"Oh, hallo, Handsome!" he said by way of greeting.

Handsome, sleek but dangerous, did not return the greeting. His hard eyes flickered over Monty, and behind them was a cruel glint.

"What are you doing aboard, Monty?" he asked.

"Oh, just taking a holiday!" replied Monty. "I was wanted as a witness in that graft investigation, but I don't care to testify against a pal."

"Any other important reason?"

Monty knew that there was a challenge behind the words, but he gave no sign of his knowledge.

"No," he replied. "Only that."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah."

"Nothing to interest you in the Graham cabin, for instance," said Handsome sarcastically.

"You mean Mrs. Graham?" Monty made a gesture of impatience. "Good heavens, how absurd!"

"You know quite well I don't mean Mrs. Graham," said Handsome. "Come on, Monty, let's get down to cases."

"Cases?"

"You heard me." Handsome took a pace nearer and lowered his voice. "You haven't been paying just a friendly visit to the Grahams. There's more in it than that."

"Is there?" said Monty calmly. "Well, have another think, Handsome. Mr. Graham and I are such old friends that we're like father and son."

Handsome's lip curled with frank disbelief.

"Is that so?" he said. "Well, son, your father's carrying a pretty heavy bank-roll. Now look here, Monty, I don't allow any butting in on my game. I'll go in with you, but whatever's in your mind about Graham has got to be shared. Get me?"

Monty said nothing for a few seconds, but held Handsome's eyes in challenge. He walked to his door and opened it in readiness to go inside.

"Sorry, Handsome," he said slowly and deliberately. "But I don't like crowds."

He went into his cabin and closed the door. Inside he paused for a moment before his suitcase, thinking. Then he opened it, and felt under the clothes that lay inside.

When his hand reappeared, it was gripping a heavy black automatic. He examined it to see that it was loaded, then quietly dropped it into his breast-pocket.

Monty Butts In.

THE morning of the following day passed comparatively uneventfully. Monty spent most of the time in wandering about the open decks, keeping a fatherly eye upon Graham and Handsome, and wondering rather uneasily what the presence of such diverse types on board meant.

So far he had not been able to guess exactly where Sigrid Carline came into the picture. Sigrid was blonde, very alluring in a cheaply fashionable way, and at heart an inveterate gold-digger. Moreover, she was not one of those women who travel by the expensive luxury of the Transatlantic without some very good reason—and the reason was undoubtedly Graham.

Monty found himself wondering why he was so interested in the Grahams. Was it because he still loved Kay Graham? No, it wasn't that. It was just that he felt intensely grateful to her because, in those months at Havana, when he had known her and met her every day, she had tried to reform him. She had not succeeded, it was true, but a man like Monty could not help feeling very friendly towards the woman who had attempted to make him into something worthy.

Yes, she had failed; therefore she had married Graham. And now Monty wanted to see that she was happy with him. She deserved happiness, he told himself.

Monty pondered over these things for a while, and finally decided that he ought to drop in on Sigrid and see what was doing. He and Sigrid were old friends, the reason for their friendship being that they were both grafters.

It was getting on towards lunch-time when Monty, armed with the number of Sigrid's cabin, went below. He found her door and, without troubling to knock, opened it.

Sigrid was standing in front of a long mirror, putting the last touches to her appearance in readiness for luncheon. She stood back and gazed at herself—pretty, spoilt, vain.

"Oh, Sigrid," she said to her reflection, "why are you so beautiful?"

Monty chuckled.

"I know the answer to that one," he said with a grin, and indicated with a brief motion of his hand the array of cosmetics and powders on her dressing-table. "Incidentally, I heard that you were on board, and rushed right over. Nice of me, wasn't it?"

Sigrid had swung round, and was glaring at him angrily.

"You might have had the decency to knock," she said curtly.

"Why should I?" replied the amiable Monty. "I never used to in the old days, and you never seemed to mind."

"But these are not the old days," she retorted. "Times have changed."

"But you haven't," he said, his eyes busily roving round the cabin. "You couldn't." He caught sight of a huge basket of roses standing in the middle of the floor, and his expression became thoughtful. "Oh, you got my roses, I see!"

"You sent them?" She spoke with astonishment.

"I ordered roses," he lied, and strolled across to the basket. Quietly he detached a card from the flowers, and held it up to the light. "To my beloved, from—Bunny. Sorry. My mistake. They're not mine, after all." He chuckled again. "No, my dear, times haven't changed, and nor have you. When you see what you want, you take it, without any regard for others."

Sigrid's eyes narrowed. She knew what he was insinuating.

"I only take from those who can afford to lose," she replied shortly.

"Well, there's one woman on board this vessel who can't afford to lose," he said. "A woman who's mad about her husband—whose heart is breaking."

Sigrid smiled maliciously.

"I see," she said ironically. "So you're interested in Mrs. Graham, are you?"

He sighed.

"No. Not now." He considered the point. "Well, perhaps I am, Sigrid—as a brother. And brothers can be very dangerous sometimes, you know." He turned away, and walked to the door. "Think it over, my dear," he said slowly. "Think it over."

Quietly the door closed behind him, and as it hid him from Sigrid's sight his expression became hard. "Bunny"—the name written on the note accompanying the roses—was Graham's nickname!

On the Promenade Deck.

MONTY returned to the promenade deck in a distinctly pensive mood, wondering quite where the strange situation that had arisen was going to end. Hodgkins, with his "a ship is like a little world" speech was certainly right. Strange things do happen on a voyage over the big pond.

He made his way to the rail, and leaned on it to gaze out over the sea. Not a thing was in sight—no land, no other ships, only limitless water. He smiled grimly as he reflected that he and his fellow-passengers were isolated from the world for four whole days—unable to escape each other, and having to bear with each other's company.

His musings were brought to an end by a girl's clear voice.

"Oh, daddy, it's wonderful! But isn't it all rather extravagant? Ought we really to be doing it?"

Monty turned his head so that he could see the speaker, and as she came into his line of vision, his hardness vanished.

He found himself looking into a girl's face that was perfect. The set of the chin, the slightly upturned nose, and the deep-brown eyes combined into a picture that moved him to his very depths.

She was with a man who was only slightly taller than herself. His face was bearded, and he wore the gold-rimmed spectacles of the professor type. Grey hair, brushed back from his high and intelligent forehead, showed him to be about sixty or so. The girl, Monty judged, could not be more than twenty-two.

The bearded man spoke.

"Judy," he said quietly, "all my life I have been grinding lenses—lenses for other men to see by. I have given them spectacles so that they can read and telescopes so that they can study the stars. For over thirty years I have taken pieces of glass and held them to the rouge wheel so that others could see the world. Well, now it is we who shall see the world."

Graham was slumped across his desk and a revolver lay on the floor.

The girl nestled close to him and hugged his arm.

"You're a darling," she said. "You pretend you're doing all this for yourself, whereas I know it is for me."

The old man laughed and moved away. He strolled across the deck to where a model globe was standing. It was this globe that told the passengers day by day their exact position in terms of latitude and longitude.

He leaned over the globe interestedly, and began to study it. Monty watched him for a minute or two, and then crossed slowly to his side.

"Good-morning!" he said, with the easy familiarity life on board ship makes possible.

The old man looked up and smiled. Monty took an instant liking to him.

The old man pointed to the globe.

"Do you understand this?" he asked, and in his voice was a faint but unmistakable German accent. "It is supposed to show where the ship is—forty degrees and ten minutes north of latitude, and seven degrees eighteen minutes west longitude."

Monty looked at the globe gravely, and decided that he ought to show his learning.

"It's quite simple," he said, with a smile. "You see, you stand with your right hand pointing north and your left hand pointing south. In front of you you have longitude and behind you you have latitude. There you are!"

The old man laughed, but made no other comment. Instead he called his daughter from the rail and she joined them.

"You must tell my daughter about it," he said, and his air of innocence completely deceived Monty.

"Certainly!" Monty turned to her and cleared his throat. "I was just explaining to your father how this globe works. You see, if you stand with your right hand pointing south—no, north—and your left hand pointing south, before you you have latitude—er, longitude—and behind you you have latitude. Isn't that right?"

The girl looked at him seriously. "Well, no, not exactly," she replied, and at close quarters Monty thought her more lovely than before. "You see, latitude is the distance north and south of the equator, and longitude is the distance east and west of the prime meridian."

Monty coughed. This was really most embarrassing. These two had been pulling his leg.

"Maybe you're right," he said resignedly, and then laughed. "But let me introduce myself," he said to the old man. "My name is Greer—Monty Greer."

"And mine is Rudolph Kramer," replied the old man. "This is my daughter, Judy."

Monty bowed, and thereafter conversation became general for a few minutes. Old Kramer told Monty about his life, and how he was now retired. They were seeing the world for the first time.

"I have met so many interesting people on board, too, Mr. Greer," he said. "I was speaking to one last night—a Mr. Graham, president of the Graham Investment Corporation. I found him very entertaining. You see, I am one of his depositors—all my savings are in his banks."

Monty gulped, but said nothing. He did not dare tell the old man that Graham's banks were tottering on the brink of ruin, and that Graham himself was going to Europe to avoid the consequences of the smash.

November 14th, 1931.

But he mentally resolved that something had to be done, if only for the sake of Judy, the most marvellous girl he had ever met in his life.

Scandal.

MONTY did not need to do much thinking to realise that before the voyage was over there was going to be a large quantity of trouble for somebody, and that somebody was himself.

He could feel himself being gradually entangled in about three different directions. There was the Graham problem, in which Sigrid was so intimately concerned; there was Handsome, who was sure to start something before long; and there were now the Kramers. It was impossible for him to let little Judy Kramer suffer for Graham's sins.

He decided to do something about it. Acting on the assumption that Graham was not sailing empty-handed—indeed, Handsome had been most definite upon the point—he felt that there would be no harm in a little mild burglary in Graham's cabin. It would only be justice to lift from the banker sufficient of his private hoard to make up the Kramers' loss when the news of the crash came.

With this idea in mind, he quietly opened Graham's cabin door that evening after dinner, and locked it from the inside with his skeleton key. Graham, of course, was in the lounge, smoking, and was not likely to disturb him.

He started his search quietly and efficiently, showing that he was by no means new to the particular rôle he was now playing—that of gentleman crook. With brief thoroughness, he went through Graham's wardrobe, two of his trunks, and a suitcase, in each instance drawing blank.

Suddenly there was the sound of a key in the lock. Graham was returning!

Monty looked round swiftly, and caught sight of a small door which led, apparently, to a private bathroom. He opened it, and went inside.

Graham entered the cabin. He crossed to the far side of it, and listened at his wife's door to assure himself that she was not within hearing. Then he went to the telephone, and called the number of Sigrid's cabin in a low voice.

"Hallo! Is that you, Sigrid? Look here, I'm just going to the lounge to have a cocktail, and then I'll be right along. Be with you in five minutes. Very nice of you to ask me. Good-bye!"

He hung up the receiver, and hummed to himself as he straightened his tie and hurriedly brushed his hair. Then he left the cabin again.

Monty poked his head out of the bathroom, and there was a knowing look on his face. So Sigrid had invited Graham along to her cabin, had she? Well, well! And Graham had fallen for it! He would be having a quiet cup of coffee with her when she would suddenly spring up and fling her arms round his neck. At that moment the door would open, and in would walk a man who professed to be her husband, or something. The result would be that Graham would have to pay out, or be involved in a scandal. It was old stuff.

With a gleam in his eye, Monty carefully let himself out of the cabin. Silently, but without any loss of time, he made his way through the maze of corridors to Sigrid's door.

He paused before it, wondering whether to knock, and decided against it. He thrust the door open quickly, stepped inside, and closed it again after him.

Sigrid had been standing in the middle of the room as he entered. She had taken an eager step forward at the first sound of someone coming in; but she stopped as she saw who it was.

"Monty Greer!" she cried. Monty looked at her in mock astonishment.

"How did you know?" he asked. She ignored the fatuous question, and went quickly to his side.

"I want you to go away at once," she said, betraying her alarm by her voice. "Please!"

He did not hurry himself. He was playing for time. Calmly he took his watch from his pocket, and consulted it.

"Ten o'clock," he mused. "Surely you can't be expecting anyone at this hour of night?"

"Yes, I am."

"Oh!" There was the faintest suggestion of pained astonishment in Monty's tone. "Anyone I know?"

She clenched and unclenched her fingers, striving hard to keep her self-control.

"Oh, Monty, you must go—now—please," she begged. "Don't you see —"

There came the sound of footsteps in the corridor outside, and she stopped speaking, panic gripping her. She could see her well-laid plans failing hopelessly.

But Monty was inexorable. Stepping forward deftly, he put his arms round her.

"Oh, Sigrid," he said loudly enough to be heard by anyone standing in the doorway. "why are you so beautiful?"

Sigrid struggled in his grasp, white with rage, but as she struggled Monty's grip became more secure.

Suddenly, as though aware for the first time that someone had entered, Monty turned his head, and saw Graham standing not four paces away. Abruptly he let Sigrid go, and bowed ironically.

"How do you do?" he said politely.

Graham was angry, but as his eyes shifted from Monty to Sigrid, his anger gave way to cold scorn.

Sigrid saw the change, and made a desperate effort to win a battle that was already lost. She went towards Graham, her arms outstretched.

"Oh, Bunny——" she cried.

Graham still regarded her coldly.

"I must apologise," he said quietly.

"I seem to be a trifle—early."

"Bunny, you must listen to me," said Sigrid. "I can explain everything."

"Somehow I seem to have heard those words before," said Graham unmoved.

Then he turned abruptly, and left the cabin.

Monty watched him go sadly. He did his best to look contrite.

"Sigrid—oh, Sigrid!" he murmured in a broken voice. "Did I do wrong?"

She swung on him, all her fury unleashed.

"You beast, why did you do this to me?" she flamed. "Get out. I never want to see you again. Get out, or I'll scream."

Monty got out. Grinning quietly to himself, he drifted down the corridor towards the ball-room, knowing that he would find Kay Graham there.

He saw her standing against a pillar, watching the dancers idly. Deep sorrow shadowed her beautiful eyes.

He went up to her, and touched her on the arm.

"Kay, my dear, will you run along and put a candle in your window to-night?" he said gently. "I think your daddy's coming home."

The sorrow vanished from her face like magic. As she turned her head so that she could see him, her expression became radiant.

"You mean—"
"Just that," said Monty. "Good-night—and good luck!"

Monty hurried off, and sought the quietness of his cabin. As he shut the door on himself, and prepared for bed, he gave a smile of satisfaction.

"That's one of my troubles over," he said to himself. "I wonder when the next will arrive?"

Found Shot.

DURING that night a storm arose. It came swiftly, bearing down on the gigantic liner with hurricane speed, enormous waves dashing themselves against the bows and spreading themselves in spray over the decks. The boom and thunder of the running seas was enormous—like a succession of guns distinctly fring.

Up on the bridge, the all-night watchers decided that the speed of the vessel should be reduced to half. Only a short distance away, in a small cabin fitted with wireless apparatus, the night operator was taking off the broadcast news of the day in readiness for the morning paper that was published from the ship's printing presses.

None could hope to escape the inexorability of that news service. The thirteen hundred people on the Transatlantic were under its influence as it reached out like an invisible arm across the world, including everyone within its grasp. Even Graham could not hope to escape.

Thus, when Monty woke up the following morning to the din of the crashing breakers against the iron hull of the ship, the first thing he saw was his copy of the "Transatlantic Daily." He opened it idly as he sipped his morning tea.

And there, spread over three columns across the front page were the headlines:

FAILURE OF GRAHAM INVESTMENT CORPORATION.

GIGANTIC FINANCIAL COMBINE SMASHES FOR $20,000,000.

THOUSANDS OF SMALL INVESTORS RUINED.

Monty took the news calmly. Frankly, knowing Graham, he had expected something of the sort, although he had not expected the failure to be quite so large.

He read the half column of print that followed the headlines, and emitted a long drawn-out whistle. Not only had Graham crashed, but he had also, according to the news agencies, decamped with $5,000,000 worth of securities which were immediately negotiable into cash!

Five million dollars! A million pounds! So that's why Handsome was so interested!

Monty was very thoughtful as he dressed and had breakfast, and the result of his thoughtfulness was that he felt he ought to pay Handsome a visit, just to see how the land lay now that this news had broken.

It was shortly after ten o'clock when he dropped into Handsome's cabin. Handsome was there, sitting at a table playing poker, and with him were some of his "boys"—Socker, Chalky, and a couple of gorillas.

The boys stiffened as Monty entered, but Handsome quelled them with a gesture, and rose in greeting.

"Well, Monty, if this isn't a pleasure," he said drily. "Come right in. Make yourself at home."

Monty smiled disarmingly. No one knew better than he did the uneasiness his presence was causing.

"I'm not stopping," he said amiably. "I just thought I would let you know that you can lay off Graham now. He's failed."

Handsome's eyes narrowed, but he still kept his forced smile.

"Graham's banks failed—but not Graham," said Handsome. "He's packing a lot of personal securities he doesn't want the law to grab."

"That's so," said Monty, and decided that it was now Handsome's turn to take the lead. "Well, what do you want me to do about it? Break down and cry?"

Handsome moved a pace nearer, and leaned forward confidentially.

"I asked you to join in with us," he said softly.

"That's right," Monty replied. "So you did. I forgot!"

"I also asked you to give me a clear field."

"Well, haven't I?"

"You started by making passes at Mrs. Graham," said Handsome, his temper beginning to rise in the face of Monty's complete serenity. "Last night you were in the Graham cabin again. On business, I suppose?"

Monty looked at him aggrievedly.

"Handsome," he said reproachfully. "you haven't been spying on a pal, have you?"

"I know every move you make," said Handsome menacingly.

Monty's attitude changed. He ceased to be calm, and for the first time Handsome saw something of the steel that lay beneath the genial exterior.

"Anything more, Handsome?"

"You've heard my last word, Monty." Monty's eyes swept over the gangsters with contempt, finally coming to rest upon Handsome once more.

"I've been hearing your last word for a long time," he said quietly. "One of these days you're actually going to say it, and maybe I'll be there to hear you." He turned towards the door, and instantly his seriousness left him. He was Monty Greer once again—gay and debonair.

"Happy days!" he called over his shoulder, and shut the door softly behind him.

He wandered along to the shelter deck, intending to take his morning walk. The ship was lurching under the impact of the waves now, and the noise was terrific.

He did not take his walk, but stood at an open porthole and looked at the raging seas, the storm suiting his mood. How long he remained there he could not tell, for he was musing upon the fact that it was part of his game to remain quiet and inconspicuous while on the Transatlantic—after all, the police in New York were still looking for him—and here he was poking his nose into everything that came before it.

He shrugged his shoulders. A decent man at heart, he hated the idea of leaving a wrong undressed, and on no account could he ignore a call for aid.

A slight noise behind him made him start.

Eventually he turned along the deck seeking his belated exercise. But he had hardly gone a few paces before he discerned the neat, slim figure of Judy Kramer coming towards him. She was wringing her hands in obvious distress, and looking from right to left as though seeking someone.

He hurried towards her, and she saw him.

"Oh, Mr. Greer, I'm so glad to see you," she cried, and her voice sounded curiously choked.

"Why? What's the matter?"

"My father."

"What's happened?"

"Ever since we heard of the failure of the Graham bank this morning, he has been moody, and uttering threats about what he would do to Graham if they came face to face." She gripped Monty's arm imploringly. "You will talk to him, won't you—try to persuade him to take the smash calmly?"

"Of course," said Monty readily. "Where is he now?"

"He went off in the direction of Mr. Graham's state-room," she replied.

Monty took her by the arm, and hurried her below. They reached Graham's door, only to find everything quiet. There was no sign of Mr. Kramer.

By way of making sure that all was in order, Monty opened Graham's door gently and looked inside. What he saw there made him utter an exclamation of horror. Graham was slumped across his desk, and a revolver lay on the floor near him, while standing on the other side of the room, staring straight in front of him as though his mind was stunned, stood Mr. Kramer himself!

Judy, looking over Monty's shoulder, saw him, and with a scream rushed across the room and took her father in her arms.

Monty followed her, and shut the door after him. He bent down and examined Graham. Then he straightened himself, and his face was grave.

"I'm not quite sure, but I think he's dead," he said quietly. "He's been shot through the chest!"

The Getaway.

FOR several minutes there was no other sound in the cabin but Judy's sobbing. Old Kramer, his hair dishevelled and his eyes wide and staring, was like a man in a dream.

Monty considered the situation swiftly. He accepted without question that whatever had happened to Graham was well deserved, and he saw no reason why old Kramer should suffer.

He turned, and crossed to Judy. She was obviously terribly upset, and was not likely to be of much use unless she could get her feelings under control, so he caught her by the shoulder and shook her gently.

"Get your father back to his own cabin right away," he said sharply. "Don't leave him alone for a minute. I'll see to things here. Quickly, now!"

"Oh, Mr. Greer, you think—"

"I think nothing. Get going, and hurry."

He led her and the old man to the door, and almost pushed them out into the corridor. Then he returned to the cabin and locked himself in.

Swiftly he crept across to Kay's adjoining room and listened. All was quiet. Furthermore, owing to the screaming of the wind and the buffeting of the waves on the side of the ship, no one had heard the shot—that was obvious.

November 14th, 1931.

He took a towel from a rack over the wash basin, and used it to wipe the revolver clean of finger-prints. Then he took the weapon over to where Graham was lying, and closed the man's hand about it.

He looked about him quickly. There were signs that the cabin had been ransacked, but he had no time to tidy things up now. Someone might come in at any minute.

He went towards the door, intending to leave, but stopped as he saw the faulight above it. He stood considering its possibilities for a few moments, then snapped his fingers as an idea came to him.

A piece of string was in his pocket. He unravelled it and tied one end with a slip-knot around one of Graham's fingers. The other end he dropped through the faulight so that it hung down in the passage outside.

Quickly he stepped out of the cabin, taking the key with him. He locked the door on the outside, and mounted a sofa. Deftly threading the key over the string, he allowed the former to slide down until it came to rest upon the desk close to Graham's hand; then, with a quick jerk, the slip-knot was released, and Monty pulled the string through the skylight and thrust it into his pocket.

A slight noise behind him made him start. He looked round slowly, knowing that he had been detected by someone coming along the corridor, and hoping that it would be a complete stranger, who would never know him again.

It was no stranger. It was Sigrid Carlene, and even as he recognised her he knew that when the alarm was raised she would speak about what she had seen.

Investigation.

EVENTS began to move with great rapidity. Kay Graham, going below to find out why her husband had not joined her on deck, discovered him lying where Monty had left him, and her cries attracted the notice of a steward. He, having seen what had happened, called another steward, and sent him away to the officer in charge of the bridge. Inside ten minutes the captain of the vessel arrived, accompanied by his first officer and the purser.

An investigation was held on the spot. Mrs. Graham was questioned, and she told of the discovery she had made, saying also that the whole of Graham's money had completely vanished. The doctor, summoned immediately, said that Graham had been shot from close quarters, a fact that was indisputable in view of the marks of burning on Graham's clothing, but that he was still living.

They rushed the shot man to hospital. Meanwhile, the captain returned to his office, and had a notice issued to the whole of the ship's crew asking for information.

It came. The steward on B deck said that he had seen Mr. Kramer go into Graham's cabin about a quarter of an hour before the discovery was made, and now he came to think of it the old man seemed strange.

The captain's secretary took a statement of this in writing, and made the steward sign it. While this was being done, the first officer bent down and spoke into the captain's ear in a low voice.

"There's a woman outside who wants to see you," he said. "She says it is very important."

"Very well. Bring her in."

The first officer went away, and returned with Sigrid. It was exactly as Monty had guessed. Still smarting under the humiliation of her defeat over Graham by Monty, she had come to tell what she knew.

She told it briefly, and without offering any explanation for her apparent eagerness to have Monty put under suspicion.

The captain heard her out, and then asked what was known of Monty Greer. The fourth officer immediately related the watch that had been kept upon the gangway at New York by himself and Detective Glennon.

"Very well," said the captain briefly. "Send Mr. Greer and Mr. Kramer to me at once!"

A steward hurried away, and found Monty in Kramer's cabin, trying to calm the old man. Monty heard the captain's summons unmoved, but knew that it had to be obeyed. He nodded to Judy to help him, and between them they managed to get Kramer to his feet. The old man was as weak and helpless as a child.

They reached the captain's office and went inside, to find that a complete case had already been made out against them. As soon as they appeared, the captain briefly stated the facts.

"Mr. Kramer," he said, "I find upon investigation that you had a personal grudge against Mr. Graham owing to the loss of your savings, and that at the time when Mr. Graham was shot you were in his cabin. I am not here to try you, but I feel bound to keep you in custody until you can be handed over to the police when we reach port. You will be confined to the brig for the remainder of the voyage."

Kramer, if he heard, remained unmoved, still staring ahead, but Judy ran forward, with a little cry.

"But, captain, my father isn't guilty. He couldn't do it," she said in anguish. "He couldn't!"

"I'm very sorry," replied the captain. "My decision remains unaltered."

Monty decided that it was about time he said a few words. He knew that he was in a tight fix, but he had often found in the past that facing a situation squarely often pulled him through.

"I understand that it's a case of suicide, captain," he said.

The captain raised his eyebrows slightly.

"Indeed?" he said quietly. "So you know all about it already?"

Monty saw that he had been a little too hasty and tried to recover himself.

"The affair is the talk of the whole ship," he said.

The captain glanced at his papers.

"Mr. Greer," he said, "you were seen in the vicinity of Mr. Graham's cabin. You were also seen sliding a key down a piece of string through the transom. I very much regret, therefore, that it will also be necessary to confine you to the brig with Mr. Kramer until the end of the voyage."

"But—"

The door opened, and the ship's doctor entered. He went quietly to the captain's desk, and said in a low voice:

"I have operated, and the bullet is out. He is in a bad way, but he may recover if properly nursed. It was a close thing."

The captain nodded, and signed to the first officer that the investigation was at an end. Monty and Mr. Kramer were led away.

In the Brig.

UNDER a guard directed by the first officer, Monty found himself being conducted down on to the lower decks, far into the bowels of the vessel, where was situated a small but quite comfortable cell constructed of steel. This was the brig—a term which survived from the days when prisoners were confined in a special square-rigged, two-masted ship on their transportation to the penal settlements.

The door was locked on them, and one glance sufficed to show Monty that escape was out of the question.

Monty placed a kindly hand on Mr. Kramer's shoulder, realising that the old man was not used to this sort of treatment.

"Don't worry about all this, Mr. Kramer," he said. "I know you didn't do it. In fact, I have been doing a little thinking, and while I don't pretend to account for your being in Graham's cabin while the shooting was on, I think I know enough to have us both out of here in a short time."

"But when I went to Mr. Graham's cabin I intended to kill him," said Mr. Kramer. "He robbed me! I can't remember—"

He passed his hand across his brow in a bewildered fashion, and it was clear to Monty that the old man's brain was still suffering from the shock he had had.

He let the matter drop.

Within half an hour it was lunch-time, and the key grated in the lock. An officer entered, followed by the worthy Hodgkins carrying a large tray.

"Good morning, gentlemen," said Hodgkins cheerfully. "Is everything all right?"

"Oh, yes!" said Monty. "Everything's quite cosy. In fact, I'm wondering why I ever went to the expense of travelling cabin."

"Well, here's a meal for you, gentlemen, which will warm the cockles of your 'carts," said Hodgkins, upon whom Monty's heavy humour was quite lost. "There's kidney stoo, a bit of salad, soup, and cheese, strawberry jam, and some buttered scones."

"Thank you, from the bottom of my heart, for the scones, Hodgkins," said Monty flippantly.

"Yes, sir. Certainly, sir," replied Hodgkins, unabashed. "But you mustn't let the trouble you're both in get you down, gentlemen. What I always says is a ship is like a little world. It can't always be easy sailing. There's rough weather and calm; there's quiet seas and heavy squalls, and the man what takes the bitter with the sweet is bound to have a happy crossing in the end."

Monty laughed.

"You're a happy soul, Hodgkins," he said. "The sailors must adore you."

Hodgkins squinted down his nose modestly.

"Yes, sir. And if there's anything else you want, sir, don't be afraid to ask me, sir. You've always been very nice to me, sir, and I'd like to do anything I can."

"Is that so, Hodgkins?" said Monty humorously. "Well, go and find me the key to all my difficulties, and I'll make you a rich man."

"Yes, sir. Certainly, sir. I'll see what can be done, and will come back with your supper to-night, sir."

The door elanged to, and once more Monty and Kramer were alone.

Dinner-time came, and the door opened again, admitting Hodgkins accompanied by an officer.

"Ah, there you are!"

said Monty welcomingly. "I'd almost given you up."

"I'd 'ave been 'ere before, sir," said Hodgkins, "but I had to get hold of a nice raspberry-pie for you gentlemen, knowing that you like them, sir."

Monty looked puzzled.

"But I don't like—" he began.

"What I always says is," went on Hodgkins hurriedly, "we often find the key to all our troubles in a good raspberry-pie, so you must cultivate a taste for them, sir."

Monty said nothing more. He just exchanged a look with Hodgkins that satisfied the latter's speculations concerning his future financial anticipations.

Once more the door of the brig closed on Monty and Kramer, and Monty settled down to wait.

The Duel.

IT was several hours later when Monty made use of the key Hodgkins had secreted in the raspberry-pie, but once free he made his way quickly to Handsome's cabin.

He pushed open the door silently, to find the place empty but for Chalky. Chalky was sitting with his back to the door, his villainous face hidden, playing solitaire.

Monty closed the door softly, and put his right hand in his jacket pocket. His gun had been taken from him when he had been placed in the brig, but a finger thrust against the cloth of his pocket looked just as formidable.

"Stick 'em up, Chalky!" he said softly.

Chalky's white face could not go whiter, but he recognised the voice of Monty Greer, and knew that it was not to be disobeyed.

"Get over there—against the wall," Monty continued. "That's better. Now where is it? Come on—speak up!"

"In my pocket—hanging on the chair."

Monty went to the chair upon which

"Stick 'em up, Chalky," he said softly.

Chalky had recently been sitting, and retrieved a large automatic pistol from his coat.

"All right. Put them down. Turn round." Monty uttered his commands sharply.

As Chalky obeyed, Monty heard the sounds of footsteps outside. He stepped back behind the door as it opened, and another of the gang entered.

"It's all set, Chalky," said the newcomer. "We've got Socker in the engine-room with overalls up to his ears. He's got the stuff, and when we dock in the morning—"

Something in Chalky's face made him stop. He turned, to find himself menaced by Monty's gun.

"Keep right on talking," said Monty, and jammed the gun into his ribs, at the same time taking the crook's own gun from his side-pocket. "I knew you boys shot Graham and took his money and securities. And you'd let an innocent man suffer for it, too, would you? So Socker's down in the engine-room with overalls up to his ears, huh? And he's got all Graham's loot with him, eh? And when the ship docks in the morning, he goes on shore with the engineers and crew, and carries the stuff with him? Did I get that right?"

Chalky and the other nodded sullenly. "To blazes he does!" snapped Monty, and slammed out of the cabin.

He raced up to the top deck, and found the door which led to the engine-room elevator. Swiftly he got inside, and pressed the switch for one of the lower levels.

He found himself amidst a maze of machinery. The din was deafening. A gigantic reciprocating pump was working close to him, while beneath his feet he could feel the throb of the turbines.

He made his way along some steel galleries, looking about him carefully. Suddenly he saw a man bending over a large piece of moving mechanism that was connected with the steering rudders, and that man looked like Socker, in spite of the oil-can and cotton-waste in his hand.

He hurried along the adjacent gallery so as to get close to Socker, and in that moment Socker turned and saw him. He whipped out a gun from his pocket and fired.

Monty asked no questions, and showed no mercy. He knew that the shooting would never be heard amidst that roaring, clanking machinery, and he let Socker have it. Once—twice—he pressed the trigger, and at the second shot he saw the crook open his mouth to let out an unheard yell. At the same time his gun flew wide.

Monty was on him before he could recover. He gripped him by the throat, and thrust his face close.

"Where have you got it, Socker?" he roared above the din. "Come on, or you're finished!"

Socker winced, and fear showed in his eyes.

"In the store-room upstairs," he replied.

Monty flung him on one side, and made for the elevator again. The game was in his hands.

Hit.

BEFORE reaching the elevator, Monty had to return along the galleries by which he had come, and as he swung round the cylinder head of a huge bilge exhauster, Handsome appeared on the next level above.

The two saw each other about the same time, and Handsome reached quickly for his shoulder holster. A gleaming gun appeared in his hand, and Monty saw the flash and heard the whine of a bullet past his ear.

He ducked behind the exhauster, and waited. Once he looked out cautiously, only to see Handsome's gun flash once more. Then Handsome began to retreat to higher levels still.

Monty knew that he had to get him, otherwise the crook would go straight to where the Graham loot was hidden, and remove it.

He left his cover, and came out into the open, sending a shot flying after Handsome's retreating back. Handsome turned at bay, firing as he swung round.

Monty let out a yell as he felt a sharp searing pain in his right arm. The gun dropped from his nerveless fingers. He leaned back against a bulkhead weakly, suddenly faint from the shock of being hit; then, as he saw Handsome's gun flash yet again, he ducked low, and picked up his weapon with his left hand.

Everything depended upon him now, and he had very little time left. Some distance away he could see one of the engineer staff racing towards them, intent upon finding out what all the trouble was about.

Deliberately he mustered his strength, and took aim at Handsome. His gun kicked, and at the same moment a spasm

November 14th, 1931.

Our Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

convulsed the crook. The shot had taken effect.

Monty threw off his feeling of weakness, and dived up a near-by companion-way to the higher level. He grabbed Handsome by the waistcoat and dragged him to his feet. He could see that the crook was all in.

"Come on, Handsome," he said harshly. "I have a date for you."

He dragged Handsome to the elevator, and slammed the door of it in the face of the oncoming engineer. The next moment, as he pressed the switch, they were travelling upwards.

Handsome was lying on the floor of the elevator, his eyes closed. Monty bent down, and lifted his head.

Slowly Handsome opened his eyes. "You win, Monty," he said feebly. "Let me alone."

"Huh!" said Monty unsympathetically. "So you can still talk, can you?" "Yeah! I can talk!"

"Then you're going to—plenty," said Monty. "You are in a bad way, but if you spill what you know, I'll see that something's done for you. You'll tell that you shot Graham, and you'll tell that you robbed his cabin. See?"

"I'll tell everything," gasped Handsome weakly.

"You're right. You'll tell everything. You won't leave out a single blessed thing."

The elevator stopped at the top deck, and Monty flung open the door.

"Hi, you!" he yelled to a deck hand. "Help me with this trash to the captain's office."

"Dull Voyage."

IT was several hours later, and the Transatlantic was already in sight of land. In the ship's hospital lay Handsome, and in the brig were—not Monty and Kramer, but Chalky, Socker, and the others.

Graham was in the hospital, too—in a different part. His wife was by his side, nursing him. He only spoke once before being taken ashore to a nursing home, but what he did say made Kay realise that all her troubles were over.

"Kay," he whispered, "I can't talk much—my breath won't let me. I've been an awful fool—forgive me—"

"Don't worry yourself, dear," replied Kay. "Get better—for my sake."

"You'll give me another chance to make good?"

"Of course."

"Then I'll make amends. All that money—those securities—I'll give them all back—"

He could say no more. Unconsciousness claimed him, but it was the unconsciousness that meant complete recovery.

Kay felt that she could not stay with him any longer. She wanted to cry. Hastily she left his bedside and went out into the open. There she met Judy and Mr. Kramer, waiting for news.

"Mrs. Graham," said Judy quickly, "how is he?"

"He's going to recover completely," replied Kay. "Meanwhile, I want you to come to my cabin as soon as we dock. Your savings are quite safe, and I will give you a letter of credit on my private account which will see you through until you can draw your own money."

"Oh, thank you!" cried Judy.

Meanwhile, in the captain's office, Monty awaited the arrival of the ship in port, when he would have to go ashore to testify concerning the shooting of Handsome. He knew what that meant,

(Continued on page 24.)

A gripping drama of how the Police cunningly tricked a gang of rascally crooks. Another true story from the notebook of William J. Burns of the U.S. Secret Service.

The Squealer.

THE hall of an apartment-house in the Bowery of New York.

At one time the carpet had been good, the stairway well kept, and the furniture polished and clean, but now it was drab and dirty. Except for the occasional visit of a charwoman only men inhabited that house. Racketeers did not welcome outside influence nosing into their affairs.

A round-faced man in a faded raincoat and slouch-hat drawn well over his eyes slunk into the hall, glanced quickly round, and sidled across to a telephone on a small three-legged table.

Stealthily he removed the receiver, and a tense expression appeared on his squat, flabby features.

Leading off that hall were a number of rooms. The library was the best furnished and kept of them all. It was much the same as when the gang had taken over, though there were additional features that not even the police suspected.

Mr. Langman sat at a carved wooden chair of ancient make, and there was a queer expression on his clean-cut features. A glint in his sharp eyes as he replaced the receiver of the telephone, and with one hand drummed softly on the large, flat-topped table that was littered with papers and books. Mr. Langman was a business man to the outside world, hence the books and papers, and shelves lined with books on legal subjects.

Evidently something had arisen that caused him considerable anger, because the lined face twisted and contorted so that it became repulsive and bestial—fury revealed the real nature of the man. Usually the chief was a grey-haired, placid-featured man of smooth manners and a benevolent attitude. The men who worked for him knew that he was as hard as iron.

He ceased drumming on the desk, got to his feet and paced softly up and down the room. Evidently he was planning how best to deal with some problem.

Then he undid a drawer and took out a revolver, and, after seeing it was loaded, carefully replaced it. From another drawer he took out a small book; on each page was the photograph of men and women, and an account of each. The chief believed in having full knowledge of the life-story of each person who worked for him. It was the history of Spike Mullins that interested him, and after a while he nodded his head, replaced the book, and resumed his pacing of the room.

TRAPPIED

A pause, and slowly he pointed at a bookcase near a big fireplace, smiled, and placed a chair by the side of his table—this chair was between the bookcase and his own chair. Satisfied, he pressed a button twice.

The door from the hall opened, and a young man in a blue suit entered. In age the newcomer was about twenty-eight, dark hair and brown eyes, and held himself erect. A quiet, strong type—a useful man to Mr. Langman.

"Close the door, Wilson." "You rang for me, chief?" The young man had shut the door and now came to the desk. The eyes that watched the chief, who was busy writing, were very alert.

"Yes, and the matter is urgent." The chief looked up at his assistant. "I am just making a few notes of importauce—we're quitting this place."

"Quitting, chief?" "Yeah, and some folks will quit for good." There was an ugly sneer on the chief's face. "Somebody is a squealer. Have you any idea who it could be?"

For a second Wilson's eyes flickered, and their gaze moved towards the chief's waistline. The chief's hands were on the legs of his trousers, and not in his pockets. Wilson did not like a hand in a pocket, because it was difficult to tell what might be in the hand.

The chief gave a mirthless laugh. "You have no idea, Wilson?"

"None, chief. I would have sworn that there were no traitors among us." Carelessly he slipped a hand into his own coat-pocket. "Do you know this man's name?"

"Yeah, and it will surprise you when you hear it."

Again the brow flickered curiously. The tense expression left Wilson's face as if the chief's words were a great relief.

"What do you intend to do, chief?" "A little joy-ride in the country!" The thin lips smiled cruelly. "In fact, he'll go with us when we make our getaway from this dive. He's spilled the racket to the cops."

"When, chief?" "Not many minutes ago." The chief waved a thin hand towards the telephone. "That device by which I can listen-in to any conversations proved useful. A little patent of my own. If anyone takes off the receiver that white-dial goes red. If I had not removed the receiver and listened-in we should all be due for a spell in gaol. The cops will raid this place within the next few hours—at five o'clock, to be exact, and it is now two. So we have just three hours, Wilson, to clear out and to settle the squealer."

"You recognised the voice?" Wilson asked the question quietly.

"Yeah, I'd know it in a thousand. A guy I reckoned was on the level. Wilson, how much dope have we got in the cellars?"

"A new supply came in yesterday. About a hundred packets and twenty cases of liquor."

"To blazes with the liquor—that's of no account," snapped the chief. "If the cops get us with drugs we're up for a long stretch. Give orders for the dope to be packed up—it must be all ready to move within an hour—no, an hour and a half. Can you fix that, Wilson?"

"Yes, chief."

"Now, I'm going to put that squealer on the fire." The chief laughed harshly. "You'll hide behind the secret."

November 14th, 1931.

"Keep yer mitts off me and away from that drawer," sneered Spike.

bookcase, and when I ring you cover the guy from behind. First, get the men down in the cellars busy packing up that dope, because I want to put a guard on the front door. Can you guess who the squealer is, Wilson?"

"I can make a mighty good guess, chief." Wilson pursed his lips and showed his teeth. "No mercy, chief!"

"Leave that to me. Get busy, Wilson."

Wilson vanished, and another bell summoned a young man whose face was dissipated and lined. Drink had been his downfall. The small eyes blinked suspiciously at the chief.

"I want Hank on the door and Red at the back exit," ordered the chief. "You're to stay outside this room, and only enter if you have any news of the cops. Yeah, we're expecting a raid. Tell the rest of the gang to get ready for a flit, but to have their gats ready. No need for a scare as I've taken the matter in time. I've located the squealer."

"Squealer, chief? Who?"

"You'll learn later. Wilson will give my instructions re the get-away. He's busy now."

The chief waved his hand in dismissal.

As the crook left the room Wilson entered.

"Everything set, chief," he stated.

"Good!" The chief raised his voice. "Creason, come back." The young crook hurried back into the room. "Send Spike Mullins in to see me."

The door closed, and the chief half-closed his eyes.

"Spike's the squealer. Better get into hiding."

Wilson nodded and hurried to the bookcase. He touched a book, and the whole case swung back. Swiftly he disappeared into the darkness.

The chief slightly opened the drawer containing the gun, his face twisted into an evil leer, and the eyes became hard and steely. His fingers twitched as if they were coiling round a trigger.

November 14th, 1931.

The Two Crooks.

THE door opened, and the man in the faded raincoat slouched into the room; his hat was on his head, and he was chewing gum as if he hadn't a care in the world.

The chief gave him a welcoming smile.

"How are things, Spike?"

"Danged slow!"

"Slow?"

"Too much caution about this joint."

Spike transferred the gum to another tooth. "Can't run a load because the cops ain't in a good humour or the weather ain't nice or some other fool reason."

"You don't mince your words, Spike."

"Why should I?" Spike shrugged massive shoulders. "You're a big shot, but I ain't a pellet from an air-gun. Plain speaking and straight shooting's my motto. I ain't a dumb-bell."

"No, one can't teach you much." The chief opened a drawer and took out his book. "You'll pardon my asking a question, but why did you ask for a transfer from 'Frisco to headquarters? You've been here a fortnight, and I've often wondered. Were you wanted for anything, Spike?"

"Yeah, I should say I was." Calmly Spike took the vacant chair. "The Spicer gang wanted to come in with us, and, against my advice, we made a hook-up. We got two blocks of ice sent us a week later, and in those blocks were a couple of our men, and I got a hint that there was ice to spare. I asked old man Spicer what he weighed, and he told me a hundred and sixty, but he looked a bit green when I asked him what lead bullets weighed. They got two blocks of ice a few days later, and he was in one of 'em. I reckoned I was going to be hustled plenty, and that a change of air might be advisable."

"You're a tough baby, Spike." The chief laughed and produced a cigar-box. "Have a smoke. We certainly got the right man when you joined headquarters."

"You've said it." Spike lit his cigar. "But I'm finding New York pretty slow; reckon I'll soon be asking for a move to Chicago."

"Maybe I'll get you a move." The chief laughed. "If you reckon this game is too slow, give me an idea on how you'd act if you were in my place."

"I'd fire half a dozen of the boobs that call themselves hard eggs. They turn yellow as soon as they see a cop. They're scared to put anyone on the spot, and quake with fright that they may go that way themselves. Ain't worth wasting good lead on those saps. You want guys that ain't scared to shoot first and ask questions afterwards. The cops are getting the upper hand in this burg, and unless we get moving they're going to push us out of business. You have thousands of bucks' worth of dope, and you ain't planting any, and we're so skinned we have to play crap for cents."

"Would it surprise you to know that the police are wise to this hide-out?" The chief's eyes narrowed to mere slits. "We're sitting on Vesuvius, and likely to erupt any second."

"Is that so? Fancy the cops being wise. Shouldn't have thought those flat-feet had the brains. How did they horn in on our game, chief?"

"You haven't any idea—yourself?" Spike favoured the chief with a puzzled glance.

"How should I know? They could have trailed one of our boobs; someone mighta squawked—" He broke off to rub a bristly chin. "Say, is that the way the cops have got wise?"

"It sure is!"

"Oh, oh, ain't that queer?" Spike was silent for a moment or so, whilst the chief watched his intended victim with mocking gaze. He spoke at last. "Have you a trail on the squawker?"

"Maybe I have, and maybe I haven't."

"You mean you know, but you ain't talking." Spike's face seemed to change to a brutal coarseness. "It ain't always wise to talk too much, chief."

Mr. Langman bristled at the man's arrogance.

"I don't get the hang of your ideas, Spike."

"Nor I yours," came the swift answer. "What's the bright idea in all these questions and wise-cracks? Why have you picked out me to spill the beans about a squawker? Do you want him bumped-off, because if that's the office I'll start right in."

"The squawker will be bumped-off soon enough." The chief was laughing. "I'm taking him for a lovely ride out in the country, and he can admire the beautiful scenery for the last time. Must be a nasty feeling to know you haven't got long to live. What do you think, Spike?"

"I think some folks are going goofy!" Spike snorted. "Say, chief, I've got a date. Just what do you want me to do?"

"I thought you might like to come and see the fun." The chief puffed at his cigar and slid one hand towards his desk. "Glorious day for a ride, Spike."

The chief's hand was within an inch of a button hidden on the leg of his desk-table; a movement from Spike, and the button would be pressed. Spike seemed quite indifferent.

"I ain't kinda keen on riding," he said. "I might have a bit of business myself in that line. You see, I knew afore I came in to see you, chief, that the cops were wise to this dive." Spike grinned at the startled expression of his chief. "That surprises you."

"It sure does." The chief pressed the button. "What made you tell me this? Someone has squawked, and what you've just said makes it sound—"

"As if I've been and squealed." Spike's hands were near his pocket. "No, that ain't my sort of racket. I just mentioned the matter because I'm wise to your game."

Mr. Langman scented danger. Was Spike aiming to draw his gun? What a fool not to have housed a weapon in his own pocket. He had taken this squealer too lightly—most of them were yellow. There was a menace in Spike's voice and in the beady dark eyes.

"Wise to my game?" The chief was playing for time. Thank Heaven the door of the bookcase was slowly swinging open. "What game do you reckon I'm playing?" He gripped Spike's right arm. "Pull yourself together, man, you're talking like a madman!"

"A good game of bluff, but I'm wise," Spike sneered. "And keep yer mitts off me and away from that drawer! I told you a while ago a guy what weighed one hundred and sixty pounds. What do you weigh, chief?"

"You're crazy!" raged the chief. "You're crazy with fear." Spike grinned and chewed contentedly. "You're just wondering how long you got to live, you dirty squealer!"

Wilson had slithered through the open bookcase, and in his hand was a gun. A grim smile twitched the strong-mouth.

"What have I done that you want to talk that way? The chief spoke jerkily. A few seconds more, and Wilson would be close behind Spike.

"I'd like to strangle you with my own hands!" A mask of hate appeared on the crook's face. "The Spicer gang thought I was easy, and tried to frame me, but I got 'em! You tried to frame me, and now I'm gonna get you! Did yer think that all that junk about a ride cut any ice with me?"

"I'm not trying to frame you." The chief was white and scared. This attitude of Spike's was baffling. "You squealed to the cops! I heard you." "You lying skunk!" yelled Spike, and whipped out a gun. "I ain't ever squawked. Say yer prayers, you big boob, and take yer medicine!"

"Stand quite still, Spike," drawled a voice. "There's a gun about six inches from your ribs. Chuck that gat on the table—and step quickly!"

The fury and murderous rage died from Spike's face, and he became a furtive, cornered rat. He was trapped. This would mean a ride in the country.

"Curse you!" Spike snarled at the chief. "You've got me, but you won't always get away with this yeller game! One day you're gonna be riddled with lead! I don't play a lone hand in this burg. Take me for a ride, and see what happens to you!"

The chief sighed, and ran a finger round his collar. Gosh, that had been a mighty close squeak with death. What did he care now for the idle and futile threats of a man almost dead?

Spike and Langman Get a Surprise.

WILSON watched the two men under furrowed brows—Langman, who was slowly recovering his courage, and Spike, preparing to face an unpleasant ride.

"Keep Spike covered," drawled the chief. "As he hasn't got much time on this earth, we'll let him have a show-down."

"Cut out the funny stuff!" Spike snarled. "Let's get going!"

"Not before I explain how foolish it was to pit your wits against mine," sneered the chief. "It was unwise of you to ring up police headquarters and arrange for them to pay me a call. I heard the instructions that you gave, and have acted accordingly."

"You heard me squawking?" gasped Spike. "Why, I—"

"Hold your tongue, fool!" snapped the chief. "You can talk when I'm through. I've arranged for this place to be abandoned, so that the cops will only find a dead man when they get here—the squawker who tried to put the cops wise." He pointed to the 'phone. "I listened in, you yellow dog!"

"Now I see yer dirty game!" raved Spike. "You ring up the cops, tip 'em off, collect blood money for selling the game, and try to make me the cat's-paw! You and Wilson have framed this between you! But the boys ain't such fools as that! Sell them, and see if they don't pay it back! You dirty, yeller —"

"Cut out the monickers!" The chief banged on his desk. "Why keep up this lying racket? Why pretend, Spike? I'm wise—I heard your voice!"

"You—you heard?" spluttered Spike. "But I swear on all that's sacred I never spilled the beans! Chief, you're on the wrong trail! I listened in on the 'phone in the hall, and I heard a voice. It did sound like my voice, but—"

"But what?" demanded the chief, scrutinising the other closely. Even a crook sometimes knows when the truth was being spoken.

"But I thought you were imitating my voice!" shouted Spike. "I came in here meaning to square the account."

"Then whose voice did I hear?" The chief spoke softly. "If it wasn't you, who could it have been? You're trying to razz me!" Spike met his gaze boldly. "No, I believe you're on the level. Then who has put the cops wise?"

"How should I know?" muttered Spike. "Maybe Wilson has a line."

(Continued on page 27.)

"A smart piece of work, Wilson." The chief of the gang glared at the detective. "I'm not likely to forget it!" November 14th, 1931.

"TRANSATLANTIC."

(Continued from page 20.)

He would have to return to New York under an extradition warrant.

But his spirits were not damped, in spite of his arm being in a sling. He stood at the window gazing at the people that hurried past.

As he stood there, two men stopped within earshot. One of them lit a cigarette.

"Horribly dull voyage, don't you think?" one of them said.

"Stupid," was the reply. "Nothing interesting ever happens. I'll be glad to land."

They passed on.

Monty laughed, and turned away. As he did so, he saw that Judy and her father were in the office with him. He immediately advanced to meet them.

"Well, well, well!" he said cheerily. "This is awfully good of you."

Kramer cleared his throat noisily.

"Mr. Greer," he said awkwardly, blinking through his spectacles, "I have come to thank you."

Monty smiled and patted his arm.

"Please don't. I've got all the thanks I want in seeing that you are both all right." As he spoke, his eyes wandered to Judy's face, and he found that she was looking at him with an expression in her eyes that made his pulses throb wildly. Hurriedly he looked away again. "Be sure you both have a good time."

Kramer held out his hand.

"Well, good-bye," he said. "Judy wants to say good-bye, too."

They shook hands, and Kramer left the office. Judy and Monty were alone.

"Well, Judy," said Monty, trying to be off-hand, "the voyage is over, and you are going on your way. Good luck to you, wherever you go."

"Yes," said Judy wistfully, looking at him. "The voyage is over."

"And now it's London, Paris, Vienna, Berlin—all the places you've dreamed about and wanted to see," continued Monty, trying to hide his emotion. "What a wonderful adventure you have ahead of you!"

Tears came into Judy's eyes, and she went a little nearer to him—timidly, as though afraid.

"I wish you were coming, too," she said, and from the way the words rushed from her lips, Monty could tell that they had been spoken sincerely—longingly.

"So do I," said Monty, with a touch of sadness. "I'd give all I had to be able to see the world through your eyes. But I'm afraid it's too late. Those responsible for law and order have too much interest in me for me to be able to choose my own comings and goings. Perhaps—one day—"

"Yes?" She breathed the word eagerly.

"Perhaps one day we shall meet again, Judy. I hope so, because you will then find me a far different man."

"I hope so. Oh, I hope so."

Monty held out his hand.

"Well, good-bye, Judy," he said finally. "And all the luck in the world."

"Good-bye."

She took his hand and pressed it, then turned away. She had barely gone a pace, however, when she turned back again, and went very close to him.

"You're the most wonderful man I have ever known," she whispered.

She flung her arms around his neck, and pressed her warm lips to his. The next moment she had gone.

Monty started after her, regrets for his past life filling his mind. How long he stood there he did not know, but presently he felt a touch on his arm.

He turned with a start, to find the worthy Hodgkins in the office.

"Is there anything I can get you, sir?" Hodgkins asked, not forgetting the handsome tip he had received only a short time before.

Monty smiled, but ignored his question.

"Isn't it wonderful, Hodgkins?" he said dreamily.

"What's that, sir?"

"To find a woman who sees us as we might have been—not as we really are."

Hodgkins heaved a deep sigh.

"Women are like that, sir," he said philosophically. "Bless 'em! As I often say to Mrs. 'Odgkins, sir—"

Hastily Monty interrupted him.

"I know, Hodgkins, I know," he said. "A ship is like a little world. You have the rough weather and the calm—the quiet seas and the sudden squalls—and the man who takes the bitter with the sweet is bound to have a happy crossing in the end."

"That's right, sir," said the pleased Hodgkins, beaming brightly.

"Well, good-bye, Hodgkins."

"Good-bye, sir."

They shook hands, and once more Monty found himself alone. Outside the gangway was lowered, and the passengers slowly tramped ashore.

The voyage was ended.

(By permission of the Fox Film Co., Ltd., starring Edmund Lowe and Lois Moran.)

"HELL BENT FOR 'FRISCO."

(Continued from page 12.)

tance when he tripped over the track-way of a travelling crane, to come down in a sprawling heap.

He regained his feet in a moment, but already Jimmy was upon him, and, grappling with him, the young reporter swung him around.

"Take it easy, Kenton," he ground out. "You can't make any getaway."

"No?" snarled Kenton, and as he spoke he pulled free again, and struck Jimmy a blow that rocked him to the heels.

But the Press man was on him again in a twinkling, and his fist caught Kenton on the temple and hurled him to the ground. Jimmy flung himself a-top of the scoundrel, and they wrestled fiercely, the police drawing nearer to the scene in the meantime.

Kenton managed to throw Jimmy aside, and as he scrambled up he kicked at the reporter savagely. Jimmy dived clear of the crook's driving boot, missed it by the fraction of an inch, and regained his feet.

Kenton crowded him, lashing out with right and left in an effort to floor him and continue his flight. But Jimmy met him toe to toe, and fought back against the onslaught, and in the space of a few seconds it was Kenton who was on the defensive.

Jimmy broke through his guard and swung his bunched knuckles to the ribs. Kenton wilted visibly under the impact of the punch, and as he dropped his hands Jimmy ripped home another blow—to the mouth this time.

Kenton tottered backward. The edge of the dock was behind, and, forty feet below, the choppy waters of the sea, smeared with the oil of ocean-going ships.

Jimmy measured him and slammed his right to the jaw. One hundred and eighty pounds of bone and muscle were behind the blow, and it lifted Kenton clean off his feet and pitched him over the quay.

Kenton dropped to the sea, his arms flailing and his legs trundling frantically. He hit the surface with a resounding splash and was swallowed in a smother of foam, and when his head broke water a second or two later he was spluttering breathlessly.

Jimmy peeled off his jacket, and he was throwing it to the ground when the police officers came up with him. They were followed by Ellen, and as she reached the scene the girl tried to restrain Jimmy from his purpose.

"Don't, Jimmy!" she pleaded.

"You'll be drowned!"

But he was scarcely listening. Kicking aside his shoes, he poised himself on the brink of the quay and dived.

His body cleaved into the water close to the spot where Kenton had come to the surface. A moment afterwards he reappeared beside the crook and reached out to clutch him.

The cold shock had revived Kenton and counteracted the effects of the punch that had hurled him into the sea. There was still fight left in him, and he struck at Jimmy viciously as the young reporter approached him.

Jimmy parried the blow, and then filled his lungs to plunge below the surface again. Taking Kenton by the legs, he wound his arms around them firmly and dragged him under.

Kenton writhed like a madman. In thirty seconds Jimmy rose to the surface once more, and grinned up at Ellen and the police officers on the quayside. But he did not permit Kenton to lift his head above water, for, changing his grip to the scoundrel's sleek, dank hair, he held his squirming body beneath the waves.

Kenton's struggles grew feeble, and he had ceased to show any signs of resistance when Jimmy brought him to the surface.

Jimmy then took him by the armpits, and, swimming on his back, kicked out for a stretch of pebbled shore some distance from the quay. Meanwhile, Ellen and the police-officers made for the same objective, realising Jimmy's intention.

They met the young reporter and his prisoner at the water's edge and helped him on to dry land.

"Jimmy," Ellen cried, "are you all right?"

"Sure, I'm all right," he told her. "But Kenton looks pretty sick for himself. Better take him, boys," he added to the officers, pushing the crook towards them.

Sagging limply, Kenton was delivered into the hands of the law. He tried to speak to Ellen, but she turned away from him scornfully and helped Jimmy to don his coat.

"Say, what's the time?" Jimmy demanded all at once. "I've got to get in touch with the chief."

One of the police-officers answered him, drawing a watch from his pocket.

"The exact time is seven fifty-eight," he informed Jimmy.

"Gosh, I've just got two minutes," Jimmy ripped out. "Where's the nearest 'phone? The 'Morning World' can't come off the presses till I give the word to Graham."

"There's a 'phone over there," he was told.

Jimmy raced for the call-box, and Ellen hurried after him. She joined him in the 'phone-booth just as he was lifting the receiver.

"Give me Long Distance—Los Angeles, 'Morning World,'" he jerked. "Reverse the charges and step on it, sis— Er—I mean, step on it, miss, will you, please?"

At seven fifty-nine, when Graham was tearing his hair, the 'phone-bell rang in the editorial office of the "Morning World." Half a dozen hands reached for the instrument, but Graham scattered his subordinates in one blundering rush that was reminiscent of a buffalo stampede.

"Here, gimme that 'phone," he snarled.

He picked up the receiver, anxiety written in every line of his face. Then his brow cleared, and gradually a beam spread across his countenance.

"Hallo?" he panted. "Jimmy? Jimmy Gray? Aw, thank heavens—"

"More dope for you, chief," came the voice of Jimmy. "I just arrested Kenton with my own hands. Knocked him off the quay, then dived after him and brought him to the shore. Say, chief, if you think this has been a picnic— But get a load of this, will you—"

He talked on, Graham listening attentively.

"Good work, boy," the editor said, as Jimmy finally ended his report. "Good work! Hold on a minute, Jimmy, will you?"

He turned to the re-write man. "Add this to Jimmy's story," he ordered: "'Kenton's accomplice, Nick Corrigan, was bumped off in a gun-duel with the police-officers who tried to arrest him. Kenton was taken after a desperate hand-to-hand struggle with the 'Morning World's' special crime representative.'"

"All right, Jimmy," he added, speaking into the telephone once again. "It's a wonderful story, pal, and thanks a lot. Hurry back."

"I'll catch the next train," Jimmy assured him. "So-long, chief!"

Graham hung up the receiver and then faced the members of his staff.

"Gee, what a scoop!" he announced enthusiastically. "Say, if I had to go through another two or three hours like that I'd go crazy. Yes, sir—plumb crazy. Oh, boy, when we get that edition on the streets can you imagine what the guys on the other papers in this town are gonna do?"

He fixed his eye on an office-boy and rapped out a command.

"Go down to the works and tell Jake to let her rip! Quick, son, snap into it."

"Yes, sir," the boy answered, fairly leaping to obey.

Far from the clamour and the hustle of newspaper offices, Jimmy Gray was drawing Ellen Garwood deeper into the telephone-box, and, enfolding her in his arms, he stooped to kiss her tenderly.

Fully a minute afterwards an elderly man hurried up, and he had actually grasped the handle of the booth before he realised that it was occupied. He did not see Ellen, and was only able to distinguish the broad back of Jimmy, whom he imagined to be 'phoning.

With an impatient shrug he passed on.

(By permission of the Gaumont Film Co., Ltd., starring Charles Delaney and Vera Reynolds.)

Hollywood's Monuments.

HOLLYWOOD, though too young in years to possess any history, has many monuments of its own in the shape of "sets" still standing of famous picture classics of the past. In the days before the talkies many pictures were made by the largest of the producing companies which entailed the erection and equipment of sets of gigantic dimensions. After the picture was completed it was often found that to dismantle the set would take so much time and labour that it would be a more economical proposition to let it remain standing, particularly if it happened to stand on ground that was not urgently needed for immediate use for another production.

Many strangers in Hollywood, ignorant of the pictures in which these sets were used, would pass these landmarks in film history without as much as a second's thought, for, to the uninitiated, they are nothing but the remains of old scenes apparently used in days gone by for some picture or another, dead and forgotten.

To the veterans of film-land, however, these old settings bring back pleasant memories. Whilst in the busiest studios the sets erected for present-day pictures are being changed practically every day, these old relics, often on the outskirts of Hollywood, remain as monuments to the greatness of the particular picture for which they were originally built.

Sometimes a corner of a wall in one of these old sets is even now used for a close-up in a present-day picture; often a part of an old set is remodelled so that it is given an entirely different appearance for a new film.

It was only a short time ago when the famous Rex Ingram production, "The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse," was recalled by the destruction of the huge set of the ruined chateau, which played such an important part in that film. Many people made wealthy and famous by this picture used to look upon this set with a feeling almost of reverence, for it had been one of the few permanent reminders of one of the greatest films the silent screen ever knew, bringing in its trail of conquest the fortunes of Rudolph Valentino, Alice Terry and Rex Ingram, to name only a few of those who were "made" by its success.

About a quarter of a mile away from the Culver City studio is the old Pathé studio, where, still standing, close to the boundary fence, is a towering castle, partly hidden in these hectic days by smaller sets which have been built in front of it. Despite this, however, its battlements stand above everything else in the neighbourhood to remind one of the first picture Cecil B. de Mille made as an independent producer, "The Road to Yesterday."

Big sets for motion pictures are never mentioned in the best-informed circles without some reference to what has been claimed by many to be the mightiest of them all, the marvellous Notre Dame Cathedral setting at Universal City. There Carl Laemmle poured in hundreds of thousands of dollars to perfect every detail in making as near as human ingenuity and endeavour could devise an exact replica of the original cathedral it was built to represent. There, for many months, crowds of thousands played in huge scenes in making one of the biggest and most spectacular films of all time, "The Hunchback of Notre Dame," which set the seal on the fame of the late Lon Chaney. Now the set, still standing, is looked upon as a mute reminder of this great character actor.

No visitor to Hollywood can say that he has had a proper look over all the sights unless he has seen this set on the Universal lot, for to come away without doing so would be as bad as "seeing the sights of London" and leaving without a visit to the Tower!

When a couple of the largest of the new stages on the Metro lot were built to make space for the making of an even bigger number of talkies, a long, majestic flight of steps was destroyed. They had stood for years since being first built for the making of the old Goldwyn film, "Three Weeks"; in fact, a large amount of the action of the film took place on them.

Just off Motor Boulevard, in Culver City, the high walls of a gigantic prison can be seen towering over the walls that surround the studio. Curious visitors, peering quickly through the gate which admits to the guarded enclosure, would see what appeared to be a part of a great house of detention, a cold, grey expanse of confining walls. To folks who know their film lore that setting will always be "The Big House," for it was for the film of that name that it was originally built.

Not far away from it is a six-story orphanage, built to provide the many thrills in that pictorial glorification of the fireman, "The Fire Brigade," released in this country under the title of "Fire!"

At the corner of Vine Street and Sunset Boulevard in Hollywood there stretches an enormous vacant lot, covering several acres in the very heart of the film colony. It was here that the old Lasky and the present Paramount studio was founded. Several years ago the whole studio was transferred to a new location, and all the old buildings were either razed to the ground or moved. In an odd corner, however, can still be found the crumbling remains of a plaster pedestal. On this stood the "Golden Calf," used in the first of the great Biblical pictures, "The Ten Commandments."

(Continued on page 28.)

32

RILEY'S "HOME" BILLIARD TABLES

GIVEN AWAY FREE

Write for particulars to
E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
 Howard Works, ACCRINGTON,
 and at Dept. 35, 147, Aldersgate
 Street, LONDON, E.C.1.

ROBERT MONTGOMERY.

The young Metro star who is making a big name for himself.

"TRAPPED."

(Continued from page 23.)

"If you'll put your hands high, Spike, I'll tell you," softly spoke Wilson. "And that applies to you, chief." "Are you mad, Wilson? You know how I deal with—"

"Put your nitts high, Mr. Langman, and don't try any funny stuff," drawled Wilson, and now his gun covered the chief. "And just stand right away from that drawer. You want to know who did the talking—well, you ain't got far to look."

The chief and Spike stared at each other as they raised their hands. What this meant was slowly dawning on them. Wilson was in the pay of the police!

Trapped.

SOMEWHERE a shot rang out and then a cry of pain.

"This place is surrounded," calmly announced the man with the gun. "It's taken me weeks to get you, Langman, but I've got you now. I've done some of your dirty jobs so that you never suspected me."

"So you're a cop!"

"Police detective," smiled Wilson. "After you shot my comrade, Gilson, I asked to be put on the job. They transferred me from Boston. That's why you did not know my face. A week ago a patrolman was shot who stopped a lorry, and from that moment the net's been closing round you."

"You imitated my voice!" Spike thrust his jaw forward. "Are you lying, or is this more bluff?"

"I ain't the kind that lies." Wilson spoke in a husky undertone not unlike the other's voice. "Yours is not the only voice I can imitate. I'm thinking of taking someone for a nice ride in the country." Mr. Langman showed his teeth at the perfect imitation of himself. "Now nothing remains but to wait here until my colleagues appear. If there are any questions I can answer, don't hesitate. You won't have much time to talk where you two cheap skates are going."

"When I get through I'll come back for you, Wilson!" The chief's eyes were blazing with hate and baffled fury.

"Maybe you won't come back or have the chance," sneered Wilson. "I've got the gun that shot that patrolman, and it was your gun, Langman!"

The chief and Spike watched the detective with eyes alert for any chance. They knew that if taken to gaol it meant the end. Spike cursed himself for boasting; Wilson would have heard all about the clean-up of the Spicer gang. Better to die than go to the chair! He edged a pace nearer the detective.

"Don't move again, Spike! I have no compunction about shooting rats like you! Keep those hands high, Langman!"

Sounds of sudden shooting and much commotion, harsh voices, cursing, and the moaning of someone badly hurt. Pounding footsteps running towards the library.

"Keep quite still, gentlemen!" cautioned Wilson.

The curtains over the doorway were flung aside, and the dissipated youth, with blood streaming down his face from a bullet graze, glared at the three men with fear-distorted visage.

"The cops, chief! The cops—" His voice trailed away as he saw the gun in Wilson's hand.

In a second he knew Wilson was a policeman, but as he swung up the gun in his hand Wilson's weapon spoke.

The gun dropped from the nerveless fingers as, clutching at his shoulder, the crook sank to the ground in a moaning heap.

In that same instant Spike and Langman flung themselves forward, but Wilson was prepared. A jump backwards, a straight upper-cut with his left fist, and Spike was flung back into the chief's arms.

Angrily the chief pushed his comrade aside and leaped forward. The gun spoke again, and a spasm of pain creased the chief's face. His arm flapped useless against his side, and he could feel a trickle of blood running down the back of his hand.

"Try that again and I shoot to kill!" blazed Wilson. "Get up, Spike, and quick!"

Slowly and reluctantly Spike got to his feet, his ferrety eyes seeking everywhere for some chance of a break, but in the steely eyes of the detective he knew there was no hope.

"Stop nursing yer jaw!" Wilson snapped, and pushed forward a chair. "Sit there, Langman, and don't forget I can handle a gun!"

Wilson backed across the room till he stood over the groaning, dissipated young crook.

"Stop snivelling!" The detective was not inclined to be merciful. "You've only got a flesh wound. Pass me up that gun of yours—the hutt first!"

He snapped open the breach, saw the gun was loaded, and smiled grimly. He reloaded his own gun, but his intent eyes never relaxed their watch over the chief and Spike.

Outside the house came the whirr of a machine-gun and then a crashing sound that meant that the cops were breaking in. The round-up should soon be complete.

The shooting in the library must have warned the besieged crooks that there was trouble in their midst, and that their chief might be in danger. What had become of Spike, Wilson, and the Kid?

Only the chief and those wholly in his confidence knew of the secret passage behind the bookcase, but the gang did know that there was some method of escape. The chief must reveal his secret, and let them get away from the deadly fire of the cops, already two of the gang had been badly wounded.

The front door gave way as three of the gang raced towards the library. Wilson had heard them coming, and was watching from behind a curtain that screened the library door. Wanton killing was not in his line, and he contented himself with dropping the first gangster with a bullet through the leg. The other two darted towards the stairs, and wasted their ammunition by blazing away at the library door.

One, holder than the other, edged down the steps with the intention of flinging the curtains aside and jumping in at the hidden marksman.

Just as he was about to hurl himself through the curtains three policemen rushed into the lounge hall. The man on the stairs fired through the banisters, missed, and next moment came rolling down the stairs with a bullet through the lungs. The other two cops flung themselves on the other crook before he could turn his gun on them.

Handcuffs stopped all further arguments.

"This way, boys!" shouted Wilson. "I've got Langman and two others! It's okay because I've got 'em where I want 'em."

A few moments later Langman had the humiliation of having handcuffs slipped over his wrists. Spike took it as a matter of course; he was an old lag.

Men in uniform lined up on either side of the two gangsters, whilst two others attended to the snivelling, moaning Kid.

"A smart piece of work, Wilson!" The chief glared at the detective. "I'm not likely to forget it."

"Don't worry yourselves about remembering," laughed Wilson, and helped himself to one of the chief's cigars. "We're not having any further trouble. We've too much on you to permit even the crookedest of lawyers to get you out of this jam. Take 'em away, boys!"

When the gangsters had been taken away and the wounded Kid removed on a stretcher, Wilson organised a complete search of the house, and found enough evidence to ensure there being no escape for the Chief.

(By permission of Ideal Films, Ltd.)

GRAND FILM NOVELS.

He lived by trickery and blackmail, but love entered his life and he tried to reform—but once a criminal always a criminal.

"THE LAWLESS WOMAN."

A young reporter is ordered to investigate the death of a powerful crook and together with a show girl is plunged into a whirl of intrigue and strange adventure. Starring Carroll Nye and Vera Reynolds.

Complete in this week's issue of our splendid companion paper.

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY. PRICE 2s. November 14th, 1931.

HOLLYWOOD'S MONUMENTS.

(Continued from page 25.)

A little while ago a buyer of scrap lumber found in his wagon a long sign which read "Newberry Prison." This was the last remnant of the appearance of Lillian Gish in a picturization of the classic song, "Annie Laurie."

On the opposite side of the city of Los Angeles, far from Hollywood, there is an abandoned studio which stopped work many years ago. Still standing there, however, is a section of an African village which had its initial use in one of the episodes of those very early film thrillers, "The Adventures of Kathleen," featuring Kathryn Williams, one of the first stars in films.

When the wreckers went to work on the old Mack Sennett studio at Edendale after the comedy producer had moved to another location, it recalled to many present the days when the late Mabel Normand played there in her great success, "Mickey."

One of the most pathetic sights of all is the crumbling ruin of a church set which stands on the coast highway running north from Santa Monica to San Francisco. About six miles from the former town, it stands by itself, although real estate offices and new beach residences are beginning to crowd in on it from all sides. Most people who pass it have not the slightest idea that it ever had any connection with the film industry, yet it is all that is left of one of the busiest of the early studios, the old "Inceville," where Thomas H. Ince raised, among many others, William S. Hart and Charles Ray to stardom.

The quickly-growing population increased the demand for beach property, and after Ince moved to another quarter the studio structures were taken away and the land divided up for sale in separate sections. All that remains of the old studios is the disintegrating chapel, once built for a picture so long ago that no one can remember its name.

To persons with imagination and sentiment these mute reminders of the past glories of the film industry are the most stirring sights in that part of America. Unfortunately, we have none such in England, perhaps because the average British film has never reached that spectacular stage which has entailed the erection of sets of the mammoth order.

(Continued from page 2.)

Two Lovely Black Eyes.

Jack Hobbs, who in the past few weeks has fought with thirty people, dashed round corners in a racing car at breakneck speed, crashed through the side of a barn in a taxi, and done many other things inviting injury to himself, has been the victim of a simple accident which rendered him unconscious and left him with two perfect black eyes.

Hobbs is playing in the film, "The Love Race," which is being directed for B.I.P. by Lupino Lane at Elstree, and the accident in which he was involved took place inside a taxi which, for the purpose of the film, was hurrying with him to the start of a big motor speed race in which he was to take part.

He was standing up urging the driver to gain speed when the taxi swerved at a corner in one of the lanes near Elstree where the action was taking place, and he struck his head with terrific force against the roof. It was at once seen that he was badly hurt, and a doctor was summoned. Hobbs was still unconscious when the doctor arrived, and it was learnt with relief, after he had been examined, that his injury was not as serious as at first feared. At Lupino Lane's instructions the injured actor was sent home by car, and later (with the exception of his black eyes) was none the worse for the accident.

Film Stars in Gas Masks.

The exciting spectacle of four film stars trapped and surrounded by flames in a burning mansion was witnessed by crowds of people from Beaconsfield and the surrounding district who hurried to the British Lion studios at Beaconsfield during the early hours of one morning, thinking that the studio was on fire.

Actually scenes were being filmed for the talkie version of the Edgar Wallace thriller, "The Old Man," and the sequence depicting the fire at Lord Arranway's mansion was being filmed. The central figures in these tense scenes were Anne Grey, Lester Matthews, D. Clark-Smith and Gerald Rawlinson, all of whom had to receive medical attention after the scenes were shot.

So dense and choking was the smoke in this realistic sequence that the artistes and the studio staff were forced to use gas masks during the several rehearsals.

The mansion, which was built up in the grounds of the studio, was a spacious affair over 50 feet in height, and when the flames were at their deadliest Manning Haynes, who is the producer of the film and a stickler for realism in his productions, discovered that some valuable old furniture and tapestries which were being used on the set were in danger, and, rushing into the flames, he was responsible for the rescue of a famous old tapestry worth several hundred pounds which had been lent for the production.

This exciting fire sequence is only one of the many thrilling scenes which will go towards the making of what it is hoped will constitute the first talkie with 100 per cent action.

The "Gorilla" and the Charwoman.

Dubois, the well-known animal impersonator, had an amusing experience recently at Welwyn Garden City. He had to take the part of a full-grown gorilla in the picture, "The Four Winds."

While trying to find his way through the studio to the "set" where the film was being made, he lost his way, and found himself in a darkened passage. There he saw a charwoman, and, fearful of his frightful appearance, went up to her to ask the right way. But before he had time to speak, the old lady turned round and, seeing a big ape standing near her, gave a piercing shriek and went along that passage faster than she had ever moved for years.

Norman Lee, the director of the film, and his company heard her yell, and hurried to the scene to see what was the matter. They recognised that it was only Dubois in his make-up, but it was not till he had removed his mask and then confronted the frightened charwoman that she could be convinced he was not "the missing link."

GROSE'S		8, New Bridge Street, LONDON, E.C.4.	LUDGATE CIRCUS.
BILLIARDS AT HOME 1/- per week.
SIZE	DEPOSIT	4 monthly payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10/-	6/6	26/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8/6	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10/-	12/6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	15/6	52/-
Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls, guaranteed unbreakable, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk. COMPLETE LIST FREE.

STAMMERING Stuttering. New, remarkable, Certain Cure. Complete, 2/- Details.—L. A. STEBBING, (Stammer Dpt. A.P.), 26, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

BE TALL Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 26, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

STAMMERING, STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars free. FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

ONE GUINEA

is all you pay for a charming Portable Model. Many other bargains in Horn, Hornless, Upright, Grand and Consoles, with which I give AN ALBUM OF FREE RECORDS. Approval, Carriage Paid. Monthly terms. Write for my Free Lists NOW.

Edwd O'Brien, Ltd. SEND FOR LISTS

SPECIALISTS IN CYCLES & GRAMOPHONES. 60-62, COVENTRY.

BLUSHING, Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 6/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 26, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

BE TALLER! Increased my own height to 6ft. 3 1/2in. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-), including Almost Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, STOURBRIDGE.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Boy's Cinema

"Sundown Trail" and "The Warden's Pen."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 623.

EVERY TUESDAY.

NOVEMBER 21st, 1931.

The STAR WITNESS

A GRIPPING STORY OF A GANGSTER'S TERRORISM

Don't Miss This
→
GRAND NEW ANNUAL
NOW ON SALE
6¢
Coloured Plates & Photogravures.

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"The Star Witness."

Grandpa Summerill, Charles (Chic) Sale; District Attorney Whitlock, Walter Huston; Ma Leeds, Frances Starr; Sue Leeds, Sally Blane; Pa Leeds, Grant Mitchell; Jackie Leeds, Ed. J. Nugent; Ned Leeds, Dicky Moore; Donny Leeds, George Ernst; Thorpe, Russell Hopton; Maxey Campo, Ralph Ince; Williams, Robert Elliot; Big Jack, Nat Pendleton.

"Sundown Trail."

Buck Sawyer, Tom Keene; Dorothy Beals, Mariou Shilling; Flash Prescott, Nick Stuart; George Marsden, Hooper Atchley; Joe Currier, Stanley Blystone; Jenny, Louise Beavers; Ma Stoddard, Alma Chester; Pa Stoddard, William Welsh.

"Horror" Films.

I do not know how many of you like the "horror" films of the "Dracula" type, though personally I cannot see what "entertainment" there is in pictures that are designed for the sole object of making one's flesh creep. But apparently there is some demand for the judging by the fact that other such pictures are being produced.

"Frankenstein" is the title of one, and no pains or money is being spared by Universal to make it even more horrible and creepy than "Dracula." Colin Clive will be seen in the title rôle and Boris Karloff will appear as a monster. At the Paramount studios a new version is being made of "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde."

As some of you may remember, John Barrymore made one of the greatest hits of his screen career when he appeared some years ago in the dual rôles of the silent film. There were scenes in it that were creepy enough then, but with the addition of such sounds as shrieks and moaning the horror of the story is certain to be increased. Both these films are being made in an atmosphere of secrecy.

Colin Clive's Hustle.

Colin Clive's recent departure to America to play the lead in "Frankenstein" makes it his third visit to that country. He first went there when James Whale, also an Englishman, was put in charge of the direction of the screen version of "Journey's End." Mr. Whale tested a number of other actors for the part of Capt. Stanhope, and, failing to be satisfied, cabled to Colin Clive to come over and play the rôle.

His second trip across the Atlantic November 21st, 1931

NEXT WEEK'S GRAND NUMBER.

"DANGER ISLAND"

Adventure! Nerve-tingling, daredevil, hair-raising exploits on a dangerous expedition in search of a fortune in radium to an uncharted volcanic island off the coast of Africa! Start this magnificent new serial next week! Starring Kenneth Harlan, Lucille Browne and Walter Miller.

"THE GUEST HOUSE."

Owing to rustlers, an old rancher and his charming daughter are forced to take in paying guests. Ruin stares them in the face until a stranger rides in from the prairies. Starring Rex Lease.

"THE LADY FROM NOWHERE."

A stirring tale of the Secret Service. Trapped and double-crossed by a woman, faced with disgrace, a man fights back to save his name. Starring Alice Day and John Holland.

"THE TRIANGLE MURDER."

Another gripping story from the notebook of William J. Burns of the U.S. Secret Service of blackmail and a mysterious menace.

was in answer to a summons to play in "Overture" at the Longacre Theatre in New York City. But his third trip proved a real hustle. As soon as he arrived in New York he was rushed off to Universal City by aeroplane so that no time might be lost before he began his rôle in "Frankenstein." This time his stay in America will be very much longer than his two previous visits, for Carl Laemmle, jun., has taken the precaution of getting Colin Clive to sign a five-year contract.

Mickey Daniels' Freckles.

Mickey Daniels, the big freckled-faced lad, who used to play in his younger days in "Our Gang" comedies, has been much worried lately over his freckles. They have always been his pride and trade-mark, and it was even whispered (you can reach for the salt if you like) that he knew exactly how many freckles he had.

But the Californian sun has had its effect on Mickey's face. It not only tanned it a rich brown, but drew quite a number of those freckles together, till now Mickey can't tell one from the other. He feels the value of his trade-mark is disappearing.

His Own Double.

The other day Stan Laurel found himself in the strange position of being regarded as only an imitation of himself.

It happened while the sad-faced comedian was fishing from one of several barges that were anchored off the Californian coast. It was his day off, so that he had no sort of make-up on. Standing next to him in silence was a pudgy stranger who was also bent on trying to get a "bite." After a while the stranger walked over to the barge-keeper for some more bait. He came back chuckling heartily.

"Say," he remarked to the comedian, "can you beat this? That guy over there"—jerk-ing a thumb in the direction of the barge-keeper—"has been trying to kid me that you are Stan Laurel of Laurel and Hardy. Just keep up the joke and you and I will be able to raise a lot of laughs!"

Why Be an Extra?

If you want to be an extra in films the chances are a thousand to one against you. You'll certainly starve most of the time, go without work almost continually, and if you are lucky enough to get past the studio gates you will probably find that the rôle you have been assigned is so small that your friends and relations will not be able to spot you in the crowd.

Yet there are people who seem to be content to be nothing else but extras. There are 15,000 registered ones in Hollywood and 150,000 prospective others who stand by, hoping upon hope to be given a chance some day. Why, therefore, be an extra? Here is the answer of one of them.

He is Sherman Dowd, fifty-eight, white-bearded and slightly deaf. His opinion was sought when he was playing the part of a sword-dealer, hawking a colourful collection of sinister-looking weapons in the new Samuel Goldwyn production, "The Unholy Garden."

"Why be an extra?" Dowd repeated. "Because ever since I have been a boy I've wanted to see the world and do adventurous things. Being an extra enables me to gratify this desire within Hollywood itself where many parts of the world can be reconstructed. Today I am an Arab peddler, to-morrow

(Continued on page 27.)

Eye-witnesses to a terrible crime—threatened—beaten—kidnapped. Their duty is to tell all—but their lives are worthless if they speak! A heart-stirring story of a family who found themselves menaced by ruthless gangsters.

Starring CHARLES (CHIC) SALE and WALTER HUSTON.

The Unexpected Guest.

FARAMENTO, city of eternal gang warfare—where guns spit death at all odd moments of the day, sending law abiding citizens scuttling pell-mell for shelter, while the ruthless racketeers fight out their quarrels till one gang or the other is exterminated, or the police interrupt and quell the outbreak by a grim and vigorous attack on both sides.

A week-end of many such desperate gun battles, resulting in much bloodshed, was followed by a quiet and peaceable Monday morning and afternoon. Never the sound of a single shot—not the least sign of a gangster to be seen prowling the streets. The calm before the storm. Soon a terrible fight would be waging somewhere in the city. So thought Charles Whitlock, the eminent and powerful district attorney, as he sat in his office at the Criminal Courts Building, ruminating upon the unusual inactivity of the dread law-breakers he had sworn to crush.

And there were thousands of others, citizens as well as police, who had adopted the same line of thought as the district attorney, as late afternoon came and the peace of the day remained unbroken by the wicked splutter of revolver and machine-gun bullets. This tranquillity could not last. Soon there would break yet another grim and awesome gun duel among the crook fraternity, who had the whole city in a grip of terror and dread.

But there was one family in Faramento, at least, who that day had not given a single thought to the terrible menace of the gangster—and certainly this callous brute never entered their heads as they sat down to table to partake of the evening meal.

There was Pa Leeds at the head of the laden table, a short, stockily built man of some forty-eight years, with sandy hair that was tinged with grey, and brown eyes that looked tired after the toil of the day. Opposite him was his wife, a shade younger than himself, but whose face, once obviously pretty, now showed lines of care and worry. On her right was her eldest son, Jackie, weak of character though not bad-looking—and at the moment out of a job. Beside him was an empty chair, yet to be filled, while facing him sat a pair of incorrigible youngsters, his brothers, Donny and Ned, ten and five years respectively.

The clatter of knives and forks and the sound of much chattering as the meal began, then suddenly the dining-room door swung open, and a pretty, neatly-dressed girl, with large hazel eyes and light brown hair burst in upon the diners.

"Oh, so there you are, Sue!" Pa Leeds paused in the act of conveying a succulent piece of boiled pork to his somewhat large mouth, to frown at his daughter as she sank wearily into the empty chair beside her elder brother. "I thought you'd got lost. Unusual for you to be so late for dinner."

"Forgive me, dad." Sue gave him a bewitching smile that chased away his frown. "We came home by Victory Drive and got stuck in several traffic jams."

"More meat, please," came a plaintive voice.

Little Ned glanced at his mother hungrily, then passed her his empty plate as she finished serving Sue. Satisfied with his girl's explanation of her lateness in arriving home, Pa Leeds renewed his attack on the pork and beans. But Jackie was openly sneering at his sister, forgetful for the moment that his dinner was getting cold.

"I say, Sue," he remarked nastily. "I should think Jim Martin would be ashamed to drive that old tin can of his among all those swell buses up on the drive."

Sue pouted, but made no answer, for it was not the first time her brother had got at her over her boy friend's second-hand car. But their father, somewhat irritable on account of the immense amount of work he had been called upon to do that day, cast glinting eyes upon Jackie.

"Well, my lad," he said with biting sarcasm, "that old tin can, as you call it, is a darn sight more car than you'll ever drive, if you don't quit wasting your time around pool-rooms."

"That's right, ram all that down my throat again," Jackie looked at his father sullenly. It always did touch him on the raw whenever his parent accused him of haunting the local billiards hall, mixing with the set of idlers that frequented the place. "Tell me, is it my fault I can't find work?"

Mrs. Leeds gave her husband a warning glance. Always she did her best to avert quarrels among her family. But Pa Leeds paid her no heed.

"Whose fault is it, then?" he snapped, glowering fiercely at the boy. "Not yours, of course. Well, let me tell you something, Jackie. I can't say I've seen you bust any legs trying to find a berth."

"But, pa," protested Mrs. Leeds, hastening to protect her eldest son. "Jackie tries every day to find a job—I'm sure of it."

"You think so, eh?" The father turned his eyes on Jackie again as his wife made to satisfy young Donny, who was clamouring for more potatoes. "You ought to have stayed at High-school a while longer, my boy. You'd have then been fitted for a decent clerical job. Why, at this very moment, W. P. Randolph & Co. are in want of a bookkeeper. I could no doubt have got you the post, but you know nothing—simply nothing. As a matter of fact, in my opinion you don't wish to know anything."

"So that's what you think, is it? Well, I know a darned sight more than you imagine. And now let me tell you something, father. I wouldn't dream of working for such a rotten firm as yours. Why, they're nothing more than—" Jackie broke off his furious outburst, not because his father had half-risen from his seat and was glaring at him angrily, but because there had drifted to his ears the sounds of a life being played somewhat out of tune. The boy groaned dismally. "Oh, heck! Now we're in for a pleasant evening—I don't think!"

A pleased expression had come into Mrs. Leeds' face at the first notes of the musical instrument, while they had caused young Donny and Ned to leap to their feet and to scatter from the room.

The front door reached, the elder of the two boys quickly flung it open to reveal, standing on the doorstep, an aged man with iron-grey hair and beard, and grey eyes that held a peculiar hard glitter. A quaint figure he cut as he stood there in his army pensioner's blue uniform, spectacles perched half-way down his nose, the fife to his lips, his legs bent at the knees with the rheumatism from which he suffered.

"Gramps! Gramps!" cried Donny ecstatically. "Well, it's sure nice to see you again."

The old fellow ceased to torture the fife, patted the heads of the two small boys affectionately, then stamped in and entered the dining-room. After him went Donny and Ned, and they made a divo for their seats as their grandfather suddenly halted and, grinning amiably, drew his hand to the salute.

"Silence in the ranks!" came the throaty tones of the old soldier. "Private Summerill salutes the family of Leeds!"

In another moment Mrs. Leeds was beside him, clutching him by the arm. "Glad to see you, father!" She kissed the thin and wrinkled face. "But come along. You're just in time for dinner. I'll get you a chair."

But Sue had already procured one from the kitchen, and had placed it in between Donny and Ned. Greetings were eventually over, and the old warrior sank with a grunt into the chair and attacked the pork and beans his daughter set before him.

"Staying long, grandpa?" inquired Pa Leeds as he set aside his empty plate.

"Forty-eight hour furlough." The old fellow thrust some of the pork and beans into his capacious mouth and smacked his lips appreciatively. "That means I'll be with you till Wednesday."

Jackie grunted disgustedly, for this meant he would have to share his bed with his grandpa. But the others fussed round the old boy in an endeavour to make him feel at home.

"I'm mighty glad you came, gramps." Young Donny cast a furtive glance in his mother's direction, saw that she was not looking his way, and slyly appropriated a spoonful of mashed potato. "Yes, I am that, for you'll be able to see the baseball game with Downey Intermediate."

"Sure—that's just what I came for, Donny." The old warrior shot his young grandson an affectionate glance. A baseball enthusiast himself, he was glad there was at least one member of his daughter's family who had taken to America's great national game. "And see here, you young scallywag, I'll be sitting right there behind that wire-netting a-watching that out-shoot of yours just a-comin' a-tearin' across the plate. My, but how I'll cheer you."

There was an audible sniff from Jackie, who despised all outdoor games and exercises. To his mind there was far more honour to be gained in compiling a hundred or two break on the billiards table than there was in making the winning shot for one's side in a big ball game.

Two pairs of eyes instantly glared at him. Both Donny and his grandpa knew the reason for that sniff, and it riled them to have the game they loved scoffed at in this way. But they could say no word in protest, for at that moment Ma Leeds spoke.

"If you intend to go to the ball game, father, you'd better quit drinking right now." She wagged a reproving finger at the old fellow as, a pained look creeping into his eyes, he opened his mouth to voice a protest. "No, no, I don't want to hear any excuses, father. I tell you I'm not going to have this family disgraced again—like the last time you were here and you blacked poor Mr. Ashton's eye."

"Oh, so you'd hang that over me, huh?" Grandpa gave a chuckle as he remembered the incident alluded to. It had often tickled him to think that he, an old fellow of eighty, had stood up to a man a full thirty years his junior. But there was no doubt he had had a drink or two too many that day, and, remembering, his face took on a repentant expression. "I'm sorry about that little spot of bother, my dear, of course. But still I'd every excuse. It was provocation, that's what it was. You see, that particular day my leg'd been bothering me and I just had to take something to relieve the pain—a little overdose kinda limbers it up. But, as I said, I'd every excuse about the Ashton affair. An argument over the baseball match. I was right, but he couldn't see it. And, besides, he called me a billy-goat."

"And then the fireworks started." Pa Leeds cast a reproachful glance at his wife's father. At the time of that brawl between the old fellow and Claude Ashton, who lived near by, he had been very much upset. Supposing the fracas got to the ears of his boss? Well, Pa had realised the harm it could do him in regard to his business position, for old W. P. was a martinet, and any scandal in which a member of his staff was involved was likely to meet with much disfavour. But, fortunately, W. P. never got to hear of that disturbing episode. "That certainly was a disgraceful business, father. You came home with one eye closed and a policeman hanging on each arm—that's what you did."

"Oh, a policeman? Well, let me tell you I just walked home with those boys. Yeah, I'd been a-wrestling with 'em friendly-like." The old stager's eyes gleamed fiercely. Not for nothing had he won half a dozen medals during the period he had served his country. In his veins was fighting blood, and as the episode of that day came clearly back to him, that fighting blood was roused.

"Heck, but I'd have put them two bulls on their backs that day if it hadn't been for my darned leg."

"And you said it was friendly wrestling?" Pa Leeds sadly shook his head. "Why you ought to be ashamed, at your age, causing such a disturbance as you did."

"Age!" Grandpa Summerill hopped up from his chair, banged his fist violently on the table, then sat down again, eyeing his son-in-law fiercely. "Why, doggone it, I'm just as strong as a bull and just as quick and active as a kitten. Dang you, George, if you don't get my monkey up, I've half a mind to put you on your back just to show you to be careful what you say."

"Now, now, father, please!" Again his daughter looked at him reprovingly. "Get on with your dinner, and not so much of the fighting spirit. Have some more spinach?"

"No." A good portion of pork and beans disappeared into his mouth.

"Don't like spinach, my dear."

"But it's good for you. It's got iron in it. Makes you strong."

"Heck! Didn't I tell you just now I'm strong enough? Now be quiet, the lot of you, while I finish my food."

For several minutes the meal progressed with the silence broken only by the two small boys, who possessed amazing appetites and clamoured for more of the pork and beans in no uncertain manner.

Presently grandpa pushed aside his empty plate, drew a smaller plate towards him, then reached for a piece of bread-and-butter.

"No blackberry jam?" he grunted, as his eyes swept the table.

"Sure, grandpa." Pretty Sue was on her feet in an instant. "There's some stowed in the cellar. I'll get it for you."

As she ran from the room, the peace of the evening was shattered by several loud reports and the roar of a motor-car's engine somewhere in the street.

"What's that?" gasped Ma Leeds, startled.

"Some car back-firing," said Jackie laconically.

But Donny and Ned had jumped up from the table and had scampered to the bay windows overlooking Western Street.

"Hully gee!" Donny's eyes went wide with horror as he peered through the panes of the right-hand window of the bay. "Tain't no back-firing. It's two cars—sh-shooting at each other!"

Gang Warfare.

IN a moment Jackie, together with his mother and father and his grandpa, were crowding round the window, gazing with horror-filled eyes along the street that stretched below. Darkness had fallen, but in the light from the powerful street lamps they could see two speeding cars, one a little distance behind the other; see, too, the wicked stabs of flame as the occupants of the vehicles fired at each other.

"Sounds like the Battle of Chickamauga," grandpa grimly remarked.

Quite a fusillade of shots echoed along the street, then suddenly there came the raucous note of police whistles, and an unmistakable whining noise that increased quickly to a roar. And all the while those two cars, tearing madly up the street, drew nearer the house of the watching Leeds' family.

"The dirty skunks!" Grandpa's fists were tightly clenched, the fighting light back in his eyes. "But the cops are after them—hear the roar of their cars and motor-bikes? This is one gang feud that won't have a very long life."

"Look, look! The leading car's zig-zagging across the road. I can just see the driver; he—he's sprawling over the wheel. K-killed, I sup-suppose. The— Mrs. Leeds suddenly clapped her hand to her mouth, her heart thudding painfully against her ribs, her face draining of all colour. "Oh, heavens! The car—it's out of control! It—"

There was a loud crash, followed by the sound of smashing glass as the leading car, driverless and completely out of control, suddenly swung on to the pavement below and drove straight into a lamp-post. Next second the horrified Leeds family saw two men leap from the wrecked vehicle and dash away down the street.

On the instant there came three wicked flashes of flame from the pursuing automobile as revolvers were hastily fired, but the reports were drowned in the roar of the police cars hurtling at top speed after the gunmen.

The watchers at that window in Western Street saw one of the fleeing men stagger a little as if he had been hit, then go on again after his companion at a pace that told that a bullet had got him in the leg.

"That other car—it's stopping!" Jackie pointed as the second auto drew into the kerb with a shrieking of brakes, and three men jumped quickly from it. "Heavens, that man in the yellow raincoat—he's got a gun! He's going to—"

They heard the reports of the revolver that time—saw the men who had fled from the wrecked car pitch headlong to the ground—and their hearts went suddenly sick within them. Obvious from the way both lay upon the sidewalk that they were dead—shot in the back by the avenging gunmen!

Bare seconds the Leeds family stood awestruck, then a cry from little Ned made them all jump in alarm.

"Those men—they're coming into our house!"

The boy was right in what he said. Their dastardly work done, the three gangsters were all for flight now. And time was precious, for the roar of the police machines was unpleasantly loud in their ears as they shot down Western Street like some avenging angels. Scarce time to get back into their own car, start it up again and make a clean getaway. This house by which they stood offered a good means of eluding the police.

"Oh, stop them! Stop the brutes!" Ma Leeds cried distractedly as she saw the three men run up the steps that led to their front door.

"The door's locked, my dear," her husband hastily assured her. "It's quite all right. They'll never—"

"It isn't locked—nor even shut!" From where he stood Jackie had a clear view of the front door, and he saw that it was unlatched—saw, too, the gangsters as they slammed it open and burst in, then crashed it shut with a violence that shook the windows. Back he jumped in alarm. "Oh, heavens, they're in! That fool Donny must have left the door open when he let grandpa in."

Heavy footsteps sounded in the hall outside the dining-room and Ma Leeds encircled her two small boys with protecting arms, while her husband stepped quickly in front of her. Next second the gangsters appeared on the threshold of the open door, their eyes gleaming viciously beneath the brims of their soft felt hats.

"The back way out!" The tall, burly ruffian in the yellow raincoat jerked up his arm, levelled the ugly-looking revolver he carried straight at Pa Leeds' heart. "You—tell me quick, or, by heck, I'll drill—"

"Your dirty scum!" Eyes blazing fiercely, the fighting blood coursing in his old veins, grandpa shook his fist at the gangster. "You think you'll get away with it, huh? Well, you won't. No, siree. I saw you shoot them two—"

With a vicious oath the man in the yellow raincoat had flung himself at the old fellow, and the butt of his gun, slamming to the side of grandpa's head, sent him thudding to the floor, unconscious.

"Hey, you beast!" Little Ned's eyes flashed fire as the gangster jerked up his gun again, covering his father. "That's my grandpa. You've hurt him—"

"Shut up, you little rat!" The brute made to strike the small boy, but with a terrified cry his mother thrust him quickly out of reach. Again murderously gleaming eyes met the scared gaze of Pa Leeds and his family. "Listen, you simps. You ain't seen nothin', see? You ain't heard nothin', see? One move out of you and I'll shoot down the lot of you like as if you were mad dogs! Now, how do you get out by the back way?"

The sound of screeching brakes down in the street told of the arrival of the police. In another moment they would be clamouring at the door—asking the occupants if they had seen which way the killers had gone in their mad flight.

Every moment was precious now, as the crooks realised only too well—and the gun in the hand of the man in the raincoat dug viciously into Pa Leeds' ribs.

"Quick—the back way," the gangster snarled threateningly, "or, by hades, I'll drill you where you stand!"

But Pa Leeds never flinched. Good citizen that he was, his soul revolted against the gangster and his terrorism, and to help such brutal law-breakers as these to escape the police was the last thing he intended to do. But there was fear in his wife's eyes for the safety of her husband, and as she gave an anguished cry Jackie stepped forward.

"That way!" He pointed a shaking finger at a door on the opposite side of the spacious dining-room. "Through the kitchen—you'll see the back door there!"

Even as he spoke the hum of voices drifted up from the street below, to be followed instantly by the clatter of booted feet ascending the steps that led to the front door.

"One move out of you and I'll shoot down the lot of you like as if you were mad dogs!"

As the three gangsters ran hastily across the dining-room to make good their escape, the door leading from the kitchen swung open and Sue appeared, jam-pot in her hand. But sight of those grim-faced men coming towards her with guns in their hands caused her to pull up instantly and to give a terrified cry.

"What—what—" she stammered, trying to collect her wits.

Brutal hands thrust her roughly aside and the gangsters darted quickly into the kitchen, slamming the door violently behind them. Then, ere the sound of their fleeing feet had died in the distance, a thunderous rat-a-tat-tat came upon the knocker of the front door.

The police! But at that moment not one of the Leeds household seemed to have sufficient power to move a single muscle. The grim happenings of the past few minutes, the deadly menace that had threatened themselves had left them completely numb.

The knocking was repeated, loud and insistent; then came heavy thuds upon the front door as powerful shoulders were flung against it. Under the terrific impact thrust upon them the panels splintered quickly and a hand came through the gap and unfastened the latch.

Next moment two plain-clothes men and two uniformed officers burst into the dining-room and confronted Pa Leeds and his terrified family.

"Where'd they go?" The uniformed officer who fired the question glanced quickly round the room, then fastened his stern gaze on Pa Leeds.

"We know they came into this house—saw them as we came after the brutes. But quick now! Which way did they go?"

"They went through the back way." His face ashen, Jackie pointed a quivering finger to the door through which the gangsters had vanished. "Out through the kitchen there."

In a flash the police officers were gone, leaving the Leeds family to collect their shattered wits and to revive Grandpa Summerill to consciousness. But never a trace of the killers did the officers find, though they searched every house and every piece of ground in the immediate vicinity.

Identified!

A ROOM in the Criminal Courts Building. At a large mahogany desk sat a tall, well-built man of some forty-eight years, with clear blue eyes, dark hair and a chin that told of great determination. Standing close to the desk, notebook and pencil in hand, a not bad-looking and alert young man, while ranged on seats in front of the desk sat the entire Leeds family, together with that old warrior, Grandpa Summerill.

"We may assume, then, that these are the actual facts of the case, Thorpe." The man at the desk glanced quickly at his assistant. "A man known as Greener Kaufman was on his way to this office in the company of one of my trusted officers—Jim Preston, a man who never swerved a hair's-breadth from the full performance of his duty, a man we all loved."

Thorpe nodded grimly, while the Leeds family wondered vaguely in what way this could be connected with the shooting affair that had taken place outside their house, that atrocious crime about which they had been brought here to be questioned.

"Kaufman, then, was on his way here," resumed District Attorney Whitlock in grim, icy tones. "We were waiting to hear his story. If he told all he knew, we could break the power of the gangs in this city for ever. We could send to prison, if not to the electric chair, that whole cabinet of thieves and murderers who have actually tried to seize the reins of government out of the hands of decent citizens." His fine eyes suddenly switched to Pa Leeds and held the latter's gaze. "Do you know, Mr. Leeds, that not one gangster has ever been sent to the electric chair from this county?"

November 21st, 1931.

"Is that so?" Pa Leeds looked utterly astounded at this amazing information. Crimes almost every day and not one of the culprits meeting with his just deserts. It really was incredible. "Well, Mr. Whitlock, lots of 'em should have been, from what I've read in the papers."

The district attorney nodded, his eyes searching the intent faces in front of him and finally coming to rest on Grandpa Summerill who, in an endeavour to hear clearly all that was being said, was leaning forward in his chair, his left hand behind his ear, pressing it forward.

"Now folk." Whitlock rose to his feet, walked round to the front of his desk and lounged back against it. "We've an idea we know the man who did the shooting in front of your house, and we think we can send him to the chair. That man we believe is a fellow named Maxey Campo—leader of one of the smaller gangs, it is true, but a rapidly growing power in the underworld. If we can send one man of Campo's importance to the chair, we as good as tell every gangster in this city that there is law, and that every one of them is answerable to the law. You see the idea?"

"Yes," Pa Leeds nodded. "And we're with you, Mr. Whitlock."

"I thought you would be." The district attorney experienced a thrill of satisfaction. His vow to smash the gangster element in Faramento was a difficult one to fulfil, but with the backing of honest and true citizens he knew that that difficulty could be overcome.

"Well," he went on, "I want you all to get every detail of this case clear, so will you please listen carefully. My man Preston had been trailing Greener Kaufman, a rival gangster known to have a grievance against Maxey Campo. Suddenly my telephone bell rang—that was yesterday, of course. It was Jim Preston. He said that Greener had decided to come through and tell all he knew. But he also said that one of Campo's men had seen him and Kaufman together. I knew in a flash, then, that it was a matter of life and death."

He paused a moment to allow his words to sink in. Then:

"Well, I told Jim Preston to grab a car and to bring Kaufman right in. Then I ordered police cars out from every direction to try and pick Jim up before Campo's men could catch him. Well, what happened? Campo was as much taken by surprise as we were. No time to send his hired gunmen—it was a matter of minutes—seconds. Greener Kaufman must never reach this office to spill the beans. Campo ran for a car himself, followed by his personal bodyguard—Al Allen and Jake Short."

"We know that much, because we have witnesses who saw Campo get into the car. These witnesses even described the brute's clothing—dark suit, grey hat. That's much we have okay. But beyond that we can prove nothing. You see, the crash occurred so suddenly that eye-witnesses could give us no clear idea of what followed. A man in a yellow raincoat seemed to be the leader. Now Campo could have slipped that coat on while he was in the car. Whether he did or not, of course, we do not know."

"Well, we saw the man in the yellow raincoat." Pa Leeds glanced at his wife, who sat on the end chair, nursing little Ned, who was nearly asleep. "Didn't we, ma?"

Mrs. Leeds nodded, and again a satisfied smile came into the district attorney's face. These witnesses were invaluable—handled carefully and in the right way they would be the means of striking a vital blow at the very heart of the gangster fraternity of the city.

"Why, doggone it, the skunk stood right on the sidewalk and knocked off them two poor fellows a-runnin' down the street, like they was jack-rabbits a-jumpin' for cover." The battle light in his eyes, Grandpa Summerill jiggled up and down in his chair in the excitement that gripped him. "Oh, I seed him all right. I've got a good eye I have."

"Then he came into the house." Whitlock glanced towards his assistant to make sure he was putting down what was now being said. The young fellow was leaning negligently against the far wall busily scribbling in his notebook. Satisfied, the district attorney returned his gaze to his invaluable witnesses. "This man in the raincoat—he came close enough for you to recognise him if you saw him again, didn't he?"

"Close enough?" shrilled grandpa, giving the others no time to answer.

"Why, doggone it, I was just ready to grab him when he whacked me over the head with something—his gun I think—but I got a good look at him before he outed me. Feel that bump?"

The old campaigner shuffled over to the district attorney and pointed to a spot on his iron-grey head. But Whitlock was not in the least interested, though he patiently touched the indicated place, feeling the large swelling there.

"And you'd know the man again if you saw him, huh?"

"Now, now, ain't I telling you so!" snapped grandpa on his way back to his chair.

Whitlock smiled tolerantly, and turned inquiring eyes upon each of the others in turn. Without exception they nodded, and, swinging round on his heel, the district attorney picked up a photograph that lay upon his desk. Turning back to the Leeds family, he held up the portrait for all to see. It was the picture of a man of the lowest type—the features bloated and obviously coarse, eyes that showed a marked fierceness, and a thin-lipped mouth that twisted at one corner, giving the owner a sinister appearance.

"Well?" the district attorney inquired.

There was no room for doubt—no hesitation on the part of these people sitting before him.

"It's him, Mr. Whitlock." Pa Leeds nodded his head emphatically. "That's the man who fired the shots, then escaped through our house."

"Yeah, that's him!" shrilled grandpa, and vigorously shook his fist at the portrait, while Ma Leeds and the others told the district attorney that they, too, were positive that the subject of the photograph was the murderer of the two men in Western Street.

"Good." Whitlock replaced the portrait on his desk, then turned his gaze on Pa Leeds. On the district attorney's face was a triumphant smile, and in his heart a grim determination to rest not a moment now till Preston's death was avenged—till the Chair claimed this Maxey Campo whom he had now established, firm as a rock, was the perpetrator of the crime. "All right, Mr. Leeds, that's all for now. But hold yourselves in readiness. I'll be wanting you all later."

"Now, my boy, if this is Campo's crowd, stall 'em—understand? It might mean your brother's life!"

He shook them warmly by the hand, then, because every moment was now precious, he hustled them from the room. Directly the door had closed behind them, he pressed a bell-push that was let in the top of his desk. Almost as if by magic, the door opened again and in trooped half a dozen plain-clothes men, their faces grim set, their eyes meeting Whitlock's inquiringly.

"Listen, all of you. I'm going to try and hang this latest outrage on Maxey Campo. You know what that means, don't you? It means his pals will try to get me—they'll try to get every one of you." He shrugged his powerful shoulders in a careless gesture. "But we're going to fight till Campo is where he should be—nicely seated in the Chair. I've got the witnesses I want to land that brute high and dry, so just you get busy and pick him up. If he comes peaceably, so well and good, but if he doesn't, drag him in! Drag him in!"

A wave of the hand was all that was needed, and in another moment the plain-clothes men were darting from the room, grimly resolved to fulfil their mission—to bring in Maxey Campo at all costs.

Trapped!

MAXEY CAMPO had his spies everywhere, and one brought in to him the disturbing news that District Attorney Whitlock had had the Leeds family down to the Criminal Courts Building, and by clever handling had induced them to speak.

"You say they saw my photo, swore I was the same man as did the killing and then invaded their house?" the gangster snapped, glaring fiercely at his henchman.

"Sure, boss," averred the other. "I got it from Tony Larkins. It was sure a swell idea to bribe that fool commissionaire. He's come in mighty handy, huh?"

"Yeah." Campo's face was hard as steel, murder glimmered in his sinister brown eyes. "But just you get out and send Big Jack to me."

The man departed hurriedly, and Campo occupied the time in waiting for Big Jack to put in an appearance by fingering a wicked-looking revolver that lay beside him on the desk.

Meanwhile, after the interview with District Attorney Whitlock, Pa Leeds had hastened to the palatial offices of W. P. Randolph & Co., in Main Street, where he worked as chief cost accountant, while Sue had returned to the big shipping firm near the river where she held the important post of secretary to the managing director.

A short afternoon for both, but at six o'clock, the time for leaving for home, each had got through a fair amount of work, and knew it would not take them long next morning to completely make up for the time lost that day.

"Excuse me." A well-dressed young man, not bad looking in a grim kind of way, confronted Pa Leeds as he came down the steps of the Randolph building and made to turn his steps for home. "But could you tell me where I could find Mr. Leeds?"

"Why, I'm Mr. Leeds," replied the sandy-haired man, vaguely wondering what this fellow could want.

"Now isn't that lucky? And I got here only just in time." The stranger waved a hand towards a car that stood at the kerb with a dark figure at the wheel, then smiled disarmingly at the puzzled Mr. Leeds. "Well, Mr. Leeds, I'm from the district attorney's office. He's got a complaint ready to sign."

"A complaint?" Pa Leeds was more mystified than ever. "I'm not complaining about anything."

"But you're ready to testify against Campo, aren't you?" the other persisted, his eyes narrowing to mere slits.

"Ah, now I understand." Pa Leeds smiled grimly. "Of course I'm ready to testify. There isn't the slightest doubt it was Maxey Campo that did the shooting last night."

"Yeah. Well, Mr. Leeds, you've got to sign an affidavit to that effect—a complaint." He took Pa Leeds by the arm, and jerked his head towards the automobile. "Now, come along. Step right in the car, Mr. Leeds, and I'll have you down town and back home again in 10 time at all."

All unsuspecting, Pa Leeds allowed himself to be led to the vehicle and helped inside, and scarcely was he seated with the other man beside him, than the car shot away from the kerb and rapidly gathered speed.

Mile upon mile the vehicle travelled, quickly leaving the better quarter of the city and sliding in and out of a perfect network of mean alley-ways and sordid streets. But Pa Leeds was completely lost to his surroundings, for the man beside him engaged him in a conversation that thoroughly interested him so that his eyes never left the fellow's face.

Then at last the car stopped and his companion opened the door, took a grip on his arm.

"Come on," he said somewhat tersely. Brown eyes blinked in astonishment as Pa Leeds peered through the open window of the car, saw a dilapidated building in front of him. Quickly he gazed round—a mean and squalid street with tumbledown dwellings and warehouses on either hand.

"Why," he gasped, turning back to the man who had been his companion on the drive, "this isn't the Criminal Courts Building—"

"Why, no; didn't I tell you?" The other scrambled out of the car and almost dragged the bewildered Pa Leeds after him. "Mr. Whitlock is down here on another case. He's got the necessary papers for you to sign with him. Come on, Mr. Leeds."

He led the way into the dingy building, up a flight of narrow wooden stairs, and at the top, flung open a door and thrust Pa Leeds into the room beyond.

An almost bare apartment with dust thick upon the floor and cobwebs hanging from the ceiling. Very little light, for the one window was shuttered, the only illumination being the guttering flame of a candle that stood in the neck of a bottle that rested on a worn and rickety table.

But Pa Leeds paid no heed to his forbidding surroundings. His terrified eyes rested on the brutal faces of the four men who sat at the table fixing him with murderous gaze.

"Get over there!" His companion of the car pushed him roughly forward, then turned to the biggest of the four men, a huge fellow whose battered features told plainly enough that he was an ex-pugilist. "Well, Jack, here's the bird as ordered—and mighty easy game. believe me. Fell for it like a fool."

"Give him a chair." A chair was pushed forward, and Pa Leeds sank timidly into it, his mind a chaos of conflicting thoughts. He felt that something was wrong, that he had been tricked into taking that ride—then as he heard the big man's coarse voice again it came to him in a rush that he was in the hands of the Campo gang. "Your name Leeds?"

"Er—yes!" stammered the frightened man. "But I don't understand."

"You'll understand in a very few minutes, and if you're wise, Leeds, you'll consider carefully all I say!" Big Jack grinned evilly and held out a cigar he extracted from a waistcoat pocket. "A smoke? No? Well, please yourself, of course. Now let me tell you something. We brought you down here for a little talk. Just a friendly talk. Get me? Now you claim it was Maxey Campo that shot these men outside your house?"

"It—it was Campo, all right," asserted Mr. Leeds a trifle hesitantly.

"But are you sure? It's a serious business, sendin' a man to the Chair. It was gettin' dark, you mighta been mistaken. As a matter of fact, you were mistaken!"

Big Jack, deputed to corrupt Pa Leeds, to fix him so that he would not testify against Campo after all, allowed his words to sink in. This man, obviously a weakling, should be easy game. Campo did not want him killed—it would only mean another murder to be laid at his door. Bribery, or if that failed, a rough-handling that would terrify him, intimidate him so that he and his family would be too scared to stand witness against Maxey.

"Now I'll tell you why you were mistaken, Mr Leeds," Big Jack went on. "Campo was over at his summer place at Terrace Hill. You know, Campo ain't really a bad fellow at all. There's a gang of politicians in this city tryin' to hang something on him. That's all, and we know you ain't the man to let 'em get away with it. Now, are you sure it was Campo you saw?"

"It was Campo all right," Pa Leeds forgot his first fears. "I might have been mistaken in the street, but when he came right into the house and stood as close to me as you are now, I couldn't help seeing him. Then when they showed me his picture in the office, it was the same man all right."

"You could forget it if you wanted to." Big Jack was not so certain now that the prisoner was going to be easy, after all. He produced a bulging pocket-wallet, drew out a wad of a thousand dollar bills. "Look here, we'll make it worth your while to forget it. A wonderful holiday in California for the entire family, Mr. Leeds, and five thousand dollars to spend. It's yours if you'll keep your trap shut and guarantee to handle the rest of your family."

Pa Leeds was trembling now. His fears had crowded back on him as he realised the terrible plight he was in—the hands of a set of ruthless gangsters who thought nothing of using the gun. But honest to goodness man that he was, he would never accept a bribe even at the risk of his own skin.

"I—I couldn't do it. Oh, please don't ask me!" He looked pleadingly at the big man, shuddered as he saw him rise ponderously to his feet, an ugly snarl curling the large, cruel mouth. "Oh, please, please, I really couldn't take that kind of money. Now do let me go home, I implore you."

"Sure we'll let you go home. After you've learnt your lesson." Bribery being out of the question, Big Jack made a sign to his evil companions, and they quickly gathered round. "And now, Leeds, we've got a little piece we want you to speak, and the sooner you say it the better for you. It goes like this: 'I ain't seen nothin'—I don't know nothin'!'"

"Oh, oh, for Heaven's sake don't look like that at me!" Pa Leeds recoiled as the gangster thrust his face forward aggressively. "Oh, leave me alone—leave—"

His words snapped off as a huge fist crashed under his jaw. Back he hurtled under the force of the impact to bring up against the wall of the room whimpering like a child, his body trembling with the terror that gripped him.

"You miserable little scum, we'll learn you!" Big Jack's voice was grim and harsh. Again he signed to his companions. "All right, boys, beat him up. And don't spare him till he's whining for mercy—till he swears he'll keep as quiet as a mouse!"

They nodded, then, grinning hideously, moved forward to obey the brutal command, while the terrified Mr. Leeds cringed back against the wall, eyes wild with fear, words of imploration tumbling from his quivering lips.

Scared!

WHEN Pa Leeds failed to arrive home at his customary hour that evening his wife became very uneasy. She remembered those grim words of Maxey Campo's when he and his ruffianly bodyguard had broken into their home the previous night: "You ain't seen nothin', see? You ain't heard nothin', see? One move out of you and I'll shoot down the lot of you as if you were mad dogs!"

Supposing Campo had got to know that they were going to testify against him in Court? Utterly callous as he was, he would carry out his grim threat without the slightest compunction!

Ma Leeds turned almost sick as the thought beat into her burning brain. With a cry of anguish she ran blindly to the telephone, rang up the district attorney's office and spoke to Whitlock in a sobbing voice. Her husband was not home. Could Maxey Campo possibly have discovered they were going to stand witness against him and had waylaid her husband and carried out his brutal threat?

Whitlock was alarmed. He thought it all quite likely, though he refrained from admitting that much to the distracted woman. He would do his best to locate her husband—he was sure Mr. Leeds was quite all right, perhaps delayed on business.

The moment he hung up the receiver he called his men around him, sent them out in search of the missing man.

Within the hour Mr. Leeds was found—found semi-conscious in a gutter in the slum quarter of the city. They carried him to his home in a car babbling that he had been the victim of Maxey Campo's ruthlessness, and he was put to bed, badly broken in mind and body.

Scared nigh out of their wits, his family clustered around him, heard from his bruised and bleeding lips all that had happened since he had stepped from his office that night.

"And the brutes said this was only a sample!" the injured man groaned. "A kind of warning to us all to know what to expect if any of us dare go into the witness-box and swear that Campo did the killing last night. Oh, mother, Sue, Jackie, we can't take a chance—we—"

"Bah! You're scared, scared of a few measly little rats! Heck, but I'll learn 'em—I'll show 'em a thing or two. I'm a law-abiding citizen, I am, and I'm willing to make any sacrifice to see this city clean." Fists clenched, Grandpa Sumnerill danced about the bed-room, a warlike gleam in his eyes. "And I'm a soldier, too—been in battle after battle, and by hades, I'll fight a whole darned battalion of Maxey Campos—"

Maxey Campo
scowled at the old man.

"And go out first pop," sneered Jackie. "Why, I bet you'd be the first to stick up your hands if he came in here at this moment."

Grandpa was on the point of making some caustic rejoinder, when there came a knock at the front door.

"All right, I'll go." The old warrior smiled disdainfully as he saw the terrified expressions that had leaped into the faces of his daughter and her family. "It's not Maxey Campo or any of his scum, if that's what you think. Whitlock, for a pension—just you mark my words."

It was the district attorney, and he came into the bed-room with grandpa at his heels.

"Hallo, folk! Feeling comfortable, Mr. Leeds?" the district attorney inquired.

"No, I'm not—and it's all thanks to you," grumbled the invalid in little more than a whisper. "If you hadn't got round us to—"

"Now, now, don't be sore, Mr. Leeds." Whitlock glanced at the others, saw the grim expressions on the faces of Mrs. Leeds, Sue and Jackie, and knew that this latest outrage of the Campo gang had intimidated all three. Now it would be difficult to attain the greatest ambition of his life—to indict the killer of Jim Preston and the gangster Kaufman. He could see that clear enough. His witnesses were turning yellow. "Look here, folk, I can see what's biting you, and I can quite understand your feelings. It's tough that Mr. Leeds should have fallen into the hands of these ruthless curs, but nothing like it will happen again. I've put a guard on this house, and he's going to remain on guard till after the trial. That's the day after to-morrow, for, by a stroke of good fortune, my men have just brought Campo in. Behind prison bars he is now, and with you to swear he did that killing he'll never be free again."

"But his men will wreak vengeance, Mr. Whitlock." Weak-kneed as he was, Jackie was more scared than any of them. "If we put a foot outside the door they'll—"

"But none of you are leaving this house till you're wanted for the trial." The district attorney smiled grimly. It was the only way to make certain that the remainder of the Leeds family did not lay themselves open to an attack by the gangsters. Shrewd that he was, he was taking no further risks with them. "No, no; don't protest, Mrs. Leeds. I've been along to Miss Sue's office, and her boss is quite willing to allow her the time off. And there's no need for the boys to go to school. I've seen their headmaster, and—"

"You have, huh?" Donny scowled at Whitlock. "Well, I ain't stopping in, so there. The baseball game's to-morrow, and the boys'll be wanting me to—"

"Now, now, Donny!" His grandpa wagged a reproving finger at the boy. "You'll do what Mr. Whitlock says. There's a far greater game for you to play down at the courts the day after to-morrow. You're a law-abiding citizen and a man, you are, and—"

"Oh, for heaven's sake, father, please don't talk like that!" There were tears in

Mrs. Leeds' eyes and her heart was like a leaden weight within her. Well she knew the uselessness of standing firm for law and order. Her husband had suffered brutally at the hands of the Campo gang, and if any of them testified against their leader there was no doubt in her mind that the consequences would be very dire indeed. Probably they would be shot down when next they appeared in the street. "Donny is my boy, and he'll do what I say, father; and I tell you he's not going to say a word that will endanger his life."

"But, Mrs. Leeds," protested the district attorney, "as respectable citizens you must—"

"Must nothing!" snapped Jackie, his eyes flashing fire. "If we don't want to testify you can't make us. You had our promise, yes. But poor father's suffered for it, and that's quite enough. The rest of us are not taking chances."

"Scared, that's what you all are! Darned fine relations, I must say!" Grandpa Summerill glared at them with a disdainful look on his wizened features. Then he turned to the district attorney, whose face wore a troubled expression. "Mr. Whitlock, why worry about these white-livered fools. You have me—Private Summerill, the man who never feared a single foe. I'll testify against that brute Campo and the rest can go hang!"

"Thanks, old-timer." Whitlock patted his shoulder appreciatively. "You'll be wanted, of course, and so will the others. You see, the more witnesses we have, the better chance there'll be of proving Campo guilty." His stern blue eyes wandered to the faces of Mrs. Leeds, Sue and Jackie. "Sorry, folk, but you can't get out of it now. You're going into the witness-box and you're going to say your piece, see?"

A curt nod that was meant for them all, then, turning sharply on his heel, he strode from the room, ramming his hat on his head as he went.

A Terrible Blow.

IN the afternoon of the following day District Attorney Whitlock, together with a plain-clothes officer, paid yet another visit to the Leeds' home. He knocked upon the front door and almost immediately it was opened by Thorpe, his young assistant, whom, by way of extra precaution, he had installed there late the previous night.

Together they went into the sitting-room, where Thorpe looked at his chief inquiringly.

"Anything new, Thorpe?" Whitlock asked, as he flung his soft felt hat into a chair.

"Nothing here, chief," was the instant reply. "Everything quiet—not the least sign of the Campo gang. How are things shaping?"

"Fine! I'll indict to-morrow for first degree murder." There was a harsh note in the district attorney's voice and his eyes glinted like twin points of steel. "And if the Campo gang make one move to stop me, I'll ask the governor to call out the militia. I'll throw a guard around the Criminal Courts Building, empanel a special jury, and I'll watch Maxey Campo die in the chair ninety days from next Tuesday. Now, just you bring in the witnesses. I want to check their testimony."

Thorpe was out of the room in a flash. Jackie, Sue, and their grandfather he found in the dining-room partaking of an afternoon cup of tea, and he sent them in to the district attorney. Sue told him her mother and the two small boys were upstairs with their injured father, and with a word of thanks the young fellow ran up the stairs and knocked on Pa Leeds' bedroom door. Mrs. Leeds' voice bade him enter, and, opening the door, he poked his head into the room.

"Excuse me, Mrs. Leeds, but the "Ah, ha! that's the fellow that did the shootin'!" Eyes gleaming fiercely, he raised his hand and pointed his finger straight at the gangster.

district attorney wants you downstairs with little Ned and—” Thorpe cut off his words abruptly and looked around the room with a puzzled frown. “But Donny—they said he was up here with you.”

Mrs. Leeds' face went suddenly white, and a sob of anguish escaped her.

“Donny! He hasn't been up here at all—at least, not since dinner!” Her hands clasp convulsively, she sprang to her feet. “Oh, please, please don't say he's not in the house! Oh, don't say it—don't say it!”

“Heavens, those brutes—they've got him! He—he must have slipped out for the baseball match, mother.” Pa Leeds struggled to sit up in his bed, but the effort was too much for him, and, with a gasp of pain, he sank back on the pillows. “Oh, this is terrible—terrible! Oh, what on earth have we done to deserve this? What—”

But Mrs. Leeds scarcely heard him. With a protective arm around little Ned she staggered from the room, and Thorpe, his face grimly set, followed her.

Distractedly the mother burst into the sitting-room, and the terror in her face, the tears swimming in her eyes, was sufficient to tell those gathered there that something terrible was wrong.

“Donny! Donny!” Her voice was shrill and pathetic. “He's not in the house—he's gone—gone, and those brutes have got him! I know they have! I know they have!”

“Is this right, Thorpe?” Whitlock grabbed his assistant fiercely by the arm.

“It looks like it, chief,” came the grim answer.

The district attorney at once issued brisk orders, and Thorpe and Williams, the plain-clothes man who had accompanied Whitlock to the house, rushed away to search for the missing boy. Not a sign of him anywhere in the house, and no trace of him in the immediate vicinity when they continued their search outside.

Back they came to report failure, and the district attorney, learning from his sobbing mother that the boy had most probably disregarded instructions and had slipped out for the baseball match, at once got through on the telephone to his school. Nothing had been seen of him there, and he was not on the ball-ground.

It was at that moment that the detective who had been guarding the house from outside entered the sitting-room and gravely handed to his superior a cap and a baseball glove.

“I found these down the end of the alley,” he announced. “They were trampled in the mud. It looked to me as if there had been a struggle.”

“Oh, my Donny! My Donny!” Mrs. Leeds burst into a flood of tears, her shoulders heaving convulsively. “They've got him! The brutes—they've got him. Oh, what can I do! What—”

The ringing of the telephone-bell broke into her bitter outburst, but as Jackie lifted the receiver of the instrument, Whitlock flung forward and quickly clapped his hand over the mouthpiece.

“Quick, Williams, run out and trace this call from the nearest phone box. Quite likely it's the Campo gang going to tell us they've got young Donny. See what I mean?” As Williams darted from the room the district attorney returned his gaze to Jackie. “Now, my boy, if this is Campo's crowd 'tall 'em, understand? It might mean your brother's life!”

November 21st, 1931

Jackie nodded sulkily, took the receiver from its hooks, and placed it to his ear with a hand that trembled.

“Hallo,” he said into the mouthpiece in a shaky voice. “Yes, yes, this is the Leeds' house. No, it isn't Mr. Leeds speaking; it's his son.”

“Then you listen here.” The voice of Big Jack sounded menacingly in Jackie's ear. Shrewd that he was, the gangster suspected that the delay in answering his call was to allow someone at the other end sufficient time to trace from where it was being made. “You just cut out the stalling and get this straight. Your kid brother's here, see? And if any member of his family identifies Campo at the hearing tomorrow that's the last you'll ever see of him.”

With that grim threat the line went dead, and replacing the receiver Jackie turned from the instrument, his face haggard, stark fear showing plainly in his goggling eyes.

“They've got him, eh?” Whitlock said in a quiet, grave tone.

The boy nodded wretchedly, and on the instant Mrs. Leeds let out a hysterical scream. Quickly her daughter ran to her, flung her arms compassionately around her neck, while Grandpa Summerill, his eyes blazing fiercely, stamped up and down the room, shaking his clenched fists and uttering dark threats against Campo and his ruffianly gang.

Then Williams returned breathlessly. “Too late, chief,” he gasped. “It was somewhere on the Adams exchange. They hung up before we could get the number.”

“Where's the Adams Exchange?” Whitlock fired at him.

“Around Eighth and Stanton Streets.”

“Yeah. Well, that's where they had the father, near the Ideal Paper Box Plant. And that's Campo's territory all right.” The district attorney's face was set with a grim determination. “Heavens, but I'll throw every policeman in the city into that territory, and go through it, house by house. I'll find that kid if I have to move Heaven and earth. Come on, Williams, let's be going!”

But before he had time to grab up his hat, to reassure the distracted Mrs. Leeds, Grandpa Summerill, his eyes a gleam, grim resolution blazing in his heart, had slipped quietly from the house. Campo's gang of killers had got little Donny, his favourite grandchild, somewhere in the salubrious district surrounding Eighth and Stanton Streets. The callous brutes! If only he could trace their hide-out they should be made to suffer dearly for this heinous offence.

Grandpa to the Rescue.

THE day of the trial, and the Leeds household was in a state of panic.

No news of Donny, in spite of the widespread efforts of the police to locate his whereabouts, and there was no news or sign either of Grandpa Summerill, who had been missing from the house in Western Street since the previous afternoon.

District Attorney Whitlock was almost demented. He simply had to get the Leeds family to testify against Campo, but with Donny and now his grandpa obviously in the hands of the Campo gang, he knew it was more than likely that the others would be too terrified to say the words that would send the ruthless gang chief to the smoky cell.

But he had them taken to the court, for all his fears, and Pa Leeds went, too, travelling on a stretcher in an ambulance van that was heavily-guarded by an escort of plain-clothes men who, from the powerful automobiles in which they rode, kept an alert eye on the sidewalks in case any attempt should be made to “get at” these precious witnesses.

Meantime in a room above the premises ostensibly occupied by the Ideal Paper Box Plant, Ltd. in East Street, which was not a quarter of a mile from Station Street, little Donny Leeds sat upon a Chesterfield, virtually a prisoner, but listening with rapt attention to the thin-faced man who was seated beside him explaining in detail the rudiments of baseball pitchings.

A strange thing that this brutal gangster should be consorting thus with the boy. But a few moments before Donny had absently pulled from his pocket the baseball that his grandfather had recently given him with his initials upon it, and the man, an old player himself, had been keenly interested as the youngster made pretence to hurl it at an imaginary batsman.

“You've a lot to learn, son,” the gangster had said. “Here, give me that ball and I'll show you how to make some of the best pitches ever.”

So Donny had given the crook the ball and had soon become engrossed in what the man had to tell him. The fact that he was a prisoner in the hands of some of the most ruthless gangsters in the city—that even at that moment four of them were crouching at a window, guns ready in their hands, prepared to put up a stout resistance should the police, who were even then scouring East Street for the boy, suddenly break in upon them—all this was lost to the little fellow in his eagerness to improve his knowledge of the great ball game.

“Now you bring the ball over the end of your finger—like this, kinda whip it when you let it go and it's an indrop.” The gangster illustrated the pitch perfectly. “Kid, that's sure a nasty one, believe me. One guaranteed to help any side to victory.”

“Gee, mister”—Donny's eyes shone with enthusiasm—“it certainly does look a good 'un to me. As soon as I get the chance I'll try it.”

“Here!” The man thrust the ball into Donny's hand. “Let's see you go through the movements of the pitch right now. Then I can see you get it absolutely okay.”

Donny got to his feet eagerly, the ball clasped in his fingers, his arm stretched out behind him.

“That's right.” The gangster nodded his approval. “Now your arm comes over—yes, that's it. And now—”

He broke off as Donny let his arm drop suddenly to his side and gazed inquiringly at the boy whose eyes had taken on an eager gleam as he caught the notes of a life being played down in the street. That tunc. Donny could not mistake it. It was one that his grandpa played time and time again.

His grandpa in the street below! Here was a chance of escape. Scarce had the thought flashed into his mind than Donny drew back his arm again and hurled the baseball with unerring aim straight at the window where Big Jack and the others were crouching.

The tinkle of broken glass as the ball smashed clean through the window-pane within an inch of Big Jack's head, mingled with a string of violent curses as Campo's men leaped back in alarm. For the moment they feared that a machine-gun attack was being made

(Continued on page 23.)

A haughty young beauty came with a cowardly attorney to take over her father's ranch, but the daredevil manager and a gang of rustlers upset her plans. Starring Tom Keene and Marion Shilling.

The Tally-ho.

THE strains of music agitated the atmosphere in Las Cruces, near the Rio Grande, ten miles from the point where that mighty river leaves New Mexico and enters Old.

The music came from the throats of a bunch of parched cow-hands who were escorting into town the strangest equipage that Las Cruces had ever witnessed. It was an open wagon with a kind of four-poster awning, to keep the sun off two or three easy-chairs that had been placed in the carriage, and it was drawn by a couple of high-stepping ponies.

A big, bronzed fellow, wearing an outsize in sombreros, was plying the reins, and his voice gave a strident rendering of the melody which he and his companions seemed to favour. Thus the attention of everyone in the street was attracted to the new arrivals, and as the cavalcade came to a standstill it was at once surrounded by a crowd of inquisitive onlookers.

