a dream, Trent obeyed. Still with Fargo's pressure on his ribs, he walked straight into the exposed position in front of the saloon, and the shooting from both sides stopped from the sheer surprise of the move.

"Going to be pleasant—or awkward?" Fargo asked pleasantly.

"I'm going to tell my men to kill you," retorted Trent savagely.

"I somehow thought you would," Fargo observed. "It shows that you are a man who is completely lacking in imagination." He raised his voice. "Jim Marvin!"

"Hallo!" came Jim's voice from the saloon.

"Trent threatens to tell his men to plug me. Return the compliment if he does, will you?"

"Right."

Trent paled visibly. He saw now the position into which he had been led. His main reason for coming into the open so willingly was that he knew he could have Fargo killed there, but he had forgotten about the defenders in the saloon. If Fargo's position was dangerous, so was his own. They would get him before he could move a single pace towards cover.

"How do you feel about things now?" Fargo asked.

"I'm waiting for your next move," Trent replied. "Then I'll tell you."

Fargo shrugged his shoulders. "There isn't a next move," he said.

"You're through, and if you wait here long enough you'll know why."

For the next ten minutes Fargo did his best to engage Trent in pleasant conversation, and the end of which time he abandoned his efforts. They stood in the centre of the street in silence, the attack stopped in a complete and insoluble deadlock.

Fargo was the first to move again. He turned so that he could see up the street towards the sheriff's office, and nodded with satisfaction.

"I told you I hadn't got a next move, Trent," he said quietly. "I had already made it before I came after you. A company of state troops is coming down the road to look after you and your cut-throats. Have you anything to say to that?"

Trent hung his head. This last revelation had knocked all the fight out of him.

"Only that I'm beat," he replied in a low voice.

Fargo left the final rounding up to the troops, and took Trent and Collins inside the saloon. Piled in one of the corners were Skeggs, Maloney, and Perrin, their handcuffs removed in case fire had broken out.

Jim greeted Fargo cheerfully as he came in, and then turned on Trent. He was about to say something when Fargo's hand dropped on his shoulder.

"Let him be," he said. "He's through."

Jim nodded understandingly and walked over to where Betty was waiting for him. He held out his hands, and she took them.

"Well, that's the end of the trail, Betty," he said. "So now I'm going to ask you that question."

She smiled up at him happily. "You don't need to ask it, Jim, and I don't need to answer. It isn't necessary."

He drew her towards him, while the deputies and others looked on interestedly. They had forgotten everything else for the moment, except the young couple before them.

A shout went up, and they wheeled round instinctively.

"Trent's got my guns," yelled a deputy.

"Get your nits up," came Trent's voice, cutting through the noise of the confusion. "Come on, men! Rush them!"

Jim dropped Betty's hands abruptly and looked round swiftly to fix Trent's

(Continued on page 28.)

JOHN BARRYMORE.

*A recent portrait of the famous
and popular film star.*

"BRANDED A COWARD."

(Continued from page 8.)

The officer made a swift note on his pad, and told the guard that an inquiry would be held in the morning. Then he started out on his inspection of the cabins.

He saw nothing out of the ordinary until he reached that occupied by Bill and Skeeter. Then he saw that Bill's bunk was empty.

"Where is Cadet Dunn?" he demanded in a sharp tone.

Skeeter raised his head above the bed-clothes, and sprang out as soon as he saw who it was.

"I don't know, sir. He went out to wash, I think."

"Tell him to report to me as soon as he returns." Then turned as there was a movement at the door behind him. "Cadet Dunn!" He stared at Bill almost unbelievably, knowing him to be one of the most promising students at the academy. "What are you doing at this hour in full-dress rig?"

"I've been out, sir," Bill explained, saluting. "I'm sorry I'm late, but I was hung up and couldn't get back earlier."

The officer looked at him grimly.

"Very well. You will remain in your quarters until you are sent for. I shall bring a charge against you for striking one of the guards."

Bill stared at him aghast.

"But, sir—" he began, and then stopped. He had seen what had happened in the grounds. "Very good, sir," he finished, and saluted.

From the Jaws of Death.

LIEUTENANT DUNN faced Bill squarely. His face lined heavily with the worry of Bill's arrest, bore disappointment.

"When I received the skipper's message at Washington, I got leave to come across," he said. "There must be some explanation, something I can do to clear things up." He laid his hands on Bill's shoulders. "Come, my boy, tell me about it. You can't ruin your whole career like this."

Bill swallowed hard. The last few days had been agony for him. Accused of striking a superior, one of the worst crimes in the service, he could see nothing before him but the end of all his ambitions. They would expel him from the Navy, and in one moment his whole future would be ruined. It would even be impossible for him to have anything more to do with Betty, for without his pay marriage would be out of the question.

"I'm sorry, dad," he replied slowly. "I have nothing to say."

The old man shook his head sadly. "There's something strange here," he said slowly. "I know you didn't do it, because it wouldn't be like you. For some reason or other, you're shielding someone else. Who is it, and why?"

Bill looked up suddenly. He squared his shoulders.

"Listen, dad," he said firmly. "You are right when you say that I am taking the blame for someone else, and I'm going to tell you why I'm doing it. I had a friend once, and he loves a girl I love also. At one time I had a faint hope that she loved me in return, but this other fellow appears to have won her back completely. She sent a letter by him the other night telling me so. Also he was out at a time when he was under open arrest, and you know what that means."

February 15th, 1930.

"I do," said his father. "Go on."

"Here is my position. If I report what I know and so clear myself, I get him kicked out of the Service, and that would make the girl feel rotten. It would also look as if I'd shopped him to leave the way clear for myself." Bill lowered his voice to a whisper. "Now what would you have me do? Play a dirty trick by resorting, or keep things as they are?"

His father looked at him for a few moments, and in that short space of time the expression on his face changed to one of intense pride.

"My boy," he said slowly, a catch in his voice, "what an officer you would have made."

Bill had been given his answer. "What an officer you would have made." Not what an officer he will make. Bill's career was ended.

That night he disappeared. The master-at-arms reported that a motor-boat had been seen heading towards the open sea, down the Chesapeake River with a cadet on board. It was Bill's way of putting himself beyond the reach of awkward questions.

Early the following morning, even before divisions, the admiral commanding the academy received a message that a lady desired to see him urgently. The name on the card was "Miss Betty Allen."

"I have never heard of her," the admiral said. "Ask her to make an appointment."

The junior officer who had brought the message persisted.

"She says it is about Cadet Dunn, sir," he said. "She wants to see you most urgently."

The admiral's attitude changed at once. "Show her in!" he ordered curtly, and the junior saluted and withdrew.

Presently Betty was ushered in. Her eyes were heavy, and she looked worried and tired. She was given a chair, and sank into it listlessly.

"Mr. Dunn has disappeared," she said in a low voice.

"I'm afraid so," the admiral replied. "He left last night, making his way down the river. Perhaps it is as well. I shall have his name deleted from the registers, and that will be the end of the matter. It will save both him and the academy from the disgrace of an expulsion."

"But he didn't do it!" Betty protested. "I know he didn't. Please won't you believe me?"

The admiral shook his head. His attitude was courteous but firm.

"I'm sorry. I have to administer a charge of this type entirely upon evidence." He went over to her side and laid a kindly hand on her arm. "Don't worry about it, young lady. Everything has turned out for the best. He has done wrong according to the traditions of the service, and he has made what restitution he can by going away."

Betty looked up at him, and saw that there could be no altering of his decision. He was the last possible source of appeal, and if he refused to consider the case there was no higher authority to whom she could go.

She fumbled at the catch of her handbag, and drew out two letters.

"I had hoped that it wouldn't be necessary to show you these," she said slowly. "It means an even worse disgrace on one of the other cadets, because he's been guilty of something like forgery. Bill—Mr. Dunn—went away because of me."

"Because of you?" The admiral looked at her in surprise. "I do not understand."

"Mr. Luff was out that night when the guard was struck," she went on. "He bragged about it to his room mate, and when the room mate—he's called Bulge, I think, but I don't know his proper name—when Bulge wanted to report what Mr. Luff had told him, Mr. Dunn forbade him to. It was Mr. Luff who struck the guard."

"Cadet Luff?" The admiral snapped out the question almost savagely. He did not like the type of man who would let another bear the blame. "Can you prove that?"

"Yes." Betty selected one of the letters. "This note was supposed to have been written by me, telling Mr. Dunn that I didn't care for him any more. Mr. Dunn had never seen my writing, so he couldn't know that Mr. Luff had written it. This other one is from Mr. Luff to me. It seems that Bulge had told some of the other cadets, and they treated Mr. Luff so badly that he had to give in the end. So he wrote me a confession and left the academy by the early morning train."

The admiral took the letters and read them. The writing of each was identical. One was addressed to Bill and signed in Betty's name, and the other was addressed to Betty and signed by Herbert.

He rang a bell, and sent for Herbert's papers. He compared signatures, and nodded slowly. For a long time he sat quite still, his head bowed in thought. Then he reached out for his telephone.

"Get me aircraft headquarters," he said to the operator, and then waited. "Is that you, Ellendale?" he went on as soon as connection was established.

"Can you send out a search squadron at once? One of my cadets is on the Chesapeake River in a motor-boat heading for the sea. Yes, there's been some misunderstanding here, and he thought he was in disgrace. It's cleared up now, and I want you to find him. What's that? At once? Good man! Report when you have news, will you? Thanks!" He hung up the receiver, and turned to Betty once more. "They'll land him at the slipways in Eastport," he went on. "You can go over in my car if you wish."

He held up his hand quickly to check her thanks.

Meanwhile, far down the river, approaching the Potomac line which marked the beginning of the open sea, Bill stered his tiny craft mechanically. He knew he had reached the end of everything, and was just not caring what happened. All he wanted to do was to get as far away from Annapolis as he could.

Suddenly he glanced at his petrol gauge, and saw that the pointer was approaching zero. He looked round quickly, and sighted another vessel a short distance away. Immediately he changed course, hoping that the skipper of the other craft could replenish his tanks.

The men on the other boat saw him coming. There was a swift scurry on deck.

"It's a revenue man," one of them said. "If he finds this cargo of liquor aboard, he'll take us in."

"Sink him," was the immediate response, and covers were ripped swiftly off a machine-gun mounted in the bows.

A hail of lead pinged against Bill's craft, and he ducked hastily behind the engine housing. Clouds of spray rose his overcoat and five ancient volumes which had cost him much money before the war. But the coat was threadbare, and the last of his books were worth nothing when the whole nation's energy was bent on war. And the egg had cost him twelve shillings; which was a low price, the shopman had said.

(Continued on page 28.)

"THE ENEMY."

(Continued from page 14.)

"I heard news," the professor said, as Pauli lit the fire. "It may be that Carl's regiment is coming home for a rest. I'm not sure," he went on quickly, "but there is a rumour about it."

"His father will know!" Pauli said eagerly. "He's doing well—making a lot of money, they say. We could ask him."

"He's a profiteer," the professor said. "Fat and well-fed, and—!" He broke off as the door swung open, and Mr. Behrend himself entered.

He wore a fur coat with a gold watch-chain slung across his waistcoat. He had grown fatter during the war, and now there was a smile on his face as he looked around the room.

"Well, well, well!" he said. "I told you, professor, that you'd get yourself into trouble for talking against the war. And how's my little Pauli, eh? You're looking thin! Carl will want to see you with roses in your cheeks, and—"

"Is he coming home?" Pauli gasped. "Yes, his regiment's due now!" the profiteer said. "At any moment they—hear that?"

He raised his hand. The sound of a band came from outside, its strains stirring.

"That must be them!" the professor gasped. "They never play a band now unless it's for men coming back from the front."

"It's Carl's regiment!" Pauli called from where she had rushed to the window. "I can see them in the street, and—here he is!"

She half screamed the words as the door of the garret was pushed slowly open. It slumped wide, but it was not Carl who stood there. It was Jan.

There was a bandage around his head, bloodstained. His overcoat was torn and smothered with mud. He was unshaven. He had no equipment, and his hands quivered and shook as he stared half-unseeingly around the room.

A stricken silence fell as they regarded him, then Paul spoke.

"Where's Carl?" she asked. "The 11-lieutenant?" Jan stared at her, then stumbled farther into the room and dropped into a chair which the professor pushed out for him.

He sat there, his whole body trembling, his eyes vacant, and his lips quivering.

"Shell-shock!" Mr. Behrend gasped. "Th-th-that's r-right!" Jan murmured. "S-shell-shock!"

"Where is Carl?" Pauli rushed to him and caught at one of his shaking hands. "Is he with the regiment?"

"Th-they're here," Jan quavered. "But th-the lieutenant's—d-d-dead!"

"Dead!" Pauli backed from him, her eyes wide and frightened. "Carl—dead!"

"We've had a t-terrible time—shells and—guns and no food!" Jan's voice steadied, though he still trembled. "I've seen trenches full of dead men, and—it was Christmas Eve when they killed him. The shell hit me, too—here." He touched his head. "I can't think. I wandered about. But I s-saw him fall. He's dead, like a lot more!"

"Dead!" Through the now opened window came the tramp of the regiment as it passed, boots thudding rhythmically on the cobbles, the sound of the band dying, and suddenly Pauli laughed.

"My Carl's dead!" she said. "Ha, isn't that funny? He married me, and then he marched away to the war—like the others are marching! Marching—marching—hear them, all going to be killed, like Carl! Hear the gun-wheels rattling on the road—hear the band playing—that's war! It's war that's killed my Carl!"

Then she sank, swooning to the floor.

From the Schottenring Railway Station in war-trenched Vienna came men from the trenches.

The war was over, and these were the soldiers coming home. England and the rest of her allies had won.

These men came back to the homes they had left years before, but they were different in appearance from when they had marched away. There were wounded amongst them, for whom the hospitals were too full.

There were men who limped, limbless fellows who aided one another. There were soldiers whose uniforms were in rags, who were hungry and worn and deathly tired.

They wandered through the streets, looking for their homes and the folk they had left behind them. In those streets—like the streets in London and Berlin and Paris—people had cheered the outbreak of war. There was no cheering now for the men who had come back from fighting for them.

There was only cold and poverty, hunger and a great weariness. About the gates of the railway stations in Vienna women stood and waited in the hope that, after all, their own men might be amongst the survivors.

Pauli did not wait with those women. She sat in her garret, hopeless. Things were a little better now. Her father had got back his old job in the University, because people were more ready to listen to his talk of peace between all men.

Pauli did not even start when a strange footstep sounded on the bare stairs, but she looked up when the door opened and someone entered.

"Why—Bruce!" she said wonderingly. Bruce stood there. His left arm was missing below the elbow, and the empty sleeve was pinned up.

"Pauli!" He spoke gently. "You said you'd come back after the war." She stood up, still looking at him. "What fools we were! Do you remember how Carl stabbed you? And it's been all for nothing—nobody's won really."

"I had to come and see you, Pauli," Bruce said, as he stepped towards her.

"Is it because you said you loved me?" Pauli asked. "That won't be any good, Bruce. I think you're fine, but I'll always love Carl, even though I've lost him. He was killed one Christmas Eve."

"I was there," Bruce said slowly. "I saw him!"

"You saw him die?" The colour drained from Pauli's face now.

"I saw him hit, and I picked him up and carried him to our lines," Bruce said. "I sent him out of the trenches, and they pulled him through." His voice quickened. "They've kept him prisoner of war, and now I've brought him back to you, Pauli."

"You've—!" Pauli did not seem to understand.

"He's outside," Bruce said, and turned. "Carl!" he called. "Come in now, old chap!"

Carl entered slowly. His cap was battered, his overcoat was worn and old, the once-smart uniform was torn. Pauli looked at him unbelievably, and not until he touched her hand did she speak his name.

Bruce watched his friend take her in his arms, before he moved towards the door.

He stood there for a moment, looking back at them—at the girl he loved, and the enemy he loved just as well.

Then, very quietly, he went out and closed the door behind him.

(By special permission of the Metro-Goldwyn Film Co., Ltd., starring Ralph Forbes, Lillian Gish, and Ralph Emerson.)

THREE GRAND FILM NOVELS.

BETTY COMPSON in "The Time, the Place, and the Girl."

"THE TIME, THE PLACE, AND THE GIRL."

Is a woman ever justified in sacrificing her good name for the man she loves? Don't miss this romantic comedy of a football star and a flirt.

"GUILTY"

Sixteen years an innocent man served behind prison bars, and when he regained his freedom he kills a man to protect his wife and daughter's honour. A powerful drama.

"DESERT LOVERS!"

The treacherous Turks separated the brave Arab Sheikh and his sweetheart, but Allah willed that the progress of civilisation should bring a happy re-union.

And "THE TIGER'S SHADOW," a gripping new mystery serial.

Don't miss this grand issue of our new companion paper, packed with stories and pictures.

"SCREEN STORIES."

OUT ON WEDNESDAY. PRICE TWOPENCE. February 15th, 1930.

"Branded a Coward."

(Continued from page 26.)

from the side as the stream of bullets thudded into the wooden hull and cut their way through.

Suddenly the firing ceased, and the liquor craft made off at full speed. Bill stood up again and looked after them, wondering what it was all about. Apparently they had not attempted to aim at him personally, and the fact puzzled him.

Not for long did he remain wondering. Water began to filter through the deck boarding as it came awash, and the engine spluttered to an abrupt standstill. In vain Bill tried to get to the leak and stop it up. The bootleggers had done their work too well.

He had reached the highest point of the motor-boat—the roof of the cabin—when there came a steady droning from above. He looked up, and saw four heavy flying-boats above, their long, slender fuselages gleaming in the early sun. Wildly he waved his cap to attract their attention.

They saw him. Swiftly one of them swooped down to the surface of the water, and taxi'd forward.

Bill clutched at the wing as it swept past, and clambered aboard. Slowly he made his way towards the cockpit.

"Are you the young shaver from Annapolis that's been getting yourself into trouble?" bellowed the pilot.

"I am," Bill replied. "But I don't reckon I'm going back there. If you've come to collect me, I'm going overboard. I'd be in the way if I returned."

The pilot leaned over and grabbed him by the collar of his jacket.

"Cut that talk right out," he said. "The skipper of my unit told me to tell you that there'd been a misunderstanding or something, and as I passed low over Eastport slipways I saw the admiral of the academy standing below looking at our squadron. There was a girl with him. Does that convey anything to you?"

"It does," said Bill briefly. "How fast can this old tub go?"

The pilot did not answer. Instead he opened his throttle wide, and Bill held on for dear life while they shot forward and banked steeply for the turn back to Annapolis—and Betty.

(By permission of the Producers' Distributing Company, Ltd., starring Johnny Mack Brown as Bill Dunn.)

The NEWS REEL

(Continued from page 2.)

Nearly Lost His Balance.

While acting in a talking sequence from the roof of a restaurant in London, Carl Brisson nearly lost his balance and fell into the street below.

The picture he was taking part in is "The Song of Soho," and the scene in question shows him seated on a low parapet of a Soho café and singing to Edna Davies, who is listening to him from a window below. Edna Davies, seeing his danger, shouted in alarm, and at the same time an assistant director who was at Carl Brisson's side grabbed hold of him as the star was about to fall.

In the picture, Carl Brisson's singing will be heard in conjunction with the ordinary noises of a London street.

position. Then he leapt across the roof.

Both Trent's guns roared at once, and someone gave a cry of pain. Almost as soon as the reports had died away, there was a yelp. Trent had received the full force of Jim's fist clean on the point, and his weapons clattered to the floor.

Jim did not give him time to recover. With a shout to the others to wade in, he sprang at his enemy and laid him backwards across a table. Again and again he crashed his fist into Trent's face.

The others took up the shout. Within a few seconds the saloon was like a battlefield. Collins, grabbing at one of the fallen guns, gripped it as Steve mounted a table. Steve took a flying leap and landed squarely on Collins' back. The two rolled over locked in a fierce embrace.

Fargo stood apart watching the scene calmly. He turned to Lee, who was standing near.

"A nice law-abiding place," he commented, and grabbed the sheriff, who rushed through the doorway at that moment. "Say, sheriff, you might get my boys along and have this mess sorted out. Take Trent's crowd down to the lock-up. They've caused about enough trouble." He paused, thinking. "Oh yes, and see Jim and Betty Kincaid down to the parson's house while you're about it."

He was about to turn away, when he remembered something else.

"I suppose I'd better stay and fix you up over those oil lands, Lee," he went on. "Somebody's sure to make a mess of it if I don't. This place wouldn't be the same without me." A bottle whizzed past his head. "Have a cigar?" he asked calmly.

"Thanks," Lee replied, accepting one. "What is your next job?"

Fargo gazed speculatively at Trent and his confederates as they were led away.

"Chicago, I expect. I feel the need for excitement. The West isn't what it was."

THE END.

(By permission of the Universal Films, Ltd. Don't miss the opening episode of a new and thrilling serial—the first "talkie" serial ever made—of "Blake" the famous Scotland Yard detective.)

NEXT WEEK'S GIFT!

NORMA SHEARER

Don't miss this splendid photo-card of the charming and popular film actress, given FREE in next week's BOY'S CINEMA. Order your copy NOW and avoid disappointment.

HEIGHT INCREASED 5/- Complete Course One Month.

3-5 ins. without appliances—drugs—dieting. THE FAMOUS CLIVE SYSTEM NEVER FAILS. Complete Course 5/- P.O. post free, or further parcels, stamp. P.A. CLIVE, Harrock House, COLWYN BAY, North Wales. (Est. 1908.)

FREE to applicants for our Approvals: 75 different Stamps, Duplicate Book, Perforation Gauge, 100 Stamp Mounts. Send 2d. stamp for postage (abroad 4d.).—R. WILKINSON, Trinity Str. (W.), LLANDUDNO.

FREE FUN!

Ventriloquist's Instruments given FREE to all sending 7d. (P.O.) for latest Magic Trick and List. (Large Parcels 2/6, 5/-).—P. T. Thompson Co., Colwyn Bay, N. Wales.

STOP STAMMERING!

Cure yourself as I did. Particulars Free.—FRANK B. HUGHES, 7, SOUTHAMPTON ROW, LONDON, W.C.1.

FREE PASSAGES TO ONTARIO, CANADA, for approved boy farm learners, age 15 to 19. Apply:—ONTARIO GOVERNMENT, 346, STRAND, LONDON.

BE TALLER!

Increased my own height to 6ft. 3 1/2 ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—EOSS, Height Specialist, Scarborough.

"All British" Boxer Cycle.
 Guaranteed for ever. Usual retail—£4-4-0.
55/- Frame Reynolds or Accles & Pollock Tubing.
 Genuine Clincher Cord Tyres
 Deposit 10/- & 12 monthly payments of 1/11
 WRITE FOR COMPLETE LIST.
 GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, NEW BRIDGEST, LONDON, E.C.4

HEIGHT INCREASED 2 to 5 ins. 5/6 COMPLETE COURSE
 THE ALAN SYSTEM CANNOT FAIL. I GUARANTEE SUCCESS WITHIN 21 DAYS or Cash Refunded in Full. Send P.O. 5/6 NOW, or stamp for particulars. A. K. ALAN (DEPT B), 19-21, OXFORD ST., LONDON, W.1.

MAGIC TRICKS, etc. Parcels, 2/6, 5/6. Ventriloquist's Instrument. Invisible Imitate Birds. Price 6d. each, 4 for 1/-.—T.W. Harrison, 230, Pentonville Rd., London, N.1.

Boy's Cinema

"PRINCE OF DIAMONDS" and
"AROUND THE CORNER."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 560.

EVERY TUESDAY.

SEPTEMBER 6th, 1930.

KEN
MAYNARD

in

The Fighting Legion

A gripping drama of the Texas Rangers in the Old West.

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 186, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street London, E.C.4.

"The Fighting Legion."

Dave Hayes, Ken Maynard; Molly Williams, Dorothy Dwan; Pop Williams, Harry Todd; Hook Brothers, Les Bates, Charles Whittaker, and Bill Nestelle; Cloudy Jones, Frank Rice; Jack Bowie, Ernest Adama; Burl Edwards, Stanley Blystone; John Blake, Jack Fowler; Tom Dawson, Bob Walker; Tarzan, Himself.

"Prince of Diamonds."

Rupert Endon, Ian Keith; Eve Marley, Aileen Pringle; Lolah, Fritz Ridge-way; Lord Adrian, Tyrrell Davis; Gilbert Grayle, Claude King; Williams, Tom Ricketts; Li Fang, E. Alyn Warren; Smith, Gilbert Emory; Inspector Betterton, Colonel McDonell.

"Around the Corner."

Benjamin Kaplan, George Sidney; Patrick O'Grady, Charlie Murray; Rosie O'Grady, Joan Peers; Tommy Sinclair, Larry Kent; Terry Calahan, Charles Delancy; Moe Levine, Jess De Vorska; Sinclair Senr., Fred Sullivan.

William Haines Learns a Useful Art.

"Dramatic art sometimes consists of soaking one's knuckles in alum and water."

So remarks William Haines, and thereby, he says, he's divulging the secret of how he was able to enact a prize-fighter's rôle. The famous star of athletic rôles, after invading football, baseball, even polo, clashed with a professional in the ring in "The Duke Steps Out," Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's new comedy drama. All his success in his fistie encounter, he says, he owes to the alum.

"Jack Roper, the fighter I fought with in the ring, showed me the trick," explained Haines. "The alum hardens the knuckles so you can't skin or hurt them, and this lets you keep your mind on your acting. Also, in my case, it let me use my mind to concentrate on how best to avoid Jack Roper's fists. He didn't know how to fake his blows, never having been in pictures before. He told me to hit as hard as I liked, and said he'd try to remember not to hit back too hard. They say it made a great fight on the screen. It certainly felt like it from where I stood. Once when Jack hit me on the ribs I rang like a drum."

William Haines took intensive boxing lessons before James Cruze began directing the new production. Roper was his teacher, and they rehearsed the fight dozens of times, then staged it before the camera and microphone in the Hollywood Stadium, with an audience of over a thousand looking on.

A Change of Name.

After twenty years on the stage, Van and Sehenk have changed their names to Burke and Glennon.

But the alteration is only temporary, and made for their rôles in "They Learned About Women," their first September 6th, 1930.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

JOHNNY WALKER

— in —

"COUNTED OUT."

Ups and downs in the career of a prize-fighter who stubbed his toes when he snubbed his friends. A drama of the boxing ring.

"TWO BIG VAGABONDS."

A thrilling drama of the West, starring TOM MIX and TONY.

"RED PEARLS."

A story that starts in the office of a Pearl Corporation to the oyster beds in Southern Seas and from the luxury of a West End club to Scotland Yard. Starring Lillian Rich and Frank Perfit.

— ALSO —

The concluding chapters of the mystery serial:—

"THE JADE BOX"

motion picture. The famous songsters play the parts of vaudeville-baseball team mates, and picked out the Irish names to fit the rôles they portray.

Bessie Love plays the leading feminine rôle opposite the singing stars, and the supporting cast includes Mary Doran, Benny Rubin, Tommy Dugan, Eddie Gribbon, J. C. Nugent, and Francis X. Bushman.

Horses.

A troupe of wranglers have been sent down into Mexico by Wesley Ruggles, Radio Pictures director, to round up and bring back to Los Angeles at least a thousand horses. The steeds are required for "Cimarron," Radio Pictures' new film, to be directed by Ruggles.

Thus far Wesley Ruggles has only been able to round up about five hundred horses in and around Los Angeles as against the fifteen hundred he requires.

The horses are to be used in stirring outdoor shots to be done on a panoramic scale, and also to haul that famed cavalcade of a thousand covered wagons which are to be used in the picture.

One of the great problems confronting the director is that of signing up enough skilled riders for his epic of the rise of Oklahoma to statehood. Bronco busters, mule skinner, cow-punchers, and vaqueros of every description who can handle a rein or stick to a saddle are finding it a comparatively easy thing to linc up several weeks' work on this account at the Radio Pictures Studios.

Chester Morris Goes Crook Again.

The police siren, that most effective of all sounds in talking pictures since its efficient use in "The Perfect Alibi," by Roland West, will vie with creaking hinges, shattering glass, screaming ladies, humming motor-cars, and ghostly footsteps in a pro-noise campaign in "The Bat Whispers," Chester Morris' forthcoming all-erie film that Mr. West is directing.

In "The Perfect Alibi" Mr. West got as much drama out of the ticking of a clock during the third degree that was tensely silent. He has been studying the possibilities of dramatising the proverbial drop of a pin. Una Merkel, William Bakewell, Gustav Von Seyffertitz, Ben Bard, and others are in the cast that is hard at work rehearsing at the United Artists Studio.

Jungle Talking Film.

The other week the Universal Company in America despatched an expedition to the island of Borneo to make a talking film which has its locale in the jungle.

The title of the picture is "Ourang," but though it will feature the most formidable of apes, the story will not be just a travelogue. Into it will be woven an exciting drama, with Dorothy Janis playing the leading feminine rôle and a number of Malaysians supporting her in real native parts. The American company itself consists of fourteen members, and precautions have already been taken for their safety.

Before leaving the States they were inoculated against tropical fevers, and, as ourangs on the island are certain to give them an unwelcome reception, the American equipment includes a number of tear-bombs, to keep the huge apes at a safe distance. This is because there is a law in Borneo which prevents the killing of these animals.

(Continued on page 28.)

LOOK OUT for our representative at the seaside resort you are visiting. He is giving away Splendid Prizes and Thousands of Attractive Free Gifts.

To avenge his Texas Ranger pal, a young cowboy runs into the toughest bunch of bad men north of the Rio Grande. A grand thriller of the Old West.

The FIGHTING LEGION

On the Run.

Starring

KEN MAYNARD.

A CROSS the wilderness in a head-long dash for freedom swept a couple of riders, with the long arm of Ranger Law reaching forth in a determined effort to lay hold of them and consign them to a lock-up.

The fugitives were no bad men, being Dave Hayes and Cloudy Jones, punchers who had gone on the spree and become too high-spirited and frolicsome in a town which refused to countenance any wild behaviour. And the long arm of Ranger Law was represented by Tom Dawson, who had been bent on introducing them to the inside of a gaol ever since the moment when young Dave Hayes had sportively emptied the main street of the aforementioned town by some harmless but noisy gun-play.

You will find no scenery more impressive than the scenery of the Texas Desert, with its towering ranges and its curious rock formations that rise up from the scrubby waste land like monstrous gargoyles of a prehistoric world. But neither Cloudy Jones, astride his barrel-bodied sorrel, nor Dave Hayes, on his white pinto Tarzan, had much of an eye for the wonders of Nature during that mad gallop.

Not far from the Border there is a sluggish, sprawling river that has quenched the thirst of many a man crossing the wilderness, but though Dave and Cloudy were both parched by the heat and the desert dust, they spurred through the shallows without a pause, and they had reached the dry ground on the other side when Tom Dawson gained the ford.

The water was scarcely deep enough to cover a bronc's hocks, but it was deep enough to conceal some treacherous hollows where a horse in full career could break a leg. Dave and Cloudy had crossed in safety, but Dawson's mount had the bad luck to find a deep cleft, and as the animal stumbled the Ranger took a heavy fall.

He plunged clean over the bronc's head, and his skull came into violent contact with a half-submerged stone. A low groan escaped him, and then he lay still and silent, with his face buried in the water—and he may have lain there till he drowned but for the fact that Dave Hayes chanced to look back and saw what had occurred.

Dave drew rein and Cloudy followed suit, pulling his bronc to a standstill a few yards ahead of his pard, and throwing a glance over his shoulder to see what the youngster on the white pinto had already seen. He was a man of mournful visage was Cloudy, and he had looked as miserable as a sick steer ever since Dave had created the rumpus that had brought Dawson on their trail, but on witnessing the mishap that had befallen the Ranger he almost beamed.

"Can ye beat that for luck?" he panted. "He's out to the wide!"

Dave compressed his lips. He was seventy-four inches from head to heel, and he turned the scales at something over thirteen stones, and he was as big-hearted as he was stalwart.

"Luck nothin'," he said. "I'm goin' back to Dawson. We can't leave him there to drown."

And, in spite of the sour expression that at once became apparent on Cloudy's face, he pulled his bronc round and rode to where Dawson was lying.

He dismounted beside the Ranger, and, lifting him, he splashed through the ford to the dry ground again. Cloudy followed him, figuring that Dave had done the right thing after all, but nevertheless maintaining an expression of doleful disgust.

Dave set Dawson down, and, soaking a handkerchief in the water, he dabbed away the blood around an ugly wound on the Ranger's head. About a minute later Dawson opened his eyes and looked up at him, dazedly at first, and then with a dawning intelligence.

"How do you feel, partner?" Dave asked him.

Dawson was staring at him. "Not so good," he answered. "But say, what made you turn back? You must be plumb locoed. You had the chance to get clear away. I reckon."

"That's what I told him," put in Cloudy angrily. "an' though I'll admit it was only right and proper that we should pull you outa the ford so's you wouldn't drown, there wasn't no call for him to go an' play nursemaid to you. Ranger, that gny sure is loco, an' I'm loco myself for havin' truck with him. I guess you'd better up an' take us back to gaol with ye."

It was plain, however, that the Ranger was in no fit condition to make the return journey across the desert right away, but if Cloudy thought that there was therefore still a chance of himself and Dave making a get-away, he was very speedily disillusioned, for, declaring that the desert was no place to leave a man who might become delirious from the severe head injury he had received, Dave announced his intention of remaining with Dawson until the Ranger had completely recovered.

Cloudy regarded him despairingly. "Pard," he said, "I almost wish I wuz a real bad man, so I could bust this Ranger with the handle o' me gun an' lay him out long enough for me to beat it across the Border."

"Yeah?" rejoined Dave, with a grin. "I'd knock your block off if you did!"

So they made Dawson comfortable in the shade of some stunted trees, and, after tethering the three horses, they settled themselves beside him. It was then fairly late in the afternoon, and along about dusk, after Cloudy had fixed up a scanty meal, they laid their heads on their saddles, pulled their horse blankets over them, and went to sleep.

Cloudy had a dream in which the interior of a gaol figured prominently, and it was a dream that recurred persistently. He was still tossing restlessly in the throes of it when the dawn broke.

He was not the only one who stirred, Dawson having awakened.

The Ranger seemed himself again, in spite of Dave's fears that his head injury would prove troublesome, and, rising noiselessly to his feet, he reached for his sombrero. Then he took out pencil and paper and scribbled a note, which he pinned to the blanket that covered Dave, and, having achieved this without arousing either of the cowboys, he quietly moved across to where his bronc was standing.

Climbing into the saddle he rode away, and only the white pinto Tarzan and Cloudy's barrel-bodied sorrel noted his departure. But he had scarcely passed out of sight beyond a mass of huge rocks three or four hundred yards away when Tarzan moved over to Dave's recumbent form and nudged him with his muzzle.

Dave muttered drowsily and turned over on his side. In doing so he rolled against Cloudy, who immediately sat up with a start, and next instant Cloudy was shaking Dave by the shoulder.

"Say," he jerked, "the Ranger's gone! Wake up, Dave! The Ranger's gone, an' his boss ain't here neither."

"Gone?" Dave echoed, rubbing his eyes, and then he caught sight of the note that Dawson had pinned to the blanket.

Dave read the message on it. It was addressed humorously to "Two Bad Men."

"My duty was to bring you back and put you in the jug," it ran, "but after what you done I couldn't but think you was too white for any cell. So I'm going to say you gave me the slip in the desert."

"Don't cut loose in any more towns. A sprec's a sprec, but keep inside the margin. So-long, and best of luck."

"Tom Dawson."

"That Dawson sure is a good guy," declared Cloudy, when Dave had finished. "You know, I reckon he's—"

But whatever extravagances of praise Cloudy was about to utter were interrupted by a sound that cut sharp and clear through the stillness of the morning. It was the sound of a rifle-shot, fired at no great distance from their camping-ground, and it brought them to their feet.

It seemed to have come from beyond the barrier of rocks—around which Dawson had disappeared a few minutes before—and, swinging themselves astride their ponies, Dave and Cloudy galloped in that direction. They passed the rock formation in a smother of dust, and, swerving to ride parallel with it, they saw the ill-fated Dawson's bronc careering in a panic across the wilderness.

Dawson himself was lying huddled on the sand of the desert. He was conscious when Dave dropped on his knees beside him and gathered him in his arms, but his eyes were glassy and his face was grey.

"I'm—done for, friends," Dawson whispered feebly. "They got me—clean through the back."

He thrust his hand inside his shirt, and with some difficulty he drew out a badge and a report-book. The effort of producing them brought the blood to his mouth, but he contrived to speak, and, by bending close to his lips, Dave and Cloudy managed to hear his every word.

"Will you do somethin' for me, Hayes?" he said. "Will you see that this here star—an' this here book—are turned in—at headquarters—"

"Sure I will," Dave told him. "But say, Dawson, you ain't passin' out. Why, just as soon as Cloudy and I start doctorin' you up you'll be feelin' as fit as ever you were."

He did his best to sound reassuring, but he could not deceive himself, let alone Dawson, who could feel the chill hand of death on him.

"I won't want that badge no more," the Rainger breathed. "I'm through. Somebody—up there in the rocks—shot me in the back. No use—lookin' there. Gone by now—I reckon that gang from Bowden heard I was on their trail. I—"

His voice trailed away, and his head fell forward over Dave's arm.

"Dead!" murmured Cloudy, and Dave looked at him grimly.

"Yes, Cloudy," he said, "and something tells me we're headin' for Bowden—"

Bowden.

THERE was the sound of a gunshot in a bar on Main Street, Bowden, and a certain Pete Rogers dropped to the floor with a bullet in his heart.

A killing was a more commonplace affair in Bowden than in most townships, but it was not such an everyday occurrence that it failed to attract attention, and soon a crowd had gathered at the entrance of the bar-room.

Among that crowd were several prominent citizens, and these included John Blake, the banker, a tall, grey-haired individual who elbowed his way through the mob even as two or three men emerged from the saloon.

One of the latter was a notorious character by the name of Denby, a professional gambler who made his livelihood in the bar-room with a pack of cards. Immediately he appeared it was at once clear that he had fired the shot that had killed Rogers, for there was a smoking six-gun in his hand.

Now Bowden was a town where the law had no representative, the place having sprung up almost overnight less than a year before. But John Blake claimed to be one who was all for justice, and, singling out Denby, he spoke to him in stern accents.

"Denby," he said, "this town has had enough gunning, and I reckon it's high time an example was made of somebody. They tell me Pete Rogers is dead—shot by your hand."

Another prominent citizen had followed Blake through the crowd, a powerfully-built man wearing a broad-brimmed sombrero and a store suit, the trousers of which were thrust into a pair of patterned riding-boots. He was known as Burl Edwards, cattle buyer, and, like Blake, he was to all appearances in favour of law and order.

"I'm with you there, Blake," he stated. "Bowden's seen enough o' these killings."

Denby had slipped his gun inside his waistcoat, and now he held out his hands appealingly.

"I hadn't any choice, Blake!" he protested. "Pete drew a gun first. It was him or me. Anybody that was in the bar at the time will tell you the same."

He looked at a bunch of unsavoury-looking individuals who had emerged from the saloon with him. They supported the statement, though, watching them closely, an onlooker might have noticed the flicker of a smile around the lips of more than one of them. Blake, however, merely shrugged.

"Well, we'll have to take their word for it, Denby," he said, and, in company with Burl Edwards, he turned away.

There was a girl on the veranda of the building in which Pete Rogers had met his death. That building was both saloon and hotel, and the girl was Molly Williams, daughter of Pop Williams, the proprietor. Her father was standing with her, and she turned to him as the crowd was breaking up.

"Pete Rogers didn't draw first!" she said hotly. "It's a lie. I was in the hotel lobby and I saw what happened. He had his back to Denby—"

Her father gripped her arm. "Quiet, Molly," he said in an anxious undertone. "Whatever you saw, keep it to yourself."

Nor was Molly Williams the only one who knew that a dastardly crime—only one of many in Bowden—was going unpunished on a false testimony. For a couple of men who had been in the bar at the time, and who were now moving off with the crowd, were voicing the same sentiments as those which Molly had expressed.

"It was plain murder, Jim," one said to the other. "I saw it with—"

He was interrupted. One of the rogues who had vouched for Denby's story was right behind him, and spoke threateningly.

"Say," the ruffian ground out, "you didn't see nothin'. Get me?"

The man he addressed moistened his lips.

"Sure," he answered uneasily. "I get you—"

In the meantime Pop Williams and his daughter Molly had gone back into the hotel, in the lobby of which Pop was presently joined by two or three honest-looking citizens of serious mien. They looked around them first of all to make sure that there were no eavesdroppers, and then one of them broached the subject of Pete Rogers' killing.

"Williams," he announced, "there's some talk goin' around that Rogers was jest plain murdered, and, knowin' Denby and his cronies, I'm prepared to believe it. It's about time that the good folks in this town got together to protect themselves from the bad element."

Pop Williams nodded grimly. "That's what I've always said," he rejoined, "but the trouble is, that outside you fellers and myself, you can't tell for certain which are the bad 'uns and which are the good 'uns."

There was more truth in the statement than even Pop Williams himself suspected, and had he been in the neighbourhood of Burl Edwards' office at that moment he might have overheard a conversation that would have given him cause for deep thought.

Blake had accompanied Edwards to that office, and in the privacy of it the banker spoke to the other man impatiently.

"Listen here, Edwards," he said, "tell that gambler Denby he's got to calm down, or he'll get us all into trouble. You and I are playing for big stakes, and we don't want any of our men creating any kind of stir that might rouse these law-and-order citizens. Don't forget we're in the position of men who are sitting mighty close to a hornet's nest."

"Aw, forget it!" growled Edwards. "The law-and-order element in this town ain't sure enough of themselves to start anything. And besides, ain't you and I got 'em fooled a-plenty with our talk of justice and right livin'? Why," he added, with an ugly smirk, "there's times when I feel a psalm-book wouldn't be outa place in my hands."

"All the same," Blake grumbled, "Denby ought to keep that gun of his unloaded for a spell."

"Oh, be yourself!" said Edwards. "And listen—I'm goin' across to the hotel to see what Pop Williams thinks o' the affair. I'll look you up later."

They parted, Edwards crossing the street to the hotel and entering the lobby as Pop was seeing his friends off the premises. Pop and those who were of the same way of thinking as himself had been unable to figure out any plan of campaign, but the hotel-owner was still turning the affair over in his mind when Edwards greeted him.

Pop answered him gruffly. He had no cause to suspect Edwards, but at the same time he was not particularly partial to the cattle buyer, and he had never been in the habit of taking him into his confidence.

"A bad business—the shootin' of Peto Rogers," observed Edwards.

"A bad business right enough," Pop grunted. "A man can't call his life his own when there's folks around that are too free-an'-easy with their guns."

He left Edwards and went upstairs, and Edwards was on the point of taking himself off when his glance travelled to the register-desk at the far end of the lobby. Molly was behind the counter, busy with a ledger, and at sight of her Edwards fingered his moustache and strolled across to her.

Her hands were resting on the counter, and, leaning towards her all at once, he caught hold of them.

"How about a little kiss from the prettiest girl in Bowden?" he coaxed.

She tried to draw away, but his grasp on her hands tightened, and she was actually struggling to free herself when a couple of strangers to Bowden came in through the entrance of the hotel lobby. One was Dave Hayes, and the other was Cloudy, who looked more doleful than ever.

Dave was immediately aware of what was taking place at the counter, for the first object that caught his eye was Molly's pretty face. The expression on it told him that the attentions of the man who was pestering her were by no means welcome, and he at once moved towards the desk.

Coming up alongside Edwards, he brought his heel down with deliberate force on the cattle buyer's foot, and Edwards was unfortunate enough to possess a large-sized corn. He had released Molly in the twinkling of an eye, and with a bellow of pain he began to hop around on one leg.

Dave was profuse in his apologies, but it was all too clear to Edwards that his action had been intentional, and the cattle buyer raved and fumed.

He broke off in his curses to utter a sharp yelp, for Cloudy had come up on the other side of him, and Cloudy was holding a cigarette which he contrived to stub—apparently by accident—against the cattle buyer's hand. Edwards, carrying his burned finger to his lips, glared at Cloudy, but after a moment he seemed to master his rage and he assumed an ugly smile as he turned his glance on Dave again.

"You'd better be careful whose toes you step on!" he said. "They ain't all as good-natured as me in this town."

Dave turned his back on him contemptuously and was about to address Molly when he saw a look of horror in her eyes. She was staring over his shoulder, and Dave instantly whipped round to see Edwards reaching for his six-gun.

The cattle buyer's hand had actually closed on the butt. He did not proceed with the gesture, however, for in the act of wheeling Dave had jerked his own gun out of its holster and now he was covering Edwards. The man looked at him narrowly for a moment, and then, with compressed lips, he backed towards a pair of swing-doors that opened on to the bar-room.

When he had gone Dave turned to Molly again and announced that he and Cloudy wanted to put up at the hotel, and he was in the act of signing their names when old Pop Williams came downstairs.

"You're aimin' to stay here, strangers?" he inquired, approaching the counter, and as Dave nodded: "Well, if you don't mind, I'd like you to pay in advance, gents," he said. "Folks pass out mighty sudden in this town, an' it ain't easy to collect money from a corpse sometimes."

Cloudy glanced towards Dave uneasily, and then fairly gave a jump as he found himself confronted by a long, lank and dismal individual who had entered the lobby and moved between him and his pard. This man was carrying a tape measure, and he proceeded to take Cloudy's measurements.

"I'm the undertaker," said he of the dismal countenance. "I might as well get your dimensions now as later. It saves time when business is as bright as it is now."

Cloudy retreated hastily.

"Keep away from me, will ya?" he gasped. "Keep away, I tell ya!"

Dave grinned amusedly, and then, as Cloudy blundered through to the barroom, he followed him and pushed him laughingly into a chair beside a small table that stood near the street-door of the saloon.

Food was what they needed, and, taking a seat beside Cloudy, Dave called a waiter—and while a meal was being prepared for them he took stock of the crowd in the bar-room.

The place was well patronised, and at the long counter there were enough men to keep three bar-tenders steadily occupied in serving out drinks. As for the customers, they were typical of the state of affairs in Bowden—some of them hard to place either as "good folks" or "bad," others seeming decent enough specimens—and the rest as ugly a set of ruffians as Dave had ever seen.

Dave's attention was diverted presently by the appearance of three men who marched from the street arm-in-arm. They were all men of magnificent physique, but it was not this circumstance that caused Dave to watch them with interest. For they drew notice to themselves by bawling out a ditty in loud, strident but unmelodious voices as they crossed the threshold:

"Bad Bill was an hombre

Who took too big a chance.

So now the undertaker's measurin' him

For his go-to-heaven pants."

This ballad, which rang unpleasantly on Cloudy's ears after his experience in the hotel lobby, was followed by a vast guffaw of laughter from the three newcomers. And then, speaking in unison, they made an announcement.

"Introducin' the Hook Brothers," they said. "Ed"—three hands pointed to the one on the right—"Fred"—the hands pointed to the one on the left—"an' Red."

Once more their gust of laughter swept through the bar-room, and then, bowing over a diminutive waiter in their stride, they crossed to the bar and called for three drinks in one voice.

It was not until then that Dave noticed a familiar figure at the bar—an acquaintance of a few minutes before. It was Burl Edwards, and Burl Edwards had his eye on him. The cattle buyer's glance wavered as Dave stared back at him, and the meal he and Cloudy had ordered arriving just then, Dave paid no further heed to the man.

Then he scribbled a note, which he pinned to the blanket that covered Dave.

As for Edwards, he scowled at the counter, and not until he suddenly became aware that the Hook Brothers had raised their voices in song again did the scowl leave his face, a slow smile following it.

With malicious inspiration Edwards drew nearer to the Hook Brothers and interrupted them in their melody.

"Boys," he said, "there's a couple guys over there plumb disgusted with your singin'—"

The Hook Brothers paused, turned their heads in the direction indicated by the cattle buyer, and then looked at one another and nodded solemnly.

They approached the table where Dave and Cloudy were sitting.

"We understand," they said, "that ye don't care much about the Hook Brothers' singin'."

Dave glanced up at them. Their faces were thrust forward threateningly towards him, but he was not in the least perturbed, and his eyes twinkled.

"Why," he stated, "I never heard tell of the Hook Brothers—and I certainly didn't hear any singin'."

The Hook Brothers were not partial to sarcasm, and their chests swelled. Then, with a sudden forward movement of his shoulder, Red drove his great fist into Dave's chest and hurled the youngster from his chair.

Dave was up in a moment, and the twinkling merriment had gone out of his eyes. Without a word he launched himself at the three brothers like a fury.

Rough House.

THE Hooks were scattered by Dave's whirlwind onslaught, and Red took a smashing punch that caught him below the left eye and knocked him staggering to the bar. There was an immediate uproar as the crowd there became aware that a fight had begun, and shouts of encouragement arose.

The Hook Brothers rallied and closed in on Dave.

From behind the youngster there was the scrape of a chair, and Cloudy climbed to his feet with a war-like howl. Flung himself into the scrimmage, he singled out Red, and once again that worthy received a lusty buffet below the left eye.

Red knew how to take punishment. He bellowed like an infuriated bull and rushed at Cloudy to avenge the punch. Dave, in the meantime, had his hands full with Ed and Fred, but he was a match for the pair of them, and, suddenly enveloping them with his strong arms, he slung them across a table. Fred, deep in the chest and black in the beard, was rendered helpless, one arm pinned down by his brother's weight and the other held in Dave's vice-like grip. But Ed, powerful as a gorilla, clutched at the youngster's shoulder and swung with his right. It was a hammer blow that must have created havoc on Dave's jaw had it landed, but the table capsized before the punch could connect, and the three combatants fell to the floor in a struggling heap.

With arms and legs entangled, they writhed and fought. Dave had his forearm under Ed's chin and his wrist was wrapped around Ed's biceps. With the other arm he was man-handling Fred, but the latter, emitting snarling sounds from amongst his raven whiskers, had secured a hold on the youngster's wind-pipe.

He did his best to strangle the wits out of Dave, and it was only with a tremendous effort that the youngster managed to break his grip and scramble to his feet. The brothers rose with him, but Fred took a count of sixty seconds as a shattering right-hander landed on his jaw.

September 6th, 1930

Ed grappled with Dave, and the two of them reeled to the bar, where a couple of bystanders—cronies of the Hook Brothers—suddenly elected to join in the struggle. Climbing on to the counter and kneeling there, they helped Ed to secure Dave, and then one of them wrenched the youngster's face round so that he could take a crack at his jaw.

Dave tore free before the fellow could launch the blow, and, smashing Ed to the floor, he waded into his two sympathisers with both hands.

But what of Cloudy?

Cloudy, as a matter of fact, was having a rough time at the hands of Red, who sent him to the boards with a terrific swing. Two men near by, with kindly sentiments, helped Cloudy to his feet, but Cloudy was too dazed to distinguish this as an act of friendliness, and he blindly proceeded to lay them out.

He knocked them sprawling over a table—and he had hardly accomplished this when Red stepped close once more and gave him a knock-down punch. His eyes grown glassy, Cloudy lay tumbled across an overturned chair, and, while he reclined in that position, Red Hook gripped him by the throat with one hand, and, swinging his other arm to its full extent, began to batter the wits out of him entirely.

Yet Cloudy, though his form was as spare as a scarecrow's, had remarkable powers of endurance, and, swiftly recovering from the punishment inflicted on him, he lurched to his feet the moment Red turned from him.

Red made for the spot where Dave was fighting, but, reeling after him, Cloudy overtook him near the bar and clouted him with such force that he was staggered. And it was at this same moment that a little Irish bar-tender decided to put a stop to the battle in the name of law and order.

He pinned a badge importantly on his chest and ran to the end of the long counter. Two men leaning against a hinged leaf there received a jolt under the chin as the little Irishman flung it up to pass through.

The bar-tender busted up to Cloudy and Red Hook. Each was in the act of aiming a terrific punch at the other, and the Irishman received both of them. He described a somersault, lay quivering on the floor, and then, reaching his feet, stumbled back towards the leaf in the counter. As he threw it up once more the men leaning there received a second jolt under their chins.

Meanwhile, Dave was lashing out at his assailants with both fists, and, having accounted for them, he wheeled wildly towards the bar, which was now lined with men whose sympathies were with the Hook Brothers. They baited Dave and jeered at him, and the youngster, fairly worked up into a fighting frenzy now, sprang pantherishly into the midst of them.

They were scattered, and one of them was tumbled over the counter. Next instant, however, the mob came swarming around him with angry shouts.

Dave leapt on to the bar, planted each hand in a man's face, and then jumped in amongst the crowd and swung at them right and left.

It was as he jumped that something fell from the inside of his shirt, and it slid across the bar-room floor to the feet of a man who had entered the saloon a minute or two before. The man was John Blake, banker, and, stooping, he picked up what appeared to be a book.

It was a book—the report book that had belonged to Tom Dawson—and between the leaves of it was the dead Ranger's badge.

Blake's face was a study in bewilderment, and then, rousing himself and glancing significantly at Edwards, who stood near by, he forced his way through Dave's assailants.

"Boys," he announced, "meet the first Ranger that ever honoured Bowden with a visit."

There was a blank silence, a silence that was shared by Dave.

"I'm sorry, Dawson," Blake went on, "that these hombres gave you such a rough reception."

It was Dave's first impulse to tell him that he had made a mistake—that Dawson lay dead out on the desert, shot through the back by an unknown hand. But suddenly it seemed to him that, by taking advantage of the error in identity and keeping up the deception, he might find it less difficult to achieve the purpose which had brought him here to Bowden.

He gave the battered Cloudy a side-long glance ere answering Blake.

"I guess you don't have to worry about the rough reception," he stated. "I always did hear that a fight was the best way of gettin' acquainted. But if you don't mind, me and my pard'll be gettin' along upstairs."

"Sure," was the rejoinder. "I reckon you could do with a rest, what with a long ride and a rumpus at the end of it. Look me up some time, will you? The name's Blake—John Blake—and I'm the banker here."

"Sure I'll look you up," said Dave, and then, in company with Cloudy, he passed through the bar-room to the hotel lobby, where Molly Williams was standing with a scared look on her face. For she had heard the sounds of strife in the saloon.

Molly showed Dave and Cloudy to their room, and at the door of it Dave paused to exchange a word or two with her. From the moment when he had first set eyes on her he had been attracted by her, and he was anxious to know more of her.

They parted a few minutes afterwards, and Dave entered the room to find Cloudy sitting moodily on a bed. He settled himself beside his pard, and for a spell the two of them gazed thoughtfully into space.

Dave was the first to break the silence. "Cloudy," he said all at once, "what are we goin' to do now?"

"Do?" Cloudy rose to his feet abruptly and regarded Dave with a determined glint in his eye. "D'you know what we're gonna do? We're gonna get outa this town afore that doggone underliker gets his claws on us!"

"Aw, forget him, Cloudy," urged Dave. "I mean, what's the next move we're gonna to make in clearing up the mystery of Dawson's death?"

"Listen, cowboy—or Ranger—or whatever y' are," said Cloudy. "I've stuck alongside you pretty permanent for more'n a couple years now. But I'm through with lookin' around fer trouble. So-long!"

And, pulling his sombrero farther down over his head, he stepped out towards the door.

"So-long," Dave rejoined casually.

Cloudy reached the door and actually gripped the handle. Then he seemed to waver, and finally, muttering something into the stubble on his chin, he turned round again.

It was not the first time that Cloudy had threatened to leave Dave flat, and it was not the first time that he had changed his mind.

Law and Order.

DAVE, assisted by Cloudy, had fairly installed himself in Bowden, and within a month of taking up his residence there he had fixed up quarters in a vacant shanty close to the Williams' Hotel.

He still posed as Ranger Dawson, and, to lend credence to the well-meant deception, he had hung up a signboard over the shanty, bearing the legend: "Ranger's Office." But that was not all he had done to justify himself in his new rôle. All Bowden was talking of the exploits which he had performed in the interests of Law and Order.

One forenoon, when Dave was sitting at his desk in the office and Cloudy was reclining with his feet on a slow-combustion stove, a small oval patch of reflected sunlight shone through the window and flashed across the shady room. Cloudy took no particular notice of the circumstance until he noticed that the flash kept recurring, and then, turning to Dave, he saw that the pseudo-Ranger was watching the flashes and busily writing something in a book each time they danced through the office.

"What's the idea?" Cloudy demanded. "Just a little code that Pop Williams and I worked out," Dave explained. "Pop is in a house on the other side of the street, heliographin' me with a mirror. Every time anybody passes he signals whether they're good, bad, or doubtful, and I jot down their names. One flash means that a guy's plumb bad, two flashes tell me that an honest citizen is passin', and three flashes signify a doubt."

Cloudy grunted, and then he was silent for a while. When he spoke again it was with great deliberation, as if he had been turning over some deep problem in his mind.

"Did you ever stop to think what would happen," he said, "if the guy that shot the real Dawson ever drifted into town?"

Dave's eyes narrowed.

"That's what I'm waiting for, Cloudy," he answered slowly, "and when he does drift in I'm banking on him showin' his hand in some way or other. The moment he shows his hand I'll nail him!"

It was at that moment that a long, lank figure passed the window—a figure at the sight of which Cloudy leapt to his feet. It was the figure of the undertaker, and, pausing at the office door, which was open, he bent a mournful eye on Cloudy.

"Five feet eleven," he murmured, "and thirty-seven round the chest." And then he moved on.

A chill perspiration broke out on Cloudy's brow.

"That's the guy that's goin' to nail me," he wailed. "He's goin' to nail me down with coffin pegs. I kin see it in his face. Aw, Dave, what was Dawson to you, anyhow, that we've gotta stick around here an' find his killer?"

"Dawson was one o' the whitest men I ever met, Cloudy," said Dave, "and I happen to know that he left a widow and three kids. And if it's the last thing I do, I'm going to get the bunch of dirty coyotes that were responsible for his killin'."

Cloudy lost his temper and began to rave at him, and he was indulging in some particularly ungentlemanly expressions when a girl appeared on the threshold of the office. The girl was Molly Williams, and as Dave caught sight of her he began to make feverish attempts to silence Cloudy, but not until the latter actually perceived Molly himself did the atmosphere become suitable for feminine ears.

"There's one thing I like about Cloudy," Dave said to Molly, with a grin. "He's just as mild as an old burro."

Cloudy looked daggers at him, but at that moment a diversion was caused by a wild series of flashes from Pop Williams' mirror.

"Gee!" David commented. "Half the town must be headed this way!"

The first men to pass the window of the office were the Hook Brothers, and with threatening mien they marched in across the threshold. They had apparently made some boast about boarding the Ranger in his den, for there was a fair-sized crowd of ruffianly-looking loafers on their heels, and the mob stood outside the office to listen to what was said.

Cloudy's first impulse at sight of the Hook Brothers was to reach for his gun, but he checked himself and gaped in bewilderment as he saw the three of them wink distinctly. Then, speaking as usual in one voice, they addressed Dave.

"Ranger," they announced, "the Hook Brothers wish ter state that they don't give a coupla cents for you, and if it's thinkin' you are that you'll make law-abidin' citizens out of us—come and try it!"

They spat deftly at Dave's feet, whereupon the mob outside smirked approvingly. Then, advancing nearer, the three Hooks addressed the pseudo-Ranger again. But this time, although their voices sounded as gruff as ever, their words could not possibly have reached the ears of the ruffianly crowd in the street.

"Ranger," they went on, "we're the worst ornery bunch o' wildcats in this no-man's country. But for your private car we'd like to let you know that if you want any help you can bank on us."

They drew back once more, and at the doorway they reverted to their former threatening attitude.

"Bear in mind what we told you, Ranger," they declared, "and you'll save yourself a heap o' trouble."

Then, with another sly wink at him, they turned on their heels and departed, amid the applause of the crowd.

Dave glanced at Cloudy.

"Can you beat that?" he said.

"Those three hard cases are for us." Then his face grew serious. "All the same," he continued, "we need every man we can count on—even with three huskies like the Hook Brothers. We seem to have been keeping things in hand pretty well since we started out to clean up this town. But the wilder elements are only lyin' low for the time bein', I guess, and one day there's goin' to be a show-down!"

He looked at his companions.

"Molly—Cloudy," he told them, "I've been keepin' my ears and eyes open in Bowden, and this is what I've figured out—that there's some ruling force behind this town's lawlessness, and when we rope in a bunch of rustlers, or horse-thieves, or hold-up men, it don't amount to much."

They stood waiting with drawn guns as they heard the newcomers ride up to the shack.

The "roping in" of rustlers, horse-thieves and hold-up men did not, perhaps, amount to a great deal in Dave's estimation, since it was the bigger game he was after. But at that moment a discussion was taking place at the headquarters of the said "bigger game," and it was a discussion which proved that the activities of Bowden's Ranger were not being treated lightly.

The Man From the Desert.

EDWARDS and Blake moved in across the threshold of the cattle buyer's office to find two or three men lounging there—members of that fraternity of lawlessness of which they were the leaders, and which held wide-spread interest in anything that promised loot.

One of the gangsters was playing a mouth-organ, but Blako interrupted him in his melody-making efforts.

"Hey, cut out that music," he said, "and go down and take care of that stock, will you?"

The man went off, and Blake glanced at the others broodingly.

"Aro you sure it was the Ranger that you saw last night?" he demanded.

"Sure enough I saw him!" one of them declared, and the other nodded emphatically.

Edwards spoke.

"Yeah," he ground out, "only for that Ranger we'd have had ten thousand dollars' worth of cattle stacked away in the hills right to-day."

"Aw, take it easy, Ed!" said Blake. "This Ranger isn't the first man who thought he could beat us—"

He paused, for at that juncture there was a knock on the door, and next moment it was opened to reveal a sinister-looking individual who was powdered with dust from the crown of his battered hat to the heels of his riding-boots.

He was below the average height, but looked a dangerous enough customer—a rat of a man with a pair of shifty eyes and a week's growth of stubble on his face. He was known around Bowden as Jack Bowie, and he had something of a reputation with a gun.

"Howdy," he greeted, coming in and closing the door. "Glad to see you, Blako—and you, Edwards. How about a little mountain dew outa the bottle to wash down this alkali in my throat?" And he moistened his lips as he spoke.

Blake and Edwards regarded him sourly.

"You're a fine one to send out to get somebody, ain't ya?" snarled Edwards. Bowie's expression was one of bewilderment.

"I was just layin' low until it was safe to come back into town, that's all," he protested. "I got my man, an' I didn't have no call to come a-ridin' into Bowden afore the affair had blown over."

"You got who?" demanded Edwards. "Your man?"

"Sure," said Bowie, "the man you hombraes sent me out to get—Dawson the Ranger."

"Yeah?" sneered Edwards. "You musta been cross-eyed when you shot at him. Why, Dawson's right here in town—large as life."

Bowie's expression of bewilderment gave place to one of blank amazement.

"Dawson?" he echoed. "Say, I September 11th, 1930.

plugged him when I was comin' through the pass. What kinda talk is this you're givin' me?"

Blake touched him on the arm. His brows were drawn down in a frown.

"Come here," he said, drawing him to the window. "Look there! If you shot Dawson, who is that man over there by the Ranger's office?"

He pointed. Dave had come out on to the veranda of his quarters with Molly, and was in full view of Blake and Bowie.

"That's Dawson," said Blake, "the man you claim to have—"

Bowie cut in on him.

"Aw—I know Dawson better than I know you. Whoever that hombre is, he ain't Dawson." Then all at once his eyes narrowed till they looked like mere slits in his leathery face. "Say, what's he hornin' in here for?" he blurted, reaching for his gun.

Blake checked the gesture.

"I know a better way than that," he jerked. And, to Edwards: "We've got this Ranger just where we want him."

On the veranda of the office across the way Molly was passing some pretty compliments on Dave for the headway he had made in cleaning up Bowden, and neither of them had a suspicion of the trouble that was brewing.

"You know, I just couldn't have believed that one man could have done all that you've done for this town," Molly was saying, when Cloudy came out of the office.

"Oh, Mr. Cloudy," Molly apologised, as she saw him. "I quite forgot to say 'How do you do?' when I dropped in just now."

"How do I do?" Cloudy repeated gruffly. "Say, I'm right on the verge of nervous prostration—just the same as I have been ever since I hit this town."

"Aw, don't pay any attention to him, Miss Molly," said Dave laughingly. "He takes more pleasure in being miserable than any man I ever knew."

He moved along from the hitch-rack, and Tarzan seemed to be of the same mind as his master, for he gave Cloudy a nudge that sent the dismal puncher staggering. Having slipped its reins from the rack, over which they had merely been slung, the brone proceeded to hustle Cloudy along the street, Cloudy protesting fruitlessly the while—and Dave was grinning over his pard's discomfiture when all at once he perceived a crowd of men approaching.

"Hallo, what's wrong?" he said to Molly. "There's a mob headed this way. Blake and Edwards are leadin' it—and a hombre I never saw before."

The last-mentioned was Bowie, and Blako and Edwards walked him along to the veranda of Dave's quarters with a bunch of their hirelings on their heels. Dave met them in front of his office, and glanced at Blake inquiringly.

"What seems to be the trouble, Blake?" he asked.

"Dawson," said the banker, "I want you to meet Bowie, who's just in from the desert. Shake hands with Dawson our Ranger, Bowie!"

Bowie's lip curled.

"Dawson the Ranger, huh?" he sneered. "So that's the kind of faro this guy's dealin'. Say, listen, folks—this hombre is an impostor."

There was some murmuring, and the situation looked ugly for Dave, but the crowd had been swelled by the appearance of some of his friends—in the shape of Pop Williams, the Hook Brothers, and some of those citizens who had welcomed him as a representative of the law. And Pop Williams caught Bowie by the arm.

"Wait a minute," he interposed. "Do you realise what you're sayin'? You've made a pretty serious charge, Bowie!"

"I'll be sayin' more before I'm through," Bowie snarled. "I'm callin' this guy's bluff, and he knows it—the same as he knows that the real Dawson was killed out in the desert—shot in the back! He didn't tell ye that, did he? No, an' he didn't know that Bowie was comin' to town to uncover him as the skunk that plugged Tom Dawson. Them's the charges I'm makin', and I'll back 'em up!"

There was an ominous growl from the hirelings of Blake and Edwards, who were vastly in the majority, but again Pop Williams intervened.

"Don't you think the Ranger has a right to say something in his own defence?" he protested, and it was Blake, who answered him with an assumed generosity of spirit.

"Sure," Blake declared. "Fair play in our community. Go ahead, Ranger!"

Cloudy in the meantime had been mingling with the crowd, but now, with an anxious expression on his face, he slipped away to where Dave's white pinto was standing.

"Tarzan," he said, "we've sure got to use our heads. Come on—follow me!" And he took the pony's rein and led him along the street.

Cloudy commandeered every brone that he could find, and a buggy with a pair of restive-looking "plugs" as well. Then he drew his six-shooter.

Flight.

THE crowd was waiting for Dave's statement, and, bracing himself, the young-ter spoke in clear, steady tones.

"Boys," he said, "I'll tell you the truth. I'm not Dawson"—the hirelings of Blake and Edwards growled anew—"but I'm here in his place. This hombre Bowie was right. Dawson was killed out there in the desert—and that's why I came to Bowden—to find the guilty man."

"Yeah!" It was the voice of Edwards. "We've heard that kind of a story before. Come on, boys, let's get a rope an' string him up."

There was a clamour of approval, but Dave made himself heard once more.

"Wait a minute," he said, his eyes on Bowie. "Wait a minute. When Bowie says I killed Dawson, my answer is just this: I wouldn't sneak up on a snake an' shoot him in the back without givin' it a chance to defend itself."

Bowie cringed at the words, for, hired murderer though he was, he had some glimmer of conscience in him. But next instant he whipped round and appealed to the crowd impatiently.

"What are you goin' to do?" he grated. "Stand here an' listen to his palaver all day? By gum! I got a mind ter plug the coyote myself!" And in a moment he had snatched his gun from its holster and rammed the muzzle against the buckle of Dave's belt.

Simultaneously there was a racket of shooting farther along the street, and suddenly those on the outskirts of the crowd raised an uproar. For, firing into the air, Cloudy had stamped the brones that he had mustered, and the mass of horseflesh was thundering through the town.

There was a momentary panic, and Dave took advantage of it, striking Bowie's gun from his fist and jumping into the middle of the street. Blake and

Edwards and one or two others tried to grab him, but while apparently having the same project in mind, the three Hook brothers lunged forward with one accord, purposely missed Dave and fell sprawling at his enemies' feet.

Edwards and Blake and their hirelings tripped over them, and the resulting confusion gave Dave a few precious seconds. He saw a couple of "plugs" swing past him at full gallop, a light buggy skidding and swerving through the dust behind them—and he sprang towards the vehicle.

He tumbled into it and scrambled to the driving-seat, plucking up the reins. There was pandemonium in the rear, and a volley of bullets zipped around him viciously, but not one of them hit him, and, laying on to the plugs, he drove them headlong out of the town.

They swept up on to the trail that led westward, and the buggy swayed wildly from side to side as the horses stretched themselves in a break-away dash. Dave caught himself yelling at the top of his voice—yelling to encourage them—and they answered well. But, glancing over his shoulder, he saw that some of the mob had secured their brones and were galloping in pursuit.

Then he caught sight of Cloudy not more than a hundred yards to the rear—Cloudy in Tarzan's saddle, and rapidly gaining on the buggy.

A bend was turned, and dense thickets hid Dave from the pursuers. Looking back three or four seconds later he saw Tarzan and Cloudy career into view, and in less than half a minute the white pinto was pulling level with the buggy.

Dave dropped the reins he was holding, and as Tarzan raced abreast of him he slung one leg over the pinto's back. Next instant the fugitives were striking to the left through the thickets, leaving the two plugs to speed on along the main trail with the buggy.

When the pursuers swung round the bend they followed the tracks of the wheels—

And in the meantime Dave and Cloudy pushed on through the chaparral till they found themselves in a country of rolling hills, in the heart of which they discovered an abandoned homestead.

The place seemed a likely hide-out, and they pushed open the front door and entered, leading Tarzan after them. Here Dave pronounced himself content to remain for as long as it should prove necessary, and, having settled himself comfortably in a rickety chair, he began to sing high heartedly.

Cloudy was by no means easy of mind, and it was with acute anxiety that he interrupted Dave as the latter was rendering an old-time Western ballad.

"Say," he protested, "I'd be a good deal happier if you'd cut out that squawkin'. If you ain't careful, Dave Hayes, you'll be a corpse mighty soon, an' I don't want no lilies in my hand. I—"

Cloudy checked, for all at once he heard a sound that filled him with dread—the sound of hoofs clattering on to a stony slope—and in a moment he was at the window.

"A bunch o' horsemen," he panted, "an' they're headed this way. I bet that undertaker is at the bottom o' this. He's had his eye on me ever since we hit town."

"Aw, forget it, Cloudy!" said Dave. "And listen—if this is a show-down we're going to barricade ourselves in that back room and get ready to shoot our way out. Come on!"

He led the way through a door opposite the one by which they had entered, and, having passed into the back room with Tarzan, they proceeded to drag every piece of furniture available across the floor. Then they stood waiting with drawn guns.

They heard the newcomers ride up to the shack, and they heard them troop into the front room. But in the very next moment they knew that the men had not come looking for them, for the familiar voice of Pop Williams made itself audible, and his first words revealed the purpose for which he and his companions were gathered there.

"Folks," Pop announced, "it's taken a long time to find out who can actually be trusted in Bowden, but we all here are honestly fer Law and Order, and that's why this meetin' has been called.

Now listen, I want to state that for a crowd of wise hombres we're the biggest bunch o' jackasses between here and Mexico. We've let our dumbness drive away the best friend we ever had, for, jest because this skunk Bowie shot off his mouth, we sat around wall-eyed an' let the riff-raff chase the young Ranger outa town."

There was a murmur from his audience, which must have comprised almost half the male population of the town—a crowd typical of the Border, with Mex and Yankee intermingling in a common cause to stamp out crime.

One of the Hook Brothers spoke. "Now look here, Pop," he protested, "that ain't fair. If one of us had interferred open-like, we'd been shot dead in our tracks—"

Standing on the other side of the door separating the two rooms, Dave had heard enough, and now he raised his voice and betrayed his presence there.

"Say," he called, "is that meetin' of yours a private game, or can anybody draw cards?"

There was a tense silence, and then Pop gave an exclamation.

"That was the Ranger," Dave heard him say. "I know his voice. Come on out, Ranger—you're among friends."

Dave had the door open in a few seconds, and, followed by Cloudy, he stepped into the front room amidst a volley of greetings. Then he addressed the crowd of citizens.

(Continued on page 27.)

Edwards held the gun, but Dave's grasp was still on his wrist, and he forced the crook's arm outward and upward.

A gripping drama of a man accused of stealing a huge diamond, and how he escaped and the terrible revenge he took. Starring Ian Keith and Aileen Pringle.

"PRINCE OF DIAMONDS"

The Thief.

IT was an unhappy day for Rupert Endon. His home, the home that had been his family's for three generations back, was to be sold.

Rupert did not want to part with the place, but he had no choice. It was a rambling old castle which stood high on the rocks of Maine, as impregnable as a fortress. The solitary road which led up to it from the nearest town had to pass over a drawbridge, and when this was up access to the great doors which guarded the entrance was impossible.

It was built of massive stone on solid rock, and beneath there were passages which descended to the foot of the cliffs. They led to a cove, and occasionally Rupert used it for mooring his small fishing boats on those occasions when he took a quiet holiday.

Rumour had it that the castle was once used by pirates. Certainly it dated back a considerable number of years, for it was one of the show places along the coast. Rupert, who loved it, knew every nook and cranny of its gigantic stone walls.

Times were bad. Several business ventures in which Rupert had been involved, mainly connected with the diamond trade, had crashed with somewhat extraordinary suddenness.

It was a blow—a very serious blow. Barely six months ago his engagement to Eve Marley had been announced, and it had been both his dream and hers that they should make their home in Endon Castle.

All that was ended now. There was no alternative—Rupert was compelled to let it go.

He arrived back at it after a trip to France, where he had been working in order to try to retrieve his fallen fortunes, and looked round longingly. Williams, the old butler who had been September 6th, 1930, with the Endons all his life, greeted him.

"I trust you will permit me to go with you, sir," he said.

Rupert allowed a smile to play across his tanned face, revealing a row of even white teeth. That smile of his, coupled with a peculiar way of putting his head slightly on one side, had earned him the sobriquet amongst those who knew him of "Charming Endon."

"I'm afraid not, Williams," he replied. "I shall not be keeping up a place like this in future."

"But, sir—"

"Perhaps the new owner will keep you on," Rupert continued evenly, cutting short Williams' protests. "You know him quite well. It is Mr. Gilbert Crayle." He glanced at his watch. "He should be here shortly."

The even hum of a large car was heard coming over the drawbridge. It died away as the car drew up before the outer gateway.

Williams, always courteous and urbane, bowed slightly to his young master and crossed the hall. He opened the door to admit a grey-haired man, faultlessly dressed, on whose face was all the craftiness of a fox.

"Good-morning, Mr. Crayle!" said Williams soberly. "You will find Mr. Rupert in the library, sir."

Crayle nodded briefly, as though the existence of Williams was completely beneath his notice, and departed in the direction of the library.

Williams watched him go with very mixed feelings. So that was his new master! Well, he could see trouble brewing, and he mentally registered then that his stay at Endon Castle was likely to be a short one.

He was about to close the door when another car made its appearance. Williams waited for it to stop, and then hurried forward as a girl descended from it. Her face was radiant, and her step light and full of vitality. She was looking forward to seeing Rupert again—just to tell him that in spite of the fact that he was poor, it was going to make no difference. She still cared for him, and always would.

She turned as she reached the ground. "Come along, Adrian," she said tolerantly. "Mr. Crayle is already here, and I want to say something to Rupert before he starts talking about business."

The young man addressed slowly alighted from the car. He was rather foppish in appearance, and affected a monocle. Through no fault of his own, he had inherited a peer's title without the necessary money to keep it up; nevertheless, he liked to be called "Lord Adrian" by anyone who was sufficiently impressed with his greatness.

"All right, old girl," he drawled. "Coming, and all that. I don't know why you can't slow up for a change. Ever since I got up at the unearthly hour of nine, I've done nothing but rush all over the place."

Eve Marley laughed good-humouredly. She was used to her brother's indolent ways, just as she was used to his habit of coming to her for money whenever he was hard up—which was quite often.

They went into the castle, and Eve, without invitation, made her way to the library.

Rupert and Crayle were enjoying a cocktail when she entered. They rose at the sound of her greeting.

"Hallo, Eve!" said Rupert eagerly, advancing to meet her, and taking both of her hands in his. He lowered his voice so that Crayle could not hear. "You look wonderful to day, dear."

She smiled her thanks. "I want to see you before you start your business with Mr. Crayle," she said softly. "Let's go into the morning room."

They left Crayle and Adrian together, and departed. As soon as they were alone, Rupert took her in his arms. She raised her lips to his, and for a few exquisite moments the world was forgotten.

At last she broke away. "We mustn't be too long," she said. "I know you want to finish the details of the sale." She sighed. "What a pity you have to let this place go! We could have been so happy here."

A worried frown appeared on Rupert's brow.

"You know how things are going to be with me from now on, Eve," he said quietly. "I shall be fairly poor, so there is nothing else for me to do but release you from our engagement."

It was what Eve had been waiting for. The last thing in the world she wanted was to break off the engagement.

"Silly boy!" she said softly. "Kiss me again, and never say anything like that again. We are going to be married just as soon as we can."

"Eve!"

"I mean it. And now let us go back to the others."

In the library, meanwhile, Crayle and Adrian were talking earnestly. They were discussing Rupert.

"I've done everything I can to finish him," Crayle was saying. "I've broken him, and I've arranged to buy the castle from him. Yet she still seems set on the idea of their marriage."

Adrian looked thoughtful. He was no business man, but he knew something about the gentle art of squeezing money out of people.

"Leave everything to me," he said calmly. "I have my own methods of dealing with him." He lit a cigarette and puffed a cloud of smoke ceiling-wards. "By the way, Crayle, how much did you say it was worth to you to marry Eve?"

Crayle looked at him shrewdly, and his eyes narrowed.

"I didn't say anything," he replied levelly. "But I dare say I could manage ten thousand. You can count on that."

"Good enough," said Adrian. "Ten thousand it is—on the day you and Eve marry."

"Hush! Here they are."

Rupert and Eve came in. Adrian promptly went up to Rupert and took him by the arm.

"Do you mind if I run up to your room, Rupert?" he said engagingly. "I want to wash and change after our journey."

"Certainly," replied Rupert readily. "If Eve and Mr. Crayle will excuse us, I will come with you."

They went upstairs. Adrian smiled to himself as he followed the man he was plotting to rob of the only thing in life left to him.

When they were in Rupert's bedroom, Adrian flung himself into a chair, and assumed an expression of hopelessness.

"I say, old man, I'm in a deuce of a fix," he began. "I'm afraid I've made a bit of a fool of myself."

Rupert looked at him in alarm. This sudden seriousness on Adrian's part was as disturbing as it was unusual.

"What is wrong? Nothing, surely, that cannot be put right."

"I was in Crayle's office on Wednesday last," Adrian went on. "That was the day on which some—"

"The Rajah Diamond was stolen," put in Rupert. "Yes, I know about that."

Adrian put his fingers into his waistcoat pocket and drew out a large white stone, clear as water, and with a sparkle from its facets that proclaimed it to be a diamond of the first water.

Rupert stared at it dumbfoundedly. As an expert, he knew that it was the gem which they had just been talking about a few seconds previously.

"You!" said Rupert hoarsely. "You—a thief!"

"Yes," Adrian hung his head in pretended shame. "I—a thief."

False Evidence.

RUPERT took the diamond from him and stared at it as it lay in the palm of his hand. Adrian, of all people! The young fool!

That was what came of spending all his money as fast as he could lay his hands on it. He had run himself into heavy debt probably, with the result that he had to turn thief in order to save himself from bankruptcy.

With what result? In his desperation he had overlooked the fact that discovery was absolutely certain. It was impossible to dispose of a gem like that. Every collector, every jeweller in the world knew the famous Rajah Diamond. They knew, too, that it had been stolen.

So Rupert thought. He did not know that the diamond had never been stolen—that it had been handed to Adrian by Crayle himself, the rumour of the theft having been spread afterwards. Crayle was a clever man. He had done it primarily to get Adrian into his clutches, so that he would have a lever to use on Eve.

It had been his intention to give the diamond to Adrian, then denounce him as a thief when he tried to sell it. Adrian, all unsuspecting, had accepted it. He had asked Crayle for a loan, and Crayle had chosen that way of paying it.

Adrian had seen what was in the wind afterwards. By some mysterious glimmering of common sense he had waited for a day before disposing of it, with the result that he had seen the reports concerning its supposed theft.

He was as much of a rogue as Crayle, and it was obvious to him that if he tried to give it back to Crayle he would still be denounced. It was apparent that Crayle wanted Adrian arrested, so that he could either prosecute or not according to whether Eve accepted his proposal of marriage.

Adrian had to think fast. The result was that he confessed to Rupert that he had stolen it. He knew Rupert, and knew how Rupert loved Eve.

He watched Rupert staring at the jewel, and his eyes gleamed. His plan was going to work!

"This is horrible," Rupert said suddenly, looking up. "If anything of this gets out it will mean a scandal, and we can't have that. We must think of Eve."

Exactly what Adrian wanted to hear! Hurriedly he hid a smile.

"But what can be done?" he asked with a show of helplessness.

"I don't know. Let me think."

Rupert paced and down the room, the diamond in his clenched hand. This was horrible, ghastly.

He spun round and caught the hand that held the knife in mid-air, and by the sheer strength of his arm, forced the man to the ground.

There were no thoughts of rebuke in his mind. He was not like that. Other men might call Adrian some hard names, but not him. His job was to pull Eve's brother out of the mess he was in.

"Perhaps you could see Crayle and explain," Adrian suggested. "He would understand if you talked to him."

Rupert stopped his pacing. Not knowing that Crayle was so ruthless, he thought that the suggestion was a sound one.

"Why, of course," he said. "That is the obvious thing to do. I am often in and out of Crayle's office, and I see no reason why he should not believe that I picked up the diamond as a joke or something. Anyway, I'll see him at once."

They returned to the library, Rupert anxious and Adrian elated. Rupert had fallen for the story better than Adrian had imagined, and he was one of those helpful men who would do anything to save Eve trouble and shame.

As Rupert entered the room he saw Crayle about to try to take Eve into his arms. Eve was backing away from him hastily.

Rupert made no comment. He knew that Crayle loved Eve, and it was only natural for him to try to win her. In a way, Rupert regarded it as something of a compliment, and he knew Eve well enough to realise that there was only one man in her life that mattered—himself.

Crayle backed away hastily as they came in and sat down. Apparently his efforts to make Eve listen to him had not been too successful.

"Er—I was rather interested in that picture up there," he said lamely. "The one of the old lady. It looks like a Rembrandt."

"It is," said Rupert easily. He thought he saw a chance of solving Adrian's difficulties for him. "Incidentally, did you notice the stone in that large diamond pendant she is wearing?"

Crayle, glad of something to relieve his embarrassment, walked over to the picture and examined it closely.

"Extraordinary!" he murmured. "It looks exactly like the Rajah Diamond."

"That's what I thought," said Rupert. He opened his hand, and there in the palm lay the diamond itself. "As a matter of fact, I took the liberty of borrowing the Rajah Diamond in order to compare. I hope you don't mind."

Crayle stared at the diamond in astonishment, then looked up at Adrian. The latter flickered an eyelash significantly. In an instant Crayle understood. He had got Rupert and Eve in the hollow of his hand.

Drawing himself up to his full height, he looked at Rupert coldly.

"I am afraid I do mind," he replied stiffly. "If you only borrowed it, why did you not let me know when I put round the reports that it had been stolen?"

"I didn't trouble," said Rupert calmly. "I knew that as soon as I was able to see you, everything would be all right."

Crayle transferred his gaze to Eve as though to say he was sorry for what he had to do. His manner was becoming more stern.

"I am sorry, Endon, but everything is not all right," he said. "You took the Rajah Diamond from my office, and now try to return it on the pretext that you only borrowed it. People do not 'borrow' articles of such a value

September 6th, 1930.

as that. I have no alternative but to accuse you of theft."

Rupert started back, and his face flushed angrily. Crayle was being perfectly absurd.

"This is ridiculous—" he began.

"Ridiculous, eh?" Crayle was openly sneering now. "The police are hardly likely to take the same view when they look into your present financial position."

Eve started forward, her face drawn with anxiety.

"Mr. Crayle," she protested, "this is quite unbearable. You must be mad to think a man like Rupert would steal anything."

Crayle ignored her. He still addressed Rupert.

"Well, have you anything more to say?"

Rupert shrugged his shoulders. He had no alternative now but to throw the blame where it belonged.

"Just this," he said. "Ask Adrian how the diamond came to be in my possession."

Crayle frowned. He looked at Adrian meaningfully.

"Well?" he asked.

Adrian assumed a perfectly blank expression.

"The fellow is potty," he said succinctly. "I know nothing about it."

"But you gave it to me a few moments ago," Rupert protested. "You confessed that you had stolen it."

"I thought so," Adrian countered. "The man is potty."

Crayle shrugged his shoulders. His hold over Rupert was nearly complete. Calmly he went over to the telephone.

"Hallo!" he called, after he had been connected. "Is Inspector Betterton there? Betterton, you had better come over to Endon Castle. I have here the thief of the Rajah Diamond, and I wish to give him into custody."

Escape.

FOR the next hour Eve and Rupert tried to persuade Crayle that it was all a horrible mistake, but Crayle would not listen. He insisted that Rupert had stolen the gem in order to retrieve his fallen fortunes, and had afterwards invented the story about having borrowed it because he found he could not sell it.

Crayle also pointed out, with heavy sarcasm, that he was not inclined to show any mercy to a man who tried to place the blame for his misdeeds upon someone else. He referred to Adrian.

Of course, he knew the true state of affairs. He realised that Adrian had been clever, and he backed him up to the full. To implicate Rupert in this manner, thus at once ruining him and having him put away for a number of years, was little short of a stroke of genius. It left a clear field with Eve.

Rupert gave up arguing after a while. His attitude was that he would face the music. He knew now that he had been the victim of a scheme to get rid of him; but he had implicit faith in the fact that the true state of affairs would come out once the matter came before a court of law.

He cared only about one thing—that Eve still believed in him. That was all that mattered.

Eve listened to the interchange of words between Rupert and Crayle, and found herself examining the two men critically. She saw in Crayle a ruthless and somewhat sinister business man who would stop at nothing to gain his ends; while Rupert was an easy-going, honourable type who would never suspect villainy until he became involved in it.

In her heart she knew that Rupert did not steal the diamond. She knew, too, that her brother was lying.

Crayle suddenly approached her.

"Eve, I am so sorry that you have had to witness such a distressing scene," he said ingratiatingly. "I think you will realise, though, that Endon's own actions made it necessary."

She looked round to where Rupert was standing, and saw that he was well without earshot. Adrian had left the room. She lowered her voice.

"There's something mysterious behind all this, Mr. Crayle," she said. Her voice hardened. "Won't you tell me what has to be done to prevent Rupert from being arrested?"

Crayle held up his hands in protest.

"Please, Eve, don't put it like that," he said. "Justice must be done."

"Must it?" she asked ironically. She was beginning to get an insight into Crayle's true character. "Let me put the question in another way, then. What must I do—what price must I pay—for this ridiculous charge to be withdrawn?"

Crayle looked at her shrewdly, and decided that his best course was to come into the open.

"Well, I think you will see that I could not prosecute any friend of my wife's," he said smoothly. "You understand, don't you?"

She did not reply at once. The answer she got was the one she expected. Crayle had a hold on Rupert now, and the cost of having that hold released was that she should surrender herself in marriage.

"Very well, Mr. Crayle," she replied coldly. "You win, I suppose. I love Rupert, and I would do anything in the world for him. If I have got to marry you, I'll carry through my share of the bargain; but remember, although yours is the upper hand now, you won't be in that position for ever." She rose. "And now I want to talk to Rupert. Will you leave us, please?"

She was quite calm about it all. At first it had been her impulse to tell Crayle that she suspected him of a conspiracy with her brother, but she had come to the conclusion that she would not be acting for the best by doing anything like that. Crayle was a clever man, and to oppose him at this moment would be madness.

Her brother, too, would not tell what he knew. He was an inveterate liar, just as he was an inveterate borrower of money, and it was quite useless trying to appeal to his sense of honour. He had none.

She waited until Crayle had left her alone with Rupert, and summoned up her courage to play the difficult part that was before her.

"Rupert!" she called.

Rupert had been standing with his back to her on the other side of the room. He turned, disturbed by the strange note in her voice. It had seemed hard, relentless.

"Yes, Eve?" he replied dully.

Slowly she drew off his engagement ring and held it out.

"I wouldn't have minded marrying a poor man," she went on slowly. "But a thief, never!"

He stared at her in amazement. Not knowing that she was breaking the engagement in order to serve him and clear his name, he thought that she had so little faith in his sense of decency was a terrible blow. It seemed to be the end of everything.

"But, Eve, surely you can't believe—"

She held up a silencing hand. To hear his rebukes was more than she could bear.

"Need we say anything more?" she said wearily. "I know you will see how impossible it all is."

He nodded. Yes, he could see that. Marriage to a girl who did not believe in him was utterly out of the question. Silently he took back the ring.

There came a heavy thundering at the outer door. Williams opened it, to admit an official-looking man who gave the name of Inspector Betterton. Crayle promptly led the detective into the library, and pointed to Rupert.

"That is the man, inspector," he said.

Betterton strode across the room, and came to a halt by Rupert's side.

"There need be no fuss, Mr. Endon," he said quietly. "I shall have to take you along, of course, and I am giving you the usual caution about saying anything that might be used in evidence against you."

Rupert looked at him levelly, and saw that the inspector was by no means inexperienced in the handling of men. He also glanced at the door, and saw two more officers standing outside.

Appealingly he turned to Eve.

"Is what you just said quite final, Eve?" he asked.

"I am afraid it is," she replied, choking back a sob with an effort.

Rupert shrugged his shoulders. By now he was burning with a sense of injustice. Eve believed him guilty, and if she turned against him, the world was against him, too.

A slight frown appeared on his forehead. Into his mind came thoughts of revenge. Yes, that was it. Revenge, even if it took him the remainder of his life. He would get even with Crayle—yes, and with the girl who had deserted him in his hour of need.

His mind made up, he acted swiftly.

A sudden blow in Betterton's chest sent the detective staggering backwards. The next moment he had gained the window, and hung poised for a second.

"I'll come back—some day!" he shouted.

Then he vanished from sight, swinging through a window of one of the cellars, and making his way through the maze of passages that had once been used by smugglers and pirates.

If only he had waited a few moments longer! If only he had heard Eve's agonised cry to Crayle: "Please let him go, Mr. Crayle. Let him go, and I'll marry you!"

Crayle's trump card was played. He told Betterton to let Rupert go, in spite of the fact that Eve said she would be a wife in name only. It was only a matter of time, he reflected, before she capitulated and made him the happiest man alive.

By that belief, he made the one mistake of all his scheming. Retribution, devastating and complete, had already cast its shadow over his future life.

Captain Ruin.

RUPERT got clear away, not knowing that the hue and cry had been stopped before it had really started. He made his way on foot to a neighbouring port, and took the first ship available. He did not know where it was going—did not even care.

That was the last the world heard of him for three years.

At the end of that time he had completely sunk his old identity. To all intents and purposes, Rupert Endon had died, and in his place had come a mysterious man whose name held terror for everyone who heard it—Captain Ruin.

Captain Ruin and Rupert Endon were one and the same man!

In a cheap café by the waterside at Penang, Rupert sat drinking. The life of hardship he had led during the time since he had left Endon Castle showed its marks on his face. It was hard and meriless. "Charming Endon" was no longer to be seen.

The café was in the Chinese quarter, tucked away in a street that was evil-smelling and sinister. Men were murdered every night in that district, but Rupert was not disturbed by the danger he was obviously running. Only once had anyone tried to interfere with him, and the outcome had been so terrible for the attacker that the reputation of Captain Ruin spread far and wide.

The offender had been a drunken Chink, whose befuddled brain conceived the idea that he could knife Rupert and rob him of his money.

Rupert, his ears ever alert, had heard the Chink coming. With a swift, pantherine movement, he had spun round and had caught in mid-air the hand that held the knife, and by the sheer strength in his arm forced the man to the ground.

Five minutes later Rupert arrived at the self-same café in which he was now sitting. Across one shoulder he carried the Chink, unconscious. When that would-be murderer was examined, he was found to have a smashed jaw and a fractured forearm.

Rupert was left alone after that.

He made a living by undertaking dangerous jobs for anyone who cared to employ him, and his name was known throughout the length and breadth of Malay.

The owner of the café was a Chinaman by the name of Li Fang. For years Li Fang had been awaiting an opportunity of meeting someone like Rupert—someone who could be trusted, and who was not afraid of death.

He had hesitated long before approaching Rupert. He had a mission he wanted undertaken, but it was one in which his man had to be selected with care. The mission involved the finding of a hidden diamond mine.

Rupert would suit Li Fang's purpose admirably, for his knowledge of diamonds was the knowledge of an expert. But Li Fang hesitated still. Unlimited wealth could well make an honest man forgetful that the property he was handling belonged to someone else.

At the same time, he was sufficiently anxious for the safety of his own yellow hide that he did not want to perform the task himself. The man known as Captain Ruin was his only hope.

He sent for Rupert in the end. His crafty eyes glittered as he watched Rupert sit down in front of him and calmly accept a cigarette.

"Are you honest, my friend?" he began.

Rupert stared at him fixedly. "That's a darned impertinent question, Li Fang," was Rupert's swift reply. "I've a good mind to wring your confounded neck."

"The—black—death!" the negro gasped. Then his head fell back.

Li Fang held up his hands defensively. "No, no; that is not necessary," he said, grinning feebly. "I asked only because I wanted to be quite sure." He drew from the folds of his wide sleeves an aged and cracked parchment, and smoothed it out on the table before him. "Ten years ago two brothers discovered a diamond mine in a district infested with typhoid fever. They worked it for a time, and then both died. By various means—we will not discuss how—a plan of where this mine is to be found came into my hands."

"Well?" said Rupert indifferently.

"I want you to find that mine, my friend," pursued Li Fang. "If you will agree to go in search of it, I will pay you sufficient for your expenses, and we will share equally."

A smile flickered across the face of the man who was known as Captain Ruin.

"Tell me, my friend, are you honest?" he asked ironically.

Li Fang grinned again. He could afford to let pass a joke or two at himself. He was in need of Rupert's brains.

"I will repeat my offer in writing," he said smugly.

"Don't bother," Rupert's tone was dry and hard. "You couldn't play a dirty game with me, you heathen. You've offered me half, and I don't need the assistance of a court of law to get it. When do I have to start?"

"As soon as you wish."

Rupert studied the plan which lay on the table. For a few moments he did not speak; then he gave vent to an exclamation of satisfaction.

"You did well to send me instead of going yourself, Li Fang," he said. "It is a suicide country up where that mine is located, and I wouldn't swear that the men I shall take with me will ever come back. As for me—well, I don't suppose anything could ever kill me." He folded up the chart and put it into his pocket. "Get me four of the hardest toughs you can find on the quayside, and tell them to report, sober, at sunrise to-morrow. As the journey is to be made up-river, I'll go and buy a decent sampan which will hold water."

He was about to turn to go, when his eye fell on a girl standing a short distance away. She was Chinese-Malay—a mixture of the two races.

"That's a darned pretty kid you've got there," he commented. "You'd better keep a close watch on some of the men round here, or you'll lose her."

Li Fang turned his head, and saw who Rupert meant.

"That is Lolah," he said casually. "She is quite safe with me. There are none here who would dare to cast their evil glances at her, for she is my brother's daughter."

Rupert nodded, and went away. As he threaded his way through the mixture of humanity that thronged the café, he was completely unaware of the crafty expression in Li Fang's eyes.

"You are very clever, my friend," he murmured softly. "But you will never get that half-share. I will send one of my own men with you, and when you discover that mine you will die." His expression became even more crafty. "And when my emissary returns and tells me exactly where the mine is, I will kill him, too. It is only dead men who keep secrets."

In the Jungle.

THE sampan wound its way slowly up the river that led into the interior. Apart from Rupert, there were four other men on board, a September 1th, 1916.

villainous-looking individual by the name of Smith being their leader. He was Li Fang's henchman.

They were a tough crowd, and it was clear to Rupert, hardened as he was to the ways of men, that he would have trouble with them sooner or later. As a precaution, he carried a heavy-calibre Colt. As a trouble-maker, he could do fairly well on his own account!

The remainder of his crew was made up by an enormous South African negro and two beachcombers who would sell their very souls for half a pint of whisky.

The location of the mine was about two days' journey from Penang. The sampan—a type of boat that is able to go anywhere so long as there is a foot of water in which to float—was inclined to leak. The crew, definitely refused anything to drink by Rupert, were in a bad humour. The only saving grace about the whole journey was that there was none of that driving squall weather for which the Malay Peninsula is noted.

At the end of the first day, just as the sun was beginning to get low in the heavens, the negro let up a shout of fear. He had crawled under the awning of the boat for a sleep, and beneath him something had moved.

"What is the matter, Sambo?" Rupert called sharply.

"There's something here, cap'n," the negro wailed, terror-stricken. "Under that sacking—there!"

He pointed to one of the corners of the sampan, and Rupert, suspecting a snake, drew his gun. With a swift movement, he flung the sacking back.

"Lolah!" he exclaimed.

The half-caste girl, her lips parted in a smile, scrambled to her feet.

"Come with you," she said simply.

Rupert became angry. This was sheer foolhardiness. It was bad enough taking men into this plague-ridden country, but her presence made it ten times worse.

"You had no business to come," he snapped. "If Li Fang finds that you are with us, he'll start trouble, and I think I've just about got enough to contend with on this trip."

"Li Fang!" She spoke the name contemptuously. "What care I for Li Fang? He does not tell me that I am pretty. But you did—so I came."

Rupert's anger left him. He was still annoyed that she had come, but he could not feel bad about a girl who was prepared to face death just because he had called her pretty.

"Very well," he said quietly. "It has put us to a lot of unnecessary bother, but we needn't go into that now." He raised his voice and addressed the crew. "Turn about. I'm going to take her back."

The crew hastened to obey, but Lolah clutched Rupert's arm in alarm.

"Don't let them do that," she said, frightened. "Please don't. Listen to what I have to say." She bent closer to him, and lowered her voice to a whisper. "Li Fang, he says that you are to die when you have found what you are looking for. Li Fang very crafty. He order Smeeth to kill you and the others, and when Smeeth return to Penang he die, too. see?"

Rupert stared at her dumbfoundedly, hardly believing that such treachery was possible; but he had been in the East sufficiently long to know that men cease to be human at times in countries like this.

"I'll remember your warning, Lolah," he said grimly. "Meanwhile you must still go back."

"No, no." Her voice vibrated with stark fear. "If I do, I will be killed. Li Fang, he would know that I had told you."

Rupert realised for the first time the danger she was running in order to warn him of Li Fang's treachery, and he was touched. He had heard before of the blind devotion that a half-caste girl will often give in exchange for a little kindness, but this was the first time he had come into contact with it.

He patted her kindly on the shoulder.

"All right, Lolah," he said gently. "You had better come. When I've done the job I set out to do, and have settled one or two matters with Li Fang, I'll see that you're looked after. You're a good girl."

All through that night they worked their way up-river. The next day their way led them through a jungle, where the trees overhanging on either side seemed to make a natural archway. Now and then wild beasts roared close at hand.

Rupert, sitting in the bows with a rifle across his knees, studied the map. He was searching for a clearing on the right bank where, the map said, there would be found the remains of a small hut.

It was middle afternoon before they reached their destination, and the sampan was run in close to the bank. Rupert, his mind ready for any treachery that might arise, stepped ashore and watched while his men began to unload. Lolah was under the awning, out of sight.

Suddenly there was a commotion. Lolah screamed; then the negro let up a shout of agony. The shout died away to a horrible gurgle, as though the man was fighting for breath.

Rupert leapt aboard in alarm. He found the negro lying on the bottom of the sampan writhing in death agony.

"Get a pan of water," he shouted to Smith. "And hurry."

The water was produced, and Rupert forced some of it between the stricken man's lips. For a few brief moments the agony left the negro's face.

"What happened?" Rupert asked quickly.

"The—black—death—" the negro gasped. Then his head fell back. He was finished.

Rupert stared down at the dead man in puzzlement. The black death! What could that mean? Here was a burly negro, strong as a horse, suddenly laid low without the slightest warning.

Rupert rose to his feet. It was no use worrying about it. Life was cheap in Malay, and one man here or there did not make much difference. The main thing was to get his mission fulfilled as soon as possible and return to Penang.

They weighted the negro's body and buried him in the river. Then, as if nothing unusual had occurred, they began to penetrate into the jungle in search of the mine.

Swift Poison.

"THIS way, men!"

Rupert's voice rang out triumphantly. He had come to a hole in the ground that was obviously a mine shaft of sorts, and he made hasty preparations to descend into it. It might be the one he sought; on the other hand, it might be only an abandoned working from which all the wealth had been extracted.

Smith was the first to hear Rupert's

(Continued on page 26.)

A roaring comedy—hilarious situations—romantic and riotous climaxes. A story that will drive all dull care away. Starring George Sidney and Charlie Murray.

A Tough Customer.

IT was a wet night in June, and the rain was beating against the window of the cosy if somewhat overcrowded little shop parlour, but the state of the weather was not at the moment disturbing either Benjamin Kaplan, pawnbroker, or his friend, Sergeant Patrick O'Grady, of the New York Police.

Benjamin Kaplan, who fancied himself as a musician, was plucking the strings of a harp which had come to him in the course of business and had never been redeemed, and was singing at the top of his rather husky voice:

"Take a trip up the Hudson and down the Bay—
A trip down to Coney and far Rock-away."

Patrick O'Grady, who was neither a musician nor a vocalist, was doing his best to perform some sort of obligato on a jew's harp. The noise was considerable.

Both men, if you had asked them their age, would have told you, probably, that they were in their prime, which is not reckoned by birthdays. Kaplan was short, moon-faced, shock-headed, and possessed a bulge where once his waist had been. O'Grady, on the other hand, was tall, long-faced, red-haired, neither stout nor thin, and, although an Irishman, owned a nose as prominent as his Jewish friend's, though not the same shape. They had not been born with good looks, yet they were both good fellows.

The song came to an end, and the rain made itself heard.

"A fine merry month of June," remarked Kaplan, putting the harp away in a corner. "I'm sorry for you, O'Grady, havin' to go out in it, but cops will be cops—and New York's full o' doorways."

"Kaplan," said O'Grady thoughtfully,

"I was just thinkin' that for the last ten years I've spent three thousand six hundred and fifty nights in this back room of yours, and I've only just discovered something."

"What's that?" demanded Kaplan curiously.

"That you're gettin' homelier-lookin' every day!"

"Is that so?" snorted the pawnbroker.

"Vell, you don't! You couldn't!"

"Is that so?"

"Yes, that's so. And vat is more, let me tell you something— Excuse me, someone's in the shop!"

It was not a good night for trade, but undoubtedly the shop-bell had jangled. Kaplan went out into the shop, with its littered counter and its crowded shelves, and there was a tall, ill-featured young man near the door, with his overcoat collar turned up about his ears and his slouch-hat pulled down over his eyes.

Kaplan had been quick to answer the summons, but the intruder had been quicker to act upon a preconceived plan. Beneath his overcoat was hidden a silver vase which he had snatched up and concealed with the utmost rapidity.

"Excuse, please," greeted the pawnbroker. "Did I keep you waiting?"

"No, that's all right," was the reply.

"What will you give me for this?"

And with elaborate slowness the visitor produced the vase from beneath his coat and dumped it on the counter.

Kaplan picked it up with an expression of disdain and examined it critically.

"Oi, oi," he said disgustedly, "but it's worthless. Such a piece of junk I would not have in my place!"

The stranger chuckled, as well he might.

"On your shop window," he said.

"You have a notice: 'Don't throw it away if you've got no use for it.

Maybe Kaplan has.' It's silver, ain't it?"

"Sure," nodded Kaplan, fingering the vase. "Silver—yes, it's silver. But this sort of thing is a drug in the market. You couldn't give it away."

The young man looked depressed. In his haste, it was evident that he had snatched up the wrong article; but he was not without ingenuity. He proceeded to spin a doleful tale of an aged mother smitten with pneumonia, of no food in the house, and no money with which to buy medicine or obtain proper nursing.

Kaplan was a shrewd old fellow, but he had a weak heart for suffering, a fact very well known to all the shady denizens of New York's East Side.

"Oi, oi," he grunted. "And how old is your mother?"

"Ninety-four," glibly responded the thief.

"Ninety-four, eh? And from scrubbing hotel lobbies she got pneumonia! Oi, oi, oi! My mother had the same. There ought to be a law against it. All right—all right. I'll give you ten dollars for it."

The thief expressed his gratitude, and Kaplan put the vase on a shelf and paid over the specified sum.

At the door the thief paused and turned. Possibly some little stray feeling of remorse had penetrated his ordinarily thick hide. In any case he went back to the counter, fished in his waistcoat pocket, and produced a coin.

"You're a good guy," he said gruffly, "and I'm gonna show my appreciation. Have this!"

Kaplan accepted the coin and inspected it.

"It's a nickel," he said wonderingly, "and it's got two heads on it."

"Sure," was the response. "and it ain't worth five cents for that same reason. But it might come in handy some day."

"Ha!" chuckled the Jew. "Now I know what that means—that two heads is better than one. Thanks! And don't forget to let me know how your old mother comes out of it."

"Thanks," said the thief. "I won't forget."

He made for the door again, and this time he went straight out into the wet night. Kaplan stowed the spurious five-cent piece in his pocket and retired to the shop parlour.

The Foundling

PATRICK O'GRADY, during this little business interlude, had been puffing at his pipe, seated contentedly in a chair, for, according to a grandfather clock near the window, it was a full five minutes to ten. But his pipe went out, and he consulted his watch, and discovered that by the right time it was really only a few seconds to ten.

He rose indignantly, opened the clock-case, and moved the minute hand forward. The clock began to chime the hour just as Kaplan reappeared. O'Grady picked up his mackintosh and night-stick (or truncheon), and perched his official cap upon his head.

"Where are you goin', O'Grady?" demanded Kaplan. "You're not on duty till two in the mornin'!"

"I've got to get some sleep," said the Irishman.

"Vot's all you do! The trouble vit' you cops is you ain't got no ambition. If I was on the police force as long as you, I bet you by now I'd be at least commissioner."

"Ah!" scoffed O'Grady. "So long!"

Now Kaplan's pawnbroking establishment was on a street corner, and a second door in the shop parlour opened on to a little lobby which led to the side-street. O'Grady turned towards this second door, but among numerous other articles which had overflowed from the shop into the parlour was a plaster statuette of some Greek goddess which stood on an ebony pedestal.

"Vait a minute, now—vait a minute!" cried Kaplan. "Don't go out like that. Button up your mac! I don't want you to catch pneumonia."

"All right," said O'Grady, and raised his arm to obey his friend's instructions, but cannoned against the pedestal and sent the statuette flying.

Somehow he managed, in the very nick of time, to swing round and grasp the plaster goddess by the waist, saving her from destruction.

"Say, what are you tryin' to do?" howled the pawnbroker, his hands outstretched. "I'll sue you! I'll call a lawyer! Oh, it's saved! A hundred times I've told you that you should look out for this thing!"

"Phuegh!" gasped O'Grady, restoring the figure to its resting-place. "Good-night!" And he tugged open the door.

"Good-night!" boomed Kaplan.

And then, with a crash, the statuette fell to the floor and was shattered to fragments. He himself had knocked against the pedestal!

O'Grady looked back from the lobby, to see his friend ruefully surveying the damage.

"Broken at last!" exclaimed Kaplan. "For fifteen years I was afraid somebody would knock that thing over, but now I ain't afraid any more." He began to laugh. "Ha, ha!" he cried. "I'm a new man!"

O'Grady, with a chuckle, opened the street door, but stepped back aghast.

"Well, look what's here!" he cried.

Kaplan ran to him and peered over his extended arm at a wicker-basket on the floor of the porch. There was a blanket over one end of the basket, and inside, with its head on a pillow, was a brown-eyed baby of about eleven months, crying lustily.

"It—it's a baby!" exclaimed O'Grady. "Don't stand in the way like a dumb ox!" snorted Kaplan. "Didn't you ever see a baby before? Get out of the way—I'll take him in."

The sergeant removed his obstructing arm, and the pawnbroker lifted up the basket and staggered with it into the shop parlour, where he placed it on the table.

"Hurry up, hurry up!" he shouted, lifting the howling mite in his arms. "Get some bottles and milk, and go in the shop and get some toys. Go on!"

But O'Grady was inspecting the child, which was quite warily, though poorly, clad—a round-faced, chubby-cheeked little girl.

"Ah," he cried, "'tis a wee broth of a boy ye are!"

"He's a girl, you fool!" corrected Kaplan. "All my life nothing but junk has been comin' into this place, and look what I've got now. She—she's all wet. She's been out in the rain."

He rocked the baby in his arms, making little crooning noises till O'Grady indignantly took her from him and nursed her on his knee and sang to stop her tears. Kaplan, with his fingers in his ears, declared that O'Grady's voice was infinitely worse than the infant's noise.

Between them, with the utmost clumsiness, they removed the wet frock and the damp underclothes, and Kaplan produced some tiny garments he had taken in pawn. These were substituted, and the baby left off crying, and crowed at them, and seemed to be fascinated by O'Grady's truncheon, with which he performed tricks known to New York policemen.

After a while, however, O'Grady's sense of duty as a policeman began to disturb him.

"Look here, Kaplan," he said very officially, "this baby is a foundling, and we'll have to put it through the proper channels."

"Oi, oi, oi!" snorted the pawnbroker, clapping his hands for the infant's benefit. "This baby don't go through no channels. It was left on my doorstep, and it's mine. Here am I, a lonely widower, and here is the loveliest thing in the world. It's mine, O'Grady."

"Is it, be jabbers? Well, we both found it, so it's no more yours than mine—and I'm a lonely widower, too."

"You're a nice fellow, O'Grady, but this baby belongs to me."

"Say, listen," exploded the Irishman. "I've got just as much right to this baby as you have—in fact, I need a baby just as badly as you do."

The baby began to howl again, frightened by their vehemence, and for some little while both were busy trying to pacify it.

"I want to be fair," announced Kaplan quietly, after considerable thought. "I admit you've got a claim, so I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll throw up a nickel—that's fair enough, ain't it?"

He had remembered the two-headed coin; and, having obtained his friend's grudging consent, he flipped the coin into the air and caught it, crying, "Heads!"

He opened his hand, exhibiting an undeniable head.

"I win!" he cried triumphantly. "Congratulate me, O'Grady. I've got a baby! Ha, ha, ha, ha! Officer O'Grady, I want you to meet my daughter, Rosie Kaplan!"

O'Grady made a wry face. He also made protests.

"If you're goin' to care for the baby,"

he objected, "the least you can do is to let me name it."

"I'll listen. What's the proposition?" "Bridget O'Grady—there's a name for you!"

"Bridget O'Grady?" cried Kaplan scathingly. "Nothing of the kind Rosie Kaplan—that's more like it."

"Over my dead body!"

"Well, I'll tell you vat I'll do. I'll meet you half-way. Bridget Kaplan."

"Never! I'll split the difference with you—Rosie O'Grady."

"Rosie O'Grady? Rosie— Why, that's a song, ain't it?"

"Well, take a look at her," urged O'Grady. "Ain't she a song?"

"You're right, Pat," decided Kaplan. "So we'll christen her Rosie O'Grady."

"Christen nothin'!" retorted Kaplan. "We'll name her O'Grady."

Eighteen Years After.

ON a bright spring morning, eighteen years later, Sergeant O'Grady stepped off his beat into Benjamin Kaplan's pawnbroking establishment and passed behind the counter into the shop parlour.

The table was laid for breakfast, and Kaplan was frying bacon at the gas cooker, his waistcoat unfastened, his tie awry. He was just as bulky as on the night the basket with its live contents had been found on his doorstep, but his hair had turned white and become very thin on top. O'Grady, on the other hand, removed his cap from a head that was as flaming red as ever.

He sniffed at the pleasant odour as he greeted his old friend.

"Top o' the mornin'!" he said cheerfully. "It's a nice day."

"To me," said Kaplan, "it looks like rain."

"Sure ye never could agree with me," chuckled O'Grady. "Where's Rosie?"

"She's comin' right down."

Light footsteps sounded on the stairs beyond an open door, and into the room there stepped a beautiful, brown-haired, brown-eyed girl, slender of build, dressed in a blouse and skirt.

"Good-morning, daddy," she said to each of them solemnly in turn.

"Hallo, darling!" responded Kaplan.

"Look what I've brought you, Rosie," said O'Grady, and produced from behind his back a bunch of spring flowers.

"Look what I got for you, darling," said Kaplan, holding the frying-pan beneath her little tip-tilted nose.

"Look, look! Smell this!"

"How many times have I told you not to bother about my breakfast?" she reproved him. "I'm the cook around here."

"I like to do it, darling," protested the pawnbroker. "It gives me lots of pleasure."

He put the bacon on three plates, and Rosie prepared the coffee and cut bread, and they all sat down to eat and drink.

"You know, Rosie," said O'Grady fondly, "you're looking lovelier every day."

"Daddy," said Rosie archly, "you're getting younger every day."

"Younger?" snorted the pawnbroker. "Bah, you can't fool me—you're on your last legs. Did you take out insurance, Pat?"

"No, I did not."

"Well, I took out insurance last week. For Rosie."

O'Grady expressed the view that it was a very good idea.

"Why don't you take out insurance?" insisted Kaplan. "I'll send Moe Levine around to see you."

"Moe Levine?" echoed O'Grady, wiping his mouth with the back of his band. "Why should I do business with Moe Levine?"

"Well, it's all in the family, ain't it?"

"Just what do ye mane by that?"

"I'll tell you, Pat. I don't believe in long engagements. Now when Moe Levine and Rosie get married—"

"Just a minute," interrupted O'Grady wrathfully. "Rosie will never marry Moe Levine. 'Tis plain to be seen that she's crazy about Terry Calahan, and I'm tellin' you—"

"Oo, oi, oi!" broke in Kaplan with scorn. "You're getting old, O'Grady—you're getting old. D'you think I'm going to let my Rosie marry a common box-fighter?"

O'Grady rose to his feet; Kaplan followed suit. Rosie, who was quite accustomed to these bickerings, said quietly:

"Well, go ahead—don't mind me!"

"But Terry will be a champion some day," cried O'Grady.

"And I'll be a nervous wreck some day if you two keep this up!" retorted Rosie.

"You see, you see?" exclaimed Kaplan. "Can't you think of my Rosie's feelings? You think I'm goin' to have my grandchildren named Calahan, with cauliflower ears, maybe? You're crazy!"

High words followed, during which Rosie finished her breakfast and rose to her feet. It looked—but only looked—as though her adopted parents were about to rend one another limb from limb.

"Now stop your fighting!" she cried, stepping between them. "I let you pick my clothes, my food, and everything else, but when it comes to getting married, I'll do my own picking. Did you hear that?"

"He started it!" growled O'Grady.

"I shall be late for work if I stop to argue with you," she said. "Good-bye!"

She kissed them in turn and flitted away. The row was at an end.

"Say, Pat," wheedled Kaplan. "let's you and I play a game at draughts, shall we?"

"No," said O'Grady sternly. "I'm responsible for the peace and safety of this entire neighbourhood, and I've no time to play draughts, or puss-in-the-corner, either." And he rammed his cap on his head and departed through the shop.

"And better I'll play it without you!" cried Kaplan after him. "I'll have more competition playing against myself!"

O'Grady strode majestically across the street—and stumbled over the foot of a man who was standing beside a fruit-barrow near the opposite kerb.

He recovered his balance, wandered round the barrow and selected an apple.

"Small, ain't they?" he remarked.

"How much for this one?"

"Five cents," replied the keeper of the barrow.

"Well, a good apple is worth five cents," declared O'Grady, and he went off eating it.

The pawnbroking trade didn't seem to flourish that morning, and Benjamin Kaplan placed a draught-board on the counter and played against himself.

Whito was winning heavily, when a particularly ugly young Jew, long-haired, clean-shaven, thick-lipped, wearing a white felt hat and a striped suit, walked into the shop and leaned against the counter.

He was Moses Levine, the suitor to Rosie's hand, approved by Kaplan and scorned by O'Grady, and he looked troubled.

"Hallo, Moe!" said Kaplan, looking up from the draught-board. "Why, what's happened?"

"Never mind what's happened!" was the reply. "I want you to do something for me."

"All you got to do is to ask," declared Kaplan. "For my future son-in-law nothing is too good—except that I'm short of cash."

"Cash?" scorned Moe. "I don't want it—I want to buy a gun."

"A gun?" echoed the pawnbroker in astonishment, and became aware of the fact that one of Moe's eyes was distinctly blackened. "For what?"

"To show Terry Calahan I'm just as good as he is!" cried Moe savagely.

"For that you need a gun? Shame on you! When did you get that black eye?"

"Half an hour ago, when I saw Terry Calahan. What chance have I got with my fists against a fellow whose business is prize-fighting?"

"Use what all people was born with—brains!"

"He said next time he ran into me he would knock my head off—what good would my brains be then?"

"I picked you out for Rosie, didn't I?" stormed the pawnbroker. "You run right over and tell that rough Terry Calahan he can't intim—he can't intim—he can't get my goat. But first go inside and fix up your eye. You'll find some beefsteak in the ice-box, but remember, don't take too much—we've got to have supper to-night!"

Found Out.

SERGEANT O'GRADY, in the course of his official travels, had to pass the Hudson Gymnasium.

That afternoon he stepped inside the building, gazed thoughtfully at a number of young men who were taking exercise on parallel bars; the vaulting horses, the high bar, and so forth, and moved on into another room where a tall, powerfully-built but not exactly handsome young man was dealing very effectively with a punch-ball.

The young man was Terry Calahan, the suitor for Rosie's hand carefully selected by Patrick O'Grady—mainly because he was of Irish descent.

"What have ye got against that punchin' bag?" demanded O'Grady, after watching for a while the fierce blows administered.

"I'm pretendin' it's Moe Levine's face," responded the boxer grimly.

"Terry," said O'Grady reproachfully, "how many times must I tell you not to hurt Moe?"

"Bah!"

"Well, you can beat him up, once in a while, but don't hurt him. Are you goin' to see Rosie to-night?"

Terry nodded. He was going to pick her up at the office, he said, and take her home.

"Well," confided O'Grady, "you can tell her I've got the house all picked out."

"Gee, that's great!" cried the boxer delightedly.

Now Rosie worked in an office in East Twenty-Third Street, and at six o'clock, when she was due to emerge from the building, Terry drove up opposite the doorway in his little two-seater. But he was annoyed to find that Moe Levine's second-hand and very shabby car was standing beside the kerb, just ahead of his, and that Moe himself was lurking in the doorway. He strode over to him.

"What are you doing here?" he demanded savagely.

There were tables in the inner room for card-players, and they settled down to a game of pinochle.

"I'm going to drive Rosie home," replied Moe.

"You're not—it's me that's driving her home! I'll punch your head if you don't clear off!"

"You can punch from now till Christmas," retorted Moe defiantly, "but you ain't goin' to punch me away from Rosie!"

"Yeah? Well, now I'll tell one. I'm driving her home to-night!"

His fist was unpleasantly close to the young Jew's face, but Moe only flinched and fumbled in a pocket.

"Look here, Terry," he said in a conciliatory tone, "we've got to be fair with each other. I'll throw up a nickel and let that decide."

The nickel had been lent to Moe by the crafty Kaplan, but Terry was not to know that. Declaring that he could beat Moe at anything, he consulted, and Moe flipped the coin into the air and caught it, crying "Heads."

"Heads," of course, it was, and Terry bowed to defeat, just as Rosie came tripping out and greeted them.

"I'm going to drive you home," announced Moe proudly.

"Thanks!" said Rosie. "Will you give Terry a lift, too?"

"It's quite all right," said Terry. "I've got my own car—I'll see you later." And, much to the girl's surprise, he actually helped her into his rival's vehicle.

Two hours later, after she had had her evening meal, both of the young men called for her, and, in the presence of Kaplan and O'Grady, an argument ensued as to which of her suitors was to take her to a fancy-dress dance at the Webster Hall Club.

Moe declared that she had promised him the privilege; Terry was equally positive that the honour was to be his. Rosie declared that she had promised to go with both of them, which suited neither. Finally Kaplan stepped into the argument, so to speak.

"There's always a fair way to settle these things," he said. "Have you got a nickel, Moe?"

Moe had got a nickel, and produced it.

"Now remember," warned the pawnbroker, "that whoever loses has got to be a good sport." And he flipped the coin.

"Heads!" cried Moe, with the utmost haste.

"Heads it is," boomed Kaplan. "Now that settles it."

But Rosie, with a glance at Terry's gloomy face, stuck to her guns.

"I promised to go with both of them," she protested, "and I'm not going to be decided about like this. Let's all go. It would be lots of fun!"

"Me?" cried Kaplan.

"Me, too?" chimed in O'Grady.

"Sure—all five of us. We can hire some costumes."

The suggestion was embraced with enthusiasm by the two elders, if not by the two suitors.

"We're going to a masquerade, O'Grady!" chortled Kaplan. "By golly, I haven't been to a masquerade for years. I know a fine place to hire costumes—they'll give us a discount."

Rosie went on ahead to the costumier's with Moe and Terry. Kaplan flung off the old coat he wore indoors and went upstairs to don a more presentable one for the street. After he had departed O'Grady, yielding to curiosity, plunged a hand into one of the pockets of the shabby and greasy old coat—and fished out a nickel.

For a long while he had had his suspicions; now they were confirmed.

September 6th, 1930.

The nickel was a two-headed one.

O'Grady gritted his teeth and shook his fists.

"For eighteen years!" he growled, and stowed the spurious coin in his own waistcoat pocket, "For eighteen years!"

A Battle Royal.

THE Webster Club Hall was not a haunt of the fashionable, but it was a very popular resort among the male members of New York's East Side "society," and on this particular night the club was holding a fancy dress dance, open to members and to anybody else who cared to purchase a ticket.

O'Grady and Kaplan reached the hall together, the pawnbroker grotesquely attired as Little Lord Fauntleroy, complete with curls on his head and socks on his feet, and the policeman disguised as Robin Hood.

They found themselves amongst a crowd of young people in all manner of costumes, and they caught sight of Rosie, in a red satin skirt and a white satin blouse with a red collar, supposed to be a jockey, Moe Levine, dressed as a very unconvincing treader, and Terry Calahan in football outfit, including leather helmet. A fox-trot was in progress.

"Phew!" exclaimed Kaplan. "I don't care for this dancing. Pat, let's you and me get up a game at pinoche, eh?"

Pat was nothing loth, and the pair made for an inner room, collecting on their way a pirate, a cowboy and a fireman. There were tables in the inner room for card-players, and they settled down to a game of pinoche, which is something like bezique.

Out in the ball-room, both Moe and Terry—in turn—asked the conductor of the band to play "Sweet Rosie O'Grady," and eventually the tune was rendered, as a fox-trot, just after Terry had claimed Rosie for partner.

"D'you hear what they're playing?" cried Rosie delightedly.

"Sure," responded Terry, swinging her round. "I asked them to do it." He did not consider it worth mentioning that Moe had made the same request and accompanied it with a tip.

Terry was not quite as good a dancer as he was a boxer, but Moe was even worse. Having danced with both of them, Rosie announced that she was dying of thirst.

"All right," said Moe eagerly, "I'll get you something."

"No," objected Terry, "I'll go."

"I could drink two lemonades," declared Rosie. "Get me one each."

They went off together to the refreshment bar, and the moment their backs were turned a tall and handsome young fellow in the uniform of a chauffeur bore down on Rosie.

"Hallo!" he greeted her cheerfully. "You supposed to be a woman jockey? Where's your horse?"

She looked up at him indignantly, but decided that she liked his clean-cut face, his clear blue-grey eyes, and his crinkly brown hair, and smiled. "Where's your car?" she countered.

"Downstairs."

"Well, you'd better get into it before an accident happens to you," she remarked significantly.

"Not at all," he laughed. "I love accidents. Dance? Please do—I'm all alone."

"I'm sorry," said Rosie primly, "but I never dance with people I don't know."

"It only took me thirty seconds to find the most beautiful girl in the place," he informed her. "One dance and we'll be old friends. Two dances, and we'll be comrades. Three dances, and—"

"I think one will be enough," she decided.

Moe and Terry returned together, bearing glasses of lemonade, only to find that the chair in which they had left Rosie was occupied by quite a different girl.

"Look, Terry!" cried Moe suddenly, and pointed. "There she is, dancing with a chauffeur."

"Where did that guy come from?" snarled Terry.

"I don't know," lamented Moe; "but I wouldn't stand for it, if I was you."

"Don't worry!" snorted the boxer. "You wait and watch."

Rosie and her partner seemed, to their jealous eyes, to be thoroughly enjoying themselves—and they were. The young man was very masterful, but very amusing. He had already learned her name and address by heart, and had informed her that his own name was Tommy McLean. He danced perfectly, and she told him so.

"I'd like to show you how well I drive," he told her. "I'm coming round to your place to take you for a run, May I?"

"Maybe," murmured Rosie, and added impishly: "But I'm surprised you ask permission for anything!"

After the dance was over, she led him across to Moe and Terry and introduced him. Moe, with a gulp, expressed his pleasure at the meeting, but claimed Rosie for the next dance. Terry said nothing till Rosie was out of earshot. Then he said, loudly and threateningly:

"This is a one-way street, chauffeur, and as far as you're concerned, that's the way out!"

He jerked his thumb in the direction of the door, but Tommy merely smiled, his hands clasped loosely before him. Terry jabbed a finger in his chest, and Rosie immediately deserted Moe and ran over to them, fearing trouble. She tugged at Terry's left arm.

In the meanwhile a row had started in the inner room. Kaplan, having lost at cards, had deserted the game to look on, and he had hit upon a wily way of assisting his lifelong friend. Having inspected the cards held by the opposition, he proceeded to administer advice by remarks such as:

"Say, Pat, did you hear about the fellow who came into my shop to-day to sell me a diamond?"

He mentioned, at a later stage in the game, that a mutual acquaintance had heart trouble, and, after another hand had been dealt and inspected, remarked that it was a nice club.

Patrick O'Grady, with the aids of these pointers, won heavily, though not without exciting the suspicions of the other players. And when more talk of diamonds occurred, the three players threw down their cards and rose to their feet.

"O'Grady," cried one of them wrathfully, "you're a crook!"

"Wait a minute—wait a minute," begged Kaplan nervously. "Now, boys, let's all be friends."

"Friends!" cried another player scornfully. "You and your heart trouble, and your diamonds! So this is a nice club, is it? Well, take that!"

O'Grady went down with a crash, and Kaplan went down on top of him, dragging the table, the cards and the counters with him.

O'Grady rose up and laid about him. The room became a wreck, out of which, somehow, the policeman and the pawnbroker managed at last to escape, followed by their foes.

They burst into the ball-room, to find that dancing had stopped and that trouble was imminent between Terry and a young fellow in chauffeur's clothes. Terry's right fist crashed into Tommy's face, and Terry immediately received a straight left on the nose that surprised him.

The other card-players arrived; pandemonium broke loose. Moe received a blow intended for Kaplan, and hit out blindly. The Irish element in the club immediately decided that it was anybody's fight, and joined in with gusto. Girls screamed; chairs were not merely upset, but smashed to pieces—some of them upon unprotected heads. Terry and Tommy fought like gladiators.

The steward of the club, in a panic, pulled the fire-alarm, and the secretary telephoned for the police.

More Trouble.

TOMMY, the alleged chauffeur, had given Rosie his surname as McLean, but actually it was Sinclair. Somewhere about eleven o'clock that night he entered the drawing room of a stately house in Park Avenue with a black eye, a torn cheek, and his hair dishevelled.

An elderly, heavy featured man, who was sitting on a Chesterfield, and who happened to be Tommy's father as well as a millionaire, looked up in astonishment.

"What are you doing in that rig?" he demanded.

"I swapped clothes with McLean," said Tommy. "Just a bit of fun—I wanted to crash into a club I didn't belong to. There was a dance on, and I saw a perfect peach of a girl going into the place. There was a spot of bother—"

"It gives me considerable pleasure," broke in Mr. Sinclair grimly, "to see that somebody gave you a hiding. You're always doing the craziest things."

"It took six of 'em to do it, dad!" chuckled Tommy. And then he fished out a tiny handkerchief, with an "R" embroidered in a corner of it, and added: "She was worth it!"

At practically the same moment, Rosie was having an argument with a bruised and battered Robin Hood, who had perched his police cap on his head, and a semi-baldheaded Little Lord Fauntleroy. She had just reached home, by herself.

"I never saw anything so silly in my life," she declared. "Terry started the fight just because the other boy asked to dance with me."

"Which boy?" demanded O'Grady. "You don't know him?" "Did Terry know him?" "No."

"Well," said O'Grady, "you know it's a very jealous lad Terry is." "What right has Terry to be jealous when Rosie is practically engaged to Moe?" snorted Kaplan.

"Who said so?" cried Rosie stormily. "When it comes to choosing a husband, I'm going to do it myself. Good-night!"

After the storm, a calm. A full fortnight passed almost uneventfully, to all appearances, and then one day Moe Levine walked into the pawnshop, looking very spruce in a brand-new light grey suit and a brand-new hat.

Kaplan stared and questioned, and was informed that Moe had given up the insurance business to become Terry's manager. They had been sworn enemies till that "chauffeur chap" had come along, but now they were too busy hating him to hate one another, and there was more money in boxing.

"I get fifty per cent of his share, just for the mental work," declared Moe. "And as soon as I clean up big I'm goin' to talk to Rosie."

"Say, don't you worry about that chauffeur chap," said the pawnbroker. "Only last night I told Rosie I didn't want her to go out any more with that good-for-nothing, and when I tell Rosie something—"

He broke off, because Rosie had emerged from the shop-parlour in her best clothes, with a fur collar round her neck. He stared at her, while Moe held out his hand.

"You look fine, darling," said Kaplan. "Nice! Well, where are you goin'?"

"Out with Mr. McLean," responded Rosie quietly.

Moe looked significantly at the pawnbroker, but all the pawnbroker said was:

"Well, don't forget to put on your coat."

Rosie was on her way to the door, when Terry stepped in over the threshold.

"S'pose you don't want to know me any more?" he growled.

Rosie didn't answer that question. She saw a low grey car sweeping up to the kerb outside the shop, and she hissed:

"If you lay a hand on Tommy McLean, I'll never speak to you again, Terry Calahan!"

The car stopped, and Tommy, still wearing the clothes of a chauffeur, stepped into the shop. He greeted Rosie affectionately, and the others in quite a friendly fashion. But Terry, who was suffering agonies of jealousy, scowled at him, and said menacingly: "Some day, when you ain't hidin' behind a girl's skirts, I'm goin' to turn you inside out!"

"I'll look you up," said Tommy calmly. "Ready, Rosie?"

"I'll get my coat," said Rosie.

"I'll wait for you in the car," decided Tommy.

The course of true love never did run smooth. Patrick O'Grady was standing beside the grey car when Tommy went out to it; and the sergeant's notebook was in one hand and a pencil was in the other.

"How long have you been parked here?" demanded the Irishman sternly.

"About three minutes." "This car's been here for an hour," mendaciously retorted O'Grady. "I've been watching it! Lemme see your licence!"

There was no help for it. Tommy produced his licence, and at the same moment perceived that Rosie was crossing the pavement.

O'Grady stared at the licence, and then stared at Tommy.

"Thomas Sinclair?" he bellowed. "I thought your name was McLean?"

"My name's on that card," responded Tommy unhappily.

"And you're a chauffeur, and you live on Park Avenue?"

"You must have been puttin' in a lot of overtime!" scoffed Kaplan, from the doorway.

"Well, there's your licence," snapped O'Grady; "and here's another little souvenir for you!" And he handed Tommy an official slip demanding his presence before a magistrate for causing an obstruction.

Tommy pocketed the card and the slip, and turned to Rosie. He could have wished that Moe and Terry had not been present to witness the incident, but he seemed fairly calm.

"Come on, Rosie!" he urged.

She let him help her into the car; but as he settled down at the wheel and drove off, she said to him coldly:

"I'm coming with you because there are a lot of things I want you to tell me—Mr. Sinclair!"

It was not a very pleasant ride, and it was not a very long one. Tommy, in the intervals of avoiding the traffic, explained everything and was very humble; but Rosie waxed more and more indignant, and finally ordered him to stop.

He stopped obediently, though they were in a busy thoroughfare, and she got out. He followed her, deserting the car to plead his cause, but she declared that she was going home and that he was not as good a man as either Moe Levine or Terry Calahan.

Towards the end of the round he went down with a crash, and Rosie started to her feet with a cry of horror.

"I'm a better man than both of them," he retorted. "I can lick Calahan, and I can out-smart Levine—and you know it, in your heart."

"I don't!" cried Rosie, and ran off. A policeman was standing by the car when he returned to it.

"You own this car?" inquired the policeman. "You do? Well, here's a ticket for you, for leaving it unattended in the way of a fireplug."

"Oh, for the love of Mike!" groaned Tommy.

A Shock for Rosie.

ROSIE reached home in tears, and Kaplan and O'Grady, who were playing draughts in the shop-parlour, sprang up in alarm.

"I know what's the matter!" cried Kaplan indignantly. "It's that fellow Sinclair—McLean—or whatever his name is."

Rosie flew past them, making for that refuge of a girl in distress—her bedroom. Said O'Grady sternly:

"I'm going to look up this Sinclair fellow and lay down the law to him."

"I'll go with you," decided Kaplan. "What do you know about law? Listen, Pat, lemme do all the talking. With your muscle and my brains—"

They went off together to Park Avenue, relying on Rosie to attend to any customers who might arrive in their absence. They reached the stately brownstone house which was Tommy's home, and an austere butler opened the door to them, and left them standing in the hall while he informed his master of their presence and their desire to see them.

Tommy's father was in the drawing-room, and, not recognising their names, he told the butler to say that he was out. But the butler had left the drawing-room door open, and they heard:

"You may be out, but we're in!" cried Kaplan, striding into the room with O'Grady behind him. "Show your badge, Pat! We want to see Mr. Sinclair."

Mr. Sinclair was surprised, and eyed them doubtfully, but announced that his name was Sinclair.

"Oh!" exclaimed the pawnbroker. "You're his father, eh?"

"Has my son been getting into trouble of some sort?" asked Mr. Sinclair with sudden misgiving.

"Well, not exactly," admitted O'Grady, "but he's heading for trouble mighty fast. If he thinks he can fool around with my daughter—"

"My daughter!" corrected Kaplan. "I ought to know!"

"Gentlemen!" said Mr. Sinclair. "Please make up your minds!"

"Well, all right," said Kaplan, less violently. "Our daughter—she's our adopted daughter, you understand—"

Between them they managed to make the whole story more or less clear, but it took a long time, and involved considerable bickering between the storytellers. Mr. Sinclair then explained that the whole thing had begun as a frolic on the part of his son, but that he understood Tommy was really keen about Rosie.

"And, of course," he added, "having begun with deception, he had to go on with it. I can see that! McLean is my chauffeur. But, of course, if your daughter is engaged to this Levine—"

"Terry Calahan!" barked O'Grady.

September 6th, 1930.

"I'll speak to my son," hastily interposed Mr. Sinclair.

Evidently he did speak to Tommy; but what he said had considerably less effect upon that very determined young man than what Rosie had already said. For the next morning Tommy stalked into Moe Levine's little office in an unattractive street not far removed from the Webster Hall Club.

Terry was in the office, arguing with Moe because, as his manager, the young Jew had not provided him with a satisfactory number of boxing contests. They stopped short and stared at the intruder.

"You!" exploded Terry. "Didn't I tell you the next time I saw you I was going to knock you silly?"

"That's just what I've come to see you about," was the retort. "But just a moment—I understand you're a prize-fighter. Well, I've done a little boxing myself, and I think I can lick the tar out of you!"

"You can what?" bellowed Terry, advancing upon him.

"Vait, vait, vait!" cried Moe hastily, launching himself between them. "Never give away anything that you can sell." He turned to Tommy. "What's your proposition?"

Tommy laughed. "I'm willing to bet five thousand dollars," he said, "that I can put your man to sleep in eight rounds."

Terry made unpleasant noises of derision, but Moe silenced him.

"Sit down, Mr. Sinclair!" he said eagerly. "Tell me anything you want to tell me—I'm open for business."

As a result of that interview, announcements of a forthcoming fight between Terry Calahan and a "Mystery Man" appeared in the papers.

Moe had used his brains, and he continued to use them, making all the capital he could out of the circumstances. A day or two later headlines in the papers announced that Calahan's mysterious challenger was none other than Thomas Sinclair, son of the Wall Street millionaire.

The fight, which was to take place at the Madison Square Gardens on a Saturday night, became quite a topic, and seats were booked at a premium. Moe was delighted, and even Terry beamed. It seemed to both of them that here was a wonderful opportunity of putting an ignominious end to their rival and of making quite a lot of money at the same time.

On the Wednesday evening before the fight Tommy walked calmly into the pawnshop and crossed behind the counter into the little parlour. Rosie was alone in there, and she frowned up at him.

"What can I do for you?" she inquired icily.

"You can forgive me for being a fool," said Tommy earnestly. "That chauffeur stuff, Rosie—I wish you'd forget it."

"I have forgotten it—and you!" she retorted. "And if you will take my advice you'll get out of town before Saturday afternoon."

"You tell that to Calahan!"

"Why, Terry will kill you!" she cried.

"Oh, no, he won't—I have other plans. Aren't you interested in them? No? Well, you ought to be—you're part of them. In fact—"

The door opened, and Kaplan and O'Grady entered together.

"Good-evening, gentlemen!" said Tommy affably.

O'Grady scowled at him, but Kaplan looked him thoughtfully up and down.

"Say," he exclaimed, "how old are you?"

"Twenty-six," replied Tommy.

"Why? Twenty-six, and you're goin' to fight Calahan? Why, you might have lived to sixty, or seventy. Well—"

"We're bettin' everything we have on this prize-fight," broke in O'Grady.

Rosie looked up, aghast; but Tommy said cheerfully:

"Is that so? Who are you betting on?"

"A sure thing!" boomed Kaplan.

"Calahan!"

"Really?" said Tommy. "Calahan? Well, well—bye-bye, Rosie!" And without another word he went out.

Rosie looked blankly at the door he had closed behind him, then jumped up and put on her hat and coat.

"Where are you going, Rosie?" asked O'Grady, barring the way.

"I'm going to see Terry," she said, with a curious little catch in her voice. "I'm going to stop that fight."

"You can't do anything like that!" protested Kaplan. "The papers are all signed, the money's put up, and the seats are sold!"

"And besides," chimed in O'Grady, "you can't see Calahan, anyway—he's at some place in Jersey, training."

"Oh, but that poor boy will be killed!" faltered Rosie. "It isn't fair, and I'm going to stop the fight if I have to burn down the building!"

It was then that Kaplan made an indiscreet remark. He declared that Tommy wasn't worth her tears—even his own father had said so.

"How do you know that?" she stormed.

"Because we went to see him."

The fat was properly in the fire then. She insisted upon being told all about their visit to Mr. Sinclair, and she raved at both of them for doing such a thing, and went off with tears in her eyes and an entirely new determination in her heart.

"Now do you see what you have done?" hissed Kaplan after she had gone. "A fine mess you have made of the whole thing, O'Grady!"

The Winners.

ROSIE made straight for the house in Park Avenue, and, as it happened, Tommy was out and Mr. Sinclair was at home. She was ushered into his presence, and she poured forth her fears and begged him to stop the fight.

"It isn't fair!" she cried. "It won't be a fight, I tell you. It will be murder!"

Tommy's father had taken full stock of her, and had decided that she was not merely a beautiful girl, but a sensible one—one who would be very good indeed for his wayward son.

"You don't think much of Tommy, do you?" he said regretfully. "But he thinks a great deal of you. He must do, for this is the first time I've ever known him do anything really definite. He has made a bet of five thousand dollars on himself. I didn't give him the money—he dug it up somewhere. And I'm not going to stop the fight, my dear. He's going to win it! I'm a conservative man by habit, but I'd stake everything I've got on that."

"You would?" exclaimed Rosie, looking up at him with eyes that shone.

"I certainly would. Oh, and, by the way, last time I saw him he invited me to his wedding, and it may interest you to know that he intends you to be the bride. I can't question his judgment in the matter, but I'm afraid you're going

(Continued on page 25.)

An ominous secret surrounds the box; many people try to steal it and learn its secret. A mystic force of terrible malignity lurks in the background. Don't miss the grim adventures of a daring youngster and a pretty heroine. Starring Jack Perrin and Louise Lorraine.

EPISODE 7.

"The Temple of the Sacred Jade."

The Secret of the Jade.

MORGAN'S cry of terror rang through the disordered room as the Shadow Man forced the revolver around until its blackened muzzle was pointing at the financier's own head. Jack saw Morgan's arm and hand quivering under the strain as he tried to resist. He saw the man's finger being forced down on the trigger by the pressure of the ghost-like hand about his own—and then Jack flung himself across the floor, with Percy shifting at his side.

They grabbed at the revolver together, jerking it upwards. Both felt the strength of the Shadow Man's resistance as they struggled, while the weapon exploded, smashing a bullet to the ceiling so that flakes of plaster came showering down.

White of face, Helen watched the fighting figures, Morgan helping to try and wrest the revolver clear. Over them reared the terrible form of the Shadow Man, black as ebony, as impalpable as a phantom, and yet gifted with amazing strength.

Again the revolver exploded as the three struggled against the thrashing black figure, and this time its bullet seared through the carpet. With the shot, Jack wrenched madly on the weapon, tearing it away so that it went flying across the room. It struck the wall and dropped to the floor.

Jack saw the Shadow Man sweep across the room towards it, and he tried to beat him to the weapon, but the daylight ghost travelled faster. A filmy hand closed on the butt of the gun, lifted the weapon, and pointed it at the open window.

It blazed the remaining shots into the empty air outside, and then, very swiftly, the Shadow Man faded out, and the gun dropped to the floor.

All that was left after that was the revolver, with smoke wreathing up from its reeking barrel, and Morgan slumped against the wall, trembling like a man stricken with palsy, while Helen clutched the jade box and the sheet of paper which gave the key to opening it.

Morgan had been nearer to death than ever before when he looked down the barrel of that revolver, and he realised it. He had openly shown his enmity to Jack in trying to get the jade box from him, and the Shadow Man had wrecked his attempt to gain the secret.

Quivering against the wall, Morgan forced his brain to clarity, obliged himself to think quickly. He saw Helen staring at him, her eyes wide in horrified surprise. Percy Winslow was watching him, his face set and his gaze calculating. Jack turned to regard him, frowning and with his fists hunched.

"So you were trying to hold us up," Jack said grimly, as he moved across the carpet. "You were holding us up for the box, eh?"

"You're wrong!" Morgan pushed himself off the wall. "I—I was just trying to save you from yourselves."

"It looked like it," Percy cut in quietly. "You said that if we didn't hand the jade and that paper to you, you'd shoot us where we stood!"

"I know I did, but I was only threatening you!" Morgan was recovering fast, while his glance darted about the room to make certain that all sign of the Shadow Man had gone. "You see, there's a deadly secret in that jade box—something terrible. I was afraid that you might harm yourselves with it if you opened it, and—"

"And so you stuck us up with a gun to get it for yourself!" Percy grunted.

"No. I was startled—I had to think quickly," Morgan answered. "I did the first thing that came into my head, that's all. I didn't mean any harm."

Jack glanced at Percy. Both knew perfectly well what Morgan's game was, and they also remembered that he was Helen's uncle—revelation of his duplicity would only distress her. It was better, Jack decided, to appear to fall in with him and not to let him guess that they knew more than he thought.

"You certainly seared us!" Jack exclaimed, and Percy took his cue from his friend.

"I thought you meant business, Mr. Morgan!" he said.

"Why, uncle wouldn't shoot anybody! He was only kidding!" Helen laughed a little nervously. "But—but the Shadow Man—"

"He meant business all right!" Percy eyed Morgan narrowly as he spoke. "The way he turned that gun on you looked as though he knew something!"

"I'll pump lead into him the first chance I get!" Morgan said desperately, and moved towards the gun as he went on: "Let's look at that paper!"

"We'll do that downstairs," Jack suggested. "Percy, help bring Helen's suit-cases below, then we'll all study this key to the box!"

Soon they were gathered in the wrecked room on the ground-floor, and Helen set the jade box on the financier's desk.

"Do you think we ought to open it?"

September 6th, 1930.

Percy asked doubtfully as Jack studied the paper.

"If the Shadow Man hadn't meant us to, he wouldn't have given these directions," Jack answered.

"Open it—open it!" Morgan exclaimed.

Jack glanced at him as he passed the paper across to Percy. Morgan's hands were trembling and his face was pale from eagerness. Helen pushed the box across to Jack, and he picked it up.

He searched for the two queer characters on the sides, then placed his thumbs on the idol's head in the lid of the box. He found that his fingers fell naturally into position indicated by the diagrams. He held his breath a moment.

"Press downwards!" Percy exclaimed as he held the paper.

Jack pressed with fingers and thumb. He felt all three parts of the box move almost imperceptibly, then the ridged lid split in the centre and flung back.

Inside, on a little bed of cotton strands, lay a glass phial. Helen reached in and lifted it out. They saw that it was filled with some jet black liquid, and she pointed to it as she exclaimed:

"The secret of the jade box—I know what it is! It's stuff which will bring the Shadow Man back to his proper form—that is why he was so anxious to get it!"

Behind her, Morgan was bending forward, his hands reaching eagerly towards the little glass container. But he restrained himself, and Percy asked: "Is there anything else in the box, Jack? It looks as though there might be room for something more."

Jack lifted out the cotton strands, but there was nothing to be seen. He noticed that the under part, where the phial had rested, was thick and deep, as though there was space for yet another compartment in the strange green casket.

"Nothing else," he said. "And no instructions, or anything."

"Perhaps the Shadow Man will come for it!" Helen exclaimed. "Perhaps—"

Her voice died away.

Martin Morgan had stepped back, and in his hand now showed the revolver which had lain in his desk-drawer before the Shadow Man had wrecked this room. Swiftly the financier was slipping fresh cartridges into the chambers, and the weapon locked as he raised its loaded shape and covered the three.

"Put that phial down!" he snarled, and there was a menace in his voice which made Helen obey. "Step away from the table—and leave the Box there!"

His face was distorted to a grin of triumph as he watched them obey. There was now absolutely no colour on Morgan's features. The Jade Box and its secret were on the desk before him, the things for which he had schemed and worked for so long; rather than lose them now he would have used the revolver ruthlessly.

He believed that the secret of the box would pave the way to power, to riches and wealth beyond computation, and that the contents of the small phial were far more potent than Helen imagined.

His threatening weapon sent them away from the desk, and he drove them towards the hall.

"Out of it!" he snarled. "Pick up those bags and get out—quick!"

Jack could see that he would shoot on the slightest provocation. He picked up Helen's suitcases, and Morgan followed them closely as they moved out to where Percy's car still waited.

September 6th, 1930.

The three of them crowded in, always with Morgan watchful behind them.

"Now get away—and don't come back!" he rasped.

The Black Phial.

JACK stopped the car when they were on the main highway and half a mile from the house, then spoke for the first time.

"Now we do know where we are!" he said quietly. "Helen, I'm going back there to get the Jade Box. I want you to drive on to my apartment and wait for me there."

"Jack, you can't go back. He'll shoot you and—"

"I believe that there's something else in the Box besides the black phial," Jack said, "and I'm going to get it! Your uncle took us unawares that time—but if you hadn't been there we'd have made a fight for it!"

"We would," Percy agreed. "I'll come back with you, Jack!"

"But why should uncle turn like that?" Helen asked.

"He's been like it all along," Percy told her. "He's behind most of the trouble that we've had, and—"

"We'll tell you the whole story later," Jack said. "There's no time now. Helen, you drive on"—he dropped out of the car with his companion—"and we'll come to you as soon as we can. Then we'll all three start for Kublik-Kehn—taking the Box with us. Ready, Percy?"

After some persuasion, Helen agreed to do as Jack suggested, and she drove on. The two watched the car out of sight before they turned back to the house, with the trailing shadows of dusk darkening the trees about it.

"I've got an idea that there's something else in the Box, besides that little bottle," Percy said.

"I think that, too," Jack agreed. "But I didn't get a proper chance to examine it. What d'you think the phial is for? D'you think Helen's right? She said that the stuff would bring the Shadow Man back to his proper form."

"I don't know," Percy answered. "It doesn't matter much, anyhow. We've got to get it away from Morgan before he can do anything, and that's going to be our problem!"

"Well, he'll start on the job straight away," Jack told him. "He may have done something about it already for all we know."

They hurried on. They reached the drive and went up it cautiously. The hall door still stood wide open, and the hall beyond was still cluttered with wrecked furniture. There was no light showing in the darkened building except the yellow glow of electric which came from the big room on the ground floor that Morgan used.

Cautiously the two entered the building and stood listening.

Absolutely no sound came to their ears, and they picked their way carefully down the hall. They stopped as they came in sight of the grille which guarded the big room.

A table and some chairs had been piled up to keep it closed from the inside. A carpet had been flung over the pile as though to disguise from prying eyes anything that went on, and over a gap in the top of this the light streaked out.

"He's up to something in there," Percy said.

"He must have the windows covered as well," Jack guessed; "we couldn't see the light from outside as we came up."

"We can't see through that lot," Percy told him, indicating the barred grille. "And if we shout to him he'll probably start shooting—he looked mad enough for that when we left him!" He added: "Isn't there another door to the room?"

They found it further along the passage. It was locked, but a slit of light came out through the keyhole. They listened, but heard nothing.

"D'you think that one of the keys to the other doors might fit this lock?" Jack suggested, and when they tried out the idea they found that the wards of the lock shifted under the first key they inserted.

Gently, Jack pushed the door open. It was shielded by a heavy velvet curtain meant to keep out draughts. The two of them slipped in under the cover of this, then drew the end of it back and looked into the barred room.

They saw that Morgan was seated at his desk. Before him was the Jade Box, and in both hands he held the black phial. He was turning it over and over as he stared at it, while the light played on the glass—and on the steely bulk of the revolver which lay at his elbow.

His eyes were blazing as he twirled the phial and held it up to the light. Its contents were absolutely black. He set it down and then inspected the Jade Box. Jack could see that, like himself, Morgan suspected there might still be some hidden compartment. He was searching for it, but he did not find it.

"He's going to do something with that phial," Percy whispered. "Think it's any good trying to rush him?"

"No. He'd shoot us down before we got half-way across the room," Jack told him. "We'll watch for a bit."

Again Morgan turned his attention to the phial. It was quite plain that, now he had the Box and had penetrated its secret, he did not know what to do with it. Yet again he turned the gleaming glass bottle around in his hands, then, with a resolute gesture, he tried to remove the stopper.

It appeared to be stiff, and he pressed the phial down on the desk as he strained anew. Finally, with a rasping, grating sound, the stopper came out.

He set it aside and sat looking at the phial as it stood on the desk.

Jack and Percy could see that the black stuff in it was fuming, giving off twirling, smoke-like vapour. Morgan stared at this and then bent, sniffing at the fumes.

The watching pair saw the fumes trail up into his face, and instantly he became rigid where he sat. On his features there awakened a frozen expression of alarm and horror, dead and impotent surprise.

The fumes from the bottle grew more and more strong. They swirled about him, and as they hazed his form, Martin Morgan began to fade away where he sat!

They saw the back of the chair show through his rigid and immobile figure. The edges of the desk appeared through the arms that rested on them. He faded out swiftly until all that was left to their sight was an unreal shadow hunched up in the chair.

"Gosh! The stuff's turned him into a Shadow-Man!" Percy gasped. "And—look! He's moving now!"

They saw Morgan's shadow lift in the chair and stand up. They could see him only faintly, like a dark patch on the air. He moved from the desk, while they gazed spellbound, and it seemed to them that he was trying to realise what had happened to him.

He turned back to the desk, and they saw the stopper of the phial lift and rasp home into the neck of the little bottle, cutting off the fumes that it was throwing out. They died away, while the Shadow remained looming above the bottle.

It moved again, lifting things about the room, and dropping them almost at once. It was as though Morgan was trying out his new state. To Jack and Percy it appeared as if he was just as he had been before, except that his body was almost invisible—was, in fact, apparent only as a shadow.

Morgan shifted a chair, then switched the light off and on again. He went to the telephone and lifted the receiver, and it was uncanny to see the shadowy figure bending in ghostly fashion over the instrument, with the receiver poised in mid-air.

The two heard the thin, squeaky sound of the operator's voice as the call was answered, but the Shadow did not reply. It made no sound, and suddenly the two realised that Morgan could no longer speak! His voice had vanished with his body.

He slammed the receiver down and moved from the desk. It appeared, then as though complete under-standing of his position came to him.

He was voiceless, and he had no body—and there was no way in which he could regain his own form save by death, when the power of the black phial passed.

Right at the beginning of things, the Shadow-Man of the Jade Box had warned him that a fate worse than death would be his if he persisted—and now that fate had overtaken him!

He was doomed to wander the world as a shadow; formless, voiceless—a ghost.

Quite motionless, he remained in the centre of the room, and then he seemed to go mad. He rushed around the floor, pulling at broken chairs, tearing pictures from the walls and smashing them as though by physical demonstration of the power left in him he could convince himself that he still retained his old form.

He fluttered about the room like a wild bat, moving in a silence shattered only by the shifting of furniture and the breaking of glass. Finally, he rushed to the barricaded grille and began to wrench away the furniture he had piled there. He slung it behind him, and the two saw his filmy hands wrapping on the bars of the grille as it grated open.

He passed through it, and his dim-seen form merged with the darkness of the hall beyond.

Gasping, some of the colour blanched from his face, Percy Winslow turned to Jack.

"Poor devil!" he breathed. "If that's the secret of the Jade Box—"

"We must get the Box and the phial before he comes back!" Jack cut in. "Quickly now!"

They stepped clear of the curtains and ran across the room. The black phial was standing harmlessly on the desk, and Jack saw that its stopper was firm before he lifted it. He dropped it into the Jade Box, scooping up the cotton fibres which still lay there, and using the wool-like mass to protect the glass.

That done, he closed the strange lid of the green casket and slipped the whole thing into his pocket.

They hurried from the room, peering into the hall. There was no sign of Morgan's shadow. Night had completely fallen outside, and they stepped warily into the open air. They moved on to the grass which fringed the drive, and hurried down it to gain the road at the end.

"We've got to get away from here without him suspecting us," Jack told Percy. "He'll find the box gone the moment he goes back to that room and—"

"And he'll come after us if he thinks we were there!" Percy agreed. "We'd better collect Helen and our kit and start for Kublih-Kehn before anything else can happen to stop us!"

"That's talking sense!" Jack agreed, and they went down the road at a run.

They paused once to look back at the house.

It was in utter darkness. As gloomy, as menacing and forlorn as the new-made Shadow they had seen haunting the room in which the Jade Box had rested.

The Fuming Jar.

TROPIC' sunlight scared down on the narrow, dusty ways of Kublih-Kehn, beating from the smooth, plastered walls of the buildings and shining on the awnings over the little shops and the mysterious, cool-looking bazaars.

Down a narrow way Jack and Percy and Helen walked. Natives stared at them, vendors cried to them from the little hole-in-the-wall shops which they owned. Camel drivers steered their lumbering beasts carefully, so that their plodding, clumsy feet might not cast dust to soil the white lady's dress.

"This was the bazaar," Jack said quietly, as he touched Percy's arm, and all three paused. "Here's where they stabbed the man who sold the Box to us!"

He nodded to the dusty threshold of the bazaar, where the earth had drunk deep of the blood of one who had proved traitor to the Keepers of the Jade.

"And this is where the trouble started, eh?" Percy asked.

"Yes. Here's where it started, and here's where the end of it begins, too," Jack said slowly.

The three had reached Kublih-Kehn without the least hitch through all their long and, sometimes, hazardous journey. They had seen nothing of any Shadow-Man, nor any sign of Morgan.

"From here we went to the Café of the Seven Seas," Jack went on. "That's where my father disappeared. If any of the set who really own the Jade Box are about, they'll see and recognise me. If none of them approaches us, then I'll have to think out some other way of getting into touch with them."

"We haven't been in Kublih-Kehn more than three hours," Helen said. "It's a bit early yet for anything to happen."

Helen was wrong. Things were happening even then.

Upon a balcony which overlooked the entrance to the bazaar two men were standing, half-hidden by the drooping fronds of a palm which grew from a wooden bowl ribbed with brass. One was tall; he wore a crimson cloak drawn high so that it half concealed his black beard. The other was shorter, and his cloak was blue and yellow, while both wore turbans of faded green.

The one in the crimson cloak was Abuk, and his hand rested on the haft of the long-bladed dagger with which the treacherous bazaar-keeper had been struck down weeks earlier. Now his fingers gripped the weapon with such force that his whole arm quivered as he snarled:

"By the sacred hair of Mahomet, it is the son of Lamar!" he breathed.

"Come back to Kublih-Kehn!" muttered his companion.

Behind her Morgan was bending forward, his hands reaching eagerly towards the little glass container.

"Come back to lay his bones in the desert dust!" Abuk snarled. "Ere the sun goes down, I'll lay his body cold against the hot sand!"

"Does he bring the jade?" his companion whispered.

"How can he bring the jade when no man knows where it be?" Abuk asked. "Long have I waited for his return, and now he is come he shall pay the price!"

"And the one with him?"

"He, too," Abuk snarled, "and the girl! There is no mercy in my heart since these thrice-accursed infidels found that which we sought and took it for themselves. May their bones rot, may scorpions share their beds, may pigs defile their graves!"

He cursed in his beard and watched the three move on along the street. Abuk and his companion descended swiftly from the balcony, and, while the other watched, Abuk darted into the bazaar below.

He strode swiftly, his red cloak fluttering, to where a sandal-maker stitted slowly at soft leather.

"The son of Lamar has returned!" Abuk bent low and whispered in his ear. "Give the word, good Yakoub—and spread it swiftly! Say they pass even now by the Street of Many Feet. Bid the Keepers watch and wait a sign from me. I will parley before I kill."

"I go, Akub, swifter than the hot wind of the desert's morn!" Yakoub answered, and he rose as he spoke, to dart along the bazaar.

Jack and Percy and Helen strolled slowly along the narrow road, and always Jack's arm was pressed above the bulge which was the Jade Box in his breast-pocket. In his coat he also carried a loaded automatic. Percy was similarly armed, and Helen carried a lighter—but just as deadly weapon—in her handbag.

"We'll go into the Café of the Seven Seas," Jack said. "I've got a feeling that the Keepers of the Jade have their Temple somewhere near there."

"And I've got a feeling that they're liable to start a fight if they learn what you've got with you," Percy told him.

"I don't see how they can," Jack answered. "Not when they know we've come to hand the box back to them, and—and to release my father. That's if he's still alive."

"He's alive all right," Helen reassured him. "The messages from the Shadow Man prove that."

They walked on, and it was Percy who first got the feeling that they were being watched. A beggar, squatting on a corner in his dusty rags, and with his wooden gourd outstretched for alms, eyed them with a peculiar glance, while a mat that draped the wall behind him shifted, and Percy thought that two black and staring eyes glared out.

From the parapet of a flat roof, where palms formed a green fringe, another man watched them, his eyes expressionless above the garment that screened his face. Once a man passed, staring full at them, his lips drawn from his teeth in a half-snarl that made Percy reach for his gun.

As they neared the Café of the Seven Seas, the traffic in the streets thinned. Shopkeepers no longer cried their wares to them; water-sellers no longer swung their goat-skins temptingly, nor pointed to the sherbet they carried on their trays. All whom they passed looked at them peculiarly, and Jack became aware of it presently, so did Helen.

"Something brewing," was Jack's comment. "I guess I must have been recognised. I certainly did turn this town inside out before I stopped looking for dad! Anyhow, there's the café."

He nodded ahead. The other two saw a long, low-fronted building with yellowed walls and an entrance shaded by reed screens. They paused when they reached it and looked in.

They saw that the interior was almost empty. None of the tables around the walls were occupied, but a few natives sprawled on the cushions scattered about the floor.

Jack led the way in, and made for a table near one of the fragile walls, which were made for the most part from cane and plaited leaves. The natives stopped chattering the moment that the three entered, and silence fell, to be broken again while the men eyed Jack and Percy covertly.

The three sat down at one of the tables, and a native came to ask them for their order. Jack called for sherbet, and, as he did so, Abuk stepped alone through the entrance.

"Percy, see that man! He tried to get the box from my father just before the fight here, and—"

"And he's coming over to have a word with you!" Percy broke in.

Abuk strode straight towards them. He stopped and bowed to Jack, then said softly:

"The young white lord has returned, and he seeks—what?"

"My father," Jack answered.

"Not the jade?" asked Abuk, and his teeth glittered as he smiled. "Has my lord forgotten how a man died in the bazaar? Or that the buzzards strip the bones of those who cross the Keepers of the Jade?"

"I want to meet those to whom the jade box belongs," Jack said slowly. "I have it here."

Abuk straightened with a jerk.

"May thy lying tongue curl in thy mouth and choke thee!" he said simply.

"I do not lie!" Jack told him gravely.

"See!" From his pocket he drew the green casket. At sight of it Abuk stepped back. Behind him every man in the strange building rose, and one of them gasped:

"The Jade Box of Quabilya!"

"By the bones of the Prophet, it is the jade!"

Silence dropped, then Abuk's hand slid beneath his cloak and the chill steel of his dagger flashed as he drew it.

"White lord, be wise! I will spare thy life—for the jade!"

The others crowded behind him now, all men whom Yakoub the sandal-maker had roused. More knives glinted as they began to press close about the table.

"Release my father—and the jade is yours!" Jack answered.

"The jade!" Abuk stretched out his hand. "Give me the jade, and its Keepers shall be merciful."

"My father is—"

Jack broke off, and his automatic jerked from his pocket. He fired as Abuk leaped at him, the bullet splintering the boards at the man's feet. Abuk stopped dead.

Percy's gun came out, then Helen's nicked automatic glimmered in her small hand as the three of them faced the group of natives across the table, holding them at bay.

"I came here to return the box to those who own it," Jack said tensely. "Release my father, and you shall have it. But try and take it from me, and we'll shoot—understand?"

He met Abuk's eyes, and the big native lowered his raised dagger.

"As my lord wills!" He bowed, and a gesture made the men behind him back away. "As my lord wills!"

He moved down the café, then reached out and pulled a hidden cord on the wall. Immediately a section of it lifted, disclosing broad steps which ran downwards. Abuk bowed as he spoke again.

"The Temple of the Sacred Jade lies below," he said. "Descend and meet those to whom the box belongs. Speak with them about thy father."

Jack glanced at Helen and Percy, then looked towards the steps. Candles, set in niches on the wall, lit them, but they were gloomy and strange.

"You stay here, and I'll go down," he said.

"No, let's all go," Helen answered. "I don't suppose I shall be much good if there's any more trouble, but I can help. Go on, Jack!"

They stepped towards the opening. Abuk watched them in silence, and Jack led the way through. The three were descending the steps when Abuk followed. At the bottom was a door. Jack pushed it open, and discovered a wide, empty, stone-walled chamber.

To the left of this was a green door; opposite was one made from timber, heavily barred with iron. Abuk moved to this and pushed it open, then stepped aside and motioned for them to enter.

Jack saw that it was lit by four high candles which were placed about a great jar, made from green jade like the box that he carried. The jar was crowned by a massive lid with a handle formed in the shape of the idol which the box itself also bore.

This chamber was quite small, and Abuk followed them only as far as the threshold.

"If my white lords and the white lady will wait here," he said, "I will tell the Priests of the Jade that you bring that which they have long sought."

He was smiling as he spoke, and there was something in his voice which made Percy look at him keenly. Bowing, still smiling, Abuk stepped back, then, with a quick movement, he crashed shut the heavy door.

Percy jumped towards it, but he discovered that there was no handle on the inside, and he heard the rasp of heavy bars falling into position from the outer chamber.

"He's locked us in!" he exclaimed.

"That's nothing to worry about—we've got guns if they start any tricks!" Jack said. "We've got the Box, and that's what they really want. We're safe until they can get it off us—and they won't do that until I know that my father is all right!"

They looked round the chamber, and at the straight flames of the four big candles around the jar.

"What's in that?" Helen asked.

"What's the— Look!"

Her exclamation was almost a scream. All three saw a shadowy hand forming on the air above the jar, and behind it swiftly appeared a tenuous form.

It was a Shadow-Man looming above the candles, and they saw his dusky fingers close about the lid which crowned the green vessel. He lifted it with a sudden snatch, almost as though he was answering Helen's question.

He lifted the lid high on the air, and as it rose thin, smoke-like trails rose with it. They thickened, rising from the jar's mouth.

"Fumes!" Percy yelled. "Fumes, Jack—like those which came out of the phial in the Jade Box!"

They thickened as he spoke, forming a cloud which rolled sullenly out on the air.

"They're the fumes that turned Morgan into a Shadow-Man!" Jack gasped.

(To be concluded next week. By permission of the Universal Films, Ltd., starring Jack Perrin and Louise Lorraine.)

"Around the Corner."

(Continued from page 20.)

to have a deal of trouble managing that young man."

Mr. Sinclair was a wily father and a man of the world.

"Oh, no, I'm not!" immediately declared Rosie with considerable warmth. "So you don't think we ought to stop the fight?"

Mr. Sinclair chuckled.

"On the contrary," he said, "I think we ought to see it—it's going to be a good one. Miss Rosie O'Grady, may I have the honour of your company on Saturday night? I've bought two ring-side seats."

"Just try to keep me away!" cried Rosie excitedly.

She never quite knew how she lived through the rest of the week. She wanted to see Tommy, but resisted the temptation to seek him out at his training quarters. She wrote a number of letters to him, but tore them all up. The days dragged. Work was a torture; rest was unrest, because she was in such a fever of impatience.

Saturday night came at last, and Mr. Sinclair called for her in his car and swept her off to Madison Square Gardens. The boxing theatre was crowded as they made their way down the central aisle to their seats.

"Why are you trembling?" he asked her, after they were seated side by side immediately below the ring. "You're not up there."

"Oh, yes, I am!" whispered Rosie. "You're really sure he'll win?"

O'Grady and Kaplan had been presented with tickets by Moe Levine, and had arrived early. They were seated not very far away, and were obviously excited.

"Look," said Mr. Sinclair, "there are your—your guardians."

"They don't know I'm here," Rosie informed him. "I didn't tell them, and they'd gone before you called for me. They've put all their savings on the fight, and I got them to let me place the bets for them. There's a man at my office who knows a really good bookmaker—"

"Whom are they betting on?" inquired Mr. Sinclair.

"Calahan."

He looked round at her.

"And you placed the bets, eh?" he exclaimed. "Well, well, truly the ways of women are wonderful!"

Two unimportant boxers put up a sparring match as a sort of curtain-raiser, and then a shout went up. Calahan was making for the ring in a jazzy dressing-gown over his shorts.

Tommy followed a few moments later, and received almost as great an ovation as his better-known opponent, because of all the newspaper publicity he had received and the fact that he was the son of a millionaire.

"He looks good!" groaned Kaplan, as the athletic-looking young fellow bowed to the audience.

"Listen to me for the tenth and last time!" snorted O'Grady. "Calahan can't lose!"

"Yes," grunted Kaplan. "Well, you know it, and I know it, but does Calahan know it?"

The announcer lifted up his voice from the centre of the ring. It was a powerful voice, but not by any means a musical one.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he shouted, "the main event. Ten rounds. Terrible Terry Calahan in this corner, and in this one Tommy Sinclair, the Park Avenue Kid."

The referee caused the contestants to shake hands for the benefit of some camera-men, and Kaplan asked O'Grady what they were taking pictures for.

"So as Sinclair's family can remember what he looked like before the battle," was the reply.

The first round went entirely in Terry's favour. He got in a left and a right to Tommy's face, a heavy blow over the heart and a left hook to the chin. But Tommy showed up gamely enough, and seemed quite a glutton for punishment.

Towards the end of the round he went down with a crash, and Rosie started to her feet with a cry of horror. But almost instantly Tommy sat up. Terry stood over him as he rose to his feet, but he backed briskly, adopted a fighting attitude, and caught his opponent fairly and squarely between the eyes.

"He couldn't stay down!" cried Mr. Sinclair proudly. "He doesn't know how!"

"Look! Look!" cried O'Grady to Kaplan. "There's Rosie over there—with Mr. Sinclair."

Kaplan stood up and waved, shouting:

"Hallo, Rosie!"

"Sit down!" bellowed a man behind him. "Sit down, or I'll nail you down."

Tommy and Terry were in a clinch, and the referee was parting them when the gong went. Tommy went back to his corner, seemingly no worse for wear than his opponent, who confided to Moe that the fellow was a shock absorber, but could be put out at any minute.

The next round, however, suggested that Terry was mistaken, for in it Tommy carried everything before him, on points, and landed a number of blows that jolted the professional badly.

"Tell him to use his left!" yelled O'Grady frantically.

And Kaplan chimed in:

"Tell him to use his left, Moe—if he's got anything left."

"That was a beauty!" cried Mr. Sinclair almost in the same second. "Right on Calahan's nose! Go it, boy—go it!"

Terry was on the ropes several times in that round, and one eye was nearly closed, and he was breathing heavily when, at the end of it, he tottered to his corner.

"It's awfully brutal, isn't it?" shivered Rosie. "Will it go on like this for ten rounds?"

"No," replied Mr. Sinclair confidently.

He was perfectly right; it didn't. Half-way through the third round Tommy landed a terrific upper-cut, and followed it with a straight left to the point of the jaw. Terry Calahan went down to stay down—though O'Grady shouted frantically to him to get up.

He was counted out and carried across to his corner, while O'Grady mopped his own brow, and Kaplan flung his hat on the floor and danced with rage upon it. Tommy was greeted with cheers from his supporters and with a certain number of hisses from those who had backed Terry to win.

Ten minutes afterwards, Tommy's manager and seconds stepped out from his dressing-room because his father and Rosie were about to enter it. Tommy's face had been sponged and his hair tidied, and he bore only a very few scars of battle upon his handsome face.

"Hallo, Tommy, my boy!" cried Mr. Sinclair. "That was one of the greatest fights I ever saw!"

"I was afraid you'd be hurt," said Rosie.

At that moment there came a loud bang at the door, and O'Grady and Kaplan burst into the room, uttering congratulations.

"I knew all along you could lick that fellow," said Kaplan.

"That's why you bet on Terry, eh?" jeered O'Grady. "The best man won, but two good men lost!"

Rosie ran across to them.

"Daddy," she said to Kaplan, "do you remember what you told me when you gave me the money?"

"We told you to put it on your future husband," said O'Grady. "At least, I did!"

"Well I did it," cried Rosie triumphantly. "I bet it on Tommy—and I got five to one, too! You've won about twenty-four thousand dollars!"

Kaplan gulped; O'Grady closed his eyes and screwed up his mouth.

The pawnbroker was the first to recover from the shock.

"Now, now, now," he cried. "don't get excited. Twenty-four thous— Well, it's nice you should have rich relations on both sides, ain't it?"

Rosie had been swept into Tommy's eager arms and was hugging him rapturously. Mr. Sinclair invited them all to supper and celebration at his house, then discreetly disappeared. But O'Grady and Kaplan lingered till Tommy said significantly:

"We'll see you later."

The sound of kissing reached their ears as Kaplan was closing the door behind them. Kaplan winked and pulled his friend along the corridor.

"I hope the first is a boy," he said.

"Won't it sound fine—Benjamin Kaplan Sinclair!"

"You're crazy!" snorted O'Grady. "The son of a fighter like that! It'll be Patrick O'Grady Sinclair!"

"Don't be a fool, you fool! I tell you—"

"Now wait a minute! I'll flip a nickel for it, I will, see?"

"All right—certainly," nodded Kaplan.

And thereupon O'Grady fished a nickel from his pocket, made sure that it was the one he wanted, and tossed it into the air.

"Heads!" called Kaplan hurriedly.

But it wasn't. It was tails!

(By permission of W. & F. Film Service, Ltd., starring George Sidney as Benjamin Kaplan and Charlie Murray as Patrick O'Grady.)

Picking 'em up all round the dial

Can you get them all on your three-valver? London Regional, Midland Regional, Radio Paris, Prague, Rome, Stockholm, Stuttgart, Vienna, Barcelona, Langenburg, Berlin, and the rest—are they all waiting on your 'speaker? It can be jolly annoying to know that the folk next door are enjoying a rattling good programme which no amount of tuning will bring in to you. Bring your set up to scratch. POPULAR WIRELESS will show you how to get all the long-wave stations with perfect clarity.

POPULAR WIRELESS

weekly

Buy a Copy TO-DAY.

"PRINCE OF DIAMONDS."

(Continued from page 14.)

shout. He called to the others, and between them they lowered Rupert down out of sight. Lolah stayed silently up above with the men, watching and waiting.

Rupert found himself in a small underground cavern. It had been hewed out of gravel soil, and had been propped by cuttings from gum trees. Obviously it was a newly erected mine—probably not more than ten years old.

For a few minutes Rupert hacked away at the gravel walls, examining each pebble, and sorting out a pile in the middle of the floor. Every moment he was becoming more and more excited.

Suddenly, forgetful of Li Fang's treachery, he called to the men above. "Smith!" he shouted. "Come down here. This is the place!"

Smith descended, and his eyes gleamed as he saw the pile of pebbles Rupert had collected. Hastily producing his hunting knife, he hacked away at a few, and caught the gleam of a diamond beneath the rough surface.

"We'd better get up top again," said Rupert, suddenly remembering that he had now reached the critical stage of his mission. "I want to—"

The words died in his throat as two horrible shouts of pain reached his ears. One of the men above gasped out the words:

"The black death!"

He and Smith hauled themselves out of the mine, and a horrible sight met their gaze. Their companions lay on the ground writhing pitifully, and the shadow of death was on their faces. Lolah sat indifferently on a near-by mound, her chin on her hands, gazing into space.

Rupert bent down over one of the men to see if there was anything he could do. He was startled by a scream from Lolah.

"Beware!" she cried. "He will kill you!"

Rupert straightened his back abruptly, jerking his gun out of its holster as he moved. He side-stepped without turning round, and caught someone's wrist as it swept past his shoulder. It was Smith.

"Swine!" shouted Rupert. "This is where you finish."

They swayed backwards and forwards in a death grip. Suddenly Smith gave a yell and staggered backwards, his face ashen. With a crash he fell to the ground.

"The—black—death—" he gasped, with his last remaining breath.

Rupert spun round, amazed at the suddenness of it all. He looked down at the dead man, and then transferred his gaze to Lolah, who was still sitting some distance away. Apparently she had not moved.

"This is ghastly," he cried hoarsely. "We might be the next to go."

Calmly the half-caste girl shook her head.

"No," she said indifferently. "You see this?" From the folds of her dress she produced a long, thin tube. "This is the black death—a poison that acts quickly and surely. They would have killed you but for the darts that come out of here."

September 6th, 1930.

Rupert passed his hand wearily over his brow. A blowpipe! This girl, who had followed him into the depths of the jungle just because he had called her pretty, had saved his life! The thought left him numb, dazed.

With an effort he pulled himself together. Li Fang's treachery had been proved to him beyond all doubt. Now must come the time of reckoning.

"Come, Lolah," he said gently. "We'll collect all the gems there are and get back. The time has come for me to take my revenge."

"On Li Fang?" she asked.

"No. On a man back in my own country—a man and a woman!"

Just Deserts.

BACK in Endon Castle, Crayle was having a bad time. Ever since Rupert had gone away Eve had been like a woman dead. She spurned him every time she saw him. In spite of the fact that she was his wife, she avoided him always.

That was not Crayle's only trouble. Someone was flooding the markets with diamonds.

He had, only a few months previously, bought large stocks of the precious stones at a big price. A mysterious individual who said he was the agent of the Prince of Penang had offered Crayle a quantity of the gems, and Crayle had taken them because they were of such excellent quality.

No sooner had he paid for them, using almost the whole of his capital to do so, than he found it was impossible to sell them again. Every buyer in the country was getting the same kind of gems for a considerably lower price.

In vain Crayle tried to undersell. His competitor dropped his price lower still.

The battle of finance lasted for a month. At the end of that time Crayle was ruined, and on the verge of bankruptcy.

He returned to Endon Castle one day with disgrace staring him in the face. Whoever had been responsible for his downfall had done his work thoroughly. The career of Gilbert Crayle was ended.

Williams, who had still kept on at the Castle at Eve's request, announced a visitor. The visitor had given the name of "The Prince of Penang."

The mysterious personage strode into the room—the self-same library in which Crayle had brought his charge of theft against the man who had gone away.

Crayle stared at him in amazement. He rubbed his eyes and stared again.

"Rupert Endon!" he exclaimed. "You—the Prince of Penang!"

Rupert smiled.

"What is in a name?" he asked carelessly. "In Penang itself they call me Captain Ruin. An appropriate title, isn't it? I merely used the other name so that you wouldn't know who it was fighting you." He sat down in a chair and lit a cigarette. "Well, Crayle, how do you like the situation now?"

"You fiend!" Crayle gasped. "You infernal fiend!"

"Not at all!" Rupert puffed clouds of smoke ceilingwards. "Six years ago you did the same to me that I have now done to you. It was a compliment to your power, Crayle, that it took me so long. By the way, where is Eve?"

He spoke indifferently, but Crayle was aware of the hidden eagerness in his voice.

"I don't know," he replied shortly. "She's in the castle somewhere, I suppose."

Williams entered, and bowed deferentially to Rupert.

"There is a young person outside, Mr. Rupert," he said. "She says she is accompanying you."

"Oh, yes! That will be Lolah. I left her in my car." He looked at Crayle inquiringly, but Crayle made no response. "Tell her to come in," he continued. "I'm sure Mr. Crayle will not mind."

Lolah entered the room nervously. All her life had been spent in half-primitiveness, and she had never seen before the luxury of a wealthy Western home.

Rupert waved her to a chair. He was completely indifferent to the pretiness that he had commented upon in the café of Li Fang, but he had a use for her. She was his means of revenging himself upon Eve.

Eve joined them a few minutes later. She was not aware that Rupert had arrived, but as soon as she saw him, she ran towards him gladly, her hands outstretched.

"Rupert!" she cried. "Thank goodness you have come back!"

Rupert looked at her calmly.

"Meet Lolah," he said, indicating with a wave of his hand the half-caste girl.

Eve ignored her. Her whole attention was upon Rupert himself.

"Rupert, I've cleared your name," she went on quickly. "Adrian confessed that he and Gilbert conspired together to ruin you. And I—well, I married Gilbert so that you could escape."

Rupert changed his expression abruptly. From sheer indifference, it became remorseful.

"You mean you sacrificed yourself, for me?" he said.

"I mean just that."

Crayle, watching, sprang to his feet in sudden rage. Financially ruined, he could now see himself losing the woman he had in vain striven to win all these years.

His hand flashed to his hip-pocket, and he produced an automatic pistol.

"The last laugh is mine, Endon," he snarled, and levelled the weapon murderously.

He never pulled the trigger. With a hoarse shout, he threw up his hands, and even as he crashed backwards his features turned the familiar ashen hue of the Black Death.

"Lolah!" cried Rupert hoarsely. "You've killed him!"

Lolah's eyes filled with tears. She looked at him wistfully.

"If I had let him live, he would have killed you," she replied, and her voice sounded infinitely tired. "Now that he is dead, you can be happy."

She folded her arms slowly. Suddenly her own face changed colour, and she closed her eyes, swaying from side to side.

Rupert sprang forward. It was too late. Her legs crumpled under her, and she collapsed to the floor, one of her poisoned darts thrust into her arm.

Rupert bowed his head. He looked at Crayle's dead body; then at Eve, who was weeping silently by his side.

"Revenge!" he said brokenly. "And at what a price!"

(By permission of the W. & F. Film Service, Ltd., starring Ian Keith and Aileen Pringle.)

"The Fighting Legion."

(Continued from page 9.)

"Listen, boys," he stated, "what I said to-day was the truth—I'm out to round up the coyote that killed Tom Dawson. What's more, I've got a pretty good idea who he is. But I want to make him show his hand first, and I'd sure like to depend on you all to help me if the rowdies step in."

There was a chorus of approving cries as his listeners assured him of their aid. "Thanks, boys," Dave went on, "that's fine. And now I'll tell you what I'm goin' to do. I'm goin' to have a notice posted up in town, and I'm goin' to have a round-up in the saloon tomorrow at midnight."

Towards Midnight.

AN unknown hand had pinned a notice to the veranda post of the cantina or saloon. The hand might have been the Ranger's. At any rate, the message which had been written on the sheet of paper bore his signature.

"I am coming through the saloon doorway on the stroke of midnight," it ran, "and I am coming for the man who killed Tom Dawson."

The hands of the clock behind the bar of the cantina had moved round to ten-thirty, and it was ticking away the fateful seconds with unflinching solemnity. The sound of the ticking was lost in the prevailing clamour of men's voices and the clinking of glasses, but it was a sound that one man heard all too plainly—a sound that seemed to hammer at his brain till he could have cried out in the agony of a tortured mind.

That man was Bowie, and, seated at a table near the door with Blake and Edwards, he watched the swing of the pendulum as a hypnotised victim watches the swaying of a cobra-snake's head.

Outside, the notice on the veranda post was flapping dully in a gusty wind that brought sheets of stinging rain in its bosom, and before the clock had chined the quarter the downpour had become a veritable deluge.

Those inside the saloon could hear it crashing through the black night on to the roofs of the houses, and the wind shrieked and whistled through the street as if all the demons of the nether world had been let loose. And this unholy din was presently added to by a rumbling of thunder.

"Tough outside, ain't it?" someone was saying. "Meanest night I've ever known. Hey, d'ye think that hombre will show up to-night?"

"Ef he does," another man rejoined, one of the rogues in the pay of Blake and Edwards, "there's a lot of us boys has bones to pick with him."

Many others in the saloon were of the same way of thinking, but in a corner sat a group of men whose hands were ready on their six-shooters—men who knew that, unless they stood by Dave, Bowden would not be fit for an honest man to live in.

There was a plot afoot, a plot to unnerve the man Bowie till he was ready to blurt out the truth, and that plot had its culmination on the very stroke of midnight, when Bowie, with fingers clutching at his gun-butt, wheeled to see the door swing wide.

Bowie whipped out his "iron," and was not alone in doing so, for several of the ruffians at the bar followed suit. But in the same instant, from behind them all, there came a sharp command reiterated in a dozen voices.

"Drop those .45's! Come on, thar—down with yer artillery an' up with yer mitts! Shove 'em high, will ye?"

Cloudy Jones and a party had entered by the back of the saloon. Together with the Hook brothers, Pop Williams, the bar-tenders and every law-desiring citizen in town, they held up the entire bar-room.

Dave Hayes walked across the threshold. His eyes were fixed on Bowie.

"So you drew your gun, huh?" he drawled. "You knew it was you I was comin' for, huh?" Then his tone changed, and he gripped the cringing scoundrel by the shoulder. "Come on, rat!" he blazed. "Tell 'em who killed Dawson the Ranger. Tell 'em, or by Heaven—"

"I'll tell!" sobbed Bowie. "It was me killed him. Yeah, me—shot him in the back like you said—"

"I know that," Dave ground out; "and now I want to know something else. Who were the men that hired you to bump Dawson off? Better talk, Bowie," he added, as the rogue hesitated. "It's your once chance of savin' your neck."

Bowie moistened his lips. "John Blake," he faltered, "was one. An' the other—"

A shot crashed out, and from Bowie came a strangled cry that ended in a death-rattle. Lifeless he pitched to the floor, and in the same moment there reached Dave's ears, from the direction of the hotel register-office, a scream in Molly's voice.

Dave sprang to the curtains that hung over the doorway which led to the lobby, and as he wrenched them aside he saw the figure of Burl Edwards, a smoking six-gun in one hand and his free arm around Molly's waist. The man had vanished with the struggling girl an instant later, plunging out of the hotel into the rain.

Dave stumbled across the lobby in pursuit, and as he gained the street he saw Edwards shoving Molly into a building some little distance away. He reeled towards that building through the storm, and, fairly hurling himself against the door, he blundered over the threshold into a dark room.

The muzzle of a six-shooter was jabbed viciously into his ribs.

"Keep still," said the voice of Edwards, and then there came the sound of the door being kicked shut.

Edwards spoke again: "Ranger," he snarled, "I'm goin' to send you on a long trip—ter Kingdom Come. The walls of this place are thick, an' the storm's ragin'. No one will hear this gun. And when you're gone, Ranger, I'll make a long trip myself—with Molly Williams—"

Dave took a chance, and brought his hand slicing down to clutch at the gang-leader's wrist. The .45 went off with a smashing detonation, but the bullet thudded into the floor, and next second the two men were swaying across the room in a fierce struggle for possession of the weapon.

"The light, Molly!" jerked Dave, and a moment later, with furniture crashing about her as the combatants overturned it in their savage scuffle, the girl found matches and a lamp.

She struck one of the matches, held the flame to the lamp and then turned. The two men were sprawled across a couch. Edwards held the gun, but Dave's grasp was still on his wrist, and the weapon blazed harmlessly at the ceiling as Dave forced the crook's arm outward and upward.

Edwards broke free, but a flashing punch to the jaw flung him in a corner, and the six-gun slid from his hand. When at length he struggled to his feet Dave was covering him.

"I reckon it's you who'll take that trip, Edwards," he said, "by way of the hangman's noose—and John Blake will be the one to travel with you, not Molly—"

A double ceremony was taking place in Bowden, Dave and Cloudy being the principals. No, it was no wedding ceremony, but the ceremony of taking the oath of enlistment in that world-renowned force—the Texas Ranger Service.

Had Bowden possessed a newspaper at that early stage of its career it might have mentioned in its report on the function that Mrs. Dave Hayes was present, looking the proudest as well as the prettiest girl in town.

(By permission of the Universal Films, Ltd., starring Ken Maynard and his horse, Tarzan.)

COMPLETE FILM NOVELS.

Greta Garbo and Conrad Nagel in "THE KISS."

"THE KISS." The drama of a woman caught in the toils of jealousy and suspicion—fighting for her life and unable to tell the truth.

"THE QUEEN'S NECKLACE." France in the years immediately before the great revolution. Marie Antoinette, its selfish queen, caught in a network of intrigue which involves a necklace worth a small fortune.

"SPRING IS HERE." Cupid at large in a gale of laughter. A romantic comedy, starring Bernice Claire, Lawrence Gray, and Alexander Gray.

"CRAZY THAT WAY." A hilarious comedy of three men and a maid—she preferred two fiancés to one husband. Starring Joan Bennett.

Don't miss these four grand complete novels in this week's issue of

"SCREEN STORIES."

Out on Wednesday.

Price 2d.

September 6th, 1930.

(Continued from page 2.)

Conquering Our Language.

Language is something to be conquered, like any other task or obstacle. Ulrich Haupt, actor and artist, went to Hollywood a few years ago with a Teutonic accent. He painted a few pictures, then devoted himself to an actor's career, and won a splendid reputation.

When talking pictures came along, Haupt devoted himself to studying English pronunciation under the best masters. To-day, acting in Norma Talmadge's latest picture, "Dr. Barry," for United Artists, Haupt hasn't a trace of an accent. His English is so perfect that he talks like a Londoner.

Intimate Facts About Famous Talkie Stars.

Noah Beery will bark for a medicine show, sing opera, work before the camera or on the stage, clown for friends, but his knees tremble and his voice shakes with terror when confronted by a radio microphone.

Walter Pidgeon is a "Bohemian," a noted singer, and film and stage leading man, Canadian born and an ex-service man from two years of the World War, but he has never taken a drink of liquor in his life.

Marilyn Miller is unquestionably the world's most famous musical comedy star; she is blonde, blue eyed, a former member of the Ziegfeld Follies. It is a fact, well known in professional circles, that she has been a victim of more "gold-digging" by girls and men with hard-luck stories than any other Broadway celebrity.

Bernice Claire, "the youngest prima donna," of the San Carlo Opera Company, went as a favour to Alexander Gray to play and sing opposite him in a film test made for First National in New York.

Gray got his contract, but Bernice thought no more of it, and had no intention of entering the movies—until she was overtaken by an emissary of the movie company, with a fat contract for herself! Now, of course, in one year she has become one of the most successful young actresses on the screen.

Loretta Young had decided not to go in for a film career, so as to leave the field clear for her elder sisters, Polly Ann Young and Sally Blane. But she had to fill a "coll" for one of her sisters who could not take the job, and was so successful that she won a contract and is now a star, and by far the most famous of the three.

Lila Lee was a perfectly formed little woman at the age of thirteen, so she was starred in a series of pictures as a regular leading woman, with Harrison Ford playing opposite. Two years later she grew five inches taller, got "gawky," and had to postpone her film career another four years—until the talkies came in!

Alice White used to be a red-head, and when she first came on the screen she photographed so nearly like Clara Bow that everyone accused her of imitating the Paramount star. So did Miss Bow, one day when they met "socially." This made Alice so angry that she bleached her hair, reduced by ten pounds, and became a willowy, petite, blonde screen star not at all like Clara!

Now it develops that John Barrymore gave Richard Barthelmess his first lesson in make-up, and prophesied that he would go far in motion pictures or the stage.

Joe E. Brown, the famous comic of films, vaudeville and musical comedy, began his career in the show business by realising his boyhood ambition to become an acrobat. He went through all the Horatio Alger Jr. trials and tribulations as a circus boy, including treachery and cruelty from the boss of his act!

Fred Kohler, who is to be starred by First National in rough-and-ready "he-man" rôles, owes his film fame to the fact that he spent his latter "teens" coalmining, which developed his tremendous physique. He weighs two hundred and thirty pounds, and is "hard as iron." He is the only movie star to live throughout the year on a ranch and work on it himself between pictures.

Sidney Blackmer, zeon of a "first family," was hobnobbing in New York for adventure, and needed some money. He took his stand in a line of men beside a skyscraper under construction, supposing he was applying for a labourer's job. He was chosen, and found himself an extra in a Pearl White thriller, to be filmed on the skyscraper's girders! That put the acting notion into his head for the first time.

David Manners, who has scored successes in "Journey's End" and "Sweet Mamma," came through Los Angeles en route to Honolulu on a quiet honeymoon. As usual, wife's relatives got him into trouble. Mrs. Manners had them in Los Angeles, they secured the stage juvenile a film test, and the honeymoon never went west of Hollywood!

Conrad Nagel developed his fine singing voice, and keeps it in training, by church singing.

Antonio Moreno, a Spaniard by birth, speaks faultless English and faultless Spanish, so he is able to play in either English or Spanish talkies; his latest in the latter language is First National's Spanish version of "The Bad Man," in which he plays the title rôle, which is enacted in the English version by Walter Houston.

THE WORLD'S BEST CYCLE

26

DOWN

& 15 MONTHLY PAYMENTS OF 5/10

The JUNOTM ROYALTM

BROOKS SADDLE, DUNLOP CORD TYRES, RENOLD CHAIN, 14 DAYS' FREE TRIAL.

All British. Superb Quality Guaranteed for ever. Direct from Factory to you. Packed and Carriage Paid. Wonderful easy terms to suit you. Chromium Plated Models II desired. Write for Free Art List.

JUNO CYCLE Co. (Dept. U2), 248, BISHOPSGATE, LONDON, E.C.2.

£315 CASH

GROSE'S, LUDGATE CIRCUS, LONDON

FOOTBALL JERSEYS

All Colours and Designs

15/6

per doz.

Send for Illustrated List, Post Free

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge St., London, E.C.4

THE REAL OPPORTUNITY!

AUSTRALIA, NEW ZEALAND, and CANADA. Hundreds of BOYS (ages 14-19) WANTED. "THE STEPPING STONE TO MANHOOD" describes the Salvation Army's Scheme for training Boys on Army Farms and placing them with farmers overseas. Ask for Free Copy. OUTFITS provided. Parties of Boys PERSONALLY CONDUCTED overseas. COMMONSENSE AFTERCARE. Ordinary and reduced Bookings to the British Dominions, passages booked to U.S.A. and all parts of the world by all lines. Write or call: THE SALVATION ARMY, 3, Upper Thames Street, LONDON, E.C.4.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/- Send STAMPS NOW for Free Book—Stebbing System, 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2

£2,000 WORTH OF GOOD, CHEAP PHOTO. Material and Films. 12 x 10 Enlargements, any photo or film. 8D. Samples Catalogue Free.—HACKETT'S, July Road, Liverpool.

FREE PASSAGES TO ONTARIO, CANADA, for approved boy farm learners, age 15 to 19. Apply—ONTARIO GOVERNMENT, 346, STRAND, LONDON.

HANDSOME MEN ARE SLIGHTLY SUNBURNED. Appearance 16, 29. 6,000 Testimonials (Booklet, stamp)—Sunburneze Laboratories (Dept. A 71, Colwyn Bay, Wales. (Est. 1902)

CHRISTMAS CARD AGENTS WANTED to sell Private Areas Cards Sample Book of lovely designs supplied free. Latest in Novelty cards HIGHEST COMMISSION BEAUTIFUL PRIZES Apply to G DENTON & CO. LTD., Dept. D.25, ACCRINGTON

FREE FUN!

Send 6d. for "Instruments Given FREE" to Mr. W. J. H. (P.O.) for latest Magic Trick and List (large Parcel 2/6, 5/- P. T. Thompson Co., Colwyn Bay, N. Wales.

DON'T BE BULLIED

Send Four Penny Stamps for some SPLENDID LESSONS in JUIJITSU and Handsome Photo Plate of Jap Champions The Wonderful Japanese Self-Defence without weapons Take care of yourself under ALL circumstances; Bear no man. You can have MONSTER Illustrated Portion for 1/0 3/6 SEND NOW to "YAWARA" (Dept. A.P.I., 10, Queensway, Hanworth, Feltham, Middlesex. Practised at Tottenham London School Daily

PARCEL OF 200 Interesting Stamps, such as Persia, Sam, Roumania, Boy King, Triangular, price 3d with Approvals only W A WHITE, 30, Longue Lane, 1 YF, Stourbridge

HEIGHT INCREASED

In Thirty Days. No apparatus, no medicine, ordinary habits retained. Complete Course 5/-. Full particulars and testimonials, stamp.

