"Reckon I piled it on too strong. Guess I've put the boss in a jam. Cuss all girls and toads like Weber. Maybe Buddy will think better of it and not sign."

But when a beautiful girl plays the part of a magnet then may a man make a mistake. Buddy Doyle signed after naming one condition—that he should not ride till after the Gold Cup.

Wally Weber patted his new recruit assuringly on the shoulder.

"That's okay. Haven't I got Speed Martin riding? So I couldn't possibly want you. Off you two young people go and enjoy yourselves."

And when they had gone Wally Weber picked up the phone and got through to his stables:

"Send Speed Martin to me at once. Tell him it's urgent."

Trickery.

BUDDY DOYLE was not happy, even though Babe Ellis told him that she loved him and no one else in the world. Most of the jockeys in Weber's stables were not bad sort of chaps, and though they were friendly enough Buddy felt they despised him. Wouldn't they have quit on a trainer who called them nasty names? But even that reasoning did not quite appease Buddy's conscience. Pop Blake had been a good master, and just because of a girl Buddy had left. He missed Sleepy and his wise-cracks. The next day he ran into the trainer and the latter's sneering laugh made his blood boil, but Babe was with him, so he let the taunt pass.

Another thing that worried Buddy was Six-Shooter. The jockey had a real affection for the horse, and he knew that the horse would answer to his jockeyship better than to that of Maloney. Six-Shooter was just like a bullet when Buddy chanted his "Whoop-te-do!" Could Maloney ride the horse well enough to beat Weber's

"I've just got a message—I'm to ride Rosedawn!" Buddy thrust aside the men. "I can't ride the horse, Mr Weber!"

Rosedawn? Yes, he reckoned Maloney could just about do it, because Speed Martin was only tenth in the list of winning jockeys for the season. Buddy had expected that Six-Shooter would go out from evens to five to two when the racing world heard he had quit riding for the Blake stables, but it was a shock when the horse went out to fours, and Rosedawn shortened down to two to one. Someone must be putting money on Rosedawn.

Buddy tried to forget by being constantly in the presence of Babe Ellis. One morning Weber persuaded him to give Rosedawn a gallop as he didn't want to work Martin too hard. With no suspicion of ulterior motive Buddy was only too pleased to oblige.

Then came the day of the great race, and Buddy got a big surprise when Baggott, Weber's trainer, sent him a message. He was wanted to ride Rosedawn as Speed Martin had been hurt in a car accident and taken to hospital. "I can't race against Six-Shooter," Buddy told Babe. "It's out of the question. I must go and see Weber at once."

"If you rode Rosedawn the horse would win," Babe spoke hesitatingly. "Weber would give you a thousand bucks if you won the Gold Cup."

"I don't want his money!" Buddy was almost rude in his perturbation. "I won't ride! I won't ride! I'm going to his office to tell him so right now."

Wally Weber's office was seething with excitement and bustle. Besides being an owner Weber was a gambler. He had backed his own horse heavily, but he had also given out that Rosedawn would win, and that he would not mind taking any bets on other challengers. That was why his phones were fairly buzzing, because Weber was offering five against Six-Shooter.

"Get in as much as you can before it gets abroad that Martin has had an accident." He smiled at his trainer. "Good joke that. Won't the fools laugh when they learn Doyle is riding instead of Martin."

"Will Doyle make any trouble?" asked Baggott.

"Buddy can do nothing because there's a clause in the contract that he can't break." He raised one eyebrow as the sound of an angry voice came to them. "If I'm a good guesser, that will be Master Buddy. Leave this to me, Fellows"—Weber raised his voice to attract the attention of several men busy at phones—"better shut down. Tell the operator to say engaged till I'm through with Buddy. Want your collaboration with the young fool." His voice became a whisper. "You know your stuff. Take your cue—here comes Buddy."

Buddy fairly hurled himself into the office. All the men were grouped round Wally's desk.

"Darned tough about Speed Martin," Weber was saying. "Still, young Buddy should pull off the race."

"I've just got a message I'm to ride Rosedawn." Buddy thrust aside the men. "I can't ride the horse, Mister Weber."

"I'm sorry, Buddy; but how was I to know Martin would get crooked?" Weber shrugged his shoulders. "It's very tough luck on me, but I've backed my horse, and I must get my next best jockey to ride."

"But we arranged that I shouldn't ride till after the Gold Cup," was the argument.

"I'm awfully sorry, but this is an eventuality I didn't bargain for." Wally Weber shook his head. "You'll find in the contract that in a case like this I can call upon you to ride. You see, Buddy, I've got to study my own interests."

"Of course you have, boss." A lean man with a hat on the back of his head—it was Baggott. "There's no question about it. You'd better not hang around here because time is flying."

"Of course Buddy takes out Rosedawn," spoke another man.

"But I won't ride against my old stable," shouted Buddy. "It isn't playing the game."

"Do you want to be suspended?" snapped Weber. "Now, don't talk like a child, Buddy. It is bad luck, but what can I do?"

Arguments availed nothing, and at last Buddy went reluctantly to the stables. He saw Wally Weber's argument, but it was darned rough. He tried to ease his conscience by calling it "Fate."

But after "weighing-out" Buddy overheard two stable lads talking.

"I guess I'm investing a buck on Rosedawn. That was a mighty bright idea getting Speed into an accident and making Buddy ride."

"Yeah—some accident. I bet Speed ain't in any hospital."

Of course, it was a lot of lies, still it sowed the seed of suspicion. Somebody had been backing Rosedawn heavily—who? Speed Martin had a bad name on racebooks—was this a frame-up? If Rosedawn had Buddy on its back, would the horse have a better chance? The jockey knew it would have a better chance. And just when he was trying to solve all these problems, a familiar growl made him start.

"You double-crossing little rat," sneered Sleepy Jones. "So you're going to ride Rosedawn. After all the years I've known you and yer go crooked for a skunk like Weber."

"What do you mean by that?"

"You knows as well as I do that Martin ain't had any accident." The hitter contempt made Buddy wince. "I should wave yer hand to him when you enter up to the starting-post."

"Martin's not here?"

"Oh, childlike innocence—I seed him with my own eyes." Sleepy spat in disgust. "He'll be arm-in-arm with yer two crook friends, Mr. Slinny Weber and Miss Baby-face."

"You're lying to me." Buddy's face was tense.

"I ain't that sort, and you knows it." Sleepy turned away. "I hope you're satisfied, you dirty little trickster. I suppose you know Pop Blake has a packet on Six-Shooter and that it'll smash him. You'll tell me in a minute that you don't know that Weber has been backing his nag like blazes and laying all bets on Six-Shooter."

Buddy Doyle knew then that he had been tricked. A girl's false smile and the cunning of a plausible roguo had easily been too much for him. They had tricked him through his vanity and he'd got to stand by them or— He stared after Sleepy as an idea slowly formed.

Was his own name worth sacrificing in order to outwit a bunch of crooks and help Pop Blake, who had always shown him every kindness? But before he decided anything he would ride close enough to scan the crowd in the grandstand—Wally Weber always had front row seats.

Buddy centered up the course, and one glance was sufficient. Babe Ellis, Wally Weber, and the leering face of Speed Martin.

Buddy's Strange Ride.

Buddy could hear the yells of the bookmakers, and above them all came the price of two horses: "Rosedawn at five to four on, and Six-Shooter at sixes."

His next interest was Six-Shooter, and he noticed that the horse was lathered with sweat and obviously in a bad condition. Maloney was hanging on like grim death and looking obviously scared. The man had no control over the creature, and probably Six-Shooter had gone from bad to worse since the old jockey had gone.

A line-up for the start, and then up went the tapes.

Buddy had orders to make the pace, as Baggott was scared with twelve runners that the horse might be shut in—the distance was a mile and two furlongs.

At the first bend Buddy, two lengths in front, looked back—Six-Shooter had tailed off last.

Buddy set his teeth and slowly began to pull Rosedawn.

Wally Weber's smiles of anticipation changed to frowns, and then to rage. The Wasp and Black Knight were level with Rosedawn. The crowd gasped as Rosedawn slithered back into fourth place and seemed to disappear in a bunch of horses. Round the bend and a gasp went up. The Wasp leading by two lengths, a cluster of horses, and three lengths behind were Six-Shooter and Rosedawn.

"My gar, he's framed me!" snarled Weber. "I'll ring his neck, the little skunk!"

"You deserve all you get." It was the Babe who spoke. "I'd have never come in on this game if I'd known how low it was. I don't know what Buddy's doing, but I reckon it's grand."

Only Buddy and a horse knew what was happening.

Buddy dropped to the tail, and then Maloney heard a rhythmic chant:

"Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do!"

Maloney was dull-witted and did not understand, but Six-Shooter knew. It was his beloved master spurring him on. The flagging limbs tautened and Six-Shooter became again a champion.

In a few strides Six-Shooter had caught up and passed London Wall.

"Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do!" Like a streak Six-Shooter went past two more stragglers.

Mercilessly Buddy whipped Rosedawn into maintaining the tremendous pace.

"Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do!" Nearing the last bend and Six-Shooter and Rosedawn were through, with only The Wasp and Lincoln in front. The latter four lengths and The Wasp six lengths ahead.

The straight with a quarter of a mile to the finishing-post, and now Six-Shooter was level with Lincoln.

The judge craned his neck from his box, the whole crowd craned theirs, and now Wally Weber knew the secret. Buddy was breaking all rules to drive Six-Shooter to victory.

"Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do!" panted Buddy, and lashed at Rosedawn, because Six-Shooter was tearing over the ground like a mad thing. Past Lincoln and a furlong to go—The Wasp was a length and a half in the lead.

"Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do!" Buddy felt his lungs burst, but he must not fail.

The judge and the crowd saw two horses racing towards the finish with a third horse close behind. They could hear now the refrain: "Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do!"

Six-Shooter flashed by the almost run-out Wasp and passed the finishing-post an easy winner by two lengths.

Yells and shouts broke out—pande monium was let loose. Those who had backed Six-Shooter were almost hysterical at the mirage, whilst those who had backed Rosedawn and The Wasp were wild with rage.

And Buddy when he stood before the stewards was smiling. He had eased his own conscience, saved Pop Blake and Sleepy Jones, and smashed Wally Weber.

"What explanation have you to offer of your extraordinary riding, Doyle?" demanded the judge. "You pulled Rosedawn to last place and then acted like a madman. Why were you shouting 'Whoop-te-do!'?"

Buddy Doyle made only one answer to every question: "I have nothing to say about my riding."

"You're suspended for a year, Doyle," the judge rapped out his verdict.

Disgraced but with head held high, Buddy Doyle passed through a crowd who wanted, in most cases, to lynch him. A girl tried to get through, but the press was too much. Buddy Doyle left Kentucky on the brake rods of a southern express.

The Price of Dishonour.

THERE are many towns known by the name of Wellington in the States, but this was a small cow-town in Southern California. Its chief claim to any importance was the race-course, where cowpunchers and others came from miles around to enjoy the sport.

Favourites had a strange habit of failing at these meetings, and it was not always the fault of the horses. The riding of many of the jockeys was very questionable.

One morning in late summer, two months after the sensational Gold Cup, a thin man in flash clothes and straw hat lounded against the rails. His weather-tanned, lined face gave his age at fifty; the eyes behind the bushy eyebrows were very much alive. Clarence Hardwick was known on many race-courses as the Dude, and he earned his living by giving tips. One could learn tips from strange quarters out in the West, and the Dude found he could make more money than on the bigger courses.