"What's Buck Sawyer up to now?" someone demanded, and the question was repeated to the big, bronzed cowboy who occupied the driving-seat of the wagon.

"What in Sam Hill do you call that, Buck?" he was asked.

The hefty cowboy made an accommodating gesture.

"Say," he stated, "this is the first open-air, sight-seein' tally-ho in the State of New Mexico."

"Tally-ho?" a man in the crowd repeated doubtfully. "What's that, Buck—a travellin' piazza, or the result o' hard liquor?"

"Brother," Buck Sawyer answered with mild reproach, "this is the result of a lot of hard thinkin', and has been built by lovin' hands to carry Miss Dorothy Beals, heiress of the Lazy B, to her regal domain."

There was a saloon hard by, and from the veranda of it a burly, dark-complexioned individual had noted Buck's approach. He was a man known around Las Cruces as Joe Currier, and his reputation was none too savoury, though no actual misdeed had ever yet been pinned on him.

Currier regarded the Lazy B ranch-hands and their comie equipage for a spell, and then strolled through into the saloon and singled out a slim, curly-headed youth who was drinking at the bar.

"Flash," he drawled, with the suspicion of a sneer, "your old runnin' mate, Buck Sawyer, has gone plumb loco, ain't he?"

The youngster whom he had addressed was one Jim Prescott, commonly known as "Flash," a likeable fellow, whose only failing was his recklessness. He looked at Currier inquiringly, and only gathered the latter's meaning when the man led him to the swing-doors and indicated the scene in the street.

Flash grinned at the spectacle, then suddenly became serious.

"Say, listen, Joe," he muttered, "if Buck should come in here, don't let on that I know you, will you?"

Currier frowned, and fixed him with his narrow, penetrating eyes.

"I don't savvy why you're so seared o' that dude," he growled; but before he could say more young Flash interrupted him.

"Buck's one of the best," he declared stoutly, "an' somehow I wouldn't like him to know anything about the kind of racket we're mixed up in. And another thing—don't you ever tangle with that 'dude,' as you call him. He'll shoot the spurs plumb off your boots and never spoil your shine. I'm tellin' yuh."

Meanwhile, the crowd in the street was drifting away, as their brief interest in the fancy tally-ho began to fade. But when Buck descended to the ground a man came out of a Wells Fargo Express office opposite and drew him aside. He was the agent in charge of the Las Cruces branch.

"Buck," he said, "I'm kinda worried. Currier an' his gang are in town, an' there's a heavy shipment of gold comin' in on the train. It's to be carried on to Victoria by stage-coach."

Buck was listening attentively, and the mention of Currier's name had produced a thoughtful expression on his face.

"You know," he murmured, "it's a funny thing. They've never nailed any thing on Currier, but he's generally around when things happen."

"Listen, Buck," the agent went on. "Supposin' I put the gold in a sack and slip it in your tally-ho. The Victoria agent could pick it up at your rancho to-night."

"All right," Buck agreed; "you do that while I'm makin' Miss Dorothy welcome. In the meantime, I guess me an' the boys will trail over to the saloon an' wait there till the train's due."

The Lazy B hands trooped across the street in a body, and Buck, the first to cross the threshold of the saloon, was pounced upon by a crouching figure the instant he pushed open the swing doors.

Though taken by surprise, he proved himself equal to the emergency, and in the twinkling of an eye he had swung his assailant off his feet and dumped him on the floor. He then sat on his chest, but without animosity, for he had already recognised the practical joker as Flash Prescott.

"Say, you old burro," he drawled, "what are you doin' in these parts—lookin' for your old job with the Lazy B?"

"Not me," Flash gasped, his merriment and Buck's weight combining to rob him of his breath. "Hey, get up off me, will yuh? You're sittin' on an official of the R. and S. Beef Company."

Buck stood up and pulled Flash to his feet.

"I sure am glad to see you, anyway," he stated. "Listen, old-timer, I've got some things to talk over with you—No, don't stampepe for the bar. What I've got to say to you is private."

He led Flash away from the counter, where the rest of the Lazy B boys were already forming up for liquid refreshment.

"Come on, now," he resumed, when there was less likelihood of their conversation being public property, "what's this job you're braggin' about?"

"No foolin', Buck," Flash answered, "I'm western appraiser for one of the largest beef concerns in the country."

Buck eyed him keenly.

"I hope you're tellin' me the truth," he said. "You've been showin' up here too often with that Currier hombre."

Flash looked uncomfortable for a moment, then met Buck's steady gaze with a carefree laugh.

"Don't you start gettin' riled about me, Buck," he told the big cowboy. "I'm behavin' right churchily, I am."

"I'm glad to hear it," was Buck's rejoinder. "For you never were the kind of guy that settled down easily, and I've been thinkin' I might have to lick you into shape one o' these days. And lister, Flash—when you decide to go back to work for a livin' instead of trailin' along with this Currier outfit, let me know. I'm still manager of the Lazy B—"

He came to a pause, realising that they were no longer alone. A man had strolled towards them, and, turning his head, Buck recognised the burly form of Currier.

Currier's first words made it plain that he had chosen to disregard Flash Prescott's appeal, and was also inclined to flout his warning.

"Sawyer," he said to Buck, "this kid's weaned. Why don't you let him pick his own company?"

"He has," Buck retorted pointedly.

"That's what's worryin' me."

A dangerous glint appeared in Currier's eyes.

"No one has a thing on me," he blurted, with heat. "Not a thing."

"No, not yet," Buck granted, and at that Currier's face grew livid. For an instant he was tempted to reach for his gun, but he saw that the big cowboy's hand was near his holster, and he contented himself by glaring truculently at the ranch foreman.

It was at this juncture that a shrill and distant blast penetrated to the saloon. It was the whistle of a train's siren, and as Buck heard the sound he forgot Currier's presence and turned to the boys at the bar.

"Come on, fellers!" he roared. "Here comes the rattler, with Miss Dotty Beals aboard!"

Over the Prairie.

A CONDUCTOR entered the private compartment that had been booked in the name of "Miss Dorothy Beals."

It was occupied by three people, one November 21st, 1931.

of whom was Dorothy herself, a girl of twenty, fashionably and expensively dressed in the latest New York style, and radiantly beautiful, though the expression on her pretty face at the moment was somewhat petulant.

Opposite her was seated a thin, clever-looking Easterner in a smart lounge suit—George Marsden, her attorney and legal adviser. The third occupant was a sixteen-stone coloured woman known as Jenny, Dorothy's handmaid.

"We're pulling into Las Cruces, Miss Beals," the train conductor announced.

Dorothy thanked him, and then gazed through the window at the picturesque sweep of country over which they were passing—a country of rolling prairie and mountain pinnacles.

The train had slackened down, but was still travelling at a fair speed. A few seconds before, it had pulled level with a cowboy who was riding in the same direction, and in a sportive mood the ranch-hand was now racing abreast of the long line of cars, exhibiting his own magnificent horsemanship, as well as the pace of the mustang on which he was mounted.

Dorothy was watching him without enthusiasm when Marsden spoke.

"I hope our stay in these parts will be short," the lawyer observed.

Dorothy nodded, and then with a contemptuous gesture indicated the cowboy who was galloping abreast of their coach.

"They're all show-offs," she said scornfully. "You know, I've still a faint recollection of the West—very faint, thank heavens. I think I was seven when mother took me to civilisation."

Marsden leaned forward.

"I agree with you that its attractions are overrated," he declared, "but I'd advise you not to show your prejudice—at least, not until after we learn the conditions of your father's will, Dotty."

"Don't use that horrid nickname when you're talking to me!" Dorothy snapped. "You know how I loathe it."

Marsden hastily apologised, but Dorothy was in an irritable mood, and had been prone to fits of temper ever since she had known that she must travel West if she were to inherit her father's estate. She was still frowning when she descended from the train at Las Cruces.

Buck and the boys were waiting for her with the tally-ho, and, as she was the only feminine passenger to alight, Buck stepped forward, hat in hand.

"Howdy, Miss Dotty?" he greeted.

"Welcome back home to the Lazy B!"

Dorothy's eyes snapped as she heard the detested nickname. She looked Buck up and down with a glance that should have chilled him.

"I'm Buck Sawyer, the manager of your ranch," the cowboy went on to explain.

"Pardon me, Mr. Sawyer," Dorothy said with scathing sweetness, "but I think you mean my ex-manager. My attorney, Mr. Marsden, will have full charge of my affairs from now on."

Buck was for the moment taken aback, but he speedily recovered his composure, and when he spoke it was with a slight curl of the lip.

"Howdy, Mr. Marsden?" he drawled. "You've sure taken a load off my shoulders."

Marsden frowned.

"I suppose you've arranged for us to drive out to the ranch right away?" he suggested.

"Have I?" Buck declared, turning with pride towards the tally-ho. "Say, the boys and I have rigged up, especially for Miss Beals' comfort, the first open-air, sight-seein' carriage ever known in these parts."

Dorothy looked at the colourful equipage with unconcealed amazement and disgust.

"I refuse to make myself ridiculous!" she cried hotly. "I'd rather walk than ride on such a conveyance!"

Buck and the boys exchanged glances. Then the ranch foreman spoke quietly.

"The Victoria stage-coach goes right by the Lazy B outfit," he said. "It's a heap faster—but not nearly so private an' artistic," he added.

Dorothy turned on her heel and, followed by Marsden, marched towards the stage coach. Her handmaid Jenny did not accompany her, however, but looked longingly at the fantastic tally-ho, feeling that nothing would have pleased her more than to ride out to the ranch in such splendour and state.

"Mistah Sawyah," she said, "can Ah ride with you-all?"

"Can you?" Buck echoed. "Say, mammy, I'll show you the most all-fired private sight-seein' tour you could ever wish for. Hey, Tom," he called to one of the boys, glancing dubiously at Jenny's buxom form, "get me a derrick, will you?"

Jenny was lifted aboard amidst laughter, and she had settled herself regally in one of the easy-chairs when the Wells Fargo agent appeared on the scene. He was carrying the sack to which he had transferred the shipment of gold.

"Here's the stuff, Buck," he said in an undertone, and when the sack had been deposited in the tally-ho he drew back and wished the ranch foreman a safe journey.

Buck climbed to the driving-seat and ordered one of the boys to strike up a melody on a banjo, and as the cavalcade moved forward in the tracks of the Victoria stage, a dozen voices were raised in song.

Before the fast-travelling coach could roll on out of hearing the opening words of the first verse reached the ears of Dorothy Beals and brought an angry flush to her pretty face.

"I built my gal a tally-ho, flowers an' fixings fine,

I thought I'd be a riot, but I'm thinner than a dime."

The boys sang on hilariously, and long after she was beyond sight or sound of them Dorothy felt her blood boiling with resentment. But the circumstances that had upset her might rightly have been regarded by her as trivialities had she been aware of what was going on at the bank of a stream a mile ahead.

Four or five men were gathered there, and if any casual wayfarer had seen them he might have been struck by the strangeness of their behaviour. For every one of them was down on his knees, busily plastering his face with thick, black mud from the stream-bed.

Their features were unrecognisable when at length they stood up. No man could have said with any certainty that those mud-smothered faces were the faces of Currier and his associates. Yet the voice that reeled off a series of instructions before the stage-coach drove into view was that of the man whose reputation Buck Sawyer had questioned in the saloon at Las Cruces.

"Flash," said Currier, "don't get too prominent."

"All right," came the reply from the grime-smearing youth who had assured Buck that he was in honest occupation.

"Bill an' Sam," Currier continued, turning to two more of the gangsters, "your job will be to cut the hosses loose. And Burghley, you get the gold-chest. Come on now, let's get goin'!"

They left their ponies in a thicket and advanced to the edge of the road. They had not long to wait ere the stage was sighted on a bend a couple of hundred yards distant.

The crooks watched it grimly and calmly. The least composed of them was Flash; but, the more to his discredit, his conscience was not the reason for his anxiety. This was his first stick-up, and the excitement of it had set his pulses hammering. In his folly, he imagined that the sensation was a pleasurable one.

The coach drew near the point where the gangsters had concealed themselves in the brush, and suddenly Currier jumped out into the middle of the trail. The others followed suit, flourishing their six-guns.

"Elevate," Currier rapped out, "an' don't try no heroics!"

The driver drew rein and promptly shot his arms above his head. Scared faces appeared in the window of the coach—the faces of Dorothy, Marsden and another passenger. The occupants were ordered in a gruff voice to step down, and did so with their hands in the air.

Burghley climbed to the roof and dragged an iron-bound chest from its resting-place there. In the meantime Bill and Sam were cutting the traces and stampeding the coach-horses as a precautionary measure, and while they were about this work Currier and Flash were covering the trio of passengers.

"Toss your valuables in a pile and it'll soon be over," Currier ordered, and with gingerly fingers Marsden and the other male passenger obeyed.

"Now, lady," Currier went on, as Dorothy made no move, "do you donate or do I have to search you?"

"Don't you dare lay hands on this lady!" Marsden cried vehemently, but in a moment Currier's six-gun was against his ribs.

"Back up there, hombre," the gang-leader warned, with a sternness that sent Marsden stumbling away in full retreat. "You ain't seen enough of this glorious West to die yet. Come on there, lady, make it snappy."

Thoroughly frightened now, Dorothy hastily plucked one or two rings from her fingers and a necklace from her throat. She threw them to the ground, together with some money from her handbag, and the loot being gathered, Currier and his companions vanished into the brush again.

The driver of the stage stumbled off in the hope of securing his horses, Marsden, Dorothy and the other passengers remaining where they were.

"I reckon you can take your arms down now, brother," the third passenger said to Marsden, as he saw that the attorney was still standing with his arms raised. "Them road-agents won't be back."

Marsden turned to Dorothy. "Now I understand your mother's loathing for the West," he told her querulously, mopping his brow as he spoke. "I never experienced—"

He did not complete the sentence, for just then a familiar sound broke on his ears. It was the refrain of a ballad which a number of lusty voices were rendering, and presently Buck Sawyer and the Lazy B cowboys moved into view with their tally-ho.

"I woke up one morning on the old Chishold trail,

Rope in my hand and a cow by the tail.

Coma yi-yi yipi, yipi ya—"

Marsden and the other passenger ran towards the bend around which the cavalcade had appeared, and thirty seconds later they were relating to Buck all that had occurred.

"Road-agents, huh?" Buck ground out. "Did they get Miss Dotty?"

"No," Marsden cut in, "but they took all her jewellery and threatened her. They can't be far off, Sawyer."

"Tom," Buck said to one of the boys, "give me your horse."

"Wait a minute, Buck," the puncher interrupted. "Miss Dotty might need your attention. Better let me an' the rest of the boys trail 'em."

Buck nodded.

"All right," he agreed, "bring 'em in."

And as the ranch-hands galloped off he glanced down at Marsden and the attorney's fellow-passenger.

"Better come aboard, Marsden," he offered. "And I can give you a lift, too, stranger."

"No, thanks," was the reply. "I'll wait till the stage-driver finds his horses."

With Marsden installed in a chair next to the one Jenny was occupying, Buck drove on to join Dorothy. He pulled up alongside her and spoke to her attorney.

"Mr. Marsden," he said, "would you ask Miss Beals if she'll be ridiculous now and ride in my tally-ho? Or is she bent on walkin'?"

"Mr. Marsden," Dorothy rejoined curtly, "tell Mr. Sawyer I'll walk."

With the words she proceeded to step out along the dusty trail in her high-heeled shoes. She was stumbling in the wagon-ruts before she had gone three paces, but seemed determined to continue the march.

Buck raised his voice again. "Mr. Marsden," he said loudly, "tell Miss Beals we've got twenty miles of real rough goin' ahead of us. Well-stocked with mountain lions and rattlesnakes."

He saw Dorothy come to an abrupt standstill.

"Yeah," he went on, "and I don't want to brag about it, but we've got a pretty fair crop o' gila monsters, too."

Dorothy faced round and moved back to the tally-ho reluctantly. Dropping to the ground Buck swung her up in his powerful arms without comment and dumped her aboard the carriage. Then he climbed to the driving-seat and cracked his whip above the heads of the two horses in front of him.

A Brush with Currier.

MAKING for the spot where they had tethered their horses, the road-agents swung themselves into the saddle and galloped through the thicket. They followed the course of the stream, and did not halt till they were a couple of miles from the scene of the hold-up.

They deposited their loot on the ground. The valuables taken from the November 21st, 1931.

The occupants were ordered in a gruff voice to step down, and did so with their hands in the air.

three passengers did not concern them a great deal, for when money and trinkets had been divided each man would only be a few dollars the richer. But the contents of the chest should provide a fortune, they imagined, and it was with eagerness and impatience that the gangsters watched Currier force the lock.

The lid burst open to reveal a number of sacks, and snatching one of the canvas bags Currier drew out a knife and slashed the fabric. The mud on his face concealed his expression as he saw the result, but the fury with which he ripped open the other sacks betrayed his feelings.

From every one of the canvas bags a worthless stream of grit had poured. "Sand!" blazed Currier. "Why, the dirty, double-crossin' coyotes!"

"That's the first time we ever slipped up on a job," Burghley growled. "Wonder what could've gone wrong, boss? Who was it that planted that stuff there?"

Currier was glaring at the sacks, and all at once he stood up.

"Kid," he said to Flash Prescott, "you go on an' wait for us in Victoria."

Flash made as if to utter a protest, but Currier broke in on him.

"Get goin'!" he rapped out, and Flash mounted his horse obediently and cantered away.

When the youngster was out of earshot the rest of the gangsters looked at Currier inquiringly, and he at once voiced his thoughts.

"We're goin' to take a look at Sawyer's funny wagon," he grated. "I saw that Wells Fargo agent snoopin' around it just before the stage left Las Cruces. Sawyer's Flash Prescott's friend, so I figured I'd get the kid outa the way."

The crooks remounted and made for the road again. A hillock now lay between them and the ribbon of trail, and as they reached the peak of the promontory they caught a glimpse of the tally-ho winding its way across the flats below.

"There he is now!" jerked Currier.

In that same moment Buck sighted the rogues as they formed a group of dark silhouettes against the vivid skyline, and the instant they began to sweep down the hillside he whipped his horses into a gallop.

"Hqld fast, folks!" he called to his passengers. "That looks like the stick-up party, and we're gonna ramble!"

His voice mingled with the strident tones of Currier, which reached the occupants of the tally-ho as the vehicle was lurching forward.

"After him, boys! He thinks he can beat us to the ranch!"

The crooks urged their hroucs down the declivity, and in a whirl of dust the animals slithered to the trail scarcely fifty paces behind the fugitives.

By then the tally-ho was careering along the road at break-neck pace, but the crooks gave chase determinedly, and the drumming of their horses' hoofs was punctuated with the blasts of gunfire.

Hot lead ripped around the fancy carriage and an anxious expression appeared on Buck's face. He was not concerned for himself, however, but for Dorothy and Jenny, as there seemed every likelihood of a random bullet hitting one of them.

A deep gully lay to the left of the trail, and swerving to the brink of it, Buck pulled the horses to a standstill and cut them loose. Then he turned to Marsden and pointed out a copse near by.

"Get Miss Beals behind those trees and keep out of sight," he ordered. "And Jenny, you lead these horses to cover!"

The passengers descended, and the instant they had set foot to ground Buck put his shoulder under the carriage and with a terrific heave overturned it. It tumbled into the gully and finished wrong side up, and, diving after it, Buck took cover behind its wreckage and drew his six-gun.

Meanwhile Marsden had hustled Dorothy to the copse, which stood near the foot of the slope, and they had concealed themselves when Currier and his men reached the scene.

"Sawyer," Currier shouted, approaching the edge of the trail cautiously, "turn over that Fargo box and you can keep the girl. But if we have to fight for it, we'll take her, too."

Buck's answer was a bullet that sent Currier to cover, and next second that shot was greeted with a fusillade from the gangsters. The crash of the guns shattered the silence of the New Mexican noon, and leaden slugs sang around the ranch foreman's head, but, though he knew he had stirred up a hornet's nest by his decision to fight, he displayed magnificent coolness as he fired back at his adversaries.

Perhaps that was why a man of Marsden's unheroic calibre was inclined to regard the duel with some suspicion.

"Evidently this man Sawyer isn't afraid of the whole gang," said Dorothy in a tremulous voice, as she watched the gun-battle from the shelter of the copse.

Marsden sneered.

"I'm beginning to think the whole thing has been staged to impress you," he told her.

"But why?" Dorothy demanded, in a bewildered tone.

"Either to frighten you or arouse your admiration," Marsden rejoined. "I'm not quite sure."

At that instant Buck jerked back with a half-stifled exclamation and grabbed at his shoulder, where a bullet had clipped him and drawn blood. But though the pain for the moment was excruciating, he blazed away at the crooks, and he had actually avenged himself and plugged one of the ruffians through the arm when a commotion on the trail caused the gang to scatter.

The Lazy B ranch-hands were in sight, and as they came on at full gallop Currier and his men leapt into the saddle and took to the bush. Buck then moved from behind the overturned tally-ho, and, dragging out the sack of gold that had been hidden in it, he rejoined Dorothy and Marsden and elinbed with them to the trail, where they were met by Jenny and the horses.

"Mr. Marsden," said Buck, "you and Miss Beals take the ponies and go on ahead. Jenny and I will walk."

Dorothy spoke. She was looking at Buck superciliously.

"But surely," she observed, "one capable of staging highway robberies and comic opera hold-ups should be able to furnish better mounts!"

Buck eyed her steadily. His wound was hurting him cruelly, but when he answered her slighting comment he betrayed no sign of suffering.

"Gosh, I should have thought of that," he said, with mild sarcasm. "But we're plumb out of luxuries, so—it's bareback or walk."

He lifted her astride one of the ponies, and, while Marsden was mounting the other, he turned back to Jenny. But Dorothy, laying a hand for a moment on his shoulder just as he had swung her up, had drawn her fingers away to find them smeared with the blood that had soaked through his shirt.

It was with a shock of something approaching remorse that she realised how she had misjudged her foreman, and involuntarily she called to him.

"Oh, Mr. Sawyer," she said, "I—I'm afraid I must ask you to hold me on."

Buck shrugged, and then climbed up behind her. She added, in an undertone:

"I want you to know how sorry I am—about that unkind remark. The one about the comic opera hold-up."

"Miss Beals," Buck answered deliberately, "unkind remarks are like bullets. Once fired, being sorry doesn't stop their damage."

She bit her lip, but made no rejoinder, and Buck spoke to Jenny.

"Stay here and make yourself comfortable," he said to the negress. "I'll send somebody back for you."

"Yassuli, Mistah Sawyah," Jenny replied, picking up a heavy piece of wood that would serve her as a bludgeon. "Ah'll be heah, if dem outlaws don't come. An' even if dey do come," she added stoutly, "Ah'll still be heah."

The Will.

WHEN Buck and his companions appeared at the Lazy B they were welcomed by the domestic staff of the ranch-house, including Pa and Ma Stoddart, who had been firm friends of Dorothy's father, rather than employees.

"Say, Buck," old Pa Stoddart demanded, as the foreman dismounted and helped Dorothy to the ground, "where's the boys? And what's happened to the tally-ho?"

"There was a stick-up," Buck explained briefly, "and the boys are out lookin' for the bandits. Nobody was hurt—I got a scratch, that's all. Oh, folks," he added, "I want you to meet Miss Beals. Miss Beals, this is Pa Stoddart, your father's oldest friend. And this is Ma Stoddart."

"Welcome to the Lazy B, Dotty," said Ma.

Dorothy's eyes flickered dangerously. "How do you do?" she answered, with an airiness that did not escape the older woman.

"And this is Mr. Marsden," Buck was saying, "Miss Beals' attorney and manager."

"Manager?" Ma Stoddart repeated testily.

"Now listen," Buck continued, ignoring Ma's comment, "there's a coloured servant down at the pass. Will somebody take the buckboard and bring her in?"

"And in the meantime," put in Dorothy haughtily, "someone might be good enough to show me to my room."

Ma Stoddart took it upon herself to answer.

"There's plenty of rooms in there," she snapped, jerking her thumb towards the ranch-house, "and they're all yours. Help yourself!"

Buck tried to frown her into silence, but not succeeding, he escorted Dorothy and Marsden to the ranch-house and conducted them into the lounge, where a legal-looking gentleman was waiting.

Buck introduced him to Dorothy as her father's executor, and, in the additional presence of Pa Stoddart and one or two of the ranch staff, the lawyer proceeded to read out the last will and testament of the late James Beals.

After quoting several minor bequests, he came to the clause with which Dorothy was concerned.

"And to my daughter Dorothy Mae Beals," the executor read, "all the property and estates of which I die possessed. But the said Dorothy Mae Beals is compelled by the terms of this will to live on the property known as the Lazy B ranch for a period of five years. . . ."

Dorothy's face as she heard these words was a study in emotion.

"Why, it's—it's preposterous," she cried involuntarily. "Surely you can't mean—"

"In the event of my daughter failing to comply," the lawyer continued, "my executor shall consider this will broken. And in such a contingency, Robert (Buck) Sawyer shall receive all properties and money left by me.

Also, under any and all conditions, Robert (Buck) Sawyer is to remain as manager of the Lazy B rancho, and—"

Dorothy was on her feet.

"I've heard enough!" she flashed. "If there is more of this imbecility, you can conclude the reading of the will with my attorney—Mr. Marsden!"

"Now, Dorothy," Marsden appealed, "I must insist that you make no statement at this time."

Dorothy turned from him impatiently and looked at Pa Stoddart.

"You were my father's closest friend," he said. "Why has he compelled me to live here?"

"Your dad spent all his life without you," Pa Stoddart answered quietly. "Why, the only practice he ever had at bein' a father was rearin' Buck Sawyer. But he always hoped that you'd come back and live hero with him. You wouldn't, but—I guess you will now."

With these words he departed, and the lawyer immediately afterwards, Buck, Dorothy and Marsden found themselves alone.

"Of course, Sawyer," said Marsden superciliously, "you didn't know the conditions of this will."

"Certainly not," Buck retorted. "Mr. Beals promised me nothing—not even a job. But, since I'm still manager here," he added, turning to Dorothy, "are there any orders you'd like carried out?"

"Yes," Dorothy answered curtly. "You'll find quarters outside this house, and in future you will transact all business with my personal manager—Mr. Marsden."

Buck smiled a slow smile.

"Oh, Mr. Marsden," he said, "you might thank Miss Beals for those favours and say 'good-night' to her for me. And I sure hope the coyotes don't keep her from beddin' down right comfortable."

He strolled from the room, and when he had gone Dorothy looked at Marsden.

"That's the first person who's ever made me delight in sarcasm," she declared bitterly. "I can't understand the violent dislike I've taken to him."

"I can," Marsden rejoined, with what he imagined to be a shrewd expression. "I didn't understand his motive at first, but now it's all too obvious. He thinks that by making things unpleasant he'll drive you away and inherit this property—worth about a million dollars. Remember—if you leave this outfit he falls heir to it absolutely."

Dorothy frowned, believing that Marsden's suppositions were correct.

"He doesn't know me," she announced determinedly. "He'll never get me off this ranch, if that's his idea."

She crossed thoughtfully to the window, which was open. From somewhere near by came the strains of a guitar, and a plaintive chorus of cowboy voices, singing a mournful ballad.

"Oh, bury me down on the lone prairie,

Where the wild coyote will howl o'er me."

Something seemed to rise in Dorothy's throat as she heard those words. Her father—he was buried "down on the lone prairie"—lonely old man who had never known his daughter's affection. She felt a pang of remorse, and something of the subtle spell of the West, too—and all at once an emotion both strong and deep brought the tears to her eyes.

"Why, Dorothy," said Marsden, approaching her side, "you're crying."

"I'm not," she answered, but there was a catch in her voice that belied her denial.

Tornado.

IT was early morning, but Buck and the boys were already astir, the ranch manager having emerged from his new quarters shortly after sunrise.

He was now saddling a restive-looking bronc that stood in the little corral at the back of the bunk-house, and as he tightened the cinch-buckle one or two of the punchers came to the fencing.

"You know, fellers," Buck said to them, "if I didn't give this pony a work-out every morning he'd feel neglected. He sure is an ornery bronc—kicks out every mornin' just as regular as the sun comes up."

"Yeah," one of the boys observed, "an' for four or five jumps it takes pretty much of a man to hold him. Then after that he's gentle as a kitten."

The bronc was already beginning to show signs of rebellion, and Buck had some difficulty in holding him.

"Whoa, there," he said. "All set for your frolic already, are you? Okay, Tornado, let's go." And as he spoke he sprang lithely to the saddle.

The bronc cut loose, and for the space of sixty frantic seconds the demon streak in him held sway. Bounding around the corral he tried his hardest to throw his rider, but failed signally, and, as was his wont, he became docile as soon as his early morning mood had run its course.

"Whoa!" Buck commanded with a grin. "You're just a great big bluff, that's all."

He brought the pony to a standstill, and it was as he was dismounting that he noticed Dorothy and Marsden had appeared at the fencing.

"Good-morning, Sawyer," Marsden greeted him in a patronising tone. "Miss Beals would like to have a horse saddled."

"Can I ride that beauty?" put in Dorothy, indicating Tornado.

Buck knew that the bronc's "cussedness" was now quite spent, but, nevertheless, he was only to be mounted conditionally.

"Sure, you can ride him," he stated, "if you keep him in the corral. Don't let him in the open, because he'll head for the hills and won't stop till he reaches 'em."

Currier gave him no chance to say more, for with a sudden lunge he ripped his fist to the youngster's jaw and felled him.

"Why is that?" Dorothy demanded impatiently.

"Well, he's got wild blood in him," Buck explained, "and fightin' range stallions is his idea of a picnic."

"Do you think it's safe for Miss Beals to ride him?" Marsden interposed with some anxiety.

Buck nodded.

"That pony's as gentle as a kitten now, so long as he's kept in the corral. Tom," he added to one of the boys, "you'd better shorten them stirrups."

Dorothy was helped into the saddle a moment later, and the animal under her seemed so meek that she fell to wondering if Buck's words had been intended to impress and alarm her. The thought had scarce occurred to her when she resolved to disregard his warning, and she at once spurred out of the corral before the gate could be closed.

Buck uttered a yell and flung himself astride another horse. His example was followed by one of the boys, and the two men were in full pursuit before Tornado had covered a hundred yards.

But the half-tamed bronc was racing across the prairie at a pace which Dorothy was powerless to check, and, as Buck had prophesied, he was heading for the hills.

Dorothy blanched, realising now that Buck's warning had not been so many idle words. She threw all her weight on to the reins, but her efforts to stop Tornado were ineffectual, and a chill seized her as she foresaw what might happen when the runaway pony encountered the wild herd and gave battle to one of the range stallions.

Straight for a canyon amid the hills Tornado galloped, and as she was swept into the gorge Dorothy saw a troop of wild horses ahead of her.

But Buck Sawyer was close behind her, and, when Tornado was only fifty yards from the herd, the ranch foreman came abreast and circled Dorothy's waist with one strong arm. Next instant he had plucked her from the saddle.

He lowered her to the ground and rode on after Tornado, who was now almost upon a big black stallion which had advanced from the muster of wild horses. Before a clash could take place, Buck whirled his lariat and circled Tornado's neck with the rawhide noose. Then he blazed off his gun and frightened the herd of outlaw brones into a stampede.

He held Tornado in check till the other ranch hand came up.

"All right, Jim," he said then, "you take him. An' don't ever let Miss Beals ride him again."

He cantered over to where the girl was standing, and dismounted beside her.

"I—I didn't realise the danger," she stammered. "I thought—you were trying to scare me."

"What would I want to scare you for?" he demanded, and Dorothy could find no words with which to answer him.

Her next encounter with Buck was of a more pleasant nature, and took place in circumstances that showed she was not so averse to the West as she had at first declared.

For when the big ranch foreman came across her she was indulging in a little revolver practice on a target that she had rigged up with Jenny's assistance.

Buck watched her amusedly for a spell, and then, seeing that she was not meeting with much success, he strode across to her.

"Say, lower your sight," he told her. "You're elevatin'. Come on, let me show you."

Taking up a position behind her, he held her wrist and levelled the six-gun at the target.

"Now," he went on, "top your sight—take a dead bead—and set her on the bullseye. Okay—let her go!"

There was a report, and the slug hit the centre-spot of the target.

"That's what I call real shootin'," Buck declared. "Let's try it again."

She looked up at him and nodded smilingly, and as their eyes met Buck was seized with an impetuous desire to kiss her. It struck him, too, that she might not resent such a liberty as much as she would have done on the day of her arrival, but he overcame the impulse and turned his attention on the target again.

"We'd better get to shootin'," he drawled.

A man was watching them with an expression that betrayed a good deal of displeasure. The man was Marsden.

The Return of Flash.

A WEEK or two had passed since Dorothy had first taken up residence at the Lazy B Ranch, and, as he confronted her in the living-room one day, Marsden's manner conveyed impatience.

"Since you're compelled to remain out here in the West," he said, speaking no longer as an attorney, but as a suitor, "why not set our wedding-day?"

Dorothy studied him for a moment, and then glanced sidelong through the window.

"No, George," she murmured. "As a husband you might have worn well enough in New York. But you're no bargain in the West."

"I notice that your attitude has changed towards me since you started seeing a good deal of this man Sawyer!" Marsden said hotly. "Now, if you think I'm going to let him come between us—"

He was interrupted by a tap on the door, and as he looked round he saw a figure that immediately struck him as familiar. It was the figure of young Flash Prescott, and suddenly Marsden found himself associating him with the gang which had robbed the stage.

The youngster's face, of course, was unknown to him. But the somewhat gay and picturesque attire which had earned the irresponsible youth his nickname of "Flash" was the link which connected him, in Marsden's mind, with the plundering of the coach.

"One of the men who held us up," he said to Dorothy in a husky whisper.

Flash did not hear those words, and approached nonchalantly.

"Sorry to butt in," he stated, "but I reckon Buck half-expects me. My name's Prescott—Flash Prescott."

Marsden coughed nervously.

"I—I'll fetch Mr. Sawyer for you," he faltered, but Flash restrained him.

"No," he protested. "Oh, no, don't bother to do that. You see, I'm aimin' to buy stock, and I guess I can talk business with you."

Marsden's ill-concealed agitation gave place to interest, and a deal had been clinched when Buck appeared on the scene.

"Hallo, Flash!" he greeted. "Saw that pint of yours outside, and knew you were around. What brings you to the Lazy B?"

"I've just sold that herd for ten thousand dollars, Sawyer," put in Marsden. "That's a fair price, isn't it?"

Buck glanced from Marsden to Flash.

"Sure, it's a good price," he said. "And then to young Prescott: 'C'mon outside,'" he added. "I want to talk to you."

He escorted Flash from the ranch-house and looked him full in the eyes.

"Pardner," he observed, "a man is judged accordin' to the herd he trails with, and I've got a sneakin' idea I'd like to separate you from Currier and his influence. Now, listen, I know of a good job waitin' for you on a ranch up in Montana, and I think you need a change of air."

Flash laughed easily.

"Don't you worry about my health, Buck," he said. "And, getting back to business, I'll be ready for delivery of that herd at Allen's loading corral by sundown. Adios, amigo."

He swung himself into the saddle of his horse and cantered away, leaving Buck to give instructions for driving the purchased cattle to railhead.

Meanwhile, Dorothy and Marsden were discussing the situation from an angle that the big ranch-foreman did not suspect.

"Do you think Buck Sawyer knows this Prescott is a hold-up man?" Dorothy was saying.

"I'll bet they're working together!" Marsden retorted spitefully.

Dorothy favoured him with a glance that held just a trace of contempt.

"You wouldn't dare say that to Buck!" she challenged.

"No?" Marsden sneered. "Well, if you think he's on the level, you may change your mind when I get him in here and ask him a few questions."

He walked to the door of the ranch-house, and, as he opened it and saw Buck, he hailed the stalwart Westerner and asked him to step in for a moment.

Buck entered the house, and, in the presence of Dorothy, Marsden began his interrogation.

"Sawyer," he asked, "how well do you know this Prescott?"

"Why, I've known him ever since we were kids," Buck replied. "We were pals. He used to ride for the Lazy B."

Marsden looked sidelong at Dorothy and then addressed the foreman again, an ugly sneer playing around his mouth as he spoke.

"Then you know that he held up the stage-coach!" he accused.

Buck acted involuntarily, his bunched fist driving to the point of Marsden's chin and landing with a shock that flung the attorney to the floor. He lay with his back against an armchair, a vacant, stupefied expression on his sallow face.

Buck stood over him and was still glaring at the man when he felt a touch on his sleeve. He turned his head to find Dorothy at his side.

"You obviously consider Prescott is thoroughly honest," she told him. "But you're wrong. He was one of the bandits who held us up on the day of our arriva'."

It was hard for Buck to credit her statement, for, though concerned over the company Flash was keeping, he hated to think that the youngster was already involved in a life of crime.

"Did you see him that day?" he demanded of Dorothy.

"No," she admitted. "I didn't see his face. The men were all masked with clay. But his build, and the style of his dress—they convinced me that Marsden's suspicions were correct."

"Marsden could be wrong," Buck declared. "I think Flash is honest, and I'm going on believing it. He's just a fresh kid, under bad influence. But he's not crooked."

He strode to the door and walked out of the ranch-house, but as he was approaching the men's quarters one of the hands accosted him.

"Buck," the fellow said, "I've just come in from town, and I've got red-hot news for yuh. You've gotta find Flash Prescott and tell him to pull his freight."

"Why?" Buck wanted to know.

"The sheriff's looking for him on account of that hold-up job," the cow-hand answered. "He's got a strong hunch Flash was mixed up in it."

Buck bit his lip. He was not sorry that he had laid out Marsden, for he had not been partial to that worthy from the first moment of clapping eyes on him. But he was now forced to believe that the attorney's words had not been ill-founded, and Flash must be saved from the consequences of his own rashness.

"All right," said Buck. "I think I know where to find him. You help the boys to get the herd on the way. I'll see that Flash hits the trail and quits these parts."

He sprang towards his brone and, vaulting into the saddle, galloped off in a north-westerly direction, headed for Allen's loading corral. He hoped either to make up on Flash, or else locate him at the railroad siding.

Currier's Plan.

FLASH PRESCOTT came in sight of the railroad and entered over the prairie to the lonely siding where the loading corrals stood.

A group of men stood near a rough shelter that was a boon in the rainy season. The men were Joe Currier and his associates, and, riding up to them, Flash dismounted.

"Well," said Currier, "how did you get on?"

"Okay!" Flash rejoined casually. "I talked business with that hombre Marsden and bought the beef for ten thousand."

"Did you say delivery had to be made to-night?" Currier asked.

Flash nodded.

"Sure," he answered. "I saw Buck afterwards, an' told him we'd expect the cattle here by sundown."

"Great!" said Currier with a smirk. "That'll take all their men, an' we can get the dough back without any trouble."

"It's a cinch, boss," another of the gang declared. "The sweetest job we've pulled in a long time."

There were similar comments from the remainder of the crooks, comments which Flash Prescott heard with a bewildered air.

"Say," he demanded, "what are you fellers talkin' about?"

Joe Currier leered at him.

"That ten thousand dollars you just paid over at the Lazy B," he rejoined.

Flash Prescott's eyes blazed as the truth dawned on him, and all at once he had thrust his impassioned face close to Currier's.

"So that's why you had me buy that herd!" he cried. "You stock up with cattle, and while the ranch is deserted you bust in and grab the money. You get the herd and your money back as well, huh?"

"What a brain you've got!" sneered Currier. "Well, supposin' you're right, Prescott?"

"Listen!" Flash ground out. "You made a sap outa me and fooled me into tyin' up with you over that stage robbery. Well, maybe I had myself to blame for that. Maybe I should've known that only a mug is crooked. But when you sent me to the Lazy B with that ten thousand dollars I thought it was a straight cattle-deal."

"And now you know different, Prescott," Currier said dangerously, "just what do you aim to do?"

"I'm through!" Flash shouted violently. "When you start stealin' from my friend you can count me out."

Currier squared his shoulders.

"You'll do as I tell you, kid," he advised.

"You can't make me put one over on the outfit my pal works for!" Flash raved. "I'll queer your game—"

Currier gave him no chance to say more, for with a sudden lunge he ripped his fist to the youngster's jaw and felled him.

Flash went sprawling in the dust, and lay dazed for a moment. Then he shook himself, and as his brain cleared an inarticulate cry escaped him. Next instant he had scrambled to his feet and was springing at Currier.

Currier was a burly ruffian who could have given Flash a couple of stones in weight, and it might have fared badly with the slim youngster had the gang-leader torn into him. But before Flash could come within striking distance again half a dozen pairs of hands had seized him.

He struggled furiously, but Currier's accomplices held him fast, and at their leader's bidding they bound his hands with cord.

Hardly had he been made secure when the drumming of hoofs was heard, and Currier instantly rapped out a command.

"Get Prescott inside that shelter and keep him quiet," he jerked. "Bill, you an' Blaney see who it is!"

With a grimy hand clapped over his mouth to prevent him from calling out,

Flash was dragged into the shanty, and in the meantime two of the gang hurried round an angle of the corral to confront the newcomer.

The approaching horseman was Buck Sawyer, and as he caught sight of the two gangsters he urged his pony towards them and drew rein.

"Say, you seen Flash Prescott around here?" he inquired.

"Nope," said the man Blaney. "Ain't seen him since mornin'."

Buck appeared to accept the statement as the truth.

"That's funny!" he murmured. "He told me to meet him here. If he shows up, tell him Buck Sawyer's lookin' for him, will you?"

"Yeah, we sure will!" Blaney promised, and Buck wheeled his horse and galloped off.

The gangsters retraced their steps round the corral and joined Currier and the others.

"Well," said Currier, "who was it?"

"Sawyer," Blaney replied, whereupon Flash Prescott's eyes gleamed. "Said he was to meet the kid here."

"Yeah?" growled Currier. "Say, listen, somebody's gotta keep an eye on Prescott. He'd squeal to his friends if he had the chance."

He turned to two of his men.

"Jim, you an' Silver better stay here," he continued. "You can take delivery of the herd when it shows up, and in the meantime watch the kid."

"All right, boss."

"Well," Currier said to the others, "let's hit the breeze for the Lazy B ranch-house and collect our dough."

The gangsters mounted and galloped

Buck hit him again, this time with a full swing.

away, leaving Flash in the care of the two men, Silver and Jim—and their going was witnessed by a watcher on the crest of a hill overlooking the railroad.

For if the crooks imagined that Buck Sawyer had been fooled by the denial of Flash's presence they were mistaken. In the men he had met at the corral Buck had recognised two of Currier's gang, and had hardly asked after Flash before he realised that he was not likely to obtain much information from them.

Thus, after conveying the impression that he was abandoning his quest for Flash, he had made a detour behind the cover of the hill and had gained a vantage point from which he could command a view of the shelter.

He caught sight of Flash, and, when Currier and the main body of the crooks had departed, he began to work his way to the corral again. He was careful to avoid being seen by Jim and Silver, and, as Flash gained a glimpse of him, he held up his hand in a mute gesture that enjoined caution.

Only by an involuntary start had Flash shown any sign of excitement that might have warned his captors. But it passed unnoticed, and a moment later the youngster had hit upon a ruse calculated to help Buck in his attempt at rescue.

He began to struggle violently, and thereby concentrated the attention of the gangsters. Buck at once darted to the corner of the corral and crouched there, within a few paces of the two men guarding Flash, but the rogue known as Silver must have had keen ears, for all at once he looked round.

Buck was stooping beyond the angle of the fencing, and Silver did not see him. The crook stood in an attitude of suspicion, however, his head on one side.

"What was that, Jim?" he demanded. "Iuh?" muttered the other. "I didn't hear nothin', pardner."

"I'll swear I did!" Silver declared emphatically.

Flash renewed his struggles with even greater enthusiasm, and once more succeeded in diverting the gangsters.

"It's no use you tryin' to get loose, Flash!" growled Jim. "You can't bust them cords nohow. Keep still, will yuh?"

The crooks again had their backs to the Lazy B foreman, and Buck pulled his six-gun from its holster and stepped to the front of the shelter.

"Stick 'em up!" he ordered curtly.

Silver and Jim whipped round in alarm. Silver thrust his hands into the air promptly, but Jim carried his hand involuntarily to his hip. He changed his mind as Buck jabbed his "forty-five" towards his ribs.

"You heard me!" he ground out. "Up with those mitts, or I'll drill you!"

Jim obeyed sullenly, and Buck relieved the two ruffians of their "irons."

"Now cut the kid free," he ordered Silver, indicating Flash.

The man did as he was told, and, once he had been liberated, Flash proceeded to bind Currier's hirelings hand and foot. They were then pushed into a corner, and Buck thrust his gun back into its holster.

"Take a seat," Buck said to the crooks with a grin. "You won't have to wait long. I'll send the sheriff to collect you just as soon as I can. And Flash," he added, "you head for Montana—pronto. The law's on your trail."

"Thanks, Buck!" Flash answered fervently, "you're a pal."

"Go on, kid!" Buck told him. "Beat it—and good luck to you."

Flash turned towards his horse, which was tethered near by, but on an after-thought he paused.

November 21st, 1931.

Our Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

"Hold on, Buck!" he said. "Currier's gone to the Lazy B ranch-house to get that ten thousand dollars I paid you for the stock. Silver and Jim were to take delivery of the cattle while the rest of the gang raided your outfit and took the dough. That's why I fell out with 'em. Come on, I'll trail along with you."

"Wait a minute," Buck jerked, laying a hand on his arm. "I've got a better idea. I'll take the short-cut by Red Canyon. You ride the long way round and meet the boys with the cattle. Tip 'em off to Currier's little scheme, will you?"

"Right, Buck!" Flash agreed, and, springing into the saddle of his horse, he clapped spurs to the animal's flanks.

In the meantime Buck sprinted to where he had left his bronc, and less than a minute after he had parted with Flash he was galloping at top speed in the direction of Red Canyon.

The Raid on the Ranch-House.

RIDING by the same route that Buck was to choose, Currier and his men sighted the Lazy B outfit shortly after sundown.

The shadows were falling swiftly, and ere they had tethered their ponies in a chaparral thicket fifty or sixty yards from the ranch, the stars were out.

The gang advanced on foot, and, at the veranda of the house, Currier called a halt.

"Blaney, you and Carson guard the outside in case of accidents," he said, picking out two of his hirelings. "You other guys follow me."

The Lazy B ranch-house was a sumptuous, two-story building. There were lights in the upper floor, but the lower windows were in darkness, and, the front door being unlocked after the free-and-easy style of the West, Currier and his companions had no difficulty in entering.

Each with a gun in his hand, they filed into the lounge-hall with noiseless tread, but they had scarcely made their way across the threshold when they heard the sound of a door opening and closing somewhere above their heads.

A man began to descend the stairs, and Currier and his gangsters crouched down beside the banisters. The man proved to be Marsden, and as the attorney reached the lounge he switched on a light and walked over to a safe at the far side of the room.

Currier restrained his men and watched with interest. He permitted Marsden to open the safe and take from it a legal document, which was actually a copy of the will that had been made by Dorothy's father. Then, before the attorney could close the safe, the gang-leader moved from hiding.

"Elevate, pardner," he drawled. "Elevate."

Marsden spun around and saw three armed men. He uttered an exclamation and stuck up his hands with a seared look, the will falling from his grasp.

"Friend," said Currier, "we're here to make a collection. The cattle we bought from you will be on the railroad by now, with a couple of my men travelin' along to take spot cash on delivery. We dropped in to get back the ten thousand we paid for 'em. Stand aside from that safe, brother—"

One of his men pulled at his sleeve, interrupting him.

"Listen, boss," he hissed. "Somebody else comin' down the stairs."

Currier and his men crowded Marsden into a corner, and held him there as the newcomer descended. It proved to be Dorothy, and, without seeing the

(Continued on page 25.)

A gripping story of a risky plot by a prison official to capture a callous, fearless gunman. Another true story from the notebook of William J. Burns, of the U.S. Secret Service.

The 'Plane to the Rescue!

THE warden of the State prison paced up and down his study, a frown upon his usually placid features. The telephone had shrilled, and the message that had reached his ears a few short moments earlier was evidently unpleasant in character. Prison executives must of necessity plumb the depths of the emotions, and Warden Thompson was evidently to be no exception to the rule.

But here was a message of an unusually serious nature. "Serious," in fact, would be a somewhat mild description. "Alarming" would describe it with even greater accuracy, for the message hinted at a carefully laid plan to set prison discipline at naught and flout the authority of the law. It was nothing less ominous than the fact, conveyed to the authorities by prudent connections in the New York underworld, that steps would most certainly be taken to keep "Killer" O'Rourke from the electric chair!

Steps would be taken! Not might be taken! There was the rub! It was no mere idle threat—of that the warden was perfectly convinced. For the associates of the Killer were men of their word—silent, ruthless, banded unitedly against decent society. Applied to the ordinary, everyday business of life, the talents of this particular gang might have assured for all of them a comfortable position. But the excitement of law-breaking, the joy of "besting" the authorities, far outweighed the attractions of legitimate occupation.

The warden well knew the class of individual he had to reckon with—men of the underworld who would stop at nothing; men who had limitless illegally secured resources at their command; men who were able to enlist those resources in defying the law and fighting it to the very limit.

Killer O'Rourke had been their 'bright particular star'; had enjoyed amazing immunity from arrest in a long and hectic career of crime; had hitherto slipped through the meshes of the law, simply by reason of the fact that he had borne a charmed life. But Killer had gone too far, had over-estimated his powers.

Here he was, then, with a double guard outside his cell, his days definitely numbered. For Killer O'Rourke had slain one of his fellows under circumstances that made a pardon impossible. His friends had moved heaven and earth to secure a revision of the death sentence, but without avail. Mike O'Rourke, his daredevil brother, long a thorn in the side of the police of New York and an accomplice in Killer's latest crime, had escaped the extreme penalty by the very breadth of a hair, and now was faced with the prospect of ending his life as an unwilling guest of the Federal Government.

Mike had accepted his sentence with a resignation that certainly deceived the authorities. His behaviour whilst in prison was regarded as exemplary, and already he had qualified for little concessions such as fall to the share of prisoners who bow to the inevitable and make as little trouble as possible.

He was permitted to receive visitors at carefully regulated periods, such visitors being searched and watched and their conversation overheard. He was permitted also to receive a certain number of letters per month, letters which referred to, or seemed to refer to, matters of a purely domestic character. Not a single word about the gang or its activities, for every line of those letters was carefully scrutinized by the warden, every sheet of paper subjected to a test to avoid any possibility of an illegal message coming through.

Yes, Mike O'Rourke had bowed to the inevitable. No convict sang more fervently in the prison choir, none seemed so anxious as he to remain in the good books of the kindly prison warden.

The warden pressed a button, and within a few seconds, as if impelled thither by some well-oiled mechanism, there came into the room a plump, clean-shaven individual bearing a closer resemblance to a commercial traveller on vacation, than to one of the smartest detectives in the Force. "Morning, chief," greeted Detective Connell. "What can I do, sir?"

"It's about Killer O'Rourke," said the warden. "There is, of course, no chance of anything going wrong with our plans. He's going to the electric chair. That's definite!"

"And no man more justly deserved it," came the deep-toned response. "A menace to the community, if ever there was one; no man ever had a more just trial or a more honest verdict."

"Quite," returned the warden. "But the point is that the time and place of O'Rourke's end will have to be kept as quiet as possible. The less publicity we get the better. So, please, keep your eye on the Press; pass them the word, and tell them that there's more in our request for as little publicity as possible than meets the eye. I leave you to handle the Press." This with a twinkle in his eye, for Connell had graduated to the Force from the reporters'-room, a firm believer in his own private axiom that the truncheon's mightier than the pen!

"Do you think," asked the warden, that ominous telephone message still at the back of his mind, "that we ought to keep a special watch on his brother Mike? I've often thought, you know, that Mike was the brains of most of the enterprises that have led Killer to the chair. That, of course, is my private opinion. I do not speak officially."

"No, warden," replied the detective thoughtfully. "I believe that Mike is perfectly satisfied that he's got off with a life sentence, instead of sharing the death penalty with his brother. He seems surly and morose at times. Still, the prospect of a 'lifer' is enough to make a chap surly, though he hasn't been in long enough to realise what a 'lifer' really means."

November 21st, 1931.

"That's as may be. Anyhow, just to prove to you that appearances are deceptive, we've just had warning that Mike is going to attempt to escape! We have been warned also that if he does manage to get away—and I'd like to see him try it!—he proposes to have my life!

"Not the first man, by any means, to threaten the warden of the State prison, and, I imagine, not by any means the last. What earthly chance does a man stand these days, not only of breaking prison, but of keeping out of reach of the wireless descriptions of him? Still, Connell, we'll keep our eye upon his associates and the members of the O'Rourke family. There's never smoke without fire, and our informant is usually correct—uncannily so."

The convicts were assigned to their various duties in the drab, high-walled yard of the State prison. Warders armed with loaded rifles patrolled the place from various points of vantage; not a single move of the prisoners passed unnoticed. And yet, in spite of the eagle eyes that watched them, two members of the working-gang managed somehow to snatch a hurried and breathless conversation.

"Say, Kinky," said Mike O'Rourke, out of the corner of his mouth, "what time is it?"

The man addressed as Kinky curled his cruel lips in disgust.

"Time?" he repeated. "What's botherin' you, O'Rourke? You should be worrying about the time, when for the rest of your life you'll be raking this yard!"

"Don't believe it!" muttered O'Rourke, "I'll not be raking this yard all my life! Tell me, Kinky," he begged, "what d'you reckon the time to be?"

Kinky muttered a curse.

"Look out, Mike, they're watching us! It struck eleven about a quarter of an hour ago."

"Fine!" was all the convict said. And all the time that quiet prison yard was a seething volcano, a place of carefully restrained passions, of feelings that ached to be unleashed. Hopelessly the men looked up from their tasks, glimpsing the sky that roofed those prison walls—freedom so near at hand, freedom impossible to attain.

The guards were patrolling the prison wall, every man on the alert, every rifle ready for instant service, every prisoner a marked man. Hopeless to even dream of escaping from this living tomb. Foolish to ever plan to run the gauntlet of those sharp eyes, those fatal bullets; to scale that murderously lofty wall—cruel, unclimbable as the side of a precipice. And so O'Rourke went on sullenly with his job, apparently resigned to his fate, but with a glint in his eye that seemed to betoken mischief. Suddenly from the distance came a musical humming, as of a giant bee questing for some mighty flower.

Nearer and nearer came that insistent droning, and then, a mere speck in the sky that might have been a bird gradually revealed itself as a sturdy, swift-moving aeroplane. Nearer still it came, ever nearer, and its antics were both surprising and alarming. It nosed, then righted itself, spiralled, enveloped itself in a smoke cloud, performed evolutions that brought forth the loud-voiced admiration of those well-armed warders.

A welcome diversion in the prison routine. They speculated whither the 'plane could be bound, the reason for its evolutions, commented upon the nerve of the pilot, playfully suggested what an ideal method it might prove to be to make a clear getaway from gaol!

Uninfluenced by the commotion, a couple of labourers, in the uniform of railwaymen, were patrolling the railway track. The aeroplane and its stunts had no seeming interest for them, for they walked with hurried step along the iron road that lay beyond the prison walls, evidently bent upon their routine duties. Here were the warders, sky-gazing still, watching with unwonted interest the spirallings of that hardy airman. And while the warders watched, in the flick of an eyelid the "railwaymen" had thrown a rope over the high prison wall—a long rope, a strong rope, of which they held the ends, and held them firmly!

His guardians still 'plane-gazing, Mick O'Rourke seized that heaven-sent rope, clambered with the agility of a monkey up the terribly high wall, ran along the top of it with all the speed at his command, and, just as his escape was discovered, dropped on to the roof of a passing train.

Shot after shot rang out, all very wide of the mark. The convicts in the prison yard raised a feeble cheer as the redoubtable O'Rourke disappeared from view. Stern orders from above curbed their enthusiasm, but many a convict's heart beat frantically at the sheer audacity of that exploit. The alarm was sounded, the train sped on, carrying on its roof, in a position of gravest peril, a man who, above all men, the prison had desired to keep in closest custody.

O'Rourke clung to the sloping roof, swayed to and fro by the violent motions of the train, grabbing a precious hand-hold upon the centre-ridge, the aperture through which the carriage lamps were lighted. Now it seemed as if he must be dashed to the permanent way as the train swerved round a wicked curve. Now, almost suffocated by the poisonous fumes that filled a terribly lengthy tunnel. Sparks and dust flew in his face, and there were moments when Mike O'Rourke, now a fugitive from justice, longed once more for the safety of the prison yard. But he had made his choice—would see it through to the bitter end, come what might!

That telephone message had evidently been inspired. The train—an express, as it so happened—flew on, and it might have been observed that the mysterious aeroplane, queerly enough, was keeping pace with it! Stranger still, the pilot could now be seen paying out a long rope-ladder carefully, gingerly, whilst hovering above the speeding train. A breathless second, an awful moment of indecision, then, with a bound, O'Rourke had caught the yielding rung of the ladder, dangled perilously in mid-air, till strong and willing hands hauled him into the rescuing 'plane. Higher still it soared into the clouds, until it became a mere speck, its destination a matter of infinite speculation.

The impossible had happened! Mike O'Rourke had made his getaway, aided by means that only money could have made possible. So, it seemed, he was in a position to wreak his threatened vengeance upon the man who had determined to send his brother to the chair. But would O'Rourke dare?

In spite of the eagle eyes that watched them, two members of the working gang managed to snatch a hurried and breathless conversation.

The Wireless Warning.

THE voice of the wireless announcer broadcasted the startling news: "The public are advised that Mike O'Rourke, brother of Killer O'Rourke, has just escaped from the State Prison, and was last seen on the top of a train headed for the city."

Then, after a brief interval, came an announcement that added thrill to thrill, as if the news of this amazing exploit were not sufficiently startling:

"An aeroplane played a part in his escape, and it is believed by the authorities that it had been specially chartered for his rescue, as the pilot could not be identified. Watch is being kept upon all aerodromes and police and public are requested to report anything of a suspicious character which may be considered to bear upon O'Rourke's escape."

"So that's that!" exclaimed Warden Thompson, after having made every possible arrangement for the apprehension of the elusive Mike, if and when discovered.

"This," he remarked to Connell, who had since returned from his satisfactory interview with the Press, "this is where I come in."

"This," corrected Connell, "is where we all come in!"

"No, you don't quite grasp it, for it all boils down to quite a personal matter. O'Rourke is the charming gentleman who remarked to the judge, to the warders, and to his prison chums, that if ever he escaped, his first and most 'pleasant' duty would be to settle me, once and for all."

"Well, warden," grunted Connell, "now that we know, it's up to us to show Master Mike just where he's going to get off."

Meantime, in a secret, unsuspected landing-place, far away on the outskirts of the city, the aeroplane came to rest, and almost as soon as its wheels had touched the earth a mud-splattered saloon car, that seemed as if it had passed through several campaigns, raced to meet the machine. In a trice the convict was out of the 'plane, bundled into the closed car, where he stripped every stitch of his prison garb and changed into the smartly cut garments of a man about town.

"Gee, Ben," O'Rourke said to the man at the steering-wheel, "everything worked like a clock. The simple message in your letter—even the warden read it, and didn't suspect anything—kept me fully prepared. The 'plane came on the tick. I haven't had a chance to thank the pilot yet, You'll do this for me, won't you? And here's your auto on time, just like a railway train, and with a fine, smart rig-out that makes me respectable again. What a bunch of pals to have, you boys!"

Within half an hour the former convict was speeding to the home of one of his associates.

"Well, Mike," they said, after mutual congratulations, "you're a smart lad to make so clean a getaway."

"Smart?" replied O'Rourke, as the refreshments circulated and the congratulations had begun to grow irksome. "It was the only chance, the only way to cheat the chair of my brother."

"But," they replied in hushed voices, "Killer did it, didn't he? You'd have to be the governor to save him."

"I know," came the surly answer, "I know that Killer did it. Just the same, I'm going to save him. What d'you think I broke prison for? I got out, didn't I? Got away from the closest-guarded prison in the States! And whether Killer's got a double guard or not, he'll be here in this very house before another day's passed." They listened to this gruff-voiced colleague as if to a worker of miracles.

"Now, see here," And they drew closer as the desperate man outlined his plans. "I'm going to Warden Thompson's place to-night. And, what's more, if he doesn't get hussy and tell the governor that Killer was innocent, then Mister Thompson's number's up!"

"Well, Mike," observed his bosom friend, "a brother's a brother, and blood's thicker than water, as someone said, but there's no sense in putting your head into a noose, too."

"Shut up!" was his reply, and further comment became frozen.

The Warden's Ruse.

"MY plan is this," said the warden, addressing his men: "I shall see to it that all the evening papers carry a front-page paragraph to the effect that I am called to the city this evening. Then I want you to pass the word to Gippy Wilson, our man in the underworld, that the trip to the city is a 'blind.' I want it to be given out to him—and he knows how to pass on the news—that I am working on a case at 325, Edgewood Road."

"Edgewood Road?" repeated Connell. "What sort of place is that?"

"It's Sam Levering's house. His family is out of town, and I can borrow the place for a day or two if necessary."

"A nice little trap," was Connell's comment, "and I hope it keeps fine for Mike and his cronies. But it's risky, chief."

"We are always taking risks," came the reply, "and this time I'm the cheese in the mousetrap!"

The telephone-bell rang at O'Rourke's hideout, and Red Wolff, bosom friend of the redoubtable Mike, answered the call.

"Funny," was all Red could say. "It's Gippy Wilson on the 'phone, and he says that Thompson's visit to the city is a blind. He's working on a case at 325, Edgewood Road, and he's going to lie low there until you're back in gaol."

"Oh, he is, is he?" commented O'Rourke. "Well, Red, you can tell Gippy just where I'm hiding, just to show how 'frightened' I am of Thompson and his men."

"But, Mike, it's sheer madness."

"You heard what I said, Red?"

"Have it your own way, then."

Mike's friends eyed each other as if doubting the sanity of the man. Reckless, that was the only word for it! Asking for trouble, and he'd get it for sure!

Not very long afterwards, a telephone bell rang in the apartment at Edgewood Road, where Warden Thompson had elected to "hide," for reasons of his own. His caller was Gippy Wilson.

"Hallo!" said Thompson. "What's

There came from the pen a puff of white smoke and a deafening explosion.

the address—829, Livingstone Street? You're sure?"

"That was Gippy Wilson speaking," explained Thompson to the trio of plain-clothes men within call. "He has found out where O'Rourke is hiding. Get the other boys together and go after him. You, Connell, better hang around here with a couple of the men. One never knows. And if O'Rourke makes an entry here, don't stop him! There's none too much time. Smart's the word."

A posse of police raided the hiding-place of O'Rourke, amid a joyous smashing of glass and a splintering of woodwork. The house was surrounded, every exit barred. Ah! Here was a room with the lights all on, and seated in an armchair a figure unconcernedly reading an evening paper. The fugitive at last! It seemed too easy—too good to be true!

"Put 'em up!" came the stern order. The man looked up with obvious annoyance. It was none other than Red Wolf! The policemen did their best to hide their chagrin.

"Say, gentlemen," drawled Red, "what do you mean by damaging the place like this? Why didn't you knock on the door like decent fellows?"

In the meantime, taking advantage of the commotion that was bound to arise—and as has been seen, did arise—at his own hideout, Mike O'Rourke had trailed the warden to the house at Edgewood Road. Little by little, foot by foot, taking advantage of the deep shadows, he had drawn nearer and nearer to the man whose life would be forfeit, unless the warden yielded to a peremptory demand. Sharp eyes were watching O'Rourke as he tampered with a window-fastening.

Unaware of the danger near at hand, the warden had selected a volume from the bookcase, had settled down comfortably to an hour of undisturbed reading. The bell tinkled.

"No news of O'Rourke," came across the wire. "We surrounded the place, but only succeeded in nabbing Red Wolf. We think he knows more than he'll tell. So we'll hang on to him for a bit."

"Good work!" was the warden's reply. "Carry on, then come straight along to Edgewood Road and bring the boys along with you."

And all the time death was creeping ever nearer to the tranquil warden.

Book in hand, and by now deeply immersed in its pages, there came a gruff voice from his immediate rear, a voice that was full of menace—a merciless, unforgiving voice, if ever there was one.

"Well, Thompson," was the message carried by that cold, hard voice. "I've got you this time! Your men are outside. I believe?"

"Just a couple of the boys," replied the warden easily, without a falter.

"Then you'll take up that 'phone," commanded Mike, "and tell your men to beat it—quick! And then we'll talk business—you and me. And there's quite a lot to talk about," he added, fingering his gun significantly.

The warden, hesitating for the fraction of a second, took up the telephone communicating with the ante-room.

"There's no need for you fellows to stay on any longer. Get along home until you hear from me further."

"That's the ticket," commented the convict. "Now you'll switch off that 'phone and listen to me. Just attempt to call Headquarters, or anybody else, and you're as good as dead. You can walk out of here alive—and I don't suppose you want to peg out before your time—on just one condition."

"And that condition is?" inquired the warden.

"At five-thirty to-morrow morning my brother is supposed to go to the electric chair. It was you who helped to put him in that chair, and it's you who are going to get him out of it."

"Listen O'Rourke, what you ask is quite impossible, and you know it!"

"Nothing's impossible when your life is at stake," snarled O'Rourke. "It's the very simplest thing in the world. And this is how you're going to do it: you'll telephone the governor right away, and tell him that you've got some new evidence which proves that my brother did not kill Kelly."

"Such a lie that would not be sufficient to free your brother," said the warden, playing for time.

"I know that. But it will do just what I am planning to do, which is this: it will delay the execution, delay it just long enough for my brother to make his getaway as easily as I did, in spite of all your precautions." The convict chuckled at the recollection.

"I don't honestly believe the governor can do a thing at this late hour. The case had a fair trial, there was an appeal, and it will take more than a 'phone-call to interfere with the course of events. No, O'Rourke, it's a waste of time—and you know. Shoot, if you want to! You'll hang, in any case—my men will get you if it takes a life-time."

"Stop your nonsense, Thompson," the convict commanded. "You're only playing for time. I'm going to count ten, and if you've not called the governor by then, you might as well say your prayers—if you know any."

"All right, O'Rourke," returned the warden with a sigh, "I'll call him up, though you might as well know that he's in town here to-night, attending a banquet at the home of Frank Spear."

"I don't care where he is—'phone him."

The warden took up the telephone book. "Let's see, Spear's place is on Main Street—here it is—Central 9854." Then closed the book.

"What a nuisance!" he exclaimed.

"What was that number?"

"How should I know?" was O'Rourke's angry reply.

Once more the warden reached for the book, drew a scribbling pad towards him, reached for his pen, only to be roughly warned: "Put down that hand, Thompson! How do I know there's not a gun?"

"Wrong again, Rourke. I'm just reaching for my pen."

But the escaped convict was taking no chances.

"Pen or no pen, I'll handle it."

With a jerk, he freed the pen from the warden's pocket, covering him meantime with the wicked-looking revolver.

"Listen, Mister Warden, just you get me right. I'm running this show! Now jot down that number, so that you don't forget it this time, and make it quick. Time's getting along, and that brother of mine is going to be free! Get me?"

"What's the hurry?" inquired the warden, with an assumed indifference that goaded his captor to anger.

And then, with an innocent and quite disarming glance, Warden Thompson pointed the pen at Mike O'Rourke; and as he pointed there came from the pen a puff of white smoke and a deafening explosion, and a generous charge of tear-gas went full into the eyes of the astonished criminal. O'Rourke recoiled, gasped, spluttered, yet in spite of his agony kept a grip on himself. Grabbing his pistol, he fired wildly in the warden's direction, and with the noise of the firing the detectives hurled themselves into the room, grabbed the blinded convict, handcuffed him before he had time to collect his senses.

"Boss," said Connell, wringing his chief warmly by the hand, "remember you ordered us never to leave until we received the instructions a second time. That was the only thing that saved the situation."

"I know," replied the warden, wiping his eyes, for by now the tear-gas had penetrated the room. "But never forget that I told you boys that the little tear-gas pen of mine might come in handy some day. It has."

Killer O'Rourke paid the penalty. Mike still dawdles over his duties in the prison yard; still watches the skies for possible rescues from the clouds. But the State Prison, prepared for most eventualities, is prepared even for that! (By permission of the Ideal Film Co., Ltd.)

GRAND COMPLETE FILM NOVELS

"HIGH STAKES"

Joe Lennon did not approve of the baby-faced girl his elder brother Richard had married after being for ten years a widower. He felt that something was radically wrong somewhere, and set out to prove it in his own nonchalant manner—with highly dramatic circumstances.

"THE WRITTEN LAW"

An eminent physician loses his sight and a so-called friend tries to steal the affection of his wife. The unmasking of an outsider. Starring Percy Marmont and Madeleine Carroll.

"FASCINATION"

For two years the young married couple lived happily, then an actress came into their lives. The wife was prepared to make any sacrifice for her husband, but— Starring Madeleine Carroll and Carl Harbord.

Don't miss these three grand film stories, complete in this week's issue of our companion paper—

"SCREEN STORIES."

On Sale Wednesday.

Price 2d.

MAE MURRAY and LOWELL SHERMAN

in
'HIGH STAKES.'

"THE STAR WITNESS."

(Continued from page 10.)

upon them from the upper part of the shop opposite, but almost at once the man who had been tutoring Donny in the art of baseball pitching allayed their fears.

"It's all right, Jack." He grinned at his leader's obvious discomfiture. "Just a slight accident. The kid was practising a pitch and sent the ball through—"

"An accident, boloney!" A hate-facéd gangster, Lug Lorgens by name, turned quickly from the window. Below on the side-walk he had seen an aged man with iron-grey hair and beard and dressed in the blue uniform of an army pensioner, pick up the baseball that had landed at his feet. "The kid's grandfather is down in the street—I recognise the old fool. It was him who was playing that flute. Searching for the brat, I guess, and the kid knew it was him by the music."

His ugly face black with rage, Big Jack swung on his heel, and his murderously gleaming eyes glared down to the side-walk. He was just in time to see Grandpa Summerill inspect the baseball closer and to give a start as he discovered from the initials upon it that it was the one he had recently given his grandson.

Next moment and the watching gangster saw the old warrior hobble away, and knew on the instant that he had gone in search of the police.

"You dirty little brat!" Big Jack fairly leaped at Donny, caught him savagely by the coat collar and slung him into the settee. "For that I've a darned good mind to drill you!"

His gun was out in a flash, menacing the cowering little figure, but evidently he thought better than to shoot a mere child, for he suddenly swung away and confronted his confederates.

"That old swine's gone for the bulls—-that's certain, boys!" he spat at them fiercely. "Best make a break for it before we have a hornet's nest about our ears."

But grandpa had run into half a dozen stalwart patrolmen not fifty yards along the road. They came swinging out of a side-turning, one of several parties of officers who were searching that quarter of the city for the kidnapped boy.

"Quick! Quick!" The old stager excitedly grasped the arm of the foremost officer. "Along here, quick—the Ideal Paper Box Plant, Ltd."

"Now, see here, grandpa," growled the patrolman, a good-natured man of English descent, "you can't play tricks like this on—"

"Grandpa's right. That's just what am. I'm his grandpa." In his excitement old man Summerill did not realise he need for making himself clear to the group of officers. Again he tugged at Police-Officer Sainty's arm, succeeded in dragging him almost to the door of the premises labelled the Ideal Paper Box Plant, Ltd., and pointed a trembling finger towards the smashed window above. "See up there, that smashed window? Donny's up there—ony, my grand—"

"That's enough, you old ditherer." no of Police-Officer Sainty's colleagues grasped grandpa firmly by the arm. We can't have you raving like this in the streets. Batty, that's what you are, and you're going inside to be certified." "Why, doggone it!" grandpa fumed.

"So I'm batty, huh? Why, you big mug, I'll—"

"Now, now, what's all the row?" a stern voice suddenly inquired.

A police lieutenant, followed by a sergeant, had stepped from across the road to discover what the scene was about. But before any of his subordinates could answer him, the sergeant accompanying him gave a shrill whistle, then turned quickly to his superior officer.

"This man's Summerill, sir," he explained. "The missing witness in the Campo case."

"Missing witness, your granny!" The old warrior pulled a face at the sergeant, then turned eagerly to the lieutenant. "Now, now, you listen here, young man. Take a sly look above these here premises, the broken window there. You see it? Well, my grandson's up there. How do I know? Well, he threw this here baseball through the window as I came along a-playing my fife. I was hunting for him, and he recognised the tune I was a-piping. See his initials on the ball? You do? Well, if you've brains you can guess the rest. Campo's gang kidnapped Donny Leeds and they've got him right up there."

The lieutenant nodded grimly as he again took a surreptitious glance at the broken window above, saw the pair of sinister eyes that peered down at them. The eyes of Big Jack, who stepped hastily back from the window to report to his companions that there was no easy getaway for them now—that it had come to a show-down with the cops and that they must fight their way to freedom.

"Now, boys"—his face set grimly, the police lieutenant reached for his gun—"we're going in after that kid right now, and if those thugs show fight don't hesitate to shoot 'em down. Ready?"

They nodded, and he led the way to a door upon whose frosted glass panels were the words, "Ideal Paper Box Plant, Ltd." Instantly Grandpa Summerill, his eyes shining with the light of battle, shuffled to the police lieutenant's side. But the officer, becoming aware of the old fellow's presence, stopped and gravely shook his head.

"No, you can't come, grandpa," he told him sternly. "It's too darned risky. Those brutes will almost certainly shoot when we break in and—"

"Let 'em shoot!" With an effort grandpa drew himself erect. "I'm a soldier I am—and I'll say the army can take care of itself. Yes, siree, they darn well can, believe me."

The lieutenant knew there was no time for argument, so with a shrug of his shoulders, he went forward again, led his men into what seemed to be half-shop, half-office. Not a soul to be seen—if there had been anyone in the place in the last few minutes he had evidently become aware of the presence of the police and had made himself scarce.

Without hesitation, the lieutenant opened a door at the far end of the spacious premises, and, gun in hand, he led the way into the wide passage beyond. In front lay a staircase that ran up to the floor above, and the police swarmed towards it.

All seemed strangely quiet and still, but not for long. Suddenly there came a loud report from the direction of the upstairs landing, and, with a gasp, one of the leading police officers pitched to the floor, a bullet imbedded in his thigh.

Next instant the place echoed to a regular fusillade of shots.

Taking advantage of what little shelter they could find, the police officers fired every time a face showed on the landing at the top of the stairs. But Big Jack and his confederates, trapped though they were, offered a stout resistance, and the battle waged grim and relentless for some few minutes before a concerted rush by the police at last overpowered them.

"Ah, ha, we've beaten the dirty skunks!" To the amazement of the police lieutenant, Grandpa Summerill waved a revolver excitedly above his head. The old stager grinned as he saw the frown on the stern but good-looking face. "Yes, siree, a gun, and I sure enjoyed meself with it. Shot one of the white-livered curs, I think. But don't look at me like that. I've got a license for the darned thing. You pay attention to your business. Find my grandson—you hear me?"

The officer laughed good-naturedly, then gave quick instructions to two of his men. A few minutes' search, then back they came with little Donny, who, at sight of his grandfather, gave a loud whoop and ran into his outstretched arms.

"That's the Fellow Who Did the Shooting!"

THE court was crowded, for the trial of the notorious Maxey Campo, racketeer and killer, had aroused tremendous interest in the city of Faramento, especially as this was the first time in many months that a gangster had been put in the dock.

Would he be found guilty of the charge upon which he was indicted? All present hoped that he would be, though the majority feared that bribery and corruption, or intimidation, would carry the day in his favour.

Every precaution had been taken by the authorities to guard against the possibility of an attempt being made by Campo's gunmen to kidnap the prisoner from the court-room. A strong force of armed police officers had been flung around the building, while some score others stood at vantage points within the court itself. And every care had been taken not to let in any known member of the gangster fraternity of the city or any other suspicious characters.

The case for the State had been outlined. Campo was charged with killing Jim Preston, a trusted officer of Faramento, and Greener Kaufman, the gangster who had sought to double-cross his old enemy by giving evidence against him to the police.

The first witness, Jackie Leeds, was placed in the box, and District Attorney Whitlock, his face hard and grim, immediately confronted him.

"Now, Mr. Leeds, you have heard the charge, one of first degree murder, made against Maxey Campo, the prisoner." He half-turned and glanced at Campo, who was leaning arrogantly against the dock, hands in pockets, a cynical smile upon his thin, cruel lips, coolly masticating chewing-gum. "You saw the shooting down in Western Street from the window of your house, Mr. Leeds. Now is this the man who fired at Jim Preston and Kaufman?"

Jaekie looked nervously at the sinister figure of the racketeer, saw the ferocious gleam in the man's eyes and experienced a feeling of nausea.

"Nun-no," he said in a weak and trembling voice.

A wide grin spread across Campo's coarse face, while Whitlock eyed Jaekie with white-hot fury in his gaze.

"But your statement," he rapped out. "In it you said you identified the killer from the photograph I showed you—and that photograph was Maxey Campo's."

"Ye-yes." Jackie fidgeted restlessly with his watchchain. "But I—I see now I made a mistake. This is not the same man as the one who did the shooting."

Whitlock gritted his teeth. In that moment it was on the tip of his tongue to tell the youngster that he was yellow—scared to do his duty as an honourable and law-abiding citizen because he feared the power of Campo's gang. But he suppressed the feeling, and, indicating that the witness should be allowed to stand down, he called upon Jackie's sister, Sue.

"Miss Leeds." Whitlock's voice was pleading as the girl took her stand in the witness-box. "You did not see the shooting, I know, but you can establish one fact. The killer and his diabolical companions entered your house that night as they made their getaway. You saw them as you returned from the cellar, where you had gone for a pot of jam. Was the prisoner the man in the raincoat?"

Sue shuddered as she stole a glance at Maxey Campo, saw the evil glitter in his eye.

"Well, I—er—well he looks something like him," she said lamely. "But, really, I wouldn't swear to it."

As the district attorney shrugged his shoulders helplessly, Maxey Campo let out a loud guffaw and winked at his counsel, a crook lawyer who was in his pay.

"Silence in court!" came the deep-throated voice of the usher.

"Your honour." Campo's counsel was now on his feet. "I demand that the case against my client be dismissed on the ground of insufficient evidence."

Campo shot the discomfited Whitlock a triumphant glance, then turned his sinister eyes on the judge's disappointed face.

"Mr. Whitlock, I need not tell you the law." The judge experienced a twinge of pain that he should be compelled to speak thus to the district attorney. Like all law-abiding citizens he had hoped that Whitlock would have a clear case—that at the end of the trial he would be able to pronounce the death sentence on the prisoner. But his hopes were now dashed to the ground. "You have produced no evidence to warrant me holding the defendant, therefore—"

He paused as he noticed that Whitlock's assistant, Thorpe, had come hurriedly into the court-room and was whispering in his chief's ear. Next moment and the district attorney, an eager gleam in those fine blue eyes of his, was facing him again.

"Your honour." Whitlock cried in a voice vibrant with excitement, "may I ask the indulgence of this court for just a few moments on a matter of great importance in this case?"

"Granted." The judge hesitated not a moment in giving his reply.

But as Whitlock swung about with the intention of hastening into an adjoining room, where he had been told by Thorpe he was wanted on the telephone by the Stanton Street Police Station, Maxey Campo's counsel leaped hastily to his feet. Shrewd that he was, he shared the judge's suspicion that this interruption in the proceedings meant fresh evidence against his client—perhaps vital evidence that would condemn him.

"Your honour, I object!" he cried warmly.

"Objection overruled," announced the judge promptly.

The district attorney, with a triumphant November 21st, 1931.

ant smile, bowed to the judge, then hurried quickly from the court. A few minutes' absence, and then he was back again. But even as he took up his stand once more, a police officer approached and spoke to him in a whisper.

"Yes, yes, officer. Bring them right in." His face beaming, Whitlock went over to Mrs. Leeds and her family, who sat in the seats reserved for witnesses. His shining eyes took in them all, including the father who rested comfortably on his stretcher on the floor, but it was to Mrs. Leeds that he addressed himself. "Mrs. Leeds, I've real good news for you. Your boy is safe. I just had word to that effect from the Stanton Police Station."

"Oh, thank Heaven for that!" The mother clasped her hands thankfully and gave the district attorney a grateful glance. "Donny safe! Oh, how wonderful!"

"They're bringing him here now," Whitlock went on. "And his grandfather's with him. It appears that Mr. Summerill was searching for the boy and—"

But his words were drowned in a bedlam of sound that suddenly welled up in the Court. All faces turned instantly towards the door at the far end of the crowded room where, surrounded by half a dozen police-officers, there had appeared the aged form of Grandpa Summerill and the small figure of little Donny.

"One moment, your Honour!" Whitlock faced the judge with the air of a man who has already tasted the fruits of victory. "Some additional witnesses arrived to testify."

The judge nodded, experiencing a thrill of elation at the district attorney's words.

Instantly Whitlock swooped down on Grandpa Summerill as he and Donny joined their family, and the small boy was embraced passionately by the greatly relieved Mrs. Leeds.

"Do you want to take the stand now, Mr. Summerill?" the district attorney eagerly inquired.

But as the old stager swung round on him, and as he saw that he was breathing heavily, that his eyes looked heavy as if from lack of sleep, Whitlock remembered what the police chief at the Stanton Street Station had told him over the telephone. Grandpa Summerill had been tramping the streets since he had disappeared the previous day, in the hope that he would be able to trace his kidnapped grandson. It was clear that he must be very tired—almost at the end of his tether. And humane that he was, Whitlock felt he could not possibly tax the old man further yet awhile.

"No, Mr. Summerill," he said, squeezing grandpa's arm. "You'd better wait a little while. You must be tired. I'll get an adjournment while you snatch a little rest."

"Adjournment nothing!" The fighting light was back in grandpa's eyes. Rest when he had his duty to the State to do? Not he! Hadn't he once been in battle for the better part of a week with little more than two hours' sleep the whole while? Shoulders squared as if he were on parade, he looked at Whitlock determinedly. "Of course I'm going to take my stand now, and, by heck, they're going to hear a darned pretty tune!"

Importantly, he shuffled forward, making straight for the judge's bench. Arrived there he blinked up into the stern face, bowed somewhat awkwardly, then, with surprising suddenness, turned quickly about.

"Ah, ha, that's the fellow that did the shootin'!" Eyes gleaming fiercely, he raised a hand, pointed his finger straight at Maxey Campo, who seowled at him. But the ferocious look in no way perturbed the old warrior. Quickly he turned to the judge again, while everyone in the court-room strained their ears to catch his words. "Yes, he's the fellow, judge. Now let me tell you and the whole darned Court something. These skunks ain't so tough as they think they are. The trouble with us is that we're too weak-kneed with 'em. I ask you, what would the founders of our country have done with scum like them? What would Abraham Lincoln have done? Why, he'd have risen up and flung them slap into the ocean. And it's time we was a-doin' the same thing. Yes, siree!"

The judge could only blink at him, so taken aback was he with this irreverent outburst. But his Honour was not the only one in the court who was utterly astounded by Grandpa Summerill's passion-inflamed words. Every single person present was flabbergasted—as for Maxey Campo, he felt suddenly weak and helpless, without a spark of fight left in him.

Watched by hundreds of pairs of fascinated eyes, Grandpa suddenly shuffled forward and confronted the prisoner as he leaned limply against the dock.

"You low-down dirty rat, shoot me in the back, would you, huh? Kidnap little Donny, beat up his father, huh? Well, I'm going to give you a dose of clean medicine, not the rotten stuff that you like to dish up."

Eyes flashing fire, he brought up his fist and smashed it with all his force to the point of Campo's jaw. With a grunt the gangster tottered sideways, but grandpa only grinned ferociously, then with another quick movement he kicked Campo's feet from under him and brought him crashing to the floor.

"And that's one I owe you for laming me on the head with that gun. How do you like it, huh? Tell me, how do you like it?"

Whitlock came darting forward, the first in all the Court to recover from the effects of the startling scene that had been enacted before their eyes. Quickly he gripped grandpa's arm, but the old fellow pushed him aside, then scanned the court with his fiercely gleaming eyes.

"Now where's that infernal witness stand?" he shrilled. "I'll show 'em! I'll testify that it was this dirty thug who did the shooting on Western Street. Fond of taking folk for a ride, is he? Well, it's his turn to take such a trip—a trip to the Chair, and, by heck, it's going to be warm for him!"

Words that sounded the death-knell for Maxey Campo, for, inspired by the pluck and grit of Grandpa Summerill, star witness in the trial, the whole of the Leeds family went into the witness-stand and swore that it was he who had shot Jim Preston and Greener Kaufman in Western Street that fatal night.

And so Maxey Campo went to the Chair, and his demise did much to lessen the gang atrocities in the city, for the czars of the underworld were compelled to realise that the Law was a power, after all, and was not to be lightly defied.

(By permission of Warner Bros. Pictures, Ltd., starring Charles (Chic) Sale and Walter Huston.)

"SUNDOWN TRAIL."

(Continued from page 18.)

attorney or his captors, she stooped as she reached the hall and picked up the document that had fallen from Marsden's hand a few seconds previously.

She was gazing at the document when Currier moved into view, and as she heard his footfalls she looked up quickly. Next instant she drew back with an exclamation.

"Just a minute, sister," said Currier. "This is unexpected good luck."

Dorothy whipped round and darted towards the stairs again, but one of Currier's men slipped between her and her objective and pushed her away roughly.

"Take it easy, ma'am," he advised. "Kinda looks as if the boss 'ud like to have your company."

"Yeah, the boss would," observed Currier. "You see, we'll have to take you along with us, lady—as you might put the sheriff on our track too soon. We don't want any description of us circulated until we're a long way from here."

One of Currier's men caught Dorothy by the wrist. The other was standing guard over the cringing figure of Marsden.

"Well," the gang-leader continued, "we'd better get to business, I reckon. I'll lift that money from the safe, boys, and then we'll hit the saddle. Bring the gal along—an' that guy Marsden, too. We'll show 'em the moonlight on the river—from the other side."

He was thinking of the Mexican reaches of the Rio Grande, which he hoped to make before midnight. Once over the border he and his men would be safe from U.S. law, and could safely allow Dorothy and Marsden to return.

Currier did not know that Buck Sawyer was approaching the ranch-house at that very moment to tether his horse in a range of brush and steal forward noiselessly.

It was as well for Buck that he employed caution, for when he had almost penetrated the thicket he discovered the two men, Blaney and Carson, standing on the edge of the brush.

Buck crouched down. The gangsters were somewhat to the left of him, but he could hear their voices distinctly and made out every word that they uttered.

"I reckon we oughta tour around the house," Blaney was saying. "We're only watchin' the front of it from here."

"Okay, Blaney," agreed Carson. "That's a good idea. I'll walk this way and you walk the other."

They separated, and Carson's steps took him towards the point where Buck was hiding. By the time he was passing the ranch-foreman, Blaney had vanished beyond a corner of the house.

Buck sprang to his feet and lunged forward. Carson caught sight of him in the instant of his attack, and reached for his six-gun with a cry, but the exclamation was stifled as Buck clapped a hand over his mouth. Nor was the rogue successful in his attempt to draw his revolver, for Buck forestalled him and snatched the weapon out of its holster before the crook's fingers could close on the butt.

Buck had thrown his arm around Carson's neck and face, and as the fellow began to struggle the big foreman clubbed the six-gun and struck him a stunning blow on the temple.

Carson sagged to the ground in a heap and lay still. Buck, throwing the man's revolver far into the brush, moved on to the ranch-house.

He gained the wall of it, and peered in through a window of the lounge. He immediately saw Dorothy, Marsden and their captors, and realised that it would be suicidal to enter by the front door, as the crooks happened to be facing it.

Buck drew back and took stock of the outside wall of the building. A moment later he was climbing to a balcony on the upper floor, and, having scrambled over the rail of this, he made his way quietly through a bed-room and stepped out on to a landing overlooking the hall-lounge.

The occupants of the lounge were in more or less the same position as when he had last seen them, and Currier and his men now had their backs to him.

"Up with your hands!" Buck commanded imperatively.

There was a scuffling of feet as the crooks wheeled. Looking towards the gallery, they discerned Buck standing near the head of the stairs with a forty-five in his grasp, and the muzzle of the weapon was threatening them indiscriminately. They raised their arms with only a momentary hesitation.

Buck spoke to Marsden, who seemed incapable of thinking for himself.

"Come on there," he said. "Get their guns—and make it snappy."

Marsden advanced to disarm the gangsters, and Dorothy willingly gave him a hand. Currier uttered an oath and for a second seemed inclined to resist, but Buck called a warning.

"Back up there, Currier," he rapped out. "The hammer of this gun is itchin' to fall!"

Currier accepted the situation and was relieved of his six-shooters. His two hirelings were also obliged to remain passive while their "artillery" was taken from them.

"All right," Buck called to Marsden again. "Lay the forty-five on that table and then fetch some rope."

Marsden did as he was told, and proceeded to bind the gangsters' wrists.

Bare Fists.

MARCHING around the house, Blaney wondered why he did not meet with Carson, and he only discovered the reason when he came upon his comrade's body at the edge of the brush.

Blaney stooped quickly, and as he peered at Carson he made out a dark bruise on the fellow's temple. He attempted to arouse him, but his efforts were in vain. Carson lay like a log, utterly oblivious of his surroundings.

"Gosh!" Blaney muttered. "Somebody in a musta soaked him just after we left each other."

He straightened up and made for the ranch-house veranda, but as he was approaching it he caught a glimpse of the hall through one of the windows.

Blaney took in the scene at once—Marsden in the act of securing Currier and the other two gangsters, Buck Sawyer covering them from the gallery.

It was as easy for Blaney to climb to the upper floor as it had been for Buck, and sixty seconds later the ruffian was moving on to the landing to surprise the foreman from the rear.

"Drop that iron, Sawyer!" he grated, jamming the barrel of his forty-five into the small of the cattle-man's back.

The young foreman lowered his gun and then let it fall to the floor. The thud of it synchronised with Currier's voice.

"Good work, Blaney," the gang leader called. "Hey, Bill, get me loose, will yuh?"

Currier and one of his companions had been bound, but the third man was still free, and, pushing Marsden aside, he set about untying the cords with which the other two had been secured.

Meanwhile, Buck stood helpless on the landing, but an opportunity for action was yet to come, and it presented itself when a bed-room door suddenly opened.

It was opened by no more formidable a personage than Jenny, Dorothy's coloured servant, who had been attracted by the sound of strange voices. But Blaney whipped round in some alarm, and turned his gun from Buck, whereupon the foreman turned swiftly and struck the weapon from his hand.

Blaney uttered an angry bellow and lashed out at Buck, but the young cattleman parried the blow and banged his fist to the bridge of Blaney's nose. The crook's strident roar became a howl of pain, and he bumped violently against the wall.

"Hold him, Blaney!" yelled Currier from the hall. "We'll be with yuh in a couple of shakes! Quick, Bill—get these cords slackened off!"

Marsden made a belated attempt to hinder the man Bill, but the latter turned on him and flung him into a corner with a sweep of his arm. Meanwhile, up on the landing, Blaney was doing his best to tackle Buck.

He grappled with the big foreman

THE GREATEST GAME ON THE FINEST "HOME" BILLIARD TABLE

13/3 DOWN brings prompt delivery of the 6 ft. size Riley "Home" Billiard Table to rest on an ordinary dining table. You pay the balance by easy instalments. Cash Price £11 15 0. 7 days' Free Trial allowed, and Rileys pay carriage and take all transit risks.

32 FREE Riley "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables, in various sizes and styles, are also offered for cash or easy terms. Send for Free Art List, describing them. Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Gt. Britain.

E. J. RILEY, LTD., Howard Works, ACCRINGTON, and Dent, 35, 147, Aldersgate Street, LONDON E.C.1.

THAT MYSTERIOUS MESSAGE!

Our SECRET CODOGRAM, which appeared recently in this paper was seen by over a MILLION BOYS! Yet only Boy Detectives could READ and UNDERSTAND its HIDDEN MESSAGE! WERE YOU ONE OF THEM, or are you missing the most fascinating, thrilling and absorbing hobby of to-day? DON'T DELAY! Other mysterious messages are appearing shortly, so become a Boy Tec AT ONCE, and be "in the know!"

WORLD FAMOUS SECRET SERVICE OUTFITS, with secret codometer, marvellous radio, invisible and mystic fire inks, membership badge, fingerprint powder, etc., etc. TEN ENTHRALLING ITEMS for only 1/- post free. Or larger Special Presentation Outfit, with fourteen items, only 2/6 post free, from THE BOY DETECTIVE SUPPLY STORES, Desk B.C., 32, CATHCART ST., GREENOCK. (Foreign Postage, 3d. in the shilling extra.)

November 21st, 1931.

and tried to wrestle him, only to meet with another reverse. There was a fierce scuffle, during which Blaney appeared to hold his own for a second or two. Then Buck swung him clean off his feet and lifted him in his powerful grasp.

Blaney squealed as he was borne aloft. Poised above the banister rail, he struggled frantically as he saw the hall twenty feet below him, but his struggles were of no avail, and a moment later he was dropping through space.

He crashed into a bureau and rolled to the floor, groaning and breathless. By that time, however, Currier and the other two were ready for Buck, and Currier was running to the table to snatch up one of the guns Marsden had laid there.

Buck climbed to the gallery rail and threw himself at a heavy chandelier which hung from the ceiling. He gripped it as he dived through mid-air, and the momentum of his leap swung him forward above the heads of his enemies.

He let go of the chandelier and plunged downwards, and he struck Currier feet-foremost. The gang leader was bowled over like a ninepin, and Buck sprawled a-top of him.

The other two rogues rushed to where the foreman lay, but before they could reach him the hall was in darkness. For Dorothy, standing near the door, had turned off the switch.

Buck scrambled to his feet and drove his bunched knuckles at a face which loomed close to him. The blow connected with an impact that was heard all over the lofty room, and the face disappeared.

The remaining gangster pounced on Buck and caught him with a savage punch that rocked the big foreman, so that he tottered across the hall for several paces. But he came back at the crook and dashed him to the floor with a terrific hook.

Blaney had roused himself, however, and so had Joe Currier and the man Bill; and the three of them made a concerted attack on Buck that threatened to overwhelm him.

A faint spark of unsuspected courage urged Marsden to go to the foreman's assistance, and he stumbled through the gloom and engaged Blaney, dragging him out of the mêlée and giving him a tap on the chin.

Blaney retaliated with a full swing that spun Marsden across the hall. The attorney brought up against a chair, and was steadied by the collision. But as he was endeavouring to brace himself for a fresh onslaught, a boxom figure stepped towards him from the rear.

It was the figure of Jenny, who had descended the stairs a moment before. She was carrying the cudgel with which she had armed herself the day the stage had been robbed, and she deliberately lifted the bludgeon above George Marsden's head.

She did not recognise the attorney in the gloom, and took him for one of Currier's ruffians. Down came the cudgel with a smart thwack, and, as Marsden collapsed, Jenny drew back into the deepest shadows.

Buck, in the meantime, was battling desperately against his assailants. Bill was felled by an upper-cut that might have staggered a gorilla. Currier was hurled across a settee by a devastating right to the head. Blaney, after scoring with one or two blows, was driven across the hall before a rain of punches.

Currier and Bill regained their feet and closed on Buck once more. The fourth man, who had been laid low in the initial stages of the fight, now struggled up as well, but as he was stumbling towards the scene of conflict Marsden rose to confront him.

Marsden was still dizzy from the rap across the skull which Jenny had conferred on him. But he struck out hazily at the gangster.

The crook hit back at him just as hazily, and soon the two were exchanging a regular series of blows, most of which went wide. But as Marsden was warning to his work, Jenny stepped out of hiding and, still under the impression that the attorney was one of Currier's gang, she smote him once again over the back of the head.

Marsden wavered at the knees and then sank into a sitting posture. Jenny withdrew once more, never dreaming that she had been instrumental in raising the odds against Buck from three to four.

Buck was knocked sprawling by an unlucky punch, but, as the crooks dashed towards him, he rolled aside and sprang to his feet, in time to see Currier and his men blundering into the big, open fireplace.

The gangsters wheeled and renewed their attack in a body. Yet, despite the odds against him, Buck did not choose to wait on the defensive. Springing to meet them halfway, he tore into the ruffians with both hands, smashed two of them to the floor and, sweeping aside the burly form of Currier, hammered the wits out of another gangster.

He had crushed the rogue under a storm of punches, when a girl's voice screamed a warning. It was the voice of Dorothy, and, turning on his heel, Buck saw what she had seen—the figure of Currier brandishing a chair in his hands and rushing across the hall like a maniac.

The young foreman scarce had time to duck. He took the shock on his broad back, and the chair broke in two. Next second he had closed with Currier.

Over by the stairs George Marsden rose for the third time, but as he was tottering forward shakily Jenny again assailed him, and she struck him with the bludgeon even more lustily than before.

Marsden drooped with a sigh and stretched himself out on the floor, whereupon Jenny gave vent to an exclamation of satisfaction.

"Ah always gits mah man!" she declared.

The Clean-Up.

WHEN Flash Prescott had left Buck, he had pushed every inch of speed out of his brone, and three miles of mesquite had slipped past under the pony's drumming hoofs when he sighted a moving herd of cattle.

It was the stock that had been purchased from the Lazy B outfit, and, drawing rein as the head of the column approached him, Flash hailed the men who were riding at flank and rear.

"Hey," he called, "Buck Sawyer's in trouble. He needs us at the ranch-house. Joe Currier's gang!"

The boys were quick to comprehend his meaning, and did not waste time by asking for details. The herd was left in the charge of one or two men, and the rest followed Flash in a break-neck gallop across the prairie.

They had seven or eight miles to cover, and they made the distance in record time. As they neared their destination they saw the mounts of the gangsters tethered by the chaparral, and knew, at least, that they were not too late to round-up the rogues.

Close to the ranch-house they discovered Carson. The man had recovered consciousness, but was still in a dazed condition, and before he could make his escape Flash and the boys overtook him.

"Where's Buck Sawyer?" Flash demanded.

"I ain't seen him," Carson whined, "Somebody grabbed hold o' me an' gave me a bump over the head. That's all I know."

"One of you fellers stay out here and take care of this hombre," Flash said, indicating Carson. "The rest of you follow me. I guess Buck must be in the house."

They dismounted and advanced to the building, leaving Carson in the charge of a stalwart ranch-hand. A few seconds later they were tramping across the veranda to the front door.

Flash was the first to enter, and the boys crowded across the threshold after him. The hall was still in darkness, but sounds of strife came to their ears through the gloom—the stamping of feet and the thud of blows, and every now and then a grunt that told of a solid punch finding its mark.

One of the boys located the electric switch and turned up the light, and the scene that met the newcomers' gaze was one that held them awestruck.

Dorothy was cowering on the stairs. In the fireplace lay the huddled form of a gangster. A second man was sprawled under one of the windows, and a third was stretched out near the foot of the staircase. All three were insensible, and they testified to the havoc created by Buck Sawyer's fists.

Nearer, another still form was to be seen. It was the form of George Marsden, and Jenny was looking down on him in consternation, her eyes rolling comically as she recognised her victim.

And at the far side of the hall Buck Sawyer and Joe Currier were fighting tooth and nail.

Flash and the boys did not interfere, for, savagely as Currier struck out at the young foreman, it was plain that Buck needed no assistance. He had accounted for three men single-handed, and he was capable of accounting for the fourth.

Currier did land one lucky punch that drove the cattleman backward. But as he tried to follow up the advantage Buck jerked his head aside and then ripped his right to the jaw in a flashing cross-counter.

Currier's onslaught was checked, and he gave a kind of lurch. Buck hit him again, this time with a full swing that threw the gang-leader headlong into the hall-table.

The table capsized, and Currier plunged over it and rolled across the floor. He picked himself up and stood on the defensive as Buck advanced. But the young foreman drew down his guard with a feint to the ribs and banded his fist to the jaw again.

The smack of the blow must have been audible outside the ranch-house. Currier was knocked off his feet by it, and with arms wide-spread he fell on his back and lay quite motionless.

Flash and the boys came fairly into the room, and Flash looked round at the prone bodies with a grin.

"Somebody must have made Buck mad," he opined humorously.

At that moment Buck was looking down at Dorothy, who had run forward and laid a hand on his arm.

"Oh, Buck," she was saying, "I'm so grateful! I don't know what you'd have done without you."

"That's all right, Miss Dorothy," Buck told her, and was turning away when Flash confronted him.

"Regular old-fashioned rumpus, Buck, huh?" he declared. "Gee, I'd like to have been here sooner."

Buck smiled and took hold of him by the shoulders.

"Pardner," he said, "I reckon I've got news for you. We're both going to head for Montana."

"Both?" Flash echoed.

"Yep," was the rejoinder. "I made up my mind as I was comin' along by Red Canyon. But of course, I had to stop Currier's game first."

Flash clapped him on the back.

"You're trailin' along with me!" he shouted. "Gee, that's great! Come on, we'll get goin' and leave the boys to collect this garbage"—with a gesture that encompassed Currier and his gang.

Buck started for the door, but before he could reach it someone tugged at his sleeve, and as he paused he realised it was Dorothy.

"Buck," she appealed, "Buck, why are you going away?"

"Well," he said, "I figured I'd let you see as how I didn't want to hang on here, like I was hopin' you wouldn't be able to last the five years, in accordance with your dad's will. I hope you settle down here, Miss Dorothy, and get to like the Lazy B, so's you'll never aim to leave it at all."

"But Buck—" She looked up at him, and then coloured swiftly. "Buck," she added in a voice that he alone could hear, "I—I can't stay here—without you. If you go—I'll have to lose the inheritance."

Buck gazed at her incredulously for a moment, and then, taking her in his arms, he spoke to Flash.

"I sure am sorry, pardner," he told the youngster, "but you'll have to make that trip to Montana alone."

Flash grinned.

"Sure, Buck," he stated, "I understand. I'm sorry I can't be your best man, but I've gotta be hittin' the trail. Adios, companero." And with the words he stepped into the night.

From the doorway, Buck and Dorothy watched him mount his pinto and ride away till the night swallowed him. He had learned his lesson and was heading for a new life, wherein men like Currier would play no part.

(By permission of the Producers' Distributing Co., Ltd., starring Tom Keene and Marion Shilling.)

(Continued from page 2.)

I am a sea-captain, and the day after a gangster. Then, maybe, I don't earn enough to eat for a couple of days, and the following day I am made a chef on a motion picture liner where every conceivable delicacy comes under my supervision. Yes, the hard life of an extra has its compensations."

Stories for Tom Mix.

Preparations were recently completed for two of the six super Western productions which Tom Mix is to make on his return to the screen under Universal.

The first two stories are "Destry Rides Again" and "Christmas Eve at Pilot Butte," both by well-known American authors, though it is certain that the titles will be changed.

Tom Mix, who not long ago finished his engagement with Sells-Floto Circus, is in Universal City with his horses and equipment, and has already started production on the first of the two stories chosen for him.

An Eskimo Picture.

Ewing Scott, a film director, and Roy Klafki, a cameraman, will be able to give civilisation a picture of what life is like in the far north.

For nine months these two endured terrible hardships while living among the Eskimos and filming their ways. After being given up as lost by those who had sent out the expedition they were eventually found marooned on Icy Cape, where they had been for more than thirty days. Their rescue was due to the chance arrival of a whaling ship.

Stars' Lucky Escapes.

While acting the other week for a new Western picture, Buck Jones was unable to dodge quickly enough out of the way when a chair was thrown at him. Result—two broken ribs and a badly injured back. This is what the stars have to pay for our entertainment, and it is marvellous how they manage to escape worse consequences.

Bill Boyd was nearly killed not very long ago. He was on location in Arizona when an explosion sent a big rock hurtling in his direction. It missed him by only a few feet.

Though Paul Page was not acting at the time he had his lucky escape, he was on his way to the studio to do his part in "Palmy Days." His car overturned, and it was thought certain at first that he had been killed. As it was he was badly injured, his nose and leg being broken and his head and face terribly cut. Thanks to skilful surgery, however, Paul Page will be able to return to the screen later on.

It was while filming the submarine scene in "Tho Seas Beneath" that disaster very nearly overtook several members of the company. The U.S. naval submarine V-4, the largest in the world, was being used in the rôle of a German U-boat. Henry Victor's part as the commander was being doubled by Lieutenant-Commander Quigley, of the U.S. Navy, and his vessel had to keep a secret appointment in enemy waters with a lighter carrying oil fuel.

On board the lighter itself was John Ford, the director of the film, John Loder, Marion Lessing, and cameraman. The V-4 disappeared and cameramen on the lighter got ready to film it as the submarine came to the top. Then came the terrifying discovery that the lighter, failing to answer its rudder, had drifted on to the spot where the submarine was expected to rise.

Slowly the 207 ft. deck of the V-4 could now be seen rising from below. Those on the lighter immediately above it were in a helpless position. Then, as the periscope and next the conning tower broke the surface of the water, a shout of horror went up from the Kingfisher, an auxiliary ship standing by. A second or two later, Commander Quigley was able to see that the V-4 was only two feet away from the keel of the lighter. Instant orders were given, and the rise of the submarine checked and its course altered. But for the director and the others, it was touch and go.

BE TALL Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

ONE GUINEA

is all you pay for a charming Portable Model. Many other bargains in Horn, Hornless, Upright, Grand and Consoles, with which I give AN ALBUM OF FREE RECORDS. Approval, Carriage Paid. Monthly terms. Write for my Free Lists NOW.

Edwd O'Brien Lfd. SEND FOR FREE LISTS

SPECIALISTS IN CYCLES & GRAMOPHONES. DEP. 20. COVENTRY.

BE TALLER! Increased my own height to 6ft. 3ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

BE STRONG I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-Control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-.—STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

GROW TALLER! ADD INCHES to your height. Details free.—JEDISON, 39, BOND STREET, BLACKPOOL.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-), including Alport, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

GROSE'S 8, New Bridge Street, LONDON, E.C.4. LUDGATE CIRCUS.

BILLIARDS AT HOME 1/- per week.

SIZE	DEPOSIT	4 monthly payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10/-	6/6	25/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8/6	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10/-	12/6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	15/6	52/-

Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls, guaranteed unbreakable, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk. COMPLETE LIST FREE.

BLUSHING, Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/-. Details, striking testimonials free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

HEIGHT INCREASED. Complete course 5/-. Clients gain 1 to 5 ins. Particulars, testimonials free.—P. A. CLIVE, Harrocks, Colwyn Bay, N. Wales.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

WE HAVE SEARCHED THE WIDE WORLD

KOLSTER-BRANDES "MASTERPIECE"
 We tested dozens of new 2-valve sets. Our experts examined every set that claimed to compete with the K-B "Masterpiece," and not one surpassed the standard set by Kolster-Brandes. The K-B "Masterpiece" is the finest value offered! A revelation in 2-valve radio. Get your K-B quickly and enjoy the pick of the winter programmes . . . free . . . save B.D.V. coupons—from to-day.

500
COUPONS ...
B.D.V.
CIGARETTES

each Coupon worth 3
TIMES other coupon values

Old King Cole was a merry
 old soul,
 And a merry old soul was he;
 He called for his pipe,
 He called for a light,
 And he called for his B.D.V.

The writer of this advertisement has himself received 23 stations, in London, on the K-B "Masterpiece" Set, using only a 15 ft. indoor aerial.

SPECIFICATIONS

The Kolster-Brandes "Masterpiece." The most compact 2-valve set in existence! Over-all dimensions 7½ in. x 7½ in. x 7½ in. Highly sensitive regenerative receiver. Pure toned loud speaker built into the lid. Polished dark figured-mahogany finished case in Bakelite. Complete with two "Fotos" valves and instructions.

GET THE GOLDEN GIFT BOOK

To GODFREY PHILLIPS, LTD. (B.C.), 39, Commercial Street, London, E.1.

Please send me a copy of the amazing B.D.V. Golden Gift Book, in colour, showing 275 treble-value gifts, and including 5 free coupons.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

By B.I.

EVEN LESS COUPONS REQUIRED FROM B.D.V. TOBACCO—EACH TOBACCO COUPON BEING WORTH 11 CIGARETTE COUPONS

Boy's Cinema

"THE GUEST HOUSE," "THE LADY FROM NOWHERE" & "THE TRIANGLE MURDER."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 624.

EVERY TUESDAY.

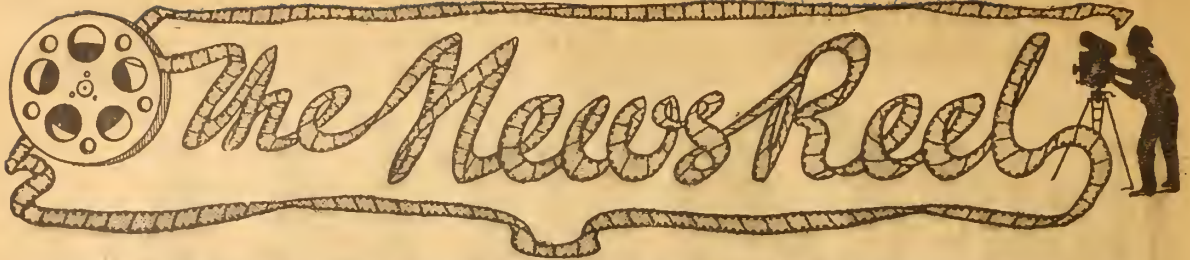

NOVEMBER 28th, 1931

DANGER ISLAND

A Cargo of Breath-taking Thrills on a Three-masted Schooner Freighted with Adventurers bound for World's Wildest and Strangest Island

START this GRIPPING NEW SERIAL TO-DAY

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed to BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Danger Island."

Captain Harry Drake, Kenneth Harlan; Bonnie Adams, Lucille Brown; Doctor Adams, Tom Ricketts; Ben Arnold, Walter Miller; Bull Black, W. L. Thorne; Arlene Chandos, Beulah Hutton; Briney, Andy Devine; Lascara George Regan; Cebu, Everett Brown.

"The Guest House."

Jim Weston, Rex Lease; Helen Sutter, Dorothy Gulliver; Frank Sutter, Jay Hunt; Harry Winslow, Harry Woods; Ben, Harry Todd.

"The Lady from Nowhere."

John Couroy, John Holland; Marion Dale, Alice Day; Barstow, Phillips Smailley; Rigo, Mischa Auer; Millie, Barbara Bedford; Jones, James Burtis; Colonel Snowden, Lafe McKee; The Chief, Ray Largay.

A Little Child Taught Him.

It seems improbable that one could capitalise on what might be learned from a two-year-old baby. But it's possible.

Stan Laurel, the undersized partner of Oliver Hardy, admits he has learned much from babies. And he makes money with the knowledge.

Famous, among other things, for his "cry-baby face," Stan frankly admits having learned it from a crying babe.

"Making funny faces is an art in itself, when they are used in the spasmodic business of making a motion picture," said the comedian. "It's easy enough to make a funny face once or twice for the amusement of friends, but when it comes to making the same face over a dozen times before a camera, you have to start studying the actual business of making the face to make it appear natural.

"It took me several months to get even a semblance of a 'cry-baby' face. I used to stand before a mirror, close my eyes a little, pucker up my mouth and try to look like a squalling baby. Believe me, it was anything but funny trying to get it down pat.

"The first three or four weeks I worked on it the muscles in my jaws were so sore I had to use liniment on them when I ate my meals. I tried holding a baby before the mirror with me, but I guess my efforts to cry made the baby laugh, for I got very little help from the youngster when he saw me working.

"I used to watch a baby cry and then try to get the same expression on my own face. It might entertain movie audiences now, but when I pull a 'cry-baby' face around home my daughter embarrasses me. She makes a better one than I do with all the rehearsing I've done, and she's only three years old!"

King of Stunt Artists to Star for Radio Pictures.

After having "doubled" for the star of a film drama a hundred times, one of Hollywood's unphotographed heroes November 28th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

WALLACE BERY

IN

"THE SECRET SIX."

Tony Scorpio started as a stockyards slaughterer, then won his way, by a sinister trail of gun-play, till he had a town at his mercy. Then came the Secret Six, grimly resolved to crush him.

"WILD HORSE."

Two kinds of outlaw—a wild stallion and a ruthless bad man—both ridden to a finish—conquered by a daredevil and reckless cowpuncher. Starring Hoot Gibson and Alberta Vaughn.

also

The second episode of our gripping new serial-drama of treasure guarded by a tribe of fierce cannibals:

"DANGER ISLAND."

Tell all your friends about this amazing new story.

is at last to receive due recognition.

Dick Grace, a frail little man with a quiet, nervous manner, the last survivor of the famous Squadron of Death Club, formed in Hollywood by stunt flyers, is now to star in his own story, "The Lost Squadron," based upon his hair-breadth escapes.

This will be made by Radio Pictures, with Paul Sloane directing, and Eric von Stroheim playing in support of Dick Grace.

When he makes this picture it will be the first occasion on which his face has been seen by the audience. Although he has crashed thirty-four aeroplanes before the camera, and broken sixty-eight bones in so doing, it has always been with his back to the lens, and the star got the credit.

It was Grace who provided the thrills in "Wings," "Young Eagles," and "The Air Circus," whilst his dare-devil stunts in the Colleen Moore picture, "Love Never Dies," was the talk of Hollywood.

Believing that Fate can be tempted too many times, when he has finished "The Lost Squadron," Grace intends to retire. But before he does this he has to make the most daring crash he has ever attempted.

When every other scene in "The Lost Squadron" has been finished to everyone's satisfaction, he will crash an aeroplane into the sea at 100 miles per hour.

Realising that this is courting violent death, Grace had a special clause added to his contract with Radio Pictures. This calls for a mobile operating theatre with surgeons ready on the spot to take care of any emergency operation necessary, and for special police to keep the area of the crash free from spectators.

"The Lost Squadron" being the swan song of one of Hollywood's greatest dare-devils, and dealing with the game he knows so well, will undoubtedly prove one of the most thrilling air spectacles ever offered by the screen. In addition to this, it will bring before the public one who has for many years "taken all the kicks and collected aught but little of the ha'pence."

Director of Horticulture.

During the making of Richard Dix's latest Radio picture, "Secret Service," a new Hollywood profession was discovered.

A Japanese horticulturist supplied the studio, at a few hours' notice, with a complete garden stocked with flowers popular in the Southern States of America seventy years ago, at the time of the American Civil War.

Jimmy Evergreen, as he is called—his own name being unpronounceable—through his own knowledge and the work of his own research department, has managed to cultivate over 10,000 flowers and plants not indigenous to the country, and consequently does an exceptional amount of business with Hollywood producers, supplying landscapes for pictures staged outside America.

"Secret Service" is a story of the American Civil War, and Jimmy Evergreen helped considerably to bring to the screen the atmosphere of the period.

Movie Stars in Training.

More than a dozen former pugilists and athletes are now making goodly incomes training the male stars of Hollywood.

One of the most successful of these is Nate Slott, who was a champion boxer in Chicago arenas ten years ago. He trained Richard Barthelmess for his fight in "The Patent Leather Kid," and made a real boxer out of the star within two months. Now he is once more employed in keeping this famous star fit.

Barthelmess, however, is not the only cinema star he has under his wing. There are others, feminine as well as masculine. Dorothy Mackaill has trained with Slott; James Cagney has taken boxing lessons with him; Warner

(Continued on page 28.)

Follow a two-fisted sea-captain and the beautiful daughter of a brave explorer—as they sail on a perilous trip to a forgotten cannibal island—where they defy storm, fire and water, man and beast—on a search for a fortune in radium! Starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Browne.

DANGER ISLAND

The White Men.

THE sweltering tropic heat seemed to penetrate even to the deepest recesses of the jungle. For the three men plunging through the swamps and tangled thickets there would have been no escape from it even had they been in the mind to seek refuge from its oppression.

The dusky shadows under the huge cotton-trees were a mockery, seeming to promise coolness, yet in reality offering none. For on all that considerable island there was no single place where the very air did not seem like the breath of a furnace.

Sleek creatures stalked the bush. A tawny lion, padding his way along a forest track with the scent of mankind in his nostrils, aroused a thousand echoes with the thunder of his hungry roar. A hyena challenged the sound with his hideous, half-human laughter, and in his lair a dappled leopard snarled truculently, frightening some chimpanzees, who sprang chattering through a tracery of leaves and creeper-tendrils up above.

These sounds were too familiar to impress the three men who were forging their way through the jungle. Their waking hours had been punctuated by them, their spells of slumber interrupted by them for weeks on end. If they had not known it before, they had soon learned that the beasts of the wilds were cowards at heart, easily frightened off if a man were armed and kept his nerve.

The menace which these three men feared was one a hundred times more dire than the menace of skulking, feline brutes, a menace symbolised by an ominous throb that now reached their ears.

It was the throb of drums, sounding a grim tattoo that seemed to become louder and more rapid in its beat as the three men listened. War drums thudding out in mad diapason the frenzied measure of the death-dance.

The three men pushed on, forced to follow a track that was bringing them ever nearer to foes who stood between them and the safety of the coast—primitive, treacherous and fiendish enemies ripe for slaughter—black demons of the jungle.

Of the three men two were white, one a thin, aged intellectual fellow known to the civilised world as Professor Adams, scientist and explorer, the other a younger individual answering to the description of John Ramage, soldier of fortune. The third man was a gigantic negro, and these were all that remained of a brave company which Professor Adams had mustered for an expedition that must have benefited the whole of mankind had it succeeded.

Privation, fever and wild beasts had taken their toll ere Adams had reached his goal, and now, with his mission so near accomplishment, he was threatened with utter defeat and destruction.

Yet he was pressing forward determinedly in the hope of reaching the coast, when all at once a vista of track opened up before him in a kind of avenue several hundred yards long. The dense walls of jungle on each hand and the canopy of boughs and foliage overhead gave the path a tunnel-like appearance, and at the end of it a clearing was revealed.

"Down!" Professor Adams jerked, and suited the action to the word by dropping suddenly into a crouching attitude.

His companions followed his example, and the professor lifted a pair of field-glasses that were hung around his neck. Gazing through the powerful lenses, he perceived in magnified form the scene that he had distinguished a moment before with the naked eye.

The clearing was occupied by a native village of thatched huts, and in the midst of these a mob of black savages were capering wildly, brandishing spear, bow and war-club as they danced, and every now and then raising their voices in a fierce shout. But the central figure, one which engaged the professor's closest attention, was that of a villainous negro whose half-nude body was hideously tattooed and daubed with paint.

He was far inferior to the capering warriors in physique, but his head-dress of a wild beast's skull marked him as one supreme in the counsels of the tribe. He it was who goaded the blacks as they danced, chanting to them in the barbarous island dialect, and flourishing an ugly bludgeon as he harangued them.

"What do you see, professor?" Ramage asked huskily, as he knelt behind the scientist.

"Savages!" Adams answered in a terse voice. "Their witch doctor is up to something. I can't just tell what—"

He turned to the huge negro who accompanied Ramage and himself, and spoke to him in clipped English.

"Cebu," he said, "look through glasses. Tell us what witch doctor is doing."

EPISODE 1.

"The Coast of Peril."

The black giant took the field-glasses and held them to his eyes as he had often seen the professor do. He focused them on the tattooed medicine man, and watched him solemnly for a full minute ere turning to the white men again.

"Owando, witch doctor, he told his people their god angry," he said slowly. "He told them go out and kill white men."

"Give me those glasses again," Professor Adams rapped out, and, peering through them once more, he again riveted his attention on the witch doctor Owando.

As he followed the medicine man's antics a new sound was heard. Louder than the drums, louder than the roar of any lion, it broke over the entire island, and must have been audible far out to sea—a deep rumbling that seemed to belong to those primeval days when the earth was in the making.

Professor Adams and his companions knew well enough what it was. It was the voice of a volcanic mountain to the north, whence they had come, and during the last day or two they had heard it at frequent intervals.

But if it did not impress the white men and Cebu, its effect on Owando and his warriors was marked. For they ceased their capering for an instant and gazed with superstitious awe towards the distant, smouldering pinnacle of the mountain.

"Fire-god talks, baas," Cebu muttered uneasily. "Owando, he say black man's Fire-god tell bush people to kill whites."

Professor Adams was scarcely listening. Through the glasses he now saw Owando snatch up a black object twice the size of a man's fist, a tarry substance with a peculiar lustre, and as the witch doctor held this aloft the warriors danced towards him and struck their weapons of war against it in accordance with some ancient rite.

"The old devil!" Adams ejaculated. "He's got a piece of pitchblende in his hands. No doubt it contains enough radium to save hundreds of human lives with its healing properties. And here's this black ruffian using it to incite his men to kill!"

Even as he spoke the bushmen began to rush to and fro, abandoning the clearing to plunge into the jungle yelling fiendishly as they ran, and shaking assegai, club and bow with unmistakable significance.

"They're scattering in all directions!" gasped the professor. "There's a body of them coming this way. We've got to make our way to the coast and find some means of leaving the island. Cebu—Cebu—you've brought us this far, can you guide us out of this accursed jungle?"

Cebu pointed to a track that branched from the one they had been following. The giant negro's face was an impassive mask that concealed the terror he must have felt.

"Try this way," he said. "Come!"

Flight Through the Jungle.

THE bush seemed alive with sound and movement, voices chanting a chorus of doom, black forms flitting hither and thither like hell-fiends.

Professor Adams, Ramage and Cebu stumbled forward doggedly, the horror of pursuit at their very heels. Alone, Cebu might have made good progress, but the two white men were handicapped by the weight of thick-soled boots. Meanwhile, Owando's warriors were drawing ever nearer, travelling hot-foot with the rapidity of a people bred to the jungle.

"They're close behind," Ramage kept saying over and over again. "They'll sight us any moment."

And those words were on his lips when a party of half a dozen savages burst into a patch of open ground across which the fugitives were running.

A yell went up, and Adams and his companions half-turned. The blacks had checked, and one had fitted an arrow to his bow. Even as Cebu and the white men were in the act of wheeling to continue their flight into the bush the shaft sped on its mission of death, and the heavy blade of the arrow tore into the professor's breast.

A sharp cry of agony broke from the scientist's lips, and he pitched to the ground. Ramage and Cebu immediately stopped and bent over him, the former haggard with anxiety.

"They've got me," the professor moaned. "They've got me—"

With a strong, firm pull, Ramage wrenched the arrow from the old man's body. Then, with Cebu's assistance, he raised him.

At the other side of the little clearing another of the savages had fitted an arrow and was preparing to send it on its way. But Ramage caught sight of him, and, throwing aside the missile that had struck the professor, he plucked a revolver from a holster at his belt.

He fired, and the blast of the gun challenged the exulting howls of the bushmen. The bullet thudded into the dusky chest of the savage who was in the act of drawing bow, and with a grunt the warrior staggered back. The arrow leapt from his fingers as he fell heavily, but it flashed harmlessly towards the shimmering blue vault of the sky, and when it had spent itself dropped somewhere into the heart of the jungle.

A shriek of execration burst from the other blacks, but in face of the "thunderstick" in Ramage's fist they hesitated. While they stood there wavering, Ramage and Cebu seized the opportunity of dragging the professor into the bush.

The tangled vegetation swallowed them, and at the same moment the party of blacks at the other side of the clearing were joined by another and larger body of tribesmen. Howling murderously for blood, the savages swept forward.

Carrying Professor Adams between them, Ramage and Cebu reeled on. But they realised the folly of keeping to the beaten tracks, as they knew that they must speedily be overtaken with their burden, and so they swerved aside and crashed through a mass of jungle fronds and creepers.

Tree-apes chattered at them from lofty boughs, but the fugitives had no ears for those animal voices. They were on the alert for sounds of pursuit, and it was with indescribable relief that they heard their enemies surging in full cry along the path which they had abandoned.

Ramage and Cebu toiled through the thickets with a dead weight hanging on their arms. It was an appalling trek, this blazing of a new trail through the dusky jungle—for two encumbered men, a titanic endeavour that sapped the strength even from the giant negro's magnificent physique.

Fibrous creepers tripped them, and thorny tendrils whipped and tore their flesh. Time and again they had to lay the professor down and tear a pathway with their bare hands. Sometimes they were confronted with impenetrable barriers of giant flora that might have resisted an axe, and were forced to change their course.

They paused at last, from very exhaustion, and lowered Professor Adams to the ground. He was conscious, and his eyes were open, but a mass of blood had coagulated on his shirt and he was very weak.

The jungle was still, and the sound of savage cries came but faintly to their ears, cries in which a baffled tone was distinguishable. For the time being, at least, the pursuers had been thrown off the scent.

"They've lost track of us," Ramage breathed hoarsely. "We'd better keep going as long as we can."

"Wait," Adams pleaded, as they made to lift him again—"wait—"

He reached inside his shirt, and, stifling a groan, drew out a faded paper, which proved to be a chart when he opened it with trembling fingers. It was a map of the island on which so many of his companions had met their doom, and wrapped in it was a fragment of that same lustrous black substance that the witch doctor, Owando, had used to incite the bushmen.

"Ramage," the professor said, speaking with difficulty, "this chart—already stained with the blood of my ancestors—must go back to civilisation—whatever happens to me. It must be—preserved—"

"I understand, professor," Ramage answered, urging him with a gesture to thrust both map and pitchblende back inside his shirt. "But we must get out of here."

"This chart," the old man persisted—"this chart and this piece of pitchblende—must go to my daughter Bonnie—Bonnie—"

"Yes, yes, professor; I'll attend to it," Ramage turned to Cebu, and: "Come on," he added, "give me a hand with him. We've got to get him out of here!"

They raised the old man, and once again pushed on through the eternal gloom of the bush.

Bound for Danger Island.

AT the other side of the world, a group of people whose lives were linked up with Professor Adams' enterprise were gathered in the drawing-room of the scientist's New Jersey home.

They included Bonnie, the professor's blonde and lovely daughter, and Dr. Adams, his brother. There were two others in the room, a man and a girl, both in the late twenties. The man, tall, dark, and in some respects handsome, was Ben Arnold, who had formed a friendship with the Adams family some time prior to the professor's departure on his ill-fated expedition to Africa. The girl, Arlene Chandos, was a pale, slender brunette, who had for the last year or so acted as a companion to Bonnie.

They were standing around a globe that represented the world, and Ben Arnold was turning it on its pivot.

"You see, Bonnie," he was saying, "the island we think your father is on is not charted on this map. But it lies about here." He laid his finger on a point just off the coast of Angola, where the barbarous Congo River empties its sluggish waters into the sea. "And it is known as Danger Island."

Bonnie nodded, and bent her blonde head over the globe.

"Captain Drake, my new skipper," Ben Arnold continued, "knows every inch of that coast. With him in command we're sure to find your father—if he's alive."

Bonnie looked up swiftly, and just for an instant an expression of dismay was written on her lovely face.

"Oh, he must be alive, Ben!" she said, with more hope than conviction in her voice. "Don't you think so, Uncle Anthony?" she added, turning to Dr. Adams.

"Oh, I'm convinced my brother is alive," the doctor murmured. "But I'm not so sure that an expedition of this kind would be safe for a young girl. There are wild beasts—savages to encounter—"

Arlene Chandos interrupted him. It was as if she wished to sidetrack the doctor from his protests, for some reason best known to herself—and perhaps to Ben Arnold.

"Doctor," she said, "Bonnie tells me that she hasn't heard from her father for a long time."

Dr. Adams pursed his lips and looked anxious for a moment.

"Yes," he muttered; "quite some time. It may be that some disaster has overtaken him."

"Your brother's expedition was not properly equipped," put in Ben Arnold. "My ship, the Lottie Carson, has everything. She is engine-driven, but is rigged for sails in case of an emergency—a breakdown, for instance. She carries motor-boats, and in addition to these—an aeroplane. In fact, there is no hazard or contingency which may possibly arise that I have not provided for."

"Very thorough preparation, I should say," Dr. Adams declared emphatically. "And I'm sure both Bonnie and I are considerably indebted to you. It's magnificent of you to fit out this expedition—"

"Not at all," said Arnold, with complacency, his dark eyes shifting for an instant towards Arlene Chandos. "I regarded the professor as one of my dearest friends, and am willing to do everything in my power to help him. I am afraid, in view of the lack of news, that he may need help."

The door opened at that juncture and a butler appeared on the threshold.

"Captain Drake," he announced formally, and at mention of the name Arnold glanced round.

"Oh, show him in," he said, and a moment later a young man of commanding appearance entered the room.

He was something over six feet in height, clean of limb and superbly built. His free stride and blue, far-seeing eyes were characteristic of the man whose trade is the sea. His bronzed face, though almost youthful in its lines and pleasing in its expression, possessed a certain manly ruggedness that told of fighting qualities.

"Hallo, Captain Drake!" Arnold greeted him. "I'm glad you're here, for I can introduce you to the folks while we're all together. This is Dr. Anthony Adams. This lady is Miss Chandos. And this is Miss Adams."

Captain Harry Drake found himself taking the slim, delicate hand that Bonnie proffered to him.

"Glad to meet you, Miss Adams," he said, and though the bridge of a ship was home to him, the intonation of his fine, strong voice told of English birth.

"How do you do, Captain Drake?" said Bonnie. "Mr. Arnold has been telling us all about you. I understand you know where Danger Island is."

"Well, I think so, Miss Adams," Harry Drake told her with a smile. "It's somewhat out of the track of ships, but I've sailed those waters many a time."

"We have a map here," Bonnie mentioned, indicating the globe. "Won't you show me where the island is, and just how we get there?"

"I'll be glad to," Harry answered, and, approaching the atlas with her, he began to turn it with his hands, at the same time tracing their intended course across the North and South Atlantic.

"You see, Miss Adams," he explained, "we sail from here direct to the Azores, about eight hundred miles from the west coast of Portugal. We take on fuel and provisions there, then alter our course and run direct for the south. In two weeks from now we should be nearing this point right here."

Dr. Anthony Adams had joined Drake and Bonnie at the atlas, and was looking over the captain's shoulder interestedly. Ben Arnold and Arlene Chandos did not attach themselves to the group, however. They took the opportunity of drawing aside and conversing with each other in a low tone that Bonnie and her companions could not hear.

"Drake knows the exact location of the island," Ben Arnold said, with keen satisfaction.

Arlene Chandos favoured him with a penetrating glance.

"Yes," she retorted significantly, "he knows too much. Take my advice and get rid of him."

"Don't worry," Arnold told her with a sardonic smile. "I've had my mate, Bull Black, trail him ever since he signed on. Once Drake shows me the island, Bull will take command of the ship!"

At Sea.

THE Lottie Carson ploughed her way through the waters of the South Atlantic, spray dancing from her bows, a trim, three-masted schooner bound for a remote and savage coast.

On the after-deck Harry Drake and Bonnie Adams were talking of the voyage.

"It hardly seems possible that we've been at sea two whole weeks," the girl declared. "How many days will it be before we reach the island?"

"You won't have much longer to wait, Miss Adams," Harry informed her. "A couple of days at the outside."

Bonnie laid a hand on his arm and looked at him earnestly.

"Captain Drake," she said, "you do believe we'll find my father, don't you?"

"I think he'll be on the beach waiting for you," the Englishman answered reassuringly, and he added, with a smile: "Any man would, Miss Adams."

There was a good deal of bustle going on aboard the craft at this particular hour, and further conversation between Harry and his fair companion was interrupted by the strident and unmelodious voice of a hefty young sailor who was fixing a rope.

Harry and Bonnie could not see him, for the squat bulk of bridge and wheelhouse concealed him from their view, but his cracked tones reached their ears as he gave hideous rendering of a seafaring ballad:

"Oh, my name is Briney, I was born on the briney deep;
And you'll always find me workin' when the other swabs are asleep!"

Harry and Bonnie laughed, but there was a man, sour of temper, whose mood did not coincide with that of the cheerful Briney. That man was Bull Black, mate of the Lottie Carson, and Harry Drake's immediate subordinate.

With a strong, firm pull, Ramage wrenched the arrow from the old man's body.

Bull Black approached Briney with a scowl as dark as his name. A heavily-built man with a deep chest and the face of a tyrant, he was a fair seaman, eminently capable of handling a ship—and capable, too, of handling a crew, so long as he was given free use of his fists. Harry Drake was not too partial to him, and more than once he had been compelled to check him for his brutality to the men.

But Harry Drake was not in view, and, brushing aside a sailor who stood in his path, Bull Black stepped up to Briney, swung him around by the shoulder and snarled a command at him.

"Stow that cursed noise!" he said.

Briney looked at him cheerfully.

"I think it's pretty," he declared, without offence.

"Oh, you do, do ye?" growled Black in a tone that was dangerously quiet.

There was an inhuman leer on his ugly face, and his narrow eyes seemed to fasten on the point of Briney's jaw.

"Well, then," he went on, "what do yuh think o' this?" And with the words he swung a fist like a hammer and knocked Briney sprawling.

Black made a gesture as of dusting his hands, and then swaggered aft. A moment later he caught sight of Drake and Bonnie near the stern of the vessel, and after pausing to watch them for a few seconds, he changed his course and strode in the direction of Ben Arnold's state-room.

Arnold had received a visit from Arlene Chandos, and, like Bonnie and Harry Drake, the two were discussing the prospects of the voyage—though from a very different angle.