MELVIN A. STRONG, Rednal, Birmingham.

Printed and published every Tuesday by the Proprietors, The Amalgamated Press, Ltd., The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad, 11/- per annum; 5/0 for six months. Sole Agents for Australia and New Zealand: Messrs. Gordon & Gotch, Ltd.; and for South Africa: Central News Agency, September 6th, 1930. Ltd. Registered for transmission to Canada at Magazine Rates. S.G.

Boy's Cinema

"The Criminal Code," "Tom Sawyer" and
"Wild West Whoopee."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 603.

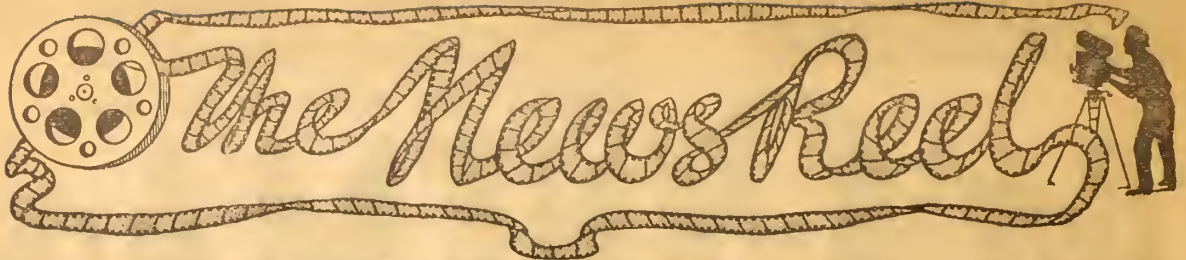

EVERY TUESDAY.

JULY 4th, 1931.

A vivid drama
of the West.
Starring
BUCK JONES.

DESERT VENGEANCE

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Desert Vengeance."

Jim Cardew, Buck Jones; Anne, Barbara Bedford; Hugh Dixon, Douglas Gilmore; Bill McBride, Al Smith; Beaver, Ed Brady; Winnipeg, Bob Fleming; Parson, Buck Conner; Alabam, Pecwee Holmes.

"The Criminal Code."

Warden Brady, Walter Huston; Robert Graham, Phillips Holmes; Mary Brady, Constance Cummings; Gleason, De Witt Jennings; Galloway, Boris Karloff; Runch, Clark Marshall; Dr. Rine-wulf, John St. Polis.

"Tom Sawyer."

Tom Sawyer, Jackie Coogan; Huckleberry Finn, Junior Durkin; Becky Thatcher, Mitzi Green; The Teacher, Lucien Littlefield; Muff Potter, Tully Marshall; Aunt Polly, Clara Blandick; Mary, Mary Jane Irving; Mrs. Harper, Ethel Wales; Sid, Jackie Searl; Joe Harper, Dick Winslow; Widow Douglas, Jane Darwell; Injun Joe, Charles Steven.

"Wild West Whoopees."

Jim Logan, Jack Perrin; Ginger Rogers, Josephine Hill; Captain Rogers, Henry Roquemore; Smoky King, Fred Church; Sheriff Tim Ward, Charles Austin; Lew Larson, John Ince; Top-Hand Norton, Buzz Barton; Slim McGee, George Chesbro; Pete Weddel, Benny Corbett; Joe Harris, Walter Patterson.

Another Spectacular Epic for Richard Dix.

The high-water level in spectacular production set by "Cimarron" is to be maintained in another Richard Dix picture, entitled "Marcheta."

"Cimarron" dealt with the vivid action and colourful characters to be found in the south-west frontier of America, when this part of the continent was being wrested from the Indians and made habitable. In this picture Richard Dix, as the outstanding character of Yancey Cravat, made a new reputation for himself.

In "Marcheta" the scene changes to glamorous Spain, but the scope of the production is said to be as wide and as universal in its appeal as that of "Cimarron."

No expense is being spared in obtaining authentic atmosphere, and in this respect it is interesting to hear that Victor Schertzinger, who is to direct the picture, left for Spain recently with a complete camera crew for atmospheric shots in connection with the film.

"Marcheta" is based upon the famous song of the same name, which enjoyed a phenomenal popularity a year or so ago, and one of the principal reasons for Schertzinger's trip to Spain July 4th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES

LEW AYRES and ROBERT ARMSTRONG

"THE IRON MAN."

A stirring story of the boxing ring and how a young boxer rises to be the light-weight champion, but through swollen-headedness loses his championship and, becomes a man.

"SHIPMATES."

Traditions—loyalty—iron nerves—tingling romance and thrilling drama among the thundering guns of the mighty fleet. Starring Robert Montgomery, Dorothy Jordan and Ernest Torrence.

"THE APACHE KID'S ESCAPE."

A daring outlaw, tiring of his life of crime, determines to run straight and as a humble cowpuncher on the Bar X Ranch becomes involved in a strange adventure. Starring Jack Perrin.

is to photograph and record the world renowned guitar symphony of 60 pieces.

This symphony will be used to lend local colour and authentic Spanish atmosphere through the picture.

Electricity Facts.

Two billion watts of electric current! Enough to operate 80,000,000 average-sized lights.

Or 10,000,000 homes.

Reduced still farther down the dizzy scale of statistics, this vast annual power consumption of the Radio Pictures studio will nightly light a city of 33,300 homes, or 100,000 population.

A mathematical genius—only a genius could do it—might translate this tremendous equation into terms of bread toasters, washing machines and vacuum cleaners. However, this current has a more romantic usage.

Under the watchful eye of William Johnson, chief electrician, it feeds into the studio's six gigantic generators, turns camera motors, projection machines and lights the sets.

It takes a lot of power to burn a single motion picture incandescent lamp —from 500 to 2,500 watts—and there have been times when 300 lamps on a single set were insufficient.

The actual power input metered into the studio is actually 2,003,610 kilowatts for the year ending March, 1931—a kilowatt hour corresponds to a thousand watts of current measured over a period of an hour.

The studio's ranch near Encino, California, consumes an annual power consumption of 6,730 kilowatts.

Handling this immense power is a man's job.

In normal times 150 electricians are employed in the various branches of Johnson's department. At peak times, when production is at its highest, 280 operators are engaged.

Ancient Mexican Chapel Reproduced in New Barthelme Picture.

Richard Barthelme's favourite chapel was recently reproduced on a stage at the First National and Vitaphone studios. A chapel of delicate colourings, of blue and gold and silver; a little chapel of old Mexico.

A year and a half ago Barthelme, accompanied by his wife, made a pleasure trip to Mexico City. While there he visited many of the old landmarks, one of which was an old church just outside the city limits.

Entering the little chapel of this ancient building, he was spell-bound with its reverent beauty—a quiet, serene loveliness.

"What a lovely thing for a picture!" thought Barthelme.

Fortwith he purchased postcard photos of the church and the chapel. The result is that now motion picture audiences will be able to see that self-same place of worship in all its details.

The chapel has been incorporated into the San Gabriel Mission set which plays such an important part in the enfoldment of "Adios," the current Barthelme production.

Frank Lloyd directed "Adios," with Mary Astor and Marion Nixon in the feminine leads. The balance of the cast includes Fred Kohler, Arthur Stone, Mathilde Comont, James Rennie, Erville Alderson and Robert Edson.

Answers to Questions.

"Silver King," the late Fred Thomson's horse, is still alive, Douglas (Guernsey). Tom Tyler has not given up acting and his latest appearance is in the serial, "Phantom of the West." It has ten exciting episodes.

The four Marxes, Groucho, Harpo, Chico and Zeppo, were in "Animal Crackers," Bertie (London, W.). Yes, David Torrence was born in Edinburgh. He is 6ft. 1in. in height and Ernest Torrence is 3in. taller.

A feud between two outlaw bands—a girl who fell in love with a dashing bandit, and proved to be herself a crook—and a scheme of revenge that reacted on the schemer. A whirlwind drama with a terrific climax. Starring Buck Jones and Barbara Bedford.

DESERT VENGEANCE

The Man Who Lost.

THE smoking-room of the steamship Alloa was fully justifying its name: the atmosphere was thick with the reek of cigars and cigarettes. A retreat for male passengers, this big pillared room, ten stairs down from the promenade deck, set with tables, provided with a bar. And at most of the tables the men were playing cards.

"Quite a game at No. 2," remarked a waiter to the bar-tender, as he picked up a loaded tray. "The big mining man who came on board at San Diego sure is lucky."

"Aha," said the bar-tender without any show of interest. "On your way, Sam!"

The waiter went off with his tray, setting filled glasses before various players; but even as he threaded his way among the tables his glance strayed frequently to the four men who were seated round No. 2. They were playing poker, and they were immersed in the game.

One of them was a white-haired man with the face of a lawyer; another, a long, lean, red-headed Scotsman, had already made it known to everybody that he was an oil-pro prospector. But Sam, the waiter, was more interested in the other two, one of whom had been plunging wildly and had lost heavily, while the other was decidedly the biggest winner.

The winner, James Cardew, was a powerfully-built young man, clean-shaven and dark, not exactly handsome, yet one who would inevitably attract attention, even in a crowd. He had a pair of steady grey eyes and the face of a poker-player—a face that did not betray its owner.

The loser, Hugh Dixon, was of quite a different type. He was slighter of build, and quite handsome in his way, with his curly little moustache; but there was a cleft in his rounded chin, and the gaze of his hazel eyes was seldom direct. A young man who would doubtless appeal to the fair sex, but who did not appeal to Jim, who was a judge of men.

"Four hundred dollars," said Dixon, studying his cards.

"I'll raise that two hundred," announced Jim Cardew in his slow, quiet way.

"I'll see you!" retorted Dixon, not without an air of strain.

"What have you got?"

"I'm calling you!" snapped Dixon.

Quite calmly Jim spread out his cards on the table—two kings, three queens. Dixon threw down his hand with the sigh of a beaten bluffer.

"That cleans me," he said gloomily. "I'm through!" And he rose from his chair.

"Better luck next time, son," said the red-headed prospector sympathetically.

"There won't be a next time for me," growled Dixon, and pushed across a pile of chips from his side of the table, then turned about and made his way from the smoking-room.

"Sam!" called the man who looked like a lawyer. "Bring a couple of Manhattans!"

An onlooker slipped into the vacant chair.

"Well, what are we waiting for?" he boomed cheerfully. "If I win every pot between here and Frisco, I'll still be a loser. Going to play, gentlemen?"

Jim stood up.

"Deal me out, gents," he said. "I've had enough for to-night."

He made his way to a caged-off portion of the long bar.

"Cash these chips in, steward," he requested.

"Certainly, sir," responded the steward with respect, and exchanged the pile of counters for notes and cash.

Jim went out and climbed the metal-edged stairs to the promenade deck. The air seemed clean and sweet out there, after the stuffy atmosphere of the smoking-room. A full moon was lighting up the still waters of the Pacific Ocean, and away to leeward stretched the dark coast of California.

But Jim was not beguiled by the beauties of the night. A silhouetted figure was balanced upon the rails of the deserted deck, just as he had expected. Dixon was about to throw himself over the side!

With a sudden spring he reached the rails, gripped the young man by the arms, and pulled him down.

"What are you trying to do?" he inquired gruffly.

"Why don't you mind your own business?" stormed Dixon.

"You ain't going to do nothing like that, young fellow," retorted Jim, still holding him. "That water's kind of wet down there. Where are you bunkin'? Let's go down and talk it over. Come on!"

"No!" cried Dixon savagely. "Leave me alone!"

But Jim was masterful. He marched his companion off along the deck, virtually a prisoner, compelled him to descend a staircase, and having propelled him into a cabin he admitted was his, shut and fastened the door.

"Take your coat off and get in that bunk!" he commanded; and reluctantly Dixon obeyed. Then Jim went to a locker, poured a fairly stiff drink into a glass and went over to him with it.

"Here," he said in a friendly way, "put that inside you, buddy. Do you good! You know, you ought to be ashamed of yourself, a great, big bull-calf like you trying to kill yourself."

Dixon gulped down the whisky-and-soda, and held up the empty glass with a trembling hand.

"Can't you see I'm all shot to pieces?" he complained. "I'm a wreck—a failure—"

"If it's the money you lost to-night and last night, I'll see that you get that back," interrupted Jim.

"Do you think I'd let you give it me back?"

"Aw, forget it—I've got plenty of money."

He deposited the empty glass on a dressing-table. Dixon was lying on the bunk whimpering like a woman, and that disturbed Jim badly. He found himself staring down at a framed photograph of a girl by the mirror—a beautiful girl, dark-haired, dark-eyed. He picked it up.

"Sweetheart?" he questioned.

Dixon looked round.

"Sister," he blurted. "It was her money I lost to-night. It—it was the last of a lot more that went the same way. Oh, I tell you, I'm not fit to go on living!"

Jim put the framed photograph back on the dressing-table and leaned over the writhing figure on the bunk.

"Pull yourself together," he admonished. "There's a lot better ways out than the one you tried just now. Say, it's kind of lonesome down my part of the ship—think I'll just stay here a while. That is, if you don't mind?"

Dixon did not reply.

"I'm staying," said Jim grimly.

He went to the door of the cabin, opened it, and looked out into the long corridor. Then he closed the door and bolted it, and seated himself resolutely in an easy-chair.

"You'll feel better in the morning, young fellow," he said calmly, "and I'm seeing that you live till morning. I've got a gun in my pocket!"

He settled back in the chair. The whimpering sound gradually died away, and it seemed that the figure on the bunk had fallen asleep. With a sigh of relief Jim fished out paper and tobacco and rolled himself a cigarette.

It was towards dawn that he dozed. The quiet of the cabin, combined with the lap-lap of the water against the sides of the vessel, lulled him to slumber. He woke with a start because someone was knocking at the door. Morning sunlight was streaming through the two portholes of the cabin.

"First call for breakfast!" called the voice of a steward.

Jim yawned, stretched his arms, and looked about him. The bunk was empty, the porthole immediately above it was wide open! He himself could not have scrambled through that porthole, but a determined man of slenderer build very well might!

He gazed blankly about him, and, propped against the photograph on the dressing-table, he found this note:

"You tried to do me a good turn, but I can't go on. This leaves my sister all alone. She'll be waiting for me on the quay—meet her and tell her in your own way what I've done.—H. D."

Jim called a steward, who fetched a mate. The mate went off and fetched the captain.

"I sure feel bad about this, captain," declared Jim, after he had explained matters for the third time. "I shouldn't have been so dog-gone careless as to drop asleep."

"There's no reason for you to feel responsible," was the reply. "These things happen in spite of all of us."

July 4th, 1931.

Beaver Pays a Call.

THE Alcoa was already passing through the Golden Gate into the big land-locked Bay of San Francisco. In less than an hour she had docked, and passengers were streaming down a gang-plank to the quay. Jim, dressed in tweeds, but with a big cow-hat on his head, made straight for a slim and graceful girl who was standing patiently there—the girl of the photograph; he would have known her anywhere.

A little felt hat covered most of her dark brown hair, and she was dressed quietly in navy blue with a white collar. Her eyes were a luminous blue, and she turned them on Jim in surprise as he swept off his hat before her.

"Miss Dixon?"

"Yes," she said, staring at him.

"My name's Cardew. You see, I'm— I'm supposed to meet you here. It's about your brother; he isn't on the boat."

"Isn't on the boat?" she echoed blankly. "But he wired me that he would be. Please—has—has something happened?"

"Yes, ma'am," replied Jim. "He disappeared last night."

"I—I don't understand," she faltered.

Jim fished the note from his pocket and handed it to her, hating his task. Her hands trembled as she read it; her head drooped. The sheet of paper fell crumpled to the stones, and she reeled.

"Oh, I'm awfully sorry, miss," he said hoarsely, and caught her by the arm. "I'll take you home now, shall I?"

She nodded gratefully, and he led her away to the road, where he hailed a taxi.

She was living, it appeared, in a furnished flat on the Hunter's Point Boulevard, and he took her to it. He was clumsy of speech, perhaps, but there was a quiet strength and self-reliance about him which was very soothing to frayed nerves.

She asked him into a pleasant sitting-room, and they talked. She confided to him that her brother had always been a reckless gambler, and she was not really surprised that he had decided to drown himself.

Jim, irresistibly drawn towards her, invited her to have dinner with him at the hotel where he proposed to stay in San Francisco for a few days, and much to his joy she promised. She seemed to have recovered fairly completely from the shock when he left her, and she seemed almost radiant when he called for her in the evening.

He had come to San Francisco for a brief holiday with the avowed intention of spending money and enjoying himself, but he had not bargained for making the acquaintance of a charming girl. He became a daily caller at her flat; he took her out and about, and he was still at the Humberstone Hotel four weeks after he had landed!

Every morning, after that first meeting, she received a box of roses from a florist's with a card: "To Miss Anne, from Jim." And every morning Jim arrived at the flat within an hour of the flowers. It was the first time he had ever been in love, and he was very self-conscious about it.

She played the piano rather well, and he became particularly attached to a piece of MacDowell's, called, "To a Water-lily." As she had played it on the second day of their acquaintance, he associated it with her—asked her to play it every time he visited her.

"That was mighty pretty, Miss Anne," he said to her one morning, leaning over her at the piano in the living-room.

She smiled up at him.

"You must like it," she said, "I've played it for you every day!"

He grinned shamefacedly.

"You know," he said, "I was supposed to be in town only two or three days—instead, I've been here a month."

"It seems only a few days," she told him softly. "You've been wonderful to me, Jim. My brother's debts—and all that money."

"It makes me mighty happy if I've been able to help a little," he assured her.

She got up from the piano, and, taking a rose from her waistband, put it in his coat.

"You're a dear!" she said.

"Would you mind playing that piece again for me?" he asked.

She laughed merrily, re-seated herself at the keyboard, and played the piece all over again.

Two days later an obvious Westerner came to the Humberstone Hotel—a man with a scrubby chin and a drooping-moustache, whose ready-made suit of serge looked as out of place on him as a bowler hat on the head of a baby. He was slightly bow-legged, as one who was more at home on a horse's back than on his own feet.

This visitor gave his name to the clerk in the inquiry office as Robert Beaver, and he said that he had urgent business with Mr. James Cardew. A page-boy accompanied him in a lift to the fifth floor, but there left him.

"No. 407," he said pertly. "Bottom of that corridor on the left."

The little man walked widely down the carpeted corridor, examining the numbers on the doors. Before 407 he stopped short, rubbed his chin thoughtfully, then stooped and applied an eye to the keyhole.

Inside the room—a sitting-room—Jim was kneeling at a chesterfield with a book in his left hand, and his right hand raised as though in pleading. Beaver blinked, removed his eye from the keyhole, and applied an ear in its stead. He heard this remarkable utterance:

"My beloved, have pity upon a heart that is tortured with love and longing—a heart that you can crush with but an unkind look. From the first moment I looked into your heavenly eyes I became your slave. In token of my complete—"

Beaver arose, turned the door-handle gently, and stepped into the room, gazing with rapt attention at the kneeling figure.

"And, knowing my unworthiness to even so much as touch the hem of your robe, I offer you my heart and my hand!"

"Them was sure purty words, Mr. Cardew!" exclaimed Beaver.

Jim jumped violently, swung round, and sprang to his feet, dropping the book.

"What are you doing here, Beaver?" he cried, ashamed to have been caught in such circumstances.

"Purty words, Mr. Cardew!" guffawed Beaver, contemplating him. "Mighty purty words!"

"Shut up and sit down!" barked Jim. "What do you want?"

Beaver seated himself on the chesterfield and picked up the book. It was called "The Art of Making Love." He heaved a sigh, put it down beside him, and cleared his throat.

"Well," he said slowly, "after a month had went by, and you hadn't showed up, the boys began tiggerin' something had happened. So they decided I'd better come along and find out."

Jim, who was in his shirtsleeves, shrugged and grinned.

"The boys are right, Beaver. Something has happened!"

"Same thing happened to me once," declared Beaver. "She was a red-head."

"How are things back home, Beaver?"

"Pretty bad. Your friend McBride's startin' trouble again."

Jim frowned.

"Is that so?" he growled.

"Yes, him and his gang has joined forces with Winnipeg."

"What a fine bunch of cut-throats that'll be!"

"Yes," nodded Beaver solemnly, "and if you don't come on back we might as well quit, because they swear they're goin' to wipe us out clean!"

"Is that so?"

"Yes, and the boys are gettin' kinda nervous without you, Jim."

"Well," said Jim, pacing the carpet, "you go on back and tell the boys I'll be in on Friday night."

"We'll be there to meet you."

"Right! Now, go on! Get out of here, will you?"

Beaver picked up the book and moved slowly doorwards with it.

"I'm going to try this on the red-head hoochie dancer over at Sharkey's place," he said.

But Jim retrieved the book before he bundled his henchman out into the corridor.

A Shock for Jim.

ON the following morning Jim went off to Anne's flat full of determination to declare his love for her in flowery phrases before he bade her farewell. But, sitting awkwardly on the edge of a chesterfield beside her, the words deserted him, and finally he blurted this:

"Miss Anne, I've gone and fallen in love! I just couldn't help it!"

She glanced sideways at his face, which was very red, then looked down at her hands, which were folded in her lap.

"Oh, you don't have to give me your answer now," he said hoarsely. "I'd rather have you wait, and sort of get used to the idea."

Her hands came up and held his face, and she looked laughingly into his eyes.

"Oh, you big goose!" she cried. "I thought you were never going to ask me! Aren't you going to kiss me?"

"Yes, ma'am," said Jim bashfully, and gave a little peck at her cheek.

She kissed him full on the lips, and then, possessively, he took her in his arms and hugged her like a bear. But after a while a frown settled about his brows, and he got up and walked away from her.

"I've got something I want to tell you, Miss Anne," he said, with gloom.

"Anne!" she insisted, and followed him.

"Anne, I mean," he amended. "It—it's something I've been ashamed of since I met you."

She tugged him round at that, so that he faced her.

"I know," she nodded. "You're going to tell me that you've been in love with another girl."

"No, ma'am," he contradicted. "Much worse than that. Fact is, I've been a pretty bad fellow in my time, and when you find out how bad, I'm afraid you won't—"

She put a little hand over his mouth.

"If you love me," she said, "nothing else matters."

"Just the same," he persisted, removing the hand and holding it, "there's something you've got to know before—"

"I forgive everything in advance, so there!"

"Gee!" he exclaimed, with infinite relief. "That's mighty fine!"

He groped in a pocket and brought out a little book.

"That's for you," he said.

She took the book and examined it. It was a bank-book, in her name, in which she was credited with five thousand dollars.

"Jim," she exclaimed, round-eyed, "you know I can't take this!"

"Sure you can," he responded. "And besides, young lady, hereafter you're going to do as I say, and, just to keep you out of mischief, I want you to go shopping every day, and buy a lot of pretty things to wear on our honeymoon."

"Your mine must be awfully rich, Jim," she said. "Where is it?"

"Well, you see," replied Jim airily, "I have a lot of 'em, scattered all around."

"I wish I could go back with you, Jim. I'd give anything to see your mines. It must be terribly interesting."

"Yes, ma'am," said Jim, a trifle grimly. "It does get quite interesting sometimes."

He looked across at the gilt clock on the mantelpiece. It was eight minutes past eleven.

"Say, I'd better be moving along," he remarked ruefully, "or I'm going to miss my boat."

"Oh, I wish you didn't have to go!"

"So do I. But I'll be right back in a couple o' months for our wedding."

He left her soon afterwards, and returned to his hotel to pack. He had filled one suitcase, and was placing a framed photograph of Anne on the top of his shirts in a second one, when there came a knock at the bed-room door.

"Come in!" he called.

The door opened, but it was not the page-boy with his bill who entered. It was a tall young man in a light grey suit, whose eyes were a curious sandy brown and penetrating.

"Mr. James Cardew?" inquired the stranger.

"Yes."

"I'm Inspector Brant, of the Coast-line Steamship Company."

"Glad to know you," said Jim. "Sit down!"

And he removed the second suitcase from a chair.

"Thank you," said Brant, and, seating himself, fished out an official-looking sheet of blue paper. "Mr. Cardew, you were a passenger on the s.s. Aloa, arriving here on the 19th of last month, weren't you?"

"That's right."

"You remember a young man by the name of Hugh Dixon, who committed suicide on the night before the vessel docked?"

"I sure do," replied Jim wonderingly. "Why?"

The big sheet of paper was extended in his direction.

"Is that the man?"

Jim studied the paper. It was headed:

"ONE THOUSAND DOLLARS REWARD"

There was a picture, which unmistakably was of Hugh Dixon, and beneath the picture was this surprising statement:

"Wanted for Larceny, Embezzlement, and Fraud.—Hugh Dixon, alias

"I'll get you for this!" hissed the swarthy bandit, as he handed down the bag.

Martin Carraway, alias Stephen Jackson, alias Flash Hughie."

There were also details concerning the wanted man's height, weight, colour of his eyes and hair, and so forth.

"Is that the man?" insisted the watchful inspector.

"Yes," said Jim slowly.

"I thought so. Well, I'm looking for that bird."

"What do you mean? He—he's not dead?"

Brant laughed scornfully.

"Listen," he said impressively. "That fellow's committed suicide at least a dozen times, and he's teamed up with a woman who's supposed to be his sister. Now, I don't want to be too personal, my friend, but did you happen to console that bereaved sister, or take up the family mortgage? Did you?"

Jim turned away, holding the sheet of paper as if to get more light from the window with which to study the picture of Hugh Dixon. His visitor had no idea of the blow he had administered, the dream of happiness he had shattered. Jim was slow of speech but quick of thought, and he was thinking more rapidly than usual.

"Why, no—no," he said at last. "I didn't meet the sister."

"You're lucky! Lots of them have!"

"Lots?" echoed Jim.

"Lots! For my own sake I was rather hoping you had met her, because he's bound to come back to her, and you might have led me in the right direction. I've reason to believe she is in San Francisco, but she changes her address like a chameleon changes its colour."

Inspector Brant departed, congratulating Jim on the fact that he was returning that same day to his mines in the Western Sierras—a place where the Hugh Dixons of the world would find it difficult to ply their nefarious trade.

Jim dumped himself on the bed and grappled with the situation for some little time. So Anne was a crook—and he loved her! He had been hoodwinked—cheated! He thought of the money he had given her, the gifts he had lavished on her.

He began to chuckle mirthlessly. She had certainly deceived him; but, after all, he had deceived her, too, though he would have told her the truth if she had let him.

He unpacked the suitcases, dressed with care, and set out for her flat.

"When Greek Meets Greek—"

BY some freak of fate Hugh Dixon had chosen that very morning to walk back into Anne's life. He arrived in a taxi, without luggage, while Inspector Brant was talking about him in the bed-room on the fifth floor of the Humberton Hotel.

Anne, who opened the door of her flat to him, seemed none too pleased to see him; but he greeted her effusively, and walked into the sitting-room as though he owned the place.

"Well," he said cheerfully from the hearthrug, "I've been dead just a month and a week to-day! That makes the third time I've died this year. It sure was a lucky day when we teamed up on this brother and sister act!"

"One of these days perhaps you'll stay dead," said Anne, "and I may get a little peace. Jim Cardew is a fine fellow."

"A he-man from the sage-brush, eh?" jeered Dixon.

"I don't know about the sage-brush," she retorted, and moved across to a little bureau from which she took the bankbook Jim had given her that morning.

"Hugh," she said, holding it out to him, "I've been thinking. We might split this, and with it our partnership—for a time, anyway. It's hard work playing on your heartstrings. I need a rest."

Hugh Dixon took the book and examined it. He tossed it back to her with a scowl.

"You think of dropping me, and playing this bird yourself?" he demanded angrily.

"Oh, don't be silly," she said. And then, almost wistfully: "You know, for a while I thought I was really falling in love with that big boy. It wouldn't be so hard to do, at that."

She dropped rather wearily on to the chesterfield, and he lit a cigarette before he dealt with this unexpected confession. Then he said fiercely:

"Look here, Anne, no nonsense! This bird is full of money, and we're going to take it from him—right?"

"We'll talk about that later," she evaded. "There's plenty of time—he won't be back for weeks. Run along, Hugh, I'm tired."

He went, smoking his cigarette, smiling maliciously back at her from the door. And she flew to the window to watch him leave the building.

A taxi had drawn up at the kerb as he emerged into the sunlight, and Anne, at the window, gasped. For it was Jim who descended from the taxi. Hugh viewed his victim with some alarm, and would have made off, but Jim grabbed him by the arm.

"Dixon!" he cried, as though in amazement. "Why, you old son of a gun, why—er—I thought you—"

"Yes, I know," said Dixon glibly. "I guess it's my fate to go on living. You see, when I went overboard that night I woke up being pulled aboard a tramp steamer bound for South America."

"But why didn't you let me know, man?" demanded Jim, dissimulating.

"Well, I knew you'd told my sister, and I really intended completing the job later. Guess I lost my nerve."

"You don't know how glad I am to see you!" cried Jim, thumping him in the back and holding him while he paid the taxi-driver. "Come on—let's go in! I guess Anne has told you about our engagement?"

"Well, yes," admitted Hugh.

They made their way together up the stairs to the flat, and Anne, with a book in her hand, admitted them.

"Look who's here!" exclaimed Dixon.

"Jim, darling!" cried Anne. "So you didn't go?"

"No, I missed my boat," Jim replied. "And glad of it, too. I don't think I could go back without you now, Anne."

She seemed genuinely pleased to hear that.

"Oh, you're a dear!" she declared, and pulled him into the sitting-room and sat beside him on the chesterfield. "Weren't you surprised to see Hugh?"

"I should say I was," he drawled, and looked up at the man who was wanted for larceny, embezzlement and fraud with a friendly smile.

"You know," he said to him, "Anne wanted to see how I worked the mines, and now that I've missed my boat I've come back to tell her she can come along. You might come along, too, Hugh. Maybe you're interested in gold mines?"

"I'll say I am," responded Dixon quite eagerly.

"Is there a town where we're going?" asked Anne.

"Sure," nodded Jim. "Skyfields isn't much of a town, but it is one of sorts. You see, I practically own the place. Sort o' one-man town, you might say."

"Don't tell me you're the mayor?" breathed Anne.

"Yes, ma'am," chuckled Jim. "And just wait till you meet my councilmen! What do you say, both of you? To-morrow's boat?"

"Suit me fine," declared Dixon with enthusiasm.

"I shall just love it!" cried Anne.

They embarked next day upon the steamship Paxton, belonging to the Columbia line, for San Diego; and at San Diego they boarded a train on the Southern Pacific Railroad for Riolite, the nearest mining-town to Skyfields, as Jim explained.

"It's right on the fringe of the Colorado Desert," he said. "It's going to be a real experience for you. We shall just about make Riolite in time for breakfast."

The Train from San Diego.

R YOLITE was a typical mining-town at the foot of the Sierras, within a few miles of the great desert—a town of frame buildings and log cabins, in which men lived more or less at peace with their wives and children, subject to disturbances from three rival gangs of bandits who occasionally rode into its main street, bent on amusement or pillage.

The centre of attraction for the wilder spirits of the place, and for those who rode into town, was the Riolite Bar, a long, low-built saloon which boasted a dancing floor as well as some sort of orchestra. And at about the hour that the night mail left San Diego on its long journey across the Colorado Desert into Arizona the swarthy and bearded Bill McBride, leader of one bandit gang, was in close converse with a mean-faced rascal known as Winnipeg at one of the tables.

Winnipeg was leader of a gang that operated largely in the region of Palm Springs, and consequently was not a rival of McBride in any true sense. But McBride had invited Winnipeg to join forces with him even as Beaver had reported to Jim, and this meeting was concerned with the fusion.

"I'm surprised," grunted Winnipeg, puffing at his foul pipe, "that Cardew hasn't been hung already."

"It ain't too late for hanging to happen," responded McBride significantly. "That's why I sent for you."

"I owe him plenty," said Winnipeg. "Thanks for lettin' me in on the frolic. Goin' to string him up, eh?"

"Kinda thought you'd like it. You and me don't get in one another's way—he gets in both your way and mine. Been gallivantin' off to 'Frisco, but he's due back 'most any time now."

"Guess we'll get ready for him!"

"Yeah, we—"

McBride broke off abruptly as the door of the saloon was pushed open and Beaver ambled across to the bar, followed by eight other men in cowboy clothes. He dug an elbow into Winnipeg's ribs.

"Cardew must be comin' in to-night," he said in a hoarse whisper, "or they wouldn't be here!"

He pushed back his chair and, rising, went over to the bar.

"You didn't expect to see me here to-night, did you?" he said menacingly to Beaver, whose companions were looking at two dancing girls.

Beaver, in the act of ordering drinks, swung round and blinked. McBride's right hand was on the butt of his six-shooter.

"Please, mister," he said quietly, "I don't know you."

"Well, maybe this will introduce us!" snarled McBride, and the six-shooter was in his hand, its barrel pointed straight at Beaver's heart. "You expectin' anybody to-night?"

"You—you wouldn't shoot a poor little fellow in the only stomick he's got, would you?" faltered Beaver in seeming terror.

"You've got three seconds to answer civil," snarled McBride. "One of 'em's gone!"

Winnipeg leaned forward in his chair and chuckled. The bar-tender ducked, and the dancing-girls fled.

But Beaver was not by any means as scared as he appeared. Covertly his right hand had crept round to his holster, and covertly he had drawn his gun. He fired it from the hip, not at McBride, but at the big hanging lamp which illuminated that end of the saloon—and as he fired he dropped on all fours.

The lamp was extinguished amid a shower of broken glass. Shots rang out in all directions. But Beaver, crawling under a table, whistled twice, then made for the swing-door.

The eight men who had entered the saloon with him crawled out behind him.

In the semi-darkness of the saloon guns were still being fired as Beaver and his men got to their feet in the comparative safety of the moonlit roadway.

"Everybody here?" inquired Beaver softly.

"Yeah, we're all here," responded a burly bearded fellow in a checkered shirt named Alabam; "but what's the idea o' runnin' away from that outfit? You know how I like funerals!"

"Son," admonished Beaver, "we're men of peace! Let's go!"

Their horses were tethered to a rail outside the saloon. They mounted them and rode out of town towards the desert. Other men came tumbling out from the saloon, but, finding the horses gone, did not pursue.

On the moonlit alkali, far beyond the town, Beaver halted his followers.

"Listen!" he said. "We'll get enough fighting before we're through with McBride. Come on—we've got a train to meet!"

Across the edge of the desert they rode for hours, with the foothills of the mighty Sierras on their right, and the mystery of night about them. They came to the built-up track of the Southern Pacific where it crossed this end of the dry waste, and there they halted.

In the distance a whistle shrieked at the night, and a long train came rushing and roaring towards the waiting horsemen. Beaver unhitched from his saddle-bow a red lamp he had acquired in Ryolite. He lit and handed it to one of his men—a bearded fellow who rejoiced in the nickname of Whiskey.

Whiskey dismounted and walked along the track towards the approaching train, swinging the lamp, while the others clustered together on their horses, waiting.

The driver of the night mail shut off steam and applied his brakes; the long train came creakingly to a standstill, its bell clanging stridently. Beaver and Alabam slid down from their saddles and climbed up into the first coach.

"It ain't robbery, Mister Conductor," said Beaver pleasantly to the official who would have barred their way. "We just want to see a Mister Cardew, that's a-ridin' on your train."

"But I don't know Mr. Cardew," snapped the conductor. "Besides, I can't have my passengers disturbed—they're all asleep in their bunks."

"I wouldn't think of disturbin' nobody!" declared Beaver at the top of his voice. And with that he went running along the corridor of the sleeping-car, while Alabam stood truculently in the conductor's path.

"This way, Beaver!" boomed a voice. "What's the trouble?" And in the dimly-lighted corridor between the curtained bunks Jim's head appeared.

"Better get off here, Jim," urged Beaver. "Tell you more about it later."

"Right!" said Jim and, in his shirt and trousers, moved further along the corridor.

"We're getting off here, Anne!" he shouted. "Hurry, please!"

"All right, Jim, darling," responded the voice of Anne from behind a curtain. "I'm nearly dressed."

"Did she say 'darlin'?" inquired Beaver delightedly.

Hugh Dixon clambered out from a bunk, half-dressed and yawning.

"What's the matter, Jim?" he inquired nervously. "Train held up?"

"Naw, you ain't held up," laughed Beaver.

"Get the grips," said Jim. "It's all right, Hugh—we're getting off here. Put on your coat!"

In a very few minutes Anne and Dixon, fully dressed, stood beside Jim, who marched them off to the steps at the end of the coach. Beaver had collected the luggage from a startled negro attendant, and they all descended to the track.

The conductor had said everything he could think of by way of complaint. The horsemen who had surrounded the massive engine put away their guns, and the train moved noisily off into the night. Jim stepped aside with Beaver, while Anne and Dixon stared blankly about them.

"Kinda looks like McBride meant what he said," confided Beaver. "He's been meetin' all the trains at Ryolite, and swearin' he was goin' to string you up. I got your wire, and I thought, on account o' the lady, you'd sooner see McBride later."

"You're right, Beaver," approved Jim. "You've brought horses, I see. Let's mount 'em up, and go."

Meanwhile:

"What do you think this means?" asked Anne nervously of Dixon.

"I'm wondering," was the reply.

Jim whistled shrilly, and his own big white horse, Silver, came trotting up to him. Beaver led two other horses over to Anne and Dixon.

"We're ridin', miss," he said. "Did you ever paddle a horse canoe?"

"I learned to ride at college," replied the girl. "How far is Skyfields from here, Mr. Beaver?"

"Beaver's the name, ma'am—and it's forty miles."

"Forty miles?" gasped Anne. "I thought there was a railroad running through the town?"

"Why, no, ma'am," said Beaver cheerfully; "you see, they ran out of railroads just before they got to it. Right this way, miss. Get aboard, son—we're travellin'!"

"Don't call me 'son'!" snapped Dixon.

When they were all in the saddle, they set off across the desert, Jim riding beside Anne, Beaver beside Dixon, and the rest of the party bringing up the rear.

The parson was sitting at a table with Jim; they had just finished a meal. She poured a cup of coffee for him then held one out to Jim.

Robbing the Robbers!

WHEN dawn broke, the travellers had reached the foothills to the south, where patchy grassland mingled with rock. But the sun was up before they came in sight of any human habitation.

Dixon had been complaining at intervals throughout the long ride; now he stared at a cluster of tumbledown buildings in a dip, and his jaw dropped. Broken walls, paneless windows, and a general air of neglect enabled him to guess that before him was a "ghost city"—a mining town created in the days of some gold rush, and abandoned to its fate by those who had dug for gold and found nothing.

They swept down a sandy slope into what had once been a main street, and Anne looked about her wide-eyed. They came to a galleried building on the far side of the ghost city—a building in a better state of preservation than most of the others. Over its main entrance was the mocking sign: "Skyfields Hotel, Casino & Saloon."

Jim slid from the white horse and flung out his arms.

"Welcome to Skyfields!" he cried ironically. "Sorry I haven't got a key to offer you, but the town is wide open. We're mighty proud to have such fine company!"

The men dismounted and streamed into the building, after hitching their horses to a long rail. Dixon and Anne climbed wearily down from their saddles. Jim pointed to the open doorway significantly.

"Here we are," he said, "and if you get dissatisfied, you're welcome to go any old time. But, remember, there's forty miles of desert between here and the next drop of water!"

Anne resisted a temptation to burst into tears, and followed him into a typical miners' saloon. A cracked mirror hung awry on one of the walls; but there were plenty of chairs, tables, and forms, and there was a long bar. Jim led the way to a staircase, mounted to a landing, and flung open a door.

"Your room," he said curtly to Anne. And then, to Dixon: "That's yours down there. Guess you'd like some sleep before you have a meal."

Dixon, with a shrug of his shoulders, made for the indicated room. He was dead tired and thoroughly dispirited. Anne passed in at the open door of her room and closed it behind her. She looked out of an uncurtained window across miles and miles of desert and sandy hills; she gazed down at broken walls and roofs.

As she turned away from the window she caught sight of a poster pinned to one of the walls of her room. She studied it with horror. It intimated that a reward of five thousand dollars was offered for the capture of the notorious bandit, Jim Cardew, dead or alive!

She burst into a peal of hysterical laughter, which echoed through the building. Jim, who had gone off to change into his western clothes, tapped on her door and opened it. Derisively she jerked her head at the poster.

"The big mine-owner!" she shrieked. "Mayor of the town!" Sobs mingled with her laughter. "Just a common crook!" she screamed. "You've got a nerve, bringing me here!"

"A man needs plenty of nerve to deal with a woman like you," he said sternly. "We're both crooks, but here's the difference between us: when you go after something, the only thing you risk is a few of your rotten kisses! Oh, I know all about you and your precious brother!"

"My kisses weren't so rotten while they lasted, were they?" she flung at him. "Listen, here's the difference between us: I'm smart enough to outwit your kind, while you're too dull-witted to get anything except with a gun."

With a sudden movement he grabbed her in his arms and kissed her fiercely.

"I didn't need a gun to get that!" he said with a laugh; and turned his back on her contemptuously. She snatched up a hair-brush and flung it after him; but it struck the wall above the door, and he laughed again as he went out and shut the door behind him.

Down in the saloon the men were gulping hot coffee, which a plump and elderly woman had prepared for them; they called her "Princess." She beamed at Jim as he descended, and set a steaming tin cup before him as he dropped into a chair at one of the tables.

Ten minutes later he and his men were in the saddle again, riding out into the desert. Jim had decided to meet McBride. The day was very young as yet, and the opportunity seemed too good to be missed.

The bandit's hide-away was somewhere in the foothills between Ryalite and Nogales and, having failed to find his enemy, McBride would doubtless be returning to it by now—and probably not empty-handed. There was a State Bank in Ryalite, and McBride had an affection for State Banks—as a general rule he blew their safes up with dynamite for his own profit!

Jim knew his man well, and judged him rightly. McBride and his gang had broken into the Ryalite State Bank just before dawn that morning, and were riding out of the town with their loot a while before Jim and his followers set out from Skyfields.

Jim made for the foothills, and from the cover afforded by them he watched the enemy's approach. Imagining him to be hundreds of miles away in San Francisco, they rode quite openly across the sage-brush and the sand.

They paused beneath a mass of rocks to scan the landscape before turning into a gap that led up to their retreat.

"All clear," chuckled McBride. "And, as the old saying goes, 'the goose hangs high.'"

"You'd make a pretty cooked goose, Bill," commented one of his men.

"Shut your head!" snapped McBride angrily. "Let's ride!"

"Just a minute, boys," boomed a voice from behind a rock. "Stick 'em up!"

The hands of all the members of the gang went up automatically, and Jim stepped calmly out from his hiding-place, a six-shooter in each hand, and a broad grin on his lips.

"Well, if it isn't my old pal, McBride!" he said facetiously. "How are you?"

"Thought I warned you to stay out of these parts, Cardew!" snarled the discomfited bandit.

"So you did!" nodded Jim. "Get the guns, Beaver!"

Beaver, Alabam and the rest came streaming down from the rocks. With the celerity of an expert, Beaver relieved McBride and his followers of their weapons. Then Jim thrust away his own guns and calmly held out his hands for a big canvas bag attached to McBride's saddle-bow.

"I'll get you for this!" hissed the swarthy bandit as he handed down the bag.

"Yeah?" drawled Jim. "Which is it this time—a threat or a promise? From now on, this part of the country is my diggins. Savvy? Now drift!"

McBride turned his horse towards the gap in the rocks, and his men followed him. Jim tossed the heavy bag to Beaver, and whistled his horse.

"Split that with the boys," he directed. "Anything that coyote touches is just poison to me!"

"It's as good as split," rejoiced Beaver.

Sunday Night.

BY the time Jim and his men got back to Skyfields, the Indian "Princess" had prepared a meal for them.

Jim sat down with Beaver at a table near the swing-doors, the bag of money between them. It appeared, from the squaw's report, that Anne and Dixon had slept away most of the morning, and had then demanded food to be served in their own rooms.

The men were drinking coffee, when the swing-doors were pushed open, and a tiny bare-headed man walked into the saloon. He was wearing patched trousers and a coloured shirt, and he had a mane of white hair and a bushy white beard. There was something venerable about his face, and he had the blue eyes of a fanatic.

"Hullo, parson!" greeted Jim.

"Back again," said the little man, "without any bullet-holes in your hide."

Beaver, who always felt uncomfortable in the presence of this remarkable minister, who had come to Skyfields during the dead and gone gold rush, and had remained ever since to preach the gospel in a tumble-down church—often with no congregation at all—rose and picked up the stolen bag.

"Think I'd better attend to that business with the boys, Jim," he said, and went out, calling the men after him.

"Cup of coffee, parson?" suggested Jim, and reached over to a big metal pot and filled a cup. The little man sat beside him and drank.

"God's been good to you, Jim," he said, "in spite of your cussedness. You lead a miserable life, my son, always in hiding from your fellow-men."

"How long have you been here, parson?" inquired Jim evasively.

"Forty years preaching the Word."

"Forty years is a long time—especially all alone in a place like this, most of it. I like you, parson! Guess I'll turn in for a bit of sleep now."

His men, presumably, followed his example; the afternoon wore monotonously away, even the princess dozing on a chair in the kitchen.

But after the lamps in the saloon had been lighted the men came trooping into it and lounged there.

Alabam had brought his guitar with him, and presently he began to pluck the strings and sing the famous cowboy song, "Red River Valley." The others chimed in at the top of their voices, and Jim looked on with amusement for a while, then mounted the stairs and knocked at Anne's door.

Hugh Dixon, who had wandered down into the saloon to see what all the noise was about, looked after him with a scowl, then went to the bar. Alabam was perched on a stool with his instrument, and a gnu projected temptingly from his holster.

Dixon drew nearer, brushed against the player, and quietly annexed the weapon. He slipped it into one of his trouser pockets and slipped back to the stairs.

Anne had refused to admit Jim in response to his demand, but he turned the handle and strode into the room.

"Well," he taunted, "I'm in!"

She was fully dressed in a grey frock that became her, and she was standing just inside the door, with her hands on her hips.

"You're even lower than I thought!" she said with intent to hurt. And then abruptly she smiled, for Dixon was standing behind Jim with Alabam's six-shooter in his hand.

"Put up your hands, Cardew!" he rasped.

Jim raised his hands and looked at Anne with a curious expression in his grey eyes as these words of the song floated up the staircase:

"I've been waiting a long time, my darling, for those sweet words—"

He turned slowly and faced the gun. "I'd like to kill you now," said Dixon, "but we're leaving here—and you're taking us!"

Jim looked over the speaker's shoulder out into the deserted passage.

"It's all right, Beaver," he said.

Dixon turned his head, just as Jim had expected him to do, and in that second the gun was wrested from his hand and a fist came up, caught him on the point of the jaw with a resounding thud, and sent him flat on his back, half unconscious.

With a quiet grin Jim stowed the gun in a pocket, then picked Anne up in his arms and carried her out to the stairs.

"I only came up to invite you to our little party," he told her calmly, and strode down the stairs with her into the saloon.

The singing stopped dead; the men stared.

"Strike up a tune, Alabam," directed Jim, and deposited Anne on her feet. "Make it a dance," he added.

Alabam obediently plucked the strings of his guitar, and Jim took Anne in his arms and began to move about the floor with her. Hugh, nursing his aching jaw, crept down the stairs and stood gloomily in a doorway, watching them.

And then, abruptly, a cracked bell began to ring, somewhere on the outskirts of the ghost city—the cracked bell of the dilapidated little church.

Jim stopped short, and motioned to Alabam to cease playing.

"It's Sunday night," he said solemnly. "I forgot! Come on, everybody!" And he marched Anne to the swing doors.

The others followed—all save Dixon. But Beaver went back for him.

"Come on!" he barked menacingly. "Everybody goes to church here!" And he grabbed the reluctant crook by the arm and pulled him out.

In a straggling procession the whole party moved across the sandy ground to the isolated wooden church; and there was the parson, standing on the top step with a Bible in his hand, waiting for them.

"Good evening, parson," said Jim. "Meet a new member of our congregation."

"Glad to have you with us this evening, sister," said the little man, shaking hands with Anne.

"Shake hands with the parson, son," commanded Beaver, pushing Dixon forward, and Dixon reluctantly held out his hand.

A remarkable congregation; but then everything was remarkable about Skyfields. The men made their way to long forms in the body of the building, and Jim sat beside Anne on the left, while Beaver pulled Dixon down beside him on the right.

The parson mounted to a roughly fashioned pulpit, after he had distributed hymn-books.

"I want you all to join me in singing the grand old hymn, 'There's a Great Day Coming,'" he said. "Page 167—one, six, seven."

Evidently these bandits knew the hymn quite well, for they sang with gusto. A prayer followed, with everyone on their knees; and then came a Scripture lesson, taken from a number of passages from the Old Testament prophets. Anne sat amazed; Dixon could hardly believe his ears; for this tiny parson, with his fervid manner, hurled at his listeners denunciations such as these:

"My house shall be called of all nations the house of prayer, but ye have made of it a den of thieves. . . My face will I turn also from them. And they shall pollute my secret place—for the robbers shall enter and defile it. And if ye will not be formed, I will bring a sword upon you."

After it was all over they trooped back again to the saloon, quiet, subdued. Next day they might embark upon some fresh robbery, but to-night they had the manner of law-abiding, God-fearing people.

In the Desert.

IN the weeks that followed there were many mysterious comings and goings on the part of Jim and his gang, but always two men were left behind to guard Anne and Dixon, both of whom were set to menial tasks. Anne was made to fetch and carry and help the princess in the kitchen; Dixon was compelled to do all manner of odd jobs for which he had no liking.

"I'm getting to look more like you every day," Anne said bitterly to the squaw one morning, as she picked up a loaded tray.

"Onah!" retorted the princess in her own language, and then curtly: "They are waiting!"

Anne went out into the saloon to serve Jim and his followers with coffee.

The parson was sitting at a table with Jim; they had just finished a meal. She poured a cup of coffee for him, then held one out to Jim.

"This coffee's cold and weak," he complained, after he had sipped at it.

"Well, why don't you keep some wood in the kitchen?" she retorted angrily. "Or perhaps you'd like to have me do that, too?"

Dixon looked apprehensive.

"Where am I to get any more wood?" he growled. "I can't grow it!"

"There are plenty of broken-down cabins in the place," snapped Jim.

Anne went back to the kitchen to make fresh coffee, but she was sitting at the big table with her face in her hands when Dixon came in at the back door with an armful of wood, which he threw viciously on the floor, and proceeded to re-light the fire. The princess was out in the saloon, gathering up the used plates.

"I wish I were dead!" exclaimed Anne tragically. "I'd rather die a thousand times than stay here another day."

"We're not going to stay here another day," declared Dixon in a low voice, feeding flaring paper with broken wood. "Listen, Anne, we've only got one chance. The horses are guarded night and day. We've got to walk it—are you game?"

She rose and went over to him.

"I'm game enough," she said eagerly. "When?"

"To-night."

His finger was on the trigger when Alabam saw him standing there, and fired.

July 4th, 1931.

While the fire burned and a huge kettle boiled, he arranged the details with her, breaking off every now and then, as the Indian woman bustled in and out of the kitchen.

The rest of the day passed depressingly for them both, but they were eager for the night, neither of them realising what forty miles of desert mean to those who would cover them on foot.

At eleven o'clock they crept out from their respective rooms, and like shadows flitted down the stairs.

Dixon drew the bolts of the back door, and they went out into the moonlight, keeping in the shadows of the tumble-down buildings till they were well away from the saloon. Then they ran out across the sage-brush into the sand—ran as though pursued, though no one pursued them.

But the sand soon wearied them of running, so that hand-in-hand they walked, walked resolutely towards the undulating line where sand and sky seemed to meet.

For hours they walked, and a chill air grew into a little wind that blew the dust against their faces. Thirst began to assail them both, and walking became an agony.

Anne stopped short at last, holding out her hands to her companion, and he unscrewed a water-bottle he had brought with him, slung about his shoulders, and she took it and drank greedily.

"No more," he said thickly, and snatched away the flask and put it to his own lips.

They walked on again—on and on and on. And dawn crept up over the desert before they had covered twenty miles.

Anne's walk had become almost a totter when a bleached skeleton stared up at them. Anne stumbled over it, screamed, dragged her aching limbs away from it in fear, and fell flat on her face.

"Anne! Anne!" cried Dixon, kneeling beside her. "Anne! We've got to go on! Anne!"

He dragged her to her feet, and they covered another agonising mile before she fell again—this time so exhausted that he could not raise her, because her limbs refused to function. He unsung the water-bottle, unscrewed it, lifted her head, and held the rim of the bottle to her lips. But she could not drink—she was unconscious!

He lowered her head to the sand again and looked wildly about him.

Nothing but sand and scrub, with here and there a dune, and here and there a cactus! He replaced the cap of the bottle, slung the bottle once more about his shoulders and got stiffly to his feet. Then, without another glance at her still form, he plodded on, climbed a sand-hill, and disappeared from sight.

The sun had been up for over three hours when Jim, searching the desert for the fugitives, came upon her. Beaver and the others had gone off in different directions. He sprang down from Silver's broad back and knelt beside her.

"Anne! Anne!" he whispered in her ear and hugged her close.

His vengeance had turned to ashes; he knew now how much he loved her. He kissed her dry lips, then laid her gently down and went back to his horse. A water-bottle hung from the saddle-bow. He unfastened it, soaked a handkerchief, and returned to her.

He lavied her face with water; he poured water into cupped hands and dripped it between her lips. And at last she opened her eyes and looked up into his face.

"Why—take—so much—trouble," she faltered wonderingly, "if you—hate me so?"

July 4th, 1931.

"I don't hate you, Anne," he said brokenly, and pressed her wet cheek against his. "I love you!"

She sighed and closed her eyes again, and then he lifted her up and carried her to the horse, and presently he went riding back to Skyfields, holding her in his arms.

Some hours later, Dixon, almost at his last gasp, reached the region of rocky foot-hills where McBride and his gang had their fastness. The solitary figure had been seen long before he reached the rocks, and some of McBride's men were waiting for him.

They gave him water, his own bottle being empty, and they half-dragged, half-carried him into the bandit's presence.

Winnipeg and McBride had joined forces for a determined attack upon Jim, and Winnipeg was with McBride when the drooping Dixon was brought into the camp.

"What are you doin' in these hills?" demanded McBride without a trace of sympathy in his voice for the exhausted condition of the captive.

"Why, I—I was going in search of officers," stammered Dixon.

"Yeah?" drawled the bearded Winnipeg. "And then what?"

"My—my sister and I were kidnapped, and held for ransom."

"Is that so?" quoth McBride with sudden interest. "Well, we're the officers you're looking for, young fellow. Rangers we are. Talk free and easy." And he winked prodigiously at Winnipeg.

"Well," lied Dixon, "we were driving through your country here. We were overtaken and captured. Cardew and his men were on us before we knew it."

"Cardew?" exclaimed Winnipeg.

"Did you say Cardew?"

"Yes, Jim Cardew," said Dixon venomously. "You know him?"

"It's him we're trailin', son," declared McBride. "We know he lurks around these parts, but not exactly where. Know his hideaway?"

"Back there," said Dixon, jerking his thumb. "A deserted town."

McBride and Winnipeg exchanged glances.

"Can you ride?" demanded Winnipeg.

"You can? Well, after you've rested a bit, and had some grub, you can show us the way. There's more than one deserted town on the desert."

— 4 — The Way of Salvation.

IT was high noon when one of Jim's men came rushing into the saloon at Skyfields with the news that fully a score of horsemen were galloping towards the town.

"It's McBride," decided Jim. "Get the men set right away, Beaver. Anne!"

Anne was up in her room, resting on her bed. He darted up the stairs to her.

"What is it?" she asked nervously, springing in alarm from the bed.

"There's going to be a serap," he told her. "It'll be pretty serious, Anne, but no matter what happens, don't leave this room—and stay away from that window!"

He shut her in and raced down to the bar. Beaver had got all the men there together, and their guns were in their hands.

"You all loaded, boys?" he inquired.

"Right! Let's go!"

They went out into the sunlight, and stood ready before the building, but Jim darted back to the staircase and appeared on the balcony above their heads. McBride and Winnipeg and their united gangs had reached the far side of the town, and were firing as they came to intimidate the besieged.

"Get inside," yelled Jim, "and guard the windows and the doors! There are more than a score of 'em!"

His men dived obediently into the building. Jim, from the balcony, saw, to his alarm, that the little parson was standing on the steps of his church. He howled a warning, but the parson did not budge.

Down what had once been a street swept the invaders, and with them was Dixon. Jim fired at one of the foremost figures, whom he recognised as McBride, and McBride rolled from his saddle.

Shots answered his shot. Bullets whizzed past his head. He climbed in at the nearest window and took cover.

From windows and doors downstairs guns spoke and spat. The horsemen swept by, firing as they passed, then turned about and rode again.

Men fell from their horses and lay still. Winnipeg, taking command, directed the operations of the remaining invaders, leading them away to cover, where they dismounted, to return to the attack more cautiously on foot.

An arm came up over a windowsill, a shot rang out, and Beaver fell in a huddled heap.

Like a panther, Jim sprang to the window, firing right and left. He had the satisfaction of seeing five men bite the dust, then ran back to his fallen henchman, who had crawled to a wall. He tied a handkerchief about a wounded forehead, but Beaver was mortally hurt, and fell forward against his knee, dead.

From all sides the besieged were attacked, but the attackers had dwindled considerably in numbers. Winnipeg had gone down with a bullet in his heart; the score or more of ruffians outside had become little more than a mere half-dozen.

Jim, greatly daring, pushed a wrecked polyphon before him towards the swing doors, and he and Alabam, using the tall mahogany case of the instrument for cover, picked off several of those who were lurking outside the white walls of the building.

Alabam, returning from a tour of inspection, cried out:

"There's only three of us left—you and me and Bill!"

"Let's pour it into 'em!" shouted Jim. "They're down to half a dozen!"

At that moment Dixon, with a gun in his hand, came stealing into the saloon from the kitchen. He had borrowed the gun, but hitherto had kept well out of the way. Now, judging the time to be ripe, he had crept into the building from the rear, in the hope of catching Jim unawares.

Jim's back was towards him—an easy mark. His finger was on the trigger when Alabam saw him standing there and fired.

Simultaneously the shots rang out, and Jim fell forward against the polyphon and rolled thence to the floor, while Dixon flung up his hands and crashed down on his face, to trouble this world no more.

"Are you hit bad, Jim?" asked Alabam anxiously, going down on his knees beside his fallen leader while a final fusillade rang out, and the man Bill at the window collapsed.

"Not—too—bad," gasped Jim, and he dragged himself up, picked up his fallen gun, and clung to the polyphon.

"Run for it, Alabam," urged Jim. "I've got it in the leg, but you may be able to get away."

Alabam went reluctantly, but as he

(Continued on page 28.)

A gripping drama of life in a prison and how a youngster committed for an impetuous act, lives a life of misery and hardship for six long years before winning his parole.

The Jute Mill.

CEASELESSLY the awful noise went on, and on—and on! Gears crashed together, pulley-rods whined in their bearings, and the teasing looms chattered with the nerve-racking hammering of metal upon metal.

It was the jute mill of San Quentin prison.

Men lived in that terrible racket—yes, and died in it, too. Some had been there only a short time—five years or so—and some had been there all their lives. Day in, day out, they spent their existences in the mill, becoming less like human beings and more like brute beasts as time rolled slowly by.

It was in these mills that Robert Graham worked. The crash of the machinery had been breaking his nerve for full six years, until the once progressive and ambitious broker's clerk was little more than a wreck.

At the end of the sixth year, he was in a pitiable state. His eyes were dull and hopeless, his shoulders drooped, and his hands, roughened and cut by the sharp jute strands that passed on their way to the rope-making machines, moved mechanically. He had ceased to be a man. He was a machine, like those monsters of shrieking metal around him.

The breaking point had to come, and it came with remarkable swiftness.

He was standing at the input end of the rope-maker one day, his fingers running along the unending strands feeling for crimps. He had been there, in just that same position, since breakfast time—three hours ago.

On and on went that eternal jute strip, but he was hardly conscious of it. A sudden hammering had started in his brain. It was loud and insistent, drowning the noise of the machinery.

He paid no attention to it, thinking that some new horror of noise had been introduced into the mill. Yet he was conscious of a tightening of his muscles and a tingling of his nerve-ends.

Then, without warning, he let out a cry, and flung himself full at the jute strip—fighting it, clawing at those tough strands as though they were an enemy whose throat he wanted to reach. He was gibbering like a maniac.

Starring
WALTER HUSTON,
PHILLIPS HOLMES
and
CONSTANCE CUMMINGS.

Another convict standing close by heard his shout and turned.

"Gosh!" he screamed. "Help me, somebody!" and leapt forward.

His hands closed on the unfortunate Robert Graham just as he was being dragged slowly into the intake of the machine. He fixed his fingers in the unfortunate man's clothing and dragged him clear.

Robert Graham fought like a madman, the last vestiges of his self-control gone. He bit and swore and kicked.

The convict who had saved him tried to calm him down.

"Easy now, big boy," he said between laboured breaths. "You'll do some damage in a minute."

Graham did not reply. He merely fought all the harder. There was only one thing left for the convict to do, and he did it. He swung his fist back, and sent it crashing home to the side of Graham's head.

Graham stiffened, a streak of blood coming from his mouth. He started backwards, his eyes wide with hate, then, with another awful cry that echoed and re-echoed across the mill, he slumped forward, and pitched clean on to his face.

The convict who had hit him stepped clear.

"Poor devil!" he said in a low voice to someone standing near. "This place had to get him. It gets them all in the end."

"Quiet!" said a voice. "The screws!"

Another Job.

TWO of the prison warders came up, and discovered what was the matter. They asked no questions and made no fuss; they were too familiar with happenings like this.

"Pick him up, two of you," said one of them. "Take him over to the hospital."

The convicts obeyed.

When Graham came to his senses, he found himself lying on a couch in the medical officer's surgery. He opened his eyes and stared round him wildly, suspicious of the unusual peace and quietness that pervaded the room.

He found himself staring up into the grey eyes of the medical officer himself. The doctor was stroking his beard thoughtfully, a grave expression on his face.

"Well, young fellow, how do you feel?" he asked.

Graham went on staring, hardly comprehending what was being said to him. Then he started to think coherently.

"I'm all right," he replied tonelessly.

"Sit up, and let me look."

Graham obeyed, and the doctor examined under the lids of his eyes. He sounded the convict's heart, and laid a gentle hand on the quivering body.

"Come over here and sit under the light," he said. Then, when Graham obeyed: "Try to look up with your eyes open."

Graham tried, and uttered an exclamation of pain as the glare from the overhead lamp smote upon his sensitive optic nerve.

The doctor nodded thoughtfully.

"You're in a bad state," he said quietly. "Where do you work? In the jute mills?"

Graham nodded.

"I thought so." He beckoned to the warder standing close by. "Take this man back to his cell. He is to be reried of duty for the day. I'll see the warden at once, and obtain an order for a change of occupation."

"Very good, sir," replied the warden, and went out, taking Graham with him.

The medical officer made a few notes on a pad lying on his desk, then left his surgery and made his way to the warden's office. He knocked at the door and entered.

The warden was seated in an arm-chair on the other side of the office, a towel round his neck. His face was lathered, and standing over him was one of the convicts, a keen razor in his hand.

"Who's that?" the warden snapped.

"Mc—Dr. Rinewulf."

"Come right in, doc," replied the warden. "Sit yourself down somewhere. I'll be through in a minute." He looked up at the convict standing over him. "Get on with it," he said calmly.

The convict bent over him and started the shaving. The warden felt the steady sweep of the razor over his face, and nodded appreciatively.

"You've handled a razor before," he remarked. "You do it darned well, too. How long are you in for?"

"Life," was the short reply.

"That's tough," said the warden. "What for?"

"Slitting a guy's throat," said the convict, starting to shave under the warden's chin.

The warden laughed.

"Well, don't slit mine," he said easily. "It'll only make more work for the doctor there."

The convict finished his work, and departed. The warden wiped his face, and crossed the room to where the doctor was sitting. He looked with amusement at the doctor's face, which was bathed heavily in sweat.

"Hot?" he asked.

The doctor mopped his forehead.

"You're a cool one, Brady," he said. "That man might have slit you from ear to ear, yet you never so much as turned a hair."

Brady grinned hugely, shaking his head.

"Not him," he said. "Those trusties are all right. They know what's best for them." His grin broadened. "When I tell you that I think I recognise the man, and that it was me who sent him here when I was district attorney, you'll see that he's as safe as a railway." He slipped into his jacket, that had been hanging on the back of a chair, and sat down at his desk. "Well, doc, what's bothering you?"

The doctor cleared his throat.

"I have just been examining a young man who collapsed in the jute mill, and I would rather like you to take a look at him," he said. "He's a good type of fellow, and I think he has possibilities, but the mill is dragging him down. Will you see him?"

Warden Brady looked at the doctor admiringly.

"What I like about you, doc, is the interest you take in the men in your charge," he said pleasantly. "Yes, I'll see him. Have him sent up."

"Thanks so much," said the doctor; "I will. My idea is that he needs a change of occupation—something out of doors, if you know what I mean."

"O.K. I'll do my best. Shoot him along."

The doctor went away, and in about half an hour the captain of the guard appeared in the doorway. His name was Gleason, and he had a hard, merciless look in his eyes that made him hated by every convict in the prison.

"No. 159 to see you," he said in a voice that was cold and relentless. July 4th, 1931.

"Doctor Rinewulf said you were interviewing him."

Brady, still seated at his desk, looked up from his papers.

"Bring him in," he said. "And when he's here, get out. I'll speak to him alone."

Gleason hesitated and withdrew. He never liked the idea of the warden seeing men alone. They might start trouble—or worse, they might make complaints against Gleason concerning some of his unreported brutalities.

Convict No. 159 was shown in. Warden Brady looked him over, and decided that he rather liked this young-looking prisoner with the clean-cut face and the tall bearing. Even prison life had not spoilt him entirely. He was clean all through.

Brady went to his card-index cabinet, and produced No. 159's record. He took it to his desk and sat down.

"Your name is Robert Graham?" he said.

"Yes."

"In for manslaughter—fourteen years. H'm!" Brady's eyes flickered over the man before him thoughtfully. "I seem to remember you. Let me think, now. Oh, yes, I remember. It was I who put you here, wasn't it?"

"Yes."

"Got mixed up in a quarrel in a café. Some guy insulted the girl you were with, and you crowned him with a bottle. Manslaughter proven." Brady shrugged his shoulders. "Well, son, you had it coming to you. If anyone'd insulted my girl, I'd have done the same thing, I expect; then I'd have been where you are now. That's how things are in life." His eyes came to rest on Graham's face. "The doc's seen you, and says you can't stand the jute mill. Is that right?"

"Yes," said Graham in the same dull voice. "I hate it."

"So do they all, but some are tougher than others," replied Brady evenly.

"Well, Graham, you look the sort of guy that deserves a change. You've kept out of trouble, and that's more than most of them can do. Can you drive a car?"

"Yes." The tone was a little more cheerful—a little more certain. As Brady had found in the past, humanity pays.

"Got any grudge against me for putting you here?"

"No."

"All right. You are relieved of all duty for five days, and will report to the doc. for hospital treatment. When you're better, you'll come back here and be my chauffeur. All right?"

For the first time for years, Graham's eyes began to glow. The end of the jute mill had come, and he was to have a decent occupation.

"Thank you, sir," he began fervently. Brady snorted in annoyance.

"If you say that again, I'll put you back in the mill," he said roughly.

"No man has to thank me. There's no obligation on either side. You have a job to do, and you'll do it properly. I also have a job to do, and I'll do it the way I think. Now get out."

"But—" protested Graham, wanting to express his gratitude.

"Get out!" roared Brady.

Graham got out. It was the safest thing to do.

The Escape That Failed.

WARDEN BRADY made a point of having as many good men on his personal staff as possible. It saved him doing things for himself.

He selected men who had earned the "trusty" badge, which meant that they were of proven good behaviour, and could be relied upon to get on with their work, and not harbour thoughts of escape.

Graham, in his capacity as chauffeur, had many opportunities of leaving the walls of San Quentin behind him, but he never availed himself of them. He was too busy winning back for himself his self-respect and faith in life.

Other "trusties" on Brady's staff were Galloway, a tall, powerfully-built, and evil-looking ex-gangster, who acted as butler; three clerks who worked in the office; and a man named Fales, who looked after the gardens. There was the barber, too, who acted as valet in addition.

Graham's duties were light. When Brady wanted to go in to the railroad station, or when something was wanted from the adjacent town, it was Graham who took the car there and back.

About a week after Graham had got his job, Brady sent for him. He reached Brady's office, to find his boss looking quite human for once. He was wearing a white flower in his button-hole, and his usually stern and immovable face was relaxed in a smile.

"Graham," he said, "I want you to go down to the station for me. I'm hung up by the prison commission, who are waiting downstairs. Meet the twelve-fifteen train, and pick up my daughter. She's on her way home from school."

"Yes, Mr. Brady," he replied, and went out.

He was at the station sharp on time, and the train drew in a few minutes after. He watched the alighting passengers with interest, wondering how it was he had never heard of Brady's daughter before. He explained it to himself by reflecting that Brady seldom talked about himself—he was not that sort of man.

A girl approached the car, and stopped.

"Are you from Mr. Brady, at San Quentin?" she asked.

Graham sprang out of the car with alacrity. Unlike Brady, she was beautiful, with a fresh complexion and frank blue eyes that seemed to be perpetually smiling.

"Yes, miss," he said.

"I'm Mary Brady," she went on. "Isn't father here to meet me?"

"No, miss," replied Graham. "He had to attend a meeting of the prison commission, and told me to explain."

"All right," she said. "Would you mind getting my grips?"

He obeyed, loading her luggage in the back of the car. She seated herself beside him, and within five minutes they were on their way back to the prison.

As he drove along the straight, flat road, he was conscious that she was looking at him with open curiosity, and somehow he felt a thrill at her presence. It was a long time since he had seen anyone so lovely as she was, and, his new job having softened him, he felt that there was nothing in the world that he would not do for her.

They were half-way towards the big steel gates before she spoke. Then she said:

"I haven't seen you before. Are you—?" She hesitated.

"Yes, miss, I am," he said quickly. "I haven't long had this job."

He could sense her sympathy.

"I'm sorry," she said. "You don't look the kind who makes a habit of coming to San Quentin. Was it an accident? Were you framed, or something?"

"No, I wasn't framed," he replied.

(Continued on page 17.)

The adventures of a fearless youngster and his harum-scarum friend, Huckleberry Finn. Mark Twain's famous story as a film.

Jackie Coogan

"TOM" IN "SAWYER"

Tom and Huckleberry Finn.

A ROUND-FACED boy of fourteen frowned over his task—the covering of jam-jars for his Aunt Polly. Of course, he ought to be pleased to do anything to help his aunt, because the kindly old soul had undertaken the upbringing of the three orphaned children of her dead sister, and she had been thorough. Too thorough sometimes when she used the birch, though she always said it hurt her more than Tom.

Tom's sister Mary was sixteen, and a model of virtue and kindness, and yet though she was so good and helpful Aunt Polly had to admit that Tom was her favourite, in spite of the fact that he was the "wickedest-ever." Sid was eight, very studious, clean, but labelled as a "toll-tale." Tom frowned this glorious sunny day because he hated jam-jars, and he wanted to go fishing with his buddy, Huckleberry Finn. A startled look came to the blue eyes as he heard the hoot of an owl.

"Fancy an owl at this time of the day," Aunt Polly, busy with a rolling-pin, peered over her spectacles; her sharp eyes studied Tom, because she was ever on the watch for mischief. "Don't go sticking your fingers into the jam, Tom."

"No, aunt," meekly answered Tom, and tried to peer out of the window—Huckleberry had given him the signal.

"Sid tells me you were out yesterday with Huckleberry Finn," Aunt Polly gave the dough a vigorous punch. "Must you bring grey hairs to my head by associating with the son of the village black sheep?"

Sid, in a neat velvet suit, gave his brother an anxious glance round the edge of a book—Tom would swear vengeance—and Mary shook her curls because, though she was a good girl, she hated tale-telling.

"May I go out and play, aunt?" Tom asked as he finished the last jam-jar.

"Well, I have some more that should be done." Aunt Polly peered over her spectacles and saw his dismal look. "All right, go out and play; but don't go with that there Huckleberry." Tom had grabbed up an old straw hat and was already out of the door. His aunt shook her head. "I never did see the like of that boy!"

Down near the banks of the river Tom found his friend. Huckleberry was a year older, his clothes were in rags, his face dirty, and he was smoking a corn cob pipe. One brace supported ragged trousers, his flannel shirt was in tatters, his straw hat was a disgrace, and yet the grin on his lean face won your heart. His father never bothered about the boy, and Huckleberry usually slept under a hedge or in a barn at nights, and was always playing truant from school. A tall, thin youngster against whom all mothers warned their children, and did not appreciate that Huckleberry, for all his grime, had his heart in the right place.

"Say, what you got in there?" Tom pointed to a sack.

"Dead cat," was the answer. "Bough him from a boy down at the slaughter house for an old knife. Cats is mighty good for warts."

"Playing with frogs brings warts," answered Tom. "What's your way of curing warts, Huck?"

"You got to go to the graveyard at midnight," Huckleberry was very serious. "You got to go there after someone wicked has been buried. At midnight a devil will come, and you heave the cat at him and say: 'Devil follow corpse, eat follow devil, wart follow cat, I'm done with ye!' That'll fetch any wart. They buried Hoss Williams, the worst rascal in years, on Saturday, and—"

"But to-day is Monday."

"Devils don't slosh around much on Sundays," argued Huck. "Are you game to try it out to-night?"

"I ain't afeard," cried Tom. "You meow and I'll meow back."

"Don't keep me meowing round too long," grumbled Huckleberry. "Last time old Hays went throwing rocks at me and shouting: 'Dern that cat!' and I love a brick through his window—but don't you tell!"

"I'll meow quiet," decided Tom. "Aunt Polly sleeps with one ear open. Let's go fishing, Huck."

Arm in arm the two made their way towards the banks of the Mississippi.

What Happened in the Churchyard.

TOM had a happy knack of always getting into trouble. One bright day he decided that crab-apples would be had for the tender digestion of Sid, and so the apples disappeared. Now it happened that Sid was accusing Tom of taking them when Aunt Polly appeared and wanted to know what all the argument was about, then who should come along the road but the doctor's wife.

"Where are your manners, Tom?" reproved his aunt. "Take off your hat at once, sir!"

Tom obeyed, and out tumbled the crab-apples from their hiding-place. When his aunt recovered from her anger she ordered Tom to whitewash the fence.

What a day of woe faced Tom! But his brain was keen, and he did the whitewashing with such gusto and evident enjoyment that boys who came to watch and jeer begged to be allowed to try their skill. By the time the fence was finished—in record time—Tom had collected a kite, a kitten, a jew's harp, some marbles, a dog-collar, a key, a dog's tooth, a bat skin and other treasures.

His next adventure was to fall in love. The school had a new pupil in demure Becky Thatcher, and her smile, curling ringlets of fair hair and pretty Jackie Coogan as Tom Sawyer. On right, Aunt Polly (Clara Blandick) has a few words to say to Tom when she finds out how Sid (Jackie Searl) lost his crab apples. They were inside Tom's hat.

(Continued on page 16.)

Tom has traps for girls, but until the arrival of Thatcher. He does work with his cat school in order to be the punishment of being with the girls.

Joe Harper (Dick Winslow) is incensed because Tom jeers at his smart clothes. The boys have a great fight, but afterwards become friends.

Tom builds castles in the air, and the chief people in those castles are the Prince and Princess. Tom is always rescuing his Becky from dragons.

Tom goes with Hank churchyard and they a brutal murder. Tom so scared that they that they must never of what they have seen overhears the town dis the crime—the wrong has been arrested

In the midst of the morning service the run-aways return, and afterwards receive a well-deserved hiding.

Tom tells the truth at the trial, and Muff Potter (Tully Marshall) is acquitted. He is seen kissing Tom's hand, whilst Becky again recognises Tom as her hero.

has says liked the but ever seriously the anal of Becky her. I does deadly with catapult at and near to be given punishment of 'siting while the girls'

Tom gets the desired punishment and sits beside Becky, who does not seem to mind Tom using her slate to write his messages. On right they are seen plighting their troth.

Back the they mess
er. The are they hide break om are seeing wrong n arrested

Worried by the murder, and because Becky is angry with him enables Tom to persuade Huckleberry Finn and Joe Harper to run away to Jackson's Island and play at pirates.

The school are taken for a treat to some old caves. There is a tea fight outside in honour of Tom Sawyer, who is all dressed up for the occasion. Later they go into the caves and Tom gets lost with Becky.

They meet Injun Joe, the real murderer, and see him with a casket of treasure. The half-breed chases them and falls down a fissure to his death. Huckleberry Finn finds them and leads them back to safety.

"TOM SAWYER."

(Continued from page 13.)

clothes won his heart. It was considered a terrible degradation to have to sit with the girls. The teacher knew the power of the birch, but to sit a boy amongst the girls was worse than a caning.

There was a vacant place on the form next to Becky. Tom got busy with his catapult and pieces of hard paper. The teacher, with a fiendish grin, ordered Tom to sit with the girls, and the whole school gasped and Becky blushed when Tom eagerly went and sat beside her.

The love affair made such rapid progress that after school they plighted their love by carving their names on a tree. Unfortunately Tom made a grave mistake when, in a moment of bravado, he mentioned that he had been "engaged" before to Amy Lawrence. Becky was angry, and when Tom explained that he did not care for Amy any more than Becky gave way to tears. The lovers were parted, and Tom went off vowing that he would never marry—not even if he lived to be a thousand.

That night, whilst thinking of his troubles as he lay in bed, he heard the meow of a cat. Almost had he forgotten about Huckleberry Finn and the cure for warts.

Without disturbing the sleeping Sid he dressed and cautiously climbed out of the window. He meowed softly and slithered to the ground down a drain-pipe. Like shadows the two boys stole towards the churchyard.

A faint wind moaned through the trees, and Tom shivered. The boys spoke seldom and then under their breath. Near the grave of the bad man were three elms, and when Huckleberry clambered up into the branches Tom was not long after him.

"Hucky, do you believe the dead people like it for us to be here?"

"I wish I knowed," whispered his buddy. "It's awful solemn like, ain't it?"

The hooting of a distant owl made them start, the wind seemed to get up, and the branches to form themselves into strange shapes and shadows. Just when the boys thought nothing was going to happen Tom clutched at Huckleberry's ragged sleeve and pointed. At the far end of the churchyard was a moving light.

"It's the devils, sure enough," Huck whispered after a while. "Three of 'em. Oh, Tom, I guess we're goners!"

The light came closer, and the quaking boys saw that there were three men.

"They're humans," muttered Huckleberry, vastly relieved. "Look, it's Muff Potter, Dr. Robinson, and Injun Joe—that murderin' half-breed. Why for they come here?"

Then the boys witnessed a drama so bloodcurdling that almost they thought it was a nightmare. These men had come to rob the graveyard, and Dr. Robinson was the ringleader. The doctor was not liked, and was something of a mystery. The work was almost done when Potter and Injun Joe began to demand their money, and when the doctor refused till the task was completed a quarrel ensued.

The boys saw Potter and Dr. Robinson milling round, and gasped when the doctor felled the older man with a spade, and they nearly gave themselves away when Injun Joe, knife in hand, crept up behind the doctor and stabbed him with a knife that Muff Potter had dropped when the fight first started.

But the villainy did not end there. Injun Joe stooped over the two motionless figures and placed the knife in the hands of Muff Potter. He chuckled fiendishly when his task was done, and calmly seated himself on a barrow to await the return to consciousness of his companion.

The moon went behind a blanket of clouds, and the two boys slithered down the tree and ran for dear life.

"Tom, we got to keep mum," Huckleberry told his friend after a long discussion on the murder. "That Injun devil wouldn't think any more of drownin' us or cutting our throats than he would a couple of cats. We got to swear to keep mum—we got to swear on our blood."

They pricked their thumbs, and on a piece of old parchment wrote the following:

"Huck Finn and Tom Sawyer swears they will keep mum about this, and they wish they may drop dead in their tracks if they ever tell and rot."

When Tom crept in at the bed-room window he thought the gentle-snoring Sid was asleep, but Sid was very much awake. When Tom awoke after appalling nightmares, Sid was dressed and gone, and his Aunt Polly appeared and lectured him on the evil of stealing out at nights. A flogging Tom could have stood, but when the old lady began to cry, Tom felt mighty like tears himself.

What with losing Becky, the murder and this trouble with his aunt decided Tom that life was a mighty miserable thing. When he got to school his cup of misery was complete, because the prized jew's harp that he had given Becky was reposing on his desk.

(Continued on page 27.)

The three chief characters: Jackie Coogan (Tom Sawyer), Mitzl Green (Becky), Junior Durkin (Huckleberry Finn).

July 4th, 1931.

"THE CRIMINAL CODE."

(Continued from page 12.)

"I deserved it. Lost my temper, and—well, the man died."

"What a relief you are!" she exclaimed. "They all say they're innocent as a rule!" She paused, thinking. "How long are you going to be here for?"

"Another eight years, less remission," he said.

"Good!" Her gladness was quite open and unashamed. "I rather like you. I certainly feel safer with you than—"

She stopped suddenly. Above the noise of the engine came the scream of the prison siren.

"What's that?" she said quickly—almost nervously.

"Someone's making a break for it," said Graham grimly, and slammed on his brakes.

The prison was less than a quarter of a mile away, and the siren's awful din swept over the countryside like some cry of agony. Almost immediately afterwards was heard the sharp, staccato rattle of machine-guns.

It lasted a bare minute, then died away. Graham remained where he was, listening. A full five minutes passed before he spoke.

"What do you want to do?" he then said. "Go on, or wait until all the danger is over?"

"I'll go on," she said. "And please hurry. My father might be hurt, or something."

Graham slammed in the gears, and pressed hard on the accelerator. The car shot forward in a cloud of dust.

"Who Killed Runch?"

THE scene back at the prison was serious. Two men had tried to get away, and the news was already spreading like wild-fire that they had been caught because someone had squealed. The guards, waiting for the squealer's story to be verified by actual happenings, had bided their time until the two convicts were in the act of climbing over the cockhouse roof and so on to the wall behind, and had then ordered them to surrender.

The convicts were reluctant. Freedom seemed too near. So Gleason ordered his machine-gunners to persuade them.

Streams of bullets had ripped into the stonework at the escaping convicts' feet, and they had surrendered. But the other convicts—and there were more than a thousand of them—knew the inner secret of what had happened, and word began to pass round swiftly.

"Runch squealed! Someone must get him!"

When Graham and Mary reached the warden's private gate, they found the guard on it doubled. Graham, not knowing what had happened, left Mary in the car while he made inquiries.

"Is it safe to bring Miss Brady in?" he asked.

"I guess so," replied the guard. "You'd better go straight to the warden's office, though. There's trouble brewing."

Graham took her there, and found Brady pacing up and down in agitation, his hands behind his back and a dead cigar in his mouth. He greeted Mary abstractedly, and sent her straight to her room. Graham waited for further orders.

The door opened, and Gleason entered.

"I've got Runch outside," he announced.

"Bring him in," said Brady abruptly. He appeared to have forgotten that Graham was still present. "I'll talk to him."

Gleason went out, and presently returned with a cringing, quivering life-sentence man.

"Well?" Brady demanded, looking at him with contempt. "What do you want?"

Runch crossed the office in a series of short, jerky hops, and caught Brady by the hand. Fear was written on every line of his craven face.

"They're after me, warden," he squeaked. "It was me who told about the two who tried to escape, and the others have threatened to kill me."

"Who?" said Brady quickly, a glint in his eye.

"I don't know. Someone scratched a message on the wall outside my cell." For a moment he swayed as though he would collapse. "They'll get me! I know they will! Do something, warden—send me away from here!"

Brady looked at Gleason sharply. "Is what he says true?"

"Yes," replied Gleason. "But for him, the other two would have been missing for good."

Brady shifted his eyes back to Runch with distaste. He disliked a squealer; at the same time, by law, it was the duty of every convict to report a projected escape.

"All right," he said. "I'll make a report to the commission and have you removed. Meanwhile you'll work in this office as one of my clerks. That'll keep you out of danger for the time being."

Gleason nudged Runch from behind. "Come on," he said. "Go and get your kit and move into the trusties block."

Runch was about to turn away, when a noise came from the exercise-yard. It started softly at first, and gradually swelled in volume until it was almost deafening.

"What's that?" he said in sudden fear.

"They're yammering," said Gleason; "and if you don't know what that is by now you ought to."

The sound seemed to get louder and louder, until a thousand powerful voices were raised in a long-drawn-out "Ah-h-h-h!"

Gleason went to the window and looked down.

"I'll soon settle them," he grated harshly. "Half a dozen machine-guns will darn quickly quieten them down. They're doing that to cover up something, and it's got to stop!"

He made for the door, but Brady's

"Look out," he shouted, "or you will hit Gleason!"

incisive voice cut through the yammering and checked him.

"Cut that out, Gleason!" he said quickly. "You can't do anything with tommy-guns, short of murdering every man in the place. I'll handle this." He saw Graham standing on the other side of the room. "Stay here with Runch, Graham. I'll be back."

He and the head guard hurried from the room, and Graham stood waiting, listening to the awful din from the exercise-yard. Suddenly the door leading to the warden's private quarters opened, and someone entered the office. It was Galloway, Brady's convict butler.

"The warden wants you in the yard," he said, his black eyes glinting from his bullet-like head. "Get going—he's in a hurry. I'll look after Runch."

Graham obeyed, leaving the door open behind him. Galloway waited until his footsteps had died away on the stone floor outside, and then crossed and shut it. When he turned a knife was in his hand. Its broad blade gleamed evilly.

"Well, Runch," he said slowly, "we've got you! You know the code, don't you? Any one of us who squeals has to die."

Runch, taken by surprise, did not even cry out. The shock of the way in which he had been trapped left him bereft of speech. His eyes stared as Galloway walked slowly towards him, the knife held low.

He began to back away, his hand to his quivering mouth. A whimper escaped his lips.

"No—no!" he whined. "Not that! I didn't mean—"

He felt himself against an open doorway, and backed through it, turning to run. Galloway's hand lifted sharply, and a flash of light gleamed for a fraction of a second between the two men. It was the knife, thrown with deadly precision.

"Gosh!" screamed Runch in agony. "It's in my back! You've got me! You've—"

His voice died away as he stumbled forward. There was a thud as he fell. A minute later Graham opened the door leading from the prison corridor and stepped inside.

"He didn't want me, Galloway—" he began, and stopped.

The office was empty. Everything was deathly quiet. Even the yammering had died down.

"Runch!" he called sharply. Brady's footsteps sounded in the corridor outside. He thrust past Graham, and strode into the room, saying nothing; but there was a look in his eyes which told clearly that he already knew what had happened.

He crossed to the far door and flung it open. For a full minute he stood looking inside, then slowly he turned to Graham.

"Graham," he said deliberately, "who killed Runch?"

Third Degree.

IN a flash Graham realised the whole situation. He knew what had happened, and he knew who the killer was. He also knew that, by the law of the criminal, he could not squeal.

Brady waited for his answer, but it did not come. Brady, too, knew the law of the criminal, and he knew that he was face to face with it now. He had every sympathy with the rotten position Graham was in, but he had to do his job, and, by heck, he was going to do it!

"Come on now, Graham!" he said. "Who did it?"

July 4th, 1931.

Graham hesitated no longer.

"I don't know," he lied.

"All right, Graham," Brady said. "I know what's on your mind—you don't want to squeal on a fellow-convict. I'll put my question another way. Who was it told you to leave this room?"

Graham returned his gaze fearlessly.

"Sorry," he said, "I can say nothing."

Brady stood before him, savagely chewing the cigar that was stuck in the corner of his mouth. Suddenly he turned away, and sat down at his desk. His face was stern—unrelenting. It was a face of a man who had a battle before him, and who was going to fight it to the last ditch.

"Listen to me, Graham," he said, and as he spoke he hammered on the desk with his fist to emphasise the words. "You are keeping silent because of some notion that it's not right to squeal on a fellow-crook. That's the criminal code; but there's one code which is stronger—the code of law and order. The State demands that you shall do everything in your power to help me find out who committed this murder." He half rose from his chair. "Come on now, who did it? Who did it? I order you to tell me!"

The tension in the room was terrible. Beads of sweat began to stand out on Graham's brow, but not for one moment did he waver.

"Again, warden, I'm sorry," he said. "I can't!"

"No?" Warden Brady slumped back in his chair, and regarded Graham steadily. "You are a fool, Graham," he said; "and you will see why in a minute."

He picked up a paper from his desk and tapped it significantly.

"For the last time, will you tell me?"

"For the last time—no!"

"Very well." Slowly Brady unfolded the paper and held it up for Graham to see. "Here's the position. When you were brought to me a few weeks ago by Dr. Rinewulf, I weighed you up pretty thoroughly, and I decided that you were the kind of man who ought not to serve his full sentence. There was a meeting of the prison commission to-day, and I put it forward that you should have your release on parole. The commission gave me a release warrant, and this is it."

He paused significantly.

"Are you still of the same mind now?"

The silence that followed was deep and penetrating. Graham stood before Brady's desk, his eyes glowing dully, his position clearly before him. Brady's meaning was obvious. Either confess, or the parole warrant was not going to operate.

What could Graham do? He was not of the criminal world—never had been. The crime which had put him in prison was that of manslaughter, the striking down of a fellow human in sudden rage.

It was a thing that might have happened to anybody.

What made the present position worse was that a new factor had entered into Graham's life only that day. For the first time in his existence he had met a woman to whom he wanted to devote the whole of his life. It was the warden's daughter, Mary Brady.

Liberty was to his hand. All he needed to do was to give the name of Galloway as the murderer of Runch, and he could walk out of San Quentin a free man. He would be able to start life anew, perhaps with a woman such as Mary by his side. And he couldn't speak. The unwritten code of the wrongdoer bound him irrevocably.

He had to decide at once. Brady's last question had been—was he still of the same mind? There was only one answer he could give—

"Yes," he said tonelessly. "I'm still of the same mind."

Brady took the cigar out of his mouth and flung it across the room. He stood up, and, with his hands behind his back, paced back and forth. Suddenly he swung round, facing Graham once more.

"I like you, Graham," he said more quietly, "and I want to do the right thing by you. You're in a jam, and so am I. Your silence is going to mean a cancellation of this parole warrant, and failure to discover the murderer of Runch will put me in queer with the State Governor." He pointed dramatically to the door behind which the body of Runch lay. "Think tho thing out along these lines," he went on. "There's a man lying in there, stiff and cold. He's got a knife in his back, and the least that could be said for him is that he was worthless. He was an habitual criminal, and the world is well rid of him. I'm not saying that out of irreverence for the dead—I'm just facing facts. That's the man you are going to throw away a chance of freedom for. You are going to jeopardise the whole of your future life and happiness for some skunk who wasn't worth two cents. Come now, Graham, be reasonable over this. The exchange is a bad one, and you know it."

He paused, expecting Graham to reply, but Graham stood there in silence. It was apparent that he did not intend to speak.

Brady went up to him, his patience suddenly breaking down. He gripped him by the revers of his jacket, and shook him like a terrier shakes a rat.

"You will drive me crazy in a minute, Graham!" he shouted angrily. "I thought you were a man of some intelligence, who would play the game by you, but it seems that I was mistaken. Well, I'm through with trying to reason with you. So far I have spoken to you as man to man. Now I will speak to you as prison warden to convict. Who killed Runch? Answer me! Who was the man you left in this room alone with him?"

"I won't tell you," persisted Graham. "I can't!"

"You are being obstinate," cried Brady, "but I will darn soon break that obstinacy down. I will give you one minute to tell me the murderer's name, and if you don't you will go into solitary confinement for thirty days. Now think, and think hard!"

He released Graham and walked over to the window. Deliberately he took his watch out of his pocket, and held it in front of him, his eyes riveted on the second-hand. Slowly the hand made one complete revolution.

Brady thrust the watch back into his pocket, and, without another word, crossed to a door and flung it open.

"Gleason," he shouted, "come here!"

Gleason appeared in the doorway. Brady turned and pointed at Graham.

"Thirty days solitary," he said incisively, "but if he wants to see me at any time, bring him back here."

Gleason nodded and crossed to Graham's side.

"Come on!" he said.

Graham shrugged his shoulders. It was no more than he expected. With dragging footsteps he walked out of the room.

(Continued on page 26.)

A daring young cowboy sets out to win a rodeo and his employer's daughter, but through jealousy of the ranch foreman, he loses the former and after a terrific struggle wins the better prize.

"WILD WEST WHOOPEE"

Starring
JACK
PERRIN.

The New Hand.

THERE was trouble on the rancho of old Cap Rogers, late of the U.S. Cavalry, and now one of the wealthiest cattle-barons south of the Yosemite Valley.

There had been trouble in that section of the grazing country ever since his daughter Ginger had cut her first tooth and displayed to the eyes of her fond but harassed parent her first crop of carrotty hair.

Ginger was now nineteen, and her hair was of a still more fiery hue. It was the crowning glory of a small, slender figure, a pink-and-white complexion and a pretty face.

"Young woman," said old Cap Rogers, "I want you to understand once an' for all that I won't have you hangin' around with this no-account cow-hand Logan. So I'm packin' you off to Carson City, up in Nevada, to stay with your Aunt Emma for a spell."

Ginger looked at him appealingly, and the expression in her blue eyes was well-nigh irresistible.

"Oh, dad," she appealed, "not before the rodeo. You know I'm dying to see it. Promise not to send me to Carson City until then."

Her father wavered, and gradually his sternness of mien vanished. He would have been the last to admit it, but when Ginger looked at him with those big blue eyes of hers she could generally twist him around her little finger.

"All right, then," he agreed. "But remember—you're leavin' for Carson after the rodeo."

Ginger smiled happily, tugged the strings of his necktie with a sudden, saucy gesture, and then ran off towards one of the corrals, where a tall, handsome youngster was swinging himself out of the saddle of a white pinto.

With pursed lips Cap Rogers strode back in the direction of the ranch-house; but, passing a barn en route to the trim dwelling, he was accosted by his foreman, a lynx-eyed individual by the name of Smoky King, and after some conversation on business affairs King indicated a group of punchers lounging near the bunk-house.

One of them was strumming on a guitar, and the others were singing the chorus of a favourite ballad of the cow-camps. Smoky King regarded them sourly.

"I reckon them hombres ain't gonna make much of a show at the big rodeo in town, boss," he observed. "I'll take a bet that this outfit don't finish up with any prizes to its credit, anyways."

"I guess you're right, King," Cap Rogers murmured.

The foreman turned his head, and with the movement caught sight of Ginger and the youngster who had dismounted from the white pinto. That youngster was the same Jim Logan who had roused Cap Rogers' resentment by his friendship with Ginger.

King's face took on an ugly expression as he saw that they were holding each other's hands.

"Boss," he drawled, "I don't like to interfere in your personal affairs. But it seems to me that that new hand Logan is payin' a heap too much attention to Ginger. You only signed him on a day or two back, but you'd think he had some kinda claim on the girl the way he acts."

Old man Rogers followed his foreman's brooding glance, and glared at the young couple.

"Yeah?" he ground out, his temper rising again. "Well, you leave him to me." And he stamped towards the corral beside which Jim Logan and Ginger were standing.

Jim Logan was a bronzed, good-looking specimen of the great South-West. He let go of Ginger's hands and greeted the rancher genially as the latter came up.

"Oh, howdy, Cap?" he said. "Don't 'Cap' me," Rogers retorted angrily. "You're fired! D'ye hear? An' the quicker I see your back, the better I'll like it."

Jim stared at him in bewilderment.

"Fired!" he echoed. Then, in a tone of protest: "But you can't fire me, Cap," he said. "Leastways, not until you've given me a try-out. When you signed me up that was the stipulation."

"Well," the Cap declared savagely, "I'll give you a try-out." And, turning, he called out in a loud voice to the men lounging by the bunk-house.

"Hey, some o' you hombres," he shouted. "Bring Lightning outa his stall!"

"Lightning, dad!" gasped Ginger, as two or three hands ran to obey her father's command. "That killer!"

"Yeah, Lightning," the old man growled. "I want horsemen on this outfit, not lady-killers. An' if this guy Logan can't ride him he's no use to me."

The brone in question was led to the corral. He looked restive, and his eye was bloodshot and wicked. Bred among the wild herds that had roamed the plains since the days of the early Spanish settlers, he was viciousness personified whenever human burden attempted to straddle his sleek back. No man had ever stayed on him for long, and many who had matched their skill against his dynamic ferocity had counted themselves fortunate to escape with broken limb or trampled ribs.

"Jim," Ginger panted, "don't ride him!"

The tall young puncher looked down on her smilingly. "He looks pretty tough," he said, "but don't worry. I can take care of myself."

The wild brone was already being saddled. He quivered as he felt the girth-strap tightening around his belly, but strong hands held his head till Jim Logan had swung himself astride.

The mustang was released, the men who had brought him from the stall springing away and leaping to the fence, which was already lined with expectant cow-hands. Next instant Jim Logan was battling with one of the worst animals it had ever been his experience to ride.

Stored up inside that bronc's hide there was a natural reserve of fury which was cyclonic in its outburst. The cow-hands accentuated it in the usual way by firing off their six-guns and whooping shrilly, and for the next two or three minutes pandemonium raged.

The wild bronc circled the corral in a series of frenzied jumps. Back arched, head and haunches down, hoofs drawn together and legs rigid, he strove fiendishly to throw his rider from the saddle. But Jim kept his seat, and even seemed to enjoy the dangerous duel, for, snatching off his sombrero, he slapped it lustily against the animal's flank.

The onlookers began to realise that they were watching a youngster whose horsemanship was a delight to behold, even for men living in a country where rough-riding was a normal accomplishment. Excitement and admiration mingled in their tones as they yelled uproariously, and, his antipathy towards Jim forgotten for the moment, Cap Rogers shouted as loudly as any.

"Gee, dad! Isn't he great!" It was the thrilled voice of Ginger, and it recalled to the old man the circumstances under which he had ordered Jim Logan to ride the wild bronc.

"No!" he snapped angrily, and for the remainder of the duel 'twixt man and beast he was a silent, glowering figure.

The bronc continued his desperate efforts to unhorse Jim, but failed signally, and, lathered and blown, his temper was steadily curbed. He was beginning to realise that he had found his master, and a little while later he came to a meek standstill in the middle of the corral.

Jim dismounted amid a shower of congratulations, to which the foreman, Smoky King, did not lend his voice. Nor did old Cap Rogers join in the applause.

"Well, Cap," said Jim with a grin, "any time you want another goat exercised, jest let me know."

The rancher chewed at the end of a cigar.

"You can ride, young feller," he admitted grudgingly, "an' this outfit can do with a hombre like you in the rodeo. But meantime—keep away from my daughter."

The Rodeo.

A BUCKBOARD rolled over the trail that led to town. Cap Rogers plied the reins and Smoky King sat alongside him. Ginger occupied a seat just behind the two men.

About forty or fifty paces in the rear of the vehicle rode the cow-hands, with Jim Logan well to the fore, and between the latter and the girl in the buckboard signs were continually passing.

Jim had not been permitted to talk to Ginger throughout the journey, but had found this means of communicating a suggestion that she should share his saddle, and as the girl nodded eagerly he suddenly spurred forward and dashed abreast the buckboard.

Ginger stood up. Jim reached forth one strong arm and lifted her bodily, perching her safely in front of him. Next moment, and before Cap Rogers or Smoky King realised what had happened, he and Ginger were galloping ahead.

A shout escaped the old rancher as he saw them, and he whipped up his team angrily, shouting to the rest of his hands to follow him and give pursuit. But Jim's white pinto, Starlight July 4th, 1931.

by name, showed the rest of the cavalcade his hoofs, and fifteen minutes later he was out of sight, in spite of the fact that he was carrying a double burden.

Some time afterwards, Cap Rogers lit town in a smother of dust and a dangerous mood, and when he had disposed of the buckboard he and Smoky King stamped off through the throng that crowded the vicinity of the stadium where the annual rodeo was to be held.

The stadium was a regular Mecca for the foremost ropers and riders of California, and already some magnificent feats of horsemanship were being performed in the arena. But, raging around the chutes where the steers and the wild broncs were lodged, Cap Rogers had no eye for the events that were taking place. He was searching for Ginger.

He failed to locate her, however, and, giving up the quest at last, he settled his squat form on the top bar of a strip of fencing near the chutes. From that vantage point he watched husky cowmen matching their skill against mustang and steer, and he was engrossed in a display of fancy riding when someone pushed him mischievously and almost toppled him off the fence.

He swayed precariously, but with a frantic clutch saved himself from falling. Then he glared round and saw that the culprit was Ginger.

"You, huh?" he grated. "What did you mean by runnin' off with that ornery cow-hand? Where is Logan, anyway? I want to give him a piece o' my mind!"

"He's along at one of the chutes," Ginger said. "He's due to ride Dynamite in a few minutes—the fiercest bronc in the round-up!"

"I hope the critter busts his neck," snapped her father. "And, listen to me, young lady. It's you for Carson City the minute I—"

Ginger scrambled up beside him and stroked his cheek. He flung her hand away impatiently, but she slipped her arm around his shoulders, and his ire began to dwindle.

"Don't be angry with me, dad," she soothed.

"Young lady," he growled, "one day you're gonna make me lose my temper, an' then there'll be trouble!"

Meanwhile Jim Logan was standing with one or two of the other hands near Dynamite's chute, and the group was presently joined by Smoky King, who shot a vicious glance at Jim. The young puncher returned it coolly, well aware of the foreman's hostility, which had been marked ever since Ginger had first shown a partiality for the new hand's company.

"Reckon we better get that wild bronc saddled, Jim," observed one of the other men. "You'll be ridin' him any minute now."

"Okay," Jim answered. "Go ahead." The boys set to work, while Jim climbed to the top of the stall and watched operations. He took the measure of the horse, too—noting the ugly restlessness that he revealed as the saddle was thrown over his back, noting the rolling white eye that bore out the animal's reputation as a killer.

It might have served Jim better to keep his eye on Smoky King just then, but, at that early stage of his acquaintance with the foreman, the young puncher did not suspect the extent of King's villainy.

King was standing at the front of the chute, looking through the bars at the savage-tempered animal within, and suddenly he saw the girth-strap of the saddle dangling before his gaze. He paid no particular attention to that strap until all at once a sinister thought occurred to him, when he looked around to assure himself that no one was like, y to observe his actions.

The foreman slipped a clasp-knife from his pocket and opened it. Then, reaching a hand through the bars surreptitiously, he caught the cinch-buckle and drew the dangling strap towards him. The keen edge of the knife cut deep, almost severing the band of leather, but not quite. It would hold—for a spell, until the strain thrown on it by the wild bronc's plunges out in the arena finally proved too great.

The flap of the saddle effectively concealed King's dastardly handiwork, so that there was little chance of the flaw being discovered before the bronc was let out of the chute. In fact, only a second or two after the foreman had returned his knife to his pocket, one of the boys laid hold of the strap and fastened it by means of the buckle.

Poised on the top of the stall, Jim prepared to lower himself into the saddle of the restive animal, the boys shouting words of advice in the meantime.

"Careful, Jim! Easy, there, easy!"

Jim slipped astride the bronc cautiously. Next instant the chute was flung open, and the horse plunged forth, charging straight across the arena till it was close up against the far barrier of the parade ground. Then all at once it started to buck.

It took Jim five seconds to realise that the creature he was riding was true to its name. The mustang he had conquered at Cap Rogers' rancho had been fierce enough, but this pony had ten times more devil in him. He was concentrated fury.

Yet Jim did not look like coming off, and towards the end of a minute the crowds up in the stands were yelling encouragement. It was an uproar to which Ginger and Cap Rogers' ranch-hands lent their voices—all with the exception of Smoky King, who watched the upright figure of Dynamite's rider narrowly.

The seconds slipped by. King began to wonder if his knife had slashed deep enough, or if the half-severed leather was going to hold out against the strain after all. Then suddenly Dynamite's hind legs came up in a vicious kick, and simultaneously Jim Logan shot from his back and hurtled head foremost towards the fencing of the barrier.

His skull struck the woodwork with a smashing shock, and he fell to the ground in a crumpled heap. The wild bronc, rearing up wildly, brought his fore hoofs down on the cowboy's prone body. From thousands of throats there arose a shout of horror, from Ginger a shrill scream.

Two or three of the boys sprinted across the arena, and Dynamite was roped and dragged towards the chutes. Two more of the cow-hands from the Rogers ranch dashed to where Jim Logan lay.

From the stands it had looked as if Jim had taken a straight fall, but, running through a swirl of dust, the two men who were running towards the young puncher's body stumbled upon Dynamite's saddle and trappings. One of them picked it up and gave vent to an exclamation.

"The girth-strap bust!" he jerked. The other took hold of the leather, and then looked at his companion keenly. He had seen the straight white snick that had been ripped in the strap by a keen blade.

"Bust nothin'!" he ground out. "It's been cut!"

The Road to Carson City.

A WEEK had passed since Jim Logan's experience at the rodeo, and an ugly cut in his head had now quite healed, though he was still suffering a certain amount of stiffness as the result of bruises.

Jim reclined in a chair on the bunk-house veranda and allowed his mind to dwell on the incident. The fact that the girth-strap had been severed had not been withheld from him, and he had a pretty shrewd notion as to the identity of the culprit. But he was not the man to make accusations without definite proof, so he said nothing but thought plenty.

His reflections were interrupted by footfalls, and recognising Ginger by her step, he immediately leaned back in his chair limply, like a sick man. Ginger approached him sympathetically.

"How are you feeling, Jim?" she asked him.

"Oh, so-so, so-so," he murmured. "I always feel at my best when you're around, though."

Ginger looked solemn.

"In that case you're liable to have a relapso right away," she said. "Because dad's just told me that he's packing me off to my aunt 'way up in Carson City at once."

"What?" Jim exclaimed, sitting bolt upright.

"He's driving me to Fresno in the buckboard," Ginger told him, "and I'm taking the stage from there. Jim, I don't want to go. What are you going to do about it?"

He grinned at her.

"Do!" he echoed. "I'll tell you what I'm gonna do. I'm gonna marry you."

"Oh, Jim," she cried happily, "I knew you would!"

"Listen," he whispered. "After you leave here with your dad I'll saddle up Starlight. Somewhere on the Carson road the stage is gonna be held up—see? And you're gonna find yourself my prisoner—see? Then we'll elope. Is it a bet?"

She nodded quickly.

"You can count on me, Jim," she said.

At that moment her father's voice was heard calling her name, and Ginger hurried away to finish her packing. She had hardly disappeared when old Cap Rogers stamped into view, and, coming up to the bunk-house veranda, planted himself in front of the puncher.

"Where's my daughter?" he demanded.

"I saw her around a minute ago," Jim murmured.

The old man fixed him with a baleful eye.

"Well, let me tell you somethin', young feller," he announced. "You don't see her around any more. I'm sendin' her to Carson City to-day, an' she'll be well outa your way up there. I'm goin' to have no loafin' cow-hand makin' up to my little girl and turnin' her head. Get that!"

He marched off, and, having given orders for the buckboard plugs to be harnessed, was joined by Ginger at the ranch-house. He helped her up into the vehicle, and then, taking his position beside her, drove the ponies forward with a flick of the reins.

They picked up the Fresno road, and wheels powdered with the limestone of the rocky trail, finally ran into town as the stage was preparing to set out on its long trip.

"Clem," said old Cap Rogers to the driver, when he had bought Ginger's ticket, "my daughter is goin' along to Carson City with you. Take good care o' her for me, will you?"

"I will, sir," answered the driver. The old man handed him a cigar and then turned to Ginger affectionately.

"Reckon you're gonna miss your old dad, ain't you, honey?" he said, as she was on the point of climbing into the stage.

"Yes, dad," she answered, bestowing a kiss on him.

The Cap looked wistful.

"Reckon I'm gonna miss you, too," he mused.

"Then I won't go!" said Ginger eagerly; but with that her father grabbed her arm.

"Oh, yes, you will," he told her hastily. "Go on—get in there!"

Ginger obeyed him without protest. After all, she reflected, she was not going to Carson City. Before the coach had travelled many miles, Jim would be stopping it to take her a willing prisoner.

Had Ginger known what was afoot at the ranch just then she might have looked forward to the journey by stage with less satisfaction.

For just outside the bunk-house Smoky King and one of the hands were covering Jim Logan with their six-guns, having taken him completely by surprise.

"What's the idea?" Jim demanded, as he found himself looking into the barrels of the shooting-irons.

"I'm doin' this on behalf of the boss," Smoky King replied smugly. "You see, I happened to hear you arranging that little scheme o' yours with Ginger."

Jim bit his lip.

"Then why didn't you break the bad news to the Cap?" he demanded.

King's eyes narrowed shiftily.

"That's my business," he retorted.

"Come on," he added to the ranch-hand who was with him, "get his hands tied."

The cowboy obeyed him—not by any means willingly, for Jim was popular among the punchers—but orders were orders.

Jim's wrists were bound behind his back, and, once the youngster had been secured, King thrust his gun back into its holster. Then he spoke to his companion again.

"Keep an eye on him," he said, "an' see that he don't get away."

Even as the foreman uttered the words, Jim chanced to turn his head and see his pony Starlight near by. The horse was watching King and the other man, and in a flash Jim realised how the animal might assist him. For Starlight was no ordinary bronc. Training, and a natural sagacity, had given him qualities both of mind and body which would have been difficult to find in any other dumb creature.

Puckering up his lips, Jim gave vent to a shrill whistle, and the pony immediately responded to it. With a toss of his noble head, he began to trot forward, his steps quickening as he approached nearer, and all at once King and the other man realised that he was bearing down on them menacingly.

Panic seized King.

"Hey, what the—?" He rounded on Jim. "You tell that pinto to beat it, will yuh?"

Jim's answer was to shout a cheerful word of encouragement to Starlight, and the horse broke into a gallop. King backed in alarm. The man with him snatched up a stick, and, as Starlight dashed up in a smother of dust, he jabbed at the animal tentatively.

McGee whipped round, lifted his glance and uttered a cry.

Starlight rose on his hind legs, his fore-hoofs striking out at his attacker. The man dropped the stick, squealed and ran as fast as his feet could carry him to an out-house about fifty paces distant.

Starlight swerved towards Smoky King, who was crouching close to the bunkhouse wall. The foreman let out a terrified yell and dashed after the other fugitive with the pinto in full chase.

Both men plunged into the out-house and slammed the door behind them. Coming up a moment later, Starlight hammered against it with his iron-shod hoofs two or three times, each impact striking chill terror into the men within. Then he wheeled and galloped back to where Jim awaited him.

Jim turned his back towards the animal and held his bound hands against the horse's muzzle. Starlight's strong teeth fastened on the cords and tore at the knots, and a few seconds later the puncher was free.

He leapt into the saddle and with a pressure of the knees sent Starlight past the ranch-house at top speed, setting his course towards the north to pick up the Carson trail somewhere in the Sierras. He was almost clear of the Rogers outfit, when Smoky King and his companion plucked up sufficient courage to emerge from shelter.

King voiced a bellow of chagrin as he saw Jim riding over the plain, and, plucking out his six-gun, he blazed at the young puncher's flying figure. But his aim was bad and the shots went wide, and, a belt of chaparral swallowing the fugitive, the foreman saw him no more.

King returned his revolvers to the holster on his hip, and then, leaving the man whom he had pressed into his service, he made his way to a barn. From behind some bales of hay there he dragged forth a basket in which three or four carrier pigeons were crooning.

The foreman brought out one of the birds and attached to its leg a message he had written just before his attempt to make Jim Logan a prisoner. Then he released the feathered courier, and watched it circle above the ranch buildings for a moment ere finally winging its way northward in the direction of the hills.

King had claimed that he had been acting in Cap Rogers' interests when he had tried to foil Jim's plan of elopement. But the missive attached to that bird might have made it clear that he was at loggerheads with Jim only because the puncher stood in the way of a certain scheme of his own.

The Hold-Up.

THREE unsavoury-looking men standing outside a lone cabin in the hills were attracted by the appearance of a bird fluttering above their heads, a bird that suddenly swooped down into a kind of coop some distance from the shack.

One of the men, Top-Hand Norton by name, made his way to the wire netting of the coop, and, passing inside, secured the carrier pigeon that had just dropped out of the sky. He returned presently to join the other two men, reading the message that he had taken from the bird.

"It's from the boss," he stated.

"Smoky?" put in one of the others, July 4th, 1931.

a burly ruffian known as Lew Larson. "What's he say?"

"Listen," Top-Hand Norton rejoined. "There's a girl travellin' by the Carson City stage. I want her taken off the coach and brung up to the hide-out. Hold 'er there till I show up— That's what it says."

The third man spoke. He answered to the name of Slim McGee, a name that might have interested the sheriffs of certain sections not very far remote.

"Supposin' there's two gals, or three gals, on the coach," he growled. "How're we ter know which one ter grab?"

"Smoky gives a full description of her here," explained Norton. "I didn't bother to repeat it, but we'll memorise it on the way down to the Carson trail. Blue eyes, pink-an'-white complexion, slight build, ginger hair— Ginger hair! Say, that oughta be enough. C'mon, let's hit the saddle an' get goin'." That stage should be among the hills right now accordin' to schedule."

They dived towards a small corral at the side of the cabin, and a minute or two later they were riding down through a narrow valley that extended in a southerly direction. Clear of this, they continued to push on as hard as their broncs would carry them, and about thirty minutes after leaving the shack they sighted the Carson road.

"Look," said McGee, pointing over the tops of some trees, and, as they followed the direction indicated, the other two men observed the coach.

The crooks were sliding down the slope of a steep embankment overlooking the road, and, amid a shower of dirt and stones, they reached the trail even as the stage rocked past. The rogues swerved to give chase, drawing their guns as they did so, and in less than sixty seconds they were level with the coach's team.

Larson covered the driver and his mate, while McGee and Norton snatched at the reins and brought the six prancing ponies to a standstill.

"Better reach for the air," Larson warned the two men on the driving seat of the vehicle, and he stressed the words with a gesture of his six-shooter.

They raised their hands, and McGee moved back to the door of the equipage. As he was approaching, it was flung open from the inside, and Ginger presented herself.

"Take it easy, ma'am," said McGee, expecting her to throw a faint or go into hysterics. "we ain't meanin' no harm, but you gotta come with us."

Ginger seemed perfectly at her ease, but looked puzzled as she glanced around and saw no sign of her brone-busting Romeo.

"Where's Jim?" she inquired.

McGee gaped at her for a moment, and then switched his narrow eyes towards the faces of his companions.

"Aw—Jim," he murmured. "Oh, yeah—yeah—he'll be up at the cabin pretty soon. C'mon now, we gotta beat it, ma'am."

"Sure, I'm ready," Ginger declared cheerfully and once again McGee exchanged glances with Larson and Norton. All three ruffians were plainly bewildered.

McGee spurred nearer and took Ginger on his saddle, but as he was about to ride away she checked him.

"I haven't got my ease," she exclaimed. "It's in the coach."

McGee thought it best to humour her. He was glad she was taking things so quietly. So, locating the travelling-bag, he handed it to Norton.

Larson was still covering the two men on the driving-seat of the coach, and McGee called to him.

"All set, Lew," he said. "Send 'em on their way."

Larson flourished his revolver.

"Get goin'," he ordered the coach-driver, "an' keep goin'."

The reins were picked up. The stage lumbered on its way. With his curiously willing captive, McGee put his horse at the slope of the embankment, Norton and Larson bringing up the rear.

The laborious journey back through the cabin took them the best part of an hour, for it was uphill work. But, the hide-out reached at last, Larson dismounted and helped Ginger to the ground.

"What's this place?" Ginger asked. "Oh, it's where you're gonna hang out for a little while," said Larson.

"Till Jim arrives, I suppose," Ginger mused. "When do you expect him?"

Larson fingered his chin.

"To-morrow sometime, I guess," he informed her. "I don't rightly know."

"To-morrow!" Ginger echoed. "Then something must have cropped up to delay him. Never mind! I'll make myself at home in the meantime."

As she went into the cabin the three men looked at one another in amazement.

"What do you make o' her?" McGee demanded. "Who's this feller 'Jim' she's allus talkin' about?"

Top-Hand Norton suggested an explanation.

"I reckon Smoky ain't been usin' his right name," he declared. "This gal knows him as Jim—see? An' we had things all wrong from the start. It wasn't a kidnappin' job. She knowed she was a-comin' here."

"I guess you're right, Top-Hand," said McGee.

On the Trail.

STRIKING through the hills via every short cut that he knew, Jim Logan picked up the Carson road and raced along it at full gallop, knowing that his adventure with Smoky King at the ranch had delayed him considerably in his project of taking Ginger off the stage.

Conceive Jim's astonishment when, keyed up with the hope of overtaking the coach somewhere within the next fifteen or twenty miles, he suddenly saw it swinging round a bend towards him.

He signalled the driver to halt, and the cumbersome vehicle pulled up alongside him.

"What's the big idea?" Jim demanded. "Aren't you supposed to be headed for Carson?"

"We were," blurted the driver, "but we're a-headin' right back for Fresno as fast as we can."

Jim glanced inside the coach, expecting to discover Ginger there. As he realised that the interior was vacant, his jaw dropped.

"Wasn't there a girl travelling with you?" he asked.

"There was," the man with the reins answered, "an' that's why we're doublin' back to Fresno. About five miles north of here we was stopped by three ornery-lookin' hombres that took her off the coach and ordered me to drive on. I did drive on for a spell, but turned around mighty soon. That girl was Ginger Rogers, old Cap Rogers' daughter, and I'm gonna locate him and put him wise."

There was an expression of anxiety on Jim's face as he fired another question at the driver.

"Which way did they go?"

"North-east from the Belmont Pass," was the rejoinder. "That's all I can tell you. But, say, I heard the Rogers girl mention somebody by the name of Jim—"

The young 'puncher did not wait to hear more. With a pressure of the knees he sent Starlight forward again, and the pinto casted itself into that long, loping stride of his which could cover ground so rapidly.

He ate up the miles as the road-runner eats up the rattlesnake, and not long afterwards Jim found himself at the point where the coach had been held up by Ginger's captors. He made out the tracks leading up the embankment and followed them. But some distance farther on the ground yielded no signs which would have enabled him to trail the men into whose hands the girl had fallen, and he was compelled to ride at random, on the off-chance of locating them.

Night overtook him in his vain search, but still he persevered, and not until the small hours of the morning did he abandon the quest temporarily and snatch a brief sleep. When he awoke the sun was in the sky, and the crisp clearness of early day had thrown the colourful sierras and the varied greens of trees, mesquite, and brushwood into vivid relief.

Jim saddled and mounted Starlight, who had been grazing hard by, and soon he was pushing through the hills again, his eyes on the qui-vive for Ginger and her kidnapers. Thus he continued riding for another hour or so, when all at once the drumming of hoofs caught his attention.

The sound came from behind him, and, with a caution that was almost instinctive, Jim switched the rein and drew Starlight behind the cover of a thicket. From that vantage-point the young 'puncher discerned a lone horseman galloping from the south, and as he drew nearer he recognised Smoky King.

King was following a course that must bring him within a few yards of the thicket, and, to safeguard himself against the possibility of being discovered, Jim forced Starlight to lie down.

Jim had no qualms about meeting Smoky King. In fact, he fully intended to confront him in due course and square accounts. But at the moment it suited his purpose better to let the foreman go by unhindered. For, seeing him here among the hills, Jim had a pretty shrewd idea that he probably knew something of Ginger's whereabouts, and as probably had some connection with the men who had stopped the stage.

The foreman galloped by without observing Jim, and when the foreman was about a couple of hundred yards away the young cowboy brought Starlight to his feet with a sharp command and vaulted into the saddle.

Ho began to trail King.

In the Pass.

FROM the facts that he gleaned first from the driver of the stage-coach and then from the 'puncher who had been so innocently concerned with Smoky King in the attempt to hold Jim Logan a prisoner at the ranch, old Cap Rogers put his own conception on the affair.

He believed Jim Logan was responsible for Ginger's disappearance, and the chance discovery of the basket of carrier pigeons in the barn gave him the impression that Jim had used them as a means of communicating with those three rogues who had waylaid the coach.

The old man's first move was to send for the sheriff, who arrived with three or four of his deputies. Then, in the presence of posse and ranch hands, he scribbled a note and attached it to one of the pigeons, the entire party spurring forward in the direction that the bird took.

They could not hope to trail the bird to its destination, but they at least gained an idea of the quarter in which that destination lay.

The bird vanished amid the sierras and was lost to view. Some time later it dropped into the coop beside the hide-out of Smoky King's associates, and was seen by Larson.

Larson found the note that was attached to the feathered messenger, and, after reading it, he made his way back to the cabin in haste.

"Listen to this, boys," he jerked to his companions. "A message from old Cap Rogers—addressed to a guy called Jim Logan. The old man says he'll never consent to his daughter's marriage with this Logan, an' he's gonna make hash outa him if he can come up with him. What do you make of it?"

Consternation was written on the faces of Norton and McGee. Then the latter voiced an opinion.

"I'll tell yuh what I think," he rasped. "That red-head gal ain't acted normal ever since we took her off the coach, an' I reckon I know why. We've got the wrong dame!"

"The wrong dame!" ejaculated Larson.

"That's what I figure," McGee continued; but before he could say more there was the faint sound of hooi-beats, and, striding to the window, the three ruffians saw Smoky King riding through a narrow valley that formed the only pass to the hide-out.

They walked out of the cabin and confronted King as he cantered up to the dwelling and dismounted.

"Well," said the foreman, "did you get the girl?"

McGee answered him sheepishly.

"We got a girl," he rejoined. "Ginger-headed, just like you wrote. But I guess she ain't the right one, for all that. Look at this message we just had from Cap Rogers, the boss o' the outfit you've bin workin' for."

"This bronc belongs to that ornery cow-hand, Logan," said Cap Rogers.

He handed the note to King, who read it and grinned.

"You've got the right girl, sure enough," he stated. "Where is she?"

"In the back room," McGee told him. "But wait a minute, Smoky. This Rogers seems to have got the dope on them carrier pigeons. It seems to me that when he let loose the bird that brought his message he'd most likely start out after it."

King laughed in a scoffing tone.

"Tell me another story," he sneered. "How's any man gonna follow a carrier pigeon through these hills, unless his bronc's got a pair o' wings?"

"Well, I don't like the looks of it," McGee protested insistently.

"All right," King retorted. "You three get down to the pass and keep on the watch, while I have a word with Miss Ginger."

McGee, Larson, and Norton moved away, and King strolled on into the cabin. He crossed the living-room, and rapped on the door of an apartment that was connected with it.

Ginger's voice answered the summons. "Come in," she called, and, pushing open the door, Smoky King stepped over the threshold.

Ginger was brushing her hair before a mirror, but she turned with an expectant smile as the newcomer entered the room. The smile faded from her pretty face as she recognised King.

"You!" she stammered. "Why, I—

"You was expectin' Jim Logan, huh?" drawled the foreman.

A look of anxiety appeared in Ginger's blue eyes.

"Where is Jim?" she demanded.

"Snoopin' around somewhere, I guess," King observed, "but not so close that he should bother me any. Listen, Ginger, you ain't elopin' with that cow-hand. You're ridin' with me—see?"

He had drawn nearer to her while he had been speaking, and now he tried to take her hands. But she retreated quickly.

"Keep away from me!" she panted.

"Now don't get het up!" he rapped out. "You and me are takin' the same trail, and maybe we'll be married, so's I can fall heir to your old man's rancho. And if that proposition don't appeal to you—well, then, I reckon it'll cost your dad a whole lotta dough for ransom. C'mon now, be sensible, girlie, and let's get going. For I aim to take you some place else where we'll be safe from visitors."

Ginger was still holding the brush with which she had been smoothing out her hair. With a sudden movement she flung it at King's head, and then darted towards the doorway.

King ducked, and the hairbrush went flying into the living-room. Ginger tried to follow it, but with a jump King overtook her and seized her. There was a frenzied scuffle, the girl scratching and kicking violently, so that King soon bore the marks of conflict.

Ginger managed to break away from him, and almost escaped through the living-room. Smoky King caught her again as she was darting across the threshold, however, and with a wrench he dragged her back.

Fight.

RIDING up to the mouth of the pass which Smoky King had entered before him, Jim Logan dismounted in the shadow of some trees and looked forward to descry the hide-out of the rascally foreman's associates.

Jim's first concern was to dispose of Starlight, and, taking the pony's rein, he led him into a mass of dense thickets, July 4th, 1931.

where he was effectively hidden from view.

He then made his way back to the trees, and as he glanced in the direction of the cabin again he caught sight of Lew Larson, Slim McGee, and Top-Hand Norton striding towards the pass.

They were talking animatedly, and kept turning their heads and looking over their shoulders at the dwelling whence they had emerged a minute or two before.

They had not discerned Jim, but he realised that unless they changed their course they must approach the very spot where he was standing. He looked around him, and a forked tree near by provided him with an inspiration. Clambering up its divided trunk, he settled himself in the fork, and snapped off a thick piece of dead branch that would serve as a formidable weapon in his hands.

King's three accomplices entered the pass, and came to a halt immediately beneath Jim's hiding-place.

"You know," said McGee, "I don't like the way things are shapin'. If that gal's father finds his way here with a posse we're liable to be in a jam. We better keep a pretty strict look-out."

They turned their faces southward, and Jim decided that the moment was opportune. He singled out the centre man, who happened to be Larson, and with stunning force brought his cudgel crashing down on the rogue's head.

Larson sagged with a hollow groan. McGee whipped round, lifted his glance, and uttered a cry, a cry that was cut short as Jim struck again, felling him as effectively as he had stretched Larson.

Top-Hand Norton had taken the alarm, and, his hand diving towards his hip, he wheeled with an oath. Jim dropped on him from the fork of the tree, and bore him to the ground with the impact.

There was a fierce struggle, during which Norton made desperate efforts to drag his six-shooter from its holster. But ere he could succeed Jim plied the cudgel once more, and scattered the rogue's wits with the shock of the blow.

He climbed to his feet in time to see McGee attempting to rise. Managing to straighten up, the crook stumbled towards him, but Jim tapped him playfully over the skull and with a stupid expression on his unshaven countenance, McGee sagged limply.

Starlight had trotted out of the thickets where his master had concealed him, and from the peg on the saddle Jim took his lariat and bound the three senseless ruffians securely. Then he reached for his pinto's rein and turned the intelligent creature so that he was facing southward.

"Take the road to the ranch, old-timer!" he said. "And bring Ginger's dad right here. Go on, beat it!"

Starlight tossed his head and bounded forward into a gallop, his hoofs drumming over the mesquite grass. Jim watched him till he had disappeared, and then began to advance towards the cabin beyond the pass.

As he set foot on the veranda he heard the commotion that was going on inside, and, striding into the living-room, he discerned King and Ginger struggling in the apartment beyond. With a shout he sprang through to the bed-room, caught the foreman by the shoulder, swung him around and drove the bunched knuckles of his right into the kidnapper's mouth.

King staggered back, his lips cut and bleeding. A snarl escaped him, and he reached for his forty-five, but as he pulled the weapon clear of its holster Jim pounced on him and gripped his wrist.

He twisted the rogue's arm, and King let the weapon fall with a clatter. But next moment he slammed his left to the puncher's jaw and knocked him halfway across the room.

Jim recovered himself, and made a flying rush. The foreman whipped up a chair and hurled it with all his strength, but the young cowboy ducked, and it swept over his head and crashed into the wall.

The two men closed, and, wrestling grimly, they lurched towards the doorway. Then Jim pulled his left free and drew blood from King's nose with a stinging punch.

King reeled into the living-room, and Jim followed him up to connect with a right swing that lifted the foreman off his feet and flung him headlong against a stove in the corner. The stove-pipe came down with an ugly clangour, but King collected his wits and leapt at Jim with an angry bellow.

He broke through the young cowboy's guard and knocked him across the table, then flung himself upon him and fastened his hands on Jim's throat. His fingers clenched in a vice-like grasp, and Jim felt the blood surging to his head, while a red mist seemed to dance before his eyes. But he mustered all his strength with a tremendous effort of will, and, breaking the foreman's hold, threw him aside.

King leapt at him again, and they grappled. A wild stagger took the pair of them out on to the veranda, where they tripped and came sprawling. They were up in a second, and hit out at each other savagely, their fists thudding home against face and body.

Ginger had followed them to the door of the cabin. She watched with bated breath, and followed every blow, her heart beating high when she saw Jim score, and sinking when she saw him take punishment.

King was fighting like a madman, and for a spell the advantage seemed to rest with him. But Jim was standing on the defensive against a whirlwind onslaught, and he was only biding his time ere turning the aggressor.

He saw his chance when King left himself wide open, and before the ruffian could lift his guard the young cowboy ripped his fist to the jaw. The foreman fell, and Jim flung himself upon him. But King was by no means at the end of his tether, for, with a desperate effort he heaved the puncher aside, and scrambled to his feet.

Jim was struggling up when the scoundrel kicked at him savagely.

Starlight.

GALLOPING from the pass that led to Smoky King's lair, Starlight picked up the Carson road and swerved southward, his hoofs drumming on the sun-cracked surface of the trail.

He covered ground at top speed, and less than twenty minutes later his quick ears warned him of the approach of a body of horsemen. As he swung round a bend he saw them cantering towards him—Cap Rogers, the sheriff and a posse.

Starlight came to a standstill and waited for them to ride nearer. They reached the spot where he had halted, and looked at him curiously.

"This bronc belongs to that ornery cow-hand, Logan," said Cap Rogers. "So I reckon Logan can't be far away. Sheriff, I want that hombre put in gaol. Understand?"

The sheriff made no answer. He was watching Starlight, who had begun to act in a manner that compelled attention, wheeling first of all and dashing off in the direction whence he had come, then returning as no one followed him, and tossing his fine head in a fashion that suggested impatience.

"What's wrong with that pony?" the sheriff demanded. "He seems like he's got something on his mind."

Starlight repeated the procedure of galloping to a little distance, and then returning, and old Cap Rogers frowned.

"You'd almost think he was tryin' to tell us to chase him up," he murmured.

"By golly, you're right, Cap!" the sheriff declared. "That's just what he is doin'. He wants us to trail him. There's somethin' important he wants us to see. Leastways, that's how I figure things."

Rogers glanced at him quickly.

"Sheriff," he said, "I'm inclined to think your figurin' is correct. An' if it is, then that horse is the smartest critter I ever saw—smarter'n any circus pony, an' a lot less dumb than a good many human bein's."

"Come on," rejoined the sheriff crisply, as Starlight trotted off again, and this time, as the whole party spurred after him, he kept going at a rapid pace along the trail.

Several miles from the point where he had encountered the Cap's party Starlight left the Carson road and entered the hills. Here his followers found it difficult to keep him in sight, and he paused every now and then to let them come up with him.

The pass was reached at last, and Cap Rogers and his companions were riding into it when the sheriff observed something ahead. It appeared to be a writhing bundle, and on closer approach was made out as the figures of Larson, Norton and McGee—that trio of rascality which Jim Logan had roped with his lariat some time before.

The crooks had recovered consciousness, and were struggling to escape from the coils of the lasso. With one or two of the knots already slackened, they managed to gain their liberty when the approaching horsemen were still some little distance away.

McGee was the first to see the newcomers, and he uttered a shout of alarm as he recognised the man riding at Cap Rogers' side.

"The sheriff!" he yelled, and, reaching for his hip, he dived for the shelter of the scrub.

Larson and Norton followed his example, taking cover and plucking out their six-guns to open fire on Rogers and the representatives of the law.

There was an ugly racket as three shots smashed out in quick succession. None of them took effect, though one deputy's stetson was whipped from his head and another man's cheek was grazed.

The posse outnumbered the crooks, but they were in an exposed position, and McGee, Larson, and Norton had only to steady their aim to pick them off with comparative ease and very little risk to themselves.

The sheriff bellowed a command, and all sprang from the saddle, plunging into the same mass of thickets in which Jim Logan had concealed Starlight just before he had tackled Smoky King's associates single-handed. From this vantage-point the posse returned the crooks' fire, and the valley echoed to the crash of the gun-play.

Cap Rogers was posted near the sheriff, and presently he spoke to the latter.

"These thickets extend to the back of that patch of scrub where those guys are skulkin'," he stated. "Suppose two or three of us keep givin' 'em lead from here while the rest work around and take 'em in flank and rear?"

"Good idea, Cap," the sheriff agreed.

"You ain't forgot your military tactics, huh?"

Thus two or three of the posse kept King's satellites occupied while the remainder of the party stole through the brush, and the crooks were blazing at the spot where the sheriff and his companions had first taken to the thickets when suddenly a curt voice ordered them to cease fire.

They scrambled around and saw that four deputies were covering them, their fingers ready to draw trigger at the first sign of resistance.

"Drop them irons and reach for the air," said the one who had first spoken. "Go on, you heard me!"

The crooks hesitated, but realised that defiance was futile. Larson was the first to let his six-shooter fall to the ground. Norton followed suit, and then McGee did likewise.

The rest of the invaders of the outlaw lair emerged from the thickets, and manacles were snapped home on the prisoners' wrists, the sheriff eyeing them grimly the while.

"A nice bunch o' rough-necks," he mused in a tone of satisfaction. "Larson, Norton, an' McGee, huh? Wanted on more charges than I could count on my two hands. Well, you'll answer for 'em all—"

He did not finish the sentence, for at that moment his attention was diverted by the spectacle of two men fighting like tigers just beyond the pass. They were Jim Logan and Smoky King.

Jim had caught King's ankle and brought him low in the very instant that the latter had attempted to kick him, and now he and the foreman were rolling over and over in the dust.

They had heard the sound of shooting, and Jim had guessed the meaning of it. So had King, and he was battling all the more savagely.

The two rose, and King aimed a tremendous blow at Jim. The cowboy flung up his arm and partially deflected it, but it caught him in the temple and staggered him, and the foreman wheeled with the intention of leaping into the saddle of his brone and making his getaway.

Jim sprang after him, and, dazed as he was, clutched him around the waist and flung him to the ground. By the time King rose, the puncher's head was clear, and the ruffianly foreman straightened up only to receive a straight left flush in the face.

King reeled backward, but with an infuriated snarl he gathered himself for a fresh onslaught. He rushed at Jim madly.

The rush was stopped by a blow that Jim planted in the scoundrel's eyes. Brought up with a jerk, King lifted his hands to his head, and was instantly doubled by a hard right to the body.

Jim proceeded to rain punches on him from all angles, till the foreman was in a sorry plight. Meanwhile Cap Rogers and his party came up, but for the time being they made no attempt to interfere, and watched Jim Logan's exhibition of the noble art with admiration.

King was pitched into a clump of brush by a heavy jolt, but he struggled up again for more punishment. He received it without stint, and, badly battered, collapsed at last under a pile-driving right.

He lay on his back and counted imaginary stars. The earth underneath him seemed to spin and reel crazily. His body from the waist upward seemed to be composed of innumerable aches and pains.

"And if you ain't satisfied," observed Jim, standing over him with clenched hands, "I've still got a wallop or two left."

Smoky King bestirred himself, but not with any idea of prolonging the fight. He gained a sitting posture with an effort and raised one arm in order to describe a feeble gesture of surrender.

"I know—when I'm licked—Logan," he managed to say.

Cap Rogers stepped towards Jim and tapped him on the shoulder.

"Now the entertainment's finished, young feller," he stated, "maybe you'll explain."

(Continued on page 28.)

THREE COMPLETE FILM NOVELS.

"THE PRODIGAL."

He was a carefree, singing adventurer—but he met his strangest romance when he left the open road to return home. A powerful drama of human hearts in turmoil.

"SONG OF THE ALPS."

Wrongfully accused of murder, a young guide breaks prison, grimly resolved to prove his innocence to the law and the girl he loves. Romance—drama—and a thrilling ski race in the High Alps. Starring Luis Trenker and Renate Muller.

"KING OF THE DANUBE."

By a strange trick of Fate the ballet master of a troupe of Viennese dancers is brought into contact with a young and beautiful duchess. She believes him to be a count and falls in love with him—then discovers his real identity. Starring Peggy Norman and Harry Liedtke.

LAWRENCE TIBBETT and ESTHER RALSTON
in

"THE PRODIGAL."

Don't miss this splendid issue of our grand companion paper

"SCREEN STORIES."

On Sale Wednesday.

Price 2d.

July 4th, 1931.

"THE CRIMINAL CODE."

(Continued from page 18.)

The Fight in the Dungeons.

IT was some hours before Brady eventually left his office to go and see Mary. He was worried. He hated himself for what he had done, because he appreciated Graham's point of view.

The trouble was that they were both working under two different types of law—Brady from the law of the State, and Graham from the law of the criminal. Graham, of course, was wrong. That was understood. At the same time, Brady saw there was no chance of making any change in the present position.

When he ultimately went into Mary's room, he found her unpacking her things. Tough and hard-bitten though he was, there was just one thing in his life about which he was really human, and that was the daughter who had filled his life since his wife had died ten years back.

She looked up as he entered and ran to him.

"Is everything all right?" she asked anxiously. "No more trouble?"

He shook his head and forced a smile. "No; no more trouble," he replied.

"I don't believe you," she said. "You've got such a worried look on your face." She paused, thinking. "By the way, who was that awfully nice young man who called for me at the station to-day? I rather liked him."

Brady winced. The last thing he wanted to think about at the moment was Graham.

"Just one of the trusties," he replied offhandedly. "He's a nice lad, but I'm afraid I have had to get rid of him. You won't be seeing him any more."

He was startled by the sudden change that came over her face. Her smile vanished, and was replaced by black disappointment and unhappiness. To his amazement, he distinctly detected the quiver of her lips.

"What's the matter?" he said sharply. "I—I—oh, I want to see him again!" she cried. "I know he is a convict, but he's the only real man I have ever met!"

Brady snorted angrily. "Don't be a fool!" he said. "You've never seen him in your life before to-day. This is nonsense!"

He stopped abruptly at the look which had appeared in her eyes, and drew his breath in sharply.

"Gosh!" he muttered.

For the first time in his life, he found himself face to face with a phenomenon which could be guided by neither argument nor reason. By some strange twist of fate his daughter, Mary Brady, had fallen in love at first sight with a San Quentin convict, Robert Graham!

"Gosh!" he repeated again. "I reckon I am too tough and unthinking to know much about such things, but do you really feel the way you look?"

She nodded. No words were necessary.

For two whole days after that he wandered about in a brown study, unable to think what to do. For Mary's sake there was hardly anything he would stop at, yet he knew that if he capitulated and had Graham released from solitary confinement his action might be taken by the convicts as a sign of weakness, and they would revolt in a determined effort to escape.

Suddenly he hit upon a plan. He gave Gleason instructions to spread throughout the prison the story of Graham's captivity—of how a man due for freedom was lying in the dungeons because he refused to give the name of a murderer.

July 4th, 1931.

The news had swift effect. Galloway, working in the prison kitchen the following morning, was told the story by a fellow crook. As he listened his black, glowing eyes glinted.

"So that's it, is it?" he said. "Well, I reckon it's up to me to do something about it. Graham's not going to take the rap for anything I've done."

"What's on your mind?" asked his companion.

Galloway's face set in an expression of hatred.

"I'll tell you. There was a time when a certain man in this prison got me sent to the dungeons for something I didn't do, and I swore I would level up. I've got to go under over that Runch business anyway, so I can attend to the other matter at the same time. Give me a knife!"

He took the broad-bladed carver that was held out to him, and hid it in his clothing. Then he deliberately picked up a bucket of water and flung it at the nearest guard.

The cookhouse was in an uproar. Other guards rushed in to find out what the trouble was about, and quickly ranged themselves on each side of Galloway.

"What's the big idea?" asked one of them.

"Nothing," replied Galloway. "I just felt that way."

The guards looked at each other significantly and nodded. With a concerted action, they seized Galloway and pinioned his arms.

"You're for the dungeons, Galloway," one of them said.

"It suits me," Galloway replied. "Get busy!"

They dragged him off, and took him down into a dark chamber below the main part of the prison. On each side of this chamber were steel doors, behind which offenders against prison law suffered the agonies of solitary confinement.

One of the guards unlocked a door, while the other jammed a revolver into the small of Galloway's back.

"Get inside, Galloway!" said the man with the gun.

Galloway calmly took a step forward, then twisted round. His hands, moving with the speed of lightning, closed over the gun and wrenched it from the guard's grasp. The two guards lurched themselves forward, and simultaneously Galloway pressed the trigger.

The bullet went wide, but the crash of the explosion stopped the attack. The two guards lunged back, and Galloway surveyed them with a sardonic smile.

"Get out of here!" he said. "I will surrender only to Brady and Gleason."

The two guards did not stop to argue. They cleared out to the end of the dungeons, and while one hurried to Brady's office, the other remained on guard to ensure that Galloway did not escape.

A minute later Brady and Gleason arrived, followed by two men with a tear-gas pistol and a tommy-gun.

Brady held the others back. He was not able to see Galloway for the moment.

"Come out of there, Galloway!" he shouted. "You've got no chance!"

Galloway's voice came from the open doorway of the cell that had been intended to receive him.

"I'll come out when I feel like it, Brady," he replied. "Meanwhile, listen to what I have to say. It was me that killed Runch. I did it because he was a low-down, squealing rat. Our code demands that a man who squeals shall die, and maybe you won't understand it, Brady, but the same code also demands that none of us shall allow somebody else to take the blame for what we do. So you can send Gleason in here and get him to release young Graham. When you have done that I'll talk about surrender."

Brady hesitated the merest fraction of a second.

"You've got a gun, Galloway," he called back. "Tirow it out!"

"I will throw it out when Graham's free."

Brady said no more. He made a sign to Gleason, and Gleason entered the dungeons. There was the sound of a key rasping in a lock, and of a steel door being flung open. The moment Graham had appeared from the interior of the cell there was a clatter as Galloway's gun hit a wall and fell on the ground.

"Now, Gleason," came Galloway's voice, "I'm ready for you."

He stepped out of the cell in full view of the man with the tommy-gun and looked at its barrel with faint amusement.

"Quite a little party, Brady," he said sardonically. "You'll need the irons on me!"

Gleason eyed the crook grimly as he approached. He reached out to snap handcuffs over Galloway's wrists, when suddenly he felt himself grasped in a powerful grip and spun round.

The guard with the tommy-gun pressed his finger on the trigger, but Brady's voice checked him.

"Look out," he shouted, "or you will hit Gleason!"

He turned to Graham quickly.

"Get out of this," he said sharply. "Get up to my office and wait for me. I am allowing that parole warrant to stand, and there is a lot I want to talk to you about before you leave here. It's going to have a lot of influence on what you do in your future life."

Graham looked at Galloway uncertainly, but did not move.

"Go on, Graham," said Galloway. "Do as he says, I'm all right. Good luck!"

"Good luck!" replied Graham, and slowly made his way up the steps to the main part of the prison above.

As soon as he had gone, Brady turned to Galloway sternly.

"Now see here, Galloway," he said. "I don't want you to get hurt. You've played the game over Graham, and I'll see to it that you don't go to the electric chair for Runch. Stop making a fool of yourself and surrender."

"And spend the rest of my life in this joint?" scoffed Galloway unrepentantly. "Not on your life, Brady! I've got a knife at Gleason's back, and even at this moment he's wishing he'd been a better man. He's for it, and nothing you can do is going to save him!"

Even Brady turned sick just then. He sprang forward, but he was too late. Gleason's face suddenly went grey, and he started slipping to the floor.

"Let him have it!" Brady roared.

The tommy-gun started to chatter. Galloway threw up his hands with a cry.

Brady watched him fall, his eyes hard and merciless.

"It was coming to him," he said briefly.

He surveyed the two bodies before him for a minute, then calmly turned away, and walked with slow steps in the direction of his office.

(By permission of United Artists Corporation, featuring Walter Huston, Phillips Holmes, and Constance Cummings.)

"TOM SAWYER."

(Continued from page 16.)

The Boys Vanish.

TOM SAWYER was not his usual self; fate had marked his name with a fatal star. Muff Potter's knife had been found beside the body—Injun Joe had seen to that—and the old man had been arrested. Wherever Tom went he heard the murder discussed, and it was the general opinion that Potter would hang. Huckleberry was scared stiff, Becky ignored the two boys, Aunt Polly was in a bad temper, and everything was all wrong.

In a depressed mood Tom, two days after the murder, met Joe Harper, a youngster whom Huckleberry and Tom occasionally permitted to join in their adventures. Joe was unhappy because his mother would make him wear shoes and fine clothes. Joe wanted to dress like Tom and Huck.

The three strolled towards the river, and then Tom had his bright idea. Close to the bank a raft was moored, and there and then a counsel of war was held. They would be pirates, and run away from all their miseries. That night they captured the raft, their "galloon," and under a sail of old bits of sacking, moved down stream. Next morning found them camped on Jackson Island, four miles down stream.

For two days they played pirates, and it was great fun; then Joe began to grieve about his mother, and Tom began to think of his Aunt Polly, whilst Huck kept on talking about evil spirits, and how he dreamed Muff Potter and Dr. Robinson were watching them.

On the night of the third day of their adventure Tom discarded most of his clothes and sneaked down to the edge of the island. He was a strong swimmer, and knew how to use the power of the stream. An hour later he was on the opposite bank and hurrying through the night to the town.

On arriving home he wrote a note to his aunt, but this he pushed into the pocket of an old coat when he overheard two men talking outside his bed-room window—Sid was blissfully sleeping. Tom learnt that they were thought to be dead, and that next day a funeral service was to be held. Tom fled back to Jackson Island with all speed.

What a surprise the congregation got the next day! The minister had just finished his sermon on the goodness of the deceased boys, how the town had suffered a heavy loss in their death, what models of virtue they had been, and everyone had wept openly, including Aunt Polly and Becky, when three heads popped up in the empty gallery of the church—Tom, Huck, and Joe, prepared to be welcomed back from the dead.

Aunt Polly's tears vanished, and that night three lads were unable to sit down, but Tom was happier because Becky had forgiven him. If only he could plan some solution of the Muff Potter trial, which was duo to take place on the morrow! The murder, now the boys had returned, was the chief item of interest. Muff Potter would hang, was the certain verdict.

Tom went to the trial, and his eyes nearly darted out of his head when he saw Injun Joe there.

Tom thought of his vow; but as the evidence piled up against Muff his conscience urged him to speak, and at last he stepped forward.

"Huck and he knows something," he spluttered. "That night we was in the churchyard. We went there to cure our warts. Huck reckoned a dead cat in a graveyard near a bad man's grave was a sure cure. We hid in the trees near Hoss Williams' grave, and we saw Muff Potter and Dr. Robinson quarrelling, but it was Injun Joe what stabbed the doctor."

The truth of this statement was confirmed by Injun Joe making his escape by a wild dive through a glass window.

Tom and Huck at once became heroes, whilst Muff Potter was released. Becky kissed Tom, but the boy was not quite happy. Would Injun Joe try and kill Huck and himself?

The Pirates' Treasure.

IT was a great day, a week later, for the school—a picnic to the strange caves in the nearby hills.

Every child was given a candle, and told to keep close to the teacher. It was a most thrilling adventure, and Tom was in his element because his companion was Becky.

Hand in hand they wandered through the gloomy passages, and paid little attention to the stalactites and stalagmites that glimmered in the flickering lights of the candle. They wandered away from the teacher and became lost.

They shouted, and there was no answer, and Tom tried to pretend he wasn't scared. They tried to trace their way back, but now there seemed a myriad of passages. When their candles were getting low Tom saw a light ahead, but some instinct made him whisper to Becky:

"Let's surprise them, Becky."

It was Tom who got the surprise. He saw not the teacher and his pupils but Injun Joe. The half-breed had dug a great hole in the floor of the cave, and was lifting forth a strange old casket. It was rotten with age, because the half-breed easily wrenched off the lid.

Hundreds of coins, which Injun rolled, picked up, and let trickle through his hand. His chuckles of fiendish gloating ended in a snarl, because Tom had given vent to his amazement with a gasp. Next moment the two children were fleeing through the caves with the sinister Injun Joe racing after them.

Becky soon became exhausted, and begged Tom to leave her, but the boy had a clever idea. He made her hide in a crevasse, and before running on made a great din by kicking loose stones so that Injun Joe might not see her. But as the rascal was intent on killing Tom, he had eyes for only the boyish figure ahead. It was difficult running with a candle, but there was no draught.

Gradually Injun Joe gained, and Tom almost thought he was beaten.

His light showed him a yawning crack in the passage, a terrible fissure that was hundreds of feet deep, and Tom could not hope to jump to the other side. He could not turn back, and already he could hear the laboured breath of his pursuer.

There was a ledge, and along this Tom crawled, hoping to work his way to another passage, but it was almost an impossible task holding a candle. Almost he lost his balance, and only saved himself by dropping the candle.

With a moan of fear, he clutched the bare face of the rock. A glimmer, and then Injun Joe, carrying a storm lantern, appeared. How the fiend chuckled when he saw the boy! Placing the lantern on the ground, he began to crawl towards the boy, but his weight was more than Tom's, and suddenly part of the ledge gave way!

Never will Tom forget his scream of fear, that seemed to go right down into the bowels of the earth. It seemed minutes before a faint thud came to his ears.

Somehow Tom got back to safety, picked up Injun Joe's lantern, and hurried back to Becky.

"We can't stay here," he whispered. "Injun Joe's fallen down a great crack in the caves." His arm was round her. "Let's shout for help! Perhaps they'll hear us."

And his shout for help brought Huckleberry Finn. Huck used the caves as a dwelling-place, and he had seen Injun Joe and had been stalking him.

"I seed him and Dr. Robinson here one night," cried Huck. "They talked about some treasure, but I never paid much account, being too scared of the half-breed. Show us where you saw the old box, Tom."

Tom wanted to get out into the daylight, but he would not let Becky see how feared he was. They found the treasure, but it was much too heavy to lift, and instead they marked a trail on the walls so they could find it again. Then Huck led them back to the sunshine and an anxious teacher.

It turned out that the gold must have belonged to river pirates in early settlement days, and was worth a considerable amount.

Again Tom and Huckleberry were heroes. There was a big reward, and it was divided amongst the three children. Huckleberry found himself wealthy—a dollar a day for keeps—but his only misfortune was that the town insisted that he mend his ways, and Widow Douglas undertook his adoption.

Thus all was bright again, and Aunt Polly even went so far as to let Tom go fishing with Huckleberry. The boys went, but they took Sid's rod when he wasn't looking, and almost caught a hiding.

(This is the story of the Paramount Film, which is based upon "The Adventures of Tom Sawyer," by Mark Twain. The stars include Jackie Coogan as Tom, Junior Durkin as Huckleberry, and Mitzi Green as Becky.)

IDEAL for CAMPERS
The ROAMER Tent

The greatest tent bargain ever offered

Size 6ft. long, 4ft. 3in. wide, 3ft. 6in. high, 6in. walls. Made from strong white material. Brass-jointed poles in 3 sections. Complete with all accessories in white cotton valise. 12/6 Post 1/-.

Ground Sheets to fit, 5/11. Sent C.O.D. if desired.

BLANKS, 303, GRAYS INN ROAD, Kings Cross, LONDON, W.C.1

BE STRONG

I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-Control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-—STEEBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

July 4th, 1931.

"DESERT VENGEANCE."

(Continued from page 10.)

crossed the threshold a wounded follower of Winnipeg's, lying out there in the sun, raised himself with an effort on one elbow. His six-shooter spat fire, and Alabam fell with a groan into the dust and lay still.

A few minutes afterwards Jim dragged himself painfully out from the building. The uneasy silence was explained. Dead and dying men littered the ground all about the building, and in the distance the remnant of the attacking gangs were galloping into the desert.

Contrary to Jim's instructions, Anne was at her bed-room window now, her white face pressed against the panes. She saw Jim down below and rushed away to the stairs. But when she reached the swing doors he had disappeared.

She ran out across the sand, and there he was, staggering across to the church. She followed him fearfully; she saw him mount the steps and enter the little building. Calling his name, she, too, reached the steps, ran up them to the doorway, and looked into the dim interior.

The parson was lying at the foot of the altar, to which he had crawled, badly wounded by a stray bullet.

"Parson! Parson!" cried Jim brokenly, and went down on his knees beside the dying man.

Anne moved forward, sobbing, and then the little, white-haired minister opened his eyes and looked up at Jim, kneeling there, and at Anne, standing close behind him.

"My son," he murmured haltingly, "if thine heart is wise—my heart—shall rejoice evermore."

"Amen!" said Jim hoarsely.

And then, as the parson's head fell back, he looked up at Anne. His face was drawn with suffering, but there was a great light in his eyes.

"Anne," he whispered, "from now on we're going straight—together."

"Yes, Jim," she whispered back, and tenderly put both arms round his neck, while tears streamed down her face.

(By permission of Columbia Pictures and United Artists Corporation, Ltd., featuring Buck Jones and Barbara Bedford.)

"WILD WEST WHOOPEE."

(Continued from page 25.)

"Sure I'll explain, Cap," Jim answered. "This cayute got his three side-kicks there to take Ginger off the stage. I trailed him here and bust it on him."

Cap Rogers looked at him doubtfully. "What did King want to kidnap Ginger for?" he demanded. "I'll tell you that, dad."

It was a girl's voice, and, turning, the rancher saw his daughter, who had emerged from the cabin a few seconds before.

"King had me kidnapped because he wanted to marry me," Ginger said. "Failing that, he planned to hold me till you paid a heavy ransom for my release. And if it hadn't been for Jim—"

Her father did not wait for her to finish. "He had wheeled on Smoky King, who had been dragged to his feet by a couple of deputies, and his fiery temper threatened to break the bounds of his self-control as he glared at the rogue.

"An' I thought you were the best foreman south of the Yosemite!" he ground out. "You dirty, low-down, double-dealin' skunk!"

He drew back his hand for a blow, but the sheriff intervened, laying a restraining grasp on the rancher's wrist.

"I wouldn't bother to do that, Cap," he said. "I reckon this hombre is past sufferin', considerin' the hidin' he's taken from young Jim Logan."

The sheriff was right, for Smoky King could not stand, and hung limply on the arms of the deputies, his head sunk on his breast.

Cap Rogers let his hand fall to his side, and the sheriff spoke to the deputies.

"Take him away an' put him with the others," he ordered, and the ex-foreman was propelled towards the spot where Lew Larson, Top-Hand Norton, and Slim McGee were standing in forlorn attitudes.

The crooks were taken up on the saddles of their captors, and the posse was ready to set out on the return journey to Amarillo. Before joining his men, however, the sheriff addressed Rogers again.

"Oh, by the way, Cap," he drawled casually, "I don't believe you know it, but this Jim Logan here is Dave Logan's boy. I told him when he came to Amarillo that I wouldn't let on, but I guess it's time somebody put you wise."

Old Rogers was staring at the sheriff. "You don't mean Dave Logan, of the Circle H, on the San Joaquin?" he exclaimed.

"The same," the sheriff told him. "This here is his son."

Cap Rogers turned to Jim and held out his hand.

"Say, your dad and I went to school together," he declared. "An' we've been friends ever since, though I ain't seen him in the last five years. Why didn't you tell me you were Dave's boy?"

"Oh, I thought I'd like to make good on my own account, like an ordinary cow hand," Jim said, with a grin. "You see, dad wants me to start managing his ranch for him, but I figured I'd get some wide experience first."

"Well, boy," said Cap Rogers, "I reckon I've called you some pretty hard names, but I want to take them back. And I want to tell you that I consider myself in your debt over Ginger. Now how about hittin' the trail back to the ranch?"

"Pretty soon I'll be hittin' the trail back to the San Joaquin country, Cap," he observed. "an' if you hadn't any objections I'd like for Ginger to go along with me—as Mrs. Jim Logan. Would you mind, Cap, if I tore up that ticket to Carson, City and bought her one that would take her nearer the Circle H?"

"Make it two," said old Rogers. "Ain't it a father's duty to give away the bride?"

He climbed into the saddle of his bronc and cantered after the posse. Jim and Ginger did not follow him at once, but took the opportunity to steal a kiss.

They had not been left entirely alone, however, for Starlight was in the background, and, moving forward, the pony insistently thrust his sleek muzzle between their faces.

"Starlight says 'time's up,'" Jim announced laughingly, "and what Starlight says goes."

He lifted Ginger into the saddle, climbed up behind her, and rode in the direction which the posse and Cap Rogers had already taken.

(By permission of the W. & F. Film Service, Ltd., starring Jack Perrin and Josephine Hill.)

SPURPROOF TENTS.

Made from light-weight proofed material. Complete with three-piece jointed poles, pegs, guy lines, and brown valise. Weight 5 lbs. Size 6 ft. 6 ins. x 4 ft. 6 ins. x 3 ft. 6 ins. 12/3 With 6 in. wall and 3 in. eave. 12/3 Accommodates three boys. Postage 9d. Special extra light-weight. Made from Egyptian Cotton. Same size. Weight 3 1/2 lbs. 12/6.

Send for beautiful illustrated Camping List, post free. GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, NEW BRIDGE STREET, E.C.4.

DON'T BE BULLIED

Send Two Penny Stamps for some SPLENDID LESSONS in JUIJITSU and Handsome Photo Plate of Jap Champions. The Wonderful Japanese Self-Defence without weapons. Take care of yourself under ALL circumstances; fear no man. You can have MONSTER-illustrated Portion for P.O. 3/9. SEND NOW to "YAWARA" (Dept. A.P.), 10, Queensway, Hanworth, Feltham, Middlesex. Practical Tuition only at 48, Carnaby St., Regent St., W.1.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/- Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY, For FREE particulars, simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

MY GREAT OFFER. Write for my free Bargain Lists of the best ALL BRITISH cycles. 14 DAYS' APPROVAL. CARRIAGE PAID. Cash price £3 15s. 0d., or terms. All accessories FREE. Value 21/-. Edw. O'Brien THE WORLD'S LARGEST CYCLE DEALER. DEP 17 COVENTRY.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

STAMMERING. STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars free. FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-), including Airport, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYB, Stourbridge.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

Mitchell

Boy's Cinema

"SHIPMATES" & "THE APACHE KID'S ESCAPE."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 604.

EVERY TUESDAY.

JULY 11th, 1931.

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"The Iron Man."

Kid Mason, Lew Ayres; George Regan, Robert Armstrong; Rose, Jean Harlow; Paul H. Lewis, John Miljan; Jeff, Eddie Dillon; McNeil, Mike Donlon; Rattler O'Keefe, Morrie Cohen; Gladys de Vere, Mildred van Dorn; Riley, Ned Sparks; Mandell, Sam Blum.

"Shipmates."

The Pacific battle fleet of the United States navy "rehearsed" a solid year for one thrilling scene in "Shipmates," Robert Montgomery's first starring picture.

Culminating a year's practice and preparation, the fleet steamed out to sea for the annual force-firing exercises in which the entire battle resources of the squadron were brought into play for ten roaring minutes. With the dreadnaughts and their turret batteries of 16-inch guns were the destroyers with intermediate batteries and torpedo tubes, the bombing planes from floating carriers and the fighting seaplanes, launched by catapult from the big ships' decks.

In this great tactical feat some 40,000 men took part, and countless tons of ammunition was used in the mighty panorama of destruction staged every year to determine the fitness of Uncle Sam's watch-dogs.

Mounted at various vantage points, shielded from the terrific gun blasts by layers of mattresses, were the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer cameras grinding on the spectacle, tripods sagging at every concussion, the men wiping blind sweat from their eyes as they followed the fleet manoeuvres in the lenses. Down below on a searchlight platform, a sound man plugged more cotton in his ears and wrapped another blanket around a microphone to spare its sensitive diaphragm from the splitting vibrations.

The cast of this fine sea drama is as follows: Jonesy, Robert Montgomery; Scotty: Ernest Torrence; Kit, Dorothy Jordan; Admiral Corbin, Hobart Bosworth; Bilge, Cliff Edwards; Mike, Gaxin Gordon; Mary Lou, Joan Marsh; What-It, Edward Nugent; Captain Beatty, George Irving; Ammie, Hedda Hopper; Admiral Schmyler, William Worthington.

"The Apache Kid's Escape."

The Apache Kid, Jack Perrin; Ted Conway, Fred Church; Jane Carter, Josephine Hill; Betty Carter, Virginia Ashcraft; Frank Conway, Henry Roquemore; Bill Buckley, Bus Osborne; Sheriff Ward, Fred Burns.

"Storm Havoc."

Losses on camera and sound equipment reached some sort of record through freak weather conditions when Robert Montgomery's first starring picture, "Shipmates," was filmed.

When the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer unit first went aboard the U.S.S. Colorado for battle practice scenes, four microphones were listed as casualties because July 11th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

JACK HOLT

IN

"THE LAST PARADE."

The powerful story of a newspaper man turned gangster who pitted his wits against law and order although his biggest chum was a policeman.

"BREED OF THE WEST."

A gripping drama of the range and how a dare-devil young cowboy frustrated a rascally foreman's plans to rob a rancher. Starring Wally Wales and Virginia Browne Faire.

"SOUTH OF SONORA."

Horse thieves are making mysterious raids on the Diamond Bar Ranch. A handsome stranger and his queer friend take many risks to help the ranch owner and his pretty daughter. Starring Buffalo Bill, Jun.

of the terrific blast of the turret guns. The real overhead casualties came later, however, when the film company tried to leave the ship during a freak squall.

Unable to lower the portable sound apparatus in the heavy swell, the company was obliged to leave it aboard. Two sound camera tripods are at the bottom of the harbour with a microphone boom.

The next casualties were suffered when the company went to Laguna to make love scenes on a rock just beyond the surf line. Montgomery and Dorothy Jordan were the romantic pair.

Although the day was calm and peaceful, a freak blow whipped up unexpectedly, and before Director Harry Pollard could move his equipment and company, a huge conber broke over the rock, washing everything into the surging sea. What wasn't broken by the crash was soaked beyond repair before recovery from the salt water.

Office Boy Lands Film Actor's Job.

Property boys have been turning actor overnight at the Fox studios for a long time, and now an office-boy rises to demonstrate screen talent can be found in other departments. William Maddox, 20 years old, late of the reception-room at Movietone City, is now a full-fledged actor.

For a year Maddox worked as general utility boy in the office, greeting visitors, answering telephone calls and delivering mail to authors and stars. All the time he hoped for a chance to act.

Maurine Watkins, Fox writer who adapted the novel, "Doctors' Wives," to the screen, was impressed with young Maddox's personality and winning smile. She mentioned the fact to Director Frank Borzage, who forthwith had a test made of the youth. The result was a total loss to the ranks of office-boys. Maddox was given the part of Warner Baxter's laboratory assistant in "Doctors' Wives."

Maddox has passed the word along that his job in the office need not be held open for the time when he finishes the picture. He's not going back to it. This first taste of screen acting is too sweet not to follow up.

Fake Photographs Better Than the Real Thing.

The statement that the camera can't lie has been proved a fallacy by film producers time and time again.

This was proved once again whilst Radio Pictures were making their first Lily Damita picture, tentatively entitled "The Woman Between."

In this picture there is a marble staircase which is faked by "marble paper" manufactured by the paint department of the Radio Pictures studio. Not only does this look as natural as the real article, but, what is more important, it photographs better. Real marble either is so delicately lined that it fails to photograph, or is so bold and prominent that it actually looks faked.

The marble staircase used in this Radio picture, if duplicated in real marble, would have cost a fortune.

Buster Keaton's Joke.

Buster Keaton gave Lew Cody a nasty shock recently. Lew has several precious vases in his home, where he has a little museum. Unknown to Lew, Buster had replicas made of some of these vases, and during his friend's absence from home one day had the fakes substituted among the treasures. That evening Buster called on Lew, and after a time expressed a wish to see his collection.

"Gee, Lew," he said, picking up one of the fakes, "this is a swell vase you have here." A moment later he clumsily dropped it. The vase crashed in unpeeped pieces.

Lew yelled with dismay. Buster, serious-faced, muttered an apology, and picked up another fake vase and then dropped that also. Lew nearly fainted. Then he was told the truth!

A stirring story of the boxing ring and how a young boxer rises to be lightweight champion, but through swollen-headedness loses his championship and becomes a man.
Starring Lew Ayres and Robert Armstrong.

THE IRON MAN

The Failure!

THE Kid waltzed into his man, plastered face and body with left and right and drove the Illinois-bred Italian around the ring amid the delighted yells of a section of the crowd, but to the chagrin of his manager.

There was something almost tigerish in Kid Mason's attack, yet the comparison was not altogether to his credit as a craftsman of the roped square. When the tiger is desperate he loses his cunning, and so it was with the Kid. In the ferocity of his onslaught there was a dangerous lack of judgment and finesse, dangerous because Toni Petrelli was not the man with whom to take chances.

For a moment Petrelli seemed overwhelmed, and, driven to the ropes, fell into a clinch. The referee separated the two fighters, and the Kid, the wild light of battle in his eye, pounced on his opponent again. This time Petrelli was ready for him.

The Kid left himself wide open. Petrelli ducked a pile-driving left, and whipped a right-cross to the point of the jaw. The smack of his glove was followed by the thud of the Kid's body as he hit the boards.

The Kid rose at "five," but was hammered off his feet once more after sixty hectic seconds of "mixing." He struggled up at the count of "nine," plainly groggy, and covered himself in a vain effort to block the rain of terrific punches that Petrelli showered on him from all angles. The Italian was the aggressor now, but he was fighting with a precision that Kid Mason had not displayed since the opening round.

A crisp left bruised the Kid's eye. A right slammed to the face drew blood from teeth and nostrils. He struggled on gamely against the turning tide of fortune, but his fierce, ill-timed rush of a minute and a half before had cost him dear, and he was taking the consequences in one grand orgy of punishment. He was practically "out" on his feet, with Petrelli pouncing him relentlessly.

Dismay was registered on the faces of three men standing just below the edge of the ring at the Kid's corner. One of those men was George Regan, Kid Mason's manager, and his particular impression implied disgust as well as dismay. The other two were seconds.

With the exultant yells of Petrelli's faction dining through the hall, one of the seconds spoke to Regan. He was an old-time pug known to the sporting fraternity as Jeff, and a familiar personality at Regan's training-quarters, where more than one champion had been coached. A towel folded over the sleeve of his sweater, he peered up through the ropes at the wilting Kid and the Illinois slayer.

"What are you goin' to do, George?" he blurted to Regan. "Let him get murdered?"

Regan spoke through clenched teeth. His habitually pleasant face was the picture of resentment.

"It ain't murder," he ground out. "It's suicide. He's done everything I told him not to."

The words were punctuated with a couple of ugly snarls as Petrelli's gloves snapped home to the body. The Kid sagged pitifully.

Old Jeff stirred himself. "The towel, George," he groaned. "I'm gonna throw it in."

"No, you ain't," jerked Regan, gripping his arm.

Kid Mason at that instant made a feeble attempt to rally. He started a right swing but never finished it. For Petrelli's glove ripped into his solar and folded him like a clasp-knife, and next moment the Italian sent another blow crashing to the point.

The Kid pitched face-forward, and the referee began to count. "One—two—three—four—" The youngster on the floor tried to rise, but his cheek sank to the resin again. "Six—seven—eight—nine—" The Kid stirred, but could not gain his feet—until the referee was announcing the winner.

While the battered form of the Kid leaned sorrowfully against the ropes, the referee raised his conqueror's arm aloft. Pandemonium broke loose. Mind galled by defeat and brain dazed by the mauling he had received, Kid Mason was but dimly aware of Petrelli waving to the crowd genially, while his camp-followers mobbed the ring and clamoured boisterous congratulations.

In his dressing-room, huddled on the edge of the masseur's table, with face and body showing the marks of punishment, the Kid sat in a forlorn stupor as George Regan paced up and down before him.

Jeff and the other second, McNeil by name, stood in the background.

"Yeah, it's funny," Regan was saying. "I've been knockin' around with you since we was kids, and all the time I thought you had the makin's of a fighter. But I was all wrong. You're a born manager!" And he rapped out the words with bitter, seething sarcasm.

The Kid did not meet his eyes. He was staring dully at the floor.

"That's what you are," Regan continued in the same tone. "And so long as you don't need me, why, I'll just—"

He did not finish the sentence, but shrugged his shoulders eloquently and moved in the direction of the door. The Kid, looking up for the first time, shot an appealing glance at him.

"Are you—droppin' me, George?" he moaned.

"Not me!" said Regan. "You're givin' me the gate. Well, why shouldn't you, since you've got your own system? Listen! I asked you to go in there to-night and lay low—let Petrelli play himself out—box him. An' what did you do? Tried to knock him down for the count the minute the bell rang. Left yourself wide open, played into his hands!"

The Kid bit his lip.

"George, I—I started to fight like you told me," he faltered. "I tried—but I had somethin' else on my mind. I needed that dough, George. I had to be on the big end of the purse."

Regan glared at him.

"Rose!" he ground out. "Didn't I know it? Say, if you're in this fight game just to get enough money for that wife of yours, it's about time you knew that she—". He checked himself and made a hopeless gesture. "Oh, what's the use?" he added sourly, and walked on to the door.

On the threshold he turned.

"Good luck to you," he said, his voice curt. Then, running his eye over the Kid's bruised body: "An' put on your robe," he snapped. "Do you wanna catch pneumonia?"

The door slammed behind him. He was gone.

The Break.

TWO girls who looked as if they had stepped straight off the vaudeville stage were perched on a couple of high stools at a soda counter. They were flashily-dressed, and heavily rouged and powdered.

One of them, a brunette, was doing most of the talking, and the other girl was the subject of her conversation, a conversation into which she had drawn the burly bartender of the "soft drink" emporium.

"She got fair warning from me," the brunette declared. "I said, 'Rose, don't marry a fighter.' Didn't I say that to you, Rose?"

The other girl was staring resentfully into space. Her face was beautiful, but far from pleasing. Her eyes were hard and calculating, her lips seemed too ready to sneer, or pout into an expression of peevishness.

"She was right, Mrs. Mason," put in the bartender, vouching for the sagacity of the brunette's remarks. "It's like she says. The fight game's a pretty tough racket. Everything goes along dandy for a while. Then—wham! Nobody ain't got no more use for you. Now Kid Mason's all right. He's a pretty good scrapper, but—"

The brunette interrupted him reminiscently.

"There we were on the stage like a couple of angels," she said disgustedly. "Then Rose jumps the act and marries the Kid. And why? 'Cause she thought fighters made a lotta dough. That's why!"

Rose Mason spoke for the first time.

"All right," she snapped. "Lace it into me! I did it! I'm the sap!"

She slipped off the stool and walked out into the street. A bus took her to the very entrance of the humble apartment-house in which the Kid rented a flat. She climbed to the third floor, let herself into the suite and found the Kid already home, sitting haggardly in an arm-chair in the living-room.

He looked up, and conjured up a rueful smile that only made his battered face seem the more pitiful.

"I—I guess I don't look so good, do July 11th, 1921.

l?" he murmured. "I—I went after him too fast. I kinda had a hunch that I could lick him before he got into his stride. I guess I guessed wrong—"

Her eyes flashed contempt, and her lip curled cruelly.

"So did I—guess wrong," she sneered. "I guessed I'd be wearing that fur coat you've been shooting off your head about. And I guessed we'd be moving out of this hole we're living in now. Wasn't I a mutt?"

"You'll get your fur coat, Rose," he said huskily.

"Sure," she retorted. "If I go out and shoot a couple of cats!"

The Kid rose to his feet and pressed one fist into the palm of his other hand nervously. He seemed shaken mentally as well as physically.

"It was my own fault," he groaned. "I didn't fight the way George told me. And now he's through with me—"

"Oh, him!" Rose cut in fiercely. "You should have been through with him years ago. You doing all the dirty work while Regan sat back and grabbed his fifty per cent!"

"He didn't take it most of the time," the Kid answered stoutly. "Not when we needed the money at home. George has been my best friend all along, and he gave up a lot for us."

Her glance seathed him.

"He gave up a lot?" she blazed. "What did I give up when I married you? Oh, you make me tired! I'm finished with you!"

She walked through to the bed-room. The door closed behind her with a bang, and a key turned in the lock as the Kid tried to follow her.

"Rose!" he cried. "Honey—"

Her curt voice reached his ears. "I'm packin' my bag!" she said. "I'm leavin'—"

Fifty minutes later the Kid took a cab to Regan's rooms down-town. He found George Regan with Jeff and two or three other men. They were playing cards, but there was a pause in the game as Kid Mason entered, and an awkward silence fell.

"George," the Kid said hoarsely, "I've got to see you."

Regan's face was expressionless.

"I got nothin' to talk to you about," he answered shortly.

"George," the Kid pleaded, "it's important."

Regan looked up at him. There was something in the youngster's eyes that might have softened a harder man than big-hearted George Regan, and, somehow, he could not forget the friendship that had existed between them for so many years.

"In the bed-room," he said, not without some reluctance, and as the Kid made his way into the other apartment, Regan rose and followed him.

"Well?" the fight manager asked, closing the door.

"Rose has gone," the Kid told him shakily. "She—left me. Aw, I know what you're gonna say, George! But don't call her no names."

Regan's good-looking face was like granite, and his lips were a thin, firm line. But this eventuality was only something that he might have expected of a woman for whom he had never had any regard.

He laid a hand on the Kid's shoulder as he saw the grief that was written on the youngster's features.

"It's happened to a lot of other guys," he muttered. "Forget her." And he added, somewhat cryptically: "You don't know it yet, but you needed this!"

The Kid drew his hand dazedly across his forehead.

"It's all happened so sudden!" he moaned. "I don't know what to do."

"You're gonna get to bed and get some sleep," George told him. "That's what you're gonna do."

"George, I can't go back there!" the Kid blurted, and at that Regan's grasp on his shoulder tightened in an eloquent token of friendship and sympathy.

The woman Rose had left the Kid in the lurch. He was not going to abandon him now.

"Of course you can't go back there," he said. "You're gonna stay right here with me. Now hit the hay. Go on!"

The Road to Fame.

THE hall was packed with a yelling crowd of fight fans. The are-lights, concentrating their glare on the ring, threw into vivid relief the two men circling and feinting between the ropes.

It was a noteworthy contest—for Kid Mason a stepping-stone to further recognition as a coming world-beater.

A dusky Filipino was his opponent, a tear-away fighter with a notorious right. The Kid boxed him guardedly for three rounds, standing on the defensive, baffling that vicious, lightning-like hook with side-step and parry.

His footwork was a delight to behold, his ringcraft a wonder to the eyes of the true connoisseurs of the prize-fighting art. There were others among the crowd who had paid for seats in the hope of seeing battle and bloodshed, and who appreciated a fierce exchange of blows more than they appreciated skill. But for these, too, the fight was to become momentous.

The bell clanged for the fourth round, and marked a change in the Kid's tactics. He had the measure of the Filipino now, and, back in the corner during his "breather," Regan had whispered words of shrewd counsel.

The Kid danced into his man with both hands at the sound of the gong. A crisp left jared the Filipino, and a six-inch jolt with the right rocked him to the heels. They were the first two blows of a fistie hurricane that piled the Islander against the ropes and then drove him to his knees.

The Kid sprang back as the referee began to count. The Filipino seemed to be in a bad way, but, playing for time, he rose on the word "nine" and sprang at the Kid. A punch that pierced his guard staggered young Mason, but he fought back and overwhelmed his man, the crowd howling encouragement.

The bell saved the Filipino, but it could not save him midway through the next round, when the Kid sent his glove crashing to the jaw and stretched him for the full count.

Next morning the headlines were blazing the result across the sporting columns of the newspapers.

"KID MASON WINS BY KNOCK-OUT ROUTE."

"GEORGE REGAN'S WONDER BOY SCORES FOURTH STRAIGHT 'KAYO.'"

It was this victory which led to articles being signed for a contest with Prince Pearl, that being the high-faluting title of an Alabama nigger with a formidable reputation in the first ranks of the prize-fighters, and a day or two after he had gone into more or less serious training the Kid may have been seen in the gymnasium at Regan's quarters.

Regan sat at a table and played solitaire, but his attention was divided between the cards and the youngster who was working off a few pounds of superfluous weight at the other end of the gym. The Kid was busy at the punching-bag, and the thud of his fists lancing into it, together with the shuffle of his feet, were the only sounds to be heard.

Presently the Kid took a turn at the rings, swinging back and forth through space like a trapeze artist, and finally dropping to the floor a pace or two from where Regan sat.

Regan looked up at him, his keen eye travelling over the youngster's bare, lanky chest.

"Put on your robe," he said curtly. "Do you wanna get pneumonia?"

The Kid reached for a dressing-gown and pulled it about his shoulders. He looked a vastly different specimen from the hopeless failure who had been abandoned by his wife Rose in the culminating bout of a series of defeats. He was virile, confident—self-assured without being objectionably so.

Old Jeff stood near by, and the Kid turned to him.

"Gimme a cigarette, will you, Jeff?" he drawled.

The old-timer voiced disapproval. "Aw, Kid," he protested, "you'll cut your wind."

"Give him one, Jeff," put in George Regan. "Prince Pearl will cut his wind for him."

The Kid leaned across the table. His jaw registered determination. "You think I can't lick that guy, don't you?" he said.

"I don't think," Regan replied sarcastically, still playing his lone-hand game. "But I can read the newspapers, and all the smart money's on the black boy. That's where I'm settin' my wad, too. He'll have his left hand in your face so often you'll think it belongs there."

"All right," snapped the Kid. "Go ahead an' bet on Pearl." And he turned and walked through to the shower-room angrily.

"Say, boss," Jeff said to Regan when the youngster was out of hearing, "why don't you lay off the Kid? You know, when he's training he's just like a caged animal—"

"You let me handle him," George interrupted him, with a smile at the back of his whimsical eyes. "I understand him better'n anyone else in the world. He's got a chance to beat Pearl—a slim chance. But do you think I want him to think so? Do you think I want to swell him up and spoil him?"

"I know, boss, but if you was to encourage him—"

"Encourage nothin'," growled Regan. "He's a prize-fighter, not a prima donna."

McNeil, the Kid's other second, came into the gymnasium at that moment. He had news to impart.

"Say, boss," he announced, "I just saw them two gamblers Mandell an' Riley outside. Maybe they've come around to look the Kid over before they lay out their dough."

Messrs. Riley and Mandell entered the gym. Riley was thin, quick of eye and thought, slow of speech—not too scrupulous, but with something likeable in his manner.

Mandell was of a different stamp, fat and loud, with a false heartiness—a crook without a redeeming virtue.

"Hallo, George!" greeted Riley. "We thought we'd drop in, me an' my handicap, and take a peek at your boy."

"Don't eost nothing to look," said Mandell, with an oily chuckle. "No?"

"He's in the shower," observed Regan, rising and leading the way through to where the Kid was busily towelling himself.

"Hey, Kid," the manager said, "here's a coupla guys heard you were runnin' a peek show. You know Mandell and Riley, don't you?"

The Kid wrapped the towel about his waist. "I don't wanna know 'em," he answered shortly.

"Cheerful lad," commented Riley. "Well, it wouldn't do any harm to know us," he added significantly. "As a matter of fact, Kid, we were aimin' to lay a little money on you."

Regan faced the gamblers. "Come on, spill it," he said. "What's on your minds?"

Riley looked round to make certain that there were no eavesdroppers.

"We've just had a little chat with—Prince Pearl," he explained. "Now, the nigger is willin' to lay down an' lose the fight for five grand—five thousand dollars, Regan—"

The Kid turned from a mirror at which he had been standing and moved over to Regan and the gamblers. His face was expressionless, but there was a tiny glint deep down in his eyes.

"Do you get it, Kid?" said Mandell suavely. "The nigger lays down to one of your punches. Then, later on, you get his chance at a fight with the champion—Mike Shay."

George Regan's face was likewise expressionless. "What do you say, Kid?" he asked slowly, deliberately.

"Well, let me get this straight," said the Kid. "Mandell, you want me and George to give you five thousand to fix the contest. Is that it?"

"Sure, you got it," Mandell replied. "Then there's the other side to it. The odds will be five-to-one against you, at least. You can bet on yourself, and be certain of makin' a big clean-up. And so can we!"

The Kid was playing with him, but Mandell did not know it.

"Well," the youngster murmured, apparently wavering, "I hardly know what to say. How about it, George?"

"Aw, don't be a sucker, Kid," urged Mandell. "You can make more money from this one fight than you can make from fourteen others. You know, lots o' boys do it. Come on—give us the 'okay.' Yes?"

The Kid's right hand closed so that the knuckles stood out white against the skin. Next instant he had whipped his fist to the fat rogue's leering face.

The blow smashed home with an impact that hurled Mandell through the doorway and laid him sprawling on his back.

"What do you think I am—a set-up?" blazed the Kid. "Do I look like a dirty crook? Get out!"

"George!" gasped Riley. "Talk to him, George!"

"He's doin' right," jerked Regan, and he was equally certain that, in felling Mandell, the Kid had floored the instigator of the scheme—Riley merely being a subordinate party to it.

"Get out!" roared the Kid. "Get out, will you?"

Riley ducked swiftly from the shower-room and beat a hasty retreat across the gym. Mandell followed on all fours, groaning loudly. As the gamblers vanished Regan turned to the Kid and reprimanded him.

"How many times have I told you not to throw away punches unless your hands are taped?" he snapped.

"Huh?" the Kid mumbled. "Oh—oh, yeah, I forgot, George!"

"Go an' put your clothes on," growled George Regan. "Do you wanna get pneumonia?"

The referee raised the conqueror's arm, and pandemonium broke loose
July 11th, 1931.

Rose Again.

A BANQUET was being devoured in a private room of one of New York's hotels. It was the night following the Kid's smashing victory over Prince Pearl, and, bearing no signs of punishment except a strip of plaster over one eye, the Kid sat at the head of the table with George Regan on his left hand.

The rest of the party included a number of old-timers who were not too favourably situated as regards money, and seldom had the price of a square meal. It had become the Kid's commendable custom to entertain these unfortunates after each contest that brought him nearer to the peak of Fame—the world's championship.

The Kid was making a speech. "I only lost three or four fights in my whole life," he was saying, "and that was because I didn't listen to what George said. See? He's the best manager in the whole world—see? So I reckon we all oughta give George a hand."

There was loud applause, and George Regan climbed to his feet.

"I'll have to admit the Kid was right when he said a little while ago that I won that fight," he declared, with a twinkle in his eye. "I won it all by myself. The Kid didn't have a thing to do with it"—he grinned—"except, maybe, a couple pounds of dynamite in each hand and a body and chin that must be made of iron. Of course, maybe it's pig iron. Well, boys, I haven't anything more to say except that—well, the next feed the Kid throws will be on the night he takes the championship away from Mike Shay!"

The Kid went to bed that night with the cheers of his admirers ringing in his ears. But the next morning he and George received at their rooms a visitor who had not hitherto been numbered among the coming young prize-fighter's friends. He was Riley the gambler.

"I know you've always been on the square, you and the Kid, George," Riley told Regan, "and I guess I musta been crazy when I tried to fix you guys with Mandell."

"Well, you learned your lesson," George Regan said. "I ain't tryin' to preach, Riley, but the Kid's got where he is because he's always been on the level. The newspapers know it, too. That's why they've been fightin' so hard to get us a match with Mike Shay, the champion."

Riley pursed his lips.

"Yeah, I know," he murmured. "But I think you pulled a rotten deal when you let Mike Shay arrange it so he'd get all the purse."

"Hey, wait a minute," the Kid broke in, from the other side of the room. "What do you mean—Mike Shay get all the purse?"

"The match is for winner take all, ain't it?" said Riley.

"Well, how does that get Shay a dime?" scoffed the Kid.

Riley laughed.

"Oh, that's the way you feel about it," mused Riley. "Kinda confident, huh?"

"Well, Mike will probably murder the Kid," observed George Regan, already beginning to bait his protégé over his coming contest in that scathing, but effective, style which he had learned to employ. "But what's the difference? He's made plenty of money already."

The telephone bell rang at that moment. The caller was a girl by the name of Gladys De Vere, and her motive in ringing up was to threaten breach of promise. Now, the Kid, who was still legally the husband of Rose, had made no promises. But Gladys De Vere's particular "graft" was to become acquainted with celebrities and then attempt blackmail, knowing that in nine cases out of ten they would pay up rather than face the undesirable publicity of a court action.

For her, the Kid's case proved the unlucky tenth. George Regan saw to that, and, with the invaluable assistance of Riley, convinced her that she was treading on dangerous ground.

Immediately after the situation had been relieved a telegram arrived for the Kid, and as the latter was ripping it open George Regan gave him a few words of advice.

"After this, watch your step, Kid," he said, "watch your step."

"Don't you worry," the Kid declared emphatically. "I'm through with the fair sex for life." Then, as he read the contents of the wire he had received, his face changed colour, and: "Oh, George—George," he panted, "come in here."

He backed into the bed-room, and Regan followed him.

"What is it, Kid?" he demanded.

"It's from—from Rose," the Kid answered. "She's in town—she wants to see me. Look, it says she's sick. She—she might even be dyin'—"

Regan's mouth had hardened.

"Don't fall for that," he began, but the Kid interrupted him.

"We've gotta see her, George," he jerked. "We've gotta see her!"

Argument was in vain. Twenty minutes later they were alighting from a cab outside a dingy boarding-house, to which they were admitted by a harassed-looking landlady.

"Your little wife's been a mighty sick little woman, Mr. Mason," the woman said, as soon as the Kid and Regan had introduced themselves.

"Yeah, I know," the Kid rejoined hurriedly. Then, turning to his manager excitedly: "This is the place all right, George," he stammered, scarcely knowing what he was saying.

"What do you want me to do?" growled Regan. "Kiss it?"

The landlady led the way upstairs, singing Rose's praises en route, while George Regan listened shrewdly and thought his own private thoughts.

In a second-floor room a girl heard their approaching footfalls. She was Rose, and, the picture of health, she was reclining at her ease in a deep arm-chair. The moment the Kid's voice reached her ears, however, she gathered some cushions about her and lay back in a wilting attitude, like one recuperating from a long and dangerous illness.

The Kid came into the room, and Rose looked at him with an expression guaranteed to arouse pity.

"I was afraid—you wouldn't come," she said in a frail voice.

The Kid dropped on his knees beside her.

"Why shouldn't I, honey?" he protested.

"I've been awful sick, Kid," she told him with a catch in her voice. "I almost died. And I missed you so. Oh, Kid, forgive me."

"There's nothing to forgive, Rose!"

Just outside the door George Regan was talking to the landlady in an undertone.

"How much does that baby owe you?" he demanded. "Aw, I'm not a sap, ma'm. How much is it?"

"Oh—er—four weeks' rent," the landlady answered. "Forty-eight dollars. And meals—and private baths—"

"I knew it," said Regan, handing over a sheaf of notes. "Rose wouldn't have bothered to send that wire if things had been going well with her, or if the Kid had not made good—"

Regan walked into the bed-room, and looked down at the re-united couple.

"Tricks been comin' kinda tough lately, huh?" he said to Rose, not the least impressed by her play-acting.

"Show business?"

"Movies," she told him. "All the directors admired my talents, but you've got to be on the inside at Hollywood. Maybe I'd have been all right if I hadn't taken the 'flu.'"

"Well, you don't have to worry," Regan drawled in a queer tone. "The Kid's been knockin' 'em over lately."

Rose leaned her head against the young boxer's shoulder with exaggerated affection.

"Oh, I read every word of it," she breathed. "That's all I had eyes for."

"Oh, you've been followin' his doings, huh?" Regan murmured. "I thought you'd be interested. But let me tell you somethin'. You'd better take a long look at the Kid, because you ain't gonna see much more of him until after Mike Shay gets through plasterin' him around."

Rose sat up with a jerk, her "sickness" for the moment forgotten.

"Mike Shay?" she exclaimed. "Not the champion?"

"Sure, the Kid's matched to fight him," said Regan. "You'll be able to nurse him back to health after Mike's finished with him."

"Yeah?" mocked the Kid, raising his glance. "You thought the same about Prince Pearl. Well, let me tell you somethin'. You're lookin' at the next champion right now!"

The Championship.

IT was the afternoon of the big fight, and champ. and challenger were weighing in. The Kid, first to step on to the scales, posed for a Press photographer, then drew aside for Shay, whose powerful frame and rugged countenance looked as forbidding as they were formidable.

The Kid walked to the background, where George Regan presently joined him.

"George," said the Kid in a husky undertone. "I—I've gotta win that fight to-night. I've gotta be champion—"

That evening Madison Square Gardens was the Mecca of fight fans from all over the American Continent, and thousands passed under the imposing archway.

Fifty minutes after the last seat had been occupied, and when one or two minor contests had been staged, the principals of the big battle for the championship stepped into the ring, amid an uproar of cheering.

Preliminaries over, the seconds ducked outside the ropes, and to the sound of the bell champ. and challenger slid from their respective corners.

They shook hands, turned, and then circled warily under the arc-lights, the Kid bearing in mind every word of counsel that George Regan had ever uttered, Shay hiding his time and taking the measure of his man ere loosing off his big guns.

The Kid feinted for the body and ripped a punch towards the champion's jaw. Shay parried and slammed his right to the ribs with a shock that brought a grunt from the challenger. But the Kid connected with a stiff left, raising a murmur of approval from his supporters.

Ten seconds later Shay scored heavily in a hard spell of in-fighting, his strongest card, and as the Kid tried to dance out of range he leapt after him and crowded him to the ropes with a bombardment of punches that brought the spectators to their feet.

The Kid's defensive tactics in the face of that onslaught were magnificent, covering all vulnerable points, blocking the champion's route to a quick knockout. The Kid was punished, but only where he could stand punishment. No hammer-blow smashed home to jaw or solar.

The bell intervened when Shay was still striving to plaster the Kid with telling punches. Shay took the honours for the first round.

The second round found the Kid remaining on the defensive. His whole being yearned to launch an attack that would overwhelm the champion's, but George Regan's advice was drumming through his brain, and he held himself in check.

Shay, battling savagely, piled up the points in his favour, but he could not break through the challenger's guard to land a decisive blow, or one that would weaken the Kid's stamina and leave him wide open for a clean-cut "kayo." The Kid's body was marked, but when the bell changed once more he slithered to his corner with an agile stride and a tireless grin.

Round three opened with a fierce rally, both men "mixing it," giving and taking punches that snapped home with the smart thud of padded leather pounding flesh and bone. The crowd roared, and, mingling with the din, the voice of an announcer broadcasting the fight rose to a shrill pitch of excitement.

The Kid was fighting back. Attack and defence skilfully balanced, he planted left and right in the champion's face and body, and plainly had him worried. But Shay came in again towards the end of the three-minute spell and finished strongly. The round was even.

Shay used all he had in the beginning of the fourth round, for he could see that the Kid was settling down, and he aimed to break him before he could get into his stride. He came dangerously near to succeeding, but the Kid weathered the fury of the onslaught, and as it waned he gradually opened himself out and took the offensive.

The champ, was rattled with a volley of punches, and, as he let himself go, the Kid's attack became something that was as dynamic as a storm. Shay was battered into a corner from which he failed to escape. His ribs and chest began to show raw weals of punishment, and a right-hook brought him to his knees at the close of the round, which was the challenger's.

The champion opened shakily when the bell had signalled the seconds out of the ring again, and the Kid waded into him, raining blows from every angle. The crowd rose as one man and howled encouragement. Amid the clamour the thudding of the Kid's mitts could be heard planting punch after punch with deadly effect, smashing Shay's rugged physique, smashing their way to the title.

Shay tried to cover up, but a crisp drive to the solar bored under his guard. His hands dropped, and the Kid whipped his right to the jaw with an impact that numbed the champ. He dropped, and pandemonium seemed to break loose among the spectators. Shay was down, and looked as if he were to stay down.

"Six—seven—eight—"

The champion struggled up gamely. But he was a beaten man, and in no shape to stave off the end for long. The Kid slithered close to him again and slammed his glove to the point once more. Shay came up on his toes and toppled face forward, and he was counted out amid scenes of the wildest enthusiasm and excitement.

The Kid was the first to help Shay to his corner, and then, carrying the title belt, he came to the ringside and leaned through the ropes to speak into a microphone that the wireless announcer was indicating.

"The new champion of the world, Kid Mason, is going to say a few words to you," the announcer called. "Talk right in here, champ."

"Hallo, folks!" said the Kid, his voice querulous with the thrill of his achievement. "I'm—I'm mighty glad to be champion, and—and I want to say for Mike Shay that he was no easy cinch—see? He's a good scrapper. And—and—" He stammered for a moment. Then, with a sheepish grin: "Hallo, Rose," he added, "I won! I'll be right home—"

Later that night the new champion might have been seen with his striking wife at one of the exclusive restaurants in town, an uncomfortable and rather wistful figure in a starched shirt and an elegantly-cut evening suit, his good humour somewhat damped by the fact that he was not celebrating his victory in the customary way.

"What's the matter?" Rose asked with a sidelong glance at him. "Aren't you enjoying yourself?"

"Oh, sure!" the Kid told her hurriedly. "Sure. I was just wishing you'd let me ask George to come along—"

A look of impatience appeared in Rose's eyes. The expression was quickly curbed.

"But you're the champion now, dear," she protested. "We must associate with the better class of people—people of refinement."

The Kid stared gloomily at his champagne glass.

"Yeah, I know," he muttered. "But I was thinkin' of the boys. I always used to throw a feed for them—you know, the fellers that were down on their luck."

"Oh, celebrating your victory with a lot of riff-raff!" Rose snapped peevishly.

And, meanwhile, in a private room of a certain modest hotel, George Regan was doing his best to explain the Kid's absence to the so-called "riff-raff."

It was an absence that was prolonged far beyond the duration of the banquet, as Mr. and Mrs. Mason repaired the following day to Miami, Florida, where smart Society gathered during the season; and in the weeks that ensued, George Regan took to drink occasionally.

It was a habit that he had not indulged in before. But with the Kid's departure to the south something seemed to have gone out of Regan's existence—that companionship which had meant more to him than anything else in the whole world.

Once the Kid sent a postcard. "Greetings from me and Rose," it read. "Your old pal, Kid Mason."

And as George scanned it he raised a glass from which he had been imbibing liquor.

"Here's to you, Rosie," he toasted. "You're a better man than I am."

At that very moment, over a thousand miles away, Kid Mason was engrossed in conversation with a bell-boy of the sumptuous hotel at which he was staying.