Thoughtfully he chewed at a straw and wondered whether the information he had got for three dollars from a darkie stable hand was going to prove good. Unless one could find at least one winner it was better to hit the trail before some of the mob started getting fresh.

Out of the corner of his eyes he saw a figure come round a building. Racing would not start for another two hours, and he wondered who the stranger might be. Was it a rival snooping round after information?

The stranger was a young man, but the features looked pale and wan, whilst the grey serge suit was dusty and almost threadbare in parts, the open white shirt was not too clean, and there was no hat to the mop of curly hair.

Suddenly the Dude stiffened because his keen memory for faces told him who the stranger might be—a jockey who had once given him sound information.

"Morning," drawled the Dude, keeping his hat over his eyes. "You looking for a job?"

"Morning," was the reply. "I'm riding Aircraft in the second race."

"Know my face?" The Dude took off his hat. "Remember the tip-ster you helped at Boston, Doyle?"

The tattered figure started and glared at the Dude.

"Shush! Not that name here!" he cried. "My name is O'Burn."

"That's okay with me—O'Burn." The Dude gripped the jockey's hand. "So you're riding Aircraft—Hagan's nag! Hum! How have things been going, had?"

"Reckon you can guess how bad, Dude." Buddy looked as if he needed a square meal. "You get put up for a trial, and they want to hire you on the spot, but when you say your name that's the end. My face seems to be kinda familiar, and there's always some skate ready to recognise me even when I use another name. Reckon no one will know me down here."

"You're O'Burn to me." The Dude smiled, then frowned. "Charles Hagan ain't a sport-man that I kinda want to kiss. Watch! Pipe down, son, here comes Hagan."

A big, burly fellow in a tweed sports coat and wearing a black trilby hat strolled towards them. His thumbs were in the armholes of his waistcoat, and a big cigar was stuck aggressively from the corner of his mouth, whilst a heavy gold chain across the waistcoat did nothing to impress a person in Hagan's favour.

He nodded to both men, stroked his heavy, clean-shaven jaw, and half closed one eyelid.

"A word with you, O'Burn." He took the jockey's arm and led him just out of earshot. "Wanta talk about that horse of mine, Aircraft. I was hoping that the nag would start at sixes, but some mutt has tipped my horse, and the colt's at evens. Danged annoying when the stable ain't got their money on! The second favourite is Water Wings, and if Aircraft don't win that's a cert, and the price is fives. I'm backing Water Wings."

"I don't quite get the idea." Buddy looked at the big man in perplexity.

"If Aircraft don't win to-day, it may win somewhere else," was the reply, accompanied by a heavy wink. "And it will win at long odds. That suits me. Now do you get the idea?"

"You don't want Aircraft to win?"

"That's the scheme." The man lowered his voice. "See that my horse don't win, and you're on a hundred bucks and the chance to ride Aircraft next time out. Is it a bet?"

"You want me to pull Aircraft?" Buddy spoke through gritted teeth.

The Dude edged closer, as he was good at smelling trouble.

"Yeah. But not so loud."

"I'm not doing any pulling for anybody," raged the jockey. "If I ride Aircraft, I ride it to win."

"Oh, is that so?" Hagan removed his cigar. "I should have thought that you were pretty good at pulling horses—Doyle!"

So he had been recognised again, and the price of silence was dirty riding. Rather would Buddy starve.

"You dirty trickster!" The youngster lost his temper. "You can't blackmail me into pulling your horse. Skunks like you oughtn't to be allowed on a race-course!"

"You impertinent young rogue!" roared the big man. "You dare to call me names, and all the world knows how you pulled Rosedawn in the Gold Cup, got a thousand bucks for doing it, and —"

"You're a liar!" screamed Buddy, clenching his fists.

The raised voices had attracted attention, and curious folk slowly approached. Stable lads, trainers, hangers-on, and, by bad luck, one of the officials.

"I'll knock you still!" raged Hagan, who was a notorious bully.

"Then take that as a start!" Buddy hit the big man slap on the point of the jaw.

The blow did not hurt very much, but it made Hagan livid with fury. His left hand gripped Buddy's coat, whilst his right hand was drawn back to strike Buddy a heavy punch.

Hagan drew back his right hand to strike Buddy. The Dude pushed in between them.

September 5th, 1931.

The Dude pushed in between the two men.

"That will do, Hagan!" His lined face was aggressive. "Choose someone a bit bigger if you want to hit anyone."

"Don't you meddle in my affairs!" Hagan glared at the Dude. "I'll settle this young pup!"

"What's going on here?" cried a harsh voice, and a thin man with a green eyeshade over his forehead pushed his way through. "What's all the trouble about?"

It was one of the committee.

"Ever heard of Buddy Doyle?" Hagan shouted. "If you haven't, then you're looking at him now."

"The Doyle who was suspended for riding Rosedawn?" The official eyed Buddy, who bowed his head. "Is your name Doyle?"

"Yes, I am Buddy Doyle." The jockey faced his accuser. "Hagan wanted me to pull his horse, and when I refused he threatened to expose me."

"That's a darned lie!" Hagan tried to strike out at Buddy, but again the Dude got in the way.

"I heard part of the conversation," he said to the official. "Hagan certainly wanted his horse not to win as the price was too short, and he used his knowledge to try and force Doyle to ride crooked."

"Then you are Buddy Doyle?" demanded the official.

"Yes, I'm Buddy Doyle."

"I'm sorry, but you can't ride here. You were suspended for a year. The other matter shall be inquired into." The official waved the gathering crowd away before turning to Hagan. "You'll oblige me by coming along to my office."

Slowly the crowd melted away, leaving only the Dude and a dispirited Doyle. He was hungry, starving, and beaten—not a cent in his pocket.

"Cheer up, Buddy!" The Dude patted him heartily on the back. "Take my tip and quit horses for a spell, and get a land job. It'll be forgotten in time. Well, kid, I must be getting along! See you some time! Keep your chin up!"

"You are a great pal, Dude!" Buddy held out his hand. "Guess I'll take your tip and try a different line. Good-bye, Dude."

The Dude held out his hand.

"Best of luck, my lad!" he cried. "Don't forget about keeping your chin up! I saw you ride Rosedawn, and I know you were framed on some dirty stuff by Wally Weber. Good-bye again, and luck go with you!"

The Dude was a hundred yards away before Buddy Doyle realised that something had been thrust into his hand.

His eyes almost jumped out of his head. Four five-dollar bills! But he couldn't take them! Maybe the Dude knew how Buddy would feel, because he had taken to his heels and run.

The End of a Long Trail.

AGUA CALIENTE is one of the most famous race tracks of the West. Situated in a beautiful valley, and surrounded by forest land. Someone decided that there was no finer turf and grass for miles around, and brought horses to the valley; then a small track was built, and later on a town was built up round a super race-course.

Naturally one must eat, and so restaurants and hotels had sprung up round the course, and in one of the cheap eating-house saloons a waiter in a September 5th, 1931.

white coat ran here and there, fetching and carrying. There were other waiters, but one was only interested in this special one. He was Buddy Doyle.

In a way the ex-jockey had made good. He had got work, was well fed and fairly content. Seldom did he ever talk of racing, and none there knew that the waiter by the name of Doyle had been famous in racing circles. He was popular and earning more money than most because he could sing a comic song. A natural gift to pick up all the latest dance numbers and their choruses, and often customers would call on Buddy for a song.

Nine months had gone by since the never-to-be-forgotten day of the Gold Cup. Often Buddy thought of Sleepy Jones, Pop Blake and others, but he tried never to think of Babe Ellis. If ever she sang over the wireless he would try to get as far away as possible.

Doyle hurried to the bar.

"Two highballs, one lemon fizzer, a thunder and lightning, and—" He ceased as it was obvious the two soda fountain experts were not listening.

"I tell you Nimrod won by two lengths, and the objection was overruled. Nimrod started at thirty-three to one, because I remember a chap who had five bucks on it."

"That hoss's name was Nero."

"Hoy, how about my drinks?" They studied him with displeasure as he gave his order. "And let me tell you bozzos something you don't know. The horse was Penrod. Nero was down the course, and the price was something about eights. And I want a little less of the lemon in that fizzer. You sodajerkers can't tell me anything."

"Dang me, but I believe he's right!" gasped the big, jovial-looking bannan. "Now who would have thought a little runt like that would know anything about a man's sport. Know anything good for to-day?"

Buddy had just handed over the drinks, collected some money and found another order when someone touched his shoulder.

"In a moment, sir." The touch became more persistent and Buddy swung round. "Gosh, it's Sleepy!"

All the old differences were forgotten. In Sleepy's gleaming eyes was the joy of reunion. The two clasped hands and stood staring at each other as if they could scarce believe their eyes.

"I guess I've trailed you a thousand miles." Sleepy spoke first. "Gee, you look queer in that garb!"

"Suits me, old hoss," laughed Buddy, and scowled as someone called him. "Have a drink, Sleepy; I'll be free in half an hour."

Arm in arm they strolled through the streets of the town some half-hour later, and Buddy longed to ask questions.

"Guess you'd like to know what's been going on." Sleepy gave the youngster's arm a reassuring squeeze. "Pop Blake has given up the game. That business—" Sleepy knew he was touching on a delicate subject.

"Go on, Sleepy; I'd like to know what's been happening."

"They wanted you badly." Sleepy shook his head. "Reckon you could have got that suspension washed out if you'd been at the inquiry. There was the blazes of a row. Nothing very definite could be proved, and as Wally Weber was completely bust, the matter dropped. Pop got kinda fed-up with all the paper talk, and as he had made a packet of money he quit, but he was mighty sorry for you. Buddy, we got sorta fed-up with you, and we thought a pretence of Maloney riding would bring you to your senses, but it didn't work. After the race I minded our talk, and I knew you had thrown the race and made Six-Shooter win."

"Whoop-te-do!" Buddy spoke almost to himself.

"I reckon the stewards knew there was something fishy about the whole affair, but they could not condone what you had done. It all leaked out in time, and three months ago they annulled your suspension."

"Kind of them." Buddy did not seem very interested. "And what have you been doing all this while, Sleepy?"

"Mostly trailing around after you," was the answer. "Doing a bit of training here and there, but I missed you, boy, and we felt we couldn't rest until—"

"Did you say 'we'? Who's 'we'?"

Sleepy shuffled his feet and seemed to find difficulty in answering.

"Babe Ellis," he said at last, but dared not look at his friend's face.

"I don't want to hear anything of her!" Buddy's voice was hoarse.

"We got that gal all wrong, buddy," Sleepy cried. "Listen and hear all about it. Babe was a singer, and wanted to make good, and Weber offered her big money and a contract if she could get a good crowd at his dive. Then he told her that lew of the racing fraternity came to his place, and if she could persuade the most popular jockey of the moment to grace his place, then other racing folk would come along. There'd be many anxious to see such a notability as yerself. She knew nothing about crook stuff, and Weber had spoon-fed the girl that Pop Blake and me were a couple of crooks and that she was sorta saving you by doing this. Gee, you should have seen how she carried on when you couldn't be found."

Buddy Doyle's eyes were glistening. He had mistrusted Babe, and she'd been framed like himself.

"That gal came to me and we put notices in the papers, but you had vanished off the earth. A month ago the Dude came to see me, heard I was looking for you, and he started me on the trail. Money comes and money goes, Buddy, and I guess you oughta know that Babe has been doing most of the paying."