"Listen, Ben," Arlene was saying, "supposing we find Professor Adams alive and kicking, with a few million dollars' worth of radium in his possession?"

"We won't find the professor," Arnold retorted. "We'd have heard of him before this if something hadn't happened to him."

Arlene was silent for a spell. Then she laid a hand on Arnold's sleeve and looked at him appealingly.

"Ben," she said, "there's something else I want to ask you. Bonnie Adams doesn't mean anything to you, does she? If I—"

"Now get this, Arlene," Arnold interrupted. "It's the radium I'm after—noting else. But I brought her along because she might remember something of that chart her old man carried. When she's served her purpose—"

He shrugged, and:

"Well, this island we're bound for is dangerous," he continued, "and accidents—are likely to happen."

There was a tap on the door and Bull Black entered the cabin.

"Mr. Arnold," he said gruffly, "you'd better look out for your captain. Him an' the Adams girl are up on the after-deck cooin' together like a pair o' turtle doves."

Arnold bit his lip. It did not suit him to stand by and watch Harry Drake winning Bonnie's confidence, but for the time being he did not care to interfere.

"I can't afford to quarrel with Drake until we sight Danger Island," he muttered.

Before more could be said on the subject a voice was heard all over the ship. It was the voice of the look-out in the cross-trees, and Bull Black pulled open the door to catch his words.

"Row-boat three points off the star-board bow!"

Black and Arnold stepped out on deck and encountered Harry and Bonnie as they approached the bulwark. The Englishman had a pair of field-glasses in his hand, and he focused them on a dark object some distance away.

"What is it, captain?" Bonnie asked. "Some sort of a canoe," Harry answered. "But I can't make out what's aboard her."

"Let me see," put in Arnold, and, taking the glasses, he studied the small boat for a moment. His attention was still fixed on it when he saw the flutter of a strip of white cloth waved in a signal of distress.

"Held your course, captain," said Ben Arnold curtly.

"But there's an SOS coming from that boat," Bonnie interposed. "We must go to her."

"Miss Adams is right," Harry observed, and raising his voice: "Port your helm!" he called to the man in the wheel-house.

"Port your helm, sir," the man at the wheel repeated, and immediately afterwards the Lottie Carson was heeling over on the starboard side as the steersman altered her course.

The distance between schooner and rowing-boat rapidly dwindled, and soon those on the deck of the Lottie Carson were able to make out the half-naked figure of a huge negro. There was another figure in the boat, that of a white man, but he was quite motionless. The nigger alone moved, rowing like one in the last stages of exhaustion.

When they were alongside, one or two of the hands threw a rope-ladder over the bulwark and then proceeded to help the big negro aboard. The white man was carried up the rungs a moment later, and as he was brought on deck—a thin, wasted figure that seemed more dead than alive—Drake and his companions crowded round him.

Next instant a scream broke from Bonnie's lips.

"Daddy!" came her startling cry. "Oh, it's daddy!"

Arnold, Bull Black and Arlene Chandos exchanged glances but said nothing. Then Bonnie spoke again in a voice that trembled with anxiety.

"Take him to my cabin," she said to the sailors who were carrying her father. "And someone fetch my uncle. Oh, quickly, please!"

"Come on, boys," Harry put in crisply. "Hustle up there."

Professor Adams was borne to Bonnie's state-room and laid on a bunk there, Arlene Chandos, Ben Arnold and Harry Drake remaining with him, together with Bonnie and her Uncle Anthony.

The professor was unconscious, but a stiff drink was poured out for him, and as it passed his lips he seemed to revive a little. He was a pitiable spectacle, however, shrunk to a skeleton, and wearing clothes that were tattered and begrimed, while a dark stain over his breast showed where that bushman arrow had struck him.

One glance at him and his brother Anthony knew he could not survive much longer, and as the professor opened his eyes the unnatural brightness of them told how near he was to his end. His strength sapped away by privation and loss of blood, he had no stamina left to help him recover from his terrible experiences.

"Ramage," he whispered, as he stared past the group in the cabin, seeing only those past events with which his waking memory tortured him.

"Ramage—poor Ramage. Speared as we ran for the boat. But his was a quick, easy death. He didn't linger on as I'm lingering."

"Daddy!" Bonnie cried, flinging herself down beside him. "Daddy, don't you know me?"

The professor's brain cleared as that well-known voice called him to his present surroundings, and a look of recognition dawned on his haggard face.

"Bonnie," he faltered huskily. "Bonnie! Is it really you?"

"Oh, daddy," she told him in a tone that trembled with emotion, "I'm thankful—thankful that we arrived in time."

The professor gave a wan smile.

"I'm afraid you didn't quite arrive in time, Bonnie dear," he murmured. "Listen, I can't last much longer, and there is a great deal I must tell you before I go."

From the inside of his shirt he pulled out the chart of Danger Island and the fragment of gleaming black rock that was wrapped in it.

"Pitchblende, Bonnie," he whispered. "The treasure I was after. Rich in radium of untold value. See. See the radium in it. And there are vast deposits of that pitchblende located on the chart. Take it, dear. I charge you to find that radium field and save it from impostors and adventurers. Preserve it for the good—good of humanity."

"Daddy," Bonnie urged, "you mustn't worry yourself about the treasure. You must rest a while."

Again that wan smile flitted across the professor's face.

"Presently I will rest," he said. "I have only a few minutes left." His voice was growing weaker and his mind began to wander again. "For days and days we drifted. Danger Island—coast of peril—dark jungle. Wild beasts—savages, they killed all my companions."

Harry Drake laid a hand on Anthony Adams' sleeves.

"Can anything be done for him, doctor?" he said in an undertone; but the older man shook his head sadly, his lean, aristocratic features wearing an expression of utter hopelessness.

"No, nothing," he made answer.

"My brother is dying."

"Bonnie," the professor was saying, "Bonnie, swear to me that you will carry on."

She promised brokenly, and he lay back with a look of contentment.

"Radium," he murmured. "Rarest and most treasured substance of the civilised world. Vast deposits of it, Bonnie. Mankind must benefit. Radium! Radium!"

His eyes closed, and a tremor passed through his shrunken frame, the tremor of his last breath.

"Daddy!" the girl cried. "Daddy! Oh, he's gone—he's gone!"

A sob escaped her, and she was racked by a fit of weeping. The others in the state-room tried to comfort her, Ben Arnold and Arlene Chandos making a great show of sympathy. But it was some time before Bonnie could speak.

She pushed the chart and the fragment of pitchblende into Arnold's hands.

"You'd better keep this for me, Ben," she said trustfully.

Arnold's grasp closed on map and pitchblende with an eagerness that he could scarcely conceal. Nor could he refrain from exchanging a glance of keen satisfaction with Arlene Chandos.

Trouble Brewing.

TWO of the crew stood near the ship's side. One of them was the irrepressible Briney of the lusty voice, and the other was an able-bodied seaman named Burke.

Leaning over the bulwark they gazed at the heaving waters of the ocean and occasionally caught a glimpse of the pale-green belly of a shark. The sea was infested with the brutes, and the two sailors looked at them with the disgust of men who had learned to hate and fear the snap of their deadly jaws.

"It allus gives me a turn to watch them critters," Briney said with a shudder. "I never seen so many of 'em around a ship."

Burke looked over his shoulder cautiously.

"Ah," he told Briney with a murky air, "an' speakin' o' sharks, I never seen so many of 'em in a ship."

"In a ship?" Briney echoed dully.

"You're crazy, Burke."

"Oh, no, I ain't," Burke retorted. "Bull Black, for one—he's what I call 'a shark.'"

"Aw, you mean human bein's? Say, I know a lotta sharks that walk around in pants."

Burke laid a hand on the big fellow's sleeve.

"You know, Briney," he said, "there's something about this craft I don't like. It gives me the shivers—like a ship with a curse on it, an' if you ask me, we're all headed for trouble."

"Stow it," Briney scoffed. "You allus was superstitious."

"Well, I can't rightly explain the way I feel," Burke rejoined. "But I've got a hunch there's a storm blowin' up for us all, if you know what I mean. An' it ain't superstition that makes me say so."

"It don't look like dirty weather to me," Briney declared innocently, studying the vivid blue sky.

Burke leaned nearer to him.

"I ain't talkin' about weather," he said. "But I am talkin' of squalls, and its my opinion that one's liable to break right here on this ship. I never did know a craft that didn't have trouble when mate and skipper wrangled like Bull Black and Captain Drake do. I'm tellin' yuh they don't see eye to eye nohow, an' Black ain't the man to take orders lyin' down when he's in a position to defy 'em."

"What could Bull Black do?" Briney argued. "Drake's in command, an' everybody has to do what he tells 'em, otherwise it's plain mutiny on the high seas."

"Ah, an' that's the hang of it, matey," Burke declared. "Mutiny on the High Seas! That's the squall this craft is headed for. Have ye seen the way them fo'c'sle swabs Dempster, Gavigan, Markham an' Baxter get into a corner an' start a-whisperin' an' a-mutterin' among 'enselves? Bull Black's crawlers, they are. They're the same dirty breed as him, an' they're up to no good."

Briney spat thoughtfully into the sea. "Bull Black was never any good, anyway," he stated. "An' one day my nauter is gonna kiss his jaw for that sock he gave me."

"Yeah?" said Burke. "Well, maybe you won't have to wait long, or maybe he'll be handin' you another wallop. Mark my words, Bull Black aims to command this craft, an' if he does you'll see the bad 'uns will be top-dogs over the good 'uns. I've heard funny kinda talk passin' amongst Dempster an' Co. An' what's more, I ain't got much use for that owner of ours—Arnold. Now Bull Black's thick w' him, slippin' in an' outa his cabin all day long."

"What's at the back of it, Burke?" asked Briney.

The other sailor shook his head solemnly.

"Ah, I dunno!" he muttered. "I wish I did know, but I'll tell ye this much. I wouldn't give fifty cents for the bunch aboard this ship—exceptin' you an' me an' them two fellers Collins an' Connor. An' Captain Drake, of course."

He said no more, for at that moment a formidable figure loomed into view. It was the figure of Bull Black and as he caught sight of the two sailors at the bulwark he advanced towards them ominously.

"Get outa here, you blame' lubbers!" he thundered in his deep, bass voice. "Come on, get out an' step lively. If you ain't got work to do, it wouldn't hurt to swab the deck. D'ye hear me?"

Burke and Briney moved off, and Black was glaring after them when the door of a state-room opened close by. It was the door of the cabin in which Professor Adams had died a moment before, and in the man who now emerged Black recognised Ben Arnold.

Arnold moved across to where Black was standing, and from an inside pocket he drew out the map that Bonnie had given him.

"Listen, Bull," he said. "I've got the chart locatin' Danger Island and the radium deposits."

A glint appeared in Bull Black's crafty eyes.

"Then we don't need Captain Drake any more, huh?" he mentioned, pronouncing the young skipper's name with a vicious sneer.

"No," Ben Arnold answered, "we don't need him— Look out," he added tersely, as the door of the state-room opened again. "here he comes!"

Harry stepped out of Bonnie's cabin, and, closing the door behind him, approached Arnold and Black.

"This is a bad business, Mr. Arnold," he observed. "and I'm afraid it will change our plans."

Arnold glanced at him narrowly.

"What do you mean?" he demanded. "You heard what the professor said. We're to carry on."

"Sure," Harry retorted, "and I'm game enough. But we'll head for the nearest port and put Miss Bonnie and Miss Arlene ashore. If the island is as dangerous as the professor implied—"

"Wait a minute!" Arnold rapped out.

"Ben, what are they doing?" gasped Bonnie. "What happened—what are they fighting for?"

"It strikes me you're taking a lot of responsibility over Miss Bonnie, but I'm the owner of this ship, and you'll do as I tell you!"

Harry Drake's jaw took on a stubborn thrust.

"Yes!" he said. "Well, owner or not, we'll head for the port of Twamballa. When we get there you can hand me my discharge if you like. But until then I'm in command, and you'll leave me to give the orders— Head for the port of Twamballa, Mr. Black."

Bull Black hesitated, but, uncertain for the moment of his ground, he touched the peak of his cap sailor-fashion.

"Ay, ay, sir!" he answered, none too civilly.

Harry passed on, and he had gone a few paces when Arnold tapped Bull on the arm.

"Bull," he said through his teeth, "you've wanted command of this ship. Now's your chance. Let's see you take it!"

Bull squared his shoulders.

"You mean—"

"Yeah, that's just what I do mean," Arnold told him curtly, interpreting the sentence that Bull had left unfinished.

The rascally mate nodded, and strode after Harry. At that moment Harry was running his keen eye over a group of seamen, and he noticed that one of the hands was loafing. He was Dempster, Black's cronie of the fo'c'sle, and Harry spoke to him sharply. He had marked among some of the crew, Black included, an air of subdued insolence, almost amounting to insubordination, and he did not intend to tolerate it.

"What are you doing there, sailor?" he demanded. "Come on, clean this halyard!"

The curt reprimand brought Dempster to his feet, though it was with some sullenness that he proceeded to obey, and Harry was watching him sternly when Black came up.

Captain and mate looked at each other, and something about Black's easy self-assurance warned Harry of what was afoot.

"I've orders to take command of this ship," Bull announced. "From now on you'll consider yourself a passenger, Mr. Drake."

Harry's brow darkened.

"Is that so?" he ground out, in a voice that must have carried to Arnold's ears. "Well, let me tell you this. You'll take orders from me, Mr. Black!"

The men near by stopped their work. Briney and Burke were among them, and Burke shot a glance at his shipmate which seemed to express the sentiment, "I told you so."

There were three other members of the crew in the neighbourhood—Dempster, Gavigan and Baxter—and they also seemed to regard the situation with significance.

With every eye upon him, Bull Black took a step forward, his knuckles bunched ominously.

"I'll take nothin' from you!" he barked, and with the words swung his fist for Harry Drake's jaw.

Mutiny.

HAD it connected, that blow must have hurled Harry to the deck, but he acted with a rapidity that baffled Bull Black.

Up came his arm, and as his elbow parried the swing Bull's fist glanced aside. Next second Harry had ripped his right to the mate's chin, and the burly ruffian went over like a ninepin. Heels flying, he struck the boards with a resounding thump and rolled to the scupper.

November 28th, 1931.

He lay prone for a moment, while Harry stood over him, still in the attitude of delivering the blow. Then the mutinous rogue shook his great shaggy head as if to throw off the effects of the punch and with a full, round oath, he scrambled to his feet and lunged at the younger man.

Harry was ready for him. His left tore into Bull's ribs with an impact that drew a sharp grunt from the mate. His right lashed him in the jaw again and dropped him to the deck for a second time.

Standing at some distance, Ben Arnold could scarcely refrain from shouting a word of impatient encouragement to his fallen henchman. There were others, however, who were prepared to go to Bull's assistance, for as the mate was laid low both Dempster and Gavigan started forward.

"No, you don't," roared Briney, flinging his hefty bulk in front of them and holding them off with widespread arms. "Keep back, ye seum, an' give the skipper a chance."

Bull reached his feet again, and made still another savage onslaught. This time he was more successful. He broke through Harry's guard and rocked the young captain with a buffet that drew blood from the mouth, and, though Harry was quick to recover, his assailant fell into a clinch with him and tried to throw him.

They staggered across the deck, grappling fiercely. Meanwhile, Briney was keeping Bull's underlings in check, and at the same time watching every phase of the struggle—and a delighted yell escaped him as Harry switched his foot behind Black's legs and brought him down with a trip-throw.

There was a patter of feet on the deck, and Markham came running on to the scene.

"Say, what's the matter with you fellers?" he squealed, as he saw the mate sprawled near the bulwark. "Come on, let's give Bull a hand!"

He dashed forward, but Briney caught him and wrenched him back.

"Just a minute, you!" he stormed. "Fair play! The first guy that makes a move, I'll break him in two!"

"Yeah?" came the voice of Dempster, and next second he had wrapped his arms around Briney's neck, assailing him from the rear.

Briney was instantly engaged in a fierce scuffle, and Baxter, Gavigan and Markham leapt towards Harry. Burke took Markham on the run and brought him down in a heap, and Connor, appearing at that moment, tackled Baxter manfully. Gavigan was left to go to Bull Black's aid, for Collins, the only other reliable member of the crew, was in the wheel-house, and did not dare to leave his post. But Briney threw Dempster to the deck and pounced on Gavigan like a lion.

He hit Gavigan with a force that sent him staggering, and the man blundered against Harry. The young captain almost lost his balance, and only saved himself from falling by clutching at the bulwark. By the time he was fairly on his feet, however, Bull Black was up again, and rushing at him like a madman.

Bull's fist drove into Harry's face before he could lift his guard and block the punch. The shock swung him backward, and in a twinkling he was almost over the side—within an ace of plunging into a shark-infested sea.

He lurched back at the mate and caught the rogue with a right-hand jolt at the same time. Bull reeled away, and, following him up swiftly, the Englishman rained blows at his impassioned face. For the next sixty seconds the mate was the victim of a relentless hammering that drove him along the deck towards the stern.

In the meantime Briney and his companions were battling wholeheartedly against Bull's underlings of the fo'c'sle, and above the noise of the strife Briney's strident voice was bellowing powerfully.

"Give 'em beans, boys!" he roared. "A scarlet runner every time ye hit 'em on the nose!"

Briney was handling both Gavigan and Dempster now, his big, touselled head rearing above them and jerking this way and that as he battered them with his calloused fists. Burke was piling into Markham, and changing the contour of that rascally seaman's features with a series of well-timed blows. Connor was up against a tough proposition in Baxter, a man of Bull Black's build, but was managing to hold his own.

Ben Arnold was watching the fight eagerly, particularly the grim conflict between Harry Drake and Bull Black, and it was with feelings of chagrin and dismay that he saw the burly mate stumbling back in full retreat before the Englishman's attack. But an exclamation of satisfaction broke from Arnold as Bull rallied with an effort and rammed home a heavy body-blow.

Harry was pulled up by it, and suddenly Bull launched a terrific onslaught that was well-nigh irresistible. He used all his weight, and his bulk was a big advantage to him, for he must have turned the scales at fifteen stone, fully twenty pounds more than the younger man.

But Harry's clean-cut frame had resources of strength and stamina that were yet to bewilder Bull Black, and with his compact build the Englishman was singularly well-equipped for a "rough-house."

The mate landed a full swing that floored Harry. It should have smashed the wits out of him, too, but the young captain had scarcely fallen before he was starting to pull himself to his feet again.

Bull flung himself forward and discovered to his cost that Harry had plenty of fight left in him. For he planted his boot in the mate's stomach, hurled him back with a powerful thrust and then dragged himself up by the bulwark.

The Plunge.

DR. ANTHONY ADAMS had remained with his niece in her stateroom, where he did his utmost to console her over the passing of her father.

"You must be brave, Bonnie!" he told her. "All the weeping in the world wouldn't bring him back. And remember—he has left us with a mission to perform, a mission that is going to save thousands of lives. We've got to keep a stiff upper lip, my dear—"

It was at this juncture that the doctor first became aware of the commotion on the deck, and as the sounds of the mêlée reached his ears he took his arm from around Bonnie's shoulders.

"Why, what's going on?" he stammered. "It sounds like a battle royal."

He stepped to the door and pulled it open, and the noise of strife immediately became a hundred times more distinct. With an exclamation the doctor hurried out of the cabin, and, forcing back her sobs, Bonnie moved after him.

Ben Arnold was standing a few paces away, and Bonnie and her uncle joined

(Continued on page 27.)

Owing to rustlers, an old rancher and his charming daughter are forced to take in paying guests. Ruin stares him in the face until a stranger rides in from the prairie. Starring Rex Lease and Dorothy Gulliver.

The GUEST HOUSE

The Angry Owner.

"PAH, they make me sick!"

The old man in the wheeled chair spat out the words with vicious hatred. His hair may have been white, his cheeks sunken, and his limbs crippled, but the eyes blazed with life and determination, and the small jaw and lips were thrust forward. A fighter, rebelling at Fate, and itching to be back in the fray.

His chair was on a wooden balcony of a large ranch-house; before him lay a lawn, well-kept flower-beds, trees, and beyond—a glimpse of the rolling prairie. On the lawn sat four women in arm-chairs, and their tongues were doing overtime. Middle-aged, over-dressed women, and their Eastern clothes seemed very much out of place on this Western ranch.

Frank Sutter owned the Bar L, and it made him mad to think that he had been compelled by bad business to convert his property into a home for lunatics and soft-lidded greenhorns.

For years Sutter had been one of the big cattlemen on the Mexican border; but since the war times had not been so good. Recently rustling had caused him such heavy losses that ruin stared him in the face. He had converted the ranch into a "Guest House"—a place where people from the East could live and imagine that they were "Doing the West." Most of the women had more money than brains, whilst their children were typical of themselves.

A big, burly man, with a heavy mustache, strode on to the veranda.

"Hallo, Burke! Any news?"

"No trace, Mr. Sutter," replied the foreman. "We tried to follow the trail, but the rustlers must've drove the horses into the river and landed them, lower down. Twenty head we lost, boss."

"Yeah, and that makes two hundred head of our best stock," cried Sutter. "If these rustlers don't quit soon, Burke, I'm ruined. Has the sheriff any idea?"

"Sheriff ain't wise, boss." Burke shrugged his shoulders. "Ain't much good raising posses and riding blind. Then rustlers has a mighty clever leader."

"I'd like to have him here now!"

raged the ranch-owner. "I could shoot him and those cackling women quick as lightning—and I should laugh fit to bust! Where's Winslow—does he know?"

"Out for a ride in Miss Helen's car, boss."

"Oh, well, I wanna see him soon as he gets back," cried Mr. Sutter. "We've got to do something to round up these rustlers!"

The Accident and the Quarrel.

A CLEAN-SHAVEN young man bent over a wood fire and carefully twisted and turned some bacon over the flames. Dark curly hair set off a laughing face, which was healthy and tanned by the sun. The squareness of the shoulders and the well-knit frame showed him to be an athlete. His eyes were brown and mostly laughing—he went through life with a smile.

Fumbling with a tent was a wizened-faced man of middle age. The top lip of the large mouth seemed to protrude over a small chin, thus giving him a conical expression, which was heightened by small, beady eyes.

"Say, Ben, how ye getting on with that tent?"

"You've got the soft job," came the growl from the old campaigner. "This yere tent is all rope, and dang me if I knows which end's which!"

"You wouldn't!" laughed the youngster. "I suppose I shall have to show you."

"Any chump can sizzle bacon," was the grumble.

"For two mornings it has been burnt, and who did it?" The young fellow turned his head. "If you made a living cooking you wouldn't earn a cent, nor would you make a whale of a lot putting up tents. I can see from here you're using the wrong end of the pole."

"Why didn't you say so, Jim Weston?"

"Because I haven't got eyes in the back of my head," was the gay reply. "Come here, old pard, and eat this bacon. We'll settle one thing at a time."

"Suits me." Ben dropped everything and eagerly grabbed up a piece of bacon from the frying-pan. "Wow, it's hot!" He scowled as the younger man laughed. Ben decided to change the conversation. "What time do we strike this yere ranch?"

"Could have made it to-night, old-timer, but what's the hurry?" Jim replied. "I wanna take a look-see in the daylight, and it ain't always healthy to arrive night-time. Think you could make some coffee without spilling it?"

"Boy,—there ain't a guy—"

"I know there ain't; but I'm thirsty," interrupted Jim. "I aim to have a look at this country before turning in, and we're wasting time. Get busy with that coffee, Ben, and don't make it like pitch, or else you do that tent on your own."

"A laugh would choke me." Ben shook his head. "Fancy having to live with a jackass!"

Ben and Jim always pulled each other's legs, but actually they were fast friends. Say one word to Ben against Jim, and about six guns would be in your waist line.

The coffee was good, and when the two men had drunk their fill the problem of the tent was tackled. So far they had camped under the stars, as they had been moving in a hurry, but both men knew it would rain that night and decided to sleep in comfort. Hence the unpacking of the small tent, which had been carried in the prairie schooner.

The two men were camped near a stream. Just above them lay a stony and rough road, whilst a part-worn trail led from the road past their camp-site to an old quarry. A good place for a camp, as there was little chance of getting the caravan bogged if it rained, and made a good shelter for themselves and their horses from the storm.

A powerful two-seater roared along the dusty, gritty road.

A brunette of undoubted charm sat at the wheel, and smiled with joy as the car answered to her touch. A small felt hat crowned a head of dark curls, laughing eyes peered from beneath long lashes, whilst a dimple came and went in the soft cheeks, and the shapely mouth opened with expectant delight as the car took a corner on two wheels.

Seated beside her was a big-faced man of about thirty-eight to forty years. His small moustache was neatly clipped, but the eyes seemed a trifle too small for so large a face. The mouth was very big, whilst the shaggy eyebrows gave the man a handsome but rather ominous attractiveness. At the moment his eyes were flickering this way and that, and his breath coming in jerks.

"I say, Helen—steady down!"

"Not on your life, Harry Winslow!" came the dare-devil answer. "I'm just revelling in this. You beat me riding and told me I didn't know what speed was like. I'll show you!"

With a screech of tyres, the car took another corner on two wheels, flinging stones in all directions and kicking up clouds of dust.

Helen Sutter had just returned from a college in the East and she had brought the car with her. The college lads and lassies loved Helen, but those in charge sighed their relief. If there were a rag on foot, then the girl would be one of the ringleaders. Returning to her father's ranch, she had expected to be bored by the life, and it had been pleasant to find a cultured man like Winslow acting as manager.

Winslow was a cattle man with modern ideas, and he expounded a proposition to Frank Sutter that he should utilise his ranch and lands not only for cattle, but as a holiday resort for tired Easterners. And, as business was bad, the Bar L had become a guest-house.

The manager had been pleased to look after this high-spirited girl. Old man

Sutter's land was valuable property, and it might be well worth his while to consider Helen as a wife. At the moment Winslow almost detested the girl; he would curb her heels when she became his wife!

"Take it easy, Helen!" cautioned Winslow. "There's a nasty bend by the quarry, and the surface is very loose."

"I've never known this bus not to answer," yelled back the tom-boy. "You've heard of Lightning Hudson, the big race-driver—well, I've been lapping at a hundred and twenty with him. Once he let me drive, and the needle just touched the hundred. Gosh, it was a thrill! Hudson taught me how to skid round corners. Shall I show you, Harry?"

"Thanks, but I'd rather not!"

"It's dead easy. You aren't scared?"

The girl looked at him for a second, and the car slithered towards a bank.

"Here, hi, mind out!" yelled Winslow, and sighed his relief as Helen swung the car back to the safety of the road. "Gosh, kid, but that was a near shave!"

"Watch me take the quarry bend," was her answer. "I'll do it at just under fifty."

Winslow had no chance to protest as the engine made such a noise as Helen stepped on the gas. Like a streak they shot forward.

The quarry corner. Bump! The wheel found a pot-hole and Helen knew then she was going too fast. Desperately she jammed on the brakes, but the car seemed out of control. Helen caught a glimpse of a stretch of grass and decided that if they had to go over the bank here was the place.

The strong brakes were acting and slowing the car as she bumped off the road on to the old trail to the quarry. Ahead was something that flapped grotesquely and next moment the car had charged head on.

Both Jim and Ben were inside the tent. There were two poles, and the youngster had fixed one and was attempting to tackle the second pole.

"Wants someone outside to drive in some pegs," he cried. "I can just reach your pole with my hand, so if I hold both poles steady do you reckon you could drive in some pegs and fix a few ropes. Don't strain too much on the ropes when you're doing it or the tent will collapse."

"Leave it to me, Jim, it's easy. Why—"

Ben never finished his sentence because the tent, poles and the owners were moved on with considerable force for five or six yards. The poles and canvas saved them from serious harm, though the two were hurled to the ground with much violence.

"What the blue blazes," spluttered Jim, flinging aside the wreck of the tent. "What hit me?"

"Reckon it's a wild bull," gurgled Ben, who was also in difficulties. "If I could get clear of this stuff I'd plug the critter."

Jim crawled out of the canvas and stared round. Almost on top of him was a car, and standing up were two people. The pretty girl had a hand to ashen cheeks, whilst the man looked scared.

"Are you hurt?" Helen's voice was very pleasant, but to Jim it sounded like tearing cloth.

"Oh, no, I'm just fine," he growled. "Say, what do you reckon you were doing with that sardine tin of yours?"

"Sardine tin!" At once the girl forgot her fear. "This is a Hupmobile and she cost—"

"I don't care what she cost." Jim flung aside the tent. "Seems to me a pram would have been more your mark. What made you come charging down here—did you lose control?"

"Certainly not!"

"Wouldn't the brakes act?"

"Of course they acted." How her eyes flashed.

"The bad surface caused this lady to be forced off the road," Winslow had recovered his nerve and was glaring at the youngster in the worn cowboy outfit. "If there's any damage to your property I shall be pleased to compensate you."

"Thanks," drawled Jim.

"Are you hurt, Ben?"

"Nope." Ben felt himself all over. "But I guess I'm mighty lucky not to be all busted up."

"You were driving recklessly." Jim faced the girl with flashing eyes. "You must have come round that corner much too fast. You might have wrecked the car and killed us. You don't deserve such luck. What girls like you want is a nurse."

"Is that so?" Helen was used to admiration and adoration, and this sort of treatment was unknown. "Are you going to stand there, Harry, and hear this man insult me?"

Ponderously Winslow

"What hit me?" spluttered Jim, flinging aside the wreck of the tent.

climbed out of the car, and as he came towards Jim he squared his big shoulders and stuck out his chest in aggressive manner, whilst his thick lips opened to show clenched teeth. His knuckles were bunched, and he looked like a heavy-weight boxer about to administer a thrashing. Many a time this attitude had frightened those who stood in his way.

It did not impress Jim in the least. The boy's hands clenched, and with eyes alert for a sudden blow, he waited.

"Guess you'd better be careful how you talk." Winslow's voice was ominous. "Unless you apologise this instant there's going to be trouble."

"And you're the trouble. Ha, ha! You make me laugh," Jim sneered, and for a split second his eyes gazed straight at the girl. "Why should I apologise? You were driving too fast and carelessly, you've smashed up our tent and darn night finished me and my pard, and you're surprised because I ain't pleased. Reckon, lady, the best thing you can do is to go home to Nanna and take this big lapdog with you."

"Oh—how dare you!" cried the girl. "I'm going to smash you for this!" cried Winslow, and swung back his arm.

But, strange as it may seem, the blow hit nothing, because Jim had ducked his head, but Winslow got a jolt when a hard-as-iron fist battered his ribs just below the heart.

Winslow had an ungovernable temper and the blow made him see red. Wildly he rushed at the slim figure, hit nothing, and got a straight left on the point of the jaw that hurt. He tried to hug his opponent, but Jim was not there, and a left-right made his ears burn by the force of the blows. Then he saw Jim's face and swung a vicious hook, but the blow hit the boy on the shoulder, and next second a fist was in Winslow's right eye. This time a grunt of pain escaped his lips.

"Sock him, Jim," shouted Ben. "Give the big palooka a tousing. Knoek him cold. Let me know if you want any help."

Helen decided that this fight had gone quite far enough. Her father would be furious if he heard, and she would probably get the blame. For some strange reason she did not want this fearless youngster to get hurt. Besides, it was all her fault.

Helen knew when she was in the wrong, though she would not have admitted the fact publicly. Just as the two men were about to charge in again, the girl leaped out of her car and rushed between them.

"Stop fighting at once!" she ordered. "I won't have it!" Her eyes stared into those of the boy, who suddenly grinned. "I think you've got very bad manners."

"Maybe, but you've got mighty fine eyes." Jim's temper vanished. "Gee, how I like that dimple. I suppose we rouldn't fix up a date, because I might care to stay around this district for a spell."

"Impertinence! You ought to go back to school!" Helen tossed her head. "Harry, let's get going. I won't have a fight, but I won't stay here and listen to the babblings of a child."

"You're a pretty kid," Jim called after her. "Wouldn't like to leave your name and address, I suppose?"

Helen made no answer, though she had to lay a restraining hand on Winslow's arm.

"Let me pulverise him," he whispered. Helen shook her head decidedly and started the engine. The car backed out of the tent, turned and then shot away over the grass.

Ben was doubled up with mirth. "We sure handled them two fine," he chortled. "That big galoot looked fit to bust. The lass could do with a good spanking."

"Yeah, you're right, Ben." Jim stared thoughtfully after the fast-disappearing car. "I hope I see that girl again."

"You leave the women alone," growled Ben. "They're more dangerous than a six-shooter. Let's get on with this danged tent and forget about 'em. Reckon we'll have to cut new poles."

Jim was quite quiet as he set about helping Ben erect the tent.

Enemies.

NEXT morning Jim and Ben broke camp, piled their tent and belongings on the schooner, rounded up the half-dozen young ponies and took the trail.

"Mighty good idea bringing these mustangs along," Ben chewed at his pipe. "Reckon you'll get a good price, buddy?"

"Better than carrying money. Bandits can take money, but they wouldn't find it easy taking the horses." Jim had lit a cigarette. "Besides, old Sutter asked me to bring along any colts that were going cheap. He has had a darned thin time. Bad luck he should have been laid up with these rustlers about."

"We're just a couple of wandering punchers?" asked Ben. "Do we stand to get a pay-roll?"

"Sure, if we get the rustlers," Jim laughed. "Old Frank's offered me a thousand bucks to stop this rustling. I'd do it for nothing because he was a real pal to my father in the early days."

"Yeah, so you told me," Ben nodded. "I'm sure eager to get at them rustlers, for I ain't loosed off a gun for months."

"Don't forget to act a bit simple." Jim was grinning from ear to ear. "You oughta be able to do that fine."

"Sure I—here, you're pulling my leg!" growled Ben. "Dang me, but you're a pal! Mighty good thing you ain't a rustler, or—"

"Not so loud," cautioned Jim. "The forests have ears, and we ain't far from the Bar L."

Both Jim and Ben decided that the hacienda of Frank Sutter was a comfortable building, but they were staggered to see women in muslin dresses holding gay sunshades over large hats, children who screamed and yelled, and a number of young men.

"Gosh, old man Sutter's turned his dive into a guest house!" gasped Jim. "Things must be bad for him to go to that length."

They parked the schooner under the trees, hitched the led horses, and then made towards the ranch-house. But sharp eyes had observed their approach, and Harry Winslow stepped through an open french window.

"What do you men want here? We don't want any hoboes."

"So you are—" Jim recovered from his surprise. "Gee, ain't this a welcome! We want to see Mr. Sutter."

"I represent Mr. Sutter. I am the manager." "We heard back at Cross Trails that punchers were wanted," Jim nudged

"I'm running this show!" snarled Winslow. He glanced down at Jim's hand and caught his breath as he saw the ring.

Ben to keep quiet. "We were told that if we spoke to Mr. Sutter he'd take us on the payroll."

"The boss does not want any hands," was the answer. Winslow spoke in a quiet though hoarse voice. "Better beat it before I get the boys to move you." "Searched to try it yourself?" taunted Jim. "Well, we ain't going till we've seen Mr. Sutter."

"It's getting mighty unhealthy for you every second!" snarled Winslow. "For the last time, are you going quietly, or—"

"Here, what is all this noise?" cried a voice. "What's wrong now?"

A wheeled chair appeared, and in it Mr. Frank Sutter. Jim guessed that Winslow had spoken quietly because he did not wish his words to be overheard. Sutter looked up, opened his mouth to say something, and then shut it as Jim slowly rubbed his lips with his fingers.

"You two men want work—is that it?" Frank Sutter peered at Jim and his partner. "I've got sharp ears, Winslow, and I can use them. If these two can work, which is more than some of the hands you've hired, then they can stay. You're here on a month's trial."

Winslow's eyes were narrowed and furtive. "Just as you please, boss." He shrugged his shoulders. "If you take on hands you know nothing about, don't blame me if you get stung." With that he turned his back and left them.

"Jim, Jim, it's glad I am to see you!" The invalid held out both his hands. "What was the idea of the warning? That was Winslow, my manager."

"I've come here to trace those rustlers." Jim was very serious. "I want nobody to know who I am—everybody except yourself and Ben must be a suspect until I know they're innocent." The sound of clattering hoofs made Jim turn. His eyes opened wide—the girl of the car. "Mr. Sutter, who is that girl?" "One of your suspects," chuckled the old man. "That's my daughter Helen; she's just back from college."

Helen jumped lightly from the saddle, ran across the strip of grass, and stopped dead when she saw the two men.

"Helen, I've just taken on two new hands—Jim here and his pal Ben." Sutter smiled proudly at the pretty girl. "Had a nice ride, dear?"

"Sure I have." Helen could not take her eyes off Jim, who was grinning defiantly. "Have you hired these two men, dad?"

"Yes, my dear. But why do you ask?"

"One meets some funny kinda hoboes these days!" Helen snapped out the words. "One can't be too careful."

"We're only on trial, Miss Helen," mocked Jim. "You ride a horse mighty well, though maybe you find a motor-car more to your liking."

"Dad, I'm glad these men mentioned cars, because mine wants a clean." Now it was Helen's turn to smile. "Perhaps they might give the car a wash and polish."

"That's one to her ladyship," whispered Jim to Ben as they watched her stride into the house through the windows.

"High-spirited, Jim," her father smiled proudly. "A little quiet for her here. I'll get you to take her riding in the mornings."

"Thanks, boss! I'd like that if your daughter feels like a morning canter." Jim changed the subject. "It seems sorta queer to me to see you in that chair. Pop used to say that you were the fittest man in Arizona, and yet you're crooked with rheumatics."

"Rheumatics be danged!" raged the old man, shaking his fists. "I don't want Helen to know I've been shot."

November 28th, 1931.

Those rustlers got me six months ago in the hip, and I'll be mighty lucky if I ever walk again. Moreover, I've got to act this way, or else these guests would get scared and beat it."

"So they plugged you," Jim whistled. "Any suspicions?"

"None. Burke, the foreman, has raised several posSES, but he can never pick up the trail. By tens and twenties I'm losing my horses, and unless it stops soon, Jim, I look like being sold up."

Meanwhile, on the other side of the corral away from the ranch-house two men listened eagerly to Harry Winslow. Slinking, dirty and unpleasant fellows were these two men.

"Pete"—Winslow addressed the taller of the two—"I'm going to watch this stranger, and that goes with you two men. You are out mostly with the horses, and I want you to watch out for any sight of the youngster and his comic partner. You, Red"—this was to the burly, unshaven man—"you watch round the hacienda. You're detailed to help the guests, so you've got plenty of chance. The least suspicious thing you report to me."

"Can't we settle 'em and take no chances?" growled Red.

"I think we might have them removed," Winslow grinned evilly. "But I must think of a plan that won't fail. I will talk the matter over in the morning. We might get rid of them before the next run."

"Okay, chief!" Pete caught hold of the fat one's arm. "We'll get acquainted with these two guys right away. Same place, chief?"

"Sure! Now beat it!" hissed Winslow. "Hero comes Miss Helen. She mustn't see us together."

The two men slunk away into one of the barns.

The Rodeo.

NOTHING of any importance happened during the next few days. Jim and Ben were detailed to look after the guests, taking them riding, see they didn't fall off, and generally act like guides. The antics of some of the Easterners caused Ben much mirth.

"Fat Mrs. Gallow riding a hoss is a scream!" laughed Ben.

"Listen here, you long herring!" growled Jim. "If she sees you laughing it'll be reported to Winslow, and that means being fired. So you gotta cut out the mirth and get down to business. So far I haven't located any rustling, but I sure don't like some of the lads that work on this yere ranch."

"You've said it, son," Ben nodded. "Biggest bunch of cut-throats ever, though some of the bunch are good enough. What's this rodeo going to be like to-morrow?"

"Something to amuse the guests," scoffed Jim. "Stunt riding, two races, a broncho-busting competition and some comic stuff."

Once or twice Jim had seen Helen, but she passed him by as if he did not exist. Jim grinned, but he was annoyed because Helen was a fine-looking girl, and she was a grand rider. Jim's nostrils twitched when he saw Winslow. The skunk seemed to be always with the girl.

Winslow had not included either of the new hands for the rodeo, and so our two friends enjoyed the rôle of spectators. They sat on the wooden fence that encircled the corral, chewing straws and watching the fun.

"Pretty punk show," commented Ben. "The best hoss in that first race was that piebald, and it didn't win."

"Did you note Winslow was running a book, and laid that horse at fours. You wanted to back it, but I wouldn't let you."

"Why did you do that?" Ben scratched his head. "I was kinda riled at the time, because I could have sworn that piebald—"

"Yeah, mutton-head, I know it was the best hoss," snorted Jim, "but when I saw Winslow laying those odds I got wise. In my opinion the race was a ramp, and it kinda makes me think."

"So Winslow framed that race." Ben said this slowly, then his old face lit up. "Do you think, Jim, that—"

"Shurrup! Your voice carries!" cautioned Jim. "I don't know anything, but I don't like Mister Harry Winslow. He's too slick for my liking. Look at him now, making bets against anyone sticking on the back of the Killer for two minutes, and knowing darned well none of his bunch intend to stay on."

"Why don't you upset his game?"

"Don't want to get Winslow too riled or he may get wise." Jim removed the straw and pushed his sombrero on to the side of his head. "I did think about it, Ben, but that hoss may be one of those trick horses. Any rate, it's best left alone, and the prize for sticking on for two minutes is only ten bucks. You try, Ben."

"Not me!" Ben was decided. "I had a look at that Killer, and it's a good name."

They watched man after man climb into the wooden box that housed the Killer, get on to the creature's back, and then give the signal for the trap-door in front to be opened. Most of them shot out like rabbits, and within twenty seconds had bitten the dust. A couple of "Sun-fish" bucks, and the cowboy sailed into space. The guests roared with delight, whilst Winslow grinned and took their money.

"Suppose he gives 'em a share of the profits," mumbled Ben. "They earn it. Hallo! Look who's here!"

Jim, who had been watching the antics of the cowboys, turned to his partner. Ben's head gave him the clue to the direction of the latest interest—Helen Sutter, in neat riding costume, flicking a crop against buckskin breeches, was sauntering towards them.

"All set for trouble." Ben spoke out of the corner of his mouth. "I bet she's got some work for us, and it's going to be unpleasant."

Helen paused opposite the two men, looked up, and saw them sitting on top of the corral fence.

"Not riding?" Helen's eyes were speculative.

"Nope!" Ben answered.

"Neither of you?"

"No, lady," Jim smiled. "We're just watching the fun."

"I'm surprised you're not trying to ride the Killer," said the girl. "Don't prizes mean everything?"

"Meaning?" Jim did not like her tone.

"Father was telling me that you had quite a reputation in Montana—or so you'd told him!" Helen saw the last bit had gone home. "I should have thought riding a brone like the Killer would have been too easy."

"Are you suggesting that I haven't got the courage to ride this Killer?" Jim's voice was sharp. "Is that what you mean, Miss Helen?"

"I'm really not in the least interested," was the lofty answer, and Helen made to move off.

"Miss Helen"—Jim climbed down from the fence and stayed the girl by a firm grip on her arm—"I'm going to make this my interest even if you aren't interested. I'll wager I'll stay on longer than some of these other hombies."

"No man has ever ridden the Killer." Helen stared at Jim with mocking gaze. "What can you expect to do?" "I'll ride the horse if it's the last thing I do!" Jim swung round on his pal. "Ben, try and get ten bucks wagering with Mr. Winslow against my riding."

It seemed as if no one else wanted to have a try at riding the Killer. Winslow was shouting about odds of ten to one against. A surprise when Ben appeared and wanted to back Jim for ten dollars.

"Weston hasn't entered," cried the wily Winslow. "But I'll take the bet all the same."

Jim had a foresight that it was going to be a difficult ride, and that made the blood tingle. He would show this girl he was not a coward. Up the side of the fence box that corralled the Killer climbed Jim, and in a second he was in the saddle. Someone fired a gun, and as the front of the box opened the horse shot forward.

But if the guests expected to see another puncher bite the dust, they were mistaken. They saw a horse that seemed to twist into all shapes, go up in the air and land on all four hoofs, rear high in an attempt to fall on the rider, and fly round the corral trying to smash the leg of the rider against the wooden stakes of the fence. Never had they seen such an arched or venomous creature as this horse. The women shuddered as the foam-flecked animal came near them, and they saw the gleaming teeth and fiery eyes.

Everyone expected Jim to be flung from the Killer's back, but the boy seemed to anticipate every move of the fierce creature. He appeared to be modelled to the horse, and never once did he ever look like being thrown. It was a marvellous and almost effortless ride, and only once did Jim ever resort to brute force. That was when the Killer tried to fall back on him, and a cut over the head was necessary. Soon it was apparent that the black stallion had had enough and was tiring.

Two mounted cowboys, who were acting as judges, rode forward and lined up on each side.

"You win, buddy," cried one. "That was grand riding."

"Thanks," laughed the boy, and leaped lightly to the ground.

On the same spot of the fence sat Ben, who was grinning from ear to ear and holding up a wad of notes.

Jim climbed up beside him, but the grin became immense when once more Helen Sutter approached the two friends.

Helen did not know her own mind. She was glad that Jim Weston had ridden the Killer, and yet angry that he should have done the trick so easily. She felt humiliated, and therefore inclined to be angry.

"The Killer must have been tired, but you rode him well," was her grudging concession.

"Thanks, Miss Helen," Jim winked at Ben. "But I'll guarantee that though that boss is tired there isn't a soul here that could stay on his back as long as I did. Don't think I'm talking big, but I learnt riding in a hard school, where it meant life to keep in the saddle."

"So you think no one could ride the Killer?"

"I'll wager anyone five bucks."

"That bet's taken."

coolly answered the girl. "I know someone who can stay as long as you did."

"She must mean Winslow," muttered Ben, chewing at his straw and staring after the girl's trim figure. "I'll go shares in that bet, buddy."

"Shurrup!" Jim was clutching the rails. "I wish I hadn't bragged about my riding."

His fears were realised a minute later when he saw the Killer shoot once more into the corral, with Helen Sutter on the creature's back.

Helen was a marvellous rider, but however good a rider may be, it requires iron wrists to manage a wild broncho, especially when that bronco sees a chance of getting its own back for a recent humiliation.

Jim was off that rail like a flash, and running towards the hitching-rail and his own horse.

Failing to throw the girl, the Killer tried to crush her legs against the rails, and one of the judges hurriedly whispered to the other. They swung open the corral gates. If the Killer headed for the open country, there might be less chance of the girl being hurt.

The horse flashed away like a streak, and in a cloud of dust vanished down a canyon amongst the trees, and as Winslow yelled to his men, Jim went after the girl as if his life depended on it.

Helen's wrists began to give out. She could not check the mad creature. Already her head had just missed a low bough, and all the strength seemed to be going from her body.

The thud, thud of hoofs behind her, and she turned in the saddle.

"Jim! Jim!"

No answer from the boy save an urging of his horse to greater speed. The animal responded gallantly, and Jim surged alongside as Helen swayed in the saddle. His strong arms caught her and swept her on to the pommel of his own saddle.

Panting and scbbing she clung to him, and Jim held her very close.

"You're a mighty brave kid," whispered the boy. "Gee, you can ride a horse!"

Slowly she raised her face and looked into the serious blue eyes.

"Thank you, Jim, for saving me. I've been a little fool."

"A brave and darned nice fool," boldly answered Jim.

The sweet mouth was close to his own. He kissed her.

"Oh, you brute!" was her answer but Jim knew it was not meant.

Fired.

A FEW days later Winslow got his chance to "remove" Weston.

When Jim brought off his spectacular rescue of Helen, and Winslow saw the admiration in the girl's eyes, he determined that it was time to act. Moreover, he was suspicious of Jim: because the latter was camping out at nights. Old man Sutter had explained that Jim had volunteered to act as a night guard. The manager had a few words with the cook.

The result was that Jim one night took out doped coffee, drank it, and fell into a sleep of stupor. Pete then rode up, and from his pocket produced a bottle of whisky, which he poured into Jim's mug, and also smeared the face of his victim.

Next day, Jim was taken before Sutter on a charge of sleeping whilst on duty and being drunk.

Triumph gleamed in the cunning eyes of Harry Winslow as he watched Frank Sutter demand an explanation. Helen was also present, and so was Ben. The horrified expression in the girl's face almost made the villain chuckle. So well had Winslow talked to Sutter that the boss was convinced that Jim had fallen for strong drink.

"It was a frame-up," cried Jim, whose head was still buzzing painfully from the dope. "I hate the stuff."

"You were found soaked in liquor," shouted Sutter. "Your kit has been searched and we've found four more bottles. It's a clear case. You're fired!"

Jim decided that little use would be gained by arguing, though he was determined to prove his innocence.

Jim was forced back over the table.

"Okay with me." Jim paused by Helen. "When I said it was a frame-up I meant it, and I'm coming back to prove it. Good-bye."

Jim had a few minutes alone with Ben.

"Look after my spare saddle, hide it, and keep yer eyes skinned," he whispered. "If you want to get in touch with me, drop a note in the hollow of that old tree—the one struck by lightning. When you get a chance, search it for one from me. I want you to run me down a lot and give it as your opinion I've hit the trail south—they nusta't suspect you. Now I must be off, and keep a watch over Helen."

"Leave it to me, pard." Ben gripped his partner's hand in a horny fist. "By gar, I'd like to neck-tie Winslow and his skunks!"

"That may come later. 'Bye for the present." A nod and Jim had gone. From a window Helen watched him ride away, and then was angry with herself for crying.

Except for the stigma on his name, Jim did not mind about being fired, because now he could devote all his time to watching out for the rustlers. The previous night, whilst he lay doped, twenty valuable horses had vanished, and he swore to search every valley and canyon till he found them. Already he knew the country, but where those horses had gone was a mystery.

It was in the early hours of the morning that Pate first helped Jim. He had camped for the night near a sheer granite cliff, which at some time had been used for quarrying stone. It was honeycombed with tunnels, and he decided that they might be worth exploring to find out where they led. The sound of voices disturbed him, and he cautiously peered round the rock behind which he had been sleeping.

Winslow, Pete and Red!

"Now that meddler's gone we can get busy," Winslow was saying. "To-night we're holding a masquerade ball. I've got costumes for ourselves. Nearly all the boys will be there, as the women will want to dance. I'll talk to you there about our plans. You boys see to your side of the scheme."

"Okay, chief!" Pete rubbed his hands. "Reckon we oughta make a final clean-up and beat it before the old fool gets wise to our game."

"I aim to do that. That Weston fellow was a spy," answered Winslow. "You've seen no sign of him?"

"Followed his trail out into the prairie and there lost it," cried Red. "He's cleared out—a yeller cur."

"I wish I thought that," answered Winslow.

Jim cursed his bad luck—his foot loosened a small stone and instantly the three men swung round and saw him. Before they could draw their guns Jim had dived back to cover behind the rock. Behind another rock was his horse, and he did not waste any time in getting to saddle. Guns got busy as Jim broke cover, but the fire of the crooks was poor and the light bad.

Jim soon realised that his horse was a speedier creature than the mounts of the pursuit, and he slowed as a daring plan was forming in his head. Could he put over a daring bluff?

Winslow yelled encouragement to Pete and Red. They were gaining on their man. Nearer and nearer they drew. Jim made for higher ground and his horse seemed to be lame. Several times he turned and fired wildly. "We've got him," exulted Winslow, and urged his horse forward.

Jim was riding along the rim of a gulch when the three men got within range and opened fire. Jim swayed in the saddle, and when they fired again the reins slipped from his hands and he crashed to the ground. For a moment or so the figure twisted on the very edge and then rolled over in a cloud of dust and loosened stones. The fall was broken by a bush and lay lodged, with hands sprawling into space.

The three men dismounted and stared down at the still figure.

"That's settled him," growled Winslow. "Best leave him for a day or two, maybe the vultures will help us out. Come on, let's beat it."

But when the villains had rode away Jim came back to life, stood up and shook the dust from his clothing.

"I'm not settled yet, Mister Winslow," he cried. "That bluff worked. Soon I'm going to settle our account."

The Masquerade.

IT was the evening of the masquerade. In an empty stable crouched Jim Weston.

"Pete and Red, here are your costumes," Winslow was giving instructions. "You two are supposed to be riding range, but disguised, the Sutters will think you're guests from neighbouring ranches. My plans are not quite definite yet, but I shall be certain during the evening, so watch out for my sign. If the worst comes to the worst, we might make a clean-up of the guests."

"I'm with you, chief," cried Pete.

"We must see how things plan out," Winslow answered. "Here are the costumes. Don't let anyone see you changing. Red, you had better change in my room; Pete, you had better stay here for a spell, then dress and join us later. I want someone to watch for any trouble."

"Trouble?"

"Always wise to have a watch-dog," laughed the crook. "Better come with me, Red."

How Jim chuckled when Pete chose the empty stable as a changing room. A sack descended over the unfortunate rascal's head, steel-like fingers gripped his throat, and when he recovered his senses he was bound hand and foot. Little did he guess that a man wearing his monk's costume was at that moment joining in the revels.

Jim was received by Helen. How he longed to reveal his identity! The girl looked pale, and Jim wondered if she had been crying. Lest she should recognise his voice he spoke no word, just bowed, keeping the cowl of the monk's hood well over his face. Another thing in his favour was the wearing of masks.

Jim soon recognised Winslow, who was wearing the costume of a Spanish matador, and when the crook talked to a Chinese mandarin, he guessed the latter to be Red. He was also suspicious of a pierrot, who badly needed a shave. Was this another one of the gang?

An hour went by and Jim was alert for any sign from Winslow. Once he danced with Helen, who was strangely silent. Was she grieving for him? How would she act if Winslow told her that he was dead?

But Jim was alert when Winslow made a beckoning movement with his head, and directly the dance stopped he strolled towards the matador. His sharp eyes saw the mandarin and the pierrot hovering close by. Winslow nodded to the three men, and, opening a door, went into a small lounge, which was deserted.

Winslow did not waste time.

"To-night we're having the final show-down," he announced. "We've got the best of Sutter's horses, and we'll take the whole lot across the border in the night. We shall, naturally, take that bunch of colts Sutter has corralled down in Timber Creek. I've taken a good look at the folk here, and I don't think they're worth troubling about. The time is now ten, so let's make the hour eleven."

"We'd better get the word down to the boys," cried the mandarin.

"They've got White Cloud on the job."

"White Cloud?" What did Red mean by that? Jim was puzzled.

"Will you be coming with us, chief?" asked the pierrot.

"Later; I've got a job here." The matador grinned evilly. "I'm aiming to take someone with us over the border."

"You mean Miss Helen?" asked Red. Jim forgot his caution. These skunks should not get Helen.

"What's the idea?" His voice was hoarse. "A girl will bring every sheriff in the States on our trail." In his agitation he laid his hand on Winslow's sleeve.

The crook-manager scowled.

"I'm running this show," he snarled. "You take my orders or pay the consequences. I—" He glanced down at Jim's hand and caught his breath. Pete had calloused hands and did not own a ring. What did this mean?

"All right, have it your own way," Jim withdrew his hand. "You know the game best. What's the next move?"

"Back to the dance for ten minutes and then to your posts." Winslow's eyes had narrowed. "Best get going, Pete. It won't do to all swarm back in a bunch."

Jim was glad of the excuse to get away, but directly the door had closed Winslow turned to the other two.

"You perishing fools!" His face was livid with rage. "That wasn't Pete—that was Weston. I noted a small ring on his hand and, what's more, the hand he laid on my sleeve wasn't anything like that of our Pete. He's roped Pete and bluffed us."

"But we left Weston for dead!" gasped Red.

"Well, he's come back to life again," raged Winslow. "And we've got to act quick."

"Why didn't you shoot him, chief?"

"And have all the bunch down on us," was the jeering answer. "And how do I know he doesn't park a gun under that costume? One movement to draw and I get it. We'd best get outside, find Pete and see what Weston is planning."

The clatter of hoofs showed them that Weston had ridden into the night.

"The moon is showing over the trees, soon it will be almost as light as day," cried Winslow. "You guys have got to trail Weston, and you must get him. If you can't overtake him warn the boys to stand by for a change of plans; we may have to fight our way out of this mess." He clapped his hands together. "We've got the sheriff at the Masquerade—by gar, that's an idea."

"Are you crazy, chief?"

"I'll get him to raise a posse among the guests," Winslow spoke almost to himself. "I'll make out that Weston is the rustler, and if we can catch him disguised as a monk it will look bad against him. He cau swear it's a lie, but who can support him bar that old fool Ben? Guess we'd better settle

(Continued on page 25.)

Thrills, mystery and suspense in an exciting story of the Secret Service, starring Alice Day and John Holland.

"The LADY from NOWHERE"

The Mysterious Shot.

CRACK!
John Conroy's rather stern brows drew together abruptly, and he involuntarily turned his head listening.

There was no mistaking that sharp noise, like a large piece of brittle wood being snapped suddenly. It was a revolver shot!

Cautiously Conroy left the mirror, where he had been standing tying his tie, and crossed to the door of his room. There was a puzzled look on his face. This hotel in which he lived was one of the quietest in the city, and the last thing he would have expected was the sound of firearms.

He had two rooms on the third floor, one leading into the other. The inner room—the one he now occupied—was the bed-room, and to get from there to the landing he had to pass through his living-room.

He opened the door slowly, and almost simultaneously a girl rushed from the landing into the living-room. She paused abruptly at the sight of him.

"Oh!" she exclaimed in alarm.
Conroy studied her closely, and noted that she looked pale and distraught, as though in fear of her life. He became tense, realising that he had stumbled upon some mystery.

"Where did you come from?" he asked quickly.

She ran across the room and gripped his arm in panic.

"Don't let them get me!" she cried.
"I don't understand. What's the trouble?"

"I was on the landing outside delivering a package for my employer, Mr. Barstow," she explained. "Suddenly I heard footsteps behind me, and turned to find a horrible-looking man coming towards me with a life-preserver in his hand. I was scared. I pulled a revolver from my handbag and fired."

She covered her face with her hands and started to tremble.

"It all happened so quickly," she went on breathlessly. "I didn't realise what I was doing. Please—please help me!"

Conroy looked at her thoughtfully for a moment, then went across to the door leading to the hall and locked it. He returned to her side, and on his face was an expression of frank puzzlement.

"I still don't understand," he said.
"Why were you carrying a gun?"

"I have to. Mr. Barstow insists upon it. He is a stockbroker, and most of the packages I carry are worth thousands of pounds."

Conroy opened his mouth to ask another question, when noises from the landing made him stop. A crowd of people had gathered from adjoining rooms, disturbed by the shot, and Conroy could hear the voice of the hotel detective ordering them to stand back.

"Did you hit the man you fired at?" Conroy asked quickly.

"I don't know. I didn't see."

Someone knocked. Conroy caught the girl by the shoulders and thrust her towards the bed-room.

"In there quickly," he said. "I'll see to the folks outside, and you can finish your explanations afterwards."

"Oh, thank you!"

"Don't stop to thank anybody. Hide!"

She vanished into the other room as the knock was repeated, and Conroy crossed to the outer door. He unlocked it and threw it open.

The hotel detective was standing outside, but there was no sign now of the aggressive manner in which he had been heard speaking to the others.

"Sorry to trouble you, Mr. Conroy," he said in a respectful manner, "but a girl took a shot at someone and disappeared down this end of the landing. Did she come in here?"

Conroy smiled disarmingly.
"She couldn't have done," he replied.
"I've only just got up, and the door was locked from the inside until I opened it a moment ago. Anybody hurt?"

"No, sir. Whoever it was she fired at must have run like blazes, because there's no sign of him." He scratched his head, puzzled. "It's a funny business."

"Well, I'm afraid I can't help you," said Conroy.

"All right, sir. Good-morning!"
"Good-morning!"

Conroy closed the door again and silently locked it. Then he turned eagerly towards the bed-room, wondering what strange chance had thrown the lovely but mysterious intruder across his path.

"It's all right now," he said, entering the bed-room, and stopped abruptly. It was empty!

A hurried glance round showed him what had happened. The bottom of the window was wide open, and the curtains were flapping in the morning breeze. She had taken advantage of his conversation with the hotel detective to make good her escape.

"Fool!" he said angrily to himself, and started for the window. But he never reached it. As he passed his dressing-table he caught sight of a sheet of paper that had not been there before, and on it was scrawled the words:

"If you will call at 225, Elmore Drive, I will explain.—MARION DALE."

"Phew!" he muttered as he read the enigmatic message a second time. "I wonder what the game is?"

Barstow.

MEANWHILE, a taxi was racing away from Conroy's hotel towards another part of the city, and in it was the girl who had signed herself "Marion Dale."

She was looking worried, hating herself for what had just happened. Somehow the memory of Conroy and his willingness to help her affected her more deeply than she cared to admit even to herself.

As the taxi swept on she closed her grey eyes and surrendered herself to her thoughts about him. She liked his handsome but stern face, with its suggestion of grim humour when faced with a difficult problem, and she liked, too, his fearless eyes that had never once wavered from her face while she was telling him about the shooting. In spite of their directness, they had betrayed admiration, and the admiration had been for her.

A thrill of pleasure ran through her veins at the thought.

She was roused from her reverie by the hiss of brakes, and saw that she had arrived at her destination. She alighted quickly, paid the driver, and mounted the steps of the large, stone-fronted house which had been her home for the last four months.

In answer to her summons the door was opened by a tall, stooping man whose black hair lay in a tangled mass over his broad forehead, and whose dark, crafty eyes were turned into pin-points by the thick-lensed spectacles that rested crookedly upon the bridge of his nose.

Involuntarily, at the sight of him, she shrank back; then, as if by an effort, she pulled herself together again, and forced herself to speak normally.

"Thank you, Rigo," she said. "Is Mr. Barstow in yet?"

"He is in the study," Rigo replied, and the slight guttural slur in his voice proclaimed him to be a German.

Marion hurried past him as though glad to be beyond his reach. She crossed a wide hall, and entered a room on the far side where, seated at his desk, was the man she had mentioned as her employer.

He looked up from his papers as she came in, and nodded a curt greeting.

"Well?" he demanded.

"Everything happened as you planned," she replied. "I fired the shot outside his door, told him that I had been followed, and left him a note when I got away." She spoke wearily, as though she hated what she had done.

"Good!" said Barstow briefly. "And you think he will call?"

She shrugged her shoulders.

"Perhaps—and perhaps not," she said. "He did not look a fool."

She stood before him, regarding him speculatively, tapping with her foot on the floor. She noted for the hundredth time his hard, cruel expression, and his grossness, barely concealed by an outward suavity.

Suddenly she turned and flung herself into a chair, every nerve tingling.

"I'm tired of this mystery," she cried unsteadily, as though she had reached the limit of her endurance. "I'm tired, too, of being here, working for you. If you want a man like Mr. Conroy to come here, why don't you write to him, or go and ask him yourself? Why do you have to resort to trickery, and drag me into it?"

Barstow rose to his feet, swift anger on his face. He brought down his fist on the top of his desk with a crash.

"How dare you question me!" he shouted. Then, just as quickly as his anger had arisen, so it died again. "Forgive me," he went on suavely, "I forgot myself! You see, I do not like being asked for explanations. They are not necessary. All you have to do is to obey me without discussion, and we shall always remain the best of friends."

November 25th, 1931.

She stood up also, so that she could face him.

"I do not want us to remain friends," she cried passionately. "I want you to let me go!"

He smiled.

"Apparently you forget," he said softly. "You don't seem to realise that I helped your father to get away when the police were after him, and that even now I could tell them his hiding-place."

She dropped back into her chair helplessly, every drop of colour draining from her face.

He looked down at her, and from the change that came over his features, it was obvious that a new idea had come into his mind.

"I suppose," he said quietly, "you don't happen to be falling in love with this man Conroy, do you?"

She started. His question had taken her unawares.

"I—why—I—of course not!" she finished indignantly.

"Well, don't," he said, his voice hard and metallic. "You will only let yourself in for a grave disappointment otherwise. You see, he is rather in my way at the moment, and—well, perhaps there is no need for me to explain too fully."

She stared at him in horror. A dull red—like blood—seemed to shine from his eyes.

Quickly she rose and hurried from the room.

At Headquarters.

BACK in his hotel, Conroy finished his dressing thoughtfully. His mind was occupied by the mysterious Marion Dale. Who was she? Why had she appealed to him for help, only to disappear?

He knotted his tie, and straightened it to his satisfaction, turning over these questions in his mind. If he found any answers, no sign showed on his face as he donned his waistcoat and jacket and buttoned them.

Finally he went to the telephone, and called a number. Within a few seconds he heard a voice say:

"Yes? Who is it?"

"Conroy."

"Come right over," the voice continued. "It's urgent. How long will you be?"

"Ten minutes."

Conroy hung up, and returned to his dressing-table. He opened one of the drawers and took from it a .38 automatic. With a deft jerk of his fingers, he flung back the breech to assure himself that it was loaded, then dropped it into his breast-pocket.

Nonchalantly he left his rooms and walked slowly down the stairway to the street. Casual passers-by noticed nothing extraordinary about him, yet behind his calm eyes, which seemed to be darting everywhere, was an alertness which showed him to be in readiness for any contingency which might arise.

His appearance on the steps of the hotel was the signal for a taxi to move off from a near-by rank and slide to the kerb. He descended to it slowly, and opened the door.

"Drop me one street away from headquarters," he said in an undertone; and then, in his ordinary voice: "The Astor Hotel."

"Yes, sir," said the short, broad-shouldered driver.

Conroy got into the vehicle and sat down. The driver let in the gears, and the taxi moved off. As it joined the traffic-stream, Conroy moved his head so that it was close to a small microphone let into the side of the cab.

"Anybody around, Jones?" he asked.

"Yes," replied the driver, speaking without turning his head, and with hardly any lip movements. "That old guy who calls himself Colonel Snowden was in the hall of your place early this morning, and when he came out he spoke to Millic, who was standing in front of the jewellery shop three doors down. Also, a girl went from the third floor to the street down the back fire-ladder. Foster told me about that."

"H'm! Did he recognise her?"

"No. Never seen her before."

"Right! Thanks!"

The cab drew up just beyond a corner, and Conroy alighted. He gave the driver some money, and received some change. Then, as the cab drove away, he sauntered across the pavement and into a newspaper shop.

Nobody stopped him. Nobody, not even the proprietor of this shop, seemed even aware of his existence. He merely walked through to the back of the premises, out into the yard, through two small doors, and into a grey stone building by its side entrance.

A minute later John Conroy, secret service agent, stood before the desk of his chief.

A Conference.

D R. LANSEN, local commissioner of the International Secret Service, an organisation maintained by every civilised country in the world for the stamping-out of international crime, was speaking at the telephone as Conroy entered. He motioned Conroy to a chair.

"I know that, sir," he said into the transmitter, and his tone sounded harassed. "We'll do all we can to put a stop to it. I'm putting my best man on the job. Yes, I'll report in a week. Good-bye!"

He hung up the receiver, and sank back in his chair. His grey eyes, which had the appearance of being sunken because of his protruding forehead, were troubled.

"Conroy," he said earnestly, "I've got to hand over one of the biggest jobs that this department has handled for years. You know that counterfeit money is being circulated, don't you?"

"It always is," replied Conroy. "But the police keep it in check fairly well."

"Do they?" The chief leaned forward and picked up a sheet of paper from his desk. "I was just speaking over the telephone to the Treasury Minister, and he tells me that unauthorised notes to the value of two hundred thousand pounds are in circulation. Banks are sending them in for clearance from all over the world—Europe, America, and even from far-off Japan. What's more, every kind of note is being forged—Bank of England, United States Treasury, Bank of France, and others." He slid the sheet of paper across the desk. "Here's the classified list. You can see for yourself."

Conroy picked it up, and uttered a low whistle. It was indeed as the chief had said. From the evidence before him, a vast organisation was in existence which was defrauding the whole world.

"We've got a certain amount of information to start with," the chief continued, and from the way he ran his fingers through his iron-grey hair Conroy could tell that he was perturbed. "The brains of this organisation are here, in this city!"

Conroy leaned forward eagerly.

"How do you know?" he asked.

"I have been making inquiries amongst manufacturers of chemicals, and I find that quantities of aniline dyes, picked white rags, photographic equipment and so on, have been delivered by various routes to the house of a certain stockbroker."

"A stockbroker?" exclaimed Conroy suddenly.

"Yes. Why?" The chief looked at him curiously.

"Oh, nothing. What's his name?"

"Barstow. He lives at 225, Elmore Drive."

Conroy relaxed in his chair, a far-away look in his eyes and nodded pensively. Into his mind flashed the vision of Marion Dale.

So she wanted him to go to 225, Elmore Drive for an explanation, did she? A trap. Well, well!

The thought began to trouble him. Somehow he could not associate the girl he had seen with anything crooked, and he was a fairly shrewd judge of human nature. Yet there were the facts. She had started that scare in his hotel only that morning, and had left a note which was obviously intended to lead him into the clutches of a criminal gang.

It was some moments before he spoke. When he did he rose to his feet.

"All the documents concerning the matter are in the office outside, I suppose?" he said.

"Yes."

"All right. I'll look them over and get to work."

He made for the door, but before he reached it the voice of his chief halted him.

"I know you won't mind my giving you a personal hint." The chief spoke kindly. "In your last case you very nearly came to grief because of your disinclination to think badly of a pretty woman. This time—"

Conroy grinned.

"I know," he said. "Be a Secret Service man first, and a human being afterwards. That's why you're married, with three children. So-long!"

He got out of the office before the chief could say anything in reply to that. It was better so.

On The Track.

HE regained the street again by the same devious route, a faint smile upon his lips, and stood upon the kerb with the idea of checking up his surroundings. For a week or more past now he had been wondering why he was being watched by the two unskilful individuals known as Col. Snowden and Millie, and at last he knew. They had both been mixed up with counterfeiting before, and apparently they were associated with this latest organisation.

As he stood there a woman dressed in a long fur coat and a hat that partly concealed her face drew up close to him, as though waiting for an opportunity to cross the road. She stepped off the kerb, and as she did so she dropped a small leather money wallet.

"Pardon me," said Conroy, and stooped to pick it up.

As he straightened himself he looked up, and to his sensitive ears came the sound of a muffled click. His quiet eyes detected a fold of the woman's fur coat hastily concealing something which glistened in the sunlight, and he immediately recognised it as a small lens.

He held out the money-wallet and smiled courteously.

"You dropped this," he said quietly.

The woman uttered an exclamation of surprise and took it.

"Oh, thank you," she said gratefully.

"I don't know what I should have done if I had lost it. It's all I have in the world."

Conroy nodded pleasantly as she moved off, but the moment her back was turned he dived his hand into his pocket and produced a cigarette-case. He extracted a cigarette and tapped it a number of times on the polished side of the case, and at the same moment a stocky taxi-driver across the way let in his clutch, his quarry being the woman in the fur coat.

Conroy turned away, his eyes still active, and detected a bowed, white-haired man leave a cigarette shop opposite and wander aimlessly up the street. It was Col. Snowden.

Conroy did some quick thinking. He realised that every move he made was being watched by unseen eyes; but he also realised that in a crowded thoroughfare he was as safe as though he were behind a foot of armour-plating.

Casually he wandered across the road and into the tobacco shop, certain that it was used for the purpose of watching headquarters. He produced a note for a large sum.

"Twenty Camels, please," he said to the man on the other side of the counter.

The man served him and looked with disfavour upon the large note that Conroy had dropped.

"Haven't you got anything smaller?" he asked gruffly.

"No," replied Conroy.

The man opened his till and raised the spring holding down a pile of smaller notes. He carefully lifted off the top ones and began to pull out some from underneath.

Conroy's hand shot across the counter and gripped the tobacconist's wrist.

"Why not the ones on the top?" he asked casually. "Is it because you know me?"

With his free hand he picked up all the notes the tobacconist had and examined them, at the same time keeping the tobacconist under observation. Finally he put them down.

"Don't bother to reach for your gun," he said quietly. "I can get to mine before you can open that drawer you've got under the counter."

Before the astounded tobacconist could reply, Conroy picked up his own money and walked out of the shop.

That night in the security of his guarded hotel he sent an enigmatic message to his chief. It ran:

"It won't be long now!"

After which he settled down to wait for his unseen enemies to make the next move.

An Arrest.

IN spite of his customary cheerfulness Conroy woke the next morning feeling slightly troubled. Before going to sleep he had spent many hours turning over the problem of the counterfeiters in his mind, and he had been painfully conscious that he had only the slenderest of facts upon which to work.

For instance, although the man Barstow was under suspicion, nothing had occurred to connect him definitely with the international frauds, hence Conroy's ruse to let the other side act first. It was the only way to get to grips with whoever was at the head of the gang.

Again, his thoughts about Marion were strangely mixed. Since he had first met her the feeling that she was not really crooked had recurred time and time again in his mind. Who was she, and why had she acted in such a strange way the previous day?

Conroy's hand shot across the counter and gripped the tobacconist's wrist.

His reverie was interrupted by a knock on his door. He had then just finished dressing.

"Come in," he called, and as one of the maids entered to tidy up he added: "Oh, it's you!"

He was about to turn away when something familiar about her face attracted him. His eyes narrowed momentarily, then he grinned to himself.

"I don't think I've seen you before," he remarked.

"No, sir," replied the maid. "Bessie, who generally does this floor, is away to-day, so I'm doing this one and the one above."

"I see," said Conroy.

He went over to his jacket which was hanging on the back of a chair and took one or two official documents from the inside pocket. He glanced at them for a moment, then replaced them and went into the living-room, apparently to make a telephone call.

He shut the door behind him and listened with his ear close to the panels. What he heard broadened the grin on his face, for it was the sound of the bottom of the window being gently raised.

He did not hurry. Not until the window was lowered again did he re-enter the bed-room.

He went straight across to the chair and felt in his pocket. The papers were gone!

Calmly he went to the connecting doorway and stood barring any possible exit.

"Well, Millie," he said, "it looks as though I've got you at last."

The girl started, and her face turned a shade paler.

"What do you mean? I don't understand," she gasped. "Stand away from that door!"

"Not on your life," said Conroy. "It was you who bumped into me yesterday, and took my photograph while I was picking up your wallet. And now you've stolen some papers that belong to me."

She rounded on him fiercely.

"Prove it!" she challenged.

There was a knock on the door. Conroy opened it, to admit the short, stocky taxi-driver named Jones.

"Ah, so you got her?" said Jones. "I was keeping tabs on your window, knowing that she had entered the hotel early. She dropped these to a newsboy. I had him arrested." He held out the papers that Conroy had lost.

Conroy took them, and turned to Millie.

"Well?"

"Oh, all right," she said resignedly.

"You win. But somebody's going to get you for this, Conroy." She took a step nearer to him, her face livid with hate. "When you arrest me you sign your own death warrant."

Conroy smiled.

"Surely not," he said quietly. "Barstow might be a crook, but he'd hardly go as far as murder."

"Barstow! Then you know—" She stopped suddenly and bit her lip.

Conroy exchanged glances with Jones, but gave no sign to Millie that he had heard.

"Wouldn't you like to tell me all about it, Millie?" he said persuasively. "This will be so much easier for you if you do. For instance, I'm not the November 28th, 1931.

first man whose photograph has been taken with that pocket camera of yours. Who did you give the negative to, and how many copies were made for distribution to the gang?"

"I don't know what you're talking about," said Millie obstinately.

"No?" Conroy thought for a minute, then tried a new line. "Then tell me what Marion Dale is doing with your mob? She's no crook, if I'm any judge."

Millie looked at him sharply. She had detected the faintest signs of eagerness in his voice.

"So little Marion interests you, eh?" she said spitefully. "Well, if you think she's better than the rest of us, follow her at twelve o'clock to-day, and you'll see for yourself."

Conroy made a sign, and Jones grabbed her by the arms and handed her over to a couple of policemen waiting outside. When he returned, he found Conroy standing by the window, looking out over the roof-tops with troubled eyes.

"Well," he said cheerfully, "that gives you a line on the job anyway, boss. Millie's dropped Barstow right in the soup."

Conroy did not reply at once. He still stood at the window. Suddenly, without looking round, he spoke.

"Jones, have a spare watch put on Number 225, Elmoro Drive," he said. "And pick me up here at ten minutes to twelve."

Jones nodded and went out. Meanwhile Conroy went on thinking, and his thoughts were not pleasant. They were of Marion Dale.

Apparently he had forgotten his chief's warning about not believing the worst of pretty women!

At Dexter Avenue.

At exactly five minutes to twelve, Jones' taxi drew unobtrusively into the kerb a short distance away from Barstow's house. Jones himself was at the wheel, while Conroy sat in the back.

As the vehicle came to a halt, Conroy spoke into the microphone.

"Who did you detail for the job?" he asked.

"The flower-woman," replied Jones. "She has just given the signal that nothing has happened yet."

Conroy glanced up the street and saw an old woman standing against a wall, a large flower basket slung from her shoulders by a strap. Even as he looked he saw a car pull up outside Barstow's house, and at the same moment Marion came out and walked down the path towards it.

The flower woman, as though scenting a customer, hurried forward, and reached the side of the car at the same time that Marion did. Apparently Marion did not want flowers, for Conroy saw her shake her head and turn away to give the address she wanted to the driver.

The car moved off, and the flower-woman shambled down the street. She approached the taxi, holding out a bunch of carnations.

"Carnations for your buttonhole, sir?" she said loudly; and then, under her breath: "15, Dexter Avenue."

Jones leaned over the side of his driving seat.

"Get to blazes out of here!" he said for all the street to hear. "I'm not going to have people like you worrying my customers. Get going!"

He slammed in his gears and started down the street so suddenly that he almost threw the woman to the ground. It was all part of his plan,

Ho did not hurry, but took an indirect route to the address the flower-woman had given, taking care that he was not being followed.

He drew up before a stucco building in a cheaper neighbourhood eventually. It looked like an ordinary lodging-house or a large family residence that had been converted into flats.

Conroy alighted and went up the front steps, leaving Jones to wait. He tried the front door and found that it was open. Quickly he passed inside.

He found himself in a small hallway. Several doors opened out of it, and at the far end was the beginning of some stairs. Over the whole place hung the musty smell of stale cooking.

Conroy decided that no one who was carrying on the dangerous activities of a crook would be likely to have a room on the ground floor, so he felt that he could safely ignore the lower doors. Whoever it was that Marion had come to see was living a floor or two up at the back of the house, where the fire escape could be reached easily.

Conroy mounted the stairs slowly, stopping every now and then to listen for the sound of voices. On the first landing he drew blank. Only one room was occupied, apparently by two old people who were in the first stages of a domestic quarrel.

He mounted the second flight, and as he reached the top stair a door ahead of him opened and closed suddenly. Marion Dale stood facing him.

"Oh!" she exclaimed. "You!"

She looked confused, and glanced back at the door in embarrassment. Conroy advanced to her side grimly.

"Been visiting?" he asked.

"No—er—yes—" she stammered.

Conroy reached past her and grasped the handle of the door. He was about to turn it when she gripped his wrist desperately.

"Please—please don't go in there!" she begged.

"Why not?" He watched her narrowly, convinced now that she was one of the gang.

"Because—oh, I can't explain." She spoke almost in a whisper, just loud enough for Conroy to hear. "If I tell you anything they might—"

She stopped suddenly. Out of the corner of her eye she caught sight of two men standing behind Conroy at the head of the stairs. One of them was Rigo!

Her mind moving like lightning, she released Conroy's wrist.

"All right, then. Go in," she said.

Conroy, not seeing the others, thrust the door open, and found himself in a dingy room, furnished mainly with old chairs and a table. Sitting in an armchair by the window was a man.

Conroy's eyes narrowed. He looked from the man to Marion, and his expression was stern.

"I see," he said quietly. "Just a friendly visit, eh?"

Marion knew what he meant—that she was in love with this unshaven, unkempt individual in the armchair. A denial rose to her lips, but she checked it, hoping to gain time. Rigo was outside, and she knew that if the German and Conroy came face to face, Conroy might be in danger. She remembered Barstow's words: "He is rather in my way at the moment." Already she was beginning to suspect Barstow's true business, yet she could say nothing, for the sake of her father.

"Yes, just a friendly visit," she replied at last, loudly enough for Rigo outside to hear. "Also, I had to bring him something from my employer."

Conroy's eyes flickered over her face searchingly.

"What?" he asked.

"A packet of bonds."

"H'm!" On Conroy's face was a frank expression of disbelief. "Show them to me."

At this point the man in the chair started to his feet and went towards Conroy angrily.

"Look here, you," he said, "what's the idea of bursting into my room like this? Who are you, anyway?" He stopped, waiting for Conroy to reply, but Conroy said nothing. "If you want information I'll give it to you. She came here to see me, and that story of hers about a packet of bonds is all hoodlum, see? So if you're jealous and think I'm trying to pinch your girl, go away and think that over!"

Conroy still said nothing. His face was as inscrutable as a mask, but in his eyes as he looked at Marion was nothing but contempt.

Suddenly he turned, and before Marion could stop him he had left the room. He crossed the now empty landing and hurried down the stairs and out of the building.

Meanwhile, Rigo and his confederate were watching from a place of hiding. The latter drew an ugly automatic pistol and took aim at Conroy's receding back.

Rigo knocked his arm aside quickly. "Fool!" he hissed. "Do you want the whole of the city police about our ears?" A crafty look came over his face. "We will return to Mr. Barstow. I have an idea—a great idea—that should rid of us of this Conroy for ever. Come!"

The Trap.

CONROY returned to his hotel at once. He wanted time to think. Whichever way he looked at it, Marion seemed to be one of the crooks, her thinly-veiled attempt to cover herself having failed. Conroy, not knowing the true facts of the case—that she was forced to silence by the hold Barstow had over her father, and that she had tried to save Conroy from danger—could only think that she was in league with Barstow.

He wondered what he ought to do next. He realised what his duty was. When he finally landed the gang of international counterfeiters into his net she should be amongst them; yet somehow he could not bring himself to do it. He loved her.

That admission, even in the secrecy of his soul, seemed absurd, he knew; but he had lived long enough to realise that falling in love is one of those things that are not governed by reason. He had met her but twice, and on both occasions he had suspected her of complicity—yet following those two brief occasions he found himself thinking of her more than he had ever thought of any woman before.

For hours he paced the floor of his rooms grappling with his problem and getting no nearer to a solution. He did not notice the passing of time, with the result that when, at five o'clock, someone knocked, he uttered an exclamation of surprise upon glancing at the clock.

"Come in!" he called.

A page entered carrying a card on a salver.

"Gentleman to see you, sir." said the page.

Conroy picked up the card, and saw neatly engraved upon it—"Col. C. T. Snowden."

"Show him up," he said calmly.

The page departed, and Conroy smiled quietly to himself as he whipped out his pistol and examined it to see that the safety catch was off. So his idea of making the gang seek him was working, eh? He smiled grimly to himself.

The door opened again as Conroy thrust his weapon out of sight, and a white-haired old man with a benevolent expression and stooping shoulders entered. He greeted Conroy rather shamefacedly, and sat thankfully on the proffered chair.

"Mr. Conroy, I fear the reason for my visit is a little strange," he began at once. "Of course, you do not know me?"

"I'm afraid I don't," replied Conroy politely, realising that the old man was not aware of what the secret service really did know.

"Then I would like to ask you one question first, Mr. Conroy," the old man went on. "When one has been engaged in criminal activities, is it not a fact that one's sentence is much lighter if one offers assistance to the police?"

"I believe it is," replied Conroy.

"But I don't see what this has to do with me. I am nothing to do with the police—"

The old man raised his hand.

"We need not hide our identities from each other," he said, "because some time ago I fell upon bad ways, I was compelled to sell my services to a gang of criminals who have been engaged upon the nefarious business of counterfeiting, and it is known that you are operating against that gang. That is known to every one of us, as you can see."

He produced a slip of pasteboard, which he laid on the table before him. Conroy picked it up and saw that it was his photograph—the one Millie had taken. Conroy felt that he had to admire the organisation which could pay attention to such details.

"Well?" he said non-committally.

The old man cleared his throat awkwardly, and appeared to hesitate. Then he blurted out:

"Will you arrange for me to go free if I tell you how to bring that gang to book?"

Conroy did not reply at once. He frankly regarded the whole business as a trap, and yet it was so well done that he could easily believe it was genuine.

"That is a question I can't decide," he said at length. "My chief is the only one who can help you there. But I can say this—if I succeed in rounding up the gang upon your information, anything I recommend is almost sure to be done."

The old man appeared quite satisfied.

"Then I will be quite open with you,"

he said. "It is common knowledge that you visited No. 15, Dexter Avenue, this morning. Well, to-night at eleven the gang is meeting there. If you will accompany me I can show you a hiding-place from which you will hear everything, who is behind the gang, where the notes are made, and the addresses of all our distributing centres. Will you come?"

Conroy looked at the old man shrewdly and considered the point. Suddenly he turned and reached for the phone.

"Taxi, please!" he called.

The old man leaned back in his chair contentedly, a smirk of satisfaction upon his face. But the smirk suddenly vanished when the round face and short, wiry body of Jones appeared in the doorway.

"Jones," said Conroy, "take this gentleman to headquarters and lock him up in the largest cell you can find. Others will be joining him later."

The old man rose protestingly.

"My dear sir—" he began.

"And also tell the chief to send a few men to No. 15, Dexter Avenue, at eleven to-night, in case I want them."

Conroy, not seeing Rigo and his companion, thrust the door open.

Jones nodded briefly and clamped two large hands upon the old man's shoulders. He made a few deft passes, and a large revolver clattered to the floor.

"Naughty, naughty!" said Jones playfully. "A little boy like you shouldn't carry such dangerous things. Kim on!"

Conroy laughed and reached for his hat as Jones escorted his prisoner out of the room.

Rigo.

AT ten o'clock that night, Conroy was sitting against a chimney-stack on the roof of No. 15, Dexter Avenue, a pair of headphones over his ears. At his feet was a leather case carrying an amplifier and a battery.

He smiled quietly to himself as he thought of the sham colonel's ruse to trap him, and speculated upon what was due to happen. He could only guess that the gang intended to kill him in some way.

Fortunately, upon his arrival in the building earlier in the evening, he had found the back room on the second floor empty, its occupant having, apparently, gone to a theatre or something. Only a few brief minutes had sufficed to enable him to hide a tiny microphone behind a picture, and run his wires up the stairway to the roof.

Ten-fifteen struck—ten-thirty! Suddenly he stiffened. In the headphones he could hear the unmistakable footfalls of someone in the room below. They seemed to wander round the place for a few minutes, then a guttural voice uttered an exclamation of satisfaction and a chair creaked.

For another fifteen minutes there was silence again.

Suddenly more footsteps were heard—lighter ones this time. The noise of a door opening and shutting came over the wire clearly—then voices.

"Rigo! What are you going to do?" It was Marion!

Rigo laughed harshly.

"I am waiting for the clever Mr. Conroy," he replied. "I am watching for him to come through that door, and when he does this weapon will finish him. No noise and no fuss. It is fitted with a Maxim silencer, and no one will be disturbed." He chuckled. "That is good, eh?"

"But you can't do a thing like that," said Marion, and there was no mistaking the anxiety in her voice. "In fact," she lied, "Mr. Barstow told me to come here and send you back."

A silence followed that was so long that Conroy felt a strange tingling up and down his spine. What was happening? He strained himself to catch the slightest sound for a few minutes, and was just about to leave the roof and go below to see, when Rigo spoke again.

"I do not believe you," he said deliberately. "We have suspected you for a long time. We believe you to be in love with this man Conroy. Is that not so?"

There was another pause.

"Ah, I can see that it is," Rigo went on. "So you would be a traitor to our cause, eh? Very well, then—"

He broke off suddenly, and Marion gasped. For a moment Conroy feared something had happened to her; but the next moment he knew the reason for the sudden silence. Someone was coming up the stairs towards the second landing. Conroy could hear his footfalls distinctly, and none of them was to know that they were the footfalls of one of the other lodgers.

November 28th, 1931.

Our Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

"Now!" muttered Rigo in a low voice.

A scream almost shattered Conroy's ear-drums. Marion seemed to take two quick steps across the room, and a scuffle followed.

"Mr. Conroy!" she cried. "Go away quickly, while you're safe! They're going to kill you!"

Conroy did not stop to hear more. He threw down the headphones and ran to the side of the roof. His face set and his fists clenched, he ran down the fire-escape and burst through the window.

He found Marion and Rigo locked in a death-grip in the middle of the room. Rigo, his eyes blazing, was trying to turn the hand that held the pistol so that he could bring the muzzle against Marion's body, and Marion, terror-stricken, hung on to his wrist with both hands to prevent him.

Conroy hurled himself across the room, and sent his fist crashing to the side of the German's head. Rigo let up a cry and staggered backwards. The movement forced Marion to let go of him, and he raised his hand and took quick aim at Conroy.

Conroy ducked low as the weapon crashed out and charged. He caught the German round the waist, lifted him high and flung him across the room.

He leapt to follow, and landed squarely upon Rigo's back. Rigo stumbled forward and fell face downwards, Conroy on top.

The pistol had gone wide. Conroy gripped Rigo's wrist and brought his arm behind his back.

"Get that gun, Miss Dale," he said curtly.

"Let me go!" shouted Rigo madly. "I'll kill you!"

Conroy put pressure on the German's wrist, forcing it up towards his shoulders.

"Who sent you here to finish me?" he demanded.

"I won't tell you. Let me go!"

Conroy forced the German's arm a little higher.

"Come on now. Who was it?"

Beads of sweat began to appear on Rigo's brow, and his face was white with pain. He gritted his teeth as Conroy increased the pressure still more.

Suddenly he broke down. He had reached the limit of human endurance. "I'll tell you—I'll tell you!" he shrieked. "It was Barstow."

Conroy eased his grip slightly.

"Go on," he said. "Is Barstow the forger?"

"I don't know what you mean—Ah!" Rigo winced as Conroy reminded him to speak the truth. "Barstow financed us. I made the notes, and the rest of the gang helped to get rid of them. He—"

"All right," Conroy broke in. "I've heard enough." He looked up and found Marion watching anxiously. His features relaxed into a smile. "Well, what's your confession?" he asked gently.

She stared back at him with frightened eyes.

"I knew nothing about this forgery business," she said earnestly, and it was obvious to Conroy that she was speaking the truth. "Mr. Barstow made me go messages for him, and he told me that the parcels I took were packages of bonds. He tricked me into helping him. He's got a hold over my father."

Conroy dug his knee hard into the small of Rigo's back.

"Is that true?" he asked.

(Continued on page 28.)

"The TRIANGLE MURDER"

A gripping story of blackmail and a mysterious menace.

Mr. Fleming Gets a Shock.

THE career of George Christopher Fleming was as variegated, as colourful and as interesting as that of most American men who have risen to great heights from the lowest rung of the ladder. He had enemies—as which successful man has not?—he had found himself up against stupendous interests that seemed determined to crush him. And he had emerged powerful, assured, firm in his conviction that his financial strength was impregnable.

The story of his origin was as romantic as could well be imagined. In one of his expansive moments he assured a gathering of friends, assembled in his lovely seaside residence not far from Atlantic City, that he had entered the ranks of wage-earners at ten years of age, had drifted somehow from city to city, often getting more kicks than ha'pence, but gradually completing his education in the exacting university of Life.

"I was kicked about from pillar to post," he said, and as he talked the music of a negro band, playing noisily in his conservatory, sounded oddly as he sketched his early history. "Yes, from pillar to post," he repeated somewhat dreamily. "I have plumbed the depths, and I have tasted the pleasures of riches, and having tasted them I'll squeeze the uttermost joy out of life.

"The secret of success?" He repeated the inquiry of a zealous auditor. "Just two words—fear nothing." And then it dawned upon Fleming that possibly he had said too much. For he realised that there were chapters in his early life that might with advantage remain closed for all time. So with a deftness that did him credit, he turned the conversation into other channels, but his "fear nothing" motto was not lost upon those of his friends who had listened to their host with uncommon interest.

Such men as Fleming are the target of the blackmailer; they batten upon shady incidents in the lives of their victims, count upon the unwillingness of successful men to have their weaknesses displayed to the world. Fleming was no exception. But they threatened him in vain. He treated their demands with contempt, met their assurances of imminent exposure with the calm injunction to "get ahead," and knew in his heart that they had discovered him to be a tough proposition.

Now and again his morning mail contained a missive that administered just a momentary shock, a veiled or lurid threat to disclose to the world at least one of the methods that had enabled him to attain to, and to maintain, his present eminence. Invariably he would apply a match to such letters, watch their gradual crumbling into ash with the grimmest of smiles. Then he would return to his routine and thrust the destroyed letter from his mind.

New York has its legions who live by their wits alone; who exist by preying upon the fears and the secrets of their fellow men. Mr. Fleming was determined that such easy living should not be made possible at his expense; and not even his confidential secretary, from whom few of his activities were hidden, was made aware of the extraordinary letters that came in his employer's mail.

Mr. Fleming was destined to discover, however, that his imperturbability was not quite shock-proof. In its contents, in the strange manner of its arrival, the "Triangle" letter undermined the invariable self-assurance of this financial colossus.

Going to his study desk one early evening, he was amazed to find pinned to the blotting-pad by means of a dagger a brief note to the following effect:

"You have not deposited the 15,000 dollars as demanded in our two former notes. Look out! Death to you at 11 to-night!"

The note was "signed" with a triangle!

This was "Black Hand" blackmail with a vengeance! The kind of thing one reads of in the lurid novel, or smiled at on the movies. To encounter it in real life, to see the glistening blade of the dagger thrust into the clean pinkness of his blotting-pad—surely he must be dreaming! But there it was, a grim, solid reality, the last of a series of similar notes that had reached him through the post—notes which he had destroyed without giving them a second thought.

And now that it had been brought so very close to him, as gingerly he withdrew the glistening blade from the pad, this Triangle business was, he mused, something more than a mere practical joke. Come to think of it, the Triangle had created something of a sensation in the city. They had carried out their threats in the past, bringing death or ruin whenever they had indicated their intention of doing so. His thoughts dwelled gloomily upon their sinister record, wondered vaguely what could be the nature of an organisation so highly efficient as to be able to deliver its message with such cool effrontery.

Up and down, up and down he paced his study, angered at having been trapped so nearly, wondering who could possibly be at the bottom of it all. Which of his many secrets did the Triangle have possession of? Fleming edged his brains. That there were many who owed him a grudge he was very well aware. That there were scores who would gladly do him harm was evident.

If his Atlantic City guests could have seen him then, treading the soft carpet of his study like a caged and angry panther, they might have taken his "fear nothing" motto with a considerable grain of salt.

With a frown Fleming thrust the note from him as if the missive were red-hot, then summoned the butler.

"Perkins, do you know of anybody having entered this room recently?"

"Only the maid, sir, to do the dusting," replied the butler.

"Have you admitted anybody at all during the last hour or so?" snapped out Fleming.

"Not a soul, sir. There have been no callers whatever."

"Then perhaps you can tell me—"

Fleming evidently decided that the less the butler knew the better, and, dismissing the man, telephoned the police. The time had come to take definite action. Here, in his very home, almost under his nose, the blackmailers had struck! Things were coming to a fine pass when a man's private sanctum could be invaded effectively and unseen. Yes, that was it, unseen!

Ill at ease, still restlessly pacing to and fro, Fleming impatiently awaited the arrival of the police for whom he had telephoned a little while before. He greeted the three plain-clothes men cordially, bade them be seated, and handed their chief, Detective Thompson, the ominous message.

Thompson regarded the letter with undisguised interest, dusted it carefully with a fine black powder in the hope of discovering a useful fingerprint. But the bearer of the message, with the shrewdness of his tribe, had worn a glove.

"Let's have a look at the knife," he said. Here, too, no sign of fingerprint, nothing individual either about the dagger itself; it seemed just one of those nondescript weapons that can be picked up for a few pence in any riverside junk shop.

Fleming explained how and when the message was discovered, and the seeming impossibility of the note being placed on his desk by anyone outside his household.

"To accuse my own people of having engineered this theatrical threat is ridiculous. My servants have been with me for years, and as for it being, as I was at first inclined to believe, a practical joke—well, gentlemen, it seems rather too grim in its contents," he said.

"I was undecided at first whether I should call you," he added, "but on second thoughts this note contains so definite a threat that I felt it better to get on to you straight away. How does it strike you, gentlemen?"

Their spokesman studied the printed lettering of the message, then remarked:

"I wonder if you realise, Mr. Fleming, that the hand that penned this message is the same hand that was responsible for the blackmailing demands in the Kellogg case?"

"Is that so?" replied Fleming, and his eyes became anxious, for the Kellogg case was still fresh in the crime records of the city. Kellogg, a banker, ornament of his community, and held in particular esteem in the town, had been driven to suicide through the outrageous demands of the Triangle gang. What secrets they had discovered in Kellogg's life was never to be known. But it was proved that the self-destruction of this eminent and well-liked personality was traceable to the demands of the powerful Triangle. A half-burned message provided the clue, a clue that it was found impossible to follow.

"There was the Jagger case, also," continued Detective Thompson. "Here, too, the methods indicated the Triangle gang. They pressed Jagger for money, pressed him to such an extent that he was induced to forge his wife's name to a power of attorney authorising him to take over her securities. The discovery of the forgery and the resultant disclosures that were bound to follow drove Jagger to suicide. We were unable to lay the gang by the heels. But I'm in hopes that, with this definite warning, we're going to have better luck this time.

"Now, let's get down to facts," suggested the chief. "We know that these blackmailers are really desperate characters. We know they are killers of the very worst type. And if, as in this case, they announce their intention of carrying out their threat at eleven o'clock tonight, it is up to us to put a monkey-wrench in their plans.

"We aren't going to take any chances. These human leeches have asked for it—and we'll see that they're going to get what's coming to them. There's a big—very big—score to be settled.

"Of course," added Detective Thompson, "the fact that this is a detached house, and standing in its own grounds, makes it a bit of a job to patrol it effectively. Why, you'll be needing half the police force of the district!" he added with a grim smile. "Still, we'll take every precaution that is humanly possible.

"First of all," he ordered, "every telephone instrument had better be disconnected, with the exception of this one in the study. No chance of wires being cut, no chance of monkey tricks when the 'phone's immediately under our eyes."

The Fatal Hour.

"MICK," said the chief, beckoning to a sturdy plain-clothes policeman, "you are to cover the front door. See that no one enters or leaves the house. Pat, you had better watch the windows of this room from the outside, and keep your weather eye open for anything that seems fishy. They'll come at eleven, will they? Well, they'll get more than they bargain for!"

Fleming, with a smile that seemed to indicate that his fears had been allayed, sat down in his armchair, lit a cigar, and slowly awaited the passing of the hours, with the detective chief for company and a couple of sturdy policemen within ready call. Suddenly Fleming's face became concerned. The sounds of a fierce struggle reached the waiting pair, and the angry voice of Pat was heard exclaiming:

"What on earth are you doing, ferretting round here?"

"Let me alone—let me alone!" came the angry reply. "Take your hands off me, I say!"

A struggling, dishevelled and angry man was hustled into the room.

"I found this bird lurking outside the house, and nabbed him before he did any mischief," said Pat, indicating his prisoner.

"Who are you?" inquired the chief. "Oh, I'm sorry," interposed Fleming, "I should have told you before. He's just an irresponsible brother of mine. He's quite harmless, and keeps us busy watching him. Let him go, please."

"Irresponsible, am I?" said the angry man. "I'll show you!" and was led protesting from the room.

The noise had attracted the attention of the staff, and butler, cook, and the other domestics had arrived on the scene, very frightened.

"I want you all here," commanded the chief to the seared and trembling staff. "There's a chauffeur, too, isn't there?"

"Yes, sir," ventured the butler. "This is his night off. I believe he has gone to town. Otherwise they're all here, sir."

He surveyed the members of his staff with all the assurance of a captain casting an eye over his regiment. There was Ellen, the cook, plump, ruddy of face, wondering what all the business was about, worrying what her favourite policeman would say at her non-appearance that evening. And the little tweenie maid, just back from her nine-pennyworth of romance at the local movies, cheeks flaming at the prospect of a real drama being enacted in the master's study.

A martinet of martinets was Prodson, the butler, and as he counted them by way of assuring himself that, other than the chauffeur, there was no absentee, it was plain to see that there were none among his subordinates who had a spark of affection for him.

So the waiting staff joined their master and the detective, whilst the ticking clock brought the hour of eleven ever closer.

The occasional whirr of the telephone bell, which Detective Thompson answered, shattered the eerie silence. Now and then a swift auto speeded past the closely-guarded house, its occupants unaware of the tense vigil so soon to reach its dramatic conclusion. A cinder dropping into the firegrate seemed to reverberate with a noise akin to thunder.

"Help me!" he moaned. "I—"

It wanted a few minutes to eleven. Now thoroughly aroused, Fleming studied the clock face, as if he would see there the passing of his fears.

A strange, unaccountable noise, a soft rustling that might be the tapping of the branches against the window-pane. It might be that, or—

The little assembly was alert. The detective, hand on his revolver, suddenly stiffened. Time was nearly up. Before many minutes passed the Triangle would be declaring itself, and then— He fingered his revolver lovingly. Still the rustling continued. It was becoming unbearable.

Then a cupboard door opened cautiously, just a fraction of an inch. Still larger grew the opening. The detective cocked his revolver, and amid a silence that could be felt there emerged a tiny kitten, playfully gambolling with a paper bag! The servants fidgeted in relief, the detective gave vent to a mighty yell of laughter at the amusing manner in which the tension had been broken.

And, all unsuspecting, the threat of the Triangle was nearing its fulfilment. Tick-tock, tick-tock! Every revolution of the wheels of the clock sounded to Fleming like a hidden menace—a menace become less fearsome since both within and without this house he enjoyed the sturdy protection of the law. Once more he lit his dead cigar, once more revolved in his mind a list of possible enemies who might have conceived this vile method of torturing him. Police near at hand, servants within sight—what more protection could a man possibly ask for?

Slowly, musically, the ornamented clock on the mantelpiece chimed the hour, and then a voice that came from nowhere uttered the solemn warning:

"ELEVEN O'CLOCK—YOU FAILED US!"

"Where on earth did that come from?" muttered the detective, looking, puzzled, around the apartment.

Fleming now attempted to rise from his chair, seemingly petrified with fright, his face as pale as death itself, a face suddenly grown very old.

"Help me," he moaned, "I—I—"
Then, staggering to his feet towards the detective, he fell half-way, collapsing on the floor in a heap.

"Father! Father!" cried his daughter Marjorie, who had just returned from a visit to her friends. "Speak to me!"

But Fleming was beyond speech, and a kindly maid led her away, sobbing.

"Unconscious through fright," commented Detective Thompson as he loosened Fleming's garments, chafed his hands, applied every means at his command to bring about his return to consciousness.

"Prodson," he commanded, "get a move on! Bring some water, then ring at once for Mr. Fleming's doctor."

But after a few moments the detective realised that no power on earth could help Fleming now.

The seemingly impossible had happened, after all! The Triangle had carried out its threat under the very nose of the police, ostensibly sent to protect Fleming, but powerless to lift a finger to save him from death in its most amazing form.

The detective flew to the window.
"Pat! Mick! Hurry in here at once!"

Then, taking up the 'phone, he called police headquarters.

"Detective Thompson speaking. Send some men at once over to Fleming's and notify the coroner. Seems to me as if the Triangle blackmailers have found another victim. Yes, but hurry."

The Voice in the Air Once Again!

NOW then, boys," began Detective Thompson, addressing his two subordinates.

But before he could continue that cool and deliberate voice from nowhere broke in upon his message:

"THOMPSON, YOU'RE NEXT—AT ELEVEN THIRTY-FIVE!"

An astonished detective looked around the department, with a shade of something more than anxiety in his eyes.

"I'm not superstitious," he rapped out, "but there's something like the supernatural at work here.

"Boys," he added, in a voice that was unusually agitated, "when that voice spoke out before, Fleming must have dropped dead. We've simply got to locate the speaker. And pretty quick, too!"

Uniformed police and the coroner arrived upon the scene.

"Well, Tom," said the coroner to the detective, "tell us what has happened."

"It's uncanny—more than uncanny. The Triangle gang threatened Mr. Fleming with death at eleven o'clock to-night. Here's their message. As the hour struck, we heard a hidden voice telling him that his time was up, and to the very tick of the clock Mr. Fleming pitched forward, dead, right before our eyes."

EVERY MECCANO BOY IS AN ENGINEER

SEND FOR THIS FREE BOOK TO-DAY

Write to-day for this fine new book. It contains a number of thrilling articles profusely illustrated, describing many famous engineering feats. In addition, the full range of Meccano Outfits is shown, and there are illustrations of many wonderful Meccano models.

We will send you a copy, post free, in return for the names and addresses of three of your chums. Write your own name and address clearly, and add 11 after your name for reference.

HE BUILDS ANYTHING HE WANTS

To-day a Crane that lifts heavy loads with ease—to-morrow a Motor Car chassis, complete with gear box, Ackermann steering and differential gear—the day after a Bridge or a Loom, or a Traction Engine. That is what it means to own Meccano!

The models you build with Meccano are real engineering models in miniature, because they are built with real engineering parts. These parts can be used over and over again to make hundreds of different models.

£500 IN PRIZES

There is no hobby in the world more thrilling than Meccano model-building, but the interest and fascination are increased ten-fold when you are building a model that may win a prize in our grand £500 Competition. Ask your Meccano dealer for an entry form and full particulars.

PRICES OF MECCANO OUTFITS FROM 2/6 TO 450/-

MECCANO

MECCANO LIMITED

(DEPT. 11)

OLD SWAN

LIVERPOOL

"Seems to me to be perfectly simple," was the coroner's matter-of-fact comment. "Fleming was really frightened to death. I've heard of ever so many cases similar in character."

"I don't think so in this instance," was the detective's answer, "although I imagined that to be the case at first. You'll find it's something very much more sinister than mere fright."

"Tell me," asked the sergeant of police, "how many people were in the room at the time Mr. Fleming died?"

"Everybody you see here now," replied the detective, "with the exception of Pat and Mick, who were guarding the outside of the house."

"And no one noticed anything unusual before Mr. Fleming dropped dead?"

"Not a thing."

"How long were you actually in the room before it happened?"

"About an hour and a half."

"And you've never left the room?"

"Not for a moment."

The police-sergeant scratched his head in embarrassment.

"The impossible seems to have happened," was all he could say.

Just as nonplussed was the coroner.

"You know, Thompson, that the poison that killed Fleming must have taken effect instantly. What puzzles me is how that poison could have been administered right under your eyes."

"It would help us a bit, Detective Thompson," suggested the sergeant, "if you could show us just where he was when it happened."

With an "I'll show you," the detective commanded everybody in the room to take up the positions they occupied when the tragedy took place.

The detective seated himself in Mr. Fleming's chair.

"He sat in the chair I am occupying, while we all watched intently. There was absolute silence as the clock struck eleven. I am sure—as sure as I ever have been of anything—that not a person in this room moved at the time. And—"

The detective's remarks were interrupted by the same ominous voice from the air, which reminded him again in solemn tones:

"ELEVEN THIRTY-FIVE!"

With a leap, the detective staggered from the chair, grabbed his neck as if in pain, and yelled.

"Boys, it's in the chair! Something sharp pierced my neck!"

Without an instant's delay the coroner examined the tiny puncture in the neck of the detective, looked concerned, then explained:

"Tom, you're a fortunate fellow. Evidently, whatever pricked you has been rendered ineffective, otherwise you'd be a dead man by now. Come along, we'll take no risks and cauterise it right away."

By now a posse of police in charge of a sergeant had arrived upon the scene, and it needed but a few words to place them in possession of the facts of this strangest of crimes.

"Nothing very supernatural about this," said the stolid sergeant, pointing to the detective's bandaged neck. "Something devilishly ingenious seems indicated."

With one move of his powerful hand he had overturned the chair of death, and in a trice had revealed the power for evil so snugly hidden in its tapestried cover.

"Here you are," he said excitedly, turning to the detective. "See these wires running through the leg of the chair, right down through the floor?"

November 23th, 1931.

The detective, amazement in every feature, beckoned to the butler.

"Come here for a moment. You're familiar with the house. Show us the way to the cellar and help us locate the wires."

The butler hesitated for the merest fraction of a second, but his hesitancy was lost in the momentary excitement of another encounter.

"Say!" yelled the sergeant. "Where are you going to?" This to the gardener, who was attempting to leave.

"Up to my room," was the surly response.

"No you don't! You stay right here!"

With a grunt the man consented, regarding the policeman with eyes that glistened with anger. Mumbling something about "taking orders from a common bobby," he was hustled into the cellar, there to be made use of in the clearing-up of the mystery.

Candle in hand, the butler led the way to the whitewashed basement. His hand trembled so that before long his spotless coat was spattered with grease.

"Nervous?" asked the detective.

"Upset, sir," came the laconic reply. Which was to be understood, for Proddon's service had extended over a number of years, and with dramatic suddenness he had lost a kindly and indulgent master. His face was pale. In his eyes was a look very akin to real terror as the detective surveyed the ingenious manner in which the wires had been run up from the cellar to the chair of death. It was a little masterpiece in its way; the work of a man who knew what he was after, who left nothing to chance.

"Let's see," pondered the detective, "this one must lead to the chair, and the other maybe, had something to do with the microphone. Let's pull one of the wires and see where it leads to. Devilish clever idea. Look at this!"

Hardly were the words out of his mouth when he heard a determined "Ah! Would you?" behind him.

An astonished detective turned round, to discover Mick grabbing the hand of the butler, a hand which held menacingly a long, wicked-looking poisoned needle!

"It's a good thing I came down to the cellar to look around before you fellows," Mick explained, "for this gentleman intended to stick this poisoned needle in your back."

A turn of the wrist that made the butler squirm in agony, then the needle dropped from his nerveless grasp. Realising that the game was up, that complete disclosure was but a matter of minutes, the butler attempted to escape, and being intercepted, showed fight. A well-directed punch from Mick sent him spinning.

"There's another fellow in the cellar here," warned Mick, making quite certain that there was no more fight in the butler.

"Careful now!"

The words were hardly out of his mouth before a figure rose from behind a rampart of boxes and fired deliberately, first at the light, shattering the bulb, then at random, in the hope of wounding at least one of the policemen. Pat, realising where the shot had come from, fired the contents of his revolver in that direction, heard a groan, then the sound of a body falling.

The cellar was in darkness; the candle had either rolled to the floor or had been deliberately extinguished. And here, menacing these representatives of the law, was a bloodthirsty butler, and somewhere a needle whose touch meant death! Which was friend? Which foe?

Silence most profound, except for the heavy breathing of men who seemed to be biding their time. Where was the butler and his death-dealing point? Still insensible?

Then on the stairs came the welcome tread of heavy feet, and, best of all, a glimpse of no less welcome light. The shots had been heard, and by the light of half a dozen candles it was possible to discover the outcome of the scuffle.

"Now then," said Detective Thompson, pulling the butler to his feet. "You'd better tell the whole story. Who's this fellow who tried to shoot us?"

The butler hesitated.

"Maybe," suggested Pat, handling the poisoned needle gingerly, "we'd better try some of his own 'medicine' on him, then he'll speak, sure enough."

The butler made no sign.

"Then give it to him!" The fatal needle was brought nearer to the unhappy man.

"Oh, don't!" pleaded the butler. "I'll tell you everything. We did it," he added.

"Who's we?" persisted the detective.

"The fellow you shot, who was Wilson the chauffeur, Snyder the gardener—"

"You're a liar!" thundered Snyder.

A policeman knocked him down.

"And myself," the butler continued.

"The three of us were the Triangle. We had made a study of perfect crimes, and determined that this was the ideal method of making money. We have had a long—and I may say, successful—inings. We banded together to commit what we thought to be perfect, clueless crimes, in order to secure money."

"We have had a long run," he added, and over his face there spread a malicious smile; "a very long run indeed, and sometimes I have wondered at the luck that has attended us. As for the police—"

"Yes, and what about the police?"

Detective Thompson snorted.

"With all respect, they really haven't seen any farther than their noses."

"Indeed," was all that the detective could say.

"Yes, sir. For ten years the Triangle has had things very much its own way, simply because the crimes were thought out to the very last detail. And details count in crime as in other businesses." The butler seemed to relish his explanation.

"You were responsible for the death of Kellogg?" asked the detective sternly.

"That's what it amounts to, sir."

"And Jagger?"

"Jagger also."

"So you determined to make money out of your employer also?"

"That is so. Mr. Fleming refused every one of our previous demands, so we determined, in the sight of everybody, to show that the Triangle could not be trifled with."

"What was the idea?"

"Simply that when the others saw how effective the Triangle was, they would be more ready to pay up without any question."

"You put a needle in the back of that chair?" queried Detective Thompson.

"Yes, a poisoned needle. We reversed the needle, sharpened the reversed end, and placed poison—a little-known Eastern poison—in the needle's eye."

"You see," he added, with something of the pride of a craftsman in his job, "we were pretty perfect on the mechanical side also, and most of our apparatus was specially made for our purpose. You've no idea of the time and patience the chauffeur devoted to such jobs, the pleasure he derived from

(Continued on page 27.)

"THE GUEST HOUSE."

(Continued from page 14.)

Ben in case he causes trouble. I'll get the sheriff to take his posse to Timber Creek." He leered evilly. "It would be lucky if he found Weston and White Cloud. We've got to get going, so let's get moving. First, we've got to find Pete and lock up old Ben."

The three men hurried towards the corral and the stables.

The Rustler.

THE moonlight showed up the corral and the colts. No sign of any rustlers at Timber Creek. Then from a near-by copse appeared a white shape that came gliding forward to break into a canter—a white stallion.

"Great snakes!" Jim drew in his breath. "White Cloud is a horse. I've seen you before—in Ringling's Circus. Now, how do you figure in this game?"

Jim nearly fell out of the saddle with amazement. With deft teeth White Cloud undid the ropes that secured the gates of the corral, swung them open, and "neighed" a command to the colts. They bounded towards the stallion as if obeying a master.

The youngster dug his heels into the flanks of his own horse and went at a mad gallop towards the corral. The colts were all out of the corral when Jim got there, but the boy did not bother about them. Straight at the white stallion he rode, and twice his pistol spoke a threat. White Cloud was a coward and, deserting the colts, bolted for the woods. Jim swung round and soon was herding the frightened colts back to the corral. The job was just complete when the pounding of many hoofs made him look round.

Winslow, the sheriff, and a posse.

"We've got you covered, Weston," snapped the sheriff. "Better not try to make a break."

"Why should I?" retorted Jim. "You're just in time to learn some news. There was an attempt to rustle these colts, but I got here in time. They were free, but I drove them back."

"Ha, ha, that sounds a good tale," jeered Winslow. "He was about to rustle these colts, sheriff, if we hadn't ridden up—that's the man you want, sheriff."

"That's a lie!" shouted Jim. "Sheriff, the real rustler is a white stallion named White Cloud—a circus horse which has got into the hands of crooks. This stallion lures the colts and mares away and can undo gates and rope knots. This stallion is being used by Winslow."

"What a tale!" shouted the crook. "Sheriff, you can see for yourself he's a rustler. Look at his disguise and realise how we found him; don't forget that only a few days ago he got blind drunk on night work."

"I'll have to arrest you, Weston," cried the sheriff. "The evidence is all against you. You can tell all that nonsense to the judge."

"Oh, no, he don't!" drawled a voice. "Those what calls my buddy names is likely to get shot. Stick 'em high, fellers, and slick."

Grinning like an ape was old Ben. Winslow slid a hand to his belt, and a bullet whined so close that he shot his hands skywards.

"Some guy nobbled me, but he couldn't tie a rope," Ben cackled. "Maybo he was a friend of yours, Winslow. Keep 'em up, sheriff!"

"Good work, Ben?" Jim removed Winslow's guns and then got to horse. "Before the sun rises I'm going to prove I'm innocent, sheriff. I don't advise anyone to move till we're out of range."

With a clatter of hoofs Jim and Ben rode away, leaving a cursing Winslow and a bewildered sheriff.

"You'd better trail them," shouted Winslow. "I must get back to the ranch."

The Secret Canyon.

SCARCE a mile had the partners ridden when both saw a white shadow ahead.

"White Cloud," cried Jim. "Follow!" Through forest and gulch went the white horse until Jim turned to his comrade.

"We've been circling. See, we are quite close to that range with the old quarry mines. Gosh, Ben, that horse is a wily old fellow—he's almost human. He seems to be heading for one of those caves."

To their surprise the horse cantered into one of the largest of the tunnels and vanished. Without hesitation Jim and Ben followed, bending low over the saddle to save knocking their heads. Just when it became so dark they could scarce find the way a small speck appeared ahead. Larger and larger it grew.

"Another valley," whispered Jim. "I believe we're on the trail of the rustlers' hide-out."

Out of the cave and before them a canyon right in the heart of the mountains, everywhere they saw horses grazing on the long grass, but they did not have long to wonder, because an angry shout made them whip round in the saddle. Four tough-looking men were running towards them.

But the rustlers pulled up short as Ben and Jim whipped out guns. One made a motion as if to draw, and instantly a bullet smashed his wrist.

"Keep still, you scum!" growled Ben. "Yeah, and stick your hands high!" drawled Jim.

Whilst Jim kept the rustlers covered old Ben removed the weapons of each man. They were a craven bunch, because all of them looked scared out of their lives.

The sheriff followed the trail to the cave. What a surprise for the posse and himself to see the two they were following holding up four strangers! The sheriff stared around at the horses and at the canyon.

"The secret canyon—and I always thought it was a fable," he mumbled; then turned to the grinning Jim: "Say, kid, what's the tale this time?"

"This is the hide-out of the rustlers, and there's Sutter's horses," was the answer.

"And yonder is the white horse that I told you about—the agent of the rustlers. Do you still think I'm lying? If you do, just listen to what that fellow with the smashed arm has to say."

The sheriff learnt of the treachery and cunning of Winslow, and held out his hand to Jim.

"Guess I made a mistake," he growled. "Wish I could get Winslow."

"That's my job." Jim clenched his teeth. "But if you get back to the ranch some time within the hour you'll find I've got him. So-long, sheriff! Come on, Ben!"

Old man Sutter was still awake. Winslow was telling Helen and Sutter all about the treachery of Jim Weston.

"Weston was the real rustler," cried Winslow. "And it won't be long before we get him."

"Weston's son—and I trusted him." The old man shook his head.

The door opened softly, but Helen heard and swung round. "Jim," she gasped. "Winslow says you're a rustler and—"

"Winslow has never told the truth in his life." Jim turned to the invalid. "All your horses have been found. A white horse did the rustling and Winslow did the rest. The sheriff has got the whole of the bunch in Secret Canyon, whilst Ben is looking after the gentry working this end. I've come to settle with Winslow. You framed me with that dope, you left me for dead in that quarry, and finally you tried to fix me as the rustler. The game's dead."

"Curse you!" Mad with rage, Winslow leaped forward and swung a vicious punch to Jim's face.

Fear and rage lent the scoundrel strength and cunning. He managed to get his arms round Jim, and then his hands crept up to the boy's throat. Jim was forced back over a table, trying with one hand to free the grip from his throat. A violent wriggle and Jim came off the table to crash to the floor. The overturning of the table slightly loosened Winslow's grip, and Jim was able to tear the man's hands away from his throat.

Now they were on their feet. Jim leaped forward and smashed his fist to the big face; a quick twist of the body and he had followed the blow with a right-left to the ribs.

Winslow made several futile rushes, but never again did Jim let the man have a chance to get those arms round him. Tables and chairs went flying. A well-aimed punch sent Winslow flying backwards, to crash full length through the French windows. Jim was standing over him, daring him to rise, when the sheriff arrived.

When Winslow and his bunch had gone and frightened guests told they could go back to bed, Jim talked to old man Sutter and Helen.

"I want a new manager. How about it, son?"

"Oh, Jim, please stay!" begged Helen, and, of course, there was no further argument.

(By permission of the Gaumont Film Company, starring Rex Lease and Dorothy Gulliver.)

KEEP YOUR BOYS AT HOME!

32 Free Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

A Riley Billiard Table provides an attraction that makes it simple. There's hours of pleasure for the boys and all the family with a Riley "Home" Billiard Table. The 6 ft. size is delivered on first deposit of 13/3d., balance by monthly instalments. Cash Price £11 15s. 7 days' Free Trial allowed to test the table, and Riley's pay carriage and take transit risks Riley's "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables are also offered on easy terms. Send for Free Art List containing sizes and prices of all tables. Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Great Britain.

E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
Howard Works, Accrington, and Dept. 35,
147, Aldersgate Street London, E.C.1.
November 28th, 1931.

"THE LADY FROM NOWHERE."

(Continued from page 20.)

"Yes—quite true," gasped the German. "She didn't know anything." Conroy looked up at Marion again. "Will you do something for me?" "Willingly," she cried eagerly. "What is it?" "Go downstairs to the street, and see if you can find a short, ape-like taxi-driver by the name of Jones. Tell him to come right up. As usual, the police are late, and I want him to mind this bird while I go after the great Barstow himself."

She sped from the room, and Conroy took a fresh grip on Rigo.

The Room Upstairs.

BECAUSE Jones was watching Rigo, and Conroy was compelled to take an ordinary taxi, it was a full half an hour before he eventually reached Barstow's house. He found it in darkness, except for a light in the library window.

He entered the grounds cautiously, wondering what had happened to Marion. He had not seen her since he had sent her to get Jones.

Keeping to the shrubbery, he approached the house, and eventually climbed on to the balcony under the library window. The sound of voices came from inside, and he listened. One of the voices was Marion's!

"You can't go, and make me face the music alone," she was saying. "You can't, I tell you. You've got to do something about it."

Conroy raised himself so that he could look into the room, and saw that Barstow was hastily stuffing the contents of his desk into a bag. Marion was standing close to him, her face desperate.

"Then why not come with me, Marion?" said Barstow. "I shall have plenty of money. We could go to Europe, where we could be married—"

Conroy listened thunderstruck, bereft of the power to move. So she had betrayed him, after all! She had come back to Barstow to warn him to get away!

"Perhaps I would, if—" She paused.

"If what?" asked Barstow, pausing in his packing.

"If you would promise to leave my father alone."

Barstow laughed. "Forget that," he said easily. "There's no harm in telling you now, but your father never was to blame. Were he arrested, the police would never get a conviction. He worked for me the same as you did." He suddenly broke off, remembering the need for haste. "But we can talk about that later. There is no time to lose."

Marion looked about her desperately, and Conroy was puzzled by the expression on her face. Suddenly he saw the whole thing. She was trying to delay Barstow! She was playing for time! Also, she had cleared her father!

Sudden movement inside the room made him pay attention to what was going on. Marion, seeing a revolver lying on the desk close to her hand, had snatched it up, and was pointing it at Barstow's head.

"You're going to stay here, Mr. Barstow," she said, and her voice rang out clearly.

Barstow looked up startled. Suddenly he swept up a walking stick that was against the chair beside him and lashed out at Marion's wrist. Marion let out a cry of agony, and he weapon dropped from her nerveless fingers.

Barstow made to leap at her, and at that moment Conroy sprang through the window.

"Lay a hand on her," he shouted, "and I'll kill you."

Barstow heard the voice, and checked himself for the merest fraction of a second. Then he rushed across the room, and out into the hall.

Conroy raced after him, and was just in time to see him vanish into a room upstairs. He took the stairs two at a time, and flung himself at the closed door through which Barstow had passed.

The crack of an automatic greeted him as he charged into a bed-room, dragging out his own gun as he ran. He felt something ping past his head. Almost in the same moment there was a second report, and something which felt like a hammer smashed into the bony framework of his left shoulder.

The impact sent him spinning round, and he realised in the split second that followed that if Barstow got in a third shot it would be the end.

(Continued on page 28.)

The 1931-32 Hornby Book of Trains

Better even than last year! Read how our railway track has developed from crude rails laid on stone sleepers; how the modern passenger coach has grown from an open truck! Other articles tell about the special features of the four British groups. Page after page of fascinating information, and every page illustrated! All the splendid Hornby Locomotives, Rolling Stock and Accessories are depicted in full colour. There are details and prices of every item in the Hornby System.

You must have this book! It can be obtained for 3d. from your dealer, or post free from Meccano Ltd. for 4½d. in stamps.

ONE HUNDRED AND EIGHTY FEET ON ONE WINDING

Hornby Clockwork Locomotives are the longest running locomotives in the world. In a recent test a Hornby No. 1 Locomotive, running light, covered the amazing distance of 182 ft. on one winding! This wonderful performance could only be accomplished by a Hornby! You will realise how perfect these famous trains are when you have a Hornby Railway of your own.

All Hornby Trains have been improved this year. They are now more than ever the leaders—supreme in their strength and reliability, supreme in their realism and efficiency, supreme in their finish and durability. They are incomparable!

This must be a Hornby Christmas for every boy who is keen on model trains! If you do not yet possess a Hornby Railway now is the time to start. Get a copy of the Hornby Book of Trains described here and make your choice now. If you prefer to have an ordinary price list, you may obtain a copy of catalogue No. 6 from your dealer, free of charge, or direct from Meccano Ltd., price 1d. Write to Department K.

HORNBY TRAINS

BRITISH AND GUARANTEED

PRICES OF HORNBY TRAINS FROM 5/- UPWARDS

MECCANO LIMITED
(Dept. K), OLD SWAN,
LIVERPOOL.

Safety Valve and Whistle

Dummy Axleboxes and springs

Pullman Car "Iolanthe"

Lattice Girder Bridge

Detachable Headlamps

Outside Cylinders

True-to-type L.N.E.R. Locomotive "Yorkshire"

"THE TRIANGLE MURDER."

(Continued from page 24.)

the making of unusual gadgets to serve our ends."

"Seems to me," commented the detective gruffly, "that you fellows have missed your rightful job. With your ideas and enterprise you might, had you directed them into proper channels, have done pretty well for yourselves."

"Well, sir," was the reply, in which humility and reproof were evidently mingled, "we haven't done so badly to date."

"That's as maybe," Detective Thompson returned. "But, after all, what good has it brought you, now? You've got much to answer for, not only as regards this case, but the others."

The butler snivelled. "And these things worked the devilish apparatus?" suggested the detective, pointing to the tangle of wires overhead.

The butler nodded.

"Well, you almost got me," he growled.

"Yes, sir," mused the butler sadly. "That was our undoing. The chauffeur went too far, although there wasn't enough poison then left in the needle to do you injury."

The detective rubbed his bandaged neck.

"Is that so?" was all he could say.

Then, almost as an afterthought, Detective Thompson inquired: "And what about the voice that came from the air?"

"That, sir, was a loud-speaker concealed in the wall behind a thin layer of plaster."

Justice was meted out to the members of the Triangle, and the exemplary sentences passed on them brought a sigh of relief to a city that had suffered so long from their devilish ingenuity. Each member of the gang was discovered to have amassed a fortune as a result of this levying of inhuman tribute, fortunes which net one of them was destined to enjoy, for documents and other means enabled the money to be returned to the sources whence it originally came.

The Triangle and its reign of terror has been forgotten now. But Detective Thompson—now enjoying well-earned retirement—will never forget it. For he has a scar on his neck that will remain as long as he lives. "A treasured souvenir," he calls it.

(By permission of the Ideal Film Co., Ltd.)

"DANGER ISLAND."

(Continued from page 8.)

him, to stare in awed amazement at the mass of struggling men.

"Ben, what are they doing?" gasped Bonnie. "What happened—what are they fighting for? Has everybody on this ship gone mad?"

Arnold answered her briefly. He told her the partial truth, but so twisted the explanation to suit himself that it became a deliberate lie.

"Drake refused to obey my orders," he said. "He wanted to sail for the mainland when he heard the island was dangerous."

Bonnie looked at Arnold incredulously, and then turned her glance towards the stern of the vessel, where Bull and Harry were now battling toe-to-toe.

"On, no!" she cried. "I can't—I won't believe it! Anyway, we've got to stop this fight!"

She started forward, but Arnold seized her and dragged her back. He had no desire to see the hostile parties separated, for, though there seemed small likelihood of it at the moment, there was always a slim chance that Bull and his hirelings might turn out to be the victors.

"Bonnie, come here!" jerked Arnold. "You can't do anything!"

"Ben's right, dear," her uncle interposed. "Stay where you are. You might get hurt if you try to interfere."

Bonnie remained with the two men, but continued to gaze aft, watching Harry and Bull Black as they hammered each other furiously.

The mate was taking heavy punishment, and Harry drove him to the very prow of the ship, where he whipped home a shattering punch that flung Bull to the deck. The mutinous scoundrel rose again, and hit out at the younger man savagely. But two out of every three of his blows went astray, for the Englishman was quick and lithe, and the speed of his footwork, together with the dexterity of his fists, more than counterbalanced the advantage of Bull's gross bulk.

He gradually broke the mate's attack and carried the fight to him, raining punches from every angle. Bull began to show a decidedly lop-sided list under the effects of the battering, and he was in a sorry plight when Harry danced into him with the intention of putting him down for the count.

It was then that an accident occurred which changed the course of events. For, in stepping close to Bull, Harry tripped in a coil of rope and fell his length.

By the time he had disentangled himself and climbed to his feet Bull Black had recovered to some extent, and before Harry could put himself on the defensive the mate scored with a right to the chin.

Harry staggered, and his assailant followed up his success with another blow. The Englishman swayed on his heels, and as he was tottering Bull summoned all his remaining strength and sent his fist crashing into his unprotected jaw.

Harry pitched backward with arms wide-spread, tumbled over the side of the ship and plunged headlong into the sea. He struck the water with a splash and disappeared below the surface.

Bonnie gave vent to a sharp cry and ran to the stern, followed by her uncle and Ben Arnold. At the same time the sailors stopped fighting and crowded to the side.

Harry Drake's head rose into view. The mate's last blow had dazed him, and he could do little more than make a feeble attempt to tread water. It was clear that he would not be able to keep himself afloat for long.

"He's drowning!" Bonnie gasped. "Can't any of you do something? Can't any one give a—"

And then she stopped. Some distance astern a dark object had broken the surface. It was a sinister fin, and a stab of horror turned Bonnie sick and faint. Then she saw another and another cleave the water, and caught a glimpse of an evil head and a slit of a mouth with teeth like a saw.

"Sharks!" she screamed. "The sea's full of them!"

The hungry killers of the deep closed swiftly in, silent, ghostly shapes gliding under the surface to challenge one another for their human prey.

(Don't miss the second episode of this grand new serial next week. By permission of the Universal Films, Ltd., starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Browne.)

DON'T MISS THESE GRAND FILM NOVELS.

Evelyn Brent, Frank Albertson and Constance Cummings

in "TRAVELLING HUSBANDS."

A young salesman meets a pretty girl and through poverty determines to forget her—but the sound of a struggle and a girl's terrified cry leads to him changing his decision.

"BORN TO LOVE."

The tragic story of a courageous woman's sacrifice in order to give her child a name. Starring Constance Bennett, Paul Cavanagh and Joel McCrea.

"THREE GIRLS LOST."

A pretty gold-digger becomes involved with a gangster and drags an innocent young man into the meshes of the law. A brave girl fights for his life. Starring Loretta Young, John Wayne and Joan Marsh.

Complete in this week's issue of our splendid companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY Price 2d.

Place a regular order with your Newsagent and avoid disappointment.

November 25th, 1931.

"THE LADY FROM NOWHERE."
(Continued from page 26.)

Steeling himself against the awful weakness which gripped his senses, he raised his weapon and pulled the trigger. The kick of the shot sent him tottering backwards.

He fired again, hardly seeing what he was aiming at, and heard a painful coughing from somewhere in front. Then the world seemed to slip away, and he felt himself falling—falling—

Consciousness returned to him within a very few minutes, and he became aware that something warm was upon his lips. He opened his eyes, to find himself looking into the face of Marion.

"Barstow—" he muttered weakly. "He's dead," she replied. "But you—are you badly hurt?"

"Oh, I'm all right!" he replied contentedly, and closed his eyes in the peaceful knowledge that Marion's arms were round him, and that his head was against her shoulder. "I'll say I am!"

He was taken to hospital, and it was a month before he was able to visit headquarters again. When he did, his chief welcomed him warmly.

"We cleaned up the whole gang," the chief said. "Your capture of Barstow brought to light the names and addresses of all the distributing centres, and every crook concerned with it is now behind iron bars. Good man!"

Conroy replied with his celebrated grin.

"Then you won't mind if I have a month's leave, will you, chief?" he said.

"Leave? What for?"

"You once told me it was a failing of mine that I hated believing anything had of a pretty woman," he explained. "Well, that failing has got the better of me this time. I'm going to be married."

"Great Scott!" the chief muttered. "Poor devil! Take your month!"

And Conroy took it!

(By permission of Butcher's Film Service, Ltd., starring John Holland and Alice Day.)

(Continued from page 2.)

Baxter, William Powell, Douglas Fairbanks, jun., and Winnie Lightner have all been smartened up physically by this former light-weight.

He also trained Joe E. Brown, but not very much, because the wide-mouthed comedian is not very fond of exercise in any shape, declaring that he gets quite enough of it while working in pictures!

"A lot of my work has been in pictures with athlete sequences, such as fights, football, wrestling, and polo pictures," Slott said recently, "but most of it has been done privately."

"I am devoting three days a week to Mr. Barthelmess now," he continued. "During the summer when the stars get out on the beach and take a good sun-tan they look marvellous, but they may just as easily be as soft as in the winter months."

"That is where I come in. I start by running them a few hundred yards, after which they are usually anxious to quit. We gradually increase the exercise."