"It's like I said," the Kid was telling the lad, "it ain't easy—see? You got to train hard and live clean. You got to take a lot of hard knocks. But if you're on the up-and-up about this—"

"Oh, I am, Mr. Mason!" the boy assured him eagerly. "Gee, I don't know what I wouldn't do to become a real fighter—I mean a fighter like you! A champ!"

Rose, appearing at that juncture, the conversation was interrupted. When the bell-boy had gone she remonstrated with the Kid.

"Dearest," she appealed, "how many times must I ask you not to be familiar with the hotel staff?"

"Yeah, I know," the Kid protested. "But that boy's been fightin' amateur, and he looks pretty good—"

"But you forget you're the champion now, dear," Rose argued. "You're a big man—you're important!"

The Kid looked pleased, and adjusted his tie with a gesture that was almost snug. "Yeah, I guess you're right,"

The blow was hardly struck ere the Kid regretted it.

he murmured. "Say, have you noticed how everybody looks at me when I walk into the dining-room?"

"Well, why shouldn't they?" The Kid's clean-cut face registered self-satisfaction. Already it seemed as if the first seeds of an unbearable conceit and vanity were being sown in him by this woman who could influence him so much.

The Return.

IN the sparring ring at George Regan's quarters two masked figures were engaged in a work-out. One was a young fellow by the name of Rattler O'Keefe. Of the same fighting-weight as Kid Mason, he as yet lacked the champion's experience, and would probably never possess the Kid's sheer genius for ringcraft and footwork, which Regan had so skilfully developed. But he was a "come-on" with plenty of promise, bidding fair to go a long way in the glove game under George's expert handling.

George Regan called him over at the end of the bout.

"Hey, Rattler," he snapped, "come here! How many times have I got to remind you that you have two hands? Your left hand—what's that for? Do you get me?"

"Yes, sir," said Rattler, a willing pupil.

"What?" jerked Regan.

"Yes, George," Rattler corrected hastily.

Regan's eyes twinkled.

"That's better," he began, but before he could say more there was a commotion at the entrance to the gym, and the voice of old Jeff was heard to give utterance to a joyful exclamation.

"Hurrah! It's the champ!"

A resplendent figure crossed the threshold. He carried an ebony cane and was dressed in a bowler-hat and morning suit, silk shirt, diamond tiepin, and patent shoes finishing off the picture. It was difficult to reconcile him with the old Kid Mason, for his manner as well as his appearance seemed changed.

"Gee," old Jeff murmured, "but you look swell! How've you been, champ?"

"Oh, fine, Jeff—fine!" the Kid drawled airily. "See you later." And he sauntered past the old fellow to where George Regan was standing.

They shook hands.

"Hallo, Kid!" George greeted.

"What are you made up for?"

The Kid's laugh was almost condescendingly good-natured.

"Still the same kiddie, George," he observed. "You haven't changed a bit."

Regan's latest protégé approached.

"Hallo, champ!" he said, holding out his fist. "I'm Rattler O'Keefe."

The Kid raised his eyebrows and pointedly ignored the other's hand. Rattler seemed nonplussed, and glanced at Regan awkwardly. The fight-manager was watching the Kid, a queer, shrewd glint in his eyes.

"O'Keefe?" said the Kid, with a pretence of being puzzled. "Oh, yeah—yeah—I think I did read something about you in the papers down in Florida."

"George here bought up my contract," Rattler explained. "We're working in the same stable now, champ."

"Yeah?" The Kid's lip almost curled.

"Well, that's great." Then, as Rattler moved away discomfited, the Kid looked around with contempt. "The same bunch of mugs," he mused with a sneer. "Never getting any place. Well, how've you been getting along without me, George?"

"Oh, fine!" said Regan. "I've been July 11th, 1931.

busy—training fighters; fighters who'll fight, I mean. You don't seem to be in any hurry."

"There's no rush, is there?" the Kid argued. "Matter of fact, we've just been getting settled in a new apartment, and Rose—"

"Oh, the missus, eh?" said Regan, with involuntary sarcasm.

The Kid's eyes narrowed angrily.

"Now, listen, George," he ground out. "If you've got any more to say about that, you'd better not say it. Because what I do for Rose is my business and nobody else's. Oh, what's the use?" he added, cooling down. "I didn't come here to start a row with you. I just wanted to ask you to come over and see the new apartment."

"Why, I'd like to, Kid," George muttered. "But—you know Rose doesn't want me up there."

The Kid smiled.

"Well," he stated, "you're going to get the surprise of your life if you think Rose doesn't like you, George. I'm telling you. Wait till you see her. She's a changed girl—you'd never know her. Oh, come and see for yourself!"

So George Regan was coaxed into accompanying the Kid to his magnificent suite not far from Fifth Avenue.

An elevator took them to the tenth floor of the pretentious building in which it was located, and as their shoes sank into the pile of a thick corridor carpet George expressed his admiration.

They reached a door above which a cunning electric sign bore the name "Mason."

"Oh, by the way, George," the Kid mentioned, "in a place like this you've gotta have a lot of servants, you know. Matter of fact, Rose has a butler. But what I was going to say is—please don't wise-crack."

The Kid rang a bell, and the door was opened by a man in morning dress who happened to be in the hall—a tall, pallid, immaculate man with a small, dark moustache.

The butler, thought George, and handed him his hat. The man took it, looked at him curiously, and then spoke to the Kid.

"Mr. Mason, I presume," he said. "My name's Lewis—Paul H. Lewis. I've been delightfully entertained by Mrs. Mason. She's a very dear friend of my wife. We met her in Hollywood."

"Oh, I've heard her talk about you!" the Kid answered. "Meet my manager, Mr. Regan."

George acknowledged the introduction sheepishly and grabbed back his head-gear.

"How are yuh?" he said. "Er—I'm sorry about the hat."

They walked through to a sumptuous lounge where Rose and Mrs. Lewis were sitting, and sure enough, George Regan found Rose peculiarly charming to him, though he had the feeling that her friendliness was not sincere.

Lewis, who was connected with the screen and the stage, had once been a fight manager, and some conversation on that subject followed. Then Rose suggested that the Kid might show George over the rest of the apartment, and Mrs. Lewis insisted on accompanying the two men in their tour of the rooms.

Lewis and Rose were left alone. Pausing a little way beyond the threshold of the lounge, Regan looked back and saw that they were sitting close to each other on a davenport couch, and, regarding them for a moment, it struck Regan that they seemed rather more than friendly now that Mrs. Lewis and the Kid were out of the way.

Some time later, when George Regan announced that he must be going, the Kid accompanied him to the front door.

"Yes, sir, the place is a knock-out," Regan declared emphatically. "Silk sheets, futuristic furniture, servants an' everything." Then: "Say, Kid," he added all at once, "do you have black coffee with your supper here?"

"Why, yes, sure," the Kid answered in a puzzled fashion. "Afterwards, if you want it."

"Good idea," said George Regan cryptically. "Keeps your eyes open. Keeps you awake. Drink a lot of it, Kid."

The Kid stared after him wonderingly as he went out into the corridor.

The Split.

THREE nights later, as Kid Mason was strolling into a smart cabaret-restaurant in which Paul Lewis was interested, a reporter buttonholed him.

"I'm from the 'Morning News,'" the Press man explained. "Can you tip me off when you intend to give Sailor Hess a match, champ?"

The Kid's eyes glittered.

"You've got your nerve, waylaying me!" he rapped out. "Listen, I've got nothing to say—except that I'll fight Sailor Hess when he's good enough to get up against me! You can print that."

The reporter looked at the Kid disgustedly as the latter turned on his heel. Then he called after him:

"Oh, how about Joe Savella? He's spoilin' for a fight with you, too."

"When I'm ready to take on gas-house pugs, I let you know," the Kid said over his shoulder.

The reporter sneered.

"Oh, I see!" he muttered under his breath. "What size hat do you wear?"

The following day the "New York Evening Post" came out with two-inch headlines concerning that brief interview.

"NEW CHAMPION'S HEAD TOO LARGE FOR CROWN.

Iron Man Kid Mason,

Now Training in Night Clubs, Says Challengers are Gas-house Pugs!"

George Regan read those scathing comments at the gymnasium, and with a bitter expression on his face took a cab to the Kid's apartment, meeting the boxer in the hall.

From the direction of the lounge came the sound of lazy music and drawing voices.

"I'm sorry," Regan apologised; "I didn't know you had a party. I wanted to talk to you about this razzing you're getting in the newspapers."

The Kid looked annoyed.

"This is not the place to talk about that," he said, "in a man's home."

"Well, I have to come up here if I want to see you," Regan reminded him bluntly. "You're never at the gym."

"Aw, we'll talk about it later," the Kid rejoined. "Come in and have a drink before you go."

He led him into the lounge and over to a table that was laden with bottles. George took one drink—then another—and another. The reason for his call was almost forgotten; he began to talk reminiscently of their early days, and the Kid, his old self for the moment, laughed heartily over some of the incidents that were recalled. Then a girl came up and insisted that he should dance with her, and George Regan was left to himself.

Rose and Paul Lewis were already among the couples who were gliding across the floor to the music of a radio-graphophone, and presently the two of them paused beside a wide, carpeted sight of steps that ascended to the hall. A significant look passed between them, and, first glancing round to make certain that they were unobserved, they slipped from the lounge and moved across the hall. It was at that moment that George Regan chanced to turn his head, and, slightly fuddled though he was, the spectacle of them vanishing into one of the other rooms sobered him instantly.

He set down his glass and walked in the direction that Rose and Lewis had taken. He entered an apartment at the other side of the hall. It was empty, but, looking through to a small room beyond, he saw the Kid's wife in Lewis' arms.

Regan closed the door of the larger room noisily. Rose drew away from Lewis with a start, turned swiftly, and then came into the apartment where the fight manager was standing.

"George," she panted, "you shouldn't come in here!"

He did not answer her, but the contempt in his glance was eloquent. Wheeling, he went out into the hall again and back to the lounge, where he poured himself another drink, almost savagely.

Rose and Lewis appeared in the lounge a few seconds afterwards. Both of them seemed uneasy, but, looking viciously at Regan, Rose spoke to a butler and asked him to tell the Kid she wished to see him.

The message was delivered, and the Kid came across the lounge.

"You've got to get George out of here," Rose said, her voice quivering with anger. "He's bothering people—trailing them into the other rooms. I don't want him in my house!"

The Kid bit his lip.

"Let me talk to him," he jerked, and made his way to where the fight manager stood.

"George," he said firmly, "you've gotta cut out bothering the guests, see? Otherwise, I'm gonna ask you to go home. Rose tells me you've been following people into other rooms an' pesterin' them. Well, you can't do that."

Regan stared at him for a moment, and then brushed past him en route to the hall. At the steps he paused and addressed Rose vehemently.

"So I've been bustin' into other rooms, huh? I've been spyin' on people, have I—"

Lewis planted himself in front of Rose. "Now listen, Regan," he snapped. "Try to behave like a gentleman. Go on—get out!"

George glared at him truculently. "So Rose told the Kid what I was doin'," he grated. "Why didn't she tell him what I saw?"

"Get out of here!" Lewis snarled. "You're drunk!"

George Regan's restraint was sundered by a surge of violent rage. With a hoarse cry he launched himself at Lewis, striking him and then grappling with him.

Lewis staggered back to the wall, his face white and scared. There was an outcry among the guests. Then Kid Mason leapt across the room, seized George Regan and dragged him away bodily.

"George, George," he protested, "have you gone crazy?" His voice became more heated in its tone.

"You'd better go on home. Go on home, I said. You hear me? Get out!"

"Why, you poor dummy!" Regan blurted. "If you had any brains at all you'd see that this double-crossin' wife of yours—"

He never finished the sentence, for, eyes blazing, the Kid lashed out at him. His fist drove crashing into Regan's jaw, and, hurling him off his feet, sent the fight manager sprawling across the stairs.

The blow was hardly struck ere the Kid regretted it, and, with an exclamation, he ran forward and fell on his knees beside the man who was his best friend.

"George!" he groaned. "George!" "Throw him out in the street!"

It was Rose's voice, but the Kid scarcely heard her. Turning, he called to the butler, ordering him to help him with George Regan's prone form.

When Regan recovered consciousness he was back in his own room near the training quarters. He was stretched out on a bed, and the Kid was bending over him, having apparently been making anxious efforts to revive him.

"George, I didn't mean to go so far," the Kid pleaded, "but I had to do it!"

"Aw, get out of here an' leave me alone!" Regan flung at him.

"George, you—"

"Get out of here!" Regan said fiercely. "Leave me alone!"

The Kid turned slowly.

The New Challenger.

MENEIL and old Jeff were talking in the gym.

"Look what he done to Sailor Hess," McNeil was saying. "Did you see the Sailor? Teeth knocked out, nose bleedin', broken jaw! A beautiful picture!"

"Well," declared Jeff, "Rattier O'Keefe can thank George Regan. George learned him everything he knows. Just the same, I'd like to know what George is holdin' him back for. Why don't he fix him up with more fights?"

"I can't figure George out lately," returned McNeil, "except that he's drinkin' too much—"

While these two discussed him and his latest protégé, George Regan was reclining on a sofa in his room, lost to his surroundings in the oblivion of a heavy slumber. In fact, a loud knocking on the door, followed by the entry of a man and a woman, failed to disturb him—so deep was his sleep.

The visitors were Rose Mason and Paul Lewis, and only by tapping the surface of a table with his cane did Lewis succeed in awakening Regan. The fight manager looked up, then blinked dazedly, and then heaved himself into a sitting posture.

"I hope you'll pardon our intrusion," said Lewis contemptuously, "but they told us at the gymnasium that we'd probably find you here."

"Drunk," added Rose. "Listen,

Still struggling savagely, the Kid was dragged from the dressing-room.

George, we've come here to tell you that you and the Kid are through. We had a talk with him last night, and he agrees with us that you're the wrong man for him."

"Oh, I see!" George Regan murmured. Then, nodding towards Lewis: "Is he the new manager?" he demanded.

"I have the honour of representing Mr. Mason," put in Lewis, "and I'm here to buy back that contract you had with the Kid. I presume you'll be willing to sell it to us."

"I will not," Regan answered. "But I'll give it to you. Only you'll have to understand this. Before I tear up that contract, the Kid will have to sign a paper. He may not remember the fact, but there's a clause in the contract that says he's got to fight whoever I say—any time—any place."

Rose looked at him venomously. "Oh, what a sap he was to sign a thing like that!" she bit out.

"Yeah, just a sap," agreed Regan carelessly. "But, all the same, before I tear up the contract, he's got to agree to give my new boy, Rattler O'Keefe, a shot at the championship within four months."

"He'll sign it," said Rose.

Regan grinned up at her.

"Fine," he observed. "Well, there's nothing more."

Rose took the hint.

"Come on, Paul," she said, turning towards the door.

"Certainly, my dear," Lewis drawled. Thus, two or three months later, somewhere on Long Island, smart Société crowds may have been seen flocking to the grounds of a villa which bore the sign, in large letters: "Kid Mason's Training Quarters."

In a room overlooking those grounds Kid Mason raged to and fro like a caged lion. He looked strung up, ill-tempered, out of harmony with his surroundings.

Old Jeff was with him, for, even after the Kid's treatment of Regan, the old fellow had not found it in his heart to abandon the champ.

"I hate to tell you this, Kid," Jeff was saying, "but we ain't gettin' nowhere. You ain't taken off a pound since we been here, and you're fightin' O'Keefe in two days—"

The Kid rounded on him.

"Well, I don't need to train to fight that guy!" he rapped out. "A fine camp this is, anyway. I gotta be promoter, manager, main attraction, and everything. Well, I can do it, see? I know more about fightin' than all you saps put together."

He turned to the window again, and suddenly his expression became still more resentful.

"Here comes Lewis," he said bitterly. "To see him swaggerin' out there you'd think he was the champion! Where's he been lately? He ain't showed up since last Saturday!"

Lewis entered the room a few seconds later.

"Hallo, Kid," he greeted breezily, and then, observing he was dressed in sweater and flannels: "Come, come," he went on, "get into your fighting togs, Kid. The crowd's waiting for an exhibition."

"Well, I don't feel like clowning for a bunch of yaps," the Kid shouted violently. "Tell them to beat it! D'you hear? Tell 'em to beat it! And listen, Lewis, it's a funny thing you can find so much to do in the city that you can't be down here."

Lewis' expression became uneasy.

"What do you mean?" he muttered.

"Just what I say," the Kid rapped out, and swung on his heel.

July 11th, 1931.

"Where are you going?" Lewis demanded.

"To see my wife," was the curt rejoinder. "Joe, get out the roadster!"

Lewis made his way to another room, picked up a telephone and asked for "Long Distance." A minute or so later he was in touch with the Kid's apartment in New York, and speaking to Rose.

"Listen," he said, in low but deliberate tones. "The Kid's on his way into town to see you. Now, I don't know if he's wise to anything or not, but he's been acting mighty funny."

"Oh, Paul," came the scared voice of Rose, "what'll I do?"

"Just watch your step," Lewis told her. "He's getting dressed now. He should be up there in about three hours."

And within three hours Kid Mason was at his suite in the City, confiding to Rose his hatred of the man who had taken George Regan's place as his manager.

"A fine manager that guy is," he ground out. "Where's he been all this last week, anyway?"

"Why, how should I know, Kid?" said Rose, a look of assumed innocence in her big blue eyes.

Mason v. O'Keefe.

ONCE again, as on the night when Kid Mason had defeated Shay, the famous Madison Square Gardens were packed with an eager throng, fight fans from all over the States awaiting the appearance of the contestants in the ring.

The odds were in favour of the champ., but in his dressing-room Kid Mason was pacing to and fro nervously, listening with impatience to the conflicting advice of his camp-followers.

"No, suh," a big Negro was saying. "De bcs' 'ting fo' de champ to do is to stop O'Keefe in de firs' round."

"Aw, you're crazy," put in old Jeff. "He's got to stall like he always does—see? Like George Regan always—"

Paul Lewis entered the room.

"How are you feeling, Kid?" he asked, approaching the champion. "Your bandages all right, eh?"

The Kid glared at him.

"Are you goin' to keep askin' me that all night?" he snapped. "Ain't you gettin' on my nerves enough?"

"What the Kid's got to do," old Jeff was saying, "is to wait for a perfect opening—"

"Shut up!" barked the Kid. "I'm rnmnin' this show, and I'll fight the way I want to!"

There was a knock on the door at that moment, and Lewis answered it. A messenger appeared with a batch of letters and telegrams wishing the champion success. The Kid did not look at them, but slung them on to a table, and he was pacing the dressing-room again when the official "inspector" dropped in with George Regan, rival manager, to examine the title-holder's bandages.

The inspector crossed to the Kid and took hold of his hands. George Regan remained in the doorway, and was standing there when his glance encountered the pile of correspondence that the Kid had flung on the table. Suddenly that glance fastened upon one of the letters, and with a surreptitious movement he picked it up and slipped it into his pocket, thinking that the gesture had passed unseen.

"You want to see the Kid's hands, George?" the inspector inquired a moment later.

"No, they're okay," Regan answered, and he was turning to go when Lewis restrained him.

"Mr. Regan," Lewis said, "I don't believe that letter you took from the table belongs to you."

The Kid started violently and then strode past Lewis to confront Regan. "What's this?" he jerked. "Say, you gimme that letter. Come on—hand it over!"

"After the fight," George answered quietly, and the Kid's eyes blazed.

"Who are you to tell me when?" he stormed. "Come on, give me that letter!"

George Regan shrugged his shoulders. "You asked for it," he said between his teeth, and, throwing the missive on the table, he made his way back to O'Keefe's quarters.

The Kid ripped open the letter.

"Dear Mr. Mason," he read,— "Having come to Reno to secure a divorce from my husband, Paul Lewis, I think it only fair to advise you that I am naming your wife as the reason for my taking proceedings—on the basis of sufficient evidence in my possession.

"Respectfully,
"MRS. LOUISE LEWIS."

There was a moment's silence, and then the Kid, letting that message fall to the floor, wheeled suddenly and sprang at Lewis like a madman.

"You dirty hound!"

Jeff and two or three of the other men in the dressing-room clutched the Kid as Lewis stumbled back in alarm. There was a frenzied scuffle, interrupted by the advent of the official caller.

"Come on there, come on," the latter shouted. "They're waiting. Get your champ. in the ring."

Still struggling savagely, blind to everything but the revelation which that letter had contained, the Kid was dragged from the room. Only when he had gone did Lewis recover something of his composure, and stooped to snatch the tell-tale epistle from the floor.

A glance at its contents told him the reason for the Kid's outburst, and a few minutes later he was at Rose's flat, explaining the circumstances to her.

Rose took the news coolly enough at first, not realising the magnitude of the disaster.

"So your wife's going to sue me?" she sneered. "A fat chance she's got!"

"That isn't the half of it," said Lewis. "The Kid's read the letter and he's wise. Now listen. Get your jewels and grab all the money you can lay hands on, and let's get out of here."

Rose stood with her hands on her hips and regarded him insolently.

"So that's it," she mocked. "What do you think I'm going to do—support you? Do you think I'm going to be your meal ticket?"

Lewis stared at her, his eyes narrowing.

"I see, the angle," he ground out. "It's every man for himself, eh? All right, that's great. But before I go, I'm going to give you a nice little present."

He moved nearer to her, a queer smile playing around his lips. Then all at once he took his hand across her face in a resounding slap that left a broad red weal and raised a scream of pain from her.

About that same time, the first blow was about to be struck in the fight for the Middleweight Championship at Madison Square Gardens.

The clang of the bell had brought holder and challenger from their respec-

(Continued on page 28.)

Traditions—loyalty—iron nerves—tingling romance and stirring drama among the thundering guns of the mighty battle fleet! Starring Robert Montgomery, Dorothy Jordan and Ernest Torrence.

Shore Leave.

THE bugler rang out a call on the United States battleship Colorado one bright, summer morning, and a crowd of men at the double poured on to the foredeck. They formed up, and stood stiffly at attention as Captain Beatty, followed by his officers, stepped from his quarters on to the deck, and walked forward to a position just in front of the two great twelve-inch guns that peered out from their barbettes towards the bow.

Captain Beatty reached his post, and, with his staff, also came rigidly to attention. A moment later Admiral Corbin, in command of the fleet, came from his cabin to the deck. Grey-haired, tall and stately, with an unmistakable air of authority in his look, the admiral advanced to the group of officers. Salutes were exchanged, and the admiral indicated by a nod that he was ready to address the men.

The whole crew of the battleship was assembled on the foredeck to hear Admiral Corbin speak. Over a thousand men were gathered there, and yet the silence was profound. Only now and then a gust of wind flapping the bunting overhead broke the deep quiet as the admiral began his speech.

"Officers and men of the flagship Colorado, I have before me on this table the silver cup awarded by the Admiralty to the ship having the best record in gunnery at the last battle practice. You won the cup six months ago, and you must keep it when the fleet goes out again next week for another practice."

The admiral paused, and suddenly there smote upon the horrified ears of the crew the sound of cheerful voices upraised in song, seemingly from the stern of the battleship.

Chief-bo'sun's-mate Scott, standing at the right hand of the group of officers, turned to a lieutenant near by.

"It's those 'gobs' on the oil barge alongside," he whispered hoarsely. "Shall I go and stop 'em making that row, sir?"

The lieutenant nodded assent, and the petty officer ran off to the stern. Chief-bo'sun's-mate Scott, known as "Scotty" to the whole crew, was a hard-boiled individual of splendid physique, stern of face and heavy of fist, who was feared and yet respected by the men under him.

He reached the stern and looked over the side. Just beneath was a naval oil barge which had come up that morning with a supply of fuel for the battleship, and on its deck were two sailors reclining at their ease and singing away heartily.

"Hi, you gobs!" yelled the petty officer wrathfully. "Stop that row! The admiral is making a speech!"

"Is he, really? Tell him to speak louder; we can't hear him."

Scotty glared at the speaker, one John Jones, a thin, wiry-looking fellow called "Jonesy" by his pals on the oil ship. Jonesy was not under the chief petty officer's orders, and he was well aware of the fact.

"If you must be a blinking canary," cried Scotty, "you might choose some other time to sing your song!"

Jonesy turned lazily to his pal Bryan, a short fat sailor, known to everyone as "Bilge."

"Say, Bilge," he remarked, "have you noticed that thing dressed up in all sorts of stars and stripes hanging over the rail up there? Do you think you would know it again if you saw it anywhere?"

"Take a good look at me, sailors!" shouted the petty officer furiously. "And you'll know me again, maybe!"

Gosh! If I had you aboard this ship I'd soon show you what I am."

"Says you!" said Jonesy, getting slowly to his feet. The admiral had finished his speech by this time, and a crowd of sailors had gathered around Scotty to listen with immense enjoyment to the altercation.

Jonesy made as if to go below, but he suddenly stooped and picked up a sponge, a very oily one. Turning, he lurled it straight up at the petty officer. The unsavoury missile struck Scotty on the forehead, knocking his cap off his head, while trickles of dirty oil ran down his face.

"You darned cuss!" roared the petty officer as his shipmates burst into hilarious laughter. "I'll have you in the cells for this. I'll—"

A bugle-call rang out, and Scotty could say no more. He went off at the double, after retrieving his cap, his shipmates following him, and Jonesy turned to Bilge with a cheerful grin.

"Guess he got what was coming to him, anyway," he laughed. "Well, that's enough of that! You coming on shore to-night, Bilge?"

"Sure I am, Jonesy," said his pal. "I reckon to find a girl somewhere this evening."

Jonesy looked at Bilge and grinned, for his pal did not rejoice in a form of manly beauty, and his efforts to obtain a girl had so far proved unsuccessful.

An hour later a jovial party of sailors on shore leave landed at the quay and made for the Sailors' Home at the double. Presently they streamed out again, no longer in the regulation blue uniform and white cap, but clad in ordinary civilian attire.

"Say, what you got there, Jonesy?" cried Bilge, noticing a parcel under his friend's arm as they came out together.

"Present for your girl, eh? You got a girl?"

"Sure I have, Bilge," replied Jonesy. "Met her last week. She's a real good-looker. I bought her some silk stockings for a present, and I'm off to her place right now."

"Has your girl got a sister who wouldn't mind walking out with me?" asked Bilge wistfully, surveying his tubby figure with considerable disgust.

"Huh!" snorted Jonesy scornfully. "My girl thinks I'm a big oil man from Oklahoma. You keep off; you might spill the beans!"

Jonesy sprinted off, leaving Bilge staring dismally after him.

"Guess I'll have a woman tattooed on me," he growled. "That's all I'm ever likely to get, I reckon."

Meanwhile Jonesy had turned into a garage to hire a car for the day. Getting into it, he drove away and out of the town for some miles until he came to a fair-sized house in the country. Here he got out and walked up to the door. A burly, ruffianly-looking fellow answered his knock.

"Er—docs Letitia live here?" he murmured, taken aback by the fierce glare the man cast upon him.

"Yes; she is my wife!" growled the fellow angrily.

Jonesy had met the fair Letitia only once, and he had no idea who she really was. He edged away from the truculent individual before him, and then a brilliant idea came into his mind.

"Can I interest you in some silk stockings?" he remarked persuasively.

"Not so much as you have interested me in this," shouted the man, producing a telegram. "Your name's Jones, I reckon. You sent this to my wife to say you were calling this evening, and now I'm going to bust you up till you can't stand!"

Discretion was undoubtedly the better part of valour at the moment. Leaving the question of the silk stockings, Jonesy began an immediate strategic retreat. He turned and bolted for the car at the top of his speed, followed by the indignant husband of the deceitful Letitia, breathing threats and slaughter. Reaching the car thirty yards ahead, Jonesy sprang in, and got her going in record time. He slid away just as the man made an ineffectual grab at the back of the car, and in another moment the unlucky sailor was driving down the road at a furious pace, well out of the reach of pursuit.

"And I told Bilge I'd got a girl!" he muttered as he drove along. "I've done with women! I'd better stick to old Bilge after this."

Another car, driven by a well-dressed young man of about his own age, ranged up alongside. Jones stepped on the gas, and forged ahead, but not for long. The other driver accelerated, too, and soon the cars were racing furiously side by side. Jonesy was not a very experienced driver, and he missed a collision by the narrowest margin as he strove to outdistance the other car. Presently he managed to get a little ahead, and turned to grin at his rival. The next second the car hit a barrier that stretched across the road, and the steering-wheel was jerked out of Jonesy's hand. The car slewed across the road to the gateway of a house on the other side, smashed through the gate, and overturned in the garden.

The other motorist pulled up, got out, and went to help. He approached the overturned car, and peered beneath it for the dead body of the driver, but in vain. Walking round to the other side, he observed Jonesy stretched flat on the ground under a tree, quite motionless, but with a cigarette still stuck in his mouth. He went up to the prone figure, July 11th, 1931.

expecting to find that the reckless fellow was badly injured, if not dead, but as he approached Jonesy sat up.

"Gimme a light, pal!" cried the sailor cheerfully. "My cigarette's gone out, I've lost my girl and I've busted the car. But John Jones, the oil expert from South America, is okay—sure!"

The Millionaire from Brazil.

THE young fellow who had been racing with Jonesy was a gay blade from the town; Edward Watkins by name, though most of his friends never called him anything but "What-Ho!" He surveyed the nonchalant Jonesy with a grin as the sailor rose to his feet, but his amusement immediately turned to surprise.

Jonesy's first action was to pick up a big stone and hurl it straight at a statue of the goddess Venus which stood in the garden. Crash! And a piece of the arm flew into the air. Another stone, and Venus was deprived of her head!

"What's the idea, boy?" asked What-Ho in amazement as Jonesy stooped to find another stone.

"I'm not going mad, if that's what you mean," cried Jonesy airily. "I'm a woman-hater, that's all. Here goes!"

"So am I!" exclaimed What-Ho, seizing a lump of rock and throwing it at the statue.

In two minutes there was nothing left of the goddess of beauty, and the young men paused to take breath.

"That's what I should like to do to all these cheap dames one meets," said Jonesy. "I guess I feel better now."

"You come up to my place, boy, and just clean yourself up and have a rest," said What-Ho heartily. "Never mind the old car. We'll send someone from town to collect the pieces."

"Thanks," said Jonesy. "I'll sure come, Mr. —"

"Aw, shucks, don't call me 'Mister'! My name's Watkins, but my pals seem to reckon it's What-Ho. Hop in my car, and I'll step on it."

What-Ho stepped on it to such purpose that in a few minutes his car drew up outside a fine mansion on the outskirts of the town. Jonesy looked at the house, and then at his new acquaintance.

"Say, What-Ho, is this your house?" he asked dubiously.

"Sure it's my house," laughed his companion. "Come right in."

Jonesy, not without some inward tremors, stepped right in, and found himself in the most palatial residence he had ever seen. What-Ho led him upstairs to his dressing-room, and told him that there was a swell party that evening.

"You stop, boy, and I'll fit you up right," said the good-natured Watkins. "You're just about my size, and I've got more dress suits than I know what to do with. Let's hurry up and give them a treat."

They hurried up, and soon Jonesy, clad in evening dress, was surveying himself in a glass.

"Good-evening, I'm pleased to meet you!" he remarked, smiling to his own reflection.

"Come on, big boy!" cried What-Ho, and the pair went downstairs together, until half-way down they met a lady.

"Hallo, here's auntie!" exclaimed Jonesy's new pal jovially. "Auntie, meet my friend Jones, big oil man from South America, Brazil, I believe. Jones, kiss auntie!"

Jones did not go quite so far as to kiss auntie, but he shook hands cordially with the lady, trying hard to feel that he really was an oil magnate from Brazil.

"You boys go down, and give the folks a surprise," said auntie, and down into the ball-room they went. The room was full of men and women dancing, and the first persons whom Jonesy noticed were two of the officers of the flagship.

His first impulse was to bolt before they saw him, but he reflected that though he knew them by sight, it was highly improbable that they would recognise a sailor from the oil-tanker, and he accompanied What-Ho across the room coolly enough.

"There's Mary Lou!" cried his host eagerly. "Come and meet her, Jones."

"Thought you were a woman-hater," remarked the sailor surprisedly.

"So I am. She's why. Hallo, Mary Lou! This is my pal from Brazil, Mr. Jones."

Jonesy pulled himself together and bowed politely to a pretty girl with light fluffy hair, who looked past him and smiled at What-Ho.

"Yes, he's in oil," continued What-Ho, as a beautiful little lady, with lovely dark hair and a bewitching smile, came up with her dance partner. "Hallo, here's Kit!"

Jonesy looked at Kit, and his fate was sealed. He fell for her then and there. Mary Lou was well enough, but to his mind she was not in the same state with the charming newcomer.

"Meet my friend Jones, Kit," boomed What-Ho. "Oil millionaire from Brazil. Jones, meet Kit and Lieutenant Michael of the Colorado—we call him Mike, of course."

"May I have the next dance, please?" said Jonesy to Kit.

"You must ask my partner," replied the girl, indicating the lieutenant, who was regarding the young sailor with anything but a cheery eye.

"I want to dance the next with this lady," said Jones, quailing inwardly, but putting a bold face on the matter. "Do you mind?"

"Of course I mind!" snorted the lieutenant. "This lady is my partner."

And he swung Kit away, leaving Jones stranded helplessly in the corner until What-Ho left Mary Lou and came over to him.

"What's the matter, Jones?"

"Nothing!" said the young sailor shortly. "My girl has gone off with that officer fellow, that's all."

"Your girl, eh?" laughed What-Ho. "I'll say you've got some nerve. Do you know that she is— Why, there's some stiff making off with Mary Lou! I'll get her back. You watch me."

He rushed off, slapped Mary Lou's partner on the back, and, as the startled man turned round, What-Ho seized the girl and danced off with her. Jonesy followed his example, and managed to detach Kit from the lieutenant.

"I think you're swell!" remarked Jonesy as he danced round the room.

"Do you?" said Kit softly.

She rather liked this bold young stranger with his handsome face and his air of recklessness, and she gave him a shy glance from under her dark eyelashes. That looked finished Jonesy completely, in spite of his resolution to have done with women.

"Yes, I do," he replied in a voice that actually trembled. "Say, are you engaged to that officer?"

"Lieutenant Michael? I don't know why you should ask," said Kit. "But if you want to know, I'm not, not really, though my father wants me to be."

"Well, you're not going to be," stated Jonesy firmly. "I want you."

Kit laughed, and a heavy hand fell on Jonesy's shoulder. He started convulsively, and the lieutenant snatched Kit from him.

Once again Jonesy stood alone, but presently he strolled over to What-Ho. "Are you game for a swell scheme I've got?" he asked. "You get Mary Lou, and I'll get Kit, and we'll go down to the beach."

"Great idea!" laughed his friend. "Only one snag in it. Mike won't let Kit out of his sight this evening."

"Oh, won't he?" cried Jonesy. "I'll fix him. You get the car out, and I'll bring Kit along."

Jonesy vanished, and five minutes later Lieutenant Michael was informed that he was wanted on the telephone. Rising with extreme annoyance, for he had been making love to Kit, and fancied that she was responding to his advances, he went hurriedly to the instrument.

"Is that Lieutenant Michael?" came a voice. "This is the Admiralty office calling. You are to report on the flagship at once."

Mike did not recognise the voice, but it did not occur to him that the message might be a fake, and he set off hastily for the battleship, while the jubilant Jonesy piloted Kit down to the car. Long before Mike returned, furious with anger at the trick that someone had played upon him, What-Ho, with Jonesy and the two girls, were miles away on the beach.

"I'm staying in the car," said What-Ho, pulling up and putting his arm round Mary Lou. "You go down to the beach if you want to."

"Get up," said Mary Lou. "Don't be so lazy."

"You might as well tell a volcano to stop sizzling," replied What-Ho. "Here I am, and here I stay. And so do you!"

Jonesy helped Kit out, and they strolled down to the beach and sat down on a rock. The waves were breaking gently on the shore, the moon was shining brightly overhead, and everything in the scene invited romance. Able-Seaman Jones, of the oil-tanker Galveston, found himself alone with a charming girl who thought he was a millionaire from Brazil. It was Jonesy's opportunity, and he seized it to the full.

In ten minutes he had made more progress in Kit's affections than Mike had made in six months. The girl was startled by his whirlwind way of love-making, but secretly she was pleased that she had inspired such an ardent affection in so short a time. And when presently the sky clouded and it began to rain she asked Jonesy to accompany her home to see her father.

Another splendid mansion was destined to receive a visit from the supposed millionaire that night, and when Jonesy saw the girl's home he was a little startled. Kit's father, a tall, grey-haired gentleman of commanding presence, welcomed his daughter affectionately, and she introduced Jones as an oil magnate from South America.

"Yes, I'm in oil," said Jonesy, as he shook hands. "Only able to get away week-ends, and not always then."

Kit's father retired, and Jonesy talked to the girl for so long that presently he realised with a start that he would have to hurry to reach his ship before his leave expired. Taking a hurried farewell, which included a considerable amount of kissing, he rushed away, promising to come next week-end.

"Wish I could see you before that, Kit darling," he cried regretfully, "but I can't possibly get away till then."

Jonesy's wish was granted. He saw his "girl" the very next day, though he had not been able to "get away." And the next day he was not "Mr. Jones from South America," but merely Able-seaman Jones, just a "gob" in the American navy, a person of no importance whatever. And little did he guess in what circumstances he would meet the charming Kit again.

On the Flagship.

THE bugler got busy on the reveille next morning much too early for Able-seaman Jones. He roused himself, opened his eyes, heard sailors muttering and growling all round him, and sank back again in his bunk, but not to sleep.

"Come along, sailors! Tumble up! Step lively!" yelled a petty officer.

"I think I'll have my breakfast in bed this morning, if nobody minds," remarked Bilge, yawning.

"Able-seaman Jones to report to executive officer at once!" shouted the petty-officer. "Now, Jones, step on it. Put on your regulation kit, and hurry."

Jonesy got up reluctantly and dressed himself, thinking of his next week-end with delighted anticipation. Presently he knocked at the executive officer's door, and a sliding hatch was pulled open.

"Able-seaman Jones, sir!"

"Ah, yes," said the officer. "Well, Jones, a draft of five men is detailed to be transferred to the flagship this morning. You will take charge of the draft as the senior man, and report on the Colorado at ten o'clock. The names are Jones, Bryan, Wilson, Edwards, McConnell. Go and warn the others, get your kit together, and report here in an hour for further instructions. Got that?"

Jones had most certainly got it. The order came like a knockout blow to him, for there would be few week-ends from the flagship, and on the flagship was a petty-officer who was thirsting for his blood.

"I'm not going on the flagship. I'm stopping here," he announced loudly to the closed door.

The hatch opened again and the officer looked out.

"Who the dickens asked you to say what you're going to do?" he barked fiercely. "Go and carry out my orders, and quick, too!"

"Okay, chief!" said Jones sheepishly, edging away.

At ten o'clock the draft reported, as ordered, on the Colorado, and soon Jonesy and Bilge with the others were busily engaged in swabbing the deck.

"I don't like this draft we've fetched

"Why, if it ain't the canary!" cried a jubilant voice. "My prayers are answered!"

up in," moaned Bilge dismally. "I wanna go back on our little oil-barge. There's going to be too much work here, and anyway, I want something to eat right now."

"Huh, you got too lazy on that oil-barge!" grunted Jonesy. "You did nothing but eat. Work on, kid, and take some of that fat off your bones!"

"Why, if it ain't the canary!" cried a jubilant voice. "My prayers are answered!"

Jonesy, kneeling on the deck, looked up and saw the huge form of Chief Petty-officer Scott towering over him. Scotty had an expression of fiendish joy on his face, and Jones remembered with inward trepidation that little incident of the oily sponge.

"I'll teach you to throw sponges at me!" howled Scotty, seizing Jonesy by the neck in a powerful grip. The victim wriggled helplessly, and the petty-officer pushed his head down into a pail of water that stood conveniently near. The water was not exactly clean, and Jonesy spluttered and gurgled furiously, but all in vain. Down went his head again, and yet again, while the other ratings standing round rolled about in paroxysms of laughter. Scotty had certainly had his revenge.

"There, sailor, that'll show you I ain't the man to be monkeyed about with," cried Scotty, at last letting his victim go. "Now you and the other men from the oil-ship come with me."

Scotty led the five men to the officer on duty, and they were detailed for various jobs in the afternoon.

"Jones—about all we've got left, sir," said Scotty, indicating the new man with a contemptuous wave of the hand when duties for the others had been arranged.

"Well, he'll do, I suppose," said the officer. "Jones—admiral's barge. That's all, bos'n. Take 'em off now."

So in the afternoon Jonesy went off as one of the crew of the admiral's barge, a smart motor launch, to fetch Admiral Corbin out to the flagship.

"Fine old man, the admiral," remarked one of the crew to Jonesy. "You seen him?"

"No," replied the young sailor. "I know Captain Beatty by sight and two of the other officers, that's all."

"Boathook there, Jones!" yelled a petty-officer as they approached the shore.

Jonesy seized a boathook and steadied the barge alongside the jetty. A moment later Admiral Corbin, accompanied by a lady, came down the sloping way towards the barge, and Able-seaman Jones found himself staring incredulously at Kit and her father.

The recognition was mutual. The admiral glanced at the sailor standing on his launch, and knew him at once. Without moving a muscle of his face, he handed his daughter on board and gave the order to return to the flagship. Kit had not so much self-control, for she flushed violently, and then became very pale, but she pulled herself together by a great effort and passed Jones without even looking at him.

Later that day Admiral Corbin faced his daughter in the seclusion of his cabin on the Colorado.

"So your millionaire from Brazil turns out to be a seaman on my flagship, transferred to us this morning from that oil-tanker alongside," he said.

"After all, father, the joke's on me," replied Kit, smiling a wry sort of smile.

"He had something to do with oil."

"He sailed under false colours—ashamed of his uniform," growled the admiral. "You must not speak to him again, Kit."

"I don't think he was ashamed of his uniform," said the girl. "It was just a joke, that's all."

"Making love to you, and staying very late in my house—jokes, too, eh? I tell you, girl, this business must finish. You don't seem to realise the seriousness of it. If that fellow talks about you—"

"He won't say a word. I know he won't!" cried Kit.

"He'd better not," said the admiral grimly. "I can't understand you, Kit. You saw this man for the first time last night at the Watkins party, you say? I wonder how he got there, by the way. And now—it's ridiculous. I want you to marry into the Navy and keep up the family tradition; but there's Michael, a very good fellow."

"I know he is," replied Kit in a low tone, "and I like him very much; but I love John. And you can't turn love on and off like a fountain."

"Love at first sight, eh? Now listen, girl. You are all I've got. Don't break my heart. I'll suffer enough when I leave the Service in six months' time. Don't speak to this man Jones until after I retire. Will you promise, Kit?"

There was a silence for some minutes, while the girl looked earnestly at her father. She saw that he was deeply affected, and at last she spoke.

"Okay, dad! Okay, skipper!" she said, drawing herself up and saluting the admiral solemnly.

So when, a little later, Jonesy saw the admiral's daughter step on to the barge to return to the shore, and looked eagerly at her, she passed him as though he did not exist. When the launch reached the jetty, she ran very rapidly up the slope to her car and jumped in.

To the astonishment of the crew, Jones raced after her, in spite of an indignant bellow from the petty officer in charge.

"You might give me a chance to explain. You might—well, you didn't tell me who you were, anyway!"

"Okay, skipper!" murmured Kit, letting in the clutch without looking at the young sailor, and starting off, while Jones gazed after her with growing indignation.

"Okay, if that's the way you feel about it," he cried. "Okay, okay, okay!"

Battle Practice.

ABLE-SEAMAN JONES, feeling not just in the best of spirits, was cleaning the smoke-stack next morning when a shout from the deck startled him.

"Jones, come down," cried Scotty. "I've got a much better job for you."

Jonesy got down, and observed the traces of a grin lingering on the petty officer's face. He followed Scotty to the officer's quarters, wondering what new misfortune was to befall him.

Scotty knocked at a cabin door and entered.

"Here's the man, sir," he said, hauling Jonesy in, and forthwith retiring.

Jones found himself face to face with Lieutenant Michael, and he had perforce to stand to attention, and to compose his face to a suitable expression of respect.

"I won't ask you what game you were up to the other night, Jones," said the lieutenant with ominous calm, "but I'll tell you this. If ever I see you approaching Miss Corbin again, I'll knock you through the side of this ship."

An inarticulate sound came from Jones.

"What did you say?" demanded Mike.

"I said 'Very good, sir,'" replied Jonesy, backing slowly away towards the door.

"Shut the door," cried the lieutenant angrily.

"Very good, sir," replied the young sailor. He saluted and went out, shutting the cabin door with exaggerated care. In the passage stood Scotty, waiting for him.

"C'mon, Jones," cried Scotty. "You're detailed for gun number three—my gun—and the practice is on Monday. We've got to get busy. C'mon!"

Down in the casemate of gun number three, the old hands scented fun when they saw Scotty bring along a new man.

"Three men were killed on this gun the last time we had battle practice," remarked a gunner lugubriously.

"Yeah! And the first one to go was the one who had the job you've got—lifting up the shells," said another.

"Aw, shut your mouth," growled Scotty. "Don't you believe 'em, Jones. They're trying to make you quit. But I ain't having quitters on my gun, see? And now get to it, sailors, and we'll try for the record again."

Monday came, and the Colorado steamed out to sea with the fleet. Racing along at twenty-five knots the great battleship came level with her target, an obsolete cruiser anchored some miles away. Up above, the gunnery officers were busy getting the range, and presently orders came down, and the great guns roared out, sending their shells over miles of water to crash into the target.

On the bridge, the admiral, the captain and a group of other officers watched keenly, noting the rapidity of the fire of each gun, and the hits made, so far as could be observed through the smother of smoke that surrounded the ship.

"Number three gun is too slow," remarked the admiral presently. "It's a couple of rounds at least behind all the others."

The remark was true, for in the midst of the hurry and bustle of loading the unlucky Jones had dropped a shell. In spite of the heated words of Scotty, the consequent delay could not be made up, and the gun finished with the worst record of any on the ship.

A lieutenant came hurrying down at the end of the practice.

"Admiral says your gun's too slow," he cried. "Bos'n, you're in charge here. You'll answer for this."

"I'll answer for this!" howled Scotty, turning furiously on Jones when the officer had gone. "You spoil our record, you yellow pup, and I answer for it! You'll answer some, too!"

With a leap he came at Jonesy, and a terrific straight left took that unfortunate sailor in the right eye. He went backwards with a crash, and when he got up, ruefully enough, Scotty had gone.

"You saw that, Bilge!" howled Jonesy. "I'm lodging a complaint, and you're a witness, and don't you forget it."

Jones duly brought his complaint against the petty officer, and the matter was dealt with on the next morning at the hour of "Divisions."

"Able-seaman Jones!" called the first lieutenant.

Jonesy stepped forward briskly, removed his cap, and stood stiffly to attention. The commander took a document and began to read:

"Able-seaman Jones complains that on the seventh instant, after the conclusion of practice, Chief Bo'sun's Mate Scott struck him in the right eye and knocked him down, thereby causing a contusion on his eye and bruises about his body."

"Relate the circumstances, Jones," said the captain.

"Sir, I was a bit nervous—it was my first gun practice—and I dropped a shell, and Scotty—"

"Who?" barked the captain.

"Chief Petty Officer Scott, sir. He wasn't very pleased about it, so he hit me in the eye and knocked me down."

"What have you to say to this accusation, bo'sun?" asked Captain Beatty.

Scotty came smartly to attention, fixed his gaze on the horizon, and in a perfectly expressionless voice he told his tale.

"Sir, I have to say that Able-seaman Jones fell down a hatch just after the gun practice, and dented his lamp—I mean damaged his eye—in so doing."

Captain Beatty suppressed a smile as a guffaw came from the ratings standing around, and he surveyed Jonesy's right eye, which bore every evidence of a direct blow from a hefty fist. He looked at the petty officer dubiously, and then turned to Jones.

"Any witnesses, Jones?"

"Yes, sir! Able-seaman Bilge, sir!" "Able-seaman—who?" asked the captain.

"Able-seaman Bryan, I mean, sir."

The captain looked down at another document on his table, and everyone guessed that he had glanced at the charge-sheet.

Bilge came forward, and Scotty fixed him with a fierce glare under which the tubby little fellow visibly wilted.

"Well, Bryan," said the captain, "you saw the bo'sun strike Jones in the eye, or, alternatively, you saw Jones fall down a hatch, did you?"

"N-no, sir!" stammered Bilge, with one eye on the petty officer, and unheeding the reproachful gaze of his pal.

"Well, what did you see?"

"Nothing, sir—nothing at all!"

The captain looked at Scotty, Jones and Bilge in turn, and remained in deep thought for some moments.

"It's obvious that either Petty Officer Scott or Able-seaman Jones is not detailing the exact facts about this incident," he said at length. "Go away, both of you, and come back when you have settled the truth between you. Next!"

The first lieutenant took up the charge-sheet and read aloud:

"Able-seaman Bryan is charged with using profane language in the presence of the admiral this morning."

"Anything to say, Bryan?" asked the captain.

"Well, sir," said Bilge hurriedly. "it was like this. I was swabbing down of the deck, sir, and the admiral was standing not very far away. And a sailor was painting the mast, and he tilted his can so that the paint ran down my neck."

"Go on," said Captain Beatty, hiding a smile as Bilge paused for breath.

"Sir, I got up and I says—I says: 'You—er—you sailor up there, you must be much more careful, you really must.'"

"That was all you said, was it?"

"Well, sir, I may have put in one or two extra words," admitted Bilge. "The paint was a-running down my neck, sir, and I didn't feel what you might call very happy at the moment."

"Well, Bryan," said the captain, "when you have occasion in the future to ask a comrado to be 'much more careful,' don't do it near the admiral. That's all. Case dismissed!"

Bilge ran off joyfully just as Scotty and Jones came back. The spectators observed with interest that the seaman's face was now adorned with two black eyes.

"I have to report, sir," said Jonesy slowly, "that I have just—fallen down another hatch!"

"Case dismissed!" said the captain.

Scotty Tells the Truth.

THE crew of the Colorado assembled once more on the foredeck one day nearly six months later, and Admiral Corbin again addressed the men.

"We are going out on gun-practice to-morrow," he remarked. "This will be for me the last practice, for, as you know, I retire next week, and Admiral Schuyler takes over the flagship. I want you to make to-morrow's gunnery a record even for the Colorado!"

When the crew had been dismissed, Admiral Corbin turned to Captain Beatty.

"I showed you that letter from the Admiralty," he said with a break in his voice. "That was my death-warrant, that order to retire."

"Oh, don't say so, sir!" cried the captain reproachfully. "I trust you have many more years before you yet."

"No, I shall not be able to live an inactive life," replied the admiral, shaking his head. "I am sixty-four next week, and I have been in the Navy, boy and man, for nearly fifty years. The deck of a warship is my home. When I haul down my flag next week I feel that will be the end."

"But—Miss Corbin, sir," the captain reminded him.

"Ah, yes, Kit!" said the admiral thoughtfully. "She will do her best to make my retirement happy, but—well, enough of this. We must excel our record in gunnery to-morrow, and then I shall go out satisfied. See Bos'n Scott about that number three gun. He must do better this time."

Scotty intended to make sure that his gun did better. He instructed his men individually and minutely in their duties; but when, an hour before the practice was due to begin, Able-seaman Jones was nowhere to be seen, the petty-officer's anger boiled over.

Jonesy bent over the lieutenant in triumph. "Now perhaps you'll understand that Kit is mine!" he cried.

"Where's that darned skunk Jones?" he vociferated. "I'll break that pup's neck before I've done with him!"

"He's in the ward-room playing cards with two marines," said a voice.

"Two marines!" howled Scotty. "I'll teach him to play at cards with marines when he ought to be at his gun."

Out of the casemate went Scotty at the double. He found Jones, sure enough, with the marines.

"I reckon I've had enough of this ship," said Jonesy, just as the petty-officer rushed in. "I'm tired of being bossed about by Scotty. I'm going to quit this Navy."

"Going to quit the Navy, are you?" yelled Scotty, yanking Jones to his feet. "Not just yet you ain't. Out of this! Your job's on the gun!"

Jonesy wriggled free and punched Scotty on the jaw. The move was more plucky than wise, for the petty-officer fell upon him, floored him with a tremendous right, knocked him down again as soon as he got up, and finally hauled him off to gun number three, battered and helpless.

"Now get to it!" he shouted. "You drop a shell this time, and I'll drop you overboard! Get to it!"

Jones got to it. He was no match in brute force for the stalwart petty-officer, and he had realised long ago that complaints to the officers were useless.

Once again the great guns roared, and the knot of officers on the bridge watched the results eagerly.

"Number three gun is better this time," said the admiral, as the practice neared its end. "In fact, I think it has registered more hits than any other."

The crew of number three gun had toiled with desperate and unceasing vigour, and Jonesy in particular had worked this time with great speed and accuracy. And when the results of the practice were ascertained it was found that the flagship had surpassed its own previous record in gunnery, and that Bos'n Scott's gun had more hits to its credit than any other gun on board.

When the news came, Scotty was beside himself with joy. His grim face relaxed into a smile when the admiral and the captain congratulated him, and later he held a parade of the gun's crew in order to give each man the small piece of cloth on which the letter "E"—standing for "Efficient"—was embroidered.

"Here's your 'E,' You should be proud of that, kid," said Scotty to Jones, when his turn came. "You worked darned well this time."

Jonesy took the letter, turned it round and round in his fingers, sidled away and dropped the bit of cloth through the nearest porthole, while Scotty watched him out of the corner of his eye, but said nothing at the moment.

The flagship returned to port, and a day or two later the officers arranged for a dance to be held on board. Many guests were invited, and all the Colorado's launches were busily employed in bringing parties from the shore to the battleship.

"You go on the admiral's barge again, Jones," ordered Scotty early that evening, and Jonesy made several trips to and fro, wondering whether he would see Kit, and whether, if he did, she would this time speak to him.

On the last trip the launch made. Lieutenant Michael, resplendent in the glory of full uniform, assisted the admiral's daughter to embark on the barge, and guided her carefully to a seat. Jonesy stood moodily by the gangway, but Kit did not so much as glance at him, and once more he vowed to himself that he had done with women.

The barge reached the battleship, and Miss Corbin was helped out by Mike. She began to climb the gangway, and the officer was stepping off the swaying launch to follow, his eyes still fixed on Kit as she ascended the ladder. At that moment Jones, who was also gazing fixedly at the girl, let slip the boat-hook with which he was keeping the barge to the side of the ship. Before he could recover his grip the launch yawed away, and instantly a cry arose.

"Man overboard!" shouted a score of voices.

Lieutenant Michael had fallen between the barge and the ship into the sea.

Lifebelts and ropes were hastily thrown down, and in a couple of minutes the officer was hauled back to the deck of the barge. Dripping with water, minus his cocked hat, and with his dignity completely gone, he shouted angrily for Jones.

"You're under arrest for gross neglect of duty," he cried. "Go up on deck and report yourself. Bos'n, see to it."

Jonesy slowly climbed the ladder, followed by the enraged lieutenant. At the top a crowd of guests, hanging over the rail, watched eagerly, and Kit, forgetting for the moment her promise to her father, spoke to the young sailor as he reached the deck.

"I'm sorry you're in trouble," she murmured softly.

Jonesy glanced at her indignantly, and then, lifting his head high and squaring his shoulders, he marched off in the wake of the petty-officer. Next morning he found himself once more in the presence of the captain at "Divisions."

"Able-seaman Jones is charged with gross neglect of duty in that last evening, being engaged in assisting at the disembarkation of guests, he allowed the admiral's barge to yaw off from the side of the flagship, so causing Lieutenant Michael to fall into the sea."

The commander read out the charge in a funeral voice amid the suppressed chuckles of the bystanders. Evidence was given by Mike, who accused Jonesy of deliberately allowing him to fall overboard.

"One question, Lieutenant Michael," said the captain. "Do you know of any reason why Able-seaman Jones should act in such a way towards you in particular?"

"No, sir," said Mike, after a moment's hesitation, though he knew, of course, that there was a very good reason—Kit. But it would not do to say so.

"Anything to say, Jones?" asked Captain Beatty.

"Sir, it was an accident," replied the seaman. "The barge rolled just as the lieutenant was stepping off, and I lost grip for a moment."

"H'm!" said the captain. "Witnesses?"

Scotty came forward, and as Jonesy looked sideways at him his heart sank. Here was a glorious opportunity for the petty-officer to get his revenge for that complaint about the black eye.

"I saw Lieutenant Michael stepping off the barge, sir," he began, "and it swung out just at that moment. Didn't notice what Jones was doing, sir, but I observed that the lieutenant was not looking where he was going."

"Well, and what was he doing?" asked the captain.

Mike glanced fiercely at Scotty, whose face was even more impassive than usual as he continued his evidence.

"He was looking at—at some of the guests going up the ladder, sir."

The captain, with a great effort, preserved his iron composure, but stifled coughs behind him betrayed the feelings of the other officers.

"Ah, I see," remarked Captain Beatty. "Well, lieutenant, I think we must put this unfortunate occurrence down to one of those accidents which will happen at times. The case is dismissed," he concluded formally.

The Admiral Retires.

JONESY made his way below to find Scotty, for he was completely bewildered by the unexpected attitude of the petty officer. He found the bo'sun at length, and stood looking at him for a moment in silence.

"Why did you do that for me, you old gorilla?" he asked.

"Huh!" growled Scotty. "You're one of my gun's crew, and I don't let my men down. Besides, I told the truth, anyway."

"Well, thanks, bo'sun!" said Jonesy heartily.

"You come here and sit down, kid," replied Scotty, quite amiably. "I wanna talk to you some."

Jonesy sat down by Scotty's side, wondering what was to come next.

"You're a strange kid, Jones," said the bo'sun. "You're stubborn, and you want your own way, but you've got pluck. Ay, and you're better educated than most of the gobs. You've the makings of an officer about you, if only you knew it!"

"Says you!" laughed Jonesy.

"You wished you were up on deck last night, dancing with some of those dames," Scotty went on. "Well, I reckon you might do that some day. Where's your 'E,' kid?" he asked, breaking off suddenly.

"I lost it," muttered Jonesy.

"You pitched it out of a porthole. Oh, yes, I saw you. You're a young fool if you throw your chances away as you threw away that 'E,' boy."

"I oughtn't to have done that," admitted Jonesy; "but I guess I was mad with you that morning, bo'sun."

"Now look you here, kid," said Scotty. "I was asked to recommend twelve men to take the entrance examination at Annapolis, and I put you down among 'em, and the admiral has passed the list. He asked me specially about you. I dunno why he should. And I told him you were a downright smart kid."

"Annapolis?" exclaimed Jonesy in amazement.

"Sure, Annapolis! You pass that exam, and you get your four years in the Naval College. You come out and give orders instead of taking 'em. Why, if you stepped on board here, and you said 'Chief-bo'sun's-mate Scott, go for'ard and call up your gun crew,' I should salute and say 'Yessir!' and I should be glad."

With that Scotty went out, and Jonesy leaned back in his seat thinking.

"That's certainly some idea," he murmured, "me giving orders to Scotty. I sure must think about it!"

A few more days passed, and the crew of the Colorado mustered for the solemn ceremony of the hauling down of Admiral Corbin's flag, and the hoisting of that of his successor. For the last time the shrill trilling of the bo'sun's pipe welcomed the old man on board, for the last time a quota of sideboys sprang to the rail as he mounted the gangway, while on the quarter-deck a company of marines was drawn up in imposing guard formation.

"Officers and men of the flagship Colorado," said the admiral in a voice just as firm as ever, "I have but few words to say. The day has come for me to haul down my flag, and I cannot express the regret I feel at leaving the Service in which I have spent all my life. I thank you all for the loyalty and devotion which has made this ship the pride of the fleet, and I am sure that you will give the same loyalty and devotion to my successor, Admiral Schuyler. And now—good-bye!"

The crew cheered Admiral Corbin again and again, but as his flag came fluttering down from the mast-head their cheers died away into silence. An officer seized the flag and ceremoniously presented it to the admiral, who retired to his cabin as Admiral Schuyler's flag was hoisted aloft.

Presently Admiral Corbin came on deck again, dressed this time in civilian clothes, and carrying his flag over his arm. He shook hands with his officers one by one, and then left for the shore amidst thunders of cheering from the crews, and a salute of guns from all the warships in the harbour.

"I feel that my life is over, Kit," he said later that day to his daughter, as they sat together in a room of the hotel near the harbour, where they were staying for a few days before going home.

"Oh, dad!" cried Kit reproachfully. "Fancy saying that when you're still got me. Now you'll be able to have a nice peaceful time ashore, and I'll be able to see something of you. So cheer up, skipper!"

"I'll try, though I'm no longer the skipper," said her father mournfully.

"Dad," asked the girl rather timidly, "now that you have retired, may I—may I speak to—John?"

"John?" queried the admiral. "Oh, you mean young Jones! Well, I don't know. I suppose you'll do as you please in the end, whatever I may say. He's no longer on the flagship; he's gone elsewhere."

"Where, dad?" asked Kit eagerly.

"You will find out soon enough, Kit. I was talking about him to Captain Beatty yesterday, and the captain told me something about him that would please you. But perhaps I had better leave him to tell you his news himself."

"Oh, dad!" cried the girl. "Then I may speak to him?"

"I suppose I must say yes," said her father. "And now run away for a while, Kit. I've got some letters to write, and presently I shall go down to the quay to have another look at the ships."

Kit went out and sat on the veranda, wondering when she would next see Jonesy, and what his news could be. Lieutenant Michael had arranged to call for her at seven o'clock, but she had forgotten the appointment altogether, and in fact Mike did not even enter her thoughts.

At a quarter to seven a young man dressed in a civilian suit entered the lounge-hall of the hotel and approached the clerk.

"I'm Lieutenant Jones from Amapolis," he remarked. "Is Miss Corbin in the hotel?"

"She is out on the veranda, sir, I believe," said the clerk, and the cadet forthwith made his way to the veranda to look for Kit.

He stood hesitating when he saw the girl seated there, for he felt very doubtful as to the reception he was likely to meet. But Kit, as soon as she saw him, sprang to her feet with a joyful cry.

"Why, it's you!" she exclaimed. "Whatever are you doing in those clothes?"

Jonesy instantly forgot that the girl had ignored his existence for the last six months. Kit seemed pleased to see him, and that was enough.

"Didn't you know?" he said. "I took the entrance examination at Amapolis last week, and somehow I managed to come top of the list, and I'm entered there for the four years' course."

"How lovely!" cried Kit, beaming with joy. "How glad I am!"

"Come down to the beach, Kit," said Jonesy. "You know—where we went that night. I've got a car outside."

"Oh!" exclaimed the girl, suddenly remembering. "I can't! I said I would go out with Mike this evening."

"Never mind him," urged Jonesy. "Make him wait. I'm taking you with me."

And so, when, at seven o'clock, Lieutenant Michael asked the clerk for Miss Corbin, he was informed that a naval cadet named Jones had called for her, and that she had gone out with him.

Desertion.

CHIEF-PETTY-OFFICER SCOTT had come on shore leave that evening, and he was strolling along the road near the hotel when a car moved away from the front of the building and went slowly past him. He glanced casually at its occupants, and then fairly jumped with surprise.

"I must be dreaming," he exclaimed. "I'm the son of a sea-cook if that ain't young Jones and the admiral's daughter!"

He stood gazing after the motor until it disappeared, and then resumed his walk. A few yards along the road he met Lieutenant Michael.

"Have you seen that fellow Jones this evening?" asked Mike.

"Yes, sir," said Scotty, saluting. "I saw Lieutenant Jones a little while ago."

"Lieutenant Jones, eh? Well, where did you see him?"

"Driving a car along this street, sir," answered Scotty.

"Was there anyone with him?" demanded the officer.

"I think Miss Corbin was in the car with him, sir," Scotty replied, concealing a grin.

He guessed the state of affairs, and was not surprised when Mike turned angrily on his heel and returned to the hotel, muttering language of a distinctly naval type.

"Seems to me," remarked Scotty to himself, "I'd better anchor myself somewhere around here this evening. There'll sure be trouble when these young men meet."

Scotty cast anchor in the lounge-hall of the hotel, and sat there placidly for a long while, watching for Jonesy, while Mike paced restlessly up and down, and went in and out of the hotel, growing more and more angry as time went on.

Just before eleven o'clock Scotty grew anxious and walked down the street to see if the young cadet was coming, and by so doing the petty officer missed him, for the car came round the other corner of the street, and Jonesy escorted Kit into the hotel, to be instantly confronted by the irate Mike.

"Good-evening, Kit," said Mike. "I've been waiting for you since seven o'clock."

"Oh!" cried the girl in dismay. She had entered the hotel bubbling over with joy, but now her face clouded "Feeling better, Jones, eh?" smiled the lieutenant. "Guess I'll soon be okay!" whispered the young cadet. July 11th, 1931.

over as she looked in dismay from Mike to Jonesy, who were glaring fiercely at one another.

"You have been in pleasanter company than mine, I suppose," sneered Mike. "And may I ask you, Lieutenant Jones," he continued, with heavy politeness and a tremendous emphasis on the word "lieutenant," "at what time your leave of absence expires?"

"I don't know that you have anything to do with my leave of absence from Annapolis," retorted Jonesy hotly. "At ten o'clock, if it's of any interest to you."

"Then you've overstayed your time by an hour or more," said Mike, with evident satisfaction. "You'll hear of this! As you're so late, I will see Kit—Miss Corbin—to her room."

"I think not," replied Jonesy, with ominous calm. "I will have that honour myself. I'll see you later."

Taking Kit's arm, he led her away to the lift and up to her room on the first floor. When he returned to the lounge-hall, Mike was waiting for him, obviously ready for battle. Of Scotty there was as yet no sign.

"Come outside!" growled Mike. "I've a few words to say to you. Can't say 'em here."

"There's a yard at the back," returned Jonesy. "It's quiet enough there."

"Now, Jones," snarled Mike when the rivals confronted each other in the dimly-lighted yard. "I promised to knock you through the side of the flag-ship if you dared to approach Miss Corbin again, and anyway I'm going to knock your head off—here and now! How dare you have the infernal impudence to take her out when she had promised to meet me? You leave my girl alone!"

"Kit is not your girl!" cried Jonesy fiercely. "She's mine!"

Mike replied by clipping him deftly on the jaw, and Jonesy went to earth with a thud. He was up again in a moment, however, and he waded into the fight with both hands. Jonesy had been no match for Petty Officer Scott, but the lieutenant was a different proposition. He was much about the same size and strength as Jonesy, and so the two were pretty equally matched. In two minutes both men were considerably the worse for wear. Mike had stopped a nasty one with his right eye, and Jonesy's nose was beginning to swell. Up and down over the yard the two furious men raged, and the fight would no doubt have gone on for a long time before either obtained the victory but for an accident.

Gradually they had approached nearer and nearer to a large water-butt which stood in a corner of the yard. Just as Jonesy got beneath his opponent's guard with a left to the jaw, Mike slipped on a stone, and the blow sent him with a great crash against the butt. His forehead came into violent contact with it, and he crumpled up on the ground in a heap.

Jonesy bent over the lieutenant in triumph.

"Now perhaps you'll understand that Kit is mine," he cried.

Mike did not move, and from the gash on his forehead blood was flowing fast. His rival's triumph changed to alarm, and Jonesy picked up the unconscious form of the lieutenant and carried him into the hotel. No one seemed to be about, and the young cadet placed Mike's body on a couch in an empty room just as hurried footsteps came along the passage outside, and Scotty came running in.

"You young fool!" said the petty officer as he stooped over the still motionless lieutenant. "He's badly hurt. This means ten years for you!"

"You look after him," cried Jonesy. "I've done wi' the Navy. I'm going to desert!"

He ran wildly out of the room, out of the hotel, and down the street without in the least knowing where he went, for Jonesy had completely lost his nerve, and he felt sure that his career in the Navy was over for good and all.

Saving the Fleet.

ADMIRAL CORBIN finished his correspondence and strolled out of the hotel to the harbour, not far away. He passed through the gate, and was going down to the edge of the quay to take a last look at his beloved ship when an old man hobbled out of a shed and confronted him.

"Hey, you!" he cried. "What are you doing here? Civilians ain't allowed in these docks. You go out right now!"

The admiral had never in his life experienced such a keen sense of humiliation as the words of the old dock-keeper caused him. It was true. He had no longer any right to enter the dockyard, or to board a warship, except by the invitation of the officer in command.

"I was only about to look at the ships," he said gently.

"That's all very well," grumbled the old man. "It's too dark to see 'em now, and I've got to be very careful. There's no knowing what may happen if strangers get about."

"Strangers are dangerous, eh?" said the admiral, smiling a little.

"Reckon you're right. Why, one spark might send the whole fleet into the air. There's hundreds of tons of explosives in this harbour, if they ain't fired 'em all away to-day. They were saluting some old buffer of an admiral this morning. And now you get out—sharp!"

"Very well," said the "old buffer of an admiral." "I'll go. You're only doing your duty, I suppose, in warning me off."

Slowly Admiral Corbin retraced his steps, sad at heart to think that he was not to be allowed even to look at the fleet. He paused at the dockyard gate and glanced back. A few lights in the harbour showed the position of the ships, but the night was too dark for him to see more than the vague outline of one or two that lay fairly near the shore.

The admiral turned again and walked on. Suddenly he stopped once more. Hurried footsteps were coming down the road towards him, and a moment later he saw Jonesy rushing wildly along.

"Why, Jones, what's the matter?" asked Admiral Corbin, in surprise. "I thought you were at Annapolis."

"Don't stop me, sir," said Jonesy heavily, pausing as he recognised Kit's father. "I'm in trouble. I've hurt Michael in a fight, and I'm leaving the Navy right now."

"You mean you're too yellow to face the music, eh? You're going to desert!" thundered the admiral.

"Yes, that's the word. I'm a deserter," said the young man bitterly.

"You coward!" stormed Admiral Corbin furiously. "You—"

The old man got no further, for Jonesy suddenly clutched him by the arm.

"Look there, sir!" he shouted, pointing towards the harbour.

A sudden glare of bright light had appeared in the middle of the harbour, and seemed to be moving slowly towards the shore.

"That's the oil barge!" cried the admiral. "It's on fire!"

"And what's that, sir?" asked Jonesy, pointing his finger a little to the left.

"Good heavens!" shouted Admiral Corbin. "That's an ammunition barge, and the oil-tanker is drifting down upon it! Hurry, Jones! We must sink that barge, or the fleet will be blown to pieces!"

The admiral turned and made for the harbour as fast as his sixty-four years would allow him, and Jonesy, forgetting all else in his excitement, kept pace with him. Brushing aside the old watchman, the two rushed down to the quayside and looked eagerly about for a boat.

"There's a motor-boat at the foot of those steps, sir!" cried Jones.

"Pray heaven it's fit to sail!" said the admiral, going down the steps.

The glare from the drifting oil-tanker grew fiercer and fiercer, and the whole harbour showed up as in the light of day. Everywhere the crews of the warships were hurriedly launching boats, for the only hope was to sink the ammunition barge before the flames reached it. None of the big ships had steam up, and to sink the burning ship by shell-fire would take too long, besides involving the awful risk of a shell striking the ammunition barge.

Admiral Corbin and Jonesy jumped into the motor-boat, and while the old man hurriedly cast off, the cadet rushed to set her going.

"Okay, sir, we're off!" cried Jonesy as the screw began to turn.

In a couple of minutes the motor-boat was nearing the ammunition barge, long before any of the launches from the warships could get under way. The flames from the burning tanker were already dangerously near as the admiral and his companion swung themselves on board.

"Where are the men on guard?" gaped the admiral.

"Can't see 'em, sir. I reckon they've bolted."

There was no one on board the ship, which had been brought into the harbour and anchored only that morning. Three civilians of the dockyard staff had been put on board; but those men had lost their heads when the oil-tanker caught fire, and they had gone off in a small boat.

Down below hurried the admiral and the young cadet, down the ladders leading to the lower holds, and soon they were well below the water-line. At last they came to what they sought, the hold in which were the sea-cocks of the vessel.

"Hammer, admiral!" cried Jonesy. "We must find hammers to break open the sea-cocks."

"Not necessary, my boy," said the admiral coolly. "These ammunition barges are fitted with special apparatus for use in emergency. Just turn those wheels, and the sea-cocks will open."

Admiral Corbin threw himself upon one of the wheels which he had pointed out and began to turn it. A stream of sea-water gushed in at the sea-cock thus opened, and Jonesy, furiously twisting another wheel, set another stream flowing. In a few minutes four streams of water were rapidly filling the hold, and the ammunition barge began slowly to settle down, just as the first of the launches from the warships came up at a frantic speed.

But by this time the flaming tanker had drifted right alongside the ammunition barge, and the officer in charge of the launch hesitated to go too near. He saw that the ammunition ship was settling lower and lower, and guessed that someone on board was opening the sea-cocks. Then he noticed

(Continued on page 27.)

A daring outlaw, tiring of his life of crime, determines to run straight, and as a humble cow-puncher on the Bar X Ranch becomes involved in a strange adventure.

A Lone Hand.

THE plains of the great South West sheltered many notorious outlaws, among them being Jesse James, the Younger brothers, the Dalton Gang, and the one, perhaps, who stood out as the most reckless and daring of them all—the Apache Kid.

Except that he was quite young, slim, and clean-shaven, could speak English like a well-educated person, throw a knife with deadly aim and draw a gun like lightning, little was known of him. Big rewards were offered for his capture, but the sheriffs lacked a fitting description, and the Kid was as elusive as an eel. The reward was tempting, but otherwise the cowpunchers were friendly disposed towards the outlaw, who mostly robbed the rich or those that made money by graft or ill practices.

Many a posse had chased the Kid, and not cared too much that the elusive bandit, who always masked his face with a silk handkerchief, had again made his escape.

But sheriffs have a duty to perform, and if their territory suffers from the attention of robbers and crooks then they are likely to lose their positions unless big steps are taken to round up the bad men.

Sheriff Ward was a dogged, determined sheriff, and his one aim was to capture the Apache Kid. If the Kid could carry out his robberies under the nose of the law it would encourage other bad men to come to the South West, therefore the Apache Kid must be laid by the heels.

The posse had chased the Apache Kid through two nights and two days, and at last the sheriff had to call a reluctant halt.

"I reckoned with a change of horses we'd tiro the Kid out," the sheriff confessed in his frank manner. "Guess that yere Demon of the Kid's is a sure stayer. Boys, you'd better beat it back to town and make it snappy. There's that round-up due in a few days, and the punchers will be getting up to high larks when that's through. Anyone who starts shooting you clap him in the lock-up."

"Aren't you coming back with us, sheriff?"

"Nope!" The tall, gaunt sheriff

"The APACHE KID'S ESCAPE"

Starring
JACK
PERRIN

twirled his long, grey moustache. "I'm sticking to this trail for a while. A lone man can trail the Kid better than a bunch of mavericks. I'll be sitting quiet and maybe I'll take him by surprise. I'll stay around on the trail for ten days, and it won't be my fault if the Kid don't come back with me. Now beat it, boys, and if you want me urgent send a message to the Bar M that lies just over yonder ridge. 'Bye!"

The Treacherous Friend.

HIGH up in the hills a white horse grazed, whilst on a huge boulder sat a young, clean-shaven man. His neat blue breeches and coloured flannel shirt showed signs of dust from hard riding; on the rock lay a sombrero. From time to time he wiped the perspiration from his brow and laughed softly.

"Gee, that was a fine gallop, Demon," he said softly to the horse. "We can always show Sheriff Ward and his posse a clean pair of heels."

When he was certain that the posse had abandoned the chase the Apache Kid prepared a meal for the horse, and himself, for it was as well to be prepared for another hard ride. Far below lay a winding trail that curled like a white snake along the wide valley. The Kid had held the stage-coach up on more than one occasion, but not of recent months, because pay-rolls of hard-working punchers were not in his line.

Three faint cracks brought the Kid to his feet, whilst Demon pricked his ears. There was shooting down in the valley.

Shading his eyes from the sun, the Apache Kid peered downward, and his eyes gleamed as he saw the stage-coach. A hold-up! Yes, and he could see the driver with hands held high, and a mounted man that threatened him. The Kid shook his fists when he recognised the outlaw's horse.

"So that is why my name is beginning to stink in these parts," muttered the Kid. "Why Bill Buckley quit me to start a new life—the four-flushing skunk."

Quickly the Apache Kid got to horse and whispered his commands.

"We gotta trail a snake, old boss, so go canny."

Like a swift-moving shadow the Kid slithered through the pines to more even ground. From a belt of trees he watched the stage-coach drive on, and cursed as he saw that one man on the box-seat sagged back. Then his eyes sought for the stager of the hold-up, and found him riding towards the pines.

The Apache Kid dismounted, and hid his horse in a clump of mesquite. Fate was sending the four-flusher into his hands,

Under the trees the robber reined in his horse, dropped several bulky packages on the ground, and slid from the saddle. The man hitched his horse to a pine, and squatted down on the ground beside his loot. A dark-haired, red-faced ruffian of dago descent—a halfbreed of the worst sort. Portuguese ancestors had gifted Bill Buckley with a smooth tongue and a keen brain.

Soon a great heap of notes lay on the grass, and Buckley laughed hoarsely at the welcome sight; little did he guess of the figure that edged so quietly towards him. The ruffian spoke his thoughts aloud.

"A thousand bucks for the asking. Gee, there'll be a big reward offered now for the capture of—"

"The Apache Kid!" drawled a quiet voice. "Don't move, Buckley, and don't try to drop yer hand to yer belt. Get up, you skunk!"

Bill Buckley's small eyes flickered nervously. He knew the Kid's voice, and he wondered what kind of treatment he was going to get. The law of the West is hard on double-crossers, and revenge is often swift and bitter. He shivered as if he felt a bullet tickling his ribs.

"Get up, you yeller dog!" snapped the Apache Kid. "My fingers fair itch to fill yer carcass with lead."

Reluctantly Bill Buckley stood up and raised his hands heavenwards.

"You ain't got any need to get sore, Jack," he muttered, his eyelids flickering with shifty cunning. "I got sick of punching away up in Tennessee, so I decided to beat it back here. I was riding down the valley, and I saw the stage-coach, and I held it up, but the spoils I would have brought to you to share fifty-fifty, as of old."

"Oh, yeah?" drawled the Kid, smiling gently. "That was sure thoughtful. You did the hold-up just to convince me that you wanted to be my pard again. Sort of bringing me a dot like one of those French dames when they get married. A swell idea, Buckley, and you expect me to swallow that mush."

"I'm on the level, Jack," whined the other. "I was just counting out the swag, and then I was going to find yer."

"And, of course, you knew where to find me," mocked the outlaw. "You lying dog, you intended to keep that pay-roll for yourself, and let the world think the Apache Kid did the hold-up—yeah—and the shooting." He did not miss the fear in the other's eyes. "I watched it from yonder peak, and you plugged one of the guards. Now I want the truth, you dog—did you hit him bad?"

"No, Jack, I swear it was only in the shoulder," whined the wretch. "He tried to draw, and I had to shoot."

The Apache Kid strode forward, and with a quick movement wrenched a coloured and spotted handkerchief from the breast pocket of Buckley's dirty blue shirt.

"One of mine!" he snapped. "Kept so you could rob and pillage and let the sheriffs reckon the Apache Kid was the guy. Now I know why Sheriff Ward and others are so mighty hot on my trail. You've never been near Tennessee, you dirty crittur. I ain't ever shot to kill yet, but my fingers itch to pump you full of lead!" He whipped the gun from Buckley's belt. "Pick up that mail bag and stuff those notes inside."

"What yer aiming to do, Jack?" muttered the crook. "I swear you've got me all wrong."

"Do as I say!" roared the Kid, and shook the two guns ominously. "Jump to it."

Swiftly Bill Buckley knelt and began to gather together the notes.

"You're taking that lot to the Bar July 11th, 1931.

M." The Apache Kid pointed up the valley. "Dunp 'em with a message that they're returned with thanks. The Apache Kid will add a message of his own, then you can beat it. Don't try any tricks, Buckley, because I'm going to watch you like I'd watch a rattler."

Greed gave Buckley sudden courage, for he swung the heavy mail bag at the Apache Kid's guns. One gun went spinning, but the Kid could have shot his erstwhile friend with the other.

Instead, he dropped his gun and adopted the attitude of a fighter. Buckley tried to get powerful arms round the slim figure, but the Kid whipped a right and left to the unshaven jaw.

"Now take yer medicine!" snarled the Kid, and patted the thickset ruffian with every kind of punch he knew.

Buckley tried to kick and get to grips, but the Kid was much too quick on his feet, and at last a right upper-cut and a left to the jaw put the exhausted Buckley to the ground, where he lay moaning and staring up at his old master with swollen, bloodshot eyes.

"Now you'll do as I say," ordered the Kid, picking up his gun. "That time I used my hands, but next time I fire! Get busy, you—" He broke off and swung round. His keen ears had caught a sound.

Demon also had heard, because the horse stood rigid with ears pricked. Someone was riding through the pines.

Keeping Buckley covered, the Apache Kid stepped back towards his horse and then sprang into the saddle.

"I'm keeping you covered." The Kid edged his way into the mesquite.

"Don't try any tricks." Bill Buckley rubbed his aching head. He felt too sore to try any tricks. Slowly he scrambled to his feet and stared through the pines.

Riding towards him came Sheriff Ward, and the sheriff had drawn his gun.

Buckley Strikes a Bargain.

SHERIFF WARD dismounted, but always he kept Bill Buckley covered.

"And so, Apache Kid, we meet at last," he drawled. "Stick yer mitts up high, Kid, and don't get fresh."

"Sheriff, I ain't the Apache Kid," cried Buckley. "Listen—can you hear anything—a horse?"

The sheriff was puzzled, but he listened.

"Yeah, I can," he admitted after a while, and glanced towards the mesquite. "Stay there, and not a movement."

The Apache Kid had gone, but the sheriff glimpsed a distant figure riding up through the pines, and the horse was white. Rubbing his chin thoughtfully, Sheriff Ward came back to where Buckley stood with hands held high. He glanced at the thin, badly-fed colt that must be the robber's horse and asked a question.

"If you ain't the Apache Kid," he said, "then who are you?"

"My name's Buckley," came the quick answer. "I trailed the Kid after he held up the stage-coach. Yeah, he held it up less than an hour ago. We had a fight here, and then the Kid heard your boss and vamoosed, the yeller quitter."

"He did, did he?" The sheriff's eyes bored like gimlets into the other's mind. "You're lying, but you ain't the Apache Kid, that's certain. You're the guy that used to work with the Kid until he kicked you out or you quit. We ain't got a description of the Kid, but we got a picture of you. Yeah, now tell me some more."

Bill Buckley shifted uncomfortably.

"I found the Kid's camp fire, and I read it like a book," the sheriff went on. "That fire told me he couldn't have robbed the stage-coach an hour ago; but I guess the coach was held up—I saw it from the upper trail with one man sagged across the driver badly hit. And I heard the shooting and did some quick riding. Now tell me some more fairy-stories."

"The Kid made me hold up the stage." Buckley was cornered and lost his head. "I didn't hit that guy badly, sheriff; he'll be—"

"Come clean!" The sheriff kicked the mailbag with his foot. "You held up the mail and hoped I'd think it was another robbery by the Apache Kid. The Kid saw it all and was just about to take the swag when I came along."

"Yeah, yeah, that's right." Buckley was thinking quickly. "I've been starving and I was desperate. He held me up, and, having taken away my gun—" he pointed—"there it lies, where he flung it—he started in to beat me up, but in one hand he held his gun. You saved my life, sheriff, and I reckon I can pay you back. You don't gain much by capturing me, but maybe I could help you capture the Kid. If I help you get the Apache Kid will you overlook this and forget I ever worked with him?"

"I promise nothing," Sheriff Ward's eyes gleamed. At last had come a real chance of capturing the most desperate of outlaws. He could read men pretty well, and he knew this man Buckley hated the Apache Kid.

"If you can help me get the Kid maybe I might do something." He picked up Buckley's gun and lowered his own. "What's yer scheme?"

"The Kid has a shack along them ridge of hills—a hide-out," hissed Buckley. "I'm the only man what can lead yer to it, and I'm sure that the Kid will ride there to rest up for a spell. Sheriff, I'm on the level, for I'd give a year's prison to get that guy."

The sheriff looked his disgust, but he showed no signs of this in his next words.

"Right, lead the way!" He tossed Buckley his gun after taking out the shells. "You go first, and remember that when I shoot I always get my man."

"I swear, sheriff, I wouldn't double-cross—"

"You'd better not try," came the quick answer. "And remember this. If you don't help me get the Apache Kid you'll swing from a tree. Now get moving."

The Shack in the Hills.

THE Apache Kid was in a very thoughtful frame of mind as he rode through the forests and ravines towards his lonely shack. He was reviewing his life and regretting his past deeds.

His father he had never remembered, but his mother had been a sweet woman. But all people make mistakes, and she had married again—a man who had a smooth tongue, a crafty mind and a dissipated nature. The Kid had received a good education, but now he saw new and unpleasant companions as his step-father dragged them lower and lower in the mire. The brute forced him to help in a robbery that had started his life of crime. The step-father had died and his mother soon followed. Adventure, the pitting of brains against fellow-men, and danger became the spice of life.

Yet now he sickened of this career. The Kid did not rob for personal gain, but to help others as much as anything else, yet every other outlaw was so different. Filthy and callous and capable of any evil—scum such as Bill Buckley,

Why not give up the life? No one knew his face, and he could make his way to Tennessee or Utah, and after a while he would be a forgotten name. In a new land as a cowpuncher he could work out his redemption.

He laughed as he thought of the paltry sums of money he had kept for his own ends, but the laughter was genuine when he remembered the tricks he had played with many of the sheriffs and their posses.

How lonely and dismal seemed his shack. By the hitching-rail he left his horse, and with a key let himself into the interior. In spite of closed windows dust lay everywhere, and the air was musty, so that the Kid decided to open the windows and go outside till the atmosphere was clearer.

Little did the Kid know that Buckley and the sheriff had ridden hard and had reached the hills some hours before him, had cached their horses by a woody stream and then crawled to a mound to watch. Directly their prey had entered the shack they raced forward.

Thus the Kid, when he stepped out into the sunlight, got a nasty shock when a harsh voice snarled:

"Stuck 'em up, Apache Kid, we got yer covered!"

The outlaw swung round, and his jaw set ferociously as he saw Buckley standing behind the sheriff. The crook leered mockingly.

"You dog!" he spat out. "And this is how you repay me. Soon I'm going to square this account."

"You're going to gaol," was the sneering answer. "How you propose to square the account?"

"I ain't in gaol yet." The Kid edged a trifle nearer the sheriff. "You two guys have twelve hours' riding afore you, and you're dead tired. Maybe you might close an eye, and then—"

"Stop dreaming!" scoffed the sheriff. "I never sleep—not when I got a skunk in my clutches."

"Can I get some kit?" The Kid edged nearer and nodded his head towards the open door of the shack. "Ain't you going to look for traces of my crimes? You've only got this galoot's word that I'm the Apache Kid."

The sheriff glanced uncertainly at the shack, and in that moment the Kid acted. His clenched fist came down on the sheriff's wrist, and the gun was sent spinning. Buckley, with a gun that was unloaded, could do nothing but stare.

The Kid wasted no time, but banged a heavy right to the sheriff's jaw, and the older man sagged back in Buckley's arms; then the outlaw whipped up the sheriff's gun.

"I said you were tired, sheriff," he chuckled. "Sorry if your jaw's a bit sore, but you sure got me riled. Just hold up yer hands high, and I'll take back my shooting-iron, and don't you blink an eyelid, Bill Buckley, because you're the lowest of double-crossers I've ever met, and my finger itches to pull the trigger."

"You'll get a heavy sentence for this!" blustered the sheriff. "Striking the law."

"If the law ever gets me," was the answer. "Now lead the way to where you've hidden your horses."

With hands above their heads, they were forced to obey, and when the strange trio came to the stream the Kid snapped out the order for them to mount.

"Downstream, buddies," ordered the outlaw. "And don't come back. I'll be watching till your dust is out of my vision. You can come back at your own risk; maybe you find me gone, and maybe you don't, and it will be unhealthy if I should decide to stay. Think it out, sheriff, and remember, Buckley, that the first shot goes to you. Now beat it afore I get fresh."

The sheriff made Buckley come back an hour later, but there was no sign of the outlaw.

"I'll trail the Kid," raged Buckley. "And it ain't the reward I want. I'll trail him if it takes me all my life."

"Okay, Buckley." The sheriff took a chance. "I'll parole you, and when you bring in the Kid I'll scratch your name off my books, but until then it remains. Remember, Buckley, I've got your description, and we'll soon lay you low if—"

"It's revenge I want!" hissed the other. "I'll not double-cross you, sheriff."

Thus did the sheriff return without a prisoner.

At the Bar X Ranch.

PEACEFULLY the great herd of cattle grazed, whilst on the outskirts, and always on the alert, were the cowpunchers. These men of the Bar X rolled cigarettes, smoked, and talked, but they were ready for any emergency, for it is surprising how quickly a huge herd can be stampeded into a mad panic. Mostly they were in ones and twos, because not only had they to prevent a stampede, but to keep the herd from straying.

The cattle were being driven to a station on the other side of the high hills, and soon would pass along a barren ravine; thus they were having a final rest.

Two 'punchers were taking it easy, and, strange to relate, one of them was the Apache Kid. The other was a big, rather clumsy young man, who possessed an air of great good temper and good fellowship, yet did not look as if his brains were half as strong as his fine physique.

"You seem mighty thoughtful," the Kid broke the silence. "Anything on your mind, Ted—no trouble between you and Jane?"

"Nope, Jack, no trouble with Jane." Ted Conway puffed at his cigarette. "Jane ain't a troublesome sort, Jack, as you may have noticed. Since you joined this outfit four months ago, Jack, you've never seen us rowing, though maybe you may have seen us looking somewhat dismal. Nope, that ain't our trouble."

"I know Jane isn't a jealous or troublesome sort," laughed the ex-outlaw. "In fact, I reckon she's too darned considerate, but I haven't been blind to the fact that something was worritting you two young folk. It ain't done to ask questions out in the West, and you didn't ask none about me, though maybe you wondered what sort of a hombre I'd turn out."

"A mighty good 'puncher," Ted Conway laughed. "There ain't a guy that can touch you and your horse.

"I shall have to be careful, Ted," laughed the Apache Kid. "That yere description seems to fit me!"

Gee, how you collared the prizes at the last rodeo."

"Wish they'd been cash ones," rejoined the Kid. "Gee, I'm just about broke! That ride to town skinned me, and pay-day a week away."

"Jack"—the other was serious—"you haven't asked what was worritin' me and Jane, but I'll tell you, though maybe you've guessed—money! Yeah, money!"

"Money?" Jack was surprised. "Gee, I could see something was wrong, but you've sure handed me out a surprise. Ain't you the son of old man Conway what owns this yere ranch, and yet you say you're broke?"

"Pop's a tough guy to handle," spoke Ted. "I'm foreman, and I get foreman's pay, but I gotta work to hold on to the job. If I fly off the handle, and haven't got a cent, then I've got to beg, borrow, or steal from my buddies until next pay-day. No good going to pop."

"You sure got me beat," cried Jack, and asked a question. "Don't he sorta cotton to Jane, Ted?"

"Oh, he likes Jane a lot!" Conway rumped his thick thatch of unruly hair. "But every time I talk of marriage he gets kinda riled, and says he don't want no women around the place, that he ain't satisfied that I'm a capable foreman, and until he is satisfied—"

"But if he shouldn't be satisfied." The outlaw-cowpuncher frowned. "Suppose that should happen—what then? I don't hand out bouquets, Ted, but I've seen many worse foremen in my day. But just supposing he did make someone else foreman, he would have to do something for his son. Why, Ted, your pop could buy the Woolworth Building and still be rich."

"Dunno, Jack, it sorta puzzles me," Conway sighed. "He's kinda mean, maybe. It's Jane's birthday to-morrow, and I haven't got a cent. She knows the old man don't fling his money around, but I ain't ever missed giving her a present on her birthday yet."

A half-smile twitched Jack's lips. "Would a scarf be of any use, Ted?" From his pocket he drew a spotted, coloured silk handkerchief. "I haven't got much use for this, and you're welcome."

"You're a pal." Ted held out a glad hand. "Gee, she'll be tickled with this! Jane likes you." The foreman drew himself erect in the saddle. "Guess we'd better get going, Jack, or else we'll never get this blamed herd to the station."

The Apache Kid, or, as he was known at the Bar X, Jack Norton, did a lot of thinking during the next few hours. Many things puzzled him, but he had a mighty good idea why Ted's father was all against his son marrying Jane Carter.

The punchers handed over the cattle at the station and made the return journey with all speed. Ted Conway and Jack were the first to get back—the foreman was anxious to be home for Jane's birthday. Ted was so eager that he would have ridden on alone, except that Jack made him rest up for a few hours during the night.

"You could make it by noon," agreed Jack. "But what's the use of going back to a gal looking almost dead beat."

When they reached the ranch it was to find a number of men gathered round a notice pinned to a post on the veranda of the store. Two girls, who were talking to a fat portly little man broke away and ran to greet the arrivals.

The slim, fair-haired girl, who looked so dainty in her sheepskin chaps and neat silk shirt ran to meet Ted with open arms, whilst the short-skirted young woman with her dark curls flying in the wind ran towards Jack. They were Jane and Betty Carter, aged respectively eighteen and fourteen. Betty had adopted the handsome young rider as her own beau.

The fat little man, who was dressed in grey serge with a heavy gold watch-chain across his extensive chest, puffed angrily at his cigar and snorted like an angry old buffalo. What could have angered Frank Conway, the owner of the Bar X Ranch?

Ted Conway leaped out of the saddle and put his arms round the girl—the boys of the ranch grinned and were envious; Jack swung Betty on to his saddle, pinched her nose, and then put her gently down again. Everyone laughed except Frank Conway, who strode off.

"Hallo, pop!" called out Ted, but the old man did not stop. "I can't understand him lately, Jane."

"No—nor can I." Jack did not miss the girl's distress, and it again proved one of his theories. The girl changed the subject quickly. "Oh, Ted, do look at this notice. It's all about a desperate outlaw and a big reward."

"Who cares about it when it's your birthday?" whispered Ted. "Why, Jane, I ain't properly wished you many happy returns of the day."

"Read that first," insisted Jane, smiling up at the big man. "Then maybe you can take me home."

Ted strolled up to the notice and at first he did not take much interest. Often these posters with their offers of rewards were sent and according to law pinned in a prominent place for all to read. This one was all about a daredevil fellow named the Apache Kid, who had apparently vanished and was suspected of taking the trail towards Tennessee. It was the drawing of a bandit with a scarf over the lower part of his face that made Ted read eagerly. The Apache Kid was described very accurately and concluded with a note about the spotted silk handkerchief that the Kid always used on his escapades.

Sheriff Ward had tired of waiting for Bill Buekly to bring in the Kid and had drawn up this notice—he hated to lose a man.

Out of the corners of his eyes Ted Conway flashed a glance at Jack Norton—the description was very similar. The boys were satisfied that Jack was a genuine cowboy, but Ted had seen a lot of the newcomer and remembered now moments when his friend had been strangely thoughtful, but most convincing of all was the scarf that reposed in his pocket.

It was young Betty who dragged Jack over to read the description, and the keen eyes picked out from a distance the words "Apache Kid." Slowly Jack read the reward notice through, and then grinned cheerfully at Ted.

"I shall have to be careful, Ted," he laughed. "That yere description seems to fit me. Jane and Betty, you may be harbouring a nefarious scoundrel, who according to this notice robs and steals in a most callous manner, assaults the law and other desperate deeds."

"If you were a robber I shouldn't mind," cried Betty.

"If I were an outlaw I'd carry off one person," chuckled Jack. "Come on, Mischief, and help me unsaddle Demon and give him a well-earned feed."

Ted Conway had little to say when he went off with Jane, who wondered and waited patiently for him to tell her. At the small poultry farm, two miles from the Bar X, that belonged to Jane's father, Ted spoke.

"This is your birthday, Jane, and a mighty good moment to ask Pop about our marriage. Your father is agreeable, and it's up to my old man to help us through. He's thinking of buying the Dobsons' place away towards the border, and maybe he might make me boss. You stay right here, Jane; I gotta tackle pop whilst I'm in the mood."

"Best of luck, Ted!" cried the girl, and waved to him till her lover was out of sight.

It was an unsatisfactory ride as far as Ted was concerned, because he found his father had gone out for a ride. Actually, Frank Conway had taken the trail for the Conway Hacienda, but being fat and portly had taken the longest and easiest route—Ted going across the hills had missed his father.

What Jack Overheard.

AS Jane had gone off with Ted, the one-time outlaw decided to ride over with Betty to her home. Demon had to be rested, but Jack soon borrowed a horse.

Arriving at the ranch, Betty wanted him to stay and play with her, and Jack, who loved the child dearly, was nothing loath. The game was hide-and-seek.

"Two packets of gum to a kiss you don't find me," chuckled Jack. "Count a hundred, a proper hundred, and then after me."

Jack hid in a half-empty hay-cart, pulling the sweet-smelling hay over him. Old Man Carter had bought the hay from the Bar X for his poultry.

Scarce had Jack hidden when he heard male voices, and recognised them as Frank Conway and old man Carter.

"The matter I want to speak about deals with my son." It was the pompous owner of the Bar X. "I dislike being personal, Carter, but I am a business man. For health reasons you came here and invested your money in poultry. A venture that has not proved too successful, as you have had to borrow certain sums from me."

"I'm expecting a big dividend from some shares—"

"I don't doubt it for a moment," interrupted Conway. "I know you're sound, but you are not a rich man, and you want to make provision for your daughter. You would not encourage a man who had no prospects. You are pleased that Jane shall marry Ted because he is the son of the owner of the Bar X ranch."

"Well—er—Hallo, Betty, what you want?"

"Have you seen any signs of Jack Norton?" asked the girl. "He's hiding, and I can't find him."

"Run off and play somewhere; he's not here," answered her father. A pause. "What makes you mention this matter, Mister Conway? I'm sure my daughter—"

"A sweet girl," was the quick answer. "Far too good for Ted. Listen, Carter. I am worth at least a million dollars, and as this land is increasing in value it will soon be much more. And most important of all—Ted Conway is not my son."

"Not your son?"

"Nope. My first wife suffered poor health and she made me adopt Ted as a son," Conway explained. "She died years ago and I've let the decision remain, though I am far from satisfied with Ted as a son. He is not my own blood, and I consider him a great clumsy clodhopper. Frankly, Carter, I don't favour the marriage, and if he does marry Jane, then I disown him entirely."

"But why?"

"Your daughter is far too good for Ted," was the surprising answer. "I have a better husband in view for her. I will clear your poultry farm of all debt and make you a handsome allowance, Carter, if you are agreeable to that husband."

"Well, she might do better than Ted," agreed the poultry farmer. "I won't let them marry if he isn't your son and hasn't any money. But, say, who is this husband for my Jane? You don't mean—"

The Apache Kid heard no more, because Betty came again, seeking for Jack. The two old men retired to the house.

How Betty laughed when Jack poked his nose out of the straw.

"I've been here for hours," laughed Jack. "Guess we'll call the game off. Let's go and find your sister, 'cos I got something I wanna say to her right now."

The Arrest.

JACK often rode over to the Carter Hacienda, but most times he went alone, and one day Jane, who liked him immensely, asked the reason.

"I'm treading on dangerous ground if I say anything against Ted," answered the Kid. "But I kinda feel he's avoiding me. Can't place anything he has ag'in me. Maybe he's worrying over money, and don't want to talk about his affairs."

"He acts strangely with me," Jane said. "Oh, look—there is Ted now!"

Ted Conway nodded to Jack and grinned in a nervous, sheepish sort of manner. Both Jane and Jack were puzzled at his manner.

"Howdy?" Conway found himself under the accusing gaze of young Betty. "Hallo, Kid!"

"Hallo yourself," was the somewhat rude answer. "we reckon you oughta see a doc. Oft-times Jane and I got down in the dumps, but that don't do us any good."

"Oh, I'm grand!" cried Ted. "Maybe I'm anxious over some of those herds we bought; then the wells are mighty low; and still another week till payroll."

"Hallo, look at that dust!" Betty pointed. "Someone's riding in a hurry."

Jack was the only one who saw how Ted half-slid a hand to his belt. What the blazes was the matter with Ted? The foreman was a bundle of nerves.

The Kid felt inclined to slide a hand to his own belt when he saw the riders were the local sheriff and a posse of half a dozen riders. They did not waste time. They ranged up alongside the foreman.

"The stage-coach to El Paso has been held up," spoke the sheriff. "The money that Mr. Conway was sending to the bank has been taken by a masked man, who was wearing a spotted bandana. Hank Jennings glimpsed the gunman's face when the bandana slipped, and he recognised the face. I arrest you, Ted Conway, for the hold-up of the stage and the stealing of your father's money."

"But that's absurd." It was Jane who spoke. "You must be mad, sheriff, to think that Ted would hold up the stage."

"Hank saw his face and is prepared to swear to it," was the answer. "I've reported the matter to Mr. Conway, and he says you must stand your trial or prove an alibi."

"I've been out riding range," spluttered the foreman. "I was by myself, and I went to see the wells—water getting low. But, sheriff, I wouldn't hold up the stage. Maybe it was this desperado who did it. Wasn't he wearing a bandana, and didn't that yere reward state that the Apache Kid—"

Jack gritted his teeth. Used to fighting for his life and acting quickly, he saw danger almost before it threatened. Like lightning he threaded two and two together and guessed the truth. What the sheriff had to say strengthened that conviction.

"Apache Kid," the sheriff laughed, "that bandana was sure like one the Apache Kid used to wear, but Jennings is prepared to swear that the face was that of Ted Conway. The case you got to fight, Conway, is this one: that you impersonated the Apache Kid and hoped we would put the blame on the outlaw, who is thought to be in these parts. But for the slipping of the bandana you would have got away with it. Ain't for me to express any opinion, but it sure was a surprise to me and all the boys, and I'll be sure glad to see you cough up an alibi, but Hank was so certain sure that I ain't got no other course but to take you back."

"Say something, Ted," wailed Jane. "Can't you think of anything to prove you were out at the wells. Didn't you see any Injun?"

"Yeah, I saw Injuns, but they'll be mighty hard to find." Ted would not look any of them squarely in the face. "Guess I'll be set free directly I've had a talk to pop. Don't you worry about me, Jane."

When the sheriff and the prisoner were out of sight Jane flung impetuous arms round Jack's neck.

"You're his friend—do something for him," she cried. "Ted could never have done this. I believe his father's framed him. He hates him, Jack."

"Ted is not Mr. Conway's son." Then Jack told what he had heard as gently as he could. "It upset your pop badly, so best keep mum until he says something. I'm riding to the Bar X right now, for I've a hunch I can help Ted prove an alibi."

With hearts relieved strangely of much worry, the girls waved their hands till Jack was but a speck on the horizon.

Two hours later Jack was admitted to the cell of the foreman, who laughed nervously.

"Fine mess I'm in," he said. "No chance of proving an alibi. Now I've learnt that the boss ain't my old man at all, and—"

"Listen to me, Ted," interrupted Jack. "I've persuaded the sheriff to let me have three minutes alone with you, and if you want me to help you, then you must open out. Hank Jennings saw you plain enough, Ted, and—"

"You don't think I held up the stage?"

"I don't think—I know," was the

"I arrest you, Ted Conway, for the hold-up of the stage and the stealing of your father's money!" cried the sheriff.

fierce answer. "You wanted the sheriff to think the Apache Kid stole the money, but I'm saying this for your credit: you did not think the Kid would ever be captured. You wanted money because Conway was a thorough old skinkint and hated you because he wants to marry Jane himself. That had at last penetrated your thick noodle, and you reckoned that with the money you could marry Jane."

Ted Conway looked a picture of guilt. Jack was merciless.

"You know who the Apache Kid is," he snapped. "You wore the bandana I gave you, but, being a poor sort of bandit, you fixed it wrong and Hank saw your face."

"Gosh, you're too smart!" moaned Ted. "Guess I'd better confess I held up the stage. Jack, I ain't got a thing to say for myself. Except that none but myself knows what kinda father Frank Conway has been to me, and when I knew he wanted Jane I got desperate."

"Jane loves you, and I don't hate you as much as I ought," Jack answered. "Time is going, Ted. Tell me where you hid the money, and what did you do with my bandana?"

"I recognised you about a week ago," mumbled the foreman. "I've sure handed you a nasty crack."

"Tell me where you hid the money, and stop blithering," snapped the Apache Kid. "You've got to trust me—Jane does."

"I hid the money and the scarf in that old tree on Injun Hill," was the reply. "The tree that's dead through being struck by lightning. There's a hollow trunk, and under some earth I—"

"Shush, here comes the sheriff!" hissed the Apache Kid. "Not a word about this. Just go on swearing you're innocent, and that Hank must have been loco." He turned to grin at the sheriff. "Thanks for what you've done. Reckon from what Ted's told me, I'll soon have him out of this place. So long, Ted, and put your trust in"—he paused, and did not answer till outside the cell—"the Apache Kid!"

"What did he mean by that?" the sheriff muttered, as Jack strode out of the lock-up.

"Dunno, sheriff," mumbled Ted. "But I'm blamed certain that he'll get me out of this hole if anyone can. Reckon what he said about the Apache Kid was a joke."

Late that night a horseman left the Bar X Ranch and rode silently away. Horse and rider moved like shadows through the darkness, and an hour's riding brought them to Injun Hill.

Jack soon found the old tree, and, after scraping away the earth, the heavy leather satchel and the bandana.

The early hours of the morning found a horseman lurking in the small wood near the ranch, and round the lower part of his face was bound a spotted bandana.

The Apache Kid was playing a desperate part to save the friend who had almost betrayed him.

The Desperate.

FRANK CONWAY sat in his office; before his big desk stood the sheriff and the deputy.

"He's no son of mine," the boss of the Bar X cried. "He's acted like a snake to the man who's been a father to him. I made this ranch and the town that's grown up round it, and what I say is law. You'll summon a jury and try Ted Conway. He'll get the full punishment if—"

July 11th, 1931.

The door opened and a masked man stood there. Two guns were in his hands.

"If nothing, you fat gasbag," came a harsh voice. "Just hold yer hands high. No tricks, sheriff, for I'm a mighty angry man. I'm the Apache Kid, and your fat boss is causing me a whole lot of trouble—that's why I'm here. Stand still whilst I help myself to the armory."

"The Apache Kid," the sheriff gasped out. "What you want of us?"

"Don't shoot, Kid," whined the trembling Conway. "You can have all the money in the safe. It's only a few dollars, for I was robbed only a few—"

"Can it!" The Apache Kid swung his guns round. "I'm gonna do the talking. See this?" They noticed that a satchel swung over his arm. "Do you recognise it?"

"Why, it's the satchel I sent my money in!" quavered Conway.

"Yeah, your satchel, and your money inside." The Apache Kid laughed. "News carries quick in these parts, and that's why I'm here. The Apache Kid plays a lone hand. He had a partner once; and no guy ever double-crossed me again. You've got some poor boob in your lock-up, and trying to prove he held up the stage coach. How can he have robbed you, you fat fool, if the money is in that satchel? No man goes to jail or swings for what is my business. Take a look-see."

The Kid tossed the satchel on to the desk. His eyes glistened as Conway feverishly dragged out the bundles of notes.

"It's all there," grunted the outlaw. "This fat fool said his word was law; well, so is mine. I held up your rotten stage—never seen such a bunch of seared coyotes!—and I took this money. I've got plenty of money, but the temptation to scare a stage just tickled my ribs. Maybe I would have kept this money, but when I heard some poor boob had been corraled for my fun I had to come right back. Fifty miles over your dusty plains have I ridden."

"Guess we've made a mistake, stranger," cried the sheriff.

"Say, aren't you clever!" was the sneering answer. "Just listen to what I'm going to command. If that boob ain't released afore I'm out of range I'm a-comin' back. Keep your money, Frank Conway, and I'll be a-comin' back to talk to you if you don't do the right thing by your adopted son. Oh, yeah, I know all that goes on in this little burg."

"The sheriff shall release Ted at once," Conway was almost blubbering with fright. "I'll see Ted gets a fair deal."

"Then I'll be beating it for the wide-open spaces." The Apache Kid backed to the door. "And if I come this way again I come a-shootin'."

The sheriff made a move towards the gun that lay on Conway's desk. A gun spat, and the weapon was shot off the desk. Conway gave a moan of fear.

"Keep your hands up," he cried. "We don't mean any harm, Kid. The sheriff wanted to wipe his nose."

"I'll wipe it with a bullet if he moves again." The outlaw had flung open the door. "Now follow me anyone who dares."

The Apache Kid flung himself into his saddle. A few seconds later the sheriff and his deputy—with Conway in the background—appeared. A cloud of dust showed them the trail of the outlaw.

The shot had been heard by most of the cow-punchers of the Bar X, and they stared after the galloping horseman until the sheriff's frenzied yells awoke them to action.

"That's the Apache Kid," he cried. "There's a thousand bucks reward for his capture, dead or alive. I want a posse of twelve of the best mounted."

The Kid laughed grimly when he saw that pursuing posse. He might have laughed still more if he knew that one of the posse was the released Ted Conway. Poor Ted had gained his release—would it be at the expense of the Apache Kid?

The Apache Kid's Plans.

THE Apache Kid had made his plans. He would lead the posse a good old dance, and by the superior speed of the Demon eventually cross the border. There must he bid farewell to pleasant memories and dear friends, and to find refuge and solace at some other ranch, provided the minions of the law did not hound him back to the old life.

But the Apache Kid had reckoned without Bill Buckley.

For weeks the renegade had trailed the Kid. Several times he had got in touch with Sheriff Ward to report. The sheriff, convinced that Buckley was for once playing straight, offered him the reward of a thousand dollars if he could bring about the capture of the outlaw. The reward and hatred spurred the dago to keep to the trail, and after many wrong scents had at last headed for the Bar X.

Buckly was certain that the new hand, by name of Jack Norton, was the Apache Kid, and already he thought of the big reward, but it was as well to take no chances, and the rascal kept to the hills and the forests in his ride to the Bar X.

The scattered firing and beat of many hoofs came to his ears. Up a tree swarmed Bill Buckley, and he saw a sight that made his eyes gleam—the Apache Kid on Demon, and, behind, a posse of a dozen or more riders!

If the Kid reached the border and the dense forests, Buckley's chances of the thousand dollars would be gone. He must get the Kid now!

The first intimation that Jack had of trouble from an unexpected source was a bullet that whined mightily close to his eyes. The shot had come from a clump of mesquite. The Kid at once turned his horse and reached the woods without further shooting.

Bill Buckley mounted his horse and charged after him.

Now it happened that the Apache Kid's lead over the posse was about half a mile, and the posse had been firing just to show they meant business; when Buckley took a hand the chase was proceeding along a twisting valley, and so the posse did not see the Kid turn towards the woods.

Thus the Apache Kid twisted through the pines with Buckley close behind, whilst the posse, shouting and firing, rode on down the valley—till a straight stretch showed no sign of their quarry and they realised their mistake.

Jack heard the crashing behind and decided that perhaps he had better get moving. He hadn't bargained for the ambush. Soon his ears told him that but one man was on his trail.

The Kid reached the brow of the hill, rode down through the trees to an open stretch of land. A mile beyond lay jagged hills. Turning in his saddle, Jack looked back, and he got a surprise when the other rider broke cover. Bill Buckley, and the skunk was armed with a rifle. Two more bullets whined past his head. It would be a desperate plight for him if Buckley should attempt to shoot at Demon.

"Old hoss, we gotta make those hills," he whispered, and the gallant animal strove his utmost.

Time after time the outlaw avoided death by swerving his horse so that Buckley wasted his ammunition on a difficult target. A quarter of a mile from the hills and Demon, usually so sure footed, stumbled over a half-buried root and went lame.

Used to all emergencies, Jack thought furiously. Two bullets whining dangerously close gave him his idea. He sagged across the saddle as if badly wounded, whilst Demon limped towards the hills on three legs.

Bill Buckley rode alongside. He had replaced the rifle for a revolver, and his tanned face was alight with evil satisfaction—at last he had settled the Apache Kid. He decided to stop Demon, drag the Kid out of the saddle, bind him and then wait for the posse.

But as Buckley stretched forward his gun-hand to catch at the bridle, the lifeless body suddenly woke to life, and his gun-hand was gripped by steel-like fingers. The gun dropped to the dust and, snarling like a wild cat, Buckley freed his other hand and flung both arms round his enemy.

Demon heard an order that he understood, and at once turned sharply so that his master's feet shot out of the saddle. Buckley half out of his own saddle had the full weight of the Apache Kid on his neck, lost his balance, and next moment both men were rolling in the dust.

"This is where we settle accounts," the Kid managed to splutter as he drove a fist to Buckley's ribs.

Desperation and fear lent the double-cropper added strength, for he managed to free his arm and drive his fist into the Kid's face. Next moment they were on their feet, facing each other like two fierce gladiators.

The Kid could have drawn his gun, but he had decided to beat Buckley in a fair fight—give the coyote the hiding of his life. They swapped punches, but the Kid's hurt most, and when an uppercut opened Buckley's right eye the latter decided to beat it for the hills. He had a gun hidden inside his shirt—a trick that had served him well in many a shooting—and if he could get a few yards from the Kid he might have a chance to reach for it, but the Kid must never guess his intention or else another gun would speak first. The Apache Kid was the quickest man on the draw in the South-west.

It was exhausting work running up the loose-stoned slope, and both men stumbled. Several times Buckley felt for the hidden gun, but he seemed to see the Kid drawing his own gun.

The Apache Kid gained on Buckley, and at the crest of the first slope, where there was a small plateau, the two men came to grips again. Buckley was a dissolute rascal and he was all in. A straight left sent him crashing to the ground. Fear made the crook try to get out the gun, and just in time did the Kid jump forward and grip the weapon.

The posse on the opposite hill heard the firing of the gun, and with a yell took up the new trail.

The Kid yanked the exhausted Buckley to his feet.

"You dirty hound," he spat out, and slammed a right and left to the coarse mouth.

Buckley staggered back, swayed dangerously on the edge of the slope and then toppled backwards with a scream of despair. Over and over rolled the body, and the Kid shuddered when he saw the great boulder that Buckley must crash into with sickening force.

When the Kid reached the boulder one glance showed him that Buckley was out of sight. A desperate idea flashed to his keen mind. Here was a chance of the Apache Kid dying for ever.

The posse were not yet in sight, and the big boulder screened them from the opposite slope. The Kid was wearing a coloured shirt and Buckley's was blue. Swiftly the exchange was made, and then the Apache Kid partly covered the blood-stained mouth with the spotted bandana.

The task was just complete when a glance round the boulder showed the posse dashing down the woods. They saw the two horses in the valley and knew their quarry must be near.

What a surprise they got when they saw Jack Norton appear, dragging a figure after him. The boulder was almost in the valley, just as well, as the Apache Kid was almost all-in.

"Hallo, Norton," cried the sheriff. "What's happened? By gar, that's the Apache Kid? He's dead!"

"Yeah, I was out early," Jack gasped out. "Too hot to sleep, so I went riding. Heard shouts and shooting, and saw a lone rider with the lower part of his face masked." He pointed to the bandana. "I give chase, for I guessed it was the Apache Kid, and we came to grips on that small plateau up yonder. I could have shot him in the back, but I only shoot snakes that way. He drew a gun, and I just got to him in time. I landed two hard punches and the Apache Kid lost his balance and toppled over the edge before I could shout a warning. See that boulder, well that's the boulder his head hit."

"Well, that sure beats me." The sheriff peered at the crumpled figure and battered, crushed face. "I kinda expected the Apache Kid to look more refined. He looked sorta younger when I seed him a while back, but maybe the bad light was deceptive."

Ted Conway stepped forward and his large face was one great grin. He held out his hand.

"Gee, Jack, I'm mighty glad you got the Apache Kid," he cried. "I mind seeing this guy prowling round the ranch a few days ago." He winked. "How about riding over to the Carters, Jack? I want to thank you and so will Jane."

The two men gripped hands.

A week had passed, and Demon and his master were fit again. Jane and Betty Carter, old man Carter and Ted Conway, were bidding farewell to a true friend.

The Apache Kid kissed the two girls heartily, clapped old man Carter on the back and had a final handshake with Ted.

"Frank Conway has fixed you for that new ranch, and soon you'll be getting married," cried the outlaw. "And I'm wagering you make a big success of both. If it wasn't for the cursed wanderlust that gets me about every two months I'd be staying around."

As Sheriff Ward had cabled that he might come himself to present the reward there was every reason why the Apache Kid should lit the trail. The two girls now knew the true identity of Jack, but that made them like him, if anything, more than ever.

"When the sheriff has gone you will come back," said Jane. "There is a dead pine near the summit of Injun Hill, and until Ted tells that tree you'd best keep away."

"I'll look out for that good omen." The Apache Kid swept off his wide sombrero. "You've been real good pals, and I'm sure coming back—some day." There was a huskiness in his throat as he smiled at the girls. "You'll wait for me, Betty."

"What about the reward, Jack?" demanded Ted.

"That's the wedding present of the Apache Kid," cried the outlaw, and next moment was galloping away from the Hacienda.

They watched till he was out of sight, but they were very doubtful if the Apache Kid would ever come back to the Bar X Ranch again.

(By permission of Butchers Film Service, Ltd., featuring Jack Perrin.)

THREE GRAND COMPLETE FILM NOVELS.

"THE SINGLE SIN."

She shed her past and went straight—but evil hands sought to drag her back into the mire.

"REDUCING."

She sent for her poor but portly sister to come and assist in her famous beauty parlours. Marie duly arrives, family and all, and from that moment the fun waxes fast and furious. Starring Marie Dressler and Polly Moran.

"MORE THAN A KISS."

He was bet a huge sum he could not kiss, within forty-eight hours, the first woman who came on to the veranda of his lawyer's house. A delightful comedy drama, starring Edmund Lowe and Jeanette MacDonald.

Don't miss these fine stories in this week's issue of our companion paper,

KAY JOHNSON in "THE SINGLE SIN."

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY.

PRICE 2d.
July 11th, 1931.

CHARLES BICKFORD
*as the Royal Canadian Mounted Policeman in the stirring Warner Bros. film,
"River's End."*

July 11th, 1931.

"Shipmates."

(Continued from page 18.)

the motor-boat fastened alongside, and he was sure.

"Stand by," he ordered, "there's someone on board that ship. Keep a good look-out, men."

Down in the dark hold of the ship the admiral and the cadet turned on the last of the sea-cocks, and scrambled for the ladders, with water swirling higher and higher round their feet. Up they went in desperate haste, well knowing that at any moment the ship might be blown sky-high. They reached the deck, which was almost flush with the water, only to find that the upper works of the vessel were on fire. The burning oil-tanker was close alongside, and sheets of flame were sweeping over the sinking barge.

They crawled to the side of the ship. The heat was terrific, and even the deck, though water was beginning to splash over it, felt hot beneath them. Jonesy tore off his coat and threw it over the admiral's head as a fiery gust of flame swept over them. Another flaw of wind carried the fire away for a moment, and Admiral Corbin rose by the rail of the ship, scorched and nearly stifled, but not so badly burnt as his young companion.

"I'm sorry I called you a coward, boy," he gasped, helping Jonesy to rise. "Come, we must jump for it!"

Jonesy was very badly burnt about the face and arms, and his clothing was on fire. He staggered up, to poise himself with the admiral by the rail, and just as another burst of flame came down upon them, the two men dived.

A second later the ammunition barge disappeared beneath the surface, and a swarm of launches churned their way to the spot to rescue the two heroes who had been seen to jump from the ship.

"Starboard your helm!" howled the lieutenant in charge of the boat. "I saw one of them—there!"

Eager hands reached out and hauled a seemingly lifeless body to the deck of the barge.

"Good heavens! It's the admiral!" gasped the lieutenant. "Admiral Corbin! Full speed for the flagship!"

The Reward of Bravery.

EVERY ship of the fleet had her flag at half-mast. Solemn minute guns boomed out a farewell salute, and on the deck of the flagship Admiral Schuyler and a group of sad-faced officers stood stiffly to attention. A squad of marines carried a body, draped with the star-spangled banner, to the side of the ship, and gently lowered it into the sea.

Admiral Schuyler stepped forward and cast a wreath over the side, and one by one all the ships of the fleet steamed slowly past the spot for each captain to throw the tribute of his ship to the memory of a very gallant sailor.

For Admiral Corbin had been picked up indeed; but the plunge into the sea after his strenuous work on the ammunition ship had proved too much for him, and even as he was lifted on to the deck of the Colorado he had breathed his last. And as he had long before requested, he had been buried from the deck of the flagship at sea.

While the wreaths floated over the ocean grave of Admiral Corbin, Jonesy lay in hospital, his head heavily swathed in bandages. He had been picked up unconscious, but youth and health were on his side, and gradually he recovered until at length he was able to speak.

"Is the admiral okay?" he whispered faintly one morning to the doctor who stood beside his bed.

"Yes, son, he is. He did what he aimed to do—the fleet was saved. The admiral is okay, sure," said the doctor.

A smile came over Jonesy's face, and, closing his eyes, he went off to sleep again. When he woke he saw Lieutenant Michael bending over him.

"Feeling better, Jones, eh?" smiled the lieutenant, whose face was decorated with a great strip of plaster.

"Guess I'll soon be okay," whispered the young cadet feebly.

"What happened that night is a personal matter between us," said Mike quietly. "You'll hear no more of it from me."

"Thank you, lieutenant. I'm sorry you were hurt," said Jonesy, smiling. "I'll say you're a real good sport."

Mike went away, and Jonesy hoped against hope that Kit would come to see him. But the girl was plunged in such deep grief at the death of her father, heroic though his end had been, that the doctors positively forbade her to see Jones until he was off the danger list, and so he waited for many days in vain.

Jonesy was at length well enough to get up, and then the girl, clad in deep black, came to see him.

"Why, Kit," said Jonesy, looking with astonishment at the girl's pale face and her mourning attire, "what's wrong? Is it—your father? They told me he was okay."

"He is—okay," said Kit. "But he died on the flagship that night after he was picked up."

Jonesy rose shakily to his feet and saluted solemnly.

"Admiral Corbin was a real white man," he said, "and I'm proud to have served under him."

A few weeks later the cadets at Annapolis formed up on the parade ground for an inspection by Admiral Schuyler. After a march past the saluting base where the admiral stood, they formed a hollow square, stood rigidly to attention, and waited expectantly.

Admiral Schuyler came forward, followed by the officers of his staff.

"I have now a very pleasant duty to perform," said the admiral. "One of the cadets of this college has been distinguished by an act of most remarkable bravery. Lieutenant Jones!"

Jonesy stepped out of the ranks and stood before the admiral.

"I am instructed by the Admiralty to present to you the medal awarded for specially courageous deeds of valour," said Admiral Schuyler formally, "and to congratulate you." He pinned the medal on the uncomfortable Jonesy's breast, and shook hands with him, while the cadets cheered lustily.

For Jonesy's rash actions had been officially overlooked, and nothing more was heard either of his attempt at desertion, or of his fight with Lieutenant Michael.

Later on that day Jonesy and Kit were strolling together in the grounds of the college.

"I shall be here for nearly four years," said Jonesy. "I hope you're not going to fall for—one of those big oil men, as you did before."

Kit Corbin laughed merrily. "Don't be so silly!" she cried.

"Four years is a long time," remarked Jonesy thoughtfully.

"I shall be waiting," was the girl's earnest reply.

Jonesy looked hurriedly around, and saw that they were alone.

"Clear the decks for action!" he cried. "Commence fring!"

His arms went round her shoulders, and action commenced rapidly—on her lips—and went on until Kit laughingly pushed him away.

Jonesy glanced at the wall, on which was a metal slab in memory of the famous American admiral of the eighteenth century, John Paul Jones. He drew himself up stiffly and saluted.

"I have to report, admiral," he said solemnly, "that I have the situation well in hand!"

(By permission of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Film Co., Ltd., starring Robert Montgomery and Dorothy Jordan.)

EVERY BOY SHOULD OWN AN Ingersoll

INGERSOLL "CROWN."

5/-

Radiolite Dial, 7/6

Ingersoll Watches are famous for accuracy. In 25 years millions of boys (and men, too) have owned an Ingersoll. This fine watch, illustrated here, has a nickel case and is strong, reliable, and guaranteed. Sold by Ingersoll Agents everywhere at 5/- each.

INGERSOLL Ltd., Kingsway, London, W.C.2.

"The Iron Man."

(Continued from page 10.)

tive corners, and at the outset Kid Mason launched a whirlwind attack that drove O'Keefe to the ropes. The Kid's face was grim and set. It seemed almost as if he were trying to vent on O'Keefe all that rage which the letter from Lewis' wife had aroused in him, but O'Keefe covered up skilfully, taking the minimum amount of punishment, and finally slithering out into the centre of the ring again.

There was a hard spell of give-and-take in the middle of the roped square, and then a right-cross dropped Rattler O'Keefe to the boards. The referee waved the Kid towards a neutral corner and began to count, but at "three" O'Keefe was on his feet, smiling gamely.

The Kid rushed him, and battered him mercilessly during the remainder of the round, in which he piled up a formidable array of points. But O'Keefe's stamina, as he walked to his corner, seemed unimpaired. He had the appearance of a man who had been holding himself in check, as indeed he had—in accordance with George Regan's instructions.

The second round opened with a tear-away attack by the Kid, and more than one hammer-blow crashed home to O'Keefe's face and body with staggering effect.

At the ringside, near the challenger's corner, one of Rattler's seconds spoke to Regan anxiously. "The Kid's hurting him, George," he said. "You'd better let the Rattler go to him."

"Not yet," George answered, his eyes on Kid Mason's grim face, "not yet."

The round ended and O'Keefe came back to his stool. "You're doing fine, Rattler," George Regan told him, and then he glanced in the champ's direction—a little regretfully, perhaps, for though he aimed to guide O'Keefe to victory, it was hard to sunder the bonds of friendship utterly, and deep down in his heart he was wishing that he was in the Kid's corner.

Meanwhile the Kid was leaning back while his seconds fanned him with the towels and tried to offer advice.

"You're going too fast, Kid," old

Jeff protested, noting the youngster's heaving chest. "Don't you remember how George used to—"

"Shut up!" the Kid barked. "I'm fighting this fight! Listen, I've hit him with everything, an' he won't stay down. But I'm goin' in now, and I'll murder him!" His eyes blazed fiercely, and: "I'll murder him!" he repeated.

From the opposite corner George Regan saw his expression, and he laid a warning hand on O'Keefe's arm.

"Watch him, Rattler!" he jerked.

Get YOUR Copy NOW!

On Sale Everywhere 3^d.

Get ready for the Football Season! The ANSWERS FOOTBALL ANNUAL tells you everything you want to know about the new season's games and last season's results in Cup and League.

"He's goin' wild. This is your round—get him!"

O'Keefe nodded, and at the sound of the bell slid into the middle of the ring. He saw the Kid coming for him like a tiger, and he saw the Kid's right start to travel.

The Rattler blocked the punch and whipped his own right to the point. The Kid went over heels-high, amid a roar of exultation from the crowd, but he was up at the count of "five," and by the sheer fury of a terrific onslaught he sent O'Keefe to the boards.

O'Keefe climbed to his feet and put himself on the defensive. Once again the Kid launched forward, and this time left himself wide open in the madness of his attack.

"Now, Rattler!" yelled the voice of George Regan above the roar of the crowd, and with that O'Keefe slithered to meet the Kid and let loose a shattering punch to the jaw.

The smack of it seemed to cut through the clamour. The Kid checked, tilted like a stricken ship and then thudded to the boards, a dead weight. Ten seconds later O'Keefe was being lifted on to the shoulders of his seconds and carried round the ring in triumph.

Some time elapsed before Rattler was able to reach his dressing-room, where George told him to take a shower, and as the new champion hurried off to indulge in that luxury McNeil spoke to Regan.

"Well, it was certainly a big surprise to me," he declared. "I never thought the Rattler would beat the Kid."

George Regan smiled a twisted smile. "He didn't," he answered cryptically. "It was the Kid's wife that beat him." Then, without another word, he left O'Keefe's quarters and made his way along the corridor to the door of young Mason's dressing-room.

He opened that door quietly. The Kid was sitting on a chair near the far wall, and his face was covered with his hands. From chopping-block to champion, and then back to the bitter dregs of failure. Such was his story, and all on account of a woman to whom loyalty was unknown.

The Kid was sobbing. Old Jeff was standing beside him, pleading with him to let him take off his shoes.

"Leave me alone!" Kid Mason groaned. "Leave me alone!"

Jeff looked round and caught sight of George Regan. Regan signed to him to quit the dressing-room, and, as the old-timer obeyed him, walked slowly over to where the Kid was sitting.

The Kid continued to sob, but presently he took his hands from his face and saw his former manager standing before him. His bloodshot eyes rose to Regan's in an expression that seemed to hold despair, shame, appeal.

George Regan pointed to his bare chest.

"Put on your robe," he said quietly. "Do you want to catch pneumonia?"

(By permission of the Universal Films, Ltd., starring Lew Ayres and Robert Armstrong.)

SPURPROOF TENTS.

Made from light-weight proofed material. Complete with three-piece jointed poles, pegs, guy lines, and brown valise. Weight 5 lbs. Size 6 ft. 6 ins. x 4 ft. 6 ins. x 3 ft. 6 ins. With 6 in. wall and 3 in. cave. 12/3 Accommodates three boys. Postage 9d. Special extra light-weight. Made from Egyptian Cotton. Same size. Weight 3½ lbs. 18/6.

Send for beautiful illustrated Camping List, post free.

GEORGE GROSE & CO., 8, NEW BRIDGE STREET, E.C.4.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 6/- Details, striking testimonials free.—L.A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

STAMMERING. STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars free. FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

MY GREAT OFFER

Write for my free Bargain Lists of the best ALL BRITISH cycles. 14 DAYS' APPROVAL. CARRIAGE PAID. Cash price £3 15s. 0d., or terms. All accessories FREE. Value 21/-.

2 WEEKLY

Edw. O'Brien THE WORLD'S LARGEST CYCLE DEALER, DEP. 17 COVENTRY.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/- Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-) including Airport, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W.A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.1.

Boy's Cinema

"BREED OF THE WEST" and "SOUTH OF SONORA."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^d

No. 605.

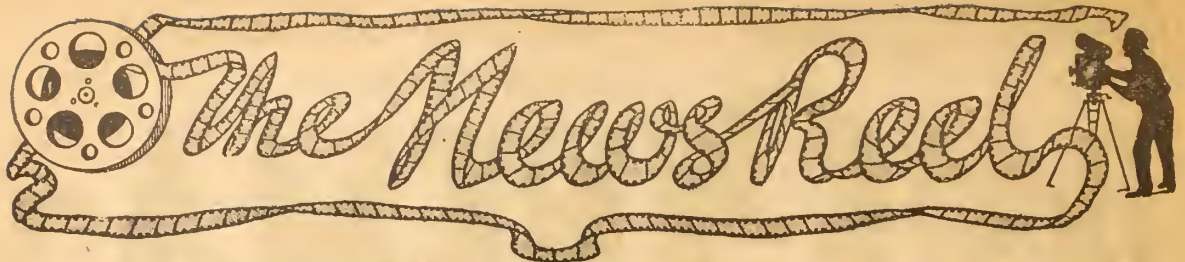

EVERY TUESDAY.

JULY 18th, 1931.

JACK HOLT in a Gripping CROOK DRAMA —

The LAST PARADE

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"The Last Parade."

Cookie Leonard, Jack Holt; Mike O'Dowd, Tom Moore; Molly Pearson, Constance Cummings; Larry Pearson, Gaylord Pendleton; Marino, Robert Ellis; Lefty, Earl D. Bunn; Chief of Police, Ed Le Saint; News Editor, Edmund Breese; Alabam, Clarence Muse; Joe, Gino Corrado.

"Breed of the West."

Wally Weldon, Wally Wales; Betty Sterner, Virginia Browne Faire; Long-ropo Wheeler, Bob Walker; Colonel Sterner, Lafe McKee; Jim Sterner, Buzz Barton; Shorty, Bobbie Dunn; Cook, George Gerwin; Sheriff Cole, Hank Bell.

"South of Sonora."

Bill Tracy, Buffalo Bill jun.; Betty Williams, Betty Joy; Heine Schmultz, Gene Schuler; Buck Harris, Fred Church; Blackie Wells, Lew Mochan; Mr. Williams, Horace B. Carpenter; Sheriff Kilne, James Merrill.

A Director's Pride.

Regard for human safety is a shifting quantity in the movies.

In the re-enactment of the Dakota land rush for the Fox picture, "Not Exactly Gentlemen," Director Benjamin Stoloff employed 15,000 persons, more than 1,000 cattle and hundreds of horses. For two days men, women and children ran helter-skelter, cattle milled and horseback riders charged. Stoloff took pride in the fact that by observing rigid safety precautions he brought the scene to a close without an injury to person or animal.

A few days later another scene was filmed in which Victor McLaglen, the leading man, was called on to clean house in a frontier gambling establishment occupied by Robert Warwick, Franklyn Farnum and sundry expugilists. The latter were instructed not to pall their punches, and no director has yet succeeded in persuading McLaglen to pull his. Stoloff took pride in this scene also, based on the amount of work provided for the company doctor in the way of cuts and bruises.

Pugilist and Actor.

Few people are aware that Conway Tearle, the outstanding British actor, playing in "The Truth About Youth," First National's latest release, was once ambitious to become a pugilist, and, moreover, he followed this profession for two years prior to taking up acting.

Conway Tearle, indeed, holds many distinctions. His family had been on the stage since 1712. One of his ancestors played in support of the celebrated Mrs. Sarah Siddons, while another was a famous Shakespearean actor. Conway's father, Osmond Tearle, was also a noted classical actor, and his brother Geoffrey is to-day one July 15th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

Fur stealing in the far North, and how the Royal Canadian Mounted Police set out to capture a desperate band of outlaws. A gripping story of the frozen wastes, starring Bob Custer.

"THE MIDNIGHT SPECIAL."

Train wreckers after bullion of untold wealth—a young railway operator blamed for the dastardly deeds—his kid brother fighting to clear his name. A thrilling railroad drama, starring Glenn Tryon and Merna Kennedy.

"THE SUNRISE TRAIL."

The daring exploits of a young cowboy who sets out to bring a ruthless band of rustlers to justice, starring Bob Steele and Blanche McHaffey.

of the most popular figures before the footlights of England.

Conway Tearle's own first appearance on the stage was at the tender age of five, when he appeared at the Academy of Music in New York. His pugilistic career terminated when he accepted an engagement at the Drury Lane Theatre in London. Later he became leading man at the Garrick Theatre. His London experience has been in support of such famous stars as Sir Charles Wyndham, Ellen Terry and Lena Ashwell. He is a real veteran in pictures, having made his film debut as long ago as 1914, when he played lead in a picture called "The Nightingale."

"A Fowl Affair."

Meet Genevieve Leghorn, or "Jenny," as she is usually called. Sorry I have no picture of her, but you will see her on the screen. Jenny is one of Hollywood's new leading ladies, and she is said to have no nasty temperament, or even an idea of what she is worth to her film producer.

Jenny—for it seems a shame to keep you all mystified any longer—is a White Leghorn hen, and she appears in a starring rôle in a talking comedy entitled "A Fowl Affair." Opposite her in the picture is a Plymouth Rock rooster, and "supporting" them are a number of farmyard folk such as chickens, ducks, roosters and turkeys. This is the first time that fowls have appeared in a talkie comedy, and however tender the birds might be otherwise, the producers say it was a tough job getting them to do their different parts.

A Real Fire Thrill.

A fire in a London street is one of the big scenes in the British International picture, "The House Opposite." Incidentally, the fire proved to be really exciting for the chief artists taking part.

The set representing a Bloomsbury quarter was built on the "lot" of the studio at Elstree, and comprised eight houses made of asbestos. From one of these Renee McCready, Celia Glynn and Henry Kendall had to make their escape in the presence of a crowd of two hundred people. To create the big blaze about 1,000 smoke bombs, about 50 gallons of inflammable liquid and half a hundredweight of "white fire" were used. Two fire-engines with fire brigade were engaged to add further realism to the picture.

Then, "according to schedule," the fire was started. The alarm was raised, people crowded on to the scene from neighbouring houses and elsewhere, and soon the fire-engines dashed up and a dozen hoses were quickly brought into play. All this was "play acting," but after a few minutes the onlookers suddenly realised that the three artistes were in real danger.

They were on the roof with a drop of fifty feet to the ground and a blazing stairway behind. Huge tongues of flame were all around them. For several seconds the three artistes could not be seen. The firemen now worked in real earnest. Then it was seen that Kendall had his arms round the really frightened girls and was trying to shield them.

In a few seconds, however, one of the firemen was able to reach them, and when the three artistes were eventually rescued it was found that the girls' dresses were partly burnt, and that Henry Kendall's hair and that of Miss Glynn had been singed. They had experienced one of the narrowest escapes in their lives.

Harry Carey's First Serial.

Years ago a Western drama was not considered good by many picture-goers unless it starred Harry Carey. His

(Continued on page 27.)

The powerful story of a newspaper man turned gangster, who pitted his wits against law and order, although his biggest chum was a policeman. Starring Jack Holt, Constance Cummings and Tom Moore.

An Unintentional Recruit.

THE chief news editor of the New York "Morning Herald" looked up with a scowl from the sheets of written matter which he had been blue-pencilling and shouted for the copy boy, who immediately shot off his stool and rushed to the big desk.

"Take that down to Room Three and ask Martin where his eyes are!"

The boy scurried off with the sheets of paper, and the chief news editor whipped up a telephone.

"Give me Cookie Leonard," he said gruffly to the girl at the distant switchboard. "L-e-o-n-a-r-d—Mr. Leonard."

The chief news editor's name was Bettinson. He was a middle-aged man, rapidly going bald, and still more rapidly losing any human qualities he may once have possessed. His job was a harassing one, even under normal conditions, but now that America had entered the war, even his sanity was threatened. For edition after edition of the "Herald" was daily being poured forth from the giant presses, and all the news must be up to the minute.

But Chauncey Cook Leonard—known on the staff as the "Inquiring Reporter," and proud of the title—seldom permitted anything to distress him. He was lounging in a swivel chair in his own small den, and his feet were planted firmly on the desk before him, with the telephone between them.

He was studying a lively little weekly publication called "Pep," and he was pleased to smile at some scandalous paragraph he had discovered in it just as the telephone-bell shrilled.

Cookie—everybody called him Cookie—was a long-legged, powerfully framed young fellow. Among a variety of other characteristics, he possessed a quantity of sleek brown hair, brushed well back from a high forehead; a pair of shrewd—and sometimes menacing—brown eyes; a clipped moustache, which accentuated a mouth that could close like a steel trap in one straight and very cruel line; and a jaw that gave more than a hint of pugnacity.

He tossed the copy of "Pep" across the room, and, taking his feet from the desk, removed the receiver from the telephone. The voice of the chief news editor assailed his left ear-drum.

"Good-morning, sweetheart!" he answered cheerfully. "This is the Inquiring Reporter. Will you have fish or cornflakes?"

"Cut out the comedy!" blared Bettinson. "There's a war going on! War! Understand? War! And the first of the volunteers are parading over on Broadway, so shake the lead out of your feet and cover that parade. And don't call me sweetheart!"

The last sentence was thundered at Cookie, but with a grin he responded: "All right, you bald-headed old baboon!" And lunged up before the explosion that followed could deafen him.

The offices of the "Morning Herald" were in West 40th Street, which is only a step from Broadway. In less than five minutes Cookie had forced his way through a crowd of onlookers into the roadway, where the first batch of recruits were marching towards downtown, preceded by a band.

Flags were waving, handkerchiefs were fluttering. Cookie plunged into the procession and fell into step beside a spectacled young man in a shabby overcoat.

"Good-morning," he said brightly as he marched along. "I'm from the 'Herald.' What noble impulse prompted you to answer your country's call?"

The spectacled young man looked sideways at him in surprise, and at that moment an irate policeman, who had been helping to keep the spectators out of the roadway, clapped Cookie on the shoulder.

The reporter, by reason of his profession, knew practically every cop in New York City—and practically every cop knew him. This one, Patrolman Michael O'Dowd, knew him well.

"Leonard!" he said angrily. "Will you leave those men alone?"

Cookie took no notice, but continued to march beside the man he had addressed. The blue-eyed, chubby-faced policeman gripped the shoulder he held.

"Did you hear my orders?" he demanded.

"Well," the spectacled man said mildly, "we're in the war now, and I think everybody ought to do their bit."

"Quite so—quite so," approved Cookie. "The spirit of '76."

"Did you hear my orders?" bellowed O'Dowd.

Cookie turned and appeared to become aware of the policeman.

"Listen, Mike," he said facetiously, "you can't walk in this parade. That's the wrong kind of uniform to go to war!"

"I got enough war with mugs like you," retorted Mike. "Now beat it!"

But Cookie did not beat it; on the contrary, he continued to march with the recruits. Police headquarters of the precinct loomed up on the left.

"Oh, the saints give me patience!" cried Mike, resisting the temptation to resort to violence with this imperturbable newspaper man.

Cookie merely grinned and looked across at the big police-station. On its July 13th, 1913.

steps several of O'Dowd's superiors were standing, watching the parade, and among them was hook-nosed Chief Donovan, waving to the recruits in a spirit of patriotism.

Possessed by a sudden imp of mischief, Cookie raised his voice and his arm.

"Hi, chief!" he shouted. "What d'you think of Officer O'Dowd? He's going to war!"

Mike gasped.

"Well, what the---" he began.

"Yes, sir, he's joined up!" cried Cookie.

Donovan swooped down from the steps of the police-station and made his way through the crowd.

"The first volunteer from the police department," laughed Cookie.

The chief fell into step and offered his hand to the flabbergasted Irishman.

"Congratulations, O'Dowd," said he enthusiastically. "I'm proud of you!"

"But, sir," stammered Mike, "I—I—I—"

"Now don't be modest," said Donovan, gripping a reluctant hand. "You don't have to explain—you're doing a very fine thing."

"That's the spirit, chief," cooed Cookie, thoroughly enjoying O'Dowd's discomfiture. "We're all in it, and everybody should do his bit."

"Good luck, O'Dowd!" boomed Donovan. "And don't be worried about your job. It'll be waiting for you when you get back."

Inwardly O'Dowd was boiling, but there was no escape now! He managed to mutter unfeeling thanks, and Chief Donovan skipped back to the steps of the station. The procession moved on.

"Good-morning," said Cookie cheerfully to his victim, for all the world as though he had never seen him before, "I'm the inquiring reporter from the 'Herald'—and what noble impulse prompted you to heed your country's call?"

Mike made no answer. Mere words were incapable of expressing his feelings; but his eyes were murdering Cookie all the way to the recruiting office.

Even into that building Cookie marched with the man he had thrust into the Army. In the clothing department he stood beside him while he got his cap, his boots, his tunic, his slacks and his puttees, none of which he wanted.

A wooden rail divided those who approached the open windows from those who had acquired their outfits and were streaming back to a doorway leading to the dressing-room. A burly sergeant kept the men moving as rapidly as possible, for all these recruits, apart from the two, had been examined and passed for active service before the parade.

O'Dowd, with his bundle, was close to the doorway when Cookie delivered a final insult.

"You've gotta give me credit, Mike," he said pleasantly. "If it hadn't been for me you wouldn't be in this man's Army."

"Give me patience with that fellow!" exclaimed Mike wildly.

"You don't realise what you owe me," pursued Cookie.

That was the last straw.

"I know exactly what I owe you, brother!" roared Mike, dropping his bundle. "And that's it!"

His left fist shot out with the force of a steam-hammer, and Cookie was caught unawares on the point of the jaw. He went down with a crash and rolled under the rail. O'Dowd disappeared into a corridor; other men passed in after him.

July 15th, 1931.

"Do you hear the little birdies?" jeered a recruit who was just behind.

Cookie had received a very nasty jolt, but his jaw was built to withstand jolts. He sat up, nursing the jaw, blinking at stars. A score of men streamed past him before he got to his feet, intent on retaliation.

He reached the doorway, his fists clenched, his mouth set in a straight and murderous line. But a massive sergeant caught at his arm and dragged him back.

"Hi, where are you going?" demanded the sergeant.

"I'm going to get the guy that socked me in the jaw!" snapped Cookie.

"You can't go in there till you're signed up!"

They were blocking the doorway to the bundle-bearing recruits, and one of those recruits decided to have his say in the matter as Cookie stood hesitatingly there.

"Sure you're big enough to fight?" he taunted.

"Maybe he's afraid to fight," suggested another. "He's too good-looking to fight!"

Cookie scowled at this second speaker.

"Oh, yeah?" he drawled savagely.

"All right, sergeant, put me in the same outfit with that guy who socked me, and I'll join your cock-eyed army!"

"Buddy," chuckled the sergeant, "you're in!"

He caught hold of Cookie's arm and propelled him down a wide passage and into a room on the left, where a young subaltern sat at a desk.

"Lieutenant," he said, "here's a man who just can't wait to join up."

The lieutenant looked Cookie up and down and grinned boyishly at him.

"In a hurry, eh?" he said.

"Yeah," responded Cookie. "I've got a date with a guy in there!" And he jerked his head in the general direction of the heart of the building.

"What's your name?"

"C. Cook Leonard."

"What's the 'C' for?"

"Chauncey," replied Cookie quietly.

"But don't let that fool you!"

In No Man's Land.

FRIENDSHIP is often born of unpropitious circumstances. As a reporter Cookie had fallen foul of Mike O'Dowd on numerous occasions, and the two misunderstood and disliked one another; but having got into the army and fought out their private hattle during the period of training, they sailed for France to fight in greater battles the staunchest of chums.

They quarrelled in billets, they quarrelled in the trenches, for such was their nature; but they had grown to understand one another and to appreciate one another's qualities.

How deeply the friendship went was demonstrated one night after a raid on the enemy. Both men took part in the raid, with shells and bombs bursting in all directions, and Very lights illuminating the tangled waste of No Man's Land.

"They've sure stirred 'em up out there," growled a private on the fire-step to a lieutenant beside him.

"They're coming back," said the lieutenant.

"Well, I hope Cookie comes back," remarked another man known as "Lefty." "He owes me forty francs!"

They watched the dark figures crawling through the broken wire entanglements.

"Looks like they've got a prisoner!" exclaimed one of the watchers.

"They've got two of 'em," rejoiced the lieutenant.

The men of the raiding party approached the parapet, covered with mud, but triumphant. They scrambled down into the trench with their two prisoners, one of whom had been knocked almost senseless by Cookie.

"Good work, Leonard," approved the lieutenant. "Fine! Here, take this man to Major Watson, quick!"

A corporal relieved Cookie of his captive.

"Well, are we all back?"

"I don't know, sir," replied Cookie, almost unrecognisable in his dirt.

"Seen Mike, any of you?"

"Sergeant O'Dowd?" questioned the lieutenant. "Anybody seen O'Dowd?"

"Ho was with me when they opened fire," stated a private. "I think they got him in the legs."

Cookie sprang up on to the fire-step and peered out across the waste.

"I see him!" he growled. "He's hung on the wire, the fathead!"

The lieutenant, beside him, looked through his glasses.

"They're coming out to take him prisoner," he said.

"Gimme that typewriter!" barked Cookie, and one of the men obediently handed him a portable machine-gun, with which he raked the advancing Germans, some of whom fell wounded, while the rest retired in haste.

"Good work!" quoth the lieutenant.

"Yeah—rough on rats—that's me," drawled Cookie, and, dropping the machine-gun, began to climb over the parapet.

"No you don't, Leonard!" exclaimed the lieutenant, grabbing at his legs.

"Well, what are you goin' to do?" demanded Cookie indignantly. "Leave him out there in that hot spot?"

"But you can't get to him!"

"I've got a date with him," snapped Cookie, and, breaking free, he climbed over the sand-bags, and went crawling towards the wire.

A bomb whistled through the night and burst close to where he was crawling, sending up a great mass of earth and debris that for a time blotted out everything.

The lieutenant shivered, and several men fell backwards with the force of the explosion.

"That got him!" gasped one of them.

But it hadn't! For a few moments Cookie lay stunned; then resolutely he crawled on again, reached the barbed wire and the dim figure attached to it, and rose to his knees to ply wire-cutters with feverish speed.

"Where'd they get you, Mike?" he demanded gruffly as he worked.

"In the legs," was the faint reply.

"Lie still—I'll get you out."

"Don't be a fool," mumbled Mike.

"Go back!"

"Aw, go and lay an egg!" retorted Cookie savagely. "There! Now come on—crawl up!"

Ho tugged with all his might, helping his wounded chum to free himself.

"Now swing on top of me," he commanded. "and keep low. Get higher up on my back."

Riffo fire broke loose, and bombs were thrown, as the enemy saw Mike's rescuer crawling away like a misshapen tortoise, with the man he had saved on his back.

"He's bringing him in!" exclaimed the lieutenant.

"Yes—but he'll never make it," growled a private.

A bomb exploded quite near the crawling figure and its burden, blotting them out from sight.

"Too bad!" murmured the lieutenant.

"Well, boy," said one of those who had been watching, "you've got to give him credit for trying."

Time passed. "There they are!" cried a voice suddenly. "They didn't get him!"

The tortoise was crawling forward again—less vigorously than before, but none the less surely.

"Come on, Cookie! Come on!" urged voices. And with a final effort Cookie reached the sand-bags, rose up over them, and rolled down into the trench.

Eager hands grabbed both men, set them on their feet. Cookie's left eye was closed and blood was trickling from it, but he held himself erect. Mike's clothes were in ribands, and he could not stand, but two of the men held him between them.

"How do you feel, Mike, old boy?" inquired Cookie.

"I'm all right," replied Mike feebly. "How about you?"

"Okay."

"Dashed fine work, Leonard!" enthused the lieutenant, gripping his hand. A Very light flamed overhead.

"Cookie!" gasped Mike. "They got you! Your eye!"

"What's an eye among friends?" retorted Cookie, with a twisted grin. "I've seen too much, anyhow!"

"I'll never forget this, Cookie," declared Mike fervently. "Never, as long as I live."

"We'll get you both down to hospital as soon as we can," said the lieutenant.

Convalescence.

THEY were both in a field hospital before the night was out; and from the field hospital they were conveyed to Base Hospital No. 131, where the din of warfare was only faintly heard, and health and strength came slowly back to them.

Nothing could save Cookie's left eye, but in all other respects he became himself again. Shrapnel was removed from both of Mike's legs, just above the ankle, and the surgeon promised him that he would be able to walk, sooner or later, with barely a perceptible limp.

The two occupied adjacent beds, and both were greatly smitten with their brown-haired nurse, Molly Pearson—and vied with one another for her favour. But Molly was wisely non-committal.

In due course Mike left his bed, in the day-time, for a wheel-chair, while Cookie prowled about the ward with a black shade over the shattered eye.

One morning while the nurse was attending to other patients, Cookie sat before a mirror which he had propped up on his bed, shaving himself carefully with a safety razor.

"What's the big idea?" demanded Mike. "You got a date?"

"Maybe," replied the shaver briefly.

"Well, it'll take more than a shave to make that face of yours look human," taunted Mike.

"Oh, I don't have to be good-looking," retorted Cookie. "I've got sex-appeal!"

He re-applied the shaving-brush and some soap splashed into his good eye. He wiped it hastily with a towel and blinked round at Mike, who was laughing.

"So you think that's funny, do you?" he cried. "Well, laugh at that!" And he plunged the brush into soap and water and shook it into the face of the man in the wheel-chair.

"You trying to drown me?" cried Mike indignantly. And then Molly swooped down on them.

"What do you boys think this is?" she demanded. "A kindergarten?"

"Sure!" chuckled Cookie. And then they sang to her in voices by no means musical:

"Through the war's great curse
Stands a Red-Cross nurse—
She's the Rose of No-Man's Land!"

"For Heaven's sake be quiet!" laughed Molly. "Don't you think there's anyone in the ward but you two?"

"Well, nobody that matters," Cookie immediately responded.

Molly assumed a professional manner. "How are you feeling to-day, Mike?" she inquired.

"Much better now you've arrived," was the prompt reply.

"How about you, Cookie?"

"Oh, I feel terrible, Molly—I've got an awful headache."

"Your head was all right a minute ago!" barked Mike.

"Say, whose head is this?" demanded Cookie, holding his hands to his brow.

"You can have it!" gibed Mike. But Cookie turned plaintively to the beautiful girl and winked at her with his sound eye.

"Don't you think you could fix it up with the doctor," he said, "for me to go out and get a little air?"

"Can't be done," replied Molly gravely. "The doctor won't let you go out without a nurse."

"But I could go out with a nurse, couldn't I?"

"Oh, well," said Molly, "I'll ask the doctor!"

The two men watched her as she sailed across the ward to the door.

"There you are!" cried Cookie triumphantly. "Old Man Sex-Appeal himself!"

A number of rude remarks followed, and then Molly came back—with a blanket.

"I've fixed it," she said.

"You're a honey and a darling!" declared Cookie. "I don't know what I'd do without you." He turned comiseratingly to his chum. "Good-bye, sweetheart," he said maliciously. "I'm sorry you can't go along."

"But he is going," laughed Molly, and arranged the blanket over the knees of the invalid in the wheel-chair.

"What?" cried Cookie. "But you said you were going to take me!"

"Well, Mike needs the air, too," retorted Molly, a mischievous twinkle in her grey eyes. "And you need the exercise! Come on—push!"

"Yes, snap into it, Mister Sex-Appeal!" ordered Mike.

So Cookie, with an air of gloom, pushed the wheel-chair across the ward into a corridor, and from the corridor out into the grounds, while Molly walked serenely beside him. And on one of the wide paths, screened by bushes, Mike cheated.

"My left ankle," he said plaintively: "would you mind looking at it?"

Molly stooped to lift the blanket.

"I don't see anything wrong with it, you big baby!" she exclaimed; and no sooner were the words out of her mouth than a pair of powerful arms were round her neck and Mike's lips were pressed against hers.

"Stop it!" cried Molly, breaking away from him. "What's the matter with you?"

He turned and left them, but Mike wasn't going to let him go like that.

"That's what I'd like to know," quoth Cookie, and swept her into his own arms and hugged her.

"I don't want to get well," sang Mike. "I don't want to get well!" And then Cookie, releasing Molly, chimed in:

"I'm in love with a beautiful nurse."

And they both meant it.

For Services Rendered.

AFTER the war was over and the American troops had returned to their native land, Cookie and Mike took part in another parade along Broadway—a parade of men and women back from France, celebrating peace.

The excitement among the onlookers was almost greater than it had been on the occasion of that other parade when Cookie had pushed Mike into the Army by a trick and followed him to return a sock on the jaw. Flags hung across from lofty buildings, confetti showered down on the marchers, paper streamers whizzed in every direction, and the cheering was terrific.

Cookie strode along beside Mike, and Mike walked with hardly a perceptible limp, as the surgeon had promised; but Cookie wore a black patch over his sightless eye.

A slim and graceful figure shot out from the crowd on the pavement and made for them. It was Molly, in a blue serge frock with a lace collar, waving and shouting to them.

"Mike! Cookie!" she cried. "Hi, wait for me!"

They looked round, grinned a welcome, and placed her between them without losing step.

"Oh," she told them breathlessly, "I didn't get your letters till it was too late. But here I am!"

"And maybe I ain't glad," said Cookie, squeezing her arm.

"And maybe me, too," rejoiced Mike. "Say, Molly, where can we get some ice-cream?"

"Ice-cream my eye!" scoffed Cookie. "Lead me to some beer!"

"Beer!" echoed Molly. "Don't be a foreigner—times have changed."

"Molly," said Mike earnestly, "we were saying on the boat that when we got back here we three were going to stick together always—the same as we did over there."

"Sure," chimed in Cookie. "One for all and all for one!"

"That's right," laughed Molly. "Faith, Hope and Charity!"

"That's me," declared Cookie. "Charity!"

"Charity?" said Mike contemptuously. "You? Ha, ha—you'd give away the ash off your cigar any time!"

"Haw, haw!" mocked Cookie.

Near the City Hall a clean-shaven young fellow in tweeds ran out from the crowd to them. Molly pointed excitedly as he approached.

"Here he is!" she cried. "This is my brother Larry. Larry, this is Sergeant O'Dowd—and Cookie Leonard."

"How d'you do?" greeted Larry. "The other two musketeers, eh? Gee, I'm glad to know you."

"Same here," said Cookie politely, studying the newcomer with interest.

At the City Hall the parade finished, the ranks broke up amid shouts and hand-shakes and kisses. The four stood together on the big patch of asphalt beneath the steps of the building.

"Well, I've got to be going," announced Molly. "See you all later."

"That's right, Molly," boomed Cookie. "Dinner at seven."

"See you there, sergeant," said Larry, offering his hand.

July 18th, 1931.

"I'm afraid not," growled Mike. "You see, I haven't been invited."

"Haven't been invited?" exclaimed Molly, frowning at Cookie. "We're having a reunion at my house to-night—didn't Cookie tell you?"

"First I've heard of it."

Molly frowned still more heavily at Cookie, who grinned guiltily.

"Forgot all about it," he said.

"Mike," cried Molly, "you've been double-crossed! Just for that you shall sit next to me, and you"—jabbing a finger into Cookie's chest—"will eat in the kitchen! So long!"

She tripped away with her brother, and Mike stood looking after her for a while, then turned to Cookie.

"Well, au revoir, Chauncey," he said, with intent to irritate. "Haw, haw!"

"Where are you going?" inquired Cookie.

"Down to the police-station, to get some work to do."

"Well," decided Cookie, "I'll trail along with you, because if there's any free lunch in town the cops will know where to find it."

"Quite so, Chauncey—quite so," jeered Mike. And they strolled together up Broadway, which had now become almost normal again.

The police-station was reached; the two mounted the steps and entered the spacious charge-room.

"Company, attention!" bellowed Cookie. "Here's your hero!"

A score of policemen crowded round them. Chief Donovan, disturbed by the noise, came out from his office, stopped short with an exclamation, and then moved briskly forward to thump Mike in the middle of his broad back.

"Say, it's sure good to see you back again, boy!" he cried.

"It's good to be back, chief," declared Mike gratefully.

"We're proud of you! All of you!" And the chief's hand swept round to include Cookie. "When do you want to get back to work, Mike?"

"The sooner the quicker, chief."

"All right—get into your old uniform!"

"What?" howled Cookie, in pretended disgust. "After Mike has won the war for you, don't he rate a new one?"

Donovan chuckled, dived back into his room, and reappeared with a big cardboard box.

"Here's a little present the boys fixed up," he said. "Open it."

"Wh-what is it?" faltered Mike, holding the box nervously.

"Judging from the size of it," remarked Cookie, "I should say it was a new pair of shoes!"

Mike tore off the string and opened the box. Inside it was a complete uniform, which he took out garment by garment. On the sleeves of the jacket were stripes.

"Well, I'm—What the—" gasped Mike. And then, joyfully: "A sergeant! A police-sergeant!"

"Sure!" drawled Cookie. "Once a sergeant always a sergeant!"

"You were a sergeant over there!" boomed Donovan. "You don't think you'd let those Army officers put anything over on us, do you?"

"Well, boys—I—that is—chief—" stammered Mike, completely overwhelmed.

Cookie swept an arm round his shoulder.

"Be brave, Gladys," he cooed, "and cry on your papa's manly chest!"

"Don't let him kid you, Mike," urged one of the men, and Mike slapped his chum's face playfully and managed to voice his thanks.

"Well, so long, boys," said Cookie, wiping away an imaginary tear; and he moved doorwards.

"Where are you going?" called Mike.

"I'm going to the 'Herald' office to get to work," was the immediate rejoinder. "After what they've done for you, they'll probably make me managing editor! Good-bye, sweetheart!"

He stepped briskly out into the sunlight, and he made his way straight to the giant "Herald" building in West 40th Street.

In the doorway he paused to look up at an imposing brass plate affixed to the wall, on which the names of all the members of the staff who had enlisted in the Army were engraved. He saw his own name there—"C. Cook Leonard"—and whimsically saluted it. Then he plunged into the building, passing an aged attendant who recognised him and waved.

In the general office, on the first floor, a black-haired girl at the inquiry desk looked up at him indignantly as he went to sail past her.

"Hallo, sweetheart!" he greeted cheerfully.

"Do you wish to see somebody?" she asked him frigidly.

"Yeah," he replied. "I'd like to see somebody I know!" And with that he strode straight down an aisle between desks and typists and reporters to the chief news editor's room.

The girl flew after him, but was too late. He turned the handle and went in.

Bettinson, more bald than ever, was sitting at his desk, stabbing the air with a blue pencil and barking at a member of the staff.

"All right, Bill," he roared, "don't give me any argument. If a man can't do it, why don't you hire a boy?"

Cookie stepped over to the desk as the discomfited Bill backed away from it.

"How are you, sweetheart?" he drawled.

"Busy!" snapped Bettinson, and stared at him. "Cookie!" he exclaimed. "So you're back!"

"Yeah—and ready to go to work on your old scandal sheet."

Bettinson scowled from under his bushy brows.

"Well, Cookie," he said gruffly, "I'm sorry—"

"What do you mean, you're sorry?"

For once in a way the chief news editor lost his bullying manner.

"Well, I—I haven't got any place for you right now," he stammered.

Said Cookie, folding his arms and setting his jaw:

"I don't get my old job back, eh?"

"Cookie, you're the fifteenth guy that's been here! When you fellows went away we had to hire other people to fill your jobs. We can't fire 'em now, just because you're back."

"I get you," nodded Cookie grimly.

"I'll tell you what to do—you come back. Come back—er—say, in a month, and I'll see if I can't find a job for you. I will, on the level."

"Sure!" replied Cookie airily. "Okay, sweetheart."

He went out from the room with his one eye glowering and his mouth set in an ugly line. He strode down the stairs to the doorway, and there he looked up at the imposing brass plate. He made an uncomplimentary noise at it with his mouth, then shoved his way out through the swing-doors.

Upstairs in his room, Bettinson spoke into a house telephone.

"Hallo—Miss Dean?" he blared.

"Look here, if any more of those tin hats come in, tell 'em I'm out, or tell 'em I'm dead—or anything. But don't let 'em loose on me!"

At Bay.

THAT night, at Molly's Lome in Brooklyn, Cookie was the life and soul of the reunion celebration. Nobody dreamed that he had been scorned and rejected at the "Herald" office. Larry thought he was wonderful; Mike decided that he had never seen him in a more jovial mood.

But after it was all over, he went out of the house with Mike, walked with that promoted policeman till their ways parted—and was swallowed up by the city.

Weeks passed by—workless, hopeless weeks for Cookie. No one seemed willing to provide employment for a one-eyed soldier returned from the battlefield, and no one ever knew how he lived in those weeks of growing despair.

But one evening he was loitering in the doorway of a cinema, watching more fortunate people enter the building, when a familiar voice hailed him.

"Hi, Cookie, you old son of a gun!"

It was Mike—Mike in a lounge suit, a big tweed overcoat, and a soft felt hat. It was a chilly evening, and Cookie was feeling none too comfortable in a very shabby suit, minus its waistcoat; but he returned the greeting cheerfully enough.

"Hallo, sweetheart!" he said, and they shook hands.

"Where have you been hiding?" demanded Mike. "I've been trying to get hold of you."

"I've never met a cop yet who could find anybody he was looking for," said Cookie lightly. "How are your flat feet?"

"Fine!"

"Where's the harness?"

"My night off!"

Mike had arranged to meet Molly at this particular cinema, and Molly at this moment arrived, caught sight of them standing there, and darted forward, crying: "Cookie!"

Cookie, his hand still held by Mike, swung round with almost a dismayed expression.

"Hallo, Molly!" he said.

"I haven't seen you for weeks and weeks," she reproached him. "Why, you've been neglecting me shamefully."

"Yes," chimed in Mike. "I thought we were going to stick together the same as we did over there."

"Well," lied Cookie, "I've been pretty busy."

"It's great to see you," declared Molly. "Just like old times! Mike and I are going to the movies—now we can all go together."

"Yeah," said Mike with surprising eagerness for him. "I'll get another ticket."

But Cookie shook his head, released his hands, and thrust them deep into his pockets.

"I'm afraid I can't go to-night," he told them. "I've got a date with a fellow. Some other time."

"Oh, come along!" urged Molly.

"Break your appointment," chimed in Mike.

"No, no, I can't do that. I'll ring you up soon. I've got to run along now. Goodbye." And he turned and left them.

But Mike wasn't going to let him go like that. With a hurried word to Molly he ran after him, grabbed him by the arm.

"Cookie!" he insisted. "Wait a minute—I want to have a talk with you."

"No, officer," said Cookie facetiously, removing the detaining hand, "I don't want to buy any tickets for the policeman's ball!"

"Listen!" insisted Mike earnestly. "Have you any money?"

"How much do you want?"

"Now, now, quit the stalling—you know what I mean. You're having a hard time getting located, and I've got a few dollars that aren't doing me any good."

If Cookie was moved by this offer of help, he did not show it.

"Listen, sweetheart," he retorted, "if you've got a few bucks saved up, you'd better hang on to them. It costs money to get married these days."

"Who said anything about getting married?" growled Mike.

Cookie looked round and saw that a motor-bus was approaching.

"Here comes my bus," he said. "So long, Romeo!" And with that he shot off into the roadway and jumped on to the step of the vehicle.

"Bull-headed sap!" exclaimed Mike. "I know he's broke!"

As a matter of fact, Cookie was so broke that he hadn't even a penny for a bus fare, and he remained on the step only long enough to turn a corner, then dropped off and slouched northwards.

That day he had had nothing to eat; next morning he had no breakfast. An empty warehouse on the river-front had provided him with a free night's lodging of sorts. He felt as he looked—an outcast with a black patch over his left eye. And being a strong man, he began to nurse an active resentment against the world that didn't want him.

Round about midday, determined to get something to eat, he wandered into one of the numerous down-town establishments in New York City where one may help oneself to bread and sausage and cheese, provided one buys tea, coffee, or soft drinks. The bar was a long one, well equipped for customers, and a number of men were eating and drinking there. Cookie went up to the bar and helped himself liberally to bread and to liver sausage.

The bar-tender, who was serving a more profitable customer, saw what he was doing, sized him up at a glance, and shouted:

"Hi, Cluck, take your snout out of that trough!"

"Go and lay an egg!" retorted Cookie calmly with his mouth full, and reached over for more sausage.

"You heard me!" snapped the bar-tender, hearing down on him.

"What's wrong?" demanded Cookie. "This is some of that free lunch I've heard so much about, isn't it?"

"That's for the customers, not for the panhandlers!" And the bar-tender snatched away the sausage. "How did you get in here?"

"On my feet!"

"Well, if you want to go out the same way, you'd better start moving. Beat it!"

"When I get good and ready," said Cookie quietly. "And don't interrupt me when I'm eating, either."

He whipped up a huge Bologna sausage and struck the newcomer viciously in the face with it.

The bar-tender tried to seize the plate on which the unwanted visitor had piled bread and sausage, but failed.

"I wouldn't do that, either," Cookie told him.

"Oh, you're a tough guy, eh?"

"Yes, sir. Sometimes I don't even know my own strength!"

"No? Well, we'll find out about the strength!" And the bar-tender shot out a formidable fist intended for Cookie's jaw.

But Cookie quietly parried the blow, whipped up a long loaf of French bread, and brought it down with all his might upon his assailant's head.

The bar-tender staggered backwards, then snatched up a heavy glass mug with intent to use it as a weapon. But again the loaf descended, and this time the white-coated assistant went down on his back.

"Do you hear the little birds going tweet, tweet?" inquired Cookie, sarcastically. "Let's go!" And he turned towards the door.

Opportunity.

At a table against the wall, opposite the bar, three men were sitting, one of them obviously an Italian, another a stockily-built curly-headed fellow, the third a lean-faced individual with shifty eyes.

"Well, what do you think about-a dat?" said the Italian with some amusement.

A burly fellow employed by the proprietor of the cafeteria to maintain order, appeared from nowhere in particular between Cookie and the door.

"This is the chance of a lifetime!" he cried, advancing with clenched fists.

"You're going to take the air!"

Cookie backed briskly to the bar, grinning as though he were thoroughly enjoying himself.

"D'you like boloney?" he inquired with mock politeness, and without waiting for any reply, he whipped up a huge Bologna-sausage and struck the newcomer viciously in the face with it.

With the roar of a bull the "bouncer" received the blow, then struck out with right and left. He imagined himself to be invincible, but he had met more than his match. The Italian sprang up from his chair to watch the fight that followed.

"I like-a dis guy!" he crowed.

Cookie was parrying blows and biding his time. The time came, and his left fist swept up almost as it seemed from the region of the floor. The recipient of that terrific blow was lifted clean off his feet by its violence, and sent crashing among the tables, to fall in a huddled heap while glasses and cups and saucers rained down upon him.

"What a fighter you are!" taunted Cookie, striding over to where the bruiser lay. "Fighting with your back against the floor!"

"I tell-a you I like-a dis guy!" cried the Italian, almost dancing beside his table. "He's got-a what you call in esse!"

He watched Cookie return to the bar, and grinned delightedly as that wrathful young man pelted the bar-tender with sausages and loaves of bread. He touched him on the arm.

"Hullo, one minute," he said in a friendly way.

"What do you want?" demanded Cookie, ready for further battle, but not necessarily inviting it.

"Nothing," was the eager reply. "I just-a own da place."

"Oh, is that so?" drawled Cookie.

"Well, I wouldn't brag about it. Any objections to my eating here?"

July 15th, 1931.

"Help-a yourself," said the Italian, and called a waiter. "Pete," he directed, "fix him a plate!" He indicated the table he had left. "Como, sit down!"

"Thanks," said Cookie.

The curly-headed man, addressed as Joe, was requested to move over, which he did; and Cookie and the Italian sat side by side. Food was brought, a huge glass mug of near-beer. Cookie ate and drank with relish, studying his chance companions without openly appearing to do so.

"What's your name?" inquired his benefactor.

Cookie told him, omitting the "Chauncey."

"You're a pretty tough guy!"

"That ain't half of it, brother," was the somewhat boastful rejoinder. "You ought to have seen me when I had my health. Why, I was so tough I was scared of myself!"

"If dat's only ten per cent true, I could-a use you in my business."

"Doin' what?"

"Drivin' a truck."

"What is your business?"

"Meat packing. The Three Star Packing Co. Marino is my name."

The owner of a meat-packing company running a cafeteria which was frequented by rough-looking customers? Cookie, as an old-time reporter on the "Herald," knew quite a lot about gangsters and boot-leggers.

"I see," he remarked gravely. "You get your stuff from Canada, don't you?"

Marino looked suspiciously at him, but most of his face, at the moment, was hidden by the glass mug. His one eye gleamed.

Marino decided to be frank. He nodded.

"Sure must be a lot of profit in that Canadian bacon," said Cookie, and put down the empty mug.

"Dat's why we can use tough guys like-a you."

"Thanks for the compliment—but I don't know."

"Well, as you like." Marino took out a card-case, extracted a card, and wrote on it with a fountain-pen. "You take-a dis card to Mulligan," he said. "He's in charge of my trucks."

Cookie examined the card. The warehouse of the Three Star Packing Company, it appeared, was in Clinton Street, near the water-front. The message Marino had written ran: "This guy is O.K.—Marino."

"All right, Marino," said Cookie, stowing the card in a pocket. "But don't set your heart on it."

Two hours later, Marino paid a visit to his warehouse in Clinton Street, passing through a gateway into a yard where motor-lorries were being loaded with quarters of beef, some of them genuine, some fakes filled with bottles of wine and spirits.

He crossed the yard to a flight of stone steps, accompanied by Joe, and went through the warehouse into a private office.

He seated himself at a desk and rang a bell, while curly-headed Joe helped himself to a cigarette.

A tall negro entered the room, obviously in a nervous state, and the story he had to tell drove Marino into a state of fury.

Cookie, it appeared, had called while Mulligan was out, and the negro—who was known as Alabam—had dealt with him, or, accurately, Cookie had dealt with Alabam.

"You—you idiot!" spluttered Marino, and burst into a string of Italian oaths.

"How was I for to know dat guy was a hi-jacker?" protested Alabam. "He had a card from you, boss!"

"Sure," bellowed Marino. "Ho gives you a card vit my name on eet, and you make-a him a present of a motor-truck vis a hundred cases!"

"I didn't make him no present," cried Alabam wildly. "While I was readin' of the card, he pinched my rod and stuck it in my ribs, and what was dis nigger a-goin' to do?"

"I tell-a you what you're goin' to do!" roared Marino. "Porto lo furo! You're through! Joe! Joe! Porto lo furo—throw heem out!"

Joe, thus commanded, seized hold of the terrified black, and struck him violently between the eyes. Then, as Marino darted across the room and tugged open the door of an emergency exit, Joe bundled Alabam out to the top of a flight of stairs, and knocked him backwards down them.

"Boss! Boss!" moaned the black, sitting up on the mat at the bottom and nursing his jaw. But the door was closed with a crash, and Alabam picked himself up and tottered out by a back way to the water-front.

A Birthday Re-union.

A YEAR later one of the most popular restaurants off Broadway was situated in Eighth Avenue, not far from Times Square. Appropriately enough, it bore on its discreet windows, in letters of gilt, the single word: "Cookie's."

It had an imposing entrance with a glass canopy over its revolving doors, and its interior was luxuriously furnished. In the big, pillared room downstairs an orchestra played dance music for the benefit of its patrons, and the polished floor between the rows of tables was reputed to be one of the finest in New York. There were upstairs rooms for private parties.

A big negro attendant in a chocolate uniform, decorated with much gold braid, guarded the revolving doors, bowing and scraping to the wealthy and fashionable folk who streamed in and out.

Cookie's had become the meal-time mecca of pleasure-seeking New Yorkers!

Alabam made an excellent attendant, from Cookie's point of view, for he knew by sight nearly every gangster, every tough, and every policeman in the city; and his job was not quite so innocent as it seemed.

The negro started violently one evening as a thick-set, chubby-faced man in evening clothes, who had stepped out from a taxi, touched him on the arm and greeted him by name.

"Want me, lieutenant?" gasped Alabam.

"Not this time," replied Mike O'Dowd with a grin. "I want to see Mr. Cookie—but don't worry, it's a social call."

He made his way into the foyer and mounted the wide stairs, but Alabam followed him.

"Coming up, eh?" said Mike.

"No, sub—just 'phoning the boss," was the reply.

"Don't trouble," barked Mike. "I tell you it's a social call."

Alabam, more or less satisfied, went back to his post. Mike deposited his hat and coat in the cloak-room and entered the restaurant.

The place was crowded with men and women in evening clothes, and the orchestra was playing a fox-trot. Mike caught sight of Cookie in the distance, hovering near a table in a little recess—a round table set against a semi-circular seat—and made straight for him.

"Top of the evening to you, Chauncey," he said, offering his hand.

Cookie, well groomed, immaculately clad, grinned broadly.

"Well, if it isn't Detective-lieutenant O'Dowd himself!" he exclaimed. "How are you, sweetheart?"

"All right. And you?"

"Fine!"

Mike stared. The black patch had gone; Cookie's left eye looked quite as good as his right one, except that it did not move.

"Oh, pipe the new headlight!" he exclaimed.

"Yes, sir," drawled Cookie. "Eighteen earat glass, and guaranteed to look on the sunny side of life!"

"It's a knock-out!" quoth Mike. "You know I could hardly tell the difference myself, if I didn't remember the night over there."

"Forget it," recommended Cookie, and sat down at the table. "Well, I'm glad to see you, old flatfoot."

"Same here," declared Mike, seating himself. "You know we haven't seen much of each other lately. Molly was speaking of it the other day."

"Well, I've been pretty busy."

"Yeah—and a year has certainly done a lot for you, Cookie."

"Well, you haven't done so badly yourself, lieutenant." He waved a hand.

"What do you think of the joint?"

"Swell!" conceded Mike. "And to think that you started with only one truck-load!"

"Why, lieutenant," said Cookie innocently, "whatever do you mean?"

"You're not kidding anybody! I know how you got your start—and so does Marino!"

"You don't believe everything you read in the papers, do you?"

"No, but I happen to know! Cookie, you remind me of the fellow who wears a toupee—he doesn't fool anybody but himself." He dropped his voice. "Kidding aside, Cookie," he said earnestly, "you can't get away with it."

"Are you speaking personally, or professionally?"

"Both. We've been through a lot together, and I'm not forgetting it, but if you stay in this racket, it's only a question of time—"

"Until the strong arm of the law reaches out in the person of Lieutenant O'Dowd and nabs poor little Cookie Leonard. Is that it?"

Mike toyed with a serviette on the plate before him.

"It's not so funny," he said slowly. "I hope that time never comes."

"And if it does—friendship ceases, eh?"

"It would be a tough spot for both of us."

"Aw, go and lay an egg," growled Cookie. "You're always singing the blues."

Mike lit a cigarette. Cookie looked about his restaurant.

"There's Molly!" he exclaimed suddenly.

They jumped up and went together to meet Molly, who had entered the restaurant with her brother Larry. She was in an evening gown all black satin and white lace, with a fur collar round her neck, and she looked wholly adorable to both men. Larry cut an excellent figure of young manhood in his dinner-jacket suit.

It was Molly's birthday, and Cookie, who forgot nothing, had invited all three to celebrate it with a dinner at his establishment.

"It's great to see you again," Molly told him, after greetings had been exchanged.

"Look at Cookie's new lamp," directed Mike, and three pairs of eyes were focused on the artificial one.

"It's wonderful," breathed Molly.

"Why, I wouldn't know which was which!"

"That's easy," jeered Mike. "The fake one is the one with the honest look in it!"

"Oh, these cops," groaned Cookie.

"Maybe if we don't pay any attention to him he'll go home. How about a little birthday kiss?"

"Of course," nodded Molly, and kissed him without the slightest embarrassment. After all, the floor was crowded with dancers, and nobody seemed to be taking any notice. Except Mike!

"Hi, break away!" he growled. "Does that one for all and all for one stuff still go?"

"It does," said Molly emphatically, and transferred her lips to his.

"Be careful," said Cookie dolefully.

"You may have to marry the girl."

"Maybe I will!"

"Over my dead body!"

They walked on together to the little recess draped with gold curtains behind the semi-circular seat.

"Oh, what a lovely table!" cried Molly.

"Speaking of tables," said Cookie.

"I'm working on a new invention—a table without legs, so Mike can get his feet under them."

"Another jibe from you, and I'm going to plant one of those big feet where it'll do most good," threatened Mike.

"In that case," decided Cookie, "I think we'd better sit down."

They sat; Molly in the middle with Cookie on her right and Mike on her left, Larry in a chair pushed forward by a waiter.

Molly admired the flowers with which the table was decorated, and Mike tugged a blue Morocco case from his pocket.

"A little present for you, Molly," he said gruffly. "It isn't much, but—"

Molly opened the case. Inside was a gold wrist-watch with a band of gold mesh.

"Oh, Mike," she cried, "how sweet! Look, Cookie!"

Cookie looked.

Marino, scowling, said fiercely : " And if my name don't stay out of the newspapers, it's just gonna be too bad ! "

"Say, that's great," he declared, and produced a longer case from his own pocket—a case covered with white lamb-skin. "I've got a little present for you, too."

He opened the case, displaying a necklace of pearls. Molly gasped.

"Oh, it's beautiful," she said in an awed whisper. "It's the loveliest thing I've ever had!" She looked at the presents in turn and from the presents to the faces of their donors. "I adore them both," she declared. But Mike looked gloomily down at his plate. Compared with his gift, Cookie's was magnificent!

Marino Pays a Call.

THEY had finished dinner and were drinking their coffee when a dark-skinned, thick-set man of Italian appearance approached their table—Marino!

"Hallo, sweetheart," said Cookie pleasantly. "Want to see me?"

"Just dropped in to say hallo," replied Marino easily, and glanced curiously at the others.

"Well, I want you to meet my folks," said Cookie. "This is Detective-lieutenant O'Dowd, but don't let that bother you—this is his night off! Won't you join us?"

"No, tanks," said Marino, bowing. "I really came-a on business."

"Oh, you want to see me on business?" said Cookie. "Mr. Marino, you know, folks, is in the packing business."

"Yes, I know," said Mike grimly.

"And Mr. Leonard," said Marino, "being in the café business, sometimes uses my beef."

"They say it's very good—before it's cut," remarked Mike, somewhat pointedly.

"Mr. Leonard seems to t'ink so," said Marino blandly.

"You know Larry Pearson, don't you?"

"Oh, yes," Marino acknowledged. "Da bright boy of da 'Herald.' Knows all—sees all!"

"Yes," said Larry brightly. "You'd better put me on your pay-roll, Marino—I know a lot I haven't spilled yet!"

Marino's face clouded and his manner changed.

"Dere is such a t'ing as a newspaper man knowing too much," he said menacingly. "When-a I want publicity I pay for it. Remember dat."

"Why not come up into my office, and we'll talk about this beef," suggested Cookie hastily, aware of Molly's troubled face, and annoyed at the threat.

Marino nodded.

"Glad to have met you," he said to the others. "See you again—eh, O'Dowd?"

"I shouldn't be a bit surprised," responded Mike tartly.

Cookie and Marino went off together. They passed through a side door to a carpeted staircase, mounted to a corridor, and entered a big room furnished as an office, where they approached a massive desk.

"Well, sweetheart," said Cookie pleasantly, "what are your views on the disarmament conference?" And he thrust his hand into his pocket where a bulge appeared.

"I vote yes," said Marino.

"And shall we approach the altar and go through the ritual?"

"It ees okay wit' me."

Cookie tugged open a drawer in the desk and produced a formidable gun from his pocket. Marino produced a gun from his pocket. Simultaneously they dropped their weapons into the drawer, and the drawer was closed.

July 19th, 1931.

Cookie sat and pointed to a chair. Marino sat beside him.

"What's on your mind?" inquired Cookie.

"Last night eight of my trucks disappeared!"

"Well, well, you don't say? Did you notify the police?"

"You are not so funny as you t'ink."

"All right, then, sue me. Only I've got a better idea. Take your sign off, and they won't be spotted so easily."

He fished out a cigarette-case and offered it to Marino, but the Italian would not accept a cigarette.

"Another t'ing," he said angrily.

"Some of your boys are butting into my territory. Now I don't want a no trouble, and there ain't gonna be no trouble."

"Oh, I see," mused Cookie. "We're going to kiss and make it up, is that it?"

"Yes—if you stay out of the south side."

Cookie frowned.

"But the doctor ordered me south for my health," he said plaintively.

"From now on the south side ain't gonna be so healthy for you!"

"Oh, is that so?" drawled Cookie, lighting his cigarette.

The door opened and Larry burst into the room. Outside a watchful attendant had tried to prevent him from intruding, but knowing him to be a friend of Cookie's had not dared to use violence.

"What do you want?" demanded Cookie frigidly.

"Why, I just wanted to use the phone—"

"Use the one outside!"

"But I was just going—"

"Beat it!" Cookie's voice was harsh, peremptory. Larry reluctantly obeyed the command.

"That kid's got the habit of nosing in where he isn't wanted," complained Marino.

"Oh, the kid's all right," said Cookie. "He doesn't know what it's all about."

"He knows-a too much to suit me," snapped Marino. "Somet'ing's gonna be done about it."

"Lay off that kid," warned Cookie. "I think a lot of him."

"Oh, you wouldn't want to lose him, eh?"

"I don't intend to lose him! I've appointed you his life insurance!"

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, for instance, if he should—er—slip on a banana peel, or get hit by a truck—or stung by a bee— You know what I mean—well, there'll be two funerals instead of one. So you'd better take pretty good care of him, Marino."

Marino, compressing his lips, got to his feet.

"Not going?" said Cookie. "Yes? Well, I'll go as far as the door with you."

He opened the drawer, took out Marino's gun, and offered it to him by the butt. Then he thrust his own gun back in his jacket pocket.

They walked to the door, which Cookie opened.

"Drop in often, Marino," he said pleasantly. "The police are not always here. Just drop in, but let me know when you're coming. I may want to bake a cake!"

Marino went out into the corridor. Mike was standing by the stairs with Larry, but he passed them without a word. Cookie joined them.

"What's all the excitement?" he inquired. "Go and carry on with the party, Mike—I'll be right with you. I just want a word with the kid. Come in, Larry, and shut the door!"

The Lure of the Racket.

MIKE descended the stairs; Larry followed Cookie into the office and closed the door.

"What's Marino all burnt up about?" demanded Cookie sternly.

"Oh," said Larry casually, "I had a little spare time on my hands so I battered out a couple of stories about him."

"You'd better find another way of killing time. Lay off Marino."

But Larry was young and eager to establish himself in the job Cookie had procured for him.

"I'm a newspaper man," he said defiantly, "and he's great copy. Why, you told me yourself to bang 'em on the nose with it—make it sensational. Well, I'm on velvet. I'm in with you, and in with Mike, and—"

"And in with an undertaker, if you don't bottle up!" snapped Cookie.

"Aw, be yourself! Why, I'm doing you a big favour! If I can get Marino put away, you'll be the big shot in this town."

"Well," growled Cookie, "I'll fix you, that's all!"

He picked up the receiver of the telephone on his desk. "Chickering 9510," he said into the transmitter, and then, glaring round at Larry: "You haven't got the sense of a ground-hog!"

A voice rang in his ear.

"Hallo, 'Herald'?" he demanded. "Gimme that old half-wit, Bettinson, the news editor."

The familiar voice of Bettinson came over the wire.

"Hallo, you bald-headed baboon!" greeted Cookie. "This is Cookie Leonard, former reporter on your half-baked sheet. Get this straight, sweetheart—take young Pearson off the underworld stuff. Understand?"

Bettinson, hard at work in his room with a blue pencil in his fist, promptly shouted back:

"We're running a newspaper here! It's our business to get the news. If I wanted your advice I'd hire you back again—and don't call me sweetheart!"

"All right, sweetheart," chuckled Cookie. "But I am telling you, and you'd better listen, you fathead, or I'll buy your cock-eyed paper and throw you out on your face. Good-bye, sweetheart!"

He slammed down the receiver and turned to Larry with a wry grin.

"And that," he said, "is what's known as telling the chief news editor!"

"Oh, boy," cried Larry adoringly, "I'm waiting for the day when I can tell him where to head in!"

"Don't be a chump! And listen! If you're going to be a newspaper man, stick to the newspaper game, and steer clear of the racket. D'you get me?"

He grabbed the youngster by the arm and marched him off downstairs to the restaurant. Mike was sitting beside Molly, who looked worried. The place was more crowded than ever.

"Well, Mike, what do you think of the joint now?" inquired Cookie proudly. "See any customers?"

"Oh, I guess you'll get along all right—for a while," quoth Mike.

"And, as the poet says, 'The paths of glory lead but to the grave!'"

Larry, soon afterwards, announced that he was due at the office, and took his departure. Cookie suggested that Molly should give him a dance, and they mingled with the couples on the polished floor. Mollie had put on the wrist-watch, and Cookie noticed it.

"Looks nice, doesn't it?" he said, looking down at it as they waltzed. "I believe you like Mike's present better than you do mine."

"Well, Mike had to work for his," Molly said non-committally.

"So did I—only we work differently."

"If you can call it work!"

"It's work all right—and some day I'm going to make a big name for myself."

"And a number!"

"They'll never stick a number on me. They leave us big shots alone."

"You're not the only big shot in the racket! Marino doesn't seem to like you much!"

"I'm not afraid of him. I was a pretty good student in that school in Franco—even if I did get a glass eye for a diploma."

"What did you learn?" inquired Molly curiously.

"I learned that the shortest distance between two points is a straight line. Triggernometry—with the accent on the trigger. I'll make a million dollars in a year at the rate I'm going."

"At the rate you're going a million dollars won't do you any good in a year," she told him. "Oh, you can't get away with it, Cookie—pull out before it's too late."

"Wait a year, then ask me," he said, and held her a little closer. "Aw, let's cut out this stuff. This is a birthday party. I haven't been able to say it before, but there's something I've been wanting to ask you."

He looked fondly down into her grey eyes. But Molly, avoiding his gaze, avoided the question, too.

"You said something a moment ago about the shortest distance between two points being a straight line."

"I get you," said he, reversing skilfully, as a couple nearly collided with them. "Strait and narrow—is that it? But, Molly, I want to ask you—"

"Wait a year," she interrupted, "then ask me."

The music stopped, and he took her back to the table, disappointed, but outwardly as gay as ever. Mike rose as they approached, and she asked him to get her cloak, declaring that she must go home.

The cloak was fetched.

"So long, Cookie," said Mike. "Sorry we have to go so soon."

Cookie sat watching them till they had vanished through the distant doorway, then he looked down at the table. Beside his plate lay a long, narrow case covered with white lambskin. Molly had scorned the present he had given her!

Not, however, because she scorned the giver. Mike escorted her home in a taxi, and she invited him into the little drawing-room, while she went off to change into a negligée.

On a table stood a framed photograph of himself, side by side with a framed photograph of Cookie. He turned the one of Cookie face downwards, and felt in his waistcoat pocket for the engagement-ring he planned to slip on Molly's finger before he left. But when Molly came back there were tears in her eyes.

"Oh, Mike," she said miserably, "what are we going to do about Cookie? We've got to get him out of the racket."

"Why don't you ask him to cut it out?" suggested Mike.

"I did, but he stalled me off. He wants another year."

"Isn't that funny?" he growled. "I thought he'd do anything in the world for you. You know he's awfully fond of you, Molly."

"I know. He tried to propose to me to-night."

"What did you tell him?" demanded Mike anxiously.

"I told him I'd listen when he decided to play the straight game."

"Do you love him?" he asked, taking her hands in his.

"I don't know," she confessed. "But if it would get him out of the racket, I'd marry him to-morrow."

"I guess that's love all right," he growled. "Pretty hard to take, though. You know I—"

"I know, Mike," she nodded. "But he needs me more."

Mike drew a long breath, and contrived to grin.

"I'll have a talk with him to-morrow, Molly," he promised. "You won't have to wait a year."

"Oh, Mike, you're a darling!" she whispered. "I don't know what I'd do without you."

He urged her not to worry, and he bade her good-night without saying a word about the ring in his pocket. On his way to the door he restored Cookie's photograph to its rightful position!

Missing!

TWO mornings afterwards, Marino sat at his desk in his big, panelled, private room at the warehouse, glaring down at a screaming headline on the front page of the "Morning Herald":

"Police Start War on New York Underworld."

Joe Pagano and two other men were present, one of them an ugly little rat of a man known as Shorty, and evidently Marino had been saying something vitriolic about the newspaper story he had just read, for Joe responded savagely:

"Yeah, with all this stuff breaking in the papers, we can't walk the streets in safety. Every twenty feet the cops stop us and frisk us. We're getting more attention than Lindbergh!"

"They got Tony and Spike last night," announced Shorty.

"Dat-a is all right," said Marino. "I bailed 'em out dis morning."

"Who's breaking these stories?" demanded Joe.

"Dat kid who hangs out wit' Cookie Leonard. He talk-a too much."

"There's only one way to shut his mouth," exploded Joe. "Waut the finger on him?"

Marino scratched his chin thoughtfully, recalling Cookie's warning.

"You bring heem here," he directed.

What happened to Larry that day had its sequel on the morning of the next, when Cookie, alarmed because Molly's brother had not been home all night, sent out men in all directions, and at last rang up Mike at police headquarters.

Lefty, a hireling, had served with Cookie in France, and wore his bowler hat at an angle and looked a typical prize-fighter, was ushered into the private office, above the restaurant, by the dusky Alabam.

"What did you find out at the 'Herald' office?" demanded Cookie.

"Not a thing."

"What did you hear from the rest of the boys?"

"Nothing—and they're still out trying to get some dope."

"Boss," said Alabam excitedly.

"Ah'm 'most sure I saw him yestidy aft'noon. Ah'll say Marino's outfit picked him up, put him in a car and took him down to the packing plant. Ah worked for Marino once, boss!"

The black had but confirmed Cookie's own fears. He opened a drawer in his desk and took out two formidable guns, which he slipped into his overcoat pockets.

"Didn't know you were a two-gun man, chief," remarked Lefty admiringly.

"This is a two-gun job," snapped Cookie. "Let's go!"

He put on his hat, and he and Lefty went off, disregarding Alabam's pleading to be allowed to go with them.

Outside the restaurant Cookie's limousine stood waiting. They went off in it to the warehouse in Clinton Street.

Ten minutes later Mike entered the restaurant, which at that early hour was in the hands of the cleaners. On the staircase leading up to the office he encountered Alabam, who professed not to have seen his master at all that morning.

"He telephoned me from here ten minutes ago!" snapped Mike. "This is not a pinch, Alabam—I want some information."

"Information?" echoed the negro innocently. "Oh, that's something I ain't got nothin' of!"

"Where's the kid?"

"Lieutenant, I dunno nothin'."

But Mike was not to be fobbed off so easily as that. Direct questions failing, he resorted to subterfuge, and finally tricked Alabam into admitting that whatever had happened to Larry, Cookie had gone off to Marino's warehouse.

"That's just what I wanted to know!" cried Mike triumphantly, and he went off in haste, fearing that something pretty serious was liable to happen, if it hadn't happened already.

The high wooden gates of the Three Star Packing Company's premises were wide open when Cookie and Lefty approached them on foot, after leaving the limousine round a corner. Motor-lorries were being loaded, some in the yard, some in the warehouse itself.

"Wait here, Lefty," directed Cookie. "You ain't goin' in there alone, chief?"

"This is a one-man job!" snapped Cookie, and strode into the yard and across it into the warehouse.

Men in white coats were weighing and carrying great quarters of beef, shrouded in muslin; several tough-looking fellows were wandering about, watching the operations; and Marino himself, smartly dressed and carrying a stick, was talking to his man Joe, who was lounging against the packing platform.

"Hallo, sweetheart!" greeted Cookie, walking straight up to the gangster.

"Hallo, Cookie!" said Marino, staring. "You come south for your health?"

"No, just to buy a little beef. Better send me a couple of sides to-morrow."

"All right," nodded Marino. "They'll be good!"

Joe's hands had sought his overcoat pockets, and Cookie was quite aware of the fact.

"When you come to see me," he said calmly to Marino. "I take you into my private office. Where are your manners, sweetheart?"

"All right," said Marino reluctantly. "Come on!" And he led the way through the packing department to a plainly furnished room fitted with desks. In accordance with the law of the underworld the two approached one of the desks and placed their respective guns in a drawer.

"The peace pact of the Hague and Hague," said Cookie.