"Gosh, how I would like to see her again!" Buddy was flushed with excitement.

"Maybe she'll get a job down these parts."

It was on his way back to another spell of waiting that Buddy gave Sleepy a half-frightened, questioning glance.

"What you aim to do now you've found me, Sleepy?"

"Just hang around and see what's doing." Sleepy rubbed his hands together. "I thought I might do a bit of training, with you as chief jockey."

"I'm through with the turf!" Buddy spoke viciously. "I ain't got any interest left in horses."

"Don't you believe it," scoffed Sleepy. "It's in yer blood. I'll give this burg the once-over until you finish for the day."

"See you in about a couple of hours." Buddy gripped Sleepy's hands. "But lay off talking about racing."

"He'll soon forget all that nonsense," decided Sleepy, as he stared after the ex-jockey. "There'll be no holding him once I get him mounted."

(Continued on page 26.)

To save his father from a life-sentence, a young cowpuncher penetrates into an outlaw stronghold in search of the real criminal. Starring Tom Tyler.

"West of Cheyenne"

The End of a Feud.

THE sheriff of the county, the greater part of which was the Circle B and Triangle Ranches, was just packing up for dinner when the door opened and Lafe Langdon, the elderly rancher who owned Circle B, walked in.

"You asked me to give you a look up, sheriff," he said agreeably.

The sheriff nodded, dropped his last papers into a drawer, and closed it thoughtfully before he spoke.

"I did, Lafe," he agreed in his quiet, genial way. "Fact is, Lafe, I'm reckonin' this feud business between you and Jim Halliday has gone far enough—too far for old-timers and old-time friends. What do you say?"

Lafe Langdon gave vent to a noise that was very much like a grunt of disgust.

"Say?" he repeated thickly. "I say you should have run that neighbour of mine off the range long ago. I say—"

"Well, suppose you say it to me!" came in a snappy tone from the other side of the room.

A door had opened, and from another room Jim Halliday—a big, bluff, and hearty fellow of about Langdon's own age—came into the office.

But it was the sheriff who stepped in between them to make the peace.

"Quit it, you two!" he said, with a faint smile. "What exactly is the row between you?"

"Jim Halliday has been stealing my cattle for months, with the aid of the Laramie Kid!" affirmed Langdon hotly. "That guy is a notorious gunman and cattle thief—and you know it, Jim Halliday!"

"I know it now," corrected Halliday quietly. "I found out that he was a no-good. Lafe, and I fired him. My boys ran him off the range. He doesn't work for me now."

Lafe Langdon hesitated, and the sheriff took the opportunity to put in his spoke.

"There you are, Lafe! The Laramie Kid has been run off the range, so you can't reckon to have anything against Jim Halliday now," he said quickly. "Why not shake hands, and resume the friendship you should both be proud of?"

Langdon grinned a little feebly, and thrust out his hand with a sudden gesture.

"Okay with me, Jim," he said shakily. "I sure did find it hard to believe it of my old chum. But if you say the Laramie Kid has been run off the range, it's good enough for me."

"That's real fine," put in the sheriff, and patted them both on the shoulders as they shook hands. "There's a drink on me to celebrate this, boys, if you'll come down to the saloon."

The enmity that had been between the two ranchers had naturally enough spread to the men who worked upon the ranches, and there was consequently considerable surprise when the sheriff was seen leading the rivals down the street. There was still greater surprise when it was seen that Lafe Langdon and Jim Halliday were laughing and joking with one another, evidently on the very best of terms.

The celebration drink was consumed in the saloon to the satisfaction of everybody concerned, particularly the sheriff, who felt that he had done a good day's work.

But it was destined that the peace should not reign for long, for there happened that which was to end the feud for ever.

Within two hours of the time when Jim Halliday and Lafe Langdon had made up their quarrel the latter rode in from his cattle range to the horse corral, to become immediately aware of the fact that one of his men was riding in at a speed that spelt trouble about some thing.

The cowpuncher's horse was sweating, and it was obvious from its heavy stride that it had been ridden all out for some distance.

"What's the trouble?" demanded Langdon as the 'puncher dragged his horse to a halt.

"The Laramie Kid has got away with another bunch of cattle, boss," panted the 'puncher. "He's got 'em all mixed in with some of Jim Halliday's, from the Triangle."

Langdon drew in his breath sharply. "The Laramie Kid again, huh!" he muttered. "All right, Slim! I'll go over and see Halliday, and get this account settled."

It might have been with a quite unconscious movement that he loosened the gun in his holster, but the cowpuncher noticed it and set his lips into a doubtful twist.

"Thought you'd made it up, boss?" he said quietly.

Langdon did not answer. He clambered again into his saddle and galloped hard for the Triangle ranch.

Following the remaking of their friendship, Langdon found it hard to believe that Halliday had spoofered him by telling him that the Laramie Kid had been fired. But it was very obvious that the Kid was still in the neighbourhood, and that he, Langdon, had lost some more cattle as a result.

There was something wrong somewhere. It was just as well he and Halliday had it out right here and now, and decided what was to be done.

He galloped up to the ranch corral and jumped from his horse with an agility surprising in one of his age. And before he had covered the ground between the corral and the house he was made aware of the fact that Jim Halliday was not alone.

In a few seconds more another fact was apparent. Jim Halliday's visitor was none other than the Laramie Kid. Langdon recognised the voice instantly.

"Get off my range, Laramie Kid, before I set the boys on you—and I guess they would like a chance to rope you!" came in Jim Halliday's heavy tones.

"You'll hand over the contents of that safe, or you won't live to give your boys any such orders," was the Kid's calm reply.

Langdon set his teeth grimly. All thought of enmity and all doubts and ideas disappeared from his mind. All he thought about now was helping his old friend.

He fairly dashed across the remaining space to the house, and had got his foot on the bottom step when there sounded one loud, short explosion.

In a flash Langdon had drawn his gun, and was up the steps to the house door in three anxious strides. The moment he put his hand to the handle of the door there came from within the sound of a heavy, thudding crash that could only mean one thing.

He had the door open in another split second, and darted inside, ready to shoot the instant he saw the Laramie Kid.

But he only saw a big riding-boot disappearing through the open window. Down on the floor lay Jim Halliday, whilst in the corner of the room an open safe told its own tale.

Langdon fairly leapt for the window, peered out, spotted a running form, and took steady aim.

The instant he pressed the trigger of his gun he knew he had missed. The shadowy form was now between trees, and only gave him a fraction of a second's view, too little to give him any chance of registering a hit.

His gun was still in his hand as he turned, white-faced with horror, to see what chance there was of saving Jim Halliday. His hands were trembling as they reached out for the fallen man's heart. He was too late—once more. Jim Halliday had been shot with the dreadful skill for which the Laramie Kid was notorious.

"Jim—old Jim Halliday—we'll get that guy now, sure as my name is Lafe Langdon!" he muttered thickly. "Poor old Jim! I—"

He broke off as the door opened and three of Jim Halliday's men came in.

"What's the matter, boss? We heard a shot—Lafe Langdon!"

The 'puncher broke off with a gasp of surprise and wonder.

"It was the Laramie Kid. I came in and fired a shot at him, but I missed," explained Langdon sorrowfully. "He's done for, boys."

"Sure, he's done for!" growled the 'puncher, and, with a flashing sweep of his hand, he had snatched away Langdon's gun. A moment sufficed to show that one shot had been fired. "And I reckon we ain't got far to look for the man who shot him, Lafe Langdon!"

"What! Me? Shoot Jim Halliday? Why, he and I are the oldest friends out West!" gulped Langdon. "I tell you, boys, I saw the Laramie Kid. I heard him demanding money! I heard a shot—"

"Guess we only heard one shot, and that shot came from this gun!" cut in the 'puncher grimly. "You'd better save your explanation for the sheriff, Lafe Langdon!"

"Sheriff?" panted Langdon, and stared about him in the manner of a man dazed. For seconds there could be heard the gulping of his breath, and he could only see the accusing, bitter eyes of Jim Halliday's men. Then his voice rose wildly in protestation. "It's darned silly to say I shot him—I tell you we were old chums! I—"

"Oh, cut it out," snapped the 'puncher. "Let's take him to the sheriff, boys. I've been expecting that 'his would happen!"

Lafe Langdon gave it up at that. It was useless to plead or argue with the cowpunchers. It would be better, easier and quite different when he saw the sheriff.

But it was not. The sheriff accepted the custody of Lafe Langdon with a grimness that clearly showed his view of the matter. He listened quietly to the story of how the cowpunchers had heard the one shot, and of Lafe Langdon's story of the two shots and the Laramie Kid's escape.

"We'll have to leave it to the jury, Lafe Langdon," was his verdict in the matter. "Looks mighty like as if the boys is right. All right, boys—I'll take him in."

Lafe Langdon did not protest further. The evidence was overwhelming against him.

The veteran who had been so agile but a few minutes before rode beside the sheriff towards the county gaol looking every one of his years and a good many more—aged, bent, white, dazed by the tragedy that had overtaken Jim Halliday and himself.

And, miles across the prairie, a man rode with the desperation of a madman, putting more and more miles between himself and the rancher he had left dead upon the floor.

It was the Laramie Kid, quite unaware of the fact that a man had been arrested for the crime, and that there would be little chance of a hue and cry for him in the face of the terrifically strong evidence against Lafe Langdon.

A Desperate Chance!

LETTER day at the ranch over which Tom Langdon ruled as foreman was always an exciting occasion. In addition to the letters which meant so much to the more or less exiled cowpunchers, the mail brought in the newspapers that kept them in late but constant touch with the world represented by cities and industrial towns.

Banty was a cheery postman. He gave letters to those for whom there were any, and to those for whom there was not a letter he had a cheery, kindly word that, after all, there was another mail to come in one day.

The disappointed 'punchers settled down again to wait for that day, softening their disappointment by playing appropriate music upon their instruments and singing at the top of their lusty voices.

But the singing stopped immediately when Banty held up his hand and nodded towards the bed upon which sat Tom Langdon.

Tom held an open letter in his hand, but his staring eyes were not looking at it. They conveyed the impression that they were looking right through the letter to the floor beneath.

"Not bad news, Tom?" asked Banty sympathetically.

"Fraid it is," said Tom, and forced a smile to his lips. "Fact is, I'm hitting the trail for home right here and now."

"Bad as that?"

"Bad as it can possibly be," muttered Tom, and read the letter again. "My old father has been taken in for shootin' a guy, but he says he can't prove he did not. I'm gonna see what it's all about."

"Sounds mighty bad, Tom," murmured Banty, and added thoughtfully: "Reckon we can't let you hit that trail alone, I guess I'm going with you."

"Good for you, Banty!" chorused the others. "Come on, boys! Let's get 'em packed. Sooner they're off, sooner they're back!"

Tom laughed then—it was good to feel that the boys were with him. Indeed, so anxious were they to help him he hardly knew what was packed. They threw everything they could find into saddle-bags, and kept up a running banter that was designed to keep Tom's drooping spirits into something like normal shape.

Within an hour of the mail's arrival Banty led the way on to the trail—but it was Tom who stopped to show that the grimness of their journey was already upon him. He held up his hand to still the tongues of the jolly 'punchers.

"Boys, I sure don't know what may be in this; but we may want some help," said Tom. "If we do, stand by to answer the call instanter."

"Make it soon, Tom—and good luck!"

Tom nodded, waved his hand, and in a moment more he was hitting the trail for home, with the eager, grim Banty riding hard at his side.