"The most difficult training grind I have paced was with Barthelmess. We used to walk and run five miles, mostly up-hill, from Barthelmess' home in Beverley Hills to John Gilbert's place. This is a grind for anyone. We haven't got to that point yet. It takes time, of course, but"—and here he smiled grimly with a glance at Barthelmess, who stood near-by—"we're going to!"

Handcuffed Stars.

Gene Gerrard and Jessio Matthews, the leading stars in the B.I.P. picture, "Out of the Blue," are not likely again to experiment with handcuffs. The story requires that Gene Gerrard be arrested and handcuffed at Biarritz.

After work for the day was over he was explaining the mechanism of the handcuffs to Jessie Matthews. To demonstrate their use, he put one of the cuffs on her wrist, when the key suddenly snapped off in the lock, leaving them handcuffed together. At first the two artistes treated the matter as a joke. But when it was found that the last of the workmen had gone from the studio and no suitable tools could be found, then the situation began to look serious. Eventually the services of the village policeman had to be obtained, and he was able, after some delay, to free the handcuffed artistes.

Answers to Questions.

Yes, Buck Jones is still acting for the screen, Alice (London, E.). Among his films are "The Lone Rider," "Men Without Law," "The Fighting Sap," "The Avenger," "Desert Vengeance," and "The Texas Ranger." You can write to him care of Columbia Studios, 1438, Gower Street, Hollywood, California, U.S.A. Give him your address in full, including the name of your country, to ensure a reply.

I have been unable to trace the Hoot Gibson picture you mention, Vincent (Melbourne), and am wondering if you mean "Prairie Trails," starring Tom Mix. If so, the cast is as follows: Tom Mix (Tom Benton), Charles K. French (Stephen McWhirter), Kathleen O'Connor (Janet McWhirter), Robert Walker (Winthrop Adams Endicott), Gloria Hope (Alice Endicott), Sid Jordan (Jack Purdy), Harry Dunkison (Ike Stork).

Here are the casts you want, D. J. M. (Graig): "The Sky Hawk"; Helen Chandler (Joan Allan), John Garrick (Jack Bardell), Gilbert Emery (Major Nelson), Lennox Pawle (Lord Bardell), Lumsden Hare (Judge Allan), Joyce Compton (Peggy Phillips), Billy Bvan (Tom Berry), Daphne Pollard (Minnie), Percy Challenger (Butler). "Bigger Than Barnums": Viola Dana (Juanita Calles), Ralph Lewis (Blandin—Old Peter), George O'Hara (Robert Blandin), Ralph Ince (Jack Ravelle).

BILLIARDS AT HOME per week
Remember you are dealing direct—we finance our own system. 1/-

Perfect reproduction of Full-Size Tables, Brass Frame Pockets, Adjustable Feet to ensure a perfect level surface. Complete with two Cues, three Turned Balls, Guaranteed Unbreakable, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules & Chalk.

SIZE	Deposit	Four Monthly Payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10.-	4.-	19.-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10.-	6.6	26.-
3 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10.-	8.6	32.-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10.-	12.6	42.-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10.-	15.6	52.-
6 ft. 4 in. x 3 ft. 3 in.	10.-	22.-	80.-

SPECIAL OFFER Size 4ft. 6ins. x 2ft. 3ins. Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk. 55/-

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge Street, London.
Send for Complete Illustrated List with Xmos supplement of Jokes and Games.

FREE FUN! Ventriloquists' Instruments given FREE to all sending 7d. (P.O.) for latest Magic Trick and List. (Large Parcel, 2/6, 5/-) — J. Harrison, 368, Dudley Rd., Birmingham.

BE TALL Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/- Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

ONE GUINEA
is all you pay for a charming Portable Model. Many other bargains in Horn, Hornless, Upright, Grand and Consoles, with which I give AN ALBUM of FREE RECORDS. Approval, Carriage Paid. Monthly terms. Write for my Free Lists NOW.

Edw. O'Brien Ltd. Specialists in Cycles a Gramophones. Dep 10, COVENTRY.

BE TALLER! Increased my own height to 6ft 3ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

BLUSHING, Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—L.A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-). Including Allport, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W.A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

Boy's Cinema "THE SECRET SIX" AND "WILD HORSE."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 625.

EVERY TUESDAY.

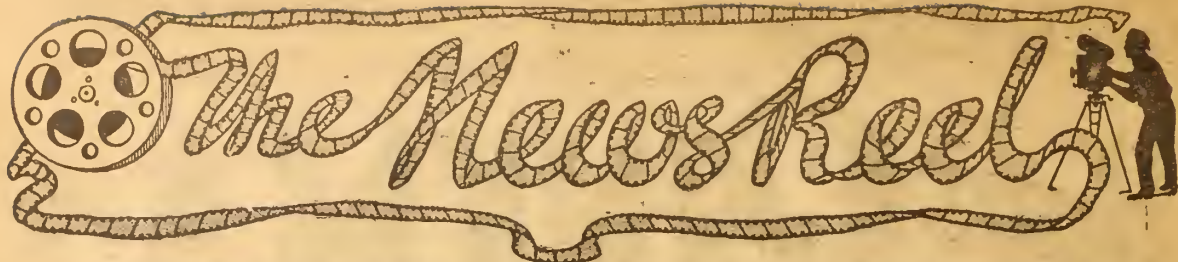

DECEMBER 5th, 1931.

A gripping drama of a gang's reign of terror.
Starring
WALLACE
BEERY.

==
The

SECRET SIX

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"The Secret Six."

Tony Scorpio, Wallace Beery; Stanley Newton, Lewis Stone; Hank Tarry, John Mack Brown; Anne Barford, Jean Harlow; Peaches, Marjorie Rambeau; Nick Mizoski, Paul Hurst; Carl Pasher, Clark Gable; Johnny Franks, Ralph Bellamy; Colimo, John Miljan; "Dummy" Metz, Murray Kinnell; Delano, Fletcher Norton.

"Wild Horse."

Jim Wright, Hoot Gibson; Alice Hall, Alberta Vaughn; Stepin, Stepin Fetchit; Hank Howard, Neal Hart; Gil Davis, Edmund Cobb; Skeeter Burke, Skeeter Bill Robbins; Colonel Ben Hall, George Bunny; Sheriff, Edward Peil; Deputy, Joe Rickson; "The Devil," Mutt, Hoot Gibson's trained palomino.

A Call for Dogs.

Numerous small boys in Hollywood recently imagined that their dogs might be able to earn them a few dollars. The reason was that Paramount, when making "Huckleberry Finn," required some canines for the picture. Scouts were sent out from the studio to search for the required type of dogs, but they did not have to look long.

The news soon spread, and dogs by the hundreds were being hurried to the casting office by their owners. Men and women, too, took along their pets. There were mongrels and pure-breds of all kinds and sizes that yelped and barked as though overjoyed at the thought of their sudden importance. But, alas! many of them never got in front of the camera.

What's a "Grip"?

Your answer to the above question will doubtless be at once—a suitcase. But a "grip" in studio parlance does not mean that at all. For in filmland a "grip" is a particular technician whose work behind the scenes is unknown to the average picture-goer.

Someone asked a "grip" at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios what his work was, and received the facetious reply: "A 'grip' is the fellow who does the work which nobody else wants to do." From which it may be gathered that the "grip" is the studio handyman; a jack-of-all-trades. He is not a carpenter, nor a plumber, nor an electrician, nor a camera-man—but he lends to all these a hand when called upon to do so. You may be sure, therefore, that he has a busy time!

Yet "grips," because they are emergency men, help to save the film companies thousands of dollars when "last minute" things have to be done. And their jobs are often as thrilling as they are varied. To-day, a "grip" may lie with his head two inches from a whirling propeller so that Wallace Beery, in the cockpit above, may have light reflected into his face for a scene in the M.G.M. picture, "Hell Divers." December 5th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S GRAND NUMBER.

"THE MAN AT 6."

In a lonely country house a strange drama is enacted. A Scotland Yard detective is sent to probe the mystery. What happened to the jewelled chessmen and who was the Man at 6? A gripping mystery thriller, starring Gerald Rawlinson and Anne Grey.

"LARCENY LANE."

The story of a bell-boy who matched his wits against Society to make easy money—but redeemed himself in the end for the sake of the girl he loved. Starring James Cagney and Joan Blondell.

"THE BADGE."

An innocent girl accused of murder, and how the electric chair was cheated of a victim. A gripping detective drama.

Also

The third episode of our thrilling new serial-drama of treasure guarded by a tribe of fierce cannibals:

"DANGER ISLAND."

Tell all your friends about this amazing new story, starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Browne.

Reflection of natural sunlight by means of tin-foil, gold-foil, or tin and mirror "reflectors" is one of the most important duties of a "grip."

To-morrow, the "grip" may be called upon to hold Bert Lahr by the heels—hidden by the window sill—as the comedian leans out of a four-storey window for a scene in "Flying High." Again, the "grip" may have to lie along the running-board of a motor-car and hold on the legs of the camera to steady it while the car is speeding along at over forty miles an hour. But the "grip" has also simple jobs to do. He may have to nail strips on the floor to serve as guides for the artistes when close-ups are required; repair upholstery, mend a leakage in a pipe, and do anything else in the day's work as required.

One for Joe.

Joe E. Brown is an enthusiastic baseball player and a good one, too. Recently he made up one of a team composed of theatrical folk.

They were playing in a small town, and during the progress of a close game, one of the spectators yelled something unpleasant to Joe when his playing did not quite please the individual. He also called Joe a "homely mug."

Joe stopped right in the game, walked over to the crowd and asked: "Who said that?" The critic was pointed out by others standing near.

"Say, you there," called Joe, "which of the Dolly Sisters are you? You don't look so good yourself!" The crowd laughed with delight at this sally and the critic was silenced.

Jackie Coogan's Joke.

Jackie Coogan is not only a good actor, but a wit. He is the only one who has so far caught Irwin S. Cobb, the humorist, napping with a joke.

"Betcha," said Jackie, "I can make you guess a riddle wrong."

"Yeah?" Proceeded, young man," replied Cobb dryly.

"How do you get the water out of a barrel when it is sealed up tight?" asked Jackie.

The humorist wrinkled his forehead and thought for several minutes.

"I give it up," he said at last.

"Why, shoot it full of holes," yelled The Kid gleefully.

Answers to Questions.

You were right in telling your friend that it was the late Fred Thomson who starred in "Kit Carson." E. C. (Stoke-on-Trent). The film was released in July, 1929. Fred Thomson died after an operation for gall-stones on December 25th, 1928. He was 6 ft. in height with brown hair and blue-grey eyes and left two boys, one of them being an adopted son.

Leslie Henson began his film career in 1919, "Curious" (Birchington). Among his pictures are "A Warm Corner" and "Sport of Kings." Lupino Lane made his film debut in 1915, in a British comedy entitled "Nipper's Bank Holiday."

(Continued on page 27.)

Tony Scorpio started as a stockyard slaughterer, then won his way, by a sinister trail of gun-play, till he had a town at his mercy. Then came the Secret Six, grimly resolved to crush him. Starring Wallace Beery, Lewis Stone and Marjorie Rambeau.

Money Talks.

THE dockside of the town of Centro, not so many miles distant from the city of Chicago, was, day in, day out, a regular hive of industry. Always some big cargo vessel was putting in at the quay to be speedily disgorged of the live stock it carried—sheep, oxen, pigs, all were driven to the near-by stockyards there to be humanely killed for the consumption of the American public.

A messy and tiring business the continual killing of so much cattle, and only the very strongest men were employed in the slaughterhouses that backed on to the quay.

A great relief to them all when the siren sounded for the toil of the day to cease. Hands were hastily rinsed beneath watertaps that were set here and there in the stout wooden walls of the slaughterhouses, dried with equal haste upon towels that were dirty and old, then, discarding smocks and aprons, the men donned their hats and coats and made for home.

All save one, a giant of a fellow with massive shoulders that told of enormous strength. Tony Scorpio was an Italian—it was easy to tell that from one glimpse at his dark, swarthy face, and the unruly black hair that showed beneath the soft felt hat that he wore on the back of his head.

Jacket undone, his big hands thrust deep in his trousers pockets, he stouched from the stockyards, crossed the road beyond the gates and turned into an eating-house, from which exuded the strong smell of grilling chops and steaks.

Very few customers were in the place as he entered, but he ignored many of the vacant tables that were divided from each other by stout wooden partitions and passed down the length of the slop-

"Hallo, pardner, fancy seeing you here."

Scorpio pulled up at the sound of that familiar voice and turned his head. Seated at the table by which he had halted, a grilled steak before him, was a young fellow, neatly enough dressed, but with a thin, cruel mouth, dark, flashing eyes which, together with a long scar upon his chin, marred an otherwise not bad-looking face.

"Howdy, Franks?" Scorpio waved his hand by way of greeting. "Thought I'd try this place for a spot of grub. You see, I ain't got no wife, nor no family, so have to fend for myself. You recommend it here?"

"Yeah. But why not sit down here with us. My pal won't mind in the least." Johnny Franks winked knowingly at the smug-faced man who was seated on his left. "Okay with you, Nick?"

"Oh, sure," came the answer.

"Well, that's settled." Johnny Franks half rose in his chair, reached across the table, caught at Scorpio's arm and dragged him down into the vacant chair on his right hand. "Well, Tony, meet my pard, Nick Mizoski—he's in the same game as me. Nick, meet Tony Scorpio, killer in the slaughterhouses across the way. A real tough guy, and he sure does like his liquor."

Scorpio grinned at the young racketeer, who did a fair amount of business among the workers in the stockyards, then shook hands with Nick Mizoski, who was vaguely wondering why on earth Franks had invited this giant to sit at their table. But Franks had a particular reason of his own though, just then, he had no opportunity of pursuing it as a young woman with fair, curly hair glided up to the table and confronted Tony Scorpio.

"Well, big boy," she said in a voice that was somewhat coarse, "and what can I get you?"

"Spaghetti and a bottle of buttermilk," Scorpio responded, gazing admiringly into her rather pretty face and experiencing a sudden fluttering of the heart.

Franks seized the opportunity to whisper in Nick Mizoski's ear.

"Play up to me. I want to get this guy in on our racket. A man of his strength will be darned useful to us."

"Spaghetti and buttermilk?" reiterated the fair-haired girl, rising her eyebrows in sheer amazement. "Say, that's a kid's diet!"

"Just the same, that's what I'm having, sister," grinned Scorpio. "So just you trot along and get it, see?"

Pearl Peach, popular with all the habitués of the eating-house, shrugged her shapely shoulders, then drifted away, but not before she had shot an affectionate glance at Johnny Franks.

"A peach of a girl—that," remarked Scorpio, looking wistfully after her retreating form.

"You've sure said it, boy." Despite the enthusiastic tone of his voice, Johnny Franks scowled at the big slaughterhouse worker. "Her moniker happens to be Peaches—at least, that's what we call her in this here place. Her real name is Pearl Peach and she is my girl!"

Scorpio swung round on him, impressed by the stress that he laid on his last words.

"My, you're a darned lucky fellow to have such a girl." Scorpio's smile was friendly, yet like Franks there was jealousy in his eyes. "I must congratulate you, pardner. A real peach of a girl."

Franks grunted and viciously attacked his steak. It was clear to him that Peaches had won a place in the heart of the giant, and the thought was as wormwood to his mean, wicked soul. But there was no time for heated words or ruffled tempers as Franks realised when he suddenly caught Nick Mizoski's warning glance.
December 5th, 1931.

"Say, Scorio, they don't pay you overwell in the stockyards, do they?" Franks said again as he again laid down his knife and fork.

"You've certainly said it." The giant shrugged his shoulders deprecatingly. "A measly twenty bucks a week."

"The skinfints!" The racketeer looked incredulous, though in reality he had known all along the paltry wage that Scorio was earning in the slaughterhouses. He had made it his business to find this out only the day before. "Why, it's a wonder you can live. Twenty dollars! Oh, heck!"

"But it's at least a job," Scorio pointed out with a rueful grin.

"Yeah." Johnny Franks nodded his agreement, then turned his gaze to his confederate. "A deserving case, eh, Nick? Shall I offer him a billet?"

"Why not?" Mizoski grinned at the way Franks was casting his bait—making absolutely sure that it was safe to lay his cards before this man. "He might jump at the chance of handling easy money for very little graft."

"What's that?" Scorio turned eagerly to Franks. "Easy money? Why, you just lead me to it, boy."

A satisfied smile at once broke on Johnny Franks' face, but at that moment Peaches reappeared with a plate of spaghetti and a bottle of buttermilk which she proceeded to place before Scorio.

"Say, big boy, they tell me you work in the stockyards." Hands on hips, the girl stood back and surveyed Scorio with a scornful smile. "You a killer—a man who's supposed to be as tough as they make 'em—drinking buttermilk. Ha, ha! That's certainly rich!"

Johnny Franks and Mizoski grinned at the sheepish look that appeared on Scorio's face. Evidently he was struggling to find words with which to counter the jeering thrust. But it was in vain. All he could do was to push his hat further back on his head and to continue to look foolishly at the girl.

"Now, now, Peaches, you can the wise cracks." Johnny Franks jerked his head in the direction of the back of the shop—a hint to her to depart. "You're interrupting a business discussion."

The girl drifted away, once more followed by Scorio's admiring gaze, but no sooner had she disappeared than he again swung round on Johnny Franks.

"About that job of work," he remarked, the eagerness back in his tone. "What is it?"

"A matter of a hundred bucks a week—perhaps more." The young racketeer pushed aside his empty plate and leaned his arms on the table. "You know my racket, of course. Booze, and believe me, though there's risks attached to it, it's a gamo that carries big money."

"Then I'm your man." There was an avaricious gleam in Scorio's eyes now. Well he knew what lay behind Franks' words, but the knowledge that he had the chance of making as much as a hundred dollars a week swept him completely off his feet. "My fairy godmother, that's what you are, Johnny Franks. You want me to come in with you—to help distribute your booze. A job after my own heart. When you want me to start?"

"Right now." Franks experienced a feeling of elation that he had succeeded in recruiting the services of this man. Scorio was just the type required by the gang of which he was a member.

December 5th, 1931.

A great acquisition, for he was obviously a fellow of enormous strength and fearless into the bargain. "You see, Scorio, we're out to extend our activities, and that means more men wanted in the business. We've got quite a nice little territory around this quarter, but we aim to spread out—to increase the boundary. It means a few scraps, of course, for we'll be muscling in on the preserves of others. But we're going to do it—more money to the mill, you know. Gee, but we're going to be mighty rich before long. You, I, Nick and the boss."

"The boss?" reiterated Scorio in surprise.

"Sure." Johnny Franks got to his feet as he saw that Scorio had finished his spaghetti, had drained the bottle that had contained the buttermilk. "But just you come along of Nick and me. We'll introduce you to the chief, then you can start right in on our racket to-night."

He took Scorio's arm as the giant got ponderously to his feet and, followed by Mizoski, led him to a door at the back of the shop that opened on to a flight of stairs that ran up to a room above the eating-house, a room from which the racketeers directed their illegal business operations.

The door opened and the door closed, and together the three men climbed the stairs to that room of vice.

The Raid.

THAT same night Scorio accompanied Johnny Franks to a warehouse some half-mile from the eating-house, in the spacious cellar of which was the bootleggers' own distillery. The place was like a miniature brewery, and Scorio marvelled as he saw the illicit liquor being distilled—saw the barrels of alcohol that stood in one corner ready for transportation to various restaurants and speakeasies that would pay exorbitant prices for the stuff.

"And they say the States have gone dry," Scorio grinned as his eyes swept the place. "Gee, but it sure makes a man thirsty to see all this drink."

"Shut your infernal trap and remember this—there's no time for wisecracks in this racket!"

Franks shot Scorio a baleful glance. Though he had been anxious to enlist the giant's aid in his nefarious business, bad feeling towards Scorio rankled in his heart. He could not forget the way the giant had looked at Peaches in the eating-house, how he had winked at the girl when the two had left for the distillery.

"No offence meant."

But there was no apologetic note in Scorio's voice, and the grin was still on his face. He had weighed Franks up in the short time he had been in his company, knew that he was a ruthless and callous brute, and above all a dangerous enemy, but the knowledge disturbed him not a bit. Scorio knew his own physical power—knew, too, that he was quite capable of taking care of himself in the event of any trouble with this man who so obviously resented him even looking at his girl.

Why shouldn't he look at Peaches if he wished? As the question formed itself in Scorio's shallow mind an evil glitter came into his cunning brown eyes. To blazes with Franks. If he caused any trouble and it came to a show-down he'd give him the "works"—perhaps with Franks out of the way he could step into his shoes, become enormously rich and powerful. No doubt the booze racket was very profitable to a man who could hold up his end.

"Say, Lewis"—Franks had confronted one of the workers in the underground distillery, an evil-looking man who wore a blue shirt that was open at the neck, and a cap that was set at an angle on his head. In the racketeer's eyes blazed fierce anger, whilst his jaw was thrust forward menacingly—"what's the meaning of this?" He waved a hand towards the barrels in the corner. "Your output is under schedule. Your orders were to turn out forty barrels to-day, and you're eleven short. How'd you explain it, huh?"

"Forty's rather heavy going, Franks," came the answer. "We've been at it hard all day. But there's still time to—"

"Confound you with your darned excuses!" Franks shook his fist under the man's jaw. "Slacking, that's what you've been doing. Why, I've a darned good mind to smash you to pulp!"

With a sudden sweep of his arm he sent the man staggering from his path, then strode across the cellar, forgetful of Scorio who followed him.

"Well, Metz, you got Jeff Larkins' order through?" Franks inquired of a man with a mop of untidy hair, and who wore thick-pebbled spectacles.

The fellow nodded, and, lifting a hand, extended four fingers.

"What the heck's wrong with him?" Scorio inquired over Franks' shoulder. "Why the secret signs?"

"He's a dummy—one of our most useful men," Franks explained ungraciously. "He sees nothing, knows nothing, says nothing. See?"

Scorio nodded, and Franks swung round and faced him.

"You can get busy on your first assignment to-night, Scorio. Jeff Larkins, boss of the Blue Moon speakeasy on Maine Street, wants four barrels of hooch. Lewis over there will drive you in the lorry. And I warn you to keep your eyes open and your gun in your hand in case of an ambush. Some folks are getting mighty sore because we've been encroaching on their territory. Colimo, for instance—a nasty little skunk who'd— By gar, there's the alarm!"

Franks glanced furtively towards the door by which he and Scorio had entered the cellar as the clangorous note of a bell set high in the wall broke sharply in on his words. Heavy footsteps could be heard hastily descending the stairs from the warehouse above, and, his hand flashing to his jacket pocket where his gun was concealed, Franks turned fiercely blazing eyes on Scorio, Metz, and Lewis, and the two other brutal-faced ruffians who gathered swiftly round him.

"It's the cops or Colimo's gang, at the least," he hissed. "Better beat it by the back way—quick. We're not strong enough to offer resistance."

But even as he raced towards a door on the far side of the underground apartments, the others close at his heels, there burst into the cellar some dozen grim-faced police officers, revolvers clasped tightly in their hands.

A booming voice called on the gangsters to stop and surrender, but they paid no heed. They were at that other door now, and as they crowded through it Johnny Franks half turned round, swung up his gun, and pulled the trigger.

A shattering report that was instantly followed by a choking gasp, and one of the police officers pitched headlong to the ground. Then came a regular fusillade of shots as his colleagues loosed their weapons at the fugitives.

But the gangsters were now well out of range, tearing up a flight of stone stairs, and the bullets thudded harmlessly into the walls by the door.

"After the swines—some of you!" roared the burly officer who was at the head of the raiding-party. "The rest of you smash up this infernal nest of vice."

The terse command was obeyed with alacrity. Up the stairs after the fleeing gangsters ran seven of the officers, faces grim-set, guns held in readiness in their hands, while the others at once began to wreck everything in the cellar. The bootleggers' still was smashed to atoms with an axe that one of the officers found in a corner, barrels of alcohol were treated similarly, and the taps of two large tanks were turned on and the whisky they contained allowed to flow out upon the cellar floor.

But though the officers of the law exacted a heavy toll upon the property of Johnny Franks and his gang, the racketeer and his followers escaped their pursuers, scuttling from the place by the back way and disappearing into the shadows of the night.

"Put on the Spot."

THE room above the eating-house that faced the stockyards where Scorpio had toiled day in, day out before he had embarked on a life of crime. Seated at the long oak table four men—Johnny Franks, Mizoski, Scorpio himself, and an elderly grey-haired man with a dissipated face, compelling brown eyes and a determined chin. Stanley Newton, a crook lawyer, and the brains behind the gang that Franks led.

Business was under discussion, and at the moment "Dummy" Metz, who stood beside Newton, was checking figures from the notebook he held in his hands, while Mizoski, in his shirtsleeves, was counting out a big pile of dollar bills.

"A hundred and sixty bucks from Lawson," Mizoski placed the notes on the table. "And forty-two from Peakes. That's the lot."

"Should have been more," Johnny Franks savagely flicked the ash from his cigarette. "We lost a whole heap over that raid on our still. Heavens, but Colimo'll suffer for that! Tip off the police 'cause we've broken into his territory. Heck, but he's sure got something coming to him for that!"

"But why in blazes all this waiting?" Scorpio, who had also discarded his jacket and had unfastened his waistcoat as well, pushed his bowler hat farther back on his head. "That was a week ago, and still we've done nothing. He'll be thinking we're scared of him."

"Then he'll soon be disillusioned," Franks shot Scorpio a sneering glance. "You were all for going after him there and then, weren't you? Hadn't the brains to realise that he was probably expecting us, and had a nice little ambush set."

"Well, to my mind that shows you're darned well scared of him, Franks!" Scorpio shot at him.

"You think that, huh?" His eyes blazing venomously, Franks flashed his hand to his jacket pocket. "Why, you ugly gorilla, I'll—"

"Now, now, quit that, you two. I won't have any wrangling. You hear me?" Newton frowned at them; and the peculiar gleam in his eyes caused them to wilt. A second he gazed at them, then his eyes wandered to Nick Mizoski who had gathered up the pile of dollar bills. "Nick, share the stuff out, then we'll talk about that skunk Colimo. I think to-night is the night to deal with him."

Mizoski nodded, while the scowl on Scorpio's unprepossessing face vanished as if by magic, and his eyes took on a look of greed.

Slowly Mizoski counted out the dollar bills, setting them into four different piles, one for each of the four of them. Newton received two dollars to every one allotted the others, but presently Mizoski slipped an extra note on his and on Johnny Franks's piles.

"Say, what the heck's the game?" Scorpio's eyes had missed nothing. Angrily, he brought his big fist crashing down on the table. "Trying to cheat me, huh? Well, let me tell you I'm not the guy to stand for that kind of dope. Mizoski, another one on my pile. You hear me?"

Again Johnny Franks' hand sought his jacket pocket. For some days now he had repented having persuaded this giant to join up with them. He was too overbearing, too much given to voicing his own views when he should have quietly accepted the views of the others. This, coupled with the fact that Scorpio would persist in trying to thrust his affections on Peaches, had incurred the young racketeer's wrath, so that Franks itched for the chance to sweep him from his path.

But again Newton interfered, and quickly poured oil on the troubled waters. Shrewd that he was the crook lawyer was well aware of Frank's feelings towards Scorpio, yet while he despised the arrogance of the giant, his blustering ways and harsh grating voice, Newton realised that here was a type admirably suited to the bootlegging game, a man it would be wise to keep in their midst. He had strength, pluck, and was obviously a born fighter.

"Now, now, Mizoski, that's not our code at all." Newton's brown eyes gazed reprovingly at Nick. "Scorpio is one of us, and as such he is entitled to an equal share in the profits. Now, just you put things square with him and no more nonsense."

Mizoski grunted and obeyed, while Franks gritted his teeth and decided to await a more favourable opportunity for the settling of his score with Scorpio.

"Now, about this dirty rat, Colimo," Newton stowed his pile of dollar bills into a wallet which he returned to his breast-pocket. "We're going after him to-night, as I said. A little surprise visit to his place in Nelson Street. He'll not expect you to imitate the spider and the fly business and coolly enter his parlour. It'll be dead easy, and there'll be very little risk. If he's got more than two or three of his boys with him I'll be surprised. Now I suggest that you three with Spike Mullins and Lew Valance will be sufficient to fix him. You agree?"

"Sure!" Scorpio grinned evilly, slid his hand into his hip-pocket and clutched the gun he parked there. "But why five to take care of that dirty pup? I could do it on my own!"

"The brave man speaks!" said Johnny Franks, with a curl of his lip.

"Yeah!" Scorpio thrust his jaw forward pugnaciously. "I ain't forgetting

"You a killer—a man who's supposed to be as tough as they make 'em—drinking buttermilk!" She surveyed Scorpio with a scornful smile. "Ha, ha! That's certainly rich!"

that it's you who's been all for putting off giving Colimo the works."

"That's enough of that, Scorpio!" Newton snapped at him. "I won't have this bickering among you boys. I'm the boss here, and you'll do as I tell you. The five of you are going—and the sooner you get along the better, see?"

He got to his feet, fixed the soft felt hat he wore more firmly on his head, then, picking up the walking-stick that rested against the chair he had occupied, he moved towards the door.

"I'll be back in an hour to hear what success you've had," he said over his shoulder, then strode from the room.

Blazing Guns.

FIVE men strolled casually into the Dojoun Café in Nelson Street, and it was noticeable that each of them had a hand hidden in a pocket of his clothes.

At sight of them a chill ran down the spine of Louis Falco, who managed the establishment, though outwardly he showed no fear whatever as he sidled over to them.

"Ah, it is Mister Franks!" Falco rubbed his hands together as he bowed. "You want to eat? This way, sir."

As he led them to a table, drew out chairs for them, he was aware that Johnny Franks cast a sly glance towards a curtained doorway near which stood a player-piano that provided music for the customers of the restaurant.

"Ah, Mister Franks, you'd like some music, eh?" he purred. "I'll set the piano going for you while you decide what you would like to eat."

He slid away, and Johnny Franks' eyes gleamed sinisterly between narrowed lids. Quickly he cast a glance round the café, saw that the place was deserted save for one solitary diner who was seated at a distant table, then switched his gaze quickly upon his companions.

"He's gone to tip off Colimo for a cert," he hissed between clenched teeth. "Best keep your eyes skinned."

Johnny Franks' surmise was correct. Already Louis Falco was in the adjoining room, clutching nervously at Colimo's sleeve as that notorious gang-leader sat talking with three of his ruffianly henchmen.

"What the blazes you want, Louis?" Colimo, dark and undoubtedly handsome, spoke without removing the cigarette from between his thin lips, and his sinister grey eyes blazed fiercely into the face of the interloper. "Haven't I told you times out of number not to interrupt when I'm in conference? Why, I've a darned good mind to—"

"But, boss, it's urgent!" Falco blurted out. "Johnny Franks and—"

"What's that?" Colimo was on his feet in a flash, gripping Falco fiercely by the lapels of his jacket. "Quick, spit it out, you darned fool!"

"I tell you Johnny Franks is out in the restaurant with four other of his dirty rats," Falco whimpered. "They're after you—they've got their hands ready on the guns in their pockets."

"Is that so?" Colimo whipped out his automatic and scowled ferociously. "Then this is where they get the works. A lot of smarties, huh? Well, they'll find they've run up against it this time, by heck they will!"

"But, boss," protested Delano, Colimo's chief lieutenant, "don't forget there are five of them."

"Yeah!" Colimo shot him a scornful glance. "Well, I don't care a hang if they're twenty-five strong. Those small fry have no brains. We're going to beat them by strategy, see?"

But Delano did not see, and neither did the other two gangsters who were with them.

December 5th, 1931.

"Louis, listen here!" Colimo again gripped the café manager's coat. "You'll go out and start up that old piano of yours. That'll be the signal for us to make a rush; and see to it that you switch out the lights directly you hear me cough. Got that? Right, then get busy."

As Falco went slowly and nervously towards the door a good-looking boy, who was scarcely out of his teens, rose from a chair on the far side of the room, dropping the book he had been reading upon a near-by table. Quickly he ran across to Colimo, and, his eyes gleaming with great excitement, he confronted the grim-faced gangster.

"Joe, let me in on this!" he pleaded eagerly. "So far since I've come in with you on the booze racket you've not let me do anything big. Now you can do with—"

"No, no, Jimmy!" Colimo patted the boy's shoulder affectionately. Ruthless and brutal as he undoubtedly was, there was a warm and tender spot in the gangster's heart for his kid brother. Many times since Jimmy had left school Colimo had wished that he had not allowed him to drift into the bootleg game; but on one thing he was resolved—he would never allow the boy to take risks. "This little affair's too darned risky, kid. There are men out there who'll shoot till they drop. No, we'll take care of them, Jimmy. You be a good boy and wait here till after the fireworks."

It was at that moment that the player-piano in the restaurant began to play a well-known and lively tune.

"Ready, boys?" His lips drawn in a grim, straight line, Colimo glanced at his henchmen, saw that their guns were ready in their hands and nodded his satisfaction. "Now listen carefully. Locate the table at which those stiffies are sitting as quickly as you can before the lights go out. Then duck down and shoot to kill!"

With that he moved cautiously towards the curtained doorway, the others hard at his heels, all unaware that Jimmy had whipped out a blue-black automatic and was moving after them on tiptoe.

The curtain reached a moment later, Colimo stealthily drew it back, revealing Johnny Franks and his colleagues seated at the table outside. But in the same instant that Colimo coughed, Franks saw him and whipped out his gun.

The crash of a shot, the dull thud of a bullet striking the woodwork of the doorway, and then the restaurant was plunged into utter darkness.

"Right, boys! Let the dirty scum have it!" Colimo hissed between clenched teeth, and dived for the shelter of a nearby table.

Hoarse shouts and vicious oaths synchronised with the terrified squeal of the restaurant's solitary diner as he leaped frantically to his feet and stumbled towards the street door. Then came a succession of nerve-shattering reports, followed by wicked stabs of flame as the gun duel burst in all its viciousness.

From somewhere near at hand Colimo heard a sudden choking sob, the thud of a body as it struck the floor. One of his men had been hit. Grinding his teeth savagely he fired at a moving shadow on the opposite side of the restaurant. But all his bullet did was to smash a water jug that stood upon a table.

"I believe we got him!" Johnny

Franks hissed the words in Scorpio's ear as the two crouched behind a thick mahogany pedestal. "Best make a break for it before they do us any damage."

"Heck, but why not out the darn lot of 'em while we're about it."

There was a brutal note in Scorpio's lowered voice, and in the darkness his eyes gleamed with an unholy light.

"You'll do as I say." Almost Franks was tempted to turn his gun on this man who had so incurred his wrath. But he mastered the impulse as a bullet whistled within an inch of his head and quickly loosed off his gun at a shadowy figure just discernible across the room. "Give the tip to the others. You hear me?"

The others were close at hand, taking shelter behind two tables set side by side. Quickly Scorpio approached them on hands and knees, and whispered in their ears.

Next second they were following him, crawling towards the door that led to the street, their guns held ready in case of emergency.

"Hey, switch on the lights, someone!"

Colimo suspected that the sudden lull in the battle meant that his rivals were making a break for it, but he was wary enough not to leave his shelter till he was sure. But, though he lifted his voice, no shot came, and so he took a chance and rose to his feet.

Then it was he heard a sound coming from the direction of the street door, discerned that the door stood wide open, and in the very same instant he saw a dim shape vanish quickly through the aperture.

"Falco, those lights!" he bellowed.

"Quick! They're making a dash for it! Those lights! You hear me!"

The lights came on, and on the instant three heads rose up from behind tables near the curtained doorway. Colimo's killers, and they quickly joined their leader.

"What's the next move, chief?" Delano rasped, his finger on the trigger of his gun. "Do we go after the rats?"

"No use. They'll be well away by now, skulking in the shadows. Better shut and lock the door in case those shots were heard. We don't want the cops to— Merciful heavens, Jimmy! Jimmy, those swines got him!" His eyes wide with horror, Colimo stood gazing dazedly at the outstretched figure that lay between two tables—at the white upturned face with a trickle of blood coming from the temple. Then a heart-rending sob bursting suddenly from his quivering lips, the gang leader stumbled forward, dropped to his knees, and gathered the limp body close. Clear that the boy was dead, and, as the grim truth beat into the gangster's burning brain, his face reddened with a terrible fury. "Franks, or one of his tykes, got him!" he raved, his voice trembling with the emotion that gripped him. "By hades, but whoever it was, he's going to pay! I'll have him—I'll drill him so full of holes he'll look like a colander. I swear I will!"

Several moments he remained where he was—a pathetic-looking figure as he mourned the loss of his kid brother, the only human being who had ever brought out a streak of goodness in his otherwise cruel and relentless frame. Then he staggered to his feet, lifted the inert body, and carried it into the adjoining room, where he placed it on a settee.

"And now," he rasped in a voice that was vibrant with passion as he straightened and confronted his grim-faced henchman, "we're going out to exact revenge! Come on!"

Treachery.

SOME half an hour later Johnny Franks was smoking a quiet cigarette in the gang's council chamber above the eating-house facing the docks when the door slammed open and a grim voice cried:

"Stick 'em up, you rat, or, by hades, I'll drill you clean between your eyes!"

With a startled exclamation, Franks swung round in his seat, raising his hands as he did so.

"Well, now, if it isn't Colimo!" Franks forced himself to smile, though his heart went sick within him as Colimo and his bodyguard advanced threateningly into the room, closing the door behind them. "This is—is a pleasure indeed. Anything I can do?"

"Yeah, plenty." Like some avenging angel, Colimo strode up to Franks and jabbed the muzzle of his gun into his ribs. "You answer me this. Did you kill my brother Jimmy, Franks?"

"Good heavens, no!" Franks' face drained of every vestige of colour. Alone in that room with these deadly rivals, he knew that his life was not worth a moment's purchase, especially as they were evidently out to avenge the death of one of their number. Desperately he sought a subterfuge. "No, indeed I didn't, Colimo. Why should I? I haven't got a thing on the kid. As a matter of fact, me and Jimmy were pals!"

"Really, you surprise me, Franks!" sneered Colimo with a curl of his lip. "Suppose you've just discovered he was your friend now he's been killed—killed by either you or one of your dirty ruffiaff during your little visit to us at the Dojoun. Well, let me tell you this. That kinda hunk cuts no ice. I'm here after the killer, and, if it wasn't you, you turn him over, or I'll plug you here and now."

A cunning gleam crept into Frank's dark eyes. Well he knew that it was a bullet from his own gun that had killed this brother of Colimo's. Hadn't he aimed at that dim-seen figure that had instantly dropped to the floor when he fired? And now Colimo wanted retribution, and Franks saw a way to appease the man—saw a way that would sweep from his own path a man whom he considered a thorn in his side.

"Very well, Colimo, I'll tip him off to you," he said with the utmost nonchalance. "It was Scorpio. You know him, of course. Well, if you're quick, you'll find him down on Pier Fourteen. He's running some booze to a ship there."

"Is that the truth?" Colimo snapped at him.

"Why, sure."

"Right. But if I find it isn't, then, by hades, I'll be waiting for you some place with a machine-gun! See?" As Franks nodded, Colimo turned quickly to his henchmen. "Come along, boys. No time to waste now."

They were out of the room in a flash, and, with a grim smile playing about the corners of his cruel mouth, Franks settled himself comfortably in his chair again. The fact that he had put a man "on the spot," sent him to inevitable doom, worried him not at all—such a ruthless procedure was merely a very small thing in his dastardly life of crime.

It was some twenty minutes later, while Newton, who had returned to the council chamber a few minutes earlier, was listening to Franks' account of the raid on Colimo at the Dojoun, that the door to the room was suddenly and violently flung back on its hinges, causing the two men to jump up with a start.

From the doorway a pair of brown eyes fixed themselves on Johnny Franks with a fierce hatred blazing from their depths. The eyes of Scorpio, whose face showed white as death beneath the black of the bowler he wore at an angle on his head.

"Why, Scorpio, is there anything wrong?" Franks recovered quickly from the shock Scorpio's appearance had given him. He had believed the fellow to be already dead, swept from his path for ever. Somehow his ruthless plan had miscarried. And then he saw the blood that dyed the left sleeve of Scorpio's grey overcoat, knew, with a nameless dread tugging at his heart, that the avenging gunmen had somehow missed with their fell shots. "But, heavens, man, you're wounded! Who did it—how in blazes did it happen?"

"You ask me that, huh? You know nothing about it, huh?" Scorpio advanced menacingly into the room, shutting the door with a backward kick of his foot. "I suppose you'll tell me that Colimo didn't come in here a while ago?"

Franks experienced a tight feeling in his throat, as if vice-like hands were throttling him. So Scorpio was aware of Colimo's visit and evidently suspected that he had been the victim of treachery. How could he explain it all away? It was as he was puzzling his brain for some plausible answer that Newton stepped suddenly forward.

"What the blazes is all this, Scorpio?" The crook lawyer's voice was harsh and his eyes narrowed to mere slits. "What do you mean by Colimo coming here?"

"I mean what I say, and it don't need much brain to put two and two together." Scorpio shot Franks a murderous look. "We shot someone when we raided the Dojoun—thought it was Colimo himself but evidently it wasn't. So along comes Colimo after revenge—I saw him turn into this place with some of his men as I was crossing the stockyards. That's the best of having good eyesight—you can see a devil of a long way off. Then what happened? Colimo asked Franks to name the killer of—"

"A hundred and sixty bucks from Lawson." Mizoski placed the notes on the table. "And four twenty from Peakes. That's the lot."

"He didn't, you darned liar!" Franks shot at him vehemently. "If you want to know Colimo came along to suggest that we cut out this gang warfare and join up—"

"Oh, oh, a pretty tale!" Scorpio's hand slid surreptitiously into his overcoat pocket and the fingers curled around the butt of his gun. "He came to know who it was who fired the shot that killed that rat of his, and you said it was me?"

"I tell you I didn't!" Franks roared. "You've got it wrong. Colimo came here as I said to—"

"That's enough, Franks." Newton's eyes blazed fiercely at the two. "How many more times have I to tell you that I won't have you wrangling. I'm the boss of this outfit, bear that in mind, and if I have any more trouble I'll—"

"Yeah; well, you're going to have a whole heap of trouble right now. See?" Scorpio was not to be pacified by the other's stern words, by the fierce gleam in his eyes. He had been the victim of treachery—of that he felt certain—and revenge blazed in his outraged heart and would not be eradicated. His fingers gripping the butt of his gun even tighter he turned on Johnny Franks again. "You low-down, dirty skunk, put me on the spot, would you? Well, it's the last time you'll live to do—"

His words snapped off as he saw Franks reach suddenly for his jacket pocket. But Scorpio was too quick for him. Like lightning he jerked out his own gun and, with a demoniac grin curling his thick cruel lips, he pressed the trigger.

The shot crashed out, reverberating in the confines of the room like a clap of thunder—drowning the choking sob that escaped Franks' lips as he pitched to the floor, a bullet embedded in his foul heart.

"You blamed fool! What the heck did you want to do that for?" Newton turned on Scorpio like a raging tiger. "That shot will most likely have been heard. Then we'll have the cops up here! At the least, it'll mean we'll have to quit this place. Darned nuisance when it's so handy."

Selfish that he was Newton gave no thought to the shot man. To him Franks and the others were mere pawns in the bootlegging game, to be used to gain his own ends, to line his pockets with the money made in the trading of their illicit liquor. A death or two among his hirelings was all in the day's work.

"But it'll be easy to find another place, boss," Scorpio assured him with the utmost coolness. "I'm darned sorry for all this, of course, but Franks—"

"Shut up; here come the police or I'm a Dutchman." Heavy footsteps were heard ascending the stairs that led from below. With a quick movement Newton made a grab for the gun Scorpio still held in his hand, but the giant pulled it out of his reach. Newton glared at him fiercely. "Give me that gun, you darned fool! Quick now, or you'll find they'll convict you for shooting Johnny Franks. Condemning evidence, see what I mean?"

Scorpio did, and he promptly parted with the gun, wondering what Newton intended to do. Quickly the crook lawyer went to a picture on the wall, moved it to one side, revealing a small safe that was let into the wall. A bare second it took him to swing open the steel door, to thrust the gun inside and to relock the door. Then, setting the picture into position again, he came back to Scorpio just as the handle of the door was turned.

"Keep your mouth shut and leave all to me!" he hissed warningly. "If they take you I'll get you free, never you fear."

And then the door crashed open and into the room strode the captain of police with two uniformed officers, while behind them swarmed a crowd that comprised two newspaper reporters and several customers from the eating-house.

"Ah, so you're the fellow who was concerned in the shooting outside." The police captain casually glanced at the still figure on the floor, then again confronted Scorpio, who, growing suddenly weak from the loss of blood, had slumped into a chair. "I was called out on that affair and got your description from an eye-witness, but didn't think I'd come up with you so easily. A lucky break, and it looks as if I can hold you for murder. Where's your gun?"

But Scorpio made no reply, and the captain quickly ran expert hands over him. Puzzled, he stepped back, then his eyes searched the floor, but there was no sign of the weapon he sought.

"What you done with it? Answer me, you rat?" But Scorpio's mouth remained closed, and the captain swung furiously round on Newton. "You know anything about this, Newton?"

"Sorry, chief, I don't." Newton shook his head, and glanced slyly at Fred Fuller, who managed the eating-house, and was standing in the doorway. "You see, I was downstairs talking to my client, Mr. Fuller, when I heard a shot and came up here to see what it was all about. This fellow"—he indicated Scorpio—"was staggering about the room, his arm limp at his side, while the other was just as you see him now, lying on the floor."

"Hum!" The police captain scratched the back of his head, eyeing Newton doubtfully, for though he had no definite proof he had long nursed the suspicion that the crook lawyer was behind the racketeers of which Franks had appeared the figurehead. "And you saw no gun in either man's hand?"

"No." Again Newton shook his head and twirled his walking-stick. But the police captain was not satisfied. Quickly he turned to Fred Fuller.

"Is what Mr. Newton said correct?" he demanded sharply. "I mean was he talking to you in the office when the shot was fired?"

"Sure!" came the quick answer. "Then why didn't you come up with him?" the captain shot at him.

But the little dark-haired man was equal to the occasion.

"Because I stopped to put my cash away in the safe," he replied. "Surely you don't think I was going to leave it lying about for any sneak thief to come in and whip it up, do you?"

A clever reply that stumped the police officer and caused Newton's eyes to gleam with satisfaction.

"It looks to me as if you've run into a cul-de-sac, old man." Newton grinned at the baffled officer. "Perhaps I can reason this affair out for you. The open window with that roof beyond on a level with it. Quite possible that enemies of these men got up there and shot them, eh?"

"Yes," the captain was forced to admit, though he was far from satisfied. Somehow his suspicions of Newton rankled—he had a vague feeling that the crook lawyer was trying to shield the wounded man in the chair. But where was the fellow's gun? He could prove nothing in court without substantial evidence.

It was at that moment that there came an interruption that startled them all.

"Let me in! Oh, for heaven's sake, let me in!" cried a distracted feminine voice.

It was Peaches who had just arrived at the eating-house for duty only to learn of the shooting and the death of her lover. Wildly she pushed her way through the crowd that swarmed around the door, her face white as death, her eyes swimming with tears.

As she saw the inert figure of Johnny Franks a pitiful shriek escaped her, and she stumbled blindly forward.

"Steady, my girl!" The police captain pulled her back, looked at her sternly. Perhaps this girl, who was evidently attached to the dead man, could give him some useful information—information such as might clear up this mystery. "Now see here, sister, d'you know anything—"

"Scorpio, you wretch!" The girl's eyes flashed venomously as they suddenly perceived the limp figure in the chair. Well she knew that he and Franks had been at loggerheads—a state of affairs brought into being because both had been inordinately jealous of each other in regard to her affections. What was more likely than that Scorpio had killed Franks in some such fit of jealousy? "You did this, Scorpio, I know you did! Killed Johnny because you were insanely jealous that he was my man!"

Scorpio blinked at her dazedly, but no word escaped his lips. She continued to rave at him, denouncing him in shrill tones as the killer of Franks, while Newton fumed inwardly that she should give vent to such condemning words. What should he do? Best remain silent. If Scorpio was taken in charge he would be sure to find some way to obtain his freedom.

"That's quite enough of that, sister!" The police captain nodded his head to the two uniformed officers as he came to a quick decision. "Take him along, boys. I'm going to bring him up on this woman's evidence."

Strong hands gripped Scorpio, but not before the alert newspaper men had taken a flashlight photograph of him huddled in the chair. Then he was dragged to his feet and marched to the door. Peaches, in the grip of hysteria, continuing to rave at him in shrill tones.

"You brute! You murderer!" She shook her fists wildly above her head. "But I'll get you for this, Slaughter-house. I swear to heaven I will!"

Then the tears started afresh and she sank limply into a chair, covering her face with her hands. Another moment and the room was clear, save for herself, one of the uniformed officers, who had been left behind on guard—and that still figure stretched on the floor.

Prowling News Hounds.

SIX months had passed—six months of terror and bloodshed in the town of Centro. During that time not a day had gone by without some street or other echoing to the staccato reports of machine-gun fire, to the cries and the moans of men who had been hit by the leaden messengers of death.

For the whole of those six months, gang warfare had waged in all its brutality and ruthlessness. It was to be a fight to the death—so had vowed each of the two gangs who waged the struggle in an endeavour to obtain complete monopoly of the liquor trade in the town.

Colimo and Scorpio, the leaders in this bitter feud. But it was a different Scorpio to the unkempt and shabby giant who, six months ago, had forsaken the stockyards for a life of crime and murder. From the moment he had been acquitted of the charge of killing Johnny Franks by a jury "framed" by Stanley Newton, he had stepped into the dead man's shoes. Strong and callous, fearless to a degree, he had gone into the booze business with all his heart and soul. Extra men were imported, ruthless killers from Chicago and New York, and slowly but surely encroaching on Colimo's preserves they had increased their nefarious trade a hundred fold.

Success breeds success. Scorpio had heard of the maxim at some time or other, and so he aimed big. He persuaded Newton to open a swell restaurant down town, explaining that it would serve them two purposes. A new source of income, and, in addition, a place from which they could direct the operations of the gang in some degree of comfort.

So Scorpio appeared thereafter immaculately dressed, hair that had once been for ever rumpled, now nicely parted and brushed. He was more arrogant than ever, too, completely wrapped up in his own importance.

But he had his full share of worries—worries other than those in evading the police and the bullets of the Colimo gang. Two newspaper men had taken to frequenting the restaurant—Hank Tarry, of the "Tribune," and Carl Pasher, of the "Examiner." Their papers, out to smash the gang element in Centro, had assigned them to the task of getting the low-down on Scorpio and his hirelings.

Very disturbing knowledge, for Scorpio was aware of the power of the Press—knew that it was to be feared more than the whole police force in the town. Once let the newspapers get condemning evidence, then it would be in cold print for all to see. And the police would act on such evidence—accept it as infallible.

The situation called for the utmost caution. The restaurant was a public place, and it was therefore impossible to bar admittance to the two newshounds. Other measures must be adopted, and for days Scorpio cudgelled his brain on the matter—and at last saw the only way out.

"Say, Newton!" Scorpio caught at the crook lawyer's arm as he came in by way of the private entrance to the restaurant. Quite oblivious that Newton frowned at him with disfavour, resenting the familiar use of his name, the giant pointed across the restaurant to a counter where a well-dressed, dark-haired young man was in friendly conversation with Anne Barford, the pretty flaxen-haired cashier. "That guy and his pal are beginning to get on my nerves. Do you realise they can do us no end of damage if we're not—"

"And you stopped me to tell me that." Newton's lips curled in a sneer. "Have them 'bumped off'—it's the safest way. You can rely upon me to get you off if they happen to run you in for it."

"Yeah, but would you be able to fix every newspaper in the town?" Scorpio followed Newton as he made his way up a flight of stairs that led to the room that served as the gang's council chamber. Together they passed into the apartment. "No, that's too darned dangerous when there are other means. Surely those boys could be bought?"

"The mighty killer scared, huh?" There was scorn in the crook lawyer's eyes, in every inflection of his voice. "Want to buy them off. Well, try it, then come and admit that killing's the only way."

"Very helpful, aren't you?" growled Scorpio, an ugly gleam in his eyes. "But I'm trying it, nevertheless."

He strode from the room, Newton's cynical laugh dinning in his ears, went down the stairs and wended his way across the restaurant.

"Hallo, Anne! Hallo, Carl!" His tone was friendly, the smile on his face disarming as he took hold of the young reporter's arm. "Carl, I'd like a word with you. Do you mind stepping this way?"

"Sure."
Vaguely wondering what Scorpio could want, Carl Pasher gave the pretty cashier a cheery nod and allowed himself to be led into a private room. Just a bare chance that he might glean valuable information if he played his cards well.

"Say, Carl, you strike me as being a decent young kid." Scorpio grinned and squeezed Carl's arms. "Just the boy for Anne. No, no, don't deny it. Ever since you've been coming here I've seen the way the wind's blowing. A fine match you two'll make. But, of course, you've not sufficient money to allow you to fix the date. Well, that's nothing to worry about when a friend's going to give you a little wedding present in advance."

He whipped from his breast-pocket a platinum case. A touch of a spring and it flew open to reveal a wad of thousand dollar bills.

"Well, what do you say?" coaxed Scorpio, watching him from between narrowed lids.

Carl's eyes gleamed—but the light in them was not the light of greed. This bribe—it told him one thing—that this gang of racketeers that was becoming more of a menace to the town every day was scared of the Press. And the thought brought to him a feeling of great elation—added to his determination to do all he could to crush them.

His presence here was upsetting their plans, hindering their business deals, making them tread warily for fear he should learn something that would condemn them for all time.

Scorpio waited till Metz had placed the gun in his breast pocket, then he jerked his thumb imperatively towards the door. "That's better. Now get, and make no mistakes, or there'll be the devil to pay!"

"Thanks all the same, Mr. Scorpio, but I couldn't take it." With a smile on his good-looking features, Carl shook his head. "As a matter of fact, you've got it all wrong. At least, I believe you have, for I suspect that it is Hank Tarry that Anne's got a crush on."

Scorpio bit his lip with chagrin as he realised that his idea of bribery was not going to prove so easy as he had thought. That was the worst of having to deal with two inquisitive news-getters at the same time. But he had to fix them both somehow, so, with a smile on his sinister features, he held out the platinum case invitingly to Carl.

"Well, just the same, take it," he urged. "A little present from a well-wisher, see what I mean?"

Carl did—and he felt like laughing at the impudence of it. But he suppressed the feeling and slowly shook his head.

"No, thanks. I'd rather not, if you don't mind," he said, and, turning sharply on his heel, he strode from the room.

"Curse the little runt!" Scorpio's eyes gleamed savagely beneath lowered brows, his hand instinctively reaching for the gun at his hip. "It looks as if Newton's darned well right. Shooting seems the only way to get rid of 'em."

Returning the platinum case to his breast-pocket he passed from the room. A glance round the restaurant showed him that Carl was nowhere to be seen. Was the boy prowling around somewhere, striving to obtain information of an incriminating nature? Probably he was questioning some member of the staff. At the thought Scorpio became very uneasy. Pearl Peach, much against his wish, had been given the position of hostess in the place. Newton had insisted, telling Scorpio that the only way to make certain she didn't turn completely against the gang was to treat her with friendly respect and consideration. But Scorpio could not feel sure of her; he remembered that wild threat she had flung at him the night he had killed Johnny Franks all too vividly.

"George." Scorpio caught the arm of a passing waiter and spoke in a whisper. "Know where Carl Pasher's gone?" The waiter jerked a thumb towards the door that led to the street. "And the other—Hank Tarry?" Scorpio asked him.

"In the Blue Room with Anne," George informed him with a grin. "Making love, I think."

Scorpio nodded and swung away. Straight to the Blue Room he went, flung open the door and strode inside. Just in time to see Hank and Anne break guiltily from each other's arms.

"All right—don't be scared, kids," Scorpio heaved at them. "A little romance, huh? Well, that's splendid. And I'm the first to know about it, huh? No, no, don't interrupt, Hank." He took from his pocket the same platinum-case with which he had tried to bribe Carl, and held it out to Hank. A touch of the spring and the lid flew back, revealing the notes inside. "A little wedding present in advance, Hank. It might come in mighty handy to help you set up the home."

Hank and Anne were both taken aback at this extraordinary show of generosity, and for the moment they were at a loss for words. Then it suddenly dawned upon the young newsgetter what was the real reason behind the proffered gift, and his eyes gleamed angrily. But before he could find his voice Anne spoke.

December 5th, 1931.

"Sorry, Mr. Scorpio, but we couldn't take it," she said with a bewitching smile. "You see, Hank loves me and so does Carl, and I just can't make up my mind which I shall have."

"Yes, that's just how it stands." Hank was glad of the chance to let it go at that, for he realised now that the words he would have uttered might have had disastrous consequences, and trouble then was the last thing he wanted to happen. He must remain discreet if he hoped to obtain the information he sought.

"But thanks all the same, Mr. Scorpio," he went on. "The thought was very nice of you."

He caught at Anne's arm and led her from the room, and the door closed behind them.

"Blamed little rat!" Scorpio clenched his fists so tightly that the knuckles showed white beneath the skin, and in his eyes was the look of the killer.

"Hell, hut Newton's right. It's the only way to be sure of them!"

The Town in Their Grip.

CENTRO was in a very bad way, and every decent citizen deplored the terrible calamity that had befallen the town on this cold December day. The thing seemed almost incredible—yet it was true enough, though many suspected that it was the result of trickery.

Gang law had the town completely in its grip now, for that day there had been an election for a new mayor, and one of the candidates had been Nick Mizoski, known to be a member of the dread Scorpio gang of racketeers and killers. And he had been elected!

Newton had seen to that, though it had cost him many dollars in the way of bribes.

In the gang's council chamber at the restaurant that night there was great rejoicing, for this victory in the election meant that Scorpio and his hirelings would have unlimited licence to pursue their nefarious "trade." The cops would be well nigh helpless to charge them with anything, for always there would be Newton and Nick Mizoski to intercede on their behalf.

"A great scheme, this election." Scorpio rubbed his big hands together in almost childish delight. "We've now got this town just where we want it, and we're going to make all the money we can. Shove the booze out to every restaurant, every speakeasy and road-house for miles around. My, but it's—"

He broke off as the door swung open and the captain of police came in, his jaw set with grim determination, contempt showing in his eyes.

"Ah, ha, if it isn't our friend, the police chief, come to congratulate us." Scorpio leered in the officer's face. "Say, you small fry, you're not wanted in this burg now. You're sacked, hear me?"

"Couldn't help but hear with such a loud and uncouth voice bellowing in my ear." The captain glared at every one of them in disgust, Newton, Mizoski, Metz, Lewis and Larkins. "But let me tell you this, Scorpio, your friend, the mayor, can't fire me, for I resigned an hour ago—and here's my badge." He flung the silver star almost contemptuously on a table. "And now I'm telling you all something. Though I'm in the force no longer, you haven't seen the last of me. Now just you sleep on that!"

With a great show of dignity he strode from the room, and on his way down the stairs he passed two men coming up from the restaurant. Colimo, and his henchman, Delano, but they took no notice of him. They proceeded up the stairs, and Delano knocked on the door of the council chamber.

"Come in!" Scorpio's eyes went wide with amazement as Colimo and Delano entered the room. "What the blazes d'you two want? Don't say you've come to congratulate us?"

"Sure we have." With the utmost coolness, Colimo went over to Nick Mizoski, delivered a few congratulatory words that somehow did not ring true, then shook him by the hand. Ignoring the others, he came back to Scorpio and grasped his fist. "Congratulations to you, too, Scorpio. It'll sure be a pleasure to pit our wits against such notable men."

"Yeah?" Scorpio glared at him menacingly from beneath lowered brows. "Then you've sure got something coming to you, Colimo."

Colimo grinned suavely, and, releasing Scorpio's hand, he went slowly from the room. As Delano made to follow him, the giant barred his path.

"Say, our gang is going to rule this town from now on. Just you get that under your cady." He winked his eye, and there was a wealth of meaning behind the gesture. "We pay our men well, so when you find your boss is not much use any more just you blow over here. Maybe we'll find you a job."

Delano looked at him levelly, puzzling over the words, then he went out after his chief.

"Scorpio, what in blazes were you getting at?" Newton demanded somewhat angrily. "I don't like the way you act—anyone would think it was you who were the head of this organisation, not me."

"Sorry!" Scorpio's grin was twisted. "No offence, really. I was only putting the wind up our dear old friends Colimo and Delano."

But Scorpio was not play acting. He was in deadly earnest, and when the others departed some while later he arrested Metz's progress as that unprepossessing scoundrel was on the point of following the others from the room.

"A little assignment for you, Metz." He closed the door softly, waited till the footsteps of the others had died away down the stairs, then drew out his gun, and thrust it into Metz's hand. "Get that skunk, Colimo, and don't dare to come back until you have."

Metz hesitated, then made a motion towards the closed door. Scorpio spat an oath, guessing the meaning of the dummy's gesture.

"Hang Newton! You do what I say or, by hades, you'll get what's coming to Colimo." Eyes gleaming ferociously, Scorpio waited till Metz had placed the gun in his breast-pocket with fingers that trembled, then he jerked his thumb imperatively towards the door. "That's better. Now get and make no mistake or there'll be the devil to pay."

A diabolical grin hovering around his cruel mouth, Scorpio watched Metz as he went slowly from the room, then when the door had closed behind him he coolly lit himself a fat cigar.

Death Stalks Hank Tarry.

WITH the death of Colimo so went all rivalry to the gang of boot-leggers led by the notorious Scorpio. The entire liquor trade in Centro was now theirs, and in consequence their profits rose exceedingly. Not for a moment did Delano, Colimo's right-hand man, or any of the dead gangster's hirelings, think to contest the territory they had hitherto called their own—in fact, they offered their services to Scorpio, who accepted them with surprising readiness.

In the days that followed, Stanley Newton chafed at the way in which Scorpio assumed command in everything connected with their organisation. Never was he consulted. Scorpio did as he pleased. But though the crook lawyer resented this slight upon him, he realised Scorpio's worth, and mastered the rage that blazed deep in his heart.

But danger loomed upon the horizon for these ruthless law breakers—danger that threatened from two different sources.

The late captain of the police of Centro, together with six wealthy city business men, had banded themselves together, determined to exterminate Scorpio and his gang—to entirely suppress the trade of illicit liquor that not only lined the pockets of these lawless ruffians, but threatened to wreck many a poor man's home. Stout men these six—men who wore masks whenever they held a meeting as a means of safeguarding their identity. Once let their identity and their object become known and their lives would be forfeit. Scorpio would see to that.

But at the moment the real danger to Tony Scorpio and his hired ruffians was Hank Tarry, and on the evening five days after the killing of Colimo, when Scorpio threw a party at the restaurant, he contrived to slip into the place entirely unseen.

Into the suite of private rooms that were Scorpio's he stole and began a diligent search of cupboards, drawers, and every article of furniture that might conceal a gun. If only he could trace the weapon that had fired the shot that had killed Colimo! What a triumph it would be for both himself and his paper if he could prove his suspicions—if he could only lay that crime at Scorpio's door!

He came into the gang-leader's bedroom, opened a small bedside locker. A few bottles of medicine, a packet of chewing-gum, a box of cigarettes, but no sign of a gun. He moved towards the dressing-table, and then had the misfortune to kick into a chair. Quickly he shot out his hand to save it from falling, but though he succeeded in doing this, the chair thumped the floor as he righted it.

Fearful lest the sound might have been heard by those making merry in the dining-room adjoining, he moved swiftly to the door that led into the luxurious sitting-room. Not a moment too soon, for barely had he passed out of sight and closed the sitting-room door softly behind him than Scorpio and Newton entered the bed-room looking about them with suspicious eyes.

"I swear I heard a sound in this room." His hand on the butt of the gun concealed in his hip-pocket, Scorpio made a thorough search of the apartment, then moved to the door of the sitting-room, motioning to Newton to follow him. "Better take a good look round. Those infernal newspaper guys are too nosy for my liking. It's just like them to slip in to see what they can find."

"You should have taken my advice and got them out of the way, you fool." As Scorpio snorted and strode into the sitting-room, Newton followed him. The place was empty, but the crook lawyer, hearing the faint sound of footfalls, made a sudden grab at Scorpio's arm. "Quick, man! There's someone creeping down the stairs!"

They fairly leaped for the door that opened out on to a landing where a flight of stairs ran down to the restaurant. As they dashed out and came to the top of the stairs, they saw Hank almost at the foot of them, and their eyes flashed murderously.

"Say, you!" As Hank pulled up at the bottom of the stairs, knowing it was useless to make a bolt for it now that he had been discovered, Scorpio raced down to him, followed more slowly by Newton. "What in heck you doing here, you prying young rat? Tell me, or by the love of Mike I'll—"

A sudden knock upon the private door of the restaurant caused Scorpio to bite off his words and to reach quickly for his gun.

"Careful new, you darned fool!" Newton, who had now joined them, clamped a hand on Scorpio's wrist, and there was a look of warning in his eyes. "Take my advice and see who it is before you do anything rash."

Scorpio muttered something uncomplimentary under his breath, went to the door and opened it, watched by Hank, who had an idea who the visitor might be, and was thankful that the diversion had come in the nick of time. Carl Pasher stood outside, and his shrewd eyes took in the situation at a glance.

"Ah, Hank!" He pushed past Scorpio, who swore at him, hurried over to Hank, and took his arm. "I've been looking for you everywhere, old son. You're wanted at your office—the boss rang me up to know if I knew your whereabouts, and I promised to locate you. Come on. Make it snappy."

He led Hank to the door where Scorpio still stood, completely dazed by the audacious coolness of Carl, and together the two newspaper reporters passed outside.

"The cops—they're after me!" Fearfully Scorpio pointed out of the window. "Peaches, for the love of heaven, help me—save me!"

"My heck, can you beat it!" Scorpio closed the door with a crash, and, his face a mask of cold fury, he confronted Newton. "That was a put-up job. You think that fellow Tarry got a line on us?"

"Quite likely." Newton's brows furrowed for a moment or two in thought; then: "Heavens, did you leave that gun about with which Colimo was shot?"

"It was up in the sitting-room—behind the books in the bookcase." Some idea of the trend of Newton's thoughts came to Scorpio then. "You don't mean to say he was looking for the gun to—"

"Yes, that's what I do mean—that he knows the calibre of the bullet that shot Colimo, and he's been rummaging around here hoping to find a gun that fires that type of shot. Heavens, if he's found that—Here, where you going, Scorpio?"

"To see if that gun's still where I left it!" Scorpio flung back as he flew up the stairs.

Within a couple of minutes he was back again, Metz following close at his heels.

"It's gone. That scrimp of a news-hound's got it!" Face contorted with passion, eyes gleaming fiendishly, Scorpio jerked his head towards Metz. "But Metz is going out after him, to stop the rat from producing that gun as evidence in the killing of Colimo. See?"

"Sure." Newton nodded his head. It was the very first time he had been in complete agreement with the ruthless giant. "It's the only way."

A terse command that came harshly from Scorpio's lips, and Metz slid from the restaurant to fulfil his murderous mission. As he came out on to the sidewalk he saw Hank and Carl some two hundred yards along the road, and went quickly after them. But not until they turned into a deserted alleyway, where they parted company some little distance along it, did his evil hand clasp the butt of the gun that he carried at his hip.

For perhaps five minutes longer he stole stealthily after his victim, then, considering that his opportunity had come, he whipped out the automatic and, levelling it quickly, pulled the trigger twice. Down went Hank with scarcely a sound, shot clean through the back, and bare seconds afterwards Metz was by his side, dragging the condemning gun from his coat pocket.

Not the least sound disturbed the peace of the alleyway. A silencer had been fitted to the gun that Metz had used, and a moment later he calmly made his way from the scene of the dastardly crime as if nothing untoward had happened.

Framed!

THE murder of Hank Tarry not only aroused the fury of every newspaper in Centro, but it also aroused the indignation of every decent citizen in the town. What were the police doing to allow such cold-blooded crimes to go unpunished? Were they corrupted that they never brought to trial these brutal assassins? Words such as these were whispered everywhere—in homes, restaurants, and night clubs.

Then, two days following the murder of Hank Tarry, the news broke in every news-sheet that found publication in Centro. The police had arrested Scorpio, the notorious racketeer, on information given them by Carl Pasher, of the "Examiner," and he was to be brought to trial for Hank's murder that same day.

December 5th, 1931.

Every seat in the court-room was taken long before the time fixed for the case to be heard. Outside the building the street was seething with people who clamoured wildly, but in vain, to obtain admittance to what was considered the biggest trial in the annals of the town. But the police, in great numbers in ease an attempt should be made by the prisoner's gunmen to get Scorpio away from his trial, dealt with them firmly and kept them at a distance from the doors.

Prompt to time the trial opened. The prosecuting counsel outlined the case for the State—Scorpio was charged with having brutally murdered Hank Tarry and also his late rival, Colimo.

Counsel called only one witness—Carl Pasher, who stated that on the night of Hank's death the young reporter of the "Tribune," suspecting that it was Scorpio who had killed Colimo, had set out to prove those suspicions of his. He knew the calibre of the bullet that had killed the gang leader, and in a search of Scorpio's rooms he had found a gun hidden in a bookcase that fired the very same type of shot.

"You knew that Tarry went to the prisoner's rooms believing that he might find the gun that fired the fatal shot?" prosecuting counsel inquired of Carl.

"Sure." Carl was aware of the fierce look that Scorpio shot him, but it in no way perturbed him. "As a matter of fact, I had an arrangement with Tarry that I should call at Scorpio's place if he didn't show up in half an hour—just in case of accidents."

"And you did that?"

"Yes," Carl answered, without the least hesitation. "And I was just in time to get him safely away. He had been discovered as he was leaving after his search of the place."

The eyes of the prosecuting counsel gleamed in admiration of the plucky witness. This boy had no fear of the man he was testifying against—did not fear in the least that the prisoner's gang might take revenge on him for making such condemning statements against their leader.

"Now, Pasher, answer me this," counsel said. "Did Tarry find the gun he sought?"

On the instant necks were craned, ears strained to catch the answer to this most vital question. Eyes smouldering with the fires of vicious hatred, Scorpio looked intently at Carl, knowing what the answer to that question would be.

"Yes." Carl's voice rang through the court-room, clear and strong.

"Then what happened?" inquired counsel for the prosecution.

"We went off towards our offices," answered Carl. "At the corner of West and East Streets I left Tarry to go on to his place where he intended to acquaint his editor of the discovery he had made at the prisoner's apartments."

Prosecuting counsel smiled grimly as he stepped back, signifying that he had finished his cross-examination of the witness. Counsel for the defence was then asked if he would like to cross-examine Carl.

"No, your honour." Stanley Newton shook his head as he got upon his feet. Well he knew that the evidence of this witness was all-condemning, that no word of his could disapprove its authenticity. But clever rogue that he was he had already planned a way out for the prisoner, a way that was cunning and brutal in the extreme.

"If I might have the court's indulgence, your honour," he said, as Carl left the witness-stand, "I would like to call a man who is present in court, a man who'll prove that my client is innocent of the murders of which he is charged."

There was a stir in court as the judge sanctioned the request, and Newton, in a loud voice, called the name of Metz.

Wondering vaguely how the crook lawyer was going to obtain Scorpio's acquittal through him, Metz left his seat among the general public and went into the witness-stand.

"Your name is Metz?" were Newton's first words to him.

Metz nodded, and the gesture caused the judge to frown.

"Kindly answer in the proper manner, Metz," came this reproving voice.

"Now," went on Newton, his eyes fixed inscrutably on Metz's face, "I have obtained information from a certain quarter that it was you who killed—"

"I object, your honour!" Prosecuting counsel was on his feet in a moment, gazing appealingly at the judge. "The learned counsel's words are irrelevant to this case."

"Objection overruled," intoned the judge.

"The information I obtained," resumed Newton, his eyes gleaming triumphantly, "was that you committed these two crimes on which my client stands accused. Do you deny it?"

Metz, his face the picture of bewilderment, vigorously nodded his head. He was quite at a loss to understand exactly what Newton was driving at.

"The witness will answer in the proper manner," the judge thundered, gazing sternly at Metz.

It was then that Newton went across to the judge and spoke in a voice that only he could hear.

"I have been told this man pretends to be dumb. Shall I pursue my point, your honour?"

The judge nodded, and Newton returned to face Metz again.

"You murdered these two men," he said with savage intensity. "It is useless to deny it, for witnesses are waiting to swear you did."

The tone of Newton's voice, the sinister gleam in his eyes, awakened in Metz a sudden feeling of alarm. In that moment it came to him that the crook lawyer was trying to "frame" him, was endeavouring to swing the whole blame on him so that he could obtain Scorpio's acquittal. Discretion was thrown to the winds then. Under the urge of self-preservation Metz suddenly found his voice.

"But I was forced to kill them," he babbled wildly. "If I hadn't—"

"Your honour." Newton turned to the judge, giving Metz no time to say words that would prove Scorpio's duplicity. "The man in the stand is self-condemned. He pretended to be dumb, a pose to evade answering my questions. I ask that my client be discharged."

Though he suspected that Scorpio was behind the killings, that he it was who had given the orders that had resulted in the brutal murders of Hank Tarry and the gangster Colimo, the judge acquiesced, ordering Metz to be arrested, to stand trial for those two ruthless crimes on a day to be fixed by the public prosecutor. No doubt but what the true facts of the case would be revealed then. Metz would swear that he had acted on Scorpio's instructions and then they would have a clear

(Continued on page 28.)

Two kinds of outlaws—a wild stallion and a ruthless bad man—both ridden to a finish—conquered by a daredevil and reckless cowpuncher.

"WILD HORSE"

(One Thousand Dollars Reward.)

MORNING smiled on the grandeur of the Kentucky mountain country, where the hills piled themselves one against the other. In a grassy valley nestled a large ranch, which at the moment resounded to the sound of many shrill-voiced whoops and the smashing detonations of six-guns.

The ranch, only a few days before, had been a peaceful spot, but Colonel Ben Hall, a promoter of rodeos, had hired the ranch buildings and corrals to try out cowpunchers and bucking brones for the rodeo he was holding in Gunsight, the cow-town some few miles away.

Leaning on the rails of the largest corral and watching an aspirant to rodeo honours taking a toss from a wildly pitching little cow-pony, two cow-boys grinned at his downfall.

"That's the third hombre that wall-eyed pinto has thrown, Skeeter," grinned Jim Wright, the big, genial-looking 'puncher. He was about five feet ten inches in height and turned the scales at something over fourteen stone.

"Betcha yuh do better'n that," said Skeeter Burke, with conviction. Totally different in appearance from Jim Wright, he was about seventy-nine inches in height, thin as a lath, with a long, lean face, bronzed by sun, wind and dust. His eyes were perpetually squinting, and deep wrinkles, that concentrated at their corners, splaying outwards, told of a deep sense of humour in his make-up.

"You got through okay," said Jim. "Guess it's up to me, if we're to stick together."

A hail came from the man in charge of the chute:

"Hey, Wright! Your turn to take a toss!"

"Good luck, Jim," said Skeeter, as Jim turned towards the end of the corral.

A few minutes later he was seated firmly in the saddle of a brone that was like a bunch of steel wire and full of fiery spirit. He could feel the muscles

Starring
HOOT GIBSON
and
ALBERTA VAUGHN

quivering under the satiny skin, and the horse rolled its eyes wickedly.

"All right," cried Jim, settling down in the saddle. "Let go."

The men in charge of the chute swung back the gate and, with a bound, the brone was out and bucking furiously, trying to dislodge the human limpet on its back.

"Ride him, cowboy!" yelled Skeeter, in a stentorian voice.

Three minutes later the battle was ended. The wild-eyed brone stood in the centre of the corral, its head drooping and its breath coming in great gasps. Jim Wright slipped to the ground, and his humorous face was wreathed in smiles as he patted the animal's head.

"Hard luck, little hoss," he said. "You sure put up a good show, but you had to lose, you know," he added, with a laugh.

He turned and walked over to Skeeter and climbed over the corral fence.

"Well ridden, boys!" It was Colonel Hall who had ridden up. He was a little fat man of some sixty-odd years.

"Thanks, colonel," replied Jim. "Do we get the job?"

"Sure!" said the colonel heartily. "My daughter Alice will sign you on. She looks after the business side of this outfit," he added, leading Jim and Skeeter over to a girl sitting on the corral fence near the chutes.

"Alice," he said, "take Jim Wright and Skeeter Burke over to the house and sign 'em up for the rodeo."

"Okay, dad," she replied, slipping to the ground before Skeeter had the chance to offer his assistance, for he rather fancied himself as a charmer of the fair sex as well as a tamer of wild horses.

As she led the way to the trim little ranchhouse, Jim stole a glance at her, and noted that she was more than pretty. Her eyes were a deep brown and her hair was a beautiful bluey-black. She was dressed in a flowered frock and a large picture hat that was more common in the big cities than in the cow-cabins, and Jim noted that it set her oval face and alabaster skin off to perfection.

"When is the rodeo to take place, Miss Alice?" asked Skeeter.

"Oh, not for another five weeks yet," she replied. "You see, dad always likes to have plenty of time in which to get everything fixed up properly, so that there can be no hitch on the actual day."

Arriving at the ranchhouse, she told them to wait on the veranda while she got the agreement papers they were to sign, and was about to enter the house when a hail reached her.

"Hey, Alice!" They looked round and saw Colonel Hall hurrying over to them from the stables and barns.

"Why, dad, whatever's the matter?" cried Alice anxiously.

"It's that 'Devil' again!" The colonel mopped his brow with a large silk handkerchief. "A bunch of boys have just ridden in from the hills bringing one of their pals badly smashed up. 'Phone for the doctor straight away."

Alice turned on the instant and hurried into the house.

"Who is this Devil you spoke about, colonel?" asked Jim, his curiosity aroused.

"It's a great white palomino stallion up in the hills," said the colonel. "Men who have got close to it say it has got a split hoof, and its hatred for humans is known all over the range."

"The doctor is coming out right away," called Alice, as she came out of the ranchhouse.

"Good!" The four made their way to the barn where the injured man had been carried, and found the doorway crowded with cowboys, who were muttering dark threats against the Devil horse.

"Ef I get that devil hoss under the sights of my rifle," said one, "he sure won't injure any other hombre."

"You said it," spoke another. "I guess we'd better go an' plug him."

"Dad," said Alice, laying a hand on her father's arm, "don't let them shoot that beautiful horse."

"H'm!" said the colonel thoughtfully. "It would be a good draw for the rodeo if we could get the Devil into the arena."

"Wait a minute, boys," he cried, holding up his hand. "Don't shoot the horse. I'll pay anybody who has the nerve to go up into the hills, capture the Devil and bring him back here in good shape a thousand dollars—cash!"

A murmur broke out from the cowboys, for shooting and trying to capture the horse were two vastly different propositions, although a thousand dollars was a lot of money. Jim glanced at Skeeter, who nodded his head.

"We'll go, colonel," said Jim.

"Oh, yeah!" sneered a voice.

The speaker leant against the doorpost of the barn. He was dressed in a gaudy silk shirt and jacket with a flaming red scarf wound round his throat. Some people would have called him handsome, but as Jim glanced at him through narrowed eyes, he noted that the chin was on the weak side and the eyes were set a trifle too close together. He was Gil Davis, the world's champion bucking-horse rider and star man in Colonel Hall's outfit.

He returned Jim's gaze and laughed. "A thousand dollars will buy me a spree in town before th' rodeo," he said.

"But you haven't got the thousand—yet," replied Jim quietly, but with a hint of steel in his voice, for he had taken a sudden and unaccountable dislike to the champion rider.

"It's as good as in my pocket right now," Davis left his leaning post and stood in front of Jim. "While you two sapheads are roamin' around, lost in the hills, Gil Davis, world's champion brone rider"—he slapped himself arrogantly on the chest—"will be in town spendin' that thousand bucks!"

Jim felt like smashing his fist into the sneering face in front of him, but, calming himself, said to Skeeter:

"Come on, Skeeter, let's go and see about getting that hoss."

"The Devil."

THE next morning the partners set out for the valleys and crags which was the home of the Devil. Jim was leading a loaded pack-horse, while Skeeter trailed a magnificent black stallion, "borrowed" from the colonel's corrals. Jim had had an idea, so Skeeter had quietly roped the stallion.

They rode for the best part of the morning, and were deep in the hills when Jim turned to Skeeter.

"Guess we must be gettin' pretty close to that old cabin we was told about," he observed.

"Yeah," replied Skeeter, "but who's this guy comin'?"

He had glanced sideways and had seen a rider coming down the hill on December 5th, 1931.

their left. They halted as they saw that the course taken by the stranger would bring him to them.

"Howdy?" said the stranger, as he pulled his horse to a stop. "Where'd you get that cayuse?" he added, pointing to the stallion.

"Colonel Hall lent him to us," replied Jim. "But what's it to do with you?"

"I'm Sheriff Hopkins." The representative of law and order in that part of the country drew his waistcoat aside and showed them the silver star pinned to his shirt. "I suppose you ain't seen a dark-lookin' guy ridin' around, have yuh?"

"Can't say we have," said Skeeter, rubbing the stubble on his chin and looking thoughtful.

"What's he rustled, a horse?" queried Jim, a twinkle in his eye.

"No," snapped the sheriff. "He's a dangerous criminal named Hank Howard, an' he busted into the Gun-sight bank an' got away with a pile of dollars."

"That's too bad," observed Skeeter.

"Well, ef you see him, bring him into town," said the sheriff. "S'long!"

They parted, and Jim and Skeeter rode off to locate the cabin one of the cowboys at the ranch had said was near where the Devil roamed with a band of wild mares.

Meanwhile, in the shack, a man was moving stealthily about looking for a hiding-place. It was Hank Howard, the bank bandit, and as his glance encountered the fireplace, piled with logs, he stooped and took from his shirt a wallet stuffed with dollar bills. Shifting the front logs, he placed the wallet at the back of the pile and replaced the front ones.

"That'll be safe there for the time bein'," he muttered, "until that sheriff gets off the trail."

He glanced round the cabin to see that he had left no mark of his visit and then slipped out of the door, and, mounting his horse, rode into the brush at the back of the cabin.

Soon after parting with the sheriff, Jim and Skeeter sighted the cabin half-hidden in the trees.

"There she is, Skeeter!" cried Jim.

They dismounted and hitched their horses to the veranda rail. Jim pushed open the door, and they glanced round the interior. Everywhere was thick with dust, and looked as though nobody had entered the place for months.

"We'd better dump the pack an' go straight after the Devil," said Jim.

"Okay," replied Skeeter. "You take the pack-horse to that corral I noticed among the trees."

They untied the pack, and, while Skeeter carried it into the cabin and dumped it into a corner, Jim took the unwanted pack-horse and turned it loose in the ramshackle corral built amongst the trees.

Mounting their brones and leading the stallion, Jim and Skeeter rode towards a rocky crag where the wild horse had last been seen.

As they neared the crag they saw the horse appear at the top and stand with head thrown back, surveying the country. Jim reined in his brone and gazed with admiration at the magnificent spectacle. He had seen many fine horses during the course of his wanderings over the range country, but never before had he seen such a wonderful creature.

The palomino wasn't big, but its coat was dead white, and under the satin skin Jim could see the powerful muscles of its sloping shoulders ripple and bunch, showing it must have a turn of speed that would be almost impossible to match.

"What a beauty!"

The exclamation slipped from Jim's lips, and Skeeter was no less enthusiastic.

"He certainly is," said Skeeter. "Just look at the way he holds his head, look at the strength in those legs—"

But Jim wasn't listening.

"I'm gonna ride you, you beauty," he muttered, "if it's the last time I ever throw a leg over a brone!"

He turned to Skeeter suddenly.

"Come on, cowboy!" he cried. "We've got a man's job catching that brone."

The Devil horse wheeled from the top of the crag and disappeared into a valley that was thick with trees and shrubs. Jim and Skeeter rode quietly forward and reached the entrance to the valley.

Screened behind a clump of mesquite bush, they watched the Devil and the fifty or sixty mares that were grazing peacefully off the lush grass.

Unknown to them, another cowboy was also watching the Devil. It was none other than Gil Davis, who had quietly trailed Jim and Skeeter from the ranch. He was closer to the wild horses, but as he caught sight of his two rivals he made no attempt to go after the Devil.

"Now, Skeeter," said Jim. "We're gonna let that stallion loose, and, while that Devil hoss is fightin' with him, I'll ride up an' rope him. If I miss I'll drive him this way, an' you can drop your rope over his neck."

"If you miss him!" growled Skeeter. "What chance hev I got of ropin' that brone with you let loose with your lariat?"

Jim smiled at the compliment.

"Stop your kiddin', Skeeter, an' let that stallion go," he said.

Skeeter slipped the halter of the stallion, and, with a slap on its rump, drove it forward towards the Devil horse.

The stallion trotted towards the group of horses with a sbrill neigh. The wild horse leader of the band raised its magnificent white head and whistled a challenging clarion call. Almost as if by some prearranged code, the mares trotted off up the valley to a safe distance, while the Devil stood and waited for the strange horse to come up.

With teeth bared and eyes gleaming hatred, the stallion advanced on the wild horse. As the stallion made a snap at the white throat, the wild horse rose on its hind legs and tried to smash the stallion to the ground with its forelegs.

But the stallion twisted and dodged, and ere the wild horse had quite recovered plunged to the attack. There was a welter of dust and loud squeals, and through the dust Jim and Skeeter could see that the wild horse was gradually overcoming the stallion.

"Now!" hissed Skeeter. "Now's your chance!"

Jim uncoiled his forty-foot raw-hide lariat, shook out the kinks, and carefully recoiled it.

"Better let me have that spare rope of yours, Skeeter," he said as an afterthought. "I might want it."

Skeeter passed over the lariat, and with a pressure of his knees, Jim sent his brone forward at a gallop. The wild horse had by this time almost vanquished the stallion, who was backing away in terror from those gleaming teeth and flashing hoofs. The creature suddenly caught sight of Jim bearing down on him with his lariat whirling, and, neighing defiance, galloped off up the valley as hard as he could; he had had many experiences of those whirling ropes, and knew that the only method to keep away from their coils was flight.

The wild horse was fast, but he was tired, and Jim had a game-hearted little cowpony under him that had quite a good turn of speed, and was steadily gaining on his quarry, when from out of the bushes on his left, Gil Davies suddenly swung into view, cut in in front of Jim, and raced as hard as his pony would go after the Devil.

With a cry of rage, Jim swung his lariat and sent it snaking out after Davis. His aim was true, and the noose settled down over Davis' shoulders. With a jerk Jim tautened the rope, and it seemed as though a giant hand had plucked Davis out of his saddle. He hit the ground with a crash and rolled into a thorn bush.

Jim let go of his rope, and, snatching the spare rope he had taken from Skeeter, raced after his quarry, twirling the rope above his head. With a faint hiss the rope snaked out from his hand and settled round the graceful neck of the wild horse.

Plunging wildly, the Devil tried to rid himself of the rope, but Jim kept it taut; a few minutes later Skeeter rode up, and, throwing his rope round the horse's neck, put the issue beyond doubt. The wild horse, that all men called the Devil, was captured!

"What now?" cried Skeeter. "Can you hold the boss while I go after that snake Davis?" He pointed down the trail. "Look, the skunk's tryin' to get to his feet. If he tries to draw, I'll beat him to it."

"Let him go, Skeeter," replied Jim. "We've got the horse, and that's all that matters. Come on, we'd better get the Devil into that corral at the hut."

With two ropes on him, the Devil was forced along to the corral at the back of the hut, and as Skeeter placed the bars that formed the gate into position, Jim gave a chuckle of satisfaction.

"Do you know, Skeeter," he said, "in spite of that thousand bucks the colonel offered for the Devil, I'd like to keep that horse. It's the finest piece of horse-flesh I've ever seen, an' I've seen a few horses in my time."

"Same here," agreed Skeeter. "But a thousand bucks is a thousand bucks, Jim, an' we're not exactly flourishin'."

"All right, old pardner!" Jim slapped Skeeter fondly on the back. "We'll turn the Devil over to the colonel an' collect the cash. Now for some grub. Come on!"

Murder.

THE first shades of the evening were falling as the buddies entered the cabin. They looked round, and on a shelf in the corner found an oil-lamp still with a plentiful supply of oil in it.

Jim trimmed the wick and lit the lamp, and, with it glowing on the table, the cabin looked almost cheerful.

"Come on, Skeeter," cried Jim. "Get the coffee-pot ready, an' I'll mix up the flapjacks."

Meanwhile, Gil Davies had extricated himself from the thorn bush into which he had rolled when Jim had pulled him off his bronc, and, cursing the partners, he caught his horse and mounted.

He rode slowly towards the cabin, muttering threats and planning how best to get even with Jim and Skeeter. As he neared the cabin and saw the white wild horse in the corral, an idea took hold of him and a cruel smile creased his thin lips.

"I'll have that thousand yet," he muttered savagely.

Dismounting some distance from the cabin, he hid his bronc in the bushes, and stealthily crept towards the window of the cabin. Peering in, he saw Jim and Skeeter getting their evening meal ready, and shook his fist silently at them.

Slipping away to where the riding horses of the two had been staked out, he cut their halters and, giving each a good slap with his hand, sent the high-spirited cow-ponies off at a gallop.

"What's that?" yelled Skeeter, as he heard the sound of galloping hoofs.

Jim strode to the window and looked out.

"Our ridin' stock is loose!" he snapped. "Come on."

He dashed out of the cabin, closely followed by Skeeter, but their brones were well away, and galloping hard.

Jim stopped.

"That's sure enough put us in a mess," he said ruefully. "You go back and get on with the grub. I'll go and round up them darned brones."

"Okay!" replied Skeeter. He picked up the lariat that was on his saddle peg where he had put it. "Better take a rope with yuh," he added.

Jim took the rope and coiled it over his shoulder and stepped out after the vanished horses. Skeeter half turned back into the hut, then paused.

"Darn funny thing fer them brones to bust loose," he muttered. "I'll go an' look at them hobbies."

He strode over to where the brones had been tied up for the night and picked up the ropes.

"Cut!" he snarled. "If I'd got my hands on the dirty skunk that did this I'd—I'd—"

He broke off as through the trees he caught a glimpse of a figure taking down the bars of the corral. Silently he slipped across to the corral, drawing his forty-five as he went.

"Stick 'em up, hombre!" he ground out, digging the gun into the middle of Gil Davis' back. "An' don't try any funny tricks!"

Davis raised his hands and muttered a curse.

"Get goin' to the cabin," said Skeeter, prodding the prisoner with his gun. "I've got a few words to say to yuh!"

Davis was compelled to obey, for with a gun pressing into the small of one's back it is no time to argue.

"All right, Davis," said Skeeter, as they entered the cabin. "That's far enough. Now turn round."

Davis swung round on his heel and took a chance. With his left hand he grabbed Skeeter's wrist and whipped his right full into the jaw of the cowboy. Skeeter staggered back, and with a lightning movement, Davis jerked the gun from his hand.

Skeeter recovered his balance and plunged forward, and before Davis could bring the weapon round, grabbed the barrel. There and then began a struggle for the forty-five.

Backwards and forwards across the cabin floor they reeled, each striving to gain possession of the gun. In the struggle the gun fell to the floor and was kicked into the corner.

They broke apart, and Skeeter drew back. Davis charged forward, exulting, and aimed one mighty punch at Skeeter's unprotected jaw. Then things began to happen. Somehow the blow went awry, for Skeeter was no longer on the spot where he had been when it had been launched; and next instant a fist that felt like a lump of rock took Davis on the jaw and propelled him ungracefully, all flailing arms and sprawling legs, into the corner.

He rose to his feet and immediately lumbered straight into a hurricane of punches. His head was jerked back three times in quick succession. His ribs sustained a series of shocks that made him grunt. His jaw coming in for punishment again, he took the floor a second time.

This time he fell on to the gun that had been kicked into a corner at the commencement of the fight, and as he touched it his eyes lit up with exultation. He snatched the gun up and levelled it at Skeeter.

"Now," he snarled, as he slowly rose to his feet and advanced on the puncher, "I've got you just where I want you!"

With the barrel almost touching Skeeter's chest, he pressed the trigger. There was a deafening explosion and, with a strangled sob in his throat,

The rope snaked out and settled round the graceful neck of the wild horse.

Skecter crashed on to his back and lay still.

For a few brief moments Davis gazed down at the lifeless puncher and fear seized him. But with an effort he shook it off, and loading the forty-five, stuck it back in Skecter's holster.

He rose to his feet and slipped out of the cabin.

Arrest and Escape.

THE sun rose in a magnificent ball of fire, and as the beams penetrated the valley where the cabin was situated it also showed Jim Wright, jogging along, riding his bronc bareback and leading Skecter's.

Arriving at the cabin Jim slipped to the ground and tied the horses to the veranda rail, then let out a shout.

"Hey, Skecter!" he yelled. "I'm back!"

There was no answer to his hail, and a puzzled frown appeared on his brow. He pushed open the door.

"Hey, lazy," he cried, "why haven't you got—"

His voice trailed away to silence as he caught sight of the still figure of his partner, laying stretched out in death.

"Skecter," he whispered, dropping on his knees beside the body. "Skecter, old pal, speak to me."

But there was no reply from those white lips. Jim straightened up, his eyes misty and his fists clenched. He staggered slightly as he walked across the cabin to the chair and sank down into it. He gazed dumbly out of the window unable to speak with the shock and horror of finding his pal. His brain seemed unable to work and for long moments he sat there without a movement.

Then he rose and his eyes were like two steel pin points of fire.

He walked round the cabin, his eyes darting here and there trying to find a clue to the identity of the murderer, but in vain.

Suddenly to his ears came the faint clip-clop of horse's hoofs on the sun-baked ground. He became rigid, his fists clenched, waiting for whoever it might be, but hoping it was the murderer returned to the scene of his crime, so that he could exact justice—a justice that would be terrible in its intensity.

"Hallo, there?" came in the sheriff's ringing voice. "Anybody at home?"

Jim's body relaxed and he walked slowly to the door.

"Lo," he said as he opened it. "Nice mornin'!"

"Yeah," replied the sheriff. "An' I'm hungry. Goin' to ask me in for breakfast?"

"Sure, sheriff," said Jim quietly. "I wanted to speak to you."

The sheriff swung himself off his horse, and hitched it to the rail.

"I hope you have news of that Hank Howard I was tellin' you about."

"No," said Jim. "Somethin' more important. 'Come in an' I'll show you."

He led the way into the cabin and pointed to the lifeless figure of Skecter stretched on the floor. As the sheriff dropped on his knees to examine the body, Jim sank dejectedly into the chair.

"H'm!" muttered the sheriff, giving Jim a side-long glance out of the corner of his eye. "Shot at close quarters by a forty-five slug." He rose to his feet. "Let me have a look at your gun," he rapped out.

"It's in the pack," said Jim, without moving.

Sheriff Hopkins untied the indicated pack and drew out a Colt .45. He glanced at it and then spun the cylinder.

"There's one cartridge been fired," he said slowly. "Can you account for that?"

December 5th, 1931.

"It's a natural precaution of anybody," said Jim. "Most everyone has an empty cartridge under the hammer of his gun."

"Maybe." The sheriff placed his hand on the cowboy's shoulder. "Maybe," he repeated. "But I'll have to arrest you for the shootin' of your pal."

Jim came to his feet and swung round to face the sheriff, his eyes blazing. "But that's absurd, sheriff," he said. "What kind of a skunk d'you take me for, to shoot the only real pal I have ever had. Why, Skecter was more to me than a brother. An' besides, that gun is only circumstantial evidence."

"All the same, I'm gonna arrest you." The representative of law and order was determined. "Coming quietly, or do I have to use the handcuffs?"

"All right," growled Jim. "Let's go."

"I'll send some of the boys out for that"—indicating the body—"when we get back."

Jim nodded and moved slowly to the door and swung himself on to his bronc's back. The sheriff followed, and a minute or so later they were on their way back to Gunsight.

They jogged along slowly, the sheriff trying to make conversation, but Jim only replied in monosyllables, until the sheriff grew tired of his one-sided conversation and relapsed into silence.

The trail twisted as it wound its way round the base of many small hillocks, and as they came round one such hillock the sheriff saw a figure crouching over a small fire, boiling coffee.

"Hank Howard!" The exclamation slipped from his lips before he could stifle it.

The crook heard and was on his feet in a flash, and like a streak of lightning his gun appeared in his hand. The sheriff made a desperate grab at his own shooting iron, but he was too late.

The iron in Hank Howard's hand belched flame and smoke, and with a groan the sheriff slipped off his bronc to the trail. And before Jim could grab the gun that had fallen from the sheriff's hand, Hank Howard was on his bronc and was spurring the animal as hard as he could and riding leather-to-split for safety.

Jim dropped to the ground beside the stricken sheriff and lifted his head on to his knee.

"Water," muttered the man, as his eyes flickered open.

"All right, old timer, take it easy," said Jim. "I'll get you some."

"You'll stay where you are," groaned the sheriff. "I've got you for murder an' I'll take you in." He struggled with Jim's gun that he had stuck in his belt, and managed to drag it out and cover Jim. "Keep still, or I'll—I'll—"

His voice trailed off and he slumped back in a faint.

Jim gazed down at the unconscious figure, and the thought flashed through his mind that now was his time to escape, but he knew he could never leave a wounded man without making some effort to help him.

"Come on, bronc," he said, and swung himself on the animal's back. He cantered back a little way until he came to a small stream he had noticed, and, filling his hat with the clear cool water, rode back to the sheriff.

"Here you are," he said, pillowing the sheriff's head on his lap and pouring some of the water down the parched throat. "You'll soon be o.k."

The sheriff revived a little, and his eyes flickered open, and he looked up at Jim gratefully, then he lost consciousness again.

Jim bathed the wound and with his handkerchief plugged the hole. Then, putting the sheriff's inert figure across his horse, he mounted his own and set off along the trail they had been following. Jim rode slowly for an hour, then, as the trail emerged from the hills, he caught sight of a ranch. With a sigh of thankfulness, he turned his bronc towards the buildings.

He arrived at the gate of the hacienda, without attracting notice and, placing the sheriff on the ground, let out a hail.

"Hi, there!" he yelled. "Come an' help the sheriff, boys!"

Two or three cowpunchers came out of a barn at his shout, and Jim pointed to the ground, then swung himself astride his bronc and galloped off as fast as his horse would go.

For the Sake of a Girl.

THE noon time sun was high in the sky when Jim rode into the yard of the ranch taken over by Colonel Hall, and saw the colonel looking through the railings of a high corral.

"Howdy, colonel," Jim cried, as he slipped out of the saddle and clapped the genial man on the back.

"Hallo, Wright," said the colonel. He indicated the corral. "You lost that thousand bucks I offered for the Devil."

"Why we—" Jim broke off and peered through the bars at the magnificent white horse. "Who brought him in, colonel?" he asked, his eyes narrowing to mere slits.

"Gil Davis, my boy," replied the colonel with a smile. "A grand horse-man, that Gil Davis."

"Yeah, he must be to bring in the Devil," said Jim. "But I don't see him around anywhere."

"No, he's gone to town for a 'big town blow-out,' as he calls it, before the rodeo."

Jim became thoughtful and a gleam appeared in his eyes. Davis had tried to cut in in front of him when he was about to rope the Devil, so Davis must have trailed them to the cabin and taken the wild horse from the corral. Skecter must have seen him and Davis had shot him! Jim drew in his breath with a hiss as the thought struck him.

"It's a grand creature." The colonel's voice broke in on Jim's thoughts. "And when the crowd see Gil Davis on its back at the rodeo they'll go stark, raving mad with excitement, you mark my words."

"Yeah, he's all you say he is, colonel," said Jim.

Round the other side of the corral, the colonel's daughter, Alice, drew her pinto pony to a halt, and, dropping to the ground, opened the corral gate and led the animal in, without noticing the wild horse already there.

She turned and shut the gate after her, and was just taking the saddle off the pinto, when, with a squeal of rage, the wild horse charged across the corral.

Alice turned at the sound, and a scream came from her as she saw the great white horse bearing down on her, with eyes flashing fire. She raised her whip and made a slash at the horse, trying to keep it off, but it rose on its hind-legs and crashed them down at her.

But with a spring she avoided those flashing hoofs and slashed at him again and again with her whip.

"Look, colonel," yelled Jim. With a leap he was on the top bar of the corral and jumped into the corral itself. He ran across the ground, shouting at the top of his voice to attract the wild horse's attention. With a scream, the Devil swung round to combat this fresh enemy, and as he turned Jim ran away from Alice, with the wild horse after him.

Stepin, the colonel's black servant, had been attracted by the shouts from the cook-house, and as he arrived at the corral and climbed up to where the colonel was perched on the top rail, he saw the great white horse's hoofs crash down on the back of Jim Wright's unprotected head.

Jim collapsed in a heap, but before the horse could trample his prostrate form, the colonel and Stepin jumped to the ground and raced across the corral shouting.

"Drive him into the inner corral, Stepin," yelled the colonel.

"Ah'll do mah hest, bawss," panted Stepin, his eyes showing white in his fear of the wild horse.

The Devil seemed to be satisfied with the damage it had done, for, with a toss of its head, it cantered into the inner corral, and Stepin breathing a prayer of thankfulness slammed the gate shut.

The colonel dropped to his knees and cradled Jim's head in his arms, just as Alice, white of face, came running up.

"Oh, daddy," she cried. "He saved my life!"

"Yes," replied the colonel sorrowfully. "And lost his own, I'm afraid."

"Don't say that, daddy," Alice tried to wipe the blood off Jim's forehead. "Get him into the house, daddy, and I'll phone for the doctor."

"Get to it, then," said the colonel. "Give me a hand, Stepin," he added, as the black came up.

With infinite care they raised Jim up and carried him to the ranch house, while Alice flew in advance to phone the doctor and get a bed ready for the man who had so unhesitatingly come to her rescue, even though it might have meant his own life.

Alice and Colonel Hall Repay a Debt.

JIM awoke two days later and, as he painfully turned his head and looked around the room, he noticed the door was open, and sitting in the next room was Alice.

He looked at his left arm and saw that it was heavily bandaged. There was a bandage round his head, too, and he ached in every limb from the terrible hoofs of the wild horse.

Alice glanced in at him through the open door, and, seeing that he had gained consciousness, she hurried swiftly into the bed-room.

"How do you feel now, Jim?" She laid her hand gently on his bandaged head. "Better?"

"Yeah," replied Jim slowly. "Guess I can get up now, eh?"

"Don't be a silly," she retorted. "You'll have to stay where you are for a day or two."

"Gosh!" groaned Jim, for the thought of laying in bed, even for a day or two and smashed up as he was, made him squirm. "If I stay here I'll get so darned lazy I won't want to get up!"

"You just lay quiet and go to sleep," Alice ordered sternly. "The doctor said you were to be kept quiet and not talk too much."

"But I feel hungry," he complained. "I could eat a steer, hide an' all, right now."

"All right, I'll get you some broth." And Alice left the room, laughing at the expression that came over the invalid's face at the mention of broth.

She returned some five minutes later, followed by Stepin carrying a tray with a large bowl of broth on it.

"You must eat it all up, Jim," said

Alice as the black put the tray down on the bed.

"Take it away!" howled Jim. "I want something solid!"

Alice motioned Stepin away with her hand, then gently but firmly made Jim drink some of the broth.

The bowl was almost empty when Stepin shuffled into the room again and touched Alice on the arm.

"Dere am de deputy sheriff awaitin' outside in de parlour to see yuh," he announced. "Somethin' about Massa Jim."

Alice looked inquiringly at Jim, and he nodded. She left the bed-room and made her way to the ranch parlour, and as she entered the room the deputy sheriff of Gunsight took off his sombrero.

"Good-morning, Miss Alice," he said pleasantly.

"Good-morning," replied Alice. "Is there anything I can do for you?"

"Yes." The deputy put his hand in his pocket and pulled out an official-looking document. "I have here a warrant for the arrest of Jim Wright for the murder of Skeeter Burke."

"Oh!" Alice's face blanched and her hand flew to her lips to stop the quiver.

"Yes," went on the deputy. "I was told he was here."

"No," said Alice, regaining her composure. "He was, but he left us yesterday."

"What's the trouble?" It was Colonel Hall who had entered the room unobserved who asked the question.

"He's come to arrest Jim Wright," Alice told him, "but he left us yesterday, didn't he, daddy?"

The colonel looked at his daughter keenly, and she nodded her head

"Jim Wright," said the sheriff, "you rode darned well, but I've gotta arrest you again."

slightly. "Yes, that's right," he said to the deputy.

"Well, in that case I won't take up any more of your time," said the official. "But if you see him around send word to the sheriff, will yab?"

"Why, certainly I will."

The colonel opened the front door and showed the deputy out.

"Now, my girl, what's the meaning of this?" he demanded, as he shut the door.

"I think Jim can explain things better than I can," she replied. "Come on, we'll ask him."

Together they entered the bed-room and confronted Jim.

"Well, my boy," said the colonel. "Glad to see you lookin' better. But what's this about you murderin' your partner?"

Jim explained to them what had happened as far as he knew.

"I think I know who did the shootin'," he concluded. "Gil Davis brought in the Devil, and I feel sure it was him that did the killin'. But as soon as I get up I'm goin' to make it my business to find out for sure."

"It certainly looks as if Gil is the culprit." The colonel took a turn or two up the room. "And if you can prove beyond a doubt that it was him, you can count on me to help you all I can."

"Thanks, colonel," said Jim. "I'll prove him guilty, never fear. Skeeter was the best pal a man ever had, and if it's the last thing I do, I'll make Davis pay for killin' him."

Colonel Hall nodded his head, and a moment later left the room.

As soon as he had gone Alice turned to Jim with a look of concern on her pretty face.

"Jim," she said, "I hope you find the killer of your friend; but if it is Gil Davis, promise me you won't do anything until after the rodeo. You know father has billed Davis to ride the Devil, and if he doesn't there will be a fiasco and daddy will lose a lot of money."

"All right, Miss Alice," said Jim. "I promise."

"Thanks." She squeezed his arm and hurriedly left the bed-room.

The Rodeo.

THE days slipped by pleasantly for Jim, who was still in hiding at the colonel's ranch. Word came from Gunsight that the sheriff was recovering from the wounds inflicted by Hank Howard, and that he would be up and about by the day the rodeo was fixed to take place.

The day of the rodeo came at last. The sun was shining high in the vault of a perfectly blue sky. The crowds began to arrive at the stadium at an early hour. Men on horseback, men and women in buggys and buckboards and almost everything that went confined to pour in its human load until the proceedings started.

There were relay races, calf roping, steer riding and a dozen other Western sports which soon had the huge crowd in a good humour.

Jim Wright was there, with his big black Stetson pulled down well over his eyes. Gil Davis, boastful and arrogant, was strolling round the horse corrals, telling everybody in a loud voice just how he was going to ride the Devil.

Suddenly a shrill scream rent the air and everybody glanced at the corrals. It was seen at once that there was something wrong with the Devil, for
December 5th, 1931.

Our Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

the white stallion was prancing about on its hind legs and neighing shrilly.

Jim made a rush for the corral, and, followed closely by a bunch of horse-wranglers who were in charge of the animals at the rodeo, he saw a crumpled figure on the ground, with the Devil prancing over it.

"Great snakes!" gasped one of the wranglers. "That Devil's been and killed one of the boys!"

With loud shouts they clambered over the rails and drove the maddened horse into the box. Jim lifted the dead man gently from the ground and, helped by one or two of the others, carried him away.

As he lifted his head Gil Davis, who, in spite of all his boasting and arrogance, was a coward at heart, had been watching the scene with fear, caught a glimpse of Jim's face. Instantly some nameless dread clutched at his craven heart, and as Jim's eyes encountered his, a half-stifled sob of terror rose in his throat. For he could read the message in Jim's eyes, a message that meant the end of the trail for him.

He glanced round furtively, but everybody's gaze was on the sad little procession coming from the corral. He turned on his heel and slipped away.

Meanwhile the announcer in his box cleared his throat and spoke into the microphone.

"Ladies and gentlemen," his voice boomed out from the giant loud speakers dotted about the ground. "Colonel Hall has now great pleasure in presenting to you Gil Davis, the world's champion bronco rider, riding the wild stallion the Devil. As you know, folks, this horse was captured only a few weeks ago and has never yet been ridden, so may the best man win. Ladies and gentlemen, Gil Davis on the Devil."

Every eye was on the elute that housed the wild horse. It was saddled, and stood there with every muscle quivering with rage, its eyes bloodshot, and its teeth gleaming savagely in the sun.

Colonel Hall glanced round the little knot of men standing by the chute.

"Anybody seen Gil?" he asked.

"Th' last time I saw him, colonel," said one, a little wizened cowpuncher, "he was over by th' stands."

"Here, Stepin," cried the colonel, catching sight of his black servant. "Scout around quick and see if you can find Gil Davis."

"Ah'm on my way, bawss, ah'm on my way," replied Stepin, shuffling off. He made his way round the corrals, but in vain.

The crowd began to clamour for the expected treat, and as the time went on and still Davis couldn't be found the clamour became an uproar.

"Boys," appealed the colonel, "Davis seems to have disappeared. Will any of you ride the Devil?"

"Not me!" said one. "I wouldn't ride the boss for a thousand bucks."

The colonel looked at each in turn, but they all shook their heads, and the colonel turned away in despair, for he knew what might happen should the crowd be disappointed. They would get out of hand and probably smash the whole show up.

"I'll ride him for you, colonel."

It was Jim Wright, who, after seeing that the victim of the Devil's hoofs had been taken away, had come up in time to hear the colonel's question.

"You will, Jim?" A glad light appeared in the colonel's eyes. "Thanks, my boy."

"That's all right." Then turning to the wranglers: "Come on, boys, get that Devil ready," he said.

Jim climbed the rails of the chute and gently lowered himself into the saddle. The Devil tried to buck, but the confined space of the chute stopped him. Jim settled himself firmly, gathered the reins in his left hand, waved his right, and announced that he was ready.

The starting-gun roared and the gate was flung open, and like a streak of lightning charged with dynamite the Devil flashed from the chute. Amidst a swirl of dust the horse bucked and twisted, his back arched and his muscles like coiled springs. Round and round the arena the Devil bucked, but Jim kept to the saddle as though he was glued there.

The crowd rose to its feet and cheered to the echo, for never before had they seen such riding, and they were men who were riding horses themselves every day in their lives.

"That's not Gil Davis." The deputy touched the sheriff on the arm as they sat in the front row of the stands. "It's Jim Wright, the man we want for that murder."

"I know," replied the sheriff quietly; "but let him finish the ride out—it's too darned good to stop."

At last the fight for supremacy was over. The wild horse gradually began to tire, and, as its bucks became less and less, Jim whacked into him with his stetson, riding the animal to a standstill. At last he stopped the horse, and it stood with drooping head, its breath coming in great gasps—beaten.

Two of the officials rode up, and, as Jim slipped out of the saddle, took charge of the horse. Jim walked across the arena to the corrals, waving his hands to the plaudits of the crowd.

"Well done, Jim!" cried Alice joyfully, and hugged his arm. "You were splendid."

Colonel Hall was also loud in his praises, and as they stood there congratulating the cowboy, the sheriff and his deputy quietly left the stands and made their way to the spot where Jim was standing.

"Jim Wright," said the sheriff, "you rode darned well, but I'm afraid I've gotta arrest yuh again."

"Oh, but, sheriff—"

—"began Alice, her hold on Jim's arm tightening. "That's all right," said Jim, laying his hand on hers. "The sheriff's gotta do his duty. Come on, sheriff, let's go."

The sheriff and his deputy escorted Jim to the town gaol and locked him up in a cell.

Trapped.

THE rodeo was over, and night had fallen. The saloons of Gunsight were crowded with the high-spirited cowboys, gambling and drinking was the order, and many a man was drinking more than he could stand.

The sheriff and his deputy were busy rounding up those who were incapable of looking after themselves and taking them to the gaol to sober up. The biggest cell in the gaol soon become crowded, and when the deputy brought in a man helplessly under the influence of his jollifications, he was forced to put the man in the cell occupied by Jim.

"You stay in there till morning," he grimmed. "An' cool off a little."

"Wash he shay?" burred the drunk to Jim. "Here, old-timer, have lil' drinksh wi' me."

He produced a flask from his pocket and proceeded to swallow the contents. Jim watched him with a grin, and as the man staggered and collapsed on to the wooden bed a daring plan entered his head, a plan to escape from the gaol and take the trail of Davis.

The drunken cowpuncher lay back on the bed and snored in a stentorian voice, and Jim sat quietly on the edge of the bed waiting patiently for the dawn.

Dawn came at last, and with it the deputy-sheriff to let out the now sobered roysterers. He came to the cell that housed Jim and the man he had put in the night before. He saw a figure stretched out on the bed with a large black stetson on—Jim Wright. The other was waiting to be released, with his white stetson pulled well down over his eyes.

"Come on, you," growled the deputy, "get out and clear that head of yours."

The man shuffled out of the cell, across the passage and into the sheriff's office.

"Wait a minute," said the sheriff, who was sitting at the table examining his forty-five and putting fresh cartridges into the chambers. The man paused at the outer door. "Just take things easy the next time you come into Gunsight, and leave the whisky alone. Understand?"

"Sure, sheriff," the gruff voice answered him.

"Well, that's all. Get goin'."

The door swung open and shut. The man had gone.

"Sheriff, sheriff!" yelled the deputy, rushing into the office. "That was Jim Wright that went out then. He fooled me—"

"I know," answered the sheriff coolly. "But I've been thinkin' things over, Bill, and I'm not so sure that he's guilty. We'll let him go for the time bein', and see what happens. But, meanwhile, get the boys together; we're goin' after Hank Howard."

Meanwhile, Jim, for it had been Jim that had gone out of the sheriff's office, found a horse hitched to the rail, and, mounting the animal, set off for the colonel's ranch.

He rode into the deserted yard and made his way to one of the barns. But his arrival had been seen, and Alice came running from the ranch-house.

"Jim," she called from the entrance of the barn. "Has the sheriff let you out?"

"No," replied Jim as he came out of the barn on his own bronc. "I escaped and I'm after Davis."

He set spurs to his horse, and it broke into a gallop.

"Good luck!" yelled Alice after his fast-disappearing figure.

The deserted cabin in the hills. There was not a sound as a furtive figure stole round the end of the cabin and pushed open the door. It was the figure of Hank Howard, the bank robber.

He gave an evil chuckle as he entered the cabin and made straight for the fireplace. Moving the logs he drew out the wallet stuffed with the proceeds of his robbery.

(Continued on page 25.)

"He's the murderer, sheriff!" ground out Jim.

Follow a two-fisted sea-captain and the beautiful daughter of a brave explorer—as they sail on a perilous trip to a forgotten cannibal island—where they defy storm, fire and water, man and beast—on a search for a fortune in radium! Starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Browne.

DANGER ISLAND

READ THIS FIRST.

In search of pitchblende deposits containing immense quantities of precious radium. Professor Adams and his companions are beset by savages on a volcanic island off the African coast, and Adams escapes with one surriering follower, Cebu, his giant negro guide.

In America his daughter Bonnie and her uncle, Dr. Anthony Adams, have become alarmed at his failure to communicate with them. Ben Arnold, an adventurer professing friendship, offers to fit out a relief expedition.

His ship, the Lottie Carson, sets sail under the command of Harry Drake, a young Englishman, and for companion Bonnie engages Arlene Chandos, who is in league with Arnold.

Professor Adams and Cebu are picked up by the Lottie Carson off the coast of Africa. The professor is dying, but before passing away he gives Bonnie a chart and charges her to secure the radium for the benefit of humanity.

Bonnie innocently gives the chart to Arnold, who now sees his way clear to locate the radium and make a fortune. But, fearing Harry Drake's honesty of purpose, he plans to relieve him of the command, and orders Bull Black, his rascally mate, to take over the vessel.

A fight ensues, the crew taking sides, and during the battle Harry falls from the prow into a shark-infested sea!

Now Read On.

Overboard.

A DOZEN pairs of eyes watched Harry Drake as he floundered astern, with those evil sharks gliding towards him. Then Bonnie turned to Bull Black distractedly. "Stop this ship!" she panted. "Stop this ship!"

December 5th, 1931.

The rascally mate gave no indication that he had heard, but at that moment the hulking figure of Briney stepped between Black and the girl.

"I'll go over an' get him, miss," he rapped out, and next second he was climbing to one of the lifeboats.

He poised himself for an instant and then dived into the sea, shooting below the surface and reappearing quite close to the semi-conscious Englishman.

With the exception of Arnold and Bull Black, those aboard the Lottie Carson crowded to the stern to watch Harry and Briney with bated breath, and Arnold at once spoke to the mate in a hoarse undertone.

"Bull," he jerked, "you'd better pick him up. When we do get rid of Drake there must be no hint of foul play."

"All right," said Bull, and had soon scattered the men with a few strident commands.

The Lottie Carson had left Harry and Briney struggling in her wake, but Bull uttered an urgent command that soon had the effect of bringing the vessel close to the two men in the water again.

"Let her come up in the wind!" he roared to the helmsman, who answered his instructions smartly.

Once alongside, the mate ordered a line to be thrown, and as a rope fell with a light splash close to his hand,

EPISODE 2. "Death Rides the Storm."

Briney seized it thankfully. Supporting Harry with his other arm, the sailor was then drawn close to the vessel by his shipmates.

"Drop the ladder to 'em!" Bull shouted.

He was obeyed, and Harry and his rescuer began to drag themselves up the rungs. Nor were they an instant too soon, for as they climbed the rope-ladder they heard the snap of steely jaws at their very heels, and Briney cursed whole-heartedly at a shark that missed his ankle by a hair's breadth.

Up on the deck of the Lottie Carson Ben Arnold had been joined by Arlene Chandos.

"I warned you that Drake would get us into trouble," she said to him in an aside. "Something told me he was the kind of man who wouldn't let anybody override him. I wish you'd respected my woman's intuition, Ben."

"I'll have Drake put in irons down in the brig as soon as he steps aboard," Arnold retorted, and even as he spoke Harry and Briney were helped over the side.

Harry was fully in possession of his senses now, but was in a state of exhaustion, and had difficulty in breathing on account of the water he had swallowed. But he gave a game and reassuring smile as Bonnie confronted him.

"Thank Heaven you're safe!" she said fervently. "Oh, Briney, take him to his cabin and let him get some dry clothes on."

"I'm all right, Miss Adams," Harry declared, bracing himself with an effort. "Please don't worry yourself on my account. I—"

But he did not finish the sentence, for just then he became aware of the curious tones of Ben Arnold.

"Mr. Black, put Captain Drake in the brig, will you?"

And Bull Black's answer, given with the accompaniment of an unholy leer:

"Ay, ay, sir! Come on, there, take him down to the brig and put him in irons, boys!"

Led by Dempster, Bull's cronies advanced on Harry, but the Englishman was not to be so easily disposed of.

"Connor, Burke," snapped the voice of Briney, naming two members of the crew who had proved themselves loyal to the young skipper, "we're not going to stand for this, are we?"

The response of Burke and Connor was stout and emphatic, and Bull Black's minions hung back, for, though they possessed the advantage of numbers, they had already sampled the fighting qualities of the men who were loyal to Harry Drake.

Even Bull Black himself was unable to shake Briney and his companions from their determined front.

"What's this talk I hear from you, you swab?" the ruffianly mate ground out, thrusting his face close to Briney's.

The young sailor folded his arms and looked him straight in the eye.

"What did it sound like, Mister Mate?" he rejoined. "An invitation to try an' sock me like you did this mornin', huh? Well, try it on! You ain't mate any longer, but plain mutineer—an' I'm eravin' to bust that ugly mug o' yours."

Bull's eyes blazed, and a fresh outbreak seemed inevitable. But in the meantime Bonnie was attempting to reason with Ben Arnold, at the same time expressing her amazement at his conduct.

"Ben, have you gone mad?" she exclaimed. "You can't do this thing to Captain Drake!"

"Let me handle this, Bonnie, please," Arnold said to her, whereupon there was an immediate hail from Briney.

"Sure, let him handle it, miss," he called. "We're ready for him."

Arnold bit his lip. Thinking things over, he began to regret his hastiness. He saw plainly that he had given Bull instructions to take over the ship before the time was ripe. In the first place, he had not realised that Drake had friends among the crew.

"After all, Ben," Bonnie continued, "I—I think I deserve some consideration, and it's my wish, too, that we change our course and make for the port of Twamballa. I want my father to—to have—a decent burial."

It was against Arnold's interests to fall out with Bonnie just now, and, first of all favouring Bull Black with a glance that was both apologetic and significant, he turned to Harry Drake.

"All right," he said to the Englishman, "you're in command. But you get your discharge when we arrive at Twamballa."

Harry shrugged.

"If you choose to pay me off at Twamballa," he observed, "I can't do anything else but accept dismissal. But out here on the high seas there's no argument as to who's handling this ship, Mr. Arnold—and I'd like you to bear that in mind. As for you, Mr. Black," he added, turning to the mate, "you'll kindly confine yourself to your quarters. And, Briney, you can take his place as first officer."

Briney stepped forward smartly.

"Ay, ay, sir!" he said. "Any orders, captain?"

"Yes, bring the ship about," Harry answered. "Twamballa's our next call, and we ought to reach it by morning."

Barometer Falling.

BRINEY seemed delighted by his promotion, and his first concern was to see Bull Black conducted to his cabin. He detailed Connor for this duty, and, with the latter's firm grasp on his arm, Bull strode off in sullen mood.

Briney then turned to the men who comprised Black's fo'c'sle underlings.

"Listen, you scum," he barked, "you're takin' orders from me! Understand?"

There was a surly chorus of assent, and Briney walked to the bridge. He mounted the ladder and entered the wheelhouse, where he found Collins at the helm.

"The course is south by east, matey," Briney said.

"South by east, sir," Collins repeated, turning the wheel in his hands. Then he looked at a barometer near by, and: "Looks like dirty weather, Mr. Mate," he observed.

Briney fixed his eyes on the glass for a moment, and then glanced through the windows of the wheelhouse. The light of the sun had become pale, sickly and indecisive, and the sea was leaden-grey, with a swell running higher and swifter every moment. The Lottie Carson dipped heavily in the smooth, deep troughs between the waves.

"Yeah," Briney commented, "there's some dirty weather knockin' around. 'S a funny thing—I was only thinkin', half an hour ago, that we'd had a mighty fine passage all the way from our home port."

Harry Drake at that moment, was scarcely aware of weather conditions, for, believing that he was alone with Bonnie on the after-deck, he was endeavouring to express his gratitude for what she had done.

"I want to thank you," he told her. "But for your intervention, the situation might have been a good deal uglier than it was."

"I couldn't stand by and see your authority disputed in—in such a fashion," Bonnie answered simply. "You see, Captain Drake, I—I've come to look on you as one of my most trusted friends."

"I'm glad of that, Miss Bonnie," Harry murmured, and he seemed on the point of saying more when the slight lurching of the ship advised him of the impending hurricane.

He glanced at sky and sea, and for the first time became aware of the thick,

"What's this talk I hear from you, you swab?" the ruffianly mate ground out.

clammy heat that had descended over the ocean.

"It looks as though we're headed for a storm," he announced. "And a bad one at that."

"Even the elements are against us," Bonnie said a little drearly. "But listen, captain. I'm worried about this trouble between you and Ben Arnold. It seems unfortunate that there should be dissent at this stage."

"Yes," Harry agreed. "You know, I can't figure out Arnold's attitude. All seemed plain sailing until just lately, when I began to notice that he was mighty partial to that fellow Black. Miss Bonnie, there's something about the whole business I don't like, and I want you to guard the chart that your father gave you."

"Why?" she asked him wonderingly. "Because I've got a sneaking suspicion that there's treachery aboard this craft," was the answer.

Bonnie started. "Treachery?" she echoed. "Why, what do you mean? Ben has father's chart. Surely you don't suspect him of treachery?"

"Miss Bonnie, I do suspect him," Harry rejoined. "I know he has professed friendship for you and your father, but I'm inclined to think that he's fitted out this expedition for his own ends. You've got to take this into account—that those vast deposits of radium, discovered by your father on Danger Island, offer a tremendous temptation to an ambitious and unscrupulous man. I mean that he might regard them more in the light of a gigantic commercial undertaking, than as a benefit to the medical profession and humanity."

"And you think that Ben—"

Harry interrupted her.

"I think personal gain is at the back of his mind," he told her, "and I'm convinced that he'd trample down anyone who stood in his way—you included—if he found it necessary. And before he's in a position to play his hand as he wants to play it, I'd like you to do something that will prove my suspicions."

Bonnie hesitated. She was loath to question Ben Arnold's honesty of purpose, but at the same time Harry's earnestness impressed her.

"It's hard for me to believe that Ben could be playing a double game," she murmured.

"And I'm not certain that he is," Harry put in. "But, in view of what I've said, it would be reassuring to both of us if we could convince ourselves he's on the level."

"What do you want me to do?" Bonnie asked.

"Just this," Harry answered. "I want you to go to Arnold and demand that chart, for it's yours, and you should have it. I think you made a mistake in handing it over to him—and I want to see his face when you ask him for it."

Bonnie laid a hand on his arm.

"Listen, captain," she said, "supposing we go to Uncle Anthony and talk it over with him. If he thinks there might be anything in your suspicions, then I'll do as you suggest."

"All right," Harry acquiesced, and together they made their way in the direction of Dr. Adams' state-room, the young Englishman supporting Bonnie against the pitching motion of the ship.

From a passage-way under the bridge, close to which Harry and Bonnie had been standing, a figure moved stealthily. It was the figure of Arlene Chandos, and without delay she hurried towards Ben Arnold's cabin to impart all that she had just overheard.

December 5th, 1931.

The Chart.

CONTRARY to Harry Drake's command, Bull Black had vacated his quarters at the first opportunity and joined Ben Arnold in the latter's state-room, where the two now stood poring over the old chart that Professor Adams had delivered into Bonnie's hands just before he had died.

"Say, this thing looks pretty old," Bull commented, as he indicated the faded parchment. "Where did Adams get it?"

"Well, it has a history," Arnold told him. "It was handed down through the family from some old buccaneer ancestor."

"A pirate, eh?" Bull retorted, with a coarse laugh. "But what did any old buccaneer know about pitchblende and radium?"

"Not a thing," Ben Arnold replied. "He only knew that the savages on Danger Island held this spot sacred."

He indicated the chart, and, glancing over his shoulder, Bull Black saw that his finger was resting on a cross that had been marked on the map, close to the location of that volcanic peak known as the Fire God's Mountain.

"That's where the deposits of pitchblende are?" asked Bull.

"Yes," was the answer. "But this old buccaneer ancestor of Adams got it into his head that the niggers were guarding buried treasure—like diamonds, or gold. He never found out his mistake, but the professor did. And then the professor got bitten by this 'humanity' bug. The fool! There's a fortune in the stuff—never mind the benefit to humanity—and we can play the market at our own price—"

He stopped speaking as the handle of the door was turned. A moment later Arlene crossed the threshold.

"Well," she announced bitterly, "your friend Drake has upset the apple-cart. Oh, you make me tired! Why didn't you leave that bird in the ocean when you had him there half an hour ago?"

"What do you mean?" Arnold demanded. "What's the matter?"

"I just heard Drake telling Bonnie this cruise is crooked," Arlene informed him.

"Ah, she'll never believe him!" Arnold scoffed.

"No?" the girl retorted. "Well, get a load of this! He told her she could prove it by demanding that chart back from you!"

There was a blank silence, during which Arnold's fingers clutched the old parchment map involuntarily. Too involved to memorise, that chart was not a thing he cared to relinquish. Nor did it suit him to share it with Bonnie or anyone else bent on using its secret in the interests of medicine.

Bonnie's father had instructed that the untapped deposits of radium on the island should be used for the welfare of mankind—delivered as a gift to scientific research. But Arnold intended to see that it was paid for at the fabulous price which a substance so rare and precious could command—a price that would make him a millionaire many times over.

Bull Black was the first to break the silence.

"Well, give the map back to her," he advised.

"Give it back to her?" Arnold cried, wheeling on him angrily. "Are you crazy? How do I know that Drake won't turn her right against this expedition of mine? How do I know that he won't get her to leave the Lottie Carson at Twamballa—"

Bull cut in on him:

"Give it to her," he repeated craftily, "after we've doctored it."

"What do you mean—'doctored it'?"

"Listen," said Bull. "We'll make a copy first—exact, with all the markings and locations just as they are in the original. We'll keep that copy for ourselves. Then we'll give her the original when we've changed the markings, putting the cross that locates the pitchblende deposits—at the other end of the island."

And with the words he ran a thick forefinger from one side of the chart to the other.

"Oh, I see," Ben Arnold murmured, his eyes narrowing. "That's a good idea, Bull, providing you can fix the map so that the alteration won't be detected."

"Leave it to me," Bull told him confidently. "I once got some stuff from a Chinaman that will take out ink without leavin' a sign of it. I'll go an' fetch it. In the meantime, get me some tracing-paper."

He slipped out of the cabin, and Arlene looked at Ben Arnold.

"Say, not so dumb for Bull, eh?" she remarked.

"I should say not," Arnold declared with an air of satisfaction. "Oh, Arlene, you go out on deck and if Bonnie or her uncle come this way, stop 'em."

Arlene departed and stationed herself at the top of a companion-way which led both to Arnold's cabin and Bull Black's quarters; and she had not long been there when Dr. Adams approached.

He was obviously bound for Ben Arnold's state-room, but Arlene barred his path and engaged him in some conversation relating to the storm, which was now threatening to break at any moment. It was not long before the doctor had forgotten his intention of dropping in on Arnold, and a few minutes later he passed on along the tilting deck.

Meanwhile, Bull had returned to his associate's cabin, and he was soon seated at a bureau with parchment chart and tracing-paper in front of him.

"Say, this Danger Island's a big place," he observed, as he laboriously proceeded to draw a facsimile of the map. "Sure covers a lotta territory."

"Come on, Bull—come on!" Arnold urged impatiently. "Snap into it, will you? We've got no time to lose."

"This is a ticklish job," Bull protested. "It's gotta be done right, an' I'm workin' as fast I can."

The tracing was completed at last, and Bull then set to work on the original, erasing the cross that marked the true location of the pitchblende deposits, and placing a false one at a point many miles distant from it.

"There you are," he said when he had finished. "Pretty good job, hey, Arnold?"

"That's fine, Bull!" Arnold declared. "No one would ever suspect that the chart had been tampered with."

Arlene entered at that moment.

"You'd better hurry," she told them. "I've been talking to Dr. Adams, and after he left me I saw him meet Drake and Bonnie."

"Fine," said Arnold. "I'll give Bonnie her father's chart before she has a chance to ask for it!"

The Storm Breaks.

HAVING located Dr. Adams Bonnie and Harry entered his state-room with him, intending to explain the situation at once.

"Uncle Anthony," Bonnie immediately began, "Captain Drake and I have been discussing Ben, and the captain feels that I should have the chart in my possession."

The doctor looked at Harry and blinked stupidly.

"Why?" he asked.

"Well, to tell you the truth, Dr.

Adams," Harry explained, "I'm inclined to distrust Mr. Arnold. You see—"

But before the Englishman could proceed further there was a knock on the door, and next moment the subject of their conversation stepped across the threshold, followed by Arlene.

"Well, folks," Arnold said breezily, "it looks as if we're in for a little blow. Oh, Bonnie, I'm glad to find you here, for I want you to relieve me of a great responsibility."

"What is it, Ben?" Bonnie murmured. From an inside pocket Arnold took the map that Bonnie had so unwisely given into his keeping.

"I want you to take charge of this chart your father left," he declared. "It's your property, and ought to be in your possession."

There was a silence, during which Bonnie and her uncle tried to catch Harry Drake's eye. But Harry was watching Ben Arnold. To all appearances the man's action gave the lie to the young captain's suspicions, and yet Harry somehow felt that all was not well. He had absolutely no evidence to support the conviction, but he was certain that Arnold was a double-dealing rogue. Too often in his travels had Harry encountered the type not to recognise it now.

Bonnie spoke, naturally believing that Ben Arnold's offer to return the chart proved Harry had been mistaken in his estimate of the Lottie Carson's owner.

"Why, you keep it, Ben," she faltered. "You're the— the head of this expedition, and you should have it."

"No, Bonnie," Arnold told her, thrusting the parchment into her hands, "I insist that you take it."

Bonnie was fumbling with the chart when once again there came a knock on the door. This time the caller was Briney.

"Beg your pardon, sir," the newly-appointed mate said to Harry, "but the glass is still fallin', and it looks like we're rumin' into a real twister."

Harry dismissed the chart from his thoughts and prepared to occupy his mind solely with the welfare of his ship.

"Take four men and batten down your hatches," he ordered, and then, hurrying out of the state-room after Briney, he made his way to the bridge.

The Lottie Carson was now rolling heavily in a high cross swell. The pallid sun had gone down, and a dense bank of cloud was moving from the north to cut short the drab twilight and obliterate the early stars. But for the flashes of white foam that flecked its heaving surface, the sea was rapidly becoming as dark as the sky.

A puff of wind put an end to the calm that had existed for the last few hours. It was the forerunner of the gale which presently struck the ship, like a force that had for its mission the special purpose of waging war on all ocean-going traffic.