"And Johnny Walker," added Marino.

"Yes," said Cookie, looking about him. "So this is your office, eh? You know I figured it differently. I could see you sitting in a great big room with Oriental rugs and trick lights, and perhaps even a pipe-organ."

July 18th, 1931.

"Not me, Cookie," declared Marino. "This is good enough for me."

But Cookie wasn't satisfied. Everything, so far, was too open, too straightforward—and he knew his man.

"Aw, come on," he drawled, "show me round: How about trotting out some of that old Southern hospitality?"

Marino, with a characteristic shrug, stepped across to what appeared to be a big safe set in the wall of the room.

"All right, Cookie," he said, and turned a lever and tugged the door open, disclosing beyond it a stone passage leading to a flight of stairs. "To tell-a you da truth, my own office is up here."

"I thought so," remarked Cookie, and followed him through the doorway. "You know, I think I'll have to get one of those gadgets for my little place."

They mounted the stairs together, and at the top of them, Marino opened another door, through which they passed into the large room with panelled walls—a room sumptuously furnished, with a costly Persian carpet on its floor.

Four men were in there: Joe, Shorty, a fellow Cookie recognised as Mart Soames, and Larry!

As Cookie entered, Joe and Shorty sprang to their feet, and their hands flew to their coat-pockets, while Larry, who was sitting in a hide-covered easy-chair nursing his overcoat and hat, started up with a cry.

"Okay, boys!" said Marino. "My friend Cookie."

"Hallo, boys!" drawled Cookie.

"Hallo, kid, what are you doing here?"

"I was just going," said Larry, taking his cue from his would-be rescuer.

"Oh, were you?" growled Cookie. "All right, come on, then—and if I ever hear of you intruding on Mr. Marino's privacy again, it's just gonna be too bad for somebody!"

Larry moved hastily over to Cookie, but Marino, scowling, said fiercely:

"And if my name don't stay out of da newspapers, it's just gonna be too bad-a for somebody else!"

"How much do you weigh?" inquired Cookie.

"Eh? Oh, a hundred and sixty-eight pound. Why?"

"I was just thinking how well you looked in your clothes. A hundred and sixty-eight pounds, eh? Be careful you don't put on weight!"

"Me? I don't never put on no weight."

"You might! With a couple o' pounds of lead under your belt, you'd weigh a hundred and seventy, wouldn't you? Think it over, sweetheart!"

Joe had started forward menacingly, but Cookie's hand was in his overcoat-pocket, and it was obvious that he had something there that he was prepared to use. He motioned to Larry to precede him, then backed through the doorway and closed the door.

If Lefty had been present he would have known now why that second gun had been taken. But Lefty was waiting impatiently in the limousine, to which Cookie lost no time in piloting his charge, retrieving his first gun from the drawer in the office downstairs on the way.

But Marino was not prepared to lose his prisoner without a struggle—especially after that last threat of Cookie's. No sooner had the door of his private room closed than he barked: "Put the finger on him! Back way! Joe, you take-a care of dis yourself."

Cookie had anticipated some such action. He whisked Larry behind the gates in the yard half a second before two shots rang out. Then, from between the hinges of a gate he fired at a figure creeping along the wall outside. Mart Soames threw up his hands and fell on his face.

From the top of an outside staircase across the yard, a man took aim and fired, but in the same instant a shot rang out from beyond the gates, and the man pitched headlong, to fall with a sickening thud on the stones of the yard.

Cookie, with a grin, dropped his gun into his pocket and tugged Larry out from their hiding-place into the street.

Mike was standing there with a police revolver in his hand, which he was firing into the air, and policemen were running to the scene from all directions.

Cookie took not the slightest notice of him, and Mike took no notice of Cookie or of his companion. The car was reached, and Larry was bundled into it. Lefty, at the wheel, drove off in the direction of Broadway.

"Boy, what a story this'll make!" cried Larry excitedly.

"Yeah?" snorted Cookie. "Well, you're through with stories, kid! Maybe you don't know it, but you quit the 'Herald' this morning."

"Oh, don't talk like that, Cookie!" expostulated Larry. "I'm not afraid of Marino."

"You haven't got sense enough to be afraid!" barked Cookie. "But you're washed up in the newspaper racket. Get me?"

In a gloomy silence the car swept northwards till Cookie directed Lefty to stop it. Then he opened the door.

"Beat it, kid!" he commanded. "Go home to Molly—and stay there till you hear from me."

"But I can't—"

"Do as I say!" thundered Cookie.

And Larry descended to the pavement, and the car moved on.

A captain of police by this time had reached the yard of the Three Star Packing Company. The two wounded crooks were being carried out to a motor ambulance, and a third body—a dead body—was discovered in an alley-way almost immediately afterwards.

"Joe Paganò, eh?" remarked the captain. "Good work, Mike!"

A Warning.

LARRY had been staying with Cookie for some months past in a flat over the restaurant; now he had been ordered to go home to the house in Brooklyn and stay there. He felt rebellious, indignant, treated like a child. Here was a perfectly good front page story going to waste!

He passed a tobacconist's shop, stopped short, and retraced his steps. He entered the shop, bought a packet of cigarettes at the counter, and asked the man behind it if he might use his telephone.

A few minutes later he was talking to Bettinson, the chief news editor of the "Herald." And Bettinson listened, enthralled, and, acknowledging that the story was a scoop, took it all down himself in shorthand.

The man behind the counter listened, too.

"That's the biggest scoop you've ever had," Larry wound up, "and I've given it to you out of the goodness of my heart, you bald-headed baboon, for I quit your half-baked sheet this morning. Good-bye, sweetheart!"

He hung up the receiver and grinned at the tobacconist.

"That's what's known as telling the editor," he chuckled.

"You sure told him, boy!" nodded the tobacconist. "And what it was! They'll rush out an extra with that, I guess!"

Larry proceeded from the shop to a restaurant, where he had a meal, and it

(Continued on page 25.)

A gripping drama of the range and how a dare-devil cowboy frustrated a rascally foreman's plans to rob a rancher. Starring Wally Wales and Virginia Browne Faire.

Longrope.

HALF a dozen of the boys were gathered outside the bunkhouse of the Lazy Y outfit, which lies to the south of Amarillo, Texas. They were taking great pains with their personal appearance, in anticipation of a jaunt to town, and a diminutive puncher known as Shorty was fastidiously removing some stains from his sombrero.

"There ain't no use you slickin' up, Shorty," observed a whiskerando answering to the name of Ransie Conning. "I got all them gals in Amarillo corralled this time."

"Yeah?" sneered Shorty. "Well, don't forget what happened last trip, when I took that blonde right from under your eyes. She was a beautiful dame," he added with a profound sigh.

A tall, elderly man came into view at that moment with a young girl in riding-clothes, and the boys greeted them respectfully as they passed by—the man being none other than Colonel Sterner, owner of the rancho, and the girl his daughter Betty.

The colonel nodded to the boys and walked on to where a grizzled cowhand was leaning against the fencing of a corral. The colonel greeted his employee solemnly, and then handed him a sheaf of bills.

"That pays you off in full, Thomson," he said, "and I guess you'll have to look for another job. I hate to see you go, but Longrope is my foreman, and I can't have fellows around that don't get on with him."

The cowhand bit his lip.

"Colonel," he answered quietly, "I can work with most any man, but when a low-down pot-hound like that Longrope ramrods an outfit, I'm ready to leave. Good-bye, Miss Betty," he added to his employer's daughter.

Betty looked at him with an expression of regret. She was a pretty, fair-haired girl of nineteen, and obviously did not share her father's sentiments.

"Good-bye, Bob," she said, holding out her hand.

The man's bronzed fist closed about her slender fingers, and then he walked away. A moment later a lean, sallow individual showed up. He was that same Longrope whom the colonel had mentioned, and if he had won old Sterner's confidence he had at the same time made himself none too pleasant to the majority of the men who worked under him.

"Where's Wally?" Betty asked him curtly, without returning the suave smile that he bestowed on her and her father.

"Oh, I put him to watching those critters down at the big corral," the foreman answered, a curious glint playing at the back of his eyes. "He ain't good for much else, I'd fire him if it wasn't for you, Miss Betty."

"I would like it a lot better if you would fire yourself," Betty retorted vehemently, whereupon her father voiced a protest.

"Betty, Betty," he appealed, "don't talk that way."

Betty made no rejoinder, but, turning on her heel, walked quickly in the direction of the big corral, where she found the aforesaid Wally tending a calf that had sustained a sprained ankle.

Wally was a slim, good-looking youngster with a crop of dark hair and a pair of level grey eyes. He straightened up as Betty appeared, and gave her a genial "Good-morning!"

"Wally," the girl said, "I came down here to tell you that if you wanted to go to town with the rest of the boys, you could. I'll fix it with dad."

"Why, that's mighty nice of you," the young puncher answered gratefully. "I sure would like to go along."

Betty laid a small hand on his arm.

"Listen, Wally," she went on seriously, "Longrope is doing his best to turn dad against you. Will you please try not to offend him, for my sake?"

"Sure I will, honey," Wally told her, with an affection that had perhaps been mainly responsible for Longrope's dislike of him. "You know I'd do anything in the world for you."

The cowboy's horse was near-by, and, swinging himself into the saddle, he cantered towards the ranch buildings. Meanwhile, Colonel Sterner was discussing him with the detested Longrope.

"What have you against Wally?" he was inquiring. "I always thought he was a top hand."

"He don't respect me," Longrope complained, and, Wally coming up at that moment, he flashed an ugly glance at the youngster ere moving off to where his own pony was standing.

Wally was on the point of riding by when the colonel hailed him.

"Say," he called, "don't you want your wages, young feller?"

"No, thanks," Wally replied. "I've got enough for this little trip, colonel. Just put mine in the bank the same as usual."

The old man gazed after him as his bronc carried him towards the bunkhouse, and as Betty approached he shook his grey head sadly.

"There goes a good boy," he murmured. "I hate to lose him."

"Why, dad, what do you mean?" Betty exclaimed anxiously.

The colonel pursed his lips.

"Well, he doesn't seem to hit it off very well with Longrope," he pointed out, "and I have to uphold my foreman."

"So that's the way the wind blows, is it?" Betty snapped.

Trouble in Town.

A MARILLO was an orderly town. Free fights there were in plenty, but at the first sign of gun-play the sheriff and his deputies appeared with rattling of handcuffs, and the gaol became the abode of the malefactors.

There was a fist-battle in progress when Wally rode into Main Street, accompanied by Shorty, who had waited for the young cowboy while the rest of the hands had gone on ahead. But the disturbance did not attract Wally's attention. What held his interest far more was the figure of Longrope, whom he saw at a distance of some thirty paces.

The foreman had come to town with a couple of ranch hands who were his cronies, and, a bully by nature, with a perverted sense of humour, he had seen in the shape of a timid Chinese laundryman a likely victim for his cruel horse-play. Quite distinctly Wally heard him voice his intention of affording himself some "amusement" at the Oriental's expense.

"Watch me spill the Chink," he said to his associates; and, taking his lariat from his saddle-peg, he made a deft cast and dropped the noose neatly over the little yellow man's shoulders.

The Chinaman squealed. Next second he was whipped off his feet and dragged headlong through the dust as Longrope clapped spurs to his brone and galloped down the street.

Wally plucked out a six-gun, took steady aim and fired. The shot crashed out, and the leaden slug split the lariat three feet from the tautened noose.

Longrope drew rein with an imprecation, and glared round to see Wally ride forward to the Chinaman and help him to his feet. As the foreman recognised the young cowboy his face became livid, and his eyes were glinting maliciously when Wally cantered up to him.

Longrope's hand moved involuntarily to his hip, but, though Wally had returned his six-gun to its holster, his fingers were close to the butt, and the foreman restrained his impulse, particularly as he became aware that the town marshal was approaching.

"Longrope," the representative of law and order warned, "you're altogether too fresh. You start anything and I'll finish it. Understand?"

The foreman scowled.

"Aw, I was only fooling," he ground out.

Wally had turned away, a contemptuous smile lingering about his firm-lipped mouth. The sheriff glanced in his direction and then back at Longrope.

"You fool kinda rough," he observed. "Now you go on an' shake hands with young Wally there. Go on, get going."

Longrope was the reverse of willing to comply, but the sheriff's tone was menacing, and he urged his brone forward to where Wally had rejoined Shorty, outside a saloon. As he held out his hand, however, his face registered an expression far from friendly.

"I'll get even with you for this," he said under his breath.

Shorty had dismounted in the meantime, and with a sudden inspiration he now took his own lariat, surreptitiously making one end of it fast to the hitch-rack and the other to the girth-strap of Longrope's brone. The foreman, unaware of what was proceeding behind his back, continued to glower at Wally savagely for a few moments, and then pushed past him and rode on at a smart pace.

Shorty's lariat uncoiled itself and suddenly sprang taut, bringing up Longrope's pony with a ierk. The foreman uttered a yell as he plunged over the creature's neck and fell sprawling in the dust—a yell that was drowned by a shout of laughter.

By the time Longrope had struggled to his feet Shorty and Wally were no longer in view, but, apart from the two cronies who had accompanied him from the ranch, the foreman had a good many associates in town. Several of these now approached him, and one of them swore to having seen Shorty fix that lariat to the foreman's saddle.

"He and his pardner beat it into the saloon," the man informed Longrope.

Bruised, shaken and enraged, Longrope snatched his forty-five out of its holster and strode towards the swing-doors through which Shorty and Wally had passed a moment before. As he pushed the doors open he saw the two cowhands standing at the bar with their backs to him, and heard the voice of Shorty raised in boastful comments.

"When he hit the ground it was the funniest sight I ever saw," the little puncher was stating. "And say, that ain't all. I can lick forty-five men like him. I wish he'd come in here right now. Y'd—"

"Fill your hand with your six-shooter, you little rattlesnake!" Longrope snarled from the threshold. "I'm gonna pump you full o' lead."

Shorty and Wally whipped round, and the bravado vanished from the former as he saw the weapon in Longrope's fist. Too scared to reach for his own "iron," he stood there shivering as the foreman crooked his finger round the trigger.

The man was in a mood that knew no reason, and there was no doubt that he intended to fire. But with a lightning gesture Wally whipped out his forty-five and let loose from the thigh, and the bullet tore the foreman's wrist, so that he dropped his Colt with a sharp cry of pain.

Longrope's associates had followed him to the doorway, and now they swarmed into the saloon with vengeful shouts. Wally immediately grabbed Shorty by the arm and propelled him towards an open window overlooking the veranda.

"Beat it," he jerked. "They're too many for us!"

One after the other they took a header through the window, darted across the veranda and sprang into the saddles of their brones. A moment later they were galloping along the street.

Longrope and his sympathisers came blundering out of the saloon, to run full tilt into the sheriff. They brought up short at sight of the representative of the law, and fidgeted sheepishly.

"You guys lookin' for somebody?" the sheriff inquired.

"No," Longrope made haste to explain; "just playin' around a little, sheriff."

"Playin', huh?" was the rejoinder. "Well, playin' is all right—but don't get gay."

Fired!

POWDERED with the dust of limestone roads, Wally and Shorty were swinging round a bend in the trail that led to the rancho when the figure of a lad of some fifteen or sixteen years appeared immediately in their path.

They were travelling fast, and the boy had no time to jump aside. The right flank of Wally's horse caught him a heavy buffet and pitched him into a clump of scrub.

Wally drew rein and assisted the lad to rise. He began to make apologies, but the boy answered him cheerfully.

"That's all right," he said, "I'm not hurt. Honest I'm not. Say, I'm glad you two fellers ran into me, anyway. I'm tryin' to locate my dad. You don't happen to know anyone in these parts by the name of Bradley, do you? I'm Jim Bradley."

"Bradley?" Wally echoed. "No, I don't know anyone by that name around here."

"Here's his picture," the boy went on eagerly, producing a faded photograph, but neither Wally nor Shorty could recognise any acquaintance from it, and the boy seemed disappointed.

"Well, I'll have to keep on makin' inquiries," he murmured. "You don't happen to know if there's a town or ranch near here, do you? I—I'm kind o' hungry."

Something in his tone made Wally look at him shrewdly.

"Have you got any money?" he asked.

The boy coloured a little.

"No, I haven't," he confessed.

Wally and Shorty exchanged a glance, and then the former spoke again.

"Say, my boss is looking for a cook's help," he mentioned. "I reckon you could most likely get the job. How about swinging up behind me and takin' a ride over to the outfit?"

"Gee, that 'ud be great," the lad replied, and a moment later he had hoisted himself lithely astride Wally's brone.

"Boy, you swing up like you knew something about horses," Wally commented, as he sent his pony forward with a pressure of his knees.

They reached the ranch some time later, and were met by Betty. Wally introduced young Jim Bradley, and then asked the girl if she could tell him where he would find her father.

"Oh, dad's gone to Denver to meet some cattle buyer," Betty answered. "He won't be back till Sunday."

Wally frowned.

"That's too bad," he said. "I was hoping he might take this kid on as a cook's help."

"Why, I guess that would be all right, anyway," Betty declared, and told Shorty to take Jim to the cook.

When they had gone, Wally spoke to Betty earnestly.

"Listen, honey," he said; "I had to break the promise I made to you to-day. I had some trouble with Longrope, and I had to hurt him."

"You did quite right, Wally," Betty told him, after she had heard the full story.

Thus, during the two days that ensued, there was an air of tension about the ranch, and matters almost came to a head on the evening that Colonel Sterner was due to arrive home, when young Jim Bradley appeared outside the bunkhouse in chaps and sombrero.

"Say, what's the big idea, kid?" demanded Shorty, who was standing near the horse's drinking-trough with three or four of the other men.

"Well, Wally's goin' to let me ride that buckin' horse in the stables," the boy announced, "and he says that if I'm half as good a rider as I claim to be, I'll be a cowboy pretty soon, instead of a cook's help."

It was at that moment that the cook appeared on the scene, a savage-tempered, husky individual, who was one of Longrope's special favourites.

"Hey, what's the idea of dollin' up like this?" he rasped, eyeing young Jim Bradley sourly. "You get in that galley an' help me with the dishes! Go on!" And he clutched Jim and dug his fingers into his arm till the lad squirmed.

"Say, you big stiff, you let go o' my little pal!" Shorty blurted, but he was sent sprawling by a forceful shove.

Next second a hand fell upon the cook's shoulder, and whipped him round so violently that he released Jim. The bully found himself face to face with Wally, and lashed out at the puncher. But Wally parried the blow and banged his fist to the cook's jaw.

The man went over like a ninepin, but scrambled to his feet and rushed at Wally with an angry bellow. A fierce battle ensued, the bystanders forming a ring and shouting encouragement, and two minutes after the first fall Longrope's satellite bit the dust again.

Once more he straightened up, but Wally had the measure of him, and he stretched him a third time. The cook attempted to rise, but could not, and, stooping, Wally swung him up in his powerful arms and dumped him into the horse-trough.

The man plunged into the water with a terrific splash and a spluttering yell, and Shorty immediately pounced on him to seize him by the hair and souse him enthusiastically. Time and again the little puncher thrust the cook's head below the surface, and it seemed as if he intended to repeat the process indefinitely, till Wally restrained him.

"Get an careful of this, men," said Wally to the assembled punchers, several of whom were eronics of Longrope. "Anybody who picks on young Jim Bradley picks on me."

A voice spoke from behind Wally, and he wheeled round to discover that Longrope had cantered up on horseback, in time to witness the final stages of the cook's discomfiture.

"Huh, so the fire-eating trouble-maker is busy again," the foreman sneered, addressing Wally.

"Maybe you would like to get in on the argument," was the curt rejoinder. Longrope's lip curled.

"Not now," he drawled. "I think I'll leave this for the colonel to attend to." And he pointed to his wrist, which had been bandaged ever since the encounter in Amarillo.

Wally said nothing, but a few minutes later he had a heart-to-heart talk with Betty.

"Well," he told her, "I guess I'll be lookin' for a new job now. Honest, I've tried my best to get along with that foreman, but it's just no use."

"I know," Betty answered, "and I'm going to have a word with dad about him."

Wally shook his head.

"That won't be any use," he opined. "Longrope has all his confidence, I reckon."

Wally's prophecy was correct, for when the colonel arrived back at the ranch, in company with the cattle-buyer from Denver, Longrope made straight for the old man's study.

He entered it as the cattle-buyer was tendering a thick sheaf of hundred-dollar bills in payment for a shipment of beeves Sterner was to deliver, and shortly afterwards the man from Denver took his departure. Longrope watched the latter crossed to a safe and deposited the money that had been handed to him in a pigeon-hole.

The old man locked the safe again, and then turned round to face his foreman.

"Sit down, Longrope," he said, "and tell me how everything's been going."

The foreman held out his injured wrist.

"Outside of being shot and insulted," he answered grimly, "I guess everything's been all right. Colonel, I can't get along with that fellow Wally. Can't hit it off nohow. He's been doin' everything to make trouble. Now, the other day, in Amarillo, . . ."

He proceeded to give a fictitious account of what had happened in town, and when he had finished the story the colonel frowned darkly.

"I'll settle this once and for all," he announced, and, followed by Longrope, he strode out of the ranch-house.

A commotion at one of the corrals attracted their attention, and they saw that the entire outfit was gathered at the fencing, watching a young boy riding an untamed bronc in masterly fashion.

The colonel was compelled to pause and admire the lad's display of horsemanship, and when the wild pony had come to a defeated standstill the old man turned to Longrope.

"Who's that boy riding?" he inquired.

"Oh, some little tramp Wally picked up," the foreman sneered.

The colonel's mind reverted to the unpleasant duty he had to perform, as he saw Wally, Shorty and Betty helping young Jim Bradley from the mustang and congratulating him enthusiastically. He went forward alone and joined the group.

"You ride well, young man," he said to Jim, and then addressing Wally: "If you'll join me at the house I'll pay you off," he continued. "I think you understand."

Betty caught at his sleeve and tried to reason with him, but he had made up his mind, and refused point-blank to reconsider his decision, whereupon Shorty stepped forward.

"You can give me mine, too, colonel," he stated grimly.

"Very well," old Sterner said. "How about you, young man?" he added to Jim.

The boy spoke quietly.

"This is the first real home I've ever had," he confessed, "but if my pals leave, I must go, too, sir."

Hand in Glove.

JIM BRADLEY was walking past the cook's galley to collect one or two trivial personal effects from the bunkhouse, when a fragment of conversation arrested his attention.

It came from the galley, where the cook and Longrope were in close conversation, and it was the latter's voice that young Jim heard.

"Now listen, Cooky," the foreman was saying, "it's up to us to get together and grab that money to-night. There's 25,000 dollars in that safe, and it's a cinch for us to make our getaway. By golly, I've waited a whole year for the old man to market those cattle, and now it's time for me to rake in."

"Are you sure that dough is in the colonel's safe?" the cook demanded.

"Yeah, I saw him put it there myself," Longrope told him.

The cook said something else in a lower tone, and, his curiosity thoroughly aroused now, young Jim tiptoed up the galley steps and actually set foot across the threshold, very gingerly. In that position he was able to overhear every word distinctly.

"How are we going to do it?" This from the cook.

"Well," Longrope answered, "Wally an' Shorty 'an that kid are pullin' their freight. There won't be nobody around here but our own gang, fifteen minutes from now. We can make the colonel open the safe."

"Sounds all right," said the cook, and with that Longrope chanced to turn his head and see young Jim Bradley standing in the doorway.

As they stumbled across the threshold they saw the prone figure of Jim Bradley.

An oath escaped him, and, taking the alarm, the cook whipped round and caught sight of the boy. Jim wheeled and tried to run, but with a swift movement the cook jerked his gun from its holster and fired.

The smash of the shot synchronised with the sharp cry that broke from Jim's lips. Next moment the lad pitched to the floor and lay still.

The report of the six-gun had been heard all over the ranch, and one of the first to come running towards the cook's quarters were Wally and Shorty. As they stumbled across the threshold they saw the prone figure of Jim Bradley, and by his side a Colt .45.

"Say," blurted the cook with sham concern, "can you imagine what happened? I was cleanin' my gun an' it slipped right outa my hand."

"Yeah," put in Longrope, "an' when it lit the floor it went off. An' the bullet plugged the kid."

Wally did not pause to question them, but gathered Jim in his arms and carried him out of the galley. As he came down the steps, Betty ran towards him.

"Wally," she gasped, "what's happened?"

"The kid's been shot," the cowboy answered, "but I think he's got a chance to live. I'll take him into the house. You run on ahead and phone a doctor."

By the time Wally entered the ranch-house with his inert burden, Betty was on the telephone and old Colonel Sterner was waiting to lead the way to a spare bed-room. It was as he was helping Wally to lay Jim on the bed that something fell from the boy's pocket, something which the colonel picked up with a strange expression on his face.

"Where did this come from?" he faltered.

Wally looked round and saw that he was holding the photograph which young Jim had shown him and Shorty on the Amarillo trail.

"Oh, that's a picture of his father," the cowpuncher explained.

Colonel Sterner walked through to the living-room. Betty was telephoning a Dr. Crandall, but her father took the instrument from her and spoke into the mouthpiece.

"Dr. Crandall?" he said, "Listen, doctor, my boy has been shot. Yes, my own son. I don't care whether you know I had a son or not. I want you to get out here as quickly as you can."

He hung up the receiver and turned to Betty slowly. "I've got a confession to make, honey," he murmured, as he saw that she was staring at him in amazement. "When you were a little tot of three years old, I left your mother and took you with me. It was a case of insane jealousy on my part, which I've regretted bitterly ever since. I came West under an assumed name, Betty. Our real name is Bradley, and this—indicating the photograph in his hand—"this is a picture of myself as a young man. Jim Bradley is your brother, Betty."

Meanwhile, in the bed-room, Jim Bradley was beginning to stir restlessly, and all at once he opened his eyes and recognised Wally.

"Hallo, little pardner!" Wally said. "Tell me how it all happened."

"The cook shot me," Jim answered feebly. "He was planning to rob the colonel's safe with—"

His voice failed him and his eyes closed again. Wally knew that he had sunk into oblivion once more, and he was stooping over him when Colonel Sterner entered the room, followed by Betty.

July 18th, 1931.

"Is my boy conscious?" the old man asked.

"Your boy?" Wally echoed.

Betty swiftly explained.

"You see, Wally," she said, "we've just found out that Jim is my own brother. How is he, Wally?"

"Oh, I guess he's all right!" Wally answered, and then, hurrying from the ranch-house, he made his way over to a corral, where Shorty was waiting for him.

"Come on with me," said Wally, tapping the diminutive puncher on the shoulder. "We're still workin' for the colonel, see?" And he led Shorty in the direction of the cookhouse.

Longrope was lounging around outside the building, and with an unexpected gesture Wally pulled a six-gun and jammed it against the foreman's ribs. By looking through the doorway, behind Longrope, the young cowboy could see that the cook was no longer in his quarters, and he aimed to find out just where the fellow might be located.

"Where did that cook go, Longrope?" he demanded. "You better talk up or I'll smoke you plenty."

The menace of the .45 loosened Longrope's tongue. He spoke in a voice that sounded almost whining.

"I didn't think the boys would understand," he said, "so I told him to beat it."

"Get back in that galley!" Wally ordered curtly. "Go on, get back. And, Shorty, keep this coyote penned up here while I chase up that cook. The two of them have planned to rob the colonel!"

"What do you mean?" jerked Longrope.

Wally laughed grimly.

"You know what I mean," he said. "I reckon I ain't makin' any mistake by pickin' on you. Now, Shorty," he added to his undersized pard, "watch him, for he's foxy."

"Okay," Shorty rejoined, drawing his revolver and compelling Longrope to retreat across the threshold of the cookhouse.

Wally wheeled round and sprang astride the bronc that Shorty had been saddling. Sixty seconds later, having heard from a loitering cow-hand that the cook had last been seen riding towards town, Wally sent the pony forward along the Amarillo trail at full gallop.

In the five-mile burst over the limestone road, he saw no sign of the fugitive, but as he clattered into town he caught sight of the rogue hitching his mount to the rail outside the saloon, and, coming up with him in a smother of dust, he flung himself on the fellow.

The cook uttered a shout as he was borne heavily to the ground. A fierce struggle ensued, and the man reached for his gun. But Wally twisted his wrist till he let the weapon fall with a groan, and then he dragged the ruffian to his feet and threatened him with his own six-shooter.

It was at this juncture that the sheriff and a couple of his deputies elbowed their way through a small crowd that had gathered to watch the scuffle.

"What's the trouble here?" the sheriff demanded, taking Wally's iron from him.

"This bird shot the colonel's son," Wally answered. "Yeah, I said 'son,' sheriff, for old Sterner has a kid about sixteen. The cook claimed it was an accident, but he was lyin'. He and another guy were plannin' to rob the colonel's safe, an' I've got a hunch that other guy was Longrope."

The sheriff spoke to his deputies.

"Take him over to the office," he ordered, indicating the cook. "We'll make him talk."

It was no idle boast, for five minutes afterwards the cook was stammering out a full confession, to which Wally and the representatives of the law listened attentively.

"And what gave you and Longrope the idea of robbing the colonel?" the sheriff inquired.

The cook moistened his lips.

"Well, Longrope wanted money to make a getaway," he said. "He was afraid maybe he would get rounded-up some time for that slayin' last fall."

"What slayin'?"

"You know that guy you found dead over on Squaw Flats?" the cook went on. "That hombre who was investigatin' the steer-rustlin' for the Cattle Association? Well, Longrope and some o' his gang had a cow stretched out for brandin' when this feller steps out on 'em and tries to hold 'em up. Longrope shot him. You see, all the time he was playin' foreman for ole man Sterner he was doin' a big private business in cattle-thievin'."

The sheriff rose to his feet.

"Boys," he said to his deputies, "I reckon we're ridin', pronto."

"You won't forget to put in a word for me when it comes ter my trial, sheriff, will you?" whined the cook, ere he was taken to the cells.

The Tables Turned.

SHORTY and Longrope sat facing each other at the table in the cook's quarters, and Longrope was the picture of uneasiness and discomfort.

For Shorty was brandishing a six-gun with a dangerous disregard of its trigger, and as he levelled it at Longrope the foreman positively quailed.

"I have waited a long time," began Shorty, ominously and deliberately, "for a chance like this, and I've got a notion to pop you off 'stead o' waitin' for the sheriff."

Longrope looked at him haggardly.

"Put that 'iron' down, Shorty," he pleaded. "Put it down, will yuh?"

Shorty seemed in no hurry to comply, but a moment later the sound of footsteps caught his attention. Five or six of the ranch-hands came into the cookhouse, looked at captor and captive with some surprise and then exchanged meaning glances.

"What's the big idea, Shorty?" one of them asked.

"I caught a rat," growled Shorty, "and I'm playin' with it."

The cow-hand who had addressed him leaned his elbows on the table.

"You don't say," he drawled. "Caught a rat, huh? That ain't a friendly name to call a hombre, Shorty. What's Longrope been doin', anyway?"

As he spoke another of the newcomers moved up behind Shorty and thrust his hands towards the little puncher's throat tentatively.

Holding Longrope covered with a gun in each fist, Shorty had never an inkling that he was about to be assailed from the rear. For he did not know that the group of men who had just entered the cook's quarters were hirelings of the treacherous foreman.

"Well," said the man who was leaning on the table, "you ain't answered me yet, Shorty. What's the idea in trainin' your artillery on Longrope this-a-way? What's he been up to?"

"What's he been up to?" Shorty reiterated vehemently. "I'll tell you what he's been up to. Wally Weldon claims that that mangy cook shot young Jim Bradley, because the boy overheard him an' Longrope Wheeler plannin' to rob the colonel's safe. Young Jim wasn't plugged by accident—no, sir! And so—

Shorty never completed the sentence, for at that instant the man behind him seized him in a vice-like grip.

A strangled cry escaped the little cowboy. He tried to spring to his feet and turn on his attacker, but the shooting-irons were knocked out of his hands, and as the weapons clattered to the table, Longrope reached across swiftly and snatched up one of them.

Shorty managed to wrench away from the rogue who had grasped him by the throat, and, wheeling round, he hit out at the fellow lustily. His bunched knuckles landed flush on the ruffian's mouth with a healthy impact that knocked him flying. But Longrope clubbed the gun he had lifted, and, diving round the table, brought the butt smashing down on the back of the little puncher's head.

Shorty staggered dazedly, but made a gallant attempt to throw off the effects of the cowardly blow, the crown of his sombrero having muffled the shock of it to some extent. Longrope whipped off the hat, however, and again struck the diminutive cowboy over the skull.

Shorty's knees gave way, and with a hollow groan he slipped to the floor. The scoundrelly foreman looked down at his sprawled form for a moment, spurned it savagely with the toe of his riding-boot and then faced the men whose arrival had been so timely—so far as he was concerned.

"That was a pretty near thing," he ground out. "I was beginnin' to think you guys was takin' your afternoon siesta or somethin'."

"We was driftin' by when we saw this ninety-eight pound skeeter playin' around with them six-guns, boss," one of the gang declared. "Lucky for you we did, or everything mighta gone wrong."

"How does the land lay now?" Longrope demanded.

"Fine en' dandy," was the rejoinder. "There's no one around the rancho but our own fellers, Longrope, an' we're all broke to leadin'. Say the word an' we'll lift the coin."

The foreman expressed his satisfaction with a curt nod. "We'll grab the money outa the safe an' pull our freight right now," he said. "Come on."

He paused to bestow another kick on Shorty and then led the way from the cook's quarters and strode in the direction of the ranch-house.

The gangsters were still some little distance from the building, when Doctor Crandall was seen to drive up in a touring-car, and, calling a halt, Longrope watched the medical man cross the veranda and enter the house by the front door.

"Reckon we'll hang up a while," the foreman mused. "We don't want any more trouble than we can help, and we'll let Crandall get off the outfit afore we start business. When he's gone I'll stroll into the house casual-like. Two of you keep pretty close on my heels. The rest of you can stick around outside and watch out for any visitors that might not be welcome—"

Meanwhile the doctor was being conducted by Betty and Colonel Sterner into the room where young Jim lay. The medical man's diagnosis of the boy's hurt did not take very long, and he was soon able to give the old colonel a reassuring verdict on the ease.

It was a verdict which was borne out by Jim's cheerful appearance when he recovered consciousness again and sat up in bed.

"You see, colonel, it's just a graze," the physician told the elderly rancher. "That's all. Why, the boy could ride a bronco right now, without any bother."

"I'm powerful glad to hear it, doc.," the colonel said in a relieved tone. "This boy means more to me than he knows. But let me see you to the door."

He escorted the doctor as far as the veranda, watched him drive off in his auto, and then returned to the room in which Jim had been put to bed.

Betty had remained with the lad, and she and her father proceeded to tell him of their newly discovered relationship. It was a piece of information that came as a tremendous surprise to Jim, and one that revived him more than any medical attention could have done.

He rose shortly afterwards, and father, son and daughter repaired to the colonel's study, where they were talking animatedly when a knock on the door interrupted their conversation, "Come in!" called old Sterner, and Longrope crossed the threshold.

"Can I see you a minute, sir?" said the foreman with the habitual air of respect that he affected in his employer's presence.

"Oh, hallo, Longrope!" the colonel greeted him genially. "What's on your mind?"

Before the foreman could make any answer, young Jim had pointed an accusing finger at him.

"Dad," he flashed, "that's the man who was planning to rob you with the cook!"

There was a blank silence, which Longrope was the first to break. With an ugly imprecation he stepped towards Jim threateningly, but pulled up short as the colonel pushed between him and the boy.

"What's the meaning of this, Longrope?" he rapped out.

Across the threshold came two of Longrope's gang, Shane and Haggerty by name. Their six-shooters were in their hands, and they menaced the colonel with the weapons.

Longrope spoke. "The meaning's just this, colonel," he drawled. "We want the money you have in that safe."

"You'll never get it from me, you dirty rat!" the old man blazed, and in a sudden, blind passion he launched forward and tried to strike his foreman.

Longrope thrust him back roughly and gripped him by the throat, but young Jim sprang to his father's rescue, and the foreman was compelled to release the old man to handle the lad.

Holding Longrope covered with a gun in each fist, Shorty had never an inkling that he was about to be assailed from the rear.

He hurled Jim aside, and the boy staggered to the far wall, finishing up near an open window. Jim acted on the impulse of the moment, and, realising that resistance against Longrope and the two armed men who had followed him into the room was hopeless, he scrambled over the sill and sprinted away in the hope of obtaining help.

Jim did not know that Longrope had left four other members of the gang outside the ranch-house, with orders to plant themselves at various vantage points and guard against interruption. But at that very instant a stealthy form was creeping up behind one of those sentinels, near the well from which the outfit drew its water.

The stealthy form was that of Shorty, who had recovered consciousness but a minute or two before and crawled out of the cookhouse.

One of Longrope's gang had taken the precaution of relieving Shorty of his six-gun, but the little puncher had discovered a hefty cudgel lying hard by, and with this grasped in his fist he came within striking distance of the man at the well.

The cudgel swept down on the rogue's head, and without a sound he toppled stupidly. He fell towards the low parapet of the well, tumbled over it, and vanished into the depths of the cavity.

Shorty caressed the bludgeon tenderly, and was complimenting himself on having disposed of the gangster, when he heard the voice of one of Longrope's men coming from beyond an out-house.

"Art," the voice called. "Where are you, Art?"

Shorty took cover, and a moment afterwards Art's seeker hove into sight. He approached the well, and was gazing about him when a feeble hail reached his ears from the bottom of the shaft.

The gangster leaned over the parapet. "What are you doing down there, Art?" he shouted.

"He's waitin' for you to take a bath," said Shorty, stepping out of his hiding-place and swinging the cudgel again.

Art received company at the foot of the well, his colleague "dropping in on him" like a bale of hay.

Shorty now proceeded to make a tour of the outfit, and not far from the ranch-house, close to a clump of brushwood, he discovered young Jim Bradley in the grasp of a burly crook.

"Where do you think you're goin', young feller?" the ruffian inquired of the lad, covering him with a six-shooter.

"I'm in a hurry!" Jim panted. "You're in too big a hurry, I reckon," the gangster began, but ere he could say more Shorty stole up from the rear and laid him low with the bludgeon.

"That worked out all right," the little puncher declared, looking down at the rogue's prostrate form. "Let's go."

"Where to?" Jim asked, and Shorty grinned.

"To the well," he stated, and the unconscious crook was dragged off, to be served in the same manner as his two associates.

The fourth man was likewise taken unawares, but as he was carried to the well three heads rose above the parapet—the heads of the men who had already been consigned to its depths. Shorty smote them lustily, and they disappeared. The fourth man was dropped after them like a plummet, and Shorty wiped his hands with a gesture of satisfaction.

July 18th, 1931.

"Where's Longrope?" he asked Jim. The boy nodded in the direction of the ranch-house.

"He's in there with two of his men," he answered, "trying to make dad open up the safe so he can get the money."

The Dash to the Ranch.

AS the cook was escorted from the sheriff's office in Amarillo and taken to the cells, Wally turned to a telephone fixed to the wall.

"I'm going to call up the ranch, sheriff," he stated, "and satisfy myself that everything is all right."

"Go ahead," the sheriff told him. Wally picked up the receiver, but the operator at the exchange failed to connect him with Colonel Sterner's outfit, and when the cowboy hung up and turned to the sheriff there was an expression of anxiety on his clean-cut face.

"I reckon there's something wrong at the ranch," he ground out. "The line is dead. Listen, sheriff, I'm goin' ahead. Hit the saddle as quick as you can, will you?"

"I'll have a posse together inside a few minutes," was the answer, "and we'll round up the whole gang."

Wally dived out of the office, unlatched the pony and vaulted on to the animal's back. In another moment he was riding out of Amarillo and taking the trail that led to the outfit.

He covered the miles 'twixt town and ranch in record time, and, powdered with the dust of the road, dismounted near one of the corrals, and advanced with his six-gun in his fist. It was as he drew rear the house that he distinguished voices, and recognised one of them as Longrope's.

The voices came from beyond the window of the colonel's study, and, stepping cautiously towards the sill, he peered inside and saw the crooks and their victims.

"Are you going to open that safe, colonel?" Longrope was demanding ominously.

The old man drew himself up defiantly.

"No, I'm not going to open that safe, you rat," he made answer.

"I don't want to hurt you," Longrope threatened, "but there's ways an' means o' makin' you do what I want. Get me?"

"You can't scare me," the colonel retorted, and with that Longrope moved nearer to him.

Betty slipped between the foreman and her father, and beat the scoundrel furiously with her small, clenched hands. Longrope was momentarily driven back by her attack, but caught her by the wrists.

"Hold on, you little spitfire," he snarled. "An' listen to me. You know the combination o' that safe as well as your old man. Get over to it—go on! And he pushed her across the room.

"Don't open up that safe, Betty!" the girl's father called, and Betty faced Longrope as defiantly as the colonel himself had faced him a moment before.

"You won't get any help from me!" she flashed.

Longrope's eyes narrowed viciously. "Oh, I won't, huh?" He turned to his men, and indicated the colonel. "Bring that old fool over here."

The rogues obeyed him, and Longrope addressed the raneher in harsh, rasping accents, brandishing a six-shooter as he did so.

"Now, colonel," he said, "tell her to open the safe. I mean business, an' I ain't wastin' any more time—"

"Stick 'em up!"

It was the voice of Wally from the window, and the three crooks wheeled in alarm, to find the cowboy's forty-five covering them. Slowly they raised their hands, and at a sign from Wally the colonel relieved them of their fire-arms and pitched them from the room.

Wally climbed over the sill, and it was as he was dropping to the floor that Longrope and his hirelings made a concerted rush at him. His revolver was knocked from his grasp, and a savage swing from Haggerty took him in the jaw and battered him against the wall.

Longrope sprang for the gun that had fallen from the cowboy's hand. But, throwing off the effects of Haggerty's punch, Wally pounced on the foreman and caught him a terrific upper-cut that hurled the crook to the far side of the room, where he lay groaning.

Shane closed with Wally, but the cowboy swung him up in his powerful arms and flung him to the floor. Next instant, however, Haggerty was grappling with him.

Shane reached his feet and started forward to Haggerty's assistance. The colonel made a gallant attempt to intercept him, but the old man's fighting days were over, and the gangster felled him with a cowardly blow, then snatched up Wally's gun.

Wally glimpsed him out of the corner of his eye, whirled Haggerty round as Shane tried to "draw a bead" on him, and sent the former staggering into his armed comrade with a mighty heave. Both men fell, and the revolver spun into a corner.

They scrambled up again, and Shane seized a vase from the mantelshelf and slung it at Wally. The cowboy ducked, and the ornament shattered to fragments against the wall. Next second he had leapt towards the ruffians and was hammering them unmercifully with his fists.

They blundered backward under a storm of blows, and their combined efforts failed to stem the youngster's onslaught. Shane wilted under a hard drive to the solar, and was smashed to the floor with a punch that broke his teeth and brought the blood streaming from his nose. Haggerty was pounded into a dazed condition which left him capable only of pawing feebly at the air, and Wally finished him with a flashing right-hook.

Haggerty hit the carpet and did not move. But there was still some fight left in Shane, and, springing at Wally, he scored with a lucky blow and almost felled him. But the cowboy came back at him like a tiger, and slammed three punches to the crook's unshaven chin in quick succession.

Reduced to limp insensibility, Shane lay spreadeagled near an overturned table.

Meanwhile, Longrope had had time to collect his wits, and he made a fierce rush that drove Wally to the far side of the room. The youngster took some hard knocks during the foreman's desperate rally, but he was possessed of a stamina that could endure punishment, and a sudden opening gave him his chance to take the offensive.

He took it with a vengeance, and laid into Longrope with both hands. The foreman was rocked with a couple of stiff lefts that were mere preliminaries of a terrific hammering. He did his best to cover up, but the cowboy's blows crashed home through his guard, and the crook's battered face became distorted with pain, while his breath escaped him in hoarse, laboured gasps.

He was knocked to the floor, and rose only to fall again. When he gained his feet once more it was to attempt escape,

(Continued on page 28.)

Horse thieves are making mysterious raids on the Diamond Bar Ranch. A handsome stranger and his queer friend take many risks to help the ranch owner and his pretty daughter.

Starring
BUFFALO BILL JUN.

STORY OF THE SONORA

The Ambush.

TWO men rode slowly along the dusty trail. On either side were frowning cliffs, with jagged stones that threatened to fall at any moment. In the far distance could be glimpsed green hills, but here was only stifling heat and desolation.

"Dreary Gulch would be a good name for this place." The tall, handsome young rider on the spirited chestnut spoke. "I'll be glad when we get through to the shade of the trees."

"Yeah, I feels as if I climb Vesuvius." The other man was short and thick set; his mount was a slaggy and unkempt cow-pony.

They were strange pards—Bill Tracy and Heine Schmultz. Tracy was tall, well built and weather-tanned; his Western outfit was good, and he held himself like an athlete. His smile had won many a girl's heart. Heine's nose proclaimed his origin. An excitable little man, whom Tracy had helped in the fording of a river, and for two weeks they had ridden together.

Heine had come West because he had always had the wish to be a cowboy. His business of making shoes had gone bust, and as the business had gone West he had done the same. Tracy stated that he was a cowpuncher with the wanderlust, and that he was on his way to the Diamond Bar Ranch in Sonora. About this time they would be needing hands, and Tracy had heard that Williams, the boss, paid good money. Schmultz had better come along.

Crack! Crack!
"Vot vas dat?" cried Heine, reining in his mount. "Don't say, Tracy, dat it was pistols."

"Sounded mighty like it," laughed the youngster. "Expect some guys have got a bit fresh. Come on, Heine.

They don't shoot at strangers out in the West without giving due notice."

The valley seemed quite peaceful as they rode forward.

"I should have said dem shots were about here," Heine whispered after they had ridden some distance. "Yet dere don't seem no folks about. Maybe we was mistook, Tracy."

"Yeah, maybe we were and maybe we weren't," answered Tracy. "Who knows but an army might be hidden among those great rocks."

Crack!
A bullet whined over their heads.

Crack! Crack!
To their amazement two shots came back from the other side of the ravine. They even saw two puffs of blue smoke.

"Gosh, this looks like a feud," cried Tracy.

Crack!
A bullet passed uncomfortably close to their ears.

"Get behind that boulder," barked Tracy. "That shot came from the south-side."

"Yeah, but suppose de guys on de north side start shooting mitt me," wailed Heine, looking very perturbed and seared.

"Then you jump round to t'other side of the rock." Tracy had to laugh. "In fact, the quicker you jump the safer you'll be. Now get to cover."

"Where you going?"
"I aim to stay here," Tracy pointed to a boulder. "I'm going to try and get above our friend."

Crack! Another bullet whined close, and made them duck their heads.
"That's a warning to keep off the grass. Get to that boulder, Heine, and trust that the North are friendly; leave the rest to me."

Bill Tracy began to work his way up the cliff side, but had not gone far when he realised that the cover was so scattered that there was little chance of getting above his quarry without being sighted.

He was hesitating what to do when shouts and howlings from below proclaimed that Heine Schmultz was in trouble.

"Help! Murder! Bill! They're killing me!"

Now guns began to pop from both sides of the ravine, and bullets were ricocheting off the rocks. Who were the two combatant sides Tracy had no idea. At the moment that could wait until he had seen what was happening to Heine.

Swiftly the tall Westerner clambered down the hill side, and twice bullets went dangerously close. On the trail below he saw several struggling figures, and as he got closer perceived that three men were on top of Heine Schmultz.

Tracy yanked one man off by the scruff of his neck and slammed a vigorous right-handed punch to an unshaven jaw the rascal slumped in a heap. The other men, turning, saw what had happened, and left Schmultz to rush at Tracy.

One came at the boy with waving fists, whilst the other leaped on his back. By a ju-jitsu trick Tracy neatly dislodged the man on his back, and by bending his body forward catapulted the fellow into the other's face. Both crashed to the ground, but got to their feet, and, breathing fearful threats, waded in for more trouble.

Bang! Not a shot, but Tracy's fist. One man dropped like an ox.
"You leave him to me," shouted Heine Schmultz, who was jumping round waving his arms. He flung himself on the prone man.

The other rascal was more cunning and milled round Tracy, seeking for an opening. All the while a miniature battle was going on above their heads.
July 18th, 1931.

Bill tried to rush in, but was stopped by a lucky swing to the ribs. He squared that with a quick left that hurt the other's nose.

Heine's man was showing signs of fight, much to the small man's fright.

"Quick! Quick! Bill, he's getting fresh," wailed Heine. "Can't hold him much longer. Take that, doggone, cuss yer!" He banged the foe on the nose with his clenched fist.

Bill waded into his man, and by clever foot-work and quick-moving arms managed to manoeuvre an opening that enabled him to get in a heavy punch to the jaw. That broke the other's caution, and he came wading in with arms flying.

Bang! Bang! A look of pained surprise on the rascal's face as those blows landed and hurt. His legs gave way and he sank to the ground.

The youngster took no chances, but flung himself forward to pin the defeated one to the dusty trail. The man Tracy had slumped had recovered sufficiently to turn the tables on the little German, but they backed away like coyotes when the tall cowboy waded into them.

Down the sides of the hill a dozen men came running. Every now and again they would stop to fire. This fire was returned, but came from much higher up—one side was on the run. On the run because three of their men had apparently fallen into enemy hands.

Heine Schmultz, when he had dodged behind that rock, had nearly fainted away when the three jumped out on him. These men had crawled down to the trail to wait for any attack from the North, and had apparently decided that Schmultz was an enemy.

It was a great consolation to Tracy to look up and observe that a thin, gaunt man that was running towards them wore a star on his shirt.

"I'm Sheriff Wilson," he barked out. "I'm mighty obliged to you two strangers."

Willing hands relieved Schmultz and Tracy of the battered rascals.

"If it ain't a rude question," cried Tracy, brushing the dust off his clothes, "what was going on—a small war?"

"These three men are rustlers," was the answer. "Hardly a week goes by without horses being run over the border into Mexico, and I sure thought that we had corralled them at last. I should reckon they were about eight or ten strong, and we might have gone on shooting at them for ever if you hadn't happened on the scene."

"We're mighty looky to be still on der scene," said Heine dolefully. "I am covered in bumps and lumps."

"So those guys were rustlers," Tracy seemed interested. "They're the type of skeeter I detest. Glad we helped you out, sheriff. We're on our way to the Diamond Bar Ranch after a job—what are the chances, sheriff?"

"Good, after what you've done today," was the answer. "Mister Williams has lost more horses than any other ranch, and he'll receive you with open arms. After I've housed these three beauties I'll be coming over to see Williams. This trail leads to Silver Fox, a small cowtown where I've got my gaol, but you turn half right after leaving this ravine and that takes you to the Diamond Bar. Meet you later, strangers."

Schmultz and Tracy shook the sheriff heartily by the hand and for a mile rode with the posse. Tracy gathered quite a lot about the rustlers and their deeds, and gained the sheriff's heart by July 18th, 1931.

promising to ride in any posse the representative of law and order might require.

Then the sheriff and his prisoners took one trail and two wanderers another.

The Diamond Bar was but an hour's ride, but before they reached their destination they were due to have another adventure.

Beauty in Distress.

HEINE SCHMULTZ was full of chatter about the recent adventure and his own stirring part.

"Bet those rustlers we captured don't talk," Tracy remarked in a thoughtful manner. "If they'd squeal we'd know the leader of the gang and that would save a lot of trouble."

"You seem mighty interested in dem rustlers," murmured Schmultz. "I don't care if I don't see no more of dem fellers. Say, Bill, this yere valley seems real peaceful and—"

His words were interrupted by a piercing scream. The sound came from some way ahead. It was a series of screams that seemed to be trailing off into the distance.

"Very peaceful, ain't it?" remarked Bill and then urged his horse into a gallop. Schmultz charged after his friend.

They came to a clearing and Tracy reined in his horse, he stood up in the stirrups and shaded his eyes with his hands and then saw where the shrieks were coming from. Below them was a grassy valley and a horse was careering along that valley with something bobbing about half in and half out of the saddle.

"A vumans in distress," panted Schmultz, and saw Bill go down the slope and through the trees at a pace that made him shudder. "Vere mein freund go so must I," he muttered, but his pace was something like that of a fast snail.

By taking an angle of forty-five degrees, Tracy would eventually overtake the runaway provided he could maintain a fast gallop. How the horse kept his footing was a miracle, and how Tracy avoided being swept out of the saddle by the boughs of the trees was even more miraculous. Luckily the runaway was only a frightened pony and tiring fast.

Through a belt of brush dashed Bill Tracy and in a few strides came alongside the runaway. Strong hands reached out and caught at the trailing bridle. The pony was checked and soon Tracy had it under control and brought the animal to a quivering halt.

Tracy's strong hands helped the girl back into the saddle and he was not slow to notice that she was young and exceedingly pretty, though her cheeks were pale from her terrifying experience.

The girl soon recovered and smiled quite bravely at her rescuer. She smoothed her ruffled hair and smiled, deciding at once that the stranger was a very handsome young man.

"Thanks—you saved my life." Her voice was soft and clear. "Pop's told me a long time that I should have some fresh saddlery, to-day a stirrup leather went as I was reaching up to pick some flowers from a bank, and when I almost fell out of the saddle Tommy took fright and bolted. He's not a bit scared of guns, things he knows, but anything out of the ordinary sends him real loco. I'd given up hope when you appeared on the scene."

Her gaze expressed curiosity. What was this handsome young man doing here? She was even more puzzled when a perspiring fat little man zig-zagged into the picture.

"Gut! Gut!" murmured Schmultz, raising his battered old felt hat. "Very lucky for you, miss, dat I hear ze screams."

"This is Heine Schmultz," laughed the youngster. "I like to have trouble trailing around with me—that's why Heine comes along. My name is William Tracy, better known as Bill. We're heading for the Diamond Bar Ranch."

"Is that so?" The girl's eyes sparkled. "I'm Betty Williams—my pop is the boss of the Diamond Bar."

"You don't say," cried Schmultz. "Den you gets mein freund and me zee jobs. You tell heem how we save—"

"That will be enough, Heine," growled Tracy. "Sorry, Miss Williams, but my pard rather oversteps himself at times."

"You're wanting work," the girl smiled. "I know father will be pleased to do—"

"But I don't want to get in under false pretences," Tracy smiled back. "I sure feel now that I'd like to work for your father, but I'm kinda cautious. Your pop may not want any hands and I might kinda feel the wanderlust urging me to keep to the trail."

"Can I show you the way?" suggested the girl. "Tommy always pulls when he's on the home trail, and it will be hard to hold him with only one stirrup." She cast admiring eyes at the chestnut. "But if there is another horse, or a man, around then Tommy's as good as gold."

"Sure that will be fine," answered the boy and scowled at his pard. "Heine, you ride back and look for the stirrup iron. You needn't hurry."

"But vy—oh, I see, two is a company and three is zee army," Schmultz grinned.

Betty blushed whilst Tracy watched her with admiring eyes. They were good friends by the time the ranch was in sight, then the boy halted.

"I'll wait for Heine," he told her. "Then we'll take a look around and if Heine wants to stay then we'll come right along and see your pop. An hour ago I wasn't at all sure about hitching up at the Diamond Bar, but now I'm full of enthusiasm."

"What's made you change your mind?" asked the girl, with a mischievous smile. In her neat riding habit she was a pretty picture. An oval face, cheeks that were now warmed by a healthy colour, and the fairest of hair. She held herself gracefully, but Tracy reckoned that it was the blue of her sweet eyes and the smile that was winning his heart.

"I think the scenery round here is so grand," was his laughing answer.

"Will you be staying long?"

"That all depends," Tracy glanced back and saw Heine. "But it won't worry me if it's a long spell."

"I'll tell pop to expect you round to our hacienda in about an hour." The blue eyes were full of friendship. "I shall be expecting you, anyway."

And when she was almost out of hearing, Tracy cupped his hands and shouted:

"In an hour's time, Heine says yes."

"Vat you talks about," muttered the perspiring German. "I not find dat stirrup, and now vy does I say 'yes'?"

"We're mooring in this port," chuckled Tracy. "But before I see her old man I want to have a look round. Just as well to see the other punchers and especially the foreman before you take a job. But it'll be a mighty tough foreman to keep me from joining the Diamond Bar. Come on, Heine."

Deputy Sheriff.

BILL TRACY did not hurry because he had reasons of his own why he wanted to have a quiet look round. Without seeming to be noticing, he sized up the Diamond Bar Ranch, the number of cowpunchers, the various buildings and corrals.

"Reckon they mostly handle horses, Heine," Bill said. "I've always heard that round these parts hosses was profitable. They can turn 'em loose most months of the year and then have round-ups for selling, branding, foaling, and all that. Old Williams does cattle as well and he reckons he must have twenty or more boys on his pay-roll." He pointed to a tin shanty with a veranda round it. "What would you say that building was, Heine?"

"A saloon."

"Yeah, you're right," Tracy rubbed his smooth chin. "If they've got their own saloon they may be a very bright crowd and it is possible I may find them too bright. Buck Harris is the foreman."

"How you know so much about dis yero ranch, Bill?" asked Heine.

"Using my eyes and ears," was the vague answer. "As they run the saloon for profit what say to a mild hibrant, Heine?"

"You bet." The little man was all eagerness. "I'll go first."

They strode towards the saloon and had got to the swing doors, when there came a crackle of gunfire. Heine jumped back as if he had been shot.

"Donner und Blitzen," he gasped. "Dis ain't a saloon, it's a shooting gallery."

"Come on." Tracy pushed the small man forward, and they passed through the swing doors.

The atmosphere was thick with tobacco fumes, whilst the lighting came from oil-lamps suspended from the ceiling, a number of cowpunchers were gathered round a prone figure, and the place stunk of cheap alcohol.

Tracy motioned to Schmultz to keep quiet, and quietly joined the group. He picked out at once the man who interested him most—a big, burly fellow in a bright-coloured flannel shirt, khaki breeches and Mexican boots. Bill took a quick survey of the ten or twelve men in the saloon. Several seemed quite decent sort of men, but the majority Bill put down as a tough bunch of cut-throats.

"I guess he won't try that trick again." It was the burly fellow who spoke.

"You bet he won't, Buck!" cackled a rat-faced, dishevelled-looking rascal. "He drew first, Buck."

The swing-doors opened and a round-faced, pleasant man rushed into the saloon. His grey sergo suit of good cloth, collar and tie, gold pin and clean appearance, told Tracy that this could be only one person—the boss.

"What's happened?" he demanded.

"Wanting a new deputy," sneered Buck Harris. "Been drinking like a fish and tried cheating at cards." He indicated a coarse-featured specimen.

"Rawson drew on Blackie, and Blackie had to shoot mighty quick. We all saw it, boss, it weren't Blackie's fault." Tracy looked at the dead man over someone's shoulder, and decided that the deputy had not been a healthy specimen of manhood.

"You choose the deputy," cried the boss. "This is the second shooting in a month, Buck, and I won't stand for it. If you can't keep better order I'll get a new foreman. This matter must be reported at once to Sheriff Kilne."

"Is that all the thanks I get!" snarled Harris. "Why I—" The foreman checked an angry speech. "Sorry, boss, but I can't blame you for them hard words. It's mighty difficult to get hands—this rustling has scared punchers away. What ye gonna do about a new deputy?"

"I'd like a big fellow!" cried Williams. "A guy that wouldn't stand for this sort of racket. Any volunteers for deputy?"

Bill Tracy pushed several men out of his way and stepped forward, for the first time they became aware of the stranger.

"My name's Tracy." He indicated Schmultz. "This is my buddy, Heine. We want jobs as punchers on this ranch, and if I'm big enough, Mister Williams, I'd like to handle the job of deputy."

"We don't want any darned strangers," cried Buck fiercely.

"Are you the Bill Tracy that helped my daughter?" asked the boss. "Yes, I can see by her description that you're the man. I'm a quick thinker, Tracy, and I'll take you as deputy, but I warn you that it's a risky job—your life is in your own hands."

"My hands are pretty capable." Tracy did not flinch before the scowls of Harris and several others. "I've met Sheriff Kilne. Me and Heine helped to corral some of this rustling gang."

Did Buck Harris peer sharply at the new deputy, and some of the others glance quickly at each other?

"Then you're the new deputy." Williams stepped forward, took the star from the shirt of the deceased, and next second it had been pinned to Tracy's shirt. "You and your buddy better come along to the hacienda—Betty would like to thank you."

There was silence in the saloon as Tracy and Schmultz followed the boss, and many a hand slipped instinctively to a gunbelt.

Heine Saves Bill's Life.

A WEEK went by without any undue happening, except that one of Harris' underlings was foolish enough to call Tracy a "long-legged hobo," and for that lost two teeth and received as compensation a black eye.

There was one other matter, but that only concerned Buck Harris. The foreman noticed the smiles and laughter of Miss Betty towards Bill, and his ugly mouth snarled hate and mischief behind Tracy's back. Heine noticed the scowl one day and shivered.

Mister Williams spoke in glowing terms to Harris about the new deputy.

"I ain't saying anything." Buck Harris saw a chance. "But what do we know about these two men? Two nights I've seen Tracy prowling around, and I reckon that several of your horses from Craggy Canyon have gone over the border."

"Maybe you're right," was the answer. "But I believe you're wrong."

That evening there was a barn dance, as it was Betty's nineteenth birthday, and Buck Harris dressed himself up in his best. He must try to oust this fellow Tracy in the affections of Betty. What a hope Buck had! First of all, Betty had never liked Harris or any of his cronies, and Bill was a really fine specimen of manhood.

Betty danced most of the time with Bill, and when she wasn't dancing she was sitting out with the deputy. Buck Harris went off to the saloon, and when he returned he had imbibed sufficient spirit to inflame his jealousy almost to mad rage. It was an interval, and the two young people were out in the moonlight, but shielded from the ranch by a great tree that spread its branches and leaves almost to the ground.

Tracy flung himself forward to pin his man to the dusty trail.

Heine Schmultz knew where Bill and Betty had gone, but wisely stayed where he was—a tree stump near the veranda, where he could smoke his ancient corn-cob without the ladies turning up their noses. He observed Harris evidently looking for someone.

Heine put away his pipe when Harris, hearing the distant murmur of voices, crept like a cat towards the big tree.

Harris parted some of the branches. "Girls ain't ever meant much to me up till now." Bill was holding Betty's hands. "I've got a sister, and she is always bringing forward her friends. I liked them all—some were mighty pretty—but that was all they meant."

"And why am I so different?" was Betty's answer. The girl leaned towards the young man, and her eyes made no secret of her love.

"You're just too cute and sweet for words!" Tracy drew the girl close. "Directly I saw you that day when you lost your stirrup, I knew Mister Cupid had caught me at last."

"Somebody else's got you!" hissed Buck Harris, under his breath, and stealthily drew his gun.

Heine Schmultz saw the gleam of the gun in the moonlight, as Harris raised the heavy weapon and pushed it between the overhanging branches. Bill had found Heine a gun, which he had endeavoured to learn how to use. So far, his practising had been so dangerous that the other punchers had told him to lay off. Perhaps if he fired the gun it would warn Bill.

The little man dragged out the gun, and just as Buck Harris, his face transformed by hate, was about to press the trigger, he fired blindly. That shot would have won a medal in a competition, because it whizzed straight through Buck Harris' sombrero, so close to the scalp as almost to make a parting.

It cured the rage of Buck Harris, because he spun round to find out who was daring to shoot him from behind. He would have done it himself, but that anyone else should dare was beyond belief. Harris saw Schmultz, and slowly he trailed the weapon on the fresh target.

"Press that trigger and I'll shoot out your teeth," Tracy spat out. The deputy had released Betty in a flash, at the report of the gun, and had fairly hurled himself round the big tree. "Throw the gun before you and stick yer hands up high."

Buck Harris was forced to obey. At once Schmultz ran forward and began to excitedly explain what he had seen. Betty, with hands to cheeks, remained where Bill had left her, but she could hear what was being said.

"It's a lie!" bluffed Harris. "There are a lot of wild dogs and coyotes round here, and that yere tree often has a hawk or some such night-bird. They're always swooping down on Miss Betty's chickens."

"So you were shooting at a hawk," Tracy said. "Schmultz was quite wrong in thinking you would want to shoot at me. Why should you? Besides, a foreman would never shoot a man in the back. Not even the filthiest skunk would descend so low." Tracy's eyes were steely as he spoke. "I should go a bit farther afield next time you want to do your fancy shooting. I don't believe what you've told me, but I'm gonna accept it. Maybe you thought I was a rustler, and maybe you thought different. Pick up your gun, Harris, and if you want to please me try and use it—funerals are fun sometimes."
July 18th, 1931.

"You can laugh now, Mr. Clever." Buck Harris picked up his gun. "But that don't say the laugh mayn't be on the other side of your face mighty soon. The sooner you hit the trail the safer you'll be."

And, without another word, Buck Harris stalked off.

"Dat guy would have got you, Bill," whispered Schmultz. "He's a killer, and, in my mind, der crook what's doing all dis yere rustling."

"I was sure of it directly I saw the gentleman," laughed Tracy. "I'm obliged, old-timer, for what you've done puts us square."

"Yeah, and now I'm gonna get vun up." Heine Schmultz rubbed his hands together. "You tink he is der rustler, and so does me. Gut! Listen, Bill, to how we catch him."

Buck Harris had doubled back on his tracks directly he was in the shadows. It was not to murder, but to hear what these two might say about him.

"What's your scheme, Heine?" "Buck's horse is hitched to the rail," Heine said. "If we untie him and give him a wallop across der flanks dat horse will go to vere der headquarters of dese rustlers is."

"Dunno about headquarters, Heine," answered Tracy. "But Mister Williams reckons a lot of his rustled cattle and horses are in a valley round here that no one knows, and that from time to time the rustlers push them over the border according to the demand. Buck's horse might lead us to this hide-out. Heine, we'll try it. I must take Betty back to the dance. I'll be right back in five minutes."

And as Betty and Bill returned to the ranch arm-in-arm, a figure shook his fist after them.

"I got a trump for that acc," threatened Buck Harris. "A trick that may win me the girl as well. No man dare thwart Buck Harris and get away with it."

A Neck-Tie Party.

BUCK HARRIS watched and waited. He saw Bill Tracy and Heine Schmultz release his horse, and the creature got galloping away into the moonlight with the riders in close pursuit.

Then the foreman went off to find Mr. Harris. Why had Tracy and Schmultz stolen off like this? Where did the two intend to go? What mischief did they plan? Buck Harris then gave his explanation to the questions. Tracy and Schmultz were in with the rustlers, and if a posse were formed at once and the two trailed, it would lead to "Last Valley," and probably the horses and cattle. It was a chance that should not be missed.

Buck Harris had his own plans for what should happen in Last Valley. The boss would see Tracy and Schmultz, and would be bound to think them guilty. Harris could easily get some of his men to act as false witnesses.

"I believe you're on a false trail," decided the boss. "Let's go and see if you're right."

Then Betty came up and wanted to know what was afoot. She insisted upon riding with her father. Could Bill be in with the rustlers? No, but Harris might be plotting some deep scheme.

Tracy and Schmultz had ridden a considerable distance, and came at last to a small ravine, where the youngster called a halt.

"I've got quick hearing." He dismounted and laid his ear to the ground. "We're being trailed!" He jumped to his feet. "Heine, ride on after Buck's horse. I'm going to stay around here. I'll join you later."

Bill Tracy had not been in hiding long before there was a thunder of hoofs, and half a dozen riders, headed by Mr. Williams, Betty, and Buck Harris. They slithered their horses to a halt quite close to the mesquite where Tracy was hiding.

"Ain't I right, boss?" Harris shouted. "This is a new trail, and look yonder. See that cleft in the cliff? I've never seen that before. There's the Last Valley, where all the rustled cattle and horses have been concealed. It's as clear as daylight these two skunks are rustlers."

Buck Harris chuckled at his cleverness. Last Valley only contained a few horses that had been left there because they were of poor quality.

"Seems like you're on the right trail," muttered the boss, "though I ain't usually wrong in a man." He turned to his daughter. "There is danger, and you must go back to the ranch. No arguments—I insist!"

Betty, after many protests, rode away, and then the posse dashed off; it was Bill Tracy who kept close to their tail, but the youngster took good care they never guessed. Heine Schmultz found himself in the Last Valley, and he saw at once what an excellent hiding-place it made. A few horses and some cattle were grazing, and he went closer to see their brand.

A yell of exultation made him jump, and he spun round to find a number of horsemen tearing down on him. Feverishly he pulled out his gun and waggled it about in a hopeless sort of way. A rope snaked through the air, and Schmultz found himself sprawling in the dust.

Buck Harris did not waste time. He winked slyly at his men to act up to him.

"Caught in the very act!" yelled Harris. "A darned rustler, and cattle and horses from the Diamond Bar all round him. We know the way to treat rustlers, don't we, boys?" There were angry cries and shouts. "I know what I reckon is the only punishment this skunk deserves."

"A necktie!" yelled one man. "String him up to that tree!" shouted another. "It's the law of the West."

"But you must try him first." Boss Williams tried to intervene. "It sure looks as if he has rustled my cattle, but you must give him a chance."

"I ain't taken any cattle!" wailed Heine. "Dese men, they lie. Dis is der valley where der rustlers keep yer horses. I trailed der foreman's—"

"A lot of lies!" Harris began to bluster. "This crook has stolen my horse—that's proof enough for us. Sling yer rope over that branch, Ned, and we'll give this guy a swing for his money."

"Save me, mister!" moaned Heine, struggling hard, but without avail. "I ain't a rustler! Himmel, here come Bill! Now you hear something."

Bill Tracy rode up, and his hand was mighty near his hip.

"What's going on here?" he demanded.

"That's the other rustler." Buck Harris pointed at Tracy. "That's the other guy what's been stealing your horses and cattle."

"I'd like a word with you, Mister Williams." Bill ignored the foreman. "Just tell your foreman and his bunch of thugs to lay up on my buddy. It looks mighty black against us, Mister Williams, but I'd like a quiet talk without those critters yelling and cackling." He made a motion with his head. "Would you come over here, Mister Williams?"

"Lay off Schmultz!" ordered the boss. "I'll talk with the deputy and hear what he has to say."

When they were about fifty yards from the suspicious Harris and his men, Bill began to talk rather loudly, but he kept so close to the boss that his actions could not be seen.

"I was just out for a moonlight ride, boss." He made his voice rather whining. "I wouldn't want to take any cattle, and my buddy, Heine, wouldn't hurt a fly. The boys have got me all wrong." A shining star with "Cattle Owners' Protection Association," lay in the palm of his hand. "You'll give us another chance, mister?" Then he lowered his voice: "How is this for an alibi? They sent me here because you wrote to them. Now I want you to act as if you don't believe my story, but you haven't got enough evidence to warrant swinging us up to a tree." He put the star back in his shirt-pocket. "When we walk back to your foreman, who is the real rustler, I want you to go for me like mad, and take the deputy star off my chest. Get the idea?"

"So you're an official of the association. Smart work!" approved old man Williams. "I take any orders you care to give. After I take the badge, what do you do?"

"Hold you up, protest that Heine and myself are innocent, and ride away," was the whispered answer. "Let's get going, boss."

Buck Harris was delighted, and could hardly suppress his grin as the boss gave Tracy a slatting, finally wrenching the star off his and throwing it to the ground. The foreman thought he was going to have a necktie party, but Tracy was too smart.

Out came two guns, and Harris, the foreman, and the posse reluctantly shot their hands skywards.

"Come here, Heine!" rasped Bill. "Get to horse and ride to the cleft in the rock and wait for me there." He scowled at his prisoners. "I ain't been given a square deal, but I'm coming back, Buck Harris, and I'll come—ashootin'."

Slowly he backed his horse, keeping them covered, waited till he thought Schmultz was almost to the cleft, and then whirled round his horse. In a mad gallop he tore up the valley.

Buck Harris and his men would have followed, but old man Williams stayed them.

"That was all bluff on his part," he hinted. "That coyote will ride for the border, and we won't ever see his shadow again."

Buck Harris called his men together in the saloon directly he got back.

"I got my suspicions that we're being bluffed," he told them. "Old man Williams was full of buck after that scene with Tracy, and I believe they staged that show."

"Let's have a big clean-up, Buck, and beat it over the border," suggested Blackie.

"That's my idea, and we'll vainoose to-night," was the answer. "During the siesta-time, when Williams and his daughter rest, you boys round up as many horses and cattle as you can get and corral them in Last Valley. We get them out through the pass at the east end, which Mister Clever Tracy ain't found, but guard the entrance that he knows, and shoot the skunk if you sight him."

"How about you, Buck?"

"I'll meet you in Last Valley just before sundown," was the answer. "I aim to have a cut at the Williams' strong-box. Get about your job, boys, in case the boss gets wise."

Betty in Peril.

BILL TRACY had ridden over and had a long talk with Sheriff Kilne, who acted at once directly he saw the youngster's badge.

"Heine has overheard talk of a final round-up," stated Tracy. "I reckon Harris plans to clear up some of that pedigree stock as a last coup before fittin' over the border. Now we've found Last Valley, it ain't worth his while to stay; besides, it means risking his skin for nothing. Get your map out, sheriff, and I'll show you how we could place several posses so that there would not be a chance for this rat to slip through our hands."

"I can raise forty men within two hours," cried the sheriff. "Guess my job will be a bit safer if I can capture this rustler. It does look as if Harris is the man. Here's a map."

When everything was arranged to their satisfaction, Tracy announced that he would be getting back to the Diamond Bar.

"Harris might try some rough stuff with old man Williams," he stated. "A lot of the Diamond Bar men are trust-worthy, but they're scared of Harris. Heine's got a torch, and he'll flash it three times from Cactus Bluff when the rustlers are on the move. See you later, sheriff."

At a canter Bill went to the ranch, but he would have made it a wild gallop if he had known that Betty was in danger.

For a long time Buck Harris had admired the boss' daughter, and he had kidded himself that it would be easy enough to win her. Buck thought himself a very handsome man, and that any girl would fall for him, but when Tracy had appeared on the scene he knew he definitely took second place. But Harris was determined not to lose the girl. He would carry her over the border with him into Mexico, and there she would soon forget Bill Tracy.

Harris got rid of the boss by getting one of his men to spin a yarn that a well was poisoned and several cattle dying. Would the boss go out at once to see the mischief? With the master out of the way, Harris brazenly walked round to the private quarters of the daughter.

When Harris walked into her room the girl was most indignant.

"Don't you usually knock" she said coldly. "What do you want?"

"You!" Buck grinned evilly. "I wanna take you for a nice little ride. You see, kid, I've kinda fallen for you, and for a long spell I've had a mind to make you my wife."

"Your wife?" Betty was on her feet. Her face was white with anger. "Are you mad, or have you been drinking?"

"Neither, Betty," was the calm reply. "I'm beating it into Mexico before nightfall, and I want you to come with me."

"You're crazy. I'll call my father."
"He's out looking at a well that's supposed to be poisoned and isn't." Harris laughed at his cleverness. "The only folk around here are several of my boys—the rest I've sent off repairing boundary fences. You can scream if you like, but that won't stop me taking you with me. Are you coming quietly, or must I carry you off by force? I like 'em wild, so I can tame them."

Buck Harris struggled for a moment and then sagged under the strength of those strong arms.

The girl edged towards the window. Everything that the foreman was saying must be true. She had always hated and mistrusted this man, and now she saw him in his true colours.

Suddenly the girl turned and made a wild rush for the open window.

"Oh, no, you don't!" cried Buck, and dragged her back as she tried to scramble over the ledge.

"Dad! Dad!" she cried. "Bill! Bill!"

"Call him, and it may mean his death!" the brute mocked. "Tracy is out, but should he come back and hear your call he will come straight here, and I shall shoot him."

But when Harris tried to fold the girl in his arms and kiss her, then did fear make her cry:

"Bill! Bill!"

The cry was heard, and the youngster fairly leaped from his horse. He had just ridden in, and wondered at the strange silence; then came Betty's shout for help.

When the door burst open Buck Harris tried to get at his gun, but Betty seized his wrist. Bill covered the man.

"Throw that gun down, you snake!" he ordered. "Now, you're going to get the hiding you deserve, rustler. Oh, yes, I'm wise to your game. When your men drive the horses to the border they will walk into the hands of Sheriff Kilne, just as you have walked into mine."

"Curso you!" snarled Buck Harris, and flung the gun to the floor. "Suppose you're going to show off on a defenceless man. You wouldn't dare fight me without a gun in your hand."

Calmly Bill pouched his revolver, and Buck Harris' eyes lit up. He was the best bruiser for miles around, and no man had ever dared to stand up to him; he could whip this stripling with one hand. He believed in the first blow and a surprise. Like lightning he flashed a right to Bill's ribs, and the youngster went down. Betty uttered a cry of fright, but Bill was up in a flash.

Betty's sitting-room was soon in a sorry state, because Harris tried every trick he knew. When he found boxing got him nowhere he picked up a vase and hurled it at his enemy. Bill had to dodge flying missiles of all descriptions.

Once, after a hand-to-hand struggle in which both men got their shirts half ripped from their backs, Harris broke free and tried to get to his fallen pistol. How he yelled when Bill's foot came down on his fingers!

Struggling fiercely, they crashed into Betty's desk and fought amidst books, pens and papers. They completely wrecked the desk. How Betty rejoiced to see that her lover was slowly gaining the upper hand and that Harris was puffing with exhaustion. Bill landed a fierce upper-cut to the rustler's chin and the scoundrel crashed backwards, but the man was game. From the floor he grabbed a broken vase, and it missed Tracy's head by inches.

"You swine!" cried Bill, and jumped on his man.

Over and over they rolled, with Bill straining every muscle to pin Harris to the ground. The rustler got his feet round the table and dragged that over on top of them. This ruse managed to gain for him his freedom, and he scrambled to his feet. Now the bully was scared and desperate.

July 14th, 1931.

Bill rushed towards him, and then Harris made his final bid. Small rugs covered the floor, which Betty had polished and stained herself. Thus was the floor somewhat slippery, and in a flash Harris gripped a rug and heaved.

The youngster's legs shot from under him, he strove to regain his balance, to finally crash on to his back and hit his head an awful crack against the edge of the table. The blow completely knocked him out.

Buck Harris stood there panting, too exhausted to act for a moment, but when Betty again edged to the window he sprang forward and gripped her.

"Tracy's dead and now you're mine," he cried, and swung her up in his arms. "You're going to Mexico with me."

A shrill whistle brought several of his men on the scene. They had been hiding near a rocky bluff within hailing distance of the ranch.

"The sheriff is out after us," yelled Harris as he held the struggling girl. He placed her on her feet, but cruelly gripped her arm. "Keep quiet, darn yer."

"The sheriff after us," cried Blackie. "What—"

"Go find the rest of the boys and warn them of the danger," ordered the rustler. "You've got the horses in Last Valley." Blackie nodded. "Drive them through the other pass when it's dark and don't make any noise; let some of you cover the flanks. You should be close to the border before that fool sheriff gets wind of you, because he'll be watching everywhere but the Last Valley. And if he did watch the end he knew he wouldn't see much, because Tracy never knew there was a smaller valley further down and nearer the border. I've finished Tracy, got the girl, and so everything's fine."

"What ye gonna do with the gal?" cried Blackie. "Women have caused ruin to more than—"

"Do as you are told!" blazed Buck Harris. "I will deal with the girl and meet you on the other side of the border."

When the rustlers had disappeared Harris swept the girl up in his arms and strode towards the big tree with the overhanging branches. Under its shelter a two-horse buckboard was hitched.

Harris freed the horses, pushed the girl towards the driver's seat, and clambered up beside her. She tried to wriggle free, and he grabbed her in a fierce clutch close to his shoulder, whilst his other hand urged the horses to a trot.

Betty screamed with fright, and the name she called was: "Bill! Bill!"

Harris laughed his scorn and urged the animals to a gallop.

He did not know that Bill Tracy was only dazed and was at that moment rubbing a sore and aching head. The youngster heard the shout and lurched to his feet.

A Daring Leap.

BILL TRACY dashed some water in his face and felt revived. The open air soon brought him back his strength, especially now that he knew Betty was in dire peril.

One leap and he was on the back of his trusty animal. Deep wheel marks and a cloud of dust made the trail easy, and at full gallop he raced to the rescue.

As he rode Bill vaguely wondered whether Heino would have seen the change of plans of the rustlers and warned the sheriff. The two queer friends had found out the rest of the secret of Last Valley only the previous evening, and Bill suspected that Harris would attempt the narrow cleft for the final round-up. But his chief worry now was the buckboard ahead.

Buck Harris had a good start, and the two horses were fresh. Soon the trail would become narrow and winding along a rocky ravine, and if Harris had a rifle there would be little chance of overtaking him. For Betty's sake he must not give Harris an opportunity of shooting him; could he get the man by surprise?

Buck Harris had heard the sound of pounding hoofs and had guessed who pursued. The foreman cruelly lashed out the galloping horses, whilst Betty clung to the rocketing seat of the buckboard.

A bullet whined over Bill's head, and he knew that his enemy had a rifle. At once he swerved from the trail and put a daring idea into force.

The dusty road soon would be lost in the twisty canyon, and it was possible to cross a lofty mesa, jump a small stream, and work his way to a spot that overlooked the road. The horse cantered sure-footed over the difficult ground, and soon Bill was making his way down a slope back to the trail. If he failed his chances of stopping Harris were gone, as the road passed between two lakes and eventually came to the pass through the foothills to the border.

Bill flung himself out of the saddle and raced to the edge. Already the approaching buckboard could be heard, and the youngster tensed himself for a hazardous leap. The drop must be twenty feet, and no mean task when you aim to hit a fast-moving objective.

With arms raised to maintain his balance, Bill Tracy hesitated on the very edge, and when Harris appeared he made the brave leap. On hands and knees he landed in the swaying buckboard, and he had to clutch the sides to prevent himself from being whirled overboard.

Harris had a vague impression of something flashing through the air, and not till he heard the crash of Tracy's fall did he guess what had happened. His gun was half out of its holster when Bill reached him.

With the rocketing buckboard swaying from side to side, completely out of control, there was fought a fierce battle. Harris kicked and scratched, tried to free his gun arm, but all in vain. A hard punch caught the rascal a terrible blow on the mouth, and next moment he was dragged backwards.

Betty, seeing her sweetheart alive, awoke from her daze of fear and grabbed at the reins. Her strong wrists strained at the runaways, and slowly their mad gallop eased.

The two men had almost gone over the tail when Betty dragged the frightened horses to a halt, then she dared to look round.

Bill, afire with fierce rage, was flinging his fists into the rustler's face. Harris lashed out with a heavy boot, and the blow caught the younger man on the ankle. He had to relax his grip, and Harris wriggled free, but only for a moment. As the rascal jumped to his feet and made to leap off the buckboard Tracy shot out a hand and seized his ankle.

Harris staggered, lost his balance, and hit the driver's seat a mighty crash with the back of his head. Bill had got to his feet and now dived like a rugger star at the half-dazed rustler, who struggled for a moment and then sagged under the strength of those strong arms.

(Continued on page 28.)

"THE LAST PARADE."

(Continued from page 12.)

was not till early in the evening that he reached the house in Brooklyn. Molly found him in the drawing-room when she reached home from the office where she worked, and he, having had plenty of time for reflection, was beginning to wonder whether he had done a wise thing in defying Cookie.

"There's something on your mind, Larry," she said, studying his troubled face. "Why have you come here? And what is it?"

"Nothing," growled Larry. "Leave me alone—it's nothing!"

A knock at the front door startled both of them. Molly ran out into the little hall, and Larry nervously followed her.

She admitted Cookie, stern of face and carrying a newspaper in his hand; and behind Cookie stood Lefty.

"You fathead!" shouted Cookie wrathfully, thrusting the special edition of the "Herald" under Larry's nose. "What did you want to print this story for?"

"Well," replied Larry defensively, "it was a great story. And, besides, what a chance it was to tell that old bald-head where to head in."

"I've got a good mind to sock you right on the nose!" roared Cookie. "Get packed!"

"What for?"

"I'm buying you a one-way ticket to California."

"What are you going to do—put me in the movies?"

"I'll move you!" roared Cookie. "Get packed! Lefty, go with him, and when he's ready, take him down the back way. Idiot!"

Lefty went off with the crestfallen young man. Molly, clinging to Cookie's arm, faltered:

"Oh, what is it, Cookie? What has he done?"

"Plenty!" was the gruff reply. "But don't worry—he'll be all right."

"Oh, if anything should happen to Larry, I'll never—"

"Nothing's going to happen to him," declared Cookie. "Will you leave it to me, please?"

The door-hell rang. It was Mike—Mike in a state of trepidation.

"Where's Larry?" he demanded as he stepped into the hall.

"Packing," replied Cookie. "I'm keeping him under cover for a couple of days, and then get him out of town."

"You beat me to it," growled Mike. "Good for you!"

"Oh, what's it all about?" cried Molly. "What are you hiding him away for? Oh, what has he done?"

"He's just too good a newspaperman," replied Mike, "that's all."

And he flung down a copy of the newspaper he himself was carrying.

"I'm glad you're here, Cookie," he went on. "I want to talk to you. Wait a minute, Molly—I guess this is just as important to you as anybody else. I went down to headquarters this afternoon—to resign."

Molly stared. Cookie bit his lip.

"What for?" he inquired, though he guessed.

"Because I can't be on the level with them and you, too. I'm through with playing both ends against the middle. Cookie, you're the greatest guy I know—I think more of you than anyone in the world. That's why I took the shock for you this morning."

"What do you mean?" growled Cookie.

"You know what I mean. I was down there. I could have seen everything. I could have put my hand on you—but I didn't!"

"You don't have to give me any breaks."

"You gave me a break in France—and lost an eye doing it," declared Mike with emotion.

"I see," drawled Cookie. "An eye for an eye, eh?"

"No—a neck for an eye. But now we're quits."

"Okay, we're quits," nodded Cookie. "So that's that."

"That's not all. This afternoon, instead of resigning, I was made captain in charge of the Homicide Squad. Donovan, as he handed me the shield, said 'Fine work, O'Dowd—and you're going to do still better in this new line of action. I'm banking on you, boy.' I didn't resign—so you know what that means!"

"Friendship ceases, eh?" grunted Cookie, pacing the carpet, and he looked across at Molly's worried face with a rueful grin. "Okay!"

"I don't want that to happen," insisted Mike. "So I'm asking you for the last time to quit the racket—to get out while you're still ahead of the game."

"But I'm not ahead—I haven't even started. There's no telling where I'll stop."

"I know where you'll stop," said Mike sternly. "'X' marks the spot!"

"Aw, go and lay an egg," growled Cookie, and strode towards the door. But Molly flew after him, pulled him back.

"Oh, can't you see he's right, Cookie?" she cried. "Can't you see it? You're losing the best friend you ever had. He can't be true to you and his principles, too. And you're not the only one involved—Larry's mixed up in it now."

"Never mind about the kid," said Cookie reassuringly. "I'll see him through."

"Oh, but I'm worrying about you, too," she pleaded. "Get out of this deadly game before it's too late, Cookie."

Tears were streaming down her cheeks, and he wanted badly to take her in his arms and comfort her; but he would not give in.

"I told you I'd pull out if you'd give me a little time," he said obstinately, "but I can't quit now. It's you I'm thinking of all the time—I want to give you everything in the world."

"There's only one thing I want," she said, holding his hands and looking up at him through her tears. "The thing that every woman wants—a sense of security—a husband she can look up to. She wants to feel, if she has children, that she won't have to wonder every day if their father's coming home, or if she'll have to go down to the morgue to bring him home. She—"

"All right, Molly, I'll pull out. Give me six months!"

"No!" she cried. "No!"

"Well, six weeks—a month."

"No," she repeated. "I'll give you just one more day. I'll give you till to-morrow."

"To-morrow? Why to-morrow?"

"We said we three would always stick together, and to-morrow's Armistice Day. Mike and I will be marching in the parade. Will you be with us?"

"Oh, what do parades mean to me?" he said impatiently.

"This one will mean something to you," she told him eagerly. "If you march with us to-morrow, we'll know you've quit the racket. We'll declare an armistice all round, and I'll listen to anything you want to ask me. What do you say, Cookie?"

"Yes, come on, Cookie," urged Mike, clapping him on the back. "Join the parade!"

"Aw, I've seen my last parade," growled Cookie, and left them without another word.

With Marino's Compliments!

NEXT morning an Armistice parade took place in the streets of the city, with bands playing and flags waving—a parade that almost recaptured the old war-time fervour.

Comrades of the distant days marched side by side; soldiers, naval ratings, nurses, gathered together, as far as possible, in their old companies, regiments, or units, some in uniform, some in mufti.

Molly, in her nurse's garb, marched beside Mike and others that she knew, though she protested that she ought to get back to her own outfit. But Cookie was not there, and several of the men who had fought with him commented on his absence.

"I'm afraid he's busy," Mike told them.

The procession passed up Broadway, and the enthusiastic noise of it reached Cookie's private office above the restaurant in Eighth Avenue. Larry was there, virtually a prisoner in Lefty's care; Cookie himself was busy at his desk.

"What the Sam Hill is this?" complained Larry. "A gaol? When are you going to put me on the train?"

"I'll tell you when," snapped Cookie. "I'm doing your thinking from now on!"

Alabam's black face appeared in the doorway.

"What's all da choutin' about, boss?" he inquired.

"It's the parade," replied Larry instead of Cookie. "It's Armistice Day."

"Armistice Day?" echoed Alabam. "Wonder if Marino knows about dat?"

The music of the band came nearer and consequently louder. Alabam moved across the big room and opened a window. Larry, close behind him, cried:

"Here they come, right by us! Come and look, Cookie! Gee, don't they look great? Kinda gets under your skin, don't it, old man?"

Cookie stood by the window looking wistfully down at the marching columns, his lips compressed, a curious expression in his sound eye.

"Hi, Cookie, isn't that your old outfit?" exclaimed Larry, pointing. "Sure it is! There's Mike—and Molly's with him! They're marching together. Gee, I bet they wish you were there!"

Cookie suddenly swung round, made for his desk, and from one of its drawers fished out his old army cap.

"Lefty," he said, "make it three tickets to California—get 'em right away, and meet me here after the parade."

"What are you going to do?" demanded Larry.

"Do?" cried Cookie, in a voice that rang with jubilation. "I'm going to join the parade!"

He raced out and down the stairs; he shoved his way through the crowd and scampered after the men of his own regiment, shouting like a schoolboy.

"Hallo, Cookie!" greeted some of his old comrades; and then he was beside Molly, and had slipped his arm through hers. Mike let go of her other arm and reached his hand across to grip Cookie's free one. Molly's face was radiant; this must mean that Cookie was going to quit the racket!

"Molly," said he, as they marched, "how would you like to live in an orange grove?"

"In California?" she breathed. "I'd love it!"

"And we'd send Mike a big box of lemons every Christmas!"

He burst into that war-time ditty, "I don't want to get well," singing at the top of his voice; and all the men around him elined in with: "I'm in love with a beautiful nurse!"

After it was all over, Mike went back to duty, Molly went home to pack—and Cookie returned to his restaurant to make arrangements for the long journey.

He found Lefty in his office with the tickets. He had left Larry with Alabam in the apartment above it.

Cookie indulged in an orgie of destruction, so far as personal papers were concerned, and he almost convinced Lefty that he had taken leave of his senses by announcing:

"The café and the rest of the junk is yours, Lefty. Give Alabam a good break—he's not a bad chap. You can take over the mob, if you want to, but I think you're a fool if you do. Why don't you pull out, same as I'm doing?"

"You can't pull out," declared Lefty. "Gee, I don't know what to say about what you're doin' for me, but once you're in the racket, you die in it. Something always happens."

"Always singing the blues!" jeered Cookie. "I'm pulling out, ain't I?"

Molly arrived in a taxi, with hat-boxes and suitcases, some hours later, and ascended to the office. Cookie waved the strip of tickets at her.

"Hallo, babe!" he cried. "All set?"

"All set," she replied gladly. "Oh, Cookie, it's almost too good to be true!"

"But it is true!" he laughed gleefully. "And how!"

"I'm still afraid something may happen. I'm not going to let you out of my sight for one minute till that train leaves!"

"And I'm not going to let you out of my sight for the rest of my natural life!" he retorted. "Now will you quit worrying? When I say I'm through, I'm through."

He turned to Lefty.

"Go up to the apartment and bring the kid down here, will you?" he said.

Lefty departed, and Cookie grabbed Molly in his arms and kissed her.

Down at the back door of the restaurant a motor-lorry drew up noisily, and one of Marino's men jumped down from it and made his way to the kitchen.

"Got some meat for you, buddy," he said to the white-clad chef.

"All right," replied that worthy "Bring it in."

Cookie employed a considerable number of men about the premises—men who carried guns in their pockets and kept their eyes open. One of them promptly darted upstairs to the office, knocked at the door, and entered.

"Chief," he said nervously, "one of Marino's trucks has just pulled up in the alley."

"Oh, that's all right!" said Cookie calmly. "I ordered some beef from him yesterday."

The man went out, and Cookie said to Molly:

"Let's telephone Mike and have him over for a farewell party!"

"Oh, I wish we could," said Molly. "But he's on duty to-night. He's seeing us off on the train, though."

"He's sure one swell guy," quoth Cookie.

Lefty opened the door, and his face was white.

July 15th, 1951.

"Oh, chief," he said hoarsely, "can I see you a minute?"

"Right," responded Cookie. "I'll be back in a minute, Molly." He joined Lefty on the landing and closed the door. "What's the matter?" he inquired.

"The kid wasn't upstairs—nor Alabam neither. And that beef—"

Cookie gave him one startled glance, then went rushing down to the kitchen with Lefty at his heels.

The kitchen staff had uncovered the alleged beef—and covered it up again in haste. They and the chef were standing by the big table looking at one another in horror as Cookie and Lefty burst in upon them.

No need to ask questions. Lefty pulled back the muslin covering, pointed to a tab.

"Compliments of Marino," he said gruffly. "It's the kid!"

Cookie looked down at the still form in its shroud, his face working.

"Take care of him, Lefty," he said, closing his eyes—the one that could see this dreadful thing and the one that could not. "I'm going to take care of Marino!"

He went back to Molly, and she, studying his face, faltered:

"Cookie, what is it? Is it something about Larry?"

"It's something I've got to do," he said grimly. "I want you to wait here."

He shut her in, and rushed up to his own deserted apartment, where into a leather bag he tumbled a portable machine-gun and bands of cartridges. He would need the "typewriter," he decided, as well as the guns he carried in his pockets!

The Last Parade!

MOLLY did not remain in the office for long. She went out on to the landing, calling his name, then sped down to the restaurant looking for him. The place was full of customers and the orchestra was playing a gay quick-step, but there was no sign of Cookie. She opened a side door leading to the kitchen, but two men were guarding the passage.

"Where did Mr. Leonard go?" she asked them anxiously.

"I don't know, miss," replied one. "But you can't go in there, because that's the kitchen."

She went back to the office, dreadfully afraid that something was horribly wrong. The office was deserted. It hardly seemed likely to her that Cookie would have gone up to his apartment, but she ascended to it.

Cookie had slipped out while she was in the restaurant, and the rooms were deserted—except that, in one of the bedrooms, Alabam lay on the floor in a pool of his own blood!

Resisting an almost overwhelming impulse to shriek, she tottered out to the stairs and down into the office. There she fought for a measure of self-possession, and finally picked up the telephone. She rang up Police Headquarters and asked for Mike, and eventually into Mike's startled ear she poured her story.

"Where are you now?" he inquired. "Oh—well, listen; don't get excited. You just stay right where you are, and I'll call you again as soon as ever I can."

In a very few minutes Mike had issued an urgency call to several stations and rounded up a number of his own men, uniformed and plain-clothed. They crowded into cars, carrying rifles; and the cars shot off down-town, following the one in which he himself rode with three detectives.

"Well, Mike," said one of the three as they careered through the lighted streets, "what's the dope?"

"We're bringing somebody in," replied Mike briefly.

"Who?"

"Marino—for murder!"

"Say, who are we protecting?" growled the detective. "Marino, or Cookie?"

Cookie had already reached the high wooden gates of the Three Star Packing Company's premises, but they were closed and locked. He was meditating a difficult climb, cumbered with the heavy bag, when a motor-lorry came rumbling along. It was the one in which the body of Larry had been conveyed to the restaurant!

Cookie shrank back into the shadows while the lorry stopped outside the gates and a man sitting beside the driver jumped down to unlock them. Then, without the slightest hesitation, he hoisted himself over the tail-board into the back of the vehicle, and presently was carried into the yard.

The two men descended, opened a door of the warehouse, and disappeared. They had gone to report to Marino, who was waiting in the downstairs office.

Cookie waited till their footsteps had died away, then clambered down from the lorry and reached up for the bag. He took out the portable machine-gun and waited.

After a while Marino came out from the warehouse, making all unsuspectingly for the gates and the street. He reached the lorry, and from behind it Cookie suddenly pounced on him, seized him by the throat.

"I've come to return the compliment," he snarled between his teeth. "Do you still weigh a hundred and sixty-eight pounds, Marino? Well, here's where you take on those two extra pounds!"

He sent Marino floundering backwards against the warehouse door and snatched up the machine-gun. It spat fire.

Not very long afterwards the police cars arrived outside the building, which was surrounded. Mike, with four plain-clothes men, made for the big gates, but again they were shut and fastened. Three of the detectives helped the fourth to climb over the top, and he admitted the rest. They streamed across the yard and were followed by uniformed policemen.

Mike and his companions entered the warehouse, flashing electric torches about its darkness. A ray of light illuminated eareases hanging on hooks, and came to rest upon a Toledo weighing-machine, from the hook of which a human body was hanging. It was the dead body of Marino!

"Too late!" exclaimed a detective.

"I'll say we are," lamented Mike.

"That's Cookie's work," declared another, "and he must be in here, somewhere."

"He's in here all right," barked a third. "Come on!"

They proceeded through the packing department to the plainly furnished office, switching on lights as they went. The imitation safe door stood wide, and they plunged through the opening and mounted the stairs.

Outside the closed door above the stairs they stopped short. A thin line of light showed beneath the door—a tell-tale line of light.

"He's in here," whispered a detective triumphantly, and raised his voice. "Cookie," he shouted, "we've got you covered—come on out!"

"Come in and get me!" defied the voice of Cookie from Marino's sumptuously furnished room.

(Continued from page 2.)

The detective looked round at Mike—head of the Homicide Squad, but friend of Cookie.

"It's Cookie," he said. "We've got him cornered. Well, what are we going to do now, Mike?"

Mike was leaning gloomily against the wall, but at that challenge he stepped resolutely forward.

"There's only one thing to do," he said heavily. "We're cops, aren't we?" And he faced the door.

"Careful, Mike," warned one of the men. "He's got a typewriter—and he sure knows how to use it!"

"I know he does," responded Mike. And then: "Cookie! This is Mike. I'm coming in to get you!"

"You'd better not try it, Mike," warned Cookie.

But Mike had made up his mind, and nothing could stop him now.

"Here I come!" he announced, and with that he burst the door open and stepped into the big room.

Cookie was standing by Marino's desk with the portable machine-gun to his shoulder, but he did not fire. Instead, he grinned.

"Put that typewriter down, Cookie!" commanded Mike.

"All right, Mike," responded Cookie cheerfully, and laid the formidable weapon on the desk. "It's written the only name I ever wanted it to write," he said quite cheerfully, and advanced with outstretched wrists to be handcuffed.

As a result of the trial which followed some weeks later, Cookie was sentenced to be electrocuted. Money was not spared in his defence, and the plea was put forward that he had rid the city of a dangerous gangster; but neither the money nor the plea was of any avail: Cookie himself was a gangster, as the prosecution pointed out—and he had committed murder.

At a quarter to four on a brilliant summer morning Mike and Molly came to bid him a last farewell—he was to go to the electric chair at four o'clock. A warden admitted them to his cell, and Molly clung to him, weeping.

The warden appeared, and a priest, who was present, looked sadly at the condemned man. From the cell to the room of execution was only a little way down a wide corridor.

"Aw, cheer up, Mike!" said Cookie, holding his head erect. "It only happens once in a lifetime. All set, Father!"

"Oh, Cookie!" wept Molly. "What are you shaking for, baby?" said Cookie gruffly. "Come on—pull yourself together!"

He turned to the warden. "Say, how about that last request stuff?" he asked. "Does it still go?"

"Anything within reason," responded the warden, considerably moved by this pitiful leave-taking.

"These are two pals of mine," said Cookie. "We've been on many a march together. How about letting them walk with me—to that door? Just as far as that door?"

"I guess it'll be all right," was the reply.

"Thanks," said Cookie gratefully. "Come on, soldiers—we're holding up the parade!"

And so, with Mike on his right and Molly on his left, his arms round both their shoulders, Cookie marched bravely in his last parade.

(By permission of Columbia Pictures and United Artists' Corporation, Ltd., featuring Jack Holt, Constance Cummings, and Tom Moore.)

quick gun-work and excellent riding made him a big favourite with lovers of cowboy pictures. He had been a real cowboy at one time, and for some time after his temporary retirement from pictures he settled down on his ranch.

Then, following the example of a few other "old-timers," he returned to studio work, and before long will be seen by his many admirers in this country in "The Vanishing Legion." It is a twelve part all talking serial and the first in which he has appeared, for all his former plays were short, complete dramas. Among the cast will be Rex, the horse, and Frankie Darro, the popular juvenile player.

Answers to Questions.

Besides "Dynamite," in which you saw Charles Bickford, T.H. (Blackburn), he has also appeared in "Anna Christie" and "The Sea Bat." He was born in Cambridge, Ohio, and is 6ft. in height, with red hair and blue eyes. He began his screen career in 1928.

Here are two of the casts you want, D.S. (Bath). "Song of the West": John Boles (Stanton), Vivienne Segal (Virginia), Joe E. Brown (Hasty), Marie Wells (Lotta), Sam Hardy (Davolo), Marion Byron (Penny), Eddie Gribbon (Sergeant-major), Ed Martindel (Colonel), Rudolph Cameron (Singleton). "The Ship from Shanghai": Conrad Nagel (Howard Vazey), Kay Johnson (Dorothy Daley), Carmel Myers (Viola Thorpe), Holmes Herbert (Paul Thorpe), Louis Wolheim (Ted), Zeffie Tilbury (Lady Daley), Ivan Linow (Pete), Jack McDonald (Reid). Greta Garbe was born on September 18th, 1906, Conrad Nagel on March 16th, 1896 and John Boles on October 28th, 1900.

Yes, there are two artists on the screen named William Boyd, Arthur (Portsmouth). The one you saw in "The First Command." is now known as Bill Boyd to save confusion with his namesake, who was for some years on the stage and not very long ago made his film debut in "The Locked Door." Bill Boyd was born in Cambridge, Ohio, on June 5th, 1898, is 6ft. in height and has blond hair and blue eyes. William Boyd, who does not give his age or birthplace, is 5ft. 10½ in. in height and has brown hair and blue eyes. Thanks for your appreciation of the "B.C." I hope your charm is now ordering it for himself, for I am glad to hear that he also likes it.

Only recent numbers of this paper are obtainable, J.N.V.R. (Mooreburg), as not more than three months' issues are kept in stock. The price of a single copy is 3d. post free, and you should write to the BOY'S CINEMA, Back Numbers Dept., Bear Alley, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. The cast of "The Blue Eagle" is as follows: George O'Brien (George D'Arcy), Janet Gaynor (Rose Cooper), Robert Edeson (Father Joe), William Russell (Big Tim Ryan), David Butler (Nick Galvani), Phillip Foyd (Limpy), Ralph Sipperly (Slate Mulligan), Margaret Livingston (Mary Rohan), Harry Tenbrook (Bascom), Lew Short (Captain McCarthy), Jerry, the Giant (Baby Tom). Among the films in which George O'Brien has appeared are "The Man Who Came Back," "Noah's Ark," "Blindfold," "Honour Bound," "Fair Warning," "The Last Warning" and "The Seas Beneath."

Though I am pleased to hear, Charlie (Graveley), of the successes you have scored in amateur plays produced locally, I fear you will find it extremely difficult just now to impress film producers. They are deluged week after week with applications from artistes who have professional experience and yet cannot get parts. However, if you like to try there are the British International Pictures Studios in Shenley Road, Flstree, Herts.

Yes, Buck Jones, you will be glad to know, Alice (London, E.), is still acting for the films. His latest films have appeared in the "B.C." in story form.

THREE COMPLETE FILM NOVELS.

"SEED."
The moving story of a mother who gives up all for her family, putting their happiness before her own to the end.

"THE BLUE MONKEY."
Forced by financial circumstances to the last resource, Elaine is compelled to degrade herself as a danseuse at a notorious underworld haunt, but fate lifts its hand and love and happiness triumph. Starring Evelyn Holt and Rene Navarre.

John Boles and Lois Wilson in "Seed."

"GRUMPY."
A sensational comedy of robbery, detection and love. Starring Cyril Maude.

All these splendid film stories are complete in this week's issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY.

PRICE 2d.

July 18th, 1931.

"BREED OF THE WEST."

(Continued from page 18.)

and not to fight. But Wally brought him to his knees with a shattering right, and, whining, the foreman held up his arm in a gesture of surrender.

Wally was aware of the sound of hoofbeats as he stood over Longrope, and guessed that the sheriff and his posse had arrived. Nor was he mistaken, for a few seconds later the officers of the law came tramping into the study.

The sheriff looked at the grovelling forms on the floor.

"Pretty nice bunch o' scum," he commented, and then, to the colonel: "Well, it don't look as though there's much left for me and the posse to do around here—except use the manacles."

"No, sheriff," old Sterner agreed. "I guess Wally has got the job pretty nearly finished."

The sheriff glanced sidelong at the young cowboy, who had moved over to where Betty was standing.

"That's the breed of the West, colonel," the sheriff drawled. "He'll make good at anything. All right, boys," he added to his deputies, "get these guys outa here. And say, colonel, are any more of your men mixed up in this?"

Old Sterner shrugged his shoulders. "I don't know," he answered. "After the eye-opener I've had with Longrope, I can expect almost anything. I had all the confidence in the world in Longrope."

"Well, 'twas misplaced," the sheriff observed. "He's been carryin' on a private business in cattle-rustlin' for a twelvemonth, and he's wanted for a killin'. But come on, colonel, let's go out and look over the rest of your hands."

The posse filed out with their prisoners, followed by the colonel and the sheriff. Wally and Betty were left alone, and there was none to see them when he took her in his arms and kissed her, for by that time the colonel and his companions were thirty or forty paces from the house.

Movements in the vicinity of the well attracted the colonel's attention, and, together with the sheriff and two or three of the posse, he made his way in its direction. Shorty was standing there with young Jim, and as the colonel and his party were drawing near a damp head came into view above the parapet. It was the head of Art, the first of Shorty's victims.

"Oh, how I'd like to sock you one," Shorty was wishing to say. "An' I'm gonna get my wish."

He punctuated the words with a stroke of the cudgel, and the head of Art dropped out of sight.

"Say, what you got down there, Shorty?" the sheriff inquired, striding to the little puncher's side.

"A quartet," was the answer. The sheriff looked puzzled.

"A quartet?" he echoed. "What kind of animal is that?"

"Have a look and see," Shorty advised, and the sheriff peered into the depths of the well and made out the

All the biggest and best films in story form appear in
"BOY'S CINEMA"
 AND
"SCREEN STORIES."
 Order your copies NOW!

figures of the four gangsters clinging to a rope from which a water-bucket was suspended.

They were raised by the winch, and reached firm ground both drenched and dazed, with not an ounce of resistance left in them; and some time later, with Longrope and his entire band of ruffians as captives, the sheriff and his posse set forth along the Anarillo trail.

Old Colonel Sterner watched them till a bend in the road took them out of his sight. Then he turned towards the ranch-house—and at the window of his study saw Wally and Betty in each other's arms.

A slow smile played around the rancher's mouth.

"Breed of the West," he murmured. "Yep, that boy Wally sure is."

(By permission of Filmophone Renters, Ltd., starring Wally Wales and Virginia Browne Faire.)

"SOUTH OF SONORA."

(Continued from page 24.)

"I've got him this time, Betty," panted Bill. "All the fight's knocked out of the skunk. Give me his belt, lass, and I'll strap his wrists against further mischief."

Then Bill brought his horse down the bank, and with Betty driving the buckboard, they retraced their steps. Not far did they go when a number of horse-men appeared, and Bill saw the sheriff and Heine Selnmultz.

"Your pal warned us," said the sheriff. "And I got my men hidden just in time. They walked straight into us, and when we appeared they gave in without firing a shot. Gee, so you've got Buck. Guess this will clear up rustling in the South of Sonora."

"Yeah, I just pops out and says 'Hands up,' and dem bad men looked plum scared," laughed Heine. "I could have done it all, but all them prisoners would have made for me much troubles."

"Like mo to relieve you of Buck?" grunted the sheriff. "I won't be happy till this bunch are in the lock-up."

"That suits me," cried Bill, and he gave Selnmultz a meaning glance. "You can go with them. I've got important business to talk with Miss Betty."

An hour later an infuriated Williams returned after a fruitless ride, but his scowls changed to smiles when he heard of the capture of the rustlers. When Bill put his arm round Betty and the girl smiled her happiness, the old man looked even more pleased.

"Say, Bill, I don't know what kind of pay they give in the Cattlemen's Association," he hinted, with a sly wink.

"But I'm needing a foreman and a deputy, and maybe we'd see you don't lose by it. Sonora needs you, son—and that includes the little man."

"The pay don't mean so much, boss," Bill looked down at the girl. "It's up to a certain young person whether I hand in my resignation and stay right here—or not."

Of course Bill Tracy stayed. (By permission of Butcher's Film Service, Ltd., featuring Buffalo Bill Jun. and Betty Joy.)

SPURPROOF TENTS.

Guaranteed Reg.

Made from light-weight proofed material. Complete with three-piece jointed poles, pegs, guy lines, and brown valise. Weight 5 lbs. Size 6 ft. 6 ins. x 4 ft. 6 ins. x 3 ft. 6 ins. 12/3 With 6 in. wall and 3 in. eave. Accommodates three boys. Postage 9d. Special extra light-weight. Made from Egyptian Cotton. Same size. Weight 3 1/2 lbs. 13/6

Send for beautiful illustrated Camping List, post free.

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, NEW BRIDGE STREET, E.C.4.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-, Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

XMAS CLUBS

SPARE TIME AGENTS WANTED for Oldest, Largest, and BEST Club. Excellent Commission—no outlay. Art Catalogue Free with full particulars.

SAMUEL DRIVER LTD., Burton Road, LEEDS.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon St., London, E.C.4.

MY GREAT OFFER

Write for my free Bargain Lists of the best ALL BRITISH cycles. 14 DAYS' APPROVAL CARRIAGE PAID. Cash price £3 15s. 0d., or terms. All accessories FREE. Value 21/-.

Edw. Osrien THE WORLD'S LARGEST CYCLE DEALER, DEPT. 17 COVENTRY.

BE STRONG

I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Bashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-—STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

HANDSOME MEN ARE SLIGHTLY SUNBURNT. "SUNBRONZE" remarkably improved appearance. 1/6, 2/6, 7,000 Testimonials (Booklet, stamp).—Sunbronze Laboratories (Dept. A.7), Colwyn Bay, Wales. (Est. 1902.)

BLUSHING,

Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 6/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-), including Airpost. Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Engle Lane, L.E.E., Stourbridge.

Mitchell

Boy's Cinema

"THE MIDNIGHT SPECIAL"
and "THE SUNRISE TRAIL."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 606.

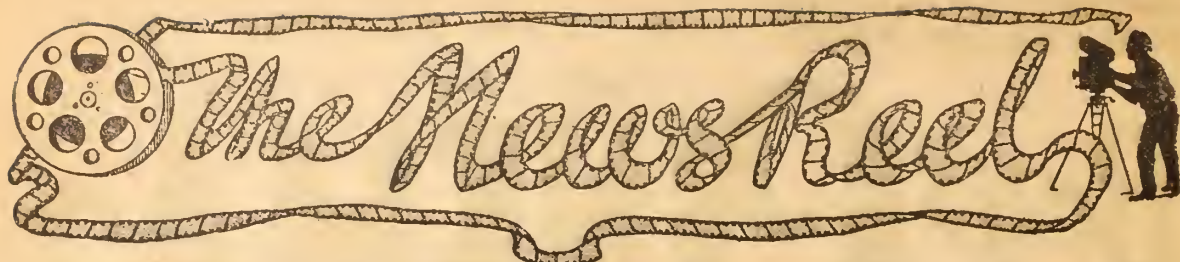

EVERY TUESDAY.

JULY 25th, 1931.

A gripping story of the Mounties.
Starring
BOB
CUSTER.

RIDERS OF THE NORTH

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Riders of the North."

Sergeant Ned Stone, Bob Custer; Ann, Blanche Mehaffey; Tim McGuire, Eddie Dunn; Tom, Buddy Shaw; Leclere, George Rigas; Inspector Devlin, William Walling; "The Parson," Frank Rice.

"The Midnight Special."

Gerald Boone, Glenn Tryon; Ellen Harboard, Merua Kennedy; Dan Paddon, Tom O'Brien; Mrs. Boone, Mary Carr; George Walton, Richard Kane; Billy Boone, Norman Phillips, junr.; Joe Lessing, Jimmy Aubrey.

"The Sunrise Trail."

Texas, Bob Steele; Goldie, Blanche Mehaffey; Kansas, Jack Clifford; French Sadie, Germaine de Neel; Raud Kennedy, Eddie Dunn; Sheriff, Fred Bunn.

"The Headless Man."

People in some of the streets of Los Angeles recently had the shock of their lives when they saw a headless man, walking nonchalantly along, carrying his head under his arm. When some of the feminine pedestrians felt on the verge of fainting from fright, the man turned about, and it was then seen that he had a big sign on his back which read:

"I Laughed My Head Off When I Saw Harold Lloyd in 'Feet First.'"

When people looked more closely they saw that the "head" which the man was carrying was made of papier mâché. His coat had been so made that the collar was level with the top of his head, and two small holes in the breast of his coat enabled the man to see where he was going.

To Film Bengal Tigers.

Ernest B. Schoedack is one of those men who love the jungle—for which picturegoers should be thankful. It was he who helped to film "Chang" during a stay of about eighteen months in a Siamese jungle, and later gave us "The Four Feathers," and more recently "Rango." For this last named picture he stayed over a year in the interior of Sumatra, where he risked his life repeatedly to obtain some amazing "shots" of tigers, apes, panthers, pythons and other jungle life for the film.

Now he has just set off again at the head of an expedition that will penetrate into the jungles of India. There, with sound cameras, he will conduct a hunt for Bengal tigers for the Paramount picture at present called "The Lives of a Bengal Lancer," and in which Clive Brook and Phillips Holmes will play the two principal dramatic rôles.

Car Crash at Dover.

Our British producers can, when required, stage a thrill just as effectively as their American colleagues. Mr. July 25th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S FOUR COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

BOB CUSTER

in

"UNDER TEXAS SKIES."

The girl owner of a horse ranch becomes the prey of a notorious band of rustlers, but a stranger comes to her aid and by amazing escapades turns the tables on her enemies.

"THE SPY."

A gripping drama of a young boy fighting to save his mother and father from the treachery of the secret police of their country. Starring Freddie Frederick, Kay Johnson and Neil Hamilton.

"FIREBRAND JORDAN."

The thrilling story of a daredevil ranger who is sent into the high Sierras to assist the local sheriff in capturing a mysterious band of counterfeiters. Featuring Lane Chandler, Sheldon Lewis and Yakima Canutt.

"MONSTERS OF THE DEEP."

The amazing exploits of a daring band of men in pursuit of the giant "devil" fish at Santa Margarita Island.

Walter Summers, of British International Pictures, is, for example, no new hand at the game of film thrills.

You will find a number of them in "The Flying Fool." Several, as the title implies, in the air, and one of the most recent, on the Dover road. It was on the last-named location that a Bentley car was sent crashing over a three-hundred foot cliff at St. Margaret's Bay.

The car, which had set up records on the Brooklands track, was secured, together with the services of two of Sir Henry Birkin's mechanics. To prevent the Bentley going off her course, a wooden track was laid down, as otherwise the lives of the cameramen, who stood at a vantage point for a close-up upon the edge of the cliff, would have been in danger. The gears of the car were then locked, and the engine warmed up until, at the word "Go," its brakes were released and the Bentley roared along the track.

Even the watchers of the scene felt the thrill as the car, having attained a speed of 72 miles an hour, shot over the edge of the cliff with the straightness of an arrow in flight, and then fell 300 feet below with a great and glorious crash. This was filmed by a second cameraman, and the sound of the crash was also recorded.

Two days had to be spent in waiting for the weather to be fine for the taking of this scene. A re-take was impossible if anything went wrong. Then the sun came out from behind a bank of clouds, and the Bentley was sent racing on its last journey over the cliff.

A Lucky Six-Year-Old.

Just as Jackie Coogan put his feet on the road to fame and fortune by his appearance in "The Kid," so another Jackie, with the surname of Cooper, has done the same by his remarkable performance in "Skippy."

Jackie Cooper is six years of age, but already he is to be paid a salary far larger than that received by the Prime Minister of England. Jackie's first two years with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer will bring him the nice sum of £20,000, with a bonus of £800.

In one other respect, too, he will be following in the footsteps of Jackie Coogan, for Jackie Cooper is to appear in a new version of "Oliver Twist," which starred the other Jackie some years ago. Each year, too, Jackie Cooper will have a three months' holiday, as provided in his contract. Well, I won't blame any of you for envying him!

Spoilt By An Ear.

The following is vouched for as a true story, though it has been thought best not to disclose the actor's name. He has often been seen on the screen in leading rôles as a romantic lover. Though he appears to have a head of heavy, thick hair, he is in reality bald, and, furthermore, his ears stick out very prominently. But they do not do this in his pictures, for he keeps his ears back by flattening them against his head with a combination of putty and glue. This little trick has usually been a success.

When one of this actor's recent pictures was being shown privately in the studio theatre, he saw to his dismay that, just as he was taking the heroine in his arms, one of his ears became unstick and jumped outwards like a signal.

"Hang it," yelled the actor from his seat, "there goes my ear."

The scene had, of course, to be taken again.

(Continued on page 25.)

Fur stealing in the North-West and how the Royal Canadian Mounted Police set out to capture a desperate band of outlaws. Starring Bob Custer.

The Fur Thieves.

"HAPPY lot of boys, Jones. Suggests the hunting has been good!"

"Sure, sergeant!"

"Better ride down and follow them up a bit. I'll keep the top trail. Meet you later on."

Trooper Jones, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, nodded and turned his horse from the edge of the cliff from which he and Sergeant Ned Stone had been watching.

Ned remained where he was for some minutes, listening eagerly enough to the musical voices of the happy go-lucky hunters who were canoeing their pelts towards the trading post.

There were two canoes, each of which contained two men. From his lofty perch, Ned could see the bundles of furs in the centres of the canoes—big bundles. He was too far up to recognise the returning hunters, but one of them, he could see, sported a big, black, pointed beard.

It was from his direction the most melodious singing came. His voice rose from the silvery lake, drifted through the softly murmuring pines, and gave added peace to the atmosphere of beauty and tranquility.

The work of the Mounted Police was not always pleasant, but in the present moment Sergeant Ned Stone found plenty to admire. The picturesque canoes, the fanciful clothes worn by the returning trappers, the gentle dipping of the paddles, the smell of the pines, and the singing all tended to the impression that here was nature at its very best.

It was with considerable reluctance that Ned turned his horse from the edge of the cliff and rode for the top trail down which he would slowly ride until he met Trooper Jones at the point where lower and upper trails met.

He did not know that he was being watched—that a man whom he would have recognised instantly as Tim McGuire, from the trading post, was mounted, silent as a statue, behind a thick, tall bush. The moment Ned had turned, however, McGuire swung his horse and rode in the opposite direction to that taken by the Red Coat, stopped twice to look down upon the canoes, and broke into a gallop as the singing stopped to permit the trappers to exchange farewells.

"See you down at the post!"

"In five days!"

"S'long!"

"S'long!"

And the canoe which contained the big, bearded man and his companion was paddled towards the lake edge, grounded, and dragged up into the undergrowth.

The two men had not explained why they had come ashore, but those that had gone on were pretty sure of the reason. The trappers had hidden away some of their earlier pelts, and this was a vantage-point for landing and hiding their canoe until such time as the skins could be fetched and added to the number in the canoe.

But it was destined that the hunters should not get very far that day, for scarcely had they turned their backs to the lake than a quiet, laughing voice broke upon them.

"Put your hands up, my frien's—it ces so much better for you!"

In a moment the trappers had reached for the skies, and their startled, angry eyes were staring down the muzzle of a rifle held easily in the hands of a French-Canadian they knew as Leclerc.

"What game you play, Leclerc?" demanded the bearded man angrily. "We are in a hurry!"

"So are we, my frien's," said Leclerc. "It ces getting very near selling time, and we have not the number of skins that we should like! Stand away from that canoe!"

The men obeyed—it was useless to argue. But their eyes burned fiercely as a man came from behind Leclerc and commenced pulling the skins from the canoe. It had taken them months of hard work and much travelling to obtain those skins, and the knowledge that they were being stolen from them just at a time when they were counting their profits was bitter.

"You cannot take them, Leclerc! We have just—" began the bearded hunter fiercely.

"No?" Leclerc laughed easily. "See—but I can! You take the rifle, my frien', and persuade our trappers to stay where they are for a few minutes—jus' while I show them that I can take the skins!"

And he laughed again as he handed over the rifle to his confederate, snatched at the bags containing the skins, and disappeared into the thick undergrowth.

He was still smiling as he burst into a hut that was half-hidden amidst the stately pines and flung the purloined skins into a far corner.

The hut was not empty. A youth was there, swaying unsteadily upon his feet, his face haggard and drawn, his eyes dulled by the amount of spirit he had consumed.

"I tell you I'm through with this!" he blurted out as Leclerc came in. "I did not know when I came out here that you and McGuire were thieves. You told me—"

"We told you that we knew where skins could be had for the peekin' up, my frien'," laughed Leclerc. "Well, is this jus' peekin' them up?"

"I'm through—I'm going back!" mumbled the youth. "The Red Coats are sure to find us one day—"

"Gettin' afraid, eh?" interrupted Leclerc.

Leclerc, and his eyes glistened. "We have a way of dealin' with—"

He broke off suddenly. From the distance sounded a shot, and an instant later there came the sharp snap of another shot. Then—silence.

"You heard that, Tom?" murmured Leclerc, a smile against the corners of his lips.

Tom scarcely seemed to hear. His dulled eyes were staring unblinkingly at the door, as though they would try and pierce the thick wood and ascertain exactly what had happened.

"They've—they've shot somebody!" he stuttered.

"Jus' two trappers who knew too much to be allowed to get away," commented Leclerc with a shrug of his shoulders. "Are you still leavin' us, Tom?"

Tom did not reply. He staggered to the table and gripped again the bottle from which he obtained so much mental relief. The spirit gave him courage, and Leclerc, watching him, half-closed his beady eyes as he saw Tom's lips setting obstinately.

"Yes, I'm through, and you are not going to stop me!" he snarled suddenly, and lurched towards the door.

But it was opened before he could reach it, and before even the watchful Leclerc could get there.

A moment later man and youth were staring at the red-coated form of Trooper Jones, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

"I heard a shot—what's up?" demanded Jones truculently.

His keen eyes roamed from the occupants of the hut to the bags of pelts.

"I told you I'n through—I told you they would come!" almost howled Tom. "You can't take me! I wanted to break away—"

"Here, not so fast!" growled Trooper Jones, as he thrust the youth from the door. "These skins—where did you get them?"

"From leetle animals," said Leclerc, with an attempt at humour. "Nice leetle oblogin' animals—"

"Pretty good hunting for two!" commented Jones. "And what does the kid want to break away from—eh?"

The words stirred Tom into activity. With a rush he made for the door, but Trooper Jones settled him with one blow under the chin. His fist crashed home, brought up the youth with a jerk, and, before he could recover himself, another straight right on the point of his chin sent him spinning against the far wall of the hut.

Then his knees sagged, his head fell forward, and a moment later he was lying unconscious on the floor.

"That's him!" said Trooper Jones. "Now I guess you can start explaining how you got these skins—and what the boy meant when he said we were sure to come!"

Leclerc did not attempt to explain in words. He made one mad dash for the door.

He was in a different state to Tom, and the trooper's whirling fists were guarded and parried, and the two of them dropped into a clinch from which only one would emerge and be ready to continue the fight.

Backwards and forwards across the rough wooden floor of the hut the heavily booted men struggled in fierce embrace. A table tottered and almost fell; the bags of skins were kicked out of the way; an empty tin and a half-full bottle clattered and rang as Trooper Jones' spurred boots sent them flying to the side of the hut.

Their heavy, panting breathing drowned the slight noise of the door being slowly opened, and neither of them saw the fur-hatted head of Tim McGuire peeping cautiously into the hut.

McGuire did not interfere, though his hand was resting upon the butt of his revolver. At the terrific pace the men were fighting there was no certainty of being able to bring down the red-coated enemy. He watched—ready to interfere the moment it was possible.

Leclerc began to gasp for breath—slowly but surely Trooper Jones was getting the mastery. None knew that better than Leclerc himself, and his wild, frantic eyes searched for a weapon.

His very expression brought McGuire half into the hut. If Leclerc was beaten, the game was up. But as if he sensed danger, Trooper Jones fought harder than ever to get in a knock-out blow.

He landed one fierce right under Leclerc's chin, and staggered his man with a second blow to the side of the head. Leclerc spun round dizzily, tottered a few inches, and fell across the table.

"Lay up, will you?" growled the trooper angrily. "You can't get away with this!"

Leclerc did not answer. He was panting for breath, dazed by the two quick blows, his eyes staring wildly with the indescribable expression of the hunted.

He moved his hands across the table—felt for and found the gun he had seen there a few moments before. McGuire saw the move and opened his lips to give a shout of warning.

But he was too late. There was a flash, a report that was thunderous in the confined area of the hut, and Trooper Jones sagged at the knees.

The men stared dully at him. They saw him move his hand feebly for his own gun, saw the hand drop as though numb to his side, and a moment later the hut shook under the crashing of his falling body.

"You blamed fool!" snarled McGuire. "I had the drop on him—I could have held him up whilst you roped him—you goldarned fool! Sergeant Stone is in the neighbourhood, too!"

Leclerc was ghastly to look upon. Great beads of perspiration were running from his forehead and cheeks. His hands trembled, his eyes looked as though they would drop from their sockets, his legs shook as if every ounce of strength had left him.

"It had to be. He knew—the kid tol' him!" he muttered.

"But he is a Red Coat, you tarnation fool!" fumed McGuire. "Ned Stone is with him; he will find him—and you!"

Leclerc grabbed at the spirit bottle and drank deep of its contents, his twitching hands fumbling to loosen his collar, as if he already were experiencing what he knew would be the consequences of his crime.

The Frame-Up.

A GROAN from the corner of the hut brought both men round with short gasps of alarm. They had forgotten the kid in the excitement of the fight.

It was McGuire who spoke first.

"The kid—he didn't see what happened!" he muttered. "He's half-ful of spirit—and it was with his gun you shot the Red Coat! Gee, you can thank your lucky stars, Leclerc!"

"How?" panted Leclerc. "Sergeant Stone will know—the Red Coats always got their men."

McGuire did not explain in words. He moved quickly to the table, upon which Leclerc had dropped his gun, and in a moment he had seized it by its still warm barrel.

Leclerc watched him, fascinated, his eyes gleaming hopefully.

He saw McGuire steadily but firmly open Tom's nerveless fingers. He saw the butt of the revolver placed under the fingers, and saw them as firmly forced shut again.

"That's how you get out of it, Leclerc!" said McGuire easily. "Hi, kid! Wake up, kid—wake up!"

He slapped Tom's face, shook him, roared at him, literally forcing consciousness into his motionless form. Even then it was minutes before the eyes opened, to stare dully up at the fur thief, blink and close again.

"Wake—wake up!" growled McGuire. "Come on—see what you have done now!"

The words must have penetrated to the lad's muddled brain with some message of alarm, for he suddenly opened his eyes wide and gaped afresh.

McGuire was grinning at Leclerc, who was forcing a smile between his own quivering lips.

"You—you just did it fine, kid," said Leclerc, with an effort. "One minute th' Red Coat was for taking us all—the next, and hecs business was all over—one shot and you sent hecm long ways! But we are your friends—me and Tim McGuire—we shall help you much!"

For a moment Tom did not gather any meaning in the French-Canadian's rather excited words. To McGuire only was it obvious that the fur thief was anxiously waiting to see how Tom took the situation when it at last dawned upon him.

Tom was still dazed when he rose to his feet, and it was seconds before he became aware of the fact that he held a revolver in his right hand. He stared at it, tottering upon his feet under the influence of the potent spirit he had consumed.

"I—I—I don't remember this," he muttered.

"Nor that?" said McGuire, indicating the still form of the Red Coat.

Crash! The moment Tom caught a full view of the shot officer, the pistol crashed to the wooden floor, his nerveless fingers refusing to grip it a second longer.

"I—I—I don't remember!" he stammered again. "I did hit him—he hit me—I know that. But—but—but—"

"You've got to get out of here before Ned Stone comes around," urged McGuire. "Pull yourself together, kid. Get out of here right now—and stay out! We'll help you all we can—we are your friends. And we've got to get out quickly, too—it won't do for any of us to be here when Sergeant Stone rides in. Get going, Leclerc!"

Leclerc was all for that. Without another glance at the youngster they had framed, he shot out of the hut door and disappeared in the thick undergrowth of the lakeside forest.

There was a famous tradition in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police that they always got their man. This time they would get Tom—and getting him meant their losing the right man. That, however, did not trouble Leclerc nearly so much as an overwhelming anxiety to put as much ground between himself and the hut before Ned Stone got busy.

McGuire slid off in the opposite direction, and, forming the point of the triangle, as it were, Sergeant Ned Stone was standing alone, looking down upon the recumbent forms of two shot trappers.

He remembered the big man with the black beard—it was one of the canoe party he had watched earlier on.

Something of the tremendous respect that existed amongst the somewhat wild trappers of the North-West could be found in the mask-like inscrutability with which Ned Stone carried out his examination.

His eyes never blinked, and not for a single moment was he hasty of hand or foot. He moved around the shot men as steadily as if he were inspecting a parade of his troopers.

From below came the whisper of the waters as they lapped at the edge of the lake. From around him issued a murmur of a gentle breeze threading its way through the tall, stately pines. Above him shone a steady sun, shedding a welcome warmth over what should have been one of the most peaceful parts of the wonderful North-West.

But here there was tragedy. Weeks and weeks of hard work had these men put in. Danger after danger had been faced to get these pelts. Having secured them, within a few miles of a reward for their labours, they had been mercilessly shot down for the sake of the few dollars they would bring in to a band of relentless fur thieves.

The sergeant's keen eyes surveyed the ground straight ahead—tracks of the thieves were easily discerned. Without another glance at the silent forms, he secured his horse, mounted, and rode steadily on the track.

It was only a matter of minutes before he came into view of the hut, and, observing what had already happened to the trappers, Ned thought it wise to dismount and approach the hut cautiously.

He had his hand on his gun as he walked with steady deliberation towards the hut, and his hand tightened involuntarily as there came to his ears the sound of crashing glass.

The door of the hut was opened—evidently he had been seen approaching, and the killer or killers had gone out another way. Throwing caution to the wind, Ned broke into a run, his gun ready. He meant to fire first and ask questions afterwards.

But after the crash of the glass there was not a sound to be heard above the slight noise his own running feet made. A horse, tethered on his right, shifted noiselessly a few inches, and remained still. It did not need Ned Stone's second glance to tell him that it was Trooper Jones' horse—the official saddle and accoutrements were obvious. And again, when Ned Stone had stepped steadily into the silent hut, there was not a muscle of his face moved to show the sudden jerk at his heart as he saw that the solitary occupant was Trooper Jones.

His keen eyes just scintillated with a bitterness no words could describe. No examination was necessary to tell him that Trooper Jones had shared the fate of the luckless trappers down by the lake-side.

Ned Stone stood still for a full minute, surveying the hut—noting the position of the table, the bottle and tin on the floor—and the gun with which the murder had been committed.

Bags of skins on the hut floor told their own tale. There were far too many pelts there to have been secured by any one trapping party. Trooper Jones had run down the fur thieves every officer in the police knew were at work, and he had paid for the discovery with his life.

Ned's chin jerked out aggressively, and his lips and eyes took on a steely expression that would have struck terror into even McGaire's heart had he been there to see it.

Slowly, Ned stooped down, and picked up the gun by the extreme tip of the barrel. The butt was sticky with fast drying spirit, and upon it, drying clearly, were finger-prints. It was the work of a moment to wrap the evidence in his pocket handkerchief and tuck it into his capacious pocket.

The bottle and the tin were unmarked save by sawdust with which the greater part of the floor was littered. But the broken window brought to light what was to Ned, quite the most valuable information.

The very size of the gash in the broken frame told him that the killer had recklessly thrown himself clean through, and upon one of the jagged pieces of glass that remained in the frame, was a strip of the cloth at least four inches long and nearly two inches wide.

His eyes were glistening as he gingerly removed it, carefully wrapped it up, and stowed it into his pocket. If the waistcoat from which it had been torn was ever worn again, Sergeant Ned Stone knew the most skilled worker with a needle in the whole of the West could never entirely succeed in hiding such a rent.

The last evidence of any value at all was a piece of paper, also sticky with fast drying spirit, and upon that also were finger prints. It remained to be seen whether those prints came from the same hand that had handled the gun.

It was when that, too, had been carefully tucked away in his red tunic pocket that Sergeant Ned Stone spoke. And his words, had they been heard by the unfortunate Jones, were exactly what he would have expected.

"I guess I'll get him, Jones!"

That was all.

Two minutes later he was riding hard down the trail towards headquarters.

The Fugitive Returns.

IT was not until he had made his report to Inspector Devlin, that Sergeant Ned Stone felt himself at liberty to take a few hours off.

The news he had brought had sent a feeling of grim anger through the whole of the depot, from the inspector down to the newest recruit.

"I'm going to leave the trail to you and Trooper Martin, Ned," said the inspector. "You knew Jones pretty well, didn't you?"

"He was my friend, sir," said Ned, simply. "With your permission, we will miss every other duty until we have got the man who killed him."

"Sure," agreed the inspector. "It was bad enough to find the two trappers, but Jones—well, he was a constable, Ned."

Ned nodded grimly.

"He was more than that, sir," he said. "He was my friend. I will have a chat with Trooper Martin, and together we shall doubtless form some plan by which we can work. I said I would get the killer, sir—and I shall."

A quick salute, and he was outside Devlin's office, his usual quiet self, but with tight lips that told of the grim purpose that was in his mind.

He wanted to think. He wanted time to formulate a plan that would enable him to trap the man from whose waistcoat there had been torn that precious strip of cloth. It was no light task he had been given.

"You cannot take them, Leclerc—we have just——" began the bearded hunter fiercely.

July 25th, 1931.

Much happened in the pine forests that was never fully explained. Dozens of men moved in their depths, and practically any one of the dozens could have been responsible for the death of Trooper Jones—if they had anything they wanted to hide. They were all hard men of the North-West to whom life meant hunting and a few dollars, and death just no hunting and no need for dollars. That was all.

He was still thinking hard when he drifted into the store kept by Timothy McGuire—a store which was also the Trading Post saloon and the place where skins were bought and sold every day of the season.

He found McGuire resplendent in a new lounge suit, which he correctly guessed was bought for the sole purpose of creating an impression with Ann, the pretty cashier. In addition to the new suit, McGuire had a new hard felt hat which was at once the pride of his life, and the source of endless amusement to the rough and ready trappers.

"So you're back, McGuire?" said Ned breezily. "Had a good trip?"

"Very good—all my boys have worked wonders," said McGuire easily. "Eleven thousand dollars worth of pelts, sergeant. Not too bad for one season!"

"A very good season," agreed Ned quietly, and with a nod, passed on to the railed off desk at which sat Ann.

McGuire watched them uneasily. Despite his blasé, debonair manner, McGuire had an instinctive fear of the quiet, grim sergeant of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. And even the elevating effects of his brand new suit and his neat hard hat, had not brought him the slightest impression that Ann preferred his company to that of the red coated officer.

He watched them as they met, noted the quick handshake, and Ann's readiness to leave her work and allow him to escort her home was not lost upon him. He was still watching them from the window of his store when she opened the door of her hut, walked in, and with a single nod of her head, invited the sergeant to follow her. That was something she had never done for McGuire, in spite of his many pressing entreaties for permission so to do.

"Sergeant Stone's back," came in a quiet voice at his elbow.

McGuire merely nodded. He knew that.

"Is that all you have to say?" he demanded truculently.

"Yes—and no," was the answer. "There's a fellow called 'The Parson' knocking around. Bit of a tough. Wants to join the gang."

"Know anything about him?" asked McGuire, with interest.

"Not much."

"Huh! We'll see."

McGuire was cautious. Willing hands were none too plentiful, so far as joining his gang were concerned. But—McGuire had very much of a conscience just now.

Everybody was a subject of suspicion. It was that grim, disinterested expression of Sergeant Stone's that worried him.

What did he suspect? What was he doing? Was he on the trail with the traditional sagacity of the Force?

But the night passed off quietly enough, and the next day McGuire saw Ned Stone and Trooper Martin take the trail out of town.

Two weeks went by before anything of even passing interest took place. Neither Leclere, Tom, nor Sergeant Stone had been seen during that time, and McGuire was beginning to hope that he had seen the last of all of them.

He had his gang in a small room in the saloon hut, firstly with the idea of getting them on to some "business," but more particularly to warn them to keep well away from the old quarters far up the lake, when there came the commencement of a series of incidents that deprived Timothy McGuire of quite a deal of his serenity.

The door of the saloon was suddenly flung wide open, and a dishevelled, panting, staring man dashed in.

"The Red Coat is after me—hide me!" he gasped.

"What's the matter?" demanded McGuire quickly.

"Just nothing—only bumped a guy off up the trail; but slip me away, can't you!" snarled the stranger. "If I get gunning, somebody besides Red Coats qualifies for a funeral! You got some hiding-place here, ain't you?"

McGuire thought quickly. Gunmen were scarce in his gang, and with Leclere and Tom still away he was two men short.

He pushed the stranger into his own private room, and closed the door before moving to the window to satisfy himself that a Red Coat was indeed on the stranger's trail.

He had just time to slip back to his chair when the door was pushed quickly open, and in walked Sergeant Stone.

Ned looked keenly at the men grouped about the room before he spoke.

"Any strangers about, McGuire?" he asked quietly.

"Not a guy!" said McGuire, with a shrug of his shoulders. "This post is getting so goldarned lonely and un-interestin', sergeant, we're thinking of moving up earlier. Sure to get a bit of excitement in the forest, at any rate."

"Sure!" agreed Ned, moving slowly towards the private room. "I was trailing a guy a few minutes ago; he made for your place, Mac. Couldn't have slipped in without your knowing it?"

"Think he's under the floor?" sneered McGuire. "That's my private room, Sergeant Stone, and the only way into it is through this saloon. There ain't been a soul in this last two weeks! You don't think I'd hide up a feller from the police, do you?"

Ned Stone laughed.

"Of course not, Mac!" he said. "Sorry I interrupted your business. I'll see you later."

And with that he went; but it was only to stand just outside the door.

He heard a subdued rumble of laughter, and McGuire's sneering voice.

"And they always get their men!"

The remark, for some reason best known to himself, made Ned Stone smile. The rumbling laughter had grown into a roar at McGuire's words, and it was ringing in Ned's ears as he made his way to the depot office to report. But he did not seem to mind.

In the saloon one of McGuire's oldest gangsters sidled up to him.

"That feller is 'The Parson,'" he mumbled. "If he's bumped a guy off up the trail, he might be glad to make up one of the number."

McGuire nodded, and it was he who opened the door of the private room.

"Come on out, you!" he snapped. "The Red Coat has gone!"

The Parson came out, his face surly, unshaven, and dripping with perspiration.

"I sure ain't foot-hoofed it so fast for years!" he grumbled. "And just because a guy happened to get in my way on the trail. Say, here's the swag, boys. Better split it!"

McGuire saw to that. He took the little cloth bag which the thief dropped on to the table, glanced through the notes that it contained, and carelessly dropped it into his own pocket.

"That goes to the next share-out!" he said coolly, and swung round like lightning as the door was slowly pushed open a few inches.

But it was not Ned Stone returning. It was Leclere!

The French-Canadian came in when he saw the coast was clear and quickly closed the door.

"Leclere, you goldarned fool!" snarled McGuire. "What have you come back here for?"

"Why not?" asked Leclere lightly. "You have nothin' on me, my friend! I have been in the saloon, and nobody there has anythin' on me, either! Even Miss Ann was glad to see me!"

"Ann? What have you told her?" demanded McGuire.

"Joost nothing!" said Leclere, with a smile and a shrug of his broad shoulders. "She asked me about her brother, but I joost tell'er that he was on a trip and would be back shortly. But never mind then, McGuire. When do we start up the lake?"

McGuire pulled himself together. The arrival of Leclere brought back rather startling memories of what had happened the last time they met, and with those thoughts and the knowledge that Sergeant Stone was also back, McGuire felt distinctly uneasy.

He would have been more uneasy still had he been at the back of the hut in which lived Ann and her Indian servant.

But at the very moment Leclere was letting himself into the room at the post, Tom was tapping gently at the window.

Ann looked round, expecting to find the ever-pressing McGuire peering through the glass. But it was not McGuire.

"Tom!"

"Let me in—quickly!" came in Tom's thin, gasping tones. "Quickly, Ann!"

It was the work of a moment to get the window open wide enough to admit the lad, but it took the startled girl and the Indian squaw half a minute more to get Tom into a chair. He was covered with dust and dirt, and he was limping. But that was not all. He was quivering as though every nerve was crushed.

"Tom—why have you come back like this?" panted Ann.

"The police ar after me! You must hide me!" he exclaimed. "I have seen Stone on my trail day after day, night after night. He's never been more than half a mile from me! I gave him the slip—"

"But—but why?"

"It's McGuire—and Leclere—they're the fur thieves who have been working up the lake. I didn't know they were thieves when I went with them—honest, I didn't, Ann! And—and I—"

"I will tell Ned Stone—he will understand." Ann could have cried with the shame of it all. "You'll—you'll have to face your punishment; but they'll only send you away for a few weeks. Even that's better than being hunted day and night, Tom—"

"They don't send men to prison for— for shooting a constable!" gulped Tom, and with the confession out his last grip on his shattered nerves went. He flung up both hands to grasp his sister by the arms. "Ann—you must hide me!"

They're after me, I tell you! I don't know what happened exactly—I had been drinking; and—and they told me I shot him!"

"Huh!" It was a grunt from the squaw. "He tired. Me hide him. He rest, then go. Me hide him!"

Ann could only nod her thanks. Her mind was bewildered by the tragic return of her brother and his confession. All her first thoughts of getting Ned Stone to plead for a light sentence for his association with the fur thieves had gone.

Tom had to be hidden until he was well enough to take a horse and ride away until the shooting of Trooper Jones had entirely blown over. Ned Stone had to be avoided—a fact which gave Ann almost as much dismay as was the realization that it was her own brother who had shot the constable.

But it had to be faced. The squaw would not allow a single word to escape her concerning Tom's return. If, between them, they could keep Tom in hiding until he was rested, there was still a chance that he would get away.

A Shock for Ned Stone.

SERGEANT NED STONE was at the store the next evening when it was Ann's time for going home. Leclerc was also there, but to him Ned gave nothing but a casual glance and an even more casual greeting.

"Going home, Ann?" asked Ned lightly.

"Yes." Ann's voice was hesitant, but it was no good trying to put off Ned Stone. She had to allay any suspicions he might have, not arouse them.

In a few moments more they were walking across the rough trail between the huts that McGuire called a street.

"Seen anything of Tom lately?" asked Ned suddenly.

"No. Leclerc said he was on a trip and would be back shortly," said Ann uneasily. "I—I—I wish he had not gone up the lake, Ned."

"Funny I haven't seen anything of him," commented Ned, as he opened the door of her hut. "I have been on the trails around the parts he was last working, but I did not catch a single glimpse of him. But if he is making good, you've nothing to worry about, Ann. Trappers and fur hunters often get more or less lost for weeks on end, you know."

"Yes—I know."

"You're looking as though you'd seen a ghost, these last few days," went on Ned. "Guess you'd better be thinking of a trip up town, Ann. It would do you good."

Ann could only nod. She was finding all her work cut out not to shriek at him to get out. The very sight of his red tunic struck terror into her heart.

She mumbled an excuse about changing her clothes and went out of the living-room, with the squaw at her heels.

And it was then that Ned Stone got the shock of his life.

He was standing by the table, thoughtfully tapping it as he considered the advisability of urging the obviously seedy Ann to take a trip up town, when his eyes caught sight of needle-work that had evidently been receiving recent attention.

Across the top of a chair was a man's waistcoat—in itself a curious thing to find in a hut occupied only by a girl and an Indian squaw. But that was not all.

It was the fact that the waistcoat had been receiving a big patch that attracted Ned Stone.

His lips came together in their customary grim line as he picked up the garment and stared thoughtfully at it. It was of the same material as the strip he had taken from the jagged window of the hut in which Constable Jones had been shot!

Ned's brain worked quickly.

Back in the inspector's office was the strip. It would take him but a few minutes to go and get it. If it fitted the tear which had been in the course of repair, he would have something very tangible upon which to work.

He was standing by the door a second later, for from the other end of the hut there had come the sound of a closing door. Ann was returning.

She came in, trying to force a smile upon lips that would persist in quivering with nervous apprehension, and behind her came the squaw.

"If you will excuse me to-night, I won't stop for a meal," said Ned at once. "I've got a little job I want to do. You don't mind?"

Ann shook her head in almost fierce relief, and she could have cried out in her joy as the door closed upon him. But her joy was shortlived, for within seconds Tom had come into the room from the back.

His eyes were almost dropping from their sockets in excitement as he grasped her wildly by the shoulders.

"Ann, I was watching by the window—he saw my waistcoat!" he panted. "I tell you I might just as well give myself up right now—they always get their men! He's trailing me right here! I tell you—"

"Sh'sh!"

It was a warning hiss from the squaw, and to the shattered nerves of Ann and her brother it was like the hiss of escaping steam.

The warning was timely, for without any preliminaries the door was again opened, and Sergeant Ned Stone stood in the aperture.

"I left my glove!" he said, breezy as he usually was in her company. "Hallo—a visitor, Ann!"

"Yes—no!" panted Ann. "Not a visitor exactly—it's my brother Tom!"

Ned Stone laughed as he stooped and picked up the glove he had dropped, and slowly put it on as he stood by the table.

"Why—of course!" he said. "Darned silly of me. How do, Tom?"

In a moment Tom was gripping the gloved hand of the man who had been trailing him on the north trails for days past, but there was nothing in Stone's manner to suggest that he was aware of the fact.

Men of the North-West, when they shook hands, gripped hard, and Tom's grip was hard enough to bring a smile to the grim lips of the sergeant. But the moment their hands parted, it was Tom's lips that parted.

For the tips of his fingers were covered with grease.

"Now I guess that's real downright careless of me!" said Ned Stone, with a laugh that struck at their icy hearts as no blow with a fist could have done. "I must have rubbed my glove in the butter! I'm awfully sorry, Ann—"

Ann could only nod, and she could do nothing but nod when he went to the door, bade them a breezy "good-night," and passed out into the darkness.

But the moment he had gone, Tom jerked himself into activity.

"That was a ruse!" he exclaimed feverishly. "He's got my finger-prints now! Ann—I must have money—clothes—food! I must get away! He'll be playing more tricks to-morrow—I'll never get a dog's chance if I don't move now."

Ann shook her head.

"They'll get you, Tom," she said slowly. "Look here, I'm going to tell Ned Stone about the fur thieves if "That's how you get out of it, Leclerc!"

said McGuire.

McGuire doesn't get you out of this! You stay here, Tom—I'm going to see McGuire right now!"

With her mind made up, Ann felt better. She was at least doing something. Perhaps, in spite of the evidence Ned Stone had collected, McGuire could help her brother out of the trouble. She could make him swear that the boy was miles away from the spot at the time of the shooting.

She burst into the saloon in a manner that had the men's hands darting for their guns, and their relief was shown in a series of gasps as she flung the door to and placed her back against it.

"McGuire—Tom has come back, and he's told me of your thieving operations!" she gulped out. "You're going to get him out of this!"

"If young Tom has been mixed up with a fur gang, I'll sure do my best for him," said McGuire, his beady eyes narrowing. "He's my friend, ain't he? And yours, Leclerc? You'll help?"

"Sure ting I will," agreed Leclerc. "But joost how do we help?"

"You'll help, or I'll tell all I know to Ned Stone!" said Ann fiercely. "You led him into this trouble, and you're going to lead him out of it! And I'm through, too, at the store, McGuire. I'm not staying on with a gang of fur thieves."

"Here—not so fast, young woman!" said McGuire, and with a sudden movement he had shot his bulky person between her and the door. "You are going to squawk to nobody—you're going to stay right here until you come back to your senses—"

"Here! Reach for the skies—up with 'em—quick!"

The interruption came in the snappy, crisp tones of a man who meant business, and McGuire's hands were the first to point to the roof of the saloon. The others obeyed more slowly, but just as certainly—and the whole gang found themselves staring down the steady barrel of the Parson's gun.

"I ain't no particular hobo!" said the Parson quietly. "But I jist can't stand by and see a lady man-handled! Missy, I guess these boys are standing quite still until you git right out into better air—ain't you, boys?"

They did not answer in words, but it looks could have done the work of guns, the Parson would have been needing the services of the very man after whom he was so ridiculously nicknamed.

Ann gave the Parson one flecting, grateful glance, and ran out of the saloon. She did not wait to see the Parson follow her, his gun still covering the gang, neither did she hear the key turned in the lock from the outside.

But she heard the Parson dash out into the darkness, and her gratitude to him was increased when she realised that this one act would result in the Parson being chased out of the trading post for all time.

She dashed back to her hut, wherein the anxious Tom was walking the floor like a caged animal.

"You saw him—he's going to help me?" he exclaimed, even before she had closed the door.

"Ho wanted to keep me until he could make his own plans!" said Ann breathlessly. "Oh, Tom, what are we going to do! I want you—"

"And so do I!" came in Sergeant Ned Stone's cool voice at their backs.

They swung round upon him, startled—erushed. There was no more mercy on Ned's set face than could have been found on a graven image.

"I want you for the murder of Trooper Jones," he went on grimly. "We have a strip torn from your waistcoat when you bolted through the window, we have a card bearing finger-prints, and we have finger-prints on the butt of the gun with which he was shot. We also have your finger-prints, which I got on my glove to-night. They all tally. You'd better come over with your story, Tom."

"He didn't shoot him! Tom, you didn't shoot the constable;" blurted out Ann.

"I—I—I don't remember anything about it!" muttered Tom, and shot one appealing glance at Ned Stone, and added viciously: "You Riders of the North ought to be called Bloodhounds of the North—"

"That's quite enough for the time being, Ann. I'm sorry, but that constable was my friend," said Ned quietly. "Get his hat."

Ann obeyed dully. The chase was over.

Once again the Mounted had got their man.

Still on the Trail.

IN the saloon there was nothing but alarm, fear, and dismay.

It was McGuire who shot the lock clean off the door within a couple of minutes of the Parson's departure.

"There'll be squawkin' in these parts in less than an hour!" he grated.

"Those who don't think they can face Sergeant Ned Stone and his goldarned questions—get out and stop out!"

Leclerc was the first to go. He shot through the door, pausing only to snatch up his rifle, and disappeared into the night. No word was passed where the gang was to meet again. They all knew that.

But for the time being the only thing that mattered was a get-away.

McGuire himself made a dive for his private room. He, for one, was not stopping to face Ned Stone's questioning—and that would be inevitable now that Ann had been freed by the Parson.

He grabbed at a bag, snatched open the door of his crude safe, and commenced to jam into the bag all the dollars he could find, and all the papers he felt it would be foolish to leave behind for future police investigation.

And he was well into the middle of his task when the door was suddenly flung open, without there being any warning footsteps on the stairs without, and Ned Stone was staring down at him.

"Not going to leave us so suddenly, Mac?" said Ned coolly.

"Just putting away a few dollar bills, that's all," growled McGuire. "What's the matter with you, sergeant, jumpin' in on a feller like this?"

"We want you for a bit, Mac," said Ned calmly. "There's a little matter of fur thieving been going on around your part of the forest, and we're investigating. You're coming along to see the inspector!"

"I sure ain't doin' nothin' of the kind!" almost howled McGuire. "You ain't got nothin' on me, sergeant!"

It took Ned Stone about three minutes with his fists to convince McGuire that his presence was really necessary at the depot, and, just to prevent any sudden effort on McGuire's part to make a break for freedom, a pair of handsome handcuffs were planted over his wrists. They gave McGuire a nasty, cold feeling down the middle of his back, and even the new suit and hard hat could not bring to him that jauntiness with which he had gone through the last few weeks.

He spent the night in a cell next to that occupied by Tom, and the experience was not a pleasant one to a man who had rather a grim notion that he was going to see nothing else but prison cells for a long time.

Ned Stone was not to be seen, for the simple reason that he had mounted and taken the north trail in search of McGuire's friend Leclerc.

Leclerc was not mounted—so much Ned had ascertained as soon as dawn had turned the skies grey.

The early sun shone upon Ned Stone's grim face as he rode out on Leclerc's trail. He was still not satisfied, although he had got the leader of the fur thieves in Tim McGuire. Leclerc had been associated with McGuire for many years past—and Leclerc had not returned until just about the same time as had Ann's brother Tom.

There might be a connection there, and the first link was getting Leclerc himself.

It did not occur to Ned Stone that Leclerc might also be looking for him, but even if he had thought of it, it was extremely unlikely that the dogged, fearless, relentless Rider of the North would have turned off the trail for a single second.

But the fact became apparent when, through the bushes some way ahead, he caught a glimpse of the many-coloured patchy trousers Leclerc invariably wore.

At the same moment the sun glinted upon the levelled barrel of a gun—but Ned did not hear the report. In a moment he was falling heavily from his horse, over the cliff edge, and down to the bottom of the high banking to the level ground below. There, crumpled into a shapeless form, he laid still.

Leclerc gave an exultant shout of joy, and his heavily-booted feet pounded over the ground to enable him to see the better how great a shot he really was.

"You joost can't win every time," he laughed. "You should have left us alone, you pig-dog fool! The day had to come when you would meet your master!"

And he aimed a vicious kick at the sprawling sergeant by way of emphasising his remarks.

Something happened—he never knew exactly how it happened or what did happen. All he realised was that his foot never reached the red tunic, but that it was seized in a grip of steel and wrenched sideways and upwards.

In a flash he was on the ground, his rifle flying from his hand as he fell. In another split second he felt as if his life was being crushed and beaten out of him, and a dazzlingly bright red tunic was whirling and twisting in front of his dazed, staring eyes.

He fought back with the instinct of the true man of the north-west. His fists went backwards and forwards like flails, but they never seemed to connect with any vital spot on that ever restless tunic.

Twice he snapped back his head as a fist crunched upon the point of his own jaw, and once he emitted a squealing gasp as a terrific something caught him full over the heart.

Fear lent him strength—fear of this dreaded sergeant who fought so unflinchingly, so noiselessly, with such relentless resolution. But all the fear in the world, and all the strength that might have conjured up, could not bring home to him the thought that he was winning the fight.

His gun was gone—out of reach. Man to man he was no match for the sergeant, and he knew it.

Sweat poured down his face, his neck, and his chest. Blow after blow came under his guard or around it, and smashed into his body and face. And only now and again did he get a fleeting glance at the white, set face above a red tunic.

Blindly he struck out in one furious effort to land at least one telling blow that would get the sergeant out for sufficient time for him to get at the police horse. Two hands went out afterwards to secure a choking grip.

But his hands were beaten aside, and in a flash a great bunched fist had come like a streak of lightning and connected with the point of his jaw.

He knew nothing more for twenty seconds, and by the time he had gathered some of his scattered senses, it was to find a pair of steely blue handcuffs locked upon his wrists.

"You joost ain't got nothin' on me—on'y the shootin' joost now!" panted Leclerc, as he staggered to his feet.

"I've got so little on you, my friend, that you think it necessary to have a pot at me!" grunted Ned. "Lay up the jaw-wagging, and get moving!"

And that was how Leclerc came to join the others at the depot.

But still Ned was not finished. He had certain definite ideas of his own to work out yet.

It may have been because of that that Tim McGuire was taken into the inspector's office soon after Leclerc had been brought in.

The one-time jaunty saloon proprietor was urged into a chair beside the inspector, who was, at that moment, busily writing.

From the wall ticked a clock with a tick that was more like the beating of a horse's hoof upon the hard trail above the lake. From the inspector's desk came the scratching, scratching of a pen that only ceased for the split second it took the officer to dip the pen into the ink-well. Then scratch, scratch, and a ceaseless, heavy tick, tick, tick.

The noises got on McGuire's nerves, and he turned pleadingly towards the inspector.

"You wanta jaw-crack with me?" he asked.

The inspector did not even look up, and the scratching went on with what was to McGuire renewed ferocity.

Suddenly there was a different sound—it clapped like thunder in McGuire's ears. But it was merely a piece of paper being crunched up in the inspector's hand. Then scratch, scratch, tick, tick, tick. Nerve-wracking to the man who was already panting and gasping to know how many dangerously awkward questions were going to be fired at him.

Beads of perspiration came upon McGuire's forehead, and were wiped away. Ten minutes later the performance had to be repeated—and two solid hours went by. He was getting soaked in sweat and could relieve only the face and eyes with a handkerchief. And still the wracking, splitting, deafening noise of pen and clock worked at his rapidly fraying nerves.

He almost gasped with joy when there came to his ears the steady patter of approaching feet. But they went into the distance, and again there was only the ticking of the clock and the scratching of the pen.

"You killed him!" suddenly barked out the inspector.

"I didn't!" gulped McGuire.

"Didn't kill whom?" thundered the inspector.

McGuire choked back something in his throat. He scarcely knew whether to speak or not. His head was bursting with the din of those noises, but his scattered senses were still not scattered enough to prevent him from realising that he was being subjected to a mild form of third degree.

Again there came the sound of those marching feet, and this time they came into the office.

Weakly McGuire looked up, and found himself staring at the Parson. But what a difference in the man to the last time they had met!

The Parson had then been unshaven, dirty, dishevelled—quite cheerily holding the whole gang up at the end of his gun. Now he was sporting the smart uniform of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Only one glance did the Parson give his late associate.

"Leclerc's confession, sir!" said Trooper Martin, alias the Parson.

As though he had been struck with a knife, McGuire was upon his feet.

"What's he said?" he shouted wildly. "If he's put me in it, he's double crossing! He shot the constable—I saw him! I never got a drop on the Red Coat! Leclerc is trying to save his own neck if he says I was in it—that I—"

The inspector rose grimly, the sheet of paper in his hands.

"Read it—you will then know all about it!" he said curtly.

Almost dazed beyond comprehension, weakened by the last sweating hours, crushed by the sudden appearance of the Parson, and staggered by the knowledge that not only had Leclerc been brought in, but had confessed, Tim McGuire took the paper.

It was blank!

"It's a trick!" he gulped. "You played a trick—just to get me to speak."

"And you spoke," said Inspector Devlin with a chuckle. "Sergeant Stone thought that perhaps you would, Tim McGuire. We know now all we want to know—we have got the fur thieves, and we have got the man who shot Constable Jones. You can get back to your cell—and have a good look at it, McGuire. You're sure gonna have a chance of making a study of prison cells during the next few years!"

With a groan that was complete submission, Tim McGuire moved towards the door. And, by the irony of Fate, in so moving he crushed the one remaining thing of which he could be proud—the hard felt hat he had lately worn so jauntily.

But he did not trouble—he was past all care. Trooper Martin, however, picked it up and set it at quite a new angle upon the prisoner's head.

"And that man I bumped off on the trail," said the Parson cheerfully, "that was also a trick of the sergeant's. I tell

(Continued on page 15)

"I left my glove," he said. "Hallo—a visitor, Ann?"

Train wreckers after bullion—a young railway operator blamed for their dastardly deeds—his kid brother fighting to clear his name. A thrilling railroad drama, starring Glenn Tryon and Merna Kennedy.

The MIDNIGHT SPECIAL

Bitter Disappointment.

AND you say, mother, that no invitation has come for me from Ellen? Well now, if that isn't just too bad!"

An affectionate good-bye to the grey-haired old lady at the other end of the wire, then the receiver of the wall telephone was slammed back on its hooks with unnecessary violence.

No invitation to the birthday party of the girl he adored, and which was being held that night. It really was too bad, and Gerald Boone, chief operator at the railroad station in the little western town of Burke, a pleasant-faced young man with clear grey eyes and a mass of wurlly jet-black hair, dropped dejectedly into the swivel chair at the flat-topped desk, clapped his hands to his head, and sat gazing moodily before him, all unaware that behind him stood a smiling girl, who had entered while he had been talking over the 'phone.

Ellen Harboard, the girl who possessed his thoughts, pretty of face, with bewitching hazel grey eyes and neatly bobbed brown hair—and the daughter of Silas Harboard, the wealthy oil king.

"Oh, Jerry!"

The musical voice cut in on Jerry's bitter thoughts, and, with a glad cry escaping him, he sprang to his feet, his face beaming joyously. Three or four strides across the office took him to her, and, his heart singing within him, he caught eagerly at her hands.

"So you thought it was too bad not receiving an invitation to my birthday party, Jerry?" she teased him.

"H'm, yes!" he answered somewhat lamely.

"Poor boy!" She gave a merry little laugh. "But, Jerry, I've come to deliver it in person. I thought you'd much prefer it that way."

July 25th, 1931.

"Gee, you've sure said it, Ellen!" Jerry was like a dog with two tails. Surely here was proof that she bore him no little affection, and the thought sent him into the seventh heaven of delight. "And thanks very much for coming. You can bet I'll be along sharp on time. Eight o'clock, isn't it?"

She nodded her head, but her eyes were gazing about her. Never before had she been in Jerry's office, and she found herself extremely interested in the place. Half office, half signal-box; a table or two, and a long counter, upon which were numerous books and papers, such as time-sheets, bills of lading, and heavy ledgers. One or two pictures of locomotives and a large map were upon the walls, and just by the window were several levers that operated signals and catchpoints. There was also the telegraph instrument standing upon Jerry's desk, and Ellen's eyes at last came to rest on it.

"Oh, Jerry, how do you work that little gadget?" She pointed eagerly to the sending key. "There was a time when I wanted to become a telegraphist. Do please show me!"

"Sure I will."

He drew her to the desk, sat her down in the swivel chair, then quickly explained the working of the little instrument and told her the Morse code. Some twenty minutes later her fingers were on the key, while Jerry's hand was closed about her wrist, helping her to tap out various letters in Morse, heedless of who might pick them up.

"Well, that's fine, Ellen! You're sure an apt pupil! Twenty minutes, and you've got the Morse code pat. Marvellous! And now what about doing a little message on your own?"

"I'd love to!" she cried excitedly.

"Right, then let's go!" He gazed at her face adoringly, and an eager gleam came suddenly into his eyes. "Begin!"—dot, dot from the machine, "L"—dot, dash, dot, dot. "O"—dash, dash, dash. "V"—dot, dot, dot, dash. "E"—dot. "Y"—dash, dot, dash, dash. "O"—

But Ellen did not tap out the letter O. Instead she started to her feet, blushing prettily, and shook a reproving finger at the boy.

"And I suppose the last letter's U?" she remarked. "A very pretty little message, eh, Jerry?"

"But it's true, Ellen!" Jerry cried fervently, again catching at her hands. "I love you, dear, and you know it. Won't you—"

But the rest of his words remained unsaid, for there came the sudden sound of footsteps on the gravel outside, and next second a tall, hard-faced young man with piercing brown eyes and thin, cruel lips strode into the little office. He was George Walton, the new section superintendent, and at sight of Jerry clasping Ellen's hands his eyes gleamed maliciously. So the suspicions he had had for some time that these two were very friendly were indeed well-founded. A rival for the girl he coveted! In that moment Walton resolved that at whatever cost he would sweep the young operator from his path.

"Why, Ellen, fancy seeing you here!" He came between them, turned his back on Jerry, completely ignoring him, then raised his soft felt hat to the girl: "I didn't know you were interested in such places as railroad stations."

"As a matter of fact, I came to ask Jerry to my party, George." There was a trace of annoyance in Ellen's voice, for she resented the rude way he had snubbed Jerry, and the friendly regard in which she had held him slumped considerably in consequence. "And I was just going as you came in."

"Well, now, that's splendid, Ellen." With an air of possessiveness he took her arm, an ingratiating smile upon his cruel lips. "I only blew in to see if everything was okay at the station, so I'll see you home."

Ellen knew she could not very well object to that, so she nodded her head in acquiescence, while Jerry glowered fiercely at the broad back of his superior. In that moment the young operator felt an intense desire to punch the fellow's head, for in addition to the way he had shunned him he did not like his assured manner with Ellen.

"So long, Jerry." Ellen smiled back at the disgruntled youngster as she was marched to the office door. "See you to-night—and mind you're not late!"

But Walton's keen brain was at work, and he quickly saw a way to keep the young operator from being at the party at all—a way that might even be the means of estranging the girl and the boy if only he played his cards carefully and well. The result being that, at half-past seven, when Jerry had just changed into a hired dress-suit in readiness to go off to Ellen's place directly his relief put in an appearance, Walton returned to the railroad station and confronted the young man.

"Bad news, Boone!" The section superintendent forced a regretful note into his voice, though within him was a savage triumph. "Vanes won't be turning up to relieve you. Sicknes or something. So you'll have to hang on. And remember the midnight special runs to-night."

Jerry's jaw dropped instantly, and his heart seemed to miss a beat. It was indeed tough that this should happen just when he was eagerly looking forward to Ellen's party—of seeing the girl again.

Somehow he sensed that Walton was delighted that this should happen to him, though not for a moment did he dream that it was all a put-up job—that Vanes, quite fit and well, had been informed by the superintendent that Jerry was going to work double shift this night because he wanted time off later.

"It sure is bad news, Mr. Walton." The young operator shrugged his shoulders despairingly. "I—I was to go to Ellen's party to-night, as you know, and—and— Well, I shall now have to let her know I can't go, that's all."

"I'm more sorry than I can say that this should happen, old fellow." Walton patted Jerry's shoulder in feigned sympathy. "Still, it can't very well be helped. Duty before pleasure, you know, and I'll tell Ellen if you like about your rotten luck."

"Thanks." Jerry's face was the picture of misery. "If you'll do that it'll save me worrying her on the 'phone. She's probably very busy getting ready to receive her guests."

A nod, and then Walton was gone—walking from the railroad station as if on air, congratulating himself that the first part of his rascally scheme had been safely accomplished, while back in the company's office a downcast Jerry Boone changed slowly back into his working clothes to spend the remainder of the night at his post of duty picturing the gay revelry at Ellen's home.

Disaster.

MANY people wondered why George Walton, when he came to Burke as section superintendent of the railroad, should take a dilapidated old house some little distance out of town. But Walton had his own reasons, and they were far from lawful ones.

Born in New York, he had upon leaving school fallen in with a gang of crooks, but a spell in the State penitentiary had somewhat sobered him, and thereafter he had decided to run straight. It was a lucky break when he managed to obtain a job in the executive offices of the railroad company. He was a good worker—and he worked hard—and promotion came his way. Then eventually came the offer of the berth he now graced. Two months as section superintendent, and once again he had embarked on a life of crime. . . .

Directly he left Jerry Boone bemoaning the fate that had befallen him, Walton sped in his car to his home, bleak and barren-looking, and built almost entirely of wood, and inside the rooms were sparsely furnished.

It was to a room at the far end of the passage that he made his way on entering the place, and as he strode into it two evil-faced ruffians, who had been seated at a small round table, instantly sprang to their feet, their hands flashing to jacket pockets where guns lay concealed.

"Go easy, boys." Walton laughed at the fierce expressions on the faces of the two. "It's only me—and I've work for you to do this very night. Come, sit down."

They reseated themselves and Walton drew a chair to the table and sat down facing them. Then he calmly lit a cigarette the while his two confederates waited impatiently.

"Well, boss, what's on your mind?" Dan Paddon thrust his bristly face eagerly across the table as Walton at last looked up. "Spill the beans. Me and Joe's anxious."

"You—you—you've su-su-sure sa-sa-said it, boy," stammered his companion. "W-w-we—"

"Shut up, you big stiff!" Paddon broke in fiercely. "You and your rotten impediment. How many times have I told you to say nothing?"

Joe Lessing's mouth opened to make some kind of angry retort, but with an impatient wave of the hand, Walton silenced him.

"Now see here, boys, we're on something big to-night and I'm killing two birds with one stone." A pause while Walton puffed at his cigarette and blew a cloud of smoke ceilingwards. Then: "We haven't done a job since you two held up the Westbound Limited at Cheswick Cutting and hiked off with the bullion aboard, have we? But I'll say that was nothing to what we're after to-night. The midnight special's running and it's carrying a real pile. We're going to get it—understand, and incidentally I'm going to put paid to a certain young man who's in my way. Now just you listen carefully while I tell you exactly what you're to do."

He lowered his voice and his hirelings craned forward the better to catch his words. For a little over ten minutes they listened carefully, then Walton got upon his feet, his eyes gleaming sinisterly.

"You understand, huh?" They Eyes gleaming murderously, Lessing snatched up a chair and came at Jerry like a whirlwind.

nodded their heads and he smiled in satisfaction. "Right, but just you mind you don't bungle things or, by hades, your lives won't be worth a moment's purchase—see?"

And then he was gone, leaving his confederates to carry out his fell scheme while he himself went on to Ellen Harboard's home where already her guests were beginning to assemble.

The ticking of the clock upon the wall was the only sound that broke the silence of the railroad station at Burke. Slumped in his chair, arms upon the flat-topped desk, his head cupped between his hands, Jerry Boone was rucfully picturing the gay party that he knew would still be in progress at Ellen Harboard's home. Just the kind of revelry his light-hearted nature would have loved—and then there was the fact that he was missing the bright companionship of the girl of his heart. Fate had indeed dealt him a nasty blow.

The minutes ticked on—a quarter to twelve came. Then behind Jerry the door was quietly pushed open and Dan Paddon and Joe Lessing came creeping in. On tip-toe and with the utmost stealth they stole up to the unsuspecting young man, then suddenly Paddon's grimy hands shot out and encircled Jerry's neck.

"What the blazes!" Jerry came out of his reverie with a start. "What's the game? Let me go, you—"

His words snapped off as he was dragged roughly over the back of his chair. As he crashed to the floor, he glimpsed his assailants, noticed that one was on the point of springing on top of him, and adroitly rolled to one side. Another moment and he was on his feet again.

Who these men were he did not know, for Paddon and Lessing were members of Walton's old gang in New York and since joining up with the crook section superintendent they had kept well out of sight in the daytime. And neither did Jerry know what they were doing here. But whatever it was, it was for some fell purpose and so the young man tore into them on the instant, his jaw grimly set, his fists lashing out with all the force he could put behind them.

A gasp of pain from Paddon as a hefty left thudded to the point of his unshaven chin, sending him crashing back against a table, then Jerry was round on Joe Lessing, who was on the point of launching a blow at the youngster's head.

"Ouch!" Lessing shook his head, half dazed from the right that had crashed clean between his eyes, then grinned hideously as he saw his confederate fling forward and clout Jerry behind the ear with a stinging left-hander. "G-g-good, Dan. G-g-go it—g-g-give him h-h-hell!"

But Jerry, hard as nails, recovered just as Paddon came in at him again, and, parrying a vicious right, he thudded his left to the scoundrel's jaw. Back against the table Paddon went once more, and like lightning Jerry pounced upon him, caught him by the throat and forced his head backwards.

"Now, you eur," hissed Jerry from between clenched teeth, forgetful for the moment of Joe Lessing's presence. "You're going to get all I can give you!"

Uttering savage oaths, Paddon struggled all he knew to break free. Suddenly his left hand swept upwards and clawed at Jerry's face. But the young man caught at the wrist, then quickly releasing his left hand from the rascal's throat, he crashed it like lightning into the scrubby face.

Eyes gleaming murderously, Lessing snatched up a chair as with a low moan Paddon slithered to the floor. Up behind Jerry he came like a whirlwind, and with all his brute force he crashed the chair own on the young man's head and gave a diabolical laugh as his victim dropped as if suddenly pole-axed.

"Q-q-quick, Dan!" Lessing dropped the chair and whipped a length of cord from each of his coat pockets. "P-p-pull yourself together. We—we haven't a m-m-moment to l-l-lose now."

The words seemed to act as a tonic on Paddon, for next second he was on his feet, helping his confederate to bind and gag Jerry, who was already showing signs of returning consciousness.

Five minutes later and the two rascals had the young operator securely gagged and bound in his swivel chair.

Eyes wide with apprehension, Jerry saw them suddenly move to the levers of the catch-points and signals just as there came a distant whistle of a locomotive—the midnight special!

What was the intention of these scoundrels?

The telegraph began to tick as the operator from the next station down the line sent through his message that he had passed the special on to Jerry's section of the railroad.

A moment later and a nameless dread swept over the helpless youngster and he began to struggle fiercely with his bonds as Paddon, a diabolical grin on his unprepossessing countenance, pulled over the lever that would give the midnight special a clear line, and followed this by setting the catch-points so that the freight train would switch on to the express line just after it had passed Burke station.

And a passenger train was almost due now on that other line!

Distracted, Jerry tried to shout out, but could only utter a choking gurgle behind the gag. Heart beating as if it would burst, he flung every ounce of his strength into a desperate fight with the cords that bound him.

The morse again. The passenger train had been passed on to his section. A smash was inevitable now unless—

Hoarse gloating chuckles came from the two scoundrels and the distraught Jerry saw them dive out into the night, heard a second later a motor-car being driven rapidly away.

Again sounded the raucous whistle of the locomotive of the freighter, then fainter the whistle of the passenger train as it hurtled through the night.

"Oh, merciful heavens!" Jerry muttered despairingly behind the gag. "What can I do—what can I do?"

Frenziedly he strained at his bonds, till the veins stood out like whipcord upon his forehead, till the perspiration trickled down his ashen cheeks. Then with a sigh of thankfulness he felt the cords around his wrists and ankles loosen. But now the noise of the on-rushing train was thundering in his burning brain and even as he flung the bonds away and staggered to his feet the freighter came sweeping past the railroad station.

A hoarse cry bursting from his dry lips, Jerry hurled himself forward, but even as he grasped the lever of the catch points, the freighter turned on to the express line just as the passenger train came thundering along the railroad from the same direction at tremendous speed.

Too late! The youngster's heart almost stood still and with a terrifying cry he dropped into the chair at the flat-topped desk, beating his hands, as if suddenly demented, on its polished surface, his body rocking to and fro in the torture that gripped him.

Bare seconds later and there came a mighty crashing, rending sound as the passenger train cleaved into the very centre of the freighter. A terrible upheaval with coaches splintering to matchwood, the debris piling up in grotesque heaps. Heartrending shrieks from those unfortunates travelling in the passenger train—the hissing of escaping steam, and then tongues of fire sprang up among the chaos to add further peril to the grim and ghastly tragedy.

And before help came to succour the injured, two sinister, shadowy figures moved among the wreckage, heedless of the pathetic groans of the victims, as they searched feverishly for the van of the freighter in which was bullion of vast wealth. They were Dan Paddon and Joe Lessing, and when they found what they sought they quickly carried it off to the waiting car and drove rapidly away.

Billy Boone on the Scent.

HEAD bowed, his spirit utterly broken, Jerry Boone came wearily up the garden path of the little cottage that was his home.

A terrible morning it had been to the young fellow. The court of inquiry, assembled at the railroad station, had refused to believe his story as to why the disaster had occurred, and he had been ignominiously dismissed from his post—told that he was lucky to escape being sent for trial for criminal negligence.

Then had come a second and even more devastating blow. Feeling that he wanted sympathy in this, his hour of sorrow, he had gone along to Ellen Harboard's home, only to hear the alarming news that her father had been on the passenger train that fearsome night and had been gravely injured.

Ellen had stormed at him, the tears coursing down her cheeks, when he had forced his way into her presence, accusing him of base neglect of duty, finishing up by telling him that she never wanted to see him again. And though he had tried to protest his innocence—to explain the real reason for the disaster—she had refused to listen to him. Like everyone else, she believed him guilty.

And so Jerry had come home—a human wreck.

Loving arms caressed him as he dragged himself wearily into the little kitchen where Mrs. Boone had dinner waiting for him, for the old lady could see by his face that the worst had befallen her boy.

"Never mind, Jerry dear," she soothed him gently. "You have nothing whatever to reproach yourself about. A shameful trick of Fate. But you will—"

"But it's not that they wouldn't believe me when I told them of the attack on me at the station that's so hard to bear, mother." Jerry shook his head pathetically, tears glistening in his eyes. "It—it's Ellen. I went along to her home, found that her poor father had been in the smash and was seriously injured. She refused to see me, believing it was my fault that he had been hurt, and when I pushed my way in and tried to explain, she only stormed at me and ordered me out of the place. Oh, mother, that's just terrible—terrible!"

"There, there, son—don't take on so!" Mrs. Boone stroked his mop of hair affectionately. "Don't despair. When an injustice has been done it is usually set right in the end. Those scoundrels who attacked you may make a slip some time and land themselves in the hands of the law. You say you've no idea who they can be?"

"Never seen them before." Jerry shook his head glumly. "And I'm sure they don't belong to this town. But I'd know them if I saw them again; in fact, I'd recognise one if only I heard his voice, for he's got an impediment in his speech."

"You mean he stutters, Jerry?" a youthful voice eagerly inquired.

"Yes."

A strange gleam came into the eyes of Billy, Jerry's kid brother, a youngster of thirteen, with mischievous blue eyes, and a cheeky though likeable little face.

Munching an apple, he had been listening to Jerry's tale of woe, inwardly seething with indignation at the injustice that had been done his brother. Jerry was Billy's hero; the youngster would do anything for him, no matter what it might be. Such was his brotherly love—and now it came to him in a flash that he might even be able to help Jerry clear the stigma on his good name. He knew a man who stuttered, an evil-faced ruffian whom he had seen only the other day in conversation with George Walton, the section superintendent. By Jove, was Walton implicated in the attack on Jerry?

Billy felt it was more than-likely, for there was something about the man that he did not like. To his mind, Walton looked a crook—his eyes were too furtive to be those of an honest man.

Then the youngster remembered the missing bullion, which it was believed had been taken by the looters, a class of persons who take advantage of the least accident to steal. This theft and the attack on Jerry might easily be connected.

Excitement showing in every line of his features, Billy suddenly dived across the room and snatched his cap from a chair. Then, apple in hand, he came back to Jerry and his mother, who were watching him in blank amazement.

"What's got you, kid?" Jerry smiled wryly as Billy gave him a knowing wink. "You don't mean to say you know who—"

"I'm saying nothing," the youngster cut in quickly. "But I'm on a clue. Just you stay here till you hear from me, Jerry—and, whatever you do, try and look a bit cheerful, or you'll give us the willies."

And then he was gone. The railroad station was his destination, and there he came upon three small boys that he knew who were playing some kind of game with stones near a small wooden structure that he knew to be George Walton's office.

He noticed with satisfaction that a car was outside, clear evidence that his quarry was at the moment in his place of work.

Seconds later he had joined his friends in their game; but, though he was soon absorbed in it, he contrived to keep one eye constantly on the door of the section superintendent's office.

And at last Billy's vigil was rewarded. George Walton suddenly made his appearance at the door and went towards his car.

"Must be going now, kids," Billy straightened instantly, a triumphant gleam in his pale blue eyes. "Got an important job to do."

"But the game!" protested one of his little friends, with a great show of heat. "You'll muck it up if you—"

"Aw, can it, Bob!" Billy looked quickly at the half-nibbled apple in his grubby hand, then took a large bite at it. "Here, perhaps this'll put us right."

With a grin, he tossed the remainder of the apple—little more than the core now—towards the disgruntled youngster; then, turning, he bent low and darted towards the car. He reached it just as the engine woke to life, and, unnoticed by the section superintendent, he sprawled full length on the near-side running-board. Next second the car shot away, with Billy clinging tenaciously to his precarious perch.

Out of town into lonely country, and in little over twenty minutes the car drew up at the dilapidated old house that Walton had made his home. On the instant Billy was off the running-board and round at the back of the vehicle, and from that place of security he watched the crook superintendent enter the house and close the door behind him.

Billy scratched his head as his gaze surveyed the tall building. Several windows were inaccessible, and one he noticed had boards nailed over it on the outside. Obviously the room beyond was intended to hold a captive.

But the main thing was to get into the house somehow. It was quite likely that he might overhear Walton and his confederates planning some fresh scheme, or learn something that might vindicate old Jerry.

Then of a sudden the youngster's eyes gleamed and he darted eagerly forward. A small window on the ground level, standing half-open, had caught his gaze.

Bare seconds later and he was in a kind of cellar with stairs at the farther end. Holding his breath, he stole forward on tiptoe, mounted the stairs, and, on opening the door at the top, he found himself in the passage that led to the front door.

Then a sound of muffled voices, and he quickly made towards a door near at hand and crouched with his ear very close to the keyhole. Now he could hear a tense voice quite clearly, and as he

"What the heck does this mean?" demanded Walton, and caught Billy's arm in a savage grip.

July 25th, 1931.

distinguished what was being said his hear began to beat quite fast.

"Yes, there's another special running at five o'clock to-day from Roxburgh, boys, with a heavy consignment of coin and notes—and we're going to get it." It was Walton speaking, and he paused to give a sinister laugh. "Now these are my plans—nothing so drastic as before, of course. You'll get down to Roxburgh and hide yourselves in a packing-case in the bullion van, then when you're near the curve in the line at Sedge, you'll spring out, take the guards by surprise, and hop off with the dough as the train begins to slow. Is everything—"

That much Billy heard before there came a dramatic interruption. Ear glued to the keyhole, completely absorbed with the dastardly plan being hatched in the room beyond, he failed to hear the front door open, or the surprised ejaculation that escaped the thick-set, brutal-faced man who saw him stooping before the door as he came into the house.

A moment later and the man was upon the unsuspecting youngster. A heavy hand came down on Billy's shoulder and, swinging round with a gasp of alarm, he found himself gazing into a pair of fiercely glowering eyes.

"Oh! You let me go, mister!" he wailed pathetically. "I ain't done nothing, straight I—"

But he said no more, for, flinging open the door, his captor bundled him roughly into the room beyond.

A Bid for Liberty.

WALTON and his rascally confederates, Dan Peddon and Joe Lessing, were seated at the small round table as the crook superintendent unfolded his plans for the robbery of the bullion train. But they were on their feet in a flash as Billy came staggering into the room, and instinctively the hands of both Peddon and Lessing flashed to their coat-pockets, where they were wont to keep their guns.

"What the heck does this mean?" demanded Walton, and caught Billy's arm in a savage grip, then looked frowningly at the thick-set man as he advanced towards them. "Fulworth, who in hades is this brat, and what's he doing here?"

"Found him outside the door, listening, boss," growled the other.

"But I wasn't! I wasn't!" Billy knew that he was in a tight jam, but he meant to try his utmost to get out of it somehow. So much depended upon him retaining his freedom now. "My dog popped in here through the cellar window, and I came in after him."

"You did, huh?" Walton looked at him from narrowed lids, but he was far from satisfied with the explanation. "Well, where's the dog now?"

"He slipped me." Billy forced himself to smile as he strove to master his feelings. "Rushed down into the cellar again, and I bet he's away through the window by this time."

"But you were listening at the door, you little brat." Walton dug his fingers savagely into Billy's arm, and laughed brutally as the youngster winced with pain. "What did you hear? You tell the truth, or by heck I'll wring your confounded little neck for you!"

Billy felt his knees grow suddenly weak beneath him, for there was no mistaking that grim threat. For a moment or two he was silent, then with an effort he bravely squared his young shoulders and looked defiantly into Walton's blazing eyes.

"I wasn't listening, I tell you!" he shouted vehemently. "And I didn't hear nothing."

The passionate note in Billy's voice almost convinced the crook superintendent that the youngster was speaking the truth, but, shrewd as he was, he did not intend to take any chances. He must be kept safely out of the way till the train robbery had been safely accomplished; it would then be time enough to consider what had best be done with the boy.

A word to the thick-set man, then Billy, struggling and protesting warmly, was dragged upstairs and flung into the room with the boarded window.

"You stay there, you little rat!" The thick-set man laughed brutally as Billy went staggering across the room. "And remember this: If you give any trouble I'll be up here in a jiffy, and I'll larrup you till your hide's raw. See?"

And then he was gone, slamming and locking the door behind him. Billy pulled a face at the locked door and clenched his little fists.

"Go and fry your face, ugly!" he shouted at the full pitch of his lungs.

Heavy footsteps on the stairs as Fulworth descended them, then silence. For a moment Billy stood irresolute; but, determined youngster that he was, he soon set his brain to devising some means of escape.

He had a line on Walton and his gang now—he could see that, if only he could get free, he would be able to clear Jerry of the stigma that was now on his name. Then there was the intended robbery of the bullion train due out of Roxburgh at five. That must be prevented at all costs.

The youngster gazed about the room. It was sparsely furnished as a bedroom. One or two chairs, a small table with a square of mirror resting back against the wall behind, a worn-out rug and an iron bedstead.

As Billy's eyes finally came to rest on the bed, a hopeful gleam came into them. What the time was now he could not say—somewhere in the region of three o'clock, he suspected.

He sat down upon the bed, eager to put into action the plan that had come to him, but he knew that it was useless to make his bid for liberty just yet awhile. Time passed, then after what he considered was a life-time, yet in reality was only three-quarters of an hour, he heard a door slam below, and a few seconds later caught the sound of a motor-car's engine starting up. He made a guess that that would be Walton's confederates setting out for Roxburgh on their fell mission.

He allowed another five minutes to elapse, then diving his hand into his pocket he brought out a handful of marbles, and tossed them one after another on to the floor. Nothing happened, so he gathered them up again and repeated the process.

Then footsteps sounded on the stairs, and seconds later the door was unlocked and opened.

"What in blazes you up to, you young scum?" Fulworth glared in at the doorway, an ugly scowl on his unprepossessing face. "You know what I said about that larruping, don't you?"

"You was young once, wasn't you?" Billy grinned cheekily, and fung two or three more marbles on the floor. "Then just you let a fellow that's got to kick his heels have a bit of fun."

More marbles went bouncing to the floor, and for several moments Fulworth gazed at the youngster, not quite knowing what to do. Then suddenly he spat out a vicious oath, swung from the room and relocked the door.

Billy grinned as his footsteps died in the distance, then he swung round to the bed and rapidly tore off the covers. The work of a very few moments to knot the sheets and blankets together to form an improvised rope, then he turned his attention to the boarded window. Silently he raised the sash, and with his small fist he hammered at one of the lengths of wood, hoping fervently that the scoundrel downstairs would be led to believe that the sounds he made were caused by the marbles being flung on the floor.

He worked on uninterruptedly, and some ten minutes later he had three of the boards from the window and was lowering the improvised rope to the ground. With satisfaction he saw that the knotted bedclothes reached to within half a dozen feet of the gravel path below, and with joyously beating heart he tied the end of the rope he held to the iron frame of the bedstead, then came back to the window and clambered out.

The ground reached in safety, he darted away as fast as his little legs would carry him. A telephone kiosk at last. Like a young rabbit he dived into it, and seconds later he was through to his home, heard Jerry's voice asking who it was calling.

"It's Billy, Jerry. Listen! I've got a line on those thugs who set on you and robbed the midnight special." The youngster's voice was vibrant with excitement and his eyes shone with an eager light. "And Walton was behind the whole affair. Ah, I knew that'd surprise you! I somehow suspected the brute, and I followed him some while ago to his house—and I've found out, through listening at a keyhole, that he plans to pinch the bullion from the special, running from Roxburgh at five."

"Couldn't put you wise before, because they caught me and shoved me in a room and— Yes, yes, of course I escaped, or I wouldn't be 'phoning you now, stupid. But, Jerry, there's no time to lose. What's that? It's twenty to five now! Gee, but we've time to fix 'em and clear you with the railroad people, haven't— Oh, why will you keep butting in. What's that? Sure, I'll go and get the cops. You bet they'll be after the train in a twinkling. And you'll be along right away? Good! Bye."

The receiver slammed back on its hooks, but Billy did not go off at once. He made another call, this time to Mr. Harboard's house and, Ellen answering the phone, he quickly told her all he had learned at Walton's place and of the rascal's latest fell scheme. And it afforded him immense satisfaction that he was able to convince the girl, after some few minutes, of Jerry's innocence of the railway disaster. Then again the receiver crashed back on its rest and, darting from the kiosk, Billy ran off like the wind.

Meanwhile, Jerry had got out his little two-seater runabout, and, driving at reckless speed, he soon reached the railroad station at Burke. Straight to the operator there he went, not knowing that the man was a confederate of Walton's, whom the crook superintendent had installed there as much for his own benefit as anything else. Breathlessly Jerry explained that there was to be a hold-up of the bullion train, due out of Roxburgh at five—would the fellow speak to the next station down the line and have it stopped and the officials warned?

"Bunkum; you can't kid me there's to be a hold-up in broad daylight." The operator shook his head, though his eyes gleamed viciously at the disturbing thought that Jerry was wise to Walton's game. "You buzz off—I'm busy."

He turned away, and, seeing it was useless to argue further, Jerry reared outside and climbed back into his car. Away he sped again, this time in the direction of Colville, his throttle opened to its fullest extent. And at Colville Station he had little difficulty in convincing the operator there, an old friend of his, that there was to be an attempt to steal the bullion on board the special from Roxburgh. The train would be stopped. Jerry was assured, and it was with triumph singing in his breast that the youngster again clambered back into his car and set off along the railroad line to meet the oncoming freighter.

The Hold-Up.

THE special thundered over the iron road, whistle shrilling blantly.

Inside the bullion van the two guards sat upon packing-cases, smoking and chatting idly.

The sudden screeching of brakes, and the train began to slacken speed.

"Now what in blazes is the matter, Harry?" one of the guards remarked to his colleague.

"Darned if I know." The other got to his feet and went to the side of the coach, his intention being to peer out of the small aperture there to see what the slowing of the train meant. He thrust out his head, but could see nothing. "Don't know what it can be, George. Suppose the signal's against us. I can't see it, but—"

"Hands up, you two—and keep them up!" a grim, menacing voice cut in sharply. "And don't try to reach for those guns of yours."

The guards swung round in a flash, and their jaws dropped as they saw the heads and shoulders of two men protruding from a big packing-case on the far side of the van, Dan Paddon and Joe Lessing, and in their hands were two wicked-looking blue-black revolvers.

Quickly they clambered from their place of concealment, and while Paddon covered the guards with his gun, his rascally companion delved into a medium-sized wooden case and brought out a heavy iron box that was heavily padlocked.

"Now, you two," rasped Paddon, waving his revolver threateningly at the guards, "if you cry out or move so much as an inch till we're clear of here I'll shoot—and shoot to kill!"

As he spoke the train drew to a complete standstill. Quickly he turned to where Joe Lessing, the bullion box in his hand, was dragging at the sliding door in the side of the van.

"Quick—off you go!" he hissed in Lessing's ear. "And make the car as soon as you can. I'll keep behind in case there's trouble."

The door was open now, and they scrambled out to the ground. An imperative cry and, glancing down the train, Paddon saw three uniformed figures racing towards them. The driver, the conductor and the brakeman of the train.

Fiercely he urged Lessing on, but under the weight of the bullion box the rascal's progress was slow. Paddon twirled around, murder blazing in his eyes, and waited for the railwaymen to come nearer.

"Hi, you! Keep where you are!" As they pulled up he levelled his gun at them through his jacket pocket. "If you move another step I'll drill you! And I mean it, see?"

He backed slowly, his gun on them the while, then started violently as there came the sudden roar of a car tearing along the road that ran parallel with the railroad. Seconds later there was a screeching of brakes, and, flinging himself from the wheel of his two-seater, Jerry Boone made straight for Joe Lessing, who was still staggering under the weight of the bullion box towards the yellow car standing by a clump of pine-trees.

Jerry came at the crook like a cyclone; but Lessing had seen him and, dropping the bullion box, he struggled to reach his gun. Too late. Jerry was into him even as his fingers touched the butt of the revolver, and a pile-driving left sent him crashing full length upon his back.

"Now, you scum, I owe you something for that time at Burke Station!" Jerry howled, and leaped on the scoundrel as he began to clamber to his feet.

But Lessing dexterously rolled to one side and, springing up, he closed quickly with the enraged young man.

Backwards and forwards the two, stamped, hitting out fiercely at each other; then, just as it seemed that Jerry had the upper hand Paddon came running up behind him and brought the butt of his gun crashing with brutal force on the back of the youngster's head. Jerry went to the ground as if pole-axed, and with savage triumph in his eyes Paddon cast his gaze quickly about him.

"Keep back! Stand where you are, or, by Hades, I'll drill you!" The railwaymen had taken advantage of the diversion to steal down upon the crooks, but they stopped in their tracks, cursing volubly, as the gun again threatened them. A leering grin, then Paddon called urgently to Lessing over his shoulder. "Hurry up, you blamed fool, and get that there bullion into the car before we have a whole mob down on us. The train—they'll be wondering why it doesn't go on when the signal's raised and—"

His words snapped off and an expression of alarm leaped instantly into his cruel brown eyes as there came the sudden hum of many powerful engines upon the macadam road—a hum that grew rapidly louder till it merged into an ear-splitting roar. A hurried glance over his shoulder, then a vicious oath ripped from between the ruffian's lips as he glimpsed the half-dozen motorcycles, uniformed figures crouched low over the handlebars, that came sweeping along the road.

"By heck, Joe, it's the cops!" he spat out fearfully.

Thought of self-preservation sent him flying towards the yellow car standing near the clump of pine-trees. And his confederate was not a moment behind him. Avaricious though he was, the wealth the bullion box contained was nothing as compared with his liberty; and letting the box drop to the ground, Joe Lessing scudded after his colleague as fast as his legs would carry him.

A bedlam of sound—the screeching of brakes hastily applied, and the hoarse yells of the police as they flung from the saddles of their bikes, and, with Billy Boone, who had been riding behind one of them, tore after the fugitives.

But Paddon and his rascally companion had now reached the yellow car and were moving away over the rough, bumpy ground. Seconds later, and with throttle opened to its limit, they went shooting down the macadam road as if suddenly propelled from some gigantic catapult.