It took them a couple of days to get to Circle B, and about as many minutes to find their way to the sheriff's gaol.

Here Tom found his father, a forlorn figure weighed down by the terrible crime with which he had been charged. Their meeting was one which made even the hardened gaoler turn his head for a few moments.

"Boy, I didn't shoot Jim Halliday," said Lafe Langdon, very earnestly. "We had been bad friends, but we had made it up. I don't know how they can think I did it."

But his explanation as to the manner in which he was found gave Tom all the good reasons why the suspicion should have been fastened so closely upon him, and to Tom it was now really a matter of how they were to get the old fellow free.

"Tell me—who is this Laramie Kid you mentioned?" he asked suddenly.

"His name is not known," was the reply. "He's a gunman of the worst type, Tom. If only he could be caught and made to confess I'm mighty sure I shouldn't be here very long. But —"

He shook his head sadly.

"Well, what about that?" demanded Tom warmly. "Does that waggle mean that he can't be caught?"

"Sure. No one ever got where he is and came back alive," said Lafe Langdon grimly. "West of Cheyenne, Tom, lies a small town called Ghost City. That's where the Laramie Kid hangs out if rumour is right for once."

Tom's eyes glinted.

"So you reckon that if I get in Ghost City I'll find the Laramie Kid?" he said, between his teeth.

"I reckon so; but you'll never make it, my boy," replied Lafe Langdon.

"No man ever went in alive and came out alive—except, of course, the gang that runs the place."

Tom rose to his feet and pulled his belt in just one more hole.

"Well, here's one who is going to get the Laramie Kid," he said, with grim determination. "If he's in Ghost City I'll find him just the same."

"You'll never make it, Tom. He's quick on the draw, and shoots straight. He's never been known to want two shots for anything he wanted to hit!" warned Lafe Langdon. "No, better give it up. I'll take what's coming to me."

"Sure, so will I," said Tom coolly. "So-long, father—and keep your head up."

A moment later, to avoid any further pleading from his father, he had slipped out of the cell and was outside the sheriff's gaol, where Banty awaited him.

"It's us for Ghost City, Banty," said Tom, as he took his horse and mounted. "That's west of Cheyenne, and by all accounts it's a place where a feller goes in as a man and stops as a ghost. Well, I fancy myself as a ghost, Banty."

"Not so much me," growled Banty. "But what you says goes, Tom. How's the old feller takin' the bad stuff?"

"Plenty tough," grunted Tom. "Say, how do you reckon I'm going into Ghost City?"

"How are we going in?" suggested Banty naively, and shook his head. "I'll find it easier running cows in, Tom.

It certainly was a poser, and much of the time spent in riding to the Ghost City was spent in thoughtful silence. The city, being west of Cheyenne, was nearer Tom's old ranch than Circle B, as they very soon discovered—a fact which was very encouraging, for it meant that such help as might be wanted would be theirs the quicker when it was called for.

Another fact impressed upon them was that they were taking a pretty desperate chance. No man had ever gone into Ghost City and come out alive unless he were a member of the gang that ran the place, old man Langdon had said.

All the same, that statement gave Tom an idea—an idea which was chewed over and over when they were at last within a mile or so of Ghost City, and finally left them with their plans cut and dried. It only remained for them to be carried out successfully—a different proposition to having the mere idea.

Meeting the Gang.

SHOTS ringing out over the plains brought two men who were on top of the rocky entrance to Ghost City full up to scratch. It also brought to light a couple of rifles which they kept handy at the side of the rock.

Down on the plain a horseman was galloping madly for the city, and he was firing back at another horseman who was riding furiously along the same trail.

The guards watched them anxiously. At the distance it was impossible to see which was friend or enemy—whether it was one of their men who was chased or chaser. They kept their rifles ready to use upon which ever was necessary when the disclosure was made.

But the rider in front settled one question for them, for with a sudden fusillade of shots he dropped the pursuer out of the saddle.

"He's got him," said one of the guards drily, and shrugged his shoulders. "Who's the stranger?"

"Don't know, but I reckon we soon shall, for he's riding pretty straight this way. Get down, Pete," said the other.

They slid off the lofty rock through the bushes to the trail, and as the narrow entrance to the city forced Tom Langdon to draw his horse to a walk, he suddenly found himself staring down at two useful-looking rifles.

"Who are you, and what do you want?" demanded he who had been addressed as Pete.

"Just a stranger, I guess, who beat Old Man Law on the draw," said Tom calmly, and laughed as he looked back along the trail.

"Well, I guess you'll just wait here a bit, mister, until one of the boys comes along," said the guard. "Then I reckons you'll be seeing Kurt Raymer."

Tom nodded, although that name conveyed absolutely nothing to him. He judged it to be the name of the gang leader, seeing that it was a guard with a rifle who mentioned it.

It was at that time that three other incidents of some considerable importance were taking place. In the first instance, the man who had been dropped from his saddle was rolling towards the undergrowth in quite unorthodox fashion for a dead man. Once under cover of the bushes, he stared disgustedly down at his gun.

"That was a plucky good idea of Tom's, but sure as my name's Banty blank cartridges do dirt up a guy's gun," he growled, and he took a piece of rag from his pocket and set about making that very useful gun something else than a mass of sooted steel.

Secondly, in the city itself a not unhandsome man was listening to the story blurted out by one of his men.

"Bess has slipped down the trail, wearing men's clothes, boss," he heard.

"Right. We'll go and get her. She was only asking me this morning to be allowed to go," said Raymer, and laughed curly. "Fancy letting a woman go out here to spill the beans to all the sheriffs in the west! I'd say so—and how! Let's be going!"

And the remaining incident was the one which brought Tom Langdon face to face with the first woman he had seen since he had left Circle B.

Waiting, with the watchful guards still keeping a grip on their rifles, Tom found it possible to make a keen and careful survey of the trail out of the city and the immediate country surrounding.

To his left was a dropping trail to the valley of Cheyenne and to his right was a level plain, thickly spiked with bushes and trees. Ahead of him was the trail along which he had come, and behind him was the narrow entrance to Ghost City—the object of his visit.

But it was to the wooded and bushed plain that his attention was drawn first, for he suddenly heard the deep voice of a man and the higher pitch of a girl's.

"Let go that rein, or I'll lay about you with this strap!"

The girl's voice came out clearly, but not more so than the man's reply.

"You'll get a sock in the jaw if you start any monkey tricks," he said brutally. "You're going back to Raymer!"

That was all Tom waited to hear. A second later he spurred his horse into a hard gallop, reached the scene of the hold-up in a matter of ten more seconds, and threw himself off his saddle and at the man who held the girl's horse so quickly that the guards could do nothing more than look on.

The girl, the moment her horse was freed, should have made good her efforts to escape. But she was fascinated by the ferocity of the fight which ensued between the two men, and that proved her undoing.

Tom was a hefty fellow of something like six foot one in his socks, and what his opponent lacked in height he had in girth and weight. The result was a rough and tumble, no-rounds fight that would have done justice to a couple of bear cats.

Tom took two thwacks straight under his jaw in the first second, and went down to the dusty ground with a thud that jarred every bone in his body. But he was up and back for more so quickly that his rival, panting under Tom's first surprising onslaught, found his own jaw unprotected, and, crash! The meeting of fist and jaw made Bess shudder.

In a flash Tom was hurling himself down at his man, and here a struggle for mastery went on for fully a minute before Tom, in order to escape a stranglehold, had to kick out with his right leg to beat back his man.

It was then that the half-sickened girl decided she would go—and found it too late. One of the guards had run forward and caught up her reins.

She tried to shriek, but the ferocity of the stranger choked every utterance. He had his man on the knee now, two hands round his throat, and behind them, looking on with gleaming eyes, were Kurt Raymer and Nevada.

A sudden heave, and Tom's knees sagged, and up came a right flush into the pit of his stomach. He was down then, and like a flash his opponent had drawn a gun.

But Kurt Raymer put in his spoke, with a quick, snappy command.

"Put up that gun!" he rapped out.

Tom Langdon suddenly found himself staring down at two useful looking rifles.

"I wanta talk with the stranger. Take the girl back, boys."

Bess, tears in her eyes, suffered herself to be led away without more than a fleeting glance at the man who had tried so hard to help her escape. But the utter helplessness, the hopelessness of the business simply smothered her.

"What are you doin' around here, mister?" demanded Raymer, his glinting eyes staring unblinkingly at Tom.

Tom shrugged his shoulders.

"I just don't know, mister," he said, and added truculently: "I beat Old Man Law to the draw down the trail, and then I saw your whiskered guard. Thought they'd got the drop on me at first, but they saw me shoot up Old Man Law, and that seemed to satisfy them. Said I should have to meet up with Raymer."

"I'm Raymer," said the other quietly, and looked keenly at the neat stranger for a full half-minute before he went on: "Guess you are a dandy fighter, stranger—and I can always do with fighters in my line of business. You'd better come up and have a word with me."

"Sure!" said Tom, and went slowly back to where his own gun had dropped from its holster during the fight and picked it up. From there he went to his horse, mounted it, and waited further orders with a nonchalance and calmness that made Raymer a lot less suspicious and a lot more satisfied.

"Let's be going, then," said Raymer, and he led the way back to the rock over which the guards were once more pacing, through the archlike entrance to the city, and along the narrow trail to the wider streets of the town.

To attack that town would be madness was Tom's instant conclusion. Raymer and his gang could hold up an army for just so long as food and water held out. The narrow entrance, the towering mountains, and the narrow valley which all comers would have to travel were more use to Raymer than a barbed wire entanglement a hundred yards deep would have been.

Raymer did not speak during the ride, which occupied more time on account of the slowness of the walking horses than by the distance that had been covered.

Nevada met them when they dismounted and went into what Tom was to discover was the gang's headquarters—Raymer's own office.

"Say, we're a pretty tough lot up here, stranger," said Raymer, after a brief pause. "We share and share alike—everything. Loot, cattle and anything else that any of us picks up—and we share any trouble. Get me?"

"Sure, I get you!" said Tom lazily. "I'm in on this racket if you'll have me, Raymer."

"Right, we'll try you out," said Raymer. "Get off and find a billet. Make yourself acquainted with the boys. Any man who walks free around this district, stranger, carries my authority, and there won't be any trouble right inside Ghost City unless you start it. I might say I end all troubles."

The careless threat made Tom smile gently, but he made no comment. He went out.

"Say, Raymer, we don't know much about that guy," said Nevada doubtfully.

"No, but I reckon to sum up a man plenty," grunted Raymer. "All the same, keep an eye on him for a bit until he's sort o' proved himself out, Nevada."

September 5th, 1931.

Nevada touched his gun and walked out of the wooden house with all the careless stride of a man who has nothing to do and no more to think about.

But there was no sign of the stranger.

Raiding the Bullion Wagon!

THERE was invariably an air of oppression in Ghost City. Raymer ruled the place with his guns, and when they were not handy there were plenty to be found in possession of his men.

The womenfolk consisted of the men's wives and a few luckless people who had strayed into the city and had never been allowed to leave. Their belongings became the property of Raymer and his gang, and there was nothing any of them could call their own.

Bess lived with a gentle little woman whom everybody knew as Rose. To mark a perfect truth, Rose was the one woman in the city whom Raymer wished he could release, for she was the one who treated him with the utmost contempt.