A wild clamour beset the struggling vessel, a clamour comprising the crash of mountainous seas, the rush of the hurricane and the deep vibration of the air.

Harry Drake left the bridge and yelled commands that sent the men of his crew reeling about the decks. They toiled with rope and canvas covering; they fastened the shutters of the wheelhouse for fear the glass panels might blow in, and they covered all ventilators.

The Lottie Carson had been rolling, her decks full of water, for some time, but heavy seas were breaking over her now. She staggered under their impact, and took successive plunges that ended every now and then in a terrific shock, as if she had planted her bows on something solid. It was the shock of giant waves, and she quivered like a frightened thing.

Lamps wriggled in the gimbals, and every movable object was sliding with the motion of the vessel. The wind howled incessantly, as if an army of clamorous demons were hurtling past in the darkness. A clap of thunder ripped the heavens, and lightning blazed momentarily on an immense waste of ocean and a lowering mass of clouds. Foam swept the decks in swift, ugly rushes, carrying men's feet from under them, and the gale whipped high flights of spray through the gloom.

The turmoil was maddening, and seemed to increase with every moment, even as the waves seemed to become more stupendous. Towering black walls of water collapsed on the ship in awful deluges, and the decks were swamped under raging torrents. A man was carried over the side, his despairing cry unheard, the going of him almost unseen. Only a few minutes afterwards another of the crew vanished.

Harry himself, in an unguarded moment, was plucked away and actually borne overboard, to flounder on the crest of a wave. But by some chance he was carried back to the deck like so much flotsam and tossed breathlessly into the scupper, whence he dragged himself with an effort.

Down in the privacy of his cabin Ben Arnold stood propped against a table, his eyes fixed on a barometer that was swinging like a pendulum against the wall. He was staring at it in a scared fashion when Arlene stumbled into his presence.

They had both left for their own quarters shortly after the "doctored" chart had been handed back to Bonnie. But Arlene had found it impossible to remain alone. She felt faint and ill—

BOYS! BE MECCANO MODEL-BUILDERS

PRICES OF MECCANO OUTFITS FROM 2/6 TO 450/-

When you are a Meccano boy you build anything you want—with your Meccano Outfit. To-day, it may be a working model of a Travelling Crane; to-morrow, a Motor Car chassis; the day after a Traction Engine, a Lathe, or a Loom. Day in and day out there is something different to build—hundreds of models in the Manuals of Instructions to choose from, and hundreds of others that you can create and build yourself.

The models you build with Meccano are real engineering models in miniature, because they are built with real engineering parts.

Think of the endless fun you can have with Meccano, and make sure you get an Outfit for Christmas.

WITH THE NEW MECCANO AEROPLANE CONSTRUCTOR OUTFITS YOU CAN BUILD YOUR OWN MODEL AEROPLANES. ASK YOUR DEALER TO SHOW THEM TO YOU.

SEND FOR THIS FREE BOOK TO-DAY

Write to-day for this fine new book. It contains a number of thrilling articles, profusely illustrated, describing many famous engineering feats. In addition, the full range of Meccano Outfits is shown, and there are illustrations of many wonderful Meccano models.

We will send you a copy, post free, in return for the names and addresses of three of your chums. Write your own name and address clearly, and add No. 11 for reference.

MECCANO

Engineering for boys.

MECCANO LIMITED DEPT. 11, OLD SWAN LIVERPOOL.

£500 IN PRIZES

There is no hobby in the world more thrilling than Meccano model-building, but the interest and fascination are increased tenfold when you are building a model that may win a prize in our grand £500 Competition. Ask your Meccano dealer for an entry form and full particulars.

sick as much from fear as with the pitching of the boat. "Ben!" she faltered. "This storm is terrible!"

"Yeah, and there's worse to come," Arnold told her grimly. "It's a twister all right."

"That's what Bull said," Arlene panted. "I just saw him at the foot of the companion-way. He was headed for the deck."

At that moment Bull was moving towards the bridge, his head lowered and his massive shoulders hunched as he battled forward against the hurricane. A burst of lightning showed him another figure close by—a figure even more gigantic than his own. It was that of Cebu, the giant Negro who had been Professor Adams' guide on Danger Island.

Cebu had come up from below, his primitive mind appalled by the extravagant rocking of the ship. For one brief instant Bull gained an impression of the black fellow's blundering form, and then both he and Cebu were overwhelmed by an avalanche of water that broke over the vessel's bow.

Bull managed to seize a hand-rail and hang on like grim death, though it seemed to him that the entire South Atlantic Ocean was striving to tear him away. Then the pressure ceased, and he was left bruised, breathless and drenched.

Cebu had gone, his black body vanishing into the storm-racked night and the frenzied sea. In the same instant one of the lifeboats had been wrenched from the ship's side, and its empty davits offered mute testimony of the tremendous strain and pressure against which Bull had maintained his grasp.

Another vivid stab of lightning showed him the figure of Harry Drake, and he stumbled along to him and faced him in the partial shelter of a burst weather-cloth.

Bull had to raise his voice to a yell to make himself audible, and at the same time a lurch of the ship nearly threw him off his feet, so that he had to clutch at Harry to steady himself.

"Why don't you heave-to before you lose all your hands and the ship as well?" he shouted stridently.

Harry's answer came through the clamour of the storm.

"I'm running this ship!" he roared. "You get back to your quarters, where you belong—or I'll throw you in the brig down below and have you put in irons! Go on—get back to your cabin!"

Bull snarled something that was lost in the howl of the wind, and then reeled back towards his quarters. He paused on the way to them, however, and turned aside into Ben Arnold's cabin.

"Hallo," said Arnold lmskily. "How are things up there, Bull?"

"Plenty bad," was the gruff answer. "Drake won't turn the ship."

"What does that mean, Bull?"

Arlene interposed, in an anxious tone. The rascally mate smiled.

"If ye ask me," he ground out, "it means that we're sunk unless something happens to Drake. Our best chance is that he's carried overboard!"

Overboard!

WITH the chart in her possession Bonnie had gone to her state-room, which was situated next to Ben Arnold's, and the storm was at its height when she was joined by her Uncle Anthony.

"I should think we're weathering one December 5th, 1931.

Two Grand Books for Boys!

Thrills! Mystery! Adventure!—that's what you get in the BRITISH BOY'S ANNUAL. This topping gift book is crowded with exciting tales of school life, sport, mystery and adventure that you will want to read again and again. There are also useful articles dealing with all kinds of interesting subjects, numerous illustrations and beautiful colour plates.

BRITISH BOY'S ANNUAL Now on Sale 5/-

Every boy will revel in the budget of ripping school yarns and thrilling adventure stories of the HOLIDAY ANNUAL. Each tale will hold you enthralled. Here you can meet all the jolly schoolboy characters of Greyfriars, St. Jim's and Rookwood schools, whose merry pranks cannot fail to entertain. There are lots of other interesting features, too, including pithy poems, puzzles, a play and eight beautiful plates.

HOLIDAY ANNUAL

Now on Sale 6/-

of the worst storms it would be possible to encounter," said the doctor. "I decide I'd better come along and keep you company, in case you were frightened, my dear."

"Oh, I am, Uncle Anthony," Bonnie told him tremulously. "I'm terribly afraid. What's going to happen to us?"

"We'll have to brave it out, Bonnie hope for the best. There's one thing we can be thankful for. We have a capable officer in control."

The words were hardly spoken before he realised that his opinion of Harry Drake's seamanship was unwittingly being called in question. For, having left the door of Bonnie's state-room wide open, he now heard the voice of Bull Black.

"I'm tellin' you Drake's stubbornness will have us all at the bottom o' the sea," the ex-mate was saying to Arlene and Ben Arnold. "There's three men gone over already!"

"What do you mean?" the voice of Arnold demanded.

"What I say," came the reply. "Three men washed over the side an' gone to Davy Jones' locker—one o' them Cebu the nigger. Drake will be next if he stays where he is!"

The grim prophecy did not escape Bonnie's ears, and she uttered a sharp cry.

"Uncle Anthony, you heard that!" she gasped. "I'm going to reason with Captain Drake. He musn't throw away his life!"

"Bonnie!" the doctor jerked, trying to restrain her as she made for the open doorway. But she evaded his hand and sped towards the deck.

Bonnie reached the deck with her uncle stumbling along in pursuit. The wind caught her a solid buffet that almost hurled her to the slippery boards, but she pushed on determinedly, now forced to an uncertain standstill as the prow became tilted high above her, now running forward sharply as it dipped suddenly into a trough of the angry sea.

Dr. Adams emerged to find himself enveloped in the storm-rent darkness. "Bonnie!" he called shrilly.

"Bonnie! Come back!" The hurricane strangled his voice, and though only ten paces from him, the girl caught not a single syllable. But by pure chance she turned her head, and in the same moment a flash of lightning threw a quivering, unholy glare over sky, sea and ship.

Bonnie saw a towering wall of water swooping on the vessel, like a grim cliff suddenly undermined so that its rim was toppling towards its base. It struck the Lottie Carson a blow that sent a shudder through the vessel from stem to stern.

The ship reeled under the impact. An avalanche of water poured furiously across her deck, and it seemed as if the sea must engulf her. Dr. Adams was flung down, then lifted on high and carried off by the surge—swept ruthlessly into the deep to disappear amid a welter of foam.

Clinging to a rope, Bonnie uttered a horrified scream. The wind snatched her voice and carried it to a figure in oilskins standing near the bridge. It was the figure of Harry Drake, and as he heard the girl's cry the Englishman wheeled with a startled exclamation.

In the swift-fading glow of the lightning flash he caught sight of her, and regardless of the risk he was running in abandoning his hold on the rail of

(Continued on page 28.)

"WILD HORSE."

(Continued from page 19.)

All unknown to him a face peered in at the window—the face of Gil Davis. His eyes were gleaming greedily as he saw the bandit draw out the wallet and looked at the dollar bills inside. He stole round to the door and stood, pressing back to the side of the cabin with his six-shooter in his hand.

"Stick 'em up!" he snarled as Hank Howard stepped across the threshold. The bandit's hand shot above his head as he felt the muzzle of the gun in the small of his back.

"Hand me that wallet," came the next order.

"What's the idea?" growled Howard.

"Never you mind," snarled Davis, jabbing harder with the gun. "Do as I say. Come on, hand it over!"

Howard was forced to obey, and as Davis took the wallet, he reversed his gun and brought the butt smashing down on the bandit's head. With a groan Howard pitched forward, rolled off the veranda and lay still. Davis looked down at his victim with a sneer. "Thanks," he said. "You're a fine bank robber, you are!"

He went round the side of the cabin, and appeared a moment later mounted on his brone. He took a trail that would lead him through a deep canyon and so clear of the hills.

Jim sat his horse on the brow of a hill, an interested spectator of the drama that had been enacted at the cabin, and as he saw the direction that Davis took, he chuckled.

"Come on, brone," he said, shaking the reins. "We'll take the short cut and get him as he comes outta the canyon."

He turned his horse and rode leather-to-split for the other end of the canyon. He came to it over the brow of a hill and slithered his brone down the almost sheer side, risking his neck every inch of the way, but his brone, with a sure-footedness that equaled a goat's, brought him safely to the bottom.

Swinging himself out of the saddle, he took his lariat and concealed his brone in a clump of mesquite. Then, climbing a tree, he stretched out on a bough that overhung the trail, and waited for his quarry.

Five minutes later the clip-clop of hoofs told him that Davis was approaching, and he quietly shook out the coils of his lariat. The hoof-beats grew louder, and a moment later Davis rode into view round a corner, all unconscious of the waiting cowboy. He passed directly under the bough and the nose of the lariat dropped and settled neatly over his shoulders, pinning his arms to his side. Next second he was plucked clean out of the saddle, and as Jim made a turn or two round the bough with the rope, he was left dangling some six feet from the ground.

"Well, Davis," drawled Jim, "I've got you!"

"Let me down, let me down," cried Davis, glancing up at Jim's grinning face. "I didn't kill your partner. I swear I didn't!"

"I know different, you lyin' skunk!" Jim's eyes were blazing. "And you'll stop there until you say so."

"But I didn't kill him, I didn't." Davis was almost whimpering.

"You'll stay there until you confess, Davis." Jim calmly rolled himself a cigarette and lit it. "You can please yourself. I don't mind if we stay here for a week—but you're goin' to confess!"

The posse, led by the sheriff and his deputy, were scouring the hills in search of Hank Howard, and their course took them to the cabin. As they neared it a figure was seen to rise to his feet and stagger about in a dazed condition.

"It's Hank Howard, boys!" cried the sheriff. "Come on, we've got him at last!"

They rode up, and before the dazed bank robber could put up any resistance, the manacles were on his wrists.

"Come on," said the sheriff. "Where's the cash?"

"I haven't got it," snarled the captured man. "A guy laid me out and took it from me."

The sheriff was sceptical, but the dazed condition of Howard and the hump on the back of his head was almost convincing evidence.

"Well, let's get back to town," he said. And with one of the posse bringing up Howard's horse, the party moved off down the trail taken by Davis not half an hour before.

Jim heard the approach of the posse before they came into view, and he drew his six-gun in readiness.

The sheriff came round the bend in the trail, and as he caught sight of Davis hanging from the bough of the tree he drew his brone to a halt.

"What's the idea?" he gasped, then drew nearer, with his posse close behind him.

"That's far enough!" came a grim voice from the foliage of the tree.

"What's goin' on here?" growled the sheriff, pulling his horse to a halt. "What's the idea of using Davis to decorate the landscape like this?"

"Just a new idea of gettin' a rotten skunk to confess a crime!" came that grim voice from the foliage above their heads.

"What crime's that? The only crime he's committed that I know of is bolting from the arena the day of the rodeo—"

"Cut me down, sheriff!" groaned Davis, breaking in on the sheriff.

"Don't touch him," Jim swung off the bough and dropped to the ground. "That's the man that killed my partner, Skeeter Burke!"

"He's lying!" cried Davis. "He killed him himself and is tryin' to put the blame on me."

"Put up that gun, Wright," said the sheriff, "and we'll thrash this matter out peaceable."

Jim put his gun away and the sheriff ordered one of his men to let Davis down. The man rode forward and Davis sat on his brone's back.

"He's the murderer, sheriff, right enough," growled out Jim, pointing to Davis, who was almost on the point of collapse.

"That's right." Everybody turned to where Hank Howard was sitting quietly on his horse. "I saw that skunk shoot the man in the cabin."

"You saw it?" gasped Jim.

"Yeah!" replied Howard. "I was lookin' in at the window and saw him plug your partner after a fight!"

"That's pretty convincing, ain't it, sheriff?" asked Jim.

"Yes, I reckon it is," replied the sheriff. "Put the irons on Davis, fellers, and we'll get goin'. I shall want you down at the office to testify to-morrow, Jim."

"Okay," was all Jim said, and he watched the sheriff leading Davis off to the gaol, his vengeance complete.

It was several weeks later. Gil Davis had been convicted of first degree murder, and was shortly to pay the full penalty for his crime. Jim Wright sat in the middle of the largest corral at Colonel Hall's ranch, with an apple balanced on his head and a beautiful white stallion gently nuzzling the fruit.

"Go on, old devil hoss," said Jim. "Take the darned thing!"

The Devil was a devil no longer, for Jim, with infinite patience, had trained the wild horse to forget its hatred of mankind. At least, of one, and that was himself, for should anybody try to sit on its back, then the Devil lived up to its name, and became once more as fierce as it was the day that Jim captured it up in the hills.

The horse took the apple and munched it contentedly. There was a sudden burst of girlish laughter, and Jim turned his head to see Alice perched on the rail, watching him.

With a grin, Jim hurried over to her and sat by her side on the rail.

"What do you think of the Devil now, Alice?" he asked.

"He's fine!" cried Alice. "He's almost nice enough to kiss."

"Well," growled Jim, "he's not goin' to get a kiss from you, but I'll take his place—"

The Devil broke in on Jim, for with his head he pushed Jim and Alice off the rail to the ground. Jim sat up and, his arm round Alice's waist, gazed up at the horse.

"All right, you Devil," he said with a grin. "I don't want any help from you!"

And he kissed Alice, while the Devil lifted up its head and neighed shrilly.

(By permission of the Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Hoot Gibson and Alberta Vaughn.)

RILEY'S HOME BILLIARDS

32 Free Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
Howard Works, ACCRINGTON,
and Dept. 35, 147, Aldersgate
Street, LONDON, E.C.1.

All the family will find endless pleasure during leisure hours with a Riley "Home" Billiard Table. The 6 ft. size is delivered to you immediately on first payment of 13/3d. Balance monthly. Cash Price £11 15s. 0d. Rileys pay carriage and take transit risks. 7 days' Free Trial allowed. Send to-day for Free Art List giving full details of Riley "Home" Billiard Tables and "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables, in all sizes, for cash or easy terms.

Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Great Britain.

"THE SECRET SIX."

(Continued from page 12.)

case against this public menace. Scorpio's re-arrest would promptly follow, and nothing, not even the pleading of his counsel, would save him.

Amid a perfect hubbub of sound the court was cleared, and Metz, shouting wildly, hurling threats at the heads of those who had "framed" him, was hauled to the cells in the grip of four uniformed officers.

"Darned clever the way you fixed it, Newton," Scorpio whispered in the crook lawyer's ear.

"You think so?" Newton scowled at him, once again resenting the familiar use of his name. Almost he wished he had made no attempt on Scorpio's behalf in this trial, that he had left him to be found guilty. But the parting of the ways was near at hand. The crook lawyer was resolved to wait till the gang had made a really big pile from the sale of their illicit liquor and then to walk out on Scorpio and the others, taking every cent with him. "But you're not out of the wood yet, let me tell you. Metz will swear it was you who was responsible for those murders and then you'll be re-arrested."

"Yeah." Scorpio grinned easily. "Well, you'll have a darned fine chance to use your wits again to get me off, huh?"

Newton shrugged his shoulders non-committally as he turned to leave the now almost deserted court.

"Into the Net."

THAT night the ex-captain of police called a meeting of the Secret Six. Once again Scorpio had escaped justice; the time was now ripe for them to take the law into their own hands. The ruthless gangster who terrorised the town from end to end must be exterminated forthwith. It was the only way to get rid of such a deadly menace.

"Gentlemen, I suggest that we raid this brute's place to-night. Are you all in agreement?" Each of the six nodded his head, and the ex-police captain smiled grimly. "Very well. I have enlisted twenty of my late subordinates, fearless officers who'll follow me into that den of vice, who'll not hesitate to shoot down Scorpio and any other member of his vile gang that we happen to find there. I have enlisted the aid, too, of this young fellow." He pointed to Carl Pasher, who sat in a chair listening intently to the ex-captain's words. "He is Carl Pasher of the 'Examiner,' as I believe all of you are aware, and in addition to the fact that he is anxious to have a hand in this affair, because he was the friend of poor Tarry, he will be most useful to us as he knows every inch of Scorpio's place."

"Splendid," one of the masked men approved. "And we wish you every success in your mission, captain."

For some minutes longer they conversed together, then the meeting broke up, the ex-police captain going off with Carl to pick up his men and to make final and complete arrangements for the proposed raid.

It came in the region of one o'clock in the morning when Scorpio, Newton and Nick Mizoski were in the former's sitting-room above the restaurant, drinking their own bootlegger whisky and discussing orders that were to be delivered the next night.

The report of a shot, followed by the tinkling of broken glass brought all three leaping to their feet in sudden panic.

"What the heck was that?" As Scorpio whipped out his automatic there came the unmistakable crackle of gunfire down in the street, again followed by the shattering of glass. His face contorted with a wild fury, eyes gleaming with the light of a maniac, Scorpio rushed to the window and peered out, only to jump back the very next second as the window was smashed by a bullet which, narrowly missing his head, thudded into the wall opposite. "Blazes, it's a police raid, and that measly rat of a captain that we fired is leading them! My heavens, but I'll make the little swine pay for this—and pay dearly!"

"Don't be a darned fool!" Newton laughed contemptuously as he hastily snatched up his hat, ranniced it on his head, then picked up his walking-stick. "Suppose you're going to fight the whole blamed crowd of them single-handed, eh?"

He moved quickly towards the door, through which Nick Mizoski had scuttled a moment before, intent only upon escape.

"Better beat it, Scorpio." Newton looked back from the doorway with strangely gleaming eyes. The parting of the ways had been reached, and the crook lawyer thrilled at the knowledge that in his pockets were the entire takings of the gang for the past week—the money that was this night to have

LONGER RUNS, HEAVIER LOADS

Boys, tell Dad now about the present you wish him to give you at Christmas. Tell him you want a Hornby Train Set. If he asks why, tell him that—

Hornby Trains give longer runs and haul heavier loads.

They are strong and reliable.

They are realistic and one hundred per cent. efficient.

They are beautifully finished in correct colours.

Above all, they are British and therefore best, and every one is fully guaranteed.

Hornby Clockwork Locomotives are the longest running locomotives in the world. In a recent test a Hornby No. 1 Locomotive, running light, covered the amazing distance of 182 feet on one winding! This wonderful performance could only be accomplished by a Hornby! You will realise how perfect these famous trains are when you have a Hornby Railway of your own.

This must be a Hornby Christmas for every boy who is keen on model trains! Get a copy of the Hornby Book of Trains—described here and make your choice now. If you prefer to have an ordinary price list, you may obtain a copy of catalogue No. 6 from your dealer, free of charge, or direct from Meccano Ltd., price 1d. Write to Department K.

HORNBY TRAINS

BRITISH AND GUARANTEED

MECCANO LIMITED (Dept. K)
OLD SWAN LIVERPOOL

THE 1931-32 HORNBY BOOK OF TRAINS

Read how our railway track has developed from crude rails laid on stone sleepers; how the modern passenger coach has grown from an open truck! Other articles tell about the special features of the four British groups. Page after page of fascinating information, and every page illustrated! All the splendid Hornby Locomotives, Rolling Stock and Accessories are depicted in full colour.

You must have this book! It can be obtained for 3d. from your dealer, or post free from Meccano Ltd., for 4½d. in stamps.

PRICES OF HORNBY TRAINS
FROM 5/-.

Hornby Engine Shed.
Hornby Single Arm Lamp Standard.
Hornby No. 2 Special true-to-type locomotive, L.M.S.R.

been shared out between Scorpio, Mzoski and himself. "Let me tell you something. This is an organised raid. You know what that fool cop said that night. He told us that we hadn't seen the last of him. If I'm not mistaken they intend to shoot you on sight. Hear that?"—as there came a loud shattering of glass from below. "They're smashing a way into the place. Best beat it while there's time—and don't stop till you're right out of town or it might be unhealthy for you. Make for Chicago—I'll meet you there at Paul Lucas' place, then we'll—"

He broke off as there drifted up from below the sound of heavy feet crossing the restaurant. Next second he had darted from the room, making for the back of the premises. Like lightning Scorpio went after him, but not till Newton had descended two flights of narrow stairs and entered an underground cellar where the gang had their "still" did he catch up with the crook lawyer.

"Say, Newton!" Scorpio grabbed him roughly by the arm and swung him round. "That money—our takings. I want my share."

"Confound you, there's no time to stop for that now." Eyes gleaming fiercely, Newton shook off Scorpio's hand. "The cops'll be after us in a moment. Can't you hear them stamping up above? You know what I said—meet me—"

"I'll have that money now!" Scorpio interrupted violently, his hand tightening on the gun he held. "You see, Newton, I'm not going to risk you double-crossing me."

But Newton made no answer. There came the sound of many feet descending the stairs that led to the cellar, and turning suddenly he ran towards a door some few yards away. Next second, murder gleaming from the depths of his eyes, Scorpio swung up his revolver, levelling it dead at Newton's back.

The crash of the shot was followed instantly by a choking gasp as the crook lawyer pitched forward on his face, then came a hideous laugh from the killer that died suddenly in his throat as he heard voices shouting from the stairs behind him.

Taking to his heels, he ran to the door on the far side of the cellar, but even as he flung it open his pursuers burst into the place. There came the crash of a shot—the thud of a bullet hitting the wall very near to him, and his gun slipped from his hand. All at once the bravado in Scorpio went from him, leaving him white and scared. Quickly he leapt from the cellar, slamming the door behind him. Up a flight of stairs he went, through a door that opened out to an iron stairway that was intended for use in case of fire. Up this he raced two steps at a time, with the sound of pursuing feet dimming in his ears. Presently he came to a window, and, feverishly raising the sash, he hastily flung a leg over the sill.

"What the blazes d'you want, Scorpio?" Pearl Peach looked at him from beneath narrowed eyelids. She was arrayed in a dressing-gown, ready for bed.

"The cops—they're after me!" Fearfully Scorpio pointed out of the window. "Peaches, for the love of Heaven, help me—save me!"

A strange gleam showed instantly in the girl's eyes.

"Sure I will, Slaughterhouse! Quick, into this cupboard and leave all to me." She quickly flung open a cupboard door in a corner of her bed-room, and, as Scorpio, his face white as death, sprang inside, she closed the door and locked it. Then into her face came a look of triumph. "Ah, ha, I've got you at last, Slaughterhouse—got you just as I said I'd get you for killing Johnny Franks!" she shrieked hysterically.

In the cupboard Scorpio heard those grim words, and he trembled violently. They sounded his death-knell, and he knew it. Bare seconds later and the police were in the room and he was dragged from the cupboard at the point of the gun.

"Hold 'em up!" came the harsh voice of one of the officers. "That's right, Ah, so we've got you at last, Tony Scorpio, just where we want you. But this time there'll be no getting out of it. You killed Newton—we were just in time to witness your very last crime."

An unmistakable click, and manacles fettered cruel, murderous hands. Then Scorpio was marched away with Peaches' hysterical laugh of triumph dimming in his ears—was marched away this time to stand trial for the murder of Newton, which resulted in him being found guilty and sentenced to death.

So the Chair claimed Scorpio, the killer, and with his demise gangster rule was completely obliterated in the town of Centro—a fact that was almost entirely due to the pluck and determination of the now reinstated captain of police and those lion-hearted business men, the Secret Six.

(By permission of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Pictures, Ltd., starring Wallace Beery, Lewis Stone and Marjorie Rambeau.)

GRAND COMPLETE FILM NOVELS.

Robert Montgomery and Irene Purcell
in

"THE MAN IN POSSESSION."

Sent to prison for a minor offence, a young man is spurned by his family and goes forth to earn his living. He becomes a bailiff and is put in charge of the home of a hard-up, beautiful, and daring young woman.

"POLITICS."

Two women dabble in politics and clean up a town. Marie Dressler and Polly Moran, the screen's funniest pair, in a riot of mirth

"YOUNG SINNERS."

A young girl of seventeen is enjoying life to the full when she meets the spoiled and dissatisfied son of a millionaire. At last the father of the boy takes spartan action and in the snow-cold Adirondack Mountains the youngster fights for his manhood. Starring Thomas Meighan, Dorothy Jordan, and Hardie Albright.

Don't miss this splendid issue of our companion paper

"SCREEN STORIES."

On Sale Wednesday.

Price 2d.

(Continued from page 2.)

A Clever Fake.

Now that many of you have seen "Hell's Angels" there can be no harm in disclosing that a real Zeppelin was not used in the spectacular scene of the bombing raid over London.

Howard Hughes, the director, who had already spent several thousands of pounds on the purchase of aeroplanes alone could have had a real Zeppelin had he wanted one. He is a multi-millionaire, and the cost would not have bothered him. But there would have been insuperable difficulties in the way of filming the scene as shown in the picture. The only effective method, therefore, lay in using a model of the great air ship. So one was made to scale and he then rented the hangar at Arcadia, near Los Angeles, and turned it into a studio.

Stretching almost diagonally across half the length of the building, he next had rigged up on high a sturdy steel cable from which the Zeppelin could be moved up or down or from side to side as required. All round and close to the roof, balconies were erected for the cameramen to film the action from different angles.

The clouds through which the Zeppelin is seen emerging on the screen were chemically produced, and the model was slowly drawn through the thick vapour. All this was comparatively easy with what followed, when the Zeppelin was attacked by an aeroplane and fell a mass of flames. This, the most difficult scene of all, had to be done by double exposure when two objects are photographed separately and later shown in the same scene.

A miniature aeroplane, twenty-four inches in size, was built and swung from a wire against a black background. Its movements were filmed by a high-speed camera, and the undeveloped negative was then rewound into the camera magazine and the picture of the Zeppelin slowly recorded on the same film. Then filming was stopped and begun again when the model was sprayed with kerosine oil and set alight. The interior views of the "Zepp" were just studio sets.

Slim Summerville's Prank.

It is not generally known that Slim Summerville, who enlivens many a picture with his comedy, was at one time called "The Keystone cutup." That was in the days when he acted under Mack Sennett with the late Mabel Normand and Polly Moran.

Slim was always a fellow for playing pranks on others in the studio until his last trick ended in disaster and caused him to turn over a new leaf. Polly Moran, too, was not averse from a practical joke, though one day it seemed to Slim that she had played rather a mean one on him. So he decided to get even and took Mabel into his confidence. She agreed to help him. It was arranged that Slim should climb to the top of the studio gate with a pail of water. Mabel consented to signal to him when Polly was passing underneath. The pail of water would complete the act.

But even a joke has a way of going wrong at times, and this one certainly did. Mabel signalled as agreed. Mack Sennett was also entering at the moment and being in a hurry happened to get in front of Polly. The pail of water was overturned and completely ruined his new hat as well as drenching him to the skin. It was a very frightened-looking Slim who came down from his perch above the gate, and it was a long time before he played any more pranks.

December 5th, 1931.

Answers to Questions.

Clive Brook was born in London on June 1st, 1891, Frank (London, N.), and was educated at Dulwich College. For some time afterwards he worked as a journalist, and then enlisted when the war broke out. On his return to civilian life he decided to try the stage, and the success he achieved resulted in his being offered film work in British productions, the first of which was "Trent's Last Case." His talking film career was begun in America, where he has appeared in "Slightly Scarlet," "Anybody's Woman," "East Lynne," "Scandal Sheet," his latest release, and others.

be out on deck! I'm going to take you to your cabin."

She did not seem to hear him. "Uncle Anthony," she cried distractedly. "Uncle Anthony! He's gone, captain!"

"Gone!" Harry ejaculated tersely. "Good heavens, you don't mean that Dr. Adams has—"

"Gone!" came the voice of Bonnie in a high-pitched moan. "Gone overboard!"

The tragedy of it dumbfounded Harry for the moment. Bonnie's father drawing his last breath aboard ship less than twenty-four hours since, and now her uncle a victim of the storm—lost in the immensity of the raging South Atlantic, beyond all possible aid!

Meanwhile, up in the wheel-house, the helmsman was steering doggedly, guiding the vessel through the fury of the hurricane.

He was shut in alone with the flickering light of the binnacle; shut in, too, with the grim fear that the wheel-house might at any instant be wrenched away under the battering of those terrific seas which were hurling themselves over the ship.

The helmsman was Collins, and his face was damp with the sweat of suspense. He could hear the masses of water pouring on top of the structure in which he stood, and every crash that shook the bridge set his ragged nerves on edge. He was almost at the breaking-point, and ready to drop with fatigue and anxiety.

His duty was plain, and he stuck to his post like a man. But he wondered dismally if his existence had been forgotten, or if any of his shipmates still survived to remember him.

Harry Drake was thinking of Collins, and realised that he had been at the wheel for a considerable time before the breaking of the storm.

The fellow had had a long spell, and must be near the end of his tether. He ought to be relieved immediately and sent below for some well-earned rest, but before the change could be effected it was necessary to hurry Bonnie Adams to a place of comparative safety.

"This way!" gasped Harry, urging her across the deck. "I'm going to take you to your state-room, Miss Bonnie, and you've got to stay there!"

The tumult of the storm reached a crescendo as they slithered aft, the wind howling its loudest and the thunder pealing like a cannonade. Once more there was a burst of lightning, and once more it revealed a mountainous sea bearing down on the Lottie Carson.

The barrier of water dashed into the ship. It was as if the Lottie Carson had thrown herself at the foot of a cataract, and the crushing weight of it descended on man and girl.

They were thrown off their feet and then snatched up by the torrent, even as Dr. Adams had been. Bonnie was half-torn from Harry's grasp, but he clutched her again and secured his hold on her. Next second the two of them were being swept headlong from the port side to the starboard.

A feeling of stark helplessness and despair gripped Harry. His own fate and the fate of the girl in his arms were beyond all human intervention, and they were at the mercy of the sea.

(Don't miss the next thrilling episode of this grand serial next week. By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Brown.)

"DANGER ISLAND."

(Continued from page 24.)

the bridge-ladder, he staggered in her direction.

Wading knee-deep in the wash that swirled over the decks, he reached her side and took hold of her even as another wave broke over the ship. It was not so heavy as the one that had hurled Dr. Adams to his doom, and he managed to brace himself against it, at the same time supporting Bonnie.

"Uncle Anthony!" she kept sobbing. "Oh, Uncle Anthony!"

"Bonnie," Harry panted, "what are you doing here? You've no right to

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-). including Alport Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W A White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge

DON'T BE BULLIED

Some SPLENDID LESSONS in JUJITSU, interesting articles, etc. FREE on application. How to take care of yourself under ALL circumstances without weapons, by the Wonderful Japanese art of self-defence. Far better than boxing. Learn to fear no man. Simply send two penny stamps postage or 1/- for first large part NOW to "Yawara" (Dept. A.P.), 10, Queenway, Hanworth, Feltham, Middlesex. School in London for Practical Tuition from THE "NEWFOOTY" GAME. Best Table Football invention. BIG DISCOUNT on sales to friends. 22 Men, Ball and Goals. MEN FOLLOW BALL AND INTERCEPT PASSES AS FOOTBALLERS DO. Many 1st, 2nd, 3rd DIV. COLOURS. BOYS AND PARENTS PRAISE IT. Only 2/3. POST 3d. extra.

FREE XMAS CASH

THE "NEWFOOTY" CO., 6, YORK ST., WALTON, LIVERPOOL. Buy now! Get orders! Enjoy Xmas!

STAMMERING. STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars free.—FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

100 DIFFERENT, including 10 Child, FREE to genuine applicants for approvals, enclosing 3d.—COURT STAMP CO., Court Place, Guernsey.

BE TALLER! Increased my own height to 6ft 3 1/2 ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A B M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH ENGLAND.

BLUSHING. Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness, Worry Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back! Booklet sent, Free, privately.—L. A. Stebbing, 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2.

GROW TALLER! ADD INCHES to your height. Details free.—JEDISON, 39, BOND STREET, BLACKPOOL.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Printed and published every Tuesday by the Proprietors, The Amalgamated Press, Ltd., The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Advertisement Offices: The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad, 11s. per annum; 6s. 6d. for six months. Sole Agents for Australia and New Zealand: Messrs. Gordon & Gotch, Ltd.; and for South Africa: Central News Agency, Ltd. December 5th, 1931. Registered for transmission to Canada at Magazine Rates. 8.G

BILLIARDS AT HOME per week

Remember you are dealing direct—we finance our own system. 1/-

Perfect reproduction of Full-Size Tables. Brass Frame Pockets. Adjustable Feet to ensure a perfect level surface. Complete with two Cues, three Turned Balls, Guaranteed Unbreakable, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules & Chalk.

SIZE	Deposit	Four Monthly Payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10/-	6 6	26/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8 6	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10/-	12 6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	15 6	52/-
6 ft. 4 in. x 3 ft. 3 in.	10/-	22 -	80/-

SPECIAL OFFER Size 4ft. 4ins. x 2ft. 3ins. Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk. 55/-

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge Street, London.
Send for Complete Illustrated List with Xmas supplement of Jokes and Games

BE TALL Your height increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/- Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2

ONE GUINEA

Is all you pay for a charming Portable Model. Many other bargains in Horn, Horns, Upright, Grand and Consoles, with which I give AN ALBUM OF FREE RECORDS. Approval, Carriage Paid. Monthly terms. Write for my Free Lists NOW.

Edwd O'Brien, Ltd. SPECIALISTS IN CYCLES & GRAMOPHONES, DEP. 10, COVENTRY.

BE STRONG I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 lbs. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-Control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-. STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28 Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

Boys' Cinema

"LARCENY LANE" and "THE BADGE."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boys' CINEMA 2^D

No. 626.

EVERY TUESDAY.

DECEMBER 12th, 1931.

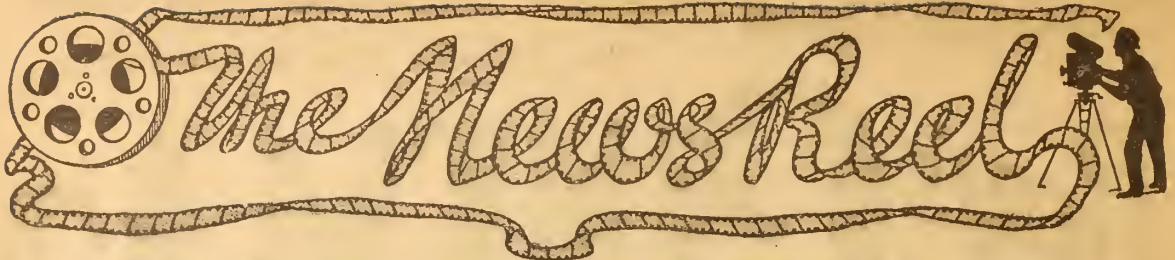

A Gripping Mystery Story

DON'T MISS OUR GRAND NEW ANNUAL

NOW ON SALE
Price 6'
Coloured Plates
& Photogravure

THE MAN AT 6

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"The Man at 6."

Frank Pine, Gerald Rawlinson; Sybil Vane, Anne Grey; George Wolner, Charles Farrell; Chief-inspector Dawford, John Turnbull; Sergeant Hogan, Arthur Stratton; Sir Joseph Pine, Herbert Ross; Campbell Edwards, Lester Matthews; Joshua Atkinson, Kenneth Koye; Mrs. Cumberpatch, Minnie Rayner.

"Larceny Lane."

Bert Harris, James Cagney; Anne Roberts, Joan Blondell; Dapper Dan Barker, Louis Calhern; Helen, Noel Francis; Joe Reynolds, Raymond Milland; Colonel Bellock, William Burress; Mrs. Snyder, Maude Eburne.

Level-Crossing Thrill.

The inhabitants of Beaumont Hall, a picturesque village near Redbourne on the Hemel Hempstead road, can no longer say that "nothing ever happens" in their little part of the world. For they were given a thrill such as they will long remember.

It happened through Lupino Lane, the director of the new B.I.P. film, "The Love Race," choosing the site as a location for a thrilling episode. And this is what the villagers saw. A taxi containing two men rushing down a hill at breakneck speed towards the level-crossing the gates of which had just been closed. At the same time an L.M.S. train came speeding towards the spot. At one of the gates stood a policeman frantically waving his arms in the endeavour to stop the car. The villagers stood still and gasped. It seemed as if nothing could stop a frightful collision before their eyes. Then came a crash as the taxi tore through the nearest gate, flashed across the rails and then went through the second gate only just in time as the train now roared past.

The thrill had been carefully planned down to the smallest detail so that a real accident should be avoided. The speed of the train had been worked out as well as that of the taxi, and the weight of the latter had also to be taken into consideration owing to the vehicle having to break through the gates. Stanley Lupino and Jack Hobbs were the two occupants of the taxi, and the experience was a thrill for them as well as for the villagers.

Filmed Three Times.

"The White Man," which is Warner Baxter's latest, was originally called "The Squaw Man," and it may be interesting to know that this is the third time it has filmed. As "The Squaw Man," it was first screened in 1913 with December 12th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S GRAND XMAS NUMBER.

WHEELER and WOOLSEY

IN

"CAUGHT PLASTERED."

Tommy and Egbert, two down-and-out comedians, undertake to run a derelict drug store for a little old lady—and bring about the downfall of a bootlegger. A delightful comedy, with complications and laughs galore.

"A HANDFUL OF CLOUDS."

He wanted to be boss of gangland, eventually attained his ambition, then decided to quit—but there was no turning back. A thrill-loaded cook drama, starring Lew Ayres and Robert Elliott.

ALSO

The fourth episode of our amazing new serial :

"DANGER ISLAND."

Tell all your friends not to miss this bumper Christmas Number.

the late Dustin Farnum as the star. He was paid £1,250 for his rôle. The story was again brought to the screen in 1918, and this time the leading rôle was filled by Elliott Dexter.

In Search of a Storm.

Going to sea to look for a storm. This is what the Regina Films unit did for the purpose of filming a storm scene for "The Verdict of the Sea." Manufacturing a storm on land would not have been quite so realistic, and so the company set sail from Falmouth on the s.s. Capri, a 3,000 tons cargo boat. For days they voyaged in the Channel, off Cornwall, and then on to the Scilly and Balearic Islands. There were some beautiful backgrounds to be seen, but of storms there was none.

In despair the Capri was turned towards the Atlantic, and there off Ushant a real "snorter" was encountered. Huge waves dashed across the deck and gave the company all the "atmosphere" they wanted, plus a good drenching. The film voyage lasted five weeks, for only two or three hours a day could be used for filming owing to the varying light and weather.

Cut-Throat Crew of a Film.

Had you been at Elstree during the making of "Tin Gods," you would have seen the most murderous looking set of cut-throats that had ever collected. They comprised flat-nosed, ebony-skinned negroes stripped to the waist, Chinese, half-castes and white men of several nationalities, some with broken noses and others with scarred faces. These men had been recruited from the lowest dens of dockland to appear as the mutinous crew of a steamer, which, in the story of the film, is carrying a number of European passengers when it is captured by Chinese pirates.

The leader of this motley gang is George Cristian, a well-known coloured boxer, who, after a strenuous fight with Frank Perfit, the captain of the ship, confessed that he felt quite as bruised and shaken as he did after fighting Jack Dempsey in 1917. More recently Cristian had acted as sparring partner to Schmeling, Carpentier and other well-known figures in the boxing world.

First British Talkie Serial.

One good result of the invasion of American film producing companies is shown in the making of "Lloyd of the C.I.D.," the first British serial talkie by Mutual Pictures for Universal. It is packed full of excitement, much of which is provided by Sam Lee and Adrian Gilbert, the two stunt actors.

In one scene Lee had to be knocked through some banisters, turn a complete somersault and fall heavily on the floor some thirty feet below. He did all this as arranged, and when the camera had stopped turning, he calmly picked himself up and walked quietly away.

Adrian Gilbert had to drive a small saloon car at thirty miles an hour into a steam wagon lumbering along at the rate of fifteen miles an hour. He was supposed to be kidnapping Janice Adair, but her place in this particular stunt was mercifully taken by a dummy. Gilbert drove into the steam wagon in great style, completely wrecking the car, and though very much shaken by the impact was able to extricate himself unscathed.

Answers to Questions.

While I very much appreciate your interest in the BOY'S CINEMA, L.F. (Coniston, Ontario), I am sorry it is not possible to reprint any back numbers of the paper. Only three months' issues are kept in stock, so if at any time you require any issues within that period, it will be best to write early to the BOY'S CINEMA, Back Number Dept., Bear Alley, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. The price of a single copy is 3d., including postage.

In a lonely country house a strange drama is enacted. A Scotland Yard detective is called in to probe the mystery. What happened to the jewelled chessmen and who was the man at 6? Starring Gerald Rawlinson and Anne Grey.

Visitors at "The Gables."

REMOTE and quiet in the midst of its unkempt and neglected grounds stood an ancient manor-house known as the Gables, once the dwelling-place of a family of distinguished lineage, a family that had fallen upon evil days. The old house had at last been sold, and it came into the possession of a certain Mrs. Rowson, who lived as a recluse within its walls.

Few of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood had any knowledge of the new owner of the Gables, beyond the bare fact that she was an elderly widow without children. She was never seen outside the house, not even in the grounds, and, except for one constant visitor, no one ever called upon her. Two servants she had, a grim old man called Jenkins, the butler, and a charwoman who went to the house three times a week, but rarely saw her employer.

Yet one evening the almost deserted house became the scene of a most unusual activity, and stranger after stranger came up the grass-grown avenue to its door. The first arrival was a tall young woman clad in a heavy dark cloak, wearing a fur round her neck, and her way of approach did not suggest that she had been invited to call.

The night was dark and cold, for the month was December. Yet the girl prowled surreptitiously round the house before she approached the front door, and for some minutes she concealed herself behind a clump of trees, watching the dark and silent building intently. At last she stepped out of her hiding-place and walked quietly up to the front entrance.

Cautiously she pushed at the door, which was not quite closed. It opened noiselessly, but the girl did not enter at once. She took an electric torch from her bag, and by its light she saw that several steps led down into a large hall. Descending the steps, she glanced round quickly, and then walking a few paces forward she stood still to listen for any indication that her entrance had been observed by anyone in the house.

No sound came save the ticking of a large clock in one corner, and soon the light of the torch was flickering here and there as the girl made a rapid survey of the hall. Presently she stooped to pick up an envelope which lay on the floor near a small table. Looking at the outside, she saw that it was addressed to "George Wolmer, Esq.," and that it was unsealed.

Again she stood still and listened carefully. Then, apparently satisfied, she drew a sheet of paper from the envelope and read the words written upon it.

The unsealed letter was certainly a very puzzling document, and a frown of perplexity spread over the girl's face as she studied it.

"Dear Friend,—By the time you get this I shall have gone. Do what you like to Jenkins. He hates you too much to tell you anything. Farewell.

"ELIZABETH ROWSON."

The girl read through this strange document, stood in thought for a moment, and then deliberately walked across the hall and switched on the electric light. She turned to the table, on which she had noticed some writing materials, and searched there for a clean envelope. Just as her hand fell upon one she heard a faint sound outside, as though someone were walking very gingerly up to the front door.

With the speed of light, she tore open the envelope addressed to George Wolmer, thrust the fragments under a sheet of blotting-paper, and slid the letter into the clean envelope. Quick though she was, she had no time to seal down the envelope, for even as she raised it to her lips the door began to open slowly.

In an instant the letter was out of sight, held in her left hand behind her, while she wetted the first finger of her right hand hoping to get an opportunity even yet to finish the job. Meanwhile her gaze was fixed on the doorway, and in another moment she saw a tall young man enter and stand nervously on the top of the steps.

The second stranger to enter the old house that evening had a handsome boyish face, and he was neatly dressed in well-fitting clothes of an expensive cut. But his manner was so hesitating and nervous that a child would have been suspicious of his intentions, and when he saw the girl calmly facing him he started and half-turned, as though to go out.

"What are you doing here?" asked the girl sharply.

"I—I beg your pardon," stammered the young man. "I saw the light go up, and I thought that Jenkins was here."

"I am Miss Vane—Sybil Vane. I am secretary to Mrs. Rowson, the old lady who owns the house."

The girl's right hand went behind her back as she spoke, and she managed to seal down the envelope unobserved by the nervous stranger.

"I didn't know that Mrs. Rowson had a secretary, Miss Vane," remarked the young man, looking puzzled. "But perhaps you will tell her that Frank Pine has called, and—"

"I think this letter is for you." Sybil Vane cut into the remark as she held out the envelope. "Mrs. Rowson told me to give it to the man who would arrive at six o'clock."

December 12th, 1931.

Frank Pine took the letter rather dubiously, glancing at the clock as he did so. It was within a few seconds of six, and as he opened the envelope the clock struck the hour.

"But I don't understand this at all." Frank read the letter through, and seemed even more puzzled than before. "She couldn't possibly have known I was coming here this evening. I didn't know myself until a little while ago. And she wouldn't address me as 'Dear Friend.' Why, she hasn't even seen me!"

He looked at the envelope again and then handed the letter back to Sybil.

"There's no name on the envelope," he remarked, glancing suspiciously at the girl. "This letter is most certainly not meant for me."

"And yet you came in almost on the stroke of six!"

The girl's words came slowly and deliberately, full of a meaning that Frank did not in the least comprehend at the moment. Before he could frame any reply, however, a third visitor entered the Gables, and began at once to interest himself very much in the affair.

"Who came at six? I came here at six!" cried a harsh voice.

Sybil and Frank turned to see a coarse-featured man in a rough overcoat, wearing a cloth cap. The newcomer glared fiercely at Frank, and then fixed his eyes on the letter which Sybil still held in her hand.

"What's that you've got?" he snarled, advancing towards the girl. "Gimme that letter! It's for me."

"Are you the man who was to come at six? Is your name George Wolmer?" asked Sybil, retreating a pace or two.

"What's that to you?" The stranger snatched the letter suddenly from Sybil's hand and thrust it into his pocket, just as Frank Pine tried to interpose.

"What do you want here?" began Frank, only to be rudely interrupted. The man in the cloth cap instantly whipped out a revolver and covered young Pine, who jumped back in alarm.

"Stand away!" growled the stranger fiercely. "I ain't letting any young cub interfere with me!" He turned to Sybil with a sneer, but still kept his revolver pointed at Frank. "As for you, miss, I don't know how you came here, but you'd better get out right now. I'm Wolmer, if you want to know, and what I say I mean. Get out, and take this young fellow with you."

Chief-Inspector Dawford.

EVEN as Wolmer spoke a grinding of brakes sounded outside, and the beams of a pair of powerful headlights swept the front of the house. Wolmer instantly ran across the hall and disappeared from view through a door on the opposite side.

Heavy footsteps plodded up to the front door, and into the hall came a tall, burly man of stern appearance, clothed in dark attire, with a bowler hat upon his head. It was obvious at a glance that he was a police officer of some kind, probably an inspector. Behind him came another man of the same type, and outside the door Frank caught a glimpse of uniforms. The police had evidently been informed that there was something mysterious going on at The Gables.

"I am Chief-inspector Dawford, from Scotland Yard," said the burly man, surveying Sybil and Frank with a piercing glance. "This is my assistant,

December 12th, 1931.

Mr. Jackson. We have come down here on information received."

"Good-evening, inspector!" replied Sybil coolly. Frank was too much upset by the events of the last few minutes to say anything. He felt and looked exceedingly uncomfortable, and Dawford did not fail to notice the young man's shrinking manner. The inspector decided to question the girl first, however, and began at once.

"You are perhaps Miss Rowson, the daughter of the old lady who is said to have disappeared?" asked Dawford.

"Disappeared?" cried Frank, startled out of his nervousness by the word.

"Yes, disappeared. Someone gave the Yard a phone message to that effect." The inspector looked suspiciously at Frank, but immediately turned again to Sybil. "Are you Miss Rowson?"

"No," replied the girl. "My name is Sybil Vane, and I have been doing some secretarial work for Mrs. Rowson."

"Well, Miss Vane, you can no doubt give me some information," remarked Dawford. "When did you last see Mrs. Rowson?"

Sybil paused for a second before she answered, and the inspector's eyes narrowed as he watched her keenly.

"Yesterday," she said at length.

"What time?"

"About six o'clock." The girl's answer came more quickly this time, and her eyes met Dawford's serenely and confidently.

"And how long have you been her secretary?"

"Not very long," replied Sybil.

"No? Well, we had no information that Mrs. Rowson had a secretary at all." Incredulity was in Dawford's voice and manner as he spoke to the girl.

"We were under the impression that she lived here alone, except for a butler. You're not the butler, of course?" he added, swinging round on Frank. "Who are you?"

"I'm—I'm just a reporter—from the local paper, the 'Argus'—I mean the 'Tribune,'" stammered Frank. "My name is John Sm—I mean John Wilson."

"H'm! You're a queer reporter!" Dawford surveyed Frank even more suspiciously than before, and, indeed, the young man's confused manner would have made anyone suspicious. "You don't seem to know what paper you work for, or even your own name. And why did you come here this evening?"

"I came to—oh, just to look round," muttered Frank, carefully avoiding the inspector's eye.

"I don't believe a word you say!" thundered Inspector Dawford. Turning to Jackson, who stood just beside him, the man from Scotland Yard nodded, and without a word his assistant went to the door and beckoned to someone outside.

A moment later a tall police-sergeant of splendid physique came in, and stood awaiting orders.

"Have you placed your men, sergeant?" asked Dawford.

"Five minutes ago, sir. All round the house." Sergeant Hogan indicated the location of his men by a wide sweep of his arm, and then again stood to attention solemnly.

"Very well. You see these two?" Dawford pointed out Sybil and Frank. "They are not to leave the building. Instruct your men that no one whatever is to be allowed to pass out. Then return and help Mr. Jackson to search the house."

The sergeant saluted and went out, while the inspector turned again to Sybil, whose coolness under his questioning had rendered him even more suspicious of her than he was of Frank Pine.

"Now, Miss Vane, you haven't helped me much so far. Where is Mrs. Rowson?"

He barked out the question with great vehemence, but the girl only smiled in reply.

"I don't know," she said quietly.

"Has she disappeared, then, as we were informed?" queried Dawford.

"I think so." To the amazement of Frank Pine, the girl smiled again as she replied, and the inspector's manner became dangerously calm.

"You think so, eh? Well, I'm not satisfied with your replies," he said. "I find you and this young fellow in a house which I was told had only two inhabitants, and you are both concealing something. I don't believe you are Mrs. Rowson's secretary any more than I believe the yarn your friend here spun me. Have you been here all day?"

"No," replied Sybil. "I arrived this evening, about half-past five."

"And our young friend the—reporter?" Dawford's emphasis on the word was extremely significant. "Did you meet him here?"

"I came after Miss Vane," Frank broke in nervously.

"He came at—six o'clock," remarked Sybil, looking sideways at Frank.

"Hardly a deserted house, The Gables, eh? Has anyone else been here this evening?" The inspector's eyes bored into Sybil as he asked the question, but the girl replied without a moment's hesitation.

"No!" she said.

Frank could not forbear a start as Sybil spoke. Who was this girl, he thought, and why should she conceal the fact that the man Wolmer had broken in upon them to take away the mysterious letter? He had little time to consider the matter for Dawford had instantly observed his movement, and turned upon him like lightning.

"And you, Mr. Wilson—you said your name was Wilson, didn't you, or was it Smith? Have you seen anyone here this evening besides this young lady?"

"N-no," stammered Frank, uneasily conscious that the inspector did not believe him.

Dawford looked sternly from Sybil to Frank, but to the young man's relief, Mr. Jackson and Sergeant Hogan returned from their search of the house at that moment, and the inspector wheeled round upon them.

"Anyone in the house?" he asked.

"No, sir," replied Jackson. "The sergeant and I have searched every room, but there's no one here."

Then where was Wolmer? thought Frank. The man might, of course, have got clear away without being observed by the police, but that seemed improbable if Sergeant Hogan had posted his men all round the house as speedily as he had said. And where was Jenkins, the butler, and the mysterious Mrs. Rowson? Did Sybil Vane know anything about them? Frank Pine grew more and more puzzled and nervous as he glanced at the impassive face of the girl, and a second later he gave a convulsive start.

Outside the door could be heard a querulous voice that Frank well knew. Someone was arguing with the policeman on guard—for yet another visitor had just arrived at The Gables.

New Arrivals.

CHIEF-INSPECTOR DAWFORD looked towards the door where the altercation was going on, and then turned to Sergeant Hogan, who stood near him.

"Go and see who is there, sergeant," he ordered. "If it's anyone asking for Mrs. Rowson, bring him in. He may have some information about her."

Hogan went to the door, and presently ushered in an old man, well-dressed and with the outward appearance of a gentleman. The newcomer was, however, in a very agitated state, his face working and his whole body shaking with excitement and nervousness.

"What's all this?" he cried, going straight up to Inspector Dawford. "Why is this house surrounded by police? Why can't I be allowed to call on Mrs. Rowson without being questioned by a constable at the door?"

"I am Inspector Dawford," replied the Scotland Yard man icily. "I should recommend you to calm yourself, sir, for I may have some questions to ask you. I am conducting an investigation here. We have been informed that Mrs. Rowson has disappeared under suspicious circumstances."

"Mrs. Rowson—disappeared?" The old man stared uncomprehendingly at Dawford for a moment, and then as he took in the sense of the words his agitation increased tenfold, and his voice rose to a wild scream.

"She can't have disappeared! You're lying—you're trying to trap me. Why, she asked me to call to-night. What shall I do? For Heaven's sake, tell me where she is!"

"Be careful what you're saying," came the stern warning. "Mrs. Rowson is not here, and you may be the last person who saw her alive. Pull yourself together and answer the questions I must ask you."

"Is—is Mrs. Rowson—dead then?" The old man seined on the verge of collapse as he stammered out the question, but Frank Pine suddenly ran across to him to hold him up as he swayed uncertainly on his feet.

"Steady, sir," he said soothingly. "We know nothing certain about Mrs. Rowson, except that she is not here. Do try to be calm, and perhaps you can help the inspector to get at the truth."

"You here, Frank?" came the answer in trembling tones. "Well, I suppose you're right. What do you want to ask me, inspector?"

Dawford had at first seemed rather puzzled at the obvious intimacy between Frank Pine and the old man who had just come in. He looked at the pair keenly, and a grim smile presently came over his face.

"This young man, whom you call Frank, told me his name was John Wilson, or Smith," remarked the inspector. "He didn't seem quite sure which. In reality, I suppose he is—"

"This gentleman is my father, Sir Joseph Pine," interrupted Frank.

"Yes, I am Sir Joseph Pine." The old man suddenly pulled himself together and spoke more calmly, facing the inspector coolly enough. "Have you any complaint against my son?"

"He did not give me his real name, as I told you," replied Dawford. "Beyond that—well, I cannot say for the present. I am sorry I did not recognise you, Sir Joseph. You are the curator of the Antiquarian Museum in this neighbourhood, I believe."

"Yes, that is right, inspector," said Frank's father. "As to Mrs. Rowson, I saw her in this house last night, and I arranged to come here this evening at six o'clock. I am a little late, of course, but I cannot understand why she should not be here."

"You came here frequently, Sir Joseph?" Dawford's voice was quiet, but he was keenly attentive to the old man's voice and manner, for he believed that the mystery of Mrs. Rowson's alleged disappearance would probably be solved by the questions he was about to ask.

"Yes, I was, I believe, her only visitor," replied Sir Joseph. "She is interested in chess, and so am I. For some time I have been in the habit of coming here in the evenings to play chess with her. She never spoke of going away. In fact, so far as I know, she never left the house."

Sybil Vane had moved nearer, eagerly listening to the old man's narrative, and Dawford observed that Sir Joseph's glance rested on the girl for a second, apparently without recognition.

"One moment, sir," said the inspector. "You recognise this young lady as Mrs. Rowson's secretary, of course?"

"Mrs. Rowson's secretary?" Sir Joseph looked at Sybil, and the old man was obviously puzzled. "No, she hadn't a secretary. I have never seen this lady before."

"I thought as much," cried Dawford in accents of triumph. "You'd better tell me the truth, madam, as to why you came here."

"I shall tell you nothing," replied Sybil firmly.

"We shall see." The inspector turned to Sir Joseph again and resumed his queries. "Another point, Sir Joseph. Do you know the man who acted as Mrs. Rowson's butler?"

"Certainly, certainly," said the old man. "I saw him last night."

"He is not in the house now," declared Dawford. "We have searched every room, and he is not to be found."

"Jenkins gone, too? He can't have gone!" Sir Joseph Pine was becoming extremely agitated again. "He was too infirm to get far. You can't have searched properly. He must be somewhere about."

Inspector Dawford was annoyed at the old man's tone, but Sir Joseph was right. One part of the house had not been thoroughly searched, and Jenkins the butler was indeed "somewhere about." Not yet, however, was his presence to be revealed, for as Sir Joseph spoke there came again the murmur of voices at the door.

Once more Sergeant Hogan went to investigate, and this time he brought in two more visitors to The Gables. One "Stand away!" growled the stranger. He turned to Sybil, but still kept the revolver pointed at Frank. "As for you, miss, I don't know how you came here, but you'd better get out right now!"

was a very tall and well-groomed individual, with a clear-cut, handsome face, who smiled cynically as he saw the inspector. The other was a scared-looking little man, excessively neat and dapper in appearance, who held in his hand a case of documents; obviously a professional man and suffering at the moment from shock, for he was plainly extremely worried at the sight of the police.

Inspector Dawford looked eagerly at the two newcomers as they approached, and his face fell, for he instantly recognized the taller of the pair.

"That's Campbell Edwards," he muttered to himself. "What can he be doing here?"

A Cry in the Dark.

"WHY, Mr. Dawford, you here? What an unexpected pleasure!"

The tall man greeted Inspector Dawford with every appearance of cordiality as he came up. Campbell Edwards was a well-known private detective, and the man from Scotland Yard foresaw immediate complications from his unexpected appearance. The inspector replied politely enough, but his manner was the reverse of enthusiastic.

"Good-evening, Mr. Edwards. I was not aware that you had heard of this business."

"Business? What business?" replied Edwards, glancing round. "I see that the place is surrounded by your men, and that this hall seems to be crowded with people, but I don't know what you mean, all the same."

"You don't know anything about this reported disappearance of Mrs. Rowson, the owner of The Gables, then?" Dawford's face brightened as he asked the question. Perhaps, after all, he was mistaken in his idea that the private detective had come on professional business.

"Not a thing. I'm down in this part of the country on a holiday, and my friend here"—Edwards indicated the nervous little man—"my friend has been kind enough to bring me to look over The Gables. I understand the house is for sale, and I have thought of buying a place somewhere in this district."

Inspector Dawford transferred his gaze to the little man, who stood looking helplessly round, clutching the case tightly in his hand. As Dawford turned upon him, he spoke in a feeble, twittering voice.

"Did—did somebody say that Mrs. Rowson is not here?" he remarked.

"Who are you?" countered Dawford, ignoring the question.

"I am Joshua Atkinson, of the firm Atkinson, Atkinson & Atkinson, estate agents. Mrs. Rowson has instructed us to sell The Gables, and now you say she has gone. You did say so, didn't you?"

The timidity with which the little man brought out his last query made even the grim Scotland Yard man smile, and Sergeant Hogan hurriedly coughed to hide a chuckle, while Frank Pine and Sybil Vane laughed outright.

"She's not here, at any rate," said Dawford. "Did you see her when she gave you instructions about the house?"

"No, no, inspector." Joshua Atkinson looked in a scared fashion at Dawford, who was regarding him with mingled scorn and contempt. "She sent her instructions to us by post."

"Got the letter with you?" asked the inspector.

"The letter is at the office of Atkinson, Atkinson & Atkinson," came the precise reply. "I can repeat the wording to you, inspector, if you wish me to do so." Dawford nodded, and the little man went on. "She wrote: 'Please sell my house, The Gables, for the best price you can obtain, as soon as possible.'"

December 12th, 1931.

That was all. We received the letter only this morning."

"Her usual signature?" queried Dawford.

"Oh, yes, yes, inspector, that was quite in order. May I go now, please? I can't possibly show Mr. Edwards over the house this evening, now that there is all this trouble."

"No one is going out of this house yet." The inspector glared round on the group fiercely as he spoke. "I'm going to get to the bottom of this business before anyone leaves."

"But—but—my wife, inspector," stammered Atkinson in extreme agitation. "It's not that I mind being detained here. I know nothing at all about Mrs. Rowson, but my wife won't like it if I come home late. You don't know my wife, or you wouldn't keep me here." His voice rose to a plaintive wail as he finished, and everyone in the hall, except the inspector, chuckled at the expression of dismay on the little man's face. Dawford looked at him stonily and replied in his iciest tone.

"Well, Mr. Atkinson, if you're afraid of your wife's tongue, that's your affair. You've come into this house, and you stay here until I'm satisfied."

"But surely you don't suspect me of any connection with Mrs. Rowson's disappearance?" twittered Atkinson, almost in tears and twisting convulsively in his alarm. "I assure you, inspector, I am quite innocent. Everyone knows me. Here's Sir Joseph Pine. Please tell the inspector that you know me, Sir Joseph."

"This is certainly Mr. Atkinson," said Sir Joseph. "You surely haven't any reason to suspect him, inspector."

"I suspect everyone present." Dawford's tone was stern as he looked round angrily at the group, and on several faces he saw unmistakable signs of alarm. "This house had the reputation of being practically deserted, and yet five people have called here this evening. Mrs. Rowson has apparently disappeared, and some of you know more than you have admitted about her. I am sure of it."

Campbell Edwards smiled sardonically at the inspector, who caught the look and resented it, for the private detective had more than once solved problems that had baffled the Scotland Yard man. Before Dawford had time to speak again, however, there came a startling interruption.

From the darkness outside came a wild scream of pain and fear—a scream in the voice of a terror-stricken woman.

"Quick! Go and see what's wrong!" cried Dawford, turning sharply on Jackson and Hogan. "Let the men search the grounds again."

The group of people in the hall waited expectantly for a few minutes, until a couple of stalwart policemen entered, carrying with great difficulty the inanimate form of a stout, elderly woman, poorly dressed in cheap clothes. Jackson followed, evidently in some excitement.

"I've found Mrs. Rowson," he cried triumphantly, "out there in the shrubbery! Someone attacked her as she was coming towards the house, I think. She's fainted, but she's not much hurt. The men are searching the grounds."

"See what you can do for her, sergeant," said Inspector Dawford. "Does anyone recognize this woman as Mrs. Rowson?"

"This is not Mrs. Rowson—this person is the charwoman, Mrs. Cumberpatch."

Sir Joseph Pine came forward as he spoke.

"I don't see how anyone could mistake her for Mrs. Rowson."

"You forget, Sir Joseph," said Dawford. "I believe you are the only person present who has even seen that lady."

"Yes, yes, I suppose so," stammered the old man. "Well, Mrs. Rowson is much older, fairly tall, though now she stoops somewhat, and she is always well dressed. Sometimes she wears a shawl over her head in the cold weather. Mrs. Cumberpatch is nothing like her."

"So this is the charwoman, is it?" The inspector was obviously disappointed, and Jackson, his assistant, retired into the background in dismay over his blunder, while once again a sarcastic smile curled the lips of Campbell Edwards, the private detective.

"You'd better try to get some information from her when she recovers," remarked Edwards in a tone which expressed his complete disbelief in the powers of the inspector. Dawford was about to answer fiercely, when a plaintive voice behind him distracted his attention.

"Please, inspector, will you permit me to use the telephone?" wailed Atkinson. "My wife will be getting so very anxious, and I must let her know I am detained."

At that moment Mrs. Cumberpatch sat up, and the inspector called Sergeant Hogan, who had been administering first aid to the charwoman.

"Take this very anxious gentleman to the telephone, sergeant," he remarked. "He wants to let his wife know he's out. Do you know if there's a telephone on this building?"

"Yes, sir, in that room on the left," replied the sergeant.

Soon Joshua Atkinson was desperately trying to explain to an incredulous wife that he was unavoidably detained at the office, for he did not dare to mention The Gables or the police. Sergeant Hogan stood by, trying in vain to keep a straight face.

"You see, sergeant," said the little man plaintively, when he had at last succeeded in pacifying the good lady to some extent, "you see, my wife is always so very nervous when I am out late. She imagines all sorts of queer things. You'd hardly believe some of the odd suspicions that come into her mind."

"Oh, yes, I should, sir," replied the sergeant. "I quite understand what you mean. You see, I'm married myself."

Jenkins is Found.

CHIEF-INSPECTOR DAWFORD admitted to himself that he was puzzled. Six persons had entered the house which had been described as "deserted"—the total was, in fact, seven, but the inspector knew nothing, as yet, of George Wolmer. One or more of these persons must know something about Mrs. Rowson's supposed disappearance, and yet the information he had obtained so far had given him no clue.

Some mystery there was, he thought. The entrance of so many people on the same evening could not be mere coincidence, and he turned to Mrs. Cumberpatch in the hope that she might be able to throw some light upon the affair.

"Are you feeling better, Mrs. Cumberpatch?" he asked. "Can you tell me what happened outside there just now?"

"Oh, yes, sir," replied the charwoman eagerly, only too ready to relate her experiences. "I was just a-comin' in to see Mrs. Rowson, 'cos

"Put up your hands, or I fire!" she said in a low voice.

Jenkins told me she wanted me to-night at six o'clock, and I was hurrying through the garden 'cos I was a bit late, an' a man, sudden-like, sprang out on me, an' I screamed."

"Yes, we heard you," remarked the inspector as Mrs. Cummerpatch paused to take breath. "Did you know the man?"

"Not in the dark I didn't," continued the voluble charwoman, "but he'd got a big cap drawn over his eyes, I think. An' he said, 'That's for you, Mrs. Rowson,' as he knocked me down, so he must have taken me for her, I s'pose. But why anyone should want to knock the old lady down is more than I can tell you, an' if you can catch him—"

Mrs. Cummerpatch would no doubt have gone on for some time longer, for she was gifted with a great capability for talking. At that moment, however, she was interrupted, for a policeman came in to report that no trace of her assailant could be found. Dawford observed a smile on the face of Campbell Edwards as the man made his report, and the inspector's annoyance overcame him altogether.

"May I ask you what you think of all this, Mr. Edwards?" he inquired sneeringly.

"I cannot express any opinion," replied the private detective quietly. "I know too little about the business. I do not even know if you are quite certain that this Mrs. Rowson has really disappeared. But if you wish me to assist you in any way, you have only to ask, and I will do what I can."

"Have you any suggestions, then?" asked Dawford.

Campbell Edwards looked coolly round, surveying Frank and Sybil, Sir Joseph and Joshua Atkinson and Mrs. Cummerpatch with his keen glance. The three men fidgeted uncomfortably as his gaze fell upon them, but the women remained quite unmoved. Edwards turned again to the inspector.

"You have searched the house and the grounds, of course. Found anything suspicious?"

"Nothing at all as yet," confessed Dawford.

"Have you searched this hall?"

Edwards glanced round the large apartment in which they stood, and the inspector's face grew crimson with annoyance.

"Great Scott!" he exclaimed. "I forgot the hall."

"I don't at all suppose that you made a mistake in overlooking the hall," remarked the detective calmly. "There's not much chance of finding a solution to the mystery, if there is a mystery, in this hall. Still, I'll have a look round, just to make sure."

Edwards began to stroll slowly around, and presently came to the small table where Sybil Vane had found the writing material when she first came in. The girl watched him turning over the papers which lay upon the table, wondering whether he would lift up the sheet of blotting-paper under which she had hidden the fragments of the envelope.

"What have we here?"

Edwards had found the torn envelope, sure enough, and he held it out for the inspector to see.

"Envelope torn in half, eh?" said Dawford, taking it and piecing the fragments together. "May have been there for days, of course. Addressed to George Wolmer, Esq. Any of you know anything about this?"

"That blotting-paper was not on the table last night," replied Sir Joshua Pine. "I was here then, and the table was clear."

"H'm! Was there any blotting-paper on this table when you arrived this evening?"

Dawford turned to Sybil and Frank expectantly, only to be disappointed.

"I am not giving you any more information," said Sybil firmly, while Frank merely shook his head.

"Who is this George Wolmer?" demanded the inspector; but once again he drew blank, for no information was forthcoming from those who knew something of the person mentioned.

Meanwhile Campbell Edwards had resumed his stroll about the hall, and presently a sharp exclamation from his lips drew the attention of everyone to him.

"Look there!" he cried, pointing towards a large settee which stood at one side of the hall.

Just visible, protruding from beneath the settee, were the fingers of a hand.

Inspector Dawford rushed across the hall, calling to Jackson and Sergeant Hogan to help, and a moment later the settee had been turned over to reveal lying beneath the motionless body of a man.

"Good heavens! It's Jenkins!" screamed Sir Joshua.

"He's dead, I'm afraid," remarked Campbell Edwards.

The inspector was speechless with chagrin. There all the time, a few yards from him, the body of the missing butler had been lying, and yet it had been left for a mere private detective to make the discovery. Dawford knelt down beside the body to examine it.

There was no sign of violence so far as he could see, but it was plain enough that the unfortunate Jenkins was dead. "Send for Doctor Grayson at once," said the inspector, rising, and the sergeant went off to 'phone for the police surgeon.

Sir Joseph Pine had been staring fixedly at the body of Jenkins for some moments in silence, but now suddenly the old man's nerve gave way completely, and he began to rave in frantic fashion.

"Yes, that's Jenkins!" he screamed wildly. "He's dead—he's dead. And where's Mrs. Rowson? Won't anyone tell me where she's gone? Then I'm going to find her."

Sir Joseph began to stagger across the hall towards the stairs. He had just reached the foot of the staircase when Frank rushed to his side, just in time to prevent his father from falling.

"Calm yourself, father," he implored. "We'll find her, never fear."

"Those men—they're missing!" shrieked the old man. "I must find them, and she can tell me where they are."

"Missing men? What do you mean, Sir Joseph?"

Dawford looked curiously at Frank's father, and his glance showed that suspicion was still alive in him.

"I must find them or I'm ruined!" cried Sir Joseph, taking not the least notice of the inspector's question.

Sybil Vane looked at the frantic old man, but there was no pity in her eyes, and a contemptuous smile curled her lip. Dawford did not see that smile, but Campbell Edwards observed it.

"Do you know what Sir Joseph means?" he asked her.

"I? How should I know?" retorted Sybil sharply. "He's raving. The sight of Jenkins' body has turned his brain, no doubt."

But in spite of her words, Sybil Vane had a very good idea of the meaning of Sir Joseph's outburst, all the same.

George Wolmer Again.

INSPECTOR DAWFORD determined to clear the hall before the arrival of the police surgeon, in order that the medical man might make his investigation into the cause of Jenkins' death without interruption. He turned first to Sybil and Frank.

"Go into that room and stay there, both of you," he indicated a door on the right of the hall. "I shall take you down to the police-station presently. I am not satisfied that either of you has told the truth about your reason for visiting this house to-night."

Sybil walked at once towards the door, looking defiantly at the inspector as she went. Frank hesitated a moment, glancing at his father, who had now collapsed heavily into a chair, quite exhausted by his emotions. Then he followed Sybil slowly across the hall, and the door closed behind him.

"Sergeant," pursued the inspector, "you will take Sir Joseph Pine, Mr. Atkinson and Mrs. Cummerpatch into that room on the left. Stay with them, and attend to Sir Joseph if he needs assistance."

"Very good, sir," replied the sergeant, shepherding his charges out of the hall, which was thus left clear save for the inspector, his assistant and Campbell Edwards. Dawford spoke at once to the private detective.

"Will you help me by trying to get some information from Miss Vane and young Pine?" he asked. "I am convinced that they both know something."

"Certainly," replied Edwards, smiling. "I quite agree with you. The young lady knows quite a lot about this business, in my opinion. I will do what I can."

A moment later Campbell Edwards entered the room to which Sybil and Frank had gone. He found the girl sitting on a chair, quite calm and self-possessed, while Frank Pine stood disconsolately by her side, still extremely worried and nervous.

"Your father seems better, Mr. Pine," said Edwards easily. "The sergeant is looking after him. Strange state of affairs this. I came here to look over the house with a view to purchase, and I seem to have stumbled upon a mystery of sorts, or even possibly a serious crime. I imagine the inspector hasn't quite made up his mind as to what is wrong."

"Are you trying to solve the problem?" asked Sybil sharply.

"I shouldn't think of interfering with the inspector," came the smooth reply. Edwards took out his cigarette-case and smiled at the girl. "Will you have a cigarette? No? You, Mr. Pine? You don't smoke? You will permit me, Miss Vane? Thank you."

The detective lighted his cigarette, and paced gently up and down the room for a moment or two, while the young man and the girl watched him in silence.

"There is something queer about this Mrs. Rowson," he said at length. "If you know anything about her, Miss Vane, I hope you will reconsider your attitude and inform the inspector. There was the matter of that torn-up envelope, too. If we knew what that envelope had contained, we might be nearer a solution."

Frank Pine started visibly, and the detective glanced at him.

"Yes, Mr. Pine," he remarked quietly. "You know something about it. Why not tell me, or tell the inspector? You will be helping your father if you do, for at present I fancy that Dawford suspects him of making away with the old lady."

Frank was in two minds. He wanted to disclose the facts about the letter and the mysterious appearance of the man Wolmer, and yet a queer feeling of loyalty to Sybil Vane restrained him. He looked at the girl, and saw that she shook her head slightly, so he did not speak.

The conversation remained one-sided. Do what he would, Campbell Edwards failed to induce either Sybil or Frank to give him any information, and at last he retired, baffled, to consult Inspector Dawford again. The girl drew a breath of relief when he had gone.

"I'm glad he's gone," she said to Frank. "I told the inspector nothing of importance, and I'm certainly not going to tell Mr. Edwards anything. The inspector sent him in to draw us, of course."

"What's become of Wolmer?" said Frank in a whisper.

"I imagine that it was he who attacked Mrs. Cummerpatch. He is probably lurking somewhere about. This is a very old house," Sybil glanced round the room as she spoke. "The sort of house which makes me think of secret passages and hidden doors."

Frank looked uneasily at the girl, and then his gaze wandered round the room. On the further side was a door leading into a small adjoining chamber, and even as the young man's glance rested upon it there came a slight noise. The door opened slowly, and a man appeared, peering cautiously into the larger room before he advanced.

He evidently expected to find the room empty, and he started with surprise when he perceived Sybil and Frank. The girl rose to her feet and confronted the intruder steadily, and Frank stepped to her side.

"You again, George Wolmer?" said Sybil. "What do you want now?"

"Where's Mrs. Rowson?" growled

Wolmer hoarsely. "Lemmo pass. She's in the hall, I reckon, and I'm going to get her."

Sybil and Frank stood firm, and Wolmer, after a moment's hesitation, came forward stealthily, and then with a sudden spring leaped at the young man. Frank grappled with him, and as he did so Sybil Vane swiftly produced a revolver.

"Put up your hands, or I fire," she said in a low voice.

Frank Pine was no match for Wolmer, who by now had him in a vice-like grip round the neck. He dragged the half-throttled young man to the side of the room, keeping Frank's body between him and the threatening pistol. Sybil did not dare to fire, lest she should hit Frank, and a second later the room was in darkness. Wolmer had switched off the light, and the girl heard the sound of his retreating footsteps as she groped her way forward to assist Frank.

The light went up again, for the young man found the switch before Sybil reached him. Frank was more shaken than hurt, and he stared in silence at the girl as she stepped to his side.

"Are you hurt, Mr. Pine?" she asked gently.

"Not very much, I'm glad to say," replied Frank. "I felt half-stifled for the moment, but it's nothing. What are we going to do now?"

Sybil did not reply, and to Frank's amazement the girl began to sway uncertainly on her feet. She staggered back a pace or two, and the young man at once rushed to her assistance, and made her sit down in a comfortable chair.

"Don't you feel well, Miss Vane?" he asked anxiously.

"I am a little faint—it's shock, I think," murmured Sybil. "Will you try to get me a glass of water, please?"

Frank went out into the hall, told Dawford that Sybil was not well, and in a few minutes returned with a glass of water. The girl was not to be seen when Frank re-entered the room, and he thought for a moment that she must have gone into the smaller apartment beyond.

He set down the glass and looked into the small room. It was empty, and to Frank's amazement there appeared to be no exit from it. Yet Wolmer had gone that way, and he was not to be seen either. Frank was completely puzzled. He ran back to the hall, and seized Inspector Dawford by the arm.

"Come at once, inspector," he cried breathlessly. "Miss Vane has disappeared!"

"I'll Tell the Truth."

SOME minutes before Frank Pine came out to get the glass of water the police-surgeon had arrived at The Gables in response to the urgent telephone message from Sergeant Hogan.

"Man found dead here, Dr. Grayson," said Inspector Dawford as the surgeon came hurriedly in. "Will you see if you can state the cause of death?"

The doctor knelt down by the body of the butler and examined the corpse closely for a few minutes. Then he stood up and turned to Dawford.

"No sign of a wound, or of violence," he stated. "The man has been dead for not more than three or four hours. I should say. He's an old man, and I think he died of heart-failure, probably from some sudden shock. Look at his face—there's fear stamped upon it."

"Yes, I noticed that look of horror on his face," replied Dawford thoughtfully. "You are able to say definitely that he was not actually murdered, then, doctor?"

"He was not," came the instant reply. "But there must be an inquest, of course. I cannot sign a death certificate under these circumstances."

"Of course you cannot, doctor. There is more in this than meets the eye." The inspector looked grave as he glanced down at the body of the unfortunate butler. "I will have the body removed at once."

Dawford called in some of his men, and when Frank Pine came out to fetch the water the corpse of the dead butler had already been taken away. The inspector had just brought Sir Joseph, Mr. Atkinson and Mrs. Cummerpatch back into the hall in readiness to resume his questioning when Frank burst in with the news that Sybil Vane had disappeared.

"There's no way out, inspector," cried Frank, "and yet she's gone."

"Take charge here, Jackson," ordered the inspector hastily. "I must look into this matter at once."

Dawford accompanied Frank and made an examination of the rooms, only to find that the young man's story was correct. There was no sign of the girl, and there seemed to be no exit from the small room.

"The window, perhaps, inspector," suggested Frank. "She may have got out that way."

"I think not." Dawford looked at the window and shook his head. "This window has not been opened for many a long day. She certainly hasn't got out there. Probably there's a secret passage somewhere."

Dawford began to tap the wall here and there, but before he had discovered anything Sergeant Hogan came rushing in.

"Will you came at once, sir?" he cried. "Mrs. Rowson is outside!"

Hastily the inspector and Frank went back to the hall, and there at a window they saw the figure of an old lady, with a shawl over her head, peering in.

"You see her, inspector?" gasped Sir Joseph Pine, trembling with excitement. "That is Mrs. Rowson at last. I must speak to her. Please bring her in at once."

In another minute the woman whom Sir Joseph had identified as Mrs. Rowson stood in the entrance of the hall, and the old man ran eagerly up to her.

"Where have you been, Mrs. Rowson?" he began eagerly. "I was afraid you had gone away."

There was no reply. The onlookers could not see what the old lady was like, for she stooped badly, and the shawl partly covered her face, which was still further concealed by a heavy veil. Sir Joseph, however, seemed sure of her identity, and he went on speaking in a shaking voice.

"Where are those men, Mrs. Rowson?" he asked. "I shall be ruined if I don't get them soon. Where are they?"

Still there came no reply from the motionless figure of the old lady. Campbell Edwards took a step forward and gazed intently at her, while Inspector Dawford looked at Sir Joseph Pine in bewilderment, unable to understand what he was talking about.

"If you won't tell me what you have done with the men, give me the drug," pleaded Sir Joseph. "If you do that, I'll let you keep the men, though that will be my ruin. Give me the drug, Mrs. Rowson, please!"

"The men? The drug? What is the meaning of all this, Sir Joseph?" asked Inspector Dawford impatiently.

The old man seemed not to hear a word the inspector said. He continued to stammer incoherently about "the men" and "the drug," though the old lady had not as yet said one word in reply to his wild pleadings.

Frank came up, and was just about to interfere when there came a startling interruption. A revolver barked from outside the front door, and Sir Joseph with a groan of anguish collapsed in a heap on the steps of the hall.

Instantly all was confusion. Inspector Dawford, forgetting "Mrs. Rowson" altogether for the moment, shouted to his men, and Sergeant Hogan hurried out to take charge of the search for the man who had fired the shot. Sir Joseph was lifted on to a couch, and the surgeon began to examine his wound.

Only one person seemed to keep his head. Campbell Edwards ignored Sir Joseph, and ran swiftly over to the old woman just as she was about to go out through the open door. He seized her by the arm, pulled off her shawl, lifted the veil from her face, and revealed the features of Sybil Vane.

"I thought as much, Miss Vane," said Edwards coolly. "What is the idea? Why are you masquerading as Mrs. Rowson, pray?"

"I refuse to give you any explanation," retorted Sybil defiantly. Shaking off the detective's grip, the girl ran past him across the hall, and into the room from which she had so mysteriously disappeared a short time before. Edwards hesitated, and then followed, but he was too late. By the time he had reached the smaller room Sybil had once more vanished.

Meanwhile a little group had gathered round the couch on which Sir Joseph lay. Frank stood at the end of the couch, anxiously watching the doctor, who was examining the old man's arm. Mrs. Cummerpatch had come up with a bowl of water, and Inspector Dawford, by her side, looked alternately from Frank to Sir Joseph, quite unable to form any theory as to the conduct of either.

"He is not much hurt, inspector," said the doctor at length. "The bullet just grazed his arm, no more. Severe shock, of course, but he'll recover from that before long."

Frank breathed a sigh of relief, and

"Stand back, you young fool!" ground out the masked man fiercely.

soon his father opened his eyes and looked up in a bewildered way. Presently he was able to sit up, and as his strength returned he seemed to come to a sudden decision.

"I've had a great shock, Frank," he said slowly, "but it's all for the best, perhaps. It has made me realise that I am in serious danger. I'll tell you and the inspector the truth."

Sir Joseph's Confession.

SIR JOSEPH PINE began his narrative in a feeble voice, but as the effects of the shock wore off he proceeded more firmly, and the fact that he was at last confessing his troubles seemed somehow to relieve his mind.

"I had a letter from Mrs. Rowson soon after she came here," he said. "She professed to be interested in the museum of which I am curator, and as she was too unwell to visit it, she asked me to call. She wanted to discuss certain antiquarian matters with me, she said. I called in answer to her letter, and after that I came here very often."

"Did you ever see anyone else here, Sir Joseph?" Inspector Dawford asked the question eagerly, for he had come to the conclusion that the old man could tell him all he wanted to know.

"The butler and Mrs. Cummerpatch, no one else. She had no visitors except for me."

Campbell Edwards came out of the room into which he had followed Sybil, and stood unobserved at the side of the hall. A smile curved his lips as he noticed the group round the couch. He felt sure that in the excitement of Sir Joseph's wound none of them had seen him unmask Sybil Vane, and he was right. Apparently even Sir Joseph and the inspector had for the moment quite forgotten the appearance of the supposed Mrs. Rowson at the door.

"Surprising that Dawford didn't keep an eye on that girl," thought Edwards. "I'll remind him of that little mistake in due course."

Meanwhile Sir Joseph continued his story, and Edwards gradually moved near enough to hear what the old man said.

"After a time Mrs. Rowson and I began to play chess," remarked Frank's father. "There was in the museum a set of jewelled chessmen, centuries old, worth thousands of pounds. They were in my charge, and they should never have left the museum."

Frank's face lengthened, for he guessed what was coming, and the inspector looked grave. He began to understand what was meant by "the missing men," and he became more and more intent on the old man's words.

"You've guessed what I did, no doubt," continued Sir Joseph slowly. "I was fool enough to bring those chessmen here, because Mrs. Rowson said she would like to see them. We played with them at times, and then three nights ago—"

Sir Joseph broke off, and sank back on the couch in great distress. Frank gave him a drink, and he rallied enough to continue in low tones.

"That night I was mad enough to allow her to keep them here, and I haven't seen them since, though I called every evening. She said she loved to look at them, and kept begging for one more day. I told her I should be ruined if I didn't take them back to the museum, and she promised to return them to-night. Where is she? Surely I saw her at the door just now?"

"I am afraid you did not see her just now, Sir Joseph." The cool voice of Campbell Edwards broke in as he came up to the couch. "That person at the door was not Mrs. Rowson at all. December 12th, 1931.

It was the girl Sybil Vane, cleverly disguised."

"Good heavens!" cried Dawford. "I'd forgotten all about that girl. Where is she now, Edwards?"

"Rather a mistake to forget her, wasn't it?" said the detective pleasantly. "She ran into the room over there, and she's disappeared again. Why did she come here this evening? I think perhaps this young man knows."

He turned to Frank Pine with a smile, and Dawford realised that he was still far from a solution of the mystery. Sir Joseph's statement had not cleared up the matter, after all, for he had not accounted for the presence of Sybil Vane.

"I don't know anything about her," said Frank firmly, determining still to conceal the fact of the intrusion of the man Wolmer. "As for me, I came here simply to find out why my father visited Mrs. Rowson so often. I was puzzled and worried about it, and I thought I'd investigate a little."

"I have an idea," remarked Edwards thoughtfully. "Possibly the young lady has been masquerading all along as Mrs. Rowson. That good lady seems to me to be a very mysterious person, and Sir Joseph certainly thought he recognised the girl a little while ago."

"Impossible, impossible, Mr. Edwards," cried Sir Joseph shakily. "That woman at the door looked like Mrs. Rowson, but I couldn't see her face."

"Have you ever seen her face—Mrs. Rowson's face?" Edwards barked out the question suddenly, and the old man was visibly taken aback.

"Why—why—never very well!" he stammered slowly. "She was always muffled up in a shawl, and—and—" He stopped, looking helplessly from the detective to Inspector Dawford, utterly puzzled. Suddenly he struggled to his feet.

"She's gone, and she's taken the chessmen with her!" he screamed. "I'm utterly ruined. I shall lose my position unless we can get them back at once."

Frank managed to calm his father down, while the inspector turned to Edwards.

"I have made a grave mistake, as you suggested," he said bitterly. "Now will you do what you can to find that girl, Edwards? Go out and see if the sergeant has traced the man who fired at Sir Joseph, and ask him to give you one or two men to look for Miss Vane. She can't have gone far. Search that room. I believe there's a secret passage somewhere."

"I will do my best," replied Edwards. "But why not go yourself?"

"I will come in a few minutes, but I must ask Sir Joseph one or two more questions first," said Dawford.

"Now, Sir Joseph," The inspector turned again to the old man as Campbell Edwards strolled off towards the door. "You have not explained everything yet. What do you know of the death of the man Jenkins?"

"Nothing, nothing whatever," stammered Sir Joseph hastily. "He was well enough when I saw him here last night."

"If I'm! Well, I don't suspect you of any connection with his death," said Dawford. "Another point. Have you any idea as to the identity of the person who fired that shot?"

"Not in the least, but I fancy the bullet was not meant for me, but for the woman I supposed to be Mrs. Rowson. I was almost touching her when the shot came."

"If anyone suspects her of being in possession of those chessmen, you may be right there," replied the inspector thoughtfully. "There is certainly someone hanging about outside—the man who attacked Mrs. Cummerpatch, perhaps."

"George Wolmer," thought Frank, but he kept his countenance under control, and he did not speak.

"One last question before I go to see if my men have traced him," said Dawford. "You mentioned a drug, Sir Joseph. Has that any bearing on this matter?"

"Hardly, inspector." Sir Joseph Pine whispered the words, and a look of shame came over his face. "Mrs. Rowson used to supply me with a drug for my nerves, and lately I seem to be unable to do without it, that's all."

At that moment Sergeant Hogan came into the hall, looking extremely crestfallen.

"You haven't found him, I see," said the inspector.

"No, sir," replied Hogan. "We caught a glimpse of him at the lower end of the garden as he was scaling the wall, but he's given us the slip. Some of the men are still searching the common outside, but the ground's very rough, and I'm afraid it's a hopeless job in the dark."

"I'll come out myself," said the inspector. "You stay here and look after these people. Have you seen anything of Miss Vane?"

"No, sir, nothing at all." Sergeant Hogan seemed thoroughly ashamed of himself as he replied. "Mr. Edwards is looking for her now, and I sent one of the men with him, but I don't suppose he'll find her."

"If he doesn't, I will!" retorted Inspector Dawford, as he went out.

The Two Bags.

FOR the second time that evening Sybil Vane crept slowly along a narrow passage into which the secret door opened. She had found the door without much difficulty while Frank was fetching the water, and now again she had passed through it after Campbell Edwards had exposed her masquerade.

The girl stopped once or twice to listen, but there was no sound of pursuit. Presently she came to the end of the passage, and, pushing gently at a door, she stepped down into a large garage. Two motor-cars stood there, and Sybil went over to them and examined both carefully, especially the smaller of the two. She did not seem to find whatever she may have been seeking, and she began to prowl round the garage quietly, looking in every corner carefully without seeing anything unusual.

After a while she came back to the corner near the door by which she had entered. She had left the door open, but now she shut it softly, and as she did so she noticed a niche in the wall close by. In the niche were two large brown bags, exactly alike. Sybil took them down cautiously, and went over to a bench. She was just about to try to open one of the bags when she paused and looked round.

The door she had just closed was being pushed outward slowly, and for the second time that evening Sybil saw Frank Pine come hesitatingly into a place strange to him. On this occasion, however, his face lighted up when he saw the girl.

"I hoped I should find you here, Miss Vane," he began.

"Speak quietly," whispered Sybil.

"How did you manage to get away?"

"Easily enough. The inspector went out to look for the man who fired that

(Continued on page 20.)

The story of a bell-boy who matched his wits against Society to make easy money—but redeemed himself in the end for the sake of the girl he loved. Starring James Cagney and Joan Blondell.

The Bell-Boy.

BERT HARRIS walked smartly across the annexe of the Washington Hotel, Pittsburgh, as the desk-clerk beckoned him with a thin forefinger.

"Show that young lady to the housekeeper's room, will you?" the clerk said. "She's called with reference to the linen job that was advertised, though as a matter of fact I believe the position has already been filled."

Bert turned his head and glanced at a girl who was sitting on a plush-covered bench. The glance told him that she was pleasing to the eye, being a dainty and attractive blonde, and Bert at once made up his mind that he would use his influence to see that the linen job was still vacant.

Bert was but a bell-boy, decked out in a uniform with brass buttons, and yet, in spite of his lowly position, his influence was as considerable as his activities were varied. At least, he usually found ways and means to realise his ambitions, and his immediate ambition was to see the blonde girl on the staff of the Hotel Washington.

He approached her and addressed her crisply.

"Step this way, please," he said, and, escorting her to the basement, led her along a wide corridor.

"I came to get the linen job," the blonde girl mentioned, as they walked towards the housekeeper's room. "I hope the clerk was wrong when he said he thought the position had been taken."

"Did you ever see a hotel clerk that was right?" Bert answered scornfully, and a moment later he was ushering her into the presence of the matronly woman who was in charge of the Washington's domestic personnel.

"Mrs. Snyder," Bert announced, "this is the girl you hired for the linen job. Oh, I know you told her to report to-morrow morning, but she wanted to get acquainted with her new situation right away. Mrs. Snyder is the lady you talked to over the 'phone this morning, Miss Jones," he added.

The blonde girl looked at him blankly, quite obviously stupefied by what he had said. Then Mrs. Snyder spoke to her.

"Ever done hotel work before, Miss Jones?" she asked.

"Oh, sure she has," Bert interposed, lying glibly. "Eight months at the Blackstone in Chicago, a year at the Startler in Buffalo. I can vouch for her, Mrs. Snyder. You see, her—her boy friend's a pal o' mine, and he told me all about her."

"I see," murmured Mrs. Snyder, and, having given his imaginary recommendation, Bert left the blonde girl with the housekeeper and sought out another bell-boy.

"Say, Jim," he began urgently, "your girl friend, Mamee Jones, got that linen job, didn't she?"

Jim nodded smugly. "That's right," he replied. "Phoned up Ma Snyder this mornin' and got orders to start to-morrow, like I told you. She was a cinch for the job, anyway. You know the experience she's had—eight months at the Blackstone in Chicago, and a year at the Startler in Buffalo—"

"Listen, Jim," Bert interrupted, "I hear Mamee can't come to work. You see, they needed somebody with a lot more experience, so another girl got the linen job instead."

The face of the other bell-boy waxed wrathful.

"Say, I'm goin' to see old lady Snyder right now!" he declared violently. "She can't get away with that stuff—"

"Now wait a minute," Bert said, in a tone that was intended to soothe his irate colleague. "Here, just tell Mamee that one of the old hands came back—you can do it." And with the words he thrust two or three dollar bills into Jim's hand.

"All right, Bert," the other bell-boy muttered, trying to look as if he were taking the bribe with reluctance, and then he moved off.

He had hardly disappeared when Bert saw the blonde girl ascending from the basement, and he hurried towards her eagerly.

"Well, you got the situation without any trouble, didn't you?" he said.

"I did," was the answer, "but I'm not so sure that I'll keep it. I don't want any job that I have to take away from somebody else."

"Aw, that ain't sense," Bert argued. "Why, whenever you take any job you keep somebody else from havin' it. There's more people than jobs in this world, ain't there?"

The blonde girl shrugged.

"Well, it was all above my head," she murmured, "this story about 'Miss Jones and her boy friend.'"

"What is your name?" Bert asked.

"Anne," was the reply, "Anne Roberts."

Such was the beginning of a partnership that was to remain fast amid the chequered eventualities of Bert Harris' career. But, during her first day or two at the Hotel Washington, Anne Roberts knew nothing of the various side-lines that Bert practised, and she continued to think of him as an obliging but common-or-garden bell-boy till one of the other chamber-maids put her wise.

"Keep away from the bell-boys," the girl warned her, "and especially that feller Bert Harris. He's dynamite, and as full of smart ideas as a tramp's sock is full of holes. At least, he thinks they're smart, and they make him a lotta money, but he'll slip up one o' these times—"

"What kind of smart ideas?" Anne murmured.

"Well, for one thing," the other girl answered in an undertone, "he peddles liquor and sells it at a hundred per cent. profit amongst the guests. And then there's the dice game he runs among the hotel staff. Keep outa that, sister. 'Most everybody owes him dough, for I guess he's got them 'bones' mesmerised."

But it was not until she had been at the Washington for a week or two that Anne heard the full facts from Bert's own lips.

A slack spell in the day's work had given him the opportunity of a few minutes alone with her, and from his locker in the staff-room he produced a scrap-book that was filled with newspaper cuttings. As he handed the volume to her she scanned its contents quietly and then began to quote one or two of the more striking headlines.

"Fraud Charge Against Smart Confidence Tricksters," she read out. "Get-rich-quick Scheme Works Again—Prince of Swindlers Makes Gigantic Haul—Impostor and Bonanza that did not Exist—'Say, what is this? Are you taking a correspondence course in larceny?'"

"Larceny's a hard word," Bert rejoined with a grin. "No, Anne, I'm no burglar, but I've got a respect for the guy that can pull off an elegant job and show he's smarter than the next man. I began this scrap-book so that I could catch on to the line these fellows take, and I'm wise to all the ropes."

"Is it your ambition to imitate these men?" Anne asked him.

"Yes," Bert told her, "and that's why I've been jugglin' with them dice and sellin' strong liquor around this dump. I needed capital, and now I've got it I'm ready for the road."

"It's a road that always ends in the penitentiary," Anne warned, but Bert shook his head.

"It won't this time," he declared, "not the way I'm gonna work things. Listen, Anne, everybody's lookin' for something for nothing these days, and honest men are scarcer in the big cities of the U.S. than feathers on a frog. Now the world owes me a living, and I'm gonna collect it. I ain't built for work—work is for horses—and I'm ready to make a play against some o' the guys that think they're smart."

Anne eyed him searchingly.

"And why are you talking this way to me?" she inquired.

"Do I have to give you three guesses, honey?" he retorted. "Say, a feller with my ideas needs a partner, and the first time I saw you I knew you were the business associate I was lookin' for. You've got beauty, Anne, and with my savvy and your looks we could trim the world."

She hesitated. Like him, she yearned for the things that were beyond her grasp, the things that only money could buy. But unlike him, she was afraid of the possible consequences. She lacked his tremendous confidence, which might have been commendable if his energy and ability had not been diverted into such unworthy pursuits.

"I've never been mixed up in any racket before," she faltered, "and if there's one thing I haven't any use for it's gao."

"Baby," he assured her, "your worryin' days are over if you tie-up with me."

Dapper Dan Barker.

A MONTH had elapsed, an eventful month that had seen Bert Harris and Anne Roberts fairly embarked on the tortuous paths of waywardness.

Already their partnership was progressing, and the Hotel Washington was but a memory. A clean-up that had brought them five thousand dollars had given them a start, and insisting that Anne should take a half share, Bert had drawn on his original capital and made tracks with her for Chicago.

December 12th, 1931.

The Michigan Hotel was his new address, and the Embassy was Anne's. But they had not taken situations in these palatial edifices, for they had abandoned their respective rôles as bell-boy and chambermaid, and tricked out in the smartest of clothes, might have been seen dining at the Michigan one evening about a week after their arrival in Chicago.

The Michigan was a place much frequented by gamblers, confidence men and the like, a swell-dressed parade of parasites who were as troublesome to the authorities as all the gangsters and hoodlums of the underworld.

"Anybody who doesn't like this life should have his head examined," Bert observed, as he toyed with some caviare and looked around at the glittering display of opulence in the midst of which he and Anne were seated.

"I'd like it better if there were some money coming in," Anne mused. "Five thousand dollars can't last for ever, and to my knowledge you've spent two thousand of your share."

Bert laughed easily.

"That was my original stake," he told her. "I've still got that two thousand five hundred. Don't you start worryin', Anne. We'll be on Easy Street yet. It's makin' the right connections that takes time. For instance, take a look at that guy over there."

He indicated a tall, sallow man who was sitting at a table not far away, in company with a fair-haired girl.

"I've been watching him," Bert continued. "He hangs around here a lot. Name's Barker, and I know he's mixed up in the racket—Dapper Dan Barker, they call him. The girl with him is named Helen—"

Bert stopped short, for at that moment the man whom he was discussing became involved in a "scene" with an individual who appeared to be the worse of liquor. Having bumped violently against the girl Helen, the fellow made some leering comment, and Barker immediately sprang to his feet and gave him a push that sent him flying across the room.

The man succeeded in recovering his balance close to the table where Bert and Anne were sitting, and with an ugly snarl he seized a chair and lifted it threateningly above his head. Bert at once stood up and wrested the piece of furniture from his grasp, whereupon the man wheeled angrily.

"Say," he began, but before he could utter another word Bert clipped him smartly on the jaw.

He fell like a log, and was still unconscious when a couple of stalwart attendants carried him from the restaurant and pitched him into the street. In the meantime Bert had been joined by Dan Barker.

"I owe you a word of thanks," Barker stated, and was about to express his gratitude in more fervent terms when Bert interrupted him.

"That's all right," he said. "I don't like fellers who swing chairs. By the way, I've seen you around the hotel a good deal, haven't I?"

Barker informed him that he was staying at the Michigan, and then he presented his fair companion, who was residing at a hotel known as the Wellington, close by.

"Oh, I'm round the corner at the Embassy," Anne put in. "We're almost neighbours."

Barker invited Bert and Anne to join him at his table, and afterwards, when the girls had been driven to their respective hotels, he saw Bert to his room. By that time they had both come to an understanding and definitely knew each other as members of the same slick-witted profession.

"The minute I saw you I knew you were in the old racket," Barker declared, as he dropped into a chair that Bert drew up for him. "Mind you, I don't like to talk business with strangers, but you look all right to me."

Bert had produced his scrap-book with the intention of showing it to Barker, and he smiled knowingly as he flipped over the pages of it.

"You can depend on me," he said, "if that's what you mean."

Dan Barker leaned forward.

"Things are pretty slack just now," he observed, "so just to pass the time away I'm working up a new deal. It's a little out of my usual line, but money is money. Anyway, the reason I'm talkin' to you is that you've got an honest face and a clean pair of hands. You've never been jugged—arrested?"

"No, I never took a fall," Bert answered.

"Well," said Barker, "how much money can you raise?"

Bert mentioned the two thousand five hundred dollars at his disposal, whereupon Barker grimaced.

"That's coffee money," he said disgustedly. "If you can't promote more than that forget I ever mentioned any scheme, friend."

"Wait a minute," Bert put in, gripping him eagerly by the arm. "Maybe I could get as much again from Anne, my partner."

Barker shrugged.

"Well, all right," he agreed. "You meet me to-morrow in the lobby—say about one o'clock, and we'll get the details fixed."

Bert kept his appointment, and he was in Barker's company till the evening, when they picked up Anne and Helen and took them to a show. Afterwards Bert saw Anne home, and alone with her in the suite she had rented, he began to talk of the new friendship he had formed.

"I don't like that fellow," Anne interposed, at the mention of Dan Barker's name. "I can't tell you why it is, but I've no use for him."

"Well, you'll have to get to like him," Bert announced. "We're working together, him an' me, and his racket is a cinch. Did you see the way he pulled out a twenty-dollar bill every time he paid for anything to-night?"

"What of it?" Anne demanded, and Bert grinned at her.

"Counterfeit," he explained. "And listen, they're so much like real money that I changed ten of those twenty-dollar bills for four fifty-dollar ones at a bank to-day. Even fooled a cashier."

Anne's pretty face became clouded with an expression of anxiety.

"You're beginning to take awful chances, Bert," she protested.

"We aim to minimise the risk by unloading these notes as quick as we can," Bert said. "By the time the banks are wise to 'em we'll be outa town. We can buy 'em off a guy named Kansas City Dutch at the rate of two for one—two 'phony bills for one genuine note. Only my twenty-five hundred ain't enough. Dan goes in for things on a large scale, and I have to have at least five thousand before he'll take me in with him."

"You can count me out," Anne told him shortly.

"Aw, listen, Baby," Bert appealed, "we're partners, ain't we? I made money for you before, an' I can do it again. Come on, what do you say?"

Anne shrugged.

"Well, I don't like it," she observed in a resigned tone, "but if I don't give you the money you'll probably steal it—so go on and take it."

Clean-Up—For One!

THE following night Dapper Dan Barker called on Bert unexpectedly.

"I hate to break in on you like this," he said, "but did you raise that money?"

Bert nodded.

"Got the five thousand right here," he answered cheerfully.

"Well, this is what's happened," Barker continued. "Kansas City Dutch is leavin' town within an hour, for he's got the tip that the cops are on his tail for a job he did twelve months ago. Now here's my ten thousand. Put it with your five, and we'll go right round and do a deal with Kansas. And don't forget—Dutch is pretty hard to trade with, but we're goin' to stick out for a three-to-one bargain. Forty-five thousand of counterfeit for our fifteen thousand straight."

They pooled their resources and made their way to the Loop District, where Kansas City Dutch was located in a mean back-room on the top floor of a lodging-house. It was Bert who effected the negotiation, Dan Barker having explained to him that he himself had formerly accepted the counterfeiter's notes in the ratio of two to one, and that it was therefore unlikely that Dutch would give better terms to him, whereas a newcomer like Bert might obtain the higher proportion.

Bert felt that he had good reason to pride himself on being a good bargainer, for, after some discussion, Dutch agreed to hand over forty-five thousand for the fifteen that the former bell-boy tendered.

"There you are," he said, counting them out. "If the cops wasn't so hot on me you'd get thirty or nothing."

The transaction completed, Bert and Dan Barker returned to the Michigan Hotel, and in the privacy of the former's room, Dutch's money was produced and examined again.

"It sure looks good," Bert declared. "I can't tell it from the real McKay."

"And nobody else could, either," Barker said. "Well, you'd better keep it all till to-morrow, and put it in some safe place till we share out. There's no use carryin' that amount of money around the streets."

There was a knock on the door at that moment, and Barker seized Bert by the arm and hurried him across the room to a chest of drawers.

"Shove that money in there," he told him urgently, and then, when Bert had obeyed: "Who's there?" he called.

"It's me—Helen," a girl's voice answered, and with a show of relief Barker opened the door to her.

"All right my dear," he said, "I guess I've kept you waitin' over our appointment to-night, but I'm ready now. Say, Bert," he added, "we'll share out to-morrow and have one grand celebration. In the meantime, lock the door of your suite and sleep with one eye open."

With these words of counsel, Dapper Dan Barker passed out into the corridor with Helen and walked to the lift-shaft, where he encountered none other than Kansas City Dutch.

Dutch was carrying a black leather bag in one hand, and he tapped it meaningly.

"I've got the dough," he stated.

"Good!" Barker rejoined. "You know, Dutch, I never knew anyone so stupid as this Pittsburgh sap. All smartened up from that fool scrapbook. The poor chump thought that real money you sold him was counterfeit coin. Said it looked perfect—said he couldn't tell it from the real stuff."

"What a mug!" observed the girl Helen scornfully.

Meanwhile, sublimely ignorant of this conversation, Bert Harris was strolling to and fro across the floor of his bedroom, his leisurely gaze fixed upon the ceiling in an expression of mild self-satisfaction, his hands thrust deep into his pockets, his thoughts dwelling upon the manner in which—as he imagined—he was going to treble his assets.

Of course, he reflected, that money in the chest of drawers was a tremendous responsibility, especially as thirty thousand of it belonged to Dan Barker. He began to wish Barker had taken his cash with him, and finally decided that some safer hiding-place might be found for the notes.

He walked to the chest of drawers and opened the receptacle in which the "counterfeit" bills had been placed. His hand moved searchingly, and then all at once became agitated in its movements. Face blanching he dropped to his knees, scabbled amidst the corners of the drawer, and suddenly uttered an ejaculation as he discovered that a section had been cut away from the back of the chest.

He dragged the piece of furniture from the wall, and saw a gaping hole where half a dozen bricks had been removed. Scarce sixty seconds after Bert had placed the money in the chest, at Dan Barker's instigation, an unseen hand had "lifted" it from the adjoining room—the hand of Kansas City Dutch, had Bert but known it.

Bert was not in the frame of mind to figure things out just then. In the twinkling of an eye he had become like a man possessed, and impulsively he flung himself against the door of the neighbouring apartment. At the third onslaught his shoulder burst the lock, and, staggering across the threshold, he brought up short against a table.

The room was empty, but a note lay on the floor by a gaping hole in the wall, and his eyes became riveted on it.

"Dear Bert," it ran.—"Paste this adventure in your scrapbook. Love and kisses,

"HELEN."

For a moment Bert crouched glaring at that mocking epistle, and then the emotion that was surging up in him burst the bonds of self-restraint.

On a sudden he was a raging mad-man with but one instinct—the instinct to destroy! In his blind fury he wrenched that room, smashing the hotel furniture to fragments. Then he tried to drown his chagrin in drink, and finished by sinking into a heavy but troubled sleep, from which he awakened next morning with mixed feelings of disgust, rage and depression—all alternating in his tortured brain.

He made his way despondently to the lounge, and was sitting there when, with an absent gesture, he picked up a morning paper. A headline caught his eye, announcing the engagement of a certain Lydia Potter, daughter of a millionaire, and on the same page Bert observed an advertisement for a Lake Shore Drive jewellery establishment.

For a moment Bert crouched glaring at that mocking epistle, and then the emotion that was surging up in him burst the bonds of self-restraint.

The two circumstances connected themselves in his mind and suddenly gave him an inspiration. He was taking one more step forward on the road to Larceny Lane, but Barker and his hirlings had cleaned him out, and he could not go to Anne and confess that he had allowed himself to be cheated of her money as well as his own.

The moment he was clear as to the details of his cunning piece of strategy, he took a taxi to the fashionable Lake Shore Drive jewellery establishment, and paid his fare with one of the few odd dollars remaining to him.

As he entered the jeweller's he was greeted by a manager, to whom he addressed himself.

"In Mr. Alexander Porter's secretary," he said, "and I want to select a diamond bracelet. Mr. Porter just announced his daughter's engagement, you know."

"Oh, yes, I read about it," the manager rejoined. "Er—will you step this way, please?"

He led Bert to a counter and presented him to a young salesman, who began to show him some expensive items.

"How much is this one?" Bert asked, singling out a bracelet.

"Fifteen thousand dollars, sir," the salesman murmured.

"Well, this is very nice," Bert observed. "I'll take it—pending Mr. Porter's approval, of course. Would you mind sending it to his residence?"

The salesman nodded.

"I'll have it sent within the hour, sir," he declared. "And the address?"

Bert had made a point of obtaining Porter's address from a telephone directory.

"Eight-seventy-five, Michigan Boulevard," he said. "And, by the way, may I have your card?"

The salesman obliged, and Bert read the name Roland on it. With the card in his possession he left the establishment and, about an hour later, he entered a phone box, where he put through a call to Alexander Porter's house.

He was answered by the butler, and Bert spoke to the manservant in businesslike tones.

"This is the German Jewellery Company, calling," he said. "Through an unfortunate error a package intended for another of our patrons was delivered at your house."

"The package is here, sir," came the reply.

"Very good," Bert said. "Our Mr. Roland will call for it immediately. Would you give it to him when he arrives? The name is Roland—R-o-l-a-n-d."

Bert hung up the receiver, and, stepping out of the phone box, hailed a taxi. Within ten minutes he had called at the Porter residence, collected the diamond bracelet and was on his way to a "fence," to whom he traded the piece of jewellery for five thousand.

His finances thus restored, Bert felt in a position to call on Anne, and he visited her suite at the Embassy.

"Hallo, honey!" he said as she admitted him. "How's tricks?"

"That's what I ought to ask you," she retorted. "Have you made that clean-up you were talking about?"

Bert dropped into a chair and shook his head.

"Listen, Anne," he told her. "Dan Barker wasn't on the level. He was December 12th, 1931.

playing me for a sap, but it didn't come off—see? Well, we're heading for New York—because I remember Barker once saying that the Big Burg was his main address, and I mean to look him up."

Anne regarded him shrewdly. "Bert," she inquired, "just how much did Dan sting you for?"

"Didn't I tell you?"

"Oh, I know what you told me," Anne interrupted, "and I know when you're telling me a lie. But that's all right—I'll pretend to believe you."

The Big Burg.

TWO or three weeks had elapsed since his arrival in New York, when, strolling into the grill-room of the Hotel Clarendon one evening, Dapper Dan Barker observed a familiar face.

It was the attractive face of Anne Roberts, and as he recognised her he approached her table, where she was sitting alone.

"Why, hallo!" he greeted. "Fancy running into you this way! May I sit down?"

Anne inclined her fair head, and Barker sank into a chair.

"You're sure looking great," he went on in a complimentary vein. "By the way, what happened to that young chump you were running around with? Did he ever tell you about that fake counterfeiting gag that cost him five thousand? Oh, boy, he fell for it hook, line and sinker, and the cream of it all was the note Helen left him: 'Paste this in your scrapbook—'"

"Oh, where is Helen?" Anne asked him, concealing the flicker of resentment that Barker's words had aroused in her.

Barker shrugged.

"She and I were just a temporary team," he mentioned. "We split partnership after we left Chicago."

They talked on, and Anne made herself particularly charming, at the same time pretending to laugh heartily whenever Barker recalled the manner in which he had fooled Bert Harris. Thus an hour or two passed, and when they eventually separated Anne had discovered Barker's address and had arranged to see him again.

She had an appointment that night with Bert, and, shortly after her return to the apartment she had rented on Broadway, the former bell-boy called on her. He entered breezily enough, and, after some conversation, casually picked up a book of poems.

Next second he had discovered an inscription on the fly-leaf, and he grinned as he read it out.

"To Anne," he murmured. "'this book so suitable, Joe.' And who may 'Joe' be?"

"A young man I met on the train coming from Chicago to New York," Anne retorted. "I suppose you hardly noticed him, but he was most attentive when I got that cinder in my eye. I've been seeing quite a lot of him in New York. Reynolds is his name, and he's something in the brokerage business."

"You don't tell me!" Bert mocked.

"Yes, and I'll tell you something else," Anne observed. "To-night I saw somebody who's more in your line—Dapper Dan Barker. He's living at the Saint Anthony. We dined together and talked of nothing but you. And, by the way, I have a message for you—Helen sends her love and kisses."

Bert's face had undergone an instantaneous change at the mention of Barker's name, and for the time being he seemed bereft of his senses.

"The dirty, double-crossing burglar!" he raved. "And you—laughin' at me along with him! A fine partner you are! Why don't you throw in your hand with me and tie up with that smart-aleck?"

"Bert, you talk like a child," Anne snapped. "Listen, Barker mentioned that he'd cleaned you out, and, before we go any further, you've got to tell me how you found enough money for this trip to New York."

Bert bit his lip.

"I never had any intention of telling you," he answered sullenly, "but I stole a necklace from a jeweller and sold it to a fence. Anne, I was desperate, and I had to do something to get back your two-thousand-five-hundred."

An expression of dismay had appeared in Anne's lovely eyes.

"Oh, Bert," she cried, "out-and-out thievery isn't your style. Oh, I'm sorry I ever got into this racket. At first it seemed clever and shrewd, and we only matched our wits against fellows that you'd call wise guys. All we did was cheat a lot of cheaters. But since you fell in with Barker it's come to plain larceny, and I suppose next week you'll rob a bank or something."

"This sounds like Joe Reynolds' influence," Bert said sourly, cycling her askance. "Well, if you want to quit—"

"I'm not going to quit yet," Anne interrupted. "I'm going to stick with you and even up the score with Dan Barker. He took our money, and he's going to pay. He made you resort to common thievery, and we'll make him resort to worse than that before we finish. Already, Bert, I've got the glimmerings of an idea."

Bert's face cleared, and he caught hold of her hands.

"Atta baby!" he said. "You had me worried for the minute I thought you were going to run out on me. Come on, Anne, what are the plans?"

The Trimming of Barker.

ANNE had spread the net cunningly, and Barker had stepped into it unsuspectingly. A week after he had formed what he believed to be a partnership with the girl, he met her at her hotel for the killing.

"I'm all set, Anne," Barker announced. "And, say, I've got to give you credit for a great idea."

"Believe me," Anne rejoined, "this rich old gent Bellock is crazy over me. He'll be along pretty soon, and we'll head for the racecourse. But I'll keep you waiting just long enough to let the programme get started before we can get to the track and you can make the clean-up from the first three races. By the way, you've given Mike the chauffeur his instructions, haven't you?"

"He knows exactly what to do," Barker answered, "and exactly how fast to travel."

The door-bell rang at that moment, and the visitor proved to be Colonel Bellock, the supposedly rich old gentleman whom Barker imagined he was going to trim. While Anne passed through into her boudoir to change her frock, Barker made himself particularly pleasant to the other man, and discussed the race meeting they were to attend.

Anne reappeared some time later and pronounced herself ready to start, and within three-quarters of an hour she and her companions might have been seen on the open road, travelling in a touring car, which the chauffeur Mike was driving.

Another automobile passed them when they were still several miles from their destination, and, after exchanging a glance with Anne, Barker looked steadily at its rear number-plate.

The driver of that automobile was a party to the scheme that Anne had proposed to Barker, and Barker knew that the man was equipped with a series of numbers which he could place over the genuine identification plate.

The number which met Barker's eye was "002," and he casually turned his attention to the racing page of a newspaper that he was carrying. The page gave the card for the meeting towards which he and his companions were journeying, and every horse was preceded by numbers registering its form in three previous races—a nought denoting that it had been unplaced, a four, three, two or one denoting that it had run fourth, third, second or first, as the case might be.

Barker examined the list of horses scheduled to appear in the first race, and saw that no less than three of them were preceded by the number "002." But the driver of the automobile in front had furnished another clue by attaching two letters—"C" and "B"—so that the identification plate read "CB 002."

Barker, working from the clue, picked out the following entry:

"002 Captain's Boy—"

"You know," came the voice of Bellock, "the time is one-fifty. That means we've missed the one-thirty race."

Barker nodded.

"That's your fault for keeping us waiting, Anne," he reproached. "And I was hoping to back a sure-fire winner in that race. What did you fancy, colonel?"

"To tell you the truth, I haven't had a chance to look at the entries," Bellock answered.

There was a spell of silence, and then Anne spoke.

"Why don't you two bet between yourselves?" she suggested. "Dan can back his fancy, and you, colonel, can act as bookmaker."

Bellock appeared to fall in with the suggestion readily, and Barker became exultant. He knew the winner already. Hadn't the accomplice in the other automobile given it to him via that fake number-plate, after having received the result of the first race over the telephone five minutes ago?

"Captain's Boy is my choice," said Barker, "and the odds are given as two-to-one. Supposing I lay five hundred dollars on that filly, colonel?"

"Make it a thousand," declared Bellock. "We'll let Anne act as stakeholder."

The other auto had accelerated, and was soon lost to view. But its driver halted at a garage some distance farther on, and, after phoning to the track for the result of the second race, he again faked his rear number-plate. Thus when the touring car overtook him, Barker read as follows:

"HB 213."

"How about a little flutter on the two o'clock?" the swindler said to Bellock. "My choice this time is High Ball, and I'll back it for fifteen hundred. Here's my money, Anne."

Bellock acquiesced, and shortly afterwards the other automobile passed them on the road for the second time. The result of the third race had come through, and once more the identification plate had been altered accordingly.

"Well, have you any fancy for the third race?" Bellock asked Dan Barker.

"I was just thinking," the swindler murmured. "I guess I'll take a chance on Queenie. And, say, how would you like to make it really interesting? Can you cover five thousand?"

"Sure I can," Bellock declared. "The sky's the limit!"

The transaction was made, and before any further wagering could be indulged in the track was reached. Anne and the two men at once made their way to the indicator on which the results were officially marked, but Barker did not even bother to raise his glance to them at first. He knew, or thought he knew, that the first three would be Captain's Boy, High Ball and Queenie.

"You didn't pick a winner in the whole lot," came the voice of Bellock. "Paintbox, Sandro and Skysign were the lucky fillies."

"What!" Barker glared up at the indicator, and all at once he was transfixed. "Double-crossed!" he shouted. "That dirty skunk in the other automobile tricked me! Where is he?"

He plunged through the dense crowd of race-goers who thronged the vicinity of the indicator, but he had not gone far when his suspicions veered to Anne. When he blunderingly retraced his steps, however, there was no sign of her and Bellock.

It was a penniless swindler who set out to walk back to New York that afternoon, and he was still tramping the long, dusty road when the share-out of his money took place in a certain expensive apartment where Bert Harris was staying.

"Colonel Bellock," better known as "Baldy" Tomkins, was one of those to profit from the tripping of Barker, and, when he had been paid off, Anne turned to Bert.

"Are you satisfied with our revenge?" she asked. "Hasn't it been more gratifying than just punching Barker on the nose?"

"With all this dough in my hand,

"How much is this one?" Bert asked, singling out a bracelet.

how can I say you're wrong?" Bert answered jubilantly. "But listen, Anne," he went on, in a more serious tone, "money doesn't mean so much to me as it once did. It's a means to an end, of course. For instance, I want to go to Europe, mix with swell people, see swell places. But there's something I want a whole lot more—and that's you, Anne. I'm no poet, but I'm crazy about you, Honey—and—Let's get married!"

Anne looked at him for a moment, and he thought he saw tears welling in her eyes.

"Oh, Bert, why didn't you say that long ago?" she told him, with a catch in her voice. "I think I cared for you, too—once upon a time. But I'm in love with somebody else now. You never seemed to have any use for me except as a partner for your racket."

"Is it—that guy Joe Reynolds, Anne?" Bert asked her huskily.

"Yes," she said, "it's Joe. I—I've learned something going round with him, Bert. I've met people—people a whole lot different from our friends. Oh, I don't know, it seems a decent way to live—that's all. So I'm going to quit the racket and marry him. I'd have quit before, only—I wanted to help you get even with Barker. And I'd have quit even before that if—I hadn't been in love with you—like I was in the beginning, Bert."

He squared his shoulders with an effort. "But you're right to quit now, Honey," he assured her. "You're right about living decent, and you'd never be happy with me. The racket is in my blood, and I couldn't go straight if I tried. Fancy me as a bell-boy again!"

He chuckled, but his laughter did not ring true. For he knew in his heart that, if she wanted him to, he would have taken any job, however lowly.

It was too late now.

The Embezzler.

BERT HARRIS sat in the lounge of a modest apartment that he had rented in New York. He was back from a year's sojourn in Europe, and it had been a year of boredom, for, though he might have enjoyed the experience under other circumstances, he had been conscious all the time that there was something wanting.

He was brooding over the past when the door-bell rang, and as he answered the summons he found a slender, girlish figure in the corridor outside his rooms. For an instant he could scarcely believe his eyes, and then his expression changed from stupefaction to delight.

"Anne!" he exclaimed. "How did you ever find out where I lived?"

"Oh, I managed," she told him, with a wan smile.

He took her arm and led her into the lounge.

"Sit down," he urged, "and tell me how you are? How'd you like married life?"

"All right, I guess," she murmured; but something in her tone belied the words.

Bert leaned forward and looked at her keenly.

"You don't look very happy," he mentioned.

"Oh, Bert, I'm not!" she cried brokenly. "I've something to tell you. Something dreadful has happened. It's Joe, Bert. He used some of the firm's money for a private deal, thinking he could make a fortune."

Bert pursed his lips. There was a curious glitter in his eyes.

December 12th, 1931.

"That's been tried before," he observed. "I suppose the deal didn't work, and now it's up to you to get him out of the mess. Aw, Anne, is this the guy you held up to me as so respectable, so straight and clean?" He laughed shortly, and: "An embezzler, huh?" he added.

"Bert," Anne pleaded, "I've come for your help, because you're the only person I know whom I can ask. I want you to lend me the money, so that Joe can make good his losses to the firm before the books are audited—on the thirtieth. It's an awful lot of money, but Joe will pay you back somehow. Could you manage—oh, Bert, could you lend us—thirty thousand dollars?"

"Thirty thousand?" Bert reiterated. "Why, Anne, I haven't got it. I haven't turned a trick since you left. I'm just living on my capital, and that don't amount to much now."

Anne looked at him with mingled bewilderment and despair.

"Why, I—I didn't know, Bert," she managed to say. "I thought you were still in the racket."

"No," he told her, shaking his head, "I quit when you did. I figured you were right, Anne—about livin' straight."

There was a moment's silence, and he watched her closely, pityingly. He could see that she was beside herself with grief, and his one desire just now was to help her—at any cost.

"Anne," he said, "how did Joe Reynolds get this money?"

"He took negotiable bonds from the vault," she answered. "He has his own key, and knows the combination of the safe. He's trusted at Werder and Lawrence's—his firm. He's been with them for years."

"I see," Bert mused. "Well, listen, Anne, tell Joe he can expect a visit from me in the morning, and have him take me to his own private office when I get there."

"What do you mean to do?" Anne asked him feverishly; but Bert evaded the question.

"Never mind," he said, "but everything's going to be all right. Just tell him to expect me."

He was true to his promise, and at ten o'clock on the following morning was shown into Joe Reynolds' office. It was his first encounter with Anne's choice of a husband, and, summing him up, Bert put him down as a tall, handsome young fellow of good family but poor principles. He had the charm of breeding, but his mouth betrayed weakness of character and lack of nerve, and there was something shifty about his eyes.

Bert broached the subject of the missing bonds immediately they were alone, and, in faltering tones, Reynolds told him the whole story.

"So you see," he finished, "I didn't intend to steal the money. I meant to return it. It's the—the sort of thing that could happen—to anybody."

"Sure," Bert agreed, with a mirthless smile; "it's happened to a lotta guys. They're up in Sing Sing now."

Reynolds moistened his lips. "Anne said you could help me," he muttered. "I—I'll pay you back. You won't lose anything."

"I can't lose anything, because I haven't got anything," Bert retorted. "Listen, is there any more dough in that safe?"

"Yes," Reynolds answered, fidgeting in his chair. "At least, there are bonds. Why?"

"Just get a load of this," Bert said slowly. "If this place should happen to be robbed—to-night, for instance—and the rest of the securities stolen, they would never know that your thirty thousand hadn't been taken with the rest."

The eyes of Reynolds gleamed hopefully.

"Why, no, they wouldn't," he agreed. "But—that's robbery."

Bert wanted to laugh, and the sneer that came to his lips betrayed his contempt for Reynolds. The latter appeared embarrassed for a moment, and then:

"There's probably forty thousand dollars' worth of bonds in the safe now," he said.

"Any negotiable?" Bert asked; and, as Reynolds made a negative movement with his head: "No, of course there aren't. If there had been, you'd have grabbed those, too."

"Look here," cried Reynolds, with an attempt at indignation, "you can't talk that way to—"

"Shut up and listen to me," Bert rapped out. "Give me the key to this place and the combination of the safe. Take Anne out to-night, and be sure you're seen by a lot of people you know, in case you need an alibi. Tomorrow morning they'll find the place robbed and the safe hanging open. They'll pick up forty thousand dollars' worth of unnegotiable bonds lying in the alley, and they'll figure that the thieves strewed them there, keeping only the stuff they could dispose of."

Reynolds reached across to grip him by the hands.

"That's great," he babbled; "that's great! Gee, I don't know how to thank you—"

"Say, I'm not doing it for you," Bert flung at him. "I'm doing it for Anne, you sap. Give me the keys!"

Reynolds obeyed meekly, and then passed over a pencil and a scrap of paper.

"You can write down the combination of the safe," he said. "Left—nine-seven; right—two-three—"

[The End of the Road.]

IT was in the dead of night that Bert Harris made his way to the offices of Werder & Lawrence, and, with the aid of the key that Reynolds had given him, he had no difficulty in gaining admittance to the premises.

A flash-light in his hand, he made his way through the rooms to Reynolds' sanctum, and the beam of the torch wandered over the office till it came to rest on the door of the safe. Bert advanced stealthily and gripped the dial of the combination-lock between his fingers.

"Left—nine-seven," he murmured, spinning the disc as he uttered the words of the formula. "Right—two-three."

The door of the safe swung open, and, searching the interior, Bert gathered up the bonds. He stuffed them into his pocket and closed the safe again, and he was in the act of turning to retrace his steps through the premises when he heard a footfall.

He darted to the door of Reynolds' sanctum and instinctively swung the beam of the electric torch across the outer office. It settled on the figures of two police officers, and with an exclamation Bert dropped the flash-lamp and ran.

"Hold him!" yelled a voice. In the darkness a hand clutched Bert's arm. He struggled, and hit out blindly, and he felt his fist drive home against a

(Continued on page 28.)

An innocent girl accused of murder and how the electric chair was cheated of a victim.
A gripping detective story.

Heiress No Longer!

CHARLES BACON, a retired stockbroker of considerable means, like many who are blessed with vast possessions, imagined that his wealth gave him the right to interfere with the lives and the happiness of those who harboured "expectations." Self-willed, irascible, there was nevertheless a warm corner in his withered old heart for his niece, Olive Thayer.

With neither father nor mother, the girl had blossomed from childhood to womanhood in her uncle's home, regarded by all and sundry as his heiress. She ministered to his comforts, pandered to his whims, smoothed the evening of his days with those evidences of real affection that money cannot always buy.

On his part, old Bacon, almost a stranger to the meaning of love, had watched the growth of little Olive; had permitted himself to weave romances around her future and, unknown to the girl, had cast around for some fine, upstanding young fellow who might be a fitting life partner for one whom he loved with a fatherly affection.

"Well, uncle," she had playfully remarked on more than one occasion, "has Prince Charming been discovered yet? I'm getting older, you know. Time's passing, and still he hasn't come."

"Don't worry, Olive," he would reply gently, "it's only a matter of time, and I promise that the young fellow who's lucky enough to win you will not only wed the nicest girl in the State of New York, but, when I'm gone, there's a fortune for both of you."

"Who's talking of dying, uncle? Why, there's years and years of life in front of you. Besides—" And here the girl hesitated, a blush suffusing her lovely face.

"Besides what?" inquired her uncle sharply, detecting a note of sentiment in her voice.

"Why, nothing," was Olive's reply.

But Charles Bacon, suspicious of everybody, persisted.

"Now, Olive, there must be no secrets between us. What's behind this eloquent 'but'?"

"Nothing, really," she said, and tried to change the conversation.

Her uncle, with a stubbornness that had earned for him the sobriquet of "Stonewall" Bacon, would not be put off with evasions.

"Well, uncle, if you must know, I'm rather fond of David Landen!"

"You mean you're in love with that fellow? You've decided to throw away your young life on a man whom you know I detest? How could you do it?" His voice was now shrill and embittered as he remonstrated with his niece because of her defection. "Anyone but Landen I would not have objected to. I dislike the fellow utterly!"

"But, uncle, there's nothing wrong with David. It's just that you've taken a strange dislike to him. He admires you tremendously."

"Admires me! He's probably a greater admiration for my bankbook than he has for you or for me!" snorted the old man.

"Oh, uncle, how can you say such terribly unjust things?" The colour mantled her cheeks as she championed the man she loved.

"They're true, I tell you! But, like many another girl who imagines herself to be in love, you choose to be blinded by this young fellow's good looks. He's not in love with you, he's in love with my money, and you know it!" he growled fiercely.

Olive was weeping softly, aghast at the change in a man who had always been the soul of gentleness, one from whom she had never hitherto heard a harsh, an unjust word. It seemed that her little world was tumbling to pieces. No, there was always her David, whose love and loyalty she never for an instant doubted.

The girl rose and faced her uncle proudly.

"I am not asking for your consent, uncle, for, after all, I am of age. But I wish with all my heart that you could have been kinder."

"Kinder? Here have I been devoting my life to you, treating you, caring for you as one of my own, regarding you as my heiress. And now in a matter which affects your whole life you do this thing without consulting me. Listen!" Her uncle held up a detaining hand. "I have no alternative but to make a further will. Instead of leaving practically all I possess to you, as I intended, you will have just one-third of my estate, and that on one condition: that you break entirely with David Landen."

Olive Thayer left her uncle's presence, her head in a whirl, determined, in spite of his bitter opposition, in spite of his threat, to remain true to her troth.

This bitter passage of arms between uncle and niece had been observed by two individuals. The evidence of one was destined later to bear considerable weight when eventually the case came up for trial. The other, unseen, noted with evident satisfaction old Bacon's displeasure. From his point of vantage behind the tall bushes he had seen and heard everything, and although it had been his intention to call upon the agitated old gentleman, he deemed it advisable to postpone his visit to a more propitious occasion.

"Tis an ill wind," he mused as stealthily he made his way again to the main road and pondered upon the serious nature of the break between this hitherto inseparable pair.

A day later Charles Bacon called for his lawyer, John Brigham, and in the presence of his niece instructed Brigham to draw up a fresh will dispossessing her entirely.

"You persist in keeping company with young Landen, and I persist in my determination that neither of you shall have a cent of my money!" he said.

In a half-hearted manner, seemingly diffident at influencing his client against his wishes, the lawyer suggested that the new will erred on the side of undue severity. The suggestion merely goaded Bacon to a fresh outburst of anger.