"Now, you cur, you're for it!" Jerry's eyes blazed down into Walton's with a cold fury.

Back came the police to where the three railway officials, who had now been joined by the guards from the bullion van, were helping a dazed Jerry to his feet. As the mists cleared from the young man's brain, memory of all that had happened came flooding in upon him with a rush. He caught the sound of the fugitives' car, saw it as it fast receded along the road, and flung out his arm wildly.

"Those skunks—they've got away with the bullion!" His voice was hoarse and his pointing finger trembled. "Quick! My car! I'm going—"
 "Now, now—take it easy, boy!" A grin on his face, the conductor of the freighter held up the bullion box that Joe Lessing had dropped in his mad flight. "See here, we've got the bullion box all right—and it strikes me it's all thanks to you and the cops for coming along when you did."

The police were crowding eagerly round now, asking quick questions; but an excited, boyish voice interrupted them, and Billy Boone thrust his way to the front and caught at Jerry's arm.

"Tricked those dirty thieves, didn't I?" he cried delightedly. "And I've told the cops all about that rotter Walton. You can bet your boots that this is the end of that smug-faced crook. To-morrow, Jerry, you'll be vindicated and—Here, where are you going?"

At mention of Walton's name, Jerry had flung off Billy's hand, and with grim, set face he was racing towards his little runabout.

"To see Walton!" he flung back over his shoulder meaningly. "I've something to say to him before the cops get him!"

Billy grinned, then he, too, broke into a run, for the cops were now moving quickly towards their bikes to take up the chase of Dan Paddon and Joe Lessing. Billy did not mean to be left out of the capture of the bullion thieves.

A Grim Fight.

THERE was murder in George Walton's heart as his feverish fingers ran through the drawers of the desk in his office at Burke railroad station.

News of the discovery of his fell plans by Jerry Boone had reached him from his operator accomplice at the station, and he knew that flight was now his only course if he was to avoid arrest and prison. A quick dash to his office to collect his few personal belongings and the spoils of his nefarious robberies, and then he would flee to New York, there to hide in the underworld, where he could safely renew his criminal activities.

At last everything was in the bag that stood upon the desk, but as his fingers went out to close it the door of the office opened and in came a neatly dressed, brown-haired girl—Ellen Harboard—and as he looked up, startled, her hazel grey eyes fastened on his with contemptuous gaze.

"So it was you who caused the smash of the midnight special—a diabolical deed for which an innocent boy has suffered. They said it was on account of Jerry's neglect, when all the time it was your doing." Her voice was biting in its scorn, and under it Walton wilted. "And you did it—caused many poor people to be killed and injured—because you are a low-down thief! Oh, yes, George Walton, I know all about it! You wrecked those trains to steal the bullion in the freighter, and to-day you planned to get hold of the money in the—" cat!" Mastering his feelings, Walton leaped round the desk and caught her roughly by the arm. "I don't want to hurt you, but if you say another word I'll—"

"That's enough of that, you little July 25th, 1931.

"And do you think I'm scared of your wild threats?" She looked at him bravely though the fierceness of his eyes caused a little shiver to run down her spine. "No, I'm not. Curs like you think twice before adding to their misdeeds when the hand of the law is fast closing upon them. And I can see you know yourself that the police are wise to your duplicity. Why would you be packing that bag if it wasn't for flight? But you'll not get far. The—"

"I won't, huh? Well, we'll see about that, my pretty." He thrust his face close to hers, causing her to recoil. A moment's pause while he gazed fixedly into those wide hazel grey eyes—and then the old desire to win her for his own came with renewed fervour. A sudden thought flashed to his evil mind and he gave an ugly laugh. "Yes, Miss Harboard, I'll admit I am thinking of flight and what is more I now intend to take you with me."

He quickly snatched the suitcase from the desk with his free hand, then before Ellen realised what was happening, he had jerked her roughly to the door.

"Let me go, you brute!" The girl's eyes were goggling with terror now, and she began to struggle fiercely as she was dragged out of the office and towards the open tourer that stood outside. "Let me go! You hear me—let me go!"

But he made no answer—just laughed callously as he bundled her into the seat beside the steering wheel.

Wildly Ellen looked about her for some sign of someone to rescue her, but there was no one in sight. At the full pitch of her young lungs, she yelled for help in the hope that she might be heard.

But in an instant her cries were drowned in the noise of the engine as Walton, leaping in beside her, touched the self-starter and, jerking the lever into first gear, sent the car speeding away with a roar of the open exhaust.

Too late a figure came dashing round the side of the section superintendent's office. It was a platelayer, and he gazed blankly after the receding car and the girlish figure he could see struggling with the driver.

The sound of another car, and minutes later the shrieking of hastily applied brakes as the vehicle slid up to the fugitive's office.

"Say, Tompkins!" cried Jerry Boone, in the act of climbing from his runabout. "Do you happen to know if Walton's in his office?"

"He sure ain't, Jerry." The platelayer flung up his arm, pointing a finger towards Walton's car which even at the moment was turning out of the station yard on to the road. "There he goes in his car. What it's all about I don't know, but a moment ago I heard someone calling for help. It was Miss Harboard and Walton's got her in—"

But Jerry waited for no more. Away he went in pursuit, carelessly indifferent to the dangerous speed at which he drove. One thing alone possessed his thoughts now. The girl of his dreams was being abducted, carried away by an unscrupulous a scoundrel as there ever was—a man who had incidentally done him a grievous wrong.

Face grimly set, a white hot fury blazing within him, Jerry swung his little runabout out of the railroad yard and on to the wide macadam road.

Some two hundred yards ahead was his quarry and he guessed that Ellen must have resigned herself to her fate for he could see that she was sitting quietly beside her rascally kidnapper.

Rapidly he began to overhaul them, but the noise of his car presently drew Walton's attention and after a quick glance back, the rascal crowded on speed and held Jerry easily.

Out into wild open country, with the road winding up and up till on either side was a drop of some three hundred feet to the fertile pasturelands below.

Then suddenly a wave of triumph swept over Jerry Boone as he saw that he was slowly but surely overhauling the car in front again. Two miles more and he had forced himself alongside the tourer.

"You'd better stop, Walton!" he yelled above the roar of the engines. "You won't get away with it, I'll see to that!"

Ellen called out to him some words of thankfulness, but he scarcely heard them. Walton was gazing at him with murder in his eyes and some instinct warned Jerry that the scoundrel was contemplating treachery. He watched him like a cat watches a mouse, the while he kept pace with the tourer.

"You going to stop, Walton?" he yelled again. "I tell you you'd better, for—"

He saw the evil grin that came suddenly to the rascal's face, saw his cruel hands start to swing the steering wheel of the tourer—and in a flash he guessed the man's intention. Walton was going to swing in front of his little car, force him over the edge of the precipice to crash down to the valley three hundred feet below!

As swift as light, Jerry was on his feet, clambering over the side of the runabout. He got a foothold on the running board of Walton's car, then shot out his hand to the steering wheel as the scoundrel swung it again and sent the vehicle roaring down the road.

"Stop, you damned fool!" Jerry roared threateningly. "Or I'll force the car over the edge!"

But Walton only grinned viciously, for he knew Jerry would not sacrifice Ellen's life and his own. A moment later and his left hand came out in an attempt to push Jerry from his perch.

Then began a fierce struggle for possession of the steering wheel in which Ellen bravely joined, though her face was white and strained, and her heart thudded painfully against her ribs as she thought of the great danger that threatened them all. A sudden twist one way or the other of the wheel, and they would hurtle to eternity!

"Ellen!" Jerry cried suddenly. "Try and jam on the brakes while I look after this car!"

As the girl made to obey a savage oath ripped from between Walton's foam-flecked lips and he lashed out with his left at the youngster. But Jerry caught at the scoundrel's arm though the effort almost caused him to lose his precarious perch on the running board.

And then the car came to a slithering stop as Ellen drew the hand brake home.

"Now, you cur, you're for it!" Jerry's eyes blazed down into Walton's with a cold fury. "You're going to answer to me for all the harm you've done before I hand you over to the police."

A sudden powerful heave and he hauled the rascal over the side of the car to the road. He waited a moment to give Walton the chance to recover himself, then he tore into the man like a raging demon. A left to the jaw staggered the villain, but he quickly shook off the effects of the blow, and spitting out a string of savage curses, he

(Continued on page 28.)

BOB STEELE.

Hero of many stirring Western dramas.

The daring exploits of a young cowboy who sets out to bring a ruthless band of rustlers to justice. Starring Bob Steele and Blanche Mehaffey.

Texas.

THE light of Border stars pierced the velvet heavens, and the music of guitars mingled with the whistle of mock-birds. On the horizon, however, there loomed a sullen bank of clouds that threatened to swell the waters of the Rio Grande with seasonal rain.

In French Sadie's cantina at Campo Santo, close to the Line, there sat two men who were ignorant alike of the musical talent of courting caballeros and chirping mock-birds, as well as the impending threat of dirty weather. Each was too involved in a game of chance to be impressed by outer influences.

One was a long, lean, unshaven worthy of the cowman breed, answering to the laconic name of Kansas. The other was of a very different stamp, somewhat flashy in his attire, with eyes that matched those of the lynx for craftiness—a typical frequenter of the card-table and the poker school, known as Fancy Joe.

They had apparently been playing some time, judging by the money lying between them, mostly on the flashy individual's side of the table, and both were now preparing to match their hands, one against the other, in a final bid.

"I'll bet fifty," Fancy Joe observed slowly, after some consideration.

Kansas of the stabbled chin opened out his five cards fanwise with secretive fingers, and squinted at them narrowly with obvious satisfaction, while Fancy Joe remained impassive, the true poker player.

"Well," drawled Kansas at length, "havin' taken a look over the scenery, I reckon I'll trail along with you, Joe. I'm puttin' you up another fifty."

Fancy Joe regarded his hand. There were three queens in it, and a two and a six.

July 25th, 1931.

"It'll cost you another hundred to see me as far as the next stage, Kansas," he murmured.

Kansas took another look at his cards. There were three aces in it, and two cards of no value.

"I'll raise you a hundred more," he declared.

It was at this juncture that Fancy Joe examined his fistful again. A significant change had taken place. The two-spot no longer figured in it, and had been substituted by a fourth queen.

No one had seen the cunning movement with which he had discarded that two-spot and "palmed" the extra queen. But the eyes of a blonde girl standing by the side of Kansas detected something lying on the floor. It was the "two," and all at once she observed Fancy Joe's foot close down on it.

When he lifted his foot the two-spot was no longer on the floor. It was stuck to a wad of gum on the sole of the trickster's tan shoe.

The blonde girl said nothing, for she knew that to have denounced the sharper would have resulted in bloodshed, and she would rather have seen Kansas cheated out of his money than have him shot down. For Fancy Joe had a "fancy" reputation with a pistol as well as a pack of cards.

"Kansas," said the sharper, "if you're ridin' with me you'll have to pay heavy fare to make the whole trip. I'm stakin' another two hundred on my hand."

"What?" Kansas lurched to his feet. His voice rasped loudly, but with a kind of gruff good-humour in its tone. "Why, you ornery, ding-basted cayute, you know you ain't left me with that much dough—the way you bin winnin' all along the line to-night."

Fancy Joe shrugged.

"Two more hundred is the bet," he said stoically.

Kansas laid down his cards and plucked out a wicked-looking knife. But violence was not his intention. With an imprecation he jammed the blade clean through the highly-decorative backs of the cards he had been holding, pinning them to the table.

"I'm gonna get me some more cash to cover that bet o' yours, Joe," he stated, "for I aim ter pay two hundred bucks to see what you-all hev called on." Then, turning to address the rest of those in the saloon: "I'm a-coming' back," he announced stridently, "an' ef any hombre so much as touches that knife o' mine there's gonna be a funeral—an' he won't be among the mourners."

With that he stamped out of the cantina, against the walls of which the first big drops of rain were already beginning to patter.

The blonde girl who had been watching the card game went to the back of the bar and began to serve drinks. Fancy Joe set his cards face downward on the table and strolled to the counter to order an aguardiente. The blonde girl eyed him with ill-concealed contempt as she poured it out for him, and she seemed on the point of making some comment when the swing doors of the saloon were pushed wide and a youngster in a Stetson and an oil-skin coat crossed the threshold.

He took off his hat and swept the clinging rain from its wide brim and tall crown. About nineteen or twenty he looked, of medium height, but lithe and muscular, with a good-looking face burned to the colour of a new saddle by sun and wind, and a mass of curly hair that was as black as the Border night.

He slipped off his storm-coat and slung it across a chair. Then, with a faint whirring of spurs, he strolled across the bar-room to come to an idle pause at the table where Kansas and Fancy Joe intended to resume their game as soon as the former returned with a fresh supply of money.

The stranger looked at the cards lying face downwards on the table, and fastened his careless glance on the five that were pinned by the knife. The men at the bar, Fancy Joe included, gaped at him in a breathless, startled silence as he casually withdrew the blade ere anyone could stop him, and as casually inspected the hand that Kansas had held.

He was standing examining it when the swing doors creaked on their hinges again. Kansas strode in, and the tension seemed to become electric as his gaze became riveted on the young stranger and the cards that he had so innocently lifted.

Kansas bore down on him with an oath. His fingers, clenching on the butt of his six-gun, snatched the weapon from its holster and rammied the barrel of it against the youngster's ribs.

"Stranger," he ground out, "I swore I'd plug any guy that shifted my knife an' gavo them cards the once-over while I wasn't on hand ter see I got a square deal. Git ready ter meet your Maker!"

The youngster eyed him steadily. "I don't aim to meet my Maker—yet," he murmured.

Kansas was scowling at him threateningly, but all at once he drew back a little.

"No?" he rasped. "Well, I'll tell you what you're gonna do. You're gonna play that hand o' mine you're so interested in—with your money! Set down!"

He repeated the command as the stranger looked at him in bewilderment, and the gun in his fist forbade argument. The youngster sank slowly into the chair Kansas had occupied some time before, and Kansas called Fancy Joe across from the bar.

"This hombre is gonna pay two hundred dollars to see your hand, Joe," he said. "And, stranger," he added to the youth whom he was covering, "see that you don't lose!"

The youngster hesitated, glanced at Fancy Joe shrewdly, and then at the cards on which Kansas was forcing him to wager. Three aces and two rags, huh?

He pulled out a sheaf of hundred-dollar bills and pushed two of them across the table. Fancy Joe laid down his hand—four queens strong. The stranger followed his example, planting the cards one by one in front of him. One, two, three aces—and a fourth!

Exclamations arose from all round, and two faces registered blank amazement—the face of Kansas for one, the face of Fancy Joe for another. But the latter's astonishment was succeeded by chagrin, and suddenly he uttered an angry snarl. In the same instant his hand went to his hip and wrenched a .44 from a holster there.

It was fast work, but not fast enough. The youngster's fist had dropped to his thigh in a lightning gesture, and he beat Fancy Joe to the "draw" by a split second. There was a burst of flame and smoke and an ugly smash, and the .44 spun from the hand of Fancy Joe and clattered to the floor.

The gambler scrambled to his feet and clutched at his numbed fingers. His eyes were glittering with mingled fear and rage, but the latter emotion seemed likely to dominate the first till Kansas jabbed him playfully with his own six-gun.

"I wouldn't be so lady-like with my shootin' iron, Joe," he said, smirking broadly. "You know, lightning never strikes twice in the same place."

Fancy Joe slunk out of the cantina sullenly.

Flaming Guns.

KANSAS turned towards the table to see the dark-haired young stranger reaching for the money Fancy Joe had staked on his cards, and he gave vent to an exclamation.

"Hold on there, you curly-headed stray," he said. "That was my bet you covered."

The youngster smiled. "We'll divide the takings, pardner," he drawled.

"All right," was the rejoinder.

"You're on. Say, Kansas is my name. What's yours, anyway?"

"Just call me Texas," the youngster told him, and handed him a quarter share in the bet.

Kansas looked at the money sourly. "Ain't you takin' in a lot o' territory, Tex?" he growled.

"Well," the youngster retorted with a grin, "isn't Texas bigger than Kansas?" But as the other laughed genially he thrust some more of the notes into his fist.

Kansas slapped him on the shoulder, and then faced the rest of the men who were standing around.

"Boys," he announced, "I want you to meet Tex. He's takin' in a lotta territory when he calls hisself Texas, but from now on—ef you wanna get to Texas you gotta cross Kansas. See?"

French Sadie appearing at that moment, Kansas presented his new acquaintance to the picturesque proprietress of the cantina. Kansas seemed on the best of terms with her, and, after asking her to serve up a couple of plates of hot tamales in a private room off the saloon, he led Tex thither.

"Now that we're all alone," he said to the youngster, as they sat down at a small table, "would you mind edjicatin' me as to just where you got that fourth ace from?"

"Kansas," Tex informed him, "cheatin' at cards ain't exactly a hobby o' mine, but when I looked at that hombre Fancy Joe I marked him down straight away as a sharper. And Kansas, the hand is quicker than the eye."

Further discussion on the subject of the bet was interrupted by the appearance of Goldie, who arrived with the grub. The interest of Tex was immediately aroused by her, and Kansas introduced him. When Goldie had departed Tex leaned forward eagerly and fired a question at his companion.

"Who is she?" he demanded. "What's she doin' in this round-up?"

"You heard her name," Kansas answered. "An' as for the rest, people's business down here is mindin' their own. But she ain't the usual run o' gals in saloons. She's a good kid. That's what French Sadie says—an' what Sadie says goes. What's anybody doin' down here, anyways? I might be askin' you the same thing. But, of course, I ain't," he added hastily.

"A little bit late, alncha, Tex?" Kansas muttered slowly.

There was a silence. Then Kansas spoke again:

"Howsomever," he resumed, "now that we're friends, do you mind my askin' you ef anybody might be expectin' you here in Campo Santo? You see, the sheriff was down here a while ago from the American side o' the Border—peerin' around like he might be expectin' to see somebody. But, of course—no star-packer would be lookin' for you, huh?"

There was a curious expression in Tex's eyes.

"Mc?" he echoed. "No! Of course—accidents will happen at times, Kansas—no matter how careful a fella is."

Once again their conversation was interrupted by the appearance of Goldie.

"Sadie wants a word with you, Kansas," she said. "She seems kind of upset about something."

Kansas drifted out into the bar-room, and Tex and Goldie were left in each other's company.

"You'll like Kansas when you know him better," said Goldie.

"I don't have to know him any better to like him," Tex told her. "I don't know you—but I like you."

She glanced at him challengingly.

"You make up your mind quickly, don't you?" she murmured.

"A lot quicker than I change it," he rejoined.

Meanwhile Kansas had made his way to where French Sadie was awaiting him in the saloon.

"Well," he demanded, "what's wrong?"

"Fancy Joe—when 'e went out I do not like ze way 'e look," Sadie declared, with a note of anxiety in her voice.

"Cain't say I like his looks, neither," drawled Kansas. "But it's a bit too late to improve on his Creator."

"Mon anil," said Sadie warningly. "'e is just like ze cat zat see too well in ze dark. 'E is dangerous man. You understand, hcin'?"

His upper lip curled into an ominous smile.

"Yeah," he murmured, "but don't you worry, Sadie. As my friend Tex says, 'the hand is quicker'n the eye.'"

"Oh, Kansas," pleaded Sadie, putting her arms around his neck. "I am fond of you. You must not go out yet."

Kansas scoffed at her fears, and then tweaked her chin.

"Do me a favour," he said. "Gimme a kiss."

The Frenchwoman recovered her native gaiety at once, and obliged him laughingly.

"Now I'm set fer anything," Kansas pronounced, and led her into the room where he had left Tex and Goldie.

"Pardner," he said with meaning. "you an' me had better be pullin' our freight."

Tex looked at him keenly and then rose. Goldie helped him on with his oilskin coat while French Sadie assisted Kansas with a snug, warm jacket that reached to the waist. The two new acquaintances then said 'adien' and took their leave, strolling out into the darkness of the street.

It was still raining, and the night was black as pitch. Kansas and Tex walked for about thirty paces, no word passing between them. But, with that understanding of men who have much in common, each seemed to know the other's thoughts, and Tex was acutely conscious of an air of tension.

Both peered into the gloom ahead, and July 25th, 1931.

both held their hands close to the hips. Then suddenly Kansas touched Tex on the arm, and the youngster saw that he was gazing in the direction of a fissure between two buildings on the other side of the street.

Tex detected a slight movement there, the movement of a man who came gliding from the shadows with a pistol in his grasp.

Tex whipped out his "iron." There was a double crash of gunplay in the storm-racked night, and then silence came down again—a silence broken only by the sigh of the wind and the slash of driven rain.

Twenty-four hours later, a fresh headstone decorated the graveyard south of Campo Santo.

"Here lies Fancy Joe," its inscription read.

The Trails Men Take.

KANSAS sat alone in the back room of French Sadie's cantina, where, a day or two previously, he had eaten hot tamales with young Texas.

Several rows of playing cards were laid out on the table before him. He was indulging in a quiet game of solitaire, but had been brought to a check—all because of an ace that was covered by a knave.

Kansas looked furtively over his shoulder, and then, slipping the ace from its position under the picture-card, he began to hum contentedly a favourite ballad of his cowpunching days:

"Beat the drums lowly, an' play the fies slowly,

Play me a dead march to carry 'me on,

Take me out on the prairie an' lay the turf o'er me,

For I'm a wild cowboy, an' I know I've done wrong."

A slight sound caught his attention. He glanced round and saw that a tall, cadaverous man in a dark suit and a fawn stetson had entered the room.

"One thing about solitaire, you don't have to guess who's cheatin'," the newcomer observed. "Are you gettin' so honest, Kansas, that you hafta play cards all by yourself?"

Kansas grimed sheepishly.

"Comin' from you, Rand," he stated, "I don't take nothin' personal in that flippant remark."

Rand Kennedy eyed him shrewdly. His eyes were not the most pleasing feature in his appearance—small eyes that gave an impression of cunning and sluttiness.

"Holdin' good cards these days, Kansas?" he inquired.

Kansas shrugged.

"Well, I might use an ace," he answered, "if you've got the right one up your sleeve."

"Meanin' I can count you in on a new deal?" Rand asked quietly.

"Pardner—like before?"

"I ain't so sure o' that, Rand."

Kansas mused, scratching the stubble on his chin. "You see, I got me a new partner. Name o' Tex—the fastest shoot-in' maverick you ever saw. Drifted in here across the border a day or two back. I sorta took a shine to him right off."

Rand frowned.

"What brand is he carryin'?" he inquired.

"I ain't asked him no partic'lers," Kansas replied. "an' I ain't told him none. But when he hits the trail I sorta figure I'll be travellin' along with him."

"Maybe he'd figure on travellin' along with us—Kansas—"

Kansas pursed his lips.

"Well," he muttered, "there's some men that's partic'ler what trail they take, an' there's some that figger cattle-rustlin' is about the lowest occupation there is. Of course," he added, "they don't look at it in a purely business way like you an' me."

"No harm in askin' him, is there?" Rand suggested.

"I'd rather that came from you," Kansas rejoined. "Not that he figures me for a saint, but ef he wasn't jest congenial about my occupation I'd just as leave he didn't know it. You ben't the respected foreman of the Circle H, I reckon you could feel him out on the proposition better'n me."

"Where is he?" Kennedy demanded.

Kansas smiled.

"Well, you might ask Goldie," he mentioned, and with that a tiny glitter seemed to take form in Rand's eyes.

"Yeah?" he said. "Thanks—I will."

And, passing out into the bar-room, he made his way to the counter where Goldie was serving.

"Goldie," he said to her, "I've somethin' to tell you. Ain't it about time you was changin' your mind about a certain proposition I made once? You don't want to be buried for the rest of your life in this dump, do you? Well, I had another letter from that ranch 'way up in Canada that would like to fix me up. I'd go, too, if you went with me."

There was a chilliness in Goldie's glance.

"Is that the only reason you're thinkin' over the offer?" she interrogated.

"You're foreman of an outfit just across the border in Texas, Rand. Down here on the Mexican side of the line, one hears things that might make Canada a lot healthier for you if the boss of Circle H got to know of them."

"Them as don't have clean skirts themselves shouldn't do much talkin'," said Rand dully. "I ain't so particular about a certain party I'm fond of," he added, "meanin' you. A killin' is a killin'—even if a girl done it, an' the man that had it comin' to him was a dirty rat."

Goldie blanched, and her eyes seemed to fill with tears. Had Rand's words some reference to the motive for her sojourn at French Sadie's cantina in Campo Santo, Mexico—beyond the reach of U.S. justice?

"It's too bad the law don't look at things the way I do, Goldie," Rand went on hurriedly, taking her hand.

"Now, ef I was holdin' that affair against you—to your discredit, like—do you think I'd be askin' you to be my wife? Listen, Goldie, I'd slip you over the border, and in a week we'd be in Canada. Then I could make you happy, so you'd forget all about that reason you can't go back to your home-town in Texas."

"Rand," she said, "I don't want to seem ungrateful, but I could never care for you the way you want me to. I guess you'd try to make me happy—and I'm just a little bit sorry you can't."

"Maybe there's someone else can," Rand was saying, when a young fellow came alongside the bar. He was Tex, and Goldie flashed a smile at him.

"Hallo," she greeted, and then: "Do you know Rand Kennedy, Tex?" she asked. "He's foreman of the Circle H."

Both men acknowledged the introduction, and Goldie went along the counter to attend to some customers who had drifted in.

"I've heard a lot about you," Rand said to Tex. "You know, the Circle H ain't a bad outfit to tie up with. Think you'd be interested in punchin' for it?"

Tex leaned against the bar. His tanned face seemed reminiscent in its expression.

"I let my brandin'-iron cool off a long time ago," he mentioned. "Leastways, for twenty-five dollars a month."

"Your shootin'-iron ain't been coolin' off none from what I hear," said Rand. "Thinkin' it over, Tex, your talents might be sorta wasted punchin' for the Circle H—when I could use 'em so convenient in my own private business. Meanin' you could warm up that brandin'-iron for considerable more than twenty-five a month."

The youngster switched his glance on to Rand's face. A curious gleam lurked in his brown eyes as he spoke.

"Sounds kinda interestin'," he murmured, and, with a meaning look: "I ain't too particular where I rangle my rope—so long as I ain't danglin' on the other end of it."

"Now you're talkin'," said Rand quickly, and he at once began to enter into details, talking in a low undertone.

"Since you know the particulars, Tex," he added, when he had made all clear, "what do you say?"

"I'm mighty careful who I ride with," the youngster retorted. "Who's in your outfit?"

"Well, there's three boys who ride with the Bar Y," Rand stated, "when they ain't ridin' with me—if you get what I mean. Then there's Poncho and Dusty. You wouldn't be knowin' them, but you don't have to worry none. They've been with me before."

"Are you sure there's no one else?" Tex asked him, looking at him keenly.

"That's all," Rand answered, recalling his interview with Kansas. "Well, I guess I'll have to be travellin', Tex. Think it over. I'll see you later."

He left the cantina, and Goldie presently rejoined Tex.

"Rand a friend of yours?" the youngster asked her.

Goldie shrugged. "He says he is. What of it?"

"Oh, nothin'—"
There was a pause, and then Tex went on speaking. "I was going to tell you I'd be leavin' soon, but I guess it doesn't matter to you," he said.

She glanced at him a little wistfully.

"Comin' back—Tex?" she murmured.

"Yes," he answered, "and when I do there's gonna be something I'll want to say to you—"

Kansas appeared from the back room at that moment, and, approaching Tex as Goldie went to the other end of the bar, he clapped him on the shoulder.

"Son," he declared, "I reckon it 'ud be casier pullin' a mare's tooth than to break you away from these here congenial surroundin's."

This with a knowing glance in the direction of Goldie. "All the same," he continued, becoming serious, "I've bin wonderin' if you was figuring on pullin' up stakes."

Tex shifted his weight from one foot to another. "I'm glad you spoke of it, Kansas," he returned. "I've been wonderin' how I was goin' to tell you."

"Oh, it don't matter to me where I go," Kansas observed, "jest so as I don't stay too long in one place. Which way are we headin', pardner?"

"We ain't," Tex answered. "We're takin' different trails for a spell, Kansas."

Kansas stared at him in bewilderment for a moment. Then his brow darkened.

"Between you an' me," he ground out, "them's fightin' words. Well, I guess we ain't friends no more."

"Why, sure we are," young Tex protested. "Kansas, d'you think it was easy for me to tell you that I'm driftin' in? Listen, Kansas, maybe I'll pick up your trail again afore very long."

Kansas was not long in recovering his good humour.

"If you mean it that way, pard," he said, "I'm sorry I took it so bad. We'll see each other again. You never can tell where two trails will cross. So-long, Tex—an' good luck!"

They gripped hands, and the youngster strode from the cantina. But as he reached the veranda he heard his name called, and looked round to see Goldie slipping out through the swing-doors.

"You were going without saying good-bye to me?" she reproached.

"But I'll be comin' back like I told you," he assured her.

She looked at him fearfully.

"I've seen them come and go from this place," she said in a low voice, "and some of them never came back. They never got this far again."

"But I'm not going very far away, Goldie," he answered. "And, say, I—I'd come back and see you every time I could if I thought you wanted me to. Only—I wouldn't want Kansas to know."

She drew a little nearer to him.

"I'm not asking you where you're going," she said. "I don't care. But if you didn't come back—"

Her underlip quivered, and suddenly he caught her in his arms.

"Would it mean that much to you, Goldie?" he asked, and, as she nodded, he kissed her swiftly.

A moment later she was watching him ride out of Campo Santo on the hot-dusty trail that led to the north.

The Hide-Out.

IN the silence of the early morning a number of men rode from various directions and mustered on a high bluff overlooking a strip of Texas prairie.

Tex and Rand Kennedy were the first to appear on the summit of the rendezvous, and, as the others showed up, the new recruit to the rustlers' gang was introduced to them—the three double-dealing punchers from the Bar Y outfit, the sleek, lank-haired Mexican, Poncho, and Dusty.

"Well, we're all here, aren't we, Rand?" said Tex, running his eye over the other members of the group.

Rand pointed to a ribbon of trail that zigzagged across the prairie below.

"Maybe now is just as good a time as any!"

A lone horseman was approaching the bluff by way of it.

"Now we are," said Rand.

The lone horseman reached the foot of the bluff and put his bronc at the steep slope. As the animal scrambled up the ascent Tex recognised its rider. Kansas was spurring towards him, a grin on his genial and unshaven countenance.

"Howdy, partner!" Kansas greeted him, with a lusty guffaw. "Picked up my trail sooner than you expected, eh?"

There was an expression of regret on Tex's face. It looked genuine, though Kansas never thought to take it seriously.

"I'm sure sorry to see you ridin' in this outfit," the youngster said.

"Yeah, I'm plumb ashamed to be found with such bad company!" Kansas replied uproariously. "Well, let's get goin'."

Thus did the trails of Tex and Kansas become one again, a trail that led to a hide-out among the sierras—where Kansas, Rand, Poncho and one or two of the others might have been seen a few days later.

They were standing outside a rude shack, whence came the sound of Tex's voice, humming a cow-camp ditty as he indulged in an early morning wash.

Presently Kansas called to the gang's new recruit.

"Tex, come here," he shouted. "Ain't you powdered your nose yet after that beauty sleep o' yours?"

Tex emerged from the cabin.

"What's the trouble, you old buzzard?" he demanded.

"These fancy hours you're keepin' is the trouble," declared Kansas. "You should go to bed on time instead o' sachayin' around the border. Anyway, the next time you go laggin' down to see Goldie, be sure you take me with you."

Rand spoke.

"That's a good idea, Kansas," he said in a curious tone. "So Tex was down seeing Goldie last night, huh? Funny I didn't see him down there."

His eyes seemed to bore into Tex, and for an instant there was something very like tension in the air. Then:

"I saw you," observed Tex. "I guess that's why you didn't see me. I always figured three was a crowd, so I just naturally waited till the crowd stampeded." And he strolled back into the cabin.

"Rand," stated Kansas, "Tex sure had the laugh on you."

Rand scowled darkly.

"It wouldn't be so funny," he mentioned, "if he had the laugh on all of us. Listen, Kansas, we ain't ridin' after no cattle until I find out just where he's ridin' the next time he goes 'visitin' Goldie.'"

It was no later than the evening of the same day that Rand had the opportunity of trailing Tex on one of his nocturnal excursions.

The double-dealing foreman of the Circle II took Kansas and Poncho along with him, but their three pairs of eyes failed to keep the fast-riding Tex in sight, and about three miles south of the hide-out they lost him.

"There's the only trail to the pass that leads over the Line," said Rand, pointing. "an' we'd see him from here if he was headed that way. Where do you suppose we missed him?"

Kansas sneered. He had scoffed at Rand's suspicions, and had only accompanied him under protest.

"Maybe he ran into a gopher hole," he suggested with a smirk. "Listen,
July 25th, 1931.

Rand, I'd be sure of what I was sayin' in future if I was you—afore I said too much."

"Yeah? Well, you and Poncho hit the trail to French Sadie's place just to satisfy yourselves. I'll go my own way. I might find that particular gopher hole."

About that same time, at the sheriff's office in a township not far from Campo Santo, but on the American side of the border, three men were engaged in conversation. One was the sheriff himself, and his chief deputy was standing by him. The third occupant of the room was Tex.

It seemed Rand's suspicions were well-founded after all, and it was on account of those suspicions that Rand was making his way to the township in question.

"Tex," the sheriff was saying, "a little while back I took a trip across the Line to Campo Santo. Of course, it bein' in Mexican territory, I've got no powers there. But I thought I might be able to pick up some information. I didn't succeed, and it's been left to you to get the low-down on these rustlers. Well, we're ready to snaffle 'em as soon as we get the word from you that they're ridin'."

"Are you sure there won't be no slips?" asked Tex.

"Don't worry about us seein' you through the minute we know when your outfit's ridin'," was the reply. "We'll get Rand and his bunch red-handed—"

He broke off as the door-handle rattled, and a swift glance passed between him and Tex. Tex acted promptly, and with a prodigious dive gained the shelter of a back room. It was as well for the sheriff's plans that he did so, for the caller was Rand Kennedy.

"Hallo, Rand," said the sheriff. "Glad to see you. What's new out at the Circle II?"

"Just what I dropped in to see you about, sheriff," Rand made answer. "I drove a thousand head of cattle into this side of Piute Range, and the old man is worryin' himself about rustlers again."

"Well, you can ease him up," the sheriff returned. "It's my idea them rustlers figure this country is too hot to hold 'em up again."

Rand looked at a letter on the sheriff's desk. It referred to a certain party introduced to the representative of the law by a Cattleman's Association anxious to check the depredations of rustlers, a young man on whose courage and shrewdness the members of the Association were prepared to stake their hopes.

"Very young, but, coupled with the fact that he is a stranger to these parts, this should be in his favour."

Rand's eyes narrowed craftily, and then, ranging about the office, fastened for a moment upon the half-open door of the back room.

"I'll tell the old man what you said," he mused, in response to the sheriff's last statement. "He'll be plumb relieved. Oh, by the way," he went on, "you remember the case of that Morgan girl—the pretty blonde who killed that man over in Laredo 'bout two years past? A fellow who knows her was askin' me about her the other day. Ever get any trace of her?"

The sheriff shook his head.

"Nope," he said. "I guess she musta got over the border like they figured at the time. Too bad she got panicky and pulled up stakes afore the law had a chance to tell her she was a free woman. You see, it was self-defence—justifiable killin', we found out afterwards."

Rand left a few minutes later. When he had gone Tex slipped out of his hiding-place.

"Think he smelt a rat?" was his first question.

"I'm not so sure," was the rejoinder. "But I'd be plumb sorry if Rand was to suspect anything now—sorry for you, I mean. You'll have to look out for him—and Kansas—specially Kansas. You know," he added, "I'd kinda like that old prairie dog Kansas if he didn't carry so much damnation in those six-guns of his."

Tex took his leave not long afterwards. Later, during a swift ride to Campo Santo, his mind harked back to Rand's conversation with the sheriff in the latter's office. The name Bessie Morgan figured prominently in his thoughts. Could it be the real name of—Goldie?

Fast Thinking.

KANSAS and Poncho strolled into French Sadie's place. The Mexican dropped into a chair beside a table near the stairs that led to the upper rooms. Kansas walked on to the bar, where he was greeted by Goldie.

"Tex not with you?" she asked.

"Oh, he'll be driftin' in shortly," drawled Kansas. "Takes somethin' mighty important to keep him from seein' you, I guess. Nothin' stopped him last night, anyways."

"Last night?" echoed Goldie. "Why Tex wasn't here last night?"

Kansas started, and then his face seemed to harden. He was standing there, with a curious look in his eyes that seemed to spell both danger and regret, when Tex entered the cantina.

"Hallo, Kansas—hallo, Goldie!" the youngster said.

"A little bit late, aincha, Tex," Kansas muttered slowly.

"Sure!" Tex answered smilingly. "I've been at the general store for the last half-hour, choosin' a little present for Goldie."

He handed a parcel across the bar, and Goldie opened it to discover a floral dress.

"Why, Tex," she exclaimed, "it's beautiful!"

"Aw, it isn't much," Tex said. His glance seemed to be riveted on her with a strange significance. "But it's the best I could do, seein' as you only told me about your birthday last night."

Goldie looked at him quickly. For an instant it looked as if she would fail to take Tex's meaning, then she saw the expression on his face.

"Why, Tex," she stammered, "you—you've made a liar out of me. I—I told Kansas you didn't see me last night. You see—it may seem silly to you—but I didn't want Rand to know."

Kansas was staring from one to the other, his suspicions obviously dispelled.

"Oh, Rand, huh?" he muttered, and at that moment the subject of their conversation appeared in the doorway. "Hallo, Rand!" Kansas hailed, with a broad grin. "What's been detainin' you? I was afraid you might have run into—a gopher hole."

Rand ignored the quip, and, as Goldie left the bar and went upstairs to try on her new frock, he lapsed into moody silence.

"Well," said Kansas presently, "I reckon you better be moscyin' along."

"I reckon so," agreed Tex. "Say good-night for me to Goldie, Rand—if you're stayin'."

They passed out of the cantina. Rand meved away from the counter and joined Poncho at the table where he was sitting. He mentioned curtly that he had dropped in at the sheriff's office on the other side of the border.

"And Tex, he was there?" asked Poncho softly.

"Couldn't prove that in a court o' law," Rand growled. "But we ain't dealin' in that brand o' law."

"I feel much better ef he did not ride with us, companero," Poncho murmured.

Rand did not know that Goldie had appeared at the head of the stairs, dressed in the floral frock, and that the girl was listening.

"Maybe he won't," he said. "Tex thought he'd put something over on me when he showed up here. But the next time he goes out riding from the cabin, payin' social visits, he won't come back."

Goldie came down the stairs, looking as if she had heard nothing. As she approached the table at which Rand and Poncho were sitting, the Mexican excused himself with an elaborate bow, and swaggered out of the saloon.

"Oh, Tex asked me to tell you good-night, Goldie," Rand announced. Then, taking her hand: "I reckon, maybe he's the reason why you ain't been so friendly to me, like of old," he added.

She wanted to tell him that so far as she was concerned he was a despicable and dangerous criminal. But she knew she could serve Tex better by keeping quiet and pretending to be sociable.

"Oh, of course I'm friendly to you, Rand," she told him. "I like you a lot."

"I ain't heard you say that you was changin' your mind about my proposition," he mentioned.

A far-away look came into Goldie's eyes.

"I was just thinking about it when I put on this dress," she mused. "I haven't worn a frock like this for a long time, and it sort of made me realise what this place is doing to me. Oh, I can't stand much more of it! I've got to get away!"

"That's easy," Rand coaxed. "You could go with me in the morning. I'd hide you out for a couple of days—just until I clean up my affairs—and then we could hit the trail for Canada."

"I'm not kidding you that I'm in love with you, Rand," she said. "I'm not. But maybe I could learn to care for you."

"I'll tako that chance," Rand answered.

And early the following morning, while they were lounging outside the lair over the border, Kansas and one or two of the gang sighted Kennedy's approach with Goldie on horseback.

"What the Sam Hill!" blurted Kansas.

Rand and Goldie cantered up to the cabin and dismounted. As they stood there, with the gang gaping at them, Tex came out of the shack. He stared at Goldie in amazement, then at Rand, and finally at the arm with which Rand was encircling the girl's waist.

"Oh, hallo, Tex!" Kennedy drawled. "I was jest about to tell the boys that Goldie is goin' to partake of our Southern hospitality—just until I straighten out my affairs and take her with me to Canada. Run along inside, honey, and make yourself at home," he added to the girl by his side. "I've got to burn the wind for the Circle H, but I'll be back to night."

"Good-bye, Rand," said Goldie sweetly.

"Aw, ain't you gonna say it with a kiss?" he protested; and, much as his nearness repelled her, she surrendered her lips.

Tex turned away bitterly, and walked to a corral situated at some distance from the cabin. As Goldie entered the shack Rand glanced in the youngster's direction, and he was watching him, with a leer on his face, when Kansas confronted him.

"Rand," said Kansas vehemently, "what are you drawin' to? That gal don't love you. Why'd you bring her here?"

"It occurred to me," Rand observed. "that she might be gettin' lonesome down there in Campo Santo—hidin' out for a killin'."

"What do you mean?"

"Bess Morgan was acquitted of that killin' right after she beat it over the border to French Sadie's place an' changed her name to Goldie," Rand went on. "It's too bad the law never caught up with her to tell her she wasn't wanted."

Kansas glared at him, his brow darkening.

"You've been keepin' the fact that she's a free woman under your hat," he ground out. "Rand, if I couldn't get a girl to marry me any way but that, I'd ride single all my life."

"You can tell her the good news," said Rand easily, "if Tex don't beat you to it."

Kansas started violently. "You ain't askin' me to believe he knows what you jest told me?" he demanded.

"He does," was the crafty rejoinder, "if he was listenin' in the sheriff's office last night—hidin' behind a door. Listen, Kansas, the first time you hear him askin' Goldie if she's Bess Morgan, and he tells her what I've told you—then it'll prove even to your trustin' mind that he's workin' with the sheriff, and out to hang every one of us."

"All I gotta say is —you'd better be right," Kansas ground out.

"And if I am, what about Tex?"

Kansas fingered the butt of one of his guns. His eyes were like cold steel, as he switched them towards the corral where the youngster was standing.

"That's the end of his trail right there," he said between his teeth.

The Gang Rides.

It was night. Kansas and Rand stood by an open window of the cabin.

From the interior of the dwelling came the sound of Goldie's voice.

"I've been waiting all day for a chance to see you alone," the eavesdroppers heard her say. "You didn't believe that I was really going with Rand, Tex, did you?"

"Aren't you?"

"Of course not," Goldie answered. "But I didn't know where you were. I took the chance that I'd find you wherever Rand brought me."

"Find me?" echoed Tex's voice.

"What for?"

"To warn you not to go riding again, Tex, because Rand said to Poncho that the next time you wouldn't come back. Oh, don't you see? I thought if I came up here you wouldn't have any excuse to go riding again, would you?"

She was sitting with Tex close to the window. Neither of them knew that Rand and Kansas were outside, but Tex suspected that they might be. That was why he answered the girl guardedly.

"Of course not, honey," he said. "Why should I?"

"Then why did you tell Kansas that you came to see me the other night?" Goldie began, but Tex cut in on her.

"It was mighty fine of you to come here and warn me about Rand," he said.

There was a little silence. During that silence Kansas took the opportunity to turn round towards Rand and glower at him menacingly. But a moment later his attention was diverted by the sound of Goldie's voice.

"Tex, there's something that I haven't told you about. I'm—wanted by the law—for something that I can't talk of now. That's why I've been staying at Sadie's. Rand knows about it. He always kept pressing me to let him take me away to Canada—"

Tex sprang to his feet, his eyes blazing.

"So that's his game, huh?" he

"I see you got Rand," he said. "Was kinda hopin' that pleasure would be mine!"

jerked, and next moment he was striding out of the cabin.

Rand and Kansas jumped aside from the window. A moment later the former found himself face to face with the youngster who had fallen under his suspicion.

"I've got some sad news for you, Rand," drawled Tex. "When we're finished ridin' to-night Goldie is takin' that trail to Canada, but you won't be with her—'cause I'm goin' in your place."

"Yeah?" growled Rand. Goldie had followed Tex out of the shack. The youngster turned to her.

"Tell him what you told me," he said to her, and, as she gazed at him in bewilderment, "It appears Goldie's got the idea you didn't approve of my callin' on her so often," Tex went on, "and that you were gonna put a permanent stop to it. Of course"—with biting sarcasm—"I know she's got you all wrong. But I thought she'd feel better to have you say so. Hadn't you better say it, Rand?"

"He's said too much already," put in Kansas bitterly.

Rand's cold, merciless eyes were riveted on Tex's face.

"I wouldn't start nothin' I couldn't finish," he warned.

By fast thinking Tex had turned an ugly situation to his benefit, but nevertheless his anger against Rand was genuine enough.

"I'm finishin' way ahead of you!" he ground out. "Get that. And I'm thankin' you for bringin' Goldie out here, seein' it saves me the trouble of ridin' into town. Of course, I wouldn't like to deprive you of the pleasure of trying to kill me, Rand. So if you're still feelin' that ambitious—maybe now is just as good a time as any!"

With the words he plucked out his six-gun with a rapid gesture, so that Rand jerked back, his face visibly paling.

"Wait a minute." It was the voice of Kansas, and Kansas laid a hand on Tex's arm. "I want to talk to you, pardner. Go inside."

Tex thrust his iron back into its holster, and turned towards the door of the cabin.

"I sorta figured you'd be paralysed at a show-down, Rand," he said over his shoulder.

Kansas moved towards Rand as Tex went inside the shack. He drew him out of Goldie's hearing.

"It looks like the kid's got the laugh on you," he stated, baring his teeth in a grin.

Rand shrugged.

"All right, Kansas," he muttered. "Maybe he wasn't in the sheriff's office that night—and maybe he's too smart to let on. But what about the particular night we know he didn't see Goldie? Are you still believin' the explanation he gave?"

Rand was referring to a jaunt made by Tex the previous night the night immediately following Goldie's arrival and the gang's decision to raid a bunch of cattle twenty-four hours later.

"We're ridin'," said Kansas, without answering Rand.

"And Tex?"

"He'll be right close to my apron-strings," Kansas replied, "where I can keep my eye on him—jest in case something happened like you suspicion, and I wanted to be sure he didn't come back. But if you're wrong, Rand, don't aggravate me by mixin' your personal grievances with business."

Saying which Kansas made his way into the cabin, where he located Tex.

July 25th, 1931.

"I reckon Rand's been shootin' off his mouth a lot," were Tex's first words.

"What does it matter what Rand says?" Kansas argued. "He's only jealous of you. Do you suppose that if a man in his right mind told me a friend of mine was a star-packer, I'd believe him?"

Tex pursed his lips, and then glanced at Kansas solemnly.

"If you did believe him, what would you do?" he asked.

"I'd shoot him like a snake," Kansas rapped out. Then he laid a hand on Tex's shoulder. "Aw, forget it," he went on carelessly. "I came in to tell you that we're ridin'—pronto. The boys are waitin' outside."

Tex shifted in his chair. "I ain't ridin' after to-night, pardner," he murmured. "I'm takin' a different trail with Goldie. I wish you'd go along with us. I'm goin' to sorta miss you, Kansas."

Kansas clapped him on the back jovially.

"You're a great kid, Tex," he declared. "Pardner."

"What do you say?" "I'll tell you after ridin'," Kansas promised. "Let's get goin'."

They passed out of the cabin. Rand, Poncho, Dusty and the three men from the Bar Y were already in the saddle. Tex and Kansas tightened the girth-ropes around their ponies and set foot in stirrup. A moment later the gang was riding through the waning starlight, filing between the clumps of Spanish Bayonet and the acacia thickets on the trail that led northwards.

The first grey streaks of dawn located them on the mesquite prairies of the southern Texas landscape, and by sun-up they were pushing into a valley where a drove of several hundred head of bees were grazing.

Concealed in a strip of woodland, another band of horsemen watched their approach. They were the sheriff and a formidable posse, and the moment the gang was sighted the sheriff began to give orders.

"Here's where we spread out," he said. "Tex will give us the signal when he fires, boys—"

The Round-Up.

THE rustlers were likewise spreading out—to envelop the herd which they intended to drive across the border. True to his word, Kansas rode stirrup-to-stirrup with Tex, and, presently halting with him in the shadow of a lone elm, he surveyed the drove of cattle with the satisfaction of a connoisseur in stolen beef.

"A pretty nice looking bunch, Tex," he observed. "Ought to stock us up for a long time."

Tex's expression was pensive. "Surely will, Kansas," he murmured, and then he laid a hand on the pommel of his companion's saddle.

"Remember what you said back in the cabin, pardner?" he went on, changing the subject. "That you'd tell me, after we'd finished ridin', if you were takin' my trail?"

Kansas nodded.

"Yeah, but we ain't finished ridin' yet," he rejoined, and, looking round, marked Poncho and Rand bearing down on the right flank of the herd.

Tex quietly drew his six-gun and nursed the muzzle of it against Kansas' ribs.

"You're finished ridin', pardner," he said. "Don't move until I tell you. Then turn around easy and head for the creek down there."

Kansas elevated his hands. His face had become livid with chagrin.

"Remember what I said about shootin' a star-packer like a snake?" he ground out. "I wish I'd believed Rand an' done it!"

"You've got me wrong, Kansas," Tex told him huskily. "I want you to get clear. It ain't too late for our trails to cross again."

"If they ever do you better see me comin'," Kansas blurted.

It was at that precise moment that Poncho the Mexican detected a movement in the strip of woodland in which the sheriff and his posse had taken up position, and under the spreading boughs of one of the trees he saw a deputy. Drawing a pearl-handled revolver, Poncho fired, and the deputy pitched out of the saddle with a groan.

Next instant there was a great outcry, and the rest of the posse burst clear of the shelter of the woods.

"Get goin', Kansas!" jerked Tex, and, as he emphasised the command with a jab of the gun, the old rustler snatched up the reins with an angry gesture and clapped spurs to his brone.

The valley was in an uproar. Guns were blazing and hoofs drumming. The cattle, grazing so peacefully a little while before, plunged forward in a wild stampede. The dust rose in clouds to obscure the scene.

The sheriff and his posse bore down on the rustlers at full gallop, shooting as they came. Poncho tried to empty another saddle, but a bullet from a deputy's gun thudded into the middle of his breast. A scream broke from the Mexican's lips, and he plunged to the ground.

One of the Bar Y men was hit in the arm, and Dusty took a slug in the stomach that dropped him in a writhing heap. Rand blazed off a couple of shots at the charging representatives of the law, but he was not the man to stand his ground when his comrades were falling all around him, and he switched his brone to the left and made a bolt for it.

He headed for the creek in the direction of which Kansas was already riding. It marked the direct route to the border and the surest way of escape. But the posse had opened out fanwise in their rush, and three of the deputies pushed between Rand and the line of his flight.

Rand swerved, changing his course and riding over the western rim of the valley towards an outcrop of the chain of the Sierra del Sacramento, intending to detour through the hills and strike the border somewhere in the vicinity of San Juan Bautista. Tex saw him, and galloped in pursuit with the aim of baffling that design if he could. He was thinking, too, of Goldie.

The three deputies who had balked Rand's dash to the creek were diverted by the flying form of Kansas. One of them took steady aim with his six-gun and fired at the fugitive, and as the iron belched flame and lead the old rustler was seen to come up in the saddle with a jerk, then sag forward across his pony's neck. But he kept his seat and rode on over the trail that led to freedom.

Meanwhile, Tex was "burning the wind" three or four hundred yards behind Rand Kennedy. Their brones were fairly evenly matched for speed, and the sierras were reached without any appreciable change taking place in the distance that separated the two horses.

Rand pushed through the hills without permitting his pony to slacken its stride. Then he followed the border line east-you, Mac, that sergeant is as full of tricks as a monkey—and he sure believes in getting his man!"

(Continued on page 26.)

"RIDERS OF THE NORTH."

(Continued from page 9.)

McGuire could only nod.

Not so many yards away from the depot, in a little hut that was curiously silent, Ann and the squaw sat, with their hands folded in their laps, staring into space with the stare that tells of broken hearts.

The door opened quietly, and almost listlessly Ann looked round.

It was Inspector Devlin.

"Come in, inspector," she whispered.

"Thanks—sure I will," said Devlin in his blunt, kindly way. "Say, Miss Ann, your brother seems to have caught up in a bit of bother, and I just want you to know that no blame can be laid on Ned Stone because he brought your brother in."

"He tricked him here—in this very room—under my eyes," she retorted. "He came here as my friend, and he used that friendship to get my own brother."

"Well, he's going away, and I sort of guess he wants to say so," said the inspector, and raised his voice. "Come in, Ned!"

The door opened again—but it was Tom who came in first. Ned Stone's red tunic was behind.

"You are taking him away?" she said.

"Away?" blurted out Tom. "He's brought me back. He tricked McGuire into a confession. They planted the gun on me after Leclere had shot him. Ann—I'm free!"

"Free?" echoed Ann dully.

"Sure, I'm free—sure!" exclaimed Tom ecstatically.

But the last "sure" was in answer to the inspector's nodded indication that two was company and four was not. He went out into the far room with the inspector. But it was only for a moment.

It was the inspector who opened the door again, wide enough for them both to poke their heads into the room in which were Ann and Ned. Those two, in the curiously silent way understanding lovers have, had crossed the floor and met.

"Say, Miss Ann, I forgot to say that Ned is going for two weeks leave, and they do say that the west lake is a fine place for a honeymoon!" said the inspector.

And again the door was closed, this time very firmly.

Ned took her gently by the shoulders.

"If I am forgiven for my tricks—what do you say, Ann?" he asked very softly.

"I should just love—a honeymoon trip!" she whispered.

And weeks of anxiety drifted into the dim past as quickly as he stopped further utterance in the only possible way.

(By permission of the British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Bob Custer and Blanche Mehaffey.)

(Continued from page 2.)

Thrills for the Cameramen.

There are times when the cameramen have their thrills the same as artists. Imagine what it must be like hanging downwards on the under-side of an aeroplane several hundred feet in the air and with a camera taking pictures in this inverted and perilous position. Yet this is precisely what three cameramen had to do when filming aerial and naval manoeuvres at Panama.

Among the thrills which the cameramen experienced was that of operating their machines while the naval pilots made take-offs and landings in a space where a few inches would have meant disaster. Other cameramen had to work from a "target" plane just a few feet ahead of bullets from a battle fleet. The cameras were elamped to naval planes trailing the kite-like targets which, towed in the air some distance from behind the ships, served as marks for anti-aircraft guns from below. It may be interesting to know that these scenes are among the aviation thrills filmed for the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture, "Sea Eagles," in which Wallace Beery and Marjorie Rambeau play principal parts.

Just for Luck.

Bobby Coogan, brother of the famous Jackie, does not apparently believe in (Continued on page 28.)

"Fine Score that!"

HE was well past the century before he was caught out. A fine score by a good player.

A piece of Wrigley's Chewing Gum in the mouth refreshes, keeps you alert during the game.

Wrigley's helps digestion, too, and cleanses the teeth. Chew a piece "after every meal."

In two flavours—P.K., a pure peppermint flavour; and Spearmint, a pure mint leaf flavour. Only 1d. a packet but the finest quality money can buy.

The flavour lasts—British made

WRIGLEY'S

1^d PER PACKET

"THE SUNRISE TRAIL."

(Continued from page 24.)

ward till he gained the canyon in which the rustlers' lair nestled. He swung himself out of the saddle at the front door of the cabin, and as he dropped to the ground Goldie came running out.

She looked strained and anxious.

"Where are the others?" she panted. "Where's—Tex?"

Rand's eyes narrowed dangerously.

"What you heard, me tell Poncho goes," he snarled. "That star-packin' friend of yours ain't never comin' back!"

Even as he spoke he heard the drumming of hoofs, and a moment later he saw Tex riding clear of a mass of brushwood that masked the mouth of the canyon. With a violent gesture Rand pushed Goldie into the shack and snatched out his shooting-iron.

Tex caught sight of him only when the gun was in his fist. He tried to grab his own forty-five, but Rand's Colt crashed deafeningly ere his fingers could close on the butt.

A grunt escaped Tex. He dived out of the saddle and hit the ground on the point of his shoulder, the shock jarring him and accentuating a searing pain high up on his left arm. He thought he was going to faint, but fought back the sensation with a sheer effort of will and reached for his hip again.

Rand jerked his gun forward viciously, and fired three bullets in quick succession. They spurted the dust over Tex's face, but did not strike him, and his hand closed on his revolver and wrenched it free.

He pulled the trigger. A shot burst with a smashing report, and Rand suddenly came up on his toes, a stupefied expression on his thin face. Then his eyes glazed, and he pitched forward with a hollow groan.

Tex struggled to his feet, and, covering Rand's prone form cautiously, he walked towards the man. A closer scrutiny of his body convinced him that he had nothing to fear from Rand, and he had returned his six-gun to its holster when Goldie stumbled out of the cabin.

"Oh, Tex," she moaned, and then, seeing the blood that stained his shirt-sleeve: "You're hurt!" she gasped.

"Just a scratch," he said with an effort.

She helped him inside and led him to a chair. He sank down and began to unbutton his cuff.

"No, no," she protested, "don't you do that. Let me take care of it for you. I'll get some water and bathe the wound, Tex."

She hurried through to a back room. Tex leaned back in the chair, dizzily. The pain in his arm was beginning to be excruciating, yet he was not thinking of himself. He was thinking of Kansas.

Different Trails.

OF his flight from the valley after the deputy's bullet had struck him in the back Kansas had no clear impression. For, about a mile from the scene of the ambush, his senses abandoned him and left him oblivious of his surroundings and the movements of his horse.

When he recovered consciousness the pony had come to a standstill and was contentedly eating leaves from a mesquite branch that hung over the trail. How long he had been there Kansas could not tell, but as he looked about him he realised that he was in the neighbourhood of the border.

He rode on, and in about fifteen minutes he gained the canyon where the hide-out was situated. He halted at some little distance from the cabin and left his mount tethered in the brushwood, proceeding at a slow pace on foot.

As he drew nearer he saw Tex's sorrel munching grass in the vicinity of the shack, and his eyes glittered ominously. Then he discerned the figure of Rand Kennedy sprawled near the doorstep.

The wound in the old rustler's body was like a living coal, but his will challenged physical agony. Tex was here—Tex, who had talked of comradeship and then turned out to be a star-packer, hand-in-glove with the sheriff. The thought hammered through Kansas' reeling brain, and he walked on with unsteady, but determined, gait.

He had a mission to perform before he took his trail.

Kansas reached the little veranda of the cabin, crossed it silently and leaned against the jamb of the door. The door was open, and in the front room of the shack, sitting in that chair with his back to him, he saw Tex.

Kansas drew one of his guns and moved across the threshold.

"Turn around, Tex," he said slowly, "so you can see who's givin' it to you."

Tex's chair scraped. He stumbled to his feet and wheeled, gaping at Kansas. There was a look of anxiety on his clean-cut face, but it was not on his own account.

"Get going, Kansas," he blurted, "before the sheriff comes up with you!"

Kansas stared at him under beetling brows. He was swaying a little on his feet, but he held his six-gun steadily enough.

"Get goin', huh?" he ground out. "Not until I get you!"

Kansas levelled the forty-five. To him this youngster seemed a low-down double-crosser. He did not understand what Tex had tried to do for him. To him Tex seemed to have violated a trust, when actually he had held tenaciously to the bonds of partnership in the face of the law, in the face of circumstances that had made his position difficult and insecure.

Tex did not flinch. He looked at Kansas sadly, regretfully, watching him as he took aim.

The old rustler's finger curled on the trigger. At that same instant a deadly spasm of pain racked his body, searing through and through him from the wound in his back. He toppled forward uncertainly. The barrel of his six-gun dipped.

The weapon went off with a roar, but the bullet smashed harmlessly into the floor-boards. Next second Tex had caught Kansas in his arms.

Goldie came running through from the back room.

"He's been badly hit, I guess," said Tex hoarsely. "We'll get him on to that bunk."

They laid him out on a bed. Presently Kansas opened his eyes, to find Goldie stooping over him and laying wet cloths on his head. Tex crouched beside her.

"It sure is—mighty flatterin'—to see you all hot-up over me—Goldie," Kansas breathed.

Goldie pressed his hand. She was holding his gnarled fingers tightly in his grasp when the stillness of the canyon was broken by the sound of hoofs. An expression that held a touch of resignation crossed Kansas' face.

THREE GRAND COMPLETE FILM NOVELS.

Two men wanted her—they were friends and partners, and she a woman who "hated" men. A powerful drama of yesterday's mis-steps, starring Bebe Daniels, Ben Lyon and Lewis Stone.

"MOTHER'S MILLIONS."

Her husband's death was caused by a financial swindle and she swore revenge. She became hard, bad-tempered and fierce, so that her children feared her and yet she did not forget their welfare. Starring May Robson and James Hall.

"BLOOD BROTHERS."

The heart-gripping story of twin brothers—one brought up in poverty, the other amid wealth. Starring Bert Lytell.

Don't miss these fine stories, complete in this week's issue of our companion paper

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY.
July 25th, 1931.

PRICE 2c.

Tex glanced through the window, and saw the sheriff riding through the brushwood alone. He scrambled to his feet and hurried out of the cabin even as the representative of the law dismounted near the door.

The sheriff looked down at the figure of Kennedy.

"I see you got Rand," he said. "Was kinda hopin' that pleasure would be mine."

Tex nodded.

"He tried to finish me off," he mentioned, "but his shootin' was about as straight as the way he lived. Did you get the rest of the gang?"

"All but Kansas," was the rejoinder. "And I figured on gettin' him most specially."

There was a silence, and then the sheriff pointed to the blood on Tex's shirt-sleeve.

"I see you got hit there," he said concernedly. "Come on into the cabin and I'll wash that up for you, kid."

Tex had learned to do some fast thinking in the last week or two, but here was a situation where it was necessary to bluff the law, and not a bunch of rustlers. "The mind, and not the hand, must be quicker than the eye."

The sheriff was moving towards the door of the shack. One step more and he could not fail to see the man whom Goldie was nursing.

Tex slipped between him and the threshold, barring the way.

"Aw, don't bother about this, sheriff," he protested, indicating his arm. "Kansas is gettin' farther away from you every minute. The last time I saw him he was headed for the pass."

"Yeah?"

"He sure was," Tex proceeded, "and ridin' heaven-to-split. You take the ridge and I'll take the canyon, and we'll try to head him off."

Inside the cabin, both Goldie and Kansas heard Tex's words, and a queer, whimsical light of understanding came into the wounded man's eyes. Then the sheriff's reply reached his ears.

"That's a good idea," the representative of the law declared. "Let's get goin'."

He sprang to his horse and swung himself into the saddle, riding off through the brushwood and spurring out of the canyon to make for the ridge of which Tex had spoken. Had he looked back he might have observed that Tex did not take to horse, but turned to re-enter the shack.

Crossing the threshold, Tex made his way to the bunk on which the last of the rustlers lay. Kansas conjured up a pitiful smile as he approached, and then lifted a hand. His grip had lost its strength, but his fingers closed eloquently on the youngster's fist.

Tex sank down on his knees by the bedside. He was shocked and alarmed to see that the wounded man's face was deathly pale.

Kansas gazed at him reminiscently. His mind was drifting back to their first encounter in French Sadie's saloon at Campo Santo—to the card-game in which Fancy Joe had met his match.

"Ain't you gonna show me—where you got that fourth ace—Tex?" he murmured.

Tex bent over him.

"Sure—Kansas," he said huskily. "There'll be plenty of time for showin' you—where we're going'. We'll be takin' that different trail. You, and Goldie—an' me—"

Kansas looked beyond him dreamily, and his eyes seemed to be hazy. He moved his head from side to side—a wistful, negative movement. On the other side of the bunk, Goldie had begun to cry, silently, and suddenly Tex felt a lump rise in his throat. For he knew that what he had proposed could never be.

Kansas was taking another trail, remote from the one they would follow. Kansas was dying. The bloodless pallor of his pinched face and the glassiness of his eyes was death.

"You—an' Goldie," said Kansas softly. "But me—I've finished ridin'—pardner—"

His head sank back on Tex's outstretched arm.

Gently Tex withdrew his arm from under the dead man's head and, raising Goldie up in his arms, moved with her towards the door of the shack.

"Good-bye, old pardner," he whispered back over his shoulder ere closing the door on a chapter of his career that would for ever live in his memory.

(By permission of the Gaumont-Tiffany Film Co. Ltd., starring Bob Steele and Blanche McHaffey.)

YOURS FOR

5/6

INGERSOLL
"CROWN"

Radiolite Dial, 7/6

A Genuine
Guaranteed
INGERSOLL

Every boy wants a watch—every boy should have an Ingersoll. This fine watch, illustrated here, has a nickel case and is strong, reliable and guaranteed. Sold by Ingersoll Agents everywhere. Ask your father—he knows Ingersoll's.

INGERSOLL Ltd., Kingsway, London, W.C.2.

Ingersoll

IDEAL for CAMPER'S The ROAMER Tent

The greatest tent bargain ever offered

Size 6ft. long, 4ft. 3in. wide, 3ft. 6in. high, 6in. walls. Made from strong white material. Brass-jointed poles in 3 sections. Complete with all accessories in white cotton valise. 12/6 Green Rotproof material 17/11, post 1/-.

Ground Sheets to fit, 5/11. Sent C.O.D. if desired.

BLANKS, 303, GRAYS INN ROAD, Kings Cross, LONDON, W.C.1.

MY GREAT OFFER

Write for my free Bargain Lists of the best ALL BRITISH cycles. 14 DAYS' APPROVAL. CARRIAGE PAID. Cash price £3 15s. 0d., or terms. All accessories FREE. Value 21/-.

2
WEEKLY

Edwin esrien THE WORLD'S LARGEST CYCLE DEALER, 117, 119, 121, 123, COVENTRY.

XMAS CLUBS

SPARE TIME AGENTS WANTED for Oldest, Largest, and BEST Club. Excellent Commission—no outlay. Art Catalogue Free with full particulars.

SAMUEL DRIVER LTD., Burton Road, LEEDS.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.1.

(Continued from page 25.)

shaking hands, as is usual after a film contract has been signed.

Bobby recently accompanied his father, Jack Coogan, sen., to the office of Ben Schulberg, of Paramount, where the grown-ups were to settle all the details relating to Bobby's contract with that company. When everything had been carefully discussed and approved, Papa Coogan affixed his signature and then Mr. Schulberg signed on behalf of Paramount. Bobby, who had up till now been a silent and very bored witness of the whole proceedings, came forward from his seat.

"Is it all set now, Pop," he inquired. "Yes, all set, Bobby," replied the elder Coogan, beaming down at his little son.

With that Bobby rushed round behind Mr. Schulberg's desk. But as that gentleman turned round to shake hands with the eager-faced boy, Bobby gave him a sharp kick on the shins. For a few seconds there was dead silence, and when the grown-ups had recovered from their astonishment, Papa Coogan demanded what Bobby had meant by his action. Turning to Mr. Schulberg, Bobby explained with a grin:

"That's for luck, Mr. Schulberg!"

Animal Doubles.

You all have read much from time to time about artistes who double for others in certain stunts. But how many of you know that there are doubles among the famous horses seen in Western films?

Before Tom Mix retired from pictures, his numerous admirers were as greatly interested in Tony as in the cowboy himself. Yet Tom Mix did not have one Tony, as was generally supposed, but eight horses which could be cast in that name. And they were all so much alike that picture-goers could not tell which was which. The reason was this: One horse could not have been used year after year in daring stunts, without some mishap or illness coming to the animal. That would have meant holding up the production, always a costly affair. Again, in "long shots," it was not necessary to use the same horse as picture-goers saw more closely on the screen. For these and other reasons, more than one Tony was required.

Again, in "The Painted Desert," Bill Boyd rides a horse which has doubled for other horses. "Ghost," as he is known, has doubled for Ken Maynard's horse. "Ghost's" master, Bill Hurley, considers his equine possession so valuable that he has refused numerous offers from purchasers. But though "Ghost" has been in pictures for years, he is never cast under that name. He is always a double for some other horse.

Perils of Alpine Talkie.

Dr. Arnold Franck, who made that splendid silent picture, "The White Hell of Pitz Palu," has followed it with another drama of the Alps called "Avalanche." This new picture, which some of you have doubtless seen already, has the distinction of being the first Alpine talkie. Also it was filmed 15,750 feet up in the rarefied atmosphere on Mont Blanc's summit.

Hardships and risks that threatened death had to be faced day after day. The daring cameramen carried their apparatus on their backs and their lives in their hands when they descended, at a rope's end, the torn glaciers to secure their pictures.

Life and property were frequently in danger from avalanches, snowstorms and Alpine thunder and lightning. Added to all this was the difficulty of breathing comfortably at such a high altitude, the suffering from glacier burns—caused by the refraction of the sun's rays on the ice—and a shortage of food and water.

There were, too, fissures in the rocky face of the mountain, lightly covered over with snow so that one could not see the sheer, bottomless drops between walls of solid ice. One day, Dr. Franck himself, experienced mountaineer though he is, fell into one of these treacherous pitfalls. He was rescued alive from a depth of seventy feet.

The rope on which all mountain climbers rely for safety is impracticable for filming, and the production company were obliged to discard its use for linking them to safety.

Dr. Franck was studying a new camera position when he suddenly disappeared from sight on what seemed to be a smooth snowy surface. Those who saw the incident were stunned into silence for a few moments. Then a rope was lowered down the crevasse, and after several minutes Franck's voice could be heard.

He was wedged between the walls of the crevasse, head downwards, but managed to secure the rope round his body and was hauled to safety. He was badly bruised, and his skin cut and grazed, but fortunately no bones were broken.

"THE MIDNIGHT SPECIAL."

(Continued from page 18.)

came in at Jerry, his fists lashing out like flails.

Jerry caught a lard blow full between the eyes, another on the side of his head, but though somewhat dazed, he flung gallantly forward and grappled desperately with his man.

Backwards and forwards they raged beside the drawn-up touter, while Ellen, standing up in the front of the vehicle, gazed fearfully down at them, a fervent prayer upon her lips that Jerry would gain the mastery.

"Jerry! Oh, Jerry, look out!" Ellen's face blanched and her hazel grey eyes goggled with a terrible fear as the two fiercely fighting men suddenly lurched to the very edge of the road. "Jerry! Oh, for heavens sake—"

Her words ended in a terrifying scream as they went over, dropping quickly from her sight.

Dead! The dread word hammered in Ellen's burning brain and she felt her knees grow suddenly weak beneath her. But with an effort, she forced herself from the car, went to the edge of the road and gazed fearfully over. To her amazed eyes, she saw two furiously fighting figures slithering down a fairly steep slope and as it was borne in upon her that at this spot the side of the road did not drop sheer to the valley, she gave a little hysterical laugh.

The fight went on, fierce and relentless, all the way down that slope. But the valley reached, it came to a sudden end. Ellen saw one of the combatants slowly get to his feet while the other lay stretched full length on his face. And she could just make out by the clothes he wore that the vanquished was George Walton.

A week later no more happy youngster could be found in the whole of the little town of Burke than Jerry Boone. He still limped painfully around as a result of the cuts and bruises he had sustained in the never-to-be-forgotten fight with Walton, who was now safe behind prison bars.

Jerry's future was assured. He was back in the services of the railroad company, his name vindicated, his position now that of section superintendent—a handsome promotion he thoroughly deserved. But to him this was not the greatest joy in his young life. He and Ellen were to be married in a day or so and that was what brought him his present great feeling of happiness.

(By permission of the W. and F. Film Service Ltd., starring Glenn Tryon and Merna Kennedy.)

SPURPROOF TENTS.

Guaranteed Reg.

Made from light-weight proofed material. Complete with three-piece jointed poles, pegs, guy lines, and white valance. Weight 5 lbs. Size 6 ft. x 4 ft. 6 ins. x 3 ft. 6 ins. With 6 in. wall and 3 in. lva. 12/3

Accommodates three boys. Postage 9d. Special extra light-weight. Made from Egyptian cotton. Same size. Weight 3 1/2 lbs. 17/6.

Send for beautiful illustrated Camping List, post free. GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, NEW BRIDGE STREET, E.C.4.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-, Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, "Nerves" Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/- Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

LET ME MAKE YOU TALLER! Write for my two Free Books, beautifully illustrated. Enclose 2d. stamp. Your only wonder will be "Why did not someone think of it before?"—P. Carne, Rhiwbina, Cardiff S.W.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-), including Airpost Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Eugene Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

Boys' Cinema

"THE SPY," "FIREBRAND JORDAN" and "MONSTERS OF THE DEEP."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boys' CINEMA 2^D

No. 607.

EVERY TUESDAY.

AUGUST 1st, 1931.

A thrilling story of the West.
Starring
BOB
CUSTER.

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Under Texas Skies."

Rankin, Bob Custer; Joan Prescott, Natalie Kingston; Captain Hartford, Tom London; Singer Martin, Lane Chandler; The Agent, Bill Cody; Deputy-marshal, William McCall; Sheriff Moody, J. S. Marba; The Dummy, Bob Roper.

"The Spy."

Anna, Kay Johnson; Ivan, Neil Hamilton; Sergei, John Halliday; Kolya, Freddie Frederick; Yaseha, Milton Holmes; Petya, Austen Jewell; President of Teheka, Henry Kolker.

"Firebrand Jordan."

Firebrand Jordan, Lane Chandler; Joan Howe, Aline Goodwin; Red Carson, Yakima Canutt; David Hampton, Sheldon Lewis; Peggy Howe, Marguerite Ainslee; Ed Burns, Tom London; Spike, Lew Meehan; Tony Perelli, Frank Yaconalli; Ah Sing, Alfred Hewston; Judd Howe, Fred Harvey; Pete, Cliff Lyons.

Old Ghost Town Walks Again.

Kernville, a deserted gold centre, once more comes into the limelight as the locale of the Western film, "Firebrand Jordan." The town was the scene of much feverish activity way back in '49, and was rapidly populated by prospectors and the usual band of outlaws who follow in the track of gold rushes.

One particular section of the town, in time, came to be known as the "whiskey flats," the district of hard-drinking, fast-shooting, bad men, who recognised none but their own law.

The old cemetery, one of the sights of the town, bears silent witness in its headstones to the hundreds of inhabitants of this section who died in their boots during the troublesome times of '49.

Tom Mix to Return.

Tom Mix's admirers, whose number is legion, will be delighted to learn that their favourite cowboy hero will again be seen in pictures.

It is a little over two years ago that the most famous of all cowboy stars was offered so much money to star in a circus that he left Hollywood flat. But that he would one day be persuaded to return was obvious to many who knew his value in filmland. Well, now the thing has been done. The Universal Film Company, through its sixty-five-years-old president, Carl Laemmle, has offered Tom Mix a salary, which, though the figure is not disclosed, is understood to be exceedingly high.

When Tom Mix left pictures he was reputed to be making about £2,000 a week. His new contract calls for six pictures, the first of which is to be begun in October. The star will be given a separate production company, a director, and all facilities so that his August 1st, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

A gambler, falsely accused of murder, eludes pursuit and gets a job on a ranch, where he turns the tables on a despicable rogue. Action-adventure-romance—in a grand Western thriller, starring Mahlon Hamilton and Doris Hill.

"LES AMOURS DE MINUIT."

A grand and gripping crook drama of life and adventure in the underworld.

"THE KID FROM ARIZONA."

Cattlemen at Fire Mountain are terrorised by a mysterious band of "ghost" Indians, but the "Kid From Arizona" solved the mystery, won a great horse race, and brought a crook to justice. Starring Jack Perrin and his horse, Starlight.

pictures can be produced on the big, spectacular scale beloved of Hollywood. In addition to Tom Mix, Universal has also signed a contract with Hoot Gibson to make six big Western pictures before the end of the year.

A Thrilling Fight Scene.

Few of you may know that there is in British films a Charles Farrell, who is no relation to his American namesake. Farrell, the Englishman, can boast of having had a fight in every film in which he has appeared, and they are many. He can show you proof of this in the twenty-seven scars he has received in various studios. His most recent encounter was for "The Man at Six," a British International Picture, produced at Elstree, where his opponent was Gerald Rawlinson.

The fight began with Rawlinson leaping over a refectory table in pursuit of Farrell, who turned and felled him with a clip on the chin. After that the two went at it, "hot and strong." Rawlinson, after struggling to his feet, launched himself bodily at the departing Farrell, and brought him down in fine Rugby style. Then for several minutes the two men struggled with each other on the floor, till Farrell, as required by the story, began to throttle his opponent, and only stopped when Harry Hughes, the director, gave the O.K. signal.

Exit Farina.

Farina has said good-bye to "Our Gang" comedies. Already many of you may have noticed that his place on the screen has been taken by a new, little coloured eon known as "Stymie."

The departure of Farina is certain to be regretted by millions of picture-goers. For though the other "Our Gang" youngsters were all favourites, it was the little black boy who could roll his eyes so comically that really engaged our interest most. Some of you may remember that when Farina first appeared in films he was always dressed as a girl.

Picture-goers, in fact, used to have heated arguments over the question of his sex. Meanwhile, Farina hated the wearing of skirts and pigtails, and there was no gladder day for him at the studio than when Hal Roach, his producer, permitted him to appear as a boy. Even then, he continued to be as funny as ever. But he was growing up, and, when he reached the age of eleven, it was felt that he was too old to frolic before the camera with the rest of "Our Gang."

His name in real life is Allen Clayton Hoskins.

Answers to Questions.

No. I should not advise you to enclose a stamped and addressed envelope when you write to artistes in America. Allen (Queensland). A better way would be to put in each letter an international coupon, obtainable at almost any post-office. Clara Bow has retired from the screen, but your other favourites can be addressed as follows: Jack Oakie, care of the Paramount Public Studios, Hollywood, California, U.S.A.; Ronald Colman, care of United Artists Studios, 1041, North Formosa Avenue, Hollywood, California, and Anita Page, care of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, California. I am glad to hear you are able to see so many fine films.

A GUARANTEED WATCH.

The ambition of every boy is to own a watch like his father, and this ambition can be realised at very small cost. For five shillings you can obtain a strong, reliable and guaranteed Ingersoll watch in a nickel case, which will delight the heart of any boy. They are sold by Ingersoll agents everywhere, or direct from Ingersoll, Ltd., Kingsway, London, W.C.2.

The girl owner of a horse ranch becomes the prey of a notorious band of rustlers, but a stranger comes to her aid and by amazing escapades turns the tables on her enemies.
Starring Bob Custer and Natalie Kingston.

UNDER TEXAS SKIES

Rustlers!

"HUR-P! Hurp!"
"Round off that leader, boys!"
"Hur-p! Hur-p!"
"Git that leader sorter turning to th' right!"
"Hur-up!"

The "boys" of the Circle A Ranch were well at it, rounding up the horses, young and old, that had been roaming over the vast, picturesque plains for days past.

There had been changes at Circle A Ranch. Things had not gone right for old Abe Prescott, and not a little of this trouble had arisen through the incessant raids of horse thieves. Years, and the worry, sent Abe Prescott to his grave, and put his daughter Joan in possession not only of the ranch but of the worries.

Joan was a sensible girl. She realised that before she could hope to make the ranch a successful business she would have to get rid of the debts her somewhat careless father had accumulated.

The ranch hands, from top to bottom, were with her. They had not been paid for weeks past, but they were getting their food and had their living-quarters, and were content to work on with the "young missy."

Joan had that morning given instructions to round up the horses, and everybody knew that those horses were destined for the Remounts Department of the Government services.

Many of the horses were more or less wild, never having been broken into the saddle. But in spite of this there was no doubt but that the Circle A bunch of horses was a pretty fine lot.

And judging by the skill with which the boys rounded them up, Circle A could also apply the words "pretty fine lot" to the boys themselves. They rode with the ease and grace of men born to the saddle, their clever mounts obeying the slightest pressure of knee or the merest sound of voices. In fact, they were obeying the direction of the boys' leader almost before the boys had fully grasped what those orders were.

"Let 'em run, boys—let 'em run!"
"Hur-p! Hurp!"

Through the valley, with the towering hills, the bush-lined trails, and the dried-up grass plains reflecting the burning rays of the midday sun, the Circle A outfit cut for home.

It was a scene of astonishing activity. The boys' horses galloped round and round with the furious speed of race-horses, but with the sure-footedness of mountain goats. Baked-up ditches were jumped with a recklessness that only the urgency of precious seconds could justify. But the leaders of the bunch had to be turned when such ditches were reached, or there would be many a broken leg and a useless horse left in the clouds of dust that the outfit left behind.

Never a horse fell. As skillfully as though every horse had its rider, or was at least guided by reins held in steel-like fingers, the bunch was driven to right or to left away from danger, and always towards the ranch.

A mile more the dusty, baked ground was to be covered when there appeared on top of a hill the figure of a man mounted upon a cayuse. In a matter of seconds he was joined by three others.

It was when they stood up in their saddles, to strain their eyes and peer down into the valley where Circle A boys were at work, that the ranch foreman saw them and let out a yell of warning.

"Head 'em off—head 'em off!" he bellowed. "There's Mustang Pete and his gang!"

"Hur-p!"

As though their very lives depended upon it, four of the Circle A boys rode to head off the horses, and in an uncannily short time the whole outfit had come to a panting, sweating stop.

"Boys, git after Pete, or they'll sure bunch together and break up the hosses!" rapped out the ranch foreman. "Sam—Jim—Jack, stay with the bunch. Come on, the rest of you!"

No further orders were issued or wanted. But spurs went into the sides of willing mounts, and in a flash the Circle A boys were riding up the trail towards the spot where Mustang Pete and his men had been seen.

But they were too late to save Joan Prescott's horses. Mustang Pete had signalled his orders, and in a matter of seconds there were so many clouds of dust rising from pounding hoofs that it was almost impossible to tell which was friend and which was enemy.

Guns began to spit their messages of lead. A saddle next to the ranch foreman was emptied.

"On y' right, boys!" he roared.

Down in the valley were more clouds of dust and more bursts of revolver-fire. The ranch foreman groaned as he saw the three cowboys he had left to guard the horses driven off by sheer force of numbers, and their running fire was of no use. Mustang Pete had ample men to fight with and get Joan's horses on the move again.

Just off the trail the wounded cowboy had the attention of two of the ranch's best boys. The three below were chased out of the valley and a final shower of bullets followed them up the home trail. The ranch foreman had four others with him, but they could do nothing against Mustang Pete's gang.

The foreman gave one glance down into the valley, saw the clouds of dust arising where the bunch had already been set moving, and gritted his teeth with rage.

"They've done us, boys!" he shouted.

"Let's git outer hyer! We'll round 'em all up agin one day!"

Bullets and derisive shouts followed them as they, too, cut for the home trail. The bullets had no effect, but the derisive shout made the cowboys boil with bitter, hopeless rage.

They rode like fiends, tucking their own guns into their holsters when they were out of range of the rustlers, and it was not until they were nearly home that the foreman jerked his mount upon its haunches, removed his Stetson, and wiped his sweat-dripping brow.

"Here's a purty nice thing! Miss Joan's best hosses rustled under our very noses—and she reckonin' on selling them to the Government! Shucks! Anybody like my job?" he groaned.

There was a general shaking of heads. Breaking the news to Miss Joan was to be a most unpleasant task—and there was nobody like the foreman for the job.

It was a very discon-olate party that continued the ride to the Circle A Ranch, and if mere expressions could have caused any damage, Mustang Pete and his gang would have troubled neither Circle A nor any other ranch. But expressions and thoughts did no damage, and Mustang Pete, doubtless heartened by his somewhat easy victory, and encouraged by cleaning up such a fine bunch of horses as Joan Prescott's, was free to carry on his nefarious work.

A Valuable Prisoner.

"HEY-UP, boys! Who's down below?"

Mustang Pete and two of his gang, riding leisurely down the trail, and still chuckling over the discomfiture of the Circle A outfit, pulled up suddenly.

From their vantage-point they could gain a good view of the bottom trail, which was mainly used by direct travellers and the mail coaches. It needed but a single glance to tell the rustlers that the cloud of dust that had first attracted Mustang Pete's keen eyes was raised by a rider who was a stranger to those parts.

He did not wear the chaps the regular cowboys invariably sported. His riding-breeches were city made, and over his shirt he had a smart-cut black coat that would have done credit to a well-paid clerk. A white collar, a black tie, and a trim Stetson completed the outfit that proclaimed its wearer a visitor to the rough-and-ready West.

"Say, that's sure a guy who might like to know the way to his destination," mused Pete. "And I reckon we're the bucks to help a stranger in these hyer parts. Come on, boys! Cut him off at the South Canyon!"

In a flash the horses were turned and driven hard back along the trail, through the bushes, along a narrow path through a more heavily wooded section, and down a steep bank to the bottom trail. They had timed their arrival to a nicety, for the stranger was loping along within twenty yards of the open plain.

"Jerk up, stranger!" said Mustang Pete loudly.

The stranger had no option about the matter. He had three big horses in front of him, and one of these was quickly slipped behind him as he pulled up.

"Reckon you're a stranger around hyer?" said Pete affably.

"Sure. I'm on my way to Circle A ranch, which I guess is pretty handy," replied the stranger briefly.

"Sure it is—sure!" drawled Mustang Pete. "You've been riding so god-darned slow down the trail, stranger, that we thought you were breakin' a Texas rule by overburdenin' your hoss—and a right, purty pinto he is!"

The rustlers looked in admiration at the pinto the stranger rode. He was not a big horse by any means—a pony in size if not in age. He had black and white patches as neatly arranged as if by an artist and he was, all in all, just about the prettiest horse those rustlers had ever seen.

"He's sure a nice pinto," agreed the stranger, his keen eyes watching his questioners warily. "I ain't ridden him hard, you can bet your next Sunday's dinner! Waal, thank you—"

"Waiter bit!" cut in Mustang Pete easily. "We're reckonin' that perhaps it's your pocket book that's too heavy. The rest of the trail to Circle A, stranger, is too hard for you and your pocket book. Better lay it over our way!"

The stranger did not reply in words. He dug his spurs fiercely into the pinto's sides, and in a flash it had reared up, scattered the horses in front of him, and was flying down the trail.

"Git him!" grunted Mustang Pete curtly.

He thudded after the stranger, and Mustang Pete doubtless thinking that one day perhaps the speed of his mount would mean the difference between hanging on a sheriff's rope and roaming under the glorious Texas skies, had what was probably the speediest horse in all Texas.

He unwound his rope as he rode, and at the rope-throwing game, too, Mustang Pete had few rivals. The stranger could not have heard the swirl of the noose as it whistled through the air, but he flung up his arms frantically as it settled over his shoulders.

He was a fraction of a second too late. Mustang Pete jerked the noose taut before the stranger could escape, and the rustler's big horse was only jerked a few yards before the little pinto had cast its dusty rider on to the dusty trail.

The rustlers were around him in a moment, and this time they had drawn their guns.

"You'll get a rope for this," said the stranger, between his teeth.

"Sure—when they catch us!" grinned Mustang Pete, and stared curiously at the neatly dressed victim. "Say, stranger, you're in a mighty hurry to git to Circle A—what might your business be thar?"

"That's my business!" snapped the stranger.

"Guess it might be ours, too," mused Mustang Pete. "Git him along to the shack, boys! Guess we'll have a talk with him."

"Move, stranger," grunted one of the rustlers, and a gun poking into the stranger's ribs was a persuasive form of argument.

It was ten minutes later when he was driven to a shack almost hidden in the bushes, and here two other rustlers joined them.

Mustang Pete slipped from his saddle and grabbed at the stranger as he showed a momentary inclination to make a run for it.

"Not so fast, stranger—you sure is showin' rotten manners for a city guy! You ain't said how'd y'do to the boys yet!" he drawled. "They're inside—waiting for you! Git that pinto in the corral, boys, whilst I do the inter-ducin'! This way, stranger!"

There was no help for it. The stranger had no gun and against a bunch of rustlers who not only had guns, but who were quite prepared to use them on the slightest provocation he was as helpless as a babe.

He submitted himself to be led into the hut, where his keen eyes searchingly examined the faces of another half a dozen of Mustang Pete's boys.

"Well?" he snapped. "What now?"

"Git that pocket book—anything else he's got, too!" snapped Pete.

"Hustle, boys!"

The boys hustled, and although more than one of them received information, in the shape of a hard, bunched fist, that the stranger was no city weakling, sheer weight of numbers saw him crushed to the ground, and here his pockets were rifled with the speed that only comes with practice.

The pocket book was the first thing to be examined. A wad of dollar bills went into Mustang Pete's pocket, a photograph of a girl was tossed on to the table, and Pete gave his attention to the less inviting-looking papers.

But those who watched saw his eyes narrow until they were one straight line, and they saw his lips twist into a smile that they knew meant that Mustang Pete was a highly pleased man.

"Boys—these papers sure give me the grandest idea ever!" he drawled. "I reckon that generally prisoners ain't so mighty useful, but we have got a real valuable guy this time! Git him down to the bottom shack, and tell the Dummy that if he loses this guy he's sure gonna have a rough time! Busy, now!"

Again there was no questioning Mustang Pete's commands. The stranger, half unconscious at the rough treatment meted out to him, and his wits dulled by the crashing of a revolver butt on the back of his head, was picked up and carried to a smaller shack.

Without ceremony, he was dumped down on a plank bed over which was spread a single blanket and the boys turned to the only person who lived in the hut.

Person is the only description, for nothing more hideous could have been imagined. The Dummy was far more like a gorilla without the mass of hair, and although he watched the proceedings, and his mouth moved continuously, no sound came from him. He was as dumb as he was burly and ugly.

"Pete ses this guy has gotta stop!"

That was all the rustlers told the Dummy. He looked at them, lazily took up half a leg of mutton, and chewed a great lump off. Then, with a curious, ambling gait only to be compared with the gorilla with which he was so like, he shuffled to the door and closed it behind the rustlers.

The stranger took that to be his opportunity, for with the spring of a panther he was at his guard. Twice his great fist crashed home on the Dummy's jaw, but the burly brute only continued his lazy chewing. A third time and a fourth time blows that would have knocked out a world's champion thudded home—and it was at the fourth blow that the Dummy grabbed the stranger, hit him once, picked him up as though he were a schoolboy, and tossed him contemptuously on to the plank bed, as senseless as a log of wood.

Not a sound had come from his lips—not even a gasp of anger or alarm at the crashing blows that had landed upon his chin.

A moment later the Dummy had squatted on an upturned box, and the leg of mutton was being polished off with incredible speed and ravenous ferocity.

Enemies on Sight.

"COME in, Tom!"
Joan Prescott was smiling as she looked round at the opening door. The ranch foreman was there, and behind him, with a view to landing moral support, was one of the cowboys.
"Sure, Miss Joan—but—but we've sorter brought bad news," mumbled the foreman.

Joan started.
"You have been rounding up—"

she began.
"Sure—we'd got the hosses within a few minutes of home when Mustang Pete and his gang sorter blew in," interrupted the foreman. "They shot up one of the boys—he's alive, but only just—and they was too many for us. They—they got the hosses!"

For a moment Joan's lips quivered, and they were still set in that uncertain fashion which is neither quivering nor quite their usual formation when the door opened for the second time.

They all three turned round—and those lips broke into a genuine, happy smile.

"Mr. Rankin!"
"The same," laughed the newcomer. "What's up, boys? You look pretty downhearted?"

Joan cut in quickly.
"It's all right, boys—we've still got enough to supply the contract. In fact, I shall be able to pay off the overdue wages—"

"That's all right, Miss Joan—we're happy enough," mumbled the foreman. "But wo sure are wild at losing them hosses. We sorter feel mad about it."

Rankin stared, but he did not open his lips to speak until Joan had ushered the forlorn two from the room.

"Rustlers again, I guess," said Rankin briefly.

Joan nodded.
"The boys were rounding up my horses," she said. "You see, father left the ranch a bit upside down, and I'm selling off the horses to pay the debts, and they include the boys' wages. I'm expecting a Captain Hartford any moment now."

"And somebody stepped in and sorter helped themselves?" suggested Rankin.

"Yes. But what are you doing round these parts?"

"Well, I don't know that that matters. Miss Joan, but it seems to me that I'll stop around until your contract has been completed," said Rankin slowly. "That is, if you'd like me to."

"I'd like nothing better!" exclaimed Joan. "Mr. Rankin, if the rustlers get away with the next lot we round up, I'm going to fall through on the contract, and my only means of getting the ranch out of debt will have gone, too. Cattle prices are none too good just now."

"Then I'll stick around," said Rankin. She gave him a glance that amply rewarded him for his offer. The newcomer had been to the ranch on more than one occasion in Abe Prescott's lifetime, and he and Joan had always been great pals.

Rankin himself was unlike the rest of the boys, although he wore chaps, shirt, scarf and Stetson of the same kind nearly every man sported out under Texas skies. He carried, too, a business-like gun in a holster at his right hip.

But he had not the light-heartedness with which Joan was so accustomed. He was stern almost to a point of grimness, and his eyes, steely-blue, piercing, steady as rocks, were like his lips. They seldom changed in their expression.

Joan was about to speak again when for yet a third time the door opened, and this time a total stranger stood in the doorway. His neat breeches, trim uniform tunic, military Stetson, khaki collar and black tie made an introduction superfluous.

"Excuse me," he said in cultured tones. "I am Captain Hartford. I have business with Miss Prescott, whom I fancy I have the honour to address."

"Yes. Come right in, Captain Hartford!" said Joan eagerly. "I guess you have come about the horses."

Hartford came into the room, smiling pleasantly.

"That's right. And doubtless you would like to see my credentials," he said, as he drew a chair to the table.

He was in the act of withdrawing his pocket-book when he looked up quickly—as if he were drawn to the cold, steely eyes that looked down at him.

"Excuse me, Miss Prescott—one of your boys?" he suggested.

"No—a friend. Excuse me—Mr. Rankin, Captain Hartford," said Joan, laughing at her fault in not performing the introductions earlier.

"Pleased to meet you, Mr. Rankin," said Hartford affably.

"Sure!" said Rankin briefly, and never for a moment did his eyes blink.

It seemed to take an effort on Hartford's part to take his eyes from Rankin's, and it was Joan who helped him.

"Thank you; the credentials are satisfactory," she cut in suddenly, and the spell, if there was one, was broken. "The horses were to have been here, Captain Hartford, but rustlers got them this morning."

"Too bad—too bad!" said Hartford sympathetically. "You can fill the contract, Miss Prescott?"

"Yes, but—"
"Then if you will just sign this paper, I will collect the horses and hand over an official draft for the amount," said Hartford briskly.

"Wait a bit, where are your insignia, Captain Hartford?" snapped Rankin. "You'll excuse me, but we want to make quite sure that none of our horses slip over the border."

"My insignia?" muttered Hartford, and laughed suddenly. "Why, I took them off to clean them, and forgot to put them back."

He produced them a moment later—the stars and letters of his rank and service section.

"Satisfied—Mr. Rankin?" he said with veiled sarcasm.

Rankin merely nodded.
"Then, Miss Prescott, if you'll just sign here?" suggested Hartford.

"You'd better see the horses, Captain Hartford," cut in Rankin again. "The last lot were rustled by a gang of thieves. It would be a pity if this lot were rustled, too. Miss Prescott would not have filled her contract, and you could demand her draft back again. The bunch would only have to slip across the border, you know, and we should lose them."

"Not so fast, stranger," he drawled.

"Sure, I understand. Perhaps I had better get the boys to round them up," said Hartford, and he rose to his feet.

Joan looked from one to another of the men in surprise. It was obvious, even to her in the moment of excitement the deal naturally brought, that there was some inexplicable hostility between them.

Captain Hartford laughed—a steady, reassuring sort of laugh. But Rankin did not seem reassured.

"Well, we shall meet again, Mr. Rankin," he said as he moved to the door.

"Sure we'll meet again, Captain Hartford," said Rankin steadily.

A moment later the door had closed behind the remount department's officer, and there came to the silent two within the sound of his mount's thudding hoofs as he rode off.

Rankin did not stop to see if there was anything else he could do for Joan Prescott. He plugged his hat hard upon his head, and walked out into the open yard.

Here his horse was tethered—a pinto, marked as curiously as had been another that had been upon the trail that morning. Before Joan could quite follow what was happening, Rankin had mounted the pinto and was riding after Captain Hartford.

Beyond Understanding.

CAPTAIN HARTFORD'S movements were peculiar.

He moved in the manner of a man who was not anxious that he should be seen. His horse, with a movement suggesting that it was not by any means the fastest animal in the neighbourhood, lumbered along at a hand gallop, rather clumsily obeying the touch of the reins, dodging bushes and trees, jumping heavily over ditches.

Hartford himself looked a dozen times over his shoulders, as if he expected to find himself being followed.

He was not disappointed. Rankin's swift pinto was on the trail but a very short time before Hartford spotted them.

For a man in the remounts department of the Government, Captain Hartford betrayed more than a little nervousness. He left the trail and lumbered through the bushes for some minutes before he at last struck what he considered a good hiding-place, and pulled up.

He left his horse tethered to a tree, hesitated half a minute, and then slipped into the undergrowth.

Rankin rode along the trail until hoof-marks, recently cut, warned him that the quarry had turned off, and then he, too, swung the pinto into the thick, bushy section. When it grew too thick to make riding comfortable, he slipped from the saddle, walked on a few yards, and then went on alone.

It was not long before he found Hartford's tethered horse. From that spot it was only possible to make headway in one direction, and it was in that direction that he set his face.

Rankin proceeded cautiously, his hand ready to grab his gun at the slightest alarm. He walked along the narrow pathway, pushing his way through bushes in the soundless manner that betrayed him as a skilled woodman, alert, grim.

But it was not until he had come out of the bushes into the clearer plain that anything happened to excite suspicion. And then it was something more than suspicion that excited him.

Something hard and pointed stuck into the middle of his back.

"Get your hands up, Mr. Rankin!"

It was Hartford!

Slowly, unwillingly Rankin obeyed.

August 1st, 1931.

In a flash his own gun was snatched from its holster and tossed into the bushes.

"You take a lot of interest in horses which may be slipped over the border, Mr. Rankin," said Captain Hartford, with a grim laugh. "I have my suspicions. I reckon you know more than you would like to say about other horses that have slipped over the border!"

"Yeah?" said Rankin coolly.

"Anyhow, we're going to look after you until such time as I have collected the horses from Circle A on behalf of the Government," said Hartford grimly. "I know of a little place around here where you will be well looked after. Get moving, Mr. Rankin—and keep moving!"

Rankin obeyed. There was nothing else for it. Not for a single moment had Captain Hartford appeared to be a man who could be trifled with and the steadiness with which the gun was pressed into Rankin's back was a further argument towards obedience.

They had proceed perhaps a hundred yards before Captain Hartford broke the silence.

"I guess you are in league with the rustlers, Mr. Rankin, whilst you are appearing to be Miss Prescott's friend," he said quietly. "A cunning business that. She trusts you, whilst all the time you are playing the low down on her. When I have landed these horses, I guess I'll come back and find the rest for her. I rather like the look of her. Just my sort—"

He broke off. Like a streak of lightning Rankin had swung round, and with the momentum of his swing his right fist went out and connected with the point of Hartford's jaw. The officer staggered, and with another streaking movement Rankin had whirled him round, his own right hand grasping the captain's right arm, and his left hand seizing Hartford's left wrist, the whole arm was jerked up behind his back.

Hartford could have screamed with the pain.

"You'll break my arm!" he spluttered.

"I'll break your arm all right if you don't drop that gun!" said Rankin, between his teeth.

It needed considerable pressure on that helpless arm before Hartford obeyed, but at last the gun dropped from his fingers on to the hard ground. Rankin kicked it half a dozen yards and stood between it and Hartford as the arm was released.

It was Hartford's turn to attack then. He slipped into Rankin with both fists whirling, and it was Rankin who staggered into the bushes and crashed heavily to the ground.

Hartford leapt for the gun, and his finger was in the act of pulling the trigger when Rankin got at him.

Bang!

The noise of the shot reverberated through the bushes, and, although he did not know it, Hartford's horse reared and kicked furiously in its hiding-place until the leather thong broke away from the bough and allowed it to dash madly away.

Rankin's pinto, alarmed, and doubtless seeking the company of its own kind in its moment of terror, dashed off with it.

There could never have been such a grim, silent fight as that which Hartford and Rankin fought. Quarter was neither asked for nor given, and blows were exchanged which went far to prove the hardness of both of them.

But it was Rankin's superior toughness that won that fight. He took two blows in the chest and one in the stomach that should have felled him to the ground, with with a last, gasping effort, shot his bunched fists upwards until they were jerked to a stop by Hartford's jaw.

Back went Hartford's head. He emitted a single gasping groan, and dropped to the ground, completely knocked out.

For a moment Rankin stood looking down at him, rubbing the dust from his gloves. Then, as quietly as if he were just leaving a post office or a saloon, he sauntered back to where he had left his pinto.

The black and white horse had returned. Training had overcome fears and even instincts, and it was steady enough as Rankin slowly and stiffly mounted.

But the moment he was astride the pinto began to rear and buck as though it had never had a man on its back before. Rankin, seated as light as a feather but as firm as a rock, merely swayed under the kicking and bucking.

"What's the matter with you, boy?" he demanded angrily. "Lost your senses?"

Even his voice made no difference. He tried to drive the animal hard to his left, but the pinto swung right. Rankin allowed him to move that way round, trying to continue the movement until he was facing the way he wanted to go. But the moment he tried that, the pinto bucked and kicked again.

"Well, if you don't like that way, have it your own," said Rankin resignedly. "Go on, then, boy!"

The "boy" went on, through the narrow pathway, past the spot where Hartford still lay on the ground, and again into the bushes on the other side of the clearing.

Rankin did not mind. He knew the many instincts of horses, and how they will avoid dangers which their riders cannot sense or see.

But it was not dangers which the pinto appeared to be avoiding. He joggled along contentedly through the brushwood, across clearing after clearing, until he brought Rankin to a dingy-looking shack, hidden in a tiny valley. Here he stopped for a few seconds before trotting quickly over to what was evidently a disused corral.

There were no signs of human beings or horses, but Rankin took the opportunity to slip out of the saddle and get into the shack. It was empty.

"Waal, this is beyond understanding!" muttered Rankin. "Why the great stars has my pinto brought me along here?"

It had him beaten, and it was all the more baffling when he again mounted his pinto, and that pinto quite unconcernedly allowed himself to be driven slowly in any direction Rankin cared to take him!

But up the trail Hartford sat in the saddle and looked down upon the shack and the man who had just left it. A grim look of understanding settled upon his face, and without a word he dug in his spurs and galloped hard towards Circle A.

The Mystery Deepens.

CIRCLE A ranch was on tenterhooks. The raids of the rustlers and the cunning manner in which plans were laid made Mustang Pete and his gang something to be feared. It was in the minds of all that it would be a very good job when Miss Joan had filled her contract with the Remounts Department, and they could find time to go out and get those rustlers.

It was a warlike party that faced Joan when she gave them orders to round up what was left of her horses. Guns were loosened in holsters, and spare holes in cartridge belts were marked down for filling as soon as Joan had completed her instructions.

Matters were just as grim down at the shack over which the Dummy guarded his prisoner. The stranger who had ridden in the valley kept to his plank bed, watching for a chance to get away, having learned full well that it was utterly useless attacking the great brute, who seemed to have nothing more interesting in life than chewing up great legs of mutton.

The chance came when, having fed well, the Dummy planted himself in front of the door and dropped off to sleep.

The stranger looked at his guard intently, feeling that it was a man's job to tackle the enemy and beat him into submission. But he showed how wise he was when he made no attempt to shift the Dummy from the door, but gave his attention to the window.

It was easily to be climbed, and it said much for the guard's sense of his own capabilities that he had made no attempt to have it locked or barred.

A heavy snore was the encouragement the stranger received when he put one leg over the window-sill, squashed his body half out, and looked cautiously around. There was no sign of life save for his own pinto down in the corral.

The sight of the pinto gave him heart and hope, and, despite his big riding-boots, there was no noise as he slipped to the ground and dodged down to the corral.

Neither was there any sound when the Dummy opened the door and lumbered out after the runaway with the amazingly swift, ambling run of his!

It was a matter of seconds—breathless, tense seconds. The stranger won the first round in reaching the corral first, and he would have won the second round too had the Dummy not been as cunning as he was silent.

For the rope tethering the pinto was not tied with the firm, but easily released, slip-knot every cowboy used. The rope was tied and knotted in a manner that made it certain that minutes must elapse if the rope was to be untied.

The stranger had no knife, and cutting was therefore out of the question. Frantically his fingers tore at the ropes—desperately he looked up and down the trail in the vain hope that someone was near to help him.

It was hopeless. Like some grim fate, the Dummy came up behind and grabbed at the runaway. Right and left the stranger crashed his fists home on the Dummy's jaw, but they had no more effect than if they had landed upon a brick wall.

The stranger groaned in his mental anguish. If only the rope had been slip-knotted—

His thoughts were interrupted—a great, empty blackness swept down upon him with a suddenness that made it impossible for him to know even that he had been hit. And, as his neatly garbed form slithered towards the ground, the lumbering Dummy grabbed him by the rim and hauled him back to the shack.

Here, just as though he had been a bundle of straw, he was gathered up and flung mercilessly back on to the plank-bed.

The Dummy, silent as a ghost, grim as Fate, was a guard from whom there was no escaping.

Way back Circle A district, Sheriff Moody was at that moment facing an urging, pleading officer of Government services with a coldness that amounted almost to indifference.

"Look here, sheriff, you have your duty to do, same as I have mine to do!" said Hartford eagerly. "I tell you that Rankin is in league with the rustlers!"

"And I tell you, mister, that I ain't actin' upon nothin' until I sees him and catches him red-handed!" said the sheriff firmly. "We're sure doggone tired of these hyer rustlers, but we can't go stringing up Rankin just because somebody suspects him! We gotta have proof!"

Hartford bit his lips in helpless rage. "Where's Rankin now?" demanded Moody suddenly.

"That's just it—where is he?" said Hartford warmly. "I know that Miss Prescott has gone out with the boys, rounding up the rest of the horses. I am to take those horses under a contract, and she is to get my draft. I tell you there is a certainty that these wild rustlers will know, too—and they'll get those horses before Miss Prescott has a dog's chance of drawing money for them. If they are rustled when I take charge, that is my fault, and my Government's responsibility!"

That tackled a weak point in the sheriff's armour. Everybody knew and loved Joan Prescott, and sympathy was with her in the losses she had sustained through the rustling.

"I'll just go up and see her—me and the boys'll see the horses are guarded until you take them," grunted Moody at last. "Then—we're finished with 'em when you get outer our district—git me?"

"Sure! But I reckon you ought to have Rankin under lock and key—in fact, I insist upon it!" said Hartford with a renewed burst. "Neither I, nor the horses, nor anybody else, is safe until you have that man!"

"Git him red-handed, and I guess we'll hev him purty quick enough!" growled Moody.

For another five minutes Hartford tried urging, pleading, even threatening. But Sheriff Moody was adamant. He listened whilst Hartford told him of the shack in the little valley, whence Rankin had been seen to leave. He grinned when Hartford burst out with the suggestion that around that shack might be found some of Miss Prescott's stolen horses, and he was still grinning when he went out to talk to the posse of matters he considered more urgent.

Hartford gave it up in the end, bitter with resentment against the sheriff's seeming indifference. Two minutes later he was riding his horse at a walk up the trail, headed for the Circle A Ranch.

Yet the affairs of Circle A Ranch were not entirely centred in the district in which the ranch was situated. Even whilst the angry Hartford was riding to complete his part of the business, other aspects were being discussed in the marshal's office, five miles away.

A tall, well-set-up man had entered the marshal's office singing a song which the marshal knew and which the marshal heralded with a howl of delight.

"Singer Martin, by all that's good!" he roared, as he leapt with both hands extended to grip those of the singer. "And what brings you down these here parts?"

"Just a little trouble," chuckled Martin, and hummed another two bars before he went on: "Know a fellow called Bainbridge?"

"No."

"Any strangers round Circle A?"

"Not to my knowledge. Why?"

"Well, Hartford left for there some

"I know of a little place around here where you'll be well looked after. Get moving, Mr. Rankin—and keep moving!"

short time back," said Singer Martin thoughtfully. "Now we have orders to do anything that Bainbridge says without question—says or writes. Know that code number?"

He fished out a paper as he spoke and handed it to the marshal.

"Sure; that's the official number used by the boss," said the marshal thoughtfully. "I don't know this chap Bainbridge, though."

"Neither do I," said Singer Martin, pausing to hum another three or four bars. "All the same—orders are orders. I guess we'd better get moving towards Circle A, marshal. That's where the trouble lies."

And they, too, mounted and set their horses' heads toward Circle A Ranch.

The net was very widespread, and a not inconsiderable number of people appeared to be involved in its meshing. It was perhaps a little curious that it was Captain Hartford who started the movement which pulled that net tight!

The Stampede.

"WELL, here we are, Miss Prescott!"

Captain Hartford said that by way of greeting Joan—as radiant a girl of the plains as one could have found in a day's ride, as Hartford was quick to assure her. But Joan was only for completing the business.

"The horses are safely in the corral," she said. "We can complete now, I suppose?"

"I'm a little worried about that Rankin fellow," said Hartford. "He attacked me when we left here—"

"Mr. Rankin attacked you!" exclaimed Joan in surprise. "Why—he's such a—"

"Friend, eh?" Hartford laughed sarcastically. "I happen to know that he is in league with the rustlers, Miss Prescott—I have already reported it to the sheriff, and he has gone to collect Mr. Rankin."

"Why doesn't he come here and collect me?" demanded a cool voice from the doorway.

The others swung round startled.

Rankin stood in the doorway, his gun at his finger-tips, his eyes steely blue, unblinking. He came in, shutting the door, and Hartford, who had half-risen from his chair, dropped back again.

But Rankin made no further attempt to interfere with the business. It was Joan who broke the silence.

"Let's get it finished!" she said desperately. "I'll be glad to see you move off—with those horses, Captain Hartford!"

"Sure! You sign this paper, Miss Prescott," said the officer, with a quick glance at the inscrutable Rankin.

"You sign nothing of the sort!" said Rankin quietly.

"This is our business!" snapped Hartford. "I'll thank you to mind your own business! Now, Miss Prescott—does this man run your affairs—as well as your horses?"

The insinuation may have conveyed nothing to Rankin, but it was certainly understood by Joan. She took the paper and the proffered pen with a sudden gesture, and in a moment Hartford had taken it up. He was smiling now.

"And here is your draft!" he said affably. "I think this is where we say good-bye. I am sorry to leave you, Miss Prescott. I am sorry I cannot say the same for you, Mr. Rankin!"

"You needn't!" said Rankin coolly. "We shall meet again! Ah!"

His exclamation was caused by the door being suddenly flung open, to admit the somewhat rudely rushing forms of Sheriff Moody and the marshal.

August 1st, 1931.

Their eyes lit up as they alighted at once upon Rankin, and the sheriff had his gun levelled in less time than it takes to wink one eye.

"So this is where you lie up for a bit, Rankin!" said Moody, reaching for Rankin's gun. "Didn't know he was a rustler, Miss Joan?"

"Captain Hartford warned me that —," stammered Joan. "I hoped that —"

"Well, Captain Hartford warned me, I guess!" said Moody, with a chuckle. "Keep well away, Rankin—I'll plug you, pronto, if you play up a trick! Guess I went and had a look at that shack, Captain Hartford—and I guess I found all your stolen horses, Miss Joan!"

Rankin stared, and so did Hartford. The marshal's chuckle was quite out of place then.

"And I sorter blew in with the sheriff, being nice and handy to take you down the trail, Rankin," he said lightly, and he sauntered swaggeringly over to the prisoner. "Guess you're a pretty good-looker to be a rustler, but they all looks just the same when they dance at the end of a rope—"

That was just as far as he got; for, with a lightning sweep of his hand, Rankin had snatched out the marshal's gun and had them all covered.

"Get your hands well up!" grated Rankin. "I'm sure not done yet! Move aside—quick—or I'll plug you! Quick!"

They moved aside as they were ordered, staring with surprise, dumb-founded at the speed with which the tables had been turned. It was then that something clattered through the window and fell in a heap upon the floor amidst fragments of broken glass.

Rankin gave it one quick look, and leapt for the door.

He was back at the table the next second, his gun still bearing upon the others.

"Guess I'll be coming back, Miss Joan—one day!" he said between his teeth, as he took up the signed contract. "You may be glad of this, you know! S'long!"

He was through the door and had locked it before anybody could make a move to stop him—if anybody had been foolish enough to risk a bullet from his gun. Hartford leapt for the window, but that was hopelessly small.

"You mustn't let him get away!" he said hoarsely.

"Watch him!" groaned the sheriff.

The marshal had picked up the missile that had come through the window—he was much too calm a man to be ruffled by the escape of Rankin.

But the others simply goggled as they saw Rankin dash to the corral and fling up the barriers. In another moment he had darted inside, and was scattering and stampeding the horses down the trail. His own pinto he grabbed and mounted, and the last those in the shack saw of him was as he rose above the swaying backs of hundreds of wildly dashing horses.

"Well—he's got 'em!" said Hartford, with a dry laugh. "I told you he would! I'll be going now, Miss Prescott—it is useless for me to stay here any longer!"

The marshal looked at him sharply, but Hartford was not talking to him. So the marshal looked down again at the paper he had unwound from the missile.

"Don't let Hartford get hurt.—BAINBRIDGE."

It was the mysterious person from whom they had to take all orders that the missile had come!

"Sure now, Captain Hartford," said the marshal, with a gentle smile. "These here parts won't be healthy for a stranger for the next few hours. Guess they're sorter likely to get shot up. You'll be much safer with us—you won't be likely to get hurt! Stand away from that door—I'm gonna blow the lock off!"

He took the sheriff's gun for the purpose, and before the startled Joan could say anything the sheriff, marshal, and Hartford were outside. The two former went willingly enough, and the latter went mainly because the marshal was rather insistent upon the point. There was sense in his remarks, and the marshal was responsible for the lives of those in his district. Hartford obeyed grudgingly.

Down the trail the stampeding horses raised clouds of dust as they thudded along. Behind them rode Rankin, urging them on with stock-whip and voice until they had reached the open plains, and there he scattered them in a dozen different directions.

There might be shooting up in the valley before many hours were over, but flying bullets could offer little more danger than a meeting with the startled, fear-maddened horses. Every trail would be full of animals ready to stampede again at the slightest sign of a human being.

Rankin laughed aloud as he rode suddenly off the trail and worked desperately to get amongst a thinner group of horses which would permit his getting out. But for minutes he was wedged in, and only the fact that he was so tightly wedged kept him from being whirled down amongst crashing hoofs which would kick the life out of his body.

It was a grim business, and Rankin realised that it was much easier to start a stampede and get amongst it than it was to get out of it. It was miraculous the way the pinto stuck to the flying herd without falling.

Once down—

Rankin shuddered at the mere thought. Scattering the herd had offered him a chance of escaping, but there was no knowing which way the startled creatures would dash. First they would turn right, and then left, some would go ahead, some would drop behind. But, somehow or other, they converged and got together again.

There was no laugh left in Rankin after five minutes' fighting. He was as close a prisoner as at the beginning. His only consolation was that no one could get at him!

But with death, or, at the best, injury staring him in the face, the consolation was a poor one.

Prisoners Galore!

MUSTANG PETE suddenly flung down the cards with which he had been playing at the shack in the little valley, and clapped his hand hard upon his gun.

"We'd better be moving, boys," he said tartly. "I guess the Circle A herd will be awaiting for us! Gee—if this wasn't the easiest bunch we ever collected!"

"Sure! But what about Dummy—and the prisoner?" asked one of his gang.

"Waal, I guess these parts ain't gonna be sorter healthy fer a time," said Mustang Pete with a chuckle. "They will be found, and I sorter reckon of we stop behind to look after them we'll be found, too! That Circle A bunch'll be kinder nasty when they lose again! Come on, boys—let Dummy look after the prisoner as long as he likes!"

There was a laugh; but the laugh turned to dismal silence the very moment the last of the gang had stepped from the shack.

For from behind came a voice which, though bantering in its lightness, was menacing in its directness.

"Get 'em up, boys—and reach for the skies!"

The gang swung round, hands already up. They, of all people, knew the wisdom in prompt obedience to such a command.

They saw before them the tall, neatly dressed figure of Singer Martin, a gun in either hand and the most amused smile upon his lips.

"Keep reaching for them skies, boys, 'cos it's sorter dangerous to tickle holsters!" he laughed, and commenced a warble which would have sounded quite pleasant in any other circumstances.

He broke into his singing only to urge the rustlers to get closer together, and he was singing in their very ears when, with their hands reaching high above their heads, he slipped a rope round the bunch of them.

A loop round their wrists, another around their forearms, and a third round their shoulders rendered them about as helpless as canaries in a cage.

The end of the rope he shot over a rafter in an outhouse, and it was hauled tight enough to ensure that, when he had fixed it around a stanchion, they would remain "reaching for the skies" without the aid of the levelled gun-barrels.

His task completed, Singer Martin sang on merrily whilst he surveyed them. That took him quite four minutes—four minutes which he must have considered well spent.

"Well, if you ain't just the niftiest bunch of rustlers I ever set my eyes upon!" he chortled. "All brave rustlers, and one little buck like me—now up from the city—can just get the drop on you and have you set like that!"

"I'd hev you set of my hands was free!" snarled Mustang Pete. "Guns talk big, stranger! You sure got the drop on us! Let me—only me—loose, and I'll show you how men get along around here!"

"The invitation ain't accepted!" grinned Singer Martin, and commenced that maddening hum of his that set a dozen sets of teeth grating with rage.

But Singer Martin would have not been so slow in his movements, and nothing like so bright in his attitude had he known that, less than a hundred yards away, Rankin was being subjected to as terrible an ordeal as any man ever experienced.

It was scarcely an hour since Rankin had stamped the horses from Joan Prescott's corral. In that time he had spent forty minutes fighting to get free from the thundering animals. He escaped one lot of madly-rushing beasts only to get mixed up in another lot, and his pinto was all but dropping with exhaustion when a lucky slip-up on the edge of a cliff sent them both flying down to the safety of the little valley.

What would have happened had the business ended there Rankin could not have foretold. But the moment his pinto had clambered to its feet, it emitted a shrill whinny and trotted off.

Rankin stared, sat up on the ground, and blinked through the dazzling sunlight. For down in the valley, in a corral that was familiar, was a pinto of exactly the same black-and-white colouring as his own!

Rankin's face fairly beamed for just a fraction of a second—the next, and his eyes were again steady and grim.

He followed the pinto through the bushes until he came into view of the shack, and here he moved more cautiously. His gun had gone in one or another of his madly-swaying efforts to keep on the pinto's back during the stampede, but that fact did not lessen his determination.

He pushed open the door of the shack with his foot and waited. But no movement came from within. He stepped forward a pace, and waited again, his hands ready to lash out at anything that showed itself.

Another step, and he was past the covering door and could see everything within. And almost at once he saw the recumbent form upon the plank bed.

There was no obvious need for silence now. Rankin fairly leapt across the floor of the shack and flung himself down beside the prisoner.

"Jack!" he ejaculated.

The prisoner looked up, startled. "Get out of this, quick; there's a devil knocking around!" he blurted out. "He's gone to fetch some water—"

He broke off, his staring eyes telling of the fact that the dreaded guard had come in, as silent as ever.

Rankin sprang to his feet and leapt in to the attack with the speed of the trained boxer. Crash—crash—clump—clump went his fists, flush upon the hideous jaw of the gorilla-like Dummy.

But the Dummy just shook his head, gathered Rankin in his mighty arms, and crushed his massive chest against what was the comparatively puny Rankin.

Frantically Rankin hit out, using his legs in the flashing realisation that every and all weapons would have to be mustered to break down the Dummy.

The Dummy just grinned, took another couple of fists on his steel-like jaw without so much as a wince, and gave way just for a fraction of a second at a terrific, all-in effort Rankin made to escape.

The prisoner could only look on, helpless and weak as he was. Rankin dashed in furiously, and this time the table was sent crashing against the door, tin drinking cups clattered upon the floor, and they went to the boards with a crash that shook the shack to its very foundations.

It was the Dummy who got first grip there—and mists began to shut out all else from Rankin's eyes. He was aware of two massive arms entwined around his throat—of something that was gradually squeezing the breath of life from his body, and a sudden—

Bang!

For a second the arms tightened in sickening fashion. Then they relaxed as the Dummy rose, staggered, and crashed down again to the boards.

Rankin was dazed by the fight—stunned by the terrific noise of the exploding gun—but he could not mistake the sudden chirruping that came from the doorway.

Singer Martin was there, a smoking revolver in his hand, a grin upon his lips—and a warble in his throat.

"Just sorter potted round in time, you fellers!" he said coolly.

"How—how'd y' find us?" gulped Rankin.

Singer Martin helped him to his feet before he answered.

"Those pintos—you and Jack Hartford got them hosses off'n the same outfit," he drawled. "They're twins—and they're down in the corral right now. I knew them at once. If you was both around—shucks! Guess I thought I'd better look you up! And if I ain't mistaken, here's somebody else lookin' us up!"

He hesitated as a dusty cloud heralded the arrival of Sheriff Moody, the marshal, a gang of the boys, and Captain Hartford.

"Howdy, boys?" chuckled Singer Martin, but he was thrust aside with surprising quickness as Rankin jerked his way in front of Hartford.

"Sheriff—you can have this chap," said Rankin between his teeth. "I own I took that contract, and I own I stampeded Joan's horses. But this feller isn't Captain Hartford at all—the real captain is over there!"

And he jerked his thumb towards the still dizzy form upon the plank bed.

"It was a work-up," said Rankin

(Continued on page 23.)

FILM NOVELS YOU SHOULD NOT MISS!

"AVALANCHE."

She is loved by two men—a musician and the meteorologist of Mont Blanc. Both are stout fellows and wholly desirable, but it takes a pitiless storm to solve the girl's problem.

"WE DINE AT SEVEN."

An amusing story of three husbands and three wives—and how a scandalmonger almost ruined their married bliss. Starring Herbert Mundin and Dorothy Bartlam.

"SIX-CYLINDER LOVE."

They sponged on him because he was the owner of a luxurious car. But when faced with ruin he discovered his manhood, as his so-called friends soon found to their cost. Starring Spencer Tracy, Edward Everett Horton, and Sidney Fox.

All these splendid film stories are complete in this week's issue of our companion paper

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY.

PRICE 2d.
August 1st, 1931.

A gripping drama of a young boy fighting to save his mother and father from the treachery of the secret police of his country. Starring Freddie Frederick, Kay Johnson and Neil Hamilton.

Moscow, 1921.

UNDER the shadow of the Kremlin, behind whose grey stone walls the Soviet government was slowly working out the destiny of a broken nation, stood a long queue. The front end of it trickled slowly into a ramshackle shop whose windows were filled with brown bread and flour, and the end of it wound up the street and out of sight round a corner.

Half way down the queue stood a woman, a boy by her side. Although she was barely thirty-seven, her face bore the lines of intense worry and fear. She had been standing there for more than three hours, and she was dead tired.

The bread queue moved forward a few paces, the woman and Kolya with it. Suddenly from round the corner came the tinkle of bells, and a horse galloped down the street, dragging behind it a heavy sleigh.

As the runners hissed over the blanket of snow that covered the ground, the queue shrank back against the buildings apprehensively. A tense murmur broke from it.

"Koslov! The President of the Tcheka!"

The man who was riding in the sleigh looked out at the bread queue, his face expressionless.

Kolya clenched his fists at the sight of Koslov.

A man paused by the side of the queue, and Kolya looked up to recognise Sergei, who lived in the next room in the dirty tenement building which was their home.

Sergei did not take any notice of Kolya.

"Greetings, Anna," he said in a smooth voice.

August 1st, 1931.

Kolya's mother started. She had not been expecting anyone to talk to her, and Sergei's voice took her by surprise. "Not in the best of spirits, eh?" he went on. "How long have you been here?"

"Ever since early morning," Anna Pavlovna replied.

"Too bad!" Sergei thought for a moment, his handsome face alight with irony. He caressed his neatly trimmed moustache, and drew the collar of his warm leather coat more closely about his ears. "I'll tell you what," he said. "I'll get your rations for you. Give me your card."

He took the ration card that she had been holding between her fingers, and strutted to the head of the queue. He disappeared inside the shop, and came out again after a few minutes bearing in his arms two of the coarse loaves and a quarter of the brown flour that could be seen in the windows.

Murmurs of suppressed rage ran through the queue.

Sergei laughed as he beckoned to Anna. She left the queue, taking Kolya with her, and approached her benefactor.

"Thank you, Sergei," she said quietly. "You have been very good to me. I wish there was something I could do for you in return."

"There is much that you can do for me in return, Anna," he said, going closer to her and lowering his voice. "Let us return to our lodgings, and I will tell you about it."

The "Friend."

IT was about a quarter of a mile to the miserable tenement house where Kolya lived with his mother, but they did not reach it for a full ten minutes, the freezing snow on the ground making progress difficult.

Kolya kept well to the rear, noting as he walked that his mother and Sergei did not talk much. Once or twice as they crossed the road, Sergei took Anna's arm, but she freed it again as soon as they reached the opposite pavement.

Kolya did not like Sergei. There was something sinister and menacing about the man. He seemed always to be watching and waiting for something.

When they reached the tenement, Sergei went first to his own room on the other side of the landing. He was away about five minutes, and when he returned he smelt of cheap perfume.

He gave Kolya a suspicious look; then crossed the room to where Anna was sitting at her sewing-machine, and sat down by her side.

"Aren't you tired of all this?" he said softly. "Aren't you tired of the bread queues, of the restrictions imposed upon you by the Labour bureau, and of the difficult conditions in which you live?"

"I am," said Anna wearily. "Very tired of it."

"Then why don't you qualify for a Worker's licence?" said Sergei. "It is yours for the asking."

"A Worker's licence!" she exclaimed. "But I don't understand. I have been classified for the lower grade of rations. How can I get more?"

Sergei glanced round him quickly, and a shade of annoyance passed over his features as he saw that Kolya was staring at him unwaveringly. He opened his mouth to say something, his intention being to tell Kolya to clear out; then he changed his mind and turned back to Anna.

"I have a Worker's licence," he said lowering his voice still more, so that Kolya could hardly hear it. "You know the law here? As Anna Pavlovna, you come under the aristocrat class and get just barely enough to keep body and soul alive; but as Anna Sergei—"

He came to an abrupt halt as Anna stood up, white and trembling.

"You forget, Sergei, that I am already married," she said. "I already have a husband—alive!"

"You talk like a fool, Anna," he answered. "You know quite well that you only have to apply to the Polit-bureau and sign the necessary forms, and you are free at once. You could be my wife within the hour."

"Has it not occurred to you, Sergei," she said slowly, "that I may not want to become your wife—either within the hour, or ever?"

"You would prefer to go on starving?" said Sergei with a sneering laugh.

"Yes, I would prefer to go on starving."

"Still thinking of that husband of yours?" jeered Sergei. "He's in Paris, isn't he? He hasn't even the pluck to return here and take his place under the Soviet regime. He has been an officer in the Guard like myself, and the country needs good officers. If he came back and took the oath of allegiance, he could be classified as a Worker right away."

He paused to allow this to sink in.

"But does he return?" he resumed. "Does he come back to the wife and child who are suffering? Of course he doesn't! He prefers Paris, where he can live in comparative luxury." He snapped his fingers. "That is the man you can't forget, Anna—a man who obviously forgets you."

He leaned back, and paused again. For a whole minute there was silence while he waited for her to say something; and when she still kept her lips tightly compressed, he got up so that he could be closer to her.

"He is in Paris," he went on, softening his tone, "while I am here, I can bring you comfort and happiness now—at once. Well, what do you say?"

"My answer is—no!" she said firmly.

"Definitely and finally—no! And now please go. You have been very good to me in many ways, and I am grateful to you, but I shall always remain loyal to Ivan."

Sergei made a gesture of impatience. Throwing aside all pretence at reserve, he tried to put his arms around her.

"Anna—" he began.

Kolya ran across the room as his mother shrank back from Sergei's touch.

"You heard what she said, Sergei," he shouted. "She told you to go. If you dare to touch her, I'll—I'll kill you!"

For a moment Sergei seemed as though he would dash his angry fist into the boy's face. Then suddenly his expression changed and he turned on his heel and left the room.

Arrest!

KOLYA watched him go and slammed the door behind him. As he did so, he heard his mother sob, and hurried to her side.

"Don't let that fellow upset you, mother," he said soothingly. "Sergei can't do you any harm. I'll see to that."

"Bless you, Kolya!" She tried to smile. "If I hadn't got you to comfort me, I don't know what I should do."

Kolya saw that she would be all right now that Sergei was out of the way, and he picked up the ration cards which were lying on the table, and got himself ready to go out. Bread and flour had already been purchased, but supplies of butter, tea, and sugar were yet to come.

He left the tenement and made his way to the centre of the city again, where he tacked himself on to the end of still another queue.

It was well into the afternoon before he was able to reach the shop counter and receive his meagre supplies. He took them, put them into his shopping basket, and began his weary trudge homewards again.

At the bottom of the tenement stairs a knot of women were standing, and when they saw him coming they nudged each other and became silent.

He was so tired that he hardly noticed them.

He mounted the stairs slowly, hoping that there would be something ready to eat when he got in. But as he climbed the last few steps which brought him in sight of the door, he stopped dead, and his heart seemed to cease beating.

Affixed to the door was a red seal! It was so fastened that the door could not be opened!

The seal of the Tcheka—the secret police!

Kolya uttered a cry and ran forward, intending to tear the seal down and force his way into the room. A kindly old man who had been standing near by stopped him.

"Careful, sonny!" he said. "If you go past that door you'll be flung into gaol."

"My mother!" cried Kolya. "Where is my mother?"

The old man shook his head sadly and resignedly.

"She has gone," he said. "An information was laid against her, and the Tcheka took her away."

"But what will they do to her?"

The old man shrugged his shoulders. Kolya turned away. The old man was right. If he broke the seals on the door of what had been his home, he would commit a treasonable act, and he would be committed to prison—perhaps even sentenced to death.

He wandered down the street, wondering what he could do, shambling along despondently, not troubling to notice where he was going. Suddenly he was awakened to watchfulness by the sudden pattering of feet and a tug at his arm; but before he could save himself he was hustled into the gutter, his shopping basket with its food gone.

He scrambled to his feet, and saw the tail end of a gang of urchins vanishing round a near-by corner. He gave chase, urging every ounce of his strength to the recapture of his basket. It was the only food he had, and it would have to last him for an indefinite period.

He swung round the corner savagely, intent upon the chase, and did not notice that the gang had ranged itself against the wall of the building he was then passing. Someone shot out a foot, and Kolya went sprawling on his face.

A dozen pairs of hands seized him, and "Go to my home, Nikolai," the General ordered Ivan calmly.

picked him up bodily. Half-conscious, stunned by his fall, he felt himself being carried down a flight of steps into an evil-smelling basement.

Suddenly he was placed on the ground and set free.

He was surrounded by a ring of sharp, eager faces that had not been washed for months. Dozens of boys and girls, all about his own age, were in that cellar, and so far as he could see it was their home.

He looked round slowly, and picked upon a boy slightly taller than the rest who was obviously their leader. He went up to him, his fists clenched.

"Give me back my basket!" he said threateningly.

The circle of boys and girls made an almost imperceptible movement closer, but the boy to whom Kolya spoke held up his hand commandingly.

"Stop!" he said in a hoarse shout. "I'll deal with this." He looked at Kolya again. "Who are you, and where do you come from?"

Kolya paused for a fraction of a second before replying. What should he do? If he tried to fight his way out he would be half-killed.

He was no coward, but he decided that his best course was to explain matters. If they heard his story they might be inclined to help him.

"My name is Kolya Pavlovna," he said. "I live alone with my mother, and while I was out to-day she was arrested by the Teheka and the door of our home sealed."

"Arrested, eh?" said the other. "Why?"

"For no reason at all," Kolya replied. "She'd never done anything wrong. I ought to know. I used to be with her all the time."

The boy looked at the others questioningly, and they responded with a nodding of heads. Then he turned to Kolya again, and this time his attitude was friendly.

"Listen to me, Kolya," he said. "All of us down here are in the same fix. Our parents have been arrested, and we were left by the Teheka to starve. So we formed ourselves into a gang, and we get food any way we can. Also, one day we'll be strong enough to get our own back on the Teheka. Will you join us?"

Kolya did not reply immediately. He saw the explanation of these urchins now—they were a band of outcasts, victims, like himself, of the secret police.

"All right," he said, and held out his hand. "I'll join you."

The other boy gripped his fingers, and the gang crowded round vociferously, glad to give Kolya a welcome.

"My name is Petya," said the leader. "Keep close to us, Kolya, and we'll see that no harm comes to you."

Kolya nodded assent, and as he did so, he felt the handle of his basket being pushed into his hand. He looked at the contents thoughtfully, then held it out again.

"I'm one of you now," he said. "Shares, comrades!"

They cheered him to the echo, and he knew from that moment that he could count on every one of them when the time came to save his mother.

Set Free.

IN the week that followed, Kolya learnt much of the way in which the gang lived. They stole from the food dumps down by the railways, and gathered up any odds and ends that they could safely take from the more well-to-do members of the community.

Meanwhile, Anna was cooped up in August 1st, 1931.

the dungeons of one of the prisons, without washing water, and with a minimum of coarse and almost uncatable food.

At the end of the week, one of the warders came to her cell and unlocked the door. He motioned her to follow him.

He took her to a large, iron-barred room and left her sitting on a bench close to a wall. Before her were half a dozen tables, and at each table sat a man wearing the uniform of the Teheka.

She began to feel apprehensive. These men were disposing of human lives like a well-oiled machine, and with monotonous regularity. As she listened, she could hear the conversations which passed between the men at the tables and other men who came forward with sheafs of documents.

"Anton Ivanoff," the man with the papers would intone. "Guilty of treason. Tried to wreck a State tramway-car. I had him shot."

"Sentence confirmed!"

"Serge Irku, guilty of treason. Attempted to resist arrest on a charge of forgery. I had him shot."

"Sentence confirmed!"

So it went on ceaselessly. "I had him shot—Sentence confirmed!" and the quiet signing of papers. No trial, no hope of being saved—dead, in most cases, before the case ever reached the public prosecutors.

Anna shrank back against the wall, wondering if she were set down for the same fate.

Her eyes opened abruptly as she heard her name called, and she choked back a cry of terror. They were sending for her at last!

She looked round for the man who had summoned her, and saw him beckoning to her from a nearby room, the door of which was partly open. She rose to her feet, almost too weak to stand, and crossed slowly to him.

"The secretary of the president wishes to see you, Anna Pavlovna," he said. "This way."

She stumbled on blindly, and found herself in the room, standing before a desk looking down upon a man who was seated there. He had cruel eyes and a stern, hard face that never seemed to change.

"Anna Pavlovna," he said, "you were arrested a week ago, and have been a prisoner since, for your own safety. You live alone, unprotected by anyone, in a house that is noted as being dangerous for lonely women." He picked up a paper from his desk. "Peter Sergei!" he said quietly.

"I understand you wish to enter into a bond for this woman," the secretary went on. "Do you agree to see that she comes to no harm, and that you will hold yourself responsible for her safety?"

"I do," said Sergei.

"Very well." The secretary held out the paper. "Sign this, and I will set her free."

Sergei took the document and glanced over it. It bound him as being answerable to the Teheka, in the name of the Soviet, for the safety of one Anna Pavlovna, and to deliver her safely to the Teheka's custody should he ever wish to revoke his bond.

Sergei signed it and handed it back without comment. The secretary looked at the signature, witnessed it, and stamped the paper with the Soviet seal.

"You may go, Anna Pavlovna," he said without looking up. "But you will remember that you are answerable to Peter Sergei for your movements. See to it that you do nothing which will cause you to be sent back to prison."

Anna turned away, thankful for Sergei's guiding hand as it gripped her arm and steadied her. She passed through the doorway and out into that dreaded room where they were still saying: "I had him shot—Sentence confirmed!" It was going on with monotonous regularity.

It was not until they were in the open that Sergei spoke. Then he said:

"Well, Anna, it seems that you cannot do without me, after all."

She turned to him, mixed gratitude and puzzlement in her expression.

"How did you manage it?" she asked. "How were you able to have me set free?"

"Oh, it was nothing," he replied. "I heard that you had been arrested, and decided to enter into a bond for you. You see, the law says that if any woman appears to be without protection, and an information is laid against her, she shall be kept in a State prison until someone can be found to care for her. I suppose some busybody informed about you, so the Teheka came and took you away. I shouldn't worry about it any more. You're a free woman, and that's all that matters."

"I don't know how to thank you enough, Sergei," Anna said. "When Ivan returns, he will see to it that you don't go unrewarded."

"Poor Anna!" Sergei smiled. "Still thinking of the husband who never comes! Well, he wasn't of much use to you to-day. It was I, Sergei, who had to act as your protector." He moved closer to her as they walked. "Won't you let me be always, Anna?" he pleaded. "Won't you marry me, and let me take care of you?"

Anna edged away from him.

"It's no good, Sergei," she said. "I can't. I don't love you, and never shall. Please don't speak of it any more."

"Very well," Sergei said. "It is your concern, not mine! I will give you a week in which to change your mind." He took her arm to lead her across the road. "And now, let me see you home."

Anna followed him dumbly. A net seemed to be closing in upon her from which there seemed to be no chance of escape.

Anna's Decision.

BECAUSE she had been in a State prison, Anna was entitled to an emergency ration of food at once, so that she could tide herself over until her ordinary rations were available.

She did not go home at once, therefore, but decided to join the nearest bread queue.

For the moment she was not anxious about Kolya. She expected that one of her neighbours had taken him in hand for the time being, and thought that he would be quite safe.

She left Sergei outside the Kremlin, and made her way across the street to the public markets. On the way, as she was passing the entrance to an alley, she paused.

Someone was ringing, and she thought she recognised his voice.

She turned down the alley towards a crowd of people at the end, and thrust herself to the front. There, standing in the centre of a ring of people, was Kolya!

She gazed at him in horror. He was in rags, and was covered in grime from head to foot. His feet were bare, and his hair was matted over his forehead like a lump of tow.

"Kolya!" she called.

The singing stopped suddenly as Kolya recognised her. Joy at seeing her again fought in his brain for a few seconds with the shame he felt at her finding him like this. Then he rushed towards her and flung his arms about her.

The crowd that had been listening to him drifted away, leaving only half a dozen of Petya's gang behind. They stared curiously while Kolya greeted his mother. Then Petya stepped forward. "Hi, you aren't going to leave us, are you, comrade?" he said wistfully. "We're pals, and—"

Kolya stepped back, and motioned to the gang with a sweep of his arm.

"Mother, these are my friends," he said, and he felt no shame now. "They looked after me while you were away."

Anna's expression softened. She loved Kolya, and no matter how dirty Petya and his pals might be, she felt friendly towards them now that she knew they had been kind to her son.

"I don't think I can ever thank you enough," she said simply. "But if you will help me to buy food, I will see that you all have something to eat."

Petya stepped forward and touched his forehead with his finger.

"We'll get your food for you," he said in his rough voice. "But if you're feeding us off rations, you won't have enough for yourself. We'll bring our own. Come on, lads!"

He darted away, and the rest of the gang followed, leaving Kolya behind.

Anna took Kolya home. She was terribly worried about him. While waiting for Petya and his friends to come, she made Kolya take a bath; meanwhile she wondered what was best to be done. She dare not go to prison again, otherwise Kolya would be thrown on the streets once more—perhaps disappear from her sight for ever.

Finally she went across the landing and knocked on Sergei's door. Sergei opened it, and raised his eyebrows in surprise.

"I want you to do something for me," she said worriedly. "I'm tired of this life. I must become a worker, with all the privileges a worker has."

"Very well," he said. "There's only one thing for a good-looking woman like you to do, and that is become a hostess at one of the State casinos. I'll get you in to-morrow, if you like. You can always leave if you get tired of the job."

"I'll take it," she answered. "Thank you once more."

Sergei watched her return to her own room, his eyes narrowed to slits.

The Secret Visit.

THREE days later, on a night that was pitch black with overhanging clouds, a man plodded steadily through the fields close to the frontier that divides White Russia from the Soviet Union. The lights of Vitebsk were far below him on his left, while on his right, lying in a deep valley, were the red and green signals of the Brest-Warsaw railway.

He paused every now and then, listening for sounds, but a deep silence brooded over the hillside.

So far as he could make out, he must be very close to the frontier, and at any moment he might find himself blinded by the powerful searchlights from the sentry posts. The slightest suspicion of his presence would mean death, swift and sudden.

From somewhere in the distance came the vibrating rattle of wheels on metals, and a mile away shone the headlight of a locomotive. The man paused to watch it. It was coming from Vitebsk, and was going across the frontier to Smolensk, fifty miles inside the Soviet Union territory.

Suddenly he threw himself flat as a beam of dazzling light pierced the darkness and swept over the hillside. It hovered above him, casting grim shadows beyond the trees, and finally came to rest on the oncoming train.

Brakes began to squeal, and the train clattered to a halt. The man looked again, and saw that it was about three hundred feet below him, and not more than half a mile forward.

He watched while frontier officials boarded it, everything clearly outlined in the glare of the searchlight, and then decided that now was the time for him to get across the frontier. The sentries would be busy searching the train, and they would not pay much attention to the meadows above them.

He rose to his feet and began to run in steady, lengthy strides. He kept going like this for two minutes.

Then his foot caught something, and he fell with a crash on to his face. At the same moment a gun exploded close at hand, and a spatter of buckshot struck the nearby trees.

The man emitted a curse. A trip wire! Connected to the trigger of a trap-gun, too! Had he not been running, he would have been dead by now. It was only the speed of his progress which had made him drop flat to the ground so quickly.

He realised that the frontier guards must have heard the report, and he got to his feet again. He started to run once more, this time with every ounce of strength in him.

There was a wood ahead, and he wanted to get under its cover without being seen. He raced along, his heart pounding heavily as the searchlight swept the ground he had just covered.

He dived into the wood just in time, and flattened himself against a tree. That powerful beam swept past him.

Dodging the searchlight, he penetrated more and more deeply into the wood, taking a direction which would bring him out as far from the frontier as possible.

Some hours later he reached a small village close to a railway junction. So far as he could judge, he was now about five or six miles inside Soviet territory—far enough away from the frontier guards not to be recognised. They might know him all along the sentry posts; but here, in this small cluster of tumble-down houses, he would be comparatively safe.

He made his way down the village street boldly in the early daybreak, seeking the railway station, depending now upon the forged identity documents that were in his pocket.

Twenty yards from the station he was called upon to halt. A policeman, armed with a rifle, came up to him.

"Who are you, comrade?" he asked curtly.

"My name is Saratov," was the quiet reply. "I have been visiting my sister, who is ill, and am on my way back to Moscow. Here are my papers."

He held them out, and the policeman glanced through them. He appeared quite satisfied, and handed them back.

"Pass, comrade," he said. "I had to stop you, because someone got in across the frontier last night—a man named Ivan Pavlovna. He is a dangerous enemy of the Soviet, and we have orders to take him dead or alive."

The man was fortunate in being able to board a train for Moscow almost at once. It was an express, and was due at the city a little before midnight.

"Why do you lie to me?" Koslov shouted.

But the man did not travel into the city on it. He dropped off from one of the coaches during a temporary halt a couple of miles outside, and walked the remainder.

He reached his final destination at about one. It was a small house almost under the shadow of the Kremlin, tucked well away in a side street.

He approached it warily, and knocked on the door. There was a pause and a shuffling of feet. Then the door opened a little way, and a shaft of yellow light streamed on to the mysterious visitor's face.

"Ivan Pavlovna!" a voice in the house exclaimed. "Come in quickly, before you are seen!"

The door opened wider; then shut with a snap. The street was empty once more.

Treachery.

IVAN PAVLOVNA, Kolya's father, stepped into the hall of the house, and found himself face to face with an aged and bent man whose voice was still a voice of steel and whose spirit still betrayed those days when he had ridden as colonel of the Imperial Horse.

At the time of the revolution, when Russia had been given over to the Bolsheviks, he had been Staff General of the Russian Forces. Now he was a "comrade," only retaining his liberty because the President of the Teheka believed him to be harmless.

The general stared at Ivan in amazement.

"What brings you here, my friend?" he asked in a low voice, as though even the very walls might be listening.

"His Imperial Highness sent me—" began Ivan.

"Hush!"

The general, at the mention of the hereditary ruler of Russia under the Czarist regime, looked about him fearfully, then led the way to a quiet room at the back of the house. The windows were barred and heavily curtained, and the door was provided with a strong lock.

"We are safe from interruption here," said the general.

"His Imperial Highness is in Paris, as you know," said Ivan. "For months he has been working on a plan to overthrow those in power in the Kremlin. Well, all is ended. His Imperial Highness sends me with a letter ordering all the loyalists here to cease operations."

He produced a heavily sealed envelope from his pocket.

The general took the letter and read it through, lines of sorrow on his forehead. It was brief but decisive—telling the loyalists that no further steps were to be taken against the Soviet Government—and it was signed in the bold hand of the man who might have been king but for the revolution of 1917.

The general folded it up, and hid it in his clothing.

"Very well," he said. "I will go to the others and tell them. We are meeting to-night at the Zimoviev Cafe."

Ivan picked up his fur cap, which he had left on the table, and turned towards the door.

"And I will go to find Anna," he said. "I expect she will be at the old place, won't she?"

"Wait!" came the reply. "She is not at home now. She is at the café—as one of the hostesses. Come with me and stand at the door. I will send her out to you if I can. But if she does not come to you within ten minutes after our arrival, go then straight to her lodging and wait there."

They went out together, walking silently side by side.

August 1st, 1931.

At the door of the café the general made a sign to Ivan.

"If anyone asks," he whispered, "you are one of my servants."

Even before he sought his fellow-conspirators, the old fellow got into touch with Anna. She was dancing with a commissariat official as he entered, and he stood on one side until the band had stopped playing. Then he beckoned her over.

"Anna," he breathed, "I have news for you. Command yourself—Ivan has come. He is waiting below for you. As soon as you can, slip away from here and, whatever you do, get him into hiding."

Her eyes lit with gladness, but she said nothing. She merely nodded.

At that moment Sergei joined them. He nodded to the general, then turned to Anna.

"You promised me the last two dances," he said. "The band is just ready to begin."

She drifted off to a slow waltz, leaving the general standing there. Ivan home! She could not conceal the sudden joy that she felt. After all this time Ivan was back again—back, she hoped, for good!

She became aware that Sergei was speaking to her.

"You seem unusually happy this evening, Anna," he was saying. "Have you had some good news?"

"I have—wonderful news!" she said eagerly. "Ivan is home. He went to the general's house first, and the general came here to tell me." She looked at him imploringly. "Let me go home now, Sergei. I will give you the dances some other time."

"Certainly," he agreed. With a little bow he smilingly left her.

While she went away to get her hat and cloak, Sergei made his way unobtrusively to the vestibule of the café, and beckoned two uniformed men who were standing just inside the doorway.

"Come with me," he ordered.

They followed him back into the café. Sergei made his way through the dancing couples until he came to where the general was standing. He tapped the general on the shoulder.

"Well, general," he said with an oily smile, "so you have received the letter you were expecting?"

"What do you mean?" came the quick question.

"I mean that you received a visit to-night from Ivan Pavlovna, and that he delivered a letter to you from Comrade the Prince Vladimir." Sergei spread out his hands ironically. "Therefore, my very excellent friend, you are under arrest for conspiring against the Soviet!"

The general gave him a glance of contempt, which Sergei utterly ignored. He ran deft fingers over the old man's clothing, and soon found the letter.

"The seals are broken, general," grinned Sergei. "Therefore I will read what Comrade Vladimir has to tell us." A glance at the letter followed, then Sergei nodded to the policeman. "Away with him!" he ordered. "I will follow you to the Bureau."

At the door of the café, waiting in the night shadows, was Ivan. He started forward on seeing the general under escort. The old man put out a restraining hand.

"Go to my home, Nikolai," said the old man calmly. "Tell them I have to visit the Teheka on a matter of business. There is no cause for alarm."

Ivan stared so fiercely that one of the men put his hand on the general's shoulder.

"Go home," repeated the general, his eyes plainly indicating which home he meant.

Ivan turned away and left him, his mind anxious and confused.

Meantime, Sergei had waylaid Anna as she came out of her dressing-room.

"It seems that news of Ivan's return has reached the Teheka," he told her. "I am terribly sorry. The general has been arrested. He had a letter on him from the exiled self-styled king! He couldn't help the sneer. "Ivan is implicated, and I had better come with you to your lodging."

"You have betrayed Ivan!" Anna's eyes blazed. "What a fool I was to trust you!"

Sergei shrugged his shoulders. "Too late for heroics, Anna!" he triumphed. "Are you coming with me, or shall I go to Ivan alone?"

She glared at him dumbly, then turned and walked out of the café, the spy chuckling at her heels. She did not speak to him again until they had reached her lodgings. She walked into her room, the man whom she knew for a Teheka spy close behind her, and saw Ivan advance eagerly to greet her. She held up her hand to stop him.

"I've only just heard that you were back, Ivan," she said, and the words seemed to stick in her tense throat. "Sergei got to hear of it, too, and the general has been arrested for treason."

Ivan's expression, first puzzled, became terrible. He took a quick step forward, his fingers twitching.

Anna put herself in front of him quickly, her back turned to Sergei. In the fragment of time that followed, she was able to say with her eyes what she dare not say with her lips—that she loved Ivan and always would. No matter how powerful the Soviet was, it could not be stronger than that.

"Please go, Ivan," she said softly. "Wait outside until I call. I must speak with Sergei alone."

Ivan hesitated, then nodded slowly and walked to the door.

"I will be on the landing outside," he said, and as he spoke his eyes were fixed on Sergei's face.

He closed the door behind him, and the noise penetrated to Kolya, who was sleeping on his bed behind a low screen. He sat up with a start, wondering what was happening. Only a short time before he had seen his father, and had gone off to sleep with Ivan sitting by the bedside.

Now Ivan had gone, and he could hear the voices of his mother and Sergei.

"Well, Anna, what are you going to do about this letter?" said Sergei menacingly.

Kolya put his eyes to a hole in the screen and watched. He saw Sergei standing in front of Anna, holding a large envelope in his hand. Ivan was no longer there.

"What do you mean, Sergei?" asked Anna, in a strained voice.

"You know quite well what I mean," Sergei replied sharply. "If I send this letter to Koslov, Ivan will die." He shrugged his shoulders. "He is, after all, an enemy of the State, and therefore not a fit man to be your husband. I, on the other hand, am in the employ of the State, and could care for you as no other man can."

"You mean that I must divorce Ivan and marry you?" Anna asked. "If I don't, you will send Ivan to the Kremlin?"

"I mean just that," Sergei replied. "After all, my dear, you have brought it all on yourself. You tried to pit your brains against mine. When you got yourself into trouble with the Teheka, it was I who pulled you out of it."

(Continued on page 26.)

The thrilling story of a daredevil ranger who is sent into the high Sierras to assist the local sheriff in capturing a band of mysterious counterfeiters. Featuring Lane Chandler, Sheldon Lewis and Yakima Canutt.

A Warning Defied.

ON the sandy bank of Cripple River, a winding tributary of the mighty Colorado, Firebrand Jordan swung down from the broad back of his piebald mare Nell, and hailed his diminutive companion, Tony Perelli, who was perched uncomfortably on a mule some way behind.

The sun had sunk redly behind the mountains to the west, and the hot day was cooling to dusk. Both riders were tired, and so were their mounts, for they had ridden far since day-break; but Tony was more than tired—he was stiff and sore into the bargain.

With the utmost readiness he dismounted, and the mare and the mule were led down to the water.

"Well, how goes it, Tony?" inquired Firebrand, stretching his long limbs.

Tony screwed his swarthy face into a grimace.

"I never knew," he groaned, "that anything so full of hay could be so hard!"

Firebrand laughed. A mule is not by any means the most comfortable of mounts, and Blossom had her own way of showing her feelings when she was tired of travelling.

"We've come a good way from Hewson," he remarked, looking back across the waste of scrub and sand to the woods and the mountains of the region they had left behind.

"Let's stay here for the night," urged Tony.

"Stay here? Say, we've got about forty miles to go before we make Kernville!"

"Forty miles!" gasped Tony. "Oh!" And he proceeded to arrange a blanket over the mule's saddle, saying as he did so: "This may make it a bit softer."

Tony was the offspring of an Italian father and an Irish mother, and he must have been one of the shortest men in the West, for he stood no more than five feet in his socks. His companion, on the other hand, was unusually tall; six feet two at the least, and broad with it.

Tony's face was round and decorated with a black moustache, and he had a curly brown mop of hair all over his head, but Firebrand's face was clean-shaven and well-featured, and his eyes were grey-blue and keen.

His hair was a flaming red, and this may have accounted for his nickname—he was James Jordan according to his birth certificate—though it was quite as likely that he had earned the "Firebrand" by reason of his dare-devil ways.

Having permitted their steeds to slake their thirst, the two remounted and forded the river, which was shallow at this point. They rode on for another ten miles into a tract of rock-strewn sand and massive boulders.

One particular rock, with a flat side like a wall, attracted Firebrand's attention, for on it was a roughly-painted inscription. He rode up to it, followed by his henchman, and this was the ominous message that stared them both in the face:

"STRANGER, DON'T LET THE SUN GO DOWN ON YOU HERE."

Tony's brown eyes blinked. "Good job you ain't exactly a stranger round here," he said.

"They must have meant that for you, Tony," laughed Firebrand. "Looks kind of bad for you, big boy."

At that very moment a shot rang out from behind a mass of rocks some distance to the left, and Tony promptly threw up his hands and fell from the mule.

"I'm shot!" he cried. "I'm shot! Shot through the brain!"

Firebrand slid down and picked him up.

"Let's have a look at your head," he said.

"Oh, oh, oh!" moaned Tony. "It isn't my head! It—it's somewhere else!"

Firebrand squatted on a boulder beneath the warning notice, and turned his companion this way and that, examining him carefully. There was no suggestion of a bullet wound anywhere about his person, but to the seat of his trousers a number of stiff, sharp spines were still attached.

"You fell on that bunch of cactus, you fool!" quoth Firebrand, and calmly dumped the little man across his knees and extracted the spines.

Unnoticed by either of them, three men had climbed to the top of a rock and were looking down at them, and one of the three held a rifle.

"There they are!" exclaimed the man with the rifle. "Hampton had the right hunch!"

The three disappeared from sight as Firebrand set Tony on his feet and himself stood up.

"Well, you won't be able to ride any more to-night," he said, "so we'll stay here among the rocks."

"Stay here?" exclaimed Tony nervously. "Oh, come on! I can ride! I can ride!"

And to prove it he climbed on to Blossom's back, but immediately dropped off again, groaning loudly.

"You look like riding!" scoffed Firebrand. "Come on with the blankets. I want those outlaws to be right here where we're going to sleep!"

The light was fading rapidly, but Tony had no desire to linger in the dark and make a target for more bullets.

"Sleep?" he exclaimed. "Here? You don't mean that!"

"I do mean it, and I guess you'll sleep all right."

"With my two eyes wide open!"

"Well, sleep with your eyes open if you want to, but right here is where we're going to sleep!"

Protesting loudly, Tony unfastened the blankets attached to the saddle-bows of the two animals, and arranged them on the sand under the rocks, selecting for himself a spot some distance from the painted threat. He laid his beloved guitar on a flat slab above his head, and, seeing that his companion had settled down for slumber, pulled a blanket over his head, complaining all the while.

A crescent moon came up over the distant hills, and only a corncrake interrupted the silvery silence. In less than half an hour Tony was fast asleep and snoring.

It was the morning sun that awakened him: its rays crept down over the rocks, to shine right into his eyes. He started up with an exclamation and looked round. There was no sign of Firebrand except for a big bulge in the blanket under the rocky wall. Tony threw off his own covering and stood up.

"Oh!" he gasped. "Oh!"

The horn handle of a knife projected from Firebrand's blanket, its blade evidently buried in the bulge!

With his eyes nearly starting from his head, Tony crept over to the knife handle, emitting little cries as he went.

"What's the matter, Tony?" inquired a familiar voice, and Firebrand himself appeared round a shoulder of rock.

"Oh, you're not dead!" rejoiced Tony. "I thought you were very dead!"

Firebrand stepped over to the blanket, withdrew the knife, and studied it thoughtfully.

"No, I'm not dead," he chuckled. "You know, Tony, it always pays to out-guess the other fellow. And now we've got to find him!"

He whipped up the blanket, displaying beneath it a sack in which they had carried food for the journey, but which he had filled with sand before seeking a resting-place elsewhere.

"How are you going to find him?" demanded Tony. "He must have gone after he did that to you."

"Sure," nodded Firebrand. "But horses leave tracks! Let's have a look, starting from where that rifle-shot came from."

Reluctantly Tony accompanied him to the cluster of rocks. The tracks of three horses were plainly visible in the sandy soil.

"They headed west," decided Firebrand.

"Good!" said Tony. "We go east!"

"No, we don't!" retorted Firebrand. "I want to give this knife back to its owner."

"Oh, no, no, no!" expostulated the little man. "Now, listen, please, I'm afraid!"

"And you snoring all night as though you were in your own bed! If I believed you, I'd send you straight back to Hewson! Come on! Let's have some grub and break camp."

The Sheriff Makes a Mistake.

TWENTY miles nearer Kernville, and consequently only ten miles away from that little mining town, a log cabin stood in a green hollow, surrounded by a belt of hemlock and cedar. A convenient sort of hide-away, where wrongdoers might very well resort to plan their wrongdoing.

The cabin was furnished roughly with a table, stools, a bed of sorts, and a variety of domestic utensils. It might have been a chuck-house on the extreme confines of a range, only it happened to be nothing of the kind.

The tracks of the three horses led into the hollow, and in the cabin, at seven o'clock in the morning, the riders of the horses were sitting at the table, eating a meal.

All three were dressed as cowboys. One of them was a tall, lean young fellow, rather narrow-eyed, yet obviously superior to his companions. His name was Red Carson, and he was called "Red," not on account of his hair—which was brown—but on account of his somewhat uncertain temper.

The man opposite him at the table was a bullet-headed rascal known as Spike; a bully by nature, a coward at heart. The third had a crafty, lantern-jawed face, Hank Barker, a firm believer in the adage that he who fights and runs away lives to fight on other days.

"If you hadn't left the knife in that guy's bed-roll," quoth Red Carson, tussling with a loaf of bread, "we might have had something to cut this stuff with!"

He was addressing Spike, and that blusterer immediately responded:

"Quit your funny little jokes, will ya? You'll get enough off this job to buy a dozen knives!"

"Settled him, did you?" inquired Hank, probably for the fiftieth time.

"When I stick a knife into anybody," snapped Spike, "he's dead to stay dead!"

Surprisingly, the sound of a guitar reached their ears from somewhere out in the hollow, playing a serenade—though that they did not realise it. They looked blankly at one another.

"What is it?" gasped Hank.

They looked towards the door, and as they looked the door swung wide, and Firebrand stood on the threshold with a gun in his hand.

"Stick 'em up, all of you!" he commanded.

Red and Hank raised their hands with alacrity, but Spike, elevating one hand, reached downwards with the other.

"Drop that gun!" roared Firebrand.

The hand that sought a holster was raised; the discomfited three stood by the table, staring at the tall intruder. But almost in the same instant they saw what Firebrand could not see—his back being turned to the sunlight.

"Stick 'em up, stranger!" bellowed a voice.

Firebrand swung round, and became aware of a powerfully-built man with a little clipped moustache and fierce grey eyes standing immediately behind him, and of a gun that threatened.

Spike was quick to take advantage of this diversion. He was close to the bed, and from the bed he whipped up a big blanket, which he flung dexterously towards the doorway. It descended upon Firebrand and the man who had challenged him, enveloping their heads.

The cabin consisted of two rooms, and the three at the table made a concerted dive for the inner room, where Spike hastily raised a trap in the floor. They had scuttled down a ladder beneath the trap, and the trap itself was closed, by the time Firebrand had flung off the blanket.

"Drop that gun," roared the shirt-sleeved man on the doorstep, "or I'll shoot you!"

As both were ready to shoot, the advantage could only be with he who proved the quicker on the trigger, and Firebrand grinned.

"I'm faster than you, brother," he said.

"If you are, you'll hang," was the angry retort. "D'you know that I'm the sheriff of this here county?"

"Sheriff?" echoed Firebrand, and thrust away his six-shooter with a laugh. "Why, you're just the man I want to see!"

"About what?"

Firebrand fished in the pocket of his shirt for a crumpled sheet of paper, which he presented.

"This letter'll tell you all about it," he said. "At least, it ought to—you wrote it yourself!"

The sheriff of Carter County—Ed Burns by name—took the crumpled sheet with his left hand without any loss of vigilance.

"If you don't mind," he growled, "will you face the other way?"

Obediently Firebrand turned about, and the barrel of the sheriff's gun was jabbed into his back while the sheriff read:

"Dear Mr. Jordan,—I've heard tell about you and your knowledge of this county and your way of rounding up crooks. Will you arrange with the authorities to come over here and help bring a gang of counterfeiters to justice? I need you pretty bad.

Yours truly,
ED BURNS."

"Well," said Ed Burns, lowering his weapon, "I did write this myself—and are you Firebrand Jordan?"

"That's me, sheriff," replied Firebrand, swinging round with a broad grin. "And I guess you interrupted me when I was right on the trail!"

The sheriff picked up his big hat, which had been swept off by the blanket, and Firebrand retrieved his somewhat similar headgear from the floor.

"Well, say, I'm awfully sorry for the reception I gave you," apologised the sheriff, extending a horny hand.

"No harm done," Firebrand assured him. "But those fellows I was trailing got away just the same."

"Would you recognise 'em if you saw 'em again?"

"I don't think I would," admitted Firebrand. "I didn't get a good look at but one of them."

"Well, I got in a little late," admitted the shirt-sleeved sheriff. "I didn't even get a slant at them myself. Wonder who they were, anyway?"

"Doesn't make an awful lot of difference, sheriff. Best thing you can do is to tell me all you know about this gang."

"Well," said the sheriff, picking his words, "this thing came to my attention about a month ago, and it got me sure puzzled, so I guessed we should have a new man on the job."

"Working independently, eh? I suppose I can count on your help if I need it?"

"Absolutely! I'll be right around whenever you want."

"And you wouldn't mind showing me your star?"

The sheriff fished a star of silver from his waistcoat pocket, and he was explaining that he had been keeping his eyes on this isolated cabin, when a noise in the adjoining room sent them rushing into it.

The trapdoor in the floor was rising slowly, and a hat was visible in the dark opening. Firebrand and the sheriff stood watching, with their guns levelled ready to fire. But it was Tony's swarthy face that appeared under the hat, and Tony, blinking at the guns, cried wildly:

"It's only me! It's only me!"

Firebrand jerked the little man out from the hole in the floor.

"It's all right, sheriff," he said reassuringly. "He's a friend of mine." Then, severely to Tony: "It'd have to be you! What were you doing down there, anyway?"

"Well," Tony replied, "there was three fellows that came out of a hole across the clearing, and went away on horses. So I crawled into the hole—and got here."

"Where did they go?" demanded the sheriff eagerly.

"Come with me, and I'll show you," promised Tony, and he led the way out into the sunlit clearing.

Firebrand Returns the Knife.

FIVE miles from Kernville on its southern side stood Judd Howe's cattle-farm, in the midst of rolling grassland, two thousand feet above sea-level, flanked by mountains to the west and by desert to the east.

Round about noon that day Red Carson, Spike, and Hank were getting some steers into a commodious corral, when Red caught sight of a trim, girlish figure approaching on foot.

"How many have we got?" he inquired of Spike.

"Twenty-five—thirt'," said Spike, counting.

"Guess that's enough for this morning," decided Red. "We'll knock off for chuck—it'll be ready mighty soon."

The girl who was approaching them was Peggy Howe, younger daughter of the rancher, and she had rather a liking for Red Carson, who, whatever his other deficiencies might be, was very much in love with her.

But before he could greet her a second girl came riding up behind more cattle—Peggy's sister Joan, two years her senior and looking very businesslike in her riding kit, her brown hair fluttering in the breeze.

Joan dismounted beside Peggy and gazed with approval at her dainty frock of chequered muslin.

"Gee, you look swell, honey," she said. "That's the way I like to see you—looking the little lady."

"I'm glad you like it," Peggy replied, "but I feel so useless when I see you at work. Isn't there anything I can do of real value?"

"Don't you worry about work," laughed Joan. "I'll attend to it while dad's away. Got 'em all in, Red?"

Red nodded, and just then Ah Sing, the Chinese cook, emerged from the kitchen, beating a gong. Food was ready to be served to the farm-hands.

Red, deprived of the talk he had hoped to have with Peggy, marshalled his men and led the way to the chuck-house, while the two girls went on to the farmhouse, Joan leading her horse, Peggy tripping daintily beside her.

The afternoon wore peacefully away, and no stranger would have imagined that there was anything wrong with the Howe homestead, or with its outfit.

In the evening, as they were perfectly entitled to do, Red and Spike rode into town, where they made straight for the Mountain Inn, a big, wooden building with a wide veranda on which cowboys lounged.

Inside, miners and cowhands were sitting about at the tables, many of them playing cards, while others lounged at the bar or stood watching a trio of dancing girls.

Red and Spike were making for the bar when David Hampton, the proprietor of the place, descended a staircase at the back of the long room and beckoned with a jerk of his head, whereupon they followed him to a table set near one of the walls.

This David Hampton was a heavy-featured man with a mane of black hair. He wore eastern clothes and a fancy waistcoat, and he was reputed to own half the town and to hold mortgages on many of the ranches in the neighbourhood.

"Well, Red," he said in a low voice to that young man, "are you sure the girls will sell their interest in the mine?"

"Yeah—if you give them the cash," was the reply.

"Right; I'll bring the ten thousand dollars with me to-morrow. I'm going up to the mine." And he winked.

For a while he sat there talking; then his quick eyes noticed two strangers crossing the threshold, and he went over to them, never dreaming that one was Firebrand Jordan and the other his henchman, Tony.

"How do?" he greeted them pleasantly. "I'll find you some nice seats up near the dance floor, right close to the girls."

Firebrand shrugged and followed him, and presently Tony was sitting with a glass of beer in his hand watching the dancers, while Firebrand sat beside him, looking everywhere save in their direction.

Abruptly he rose and strode over to the table at which Red and Spike were talking together.

"Pardon me, gentlemen," he said, "but you lost that in my camp last night!" And he held right under their noses the knife which had been intended for his heart.

"You're loco!" exploded Spike. "I've never seen that knife before!"

"Would you swear to that?"

"Certainly."

"What do you say?" demanded Firebrand of Red.

"I'm not saying you're off your head, but I'm saying everything else that he's said."

Firebrand looked sharply at Hampton, who had approached the table. Then he said contemptuously:

"You fellows are just like a lot of cattle I've seen—born yellow!"

He threw the knife between them so that it stuck upright in the table-top, then turned on his heel and went back to Tony. Hampton leaned down.

"Red," he growled, "I want to see you up in the office—you and Spike." He wandered away among the customers for a few minutes—during which he glanced covertly at Firebrand several times—then made for the staircase and slowly ascended to a room above, fitted as an office with a big, flat-topped desk and several chairs.

Down in the saloon Red pushed back his chair and rose. Spike, following his example, reached out his hand towards the hilt of the knife—a movement which Firebrand did not fail to notice. But Red beat the hand down.

"What's the matter with you?" he said gruffly. "Want to tell him that you own the knife? Leave it there, Spike!"

"Guess you're right," admitted Spike, and made for the stairs.

Red followed him, and together they entered the narrow room above, where

"Was that you shouting just now?" demanded Firebrand.

Hampton was sitting moodily behind the desk.

"Well," he said, looking up at them. "I suppose, as you've carried out my orders, you want me to pay you off?"

Spike tried to clear his throat, but it was in a husky voice that he replied slowly:

"Well, boss, fact is, the work didn't turn out as good as you might think. The guy got away."

"What do you mean, he got away?" snapped Hampton.

"He trailed Red and me to the shack, and almost caught us."

"Well, you're a fine pair of dumb-bells!" roared Hampton. "How did it happen?"

They gave him a fairly accurate account of what had occurred, to which he listened with growing scorn.

"Well," he said at last, "I'm through with you. You're fired, both of you!"

"But listen, Hampton," protested Spike. "We've got to live."

"Not necessarily," retorted Hampton. "Nice people starve every day! Besides, you fellows have got jobs—Red's foreman of the Howe ranch, and you're top hand. What more do you want? I won't have bunglers in my pay. Now get out, and send Hogan up to me!"

Reluctantly they went out, and down in the saloon they spoke to a broad-shouldered man with a pronounced stoop and the somewhat bandy legs of one who has lived long in the saddle. Hogan went up to Hampton's room; the discomfited pair made their way to the street.

"Well, what's on your mind?" demanded Spike, as Red leaned thoughtfully over the hitching-rail instead of unfastening his horse.

"Did you hear Hampton say he was taking ten thousand cash to the farm in the morning?"

"What of it?"

"Well, I'll bet you fifty per cent he won't get away with it," chuckled Red. "Come on, let's go!"

Hampton's conference with Hogan was of brief duration. The strains of an accordion reached his ears from the saloon, and he went out to the stairs to see what was happening.

A miner had brought the instrument into the place, and Tony had borrowed it and was playing a lively jig to which the girls were dancing with some of the men—a most unorthodox proceeding.

Hampton descended in a fury, shouting. "Stop that!"

The girls retreated in haste, the men made sheepishly for the bar, and Tony handed the accordion back to its owner. Hampton strode up to the musician and ordered him to clear out.

Tony looked inquiringly at Firebrand, who walked straight up to the proprietor and grabbed him by the lapels of his coat.

"What harm has my friend done?" he inquired.

"You butt in when you're asked!" roared Hampton.

"I'll butt in when it suits me!" said Firebrand coolly, and letting go of Hampton's coat he crashed his fist into a somewhat prominent jaw. Hampton went down with a thud, and out came Firebrand's guns.

Everybody present raised their hands in alarm, and the bar-tender ducked down out of sight as the guns spoke, shattering bottle after bottle on the shelves.

"Come on, Tony," said Firebrand, finally, as he backed towards the door. "This isn't much of a saloon, anyway!"

August 1st, 1931.

Shot!

NEXT morning, in the garden of the Howe farmhouse, Joan was talking to Red about the continued absence of her father, which was worrying her rather badly, when a car was seen approaching in the dusty roadway beyond the fence.

"I can't understand it," she said. "He rode into town a week ago, and we haven't heard a word from him since. Are you sure he told you he was going to Las Vegas that day, Red?"

"Sure," responded Red, "and I don't think you've got any cause to worry, Miss Joan. Hullo, here comes Hampton!"

The car had stopped outside the gate, and David Hampton was stepping down from it. Red moved away to a shack which was his office as the newcomer entered the garden, hat in hand.

"How do, Miss Joan," said Hampton, in the smooth voice he knew so well how to assume, "I was on my way over to Painted Rock Mine, but thought I'd call here on the way as there's a little business I have to discuss with you. How are things?"

"Not very good," replied Joan frankly. "And I'm terribly worried about my father's absence."

"Well, it is funny, and I hate to bother you while he's away, but there's this!"

He took a folded bill of exchange from his pocket and opened it out for her inspection. According to the document, Judd Howe undertook to pay, three months after date, ten thousand dollars to the order of David Hampton, for value received.

"Ten thousand dollars!" gasped Joan. "I knew dad owed you money, but I didn't realise it was so much!"

"Your dad sunk a lot of money in that worthless mine," explained Hampton. "My trouble is that this money is due on the 5th of July, which is ten days from now. But I don't want to be harsh. I'll give you this bill and another ten thousand into the bargain for the entire rights in the mine—I've got an offer for that amount."

"Oh, but, Mr. Hampton, I couldn't do anything like that in dad's absence," protested Joan.

"The mine isn't in your dad's name—it's in yours and your sister's. That's the way we arranged it."

"But I—I couldn't do anything without him."

"All right," said Hampton gruffly. "But how if he doesn't come back within ten days? I can't seize the mine, because that isn't his, the way the deeds are made out. But I'll have to foreclose on the ranch. Think it over—and I'll see you again."

He went off in none too good a temper, and as the car swept towards the hills, Red, who had been listening to the conversation at the door of his shack, strolled back to Joan, who was lifting her lip and looking troubled.

"Well, Red," she said sadly, "I guess you'd better look for another job—I've just found out that dad owes Hampton ten thousand dollars!"

"Don't you worry," said Red cheerfully, "I'll get you the money to-day." She stared at him in astonishment.

"You!" she exclaimed. "Where in the world could you get ten thousand dollars?"

"That's a little secret! But I'll tell you this much: Hampton's a crook, and he's doing some dirty business over that mine. I—I've heard things. You leave it to me."

Some little way along the road Hampton stopped his car again. Peggy was riding towards him on a pony, and even as he stopped the pony shied at the car, tumbled its rider into the roadway, and ran off across the fields towards the farm.

Hampton helped Peggy to her feet, apologising profusely. She brushed the dust from her frock and assured him that she was not hurt in the least. To prove it she smiled at him.

"Say, what about taking that job I offered you?" he inquired eagerly.

"Oh, I'd love to," she declared. "It would be wonderful to work in a town, and I'm sick of this old ranch. But Joan won't let me, Mr. Hampton."

"Well, I'm going to have a little talk with your sister—and I don't think she'll object the way I'll put it to her."

"Oh, what would be lovely," Peggy declared.

Hampton drove on, and Peggy made her way across the fields to the farmhouse. As she reached the yard she saw Red go galloping off on a horse, and wondered, because instead of turning into the road he went off across the long grass of the range.

She wondered still more when she caught sight of her sister following Red on a big brown horse, and she spoke to one of the hands named Pete. But Pete could tell her nothing save that Joan had wanted a horse in a hurry and had gone off on Poison.

"Just as dinner ought to be ready!" complained Peggy. "People are tiresome!"

Joan, however, had followed Red because of what he had said. Being a shrewd girl she had come to a conclusion concerning his sudden departure which seared her. But Poison was not nearly as speedy as the horse Red rode, and under a belt of trees she lost sight of him.

She rode on. If Red planned to do what she believed, he was making a more or less straight line for a spot where the winding road to the mine dipped down between walls of rock.

She was perfectly right! Red reached the rocks and road long before there was any sign of Hampton's car, he dismounted and with feverish haste made a barrier across the dusty highway with brushwood. Then, hiding his horse, he concealed himself behind a tree and drew his gun.

Joan reached the rocks almost immediately afterwards, slid from her mount, and crept forward. She could see no sign of Red, but the barrier of brushwood was only too visible. She tugged out a small but serviceable revolver she had brought with her.

Presently the car, with Hampton at the wheel, came swiftly down-hill, but as its driver caught sight of the barrier he braked hastily. Red cried out in an assumed voice:

"Drop that money-bag of yours, stranger! Drop it over the side, or I'll drill you!"

Hampton looked nervously round, and a shot rang out and a bullet sang past his head. Without any further hesitation, he dropped a leather bag over the side of the car.

"Now you can remove the brush and drive away!" directed the voice.

Hampton obeyed meekly; and though he drove away muttering to himself, he did not seem to be as furious as one might expect a man to be when robbed of ten thousand dollars.

While Joan crouched watchfully behind a rock above, Red crept out from his hiding-place and picked up the fallen bag, which he opened and closed again with every sign of satisfaction.

Joan was about to clamber indignantly down to him, when from the other side of the road a tall rider on a piebald horse suddenly appeared.

Joan shrank back. It seemed to her a dreadful thing that Red should have robbed Hampton in this way; it seemed still more dreadful that he should be caught red-handed, trying to help her.

"Drop that gun, young fellow—and the bag!" shouted Firebrand, close behind Red's back.

And Red, realising that he was caught, obeyed.

"Now turn round! I want to take a look at you!"

In a panic, Joan raised her tiny weapon and fired. Her intention was simply to give Red a chance to escape, and she took no aim. But the bullet pierced the brim of Firebrand's cow-hat and ploughed its way across his forehead. He reeled in the saddle and pitched face downwards into the dust.

Red grabbed up the bag and the gun, and scurried off among the rocks, where he remounted his horse. He was galloping away as Tony came out from under a clump of trees into the roadway, and Joan reached the prone figure.

"What happened?" Tony demanded agitatedly as he flung himself from his mule.

"Get some help!" shrilled Joan, and sank down on her knees beside Firebrand, whose face had gone deathly white except where a streak of crimson trickled.

"What happened?" insisted Tony.

"He's been shot by a bandit," faltered Joan, trying to stanch the wound in Firebrand's forehead with a wholly inadequate handkerchief.

"You mean he's goin' to die?"

"No. I'll have to take him over to my ranch. Get help, please! Oh, please!"

At Bay!

THIS way and that Tony rode about on his mule till he sighted the farm and urged Blossom across to it.

He poured forth an incoherent story to Pete, who, with a number of hands, went back with him, carrying blankets and a hurdle. The unconscious Firebrand was conveyed to the farmhouse and laid on Judd Howe's bed, and a doctor was fetched from Kernville.

Fortunately it was not a very serious wound Joan had inflicted, but it was bad enough to put Firebrand out of action for several days, though on the second day he was able to get up and totter about with a bandage round his head.

Joan found the stranger a handsome and amusing young fellow, and Firebrand, not realising that she had shot him, decided that she was the most adorable girl in the world. A friendship developed between them which ripened rapidly into something deeper.

Tony, also installed at the farm, amused everybody with his quaint ways, and with his inevitable guitar provided many an accompaniment for the singing of cowboy ditties.

But Firebrand began to entertain suspicions concerning Red, as a result of hearing him shout one morning by the corrals.

Calves were being branded, and one had just been roped and laid low. Red, holding the branding-irons, had been giving instructions.

Firebrand was in the yard, talking to Joan, who had just mounted her horse for a ride, but at the sound of that voice he went running to the corrals. She followed, curious as to the reason for his sudden disappearance, and she found him standing beside the prostrate calf, with a hand on Red's sleeve.

"Was that you shouting just now?" he demanded.

"Yes. Why?" inquired Red.

"Shout again," directed Firebrand.

Tony, who had wandered up with his precious guitar under his arm, looked on expectantly, knowing his leader's ways and anticipating trouble. But Red, with a shrug of his shoulders, shouted again, at the top of his voice, but quite differently.

"My mistake," apologised Firebrand.

And Joan, on her horse, gave a little sigh of relief.

But a few evenings later, as Firebrand sat on a little seat in the garden, with Joan beside him in a silk frock that set off her beauty, Red called urgently from the bunkhouse:

"Miss Howe!"

Firebrand sprang up instantly.

"What's the matter?" inquired Joan.

"Whose voice is that?"

"It's only my foreman," she replied.

"I won't be a minute." And she ran off, full of misgiving.

"What is it, Red?" she said severely.

"You know what I told you."

"Yes," replied that young man urgently, "but to-morrow's the day Hampton's got to be paid for that note."

"I know," she said mournfully. "But what am I going to do about it?"

"You're going to do just what I told you—pay him with his own money."

"Since when am I taking orders from you?" she demanded. "Didn't I shoot Firebrand to keep him from recognising you? I can't do such a thing!"

"Don't be silly!" laughed Red. "He'll never know it's his own money, and your worries will be over—except about your dad."

Firebrand, who had been quite himself again for several days, but who had remained at the farm for his own purposes, came strolling towards them, and Red promptly dived into the bunkhouse, while Joan turned to greet the man she had grown to love.

"Well," said Firebrand calmly. "I had a good look at that fellow Red in the moonlight, and I overheard most of your conversation."

"Then—then you know—"

"Yes, I know, little girl! But I'll forgive you so long as you let me help you. I want to see that money!"

"B-but it was stolen from Mr. Hampton, and we'll have to give it back to him. I've had it ever since that dreadful day—"

"Joan," said Firebrand earnestly, "can't you trust me?"

"More than anyone in the world."

"Well, then, let me have that money."

They went into the house together, and in the sitting-room she brought him a big envelope crammed with notes. He examined them carefully against the light of a lamp, studying the details of their printing and their watermarks.

"What are you going to do, Firebrand?" she asked.

"Put everything right, I hope," he answered gravely. "But that won't be to-night."

The sound of a car in the road startled them both, and Firebrand thrust the notes into a pocket. Hampton was evidently not waiting till morning!

Joan met the unwelcome visitor at the front door, and escorted him into the sitting-room, where he glared at Firebrand.

"What can I do for you, Mr. Hampton?" asked Joan.

"Well, my task is not a pleasant one,"

Red went backwards over the top of the desk with Firebrand's left hand at his throat, while Hampton received a blow on the side of his jaw.

was the reply, "but I have to remind you about the money your father owes me. You see, it's due to-morrow."

"That will be all right, Mr. Hampton," said Firebrand cheerfully, rising up from a settee. "I'll attend to it."

"What have you got to do with it?" growled Hampton.

"Well, you see. Joan and I are going to be married, so I'm attending to all her financial affairs from now on."

"Do you realise," roared Hampton, "that her father owes me ten thousand dollars?"

"Oh, yes," drawled Firebrand, "but I'll have it ready for you."

"It's got to be in cash."

"Of course! Good-night, Mr. Hampton."

Hampton went, mentally cursing the interference of this tall and very alert young man, whom he had done his best to prevent from reaching the district.

As he went out to his car he heard the voice of Tony, somewhere in the distance, singing "Red River," to the twanging of his guitar. He drove off, cudgelling his brains for the best means of dealing with an unexpected situation.

That night he sent a message to Red and Spike by Hogan, as a result of which the two rode into town early next morning.

A negro was sweeping out the saloon as they mounted the staircase to the office and found Hank already there with Hampton.

"I've sent for you two fellows," said Hampton, "to talk to you about this guy Jordan."

"What about him?" inquired Red.

"I'm expecting trouble with him, and you're both in it up to the neck. You've got to stay here with me, and keep your eyes skinned—and your hands ready. I'm expecting him any time, and I don't want his head!"

If any one of them had looked out of the window into the street just then, Firebrand might have been seen riding towards the saloon with Joan. He also had decided upon a plan of action, in pursuance of which he said quietly to his companion as they reached the blacksmith's shop:

"You ride on to the sheriff's office, Joan, and ask him to come to the Mountain Inn right away."

Joan nodded and cantered on up the street. Firebrand waited for Tony, who was riding discreetly behind on Blossom.

"You watch the back entrance," he directed, "and keep your gun handy."

In the saloon he inquired of the black who was wielding an enormous broom whether Mr. Hampton was up in his office, and, on receiving an answer in the affirmative, he mounted the stairs.

Red, Spike and Hank were grouped round Hampton as he entered the room, but they made way for him.

"Good-morning, Hampton," said Firebrand curtly, and produced a wad of notes which he flung down on the desk. "Here's the money—ten thousand. Count it!"

Hampton took up the notes, stared; turned one or two of them over, and held them up to the light.

"So," he exploded, "you're the highwayman who held me up! This is my money!"

"It is," replied Firebrand, pointing an accusing finger at him. "You made it yourself! But I'm no highwayman. I'm a ranger—and I'm arresting you for counterfeiting this money!"

"Don't be ridiculous!" bellowed Hampton. "You can't prove a thing like that!"

"No?" questioned Firebrand, whipping up the notes and stowing them in a pocket. "Well, come along and explain it to the judge."

August 1st, 1931.

He turned to Red and Spike.

"And that goes for you two birds as well," he added.

Hank had crept up behind him, and the barrel of a six-shooter was jabbed into his back. But, like lightning, Firebrand swung round, grabbed the gun and sent its owner sprawling. Then, as Hampton sprang up behind the desk, he turned again, and Red went backwards over the top of the desk with Firebrand's left hand at his throat, while Hampton received a blow on the side of his jaw that sent his head into violent contact with Red's nose.

Spike dived for Firebrand's legs, but received a kick that laid him low. But by this time Hank was on his feet again, and he flung himself upon the ranger from behind, his fingers clutching and tearing at Firebrand's neck.

So unequal a combat could not last for long. Hampton and Red wrenched themselves free, and Spike got up. Blows were rained at Firebrand by four pairs of fists, but even then he struggled gamely to the door, and sent Hank somersaulting down the staircase before he was finally overpowered and roped.

They left him, bound hand and foot, with a gag in his mouth. Hampton's evil brain had devised a plan that might even yet save him from arrest.

Pursuit!

JOAN had ridden on to the sheriff's office, only to find it deserted. She asked a man who was lounging outside whether the sheriff was in town, and received the unsatisfactory answer: "No, but he's liable to show up any minute."

"Will you find him for me, and send him over to Mr. Hampton's office right away?" begged Joan.

The man promised that he would do this, and Joan turned her horse in the direction of the saloon.

Peggy had ridden into town that morning on her pony, deciding that there was no reason why she should be left alone at the farmhouse. Hampton met her as he emerged from the saloon with Red, Spike and Hank. He told them to ride on to the mine, and, as they mounted their horses by the hitching-rail, he led Peggy to his car, which was standing in the roadway.

"I've got some good news for you," he told her. "We've found your dad!"

"Oh!" cried Peggy excitedly. "Where is he? Where has he been?"

"He's over at Painted Rock—got in last night, and decided to stay at the mine. Get in the car and I'll run you over."

Peggy complied with the utmost readiness, and Hampton was tethering her pony when Joan came riding down the street, caught sight of her sister, and went over to her.

"What are you doing here, Peggy?" she exclaimed.

"Oh, Joan," cried her sister, "Mr. Hampton says dad is back—he's at the mine! He's going to take me to him!"

Hampton looked round. Luck, he decided, was favouring him! He suggested that Joan should leave her horse and get into the car with her sister.

"But Mr. Jordan—he—"

"He's gone on," lied Hampton.

"We'll soon catch him up."

So Joan climbed into the car, and Hampton presently drove off with the two girls in the direction of the hills, passing the sheriff, with a chuckle, just outside the town.

The man to whom Joan had spoken kept his promise. He did not even give the sheriff time to dismount.

"Chief," he said, "you're wanted at Hampton's office right away!"

"Hampton's office?" echoed Ed Burns wonderingly. "But I met Hampton himself just now in a car with Judd Howe's daughters."

"Well, there it is—and Joan Howe was the girl who wanted you—and she seemed to want you purty bad."

"Funny," decided the sheriff. "Perhaps you'd better come with me, Tom."

He slid down from his horse, and together they made briskly for the saloon.

But Tony, long since tired of hanging about round the back of that building, had ventured into it in search of Firebrand. He encountered the negro, whose remarkable story sent him rushing upstairs to Hampton's office—and there he found Firebrand, gagged and trussed.

"You oughta let me come with you," he said reproachfully as he cut the bonds and removed the gag. "I've been doing nothing out there all this time, except gettin' sunstroke!"

"Where's my hat?" growled Firebrand, stretching his cramped limbs. "Don't grouse, Tony—get your mule and follow me. I guess the next act of this drama's going to be staged at that mine we looked over the other day."

He went out from the room, but, instead of descending the stairs, he climbed out through a window on to a balcony overhanging the veranda beneath. The piebald mare was standing patiently where he had left her down below. He straddled the balcony railing and dropped neatly into the saddle, while Tony looked on with undisguised admiration.

Off up the street he galloped, and Tony ran down to mount his mule. From the veranda he tried to emulate his master's feat, without quite so much risk; but Blossom moved aside as he sprang, and Tony descended on all fours in the dust.

As he rose and mounted the mule, he saw that Firebrand had stopped to talk to the sheriff, but though he urged Blossom forward, he missed the conversation. Firebrand swept on at full tilt, while the sheriff and the man with him went running in opposite directions, shouting for riders in the name of the law.

Commotion followed. Men came running out from shops and houses, seeking their horses. Tony rode on, trying to catch up with Firebrand; but from time to time he looked back, and very soon a cloud of dust told of a posse mounted at last and galloping after him.

The road to the mine dipped down under trees, rose steeply between rocks, and flanked the Cripple River at a point where the water cascaded and swirled fully fifty feet below. Firebrand, travelling like the wind, failed to see any sign of the car Hampton drove, but glimpsed the three riders whom the car had passed.

Spike, having looked back and guessed at who followed, took cover beneath a tree above the gorge in which the river ran, determined to make an end of this pursuit. A shot rang out as Firebrand approached, and a bullet whizzed past his head; but Firebrand, uninjured, rode straight at the man who held the gun.

Spike's horse stumbled, and Spike went headlong downwards into the water. Firebrand, himself, unable to stop, took a header from the saddle, and a great column of water shot up as he dived beneath the surface.

He rose to find the faithful piebald mare swimming sturdily beside him, and they reached the opposite bank in company and clambered up among the

(Continued on page 27.)

The amazing exploits of a daring band of men in pursuit of the giant "devil" fish at Santa Margarita Island.

"MONSTERS of the DEEP"

Dangerous Seas.

WHERE the waters of the mighty Pacific sweep the southern coastline of Lower California, you come upon that indentation known as Magdalena Bay, mirroring the azure vault of the sky, dotted with islands that know only the traffic of sea-birds and fishermen.

The Dispatch, a fifty-foot motor boat carrying a crew of three or four men, was cruising off the mainland. She had been placed at the disposal of Harold Austin, a sportsman keenly interested in deep-sea fishing, which was liable to be a pastime both perilous and exciting in a tract of water infested by such enemies of mankind as the shark.

The Dispatch had been specially equipped for the trip, and the personnel included Draper, a cameraman anxious to secure some shots for a motion picture company which he represented. Neither he nor Austin were destined to be disappointed by results.

The islands scattered about the Bay were many of them uninhabited, but formed the nesting-places of veritable clouds of cormorants and pelicans that swooped over the surface of the sea and preyed upon small fish. It was to one of these islands that Austin, Draper and a member of the crew repaired for their first adventure with the denizens of the ocean, and Austin had scarcely cast his line when a violent tug told him that something had caught on to it.

The next few seconds were fraught with thrills and anxiety so far as Austin was concerned, and he had no doubt in his own mind that the same might have been said for a fish.

It was a big bass, and it gave him a hard struggle. But the bass does most of its fighting under the water, and as soon as it broke the surface it was drawn in with as much ease as its twenty-pound-bulk would permit.

Again Austin cast his line, and again he was successful. Satisfied with the catch, he decided to make a tour of the island itself, and soon discovered that it was not only inhabited by birds, but by seals as well.

"Cute little fellows, huh?" said Austin, indicating a couple of sportive pups that had strayed from their mother seal.

"They certainly are," agreed Draper. "Say, I've got a sister back home that would give ten years of her life for a coat made out of these critters' skins."

Austin laughed and shook his head. "Not these ones," he rejoined. "They're not the fur-bearing kind that you get in the Arctic. But I'll tell you what they are good for when they're caught young—circus-tricks! How about taking those two pups aboard and training them?"

It was a suggestion that met with approval, but when it was discovered that the seal-pups required to be washed every day, they were returned to their native shore without regret. After all, the crew of the Dispatch had come to Magdalena Bay for deep-sea fishing, and not for the purpose of starting a menagerie.

Fishing in those waters was not always a profitable pastime, for many times it was only the head of a fish that was hauled on board, the sharks having seized the rest. But it was a pastime packed with interest, and the interest was increased a hundred-fold when the Dispatch encountered a high-sea fleet of tuna boats.

Austin and Draper were invited aboard one of the craft, and it was an invitation that came as a surprise, for among the superstitious fisher-folk there was a legend that the fish left the vicinity when strangers visited the boats.

The legend was not borne out on this particular occasion, for the sea was thick with skip-jacks, or little tuna, which continued to swarm around the vessel in shoals.

From the master of the craft, Austin and Draper learned that the fishermen worked on a percentage basis, and they had to work fast, as the tuna did not stay long in one place.

The men were standing on a kind of cradle rigged up along the ship's side, and the two visitors watched them with keen appreciation, following the glinting hooks that fell into the water and lifted into view again with a silver victim attached.

There were no barbs on the hooks, and the fish flopped off as soon as they touched the deck. But each man had to watch his line, for if he slackened for an instant he lost his fish—an unpardonable sin.

Meanwhile two or three of the crew kept tossing live sardines into the sea, to feed the little skip-jacks and keep them close to the vessel, and the tuna became so excited that they snapped at anything which hit the water.

"Tuna haven't much sense anyway," Austin commented, when this mode of baiting them was explained to him. "Did you ever notice how dumb they looked in a can, Draper?"

The cameraman laughed, and then: "Say, how big a catch will these boats hold?" he inquired.

"A hundred and forty tons, I'm told," Austin replied, "and the fish fetch $120 a ton. Can you beat that?" he added, his bronzed face breaking into a grin. "Fishing and getting paid for it."

He turned his attention to the men on the cradle again. They were taking in the heavier tuna now, which had followed the small skip-jacks. Fifty pounds apiece, these big fellows weighed, bait being required for them.

"And they're nippers compared to the ones you'll find up in Nova Scotia," observed Austin. "I've seen 'em run as high as fifteen hundred and two thousand pounds there. They catch 'em with nets, and the fishermen have a hot time of it. One slap of the tail from a giant Nova Scotia tuna and you'd finish up in hospital, if not worse. But say, I think I'll ask the captain if I can try my hand here."

Again Austin cast his line and again he was successful.

Permission being given, Austin took up a position on the eradle, and he was not long in hooking into something that gave him a lively struggle. But it was with an exclamation of disgust that he pulled up a sinister shark, and a little later he and Draper returned to the Dispatch.

They waved farewell to the tuna boat and cruised on in search of further adventures amid those strange and populous waters.

The Whalers.

THE lure of fishing had spread to every member of the Dispatch's crew, and had become a veritable craze with Riley, the Irish cook, who even allowed it to interfere with the schedule of the meals.

Austin formed a plan intended to cure Riley of the obsession, and took into his confidence Draper and a little Japanese handyman known as Kay.

Riley had fixed up a line near the galley, and it was to be seen dangling over the rail at all times of the day. Hauling this in, Austin hooked an old sea-boot to it, tossed it into the Dispatch's foaming wake and then raced to the cook's quarters.

"Riley," he shouted, "there's something on your line."

The Irishman came blundering out of the galley and rushed to the rail. He began to haul in his line hand over hand, and his excitement reached fever-pitch as he observed a dark object leaping and bounding on the end of it, an object that was not recognisable as a boot till it was pulled out of the water.