Rose was returning with a pail of water at the moment Tom Langdon had spotted Bess through the window of their house, and she alone saw him clamber in through the window. But she saw Nevada coming her way, and waited expectantly for his questioning.

"Seen anything of a strange guy round here, Rose?" asked Nevada truculently.

"Sure, over by the horse corral," said Rose, in just the same blunt fashion.

Nevada nodded and strolled off, with his hands idly around the butts of his guns.

In the meantime, Tom had found that Bess had changed into clothes designed for her sex, and for the first time he had the opportunity of seeing how pretty she was. She had an oval face, hair like ripening corn, and a set of perfect pearly white teeth. Only her eyes—sad, wistful, almost resentful—spoiled what would have been a wonderful picture.

"I am glad to have the chance of thanking you, stranger," she said the moment Tom entered. "But—it was no good."

"Guess you're a prisoner," said Tom, as a statement of fact rather than as a question. "But I did not come here to be thanked. I—"

"You must be very careful. Raymer doesn't like the men even to speak to me," put in the girl, watching the window anxiously. "Sh'ish! Here's Rose."

"Rose?"

"She lives with me—looks after the house. She's wonderful—she is always trying to help me to escape. But the guards always see me, and then Raymer comes out after me."

Tom was nodding when the door opened and Rose entered. She looked sharply at him for half a minute before she spoke.

"You'd better look out, mister," she said, in her blunt way. "Raymer's men are watching you."

Tom nodded again with an indifference that made both Bess and Rose look keenly at him.

"I am here for a purpose," he said calmly. "I'm not going until I have done what I want to do. I want to find a fellow called the Laramie Kid. Know him?"

Bess snook her head instantly, and Rose allowed the question to pass without answering. The tragedy that was so plainly written on Bess' pretty face drove away any other thought from Tom at that moment, and he prepared to go.

"When I get out of here with this Laramie Kid guy I guess I'll take you with me," he said. "This sure isn't the place for two good women. I'll see you later."

"You won't see us again if you don't take care, young man," was Rose's blunt reminder. "Kurt Raymer is a tough guy, and there's plenty of room around here for burying strangers who have business in which there is no profit for Raymer!"

"Rose!" pleaded Bess.

"That's my way of warning him," growled Rose. "Clear off, young man, whilst the going is good."

Tom, with a faint smile, opened the window, looked carefully to right and to left, and slipped out. In a moment more he was lounging idly round the front of the house into the street, his hands deep in his pockets, a straw being chewed lazily at the corner of his mouth.

It was Raymer himself who spoke to him first, and that was not until Tom had obeyed a curt nod of the gang leader's head signalling him to enter the office.

There were a number of men there, all obviously awaiting Raymer's orders. And they had not to wait long.

"The bullion wagon is going by in the morning, boys," began Raymer, and even then there was a veiled threat in his tone that was unpleasant to listen to. "We gonna pick up that bullion. If the driver and the guards put up any resistance just remember we don't want any prisoners. Get that, stranger?"

"Sure," said Tom. "Mighty nuisance—prisoners."

"You're going along with us, stranger, as a sort of trial," went on Raymer. "If you come through this raid okay, guess we'll count you in on the share-out. I shall be watching you!"

"Okay with me," said Tom breezily.

"What time do we start?"

"You'll know when to start," growled Raymer.

That was all that Raymer had to say just then, but it was quite enough to set Tom Langdon thinking. He would have to take part in that raid on the bullion wagon, or betray himself right away as not being the fugitive from the law that he proclaimed himself to be.

The risk that he would run of getting shot by the driver or the wagon guards did not trouble him one iota. It was the possibility of the driver and the guards being shot that worried him.

Everything would apparently be all right for them if they did not offer the gang any resistance. But that "no prisoners" order was grimly impressed upon Tom's mind. It meant only one thing—death.

Tom waited until night fell, and friendly darkness came to assist him in moving without being seen. He knew that the rocky entrance to Ghost City would be guarded just as well at night as by day, and there was absolutely no chance whatever of getting through the valley that way.

He spent a couple of hours looking around. At the end of that time he discovered the real truth of the matter—that Kurt Raymer was as safe in Ghost City as he would have been in a fortress. There was absolutely no possibility of attack from any quarter other than by the valley, and it would only need half a dozen gunmen to keep that rocky entrance clear of any live enemy.

The truth was a grim reminder of the difficulties of his task. Outside there was Banty, who could get the boys from the ranch just when they were wanted. But what could they do? There was not the remotest chance of their coming into Ghost City—they would be blown off the face of the earth long before they could reach the rocky entrance.

Whatever had to be done would have to be done inside the Ghost City, and just what was possible there Tom Langdon had not the faintest notion. It all seemed so utterly hopeless, and Tom remembered that expression in Bess' eyes. It was justified.

But Tom would not give up hope. There was Bess to think about, and his promise to take her away when he went. That promise was going to be kept, so long as Tom Langdon had life to work.

He went to bed that night thinking only of Bess and the fact that he was just as much a prisoner as was she. He would never get away now, unless the whole gang went with him. And one against Raymer's bunch of desperadoes were pretty tough odds against success.

The morning came at last, and within a couple of hours of sunrise Raymer summoned the gang and headed the way out to the plain.

No one spoke during the short ride to the main trail, and it was only when they had pulled up that Raymer gave out the plan of campaign.

He split the gang up into groups, and sent them to vantage points along the trail, so that when the bullock wagon came to a given spot, Raymer's men would be able to ride on to the trail and entirely surround both wagon and escort.

"Keep well down under cover of the bushes along the trail, boys," said Raymer. "I'll be out first, right at the driver's head, and see that the escort is knowing you're all round, boys. Get out—and watch for me! Stranger, guess you can take that bush there to my right."

"Okay," said Tom, and rode off to the bush Raymer indicated.

Here he dismounted and tied up his horse. But he did not slip down behind the bush as Raymer expected that he would. He ran cautiously into the thicker undergrowth, waited a few seconds to make sure he was neither seen nor heard, and then placed his fingers to his lips and gave vent to a low whistle.

"I'm here, Tom!" came in an almost instantaneous whisper from just ahead, and the bushes parted to reveal Banty.

"Banty, they're holding up a bullock wagon," said Tom quickly. "When it comes along, Raymer is going to ride out as a signal. Soon as you see him, take a shot at somebody's hat and scare 'em!

Then slip back and warn the boys. Tell 'em to come right handy to Ghost City, and be ready for a shoot up!"

"Right. What's the signal to be?" asked Banty eagerly.

"Tell 'em not to take notice of firing—there's going to be plenty of that soon, I guess, and there may be no need for the boys to come in at all," whispered Tom, and started suddenly. "There's the wagon rumblin' along the trail, Banty. Listen. I'll send my horse out on the valley. He'll pick up the boys, and if they turn him he'll come right back to me. I must get off!"

He went without another word, back to the bush where he had left his horse, and drew his gun.

His heart beat fast as he saw the wagon coming along the trail, with its unsuspecting escort idly rising and falling in their saddles to the motion of their horses. For the first time in his life he knew what it was to take part in a hold-up.

It would have been a thrilling sensation were it not for the fact that he had fears for the lives of the wagon-driver and his escort. Raymer was ruthless, relentless—there would be no prisoners.

Everything depended upon what happened when Banty took his pot-shot.

The wagon passed Tom, and rolled on into the very centre of the ambush so innocently that Tom had to put up a terrific fight not to shout out a warning. The driver was half dozing in his seat, and the escort were singing a range chorus with all the lightheartedness that was one of the glories of Western life.

Yet they were within inches of death!

Suddenly a horse's hoof clattered on the trail—Raymer was out.

"Get 'em up—you're surrounded!" he rapped out.

Instantly, from all around, came riders, guns in their hands which glinted in the sunlight. And only a fraction of a second behind Raymer's signal came the sound of a gun shot, and a bullet shrieked through his hat.

Tom grinned, and slipped a few yards towards the gang leader.

The escort and the driver, wakened into desperate life, took advantage of the immediate confusion caused by Banty's shot, whipped up the horses, and made a dash for their lives.

It was then that Tom spotted Nevada, and he began a noiseless crawl towards Raymer's chief gangster. Nevada had not ridden out, and was not therefore looking for signs of the enemy who had started the shooting.

He was, in fact, the only gangster who made the slightest attempt to stop the runaway wagon. He got his gun levelled on to the leading horse.

But his finger never pulled the trigger that day. Tom twirled his own gun and brought down the butt with a crash on the side of Nevada's head. The gangster went down into a pit of blackness without knowing what had hit him.

Tom had a moment then to look around. Raymer and his men were riding pell-mell for cover of the bushes, shooting right and left in the bare hope of getting at least a few of the men they believed surrounded them.

And the deep rumble of the wagon wheels grew less and less as the whipped-up horses drew it at amazing pace away from Ghost City.

Once the trail was empty there was still no sign of Raymer's enemy. He rode out at last, boldly determined to draw the enemy's fire, but no shot came his way.

"All right—come out, boys!" he shouted, and it was curious how he managed to get a snarl into such a loud pitch.

The men came out of their hiding-places, guns still in their hands, their eyes blazing with anger and wonder. Nevada fairly staggered out, rubbing a huge bump on his head as though he thought he could remove the pain of it with his fingers.

"What happened, boys?" demanded Raymer fiercely.

"I don't know, boss, but somebody shot my gun out of my hand just as I had the draw on the driver," growled a bearded gangster.

"What's the matter with you, Nevada?" was Raymer's next fierce question.

"I gotta whack on my head with a gun-butt, I guess!" snarled Nevada. "I'd sure like a talk with the guy who did it!"

"Where's the stranger?" fumed Raymer. "If that guy—"

He broke off. Tom Langdon was staggering down the trail from the bush where he had been placed, his hat in his hand, and his other hand engaged in rubbing his head.

In order to avoid a stranglehold, Tom kicked out with his right leg to beat back his man.

"What's the big idea, boss?" he asked truculently. "I got a crash on my head with a gun-butt, and I don't like it! Did that bullion driver have some pals out there, or what?"

Raymer did not answer. He just stared hard at Tom for a moment, and then gazed up the trail along which the bullion wagon had disappeared.

"I'd like to have a chat with the guy who bashed me!" said Nevada viciously, and shot a vengeful, suspicious glance at Tom that made that worthy instantly aware of the fact that here was an enemy who might prove more troublesome than Raymer himself.

"Well, it's no good talking here," snapped Raymer. "Get your horses, boys, and let's be going."

And the party he led back to Ghost City was surely the most silent and morose gang of bandits the West had ever known. Only one of them could find it in him to raise a faint smile.

That was Tom Langdon. The first blow against Raymer had been struck, and Tom had won. It promised well for the future, a future into which it was just as well for Tom that he could not see.

The Court Sits.

MINUTES before Kurt Raymer went into his headquarters the whole of Ghost City knew that the raid had failed dismally. The surly attitude of the whole bunch fairly shrieked the news.

Bess and Rose, watching from their doorway, knew it instantly, and a worried frown corrugated Bess' brows.

"If there's been a failure, they might blame the stranger," she said uneasily.

"They might. What of it?" demanded Rose.

Bess did not answer in words. She just flushed a glorious red, and dropped her eyes.

For a moment Rose stared. Then she understood, and for once there was just a trickle of a smile at the corners of her lips.

"If it's like that, I'll have a word with the stranger," she said in tones of the most reluctant resignation. "They won't get busy until they have had a drink to drown their sorrows, and some of them look as though they'll want the whole saloon to do that."