"Whose money am I disposing of?" he queried tartly. "Rather than see my niece throw herself away on a worthless scamp—"

"You know in your own heart that David's no worthless scamp," the girl interposed.

"Rather than that," continued the girl's uncle, ignoring the interruption, "you'll find you've made the worst bargain in your life."

With eyes discreetly bent, his pen scratching hastily across the paper, John Brigham noted his client's further directions for disposing of his riches.

"The draft will be ready in a day or so," he promised.

"The sooner the better!" was Bacon's reply.

When the lawyer had left, uncle and niece were still arguing, the girl attempting to bring him to a reasonable frame of mind, the uncle adamant in his decision to punish this determined attempt to run counter to his wishes.

Bacon, trembling with anger and excitement, was seen by the butler to make his way from the house into the gardens of his estate. A moment later the report of a pistol was heard, and Bacon lay prone on the lawn, evidently at the point of death. The staff rushed to the spot, and his last words to agitated inquiries were:

"A shot was fired at me from that bush, and—"

But the sentence was destined never to be completed.

In spite of her tears and protestations, Olive Thayer was apprehended on the capital charge, to the amazement of her fiancé and the incredulity of the neighbours.

The Trial.

OPINION was equally divided. There were some who persisted that, having everything to gain by the immediate death of her uncle, hers was a deed that had a definite object. There were others who, regarding the lovely, slim figure of Olive Thayer, as she faced the district attorney's terrific verbal bombardment, considered her incapable of the deed that American justice attempted to lay at her door.

Tearfully she protested her innocence, emphatically assured her tormentors that she had loved her uncle far too dearly even to dream of taking his life; and that, so far as his wealth was concerned, money, in her view, did not always represent happiness.

The district attorney declined to be impressed by Olive Thayer's impassioned denials, and the members of the jury, swayed by the pitiless logic of the lawyer, seemed rapidly to be veering round to the opinion that, although her explanations were plausible, the weight of evidence was against the girl. Her glove, for instance—how did it happen to be covering the gun that had prematurely ended Mr. Bacon's career? Olive Thayer, explained the prosecuting counsel, was not on the spot at the time, but a hundred yards away from where the police discovered the pistol, a weapon that belonged to Mr. Bacon, and one which was readily accessible to the accused.

"What is particularly noteworthy," persisted the attorney, leaving the accused girl to come over to address the jury, "is that the pistol was found to have been soaked in oil. But not a single finger-print was discovered! Why? Because the hand that fired the weapon wore a glove. That glove bore marks of oil. A woman's glove! We will prove that that glove belonged to Olive Thayer, who now stands her trial for the murder of her uncle."

There was an evident rustle in the court as the relentless voice of the attorney made these accusations.

Now John Brigham, Bacon's attorney, and, by a coincidence, defending counsel for Olive Thayer, questioned the girl. He seemed trembling with excitement, like a man who has just emerged from an ordeal. His question is notable because of its surprising brevity:

"Do you know, Miss Thayer, who fired the shot that killed your uncle?"

"No," came the firm answer.

Landen regarded the defending counsel with amazement. Did he really imagine that this trivial question was going to help his client? Surely, in the time at his disposal, he could have introduced a string of relevant questions that would have proved Olive's innocence beyond the shadow of a doubt!

But no! Here was Brigham, wiping the perspiration from his brow, sinking with relief into his chair, as if he had emerged from a gruelling examination.

He was deathly pale; his hand trembled as he sipped a glass of water.

The brevity of Brigham's examination was not lost upon the public, who nudged each other, as if to suggest that the defending counsel knew more than he dared disclose. As events were soon to prove, this was so!

Meantime, Olive Thayer braced herself for further questioning, as the prosecuting attorney now interposed:

"Did you and your uncle have an argument on the morning that he was killed?"

"We did."

"Is it not a fact that your uncle was angered because you absolutely defied him—disregarded his wishes in regard to David Landen?"

"That is so. I considered that I was old enough to exercise my own discretion in a matter affecting my future happiness."

"Did you ever see this pistol before?"

"I don't know. I've seen one like it."

"Did you ever use the one you saw like it?"

"No. Mr. Landen used it two or three different times, shooting at a target."

"Wasn't he instructing you how to use it?"

"No."

"Isn't it true that you had in mind the idea of shooting your uncle?"

"No."

"Did you know of three different wills your uncle made?"

"Yes; my uncle told me about each one of them, but he never signed the last will—in fact, it was never drawn up."

"What do you know about the contents of the different wills?"

"In the first one he left me everything. In the second one he left me one-third of his estate, fifty thousand dollars to his lawyer, Mr. Brigham, ten thousand to his butler, and the rest to some religious cult that he had become deeply interested in."

"How about the last one—the one that was never drawn up?"

"He intended leaving everything to the religious cult."

"This is your property?" he snapped, holding up a white glove.

"Yes—it's mine," she replied in hesitant tones.

"There!" said the prosecuting attorney in triumph. "Could anything be more circumstantial?"

Circumstantial! Yes. But, averred the prosecution, never had there been a case in that court wherein the motive was so clearly defined. Never a case in which the weight of evidence moved so strongly in the defendant's disfavour.

"Rubbish!" murmured a pale-faced young fellow in the body of the court, whereat the usher, with a threatening movement, approached him—then evidently decided to let the interruption pass. It was easy to understand the young man's agitation; easy to appreciate the mental tourmole through which he must be passing. Here was the sweetheart of the weary-faced girl in the dock,

"We will prove that that glove belonged to Olive Thayer, who now stands her trial for the murder of her uncle!"

December 12th, 1931.

convinced entirely of her innocence, forced to listen to that pitiless brow-beating of the girl for whom he would willingly yield up his life; compelled to witness the slow building up of a case that seemed to become blacker with every moment.

David Landen, shrewd fellow that he was, needed but half an eye to realise that the dead man had but little affection for him. Nor was it possible to mistake the veiled hostility with which his visits to the girl had been received by her uncle.

But that the girl had deliberately destroyed her one benefactor in the world was unthinkable.

"Tell me," David said to her at the conclusion of the first day of the trial. "The quarrel between you and your uncle was just because he objected to me?"

"It was. Uncle told me once again that he objected to our keeping company. I replied that I had the right to happiness, the right to choose my friends. He answered that he agreed that I had that right, but his objection was to you. I asked him why. He simply answered that he didn't like you, and that if I persisted in our friendship, he'd alter his will."

"Nothing more?" asked the boy.

"Not a thing," the girl answered. "He just stalked out into the garden in high dudgeon, and—and the rest you know."

"He never liked me, Olive," the lad explained. "It was not so much that he objected to me personally, as because he associated me with another member of my family who got the better of him in a business deal long ago. That much I learned when first we met. And he never forgave me—for the name reawakened memories of the one occasion when he really met his Waterloo. He was a bitter later. Sometimes I think that, for your sake, it is a pity we ever met. Sometimes—"

"We can't fight against destiny," the girl replied quietly and sincerely.

"Maybe we can't fight against destiny," the lad answered. "But we can fight against what they call circumstantial evidence, as you'll realise very soon. As soon as I heard of your arrest on this monstrous charge I got in touch with the only man who'll really ferret out the truth. I've put Detective Thompson on the job. He's a retired Secret Service man, and though there's been precious little time for him to do anything of practical value, I've hopes—big hopes. Maybe to-morrow, my dear, we shall be hearing good news."

"Maybe," replied the girl cryptically. "Whatever happens, you're a dear."

The second day of the trial, by reason of the interest aroused by the report of the first day's proceedings, attracted a packed court. The jury, alert, important, and appreciating the dramatic nature of the case, were anticipating further interesting disclosures. They were destined not to be disappointed.

The prosecuting attorney went straight to the point.

"Do you still insist that you've never handled a gun in your life?" he asked Olive Thayer. "Now think well before you reply."

"Maybe I have," the girl answered slowly. "A few years ago, when there was a fair in the town, I remember having used one at a shooting-gallery, just out of fun."

"And never since?"

"Never. There was no reason."

"Do you keep a revolver in your bedroom?"

The court was tense with expectancy as the lawyer introduced this unlooked-for query.

"That is so."

"And for what reason, assuming, as you say, that you have never handled real firearms?"

"Just for appearance sake. There have been robberies in the neighbourhood in the past. I should be afraid to hold it if it were loaded."

"So you say," replied the attorney mysteriously.

At this stage of the proceedings a messenger came up to the district attorney, whose cross-examination was thereby interrupted. Would he see Detective Thompson, who had been engaged by Mr. Landen to investigate the mystery?

With a whispered consultation to the judge, who signified an apparently unwilling approval, counsel made his way to the ante-room.

"Morning, Thompson," said the district attorney cheerfully. "What can I do for you?"

The detective explained in a few words the object of his visit.

"I've a string of important witnesses here—only rounded them up at the last minute—and if you can possibly get an adjournment of the case for about an hour, it should be worth your while."

The presiding judge, protesting at this flouting of routine, at length agreed, the court adjourned, and Detective Thompson did some rapid work, not the least important of which was his ability to convince the district attorney that Olive Thayer was incapable of the crime, and that she should be at once discharged.

The court reassembling, the district attorney at once arose, and question and answer filled the court with increasing amazement.

"Your honour," explained the district attorney to the judge, "I ask for the acquittal of the defendant, as I am convinced that she is innocent."

"Well, I am not convinced! Enough evidence has been introduced here for the jury to decide that," returned the judge crisply.

"Your honour, when I asked for an adjournment it was for this reason—to interrogate certain witnesses that a special investigator has produced."

"I thought you were the prosecuting attorney," remarked his Honour sarcastically, "but you seem now to be the counsel for the defendant. Anyhow, continue."

"The guilty party called at Bacon's residence," went on the attorney quietly, "and while Charles Bacon was absent from the room for a short time, that party took the pistol and glove—the glove was put around the pistol to cover up possible finger-prints."

"Are these witnesses in court that you examined?" queried the judge, gazing round the court-room.

"Yes, do you wish to examine them?"

"No—continue."

"The guilty person was hard pressed for money—he had passed several worthless cheques—this person's only salvation seemed to be to procure the money willed to him by Charles Bacon. One witness saw this individual fleeing from the Bacon estate at the time the crime was committed—"

"This is your property?" he snapped, holding up a white glove.

"What I don't understand," interrupted the judge, "is why the defendant's lawyer didn't procure these witnesses instead of you."

"Your honour—there is a very good reason indeed why he failed to do so—the guilty party stands there before you!" thundered the district attorney, pointing a stern finger at the defending counsel.

"John Brigham!" gasped the judge.

"Yes, your honour," Olive Thayer's attorney, and Charles Bacon's attorney and executor."

"Do I understand that he has confessed?"

"We confronted him with an array of witnesses connecting every link," said the D.A. quietly. "He stoutly denied everything until Detective Thompson flashed a lodge badge before him, and then he asked him to explain how that happened to be in the bush from where the shot was fired. He then broke down and confessed."

"How did this investigator know that it was his lodge badge?"

"Brigham's name was on the back of it."

Like a man in a dream, John Brigham arose to face his accusers, his face pale, his body shaking like an aspen.

"You honour—" he said.

But the judge motioned the trembling man to be seated.

"You will have an opportunity, very shortly, of denying this charge, if it can be denied. Meantime—"

"This is a trick!" yelled Brigham. "A frame-up unworthy of American justice! If it takes every cent of my fortune I will get justice done. I have not confessed! If it takes ten years—"

"Silence!" thundered the judge. "You of all men should have some respect for the dignity of the law."

Thereupon the judge motioned to two burly warders, who led the lawyer, protesting, to the cells below. Came a muffled shout, the sounds of a struggle, a hysterical shriek as of one who has been foiled of his purpose.

Hardly had the door of the cell been closed upon him than the unhappy man was seen to place his hand furtively in his hip-pocket. The door was unlocked with lightning rapidity, and a strong hand wrested a small but serviceable revolver with which John Brigham had intended to cheat the law.

A happy trio met outside the court at the conclusion of the case—Olive, Landen and Detective Thompson.

"What puzzles me, Thompson," said the girl's fiancé, "is this: How did you manage to find that lodge pin? Was it discovered near the bush from where the shot was fired?"

"Not at all," was Thompson's reply. "That lodge pin wasn't in any bush. You see," he whispered, "I found it in Brigham's apartment last night in a bureau drawer, and I happened to know that Brigham usually carried the badge—he was a pompous man, who liked to boast about his work in the lodge. I was certain that it would make him confess. And it did!"

The trio moved happily away, their progress impeded by handshakes innumerable. From the shadow of death into the sunlight of happiness. Free as the air—and supremely happy—David and his loved one plighted their troth anew.

(By permission of the Ideal Film Co., Ltd.)

December 12th, 1931.

Our Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

"THE MAN AT 6."

(Continued from page 10.)

shot, and also to find you. He may come here, but I don't think he'll get Wolmer."

"How do you know it was Wolmer who fired?" asked Sybil.

"I don't know." Frank looked in a puzzled way at the girl. "I thought it might have been, that's all. Have you seen him again? I didn't mention him to Dawford, of course."

"I haven't seen him," replied Sybil. "Tell me how you got here."

"Mr. Atkinson began to implore the sergeant to let him go home to his wife. Hogan seemed to think that extremely suspicious, and then the little man made a sudden bolt for it. He got as far as the door, and he may have got away. I didn't stop to see. I took my chance, found the secret door without much trouble, and here I am."

"Come and look at these bags, Mr. Pine," said Sybil. She endeavoured to open one, but found that it was locked. Producing a bunch of keys, she tried one after the other, and at length found one that fitted. A second later the bag was open, and Frank gasped as he saw the contents.

In the bag were the missing chessmen.

"How did they come here?" cried the young man. "Thank Heaven you've found them! My father's saved!"

"These bags were left here by the thief, who was to have come at six o'clock this evening to take them away," replied Sybil calmly.

"How did you know that?" Frank stared in bewilderment at the girl's words. "And who is the thief? George Wolmer?"

"I am not quite sure," said the girl, "but I think we shall soon see the thief—here."

Frank glanced round the garage anxiously, and then spoke in haste.

"Let's go back to the hall at once and hand over the chessmen to the inspector."

"Yes," replied Sybil. "I wonder what's in the other bag," she added, as they moved towards the door of the passage.

"We'll see presently. Why, surely I left that door open!" Frank gazed in surprise at the door, which was shut. He tried to open it, but in vain, and he turned to Sybil in dismay.

"Someone has been here," he whispered in alarm. "Try the other door."

But the outside door was locked, too.

There was a faint sound behind them as they stared in dismay at the locked door, and they turned sharply to look. Even as they did so the outer door of the garage opened, and someone came in. Sybil and Frank swung round again to face a man wearing a mask over his eyes, and they gave back several paces. To their surprise, however, the newcomer's glance went beyond them, and they followed his gaze, to see another man just rising to his feet from behind the large motor-car.

Silence for a moment. Then the man by the car spoke, briefly but to the point.

"Drop those bags, kid! Up with your hands, all of you!"

The command was obeyed, for the man who spoke had produced a re-

(Continued on page 26.)

Follow a two-fisted sea-captain, and the beautiful daughter of a brave explorer as they sail on a perilous trip to a forgotten cannibal island, where they defy storm, fire and water, man and beast on a search for a fortune in radium! Starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Browne.

DANGER ISLAND

READ THIS FIRST.

In search of pitchblende deposits containing immense quantities of precious radium, Professor Adams and his companions are beset by savages on a volcanic island off the African coast, and Adams escapes with one surviving follower, Cebu, his giant negro guide.

In America his daughter Bonnie and her uncle, Dr. Anthony Adams, have become alarmed at his failure to communicate with them. Ben Arnold, an adventurer professing friendship, offers to fit out a relief expedition.

His ship, the Lottie Carson, sets sail under the command of Harry Drake, a young Englishman, and for companion Bonnie engages Arlene Chandos, who is in league with Arnold.

Professor Adams and Cebu are picked up by the Lottie Carson off the coast of Africa. The professor is dying, but before passing away he gives Bonnie a chart and charges her to secure the radium for the benefit of humanity.

Arnold secures the chart, and before it is returned to Bonnie it is cunningly "doctored" by Bull Black, the rascally mate, after an exact tracing of the original has been made.

A hurricane breaks, and Cebu and Doctor Anthony are washed overboard. Then Harry sees Bonnie on the storm-lashed deck, and reaches her even as a cataract of sea-water hurls them off their feet.

But all at once he was aware of a terrific impact that left him bruised and shaken, and as he lay in the foaming wash he realized that he had been flung against the bulwark and was safe.

He had kept a firm hold of Bonnie, and his first concern as he struggled to his feet was for her. She showed no signs of life, but it was he who had borne the brunt of the shock, and he speedily discovered that she had only fainted.

He raised her from the deck and was wading towards the after-part of the ship with her when the figure of Briney showed up in the tumultuous gloom. The hulking young sailor raised his voice and yelled an anxious question.

"What happened, sir?" he demanded. "Almost washed overboard," Harry answered laconically. "Have the ship pulled up in the wind while I take Miss Adams aft, Briney."

"Aye, aye, sir," Briney rejoined, and promptly roared a command at a huddled group of seamen near by.

"Put over your sea anchor," Harry heard him shout, and then slithered on with Bonnie and bore her to her state-room.

He was laying her on a cot when she came round and opened her eyes. For a moment she stared at him vacantly, and then she remembered the tragic incident that had occurred just before she had fainted.

"Oh, Harry," she moaned, "it's terrible. Poor Uncle Anthony! I saw him with my own eyes—carried into the sea!"

Harry did his best to console her, but by the time that she had managed to overcome her grief the hurricane was on the wane.

"Thank heaven that you're safe, at least," the Englishman told her. "And the worst of the gale is over. Take it easy and rest here a while, Miss Bonnie."

Meanwhile, in an adjoining cabin, Ben Arnold, Bull Black and Arlene Chandos were watching a barometer fixedly, Arlene with an expression of dull agitation on her pallid face.

"What does the glass say now?" she breathed.

"It's on the rise," said Bull. "These tropical storms go as quickly as they come. It looks as though Drake has weathered it."

Arlene looked at him bitterly.

"Half an hour ago you were trying to tell us he didn't know how to run this tub," she said. "But if it hadn't been for Captain Drake's good seamanship we'd all have been at the bottom of the South Atlantic."

"Aw, why don't you get seasick," Ben Arnold put in angrily. "I'm tired of hearing you grouse."

Arlene had neither cause for grumbling nor sea-sickness during the remainder of the voyage to Twamballa, but when she stepped on to the quay with Bonnie Adams and Ben Arnold she felt heartily thankful for the

December 12th, 1931.

Now Read On.

At Twamballa.

AS the cataract of water swept them across the deck, Harry believed that nothing could save him and the girl in his arms from being carried overboard to a watery grave.

EPISODE 3.

"DEMONS OF THE POOL."

opportunity of setting foot on firm ground.

The tropical African port was a squalid city with a population culled from the gutters of civilisation and the savage heart of the Dark Continent. Here one saw the robed Arab, the swaggering white man, the insolent half-breed, the primitive negro, and here one heard a thousand tongues that were reminiscent of Babel's ancient Tower.

"Well, girls," Arnold said to his two companions, "it will take a day or so to fix up the damage done to the Lottie Carson by the storm. As a matter of fact, Captain Black is ashore now seeing about repairs and getting a new crew."

"Captain Black!" exclaimed Bonnie in surprise. "Why, where is Captain Drake?"

Ben Arnold frowned.

"It was understood that he was to be discharged," he began, but Bonnie cut in on him.

"Ben, I think you're making a big mistake," she protested. "You said yourself before we left America that Captain Drake was an excellent seaman."

"He refused to obey my orders," Arnold retorted. "And very nearly wrecked my ship in the hurricane."

"That's not true, Ben," Bonnie argued. "It wasn't Captain Drake's fault that we ran into the storm, and any man in the crew will tell you that if it hadn't been for the way he handled the Lottie Carson we'd never have weathered it."

Arlene spoke, hoping to change the subject. At the same time she glanced rather disdainfully at a group of native peddlars who were crying their wares close by.

"We'd better go and find a hotel," she suggested, "if there is such a thing in this place."

"Oh, I'm sure we can find accommodation of some kind," Arnold declared; "and both you girls will feel all the better for a rest."

They walked on, and were soon lost to view amidst the crowd that thronged the waterfront. Shortly after they had disappeared four seamen came down the gangway of the Lottie Carson, and might have been recognised as Briney and those members of the crew who had remained loyal to Harry Drake when Bull Black had attempted mutiny.

Briney sang the eternal song that had earned him his nickname, and his croaking voice was echoing through Twamballa's narrow streets when one of his companions drew his attention to a caravan of Arab camels that had entered the town.

"Look, Briney," the sailor ejaculated, as he pointed to the animals. "Our brother-ships of the desert."

"They ain't no brothers of mine," Briney guffawed. "They go eight days without a drink, an' my limit is eight hours. Come on, fellers, let's look for some place to liquor up."

They strode on, and so came to a den that looked passably inviting, a place of haunting native music and half-caste dancing girls.

It was the only hotel and café of any size in Twamballa, and for infamous notoriety was probably unrivalled by any other dive known to humanity. But because they had no choice of destination, Briney and his shipmates passed through its portals.

It was partly for this same reason that Arnold had singled it out, on Bull Black's sinister recommendation, as a resting place for Bonnie Adams. But he had had yet another motive in mind when he had decided to make his quarters there, a motive that was as dastardly as any a man had ever conceived.

The Bribe.

THE riff-raff of the Seven Seas congregated in Lascara's dive, and found fit company in the scum who were permanently domiciled in Twamballa.

Lascara himself leaned against one end of the long zinc bar where drinks were served, a sleek, swarthy Portuguese, with lank black hair and a face on which vice and cruelty were stamped indelibly.

His activities were many, and invariably they were concerned with criminal enterprise. A power in Twamballa's underworld, he had but to utter a single word of command and a dozen ruffians in his pay would have detached themselves from the mob that frequented his saloon. Grim were the stories told of men who had come under the shadow of his displeasure, to vanish for all time and pass utterly from the ken of the world.

It was with this villainous individual that Bull Black associated himself shortly after the arrival of Arnold and the girls, and the two were deep in conversation when Briney and his companions entered.

Black glared at the seamen, and watched Briney truculently as the latter fell in with a dancing girl and walked her over to the bar to stand her some refreshment.

"Here's some o' this feller Drake's pals," Bull told Lascara in an undertone, "but I reckon that needn't worry you any, eh?"

"No," Lascara answered in broken English, favouring Bull with a crafty smile; "my men handle them too eef they start any trouble. But thees man Drake—what does he look like?"

He had hardly put the question when the subject of their conversation entered the saloon, and an ugly glitter appeared in Bull Black's eyes.

"There he is now," he said as Harry sat down at a table. "Look! The guy that just came in."

Briney was fighting like a titan in the hope of rescuing his skipper from a ghastly fate deep down in that well of death.

Lascara riveted his gaze on the young Englishman, and his face was a study in malevolence.

"Well," Bull muttered, "can it be done?"

Lascara gave a leer.

"In Twamballa," he said softly, "anything can be done—ceef there is enough money."

"There'll be plenty o' money," Bull assured him. "I'll go an' have a talk with the man I'm workin' for, an' we'll see yuh later."

He left Lascara and made his way to a flight of stairs that led to the floor above. Ascending, he knocked at the door of one of the upper rooms, and was at once given permission to enter.

Bonnie, Arlene, and Ben Arnold were in the room, and Bull exchanged a meaning glance with the owner of the Lottie Carson.

"I'd like to speak with you a moment, Mr. Arnold," he said.

"All right, Bull," Arnold replied; and then, turning to Bonnie: "I'd advise you to turn in, my dear," he observed. "We've all had a pretty rough time, and a rest will do you good."

"I think you're right, Ben," Bonnie agreed, and, leaving her with Arlene, Arnold accompanied Bull out into the corridor.

"Well," he said when they were alone, "did you fix it?"

"I sure did," Bull answered. "I just had a talk with that feller Lascara downstairs."

"Yes?" Arnold rejoined eagerly. "What did he say?"

"He said he could fix anything," Bull told him, "if there was enough money in it."

Arnold pursed his lips.

"I'll attend to that," he declared. "Listen, Bull!

Drake's got to be put out of the way at any cost! I won't be easy in my mind while he's hanging around. He's gained Bonnie's confidence, and we know that he's kind of wise to us—"

He paused, for the door of the bed-room opened at that moment. Arlene emerged and looked at them keenly.

"How would it be if you let me in on this secret?" she suggested, in a low voice. "I'd like to know just how we all stand. Are you sending Captain Drake home?"

"I'll take care of him," Arnold returned. "All you've got to worry about is this—don't on any account let Bonnie go downstairs. Tell her it's dangerous. You understand?"

"I take you, Ben," Arlene murmured, and with that Arnold and Bull Black made their way to the saloon.

They joined Lascara at the end of the zine bar, where Bull introduced Arnold and then, speaking in guarded tones, brought up the subject of Harry Drake again.

Lascara laid a lean, swarthy hand on his arm.

"One moment!" he said avariciously. "I do thees job for you—verree good. But who pays?"

"I do," put in Ben Arnold. "Here's part of the cash in advance."

And from a wallet he drew out a sheaf of notes, which he handed to the Portuguese.

Lascara moistened his lips as he saw the money, and, taking the bills, he swiftly pocketed them.

"All right," he told Arnold. "You no' worry about Drake any more."

Arnold leaned towards him a trifle anxiously.

"Say, you're sure you can handle this affair, Lascara?" he muttered. "We can't afford to bungle."

"Don't worry," Bull interrupted. "I know Lascara, an' he won't make mistakes. Anyway, you an' me are clear of trouble, no matter what happens."

Lascara drew away and began to walk across the saloon, threading his way between the tables. He chanced to approach the one at which Harry Drake was sitting, and noticed that he had been joined by Briney's shipmates, Collins, Burke, and Connor.

Lascara paused for a moment within earshot.

"You know, captain," he heard Collins say, "Bull fired us for stiekin' with you in that fight he an' his swabs started. Of course, I was at the helm, and didn't join in the shindy, but he knew I'd have been on your side if I could've left the wheelhouse, so him and Arnold paid me off as well."

"So we're anchored here until another ship docks," Burke put in. "An' we thought we'd look up this joint to pass some o' the time away."

"I'm here for the same reason," Harry stated. "And don't you boys get down-hearted. I haven't forgotten the way you stood by me, and I'll do my best to see you get a passage home. But listen! Keep your eyes open in the meantime, and steer clear of any rumpus. We're in the toughest port on the coast, and this is about the toughest joint in creation."

Lascara heard so much and then passed on. He stopped at a table where two murderous-looking ruffians were seated and whispered something to them, at the same time indicating Harry Drake with a sly movement of his head.

Boys! Build anything you want

A different model every day!

There is no limit to the number of models you can build with Meccano—you can have a different model every day of the year if you wish!

A Meccano Outfit will give you endless enjoyment and hundreds of thrills! All the time you are building and inventing models you will be learning the secrets of engineering—knowledge that will be invaluable to you when you grow older.

The models you build with Meccano are real engineering models in miniature, because they are built with real engineering parts—Nuts and Bolts, Girders, Plates, Gear Wheels, Pinions, Cranks and scores of others. These parts can be used over and over again to make hundreds of different models.

If you already possess a Meccano Outfit, buy more parts so that you may build bigger and better models.

Be sure you get Meccano this Christmas!

PRICES OF MECCANO OUTFITS FROM 2/6 TO 45/0-

£500 IN PRIZES

Ask your Meccano dealer for an entry form and full particulars of our grand £500 Model Building Competition.

The new Meccano Aeroplane Constructor Outfits enable boys to build their own model aeroplanes. Ask your dealer to show them to you.

Send for this free book to-day

Write to-day for this fine new book. It contains a number of thrilling articles, profusely illustrated, describing many famous engineering feats. In addition, the full range of Meccano Outfits is shown, and there are illustrations of many wonderful Meccano models.

We will send you a copy, post free, in return for the names and addresses of three of your chums. Write your own name and address clearly, and add No. 11 for reference.

MECCANO

MECCANO LIMITED (DEPT 11), OLD SWAN, LIVERPOOL

The men nodded, and Lascara strolled to another table, occupied by four more of his minions. In all he must have spoken to over a dozen rascally hirelings, after which he stepped to the middle of the spacious room, where a dark-eyed half-caste dancing-girl was swaying to the barbaric strains of a native melody.

He gripped her by the wrist, and, with a cringing movement, the girl ceased dancing. Obeying Lascara's sign to follow him, she slipped after the scoundrel as he led the way to an alcove at the far side of the saloon.

"Pelula," he said, when he was certain no one was within hearing, "there ees something I want you to do. You see white man over there—ship's captain, huh? Well, you go and sit with him."

The girl Pelula gave him a hunted look. "And—what do I do then?" she faltered.

"That's all," was the curt rejoinder. "I do the rest, my little Pelula."

"You make tro'ble for heem!" the girl said, with a swift intake of breath. "Always you say Pelula be nice when you want to make tro'ble for some man. Lascara, I no' like—"

His hand clenched on her arm before she could finish the impassioned protest, and the fierceness of his grasp bruised her flesh so that she uttered a little moan of pain.

"You do as I tell you!" he ground out. "You sarvee—yes?"

"I—I do what you tell me," she answered piteously, almost sinking to her knees.

He dragged her up with a savage gesture.

"Well," he snarled, "you make no meastake, or—you know what happen to you—" An evil smile played around his thin-lipped mouth, and: "There are hungry ones in the pool behind the saloon," he added mysteriously.

The words had an instantaneous effect on the girl, for she covered in abject terror.

"You no' take me to pool, Lascara!" she sobbed. "You no' take me there—"

"Quiet!" he interrupted viciously. "Madre de dios! you go to white man this fashion, and I will kill you. Laugh—you understand? You are happy, so you laugh and be gay—you understand?"

"I—understand, Lascara," the girl managed to say.

A Shock for Briney.

BRINEY was standing at the bar when he saw Harry Drake, and as he caught the Englishman's eye he saluted him cheerfully, then turned again to the girl whose acquaintance he had made.

The drinks served at Lascara's were none too palatable in Briney's estimation, for they were cheap, burning liquors that were handed across the counter in tiny glasses, and presently the big sailor rebelled against such poison.

"Say," he declared to his companion, whose name he had discovered was Rita, "I'm gettin' tired o' drinkin' this taek outa thimblies. How about you and me goin' for a walk?"

The girl started violently.

"Oh, no," she gasped. "I cannot leave thees place. Lascara, he no' let me go out!"

"Lascara?" Briney growled. "Who's he?"

"He own thees place," Rita explained. "He veree bad man to cross. When a girl works for heem, she has to stay here all-a time."

December 12th, 1931.

Two Grand Books for Boys!

Thrills! Mystery! Adventure!—that's what you get in the BRITISH BOY'S ANNUAL. This topping gift book is crowded with exciting tales of school life, sport, mystery and adventure that you will want to read again and again. There are also useful articles dealing with all kinds of interesting subjects, numerous illustrations and beautiful colour plates.

BRITISH BOY'S ANNUAL 5/-

A budget of thrills, mystery, and adventure—that's the CHAMPION ANNUAL. Here are stories of hazardous exploits in all parts of the world. True-to-life stories of School Sport and many thrilling tales that carry you breathlessly to the last word. There are also many clever illustrations. If you want a present for yourself or a friend get this exciting gift book.

CHAMPION ANNUAL 6/-

At all Newsagents and Booksellers.

"Now listen ter me," Briney argued. "You don't have to bother about Lascara. I won't let him do anything."

"No, no," the girl told him emphatically. "If I don't do like Lascara say, he throw me to the crocs."

"To the what?" Briney demanded in bewilderment.

"To the crocs," the girl repeated. "You come an' I show you."

She tugged at his sleeve, and he followed her along the bar and round to a wide doorway at the back of the saloon. It opened on to a bare room with stone flags and granite walls and as Briney strode across the threshold after Rita he noticed a circular pit in the middle of the floor. It was about ten feet in diameter, and surrounded by a low parapet scarce six inches high, and, as far as Briney could judge, it appeared to be a well sunk into the gloomy chamber for some reason or other.

Rita moved to the edge of the pit. A big side of beef lay on the parapet, and she lifted it in her hands, Briney watching her amusedly the while, not understanding the grim significance of what she had told him a few seconds before.

"Say, what are you goin' to do, Baby?" he asked with a grin. "Make a meal o' that?"

"If anybody don't do like Lascara say," the girl told him solemnly, "he— he feed them to the crocs. See—come here!"

Briney advanced, and, standing at her shoulder, peered down into the well. At the sight which met his eyes his face lost its amused expression, and he felt an icy shiver run down his spine.

The pit was twelve or fifteen feet deep, with sheer stone walls. At the bottom of it was a stagnant and muddy pool, and in the slime he saw half a dozen monster reptiles wallowing—loathsome crocodiles with jaws agape and eyes gleaming hungrily, their hideous heads upraised as they scented the meat that the girl Rita was holding high above them.

The muddy waters swirled as they raged in the depths of their prison, thrusting each other aside and craning voraciously towards the food that was poised so far beyond the reach of their fearsome snouts.

"Lascara he feed them like thees," Rita was saying. "Only it is not always animal meat. Sometimes it is people—people who are in his way."

With the words she tossed the beef into the well, and the horrified Briney saw those reptile jaws snap at it savagely. The meat fell amongst the scaly denizens of the pool, and in an instant their tails had lashed the mud and water into a heaving, glutinous mass as the creatures fastened on the food.

For a moment man and girl watched them fighting for possession of it, watched them tearing away great strips of it with their vast, greedy jaws. Then Rita drew back with an exclamation of repugnance, and, covering her eyes with her hands, shuddered violently.

The effect of that spectacle on Briney was even more pronounced, for it was something he had never before witnessed or imagined. Temporarily paralysed by a feeling of mute horror, his first instinct, when he recovered the use of his trembling limbs, was to turn and run from the vicinity of that ghastly well.

"Sufferin' dogfish!" he blurted. "I'm gettin' outa here!"

The girl Rita called to him as he made for the threshold of the saloon.

"Wait!" she cried. "Wait for me!" And then, overtaking him and seizing him by the arm: "You see why I no' go for walk with you, Sailor-man," she urged, "so now mebbe you dance with me, eh?"

"Not now," Briney answered hoarsely. "I gotta tell my boss about that crocodile pit."

He shook free, and, with the girl still at his heels, entered the saloon and stumbled across to the table where he had last seen Harry Drake.

Harry was alone again, Collins, Burke and Connor having moved off to the bar, and as Briney steered his bulk towards the Englishman the girl Rita shrugged her shoulders resignedly and walked off in search of some other escort.

Briney reached Harry's side, and dropped into a chair beside him.

"I've come aft to join yuh, skipper, with a signal o' distress," Briney panted, lapsing into a whimsical dialect of the sea that he sometimes affected. "There's dirty weather in the offing, an' we've gotta alter our course an' steer clear o' squalls."

"What the deuce are you raving about, Briney?" Harry demanded. "Talk plain English, will you? What's the trouble?"

"We've gotta get outa this dump," Briney gasped. "You know what this feller Lascara does with anybody he don't like? He takes 'em through to a room at the back there, an' throws 'em to the crocodiles!"

Harry greeted this piece of intelligence as light-heartedly as Briney had done when he had first heard it from Rita's lips.

"No!" he said, with an amused grin.

Briney was on the point of emphasizing his statement and attempting to convince Harry of its truth when a slender figure moved between him and the young Englishman. It was the figure of the girl Pelula, and, knowing the watchful eyes of Lascara were upon her, she forced an alluring smile, and circled Harry's neck with her dusky arm.

"I like you, sailor," she said softly, with the melodious intonation that she had inherited from native forebears.

Harry pushed her gently but firmly aside.

"Cast off, sister," he told her. "You've dropped anchor in the wrong port."

Standing in the background, Lascara glanced quickly round the saloon, and from various points his ruffianly minions approached, forming an ominous circle around the table at which Harry and Briney sat. At the same time, near the end of the long zinc bar, Bull Black and Ben Arnold looked at each other meaningly.

One of Lascara's hirelings stepped close to Harry, and, while Pelula slunk off, laid hold of the Englishman's shoulder. The fellow was a San Francisco wharf-rat who had drifted far from home and enlisted in the service of the ugliest villain on the African coast.

"Say," the man rapped out, "keep your hands off my girl!"

"Take your girl away!" Harry retorted. "She's not wanted at this table."

The rest of Lascara's hirelings closed in, and Briney was the first to become aware of the converging ring of toughs. In a moment the big sailor was on his feet.

"Look out, captain!" he roared. "It's a frame-up!"

Harry sprang up, and on the instant the Frisco wharf-rat pounced on him. The Englishman caught him up in his powerful arms, and, swinging him off his balance, hurled him over the table bodily. Next second he was overwhelmed by a rush of nine or ten men, a mixed mob of white scum and half-castes.

Briney was tackled by three others, and hit the foremast with a fist as hard as an anchor-cable. The rogue went down, but the others came on and grappled with the sailor; and suddenly Briney caught the glint of a knife.

The Pool.

BONNIE was undressing when the sudden uproar in the saloon reached her ears, and, thoroughly alarmed by the noise, she threw on her clothes again, and hurried to the door.

As she wrenched it open she came face to face with Arlene, and looked at her anxiously.

"What is it?" she panted. "What's happening down there?"

"Oh, nothing," said Arlene carelessly. "Just a bar-room row, Bonnie."

Even as she spoke, the tremendous voice of Briney was heard.

"Collins, Burke, Connor! Lend a hand, shipmates! They're after the skipper's blood!"

Bonnie shot a scared glance at Arlene.

"It's Harry!" she gasped. "Harry's down there!" And, with the words, she slipped past Arlene before the other girl could restrain her.

"Bonnie," Arlene called urgently. "Bonnie, come back here! It's dangerous for you to go—"

But Bonnie did not heed her, and, running down the stairs, she encountered Arnold and Bull Black near the foot of them. The two men started as she appeared beside them, and Ben

(Continued on page 27.)

Hornby Trains are better than ever

Even last year's Hornby Trains have been eclipsed by the wonderful new models! The locomotives are fitted with stronger mechanisms that give still longer runs, with still greater hauling power. The Rolling Stock is greatly improved, and many new models have been added to the range. The Railway Accessories are more numerous and more realistic than ever.

Hornby Locomotives are the longest running locomotives in the world. In a recent test a Hornby No. 1 Locomotive, running light, covered the amazing distance of 182 ft. on one winding! Hauling three No. 1 Pullman Coaches, the same locomotive ran 150 ft. on one winding. This wonderful performance could only be accomplished by a Hornby!

For every boy who is keen on model trains this must be a Hornby Christmas! Get a copy of the Hornby Book of Trains described here and make your choice now. If you prefer to have an ordinary price list, you may obtain a copy of catalogue No. 6 from your dealer, free of charge, or direct from Meccano Ltd., price 1d. Write to Department K.

HORNBY TRAINS

PRICES OF HORNBY TRAINS
FROM 5/-

KEY TO ILLUSTRATION

- 1 Dummy Brake Pipe
- 2 The headlamps are detachable
- 3 Outside cylinders
- 4 Cast Driving Wheels
- 5 Steps on Engine and Tender
- 6 Brake Lever in cab
- 7 Pullman Coach "Iolanthe"

MECCANO LIMITED
(DEPT. K),
OLD SWAN, LIVERPOOL.

THE 1931-32 HORNBY BOOK OF TRAINS

Page after page of fascinating reading, and every page illustrated! All the splendid Hornby Locomotives, Rolling Stock and Accessories are depicted in full colour.

You must have this book! It can be obtained for 3d. from your dealer, or post free from Meccano Ltd. for 4½d. in stamps.

"THE MAN AT 6."

(Continued from page 20.)

volver, and now he came forward slowly.

"Shut that door!" he growled, and the masked man did so. "The other door is locked. I saw to that. Now hand those bags to me."

The speaker had not taken his eyes off the masked stranger, though he spoke to Frank, who lifted the bags and approached the gunman gingerly.

"Open them," said the man with the gun. "I want one of 'em, not both."

The young man bent over the bags as though to obey, and then, to the surprise of Sybil, and the still greater surprise of the gunman, he suddenly straightened up, and in a flash knocked up the revolver. In a second he had closed with the man who held the gun, and a figure flashed by Sybil as the masked stranger rushed in to help Frank.

Two minutes later the gunman was on the floor, disarmed and helpless. Without speaking a word, Frank found a rope, and tied the fellow up securely.

"That's settled him, anyway!" he cried, turning to Sybil, who was staring hard at the man in the mask.

"Are you the Man at Six?" she asked.

Who Was "The Man at 6"?

THE masked man had taken part in the successful struggle against the gunman, but so far he had not spoken a word. He replied to Sybil's question, however, in a quiet tone.

"I don't quite know how you got the information, madam," he said, "but if you mean to ask whether I had arranged to come here at six o'clock, I must reply in the affirmative. To that extent, therefore, I am the 'man at six,' as you put it."

"Several men came to The Gables about that time," remarked Sybil. "I know what some of them wanted. What do you want?"

"I came to take away those bags." The masked man picked up the two bags and set them on a bench. "Have you examined them? In this one certain valuable jewelled chessmen; in the other—let me see! Ah, yes, a bomb—a time-bomb. How curious!"

He fiddled with the bags a moment, then closed them, leaving them on the bench, the one containing the chessmen being nearer the edge.

"A word of explanation before I take these bags to the inspector," he remarked. "I meant to call before, but I haven't had the chance until now."

"No; because he was after them too, I suppose."

Sybil indicated the man on the floor, but the masked man was eyeing her steadily, and he did not follow her glance.

"You are right, madam," he said. "This extremely unpleasant person has been following me around for some days, only he wasn't quite sure that I had got the chessmen. Now he knows. I must thank you, Mr. Pine, for your courage just now. But for you, this fellow might have got away with the spoils."

"You've double-crossed me, you low bound!" yelled the gunman angrily. "You promised me half. Get hold of him, kid! He's the thief!"

"Be quiet, or I'll send a bullet through you!" came the stern reply as the masked man turned sharply, a gun in his hand. The man on the floor subsided, and the speaker swung round again, seized the bag at the edge of the bench, and faced Sybil and Frank.

"Who are you?" cried Frank fiercely.

"Give me that bag, you scoundrel!"

"Stand back, you young fool!" ground out the masked man, thrusting forward his revolver.

Frank drew back to Sybil's side, glaring angrily at the man who was threatening him. Step by step the man in the mask retired towards the outer door, which he opened. Still covering the young couple, he got into the small car.

"You will be interested to know what will happen in a few minutes," he remarked coolly. "I set the time-bomb, and it will go off in four minutes; no, four and a half." He consulted a wrist-watch and smiled grimly.

"I have just time to make a few remarks before I leave," he continued. "In the first place, our friend on the floor is right. I am the thief, as he put it."

Sybil Vane watched him in silence, quite calm and collected, while Frank fidgeted, looking uneasily at the other bag.

"That fool of an inspector is now looking for you, and for someone who is supposed to have fired at Mrs. Rowson, or at Sir Joseph," resumed the man in the mask, beginning to back the car out of the garage. "Mrs. Rowson! Odd, because—"

"There never was a Mrs. Rowson, of course," interrupted Sybil.

"Of course not. I was Mrs. Rowson. I came down here after these chessmen, and I fooled Sir Joseph into letting me have them. He never suspected Mrs. Rowson to be a man in disguise."

The masked man chuckled, and Frank growled in impotent wrath.

"That explains a lot," said Sybil. "The death of Jenkins, for example."

"Yes, I regret that," came the reply. "Jenkins was useful in his way, and he didn't suspect me either. This afternoon I discarded the attire of Mrs. Rowson in his presence, and the shock was too much for the old man. He saw what he thought to be a feeble old woman change into a strong man before his eyes, and he fainted. When I picked him up he was dead."

"You wrote that letter signed 'Elizabeth Rowson,' I suppose," said Sybil.

"A mere blind, my dear lady. Of no importance except that it indicated the departure of 'Mrs. Rowson.' I congratulate you on your acumen, madam. Why did you masquerade in the way you did?"

"I hoped to surprise a confession out of someone by suddenly appearing as Mrs. Rowson, that's all," replied Sybil, elanged shut.

The masked man had stopped the car in the doorway, but now he began to move slowly out.

"Good-bye," he remarked pleasantly.

"You have one minute left. I must go."

The car disappeared, and in some way which Frank and Sybil could not fathom the door changed to as it went out.

"He doesn't know everything," said Sybil, smiling at Frank. "He doesn't know that I am a private detective. I was employed to watch—your father. He was already suspected, you know. The chessmen had been missed."

"But—but—" stammered Frank, his face paling as he edged away from the bench where the brown bag lay. "That bomb!"

"Don't worry about that." Sybil smiled at the young man's irritation. "I changed the bags when he turned round to the gentleman on the floor."

She took up the bag and opened it. There, sure enough, were the chessmen.

"He's got the bomb," said Sybil. "Listen!"

A tremendous crash outside, and the ground rocked beneath their feet, while through a window over the door they saw a flash of flame.

"That's the end of the Man at Six," remarked Sybil quietly.

Half a dozen policemen rushed to the scene of the explosion, but it was impossible for them to approach the blazing car. They could only watch helplessly from a distance. Sybil and Frank were soon released from the garage by the inspector and Sergeant Hogan, and the former gazed in astonishment at the pair.

"How did you get here?" he asked.

"And who was in that car?"

"The Man at Six," replied Sybil.

"What do you mean by that?"

Inspector Dawford looked puzzled, as well he might. The evening's events had been a little too much for him.

"I am a private detective, Mr. Dawford," replied Sybil. "I happened to find out that Mrs. Rowson had disappeared, and I sent a telephone message to Scotland Yard about it. I also discovered that a certain man would come here at six o'clock for the chessmen. I didn't know who the man would be, but I think I know now. And I have the chessmen here. He thought he'd got them, but he took the bag with the bomb instead."

Chief-inspector Dawford seemed more puzzled than ever as he looked at the chessmen.

"Come back to the hall, both of you," he said at length. "I must hear the whole story. Bring that fellow on the floor along, sergeant, and I'll question him. Was the man who has just been killed in that car the thief, then? And where's Mrs. Rowson?" he added, turning to Sybil again.

"He was the thief and he was Mrs. Rowson, too," replied the girl. "You have only to gather together all those who came here this evening. One will be missing, and he is—or, rather, he was—the Man at Six."

(A British International Picture, by permission of the Wardour Film Co., Ltd., starring Gerald Rawlinson and Anne Grey.)

32

RILEY'S "HOME" BILLIARD TABLES

GIVEN AWAY FREE

Write for particulars to
E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
 Howard Works, ACCRINGTON,
 and at Dept. 35, 147, Aldersgate
 Street, LONDON, E.C.1.

"DANGER ISLAND."

(Continued from page 25.)

Arnold bit his lips as he recognised her.

"Bonnie!" he rapped out. "What are you doing here?"

"Ben, Ben," the girl cried, "what's wrong? What are they doing to Captain Drake? Oh, Ben, we've got to do something to stop those men."

"It's not our fight, Miss Bonnie," Bull Black put in. "Drake took a fancy to that half-caste dancin'-girl over there, and another feller jumped him with a crowd o' his pals."

Bonnie glanced towards the dusky Pelula, and then faced Bull indignantly.

"It's a lie!" she flashed. "I don't believe it!"

With that, she wheeled, and, in defiance of Ben Arnold's sharp command, she darted towards the scene of the fracas.

"Bonnie!" Arnold shouted fiercely. "Stop, will you? Keep out of it!"

"Come back here, you little fool!" Bull Black added through his teeth, but Bonnie ignored both men.

Briney was still struggling with two of Lascara's underlings, and he had some difficulty in handing-off one of them—the man with the stiletto. The fellow was a Dago, and he was dancing in and out of the big sailor's reach, seeking an opportunity to bury the blade of his dagger in Briney's ribs. But the seaman finally hurled his other assailant to the floor, and pouncing on the man with the knife, struck aside the weapon with a slicing blow of his hand.

The knife fell from the Dago's grasp, and Briney caught the murderous little ruffian with a buffet that knocked him half a dozen yards, and then dropped him in a heap at the foot of Lascara's zinc bar. Next second, however, Briney's first adversary scrambled to his feet and engaged him savagely.

Meanwhile, Burke, Collins, and Connor had gone to Harry Drake's rescue, and had peeled three of the Englishman's assailants away from him. But there were still seven against Harry, and only a man of the young captain's physique and determination could have resisted them as effectively as he, for a spell, managed to do.

He contrived to break away from them and keep them at bay with his fists. In this way he was at first successful, for one man was crushed under a terrific right to the jaw, and two more were soon grovelling on the floor alongside him, their tumbled bodies throwing the remainder of the gang into confusion.

It was at this moment that Bonnie appeared on the scene, and she flung herself recklessly at one of Harry's enemies, attacking the scoundrel from behind and seizing him by the hair.

The fellow roared with pain, then squirmed round and tore himself from her grasp. But she scratched his face like a wild cat, and, in a fury he caught hold of her and threw her across the bar-room, so that she staggered for several paces, and then fell.

She struck her head against the floor and lay half-stunned while the fight raged around her, but presently she managed to struggle to her feet, and as she stood up she saw Harry's attackers mustering for a concerted rush.

The men whom he had knocked down had risen to their feet, and in an irresistible charge all seven of the ruffians crowded Harry towards the back of the saloon. The Englishman lashed out at them desperately, and his bunched knuckles drove into the face of one man with an impact that broke his jaw, but the others closed with him, and by force of numbers hustled him towards that grimy chamber of horror where the hungry crocodiles wallowed in the pool!

From the far end of Lascara's bar Bull Black and Ben Arnold watched the battle closely, and the eyes of the mate gleamed significantly as he saw that struggling mass of humanity blunder across the threshold of the sinister back-room.

"An' that's the finish o' Captain Drake!" he growled. "I guess you've seen the last o' him, Arnold!"

"What do you mean, Bull?" Arnold demanded. "They'll finish him in there—with knives?"

Bull's mouth twisted into a crooked smile.

"No, not with knives," he said. "With something that don't leave any trace—something that's the particular pastime o' Lascara. An' I give yuh my colonial oath, it would make your hair stand on end to see it, Arnold!"

"I don't care how he's finished," Arnold ground out, "so long as they make a sure job of it—"

Bull Black was not the only one who had seen Harry's assailants force him across the threshold and known their purpose in doing so. For Briney had witnessed the circumstance, and as Harry disappeared into the room of stone the big sailor seemed to become a raving madman.

"Don't go in there!" he shrieked. "Don't let 'em take you in there, captain!"

He was still struggling with one of Lascara's underlings, but suddenly dashed the man to the floor and started for the back room. At the same time Bonnie ran to him.

"They're throwin' Drake to the crocodiles!" Briney told her huskily, and with ashen face he lurched on towards the doorway through which Harry had vanished.

Bonnie followed him, and as she crossed the threshold she saw Harry Drake striving to tear himself from the swarm of men around him. But he was fairly at their mercy now, and with an exultant clamour they hustled him towards the middle of the room and that well of death.

Harry was only a couple of paces from the aperture in the floor when he tripped and fell. He came down with a heavy thud, his shoulders striking the low parapet of the well, and Lascara's hirelings sprawled atop of him. One man had his arm wrapped around the Englishman's neck, another was gripping him by the throat, and while these pushed him farther into the pit two or three others hoisted him up by the legs.

They were trying to toss him headlong into the well, and as he lay across the parapet Harry saw the monster reptiles below him. A thrill of horror ran through him as their ugly bodies slid through the water, their necks craning upwards at the sight of him, their jaws clashing greedily, and a hoarse exclamation escaped him as the brutes leaped at the wall, only to fall back from its sheer surface.

"The crocodiles!" roared the voice of Briney, and next instant the big sailor had flung himself into the midst of the Englishman's foes.

Bonnie darted after him, and she felt sick with terror, for she had realised the meaning of Briney's words. Sobbing distractedly, she clutched at one of Lascara's minions and tried to tear him away from Harry, but at the same time a feeling of faintness overcame her as she discerned the creatures of the pool.

Briney was fighting like a titan in the hope of rescuing his skipper from a ghastly fate deep down in that well of death. He had seized one ruffian by the collar and was dragging back another man whose head he had imprisoned in the crook of his arm. But he was one against many, and the fate of Harry Drake seemed sealed.

Briney pulled aside the two men on whom he had laid his great hands. But the others had Harry in their power, and with a heave they tipped him into the sinister pit.

A shriek escaped Bonnie Adams as the young Englishman's body plunged down, and the echoes of her cry mingled with the horrified shout that Briney uttered.

From the depths of the well there came an awful tumult—a snapping of great jaws, the splash and swirl of muddy waters lashed into a fury by the demons there.

(To be continued in another gripping episode next week. By permission of the Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Browne.)

GRAND FILM NOVELS.

"TRANSGRESSION."

She fell in love with a false ideal and when she learnt her mistake was haunted by the fear that her husband would learn of her folly.

"WATERLOO BRIDGE."

During a Zeppelin raid a young Canadian Tommy meets a girl, who tries hard to drive him from her life. Starring Mae Clarke and Kent Douglass.

"PEACE AND QUIET."

Percy inherited a peerage and a castle and found that a number of unpleasant people desired his life. Starring Herbert Mundin.

KAY FRANCIS IN "TRANSGRESSION."

Complete in this week's issue of our splendid companion paper

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY.

PRICE 2d;

December 12th, 1931

"LARCENY LANE."

(Continued from page 18.)

man's jaw. His captor's grip slackened, and there was the thud of a falling body. Next instant the fugitive had dashed into the ground-floor lobby of the skyscraper building in which the premises of Wernor & Lawrence were situated.

He swerved towards a flight of stairs as he saw a stalwart form blocking the only other line of escape. There was an immediate hue and cry, and the blast of a gunshot punctuated the tumult.

"This way, boys! After him—"
Bert raced on up the stairs, but as he reached the fourth floor he turned and sprinted along a corridor. At the end of it there was a window that opened on to a fire-escape, and he clambered through and sped down the rungs, to find himself in an alley.

He had hardly set foot to the ground when something jabbed him in the small of the back.

"Stick 'em up there, and swing around!"

Bert raised his hands and turned slowly. He found himself face to face with a plain-clothes man who was covering him with a revolver, and he knew that he was caught—caught red-handed for another man's crime.

Bert languished in a cell awaiting his trial, and the despair of those first hours behind the bars was only relieved when Anne called on him.

"Gee, it's swell to see you, Honey," Bert said to her as soon as they were alone. And then, as he saw the tears in her eyes: "Oh, don't take it so hard," he urged. "Things could be a lot worse."

"Nothing could be worse," she answered bitterly. "I—I just found out that Joe double-crossed you. Oh, don't you understand? He put the police on you. That's why you're here!"

Bert stared at her incredulously. "You mean to say that he pulled a trick like that, after all we tried to do for him?" he stammered. "Aw, it's impossible. Nobody could be so low."

"It's true!" she cried. "He got in touch with the police and gave you away. Only he made believe that a gang was burgling the office, so that when they caught you they'd think an accomplice had got away with the thirty thousand dollars' worth of negotiable bonds that he himself appropriated."

Bert's face suddenly became livid, and in a moment he was at the door of his cell, tearing futilely at the bars.

"The dirty, double-crossing rat!" he raged. "I want to get my hands on him, I want to tear him to pieces. Aw, if only I could get out of here!" And he sank back helplessly on his cot.

Anne gripped his shoulder. "I'm not going to let you take the blame!" she said. "I'm going to the district attorney, and I'm going to tell him the whole story. I'll—"

But Bert was on his feet again, and all at once his hand was on her lips.

"No, no, you mustn't do that!" he protested. "You'd only put yourself in a jam. Stay out of this, or they'll find out all there is to know about us. They'll dig up the whole story of our racket. You've got to keep quiet. Anne!"

"Oh, Bert," she sobbed, "I don't care what happens to me. I got you into this fix and I'm going to get you out of it. I can't let you go to gaol!"

He smiled down at her gamely. "I'm in, Anne," he told her, "and there's nothing you can do to help me. It'll just be my word against Joe's. Besides, you don't owe me anything. If I hadn't talked you into being my partner in the old racket, you'd still be holding down some linen job—without a care in the world."

"Bert—"
She drew nearer to him, and there was a tender expression in her lovely eyes.

"Bert," she said, "I went into the racket because I was falling in love with you. I love you still, and it's taken Joe Reynolds and his beastliness to make me realise it. I'm never going back to him, Bert. I'm going to make him give me my freedom, and—if he knows how much my silence is worth—he will."

"Anne," Bert breathed, taking her hands, "do you mean that?"
"Of course I mean it," she told him. "More than I ever meant anything in my life. I won't interfere in your trial, Bert, for you're right—it would mean everything being raked up, and you'd be in the pen for years. But, whatever happens—"

The warden showed up at that moment, and, unlocking the door, interrupted her.

"Time's up, lady," he said. "Come along!"

"Whatever happens—no matter what it is," Anne went on, clinging to Bert as she spoke—"I'll be waiting."

The warden touched her on the arm, and, drawing away, Anne moved out of the cell. The door was closed and locked again, and Bert stepped close to the bars. He was grinning as if he had no longer a single care in the world.

"I seem to remember somebody giving you a book of poetry, Anne," he said. "Did you happen to notice a verse in it that went this way?"

He struck a pose, and solemnly quoted a couple of lines:

"If I had the wings of a bird, my love,
Over these prison walls I'd fly. . . ."

(By permission of Warner Bros. Pictures, Ltd., starring James Cagney and Joan Blondell.)

BILLIARD TABLES 1/- per week

Remember you are dealing direct—we finance our own system.

Perfect reproduction of Full-Size Tables, Brass Frames, Pockets, Leather Covered. Adjustable Feet to ensure a perfect level surface. Complete with two Cues, three Turned Balls, Guaranteed Unbreakable, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules & Chalk.

SIZE	Deposit	Four Monthly Payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10/-	6/6	26/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8/6	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10/-	12/6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	15/6	52/-
6 ft. 4 in. x 3 ft. 3 in.	10/-	22/-	80/-

Size 4ft. 4ins. x 2ft. 3ins. Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk. 55/-

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge Street, London.

Send for Complete Illustrated List with Xmas Supplement of Jokes and Games.

WHAT BOYS WANT FOR XMAS!

BOY DETECTIVE OUTFITS, OF COURSE! They're great! Brimful with novelty, fun, and amusement!!! NOW'S the time to start on this grand new hobby for boys!!!

WORLD-FAMOUS SECRET SERVICE OUTFITS, with radio, invisible and mystic fire inks, membership badge, fingerprint powder, secret code-meter, etc., etc. TEN ITEMS, all winners, including book, "THINGS THE BOY TEC SHOULD KNOW," only 1/-. Or Larger Presentation Outfit, with extra fingerprint album, magnifying lens, etc., fourteen items, only 2/6. DISGUISE OUTFITS—contain Grease Paints (Sallow or Chinese, Sunburn or Red Indian), Moustaches, Hair (assorted colours), Removable Scars and Warts, Liquid for blacking out front teeth, etc. TWELVE ITEMS, including valuable book, "SECRETS OF DISGUISE," for only 1/6. Or larger, with extra grease paints, monocle, beard, etc., only 2/6.

NEW FINGERPRINT OUTFITS, a complete outfit for experts, EIGHT ITEMS, including book, "ALL ABOUT FINGERPRINTS"; 2/- BLACK DOMINO OUTFITS, with Revolver, Bullets, Handcuffs, Call-Whistle, gold-plated Badge, and Black Domino Mask. SIX ITEMS for 2/1! All the above are sent post free and by return. A handsome membership ticket and registered number is given free to each purchaser. Don't delay! Join the Boys' Secret Association TO-DAY!

THE BOY DETECTIVE SUPPLY STORES, DESK B.C., 32, CATHCART STREET, GREENOCK.
(Foreign Postage 3d. In the shilling extra.)

ONE GUINEA

Is all you pay for a charming Portable Model. Many other bargains in Horn, Hornless, Upright, Grand and Consoles, with which I give AN ALBUM OF FREE RECORDS Approval, Carriage Paid Monthly terms. Write for my Free Lists NOW

Edwd. O'Brien Lfd. SEND FOR LISTS
SPECIALISTS IN CYCLES & GRAMOPHONES. DOB'N COVENTRY.

STAMMERING Stuttering. New, remarkable, Certain Cure. Complete. 2/- Details—L. A. STEBBING (Stammer Dpt. A.P.), 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

BE TALLER! Increased my own height to 6ft. 3ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH ENGLAND

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-), including Airport, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge

BE STRONG I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-Control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-—STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28 Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2

FREE FUN! Ventriloquist's Instruments given FREE to all sending 7d. (P.O.) for latest Magic Trick and List. (Large Parcels, 2/6, 5/-)—J. Harrison, 368, Dudley Rd., Birmingham.

BE TALL Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course 5/-—Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2

STAMMERING, STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

BLUSHING, Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/- Details, striking testimonial Free—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

Boys' Cinema

GRAND XMAS NUMBER.

2 Complete Film Stories and a Serial.

Boys' CINEMA 2

No. 627.

EVERY TUESDAY.

DECEMBER 19th, 1931.

Caught Plastered

Starring
WHEELER
AND WOOLSEY

The Adventures of Two Hungry and Hard-Up Comedians.

Don't Miss OUR GRAND NEW ANNUAL
NOW ON SALE 6/-

Coloured Plates &
Photogravure

Tommy and Egbert, two down-and-out comedians, undertake to run a derelict drug-store for a little old lady—and bring about the downfall of a bootlegger. A delightful comedy, with complications and laughs galore.

CAUGHT PLASTERED

"Sir," said Egbert, "I'm not going to beat about the bush with you."

"Shut up!" bellowed Morgan, and pushed Tommy and Egbert back.

They surged forward, singing an entirely different song.

Egbert, in a momentary lull, sailed over to sip with them.

Starring WHEELER and WOOLSEY.

One Free Ride—and Another.

THE long goods train drew slowly into a siding just beyond the unimportant Middle-West station of Lockville and came to a full stop after a certain amount of banging and bumping of buffers. Sheriff Ebenezer Flint, a tall and self-important person of austere aspect, immediately began to search for tramps and other undesirables who, despite his vigilance, too often entered the town by rail without having paid any fare.

Halfway down the row of box-cars a sliding door was pushed back by two pairs of hands, and two young men jumped down on to the track. They did not look like tramps, but Flint immediately hastened in their direction.

As a matter of fact, the two young men were vaudeville comedians—what is known as a "double turn"—but it was a good while since they had appeared on any stage, and then they had been hooted off it. Consequently their pockets were almost as empty as the box-car in which they had travelled unlawfully across two States, and their stomachs were uncommonly like their pockets.

Yet the taller of the two—Egbert G. Higginbotham by name—was smoking a cigar; the last of three which he had purchased with his last dollar. That circumstance momentarily gave Flint pause; he was not to know that although Egbert could go without a meal indefinitely he simply could not exist without a cigar. In several other ways Egbert was remarkable. He was wearing horn-rimmed spectacles; he was dressed rather loudly in a shabby check suit, with a double-breasted waistcoat that did not match, and a pale grey bowler hat covered most of his flaming red hair. His clean-shaven face was long and his nose was one of its most outstanding features.

Tommy Tanner, his partner, was shorter, slightly bulkier, and several years younger. His face—also clean-shaven—was of a fuller pattern; his dress was distinctly assorted. A straw hat was perched on his brown hair; his trousers were a neat check; his jacket was black, and his waistcoat was a fancy one that few would fancy.

All unaware of Flint's approach, Egbert kissed his hand to the box-car.

"Well, ta-ta, old empty," he said.

"Were you speaking to me?" inquired Tommy.

Tommy pounced, and his hand was also thrust into the jar.

"Certainly not—I was just saying good-bye to our private train."
 "Ha, ha!" Tommy laughed. "Good old gondola. Five hundred miles she's brought us!"
 "Yes."

The tall figure of Flint stepped between them. His thumbs were in the armbands of his waistcoat and the shield upon his waistcoat was disturbingly visible.

"That'll cost you ten dollars apiece to the company," he barked, "or thirty days to the State."

They jumped, stared, recovered from the shock, and raised their hats with the utmost politeness.

"Yes?" said Egbert cheerfully. "How are you? And then, on the other hand—how are you?"

Tommy grinned broadly.
 "Lovely city you have," he remarked. "Haven't we?"

Flint glared; Egbert replaced his bowler and turned; and immediately the two were running with all their might across the rails in the direction of the distant roadway, dodging round intervening trucks.

"Hi, hi!" cried Flint, tearing after them. "Come back! Hi, you! Hi! You, there!"

The sheriff's legs were long, but he was not in form for sprinting. By the time he reached the gates that opened into the roadway his quarry had completely vanished. This way and that he looked in vain; then, realising that some more obvious tramps might be taking advantage of his absence, he went back to the goods train.

Egbert and Tommy had dived round a corner into what seemed to be quite a busy thoroughfare, lined with shops. They came to rest outside a baker's premises and there recovered their breath.

"Whew!" exclaimed Egbert, removing his hat and fanning his face with it. "Well, son, we're running just thirty days ahead of time."

"Yeah," said Tommy, sinking on to an empty box beside the baker's doorway. "and three days behind a meal!"

Egbert, restoring his hat to his head, sat down by his partner in distress.
 "Don't worry," he said optimistically, "our act will make us famous yet."
 "I don't want fame," growled Tommy. "I want food."

"We'll have that, too," Egbert declared, re-lighting the stub of his cigar, which had gone out. "We'll have everything! Our act's the best there is in vaudeville—only in the last town it went over their heads like a hair-net."

"Yeah," nodded Tommy gloomily. "The manager came back stage and said he didn't allow profanity in his theatre."

"We didn't use profanity."
 "I know—but the audience did!"

It was typical of these two that they could not resist cross-talk and wise-cracks even in private life; indeed, they were often funnier together in private life than they were before the footlights—they were always a "double turn."

"Isn't it too bad we're broke, Egbert?" ruminated Tommy. "You know, in Oakville the audience applauded us all the time, yet the management kicked us out."

"They weren't applauding," scoffed Egbert, "they were killing mosquitoes!" And he clapped his hands to show how similar the extermination of mosquitoes could be to the sound of applause.

"And us without a nickel!" lamented Tommy, rising to his feet because the baker was striding across his shop. "Have you ever wondered what you'd do if you had Rockefeller's money?"

"No," said Egbert, with a grimace, "but I've stopped and wondered what he'd do if he had mine!"

Tommy laughed, and slapped Egbert on the shoulder approvingly.

"Was that good?" he exclaimed, and produced from his pocket a circular metal badge on which was inscribed the word "Inspector" and the number 42. "No, kid," he said, attaching the badge to Egbert's vest, "you win the solid lead medal for that one! There you are!"

"Where'd you get the thing?" asked Egbert, blinking down at the decoration through his horn-rimmed spectacles.

"I found it in the box-car—and I kept it because it felt like a dollar in my pocket."

The baker stood in the doorway, scowling at them, and they wandered on into what obviously was the main street. Tram-lines ran down the middle of it, and the traffic was considerable.

"Don't worry," said Egbert cheerfully. "This looks like a town of go-getters to me. Something tells me the people here are alive—they're on their toes."

"They may be on their toes," retorted Tommy, "but we're flat on our heels."

Egbert, at that moment, glanced down at the pavement—and caught sight of a slip of paper lying near his feet. Tommy also looked—and swooped.

"Here, give me that! Let me have it!" cried Egbert. "I saw it first!" And he snatched at the slip of paper, and secured it.

A policeman was frowning at them, so they proceeded quietly along the street to an alleyway littered with packing-cases, entered the alleyway and sat down on an empty orange-box.

"What is it?" demanded Tommy anxiously. "Money?"

"No," said Egbert, examining the find with disgusted eyes. "It's only a street-car transfer. You know, for a minute I thought it was a good old two-dollar bill."

"You're always thinking something is something else," complained Tommy, and grabbed. "Why," he exclaimed, "it's not only a transfer, it's two days old!"

Egbert recovered the slip of paper and studied it thoughtfully.

"Well, come on," he said, "let's take a street-car ride."

"Hold on!" cried Tommy. "What for?"

"To look over our new town, of course. Who can tell—we may bump into a theatre that needs some good talent—come on!"

But Tommy hung back.
 "Wait a minute," he pleaded. "Both of us can't ride on one transfer. Besides, it's two days old."

"You—you——" spluttered Waters. "More of that and I—I'll give you a piece of my mind."

"Well, the worst they can do is to put us off," retorted his incorrigible partner. "Come on—I'll handle the situation in my usual masterly manner. Come on!"

"All right," said Tommy; for where Egbert led he invariably followed.

They stepped out from the alleyway and strolled along the street to a car-stop. An electric tramcar was standing there and passengers were streaming off it, while a little group of people were waiting to invade it. Egbert and Tommy, waiting their opportunity, jumped on to the rear platform just as the vehicle was re-starting.

"This car goes to Glen Park, Allison Avenue, and points east," sang out the conductor, a thick-set man with a pimple on his nose.

"We don't care which way it points," Egbert informed him, flicking ash from his cigar. "We're going to the end of the line."

Opportunity in a Tramcar.

FOR a while the two remained on the platform while the conductor went inside to collect fares. But before the car had reached the end of the busy street the conductor came back to them and held out his hand.

"Fares, please!"

"Here you are, conductor," said Egbert, handing over the out-of-date transfer ticket. "Nice weather we're having. And, by the way, it certainly looks as though the old League of Nations is going to get the Major League after all—and then again, there's the Lickersham Report."

Tommy, responding to a nudge in the ribs, began to pass inside the car, and Egbert would have followed, but the conductor stopped him.

"Just a minute! Just a minute!" he said truculently. "This transfer's two days old!"

"Really?" said Egbert, with a pleasant smile. "It just goes to show how long we've been waiting for this car! Thomas, one moment; you must hear this!"

Tommy turned about, wondering what would happen next.

"Conductor," boomed Egbert, "I want to shake your hand. Your hand! You know, there isn't one man in fifty would have noticed that that transfer was two days old. You're a very remarkable employee. Just make a note of that to the company, will you, Carlyle?"

Tommy fished out a little notebook and pencil, and the conductor stared in bewilderment, as well he might.

"Yes, sir," said Tommy.

"Might I—might I ask you you are?" stammered the conductor, gazing blankly at Egbert.

"Why, certainly," replied that resourceful young man loftily, and he opened his coat to display the inspector's badge upon his waistcoat.

"I—I hope you'll find everything all right, sir," mumbled the conductor, completely abashed.

"I'm sure we shall," responded Egbert. "Now, my good man, what's your name?"

"Sylvester Adolphus Bairnsfender, sir."

Tommy jotted down the name.

"Just take his number, Carlyle," directed Egbert.

Tommy handled the dangling disc on which the conductor's number was recorded, and let it fall back against the tunic to which it was attached. He then wrote down the figures, 5063.

"Now then, Sylvester," said Egbert, in quite a friendly way, "what schedule does this car run on?"

"A quarter past—half-past—quarter December 19th, 1931."

of—and at," was the immediate response.

"Good!" approved Egbert. "Come, Carlyle, we will now inspect the inside."

The conductor took off his peaked cap and brushed back his hair, relieved that the ordeal was over, and Egbert and Tommy stepped into the car's interior, passing up the aisle between the seats of the swaying vehicle from strap to strap.

"You certainly did get by that conductor slick," whispered Tommy admiringly.

"You leave everything to your Uncle Egbert," chuckled the wily one, and reached a vacant seat.

"Where are we going from here?" inquired Tommy anxiously.

"I don't know. When we go out like this something always happens, doesn't it?"

"Yes," growled Tommy, "and mostly to me!"

The car swung round out of Main Street into a less congested thoroughfare. The rows of shops on either side became interspersed with houses. A sound of sobbing suddenly assailed the partners' ears, and they became aware of a little grey-haired woman in a shabby black coat and faded black straw hat in one of the opposite seats who was crying into her handkerchief.

"Look!" whispered Tommy. "The

With All Good Wishes for Christmas

—From YOUR EDITOR.

old lady's crying! I wonder what's the trouble?"

"Maybe she has to ride this car every day," suggested Egbert.

The sobbing continued, and so did the progress of the car. Vacant plots occurred between the houses and the shops; at intervals the car came to a rest and passengers departed and others entered. But the little old lady remained crouched in her seat, and once, when she took the handkerchief from her face, Tommy caught a glimpse of a wrinkled but very sweet face, and thought of his dead mother.

"Egbert," he said uneasily, "let's find out what the trouble is. Maybe we can help her."

"Right you are," nodded Egbert, quite readily. "You know our motto—one good deed every day."

They crossed and seated themselves on either side of the drooping figure, and tender-hearted Tommy speko to her.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," he said awkwardly, "but e-can we do anything to help you?"

The old lady wiped her eyes and looked gratefully up at him, but shook her head.

"Why—why, no, thank you," she whimpered. "I'm afraid not."

"But you've been crying," protested Tommy.

"Ah-ah, and den't deny it," said Egbert, with comical solemnity. "You know it doesn't do any good to pull a Niagara."

"A Niagara?" she echoed wonderingly.

"He means tears," explained Tommy gently. "You know, Niagara Falls—tears fall. We just thought that—er—maybe we coul—er—er—"

"Do something for you," put in Egbert.

The little old lady wiped her eyes again and tried to smile.

"It's very nice of you gentlemen to take such an interest in me," she said gratefully. "Yours are the f-first kind words I've heard in—"

She broke off to sob again, and Tommy patted her arm.

"Oh, but you mustn't do that!" he protested. "Why, we've had more tough luck than you, I know."

"Sure!" nodded Egbert emphatically.

"Why, you'd think we were both born under a ladder, and broke a mirror every morning! Come on, now, mother, give us an earful of the bad news."

The old lady, thus adjured, looked up at them in turn.

"Well," she whimpered, "they're taking my drug-store away from me."

The conductor's head was thrust into the car. He had just collected fares and retreated, but it was an astonishing thing to him to see two supposed officials of the company talking to an insignificant old lady. He began to wonder how it would be to suggest to them that his pay was inadequate to his needs.

"Why are they taking your drug-store away from you?" asked Tommy gently.

"Debt," was the frank reply. "You see, since my husband died I—I did the best I could, but oh, if I'd only had someone who understood about drug-stores!"

Egbert glanced meaningly at Tommy, and said briskly:

"Now isn't that a coincidence? Mether, this is certainly your lucky day! I suppose it's just a trick of fate, us being on this car."

"It's simply amazing, Egbert—amazing!" declared Tommy.

The little old lady screwed her handkerchief into a ball, studying their faces with hope writ large in her faded grey eyes.

"Oh, do you understand the drug business?" she exclaimed.

"Oho!" chuckled the shameless Egbert. "She asks us if we understand the drug business! Why, mother, we understand the drug business all the way from Apollo to Apollonaris! Who was it conducted the biggest kiddie-crying contest the Castoria people ever held?"

"I don't know," confessed the little old lady.

"Us!" declared Egbert proudly.

"Who was it estimated that if all the compound pills in the country were piled into one heap in the Grand Canyon it would be—er—a good idea? Us! Who was it discovered that quinine and whisky was not good for a cold unless somebody else took the quinine?"

"Me!" proclaimed Tommy triumphantly.

"Us!" corrected Egbert. "Us, son—us! Now, mother, you just continue to sit here, but discontinue to weep, and give us the details of this thing."

"Well," began the little old lady obediently, "three years ago my husband was taken ill. He was a qualified chemist—I don't know anything about drugs myself."

"Go on!" said Egbert.

The little old lady went on, pouring her pitiful tale into the eager ears of the two adventurers, and the story was not really complete when the tramcar stopped and the conductor called out: "Allison Avenue." "This is where I get off," said the little old lady, starting abruptly to her feet. "Then it must be where we get off," decided Egbert.

A Shock for Watters.

ALLISON AVENUE was quite an imposing thoroughfare, second only to Main Street in the size and number of its shops. The little old lady led the way across the road to a drug-store that bore rather a neglected appearance. She took a key from her handbag and unlocked its door.

"Ah, so this is it, eh?" said Egbert. "Yes," she nodded. "I had to look it up while I went down to see the loan company."

"But, mother," protested Tommy, "don't you lose a lot of trade locking it up like that?"

"I don't have very much trade, even when it's open, any more," she said sadly. "Yet you can see it's situated on the right side of the street."

"Yeah," nodded Egbert, frowning at the uninteresting collection of brushes and combs and perfums and soaps in the window, "but on the wrong side of the ledger."

Tommy laughed at that, and Egbert felt called upon to offer a sort of apology for his facetiousness.

"You see," he said, "I'm a kind of a waggish person—you know, some people call me a wit."

"And they're half right," commented Tommy.

"Well, I hope you won't be disappointed," said the little old lady. "You see the business is run down."

"Oh, well, we'll wind it up!" laughed Egbert.

They passed into the shop, and the two were quite surprised at its dimensions, but the stock looked none too enticing, and was none too well displayed. As usual in American drug-stores, there was a public telephone-box at the far end, and a bar set with high chairs behind which reposed a soda-fountain and a variety of bottles and jars.

"Very interesting—very interesting!" commented Egbert, and advancing upon a jar containing jellied beans, plunged in a hand and filled his mouth. Tommy, who was ravenous, followed his example.

"What the store needs," said its proprietress, "is more medicine."

"Mother," said Egbert, glancing about him critically, "I'm afraid medicine won't do it any good. What I mean is—er—we'll make a diagnosis. Maybe it doesn't need medicine—maybe what it needs is exercise."

"You see," explained Tommy, "we analyse. It's a new gag in business. We make people drug-store conscious."

"That's it! That's it!" supported Egbert. "Now, mother, we'll get right down to business."

But Tommy wandered away to peer and pry, and presently he called Egbert over to him.

"We can't do anything around here," he said in a low voice. "Let's get out and find ourselves a job."

"Boy, I think you're right," agreed Egbert, and went back to the little old lady whose name—according to the fascia—was Mrs. Talley, widow of one Timothy Talley. He helped himself to a cigar, which proved to be quite a good one, and because she was looking so anxious and such a lonely little figure, he said the very reverse of what he had intended to say.

"Mother," he began, "my associate has just informed me that he is greatly impressed with the potentialities."

Tommy sat down beside the soda-fountain and made signs, but Egbert would not look at him.

"Now, with the application of our exclusive business methods," he proceeded, "we intend taking this store over for you and placing it where it belongs."

The shop door had been left open, and Mrs. Talley became aware of a tall and powerfully-built young man who was hovering on the threshold, evidently listening.

"Excuse me a minute," she said hurriedly, and went to meet the visitor, who stepped inside and removed his hat. His clean-shaven face was handsome in a way, but his brown eyes were crafty. His name was Harry Watters—a name Egbert and Tommy were going to detest in time.

"Afternoon, Mrs. Talley!" said he brusquely. "Efficiency conference?"

Egbert and Tommy were at the bar devouring jellied beans. They contemplated the newcomer without enthusiasm.

"Well, yes," said Mrs. Talley, smiling wanly. "These gentlemen were just advising me a little."

"I suppose you know what I'm here for?"

"Well, I—I hope so," she faltered. "We've extended your credit to the amount of twelve hundred dollars. You couldn't pay, so we took your note and assignment. I wanted to help you out."

"You've always been very kind, Mr. Watters. It breaks me up to think of losing the store, but I'm afraid—"

Tears trickled down her cheeks, and Tommy nudged Egbert.

"Mrs. Talley," said Watters, "I have a board of directors to satisfy, and your note is due in thirty days; but I'll take it upon myself, just as a friend, to take the whole thing off your shoulders and hand you a cheque for three hundred dollars, if you will sign—"

Egbert and Tommy rose almost simultaneously, but Egbert was the first to reach the proffered benefactor.

"Just a moment," he said, puffing at his cigar. "Did I understand you to say that this note was due in thirty days?"

"If you did," snapped Watters, "you were listening to something that was none of your affair."

"Well, listen, brother!" said Egbert calmly. "Suppose you come back in thirty days? Get me? Thirty days!"

"We should give you sixty," said Tommy with double meaning.

"Now, boys," intervened Mrs. Talley, "I want you to know Mr. Watters, and to like him. He's been awfully kind to me."

"I'm here merely to help Mrs. Talley out," said Watters angrily.

"Yeah!" drawled Egbert. "Out into the street!"

"Yes—and help himself in," added Tommy, striking an attitude.

"You—you—" spluttered Watters. "More of that and I—I'll give you a piece of my mind!"

"Better give him something you won't need!" taunted Egbert; and then Mrs. Talley tried to establish peace.

"Now, boys, please!" she pleaded. "I'm sorry, Mr. Watters, but they mean well. You see, they understand the drug business."

"Understand the business?" scoffed Watters, and turned suddenly on Egbert. "What's the difference between monoxide and dioxide?" he demanded.

She opened the door and looked round it, whereupon Egbert made a grimace, and Tommy looked innocently away. "It was the wrong number," she said with a smile.

Egbert hadn't the ghost of a notion, but with his ready wit he covered up his ignorance.

"Well," he said brightly, "they had a difference, but they've made it up now."

"Bah!" snorted Watters, while Tommy laughed aloud. "Mrs. Talley, you understand, of course, that we can supply you with no further drugs until all bills are paid. I'll see you in thirty days!"

"Have a bean?" inquired Egbert.

"Bah!" roared Watters, and strode to the door. But the little iron doorstep was in his path, and he stumbled over it and nearly went sprawling on to the pavement, so that his exit was extremely undignified.

Tommy walked over to the mat, picked up the doorstep and kissed it.

The Sheriff Reappears.

NOW Lockville, in addition to its sheriff, boasted a chief of police and quite a considerable force of constabulary. The sheriff was a survivor of an ancient regime, whereas bulky Chief Morton considered himself thoroughly up to date. But Morton was worried, for in spite of all his efforts, speakeasies existed in the town, and bootlegging was rife.

The newspapers had made a dead-set at him and his organisation, and that afternoon he held a sort of conference in his private office at police headquarters in New Street. All his plain-clothes men were present, and all the uniformed men above the rank of patrolman. He waved in their faces a copy of the day's paper which had driven him nearly frantic. He stabbed its glaring headline with a fierce forefinger.

Chief of Police Morton Unable to Cope With Bootleg Situation!

"A fine state of affairs!" he howled. "Now let me tell you men something. There's an election coming on in this town in a couple of months, and unless we show them action, there's going to be a lot of new faces in this department, including my own. That's all! Now get out and show me some results!"

The men trooped off, glad to escape. Chief Morton flung the paper from him with something uncommonly like an oath, and worried his chin with his hand.

He was muttering to himself when the door opened and a brown-haired and very dainty little slip of a girl peeped round it. She was Peggy Morton, the chief's daughter, sweet and twenty, and her extra large blue-grey eyes regarded her red-faced parent quizzically.

"Oh, daddy," she said, entering the room and closing the door, "did I hear you laughing?"

He swung round with a frown, but Peggy was his pet, and he made a valiant effort to speak calmly.

"Oh, it's you!" he said. "You'd better run along, Peggy—I'm kinda out of sorts this afternoon."

"Those nasty bootleggers been bothering you again?" she inquired.

"Yeah!"

"What a shame! You know there ought to be a law against those fellows."

"Yeah—what?"

A telephone-bell shrilled, and he reached for the instrument on his desk, while Peggy perched beside him and swung her shapely legs.

"Watters, eh?" he barked into the transmitter. "All right, send him in!"

He put down the receiver and grinned at his daughter.

"It's Harry Watters," he said. "That's it—go ahead and blush."

"I wasn't blushing!" she declared indignantly.

December 19th, 1931.

"No? Then they must have found another name for it."

Watters was ushered into the room by a sergeant, and his face lit up at sight of Peggy. He greeted Chief Morton, but took two slender hands in his own and seemed to have forgotten the reason for his call.

"Perhaps I'd better clear out?" suggested the chief slyly. "Sit down, Harry, and tell me if I'm in the way."

Watters sat, relinquishing the hands with obvious reluctance.

"Chief," he said, "as a member of the Better City Movement, I've got a little tip for you. May not amount to anything, of course, but as I always say—'better safe than serry.'"

"What've you got?" asked Chief Morton briskly.

"Two suspicious-looking characters from the East—all the earmarks of racketeers."

"Yeah?" Morton leaned eagerly forward. "Got anything on 'em?"

"No," admitted Watters. "I'm afraid that's up to you. But these two fellows have taken over a dilapidated drug-store—one that hasn't made a penny in two years. No sane business person would have taken it as a gift, and just between you and me, it looks like a liquor racket."

"Yeah? Who owns the store?"

"An old lady named Mrs. Talley."

Peggy gave a little exclamation.

"Why, I know her quite well," she said. "Surely you don't think that dear little old lady would—"

"No," Watters broke in hastily.

"No, indeed. My idea is that these fellows are taking advantage of the situation. Personally I have been trying to help the poor old soul out. She owes us a considerable sum. I've been trying to help her along. Just can't help mixing sentiment with business in a case like hers."

Peggy put her hand approvingly on his shoulder.

"I think that's just lovely of you, Harry," she said.

"Thanks for the tip, Harry," chimed in the chief gratefully. "I'll keep an eye on them. These bootleggers are getting my goat."

Peggy reached down to kiss her father, declaring that she must go, and Watters rose hopefully to his feet, but she waved him back into his chair and told him she would see him later.

"Movies, to-night?" he suggested.

"Uh-huh," she nodded, and left them together, and out in the busy street, boarded a tramcar bound for Allison Avenue.

By this time Egbert and Tommy were quite busy in the drug-store, which stood prominently in that thoroughfare—not busy serving customers, but busy dusting and cleaning and re-arranging the wares. Egbert had appropriated another cigar; Tommy had disordered his coat and cleaned out several show-cases.

"You know, Egbert," he said earnestly, "we've got to do something now. D'you realise we kept mother from getting that three hundred dollars from Watters?"

"Sure," nodded Egbert, "but do you realise that that mug isn't passing over three hundred berries for nothing? He's no bargain."

"Then why did he offer her the money? You know, we may be wrong—he may be a regular guy, after all."

"I don't like that fellow," declared Egbert, looking up at an inoffensive trout in a glass case above some shelves. "and I'll find a reason yet!" He clambered on to the counter with a duster in his hand and addressed the trout. "Hold still, Minnie," he said, "while I clean your little home for you."

"Service!" barked a voice in the doorway.

Down sprang Egbert from the counter, and he ducked low behind it—an example promptly followed by Tommy. For the voice belonged to none other than the austere Sheriff Flint.

"It's old Thirty-Days himself," groaned Egbert. "Wonder what he wants."

"What he needs is chloroform!" whispered Tommy. "You go and wait on him."

"No, you go and wait on him."

"No, you go and wait on him."

Egbert was stooping before a shelf on which reposed a number of masks and false faces, some of them decorated with moustaches, some with beards.

"Wait a minute," he whispered, and tore a ginger moustache from a papier-mâché mask, while Flint pounded impatiently on the counter. Some tubes of rubber solution were handy, and Egbert rose up disguised.

"Coming right up, sir," he said. "Coming right up. Nice day—nice day."

The sheriff stared at him, and just then Tommy arose, wearing not only an imitation moustache, but a false nose to boot. He began to polish some cheap watches with a piece of chamois leather.

"Gimme a stamp!" barked Flint.

Now in all self-respecting American drug-stores postage stamps are sold as freely as in a post-office; but Egbert hadn't any idea where they were located. He found some, however, in a drawer.

"Ah!" he said triumphantly. "Here we have some nice green ones—and on the other hand we have some pink ones. Lovely stamps, too—you can't lick 'em—I mean beat 'em."

"I want a two-cent stamp!" bellowed the sheriff.

His want was supplied, but he seemed in no hurry to go. He glared at Tommy, he glanced about the shop.

"We're expecting a new shipment of stamps next week," Egbert informed him. "You might tell your friends, will you?"

"I haven't any friends," retorted Flint, "and I don't want any. Give me change for a dollar."

Egbert rang up two cents on an ancient cash register, but in the drawer there was no money, only a few pins and buttons.

"Now, isn't that funny!" he remarked. "Nothing but twenty-dollar notes! I've simply got to go to the bank to-day!"

"Dirty stamps, no change!" snorted Flint. "Bah!"

"Oh, Mr. Tanner," called Egbert to Tommy, "have you placed on display all that merchandise we're going to sell at fifty per cent. below wholesale?"

"Yes, Mr. Higginbotham," replied Tommy instantly. "But we won't have 'em long at those prices."

Sheriff Flint's beady eyes glistened. "You're selling out below cost?" he demanded.

"Yes, sir," said Egbert "It's our Annual Prosperity Sale—everything to be sold at fifty per cent below— Now here we have some nice bath-salts—if you go in for curiosities. We're letting these bottles go at the astoundingly low price of one dollar."

"I'll give you seventy-five cents," offered Flint.

"Sold!" boomed Egbert.

Tommy came forward with a box full of bottles of patent medicine.

"Mr. Higginbotham," he said, "did you wish to sacrifice these?"

"Absolutely, Mr. Tanner," responded Egbert. "Everything in the store is to be sacrificed." He took out a bottle, read its label. "Ah!" he exclaimed.

"Colds, coughs, bronchitis, asthma—everything for the family chest! An invaluable article with water coming on. Six dollars for the whole boxful."

"I'll give you four," offered Flint, who suffered from a weak chest.

Four dollars were accepted; other articles were offered and sold. Flint went off with his purchases, and Egbert and Tommy gleefully removed their disguises and poked one another in the ribs. Peggy Morton descended from a tramcar outside and peered through the dusty panes at them; Mrs. Talley emerged from the shop-parlour and Egbert flourished seven dollars in her face.

"Mother," he said, "business is great! If only it keeps up, we'll be able to pay Watters off before the day is over."

"But I do wish you boys hadn't quarrelled with him," she lamented.

"Don't you worry about that guy," urged Tommy; and Egbert added:

"If you were to ask me, I'd say he's as crooked as a hatful of bent nails!"

Mrs. Talley apparently did not hear that remark. She had caught sight of Peggy entering the shop, and she ran to meet her, exclaiming, in quite a flutter:

"Why, bless my soul! How are you, honey?"

Peggy Changes Her Mind.

PEGGY looked a perfect picture in her little printed muslin frock with a close-fitting felt hat upon her brown hair, and Tommy almost devoured her with his eyes, deciding mentally that she was the most attractive girl he had ever seen in his life. But Peggy ignored the two young men and whispered in Mrs. Talley's right ear:

"I'm fine, but I've come to warn you about something."

Tommy daringly advanced, signifying that he would like to be introduced, and Mrs. Talley smilingly beckoned to Egbert.

"This is Mr.—er—" she began; and realised with a gasp that she was unacquainted with her helpers' names.

"Mr. Higginbotham, mother—Egbert G. Higginbotham," said Egbert with a flourish.

"Mr. Higginbotham," introduced Mrs. Talley, "this is little Peggy Morton."

"Well, well," said Egbert graciously, "she'd be great in the optical department. You know, easy on the eyes. Oh, yes—er—this is my associate, Mr. Thomas Tanner."

"How do you do?" said Peggy, eyeing Tommy as though he were some dangerous insect. "You're a stranger, aren't you?"

"I hope not," said Tommy eagerly.

"Peggy's father is chief of police," explained Mrs. Talley.

"Oh," said Egbert, with mock dismay, and retreated several steps, "that's a great pity."

"Egbert's only fooling," laughed Tommy.

"He's not fooling me," retorted Peggy tartly. "Could I use your 'phone, please, Mrs. Talley?"

Mrs. Talley smiled and nodded, and Peggy made for the telephone-box, closed the door, inserted coins, and asked for police headquarters.

Now the telephone-box had a glass panel, and Tommy had begun to clean the glass with whiting; but, having smeared the whole surface with that excellent medium, he had turned his attention to show cases. The glass panel, consequently, was obscured, and Peggy was invisible.

But Tommy, who had fallen in love at first sight, promptly made for the door, and with his finger rubbed a little round hole in the whiting, and applied his eye to the hole. Egbert hurried over to him, disapproving of such conduct, and he arrived just in time to hear Peggy say:

"Is that the police-station?"

Egbert shrank back, but Tommy made another hole for his other eye, then drew in turn a nose, a mouth, two ears, and the outline of a head.

Peggy, inside the box, began to laugh. Harry Watters had convinced her that these two young men were wrongdoers, and Egbert, with his humour, had added to her conviction. But she had liked the look of Tommy from the first, and wrongdoers surely didn't draw funny faces on glass panels.

The voice of a police sergeant rang in her ear just as she was laughing at Tommy's own flattened face, pressed against the face he had drawn.

Sergeant Hoskiss! What should she do?

"Oh—er—I'm wrong—I mean, wrong number!" she stammered, and she hung up the receiver and pushed open the door and looked round it. Egbert made a grimace. Tommy looked innocently away.

"It was the wrong number," she said with a smile.

"I'll get the right one for you," volunteered Tommy.

"No, thanks, I've changed my mind."

"But you'll be coming round again, won't you?" suggested Tommy anxiously. "To use the 'phone."

She laughed merrily and held out her hand to Mrs. Talley, who said quite proudly:

"These gentlemen are going to run the drug-store for me."

"That's wonderful," cooed Peggy. "You boys must be terribly smart. Well, good-bye, Mr.—er—Higginbotham. Good-bye, Mrs. Talley." She turned to Tommy. "You were—" she began, and broke off in confusion. "I—er—good-bye!"

"Good-bye," said Tommy, and took her hand, and still holding it, accompanied her across the shop. "Good-bye."

"Now say it this time and mean it," Egbert called after him.

They reached the front door.

"So-long," breathed Tommy.

"So-long, Mr. Tanner," nodded Peggy, and freed her hand and went out.

"Oh, boy!" Tommy cried gleefully, as he returned to his partner. "She remembered my name."

"Yes," said Egbert, without any noticeable enthusiasm, and he plunged his hand into the jar of jellied beans.

Tommy pounced, and his hand also was thrust into the jar. But though one hand could pass a wrist, two hands could not be extricated simultaneously, and Mrs. Talley was approaching. By mute consent they held the jar behind them.

"Goodness me!" cried Mrs. Talley, who was not so unobservant as they imagined. "Whatever can be the matter with me? You boys must be terribly hungry."

"Oh, no, mother!" protested Tommy.

"Oh, yes, yes, mother," said Egbert frankly. "Honestly speaking, I'm so hungry I could eat a leopard and enjoy every spot."

"Then come along with me," she directed, and led the way to the shop-parlour. "I have a spare room for you."

They crouched in a row before the door, listening intently. It sounded to Egbert as though someone was sweeping up broken glass.

December 19th, 1931.

"Don't you think we'd better stay out here in the store?" suggested Tommy, following close beside Egbert with the jar concealed between them. "No need at all," she answered. "There's a customer's bell—we'll hear it ring."

She pushed open the shop parlour door and disappeared, but almost immediately she ran out again, startled by a crash. They had smashed the glass jar on the edge of the counter to free their hands.

"What happened, hoys?" she asked anxiously.

"Only just a little matter we had to get off our hands," replied Egbert glibly. "Come on, Tommy."

They passed from the shop into a pleasant room, plainly but comfortably furnished.

"Well, this is our little home," she said. "And over here"—opening a door on the right—"is what used to be the spare room; now it's going to be yours."

They peeped in at a double-bedded room, bright, clean and singularly attractive to two who had spent days and nights in a box-car of a goods train.

"I'll run along and prepare a meal," she said. "I hope you've got good appetites. I have a nice leg of lamb."

Tommy looked at Egbert. Egbert looked at Tommy, and they both sighed.

The shop doorbell rang and Tommy made to answer its summons, but Mrs. Talley waved him back.

"No, no, you get ready for dinner," she said. "I'll go this time."

It was a tall, angular and middle-aged woman who had entered the store, wearing tailor-mades and looking every inch a spinster.

"Good-afternoon, Miss Loring," said Mrs. Talley.

"How d'you do, Mrs. Talley," said the spinster primly. "You've written that you would like to enter the Middleton Home for the Aged."

"Well, yes," hesitated Mrs. Talley. "But I'm not quite sure now."

"H'm! We require a short notice, you know. You understand, Mrs. Talley, that the Middleton Home is not a charitable institution, don't you? There are certain light tasks to perform which make the guests self-supporting, and then there's a small entrance fee. Two hundred dollars."

"Y-yes; I've saved that amount."

"Good!" said Miss Loring with obvious satisfaction and took a folded paper from the handbag she carried. "Here is an application form. Fill that in and send it to the home. We'd like five days' notice. Good-day, Mrs. Talley."

The visitor departed, leaving her victim with the application form and her thoughts. The sound of sobbing reached Tommy's alert ears and he ran out to her, struggling into his jacket as he went.

"What's the matter, mother?" he asked, and went down on his knees beside the chair into which she had dropped. "Oh, honey, I'm sure everything's going to be all right. Come on now, you mustn't cry like that."

"I won't," she said, looking tearfully at him, and leaning against his shoulder. "I ought to be ashamed, when you've been so kind to me."

"Things are never as bad as they seem," he declared, hugging her. "You know what they say about those clouds with the silver linings? Well, it's true. I've seen it happen."

Tommy had washed first. Egbert, December 19th, 1931.

who had remained behind to follow his example, now came sauntering into the shop, putting on his coat and booming cheerfully: "Well, well, well." "Ss-s-h!" hissed Tommy. "She's been crying again."

Egbert drew nearer, a forefinger raised reprovingly.

"Now, mother," he said, "what did I tell you? Didn't I say that from now on we were going to do all the worrying around here?"

"I'll be all right in a minute," whispered Mrs. Talley.

"Listen," whispered Egbert to Tommy, "we ought to do something to cheer her up."

"Yes," said Tommy, and rose to his feet with alacrity. "Let's do the act for her we did at Oakville."

"Good idea!" nodded Egbert. "Now come on, mother, just park the body over here."

He helped the little old lady up and marched her to the parlour at the back of the shop where he deposited her in another chair.

"Now, you're the audience, mother, see? And this is the stage. There are the footlights. Now the curtain is just going up. Look! Look!"

Mrs. Talley looked with tears trickling down her cheeks and a woebegone expression in her eyes. Egbert went to one wall, Tommy to the other. Then they turned about and met right opposite the chair in which she was seated, and for her exclusive benefit they did their double turn.

They told funny stories, they sang a comic song, they indulged in typical back-chat, and they performed an eccentric dance of the simultaneous variety, and gradually their audience of one forgot her sorrows and began to smile. The smile broadened. She laughed outright, and before the entertainment was over tears were streaming down her cheeks again because she had laughed till she cried.

"Well, mother," said Egbert, after they had bowed, made a pretence of going off a stage, and returned to her as ordinary individuals, "are we a success or not?"

"I think you're two very dear boys," she told them.

"And we're going to make a success of the drug-store, too," asserted Tom.

"Yes; but Mr. Watters said he couldn't give me any more credit," she reminded them. "What are we going to do for drugs?"

"Drugs?" echoed Egbert. "What on earth does a drug-store want with drugs? What a modern drug-store needs is cold soda, hot lunch, cameras, books—"

"Picture-postcards, magazines, brushes and combs, mirrors, and stationery," put in Tommy.

"But wouldn't that take quite a lot of money?"

"Yeah," said Egbert, momentarily daunted. "I never thought of that."

"I-er—I've got two hundred dollars."

"Why, that'll do it!" he cried. "A jobbing house would take that as evidence of good faith, and we can get ninety days on the balance."

"Egbert," protested Tommy, "we can't do that. We can't take her two hundred dollars—it's too big a gamble."

"Shush, son!" boomed Egbert.

"Mother, there'll be no drugs in this joint. This is going to be a drug-store. We'll change the name—we'll call it the Sunshine Drug Store. We'll advertise—we'll put in a microphone."

Tommy became infected with his exuberance.

"That's the idea!" he cried. "We'll give 'em an hour of our own entertainment!"

"Mother," said Egbert, kneeling before the little old lady, "it's a cinch!"

The Sunshine Drug Store.

WITHIN a very few days the drug-store began to present quite a different appearance to passers-by. On the plate-glass window, and on the fascia above, the new name, "Sunshine Drug Store," appeared in large gilt letters, and the dusty and decayed-looking display in the shop-window was swept away to make room for more attractive goods arranged with skill.

Egbert and Tommy were quick workers as well as quick thinkers. Decorators entered the premises to erect new show-cases, extend the bar, and paint and varnish. Arrangements were made with various wholesale firms to supply all manner of wares, and the local broadcasting station was induced to sell a certain amount of "the air" twice daily on a credit basis.

A fortnight after the arrival of the two comedians in the town—on Monday, December 15th, to be precise—Harry Watters was sitting at a desk in the private office of the Lockville Trust & Loan Company, scowling at a loud-speaker. Beside him sat a lean-faced man, caressing a clipped brown moustache and listening with occasional chuckles to the broadcast cross-talk of Egbert and Tommy. When the entertainment was over, the voice of Egbert thus addressed his unseen audience:

"And this, ladies and gentlemen, concludes the noonday broadcast from the Sunshine Drug Store. We will again present the Sunshine Hour at four o'clock this afternoon—and don't forget, folks, we serve a better meal than any other drug-store in the city. This is Dr. Egbert G. Higginbotham signing off with the voice that it kind to your ears."

The lean-faced man—his name was Clarke—uncrossed his long legs and grinned irritatingly at Watters.

"Looks like those two fellows are going to put it over," he remarked.

"Maybe," growled Watters, and rose to shut off the radio set. "Now, listen, Clarke—I can't furnish you with any more alcohol this month."

"That's up to you," said Clarke, with obvious disappointment, "but if you want to make dough in this bootleg business you got to remember 'alky' is king."

"Not so loud," warned Watters. "I can't take the chance. We've practically used up the wholesale allotment, and if I can't supply the drug-stores the Government's going to get on to me."

"All right, but it's a shame to lose all the jack we might pick up—and I'm telling you, this town's got an awful thirst."

"Well, we've sold a thousand gallons this month, haven't we?" countered Watters. "Now, listen, Clarke—about this Sunshine Drug Store. It's a good location, and I want it."

"Shoot the details."

"This is the inside of the story. The Texla Oil Company is going to put up a ten-story building across the street. Never mind where I got the tip, but naturally my company want that lot—and I personally hold the assignment of the lease."

"Pretty soft," commented Clarke.

"What d'you want me to do?"

"Suppose we take a little walk, and I'll tell you all about it?"

"Okay!" grinned Clarke. "Anything to turn an honest dollar—you know me."

They put on their hats and coats and went out together.

Meanwhile, in the Sunshine Drug-Store, Egbert and Tommy, arrayed in white overalls, were dealing with quite a flock of customers. The high chairs beside the bar were nearly all occupied by early lunchers, and Mrs. Talley was working at high pressure in the kitchen. Egbert, having disposed of a purchaser, helped himself to some jellied beans from a glass jar on the bar before dealing with a handsome but ponderous lady who had wandered towards the book counter.

Egbert became aware of a portly old gentleman with enormous white whiskers who had entered the shop and was staring about him.

"'Twas the night before Christmas, and the children were all—" declaimed Egbert, struck by the resemblance of the old gentleman to the traditional figure of Santa Claus. "Will you pardon me a moment, madam?"

"Yes," said the ponderous lady, "I'll just browse among your books."

Egbert went over to the old gentleman, who took off his hat, exposing a semicircular baldness of head with a few little sprouts of white hair sticking up on top, and inquired almost jovially:

"Are you going to wait on me?"

"Sir," said Egbert, toying with the right-hand portion of the luxurious white whiskers, "I'm not going to beat about the bush with you—I am certainly going to wait on you."

"I want a toothbrush."

"A toothbrush—yes, sir—a toothbrush. How many in your family?"

The old gentleman smiled and held up four fingers.

"Four," nodded Egbert sagely. "Then you want the large size." He opened a drawer and pulled out a tray full of assorted toothbrushes. "Look," he said, holding one up. "Non-skid bristles from Brussels."

"How much are they?"

"Fifty cents—and one dollar. But the fifty cent ones are all sold."

The old gentleman decided to have the toothbrush, and departed with it in a neat little cellulaine bag.

Egbert scurried over to the bar, where hungry customers were clamouring for attention, and Tommy advanced upon a man who was toying with a perfume spray, wasting its contents. He took the spray away and set it down on its show-case, whereupon the man presented a slip of paper.

"I want this filled," said he.

"What is it?" inquired Tommy blankly.

"It's a prescription."

A prescription! Tommy knitted his brows, this was extremely awkward!

"I'll notify the prescription department immediately," he said.

He sought Egbert in a fine state of alarm.

"Something terrible has happened," he gasped. "This is a prescription! No, you can't read it—it's written in pig Latin. Question is, what are you going to do about it?"

"What am I going to do about it?" said Egbert calmly. "I'm going to take it to a drug-store, of course."

Exchanging places with Tommy, he went over to the customer.

"I'm sorry, sir," he apologised, "but this is going to take a little time. You see, the compound spirits of salamander must first be absorbed by the tincture of— Will you wait?"

The customer decided that he would wait.

"You're wise, my dear sir," Egbert informed him. "Our prescription department is unique—there's nothing like it in the world."

He retired to the shop-parlour, where he removed his overall and put on his hat, then made his way out at the back door, crossed a yard, reached an alley, emerged from the alley into Allison Avenue, and sought a drug-store at the far end of it, where he had the prescription made up.

The Plot Succeeds.

TWO minutes after Egbert had disappeared, Peggy walked serenely into the Sunshine Drug Store, walked to the bar, and perched herself on one of the high chairs. She had been a frequent visitor ever since that first day when she had changed her mind about telephoning the police; and the more she had seen of Tommy the less she had seen of Harry Watters.

The luncheon bar was not so crowded now, and Tommy delightedly turned his full attention to her.

"Gosh, I'm glad to see you, Peggy!" he exclaimed. "Look!" And he pointed to a neat little hanging glass sign: "Peggy Special."

"It's a new drink," he explained proudly. "I invented it myself, and named it after you. Try one!"

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

BUCK JONES

—in—

"BRANDED."

Arrested for a hold-up of which they are innocent, Tom Dale and his Swedish henchman, Olaf, escape from gaol by a trick—and Tom enters into possession of a ranch bequeathed to him by an uncle, only to encounter fresh trouble. A stirring drama of the West, full of unexpected twists and turns.

"BAD COMPANY."

Two rival gangs, hated and feared by the police, warfare of a fiendish nature and behind the scenes the law waiting for a chance to clean up the city. Starring Ricardo Cortez and Helen Twelvetrees.

"THE FIGHTING TEST."

Suspicion falls on a daring cowboy for the robbery of a pay-roll and he fights hard to clear his name. Starring Buffalo Bill jun., and Joan Jaccard.

ALSO

The fifth episode of our thrilling serial: "DANGER ISLAND."

SPECIAL NOTE.

Owing to the Christmas Holidays, next week's grand issue of BOY'S CINEMA will be on sale SATURDAY, DECEMBER 19th.

Make sure of your copy by ordering NOW!

He picked up a long tumbler and proceeded to mix a beverage in it.

"It's awfully nice of you to name a drink after me," said Peggy, watching him with admiring eyes.

"Why shouldn't I?" said he fondly, and, having completed the blending, handed her the glass and feasted his eyes on her beautiful face.

"Some time I'll name something after you," she told him.

"Gee!" he exclaimed, putting his elbows on the bar and his chin in his hands. "I hope you will."

She found the concoction palatable and asked him of what it was composed.

"Everything that's sweet!" he assured her. "First I took the sweetest syrup—that's your disposition. Then I added those two cherries—those are your lips. Mint leaf-green—that's the way I turn when I see you look at somebody else. And"—pointing to the two straws in the glass—"there are your two pretty little—"

"Oh, Tommy, they're not that thin, are they?" she laughed.

"Malted egg flip!" barked an impatient man beside her.

"Yes, sir," said Tommy obediently, and, still talking to Peggy, proceeded to mix what he imagined to be the desired drink. In his absent-mindedness, however, he poured peppermint into the mixer with the egg he had broken into it, and, reaching to a shelf, added castor oil instead of liquid malt.

The man watched with growing horror. "You know, when I look at you," said Tommy to Peggy, "I don't know what I'm doing."

"No!" rasped the man, and pulled his hat down over his eyes, slid from his chair, and went off in haste.

"He's gone!" exclaimed Tommy. "He doesn't know what he's missed!"

The glass stood neglected on the counter while the two conversed. Egbert returned with the prescription made up, after he had removed the rival chemist's name from the bottle in the kitchen and substituted one of the "Sunshine" variety. Rather breathlessly he handed it to the waiting customer, charged two dollars, and took out a handkerchief to wipe his brow.

The customer departed, evidently quite satisfied. Egbert went to the bar.

"Whew!" he exclaimed. "Boy, that was a close shave! How are you, Peggy?"

Mrs. Talley, immediately Peggy had arrived, had issued from the kitchen to help serve. She smiled across at the three.

"Here's a drink for you," said Tommy, pointing to the neglected glassful of alleged malted egg flip. "It'll buck you up."

"Believe me, I need it," proclaimed Egbert, and he drained the glass. "Gosh, that's good!" he exclaimed, fanning himself with his handkerchief. "Don't neglect the business, Tommy."

Harry Watters and his thin-faced companion, Clarke, had reached Allison Avenue and had paused in a doorway only a few yards from the drug-store.

"Now you know what to do, don't you?" said Watters.

"Sure," nodded Clarke. "I go into the store, see you, look surprised, and say, 'Hallo, Mr. Watters, I haven't seen you for an age!'"

"That's right. And then I ask what you've been doing lately, and you tell me about the lemon extract. You've got it straight?"

"Straight?" chuckled Clarke. "Why, it's fifty per cent. alcohol."

"Never mind the wise cracks," grunted Watters. "I'm going on in— December 19th, 1931."

and don't forget to give me a little time to do some talking before you appear on the scene."

"Okay," responded Clarke, and sauntered off with his hands in his pockets while Watters made his way into the store, and hailed Peggy.

"Nice to see you here," he said. "I just dropped in to speak to Mrs. Talley."

"I'm sure she'll be glad to see you," Peggy decided, and she went with him to the very top of the bar where Mrs. Talley was now busy with plates and a Dutch-oven.

"There goes the one man depression!" growled Egbert to Tommy but Mrs. Talley greeted the visitor quite cheerfully.

"My word," said Watters, glancing around the store, "I really must congratulate you upon this marvellous transformation. Those two young gentlemen, Mr. Tanner and Mr. Higginbotham, are obviously men of real genius."

He had spoken loudly enough for the "two young gentlemen" to hear his words, and they looked at one another and smiled.

"Yes, and we're going to be able to meet the note on the first, Mr. Watters," declared Mrs. Talley delightedly. "That is, of course, if business keeps up."

Watters professed to be glad, for her sake; and then Clarke strolled in at the door, perched on a chair at the bar, and seemed suddenly to become aware of Watters' presence.

"Why, hallo, Mr. Watters!" he cried. "I haven't seen you for an age."

"Well, well," greeted the conspirator, "I'm glad to see you—you're looking fine."

"Your order, sir?" inquired Tommy. Clarke asked for a chocolate sundae, and while he was consuming it Watters joined him.

"By the way," he said, "how are you doing now?"

"Don't tell me you don't know?" laughed Clarke. "Remember that lemon syrup I was working on? Well, she's perfected—and I can tell you she's selling like wildfire. Why, I can't supply the demand. Every drug-store in town's crying for it. It's the newest, biggest flavour sensation in twenty years."

Watters satisfied himself with a side-glance that Egbert and Tommy were listening, and inquired:

"Well, would you listen to a proposition from my firm?"

"Not a chance!" said Clarke. "I offered it you once, remember."

"Well, we all make mistakes, you know—I'm going to come and see you about it. I'm not taking no for an answer."

He professed to have an urgent appointment, and went. Clarke ordered some sausage and mashed and plied his knife and fork. Egbert and Tommy whispered together for a while, and then Egbert sailed over to the eater.

"Nice weather we're having," said he.

"Not bad," admitted Clarke with his mouth full.

"Now, listen; what's the use of us trying to kid each other? I overheard what you told Watters about that new lemon syrup. We'd like to try some of it here."

Tommy, who had followed his partner, nodded emphatically, but Clarke waved the suggestion aside.

"What you don't realise," said he, "is that I'm twenty stores behind in delivery of that Pepo Lemon Syrup now."

"Slip in ahead on one delivery," urged Egbert. "Nobody'll be any the wiser. We'll push the stuff—give it some swell advertising on the radio."

December 19th, 1931.

Clarke chuckled.

"Say, you're a go-getter," he approved. "I'll give you credit for that! Well, I'm not a guy to interfere with a fellow that rolls up his sleeves and goes after what he wants. I'll let you have ten gallons."

"Slip it there, brother—slip it there!" cried Egbert, extending his hand. "I'll never forget you for this."

The two shook hands; Clarke finished his meal and offered payment, but Tommy would not accept any money. "That's on the house," he said.

Clarke thanked him gravely and went off.

"Well, son," said Egbert, striking an attitude, "did you see me hypnotise him? Am I a salesman? Son, I could sell a dead horse to a mounted policeman!"

Business having slackened temporarily, Tommy discussed the matter of the Pepo Lemon Syrup with Peggy.

"Isn't Egbert marvellous?" he exclaimed.

"You are, too, Tommy," she assured him, leaning over the bar so that their noses almost touched.

"You really think so?" he breathed.

"Gee, I like you an awful lot, Peggy."

"I like you an awful lot, too, Tommy," she informed him.

"Do you really?" He imprisoned her little hands and bent his head to kiss them; and he was in the act of kissing them when Chief of Police Morton, who had just crossed the threshold, saw what was happening and strode angrily forward.

"Daddy!" exclaimed Peggy, and tried to release her hands.

"That's the first time you've ever called me that!" laughed Tommy—and looked up. His face fell, his mouth opened, his eyes stared.

"Now see how fast you can get home!" barked Morton at his daughter.

"But, daddy—"

"Don't 'daddy' me! Get out of here!" rasped her father.

Egbert heard, blinked, and deserted a customer.

"Well, well, chief," said he, patting the bulky official on the arm, "this is a kick! Always glad to meet the forces of law and order. What'll you order, chief? What'll you order?"

"Nothing!" roared Morton.

"Have you met my partner, Mr. Thomas Tanner? A very efficient young man, chief."

Tommy looked modestly at his boots because he didn't like the glare in Morton's choleric blue eyes.

"If you want to continue with your efficiency, young man," said Morton fiercely, "you'd better keep away from my daughter!"

Peggy had obediently disappeared. Tommy, nervously clasping and unclasping his hands, murmured, "Yes, sir."

"Bah!" snorted Morton, and went out from the store like a human tornado.

The Effect of Lemon Syrup.

A FEW days later the promised ten gallons of Pepo Lemon Syrup arrived in a cask and was paid for spot cash. Egbert did not immediately put it on sale. In the first instance he had bills printed, show-cards hand-painted, and advertised the drink during the noonday and afternoon broadcast. The drink was to be supplied to customers on and after Monday, December 22nd.

Monday morning was memorable ever after in the annals of the Sunshine Drug Store—and in the lives of Tommy and Egbert. Despite Clarke's declaration that all the drug stores in Lockville were selling the concoction, the demand was not at first very great. But by noon the shop was thronged, and there was quite a struggle on the part of men who had already sampled the Pepo Lemon Syrup to get near the bar.

Tommy, unable to cope with the rising tide of trade, had to call on Egbert to neglect ordinary customers to assist him. The interior of the drug store became as noisy as a bear-garden.

"A lemon soda!" "Another lemon soda, please!" "Give me another, too!" "How about that lemon soda?"

"Another lemon soda—and plenty of syrup!" The shouts and cries and orders mingled and merged into a roar, and Tommy and Egbert were far too busy coping with custom to note particularly the effect of the new drink upon the customers who imbibed more than one.

At three o'clock in the afternoon, Egbert said worriedly to Tommy:

"If that fellow we sent out to find Clarke doesn't get back soon with fresh supplies we'll be all out of that lemon syrup."

"Yeah," said Tommy. "It must be great stuff—we'll have to try it one day."

"Shay," clamoured a vacant-eyed man, sprawling over the bar, "gimme an—anozzer l-l-l-lemon soda, will ya?"

"It's a repeater," confided Egbert to Tommy. "That fellow's had four already!"

Tommy and Egbert knew no peace, and the drawer of the cash register was never still. Pepo Lemon Syrup was evidently "it."

"These fellows must have been getting some bootleg spirit from somewhere," remarked Tommy innocently, viewing with a certain amount of dismay the more riotous of the clamourers for lemon soda.

He was at the cash register when Peggy entered the premises, and he immediately abandoned the thirsty crowd to talk to her.

"Hallo, Peggy," he said, holding her hand. "Gee, I thought the chief had locked you up."

"Would you have cared?" she asked in a low voice.

"Aw, you know better than to ask that."

Peggy became conscious of the crowd—and the noise. She gazed at the throng round the bar for a moment.

"It's great the way you boys have built up this drug store," she said.

"Everybody's talking about it. Pa says you must be awful smart, even if he doesn't like you."

(Continued on page 24.)

DO YOU LIKE ADVENTURE?

Thrilling Stories in Christmas Books.

Boys who delight in thrilling tales of adventure and school life are well provided for this year. You should make sure of getting a copy of either the CHAMPION (6/-), the BRITISH BOYS' ANNUAL (5/-), or the POPULAR BOOK OF BOYS' STORIES (2/6).

There is a thrill in practically every page of the first-named book. It is a great big budget of breath-catching stories of adventure, mystery and sport in every clime. Plenty of pictures, too, and coloured plates as well in this bumper book of excitement.

The BRITISH BOYS' ANNUAL is devoted mainly to stories of school, sport, mystery and adventure. It is a wonder budget of exciting tales written by well-known authors, and there are numerous illustrations, including several beautiful coloured plates.

The POPULAR BOOK OF BOYS' STORIES is a big book at a bargain price, and is remarkably fine value for 2/6. It is well illustrated and packed with the sort of stories boys like best.

No better gift could be imagined than one of these splendid books.

He wanted to be boss of gangland, eventually attained his ambition, then decided to quit—but there was no turning back. A thrill-loaded crook drama, starring Lew Ayres and Robert Elliott.

A Handful of Clouds

Paying the Penalty.

BARTY'S BILLIARDS HALL was situated above some half-dozen shops in Harper Street, which was perhaps the most notorious street in Charlesworth. Here resided many of the racketeers who infested the city, men who terrorised the populace with their frequent use of the gun.

A heated word or two or some trivial grievance and guns would bark viciously, exacting a grim toll. And often among the casualties of these gang feuds would be an innocent citizen or two, unfortunates who happened to be in the line of the leaden messengers of death.

On this particular day in December the underworld of the city seemed strangely quiet. Not a single shot had been heard in the streets and it was now nearly nine o'clock.

The calm before the storm. So said half the populace, which included the entire police force, who knew the gangsters only too well.

But the minutes ticked by and still peace reigned. Ten o'clock came, and it was as a distant church clock was striking the hour that a closed-in car drew up at the entrance to the billiards hall and a man sprang out of the back to the sidewalk. Of medium height, he was young and with a cruel, thin face from which grey-green eyes gleamed with a murderous expression.

"You know what to do?" He turned and thrust his head in at the open window at the front of the car where a shadowy figure sat behind the steering-wheel. There came a murmur of assent, and the young man smiled grimly. "Right, then see you make no mistake." He jerked a thumb towards the back of the vehicle. "Red is well acquainted with his part of this little affair, see?"

The other nodded, then the thin-faced one crossed the pavement and sped up the stairs that led to the billiards hall. In at the door of the spacious room he went, his sinister eyes searching the faces of the men who were playing at the tables and the faces of those who were clustering around watching those who wielded the cues.

Eventually he located the man he sought, an ugly-faced ruffian who had just made a shot on a distant table and failed to sink the object ball. Another second and he was confronting the fellow, whispering in his ear:

"Oh, yeah!" The unprepossessing rascal set aside his cue and his face took on a brutal expression. "Where is Red, then?"

"Outside in the car, Monk, and Spike's with him," came the sibilant answer. "Now get moving. I'll take your knock—save spoiling the game."

"Okay with me," Monk turned to the three men with whom he had been playing a four-hand of snooker. "Say, boys, Mileaway'll take my place. Mind?"

They shook their heads and, as Steve Mileaway took up the discarded cue, Monk strode quickly from the hall. Down the stairs he went two at a time, darted across the pavement, and dived into the waiting car, the door of which was swung open for him.

Next second the door was slammed and the vehicle slid away from the kerb, gathering speed rapidly. A short run, then it slid to a standstill before a small house in a quiet and deserted street.

"You all set, Red?" Monk watched the man who was with him in the back of the car draw out from under the seat an ugly-looking machine-gun, then, smiling grimly, he opened the door of the limousine and jumped out. One long stride and he was beside the driver, as sinister-looking a rascal as himself, whose hat-brim was pulled low over cruel grey eyes. "Spike, don't you forget to beat it like hell the moment I shout, see?"

The other nodded, then after a quick glance round to make sure there was no one about Monk ran to the door of the small house and knocked loudly. A woman answered his summons, and nodded in recognition.

"You want Whitey?" she inquired. "Sure I do." The rascal gave her a disarming smile. "You might tell him that I want him urgent like."

She said she would do so, and closed the door. A sneer curling his cruel thin lips, Monk returned to the car, climbed inside, and noted with satisfaction that Red had the machine-gun in position, trained on the door he had just left.

A moment or two of waiting, then the door of the small house was again opened and a man came into view.

"Now, Red, let the skunk have it!" came Monk's rasping voice. "Double-cross us, huh? Well, this is where he gets his in plenty!"

Scarce were the vicious words out of his mouth than the quiet was shattered by the staccato reports of the machine-gun belching out its leaden bail of death. A terrified shriek as the victim at the first dread note of the gun, tried frantically to leap back into the safety of the hallway behind him. But all in vain. Next second half a dozen bullets slammed into his breast—ling body and he sagged to the ground in a pitiable heap.
December 19th, 1931.

Their fell work accomplished, the gunmen sank back in the soft cushions of the car as it suddenly shot away from the kerb, a woman's wild shrieks coming faintly to their ears. The distracted wife of the dead man who, guessing the meaning of the gunfire, had come scampering frantically down the stairs of her little home.

Her shoulders heaving convulsively, tears streaming down her ashen cheeks, she drooped pathetically over her man, calling down threats upon the killers. And there the police found her when, seconds later, they rushed to the spot to investigate the sounds of the gunfire.

"Who Killed Whitey Eckhart?"

A ROOM on the first floor of police headquarters. Seated at a large oak desk was a tall, well-built man of middle age with piercing grey eyes, brown hair that was inclined to be curly and a chin that denoted strength and a great determination.

Captain Pat O'Grady, the one man in all Charlesworth that every gangster feared. A brave and amazingly clever detective who, once he had marked down a crook to be brought to justice, never rested till the task was accomplished.

"Yes, boys, though his wife won't speak for fear of the consequences, I feel sure Whitey Eckhart was killed by his own gang of rats." O'Grady spoke very slowly as if carefully choosing his words. But those who knew him were aware that that deep, almost drawing voice was characteristic of the man. The four plain-clothes men who were with him hung on his every word as he continued. "You see, I've information that Whitey tipped off Rocco to a lorry of booze that Louie Ricarno was running out to the West Hill Roadhouse the other night. That lorry was ambushed and the two men aboard badly damaged. What's more likely than that Ricarno got wise to what happened and gave Whitey the works? That's how I figure it, and I'm hoping this time that I'll be able to—"

The telephone bell broke into his words, and he snatched up the receiver, clapped it to his ear.

"Hallo! O'Grady speaking. What's that? Yeah. Send him right in." The captain's eyes gleamed from beneath narrowed lids as he replaced the receiver of the phone. Quickly he returned his gaze to his men. "You boys get out. You see, I've a visitor coming up and I want to be alone with him. It's Ricarno. Hawkes and Cox picked him up for me. Smart lads, those, for I only gave them instructions half an hour ago."

The four filed from the room, and almost immediately the door was reopened to admit an upstanding young man, neatly dressed in a grey lounge suit and a grey felt hat. Good-looking he was, too, and neatly brushed dark hair was revealed when he swept off his hat and calmly placed it on a corner of O'Grady's desk, his smiling blue eyes meeting those of the captain unflinchingly.

Strange that such a refined and well-bred youngster should be one of the most clever and daring racketeers that ever menaced the city of Charlesworth. But such was Louie Ricarno, and this boy—he was little more than that—was now marked down by Captain O'Grady to be brought to justice.

"Glad to see you, Louie." O'Grady motioned to a chair. "Sit down. Make yourself comfortable."

"My, aren't we polite." Louie gave a gay laugh. Well he knew why he had been brought here, but the knowledge perturbed him not a bit. In a battle of wits the boy prided himself with being capable of holding his own. Coolly he produced a gold cigarette-case, opened it and held it out to the captain. "Have a gasper, Pat?"

"No, thanks. I don't smoke that brand." O'Grady waited while Louie lit himself one of the cigarettes, then he rose from his chair, his eyes fixed challengingly on those of the boy. "Tell me, Louie. What do you know about that surprise party on the South Side?"

"Surprise party?" Louie's eyebrows lifted in affected amazement. "I'm afraid I don't get you. What exactly do you mean, Pat?"

"Playing the little innocent, huh?" Pat grunted. "Don't know Whitey Eckhart was bumped off last night, huh?"

"You don't say so!" Calmly the young racketeer flicked the ash from his cigarette. "That why you asked me up here?"

But O'Grady made no direct answer to the question.

"What d'you know about that deal?" he shot out with surprising fierceness.

"Not much, sweetheart." There was a merry twinkle in Louie's blue eyes. It appealed to his particular sense of humour to play with O'Grady in this way. "I only know that Whitey Eckhart was a real bad lad. You agree, don't you, Pat?"

But this question O'Grady also ignored. How to get this self-satisfied young crook to make a slip that would warrant him clapping him behind prison bars? A difficult task, Pat knew. But he wasn't finished yet. He would try a different line of conversation in the hope of achieving success.

"Louie, it's just too bad to see a swell kid like you in the booze racket. Why on earth don't you get out of it when the breaks are in your favour?" He noticed with satisfaction that Louie's lip curled. Perhaps he would blaze out at him in a moment and in his torrent of abuse say something that would condemn him. "You ought to know that the best you'll get if you stick to it is the worst of it. Why be a sap?"

"A darned pretty piece!" Louie was not to be ensnared. The rage he had felt at Pat's words had been effectually mastered. "See here, Pat." He grinned provokingly. "I'm real sorry for you. It's your job to clear up the law breakers. The dickens of a task, for if you'll pardon me saying so, you ain't smart enough."

"Yeah?" O'Grady shot him a ferocious look, smarting under the taunt. But he was not to be outdone by a mere boy. "How in blazes you think I can be that smart when you've got all the brains, huh?"

"Now, now, don't get riled." Louie wagged his cigarette reprovingly at the captain, then a peculiar gleam came into his eyes. "Look here, Pat. If you would set to and clear out Rocco's gang and not be so darned tough on your friends I could give you enough of these things to paper your kids' nursery. Look fine for Christmas decorations, take it from me."

Louie thrust the wad of dollar bills that he had taken from his breast-pocket under O'Grady's nose. Quickly the captain made a grab at them, but Louie, with a grin, jerked them out of reach.

"Getting smart at last, huh?" he taunted.

"No," growled Pat. "I just wanted to see the serial numbers."

"You do, huh?" There was fierce anger in Louie's eyes now. Almost savagely he rained the dollar bills back into his pocket. "Listen to me, you copper-headed mug. I'm no thief. My racket is beer, and you know it. I'm in a legitimate business, I am."

"Sure you are," Pat mocked him. "You're just selling that nice creamy beer to the poor working man with a few murders thrown in for his entertainment, aren't you?"

He came round his desk and confronted Louie, his whole attitude one of menace. Quickly the boy snatched up his hat and stepped back.

"What you trying to do?" With an effort Louie again controlled his anger. "Endeavouring to get me sore so I'll spill something, huh? Well, there's nix doing, Pat, so there. But you'll get a chance to read all you want to know when I write the story of my life at three-fifty bucks a copy."

"What, you going to do that? Well, well, you surprise me." There was contempt in Pat's voice. "But take my tip, Louie. Don't write the last chapter till the night you go to the chair. It'll be more realistic."

"So you think that's where I'll land?" Louie laughed carelessly as Pat solemnly nodded his head. "Rot! I'm too fly to land on the wrong side of the law, and you know it."

Pat shrugged. There was no doubt in his mind that he would have his work cut out to bring in this boy. He was immune to questioning—that was obvious. He must be caught red-handed, or one of his gang be made to "put him away."

"Who killed Whitey Eckhart?" As Louie turned towards the door Pat clamped a heavy hand on his shoulder and twirled him round. "You tell me that, you little runt?"

But the element of surprise did not have the least effect on the cool-headed youngster. Instead, he broke into a grin.

"Ha, ha, wouldn't you like to know, sweetheart!" he chuckled—then flung himself free of the detective's grasp and marched from the room.

A Strange Meeting.

THOUGH he was courageous and possessed more than his fair share of brains, Louie Ricarno felt strangely uneasy after his visit to Pat O'Grady's office. Pat was after him, and, sicker that he was, Louie felt that the time would surely come when a slip would be made and he would find himself in the inexorable hands of the detective.

That was the last thing the young racketeer wanted to happen. Not that he feared for his own safety, but there was his kid brother, Jackie, away at the Military Academy at Fairfield. The two had not a single relative in the world, and Louie knew that if anything should happen to him the kid would be desolate—with no one to pay his fees at the college, or to provide him with food and clothes.

It was as he was thus ruminating the day following his visit to O'Grady that he had a brain-wave. A way to ensure keeping on the right side of the law. Instantly the shadows vanished from his good-looking face, and, without loss of time, he set about putting his idea into practice. The result was that that same evening some hundred men, all with the stamp of the criminal upon their unprepossessing faces, assembled in the large room over a warehouse in Sanders Street that was used by Louie as a council chamber.

A strange meeting, indeed, for the men represented every known gang in the city. There was the Rocco gang, the one led by an undersized rascal called the Midget, and some score other organisations. Without exception, all wondered why they had been called here by Louie Ricarno. It was for a friendly little chat, so they had been informed by the young man's henchmen, but, in case of accidents, they parked their guns.

When Louie entered the place, surrounded by his personal bodyguard that included his chief lieutenant, Steve Mileaway, there was an immediate stir among the waiting gangsters. Hands flashed instinctively to jacket pockets in case of treachery.

"Order, please!" Mileaway raised his hand as Louie sat down at a table that was set at one end of the room. Silence descended at once. "Now, boys," resumed Mileaway, "I ask you to give Louie Ricarno a fair hearing, as he has something real important to say to you—something which I think you will agree is for the benefit of you all."

Louie got to his feet as his lieutenant stepped back, and his keen blue eyes scanned the evil faces in front of him. All of them bitter enemies of his, but just then the knowledge worried him not at all. Enemies were to become friends now—under his scheme peace was to reign in the underworld. Gun battles to be a thing of the past—everyone to work in complete harmony and accord.

"Well, there are a lot of you mugs that I've never seen before," Louie began in a voice that would have done credit to a senator in congress, "so I thought it was about time we got acquainted. But that's only half the reason for this meeting. Now, most of you fellows knew me when I was a kid in short pants. A runner for a tough mob of South Side racketeers who've now migrated. A punk who knew how to keep his mouth shut."

"Yeah," came the sneering voice of Rocco, a dark, swarthy man with narrow beady eyes, Louie's most dangerous rival. "But when we want history we read books, Ricarno, see?"

There was a burst of coarse laughter which Louie allowed to die down before resuming.

"Of course, I forgot you're something of a student, Rocco, so I'll get down to brass tacks." The youngster returned the fierce look Rocco gave him, then allowed his gaze again to take in the whole assembly. "Now, boys, we're all in one racket or another, and just lately there's been a darned sight too much double-crossing going on. One mob crashing into another mob's territory. No, no, don't interrupt, Rocco, please. We're in big business. The only thing wrong with it is that it needs organising and it needs a boss I'm taking over both jobs. I'm going to—"

"You're whatter?" Rocco was on his feet in an instant, eyes gleaming ferociously, his hand firmly gripping the butt of his concealed gun, while angry voices sounded around him declaiming Louie's cool nerve.

"As I was saying, I'm taking over both jobs," Louie, calm as ever, a cynical smile hovering around the corners of his mouth, raised his voice to make himself heard above the din. "I'm going to lay this town out in zones. I'll give each mob what I think is coming to it, and not one inch more. Get that? Each gang'll back me up and I'll take care of everything."

It sounded quite a good proposition to some, but not to others. Rocco, considered by himself the big noise in gangland, again jumped to his feet.

"Piffle!" he roared and half dragged his gun from his pocket.

"You think so, huh?" Louie froze him with a look. "Well, just you think it over and you'll see—"

"Hey, wait a minute!" The Midget waved his hand frantically to draw Louie's attention. "How much we gotta pay you for bossing the show?"

"H'm!" Louie rubbed his smooth chin, then shook his head. "Well, I hadn't thought that out. Still, I'll decide on that later."

"And supposing we agree and pay you for organisation," the Midget persisted, "what are we going to do if some mug crashes another guy's territory and hi-jacks his stuff, the same as was done to me last week?"