Riley clutched at it and glared at it. Then:

"Begorra," he roared, hurling it to the deck, "somebody's goin' to pay for this!"

Kay had been swabbing down the deck, and, espying Austin's grinning face in the fore part of the ship, the Irishman seized the

August 1st, 1931.

Jap's bucket of sea-water and gave chase. Draper took the opportunity of filming the game of hide-and-peek that ensued, and stuck to his post when it might have been wiser to make himself scarce.

For Austin proved too nimble for Riley, and, coming to a breathless standstill opposite the camera, the Irishman gave Draper the contents of the bucket.

Draper uttered a spluttering yell and started forward vengefully, and a lively scuffle seemed imminent when a shout from Kay, the Jap, diverted the attention of every member of the crew to a fleet of vessels on the port bow.

They were whalers, mother ships and their "killers," which were smaller craft equipped with harpoon guns; and, coming alongside one of the latter boats, Austin and Draper obtained permission to board her.

Two whales were playing around not far away, and every time they opened their jaws they took in a couple of mouthfuls of shrimp, just as an ap-petiser. Their black, gleaming bodies could be seen disturbing the surface of the sea with their slothful movements.

The harpoon-gunner was already at his post. He had the forward deck all to himself, and was a man of supreme importance, rating as high as the captain.

The killer came within range, and the man at the gun pulled the trigger. There was a flash and a report, and away went the harpoon with its line.

It was a hit. The sea-monster's tail came up and whipped the water into foam, but it was not long before life was extinct.

The dead whale was blown up immediately with compressed air to keep him afloat, and a flag was stuck into his carcass to show what boat he belonged to, and also to enable the crew of the "killer" to locate him again without difficulty. A second whale was harpooned some time later, and both this and the first one were towed back to the mother ship.

Here they were stripped of their blubber, which was to be tried out for oil. While the dead whales rolled heavily alongside the parent vessel, men stood poised on their carcasses and skillfully proceeded with the task of "flensing," cutting away the blubber in slices that were twelve to fourteen inches thick.

Austin and Draper watched those intrepid fellows at work. They had experienced a certain thrill in the actual hunting of the whales, but here was the nerviest business of all. For the sea was thick with hungry sharks, and one slip would have plunged a man into their midst, where iron jaws would have clamped upon his limbs and torn him to pieces.

The masses of blubber were raised to the rail and dragged aboard, then slashed into chunks and heaved into the boilers for the trying-out of the oil. The bones of the creatures were crushed for fertiliser.

"Altogether a profitable day's outing, I guess," said Austin. "Fishing and getting paid for it—and I'm down here for the fun of the thing. Oh, well, a whale would be a bit too much of a handful for the Dispatch, anyway."

The crew of the Dispatch made a point of loading up with a supply of marrow.

Little did he dream that the Dispatch was yet to encounter a denizen of the deep far more formidable than any whale that ever sprayed water from its nostrils.

The Terror at Margarita Island.

ABOUT noon of the second day the Dispatch dropped anchor off a strip of golden beach. It was the beach of Margarita Island, which contained only about twenty-five inhabitants—men, women and children.

They were a shy, primitive set of people, living almost exclusively on clams and fish that they caught in the bay, being afraid to venture farther.

When Austin and a member of the crew went ashore, they were struck by an air of tension, which they at first mistook for hostility. A talk with the head-man of the community enlightened them as to the real cause of the islanders' strange behaviour, however.

It seemed that they were very nearly on the point of starvation, and all on account of some queer, diabolical sea-monster that had visited those waters.

"It is the Devil Fish, the Manta," the head-man said to Austin in Spanish. "He has frightened away the other fish, and we are short of food. We are afraid to go out in our small boats, too, in case we should encounter this mighty creature."

Austin had some difficulty in concealing a smile. He knew the credulous nature of these island people, and was inclined to believe that the so-called Devil Fish was more a creature of their imagination than of reality.

But at that very moment he had evidence of its presence, as a number of boys, who had been bathing, suddenly made for the shore with a panic-stricken outcry and the name "Manta" on their lips.

Somewhere out to sea Austin descried a black ugly fin, rising from a welter of foam.

The incident caused him to treat the head-man's fears more seriously, and for the first time he addressed the fellow in a tone of earnestness.

"Is there no way of catching this Devil Fish?" he asked.

The head-man gazed across the sea to a dim strip of coastline that marked a lonely islet.

"Poncho is our only hope," he said. "Poncho lives on yonder islet, and we would seek his help if we dared to row that far. A mighty man is Poncho—

Out of the bay stood the top-mast of a sunken ship.

fearless and expert with the harpoon. And he knows these waters even as he knows the palm of his hand."

"Good," Austin rejoined. "Then we will go to Poncho for you and ask his help. I am seeking adventure, my friend, and would like to meet this Devil Fish of yours, and if Poncho is all that you say—why, we will induce him to come aboard our craft."

He returned with his companion to the Dispatch, which was immediately steered towards Poncho's domain. The islet being reached, Austin landed in a small boat.

The beach was a veritable cemetery of whales, bones lying there in profusion. Through this graveyard of the sea giants Austin picked his way, and at length came upon a big, stalwart Mexican sitting over a driftwood fire.

He was Poncho, bronzed, husky and sparing of speech, though by no means taciturn, as he frequently showed his white teeth in an engaging grin. His chief occupation was supplying Chinese settlers in the islands with their favourite delicacy, shark-fins, and he was bartering with a little Oriental when Austin came up.

Austin introduced himself, and explained the plight of the Margarita Islanders and his intention of hunting the Devil Fish. He added that he had never clapped eyes on a Devil Fish, but Poncho seemed to know what manner of creature it was, and at once appeared eager to pit his strength and wile against the brute.

A bargain was soon struck, and Poncho donned a light-grey stetson which had been made by a London hatter, and of which he was clearly very proud. Then, gathering the rest of his effects, which were not many, he followed Austin to the dinghy and was rowed out to the Dispatch.

Bait had been secured to catch fish for the natives of Margarita Island, who were in such dire distress for the want of food, and, before concerning themselves with any devil of the Deep, the crew of the Dispatch made a point of loading up with a supply of marrow.

These fish were plentiful outside the Bay, and, each weighing something like two hundred pounds, they were reckoned mighty good eating, the natives on Margarita being in the habit of drying them, so that a good stock of them would ensure their meals for months to come.

The after-deck was piled high with them when Poncho tied into something that called for everything he had. A lively tussle ensued before it was seen to be a leopard shark, spotted like the feline jungle creature from which it had obtained its name, and beautiful to behold—but one of the most savage of fish.

Poncho lost him, a fact which caused little regret, and at the very next cast he hooked a hammer-head of a species

The thrill of securing the fish was slight compared with the joy of the natives when their food supply was delivered to them.

kindred to the leopard shark, but even more deadly.

The hammer-head was perhaps the most bloodthirsty of man-eaters, and the next few seconds were packed with excitement. But that sensation of excitement was changed all in a moment to one of sheer horror. For, losing his foothold on the slippery deck, Poncho suddenly pitched clean overboard with a yell.

He struck the water with a splash, and plunged below, only a few yards from the spot where the evil hammer-head was fighting on the end of the line.

The shark ceased its struggles and glided swiftly towards Poncho, its slit mouth open to reveal its hideous array of teeth, its eyes gleaming balefully.

Austin and two of the crew had rushed to the side, and as Poncho's head and shoulders broke the surface three willing pairs of hands seized him. He was hauled clear, and not an instant too soon, for the shark's jaws snapped like a man-trap an inch beneath his heels.

The hammer-head and Poncho's fishing-line were lost. So, temporarily, was Poncho's precious hat, which could be seen tossing fifty yards away on the crests of the waves.

"Carambo!" spluttered Poncho, as he was dragged to safety, and then he broke into a volley of unprintable Spanish.

What he called that shark in his native language needed no translation.

"Give me a knife in my hands, señor," he said at length, turning to Austin, "and I make quick work of that shark! Carajo! I dive under him and rip his green belly, as I have done many times before. But without a knife, what can a man do? Ah, Dios, my hat—my beautiful hat!"

"Never mind your hat, Poncho," put in Draper. "You gave us the thrill of our lives, and I 'shot' the whole thing with the camera. Gee, what a picture it'll make! Man overboard in a shark-infested sea!"

"I want my hat!" wailed Poncho, and he was not to be appeased until one of the crew had entered the row-boat and rescued the Stetson.

Only then did Poncho smile again, and agree to the suggestion that the Dispatch should put back to Margarita Island and land the "catch" of marrow without further delay.

This was done, and the thrill of securing the fish was slight compared to the joy of the natives when their food supply was delivered to them.

Questing.

OUT of the Bay stood the topmast of a sunken ship, a vessel belonging to a half-forgotten age, and, according to a legend current among the superstitious natives, the resting-place of great treasure.

After leaving Margarita Island, the Dispatch cruised towards that forlorn relic of the past. Its ancient crow's-nest rose just above the surface of the water, and nothing stirred near by, the very fish seeming to avoid the vicinity. The prevailing silence and stillness—for the sea was like a mill-pond—had a strange effect of eeriness on Austin; and this sensation was one that affected Poncho a hundred times more.

For though the Mexican was less credulous than most of the fisher-folk in those parts, he was, not altogether immune to the terrors of the supernatural.

"Bad place," he said to Austin, eyeing the galleon's topmast askance as the Dispatch approached it. "Divers say giant eels drive them away when they seek for treasure."

"Giant eels?" Austin echoed. "I know—what we call morays."

"You call 'em what you like," Poncho returned. "But some believe these ones are the spirits of those who went down with ship, come to life again as fish. They make hull their breeding-place, and they guard galleon's treasure."

Austin laughed easily.

"Good!" he declared. "Then we'll try and hook into one of them."

Poncho recoiled from the idea. That ancient ship was the only thing he feared, and he did his utmost to dissuade Austin from going near it; but when he saw that the latter was determined, he fought down his own terrors and accompanied him.

Austin took up a precarious position in the crow's-nest of the sunken galleon, and Poncho joined him there tremulously, holding his breath as he saw the Anglo-Saxon cast his line.

"Señor," he panted, "you never come up if you slip into water! You know that, huh?"

Austin hooked something at that very instant, and Poncho's anxiety increased to agitation. But the fish on the end of the line proved to be a marrow, and, though he wasted a good deal of time in the neighbourhood of the old-time wreck Austin secured no eels, giant or otherwise.

They returned to the Dispatch, much to Poncho's relief, and some time later they encountered some sting-rays. They were a flat fish, carrying a stinger just above a kind of tail—a stinger which was known to have caused death, so that the catching of the species was not without hazard.

Poncho took to the row-boat with harpoon and gaff, and had a fight with a two-hundred-pounder. It was a battle-royal, for the sting-ray struggled furiously to avoid capture.

"Poncho seems to be calling that fish's ancestors a lot of names," observed Austin, watching the duel from the Dispatch, and noting the growing impatience on the Mexican's face.

"And from the expression of the fish I guess he's wishing Poncho the same," Draper commented.

The sting-ray flopped into the rowing-boat at last, and, this interlude finished, it was decided that the search for the dreaded Devil Fish of the Bay, should begin in earnest. So the moment Poncho came aboard again a potato-barrel was rigged on the bowsprit and bolted to a long plank—to enable the harpooner to brace himself and steady his aim when the time for action came.

Kay, the Jap, was sent into the cross-trees to keep a look out, and the entire crew seemed "all on their toes." Even Austin began to experience a queer feeling inside him, as if he sensed that some impending crisis were near at hand.

"You know, Draper," Austin said to the cameraman, "there's a sort of creepiness in the air. I don't know if it's the unholy quiet, or what it is—but it's got me. I wonder if there's anything in this Devil Fish story?"

"We certainly haven't seen it," Draper murmured. "but I was talking to Poncho just before you went into the crow's nest of that old galleon, and he said that certain signs told him it was around. I asked him if it was an octopus, but he shook his head. It's some big brute of a sea beast that's worse than all your leopard sharks and hammer-heads put together."

"Well, we'll see," Austin began, and before he could utter another word there was a commotion in the cross-trees.

Kay came scrambling down towards the deck, yelling and pointing. From his frantic speech and gestures the others gathered that he had seen a queer-looking fin and a pair of devilish green eyes sticking out of the water off the port bow.

Gazing in the direction indicated, the crew of the Dispatch discerned a tremendous splashing all at once, and Poncho immediately became wildly excited.

"Devil Fish!" he cried, and began digging out his home-made and extremely heavy iron harpoons.

"Poncho," jerked Austin, clutching him by the arm, "what is your so-called devil fish?"

Poncho answered him laconically. "Manta," he said, "sometimes name Monterey. We call him Devil Fish because in water he look like he have crown on head with two big horns, just like devil."

In another moment he had gained the potato barrel on the bowsprit, and was standing in readiness for the fray, harpoon in hand.

(Continued on page 28.)

Poncho took to the row-boat with harpoon and gaff, and had a fight with a two-hundred-pounder.

TAKE YOUR CHOICE - THEY'RE FREE!

- G.61. TENNIS RACQUET. 12-oz. or 14-oz. First quality gut. 550 COUPONS
- G.62. RACQUET COVER. Thoroughly waterproof ... 100 COUPONS
- G.63. TENNIS BALLS. Tournament size. ... Three for 130 COUPONS
- G.198. ELECTRIC TORCH. With 2-cell Battery ... 230 COUPONS
- G.227. BOX OF PAINTS. 14 Colours. Palette and Brush ... 90 COUPONS
- G.96. RAILWAY ENGINE. Powerful Clockwork, Reversible. 335 COUPONS

Goodness and marvellous flavour have always made Nestlé's Chocolate well worth buying. Now look at some of the wonderful gifts that make Nestlé's coupons so well worth saving! Every packet, carton and box of Nestlé's Chocolate carries one or more coupons, from the 2d. wrapped bars upwards. And the new Nestlé's Free Gift Book is the finest list ever issued of things you really want. Send for it to-day. And with it a voucher for five coupons.

NESTLÉ'S CHOCOLATE

To Nestlé's (Gift Dept.), Silverthorne Rd., Battersea, London, S.W.8

Please send me Voucher for 5 FREE COUPONS and NEW Nestlé Presentation List. 52/1.8.31.

NAME
(IN BLOCK CAPITALS)

Address

This offer applies only to Gt. Britain and N. Ireland.
1d. Stamp sufficient if envelope is unsealed.

FIVE FREE COUPONS

"THE SPY."

(Continued from page 14.)

"It was you who got me into it, too," she retorted.

"Quite possibly," Sergei agreed. "Then you thought you could escape me by becoming a worker. Well, I've got you again, and this time shall be the last. You will either marry me, or Ivan shall go before a firing party. I will give you an hour to make up your mind."

Kolya did not wait to hear any more. Not troubling to dress, but only slipping on his overcoat over his sleeping clothes, he crept to the window and climbed out on to the fire-escape.

Quickly he made his way to the ground and hurried along the street. He ran the whole distance to where Petya and his gang were in hiding, and burst in upon them breathlessly.

"Petya! Petya!" he gasped. "Sergei is threatening to send my father to the Kremlin! He has a letter which my father has brought from Paris, and he says that unless my mother marries him he will leave my father arrested!"

Petya leapt to his feet, with an oath. "Sergei!" he said hoarsely. "Is he a Tcheka spy?"

"Yes. It was he who had my mother arrested!"

Petya turned to the rest of the gang, who were lying about on old sacking in the basement which was their home.

"Come on!" he yelled. "A Tcheka spy is threatening Kolya! Death to the Tcheka!"

The gang rose, with a shout, and charged out into the street. Their bare feet pattered over the cobbled pavements as they hurried to the tenement where Kolya lived.

Kolya was not able to keep up with them. He ran as hard as he could, but when he reached the entrance to the tenement he found his way barred by Tcheka police.

He raced round to the back of the building and clambered up the fire-escape. As he jumped over the sill into his parents' lodgings, he heard a harsh voice say:

"Who shot Sergei?"

"I did," replied Anna. "It was I who shot him."

Sounds of movement followed from the landing. Kolya rushed out to find his mother being led away, while lying on the floor in a crumpled heap lay Sergei.

On Trial.

AT the headquarters of Koslov, President of the Tcheka, preparations were made for an immediate trial. It was early the following morning, and the President himself had already taken his place in the court.

He glanced through his papers, frowning as he did so. Then he looked up at his secretary, who was standing deferentially by his side.

"Ivan Pavlovna and his wife, eh?" he said. "The woman is charged with the murder of Peter Sergei, one of our secret agents for the Moskva District, on her own confession, I see."

The secretary cleared his throat.

"Peter Sergei was found dead in a room in the tenement in which he lived," he said. "He had taken from General Kostroma a letter which had been carried from Paris by Ivan Pavlovna—"

"The letter from Comrade Prince Vladimir, saying that the anti-Soviet plot was ended?" asked Koslov.

August 1st, 1931.

"Yes."

"That simply makes Ivan Pavlovna an emissary of the Soviet," the president declared. "We need not take action about the letter. Continue."

"At the time Sergei was found dead, Anna Pavlovna was discovered standing over him, a discharged automatic pistol in her hand. She said she had killed him, so we took her into custody."

"I see," Koslov read through his papers once more, paying particular attention to a doctor's report. He uttered a sudden exclamation. "Send in Ivan and Anna Pavlovna," he ordered.

Anna and Ivan came into the room. Koslov watching them closely, although summing them up. He motioned with his hands that they should stand on either side of his desk, then leaned back in his chair, with his finger-tips pressed close together.

"Anna Pavlovna," he said, "by your own confession you are charged with the murder of one Peter Sergei by shooting at him with a pistol." He picked up a weapon which had been lying on his desk. "Is this the pistol you used?"

Anna looked at it and nodded.

"Yes," she said.

Koslov turned his head so that he could look at Ivan, and his eyes narrowed to pin-points.

"It was originally yours, I believe?" he said.

"It was," replied Ivan quickly. "It was I who shot Sergei. He tried to force my wife into divorcing me and marrying him by holding a certain document over her head, and so I killed him."

"And the document was?" queried Koslov.

"You may as well know," said Ivan at last. "It was from his Imperial Highness the Prince Vladimir, and it was addressed to General Kostroma. Its contents—"

Koslov waved him to silence, and picked up the papers that were before him.

"So you killed Sergei because he tried to force you into marriage?" he said to Anna. "By shooting him?"

"Yes," she replied, in a low voice.

Koslov drummed on the desk with his fingers for several minutes.

"Ivan Pavlovna, you are something of a fool," he said slowly. "When the revolution came you allied yourself against the forces of the Soviet, and that act resulted in your being separated from your wife. She has been exposed to all kinds of dangers in consequence. Don't you think it would be wiser to forget these imperialistic principles of yours, and place yourself in a position where you can look after her?"

"I do not understand," said Ivan.

"Then I will explain myself further," said Koslov. "The Soviet requires men like you, for you are better suited to our needs than men such as Peter Sergei. Although he was our spy, he was not to be trusted. He was a traitor! He preferred keeping a secret document for his own purposes rather than hand it over to this department."

"But the Soviet—" protested Ivan.

"The Soviet is no worse than the imperialist regime," said Koslov evenly. "If you think back, you will know that this is true. No country that is well governed could ever be overthrown like we overthrew Russia. The imperial rule was thoroughly bad."

"You, Ivan Pavlovna, have the interests of Russia at heart. I know it. So have I. Therefore I am going to suggest to you that, instead of interfering in political affairs, you help us to build up our industries. We need men with brains. Well, what do you say?"

Ivan was silent. The instincts of loyalty to the late Czar still held him.

Koslov noted the hesitation, and turned away from him.

"Anna Pavlovna," he said quietly, "you stand accused of the murder of a Tcheka agent. You say you shot him." He half rose to his feet and thumped the desk with his fist. "Why do you lie to me?" he shouted.

"She didn't kill him," Ivan broke in, rushing across the room to Anna's side. "I tell you she didn't! It was I who shot him!"

Koslov's fist crashed on to the desk once more.

"You are lying, too!" he said. "Both of you are lying. Do you think I am president of the Tcheka for nothing? I know everything, I tell you—everything!"

He stood looking at their astounded faces for a few seconds, then went on:

"Bah, I'm tired of you both!" he said.

"I offer you both every chance of happiness together, and you stand there and tell me lies! You are typical Russians. You cannot run your own private lives properly, which is why you have to have men like me in power. We have to run them for you." He sat down heavily. "The court will stand while I pronounce judgment."

There was a movement through the room as everyone present stood up. The president waited until all was quiet.

"Anna Pavlovna, you have been brought before me for sentence for a crime you did not commit," he began.

"You, Ivan Pavlovna, have also confessed to the same crime. Both of you think to shield the other. But Peter Sergei was not shot. He was stabbed in the back by a knife, and the pistol that Anna Pavlovna was holding was one which Sergei fired himself in his own self-defence when attacked in his room. The murderer was a young street urchin named Petya."

"Petya!" exclaimed Anna, with sudden relief.

"Sergei wounded Petya at the time of the crime, and Petya died, confessing beforehand," Koslov continued. "Thus has justice been done." He turned to Ivan sternly. "You, Ivan Pavlovna, are found guilty of conspiring against the Soviet, however, and on that charge I have decided to commit you."

Anna started forward.

"No, no!" she cried, remembering the scene outside when voices all day long had been saying: "I had him shot. Sentence confirmed." "No—not that!"

"I sentence you to Siberia for life," said Koslov. "Not to the salt mines as a political prisoner, however, but as manager of the gold mines at Sverdlovsk. There you will work out your own destinies as servants of your country, neither caring whether it is under imperialistic or Soviet rule. You will take your wife and child with you, and you will receive the classification of Worker, Grade A."

He motioned to his secretary.

"Lead them out," he ordered. "See that they are put on the train for Siberia to-morrow morning, and see also that the boy goes with them. The court is closed."

Ivan and Anna went to the door, knowing that it was no good trying to express the deep gratitude that was in their hearts. As they reached it, the voice of Koslov stopped them for the last time.

"Remember," he called warningly, "no more secret letters! The spies of the Tcheka are everywhere!"

Ivan nodded and went out, with Anna clinging to his arm. The door closed softly behind them.

(By permission of the Fox Film Co., Ltd., starring Kay Johnson, Freddie Frederick, and Neil Hamilton.)

"FIREBRAND JORDAN."

(Continued from page 20.)

rocks, where Firebrand remounted. There was nothing to be seen of Spike, and there was no time to look for him. Firebrand rode on till he came to a shallow place where the river might be forded and the road regained.

Tony, meanwhile, had encountered Hank, who lay in wait for him, his own mount having gone lame. Hank rose up from behind a rock, commanding Tony to dismount, and enforcing his command with the aid of a six-shooter.

Tony, having no alternative, descended, and Hank endeavoured to ride away on the mule. But Blossom had her own views concerning who should ride her, and speedily deposited Hank in a bush; whereupon Tony swooped down on him, struck him violently on the head with the butt of his gun, and regained his steed.

The Downfall of a Crook.

HAMPTON, in the car with the two girls, had by this time reached the region known as Painted Rock. The road had become a mere track; the track became a sandy ravine, opening out into a big hollow littered with rails and sheds and trucks. The mine was reached!

Straight up to a cabin Hampton drove, waying away a dozen men who came streaming out from the buildings. He turned to Joan.

"Well, here we are," he said. "You'll find your dad in there, and I'll be with you in a minute."

The two girls jumped down from the car and ran eagerly into the cabin. Hampton beckoned to one of the men.

"Listen," he said, "there's a guy coming up the trail I want you to get. He's a ranger!"

"All right, boss," replied the man. And then: "Here comes Red!"

Red was riding furiously towards them out from the pass.

"The sheriff and his posse are coming!" he shouted.

Hampton, in a panic, called the rest of the men together.

"The sheriff mustn't get here till we've destroyed the evidence," he said.

"You boys got your guns? Well, throw plenty of lead into them—we can always say it was a mistake. You, Red, go with Mart and Steve and Jake and drop the printing-plant down the shaft."

Red and the three men thus named ran to a row of wooden sheds near the entrance to the mine; the rest made for a corral, where they saddled and mounted their horses. Hampton went with them, urging them to hurry, and it was not till they had ridden away that he went back to the cabin.

The door was bolted from within.

"Open the door!" he cried furiously. But the command was not obeyed, and finally, in a temper, he forced it open.

A chair descended upon his head as he entered, and he staggered backwards. Joan was standing there with another chair upraised, while Peggy was clinging to an elderly, white-haired man who was shrinking back against the wall.

"Put that down!" shouted Hampton.

"Don't be foolish, Joan!"

"But you're holding my father prisoner!" stormed Joan. "He's told us so!"

"I've come here to help your father," snapped Hampton, drawing his gun. "Put that chair down and be sensible!" Reluctantly Joan set the chair on its legs, and Hampton opened the door of an inner room.

"Get in there, both of you girls!" he ordered. "I want to talk to your dad."

Peggy went obediently enough, but Joan refused point-blank to budge. The outer door swung wide and Red stepped into the room.

"Hallo, chief," he said, "I——"

"All right," interrupted Hampton. "Look after Miss Joan, here."

He took a sheet of paper and a fountain-pen from his pocket and held them out to Judd Howe, while Joan regarded Red with contemptuous astonishment.

"Sign this!" barked Hampton.

Judd Howe took the sheet of paper and read what was written on it.

"But I can't sign this," he said defiantly. "You've used my mine for your own purposes—you've kept me a prisoner here, and starved me because I won't sell it to you—and now want me to sign a confession that I've been making

The Paper that Made Wireless Popular

If you want your radio set to give you the best results you must understand how it works. If it suddenly fails to bring in those foreign stations you should know why and not have to wait for expensive technical advice. POPULAR WIRELESS is a practical weekly paper that deals with all phases of wireless. It is brightly and clearly written by expert contributors. It is a paper for the beginner and the expert, and will help YOU to get the best out of your set.

POPULAR WIRELESS
Weekly

On Sale Every Thursday.

counterfeit notes! Alter the name and sign the thing yourself!" And he flung the paper at his captor.

"You'll sign that or die!" threatened Hampton. But the barrel of a Colt struck him violently in the back.

"He won't!" shouted Red fiercely. "Give me that gun of yours, or I'll burn a hole in your ribs!"

Hampton swung round in amazement, dropping his gun.

"You—you——" he gasped.

"Yes," said Red quietly. "Pick up that gun, Miss Joan, will you?"

Joan needed no second telling. She stooped and picked up the weapon.

"You fool!" howled Hampton. "This is our only chance! Why are you doing this?"

"These people have always treated me white, Hampton," replied Red. "I may be a fool, but I think a heap of Miss Joan and her sister, and you're not going to pull stuff like this."

He turned to Joan.

"Step outside, will you?" he said. "And take your dad and Miss Peggy with you. I want to talk private to this coyote!"

From beyond the ravine came the sound of firearms; Hampton's men and the sheriff and his posse were engaged in battle. Joan called to Peggy, and they went out with their father into the sunlight.

Joan cried out with joy. Firebrand had just ridden up to the cabin and was in the act of dismounting.

"You're all right, then, honey?" he greeted her.

"Hampton's a crook!" cried Joan. "He——"

"I know all about it," broke in Firebrand. "I was only afraid I wouldn't get here in time. Where is he now?"

"In there. Red's with him—he saved us."

"You stay here with your dad and your sister. I'll get him!"

He plunged into the cabin; but the cabin was empty.

Through an open window at the back Firebrand caught sight of Red, riding away towards a steep hill behind the mine, over which a fugitive might hope to escape.

The rattle of gunfire had died away, and now the sheriff and some of his followers were riding through the ravine, while others out beyond it were rounding up those who had defied the law and survived.

Firebrand climbed out through the window and looked about him. A movement by the row of sheds attracted his attention, and, gun in hand, he made for them.

Tony came riding into the hollow on his mule, while the sheriff was talking to Judd Howe and the girls. He dropped from the saddle and went up to the group.

"Have you seen my boss, Firebrand Jordan?" he inquired anxiously. "Please tell me, have you seen him?"

"He went in the—— Oh, there he is!"

It was Joan who had spoken, and the tone of her voice had changed utterly as she saw Firebrand coming towards them, driving Hampton before him—a very crestfallen Hampton, considerably the worse for wear.

"Well, sheriff," said Firebrand cheerfully, "this is the man you've been looking for. Put the cuffs on him!"

"With the greatest pleasure," responded the sheriff, and whipped out a pair of handcuffs. "Say, Hampton," he remarked grimly, as he seized the wrongdoer's wrists and manacled them, "you've given me an awful lot of trouble to-day!"

"Guess your troubles are mostly over," said Firebrand to Joan, slipping his arm round her waist and leading her away. "I want to tell you something that's on my mind."

Tony, looking anxiously for his "boss," wandered in and out of the row of the sheds, lying on a stack of paper which had been intended for conversion into counterfeit notes.

He went out with it—and there was Firebrand, standing under a tree with his arm round Joan and his lips on hers.

Delightedly Tony sat down on an empty crate to play them a serenade. But unfortunately for him he had chosen a spot directly beneath a galvanised iron pipe attached to a stove inside the shed, and as he raised the guitar to tune its strings the neck came into contact with the pipe—and a shower of soot descended upon his head!

(By permission of Filmophone Renters, Ltd., featuring Lane Chandler, Alice Goodwin and Yakima Canutt.)

August 1st, 1931.

"MONSTERS OF THE DEEP."

(Continued from page 24.)

The Dispatch was cautiously steered towards the scene of the commotion in the water, and as it drew nearer the men aboard her saw what resembled more than anything else a partly-submerged monoplane.

To have drawn too close to the monster would have been fatal, and presently Poncho gave the signal to shut off all power. He was now within striking distance, and all at once those on the deck saw him lift his arm and sway back a little.

Conflict.

THE harpoon flashed from Poncho's hand, and Austin and his companions saw it hurtle through the air, with the line trailing behind it. The Mexican's aim was unerring. With tremendous force the missile drove deep into the monstrous demon of the sea, which had terrorised the shores of Margarita Island.

The creature gave an enormous leap, and just for a moment those on the Dispatch saw the queer, crown-like head, the cavernous and toothless mouth, and the two sinister horns. Then it was off like a racehorse, running out a mile of line in no time.

The Dispatch followed it at full speed, and had almost come up with the devil fish when the brute began to dive. He was eight feet below the surface when Poncho loosed another harpoon.

Next instant the sea was lashed to foam and the Dispatch almost swamped by that maddened denizen of the deep. Then away it went once more, and the heavy inch-rope attached to the harpoon paid out like lightning.

To have made fast the harpoon lines would have been futile, for they would have snapped like threads under the strain. An empty gasoline drum was fixed to one of them, therefore, and thrown overboard, to float on the sea and act as a check.

The monster paused in its flight not long afterwards, and Austin and Poncho scrambled into the rowing-boat to pick up the line and take in slack. It was a hazardous business, for there was every likelihood that the devil fish might turn at any moment and charge the ship.

Holding on to the line, Poncho and Austin were pulled through the sea at terrific pace as the manta took it into its head to set off once more. The rowing-boat, leaping and bounding over the waves, was dragged along like a toy craft hitched to a speed launch.

The Dispatch kept fairly close alongside, and it was as well that she did, for almost without warning Poncho's fear that the manta might charge was realised.

Wheeling, the brute ploughed through the water at an incredible speed, and Poncho and Austin rowed desperately for the motor-launch. They were scarcely aboard when the manta was at the bows.

With a mighty heave it threw one of its gigantic, sail-like fins over the rail of the Dispatch, and for one breathtaking moment it seemed as if the craft would be drawn under the surface. The monster's greenish, bloodshot eyes glared evil, and its mouth, greater in girth than two full-grown men, opened cavernously. Then the brute slipped from the rail and veered away.

Yet it was only after eleven hours' fighting that the giant fish was finally conquered and towed back to Margarita Island, where special tackle had to be rigged to gauge its dimensions.

It weighed four thousand and two hundred pounds, this terror of men as well as fish.

Thus, with a mission accomplished, the crew of the Dispatch sailed away, leaving the inhabitants of Margarita Island in high spirits.

As Riley, the Irish cook, observed poetically:

"The kids can swim around the shore,
An' the settlement has fish galore.

For the monster av the deep is no more."

(By permission of the W. & F. Film Service, Ltd.)

"UNDER TEXAS SKIES."

(Continued from page 9.)

quietly. "This guy belongs to the rustlers, and this place is their hang-out. He would have slipped Miss Joan's horses over the border long before you could have discovered that his draft was a fake. That's why I sorter got moving myself! The pintos brought along Singer Martin, and, well, I guess that ends it!"

"Who the thump are you?" demanded Sheriff Moody in amazement.

"Him? His monicker is Bainbridge, and he, like Jack Hartford and yours truly, belongs to the Secret Service," put in Singer Martin cheerfully. "Say, sheriff, there's a bunch of tough guys in one of the outhouses—sort of reachin' for the skies. Guess your boys had better collect them. Sorter rustlers, I'm thinkin'!"

Back at the Circle A a decidedly less grim Rankin faced Joan Prescott. There was no steel in his eyes then; only a softness that she could understand.

"Guess I made a mistake," she murmured.

"Guess I can't have you making any more like it," he said, with mock severity. "I'm sorter willing to stay around these parts and keep an eye on your horses—if you just say the word—"

The strong man's voice went off in a feeble effort that might have been excused had he been attempting to nter them under the embraces of the late unlamented Dummy.

And if she answered him in words it could only have been by a miracle, for their lips had met as she suddenly raised her head.

Circle A was assured, then, of peaceful days under the glorious Texas skies. (By permission of the British Lion Corporation, Ltd., starring Bob Custer and Natalie Kingston.)

SPURPROOF TENTS.

Guaranteed Reg.

Made from light-weight proofed material. Complied with three-piece jointed poles, pegs, guy lines, and white valise. Weight 5 lbs. Size 6 ft. x 4 ft. 6 ins. x 3 ft. 6 ins. 12/3 With 6 in. wall and 3 in. cave. Accommodates three boys. Postage 9d. Special extra light-weight. Made from Egyptian Cotton. Same size. Weight 3 1/2 lbs. 17/6.

Send for beautiful illustrated Camping List, post free.

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, NEW BRIDGE STREET, E.C.4.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/- Details, striking testimonials Free—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

DON'T BE BULLIED

Send Two Penny Stamps for some SPLENDID LESSONS in JUJITSU and Handsome Photo Plate of Jap Champions. The Wonderful Japanese Self-Defence without weapons. Take care of yourself under ALL circumstances; fear no man. You can have MONSTER Illustrated Portion for P.O. 3/9. SEND NOW to "YAWARA" (Dept. A.P.), 10, Queensway, Hanworth, Feltham, Middlesex. Practical Tuition only at 48, Carnaby St., Regent St., W.1.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d.

(Abroad 1/-), including Airpost. Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Enginó Lane, L.Y.E, Stourbridge.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

MY GREAT OFFER

Write for my free Bargain Lists of the best ALL BRITISH cycles. 14 DAYS' APPROVAL. CARRIAGE PAID. Cash price £3 15s. 0d., or terms. All accessories FREE. Value 21/-.

2 WEEKLY

Edw. O'Brien THE WORLD'S LARGEST CYCLE DEALER DEP 17 COVENTRY.

XMAS CLUBS

SPARE TIME AGENTS WANTED for Oldest, Largest, and BEST Club. Excellent Commission—no outlay. Art Catalogue Free with full particulars.

SAMUEL DRIVER LTD., Burton Road, LEEDS.

BE STRONG

I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Submit your friendly Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-. STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Boy's Cinema

"LES AMOURS DE MINUIT" and
"THE KID FROM ARIZONA."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^d

No. 608.

EVERY TUESDAY.

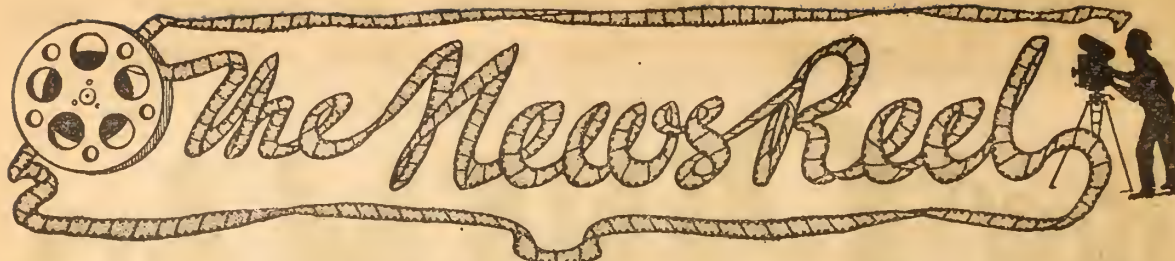

AUGUST 8th, 1931.

A gripping story of a gambler who went straight.

Starring
MAHLON HAMILTON.

THE CODE OF HONOUR

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"The Code of Honour."

Jack Cardigan, Mablon Hamilton; Doris Bradfield, Doris Hill; Nosey, Jimmy Aubrey; Tom Bradfield, Stanley Taylor; Harden, Robert Grayes; Slack, Harry Holden; Mr. Bradfield, Lafe McKee; Sheriff Smyth, William Dyer.

"The Kid From Arizona."

Jack Allen, Jack Perrin; Doris Sheldon, Josephine Hill; Bruce Reed, Robert Walker; Judge Sheldon, Henry Roquemore; Red Saunders, George Chesebro; Slats, Benny Corbett; Starlight, Himself.

Making Bobby Coogan Angry.

When the fight scene in "Skippy" was being filmed, it proved an exceedingly difficult matter to get Bobby Coogan to "go for" Jackie Searle as he should have done. The two were good friends, and Bobby was reluctant to hurt his chum. The scene was taken more than once, but always the fight lacked realism.

"You've got to hit him, Bobby," ordered his father.

"I can't. I like him," answered Bobby simply.

Then Coogan, senior had an idea. He recalled that, at one time, when Jackie Coogan used to call his kid brother "chicken," it greatly angered Robert. So Father Coogan went to Jackie Searle and whispered in his ear. Then when the cameras started grinding again for another "retake," Jackie Searle put up his fists and called out: "Come on an' fight now, you little chicken!"

Bobby's face flushed angrily.

"You call me that again and I'll bust you!" he retorted.

"Yah! Chicken, chicken, chicken!" repeated Jackie teasingly.

That was enough for Bobby. He sailed in and fought his chum in real earnest. There was no need to take the scene again after this. The only thing the Paramount cutters regretted was in having to slice out the part where Jackie Searle goaded Bobby by yelling "chicken."

Hollywood's Most Famous "Extra."

The most famous dress-suit extra and bit player in Hollywood is Adolph Faylauer.

He has eaten more movie banquets, drunk more coloured water from champagne glasses, and worn out more dress-suits for picture purposes than any other man in Hollywood.

Faylauer is Hollywood's most distinguished extra. When casting directors start to work to fill the places at a big banquet, a movie wedding, an exclusive dinner, or a fashionable scene, they immediately call for Faylauer.

He is so popular that casting directors have to speak for his services long in advance—something that can't be said of most extras and bit players.

His most recent engagement was in the big scenes of Marilyn Miller's August 8th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

BERNARD NEDELL

in

"SHADOWS."

He fled from America because rival gangsters put him "on the spot," and in England continued his life of crime, but eventually the jealousy of his lieutenant and the pluck of a boy brought about his undoing. A stirring drama of London's underworld.

"BEYOND THE LAW."

Cowboys, horse rustlers, action, cavalry, fighting, a beautiful heroine, a shy hero—and what a story! Starring Robert Frazer and Louise Lorraine.

"JAILBIRDS."

A screaming farce of two buddies who find themselves in a prison. Are the warders pleased to have their company? Read this yarn and you will see. Oliver Hardy and Stan Laurel at their best.

starring production, "Sunny," First National's forthcoming release. He was one of the guests at the shipboard wedding. He was also one of those at the fashionable summer resort.

Faylauer has scarcely any time in between pictures, and he commands top prices for this sort of work.

In his ten years of pictures he has appeared in more than 700 films, and he has a complete record of the cast and director, and what he did in each.

His selection is no mere accident. He is German by birth, and University educated. He speaks four languages perfectly. He has travelled extensively, and is the author of a large number of short stories which he writes under a pen name.

Because of his education and travel he fits perfectly into any fashionable scene.

Faylauer estimates that he has eaten more than 400 movie banquets. Now a movie banquet, be it known, is not one of those affairs you attend for one evening. Not at all. They usually last three or four days. Scenes have to be taken a number of times, and from different angles. Then there are many scenes necessary at each banquet table. And in each case the banquetfeers must eat.

"One eats something on the average of every half-hour," he says. "It is rather strenuous on the digestion, especially as the food, originally hot, soon gets cold."

Faylauer wears out on the average four suits of evening clothes a year—all before the camera. He wears them so much for screen purposes that he doesn't want to see one otherwise, and never goes out in real life in evening clothes. He estimates that he has discarded fifty top hats in the past ten years—where the average man rarely owns one, and never wears one out.

He is always in demand for weddings, and has witnessed the screen marriage of nearly every movie hero and heroine in Hollywood. The shipboard wedding scene of "Sunny" was the most unusual fashionable wedding, he says, and Miss Miller's gown the most gorgeous he has ever seen. He is now greatly in demand for foreign version pictures. He likes picture work, he says, because it gives him ample time to write. He does not write about Hollywood, and keeps his pen name a secret.

Leslie Fuller Proves that There's Nothing Like Fighting for Film Fame.

Here is a little incident which occurred during the production of the breezy British comedy, "What A Night," that demonstrates that life among the film people isn't all roses. By no means.

The story of "What A Night" concerns an enterprising, if rather tactless, commercial traveller who puts up for the night at a supposedly haunted inn. Various terrors, trials and tribulations assail him, which lead up to a climax in which aforesaid traveller catches a crook.

Leslie Fuller, of vaudeville fame, and Syd Courteney take the leading rôles in the picture. Fuller is a traveller, and Courteney is the crook.

In the final stages of the picture a terrific battle is waged in the tap-room of the inn, and this is where we come to the point. Fuller and Courteney were supposed to indulge in throwing bottles, tankards, and in one case an axe at each other.

For a time all went smoothly; but on one occasion Fuller, who used to be a boxing champion, became a trifle too realistic, and the fight developed into a real "rough house." Fuller sustained a nasty cut on the head and a bruise on the temple—gore flowing easily—whilst Courteney received a dislocated finger and a bump the size of an egg!

But Monty Banks, the director of the picture, did not interfere. He simply went on calmly shooting the film, and afterwards cheerfully informed the stars that he'd taken the fight sequence perfectly!

(Continued on page 28.)

A gambler, falsely accused of murder, eludes pursuit and gets a job on a ranch, where he turns the tables on a despicable rogue. Action—adventure—romance—in a grand Western thriller. Starring Mahlon Hamilton and Doris Hill.

THE CODE OF HONOUR

Hunted!

IN the wild country of the West, where men settle their disputes by the speed and dexterity with which they use a six-gun, a cowpuncher being chased by half a score of other men was not exactly novel.

The thudding of horses, the wild cries of angry men, and the occasional burst of gunfire were more or less everyday occurrences. It was only now and again that such matters attracted attention.

But when one man was chased by the sheriff and his posse, who flogged their horses to get the last ounce from them, anybody who happened to be a witness of the chase sat up and took a lot of notice.

Yet nobody but Jack Cardigan's own particular pal saw the desperate ride he put in to escape coming to grips with Sheriff Smyth and his deputies.

Cardigan was a hunted man, and this was not the first ride he had to put in to maintain the freedom which was now so very dear to him.

He had been riding rather aimlessly along the trail south when he first spotted Sheriff Smyth and the posse. Thereafter the aimless ride became a desperate dash for life.

Bang went Cardigan's spurs into his mount's side, and once he brought his leather heavily across the horse's neck. Then, with knee and voice, he urged the horse to do its best.

The trail became one cloud of thick dust as a dozen pairs of hoofs cut the baked ground of the trail, and with Smyth and the posse only a few hundred yards behind the fleeing Cardigan, the cloud raised by the fugitive's horse was as fine a guide as could have been thought of.

None realised this better than Cardigan himself, and it was in sheer desperation that he turned off the flat trail and galloped hard over the plain.

But the trail of dust was no less. Clouds of it rose under every pounding hoof, and the sheriff had nothing to do but ride like a man possessed and follow the dusty, tell-tale trail. His men, opening out a little in order to see the better, had nothing to worry about in whatever amount of dust they made.

Once Smyth let out a couple of bullets into the forward cloud, but he hit nothing.

Cardigan heard the bullets whizzing through the air at the moment as he felt his horse stumble for a fraction of a second, pick up, and gallop on. But the speed was diminishing—the posse was coming up hand over fist.

"Here—get—up!" he blurted out. "Come on, boy! Show 'em how you can travel! Come on!"

Bang! Another bullet whistled its way through space, to be followed a second later by another. The report this time was very much louder to Cardigan, and his heart beat fast as he realised that the chase was nearly up.

He crashed through some dried-up bushes in a frantic effort to get away from the sun-baked ground which yielded so much dust, but the posse was too near. They could see him whether or not the dust arose.

Cardigan looked round with frantic eyes. Up the plain was a cliff edge, over which he could not ride without certain fatal results to his horse, if not to himself. On his right was the much-travelled, dusty road. On his left was a small wood, and it was for this that he cut.

It was a desperately near thing, for every moment now his own horse was getting slower and slower in its stride.

That stumble had done some damage which Cardigan dared not stop to examine.

There was only one thing for it. He had to chance his luck in the wood.

But the moment he shot into the bushy fringe his horse changed its legs and nearly fell for the second time.

It was lame! Instinct more than anything else made Jack Cardigan look up desperately. Behind him thudded the posse, the crashing hoofs ever coming nearer and nearer.

Above him was a tree, with a bough that was astonishingly friendly in appearance. And Cardigan jerked himself on to the bough as his horse passed beneath it, swung himself up, and got amidst the foliage.

For one frightful second he thought his horse was going to stop directly under the bough, and announce to the whole of the posse that its late rider was somewhere but a few yards away. But, fortunately for Cardigan, his horse, relieved of the weight of its rider, and doubtless urged by the sound of the approaching horsemen, galloped on faster than ever.

It had only charged into the thickest part of the wood a few seconds before the posse came pounding upon the scene.

"Who—whoa—er!" Sheriff Smyth brought his horse upon its haunches with one pull of his reins, and the remainder of the posse followed his example.

"That was sure Jack Cardigan," said the sheriff between his teeth. "There ain't a 'puncher in the district who could lead us a tarnation caper like this. Where's he gone? That's the question!"

As if to help his brain, Smyth withdrew from his pocket one of the long cheroots for which he was quite famous. He did not light it. He simply poked it against his set teeth, tapped his lips with it and replaced it in his pocket.

"You boys scout around and try and head him off!" he ordered. "Guess I'll ride straight through and trail that hoss of his, an' git it wise that he's Jack Cardigan!"

The posse rode off without another word, and Sheriff Smyth dug in his own spurs and cut into the thick bush, leaving Jack Cardigan, listening intently, upon the bough of the tree.

He gave them a full minute to get away before he dropped to the ground and gave a short, soft whistle. A moment later he had dodged behind a tree as there sounded the rattle of hoofs and the breaking of twigs just ahead.

It was another ten seconds before he knew that his whistle had attracted his own horse and not the posse, but it was only three seconds more before he had leapt into the saddle and dashed off in the opposite direction to that taken by Sheriff Smyth and his boys.

His hope of escape was short-lived. The moment he struck open plain he knew that, for a bullet whistled past his head a full second before he heard the report of the gun that fired it.

Again his spurs went home, and again the gallant horse answered his urgent call. But the lameness was there—Cardigan could feel it in the uneven manner in which the animal's hoofs struck the ground.

The shot brought the posse round from the other side of the wood and the sheriff from the middle. Cardigan hissed savagely through his teeth.

"It's the cliff, boy!" he muttered desperately. "We're not going to be caught yet!"

He was riding for the cliff edge as he spoke, and it was not until he was within ten yards of it that he held hard on the reins and dragged his game mount to a walk.

Bang! Bang!

Two more reports settled any hesitation he had momentarily felt as he looked down the steep sides of the cliff base. He had to take chances now, for there was definitely no escape if he turned again. The posse had spread right out and covered every possible way to freedom save that which lie directly in front.

His spurs went home, his horse flung up his head and dilated its eyes as it felt its front feet pushing space. A second later the animal was sliding unsteadily down the cliff, sending clouds of chalky dust into the air, crashing through bushes until its rigid legs simply could not keep him upright.

Down upon its side went the horse, and Cardigan was flung from the saddle to continue the slide on his own account.

Up on the cliff top the posse pulled up, to gaze with fascinated eyes and gaping mouths at what they thought must be the end of the hunted man and his gallant horse.

Nobody spoke. Even the sheriff did nothing but take out a cheroot, tap his teeth with it, and watch with unblinking eyes.

Far down the cliff the rolling horse and man put more and more space between them. Yards had still to be covered before the valley plain was reached, and there, in the opinions of the posse, the hunted man would lie until he was picked up—a mangled, broken corpse.

The clouds of dust drifted lazily away against the side of the cliff, and disappeared in the atmosphere. Far below, a black, shapeless mass, which was the horse, rolled on to the plain and lay still, to be joined a second later by another shapeless mass, which was Jack Cardigan.

"Boys, guess we'd better go and pick him up!" said Sheriff Smyth, and shook his head. "That there Cardigan sure deserved a better fate! It was a tough ride he chose!"

The posse nodded, and turned their horses slowly back to the trail which would take them down into the valley.

A Shock for the Sheriff.

"WELL tarnation burn me!" That was Sheriff Smyth's exclamation as he led the posse round the bend into the trail and gazed into the valley.

For there was no sign of Cardigan or his horse!

"They's hooked it!" he added, and bit viciously at a cheroot he dragged from his pocket. "Tarnation burn me! They's hooked it!"

"That suro was a tough ride!" agreed one of the posse. "Seems somehow as his pal brought a bit of help. He cut off down the trail, sheriff, when we rode for Cardigan."

"Sure, we ain't got nothin' on him," said Smyth, with another vicious bite. "But, say! Clip along the trail, two of you. You others ride open and search the valley. I'm jus' kinder set on taking in that Jack Cardigan. Meet you by the narrow bush trail!"

He himself rode slowly forward, thinking hard. Jack Cardigan had a reputation for pluck, and a tinge of admiration was in the sheriff's breast for the desperate ride Cardigan had chosen, but which had served him so well.

He was down amongst the valley bushes in a few seconds, and here he dismounted from his white horse and chewed thoughtfully at another cheroot. He was angry that Cardigan had somehow or other given them the slip in the woods before risking that diving ride down the cliff face—the fugitive must have been within inches of them at one time!

His horse pricked up its ears suddenly and stared through the bushes, its whole bearing that of rapt attention. Sheriff Smyth looked at it, followed its gaze lazily, expecting to see one of his own men riding in to report.

But it was not one of his own men who came.

It was Jack Cardigan, walking his horse! And the horse was helplessly lame in its right fore foot!

In a flash Smyth had drawn his gun and had pressed close to the bushes by which Cardigan must come.

"It was sure rough that you should pick up a stone after giving them a show-down like you did," Cardigan was saying. "That was a tough ride, partner, but I just had to do it. We'll get that stone out soon as we see the posse shift home—"

"Stick 'em up—and keep 'em up!" snapped Smyth, as he suddenly poked his gun out of the bushes and followed it himself. "Right up, Jack Cardigan!"

Cardigan thrust up his hands—it was no use arguing with a sheriff's gun.

"You're Jack Cardigan O.K.?" asked Smyth bluntly.

Cardigan nodded.

"Card sharper and gambler—wanted for murder of a greenhorn!" said the sheriff, in his most official manner. "I got that on you, Cardigan."

"Listen, sheriff—I ain't no murderer!" said Cardigan hotly. "Why, I never carry a gun! I admit I got a bit off that greenhorn, 'but I didn't shoot him. I tell you, I don't carry a gun!"

Smyth looked down at the plain leather belt around Cardigan's waist, hesitated, and then shook his head.

"They've got it good and proper on you, Cardigan, and you've gotta come with me," he said. "You sure ain't got a gun showing now, but it ain't like Sheriff Smyth to take risks. I'm gonna put the steel on you—lower your hands!"

His gun was still held forward as he reached for his handcuffs, which were hanging upon his own belt. And the gun was within an inch of Jack Cardigan's chest—for a second.

The next second it was knocked down, and a grip like a vice fastened itself upon the sheriff's gun hand.

"I don't want to break your wrist, sheriff, 'cos I ain't got nothing against you," said Cardigan grimly. "But something is going to happen if you don't drop that gun!"

"I'll sure blow you—" hooted Smyth, and gasped as that vice tightened.

His fist came round with the whole force of his body behind it, but in a flash Cardigan had changed his position until he could wrench the gun from the sheriff's hand, dodging the blow neatly as he moved.

A moment later the gun was on the ground, and sheriff and fugitive were at grips. But Cardigan was a big man— inches taller than the sheriff. The struggle was but of short duration.

With a sudden hefty push Cardigan sent the sheriff back against the bushes, and in a flash had picked up the gun. The tables were turned then.

"Sorry I'll have to hold you up, sheriff," said Cardigan calmly, "but, as you say, they're reckoning they've got something on me up north a bit. I ain't riskin' my neck by sort of arguing with them. And sorry, too, that I'll have to borrow your horse."

"You'll be a tarnation sight sorrier when my boys come round!" said Smyth, with a watchful eye on his own gun held so steadily in the fugitive's hand. "That hoss of mine just ain't no good, and the boys'll have you sure as the sun goes down to-night!"

Cardigan smiled.

"Guess I know a good hess when I see one!" he said cheerfully.

A moment later he was up in the sheriff's saddle, and the gun was tossed twenty yards away into the bushes.

"I don't need that," said Cardigan calmly. "S'long, sheriff!"

"Poooooh!" grunted Smyth, in deepest disgust.

He dragged viciously at the cheroots in his pockets and flung them to the ground with another expression of the deepest disgust as he failed to find one that was not broken. And he was staring at the spot where Cardigan had disappeared when his men rode up two minutes later.

"I get the drop on Cardigan," he explained wrathfully. "Say, he's sure a cool guy! But I reckon I'm gonna have a talk with him one day—when I git that hoss back! It's the fastest loss in the district, and there's no tarnation chance of catching him with the start he's got! Come on, Slim, I'm gonna have your saddle, and you can git up behind one of the others! And don't nobody talk to me, for I've got me mad up! Busted my cheroots, he did! Waal, I sure have got somethin' personal on him now!"

The boys forbore to grin—until the sheriff's back was turned to them as he rode ahead of them for home. The shooting of the greenhorn had taken a second place to the "busting" of the cheroots now, and the posse had an idea that they were going to be riding, riding, riding, day in and day out, until Jack Cardigan had been brought in.

Help Needed.

JACK CARDIGAN did not stop riding hard until his horse was blown, and a glance behind had satisfied him that the sheriff had, for the time being at least, given up the chase.

Even then, in order to make best possible use of the relief thus granted him, he only gave his horse an hour's rest before again putting him to the gallop. As much distance as possible between him and the posse was his great ambition, but, at the same time, he was thinking hard about getting a job.

His horse was all right for food and water, there being plenty of both even in the plains. But Cardigan did not fancy himself eating grass and drinking out of horse pools!

It was with something like another relief, therefore, when he spotted far down the trail the peaceful rising of smoke from the chimneys of a handsome ranch-house.

"Gee, boy, see that smoke? That's where you throw your saddle for a spell!" he ejaculated. "What about putting in a real nice burst so that the owner can see what sort of horse I've got with me. We want a job, and first impressions count a high lot with ranch-owners. Get goin'!"

Whether or not the horse understood did not matter. He certainly obeyed Cardigan's urging spurs and hands, and cut down the trail at a speed Jack Cardigan found exhilarating. Sheriff Smyth had had a good horse, and fond as he had been of his own horse, the fugitive had to acknowledge that the exchange was much to his own advantage.

Ahead, down by the ranch-house entrance, Cardigan could see the figures of two men. He hoped that one of them was the owner, and that his spectacular dash down the trail was being observed and admired. Cardigan wanted a job, and, as he had said, first impressions were very important.

But the impressions those men were destined to get were not exactly as Cardigan anticipated, for with startling suddenness his horse put his foot in a hole, stumbled dizzily, and before the fugitive knew what was happening, he had been shot clean out of the saddle.

He flew half a dozen feet through the air. He saw the earth rushing towards him, had a dazed impression that his horse had given a shrill whine of pain, and something crashed straight between his eyes.

That was all he knew for some minutes.

By the time his scattered senses were coming slowly, hazily back to him, he had been picked up by the two men and was being half walked, half dragged into the ranch-house.

"Hallo, boys, what's happened?" came in a blurry, anxious tone from the side of the house.

Cardigan tried to pull himself together and explain, but it was one of the boys who answered the question.

"This guy had a fall down the trail, Miss Doris. Guess we'll sure have to get those holes filled in."

"Take him to Tom's room, boys, and do all you can for him!"

"Sure!"

It was then that Jack Cardigan had cleared his eyes sufficiently to look at the speaker. He found her interesting.

She was dressed very much as every girl he saw out West dressed—serviceable skirt, riding-boots, blouse and scarf. But she was unquestionably the prettiest flower Cardigan had ever seen, and there was ample excuse for the admiration that shone in his own eyes.

She smiled back at him—a sad sort of smile that was quite out of place on that pretty face. That impression flew to Cardigan's brain and remained there.

"Thanks," he said slowly. "I guess I can do with a bucket of water, miss. And if one of your boys wouldn't mind having a look at my horse—nasty stumble that, and no horse, however good, could have missed that hole. Thanks, boys!"

The girl looked at the fugitive with sudden, keen interest. He did not speak with the curt twang usually found with cowpunchers. His voice was quiet, and his words were clear and distinct. His smile, too, was somehow different.

"Well, what about that bucket of water, boys?" she said, with another smile. "Are you alone, stranger?"

"I was, at the time of the fall," replied Cardigan. "But somewhere down the trail there's a partner of mine. If he calls, miss, I should like him to know I am here. His name is Nosey."

She laughed, and his smile flickered back at her, a smile which became rather wan as he tottered slightly on his feet.

"Get him away, boys," she said hurriedly. "He's about all in!"

Cardigan was a tough man of the plains, but that crash between the eyes had more than shaken him up. It took the attentions of the two boys for half an hour before he reckoned that he was fit enough to be left alone for a sleep.

It was two hours later that he awoke, with a lump on his forehead the size of a chicken's egg and a splitting ache between his eyes that was a constant reminder of his somewhat undignified entry in those comfortable quarters.

He lay on the bed for another half an hour, at which time Miss Doris peeped into the room. She gave him a smile when she saw that he was awake.

"Better?" she asked brightly.

"Sure, and I'm much obliged," said Cardigan, as he sat up.

"That's all right, stranger. My father is downstairs, if you feel up to going down to meet him; he is anxious to know that you are all right," she observed.

"Thanks. I'll come down."

It was a distinctly weak Jack Cardigan, however, who walked slowly down the wooden stairs to the large, comfortable sitting-room.

At a table sat an elderly man, with rancher stamped all over him. Upon a chair, at the side of the table, squatted, rather than sat, another elderly man.

"I'm real sorry for you, Bradfield, but my client insists that I go through with it," the latter was saying. "If you haven't got the documents to prove your claim, then we shall have to make you get out."

"Take him to Tom's room, boys, and do all you can for him!"

"You and Harden know full well that this is my property, that my claim is an honest one," said the rancher warmly.

Cardigan hesitated. He did not like to intrude, for there was something going on that was no business of his. At the same time, there was something curiously pathetic about the whole attitude of the rancher, whose name was evidently Bradfield.

"Harden and I are your friends, Bradfield," put in the visitor. "At the same time, no man can afford to ignore chances. Besides, Harden is quite keen upon marrying your daughter, you know, and he wants to see her provided for."

"Leave my daughter out of the argument, Slack," snapped Bradfield. "Marrying is her own affair, and I'm not going to suggest to her that she marries Harden just to get him to lay off pressing for the land documents."

"Sure—sure!" agreed Slack. "But that's how it is, Bradfield. If you can't provide that document, Harden's instructions are to claim it free land."

Bradfield nodded, his head drooping until his chin almost touched his breast. In that manner Slack left him, and it was then that Jack Cardigan stepped slowly forward.

"I guess you're owner here, mister," he said quietly. "I want to thank you for your hospitality—"

"That's all right, stranger," cut in Bradfield, as he swung round. "Doris told me about your fall. Glad to see you're up and about. Travelling far?"

"Just anywhere, but nowhere in particular," grinned Cardigan, and added dryly: "Much depends upon circumstances."

"Then why not stay here for a couple of days, and give yourself a chance to get completely well," suggested the genial rancher. "My house is always open to those on the trail, stranger, and there's always food and rest for man and horse."

Cardigan hesitated. "That's sure kind of you," he said slowly, and looked towards the door through which Slack had passed.

The doorway was suddenly filled again. A youngster came slowly in, followed by Doris Bradfield, upon whose face was again that wistful, sad expression Cardigan had first noticed.

But it was Bradfield who broke the sudden silence.

"You have met my daughter, stranger," he said affably. "This is my son Tom. Tom, meet Mr. Cardigan. He may be stopping here for a couple of days. I've got to go to San Francisco, stranger, but I guess Tom will look after you."

"Sure," said Tom, with a slight nod and one dismal glance at Cardigan.

He went out the next moment, and for a few seconds there was an uncomfortable silence in the room.

"Guess I'll stop, mister," said Cardigan suddenly. "I may be of some help, and able to repay you and your daughter for the kindness shown me."

"Good—now all you have to do is to make yourself at home," said Bradfield with sudden briskness. "I've got to go away, but I'll be back to have a word with you before you take the trail."

Doris helped him pack his bag then and there. The old man's face, bright enough whilst offering Cardigan the hospitality of the ranch, changed altogether as the minutes went by. He seemed to get older, his eyes less keen and more weary, his whole bearing that of a man who carries a big weight of responsibility.

August 8th, 1931.

The girl was anxious, too. Her pretty eyes were restless and constantly moving from the bag-packing to her father, as if she were anxious how he was faring.

And it was a full minute after Bradfield had gone that Jack Cardigan spoke.

"Guess I couldn't help hearing a bit of talk between your father and a man called Slack, Miss Doris," he said slowly. "Trouble?"

She nodded. "Slack is a lawyer, and he and the saloon keeper, Harden, are claiming that this property was never properly bought, and there are no deeds in existence," she explained. "Father has gone to San Francisco, to the land office. His only chance is that the deeds of the property are there. I—I hope he gets them."

It was Cardigan's turn to nod. "And your brother?" he said quietly. "Tom? Oh—Tom?" she murmured, and hesitated. "He's not long been back from the East, and—and—he sees a lot of Harden. I hope everything is all right."

Cardigan nodded again. It was not a propitious moment to ask any more questions. But he gained an idea that a word with young Tom might do more good than harm—later on.

That opportunity was not forthcoming, in spite of the fact that Cardigan was in and around the ranch for the next two days, taking matters easy until he regained his strength. And it was not because most of that time was spent with Doris.

Tom was seen but very little; whatever it was that occupied his time, occupied it completely. But, judging by his pale cheeks and ever trembling hands, his occupation was anything but the healthy one he could so easily obtain on the cattle ranges.

On the third morning after Bradfield's departure—and on the day he was expected back—Cardigan received some really good news. Doris came in from town and went straight up to him as he lounged by the corral.

"Your partner is down town," she said.

"Nosey!" exclaimed Cardigan, and grinned happily. "Well, I guess I'll go down and rouse him out, Miss Doris."

For once he did not linger in her company. He secured a horse and rode off at once.

The Documents.

NOSEY! That was Jack Cardigan's greeting—and it brought Nosey from his thoughtful stare across the plains with a jump.

"Jack! Gee! I'm right glad to see you're up!" exclaimed Nosey. "And—oh, boy!"

He chuckled as if there were no such things as sheriffs and sheriffs' posses in that part of the world. He was a jolly-looking fellow, with a pair of twinkling eyes, a slight, soft, silky black moustache, and, of course, a nasal appendage of a size to account for his nickname.

"Something good around here?" said Cardigan.

"Good!" ejaculated Nosey, and brought out a roll of notes to rustle them under Cardigan's eyes. "Gee—they're dead easy meat down here, Jack! And if I can lift these greenbacks in a few hours, what can you do?"

"Do?" echoed Cardigan, and changed the subject with a sudden burst. "Say, Nosey—seen anything of a young chap down at the saloon—fellow about twenty, not in puncher's stuff, but in a lounge suit—sorter chap from the East?"

"Sure—he was playing cards," said Nosey instantly.

"At the saloon?"

"Sure—Harden's place. Say, Jack, those guys down there was just put there to meet you. You can clear up the whole town in a couple of days."

"Was the kid winning or losing?" asked Cardigan distantly.

"Losing—I was doing all the winning—me and Harden," replied Nosey. "But see here, Jack—what about a little game? Gee—you was born with fingers tickling a pack of cards, and I guess these hyer punchers around here have rolls that are worth your picking up. Suppose—"

"Suppose we go down and have a look at the place," cut in Cardigan. "I sorter want to get an eye drop on Harden. What's he like, Nosey?"

"Big fellow—powerful hombre!" said Nosey, as they walked slowly down the street. "Gets a good roll from the greenhorns who stick around his saloon, I guess."

"See a guy named Slack?"

"Slack? No—"

"Little old guy—a lawyer," explained Jack.

"I sure saw a little old guy talking to Harden, not so long ago," admitted Nosey. "Didn't hear his name. Why?"

"Oh—nothing!" said Cardigan listlessly.

And with that Nosey had to be content. But he was not content when he found that Jack Cardigan's visit to Harden's saloon was not to join in the gambling that went on there from dawn to midnight every day in the week.

Jack Cardigan was more than a hero to Nosey, although the fugitive was many years younger than Nosey himself. It was Cardigan's nimble fingers, when they held a pack of cards, that provided a great fascination to Nosey, and his skill and daring whilst in play was ever a source of tremendous admiration.

But Cardigan seemed far more interested in Harden than either the saloon or the cards. Harden was all that Nosey had said—a big, powerful fellow, who sported check riding-breeches, a flashy waistcoat, and a clean, neat black stetson. His moustache was parted town fashion, with the ends waxed with the care of a city dude.

Once, whilst they were there, Cardigan pointed out Tom Bradfield to Nosey.

"That kid has got the gambling fever pretty bad," said Cardigan. "I guess he worries his sister some."

"And I guess that same sister worries you some," growled Nosey. "You ain't touched a card—"

"I wonder what she would say if she knew that I was a fugitive from the law," murmured Cardigan thoughtfully. "I wonder if she would believe me if I told her that I did not shoot up that greenhorn guy?"

"Wonder what the boys would say, if they knew you was amongst a lot of guys with plenty of money, and you ain't touched a tarnation card!" grunted Nosey. "You've got me sick, Jack! Rolls of notes waiting to be picked up—and you're falling for a girl—"

"That kid brother of hers is losing again," muttered Cardigan, as if he was lost in his own thoughts. "I can always tell 'em by their eyes, Nosey. Watch!"

Nosey, because he realised there was no drawing Cardigan into a game, grunted and watched.

Tom Bradfield's eyes were glimmering and glinting with eagerness and anxiety. But the pile of chips in front of him went down and down, whilst the pile in front of the saloon man's chest grew bigger and bigger. It was Harden's idea to provide one of his own men at each table, just to ensure there was no cheating and no trouble, as he put it.

"I guess that kid's father would have a tarnation blue fit if he saw him now!" said Nosey suddenly.

"Just what I was thinking—but I'm not beating up against Harden just now. Say, that's Slack going off with Harden now. Old man Bradfield is coming back—guess I'll sorter head 'em off. See you later, Nosey!"

And with that Jack Cardigan strolled out into the open. But once in the open, he did not stroll. He leapt for his horse, sprang into the saddle, and cut down the trail at a pace that would have made Sheriff Smyth think it worth while squaring off the whole district to secure the return of his horse.

Bradfield was already there, having arrived a few minutes before. It needed only one glance to show that his quest had been successful, and only a fraction of a second before he turned to Cardigan to confirm the news.

"Say, stranger, I've sure had a successful trip!" he announced brightly. "I've got the documents, all signed and sealed. Give me that chest, Doris!"

Doris obeyed with alacrity, and before Cardigan had had time to offer his congratulations she had placed an iron-bound, wooden chest upon the table—the family box of secrets, as it flashed through Cardigan's mind.

Something made Cardigan turn his head as the papers were put away in what the rancher and his daughter believed to be a place of safety.

Tom Bradfield was in the doorway, his face white and morose. And, for some reason best known to himself, he would not meet Cardigan's eyes. He did look once at his sister before he turned on his heel and walked quickly out.

Bradfield tapped the chest.

"That proves my claim right up to the hilt," said Bradfield. "Say, stranger, you seem to have brought luck with you!"

Cardigan laughed.

"Perhaps the luck is all on my side," he said, and glanced quickly at the girl.

Doris blushed, smiled gently, paled a little, and flushed again.

"I'll get some food ready," she said hastily, and disappeared into the back room.

Harden and Slack, contrary to Cardigan's expectations, did not put in an appearance. Perhaps they had business elsewhere. Whether that was so or not, Cardigan spent the next few hours in pleasant conversation with Rancher Bradfield or in long periods of unaccountably difficult chats with Doris.

The Rising Tide of Trouble.

CARDIGAN'S code of honour, in spite of the fact that he was an admitted card-sharper and gambler, kept him from playing at the saloon. He felt that he could not betray the trust Doris put in him by carrying on in the same way as she hated her own brother doing.

Doris Bradfield had made a lot of difference to Jack Cardigan. Her presence, in a way, worried him. She was so different from anybody else he had ever met.

That she regarded him in much the same light was only too obvious to Cardigan. And that worried him, too. She did not know that he was a sharp—a gambler—that he was hunted by the sheriff for shooting a greenhorn in another gambling saloon. And not for the life of him could he have brought himself to tell her.

There was only one thing to do—and he said so to Nosey.

"Nosey, we're hitting the trail again," he announced the morning after Bradfield's return.

"What! Are you gone stiff in the brain?" almost hooted Nosey. "All these green guys bursting their pockets with bank rolls—and you saying you is hitting the trail before you have tickled your fingers?"

"Just that!" said Cardigan quietly. "I ain't touching a card down here, Nosey."

"Waal, buy me a rabbit!" groaned Nosey. "See hyer, Jack—I can turn those guys in little sums all round my hands! Think what a wad you can lift from them—"

"I'm not playing, Nosey—not around here! We hit the trail at sundown!" said Jack, and walked away from his partner.

Nosey stared after him with a curious mixture of surprise and disgust in his eyes. And his thoughts were not entirely centred around Jack, as his muttered words proved.

"It's that Doris Bradfield!"

He was quite right.

But the plans of mice and men, as the proverb declares, do not always go right.

At the very moment that a distinctly dismayed Cardigan had discovered that his code of honour did not permit his further staying at the ranch, Tom Bradfield was letting himself into Harden's office at the back of the saloon.

Harden looked up angrily—his office was very private. But the expression changed to one of sheer delight when he saw who his visitor was.

"It isn't Tom!" he exclaimed affably. "Come right in, Tom!"

"Say, Harden, I lost again last night," blurted out Tom. "Give me a break—give me a chance to win some of it back."

"That's what you have always said, Tom, and I sure ain't got a bottomless bank pit," said Harden, with a little less affability. "You owe me a lot now, and I ain't married your sister yet—"

"I've got something to offer as security," said Tom hastily.

Harden did not speak. He waited whilst Tom Bradfield fumbled in his pocket and pulled out a paper.

"It's—it's the deeds of our ranch," almost whispered the youngster. "If you would lend me something—I could buy it back out of my winnings! I'm bound to win to-day—the luck is certain to break my way!"

Harden's eyes glistened, and it was only with the greatest difficulty that he could steady his voice to speak.

"Oh, well, that's sure a little bit safe," he agreed slowly, and with assumed reluctance. "I'm your friend, Tom—I'm dead sorry you have had such bad luck. Perhaps I might—"

"And you promise you'll let me buy it back

"Give in, you yellow rat!" hissed Cardigan.

before I go home?" interrupted the feverish gambler eagerly.

"Sure—I'm your friend!" grinned Harden.

He pulled open a drawer of his desk, took out a wad of notes, and handed it over to the trembling fingers that were so eagerly held out for them.

"Thanks, Harden—thanks!" he almost gasped. "You're a real pal!"

"Sure, I'm a real pal!" laughed Harden.

But there was no laugh on his face when he saw the door close behind the boy. His own fingers trembled with eagerness as he re-examined the title deeds of the Bradfield ranch, and his eyes glistened with greed and joy as he placed the document in his desk and locked it.

A minute later he was whispering instructions to one of his men in the saloon. A minute after that another man joined the table at which young Tom Bradfield had sat himself.

For a full hour Harden stood against a support in the saloon, watching the pile of chips dropping down before the sweating Tom Bradfield.

The deeds would never be bought back now!

Only a few chips were on the table when Harden at last went out of the saloon to find Slack, the lawyer.

As a result of that meeting, Slack presented himself at the ranch, a beaming, beneficent smile upon his lips, to find old man Bradfield reading and Jack Cardigan making the best of his few remaining hours with Doris Bradfield.

"Well, Slack, I guess you've come to finish the business," said Bradfield, returning the smile confidently. "I've got the document!"

"Have you?" said Slack, with astonishment. "Then, my dear Bradfield, you have only to let me look at it, and I can assure my client that he cannot claim the property."

Bradfield was grinning broadly as he picked up the chest and placed it upon the table. He tapped it affectionately.

"It is here!" he said, laughing without restraint. "I'm sorry to disappoint you, Slack, but I can prove my claim."

He had opened the lid as he spoke. A moment later the lid had crashed shut again, to be feverishly flung up whilst two wrinkled old hands poked agitatedly amongst the contents.

"The document—it's gone! I've been robbed!" gulped Bradfield, and stared dizzily, accusingly around.

"Doris—Mr. Cardigan—I'm—they've—it's—"

He searched again, Slack making no movement from the chair he had taken. But Doris moved as if with instinct to Cardigan, and clasped both her hands about his arm.

Old man Bradfield was in a state bordering upon collapse.

"They've—it's gone!" he muttered again.

"Then I am sorry to say you will have to leave," said Slack, with merciless calm. "We shall claim at once—everything is prepared, Bradfield. You will have to go."

Bradfield nodded dully and Cardigan, biting his lips with bitter helplessness, turned to Doris.

"Say, I'm downright real sorry about this," he muttered, but she was not looking at him.

Her eyes were turned to the doorway. Tom Bradfield stood there, white as a phantom, twisting his hat nervously in his hands, his eyes downcast, perspiration still upon his forehead.

Instinctively everybody turned and looked at him. He had the grace to flush for a second before the ghastly pallor set over his thin cheeks again.

"Tom, come right here," said Bradfield, very quietly.

Tom obeyed slowly.

"Did you take those documents?" demanded the rancher, as he pointed to the chest.

The youngster nodded, and with that nod every muscle in Jack Cardigan's body stiffened.

"My own son—robbed me of my property—robbed his own sister of her rights!" said Bradfield, and there was more sorrow than anger in his voice. "Where are they?"

"Harden's got them. I raised some money on them. I meant to buy them back. My confounded luck was bad, but—but—"

Tom choked off into silence, avoiding every pair of eyes, and of the quartette only Slack, in the safety of the fact that nobody was looking at him, could find anything at which to smile.

"Well, if Harden has got the document against money lent, I guess that settles it, Bradfield," he said, with a shrug of his shoulders. "My instructions are that you quit—at once! I am sorry for all this, of course, but my client is a business man!"

With that he walked out, whilst Tom shuffled out of the room as his father sank wearily into his chair, one hand upon the chest from which the precious document had been stolen.

It was only natural that after one glance at Cardigan's grim face Doris should step over to do her best to offer some comfort to her father. And Cardigan took the opportunity to move thoughtfully from the room to the ranch yard.

"Say—Jack!"

It was Nosey who called.

"I've got the horses ready, Jack," he began, as he came up.

"You can take their saddles off," said Jack Cardigan grimly. "I've changed my mind."

"An'—an' you're going down to the saloon!" gasped Nosey.

"Sure, I'm going down to the saloon!" said Cardigan. "Get my horse right now, Nosey, but take off everything bar the saddle! I'm not going to leave this place for a while."

"Oh, boy!" gulped Nosey. "Say, just you watch your partner hustle some!"

Jack Cardigan did not speak, and he ventured no information and answered no questions during the gallop down to town.

At last even Nosey forbore to ask questions. He had the opinion that there was trouble brewing; he had seen before that set, grim look that had settled upon Jack Cardigan's face.

A Battle Royal.

JACK CARDIGAN strolled into the saloon with the air of a man whose time was his own, and who had but little interest in the manner in which that time was passed.

Nosey had been left to tether the horses, but he joined Jack Cardigan minutes before his partner showed any signs of joining in a game.

"Can I join in?" said Cardigan, as one of the men rose from a table.

"Sure, stranger," said the tableman.

"Sure, partner!" put in Nosey eagerly, and whispered in Jack's ear: "Skin 'em good and proper, partner!"

Jack was not listening. His eyes were upon the chips.

"Say, what's this?" he said, in tones of deepest disgust. "Boy's chips! Ain't there a man here who can play?"

The tableman stared, and stared even more when Cardigan pulled out a fat roll of notes.

"Sure, stranger! I'll ask the boss!" he said, in awe and wonder.

He dashed straight away to Harden's office, and burst into it as though the place was on fire.

"Say, boss, there's a stranger with a wad as big as a house wanting a game!" he blurted out. "Shall I—"

"You leave the cards and tell him I'll oblige!" chuckled Harden.

He was at the table almost before the news had spread that he was to play a high game with the stranger, and a crowd clustered around the table.

"Say, pleased to see there's a player in this saloon," said Jack Cardigan affably. "I just couldn't stand a boy's game, mister. What shall it be?"

"Anything you like!" said Harden promptly.

"Right! Play you for a thousand bucks!" said Jack, even more promptly.

In the amazed silence that fell, Nosey's chuckle could be distinctly heard, but nobody took any notice of him. Every eye, every scrap of concentrated attention, was upon the table.

"A—thousand—bucks!" gasped Harden.

"Sure! Thought they'd brought a man to play!" sneered Jack. "Too big?"

"No!"

The word shot out between Harden's teeth.

They played, and a thousand dollars went into Harden's corner. They should do so, seeing that he knew every card in the pack by the various marks he himself had put upon them. But Nosey's eyes showed none of the excitement that was in every other pair. He was watching—his hand was ready at his gun. He knew these saloons.

A second thousand dollars went to Harden before a third went to Cardigan. The fourth and fifth and sixth thousand dollar bills were put upon Cardigan's pile. The seventh went to Harden, but the next five went to Cardigan before Harden realised that his own cards were now known to the stranger, and they were being used against him with a skill he could never hope to match.

Great beads of perspiration rolled down his oily, fat face. He fairly tore off his collar and tie, and ripped open his shirt to allow the hot air of the saloon to get at his soaking body.

"I'm—I'm through!" he gasped at last.

"You're through!" sneered Cardigan. "Why, you're yellow—yellow as the yellowest skunk rat in the West! I asked for a man's game, and all you do is sweat over a few paltry bucks! You're yellow—"

"Another thousand bucks!" hissed Harden.

They went to Cardigan after five minutes' play, and again Harden tried to cry off. But the expressions of disgust on the faces of all those around him—all those men from whom he obtained his wealth without giving them a chance—brought him back to the game.

Every dollar bill he had got went to Cardigan, and the amount was enough to make even Nosey's eyes glitter, used as he was to seeing Cardigan play for terrifically high stakes.

"I'm broke—broke, I tell you!" gasped Harden at last, and wishing that he dared announce that he was being cheated with his own marked cards.

"No, you're not broke!" said Cardigan, between his teeth. "You've got a document that belongs to Bradfield—you've got it by the same means that I've got all these bucks! I'll give you a break, Harden! I'll cut you once for that document!"

"I—I—I—" Harden choked himself into a terror-stricken silence. Suspicious eyes were upon him. Hands were at guns. Anger and contempt were mixing in a score of eyes.

With a sudden, vicious movement he swung his chair to one side.

"I—I'll play!" he hissed. "Slim, get a pack of cards!"

"Slim—get a new pack of cards!" put in Cardigan, with a grim smile. "I'm giving Harden a square cut here. He gave money for that document, all said and done. A new pack, Slim—opened and split before the company present!"

That was more than Harden could have reasonably expected. It was a case of luck against luck now.

Cardigan was as cool as an iceberg under the dazzled, amazed eyes of the excited lookers-on. Harden came back, panting like a puffed walrus, his hands trembling and his very knees rocking. He had to win this time!

Cardigan himself tore the wrappings off the new pack of cards. There was dead silence as his slim, nimble fingers flicked them into a lightning shuffle and placed them upon the table.

"I give you first cut, Harden," he said calmly.

That cut must have taken seconds, and it was seen that perspiration was even dropping from the tips of his fat fingers as he slowly cut the pack, took a frenzied stare at the card he had to show—and flung it down with a howl of triumph.

"King of spades! King of spades! Beat that, mister!" he roared, and laughed like a madman.

Jack Cardigan placed his hand upon the pack, grinning as though this cut was for a packet of tobacco. Slowly he shifted the cards—gripped a few tight—and turned them over.

"Ace of spades!" roared Nosey. "That's all yours, Jack!"

Harden stood for thirty seconds, staring dully as Cardigan calmly took up all his winnings and stuffed them and the precious document into his pockets.

It was not until Jack Cardigan, a happy smile upon his face, had moved away from the table that the frantic, ruined Harden burst out with a shriek that was half alarm, half a command.

"He's not getting away with that—a thousand bucks to the man who stops him! I'll play on—" he roared.

Bang! Crash!

Like a flash Nosey had his gun out and had fired at the saloon lights. Almost as quickly came half a dozen other flashes from revolvers, until shooting became too dangerous.

Jack did not wait. He burst through a crowd of men, hitting out right and left, and in a flash there was a general scramble in which every man thought he had the gambler. In the confusion Nosey took to the floor and crawled his way out of the saloon.

Harden, fighting with the fury and ferocity of a maddened tiger, got to the door and staggered for his horse.

He gave no heed to the shout that reached his ears—a shout that the sheriff should be "got on the wires." His only thought was of that document—he meant to have that if he started shooting for it.

But Cardigan's fast horse got him to Bradfield's ranch minutes in front—gave him time to get into the ranch-house and search for a gun he had an idea would be necessary. But he could find nothing like a gun, and Harden was in the house before anything more could be done.

Harden's hand might have trembled with his anxiety and the tenseness of the last few hours, but the blue tube was steady enough to make Cardigan realise that it would be almost impossible to miss at the short distance that separated them.

"Put your hands up!" said Harden between his teeth.

"You can't get away with this, Harden!" said Cardigan, his desperate eyes watching the enemy's every movement. "I gave you a fair break—it was a clean cut!"

"Sure—it was a clean cut!" said Harden, calming slightly. "But do you think I'm going to let you upset everything that I have planned for months past? That document is my warrant for marrying Doris Bradfield, you tar-nation fool! The old man will do anything to keep the property in the family line! Hand it over!"

Reluctantly Jack Cardigan moved towards the table, his hands taking notes and papers from his pockets. Harden watched him keenly, his eyes bulging with triumph.

"Bustle yourself!" he snapped, with a quick wave of his gun. "I'm just longing for an excuse to press this trigger, stranger!"

"Yeah?" said Cardigan lazily. But he was not lazy a split second later. His boot suddenly flew upwards, caught Harden full upon the wrist, and the gun went spinning from his hand.

In another split second the two had come to grips, and there started a battle royal which was destined to all but wreck the room. Furniture crashed over as their burly bodies flew against it under the impetus of blows delivered with sickening, devastating force.

Chairs were hurled from one side of the room to the other, slight pieces of handsome old woodwork were splintered over arms and backs and shoulders until there was nothing left to splinter. Fists thudded into eyes and flashed on to noses and lips until streams of red oozed over battered chins. But the fight went on until they were both on the floor and it became a desperate wrestling match.

The revolver was on the floor, too, as Harden saw first. He slithered towards it—his hand went out—his eager fingers were ready to get around the trigger when Cardigan saw the real danger.

"No—don't!" he panted.

But even then it was a near thing. Harden almost had it. But Cardigan fought him back with every remaining ounce of his strength, and fairly dragged Harden to his knees.

"Give in, you yellow rat!" hissed Cardigan. "I'll break your yellow neck—"

With a superhuman effort Harden thrust away the gripping hands, and again they were at it with fists as hard as they could batter. The pace slowed

(Continued on page 28.)

"Jack! Jack!" she almost whimpered. "You're hurt!"

A gripping crook drama—adventure fast and furious—thrill upon thrill—romance. Starring Pierre Batcheff, Jacques Varennes and Danielle Parola.

Number Thirty-Seven.

THE express from Paris to Marseilles was flying along at sixty-five miles an hour. The first shades of evening were settling down upon the rapidly passing landscape, and the conductor switched on the lamps in the corridor preparatory to making a tour of the compartments. He did not hurry himself; many of the travellers would be still sitting in the restaurant car at their dinner.

A thick-set man, overcoat collar well pulled up about his ears, his largish slouch hat crushed down on his head, came slowly along the corridor and paused to ask the conductor for a match. He lit a cigarette, thanked the man gruffly, and passed on down towards his seat, glancing into the various compartments as he stepped past them. At one door he paused a moment, then went on—then presently came back.

Sitting alone in this carriage was a fresh-faced, unhappy-looking youngster. He sat there staring out into the gathering night, his hands restless in his lap, his face twitching a little every now and then. He had taken off his hat, as if overpowered with the warmth of the car, and whilst the other man quietly watched, the boy stood up and jerked down the window, then sank back into his place.

His features were now fully revealed to the onlooker. It was a pleasant face, not exactly handsome, but certainly attractive, despite the vague uneasiness of the eyes and down droop of the mobile mouth. The watcher slid back the door of the compartment and came in—fully aware of the sudden start that the young fellow could not prevent.

"You were asleep, monsieur?" spoke the thick-set fellow, sitting down in the opposite window corner. "I disturbed you?"

"I wasn't asleep. I was just thinking."

"Ah!" sighed the newcomer. "I understand only too well. Thinking of friends you are leaving behind? Allow me!" He stooped to pick up a crumpled newspaper from the floor. "You are sailing by the boat which leaves Marseilles to-morrow?" he added.

"I—yes. How did you guess?"

The thick-set man laughingly pointed to a little book lying on the seat beside the youth. It was the advertisement of a steamship company, with the brightly coloured picture of an Atlantic liner on the cover.

"I sail also," went on the thick-set man, regarding the other shrewdly. "Perhaps we meet on the voyage?" He spread out the crumpled newspaper and glanced over the front page. Large headlines caught his attention.

"ESCAPE FROM PRISON OF THE MURDERER GASTON LAJOIE! POLICE WATCHING ALL PORTS."

"Ah!" Again the thick-set one sighed. "Nothing. No news at all." He crushed up the paper into a ball and threw it out of the window. "Permit me to offer you a cigarette, m'sieur?"

"Thank you. I wasn't going to smoke." But the young man took the cigarette and found his matches. "You are travelling to the Argentine also?" he asked. His hands shook as he struck the match.

"Perhaps I have to go there on a secret mission," grinned the other man. "My work takes me everywhere."

"You—you are a detective?" The question seemed to be forced out of the youngster. He appeared more uneasy than ever. "I suppose not many criminals get away, no?"

"Not many." Just then the conductor entered the compartment.

"Messieurs, your tickets, if you please!"

The big man at once produced a little case with the necessary green ticket inside. The conductor examined the paper book, tore out a leaf and turned to the young fellow.

"I—I have no ticket," he stammered. "There was no time—the train was just starting."

At once the conductor's polite smile vanished.

"You not have the ticket?" he barked. "It is an offence, it is against the regulations. At the next stop I hand you over to the police!"

"Excuse me," put in the big man. "M'sieur was about to say he would pay you."

"Do you imagine it?" sneered the conductor, as both saw the shrinking fear of the youth. "I know this type! He has no money; he thinks to get a cheap ride—perhaps to escape from trouble. Where did you get on? I did not see you, you stole on to my train like a thief, yes!"

"There was no time to get a ticket." The young fellow seemed helplessly terrified. "But if I may pay to you —"

"Of a certainty you may pay me," cried the conductor ironically, "if you have the money." He winked at the other passenger. "Now, you will see—he hasn't even a sou!"

But the youth had quite a bulging pocket-book. He took it out furtively and offered the irate official a hundred-franc note.

"The fare is one hundred and seventy-five francs from Paris." The youth offered another note. "Oh, very well, all right! I give you a ticket. There will be twenty-five francs change."

"Please to keep that for yourself." The big man nodded approval of the youngster's action, while the conductor began to smile again as he hastily wrote out the necessary form.

"Merci, m'sieur. Merci beaucoup!" He handed over the ticket and went on to the next carriage. The two men settled down to their talk.

"Were you discussing criminals, I believe?" the big fellow said, with a laugh. "I think that our friend took you for one!"

"There is a criminal escaped from prison," the young man allowed. "But"—he laughed nervously—"I trust I do not resemble him!"

"He is ugly, that one?" came the sharp question.

"But not so ugly. His picture was in the paper you threw from the window," answered his companion more easily. "He has the strong face, clean-shaven; I imagine he might pass for a very decent fellow. He is perhaps of forty years, while I am but twenty-three. But let us speak of things more agreeable. You know the Argentine, m'sieur?"

"I know the country very well."

"I go there in search of adventure. Of life. Of fulfilment! One is not living when one is a clerk in a bank," said the youngster.

The thickest-set man shrugged.

"One is already dead," he stated.

"Perhaps you can tell me something of Buenos Aires?" asked the boy.

"It is a fine city. Fine buildings and wide streets. Fine people, especially the women. One manifestly lives in Buenos Aires. Such a man as yourself; courageous, ready, maybe, to snatch a chance." The cold grey eyes watched the youth as he spoke. "For such a man there is everything in that city of opportunity."

For a while the big fellow talked, relating many stories with great point and good humour. Little by little he won the confidence of his companion.

"I am Marcel Dufour," spoke the boy. "I am an orphan. For some years I have been employed in a bank; then I save a little money, and I—I cut and run!" he ended, with a laugh.

The other nodded.

"You are right to do so," he declared as he fumbled in his vest pocket. He produced a little disc stamped with a number in bold figures. "Regard this, if you please. I am known as Thirty-seven—to speak my name is not permitted!"

"I understand, m'sieur," Marcel nodded.

The train was slowing down, the rushing grind of the brakes could be felt.

"Excuse me one moment," spoke Thirty-seven, rising and re-buttoning his overcoat. "We are arriving at Arles, where the train will rest awhile. I make a little promenade to get the air."

He was in the corridor almost as he spoke. He disappeared into the gloom at the end of it. Marcel rose hastily to his feet as if to follow, then, his nervousness returning upon him, sank back into his place. The train ran into the dimly lit station of Arles, stayed there for what seemed to be centuries, then again was moving forward for the final straight run into Marseilles. Number Thirty-seven came back to the compartment, wiping his mouth with a large new handkerchief.

"I was tempted to have a petit verre," he explained. "I hoped you would come out also. The night is fine; I think we shall have good weather for our journey."

Georgette.

AS the train slowed to enter the terminus at Marseilles the two travellers rose up stiffly. It appeared that both of them were travelling light; Marcel had but a small paper parcel which he stuffed into his overcoat pocket, whilst his new friend had nothing.

"It saves delay to send on one's luggage direct to the ship," he explained. "One can register it through and make the declaration at the time."

As they left the train with the crowd of other passengers, Number Thirty-Seven gave quick glances left and right.

"Please to walk in front of me," he whispered to Marcel. "I do not wish to be noticed at all."

When they neared the barrier his sharp grey eyes saw that two large men were standing a little way behind the ticket-collectors. They were muffled up, and apparently just idly interested in the arrival of the passengers. The station was noisy, as it is always; engines letting off steam, bells clanging, voices shouting, shrill whistles almost deafening the ears. Marcel, with beating heart, went forward. Now was the testing moment of his courage.

All went very well. He gave up his ticket and walked through the gateway. The two large men, noticed by him also, neither moved nor spoke. They continued to carelessly regard the flowing stream of humanity. Marcel turned to look for his new friend.

Thirty-Seven had suddenly and entirely disappeared. He had modestly doubled back to the train, one hand in his coat pocket as if feeling for something. He re-entered the train with brusque words to those already starting to clean it.

"I have forgotten something."

He was in the corridor, moving swiftly. He tried one or two of the doors on the off-side of the train, and at last found one to be unlocked. In an instant he had opened it, had slipped out and down on to the oil-reeking permanent-way. Then, still more swiftly, he had gained another platform and had crossed it. Then, by devious ways and means he contrived to get out of the station and gain one of the many dark back streets of the always mysterious port of Marseilles.

Meantime, the puzzled Marcel had entered the station restaurant. He would wait here for "Thirty-Seven," who would be able to see him easily enough through the large windows which gave on to the station. He ordered a coffee and sat down to smoke a cigarette.

Almost at once a very pretty, fair-haired girl, neatly dressed, turned away from one of the long windows and, glancing indifferently round about her, came to Marcel's table. She gave him a questioning glance before seating herself on the leather bench next to him, then calmly ordered a petit verre from the waiter.

She seemed also to be waiting for someone, and not very pleased to be waiting; her smooth young forehead wrinkled itself into a deep line between finely ached eyebrows, her red mouth was set in ill-humour. An itinerant vendor of odds and ends, clad in a long white gown and dirty fez, came smilingly towards her, offering some cheap little trinket-boxes.

"No," she told him definitely.

"But regard, mademoiselle!" urged the Arab. "Behold the bargains miraculous!"

He turned out of his pocket an assortment of tawdry toys, bangles and brightly-coloured things, whereupon she shook her curls petulantly.

"M'sieur"—the Arab turned to Marcel—"please to look at these so wonderful little gifts. You will like to buy something for mademoiselle, if not for yourself?"

Marcel glanced at the girl, wondering if she had smiled at him when she had sat down. She turned her brown eyes upon him rebukingly; then suddenly changing her mood, shrugged her young shoulders and made a little mouth of derision.

"Do not be tempted, m'sieur," she said. "He shows you nothing but rubbish."

"Mademoiselle!" The Arab seemed hurt to the heart's core. "But how can you say so? Look, regard!" He produced a comical, little mechanical figure which walked jerkily across the table the moment he put it down. "Is he not really a marvel, so beautiful, so elegant—so life-like? And so cheap. Almost I give him away!"

The absurd little manikin stalked up to the girl's glass and bumped into it. Both Marcel and she put out hands to save the glass, and briefly their fingers touched. The girl was the quicker, and her petit verre was not spilled.

"Is he not truly a connoisseur?" pleaded the Arab. "You perceive, he goes to see if mademoiselle is drinking the wine of the country."

"How much?" asked Marcel.

"But fifty francs," grinned the fellow. "I give him away almost."

"Do not buy it, please," said the girl.

But Marcel had already lugged out the fat pocket-book. He paid the delighted Arab, and, with a little deprecating gesture, offered the toy to the girl.

She shrugged again, smiled, said

"No" very prettily. Then relented.

"Merci bien, m'sieur!" She opened her leather pochette and put the feebly kicking doll inside. The Arab passed on to other likely customers, saying to Marcel:

"He will bring you happiness, m'sieur. Me, I know it!"

Marcel could not help but stare at his companion. Her brown eyes made such a pretty contrast to her almost flaxen hair; her smile was so modest, so kindly. All her moodiness had gone, she chatted with him easily, talking about casual things whilst sipping at her glass every now and then.

"Will you not have another?" he invited her. "A small one with me?"

She shook her curls in refusal.

"I do not like it, of a truth. But I have to wait for a friend, and he is late."

"Me also. I await a friend." Marcel sipped at his coffee, wondering if he might dare ask her name. She was the sweetest girl he had ever met, so gentle, so very pretty. He was jealous that she should have an assignation.

Her brown eyes had glanced, now and then, towards the long window. She presently glimpsed a face that she knew only too well, and at once her little frown reappeared. She turned to Marcel, who was lighting another cigarette.

"Listen, my friend," she whispered, "you would do well not to show that pocket-book. One sees that you carry much money." Then, as he lifted instantly troubled eyes to hers, she rose from her place. "My friend has arrived. I see him at the door. Please to go quickly—and as if we had not met."

She was standing up, the check for the petit verre in her hand, when Marcel saw Number Thirty-Seven approaching them, his strongly marked features alight with pleasure.

"Ah, mon ami, here you are!" he cried, putting out his hand to the young fellow. "I search for you everywhere." He gave a somewhat theatrical little start. "Why, Georgette, you here also! But how fortunate! Dufour, my dear fellow, meet my sister, if you please. Georgette, this is Monsieur Marcel Dufour."

The girl bowed gravely, while Marcel could scarcely believe in his good fortune. Truly the little walking doll had been a mascot!

"Let us have a drink," went on Thirty-Seven in a jovial, bantering tone. "Seeing you two at the same table, almost I suspect that you have already made friends with each other. Youth, youth!" he sighed. "How splendid to be young! Ah, it is sad to be growing old!"

"But you are not old—" began Marcel. Then he saw that the girl was still standing with her cheek crushed in her fingers, her smiles all gone. Her brown eyes flashed him a signal. They said, as if she had spoken it: "Go quickly!"

But Marcel did not want to go, and Thirty-Seven didn't intend him to go. He forced Marcel to sit again—and called for drinks. He drew Georgette aside.

"You are not to lose sight of him," he whispered. "You must get him to the Paradis, to your dressing-room. I will be there."

"But, Gaston—"

"Silence, you fool! Do not speak my name!" he hissed savagely, his grey eyes glinting. "I must have money. And now. You answered my call from Arles; you know me, I believe?" His voice, low-pitched, was fraught with deadly meaning.

The girl made no further attempt, but turned to Marcel, who had been jealously watching them. Her smiles regained, she murmured prettily: "Forgive that I make the little confidences with my brother. We have not met for quite three years—" A shudder passed over her. "His arrival to night is to me very unexpected."

"Listen, Dufour," broke in Number Thirty-Seven, "I must go to the docks about our berths. There are some details to arrange—you understand?" He gave Marcel a very confidential wink. "Will you be so kind as to chaperone Georgette until—" He glanced at the clock on the wall. "Until after midnight? I will meet you where Georgette knows."

"It will be a great pleasure. I will take great care of mademoiselle."

"A thousand thanks, my dear fellow." Thirty-Seven took Marcel's cold fingers in a warm, friendly grasp. "I must go at once—drink my cognac for me, or leave it, as you prefer. All is paid for. Excuse me. Au revoir to you both."

Two large shadows had briefly loomed across the station windows of the restaurant. Thirty-Seven, with quick strides, reached a door which opened on to the street—and vanished into the misty night.

Le Paradis.

"YOU would like to have supper?" questioned Georgette when they were by themselves.

"I am very hungry," admitted Marcel. "I have scarcely eaten since I left Paris this morning."

"Come then, my friend—I know a good place." She led the way. "Please to call a taxi," she ordered the waiter who opened the outer door for them.

August 8th, 1931.

In the taxi she seemed suddenly distraught and tired. "Why did you ask me to go?" questioned Marcel hesitatingly.

"I like you," she answered him. "That is why I want you to go." She sighed as she spoke. Then suddenly she rallied. "I am so stupid, I forget my manners! You are my brother's friend—where did you meet him, pray?"

"In the train. He was very kind." Marcel smiled. "I had forgotten to buy a ticket, the conductor was inclined to think me a criminal!"

She stared at him through the gloom of the taxi.

"You are making fun of me," she said.

"No, it is quite true," he answered, then added: "I am so glad we have met."

"But you know me for only a few minutes!" she laughed. "My poor friend, I think you are either very wicked or very foolish."

They entered the dining-room of a fashionable restaurant, and were shown into corner seats by the polite hotelier. Marcel offered his menu to his companion.

"For me, I wish the plat du jour," he told her. "One always gets value."

Georgette laughed scornfully as she ordered champagne. She chose her supper with care. The room was gay with people; a small orchestra played bright fox-trots; and, as Marcel ate and drank, much of his shyness wore away.

"May I call you Georgette?" he asked her.

"You are foolish, my friend. Me, who am I? Just a passing acquaintance."

"You—you are lovely," he murmured, his eyes upon her. "You have the air of one who is true."

"Few would think of me that way," she said.

Above the pleasant noise of the supper-room came the sound of loud cheerings and applause from a room overhead. Some of the guests exchanged glances, while others went on with their meal undisturbed. Georgette called to the hotelier:

"What is it?" she asked. "Someone makes a speech?"

"It is a wedding party, mademoiselle."

"Let us creep upstairs and peep at them!" she called to Marcel. "If, I adore the wedding parties! Always the bridegroom looks so foolish!"

Georgette and Marcel left their seats and went tip-toeing up a carpeted stairway. They came to glass double-doors, one of which was partly open. By half-hiding themselves behind a large palm in the vestibule, they could see all that went on in the room.

An old fellow in shiny black coat and trousers and wearing a very large rose in his buttonhole was standing on a chair with a glass of champagne held high. He was wishing health and happiness to the young people who were sitting side by side at the end of a long table, both looking very self-conscious. The guests were sitting round the littered table in various positions of ease, all trying hard to attend to the speech-maker. They cheered him at every pause, while some of the more daring hammered their feet on the floor and clapped their hands.

Marcel watched with smiling eyes. He was feeling very much better, his nervousness was nearly gone. The bridegroom had to stand up and respond—he was nervous indeed, and stuttered and contradicted himself every moment! The guests roared with laughter, and applauded still more loudly. Then the bride had to speak.

Georgette was standing close behind Marcel. As the little white-clad girl faltered her few words of thanks to the speech-maker and to the simple, loving friends all around her, Georgette caught suddenly at Marcel's arm.

"What is it?" he whispered. "Nothing—do not speak! Listen!" she answered tensely.

"It is so pleasant for me to say thank you, everybody," came the soft girlish voice. "I am so happy that almost I could cry. I have the love of a fine fellow, who is very dear to me; always so true and so kind that never can I thank Heaven enough. I will never forget all your kindness and sweet thoughts for me, from papa and mamma, and from you all. Thank you, please—thank you very much."

A waiter ran to the piano and struck up the wedding march; the guests rose and formed up. The bridegroom, smiling proudly, led off with the little bride on his arm. Then followed papa and a stout lady; then the rest, in their due order of relationship. Georgette shrank back with Marcel, as the smiling, joyous little company passed by them; they watched them go down the stairs into the hall, where shrill whistles were blowing for carriages and cabs.

The waiter who had played the march came tripping out of the room with two others; they hastened to the hall to help give the party a grand send-off. Georgette released her almost painful grip on Marcel's arm and walked slowly into the disordered room where the wedding had been celebrated. She gazed around her for a moment, then moved to the piano and stood staring down upon its ivory-and-black keys.

With one finger she picked out the opening notes of the wedding march, while Marcel watched her with growing anxiety. Then, as if stricken to the soul, she suddenly knelt down by the piano with her head upon the keys, weeping as if her heart must break.

"Georgette!" Marcel ran to her and lifted her up. "Oh, Georgette!"

She raised her tear-filled eyes to his—a child, once more, rather than a grown woman. She shook her head to and fro, murmuring:

"It is ended—yes, it is finished for ever!"

"Georgette, I love you!" whispered Marcel. "Let me take care of you always. Be my dear wife."

She put her arms about his neck; then, with a sobbing breath, kissed him upon his still moving lips.

"It is sweet of you—" She broke from him and blindly ran from the room, almost stumbling headlong down the stairs. Marcel ran after her, believing that she had entered the restaurant. But when he reached the corner seats where they had been supping together, he saw that she was not in the room.

He sat down to wait for her. She needed a few moments to recover—she would return presently, so he told himself. But the clock ticked onward towards midnight.

The waiter came with the bill, and, when Marcel dejectedly rose to pay it, he saw that Georgette had left her black leather pochette. An impulse came upon him to open it. On the flap of the bag, inside, he read the words:

"Georgette Lajoie. Le Paradis."

He called the waiter.

"You know it, Le Paradis? It is a hostel, perhaps?"

"But not at all," grinned the man.

"Le Paradis is a night club, very well known. Very amusing! M'sieur will go there? I whistle a taxi for m'sieur."

Fanny.

THE cab brought Marcel to a queer little place, brilliantly lit up, in one of the dark back streets of Marseilles. Tightly clutching Georgette's bag, Marcel paid the exorbitant fee demanded, and went into a long, garishly-decorated dance-hall, where many couples were fox-trotting to a small, lively orchestra. A little stage at the far end was curtained when he came in; but soon after he had seated himself at a table, these curtains were drawn aside and the orchestra stopped its jazzing—with a prolonged flourish on the drums and cymbals. An immaculate director of ceremonies stepped from the wings.

"Mesdames et messieurs, I have the honour of introducing to you the dancer equilibriste, the charming Demoiselle Fanny!"

Clapping of hands followed; the couples crowded up from the decked dancing-floor and formed themselves round about the little stage. Marcel moved his chair to get a nearer view, hoping against hope that the performer might be Georgette.

But, instead, a little slip of a girl, a mere child of fifteen or sixteen, clad in a short white silk frock, came on to the stage and bowed to her audience. The orchestra began a soft, dreamy waltz, to which she kept time by turning many complicated somersaults, hand-springs, and other tricks of the acrobatic dancer.

She was very graceful, despite the knots she made of her lissome young body, and she finished up by making a living catherine wheel of herself, hands and feet all whirling round and round and over and over, much to the delight of the applauding very mixed mob.

Fanny gave an encore, then came down from the stage to walk amongst the patrons of Le Paradis and sell them roses and violets from a wicker basket which the director had ready for her. Presently she came to Marcel, smilingly offering him a buttonhole for a rather preposterous price.

"But I kiss the flowers for m'sieur," she coaxed. "Then m'sieur will be lucky in love."

Marcel bought the rose and she pinned it in his coat.

"Tell me," he murmured. "Is there—do you know Mademoiselle Lajoie?" The child fixed her blue wide gaze upon him.

"She is my friend," came her quick answer. "You are a new patron, yes? Did you not see the bill outside Le Paradis announcing her? She is what you call the star turn."

"I have something for her. I also am her friend," spoke Marcel quickly. "Could I not see her for a moment?"

Fanny regarded him with steady eyes. She nodded her pretty head.

"Come with me," she told him. "I will take you to her room."

They went out by a side door into a long, rising passage, and came to a row of doors. At one of them Fanny stopped. "Wait here, if you please."

She knocked at the door and entered a small room in which Marcel glimpsed a screen and many looking-glasses.

The door re-opened, and Georgette stood there, staring at him.

"Why do you follow me?" she demanded.

Marcel held out the leather pochette.

"You left your bag."

She took it from him, then caught at his hand.

"Come inside, then," she said sharply.

"Do not stand out here."

Soon as Marcel entered, she closed the door and put up the latch. She made a gesture towards the little girl: "This is Fanny, my friend. Monsieur Dufour"—she sat herself in a chair by a narrow, untidy dressing-table—"excuse me if I go on with my make-up."

"Forgive me for troubling you, Georgette," said Marcel humbly. "I—I did not want to lose you."

She was combing out her flaxen hair, and those strange brown eyes reflected in the tawdry mirror were no longer unkindly. Almost they relented—then sudden fear seemed to show in them.

"It will be better if you leave me, Marcel," she muttered. "If you let me go out of your life as easily as I came into it."

Marcel rose from the chair which Fanny had placed for him.

"I go, Georgette," he said. "Forgive me."

"Wait. Let me think." The line showed briefly between her arched brows. "Presently I shall sing in the cabaret, and you can listen to me like one of the patrons. Afterwards, if there is a chance, I will come to you. Go now, and, above all, be discreet. Do not come until I send the little Fanny."

She came to him and put up her lips for his kiss.

"I trust you, Marcel. I think Fate has brought you into my life." She unlatched the door and almost pushed him into the long dim passage.

Then the door closed upon him a second time, and, mystified but more hopeful, Marcel returned to his seat in the hall.

He bought a gay programme, and saw that "Georgette Lajoie" was billed in huge gold letters as the principal attraction at Le Paradis. As he read, it came to him vaguely that he had seen the name Lajoie somewhere before, apart from its having been on the flap of the leather pochette.

The orchestra was playing. A big-lipped, strikingly-clad girl ran confidently from the wings on to the stage, smiling widely at all and everyone. She broke into a lively song, accenting the words with great point and verve. It was Georgette.

Gaston Lajoie.

NUMBER THIRTY-SEVEN slid through the streets of Marseilles like an ill-omened shadow. His quick, furtive glances right and left when he came to a road-crossing showed him as someone vastly different from the good-humoured and entertaining traveller on the express. Always his right hand was plunged deeply into the big patch-pocket of his buttoned-up overcoat.

He didn't slacken in speed until he had reached the smaller docks on the far side of the harbour; here, without hesitation, he hurried along a deserted, lumbered-up pier where a few desolate boats were moored.

After listening beside an ugly-looking steam tug berthed in very close to the pier, Thirty-seven whistled thrice between his teeth, a thin, hissing sound that only carried the necessary distance. Almost at once a dimly-seen form rose up from behind the bulwarks of the vessel and, leaning on the rails, peered intently towards the pier.

"Casare!" called Thirty-Seven, whisperingly.

They faced each other from either end of the table, hands ready to seize and tear—

"Who is it?" came an answer. "The captain's down below."

"Tell him it is I, Gaston," called back Thirty-Seven.

The slouching lad on the boat turned away and went below. Thirty-Seven sprang aboard and crept down the stairs after him.

"There's a man called Gaston wants you," the boy was saying, when Thirty-Seven pushed past him to confront a bulky, grizzly-bearded seafaring fellow who had risen from his seat in the badly-lighted, ill-smelling hutch of a cabin.

"Gaston—you!" The bulky man stared his amazement. "What in the name of the devil brings you here? Is it you, really? Speak, man, speak!"

Thirty-Seven caught the gaping apprentice by the shoulders and ran him out of the cabin, banging the door upon him. Then with a grin he sat himself at the wooden table which separated him from the perplexed owner of the boat.

"You actually behold me, the great Gaston Lajoie!" laughed Thirty-Seven. "Is it not marvellous? Sit down, Cæsare, my friend; let us talk like the old comrades we have always been."

The bulky Cæsare sat down. His heavy face did not manifest any great signs of pleasure at this reunion. He took out a short black clay pipe from his pocket, filled it slowly from a filthy pouch, then struck a match on the table and lit up. All the while his pig-like eyes bored into the smilingly insolent regard of his visitor.

"Yes, Cæsare, I am here. I am no ghost," grinned Lajoie.

"They acquitted me. I was not implicated," the fat, unpleasant man stated, puffed out the words in a cloud of foul smoke. "It is useless, Lajoie, for you to try any of those games on me. You killed him, that gendarme—the jury were convinced of it. Even the judge also."

"My dear fellow, do I try to implicate you?" laughed Gaston. "Not at all. I am here on a little matter of convenience for both of us. If you had been in the town, and, if you had read the papers, you would have known that I have contrived to leave the excellent prison to which the judge condemned me."

"You were lucky to escape the death sentence, Gaston."

"As for that, who can say?" the convict retorted. "Let me tell you that the prison was not at all agreeable. However," He leaned confidently across the table, heedless of the smoke and smell of rank slag. "However, my charming Cæsare, all this is beside the point. I want your help, and I can pay you well for it."

"There is only the boy," Cæsare was beginning when Lajoie broke in with:

"The engine is under steam, and I can assist with the navigation. Always you keep a full head of steam. It is pleasant to be able to slip in and out of the port of Marseilles how and when you wish." He tapped his pocket. "There is money for you, Cæsare, much money. I have a job in hand which will take me perhaps two hours. Then I come back with my wife, and you will carry us out of Marseilles to the coast of Spain. Two thousand francs, Cæsare, easily earned."

"I have other fish to fry, Gaston. Two thousand, why, it is nothing!"

"Listen. Do not be a fool. You will make the Spanish coast in a few hours. You put us ashore, and"—he snapped his fingers—"finish! I will pay more, if the job is very profitable. For the moment I do not know how much money there is. The young monsieur who is going to oblige me carries it always in his pocket-book."

Cæsare considered the proposition, suspicion heavy in his brutish features.

"I will come ashore with you, Gaston. I would like to know more of the young fellow," he decided. "Also, I would wish to meet this wife of yours. Never before have I heard you were married."

"By all means come with me," agreed Lajoie heartily. "We go to Le Paradis, a night club amusing. She sings there, my pretty wife. And there are others."

He rose up, and as Cæsare came round to him slapped the burly fellow on the back.

"Comrades once more, Cæsare. Ah, how pleasant it is to meet again one's old friends!"

They went up the few stairs to the deck. Cæsare gave the boy gruff orders, then the precious pair went along the stone pier quietly in the darkness, treading like cats, despite their size and weight. They climbed the stone wall which surrounds the docks.

Marcel Dufour.

GEORGETTE was sitting in her dressing-room with a wrap over her stage costume. It was now nearly one o'clock in the morning and Gaston had not yet appeared. A wild thought came to her. Why not run away with Marcel at once? He was a nice boy and would help her to hide until her husband was recaptured. Perhaps already the police had found him. It was just like Gaston to venture into Marseilles, but always his impudence carried him through.

Georgette knew that her husband had murdered the gendarme. He would kill anyone who stood in his way. She shuddered, hesitated, allowing precious irrecoverable moments to go by. She was his wife, sacredly promised to be loyal to him.

She could not betray him. It would be a sin against the Holy Spirit. She must suffer; it was so ordained.

Fanny came softly tapping at the door.

"Enter," called Georgette, her heart almost standing still. "Oh, Fanny, it is you! How you startled me!"

"I have heard something," whispered the girl. "I think I guess why you have fear. He has escaped from prison. Did you know it?"

"Yes."

"He will want you to hide him," said Fanny. "Why not run off with the young monsieur who tells me that he sails at dawn for the Argentine?"

"I cannot betray Gaston."

"Who asks you to betray him, Georgette? You have had unhappiness enough." She came to Georgette and put a bare slim young arm fondly around her. "Go, my dearest one, with the young monsieur. He is honest and good."

"I will speak to him, Fanny." Georgette weakened. "A farwell—"

"Farwell to me, Georgette, and all this!" Fanny made a little hopeless gesture as she went to the door and opened it.

As Marcel came into the room she whispered:

"Make her go with you. Do not listen to any refusal. Perhaps her life depends upon it!"

Marcel approached Georgette, hoping and fearing, but mainly puzzled. He sensed that he was wading in deep waters, but always he had wished for adventure.

"Will you not come with me, Georgette?" he pleaded, kneeling to her. "I will try so hard to make you happy."

"No, Marcel, it is impossible." She laid her hand on his head, stroking his hair. "Listen, my friend; that man who calls himself my brother is a convict escaped."

"Ah!" Marcel sprang to his feet. "Now I remember. I read it in the paper. He is Gaston Lajoie."

She nodded her bowed head. Marcel, in an access of pity and love, put his arm about her shoulders, whispering strickenly:

"Me, I have no right to judge him. I also—"

Georgette raised horror-stricken eyes to his.

"What are you saying?"

"I, too, am a thief, Georgette. This morning I take money from the safe of the bank. I heard of this ship sailing for America. Always I want adventure, life, freedom. So I took the money and I will be free. Come with me, Georgette; I love you—I love you!"

She put him from her.

"You a thief?" She pointed a shaking finger at the door. "Go! Leave me!" Scorn and rage flashed in her brown eyes. "Go!"

Marcel gazed imploringly at her, his young, likeable face twitching.

Suddenly he straightened himself.

"You are right, Georgette. I will go. I will return to Paris and put back the money I have stolen. It is not good to be ashamed of oneself as I have been ashamed all this day. Better to be but a clerk in the bank, better to be in prison if they send me there, and be unashamed." He put out his hand. "Say good-bye to me, dear friend, and do not despise me for ever."

She gave him a look that seemed to read his soul; then let him take her fingers.

"Go, then, Marcel. Be proud of yourself and be patient. If it so happens—" She could not finish; she put her arms sobbing about him.

The door was thrust open and Number Thirty-seven entered.

"Ah, my little ones—" he cried.

"You have made friends, yes?" he laughed sinisterly. "But, all the same, it is not quite right that you should embrace each other, is it?"

"Georgette forgives me—" began Marcel.

"It is charming of her," sneered Gaston, shutting the door. "But I, as her husband, do not forgive!" He suddenly flung himself upon Marcel and struck him crashingly to the floor.

"Gaston!" screamed Georgette. "You make a mistake! It is nothing—"

The convict thrust her aside.

"Shut up your noise!" he growled.

Marcel was rising from the floor. The two men faced each other; then, as the boy ran in upon his formidable enemy, Gaston clutched him in a bear-like grip. They wrestled silently, Georgette watching in terror, unable to think or act. If she called for help, Gaston would be taken—she would have betrayed her husband.

Also, beyond all doubt, he would shoot Marcel.

She saw that he had loosened the boy, that he had a short, wicked little gun in his right hand, threatening the boy's breast. Then, as Marcel made a blind plunge at him, Gaston's left fist shot out and smashed against the boy's chin.

With a horrible, gurgling cry Marcel crumpled up and fell prone.

"You have killed him!" Georgette's voice was almost soundless with horror.

Gaston was dragging the unconscious Marcel into a corner. The three-fold screen which they had knocked over in their struggle was brought by him to hide the rest. The convict possessed himself of Marcel's pocket-book, then stepped forth from behind the screen. He smiled at Georgette in his hateful way.

"You managed it very well, my dear," he commended her. "Now be so good as to dress yourself. I have a friend here—" He unlocked and opened the door, calling very politely: "Come in, my dear fellow. Madame wishes to make your acquaintance."

The villainous-looking Cæsare entered, grinning sheepishly. Gaston airily waved a hand from one to the other.

"Madame Lajoie — my comrade, Cæsare Vecchetti. All is very well, Cæsare; the little job is done. As soon as Madame has dressed herself in outdoor clothes, we will go."

"I do not go with you, Gaston," came Georgette's low-spoken defiance. "After this, everything is quite finished between us. I am absolved from my vows."

"You go with me, Georgette," hissed Gaston, the pistol once more glinting in his hand.

She flung off her peignoir and stood there in her stage costume. She sat herself resolutely at the table and began to powder her face and redden her pale lips. Cæsare watched her with gloating eyes.

"Do not be a fool, Georgette," Gaston put away the gun. "Listen, our friend is master of a little vessel berthed at pier fourteen. There is a fine cabin provided for you. We sail under cover of the night to the Spanish coast—"

"I am not interested," she interrupted.

Gaston came to her and pressed the muzzle of the pistol into her bared back.

"There will be no report, Georgette," he told her. "It is quite remarkable, this little gun. When you are dead, Cæsare and I will simply walk out—"

The dressing-room door opened abruptly and Fanny came running in.

"Georgette, your turn is next after mine! Are you ready?" She stared at Cæsare in a kind of fascinated amazement, then perceived Gaston.

"Come here, my little one," he smiled at her, the pistol thrust into his pocket on the instant of her entry. He saw that she was glancing round about for Marcel. "Your cavalier has departed; he went to find you, no doubt."

His cold grey eyes narrowly watched the little girl.

"Help me, Fanny," Georgette was speaking. "I cannot fix this comb in my hair. My hand shakes—almost I believe I have caught cold."

Soon as Fanny was beside her, Georgette formed with her lips rather than spoke the words: "It is he. Tell the police!" Then, smiling in her stage manner, she went on, for Gaston to hear: "Thank you, dear child. You have the clever fingers. Run along, they are waiting you."

The call-boy's voice was sounding in the passage.

"Mademoiselle Fanny! Your call!"

With a little laughing gesture the girl ran from the room. Gaston uttered a furious oath and struck Georgette with his open hand. He moved quickly to the silently staring Cæsare, shaking him by the arm.

"Wake up! It is time to go."

"But she—isn't she coming?"

"Let her rot!" Lajoie almost dragged the pig-eyed Cæsare from the room.

"Get to the door, I will join you in a moment." He had spied Fanny standing alone at the wings of the stage. He reached her in a stride and brutally took her small, rounded chin betwixt his thumb and finger.

"Have you squealed—have you?" he ground out, his eyes blazing on hers.

"I do—not understand, M'sieur, if you please—" Fanny freed herself and tried to smile.

Lajoie, with a furious gesture, turned away. He slid through the crowd of dancers and gained the door. There he tipped the porter in lordly fashion.

"Call me a taxi!" he ordered.

When the gorgeously uniformed fellow turned to obey, Gaston slipped into the street and rejoined his friend Cæsare, who was lurking in the gloom a few yards below the entrance of Le Paradis.

"We must hurry, my dear old friend," smiled Gaston. "Especially as we must go on our feet."

Cæsare.

GEORGETTE rushed to the screen and dragged it aside. She knelt by the side of the feebly stirring Marcel and took his head on her lap.

Her tears dropped on his upturned face.

"You weep, Georgette?" The youngster struggled to a sitting posture. "Is it for me?"

"I come with you to Paris," she whispered. "You shall give back the money—" A sudden pang of honor came upon her. Gaston had stolen the pocket-book! "I will help you to earn the money to give back—"

Marcel's hand went to his breast.

"Heavens, it is gone!" he gasped, his face white as chalk. "I must go after him. It was he who took it, your brother?"

She nodded heart-brokenly as she confessed.

"He is my husband. That is why I broke down at that wedding—my memories are so sad. But now he is nothing to me; I shut him out of my life for ever!"

Marcel scarcely heeded. His thoughts were all awlirl, his mind was blank. What was to be done now? What could he do?

Sudden whistlings shrilled from the dance-room; cries, shouts—a confusion of noise that told of panic. Fanny came running into the dressing-room.

"It is the police!" she called to them. "They make a raid on Le Paradis!"

She saw Marcel, pale and disordered. "Ah, m'sieur, you are hurt? He struck you, that canaille?"

An armed sergeant of police strode into the room.

"Hold up your hands!" he shouted.

"No one is to leave this place! A dangerous criminal has escaped from prison. He is said to be here."

Georgette and Fanny were able to prove their identity easily enough.

"Get yourselves dressed!" the

Two men sprang upon the convict out of the night.

sergeant commanded. "Now, m'sieur, who are you?"

"Marcel Dufour, rue Scribe, numero six, Paris," answered Marcel. "I am visiting Marseilles."

"Have you any papers to prove it?" came the sharp question.

"My pocket-book—but it has been stolen." The sergeant shrugged his shoulders and made a sign to two police, who had ranged themselves behind him.

"This pocket-book has all your papers?" questioned the sergeant.

"But yes, m'sieur," answered Marcel. "It was he, this criminal, who stole it from me."

"You know him, then?" The sergeant eyed Marcel fiercely. "You will please go to the bureau with my men. I shall have to ask you some questions."

Georgette stared from one to the other. Then a thought came to her—a faint hope.

"I will come for you, Marcel," she said bravely. "I will not fail."

The police took Marcel with them, and the two girls threw off their stage clothes and dressed themselves hastily in their street attire.

Georgette had remembered: "A little vessel berthed at pier fourteen." She knew it, that far-off small stone pier. In the olden days she had kept tryst with Gaston there. She had conceived a desperate plan, almost a last hope. She bade Fanny go to the bureau and comfort Marcel if the police would allow the child to speak with him. She hailed a night taxi, and told the driver to hurry to the docks. At the dock gates she ordered him to wait.

"I have to visit a friend on the Almeric," she boldly lied to the guard at the gates.

Georgette was young and pretty; the sentry grinned at her and let her pass.

Presently she was at pier fourteen; she moved quickly along it under the faint sky reflection of the city lights. She came to the little tug-boat where a youth was busy at the moorings getting ready to cast off.

"I want to speak with him," she said, pressing a ten-franc note in the boy's hand. "Your captain."

"Captain Cesare?"

"Yes. Tell him to come here alone," she whispered.

Her heart was beating wildly. She was risking much—her life, at the very least. Cesare suddenly loomed before her, bulky and suspicious.

"It is I, Georgette," she murmured. "You want him, your husband?" he asked gruffly.

"It is you that I want." She was panting a little. "Cesare, I saw that you admired me. I watched you while pretending to look in the mirror. I come to ask you to be my friend."

She pushed herself close to him, and put a hand on his arm. He stood there like a block of wood. Georgette put up her face to his bearded one, and swiftly kissed him on the cheek.

Next instant she was struggling wildly in a bear-like hug.

"Kill him, Cesare!" she whispered, as she submitted to his embrace. "Kill him! He—he struck me, yes!"

"Struck you, my little pigeon?"

"Did you not see for yourself? Go! I will wait here for you."

Cesare released her.

"I will take the money also," he muttered. "He has already tried to cheat me. It will be well to kill him. He is a murderer!"

August 8th, 1931.

Georgette watched him go lumbering down the stairs to the cabin. She jumped aboard and stood at the stair-head listening intently. She heard a low grumbling of voices in dispute, then came a sinister silence, then muffled, dreadful sounds as of a struggle to the death. Not once did she distinguish Gaston's mocking accents, but she knew he was there, fighting grimly.

She crept down the stairs like a ghost. By the light of a hanging lamp she saw two men locked together, Cesare's horrible fat fingers gripping and closing across Gaston's throat. The pocket-book had fallen from the table and lay unheeded on the floor.

Georgette saw that Gaston's eyes were glazing, that his teeth were set in a grin of hate and seeming despair. She dared all, and, swiftly entering the cabin, snatched up the pocket-book and fled.

She gained the deck, stumbled across it, leapt over on to the dock edge, nearly missing her footing. The boy stared at her a moment, then put out a hand to stop her. But she dashed a little clenched fist in his face, and he let her get away.

He began to run after her.

Gaston, with a sudden savage kick of his heavy boot on Cesare's shin, caused his enemy to briefly relax the death grip on his throat. At once Gaston recovered himself and tore Cesare's fingers from his aching neck. His fist shot upwards into Cesare's face, and the blow made the burly seaman blink and lose control for a moment. Gaston wriggled free and punched his enemy clear across the cabin. A final vicious left jab sent Cesare crashing against the door, closing it with smashing force.

Brooding stillness reigned once more. They faced each other from either end of the screwed-down table; their eyes glaring at each other, hands ready to seize and tear—hate and rage expressed in their silently snarling lips. So for a full ten seconds they stood, tensed and taut, two tigers ready to leap and kill.

Gaston had put off his overcoat, and his pistol was in the left-hand patch-pocket. He had to get it somehow. The smoky kerosene lamp hanging above their head swayed as the wash of the tide stirred the boat at its berth. Gaston was thinking grimly; he knew that Georgette had been there and had taken the pocket-book. He hadn't seen her, so much as he had sensed her.

He must finish off this bulky brute, then follow up Georgette. He would find her all right! He never failed with Georgette!

Cesare suddenly leapt on to the table and charged down at him. Gaston, cat-like, stood aside and closed with the sailor in a kind of sideways grip which gave him advantage when the other's dead weight made him fall forward somewhat. The convict got Cesare down on his face and fastened his teeth in the bulging neck of the sailor. A shriek of agony came from Cesare as those vicious teeth closed in upon the top of his spine; he writhed and fought blindly, beating his huge fists upon the greasy floorboards. Gaston suddenly released him, leapt off his back, and made a dash for the overcoat lying in a corner of the cabin where it had been slung. Even as Cesare rose from the floor, Gaston had the short, wicked little gun in his right hand.

The sailor's eyes, bleared and flaming, focused, or tried to focus, the convict. Cesare had no intention of giving up the pocket-book which he deemed to be still in the cabin. With a beast's growl he rushed round the table at Gaston, his fingers outstretched to fasten on his throat. There came a faint click of the gun, a flash—the huge bulk of Cesare, hurled forward by its own impetus, suddenly slid down with horrible gasping breaths.

"You would have it!" grunted Gaston. "You wouldn't give me a chance to speak."

He knew that Cesare was shot through the breast, that he was out of it, anyway. If he was dead, so much the worse for him. Gaston slipped into the overcoat, thrust the smoking pistol into his pocket, opened and closed the cabin door, then staggered up the stairs.

In a moment more he was on the dock-side. He moved swiftly and rapidly towards the walls. No one was to be seen or heard.

Suddenly he came upon the ship's boy returning to the tug. Gaston seized him by the coat-collar.

"Where did she go?" he demanded. "Speak out, don't be afraid of me! I'm your skipper's friend, Gaston."

"She went out by the gate—" stammered the boy. "Let go, can't you? You're hurting my throat."

"Sorry, my friend. Here's something to make it well again"—Gaston thrust a five-franc note into the boy's hand. "Good-night—don't disturb Cesare. He's asleep in his cabin."

He hurried off into the darkness, reached the stone wall and shinned over it. Then, cautiously, he made his way to Le Paradis, where, from a street night prowler, he learned of the raid. With consummate impudence Gaston moved away in the direction of the police-station, and hid himself against a doorway near by.

Georgette Once More.

GEORGETTE almost fell into the waiting taxi. She bade the man drive to the Bureau, and then lay back, breathing in quick, short gasps until he brought her to the police office. She demanded to see the night sergeant, and told him she had recovered Dufour's pocket-book.

"Perhaps it was you who stole it?"

"Will you not release him, m'sieur?" she pleaded, ignoring the question. "He has affairs of great urgency in Paris. There is just time for him to catch the early morning train."

"He says he knows nothing of the fellow we want," said the sergeant. "I do not believe it—but, all the same, if he describes the contents of this book he need not be detained. How long have you known him?"

"But a little while, m'sieur."

He eyed her closely, and as he did so his hostile manner changed. He shrugged his shoulders and sighed profoundly as he rang for a subordinate. "Bring here Monsieur Dufour!" he ordered.

Marcel came into the little private office, and the moment he perceived Georgette, his pale face lighted up with such sudden joy that the sergeant had no more doubts.

"Lovers!" he muttered. "Such folly! What is love but childishness?"

"Monsieur, will you tell me what is in here?" He held out the pocket-book. "Mademoiselle has recovered it for you." Marcel answered him without a fault. "I release you," came the decision. "I wish you both all the luck you can expect in this unlikely world!"

(Continued on page 27.)

Cattlemen at Fire Mountain are terrorised by a mysterious band of "ghost" Indians, but the "Kid from Arizona" solved the mystery, won a great horserace, and brought a crook to justice. Starring Jack Perrin and his horse, Starlight.

THE KID from Arizona

Fire Mountain.

THE Fire Mountain raised its head from among the rocky slopes of the Humboldt Range of Nevada, in the far West. Once, in the ages long gone by, it had been an active volcano, and the evidences of ancient eruptions were still to be seen here and there in beds of lava and volcanic rocks.

The mountain was not very high and not difficult to climb, but it was rarely visited, save by an occasional scientist studying the geology of the district, for a legend had grown up about Fire Mountain, a legend that rendered the inhabitants of the rolling plains very shy of approaching its summit.

Black Eagle, the chief of the "vanishing" Yumas, was buried at the top of the mountain. His men had given the early settlers much trouble, and so swift were their raids, so difficult were they to overtake, that the nickname which became attached to them was easily explained. They had appeared, attacked the whites, and vanished as quickly as they had come, time after time.

The tribe of the "vanishing" Yumas had long ago disappeared, but the legend of their prowess still remained, and it was said that no white man could venture to approach the tomb of Black Eagle and return alive. Certainly one or two men had climbed Fire Mountain in times gone by, and had never again been seen. Whatever might be the truth about their disappearance, the inhabitants believed in the legend, and gave the mountain a wide berth.

One night the people of the little town of Hamilton were amazed to see a flame rising steadily from the summit of Fire Mountain. Again and again at intervals the light was seen, but no one dared to climb to the top, though several bold spirits set out on the journey, only to return without going very far. There were strange stories, too, that mysterious Indians had been seen to appear for a moment or two by night, and men began to whisper that Black Eagle and his tribe had returned, in spirit form, to visit the scene of their exploits of long ago.

Near the foot of Fire Mountain one evening rode "Red" Saunders, a cattleman returning from an inspection of his herds. He was in a disturbed and angry mood, for though his cattle were well enough, he had lost twenty horses that day. The animals had been driven off by a band of Indians dressed in white garments, and Red had come up just too late to save them, though he had chased the raiders for miles.

"I'll take a drink," he muttered. "Clear my head, maybe."

Reining up his weary horse, he produced a bottle and drank. Suddenly from the summit of Fire Mountain a flame rose into the air, and in the quiet of the evening a strange sound fell upon his ears.

Still holding the bottle, Red Saunders looked round. There was not a soul in sight, but the mysterious sound—the sound as of the beating of far-distant drums—came more and more plainly from the mountain, and the cattleman was puzzled.

"Must be dreaming," he said aloud. "Must get on and tell sheriff 'bout Indians. Real Indians this time, not ghosts. Rustling my horses. Let's have 'nother drink."

He had another, and then one or two more. Saunders had drowned his sorrow at the loss of his horses with a good many drinks that day, and the last swig at the bottle almost finished him.

Hardly able to sit his horse, the cattleman rode slowly on, swaying uncertainly in the saddle. Now and then he looked up at Fire Mountain, where flickering flames rose high in the air, while the sound of the drums—if drums they were—still continued.

"Yes, must see sheriff!" muttered Saunders again. "Tell him knew that chief's face—seen him somewhere."

Red had got near enough to the raiders to exchange ineffectual shots with their chief, and the face of their leader had seemed somehow familiar to him. He was too much soaked in whisky, however, to think clearly as he rode back home, and soon he stopped again to have yet another drink. The bottle was empty, and he threw it away in disgust.

Presently he came to a small shack, in which he kept some stores. There was a supply of liquor in the hut, and clumsily Saunders dismounted to get another bottle. He tried to hitch his horse to the rail, but the animal seemed to sense that something was wrong with his master, and with a sudden jerk he tore the reins from Red's hands and trotted off.

Saunders staggered and measured his length on the ground. He struggled to his knees, and then his eyes widened and the hair rose stiffly on his head with terror. Coming towards him stealthily, and only a few yards off, were two Indians, clad in ghost-like white robes, their heads adorned with huge plumes of white feathers.

Foot by foot they approached, and Saunders, gazing stupidly at them, lifted his hands to beg for mercy. The shock of the fall and the sight of the Indians had partially sobered him, though his mind was still in a very bewildered condition.

The ghost-like figures came up, one on each side of the cattleman, and then to his bemused senses they seemed suddenly to disappear, though in reality they had only passed behind him. Then Red Saunders fell forward on his face and lay still.

Five minutes later a tall powerfully-built young man, with a pleasant open face, came riding slowly along towards the shack. He looked up at Fire Mountain once or twice, wondering what the flame and the drumming could mean, for he was from the State of Arizona, and he knew nothing of the legend of Black Eagle and his braves.

The stranger soon came in sight of the hut, and he saw near by a man lying prone on the ground.

"Hey, pal," he cried, reining up, "what's the matter? You ill?"

There was no answer, and as Jack Allen dismounted to see what was wrong a party of cattlemen appeared riding towards him from the shelter of some trees a little way off. Jack did not see them as he stooped by the body of Saunders.

"Good heavens!" cried Jack. "The man's dead."

The cattlemen rode up and gathered round.

"Say, boys," said one, "it's Red Saunders. Someone's plugged him, sure."

"He's been knifed, and from behind," said Jack quietly. "Look here!"

The boys looked, and a clamour of voices arose. There was no question of suspecting Jack Allen, for the cattlemen had seen him slowly approaching in the distance, and knew that he could have had no hand in the death of the unfortunate rancher.

"Say, stranger," asked a cattleman. "You came up the other way. You see anyone down there?"

"I reckoned to see two Indians a little way back," said Jack slowly. "I thought I saw two men with plumes on their heads going up there."

He pointed to the slopes of the mountain, and the cattlemen looked at each other with grave faces.

"You sure of that, stranger?" asked one.

"No, I ain't what you might say sure," replied Jack doubtfully. "I thought I saw 'em for a minute, but it's getting rather dark, and they seemed to vanish all of a sudden. That's all-I can say, boys."

"The ghost Indians again," said a voice solemnly. "I'll say I don't like it, boys."

"It's a mystery to me," said another cattleman. "An' I've heard that this is the very spot where Black Eagle and his braves massacred two families in the year '51."

"Sure, Pete, this is the place," said the first man. "And now the ghost Indians have outed poor Red."

"Ghost Indians!" exclaimed Jack

Allen. "What's this you're saying, boys?"

"You'll sure hear enough of 'em if you stay in this country," said Pete. "I'll tell you there's Indians in white round this Fire Mountain, and we reckon they're rustling our cattle. The ghost Indians, we call 'em, but we ain't caught 'em yet—hardly set eyes on 'em."

Jack Allen was puzzled. He did not believe that the Indians were really the "ghosts" of Black Eagle and his tribe, and yet these tough, virile cowboys certainly seemed to be in a state of panic that no merely human foes could have inspired in them.

The cattlemen lifted the body of Saunders to carry it away, and as they did so a shiver of alarm ran through the crowd. A gust of wind blew down from the mountain, and with it, clear and loud, came the sound of the tom-toms, while high overhead the mysterious flames shone brightly in the gathering darkness.

"The drums of Black Eagle!" muttered Pete. "Say, boys, we'd better leave these parts right now. It ain't healthy here for white men no more!"

Bruce Reed.

DORIS, the daughter of Judge Sheldon, was not enjoying her evening stroll at all. She had walked out from Hamilton alone, but before she had gone far she was joined by Bruce Reed, her father's friend, and a leading rancher in the district. He was driving along in a buggy, but he stopped when he saw the girl.

"Come for a ride, Doris, my dear?" said Bruce, smiling at her pleasantly.

"No, thank you, Bruce," replied Doris coolly. "I'd sooner walk."

Bruce Reed got down to walk at the girl's side. He was a tall, well-set-up fellow, with some pretensions to good looks, but selfishness and brutality were written on his face for those who had eyes to see. Yet he imposed on most people by a well-assumed air of cordiality and good nature, and he was generally popular in the neighbourhood. Judge Sheldon had not yet found him out, but Doris instinctively disliked him, and some inner consciousness warned her that evening to be on her guard.

They walked on together for some distance, Bruce leading his horse and talking gaily. Doris had little to say, and presently declared that she was tired and must go home.

"Don't go just yet," begged Bruce. "Sit down here and rest for a while."

He indicated a wooden seat, and they sat down. They had reached the outskirts of a plantation a mile or more from the town, and a hasty glance around assured the rancher that they were alone.

"Listen to me, Doris," said Bruce Reed eagerly. "You've known me a good time now, and I reckon you ought to be able to guess what I want to say. Only it's so darned difficult to get it out!" he concluded ruefully.

Doris knew what was coming, and she half-rose from the seat to get away, but Bruce pulled her down again at once.

"Say, you must listen, honey—" he began.

"I'm not going to listen," cried Doris firmly. "And you're not to call me 'honey' ever again. I'll tell you right now that I don't want to go out with you any more."

Bruce looked at the girl as though he did not believe his ears. He had felt so sure of her that her decided words amazed him beyond measure.

"Are you—giving me the air?" he muttered, scowling.

"Well, you see, I don't think it's right for a girl to go out walking with a fellow when she doesn't care for him," replied Doris in quiet but decisive tones.

"Oh, indeed!" cried Bruce, his face darkening. "And what may you mean by that? Is there someone else?"

"No, not yet," murmured Doris faintly, for she was becoming alarmed at the vicious expression on the rancher's face.

"Well, whether that's true or not, you're going to belong to me, and you're coming with me right now!" shouted Bruce, seizing the girl fiercely in his arms and trying to lift her up to the seat of the buggy. Doris struggled so frantically that the brutal rancher had great difficulty in holding her.

"Hands off, you cowardly hound—hands off!" she screamed, fighting with the utmost desperation to free herself from his grip.

At that moment Jack Allen rode up, but neither Bruce nor Doris at first observed him. He took one glance at the scene before him, and then threw himself off his horse and ran to the help of the girl. Reed loosed his hold on Doris at the sound of hasty footsteps, and turned to confront a young man who was a complete stranger to him.

"What d'you want here?" howled Bruce angrily. "Get away!"

"The lady said 'Hands off,' I believe," remarked Jack very quietly. "Don't you understand English?"

"Yes, I understand English, and here it is!" shouted the rancher.

A fierce fight to the jaw sent Jack reeling backward. He slipped and fell on the turf, but in an instant he was on his feet again, prepared for a tough fight. The two men were apparently fairly equal in size and strength, and they circled round each other cautiously for a moment or two, each eyeing the other warily.

Then Jack saw the rancher coming at him with a fury that made his face more brutal in appearance than ever. He feinted with his left, and as Reed's arm went up to guard the blow, Jack sent out his right in a powerful drive that took his opponent straight between the eyes and jerked his head back. Swiftly Jack followed with a left to the chin, and Reed went down.

The eyes of Doris Sheldon gleamed as she saw the stranger send the brutal rancher to the earth; but her face lengthened a moment later. Reed did not appear to be much hurt, for he came to his feet again, and with the swiftness of a tiger hurled himself at Jack Allen. For ten seconds the two men swapped heavy blows, and then the young stranger took a tremendous right over the ear.

He staggered back, and fiercely Reed came on to follow up his advantage. He broke through Jack's weakened guard with a shattering blow to the side of the head, and this time it was Jack who went down.

He was up again only just in time to stop Reed's rush with a drive into which he put all he knew. Then for a few minutes the fight was even. Twice Jack put the rancher down, and twice Reed sent his opponent to the grass with hefty blows to the chin.

Both men were breathing heavily, and their faces were badly marked, but neither stopped for a second. Up and down across the turf they raged, each giving and taking heavy punishment, while Doris watched anxiously in alternate hope and fear.

Up to now Bruce Reed had taken all that Jack could give him, and had handed back as good as he got. But at length condition began to tell. The strange youngster from Arizona was fighting fit. Long days in the saddle, strenuous work on many ranches he had visited on his journey from the South, open air and clean living—all these were on his side. Bruce Reed was in fairly good shape, too, but not so tough as his opponent, and a tendency the rancher had for unlimited alcoholic refreshment now began to tell its tale.

Reed's guard weakened, and Jack's right smashed through and found his jaw. He swayed for a second, and then came again with a rush, sweat on his brow, his eyes still gleaming with the light of battle. Two steps forward he took, to run right into another fierce left that cracked home like the blow of a hammer between his eyes.

Jack brought his right over in a tremendous upper-cut that had all the weight of his fourteen stone behind it, and Reed went down, and stayed where he fell. The victor looked at him for a moment as he lay in a crumpled heap on the grass, and then walked across to Doris Sheldon.

"Oh, I'm so glad you came along!" she cried impulsively.

"I thought you needed some help," said Jack in a level voice. "Would you care to have me drive you home, miss?"

"Will you?" replied Doris, looking shyly at the young man.

"Well, I will. I guess, though I reckon I don't look very well for a lady's escort at the moment."

Jack was right, for Reed's fists had left sundry marks upon his face, and one of his eyes was nearly closed.

"Never mind!" cried Doris consolingly. "You saved me from that rotter, and you'll soon be as—as handsome as ever!"

Jack laughed, and hitched his horse to the back of the buggy. He helped the girl to a seat, mounted himself, and drove off just as Bruce Reed staggered to his feet and looked about him in a dazed way. But Doris Sheldon and Jack Allen had no eyes for him.

"You are a stranger here, aren't you?" asked Doris.

"I'm from Arizona," said the young man. "Down there they call me the 'Riding Kid,' but my name's Jack Allen, and you can call me Jack!"

Lightning.
DORIS SHELDON stole a glance at the stalwart youngster who sat by her side. He was good-looking, he could certainly use his fists—had he not just laid out the most redoubtable fighter in Hamilton?—and he had a very good horse. That much was obvious enough. Why he had come from Arizona, and what he meant to do in Nevada, she did not know, but she was sufficiently interested in him to ask for information on these points.

"Are you staying here long?" she asked presently.

"Don't suppose so," replied Jack. "I'm just wandering around seeing the world, you know, miss."

"I'm Doris Sheldon," said the girl. "I thought perhaps you had some special business this way."

"Well, I have, a little," came the reply. "And I reckon I might have a bit more to do here than I expected—now, Doris."

Jack looked so expressively at the girl that she blushed, and hastened to introduce a fresh subject.

"If you're called the Riding Kid, you're fond of horses, sure," she said, "and I guessed perhaps you'd come here for the Endurance Race. It's next Saturday, about two o'clock."

"No, I hadn't heard of it," answered Jack.

"My father is Judge Sheldon, and he hopes to win the race. He's got a very good horse. He's sure crazy about horses," said Doris as they drew up before a large house in the town of Hamilton.

A big, jolly-looking man, with a cigar in his mouth, came out of the door as Jack assisted Doris to get down from the buggy. It was by this time nearly dark, and Judge Sheldon thought for the moment that his daughter was accompanied by his friend, Bruce Reed.

"That you, Bruce?" he said, coming forward. "Why, Doris, my girl, who is this you've brought home? I thought you were with Bruce."

"So I was, dad," replied the girl. "But he—he was very rude to me, and Mr. Allen—Jack, I mean, helped me and brought me home."

"Bruce Reed rude to you?" exclaimed the judge, staring at Doris in bewilderment. "I would never have believed such a thing of him. You can tell me about that presently."

The judge turned to Jack Allen and held out his hand.

"Shake, boy," he said heartily. "Anyone who helps my girl is my friend, sure. I'm certainly obliged to you, Mr.—"

"Jack Allen," the youngster cut in. "But down in Arizona folk call me the Riding Kid, as I've been telling Miss Sheldon."

"The Riding Kid, eh? Fond of horses, ain't you?" asked the judge eagerly, scenting a discussion on his favourite topic.

"You bet I am, judge. Your daughter was beginning to tell me about the Endurance Race just now, and I'd like to hear all about it."

Judge Sheldon signed to the girl to go away, and she tripped into the house with a smile to Jack.

"Now she's gone we can talk," cried the old man. "I reckon you're straight. I can tell by the look of you, and I'll tell you what I haven't told her, though I reckon everybody else in this town knows it. I've staked a lot—too much—on this race, and I've gotta win it, somehow."

"Well, judge, why shouldn't you?" asked Jack. "Dor—Miss Sheldon told me you have a good horse."

"I'll show you the horse," said the judge. "There's just light enough left to see him, I guess."

Judge Sheldon led the way to his stables, and came to the box in which stood the animal which he hoped would save him on the day of the race.

"You're going to see the finest piece of horseflesh you ever saw in your life," said the old man with immense pride. "I'll swear there ain't any such horse in Arizona, or any other place, either. There he is! I call him Lightning, and there ain't a horse to beat him in Hamilton."

Jack looked over the animal with a critical eye, and it showed its teeth and snarled at him as he came near.

"Looks good to me," remarked Jack

"You're no Indian!" cried Doris, raising her hand to strike as the man approached her. "Let me go! I'm going home!"

at length, "but I should say he ain't quite broken in, judge."

"That's the trouble," said the judge regretfully, "but I've got a man who can ride him. In the morning I'll have him out, and you can see how he goes." "Thanks, judge," said Jack. "I must be leaving now, but I'll be around in the morning."

The youngster got his horse and rode away, while Judge Sheldon went in to ask his daughter for the truth about Bruce Reed. To the girl's great indignation, her father would not believe that the rancher had really tried to carry her off, for he wanted her to marry Bruce, and could see no reason why his friend should act in the way that Doris described. So the girl retired that night, far from content, and a little anxious as to what Reed might do the next day.

In the morning Judge Sheldon had the horse, Lightning, brought out to a field behind the house. Bruce Reed came up, as cordial as ever in manner. The cattlemen lounging about looked in surprise at his face, which was adorned with two black eyes and various strips of plaster, but nobody ventured to ask any questions. He greeted the judge with great warmth, but the old man was too much occupied in watching his horse to pay much attention to the rancher.

"Good-morning, Doris," said Bruce to the girl, who was leaning over the rail next to her father. "Has the judge got anyone to ride Lightning yet?"

"I don't want to talk to you!" retorted Doris sharply, and Reed edged away and remained silent, glaring angrily as Jack Allen came up, to be greeted with cordiality by the girl and her father.

Meanwhile, the horse Lightning was plunging and rearing violently in the middle of the field, with two of the judge's men clinging desperately to the reins. One of the men, an individual named Slat, had several times tried to mount him, but so far the horse had had the best of it.

"Anyone ever ridden that horse?" asked Jack of Doris, as he stood by her side.

"Two have tried, Jack," replied the girl. "Slat rode him a little way, and father had hopes that he would manage him."

"How can he expect to win the race on Saturday, if nobody can ride the horse properly?" muttered Jack, as Lightning threw Slat, who had at last managed to mount.

"That fellow Slat!" howled Judge Sheldon in a rage. "He swore he'd break him in and ride him in the race, and he's my best rider. Yesterday I thought he was making it, and now look at him!"

"I'd like to look at Lightning, if I may," said Jack quietly.

"Mean you think you could ride him?" cried the judge.

"I reckon so," replied Jack. "There ain't any horse in Arizona that I can't ride, and we've got some down there worse than Lightning to manage. I guess."

"Well, Jack, I hope you'll make it," said the judge, rather dubiously, calling his men to bring the animal up.

With the greatest difficulty they persuaded Lightning towards the rail. Still snorting with rage and plunging dangerously, he came forward, but it suddenly seemed to occur to him that he was going back to his stable, and for the moment he quietened down.

Jack seized his opportunity, and with a quick leap he bestrode the fiery-tom-pered animal and seated himself firmly in the saddle. Lightning leaped high in the air with indignation, and went off down the field, rearing and bucking furiously to rid himself of the insolent human who had dared to get on his back, and to stay on.

Jack sat tight, and Lightning reared and bucked in vain, for the finest horse-man in Arizona was on his back, and there was no trick of an unbroken animal which he did not know. All down the field went Lightning, but still the Arizona Kid kept the saddle, while Judge Sheldon and his men shouted and cheered frantically as they leaned watching over the rail.

"I hope he breaks his neck," muttered Reed viciously as he watched the successful rider. He noticed Doris cheering and clapping, her face radiant with joy, and jealous rage flamed higher still in his heart.

Meanwhile, the Riding Kid had at last convinced Lightning that he had met his match, and presently he rode the horse back in triumph to the judge. "You'll ride him in the race on Saturday, Jack?" asked the old man.

Jack Allen looked down thoughtfully at the eager faces of the judge and his daughter.

"I sure will, judge!" he said. Bruce Reed heard the answer, and smiled to himself.

"You sure won't," he murmured to himself. "I'll see to that!"

The White Horse.

JACK ALLEN, astride his own horse, rode slowly through the town that evening, and presently he saw Doris Sheldon walking down the street. The girl's face lighted up at the sight of him, and he stopped at once to speak to her.

"Where are you going, Jack?" she asked, when the first greetings were over.

"I thought I'd just take a ride round Fire Mountain this evening."

"Oh," cried Doris in dismay, her face falling at once. "Please don't go there, Jack! Those ghost Indians might get you, like they got Red Saunders."

"Has the sheriff done anything about that yet?" asked Jack.

"I don't know. He's up at dad's place now, I believe, but what can he do? No one in the town dares go near the mountain. And nearly every day someone's stock is rustled."

"I don't believe in this yarn about ghosts," said Jack. "How long has this rustling been going on?"

"Only two or three weeks," replied Doris, "but there certainly are some Indians about, Jack. They've been seen in several places. But it isn't your affair. Your job is to win that race for father."

"Okay, Doris!" cried the Riding Kid heartily. "I'll be around 'bout nine o'clock to-morrow and try out Lightning again. All the same, if I see any of those ghosts this evening, I'll sure find out if they're made of flesh and blood. Good-bye, kid!"

"Do be careful, Jack!" said the girl, with great anxiety in her voice.

"Don't you worry about me," cried Jack, with a laugh. "I'll be okay, dear."

He rode away at that, leaving Doris gazing after him with mingled feelings of anxiety and happiness, for she was already indulging in a delightful vision of herself as Mrs. Jack Allen. Suddenly she saw Bruce Reed some way off along the road, and though he did not see her, the vision faded, and she ran home like a frightened hare.

For an hour or more Jack trotted slowly on towards Fire Mountain, thinking not of the Indians or of the race, but of the pretty face of the judge's daughter. He came presently to a stretch of forest, and as he rode along a grassy glade between the trees he heard in the distance the beat of hoofs.

Instantly Jack pulled into the shelter of a clump of trees and watched for the rider. Nearer and nearer came the sound of swift galloping hoofs, and soon he saw a splendid white horse racing along at full speed. There was no rider on its back, nor had it any saddle, bridle or reins.

"Queer!" muttered Jack. "Reckon I'll see into this."

He shook up his horse and galloped after, but though he bestrode one of the speediest animals he had ever ridden and rode his best, he could not catch the swift white horse. On and on it flew, out of the woods and across the plain, and Jack fell farther and farther behind.

Presently, a mile away, Jack saw a corral in which were a number of horses. The white steed ran up to it and whinnied loudly, nosing at the gate, and the animals inside began to move restlessly. Jack urged on his horse, but he was still a quarter of a mile away when the horses inside the corral, furious with excitement, burst open the gate, and, led by the white horse, raced over the plain towards Fire Mountain.

"Reckon I'll surprise the cattlemen when I tell 'em this," said Jack. "I'll see where he leads 'em if I can, though."

He followed the runaway horses across the plain until the trail led him into the broken slopes at the foot of the mountain. Here and there were clumps of trees, and though Jack little suspected it, he was soon almost within range of a party of men who were ensconced behind some rocks, eagerly watching.

"Here he comes!" cried the leader of the gang, as the white horse galloped into view. "And he's done it again!"

Two figures in Indian costume rose silently as a stream of horses passed the rocks, and followed to secure the animals in the secret hide-out farther on.

Bruce Reed, for the man who had spoken was no other, had ridden straight for Fire Mountain that evening, and so had arrived long before Jack. He now rose to follow the Indians, but another of the gang touched his arm, and he instantly sank down again behind the rock.

Jack came into view a couple of hundred yards away between some trees. He reined up and looked ahead at a gully up which he guessed the horses had gone, and as he did so Reed raised his gun.

"It's that blamed fellow from Arizona," he growled. "I'll plug him, or he'll spill the beans."

Jack moved on slowly just as the rancher fired. He felt the wind of a bullet which passed an inch beside his face, and instantly pulled the head of his horse round and rode off as a second bullet grazed his ear. In another moment he was out of sight, and Bruce turned disgustedly to his companion.

"I pulled a bead dead on him!" he cried angrily.

"You thought you did, boss," sneered the man. "What you going to do now?"

"We'll frame him. The fellow's a stranger here—nobody knows him. I'll frame him right, you'll see."

Jack Allen unconsciously aided the unscrupulous rustler's plans. He lay in hiding a long time, waiting in vain for a sight of the rustlers, and returned to the town very late, too late to see the judge that night.

Bruce Reed was before him in the morning. Very early an angry party of cattlemen assembled at Judge Sheldon's house. The owner of the runaway horses had discovered his loss, and he came to the judge with his friends, raging with anger.

"Guess it's time we took the law in our own hands," he cried.

"Yeah. It's time for the rope and the nearest tree!" shouted another.

The judge himself was furious with rage and despair, for he had just found Lightning lame in his box.

"Something happened to my horse in the night," he stormed. "Some skunk got at him."

"Say, judge, if that ain't too bad," said Bruce, coming up. "Now, boys, listen. I've got a hunch I know who's rustling the stock."

"Who?" yelled a dozen voices.

"I caught that young fellow who says he comes from Arizona driving those horses away last night," stated Bruce impressively.

"Why didn't you plug the skunk, Bruce?" shouted a voice.

"I took a shot, boys, but I'm ashamed to say I missed."

"Just as well, perhaps," said a rancher. "We'll go and bring him in, and the judge can try him proper 'ording to law, and then we'll string him up."

"Where's the fellow now?" asked a cattleman.

"He put up at Granny Wilson's," said Reed. "Get your horses and we'll go fetch him."

Doris Sheldon had stood by while the angry men talked. She knew that Bruce Reed was lying, but she saw that it would be useless to appeal to the enraged cattlemen whom the brutal rancher had so easily convinced. She slipped silently away while the talk was still going on, and ran at top speed over the open ground behind the house towards the road which led to Granny Wilson's.

"I'll save him!" she gasped as she ran. "I'll save him yet!"

In Hiding.

THE little inn where Jack Allen had put up was a couple of miles from the town, and Doris Sheldon's only hope was to meet the Riding Kid on the road before the horsemen came along, for she remembered that he had promised to call at the judge's house about nine o'clock.

She ran swiftly along the road beneath some trees, and in a minute or two a solitary rider came in sight. It was Jack Allen, and the girl rushed up to him in eager haste.

"Quick, Jack, get in amongst the trees!" she gasped. "They're after you!"

"Who's after me, Doris?" asked Jack in amazement, as he drew his horse out of sight of the road into the wood.

"They mean to use the rope!" exclaimed Doris. "You must go away at once!"

"To use the rope?" said Jack slowly. "What do they think I've done?"

"They think you rustled the cattle and those horses last night!"

"Who says so?" demanded Jack angrily. "You don't believe that, Doris, do you?"

"Of course not!" exclaimed the girl indignantly. "But Bruce Reed has convinced them you did it. Save yourself, Jack, quick!"

"Bruce Reed, eh? I'm going back to face that skunk and make him prove it."

"That will never do," cried Doris anxiously. "They'll string you up before you've time to speak. They're mad with rage."

"Well, I'll go, Doris, if you say so," said Jack quietly. "But I'll come back to-night to see you—and thank you!"

"Okay!" cried Doris. "Only be very careful. I'll meet you down by the river crossing if I can. I'll whistle, and you wait for my signal. Now go at once."

Jack rode off hurriedly through the wood just in time. A moment later Doris, cowering behind a fallen tree, saw a crowd of ranchers go at full gallop down the road towards the inn, where their search, of course, was in vain. All that day they hunted the district for Jack, but failed to find any trace of him, and Reed went off to his hide-out on Fire Mountain that evening in a very angry mood.

Meanwhile Jack had ridden rapidly away across the plain, and on nearing the mountain he happened to pass the spot where he had first seen the white horse. To his astonishment the animal was there again, but this time standing quietly under a tree. Jack dismounted as soon as he saw it, tethered his own horse to a branch, and crept up quietly, taking a spare bridle with him.

Jack knew that if he scared the white horse it would be off and away in a second. It eyed him uneasily as he came up, but he talked to it gently and caressed it, and soon he was on its back, trotting down the glade. Presently he urged it to a gallop at full speed, and as he turned and sped back to the wood he knew that under him was the swiftest horse he had ever ridden in his long experience of all sorts of steeds.

"Now for a real good hide-out," muttered Jack. "Reckon I'll try the river bank amongst the willows."

After some searching he found a thick clump of willows beyond some marshy ground by the river's edge, and there he took the two horses and lay hidden all day.

Doris Sheldon passed the day in alternate hope and fear, afraid at times that "Here we are!" cried the rancher with the ear-phones. "They've done twelve miles! Only two left in the race! Bruce Reed and Jack Allen. All the others are out of it."

Jack would be brought back a captive, hopeful as the hours passed that he had got clear away. When evening came she mounted her pony and rode off towards the river. Fire gleamed at times on the summit of Fire Mountain, and the girl shuddered with fear whenever she glanced that way. But she went on, all the same.

She rode cautiously along the bank of the stream for some miles until she came to the crossing, a shallow place where the river was usually fordable. Here she stopped and surveyed the ground very carefully. She did not think that anyone suspected her of having arranged a meeting with Jack, but it was as well to make sure. No one was in sight, so the girl whistled softly.

There was a movement among some trees nearby, and she caught sight of Jack, who signed to her to come forward. She followed him for some distance, and dismounted when at length they had reached Jack's hiding-place amongst the willows.

"I'm sure glad you're here, Doris," exclaimed Jack.

"I'm glad to be here to see you, Jack," said the girl softly, "but I'm always frightened when I get near that horrid mountain."

"Nothing there to be frightened about," replied Jack, laughing. "Forget that yarn of the ghosts, kid. Tell me where that dirty skunk Reed is now."

"Still looking for you, I think," came the reply. "He went off this morning and he hasn't been back in the town all day. Don't let him catch you, Jack!"

"Not I," laughed Jack. "I reckon to take him to the gaol to-morrow. You see, I've found out one or two things about him, and I guess I'm finding more!"

"Oh, Jack," cried Doris, "what do you mean?"

"You'll see—to-morrow," said Jack. "I told you I had a little business this way. Show your father that, and he'll understand."

He handed the girl a small metal disc, at which she gazed in surprise.

"You needn't have hidden at all, then, Jack," she cried. "But I wanted to tell you something. That race to-morrow. It's awful for dad. Someone got at Lightning during the night, and he can't run. He's lame!"

"That's too bad," said Jack. "But I've a surprise for you, dear. Your dad may win the race, after all. Come and see what I've got."

He led the girl a little farther among the trees, and she saw Jack's own horse and also a splendid white stallion she had never seen before. Doris Sheldon was a good judge of horseflesh, and her eyes brightened as she looked over the strange horse.

"He's sure the real goods," she exclaimed. "Is he yours, Jack?"

"Well, I found him," said Jack slowly, "and if you reckon findings are keepings, he's sure enough mine. And I'll tell you, kid, that horse is not lightning—he's faster than anything I know—he's greased lightning. I'll ride him in the race to-morrow, and he'll win and save your dad. So that's okay."

As Jack spoke a drumming sound, far off and faint, but yet distinct, came to their ears, and Doris shuddered in alarm.

"Those dreadful tom-toms!" she whispered. "Jack, I'm afraid!"

"Don't be afraid, Doris," cried Jack confidently. "In a few hours you'll have no reason to fear anything. I'm on the track of that drumming, too, and I reckon to find what it is to-morrow."

August 8th, 1921.

"Looks like your having a busy day," smiled Doris. "I'd better get back now before dad misses me."

"You'll see me to-morrow," cried Jack, as the girl rode away. "You'll see me down at the starting-post—an' the white horse, too!"

Judge Sheldon Disappears.

BRUCE REED called at the judge's house late that evening to report his lack of success in the hunt for Jack Allen, and to find out whether there was any chance of the horse Lightning running in the race. Reed had been fuming with rage all day, for not only had Jack given him the slip, but the white stallion was nowhere to be found, and the wily rancher had reckoned on winning the Endurance Race very easily with him.

Still, reflected Bruce as he walked up to the judge's house, he had another horse which could beat anything in the race except Lightning, and Lightning was probably out of it. One of his gang had seen to that.

"I'll win in spite of all," muttered Reed, "and then I'll make my own terms with Sheldon—and I'll have Doris!"

Judge Sheldon was in no good humour when Bruce came in. Lightning had failed him, Jack Allen, whom he really liked, was accused of rustling and had vanished, while Doris had gone out and had not yet returned.

"You ought to call that bet off," he growled. "My horse can't run."

"I'm real sorry, judge," said Bruce; "but—a bet's a bet. It's just your bad luck, that's all one can say."

Doris came in just then, and the rancher soon went away, for it was not his intention to approach the girl again until after the race.

"We'll see what she says when the old man has lost everything to me to-morrow," he chuckled as he turned the corner of the building. Then a thought struck him. He went no farther, but crept quietly back to the door of the house and listened.

Doris and her father were talking in the front room, and Bruce Reed could hear something of the conversation.

"Yes, dad, and he gave me this to show you," the cunning rancher heard the girl say. He could not see what it was that Doris showed her father, and he listened, eagerly for the old man's reply.

"A deputy-marshal's badge, eh?" said Judge Sheldon. "He knows more about this cattle rustling than he calculates to tell us, I reckon."

"Yes, dad. And he's got a wonderful white horse. It's better than Lightning, he says."

"That I can't believe," averred the judge. "Where is Allen now? We must get him back. That tale of Bruce's about him can't be true."

Doris did not know that Bruce was straining his ears to catch every word, but some instinct of caution made her whisper her reply into her father's ear. "He's down in the willows by the river."

Bruce Reed could not hear the words, and he ground his teeth with rage. He listened a moment longer, but in vain, for Doris began to talk of other things. The rancher stole away disappointed. He had heard something, but not enough.

"I've sure gotta be careful," he muttered as he went off to find his gang. Presently he was talking angrily to his right-hand man, a certain Bill Haines, who was outwardly a respectable citizen, and yet, in secret, one of the rustlers.

"That guy Allen has got my white horse," snarled Bruce.

"Your horse!" sneered Bill. "The horse you rustled out of Montana, you mean."

"Well, Allen's got him now, the girl said, and she told the old man where he is, only I couldn't hear the words, darn it! We've gotta get hold of the judge and make him talk. I must have Starlight back—may need him to make a get-away."

"Make a get-away to-night if you're turning yellow," said Bill. "I thought you were riding to-morrow."

"Sure I am, but I want Starlight for the race. Fetch up a couple of the boys, and wait your chance to get the judge in the morning. It's too late to-night."

Bill Haines nodded in comprehension, and the rustlers parted for the night.

The morning of the endurance race dawned clear and fine, but Judge Sheldon got up in the lowest possible spirits. Though Doris had told him that Jack meant to ride the white horse, he did not feel that there was any hope of victory, and he was afraid that this day would see his ruin.

"Cheer up, dad!" cried Doris happily. "Jack's going to win."

"Not on my horse, though," growled the judge.

"You go out in the garden and sit down while I get the breakfast, dad," said Doris, and the old man went out, sat down in a chair and gave himself up to bitter regrets for his foolish bet with Bruce Reed.

Two faces peered cautiously out from the shelter of some bushes behind the judge. Two men garbed in Indian costume, seeing that the coast was clear, crept stealthily across to Judge Sheldon inch by inch. They were within a yard of the chair before the judge seemed suddenly to sense their presence, and he turned quickly to see their fierce faces close to his.

With the speed of light one of the men deftly slipped a sack over the old man's head, while the other secured his arms with a rope. In a couple of minutes Judge Sheldon was helpless in the hands of the intruders, who carried him away to their horses hidden amongst the trees behind the house, and made off with him at a gallop.

"Dad! Dad!" called Doris, a couple of minutes later. "Breakfast is ready."

There was no reply, and the girl came out, thinking that her father might have dozed off to sleep. To her great surprise he was not to be seen.

She looked round the garden in vain, and then went to the stables. He was not there, and though she knew that he could not have re-entered the house without her knowledge, she searched there, too. Her father was not to be found. He seemed to have disappeared without leaving a trace.

Threatened with Torture.

DORIS SHELDON was distracted with grief, at the unaccountable disappearance of her father. Her first thought was to rush for help to Jack Allen, but he was miles away, and it was almost with relief that she saw Bruce Reed walk up. Even he was better than no one at all.

"Bruce, have you seen my father?" she cried anxiously.

"No, Doris, I ain't seen him this morning," said the rancher, assuming a look of surprise.

"He's missing. I can't find him anywhere," exclaimed the girl.

"You don't say!" remarked Bruce, rejoicing inwardly that his scheme to kidnap the judge had apparently succeeded. "I'll keep round here and search the grounds."

Reed went off ostensibly to look for Judge Sheldon, and as he went he chuckled to himself. He had hardly expected Bill Haines to manage the affair so early, and he hoped that the gang would soon report to him that the judge had revealed the hiding-place of the white horse. Suddenly another scheme came into his mind. If the father could be kidnapped, why not the daughter? If the old man would not tell, the girl might.

He came back to tell Doris that he could not find the judge, and then he made his way into the town to see one of his men, in order to devise some means of entrapping the girl.

An hour later Doris Sheldon stood despondently in front of the house, looking anxiously down the road. All search for her father had so far been in vain, though the judge's men had scoured the town and its neighbourhood with the greatest eagerness.

Soft footsteps sounded behind the girl, and she turned, hoping that someone had come with good news. An Indian, with a huge plume of feathers on his head and his face decorated with bars of paint, stood behind her, holding out a note. Doris shrieked with alarm at the unexpected sight, but after a moment she took the note from the man's hand and opened it.

"Your father is in danger. Come at once. Follow the guide," she read.

"Oh, where is he?" she cried frantically to the Indian, who stood stolidly watching her.

"Come," he said slowly. "He's up there," pointing to Fire Mountain as he spoke. "You come; you save him."

"I'll go and get my horse," cried Doris, too frantic with anxiety to suspect that possibly the note might be merely a ruse to entrap her, too.

"Horse round here, you follow," said the man, turning.

Doris followed him round the side of the house, where she saw two horses. The Indian mounted one and Doris the other, and as they rode off at full speed Bruce Reed stepped out from the shelter of a wall and watched them go. An evil smile curled his cruel lips, but Doris did not look back, for in her eager anxiety to find her father she had forgotten Reed's very existence.

Straight towards Fire Mountain rode the Indian with Doris at his side. A few miles out of the town two more men dressed in Indian attire joined them, and Doris gazed at the newcomers suspiciously. They were dressed as Indians certainly, but their faces were white, and the girl suddenly drew rein.

"I'm not going any farther with you!" she cried. "I believe you're the men who have been masquerading as ghost Indians. I'm going back!"

The men pulled up and looked stolidly at Doris. One of them dismounted and came to her side,

"You no afraid?" he asked. "We no hurt paleface girl."

"You're no Indian!" exclaimed Doris, raising her hand to strike as the man approached her. "Let me go. I'm going home."

"You come with us to mountain," said the man earnestly. "Your father there. He want you."

"Is that true?" asked the girl, hesitating as she looked from one to the other and reflecting that she was quite helpless. All three of the men were armed, and their horses were better than the animal she was riding. Escape seemed to be impossible.

"That quite true," came the reply. "He up there. Want you."

Doris Sheldon looked helplessly around. They were halfway to Fire Mountain, and the plain seemed to be deserted. No human being was in sight, and in the end the girl shrugged her shoulders and went on, with fear growing in her heart as they neared the slopes of the ominous peak where Black Eagle lay buried.

If Jack had looked back as they crossed an open glade she would have taken heart. For a couple of miles away, on the top of a hill, a horseman had appeared at the edge of a wood. He was mounted on a big white horse, and when he observed the little party of riders in the distance he went back again at once among the trees.

Jack Allen had left his hiding-place in the willows that morning, and had ridden around the country for some miles in order to give the white horse some exercise. He rode with great caution, surveying the ground carefully, and keeping as much as might he under cover. By the merest chance he happened to catch a glimpse of the horsemen in the distance, and as he watched them from the shelter of the trees he felt sure that there was a girl among them.

"That may be Doris," he muttered to himself. "I'm going to see, anyway."

He rode on cautiously after the party, taking advantage of every clump of trees and every bit of rising ground. The Indians looked back once or twice, but they did not see Jack, and as they approached the gully which led to their hide-out they had no idea that the Riding Kid was little more than half a mile behind.

"Where's my father? Are you taking me to him?" demanded Doris as they came in sight of the rocky entrance to the gully.

"He up there," said one of her companions, pointing towards the summit of the mountain. "Not far now."

Doris Sheldon thought that the man was very probably lying, but in reality he had spoken the exact truth. The judge was "up there." He had been taken by his captors towards the mountain, and though they had removed the sack from his head before going very far, they had bandaged his eyes before they came to the gully, so that the old man had no idea of the secret trail up Fire Mountain.

Presently he was lifted off the horse and tied securely to a pinnacle of rock. The bandage was removed from his eyes, and the judge saw that he was in a circular depression high on the mountain, probably an old crater of the extinct volcano. Round him stood several men dressed as Indians, their heads crowned with plumes of feathers, and their faces decorated with war-paint.

The fight that followed was short and sharp . . .

"You tell chief where is white horse that runs fast," said the leader, thrusting his evil-looking face close to the judge.

"I don't know where he is," replied Judge Sheldon calmly. He had had a spasm of fear at the sight of the Indians, but as soon as their chief spoke the old man's courage returned. These were no ghosts. They were living men, and of them at least he had no fear.

"You lie," said the chief. "You know where white horse is."

"I tell you I don't know," came the reply firmly.

"You tell chief, or—"

"You rat, you!" burst out the judge furiously. "Let me go at once! Every one of you will be strung up for this!"

"Tell chief where horse is," said the Indian in a monotonous, whining voice. "No!" roared the judge furiously.

The chief stepped back, glaring furiously at the old man. Then he turned to his followers, who stood silently behind him, watching the scene with impassive eyes.

"Bring fire!" he said.

Two of the men turned and went away quietly to a small shack not far off. The chief looked again at Judge Sheldon.

"I go for little while," he snarled. "When I come back, you tell chief—or you die!"

Jack to the Rescue.

JACK ALLEN rode on after the horse-men, and at length he neared the spot where he had so nearly been "plugged" by Bruce Reed. So far he was sure that he had not been observed by the men he had followed, but he had now come to the last patch of woodland which could shelter him, and he reined up there to survey the ground before he went on.

The Indians had stopped just before reaching the gully, and Jack, peering out through the branches, saw to his indignation that they were bandaging the eyes of a white girl who accompanied them.

"The skunks!" he muttered. "I reckon it is Doris they've got!"

He raised his gun to fire, but lowered it again slowly as a thought crossed his mind.

"I could plug those guys easy," he growled to himself, "but I reckon I'd do better to follow 'em up to their hide-out."

The Indians were very busy about their horses, and as Jack watched he saw that they were tying-sacking to the feet of the animals.

"Hi!" muttered Jack. "That's the big idea, is it? They don't aim to leave a trail!"

The party moved on, and Jack noticed that one man did not mount, but led his horse to the gully, up which he and the others were soon out of sight.

"Leaving one on guard, maybe," thought Jack, still lying low. Sure enough, a few minutes later a solitary figure appeared high on a rock above the gully, and stood there, evidently watching the country around. Except for the trees among which Jack lay, the slopes of the mountain were clear for a long distance, and anyone approaching across the plain could be seen long before he reached the gully.

"Too late!" laughed Jack to himself. "You ought to have looked back before I got here!"

He tethered the white horse securely, and began to crawl cautiously towards the man on guard, keeping well down among the scattered rocks as he went. The Indian was surveying the plain with a careless eye, little suspecting that an enemy was so near. Still, whenever he turned Jack's way, the Riding Kid lay flat without a movement.

Little by little Jack drew near to the sentry, and at last he began to worm his way up the steep rock. Near the top his foot displaced a stone, which rolled noisily down the slope, and the Indian turned quickly at the sound.

"Put 'em up!" he yelled, reaching for his gun.

Jack Allen did not put 'em up. He sprang with a tiger-like leap upon the Indian and brought him to the ground. In a few seconds the man was bound, and then Jack hoisted him on his shoulder. With some difficulty he carried his captive back to the trees where Starlight stood.

"Now," remarked Jack coolly, "you show me the way to your hide-out, see?"

The man shook his head, but did not speak. Jack ripped the feathers from his head with a sudden movement, and then laughed heartily.

"Some Indian!" he cried. "Now, you yellow rat, you'll show me the way up, or you'll stop 'ere, filled with lead. Get that! I mean business!"

The rustler felt the barrel of a gun prodding suggestively in his back, and he found his voice.

"Take that gun away," he whined, "an' I'll show you."

"Okay," said Jack; "but I'm watching out, and if you try to double-cross me—" The Riding Kid did not finish the sentence, save for another significant prod with his gun, and the rustler, trembling with abject fear, pointed up the gully.

"Up there," he muttered. "I'll show you right. I hate that skunk Bruce Reed, anyhow."

Through the gully he led Jack, and along a rocky path beyond, always towards the summit of the mountain. At length they reached a narrow passage on the right, between steep rocks, a passage that Jack might have missed had he been alone, for it appeared at a casual glance to have no outlet. Turning up this, the rustler showed Jack that the passage took a sharp right-angled twist a little way up, and that the track then led on over steep slopes towards the top.

"How far now?" whispered Jack. "Just beyond that big rock," replied the rustler in the same tone.

"Okay!" said Jack. "I'll leave you here, then."

He tied the fellow up again, and gagged him tightly. Then, leading the white horse up the slope, he made his way cautiously to the big rock. Here he hitched Starlight to a projecting point of the rock, and peered round. A man stood there, his back turned to Jack. He was evidently intent on watching something that was going on in the depression just beneath.

The Riding Kid wasted no time. With one swift leap he bore the unsuspecting rustler to the ground, and so heavily did the man go down that there was no need to tie him up. His head had struck the stones, and he lay unconscious. Jack left him there and went on. He caught a glimpse of a group of men some distance below, and guessed that the judge and Doris were among them as prisoners.

A little while before Jack reached the crest, the chief had returned to try once more to make the judge speak.

"You tell chief where white horse is, or I bring fire," he whined.

"Do what you like, you dirty Indian rat!" shouted Judge Sheldon fiercely.

The chief turned and signed to one of his men, who came up bringing a steel-pointed arrow—and the steel was glowing with heat.

"I give you one more chance. Now you tell."

The judge turned pale, but kept his lips obstinately closed. The chief took the arrow and drew near.

Suddenly there came the sound of hurried footsteps, and Doris Sheldon came running up, followed by the three men who had brought her up Fire Mountain. They had taken the bandage off her eyes on reaching the hide-out, and to her horror she saw that her father was indeed in great danger.

"Oh, dad!" she gasped. "What are these wretches doing to you?"

Every trace of colour drained from the judge's face as he saw his daughter in the power of the fierce and cruel men who had seized him.

"Good heavens, girl!" he exclaimed in despair. "How did you get here?"

"Judge won't tell where is white horse," said the chief to Doris. "So —"

He stepped forward with the glowing arrow, but the girl threw herself in front of her father with a shriek of terror.

"Oh, no, no, no!" she screamed in anguish, "I'll tell!"

The chief lowered the arrow, looking at the girl; but Judge Sheldon's indomitable spirit rose again at her words.

"No, Doris," he cried, "you'll tell these skunks nothing!"

Doris Sheldon opened her lips to speak in spite of her father's words, but at that same moment a dark, lithe figure dropped from the rocks above right on to the chief's head, bearing him to the ground.

A series of fearsome howls arose from the would-be torturer.

"That's the hot arrow, I guess," remarked Jack Allen calmly, covering the chief's followers with his gun. "He's sitting on it."

He was, but the onlookers did not pity him.

Doris cut her father's bonds with a knife which Jack tossed to her, and the Riding Kid slipped another gun to the judge, who held up the rustlers, while Jack yanked the chief to his feet.

"Reckon I came just in time, judge," he said. "Say, d'you know who this is?"

With a swift movement Jack pulled the feathers from the chief's head.

"This is your foreman, Bill Haines," he added, as Judge Sheldon gazed in astonishment at the man.

"You rat! You rotten skunk!" howled the judge. "I'll see you pay for this!"

"Say, judge," drawled Jack. "I reckon I've cleaned out the whole bunch of these rustlers bar one, and I'm going to get him presently."

"Who?" asked the judge.

"Bruce Reed," came the sharp reply. "But I'll tie up this crowd first. Keep 'em covered, judge, and I'll get some rope. There's two or three more lying about somewhere. I outed 'em, but we'd better make sure."

Jack found ropes in the shack, and in a few minutes all the rustlers were securely tied up and helpless to move.

"There ain't an Indian among 'em," said Jack. "They're all whites. This was some scheme, I will say. Fire on mountain—there's the remains of the last bonfire over there—tom-toms at night—vanishing Indians. Our friend Bruce Reed has some slick ideas, sure!"

(Continued on page 26.)

HOOT GIBSON.
The popular Universal Western star.

"THE KID FROM ARIZONA."

(Continued from page 24.)

"Well," said the judge. "I owe you more than I can ever repay, Jack—marshal, I should say."

"I wouldn't say that, judge," replied Jack slowly, glancing at Doris, who blushed and began to take a great interest in the scenery.

"How did you get on the track of this gang?" asked Judge Sheldon.

"Well, I was on a jaunt from Arizona, just looking around," said the Riding Kid. "and I happen to know the marshal of this county. He told me some rustlers were hanging around here, and he made me his deputy to round 'em up if I could."

"You've sure rounded 'em up okay!" remarked the judge, surveying the prostrate rustlers with a grin. "We'll go back and send a posse to gather 'em in."

"I'm sorry to interrupt a judge and a deputy-marshal," cried Doris suddenly, "but have you forgotten that the Endurance Race starts in an hour's time?"

Greased Lightning!

ON a little wooden platform just outside the town a group of excited ranchers stood that afternoon, waiting for the Endurance Race to start. The horsemen had assembled, and the starter, a cattleman named Pete Collins, began to call over the names. One by one the riders answered.

"Judge Sheldon's Lightning, rider, Jack Allen," cried Pete.

There was no reply, and Bruce Reed, hiding a grin, turned to Collins with a question.

"How long before we start?"

"About five minutes," said Pete. "Get into line now."

Bruce Reed had waited all the morning, hoping that his gang would discover from Judge Sheldon or from Doris where the white horse was. No news came, and Reed did not dare to leave the town himself to find out what had happened. At last he came down to the starting-point on a big black horse, a very good animal, though not the equal of the white stallion.

"Two minutes!" cried Pete Collins.

"Here's the judge!" yelled a score of voices as Judge Sheldon and Doris came riding up.

"I'm a little late, boys," said the judge coolly, as he mounted the platform, "but don't scratch my entry. I'd like to make a slight change in my horse's name."

He stooped, picked up a bit of chalk, and wrote the word "Greased" in front of "Lightning" on the board where the entries were written up.

"Where's the horse?" said Pete. "It's time, judge. I can't wait."

"Horse will be here in time," replied Judge Sheldon calmly. "Go ahead, Pete."

"Get ready there!" shouted the starter. "Don't crowd. Take your time!"

Bruce Reed could hardly believe his eyes as the judge and his daughter came up. Something had obviously gone wrong with his scheme, but he had no time to think about it. The starter's gun barked, and they were off, just as Jack Allen on a great white horse swept in at August 8th, 1931.

the rear of the field and took up the race with the others.

"That's okay," said the judge to Doris. "Reed ain't seen him yet."

"That sure was a cute idea of Jack's to come up at the last second so that Reed couldn't challenge him about the horse!" cried Doris jubilantly.

Bruce Reed had got away first, and Jack lay well back, saving Starlight's speed for a later period of the race. The Endurance Race was a stern test, over fifteen miles of country, much of the course being very rough ground indeed, and the white horse had already travelled many miles that day.

Over a level stretch of plain they flew, and then up a short, steep hill. The field had begun to string out, but still Jack made no effort to force his way forward, though Reed was gaining slowly all the time.

Arrangements had been made for a broadcast of the race, and observers, stationed at intervals on the course, reported the progress of the riders from time to time. One of the ranchers put on ear-phones and called out the news to the eager crowd.

"They're crossing the swamp now," he said after a while. "Reed is still leading. Two horses stuck in the mud."

"Which?" gasped Doris eagerly. "Says he can't quite make out. Allen's through, lying 'bout sixth. They going up Stony Hill now. He can't see any more. Must wait for the next to take up."

There was a pause for some minutes, and then the rancher went on again.

"Coming down the other side of Stony Hill. What's that? One of 'em down? Hideaway's down, he says. Put his foot in a hole. Your horse is okay, judge. Allen swerved away just in time, or he'd have gone over, too. That's all from him."

Doris held her breath with anxiety as the news came through, but the judge took out a note-book and began to take bets, to his daughter's horror.

"Here we are!" cried the rancher. "They've done twelve miles. Great Jupiter! Only two left in the race! Bruce Reed and Jack Allen. All the others are out of it!"

Bruce Reed had ridden a very good race. He had kept the lead throughout, and as he had never once looked back, he was still unaware that the horse Starlight was behind him. As they entered the straight run for the last mile, Reed observed that apparently only one of his rivals remained in the race, for he could hear but one horse galloping behind. He turned at last to look.

The wily rancher nearly lost his seat as he saw the great white horse thundering on his track, some thirty yards away, with Jack Allen, his face grim and set, in the saddle. Reed recovered himself with a great effort, and spurred desperately on. The black horse, exhausted as it was, responded nobly, and for another half-mile held its own.

"Here they come!" yelled the crowd, as in the distance the two riders appeared. Bruce Reed's mount was "all out," and the rancher was riding for all he was worth. A length behind came Greased Lightning, with Jack sitting calmly in the saddle, quirt and spurs unused. There were four hundred yards to go when the Riding Kid shook up the reins, and the white stallion replied with a burst of speed that took him to the front in a few strides.

Amidst frantic cheering Jack swept past the winning-post ten lengths ahead, instantly reined up, to dismount and toss the reins to the judge. Then he turned to wait for his rival.

"That ain't your horse!" cried Reed, as he dismounted. "It's mine. You stole it!"

"Ever hear of the Coyote Ranch in Montana?" Jack cut in. "You rustled him from there, you skunk, and he's going back to his owner soon."

"Who do you think you are?" howled Reed. "Seize him, boys! He's been rustling our cattle, as I told you!"

The boys looked stonily at Reed, for they had heard enough from the judge to know that the rancher was lying.

"I'm the deputy-marshal," said Jack coolly, "and I'm taking you to the county gaol right now for rustling cattle and horses and kidnapping Judge Sheldon and daughter. Got that?"

"You liar!" shouted Reed, springing fiercely at Jack.

The fight that followed was short and sharp, for though Reed, in his fury, tried foul means, once endeavouring to kick his opponent in the face, in three minutes Jack had knocked him out.

"And here's your precious gang," cried the Riding Kid, as a posse of armed men led by the sheriff came up with the "ghost Indians," feathers and all complete. "The vanishing Yumas, boys! Look at 'em!"

"What d'you mean?" gasped Reed, staggering to his feet. "They ain't my men."

"He's lying, marshal!" exclaimed Bill Haines, as a rancher, none too gently, pushed him in front of Jack. The rascally foreman, who had posed as an Indian chief, stumbled and went down on one knee as he glared at Reed. Then he spoke again.

"He put us up to this, and he got me to take you off, judge."

"That guy plugged a man the other day!" yelled Reed. "He's lying!"

"You dirty double-crosser!" cried Haines. "I saw you knife Red Saunders in the back, and you don't put that on me!"

"Nice little bunch, ain't they?" said the judge disgustedly.

"That's enough!" cried Jack. "Take 'em off, boys!"

The boys obeyed with immense alacrity, and that night the county gaol housed the whole gang of the rustlers who had troubled Hamilton so long.

"An' now," said the judge, as he turned to Doris and Jack, who stood talking by Starlight's side, "I'm going home. I reckon—you'll come presently; eh, girl?"

The old man smiled knowingly, but Doris was too happy to mind, and in another moment she and Jack were alone.

"As I'm the Riding Kid, Doris, I s'pose I must ride—back to Arizona!" said Jack slowly.

"Oh, Jack!" cried Doris reproachfully. "You mustn't go yet."

"Yes, I must, honey," replied Jack. "But I reckon to take someone with me back there—a lady called Mrs. Jack Allen—and that's you! Will you come, kid?"

"Sure I will—marshal!" laughed Doris happily, as Jack swept her eagerly into his arms. "Sure! I'll go anywhere, so long as I'm with you!"

(By permission of the W. & F. Film Service, Ltd., starring Jack Perrin and Josephine Hill.)

"LES AMOURS DE MINUIT."

(Continued from page 16.)

They went out, too happy to speak. They reached the street and were moving away towards the railway when a shadowy form emerged from under a dark entrance. It was Gaston Lajoie. He thrust his pistol against Marcel's face.

"Not so fast," he sneered. "Give me that money, or—"

Two large men sprang upon the convict from out of the night. One seized him from behind; the other fondly believed he had fixed handcuffs about Gaston's wrists. A frightful struggle ensued in which all three fought like madmen.

"Run, Marcel, run!" screamed Georgette, seeing that Gaston had briefly torn himself out of the clutches of the police. "For the love of heaven, run!"

Marcel caught at her arm and together they raced down the street. Shouts followed them. Marcel heard a kind of whirring noise and Georgette uttered a little groaning cry.

"You are hurt?" he asked, his heart almost stopping.

"No—!" She clung to him as they went on. "I— Do not stop to talk!"

They came to a corner and Georgette stumbled, only to recover herself on the instant. The huge, ugly shape of the terminus loomed vaguely through the coming dawn.

"Go first," murmured Georgette. "Get the tickets—no time to lose!"

"But you, beloved?"

"I—follow. Go, go!" She dropped his arm. "Listen, the clock is going to strike the hour. The train leaves—at a minute past—"

They were almost in the station. Marcel ran to the ticket office, seeing that the booking clerk was about to shut down the little window.

"Two singles, second class—Paris!" he gasped.

"Be very quick, m'sieur." The clerk took the notes and thrust forth the tickets and change.

Marcel glanced round for Georgette, but could not see her. "She has gone on to the platform," he told himself as he raced through the booking hall. The ticket inspector was just closing the iron gates as Marcel ran to him.

"There is a lady with me—" He waved the tickets. "She has gone through?"

The man shrugged. "Many ladies have gone through," he answered. "You have two tickets, m'sieur? Go forward and see if she is on board. The whistle has gone."

Marcel ran alongside the train. Panic was seizing him. He had lost her; he should not have left her for a moment. Then came swift hope; she must be in the train. He stared up frantically at the high windows, trying to find Georgette's amongst the faces that he glimpsed in a kind of blur.

The train began to move. He ran back to the gates. No sign of her. He rushed to the train and leapt on to the footboard of the last carriage. A guard dragged him aboard, swearing and scolding.

As the train loudly panted its way out from Marseilles, gathering momentum, she appeared—the Georgette he had left behind him. Her feet faltered, her eyes were hopeless; the hand she had briefly put to her breast was stained with blood as she gripped the bars of the closed gate.

Slowly, with sobbing breaths, she sank down upon her knees.

Marcel was at his desk. He had been able to return the stolen notes to the safe; no one had missed them. He sat there working mechanically at his dull daily round of duty.

"Why do you return so soon. Du-four?" asked his chief, coming upon him after his late lunch. "We did not expect you until to-morrow."

"I wanted to get back."

"It is agreeable to find one so diligent," smiled the chief. "I hope you enjoyed the little holiday? It must still count as two days, although you have returned." He had an early copy of "Le Soir" in his hand. "Where did you go?"

"To Marseilles."

"You must have been travelling nearly all the time," cried the chief clerk, smiling still more widely. "What a fellow you are! Did you encounter Gaston, by any chance? Gaston Lajoie, the murderer?"

Marcel felt his heart drain dry. He made no answer as the chief slapped the paper down on his desk.

"Do not stare, my boy! It is all right; Gaston is finished—he killed himself dead at the arrest, having first shot his wife—"

The solid floor of the bank seemed to rock beneath Marcel. He got up from his seat, trembling as with an ague.

"Excuse me, sir—I am not well. I—" He stumbled to the counter, pushed open the swing door and blindly ran out of the building.

"It is train sickness," murmured his chief. "He will recover in the fresh air."

Almost blindly Marcel ran to the southern terminus, bareheaded, distraught, talking to himself as he ran. There was a train leaving almost at once for Marseilles, and with his last few notes—the poor savings which he had added to his theft, he bought a ticket and staggered into the train. There he sat, hunched up in a third-class compartment, faint with misery and remorse.

If only he had not left her! He found Georgette at the city hospital. Fanny was with her, and he was allowed to tiptoe into the ward. He saw, with a sob of relief, that there was no screen as yet about the bed on which Georgette was lying, still and white as the sheets, her brown eyes closed in a kind of peace.

"Not closed for ever—" Marcel heard himself praying. "Dear Lord, grant that she may open them for me—I love her so very much!"

Fanny made signs for him to kneel by the bed.

"I am glad you have come," she whispered. "Perhaps, now, she will live."

Marcel took one of Georgette's cold hands in his, caressing it with his lips. As she felt the touch, slowly her eyes opened. She met his ardent, beseeching gaze with the ghost of a smile.

"It is you, Marcel?" she breathed. "Hold me tight; keep me from leaving you."

"Never will I let you go, Georgette. Never, never!"

She moved herself a little nearer to him. "Then I am safe—" she told him gently. "Happy once more—As when I first see you, Marcel."

"Now she will live," spoke the little Fanny, kneeling also by the bed. "Me, I know it. It makes me cry for joy!"

(By special permission of Les Etablissements Braunberger Richebe, featuring Pierre Batcheff as Marcel, Jacques Varennes as Gaston, and Danielle Parola as Georgette.)

FILM NOVELS YOU SHOULD NOT MISS!

"WHAT WIVES DON'T WANT."

A rollicking comedy of a husband who thought a kiss was a sin, an embrace a crime, and the confusion that resulted when several people tried to change his outlook on life.

"LE MILLION."

The diverting story of an adventurous day in the life of a young artist, who wins a big prize in a lottery—and loses the ticket.

"RAIN OR SHINE."

A fight against crooks and terrible weather to keep a circus alive, climaxing in a fierce fire that showed the girl owner the worth of the man she had once sacked. Starring Joe Cook and Mary Peers.

Jean Arthur and Elliot Nugent in "WHAT WIVES DON'T WANT."

All these splendid film stories are complete in this week's issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY.

PRICE 2d.
August 8th, 1931.

"THE CODE OF HONOUR."

(Continued from page 8.)

down, for, strong men as they both were, the terrific battle told its tale.

But Cardigan still had enough left to get in a well-timed, straight right which put finish to the business—and Harden pitched full length on the carpeted floor.

And at the moment Harden, with a last effort of consciousness, flung out his arms, the door was burst open and Nosey crashed in.

"Jack—beat the trail!" he said urgently. "The sheriff is coming up! Old Man Bradfield and Doris are at the gates—"

"Doris?" panted Cardigan. "Partner—'m all in—we've had a fight. 'm just gonna stop here—"

He broke off as Doris, her face flushed with anxiety, burst into the room and flew to his side.

"Jack! Jack!" she almost whimpered. "You're—you're hurt!"

"Sure 'm hurt!" he grinned back at her through his twisted, battered lips. "But 've got that document, and that's all that matters. Maybe, though, 'll be getting a long enough rest to get over it!"

He added that last sentence with a smiling, meaning glance at Sheriff Smyth, who came into the room with a gun in one hand, and a gleam in his eye that spelt further trouble. He stopped dead in his tracks as he saw Cardigan.

"Waal, if this ain't tarnation lucky!" he ejaculated. "Ef you ain't Jack Cardigan!"

"Yes, 'm Jack Cardigan all right, sheriff," said the gambler quietly, and Nosey groaned in his dismay. "I'll thank you to do your job as quietly as possible—"

"Say, Cardigan, where's the hoss o' mine?" growled Smyth.

"In the corral!" said Jack, and added parenthetically: "Is that all you want of me, sheriff?"

"Sure! But I hev got my mad up fer you busting my cheroots!" said Smyth, whilst Nosey and Cardigan began to stare in wonder at him. "I want this guy, though."

"But—but that greenhorn—" stammered Cardigan.