Bess smiled. Rose was such a wonderful good sort, in spite of her blunt way of speaking.

They were still at the doorway when Tom Langdon strolled by, to give them a cool, smiling glance that spoke of the world's confidence.

"Young man, Kurt Raymer is the Laramie Kid, so look out!" said Rose, in an undertone and scarcely moving her lips.

Bess started, but even she did not miss the sudden tightening of Tom's fist and the sudden glint in his eyes. He passed on as lazily as he had approached, and did not even turn his head to see if it were possible to thank Rose for her help.

But his mind was busy. It was flaming with resolution. Plans had to be altered now. Raymer was the Laramie Kid, the man who alone could save old Lafe Langdon from the grim penalty the law would demand for the murder of Jim Halliday.

A dozen plans were formed and cast aside in the next hour or two, and Tom began to get really anxious.

September 5th, 1931.

A Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

Ghost City was so impregnable. There appeared absolutely no way of getting in the boys or of himself getting out alone, without taking into consideration how much less his chances were of persuading Raymer to leave with him at the end of a gun.

His concentration was interrupted by Nevada, who came up to him with a glint in his eye that spelt trouble.

"Raymer wants you at headquarters," he growled. "Tell anybody else you meet up with. And look lively, stranger. Raymer doesn't like being kept waiting."

Tom nodded calmly and moved off at once. He saw half a dozen others moving in the same direction and more were coming in from the other side of the town.

Bess and Rose, coming to the door to see the cause of the rattle of so many boots, looked on with bated breath.

"Kurt Raymer is holding a court," said Rose tonelessly. "That means death for someone."

"You—you think it—" breathed Bess.

"That young man looks as though he can take care of himself," muttered Rose. "Slip down to the corral, Bess, and have some horses ready. Likely as not there will be a running fight."

Bess slipped off just as the last of the gang went in the wooden headquarters and closed the door.

To say that there was a tense atmosphere in that room was to put it too mildly.

A long table had been set straight across the room, and Raymer's men as they came took their seats at the table without so much as a single word. Raymer himself stood at the head of the table, and Tom found himself being edged to the seat at the foot.

The door was closed, and there was utter and complete silence in the room for a full minute while Raymer surveyed them with his beady, cunning eyes.

"I'll have to ask you for your gun, stranger!" he said at last, and his words were so sudden that they came like pistol shots through the silence.

Tom drew his gun and pushed it on to the table. In a moment half a dozen hands had pushed it until it was right up in front of Raymer.

"There's a spy in our camp," resumed Raymer, and his tone was icy, menacing, bitter. "I'm listening for a name, boys."

No one answered. None turned a head save Nevada, who gave Tom Langdon one piercing glance. Tom returned the glance coldly, and then used his eyes for a much more useful purpose. He was measuring the distance his hand would have to cover to get at the gun which was sticking out from the holster of the gangster next to him.

"Well, if there is no talking, I've a way of making someone talk!" said Raymer in the same tones. "Get that prisoner in, Slim."

Tom nearly started then. The prisoner could only mean Banty.

Not a word was spoken whilst Slim went out, but Tom's mind was in a turmoil. If the prisoner was indeed Banty, one glance of recognition as he was brought in would spill all the beans.

He waited, outwardly calm, but seething inwardly.

The door opened. Banty came in, with two guns sticking at his back. But he was cool and collected as if he were drawing his pay-roll way back on the ranch.

(Continued on page 25.)

A tale of outlaws of the sea—priceless pearls—a cannibal island—and of a girl who fought for her hero.

The SEA GOD

Starring
RICHARD ARLEN
 and EVA HRAY.

A Crazy Gamble.

A LONG, brilliant beach of smooth white sand; a coral reef, encircling the whole coast; a fringe of low land beyond the beach, covered with orange, banana, bread-fruit, and coconut trees; patches of cultivated ground here and there, where pineapples and yams were grown; little winding paths, delightfully cool from the shade of the tropical vegetation, leading to houses scattered amongst the trees. Such was Teepaa, a lovely island in the great Pacific Ocean.

Phillip Barker, nicknamed "Pink" by his friends, guided his schooner, the General Grant, through the only opening in the reef to the anchorage within the lagoon. Pink was a tall, handsome young fellow, full of health and vigour. He had made a successful voyage, and when he landed with "Square Deal" McCarthy, his mate, he was in a reckless mood.

"Come to the saloon, Square," he cried. "All the drinks are on me to-night."

"Go slow on the drinks," warned the mate, a thick-set, good-natured sailor, with a reputation for honesty which had earned him his nickname. "Remember the last time!"

"Cut it out, boy!" retorted Pink as they entered the saloon. "I don't wanna remember the last time."

He ordered drinks all round, and was soon recounting the story of his voyage to the company. Presently his chief rival, a shifty-looking trader named Schultz, notorious as unscrupulous dealing, came up to the table and sat down.

"Have a drink, Schultz," cried Pink jovially. "It's on me!"

"Had a good voyage?" asked Schultz as he drank.

"Sure! Best I've ever made," replied Pink. "Look at that, boy!"

He fetched out a handful of notes and slapped them down on the table recklessly.

"If you're as flush as all that," said Schultz, his eyes narrowing, "what d'you say to a game? I can't cover that lot, but I'll go as near as I can."

He, too, planked down a wad of notes, and soon the two traders were engaged at dice. Pink drank heavily, and grew more and more excited, while his rival kept dangerously cool. Square Deal looked on helplessly, knowing that it would be useless to interfere, though his young captain lost steadily from the start.

"Hard luck!" said Schultz presently as he drew Pink's last notes across the table.

"You young fool!" cried McCarthy viciously. "Come on out of this!"

"I ain't finished yet," exclaimed Pink wildly, taking a pearl necklace from his pocket. "I'll stake this against the lot. It's worth more, anyway. Here goes!"

He threw a six and a five, and laughed jubilantly as the dice fell. Schultz eyed him coolly, and shook up the dice with great deliberation.

"Double six," he remarked calmly. "That's lucky! I wanted to give someone a present. Girl you know, I believe," he went on, taking the necklace. "Daisy!"

"You'll give that necklace to Daisy?" howled Pink, staggering to his feet and glaring angrily at his rival. "You won't dare!"

"Sure I will," grinned Schultz. "What's it to you if I do? She's through with you since that drinking bout of yours last time."

"Come out of it, I tell you!" cried McCarthy, gripping his captain by the arm.

"You leave me alone!" shouted Pink angrily. "I ain't done with this skunk yet. He's got my cash, he's got my girl, but he ain't got my boat. I'll race my boat against yours, Schultz—winner to take both."

For a moment Schultz hesitated, but all the men in the saloon were looking questioningly at him, and he finally accepted the challenge, the race to take place that afternoon.

Some hours later the whole population of the island crowded down to the beach to watch the start. The race was to be over a course of twenty miles, and Pink's luck seemed to have turned at last. The General Grant got better away, and sailed out beyond the reef well ahead.

"My luck's in this time," exulted Pink as he watched the President, his rival's schooner. "We've just got a slant of wind, and he's missed it."

The breeze was very light and fitful, and for a while both boats made slow progress, but the General Grant gradually increased her lead. When half the course was covered she was a good two miles ahead.

"Canoe on the starboard bow!" cried the helmsman suddenly.

"Never mind, Abe," said Pink. "Keep her on the course."

"There's a man in it," exclaimed Square Deal presently. "He ain't dead. I saw him move, but he's all out, I reckon. You going to pick him up?"

"No," said the young captain shortly. "We'll lose if I do."

They went on for a few minutes more, while Pink watched the canoe and his rival alternately through his glass.

"Might just do it," he muttered at length, after a last long look at the President.

Another minute went by, and then the captain's voice rang out:

"Keep her away for that canoe, Abe!"

"Aye, aye, sir!" replied the helmsman, altering course.

In twenty minutes the General Grant came up with the canoe, and its occupant, a human derelict, thin, haggard, and starving, was hastily hauled aboard.

This act of humanity cost Pink the race, for the President got home first by a few minutes. As the General Grant drew in to the harbour the rescued man, now somewhat recovered, staggered up to Pink, who had not yet spoken to him.

"Say, boss, must thank you for saving my life," he said feebly. "My name's Nick. 'Pearly' Nick they call me."

"You lost me the race!" snarled Pink. "Get out of my sight!"

"But, boss, wait a minute!" cried Nick. "I've got something for you."

The young captain turned on his heel, shouted for McCarthy, and went off.

"You've done a good thing to-day," remarked Square Deal. "I wouldn't worry!"

"Of course you wouldn't—you're too fat!" snorted Pink. "I've lost my money, my girl, and now my boat. All my own darned fault, too. And you tell me not to worry! I've sure got something to worry about, ain't I?"

"I reckon not," said McCarthy slowly. "It'll all come out okay in the end."

I Pearly Nick's Gratitude.

PINK and his mate walked up to see Schultz, and behind them, some way off, shambled the unkempt figure of Pearly Nick. Schultz was in his office when his rival came in.

"You'll have to pay my crew," said Pink. "I ain't got a dollar left."

"I'll do that," replied Schultz, "and I'll put the boat up for auction to-morrow morning."

Pink did not hear the last words. He was staring across the office at a pretty, dark girl who sat behind a desk in the corner.

"Daisy's my cashier now. Didn't you know? And I'll say she's the goods, too," remarked Schultz.

"Smart girl you are, Daisy," cried Pink scornfully. "You've picked a man with real estate."

Daisy flushed and turned away, while Pink went on talking to Schultz.

"Nice little thing, and I regret losing her. Only thing you've won from me that I do regret. Well, I'll send my crew up. See to that, McCarthy."

He went out of the office without looking again at Daisy, and Pearly at once waylaid him.

"Say, boss," he began, "you just listen—"

Pink angrily brushed him aside, and set off quickly for his own house, but he had hardly arrived there before rapid footsteps sounded behind him.

"I'm sorry you've been so unlucky," said Daisy's voice as he turned.

"You don't need to be," was the careless reply. "It's my own fault."

"Don't speak in that horrid way!" cried the girl. "We needn't hate each other after being such friends."

"We were getting bored—or you were tired of my wicked ways," sneered Pink. "So why try to drag it on?"

"I won't!" exclaimed Daisy fiercely. "I hate you now!"

She ran off in great anger, and hardly had she gone when Pearly Nick loped up and this time he could not be shaken off.

"Boss, you look!" he cried. "See this! I'm givin' it to you!"

He put a large pearl into Pink's hand. The young sailor glanced at it, and then took Nick into the house.

"Where'd you get this?" he asked suspiciously.

"You think I stole it? You're wrong, boss. I didn't. I can take you where you'll get more."

Nick took some more pearls from his pocket and gave them to Pink just as McCarthy entered. Pink passed the pearls to his mate, who examined them. "I'll say they're the goods," exclaimed McCarthy. "Where did he get 'em?"

"Boss, I've gotta plan," said Nick. "You take the pearls and buy your boat back. Then I'll take you to the Solomon Islands to find more. Take a big crew—natives are cannibals. They—

—they killed my friends, an'—an'—"
Nick's voice grew weaker and weaker. He swayed, and suddenly collapsed in a heap. Pink and McCarthy lifted him on to a bed and gave him a drink. He recovered somewhat after a while, and began feebly to tell of the exact position of the pearl island.

"I must look after him now," said Pink. "He's very sick, sure. Find someone to nurse him, Square, while I sell these pearls."