"My dear Midget, what do we always do with rats?" Louie said meaningly.

"I get you." The Midget bared his teeth in a grin. "So you're taking care of that, too?"

"Sure," Louie nodded vigorously. "I'm putting the beer racket on a big business basis, and that covers everything. If you fellows have any sense you'll see that my proposition is for your own good. Everything hereafter running smoothly, no more trouble that might land you in the jug, and big money coming your way as easy as if you were backing winners. Well, what do you say?"

"Splendid!" The Midget for one was impressed. Quickly he got to his feet and faced the others. "Let's get together, boys, just like Louie says. What do you say, huh?"

The majority were agreeable. Among those who were not was Rocco, who was still smarting under a recent raid made on one of his booze lorries by Louie's own gang.

"I say it's piffle!" Rocco snarled. "And if you fellows agree to it you're a lot of simps. Why, it's just a dodge of Ricarno's to swipe up easy money."

Louie's eyes blazed at him dangerously.

"Just say that again, Rocco!" he rasped. "You see, I didn't quite get the last crack."

"Like me to put it into writing?" Rocco spat out.

In the fury that possessed him he strode to the table and confronted Louie threateningly. But the young racketeer only smiled, for, with a quick movement, one of his personal bodyguard had slid up behind Rocco and a deadly automatic, cunningly concealed from the eyes of the assembly by a soft felt hat, was levelled at Rocco's back.

"My dear Rocco," Louie said in mocking tones, "I wouldn't dream of putting you to so much trouble."

"No? Well, get this!" Rocco whipped out his own gun. "I'll run my own business. You hear me? I don't need no punk like you telling me nothing. For why? Because I'm just as big as you are, and bigger. When one man's going to run this town, I'll be him, see? Now, you tell the mob here I'm right. Go on, tell 'em—tell 'em!"

"Pretty hot in here, isn't it?" Louie shot a sly glance at Mileaway, who was

"My dear Rocco," Louie said in mocking tones. "I wouldn't dream of putting you to so much trouble."

seated near a window whose green blind was drawn.

"Yeah, and it's going to be hotter!" raged Rocco, his finger curling round the trigger of his gun. "You going to tell—"

His words snapped off short as he felt a sudden prod in the small of his back. The gun, shielded by the felt hat, threatened him, causing him almost to drop in sheer panic.

"Yes, you're right, Rocco, it's certainly getting a darn sight hotter now." Again Louie glanced at Mileaway out of the corners of his eyes. "Open that window, will you, Steve, and give us a chance to cool down."

In a flash Mileaway seized the cord of the green blind, jerked on it, and let the blind run up on its roller. Next second there came a startled gasp from the assembled crooks as they saw the deadly muzzle of a machine-gun that was set on the fire-escape stairs beyond the window. Behind the weapon was a grim-faced man whose finger was on the trigger, while beside him was another member of Louie's gang with a rifle held ready in his hands.

"How do you like it—sucker?" Louie grinned mockingly into Rocco's startled face. "I ought to give you a little of that heat for luck. But you just put away that toy of yours. It's too darned small." Louie waited while a trembling hand replaced the gun, then he turned to the meeting in general. "You fellows heard what I said at the opening of this meeting, and what I said then goes just as it is. Any mug that don't think so will be treated to the swellest funeral that ever stopped traffic. You have two minutes to decide your fate. My administration or—"

He shrugged his shoulders meaningly. "We agree, Louie!" came in a concerted shout from the entire assembly.

Trouble on the Horizon.

FOR the whole of six months peace reigned in the city, thanks to Louie Ricarno's wonderful organisation of the bootlegging industry. The various gangs pursued their trading of illicit liquor, and never once were their recognised territories trespassed upon by rival factions—never once was the sound of gunfire heard in streets that had hitherto been the scene of much bloodshed and slaughter.

Captain Pat O'Grady, together with the entire police force, was astounded, but not one of them expected this amazing metamorphosis to last indefinitely. The break would come as surely as would the crack of doom.

Another month passed with the peace still unswerving. By this time Louie Ricarno was a very wealthy young man, but for all that he was dissatisfied—sick of the hum-drum life he was leading. Like Napoleon, whom he made his fetish, he craved for fresh worlds to conquer. There was his life story that he had promised himself he would write one day. With the thought came inspiration. He had long since been in love with Doris Chester, whom Mileaway had introduced to him at a dance. Why not marry, settle down and write that book?

To think with Louie was to act. He consulted Doris, and because she and Mileaway had their avaricious eyes on the young man's wealth, the girl accepted him. All that money would be theirs if Louie met his end in some gang feud, as they felt he surely would before he was much older.

So the wedding was solemnised in great secrecy, after which Louie called a meeting of every gang in his organisation.

December 19th, 1931.

"Boys, I've got some news for you and only a little time to say it in." Louie smiled as he saw the puzzled expressions that came into the unprepossessing faces before him. "Since our last meeting everything's been going smooth and rosy. You'll admit that, huh? I've put the beer racket on a 'business basis like I promised you, and now I'm quitting the game. No, no, don't protest any of you. To-day I married, and from now on it's the quiet life for me. In future my old pal Mileaway will be the big boss."

Dissenting voices arose at once, but Louie paid no heed. With a wave of farewell he sped to the door of the council chamber and was gone.

Five minutes later, with Doris beside him, he was driving his luxurious Lincoln at a steady pace for distant Florida, where he had booked by cable a six-room furnished house for his bride and himself.

On the way they stopped at the Military Academy at Fairfield, which was eight miles out of Charlesworth, and visited Louie's twelve-year-old brother, Jackie, an upstanding little chap with fair curly hair and bright blue eyes.

A happy hour together, with Jackie fairly lionising Louie, thanking him times out of number for the magnificent sword he had sent him on his last birthday. The boy simply bubbled with high spirits, and did not forget to show his appreciation of the fact that he now had a sister when Louie confessed to him that Doris was his wife.

Tea followed in the large dining-hall with Jackie and his fellow-cadets, then Louie and Doris continued on their journey to Florida.

Thereafter the weeks slipped by with Louie happy and contented, busily writing his book, "The Life Story of a Young Racketeer." But as he wrote on, conjuring up his daring exploits and the terrible risks he had run in the bootlegging game, he decided that the title he had chosen was much too tame, and changed it for the far stronger one, "The Doorway to Hell."

So the story progressed, and never once did Louie recall those grim words spoken by Captain Pat O'Grady that day in his office at police headquarters: "Don't write the last chapter till the night you go to the chair!"

If he had recollected them, Louie would no doubt have laughed them to scorn, assuring himself that never again would he be exposed to the grave risks of the past.

But alas for Louie, the storm clouds were gathering fast. Back in the city he had left, gang warfare had again broken out, more terrible than before. The streets echoed once more to the vicious sputter of machine-gun fire, to the cries and moans not only of brutal gangsters but of innocent citizens who were unfortunate enough to be caught in the line of fire.

With Louie's departure from Charlesworth there had sounded the death knell to the wonderful organisation he had achieved. Harmony was forgotten, gangs encroached on one another's territories, ambushed each other's booze trucks, and nothing Mileaway could say or do could stem the vicious outburst of warfare that followed.

"Say, Mileaway, you gotta get Louie to come back!"

Mileaway faced an angry crowd of racketeers and thugs in the council chamber in the city underworld—men who had been strong partisans of Louie's organisation and who, with this sudden renewal of gang hostility, sorely missed his wonderful leadership.

"That's what I say," the Midget's voice was quite emphatic. "I was hijacked for twenty barrels of—"

"Aw, stop your squawking!" Mileaway's face was pale and haggard. He had thought himself on velvet when he had taken over complete control of the organisation Louie had founded. But now he knew differently. Fellows like Rocco and Slim Sullivan wouldn't accept him as their leader, and he had neither the personality nor the strength of character to keep them in subjection that Louie had. "Ain't I doing all I can, Midget, to—"

"Yeah. But twenty barrels is twenty barrels." The Midge thrust out his jaw pugnaciously. "You tell me who's going to make them good. Now, if Louie were hero what would he do? Why, he'd—"

"Listen!" Mileaway was at his wits' end to know how to appease the infuriated gangsters. Supposing they were to turn on him? He trembled at the very thought. "If you feel so tough about it, Midget, why don't you go out and take a slug at somebody?"

"That ain't the idea," Jack Hyams, nicknamed Hymie, spat in disgust. "Louie put up a proposition, and we agreed to it. We paid him for protection and what has he done? Given us the breeze!"

"Yeah, he's turned rat!" The Midget laughed scornfully. "Got scared of the whole blamed thing. It was too big for him, and he scuttled for a funk hole. That's what it was."

"You think so?" Mileaway fingered his tie nervously, for he knew that many hidden hands among the gangsters were clutched about the butts of guns. "Well, let me tell you you've got Louie all wrong, Midget. He was never scared of anything."

"Then why can't you get him to come back?" cried an ugly-looking ruffian who was known by the name of Gumpy, and was a follower of the Rocco gang.

"Because he's through with the racket," Mileaway explained. "I've sent him telegrams and letters. But it's no use. There's not a chance of getting him back."

"Then if he's not scared, why did he quit the racket?" snarled Hymie. "You tell me that."

"For two reasons, if you want to know," Mileaway volunteered. "He's goofy on Doris and doesn't want her mixed up in anything fishy. And that goes for that kid brother of his in that military school down in Fairfield."

"Brother!" The Midget whistled in surprise. The knowledge that Louie had a brother was new to him. "You mean to say that Louie has a kid brother, Mileaway?"

"Sure I do!" came the answer. A cunning gleam flashed into the Midget's close-set brown eyes as an idea occurred to him.

"Well," he said, addressing Mileaway, "Louie belongs back here, and I'm going to find a way to—"

"If you don't watch your step, you darned fool," Mileaway interrupted with surprising vehemence, "you're going to find a way to treat yourself to a handful of clouds!"

"Yeah!" The Midget got to his feet and advanced threateningly towards Mileaway, who quickly clapped a hand to his gun, while every gangster present waited for the storm to break. "Tell me, Mileaway," the Midget inquired in a voice as cold as steel, "just exactly what do you mean by a handful of clouds?"

"I mean the kind that come out of the business end of a gun." Mileaway's finger was curled round the trigger of the automatic in his jacket pocket, ready to shoot. With a forced show of bravado he leered into the Midget's face. "Do you get me, Midget?" he said meaningly.

"Why, sure." There was a gasp of astonishment from the entire assembly as the little crook, instead of showing fierce resentment of Mileaway's threat, turned suddenly on his heel and came back to his confederates who were grouped in a corner of the room. A nod of his head brought them instantly to their feet, then they followed their leader as he went towards the door.

The Midget's resolve was taken—he was determined that Louie Ricarno should return to Charlesworth to renew his former activities in the underworld.

Tragedy.

THAT night a terrible gun-battle was waged in the city between the gangs led by Slim Sullivan and the Midget. It started with Sullivan's men ambushing one of the Midget's trucks that happened to have a strong guard upon it, a dozen men who fought back grimly, wreaking havoc among the attackers. Ten minutes the fight waged before the police arrived to quell the disturbance, but by that time five men lay stretched in the road, grim testimony to the terrible nature of the conflict.

There was no stopping the gang feuds now unless Louie Ricarno could be prevailed upon to return and take the matter in hand. Mileaway was convinced on that score, and so next morning he got on the long-distance telephone to Florida.

He could never hope to make big money as boss of the underworld now. But there was still Louie's wealth that he and Doris coveted. Once get the youngster back among all the turmoil and bloodshed there was every chance that that money would soon be theirs.

First he spoke to Doris, who then handed the receiver to Louie. But Louie only laughed when Mileaway implored him to return to quell the trouble that had broken out amongst the gangs of the city since his departure.

"Nothing doing, Mileaway." There was no mistaking the finality in the youngster's voice. "If the mobs have busted up the good work I did for them it's not my fault. They can go to blazes!"

"But, Louie," Mileaway protested, "you don't know how tough it's gettin' around here. Why, some of the mobs are talking about coming down to Florida to bring you back."

"Oh, are they!" There was a note of menace in Louie's voice now. "Then you tell the mob of double-crossers that if they think they can take me to come down here and try it. Then tell 'em that the first one that shows his ugly face around this burg will get a load of Florida sunshine. You get me?"

But Louie did not wait to hear what Mileaway had to say to that. With a violent oath he slammed the telephone receiver back on its hook, then snatched up the lighted cigarette he had rested in an ashtray that stood on the table beside the phone.

"Louie, dear." Doris sidled up to him, placed an arm around his shoulders. Because of the affection she bore Mileaway and their designs on Louie's money she was anxious for Louie to return to Charlesworth. "You shouldn't have lost your temper that way. Mileaway is right. You belong back there, and anyway, I'm sick of this infernal place."

"Oh, you are, huh?" Angrily Louie flung free of her encircling arm and faced her with fiercely blazing eyes. "What have you got to be sick of? Are you one of 'em, too? Have you got so much crime in you it won't come out? Well, I'm through with the game. I told you that when we got married, and nothing will make me change my mind."

She opened her mouth to make some kind of protest to his venomous outburst, but before she could utter a single word he stamped from the room and slammed the door violently behind him.

Meanwhile the Midget was acting on the idea he had conceived as a means of forcing Louie to return to control the organisation he had founded. At about the same time that the youngster was speaking to Mileaway over the telephone, a car was drawn up in the road outside the gates of the Military Academy in Fairfield. The Midget was at the wheel, while standing beside him and leaning negligently against the side of the car was Rocco's underling, Gympy.

Both were interestedly watching a squad of cadets who were going through a course of drill just inside the college gates.

"Do you think it's safe to do it?" Gympy suddenly inquired as he ground the butt-end of a cigarette under his heel.

"Why, sure!" the Midget said impatiently. "We ain't going to hurt the kid, are we?"

"We'd better not." Gangster though he was, Gympy had very little pluck. "I hate to think what Louie'd do if anything should happen to his brother. Mileaway told me the kid's his all—that Louie's more fond of him than life itself."

"Can it, you blamed misery!" The Midget's eyes blazed angrily at Gympy. "Ain't it the only way we got of bringing Louie back to town? We take the boy along of us, then when Louie hears he's disappeared he'll come back fast enough. I tell you it's going to be—Here! Quick! The kids have been dismissed. Call one of 'em and see if you can locate the kid brother. Don't forget he goes by the name of Jackie Lamarr—that's what Mileaway told me."

Gympy lounged to the academy gates and interrogated a small boy who stood just inside readjusting a puttee that had come unfastened. Of course, he knew Jackie Lamarr. He would tell him he was wanted. The youth scuttled away and Gympy returned to the car, winked at the Midget, then opened the door to the back of the vehicle.

Presently Jackie appeared at the school gates, and with a puzzled frown on his good-looking little face he approached the car as Gympy beckoned.

"Hallo, captain!" cried Gympy, placing an arm around the youngster's shoulders, while the Midget raised his hand in salute.

"Hallo!" Jackie responded. "You Jackie Lamarr?" inquired the Midget, with a smile that was meant to be disarming, though in point of fact it was twisted and repulsive.

The boy nodded doubtfully, for there was something about these two men that did not invite confidence.

"Well, Jackie," the Midget went on, "your brother Louie sent us along to fetch you."

"You killed Gympy and you had to get the Midget or he'd have got you!"

"Louie?" Jackie exclaimed, and at mention of his brother's name all his doubts vanished.

"Sure! He's just got back from Florida. He ain't feeling any too good, and he wants to see you." The Midget leaned over the side of the car and caught at Jackie's arm. "Come on, get in the car, boy!"

Back came Jackie's suspicions with a rush. This man seemed far too anxious to get him in the car for his liking.

"Oh," Jackie said in as calm a tone as he could manage, "I'd rather wait until I hear from my brother personally."

"Now, now, Jackie, it's quite on the level!" The Midget bit his lip as he sensed the boy's suspicions. "Come on, jump in. We'll take you to your brother, see?"

But Jackie did not move, and at a wink from the Midget Gympy caught at the youngster's arms.

"Here, let me go!" Jackie cried in alarm.

Desperately he writhed in Gympy's grasp, managed to break free, and darted wildly down the road just as a lorry swung out of a side turning. There came a hoarse voice yelling a frantic warning, a screeching of hastily applied brakes. But too late. The heavy lorry was upon the fleeing youngster even as its driver strove desperately to slacken speed. Down went Jackie with a terrified shriek as the bonnet of the vehicle struck him with violent impact.

Came the horrified cries of those who had witnessed the accident, then a white-faced crowd surrounded the broken little figure that lay so still in the dusty road with the front wheels of the now stationary lorry almost touching it. There sounded sobbing, too, for several of Jackie's fellow cadets had seen all that had happened from the academy gates, and the sight had appalled them.

Then, above all other sound, came the roar of a motor-car as the Midget and Gympy, thoroughly alarmed that they should have been the indirect cause of the accident, sped away from the scene.

Well the two rascals knew that their lives would be forfeit should Louie Ricarno get to know that it was really through them that his kid brother had rushed to his death.

The Telegram.

WHEN he heard what had led to Jackie's death the Major of the Military Academy promptly telephoned to police headquarters in Charlesworth, the nearest big town. Mention of the victim's name, together with the information that the little fellow had been running away from two men who were evidently trying to kidnap him in a car, was all that was needed to arouse Captain Pat O'Grady's interest.

Half an hour later Pat was at the academy questioning the boys who had witnessed the accident, showing them a batch of photographs that included every crook in and around Charlesworth. And two of the pictures were pointed to by the boys as being the portraits of the men who had spoken to Jackie outside the college gates.

Pat smiled grimly as, some little while later, he left the academy in his car. The Midget and Gympy! What had been the reason behind their attempted kidnapping of little Jackie? A diabolical way if it had been their intention to pay off a grievance against Louie Ricarno through his kid brother.

Well, he had got something on the Midget and Gympy now, and the evidence he could bring against them was sufficient to put them away for a long spell. Two thugs less to terrorise Charlesworth. Pat certainly had good reason to feel satisfied just then.

At about the same time that the Major of the Military Academy got upon the telephone to acquaint police headquarters with the mysterious circumstances that had led to little Jackie's death, Louie Ricarno was hastily dashing off the last few sheets of his life's history.

Presently the door opened and Doris entered the room. He glanced round, and not noticing the telegram she held in her hand, gave her a pleasant smile, completely forgetful of the fact that only a short time before he had lost his temper with her.

"Say, kid," he said, "what's the Latin word they put at the end of books?"

"Finis." Doris approached the desk at which he sat, and arched her eyebrows in surprise. "But you don't mean to say that you're actually through with your book, Louie?"

"Sure I do." He got upon his feet, swelling out his chest with pardonable pride. "You see, it had to be finished to-day, for there's a guy coming to read it in an hour or so—a publisher, you know."

She handed him the telegram then, and he took it with little interest.

"So this concludes the life of a gangster and begins the life of a man." There was the semblance of a sneer in the girl's voice. "Finis! Gee, that's swell! I'd have—" She broke off, startled, as a violent imprecation burst from Louie's lips. Bewildered eyes gazed at the youngster's suddenly white face, travelled to the trembling hand that held the buff-coloured telegraph form. "Louie, what in heaven's name is the matter? What—"

The shrill note of the telephone-bell broke into her words, and she sped to the table on which the instrument reposed. For a moment or two she listened to a voice at the other end of the wire, then, still clasping the receiver to her ear, she turned to Louie, who still stood beside his writing-desk as if rooted to the spot.

"Louie," she called, "it's the man from the Atlas Publishing Company. He wants to know if he can come over right now to read your book?"

A moment's silence, during which the telegraph form fluttered from Louie's numbed fingers, then—

"Tell him it's not finished yet!" he said in a voice charged with deadly menace.

Quickly Doris conveyed the message to the man at the other end of the line, then with a puzzled frown she returned to the desk and picked up the fallen telegraph form. On it she read:

"Brother killed in accident. Caused through two men attempting to kidnap him. Come at once.—Major, Military Academy, Fairfield."

"My heavens!" was all the girl could say.

Gympy Pays the Price.

FIVE days later Louie Ricarno, dressed in black save for his soft grey felt hat, came wearily into the sitting-room of the expensive, furnished flat he had rented in the residential quarter of Derwent, and sank heavily into a chair.

"Any luck?" inquired Mileaway, who had been awaiting Louie's return from nearby Charlesworth.

"Yeah," came the listless answer. "Plenty. I got it all from O'Grady's friend in the tobacco store. You see that guy's in Pat's confidence."

"Who did it, Louie?" Mileaway eagerly asked.

But Louie made no reply. Instead, he took up the receiver of the telephone that stood on the table at his elbow and gave a number to the operator at the exchange. A moment later and his connection was made.

"Hallo, is Rocco there?" Louie inquired, a fierce gleam flashing into his eyes.

"Rocco?" reiterated Mileaway. "Did he—"

"No, he didn't do it." Louie slowly shook his head, then sat bolt upright as a familiar voice came to his ear. "That you, Rocco? It is? Well, this is Louie Ricarno. You seen anything of Gympy or the Midget lately? You have? Well, that's grand. Now you listen here. I want you to have Gympy in front of your place to-night at nine o'clock. What? Never you mind what's the idea. You have him in front of your place to-night at nine o'clock, or by hades it'll go hard for you, see?"

"Okay," came Rocco's voice, and with that Louie rang off, a grim smile playing around the corners of his set mouth.

"So Gympy was one of 'em. And the other the Midget, just as I thought." Mileaway flicked the ash from his cigarette, then glanced at his wrist-watch. "It's after eight now, Louie. Want me to come along?"

"No, I'm taking care of that dirty hound myself." Louie ground his teeth savagely. "You stay here and keep Doris company."

That suited the fickle Mileaway down to the ground, and as Louie strode from the room he settled himself in the comfortable settee to wait for the girl who was in the bed-room changing her dress. She put in an appearance a few minutes later, and the two took advantage of Louie's absence to indulge in a mild flirtation and to drink Louie's wine and smoke his cigarettes.

But when Louie returned somewhere in the region of ten, Doris had retired for the night and Mileaway was dozing in a chair. But he awoke the moment Louie came in and glanced at him inquiringly.

"Well?"

But Louie made no reply, just went across to a decanter of whisky, and poured himself out a liberal helping to which he added a splash of soda. Then he turned and raised the glass aloft.

"Here's to Gympy and the look on his dirty face when he took it!" He laughed almost hysterically, tossed down his drink, then started violently as a knock sounded on the door. "See who it is, Mileaway!" he rasped.

As Mileaway went towards the door, Louie set down his glass and dived his hand into his jacket pocket. But the caller was Pat O'Grady, not members of Rocco's gang as Louie had feared.

"Ah, come on in, Pat." As the detective advanced into the room and Mileaway reclosed the door, Louie waved a hand towards the decanter on the sideboard. "What say to a drink, old man?"

"Thanks, no!" Pat shook his head, his eyes fastened on Louie's face in disconcerting fashion. "Say, that was a nice piece of work to-night. A gangster put on the spot and his colleagues, wise to the affair, letting him keep the appointment in the hope that they'd get the fellow who was after him. But nothing doing—the guy was too smart and drilled his victim. He even dodged me and—"

"What the heck are you getting at?" Louie strove desperately to master the sudden fear that gripped his heart. Did Pat O'Grady suspect him, then? From what he had said it almost seemed that he did. "Tell me, just exactly what do you mean, O'Grady?"

"Nothing much. Only that I was after the victim and also the Midget for being concerned in your brother's death. It's a pity about Gympy, though." Pat sbrugged his shoulders. "When I heard he was going to his death I hurried along, but was too late to save him, or get the fellow who got him. Wish I could have nabbed—"

"But why tell me all this?" Louie broke in impatiently. "Anyone would think—"

"As I was going to say, Louie, I wish I could have nabbed the fellow who drilled Gympy. You see, I'm after him as well." O'Grady jerked down his hat brim so that it almost completely screened his piercing eyes. "An unlucky break that. But my time will come. Hope you're not thinking of leaving town again, Louie. You see, I'm just beginning to take an interest in you all over again. Decent of me, isn't it?"

"H'm!" Louie gave a reckless laugh as all his old bravado crowded back to him. Obvious now that O'Grady did suspect him as the killer of Gympy, but the knowledge, grave as it was, worried him not at all. Hadn't he on numerous occasions proved himself more than a match for the muddle-headed cops? "Well, Pat, in that case I'll sure stick around for a little while longer. How does that suit you?"

"Absolutely down to the ground." O'Grady turned to the door. "Well, so long, Louie. So long, Mileaway."

And with a satisfied smile on his strong features, O'Grady strode from the room.

Into the Ambush.

IT was shortly after nine o'clock two nights later when a knock came at the door of Louie's flat, and because Louie knew by the sound of it who the caller was he lost no time in opening the door. Mileaway stood outside, but instead of letting him in, Louie stepped out into the passage and drew the door to behind him.

"Steve, I want you to take Doris out to dinner." Louie's voice was a mere whisper. "You see, I've got the Midget staked out for to-night."

"Here, wait a minute." Mileaway caught at Louie's arm. "You'll be needing help. Let me come along—"

"No, I'm saving that skunk all for myself." Louie pushed Mileaway to the slightly open door. "You do as I tell you. Take Doris out to dinner. The usual place. I'll meet you there."

Louie was already wearing his hat, and as Mileaway went into the flat he strode along the passage and descended the stairs to the street. As he came out on to the sidewalk he turned right, and set off at a brisk pace, completely unaware that he was instantly followed by a grim-faced man who had been watching the door to the block of flats from an alleyway opposite.

Some half hour later Louie came to an unlighted shop in a particularly quiet thoroughfare on the outskirts of Charlesworth upon the window of which were the words "Union Cleaners." A swift glance round to make sure he was unobserved, then he produced a bunch of keys, selected one, and unfastened the shop door.

As he passed inside and closed the door behind him, the man who had been shadowing him hurried on down the road till he came to a telephone kiosk. Into the box he dived and put a call through to police headquarters. Then back he went, and from the shadows of

Our Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

a doorway opposite he watched the shop that Louie had entered and in which there now showed a single light.

Five minutes passed, then along the road came two men who stopped as they drew level with the shop Louie had entered.

"Well, here we are, Joe." It was the voice of Midget. "You can wait. It won't take long for Largon to pay me off for those two barrels he had last week."

Little dreaming of the ambush that was set for him inside—that Largon was not in his shop as he imagined—the Midget went to the door, opened it and paced inside.

No one to be seen, but even as he stood there expecting Largon to come out from the room at the back, the muzzle of a gun, to which had been fitted a silencer, came up over the counter, followed by a face that was distorted with passion. Louie's face! At sight of it the Midget's heart missed a beat and the colour rushed from his cheeks. Next second, a muttered curse escaping his trembling lips, he made a frantic effort to reach his gun.

"You dirty undersized rat!" Louie snarled fiercely. "Kill my brother, huh?"

With the words, he fired, and even as the Midget reeled backwards, the bullet imbedded in his chest, the youngster fired again.

A thud as the victim struck the floor, then the unmistakable whine of police cars racing down the street. Quickly Louie jumped for the electric light switch and plunged the shop into darkness. Were the police wise to this ambush of his? It was quite possible that they were for he knew that Pat O'Grady had far more brains than he would have admitted to anyone.

In two strides Louie was at the door, dragging it open. He stepped out on to the sidewalk. The police cars were now very near and a man was racing away down the road—the Midget's companion who had taken to his heels at the first approach of the police. Off Louie raced as fast as his legs would carry him, intent only on escape. And after him went the watcher from the doorway opposite. Louie quickly outstripped the fellow, but not so the pursuing police cars. As the first one overtook him and stopped, a figure jumped down and quickly grasped him. It was Pat O'Grady.

"A fair cop, Louie," he exulted. "Best be sensible and come quiet-like."

"Yeah! But do you think you'll be able to prove anything against me?" Louie put on a bold front. "No, Pat, you haven't got cast-iron evidence. Then again there's defending counsel; my man hasn't lost a case yet."

"Is that so?" grunted Pat, and marched him to the police-car.

Third Degree.

MILEAWAY was somewhat puzzled that Louie did not show up at the Blue Boar Inn, but the young racketeer's absence did not prevent he and Doris staying there until the small hours of the morning.

When they eventually returned to the flat the clock in the hall was striking three.

"I wonder if anything's happened to him," Mileaway remarked as he followed Doris into the darkness of the drawing-room. "Gee, it'd be swell if—"

He broke off as he thought he heard a slight movement close at hand.

"Probably he didn't feel like coming
December 19th, 1931.

out to the Blue Boar after all, and came home and went to bed, Steve."

As he spoke Doris switched on the electric lights, then gave a startled gasp as Pat O'Grady rose up from the settee.

"Three o'clock," he remarked laconically. "I'll say good-morning to you both."

"Is it that late?" Mileaway arched his eyebrows in feigned surprise. What was O'Grady doing here? Had Louie indeed come a cropper? Slowly he turned to Doris. "Gee, time flew at that dance, didn't it, kid?"

"Oh, so you were at a dance, eh?" grunted Pat.

"Why, yes," Doris answered. "Now if you'll excuse me I'll trot along to Louie's room to see if—"

"Don't trouble, kid." A grim smile appeared on O'Grady's face. "You see his cell number's eighty-six."

"What?" Mileaway ejaculated. "Say, what's the idea?"

But O'Grady ignored the question, and grasped Mileaway's arm.

"I've been waiting here for you for two hours," he grimly remarked. "Now just you come along of me."

"But what for?" cried Mileaway, stark panic gripping him.

But again O'Grady deigned no answer.

"Come on!" he rapped out imperatively.

Despite his wild protests and the pleadings of Doris, Mileaway was led away, and within half an hour he found himself at police headquarters, in the almost bare room where suspects were taken for questioning. Some dozen men—uniformed officers and plain-clothes men in their shirt-sleeves—were in the room when Pat brought Mileaway in and dumped him in a chair at a large table, and they immediately got to their feet and clustered around the prisoner.

"Where were you at ten o'clock?" O'Grady fired at Mileaway, as he, too, discarded his jacket and dropped into a chair beside the terrified crook.

"I told you a dozen times on the way here!" Mileaway gasped, his furtive eyes scanning the grim faces around him.

"Dance, huh?" Pat O'Grady felt confident he was waging a winning game. Louie Ricarno was safe. All that remained now was to get conclusive proof against him. "Tell me, Mileaway, why did you kill the Midget?"

"Heavens, I didn't know he was killed!" came in shrill tones from the prisoner.

"You didn't, huh?" It was a uniformed officer who spoke now. "You killed Gympy, and you had to get the Midget or he'd have got you!"

Mileaway trembled in every limb. What was all this leading to? Were they trying to frame him, or was it that they had Louie on suspicion and were trying to force him to double-cross the youngster? If it was the latter, then he might tell them all he knew, with Louie convicted of the murders of Gympy and the Midget and sent to the chair, the youngster's wealth would be his and Doris'.

"You really think I knocked off those two guys, huh?" Mileaway picked up the glass of water that stood on the table before him, for his lips felt very dry. But with a quick movement one of the shirt-sleeved detectives instantly snatched it away. With a shrug of his shoulders the crook then fixed his eyes on Pat O'Grady. "Say, Pat, if you think I gave Gympy and the Midget

December 19th, 1931.

the works, what you holding Louie for?"

"That's our business." O'Grady thrust out his jaw pugnaciously. "What concerns you is this: You plead guilty to killin' the Midget in self-defence and Louie doesn't hear a word about how you've been flirting with his wife behind his back. Ah, ah, I thought that'd scare you. Now what do you say? Confession that'll mean five years or— Well, we can't hold Louie, and if he hears about your deceit he'll get you, as sure as eggs are eggs."

"All right, Pat. You get these mugs out of here and I'll talk to you alone." Thought of self-preservation overcame discretion. As O'Grady gave a sign and his colleagues trooped from the room Mileaway turned eagerly to the detective. "If I confess, you promise not to tell Louie?"

"Sure. You'll have nothing whatsoever to worry about." Pat rose to his feet, picked up his jacket which he had slung over the back of his chair, and put it on. "Look here, Mileaway, you're really on velvet. You've got a lot of money put by and when you get out you can go somewhere quiet and live like a human being."

Mileaway nodded eagerly, completely taken in by O'Grady's cunning.

"You write it out and I'll sign, Pat," he said quite cheerfully.

"It's already written out."

The detective took a document from his breast pocket, opened it out and set it before him on the table. A triumphant smile on his lips, Pat watched Mileaway pick up a pen and, without troubling to read a single word on the typewritten sheet, apply his signature in a bold, firm hand.

"That okay?" Mileaway asked as he set down the pen.

"Sure!"

O'Grady stowed away the precious document, a signed statement to the effect that Louie Ricarno was guilty of the murders of both Gympy and the Midget. The battle of wits had been won. Pat had at last got Louie where he wanted him, and for him there was now no escape.

Out of the Frying Pan into the Fire.

BUT prison bars did not hold Louie for long. From the moment he was incarcerated he awaited rescue that he knew would surely come. Eagerly he scanned the papers that were handed to him as a particular concession, but it was not until the night following Mileaway's "grilling" that he found what he sought in the late edition of the Courier. An innocent-looking advertisement it was, but it was so worded that it formed a message for Louie. "Escape somehow one in morning. Car outside."

Louie chuckled inwardly. Already he had decided on a way to break prison.

One o'clock came, and the night warder made his rounds, only to stop at Louie's cell as he heard the sound of moanings.

"What the heck's wrong with you, Ricarno?" he gruffly inquired.

"Oh, I'm terribly sick!" Louie was bent almost double, his hands clasped to his stomach. "Will you get a doctor to come and look at me?"

"You'd best come across the yard to the hospital." The warder quickly unlocked the cell door. "Come on. Make it snappy!"

Louie certainly did make it snappy. No sooner was he out of the cell than he laid the warder out with a terrific blow to the jaw, then snatched at the man's bunch of keys. Minutes later and the youngster was out in the open, but here he was seen by another warder, who promptly raised the alarm.

A game of cat and mouse began then. But Louie, after much dodging and liding in odd corners, managed to effect his escape by climbing an outbuilding at the back of the prison. Escape this way was a blessing in disguise for him, though, of course, he did not know it. As arranged, a car awaited him at the front of the prison, and it contained Rocco and two other sinister crooks. But they were not here to help Louie. Rocco, determined to avenge the deaths of Gympy and the Midget, had had that advertisement inserted in the "Courier," and in the car ready for Louie's coming was a machine-gun!

But the three killers waited in vain.

Where to go now that he had escaped from prison? It was indeed a poser for Louie. He could not return to the flat, for that would be the first place that Pat O'Grady would look for him. He must lie low for a bit, until the search for him had been abandoned. He could then flee the city and start a fresh in some far-off town, sending word to Doris where to join him.

An hour later found him in a room at the top of a squalid and tumbledown house where he had lived before he had risen to be a power in the underworld. All next day he lay on the dirty bed with the door safely locked and a gun near at hand, listening to the raucous cries of newsboys telling the city of his escape from gaol.

Evening came, and because he wanted to see what the papers had to say about him, Louie thrust his head quickly out of the window and asked a passing newsboy to bring a paper up to him. But he found he had nothing less than a ten-dollar bill, and the boy had no change.

"You can get change from the delicatessen store across the street," Louie told him. "And while you're there you might get me some bread and a carton of sweet Caporal cigarettes. Mind?"

The boy shook his head and departed. Ten minutes later he was back again with the loaf of bread and the carton of cigarettes, which he placed on the table together with Louie's change.

"Thanks, gov'nor." The boy pocketed the liberal tip Louie gave him. "By the way, I met a guy down there who says he thinks he might know you."

"Who's that?" Louie anxiously inquired.

"Pat O'Grady." The boy failed to notice the startled look that flashed into Louie's eyes. "He was in the delicatessen. He's known me ever since I was a kid. He said he might be up to see you later on."

Whistling cheerfully, the youngster departed, and, with a quick movement, Louie snatched up his gun. No use locking the door against the detective—it would not take him long to burst it in. But he wouldn't let O'Grady take him.

Half an hour passed, then Louie heard footsteps ascending the stairs, and bare seconds afterwards a knock sounded on the door.

"Come in, O'Grady!" As the door opened and Pat came into the room, Louie swung up his gun, levelling it straight at the detective's heart. "Stop, that's as far as you're coming, Pat. That's right. Now don't you dare move."

"Sorry, Louie, but the gun won't be needed. You see, I don't happen to park one. Not needed, my boy." The

(Continued on page 23.)

Follow a two-fisted sea-captain and the beautiful daughter of a brave explorer as they sail on a perilous trip to a forgotten cannibal island, where they defy storm, fire and water, man and beast, on a search for a fortune in radium! Starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Browne.

DANGER ISLAND

READ THIS FIRST.

In search of pitchblende deposits containing immense quantities of precious radium, Professor Adams and his companions are beset by savages on a volcanic island off the African coast, and Adams escapes with one surviving follower, Cebu, his giant negro guide.

In America his daughter Bonnie and her uncle, Dr. Anthony Adams, have become alarmed at his failure to communicate with them. Ben Arnold, an adventurer professing friendship, offers to fit out a relief expedition.

His ship, the Lottie Carson, sets sail under the command of Harry Drake, a young Englishman, and for companion Bonnie engages Arlene Chandos, who is in league with Arnold.

Professor Adams and Cebu are picked up by the Lottie Carson off the coast of Africa. The professor is dying, but before passing away he gives Bonnie a chart and charges her to secure the radium for the benefit of humanity.

After a storm in which Dr. Anthony and Cebu are washed overboard, the ship puts into Twamballa, where Harry is paid off. But, thinking he knows too much, Arnold and Black plan to kill him.

They enlist the aid of Lascara, the dago owner of the hotel where they are staying overnight, and a sinister power in the African port. He stages a quarrel over a native girl, and, despite the intervention of Bonnie and a handful of shipmates, Harry is hustled to the back of the premises and thrown to hungry crocodiles.

Now Read On.

A Network of Lies.

IN the instant that Harry Drake was tossed into the crocodile pit, Brincy flung down the men with whom he had been struggling, and scattered those who had been responsible for the fiendish act.

At the same time Collins, Burke and Connor came running from the bar-room, where they had routed the villainous gangsters against whom they had been opposed, and as they appeared on the scene the rest of Lascara's hirelings took to their heels.

Brincy lurched to the edge of the death-pool. He was babbling broken sentences in a voice that trembled with emotion.

"The skipper's gone!" he moaned. "Done for. They chucked him to the crocodiles."

And then he stopped, for as he looked down into that ghastly well with a feeling of sickness and horror he saw a figure chinging to the side of it.

Scarce two feet below the parapet there was a narrow ledge, and in falling Harry Drake had managed to clutch it with his hands. He was hanging there by the tips of his fingers now, but at any moment seemed likely to lose his grip and drop into the midst of the hungry reptiles beneath him. As it was, the loathsome creatures were leaping towards him, and a tumult filled the pit as their jaws snapped close to his heels and their bodies fell back into the muddy water with heavy splashes.

"Lend a hand!" roared Brincy. "There's a chance for him yet!"

EPISODE 4.

"DEVIL WORSHIPPERS."

Bonnie darted to his side, and she was the first to follow Brincy's example and reach down to seize the Englishman by the wrists. Next second Harry was being dragged from the well.

He was as pale as death, but squared his shoulders with an effort and gave his rescuers a word of thanks. Then his brow darkened ominously.

"It looks to me as if this fight was a frame-up," he ground out, "and I've an idea who was at the back of it!"

A girl was standing in the doorway watching the group furtively. The girl was Arlene Chandos, and as she heard the young captain's words she turned and hurried back across the bar-room towards a flight of stairs leading to the upper floor of Lascara's premises.

Ben Arnold and Bull Black were at the foot of the staircase in company with the rascally Portuguese proprietor, and as Arlene approached them Ben Arnold flung a question at her.

"Where's Bonnie?" he demanded. "I thought you went through to get her out of that fight."

"There wasn't any need to," Arlene retorted. "The fight's over."

Arnold took a step forward, and: "What happened?" he asked her eagerly.

"What did you expect?" the girl rejoined, her lip curling slightly. "I told you Drake was as hard as nails. He and his friends cleaned up Lascara's entire gang—"

"Here comes Drake now," Bull Black interrupted suddenly. "Let's get upstairs."

Harry had appeared in the bar-room with Bonnie and the men who had stood by him. The saloon wore a deserted air, though two or three of Lascara's men were lying around in huddled positions. Harry had eyes only for Arnold and his companions, however, and telling Briney and the other sailors to make themselves scarce, he strode on with Bonnie to the stairs.

Arnold and his associates were on the point of ascending when the Englishman overtook them. He gripped the owner of the Lottie Carson by the arm and swung him around.

"I want a word with you, Arnold," he said grimly.

"What's the idea?" the scoundrel demanded.

Harry looked him straight in the eye. "Just this!" he rapped out. "You may not know it, but I saw you and Black having a little heart-to-heart talk with this dago Lascara. I can put two and two together, and I've got a sneaking fancy that the attack on me was some of your dirty work. You thought you'd bump me off, eh?"

"I don't know what you're talking about, Drake," Arnold retorted viciously. "I had nothing to do with your rotten quarrel. When you start flattering one of these native girls," he added, "it's a good idea to make certain that no other admirers are around."

"The girl had nothing to do with it," Harry blazed, infuriated by the attempt of throw a slur on his character in Bonnie's presence. "It was a deliberate frame-up between you and this dago here—"

"No, no!" Lascara protested suavely, taking the cue that Arnold had given him. "I had nothing to do with it. I control the dancing-girls, but I cannot control the men. Bef you pay attentions to Pelula and somebody get jealous, captain, it is not my fault if a free fight start."

The young Englishman heard Bonnie utter a faint exclamation, and a glance at her face told him that the tissue of plausible lies that his enemies were building around the bar-room fracas had roused doubts in the girl's mind. It was hardly to be wondered at, for both Arnold and Lascara sounded sincere enough in their accusations.

"Bonnie," Harry appealed, "you don't believe what they're saying, do you?"

"Oh, I don't know what to believe!" she cried desperately, and with the words she ran upstairs to her room.

A husky mutter of laughter escaped Bull Black, and the ruffianly mate moved nearer to Harry and favoured him with a mocking leer.

"You ain't so lucky in handling womenfolk, are you, Drake?" he taunted.

A fierce spasm of rage seized Harry, but he betrayed it only by the twitching of the muscles in his cheek, and when he spoke his voice was cool and level.

"Maybe not," he said, "but I do know how to handle rats like you!"

Next instant he swung his fist to the point of Bull Black's jaw, and he rammed home his bunched knuckles with an impact that swept Arnold's henchman off his feet.

Bull hit the floor with a thud, and, neither Arnold nor Lascara seeming disposed to take up the quarrel on the mate's behalf, Harry strode from the bar-room into the street.

As he emerged he was confronted by Briney, and it was plain from the latter's first words that he had witnessed the incident with Bull.

"Good for you, captain," he declared. "An' listen—me an' the boys grabbed a little half-caste that was mixed up in the bar-room row. Sneakin' off along the street, he was, but we didn't let him go till we'd made him talk."

"Yes?" Harry murmured. "And what did he say?"

"We squeezed this much outa him,"

December 19th, 1931.

Briney answered. "The guys that started the fight were in Lascara's pay, and it was Bull Black that hired Lascara to have you bumped off."

Harry bit his lip.

"Bull Black isn't the only one behind the racket," he declared. "Say, Briney, get the boys together, will you? I'd like to talk to them."

Collins, Burke and Connor were standing at a street-corner not far away, and Briney gave them a hail. They came up at the double, and Harry addressed them earnestly.

He did not know that Arlene Chandos had quietly followed him from Lascara's premises at the instigation of Ben Arnold, and was lurking within earshot in the mouth of a dark alley.

"Listen, boys," Harry said. "We've got to watch our step. Arnold is out to get me, and I don't want you fellows to run into any danger on my account. The best thing you can do is to take passage on the first ship that docks in Twamballa."

"Sure, captain," put in Briney, "if you come with us."

Harry shook his head.

"Miss Adams is alone among a bunch of traitors who are only professing friendship to her," he said. "I'm convinced that she'll be in an ugly situation once Arnold and his party have her fairly at her mercy on Danger Island—for, with us out of the way, she alone stands between Arnold and his ambition to make a fortune out of those radium deposits that her father discovered."

"Well, what do you aim to do, captain?" Burke inquired.

"See the whole thing through," was Harry's answer, "even if I have to follow the Lottie Carson when she sails in the morning."

Briney laid a hand on the Englishman's arm, and—

"Captain," he stated, "when I speak for meself I reckon I'm speakin' for these here shipmates o' mine as well. If you think we're gonna desert you, you're wrong—"

From Jungle Fastnesses.

LEAVING Bull and Lascara in the bar-room, Ben Arnold made his way upstairs and knocked at the door of Bonnie's room, crossing the threshold as she gave him permission to enter.

"Oh, Ben," she said dismally, as he approached her, "was it really true that the fight started because Captain Drake was paying attention to a native girl?"

Arnold shrugged.

"Well, you know, he's a sailor," he observed, "and there's the old saying about sailors having a sweetheart in every port."

"But I can't believe he's like that," Bonnie told him. "Oh, I'm sick of this whole tragic cruise! Can't we go home, Ben?"

"Bonnie," Arnold protested, with mock righteousness, "before your father died he charged you to finish the task he had begun. Captain Black has signed on a batch of new men, and the repairs on the ship will be completed so that we can sail with the morning's tide. It's this place that's got on your nerves, but I'll check up and see that everything is being done to hasten our departure."

With that he left her and went down to the bar-room again. The usual customers had begun to drift back, and the dive was beginning to assume its customary atmosphere of barbarous gaiety, but of Bull and Lascara there was no sign. Arnold located them, however, in a private apartment behind the saloon, and as he joined them he looked at them sourly.

"Well, your men bungled the job after all, Lascara," he snapped, but before he could say more, Bull Black tapped him on the shoulder.

"Wait a minute," he stated, in his deep, gruff voice. "Before you start gettin' sore, Arnold, let me tell you that Lascara has put up a proposition that looks like a cinch. Let him hear it, Lascara."

The Portuguese smiled craftily and then beckoned Arnold to a window, through which he pointed a lean forefinger.

Arnold peered forth into the starry night. Lascara's dive stood on the very outskirts of Twamballa, and Twamballa, in more than one respect, was unique. Unlike many other ports that had been settled by white men along the tropic African coast, its civilisation extended little farther than its streets and dwellings. The hinterland behind it was the jungle, primeval, untamed—a vast barrier of sinister bush-country stretching between the coast and the heart of the Congo region.

It was towards the dark wall of jungle that Lascara gestured, and Ben Arnold looked at him dully.

"In bush there is tribe known as the Zarbessa," Lascara said softly. "Bad people to make trouble with. I know—for now and then I trade with them. The Zarbessa, they are devil worshippers. They are what you call killers—the mos' dangerous tribe in all Africa. They sacrifice white man. To-day, some of them were seen near Twamballa—skulking, you understand? Lying in wait for victim."

"A victim?" Arnold echoed. "What are you driving at, Lascara? How do the Zarbessa expect to get a white man for a sacrifice here in Twamballa?"

Lascara leaned closer.

"Very few know how," he whispered. "No white man goes out of Twamballa when it is known they are near. Yet every time the Zarbessa come, a white man disappear and we see him no more. It is their superstition—Zarbessa gods must have white man for sacrifice."

Arnold could not repress a faint shudder, for the manner in which Lascara had spoken impressed him with a dull sense of horror.

"We'll have to look out for ourselves then," he muttered, "and for the two girls as well, I suppose."

"No, not for womenfolk," Lascara rejoined. "Zarbessa only take white man. They believe their devil gods no' want white girl. And now listen, senor—you pay, and I fix it so the Zarbessa take Drake—"

Arnold laid a hand on his sleeve to compel silence, for at that moment there had come a knock on the door. The visitor was Arlene, and as she stepped across the threshold quickly the three men thought she appeared agitated.

"I've been looking all over for you," she said. "You've got to do something with Drake. He and his friends have decided to see this thing through to the bitter end. As far as I can make out, they intend to find some way of following us when we sail, and in the meantime they are coming back here to keep their eyes open and watch points."

Bull Black grinned.

"Is that so?" he mused. "Steppin' right into the lion's den, huh? How soon can you get hold of this party from the Zarbessa tribe, Lascara?"

"Yes," Arnold interposed eagerly, "and how can we get them to understand what we want them to do?"

Lascara coolly lit a cigarette.

"I live long time in Twamballa," he said. "I speak many dialects, and I know how I can get in touch with Zarbessa."

"All right, then," Arnold rejoined. "I'll tell you what we'll do—"

The Zarbessa.

ARNOLD'S conversation with Las-cara was swiftly succeeded by activity on the part of the rascally Portuguese hotel-owner, and within an hour the dago joined Bull Black at the bar.

"I send messenger to Zarbessa," Las-cara said in an undertone. "He is back now, and Zarbessa—they come soon. You get Senor Arnold, and we talk in back room."

Bull slid his glance towards a table at the far side of the room. It was occupied by a group of men who had entered the dive a few minutes before—Harry Drake and his companions—and Bull indicated them with a slight movement of his head.

"All right, Lascara," he muttered, "but watch your step. Drake is over there—on the look-out, I guess."

He parted with the dago and hurried upstairs to the rooms occupied by Bonnie and Arlene. He found Arnold in the company of the two girls, and touched the peak of his cap sailor fashion.

"I'd like to speak with you about some of the new men in the crew, Mr. Arnold," he stated.

"All right, Black," Arnold returned. "I've just been telling the girls that they had better turn in, as we're definitely sailing in the morning."

"Ben"—it was Bonnio who spoke, and there was a hesitant note in her voice—"I wonder if I might see Captain Drake. I've been thinking things over, and, whether he was the cause of that fight or not, I—P'd like to say 'good-bye' to him."

Arnold had some difficulty in concealing his impatience. "Don't waste your time on him," he advised. "He's probably out with some native girl. Anyhow, I'll see you first thing in the morning."

He stepped out of the room with Bull, and the two descended to the saloon and walked through to Lascara's private office. Lascara faced them as they appeared, and smiled an evil smile.

"All is fixed," he said to Arnold. "When Zarbessa come, we show them the man and they take hem away."

Even as he spoke there was a confused tumult, and he slipped towards the door and peered into the saloon through a grille. Two or three men had hurried into the dive from the street, and they seemed in a state of tremendous agitation.

"The Zarbessa!" Lascara heard them exclaim, and a queer light kindled in his malevolent eyes.

The cry was taken up on every hand, and an air of suspense seemed to pervade the saloon. It was a suspense that several in the dive failed to understand, and Briney was among these. Harry Drake was not so ignorant, however, for long experience of that barbarous coast had enlightened him concerning its many perils, and he was about to explain the circumstance when, silent as a troop of ghosts, a number of stalwart savages stole across the threshold from the street.

Half-nude demons of the bush, their bodies were as black as ebony, except where their diabolical features had been painted and tattooed. A murmur arose at the sight of them, and then a hush fell as they stood in the doorway, their eyes swiftly scanning the saloon.

Several seconds of stark silence must have elapsed ere they began to file through that dive, men drawing aside from them in terror as they approached. Then they were gone, vanishing one by one into Lascara's back room.

A mutter of conversation broke out as they disappeared, and when he had found his voice Briney clutched Harry Drake by the arm.

"Captain," he gasped, "what kind of fiends from Hades are these?"

"Men of the Zarbessa tribe, the most brutal savages on the African coast," Harry answered. "They make a speciality of sacrificing white men to their gods. I guess we're in no danger here, for they always strike in the dark. But if you should go out, stick together, and be sure to keep your hands on your guns."

His listeners reached involuntarily towards their hip-pockets, for, like all members of the Lottie Carson's crew, they had been served out with firearms and drilled in the use of them during the voyage, and, on dismissing them, Arnold and Bull Black had neglected to demand the return of the weapons.

Harry spoke again. "Lascara keeps strange company," he mused, "but I know that dago snake of old. Piracy, murder—these come easy to him, and I've heard that, as a sideline, he trades with the Zarbessa for ivory."

"Then maybe it ain't white men they're after to-night," Collins interposed hopefully.

"Probably not," Harry agreed. "If they were out for a human sacrifice, I doubt if they'd come so openly. They're very likely here to barter with Lascara over a consignment of tusks."

Had he been within earshot of the back room, Harry might have been less disposed to believe that the mission of the Zarbessa was one so innocent. For at that moment Lascara was acting as interpreter for Arnold and Black, and explaining to the savages what was required of them.

"I tell 'em we show 'em the man," the dago said in English, addressing Arnold and Black after he had held some conversation with the Zarbessa in their weird dialect. "They say they waste no time, for they go back to their junglo kraal very soon. They get him when he leaves saloon."

"All right," Bull Black jerked, taking it upon himself to answer, "point Drake out to them. And, Arnold, better keep your hand on your revolver. These bloodthirsty killers would as soon take you or me."

Arnold did as Bull advised, and then glanced at Lascara's sleeve.

"Wait a minute," he said. "Ask them how we're to know they'll do the job and finish him off?"

Lascara repeated the question to a stalwart savage who appeared to be the head-man. The latter made some rejoinder, and the dago turned to Arnold again.

"He say if you no' believe, you come to kraal and see for yourself."

Arnold uttered a querulous, mirthless laugh.

"I'd just as soon take his word for it," he replied, and, with a thin-lipped smile of understanding, Lascara drew the Zarbessa head-man to the grille and pointed to the table at which Harry and his party were sitting.

The dago spoke a few words more, obviously describing Harry in detail so that no mistake should be made, and the savage gave a quick and eager nod.

"All right," said Lascara, addressing Arnold and Bull Black over his shoulder. "When Drake go, Zarbessa go, too."

"I want a word with you, Arnold," he said grimly.

December 19th, 1931.

The Kidnapping of Drake.

SHORTLY after Ben Arnold wished the girls good-night, Arlene Chandos retired to her own room, and Bonnie was left alone with her thoughts.

Harry Drake figured in them prominently, and, looking back on the incidents of the voyage, reflecting upon the deep friendship that they had formed, she found it harder than ever to believe the accusation Ben Arnold had levelled against him. Indeed, she could not help reproaching herself for doubting Harry, even momentarily.

Her mind being in this vein, she suddenly stood up with the intention of seeking out Harry and telling him her true sentiments, and no sooner was the resolve made than she slipped out of the room.

The sound of music and conversation rose to her from the saloon, and, her recent experience in the bar-room still fresh in her memory, she recoiled from the idea of renewing her acquaintance with it. She therefore descended by a back-stair that brought her into the street via a side door in the premises.

She had not the least idea where Harry was to be found, but it occurred to her that he might return to Lascara's in the hope of seeing her again. Possibly he was even there now, and she decided that she would wait near the main entrance on the off-chance of seeing him.

She walked round to the mean thoroughfare that ran past the front of the building, and with that she heard a familiar voice humming the opening bars of a sea-shanty. Next moment Briney emerged from Lascara's bar-room, and the girl immediately confronted him.

"Briney," she said—"Briney, have you seen Captain Drake?"

"Why, yes, Miss Adams," the sailor answered, touching his cap. "I just stepped out for a breath of air and left him in Lascara's dive with the rest o' the boys."

"Will you tell him I'd like to see him right away?" Bonnie pleaded.

"Sure I will," was the cheerful answer. "I'd do anything for you, Miss Bonnie."

The big sailor walked back into the bar-room and gave Harry the girl's message. The Englishman instantly rose, never for a moment suspecting that evil eyes were watching him from Lascara's back room and that his departure was the signal for the Zarbessa to shadow him.

"Drake goes," Lascara said to Arnold and Black. "I tell Zarbessa to steal out by back door and make up on him. Then I follow and see they get him all right, eh?"

In the meantime Harry had passed out into the street, and there he came face to face with Bonnie.

"You sent for me?" he said, a little stiffly, for, though he intended to safeguard her interests, he was still smarting under the impression that she had believed Arnold's lying story concerning the bar-room fracas.

"I had to see you, Harry," she told him urgently. "Will you—will you walk with me a little way?"

He nodded and they began to stroll along the street, the two of them completely unaware that they were being tracked by a band of dark, silent figures.

They came to a kind of market-place, populous and filled with a great clamour, and made their way through it to a strip of open country behind the town. A hush fell over that same market-place as the Zarbessa appeared, and men covered into dark corners as December 10th, 1931.

the savages filed after their prey. Then came Lascara, watchful as a cat.

Bonnie and Harry wandered towards the fringe of jungle, but were still some little distance from it when the Englishman called a halt.

"It's not safe to go too far from the town," he mentioned. "Whatever you want to say to me, you can rest assured that we won't be overheard here."

"Oh, Harry," she began, and in spite of the gloom he saw that her face was raised appealingly, "I want to speak to you about this voyage to Danger Island. I promised father that I'd go on—carry out his dying wish. But—I can't! I can't go on without you, Harry. I don't know why it is, but somehow I'm afraid!"

Her impassioned tone affected him powerfully, and he took hold of her hands with a gesture of sympathy.

"It's been my belief all along that you have reason to be afraid," he told her. "Almost from the beginning I distrusted Arnold, and as for that henchman of his, Bull Black—"

"I think Black is the one who first made me suspicious of the whole business," Bonnie said quickly. "There's something about him that makes me shudder, and Arlene happened to mention that it was he who recommended this terrible place of Lascara's."

"Arnold and Black are hand-in-glove," Harry assured her, "and now they've got Lascara in their pay. But, Bonnie," he added eagerly, "are you trying to tell me that you don't believe what Arnold has been saying against me?"

"I believe only in you, Harry," she answered. "I was a blind fool ever to doubt you. You're the only friend I have in the world now."

Harry slipped his arms around her. Her words had elated him, and in that moment he felt ready to match his wits and courage against all the villainy of Arnold's minions—to meet the ring of enemies with his own good men, and confound them in their nefarious enterprise. With Bonnie trusting in him, he would baffle Arnold's scheming—

Harry did not see the figures that were stealing towards him through the gloom, a grim cordon of devil-worshippers between him and the town.

"Bonnie," he said, "you have nothing to fear now that I know what I mean to you."

"But we will at sun-up," she told him tremulously, "and the Lottie Carson is leaving without you, under the command of that awful man Black. Oh, I can't—I can't go on."

"The ship that carries you won't leave me far behind," the Englishman said, smiling down at her. "Listen, Bonnie; I've made my plans. Briney and the boys are staunch. To-morrow—"

But he never completed the sentence. There was a sudden scuffle of naked feet in the grass, and next second a swarm of demon figures sprang at him through the darkness.

Bonnie uttered a shrill scream of terror, and as it rang piercingly on her lips a savage wrenched her from Harry's grasp and swung her aside ere leaping forward to engage the Englishman.

Harry saw the painted face of the jungle fiend, and an involuntary cry escaped him.

"Zarbessa!" he jerked, and with the word he stepped to meet the black and ripped his fist to the bushman's hulking body.

His knuckles drove into the savage's stomach, and the negro fell writhing. His place was taken by another, who ran straight into a terrific punch that hurled him to the ground, but the two were only the foremost of a party that numbered eight or nine, and with ugly shouts the rest of the bushmen closed in.

Harry snatched a revolver from his hip-pocket, but ere he could level it his hand was seized and the gun thrust upward to the sky. A shot crashed out, but the bullet sped harmlessly enough through the fronds of a palm, and in another moment the weapon had been wrested from the young captain's grasp.

FILM NOVELS FOR XMAS READING."THREE WHO LOVED."

The dramatic story of a young bank cashier who lets his chum go to prison for a fault he himself committed, because the chum had played fast and loose with the girl he loved.

"RECKLESS LIVING."

The lure of gambling had been his downfall, and almost it lost him the sweetest and most patient of wives. A tale of the verge of the under world, starring Mae Clarke and Ricardo Cortez.

"THE GIRL HABIT."

Famous for his chivalry, a young man finds himself in difficulties with an infuriated gangster. After many adventures he thinks he has reached a refuge in prison, but—Starring Charlie Ruggles.

Betty Compson and Conrad Nagel in "Three Who Loved."

Don't miss this bumper Christmas number of our companion paper

'SCREEN STORIES.'

ON SALE WEDNESDAY.

PRICE 2d.

It dropped to the grass unheeded. Harry was now in the grip of many pairs of arms and was lifted clear of the ground, but by a superhuman effort he managed to find his footing again and, with his fists in free play, he lashed out fiercely.

He knew the savage cult which the Zarbessa called their religion—knew that capture would be followed by torture and death before their primitive idols within an hour. Desperation gave him a strength that was superhuman, and two went down under his blows. But the first pair whom he had tackled now rose to weigh the scales as heavily against him.

He actually managed to break from that swarm of black humanity, and as he saw Bonnie scramble to her feet he shouted to her to make off. She whipped round, and he started after her at the double, but one of the bushmen who had been knocked to the ground clutched him by the ankle before he had gone two paces.

He managed to avoid falling, and plucked his foot from the negro's clasp. But the momentary check proved fatal, for as he attempted to run on he was surrounded again, and this time the whole pack of savages made a determined effort to drag him down.

Bonnie turned back and threw herself into the struggle frenziedly, beating at the Englishman's attackers with her clenched hands. She was unheeded for a few seconds, then one of the black fiends wheeled and caught her up in his arms.

He dashed her to the grass and stooped over her to threaten her with his great, dusky fist. But there was no need to strike. For, bruised and shaken, terrified by the apparition of that hideous, tattooed face lowering over her, Bonnie uttered a little moan and fainted.

Scarcely thirty paces distant, the crouching figure of Lascara watched the scuffle. He saw Harry Drake battling gamely against the overwhelming odds, and he saw him dragged under the swaying mass of black humanity. He watched the devil worshippers sprawl over the young Englishman's prone form and strike at him brutally as he lay.

Presently Harry ceased to resist his assailants. He was still half-conscious, but had been battered and trampled into helplessness. There was a tumult of voices all about him, voices clamouring in the wild Zarbessa dialect of the bush. Strong hands closed on his arms and legs and lifted him from the ground.

His captors ignored the prostrate figure of Bonnie, and, in spite of stupor and despair, Harry was thankful that the primitive fiends who had him in their power showed no wish to take the girl along with them to their fastness in the hinterland.

Abandoning Bonnie, they carried the Englishman towards the jungle. Lascara followed them with his eyes until the darkness swallowed the group, and his evil face wore an expression of satisfaction. He could now assure Arnold and Bull Black that Drake would worry them no more, and before morning Arnold would pay the price agreed upon.

The night was still except for a far-off sound that came from the remote depths of the jungle. It was the mutter of native drums in the distant village of the Zarbessa.

(To be continued in another breath-taking episode next week. By permission of the Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Browne.)

"A HANDFUL OF CLOUDS."

(Continued from page 18.)

detective smiled grimly at the puzzled expression that came into Louie's face. "Too bad that I should hit against that kid you sent to the delicatessen, wasn't it? I somehow thought you'd be in this neighbourhood—the place of your childhood days, you know. Well, I got talking to that kid who's a little friend of mine, and when he asked for your particular brand of cigarettes, I knew I'd traced you."

"Well, what you going to do about it?" Louie's voice was harsh and a murderous light flashed in his eyes. "Think you're going to take me?"

"No." Again Pat smiled. "I'm just going to bid you good-bye."

"Good-bye?" Louie reiterated in astonishment. "What the devil do you mean?"

"Just this. That Rocco and some score of his toughs are waiting for you outside with a handful of clouds." O'Grady shrugged his shoulders as a startled gasp burst from Louie's suddenly white lips. "Too bad that you walked out on them, then came back and shot up Gypsy and the Midget. Gee, you're sure mighty sore with you, Louie, take it from me."

"H'm!" Louie affected a sudden air of bravado. "Putting the breeze up me, aren't you? Well, I'll get out of it."

"Like you got out of gaol, I suppose?" scoffed Pat.

Louie smiled and nodded.

"Well, let me tell you," O'Grady went on in his slow, drawing tone, "that the fixing to get you out of gaol was done by Rocco's gang so they could get the kick of bumping you off themselves. They were waiting outside the prison for you when you escaped, but you went the wrong way. But someone tipped them off you had scuttled down here."

"I don't believe a word you say." Louie tried to assure himself that there was no truth in what O'Grady said. "You're just trying to put the breeze up me."

Pat shrugged, and, crossing to the window, Louie took a hasty glance outside. Lurking shadows across the road caused him to spring back with a terrified gasp. No mistaking now that Pat had spoken the truth.

"Pat, for Heaven's sake take me back to gaol!" Louie shrieked. "Anywhere rather than—"

"No go, Louie. You see, the law prefers it this way. It'll save us no end of trouble." The detective turned to the door, then paused with his fingers on the handle.

"Well, it's the finish, Louie, but you can rest assured I'll see that that book of yours is ended properly. And now—good-bye."

His face pale as death, Louie listened to Pat's footsteps descending the stairs, then, when he could hear them no longer, he flung his gun on the dirty bed and burst into a hysterical laugh.

For a moment or two he stood where he was, his mind a turmoil of bitter thoughts. Then, with a pathetic shrug of his shoulders, he suddenly went to a cracked mirror, adjusted his tie, patted his hair with fingers that trembled.

There was no possible avenue of escape. The avengers would wait and wait till he did appear in the street. Best die as he had lived, a fearless and reckless young man.

A further moment's hesitation, then, bracing himself, he picked up his hat and rammed it on his head. In two firm strides he reached the door.

Down the stairs and out on to the sidewalk, to be instantly met by a withering volley of revolver-fire that came from across the road.

So ended the reign of Louie Ricarno, no doubt the most clever and daring racketeer who ever menaced the city of Charlesworth. And, in due time, his life's history appeared on every book-stall in the city, and the books sold like hot cakes.

"The 'Doorway to Hell' is a one-way door. There is no retribution—no plea for further clemency. Louie walked through it with his head up and a smile on his lips to his doom." Thus ran the end, which had been written by Captain Pat O'Grady.

(Based on the film "A Handful of Clouds," by permission of Warner Bros. Pictures, Ltd., starring Lew Ayres as Louie Ricarno; Dorothy Mathews as Doris; Leon Janney as Jackie Lamarr; Robert Elliott as Captain O'Grady; James Cagney as Steve Mileaway; Noel Madison as Rocco.)

WOULD YOU LIKE

A FREE

RILEY BILLIARD TABLE

Write for details and price list. for your HOME?

E. J. RILEY LTD.,

Howard Works, ACCRINGTON.

And at Dept. 35, 147, Aldersgate St., LONDON, E.C.1.

WHAT BOYS WANT FOR XMAS!

BOY DETECTIVE OUTFITS, OF COURSE! They're great!!! Brimful with novelty, fun, and amusement!!! NOW'S the time to start in this grand new hobby for boys!!!

WORLD-FAMOUS SECRET SERVICE OUTFITS, with radio, invisible and mystic fire inks, membership badge, fingerprint powder, secret codometer, etc., etc. TEN ITEMS, all winners, including book, "THINGS THE BOY 'TEC SHOULD KNOW," only 1/-. Or Larger Presentation Outfit, with extra fingerprint album, magnifying lens, etc. fourteen items, only 2/6. DISGUISE OUTFITS—contain Grease Paints (Sallow or Chinese, Sunburn or Red Indian), Moustaches, Hair (assorted colours, Removable Scars and Warts, liquid for blacking out front, teeth, etc. TWELVE ITEMS, including valuable book, "SECRETS OF DISGUISE," for only 1/6. Or larger, with extra grease paints, monocle beard, etc., only 2/6.

NEW FINGERPRINT OUTFITS, a complete outfit for experts, EIGHT ITEMS, including book, "ALL ABOUT FINGERPRINTS," 2/-. BLACK DOMINO OUTFITS, with Revolver, Bullets, Handcuffs, Call-Whistle, gold-plated Badge, and Black Domino Mask SIX ITEMS for 2/1! All the above are sent post free and by return A handsome membership ticket and registered number is given free to each purchaser. Don't delay! Join the Boy's Secret Association TO-DAY!

THE BOY DETECTIVE SUPPLY STORES, DESK B.C., 32, CATHCART STREET, GREENOCK.

(Foreign Postage 3d. in the billing extra.)

December 19th, 1931.

"Caught Plastered."

(Continued from page 10.)

"We're going to be able to take up Mrs. Talley's note, too," confided Tommy. "Then everything will be hotsy-totsy."

Egbert, stealing a moment, greeted her cheerfully.

"By the way," said she, "where is Mrs. Talley?"

"Ah," chuckled Egbert, "that's a secret. Go ahead, son, you tell her."

"As a matter of fact," said Tommy, with pride, "mother's out buying a new frock."

"Yo; bet your life!" supplemented Egbert. "We said: 'Mother, business is too good around here—you go right out and get yourself all dolled up.'"

"That's wonderful!" declared Peggy. "You boys certainly are doing a big business."

"Another lemon soda!" howled a voice. And: "Two lemons!" insisted another.

"Yes, sir—coming right up! Coming right up in a glass!" responded Egbert, and he returned to the soda fountain and the bottles and glasses.

"It's the new lemon syrup we're serving," explained Tommy to Peggy. "Everybody's crazy about it. Want to try one?"

Peggy declared that she would love to try one, so Tommy filled a glass and put straws in it, and they both sipped. Egbert, in a momentary lull, sailed over to sip with them—and the new drink appealed so strongly to him that he promptly filled a glass for himself.

The stuff had less immediate effect on Tommy than it had on Peggy, who had never swallowed alcohol before in her life. She began to laugh rather unnecessarily and rather loudly.

"You've got the cutest little mole on your ear," she said to Tommy, pushing her little hat clean off her head on to the floor. "Ears are funny things, aren't they?" She pulled his ears playfully. "The way people have one each side of their face—don't you think they're funny? Oh, dear—I think they're so funny." And she laughed uproariously.

"What's the matter with you, Peggy?" asked Tommy in alarm.

"Nothing—I just feel lively. I want to sing and dance and—and everything." She began to wriggle about on her chair as though dancing the Charleston. "Hi, hi, yoo-doo, poop-a-doop—"

Tommy smelled suspiciously at the glass, which was empty, but he could detect no significant odour.

"A lemon soda, please!" shrilled a woman beside her.

Tommy went off to serve the required drink, and Egbert said in his ear (the one with the mole): "You know I think somebody's brought a flask in with 'em!"

The woman was supplied, and Tommy stared at Peggy, who was still swaying on her chair and humming a tune. She descended as he approached and began to dance between the show-cases, and Tommy would certainly have done something about it, only just then a buzzer on the wall drew his attention to the fact that the Y.M.I. Radio Station was ready and waiting for the afternoon transmission from the Sunshine Drug Store.

"There's the buzzer. Egbert," he called. "It's time for us to go on the air."

"Gosh, I almost forgot!" admitted Egbert, and addressed the crowd at December 19th, 1931.

Two Grand Books for Boys!

Thrills! Mystery! Adventure!—that's what you get in the BRITISH BOYS' ANNUAL. This topping gift book is crowded with exciting tales of school life, sport, mystery and adventure that you will want to read again and again. There are also useful articles dealing with all kinds of interesting subjects, numerous illustrations and beautiful colour plates

BRITISH BOY'S ANNUAL Now on Sale 5/-

Every boy will revel in the budget of ripping school yarns and thrilling adventure stories in the HOLIDAY ANNUAL. Each tale will hold you enthralled. Here you can meet all the jolly schoolboy characters of Greyfriars, St. Jim's and Rookwood schools, whose merry pranks cannot fail to entertain. There are lots of other interesting features, too, including pithy poems, puzzles, a play and eight beautiful plates.

HOLIDAY ANNUAL

Now on Sale 6/-

large. "Folks," he said, "we're about to start the Sunshine Hour now. Everybody's invited to watch the artistes at work."

"Hooray!" chorused the customers. The microphone, on its metal stem, was standing in a corner. Egbert lifted it into a clear space of carpet between the bar and the bookshelves and depressed a switch. The customers gathered round him and raised a cheer which went out on the air.

"Good-afternoon, ladies and gentlemen," began Egbert, addressing the mike. "You are about to listen to the Sunshine Hour. Your announcer will be that celebrated Master of Ceremonies, Doctor Egbert G. Higginbotham. Here he is!"

"Hooray for Hickbert Gee-gee Higginbotham!" shouted a tipsy fellow behind him.

"Howdy, folks," pursued Egbert. "This is Egbert G. Higginbotham speaking from the Sunshine Drug Store, home of the famous Pepo Lemon Syrup. We open the programme with that distinguished artist and popular favourite, Mister Thomas Tanner."

There was a piano near the microphone. Egbert sat down at it, discarded his coat, and began to play. Tommy, holding Peggy's hand, led her forward and began to sing.

It was supposed to be a sentimental song to the tune of a slow foxtrot.

But Peggy insisted on dancing with him, much to the joy of the inebriated onlookers, and at frequent intervals she interrupted the words with exclamations such as: "Boop-boop-boop-boop poop-a-dook."

He reached the end of the song, and straightaway Peggy lifted up her voice in a song that wasn't in the programme at all.

"What causes a shiver to run up my spine?"

And why should I quiver when your lips meet mine?"

Egbert looked round from the keyboard, but Peggy's voice was quite a good one, and the thing was a novelty, so he improvised an accompaniment for it. Tommy, equally quick to improvise words, chimed in at suitable intervals, and they sang the final chorus together, then embraced and kissed.

"Folks," boomed Egbert, bounding up from the piano and standing before the microphone, "you have just been listening to Mr. Thomas Tanner and Little Peggy Morton. Little Peggy Morton, the daughter—"

But he got no further. With one concerted movement the revellers behind him surged forward, singing an entirely different song with the utmost discord.

The Police Arrive.

NEVER, in all the chequered history of the town of Lockville, had such wild unseemliness occurred before. But Harry Watters had been banking upon its occurring on this particular day, and he was sitting in his office at the Lockville Trust & Loan Company, listening delightedly to a loud speaker.

Switching off the set, he rang up the Chief of Police, to whom he described what he had heard.

"Guess you'd better come right away, chief," he said. "I tell you the whole store is rip-roaring drunk! Absolutely! Eh? Sure I'll meet you there."

A car was waiting for him outside the building, and in it he was swept off to Allison Avenue and the Sunshine Drug Store. He found it difficult to enter the shop, because its doorway was blocked by scandalised members of the community and delighted small boys. But at last he managed to force his way in.

A grin of infinite satisfaction spread over his face. Fully thirty men and women were in there, some with glasses in their hands, all eapering about the floor and singing and shouting at the top of their voices. Peggy was ruffling Tommy's hair, and the two came swaying towards him.

"Having a little house-warming?" inquired Watters.

"No," said Tommy, "it's just a little extra attraction for the Sunshine Hour."

"Strikes me you ought to change its name to the Moonshine Hour," remarked Watters.

But Watters had timed his arrival opportunely, for at this moment there came the strident sound of a Klaxon horn, and a police-tender drew up outside the store with a grinding of brakes.

Half a dozen uniformed men and the Chief of Police. The people in the doorway were unceremoniously thrust aside, and the forces of law and order entered the premises. Egbert, who had long since cut off the microphone, advanced with a serenity he did not feel towards Morton, who snatched a glass from a man's hand and sniffed at it suspiciously.

"How are you, chief?" said Egbert with affected cheerfulness. "Glad to see you."

"Yeah?" drawled Morton ominously. "You only think you're glad to see me. What's going on here?"

"Why, what do you mean?"

"I mean this place is padlocked!" was the stern rejoinder.

The fat-faced man approached, waving a tumbler in which was a moderate quantity of Pepo Lemon Syrup and soda-water, decorated with two straws.

"What have you got there?" demanded Morton harshly, and seized upon the glass.

"Thash lemon soda—and itsh besh in the town," declared the fat-faced man thickly.

"Hold on to that, Clancy," directed the Chief of Police, handing the glass to one of his subordinates.

Peggy pulled Tommy towards her father, and Peggy, whose eyes were un-naturally bright and whose hair was a little disordered, prodded her father in the chest.

"How-do, Pop?" she giggled. "How's everything?"

"I thought so!" said her father grimly. "I'll attend to you later." He gripped Tommy by the shoulder and Egbert by the arm. "I thought you two had criminal faces!" he barked.

An officer who had been prowling behind the bar came importantly forward with a glassful of neat syrup.

"Chief," he said, "this stuff is just full of booze."

"Booze?" gasped Tommy and Egbert in one agonised breath.

"Booze!" repeated the officer.

Morton swung his right arm in the direction of the door.

"Get out of here, all of you!" he shouted. "Go on! Out!"

The policeman rounded up the excited customers and drove them doerwards. Protesting, and in some cases struggling, they were thrust forth to mingle with the crowd on the pavement, and two officers guarded the door.

"Where did you get the stuff you put in that soda?" demanded the chief of police harshly of Tommy and Egbert.

"Honest, we didn't put anything in it," protested Tommy.

There occurred a diversion at the door. Mrs. Talley, returning from a dressmaker's establishment with a brand new hat on her head and a brand new coat over a brand new frock, had squeezed through the crowd in a state of trepidation, only to find herself denied entrance by a burly policeman.

"But this is my drug-store!" she protested. "I'm Mrs. Talley."

The policeman, at a nod from Merton, permitted her to enter, and she ran anxiously to the group by the bar.

"Has anything happened, Mr. Morton?" she asked timidly.

"Anything happened?" roared the chief of police. "Mrs. Talley, you're the owner of this store, aren't you?"

"Of course."

"Then I arrest you for running a speakeasy!"

"If you'll just let me take charge of this situation," urged Egbert, but Tommy, who was standing between his dismayed partner and Peggy, promptly raised his voice indignantly.

"Wait a minute, chief!" he shouted. "You can't take her! She doesn't know a thing about this. She hasn't even been around here. We're the ones who're running this place, and I want to tell you—"

"Shut up!" bellowed Morton, and he pushed him and Egbert back while Sergeant Clancy towered ominously over Mrs. Talley. "She owns this place, and she's got to face the music."

"But mother had nothing to do with it," expostulated Egbert. "She doesn't know anything about the booze being there—she didn't put it there."

"No?" scoffed Morton. "Then who did?"

"Why — er —" Egbert looked at Tommy, and they both looked at the terrified face of Mrs. Talley—"why, we put it there, didn't we, Tommy?"

"Sure we did," agreed Tommy. "We're the ones to blame. Take us, and leave mother alone."

Peggy decided it was high time she

BOYS! BUILD HUNDREDS OF WORKING MODELS

When you have Meccano you are able to build hundreds of real engineering models. No. 1 Meccano Outfit, costing 10s., builds over 573 models—a different one every day for more than eighteen months. There is endless variety, too, for one day you can build a Crane, the next day a Steam Wagon, the day after a Pit-head Gear, or an Aeroplane or a Motor Car.

The models you build with Meccano are real engineering models in miniature because they are built with real engineering parts. These parts can be used over and over again to make hundreds of different models.

Be sure you get Meccano this Christmas!

£500 IN PRIZES!

There is no hobby in the world more thrilling than Meccano model-building, but the interest and fascination are increased ten-fold when you are building a model that may win a prize in our grand £500 Competition. Ask your Meccano dealer for an entry form and full particulars.

SEND FOR THIS FREE BOOK TO-DAY

Write to-day for this fine new book. It contains a number of thrilling articles, profusely illustrated, describing many famous engineering feats. In addition, the full range of Meccano Outfits is shown, and there are illustrations of many wonderful Meccano models.

We will send you a copy, post free, in return for the names and addresses of three of your chums. Write your own name and address clearly, and add it after your name.

PRICES OF MECCANO OUTFITS FROM 2/6 to 450/-

MECCANO

MECCANO LIMITED (DEPT. 11) OLD SWAN LIVERPOOL

intervened. The effect of the lemon syrup had been almost completely eradicated by this alarming crisis.

"Pop," she cried, "the boys are not telling the truth. They're just saying that to save Mrs. Talley."

"How about releasing Mrs. Talley on a bond?" asked Egbert.

"That's up to the judge," growled the chief of police. "About a thousand dollars. I guess."

Watters was hovering in the background, trying not to look as satisfied as he felt, and Tommy chanced to glance in his direction. "I've got it, Egbert," he whispered. "The fellow who sold us that Pepp Lemon Syrup."

"That's right," nodded Egbert. "Say, chief, we've got the answer. There was a fellow in here the other day left that stuff—"

"What's his name?"

They confessed that they did not know the vendor's name; he had delivered the cask for cash down. Chief Merton laughed scornfully in their faces, and Sergeant Clancy began to lead his prisoner away.

"Watters knows his name!" cried Tommy desperately.

"I don't know what you're talking about," declared Watters indignantly.

"You don't? I saw you shaking hands with him just like he was an old friend."

Morton glared.

"Are you trying to tie me up in this?" exploded Watters. "Say, chief, these fellows wouldn't stop at anything."

"I know where they're going to stop for a while!" was the grim retort.

"See you later, chief," said Watters, and he went off as though in a hurry.

"Egbert," whispered Tommy, "if we don't do something, that bird's going to grab this store."

"Cut out that whispering!" stormed Morton.

"Pop," pleaded Peggy, "you've got to listen to me. I know who that lemon syrup fellow is. I mean I—er—I know where he is, I think."

"Where?" chorused Tommy and Egbert eagerly.

"Hi, hi, hi, I'll do all the questioning!" said Morton gruffly. "Out with it, Peggy!"

"Well, while I was driving by in Madison Street, I saw him in the doorway of the Sanderson Apartment House. A man was helping him carry boxes in there."

"Great!" cried Egbert jubilantly. "Come on, chief, we'll find that fellow!"

The red face of the chief of police went redder than ever.

"Wait a minute—wait a minute!" he howled. "Where d'you get that 'we' stuff? I'll find him, but you guys will have to go along with me, in case you've got sense enough to identify him."

"We'd know that face any place," declared Egbert. "Come on, Tommy."

"Mrs. Talley," said Morton, "don't forget you're under arrest. Clancy, you stay with her till we get back. Come on, Peggy!"

The four went out and climbed into the police tender, watched by an noisy crowd held back by the police. Tommy, Egbert and Peggy sat in the back with a sergeant; the chief sat in front with the driver, and the vehicle swept off down the long thoroughfare. Everybody imagined that Tommy and Egbert were being taken to gaol, and Watters, who was waiting and watching in a doorway, rubbed his hands with delight.

Merry Christmas!

AFTER the apparent arrest of the two drug-store keepers, the crowd on the pavement dwindled. Watters, deciding that the moment for action had arrived, strolled cut from his hiding-place and approached the premises.

The police permitted him to enter, and he made straight for Sergeant Clancy, who knew him well, though not nearly so well as he imagined he did.

"How are you, Clancy?" said the schemer pleasantly. "I want to have a talk with Mrs. Talley, if you don't mind."

Clancy raised no objection, and Watters went to the rear of the store where Mrs. Talley was sitting dispiritedly in a chair.

"This is an unfortunate thing," he said sympathetically. "I'm terribly sorry."

"I don't know what to make of it all," she faltered.

"Well, Mrs. Talley, I've always tried to help you out, and I don't intend to stop now," he told her. "Never too late to mend, you know."

He pulled up a chair and sat beside her, and he produced a legal-looking document from his pocket.

"Now you sign this paper," he urged, "turning the store over to us, and we'll saddle all your debts. And as far as the Old Ladies' Home is concerned—why, here's a cheque for the necessary two hundred."

She took the document and the fountain-pen he offered with it, and she looked hesitatingly at the cheque he held in his hand.

"I—I'll sign it," she decided.

The document was signed and handed over, and Watters presented her with the cheque.

Longer runs and heavier loads with Hornby Trains

The 1931-32 Hornby Book of Trains

Better even than last year! Page after page of fascinating information, and every page illustrated! All the splendid Hornby Locomotives, Rolling Stock and Accessories are depicted in full colour.

You must have this book! It can be obtained for 3d. from your dealer, or post free from Meccano Ltd. for 4½d. in stamps.

The Hornby
Single Arm
Lamp Stand Standard.

Hornby Engine
Shed.

One of the famous Hornby No. 2 Special true-to-type locomotives.

Boys, tell Dad now about the present you wish him to give you at Christmas. Tell him you want a Hornby Train Set. If he asks why, tell him that—

Hornby Trains give longer runs and haul heavier loads.

They are strong and reliable.

They are realistic and one hundred per cent efficient.

They are beautifully finished in correct colours.

Above all, they are British, and therefore best, and every one is fully guaranteed.

This must be a Hornby Christmas for every boy who is keen on model trains! Get a copy of the Hornby Book of Trains described here, and make your choice now. If you prefer to have an ordinary price list, you may obtain a copy of catalogue No. 6 from your dealer, free of charge, or direct from Meccano Ltd., price 1d. Write to Department K.

PRICES OF HORNBY TRAINS FROM 5/- UPWARDS.

HORNBY TRAINS

BRITISH AND GUARANTEED

MECCANO LIMITED (DEPT. K)
OLD SWAN LIVERPOOL

"There you are," he said, "and I hope you'll be very happy in the Old Ladies' Home."

He went off, nodding to Clancy as he passed that officer, and Mrs. Talley, thoroughly upset, bowed her head in her hands and wept.

The police tender meanwhile had drawn up outside the imposing block of service flats in Madison Street, known as the Sanderson Apartment House, and Peggy, Egbert and Tommy had followed the Chief of Police into the building. But in the hallway on the ground floor the chief rubbed his chin and remarked gloomily:

"We can't break into all these apartments without any warrant, you know. We can only knock and ask questions."

Egbert promptly knocked at the front door of a ground-floor flat, and a middle-aged woman opened it and looked out.

"Are you acquainted with anybody who makes lemon syrup?" inquired Egbert pleasantly.

The woman stared at him, glared at the Chief of Police, gave vent to an emphatic "No!" and slammed the door in their faces.

A bad beginning, but worse was to follow. The quartet ascended the stairs, calling at all the flats on the way up to the smallest and cheapest set of rooms under the tiles, and they took it in turn to ask questions, but drew blank every time.

It was on the top floor that Peggy's father really lost his temper.

"Say, what do you mean by wasting my time like this?" he howled. "Come on! Let's get out of here!"

They trooped down the stairs—eight flights of them—and Tommy and Egbert were wretchedly silent during the descent, while Peggy declared at intervals that she was positive the man they sought had helped to carry boxes into the building.

They reached the ground floor again, and had they reached it two seconds earlier than they did, they would undoubtedly have passed straight out into the street. But as they were crossing the hallway to the front door, they were startled by a crash which seemed to come from somewhere below.

They had not thought of the basement before, and there was no visible staircase to the lower regions. Opposite the flat of the woman who had slammed her door in their faces, however, was another door, and they crouched before it in a row, listening intently.

It sounded to Egbert, who was nearest the door, as though someone down below was sweeping up broken glass.

He sniffed at the keyhole, and savoured the reek of spilled spirits.

"Follow your nose, chief!" he cried triumphantly.

The chief turned the handle of the door cautiously, and the door was opened on to an ill-lit flight of stairs. One after another the four crept down the stairs.

At the bottom was another door, wide open, and beyond it was a spacious cellar, lit by electric lamps, fitted with shelves, and furnished with a desk and chairs. In the cellar, busily engaged in sweeping up the fragments of a number of broken bottles, was Clarke, with a broom.

The chief sprang, and his hand encircled Clarke's throat, nearly throttling the startled bootlegger.

"Well, well!" cried Egbert jubilantly. "The old syrup king himself!"

Morton ran expert hands over the crook's person, while taking in at a glance the presence of a considerable quantity of unlawful liquor in bottles and casks upon the shelves.

"What a sweet session you're in for!" he said grimly, and he produced a six-shooter from one of his own pockets, which he dug into Clarke's ribs.

"Who else is in on this?" demanded Morton.

"Try and find out!" snapped Clarke.

"There's somebody coming!" exclaimed Peggy.

There was somebody coming. The door above had been reopened, and heavy footsteps were descending the ill-lit stairs.

"Get back there—get back!" hissed the Chief of Police. "And not a word out of you, either!"

Clarke dropped his arms and stood there, while the others backed hurriedly behind the door and waited. The door swung back, nearly knocking the gun out of Morton's hand, and Harry Watters burst excitedly into the cellar.

"Well, it worked!" he cried. "Chief Morton fell for the whole thing—and I've got the drug store!"

"Watters!" thundered Morton, emerging from behind the door. "So it's you, eh? Well, I always was suspicious of you!"

Watters gaped at the gun, became aware of the trio behind the Chief of Police, and made a rush at Clarke.

"So you squealed, eh?" he howled. "You rat!"

Morton thrust his weapon into Tommy's hand, ordering him to keep both the miscreants covered while he handcuffed them to one another.

The handcuffs clicked, the discomfited crooks glared at each other as if about to fight, and then Egbert perceived a legal-looking document projecting from Watters' breast-pocket. He grabbed it, examined it, and laughed mockingly.

"Ha, ha!" he jeered. "What's the difference between monoxide and dioxide, eh?"

"Yah!" snorted Watters savagely.

Chief Morton recovered his gun from Tommy.

"Come on!" he snapped. "Get out of here! March!"

The two prisoners moved reluctantly before him to the stairs, and up the stairs, urged forward by the barrel of the six-shooter.

"You go ahead, you three," said Morton to Peggy, Tommy, and Egbert when the doorstep was reached. "I'll send word to Clancy to release Mrs. Talley."

"Fine, chief—and many thanks," said Egbert. "Good-bye, benefactor! Good-bye, Lemon Syrup! Merry Christmas!"

Sergeant Clancy was at the door of the drug store, and two uniformed men were on the pavement when Peggy, Tommy, and Egbert burst into the premises. Utterly ignoring the astonished representatives of the law, they made for the chair in which Mrs. Talley sat weeping.

"Mother," cried Tommy ecstatically, "it's all over! Everything's okay, and you're free!"

"B-but I've sold the drug store," stammered Mrs. Talley in bewilderment, and she held up the cheque.

"Is that so?" said Egbert, and, with a flourish, he handed her the document she so recently had signed.

"B-but I—I've got his cheque!"

Egbert, with the unlighted stub of a cigar in his mouth, caught hold of the cheque and tore it in halves.

"Mother," he said, "you mean you had his cheque!" And he tore the halves into shreds and tossed the shreds into the air, while Tommy put his arm round Peggy's waist and hugged her.

(By permission of Radio Pictures, Ltd., starring Bert Wheeler as Tommy Tanner; Robert Woolsey as Egbert G. Higginbotham; Dorothy Lee as Peggy Morton; Lucy Beaumont as Mrs. Talley; Jason Robards as Watters; DeWitt Jennings as Chief Morton; Charles Middleton as Flint; Bill Scott as Clarke.)

BILLIARD TABLES 1/- per week

Remember you are dealing direct—we finance our own system.

SIZE	Deposit	Four Monthly Payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10/-	6 6	26/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8 6	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10/-	12 6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	15 6	52/-
6 ft. 4 in. x 3 ft. 3 in.	10/-	22-	80/-

Perfect reproduction of Full-Size Tables, Brass Frame Pockets, Leather Covered, Adjustable Feet to ensure a perfect level surface. Complete with two Cues, three Turned Balls, Guaranteed Unbreakable, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules & Chalk.

Size 4ft. 4ins. x 2ft. 3ins. Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk. 55/-

SPECIAL OFFER
Slate Bed Billiard Table

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge Street, London.

Send for Complete Illustrated List with Xmas Supplement of Jokes and Games.

PARCEL OF 200 Interesting Stamps, such as Persia, Siam, Roumania (Boy King), Triangular, etc., price 3d. with Approvals only.—W. A. WHITE, 30, Engine Lane, L.Y.E., Stourbridge.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

BE TALL Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/- Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London N W 2

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars simple home cure.—Send stamp.—MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

Collector has numerous genuine PRE-WAR STAMPS for sale. Many British Colonials. Boys rarely get the chance of such fine old specimens at 18 (post free) per packet of 30 (all different). My packets contain quality not quantity.—E. BADCOCK, 17, Manor Park Avenue, Princes Risboro', Bucks.

BE TALLER! Increased my own height to 6ft. 3ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

BLUSHING. Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness, Worry Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back! Booklet sent Free, privately.—L. A. Stebbing, 28, Dean Rd., London, N W 2.

STAMMERING. STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars Free.—FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

HEIGHT INCREASED Complete course 5/-. Clients gain 1 to 5 ins. Particulars, testimonials free.—P. A. CLIVE, Harrocksouse, Colwyn Bay N Wales. December 19th, 1931.

BOYS! HERE'S A SUPER GIFT

GREAT "MATCH" FOOTBALL

80
COUPONS

B.D.V.

CIGARETTES

each Coupon worth 3
TIMES other coupon values

SOCCER SKIPPERS!

Get all the boys collecting for this "Match" football. Only seven coupons per head if the whole team joins in. It's a real winner. Stout leather case. Bladder of pure Para rubber. Don't spend club funds when you can get your new-season's ball FREE with B.D.V! Get together NOW

*Old King Cole was a merry
old soul,
And a merry old soul was he;
He called for his pipe,
He called for a light,
And he called for his B.D.V.*

GET THE GOLDEN GIFT BOOK

To Godfrey Phillips, Ltd. (Dept. B.C.),
39, Commercial Street,
London, E.1.

Please send me the amazing
B.D.V. Golden Gift Book, in full colour, with 5 free coupons, showing 275 treble-value gifts.

Name

Address

B.2.

EVEN LESS COUPONS REQUIRED FROM B.D.V. TOBACCO—EACH TOBACCO COUPON BEING WORTH 1 1/2 CIGARETTE COUPONS.

ISSUED BY THE PROPRIETORS, GODFREY PHILLIPS LIMITED, ESTABLISHED 1814.

Boys' Cinema

"Bad Company" and "The Fighting Test."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boys' CINEMA 2

No. 628.

EVERY TUESDAY.

DECEMBER 26th, 1931.

BUCK JONES in

Wanted for a stage robbery, a young cow-puncher fights hard to regain his honour.

BRANDIED

Arrested for a hold-up of which they are innocent, Tom Dale and his Swedish henchman, Olaf, escape from jail by a trick, and Tom enters into possession of a ranch bequeathed to him by an uncle, only to encounter fresh trouble. A stirring drama of the West, full of unexpected twists and turns. Starring Buck Jones and Ethel Kenyon.

A Hold-Up.

FROM Falls City to Westonville is a matter of forty-five miles, or thereabouts, and forty-five miles is not considered any distance at all in Texas. But Tom Dale had ridden out of Knox County with Olaf Jensen—and the Bar-C Ranch, in that county, is over eighty miles from either town, so that, aside from a brief night's camp in the hills, the two had been in the saddle for the better part of a day and a half.

Tom, however, had no complaints to make. He had made plenty concerning more important things the previous morning to the overbearing foreman of the Bar-C, ere demanding his pay and announcing his immediate intention to quit; but he was rather enjoying the ride. The day was hot, but not uncomfortable so, and Silver, his big and intelligent white horse, was still as fresh as paint.

It was Olaf Jensen—sometimes known as "Ole," but more frequently as "Swede"—who did all the complaining. Yet Olaf had accompanied Tom entirely of his own accord, preferring that young man's company in an uncertain quest to continued employment on the Bar-C without it.

As a matter of fact, it was largely over Olaf that Tom's quarrel with the foreman had originated. For Olaf was a queer fellow, a tall and powerful son of Swedish immigrants, who lacked the courage to fight his own battles, though physically capable of holding his own under the most adverse circumstances.

One of the things about him which irritated the foreman was his dogged devotion to a battered bowler of Swedish pattern which he invariably wore instead of the regulation cow-hat. And the previous morning the howler had been knocked off his head, and Olaf himself had been knocked off his horse for persisting in wearing the thing.

Every bit as dogged as Olaf's devotion to his ancient bowler was his devotion to Tom, whom he almost worshipped. Consequently, the foreman had suffered severely at Tom's indignant hands, and Tom had unburdened his mind of many pent-up grievances while the foreman nursed an aching jaw and murdered the pair of them with his eyes.

Tom was like that—quick of temper, quick of tongue, and quick to champion the oppressed. His keen grey eyes gave witness to his indomitable soul—and he was as quick on the trigger as any man in Texas, if not quicker.

But if he was impulsive he was warm-hearted. Once upon a time he had put a man in bed for weeks for maltreating a steer; and more than once he had flogged a man for flogging a worn-out horse. He was an implacable enemy, but he was a staunch friend.

Half-way to Westonville, however, even he became impatient with Olaf, for the Swede, uncomfortably mounted on a bony brown horse, alternately filled the air with complainings about the heat and snatches of song rendered in a voice so raucous that it grated on one's nerves.

Together they breasted a hill out of a region of grassland and looked down upon the winding coach trail beneath them. In the distance were the purple hills, while, nearer to hand, the roadway dipped down between a mass of tumbled rocks. Automatically they paused there, and the majestic scene appealed to Tom's sense of the beautiful. But Olaf, who had been grunting and groaning all the way up the hill, suddenly began to sing again.

"For the love of Mike, don't sing!" commanded Tom. "Just look at that road, winding its way among the rocks! Just look at them hills, all purplish-like! Just—"

"I hope we get to where we're going to soon," interrupted Olaf, with what he considered to be a touch of humour, "because my feet is gettin' awful sore!"

"Give the old pony a kick and let's get going," said Tom disgustedly. "You've got no sense of nature."

"If you was a-sitting on a bundle of bones—"

"Aw, come on, Ole!"

They were nearly at the bottom of the hill, when round a bend to the left the coach came into view, travelling from the direction of Westonville. It reached the patch of fallen rock, and there abruptly it came to a full stop, the four horses that were drawing it pulled almost on to their hind legs by the driver. For a solitary horseman had ridden out from the rocks, and a gun was in his hand.

At that distance, neither Tom nor Olaf could gain a very clear impression of the bandit who, in this wise, had held up the coach, but Tom immediately dug his heels into Silver's broad sides,

The Christmas present you MUST have. THE BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL
On sale everywhere, price 6/- net.

shot over the roadway, and galloped towards the rocks. Olaf, emitting loud groans, followed his example.

Meanwhile, the bandit flourished his gun and barked instructions at the chagrined driver of the coach, a weather-beaten old veteran named Jed Knowles.

"Throw out that sack from under the seat, and no monkey business. G'wan—my partner's got you covered!"

Jed looked round, and saw the barrel of a rifle pointing directly at him over the edge of a boulder on his left. He abandoned his first idea of driving on and chancing the aim of the man on horseback, and, reaching down, pulled out the mailbag from under the seat and tumbled it into the dust.

Beside Jed on the box was seated an elderly rancher with a walrus moustache, and—at the moment—a very white face. Across this passenger's ample waistcoat stretched conspicuously a gold chain. The bandit looked down at the mailbag and up at the waistcoat.

"I'll have to trouble you for that watch and chain!" he shouted.

"Oh, mister," protested the shrinking passenger, "you wouldn't take a man's timepiece, would you?"

"Wouldn't I?" was the immediate retort. "Toss it over quick!"

Reluctantly the passenger removed the watch from his pocket and the chain from his waistcoat and threw them. The bandit caught the chain, but the watch dangled precariously for a moment.

"Be careful—don't break it!" cried the owner in alarm.

The watch was thrust into a pocket, the six-shooter waved to Jed.

"Get going!"

Jed spat, cursed, snatched up his whip, and flicked the leaders. The coach moved on, and the man who had held it up reached down from his saddle and picked up the heavy mailbag. With a sarcastic wave to the disappearing coach, he rode in among the rocks with his prize, retrieved a rifle which had been propped in position with the aid of stones, and sought a little nook between the rocks in which to open the bag and search for valuables.

He dismounted, squatted with his back to an upright boulder, and unfastened the bag; and he was emptying out the letters when Tom and Olaf looked down at him from behind a rock high above his head.

"It was a hold-up," whispered Tom. "We'll head that hombre off. You get over there."

They had dismounted, and their horses were nibbling the sparse herbage nearer the road. Olaf obediently crept behind another rock and drew his gun, but Tom picked up a lump of limestone, lifted it to the top of his hiding-place, and sent it hurtling down on the bandit beneath.

It should have hit him on the head, but a ridge deflected its descent, and it fell upon a pair of hands that were about to open an envelope. Immediately the bandit sprang to his feet, took cover, and fired upwards.

A bullet whizzed past Tom's big hat and struck another and higher rock behind him. Almost instantly he fired back, using a shoulder of rock to take aim. But the stranger provided for just such an attack by deserting the mailbag and diving between two needle-like stems of limestone.

Gun answered gun, but the bullets spat harmlessly, splintering fragments of rock above and below. Olaf, scared almost out of his wits, sank down on his knees and fired mainly at the blue sky above him.

And then, because he imagined he was almost completely surrounded, the bandit abandoned his plunder, creeping away from rock to rock till he reached his horse, which he had left beneath a stunted oak near the roadway. Tom wasted a cartridge—or thought he had wasted it—then watched with a sense of disappointment a flying figure on horseback that sped up the winding trail towards Westonville.

"Come on, Swede," he shouted, "the war's over!"

Olaf's bowler appeared above the rock behind which he had been crouching.

"Has he g-g-gone?" he chattered.

"No," said Tom grimly, as he moved round to his kneeling ohum, "he's on his way back. Come on!"

They descended to the spot where the contents of the mail-bag lay strown upon the earth. The sun had reached its zenith, and was blazing down upon them.

"Pheugh," complained Olaf, viewing the litter, "anybody might have thought we was running a post-office! Say, there might be enough money in some o' these letters to keep us going for a bit!"

"You put those letters back in that bag," snapped Tom. "Come on—I'll help!"

In Gaol—and Out!

AS fate would have it, the coach had been held up four times in the past month near that particular cluster of rocks, and the sheriff of Falls City, stung into activity by the reproaches of the community over which he more or less ruled, had ridden out with a posse that morning on the off-chance of capturing a brigand.

Within half a mile of the scene of the hold-up he encountered the coach, and had word with old Jed and the passengers. What Jed had to say was almost enough to paint the purple hills a bright vermilion, and the man on the box who had been robbed of his watch, though less fluent in his language, was equally violent in his wrath.

"Oh, so you're a sheriff, are you?" he roared. "Well, I'm glad you've turned up. Held up, just like a lot of babies, about half a mile back on the road there!"

Explanations followed, and a description of the bandit which told the sheriff little, because the inside passengers were at utter variance with Jed and the passenger who sat beside him as to details. Some even described the supposed second man, though they had seen nothing more of him than the barrel of a rifle.

"Come on, boys!" shouted the representative of law and order. "We'll know what they're like when we get 'em!"

"Hi," yelled the outside passenger as they began to ride away, "don't forget I want my watch from them two thieves!"

The sheriff, concerned about the loss of the mail-bag, ignored the request, and, as a matter of regrettable fact, forgot all about the watch.

Among the rocks Tom and Olaf were busy picking up the scattered letters, but Olaf was slow because he persisted in studying every envelope before restoring it to the bag.

"We ought to get a good reward for this," remarked Tom.

"Oh, ya, sure," nodded the Swede, and suddenly gave vent to an exclamation of disgust.

"What's the matter?" inquired Tom. "Why, here's a fellow what's got the funniest name you ever heard," was the

"I just put it up," said Tom, "why take it down?" And he leaned insolently against the rail.

reply. "Cuthbert Chauncey Dale! Relative o' yours, d'you s'pose?"

"What's that?" cried Tom.

"Cuthbert Chauncey— Oh, but you can't do that!"

Tom had snatched away the missive and was tearing open the envelope.

"Can't I?" said he grimly. "Well, this letter happens to belong to me."

"But your name's Tom."

"Listen, Swede, my name is Cuthbert Chauncey Dale. But if you ever mention it to anybody, or chip me about it, you'll wish you hadn't."

"Why, boss," gasped Olaf, "I swear I'm never goin' to tell anybody such a terrible thing like that! But I'd just like to ask you how you came to get a name like Chaun—"

"Don't say it again!" hissed Tom. "My parents gave it to me, but I think it was the fault of an aunt who read books. I had an awful time trying to live it down when I was a kid, and as soon as I left home I took the name of Tom."

He had extracted a letter from the envelope while he was talking, and, opening it out, proceeded to master its contents.

"It's from a lawyer in Westonville," he informed Olaf. "You know I was aiming to look up an uncle who had a ranch there, in case he could give us both a job. Well, this lawyer says he's dead, and I've inherited a section of land up there, and what am I going to do about it!"

"By golly!" rejoiced the Swede. "I felt in my bones that something was coming our way!"

Something was coming their way with a vengeance; for the sheriff and his men had caught sight of Silver and the brown horse down by the roadway, and, dismounting, had crept in among the rocks to surround their quarry. The two were storing the remainder of the letters in the mail-bag when a stentorian voice immediately over their heads startled them.

"Up with your hands!"

"Boss," gasped Olaf as he got to his feet in a panic and raised his hands, "ho's come back?"

Tom stood beside him. His quick eyes had seen more than one gun pointed in their direction, but he said nothing. And then the sheriff came scrambling down to them, and his men closed in triumphantly.

"Got the goods on you this time!" barked the sheriff.

Certainly the evidence seemed clear enough. There was the mail-bag in the dust, and at the feet of the captives lay the last of the unreturned letters which they had dropped as they held up their hands. To make matters worse, Tom's indignant protest indicated a complete knowledge of the hold-up, for what he said was this:

"Why, you don't think we held up the stage, do you?"

"Wo ain't thinkin'," snorted the sheriff, "we know!"

"Oh, listen, you fellows. I can explain everything."

"You'll do all your explainin' at the end of a rope," retorted the sheriff. Whereupon Olaf, trembling like an aspen leaf, stammered:

"Aw, but say, mister, the—the—the—"

"Shut up!"

"I—I—I—I'm shut," faltered the unhappy Swede. But Tom was not to be silenced so easily.

"Say," he insisted, "we ran that bandit off, and was aimin' to bring that stuff to town."

The sheriff frowned. Certainly this captive looked honest enough, with his clear-cut, clean-shaven features and his keen grey eyes. But while the sheriff was wavering, one of his men stepped forward and snatched the opened envelope from the pocket of Tom's shirt.

"If these guys didn't do it," he cried scornfully, "what's this letter doin' on him?"

The sheriff was convinced, refused to listen to any further arguments, and picked up the mail-bag. The prisoners were marched off to the spot where the horses had been left, and a few minutes later the whole party were on their way to Falls City.

It was late in the afternoon when the town gaol was reached. Tom demanded that the driver of the coach should be produced to establish his innocence, but the coach had long since proceeded on the second stage of its journey to distant Oak Springs, so the prisoners were marched through the sheriff's office to the barred cell beyond it.

"You hombres sure picked a bad day for a hold-up," said the sheriff sarcastically as he removed the key from the lock. "Friday, the 13th."

He strode back to the front doorway and addressed the members of his posse, who were waiting there.

"You fellows had better go and get some grub," he said. "Old Jed won't be back till day after to-morrow, so there's no hurry."

The men went off, and the sheriff presently devoured a meal which was brought to him by his red-headed deputy from the hotel over the way. The deputy went home to tea; the sheriff, tired with his exertions, put his feet on the desk, lolled back in his chair, tilted his big hat over his eyes—and slumbered.

Daylight was fading when he wakened with a start. Judging by the commotion in the cell the two prisoners were fighting! He rose heavily and went to the iron door. In the dim light he saw that Tom had got Olaf by the throat and seemed intent on choking him.

"What are you doing in there?" he roared. "Leave him alone!"

But instead of obeying the command, Tom forced his victim back against a wall, and the sheriff in a fury unlocked the door and rushed in to separate them.

Immediately Tom turned his attention to the intruder, and Olaf sprang for the open door and ran out into the street. A well-timed blow to the sheriff's scrubby chin sent that discomfited official sprawling backwards on the solitary bunk, and before he could regain his feet the door of the cell was locked on him, and Tom was half-way across the office.

Silver and the brown horse had been left tethered to the hitching-rail outside, and it was only a matter of seconds to unfasten them. But a man on the veranda of the Blue Boar saloon raised the alarm. Pushing open the swing doors, he cried excitedly:

"Bill! Mike! The bandits are getting away!"

Men came tumbling out into the street, and there was a rush for horses. The deputy sheriff scuttled over to the gaol and released the hoodwinked sheriff, but by the time the posse were in the saddle and creating a cloud of dust Tom and Olaf were out of sight.

It is no easy matter to pursue well-mounted fugitives in the dark, and there was as yet no moon. This way and that the pursuers rode, but by the time the moon came up over the hills the trail was cold, and the chase proved fruitless.

An Inheritance For Tom.

TOM and his companion deserted the road as soon as they were out of the town. A belt of long-leaf pines provided cover for the better part of two miles, and then they galloped across a stretch of prairie and plunged into a gulch lined with rock.

They were in the gulch before the moon rose, and a brief pause convinced them that no one as yet had found their trail.

"Friday the thirteenth!" quoth Olaf dismally. "D'you know this is my birthday?"

"So it's you that's brought all the luck, is it?" growled Tom. "Pity I didn't really choke you, eh?"

They rode on without any particular hurry. Westonville beckoned, in view of the letter from the lawyer, but Westonville would do well enough in the morning. They reached the end of the gulch, and found themselves in a moonlit landscape of grassy slopes with a river gleaming in the distance.

"My, but I'm mighty hungry," remarked Olaf.

"Same here," declared Tom.

They breasted a little rise, and then he pointed. Down on the river bank, under a tree, a camp fire had been lit—a camp fire over which a dark figure crouched, evidently preparing some sort of a meal. They rode down, and as they approached the figure resolved itself into a man with a decided limp, who drew his gun and waited.

"How do?" inquired Tom pleasantly. "Stranger in these parts?" demanded the man.

"Yeah. Don't know this range very well," replied Tom. "In fact, we're trying to get out of it."

"Looking for someone?"

The voice was suspicious, almost treacherous, and the gun still threatened. But Tom replied, with an air of frankness:

"No one in particular. Just got out of a little trouble, and thought maybe I could get some grub up here."

"Well, I can stake you to some food," said the man in a more friendly manner, and put away his gun. "I'm in a little trouble myself. My horse stuck his foot in a gopher-hole yesterday and turned over on me. I can't get around very well. Still, maybe I can help you. All I've got is some beans and bacon, and some good Java coffee."

"That coffee smells good!" rejoiced Tom. "Swede, we eat! How far are we from Westonville, pardner?"

"Well, you're in Falls County now. Westonville is just the other side of the ridge. The grub's in the pack. Perhaps you'll help me cook it?"

Tom expressed his readiness, and he and Olaf dismounted, but it was Olaf who demonstrated his powers as a cook while Tom and the stranger conversed. Bob Starrett, it appeared, was the lone camper's name, and Tom decided that he rather liked him, despite his somewhat gruff voice and his dark features.

Over the meal that followed Starrett asked what his guests were doing in that particular part of the country.

"As a matter of fact," confided Tom, "I'm heading for the Dale ranch. It used to belong to an uncle of mine, and I've fallen heir to it."

Starrett stared.

"You don't mean old Tom Dale?" he exclaimed.

"I do. Did you know him?"

"Yes," replied Starrett warmly, "I knew him well. He did me a favour once. His was that stretch of land a fellow by the name of Moore tried to cheat him out of."

"Cheat him out of?" echoed Tom, to whom this was news. "Well, I guess that gives me two reasons for going to Westonville."

Starrett rolled cigarettes for himself and his guests, then, fugging at his clipped moustache, he said diffidently:

"Couldn't use an extra cowhand, could you? I'm looking for a job, added to which I've got an old score to settle with that hombre Joe Moore myself."

Tom considered the suggestion.

"Well," he said finally, "I don't know about Moore, but I think I might be able to use a good cowhand."

The moon by this time had climbed high into the heavens, and it was almost like day by the river bank; but peace enfolded the world, and there was no sound of hoofs to disturb the silence of the night. The three curled up on the turf in their blankets and slept till day-break, Tom declaring that Silver would give them warning of the approach of any unwanted strangers.

There was just enough food to go round for breakfast, and afterwards they cauntered together, climbing the ridge and descending to the road outside the town of Westonville. Starrett, who knew the way, took them by the shortest possible route, and Tom's liking for him increased, though his expert eyes were not at all convinced about the alleged gopher-hole.

"That fellow," he said to himself, "has been shot in the foot or I'm a Dutchman; but it's no business of mine."

Westonville proved to be a town of considerable size, though mainly composed of wooden frame buildings and log cabins. Starrett directed Tom to the office of Jacob Hines, attorney-at-law, and Tom, tethering Silver, told Olaf to take the new cowhand to a doctor to have his foot tended.

He himself entered the building, which was on a corner, and climbed some rickety stairs to a door on the first floor. In response to the banging of his knuckles on the panels, a voice bade him enter, and he found himself in the presence of a lean-faced, white-haired man, who looked up at him from a desk strewn with papers.

"My name's Dale," said Tom diffidently. "I've come about a piece of land I've fell heir to."

"Oh," said Mr. Hines pleasantly. "So you're Cuthbert Chauncey Dale, eh? Sit down! D'you know I've had a hard time finding you, my lad?"

"It hasn't been half as hard as the time I've had finding you," chuckled Tom, seating himself in a chair beside the desk.

"Of course," said the lawyer cautiously, "you're able to establish your identity?"

"Sure," responded Tom, groping in his pockets. "I did a stretch in the Service. I've got a discharge here." He held out an Army paper. "That ought to prove something."

Mr. Hines ran his eyes over the document and nodded.

"Cuthbert Chauncey Dale," he said, returning the paper and opening a drawer. "Quite a name, eh?"

"You can have it," declared Tom, with a grimace.

"Not at all, Mr. Dale—not at all!"

"That's the same way I feel about it," said Tom bitterly.

Mr. Hines produced a bundle of papers from the drawer, tied about with pink tape.

"Here are all the Dale ranch papers," he said benevolently. "You might look them over."

Tom took the papers and removed the tape. For the better part of ten minutes he was busy studying them. Then:

"Say," he exclaimed, with a frown, "what's this thing here about land rights?"

Mr. Hines explained that when Mr. Thomas Dale was alive he had leased a strip of land to the Preston family, who had the biggest cattle outfit in the country, but the lease had just run out.

"You can get a good price for that strip," he said.

"Yeah?" wondered Tom. "Why?"

The lawyer clasped his hands together and pointed his two forefingers at Tom.

"Well, you see," he said gravely, "the best grazing lands in this county are some little valleys that lie back of your land, and the only way into those valleys is through a narrow canyon located on your property."

"You mean," said Tom, "that I could fence off that canyon and cut 'em clean off, eh?"

"Exactly!" nodded the lawyer. "And since they need this land they'll pay plenty for your strip that gives them right of access."

"H'm!" mused Tom, pushing back his hat and knitting his level brows. "Say, just where is this Preston outfit located?"

"A little way up the valley beyond the range that is now yours."

"Oh! Then I guess when you've done with me my first job is to go out and talk turkey to the Prestons."

The lawyer smiled non-committally, and certain legal formalities followed. Ten minutes later Tom went down the rickety stairs into the morning sunlight and found Olaf standing between his brown horse and Silver.

"What did you do with that guy Starrett?" he inquired. "Take him to a doctor like I told you?"

"Well," said Olaf, with an ingratiating grin, "I couldn't find no doctor, so I took him into the saloon—and when I left him he was perfectly happy."

"Oh!" grunted Tom. "Well, we'll go out and take a look at the ranch—we can pick him up later."

The Building of a Fence.

THE Dale ranch was situated about three miles from the town of Westonville, and the ranch-house itself was at the end of a lane fringed with hickory, ash, and maple trees. It looked little more than a bunk-house, built of logs, with a narrow veranda in front of it, reached by four steps.

"Signs don't mean anything to the law, Dale," declared the sheriff. "I'm here to arrest you for cattle rustling."

Olaf contemplated the building with a crestfallen air, and rubbed his chin.

"You wasn't figuring on settling here, was you?" he said gloomily.

Tom looked away from the ranch-house to the pleasant valleys beyond it and the guardian hills that enclosed his valleys.

"Not on your life," he laughed. "I wouldn't settle anywhere. I'm going to sell this place and get out as fast as I possibly can."

He slid from the back of the big white horse and jerked a thumb.

"May's well have a look round the premises," he decided.

Together they entered the shack. Evidently Uncle Tom had lived a lonely sort of existence, and had not studied his comfort, for apart from a few moth-eaten rugs the floors were bare, and the furniture was of the roughest imaginable type. With growing disgust the two proceeded from the living-room to the kitchen, from the kitchen to the two bed-rooms.

Silver and the brown horse had been left to their own devices outside, and Silver promptly decided to investigate on his own account. The brown horse trotted off with him, and a hundred yards or so to the right of the ranch-house they crossed the strip of alkali that opened into the little valleys owned by Louise Preston, sole survivor of the Preston family.

Some horses were grazing just beyond the canyon, and Silver, in skittish mood, darted in among them and sent them running in all directions. The brown horse, inspired by the white horse's example, assisted in the rout.

Out from the little valley rode a slender girl on a big bay mare—a girl in riding-breeches with a felt hat perched on her bobbed brown hair. She viewed the stampede with feminine rage, and gave chase to Silver, snatching up her lariat as she rode.

On the fringe of the yard outside the ranch-house she sent the rope whizzing through the air with expert aim. The noose descended about Silver's proud neck, and was tightened, and the girl slid from her saddle while the big white horse ran indignantly round and round, trying to free himself.

Tom and Olaf, inside the shack, glanced out through the dusty panes of a window, and immediately Tom rushed out into the yard. He hadn't stepped to notice the sex of the lassoer, and, as he jumped the steps from the veranda, her back view appeared quite masculine. He gave her a kick that sent her sprawling on all-fours, then whistled to Silver and freed his neck of the rope.

An angry but distinctly feminine voice caused him to turn and to jump in horrified surprise.

"You big jackass, what do you think you're doing?" shrilled the girl.

He found himself staring into an enraged but beautiful little face and a pair of flashing brown eyes that were trying to annihilate him.

"Why—why—why, I'm s-sorry, miss," he said sheepishly. "I wouldn't have done that—"

"If you were a gentleman," stormed the girl, "you'd apologise—"

"Oh!" said Tom, recovering a measure of his self-possession. "But what would you have done if you'd caught some little sawed-off runt roping your horse?"

His words acted as fuel to the flame of the girl's temper.

"Sawed-off runt?" she shouted. "Say, do you know who you're talking to?"

"No, ma'am," replied Tom. "I don't much care, either!"

December 26th, 1931.

"Well, I'm Lou Preston, and I own all the country around here."

"Not this bit, you don't!" he retorted calmly.

"What do you mean?"

"He means," said a voice behind them, "that he's the new owner."

Unnoticed by either of them, a broad-shouldered and rather narrow-eyed man had ridden up. He looked about thirty-five, and a dangerous customer. A cruel mouth was twisted into a sardonic grin beneath a little brown moustache.

"Is that so?" exclaimed Louise Preston blankly.

Tom did not reply; he was studying the newcomer, whom he correctly judged to be Joe Moore, the man with whom Starrett had a score to settle. But Joe Moore nodded maliciously, and said:

"His full name, I believe, is Cuthbert Chauncey Dale."

"Cuthbert Chauncey?" echoed Lou with a mocking laugh. "Wow! What a handle! No wonder he's so bad-tempered. Cuthbert Chauncey—"

Tom, who had never been able to hear the sound of his own name, completely lost his temper. Striding over to Moore he said fiercely:

"Listen, you! Another little joke outa you, and I'll forget there's a lady present."

"Perhaps," retorted Joe Moore significantly, "we can continue this interesting conversation when there isn't a lady present, Mr.—Mr. Dale!"

He tugged his horse round, and Lou, vaulting into the saddle of the bay with a skill that compelled Tom's grudging admiration, re-coiled her lariat, replaced it on the saddle-bow, and called out:

"Bye-bye, Cuthbert!"

"Don't bother coming back this way," bellowed Tom as they loped away together, "cause there'll be a fence out there!"

Olaf had stepped out from the shack, but had not ventured any farther than the little veranda. Now he wandered down the steps and over to Tom.

"A fence?" he said. "What do you mean about a fence?"

"I mean just this," snapped Tom. "We're staying right here. Nobody's going to call me Cuthbert and get away with it!"

So Tom moved into the ranch-house with Olaf and Beb Starrett, and he bought a little extra furniture and a lot of wood, for the first thing he proposed to do was to build a fence right across the canyon, barring the way to the Preston valleys.

Most of his uncle's stock had been sold at his death, and Starrett looked after the few cattle that remained while Tom and Olaf toiled at the erection of the barrier, which was a long job.

A fortnight later the fence was complete except for three posts and a few rails, and Olaf was digging holes for the posts and wiping his streaming face with the back of his hand because the day was hot.

"Say, boss," he growled to Tom, who was nailing rails in position, "was there no place where you could buy ready-made pest-holes?"

"What's the matter?" Tom laughed. "Getting tired? Here, I'll relieve you."

They exchanged tools, but almost immediately Olaf hit his thumb instead of a nail, and danced about with pain, filling the air with complainings. Tom silently handed him back the spade and picked up the fallen hammer.

A few minutes later a trim figure on horseback appeared in sight. It was Lou Preston, riding to have word with Tom, and she was not in the best of tempers, because that morning Joe Moore, her range manager, had proposed to her for the fifth time, and she had told him, as before, that she liked him very much as manager, but not enough to marry him.

She rode through the gap between the last two posts, curled round the workers, and pulled up. She was looking far more feminine nowadays, in a divided skirt and a fluffy blouse, with a gaily-coloured handkerchief round her neck, but Tom affected not to see her.

"Good-morning, Mr. Cuthbert!" she said mockingly.

"The name's Dale," he retorted, "and I'm busy!"

He fastened a rail across the solitary gap while she sat watching him with a frown.

"I made you a pretty generous offer for your place, young man," she said angrily. "You'd better accept it."

"I told you once before," he responded quietly, "this place is net for sale."

"All right, then. If you won't sell, I'll drive you out!"

"I'll be waiting for the fireworks, miss," he told her calmly, and picked up a notice-board and attached it to the fence. It read: "Dale Ranch. Private Property. Keep Out!"

He pointed to it significantly with the hammer, and it made her furious.

"Take down that fence!" she cried. "I want to get out!"

"I just put it up," said he, "why take it down?" And he leaned insolently against the rail while Olaf looked on in obvious enjoyment.

"Oh, leave it up, then!" she snapped, and rode off along the fence.

She came to another notice: "Dale Ranch. Keep Out! That Means You!" But she could find no other gap, so she set her bay mare at the railing. The mare shied, but Lou was determined. She rode back a few paces and made another attempt.

This time the mare jumped, but fouled the top rail, threw her heavily into a patch of scrub, and went galloping off across her own land.

Tom's temper, born almost entirely of her frequent use of the names he owned but hated, flew to the spot where she had fallen, dropped on one knee, and raised her gently in his arms. Her face was very white, her eyes were closed.

"Lou—Lou!" he said anxiously, but she did not answer, so he carried her over to a grassy bank beneath a spreading maple and laid her on the turf, then howled to Olaf to bring a water-bottle.

"Is she hurt?" inquired the Swede as Tom held the bottle to her lips.

"You get out of here!" barked Tom. "Go away! Leu—Lou!"

Joe Moore, following his young employer at a discreet distance, had met an assistant, Tex Howard, and was riding with him over on the Preston property. Tex, a swarthy half-breed, jerked a thumb in the direction of the maple-tree as he and Moore emerged from a clump of mesquite.

"Well, it don't take people long to get acquainted round here," he chuckled.

"Won't take me long to separate them, either!" snarled Moore, with jealous rage. "Let's get back out of sight."

Framed.

LOU had been stunned by the fall, but she was quite conscious when Tom picked her up. In spite of herself she felt fascinated by this self-possessed young man, and she found the experience of being held in his arms a pleasantly novel one. But when the water began to trickle between her lips she could no longer keep up the pretence of having swooned.

She pushed away the bottle, opened her dark brown eyes, and put a hand to her brow.

"Oooh, my head!" she murmured, sitting up. "Where am I?"

"I—I think you're on the Dale Ranch," replied Tom, removing his arms with some reluctance. "You—you feel better?"

"Yes, thank you. Where's my horse?"

Tom got to his feet and looked across the fence.

"There he goes," he said, pointing. "Right up the hill there—I guess he's headed for parts unknown! And listen, young lady, that ought to be a very good lesson to you never to try to jump people's fences."

She sprang up indignantly at that.

"When I want a lecture from you, I'll ask for it!" she cried scornfully, and with that she dived between the rails on to her own land, and went off with her head in the air.

"I hope you enjoy your walk home!" Tom called after her.

On the following morning Joe Moore rode into Westonville to draw money from the bank, and Tex accompanied him, but repaired to the Lone Star Saloon to quench his thirst while the cheque was being cashed.

As fate would have it, Tom was in Westonville that morning. He had ridden in with Starrett, his object being to raise a loan on the deeds of the property in order to buy some stock, and he was in the bank talking to the manager when Moore entered.

That rascal overheard sufficient of the conversation to set his wits working, and as soon as a clerk had attended to him he went and called Tex out from the saloon.

"Listen," he said, "Dale's in the bank, raising some mency on that land of his. He wants to buy cattle. You get hold of him and tell him you've got fifty head you can sell pretty cheap."

"Me?" exclaimed the astonished half-breed.

"Yes, you. He hasn't seen you up to now—not to notice you. Tell him you're getting out of the country—tell him anything. Use a fake name. Saunders would do—Bill Saunders. That sounds honest."

"Yeah, but 'spose he says okay, where do I get fifty head?" grunted Tex. "Out of my hat?"

"It isn't a joke!" snapped Moore. "You make arrangements for him to see them to-morrow, and to-night get up and take fifty head from that herd on the mesa."

Tex stared.

"But they've all got the Preston brand on them!" he exclaimed.

"Exactly!"

Moore's elaborate wink made things plainer.

"Oh!" said Tex. "I—I get you."

The bank was on a corner, and they passed it slowly. Silver was waiting patiently by the kerb.

"There's his horse," said Moore. "You wait right here for him."

Tex nodded, and Moore went off to make some purchases. Five minutes elapsed, and then Tom emerged from the bank highly satisfied with the result of his interview. He was in the act of swinging himself into the saddle when Tex approached him, calling his name.

"What is it?" asked Tom, turning about.

"My name's Saunders," lied Tex. "Bill Saunders. I've been given to understand you're figuring on buying some cattle."

"That's correct," admitted Tom.

"Well, I've got fifty head I could let you have mighty cheap."

It had been Tom's intention to voice his requirements in the saloon, where several ranchers were almost bound to have congregated, but this seemed an easier alternative.

"What do you call cheap?" he demanded.

"Well, being that they're yearlings, I can let you have them for about twenty-five dollars a head."

"That sounds reasonable enough," conceded Tom. "When can I see them?"

Tex scratched his chin as though considering the matter.

"Well," he said, "I'll have to round 'em up to-night, and then you can see 'em in the morning. I'll run 'em on to your ranch about seven."

The suggested arrangement sounded eminently satisfactory, and Tom sought the saloon only to dig out Starrett, who had been imbibing. He rode back to the ranch-house well content with the morning's work.

But at nine o'clock next day a cow-hand galloped up to the wooden office of the Preston Ranch, swung himself to the ground, and rushed excitedly into the presence of Joe Moore, who was sitting at his desk conversing with Tex.

"Mr. Moore," cried the cow-hand. "rustlers have run cattle off the mesa!"

"Get a look at 'em?" asked Moore, concealing his satisfaction.

"No; but I followed their trail, and they're on that feller Dale's land."

"Round up the boys, quick as you can!"

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

KEN MAYNARD

IN

"TWO'S COMPANY."

Flaming guns and non-stop action in the thrilling story of a grim range war of the Lone Star State.

"SKYLINE."

After years of hardship a boy finds his foot on the ladder. He climbs, but always he bears a bitter hatred against his unknown father. They were doomed to meet in strange circumstances. A tale of the American skyscrapers, starring Thomas Meighan and Hardie Albright.

"THE STARBRITE DIAMOND."

A gripping complete story of the mysterious disappearance of a valuable jewel.

ALSO

The sixth episode of our gripping serial: "DANGER ISLAND." Tell all your friends about these grand film stories.

The cow-hand dashed out as precipitately as he had entered, and Moore grinned at his accomplice.

"Dale's going to have a pretty tough time trying to explain what he is doing with Preston stock," he exulted.

"Yeah!" agreed the half-breed. "That fake bill of sale you gave me was sure a big idea."

"I'm not so sure that wasn't a mistake," growled Moore. "Anyway, you keep out o' sight for a couple of days. Understand?"

"I'll appear after the funeral," chuckled Tex.

The office adjoined the manager's cabin; the cabin was across the yard from the big ranch-house, which was Lou's home. Lou herself was in the kitchen talking to her squaw housekeeper when a commotion in the yard drew her to the window. She saw to her astonishment that half the members of her outfit, instead of getting on with their work, were grouped together on their horses outside the office, where Joe Moore was addressing them. She ran out to them.

"What's happened, Joe?" she inquired.

"We're going to pick up some rustlers," replied Moore.

"It's that Dale fellow; miss," explained a cowboy.

Her brown eyes widened, then narrowed.

"I'm going to ride with you," she decided.

"Better not, Lou," urged Moore.

"You stay here."

"I said I'm riding with you," insisted Lou. "Fetch Nell for me, Fred."

The cow-hand thus addressed went off in a hurry, while Moore turned away to hide his annoyance. He did not want her with him on such an occasion.

The bay mare was brought, however, and she rode with the outfit away through a wooded valley and up a hill on to the grassy tableland, or mesa, whence fifty head of her stock had been driven by a circuitous route on to Tom's land. The trail was there for all to see, and they followed it easily enough, descending into a hollow near the Dale ranch.

So far as Tom was concerned the transaction was complete, and he and Starrett and Olaf were busy branding the new stock when Moore galloped up to the scene in advance of the rest, his six-shooter in his hand.

"Stick 'em up!" he shouted. "Stick 'em up, and keep 'em up!"

Tom dropped the branding-iron he was using, and raised his hands. Olaf, who was tending the fire of logs, gave vent to a frightened cry. But Starrett sowled at Moore. The rest of the riders approached, and nearly a score of guns gleamed in the sunlight.

"What's the idea?" asked Tom angrily, looking at Lou.

"You'll find out soon enough," retorted Moore. "Just whose brand were you putting on those cattle?"

"My brand," replied Tom. "Why?"

"You can't get away with rustling in this country any more," shrilled Lou with undisguised contempt. But Tom, defying the guns, reached to the pocket of his shirt and produced a sheet of paper.

"What do you mean by 'rustling'?" he scoffed. "Those cattle belong to me. I've got a bill of sale for them here. Take a look at that!"

Lou slid from her mare and took the paper and studied it.

"And just who is this fellow Bill Saunders, who sells my cattle?" she cried scornfully.

"Ask him!" retorted Tom, pointing to Moore. "He ought to know—his name's on it."

"The man's crazy!" roared Moore. "That bill of sale was never made out by me!"

He heaved himself from his horse to seize the paper, but Tom grabbed it back from Lou and struck out with his left, administering a blow to the manager's jaw that sent him reeling.

"Easy there, pardner!" roared a cowboy.

But Tom's blood was up, and he looked at Lou in a way that made her almost shiver.

"So that's it, eh?" he shouted bitterly. "Trying to frame me! You!"

Lou was upset and showed it; but Olaf, taking advantage of an opportunity which had presented itself, had made a bid for escape, and at this moment a stalwart cow-hand brought him back with a rope about his shoulders.

"Caught him sneaking off in the bushes, so I brung him back," explained Olaf's captor, and immediately Lou's pretty face hardened.

"Funny he should run away!" she flamed at Tom, "when you're so innocent!"

"Whitey! Clem!" bellowed Joe Moore. "Bring your ropes!"

But Lou was not going to be a party to any lynching.

"None of that, Moore!" she cried imperiously. "I'm running this affair." She turned to Tom, who had folded his arms defiantly. "If you're not out of the country in twenty-four hours," she said, "I'll turn you over to the sheriff!"

Moore, swallowing his mortification, added wrathfully:

"And my advice to you, buddy, is to leave while the leaving's good!"

Even then the plotter was reluctant to forego his plans. But Lou commanded some of the men to drive the cattle back to the mesa, and the rest to get on with their appointed tasks. Tom, Starrett and Olaf were left behind to discuss the situation at their leisure, and to do what they chose about Lou's ultimatum.

Found Out!

THE rest of the day passed quietly enough; but after darkness had enveloped the range, Tom set off upon a journey over unfamiliar territory, seeking the Preston ranchhouse.

He left Silver in a spinney and prowled around the buildings with the furtiveness of a burglar. He was looking—amongst other things—for the man who had called himself Bill Saunders, fully convinced by now that Bill Saunders was one of Joe Moore's creatures.

He came to the wooden office at last, and through one of its dusty windows he detected the glow of a lighted pipe. Tex, obeying Moore's injunction, was keeping under cover, but could not resist the luxury of a smoke.

The front door of the office was unlocked. Tom opened it stealthily and crossed the threshold. Tex was in an inner room, sprawling on a bunk, and in the first instance Tom did not go near the inner room. With the aid of matches he sought among the books and papers on Joe Moore's desk, in its drawers, and on a shelf behind it, hampered slightly by a gun in his right hand.

Evidently he found something in a book that gave him infinite satisfaction, for he had closed the book and tucked it under his arm when the door of the inner room opened and the moonlight that streamed in at the window gave shape to a form in the doorway.

"Stick 'em up!" rasped a voice. "I'm afraid I'm gonna kill you, mister."