"Oh, him!" Smyth shrugged his shoulders. "When you told me down in the plain that you never carried a gun, Cardigan, I sorter believed you and started on another trail. I sure got my man, and I ain't got nothin' on you! That is—only a few cheroots!"

"Then my partner ain't gonna be hooked up?" said Nosey joyfully.

The sheriff looked at him patiently, almost pathetically, before he nodded slowly to the still anxious Doris.

"Don't be such a tarnation fool!" he growled. "Don't it look as ef there's some hookin' up coming along?"

Doris blushed to the roots of her hair, and her discomfiture was not relieved when the arm around her suddenly tightened in an ecstasy of joy.

"Doris—I'm free!" whispered Jack joyfully.

"Another tarnation fool!" growled Smyth. "That's just what you ain't! Hallo—here's my guy coming back to have a nice little peep at me gun!"

Guns were not necessary to get Harden away. He was whacked to the world, and he had to be half-carried out of the room to his horse.

Old Man Bradfield gave Jack and Doris one look—and smiled as he remembered very clearly an occasion when he and Doris' mother had looked at each other like that.

"I'll go and find Tom—he'll be glad to know that the document has been recovered," he said quietly. "Perhaps you'd help me, friend Nosey."

Nosey groaned—he was past speaking. His partner had dished him for a much better partner—a partner who seemed to take a very great joy in attempting to soothe a pair of battered lips by just gently touching them with her own.

(By permission of the British Lion Film Co., Ltd., starring Mahlon Hamilton and Doris Hill.)

(Continued from page 2.)

Answers to Questions.

Among the films in which Grant Withers has appeared are the following, Kenneth (Sheffield): "Tiger Rose," "So Long Letty," "The Other Tomorrow," "The Second Floor," "Back Pay," "Dancing Sweeties," "Winner's Holiday," and "Scarlet Pages." Yes, he is an American, without doubt, for he was born in Pueblo, Colorado, and his parents were also born in the States. Grant was at one time a police-court reporter, and some years later began in films as an extra. Sue Carol's real name is Evelyn Jemmy Lederer, and she is the daughter of S. M. Lederer, the Chicago millionaire, who died in Switzerland in 1925. About a year later, Sue made her debut on the screen in a small part in "Is Zat So?" She was born in Chicago, Illinois, on October 30th, 1907, and is 5 ft. 2 in. in height, with brown hair and eyes.

I would not be surprised if a Landler wrote to me, H. M. (Amballa), for we receive letters from all parts of the world. I am pleased to know that the "B.C." is popular with you and your chums in the regiment. Why not write to Joan Crawford for her autographed photo? Address her care of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, California, U.S.A. Her real name before marriage was Lueille le Seuer, and she was born on May 23rd, 1904, in San Antonio, Texas. She married Douglas Fairbanks, junr., in 1929. No, she is not related to Kathryn Crawford, whose real name is Kathryn Moran.

If you write to Gary Cooper, care of the Paramount Publix Studios, Hollywood, California, U.S.A., he will be certain to get your letter, J.Y. (Inverness). Among Wallace Beery's many successes are the following: "The Sea Hawk," "We're in the Navy Now," "Sons of the Sea," "Now We're in the Air," "Beggars of Life," "Chinatown," "River of Romance," "The Big House," and "Billy the Kid."

SPURPROOF TENTS.

Guaranteed Reg.

Made from light-weight proofed material. Complete with three-piece jointed poles, pegs, guy lines, and white valise. Weight 5 lbs. Size 6 ft. x 4 ft. 6 ins. x 3 ft. 6 ins. 123 With 6 in. wall and 3 in. cave. Postage 9d. Accommodates three boys. Special extra light-weight. Made from Egyptian Cotton. Same size. Weight 3 1/2 lbs. 176.

Send for beautiful illustrated Camping List, post free. GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, NEW BRIDGE STREET, E.C.4.

XMAS CLUBS

SPARE TIME AGENTS WANTED for Oldest, Largest, and BEST Club. Excellent Commission—no outlay. Art Catalogue Free with full particulars.

SAMUEL DRIVER LTD., Burton Road, LEEDS.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-, Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

BLUSHING,

SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

MY GREAT OFFER

Write for my free Bargain Lists of the best ALL BRITISH cycles. 14 DAYS' APPROVAL. CARRIAGE PAID. Cash price £3 15s. 0d. or terms. All accessories FREE. Value 21/-.

Edw. O'Brien THE WORLD'S LARGEST CYCLE DEALER, DEP 17 COVENTRY.

2

WEEKLY

BLUSHING, Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 6/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

STAMMERING, STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars free. FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-) including Almost, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Engle Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Printed and published every Tuesday by the Proprietors, The Amalgamated Press, Ltd., The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Advertisement Offices: The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad, 11/- per annum, 2/6 for six months. Sole Agents for Australia and New Zealand: Messrs. Gordon & Gotch, Ltd.; and for South Africa: Central News Agency, Ltd., August 8th, 1931. Registered for transmission to Canada, at Magazine Rates, S.G.

Mitchell

Boys' Cinema

"SWANEE RIVER" and
"PHANTOM OF THE DESERT."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 610.

EVERY TUESDAY.

AUGUST 22nd, 1931.

BUCK
JONES IN

Men Without Law

A Fighting Western Drama

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Men Without Law."

Buck Healy, Buck Jones; Tom Healy, Tommy Carr; Murdoch, Harry Woods; Sheriff Jim, Fred Burns; Deputy Sheriff Clyde, Fred Kelsey; Senor del Rey, Victor Sarno; Juanita, Carmelita Geraghty; Mrs. Healy, Lydia Knott.

"Swanee River."

Garry Sommers, Grant Withers; Caroline Bradford, Thelma Todd; Jack Bradford, Philo McCullough; Colonel Bradford, Palmer Morrison; Morton, Walter Miller; Esau, Robert Frazier.

"Phantom of the Desert."

The Phantom, Starlight; Jack Saunders, Jack Perrin; Mary van Horn, Eva Novak; Colonel van Horn, Josef Swickard; Dan Denton, Edward Earl; Benny, Benny Corbett; Steve, Robert Walker.

New Serial Queen.

Maybe some of you remember, maybe some of you do not, those three daring artistes of the old silent serials, Pearl White, Grace Cunard, and Ruth Roland. In spite of all the dangers they went through they are still alive, and with not a broken limb among them. Pearl White has made Paris her home; Grace Cunard is reputed to be the wealthiest woman in California; and Ruth Roland is still working at Universal City. And now Hollywood has a new serial queen in petite, blonde Lucille Brown.

Her coming is timely, for now the serial is surging back to popularity. Lucille Brown has the feminine lead in "Danger Island" with Kenneth Harlan. Her first day's work for this picture brought her a thrill, for she was swept off the rigging of the Lottie Carson into the waters of the Pacific.

The Lottie Carson is a schooner-rigged vessel which was used almost all through the twelve-chapter serial, "Danger Island," and the spot where Lucille fell was ten miles out in the ocean. Fortunately, Lucille can swim as well as a fish, and the unexpected incident did not unnerve her a bit. A few minutes after getting back on board she was ready to continue her acting.

"Danger Island" is full of thrills, but this new Universal star declines to have a double for any of them.

A Microscopic Wonder.

John Hix, discoverer of oddities and originator of the "Strange As It Seems" newspaper series, which Universal show on the screen in colours, has been beaten at one of his own discoveries.

Recently, Hix found a woman who reproduced with a pen the Lord's Prayer three times in a circle the exact size of an American ten-cent piece. This struck Hix as fine material for his "Strange As It Seems" series. But when the picture came to be made, a Universal studio title artist, John Connelly, did three times better than the Hix discovery.

He reproduced the Lord's Prayer six times, and added his name within the tiny circle. He worked without the aid of a magnifying glass or a special pen.

August 22nd, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

HOOT GIBSON

IN

"CLEARING THE RANGE."

Tracking down his brother's slayer, he made out he was yellow and a coward, but as "El Capitan" he blazed his way through a Western crime ring to victory. A thrilling yarn of the Lone Star State.

"QUICK MILLIONS."

By unscrupulous methods a truck-driver makes himself a power against whom the forces of law and order were helpless. But like all criminals he goes a step too far and— A grand and thrilling crook drama. Starring Spencer Tracy.

"WESTWARD BOUND."

A stirring story of the West, showing how a man, trying to get amusement for a girl, started a senator's son on the road to romance. Starring Buffalo Bill Junr.

used only capital letters throughout, and his reproduction is in forty lines of perfect letters. A magnifying glass is used to reproduce Connelly's remarkable accomplishment on the screen.

Fighting for the Films.

Sometimes film fights are faked. Most often, however, they are as real and as exciting as seen on the screen. The picturegoer, it is true, cannot tell the difference. Every action is carefully timed and rehearsed. Fake blows are so arranged with the camera angles carefully calculated that the hits seem realistic enough. But this, as stated, is not a usual practice, and even a fake blow sometimes finds its mark.

Fred Kohler, two hundred and forty-five pounds of bone and muscle, has perfected a blow which, if it caught its victim, would certainly kill him. His control is so good that, though he may strike with all his tremendous strength, his fist actually stops within an inch of his target. On the screen this cannot be detected. On one occasion, however, when Kohler and the late William Russell were staging a shipboard fight, it was intended that Kohler's k.o. punch should pass over Russell's shoulder. But as Kohler let drive, full force, a wave threw Russell off his balance and he caught Kohler's big fist plump on his nose. Further production had to be held over for a week. Kohler himself has had a rough time in film and carries thirty-one scars as mementoes of his screen fights.

One of the most terrific fights yet staged for the screen was the one which took place several years ago for the first version of "The Spoilers." The combatants were the late Tom Santschi and William Desmond. Realism was wanted, and neither man showed nor asked for mercy. Santschi, being the villain, got the worst of it. He suffered a broken arm and the loss of several teeth. Desmond, too, received a terrible beating, and both men afterwards spent weeks in recovering. Sometimes doubles provide the more strenuous touches for these film fights. For the third and sound version of "The Spoilers," in which the principals were Gary Cooper and William Boyd, the fiercest part of the fight was fought by two doubles, Collins and Holbrook. They took a terrible beating "for art's sake." But in the close-ups even the actors, Boyd and Cooper, had a really tough time.

Chief of Studio Police.

A chief of police and a force of twenty-five special officers—enough to patrol a good-sized town—are maintained at the First National Studios in the law-abiding community of Burbank, California.

Lou Holtendorf has a really unique job. There is said to be no other police job just like it.

The work consists not so much in maintaining order, as in protecting property not only against theft and vandalism, but against being tampered with or touched in any way by people who mean no real harm.

In the first place the studio entrances must be guarded against the countless gate-crashers who work every kind of racket, from mere curiosity to see a studio to soliciting actors and actresses for one favour or another. It is quite a problem, for the officers must recognise and admit without delay all the thousand or more artists, directors, writers, carpenters and technicians, and must be courteous to all visitors, and see that those with legitimate business are directed to the proper places. And at the same time they must be firm but courteous in refusing admittance to visitors who have no real business on the lot.

One of the great problems is to prevent the sets from being tampered with. The loss or misplacing of an article that is being used as a prop in a picture may cause hours of delay, running into thousands of dollars, and cause a large number of scenes to be re-shot. Six men were assigned to policing the sets used in making "Adios," Richard Barthelme's forthcoming release.

Each piece of furniture is left at

(Continued on page 23.)

The dare-devil adventures of a rancher returned from the War, who sets out to rescue his brother from a gang of outlaws, only to fall into their clutches himself and to be impersonated by their leader.

MEN WITHOUT LAW

Starring
BUCK JONES and CARMELITA GERAGHTY

Back From No-Man's Land.

IT was during the war that Buck Healy and Ramon del Rey made one another's acquaintances and became firm friends; and it was strange that they should have had to travel so many thousands of miles to meet, for Buck was a rancher from Gunsight, in Arizona, while Ramon came from his father's rancho in Naco, just over the Mexican border, and only fifty miles or so from Buck's home.

Buck was a sturdy fellow who hardly realised the meaning of the word fear, whereas Ramon was a slender and highly-strung young Mexican who did daring things not because he was by nature daring, but because he was afraid of being afraid.

On a pitch-black night in September, 1918, Buck proved his friendship at the imminent risk of his life. Ramon had taken part in a raid on the enemy trenches, and his companions had come back with two prisoners, but without him. One of the men, it appeared, had seen him fall headlong into a shell-hole while the raiders were crawling across No-Man's Land in the face of fierce machine-gun fire, and it was decided that he was dead.

Buck was standing on the fire-step of the trench after the din that followed the raid had died away, when faintly from somewhere beyond the barbed wire he heard a voice calling: "Buck! Buck! Buck!"

"That's Ramon!" exclaimed Buck, and immediately made to climb the parapet.

"You can't go out there—it's suicide!" growled the man on his right, tugging at his legs. But Buck kicked the detaining hand away and hauled himself up over the sand-bags.

A sniper saw the crawling figure near the wire, and bullets whizzed past Buck's head. Machine-gun fire broke loose again, and for a while the would-be rescuer hugged the ground. A bomb exploded near him and he gave vent to a queer little gasping sigh.

But as soon as things had quietened down he crept doggedly forward again, and in the sudden blaze of a Very light he saw Ramon, almost unrecognisable in mud and blood. The Mexican had dragged himself out of the shell-hole only to become caught in the wire.

"Buck!" The voice was very faint, but it reached Buck's ears.

"Stay with it, kid," he called, and made for the bruised and wounded figure of his chum

He reached the wire, and the wire was cut; he managed, somehow, to get Ramon on his back, pulled his arms round his own neck, and began the perilous return journey.

The Germans in their trenches refrained from firing, appreciating this act of bravery, but from behind their lines big guns suddenly set up a barrage, preliminary to a projected advance.

Shells shrieked and whistled overhead; it seemed as though hell itself had been let loose. But Buck, with his burden, crawled doggedly back to his own trench. He had been wounded in the right arm on the outward journey; he was wounded in the left leg just before he reached the sand-bags and rolled over them with the man he had rescued into the arms of his comrades.

Buck and Ramon were bundled off to a field hospital with as little delay as possible; the projected advance of the Germans failed, and a few days later the two friends were conveyed to the comfort and comparative security of a base hospital.

There they remained for a full month; but towards the end of October Buck hobbled about the ward with the aid of a stick, carrying his arm in a sling, and regained his usual cheerfulness. He was, however, deeply concerned about Ramon, for Ramon still remained in bed, a mass of bandages, and suffering from an internal wound that refused to heal.

Proceeding down the long ward one morning with less effort than usual, Buck greeted various convalescents in his own characteristic way, and approached the bed at the far end, near a window.

"Hallo, Ramon," he said cheerfully, "how's tricks to-day, kid?"

"Not so good, Buck," came the faltering reply.

"Aw, what d'you mean, not so good?" said Buck encouragingly. "You're looking great to-day."

It was a lie, for Ramon was looking particularly bad that morning, but it was a justifiable lie, intended to help. Buck sat down on a chair beside the bed and noticed a sheet of paper in his chum's transparent hand.

"What have you got?" he inquired. "A letter from home?"

Ramon nodded. "Read it," he said.

HELP THE NEWSAGENT.

Have you ever thought how difficult it is for a newsagent to order just the right number of copies of any particular paper each week? You can make his task much easier if you place a regular order with him. You will not only help him to order correctly and avoid waste, but will make sure of getting your copy regularly each week.

Buck took the letter and read it. Much to his astonishment he found that it was addressed to himself; it had been enclosed with a letter to Ramon. It ran:

Rancho del Rey,
Naco, Mexico.
10th October, 1918.

Dear Mr. Healy,—Words cannot express my gratitude to you for your heroic action in saving my son as you did. It was wonderful of you, and I shall never forget it. Ramon's sister feels as I do. We are greatly in your debt, and anything we can do to show our gratitude at any time we shall count it an honour to do.

We shall hope to see you when you return home and to thank you in person.
—Yours to command,

FRANCISCO DEL REY.

Having mastered the contents of this letter, written in a thin, spidery hand, Buck looked reproachfully from it to the pallid young man propped up upon the pillows.

"Say," he exclaimed gruffly, "what have you been doing? Writing a lot of boloney about me back home? You shouldn't!" He looked at the address on the sheet of paper, and went on: "You know, it's funny, Ramon, we living so close together back in the States, and never knew each other. I'd like to meet your folks."

"You will, Buck, when you go home," said Ramon.

"You mean when we go home," corrected Buck. And then, as the sick man shook his head, he endeavoured to cheer him up by talking of what they would do when the war was over.

"Say, listen," he said, "you ought to meet my Ma—she bakes the greatest apple-pies you ever stuck your teeth in. And my kid brother—gee, you'll like him, he's a great kid! And I've got one of the greatest little broncos you ever seen in your life. I call him Silver—he's just like a flash—and when you come down to my ranch I want you to ride him. Gee, but it'll be great when you and me get back home! And listen, boy, I'll tell you something else—"

He broke off short as Ramon's head fell back and his smoken eyes closed. In a panic he banged on the floor with his stick, and with its aid rose up and bent over the bed.

A trim nurse deserted a patient at the far end of the room and came over. But Ramon was beyond mortal aid; Buck's act of heroism had been in vain.

The Girl on the Train.

BUCK went back to the trenches only a few days before the Armistice was declared, and, by some stroke of good fortune, he was among the first of the American troops to go back across the Atlantic.

There was a parade in New York City, and when Buck found himself on a train bound for the long journey home to Arizona—a troop train, full of returned soldiers.

An exciting journey, crowded with incidents, for at every town where the train stopped there were crowds to welcome the returning warriors, banners waving, bands playing.

At several important junctions, Buck had to change from one line to another, and as he progressed farther and farther west and south his companions dwindled in number and ordinary citizens became more numerous.

At Ogden, in Utah, he changed out of a Union Pacific train into one on the St. Paul & Pacific line, bound at last August 22nd, 1918.

direct for southern towns in Arizona. The returning soldiers were reduced by this time to a hundred or so, scattered about the various cars.

Buck sat beside the centre gangway of a car in which a dozen men were sitting lustily as the train drew near to Gunsight. He looked up with interest at a beautiful black-haired girl who came tripping along from the direction of the dining-car. But a practical joker on the other side of the gangway thrust out a foot and she nearly fell on to Buck's knees.

She recovered her balance with an effort, and her dark brown eyes flashed down at Buck.

"Excuse me, sir," she cried indignantly in Spanish, "but I seem to be in your way!"

Buck, who hadn't a ghost of a notion what she was saying, blinked at her.

"Er—er—" he began awkwardly; but she swept past him with her chin in the air.

Buck gazed appreciatively after her, and the offender from the other side of the gangway said to him facetiously:

"I don't know what she said, partner, but if it's what I think it was, you ain't no gentleman."

"Maybe I'd better go and apologise to the lady, eh?" said Buck.

"Sure! And ask her if she's got a girl friend."

"As you were, doughboy!" scoffed Buck.

He rose, passed down the swaying car, and stepped into the next one. The black-haired girl was seating herself beside a white-haired woman, obviously Spanish, who looked as though she might be a housekeeper or a nurse.

"A man tried to trip me up," said the girl angrily in her own language. "The train's full of soldiers returning from the war, and they're singing and fooling."

"They go happy to their homes," said the white-haired woman soothingly. "The war has been so dreadful, and now, naturally, they are high-spirited."

The black-haired girl nodded, and might have recovered her temper, but at this moment Buck, who had reached her side, said eagerly:

"Oh, mademoiselle—senorita—parlez vous French? I mean, sprechen sie Deutsch? Oh, gee, I wish I could speak your language!"

"If you are trying to apologise for your clumsiness," she said coldly and in perfect English, "I forgive you."

"Gee, that's great!" cried Buck delightedly. "Now you're talking my own lingo. I'm awfully sorry for what happened a minute ago, but it wasn't my foot." He perched himself on the arm of a seat on the other side of the gangway and grinned at her. "Great day for travelling, isn't it?"

She gave him a disdainful glance, but in secret decided that he was quite an attractive young man, with his strong, clean-shaven face and his clear grey eyes. Her companion, glaring at Buck, began in Spanish:

"This man is annoying you, Juanita. Shall I call—"

"No, Maria," interrupted the girl in the same language. "It's all right." But she paid no further attention to Buck.

An attendant passed down the car calling out:

"Gunsight! Next stop Gunsight!"

The train was slowing down.

"How happy your father will be to see you again!" said Maria, in Spanish.

"A little," smiled Juanita.

There was a grinding of brakes, and a very small station loomed up. All along its low platform a steamer waved in the breeze, inscribed: "Gunsight Welcomes its Heroes"; and near the shed-like booking-office stood a little band of eight musicians playing on brass instruments for all they were worth.

"Gunsight!" shouted the conductor. "Will you please take my bags?" called Juanita.

"Ah, senorita, do you live in Gunsight, too?" cried Buck, jumping to his feet. "I'll help you."

Juanita did not reply, and though Buck reached up to the rack over the ladies' heads, the attendant took the cases from him as he removed them. So Buck, disappointed but quite unabashed, went back to the other car to get his own belongings. And with him, unnoticed by the others, he carried a small case belonging to the black-haired girl.

The platform was alive with cowboys and men, women and children, welcoming back old friends and relatives as he swung down from the train and looked about him. The soldier who had tripped up Juanita—Hank Davis—descended beside him.

"Oh, boy—some girl friend!" he exclaimed, and pointed to the elderly Mexican woman called Maria, who had just followed her young mistress down from the steps of the adjoining car.

A fat woman with two children clinging to her skirts and a baby in her arms darted up to the speaker, crying rapturously: "Hank! Hank!" Buck chuckled, and moved from the open platform to the tree-lined road beyond it, looking back at the girl with whom he had tried to scrape acquaintance.

A typical Mexican had stepped up to her and seized upon the two suitcases which the conductor had deposited on the platform. He greeted Juanita deferentially and announced, in Spanish, that he had brought the wagonette to take her home.

"But, Pancho!" cried the elderly woman blankly. "The other bag—where is the other bag? There were three!"

"Three?" echoed the Mexican, looking at the two cases he was holding. "But how three? Here are two only!" "One has been lost! We must find it!"

Buck had lingered within earshot. The only word of the conversation he could understand was "maleta," Spanish for "portmanteau," but he knew well enough what it was all about. He sauntered back to the girl.

"Is this your grip, senorita?" he inquired, indicating the small case he had wilfully appropriated.

"Yes, thank you very much," she said, and looked at him suspiciously.

"Let me help you," he begged.

"Where did you get it?" she challenged.

"Oh, I—er—I found it. That's right—I found it."

He walked beside her to the wagonette, and Pancho and Maria followed. He would have helped her up into a seat, but she looked at him contemptuously and climbed up unaided, spurning his hand.

Maria sprang at him in a fury, raving at him in Spanish, and in much alarm Buck stepped backwards, stumbled over the case he had placed on the ground, and went sprawling. Immediately the two horses in the wagonette bolted.

Maria flung up her hands in horror, and the manservant, Pancho, ran shouting after the swaying vehicle. Buck was on his feet in a moment, saw what had happened, and acted.

Several horses, belonging to the celebrating cowboys, were hitched to a rail. He rushed over and released one, and almost in the same moment swung himself into the saddle.

Like the wind he shot off along the dusty road in pursuit of the runaways, caught up with them, sprang from the horse he had borrowed on to the back of one of the horses attached to the vehicle, and in a masterly fashion brought it and its companion to a standstill. Then he slid down into the roadway and looked at the girl.

"Are you all right, miss?" he inquired. "I'm sorry that happened."

Juanita had been watching his efforts with admiration, but now she frowned.

"Are you sure you didn't do it on purpose, just so you could be a hero?" she said scathingly.

"Who—me?" cried Buck. "Why, lady, I wouldn't have had that happen for worlds!"

Pancho and Maria arrived, panting, and Maria was too breathless and too scared to do anything more than climb mutely up beside her mistress. Pancho mounted to the driving-board and picked up the reins.

"It's a great day for travelling, isn't it?" said Buck cheerfully.

"Well, why don't you travel?" demanded Juanita.

Pancho set the horses in motion, and Buck caught at the bridle of his borrowed steed, and stood grinning. Evidently Juanita relented, for as she was being swept away in the wagonette she looked back at him—and smiled.

A Fine Home-coming.

AN hour or so later, Buck walked briskly up a shady lane on his own property, five miles from the town of Gunsight, and came to the white gato of the ranch-house garden. It seemed to him that the pepper trees, the oaks, and the flowering eucalyptus had grown considerably during his absence, and the flower-beds were ablaze with early spring blossom.

His mother, a little silver-headed woman, was watching for him at the living-room window of the two-storey adobe building, and she darted out into the porch and down the steps to meet and greet and hug him.

"Oh, my boy! My big, big boy!" she cried tremulously.

"You know I've been thinking about this for two whole years," declared Buck. "Dreaming about it! I've even talked about it in my sleep!" He held her face in his hands and looked fondly into her tired eyes. "Gee!" he cried. "You don't know what it is to be back home!" "I know what it is to have you home, son," she told him.

They went into the house, arm-in-arm, and they sat and talked for a long while. Then Buck said suddenly:

"Where's Tom?"
"I'd give anything in the world if I knew," said his mother unexpectedly. "He hasn't been home for a month. I hadn't said anything before, but I'm worried almost crazy. Buck. He may be sick, or even—"

Tears were trickling down her cheeks, and she hadn't the courage to voice all her fears.

"Ah, now don't, mum," urged Buck. "He's all right."

"He's been into the house, arm-in-arm, and they sat and talked for a long while. Then Buck said suddenly: 'Where's Tom?' 'I'd give anything in the world if I knew,' said his mother unexpectedly. 'He hasn't been home for a month. I hadn't said anything before, but I'm worried almost crazy. Buck. He may be sick, or even—'"

"This was disturbing news, but Buck did his best not to show that he was disturbed.

"Don't worry about him, honey," he said. "I'll round up the beggar in no time. What he needs is a good spanking."

"He isn't a baby any more, Buck. He's grown so you'd hardly know him." She pointed to a framed photograph on the sideboard. "He had that taken the last time he was in Phoenix."

Buck went over to the sideboard, picked up the photograph, and studied the pictured face of his young brother. It was quite a nice face; the mouth was a trifle weak, but the eyes looked frank and clear.

"What d'you know about that?" exclaimed Buck. "Getting to be a great big fellow, ain't he? But I'll still say he needs a darned good spanking—and I'm just the fellow that can give it to him, too!"

The whinnying of a horse floated in at the open window.

"Guess Silver knows you're home, too," said Mrs. Healy.

"I'm going outside to say hallo 'to him," decided Buck, and he set down the photograph and went out into the farmyard.

A big white horse, broad of back, unharnessed, came running delightedly up to him—a noble creature, who carried his head proudly, as became one who had an Arabian strain in him.

"Hallo, son!" welcomed Buck. "How are you? Did you miss me, eh?" Silver sagely nodded his head. "Missed me a lot, did you? Well, give me a big kiss!"

Silver raised his head, and his moist tongue caressed his master's cheek. Buck patted him affectionately.

"Gee whiz!" he cried. "It's a long time since I haven't seen you. Listen, you old son-of-a-gun. We're going to start to town pretty soon. You want to go with me, eh? Okay! Just wait around till I come and saddle you."

In less than half an hour he was in the saddle, and it felt good to him to be on his devoted horse's back again. He set off for Gunsight at a brisk canter, though Silver really wanted to gallop, in order to work off some of his excitement at this reunion.

Outside the Mission House, at the beginning of Main Street, a group of men were talking together as a little cloud of dust betokened Buck's approach.

"More excitement in one day than I've seen in twenty years!" declared one, a grey-bearded rancher.

"Yep," nodded a younger man. "Goin' some for Gunsight! Boys coming home from the war, and the bank being robbed, all in one afternoon!"

"Well, darn my breeches!" exclaimed a little man in cowboy rig, whose big hat was perched on the back of his head. "If it ain't Buck Healy!"

Buck rode up to them, looking bronzed and splendidly fit, but no longer a soldier. He had shed his khaki and put on Western clothes; and round his waist was a heavy belt with holsters,

The sheriff took out his watch and consulted it. "I'll give you just an hour, Tom," he said.

and in the holsters were the formidable six-shooters he had used before he had learned to carry a service rifle.

"Hallo, Buck! How are you? Glad to see you!" chorused the three.

Buck dismounted beside them. The street was crowded with people, but that, of course, might very well be due to the return of the warriors.

"Where were you during all the excitement?" inquired the little man. "Say, you're lookin' great! Soldiering must agree with you."

"Oh, yeah?" drawled Buck. "What was the excitement?"

A red-headed cowboy joined the group.

"Say, Buck," he boomed, "I got a lotta questions I want to ask you. Now, do them Frenchies really eat frogs?"

"Get out!" laughed Buck. "What do you mean, eat frogs? Ha, ha, ha! I didn't see a frog in France!"

"Buck, have you heard about the bank robbery?" demanded the bearded rancher.

"No, what was it?" asked Buck curiously.

But before the speaker could answer Red butted in again.

"How about them madamoiselles?" he asked. "Were they peaches? Got any pieters of 'em on you?"

"Wait a minute," said Buck. "It's my turn—I want to ask you fellows a few questions. Most importantly—have you seen my young brother lately?"

"No," said one, "I haven't seen Tom for a couple o' weeks. Have you, Red?"

"No," said Red, rubbing his chin, "can't say I have. Now it seems to me the last time I seen him—"

Buck had the impression that they were keeping something back from him; but a sudden commotion up by the Blue Star Saloon drew his attention, and the attention of the others.

"Looks as if the sheriff's got one o' them bandits with him," remarked the little man. "Let's go and see who it is."

Sheriff Jim Matthews, a tall, lean, white-haired representative of law and order, was marching a prisoner across the roadway to the town gaol, followed by a crowd of cowboys and other habitués of the Blue Star. Buck and his companion moved forward, Buck holding Silver's bridle.

"Tom!" he exclaimed. For the prisoner was undoubtedly his brother, though he would hardly have recognised him if he hadn't seen the comparatively recent photograph.

Tom looked round, but was bundled over the doorstep of the sheriff's office, beyond which were the cells. Bill Clyde, the bulky and slow-witted deputy-sheriff, took charge of the prisoner and put him behind bars, while the sheriff moved over to his desk to make an entry in the record-book.

He looked up as a shadow fell across the book, and blinked at Buck, who had forced his way into the building.

"Hallo, Buck!" he exclaimed. "Sure great to see you, boy! How do?"

But Buck was not in the mood for formalities.

"What's this all about, Jim?" he inquired gruffly. "What have you got Tom for?"

"Well," said the sheriff slowly, swinging round in his chair, "the boy's been travelling in some pretty fast company, and it's naturally got him into trouble."

"What's he been doing?"

"Got mixed up with that Murdoch bunch. You remember Murdoch? Robbed the bank this afternoon while everybody was down at the station celebrating, and got away. Tom's the only one we've picked up."

Buck's dark brows came down and his August 22nd, 1931.

mouth closed like a steel trap. A fine home-coming!

The Sheriff Relents.

CLYDE, having locked the barred door of a cell on Tom Healy, lumbered into the sheriff's office and stared blankly at Buck.

"Hallo!" he greeted. "Got home from the war, then?"

"Hallo, Clyde!" said Buck briefly, and strode past him out across a passage to the barred door of the cell. Tom was clinging to the bars, and his weak mouth was working.

"Hallo, kid," growled Buck. "So you turned bad man, eh? I ought to beat the tar out of you!"

Tom looked pitcously at his sturdy brother.

"I didn't want to do it, Buck," he whimpered. "But I couldn't help it. They made me do it!"

"Bah!" cried Buck contemptuously. But the sheriff had followed him, and the sheriff said, compassionately:

"He's right, Buck. They double-crossed the kid, and left him holding the sack while they made their getaway."

"Serves you right!" snapped Buck at his brother. "What did you make up with them for in the first place?"

"Oh, I don't know," replied Tom wretchedly. "It was all so quiet around here. I thought I'd get a kick out of it."

"Yeah—you'll probably get a kick out of doing a couple of years in gaol!" retorted Buck.

"Have you seen mum?"

"I have."

"Don't let her know, Buck. You won't—will you?"

"Fine time to be thinking about her now!" rasped Buck. "She's been doing a tidy lot o' thinking herself, the past month, and grieving her heart out over you. When I left for France, you promised to take care of her. Nice job you made of it!"

Tom bowed his head in shame.

"I know," he admitted. "I'm just no good, I guess."

Buck pushed back his big hat and stood thinking for a moment or two, then turned impulsively to the sheriff.

"Jim," he said earnestly, "I want you to do me a favour."

"What is it, Buck?"

"I promised mum I'd bring Tom home to supper to-night—you know, she hasn't seen him for a long time, and she rather banked on my word. Let me take him home for an hour, will you?"

"I can't do it."

"I'll bring him right back. Besides, it'll give me a chance to cook up a story about him going away."

The sheriff wavered. He had always liked Buck, and he fully understood the situation.

"Well," he said doubtfully, "it ain't regular."

"Oh, I know it ain't regular, Jim! But think what it will mean to my mother. Why, if she ever found out anything about this it would kill her."

"All right," decided the sheriff, fishing a big key from his pocket. "I'll let the boy go home—but I'm going to keep you here till he gets back."

"That's okay with me, Jim—and I'm grateful."

The door of the cell was unlocked and opened and Tom stepped forth. The three passed across the passage into the sheriff's office, and Buck looked his brother up and down with critical eyes. The youngster had certainly grown, but he was still little more than a boy.

"Tom," said Buck, "I want you to run on home to mother, and tell her you've been prospecting down across the border, and that you're going back, and that you'll probably be gone for a good long time. If she thinks you're safe she'll be satisfied. Do that?"

"Sure, Buck, if the sheriff—"

The sheriff took out his watch and consulted it.

"I'll give you just an hour, Tom," he said. "Till seven o'clock. If you're not back by then, Buck goes to gaol."

"Oh, I'll be back!" promised Tom eagerly. "I'm through with this business from now on."

"Well, I hope so."

Buck reached out a hand and removed his brother's belt in the holster of which gleamed a formidable Colt.

"Better leave this here," he said, "it might get you into a little more trouble, Tom. Now, run along—and get back on time!"

"So long, Buck," said Tom gratefully. "So long, sheriff! I won't let either of you down."

"You'll find your horse in the stable round the back," the sheriff informed him.

There were many in the street who stared as Tom stepped out from the building and passed down a yard beside it to the stable; but Sheriff Jim Matthews administered the law according to his own methods, and everybody respected him. Tom rode out of town leaving behind him a free topic for conversation.

He set off in the direction of the ranch, but he did not reach it. Four miles south of Gunsight, three men on horseback rode out at him from behind a clump of bushes, and their leader, a swarthy fellow with a tiny moustache and what seemed to be almost a permanent grin, chuckled as the youngster held up his hands.

"Hallo, Tom!" he cried. "Good work, kid! How did you get away?"

Tom bit his lip. The very worst had happened—he had been captured, virtually, by Jake Murdoch and two of his followers; the evil companions he had cultivated to his cost.

"Well," he said nervously, "Buck's come home again, and he squared it with the sheriff so I could go back and see my mother, and put things right with her. Then I'm going back and take what's coming to me."

"You're not turnin' yellow, are you?" demanded Murdoch harshly.

"Listen, Murdoch," replied Tom. "I'm through."

"Oh no you're not," laughed the outlaw. "You know too much! Bring him along, boys!"

The two other riders closed in on either side of the boy.

"Oh, but listen, Murdoch!" pleaded Tom desperately. "I've got to get back there—"

"You're coming with us," broke in Murdoch grimly, "so shut your head and ride!"

From six o'clock till seven, Buck and the sheriff sat side by side in the latter's office, chatting and smoking. At seven the clock in the wooden tower of the Mission House proclaimed the hour, and the sheriff crossed his long legs and took out his watch.

At seven-five he looked at Buck, who glanced across at the open watch, but went on talking of his war experiences and chipping a piece of wood with his clasp-knife. Ten minutes later the sheriff said:

"Stop whittling that stick, Buck—it's a quarter-past seven. Think the kid's put something over on us?"

"Course not," answered Buck. "Prob-aback up at the house there, and lost track of time. You know how it is, Jim."

"I'm afraid we can't wait any longer."

"Well," suggested Buck, "what say we go up to the house? He'll be there."

"All right—we'll see." And pocketing his watch the sheriff rose to his feet. "I'm hoping you're right," he said; "but I'm fearing you're wrong. Come on!"

A Way of Escape.

MRS. HEALY was looking anxiously out of the living-room window into the gathering dusk when Buck and the sheriff came riding towards the ranch-house. She could not see their figures distinctly, but she saw the white form of Silver, and that was enough for her. She made for the kitchen, where the middle-aged help was busy at the stove.

"They're coming, Martha," she said. "I saw Silver."

"Oh, good," responded Martha. "I'll get the things on the table right away."

The sheriff had looked about him in the lane; and he looked over the garden fence as he and Buck hitched their horses there.

"Well, I don't see Tom's mount anywhere," he growled.

"He's here all right," said Buck confidently. "How long since you've been to our place, Jim?"

"Guess it's six weeks at least, Buck."

"You'll be welcome."

Martha was laying the table when they stepped into the living-room. Mrs. Healy hurried towards them.

"Oh, I knew you'd bring him!" she cried. "Good-evening, Jim."

"Howdy, Mrs. Healy?" said the sheriff, and closed the door.

"B—but where's Tom?" she faltered.

"He isn't coming," blurted Buck.

"At least, not to-night, mother. You see—er—Tom went down across the border, prospecting with some fellows. He left in quite a hurry—that's the reason he didn't tell you anything about it. Isn't that right, Jim?"

"Yes'm, that's right," lied the sheriff, rather red about the ears.

"But he shouldn't have gone away like that!" cried Mrs. Healy in dismay.

"He's such a boy—something might happen to him."

"There you go worrying again!" exclaimed Buck. "Tommy's all right, mother—he can take care of himself. Besides, Jim and I are going down to-night to see how he's getting along. And all this fuss for nothing!"

Martha finished laying the table and brought in some dishes.

"Sapper's all ready, Mrs. Healy," she announced.

"That's fine," nodded her mistress.

"Sit down and make yourself at home, Jim."

The sheriff shook his head regretfully, declaring that he couldn't stay.

"There's plenty," Mrs. Healy assured him. "You take Tom's place."

Buck, who was ravenous, also tried to coax; but it was Martha who proved the deciding factor. She came in with a dish whence arose a distinctly appetising odour.

"What's that?" asked the sheriff.

"My chicken with dressing!"

"Yes," said Mrs. Healy. "And cream gravy and apple-pie to follow."

"Well," yielded the sheriff, "if you insist—"

"Gimne your hat, Jim!" cried Buck triumphantly. And presently the sheriff was sitting at table on one side of Mrs. Healy, with Buck facing him. He was given a generous helping of chicken, and did full justice to it. The pie was cut and served.

"Oh, boy!" cried Buck, with his mouth full. "Is this pie, or not?"

"Best I ever ate," declared the sheriff, and demolished his share with gusto.

"Another piece, Jim?" urged Mrs. Healy.

"No, thanks, Mrs. Healy," he said. "I couldn't hold another crumb! And besides, I gotta be going. I'm sorry to run off like this, but it has to be done."

He rose and looked significantly at Buck.

"Coming?"

"Right with you, Jim," was the response.

"Oh, Buck, do you have to go right away?" protested Mrs. Healy.

"I'm afraid I do, ma. We got to look after Tom, you know. But I'll be back with him before you know it—and don't worry about one little thing."

He and the sheriff put on their hats, and Buck took his mother in his arms and kissed her. Said the sheriff, opening the door:

"I certainly did enjoy that meal, Mrs. Healy!"

The two went out together and down the garden path to the gate. But as they unhitched their horses, the sheriff said in a low voice to Buck:

"There's only one thing I can do—I've gotta hold you!"

That didn't suit Buck at all. In gaol he could do nothing, whereas out of gaol he might do quite a lot.

"Look here, Jim," he pleaded, "give me two or three days, and I'll guarantee to bring him back."

"Can't be done! I took a chance on Tom, and he double-crossed me. I'll have to hold you till he's found."

"Somehow," said Buck earnestly, "I don't think it's Tom's fault. Let me go and get him for you, will you?"

But the sheriff, in spite of all the chicken and apple-pie he had devoured, was adamant.

"No, Buck," he said doggedly. "I'll get him myself, and in the meantime you're under arrest."

So the two rode back to town in the moonlight, and Buck was locked in the cell his brother so briefly had occupied. Bill Clyde, the slow-witted deputy, was left in charge, and the sheriff went off to scour the country for the escaped prisoner.

The cell was quite a small one, fitted with a bunk—suspended on chains from the wall—and a footstool. Buck, having acquired in the army the ability to sleep under almost any circumstances at any given opportunity, stretched himself on the bunk with a hard pillow under his head and a blanket over him, and was very soon in dreamland.

But he was awake with the dawn and cudgelling his brains to devise a way of escape. He had been made a prisoner, but he had given no parole.

He could always think best when his hands were occupied, so out came his clasp-knife, and he picked up the stool and began to chip away at one of its round legs.

Soon after seven o'clock in the morning Bill Clyde, having slept and breakfasted, came and looked through the bars to make sure his prisoner was still there. He stared in astonishment. Buck was sitting on the edge of his bunk with the stool upside down on his knees, and the floor was covered with chips and shavings of wood.

Buck, instead of sweeping the floor, was sitting on the bunk chipping away at the handle of the broom.

"Hi, what's that you're doing?" he cried.

"Who—me?" inquired Buck innocently. "Nothin'!"

"Gimme that knife! It looks like a sawmill!"

"No—yes, sir. Sorry!" And Buck put away the knife and grinned at his gaoler. Clyde did not insist upon receiving the knife, but refused to be placated. Damaging Government property was an offence! He whipped up a bass broom and thrust it between the bars.

"See how you like cleaning up!" he snorted.

"Yes, sir," said Buck respectfully, and accepted the broom. Then he plunged a hand into one of his pockets and brought out a curious little metal puzzle. "Oh, dep!"

The deputy-sheriff, who had turned away, turned back again.

"Come here a minute," said Buck. "Take a look at that! Those rings can be parted from one another without force—see if you can unravel it, will you?"

Bill Clyde looked at the puzzle and then at its owner's smiling face.

"What are you tryin' to do—put something over on me?" he growled.

"No, sir," said Buck. "You're too clever for that."

"You bet I am!" responded Clyde, who was blessed with plenty of self-conceit. And he took the puzzle and went off with it into the office.

He tried to part the rings, but without success. Time passed, and he began to lose patience, but he hated to be baffled.

"Stop that whistling!" he bellowed.

Buck ceased to whistle. It was a hot morning, and perspiration came out on the deputy-sheriff's brow, born more of mental than of physical effort.

He went back to the barred door of the cell to complain that the puzzle was not a puzzle at all, but what he saw caused him to unlock the door and enter in a rage. For Buck, instead of sweeping the floor, was sitting on the bunk, chipping away at the handle of the broom!

The deputy-sheriff snatched away the broom and demanded the knife.

"You wait till Jim comes back!" he cried.

"Looks like I'll have to," remarked Buck.

The steel door clanged and was locked. Another broom was thrust between the bars.

"Now clean up that cell!" snapped Clyde.

He went back to the office and picked up the puzzle, twisting the rings this way and that, but without mastering their secret.

Buck began to sweep the cell in a leisurely manner, but stopped short and listened intently as he heard footsteps in the yard outside the little barred window. He emitted a whistle well known to the men with whom he had fought in the trenches, for the footsteps sounded to him very much like that of Hank Davis, the man who had tripped up Juanita on the train the day before, and who had been welcomed home on the platform by his wife and children.

He was not mistaken. There came a scraping sound as of a box being pushed against the wall outside, and then Hank's somewhat expansive face appeared at the window.

"Hullo, Buck!" said Hank in a hoarse whisper. "When I heard you was in here I remembered the time I was in the cooler in Verdun, and you sprung me." And he thrust between the bars a small parcel.

August 22nd, 1931.

"Good for you!" whispered Hank. "Gimme your hat!"

Hank's big hat was squeezed through to him.

"Now gimme your boots!"

The boots wouldn't pass the bars till the parcel had been opened and the two files inside it had been brought into play.

"Now your shirt," whispered Buck.

"Say," protested Hank, "this ain't no strip poker game!"

"Gimme your shirt!" insisted Buck. And Hank got down from the packing-case, pulled his coloured shirt over his head, and bundled it into the cell.

Half an hour later Bill Clyde threw the puzzle from him with an imprecation. It fell on the floor of the office—and the two rings rolled apart. The deputy stared down at them, then picked up the pieces.

For a few minutes he toyed with them, then strode heavily across the passage to the cell door.

"Well, I've done it!" he cried victoriously. "It's a cinch! I'd be a pretty dumb guy if I couldn't figure that one out! Hi—I'm talking to you!"

He looked in through the bars at what appeared to be a recumbent figure under the blanket on the bunk.

"Didn't I tell you to clean that cell up?" he shouted. "I'm talking to you!"

There was no answer, so he opened the door and advanced to the bunk. He whipped off the blanket—and stared aghast at a perfectly good cow-hat, a pair of excellent riding-boots, and a coloured shirt into which the hard pillow had been thrust.

"Well, if I ain't a cross-eyed monkey-wrench!" gasped the disgusted deputy, staring at the window, the bars of which were broken. On the floor beneath the window lay two small but business-like files!

The Use of a Rope.

JAKE MURDOCH'S headquarters consisted of a sizeable log-cabin and outbuildings, conveniently situated in a cup in the hills within a few hundred yards of the Mexican border. Thither Tom had been taken, and he spent a restless night, treated almost as an enemy by Murdoch and the six members of his gang.

After breakfast, four of the men were playing cards at the misshapen table in the living-room, while one played on a guitar with some measure of skill, and Tom haunted a tiny window which commanded a view of the rocky pass that cleft a way to the hollow.

Suddenly he caught sight of a rider on a white horse climbing the steep slope, and involuntarily he exclaimed:

"Buck!"

"What's that?" cried Murdoch instantly. "What did you say?"

"Nothing," responded Tom sullenly. But Murdoch went over to him, peered out through the window, and saw what he had seen.

"Oh, your brother!" he said grimly. "Seems to be looking for you. That's fine! We'll invite him to call. Go down and get some water so he'll see you, and then come back."

"You're not going to trap him!" stormed Tom.

"No tricks, kid!" snarled Murdoch. "We'll have you covered." He turned to two of the men, known as George and Fred. "You two go round the cabin and watch him from there," he directed.

"I won't do it!" cried Tom. But a pail was thrust into his hand and he was pushed out over the front doorstep, menaced by guns; and he went slowly to a wooden pipe through which the water of a mountain spring was conducted into the hollow.

Buck saw him there, and rode up before the pail was quite full.

"Great way you have of keeping your promise, kid!" he shouted. "I ought to thrash you within an inch of your life!"

Tom, knowing that both their lives were in danger, turned without a word and scurried back to the cabin. Buck slid from the saddle, and with a gun in each hand followed him.

"Come on," he commanded, "we're starting back right now!"

Tom vanished into the cabin, and Buck dived wrathfully after him. But Murdoch was standing just inside the door.

"Up with them!" he drawled. "How are you, Mr. Healy?"

Buck swung round, and perceived that he had walked into a trap. Four other men were grouped about the cabin, their six-shooters ready to fire, and behind him came the two who had been watching outside. Tom had set down the pail and was standing in the middle of the cabin, clenching and unclenching his fists.

"Why, you double-crossing little pup!" roared Buck as he raised his hands and was relieved of his weapons.

"I didn't double-cross you, Buck—honest I didn't!" protested Tom. "They made me do it!"

Buck stepped forward, glared at the grinning face of Murdoch, and with a sudden and entirely unexpected movement flung himself upon his captor. His fist came into violent contact with the outlaw's jaw. George fired his gun at random, and Murdoch went crashing backwards against one of the walls.

He recovered his balance and rushed at Buck, seizing him by the neck of his shirt, but Buck's right fist smashed into his face, and he went down, flat on his back.

It had all happened in a few seconds, and only George had pulled a trigger. Murdoch's gun had gone spinning across the room. But before Buck could take any advantage of the blow he had dealt half a dozen hands were gripping him, and blows were being rained at him from all sides.

"You can't do that to him!" yelled Tom. But Tom was dragged back, and Buck fell senseless to the floor.

Murdoch rose painfully to his feet.

"Search him and see what he's got on him," he ordered.

One of the men went down on his knees and turned out the contents of Buck's pockets.

"An Army discharge, twenty dollar bills, and a letter," he announced.

"Let's have 'em!"

The articles were handed over.

"A letter from his girl, I reckon," said the searcher. "There ain't another thing."

Murdoch opened out the letter and read it. It was the one Ramon had given him in hospital.

"Rancho del Rey!" he remarked.

"Why, that's the joint we've had spotted for a year! Listen to this, boys: 'We are greatly in your debt, and anything we can do to show our gratitude at any time we shall count it an honour to do.'" He opened out the Army discharge, and read aloud: "'Buck Healy, Sergeant, 23rd Infantry.' Ha, ha, this sounds good to me!"

Buck, flat on the floor on his back, opened his eyes with an effort, but closed them again. Murdoch tugged reflectively at his little moustache.

"Guess Buck Healy's goin' to pay the Del Ray family a visit!" he chuckled.

The men stared; but George, the most quick-witted of them, exclaimed:

"You mean—"

"Certainly. With this discharge and letter it'll be a cinch!"

"It's a great idea, chief," said George.

"Won't take me long to locate where the dough is, either," declared Murdoch.

"Put those two in the loft where they won't bother you any. I've got to slick up a bit for my trip."

They made Tom climb a ladder to the cramped loft above, and between them they hoisted the inert form of Buck through the trap, and dumped him on some straw; then they bound the two with ropes and left them.

Some little time later, Murdoch, having washed and shaved and paid particular attention to his hair, had his horse saddled and prepared to start for the border.

"Fred," he said, "and you, George, come with me. The rest of you fellows look after our guests. Don't starve 'em—and don't let 'em get away."

He rode off down the pass with the two men he had chosen, and the rest went back to their cards.

Up in the loft Buck said in a low voice to his brother:

"We've got to get out of here."

"How?" said Tom dubiously.

"I don't know, but we've got to drift. Keep as quiet as you can, but try to wriggle a rope loose."

The day dragged on. There was very little light in the loft, but the two struggled persistently with their bonds. Through the trap came the odour of tobacco smoke and the talk of the card-players.

Outside the daylight faded, and downstairs an oil-lamp was lit. Buck, by this time, had managed to get one hand free.

"How's it coming?" inquired Tom, who had achieved nothing but lacerated wrists.

"Pretty good," replied Buck guardedly. "I don't like that fellow singing down there, but it comes in pretty handy." He freed the other hand, groped in Tom's pockets, and discovered that his clasp-knife had been ignored. It took but a few minutes after that to remove the rest of his bonds and the rope that bound his brother.

There was an argument among the men below as to who should get water, and then a hoarse voice called up from the foot of the ladder:

"Anything special you gents want for supper? Which'll you have—strawberry shortcake, or pickled pig's feet?"

"Both!" called back Buck. "And you might bring us up a little apple-pie."

"Keep your shirt on, cowboy!" retorted the voice.

There was a small and windowless opening in the roof on the far side of the loft, and Buck had looked at it thoughtfully many times before dark. Now a star was gleaming down at them through it, and he decided that the moment had come to put into action the plan he had thought out.

He joined together the pieces of rope that had bound him, and united it with the rope that had bound his brother, then crept noiselessly to the opening. Outside it a stout hook of iron projected from a beam. He draped the rope over the hook, crawled out through the opening, and swarmed down, hand-under-hand.

The man who had fetched the water was returning to the cabin. Buck had timed things well, for he needed the fellow's guns. He descended upon an unprepared head, bearing its owner to the ground. The pail fell with a crash, and the water splashed, but no one seemed to notice the noise, and Buck's right hand was clapped over his captive's mouth.

"Come on!" he said in a hoarse whisper, and Tom descended the double rope to his side. Immediately Buck tied one end of the rope round the water-carrier's chest, beneath his arm-pits, and hauling vigorously at the other end, hoisted the unfortunate up to the hook.

"Help, help!" yelled the dangling man. "Get me down from here!"

Buck knotted the slack of the rope round a hitching-rail, while Tom fetched his own horse and Silver. The two rode off at top speed down through the pass to a trail at the foot of a hill.

"Ride for the sheriff, and make it pronto," directed Buck. "I'm heading across the border."

The door of the cabin had been opened before the fugitive reached the pass, and Murdoch's men came streaming out.

"Alf! Mike!" howled the suspended crook. "Help! They got away! I'm hung! Get me down!"

"I'll get you down!" roared one of the men, and he took out his knife and cut the rope. The water-bearer fell with a thud that knocked all the breath out of his lungs, and the others ran for their horses.

Murdoch Plays a Part.

SEÑOR DEL REY'S ranch covered a good many square miles south of the Mexican town of Naco. He was a very wealthy man, and his casa was more like the residence of a Spanish grandee than of a farmer. It was a galleried structure of adobe, built round a large patio, or courtyard, in the centre of which was a walled well.

In the evening of the day on which Jake Murdoch rode over the border with two of his men, the patio was ablaze with light and colour. Tables and chairs had been set round the white walls; men in gala attire and girls in beautiful costumes, wearing mantillas, and carrying fans, thronged the flagstones, the galleries, and the rooms of the building. A little band of minstrels played haunting Spanish melodies upon violins and guitars, and Senor del Rey moved about among his guests, a fine figure of a man with a flowing white moustache and an air of breeding.

Buck stepped forward, and glared at the grinning face of Murdoch.

It was Juanita's birthday, but Juanita sat sadly in her own room, disinclined to take any active part in the festivities. Maria found her there.

"Won't you come down to the guests?" she said.

"I want to be alone," replied Juanita. "I've no heart for all this gaiety."

Maria departed, but soon afterwards Senor del Rey knocked at the door and entered.

"Aren't you happy to-night?" he asked gently, leaning down over the drooping figure of his beautiful daughter. "On your birthday, too!"

"It would have been Ramon's birthday," said Juanita. "How can I be happy on such a day as this? Oh, I know a lot of rubbish is talked about the affinity of twins, but to-day his death haunts me."

A man-servant rapped on the open door.

"Senor del Rey," he announced in Spanish, "there is an American gentleman who wishes to see you."

Del Rey gave instructions that the visitor should be shown into the drawing-room, and he prevailed upon Juanita to descend with him. It was Murdoch who stood smiling with easy confidence at them as they entered.

"Senor del Rey?" he inquired with a bow. "I'm Buck Healy."

"Senor Buck Healy?" cried Del Rey in delighted surprise. "Welcome! Welcome! I am very happy to meet the friend of my son."

"Thank you, sir," said Murdoch. "It was nice of you to write me this letter." And he produced the letter which had been found on Buck.

"Words cannot express what is in a heart filled with gratitude," declared Del Rey. "My daughter, Juanita."

"Senorita," murmured Murdoch, feasting his eyes on the girl's beauty.

"To-night," explained the Mexican, "we are celebrating my daughter's birthday. Perhaps you will find it interesting—but first, no doubt, you would like to refresh yourself after such a long ride."

He clapped his hands, and to a servant who entered he said:

"Jose, show Senor Healy to our best room."

Juanita had not uttered a word, but she had studied Murdoch critically, and after he had gone off with the servant she said, disappointedly:

"Senor Buck Healy is not at all like I thought he would be."

"Oh, Juanita," protested her father, "he may not please your feminine fancy, but you must be very gracious to him—he was the best friend of our Ramon."

"Of course," she nodded gravely. "And how strange that of all days he should arrive on this one!"

Murdoch, in an elaborate bed-room, washed away the dust of travel, gazed with approval at a huge bed set on a dais, looked out of a casement window at the mountains and lights in the distance, and descended to his host.

Food was pressed upon him, and he ate an excellent meal in a perfectly appointed dining-room. Senor del Rey made a great fuss of him; but, after the meal, Juanita asked him some awkward questions.

"Tell us more about my brother, August 22nd, 1931.

Senor Buck," she said. "You were with him when he passed away."

"Oh, yes!" lied Murdoch. "Out there in No-Man's Land your brother begged me to leave him and go back, but I stayed with him until the very last."

Juanita stared. "I don't understand!" she exclaimed. "Ramon was in hospital many weeks after he was wounded."

"Oh, yes, of course he was! I was in hospital, too," said Murdoch hastily. "Thoughts of those last moments make me very sad."

"It was a great sorrow to me—my only son," said Del Rey brokenly. "It was a great loss to all of us," said Murdoch, rising to his feet and putting a hand on his host's shoulder. "But you still have your charming daughter."

"My little Juanita," nodded the Mexican. "But one of these days she will be getting married."

"If you will excuse me," said Juanita stiffly; and she rose and went out into the patio.

After the birthday celebrations were over and the guests had gone, Murdoch was standing thoughtfully near the well, alone, when Buck climbed up from the broad back of Silver on to the high white wall that screened one side of the patio from the road.

He gazed with grim satisfaction at the solitary figure, then crouched down and removed his lariat from the pommel of Silver's saddle. Quickly he made a noose, and then, with the unerring skill of an expert, he sent the rope whirling through the air.

The noose descended about Murdoch's broad shoulders and was drawn tight. Then Buck ran along the wall, gave a tremendous jerk—and sent Murdoch head-first into the watery depths of the well.

"Help! Help!" howled Murdoch as he rose to the surface. But Buck jumped down from the wall and went over to taunt him.

"How are you, Senor Buck Healy?" he called down mockingly.

Juanita came running out from the house, but stopped short as Buck swung round and grinned at her.

"What's the meaning of this?" she cried wrathfully. And then: "Oh—it's you!"

"Help, Senorita del Rey! Help!" spluttered Murdoch, splashing about in the water.

"How dare you come here and do a thing like this!" flamed Juanita. "Get him out of there immediately! Quick, I tell you!"

But Buck, staring at her in the light that streamed from the surrounding windows, exclaimed:

"So you're Miss del Rey, eh?"

Maria came out to them, shouting in Spanish. Juanita clapped her hands and cried:

"Juan! Pedro! Come, help!"

Buck, with one foot against the coping of the basin, tugged at the rope; but almost immediately he was dragged back by some men-servants who came running to the scene. Senor del Rey appeared, considerably alarmed, and the soaked and dripping Murdoch was hauled to safety.

"This man," cried Juanita angrily, "tried to drown Senor Buck!"

The servants seized Buck, jabbering in Spanish that they were convinced he was mad.

"Just a minute!" growled Buck, struggling to free himself. "You are making a little mistake."

"Who are you?" demanded Del Rey. "Buck Healy."

"He's crazy!" shouted Murdoch. "Crazy, eh?" scoffed Buck. "Listen, he stole my discharge papers and a letter that your son gave me in France. He's an outlaw—the sheriff wants him!"

"Don't mind him," urged Murdoch, soaking wet and shivering. "He's not responsible, senor. He—he's shell-shocked—insane. He was in our Division—I knew him in France. His mind's absolutely gone, and he—he's dangerous. You'd better lock him up."

"Say, you've got to listen to me!" cried Buck. But Senor del Rey gave instructions in Spanish, and his servants forced the indignant captive to a stone-built outhouse with a heavy door. He was bundled into pitch darkness, and a key grated in a lock.

"He'll be safe, Senor Buck, where I have had him put," said Del Rey to Murdoch, "but you need to change quickly, or you will catch your death of cold. Come with me."

On the Roof of the Cabin.

THREE people slept indifferently that night: Buck, who found himself in a tiny cell-like structure with only a little straw on which to lie; Juanita, in her luxurious bed, who thought quite a lot about the young man she had met on the train and his claim to be her dead brother's friend; and Murdoch, who could not understand how Buck had escaped from his men, and felt none too safe.

Early in the morning, Juanita went out to the door of the little stone-walled building. It had no windows, but in the door was a barred grille.

"Senor!" she called. Buck's face appeared at the opening, and she liked the look of his face. This man, she was convinced, was not by any means mad; she was not even sure that he was an impostor.

"Are you going to let me out of here?" asked Buck eagerly.

"I'm sorry, but I can't," she told him.

"Well, listen," he said, "you've got to believe me. That man I half-drowned is an outlaw. He came here to rob your father. I'm Buck Healy. I can prove it to you. Your brother Ramon was in my Company—the 23rd Infantry. He was wounded at St. Mihiel, and died a month later in hospital."

"That is true," nodded Juanita.

"He used to talk about you all the time, and he told me to say to you, when I met you: 'Buenos noches, Juanita, don't get lost in your sleep.'"

"Oh!" "He said that when you were a little girl you wandered out of the house one night in your sleep and were lost for days."

"That's true!" "And every night, after that, he used to say to you, 'Buenos noches, Juanita, don't get lost in your sleep.'"

"I believe you—I believe in you," declared Juanita. "I think I nearly believed you all the time. I'm sorry I ever doubted you."

"Get me out of here before Murdoch does anything," urged Buck.

"Jose has the keys," she said. "But I'll go and tell my father at once."

She scurried back to the house, and in the arched drawing-room she found her father with Murdoch, who was wearing the Mexican clothes which had been lent him the night before. The door of a small safe stood open, and Senor del Rey had a casket in his hand.

(Continued on page 26.)

In order to gain his own ends an unscrupulous lawyer fastened his own crime on another's shoulders. A gripping tale of a great dam-burst.

"SWANEE RIVER"

A Fiery Old Southerner.

THE powerful Lincoln touring car purred gently over the hard-baked uneven track, and the black chauffeur smiled as he thought of the fine meal he would soon be eating. In the back of the open car sat three people.

The white-haired, square-shouldered old man with the trim moustache and small white Napoleon beard was Colonel Bradford. He was a Southerner of the old school, forthright, inclined to irascibility, especially where modern novelties and notions were concerned, but all his workers loved him.

The colonel owned many hundreds of acres of valuable forest and pasture land—many of the latter he had converted into cotton fields. The timber could have been sold for a vast sum, but the colonel would not hear of nature's beauty being sold for money. The colonel smiled happily and proudly as he saw in the distance a band of black employees working vigorously to a quick chant.

"My men never get out of time," he said aloud. "And it's a fast one."

The girl sitting in the middle smiled a little secret smile to herself. She knew the black boys better than her guardian. They had seen the sun glinting on the windscreen of the car a mile off, and she was pretty certain that until then the tune they had been singing would have been almost a dirge.

Caroline Bradford was a blonde of surprising beauty. Her round cheeks needed no make-up, long lashes veiled deep blue eyes, her body was gracefully moulded on athletic lines and the dimples that appeared in her cheeks showed that she had a sense of humour. Her sports outfit of white serge was well cut, and her blue beret set off her fair hair. Caroline loved the great outdoors and the guardian who had been so good to her.

"One day these lands will be yours, Jack." The colonel waved his hand lovingly towards hill and dale. "A Bradford has ruled here for many years and the same traditions have been kept up—shall continue to be kept up." His eyes sparkled with the intensity of his desire. "Never has a Bradford sold any of the timber on this land, never have the fields been anything else but cotton, never have there been less than three hundred niggers—"

Starring
GRANT
WITHERS
and THELMA TODD.

Jack Bradford frowned and turned his head. He was a sallow faced handsome man, whose dark hair, eyebrows and moustache gave him a somewhat saturnine appearance. Besides being nephew to Colonel Bradford, he also was his attorney. Caroline was twenty-one and he was seven years older—it was the wish of the colonel that they should carry on the line.

"And when I have joined my ancestors—" The colonel was on his favourite theme. "I hope that two people that I love very dearly will carry on the good work; it is my dearest wish that their friendship ripen to—"

The happy dimples vanished from the girl's cheeks and she moved restlessly.

"You will pardon an old man for touching on so delicate a subject," soothed the colonel, smiling at the girl. "But I am not good at keeping my thoughts and hopes to myself."

A smile flitted across the lips of Jack Bradford. Not often did he see eye to eye with the colonel, but marriage with Caroline was certainly a sound proposition. They were not engaged yet, but soon Caroline would name the day. The girl would come to care for him much more when they were married.

The car slowed down at a gate, and a black boy, who had been carrying a yoke with two pails, ran forward.

"You come along in de car with me," the chauffeur showed all his teeth in a gleam. "And open de gate to de house."

But at the next gate the colonel ordered the chauffeur to wait before the car moved forward.

"Look at that eyesore." The old martinet pointed towards a great brick dam some miles away. It blocked the valley and one could glimpse behind it a shimmering sheet of water. "Isn't there enough water without building that hideous structure? Jack, it makes me mad when I think that Ephraim Dutton offered me that territory ten years ago and I refused to buy. I could have stopped all that if I had bought it."

Over the grass came a brown horse with a tall, wavy haired young man in the saddle. Dusty riding boots, weather-beaten breeches and a shirt open at the throat—but for all his shabby dress, Garry Sommers looked every inch a man. The big face had an air of strength and determination, whilst the shoulders denoted power and perfect health, and when he smiled one liked this youngster at once. Garry was two years older than Caroline and he was an assistant engineer on the Great Dam.

Garry rode up from the rear so that the colonel and Jack Bradford did not hear or see him—Garry rode quietly as he neared the car. Yet Caroline heard him and turned her pretty head.

A happy smile appeared again and her cheeks blushed a delightful shade of pink.

Garry made strange movements with his mouth and pointed with his hand in the direction of the valley. A lip-reader could have told at once that one word was "To-night"—the girl understood because she nodded. She grinned rather foolishly as Jack Bradford glared at her and then scowled back at Sommers.

Confound the fellow. Caroline had been actually smiling at him! This would need watching. But the dam was almost complete and then Sommers would go away.

The colonel fairly bristled with wrath.

"Pah!—a blot on the horizon," he growled. "Rastus, drive on at once. Pah!"

Garry Sommers chuckled quietly as the powerful car disappeared in a cloud of dust. The colonel was old fashioned and yet he allowed himself the luxury of a powerful car.

"He's a kind-hearted old jossler, but I wish he weren't so stubborn," Garry said to his horse. "As stubborn as you can be, old hoss, though you ain't a mule."

Garry went at a gallop towards the dam. He whistled as he rode, because to-night he was meeting Caroline.

The Fight.

THE summer sun was sinking in the west and the rays cut strange patterns amongst the pine trees. Lounging against a tree, smoking a pipe and wearing the same clothes, was Garry Sommers.

The call of a whip-poor-will made him start. He placed fingers to his lips and the same call went floating back on the still air. But it was not Caroline that Garry saw hurrying towards him, but the colonel's old butler, Esau.

"Miss Caroline will be a little late, sah." The old butler liked young Garry Sommers, because the servant knew that here was a strong man who truly loved his young mistress.

Caroline had met Garry when looking over the dam—needless to say she had chosen a time when Colonel Bradford was away on business. The young engineer had been very attracted by the pretty girl and they had arranged to meet again, but so antagonistic was the colonel to anyone connected with the dam, that the two had only managed to fix up occasional meetings with the aid of the butler.

"I would wait for her for ever, Esau," Garry puffed at his pipe. "I can't think why she likes me."

"Oh, de reason ain't so hard to find, sah," grinned the old nigger. "She take one look at yuh—same as ah done—and she knowed yuh was a straight young fellow. Looks don't count wid me and Miss Caroline."

"Don't say any more, Esau—or you'll be telling me I'm how-legged," chuckled Garry. Suddenly he clutched the butler's arm. "Look, here she comes! See how the sun shines on her hair. What a picture she looks in that white muslin dress."

"Ah guess dis ain't no place for me, sah," chuckled Esau. "Massa Garry, ah'll go stand by dem trees and see dat nobody don't come dis way."

"Good for you, Esau," Garry patted the servant's shoulder and then strode through the pines to meet Caroline. She gave him her two soft hands and he raised both in turn to his lips.

"Stupid boy." Yet Caroline was pleased. "Suppose someone could see?"

"Let's walk towards the old pond," he hinted. "Esau is keeping watch. I'm glad I was able to fix up to see you to-night, because I've got some good news."

"Good news, Garry?" asked the girl, when they were seated on a fallen tree trunk.

"You know my boss, Morton?" He pointed vaguely in the direction of the dam. "Apparently he is not quite satisfied with the dam, and wants me to stay on for at least another fortnight, probably because he has at last heeded my report. That dam will give, and then a wall of water will crash down Cotton Valley, causing havoc and destruction—that is, unless further reinforcement is put in hand. Morton is also interested in the timber round here. Believe he wanted the colonel to sell the Western Section."

August 22nd, 1931.

"Yes, and he got shown the door," Caroline sighed. "I'm sorry you're staying on, Garry, because I was going to make this our farewell meeting."

"What are you talking about?" Garry gazed at the girl in amazement. "What makes you talk in this abrupt and startling fashion? You were bright and cheerful, and then you say this is our last meeting." He gave a shaky laugh. "You're having a joke with me."

"I wouldn't play a joke like that." Miserable blue eyes stared into his brown ones. "I've got to say something that will hurt you—something that I wouldn't have had to say if you had been going away. I was a coward, but now I must pluck up my courage. I planned a final farewell meeting, because you told me only the other day that this week would see you through."

"Yes, but I didn't know about Morton. But why, Caroline—"

"Listen, Garry, and don't be too hard on me." Caroline could not face the agony of suspense that she saw in his eyes. "Colonel Bradford is only a distant relation, but I've always called him father. He has dragged me from poverty and squalor and given me a beautiful home—I owe everything to him. It is his wish that the Bradfords never die out, and he wants me to—"

"Marry Jack." Garry spat out the words. "How can he expect you to marry a man you don't love?"

"I mustn't think about love, Garry," was her pitiful answer. "It's the one favour the colonel has asked, and I've tried every way to get out of marrying Jack, but with no success. It is to be announced at my birthday party next Tuesday."

"Oh, Caroline, you can't do this thing!" Garry held her close. "You love me."

"I do love you, Garry, but it would break father's heart if I didn't marry Jack. You'll soon forget me, Garry; they're plenty of other girls much nicer than me."

"Don't be absurd, Caroline!" He tilted her chin. "You know I love only you. I won't give you up!" Suddenly he kissed her, and she clung to him—tears trickled slowly down her cheeks.

"Please let me go—you make it all the harder," sobbed the girl. "I must be getting back or father will miss me. Kiss me once more, Garry, for the last time."

Old Esau, who was much too decent a nigger to watch young lovers, suddenly felt himself brushed aside. Jack Bradford flung away his cigar.

"So this is why Caroline slunk out of the house?" he sneered. "You're a bad watch-dog."

"Ah don't know nothing, sah," quavered Esau. "Ah just came out here to take de air."

But Jack Bradford was not listening. He strode towards the small pond and the crackling of the dried grasses under his feet made the two lovers jump apart. There was an unpleasant sneer on the attorney's face.

"Sorry to interrupt," he said. "But Colonel Bradford wants his daughter in the house. Caroline, do you mind running along—I would like a few words with your friend."

"I was saying good-bye," said Sommers, uncertain how to act.

"So I noticed," scoffed Jack Bradford. "I think you had better hurry, Caroline, as your father wants to know where you've been."

"Can't I go anywhere without you spying on me?" she flamed at him. "Aren't you forgetting Colonel Bradford's wishes?" The attorney played the right card.

Without a word Caroline walked away along the path. Her brain seemed to be whirling. She longed to defy her adoptive father and Jack, but she must remember all that had been done for her. She must get away before love made her act contrary to what was her duty. Perhaps she might write a farewell to Garry.

The two men, left alone, stared at each other—Garry was solemn and unhappy; Jack fierce, unpleasant and mocking. It was Jack who spoke first.

"Are you aware that Caroline is engaged to me?"

"I have just learnt the news," was the quiet reply. "I was saying my last good-bye."

"And in future keep out of my way," threatened the lawyer. "Caroline's my property and I'll have no interlopers around."

"You're a cad to talk like that!" Garry was roused. "She's only marrying you because it is the colonel's wish."

"The colonel's a wise man," laughed Jack in boasting triumph. "And Caroline will soon learn that she has a master in me. She won't try flirting with any cheap engineer—"

Bradford got no further, because Garry hit him on the point of the chin.

"You cheap skate!" Garry shouted. "How dare you talk that way! I'd like to give you a hiding!"

"Then here's your chance!" raged Bradford, and callously kicked his enemy in mid-regions.

Garry doubled up and crashed among the grasses near the pond. At once the lawyer tried to seize his chance to pummel the youngster into insensibility, but the agonising pain passed and the lawyer was flung away.

The two men got to their feet and slugged wildly at each other, but soon superior strength and fitness began to tell, and always Jack Bradford had to retreat. Both his eyes were red and swollen and his nose was bleeding, but he refused to be beaten. Suddenly he grabbed up an old tree branch that lay among the rushes, and with a scything blow at Garry's knees brought his rival down. Once more they were locked in each other's arms.

Caroline heard the scuffling and then saw them fighting on the very edge of the pond, which was muddy and treacherous.

"Father! Father!" Through the trees she had seen the figure of the colonel. "Father, here, quick!"

Colonel Bradford had come out to find where Jack and Caroline had gone. At the sound of the girl's cries he hurried to her side.

"What's going on?"

"They're fighting! They'll be drowned! Oh, stop them!"

"Leave this to me!" The martinet hunched up his coat and, with a stick clenched in his hand, ran down the path.

He arrived on the scene at the precise moment that Garry broke free from Jack, lugged the lawyer to his feet and planted a blow on the chin that toppled his enemy amongst the rushes.

Next moment Colonel Bradford had thrust himself in front of the panting victor.

"How dare you! How dare you! You villainous rascal!" shouted the colonel. "What's the meaning of this blackguardly attack on my nephew? You hulking bully! You blackguard! Unless you're off my estates within two minutes I'll call my servants and have you thrown off!"

Garry looked beyond the colonel to where Jack Bradford squatted, rubbing an aching jaw. Should he tell the colonel that his prize nephew was a cad? Useless, as it would not be believed, and Jack Bradford might counter some lying tale about himself. Best to go and say nothing.

Already a plan was forming in the young engineer's head.

"I'll go, colonel." The words seemed to satisfy the colonel, for the old man stood back. "One day you may find out that you've got me all wrong. I don't care what your nephew tells you about this row, but he asked for trouble."

"He was telling a lot of lies to Caroline," Jack Bradford was on his feet. "And—"

"Unless you want to go into that pond you'd better still your tongue!" cried Garry.

"Leave at once, sir!" The colonel pointed. "In another minute I'll summon my servants."

"Don't worry, colonel. I'm going." Garry turned on his heel and strode off to the thicket, where he had hidden his horse.

The Murder.

OLD Esau showed the last of the guests into the big house of wood and brick that had been built and altered by generations of Bradfords. The call of the whip-poor-will made him peer round in a nervous fashion. A hand beckoned from behind a bush, and on tip-toe Esau walked over the lawn.

"Massa Garry, yuh sure ought not to be here," Esau nodded his head solemnly. "Why, if de colonel knew—"

"He would have me shot on the spot," laughed Garry. "I've just seen Miss Caroline."

"You've seen Miss Caroline?" The nigger gazed upwards to the first floor. "Why, she be in her bed-room and ah don't see—"

"I whistled like I did to you and she came out on to her veranda," Garry sighed. "She looked beautiful in that new dress of hers. I told her I was going to have one shot at stopping the announcement of her engagement to Jack Bradford."

"It won't do no good, sah. De colonel have sure set his mind on Massa Jack marrying Miss Caroline." The butler shook his head. "You would only make de colonel fighting mad—he have de bad heart."

"I know something that will open the colonel's eyes to the mistake he is making," Garry answered. "Now, don't argue any more, Esau, but run along and find the colonel; tell him a gentleman wants to see him in the library. Leave the rest to me."

"Ah'll sure do as yuh say, sah," Esau answered. "Any port in de storm to stop dis wedding."

The colonel frowned when Esau at last got him to one side and stated there was a guest in the library.

"What is his name, Esau?"

"The gentleman never give me no name, sah," Esau answered. "But he say dat it were mighty important dat he speak to yuh dis minute."

"All right, I'll go and see who it is," Colonel Bradford nodded to his servant.

The colonel nearly burst a blood vessel when he found the visitor was Garry Sommers.

"What is the meaning of this outrage?" The colonel's moustache bristled with anger. "What impertinence is this? How dare you force your way into my house. I'll see that Esau is fired in the morning—he told me a gentleman—"

"With important and urgent business wanted to see you," Garry interrupted.

"I've come to talk about Caroline. Your chief objection to me is that I'm spoiling the face of nature with machinery and bricks, cutting down forests and destroying the peace of this beautiful land. Are you aware that you have an interest in that dam?"

"You're talking nonsense. Leave my house!"

"You've an interest in that dam, because owing to a recent purchase of land we can raise the water level another four feet. That land is in the Eastern Section."

"The Eastern Section?" Now the colonel was startled. "Where that road you've made goes along by the pine wood? I never sanctioned such a sale, and"—he stared hard at Garry—"you're hinting that you've got this land through Jack."

"Morton bought it yesterday, and starts cutting timber in the morning," was the calm answer. "And I reckon a guy that would sell behind your back doesn't deserve to marry a girl who is as honest as she is pretty. Now you know why I've had the impertinence to come here to-night."

"I'm going to give you a chance to prove this," the colonel decided. "Go into my private study and wait there."

Jack Bradford, coming to find the colonel as the guests were eager for the announcement, stopped dead when he heard voices in the library. He cautiously edged forward and heard all that Garry was saying, but he darted behind a curtain when the colonel ordered the engineer to go into the study.

"What's your plan, colonel?" asked Garry.

"I shall ask him point blank if he sold my land," was the answer. "You will know what to expect if he says 'no.'"

"If I know Jack Bradford, 'no' will be his answer!" Garry gave a scornful laugh. "I suggest you chek up on me in the morning by riding over to the eastern section."

"You hide in that study." The colonel was brisk and decided. "We'll settle this matter at once."

Jack Bradford heard a loud click and guessed that Garry had been locked in the study. Should he slink away himself or face the music? What tale could he tell the old fool? Say he had been offered a marvellous price and that he had thought that, as the dam could not be stopped, there was no harm in selling the small section? The colonel could easily be smoothed down with a little tact—Jack Bradford did not know the hot temper of the old soldier quite as well as he imagined.

Jack Bradford strolled into the library just as the colonel was coming to look for him.

"Just the person I want to talk to." The colonel faced his lawyer. "I want "You murdering thug!" Garry braced his shoulders. "You haven't got me yet!"

to ask you a question and I want the truth."

"Certainly, colonel, but the guests—"

"They can wait—dog-gast 'em!" The colonel was fuming. "We'll have the question first. Have you, or have you not, sold a section of the eastern property to Morton?"

"Well—er—I—" Bradford did not find it so easy to answer before those accusing eyes. "You see, it was a sort of surprise—how did you find out?"

"So you have sold the land?" The colonel became suddenly like a madman. "You've betrayed the power of attorney I gave you to sell my lands. My beautiful trees will be dragged down and sold because my nephew is a thief and a Judas!"

"No, colonel, it isn't that way," Jack Bradford argued. "I was offered a huge price and I sold because the dam could not be stopped. I did not think a few extra feet of water—"

"That grove of young white pines will be destroyed!" The colonel's eyes blazed in a strange manner. "The old forest destroyed and these new trees buried under water to supply you with money. A week ago you tried to borrow a thousand dollars from me, and when I refused you sold my lands. You double-crossing trickster! That I should live to see one of my own blood sink so low!"

"I was going to tell you about it, after the announcement," Jack Bradford also possessed a fiery temper. "I sell useless land for five thousand and this is all the thanks I get!"

"There will not be any announcement!" The colonel was vicious and vengeful. "You cease to remain my attorney and I shall cut you out of my will. The engagement between you and Caroline is finished. Only a few days ago you agreed that my land should never be sold and yet, behind my back, you begin to sell before I'm dead. Now I can see through you. Why, you would sell everything, make Caroline unhappy, and squander it all on fast living! I've been a blind old fool."

"Because a sneaking engineer comes crawling here," Bradford pointed to the locked study. "You believe all he says and turn against me. What have I done—just sold a bit of land!"

"And kept the money," sneered the colonel. "Like a lot of other goods of mine. A year ago you sold a thousand copper shares just before there was a big rise, you made me invest money on ranch stock that turned out valueless—I can think now of a lot of things. You're a Judas. A liar! A thief!"

"Don't you talk like that to me," snarled Bradford. "I've sold a few old pines and you act like a madman. Your old-fashioned ideas have affected your brain—you're going crazy! I'm your attorney and you're not rid of me yet. Unless you change your tune, I'll sell up half your stock this night—I could put a long-distance call through from here and you wouldn't stop me."

"You get out of my house!" The colonel lost control of his temper and suddenly gripped his nephew by the throat. "Get out, or I'll chuck you out."

"Take your hands off me or I'll smash you," raved the younger man. "Let go, you old fool!"

Bradford forced the colonel back on to his desk and endeavoured to pin the old man down. Groping fingers found a dagger paper-knife, and weakly the colonel tried to stab at the fingers that held him so relentlessly.

The knife was grabbed from the old August 22nd, 1931.

fingers, and in a frenzy of rage Jack Bradford drove the knife into his uncle's chest.

"Take that, you interfering old fool!" came his mad cry, and then he realised what he had done. "By heaven, I've killed him!"

The colonel gave a groan and rolled off the desk on to the floor.

Jack Bradford bent over his victim. His face was ghastly white, not from remorse, but horror of the consequences. With a shudder he flung away the knife and started to his feet.

He became aware that someone was hammering and banging on the locked study door. In the heated quarrel they had paid no attention. Garry Summers knew that something was wrong and was trying to break into the room.

A look of fiendish joy crossed Bradford's face. Taking out his handkerchief, he picked up and wiped the handle of the knife before placing it near the still figure. Then he wiped his hands and sped from the library. A quick clean-up and a new handkerchief; then out into the garden and round to the veranda of the drawing-room. Calmly and unconcernedly he mingled with the guests.

The Escape.

GARRY had mooned about the study. He had no desire to listen to the conversation, though there would have been every excuse for him to eavesdrop. Yet he edged towards the door when the voices were raised. He wished Colonel Bradford had not locked him in the study.

It was difficult to hear all that was being said, but he knew that both men were getting more and more angry. When they began to fight Garry wished he had acted before. He banged on the door.

"Let me out! Don't be a fool, Jack!" he shouted, but the doors were very thick.

At last, in desperation, he flung himself against the door.

No sound came now from the library, and that worried Garry considerably. What had happened in the next room? Summoning all his strength, he flung himself again and again against the door! At last a crash, and he stumbled into the room.

The desk was swept clean of everything. Garry noted the disorder first, next that the study seemed deserted. Then he perceived the still figure on the carpet.

Swiftly he bent over Colonel Bradford, and one glance was enough to show him that the Southerner was dead.

"Knifed!" Garry picked up the weapon, then threw it down. "I wonder where that skunk is hiding?"

Next moment Caroline appeared in the doorway. Why was Garry so long with the colonel? She had to find out. What a sight met her eyes as she entered the library—Garry bending over the body of Colonel Bradford!

Her scream of terror meant much to Jack Bradford.

"Something's wrong," cried the lawyer to the guests. "I'll go and find out."

Naturally everyone piled after him, and a throng of inquisitive faces gathered at the open door of the library. They saw Garry Summers kneeling beside the prone figure of the colonel, Caroline gazing at the scene with horror-stricken, accusing eyes, and Jack Bradford pointing an accusing finger.

"Colonel Bradford's been stabbed!"

he cried. "And you haven't got far to look to see who did it."

Garry had been so intent on examining the colonel for any chance of life that he had taken little account of the crowd that had collected. Being a person who could never kill anybody, the possibility that he might be accused of the crime never entered his head. Naturally Caroline had screamed, but she would never think him capable of such a deed. The engineer looked up and saw the horror and dread in her eyes. So she did think he had done this foul deed!

"I was locked in that room"—Garry pointed to the study. "All I could hear was the colonel and someone quarrelling; then there was a fight, and I tried to break in. When I did break in, the colonel was lying on the floor—dead!"

"Then why are your hands covered with blood?" sneered Jack Bradford. "What are you doing inside this house, which has been forbidden to you? We all know you hated the colonel, and this is your revenge!"

"You lying skunk!" Garry was on his feet. "The colonel was quarrelling with you, and—"

"But Jack was in with us," cried one of Jack's special friends. "Why should Jack want to kill his best friend?"

"The row was over land that had been sold without the colonel's consent," shouted Garry, and was aware of the hostility of the guests, most of whom were friends of Jack Bradford. The lawyer had a persuasive manner that went down well with most people.

"That's a lie!" blustered Bradford. "Seize him, boys, don't let him escape. We've got the murderer here. I know he had it in for the colonel." Several of the guests ranged up beside Garry. "I loved every hair of uncle's grey head," added Bradford, making his voice choke as if with emotion. "This skunk has killed him in cold blood!"

Caroline had said nothing all this while—she seemed paralysed by this sudden tragedy. All she could do was to stare with horror at the still figure, and then gaze at Garry with wondering, incredulous eyes. It was all so confusing: Garry had told her that he could persuade the colonel to change his mind—had he meant by using force?

"Caroline," Garry appealed to the girl, "you don't think I did it?"

"I—I can't say," she managed to stammer out. The girl rubbed her hands together in a distraught manner. She did not know what to say or do.

"Caroline knows he did it," Jack Bradford was not going to miss this chance of saving his own skin. "Hold him, boys, and don't let the skunk have a chance of escape!"

Perhaps Garry acted foolishly, but who can blame him? All round were people who thought him guilty, and if he were taken off to gaol, what chance would he have of proving his innocence? He must escape, and then get proof of the real murderer.

"This means the chair for you," Bradford laughed in his rival's face. "I'm going to hold you until we can get the sheriff."

"You murdering thug!" Garry braced his shoulders. "You haven't got me yet. Take that!"

With a mighty effort Garry had wriggled free from detaining hands and planted his fist in the sallow features. Bradford sank back into his friends' arms.

At once there was a rush, but with rights and lefts Garry swept a clear space. One man he picked up and flung in the faces of the others, and this gave him time to make the window: a crash of glass and he was through.

Down the drive raced Garry, and after him ran a dozen men. Soon Bradford caught them up, and he held in his hand a gun.

"Don't let him get away!" His voice was hoarse with rage. "We've got to get him."

Along the side of a lake panted the young engineer, and always Bradford kept to his trail. Once Garry tricked the pursuit by hiding behind a tree and doubling back, but they soon heard him crashing through the undergrowth. Twice Bradford fired, but the bullets went wide.

Garry came at last to that part of the lake where a river flowed in, and though the current was strong and treacherous, he did not hesitate. They heard the splash as he hit the water, and Bradford raced down to the bank.

"There he is!" Bradford fired. "Ah, ne's sunk—I've got him!"

But Garry had only dived. Under water he swam, coming up now and again for a quick breath. At last he cautiously crawled out on the opposite bank.

Bradford cursed, as none of them dared to swim the river, and there was no boat.

"We'll get the sheriff and his bloodhounds." He waved the pursuit back. "Back to the house and ring for the sheriff!"

Blackmail.

ESAU and Caroline were whispering together in the hall.

"When old Esau make up his mind dat a person is a crook, den he is sure right." He shook his head solemnly. "Ah knows, and mah darkie friends knows dat Massa Garry ain't no killer—dat's why Ah tells yuh where we've hidden him."

"I was crazy ever to think otherwise, Esau," answered Caroline. "But it all looked so suspicious. Oh, Esau, they've got bloodhounds taking up the trail!"

"Maybe we can bluff dem dawgs," grunted the old butler. "Shush—here come de new master!"

Esau slithered away to the servants' quarters, whilst Caroline, after a moment's hesitation, hurried up the stairs.

Bradford came in and walked towards the study and frowned as he saw a man sitting there smoking. Caroline came down the stairs and edged close to the door so that she could hear; she was taking any chance to help Garry find evidence.

"Hallo, Morton!" spoke Bradford. "And what can I do for you? You have heard all about what happened yesterday?"

"You mean the colonel?" Morton was a clean-shaven, big-faced man of middle age—his eyes were crafty, his smile was hard and cruel. "Oh, yeah, I heard all about that. What I came about was the Eastern Section. I want to buy all that bit of forest land—the timber is fine. The sale of that timber would fetch a good price, and I could also do a good deal with the directors of the dam."

"It's quite impossible," Bradford answered. "The colonel was all against selling—"

"I'm offering five thousand dollars," Morton calmly puffed at his cigar. "And you're accepting that offer."

"You're crazy, man! Why the wood is worth that price, and the land about three times as much."

"Yet I'm offering five thousand," was the cool rejoinder. "I should not refuse, if I were you."

"What do you mean?" There was an edge of fear in Bradford's words.

"The document dealing with the first sale might put a different light on who murdered Colonel Bradford." Morton carelessly flicked the ash on the carpet. "And there is another letter of yours, suggesting a further sale. Very foolish to put things in writing. Now what do you say to my offer of five thousand?"

"Curse you!" Bradford was cornered. "You can't prove anything, but I don't want trouble now, so I'll sell for five thousand."

"Then let's shake on it!" Morton mocked.

Caroline ran for the stairs lest she should be seen. Here was the evidence Garry needed.

Soon after, Morton and Jack went off in the car and Caroline at once sought out Esau.

"I've got a clue, Esau," she cried excitedly. "Can you take me at once to where you have hidden Garry?"

"Now Massa Bradford am gone, it is safe." The butler examined a huge watch. "We won't be gone long."

Esau led the way to a sandpit about two miles from the dam. Sand had been dug out to mix with the cement. After a while the quality of the sand had become poor and the working had been abandoned. A number of caves had been made in the sandstone cliffs by the workmen, and in some of these wandering-blacks had made a home.

They all knew and loved Uncle Esau, so that what the old man said was almost a law to them. He told them to hide Garry Sommers, and they hid him in one of the caves.

The sheriff and his posse were led by the bloodhounds to the caves, but the men thought the dogs must have got a wrong scent when they saw the grinning faces. No, sah, dey hadn't seen no white mans!

Esau led her into a cave which had a smaller cave beyond it, and in there she found a young man, who clasped her close in his strong arms.

"Oh, Garry, I should never have doubted you!" she cried with a sob. "But father was so stubborn, and you were so mad about it all, that I feared you had lost your temper."

"And knifed him, Caroline?"

"I know you could never do anything like that, but I didn't know what I was doing." She clung to him. "Then Esau came to me, and what a comfort he was! Directly he said that he was certain you hadn't killed the colonel, I knew at once he was right."

"You precious darling!"

"Esau said that he had trailed you, and then hidden you in these caves." Caroline spoke in whispers, as if she feared the sheriff might be listening.

"He promised to bring me to you directly it was safe, and whilst I was waiting something happened." She pushed a parcel into his hands. "Here is something to eat. Stop kissing me, Garry, and eat, because every moment is of value. Listen, and I'll tell you what has happened."

"No one else has been killed?"

"No, no. It concerns Morton." Caroline saw how alert Garry became at that name. "Twenty minutes to half an hour ago he talked to Jack in the study, and I heard every word. Morton offered five thousand for the rest of the Eastern Section."

"I'm offering five thousand!" was the cool rejoinder. "I should not refuse if I were you."

"Five thousand!"

"Jack sold!" Caroline interrupted fiercely. "Sold because Morton forced his hand. There is a document that Morton possesses, concerning some other sale in the Eastern Section, and also a letter which Jack must have talked about selling other parts of the property—all done while father was alive."

"I know about that sale in the Eastern Section." Garry was eating his sandwiches in haste. "And I know where Morton keeps all his documents. Listen, I've got to get that document at once, because Morton, realising its value, may send it to a bank. Will you wait here, Caroline, until I return?"

"I'll wait for you here, Garry, but don't be too long, as I shall be anxious."

Esau and the darkies had to leave Caroline. They had work to do in the cotton fields, but the girl did not mind being left alone. How worried she would have been if she had known that someone else was after that document. Jack Bradford, after leaving Morton, who was on his way to a nearby township, had decided that this was a fine chance to steal the incriminating letter.

A rogue will never trust another rogue, and Morton had not gone far when he realised that Bradford was not behind him. Bradford had talked about going to the town—why hadn't he done as he said? Morton suddenly thought of the letter, and turned his car.

Morton knew a short cut, and he drove his car full out for the Dam Construction Camp.

A Fiendish Plot.

MORTON arrived at the Construction Camp, and found no one about, as it was a half-holiday. He opened his office, saw that everything was intact, slid a revolver into his pocket and went outside. Perhaps he had made a mistake, still it was as well to take no chances. It was a big surprise when he heard the sound of a galloping horse, and not a car.

Morton's lips became a sneer when a hot and perspiring Garry Sommers slid from the back of the horse.

"You don't expect help from me?"

"I don't expect anything where I'm not likely to get it." Garry stared coldly into the other's eyes.

"I shall hand you over to the sheriff."

"Not so fast, Morton. You don't think I came here for the pleasure of giving myself into your keeping? In the two months I've worked under you, I've had a pretty fair idea of your methods. So far, we have had no row, but it's been a mighty near thing. I've come here after a certain letter."

"Letter?" Morton was suspicious. "You've come here to steal money."

"I don't suppose I should find much if I tried." Garry gave a harsh laugh. "No, I want a document that deals with the sale of timber land that belonged to Colonel Bradford. Sold by Jack Bradford and bought by you, and I also want a letter from Bradford, concerning the possibilities of further sales. I want that document and the letter, Morton."

"You won't get them," sneered the crook, and drew his pistol. "I've got you where I want you. Move and I shoot."

"Good heavens, the dam!" Garry tried an old trick. His eyes were staring at something behind Morton.

Morton fell for the trick and turned August 22nd, 1931.

his head; in a second the gun was wrenched from his hand and flung far away. A great fist caught Morton between the eyes and the man crashed to the ground.

As Garry made to step into the office, Morton grabbed his legs, but the engineer kicked himself free.

The crook got to his feet and flung himself after Sommers, who was compelled to push his late employer out into the open and stretch him flat with two hefty punches.

"Stay there, you cheap crook!" he panted, before charging back into the shack.

Jack Bradford parked his car some distance from the offices of the Dam Construction camp, and went forward cautiously on foot. He was in time to witness Garry stretch Morton flat, and to see Morton stagger to his feet and follow Sommers.

Bradford rubbed his chin and stared at the wooden shack as if trying to make up his mind. He guessed why Garry was fighting with Morton. If only he could get rid of these two men. That would settle everything—Caroline would be his, the land would be his, and the two men who could prove him a murderer would be dead. If only there was some way!

A gleam came to his crafty eyes as he glanced at the great dam that overshadowed the wooden shack. Next moment, bent double, he was racing towards a small shed, on which was written: "Dynamite." "Dangerous Explosives." "No Smoking."

Garry Somers burst into the office of the Dam Construction Company and at once made for the centre drawer in the big table. Naturally it was locked and, as Garry was considering how best he should burst it open, Morton rushed into the room.

The lighting of the room was only one small window, and as dusk was not far away it was difficult for the two fighters to see what they were doing. They slammed wildly at each other, and many a blow hit only the air. At last they got to grips, and the tables and chairs went crashing in all directions.

Both were powerfully built and in training, though Garry was perhaps the better boxer, but Morton made up for that by a knowledge of all the foul methods of fighting. Once he almost won the fight by a kick that paralysed Garry's left leg, and on another occasion a vicious upward blow to the stomach with his knee nearly met with success.

Garry knew what failure meant, and he struggled on until the agonising pains had passed. He beat a tattoo on Morton's ribs and broke free from the other's clinging arms. They got to their feet, and in the exchange of punches it was undoubtedly the boy who came off best—twice he landed an upper-cut to the chin that shook his man.

Morton tried another method of attack. He picked up chairs and any heavy object he could find and hurled them at Garry, who spent his time dodging the missiles and trying to get at grips with his enemy.

Eventually he ripped away a broken chair and landed a straight left that dropped Morton to the floor; but the man was far from beaten.

"I'll smash you for that, you whelp!"

he growled through bleeding lips, and, getting to his feet, rushed wildly.

Garry tripped, in the semi-darkness, over a chair and crashed backwards. Like a madman Morton flung himself on the boy and fastened steel-like fingers on his throat. Garry struggled to free the grip; but Morton hung on, and soon everything seemed to the young engineer to be going round and round. He was forced to use one of Morton's methods—a blow to the mid-regions with his fist.

Once more he was free, but his throat was making strange wheezing noises as he tried to regain his breath. Garry had to stagger round the smashed office, with Morton after him, until his breath and strength returned, then he turned like a tiger to fight back.

That was the end. A hard right to Morton's bleeding nose, and a right and left upper-cut to the jaw—the dam boss rocked on his feet and then fell in a heap.

For a moment or two Garry rested with his hand against the wall. Now the fight was over he felt absolutely played out. He steeled himself to look for the document, and dragged the desk forward. Luck favoured him, because the drawer was easily forced, and it contained about half a dozen papers and documents. These Garry carried to the light, and gave a cry of joy after scanning two of them. These should prove valuable evidence in clearing his name.

The youngster stuffed them in his pocket and turned to Morton. The crook showed signs of recovery, and was trying to stand up.

"No need to waste time over you!" growled Garry. "I've got all proof I need, you skunk!"

Out of the office he ran and jumped to the saddle of his horse. With heart aglow with expectant hope he rode back towards the cave.

He had gone a quarter of a mile when the whole ground rocked, and then there followed an appalling explosion. A glance back showed the whole of the dam collapsing like a pack of cards.

"Morton's blown the dam!" gasped Garry.

As he stood there, paralysed by the magnificence of this terrifying spectacle, a wall of water engulfed the company's offices. His own plight made him dig his heels into his horse's flanks, and then he thought of Caroline in the cave—it would be right in the path of the water!

Furiously he urged his mount to greater speed.

Already the water had claimed two victims—Morton and Bradford. A piece of jagged concrete had come flying through the air and had struck the fiendishly-laughing lawyer full in the face. He had toppled over and over into the swirling, rushing waters.

Where Was the Cave?

GARRY had no time to spare wondering how Morton was faring. If the crook were drowned in the flood, then it was a just retribution. His worry concerned Caroline. Would she remain in the cave? He feared she would, because, being inside the quarry, she might have no idea of what went on outside, and she would remain in the quarry, because she did not wish to give away the hiding-place, as the sheriff was a man who hated to abandon a trail.

His next thought was the course the water would take. It must follow the bed of the old river, which had become but a trickle since the erection of the dam, and the quarry was only a few yards from the banks. How far was it now to the quarry, and was the water gaining?

The water was coming down the valley like an express train, and Garry glanced back to see a great brown wall crashing through the trees straight for him. His only chance was to gain higher ground.

This was managed in the nick of time, and as he rode along a plateau he saw the great wave rush past below him. Trees and rocks were swept out of the way like so much chaff, whilst the roar of the water was appalling.

The water was bound to reach the quarry before he could, but the huge wave was getting lower and should soon lose some of its first swiftness. That meant that though the water would rush into the quarry, it would not become a maelstrom, but rather like a huge lake. How long would it be before the water got up to the cave, which was but a few feet above the floor of the quarry?

Garry planned to ride along the plateau and then slide down into the quarry. His heart almost stood still as he stared down. Already the quarry was filling. Caroline must have drowned—unless she had crawled up the slippery sides.

Down the bank slithered Garry, and once or twice he paused to yell "Caroline! Caroline!" But his only answer was the boiling, squelching gurgle of water pouring into the quarry.

At last he was on the edge of the slowly rising water. No sign of Caroline. Then, to his horror, he realised he could not see the cave. He edged nearer to the place where it had been, and a wild hope thrilled him as he heard a faint:

"Garry! Garry!"

Caroline was inside the cave, but where was it? Garry hugged the slippery, crumbling sides of the quarry, and then he saw the cave. The arch was just showing, and in a few moments it would be completely covered.

No time to tear off his boots or shirt! Without a thought of the risk, he dived into the dirty brown water and was carried through the opening into the cave. At last his head came above water, and the first thing he heard was his name.

A chimney had been cut in the centre of the cave and this enabled a faint light to disperse the gloom. Caroline was lying on a sandstone ledge, and already the water was over her legs.

"Oh, Garry, Garry!" Caroline was nearly delirious with joy at seeing his head appear above the water.

"Help me out!" he yelled at her, and she assisted him to clamber to the ledge beside her.

"Is there no hope, dearest? I'm not afraid," she called to him.

"Must get my wind!" he panted out. "We've got about five minutes to make that opening." He pointed to the entrance of the cave, which still showed a small gap. "Got to fight against the current, and we must not fail."

"I was hiding when the water came," Caroline clung close to him. "Only a little while before, the sheriff and his deputy came exploring the quarry, then they gave a yell and ran."

"They saw the water—good!" cried Garry. "They will warn all the people along the valley and they should be able to escape to higher ground. Are you ready, Caroline—as the entrance has nearly gone? Cling to my right shoulder with your left hand, and kick out with your feet! Ready?"

"Yes, Garry."

Gently he drew the girl down into the swirling water and placed her hand on his shoulder.

"I'm going to work along the side for a few yards," he shouted in her ear. "Then I'm going to swim under water. Hold your breath and hold tightly."

Bravely the girl nodded her head.

"I won't get panicky," was her answer.

Garry worked his way for a few yards and then gave Caroline the signal; next moment he was under water. It was a hard fight getting through the opening of the cave, but Caroline did her best, and at last they were out in the quarry.

The water seemed to beat in their faces and try to drag them under, but with all their strength they battled to the side of the quarry. Caroline let go her hold of Garry to clutch at an old tree stump, and soon drew herself to safety. Garry was almost done after his fight with Morton and now this struggle against the elements.

It was Caroline's strong arms that helped him up the bank. They sat there gasping and panting, whilst the water still slowly rose towards them.

"Better now," Garry managed to shout to Caroline. "We must climb!"

Soon they were beyond the cruel grip of the water, but they pushed on as best they could, because they were anxious to know how the people of the valley had fared. Many of the darkies that had worked for Colonel Bradford had bamboo and reed huts on the old banks of the river.

Garry helped Caroline to the saddle of his horse when the top of the quarry had at last been reached. It was pitch dark now, and Garry staggered along, leading the horse under the murky night.

They came to a well-worn trail, and Garry climbed up into the saddle behind Caroline. At a trot they made for the Bradford mansion.

What joy to find Esau and all the darkies safe and well! Esau was nearly delirious when Garry and Caroline, looking like drowned rats, staggered into the house.

Garry had not lost his precious evidence in his race to save Caroline. It was soaked and dirty, but still readable. There were plenty to prove that the breaking of the dam had been caused by explosive, and when the water went down they found Jack Bradford's car, and later on they found the two men. The case against Garry Summers was withdrawn, and a verdict against Jack Bradford, deceased, decided upon after brief proceedings.

Soon the work of rebuilding the dam was started, but on the special day everyone ceased work.

The special day being the occasion of the marriage of Garry Summers to Caroline Bradford.

(By permission of the Gaumont Company, starring Grant Withers and Thelma Todd.)

"I'll smash you for that, you whelp!" he growled through bleeding lips.

August 22nd, 1931,

A Western thriller of a horse that was swifter than lightning and became the terror of the plains. Starring Jack Perrin and his horse, Starlight.

The Phantom.

"MORNIN', Colonel!"

Colonel van Horn gave his neighbouring rancher a nod, and continued to stare out over the distant hills.

The colonel had once been known as the most genial rancher out West. Certain it was that he was looked upon with friendly eyes by all those around him, in spite of the fact that he had managed to build up his great business at the expense of many others.

Van Horn's thoroughbred horses were famed throughout the States, and their fame brought to the retired officer a not inconsiderable fortune. It was only in the natural course of things that in consequence the demand for horses of lesser calibre was nothing like so good as it had once been.

Many neighbours might have felt resentment at that fact. But none of them showed resentment to Colonel van Horn. He was so genial, so welcoming, so very ready to help with advice, food, water, or anything else that might be required by his rivals in business.

It was with something of a shock, therefore, that the self-same neighbours gradually became less and less welcome at the Diamond Cross Ranch. The old rancher had little or no time for the long chats in which he had once been so willing to indulge. He seemed just as if he wanted to be quite alone.

Even Mary, his daughter, found a great change in him. He was morose even with her, and she found herself less and less in his company.

But it was for the good of everybody that they knew the reason for the change.

The colonel was losing heavily through the visit of the most daring and at the same time the most elusive raider that August 22nd, 1931.

part of the West had ever known. Dozens of his best brood mares had simply disappeared off the great open plains as if they had been spirited away.

No one knew of their going or where they went. They just disappeared. No footsteps were ever seen to tell them the slightest thing about the raider. He came and he went without leaving a trace, and with his every visit to the ranch and the plain thereabouts Colonel van Horn lost a batch of his best mares.

Dan Denton, the colonel's nearest neighbour, had lost a few horses, but their value was puny compared with that sustained by the colonel.

"You know, colonel," said Dan Denton now, diving his hands deep into the pockets of his riding-breeches and touching upon the one subject which was certain to draw the colonel. "I reckon there won't be the slightest hope of putting a stop to these losses until that Phantom is caught."

"The Phantom?" repeated the colonel. "H'm! You can't tell me, Denton, that a great white horse can spirit away my mares, or anybody else's horses! Why, he is scarcely ever seen around here!"

"No; but the fact remains that the raids have been real heavy since he was first spotted," said Denton thoughtfully. "There was that dozen—the first lot you lost. The Phantom was seen but a couple of hours before they were missed. It's weird."

Van Horn nodded. "It's sure that," he agreed. "That white horse is a grand-looker, and it's a mighty funny thing where he goes when he dashes off. He's got such speed, too, that no one can follow him."

"He ain't got the speed of a bullet, colonel," said Denton slyly.

Colonel van Horn started, opened his mouth as if about to speak, and closed it again, a worried frown upon his brow.

"Why not offer a reward for his capture?" put in Denton.

"I'd willingly give a thousand dollars for that," said Van Horn. "It would at least confirm or remove some suspicions. I admit, Denton, that I'm thinking everybody around here is a rustler, and that I am the chief victim! But—well, it ain't done to shoot wild horses. He might not be the rustler."

"Oh, shucks!" said Denton impatiently. "What's the good of him, anyway? Nobody can catch him—Hallo, here's Steve, and, by the way he's riding, he's got news!"

He broke off then to watch, with the colonel, the cloud of dust that had appeared down the trail. It heralded the arrival of the colonel's foreman, Steve, and the nearer the pounding hoofs of Steve's mount came, the more puckered became the colonel's brows.

He did not speak until Steve had flung himself from his steaming mount.

"Well, Steve?" he said quietly.

"That bunch we had in the far corral have gone, boss," said Steve. "There ain't a hoss left."

"But—but they were in a corral around which was barbed wire!" exclaimed Van Horn incredulously.

"All busfed down, sir," said Steve. For a moment the colonel did not speak—a moment which was utilised by the ranch foreman and Dan Denton for an exchange of glances.

"Did you see that white horse—the Phantom?" asked Van Horn suddenly.

Steve nodded. "I sure saw him an hour before I missed the bunch, boss," he said. "He was way down the plain—right amongst the bushes. He just looked my way for a moment, then he flung up his head and dashed away. I lost him in the undergrowth."

"Well, look here, Steve," said Van Horn between his teeth, "get the news around that I'll give a thousand dollars reward for the trapping of that white horse. Have some notices printed and put up all around the ranch, so that even passers-by can see it. It might tempt some good hunters to come in and join."

"A thousand dollars, boss!" ejaculated Steve. "Sure, I reckon I'll trap that feller all O.K.!"

And he ran for his horse, leapt up into the saddle and dashed away to spread the news. Van Horn watched him go, thoughtfully biting at the ends of his white moustache.

"That was my best bunch, up in the north corral," he mused, and suddenly shrugged his shoulders. "Well, I guess if the boys catch the Phantom, Denton, we shall soon see if he is responsible for the raids, for they'll stop with his capture if he's the guilty party."

"Sure they will!" agreed Denton, but without much enthusiasm.

And they left it at that, the colonel going into the ranch-house, leaving Denton to thrust his hands deeper into the pockets of his neat breeches and walk slowly off.

Trapped!

"SAY, how much more have we got to travel to get to that there Diamond Cross ranch, Jack?"

Benny Mack sounded just as fed up as he looked. He and his partner, Jack Saunders, had been riding the trail for days with the fixed intention of applying to Colonel van Horn for a job on the ranch.

"It ain't so mighty far, Benny," said Jack cheerfully. "Say, why can't you get some patience into you? Supposing, too, we don't get a job on the ranch?"

Benny glared, and tapped his gun. "This'll do the talking then!" he growled. "You allowed that hosses from the Diamond Cross was the finest in the West, and that we'd be right in our element if we worked among 'em. Now you suggest that there won't be no job! Gee, if you've made me hit the trail all this time on a bunk job—Say, what's that, Jack?"

He broke off with a sudden exclamation, and in a moment they had pulled up their horses.

It was not a difficult matter to pick out that which had attracted Benny's attention.

Jack stood up in his stirrups and stared across the plain. A matter of fifty yards away something white wriggled on the ground, turned half over, then wriggled back again. It took them but twenty seconds to give that something a name.

"That's a hoss!" said Jack.

"Trapped or something." "If it's fell and busted something, we'd better help it out," said Benny. "Poor brute!"

Jack nodded, and in a flash he was riding to the white horse.

The moment they leapt from their saddles, a couple of yards from the fallen horse, they could see the cause of the trouble, and a grim light came into Jack's keen eyes.

"Say, if that's how they catch their hosses around these parts, we ain't joining in, Benny," he said contemptuously. "That's a darned great wolf trap he's hooped into!"

Benny nodded, his expression as angry as that of his partner. The white horse—a magnificent specimen, unmarked save for patches of dust and dirt obtained in its struggles and kicks whilst in captivity—was caught by the off fore-hoof in the grip of about as ugly a trap as the cowpunchers had ever seen.

"Guess we'll soon get him outer that!" grunted Jack. "Keep his head flat down, Benny, and I'll lever the trap open with my gun. Hold him!"

Benny found it difficult. The massive white head was upon a neck of immense strength. He had to use his knees to keep the horse down whilst Jack got busy.

Before he levered the trap open, however, Jack took the precaution of examining the trapped hoof. It was cut, but not very badly, and there were no signs of broken bones.

"The goldarned rotten tripes!" growled Jack, as he dug the barrel of his gun down between the steel jaws of the trap. "I'd drop a man I saw setting this, Benny!"

"You would—if I didn't happen to get a drop on him first!" grunted Benny. "Hey—steady, old boy—gee! He's a tough customer, this, Jack!"

"Hold him a moment—that's done it—look out!"

The warning was only just in time. The great white horse, the moment its leg was released from the trap, struggled upon its four legs, rose upon its haunches, and cut viciously down with its fore-legs. It was only by inches that the partners missed being kicked upon their heads.

Down came the hoofs, and up went the hind legs in another terrible kick, before they, too, came crashing to the hard, sun-baked turf. A moment later Jack and Benny were watching it travel like the wind towards the thicker undergrowth into which it disappeared.

"That's a sure good tough customer," said Benny, rubbing the dust from his hands.

"He's all that," chuckled Jack, his eyes looking beyond the undergrowth to the hill above. "There he goes, Benny! Gee! If I'm stopping on around these parts, I reckon to ride that fellow one day!"

"Huh! I guess I'll be around to pick up the pieces the day you try it!"

"You—you double-crossing yellow rat!" grated Steve. "I thought you had sold all them horses, Denton?"

granted Benny. "Now, what about this Diamond Cross ranch?"

Jack nodded, and kicked heavily at the steel trap before he walked slowly towards his horse.

"No wonder they gets good hosses around here, Benny, if the old white fellow is any sample," he mused. "Look at him up there on the hill! Ain't he a sight for a sore cowpuncher! Looking down at us as if he don't know whether to come back and say 'Thank you.' As pretty as a picture!"

A second later his hand had dropped to his gun, and Benny nearly dropped out of his skin as it exploded only a couple of inches from his ear.

"What are you at, you blamed—" he yelled.

But Jack was not listening. With his still smoking gun in his hand he was rushing down towards the undergrowth, from which two men emerged in a towering rage, one of them waving a rifle the barrel of which had been smashed by Jack's bullet.

It took Benny a second to realise what had happened. Jack had seen the glint of the rifle levelled at the wonder white horse, and he had shot that barrel out of business with a single pull of his finger.

Benny leapt after his partner, shooting just one glance up at the hill where the white horse had been. He was not there.

"You done me out a thousand dollars!" snarled the man with the rifle. "You've got a thousand dollars-worth of learnin' coming your way!" said Jack. "We don't allow for shootin' hosses, mister!"

He emphasised that remark by lashing out with his fist, and it caught the man clean under the jaw. There was no time for further argument. Guns were put back into holsters, and the fists came into full use.

Jack was angry, and so was Benny. The other two were probably angry from quite a different reason. Consequently the fight was fast and furious whilst it lasted.

Jack took a crack on his chin that put him on his back just as Benny crashed down under the weight of another blow from the man at whom he leapt. Both were up in less than two seconds, and it was then the stranger's turn to feel how hard was the sun-baked turf.

They came back willingly enough to the fight, and for a few seconds blows were exchanged at sufficient rate and with sufficient force to change the expressions on all four faces. But it was the strangers who stopped, at last, on their backs.

"All right, lay up, stranger!" growled one. "Steve—"

"Keep your hands off your guns, mister," said Jack, with a warning glance at the fallen Steve. "I'm just longing for a chance to give you what you wanted to give that boss."

"You don't know that boss, stranger," growled Steve, as he slowly and painfully picked himself up and rubbed his aching jaws. "There's a thousand dollars reward out for him!"

"That don't allow for shooting!" snapped Jack. "Beat it, mister, and take your partner with you before I start lammin' into you again."

Steve must have reckoned that his unluckiest day. He had trapped the Phantom, and had afterwards had as good a drop on it with his rifle as he ever hoped to get. In addition, he had the feeling of what it must be like to be passed between two huge rollers.

He gave one venomous look at the grim Jack, another at the smiling Benny, and with a nod towards his partner, walked savagely into the undergrowth.

And as they disappeared, from the top of the hill came a shrill neighing. Instantly the cowpunchers turned in its direction. He was standing up there, as regal as a king, his ears pricked, his fine, silky neck steady as a rock as he stared towards them.

Jack laughed. "All right, mister!" he called out, as he waved his hand. "We accept your thanks with gratitude!"

"Shucks!" snapped Benny. "I ain't wavin' no hand to him. He tried to kick me under the chin, and I've sure got a fat ear through him. I've seen enough of him for a day or two! Let's be going!"

Jack laughed again, and even when they had mounted and hit the trail once more for the Diamond Cross ranch, he found himself watching the white horse until it disappeared with a sudden, lightning-like swerve.

The Rescue and a Job.

A QUARTER of an hour must have elapsed in silence, save for the gentle tap-tap of their horses' hoofs, before Jack gave a sudden cry.

"Say, that's the lower trail, Benny—and it's along there that the Diamond Cross ranch lies! Riding down, or riding round?"

Benny looked down the stiff face of the hill to the lower trail, and then to the trail ahead of them. This latter disappeared round a hill, and it might be miles farther on that it worked down to the bottom track.

He did not have to solve the question, however. It was solved for them.

A thundering of hoofs from below broke upon their ears just as a shrill neigh came to them from the far side of the valley into which they were looking.

"There's your pal again!" said Benny, with a nod.

Jack nodded, too. The white horse was coming down the far side of a hill at a terrific rate. Its feet scarcely seemed to touch the ground, despite its size, and for a moment Jack forgot all about the hoofs that had thundered upon the trail.

"I'm sure gonna ride that fellow one day!" he said ecstatically. "I'd win every cowpuncher's race in the States on that boss, Benny! What a hoss!"

He watched it come down the hill, stretch it out at even greater pace across the flat of the valley, heading for the trail and that hill upon which Benny and Jack were sitting their own horses.

Jack was dimly conscious of the fact that another rider had appeared, but he paid little or no heed to that. He was intent upon the wonderful action of the wonder white horse.

But he certainly took notice when the white horse flashed across the trail but a dozer yards in front of the rider—and from that rider came a piercing shriek that could only have been emitted by a woman.

Instinctively Jack gripped the reins hard, and his keen eyes left the wonder horse for a moment and stared at the rider.

Her horse was tearing at the reins, bucking like any horse new to a saddle, and fighting fiercely to follow the white horse!

It had got complete control—there was no doubt about that. And under the strength of that strong neck the girl's arms were utterly useless. She had no more control over her mount than had Jack himself.

"The white hoss has scared t'other!" growled Jack. "Come on, Benny!"

He went down the face of that cliff at a rate that was calculated to test the nerve of the finest horseman in the West. Benny could only see the huge cloud of white dust that Jack's horse created as it stuck all four legs straight out in a frantic effort to steady itself down the cliff. Benny followed the cloud.

Twice Jack had to jerk up his mount's head in order to keep it upon its feet, and whilst looking after that he had no chance to see what was happening to the scared girl.

That came only when he had struck the trail through the valley, and his first impression was that the horse would just run itself dead out to a standstill.

But the moment the white horse, ahead of all, turned up towards the cliff, the girl's horse turned, too. It was making frantic efforts to get up to the wild white horse.

Jack dug in his spurs and rode like a madman, for the girl was beginning to sway ominously in the saddle. Once she only saved herself from being thrown by snatching blindly at the runaway's mane.

The yards between girl and cowpuncher grew less and less under Jack's frantic riding, and still the great white horse pounded ahead. Jack had a glimpse of the girl's horse, with its white, staring eyes and foaming mouth—and then she swayed again.

A desperate dig with both heels sent Jack's horse leaping forward, but even then it was only by leaning far forward in his saddle that Jack was able to grab at the girl as she fell.

Her feet did not touch the ground. Jack swerved his horse the moment he felt his fingers get a grip on her clothes, and his horse, trained to the very last inch of its intelligence, obeyed like a flash.

It was just as well, for that swerve undoubtedly saved the girl. It also gave Jack the added impetus he needed, and the girl was flung, rather than dragged, straight across his saddle.

A moment later Jack had pulled in his mount and was staring down into the white face of just about as pretty a girl as he had ever seen in his life.

"You all right, missy?" he panted.

"Say, there's sure some excitement around these parts, Jack!" came in a shout from Benny as he dashed up. "Is she O.K.?"

Jack nodded as he lowered the girl gently to the trail and dropped down beside her. She opened her eyes when she felt herself upon her feet and stared dully up at him.

"That was the Phantom!" she whispered. "He's—he's a terror!"

"Is that why men were out trying to shoot him?" asked Jack, with a frown.

"I suppose so—the Phantom steals my father's horses, anyway!" she explained, recovering herself quickly. "My father is Colonel van Horn, stranger, and I'm sure he would like to thank you for saving me from being thrown."

"Colonel van Horn! That's the gent I'm making for," said Jack, with a laugh. "I've got a letter from my old boss, who is a pal of the colonel's. I and my partner are after a job."

"Then you'd better start trying to rope in the Phantom!" said the girl, with a laugh. "Give me a lift, stranger, and I'll take you home."

"Sure; but there's no need to say anything about—er—how I came along."

said Jack uncomfortably. "You see, we don't want to get a job as a— as a sorter reward."

Mary just smiled—a smile which Jack found distinctly fascinating. So he kept her smiling on the short ride down the valley trail to Diamond Cross ranch, with the result that Benny was, for once, completely cut out of Jack's picture.

Once at the ranch, however, Jack Saunders settled down to the business for which he and his partner had travelled many long miles, and for which many hours had been spent in the saddle.

Mary introduced him to her father, to whom Jack gave his letter with an idea that even that would not help them get a job. There had been so few signs of activity in the ranch that it appeared more than likely the rather elderly rancher was not now doing half the business for which he was famous amongst all horse dealers.

Colonel van Horn read the letter, it being impossible for him to frown over it for the simple reason his brows had been meeting at the time he was introduced to the cowpunchers.

"This is sure a good recommendation from an old friend, stranger," were the colonel's first words. "All the same, I haven't got so much work as I used to have—or as much as I should like. You see, mister, there's a white horse out yonder who is interfering with my mares—he's collarin' them by the dozen, and I don't need half the boys I have now got on my pay-roll."

"There's a thousand dollars reward out for its capture," put in Mary, with a smile.

"Dead or alive!" said the colonel angrily. "I'm going to let the boys shoot him. I'll give you a thousand dollars for the Phantom's head, stranger!"

Jack waved his hand disparagingly. "There sure ain't no need to start shooting wild horses, colonel," he said shortly. "I'll go after him—but call off those shooting orders."

It was at this point that Mary drew her father's head down and whispered into his ear, Jack being quite unable to learn what was said by her smiling lips. But her twinkling eyes, and the manner in which they looked round at him, suggested enough to make him realise that she was pleading on his behalf.

"All right, Jack Saunders," said Van Horn suddenly, "I'll call off the shooting orders, and give you a few days in which to catch that Phantom. You and your partner are on my pay-roll, so you'd better go down and meet Steve, my foreman."

"And sure, he'll be right down mighty glad to see us!" chuckled Benny. "Tell us where the buckets of water are kept, boss, and we'll find Steve O.K."

The colonel did not understand that. But then he did not know that Steve's jaw would, most likely, at that moment be feeling very much the better for a plentiful supply of cold water.

The fact that they had secured a job was sufficient to put Benny into a good temper with the world in general, and he was just as lighthearted as Jack was solemn and serious as they walked towards the quarters indicated by the colonel.

"You've fallen already for that purty girl," chuckled Benny,

"Sure!" agreed Jack indifferently, and flushed. "I mean, I've sure fallen for this white horse they call the Phantom, Benny. I'm gonna get that horse, and when I get him, I'm gonna ride him."

"Think of the girl—think of the girl," murmured Benny. "A pity—widow afore she's married—here, what're you at?"

"I've got a grip on your ear, partner, and that grip is staying put until I can get that tongue of yours into a pail of water!" growled Jack.

But, at the same time, there was a merry glint in his eye. Mary van Horn was certainly a very fine specimen of Western womanhood, and, of course, Benny was entitled to his fun.

Jack made up his mind that his next meeting with Mary would be when Benny was elsewhere.

Two on the Trail.

JACK SAUNDERS and Benny spent the next two days in riding around searching for signs of the Phantom, but they searched in vain. He had disappeared as completely as if the earth had opened up and swallowed him.

Jack was disappointed. He had quite made up his mind to break in the wild horse and keep him for himself. He rather fancied that the Phantom would make a champion at any of the numerous cowpuncher shows and contests held in that State.

It was not until Steve rode in one morning to report the loss of another bunch of brood mares that Jack paid more attention to the ranch work than the hunt for the Phantom. He and Benny rode out to the north corral, from which the mares had been rustled, and dismounted when they came to the spot where the wire fence had been broken down.

At first glance the fence suggested that it had been smashed down. The supporting posts were broken off at the stumps, and the wire was one tangled mass, as if a dozen sets of hoofs had twisted it.

But this suggestion was negated a few seconds after Jack had given a closer examination to the wire.

"Say, Benny," he said as he waggled two ends of wire thoughtfully in his hands. "That Phantom is sure the wonder hoss of the States! He carries a pair of pliers, or wire-cutters!"

"Gee! You don't say!" exclaimed Benny, peering keenly at the wire. "You're right, Jack! That wire has been cut clean enough. What are you goin' to do about that?"

"Plenty!" said Jack grimly. "Come on—let's go and have a word with the colonel."

They remounted their horses, and rode round the corral to the ranch, without further conversation or delay. Colonel van Horn, a little more pale than before, looked round at their approach, just as Dan Denton stepped noiselessly to his side.

"Another lot gone, Denton!" he said between his teeth.

"Sure—and here comes the strangers, colonel," said Denton. "I've a notion we might not have to look very far beyond them, if there are rustlers about. I don't like 'em!"

"Sh!sh! Let's hear what they have to say," muttered the colonel.

They had not to wait long. Jack came up to them quietly as soon as he had dismounted, leaving Benny to look after the horses.

"Well, Saunders—find anything up at the corral?" asked Van Horn.

"Plenty!" replied Jack in his quiet, unruffled tones. "Say, boss, that Phantom is a wonder hoss all O.K. He carries wire-cutters, and I just don't know how I came to miss them when me and Benny had our hands on him a few days back!"

"Wire-cutters! Do you mean to say—"

"The wire around the north corral

Jack grabbed the girl and rushed to where a log lay across the trail.

was cut, not broken down by stamped-ing hosses," cut in Jack. "The thief is boasting two legs, colonel, not four! And I'm gonna get that rustler!"

"How?" asked Denton coolly. "I reckon you're talking through your hat, Saunders."

"You would," said Jack, just as calmly. "I think the Phantom is being used as a cover to hide the work of the real rustler, mister, and just to prove that is right, I'm gonna trap that Phantom right away."

"How?" asked Denton again, but this time it was with a sneer.

"I'll tell you how I caught him—when I've got him," said Jack with a short laugh. "I might have to use the same sort of trap for the two-legged rustler, mister, and I sure ain't tellin' anybody what sort of trap I'm gonna put out. Excuse me now, boss, 'cos I'm reckonin' to have the Phantom between my knees short of three hours!"

And with that he walked off, leaving the colonel with a curious feeling of relief, and Denton with a sneer on his face that was as annoying as it was unpleasant.

"He'll get his neck broken, but that's all he will get," said Denton suddenly. "Funny that he should be the only one to discover that the wires have been cut—suggests he knew all about it!"

Van Horn did not answer. He was watching Jack Saunders as he walked slowly down to the corral where Mary and he kept their own riding-horses, and he was still watching when he saw his smiling daughter come running towards the cow puncher.

But he was too far away to hear what was said.

"Miss Mary—if you will help me, I reckon to capture that Phantom mighty quick," was Jack's greeting.

"Without shooting him?" asked Mary quickly.

"Sure—listen! That white hoss and your mare seem sort of friendly. I remember how she went after him when he crossed your trail the morning I first met you," said Jack. "My plan is to tether your mare out on the plain, somewhere among the undergrowth he appears to haunt, and have a rope trap all set for him. If he comes towards her he'll get snaffled. Game?"

"He—he won't hurt her, will he?" she asked dubiously.

"I and Benny will look after her!" said Jack confidently. "I ain't agreein' that the Phantom is sort o' enticin' the mares away from the corral, Miss Mary. It's a two-legged rustler I'm gonna look for, but first of all I want that Phantom."

"All right," she said, after only a moment's more hesitation. "I wish you luck, Jack! Nobody else has ever got near enough to do more than look at him."

Jack's movements thereafter were quick. He led Benny down to the spot where they had seen the Phantom disappear after they had released him from Steve's steel wolf-trap, and here they got busy.

A place was selected where a narrow trail led between two medium-sized bushes, and down which any horse would have to travel if it wished to get from one side of the bushes to the other. There was no way round, the undergrowth being too thick.

At one side Jack tethered Mary's mare, and yards behind the mare they hid their own horses. Finally, they hid themselves amidst the bushy undergrowth, and waited patiently for results.

They had not to wait very long. August 22nd, 1931.

Within a quarter of an hour of hiding themselves, they heard the white horse's unmistakable neigh, and in a flash an answering neigh had gone out from Mary's mare.

Simultaneously, from a long distance, came the thudding of a second set of hoofs, and the cowpunchers looked at one another quickly.

"Somebody is trailing the Phantom!" said Jack, between his teeth. "If they start shootin' up, I'm going to put a lump of lead in some wrists by way of reminding their owners that the colonel's orders is no shootin'!"

"Stow the cackle, Jack—here comes the Phantom!" hissed Benny.

He was right. With almost startling suddenness the Phantom appeared beyond the bushes, his great white head held proudly as he stared towards Mary's mare. For a moment he stood on the narrow trail, hesitating. Then he trotted slowly towards the trap.

It was all over in a second. The hunters had set a simple rope snare, and straight as if he had been guided by reins, the Phantom trotted into the rope loop, neighing softly as he got nearer to the mare.

The loop settled over his neck, and became smaller as the white horse advanced until it had him securely just above the massive shoulders. It was then that Jack and Benny saw the savage nature of the wild horse.

It got up on its haunches and lashed out at the bushes to which the rope was fixed. His great eyes dilated with anger, and what with his lashing hoofs and his shrill, angry neighing, he presented a grand, if terrible sight.

"Well, he's there, Jack!" said Benny, with a grunt. "Feel like patting his neck?"

Jack took that in far more grim a fashion than Benny had expected.

"I'm gonna ride him!" he said, between his set teeth. "Benny, get your knife ready, and the instant you see me on his back, cut the rope!"

"Why don't you shoot yourself—it would be much quicker an' more pleasant than getting pounded to dust by them hoofs!" growled Benny.

"Oh, mush! You do as I ask you!" grunted Jack.

And he advanced towards those flying hoofs with a fearlessness that sent a shiver of admiration down Benny's spine.

Mounting the wild horse was much more difficult than it seemed. The Phantom never seemed to tire, despite its fearful, frantic bucking and kicking.

Jack took one side, waiting a chance to leap forward and upwards, whilst Benny, with open knife, took the other side. The great horse kept them on the move, too, for it attacked them with head and heels in a manner that suggested he was raving mad.

Foam collected and dropped from the corners of his mouth—a mouth which had never yet felt a steel bit. Bush after bush was smashed down to splinters by the terrible, pounding hoofs, and the gnashing of its great teeth was like the snapping of thick boughs.

It was Mary's mare that gave Jack the chance for which he was looking.

She gave a sudden, frightened whimpy, and down came the Phantom on all fours for the first time since he had felt the rope trap. And, in the fleeting second the Phantom stood to stare at the mare, Jack took his leap.

"Benny!" he called excitedly.

He had a grip on the white horse's mane in a flash, and up went his long legs in one great leap. In another split second, he was astride, and Benny, with a daring sweep of his sharp knife, had cut the rope.

For another dazed second the Phantom stood still. Then up he went, with Jack clinging on with hands and knees, and the fact that there was now no rope was instantly conveyed to the horse's senses.

He shot forward under the kick of his two mighty hind legs, and in a flash Benny was looking at rider and Phantom crashing through the smaller bushes down the narrow trail.

Jack hung on grimly—it was easier now that the Phantom was bolting. The speed of the beast was amazing. Its sure-footed striding was more like that of a mountain goat. He never faltered or made a mistake, but went down the winding trail, through surprisingly easy bushes on to other trails, as if he had one way to go and one way only.

Jack did not know where they were going. He had lost all sense of direction within a couple of minutes of striking the first trail. All Jack was conscious of was the fact that his mount was utterly tireless.

The thrill of that ride was something that Jack would never forget. Never had he sat a horse that cut so much ground so quickly under its flying hoofs, and yet the beast's broad back scarcely jolted him an inch.

One thing was quite certain. Benny, if he had dashed for his horse and at once leapt into the saddle, would never catch up with them. He might be able to trail them, but that was the best that could be expected.

And so Jack was a lone rider when he at last found himself staring into what was to him a completely strange canyon. Here the Phantom calmed down and dropped into a lazy, loping trot until he had taken Jack to where dozens of magnificent horses were browsing.

For a moment, Jack was bewildered. The horses at which he was looking were blood horses—there was none of the un-accared-for look about them that was the unmistakable mark of the wild horse.

"Shucks—these must be the colonel's horses!" muttered Jack, as he slipped from the Phantom's white back. "You wicked white old scoundrel! So you have been doing the rustlin'!"

The Phantom simply trotted calmly off to the other horses, and left Jack to do what he liked about the matter. Jack, as a matter of fact, was smiling.

It was the strangest position in which he had ever found himself. He could not very well suggest hanging the Phantom, which was the fate of all cattle rustlers. Certainly, he was not going to suggest shooting the animal. Colonel van Horn would have to be content with the fact that his mares had been recovered.

It was with something of a shock that Jack suddenly remembered the cut wire, and a puzzled frown corrugated his brows.

"He sure couldn't have bit through them wires so clean!" he muttered to himself. "This is darned funny, Jack Saunders! Wonder if the Phantom belongs to anybody?"

That suggestion put fresh life and activity into him. If that was correct, there would assuredly be some sign of habitation somewhere in the bush screens of the canyon.

He began a search, picking his way carefully so as not to make more noise than was necessary—and that search lasted precisely five minutes.

At the end of that time Jack found himself looking towards a hut that was completely hidden from view at one side of the canyon—the side at which he had entered on the Phantom's back. The door of the hut was open, and from the chimney there rose a tiny, thin spiral of smoke.

Jack shut his teeth hard. Surprises were the order of the day, but he was going to be very much surprised if he discovered that the Phantom, besides being the leading rustler, occupied a hut and kept a fire going!

He drew his gun as he approached the hut, and his steps became much slower and far more cautious as there remained only a dozen feet to go. If there was a man in the hut, Jack meant to surprise him, get the drop on him, and then start asking questions.

But the hut was empty—no one sat at the table which stood in the centre of the floor, and the chairs and boxes were not in use.

Convinced that the rustler was away from home, Jack stepped into the hut.

When Thieves Fall Out!

WELL, there's a gang of them, anyway!"

Jack said that aloud as he stood in the centre of the hut and looked around. Cards and glasses, numerous cigarette ends and the butts of many cheroots told him that much.

He spent only two or three minutes in the hut before he once more made his way to the door. It would be necessary to get the colonel and his men down here if they were to catch the gang with their rustled horses.

But he only got as far as the door.

There he felt a sudden plug in his back that brought him to a dead stop in his tracks.

"Drop that gun, mister!" came in snappy tones from behind. "We sorter want a chat with you—drop that gun!"

Jack obeyed—it was useless to argue with a man who had got a gun-barrel stuck right into the middle of his back.

It was only then that he could turn round, and he gave no start of surprise when he saw Dan Denton, his hands deep in the pockets of his riding breeches, looking straight at him.

"So you are the two-legged rustler, Denton," he said calmly.

"And you're the one man who knows too much!" said Denton coolly. "You've sort o' pushed matters a bit, stranger. I was getting ready to drive those brood horses over the border, but there is one more bunch we want. Guess you're going to stay here until we get away with the lot. Rope him up, you fellers."

Jack took that as his signal to start fighting. In spite of the gun menace, he went straight out for the man nearest the door, and clipped him hard and sure under the chin. In a second the others had piled on to him, Denton taking care that he was not near enough to get hit in mistake by one of his own men, or anywhere near Jack's flying fists.

The fight, as could only be expected, was of very short duration. Five to one was a little too big odds, and Jack soon found himself on the floor with four of the enemy piling on top of him. He was helpless whilst the fifth man roped him with the skill of the born cow-puncher, and he was just a little more helpless when they picked him up and flung him on to a bed in another room.

"Now we'll have to get busy, boys," Denton said, the moment they were together again. "That feller's pal Benny is sure to start a search-party, and I guess we don't want no one to trail us here just now."

"Reach for the skies—you're just too late!" came in a rasping voice from the doorway.

Denton swung round, his hands going up with the promptness such a command, in such a tone, demanded.

A GRAND NEW ANNUAL

This fine Annual is packed with gripping film stories, interesting pictures, splendid articles and intimate facts about your favourite film stars.

IT WILL BE ON SALE
SEPTEMBER 1ST,
PRICE 6/- NET.

So make a note of the date and place an order with the newsagent at once and make sure of a copy, otherwise you will be disappointed.

"Steve! What's brought you here?" exclaimed Denton, lightly enough, but with a gleam in his eyes that was a curious mixture of banter and alarm.

"You—you double-crossing, yellow-spined rat!" grated Steve. "I thought you had sold all them horses, Denton?"

"Well, they are sold—only I'm keeping them until I've got the whole bunch!" said Denton. "You can put the gun down, Steve, and collect your dollars—but I ain't arguing with you whilst you've got your gun like that. I ain't double-crossed you—you are thinking that just because you ain't got any patience."

Steve was not satisfied, and looked it. But Denton lowered his hands and sat down at the table with an indifference that certainly did not suggest fear.

"I suppose you know that Jack Saunders trapped the Phantom, and rode him here—I trailed them!" he said. "His partner was with him, and the last I heard of him was when he was riding towards Diamond Cross, leading Miss Mary's mare. You'll have to get those mares over the border, Denton, and leave the others."

"Oh, shucks! You're letting a couple of mangy cowpunchers scare you stiff!" sneered Denton. "If you think I'm double-crossing you, here's a cheque for your share! Want it?"

"Sure I want it—and I'm getting outer here right now!" said Steve bluntly.

He was wrong. The instant the gun was lowered and pointing towards the floor, one of the others shot a fist out and crashed it home against the side of his head. In a flash he was being treated in a manner similar to that which Jack had already experienced, and which, in the excitement brought about by the conversation in the other room, Jack had completely forgotten.

But Steve suffered more than Jack. He was knocked senseless and kicked into the corner of the room with a merciless disregard as to where the boots landed.

Denton surveyed him as he lay unconscious, a bitter expression on his face.

"The poor boob!" he growled. "Thought he would get away with a half-share, and you boys and me to share the other half! But look here, boys, I reckon it's time we cleared outer here! Round up the mares, and get 'em going towards the border. I ain't taking no risks now. Get going!"

Half a minute later the hut was empty save for Jack and Steve, and it was then that Jack started a frantic fight to get rid of his bonds. That took him fifteen minutes, and as many seconds sufficed for him to break down the door.

Steve was lying on the floor where he had been left, groaning now as he began to come round to his senses. Jack got a can of water and helped the coming round business with considerable more speed than care.

"Wake up!" he said shortly. "I heard all the yarn! Which way is the border from here?"

"Groooo!" grunted Steve. "The double-crossing rat! I'll squawk on him and take what's coming to me! It'll take them some time to round up, all they've taken from the colonel, Saunders. You can ride and head 'em off. I'll go for help at the Diamond Cross."

"Well, you may as well do your best now, Steve," said Jack grimly. "Your game is sort o' known to me, and you can't get away. In any case, I'm gonna get Denton!"

That was easier said than done, for he had no horse. And already the mares had been set moving by Denton's men, whose shouts could be heard coming from the depths of the canyon.

Wildly Jack looked round, hoping against hope that he would be able to spot a loose horse which he could secure and use.

He saw the horse all right—it was the Phantom! The great white beast stood on the crest of a hump, his ears pricked, his massive head held high, and his nostrils quivering as he stared towards the collection of mares which Denton and his men were rapidly rounding up.

"Boy—boy! Steady, boy!" called out Jack, as he walked towards the Phantom with a slowness that irritated him enormously in view of his keen desire for swift action.

The Phantom turned towards him, and bared his huge teeth in what was curiously like the snarl of a dog. But he did not move away from the crest of the hump.

It had been said to Jack on many occasions that he had a spell over horses. Certainly he seemed to have cast a spell over the Phantom, for, beyond moving nervously round in a half-circle as Jack came up to him, he made no sign of getting ready to dash away.

Jack talked to him, crooning like a nurse croons to a baby, until he got a grip on that silky mane. Then it was business—grin business!

"Get goin', boy!" almost hissed Jack, as he swung himself swiftly on to the broad white back. "We're gonna stam-pede that lot of mares!"

Lovers.

BENNY had not remained inactive after losing sight of Jack and the Phantom. He set off for the Diamond Cross to gather all the men he could find in and around the ranch, convinced that there would be a long and anxious search for Jack when the Phantom had thrown him off into the thick undergrowth.

The crashing of the undergrowth as the great white horse had smashed a way through told Benny that a fairly easy trail would be found, but just where they would find Jack was a different matter. They might trail the Phantom, but spotting Jack as he lay in the undergrowth would be a difficult task.

Mary received her mare back with a little cry of joy, and she was the first to mount when Benny had blurted out his story.

"We must go and search for Jack!" she said anxiously. "I'll go to the house first, pick up some bandages, in case he is hurt, and ride after you! My father is up in the north corral, Benny!"

"Right!" said Benny, and swung his mount round fiercely.

Spur and knees and leather were used relentlessly to get speed. Benny yelled as he passed each cowpuncher, drawing them towards the north corral, where Benny expected to find the colonel with Steve. But Steve was not there, although Van Horn was riding at a walking pace just where the wires had been cut.

"Boss—Jack trapped the Phantom, and the last I saw of him was on the white galoot's back!" shouted Benny, before he had even jerked his horse to a panting halt. "He'll sure be half-dead by now! I'm getting the boys and goun' searchin'!"

"That's O.K.!" snapped Van Horn. "I'll ride with you. Get going, boys!"

In a moment more the whole available outfit was riding madly towards the spot where the Phantom had been trapped.

August 22nd, 1931.

Long before they reached it, Jack Saunders was getting the thrill of his life out of the amazing speed shown by the Phantom. The excitement of the chase was intensified by that reason, and it was a laughing, eager Jack that urged the great white horse to do its best.

He came up to and passed round the mares which were being driven by Denton's men. Jack wanted to spot the neatly-garbed Denton, for he could stam-pede the mares just when he liked now. But he knew that the moment he started the stampede, Denton would order his boys to commence gunning, and that was just what Jack wanted to avoid for purely personal reasons!

He spotted Denton at last, and as Denton happened to spot him at the same moment, the rustler knew that the game was up. He started off across the canyon at breakneck speed, thinking only of getting on the other side of the border in order to save his own neck.

Jack laughed aloud. "See 'em, boy!" he shouted ecstatically. "Show 'em what you can do! They called you a rustler, you grand old hoss! Show 'em you can move some! Shift those legs, boy!"

The Phantom, urged by knee and voice, put on his very best—and that was much too good for Dan Denton's comparatively puny mount.

Jack was sweeping up behind him at an incredible rate, and fear was tugging at Denton's heart minutes before he felt a strong arm swing around his shoulders, steely fingers grip his shirt, and felt himself whirled out of his saddle.

But Jack did not fall with him. The cowpuncher was scarcely himself at the moment—he was drunk with the excitement of that glorious race and the pride of his mastery over the Phantom.

Neither Denton nor Jack will ever forget the next few minutes. Doubly weighted though he was, the Phantom never faltered or lessened his great speed. Jack headed him for the mares, which were approaching from his right hand, and it was not until only twenty yards separated them that he suddenly swung himself clean off the Phantom's back and crashed to the ground on top of the unfortunate Denton.

Jack did not see what happened. He only heard the scared neighing of dozens of mares, and the shriller, keener neighing of the Phantom. He was amongst them, and certain it was that no cowboy would get control of them until the great stallion had chosen to leave the bunch!

Denton tried to put up a fight, but he was scared stiff. He took clip after clip under the jaw, and struck out blindly in the hope of getting in one lucky blow which would enable him to get away.

But there was no luck for him that day. Jack was in his element, capable of anything. And before many minutes had elapsed, Denton was grovelling on the sun-baked ground.

"You're a rotten sort of neighbour, Denton!" panted Jack. "A poisonous sort that rustles an old man's cattle! You ain't gonna rustle no more—here's the colonel and his boys eager to tell you so!"

"Hey-ho, Jack!" came in a yell from Benny.

The Diamond Cross boys had not so far to search after all, for the dust raised by the driven mares, and the noise made by the thundering hoofs were guides none could fail to follow.

Benny was at the head of the Diamond Cross outfit as they rode up, and it was he who yelled orders.

"Round up the gang, boys—round 'em all up! They're making fer the border!" he shouted. "I'll see to Jack!" "I'm all right—say, colonel!" Jack raised his voice as the old man showed signs of leading the dashing round-up of Denton's gang. "Colonel—I guess I've stam-peded your mares—the whole bunch of them. The Phantom helped—and we've sure got the real rustler! Get up, Denton!"

Denton got up, sulky and battered, and avoided the contemptuous eyes that stared at him from under the greying brows.

"I'm done!" he growled. "Steve was in it, colonel, and here he comes, I guess, to spill the beans!" put in Jack lightly.

He was right. Steve, true to his word, but doubtless wishing also to get a little of his own back on the double-crossing Denton, rode up, shamefaced but not sulky.

"Well?" said Van Horn curtly. "I'm all in, boss—I'll take what's coming to me," said Steve, almost as bluntly. "We were in it—we used the Phantom to cover our tracks. Guess we knew that if the Phantom was trapped we'd have to lay off for a bit, and this double-crossing rat was out to get over the border with the whole bunch without my knowing it. I'll spill all I know—holy smoke, look at that!"

He broke off with a cry of alarm, and instantly those around him followed the direction of his staring eyes.

The stampeding mares, way down the canyon, were on the narrow trail, the massive white Phantom leading them back to the secret corral as unerringly as a master cowboy!

The rate at which the Phantom travelled was little more than that put out by the frantic mares—but that was not the cause of alarm. It was the fact that Mary van Horn was coming along the trail in the opposite direction—and she could not turn her mare!

They saw the Phantom lift his great head higher than ever, they heard his shrill neigh as he charged down upon the helpless girl—and they saw her mare suddenly swing round and dash along the trail just ahead of the stampeding bunch!

Like lightning Jack leapt for the nearest horse, and his spurs cut deep into the animal's side. Knees and leather urged his mount into as mad a gallop as any of his keenest watchers had ever seen.

Jack's eyes were glazed with the terror he felt at the girl's helplessness. If she fell, she would be battered into a shapeless mass by those thundering hoofs—and the ghastly thought of that beautiful face having an ugly hoof planted upon it stirred Jack as even riding the Phantom had failed to do.

It flashed across his mind now how useful would have been the Phantom—he would have made this mount of his look like a Blackpool donkey. But the Phantom was heading the stampeding mares straight towards the hapless girl!

There was only one way to do anything—that was down the face of the cliff, and down the face of the cliff Jack drove his horse, with a frantic recklessness that asked for death but deserved the reward of success.

He got it—got to the head of the stampeding mares, cut past the loose leaders, even past the Phantom himself, and dashed up to the girl just as her horse stumbled and pitched her headlong to the trail.

It needed a mind capable of forked-lightning thinking to get her out of the grasp of death then. Jack did not stop to think—he flung himself off his

(Continued on page 28.)

LOOK WHAT'S IN THE NEW NESTLÉ'S GIFT BOOK

A "Hawkeye" camera made by Kodak. A waterproof case to carry it in. A silk-bound album to mount the fine snaps you have taken! These are just three out of scores of useful gifts in the new Nestlé's Free Gift Book.

And there are one or more Free Gift Coupons in every Nestlé's packing, from the 2d. wrapped bar upwards.

Send to-day for this, the finest list ever offered of things you really want. With it comes a voucher for five coupons.

- G. 135. Camera. With two View-finders. 140 Coupons.
With one View-finder. 120 Coupons.
- G. 136. Camera Case. With Shoulder Strap. 50 Coupons.
- G. 197. Album. 48 Pages, Moiré Silk Covers. 110 Coupons.

NESTLÉ'S CHOCOLATE

To NESTLÉ'S (Gift Department), Silverthorne Road, Battersea, London, S.W.8.

Please send me Voucher for 5 FREE COUPONS and the New Nestlé's Presentation List.

52/22 B. 31.

NAME

IN BLOCK CAPITALS

Address

This offer applies only to Great Britain & Northern Ireland.

1d. Stamp sufficient if envelope is unsealed.

FIVE FREE COUPONS

"MEN WITHOUT LAW."

(Continued from page 10.)

He was showing the outlaw the family jewels.

"Three hundred years old," he said proudly. "Beautiful, aren't they? They are to be Juanita's when she marries."

"Father!" cried Juanita in Spanish. "We have made a terrible mistake!"

"What?" cried her father, starting to his feet.

"The man you locked up," she said in English, "is Buck Healy. He's told me things that positively prove his identity. That man is an impostor!"

Murdoch, realising the game was up, stopped back and whipped out his gun. "Get over there!" he cried. "Get away from that safe! Go on!"

Senor del Rey, instead of obeying, made to thrust the casket into the safe. Murdoch fired, and the Mexican collapsed with a groan to the floor.

"Juan! Pedro! Help!" screamed Juanita. But Murdoch snatched up the fallen casket, gripped her so fiercely by the arm that his fingers dug into her flesh, and pulled her out into the patio. In the road beyond the gates the two men who had accompanied him across the border were waiting with three horses.

He mounted his own horse and swept the screaming Juanita up on to his knees. The others sprang into their saddles, and all three went galloping off towards the border.

Jose, Juan, Pedro, and two other servants rushed out from the house a few minutes too late. Three of them ran to the stables, passing the building in which Buck had been imprisoned. He cried out to them, and eventually Jose stepped up to the grille.

Hurriedly he explained matters, and in less than five minutes he was on Silver's back, riding for all he was worth.

Near the border, soon after noon, Murdoch and his companions fell in with the rest of the gang, still searching for the prisoners who had escaped them. They told their story, staring at the agitated girl on their leader's knees and noticing the scratches on his face which told of a struggle abandoned out of sheer weariness.

"I ought to skin you bozos alive!" roared Murdoch savagely.

A burly ruffian pointed suddenly to the hilly trail behind them, down which was galloping a rider on a white horse.

"Here he comes now, chief!" he exclaimed.

Murdoch looked—and was more or less appeased.

"Fred, you and George stop him," he directed. "The rest of you lug-heads come with me."

He swept onward with four of his men, while the specified pair took cover behind fallen rocks and got their lariats ready for action.

As Buck came riding past the rocks the ropes whizzed out simultaneously, descended over his head, and tightened about his arms and chest. Silver pulled up instantly, but Buck was jerked to the ground, and on the ground his captors bound him, hand and foot. They dumped him in the sand behind a rock and rode on.

The fall had nearly stunned him, and it had considerably bruised him. He lay perfectly still for quite a while, then whistled shrilly.

Silver, who had galloped away—in August 22nd, 1934.

telligently enough—so that he should not be captured, heard that whistle and cantered back to his master.

"Come here, son! Come on!" commanded Buck. "Atta, boy—down here! Put your head down and undo this rope. Take a hold—that's it! Take a hold again! Bite it! Pull it up! That's the one!"

With his teeth Silver tugged at the knots that bound Buck's wrists behind his back; tugged and bit till they were loosened—and the rest was easy. Buck, freed of his fetters, rose and stretched his limbs, then climbed into the saddle and rode cautiously in the direction of the enemy's cabin.

To approach it by the pass was to court disaster. He mounted a hill at the back of the hollow and descended a wooded slope. The last part of the journey he accomplished on foot, leaving Silver under the trees; and he crept to the back of the cabin.

The sound of voices informed him that Murdoch and his men were inside with their captive. He climbed to the roof of a lean-to shed, and from the shed to the roof of the cabin itself.

He was convinced that with the aid of the hook over which he had slung the twin rope the evening before, he could clamber from the roof into the loft, but while creeping over the thatch he reached the brick chimney-stack, and there another idea occurred to him.

A fire was burning down below, in the living-room—a fire of logs. He removed a number of cartridges from his belt, and clung to the stack, listening.

Murdoch and three of his men were grouped round the table, while Juanita was shrinking back from the unwelcome attentions of the others.

"You'll get used to us in a few days," the scrubby-faced Fred informed her. "How about a dance?"

"I'll play for you, senorita," chuckled the man who played the guitar.

"You must release me at once!" Juanita cried out to Murdoch. "You can't keep me here like this!"

"I'm sorry," said Murdoch, with a mock bow, "but if these coyotes annoy you, you can retire to your private boudoir."

He got to his feet and opened a door leading into an inner room—a very small room, crudely furnished, and lit by a window too small to provide even a slim girl with a means of escape.

"You'll be perfectly safe in here," he told her, and, without the slightest ceremony, pushed her in and closed the door.

"Goin' to hold her to ransom, eh?" suggested a bearded ruffian. "She ought to be worth twenty-five thousand dollars, at least."

It was at this moment that Buck dropped a handful of cartridges down the chimney.

There followed a dozen startling explosions, and bullets flew in all directions. The men who were sprawling about the living-room sprang up in alarm, and there was a general rush for the door.

"Must be two or three of 'em!" cried George. "One of 'em took a shot at me."

Murdoch, who had been standing near the fireplace when the explosions occurred, cried out angrily:

"Come back, you fools!" But no notice was taken of his words—everyone of his followers went out, drawing their guns as they went, to do battle with imaginary fees.

Buck Rides Away.

CURSING their folly, Murdoch went over to the little window that commanded a view of the pass. The ladder was beside him, the opening into the loft immediately above him. Clean on to his head and shoulders dropped Buck from above, bearing him to the floor with a crash. His gun went flying, and the back of his head struck the bottom rung of the ladder, but he struck out with his fists and fought his way to his feet.

The door of the inner room opened and Juanita looked out, saw the two struggling figures, and caught sight of a gun on the boards. She darted for-

GRAND FILM NOVELS YOU SHOULD NOT MISS!

A delightful comedy-drama of a self-made millionaire, who, during a forced rest-cure, tries a work-cure on his own and takes a course of lessons from two young lovers on how to be happy though rich.

"JEAN DE LA LUNE."

The story of a gay young girl and a much too truthful young man. Love and laughter amongst the glitter of Paris.

"MEN CALL IT LOVE."

A wife who believed in marriage vows got a rude awakening when she found her husband in another girl's arms. Read how she won back her husband, starring Adolphe Menjou and Leila Hyams.

GEORGE ARLISS in "THE MILLIONAIRE."

All these splendid film stories are complete in this week's issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY.

PRICE 2d.

ward, snatched up the weapon, and cried:

"Put up your hands!"

Buck, instead of obeying, drove a left hook to Murdoch's jaw that sent him down on his back senseless. Then he turned and grinned.

"Buck Healy!" gasped Juanita. "Why, how in the world—"

"S-s-s-h!" hissed Buck. "That gang is liable to start something any minute!" He ran across the room and bolted the front door. "You watch that window for a while," he directed. "Just for a couple of minutes."

Obediently she went over to the little window and stood there with Murdoch's gun in her hand. There came a rattling at the latch of the door as the cheated crooks tried to re-enter. Voices cried out to Murdoch to open the door; but Murdoch was not only unconscious but by this time had been deprived of most of his clothes!

A head bobbed up outside the window at which Juanita was watching, and she fired through the pane. A shower of glass fell inside the room and out; the head disappeared.

Buck, shedding his own garments in haste, donned those he had stripped from Murdoch's inert body. Then he trussed the outlaw with a rope and dropped a blanket over him. He pulled the brim of Murdoch's big hat well down over his own eyes.

"I sure hope this is going to work," he said. "Come on, senorita! Believe I'm Murdoch, and that I'm going to take you off. Come on, now—and don't forget to fight and to fight hard! Ready?"

Juanita had turned from the window and was regarding him with astonishment. He had put on Murdoch's chequered shirt and hat, and, sideways, she might very well have mistaken him for that bandit. But she was a quick-witted girl, and she grasped his intention at once.

"Ready," she said in a low voice, and began to scream. "Help!" she cried. "Help!"

Buck dragged her towards the door, tugged back the bolts, raised the latch, and, holding her with apparent fierceness while she beat at him with her little hands and kicked and struggled, he hauled her over the threshold.

The half-dozen men outside fell back, but one of them, more courageous than the rest, demanded gruffly:

"What's up, boss?"

"Get on your horses, men," commanded Buck, doing his best to imitate Murdoch's voice. "We're leaving!"

The men scattered to seek and mount their horses. Murdoch's brown pinto was standing near the water-pipe, and Buck half-carried the struggling Juanita to it. He bundled her on to the saddle, sprang up behind her, and, holding her with violence, swept off towards the pass. Murdoch's men came riding wondering after him.

Through the pass Buck galloped with the girl he adored held close in his arms.

"All right, now," he whispered.

"Needn't scratch my face any more!"

The end of the pass was reached, and Buck shot downwards to the rough roadway below. But in the roadway, on their horses, sat a score or more riders, headed by the sheriff, blocking the way.

"Pnt 'em up!" yelled the sheriff. "Hold 'em in the air, and keep 'em there!"

Raising his hands, Buck rode straight to the sheriff, who gaped at him.

"What's the idea?" he exclaimed blankly.

Tom was sitting on a horse beside the sheriff, and Buck greeted him.

"Hallo, Buck!" said Tom joyfully. "Saw you coming, but didn't know it was you. When we got across the border and saw what had happened we made tracks back here."

"Good work, boy!" cried Buck. "Sheriff, here's Murdoch's gang coming—they think I'm him."

The sheriff barked instructions, and the men who formed his posse set their horses at the hill half-way down which Murdoch's men had now stopped short. A chase followed, up into the hollow, and shots were exchanged. But the outlaws, outnumbered and three of them wounded, were finally rounded up and made prisoners.

Meanwhile, Juanita, sliding down from Buck's knees, had gone anxiously up to Tom.

"My father," she said tremulously. "Is he all right?"

"Yes, ma'am," reassured Tom. "He

"Fine Score that!"

HE was well past the century before he was caught out. A fine score by a good player.

A piece of Wrigley's Chewing Gum in the mouth refreshes, keeps you alert during the game.

Wrigley's helps digestion, too, and cleanses the teeth. Chew a piece "after every meal."

In two flavours—P.K., a pure peppermint flavour; and Spearmint, a pure mint leaf flavour. Only 1d. a packet but the finest quality money can buy.

The flavour lasts—British made

WRIGLEY'S

1^d PER PACKET

got a little shoulder wound, that's all."
"Oh, thank goodness it was no worse than that!" faltered Juanita.

"You know," remarked the sheriff. "I came pretty near shooting you, Buck, for a bandit, instead of a gaol-breaker."

"Oh, yeah!" drawled Buck. "Well, it's a good thing you came along when you did, or you might have taken me for 'most anything. That gang was about to wise up that I wasn't Murdoch."

"You've got me going," confessed the sheriff. "I can't figure this thing out at all."

"Don't try—don't try, Jim!" laughed Buck. "I'll figure it all out for you—after I've taken the senorita home."

"Goin' to do that, are you?" said the sheriff. "Don't you think you'll need another horse?"

"No," said Buck, and he dismounted and gave vent to a series of shrill whistles. The members of the posse came riding down with their prisoners, and behind them cantered a big white horse—Silver.

The sheriff looked the prisoners over, but Silver trotted straight up to his master and rubbed his nose against his face. Buck glanced inquiringly at Juanita, and immediately she sped to him, her eyes shining, her face flushed. He vaulted into the saddle and reached down and lifted her up on to his knees. She put her arms round his neck.

"Oh, I see!" growled the sheriff.

"Yeah," nodded Buck. "Say, Jim—Murdoch's up in the cabin there. I think he wants to play you a game of pinocle!"

"Oh, yeah!" said the sheriff. "Well, your brother, here, is a dandy player, and this lets him out, I guess." He proffered a formidable Colt by its barrel. "Take this, and go and get him, Tom," he directed.

"And when you're through," added Buck, "go straight home and tell mum I'll be back to-morrow."

He turned Silver about and went riding off towards the border with Juanita on his knees and in his arms.

"Now I believe everything my brother told me about you!" she said.

"He didn't tell me half enough about you!" retorted Buck.

(By permission of Columbia Pictures and United Artists Corporation, Ltd., featuring Buck Jones and Carmelita Geraghty.)

"PHANTOM OF THE DESERT."

(Continued from page 24.)

own horse, grabbed at the girl, and rushed her to where a log lay across the trail.

In an instant, ruthless as to how he did it, he crushed Mary flat against the log, and listened breathlessly to the pounding hoofs as they roared along the trail.

The thunder came nearer and nearer and louder and louder at a speed which was uncanny. Shadows went over them, dust flicked at his mouth and eyes as he bent right over the girl in an effort to shield her from the flying hoofs.

He succeeded as he deserved to succeed. Only one crashing hoof struck human flesh that day—and that was but a glancing blow upon Jack's own leg.

It seemed an eternity before the last of the shadows passed over them, and the thundering clatter of the hoofs grew less and less—and before realisation came that the danger was over.

It was only then that Jack moved away so that Mary could sit up.

She was as white as the trail dust, but her lips were smiling bravely, and her eyes shining with a light that Jack had dreamed about but had never seen.

"Well, that seems to be the end!" he said, with an effort at gaiety. "Guess I didn't calculate on your coming up the trail, Miss Mary, or I would not have used the Phantom to stampede those mares!"

She wasn't listening to him. She was looking up the side of the canyon, where the Phantom and her own mare, away from the bunch of horses, were walking side by side up the hill.

"Jack!"

"Yes?"

"That's—that's love, isn't it?"

He nodded, smiling.

"I guess that's what makes the world go round!" he commented softly.

He felt a thrill run through him as she gently placed her little white hand into his own strong palm.

"I guess it's making my world go round!" she murmured. "Shall we go home, Jack?"

"Oh, sure—sure!" he almost gulped. "I'm sort o' longing for that home—Mary!"

(By permission of the British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Jack Perrin and his horse, Starlight.)

(Continued from page 2.)

night in a certain position. It must be kept in exactly that position until the following morning, as perhaps the director knocked off work in the middle of a scene. The person who was sitting in that chair will resume his position there the next morning. If the chair is inadvertently moved, and the fact is not noted, the two scenes will not match. The sitter will suddenly appear to have jumped to another position across the room.

Often articles used as props, cannot be replaced at all if they are taken away. Most extras understand this, but some are careless. Also there are often new extras. Holtzendorf was up against a specially difficult problem recently through the employment of several hundred Mexican extras, some of them notoriously "taking" in their ways. It is said to his credit that the sets were protected, and only minor losses sustained, which in no way held up production.

Curiously enough, flowers must be guarded with special care. If there are a lot of flowers being used on scenes, for instance, each bloom must be watched. When the filming is ended the flowers are rushed to a refrigerator for the night, and the bouquets arranged in exactly the same position as a background in the morning.

People for some reason do not seem to think of flowers as props. They will casually stop up to a bouquet on the set and break off a flower, and women extras will often gather half a dozen roses to take home. Once or twice it has been necessary to check every extra through the gate just to get back an armful of roses that was taken from a set.

Complete harmony is maintained by Chief Holtzendorf with Chief Berg, of the Burbank City Police Force, and both work together in the orderly handling of crowds. Frequently several thousand people are needed for mob scenes, and many more than required apply. Fights sometimes develop among such extras, but they have always been quelled without serious disturbance. It's no easy job guarding a $3,000,000 plant, really a miniature city, and one inhabited by many temperamental people.

GROSE'S, LUDGATE CIRCUS, LONDON

FOOTBALL JERSEYS

All Colours and Designs.

15/- per doz. British Made.

Send for Illustrated List. Post Free.

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge St., London, E.C.4.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

MY GREAT OFFER

Write for my free Bargain Lists of the best ALL BRITISH cycles, 14 DAYS' APPROVAL. CARRIAGE PAID. Cash price £3 15s. 0d., or terms. All accessories FREE. Value 21/-.

Edw. O'Brien THE WORLD'S LARGEST CYCLE DEALER DEP 17 COVENTRY.

STAMMERING

Stuttering. New, remarkable. Certain Cure. Complete, 2/-. Details.—L. A. STEBBING, (Stammer Dept. A.F.), 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

Boy's Cinema

"QUICK MILLIONS" AND "WESTWARD BOUND."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^d

No. 611.

EVERY TUESDAY.

AUGUST 29th, 1931.

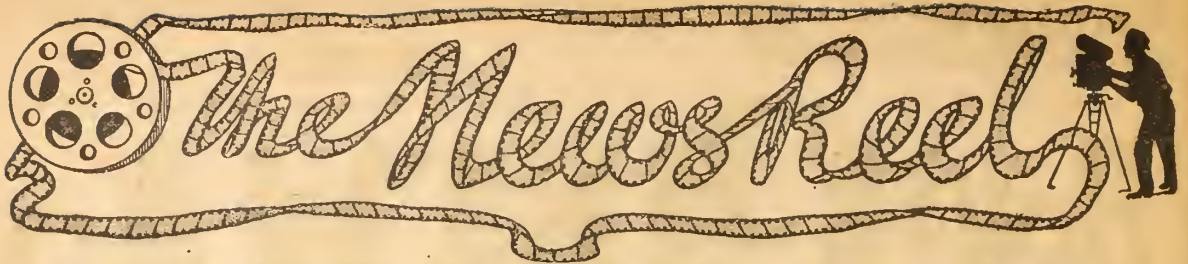

Howard Gibson

With two guns loaded for Action and Thrills.

A STIRRING WESTERN DRAMA.

CLEARING the RANGE!

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Clearing the Range."

Curt Fremont, Hoot Gibson; Mary Moran, Sally Eilers; Lafe Kildare, Hooper Atchley; Juan Consares, George Mendoza; "Dad" Moran, Robert Homans; Burton, Edward Peil.

"Quick Millions."

"Bugs" Raymond, Spencer Tracy; Dorothy Stone, Marguerite Churchill; Daisy de Lisle, Sally Eilers; Arkansas Smith, Robert Burns; Kenneth Stone, John Wray; Nails Markey, Warner Richmond; Jimmy Kirk, George Raft.

"Westward Bound."

Bob Lansing, Buffalo Bill, jun.; Marge Holt, Allene Ray; Frank, Buddy Roosevelt; Ben Coleman, Ben Corbett; Emma, Fern Emmett; Jim Stone, Yakima Canutt; Steve, Robert Walker; Dick, Tom London; Al, Pete Morrison.

Bitten by a Crocodile.

Charles Bickford had a painful experience recently when a crocodile nearly snapped off his foot. He is appearing in a new picture called "East of Borneo," the scenes of which are laid in the Malay Straits. Everything was faithfully reconstructed on the Californian location even to the shallow river, which Bickford had to wade through, and which was infested with crocodiles.

He had been warned to be careful, but had failed to notice one of the reptiles, which suddenly snapped viciously at one of his feet. If the star had not been wearing extra heavy boots at the time an accident would certainly have happened. As it was he felt the big reptile's jaw close on the leather, and only just managed to wrench his foot away before the grip on it became too vice-like.

The pain necessitated his going to hospital, but he was all right again in a few hours.

Red Haired and Freckled.

From the Hal Roach studios I learn that Sherwood Bailey, jun., a seven-year-old Long Beach youngster, has been signed to a term contract by Hal Roach as a member of the famous "Our Gang" comedies. Sherwood is a typical American boy with an abundance of red hair and freckles.

He will play the rôle of a "tough guy," and he known on the screen as "Spud." As Junior Potter, he may be remembered for his work in "The Potters," a series of short subjects. He was also in "Bad Girl," with Sally Eilers, and will be seen in Gary August 29th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S GRAND ISSUE.

TIM McCOY and MARION SHOCKLEY

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. Don't miss the opening episode of this grand new serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama.

"SWEEPSTAKES."

By a trick a jockey is lured away from a kindly master, but at the price of his own honour he plays the game. Disgraced, he swore he would never ride again, but— A thrilling story of the race-course, starring Eddie Quillan.

"WEST OF CHEYENNE."

To save his father from a life-sentence a young cowpuncher penetrates into an outlaw stronghold in search of the real criminal. Starring Tom Tyler.

"THE SEA GOD."

A tale of outlaws of the sea, priceless pearls, a cannibal island, and of a girl who fought for her hero. Starring Richard Arlen and Fay Wray.

Cooper's new picture, "I Take This Woman."

Quick Work.

Some of you have doubtless seen by this time, at the special showing in London, the film record of the world's heavyweight championship fight between Max Schmeling and "Young" Stribling at Cleveland, Ohio. A few minutes after the fight was stopped in the fifteenth round a fast aeroplane left for Canadian territory with the precious film in its round tin. Then a fast launch took it to the liner, and later another aeroplane brought the film to London.

Filming a Bull-Fight.

Though the romantic stuff in "Carmen," the new British International picture, may not have much interest for you fellows, there is one sequence in the story which is bound to have its thrill. This relates to the Spanish bull-fight.

The company, with Mr. Cecil Lewis, the director, went to Spain specially for this purpose, because the securing of the scenes of a real bull-fight was necessary to the success of the production. But the idea was easier planned than carried out. Mr. Lewis was anxious to film the famous Roman Ring at Ronda, but when the vast audience who had assembled to see the bull-fight saw that it was going to be used for picture purposes they set up a vociferous opposition.

For some little time it looked as if the filming would have to be abandoned. Then, through the friendly help of Mariano Rodriguez, the twenty-five-year-old matador hero of the moment, Mr. Lewis was able to stand his camera at the arena barrier. Rodriguez further placed his exceptional talent at the director's disposal by executing the kill on a spot marked within the range of the camera.

Due to the skill of the matador the bull died instantaneously with its forefeet on the small piece of wood which Mr. Lewis had placed on the marked spot. Thus the camera was able to record the most interesting close-up ever secured of a Spanish bull-fight.

Within three hours of filming it Mr. Lewis and his artistes were aboard an express and homeward bound.

Gave Him a Start.

A Western drama was being filmed, and the director was staging a big thrill. After the completion of the scene he turned away from the brink of a high cliff; he noticed a straw dummy lying on the ground.

"Good heavens," he screamed, "who was it we just threw over the cliff?"

Great Pals.

The two Jacks of Paramount's kid picture, "Skippy," are pals although they are as different as possible. Jackie Cooper, who plays the title rôle, is a cocksure young scamp who will soon be eight years of age. Jack Searl, who plays the "heavy," is aged nine, and is always aware of his responsibilities. When tow-headed Jackie Cooper gets in difficulties, which is pretty often, it is the other Jackie who always gets him out and who feels upset when his chum is punished.

Jackie Cooper, for example, fell into dire trouble for eating peanuts against orders and scattering the shells on the floor during "time-off" when "Skippy" was being produced. But

(Continued on page 25.)

Tracking down his brother's slayer, he made out he was yellow and a coward, but as "El Capitan" he blazed his way through a Western crime ring to victory. A thrilling yarn of the Lone Star State.

"CLEARING THE RANGE"

Starring
HOOT GIBSON
and
SALLY EILERS.

The Assassin's Bullet.

RIDING over the southern corner of the Llano Estacado, Texas, you may strike the little cattle town of Comanche, and not so long ago, had you drifted down the main street, you might have seen through the dust of your pony's hoofs a notice-board nailed against the frontage of the local bank.

It read as follows:

"COMANCHE STATE BANK.
President - James Fremont.
Cashier - - Lafe Kildare."

One night, about the hour of eleven, a sallow individual in shirt-sleeves and stetson pushed his way into the bank through the door and looked into the president's office to see Jim Fremont poring over three or four heavy ledgers. "Why, hallo, Jim," the newcomer greeted the man at the desk. "Workin' late, aren't you? I saw the light from outside and thought the bank was bein' robbed or something."

Jim Fremont regarded the man who had just entered with a cold and steely eye.

"The bank has been robbed," he observed deliberately. "And you know it, Kildare!"

"Huh?" The cashier looked at him vacantly. "What's on your mind, Jim?"

"You know what's on my mind as well as I do," Jim Fremont answered vehemently. "You've been borrowing a lot of money you had no right to touch, Kildare—the bank's money. And these books here show exactly how much you've appropriated."

Kildare bit his lip. "I didn't mean to steal it, Jim," he said. "I only wanted it to speculate, and I meant to pay it back. But the bottom dropped outa the market and I lost every dime."

"Listen, Kildare," Jim Fremont ground out, "most men would throw you into gaol the minute they discovered what you'd been doin', but I'm being lenient. I'll give you time to make up the deficit, and I'll keep quiet about the damning evidence these ledgers reveal. But that money has got to be paid up to the last cent before the end of the month, or I turn the books over to the sheriff. Understand?"

Kildare spread out his hands appealingly. "But how am I gonna raise the dough by then?" he argued desperately. "I'm in a jam, and I've gotta have more time than a month."

Jim Fremont drummed his fingers on his desk. He was a man still in the early thirties, a man whose talents promised a distinguished career in the banking profession.

"I'm sorry, Kildare," he said, "but you'll have to find that cash, or I'll be forced to prosecute."

Lafe Kildare drew back. "All right," he said huskily. "All right—I'll do my best."

Fremont turned his attention to the ledgers again. Kildare, retreating towards the door, paused all at once and shutted his hand hesitantly to the region of his hip. There was something in his mien that gave him the appearance of a hunted thing at bay.

Suddenly his fingers closed on the butt of a six-gun. The touch of cold steel seemed to steady him, and he drew the weapon from its holster—levelled it at the figure of the man at the desk.

There was a deafening smash, and a whiff of acrid gun-smoke enveloped Jim Fremont. A sharp cry sprang to his lips, a cry that ended in a low groan as he tumbled from his chair with a bullet in his heart.

Kildare thrust the six-shooter back into its holster. For an instant panic seized him, and his impulse was to fly the premises. But it was an impulse that he fought down, and, stumbling past Fremont's prone body, he gathered up the ledgers with trembling hands, stowed them in a safe and locked it. Then he slipped out of the bank through a back door, dived into a side street and made for a two-story apartment house where he shared a room with a crony known as Tom Burton.

By the time Kildare gained that haven the town seemed in an uproar. He found Burton at home, and the latter glanced at him inquiringly as he entered.

"What's the rucus down there, Lafe?" he demanded.

Kildare moistened his lips. "How should I know?" he blurted almost savagely.

"Well, you were out, weren't you?" said Burton. "And somebody loosed off a gun, didn't they? I thought you might've heard what the trouble was."

There was a clatter of hoofs outside the house at that moment, and presently footsteps were heard ascending to the room in which Kildare sat.

HELP THE NEWSAGENT.

Have you ever thought how difficult it is for a newsagent to order just the right number of copies of any particular paper each week? You can make his task much easier if you place a regular order with him. You will not only help him to order correctly and avoid waste, but will make sure of getting your copy regularly each week.

Burton lodged. Kildare looked at his associate haggardly.

"Listen," he jerked, "I've been indoors all night. See? I haven't been outside this room."

Burton eyed him shrewdly.

"I get you, Lafe," he drawled.

There was a knock on the door. Burton answered it, and found himself confronted by a deputy. The deputy looked past him.

"Oh, Kildare!" he called. "The sheriff's down below. He'd like to talk to you a minute."

Kildare's hand travelled to his collar nervously. He joined the deputy on a small landing at the top of a flight of stairs which were built against the side of the house and led to the street level. Beneath him he saw the sheriff and a posse of half a dozen men.

"Kildare," the sheriff called to him, "somebody just broke into the bank an' shot Jim Fremont dead!"

"Shot Jim Fremont?" Kildare echoed in feigned horror. "Shot Jim Fremont dead? Good heavens, sheriff! Did you get the killer?"

"No," was the answer, "but me and the boys are spradin' out in the hope of sightin' him. I wondered if you would go to the bank and take over there. You know—see that nothing's disturbed."

Kildare had regained his composure.

"I'll do that, sheriff," he said eagerly, "right away."

The deputy who had summoned him was already descending the stairs. He followed the sheriff as the latter galloped off with the posse, and Kildare leaned weakly against the rail of the landing on which he stood.

A voice spoke behind him. It was the voice of Burton.

"Indoors all night, huh?" he mused. "So it was you that killed Fremont, Lafe."

"I had to do it," Kildare breathed. "I was in a corner. I—had to do it."

Two days later the name of James Fremont no longer figured on the plate outside the Comanche State Bank. For by that time the notice-board displayed the legend:

"President - Lafe Kildare."

Curt Fremont.

A YOUNGSTER in a broad-brimmed stetson and Texas star-boots cantered into Comanche, and looked around him with the air of one to whom the little township recalled memories. He was a blond young man with a cheerful face that did not seem to imply an over-abundance of manly qualities at the first glance, though there was a glint in his eyes reminiscent of tried steel.

In a shady corner near a saloon a couple of old-timers were exhibiting to each other their skill with the six-shooter.

The young horseman, whom many in the town might have recognised as Curt Fremont, brother of the slain bank president, caught sight of them and paused to watch them. He saw one of the aged fellows spin his forty-five deftly in the air and catch it by the butt, then challenge the other to emulate the trick.

The challenge was accepted, but in the attempt the second veteran's finger fouled the trigger and a shot smashed out startlingly.

Thirty yards down the street a couple of spirited horses harnessed to a buckboard dashed forward in a panic, and an elderly Spanish woman in a man-

August 29th, 1931.

tilla lost her hold of the reins and screamed for help. That scream did not go unanswered, for Curt Fremont clapped his heels to his bronco's flanks and galloped after the buckboard in full pursuit.

He overtook the runaways ere they had gone fifty paces, and dragged them to a standstill, and he was waving aside the gratitude of the senora when a Mexican youth sped from a nearby store and ran to the spot.

"Madre mio," he panted, seizing the senora's hands, "you are not hurt?"

"Thanks to this young cahallero, no," the elderly woman in the mantilla answered, indicating Curt.

The Mexican youth turned his head, and next moment he uttered a cry of recognition.

"Why, Curt Fremont," he exclaimed. "We haven't seen you for years. Madre mio," he added to his mother, "do not tell me you did not know Curt."

"I would never have recognised him, Juan," the senora replied. "What are you doing in Comanche, Curt?"

Curt smiled.

"Well, I'm tired of ridin' herd for other folks," he said. "I thought I'd settle in Comanche and start ranchin' on my own."

Juan looked at him seriously.

"You have heard—about your brother, Curt?" he murmured, and all at once Curt Fremont's eyes seemed to harden.

"Yes," he said, "I've heard—"

The buckboard had been pulled up outside the Comanche State Bank, and at that moment Lafe Kildare emerged from it. As he saw Juan's mother he came over and touched his hat.

"Good morning, Senora Consares," he said. "I'm glad you're in town. I wanted to see you about that mortgage the bank holds on your rancho. I'm afraid I'll have to foreclose on it."

The old lady gazed at him in consternation.

"But, Senor Kildare," she protested, "I cannot pay the bank that money. In three-four months, yes. But just now it is impossible."

"You have cattle, senora," Kildare observed. "If you can't pay on the nail, I'll have to take your herd in lieu of cash."

"Senor, that would ruin me," Juan's mother cried. "Of what use is my land without cattle? How am I to exist?"

Kildare shrugged.

"Sorry, senora," he said, "but the bank needs the money that was loaned to you, and if you can't settle I'll have to have that stock."

Curt leaned down from the saddle.

"Are you Mr. Kildare?" he asked in the friendliest of tones, and, as his brother's slayer nodded: "I'm Curt Fremont," he went on. "Jim used to mention you often in his letters to me. He had a lotta respect for you, Mr. Kildare, and I'm glad to meet you."

Kildare made some gruff rejoinder. He had given a start on learning Curt's identity, and for a moment a flicker of fear had darted through his eyes. He was not the whining creature who had gone in terror for his skin the night he had shot the elder Fremont, however. Since then he had walked with a confident step, a kind of a swagger, knowing full well the powerful position in which circumstances and his own villainy had placed him.

"You know, Mr. Kildare," Curt continued. "I was thinking of settlin' down in Comanche. Did my brother leave me any property, aside from the little rancho he owned?"

"Not a cent's worth," was the blunt answer. "Not even that little rancho. You know, there was a big deficit at the bank when your brother died, and his estate had to be attached to help meet the obligations."

He turned away, and Curt was left with Juan and his mother. He saw Kildare join a crowd of men near a hitch-rail, and, all having mounted, ride with them out of the town.

"Kildare, he travel with a bad bunch of hombres now," said Juan, "and the whole town seems plenty 'fraid of him."

"Oh, I don't know," mused Curt. "I'd kind of like to see more of him. Say, Juan, I'm going over to stay for a while at the Morans. If you aim to get in touch with me any time you'll find me there."

He parted from Juan and his mother a few minutes afterwards, and took the trail that led through the rocky country south of Comanche to the Moran outfit, one of the largest ranches in the county.

It was owned by 'Dad' Moran, who had been a close friend of Curt's father when the latter had been alive, and Curt met the grizzled old cattleman as he was coming off the range with some of his hands.

"Why, Curt," declared the rancher, offering him a big, bronzed fist, "I'm powerful glad to see you. Was just wonderin' when Mary Lou an' I could be expectin' you. Go on into the house and meet her. I'll join you there as soon as I've finished some business I've got to attend to."

Curt dismounted at the door of the trim ranch-house and walked into the living-room, where he was looking around him as on a scene that conjured up memories when a light footstep on a staircase caught his attention.

Mary Moran appeared a moment later, a winsome brunette who had been the sweetheart of Curt's boyhood. As she caught sight of him she hurried towards him with outstretched hands.

"Curt!" she exclaimed. "Gee, it's good to see you again. But my, you've changed some—you're taller, and more grown-up."

Curt grinned.

"You've changed too," he declared. "Why, the last time I saw you you were only so high." He indicated her former stature, and then: "No, maybe taller than that," he added, drawing her closer and pressing her head against his chest. "About so high, I should say—or maybe—"

"Now you're fooling, Curt," she interrupted laughingly, breaking away from him.

Dad Moran came into the house, and, lighting a pipe, blew out a cloud of smoke ere he spoke:

"Well, Curt," he said, in sober tones. "I suppose you've come back to Comanche to get the man that shot your brother Jim."

It was as if a cloud passed across Curt's face, a fleeting cloud that vanished to leave his habitual, ingenuous expression unimpaired.

"Well, of course, I'd like to see the snake that killed Jim brought to justice," he claimed, "but I figured on settlin' down hereabouts, too—maybe buyin' some little property and startin' on my own. I'd kind of hoped to take over that land Jim worked as a sideline to his banking career, but Kildare tells me he had to take it over to settle some of the bank's liabilities."

Dad Moran took the pipe from his mouth and looked at Curt grimly.

"Do you mean to tell me that you were talkin' to Kildare?" he demanded. "Why not?" Curt asked. Moran's glance hardened. "Son," he stated, "there's a lotta folk in and around Comanche that have the idea it was Kildare himself who was responsible for your brother's death, and they might say so if they dared."

"Oh, I've heard that, too," Curt murmured, "but I don't aim to take no notice of idle gossip. Besides, I didn't come here to start any trouble and get in wrong with anybody. I want to settle down peaceable-like, and not get my hide plugged with lead. By the way, Daddy Moran, where's my room?" "The one above the porch," said Moran, and the words seemed to come almost harshly from his lips.

Curt went up to the apartment that had been set aside for him, and when he had gone Dad Moran exchanged a queer glance with Mary.

"To settle down peaceable-like," he muttered darkly. "Not get his hide plugged with lead. Say, that's no Fremont talk. That boy's not the man his father was—no, nor the man that his brother Jim was!"

"He seems to have changed," she said, "changed terribly."

The Spoilers.

THERE was a commotion outside the ranch-house, which brought forth Dad Moran and Mary. Curt appearing on their heels at a leisurely pace.

A troop of horsemen had clattered past the corral to the front door of the dwelling, riding from the rolling mesquite valleys towards the border. Lafe Kildare was at the head of the band, which comprised his hirelings, and in the midst of the party was a youngster who had obviously received rough handling.

His wrists were bound behind his back. His forehead was flecked with blood, and his features were bruised, and he seemed in so sorry a plight that he could scarce keep the saddle. Many were the marks of cowardly treatment that he bore, cowardly because Kildare's followers were fully a score in number. The youth was a

Juan—

Old Dad Moran glared up at Kildare as the latter spoke a greeting to him.

"What have you been doing to that boy?" the rancher demanded harshly. "What's he tied up for?"

"For resistin' the course o' the law," Kildare answered briefly. "He tried to pull a gun on one o' my men when we called to impound his mother's cattle in lieu of the mortgage money she owes."

Dad Moran's face grew red with anger.

"Kildare," he blazed, "you're makin' yourself mighty unpopular in these parts, and I aim to have you know that I'm not your friend. As for the Comanche State Bank, I'm severin' all connection with it while you're president."

Kildare smiled crookedly. "I reckon it was on that score I dropped in here while headin' north with the senora's cattle," he stated. "Moran, you'll recall that a heavy deficit was discovered at the bank after Jim Fremont's death, and I'd like to remind you that you and certain others stood guarantee for all money deposited when that bank was founded."

"Well?" Dad Moran ground out. "Well," Kildare continued, "you're legally liable for part of the cash that's missin', and your share is twenty thousand dollars, which must be paid afore the end of the month."

Moran was speechless for a moment. When he did find his voice it was husky with indignation.

"Where do you think I can raise twenty thousand dollars in a month?" he blurted.

Kildare shrugged. "That's a question that concerns yourself, not me," he answered.

Curt Fremont had drawn close, a vacuous expression on his face, and, standing close to Juan's horse, he suddenly caught the Mexican youth's eye. In the glance that Juan bestowed on him there was an appeal that should have been irresistible.

"Curt," he said, audibly enough for Kildare to hear. "I could not stand by and let them r-rob my mother of her all. Take care of her for me, I beg you."

Curt looked away. "Say, I've got nothin' to do with this!" he protested. "I like you, Juan, but I ain't aimin' to champion other folks in their troubles. I got plenty of my own—seem' about raisin' enough dough to buy a ranch, an' everything. An' I aim to live peaceable, without ruinin' foul of nobody."

If ever anyone registered bewilderment it was Juan in the moment of hearing that speech, so unlike what the Curt of former days might have been expected to deliver. As for Kildare, who had caught every word, he looked down with amused contempt at the brother of the man he had slain, and then sent his pony forward with a pressure of the knees, his hirelings and their captive following him.

Curt walked back into the living-room of the ranch-house, where he was presently joined by Mary and her father, and it was with a bitterly scornful expression on her pretty face that Mary approached him.

"Curt Fremont," she said, "aren't you ashamed of yourself?"

Curt looked at her in an injured fashion.

"For not takin' Juan's part?" he inquired. "Why should I be? I didn't come here lookin' for a rakes. I laid off my guns long ago, for there ain't no sense in settlin' arguments with 'em, and maybe gettin' plugged full o' holes."

"Oh, you're impossible!" Mary snapped.

Curt shrugged his shoulders and wandered upstairs, where he was heard to close and lock his door.

Once the key was turned his manner underwent a change—a change that might have startled the Morans more than his apparent chicken-heartedness had done. Like a cloak his pose of leisurely self-indulgence fell away from him, and, a glint as of iron in his eye, he rummaged through his personal belongings and drew forth those two six-guns which he had claimed to have laid aside, and also a Winchester rifle.

Armed with these, he quietly raised the sash of his window, lowered himself to the porch, and then dropped lightly to the ground. His brone was hard by, and, leading it by the bridle till he figured it was out of earshot, he swung himself into the saddle and dashed into a belt of chaparral that screened him from view.

Following a track through the thickets, a short cut that picked up the Comanche road some miles to the north,

"Hey," he complained in drowsy accents. "Whatsa idea? Can't a feller get any sleep around here?"

he gained a mass of craggy rocks that suited his purpose. Here he chose a vantage-point overlooking the trail along which Kildare and his gang must pass, and here he set about making certain preparations for their coming.

Kildare and his band hove in taken fifteen minutes after Curt had taken up position, and they were riding between the tumbled masses of rock when a voice hailed them startlingly—a voice shouting out an order in the accents of a Mexican, and unrecognisable as Curt Fremont's.

"Ho, there—halt, amigos! Make not a movement, or we fire!"

Kildare drew rein abruptly and turned his head with a scared look, his hirelings doing the same. They scanned the rocks, but saw no one.

"Pedro, Lopez, Esteban," Curt shouted to three imaginary companions, "hold their leader covered, and shoot to kill if he tries any tricks! The rest of you watch his men."

Having given these instructions, he sped to various points in the rocks with all speed, calling out a word here and there, and changing the tone of his voice to raise the impression that the commands were being answered by numerous followers.

"Si, capitan." "Si, capitan." "Ho, there, Miguél, you heard El Capitan? Carambo! We'll riddle any of them who so much as twitches a finger!"

And so back to his original station, where he again assumed the tones of El Capitan, but spoke in broken English.

"Mebbe you hombres no' understand Spanish too well, eh? So! I tell my men to shoot to keel if you try any trecks. You understand that verce well, yes?"

A sullen silence was maintained by Kildare and his associates. They kept glancing about them furtively for some sign of the Mexicans whom they believed to be lying in ambush.

Once more Curt spoke.

"Let the youth who rides a prisoner with you come forward alone to the rocks," he said. "R-remember—alone!"

Kildare glanced over his shoulder at one of his ruffians, who was holding the bridle of Juan's horse. He signed to the man to release it, and Juan pressed his heels into the bronco's flanks, urging the creature towards the mighty boulders from behind which the imperious voice of El Capitan had sounded.

He had not reached those rocks when a member of Kildare's gang made a suspicious movement. Curt detected it, and snatched the end of a rope lying at his feet. The rope was connected to the trigger of his rifle, wedged in a crevice some distance away, and the weapon spat flame and lead with a smashing report.

The bullet soared above the heads of the rogues on the trail harmlessly enough, but it convinced them that the mysterious El Capitan's words had been no idle piece of bluff, and every hand went higher, particularly those of the gangster whose movement had inspired the shot.

Juan reached the rocks and allowed his horse to push through them. As he caught sight of Curt he made as if to utter a cry, but Curt silenced him with a gesture, severed the cords that bound the Mexican youth's wrists, and then pointed to a narrow defile which led on to a strip of prairie.

Juan nodded and cantered towards the pass. Curt, vaulting into the saddle of his own bronc, paused only to call a final command to his imaginary band of followers.

"We go, companeros," he said, audibly August 29th, 1931.

enough for Kildare and his men to hear. "Keep these carrion-birds covered till we are well clear, and if they try to follow—shoot to kill!"

Kildare and his hirelings remained motionless for many seconds, listening to the retreating hoofs of the horses ridden by Juan and El Capitan. But as the silence of the immediate vicinity remained unbroken either by voice or movement, vague doubts began to take shape in their minds, and presently Kildare plucked up enough courage to signal an advance on the rocks.

They obeyed him hesitantly, and Kildare brought up the rear. As progress was made without a shot being fired, the rogues grew bolder and forced their horses to quicken pace. Next moment they were in the very midst of the empty rocks, and staring in mingled rage and chagrin at the rifle with the rope attached to its trigger.

"Tricked, by thunder!" snarled Kildare, and then suddenly one of his men pointed through the defile to the strip of prairie beyond, where a swirl of dust was rising towards a sky that had darkened with the approach of nightfall.

"There they go!"

Kildare lashed at his horse, and with his gang in full career behind him, he gave chase—a chase that led southward again through the chaparral.

It was impossible on account of the gloom to recognise the identity of Juan's rescuer, and, failing to make up on the fugitives, Kildare could hazard no guess at it. But the trail led direct to the Moran rancho, where, a minute or two before, the scoundrelly bank president and his hirelings burst clear of the thickets, Curt and Juan disposed of their horses and climbed noiselessly to the room above the porch.

Once in that room Curt told Juan to conceal himself under the bed, and, having undressed and unlocked the door, slipped between the sheets. Hardly was his head on the pillow when Kildare and his men drew rein at the ranch-house.

Kildare hammered on the front door with the butt of a six-gun, and the summons brought old Dad Moran and Mary to the threshold.

"What's the idea in settin' up this confounded rucus, Kildare?" Dad Moran demanded as he faced his visitor.

"I'm lookin' for two men that rode this way," Kildare blazed. "One was Juan, and the other was some ornery fox that tricked us into surrenderin' him. Where are they?"

"How should I know?" Moran retorted angrily. "Nobody's stopped here since you looked in an hour ago yourself."

Kildare's eyes narrowed.

"I ain't believin' that," he rapped out. "We trailed 'em to this ranch-house, an' I aim to search it. Understand?"

"You can come in alone," was the stern rejoinder, "but keep your men outside. I ain't havin' them a-troopin' through my home."

Kildare agreed to this, and, after a tour of the ground floor, moved towards the staircase.

"There's no one up there but that peace-lovin' jack-rabbit Curt Fremont," Dad Moran observed testily.

Kildare paused thoughtfully. Curt Fremont, eh? Supposing Curt Fremont had been pulling wool over his eyes, supposing he was not the timid individual he appeared to be?

"I'd like to see Curt Fremont," Kildare growled.

Dad Moran took a lamp and led the way up to Curt's room. He made as if to knock on the door; but Kildare restrained him, and, drawing his six-gun again, flung open the door without preliminary.

The sound of deep snoring came from the far side of the room, and the lamplight played on Curt's innocent face. He seemed to be in the land of dreams; but Kildare was not satisfied, and he jammed his six-gun into Curt's ribs.

Curt sat up sleepily and blinked at the bank president.

"Hey," he complained in drowsy accents, "whatsa idea? Can't a feller get any sleep around here?"

Ho struggled out of bed with an effort and yawned capaciously, a comical figure clad in a striped night-shirt.

"Whatsa matter, anyway?" he demanded.

"Aw, nothin'," growled Kildare, and strode out of the room again with Dad Moran on his heels.

Curt listened for a moment to their retreating footfalls, and then, glancing over his shoulder, saw the heel of a riding-boot protruding from under the bed. It was only by the greatest good fortune that Lufe Kildare had not discerned it and dragged Juan Consares from his place of concealment.

Curt kicked at the boot lustily.

"You can come out now, but next time anybody looks in here keep out of sight for the love o' Mike."

Juan crawled forth and stood beside Curt, his hand on the cowboy's shoulder.

"How can I ever thank you, amigo?" he murmured.

"Aw, forget it," Curt told him. "Say, I suppose you got a pretty big surprise when you came through those rocks and saw me, huh?"

Juan smiled.

"Not so verce big surprise, Curt," he answered. "You fooled Kildare and those other hombres, but I knew by the voice that it was an Americano who had saved me, and not a Mexican."

"How come?" Curt inquired.

"Well," said Juan laughingly, "your Spanish is terrible."

Curt dressed himself, and two or three minutes later made his way downstairs to find some grub. He entered the living-room as Kildare was on the point of taking his leave, having explained to the Morans in detail the reason for his call.

"I suppose you're satisfied now, at any rate," Dad Moran observed contemptuously.

"I suppose so," Kildare rejoined in a disgruntled tone, and was making his way towards the front door when Curt hurried after him.

"Oh, Mister Kildare," he said innocently, "could you lend me a hundred dollars?"

"No, you blockhead," the bank president snapped, and slammed out of the house.

Curt pretended to look hurt, and stood near the door for a spell with his hands in his pocket. He was aroused by the voice of Mary Lou.

"What a man!" she breathed.

Curt turned his head.

"Who?" he asked.

"El Capitan," Mary answered, "the Mexican who just held up Kildare and all his gang single-handed and rescued Juan Consares."

"El Capitan?" Curt repeated.

"What's his real name?"

"I don't know," Mary Lou retorted.

"But I do know that it isn't Curt Fremont," she added sarcastically.

Curt looked at her unabashed.

"O' course it isn't," he declared. "In the first place, I've got a respect for my hide. In the second place, I wouldn't do anything that might make trouble for you and Dad."

He walked in the direction of the kitchen, but looked round as he reached the threshold of it.

"An' in the third place, I don't look like a Mexican," he stated, "an' my Spanish is terrible."

He passed out of sight, to reappear presently with a plate laden with food.

"Oh, say, Mary Lou," he inquired, pausing on his way to the staircase, "if you're goin' into town with the buckboard to-morrow maybe you'd giunne a lift."

"You're got a horse, haven't you?" the girl said icily.

"Yeah," Curt replied, "but you sorta convinced me I ain't man enough to ride him."

One Thousand Dollars Reward.