"Okay, skipper," replied the mate, going out. He returned presently with a native woman who had agreed to take care of Nick, and then Pink went off to the store.

"How much for these?" he asked the Chinese storekeeper.

The man took a glass and examined the pearls carefully.

"One thousand dollars," he said at length.

Pink knew that the pearls were worth at least fifteen hundred dollars, but he could not screw more than twelve hundred out of the Chinaman, and finally he went away with that amount fairly satisfied.

In the morning the General Grant was put up to auction, and to the surprise of the whole company the boat was knocked down to Phillip Barker, who went off at once to prepare for the trip to the Solomon Islands.

"Where did Barker get the cash?" exclaimed the astonished Schultz to his right-hand man, one Rudy. "He told me he hadn't a dollar left."

"Can't say, unless he stole it," said Rudy.

"No, he ain't that sort," replied Schultz thoughtfully.

"Say, he's got that fellow Nick at his house," remarked Bill, another of Schultz's men. "Pearly they call him."

"You've got it, Bill," cried Schultz excitedly. "Nick gave him some pearls, sure. Where's Barker now?"

"Down on the boat," answered Rudy.

"Well, I'm going to see this guy Nick," said Schultz. "I'll maybe get something out of him."

Schultz went off at once to Pink's house. Brushing aside the remonstrances of the nurse, he came to the bed where Nick lay and looked down at the wasted form of the rescued man. Nick opened his eyes, saw someone standing by the bedside and began to babble deliriously, thinking that Pink had returned.

"Boss, I'll tell you. Solomon Islands."

"Where?" asked Schultz eagerly, leaning over the bed.

"Go to Bougainville, then sou'west—small islands," muttered Nick, trying to sit up.

"Bougainville. That's one of the biggest of the Solomons. Well, go on, Nick."

"Stop, Nick!" cried a voice, as Pink came in. "What are you doing here, Schultz? Get out of my house!"

"I'm taking him with me," said Schultz coolly. "I've got an order from the mayor to remove him. He ain't being looked after properly here."

"That's a lie!" cried Pink. "You want to get him to tell you something, that's all."

"Well, an' if I do?" sneered Schultz. "Who'll stop me?"

"Something even you can't fight has stopped you," said Pink slowly, looking at Nick, who had fallen back on the bed and lay still. "Your spying's finished. The poor fellow's dead!"

The Stowaway.

DAISY came back from Pink's house to the office feeling very angry and yet unhappy, for in spite of her fierce words to him she still loved the young sailor in her heart. Hardly had she sat down before Schultz came in.

"Well, Daisy," he said, "where have you been?"

"That's nothing to do with you," replied the girl sharply.

"Soon will be," retorted Schultz angrily. "We're going to be married, and don't you forget it."

"I don't want to be married," cried the girl.

"Now see here, Daisy, I ain't going to be made a monkey of!" snarled Schultz. "And I'll tell you I've decided we're getting married next week."

"I won't marry you!" exclaimed Daisy. "I'll run away first!"

"Don't run away," laughed the trader. "There ain't a place to run to, and you know it."

He went out, and Daisy spent many miserable hours until she happened to overhear Rudy and Bill talking after the auction.

"Pink's ready to sail, I hear," said Rudy. "Wonder where he's going."

"Schultz knows, maybe. I don't," replied Bill. "But Pink's off to-night, sure."

Daisy suddenly saw a way out of the hateful prospect of marriage with Schultz. That evening she slipped down to the quay and managed to steal on board the General Grant, unseen by the crew. Only a loafer on the bank saw her, and he took little notice. It was not his business, he thought.

Presently Pink gave orders to cast off, but even as his men got to the ropes Schultz came on to the quay, followed by several of his gang.

"I know all about that pearl expedition, Barker," he said, "and I've declared myself in."

"That's mighty good of you," retorted Pink, stepping on to the quay and confronting his enemy.

"Sure!" sneered the trader. "We can be friends or enemies—it's up to you."

"Then we'll be enemies!" said Pink shortly.

Schultz did not reply in words. He sent a sharp jab to Pink's chin, a jab that nearly toppled him back into the water. The young captain countered with a right to the jaw, and in another second a fierce battle was raging.

Schultz put up a good fight for a few minutes, but a stiff uppercut took most of the courage out of him. He sprang back, seizing a knife which hung at his belt, while his men sprang forward to assist him.

"Stand back there, you skunks!" roared Square Deal promptly, raising his gun.

The men drew back, and Schultz tried to finish the fight by an attempt to stab his opponent in the chest with his knife. Pink caught his arm just in time, twisted his wrist so that he was forced to drop the weapon, and then with a mighty heave he hurled the rascally trader over the edge of the quay into the sea.

"Cast off there!" yelled Pink, jumping on board.

The ropes were cast off, and a couple of minutes later the General Grant was sailing away. She passed out of the opening in the reef just as Schultz was hauled back to land, furious with wrath and disappointment.

"Why didn't you plug him, Rudy?" he shouted angrily.

"McCarthy got his gun out first," remarked Rudy with great coolness.

"I know where Barker's gone," cried Schultz, "and I'm following him. He ain't getting away with it so easy. Go and get my boat ready, Rudy, and you, too, Bill, and look slippy!"

"Say, Mr. Schultz," said a man, coming up with a grin on his face, "d'you know who's on that boat?"

He pointed to the General Grant, which was now spanking along at a great pace before a favouring breeze, several miles out already.

"Lady you know is on board," the man went on. "Miss Daisy. I saw her slip down to the deck."

"I'll—I'll kill Barker!" howled Schultz, mad with rage.

Daisy was on board the General Grant, sure enough, but it was some time before her presence was discovered. The boat was many miles from Ieepaa when Square Deal happened to open the door of a cabin he thought to be empty.

"Great Jupiter!" he cried as he saw the girl within. "What are you doing here? Hi, Pink, come down, quick!"

The captain came down and glared angrily at Daisy.

"A stowaway, eh?" he said. "What's the meaning of this?"

"I had to get away from Schultz somehow," replied Daisy. "I can pay my fare, and I'll go ashore at the first port."

"It ain't that sort of a boat," said Pink. "We don't take passengers, and we shan't make any port this journey."

"Oh," cried Daisy, in dismay, "I thought—"

"You'll have to do your share of the work, now you're here," interrupted Pink, "and share our risks—and our profits, too, if we make any," he added.

Daisy was forthwith installed as cook, and except for a few days when the ship was blown off her course by heavy storms, she worked very hard. Pink hardly spoke to her, and until the pearl island was at length reached she was very lonely. Only Square Deal had now and then a few words to say, and even he was too busy most of the time to give her much attention.

"That's the island," sang out Pink one morning as land was sighted. "We'll go on shore and prospect a bit. Nick said the natives were cannibals, so we must keep our eyes skinned."

The General Grant was anchored in a little bay. Pink, McCarthy and three or four men got into a small boat, and Daisy insisted on coming, too, in spite of warnings of danger. With their guns ready, they landed on the beach, to find everything seemingly peaceful and quiet.

"Stand by a minute," said Pink. "I'll throw a bomb into that clump of trees."

He hurled a bomb, and then another and another. They exploded among the trees with a roar, and a cloud of earth and stones arose, mingled with smoke. The noise died away, and silence fell again.

"Okay!" said McCarthy. "No one there."

"Look!" screamed Daisy. "There to the right! I saw one of them!"

The men looked in vain. Another bomb was thrown in the direction the girl had pointed out, but nothing more was seen.

"You must have imagined it, Daisy," said Pink at length.

"I didn't. I saw a hideous face, all painted with stripes of colour—one of the cannibals!" cried the girl tremblingly.

A search disclosed no signs of the natives, and the men returned on board convinced that Daisy was wrong, and that the pealing might start at once, without any fear of interruption from the savages.

A New God.

PINK sat in the stern of the General Grant that afternoon almost ready to begin the search for pearls. He had put on his diving dress, except for the helmet, when Daisy came up and sat beside him.

"I want to know, Pink, please," she said timidly, "is it dangerous?"

"Diving? You wouldn't care, anyway!" retorted Pink harshly.

"I do care. I care if anybody's hurt," cried Daisy.

"Do you care for me any more?" asked the young sailor, in a changed tone.

"Of course not!"

"I love you, all the same, and always shall."

"Yes, in the moonlight!" laughed the girl.

"No, all the time, day and night, more than anyone else. You've been working for me all this time till your hands are all rough and spoilt. I'm sorry. Can't we be friends?"

"No," said Daisy, not very decidedly, turning away.

Pink might have said more, but McCarthy came up to put the helmet on, and soon the diver clambered over the side and went down. The water was not very deep, for the ship was not far from the shore, and Pink soon found an oyster-bed. He began to detach the shells and send them up in a basket.

After a while a noise overhead came faintly to his ears, and the supply of air that was being pumped to him suddenly ceased, but after a second went on again spasmodically.

"Something's wrong," muttered Pink, as the air supply failed again. "I'll have to wade out and see."

Something was wrong indeed. The diver had not been below more than ten minutes when a great fleet of canoes came round the point of the bay and made swiftly for the ship. Instantly everything was in confusion. The men rushed hastily for their guns, and Abe, who was turning the wheel operating the air supply, left his task and rushed with them. Daisy took one hasty glance at the canoes, then seized the wheel and resumed the pumping.

The savages came on quickly, despite a rapid fire from the deck of the ship. In two minutes their canoes were alongside, and a host of grotesquely attired natives poured on board. The crew battled desperately, and many of the cannibals went down, but one by one the white men were killed by the spears of the enemy.

All through the noise and confusion of the fight Daisy kept on pumping air to Pink, till Square Deal, who had defused her with desperate valour, fell to the deck beneath the attack of half a dozen natives. Two more seized the girl and carried her screaming to a canoe.

The General Grant was by this time on fire, and with loud yells of triumph the victorious savages pulled away, carrying McCarthy and Daisy with them. The rest of the crew they had slain to a man.

They gazed towards the end of the clearing at some strange object which had suddenly appeared.

As the canoes turned away from the ship, Pink's helmet emerged from the shallow water inshore. He cut the air-hose only just in time, for in another minute he would have been suffocated. Floundering on a few more steps, he turned to see dimly, through the glass of his helmet, that the General Grant was a mass of flame. The native canoes were disappearing round the point, amid the loud beating of war-drums, mingled with yells of triumph.

There was nothing Pink could do. He struggled to the shore, and tried in vain to get the helmet off. Then he walked aimlessly on, stumbling wearily through the woods hour after hour, stunned by the thought that Daisy and all his men were dead.

Yet, though he little knew it, every step that Pink took was bringing him nearer and nearer to Daisy and Square Deal. Their captors had led them to a village built in a clearing in the midst of the woods, and there they were tied securely to adjoining trees, while a crowd of exultant cannibals danced wildly around them.

"Will they kill us?" whispered Daisy presently.

"Well, we ain't dead yet!" replied Square Deal, with affected cheerfulness. "and I reckon I'll try to wriggle loose later on. They're bound to have a feast and get drunk, and then our chance will come."

"But—but perhaps they'll feast on—on us!" shuddered the girl.

Before the mate could reply, the savages around them stopped their wild dance, and gazed towards the end of the clearing at some strange object which had suddenly appeared.

"What's that?" exclaimed McCarthy, looking in the same direction.

"It's Pink!" screamed Daisy frantically. "I can see the helmet. He got out safe, after all. Oh, Pink, Pink, come and help us, quick!"