"You'd better," retorted Tom, ducking down behind the desk, "because if you miss I may return the compliment."

A gun spat fire, another gun responded, and then over the desk bounded Tom to grapple with the half-breed.

Two shots were wasted, and two bullets embedded themselves in the logs of the wall; then Tex went down in a heap on the floor, completely knocked out by a vicious half-hook that caught him clean on the point of the jaw.

A curious little whistle, emitted by Tom from the doorway of the office, brought Silver trotting out from the spinney, and the limp form of Tex was draped over the saddle while Tom swung himself up on to the broad back of the white horse.

Starrett was waiting up for the man who returned with a bound ledger and a bound and gagged prisoner, but Olaf had retired for the night and knew nothing of the occurrence.

In the morning, having washed and dressed, the Swede shaved and tried to sing.

Tom, aroused by the noise, looked into the bed-room, and saw Olaf prancing about the floor with lather on his face and a gun in each hand.

"You'd better go and saddle Silver instead of monkeying about with those guns, you square-head!" he said scathingly. "You can't fight, and you can't sing. Finish cleaning your ugly mug and try something you can do."

The three horses were saddled, breakfast was prepared, eaten, and cleared away, and just before nine o'clock Tom and Starrett were discussing their plans when Olaf burst in upon them.

"Say, boss," he cried, "that lady's here again—and she's got a whole crowd and a sheriff with her."

Tom glanced at Starrett, then rose to his feet. He peered out through the panes of a window. In the long fence he and Swede had built he had put a gate, and the gate had been opened, and a whole party of horsemen were streaming through it, headed by Joe Moore and Lou Preston. He smiled grimly and went out on to the narrow veranda.

Some of the riders were dismounting in the yard, and, tallest of all of them, was Sheriff Watkins of Weston County, a grey-haired veteran with a star upon his chest.

"That sign over there on that fence says—and means—"keep out!" shouted Tom, drawing his gun.

"Signs don't mean anything to the law, Dale," declared the sheriff, advancing to the foot of the steps. "I'm here to arrest you for cattle-rustling."

"By whose say-so?" demanded Tom, descending the steps with Olaf behind him.

"Mine!" declared Lou, and walked up to him with clenched fists.

"And mine!" bellowed Moore from the other side of the sheriff.

"Well, that's too bad," said Tom quietly. "But I wouldn't be hasty, sheriff, if I were you. Will you come inside?"

"Quite agreeable to that," decided the sheriff. "Wouldn't do any harm."

And he followed Tom up the steps into the living-room, followed by Lou.

Moore turned to the men who were with him.

"Two of you," he said, "had better go over there and start tearing that fence down—the rest can stay here."

Two eager volunteers went off to attack the fence. Moore mounted the steps and entered the ranchhouse.

"What's it all about, Dale?" asked the sheriff.

"I told you before," began Lou angrily, "he was caught—"

A sound as of a scuffle in the kitchen reached their ears.

"What's that?" the sheriff demanded suspiciously.

"A rat, I guess," answered Tom, and opened a book which was lying on the table. "Take a look at that, sheriff! These people have had their say with you—now I'm going to have mine. I've been framed!"

The sheriff looked down at the open book. He saw the jagged edges where a page had been torn from it, and he saw a sheet of paper, creased where it had been folded, but now smoothed out, lying beside the jagged edges. He read it through; he noticed that the number in its top right-hand corner was a number missing from the book itself. He turned back a page, and then abruptly he turned round on Joe Moore.

"How about it, Moore?" he said brusquely. "Your signature's on this!"

"It's a forgery!" shouted Moore.

"Did you ever hear of this fellow Saunders?" questioned the sheriff.

"Never!"

"No?" said Tom with an ominous grin, and strode over to the kitchen door, which he flung wide. "Bring him out!" he shouted.

Starrett, completely recovered from his limp, appeared in their midst, gripping the arms of Tex, whose eyes were downcast, whose hands were fastened behind his back.

"Tex!" gasped Lou, while Joe Moore brushed the back of his hand across his forehead because a cold sweat had gathered there.

"That's the fellow who calls himself Saunders," said Tom. "Miss Preston, I owe you an apology. I took the liberty last night of removing that man and this ledger from Moore's office."

"I think this is a dirty frame-up!" trumpeted the sheriff disgustfully.

The cowboys in the doorway looked at one another in dismay and shuffled off. Lou, in a passion, went up to the discomfited Moore.

"So that's where all my cattle have been going!" she cried. "You're fired!"

Joe Moore turned to hide his chagrin, and Lou looked at Tom.

"I suppose I ought to apologise to you," she said ungraciously.

"It kinda looks that way, miss," he admitted.

"Well, I won't!" she stormed, and ran out.

But at the end of the yard she received another shock; two of her men were tearing down the fence Tom had erected.

"Stop that!" she shouted. "Get back to your own work!"

The two cowboys slunk back to their horses and rode away, and Lou called the rest of her men round her and retired with them on to her own property.

"Dead or Alive"

IN the living-room of the ranch-house, meanwhile, the sheriff had been speaking his mind.

"You say the word, Dale," he wound up, "and I'll take these two fellows in with me."

"I'd a heap sooner you left them here, sheriff," said Tom, restoring the bill of sale to his pocket.

"All right," said the sheriff with a comprehending nod. "Just as you say, boy."

He went off, though he would dearly have liked to stay to see the fun, and Tom waited, gun in hand, till he had clattered out of the yard. Then he said to Starrett:

"Put your gun away, Bob. Now take

(Continued on page 25.)

Two rival gangs, hated and feared by the police—warfare of a fiendish nature and behind the scenes the law waiting for a chance to clean up the city. Starring Ricardo Cortez and Helen Twelvetrees.

The Recall.

A WHITE hulled steam-yacht rode at anchor in the sheltered bay. Nearby a seaplane floated on the oily water—a boat being rowed towards the yacht.

A young man in white ducks stood up and waved.

Over the rail of the yacht leant a number of young men and girls—a gay pleasure party. Some were garbed in bathing costumes, whilst, down below, several were swimming in the cool waters. Near the gangway stood a strong-faced man. His iron-grey hair gave him an austere expression, but though the eyes were twinkling and the mouth laughing there was something about him that was puzzling. What would Rex King look like without the twinkle and the smile—hard, determined and calculating!

By his side was a beautiful, fair-haired girl. She wore a gaudy, striped bathing wrap of blue and white over a blue costume. In her gentle blue eyes there was a look of love and affection as she watched the approaching boat, and in her joy slipped a shapely arm through that of the man. His smile was one of pride.

"So you've got your wish." His voice was rather gruff, though moderated. "I'm glad Steve could make it."

"So am I, Rex. Now my party is perfect."

They were brother and sister, though the difference in ages was more than ten years. Helen could never remember her parents, only the strong silent man who had been both father and brother to her since she was a kid. He had seen that she wanted for nothing.

Up the gangway came a round-faced, curly-haired youngster. He held a soft cap in his hand, and his neat blue suit spoke of business.

"Hallo, Helen! Howdo, sir?" he greeted them. "By gosh, what a beautiful day I've chosen for a holiday! Never thought I'd get away. Had to charter a 'plane to make it. You look fine, Helen."

The girl blushed and several of the guests nudged each other. They knew that Helen was very fond of Steve, but they didn't take notice too much, because they were all the guests of her brother on this floating palace.

"I'm glad you could come, Steve," was all Helen could think to say, but there was a message of welcome in her blue eyes.

With the excitement over, the guests went back to their various diversions. Helen found a swimming costume for Steve and soon they were both in the blue waters laughing, joking and playing around—one could not imagine any on board the Helena having a care in the world.

Rex King was sitting at a wicker table, drinking an iced lemonade and watching the bathers, when there was a touch on his shoulder. A tall man in yachting kit like his own was holding out a paper.

"Just come through, chief."

"Thanks!" King took the message and read it thoughtfully, laughed and screwed the paper into a ball. "Looks like the pipe of peace. What do you make of it, Barnes?"

"Wouldn't trust that snake an inch," was the crisp answer.

"I think this is on the level," decided his chief, "but you can never tell how long it'll remain that way. To-day's Friday; cable that we return on Monday and that I'll talk business any time. Now, Barnes, let's have no more of this sort of talk—I'm here on holiday."

"Okay, chief." The other touched his cap. "I'll go and make all arrangements with the captain."

"Be careful how you step, Barnes," warned King. "Don't forget that Helen must never know or even suspect our business. Take every precaution."

A nod of understanding and the tall man turned on his heel.

There was dancing on deck after dinner. The couples looked ghostly in the strong moonlight as they slithered over the smooth deck to the music of the Argentina Dance Band.

In the bow sat a man and a maid. His arm was around her and her head rested against his shoulder. They sat there, reposing against a coil of rope, gazing thoughtfully towards the twinkling lights on the coast. A moment of great content.

Helen was smiling to herself. What a wicked girl she was. She had had to encourage Steve with many loving attentions and glances from her merry eyes before he could put his arms right round her and kiss her! They had met the previous summer and had been attracted to each other at once. Since then they had met often, and Helen would have said "Yes," if Steve had proposed. But Steve at times seemed strangely shy. The murmur of the waves, the power of the moon and her own bright self had at last forced Steve into a proposal. Oh, what a wicked girl she was!

Young Steve Carlyle should have been smiling; instead he stared at the dark outline of the coast under frowning eyebrows. He was happy, far happier than he deserved, and yet—a sigh escaped him.

"You're not cold, Steve?" she murmured. "You're not sorry, are you, Steve; because, if you are—"

"I love you like I shall never love anyone else," was his fierce answer. "I was just thinking, that's all. You know nothing about me, Helen, and—"

"You're a very clever business man," was her gay reply. "You're trying to make pots and pots of money. What's it matter if you don't? Rex has more than he knows what to do with."

"A man can't live on his wife's brother." Steve kissed the soft forehead. "This has all got to be figured out, and—" His voice died away, and she felt his whole body stiffen.

"What's the matter, Steve?"

"Do you hear anything? Listen!"

Silence whilst they strained their ears.

"I can hear the splash of oars," said Helen softly. "Who could be out rowing at this hour of night?"

"Someone—I wonder why?" Steve craned his neck. "The sound seems to come from over there. Look, Helen, can you see a shadow—looks like a boat."

"It is a boat. Probably someone in love like we are."

But Steve did not laugh.

"I fear it means business," he grunted. "Gosh, I shall be mad if I'm wanted back!"

"Oh, Steve, you couldn't go back at this hour!"

The boy made no answer, but stared fascinatingly towards the approaching boat.

"Is that the Helena?" hailed a voice. "Wanna speak to Steve Carlyle, message for him."

"This is Steve Carlyle speaking." The boy cupped his hands as though he did not want to disturb the whole ship. "Come alongside the bow."

Helen saw a note passed up to Steve, and wondered why she should feel so cold and frightened. She knew what the message meant before he turned to her.

"You've got to go back?"

"At once, Honey," said Steve. "I'm terribly sorry, but this message is urgent. It's about some business that must be done at once. Helen, you'll forgive me for running off like this. I hate having to go, but there is no option."

"I understand, Steve," was her sad answer. "I knew this happiness of mine was too great to last."

Two men were waiting on the shore when Steve Carlyle stepped on to the shingle. Their coat collars were turned up almost concealing their faces.

"You gotta take a convoy—Lansen's sck," one of the men almost snarled his words.

"Why couldn't someone else have done this job?"

"Our orders were to find you. Gorio wouldn't trust anyone else," replied the other man. "What's more, he sends warning to be on the look-out, as McBaine's on the warpath. We'd better get moving."

"Lead the way." Steve nodded, and then turned to take a last look at the Helena. How peaceful and graceful she seemed, even in the moonlight she was a picture of grace personified. The faint sounds of music carried across the water and Steve clenched his fists. Almost savagely he turned and followed his two companions to a waiting car.

An Evil Power.

IN a magnificent room sat a dark, clean-shaven man. Very wide apart, jet-black eyes stared forth from a face that was too white. There should have been colour to the man's cheeks, but nothing save a faint darkening near the neck. Evidently there was Spanish or Mexican blood in his veins. He was in age about thirty-six, and wore a gorgeous coloured dressing-gown over pyjamas of maroon silk.

December 26th, 1931.

Goldie Gorio stared round his bedroom, and a smile of content made him show his gleaming white teeth. Kings and queens had never had bed-rooms as sumptuous as this. The pictures, rugs, and furniture had cost a fortune—he could afford it. He touched a bell, and a big man appeared, a clumsy, big-headed fellow with small beady eyes and a cruel mouth.

"Just coming, sir. I've got a fine breakfast for you, sir."

"That I'll judge for myself," was the curt answer. "Has Anderson brought my new suit?"

"Yes, boss—"

"Sir to me." Instantly the dark man's face twisted. "Now put that breakfast down."

His valet, butler, and right hand man placed the tray in front of his master. The big fellow stood there as if waiting to be hit. From a bottle Goldie took two tablets, placed them in water, waited till they had dissolved, and then swallowed the mixture. This done, he removed a silver cover and scowled.

"Kidneys and bacon," he snarled. "I can't eat kidneys when they're flavoured with bacon." He fingered some toast. "This is as hard as a board. Pour me out some coffee."

The big fellow hovered round whilst his master ate one of the kidneys and a portion of another. Gorio became interested in the paper.

"Demand by the citizens of Chicago for the cessation of gang warfare in this city," Gorio laughed. "Poor fools—as if what they want counts." He took a nibble at the kidney. "Why, this is cold—take it all away. Send Anderson in to me."

A frail little man appeared and bowed. Over his arm was a suit of clothes.

"Good-morning, sir!"

"Hope the clothes fit," cried Goldie Gorio. "That last pair of trousers were a quarter of an inch too long, Joe,"—he turned to the butler—"pour me out a glass of water in that wine-glass and squeeze some lemon—make it a good lemon. Now, Anderson, let's see what you've done."

The trousers seemed satisfactory, though Goldie said no word of approval, but a queer light came into the dark eyes as he inspected the jacket sleeves. Gorio let the sleeve fall, took a deep draught from the wine glass, and holding the glass up to the light, spoke without looking at the tailor.

"How many buttons on the sleeve?"

"Four, sir."

"How many did I ask for?"

"Three, sir, but—"

"Why did you disobey me?"

"Three buttons are out of date, sir," answered the old tailor. "So I put four buttons on, sir, because I thought you wanted to have the latest style."

"You heard my orders." Goldie was smiling in a queer way. "You will take that back and put on three buttons."

"But I couldn't do that, sir," quavered the tailor. "Four buttons is the present style, sir, and—"

"I said three buttons, you crawling little worm!" cried Gorio. "When I say three I mean three."

"But, sir, you can't ask me to do this." The tailor did not quite realise the kind of man to whom he spoke. "I must give gentlemen the latest style—"

A scream of fear and ghastly agony rang through the room. Goldie Gorio, with face twisted and contorted, held a broken wine glass in his hand, whilst blood streamed down the face of Anderson, the tailor. The old man touched his lacerated face, saw the blood, and then slumped in a faint on the floor.

"That's what happens to fools who disobey my orders!" The normal expression returned. "Joe, find the Doc. Tell him to sow this fool up. Three stitches!"

A sandy-haired, thick-set man entered, calmly studied the prone figure, and nodded. The Doc. swung the limp figure over his shoulder.

"Any other orders, sir?"

"Just sow him up," snapped Gorio. "And when he comes to, give him my definite instructions. Three buttons, and if it isn't done within two hours I'll have buttons sown to his bare skin."

The man called Doc. nodded and went off with his limp burden. Joe, the butler, appeared and scowled after the Doc.

"I'd like to bump that guy off," muttered the butler. "He scares ever talks. Makes me creepy does that guy, sir."

"I'm not interested in your opinions," was the answer. "He's a darn good doctor, and knows better than to play any tricks. Better get my bath ready." "Steve wants to see you, sir," said Joe. "Told me it was very urgent, or else he wouldn't have come."

"Steve?" His eyes narrowed. "All right, I'll see him later. My bath first, and if you make it too hot I'll flay you alive."

"Thank you, sir," answered Joe, and shuffled off.

Half an hour later Goldie Gorio sat before the solid oak table. He rang a bell, and Joe appeared at once.

"I'll see Steve now."

Goldie Gorio grinned a welcome as Carlyle stepped into the room. It was against orders to come to the private residence of Goldie Gorio, but who could imagine that smiling man was angry.

"Sorry I've had to come here to see you," said Steve. "But I'm in a jam, sir."

Goldie Gorio seemed to have recovered from his bad temper, for he smiled and waved the youngster to a chair.

"You have had trouble with the cops?" asked the gangster. "No, I don't think you would worry me so early—if it were the police. Let me so guess—a girl?"

"A girl is the main reason," Steve answered. "She is the reason why I want to get out of the game. I want my freedom, sir."

"You want to leave me?" The crook showed no sign of annoyance or surprise. "I should hate to part with you, Steve, because you are one of the few who are trustworthy. Why not marry the girl and remain in the game?"

"Because she's honest and clean." The boy spoke quickly. "She's never been sullied by anything underhanded or crooked. She comes of a decent family, knows the right sort of people, and does not realise what goes on in the—er—"

"Underworld," Gorio smiled. "Continue, Steve—do not spare me. This girl is beautiful, of course?"

"She is not only beautiful of face," was the earnest answer, "but she is beautiful of mind. It is impossible to tell her what I am, but if I could get out and make a fresh start, then I would ask her to marry me. She doesn't want to know what I have been, but if I told her I was a crook, I believe she would still marry me, even if her heart were breaking. Do you know why I joined in this game, sir?"

"I should love to hear."

Somehow the smile on the face of Goldie Gorio was not pleasant.

"A girl let me down, and I was convinced that life was finished for me."

Steve was intent on his explanation. "I decided that excitement and adventure might help me to forget. My senses returned slowly, and I realised what a fool I had been. But I stuck to my bargain with you, sir, though some of the jobs haven't been to my liking."

"One reason why I've liked you"—now the smile was pleasanter—"you're the first person who has ever refused to obey any of my orders. When we had that argument with the Marani gang you said 'Nothing doing!'" Goldie chuckled. "I believe I threatened you with a ride, and still you wouldn't give way. Steve, I'm glad I didn't send you for that ride. But you're treading on dangerous ground now. There are two reasons why I can't let you go. One is that you are far too useful, and the second is that it is too risky. You know far too much about me."

"But I would never breathe a word," argued Steve. "I would go away and swear never to come within a hundred miles."

"It makes no difference!" Goldie waved aside all argument. "The cops would follow. McBaine would jump at the chance to get one of Goldie Gorio's gang alone. They might find methods to make you talk, and I have no time for squealers. Once in my gang a person must stay. Whilst I command, there is only one way out." He smiled broadly. "That way lies via the morgue."

"Well, better that way and get back my self-respect!" Steve was getting angry. "I cannot go on pretending, and never to see Helen again would be worse than death. Now you see what kind of a jam I am in, and I reckon you ought to let me out. I've served you well, and you know I'm not the sort that squeals."

"McBaine has methods almost as pleasant as my own of making a man talk." Goldie shrugged his shoulders. "If every cop were a McBaine I would respect them. I'm sorry, Steve, but I must think of myself first. There are hundreds of other pretty girls—you can easily forget her. Take a vacation, and when you come back—"

"I shall still love her just as much." Steve squared his shoulders. "I shall always love her. If I cannot have my freedom, then—"

A door opened and someone came into the room. Steve broke off as he saw that Goldie was not listening to him. Curiosity prompted him to turn and see who could have dared to interrupt Goldie Gorio during an interview. His eyes opened wide with amazement.

The newcomer was King—Helen's brother!

The Peace Pact.

KING was equally surprised to see Steve Carlyle. His smile of greeting to Goldie Gorio gave way to a stare of amazement which the gangster did not miss.

"You two know each other?" Goldie spoke softly. "How very amusing. I hope, King, you know nothing against my young friend?"

"Friend?" King spun round. "Surely Steve isn't one of your men?"

Steve had no idea why King should be here, but it seemed that this encounter must ruin all his hopes. King would have to tell Helen, and that would finish their romance.

"One of my most reliable lieutenants," Goldie delighted in titles. "Perhaps you don't know each other properly. On my right, Steve Carlyle, trusted officer to Goldie Gorio, and on my left Hartley King, my most dangerous rival."

"Hartley King!" gasped Steve. "Not the man who runs the West Side?"

There was a gesture of sadness, almost of despair, in King's slight nod.

"It seems, Steve, we've been sailing under false colours. Was this fair on Helen?"

"Helen—Helen!" Goldie was surprised. "Steve, is the girl you've been telling me about King's sister?"

"Yes, sir."

"Carramba, but what a complex!" Goldie's eyes were dancing. "Steve comes to me and wants to leave me because he is in love with a charming and honourable young woman. Now I find she is the sister of Hartley King."

"Helen has no idea what I am!" King spoke gruffly. "Anyone who tells her is likely to get hurt. She has been brought up imagining that I am a successful business man, and she has never had any association with the underworld. Steve would never have been encouraged as a friend if I had known he served Goldie Gorio."

"To try and get level I came here to beg for my freedom," answered Steve. "This seems like the curtain."

"The curtain on the final act." Goldie's voice was raised, and the man's eyes were blazing. "I am going to give you a play that will stagger Chicago. You and I, King, are the two powers in this city, and you came to see me to discuss a scheme to combine forces in order that gang warfare should cease. We will combine, and gang warfare shall cease. When two great rival powers, enemy powers if you like, come together, there is usually some kind of ceremony such as a wedding of the prince of one kingdom to the princess of the other."

King and Steve stared at Goldie. What was the man going to suggest?

"Let us call the princess by the name of Helen"—strange lights gleamed in the man's eyes—"and the prince shall be Steve. We will have a great wedding, and the marriage of Helen to Steve will be the link between the two kingdoms—you on the west, and myself on the east. How does the scheme strike you, King?"

"I hardly know what to say."

King stared at Steve. "I'm not marrying Helen under these conditions." Steve raved. "She must not be dragged into this sordid life. She—"

"Listen, hothead," argued Goldie. "If you marry Helen you get the girl you love. Also, gang warfare and bloodshed will cease, the cops can have a

Though there was the fear of death in all the faces of these men, not one stepped forward.

holiday, and you will have the great Goldie Gorio as your best man. I will stage a wedding that will make history. Think carefully before you say 'no' to this, Steve. 'No' would mean that bloodshed would continue; you would never get your Helen, and the morgue would be very busy. A 'yes' would be like the cooing of the dove of peace. Give me a month to stage this wedding, and it will be the greatest ever. Fix it with your sister, King, and then send her away, in case she should hear any talk. I can see, King, you favour the plan. How about you, Steve?"

There was no alternative for Steve. Besides, why should he die when a "yes" meant the cessation of gang warfare, even if it did mean deceiving Helen? And so the wedding was fixed for one month from that day.

A month later Steve Carlyle and Helen King were made man and wife.

It was the most elaborate and gorgeous wedding that Chicago had ever seen. It was too gorgeous. Several times Helen wanted to know why there was all this show and pomp, and Steve cursed because his tongue was tied.

Roses were thrown from windows on the bridal procession, the streets were decorated with bunting, the wedding was held at the chief church; there were a dozen bridesmaids, and the reception was held at the largest hotel. Hundreds of guests, grand entertainment, marvellous flowers, valuable presents—no expense was spared.

Among the uninvited guests was a thick-set wizened-faced man. He was one of the crowd, and he chewed the end of a long cigar as he watched the arrival of every car at the church.

"Wonder how long this is gonna last," sneered McBaine, head of the Chicago police. "Gorio reckons that, now he's in harness with King, he's got Chicago skinned. Guess he'd better take another think."

"They'll be a tough combination," murmured a trusted captain, who also wore civilian clothes.

"Gorio's screwy," McBaine laughed. "One day something will send him real crazy, and then the fireworks will begin. That will be my chance."

McBaine little knew how near he was in his prophecy. Goldie Gorio had never seen Helen until she came up the aisle on the arm of her brother. He had heard that Steve's future wife was good-looking, but Helen was the most divine creature that Gorio had ever seen.

His nails dug into his hands as he watched her approach. If he had known about Helen, he would have married her himself. A queer smile twitched his lips as he glanced at the exalted Steve. The great Goldie Gorio had made this marriage, and now it was too late to stop it, and the gangster wanted this girl for his own.

Gorio gave no clue to his thoughts as the wedding proceeded, though once Helen looked startled to find those piercing black eyes watching her.

And when Gorio talked to the girl at the reception afterwards his determination and admiration increased. His eyes narrowed as he glanced at Steve. Perhaps there might still be some work for the morgue.

The Trap.

ALL the while Helen and Steve were on their honeymoon Goldie Gorio's fertile brain was busy. All the while he prepared the home that was to be the Carlyle's. He had insisted upon finding a house for the young couple, and Steve had no option but to agree. King wished his new partner would not make such ostentatious show, but Gorio was a difficult man to deal with.

December 26th, 1931.

Before they sailed for the West Indies, Gorio lavished presents on the girl, who was bewildered by all this extravagance. Her brother explained that it was Goldie's generous nature. His new business partner was as kind-hearted as he was rich.

Bloodshed had not completely ceased, because a cop had been killed during the running of some illicit liquor, and McBaine had vowed to get Gorio. Then several smuggling ventures went astray, and Gorio began to suspect that someone inside was in league with McBaine. This led to the master-crook planning the end of Steve Carlyle. The plan materialised some four weeks after the return of the happy couple.

The Shark was a fast river-boat that could carry passengers and freight. Besides oil engines she carried masts and sails—a useful craft for all emergencies. Engines could be heard at night.

Gorio had so much money that he could buy most things—he had a city patrolman who took his money. This was how he learnt that McBaine had got wind of the fact that Gorio owned the Shark.

The ship was now an ambush. If Gorio attempted to take the craft on a run, then some guns would be loosened off. But the information that made those queer eyes gleam was that the Doc. was one of McBaine's men.

"Now we know why things have gone wrong of late," Goldie told his servant. "Let me bump him off!" demanded the bloodthirsty Joe. "I allus have hated that silent sucker."

"The Doc. is going to be useful to me—afterwards," Goldie Gorio gave his watchdog an understanding wink. "I want you to bring the Doc. to me just before dusk this evening. I am going to tell him that the Shark will leave her moorings at midnight. You will follow the Doc., and when you are certain he has sent the message through to McBaine you can act."

"Leave him to me," beamed Joe, rubbing his hands.

Two hours later Joe talked again to his master.

"You was right, boss," he began; and grinned sheepishly as he saw the anger in Gorio's dark eyes. "You was right, sir. He went straight to a telephone booth and spilt the whole story."

"You're sure, Joe?"

"One of the boys was in the next booth!" Joe chuckled. "It made me laugh to hear that guy telling McBaine how clever he was and how you never suspected him. He was still chuckling when he made to step out of that telephone booth, only he never stepped out. I gave one of them Lewis guns a try-out—acted beautifully."

"You removed the body!" snapped Gorio. "Usual place in the river? Good! Now go and get Steve Carlyle on the 'phone. He's taking the Shark out to-night."

"You're a genius, sir!" cried Joe. "McBaine will get Carlyle, and you'll get—"

"Still your fool tongue!" Goldie swung round on his cowering servant. "Or someone else will be found in the river. Now get Steve on the 'phone, you rat!"

Steve had planned an evening with Helen, and when Gorio issued orders for the taking out of the Shark the telephone protested. The crook smiled covertly at Joe and spoke with an oily tongue.

"I'm terribly sorry, Steve," he apologised. "First chance I've had of collecting a cargo, and there's no one I can trust save yourself. If there were someone else, I'd send them; in fact, I'd go myself, only this confounded indigestion has got me again. Tell Helen how sorry I am. I've got a luncheon party arranged for her to-morrow, so get your job done quickly, Steve, and be back in time. Sorry—good-night—" He pouted to wink again at Joe. "Bon voyage!"

"That was a cute one about the luncheon," said Joe, as Gorio put away the telephone. "Any other orders, sir?"

"Arrange about the lunch for to-morrow—I don't want the least suspicion to rest on me. Don't forget to broadcast the news that I am indisposed. I shall stay in, eat nothing, and be very bad-tempered." He smiled. "You will know my bark is worse than my bite. Soon after midnight I shall expect news."

Helen was angry with Steve when she heard he had to go out that night. What right had Gorio to send him out and about at all hours?

"I can't understand your business," She frowned and stamped her foot. "I've never heard of business men running off at such ridiculous times on work. Last Sunday you were called away in the midst of our party, and now you've got to go off again. Tell Gorio you can't go."

Steve fidgeted uncomfortably. What a fool he had been to ever get lured into this rotten life! Could he always go on bluffing to his wife? This sumptuous flat was too vast and showy—why couldn't he have a quiet, homely place? Gorio's love for show robbed their first home of all its charm. Steve was restless and disturbed, and he knew that Helen often watched him with worried eyes. She was puzzled about his business, and, worst of all, she could not stand Goldie Gorio—why couldn't he get a job with someone else? That almost made the boy go crazy, and, when she suggested a talk to her brother, he had to beg her to say nothing. This midnight call on top of everything was just about the limit.

Helen was almost in tears, but Steve did his best to comfort her.

"It's a client who lives way out of town," she explained. "I must see him because another company aro after him. Dry those pretty eyes and give me a smile."

When Steve had gone Helen went into her husband's dressing-room. Why did she hesitate to open a certain drawer? Why did her hand almost touch the knob and then withdraw as if she were stung? At last the girl seemed to pluck up courage, for she wrenched open the drawer.

"The revolver's gone!" came her cry, and with blanched cheeks reeled back. A week previous she had seen that revolver and had not plucked up courage to question her husband. Already a suspicion of the truth had come to her. "I must ring up Rex!" she told herself. "Ho, will help me."

The deck of the Shark was deadly quiet. What were those vague shapes crouching in dark corners? One moved and slithered across the deck.

"He's on his way!" hissed a voice.

Another shape moved across the deck and disappeared down the companion-way.

"Chief," came a hoarse whisper, "he's on his way!"

"This is where we square one account!" rasped a voice out of the darkness. "You know your orders."

The figure disappeared, and McBaine of the police force drew a gun from his hip-pocket. Two other figures crouching near the cabin table drew weapons.

"Directly he reaches the fifth stair," was the chief of police's order. "We won't let the rat slip through our fingers this time!"

Steve Carlyle found the Shark lying silent and deserted at the moorings. This caused him no particular uneasiness because the Shark never wanted to proclaim to the world that there was life on board. Directly Steve appeared men would materialise, and the hawsers would be thrown off; then, under a silent motor, the ship would work down-stream to the sea.

A high moon showed him up clearly. The hands of the men hidden on the deck trembled round the triggers of their guns. Goldie Gorio at last!

Down the companion-way stepped Steve, who was beginning to wonder why the ship was so quiet as this, and where all the men were hiding. He decided to call out as he stepped on the fifth stair.

"Where's everyone? What the heck—"

There was a blaze of flame and the crash of two explosions.

Steve Carlyle slumped in a heap to the bottom of the companion-way.

"What's the idea, chief?" cried a voice. "Why did you knock up my arm? Why—"

"Get a light, fools!" shouted McBaine. "And then you'll see! We've got the wrong man!"

When a light was brought a hard-faced, grim-jawed man knelt beside the prone figure. There was a gesture of sadness in that shake of the head as he looked at the blood on his hand.

"Couldn't divert both guns," McBaine muttered. "Looks as if one shot is mighty near the heart. Goldie got wise to our game."

"But, chief, this is Steve Carlyle, one of his best men."

"Shucks! Goldie is crazy with power, and he'd do anything." The chief got to his feet. "Ah, there is the ambulance! See that Carlyle is taken to hospital, and that the very finest physician is put on the job. Right—jump to it!" Then he spoke, almost to himself. "I hope the poor old Doc. is all right."

And when McBaine learnt next morning of the Doc.'s body in the river his wizened face twisted into a fierce scowl.

"I'll get you, Goldie," he muttered. "and I think I've got the dope to call your bluff."

The Truth.

A WHITE-FACED, anxious Helen looked down at the pale wraith of a boy who was her husband. His eyes were closed, and he scarce seemed to be breathing. Behind Helen stood the grey-haired but anxious brother, whilst hovering close at hand was a white-robed doctor and a nurse. In her fear, Helen gave her hands to King, and her eyes sought those of the doctor in a pleading query. He touched his lips, then beckoned them out of the room.

"Your visit has done a lot of good, Mrs. Carlyle," announced the doctor. "He opened his eyes and recognised you. Now he will have the incentive to live. Don't worry, because, though it was a bad wound, the bullet has been extracted, and his strong constitution will pull him round. In a week he will be out and about."

As their car drove away, another drew up before the hospital, and Goldie Gorio stepped forth. He stared after the other car, and his eyes gleamed as they rested on Helen. Smilingly he turned and went into the hospital, and when he learnt Steve would live he still smiled, but none knew the rage in his heart.

So strong was his personality and so feared was his name that he was permitted to see the invalid. Steve opened his eyes and managed a faint smile.

"I can't think how this happened," Goldie spoke. "But I'm combing every man of my gang to see if it were a frame-up. I'll not rest till I get the guy that put this across—and that other rat, McBaine! They have got to learn to treat the friends of Goldie Gorio with respect. Get well soon, Steve, because we sure miss you."

A weak nod, and then a doctor came into the room. The talk was at an end.

"I'll see Helen doesn't worry," promised Goldie, with a smiling good-bye.

Lucky for Steve that he could not worry, because at that moment, on the way home from the hospital, Helen was questioning her brother.

"I rang you up last night, and told you how worried I was, and you talked a lot of nonsense about duty. I am not quite a fool. Why did Steve go out and take his revolver? Why did the cops shoot, and why are the papers so quiet about the affair? I want the answers to those questions. You know Steve's business. I know this much—it isn't honest!" The girl stared accusingly at King. "He's in the power of some gang. You know he is!"

King could not deny it. What he had feared and dreaded was happening. The eyes of Helen were open.

"Who is this Goldie Gorio who employs Steve?" went on the overstrung girl. "Why does he lavish all this money on us? People I've met have talked, and I'm certain he's the head of some big gang, and that Steve is in his power."

"I'll send Steve away when he gets better," King clenched his fist. "Send you both on another honeymoon."

"You'll get Steve into another business," she demanded. "Get him into a straight business, where cops and thugs can't shoot at him. You've got to get him away."

"I'll do my best, Helen." King bowed his head. "But it won't be easy. You see, Goldie and myself are partners. I'm in the game myself. I guess, Helen, I'd better come clean. Steve's a gangster, and so am I."

With eyes wide with horror and amazement, Helen stared at the brother she loved and respected while he unfolded the tale of his life—how the war had left him a pauper, and of the tempting offer to run liquor for a livelihood; how he had been dragged more and more into the game until he had become one of the big men.

"The excitement and thrill were life to me," he told his sister, "and I wanted money. You would never have known if it had not been for this rotten shooting. But I promise you, Helen, that I will talk to Goldie Gorio, and try to persuade him to let Steve out. Steve belongs to Gorio's gang, and—"

"Gorio is cruel, callous, and evil!" Helen's eyes flashed fire. "I could kill that man!"

McBaine Severs a Partnership.

ON the day that Steve was allowed to sit up for the first time, McBaine started his attack. By careful detective work he had learnt much that puzzled him. When everything was ready he rang up King.

"This is McBaine speaking. Surprised? I've got a reputation for speaking plain, King, and to the point. As crooks go, you're a better specimen than most. You may steal, rob, smuggle, and indulge in other unpleasant actions, but you don't murder or shoot in cold blood."

"Thanks!" King's sharp mouth twisted in a wry smile. "You haven't forgotten the other night by any chance?"

"That's why I'm ringing you now. I want to tell you just what happened. It's my job to wipe out murderers and gangsters, and to stop the wholesale slaughter through gang warfare. I decided to do a little killing on my own. Don't interrupt, King, but just listen. Did you ever meet the Doc? He acted for Goldie."

"Sure I knew him," answered King. "You found his body. One of your scouts?"

"Sure he was," came the answer. "He was shot dead two seconds after speaking to me. He told me that on the night of the 17th the Shark was going out, and that Goldie Gorio was taking her."

"What's that?" King spoke sharply.

"Thought it would surprise you," came the grim chuckle. "They got wise that Doc was one of my men, but they wanted him to tell me about the Shark for some reason. Can you think of a reason, King? Can you think of one person who might like Steve to take a ride to heaven? I'm not asking for thanks, but I pushed aside one of the guns, or Steve would have been a corpse. I recognised him just in time. Steve had been sent as a deputy. That night Goldie Gorio was supposed to be queer with indigestion. Do you swallow that muck?"

"Are you hinting that Gorio sent Steve to certain death?"

"I am," answered McBaine. "I got the Doc to try and lure Gorio on board the Shark, and I also know that Goldie himself personally gave the order to Steve over the 'phone. Link all this up, King, and ask your nice, kind partner why he sent Steve Carlyle to his death."

"You meddling police cop!" shouted King. "Why ever should Gorio want to have Steve shot?"

"You've got a sister, haven't you?" The words were sinister. "One of the best-looking in this city. She's the wife of Steve. Has Goldie ever sent her any presents? This ain't a bluff on my part, King, but the truth. Why not find out for yourself?"

December 26th, 1931.

King was furious with rage and hate as he paced his room. He was linking up small facts and details. Gorio had never seen Helen till the day of the wedding; now Gorio was always giving Helen some sort of present. Then there was the huge car, the amazing flat—and King's face hardened as he remembered that over the dressing mirror in Helen's room was scrawled in gold letters: "With the Love and Respects of Goldie Gorio." How Helen had hated that blatant advertisement of a rich man's generosity. McBaine was right when he said Gorio himself had spoken to Steve over the 'phone. Helen had told him so. Then there had been those strange, queer lights in Gorio's eyes whenever he had gazed upon Helen.

"McBaine's right!" King hit his clenched fist into an open palm. "Gorio framed Steve!"

King snatched up the telephone and put through a call.

"Is that Goldie Gorio?" He spoke quietly. "King this end." A pause. "Yeah, Helen's fine, and so is Steve. I'm gonna tell you something. I know how Steve came to be shot. Your murdering scheme did not quite succeed. No, I'm not crazy! I've learnt all about the Doc and how he died. I'm coming right over to discuss the matter. Reckon we ought to have a show-down."

"Anything you say suits me," drawled the tired voice of Gorio. "You've been listening to McBaine, but I'll sure be all prepared to see you. Step right over." His laugh was almost pleasant as he added: "Bring your friends along. You're all welcome."

King jabbed back the receiver. "The skunk did frame Steve!" He got to his feet. "This city isn't big enough for the two of us. The treacherous, murdering skunk!"

Murder.

IF one could have watched Goldie Gorio without his being aware of it, one would have noticed a queer change. His mouth kept on twitching, and the eyelids kept flickering; besides these two facts he had developed a habit of muttering to himself.

"That's queered me with Helen! Curses on the meddling fool!" He paced his luxurious bed-room. "But I'm the big noise in this city, and King's a nuisance. If King goes, then Helen—" He grinned in a horrible manner. "And King is coming for a show-down. He's going to get a big surprise!"

In the ante-room to Gorio's bed-room was an invalid chair. The invalid was an old man much enfolded in rugs and scarfs. A grey-haired woman whose face was marked with years of suffering and worry hovered around. She was the wife of the invalid. There was fear in her eyes as she gazed at Gorio, who made a significant gesture for her to get out.

"King coming over with his gang—a show-down!" rapped out the crook. "Are you all set? The signal will be when I stroke my chin—get it? King believes you to be only an old invalid pal of mine, so it will be dead easy. Now I'll go and talk to the other boys."

Who would have imagined that the marble entrance hall of this big building was a death-trap? Slide back the pictures and small slits in the walls would have been revealed. Behind were "typewriters," the deadliest kind of machine-guns. Handling them were men whose eyes gleamed with the lust to kill. At most times Goldie Gorio used this building, known as the Regal, as his home and place of business. His gang were kept out of town, except for a few trusted ones, but Goldie had all the gang brought in as soon as he found King was planning a show-down.

King knew nothing of Gorio's hidden menaces, but he was so enraged with the treachery of his partner that he was blind to all danger. Boldly and fearlessly he went with half a dozen picked men to the Regal. As they marched across the entrance hall a picture slid back and a wicked, snaky barrel followed the procession with sinister alertness. One move by King and his gang and that "typewriter" would speak.

Joe met King. The big fellow grinned.

"Goldie is expecting you, boss, in his bed-room. Will you follow me?"

King gave his men a significant nod to be on the alert, and stepped after the burly gangster. They were shown into the ante-room. The invalid made a great effort and turned in his chair. He smirked at them, and then sank back limply against his cushions. Then a door opened and Goldie Gorio stepped out of his bed-room. He was garbed in a well-cut blue lounge suit. It had three buttons!

"Howdy, King! I see you've brought your friends."

"I've had information passed to me that only you can explain away." King did not waste his words. "You heard what I said over the 'phone. Did you or did you not send Steve Carlyle to the Shark, knowing that McBaine and his men were waiting in hiding?"

"The Doc and McBaine had planned it all so nicely that it seemed a pity to spoil their plot." Goldie smiled pleasantly. No longer was it worth while trying to win Helen by gentle methods—force, power and money should achieve his ends. Therefore, why bother to lie? "McBaine wanted someone to shoot at, so I sent someone. Steve wanted to get out of the game, and I do not trust men who want to quit. I decided that by sending Steve I'd do him a good turn; but McBaine always was a bad shot."

"You murdering skunk!" shouted King. "So you boast about planning an innocent lad's death! And what do you think I'll be doing when you plan to send Steve for another so-called holiday? You're not the only person

(Continued on page 26.)

OUR GRAND NEW ANNUAL.

Don't forget to get a copy of this wonderful new Annual. It is packed with thrilling film stories, pictorial articles, and coloured plates.

Price 6/- net, at all Newsagents.

Suspicion falls on a daring cowpuncher for the robbery of a pay-roll and he fights hard to clear his name.

Starring Buffalo Bill, jun. and Joan Jaccard.

Roaring Guns.

It looked like being a hot day as Bill Dakers took his seat at the steering wheel of the Wyoming Development Company's pay car, and gently eased the clutch with his left foot.

A good seventy miles lay ahead of him. His destination was the company's vast cattle ranch at Twin Falls, and he reckoned to make it by four that afternoon. It was now close after twelve.

He engaged his bottom gear, and turned his head towards another man who sat in the seat by his side.

"All set?" he asked.

"All set," was the reply. "Go right ahead."

The pay car moved off, and the two men settled down to the long run before them.

An hour slipped by, and Cheyenne, the town they had just left, was twenty miles in their rear. The sun blazed down relentlessly as the car steadily climbed the dusty trail that led over the Colorado Mountains, skirting the boundary line between the State of Colorado itself and Wyoming.

Bill Dakers found the heat oppressive. Waves of shimmering air came back to him from the engine, causing beads of sweat to drip from his forehead on to the steering-wheel.

He endured it for another half an hour, then abruptly drew the car to a standstill at the side of the trail.

"Gosh, it's stewin'," he said, and wiped his forehead with the back of his hand.

His companion glanced about him nervously, and touched a brown leather bag that lay under the dashboard with his foot.

"Better keep goin', Bill," he advised. "There's been several hold-ups hereabouts in the last week or two, and I calculate we oughtn't to take any risks.

There's ninety-five thousand dollars in our charge, and it's a tidy sum."

"Maybe," replied Bill Dakers phlegmatically, "but that ain't going to stop me havin' a smoke."

He produced a small sack of tobacco and a packet of cigarette papers, and deftly teased out a finger of brown strands into one of the papers. Neatly he rolled his snoko, running his tongue deftly along the gummed edge in completion of his task.

"Hold-ups, eh?" he mused as he flicked a match into a flame, and lit up. "Waal, I guess your two sixes and the engine in this old tub will keep us out of any trouble. The hombres have only tried it on us once, you will remember, an' we shot one into a fair imitation of a griddle-cake, and ran the other down."

He chuckled at the memory as he engaged his gears once more, and resumed the journey.

For another two hours things were uneventful, and by then they were within fifteen miles of Twin Falls, the only excitement being a cloud of steam from the radiator owing to the cap having blown off under pressure.

Suddenly, at the end of a sharp twist in the trail, they saw a rope. It was stretched taut across the trail from trees on either side, and was about the height of the windscreen.

Neither Bill Dakers nor his companion said a word, but they acted in unison. Bill crouched low over his wheel, and rammed his foot down hard on the accelerator, while the other whipped a pair of six-guns from their holsters, and tensed himself in readiness for a fight.

Bill's mind worked with the rapidity of lightning. He knew full well that the rope had been stretched across the trail for his own especial benefit, and he knew, too, that somewhere behind the rocks on either side of him were men who wanted to split the Wyoming Development Company's pay-roll between them.

The speed of the car rose from twenty to thirty-five miles an hour as he swung over the steering wheel. The wheels left the trail for the hard, rocky ground by the side of it as Bill raced round the outside of the obstructing rope.

At the same moment that he regained the trail again, he heard a sound like the swish of a stock-whip, and his hat vanished from his head. The next second, the six-guns of his companion roared and flashed their challenge and defiance.

Bill paid no attention to what was going on. He kept his foot hard down, and his eyes on the trail ahead, knowing that he would need all his driving skill for what was coming.

The trail altered direction sharply a bare two hundred yards further on, one side of it bounded by a sheer wall of rock, and the other falling away abruptly in an embankment that dropped fifty feet to the bed of a dried-up river.

Bill clung to the wheel grimly, steady-ing the bumping vehicle over the pot-holes in the trail. The speedometer was showing about forty.

Suddenly above the harsh thundering of his companion's artillery, he heard another sound—a sound that froze him with momentary fear.

A tire had burst!

The back part of the pay car seemed to rise up a few feet from the shock of the burst, and then crash back on to the rocky surface. In the same second, Bill Dakers saw the bed of the dried-up river yawning beneath his front wheels like some giant monster waiting to devour him.

"Look out!" he roared. "Jump for it!"

There was no time. The car tilted to a sickening angle. Then, as it started its headlong plunge downwards, the front of it ploughed into the crumbling dirt of the embankment. The back of it came over, and it started to roll.

With a horrible crash, it struck a group of rocks at the bottom, and came to a standstill. Bill Dakers groaned as the steering-wheel smashed against his broad chest and part of the splintered body work hit him on the back of the head. Slowly, dazed almost into unconsciousness, he crawled from the wreckage, and staggered to his feet.
December 26th, 193

Two horsemen stood on the trail above. One of them carried a rifle, and as Bill Dakers straightened himself, the rifle came swiftly to the ready.

Bill saw this foggily, and knew that his life could be measured by seconds only. With fingers that were numb and uncertain, he groped towards his holsters.

The rifle above spoke, and Bill felt something which seemed like a hammer smash into his right shoulder. He spun round completely from the impact.

"You darned murderers!" he tried to shout. "I'll—I'll—"

The rifle spat again, and half an ounce of hot lead buried itself in his chest. He threw up his hands and toppled backwards, tried to shout once more, then lay still upon the dirt—dead!

The Cheyenne Kid.

IT was two boys from the Development Company's ranch who discovered what was left of the pay car. When the car became overdue, the foreman sent them along the trail with lanterns the same night to see what had happened, thinking that the delay was due to a simple breakdown.

But when, the next day, the foreman saw two bodies laid out side by side in a buggy, riddled with rifle and forty-five bullets, he started to bring the whole influence of the great Wyoming Development Company to bear upon hauling the murderers up to justice. The single-line telephone to Cheyenne, the company's headquarters in Wyoming, started to hum with the news, and the company's president at once got into touch with the State Department of Justice.

Nothing happened for three whole days, and the township of Twin Falls, having received another consignment of pay by the express armoured car settled down to the contemplation of yet another unsolved mystery.

Then, on the morning of the fourth day, shortly after the cattle hands had spread themselves over the surrounding landscape on their routine work, the trail from Rawlins, fifty miles north of Twin Falls, became alive with flying lead. Two riders bore down upon Twin Falls, one a hundred yards ahead of the other.

It was a pursuit. The foremost rider switched round in his saddle every few seconds, and loosed off a stream of shots at the rider behind. At such times, the rearmost rider would crouch low over his animal's back, waiting for the other to reload. Then he would straighten himself, and his own six-gun would blaze a reply.

The sheriff of Twin Falls, his hoary beard bristling with wrath, heard the shooting, and charged out of his office on to the veranda which marked the entrance to his domain. He saw the two riders hurtling down the street, and charged back into his office again, to reappear with a shot gun of doubtful age.

He was too late to stop the first of the two riders, but he sent the second back on his animal's haunches at the sight of the old muzzle-loader, and compelled him to dismount.

"You'll stay right here, by gun," said the sheriff fiercely, "or I'll scatter you all over the street!"

The other gave one fleeting glance at the rapidly disappearing rider he had been pursuing, and shrugged his shoulders by way of agreement.

"That's better," said the sheriff. "There's been too much shootin' round here lately, and I'm goin' to put a stop to it. Now just exactly who be you, and why?"

The other looked him up and down amusedly and grinned.

"Well, an' just exactly who be you—and why?" he countered.

"I be Hank Bates, Sheriff of Twin Falls, and all the law there is around here, I guess," replied the sheriff.

"Huh!" The other whisked a disc of metal from his pocket and held it out.

"Well, Mr. Bates, I'm Utah Kane, United States Marshal. Here's my badge. An' right now I'll tell you that you've assisted the escape of one Buck Allen, otherwise known as the Cheyenne Kid."

The sheriff started violently and dropped his gun. It hit the roadway with a clatter and exploded, sending a charge of buckshot into a nearby water-butt. He jumped again.

"Well, I'll be gosh-darned!" he belated. "The Cheyenne Kid! Say, there's five thousand dollars reward on him, dead or alive!" He scratched his head exasperatedly. "But listen, mister. I've heard of you, an' I reckon Utah Kane's the man for any roundin' up of toughs that's goin'; but you've got it all wrong this time. I know Buck Allen—we all do round here—an' I reckon he's all right."

"Is that so?" replied Kane sarcastically. "Well, Mr. Clever Bates, tell me how it was he was runnin' from me? Tell me why, if he was innocent and found me after him, he didn't stop right here an' get you to vouch for him."

The sheriff tried to think of a reply, but couldn't find one.

"Listen, sheriff!" Kane went on. "I'm callin' on you now to help me round up this Buck Allen. That pay-car job was done by the Cheyenne Kid, and the Cheyenne Kid is someone who lives in Twin Falls an' knows all that goes on."

"How do you know?" "Because the Development Co. had an idea that there might be a hold-up, and sent a dummy car along the trail back here only ten minutes ahead of Bill Dakers. Only two men knew about it—even Bill himself didn't know—yet the dummy car wasn't stopped. One of the men who knew was Buck Allen. Get me?"

"Yeah, but that don't signify nothin'," said the sheriff. "That don't make Buck the Cheyenne Kid."

"Then," asked Kane patiently, "why was he runnin' away?"

"H'm, there's something in that," muttered the sheriff, finding Kane's argument unanswerable. "But I didn't think Buck—"

Kane cut him short bitingly as he turned away in disgust.

"I reckon that's your trouble," he said. "You never did think—cept, maybe, in your sleep!"

The Traitor.

MEANWHILE, far down the trail leading from Twin Falls into the heart of the Colorado Range, Kane's quarry was riding hard. Suddenly he slowed up and wheeled his mount until he was facing the way he had come.

He thrust his white stetson to the back of his head, and gazed steadily along the trail, waiting. For perhaps ten minutes he did not move; then, satisfied that he was no longer being followed, he urged his horse into a gallop once more, and started back for

Twin Falls, keeping to the low scrub by the side of the trail.

Soon he came to a whitewashed timber-house on the outskirts of the township. He drew rein some distance from it, keeping himself hidden by the overhanging branches of a tree. As he watched he appeared to be thinking, but no change of expression altered the set of his stern, determined profile.

Suddenly, as though tired of inactivity, he dismounted, and made his way towards the house, keeping low to escape observation.

When he reached it, he swung on to the sloping roof of an outbuilding and gained the sill of one of the upper windows. He clambered through it, but as he did so a man's voice pulled him up dead.

"Who's that?"

He swung round in the direction whence the voice came, gun in hand. Then he laughed, spun his weapon on his trigger finger, and thrust it back into its holster.

"Hallo, Duke!" he said, with a grin.

Duke Porter was foreman of the Wyoming Development Co.'s ranch at Twin Falls, and up to four days ago—until, in fact, the day of Bill Dakers' murder—he had been Buck Allen's boss. And now Buck stood before him, an outlaw.

Duke was not too pleased to see him, but he forced a greeting.

"Gosh, though, Buck, don't you know the whole town's after you?" he said. "Don't you realise that if you're caught it means a trial and the rope? Why did you come here?"

"To see Betty."

They were in one of the living-rooms of Betty Thorpe's house, and even as Buck spoke a light footstep sounded on the stairs. The door opened, and a girl stood framed in the doorway.

At the sight of Buck her face went dead white, making the blueness of her eyes and the flax colouring of her hair seem more intense than usual. She stumbled towards him and gripped his hands.

"Buck—you!" she cried. "Oh, why did you risk coming back here?"

"Utah Kane is out after me, and he cut my trail to the north, so I had nothing else left but to return here again." His voice softened. "Before leaving for the south, I reckoned I'd see you again. That's all, I guess."

Duke Porter shuffled awkwardly, and as he watched Buck and Betty together he remembered that the State Department of Justice had placed five thousand dollars on Buck's head. He fingered the butt of his gun thoughtfully. It would be easy to stick Buck up now, send for the sheriff, and collect that five thousand.

He checked himself. There was Betty to think about. He, too, wanted to marry her, and if he gave Buck over to the sheriff, Betty would regard him as a traitor, and refuse to have anything to do with him.

He had to play his cards carefully. If he could fix it so that Buck was placed under arrest without the suspicions of Betty being aroused, Buck would eventually hang, and both the girl and the reward would fall into his hands.

These things flashed quickly through his mind before he spoke again.

"Say, Buck, I hope you don't misunderstand my being here like this—with Betty, I mean," he said, with the intention of making fresh protestations of friendship.

Buck turned to him, smiling.

"Aw, now, don't be foolish, Duke," he replied. "You're the best pal a guy ever had, even if you are in love with her."

Duke again shuffled his feet awkwardly, and opened his lips to protest. Buck cut in:

"Don't deny it, Duke. I know. You see—"

A horse whinnied in the corral below, and he stopped speaking abruptly, every nerve tense.

"What was that?"

"Nothin'," Duke replied, going over to the window. "One of the animals gettin' restless, that's all."

"Go and look round for me, Duke," said Buck, looking over his shoulder.

"If anyone thinks I'm here, say I'm not—see? Say you haven't seen me."

"Okay, Buck," replied Duke, and went out.

Buck waited until the door shut behind him; then, putting his finger to his lips so that Betty would keep quiet, he softly opened it again and listened. He stood there, motionless, for a minute or two before turning back to her.

"Listen, Betty," he said quickly. "I can't stay here with you much longer, an' there's somethin' I want to say to you before I go."

"What is it?" she asked eagerly.

"Will you trust in me and believe in me until everything's cleared up?"

"You know I will, Buck," she replied. Then a puzzled expression came over her face. "But, Buck, the boys say you're the Cheyenne Kid, an'—"

"It's no use," he cut in, "I can't explain now. Just forget it until I come back."

They were interrupted by the distant pounding of hoofs. Buck rushed to the window and looked out.

There, far down the trail that led from Twin Falls, was a posse approaching, and in spite of the distance Buck easily recognised Utah Kane and the sheriff leading. He turned back to Betty quickly.

"I must be goin' now," he said. "They're after me. Good-bye, Betty. Don't forget what I said."

Betty stood before him, her face blanched of all colour, hesitating. Then she flung her arms round his neck, kissed him, and was gone.

Buck stared after her, more dazed than if he had been thrown from a wild bronco. The noise of the clattering hoofs became more distinct in the seconds that followed, and he roused himself for action.

With a light spring he gained the window-sill and dropped on to the sloping roof outside. The posse was close now, and an enormous report told him that the sheriff had loosed off with his shot-gun.

Buck laughed as he vaulted to the ground and started running towards his horse. Then as a spurt of dust rose close to his feet he realised that he could never reach it. He wheeled about, running hard for a thick expanse of bush a hundred yards to his right, and reached it amidst the whine of bullets all about him.

He knew then that he was safe.

Meanwhile, Kane, watching him vanish, made no move to follow him. Instead, he reached out his hand and laid it on the sheriff's bridle as the sheriff urged his bronco forward.

"Go easy, sheriff, unless you want the top of your head blown off," he said easily. "You'll never find him in there, and he could turn you into cold meat from his hiding-place before you knew he was within yards."

The sheriff checked his animal abruptly, grumbling into his beard the while.

"Heck!" he said, disgruntled. "It's sure funny how I missed that hombre! And it's plumb hilarious that you did the same, Mr. Utah Kane."

Kane smiled enigmatically.

"It was your fault, sheriff," he said. "You kept gettin' in my way."

The sheriff snorted angrily.

"Now that I come to remember, it was you that got in my way," he retorted. "Every time I tried to fire you rode across me. Well, he's afoot, anyway, an' that's somethin'."

At that moment Duke Porter appeared out of Betty's house, and strode towards them.

"Hey, Kane, how do I stand for that five thousand?" he asked. "It was me that gave you the low-down."

Kane looked at him levelly.

"Darn good of you, Porter," he said shortly, "but we didn't get him, and the conditions of the reward are—captured, dead or alive. Besides, I didn't recognise your voice over the 'phone." He shot a glance at Betty's house. "Say, ain't you supposed to be a pal of Buck's?"

"I was, but I don't stand for murder from no one."

"Is that so?" Kane's eyes shifted back to Duke thoughtfully. "Well, that's plumb law-abidin' of you, Mr. Porter! I'll not forget it!"

He wheeled his horse abruptly and rode back to Twin Falls.

At the Old Barn.

Buck was not seen for the remainder of that day, but Utah Kane did not seem to worry much. He occupied his time by sitting on the sheriff's veranda, chewing peanuts and gazing enigmatically into the distance. He seemed to have something amusing on his mind, but what it was even the sheriff himself couldn't find out.

The following morning he was astir early, and ate more peanuts until breakfast-time. He seemed to be waiting for something, but neither in action nor speech did he give the slightest hint of what it was.

Nothing happened until just as he was finishing his breakfast. Then on the crisp morning air was borne the sound of a distant shot.

The sheriff, sitting on the other side of the table, slammed down his cup of coffee and got to his feet.

"What was that?" he said tensely.

His six-gun was in his hand and in his eyes was a gleam that meant business.

"Someone doin' some target practice," replied Kane amiably, stuffing another wad of salt pork into his mouth.

One of the boys from the Development Co.'s ranch thrust his head in at the door.

"Shootin' down at the big barn," he said breathlessly. "It's the Cheyenne Kid!"

Both Kane and the sheriff forgot breakfast and charged into the street. Their mounts were standing at the end of the veranda, and they leapt into their saddles and galloped off in the direction of the Development Co.'s ranch.

When they reached it they found a crowd outside. Thrusting their way through, they got close to find Duke Porter, gun in hand, shouting to someone inside the barn to come out.

Kane rode up to him.

"Hey, what's the yellin' for?" he demanded.

"Buck Allen is in there," Duke explained. "Gorman, my assistant, was in there talkin' to Madge, and Buck bust in on them. He stuck Gorman up, and when Madge tried to stop him shootin' he plugged her."

"Buck shot a woman?" said Kane incredulously. "I guess I don't quite believe that."

"It's true," said Duke. "What's more—"

Kane silenced him with a gesture, and turned his attention to the barn.

"Come on out, Buck!" he called. "The game's up!"

He reached for his gun, expecting a rush, but his fingers never closed over the butt. The door of the barn remained shut, but a trap-door in the roof swung back, and Buck leapt on to the weather-boards. His six-gun was in his hand, and in his eyes was a gleam that meant business.

"I'd have shot it out with you, Kane," he said quietly, "but there's a woman in there that needs attention pronto. You'd better send one of the boys for Doc Stevens."

Kane, his hands above his head for safety's sake, nodded.

"Okay!" he said calmly. "Wurdy, ride to the doc's house an' bring him back. And now, Buck, I reckon you'd better surrender. You're surrounded, an' we'll get you sooner or later."

"I'll surrender all right," said Buck. "But before I do, there's something I want to say. I just heard what Duke Porter said. I met Madge here by appointment. She used to be Duke's girl, and he threw her over. Well, she said she had got something important to tell me, but before she could begin someone shot her from the doorway. It looked uncommonly like Gorman, from the glimpse I caught of him before he bolted."

"Where is he now?" asked Kane, eyeing Buck's gun steadily.

"I don't know."

Kane frowned, and he shifted uncomfortably in his saddle.

"All right," he said. "I'll talk to Gorman later. An' now, what about surrendering? I've a perfectly good breakfast to finish back at the sheriff's place, an' I guess I'm still hungry."

There was a tense silence while Buck hesitated. He glanced over the group thoughtfully, and the sheriff began to quail at the thought of him trying to shoot his way out.

Then with a short laugh Buck flung his gun to Kane, and leapt down from the roof.

"Here I am, Kane," he said. "I reckon you've got me."

A wave of relief swept over the watchers behind Kane, and everyone lowered their hands. Then as Kane marched his prisoner off, a babel of talking broke out. Buck—the Cheyenne Kid—had surrendered! Almost without a fight he had calmly given himself up to justice.

It was a mystery, and no one seemed able to throw the least light on it. The boys gave it up.

Kane Gets Busy.

KANE put Buck in the lock-up behind the sheriff's office, and quietly settled down to his breakfast again. The sheriff sat down opposite, but not to eat. He wanted to know things, and judging from the expression on his face, he wanted to know them pretty badly.

"See here, Kane," he said suddenly, "I reckon I don't quite understand all this. I thought that, seem' how the Cheyenne Kid is dangerous, you'd be takin' him to the County gaol right away."

Kane emerged from a plateful of whaffles, and fixed the sheriff with an expressionless stare.

"Mister Hank Bates," he said with solemn politeness, "you belong to a past age—an age of lynchings and shootin' on sight. When someone's done a crime, you jest pick on the first guy that seems suspicious, and stick him up for trial, an' he's generally dumb enough to say things that'll get himself convicted, whether he's guilty or not."

"But—"

"Don't interrupt. It's me that's doin' the talkin'." Kane stuffed his mouth full once more, and set his jaws to clearing a space through which he could go on.

"In the West to-day we still carry the outward trappings of the days of lawlessness, but hombres who get arrested now shout loud for a lawyer as soon as they find themselves in the calaboose. We ain't quite got to the complications of finger-prints an' other horrors of civilisation, maybe, but we do have to use brains. Ge' me?"

"Meanin' that I haven't got any?"

Kane shrugged his shoulders.

"Meanin' that I have," he countered politely, "an' that's upsettin' nobody's feelin's, I guess. Anyway, jest for the time bein', I want you to do things for me, and not ask questions. You'll see why, when it filters into that block you call a brain."

The sheriff subsided, disgruntled. "What do you want me to do?" he asked surlily.

"Bring Gorman to me here in an hour."

"But Duke Porter said—"

Kane threw up his hands in despair. "By all the powers," he swore, "stop that thinkin' you keep indulgin' in! It'll be getting you into trouble. Do as I say, and quit stallin'!"

"Okay," said the sheriff.

The conversation ended by the sound of Kane swilling hot coffee as though he were giving an imitation of Niagara in a music-hall.

A quarter of an hour later he wandered out into the one main street that ran through Twin Falls, resumed the chewing of peanuts that had been interrupted by breakfast, and strolled off towards the hospital.

He disappeared inside, and after a brief altercation with Doc Stevens because the doc didn't want Madge, the shot woman, disturbed, went in to see her. He was with her a bare ten seconds; then he came out again, a broad grin on his face.

He met Betty in the porch. She caught hold of his arm as he went past her, and stopped him.

"Mr. Kane!"

"Yeah?"

"How is she?"

"Who—Madge? Oh, she's fine! The doc reckons she'll get better all right." He flipped a peanut shell at a bucket, and scored a direct hit. "She'll be about again in time to give evidence at the trial."

Betty's face changed colour.

"Mr. Kane, you don't believe that Buck really committed those crimes, do you?" she implored. "He—he couldn't."

"No?" Kane glanced at her kindly.

"Well, maybe I think he did, and maybe I think he didn't. Come along to the sheriff's place this afternoon, an' I'll let you know definitely."

He wandered away, his head bent in thought, and an expression of intense satisfaction on his face. Several men greeted him as he passed back along the main street, but he neither returned their greetings nor looked at them.

Eventually he reached the office again, and went inside. He grinned inscrutably at Buck, who watched him from behind the iron bars of the lock-up.

"Say, Buck, here's the keys!" He took them off the nail on which they hung, and tossed them into the lock-up.

"Come on out—company's comin'!"

Buck looked hesitatingly at the keys, then at Kane, unable to fathom what Kane was getting at. Then he picked them up, and started unlocking the door.

"Company? Who?"

"Gorman. I told the sheriff to send him." Kane looked out of the window.

"Ah, I guess he's arrived! Come in, Gorman!"

Gorman entered, his close-set eyes looking shifty about him. He was the assistant-foreman down at the Development Co.'s ranch, and not too popular with the boys.

"The sheriff said you wanted me," said Gorman. "What about, anyway? I'm busy, an'—"

Kane smiled at him disarmingly.

"Gorman, Buck here says he reckons it was you who shot a woman down at the barn this morning, an' you say it was him. Ever had much to do with Indians, Gorman?"

"Now look here, Kane—" began Gorman.

Kane interrupted him a second time. He reached over, and jerked the gun from Gorman's holster.

"Nice-lookin' gun that, Gorman," he said absently. "Oh, about them Indians! Well, Indians used to have a great way of gettin' at the truth of a thing like this. They gave the two men one weapon, and they figured that the survivor was innocent. Now I don't want to see either of you two boys get killed, so I've picked my own weapon—that short cattle-whip on the wall over there." He turned and strolled towards the door. "Fix it between yourselves. I'll be back in ten minutes."

He went out, shutting the door behind him.

The Fighting Test.

BUCK faced Gorman and waited. He had no intention of making the first move, knowing that once Gorman started anything, he would have him at a disadvantage.

Gorman watched Buck craftily, crouching low. Suddenly, without warning, he made a break for the door.

Buck stepped across his line of flight, gripped him by the shoulders, and hurled him backwards. Gorman lit the wall behind him with a crash, and leaned against it, gasping for breath.

"I'm not lettin' you get away, Gorman," said Buck. "Not before you are ready to tell Kane who shot Madge. Now, are you goin' to tell decently, and in good order, or do I have to lam it out of you?"

"You can't do that!" squeaked Gorman, scared stiff. "It ain't law!"

"Nor's shootin' a woman," replied Buck. "Come on, now—I'm waitin'!"

Gorman stayed close to the wall, making no attempt to move. Buck waited for a few moments longer, then became impatient.

"All right," he said finally. "You've had your chance. Now I'll force it out of you."

He made a move towards where the whip hung, and his action compelled Gorman into movement. The assistant-foreman, taking advantage of Buck's temporary lack of watchfulness, took a quick pace forward, and swung up the chair in front of the sheriff's table.

Buck swung round to meet the attack, and bent low to take the weight of the chair on his back. It landed with a sickening crash and splintered, but without doing much damage.

Buck straightened himself abruptly, lunging upwards with his fist as he did so. The blow took Gorman under the chin, sending him staggering backwards a second time.

The next moment Buck had the whip in his hand.

"For the last time, Gorman—" he began, and broke off as Gorman, desperate, leapt at him.

He cannoned into Buck, and the two clinched, fighting hard for possession of the whip. They swayed backwards and forwards, crashing into the rough furniture about the office, each maintaining a firm hold of the other for fear of losing the advantage.

One of Gorman's heavy riding-boots caught Buck on the shin, making him wince with pain. His leg began to go numb, and he realised that he could not hold on much longer.

He twisted sharply in Gorman's grip as the boot landed again, this time with a glancing kick. Jerking backwards, he brought his knee upwards and drove it hard into the pit of his adversary's stomach.

Gorman relaxed his hold and began to gasp for breath. Buck tore himself clear, and raised the whip.

"Now, Gorman," he said, "are you goin' to speak?"

Gorman's eyes glinted, and he made to rush again. Buck brought the whip down across his shoulders heavily, and the contact of the lash made a noise like a pistol-shot.

"Ah!" shouted Gorman in agony.

"Who shot Madge, Gorman?" Buck demanded.

Gorman's eyes roved about the office treacherously, and picked upon a leg of the broken chair lying on the floor not a pace away. He dived for it quickly.

Again the lash whined through the air, and landed across his shoulders. He fought back the weakness the pain caused, and picked the chair leg up.

Crack!

Gorman let out a howl, and dropped the chair leg. He staggered to a corner, and crouched into it in an effort to avoid the deadly thong that bit into his flesh.

Buck followed, and stood over him.

"Ready to talk yet, Gorman?"

"No," gasped Gorman weakly.

The whip descended once more, making a vivid red weal across his chest. He cried out again, and sank to his knees, whimpering. Buck raised the whip yet again.

Gorman's face went dead white, and he put up his arms in a vain effort to shield himself.

"Buck—no—no!" he implored.

Buck checked his arm.

"Who shot Madge?" he asked relentlessly.

"I did. Put up that whip."

Buck turned and went to the door. He flung it open, and found Kane outside, leaning against a corral-post, thoughtfully chewing his eternal peanuts.

"All right, Kane," Buck said. "We've agreed."

Kane nodded amiably, and followed Buck back into the office. He looked at Gorman, and did his best to stop himself from grinning.

"Fine!" he said enthusiastically. "Now you've agreed, perhaps I can get the information I want. How about it, Gorman?"

"I shot Madge," Gorman whined. "I shot her accidentally, tryin' to capture Buck."

"H'm!" Kane considered the point. "Well, I calculate that don't sound much like the truth—especially after what Madge told me—but it'll have to do for the time being."

"I swear it."

"Don't swear. Be a gentleman," said Kane. "Now tell me something else. Who held up that pay-roll car and plugged Bill Dakers?"

"I don't know."

Kane glanced at Buck, and Buck raised the whip again.

"I don't know, I tell you!" screamed Gorman. "You can cut me to ribbons, but I can't tell you something I know nothing about."

Kane put out his hand and checked Buck.

"Well, maybe you don't want to tell me," he said. "It would only mean using you as State evidence, and that would mean a lighter sentence. I reckon I can find out without your help."

He grinned, and turned his back on Buck, intending to help Gorman to his feet. Buck flung down the whip and, with a lightning movement, jerked the gun from Kane's hip.

"Stick 'em up!" he said sharply.

Kane obeyed slowly, and turned with a look of reproach in his eyes.

"Say, Buck, I've been tryin' to help you," he said. "You ain't goin' to break gaol on me, are you?"

"Don't argue, Kane," Buck replied. "Do what you're told, an' no harm'll come to you." He reached to a nail on the wall, and pulled down a pair of handcuffs. "Chain your two selves to the bars of the lock-up, and be quick about it. I'm not riskin' pursuit."

"But, look here—"

"Get busy!"

Kane got busy, but the order did not ruffle his placidness of temper. He took Gorman to the lock-up, passed the chain of the handcuffs behind one of the bars, and fastened one end to his own wrist and the other end to the wrist of Gorman.

Buck backed to the door, and gained the open. The next minute he was astride one of the horses that stood against the corral-post, and galloping down the street in full flight.

A Warning.

TEN minutes later he halted in front of Duke Porter's house, and dismounted. In his approach he made as little noise as possible, and now he Buck closed with him and forced his gun hand high into the air as he pressed the trigger.

crept up to one of the windows and listened.

Duke was inside, and Betty was with him.

"Duke, you must do something," Betty was saying. "If you don't, they'll take Buck away and hang him."

"Nothing can be done, Betty," Duke replied. "It's no good worrying about him, Betty—he's finished." He paused for a moment, and when he spoke again his voice had changed. "Why don't you forget about him? I always said that if anything happened to him I'd look after you, and I'll keep my word. I've got enough money for us both."

"Why, what do you mean?"

"Marry me, and we'll go away to New Mexico, where there's a ranch I intend to buy and run on my own. What do you say?"

Buck nodded, satisfied with what he had heard. He went to the door and opened it.

"Duke! Duke!" he called out. "Where are you?"

He went inside, and found Duke and Betty in a small living-room. Chairs and a table formed the main furniture, while against the left wall was a bookcase, and over in a corner was a large cupboard.

When Betty saw him she went to him quickly.

"Oh, Buck!" she cried happily. "Have they let you go?"

"No," replied Buck. "I broke gaol."

Duke looked quickly out of the window to see if there were any signs of pursuit, and was disappointed.

"You're crazy to head this way," he said. "Why don't you head south and make your get-away?"

"I came to warn you," replied Buck. "Kane's been askin' Gorman a lot of questions, and Gorman handed out some story that you shot Bill Dakers."

"I held up the pay-roll car?" Duke looked incredulous for a moment, then let out a shout of laughter. "Gosh, that's funny!"

"Funny or not," said Buck, "Kane fell for it, and he's on his way out here now, with a posse behind him. They're goin' to search this place for the stolen money."

Duke hesitated for the merest fraction of a second, but his face was expressionless.

"That's just too bad!" he said. "They'll be wasting their time."

Buck made no reply, but turned away to talk to Betty. He took her away to the other side of the room, pretending not to see what Duke was doing.

Duke looked round furtively and, thinking that he was unobserved, moved step by step to his bookcase. Casually, as though unmoved by Buck's warning, he drew a volume from the shelves. Calmly he opened it and started to read.

But Buck, watching, saw him take something from the book and stuff it into the opening of his shirt. He swung round, strode across the room quickly, and jerked the book from Duke's hand.

"Hollow, eh?" he said. "So that's where you had the money hidden, was it, Duke?"

Duke's face changed. Hate smoldered in his eyes as he reached for his gun.

Buck closed with him and caught hold of his wrist, forcing his gun hand high into the air as he pressed the trigger. The gun exploded and the bullet buried itself harmlessly in the rough timbers of the ceiling.

"You're too darned smart to live, Buck Allen!" swore Duke, and dashed his fist into Buck's face.

Buck released his hold and staggered backwards.

Duke saw his advantage, and brought his gun hand down quickly.

December 26th, 1931.

Buck knew that he stood no chance, unless he could shield himself. He dodged sideways, grabbed the door of the cupboard, and swung behind it.

Duke fired. The bullet struck the door and ploughed into the stout wood, spending itself without damage. He started to change position, in order to get a clean shot, and in that moment of delay Buck slammed the door.

With a snarl of rage Duke pressed the trigger again and again, while Buck crouched flat on the floor of the cupboard. A succession of shots rang out.

Suddenly there was a metallic click. Duke's gun was empty!

Buck leapt to his feet and flung open the door. As he did so, Duke raised his right hand and hurled the empty gun straight at Buck's head.

Buck ducked, but not quite in time. The butt caught the top of his scalp, temporarily dazing him. He clapped his hand to his head, and tried to shake off the blur before his eyes.

Buck shook himself and regained possession of his senses.

He rushed to the door in time to see Duke, his horse in full gallop, racing down the south trail as hard as he could go. He jumped into the saddle of his own animal, and bent low over the mane as he followed.

A Running Fight.

GUN in hand, he pounded along, now and then, when conditions seemed favourable, taking aim and firing. But the motion of his horse, made any chance of success seem remote at that distance.

He emptied the gun; then, finding that he had no other weapon but his own bare fists, he flung it aside and settled down to a steady chase.

Slowly, foot by foot, he overhauled Duke Porter until he was almost on top of him. At last they were galloping neck and neck, and Buck saw his chance. He raised himself in his saddle, keeping only the extremities of his riding boots in the stirrups.

He launched himself full at his quarry, and wound his arms round the other's body. The two horses swerved dangerously, and for a sickening moment it looked as though they would both come down.

"Let go, you fool!" Duke cursed. "Can't you see where we are going?"

Buck saw, but too late. A steep precipice at the side of the trail yawned under them suddenly, and they found themselves hurtling downwards.

Buck released his hold on Duke and tried to dig his fingers into the dirt and rock over which he was sliding.

A clump of bushes checked him, and he came to a halt. Looking about him, he saw that he had pitched into a thick evergreen; while, not ten paces away, Duke Porter lay on the ground, groaning.

He extricated himself and crawled over to his quarry. Then, realising that Duke was not likely to make any further attempt at escape owing to his injuries, he sat down by his side to await the arrival of Kane.

Not more than five minutes passed before Kane appeared on the trail above, accompanied by the sheriff, Betty, and several others. He set his horse to the steep gradient, and rode down, finally dismounting at the bottom. The others followed his lead.

"Heh!" said the sheriff gleefully. "I guess we've got you now, Buck Allen. I arrest you in the name of the people. Stick 'em up!"

Kane came forward, and knocked the sheriff's gun aside.

"Hey," he said, "leave my deputy alone!"

The sheriff blinked in astonishment.

"Your deputy," he stammered.

"Yes, my deputy," said Kane, mocking him. "There's the man you want—Duke Porter. And I guess you don't need any handcuffs."

"You mean to say that Duke Porter held up that pay-roll car and killed Bill Dakers?" said the sheriff incredulously. "Say, what are you tryin' to do—make a fool out of me?"

"Nature saved me that trouble," replied Kane calmly.

The sheriff shook his head sadly.

"I guess you're right," he said. "I might have known there was something phoney in the way you kept lettin' Buck Allen escape the way he did—an' you the best shot and the plumb-cussodest man-hunter in three States. Even so, I still can't believe it."

Kane made no reply just then. He motioned to Buck, and Buck produced the wad of money from Duke Porter's shirt.

"Maybe this'll convince you," said Kane, holding the wad out. "An' perhaps you'll remember what I said about not jumpin' to conclusions when a man first comes under suspicion. Two men could have done that murder job—Buck here, and Duke Porter, because they were the only two who knew that two pay-roll cars were being sent; one as a dummy. See?"

"Yeah, I see. But why Duke?"

"Because Buck is my personal deputy hereabouts, and was put in the employ of the Development Co. specially to stop the robberies that had been goin' on in this district for some months past. I already had Duke under suspicion, you see, but I couldn't fix anything definite on him. It wasn't until Gorman, who gets a split from Duke, tried to kill Madge as she was goin' to tell Buck all about it, that I got the real low-down on the whole affair. Even so, what she said wasn't enough to bring Duke to justice, because she'd only heard about the killing of Bill Dakers from Duke and Gorman talkin' together."

"Gosh, then my chasin' after Buck was all hokey!" said the sheriff disgustedly.

"I guess so," said Kane, with a grin. "You see, I had to make Duke convict himself, an' that's where Buck came in. By pretendin' friendship an' bein' suspected himself, he'd never rouse Duke's suspicions that he was really my deputy. You see, Mister Hank Bates, it wasn't Duke I was scared of, hut you. You do too much thinkin', an' that always starts trouble. I found that out the first day I met you."

"Is that so?" replied the sheriff, riled. "Well, let me tell you—"

"Aw, give it a rest!" said Kane.

"Get your prisoner an' come away. Can't you see Buck an' Betty want to talk to each other?"

The sheriff looked and saw. Solemnly he closed one eye, and what he thought this time was right.

"Heh! Heh! Heh!" he guffawed.

"I get you, Kane. Gimme a peanut, an' we'll be goin'."

The posse rode away, leaving Buck and Betty alone.

(By permission of Butchers' Film Service, Ltd., starring Buffalo Bill, Jun., as Buck Allen; Joan Jaccard as Betty Thorpe; Yakima Canutt as Utah Kane; Jack Mower as Duke Porter; Frank Ellis as Gorman; Fred Burns as Hank Bates; Violet McKay as Madge.)

Follow a two-fisted sea-captain and the beautiful daughter of a brave explorer as they sail on a perilous trip to a forgotten cannibal island, where they defy storm, fire and water, man and beast on a search for a fortune in radium! Starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Browne.

DANGER ISLAND

READ THIS FIRST.

In search of pitchblende deposits containing immense quantities of precious radium, Professor Adams and his companions are beset by savages on a volcanic island off the African coast, and Adams escapes with one surviving follower, Cebu, his giant negro guide.

In America his daughter Bonnie and her uncle, Dr. Anthony Adams, have become alarmed at his failure to communicate with them. Ben Arnold, an adventurer professing friendship, offers to fit out a relief expedition.

His ship, the Lottie Carson, sets sail under the command of Harry Drake, a young Englishman, and for companion Bonnie engages Arlene Chandos, who is in league with Arnold.

Professor Adams and Cebu are picked up by the Lottie Carson off the coast of Africa. The professor is dying, but before passing away he gives Bonnie a chart and charges her to secure the radium for the benefit of humanity.

After a storm in which Dr. Anthony and Cebu are washed overboard, the ship puts into Twamballa, where Harry is paid off. But, thinking he knows too much, Arnold and Black plan to kill him.

They bribe a Portuguese saloon-owner, Lascara, who arranges for the Zarbessa, a tribe of jungle devil-worshippers, to kidnap Harry and sacrifice him to their idol. Harry is attacked while he is with Bonnie, and is carried off.

Now Read On.

The Jungle Track.

SHORTLY after Harry Drake left Lascara's bar-room to join Bonnie Adams, Briney and those sailer-men who had remained loyal to the young English sea-captain might have been seen strolling along the seashore.

They had decided to enjoy the cool of the night, and also to discuss the plan Harry had formed in order to baffle Ben Arnold's nefarious designs.

"You know," Briney was saying, "we got fired off the Lottie Carson along with the skipper, but we ain't gonna be so very far away from the craft when she weighs anchor an' sets sail for Danger Island."

"I understand Bull Black's been made captain," put in Burke, "and has signed on about eight new men. I reckon Arnold don't mean to tacklo Danger Island shorthanded, but all the same a couple o' dozen ain't too many for a place like that."

The seamen strolled on, and were at least a mile from the port when they decided to turn back. The beach took a wide curve, however, and it seemed plain folly to make so long a business of the return journey when a short cut was available.

Briney pointed to the jungle, which creuded down to the very edge of the sand and ferned a vast semi-circle about Twamballa. A path was visible, running like a dark scar through the tangled masses of vegetation and flora.

"Don't let's walk round by the EPISODE 5.

"MUTINY."

beach," the big fellow declared. "This track through the bush looks as if it oughta take us near the town."

Burke, Collins and Connor agreed, but the last-named had a word of warning to add.

"The Zarbessa are around," he reminded his companions. "An' don't forget what Captain Drake said about them takin' white men as a sacrifice to their jungle gods. Stick together, boys, an' keep your eyes peeled."

"Aw, we've got guns, ain't we?" Briney scoffed, tapping his hip significantly. "If them black swabs tried to grab any one of us, we'd fill 'em so full o' holes that the wind would play tunes in their dirty carcasses. Come on, you fellers."

And he led the way into the bush. They marched in single file, and had been tramping the jungle path for five minutes or more when they saw that it joined another track, and they were approaching the fork when the swift padding of naked feet reached their ears.

Briney suddenly came to an abrupt halt and creuded down, signing to his shipmates to imitate his example. A moment later they perceived a number of dusky forms hastening past along the other track.

"Shiver me timbers!" Briney whispered. "If it ain't them inhuman fiends the Zarbessa, I guess they're the bunch that came to Lascara's dive, and they must be on their way back to their kraal."

Even as he spoke Burke clutched his arm, and:

"Look!" he said. "They've got some poor guy a prisoner."

His companions realised that he was right, for three or four of the blacks were now moving by with the limp figure of a white man in their arms. Knowing what they did of the Zarbessa, the spectacle made the blood of the sailors run hot in their veins, and their mood instantly changed. A second before they had been prepared to lie low and allow the savages to pass without hindrance, but now they were of a very different mind.

"Say, are we goin' to let them get away with this," Collins demanded, "or are we gonna rescue that feller from their clutches?"

"You bet we are," said Briney. "Come on, boys, after 'em!"

The sailors were outnumbered, but the revolvers with which they were armed gave them an advantage that balanced the odds, and without hesitation they sprang to their feet.

The Zarbessa and their captive had proceeded along the other track, and those in the rear were thirty paces away when Briney and his shipmates reached the fork.

Briney uttered a stentorian bellow that brought the blacks to a standstill. They wheeled, and raised a fierce outcry at the sight of the white men.

The savages were armed, but in taking their prisoner had refrained from using any weapons, for their creed demanded that the victim should be brought to their gods alive, and sacrificed only after ghastly tortures had been inflicted. But at the first sign of attack half a dozen spears were raised against the sailors.

"Give 'em lead, boys!" roared Briney.

The white men poured in a volley, and the withering blast of gunfire woke a thousand echoes in the jungle. A troop of monkeys dashed screeching through the festooned foliage of the trees, and their strange cries mingled with the agonised shrieks of wounded men.

The sailors dashed forward, and the blacks threw their captive to the ground and tried to muster for the onslaught. A spear grazed Briney's body and ripped the sleeve of Collins, who was immediately behind him. Next second the white men and the devil worshippers had clashed.

Briney found himself face to face with a negro of his own bulk, and slammed his left to the ribs with a force that staggered the black. Another pounced on the seaman and almost took him unawares, swinging aloft a deadly war-club in an attempt to bludgeon him. But Briney still grasped his gun, and he twisted the muzzle and shot the native at point-blank range.

The other sailors were blazing their way through the swarm of savages and, with several of their number lying dead, the Zarbessa suddenly gave way and fled through the jungle.

Briney and his comrades would have pursued them impetuously, but the white man whom they had rescued now picked himself up with an effort, and planting himself in their path, he restrained them.

"Wait a minute!" he said, in a voice that was familiar to the seamen. "There's no sense in following them, boys. They know the jungle tracks, and they'll get you into an ambush!"

An exclamation escaped Briney. "Hully gee!" he blurted. "We didn't know it was you, captain!"

"Yes, it's me all right," said Harry, "and I'm lucky to be alive. If you fellows hadn't come along I wouldn't have lasted till sunrise. But, listen," he added anxiously. "Miss Adams was with me when I was attacked, and we'd better go and find her—"

December 26th, 1931.

The Return.

WHEN the Zarbessa had disappeared into the jungle with their captive, Lascara had slipped through the gloom to where Bonnie lay senseless.

He picked the girl up in his swarthy arms and made for the town. He had reached his premises by the time Briney's party fell in with the devil-worshippers, and so heard nothing of the commotion that arose in the heart of the bush.

Carrying Bonnie through the side-door of his disreputable hotel, he asked a waiter if he had seen Arnold, and he was informed that the owner of the Lottie Carson was in the back room with Bull Black and Arlene Chandos. A minute afterwards Lascara was stumbling across the threshold into their presence.

"Bonnie!" Arnold exclaimed, as he saw the girl in the dago's grasp. "Good heavens, what happened, Lascara? Where did you find her in this condition?"

The dago laid her on a couch. "She with Drake," he explained. "The Zarbessa, they take heem—threw girl to ground. I bring her here."

He had hardly completed his brief narrative when Bonnie opened her eyes, and, after staring around the room blankly for a moment, she suddenly uttered a sharp cry of horror and clutched at Ben Arnold's sleeve.

"Oh, Ben, Ben," she sobbed, "they've taken Harry Drake away— Those awful savages— Oh, we've got to do something!"

"Take it easy, Bonnie," Arnold told her, in a tone that was meant to soothe her. Then, turning to Lascara and eyeing him meaningly: "You saw the thing happen," he said. "Can anything be done?"

Lascara lowered his glance. "I hear girl's scream, senor," he replied, "and when I run to help I see Zarbessa warriors taking Captain Drake into bush."

"Well?" Arnold murmured, and with that Lascara gave an expressive shrug. "Nothing can be done," he said. "When Zarbessa take white man, nobody ever see him again—"

At that particular moment Captain Harry Drake was far from being in danger of his life, for, in company with his rescuers, he was examining the spot where the devil-worshippers had surprised him.

"It was right here that these fiends attacked me," he declared to his companions, "but Bonnie has gone. You know, boys, I'm certain this was another frame-up, staged by Lascara at the instigation of Arnold and Black. The Zarbessa came to Lascara's dive, and that dago rat must have put them on my trail. Come on, we'll go back to the saloon, and perhaps find some news of Miss Bonnie there."

They made tracks for the premises of Lascara, and, marching into the bar-room formidably, demanded an interview with the proprietor. Lascara had left the door of his office wide open, however, and as Harry caught sight of Bonnie in the midst of the group of conspirators, he took the liberty of entering without "by your leave."

The party in the room turned their heads, and if Arnold and his hirelings had been a ghost they could not have looked more startled. Next second Bonnie was running to the young Englishman's side.

"Harry!" she cried. "Are you all right?"

"Yes," he answered; "and thank Heaven you're safe, too!" Then he put her gently to one side and faced Ben Arnold grimly.

"Listen, you," he went on; "it's about time we had a show-down. Your several attempts to get rid of me have failed, and I'm warning you that I'll take steps to retaliate pretty effectively if there's anything else of the kind—"

"Wait a minute, Drake!" Arnold cut in harshly. "Before you start pulling any more heroics in front of Miss Adams, let me tell you something. You accused me of holding on to Professor Adams' chart for my own ends, and I proved you were wrong! You started a bar-room fight over a native girl, and accused me of being responsible—"

"You're lying to save your face, Arnold!" Harry blazed. "But Miss Bonnie knows the truth about that business!"

Arnold glared at him. "If she cares to believe your glib explanation, it's her own affair," he ground out. "But I'll say this much: I promised her father that I would carry out his last wish by taking this expedition to Danger Island, and ever since I made that promise you have done your utmost to stand in my way."

"That's right, Arnold," Bull Black put in curtly. "He managed to split the crew into two factions, anyhow!"

Harry started forward to challenge that lying slander with a blow, but, as Bonnie checked him, Arnold went on speaking.

"In any case," he said, "the Lottie Carson is my ship, manned with my crew and fitted with my equipment. This expedition can't go on without me, but it can go on without you, Drake, and it will go on in spite of you! And if Miss Adams has the respect for her dead father and uncle that I know she ought to have, she will not allow you or any other man to interfere."

With fine words and a sly touch of righteousness, Arnold had made a bid to turn the altercation in his favour. He succeeded, at any rate, in convincing Bonnie that she must go on with him for her father's sake.

Harry stepped close to Arnold. He could not lawfully dispute the man's ownership of the Lottie Carson, but he had made up his mind that, if need be, he would use force to dispute his control of the expedition. For the moment, however, Arnold seemed to hold the whip-hand.

"Listen," Harry stated, "your expedition could sail without me over all the Seven Seas, and I wouldn't kick. But I distrust you, Arnold, and before I leave Miss Bonnie entirely in your care I want to warn you. If any harm comes to her, or if her father's wishes are not carried out to the last letter, I'll know it—and you'll answer to me!"

He turned and held out his hand to Bonnie.

"Good-bye!" he said, and, grasping her fingers for a moment, he finally wheeled and made his way into the bar-room to rejoin Briney and the boys.

His manner as he encountered them seemed to belie his apparent acceptance of the circumstances in which Bonnie was to sail away under Arnold's doubtful protection.

"Come on, you fellows," he announced curtly. "We've got to get busy."

Towards the Island.

THE Lottie Carson was three hours out of Twamballa Bay, ploughing a course towards the south-west and her grim destination.

With Bull Black in command, her crew was composed of that worthy's fo'c'sle minions Dempster, Gavigan, Markham and Baxter, together with some eight or nine new hands.

There was one other man who had belonged to the original personnel. He was a seaman named Rogers, and at the time when Harry had fallen foul of Bull Black on the voyage to Africa he had been on the sick-list, and therefore unable to play any part in the free fight that had ensued.

Had he been fit he would have joined forces with those who had been loyal to Harry Drake. Suspecting this, but not certain of it, Bull had kept him on chiefly because he was a skilful carpenter and a useful man to have aboard.

Descending from the bridge and walking forward after some conversation with the helmsman in the wheel-house, Bull Black came upon Rogers and a new hand known as Dennis. The two seamen were stooping over a hatch that they had just lifted, and Bull fired a gruff question at them.

"Hey, what's goin' on here?" he demanded.

It was the man Dennis who answered him.

"Goin' below to get some rope," he said, and with that Bull's eyes glittered ominously.

"Say 'sir' when you're talkin' to your captain, you scum!" he snarled, and took the back of his hand across the sailor's face.

Dennis recoiled, and as Bull Black moved on he made as if to stride after him angrily. But Rogers held him back.

"Wait a minute," he said. "You'll have the chance to get even with him yet."

"Get even with him!" Dennis echoed bitterly. "I'll get even with him. I'll take that kind o' treatment from no man!"

Rogers urged him down into the hold, and then descended the ladder after him. When he stepped to the floor beside Dennis he saw that the latter was looking round on several piles of cases that bore the inscription "Dynamite."

"What kind of a cruise is this I signed up for?" Dennis growled. "Both skipper an' cargo are high-explosive!"

"This is a death-ship, matey," Rogers answered ominously, "with the devil in command. Say, never mind that rope. I just wanted to open up that hatch an' show you something."

He moved towards the cases of explosive and gave a low call. Instantly five heads rose into view from behind the deadly cargo—the heads of Harry Drake and the shipmates who had remained loyal to him through thick and thin.

"Here's one of the new men, captain," Rogers told Harry. "Name of Dennis, sir."

"Good!" said Harry. "Listen, Dennis: Rogers smuggled us aboard. In a couple of hours from now I'll be in command of this ship. Which side are you on?"

Dennis had recovered in some measure from his bewilderment.

"I don't know who ye are," he made answer, "but I'm on any side that's agin Bull Black."

Harry proceeded to let him fairly into the secret, and had soon explained all.

"Rogers, get Miss Adams down here for a moment if possible," he added. "And don't forget, Dennis will talk to any of the new men he feels he can trust, and will give the signal two hours from now. One blast on this whistle."

A silver object changed hands, and Harry and his comrades ducking out of sight again, Rogers and Dennis made their way up on to the deck.

They paused by the hatch for a moment to consider which men should be approached. Dennis himself was able to vouch for two friends who had signed on with him, and Rogers suggested a likely third who might be spoken to immediately before the signal was due to be given, so that in the event of the fellow refusing he would have no time to raise an alarm.

Rogers and Dennis now parted, Rogers to seek out Bonnie, and Dennis to pass on the word of Harry Drake's project.

Shortly afterwards Dennis might have been seen near the bow with a sailor known as Floyd, and he had made the situation plain to the other man, when he noticed Bull Black approaching him with an ominous scowl. He at once changed the subject, and spoke in an audible tone.

"As I was sayin', Jim," he told Floyd, "I've seen some sharks, but—"

"Oh, 'as you were sayin', huh?" Bull rapped out, bearing down on him. "Well, if you've got anything to say, say it out loud. No more whisperin' aboard this ship, or I'll feed yuh to the sharks! Get aft there, and, Floyd, don't let me catch yuh talkin' to this guy Dennis again."

The two sailors moved away separately, and Bull kept his lowering gaze fixed on Dennis. He decided that it might be advisable to watch the fellow.

The Whistle.

ABOUT the time that Bull Black was breaking in on the conversation between Dennis and Floyd, Arleno Chandos made her way to Ben Arnold's state-room.

"I want to talk to you, Ben," she said. "You've got Drake out of the way. New what about getting rid of Bonnie Adams?"

"Listen, Arlene," Arnold retorted with some impatience. "I'd like you a lot better if you'd mind your own business."

The girl coloured hotly at his curt words.

"Don't you talk that way to me, Ben Arnold!" she snapped. "You told me you were in love with me, and if I thought you were sweet on Bonnie Adams I'd start something that mightn't be to your liking."

"Who said I was sweet on Bonnie Adams?" Arnold demanded. "I'll handle her, but in my own time. And I'm not standing any interference from you!"

He paused, for Bull Black had opened the door. The newly-promoted captain looked at Arnold and the girl sourly, for he had entered in time to hear the tail-end of his accomplice's angry outburst.

"Arnold," he stated, "you've no time to raise any shindy over womenfolk. There's trouble brewin' on this ship."

"Trouble?" Arnold reiterated.

"What do you mean?"

"Whisperin' among the men we signed up at Twamballa," Bull announced. "Keep your weather eye pceled, and, if anything starts, use your gun and shoot straight. This crew of ours is a rum bunch."

Arnold pursed his lips.

"I thought you knew sailors," he ground out, "but it looks to me as if you've picked a lot of cut-throats."

"Well, what do you expect for a cruise like this?" Bull growled. "A lot of naval college cadets? Listen, Arnold, I've been watching a guy named Dennis. I don't know what his game is, but he's up to something, and we've got to stand by fer action."

Harry and his men advanced along the deck and then came to a halt.

"In that case," said Arnold, turning to Arlene, "you'd better go to your cabin and stay there."

Arlene took his advice and departed, and when she had gone Arnold glanced at Bull.

"That girl may make herself awkward yet," he muttered. "She thinks she's got reason to be jealous of Bonnie Adams. Well, maybe she'll have reason yet. I've been thinking, Bull, that if Bonnie was to marry me there wouldn't be any need to get rid of her. For I'd be in full control then, and I'd see that she realised the folly of making a free gift of this radium to science."

At that moment Bonnie was leaning against the bulwark and staring thoughtfully across the vast expanse of ocean, and she was still in this pensive attitude when Rogers discovered her.

He touched his cap and spoke to her in a guarded tone, and, wondering at his manner as much as his words, Bonnie followed the man forward to the hatch. He conducted her down to the hold, and uttered a low call, which was immediately answered by Harry and his fellow-stowaways.

"Harry!" exclaimed Bonnie, as the Englishman stepped from his hiding-place. "And Briney and the boys! How did you get here?"

"I told you the ship that carried you away wouldn't leave me far behind," Harry answered, with a grin. "Bonnie, we're here because we considered you were in danger. We've got friends among the new hands, and pretty soon one of them will give us the signal to cut loose. It may mean a desperate fight, but I'm going to regain command of this ship, and I want you to promise me that you'll stay in your cabin till it's all over—"

He got no farther, for at that instant the very sound that they awaited rang out clear and shrill upon the deck overhead.

Harry at once gripped Bonnie by the arm.

"That's the signal," he said. "On second thoughts you'd better stay down here. Come on, boys," he added to his men. "Up we go, and, remember—don't shoot unless you have to."

Harry was the first to ascend, and he was closely followed by Briney and Burke. The last-named had been pulling surreptitiously at a cigarette, and flung it to the floor as he set foot on the ladder.

The glowing stub fell among some straw and sacking, and remained there unheeded. The men, climbing eagerly to the deck in response to the blast of that whistle, were too intent on their bold venture to notice the circumstance.

The signal had been heard all over the ship, and it had not escaped the ears of Ben Arnold and Bull Black. They came striding from the state-room where they had been in conversation, and, looking forward, saw Harry and his party clambering from the hold.

The faces of Arnold and Bull became a dual study in amazement.

"Drake?" gasped Arnold. "What's he doing on board this ship?"

Harry and his men advanced along the deck, and then came to a halt. At the same time, Bull Black's minions gathered aft, and were joined by those of the new hands who had not been trusted with the secret of the stowaway's presence.

Briney and the boys kept their eyes on the rascals, but they did not see a man perched in the cross-trees up above them, a man who began to descend the rigging stealthily.

"Mr. Arnold," Harry called. "I don't like to flout the letter of the law, but I feel compelled to do so. I'm going to take command of this ship, and if you don't hand it over peacefully we'll fight for it!"

There was a sharp, mocking cry from aloft, and Harry looked up to see the man in the rigging. The fellow was in the act of plunging through mid-air, and he dropped feet foremost into the midst of the Englishman's party, scattering them for an instant.

Arnold and Bull Black were not slow in seizing their opportunity, and, with a roar, Bull led an ugly rush across the deck. His pack of ruffians clamoured at his heels, and next second they were at grips with Harry's followers.

As regards numbers, the two factions were fairly evenly matched, with the odds slightly in favour of Arnold's hirelings. Yet it was soon plain that Harry Drake and his staunch band of honest sailor-men were likely to do more than hold their own. Harry himself was a trojan who carried a devastating punch in each hand, and Briney's fists fairly played havoc with those of Black's cut-throat gang whom he singled out for punishment.

It was Briney's ambition to tackle Bull Black in person and avenge himself for the ill-treatment he had received when serving under the man. He hammered his way to where Black was overwhelming Rogers with a shower of blows, and, intervening between them, he soon had the tyrant fighting on the defensive.

Briney was on the warpath, and he battled with a fury that taxed Bull's stamina to the utmost. It was a conflict of heavy-weights, and, though Harry Drake had previously shown that Bull Black was by no means invincible, he had done so by superior speed and skill.

Briney was as cumbersome as his opponent, and as ignorant of the fine art of boxing. They were fighters, the pair of them, giving and taking punches that a man with any sense of ring-craft would have had no difficulty in avoiding. Their conflict was a sheer bombardment of bunched knuckles, and he who survived the battering would prove himself beyond all question the stronger and more determined man.

Bull took heavy punishment during the early stages, but managed to rally, and he launched a counter-attack that would have crushed anyone of normal physique, yet Briney fought back doggedly.

In the meantime, the rest of the men were engaged in a desperate mêlée. Fists alone were used, for in that fierce mix-up there was no chance of gun-play, but the scenes enacted on the deck of the Lottie Carson were none the less violent.

Fire!

STANDING in the hold at the foot of the ladder up which Harry and his companions had climbed, Bonnie Adams listened anxiously to the tumult of the strife that was going on over her head.

Now and then men lurched close to the hatch, and for a blink of time she caught sight of them as they fought. But she could not guess how the battle was faring, and, though she was not yet fully convinced of Arnold's villainy, her fears were for the young Englishman who had championed her.

She was waiting there in suspense when a faint, crackling sound arrested her attention. It was accompanied by the smell of smoke, and as she turned her head quickly she saw the gleam of flames a few feet away from her. The cigarette-end, so carelessly thrown aside by Burke, had set fire to the straw with which the floor of the hold was covered.

A cry of consternation escaped Bonnie, and she tried to stamp out the blaze under her heel. But it was spreading swiftly through the dry straw, and her efforts were futile. As she endeavoured to trample it down, the fire baffled her and sent out tongues of flame.

A considerable blaze was soon raging in the hold, and it reached the pile of boxes behind which Harry and his fellow-stowaways had earlier concealed themselves. Next moment Bonnie caught sight of the inscription that had been painted in red letters on every one of those crates, and as she spelled out the word "Dynamite," a thrill of horror ran through her.

She turned and made for the ladder again, and scrambled frantically towards the deck. Her foot slipped on one of the rungs, and she almost tumbled back into the hold, but saved herself from falling and climbed on.

Her head rose above the hatch-opening, and a thin spiral of smoke drifted aloft. She looked round at the mob of sailors who were struggling close by and called out frantically in an attempt to give the alarm.

"Fire!" she screamed. "Fire!"

The men paid no heed, for none heard her in the stress of the moment. The ship might have been sinking under them for all they knew. Indeed, it was in a worse plight—it was in danger of being ripped open from stem to stern by the terrific explosion of several tons of dynamite, and every soul aboard her stood on the brink of doom!

"Help!" Bonnie shrieked again. "There's a fire in the hold!"

Still there was no response to her terrified cry, but all at once she saw Harry and Ben Arnold grappling fiercely at the other side of the hatch. She clambered on to the deck and ran round the opening in the hope of separating them and forcing them to listen.

The hulking form of Bull Black stumbled into her path. He was striving to ward off a regular tornado of blows that Briney was aiming at his head, and was meeting with no great success, for as he loomed up in front of Bonnie a punch crashed into his jaw and hurled him to the planks.

Bonnie dodged past his prone form even as Briney was assailed by one of Bull's minions. But again the girl was balked, this time by Collins and an assailant of powerful physique who were hammering at each other lustily.

Bonnie managed to avoid them, and in another instant she was close to Harry Drake.

"Harry!" she cried, tugging insistently at his sleeve as he wrestled with Arnold. "HARRY, THE SHIP'S ON FIRE!"

Even now the young Englishman seemed scarcely aware of her presence, and as she was about to repeat the words, Collins and his assailant blundered close to her.

Collins swung a right to the other man's chin. It landed with shocking force and knocked the fellow staggering, and he came up sharp against Bonnie as she was making her frantic attempt to attract Harry Drake's attention.

The collision threw the girl off her balance. She reeled towards the hatch, tottered precariously on the edge of it for an instant, and then plunged into the hold.

A swirl of flame and smoke closed over her as she dropped. She struck the floor with an impact that stunned her, and rolled aside on to a patch of straw that had not yet caught fire.

(Don't miss next week's enthralling episode of this grand serial. By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Kenneth Harlan and Lucille Browne.)

"BRANDED"

(Continued from page 8.)

his gun and belt off him—one of us is going to get an awful whipping! Swede, get outside! Bob, take that half-breed away!"

Moore's belt fell to the floor and was removed. Tom shed his own belt and clenched his fists.

"I'd like to have a share in this, Dale," said Starrett.

"No," decided Tom. "This particular argument is between him and me—you can settle your own score some other time. Take Mr. Bill Saunders with you, and hold him tight!"

The fight that followed was one of the fiercest ever waged between two men in the whole of Texas. Moore, with the roar of an animal at bay, snatched up a chair and hurled it at his enemy; but Tom dodged, the chair sped harmlessly over his head, and the conspirator received a sledge-hammer blow between the eyes that sent him staggering against the table.

From the table he made an ugly rush, and Tom found that he was no mean opponent. The way and that they swayed about the room, giving and receiving blows. Olaf, who had gone no farther than the veranda, glued his frightened face to the window-pane and watched the battle with bulging eyes.

Twice Tom went down, and if Moore could have had his way he would have choked him; but he had met his match in physical strength and his superior in tactics. Each time Tom brought his opponent down with him and was the first to rise.

The room became an utter wreck; even the solitary picture on the wall fell from its nail upon them; and at last Moore picked himself up from a corner, breathing heavily, with only one idea in his head—to escape.

Inch by inch he fought his way to the front door, and there lashed out with a vicious left that caught Tom in the mouth—and managed to get the door open. But even as he was about to back out through it Tom was on him, and a terrific punch caught him with such force under the jaw that he was lifted clean over the veranda, lost his balance on the top of the steps and crashed backwards down them with his head on the ground and his arms flung wide.

Tom leaned against the rails to recover his breath, and Olaf went anxiously to him.

"Say," he faltered, "w-w-was you all right?"

"Sure!" nodded Tom. "Wait—till—I get my—breath."

Starrett was waiting in the yard with his prisoner Tex, who was looking distinctly the worse for wear.

"Made him cough up that money, Tom?" inquired Starrett.

"Yes," nodded Tom, "I've got it. And now they can put that fence up again."

He descended the steps and jerked Moore to his feet.

"Come on, you hammerhead!" he said masterfully. "Olaf, bring some tools."

The prisoners were marched over to the wrecked portion of the fence and provided with hammers and nails.

"When you're through with this line," Tom informed them grimly, "you'll know all about fence-building."

It took far longer to re-erect the fencing than it had taken Lou's men to knock it down, but there was no rest for Moore and Tex till the task was accomplished. Tom, Starrett and Olaf squatted on the turf beneath a tree, nursing their guns, and Olaf lifted up his raucous voice in a song about a Texas cowboy which seemed to consist of innumerable verses.

When the fencing was restored, Tom inspected it, and nodded his approval.

"Thanks, boys!" he said cheerfully. "Couldn't have done it better myself!"

"Yeah?" rasped Moore. "Well, we'll be back."

"Call around any time!"

The worn-out pair made wearily for their horses, and it galled them that in order to go back to the Preston ranch to collect their belongings they must follow a roundabout route.

They were almost in sight of the ranch-house when they fell in with the sheriff of Falls City, who was riding that way, and Moore greeted him as an old acquaintance.

"Why, Mack, you old son-of-a-gun," he exclaimed, "how are you? What are you doing up in our country?"

"Oh, just a little errand," responded the sheriff, "decorating trees and things. Ever seen these hombres before?" And he passed over one of a sheaf of posters.

Moore took the sheet and opened it out, and as he did so his narrow eyes gleamed with evil satisfaction. For the poster contained pictures of Tom and Olaf, and announced a reward for their capture, dead or alive—a reward of five thousand dollars!

"Let's get into the office," he suggested, and they proceeded to that building.

Lou, from the ranch-house, saw them arrive with a man who was a stranger to her, and, wondering what fresh mischief was afoot, stole out to find out. A window was open, and she crouched beneath it, listening.

Inside the office Moore passed the poster to Tex with a grin.

"Have we ever seen these guys before?" he said.

Tex looked at the pictured faces, raised his heavy brows and whistled.

"Have we not!" quoth he.

"Well, that's good hearing," declared the sheriff of Falls City. "Nice old time I've had fixing their identity and gettin' picters of 'em from over in Knox County, where they come from. I'm here to get that feller Dale and his man Olaf for the stage hold-up mentioned there, dead or alive."

"Dead or alive, eh?" said Moore.

"That's what I said."

"Well, listen—will you let me select my own posse to round these babies up? I know where to put hands on 'em, but they're tough hombres."

The sheriff considered the suggestion. "Why not?" he decided finally. "Go ahead—and I'll ride into town and notify the Weston county sheriff that I want these men. But don't let 'em get away from you."

"We won't!" promised Moore.

"And Sheriff Watkins will bring you straight to their hang-out."

The sheriff presently mounted his horse and departed in the direction of Westonville.

"This'll be the first time I ever put lead into a fellow and got a reward for it!" chuckled Tex.

"That's the idea!" nodded Moore. "We'll say they tried to make a getaway and we had to shoot. It'll be too late to argue by then!"

Lou did not linger to hear any more; she darted down the yard to the stables, saddled the bay mare, and set off at a frantic gallop in the direction of the Dale ranch only a few minutes before Moore called a passing cow-hand to the door of the office and instructed him to get some of the outfit together as quickly as possible.

Starrett Tells the Truth.

LESS than half-way to the Dale Ranch, Lou caught sight of Tom.

He and Olaf and Starrett were driving back to the mesa some over-looked cattle he had innocently acquired from "Bill Saunders." She flew to him in a panic as fast as the bay could carry her.

"You've got to get away at once!" she cried. "They're coming to kill you!"

"Kill me?" echoed Tom. "Who are?"

"Moore and Tex—they know you're wanted for a stage hold-up."

"We didn't hold up any stage! That can be proved!"

"Not in time," she said, and put a hand pleadingly on his arm. "Oh, please go—oh, do! For—for my sake!"

"For your sake?" he repeated, scanning her face. "What do you care?"

"Everything!"

"Oh, Lou!" he exclaimed joyfully. "Do you mean that?"

"Can't you see I do?" she faltered. "Now, please go before they come."

But Tom, resisting an impulse to put his arm round her, set his jaw, and said:

"I'm sorry, Lou, but I—I wouldn't run away from anybody."

"All right, then," she cried desperately, "if that's the case, I'm going to get the sheriff to straighten this thing out." And she shot off in the direction of Westonville.

Tom whistled to Olaf and Starrett, and they rode over to him.

"Never mind the cattle," he said. "Moore and that gang are coming to clean us out. They've heard about the stage hold-up. Let's get back to the ranch-house and make a stand for it."

Olaf's face was a picture of consternation, but Starrett nodded grimly, and they rode. Long before they came to the yard, however, they saw that they were too late. Moore and nearly a dozen men were already grouped round the shack, brandishing their guns.

"I hate to do it," growled Tom, "but we've got to go!"

They swung to the right, making for the road that stretched between Westonville and Falls City; but Moore caught sight of them as they went tearing

(Continued on page 28.)

KEEP YOUR BOYS AT HOME!

32 Free Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

A Riley Billiard Table provides an attraction that makes it simple. There's hours of pleasure for the boys and all the family with a Riley "Home" Billiard Table. The 6 ft. size is delivered on first deposit of 13/3d., balance by monthly instalments. Cash Price £11 15s. 7 days' Free Trial allowed to test the table, and Riley's pay carriage and take transit risks. Riley's "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables are also offered on easy terms. Send for Free Art List containing sizes and prices of all tables. Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Great Britain.

E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
Howard Works, Accrington, and Dept. 35.
147, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.1.
December 26th, 1931.

"BAD COMPANY."

(Continued from page 14.)

who can shoot!" All King's men had their hands near their hip-pockets.

Goldie Gorio stroked his chin.

"You should look about you," was all Goldie said.

They turned to see that the invalid had flung aside his rugs and was covering them with a "typewriter."

"Stick up yer hands!" The invalid's face was contorted with rage. "I was paralysed by a slug from one of your men, and I'm just itching to square accounts. I've been waiting—"

"Enough!" snapped Goldie. "Keep them covered. If you look at the walls you may observe certain slits. Can you see anything beyond? I leave it to your astute brain, clever Mr. King! So you want a show-down?" Goldie walked across and took over the machine-gun from the invalid. "Here's my answer. Raise your hands high!"

"You're murdering us in cold blood!" King showed no sign of fear. "You treacherous yellow curl! You can murder us, but you'll only sign your death-warrant. It'll give McBaine the chance he's waited for months!"

"I fear no one!" Goldie Gorio's eyes were flickering, and his mouth was twitching in a most horrible manner. His voice was almost a scream. "I am the ruler of this city! If they try any tricks I'll make it so hot they'll howl for mercy! Would any of you guys like to beg for your lives? You haven't got long to live!"

Though there was the fear of death on all the faces of those men, not one stepped forward.

"You're murdering yourself," spoke King. "You're mad! You think you hold all the power, but now you're destroying what little power you ever held. Kill us, and you sign your own death-warrant. You won't die so very nicely, Goldie Gorio!"

A grey-haired, haggard, terror-stricken woman faced a ring of grim faces. McBaine's gimlet eyes seemed to bore into her.

"I've seen crime, but never anything like this," quavered the woman. "For years and years I've been true to my husband, but this terrible murder is more than I can stand. I've got to speak the truth. King and his men were shot down in cold blood."

"The Regal has been under observation for weeks," McBaine spoke to one of his men. "I saw King go there with his fellows, and that was how I guessed what Gorio might do. This woman's tale is the proof. We have enough evidence to take Goldie Gorio. Sound the alarm."

Helen Seeks Vengeance.

WHAT a change in Helen Carlyle from the gentle, sweet-faced girl.

Though her face was white and drawn, the eyes seemed to blaze out of her face. From one of her brother's men she had guessed what must have happened.

"I warned your brother he was walking into a death-trap," the man had panted out. "But he would go. It was a show-down—your brother had learnt that Goldie framed your husband on the Shark."

That news had made the girl cry out, but the iron will that had driven her brother was not lacking in his sister, and she fought back her hysteria.

December 26th, 1931.

"King decided to thrash it out with Goldie, and took six of the boys," went on the gangster. "They went in, but they haven't come back. I trailed them, and I was watching from a building across the street. There was firing in one of the rooms, because I could see the flashes. I reckon something bad has happened to your brother and the gang. Can you tell us what we ought to do? We aren't strong enough to attack the Regal, and it would be playing into the hands of both Goldie and the cops."

Helen sent the gangster away and paced her bed-room.

Then the telephone had rung, and when she heard Goldie Gorio's voice she decided to bluff.

"Hallo, Helen, how's Steve to-day? Hope he's better?"

"Hallo, Goldie, glad you rang up!" Helen made her voice soft and rather pathetic. "Very dull sitting at home doing nothing. My brother is out somewhere."

"King's gone out of town on a job," lied Goldie. "I wonder if you could come over to the Regal, as I want to discuss plans for Steve's vacation. Where you'd like to stay, and all the rest. Could you come over now? We might have some dinner."

"I should love to come, Goldie," answered the girl. "Steve is better and so grateful for all you've done. He'll be about soon—and I shall no longer be a grass widow. Two's company and three's a mob. I'll come right away, Goldie."

How hard and grim was the young face as she replaced the receiver. From a drawer she took out a gun, slipped it into the pocket of her coat, and, after a few words to the maid, hurried off to keep her appointment.

The Regal looked just like an expensive hotel, but the men behind the hidden partitions winked when they saw the girl arrive. They knew of their leader's infatuation for the sister of his enemy.

"He'll get the girl now he's got King," opined one. "Don't reckon young Steve has much chance. Wonder what scheme the boss will choose to bump him off? The poor skate!"

Helen was shown into the ante-room adjoining Goldie's bed-room, and, while she did not appear to take much interest, her eyes searched everywhere. There were too many pictures on the walls and too many curtains—did they hide anything? If there had been a show-down, it must have been on this floor, because the gangster had described the position of the building from which he had watched. On a table was a cigarette-holder, and her eyes narrowed—it was one her brother always used. Perhaps he had put it down and it had been overlooked? There was a peculiar stain on some of the floorboards that had been recently polished, and she glanced at the carpet. Helen had been in this room before—it was a different carpet.

Goldie Gorio appeared and held out welcoming hands to her.

"Come right inside, my dear!" he cried. "This is a pleasure I don't often get."

"So kind of you to ask me," was her answer, and gave him her hauds. "I have never seen your own apartments. What a magnificent place you have, and what a touch you have for the artistic. My brother admires this place very much. Have you seen him at all to-day?"

"I don't think he'll be back for a night or so." Goldie Gorio produced his best smile. "It was very urgent business that took him away. He told me to ring you up, as he knew you would be lonely." He pointed to a huge mahogany table desk and a bust. "See that? What do you think of it?"

"Who is it?"

Helen touched the gun to keep up her courage.

"I had that constructed to my own idea." He touched the carved face. "It is a mixture of Washington, Napoleon, Lincoln, and—your humble servant! I have put in my own features wherever the bust lacked strength and character. Now it is the bust of a very great man. I would have had a bust of myself, only I feel my jaw is a little too heavy and my eyes too compelling. What do you think?"

"I think you must be mad!" the girl's voice rang out. "My brother came here this afternoon. Where is he?"

"But what a queer way to address your best friend and devoted admirer." His eyes were twitching curiously. "My feelings are more than that of admiration. You and I could be King and Queen of Chicago, and—"

"Where is my brother?" said Helen again. "Do not waste time by pompous, bombastic nonsense. Where are my brother and his men?"

"They haven't been here." Gorio edged nearer to her. "You're upset over something, my dear child. What is it—tell me?"

"Has my brother been here within the last few hours?" she rasped out the question. "I know he has, and I know he never left. Is he alive or dead? Don't lie to me, Gorio, because I know that it was you who sent Steve to almost certain death."

"You're crazy, girl—crazy!" His whole face was contorted. "In time you will learn to love your master. We will rule together, and you will forget all these others. I am the greatest man in Chicago. I would do anything for you."

"Now I know you are mad! Something has happened to my brother." Her hand gripped the gun in her pocket. "Did you kill him? I can see guilt written on your twitching face. You murdered them all!"

"Supposing I did." He laughed like a maniac. "I will not kill you, my beautiful queen, although you are in my power."

"Am I?" From her pocket came the gun. "I have never shot a man or

ALL-BRITISH GIFT BOOKS FOR BRITISH BOYS.

Don't forget to buy books this Christmas. They are the best gifts and never fail to please.

There is a splendid selection of gift books in the shops this year, especially the MODERN BOY ANNUAL (6/-), THE HOBBY ANNUAL (6/-), and the MODERN BOY'S BOOK OF AIRCRAFT (7/6). The first-named is the biggest value gift book that any boy could have. It is new in every way, and tells all about the marvels of Railways, Ships, Aeroplanes, Motor-Cars, and many other things of interest to boys. There are also pages of wonderful photographs besides thrilling adventure tales.

The HOBBY ANNUAL is a fascinating book for the boy who is keen on making things at home and finding out how things work. It is crowded with wonderful "How-to-make" articles dealing with such subjects as Model Railways, Wireless, Speed Boats, etc., and is profusely illustrated with remarkable photographs and easy to follow diagrams. Whatever a boy's hobby may be this is the book for him.

The MODERN BOY'S BOOK OF AIRCRAFT (7/6) is new this year. It contains four coloured plates and many other illustrations, and deals with personal narratives by practical aviators. This is a book to appeal to all boys between the ages of ten and seventeen.

harm an animal, yet the killing of a fiend like you will give me no compunction. Don't come any closer, Gorio, or I will shoot!"

"You haven't the courage. You would not dare to shoot at me!" Again the insane laugh. "I shall kill Steve very soon—perhaps he shall choose his own death. Yes, I killed King and his dumb gang—it gave me pleasure. Put down that gun and tell me how much you admire me for my courage and daring."

Though her heart was sick, the girl's eyes never wavered from the scoundrel's face.

"You are the most loathsome reptile that ever existed!" she said in hoarse tones. "You have become crazed with power and the lust to kill. But now you must pay the penalty!"

The rat-tat-tat of machine-gun fire startled them both. The attack by the police had commenced.

The Final Conflict.

STEVE was restless and disturbed. Why hadn't Helen been round to visit him since the early hours of the morning? He had a telephone call put through to the flat, and learnt that she had gone out. The maid explained that it was to the Regal to see Mr. Gorio.

What for? For some while Steve had been getting suspicious of Goldie Gorio. He was still wondering when the gangster who had warned Helen was announced. In a few words he told the dread truth.

"King knew you had been framed and went to the Regal with his fellows for a show-down. They haven't come back, and I'm certain they're all dead. Not knowing what to do, I went to see your wife, and when I came back, after seeing the rest of the gang, I found she had gone to the Regal. The maid tells me she is packing a gun. What will you do, Steve?"

"Go to her!" raved the invalid, and limped out of his chair. "Help me get out of this place. No one must stop me. I'll tell the doctor—"

He broke off as he heard a nurse speaking excitedly in the next room.

"The police are attacking the Regal. They're after Goldie Gorio for murder!"

The two men looked at each other and then ran for the door. They hurled a doctor aside in their haste. Seconds later a hired car was taking them towards the Regal.

In a side street Steve found McBaine, and in a few words learnt of the confession.

"Give me a gun, McBaine!" shouted Steve. "My wife's inside—"

"Better stay with us, Steve," cautioned McBaine; then, seeing the boy's determined jaw, laid a hand on the young fellow's shoulder. "You can't do anything, lad. Guess Gorio won't harm your wife."

"I'm not taking any chances," Steve shouted, and sped away.

The police were slowly working towards the chief entrance of the Regal. The building was off the main thoroughfare, but all traffic down this side road had been diverted. From corners and from behind some old wagons the police fired towards the great door. Already all the glass was smashed and the beautiful statues and huge palms riddled to dust and ruin. From hidden loopholes the gangsters returned the fire.

Steve found a plain-clothes man hiding behind an old car.

"My wife's in that hell," raved the youngster. His anger lent him strength. "You're bringing up racket guns—let me use one. I know where those skunks have their loopholes."

"You go to certain death!" was the answer.

Steve snapped at him. "You'll never get them out of that warren otherwise!"

"Go to it, kid!" the detective nodded. "I'm taking a chance on you."

Racket guns are long-barrelled machine-guns mounted on a wheeled trolley and having an armour-plated shield. The barrel goes through a hole in the shield, and it is possible for a man to crawl along, pushing the machine-gun before him. The chief danger was in Steve's leg.

Through the shattered door the racket gun was slowly pushed, and behind the gun was Steve Carlyle. The gangsters grinned fiendishly at seeing such an easy victim. Little did they guess who manned the gun, or that he knew most of their secrets.

Crack! Crack! Crack! One of the men behind the loophole gave a sobbing cry and slumped to the ground. His companion stared in horror; then a look of agony creased his face as two bullets found their mark.

From the stairs a man opened fire on the protected attacker, and instantly Steve swung round to deal with this new danger. Deadly was the fire of Steve Carlyle, and the man came tumbling down the stairs to lie a crumpled heap.

Two more loopholes opened fire on Steve, but they found shooting difficult, as bullets were now blazing through the door from two more racket guns. Then Steve located the small aperture through which the gangsters' guns were spitting fire—and his weapon answered viciously. Those behind the loophole fell silent, and a ricochet smashed the last gun. Two men on the stairs tried to hold back the attackers, but fell riddled with bullets.

Dashing out of hiding, Steve picked up one of the gangsters' guns and charged up the marble stairs. A bullet whined past his ear as he dodged behind a statue. A hand protruded holding a gun—but instantly Steve fired. A howl of pain was his reward. Steve's clenched fist flattened out the man as he reached for a gun with his unhurt hand. He thrust the fellow aside as if he were a child.

Joe tried to stop Steve, and was foolish enough to threaten.

"I'm gonna kill you, Steve Carlyle!" He was as mad as his master. "Straight through the heart!"

A wild leap and Steve was behind a pillar. The bullets sprayed all round but he was unhurt. He had picked up another gun, and with a cry he threw his emptied gun from him. Steve made that cry sound like one in terrible pain. It bluffed Joe—and Steve, from behind that pillar, got Joe as he half lowered his weapon. Over and over down the stairs rolled the body of Goldie Gorio's ablest servant.

Goldie's apartments at last! A rush and they were open.

Steve pulled up with a jerk. By a table stood Helen, and she stared down at something that lay at her feet. The girl seemed in a trance. Comforting arms were at once thrown about her.

"Steve! Steve!" She clung to him. "He rushed at me and I shot him!"

A head peered round the corner, took in the scene at a glance. A smile spread over the lined, grim face of McBaine.

"Who killed Gorio?" His sharp question made them jump.

"I did!" gasped Helen.

"Oh, no, you didn't!" McBaine laughed as he took the gun from the girl's nerveless fingers. "I killed Gorio."

They stared at him with dawning hope. "After I've been trailing him for nine months I'm not going to let a woman take him from me." He winked broadly at both of them. "This is my funeral! This show's over bar the shouting. By to-night you two kids are going to be well on your way to Florida. As far as McBaine is concerned you ain't ever been in this dive!"

(By permission of the Producers' Distributing Company, Ltd., starring Ricardo Cortez as Goldie Gorio; Helen Twelvetrees as Helen; John Garrick as Steve Carlyle; Paul Hurst as Joe; Frank Conroy as Hartley King; Harry Carey as McBaine; Frank McHugh as Doc.)

"THIS MODERN AGE."

Should a daughter give up her chance of happiness to defend her mother? A modern story of mother-love—of a girl's sacrifice to save her mother's name.

GRAND COMPLETE FILM NOVELS.

"BIG BUSINESS GIRL."

Her boss wanted to be her husband, her husband wanted to be her boss. Read this story and see who wins. Starring Loretta Young and Frank Albertson.

"THE DANCING PARTNER."

He posed as a dancing-partner to test her character—this unknown girl he was to marry in a month! Starring William Haines and Irene Purcell.

Neil Hamilton and Joan Crawford in "This Modern Age."

Complete in this week's issue of our splendid companion paper

"SCREEN STORIES."

On Sale Monday, December 21st.

Price 2d
December 26th, 1931.

"BRANDED"

(Continued from page 25.)

across the rolling grass-land and, with a shout of baffled rage, set off in pursuit, followed by the rest, firing as they rode.

Over the crest of a hill and across a stretch of waste the fugitives rode for dear life, and they struck the road close to the region of the fallen rocks beside which the stage-coach had been held up. They swept across the dusty roadway and plunged in among the protecting crags, dismounted, and took cover.

But they had not been able to reach their hiding-place unscathed. Their pursuers streamed into the roadway, left their horses, and advanced cautiously to surround and close in upon their quarry. The air became acrid with the smoke of six-shooters; bullets spat against the boulders.

The three separated to present less of a target, and each behind a protecting mass of limestone fired and ducked and fired again. Olaf, waxing suddenly valiant, exposed himself to take aim at the ugly face of Tex, which rose up over a ledge less than ten yards.

His gun and the half-breed's barked simultaneously, and the face vanished—but Olaf fell groaning to the dust.

Tom came scrambling down from his loftier retreat to raise his henchman.

"Where'd they get you, Swede?" he asked anxiously.

"My arm," groaned Olaf.

Starrett crept round to them, a six-shooter in each hand, and he insisted on mounting guard while Tom hastily bound up the wounded arm.

Bullets were spattering all about them, but Starrett asked quite calmly: "You said something about a stage hold-up—when and where did it happen?"

"Just around here, about three weeks ago. This fellow Moore is trying to frame us."

A volley rang out, putting an end to talk; the encircling movement was nearly complete now, and the attackers were close.

But Lou had reached the sheriff's office in Westonville some little time before Tom and his companions had reached the rocks. She burst into the little office and, without any preliminaries, she cried wildly:

"Moore and Tex are going to lynch Mr. Dale for a hold-up he didn't do!"

"Moore, eh?" snorted the sheriff, and looked at his colleague, Sheriff Dawson, from Falls City, who had been talking to him when Lou so dramatically appeared. "Well, you may be right, Mack, but there ain't goin' to be any lynching in my country!"

He sprang up from his desk and went to the door.

"Ben," he bellowed to a passing cow-puncher, "get the boys together—quick!"

Ben wanted to know why, and was briefly informed. He darted over to the saloon, outside which many horses were tethered to the hitching-rail.

"Come on, boys!" he shouted in at the doorway. "We gotta stop a lynching!"

There was quite a stampede from the bar, but outside the building an elderly rancher with a walrus moustache gripped the cowboy's arm.

"Who's being lynched now?" he demanded.

"Some bandits that held up the Falls City coach about three weeks ago," was the hurried reply.

The others were already on their horses—fully a score of them. The rancher followed suit; the two sheriffs came galloping up with Lou, and the whole party went off out of the town in a cloud of dust.

Lou led the way, assuming that the scene of combat would be the Dale ranch; but as the riders approached the rocks the incessant noise of gunfire on their right told its own story. Sheriff Watkins barked commands, and the horses were left on the fringe of the road while the posse plunged in among the rocks.

A rain of bullets informed the surroundings that they were surrounded; the stentorian voice of the sheriff of Westonville was heard bellowing:

"Stop there! Hold everything!"

Most of the besiegers, realising that they were outnumbered by the forces of law and order, stopped obediently enough; but Moore, enraged at the prospect of losing his prey, crept towards the cluster of rocks that screened the three.

Starrett, catching sight of him, ran out to take aim; Tom, with a warning cry, looked round a projection and fired. Three guns barked as one, and Moore threw up his hands and collapsed, shot through the heart. But Starrett, tottering backwards, fell in a huddled heap, and Tom, regardless of danger, was raising him up when the two sheriffs came forward.

One of Moore's followers, darting ahead of them, flung a noose over Tom's head, and the sheriff from Falls City cried triumphantly:

"There's your man!"

But the rancher with the walrus moustache shouted over the top of a rock which was in his way:

"That's not the man that stole my watch!"

"What?" barked the sheriff.

Starrett, leaning feebly against Tom's shoulder and breathing with difficulty, opened his eyes and looked at the gesticulating rancher.

"He's—right," he said gaspingly. "Dale had nothing to do—with it. I help up—the stage—alone."

"That's the man right enough, sheriff," declared the staring rancher. "I never forget a face."

But Starrett, summoning the last remnants of his breath by sheer will-power, said faintly:

"Got a smoke, pal?"

Tom, holding the self-confessed bandit with one arm, found a cigarette with his free hand, put it between the dying man's parched lips and lit it. But Starrett hadn't enough breath left to draw in even a wisp of smoke. The cigarette fell to the ground, and he was dead.

Lou had remained in the roadway with the horses, commanded to stay there by Sheriff Watkins, and she was patting Silver's white neck when Tom eventually climbed down to her. His face was strained and there were tears in his eyes.

"Here's your horse," she said gently. "I'm awfully sorry, Cuthbert."

"Th—that's all right," said Tom with an effort at cheerfulness. "And I guess I'll be riding your way directly. Only don't call me Cuthbert any more."

She gazed at him with a tender expression in her brown eyes, but she could not resist the opportunity.

"I never will," she said. "Never—Chauncey!"

(By permission of Columbia Pictures and United Artists' Corporation, Ltd., starring Buck Jones as Tom Dale; Ethel Kenyon as Lou Preston; Wallace McDonald as Bob Starrett; Al Smith as Joe Moore; John Oscar as Olaf (Swede); Clark Burroughs as Tex; Philo McCullough as Sheriff Mack Dawson; Fred Burns as Sheriff Watkins.)

GROSE'S 3, New Bridge Street, LONDON, E.C.4. LUDGATE CIRCUS

BILLIARD TABLES 1/- per week.

SIZE	Deposit	4 monthly payments	Cash
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
5 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10/-	6/6	26/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8/6	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10/-	12/6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	15/6	52/-
6 ft. 4 in. x 3 ft. 3 in.	10/-	22/-	80/-

Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls (guaranteed unbreakable), Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk. COMPLETE LIST FREE.

BE TALL Your Height increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

STAMMERING, STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars Free.—FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-), including Airpost, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars, simple home cure, send stamp.—MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

BE TALLER! Increased my own height to 6ft. 3 1/2 ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

FREE FUN! Ventriloquists' Instruments given FREE to all sending 7d. (P.O.) for latest Magic Trick and List. (Large Parcels, 2/6, 5/-)—J. Harrison, 368, Dudley Rd., Birmingham.

BLUSHING, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

FULL O' PEP VIGOROUS, HEALTHY, HAPPY AND STRONG—Life's Greatest Gifts—ALL YOURS. The very moment you commence treatment this ELECTRO MEDICAL INDUCTION SET will have started to strengthen your whole body, and its beneficial effect influence your general health. Sent you complete for 7/6. Post Free. Money refunded if not satisfied. SYMAX & CO., 261, Lichfield Rd., Aston, Birmingham.