W HILE Mary Lou made some purchases at the general store, Curt Fremont remained in the buckboard with a thoughtful expression on his face, and he was only aroused from his reverie when a passer-by hailed him.

"Why, hallo, Slim!" Curt greeted, recognising an old acquaintance. "How's tricks? Still raisin' stock on that ranch o' yours down by the border?"

The other man gave a bitter, mirthless laugh.

"I don't own that ranch any more, Curt," he said. "The bank held a note of mine, and Kildare foreclosed on it and attached my entire outfit. I'm workin' down at the stockyard now. There's a lot more of your old friends there. Their ranches were taken over by Kildare as well."

Curt leaned closer to him. "Would you boys like to get back at Kildare?" he asked in an undertone.

"Show us how!" was the eager rejoinder.

"Maybe I will," Curt told him. "You know, Slim, all Texas ain't big enough for me an' Lufe Kildare—an' it's plenty big. But just now I'm lyin' low."

His companion looked around him guardedly.

"Listen, Curt," he said, "it wouldn't be a bad thing if we could get El Capitan to work with us."

"Who?" Curt inquired innocently.

"El Capitan, the Mexican daredevil that held up Kildare and his gang yesterday. Take a stroll over to the bank there, and read what it says on the notice-board."

Curt nodded.

"I will, Slim," he agreed. "An' don't forget what I said. I'll be seein' yuh."

He descended from the buckboard and crossed the street, making his way to the bank's premises. On the notice-board that his acquaintance had mentioned he discovered a bill referring to the incident of the previous day:

"One Thousand Dollars Reward For Information Leading to the Arrest of The Bandit known as El Capitan."

It was while Curt was considering this notice that he suddenly became aware that a Mexican senorita had driven up in a buggy and was making urgent signals to him. Only when the cowboy approached to within a few feet of the equipage did he recognise Juan.

"Buenos dias, senor," Juan said, coyly drawing the veil of a mantilla over his face.

"Hully gee," breathed Curt, "what are you masquerootin' around town for?"

Juan became earnest.

"I stole away to my mother's and got these clothes," he explained. "Curt, my mother is penniless, and she is hungry. What am I to do?"

Curt crammed a few notes into the Mexican youth's fist. "Buy some grub with these," he said. "Get it at the Mexican store. They won't betray you there. An' listen, Juan, I know a way we can get some ready cash for your mother. See you later."

Juan drove on, and had scarcely left Curt when the latter was joined by a sturdily-built man of fifty.

"Well, if it ain't Jim Bellamy," Curt exclaimed. "Say, don't tell me they've made you sheriff since I left these parts," he added, observing a star that was pinned to Bellamy's waistcoat.

"They sure have, Curt," Bellamy informed him.

"That must be a pretty good job," Curt murmured, "with the bank offerin' thousand dollar rewards."

The sheriff addressed him in a confidential tone.

"Aw, I ain't worryin' much about El Capitan," he said. "Of course, under the circumstances, it would be my duty to arrest him. But it's my private opinion he deserves a medal."

"I'm glad you feel that way, sheriff," Curt announced with a grin.

"By the way," observed Bellamy, "who was the lady I saw you with just now?"

Curt's grin broadened. "Her name begins with 'Juan,'" he answered, "and I'm not tellin' you any more. If you knew that girl you might take her away from me."

The sheriff laughed heartily and passed on, and Curt had turned his attention to the reward notice again when Mary Lou appeared at his side.

"Hallo," she said mockingly, as she realised the object of his interest, "are you thinking of earning that thousand dollars?"

"Why not?" Curt asked her. "If I could capture that outlaw an' get the reward I'd be able to start buyin' a ranch."

Mary Lou made no attempt to restrain her mirth as she pushed past him and entered a drug-store farther along the street. But she might have gained a very different impression of Curt Fremont had she been able to follow the trend of his thoughts and activities in the next few minutes.

For the instant the coast was clear Curt unpinned the reward notice, scribbled a few lines on the back of it and then, slipping into Kildare's empty office by a side-door, laid the paper on the scoundrelly bank president's desk.

Approaching footfalls warned Curt to make himself scarce, and he slipped out of the room a moment before Kildare entered it. The crook discovered the message almost at once.

"If you want El Capitan, go to the Consares Rancho at midnight to-night," it ran. "He will be there. Bring the thousand dollars with you.—A FRIEND."

That evening, behind the locked door of his bed-room at the Moran outfit, Curt Fremont decked himself out in the gay costume of a caballero from Spanish America, a costume comprising velvet calzoneros with seams unbuttoned at the ankles, a dark silk shirt, a black kerchief

"Hello," she said mockingly, as she realised the object of his interest, "are you thinking of earning that thousand dollars?"

ted tightly around the head and a flat-brimmed hat with a chin-strap.

"You know," he said to Juan, who was still dressed as a senorita, "I never would've thought of this rig-out if Kildare hadn't put the idea into my head with that reward notice o' his. C'mon, Juan, let's beat it. But don't make any noise. So long as the Morans don't know you're here, nor what I'm up to, then I reckon they can't be blamed by Kildare for anything that happens."

"I understand," Juan answered, and, going to the window, he clambered over the sill, lowered himself silently to the porch and dropped to the ground.

Curt followed him, and together they hurried through the gloom to the stables. Curt took his own horse and Juan one of Dad Moran's. They walked the animals until they felt certain they were beyond earshot, then they pushed on into the darkness at the gallop, heading south for the Consares rancho.

A strong body of men were riding towards the same destination from Comanche. They were Kildare and the coterie of rascality that he had gathered around him since he had come into power, and they reached the Consares hacienda shortly before midnight.

Kildare confronted the Senora Consares alone, leaving his men in a cordon around the house.

The bank president wasted no words.

"I'm here in answer to a message I got to-day, senora," he said, "telling me I could lay hands on El Capitan if I showed up at midnight. But that's not the only reason I came. You've got your son Juan hidden in this house, and I want him. I'm gonna make an example o' that pup and show everybody in this section that I'm not the man to cross. You'd better turn him over afore I order my men to search the outfit."

"Senor," Juan's mother protested, "I give you my word I do not know where my son is hiding!"

"Don't lie!" Kildare rapped out, but before he could say more a door swung open behind him and the barrel of a six-gun was thrust into the small of his back.

The hand that held the gun was Curt's, but Kildare did not turn around to ascertain his identity. With a scared expression on his face he reached for the air.

"I am glad the Senor Keeldare is on time," said Curt, imitating the accents of a Mexican, and with the words he wrapped his arm around the crook's throat and dragged him forcibly into the black darkness of the room from which he had stepped.

The door was slammed and locked, and Senora Consares was left staring at it in bewilderment. For Curt had not taken her into his confidence, and the whole affair was as much a surprise to her as it must have been to Kildare.

She was only aroused from her stupor by the appearance of Tom Burton, who had become Kildare's right-hand man since the latter had stepped into Jim Fremont's shoes.

"Where's Kildare?" Burton demanded.

The senora made some evasive, faltering rejoinder which was interrupted by the hammering of Kildare's heels against the locked door of the other room. With a yell that brought a crowd of his associates into the house Burton hurled himself at that door.

The rest of the gangsters hastened to his assistance, and their combined efforts smashed down the door. In the gloom of the other room they descried the bound form of Kildare.

"Gimme a gun," the bank president

August 29th, 1931.

snarled, as soon as he had been released.

At that precise moment a dark-eyed senorita emerged from the house by a side-door at which one of Kildare's men had been posted.

"Hey, where are you goin', senorita?" the ruffian demanded.

The senorita had drawn the veil of her mantilla over her face, so that the gangster failed to observe that the "damsel's" complexion was of a decidedly masculine texture. He merely grinned a self-satisfied smirk as the senorita made eyes at him.

The masquerading Juan having thus diverted the rogie's attention, Curt moved from the doorway and planted himself behind the gangster. Smirking, the man received the full force of Curt's gun-butt on the back of his skull, and collapsed without a sound.

By the time Kildare and the rest of the gang blundered out of the house, Curt and Juan had hit the saddle and were putting distance between themselves and the scene of their escapade.

They had risked their lives to provide the senora, Juan's mother, with a little ready cash—and they had not failed in their project. For, going through to the room where Kildare had been so neatly trussed the senora caught sight of a bundle of notes pinned to the door-post with a knife, the blade of which gleamed in the light from the hall.

Surrounded!

CURT and Juan reached the Moran outfit and swung themselves out of the saddle. Juan chased the horses into the barn, fastened the big door on them and then dived into a monstrous pile of hay. Curt sprang to the porch and climbed to the window of his room, only to find that the shutters had been drawn over it in his absence.

He was compelled to drop to the ground again and slip into the ranch-house by the front door. The place was in darkness, but he felt his way to the staircase and was making for his room when he heard Kildare and his gang come up at the gallop.

Next instant the hammering of Kildare's gun-butt on the front-door was echoing through the house.

The sound brought Mary Lou from her room, and she stepped out on to the landing with a lighted candle in her hand. Curt ducked into a niche close to the head of the stairs, and as she was passing him he jumped out on her and snuffed the flame.

She uttered a little cry, sharp and querulous, but in spite of the darkness realised that she was confronted by a man in Mexican attire, though his face she could not discern.

"Hush, senorita," he whispered. "I no hurt you."

"El Capitan?" she breathed, in a thrilled tone.

"At your service, senorita," was the answer, and then Curt drew her back into the niche as a splash of lantern-light filled the end of the corridor.

Dad Moran put in an appearance. He was armed, and with an ominous expression on his face he made his way downstairs. He gained the living-room even as the front door burst open under a combined attack by Kildare and his ruffians, and next moment Mary Lou and her companion on the landing heard the old man's enraged tones.

"Kildare, this is my house! What the blazes do you mean by breakin' into it this way—"

"We want El Capitan, Moran," came the grim rejoinder. "We trailed him here!"

"I don't know what you're talkin' about—"

Dad Moran did not complete the sentence, for two of Kildare's gangsters worked round to the rear of him and then pounced on him to wrest his gun from his grasp.

"Moran," said Kildare venomously, "I'm gonna search the house, an' I'm gonna search it from top to bottom!"

With the words he crossed to a little table that stood near the foot of the stairs, a table on which Moran had set the lantern when he had descended a minute before.

From the landing Curt saw Kildare reach for the lantern, and with an unexpectedness that took the girl completely by surprise he caught Mary Lou in his arms and kissed her.

Then he turned towards the head of the staircase again, plucked out his six-gun, and fed that lantern with a blast of lead that plunged the living-room into darkness and sent Kildare leaping back in alarm.

Scarce had the forty-five belched flame than Curt dived down the stairs at the top of his speed.

Kildare let out a yell and blundered to meet him, but was immediately mistaken for El Capitan by one of his own men. Meanwhile, Curt paused in his rapid descent and vaulted the banisters to land with a thud on a table in the middle of the room.

A gangster scrambled up to tackle him. Curt slammed his fist to the ruffian's jaw, and at the same time drove his heel into the face of another man hovering behind him. Then he sprang to the floor, only to be surrounded immediately.

Blows were exchanged, and the mêlée waxed fast and furious. It involved half a dozen men, and the rest of the gang hung about the fringe of the struggle, ready to leap upon El Capitan if he managed to break free.

They did not know that El Capitan, alias Curt Fremont, was no longer engaged in the scuffle. With the advantage of being more accustomed to the gloom than his adversaries, he had slid under the table and was waiting the first opportunity of making a dash for liberty.

Near by, two of Kildare's gang were fighting tooth and nail, each convinced that the other was the mysterious Mexican dare-devil. Presently one of them was knocked to the floor, and finished up close to where Curt was crouching. The cowboy immediately dragged the cover off the table and flung it over the unfortunate ruffian's figure.

Someone pounced on the prostrate gangster, claiming that he had secured El Capitan. Three other men followed suit, and he who had been wrapped in the table-cloth received the drubbing of his life, his cries of protest being too muffled and indistinct to enlighten his assailants.

Meanwhile Curt slid from under the table and darted across the room, only to be seen by another of Kildare's gang.

"There he goes!" the crook bellowed, chasing after Curt, but a moment later the pursuer collided with Kildare, who let out a triumphant yell and seized him.

"I've got him, boys!"

Curt made for the window, but as he gained it a burly rogie caught sight of him, and laid hold of a chair, swinging it on high and dashing it at the fugitive's head.

Curt ducked, and the chair swept through the window, carrying glass and framework with it. Then he closed with the gangster, clutched him around the legs, and tossed him over his back. The man fell with a thud that knocked the breath out of his body, and before he had recovered himself Curt was over the sill.

There came the scrape of a match, as, standing near the fireplace, old Dad Moran lit a candle that he had found on the mantel-shelf. The glimmer of flame revealed scattered groups of men fighting lustily in the belief that they had secured El Capitan.

"We got him here!" roared one of those who was belabouring the luckless individual enfolded in the table-cloth.

There was an eager rush from all points, Kildare figuring prominently in the stampede. But the bank president's face registered fury and chagrin as the table-cloth was wrenched aside to disclose a half-senseless member of his own gang.

"He's given us the slip," Kildare barked, and led the way from the house.

He emerged into the open to see the back view of El Capitan as the latter galloped swiftly into the gloom, headed for a range of hills that loomed against the velvet Border sky.

From the window of her room Mary Lou saw El Capitan too, and with never a suspicion of his real identity, prayed fervently for his safety.

Her prayers were answered, for although they "snoked" him with their six-guns, and gored their horses in a determined pursuit of him, Kildare and his men lost his trail within an hour.

The Rustlers.

JUST before sun-up Curt Fremont returned to the Moran ranch to discover, near the barn, a limping figure in the dress of a senorita. It was the figure of Juan, and, overtaking the Mexican youth, Curt asked him what was wrong.

"One of Keeldare's men, he searches for me while the rest break into the ranch-house," Juan explained. "I am hiding in the hay, and thees man picks up a pitchfork to see if I am there. Oh, but it hurt, amigo. I do not know how I was able to keep silent." And he rubbed his hip mournfully.

"That was no way to treat a lady, was it?" Curt observed with a grin, and then, walking round to the front door, the two of them quietly entered the Moran ranch-house.

Mary Lou and her father had retired again, and, taking every precaution to avoid waking them, Curt and Juan made their way to the room which they were secretly sharing.

Behind a locked door, Curt and Juan slept soundly till Mary Lou aroused them by knocking. Bidding Juan to remain quiet, Curt hurriedly disposed of the clothes he wore as El Capitan and confronted Mary Lou on the landing in the less spectacular attire of an ordinary cow-hand.

"I was wondering if I could get in to clean your room," she said coldly.

"Don't bother, Mary Lou," Curt told her, stooping to lock the door behind him as he spoke. "I'll tidy it myself."

"Oh, then, you are capable of doing something," she observed, "besides sleeping and eating."

Curt looked at her with a hurt expression.

"Sleepin' and eatin'?" he echoed. "Well, what's wrong with that? A feller's gotta look after his health, ain't he?"

"And your health is the most important thing in the world," Mary Lou said with a curl of her lip.

"O' course it is," Curt answered emphatically, following her down the stairs.

He walked through to the kitchen in quest of food, and returning with a heaped plate, saw that Mary Lou was near one of the living-room windows. She was gazing at those hills towards which she had seen El Capitan riding the night before, and with a sweetly-reminiscent expression on her face she was touching her mouth with the tips of her fingers.

Curt grinned behind his hand, then affected a look of innocence.

"What's the matter?" he inquired. "Anything wrong with your lips?"

Mary Lou started guiltily, but quickly recovered herself and answered him in a sharp tone.

"Not as far as I know," she said. "I'm perfectly satisfied with them, anyhow."

Curt moved towards the staircase, but paused at the foot of it.

"By the way," he mentioned, "I kinda figure that guy El Capitan had better watch his step from now on."

Interest quickened in Mary's eyes, but she tried not to betray it.

"Really?" she murmured.

"I ain't had a close look at him yet," Curt continued, "but I managed to trail him away last night after I was woke up by that shindy down here."

"Which way did he ride?" Mary Lou asked eagerly, on the spur of the moment.

Curt smirked.

"That would be tellin'," he drawled, "but I reckon I know where I might find him. Say, did you happen to get a close-up of him last night?"

Mary Lou thought it was her turn to smile.

"That," she observed, "would also be telling."

"Oh," Curt murmured, and then, after a moment's silence: "This El Capitan appears to be a kind of a Romeo," he went on. "He's been seen ridin' with a Mexican dame."

"A girl?" said Mary Lou, biting her lip.

"That's what I said," Curt told her. "She's mighty good-lookin', I'm told. Gee, I wish I had that guy's way with women!"

He began to climb the stairs, and, looking over his shoulder, saw that Mary Lou had picked up a duster and was flaking the furniture in the living-room viciously. Again he grinned, but the grin faded as he heard a sudden drumming of hoofs and saw Lafe Kildare and his men file past the window.

There was a knock on the door, and old Dad Moran came through from a back room and answered it. He found himself confronted by the scoundrelly bank president.

Curt slammed his fist to the ruffian's jaw, and at the same time drove his heel into the face of another man hovering behind him.

"I've called to remind you about that twenty thousand dollars, Moran," said Kildare, "the guarantee you're liable for as a director of the Comanche Savings Bank."

"Kildare," the old man retorted huskily, "I've already told you I can't obtain that much money."

Kildare shrugged.

"I'm sorry, Moran," he stated, "but in that case I'll have to take your cattle. And I'd advise you to make no trouble, for the law is on my side."

"Go ahead," Moran told him heavily. "You've got me hog-tied, I reckon." He glanced at the other man from under his grizzled brows. "Where are you takin' 'em, anyway?"

"South by Amarillo Creek," was the answer. "What's it to you, Moran?"

"To Slim Brennon's outfit on the Border?" the old man demanded, without answering Kildare's question.

"Slim Brennon's outfit belongs to the bank now," Kildare pointed out, and then turned to the doorway to rejoin his men.

"Oh, Kildare," Moran called after him with grim sarcasm, "you might leave me my corral, will you?"

Kildare climbed into the saddle of his horse and cantered away, his men trooping after him to round up the Moran herds and drive them south. As the sound of hoof-beats died into the stillness of the mesquite plains, Mary Lou walked towards the staircase on which her father's unwelcome guest was standing.

"Curt Fremont," she said icily, "I don't know how you can look on and see us robbed without—doing anything."

"What can I do?" Curt protested. "Besides, I told you I came here to settle down an' live peaceable. I ain't the kind of fellow to go around lookin' for trouble."

"No!" she snapped. "But if you asked me, I'd say you'd turned yellow!"

Old Dad Moran had walked out of the ranch-house moodily. Presently he saw his hands coming off the range in a body. They numbered a mere half-dozen, and, drawing rein before their employer, they informed him that Kildare and his party, from fifteen to twenty strong, had taken over the herds.

"I know," said Moran. "They're drivin' them south by way of Amarillo Creek to what used to be Slim Brennon's ranch. Listen, boys, I've made up my mind on what I'm gonna do."

He paused for a moment, and then continued speaking in a determined tone.

"Any of you that ain't partial to my hunch can drop out here and now," he stated. "You see, I intend to turn rustler an' recover my own cattle."

Two of the hands demurred, refusing to take the risk of finishing up with their necks in a noose. But the other four were loyal.

"We're with yuh, boss," said one of them, appointing himself spokesman. "It may be rustlin', but I guess this is one time it's justifiable."

The Raid on the Bank.

BACK in his room above the porch, Curt Fremont laid the plate of food before Juan and then proceeded to gather up the attire of El Capitan.

August 29th, 1931.

"Where are you going, amigo?" Juan demanded, between mouthfuls of the delicacies that Curt had laid in front of him. "You no' hungry, eh?"

"I've got no time for breakfast," Curt answered. "I'm goin' into town, Juan. You'd better stay here, but remember what I told you. Keep out of sight and don't make a sound. Until we're on safe ground, we don't want to make trouble for the Morans."

As he spoke he strapped on his leather chaps and jammed a gun into his holster. Then, cramming the outfit of El Capitan into a pair of sheepskin saddlebags, he left the house unobserved and made for Comanche as fast as his bronc could carry him.

It was about noon when he gained the town, and he at once headed for the stockyards, where he located a group of those former friends of his who had been tricked out of their ranches.

"Do you boys still want to get even with Kildare?" he demanded.

A chorus of eager voices answered him in the affirmative, and without a word Curt led the way into a barn hard by. Ten minutes later he reappeared in the doorway on horseback, clad in the calzoneros and black hat of El Capitan, and followed by the stockmen.

"All set?" Curt inquired of the troop behind him.

"Broke to leadin', pardner!" "On your way!" "We're back of you, Fremont!"

"Let's go!" Curt jerked, and next moment he was riding forward at the gallop.

Through a side-cut he dashed, and his bronc turned into Main Street at full stride, the dust rising in clouds behind its flying hoofs. Thirty paces in his rear, the stockmen affected to open fire on him, Curt twisting in the saddle to return the compliment.

Citizens in the street sprinted for cover, never suspecting for an instant that the guns of El Capitan and his fake pursuers were loaded with harmless "blanks." For thirty seconds pandemonium raged in Comanche's principal thoroughfare, and then Curt reached the northern limit of the township, dived from the saddle and took shelter in a tool-shed.

The stockmen drew rein and dismounted, to rush for various vantage-points and direct sham volleys against the hut where El Capitan had apparently been cornered.

Sheriff Jim Bellamy appeared on the scene, buckling on his gun-belt as he came. A party of citizens trailed after him, their courage restored now that El Capitan seemed at bay.

"Keep down, sheriff," yelled one of the stockmen dramatically. "He's dangerous!"

Bellamy crouched behind the fencing of a corral and opened up with his artillery. Soon a regular shower of real lead was blistering the hut, the amused stockmen grinning surreptitiously the while.

Five minutes of one-sided gunplay convinced the sheriff that the desperado in the shed must either be dead or sorely stricken. Yet it was with the utmost precaution that he proceeded to crawl on all-fours through the dust, a six-shooter grasped tightly in his right fist.

A citizen attempted to follow him, but one of the stockmen restrained the fellow.

"Don't risk your life, pardner," he said, trying hard to keep from laughing. "Let that hero take all the glory." And he motioned to the sheriff.

Bellamy continued to crawl towards the hut, and when he was three paces from it he rose to his feet and strode forward boldly. With the toe of his boot he kicked open the door, and lifted his forty-five in readiness.

A kitten that had been trapped in the shed scuttled out past his feet. The sheriff blinked at it, and then glared into the interior of the hut. He was still glaring when a man in shirt-sleeves came running from the other end of Main Street.

"The bank!" he squealed. "El Capitan just robbed the bank, sheriff!"

An oath escaped the representative of the law. This was one escapade for which El Capitan did not deserve a medal, he thought, as he dashed off to enlist the services of a couple of his deputies and give chase.

Left in the vicinity of the tool-shed, the stockmen laughed uproariously.

"I hope Curt got what he was lookin' for," one of them said, when the merriment had died down somewhat. "Sufferin' snakes, the way he had us stage that gun fight and draw half the town to that thar shed while he doubled back to the bank was one of the neatest things I ever see! He's a smart hombre, an' no mistake!"

"Slicker'n axle-grease!" declared a whiskered veteran of the party.

Meanwhile, Curt was riding like the wind over the trail that led to the Moran outfit and the south, those sheepskin saddlebags of his now appearing somewhat more bulky than they had been on his arrival in Comanche.

Bellamy and his deputies were half-a-mile behind him, and Curt kept them at that distance till he burst clear of the chaparral that screened the Moran ranch-house from the north.

He dropped from his horse and slapped the animal's flank to keep it on the move. Then, the saddlebags slung over his arm, he climbed to his bed-room window by way of the porch. The shutters were not fastened this time, and he scrambled over the sill.

A few minutes later the sheriff and his deputies reined up outside the front door, against which Bellamy struck his fist. Mary Lou answered the summons, and the sheriff swung himself to the ground and walked across the threshold.

"Where's your father, Miss Mary?" he demanded.

"He—he isn't at home," Mary Lou faltered. "He's—out on the range with some of the boys."

"I see," Bellamy murmured. "Well, where's the man who just rode in here?"

Mary stared at him in astonishment. "Why, what are you talking about, sheriff?" she exclaimed.

"It ain't any use stalling, Miss Mary," Bellamy told her. "I know our man is here, and I'll have to take the liberty of searching the house. He just raided the bank in Comanche, and we tracked him right to your front door."

"A bank robber!" Mary breathed. "But—but why should he be here? He couldn't possibly have come in without me seeing him. I've been in the living-room practically all morning. There's only one other person in the house—Curt Fremont—"

The sheriff eyed her shrewdly, feeling convinced that she was sincere in her protests, and was not merely trying to hide a fugitive from the law.

"I'd like to have a talk with Curt Fremont," he stated.

Mary laughed.

"Oh, sheriff, you surely don't think that he's the man you want!" she scoffed. "Why, he wouldn't have the nerve to raid a bank."

"Well, I'll give you a clue," said Bellamy. "The man that stuck up the bank is the only blond Mexican that was ever seen in these parts. Now take me to Curt."

"He'll be up in his room," Mary Lou opined, turning to lead the way to the stairs; "asleep, probably."

She guided Bellamy to the door of Curt's apartment. The sheriff drew his gun.

"Oh, don't be silly!" Mary laughed. But Bellamy pushed past her and rapped on the door with his knuckles.

The door was opened. A figure stood in the doorway, a figure in kerchief, black hat, silk shirt, and fancy calzoneros—the blond "Mexican" of the bank raid.

"Curt!" gasped Mary Lou. "You, El Capitan?"

"But my Spanish is still terrible," Curt told her, with a grin.

The sheriff covered him with his six-shooter.

"Come on, son," he began, but Curt interrupted him. He was still carrying the sheepskin saddlebags on his arm, and from the deep pockets of them he drew forth two or three heavy ledgers.

"Jim," he said, "these are the only things I took from the bank. You see, ever since the night my brother was killed Lufe Kildare has been keepin' two sets of books. If you look at these the same as I did just now, you'll see that the first set proves Kildare had appropriated a big sum from the bank a few weeks before the shooting. And maybe you'd like to see this, too," he added, producing a letter addressed to him in his brother's handwriting.

The sheriff glanced at the missive. It bore the date on which Jim Fremont had been slain, and must have been penned a little while before the murder had been committed.

"Dear Curt,—I'm going over the books at the bank to-night, as I have reason to believe Kildare has been getting away with the funds.

"If my suspicions are correct, I may need your help in this matter. Be ready to come at once.—Your brother, "Jim."

The sheriff reached for the ledgers under Curt's arm.

"If what you say is correct," he muttered, "Kildare will finish up with a noose around his neck." He smiled a grim smile, and: "Reckon the sheriff is entitled to examine stolen property, eh?" he went on.

Bellamy went downstairs and laid the books on a table, Curt and Mary Lou following him. While the representative of the law was scrutinizing the entries in the ledgers, Curt suddenly observed that Mary was making signals that obviously conveyed a desire to speak with him in private.

"Curt," she said, in an anxious whisper, "dad left for the border with four of the boys. He plans to rustle back the cattle that Kildare impounded. Kildare has twenty men riding with him, and—and I'm afraid. You see, dad's theoretically going against the law."

Curt's mouth tightened into a firm, determined line.

"Juan's upstairs, Mary Lou," he told her, "so don't be scared if you suddenly run across him. I'm headin' for Amarillo Creek—pronto."

He slipped out of the house while Bellamy was still bending over the books, and, locating his brone at the back of the outfit, he climbed into the saddle and rode south. His course lay through the brush-tracks that skirted the open prairie, and thirty minutes after leaving the Moran rancho his horse was picking its way through the shallows of the Amarillo Creek bottom.

Burton.

A HARD ride had brought Dad Moran and his four loyal punchers to the rim of a fertile valley south of the creek, and there, on the range that Kildare had seized on behalf of the bank, but in reality for his own profit, Moran and his hands saw the impounded cattle.

Kildare and his men were not in sight, having herded the steers in the valley some time before. Everything seemed in favour of Moran's project.

"Go to it, boys!" he said to his men, "Round 'em up, and take 'em through the pass."

The punchers galloped down into the valley, and Moran brought up the rear at a more leisurely pace. He dismounted when he was fairly in the middle of the valley, and looked to his guns, for he suspected that Kildare had not left the cattle entirely unattended.

Moran was not far wrong. From a vantage-point that commanded a view of the valley a sentinel left by Kildare saw the old rancher's cow-hands riding towards the herd, and immediately turned his horse and galloped northward in the direction of Comanche.

Half a mile from the valley the crook came up with Kildare and the rest of the gang.

"Moran an' four o' his men are drivin' off them steers," he panted.

Kildare's eyes narrowed. There was a glint of satisfaction in them.

"Good," he said, "then I've got Moran where I want him—and I want him out of the way. Back, boys, and when we hit the valley shoot to kill."

Meanwhile, by the route that led direct from the Moran ranch, Curt Fremont was spurring southward at the top of his bronco's speed, and he had gained the slope of the valley in which a fatal gun-duel seemed imminent when he caught sight of Kildare's bunch riding from the north west.

Curt's horse carried him down the slope at the foot of which Mary Lou's father was standing.

"Beat it, Dad," Curt jerked. "Kil-

"Kildare," he said, "the next time you feel a rope around you it won't be mine—and it won't be under your armpits!"

dare and his whole gang are headed this way."

Dad Moran was in too desperate a frame of mind to wonder at Curt's Mexican attire.

"You get to blazes outa here," he thundered, "you yellow-livered molly-coddle. If Kildare rides this way I'm introduc' him to lead."

"You haven't got a chance, Dad," Curt insisted. "Kildare has twenty men against your four—"

"This is no place for you, Curt Fremont," the old man cut in on him harshly. "I tell you there's gonna be shootin'."

Curt stiffened in the saddle.

"Yeah?" he said quickly. "Well, you won't be in it." And with the words he bore down on Moran's horse, grazing near by, and put the animal to flight with a blow from the flat of his hand.

An angry shout escaped Dad Moran, but already Curt was wheeling to set his bronco at the slope again. He reached the summit and galloped along the crest till he saw Kildare and his ruffians enter the valley from the northwest.

Curt guided his horse towards them, and, halfway down the declivity, pulled his gun from its holster and fired into the air. Kildare and his men drew rein as they heard the shot, and turned their heads, to discern the figure of the dare-devil who had so far eluded their clutches.

Curt's aim was to draw Kildare's gang from Dad Moran's party and save the old man from certain death, and his ruse was eminently successful.

"There's the man I'm after!" yelled Kildare, and, Moran forgotten, the crooks changed their course.

Curt's identity had not been recognised. At the distance, Kildare and his men had only been able to mark him out as a Mexican, undoubtedly El Capitan, and in a body they urged their ponies up the ascent.

Curt showed them his heels. The crooks smoked him with their guns, but it was long-range shooting and the fugitive remained unscathed. He led them across the Amarillo Creek and through a belt of chaparral to a tract of country made barren by tumbled boulders and towering pinnacles of rock.

His bronc was beginning to show signs of fatigue by then, and the pursuers gained appreciably. A bullet ripped through Curt's sleeve, and, glancing over his shoulder, he saw Kildare and his men strung out about a couple of hundred yards behind him.

The fact that they were strung out, and that one of their number was lagging well to the rear, suggested an idea to Curt. He made for a stretch of ground where the boulders provided him with shelter, so that for the moment he was out of sight of Kildare and his men. Then he pulled aside and halted his bronc behind a buttress of black cliff.

Concealed there, he watched the gangsters dash by one after another, and he allowed all to pass except the hindmost, who was a full seventy-five paces behind the main body. Curt spurred out to hold up this man at the point of the gun, and as the fellow raised his hands the young cowboy ordered him to ride back with him to the angle of cliff.

The prisoner was Tom Burton, Kildare's henchman, and, pale to the lips, Burton sat motionless in the saddle while Curt relieved him of his shooting-iron.

"I'm gonna kill you, Burton," Curt said grimly.

Burton's lip quivered.

"You can't shoot me!" he gasped. "I ain't done nothing."

"You've done plenty," Curt rapped out. "Turn around so I can give it to you in the back—the same way as you killed my brother."

"I didn't kill your brother," the rogue babbled. "I didn't do it! I ain't the man you want. I wasn't the one that got your brother that night!"

"No?" Curt drawled. "Well, I ain't believin' you."

"It was Kildare!" Burton moaned. "Kildare, I tell you! I vouched for his alibi at the inquest, but I was lyin'. I'm tellin' you the truth now! You've gotta believe it! I was alone in Kildare's room the night of the killin'. Kildare came in just after it happened. He told me to say he'd been at home the whole evenin'. Then later he let up on the whole affair. He shot your brother because he'd grabbed a lotta the bank's money. He said he had to do it—"

Curt's eyes bored into him. From the rôle Burton had played at the inquest—a rôle of which Curt had not been ignorant—he had guessed that the man might be bluffed into telling the real story when the opportunity occurred.

"Thanks, Burton," he said now, "that's all I wanted to hear, and you're gonna repeat it to the sheriff. Come on—get goin'."

He jabbed his six-gun into Burton's ribs and rode with him towards the Moran ranch—not taking the direct route, however, but making a detour to avoid an encounter with Kildare and the rest of the gang.

Kildare's Last Bid.

COMPLETELY baffled by Curt's disappearance among the rocks, Kildare presently called a halt.

"We'd better break up," he announced. "You boys scatter an' search for him. I'll keep a-headin' for the Moran ranch. If I wait long enough I may pick up his trail there, for it's my opinion him an' Moran are hand-in-glove."

He left his men and pushed on alone. A quarter of a mile farther on his horse scrambled up a gravelly slope and carried him to the brow of a low ridge.

The Moran ranch-buildings sprawled below him, and he saw the sheriff and his two deputies standing near the barn. He steered his pony towards them and saluted Bellamy.

"Howdy, sheriff," he said. "I'm lookin' for that bandit El Capitan. Don't suppose you've seen anything of him around here?"

"I was after him myself a while back," the sheriff murmured, a curious expression on his bronzed face. "But I lost sight of him 'bout an hour since."

Kildare's eyes glittered angrily. "Well," he snapped, "he was down by Amarillo Creek half an hour ago, helpin' Moran to rustle the cattle I had to impound. We chased him back in this direction."

"Is that so?" the sheriff drawled interestedly. "By the way, Kildare, did you hear what happened at the bank?"

"At the bank?" Kildare echoed, in a startled tone. "No! What happened there?"

"While you and your men were impoundin' Moran's cattle the bank was raided," Bellamy informed him.

"Raided?"

"Yep," the sheriff declared. "And by El Capitan."

Kildare glared down at him.

"And you sat around in your office and let him do it," he ground out. "Great snakes, can't the law afford any protection to honest citizens?"

"That's just what the law aims to do, Kildare," Bellamy answered. "Afford protection to honest citizens against robbery an' violence—an' punish them as are guilty of crime."

Kildare shot a sidelong glance at him. "Well, did he get away with much?" he growled.

"Not so far as I can understand," the sheriff replied. "But he took these books. I got 'em back from him."

Kildare had not noticed the heavy ledgers Bellamy was carrying under his arm, but his eyes flashed to them now, and an expression of guilt and panic appeared on his face.

"How long have you had those?" he blurted.

"Aw, 'bout an hour," the sheriff told him. "Maybe more. But say, here comes Curt Fremont."

He motioned to the ridge which Kildare had crossed a moment before, and, turning his head, the scoundrelly bank president saw Curt descending the slope—Curt in the attire of El Capitan.

There was someone else with Curt, someone whom the puncher was covering with a six-gun, and Kildare's pulse quickened alarmingly as he recognised Tom Burton.

For an instant Kildare was paralysed with fear. Then he realised to the full the magnitude of his plight—realised that nothing could save him from the gallows unless he acted immediately.

He whipped round. Bellamy and his deputies were closing in on him. Kildare clapped spurs to his bronco's flanks and charged them.

His horse scattered them, and Kildare dashed on in full flight. Bellamy and his deputies reached for their guns, but before they could draw them Kildare was swinging past a corner of the barn.

Three shots clipped splinters from the building as he turned the angle of it and disappeared.

From the direction of the ridge came a shout in Curt Fremont's voice. Snatching at Burton's bridle, he urged his own horse and his captive into a gallop, and in a smother of dust reached the spot where the representatives of the law were standing.

"Hang on to this hombre, Jim!" he called to Bellamy, throwing Burton's reins to the sheriff, and then he raced on in pursuit of Kildare.

He caught sight of him a hundred and fifty yards beyond the barn, and leaned forward in the saddle. Kildare plunged into a mass of thickets and was lost to view for a spell, but, driving through the brush, Curt picked up his trail again.

The crook's pony was struggling up a long slope, and Curt set his horse at the ascent. Nearing the summit, Kildare turned in the saddle and pulled a gun. He blazed at his pursuer, but his hand was unsteady and his aim uncertain.

Three shots zipped past Curt, missing him by yards. Then Kildare gained the hill-top and swung sharp to the left. Silhouetted against the skyline, he rode along the brink of the declivity. His

(Continued on page 26.)

By unscrupulous methods a truck-driver makes himself a power against whom the forces of law and order are helpless. But, like all criminals, he goes a step too far and— A grand and thrilling crook drama. Starring Spencer Tracy.

Quick Millions

The Truck Driver.

THE story of "Bugs" Raymond's rise and fall was an episode in the history of a big American city. It began on a certain day when Bugs fell foul of a chauffeur and a cop.

Daniel J. Raymond, commonly known as Bugs, was one of the city's obscure millions, driver of a three-ton lorry that drew up alongside a gleaming limousine in a traffic block.

Stationed at one of the city's busiest crossings, the imposing form of Police-officer Murphy held all south and north-bound vehicles at bay for a space of several minutes, and then blew a whistle to signal the "all clear."

Bugs Raymond slipped the gear-lever into position and eased off the hand-brake. Bugs was in a hurry, and attempted to cut in between the limousine on his off-side and a van immediately in front.

"Hey, there!" called the immaculate chauffeur of the expensive auto. "Where the blazes do you think you're going?"

His tone was harsh, and Bugs took exception to it, and among his associates Bugs was notorious for a temper that fired the blood in his veins but left his head cool-clear. He was equally notorious for a habit of riding down those who stood in his way.

With deliberate malice and aforethought he turned the steering-wheel of the truck he was driving and permitted the three-ton monster to wrangle with the polished wing of the magnificent limousine. In the metallic argument which ensued the car's wing came off worst, and ere the scrape and clangour had subsided and Bugs had brought his truck to a standstill again, that shining auto-wing was a buckled caricature of its former self.

Officer Murphy forged a pathway towards the scene of the commotion, and planted himself before the radiator of the lorry.

"It takes brains to drive a truck," he observed to Bugs with tolling sarcasm.

"An' it takes a lotta brains to blow a whistle," Bugs rejoined with unmistakable scorn.

Officer Murphy made several impolite observations, and the light of battle kindled in the eyes of Bugs Raymond.

"If you'll take off that tin badge on your tunic I'll sock you," he invited.

Murphy's face purpled, and on an angry impulse he roared his acceptance of the challenge. With a yelp reminiscent of a terrier going into a dog fight, Bugs scrambled from the driving-seat.

Eager for the fray, regardless of the consequences, he climbed to the bonnet and hurled himself on the representative of the law.

Some time later a police-court judge pronounced the solemn sentence: "Fifty dollars or sixty days." And, later still, bruised, penniless, and out of a job, Bugs Raymond made his way to the apartment he rented in a humble quarter of the city.

He was met by Daisy de Lisle, who provided the romantic element in his wayward life. But just now Daisy was not in the mood for romance. Her pretty face was set in an expression of impatient resentment, and her eyes flashed fire.

"I'm sick and tired of the way you carry on," she told him. "Sacked on the spot from your job, the few dollars you have saved gone in a fine—and all because you had to strike a cop."

"A guy can't sit around and be insulted by a flat-foot," Bugs protested.

"Who do you think you are that you can't take an insult?" Daisy cried bitterly. "Oh, I'm through with you, Bugs—through with you."

Bugs dabbed a discoloured eye. He hardly seemed to be listening to her.

"Where's the sense of a man like me drivin' a truck, anyway?" he mused, half-soliloquising. "I'm a guy that has ideas—smart ideas for makin' money quick—and now is the time to unlimber 'em on this town. Baby, you're right, it ain't policy to haul a cop a pain in the jaw, but it's policy to haul him a five-dollar bill. And maybe that's what I'm gonna be in a position to do one of these days."

"Oh, you and your ideas," scoffed Daisy. "I've heard them all before."

Bugs smiled.

"You're gonna see 'em in operation pretty soon," he said confidently. "But go ahead if you're through. You know the way out by now."

Daisy hesitated. She had no faith in the wild schemes that Bugs had mentioned to her in his more confidential moments, and to-day was not the first time she had threatened to give him up on account of his recklessness, his irresponsibility. Yet some undefinable spell had always kept her loyal to him, and once again her head yielded to the instinct of her heart.

"Bugs," she faltered, "did that cop hurt you much?"

He grinned a wry grin.

"Plenty," he told her. "But you ought to see him."

A Corner in Crime.

A FEW days after he had lost his job Bugs Raymond called at a super-garage in theatre-land and asked to see the proprietor.

"I notice you have a lotta space here that don't get taken up by automobiles like it should," Bugs observed. "That's because seventy-five per cent. of the motorists leave their cars in authorised street parks when they go to a show or a night club. Now I've got a hunch that would bring 'em in off them parking-places thick and fast."

"How?" the garage proprietor demanded.

"Leave it to me," Bugs said. "Just now we'll discuss how much I get out of it."

That night an unseen hand created August 29th, 1931.

have with the cars parked in the quiet side-streets. Windows and wind-screens were smashed, wings buckled and coach-work ripped to ribbons, whilst the very engines did not escape attention; and when the theatres and night clubs emptied, the garage at which Bugs had called became filled with casualties for the repair shop.

The outrage received publicity in the newspapers, and from that time onward motorists were chary of leaving their autos in street parks. So the super-garage in theatreland prospered mightily, and Bugs drew his pre-arranged portion of the profits.

But Bugs did not rest on his obscure laurels. The filip to the garage business was a mere beginning, child's play in comparison to the network of plans he was laying for the foundation of supreme power.

About him he collected a coterie of daring and notorious men, seum of the underworld who recognised his genius for organisation, and banded themselves under his leadership—men such as Nails Markey, who had been through the whole category of crime; Jimmy Kirk, the sleek, shining gunman with the cold grey eyes; Arkansas Smith, whose talents had been envied in Chicago.

The truck business provided Bugs Raymond with his next venture in the city's commercial life. He offered the Premier Carriage Company what he was pleased to call "protection," and an unchallenged field for its activities—at his own price. The offer was accepted, and Bugs and his hirelings set to work.

The Premier Company's rivals went to the wall, or else went sky-high. Their equipment was taken over, or demolished overnight in the event of any refusal to sell out. A certain small contractor with an oil-tanker, insisting on maintaining his independence, was blown to smithereens when the fuel he was carrying mysteriously exploded.

In the space of a few weeks, the authorities saw gang-rule rearing its ugly head to dominate the city's industries, and were powerless to hold it in check. The forces of disorder were hard to locate, and harder to break, and Bugs Raymond was clever. Where he could not blindfold, he bribed.

Bugs waxed rich on the spoils. He spoke in terms of "ten grand," "twenty grand," and even "hundred grand," which meant tens, twenties, and hundreds of thousands. He himself, the former truck driver, could see no limit to the wealth that he might coin, the power that he might yet wield.

Moreover, he took his place in Society. Corruption, bribery, these factors compelled men who were prominent in the city's affairs to hail him as an equal. Once he attended a mayoral dinner, at which judges, politicians and commercial magnates were present. He learned enough to incriminate a good many of them; and halfway through the function the smiling Jimmy Kirk and several others of his ilk held up the assembly at the point of the gun, taking private papers as well as everything of value.

The affair was hushed up, for by that coup the reputations of public men were laid at the mercy of Bugs Raymond.

The following night, the hotel where he and his underlings congregated, Bugs supervised the examination of the articles which had been appropriated.

"Say, Bugs," declared Nails Markey, producing a letter from the pile of loot, "here's a little love-note to one of our most prominent judges, written by a girl in the chorus of the 'Follies.' That oughta be good for a few thousand dollars."

"Nix, Nails—nix!" answered Bugs, August 29th, 1931.

glancing at the missive. "We ain't blackmailers," he added with a twisted grin. "We make our money by protection. Send that letter back—or, better still, tear it up. His wife might see it."

Nails obeyed reluctantly. He was a flat-faced thug with a certain low cunning, but he had never been able to fathom Bugs Raymond's outlook on the racketeering game.

Daisy de Lisle entered at that moment. She was expensively dressed, and looked singularly attractive, but Bugs glanced at her with impatience as she perched herself on his desk. In his rocket-like rise to doubtful fame he had acquired something that was yet to prove his downfall—a desire to ape Society and be of Society, instead of a parasite batten- ing on its flaws. That ambition had become the keynote of his career, and to him the racket was a stepping-stone to a higher plane.

"Daisy, why don't you try an' get some class?" he protested. "You know—polish. Now, a lady don't sit around on the edge of a desk."

"I never noticed any class about you," Daisy retorted spiritedly.

"Well, I'm makin' a show at acquiring it," Bugs observed, and it was no later than the following day that he received an added incentive for the acquiring of what he called "class."

The city wore a slightly altered look that morning, for, in place of shrill-voiced newsboys, smartly-dressed business men were to be seen on the street corners selling papers. A stranger tendered a dollar bill to one of these men, and, receiving no change, commented upon the fact.

"Oh, it's a custom of the city," he was told. "Once a year prominent citizens volunteer to hawk papers and collect money for the newsboys' annual outing. Your change will go to the fund, sir."

Bugs Raymond had once been a news-boy, and had not forgotten it. Consequently, he was one of those who offered his services, and it was while he was occupying a stand in a busy shopping centre that he saw a radiantly beautiful girl emerge from a modiste's and cross the sidewalk to a waiting car.

She was simply but exquisitely dressed, and she carried herself with that unconsciously regal air of a girl reared in an atmosphere of luxury and good breeding. Bugs, with his class complex, recognised her as a true example of High Society, and, struck with her loveliness, he hurried after her.

"For the newsboys' fund, miss," he invited, overtaking her and offering her a paper before she could reach her car.

She smiled sweetly, and dipped into her handbag.

"Thank you," he said, as she gave him a ten-dollar bill, and then he opened the car-door for her.

Before the auto had vanished into the stream of traffic he had made a note of its registration number, and later that day, when he returned to his rooms to find Jimmy and Nails awaiting him, he ordered the former to ring up the City Hall.

From the City Hall licensing department he obtained the information he desired. The car concerned had been registered in the name of Kenneth Stone, he learned.

"Nails," he said, indicating a fat volume on his desk, "look up that 'Who's Who,' and find out all you can about Kenneth Stone."

Nails picked up the book and located the name.

"Here's the Stone family's pedigree," he recited off. "John Stone, died 1916. Founder Stone Construction Company, built new City Hall, State Library, Madison Trust Offices on Forty-Third Street, etc., etc. Succeeded by his son, Kenneth Stone, who now controls Stone Construction Company."

"But there's a girl," Bugs put in. "Yeah, she's mentioned, too. 'Dorothy Stone, born 1907, educated Cornell University and Sorbonne, Paris. Member of Lakeside Country Club—'"

Bugs stood up. He did not seem to be listening.

"Boys," he said, "we've been playin' around on the small-time racket long enough!"

"Whaddya mean—small-time?" Nails demanded. "I'd like to know just how much we've raked in. What's happened in the last year or two, Bugs? We don't only protect the Truck business in this town—we own it now! An' there ain't a garage in the city that don't—"

"Wait a minute, Nails!" Bugs interrupted. "Didn't it ever occur to you that there are other fields of opportunity aside from the Truck business? Listen, I'm goin' to have this town at my feet before I'm through. We've got the Truck business—good enough! We're in a position to lay a strangle-hold on every industry in the city, and the construction companies are next in line."

That night Bugs Raymond assembled his gang in a down-town club of shady repute.

The Waging of the War.

THE first act of a reign of terror was the wrecking of a skyscraper building that was under construction on one of the city's busiest thoroughfares.

A closed-in car pulled up outside the hoardings behind which work on the building was in progress. Jimmy Kirk stepped out of it, entered a gateway in the tall fence and looked about him swiftly. High into the blue sky rose the skeleton of the skyscraper, a network of steel that was a memorial to the skill of an army of labourers and the ability of a staff of engineers, a structure representing thousands of dollars in capital. Near by, a motorman was in control of a crane that was lifting a massive girder to the very peak of the building's immense frame.

Jimmy watched the girder jerk higher and higher as the strong links which grasped it rattled over the pulley at the summit of the giant crane. Then the crane swung round on its base, poising the girder above the framework in which it was to be riveted.

The motorman in his cab suddenly became aware that something was pressing against the small of his back. It was the muzzle of Jimmy Kirk's gun, and as the motorman looked round, Jimmy indicated the control-lever.

"Pull her over!" he commanded. "Come on, let her go! And I don't mean maybe."

White to the lips, the motorman obeyed. The chain paid out like lightning. Down came the girder with a running crash, battering its way through those steel spars that had already been bolted into place. A thunderous clangour filled the air as it tore through the framework, rending other girders from their rivets and carrying with it an avalanche of twisted metal.

Jimmy Kirk dashed back to the waiting car, his mission accomplished.

Outrage followed outrage. A newly completed block of offices in another part of the city was blasted by a charge of explosive that demolished an entire wing of it. Work on a big dam up in the hills was stopped by a band of armed men, who left after a hundred thousand dollars' worth of damage had been committed. The newspapers published leading articles on the scandal, and called for action, but the police department seemed powerless.

The sinister campaign terminated in a truck-drivers' strike. It was arranged according to instructions from Bugs Raymond, and it affected every commercial enterprise in town. It was a gesture that implied the far-reaching influence he was in a position to wield over the city's trade and prosperity.

The strike came as a vital blow to Kenneth Stone, and put an end to operations that were in progress for the construction of a gigantic flat-iron building, which had to be completed, according to contract, by a certain date.

Kenneth Stone had already received representations from Bugs, and had ignored them, raging meanwhile at the power and audacity of this man who was clever enough to make war on society, yet leave the authorities without sufficient evidence for his arrest.

But the strike forced Stone's hand, and he was compelled to phone Bugs Raymond's apartment and seek an interview.

He need not have troubled. Bugs was already on his way to pay him the doubtful compliment of a call, and, on his arrival with Jimmy Kirk, was shown straightway into Stone's sanctum. "What do you want?" Stone demanded in a voice that was shaken by ill-concealed wrath.

Jimmy Kirk stood by, and smiled. Bugs was cool politeness personified. He laid some papers on Stone's desk.

"These will explain my terms," he drawled. "All they need is your signature. I happen to know that the Stone Construction Company is working on a sixteen million dollar contract, and I've got more than a sneaking fancy that every cent you own will be involved if you don't complete it by schedule."

"You seem to know a good deal," Stone said with an effort.

"The information cost me a lotta money," Bugs answered cheerfully. "I had to pay for it. But let's get down to business, Stone. If you'll take a look at those papers you'll see that I've drawn up in detail the amounts payable by you to sub-contractors. You'll see also how those amounts can be cut considerably if you count me in on the deal and accept the proposals I've set down in black-and-white."

Stone glanced through the documents that had been laid on his desk, and his face darkened.

"This is plain crooked," he ground out.

"But it will save the Stone Company from bankruptcy," Bugs observed. "Remember, I've only to say the word and you can resume operations at a moment's notice."

Stone moved over to a cabinet, and, producing a decanter and a glass, poured himself out a stiff drink.

"You've got me tied, Raymond," he said between his teeth. "How can I give you any answer but the one you want?"

Five minutes later Bugs and Jimmy emerged from Stone's office, and it was as Bugs was closing the door behind him that he came face to face with the girl to whom he had sold that newspaper a week or two previously.

"Good-afternoon," he said to her. She returned the greeting with a puzzled little frown, and Bugs smiled.

"You don't remember me, Miss Stone," he remarked; "but you paid me ten dollars for a copy of the 'Herald' not so very long ago."

"Oh, yes, I do remember you now," she murmured.

"Your brother and I have just been talking over a deal," Bugs mentioned. "We'll be running in harness from now on, so I'll probably be seeing you again."

He was right, and in the week or two that followed he saw more of Dorothy Stone than a mere business connection with her brother necessitated.

Forced to tolerate him at the office, Stone resented the intrusion in his home life, resented the attentions that were being paid to Dorothy. Nor did Dorothy herself seem to care for them; but her brother put the situation to her, and explained that they must at least pretend to accept Bugs Raymond socially.

Bugs began to see less of his associates of the underworld, and still more of Dorothy Stone. The girl dominated his thoughts, and that subtle charm which had impressed him on the occasion of their first meeting gained a hold on him that blinded him to everything else.

"You know," he said to Dorothy one evening in the sitting-room of the Stones' palatial home, "there are times when I think you haven't much use for me. And then again, there are times when I think you kind of like me. What's your honest opinion of me?"

Dorothy looked at him frankly. He had asked for the truth, and she was prepared to give it to him. Yet for her brother's sake she had to be guarded, and make her criticism with a smile.

"If you must know," she told him, "I think you're a parasite. Wealth and power are your be all and end all, and you haven't any scruples about how you come by them."

"Aw, you've got me wrong," he said good-naturedly. "I'm just a man who makes opportunities for other fellows who haven't the nerve to make 'em themselves, and I feather my nest in the process."

Nevertheless it was in a thoughtful mood that he returned to his own sumptuous apartments, to find that some of the boys had drifted in, and there and then he made the first move in the severing of his association with them.

"Listen, you fellers," he said. "We've reached the peak, and there's no sense in carryin' on, for we'll only take a dive. This is where we turn honest and live clean, and keep away from the cops."

"Keep away from the cops?" someone growled. "Say, they've never Eager for the fray, regardless of the consequences, he climbed to the bonnet and hurled himself at the representative of the law.

looked like makin' a pinch so far as we're concerned."

"But some day there might be a slip-up," Bugs answered, "and I don't aim to have that happen. I'm thinking of inviting Kenneth Stone to look on me as a partner. I'm thinking of going into straight business."

"And what do we get out of it?" Nails Markey demanded.

"The Truck business," Bugs rejoined, and strolled through to another room.

Daisy de Lisle was there, trying on a new fur coat that she had bought with the generous allowance that Bugs made her. She stood before a full-length mirror and studied her reflection appraisingly.

Bugs eyed her for a moment. She wore clothes as expensive as Dorothy Stone's, and her features were as pleasing. Yet the two girls seemed worlds apart. It was personality that Daisy lacked—and "class." She would never possess either, she would never hold for him the appeal of that daughter of Society to whom he was being drawn irresistibly.

"Daisy," Bugs mused, "you're pretty smart. But you need finish. You know what I've been thinkin'? I've been thinking you ought to travel—go away for a year or so. To Europe. See Paris, London, Berlin, Rome. I'm told there's nothing like travel for giving you poise."

Daisy remained motionless, but there was a curious expression in her eyes.

"I'd stake you up to twenty-five thousand dollars," Bugs continued. "You could have a swell time—live at the best hotels—see life. What do you say, huh?"

She turned and looked at him. "Who's the other dame, Bugs?" she asked quietly.

Straight Business.

KENNETH STONE had had no choice in regard to the partnership Bugs Raymond had proposed, and had reluctantly placed at his disposal a room adjoining his own office.

To that room came Nails Markey and the boys. They had been in none too happy a frame of mind ever since Bugs had announced his intention of quitting the racket, and they seemed loath to let him relinquish the leadership of the gang.

It had all the appearance of a raw deal to them. Bugs had used them and made quick millions, and now he was for dropping out, leaving them the monopoly of the Truck business as a consolation prize.

Nails Markey appointed himself spokesman, and announced the gang's dissatisfaction, whereupon Bugs stood up and addressed the group collectively and curtly.

"What are you whining at?" he demanded. "You've got control of the Truck combine, and the dough you draw from that will keep you all on Easy Street. Now listen, boys, I'm busy, and I can't talk to you about this thing at the moment."

The gang rose sourly and filed towards the door.

"Oh, Nails," Bugs called, as they were on the point of leaving, "don't bring the boys up here any more. I'll drop in on you now and then."

The gangsters exchanged meaning glances with one another as they retired, but Bugs had already turned his back on them. He was not left alone for long, however, for shortly after the departure of Nails and the boys Daisy de Lisle was shown in.

"Bugs," she said, as soon as the door had closed behind her, "I'm here for a show-down. I'm not going to Europe, and I'm not going to let you give me the run-around for any other dame."

Bugs made an impatient pass with his hand.

"I tell you there's no other dame," he snapped, and even as he spoke the words the door opened and Dorothy Stone appeared on the threshold.

"Oh, I'm sorry," she apologised, as she saw that Bugs had company, "I thought you were alone. I just looked in to see if you were ready for the races."

"The races?" Bugs echoed. "Oh, yeah, we'd made up a party, hadn't we? I'll be right with you in a moment, Miss Stone."

Dorothy went out again, and Daisy glared at Bugs.

"Was that the girl you're sweet on?" she demanded.

"Supposing it was," Bugs drawled, and with that Daisy lost her temper and struck him across the face.

She had cause to regret it, for Bugs took that treatment neither from man nor woman, and after a fierce scuffle Daisy finished up on the floor, cowering in alarm as the infuriated ex-truck driver stood over her threateningly.

The sounds of the struggle did not reach the ears of Stone, Dorothy and a girl-friend who was to accompany them to the race-course, but they chafed at the delay which it caused.

"He invited himself," said Dorothy herself, "and personally I don't see why we can't go on without him."

"Dorothy, we daren't," her brother told her. "We can't take the risk of offending him."

So they waited for Bugs, and drove with him to the course, where Bugs, for one, spent a profitable afternoon. He showed just how profitable it had been when he pulled out a thick wad of notes during the return journey.

"And you won all that on the last race," Dorothy commented. "You certainly were in luck's way."

"Half of it's yours," he informed her.

"Mine?" she exclaimed. "Oh, no—I backed the loser."

Bugs shook his head.

"You thought you did," he said. "But I took the liberty of putting your money on the horse I fancied myself. Here's your share."

"I couldn't possibly take it," Dorothy assured him, emphatically.

"But why not?" he protested.

Her lips almost curled.

"You wouldn't understand," she murmured.

Bugs certainly did not understand what she inferred by that last remark, and he dropped the subject. He had something else on his mind, anyway—something which he was able to broach when he found himself alone with her in the lounge of her home.

She was sitting at the piano, her tapering fingers running idly over the ivory keys, when he drew a ring from his pocket. It was a platinum ring with a massive, square-cut solitaire diamond that had cost twelve thousand dollars.

"What do you think of this?" he asked her.

She stopped playing the piano and examined it.

"It's beautiful," she had to admit.

"Dorothy," he said, "would you consider it—as an engagement ring?"

She looked at him whimsically.

"I could hardly do that," she answered, "since I'm engaged already."

"Engaged already!" His face clouded.

"But—you don't wear a ring."

"No," she said, "I met him at college

—a year ago. He gave me his fraternity pin." And she pointed to a miniature badge that was fixed in her frock.

"How is it I've never seen him around the house?" Bugs wanted to know.

"He got a position in South America after he left college," Dorothy told him. "I expect him back next month."

Bugs glanced at the fraternity pin again, and laughed cynically. The thing had probably cost twenty dollars at the most.

"And you mean to tell me that's all he could give you?" he scoffed, thinking of his twelve-thousand dollar ring.

"I never thought of its material value," Dorothy said simply. "You see, I'm in love with him, Mr. Raymond."

Bugs was not in the best of moods when he returned to his apartment that evening. Jimmy Kirk and Arkansas Smith were there, for, though he had cut adrift from the rest of the gang, Bugs had retained the services of these two, realising that he might find a body-guard essential to his safety.

Jimmy and Arkansas noticed that their employer was short-tempered that evening.

The New Leader.

IN the down-town club that had formerly been one of Bugs Raymond's haunts, Nails Markey discussed the situation with several other members of the disgruntled gang.

"Bugs is playin' solo," he stated grimly, "but we ain't the kind o' mugs to sit back an' let him call the hands, I reckon. Now, listen, you guys. Nobody ever said I was dumb—and maybe I've got ideas for runnin' this town as smart as any hunch that Bugs ever had. Maybe I can take control of this outfit and run it better'n he ever thought of runnin' it."

There was a chorus of approval, and consequently the city once again found itself in the throes of gang administration, rapacious thugs laying their clutches on every conceivable enterprise, blackmailing, bribing, threatening.

But a long-suffering public had reached the limits of endurance. The Press announced its vehement disapproval in black and white. The question was debated over the radio by an influential reformer who organised a city-wide campaign. There were mass meetings at which the District Attorney, the judges, the politicians and the police were all accused of chicanery and corruption.

And in the Press and over the radio, the name of the man deemed to be responsible was but thinly veiled—the name Bugs Raymond. For who was ready to believe that the notorious racketeer had in reality turned his back on his old associates?

The outcry had the inevitable effect of spurring the authorities to action. A conference was held in the City Hall, was attended by professional men and business men, and was presided over by the District Attorney.

The District Attorney made a spirited attack not only on the hoodlums who threatened to dominate the city, but on those prominent members of the community who had countenanced the gangsters and even withheld evidence that might have convicted some of them.

Nor was the D.A.'s oratory in vain. Men came forward from the audience and admitted his charges. They were commercial magnates who had been brow-beaten or blackmailed during the months that Bugs Raymond had held undisputed sway. They confessed that they had accepted thugdom out of the fear of their hearts, but announced their determination of making a solid stand against it in the future.

Meanwhile, Bugs Raymond watched and waited, though his interest in the outcry was spasmodic, and only apparent when his thoughts did not hinge upon Dorothy Stone. He had set his mind on one course, at any rate, and it was a course that kept strictly to the strait and narrow path of law-abiding citizenship.

But Nails Markey was not idle. He realised that he had stirred up a hornet's nest, and further action was necessary. With Bugs Raymond's desertion of the gang still rankling, he saw a move whereby the latter might become a scapegoat.

Nails sent secretly for Jimmy Kirk. "Hallo, Jimmy," he greeted, when the gunman called on him. "How'd you like to make a little extra money?"

"How little?" drawled Jimmy with his thin-lipped smile.

"There's a loud-speaker on the radio that's shootin' off his mouth plenty," said Nails. "I wondered if you might attend to him, if I made it worth your while."

Jimmy's eyes took on a glint of greed. That night he made his way to the radio operator's hotel and let himself into the man's room by a duplicate key.

The reformer was sitting at a typewriter, tapping out notes for a speech that he intended to deliver the following day. He did not hear Jimmy enter. He was not aware of the slayer's presence till the smash of a gunshot broke the trend of his thoughts.

Jimmy Kirk plugged him three times in the back, then drilled him with a fourth bullet as he lay on the floor.

Next day the papers blazened the news of the killing and demanded justice. Men in the street pronounced the name of Bugs Raymond in wrathful tones. He had been at the back of it. He was the one the police should lay hands on. But the police had no proof.

Bugs received a call from Arkansas Smith at his apartment that night.

"You know the latest?" Arkansas announced. "They've pinned the killing on Jimmy Kirk. Yeah, he was seen leavin' that loud-speaker's hotel just after the shootin'!"

"Bunk!" was the rejoinder. "Jimmy didn't do it. He knows I don't want to get in any jam. He knows I'm out of the racket."

"I'm tellin' you," Arkansas persisted. "You ain't seen Jimmy since last night, anyway, have you?"

Bugs shook his head. "But that don't mean a thing," he argued. "I guess Jimmy got the tip he was suspected, and he's lyin' low for a spell."

He was interrupted by the ringing of the 'phone-bell, and picked up the receiver.

"Hallo?" he called. "Raymond this end. Yeah. Oh, hallo, Jimmy; it's you, is it? What's all this about that reformer?" A pause, and then: "You what?"

Watching Bugs, Arkansas Smith saw his face change colour.

"You've gotta get out of town, huh?" Bugs went on, a metallic note in his voice. "You want me to—" His tone grew suave all at once. "Oh, sure, Jimmy! You know I wouldn't stand by and see you in any fix without doin' something. Yeah, I'll have a car for you. You can pick it up at the gas-house at ten-thirty to-night."

He hung up the receiver and stood thinking for a moment. So Jimmy had been guilty, after all. Jimmy had gone against instructions, and now came whining for aid, a hunted slayer with the law at his heels.

It was not pleasant for Bugs to reflect that, by force of circumstantial evidence, he might now share his erring lieutenant's fear of the electric chair.

He glanced at Arkansas Smith.

"You were right," he said curtly. "Jimmy did it, but I don't want the cops to get him—if you understand what I mean. Ark, I want Jimmy put on the spot."

"I get you, Bugs."

"Take a car down to the gas-house, and meet him there," Bugs ordered.

Arkansas left the apartment, picked up a touring car and drove to the gas-house, over which Bugs had assumed control shortly after he had launched forth as a racketeer. He entered a small office there, switched on the light and waited.

Fifteen minutes after his arrival he heard a stealthy footfall, and, glancing through the window, saw Jimmy Kirk step into the shaft of light that streamed through the panes.

Arkansas opened a shutter. He observed that Jimmy looked haggard and nervous.

"The cops are on my trail, Ark," said Jimmy hoarsely. "Where's the car?"

"Right behind you," was the answer. "You'd better beat it, quick!"

Jimmy Kirk turned and darted towards the auto. Arkansas let him take the wheel and then drew a gun. He levelled it deliberately, and blazed at Jimmy's white face. Three shots he pumped into the gunman in the car, and watched him sag forward over the steering-column. Then he turned to a telephone, to dial police headquarters.

"I'm speakin' from the gas-house," he said, as he heard the voice of the desk-sergeant. "A motor bandit just tried to stick me up here. No, he didn't get away. I shot him, an' he's dead—"

Arkansas stopped speaking. A hand had closed on his wrist, and, turning quickly, he saw a man in a slouch hat. The man was not alone. There were three or four uniformed police-officers with him.

The cops had been closer on the trail than even Jimmy Kirk had realised. They would never take Kirk into custody, but they had seen and heard enough to arrest Arkansas Smith.

The manacles were snapped home on Smith's wrists.

Back to the Racket.

EVEN under third-degree methods, Arkansas Smith maintained the habitual reticence peculiar to a gangster in the haunts of the police. So Bugs Raymond continued in his rôle of business man, and was a prominent figure at a civic function which took place a day or two after Kirk's killing.

The occasion marked the completion of the sixteen-million-dollar skyscraper that had been erected by the Stone Construction Company, and the function was carried out on the roof.

At a height of over a thousand feet above street level, speeches were made and applauded, a news-reel recording them. Bugs mingled with the elite, and, when the oratory was over, managed to edge his way to where Dorothy Stone was standing.

A good-looking young man was with her. She was holding on to his arm

"What do you want?" Stone demanded in a voice that was shaken by ill-concealed wrath.

affectionately, and as Bugs came up she smiled an aloof smile and presented her companion.

"Oh, Mr. Raymond," she said, "I'd like you to meet my fiancé. Billy, this is Mr. Raymond. Mr. Raymond—Mr. Matheson."

The young man held out his hand, and Bugs gripped it. He smiled an odd smile that was of the lips only, and not the eyes.

"Glad to know you, Matheson," he murmured. "Let me see, I believe Miss Stone told me you'd been in South America."

"Correct." Billy Matheson answered genially. "I'm going back there—but not before Dorothy marries me. We've fixed the date for the fifteenth of next month. Of course, you'll come along."

Bugs inclined his head. "Delighted," he said, "and I wish you every happiness."

"Thanks, Mr. Raymond," young Matheson rejoined, and then his attention was diverted by a Press photographer who came forward and spoke to Dorothy.

"Miss Stone," the photographer said, "would you and your fiancé care to pose while I take a picture? I'm a representative from the Union News Agency."

Dorothy agreed smilingly, and Bugs stood aside and leaned against the parapet of the roof, watching the young couple as they stood arm-in-arm. The Press photographer went back to his camera, focused it on Dorothy and Matheson and then approached Bugs.

"Would you mind moving?" he said. "You're just in the picture."

Bugs started. For a moment his brow darkened, and then, nodding abruptly, he walked to the rear of the camera.

The incident rankled in a mind that was already poisoned by jealousy, and at noon, when the reception was over, Bugs took a taxi to the new address of Nails Markey.

Nails had prospered, as his sumptuously-appointed apartment testified, and Bugs found him there with four or five of the boys—and Daisy de Lisle.

"Well, well," Nails greeted him in sarcastic tones, "if it ain't Bugs Raymond in person."

"Yep," Bugs said curtly, and then, fixing him with his eyes: "Been steppin' kind of high lately, haven't you, Nails? Seems to have slipped your mind that I might put you back where you once belonged—among the alleys."

Nails jerked to his feet and reached for his hip with an angry exclamation, but in a moment Daisy had stepped between the two men. Nails slugged, and, sinking into a chair again, pushed back his hat, which rarely left his head even when he was indoors.

"Say, listen, Nails," Bugs told him. "I'm not here to have trouble. Maybe that's why I sort of mentioned that I'm still in a position to control this outfit."

Nails mastered the resentment that was kindling in him. A cunning expression appeared in his eyes, and then gave place to a shifty and affable glint.

"Well, we ain't seen you in a long time, Bugs," he observed. "We'd almost forgotten what you looked like. Hadn't we, boys?" And he looked at the other members of the gang.

They nodded, but were plainly non-plussed by Nails Markey's change of front.

"Nails," Bugs said, "I thought I'd look you up and talk over something important."

August 29th, 1981.

"You're welcome, Bugs," Nails told him, with a grin. "Specially so far as Daisy is concerned, I guess. She's always talkin' about you."

"You shut your trap, Nails!" Daisy flung at him vehemently, and then, turning on her heel, she moved to another part of the room.

Nails laughed. "You know, Bugs," he began, "there's one thing about Daisy—"

Bugs interrupted him with an impatient gesture. He had not called to discuss Daisy.

"Listen," he said, "I'm back in the racket. See?"

"Oh?" Nails murmured, leaning forward in his chair.

Bugs took a pace or two across the room, almost feverishly. It was clear that there was something on his mind.

"Nobody ever stopped me getting what I wanted," he jerked, coming to a halt before his former henchman. "You know that, Nails. I got what I went after every time. That applied to big business, and it's goin' to apply to this girl."

"What girl?" Nails inquired.

"Dorothy Stone," Bugs rapped out. "She turned me down for a cheapskate college Romeo, but I'm not the man to stand for it. Did you ever hear of the bride bein' carried off and the groom bein' left at the altar, Nails? Well, that's the kind of racket I'm gonna be in."

"Aw, kidnap the bride, huh?"

"Yep," Bugs answered, "and listen low. The morning of the wedding I'll meet you boys here. We'll make up our own party for the ceremony. Morning dress, high hats, flowers in our button-holes—and gats on our hips. We'll stick up that wedding the same as we've stuck up this town at one time or another."

"And the Stone girl will fall right in your arms," said Nails, with a smirk. "Boy, what a racket this is gonna be."

"It's the kind of racket that might make her think a whole lot more o' me," Bugs ground out, "for havin' the nerve to pull it off."

Nails stood up. "All right, Bugs," he said. "When is the ceremony fixed for?"

"The fifteenth," was the answer. "I'll be seein' you and the boys, Nails."

"Sure you will," Nails told him heartily, and saw him to the door.

When Nails Markey returned it was to encounter doubtful glances from the rest of the gang. They saw, however, that his ugly face had undergone a change of expression.

"So Mister Bugs Raymond thinks he can look us up again," he sneered, "and find us sittin' pretty—all ready to take bird-seed outa his hand and whistle a tune for him. He cuts adrift when it suits him, and he makes a come-back when it suits him. But this ain't no come-back for him. He dropped us once, and we ain't takin' a chance on him again."

"Then the wedding racket is off, Nails?" one of the gang asked.

"No, that racket goes—up to a point," Nails rejoined. "We'll be waitin' to go to church just like Bugs said—with mornin' clothes, high hats, flowers in our button-holes—and gats on our hips. But Bugs Raymond won't ever see church."

A girl's voice spoke. It was the voice of Daisy, standing in the background, and her face was paper-white.

"What do you mean, Nails?" she said breathlessly.

"I mean, baby," Nails answered, "that friend, Bugs is takin' that well-known ride."

Daisy was silent. She wanted to see

Bugs pay for the callous manner in which he had treated her. Yet she cared for him still, and knew that she always would, whatever happened.

The Ceremony.

ON the morning of the wedding Bugs Raymond donned a pair of light trousers, a fancy vest, a black coat and a topper. Spotless linen, a wing collar, with a neat, striped tie, and a pair of glace kid shoes encased in white spats completed the effect.

Bugs had never acquired the true social manner, but he at least possessed presence, and he cut an elegant and immaculate figure as he left his apartment.

He knew that Nails would have a limousine waiting to take the racketeering party to the church, so he did not order his own car, but hailed a taxi.

Half-way to Nails Markey's place he stopped the taxi outside a florist's shop and bought a carnation to decorate the button-hole of his morning-coat, and ten minutes later he dismissed the cab and entered the block of furnished apartments in which Nails had taken up residence.

He was treated to an amusing spectacle when he entered. There stood the boys, all rigged out in morning dress and high hats, and a more uncomfortable-looking group of humanity Bugs had never clapped eyes on.

One or two seemed almost presentable, but the others were like so many tailor's dummies who had been fitted with the wrong sizes in suits. Nails, in particular, was an incongruous figure, his thick-set form being totally out of keeping with the style of dress that it had been necessary to affect.

The clothes had cost a lot of money. Yet Nails did not even faintly resemble a man-about-town. His blue chin and coarse features betrayed him, and he looked precisely what he was—a thug masquerading as a dude.

Bugs surveyed him and the rest of the gang with candid mirth.

"Sufferin' snakes," he said uproariously, "do I look like you plugs?"

Nails stood before a mirror, adjusting the ends of a black silk bow tie.

"Why, what's wrong with us?" he demanded. "I thought we looked pretty hot."

"You look like a lot of half-boiled undertakers," Bugs observed. "But you'll pass. Are you all set?"

"Yeah, we're all set," Nails answered. "I'll have Chuck call round with the car."

He crossed to a telephone and put through a call, ordering the aforementioned "Chuck" to appear straightway with the limousine.

"Now let's get the whole thing clear," said Bugs, as Nails wandered back to the middle of the room. "We drive up to the church and all get out, excepting Chuck, who will stay at the wheel and be ready to start up at a moment's notice. We'll take our places in one of the pews near the altar, and before the minister can pronounce the words 'man and wife' we'll step up and bust in on the ceremony with our gats. Understand?"

"I get you," Nails rejoined. "I'll grab the girl," Bugs continued. "You and the boys will cover my get-away and join me in the car."

"Oh, we cover your getaway," Nails murmured. "And then hustle out and join you in the car, huh?"

Bugs nodded. "Right, Nails," he was saying when Daisy de Lisle entered the room.

Daisy looked pale, and there were dark shadows under her eyes. Glancing

(Continued on page 26.)

A stirring story of the West, in which a senator's son is sent to a ranch to keep him out of trouble, but trouble seems to follow him, until he wades in with blazing guns and smashing fists.

Westward Bound

Starring
BUFFALO BILL, JUN.,
and
ALLENE RAY.

["A Slight Mix-Up!"]

THE girl who sat at one of the corner tables in the slum restaurant covered her mouth with her dainty fingers for the fiftieth time that night. She looked bored, and she was bored. The restaurant, far from providing the rough and tumble amusement she had fondly expected, was just the quietest place in the city.

She turned to her escort as though he were to blame for it. "Fred Baine," she said severely, "I thought you said there was always something like real life in this sort of eating show?"

"Well, 'pon my soul, I thought there was!" Baine said. "Seems very quiet, I must admit."

"So quiet that I am going West to-morrow—back to my ranch in Montana," said Marge Holt very firmly. "The ranch does at least give one some little excitement. This city life is simply awful—no riding, no cattle stampedes, all the men looking as if they have nothing else to do but make themselves spruce and tidy. Gee, it's me for the West to-morrow all right!"

"Don't say that, Marge," pleaded Baine, and pushed back his chair. "Perhaps they are fearing a police raid, or something, and everybody is on their best behaviour. I'll have a word with Tony."

Fred Baine had his own reasons why he did not want Marge Holt to go back to the ranch. He had an idea that he would like to go back with her—as her husband. That would ensure his not being called upon to work. Later he might be able to persuade her to sell the cattle, the ranch and everything else that she had, and he would help her spend the money in the only way he knew how.

He left the table, with Marge still yawning, and made his way to where Tony, the proprietor of the so-called slum restaurant amused himself by polishing a glass that was already as bright as it ever had been or ever would be.

"Tony, my friends want a little excitement," said Baine, keeping his voice low, and dipping his hands into his pocket for his notes. "Got somebody who could sort of make things—well, not too lively, if you understand, with that pretty girl? Then I would sort o' drop in on the scene, and a little scrap would give her all the excitement she wanted."

"And the gallant hero of the evening would receive such a charming vote of thanks from the be-yew-tiful princess, eh?" grinned Tony, pocketing the proffered note. "Well, it ees not the first time, my friend, that I have obliged you!"

And he beckoned to a hooligan of just the type stage villains are invariably depicted. He was a huge fellow with a coarse, unshaven face, thin, sneering lips, beady eyes and crooked nose—altogether one who looked quite interesting in a picture, but mightily uninteresting to meet on a dark and stormy night.

The fellow came across to Tony just as the door opened and another of the boring type came into Marge Holt's view. He was spruce, curly-headed, undeniably handsome, with a pair of mischievous eyes. Behind him walked a chauffeur.

Marge had quite the biggest thrill of the evening as the two newcomers sat down and called for drinks. For a young man about town to sit down with his chauffeur was new to her, and, tame though that fact was, it was a thrill after the dull and dismal evening she had so far spent.

She was watching the newcomers so intently that she did not observe the unwieldy form of the tough until his voice made her look up.

"We're going to dance," he growled. "Ready?"

"No, thank you—not to-night!" said Marge, a little unsteadily as her heart began to beat more quickly under the leering eyes.

"I said we were going to dance!" retorted the tough, with a very effective snort.

And his hands went out—which was just the moment the gallant Fred Baine should have come upon the scene. But there was somebody else about besides Fred Baine.

The curly-headed newcomer sprang from his table, stepped away quickly to the girl's table, and lashed out twice with his right and left.

A very surprised tough met the first with his chin and the second with his nose—then rapidly going out of the newcomer's reach.

In a flash the excitement Marge had craved for was forthcoming. The tough steadied himself and hit back, and with the chauffeur running up to take his young master's side, and Tony rushing up to beg his man not to make too much mess of the really gallant stranger, there was more confusion than space.

The curly-headed young man could use his fists. Marge noticed that just as quickly as did the tough. But it was the latter who suffered the most convincing proof of that fact—two crashing rights under the jaw which sent him sprawling to the floor.

"Meester Baine—you stop this feller—there'll be smashes up!" hissed the thoroughly alarmed Tony.

Baine started to do his best, but the young man flung him aside as though he had been a sack of straw, grabbed at Marge, lifted her clean out of her chair, and carried her through the little restaurant. His chauffeur stopped to look after the tough as that worthy staggered groggily to his feet.

"Put—put—put me down!" gasped Marge Holt, her voice vibrant with anger.

The young man merely grinned, worked his way skillfully to the door, pushed it open by the simple expedient of banging it with her daintily shod feet, and dumped her gently at the very door of the taxi that was waiting outside.

"You've—how dare you!" she positively hissed.

The next moment two stinging open-handers upon the sides of his face staggered the rescuer so much with the surprise of the attack that he was stunned for three complete seconds.

The fourth saw him catch the girl gently by the shoulders, pull her towards him, and a not too gentle kiss fairly implanted upon her lips.

"Now you'll go straight home—if you're a lady!" said the young man, with a grim laugh. "Here are your friends—beat it!"

Baine and the rest of the party arrived just as Marge, under the pressure of her rescuer's arms, was being pushed into the taxi. Baine himself ushered in another girl, and slipped in after them without a word.

"Say, Mr. Bob, I reckon that was a frame-up job!" said the chauffeur thoughtfully, and stared as the other remained standing at the kerb staring after the departing taxi.

"I reckon that was a stunning girl, if ever there was one!" muttered Bob, and gently rubbed his still smarting face with the tips of his fingers. "I'm sorry I suggested she might not be a lady, Ben—but glad I kissed her! What's the tough doing?"

"Doing?" Ben grunted as he repeated that word. "That's what I say—it was a put-up job. He never moved after you had picked up the lady, although I dare say he could have made mincemeat of me. All the same, now they've gone we'd better be moving ourselves, Mr. Bob. Might be a real rough house!"

Bob Lansing nodded, and clambered into the smart two-seater beside his driver in the manner of one whose mind is very, very far from being set upon the delights of a run back to the city.

Troubles Never Come Singly!

BOB LANSING was his usual cheery self when he greeted his father the next morning, although quite a deal of the night just gone by had been spent in studying again and again a mental vision of a pretty girl he had held in his arms for all too short a time.

Senator Lansing, however, was far from being cheery. He had a newspaper in his hands, and the top lines, printed in big black letters, proclaimed to the world that Senator Lansing's son had been mixed up in a cheap sort of brawl the previous night.

"Bob, I suppose you know all about this?" he said sternly. "And with the elections just coming round—why, this will cost me thousands of votes!"

"Sorry, dad!" said Bob quietly. "But I just couldn't let a burly brute of a fellow pull a girl about, could I?"

"I don't know—I don't want to know anything about it. All I know is that you are causing me to lose a mighty lot of votes!" said Senator Lansing restlessly. "I don't even understand why on earth you want to go down to that part of the city and get—"

August 29th, 1934.

"Just a little change—a little excitement!" put in Bob, with a gentle smile.

"At my expense!" snapped his father. "Bob, you're going west for two months to my ranch in Montana—until after the elections, at any rate! Understand? And you'd better take Coleman with you—he seems to have a propensity for trouble just as much as you!"

"O.K. with me, dad!" said Bob cheerfully. "Sorry if I have messed up any votes for you, but—why, dad, you should have seen her! She was just the loveliest—"

"Brrrrr!" growled Senator Lansing, in deepest disgust.

Bob grinned, bade his father adieu, and hurried away to inform Ben Coleman of their good luck.

"Westward bound, my boy!" chirped Bob the moment he found the chauffeur. "Get a few bits together, and we're starting right away!"

"What—me, too?" gasped Ben. "I mean, I haven't just got to take you to the station?"

"Not you, my son!" said Bob, and struck a dramatic attitude that was completely spoiled by his merry, twinkling eyes. "The open plains—the rolling cattle—I mean, ranges—horses, pistols, bandits, rustlers, gangsters, racketeers—"

"A couple of hundred cows to groom every day—I know!" growled Ben.

"Well, what of it? It'll be a change! Go on—slip away and get a few things packed!"

It took them less than an hour to get all they wanted, and at the end of that time the smart two-seater was heading westward with two care-free young men aboard. Ben had, at Bob's command, discarded his uniform, and wore an ordinary lounge suit which would be less distinctive and more useful where they were going.

"Well, this is where we leave our troubles behind!" chuckled Bob, as they struck open country.

"Well, I dunno, Mr. Bob," mused Ben. "'Tain't such a bad ol' place!"

"Not so much of the Mister Bob—plain Bob does me now!" grunted Lansing. "Got that, Ben?"

"Sure, I've got that, Mr. Bob!"

"Bob, you gumph!"

"All right—Bob!" grinned Ben.

"Then step on the gas and let her rip!"

Ben obeyed, and the car simply flew over the miles until the city was left far behind. They pulled up only to feed and drink and secure the necessary petrol for the car, so that when nightfall came they were ready enough to call halt for the day.

Dawn saw them on the move again, and by the time noon came round such things as trouble seemed utterly out of place amidst the wild, open country, the rising hills, the smell of the prairies and the woods, the almost cloudless blue skies and the heat of the sun.

But even in such heavenly surroundings the most earthly things can happen. A loud bang from one of the back tyres brought them out of their idle roaming with a start.

"That's work!" grunted Bob, as he jumped out. "I'll give you a hand to change the wheel, Ben."

"Thank you, Mr. Bob, but—"

"I'll 'but' you if you call me Mr. Bob again!" growled Lansing. "Let's get at it!"

They got at it, as cheerfully as though the world belonged to them, neither of them giving a thought as to what would be the position if they suffered another puncture before they got into a town and had the damaged tyre repaired.

As it happened, they were destined to be relieved of any such worries.

They had just finished their job when two horsemen came from the neighbouring woods—two strangers who wore the costume of men of the plains, and the revolver-belts that always had such a picturesquely serious impression about them.

"Keep out of that car, mister!" said one of them grimly, his hand on his gun. "Slip off, partner!"

His partner obeyed, and in a moment they were out of the saddle.

"We happen to be in a hurry, mister—so 'scuse us if we sort o' insist upon a trade; we take your car, and you take our horses!" said he who had spoken first. "They're sure just about all in. But—they'll go for you. Get in, partner!"

"Sure, this is real swell!" grinned his companion.

With their hands reaching for the skies and neither of them with his coat fully on, Bob and Ben watched angrily but helplessly whilst the rougher-dressed men of the plains shipped into their car.

"Look here, you can't get away with this!" said Bob desperately.

"Can't?" growled the spokesman, and dropped his hand to his gun. "Say, mister, think yourself lucky we don't fill you with lead just to make sure you can't talk! And ain't we trading you our hosses?"

"Our hosses is sure right!" chuckled the other. And that was the last Bob Lansing saw or heard of them, although the car was raising the dust under its speeding wheels for some minutes for their enjoyment.

"That's the last trouble we could have expected, Ben," growled Bob, and took a look at the horses.

They were obviously tired out, but were not too bad. They at least provided them with a means of transport and, at Bob's suggestion, they mounted the animals and rode at walking pace until they came to a trail.

Here they headed west again, knowing full well that they would be lucky if they reached Montana that night and could secure food.

But even their slight anxiety in that direction could not restrain Bob from giving a whoop of sudden delight.

"Water!" he exclaimed joyfully. "Come on, Ben—this is where we get off our thoroughbreds and really enjoy ourselves!"

"I could do with something more'n water to drink!" growled Ben. "If I never see those hosses again, I'll—"

"Drink?" sniffed Bob, as he slipped from his horse. "This is going to be a real, swell swim! Come on—slip off your clothes and get a splash!"

The pool of water was inviting after the dusty ride, and it took them only a few seconds to whip off their clothes and slip into the welcome shallows. There for a while they splashed about like a couple of light-hearted schoolboys, shouting to one another if they were many feet apart, and ducking each other if they were near enough to do it.

Even Ben lost a good deal of his anger against the car rustlers as the refreshing waters brought new life into his limbs, and he was as cheerful as ever as he came out of the water a foot ahead of Bob.

But a puzzled expression took the place of his smiles as he moved to where they had left their clothes.

"Say, Mr. Bob—I mean, Bob—somebody's took our clothes! And I can't see the horses!" he exclaimed.

"What! Jumping rattlesnakes, you're right!" ejaculated Bob.

They rushed to the bushes in search of their clothes, and then to the shelter under which they had left their horses. There was nothing to be seen.

For a moment they stared at one another in dismay, and it was Ben who broke the startled silence with a grunt of deep disgust.

"Well, this is about the most thievin' district a galoot ever walked into!" he growled. "First they pinch our car, and now they've taken our clothes and horses! What d'y'know about that?"

"I don't know so much about that as I should like to!" said Bob grimly, and smiled suddenly as he looked down at his companion's dripping shorts. "But I do know that you're looking some guy to walk into a respectable town, Ben!"

"Well, seeing that you are dressed in just the same as myself, you ain't gonna look so mighty attractive!" growled Ben. "And your curls has sure been left in the pool, Bob!"

"Take cover—I hear something!" interjected Bob suddenly.

They darted behind the cover of tall bushes at the side of the trail, and waited hopefully. The creaking of wooden wheels drew nearer and nearer, and suddenly swept into sight—and two hopeful expressions turned to dismay.

A middle-aged woman was driving towards them, seated in an old fashioned, but quite serviceable, buckboard. She saw them at the same moment as they spotted her, and in a flash the horses were whipped into a gallop, and the buckboard flew past them in a cloud of dust.

"That's that!" grunted Bob. "There's nothing for it hut a hike, Ben—and a hope that our luck will change!"

"Let's he going!" sniffed Ben. "The sooner we find a decent hombre in these parts the better I'll be feelin'!"

And they struck the trail in rather tender fashion. Their feet were not hardened to walking on a hot, dusty trail, and to them it seemed that every loose stone in Montana was laid out before them.

It was only just in time to prevent their utter collapse that they stumbled up to a wooden shack that had every appearance of being deserted. By that time they would both have risked imprisonment for life to obtain a pair of hefty boots to protect their feet against the hot trail.

"We're going in there, and if nobody is at home, we'll help ourselves to whatever there is," said Bob, setting his teeth desperately. "I'm sure stuck right up with this trail paddlin', Ben!"

Ben could only grunt. He felt that if he opened his mouth very much he would groan.

Cautiously they crept up to the door of the shack and knocked upon the door. There was no answer, which gave them both a greater hope. Just as cautiously, Bob opened the door. It gave way to his touch at once, and a single glance told them that there was nobody at home.

"Inside!" said Bob briefly.

Ben went in willingly enough, and Bob followed him and shut the door. Inside they found all that they could want—clothes for both of them, including boots that more or less fitted them.

Thus it was with a little more cheerfulness that they walked once more on that troublesome trail, their borrowed clothes lending them protection against the hot sun and making them feel rather more inclined to meet up with anybody who happened to come along.

As it happened, they came up to somebody they least of all expected to meet.

"Look—there's our horses!" said Bob suddenly, pointing to a little clearing just off the trail. "And, gee! What's that? Men and cattle! Say, this is where we step in, Ben!"

Ben nodded and pushed back his shirt cuffs in businesslike fashion. In a moment more they were moving cautiously to the clearing.

Two men were busy in that clearing—too busy to take any notice of the newcomers. They were obviously branding a calf, and behind them were the two horses the car rustlers had left with Bob and Ben.

But the men turned quickly enough when Bob spoke.

"Say, guess this is where we collect our horses!" said Bob calmly.

"Your horses?" growled one of them.

"You mean our hosses! Somebody rustled them from us!"

"Somebody rustled our car, and left us the horses—I guess we'll make for the sheriff and have our argument out with him!" said Bob grimly. "Suit you?"

The second man let go the calf, and in a moment it was dashing into the open country, taking with it the slight and not unpleasant smell of singeing brought about by the branding. The next moment the two men flung themselves on Ben and Bob, and a wild fight started.

There was no time for the city men to wonder why the men of the plains should object to settling the disputed ownership of the horses before the local sheriff. They had to protect themselves as best they could against as savage an attack as they had ever encountered.

But the troubles that had come their way had roused Bob and Ben just sufficiently to fight with more ferocity than skill. They lashed out right and left, and there were no rounds. They took blows as hard as they gave, but neither party showed the least inclination to stop the fight until there sounded, from the distance, the rattle of hoofs.

That changed the whole outlook.

In a flash, guns appeared in the strangers' hands, and two anxious sets of eyes glared ferociously at Bob and Ben.

"Keep away, stranger! We'll blow holes in you if you put your fists this way again—and stand back!"

Unarmed as they were, neither Bob nor Ben could do anything but obey. They looked on in dismay as the men hurriedly mounted the horses and kept their guns pointing steadily until the rapidly approaching rattle of galloping horses urged them to dig in their spurs and dash madly for cover of the woods.

"Well, here's another go!" grunted Ben, rubbing his jaw. "I was just going to sock my man in the jaw, too!"

There was no time for more. Horsemen were all around them, and again guns came into play. And of all the men that had been met, these were the grimmest bunch ever.

"Say, ain't there a guy in this district without a gun?" demanded Bob contemptuously.

"Look here—you can't get away with this!" said Bob desperately.

"We want guns when dealing with rustlers like you!" snapped one of the newcomers—a foreman, by the look of him, and by the way the others waited for him to speak.

"Rustlers?" hooted Ben. "Why, we've been rustled—"

"What's that you've got in your hand?" demanded the foreman, as he slipped from his horse. "If that ain't a branding-iron I will say I've slipped up some!"

Bob looked down at the iron which, almost instinctively, he had snatched up at the approach of the horsemen.

"I tell you, we came up to two men who had stolen our horses, and—" began Bob hotly.

"Rope 'em, men!" cut in the foreman briefly.

He waited until his orders had been obeyed, and once more the unarmed Bob and Ben could do nothing but submit. Ropes were set round their arms and legs and pulled tight.

"Now you're going up to the Bar O, and meet up with the owner," said the foreman grimly. "I'll say rustlers have never been caught with more evidence of guilt than you—and we sure have had some rustlers in these parts. Move, strangers!"

Ben gave vent to a dismal grunt, and his expression was almost pathetic as he looked up at Bob.

"And Senator Lausing thought he was sending us out of trouble when he gave orders for us to be Westward bound!" he muttered.

"Oh, we'll get out of this plenty quick enough!" declared Bob, as they started the march along the trail.

But he sounded a lot more confident than he felt. He had been caught with a branding iron in his hands, with the necessary fire at his toes, and that was a whole heap of evidence. He knew that—none better!

Everything depended upon the ranch owner now, and if that owner was anything like those with whom they had already made contact, Bob had a notion that a good many more months than two would pass before Senator Lausing saw them again!

A Serious Business!

"YOU wait here!"

That was what Frank, the ranch foreman, briefly commanded when the foot-sore and weary suspects were marched into Bar O. They were glad enough to halt, but inwardly, just a little uncertain as to whether or not they were keen to learn their fate.

A glance round at the grim faces of the captors told Bob that a dash for freedom would be hopeless. These men showed such an aptitude for handling their guns, and bullets went quicker than any man or any horse. There was nothing for it but to wait and see what happened.

The foreman slipped round the ranch-house, followed by the man whom Bob had heard addressed as Dick—a burly, rather shifty-looking customer. At the back, just filling a washing pan, was Emma, the housekeeper-cook.

"Where's Miss Marge, Emma?" demanded Frank in his brief way.

"I'm here—what's the matter?" came an unexpected reply from the doorway.

Marge Holt stood there, less magnificently dressed than she had been in the slim restaurant, but none the less attractive and pretty.

"We caught a couple of rustlers with a running iron in their hands!" explained

Frank. "I thought you might like to have a word with them, Miss Marge, before I took them down to the sheriff. They might spill a bit if you ask them a few questions."

Marge Holt nodded.

"I'll come along with you, Frank—I'd sure like to know a bit more about these rustlers," she said, with a frown. "We've lost so much cattle lately that the sooner the rustlers are all in prison the better it will be for all of us. Where are they?"

"Round the corner."

They moved in a body towards the ranch-gates, Marge with a grimly pert expression upon her pretty face, and Emma with a distinctly curious, but nervous, twinkle in her eyes. It was Emma who pulled up the party the moment they reached the corner of the house.

"Why, if it isn't the two men I saw half-naked on the trail!" she exclaimed. "They ought to be hanged!"

Marge did not reply—she did not even smile. She was looking at the curly head, from which Bob had removed his hat. And only for half a minute did the puzzled frown remain upon her brows.

Then she smiled—a gentle, whimsical smile of amusement.

"I don't think I'll question them yet," she said suddenly, and very quietly. "Let us make them work. Give them forks and set them to work in the stables, Frank. After that they can do the washing-up."

A moment later she had darted towards the house, stopping only to order the amazed Frank to wait a minute. She came back in a very short time, and it was with a pair of dark glass spectacles over her eyes.

The others looked at her in amazement.

"Lawks alive, Miss Marge—and what's the business?" gasped Emma.

"Leave this to me!" said Marge, with a chuckle of girlish delight.

And it was she who led the way up to the suspects and stood before them in an attitude of lofty contempt.

"So you are two of the rustlers who have been raiding my cattle!" she said cuttingly. "I've always thought rustlers were real men!"

"Look here, ma'am—we're not rustlers—" began Bob warmly.

"Take them round the stables, Frank!" interjected Marge.

"But—"

"Move!" snapped Frank, and fingered his gun by way of persuasion.

Ben and Bob moved, helpless and utterly forlorn. There simply was no use in argument at that time.

The cattle-sheds were chosen as the spot upon which they were first to work, and it was Marge who handed them forks.

"Clean up the sheds," she said briefly, and Bob stared suspiciously at the black glasses as there appeared to him to be a chuckle behind the command.

But the eyes remained hidden—and Frank, standing with his hand upon his gun, moved it slightly as a sign that he was getting impatient.

If they felt humiliated in raking out the smelly cattle-sheds, that was nothing to what they felt when they were set to work, half an hour later, at a huge basin of water in which reposed various kitchen utensils. It was the first time in their lives that they had "done the washing-up," and they did not like it.

They were tired in mind and body when nightfall came, and disgusted enough to wish that the sheriff would come along with the toughest length of rope and string them up to the nearest tree. Matters were not improved when they were parted for the night, Bob being locked in a side-room by the horse stables, and Ben taken and put under lock and key by the fodder-room.

But things certainly appeared to be turning their way when Ben's door was suddenly unlocked, well into the night, and the man Dick appeared.

"Not a whisper!" muttered Dick, before he had closed the door again.

"If you reckon I'm gonna start doin' more woman's work, you can get your gun out and start shootin' right now!" growled Ben. "I'm through!"

"Sh'ish!" Dick's warning was impatient. "I'm sort o' sorry for you fellers—you don't seem much like old-time rustlers to me."

"We ain't rustlers at all!"

"There's a couple of horses saddled down by the corral—here's a key that will release your partner—beat it!"

"Shucks! Now you're talking hoss sense!" gloated Ben, and in a moment he had snatched at the key and was at the door. "One of these days we'll meet up again, mister, and then I'll tell you what I think of you."

He could not have seen the grin that crept across Dick's shifty face or he might have been a little less exuberant. As it was he slipped across the yard to the stables, and in a few seconds he had released Bob and they were making for the corral as hard as their legs would take them.

The horses were there, saddled and ready for the trail and, with Dick looking on from the cover of a stable, they mounted and dug in their spurs. In half a minute they were careering wildly down the trail.

Two minutes later Dick was also mounted, but he cut off in a different direction to that taken by the runaway suspects. His was not an aimless ride.

Dawn was coming up when he rode straight up to a shack that was practically hidden in the thick undergrowth.

Inside were a number of men who appeared to find something disconcerting in the thunder of his approach, for their hands were upon their guns when Dick opened the door and walked in.

"They're gone!" he announced at once. "Took it like a dog takes a bone, Jim!"

"Good! Let's be going!" snapped the man addressed as Jim Stone.

The result of that escape and Dick's ride were manifest not so very much after.

Dick burst into the kitchen of the ranch.

"The prisoners have escaped—and they've taken a hundred head of cattle with them!" he said breathlessly. "Two horses have gone, too!"

"A hundred head of cattle—gone!" gasped Marge, and a spoon dropped with a clatter from her nerveless fingers to the floor.

For a moment they watched her—noticing the expression of dismay that flitted across her face. They put it down to the loss of her cattle—and a hundred head of cattle being lost was certainly something to cause her concern.

But it was not that. Marge was thinking only very dimly of the cattle. They formed, as it were, only a background to a rather handsome, smiling face—a head of curly hair—and a pair of merry eyes that had looked so extraordinarily nice when filled with an expression of dismay and resignation.

"Get—get the boys all out, and we'll hunt them over the range!" she whispered. "They can't beat us if they've a hundred head of cattle to look after."

"They'll be making for the border,

I expect. We'll have to hurry!" said Dick earnestly.

"Never mind—go and get them!" said Marge, and for the first time for many a year there was real anger in her voice.

Marge Holt was a very, very disappointed young woman. Bob Lansing was, after all, a rustler.

The Accusation!

AT the very moment that Marge Holt led out her cowboys Bob and Ben were sitting beside a camp-fire, resting after a meal. It should have been a cheerful meal, seeing that it was had in freedom they had not expected when they had turned in the previous night.

But it was not a cheery meal at all. Bob was preoccupied all the time, and the clatter he made when he suddenly flung a stone with vicious force at their water-can brought Ben to earth with a startled cry.

"Shucks! You'll rouse the whole district with that row!" he exclaimed. "What's the matter with you? Want a rope round your neck?"

"I've just remembered where I met that girl—it was at the slum restaurant!" exclaimed Bob, and rose quickly to his feet. "I'm going back!"

"Going back? What for?" ejaculated the startled Ben.

"She'll be thinking we really are rustlers—running away like we did," said Bob. "I'm not standin' for that—and it's no good your talking, either! We're going back!"

"More washing-up — and perhaps they'll set us to wash the socks and shirts—woman's work!" growled the disgusted Ben.

"We'll risk that! I'm not letting that girl think I'm a rustler," said Bob firmly, and with that he made for his horse.

Ben followed reluctantly, but dutifully. If Mr. Boh could risk his neck by going back, it was up to him to make it easier by keeping Bob company.

They rode the trail in silence, Ben despairing more and more as they got nearer to Marge Holt's range, and Bob showing more and more eagerness to meet up with the girl.

But they were destined not to meet up with her in the circumstances they planned.

Bob pulled up his horse with a sudden jerk as, riding the crest of a hill, he saw below him a herd of cattle in charge of a number of men.

"Halt! Can you see what cattle they are?" he demanded tensely.

"Bar O!" announced Ben a moment later. "You can see the brand on their haunches!"

"What's a herd doing out here at this time of day—making for the border-line?" said Bob. "Say, Ben, maybe they've been rustled! If we drove them back, and picked up a rustler or two we'd sure clear ourselves! Snakes! They've been driven into a corral!"

"Then there's no hope of clearing yourself—expect it's one of the dame's own corrals!" grunted Ben.

Bob did not answer. He never took his eyes off the scene before him. Instead, he dug his heels and set his horse at a trot towards the wooded range, and Ben followed as a matter of course.

There was no need to ask any questions when they dismounted from their horses a few yards from the shack into which they had watched the cowpunchers go. Voices came to them from within.

"Well, that's about the easiest lift we have ever had!"

"A good hundred head. Jim—and the joke of it is that Marge Holt will be out for them city goomphs, and her boys'll shoot 'em up on sight, so they can't spill the beans!"

It was a joke—it must have been, judging by the laughter that followed.

But to Bob it was anything but a joke. He had heard her name now—Marge Holt. And this was her cattle.

Untrained to the range though he was, Bob needed no telling that the herd was well hidden, and that it would be quite an easy matter for the cowpunchers to ride around the wooded corral and miss all that it hid.

"You follow my lead. Ben. We're going to do some business!" muttered Bob grimly, and with a calmness that staggered Ben, he stepped towards the shack door.

Rifles and guns greeted him, but he looked at them with a contempt that might have suggested he lived in such an atmosphere of constant threat and danger.

For one tense moment the men in the hut and the newcomers surveyed one another—and there was not a flicker of surprise in Bob's face when his eyes rested, for one brief second, upon those of the man Dick, from Bar O ranch.

"Well, mister?" queried Jim Stone, very quietly, his right hand moving ever so slightly to those behind him as a warning not to start shooting.

"Seeing that Bar O cattle coming into your corral, I sort o' reckoned you do business in a pretty small way," said Bob easily. "I'm interested—but with a place like this, stranger, why don't you wipe up the district?"

There were gasps all round at the calm announcement, and eyes that had been full of suspicion changed immediately to wonder.

"I don't reckon on rustling a hundred head or so. I've got a pretty good gang of my own, mister, and I'm sure startin' on clearing the district. Seein' as you're also interested, perhaps we'd better have a sort o' understanding," went on Bob; and even Ben nearly gasped at that.

Bob was as calm and convincing as if he had discussed such matters as rustling whole herds all his life. To make matters even more plain, he calmly ignored the guns and sat down at the table.

He was up the next moment, however, for with startling suddenness there burst into the room the very person for whom he was planning so cunning a fight.

It was Marge Holt!

For a moment they stared at her, she returning their stare with eager wonder. "So you've got them—and my cattle!" she said breathlessly. "Dick, the boys are out on the range! Get them along and have the cattle driven back—"

"Wait a minute—wait a minute!" said Jim Stone slowly. "Not so fast! Those cattle ain't goin' back!"

"What do you mean?" gasped Marge. "Dick, I saw you cut off from the boys, and followed you— Oh!"

She broke off with another little gasp, and stared round at Ben and then up at Bob. But the latter's face was impassive.

"So—you are—a rustler!" she muttered, as the truth dawned upon her. "And you—Dick?"

Dick turned his head, and it was Jim Stone who cut down the surprises and got to business.

Bob fought with fists and feet, leaping from spot to spot and bunk to bunk.

"Those cattle are going over the border, ma'am, and you're going with them!" he said bluntly. "We'll let you go when the cattle is out of jurisdiction, so to speak, and your blabbing won't hurt nobody."

"Wait a minute; I'm on a better plan than that!" said Bob excitedly. "Why not have the money from the ranch as well, boys? Hold Miss Holt for ransom, I mean. My partner can take a note to the ranch, and bless your little hearts, the lady can write the note herself!"

"I'll do nothing of the sort!" snapped Marge fiercely.

"You will!" said Bob coolly, and, sitting himself down at the table, took up pencil and paper. "At least, you will sign it! That will be good enough for your boys, I reckon. They'll sure have plenty of thought for you, ma'am!"

He wrote rapidly for a few minutes, Jim Stone looking on carefully whilst it was being done. In the end Bob rose from the table and gently but firmly pushed the girl into his vacant chair.

"Sign up—unless you want to go across the border with our bunch for good!" he said tersely.

She looked up at him, indignant and rebellious. But his calm, stern expression told her at once that she could expect nothing from him but orders.

A glance round at the merciless faces about her, and with a little sob at her throat, she signed her name to the demand for all the money at the ranch to be handed to the man who brought the note.

"Thanks!" said Bob coolly, as he took the note up and folded it. "Here, Ben, take this back to the ranch and bring back the money—"

"And you go with him, Dick," cut in Jim Stone, just as calmly. "Two of 'em is so much safer, mister—especially as your partner ain't got a gun!"

Bob never turned a hair, although he realised that those words just about spelled the utter ruin of his plan. Ben would have brought back plenty from the ranch—but armed men, not money. With Dick and a gun as partners on the ride, however, that plan seemed to be scotched for good and all.

But he could not show any mistrust of Jim Stone or Dick in the circumstances, neither could he show the slightest hesitation in accepting Jim Stone's suggestion as a really fine precaution.

"That's a great idea, partner," said Bob instantly. "Get off, you guys, and don't be too long about it. In the meantime I reckon we'll keep a good lookout, mister, whilst they're gone. This dame's pouches are on the range somewhere, and we don't want any surprise."

So, as Ben and Dick went out on their errand, Jim Stone agreed to split up the remaining members of the party into two sections. One lot went into the back room—and with them went Marge Holt. The others remained in the other room, ready for any emergencies.

Jim Stone was chuckling gleefully. His new partner was showing enterprise. He had thought of the ransom idea so quickly that for once in a way Jim Stone reckoned he had met up with somebody who had as much brains as he himself. It was pleasing, and likely to be profitable.

What Jim Stone would have thought had he been on the range trail could only be imagined. But things were certainly happening out there which would tend to upset his calculations of much loot from his rustling game.

Dick and Ben were riding down the trail, and were within a mile of the Bar O ranch when Ben, with a skill that was surprising considering he was more used to motor-cars than to horses, suddenly flung himself sideways at his companion, and the two of them lurched off their horses and crashed to the ground.

Ben had the advantage of the surprise, and he crashed home his right and left before the bewildered Dick had had time to realise that Ben meant quite a different business to that upon which they had set out.

He fought back, sick and dizzy from the blows he had already received, but his spirit was greater than his strength. A third and a fourth blow landed upon his chin, and a terrific thud under his heart toppled him to the ground.

In a moment Ben was on top of him, tugging at the rope which he had carefully and thoughtfully placed around his belt. Thereafter there was no fight—only a feeble sort of struggle which Dick put up to try and avoid being tied up.

He had no chance. Ben was grimly determined to get both the girl and Bob Lansing out of that mess, for a right bad mess they would all be in if they once were compelled to join in the ride over the border with Jim Stone's gang.

Ben finished his job neatly and completely, and got at his horse again. Dick he had left upon the trail whilst he galloped madly back to the ranch.

His greeting was not exactly a cordial one.

"Here's that rustler—drop him!" shouted one-puncher.

"Wait a bit—wait a bit—I want you!" yelled Ben, as he slid from his horse and dashed up to the foreman. "Say, read this note!"

He was fumbling in his pockets as he spoke and ran. But he had not the note in his fingers when he reached Frank, and he was still without it after a breathless search through all his pockets.

"I had a note—Miss Holt and my partner are up with the rustlers!" he gasped. "The note was for money—but I guess I tumbled that I was meant to get you—"

"Instead we've got you!" said Frank calmly. "Hike him off to the sheriff, boys—I know that Dick and Miss Marge are still on the range—I saw them go off together—"

"Well, I'll be hanged!" almost shrieked Ben, and with a vicious swing of his hand, he grabbed his own hat and flung it to the ground in the deepest disgust imaginable. "I tell you—why—sure—there's the note!"

He laughed aloud as he saw the note was just exactly where he had put it—in his hat. It had been revealed when his hat struck the ground.

That settled it. Frank considered it sufficient evidence to order out all his cowpunchers and start upon the rescue ride, and in a very short time the range was resounding to the thudding hoofs of thirty armed men. Ben led them on the ride.

Alarm in the Camp.

BEN COLEMAN had made two mistakes.

The first was when, after having won the fight, he did not fix the ropes so that any struggling on Dick's part would choke him. The second was leaving Dick's horse.

For Dick struggled hard enough to loosen the ropes that bound him, and almost at the time that Ben was making a mad search for the note, he had freed himself and was riding desperately to the shack where he had left his rustler companions.

He was white and agitated when he burst into the shack—apprehensive because at last it was known that he had played a dual rôle of ranch under foreman and rustler.

"What's up?" demanded Jim Stone. "They're double-crossers—he lugged me off my horse and tied me up before he set out for the Bar O!" gasped Dick, and pointed urgently out of the door. "We'll have to beat it—they're on their way!"

Jim Stone muttered something under his breath, and swung round viciously towards the other room. But Bob had already heard the news, and he quickly brought further alarm into the camp.

In a split second he had grabbed at and secured a gun from Jim Stone's holster.

"Reach for the skies!" he said tensely. "I'm blowing holes in the first man who pulls his hands down! Get 'em up!"

He waited until the gang had obeyed before he turned peremptorily to Marge Holt.

"Get out of that door, and be ready to shut it when I come out after you!" he said briskly.

"You ain't gonna get away with this, stranger," said Jim Stone between his teeth.

"No?" grated Bob. "Get out, Miss Holt!"

Marge, with one fleeting glance that was curiously a mixture of relief and admiration, obeyed. Bob, keeping his gun handy and his eyes on the gangsters' faces, moved slowly after her.

He was at the door when a sudden, well-aimed bottle sent the gun flying from his grip—and in a flash the men were at him.

The rough, strong men of the plains might have expected an easy victory then. Gun-play was out of the question—there were too many of them, in much too confined a space. Bullets meant for the solitary enemy might easily find a billet in one of the many friends.

Bob fought with fists and feet, leaping from spot to spot, and from bunk to bunk. Once he used the wall as a lever to hurl himself at the whole gang, in the successful effort to send them sprawling on top of one another.

Only one remained steadily upon his feet, and that one collapsed under a terrific uppercut that must have rattled every tooth in his head.

In a flash Bob was at the door, and there a terrific struggle started. Bob wanted the door closed and locked—the others wanted it open.

At last, with a superhuman effort, Bob got the door crashed home, and in a second it was locked.

Bullets were crashing into the lock the moment they darted away.

"Quick—the horses!" gasped Bob. "You ride ahead—towards the ranch! Ben will be bringing the boys O.K.!"

They moved with desperate speed—Bob had the natural feeling that had he been alone he could have got clean away in half the time. But the pace was set by Marge Holt, and he had to keep to that pace.

He used his tongue and leather to urge her horse on the faster the moment they struck the trail for the Bar O ranch.

A glance behind told how the gang had freed themselves and were hot on the trail. And it was not long before shouting voices came to his ears.

"Can you stand all this?" he asked the girl anxiously.

"Sure—all this—and more!" she panted, and dug in her heels fiercely to get speed out of her horse.

But there was no more speed there, and with more than a little alarm, Bob began to realise that they were being caught up.

"You get on and tell the boys to hurry!" he shouted. "I'll stop and give them something to think about!"

"Don't—let them—shoot you!" she shouted, as he swung his horse off the trail and started back the way they had come.

If he could only split the rustlers up a bit, cause them to jerk their mounts to avoid colliding with him, the girl would get a fresh start.

It was an excellent plan, and doubtless it would have worked.

But there came another diversion.

Even as a dozen guns were jerked out of the holsters, there came a terrific fusillade of shots from the right and the left, and the terrified rustlers found themselves between two fires.

Ben had arrived with the Bar O boys!

"Reach—or it's a massacre!" came in Ben's delighted shriek.

The groans of dismay that arose from the rustlers could almost be heard above the thudding hoofs. They were so dismayed they forgot to shoot, and in the split seconds of their hesitation, the Bar O boys had ridden ahead and behind until there was nothing left to do but jerk up and reach for the skies.

Grinning all over his face, Bob looked on and took in the whole situation. Unless he was very much mistaken, Jim Stone and his gang were rustlers no longer.

But there was something else to which he had to attend.

He gave a little whoop of joy, and set his horse galloping madly up the trail, to see Marge Holt coming slowly back. She had heard the fusillade, turned to find the chase ended, and was coming cautiously to see how the fight fared.

She found instead a solitary rider on the trail—and this time her greeting was a smile.

He jerked his horse to a halt, returned her smile, and looked at her with that fascinating glint of mischief in his eyes.

"I was coming back to tell you I wasn't a rustler—and that we'd met before," he explained, a little breathlessly.

"And I was coming back to—to see

"If I was hurt?"

"N-n-no. To say that I am sorry, I slapped your face that night, and that—that if you liked to take one more risk to-day—that I—"

"Marge—I'm sure taking that risk!" he whispered.

She did not slap his face—Ben noticed that as, coming round the bend in the trail, he was just in time to catch the first and the last part of the "risky" act.

He pulled his hat off gently and rubbed his hand through his ruffled hair in the manner of one who finds himself suddenly out of all that's good.

"And now I'll reckon Senator Lansing will agree that Mr. Bob has found the right sort of trouble!" he murmured, watching the pair go slowly along the trail, side by side and hand in hand. "And me with two bosses all because we came Westward Bound!"

(By permission of the British Lion Corporation, Ltd., starring Buffalo Bill, jun., and Allene Ray.)

A GRAND NEW ANNUAL

This fine Annual is packed with gripping film stories, interesting pictures, splendid articles and intimate facts about your favourite film stars.

IT WILL BE ON SALE
SEPTEMBER 1ST,
PRICE 6/- NET.

So make a note of the date and place an order with the newsagent at once and make sure of a copy, otherwise you will be disappointed.

(Continued from page 2.)

when stern maternal justice was meted out to him it was the other Jackie who shed the tears.

Another pal of these two is Donald Haines. He is a ten-year-old freckled youngster who plays the dog-catcher's son in "Skippy." The two Jackies and Donald have been together in a number of pictures, and they hail one another with delight when they meet in a new one.

The real veteran of "Skippy," though, is Payne Johnson. He is the youngest of seven Johnsons, all of whom are film artistes. Payne is only seven months of age, but is a screen "veteran" in the sense that he has been in pictures since he was seventeen days old. Most of his life has been spent in prop. baskets, so that he has not had to exert himself much. But he can talk. So much so, in fact, that he is expected to be one day a second Will Rogers!

Getting His Own Back.

Al Christie tells the following story against himself. He was travelling through the Mojave Desert at a high rate of speed, late one evening, when a siren sounded and a motor-cycle cop stopped him. He asked for his driver's licence, read it, and handed it back.

"Oh, yes, Mr. Christie," beamed the cop, "I know who you are! A lot of us used to work in your comedies in the old days, when you needed cops in the picture."

Al saw his fine disappearing and beamed back. "Yes, indeed," he said, "I have given many a cop a five-dollar bill for an afternoon's work."

The motor-cycle cop drew out his notebook.

"My friends all got jobs with you, Mr. Christie," he said grimly, "but you never would give me a job, though I hung round your studio for days."

And he wrote, "Give this guy the limit" on the ticket, handed it over, and disappeared with a loud bray of his siren.

A Monkey School.

It is reported from Hollywood that Tiffany Film Productions are establishing a school for monkeys! Young chimps who may have aspirations to appear on the screen are compelled to attend, whether they like it or not.

School hours are sandwiched in wherever there are intervals between production scenes, when the monkeys will be taught how to act before the camera. They haven't the chance to play truant, either. A wardrobe department has also been opened, from which they will be given human suits to fit them. Cowboy outfits have just been made for them to appear in "Cinnamon," which will burlesque "Cimarron," you can look out for some roaring fun when these monkeys come on the screen.

"Cloud Lookout"—New Job in Movie Studios.

A new job, created by California's recent "unusual" weather, is that of the cloud look-out.

He is an expert at gauging their direction and speed, and the time the sun will shine between the scurrying clouds.

Paramount sent the company making "The Secret Call" with Richard Arlen

(Continued on page 28.)

August 29th, 1931.

"CLEARING THE RANGE."

(Continued from page 12.)

spurs drove into his pony's flanks relentlessly, till the rowels were smeared in gore, and the creature bounded forward in a terror that vied with his own.

Curt made the crest of the hill and let his horse fall into a long, loping stride. He saw Kildare turn in the saddle once more, and once more the crook's gun began to spit flame and lead.

The slope of the hill had dropped away into a sheer cliff four hundred feet in depth. Along this section of precipice pursuer and pursued were now careering at break-neck pace, Kildare with the horror of the noose goading him to desperation. All the supreme insolence and bravado that had characterised the man while he had been in power had fallen from him like a cloak, leaving him like a hunted animal—though dangerous at that, and with leaden slugs for fangs.

Conversely, Curt Fremont was no longer the despised figure of scorn who had seemed so anxious to avoid danger. He was the stern avenger now, resolved on bringing his brother's slayer to justice.

Kildare emptied his six-shooter and then drew fresh cartridges from his belt. He fumbled with them tremulously and loaded the chambers of his forty-five. This time he made an effort to steady his wrist for accuracy.

He might have effected his murderous purpose, but in the instant that his finger curled around the trigger his horse tripped in a jack-rabbit's scrape.

The brone went down by the head, and Kildare plunged from the saddle with a hoarse cry. The six-gun went off with a crash as it flew from his grasp, but its barrel was levelled at the clouds and the shot sang skyward.

The revolver dropped over the edge of the cliff and tumbled through space towards a muddle of ugly rocks far down. Kildare followed it headlong, but his clutching hands fastened on a clump of scrub growing out from the brink. There was a jerk that almost wrenched his arms from their sockets, and then his heels were dangling in mid-air.

Curt rode up to the spot where the crook had been unhorsed even as Kildare's pony struggled to its feet. The puncher drew rein, and looked down at his brother's slayer with grim, casual disinterest.

Kildare's breath was coming in husky gasps. He knew that if he regained the brink it would only be to face a judge and jury and finish up on the end of a noose. Yet he was sick with fear at the thought of a plunge to those rocks four hundred feet below him.

His hands clenched at the scrub, but he saw it coming away by the roots as the strain dragged it from the surrounding earth. Still Curt Fremont made no move, and the terrified wretch hanging from the cliff-edge squirmed and scrambled frantically, seeking in vain a foothold with his toes.

The roots of the scrub creaked ominously. A sob broke from Kildare's lips, and his upturned, haggard face registered an expression of mute appeal.

Curt leaned forward slowly and took a lariat from the peg on his saddle. Kildare's eyes, watching his every action, lit up with hope, but panic seized him again as he saw Curt juggle with the rawhide carelessly and unhurriedly.

"Fremont!" Kildare groaned. "Fremont—For pity's sake—"

Curt's fingers toyed with the lariat. The roots of the scrub were threatening to give at any moment. Kildare looked down, and his brain reeled as he saw the drop beneath him. In those few seconds of waiting and torture, he seemed to live through an eternity.

The roots of the scrub came asunder. A scream burst from Kildare as he dropped. But in that same moment Curt tossed the lariat deftly, and the noose looped itself around the crook's falling body.

It was wrenched taut, and Kildare was left dangling again, but not for long. Wheeling his brone, Curt cantered a little distance from the cliff's rim, and his captive was dragged to a doubtful safety.

Kildare lay for a spell in a fainting condition. When at length he struggled up his face was a greenish-grey, and his limbs seemed scarcely capable of supporting him. There was not a spark of resistance in the man, and he was whimpering.

"Come on!" said Curt. "The sheriff wants you."

He urged his brone along the cliff-edge at a slow pace, Kildare stumbling after him on the end of a lariat. So they reached the Moran outfit, where Curt cast his prisoner loose and backed him to where Tom Burton was standing.

"Kildare," he said, "the next time you feel a rope around you it won't be mine—and it won't be under your armpits. All right, sheriff," he added to Bellamy, who stood near by with his deputies, "take 'em away!"

South of Amarillo Creek, in the valley where they had come upon the impounded herd of cattle, Dad Moran's four ranch-hands were congratulating themselves on being alive.

"We wouldn't have stood a chance against Kildare's bunch," one of them declared. "If it hadn't been for Curt Fremont we'd be lookin' like a lotta kitchen-colanders by now."

Dad Moran was not with them. He had managed to secure his horse after some difficulty, and was at the moment riding back to his ranch, where he hoped to locate Curt and receive an explanation of several circumstances that puzzled him.

When he reached it Bellamy had gone, together with his deputies, the tell-tale bank ledgers and the two prisoners Kildare and Burton. There was not a human being in sight as Dad Moran stabled his horse and made his way round to the front door of the ranch-house.

But as he entered the dwelling he heard the strains of music. A guitar was responsible for the melody, and, glancing across the living-room, Moran saw Juan Consares standing at the foot of the staircase, strumming a languorous Spanish love-song.

"Hallo, Juan!" said Dad Moran. "Buenos dias, senior!" Juan answered politely. "I hope I find you well."

"Yeah!" the old man told him. "Yeah—I'm all right. Have you seen—Curt Fremont, Juan?"

Juan shook his head. "No, senior," he murmured, his fingers still caressing the strings of the guitar, "I no' see him."

"Have you seen Mary Lou, then?" the old rancher asked.

Again Juan shook his head. "No, I no' see her, either, senior," he said, "but I theeink if you find the one then maybe you will find the other."

"Thanks, Juan!" Dad muttered, and went out of the ranch-house again.

If he had looked behind the tall back of a settee he might have seen the two for whom he had inquired. But Juan had not divulged their presence, for he believed that at the moment two was company, whereas three might have been a crowd.

True, he himself made a third. But then he had his back turned to the fireplace before which the settee had been drawn up—and, after all, how could Romeo woo Juliet without the music of a troubadour?

"But, Curt," Mary Lou was saying softly, "why didn't you tell dad and I what you were doing? Why did you let us go on thinking you were a—coward—when all the time you were risking your life as El Capitan?"

"I told you I didn't want to do anything that would make trouble for you and old dad," Curt reminded her.

Mary stared into the fireplace. "That was thoughtful of you, Curt," she murmured, "but I feel ashamed of myself for believing you were yellow."

Curt slipped his arm around her.

"Mary Lou," he said, "I sorta recollect that this hombre El Capitan once sampled them pretty lips o' yours without seemin' to raise any objections."

"But El Capitan had a way with women," she laughed. And then: "By the way, who was that Mexican girl who rode with him?"

"Her name began with 'Juan,' Curt told her with a grin, "an' it finished with 'Consares.'"

(By permission of the Universal Films, Ltd., starring Hoot Gibson and Sally Eilers.)

"QUICK MILLIONS."

(Continued from page 18.)

at her, Bugs could not help noticing that she seemed out of sorts.

"Not feelin' so good these days, baby?" he inquired.

"What's it to you?" she snappy resentfully.

Bugs regarded her with a calm expression,

August 29th, 1931.

"You know," he mentioned, "you ought to have taken that offer I once made you. A trip to Europe would have done your health a lot of good, too."

His ill-chosen reminder of that first attempt to rid himself of her only served to heap fuel on her anger.

"You don't have to worry about my health!" she said viciously. "I'm not worrying about yours!"

As she spoke she flashed a glance at Nails Markey, who frowned threateningly behind Bugs Raymond's back, and signed to her to keep silent.

But Bugs detected no special significance in her words. He merely reflected that it was natural Daisy should flare up at him. After all, she had been pretty loyal to him, and he had not treated her any too well. Of course, he had been generous to her financially, but she was not the kind of girl who wanted money lavished on her. She was the kind of girl who lost her heart to a man, and was ready to follow him through fire and water. And he, Bugs Raymond, happened to be the man to whom she had been willing to dedicate her whole life.

Bugs drew a little nearer to her, and, taking her hands, spoke to her quietly.

"Don't get all het-up, Daisy," he said. "Maybe I haven't been square with you, but that's just on account of the way things have turned out, and I'm sorry if I've hurt you!"

"You couldn't hurt me!" she retorted fiercely; but there was a catch in her voice that belied the words.

She wanted to hate Bugs Raymond, but she found that she could not. In spite of his treatment towards her he meant everything to her, and suddenly the realisation that he was going to his doom chilled the blood in her veins. As he was about to turn away from her with a shrug of the shoulders, she caught him by the arm.

"Don't go, Bugs!" she pleaded, all the resentment quite gone from her now. "Don't go to that church—"

And again, even more urgently, a world of appeal in her eyes:

"Don't go, Bugs—"

Bugs pursed his lips. He did not know the real reason for this outburst. He believed that she was asking him to abandon his project because she could not bear the idea of him marrying Dorothy Stone.

"Listen, Daisy," he said; "you and I have been good friends, and I was pretty fond of you. I guess I always will be. But we weren't cut out for each other. It was class I wanted, and you didn't have that, Daisy. And then Dorothy— Well, you know how it is when a guy meets a girl that puts him off his grub—a girl he's ready to fight for, and do murder for."

He drew back, and Daisy turned away bitterly. Then one of the boys, standing by the window, gave vent to an exclamation.

"Here's Chuck with the car," he said.

Bugs squared his shoulders. Keen of face, steely of eye, he spoke to the gang with that gaiety of tone which had been characteristic of him in former days, when launching some big coup calculated to extend his power.

"Come on!" he drawled, making for the hall. "We haven't too much time."

Nails and the rest of the gang donned their silk hats, and, en route to the doorway, paraded past the mirror.

They regarded themselves with satisfaction, one or two of them giving their toppers an extra tilt before moving on.

Thus they filed out into the hall, Nails Markey being the last to go, and Daisy de Lisle was left alone in the lounge. Standing there, she heard the front door being opened, and knew that Bugs Raymond was walking forth on his way to eternity. In another moment he would be beyond recall.

She started towards the hall on a sudden frantic impulse.

"Bugs!" she sobbed. "Bugs—"

He heard her as he was stepping out into the corridor, and he glanced at Nails Markey impatiently.

"Aw, you go back and talk to her," he said. "We'll wait for you at the elevator."

Nails turned and retraced his steps across the hall. He met Daisy in the doorway of the lounge, confronting her with an unexpectedness that made her start.

"Oh, Nails!" she whispered.

"Don't worry, baby," he told her with a twisted grin, "we'll take good care of him."

He strode out of the apartment and hurried along the corridor to rejoin Bugs and the other members of the gang at the lift. They entered, and were carried swiftly to the ground floor, where they created some interest as they trooped into the street and entered the limousine that was drawn up at the kerb.

Two of the gang took their positions beside Chuck, the driver. The others packed into the interior, Bugs and Nails occupying the back seat and sinking into the luxurious comfort of its pale grey upholstery.

The car moved forward, and, changing into top gear, Chuck followed a swift-travelling stream of traffic towards the city centre. He was a magnificent driver, for on many an occasion he had had to depend on his skill with the wheel to ensure his liberty, and the limousine made good speed, fairly forging its way between the other vehicles.

The gangsters looked out upon the busy side-walks with casual interest. All seemed perfectly at their ease except Bugs, though it was from no sense of personal danger that he felt uncomfortable. He was more concerned over the success of his intended kidnapping than he had ever been over any racket he had engineered, and now that the moment for action was drawing near he appeared fidgety, chafing at the brief delays which occurred when the red stop-lights on the street-crossings were against Chuck.

Often, too, he glanced at his watch, and he had looked at it six or seven times when the car turned into the street for which Chuck had been told to make.

Peering through the glass partition that separated the interior of the limousine from the chauffeur's seat, Bugs caught sight of the entrance to the church where the marriage was to take place, a church famous for its association with Society weddings.

He saw crowds of smartly-dressed people stepping out of expensive cars and walking along the strip of rich carpet that crossed the sidewalk and passed into the great arched doorway of the chapel.

Nails Markey, sitting close to him with folded arms, slid one hand into an inside pocket and pressed a fistful of blue-black steel against Bugs Raymond's body.

Bugs turned his head and saw that Nails was regarding him with a curious expression.

"Take your elbow out of my ribs," said Bugs.

Nails Markey did not move.

"You fool," he told Bugs deliberately, "that isn't my elbow."

Bugs lowered his eyes. He saw the gun that had been quietly pushed into him, and he knew that he was approaching the end of his career. Somehow he experienced no great shock of surprise. This was what he might have anticipated, and guarded against, if his brain had not been thrown out of gear by a girl who had refused to marry him.

And he certainly experienced no fear. His only sentiment was one of cynical resignation, as he seemed to see the successive incidents of his life pass before him. Newsboy, truck-driver, racketeer, commercial magnate—then back to dust.

With his free hand Nails Markey made a sign to the other gangsters in the interior of the limousine. They reached for the blinds, and drew them down over the windows. A screen was even lowered behind the partition separating the chauffeur's seat.

Three muffled reports rang out as the car was passing the church, and just beyond the building a silk hat was tossed to the sidewalk from the curtained vehicle. It was the silk hat which had belonged to Bugs Raymond, and which would no longer be required.

"Expensive weddings these Society dames have," one of Nails Markey's companions was heard to observe before the limousine door was shut again.

The bride was just arriving, with a bevy of attendants.

"Yeah," came the voice of Nails Markey, "but we hoodlums have swell funerals!"

(By permission of the Fox Film Co., Ltd., starring Spencer Tracy.)

FOUR FINE FILM NOVELS.

"TOO MANY WOMEN."

He was the Don Juan of Paris, and the spell-binder of feminine hearts, but when the one woman came into his life he found the path of true love far from smooth.

"ANNABELLE'S AFFAIRS."

A beautiful, wayward girl married a bearded giant under strange circumstances, and ran away after the ceremony. Several years later they met again, and she did not know him. A farcical tale of a girl who falls in love with her own husband, starring Victor McLaglen and Jeanette MacDonald.

"LA DOUCEUR D'AIMER."

The joy of loving Germaine! But Albert, the dreamer, discovered that it wasn't all joy the lady had a husband and her own peculiar ways. An amusing story, featuring Victor Boucher, the Charlie Chaplin of French films.

"GLAMOUR."

The love-story of a famous actor who sacrificed happiness and played a false rôle to save a woman's good name. Starring Seymour Hicks, Margot Graham, and Ellaline Terriss.

LAURA LA PLANTE and FRANK FAY

"TOO MANY WOMEN."

Don't miss this grand issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

On Sale Wednesday.

Price 2d.
August 29th, 1931.

The News Reel

(Continued from page 25.)

and Peggy Shannon to Cataline Island for several days of location work. The first day the weather was clear; but the next day was hazy, and scenes had to be made "between clouds."

While the sun was obscured the company rehearsed, and a minute before the sun was expected the cloud look-out gave his warning, and announced: "Three minutes of light this time."

The instant the first ray of sun hit the players the cameras started turning, and the players enacted their scene. The company was forced to work two days in this nerve-racking manner, but the required scenes were secured.

Egypt in Elstree.

To be able to plump down some distant part of the world outside one's door would, if practicable, certainly abolish all the expense and fatigue of travel. But so far only producers are able to achieve this magic result.

British International Pictures recently found that Egypt, for example, would do nicely for a location. But why take the company there when all that was needed could be produced at Elstree? So prop men and others set to work, and very soon Port Said appeared on the B. I. P. lot. Then it had to be peopled, not, however, by white artistes made up to look their parts, but by the real racial specimens to be found in that cosmopolitan part of the world.

The telephone wires buzzed with messages to the casting agencies, and within a few hours out of London's teeming millions there were discovered about two hundred men, women and children of the types required. These included Arabs, Turks, Nubians, Greeks, Persians and others.

Amid a babel of tongues that must have been both "Rich and Strange" for the microphone, these people jostled each other in a typically Egyptian street, and sold beads, shawls, baskets and other things in a native bazaar. I have said "Rich and Strange," for this, I may add, is also the name of the picture in which Joan Barry and Percy Marmont have the leads.

World Search for Strange Facts.

It is certain that not all the museums nor all the books of facts there are have yet been able to tell us fully about the many strange things to be found in the world. So John Hix, the cartoonist and originator of the Universal series, "Strange As It Seems," has just started on a voyage of discovery.

He is taking with him a mass of material which he intends to verify, and which has already been insured for over £3,000. He will also gather all the new material he can. There is no doubt that Mr. Hix's job will prove a tremendous one, but the results should prove intensely interesting.

Screening a Menagerie.

Animals, as we know, were much in evidence in silent films, and many a zoo in California was kept busy supplying different specimens of the jungle variety to producers. Then the talkies came and the animals vanished for a time. Since then, however, we have had the Dogville comedies and those depicting trained monkeys, and quite popular, too, have these pictures proved.

Now we are to have something else in the way of these animal comedies. Columbia are producing them, and they will be one-reelers consisting of really laughable pictures in which trained animals will take the place of human actors. There will be a menagerie of these animals on the screen, including lions, tigers, giraffes and the more domestic types, such as dogs and cats.

Buffalo Bill Serial.

Serials, as already mentioned on this page, are coming back into popular favour, and more than one company is at work on them.

Universal is busy with one called

"Fighting With Buffalo Bill," and those of you who have read of his exploits in fiction will be able to follow some of his adventures on the screen. This serial will feature two present favourites. One of these is Johnny Mack Brown, once a prominent footballer in the States, and the other is John Wayne, who made such a hit in "The Big Trail."

Another producing company is giving picturegoers "The Phantom of the West," in which Tom Tyler will appear in ten thrilling episodes.

A Queer Collection.

One of the strangest assortments in America is kept under lock and key in a special compartment of the property warehouse belonging to the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer company.

The assortment consists of several thousands of dollars worth of gambling equipment, firearms and other lethal instruments that are legal for film purposes only, but are otherwise barred by the State of California. For this latter reason the compartment containing these things is always kept locked.

Among the gambling equipment are roulette wheels, loaded dice and several games of chance. In the ordnance line may be found machine-guns, rifles, tear bombs, pistols, swords, rapiers, cutlasses and other weapons banned by the law.

All of them are stored "broken." That is, certain parts from all the weapons are kept elsewhere so that the incomplete weapons would be useless if they were stolen. Then there are also in the collection brass knuckles, burglars' tools, daggers and much else that it would not be wise to leave lying about for anyone to pick up.

Another Air Film.

In the old days of pictures many a thrill was staged on the roof of a train, then the motor-car was put into the chase, and now it is the aeroplane.

"Wings" showed us the daring that men can achieve thousands of feet in the air, and among similar pictures we have had "Hell's Angels" and "The Dawn Patrol." This last-named film was produced by First National, and proved such a big success that the same company are now making another air picture called "Men of the Sky." It deals with spies belonging to the nations engaged in war, and is certain to be packed with thrills. The story has been specially written for the screen.

GROSE'S, LUDGATE CIRCUS, LONDON.

FOOTBALL JERSEYS

All Colours and Designs.

15/- per doz.

British Made.

Send for Illustrated List. Post Free.

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge St., London, E.C.4.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

BE STRONG I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-Control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-.—STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

MY GREAT OFFER

Write for my free Bargain Lists of the best ALL BRITISH cycles. 14 DAYS' APPROVAL. CARRIAGE PAID. Cash price £3 15s. Od., or terms. All accessories FREE. Value 21/-.

2

WEEKLY REPAYMENTS

THE WORLD'S LARGEST CYCLE DEALER. REP 17 COVENTRY.

Edw. O'Brien

BE TALL Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-.. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

STAMMERING, STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars free. FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

BLUSHING, Shyness, "Nervos," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-). Including Almost, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

Printed and published every Tuesday by the Proprietors, The Amalgamated Press, Ltd., The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Advertisement Offices: The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad, 1/- per annum, 5/6 for six months. Sole Agents for Australia and New Zealand: Messrs. Gordon & Gutch, Ltd.; and for South Africa: Central News Agency, Ltd. August 29th, 1931. Registered for transmission to Canada at Magazine Rates. S.G.

Boy's Cinema

"SWEEPSTAKES," "WEST OF CHEYENNE" and "THE SEA GOD."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 612.

EVERY TUESDAY.

SEPTEMBER 5th, 1931.

Heroes of the Flames

Starring
TIM MCCOY

Start this GRIPPING NEW SERIAL To-day

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleeway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Heroes of the Flames."

Bob Darrow, Tim McCoy; June Madison, Marion Shockley; Mrs. Madison, Grace Cunard; Jackie Madison, Bobby Nelson; Dan Mitchell, Gayne Whitman; Trixie Farrell, Beulah Hutton; Pat Heeley, Monte Montague.

"Sweepstakes."

Bud Doyle, Eddie Quillan; Sleepy Jones, James Gleason; Babe Ellis, Marion Nixon; Wally Weber, Lew Cody; Jake, Paul Hurst; Pop Blake, Fred Burton; Baggott, King Baggott; Speed Martin, Billy Sullivan; Al Clancy, Lillian Leighton; The Dude, Mike Donlin.

"West of Cheyenne."

Tom Langdon, Tom Tyler; Bess, Josephine Hill; Kurt Raymer, Harry Woods; Nevada, Robert Walker; Banty, Ben Corbett; Rose, Fern Emmett.

"The Sea God."

Phillip Barker (Pink) Richard Arlen, Daisy, Fay Wray; "Square Deal" McCarthy, Eugene Pallette; Schulz, Robert Gleckler; Pearly Nick, Ivan Simpson; Abe, Bob Perry; Rudy, Maurice Black; Bill, Fred Wallace.

"Too Good to be True!"

The production chief of any motion picture studio has plenty to cope with; but William Le Baron, vice-president in charge of production at Radio Pictures, reports a new one.

Recently Paul Sloane, who is to direct "Consolation Marriage" for Radio Pictures, came to him bearing a worried frown and the scenario of "Consolation Marriage."

"What's the matter with you?" demanded Le Baron.

"I'm worried," said Sloane.

"Why?"

"Well," said the director, "this assignment is too good to be true. The story is great, the script is perfect, the cast is superb. The cameraman is the best I can have, my assistant is a jewel and the sets are gorgeous.

"Anything as perfect as this must have a catch in it somewhere. That's why I'm worried."

No Laughing Required.

A leading lady with no sense of humour is Buster Keaton's ideal, paradoxical as it may seem.

Motion picture stars are often quizzed as to their preferences in regards to the women who play opposite them. Some like them blonde, some

September 5th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S TWO COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

BERT WHEELER and ROBERT WOOLSEY

IN

"CRACKED NUTS."

Wendell bought a revolution, Zap gambled for a crown, and so they both became King of El Dorania—with comic complications. A joyous farce, in which these two quaint comedians are aided and abetted by Dorothy Lee and Edna May Oliver.

"GUN SMOKE."

Eastera gunmen, in the guise of capitalists, come to a western ranch. Within a few weeks the finding of gold starts a war between the gunmen and a band of fearless men of the plains. Starring Richard Arlen and Mary Brian.

ALSO

The second episode of our thrilling new serial of the Fire Brigade, starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

like them dark, some are not content with any but outstanding beauties, others prefer them less dazzling, but Keaton is the first to have expressed a wish for humourless leading ladies.

In explaining the oddity Keaton said:

"Women can't control their laughs if they have a pronounced sense of humour. Consequently you get into a comedy scene, playing it straight, and just at the high point you're liable to hear a giggle. The 'mike' picks it up. You can make a comedy twice as fast if the people with whom you act have no sense of humour at all."

Information is that in choosing the featured feminine players for his latest Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer comedy, "Romco in Pyjamas," Keaton put applicants through a "straight face" test in which only those passed who refrained from laughing at his funniest antics.

Taking a Camera Up and Down Stairs.

"Walking" a sound camera up and down a flight of stairs is the difficult task achieved by Edgar Selwyn and his technical crew when "Men Call It Love" was filmed at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studio.

In the most dramatic scenes of the picture Leila Hyams is shown walking upstairs, opening a door and then retracing her steps when she discovers her husband in the arms of another woman.

Securing a hydraulic camera elevator-perambulator, Selwyn devised the filming so that the camera kept Miss Hyams in continuous focus, following her step by step upstairs to the door and reversing the process as she walked down the flight again to the hallway where the action started.

With the rise and fall of the camera, as well as its forward and backward progress, Selwyn arranged to have the microphone placed on a travelling boom that kept just out of camera range, but caught every footfall as the actress went through the dramatic scene.

A Scotch Terrier Joins the Dramatic Critics.

Although few people are aware of the fact, Joe E. Brown, the "Clown Prince" of the screen, often holds a private rehearsal of his funny business before it is recorded upon the celluloid. And his audience consists of one solitary admirer—his dog Sandy.

Sandy is a Scotch terrier, and within the privacy of the Brown household Sandy witnesses his master doing a variety of queer things. As Joe declares:

"It is really remarkable how sensitive Sandy is. When I read lines to him I instantly know how good or how bad I am. If he sits up and cocks an ear I know he is mildly interested. If he barks he is amused. If he yelps and scampers round the room I know I am going over big.

"If I am doing a love scene, and he licks my hand, I am sure I am well on the way to becoming the world's worst lover, while if it's a fight, and he goes to his corner and lies down, I throw out my chest and feel like a second Dempsey!"

Joe E. Brown's latest picture is "Going Wild." In this important comedy the star is seen as a pseudo aviator, and many of the scenes present him doing the whole gamut of flying stunts.

He is supported by Ona Munson, Lawrence Gray, Laura Lee and other popular players.

Runaway Horse in Film Studio.

A film star's knowledge and understanding of horses averted what might have been a serious accident during the production of "Carwen," which is being directed by Cecil Lewis for

(Continued on page 29.)

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. Don't miss the opening episode of this grand new serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama. Starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

"HEROES of the FLAMES"

Fire Bell!

EPISODE 1.

"THE RED PERIL."

A CROWD was gathering in Stockton Street, San Francisco. Passers-by swelled its numbers, their upturned faces registering interest and concern as they gazed at the top-story windows of a skyscraper building.

From the main entrance of the block of offices men and girls were hurrying fearfully, and the reason for their haste was patent. An enemy of mankind had reared its sinister head—the enemy fire! It flickered luridly at the summit of the building, and obscured the blue skyline with lowering masses of smoke.

A police officer was hastening to the nearest alarm-box, and soon the watching crowds would thrill to the brazen clangour of fire-bells, to the spectacle of scarlet monsters hurtling imperiously through the street, to the flash of helmets plunging into a deadly chaos of flame as stalwarts in blue risked life and limb at the call of duty.

As yet, however, no call had reached the station of District Number Five, San Francisco Fire-fighting Force.

Bob Darrow was on the staff there, a tall, well-built young fellow in the early twenties, with a pair of level grey eyes that had many times met danger unflinchingly.

Son of British parents who had emigrated to the Pacific Coast in his childhood, Bob was not an ex-sailor, like most of his comrades in the brigade, and during his first six months of ladder drill had had to conquer a normal aversion to heights. Grit and determination had triumphed over the handicap, and now none was more agile than he on the lofty escapes, and none more eager to lead the way into the heart of a raging inferno.

But Bob Darrow's resolve to enlist in the fire brigade was not merely the outcome of a desire for excitement. Of an inventive turn of mind, he had for some time been working on a flame-fighting process calculated to extinguish a fire almost instantaneously, and it was primarily for the purpose of perfecting his invention that he had embarked on his perilous career.

Bob was in the dormitory reading a book on science when the startling peal of the alarm bell interrupted his studies. In a moment he was on his feet, and simultaneously the whole station became a hive of activity as men rushed to their posts.

Bob sprang to one of the polished pillars that led to the engine-room, and slid to the ground-level with the burly form of another fireman piled up on his shoulders—a worthy by the name of Pat Heeley.

Three minutes was the time allowed for the men of the brigade to take their positions and drive out on to the street, and delays were penalised by fines. There was no record of any fine ever having been levied on a single member of the staff at Number Five Station, for within two and a half minutes of the first call the fire-wagons were invariably on their way.

"Stockton Street!" rose the cry, and a few seconds later the engines were roaring through the city in full career, heading south towards the district where the fire had broken out.

Not far from Stockton Street, in a fashionable shopping quarter, a well-dressed woman emerged from a large store and crossed the sidewalk to where a limousine was standing. A chauffeur was in the driving-seat, while the back of the car was occupied by a boy six or seven years of age.

"Oh, Watkins," the woman said to her chauffeur, "I've made some rather cumbersome purchases in the store. I wonder if you'd mind helping to carry some of them out."

"Certainly, madam," the chauffeur answered, descending from the car, and the woman turned to the small boy in the back of the vehicle.

"Jackie," she told him, "you stay right here. Remember, don't go away."

"All right, mother," the boy promised, and, accompanied by her chauffeur, the woman went back into the store.

She had not long been gone when, above the noise of traffic, the boy in the car heard the clamour of fire-bells. He immediately started to his feet and opened the auto's door to jump down into the street, his eyes kindling with excitement.

He didn't intend to move far from the limousine, but he began to edge his way through a throng of pedestrians crossing the road. The sound of the fire-bells drew nearer, changing abruptly in a thoroughfare that ran at right-angles to the one in which the

HELP THE NEWSAGENT.

Have you ever thought how difficult it is for a newsagent to order just the right number of copies of any particular paper each week? You can make his task much easier if you place a regular order with him. You will not only help him to order correctly and avoid waste, but will make sure of getting your copy regularly each week.

boy's mother was shopping. He wriggled between the steady stream of people in the hope of catching a glimpse of the engines as they dashed across the junction of the two streets, about fifty yards away.

But the fire-wagons did not cross the junction. Instead, they skidded round the corner into the thoroughfare where the boy had been left by his mother.

There was a sudden rush on the part of the crowd with which the little fellow had mingled.

"Look out!" someone yelled. "The wagons are headed this way!"

The mob stampeded for the sidewalks blindly. The boy was caught up in that helter-skelter charge, and screamed out in fear as he was swept off his feet and hustled fairly into the middle of the road.

He tripped and fell. Men and women stumbled over him, trampled him in their dash to the pavements, and only when the crowds had gained the kerb was he seen, a small, still form lying half-insensible in the street.

It was at that same moment that his mother reappeared from the store with the chauffeur. She caught sight of the boy, and, with a stab of terror, saw Number One engine of the district fire-fighting force bearing down on him at full speed. A shriek escaped her, and she started forward involuntarily, but her chauffeur dropped the parcels he was carrying and seized her by the arm.

"It would be suicide, ma'am!" he panted. "Nothing can save him!"

Cries of horror were rising from those who stood near by, and women were turning away their faces. But the mother of the boy who lay in the middle of the road did not hide her eyes. For seconds that seemed drawn out into an eternity she stared at her child with agony written on her countenance.

The boy seemed doomed. Private cars and commercial vehicles, the normal traffic of the street, had drawn in towards the gutters. A narrow lane was left for the fire-engines, a lane from which it was impossible to swerve and avoid the child. Nor was there any hope of being able to pull up in time.

The driver of Number One engine saw the boy the moment the crowd broke and scattered, and hand and foot travelled to the brakes. He crammed them on with all his force, and the wheels locked, the massive tyres squealing on the smooth surface of the road. But with its speed only slightly checked the big red juggernaut swept on, bearing down relentlessly on that small figure in its track.

The driver's face had turned an ashen colour when a figure scrambled past him and clambered on to the fire-engine's bonnet. It was the figure of Poh Darrow.

"Keep those brakes on!" Bob yelled, and, pulling himself forward feverishly, he gained the radiator and slid his legs over the front of it to plant his feet on the heavy bumper-rod protecting the wings.

The engine was hurtling onward, and the boy sprawled in its path was almost under its mighty wheels now. Held spellbound, with mingled horror and suspense in their gaze, the civilians on the sidewalks watched with bated breath.

Bob Darrow stooped, his arms reaching downward, his hands almost grazing the surface of the road. All at once they clenched—clenched upon the small hurdle of humanity lying in the track of the engine, and snatched him from what had seemed certain doom.

With the boy in his arms Bob struggled back to the driving-seat of the fire-wagon, and, the colour stealing into his face again, the motorman released the brakes and drove on. There was no question of stopping to ascertain who was in charge of the little fellow. The blaze in Stockton Street was once again the circumstance of paramount importance.

The rescued boy did not take long to recover from his terrifying experience, and, with Bob's strong arm around him, he was enjoying himself hugely by the time that the scene of the fire was reached. For this ride with the men of the Brigade in a dash to a burning building was something that he had never visualised even in dreams.

The farthest end of Stockton Street was obliterated in a haze of smoke that was pouring in dense volumes from a block of offices, and the moment the engines and tenders reached that point Bob sprang from Number One fire-wagon and lifted down the boy he had rescued.

He handed him over to one of a cordon of policemen who were holding back a large crowd.

"Take charge of this boy, officer, will you?" he said. "He nearly got run over by us on our way here."

The cop nodded, and Bob wheeled towards the blazing building. Already the hoses were being run out and the fire-escapes raised to the upper windows, and soon men were scaling the rungs while immense jets of water played upon the flames.

"Good work, Darrow," Bob's captain complimented, as the young fireman was passing him. "That boy's parents are certainly indebted to you, whoever they are."

"Not at all, sir," Bob answered cheerfully. "I guess it's all in the day's work, sir."

The Day's Work.

THE crowds which had witnessed the boy's rescue by Bob Darrow had heaved a sigh of relief as they had seen the young fireman carrying the child back to the driving-seat. But their relief was nothing compared to the joy of the mother as she realised her youngster had been plucked out of danger.

She was too overwhelmed with emotion to stir at first, and then she began to run blindly along the street in the direction which the fire-wagons had taken.

By the time she reached the scene of the blaze the firemen were already at work, and above the heads of a mob of people she could see the hose-jets playing on the building, and dark figures climbing the escapes into swirls of smoke that were shot with tongues of flame.

She pushed her way through the throng and gained the front rank of the onlookers to stumble against a burly officer.

"Keep back, lady!" the policeman jerked, but at that moment she saw her son standing beside the officer into whose care Bob Darrow had delivered him, and she pushed past and ran to the boy.

"Jackie!" she sobbed. "Oh, Jackie, thank Heaven you're safe!"

The boy turned round. His face was flushed with excitement.

"Gee, mother!" he cried. "I had a ride on one of the engines!"

The officer who was holding his hand spoke grimly:

"I understand he was almost under that engine, lady," he declared, "and the kid just told me he'd have been run over but for the young fireman who asked me to take care of him."

"That's right, mother," the boy put in. "He pulled me right from under the fire-engine's wheels! There he goes!" he added shrilly. "Look, up on that escape. Gee, he's a great guy!"

The mother followed the direction of his pointing finger, and saw an indistinct figure in the haze of smoke, a lithe, stalwart figure in the blue uniform and massive helmet of the brigade.

"Officer," the woman said to the policeman, "do you know that young man's name?"

"No, ma'am," was the answer. "But I dare say you could find out if you made inquiries at the station."

"I will," the woman told him fervently. "I'll ask my husband to get in touch with him as soon as possible."

She took her youngster by the hand and edged her way through the crowd again, to find that her chauffeur had driven the car to Stockton Street and was waiting for her on the outskirts of the mob. A minute or two later she was on her way home.

Meanwhile Bob Darrow had smashed his way through one of the windows of the burning building and was hoisting the senseless form of a girl over his shoulder. He carried his inert burden back to the fire-escape, and, descending rung by rung, regained the street, where the girl was placed with other casualties in a hospital ambulance.

She was the last of a number of people who had been trapped on the top floor, but with the building vacated, the work of the firemen was by no means at an end, for their duty was to see that the blaze did not spread, and that the least possible damage was done to the property imperilled.

The powerful jets of water hurled into the block of offices soon overcame the flames, though not before the top story was a dripping ruin, and at length the firemen returned to their quarters.

Bob washed and changed, and then, having disposed of his fire-fighting equipment, made his way to the battalion chief's office.

"Hallo, Darrow!" the captain said genially, as the young fireman appeared before his desk. "You did some fine work to-day, and I'd like you to know that I feel proud to be in command of fellows like you."

"Thank you, sir," Bob returned. "I can only say I'm glad you find me a satisfactory member of the Force."

"You're all that," the captain told him with a smile. "But did you want to see me about anything in particular, Darrow?"

Bob nodded.

"Yes, sir," he said. "I wanted to see you about that fire-extinguisher I'm working on in my spare time. You were good enough to offer me an introduction to Mr. Madison, of the Madison Chemical Company, sir, and I wondered if you had done anything further in the matter. I'm very anxious to interest someone like him in my invention, sir," he added.

"Quite," the captain agreed. "And Madison is as useful a man as you could possibly get hold of. His laboratories turn out an equipment that's employed as a precautionary safeguard in seventy-five per cent of the offices in this city. As a matter of fact, I mentioned your name to him last night, when I was at his home."

"Did he say he'd see me, sir?" Bob asked eagerly.

"Yes," the captain rejoined, "any time you cared to call at his office in Fifth Street. Mind you, Darrow, I wouldn't bank too much on that interview. He seemed rather sceptical about the whole thing, and I think he agreed to give you some of his time mainly as a personal favour to me. Of course, not being a chemist, I couldn't tell him very much about your invention."

Bob fumbled with his cap. "I guess I could interest him if I could see him, sir," he said confidently. "Would it be possible for me to take some time off this afternoon?"

"Certainly," the station chief told him, and, hurrying back to his quarters, Bob changed into "civvies" and took a street-car to Fifth Street.

He had provided himself with the address of the Madison Chemical Company, which occupied an entire floor in a skyscraper building not far from the Plaza, and within half an hour of leaving the station a lift was carrying him towards James Madison's office.

The Interview.

SHORTLY before Bob Darrow's departure from the station, James Madison had received a visitor in the shape of Dan Mitchell, a friend of the family.

Dan Mitchell was a tall man of about thirty years of age, dark, sallow of complexion and handsome, though a keen judge of character might have taken exception to the shiftiness of his eyes and the slightly sardonic expression that too often played around his thin-lipped mouth.

He was supposedly of independent means, though where those means had come from no one was very certain. James Madison liked him, and had a great deal of faith in his friendship, yet there were times when he reflected—unsuspectingly enough—that he knew very little of his private affairs. It would have undoubtedly come as a shock to him to learn that one of Dan Mitchell's sources of income was a notorious night club in the city, and that this was perhaps the least shady of the enterprises in which he was involved.

"Of course," Mitchell was saying. "I want you to understand that I have no particular interest in this extinguisher I've mentioned to you. But this acquaintance of mine asked me to put it up to you."

James Madison leaned back in his swivel chair. He was a well-preserved man in the fifties, with iron-grey hair and a strong, shrewd face.

"He's not a young fellow by the name of Darrow, is he?" he inquired. "Because, if so, Captain Wilson mentioned him to me last night. I agreed to see him as a personal favour to Wilson, but I'm not anticipating that the interview will come to anything. If I were to show you the pile of correspondence I receive every week from amateur inventors, Dan, you'd feel sorry for me. There has never yet been a perfect fire-extinguisher, and at some time or other every scientist or pseudo-scientist tries to establish one."

Mitchell pursed his lips. He had not admitted that he was intensely interested in the particular extinguisher that he had mentioned. It had not suited his purpose to do so. But he had high hopes of effecting a deal with Madison and selling him the invention at a considerable profit to himself.

"No," he drawled, "Darrow isn't the name, Madison. This extinguisher I've been telling you about isn't the fool notion of some ignorant fireman. How does it strike you, anyhow, from the little I've said about it?"

"To be frank," Madison answered, "it doesn't sound practicable to me." And he proceeded to enter into a number of technical details that were actually beyond Mitchell's grasp.

"At least, it wouldn't do any harm to follow up the matter," Mitchell urged. "Supposing you try it out—"

"My dear Dan," Madison interrupted. "I'm a busy man, and I haven't the time to waste in trying out other people's theories unless they sound pretty good."

Mitchell shrugged. "Well, I thought I'd suggest it to you," he observed, "and I feel you may be letting a good thing slip through your fingers. As I say, I've no interest in the idea, except that it's been evolved by an acquaintance of mine—"

He was interrupted by the appearance of Madison's secretary, and lapsed into silence as the older man glanced at his employee inquiringly.

"A Mr. Robert Darrow to see you, sir," the girl announced.

"Oh, yes," said Madison. "show him in." Then, to Mitchell: "Our friend the fireman," he added with a smile.

Bob entered the room a moment later. "I believe the captain mentioned me to you, Mr. Madison," he began, as he shook hands.

"He did," Madison rejoined, "and he also mentioned that you had an idea for a fire-extinguisher. Oh, by the way, let me present Mr. Mitchell. You can talk in front of him. He's a very close friend of mine."

Bob held out his fist, but Mitchell somewhat pointedly ignored it, merely inclining his head in a way that struck Bob as supercilious. He resented, too, the air of condescension that the man implied by the movement, and, letting his hand fall to his side, he turned to Madison again.

"On the face of it, sir," he said, "this invention of mine might sound sort of startling—almost wild. It's an explosive, Mr. Madison—"

"An explosive?" Madison exclaimed, and exchanged a glance with Dan Mitchell.

"Yes," Bob continued, "but it is quite harmless as regards human life or property. It is a chemical contained in a glass bulb, very much like a bomb, and in the moment of impact the bulb bursts and allows the air to combine with the liquid it contains. The effect is an instantaneous evaporation followed by an explosion which extinguishes flame as quickly as your fingers can snuff a candle."

Madison pursed his lips. Had Bob, but known it, that pursing of the lips was a sign that he was by no means impressed.

In fact, Madison was inclined to be amused at the moment.

"I see," he murmured, and, only because he wished to deal gently with this subordinate of his friend Wilson, he began to ask one or two scientific questions concerning the process of Bob's invention.

While Mitchell stood in the background superciliously, Bob produced a rough formula of his fire-fighting process and attempted to explain it.

"Of course," he said, "I haven't much scope for carrying out experiments, and I don't claim that my idea has reached perfection. But I believe that it would, sir, if it could go through a series of tests in your laboratories."

Madison stood up. "Young man," he declared, "I hate to disappoint you, but I'm afraid I haven't much faith in it."

Bob's face fell. "Perhaps I haven't made it quite clear, Mr. Madison—"

"Oh, I think I understand it perfectly," Madison interrupted. "But I doubt if it would be of practical use."

"That's right, mother," the boy put in. "He pulled me right from under the fire-engine's wheels. There he goes," he added shrilly. "Look, up on that escape!"

and I am afraid the staff in my laboratories is too busy with other research work to devote time to it. I'm sorry, Darrow."

Bob drew back, and made a brave show of concealing his disappointment.

"That's all right, Mr. Madison," he said. "I'm sorry to have wasted some of your time."

He made his way from the office and took the lift to the ground floor. As he stepped out on to the pavement a car drew up outside the entrance to the building, and a fashionably dressed girl climbed out of it.

Bob touched her on the arm as she was passing, and lifted his hat politely.

"Excuse me, miss," he told her, "but you can't leave that car there."

The girl looked at him, in amazement at first, and then in indignation.

"Who says I can't?" she demanded.

"I do," Bob answered. "You see, there happens to be a fire-hydrant just where you've parked it, and if there were an outbreak here the brigade would have to have your car shifted, which would mean a certain amount of delay."

The girl's expression was chilling.

"I'll leave my car where I please," she said defiantly. "And you can't make me shift it."

"Perhaps I can't, miss," Bob admitted, "but I can call the attention of that cop over there, and get him to make you shift it."

The girl bit her lip, realising that she must sooner or later acquiesce. With an angry glance at Bob she turned on her heel, marched back to her car and drove it a few yards along the street to an authorised parking-place. Then she returned to the spot where the young fireman was standing.

"Now I hope you're satisfied," she said bitterly.

"Perfectly," Bob told her, and grinned as she brushed past him in a passion.

The Madison Laboratory.

THE wilful young miss who had been involved in the altercation with Bob on the sidewalk took the lift to the floor occupied by the Madison Chemical Company.

"Is my father in?" she asked of James Madison's secretary.

"Yes, Miss Madison," was the reply. "Mr. Mitchell is with him just now."

Not for a moment had Bob Darrow dreamed that the girl he had met outside the building was June Madison, daughter of the man on whom he had just called. Nor would it have made the slightest difference to him had he been aware of the relationship. As it was, Bob had already half-forgotten the incident, his mind drifting back to the disappointing result of his interview with the well-known scientist.

June Madison had not forgotten the incident, however, and as she entered her father's office her pretty face still held traces of annoyance.

"Hallo, my dear," Madison exclaimed as his daughter came into the room, and the greeting was echoed in suave tones by Dan Mitchell. For apart from more material ambitions, Mitchell had long nursed the hope that June would come to regard him in the light of a suitor.

"Hallo, daddy; hallo, Dan," June returned. "I happened to be calling in at the building to keep an appointment with Monsieur Henri, the beauty specialist on the top floor, and I thought I'd just step out of the lift and see you for a moment."

"Speaking for myself," drawled Mitchell, "I can assure you, June, that it is a most unlooked-for pleasure."

September 5th, 1931.

"Thanks, Dan," the girl answered, and, still dwelling on her encounter with Bob Darrow: "It's a pity everybody couldn't be so charming as you."

"Who could be anything else but charming to you, June?" Mitchell said. June pursed her lips.

"Well, I've just been insulted by one of your sex," she declared. "He told me to move my car clear of a fire-hydrant outside the main entrance, and threatened to call a policeman when I showed resentment."

Her father looked at her doubtfully. "Clear of a fire-hydrant, eh?" he mused. "Well, you know, June, that wasn't quite the place to leave your car, and I dare say the fellow was acting with the best of intentions."

"Right or wrong," put in Mitchell, with a great show of loyalty, "he must have been pretty insolent about the affair. I can quite understand you feeling upset, June."

June could not really admit that the young fireman's manner had been insolent, so changed the subject.

"What I really came in for, daddy," she said, "was a little money. I've just been doing a lot of shopping, and I've spent every cent I had."

Her father laughed good-naturedly and, taking a wad of notes from his wallet, peeled off several of them and handed them to her.

"Thanks, daddy," she said, kissing him, and then left the office to resume her journey to the top floor.

She had not long been gone when the telephone bell rang, and James Madison picked up the receiver and heard the voice of his wife. It sounded peculiarly agitated, and he soon learned the reason why.

"What's that you say?" Mitchell heard him ejaculate. "Jackie—A fire-engine—Jackie nearly run over! Good heavens! Is he hurt?"

"No," came the reply, "thanks to a fireman who climbed down to the front of the engine, he's safe and sound. I brought him home at once, and he doesn't even seem to be shaken up. But listen, Jim, I want you to get in touch with Captain Wilson and find out the name of the man who rescued Jackie. We owe him a debt we can never repay."

"We certainly do," Madison agreed fervently. "But so far as it's possible we will repay it, my dear. I'll make a special point of getting in touch with Wilson this evening."

He hung up, and repeated to Mitchell his wife's conversation over the phone, Mitchell expressing concern as it was related to him.

"I'll see Wilson personally," Madison added. "Yes, as soon as I'm through at the office here I'll see him personally. Dan, will you excuse me? There's rather an important experiment being carried out in the laboratory this afternoon, and I asked them to hold it up so that I could be present at it."

"I guess I'll have to be running along, anyhow," Mitchell told him. "Got some business to attend to down-town."

He took up his hat and cane and said "good-bye," and almost immediately after his departure Madison's secretary appeared again.

"The head chemist just rang through from the laboratory to say he is ready to begin with the experiment, sir," she informed her employer.

"I'll be right along," Madison answered, and, passing through the offices of the clerical staff, he walked the length of an intervening corridor and entered the laboratory, where the atmosphere was heavy-laden with the smell of chemicals.

The head chemist and one or two assistants were gathered at a bench on which some scientific apparatus had been arranged. Madison entered into some technical conversation with the analysts, and then stood by while a bunsen-burner was placed under a retort containing a yellowish liquid.

The flame from the gas-jet had been playing on the glass only for a few seconds when, with an unexpectedness that took the onlookers completely by surprise, the contents of the retort exploded with a deafening report and a blinding flash of flame.

The apparatus was shattered to a thousand fragments, and Madison and his employees sprang back, several of them burned about the face and hands, and one or two of them cut by the flying particles of glass. But these were the least disastrous effects of the explosion, for certain inflammable chemicals close by immediately took fire, and almost instantaneously the entire bench was blazing furiously.

Madison and the chief chemist rushed forward in a vain attempt to quench the flames, but in the space of a few seconds they realised the futility of their efforts, and the personal risk they ran in persisting with them. For with alarming rapidity the fire gained a hold on the floor, and on the neighbouring benches.

Amongst the innumerable bottles on the shelves above the benches there were many deadly ingredients that were fuel for the fire, and, in an eventuality like this, weapons of death and destruction.

Two of them burst not far from Madison's head, and, with a hoarse cry, the chief chemist dragged his employer in the direction of the door, for which the assistants were already making.

"We've got to get out of here, sir!" he shouted. "In another ten seconds we'll be trapped, with the whole lab. ablaze around us."

He was right, for the flames were working round in a dual column towards the only way of escape, threatening to imprison Madison and his chief chemist within a raging, lurid wall extending from floor to ceiling.

The two men blundered after the fleeing assistants, darting between the benches that filled the long room. They reached the door as evil tongues of flame were coiling out to blister them and singe their clothes, and their last impression was of a fierce inferno at their heels.

Once clear of immediate peril, however, Madison's thoughts were not concerned with his own safety, but with the safety of the clerical staff, as yet unaware of the outbreak.

The clerks were warned, and abandoned their desks to throng corridors and stairs. By the time they had evacuated the eighth floor the alarm had spread, and occupants from the other stories began to march out of the building.

There was no panic, and, though there were white faces in plenty, there was not a single case of hysteria, even among the girls.

The personnel of the various companies occupying the block trooped into the street and mingled with the crowds of passers-by, who had seen the flames raging first of all in the laboratory windows, and now, watched them spreading to those on the other floors.

"This is goin' to be one o' the worst fires you ever saw," someone in the crowd was heard to say. "The chemicals in the Madison laboratory have given it a roaring start, and the whole buildin' will be a mass o' flame before it's many minutes older."

"Sure, the brigade's gonna have a tough time gettin' this blaze under. Look at them ugly red an' yellow tongues climbin' up the windows. They'll eat their way through floor after floor."

"It's lucky everybody's out."

The Snare of the Flames.

THE beauty parlour of "Monsieur Henri" was an isolated establishment on the top floor, where many of the suites had not been rented. Consequently, during the precious minutes in which the other stories were being evacuated, Monsieur Henri and his fair client remained ignorant of their peril.

In that lofty room no suspicion of the fire reached them for some time, nor did the clamour of the crowds in the street far below attract their attention, for it was merged in the distant rumble of the city's traffic.

June had called by appointment to have her hair trimmed, and, his skillful hands busy with the clippers, Monsieur Henri kept up the usual trivial conversation that he employed while attending to his wealthy customers.

He was a dapper man who had been born in Brooklyn, and his knowledge of France was confined to the perfumes imported from that country. But he had thought it good business to assume a foreign name and affect a slight accent.

"I think my hair could do with a wave, too," June said presently, breaking in on him as he was discussing the weather.

"Certainly, madame," the beauty specialist rejoined, and, heating a pair of curling-tongs, he set to work.

He was putting the finishing touches to her hair, when June raised her head and sniffed at the air concernedly.

"There's a smell of burning," she murmured. "You're not singeing my hair, are you?"

"But no, madame," Monsieur Henri protested. "I am certainly not singeing your hair."

June continued to sniff at the air doubtfully. She was not satisfied with the beauty specialist's assurance. She was quite positive, at any rate, that something was burning.

"Are you sure you haven't overheated those tongs?" she persisted.

Monsieur Henri exchanged a glance with her in the mirror before which she was sitting. His expression was mildly indignant and somewhat reproachful.

"Madame," he said, "you do me an injustice. You have surely forgotten that I am an artist in my profession—one of the most highly patronised in all San Francisco. The best people in Society come to me."

"I'm sorry, M'sieur Henri!" June apologised, slightly amused by his tone. "But I really did think that something was burning."

Monsieur Henri accepted that apology and was about to resume work with the tongs when he, too, detected what June's more sensitive nostrils had already traced. He paused and looked round dubiously.

"Madame," he declared, "there is a smell of fire, but there is nothing here that could be burning."

He laid aside the tongs and went to the door. June saw him open it and step out into the corridor.

Monsieur Henri walked towards the lift-shaft and the staircase-well. As he approached it he was startled to see formidable volumes of smoke rising, and he moved on at a more hesitant pace. Then, as he reached the top of the stairs, he felt a blast of heat, and, to his horror, he found himself looking down into a writhing mass of flame.

He was dumbfounded for the instant, but a sudden instinct of panic sent him running back to his beauty salon.

"The whole building's ablaze!" he squealed. "Run for it! There's not a second to lose!"

He wheeled again to dash along the corridor, and with that June sprang to her feet. Her lovely face had paled, and her eyes were filled with terror.

"Don't leave me!" she cried. "I—"

But Monsieur Henri was thinking of his own skin now.

"It's everyone for himself," he shrilled, and, pulling his coat over his head, he sped to the staircase and plunged through the inferno.

June ran after him, gained the head of the stairs, and stumbled down towards the next floor. But as the cruel tongues of fire wrapped about her slender form she recoiled with a sob of mingled pain and despair. Her flimsier clothes could not protect her from the flames even for an instant, and she knew that she could never fight her way clear.

A wave of smoke rolled over her. It tortured her throat and lungs, and she was racked with a fit of coughing. She retreated step by step, till all at once she found herself back on the threshold of the beauty parlour. With a piteous little moan she stumbled into the room and slammed the door.

A whiff of smoke lingered about the salon. She seemed to hear the roar of the blaze that had been climbing relentlessly up the stairs to envelop the top floor as it had enveloped the others.

June tottered to the window and flung up the sash. As she looked down she saw the masses of people in the street, and she screamed frantically for help. Whether her cries reached them she could not tell, but suddenly someone caught sight of her, and next moment hundreds of faces were uplifted towards her.

"Look, up at the top floor window," rose the cry. "There's a girl there."

It was a cry that caused James Malison to raise his glance. Standing among those who had escaped from the premises he saw the head and shoulders of the girl who had been trapped by the flames, and a hoarse shout broke from his lips.

"It's my daughter!" he jerked, and with an impetuous rush he made for the entrance to the building, whence the smoke was pouring in dense, suffocating volumes.

Before he could reach the entrance three or four members of his own staff seized him.

Bob produced a rough formula of his fire-fighting process and attempted to explain it.

"You can't go in here, Mr. Madison! It's certain death!"

Madison struggled like a man bereft of his senses. To his ears there came a faint echo of June's voice, appealing frenziedly for help, and at the sound he fought more furiously to escape those who held him. But he could not break free.

[The Death Plunge.]

FOLLOWING his encounter with June Madison Bob Darrow returned without delay to the station, and as he was passing Captain Wilson's desk the battalion chief hailed him.

"Hallo, there, Darrow!" he said. "Did you see Madison?"

Bob nodded gloomily.

"Yes, sir," he answered; "but I'm afraid he wasn't interested. I guess I'm not much good at talking, and he didn't seem impressed."

"That's too bad, Darrow," the captain murmured, with genuine sympathy. "I'm mighty sorry to hear it."

"Oh, I haven't given up hope, sir," Bob declared. "It was a pretty big disappointment to me; but I've got faith in my invention, sir, and there are plenty of other firms besides the Madison Chemical—"

The phone bell on the chief's desk rang before he could complete the sentence, and Wilson picked up the receiver. Next moment his face registered an expression of consternation, and, as he hung up, Bob looked at him inquiringly.

"Fire call," the captain said. "It's the Madison Chemical Company!"

In the space of a few seconds the alarm-bell was tolling out through the station, and the firemen were sliding down the polished pillars to the engine-room. Bob dashed to his quarters for his equipment, and within the regulation three minutes he was at his post on No. 1 wagon, his helmet on his head, his respirator handy and his axe in the leather bucket that he wore on his hip.

The big engines and the escapes storied out of the station and swung to the right, crowds on the sidewalks pausing to watch them as they surged past clamorously.

On this, the second call of a fateful day, no circumstance delayed the firemen in their rush to the scene of conflagration, and without event the fire-wagons hurtled into Fifth Street and skidded to a standstill outside the doomed building.

A strong force of police had been drafted to the thoroughfare, and had packed the crowd towards the far end of it. But Madison still remained near the entrance, striving to break the hold of those who had grasped him.

The fire-hoses were already being trained on the block of offices when Captain Wilson reached the spot where Madison was fighting to free himself, and as he approached he heard the scientist's voice raised in a fierce protest.

"Let me go! I've got to get to her! My little girl!"

Then he saw the captain, and:

"Wilson," he groaned, "make them let me go! Look—up at that window on the top floor! It's June who's there! She's calling for help! I'm going back for her!"

"You can't do that, Madison," Wilson answered. "You'd be overcome by that smoke long before you could reach her. September 5th, 1931.

It's the brigade's job to save human life—if it's possible."

"If it's possible!" Madison cried. "I'll take that chance if they'll let me go—"

He began to struggle again, and in the midst of his struggles he saw June make a last piteous gesture of appeal and then sink down view in a dead faint. Even as she disappeared a cloud of smoke rolled through the window where she had been standing, and a grim coil of fire snaked out with it.

Madison uttered a low moan, and suddenly becoming limp and submissive in the hands of those who gripped him, he sank to his knees.

Captain Wilson was on the point of turning away to give instructions to the men under his command when Bob Darrow came running from the vicinity of engine No. 1.

"There seems to be someone trapped up on the top floor, captain," he panted. "I just got a glimpse of her a moment ago, and then she fainted."

"Yes, Darrow," Wilson answered briefly. "a young girl. Does there seem to be any chance of reaching her?"

"A slim one," was the rejoinder. "The fire's got a strong hold, and it appears to have broken through the roof. Guess the very stonework won't be intact much longer, but with your permission I'm willing to risk it."

Wilson's lips tightened into a firm line. He had the feeling that, by giving his permission, he was sentencing Bob Darrow to death. But he could not blind himself to the spectacle of his distracted friend Madison, whom Bob, in the excitement of the moment, had not as yet recognised.

"Go to it, Darrow," said Captain Wilson briefly, "and good luck to you."

Bob sprang to one of the fire-escapes. Already the collapsible ladder was being run up the frontage of the building towards the top floor. Its uttermost reach was still a few feet from the sill of the window at which June Madison had last been seen, but Bob snatched up a hook ladder—a kind of rod with foot-rests and a strong grappling-iron attached to it.

He began to climb the escape, swiftly as ever seafaring man swarmed up the rigging. Hundreds of pairs of eyes watched him anxiously from a mass of upturned faces, now losing him in a swirl of smoke that surged through the splintering windows, now picking him out again as he rose clear of the smothering fumes and fought his way upward to the very peak of the ladder.

The escape had been rigged up in the most advantageous position; but the climb was fraught with hazard, and time and again Bob found himself gasping for air as the clouds of smoke rolled over him. But determination and the thought of a helpless girl's danger spurred him on, and at last he gained the topmost rung.

He grasped the hook ladder that he had brought with him and lifted his glance to the roof. A low parapet surrounded it, and he decided upon this as the likeliest means of securing the grappling-iron.

He raised the hand-ladder and clamped the hook on the coping stone.

From his position on the escape he could not tell that immediately behind the parapet, and close to the point where he had fixed the grappling-iron, the roof was a red-hot mass. Nor did he guess, though he knew that his situation was perilous, that the coping-stone had been undermined by the fierceness of the blaze and needed no great strain to sunder it completely.

Ignorant of the real and imminent danger, he set his foot on the lowest cross-step, tested the security of the hook ladder and then pulled himself up to the window-ledge behind which June Madison had last been sighted.

He reached the sill. A mass of smoke enclosed and blinded him for an instant, and a sheet of flame swept about him, scorching hands and face. He was able to see nothing inside the room immediately, and thought he might have come too late. But as the smoke and flame temporarily cleared he caught a glimpse of a crumpled figure on the floor, lying in a spot where the fire had not yet gained a thorough grip.

Bob swung himself lithely through the window, and dropped beside the girl. She was insensible, and lay on her face. He did not recognise her as his acquaintance of the afternoon, or he might have marvelled at the coincidence of meeting her again in such different circumstances.

Stooping, he gathered her in his powerful arms and swung her over his shoulder. She remained inert as he carried her to the window and poised her against the sill while he himself climbed through and set his feet firmly on the cross-steps of the hook ladder.

He let her fall forward on to his shoulder again and held her tightly. So far so good, he thought. He knew that she was alive, and the state of her clothes told him that she had not even been seriously burned, but had merely fainted with the strain of her terrible ordeal.

The rungs of the main escape were seven or eight feet beneath him. He began to descend towards them, but had taken no more than a single downward step when he felt the hook ladder jerk precariously.

He tightened his grasp involuntarily, and saved himself from being thrown there and then into the street far below. Then, as the possible reason for the ladder's spasmodic movement occurred to him, a chill seemed to strike through his veins.

He looked up towards the roof, half-knowing what to expect. The sight that met his eyes confirmed his suspicion—a sight calculated to send a thrill of horror through the bravest man.

A long rent had appeared in the section of parapet to which the grappling-iron had been clamped. Before his tortured gaze the coping-stone rocked outward.

He was paralysed for an instant. Then the girl on his shoulder seemed to revive a little, the keener air of the out of doors bringing her round to a semi-conscious state. A little moan came from between her lips.

The sound roused Bob. He made a desperate bid to descend the last cross-steps of the hook ladder and reach the main escape, and safety.

But he was fated not to succeed. The strain of Bob's weight, combined with the girl's, wrenched the coping-stone entirely from its position.

It toppled forward. From those in the street there arose a shout of horror, a shout that carried to Bob's ears even as he and June Madison were plunged towards the far-distant sidewalk—

(To be continued in another breath-taking episode next week. By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.)

By a trick a jockey is lured away from a kindly owner, but at the price of his own honour he plays the game. Disgraced, he swore he would never ride again, but ———. A stirring story of the race-course.

"SWEEPSTAKES"

Starring
EDDIE QUILLAN.

"Whoop-te-do!"

FIVE to four, Yellow Hornet! Five to four, Yellow Hornet!" There came a sudden rush of bets on the favourite. "Evens, Yellow Hornet! Three to one, Baby Girl!"

A bell clanged—the race had started. A mile and a quarter, and eight of the best two-year-olds going all out for the Victoria Gold Vase.

At the bend Baby Girl was leading by three clear lengths; next came Ruby and a bunch of others, with Yellow Hornet two lengths behind the last of them.

Several of the bookmakers got busy with their glasses, and one voiced a common opinion.

"Buddy ain't gonna ride no winner to-day. Yellow Hornet's out of the race. Gosh, wish I'd taken more! It's Baby Girl's race for a cinch!"

There are always several of the betting fraternity or late backers who get last-minute information or like an outside gamble.

"Anybody like to lay a price about Ruby or Yellow Hornet?" asked one such gambler.

"Ruby's creeping up—she started at threes. Nope, I couldn't offer you more than twos." The bookie winked at his clerk. They knew that Ruby was a bad stayer. "Maybe I might make it five to two. How's Yellow Hornet doing?" He peered through his glasses. "Might have picked up half a length, but no more. I'll give four to one, Yellow Hornet. I'm a sport, I am."

At once the backer produced some dollar bills.

"I like an outside chance. Put this twenty-five bucks on Yellow Hornet at fours."

The bookmaker called out the bet to his clerk, and then passed over a card. "Put me twenty dollars on Yellow Hornet at fours," piped another voice.

The bookmaker found that a small crowd had gathered round his stand, and at once got cold feet.

"I'll take that bet—now the book's closed," he shouted. He clapped his glasses to his eyes. "Hades!"

Well might the bookmaker kick himself for trying to make easy money. Yellow Hornet was not out of the race. In the few moments that had passed, the horse had crept up to the bunch, and, even as the bookie watched, seemed to glide through them. A blur of horses coming towards the straight, and Baby Girl still leading; gold with elaret sleeves showed Ruby to be lying close behind, second; and what was that splash of primrose with blue cap? The bookmaker gnashed his teeth, for now Yellow Hornet lay third.

On the back of Yellow Hornet was a grim-faced young jockey, who had his mouth close to the ears of his two-year-old colt, and as the boy rode he chanted a rhythmic refrain:

"Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do!"

The sound of a drum and fife band stirs the heart of a soldier and makes him dream of old battles or of new to come. The refrain stirred the equine mind to thoughts of victory and desperate endeavour. The horse knew that his rider had called him to do his best, and the chant seemed to give his limbs added strength.

Bud Doyle was one of the foremost jockeys of the day, and he never believed in setting a gruelling pace—rather to nurse the horse until there came a suitable opening. Sometimes Bud would maintain the lead from start to finish, but there was generally some strong reason. Horses are queer creatures, and some prefer to set the pace, and become fractious if kept back.

Bud had talked it over with his trainer, Sleepy Jones, and they had decided just how this race could be won, and there were no mistakes or hitches—everything went according to plan. Yellow Hornet glided into third place at the right moment, and, to the chant of "Whoop-te-do!" overhauled and passed Ruby a furlong from the winning-post. Baby Girl was three lengths ahead.

That three lengths was a trifle more than Bud Doyle had expected, and he put an extra charge into his chant of "Whoop-te-do!"

The crowd fairly yelled themselves hoarse as they saw the favourite slowly creeping up towards the leader. Could the most popular jockey of the hour bring off another spectacular victory? A bare length, and the winning-post but a hundred yards away. The rider of Baby

Girl was using his whip, but all Doyle did was to bend even lower in the saddle and yell out the familiar:

"Whoop-te-do!"

A gasp from the crowd. The two horses were running neck and neck—the winning post a dozen lengths ahead.

Shouts of "Baby Girl!" "Yellow Hornet!" rang out, but only those near the finish and the judge could tell the actual winner, yet Yellow Hornet had won by a clear head.

What the bookmaker who had given fairs had to say can best be left to the imagination.

As the owner was not present, Sleepy Jones led in the winner. The trainer was a dour, suspicious little man, with a short-cut, sandy moustache and bristly hair. His eyes would dart this way and that, the lids would droop almost to closing, and the chin was aggressive. Sleepy Jones was the exact opposite of his name; in fact, he was so alert for trickery that his friends had given him the nickname.

Yet his broad grin at the jockey was full of fun and affection. Sleepy had his heart in the right place, though he was always growling.

"You were mighty slow starting things," he said out of the corner of his mouth. "I reckoned ye'd gone to sleep."

"I nearly got shut out." Bud Doyle answered the grin with a broader one. "I will say Yellow Hornet's a buzzer when he gets moving."

"Maybe we'll get a better price next time out with the Hornet," mumbled Sleepy, and became alert. "Hullo, here comes Wally Weber and a swell dame!"

Bud Doyle was twenty-one that day, and full of the joy of life. The life of a jockey was a hard one, but there was seldom a smile far from his face. Most of his friends came from the racing stables, and he knew hardly any girls, but right from the start he liked the girl walking by the side of Wally Weber, racehorse-owner and proprietor of the big road-house known as Weber's Inn.

The girl was slight of build, young and very pretty; dark curls framed an oval face, the brightest of eyes, the reddest of lips, and cheeks that had alluring dimples.

"That was a good ride of yours, Buddy," greeted Wally Weber. He was a big man and rather flashily dressed. Wally seemed to ooze affability and good-nature; he often looked bored and slightly fuddled, but there was nothing the matter with his brain. Wally often cloaked his thoughts behind a grin or a yawn.

"Thank you, Mr. Weber," responded the jockey. "I'll say that Yellow Hornet is a game youngster."

"This is Miss Ellis." In a casual way Weber introduced them. "You gave her the thrill of her young life. She speculated a whole dollar on you, and she'd never done such a rash deed before. Babe, I'd like you to be friends with Buddy Doyle—best rider South of Kentucky."

"I think you rode a wonderful race." The girl's voice was rather shy, and the blue eyes, with their long lashes, were expressive of great admiration. "You certainly made whoopee with Yellow Hornet."

"Don't praise me, praise my horse." Buddy Doyle slid down from the saddle and held out his hand. "You aren't the Babe Ellis that often sings over the wireless, are you?"

"The midget, nightingale." Wally Weber laughed. "Why don't you come September 5th, 1931.

round one night and hear her sing—she's gracing my humble house for a few weeks?"

"I do wish you would come." Her voice was very sincere.

The conversation had lasted quite long enough for Sleepy Jones.

"Jockeys ain't got time for such places, thanking you all the same. Early to bed and early to rise—that's our motto, miss. If you'll excuse us we'll be getting along to the unsaddling rooms. Come on, Buddy."

"Don't you let him come near my den of vice," Wally Weber mocked the trainer. "Babe, he's scared we'll make his protégé go gay. Never mind, Buddy, we'll be glad to see you if you can escape from your warden."

"You might come for a little while," pleaded the girl.

"Come on, Lightning!" Sleepy Jones nudged Buddy in the ribs. "We'll have all the officials after us if we hang around here, talking. Good-day to you, Mister Weber!"

"Good-bye, Miss Ellis; I'd like to come, but you see how it is with this martinet." Bud smiled at the girl. "I'll have to content myself with listening in."

"You're a spoil-sport," grumbled Buddy after the weighing-in. "What harm would there be in—"

"Now, now, now!" Sleepy became quite aggressive. "Your orders are bed at ten, so them dives is outa your beat. What's more, for all his smiles and smirks, I wouldn't trust Mr. Wally Weber as far as I could see him. What's more, I don't want no arguments from you—you're a jockey, not a gigolo."

The Seeds of Discontent.

THAT evening there was a birthday party at Ma Clancy's house, where the trainer and his dozen jockeys and apprentices resided. Buddy was liked by all, and his voice was quite hoarse when he had got through his speech of thanks. Ma Clancy, a motherly old soul, had laid out a marvellous spread, and the boys did the good food justice.

"Gosh, I'll have to get some of that weight down in the morning!" Sleepy was inclined at times to be morbid. "You must have all put on several pounds. Heck, but it's gone ten—off to bed, the lot of yer!"

Laughing and talking they went, but Buddy Doyle remained, staring down at his pile of presents.

"Didn't yer hear me say 'bed'?" growled the trainer.

"Yeah, I heard you!" grinned Bud Doyle; but he frowned as he asked his question. "Have you forgotten I'm twenty-one?"

"So you're a man, and can stay up all night!" Sleepy winked an eye and shook his head. "You don't swing that stuff on me. When you're thirty-one—if you're still riding for Pop Blake and I'm still his trainer—you'll still be going to bed at ten. And now no more arguments, my lad!"

"I call it a lot of punk!" grumbled Buddy. "Why, it's still light!"

"If the sun was to say 'good-morning,' it wouldn't make no difference. Are you going, or am I going to get annoyed?"

"Oh, all right, misery!" Bud gathered his presents. "I hope I don't sleep a wink all night, just to spite you. Gosh, you oughta been a warden at Sing-Sing!"

Bud Doyle felt in no mood for sleep, and when he got to his room he stood for some time by the open window gazing out over the distant race-course. Almost he could see the spot where he had met Babe Ellis.

A grunt, a wheeze, and a shrill scream—that was old Sleepy turning on the wireless. From the open window the news bulletin came floating up from the room below, and the boy was about to turn away with a yawn when the last announcement made him pause.

"We are now going over to Weber's Inn, where Miss Babe Ellis will entertain us with some of her latest New York successes. Her first will be 'A Sweet Kentucky Maiden.'"

What a sweet voice Babe had, and how her voice seemed to thrill him. Gosh, wouldn't he like to be at Weber's Inn and listening to her. She had wanted him to go along, and stupid old Sleepy had queered everything. His eyes studied the sloping roof below him—pretty easy to get down into the garden. Gosh, how he would like to go down to Weber's Inn! Why shouldn't he? Wasn't he twenty-one, and a man?

A clean-shaven, well-dressed man stared thoughtfully down the track; by his side stood Sleepy Jones, and the latter rubbed his chin and watched the other from narrowed lids.

Pop Blake had just returned from a sea voyage, and his sharp eyes had soon spotted trouble.

"I tear back for the big race and expect to find Buddy hard at work on Six-Shooter. Only three days before the big race, and I don't mind telling you, Sleepy, I've laid out more than I can afford on winning the Gold Cup. I come straight to the course, and what's going on—you chewing a straw and Buddy talking to a girl. You also look as if you'd eaten something that didn't agree with you, Sleepy, so you'd best tell me here and now what's wrong."

"That dame's the trouble—women are a pesky nuisance!" Sleepy kicked viciously at a tuft of grass. "He met the girl the day he won on Yellow Hornet, and since that day you could see him change. That was three weeks ago, and for ten nights he slid down the rainpipe to go and hear her sing round at Weber's dive—she dances and sings there. I gave him a rousing, and he just looked sulky, the only girl in the world stuff, and I had no heart. I stopped him going to Weber's, but I can't stop him meeting her during the day. It ain't done his riding any harm, though he ain't the fresh, care-free Buddy we like, boss. He's just infatuated with this dame, and he won't listen to nowt."

"She's working for Weber—bad!" Pop Blake lit a cigarette. "Suppose you sent him off on a try-out and he stopped to talk to her."

"See the car by those rails," Sleepy pointed. "Who's that sitting at the wheel?—Mr. Pesky Wally Weber. If he thinks that mare of his, Rosedawn, has a chance he must be crazy."

"How about giving Buddy a shake up?" Pop Blake gave his trainer a knowing look. "Let Maloney take over the horse—Maloney is exercising near us, or my eyes are mistaken. Tell Buddy that he seems a bit off colour, and I reckon another lad ought to give the mare a try-out in case of accidents."

"That sounds good to me!" Sleepy rubbed his hands. "I'll detail Maloney at once."

The trainer hurried off. "Wally brought me down to watch you do your stuff!" Babe gave the youngster a dazzling smile. "Let me see how fast you can go."

"I'd rather talk to you!" Buddy smiled down into the bright eyes, then glanced up the course. "Guess, I'll have to get moving, for here, comes old Sleepy. He doesn't understand girls, Babe; all he thinks about are his horses."

Wally Weber, who had been lounging back in his car with half-closed eyes, suddenly decided that the two young people had long enough alone together. There was something of importance that he wanted to say, and he had better make it snappy as Sleepy was stalking down the rails.

"Morning, Buddy!" he greeted the jockey. "Did you enjoy yourself last night—did Sleepy catch you?"

"Not last night, but he was mighty suspicious because I was so sleepy this morning," Buddy answered. "Sleepy's been a real pest these last few weeks, shadowing me all over the place and giving me long lectures."

"Buddy, if you ever get fed up riding for Blake let me know," Wally Weber said with great seriousness. "I'm the last one to lure a jockey away from a good owner, but sometimes an employer can overstep the mark. If you want a job as leading jockey in the Weber stables, with as much liberty as you like, then let me know."

"Mighty nice of you, Mr. Weber."
"Not at all!" Weber chuckled. "Guess one young lady would be tickled if you joined up with us."

"I'd stay on for the rest of the season," came the inviting answer from the girl. "I might even buy a horse myself and you could ride it for me. It would be fun!"

"Shush, children!" cautioned Weber. "Here comes Sleepy, and he looks like murdering someone."

Sleepy Jones was in a bad temper. He never showed any signs of affection for a person, but Buddy was his special protégé. He had taught the boy all he knew for the last five years, and it made him mad to see Buddy going off the rails for a girl.

"Maloney," snarled Sleepy to the jockey by his side, "give Six-Shooter a canter—twice round the course, and I'll time you over the last mile."

Buddy gave over the horse to Maloney, and stared at Sleepy in a puzzled fashion. What was the idea in Maloney exercising Six-Shooter?

"What's the idea, Sleepy?" Buddy demanded as Maloney cantered away. "I was just going to—"

"Yeah, you was just going to do something," sneered the trainer. "You came here to do a timed mile, but you changed yer mind. And why?"

"Because Miss Ellis hailed me," Buddy cried angrily. "I had to stop and speak to her."

"Oh, yeah? I suppose if someone called yer in the middle of a race you'd stop and say a few words," Sleepy guffawed at his own wit. "You ain't here to do a lot of talking, but to ride horses. Pop Blake ain't satisfied with your riding, so he's giving Maloney a try-out."

"What, Maloney ride Six-Shooter in the big race?" gasped Buddy. Wally Weber smiled quietly at the girl, who looked anxious and disturbed.

"Yeah, maybe. We gotta have a jockey what keeps regular hours and don't stay out jazzing around in road-houses." Sleepy was so worked up he went a shade too far with his bluff. "Fooling around with stage dames and drinking cheap liquor. They don't care two hoots about you, and you're so dumb you can't see it."

"How dare you!" flared the girl. "Yes, how dare you!" shouted Buddy, clenching his fists.

"You put them pin-cushions away." Sleepy showed his teeth. "One swipe from me, and you'd go to sleep for a week."

"You're crazy, acting this way," Buddy shouted. "Do you know that Mr. Weber has offered me a contract as his leading jockey, but I turned it down."

"Take it, I shan't cry," scoffed the trainer. "If Mister Weber likes to have a jockey what goes to bed at two in the morning and don't do any training, then that's his funeral. Ah, here comes Maloney." He took out a watch. "And he ain't half making the crittur move."

"If you like to join up you can come and sign a contract right now," whispered Wally Weber. "Buddy, it's your chance to make big money."

"Don't miss the chance," Sleepy spoke over his shoulder. "Don't expect us to spill any tears over you. What you want is a darned good licking. Pah, you make me sick!"

"I'll sign right now!" Buddy flamed up. "Let's go across to your office, Mister Weber."

"Oh, Buddy, I'm so glad!" Babe clutched at the youngster's arm. "I'm sure you're being wise. Uncle Wally will let us have a whoopee night to celebrate."

Sleepy Jones scratched his head and stared after the big car as it purred away.