Pink had indeed stumbled upon the native village, and he came on into the midst of the savages, who gazed in silent awe at the grotesque figure of the diver. Suddenly, as he reached the trees where the two victims were bound, the whole tribe of cannibals sank prostrate to the ground before him.

"They think you're a god!" shouted Square Deal. "Play up to 'em, boy!"

At the end of the open space Pink saw an idol erected on a pedestal. Hoisting up to it, he seized the image and hurled it aside. The god fell into a great fire which the savages had kindled, and Pink solemnly took its place on the pedestal.

The natives raised their heads and gazed stupidly at him as their idol was destroyed. Then they bowed once more before their new god, this queer figure with a metal head and grotesque garments. The drums began to beat again, and the howling re-commenced, until once more there came an interruption.

A beam of light came flickering through the woods, and the cannibals fell flat on their faces in terror. Schultz had arrived that night off the island in his schooner, and he immediately turned a searchlight upon the land. The light played here and there high up among the trees, and the savages began a low chant to their new god.

"O god of the sea, if you are a true god, save us!"

The searchlight suddenly went out. Schultz had seen no signs of life, and he was not quite sure that he had hit upon the right island, so he had determined to wait until the morning before doing anything more.

The natives sang songs of praise to their new god as the mysterious light disappeared, and some of them began to bring to him gifts from their temple. Rubies and pearls were cast at the feet of the "God of the Sea," and again the whole tribe bowed before him. Still Pink sat motionless on the pedestal, waiting his chance, for he felt sure that his chance would come.

The End of Schultz.

ACTING on the information he had obtained from Pearly Nick, Schultz had followed Pink to the Solomon Islands, bent on searching every island to the south-west of Bougainville. As it happened, he had heard far off the sound of the bombs thrown by Pink, and he had steered in the direction indicated.

Schultz and his men came ashore in the morning, and in a long straggling line, their guns all loaded and ready, they entered the woods and cautiously advanced. No signs of life were to be seen until they reached the clearing. The native village was empty, but the "God of the Sea" still sat on his pedestal.

"One of Pink's men!" whispered Rudy.

"Pink himself, I reckon," said Schultz. "Go forward slowly, and we'll get the mutt easy."

They went on step by step, and the god did not move. Schultz at length reached forward to seize Pink's shoulder, and as he did so the figure fell forward and lay still.

"Diving dress is empty," said Schultz disgustedly. "He's got away, or the niggers have got him."

"Is this anything, boss?" asked Bill, showing Schultz a stone he had picked up from the path.

"Sure!" cried the trader delightedly. "It's a ruby, boys. I reckon we're in luck. C'mon, and look around some more!"

"Help! Help!" came a distant voice from among the trees.

"This way!" yelled Schultz, and the men doubled towards the sound. In a few minutes they came to a deep pit, and, looking down into it, they saw a white man.

"It's McCarthy," said Schultz. "Haul him out, boys."

Square Deal was pulled out, and the gang ringed him round.

"Now, McCarthy, I'll have the truth," cried Schultz. "Where's Daisy, and where's that skunk Pink?"

"Dead!" said Square Deal solemnly.

"Dead!" echoed Schultz and his men. "How then?"

"The niggers captured the boat while Pink was down below," said McCarthy. "They brought Daisy and me up here and tied us up. Pink got ashore in his diving dress, and the natives took him for a god."

"I guessed that," remarked Schultz. "Okay so far. Go on."

"They had a feast last night and got drunk, most of 'em," McCarthy continued, "and Pink came up and cut us loose. We were making away, but they chased us and they killed Daisy and Pink with spears. I fell down this pit, and they missed me."

"I don't believe all that," growled Schultz. "Half his yarn is lies, I reckon. I saw the back of the diving dress had been cut, and I guess Daisy and McCarthy got Barker out. I believe those two are somewhere on the island."

Square Deal was roped up and hurried off to Schultz's boat, while the trader and his men searched the island.

Schultz had guessed correctly, for Pink and the girl had escaped the night before, and after wandering a long way across the island, they found refuge in a cave just before dawn.

"Take these, Daisy," said Pink presently, giving a small bag to the girl. "I put all the rubies they threw at my feet into that bag. You look after 'em."

"Why give them to me?" asked Daisy.

"I believe Schultz is here—you saw that searchlight. We've got away from the niggers, but we shan't dodge him so easy. He won't hurt you, but as for me—"

"If he—kills you, I'll die, too, Pink," said Daisy in a low tone. "We'll go together, dear."

"Then you don't hate me any more?" cried the young sailor joyfully.

"No," replied Daisy; "I never did. I only tried to think I did."

Pink took the girl in his arms and kissed her, very happy in spite of the dangers surrounding them. Presently he stepped out of the cave to survey the country. It was an unwise move, for Schultz happened to be ensconced behind some trees not far off, looking through his telescope, and he caught a glimpse of Pink. He called up his gang, and a few minutes later Daisy and Pink were surprised and captured.

"You ever see this before?" growled Schultz, producing the ruby. "Got any more like it?"

Pink looked contemptuously at his rival, but did not reply, and Schultz turned to Daisy.

"I've got something special to say to Daisy," he snarled. "Her boy friend is going to be accidentally shot."

"Why can't you leave us to die?" cried Daisy pleadingly.

"I'll leave him to die, and take you along," snapped Schultz.

"You'll never take me with you!" exclaimed the girl.

(Continued on page 27.)

They entered the woods and cautiously advanced.

"WEST OF CHEYENNE."

(Continued from page 20.)

He was just as calm when he saw Kurt Raymer take up his gun.

"Say, one of these men is your pal," said Raymer quietly. "Give him a name, stranger."

"I ain't got nothing to say," said Banty. "And no guns is goin' to make me say anything."

"I've got a way of makin' homhres like you speak up," said Raymer. "You're going to name your pal, stranger. What's your answer?"

The answer came from elsewhere.

There was a crash as Tom's chair flew back as with a single movement he rose to his feet and snatched at the gun in his neighbour's holster.

"Here's the answer!" flashed Tom. "Reach for the skies! Up! Quick, Banty!"

The gangsters' hands went up; there was a command in that voice only equal to Raymer's. Banty needed no orders. He snatched at Tom's own gun from under Raymer, grabbed a second, and in a moment he was going round the gang relieving them of their guns.

Raymer was speechless, but his eyes spoke volumes. There was hatred, fear and desperation.

"So you're named, stranger," he said between his teeth. "You just can't get out of here."

"You'll see!" said Tom, and laughed. "You're coming with me, Kurt Raymer. They sort of want you down Circle B way. There they know you as the Laramie Kid!"

Raymer's face went ashen, and for a moment his hands shook as if he would chance dropping them.

But Banty poked a gun quickly into his ribs, and he changed his mind.

"All you bunch get against the wall, and keep facing it!" snapped Tom. "Banty, blow holes in the first man that drops his hands!"

"Sure, and it would be a great pleasure, Tom!" grinned Banty. "Move, you yellow rats!"

The men moved. None of them was asking for a bullet, and Raymer had to fare for himself just then.

"You get out of this place, Raymer—and let me warn you that you're going back to Circle B dead or alive!" said Tom briskly. "I've come for you, and you're sure goin' back! Get moving!"

Surlily Raymer moved to the door and passed out, Banty bringing up the rear with his arms full of guns. Tom, his eyes on Raymer, waited until he heard the door closed and the lock turned.

"Beat it, Banty, but keep an eye all around. Shoot anything you see!" snapped Tom. "Move, Raymer—I'm in a hurry—"

"Say, young man, they've got more guns hidden in there!" came from Rose, as she rushed up to them. "Bess is down at the corral with your horses. Move, stranger!"

"Hustle, Raymer—you're the first that's going to die if it looks as if I'll lose you! Hustle!"

Raymer hustled down to the corral, where Bess was already mounted.

"Get into that saddle, and you have got to ride like fury! I'm behind you, with a longing to plug lead into you! Get that under your hat!" rapped out Tom. "Shoot for the trail, Bess. You next, Banty—now, Raymer—"

The thudding of the hoofs coincided with the crashing in of the headquarters door. A fusillade of bullets shrieked their way an instant later, but the run-aways were already out of range.

But the main trail had scarcely been struck before they heard the shouts of the gang, and the thudding of many hoofs. The chase had begun, and shooting would soon commence.

But Nevada stopped that.

"Surround 'em, boys; we'll outride them, with the girl on a slow hoss!" he shouted. "Don't shoot yet, 'cos you might hit the boss. Ride like fury!"

His men obeyed only too well for Tom Langdon's hopes. He shouted to Banty to ride up alongside the girl and try and whack out a bit more speed from her horse.

Anxiously Tom peered behind. The gang was coming up; he saw them splitting into two groups. That meant trouble.

"We'll have to pull up and fight!" shouted Tom. "Get into that undergrowth! Move, Raymer!"

Raymer obeyed, and he was the first to slip from his horse when they had got into undergrowth too thick for them to ride through. In a moment Tom was by his side, a piece of cord in his hands.

"Turn around—sharp!" he grunted. "I don't want you to be shot, Raymer, even by your own men; and I ain't having you getting away whilst we look after you—and ourselves."

Raymer obeyed surlily, his anxious eyes watching for signs of his men.

The first notion he got of them was just as Tom put the finishing touches to binding his wrists behind him.

"It's another sort of rope you're booked for, but this will do for now!" said Tom between his teeth. "Bess, get under cover; they're moving around. Banty, slip ahead—and shoot straight! Where are the boys?"

"Out in the valley; they can't be very far away!" called Banty, as he ran forward.

A moment later he was shooting at two or three targets that presented themselves, and a hail of bullets came from the wooded range. Bess got well down under cover, her heart beating so fast that she felt it would burst.

But Tom fired no shot until he had chased his horse out on to the trail and had seen it careering madly away from Ghost City towards the valley.

Then he joined Raymer again, and kept the enemy well down by his lightning-like shooting. For fifteen minutes the battle went on, and in that fifteen minutes enough lead was lost in the shrubs to fill a decent-sized dustbin.

But Banty and Tom kept the enemy at a distance that made shooting with certainty an impossibility.

The moment anything like a target appeared, a bullet crashed beside it with a message that meant any better target was death.

Bess looked on, frightened but thrilled, and it was she who saw Kurt Raymer dash away with loose cord dangling from his wrists. He had struggled free of his bonds whilst Tom was busy shooting.

For the moment

Tom hesitated, as Raymer was running towards his own men, who would certainly shoot past him at Tom if he gave chase. Something like a groan left Tom's lips at the sudden realisation that he was running into certain death if he moved, and that he was losing the Laramie Kid if he did not move.

He started up, desperately determined to do his best, and at that precise second there came shots from down the trail. Fifty horsemen thundered amidst the dust, shooting as they came, and with reckless daring they spread out in a semi-circle to surround the scene of the battle.

Tom's boys had arrived!

"Stick 'em up—or we'll shoot you where you lie!" shrieked Banty. "Oh, good for you, boys! Look at Tom!"

The shooting stopped as if a bugle had sounded the "Cease fire!" The gangsters knew when it was wise to give in. They marched out of the undergrowth, their hands in the air, fear on every face.

But Tom was not looking on. He was making for the Laramie Kid with the speed of a hare, and the joy of one from whom all troubles have been suddenly lifted.

In that frame of mind Tom Langdon was an unbeatable giant. Raymer found that out, but Tom had to hatter the fact into him before he would admit defeat. He came back to the rest of his men with a face that was so rarely recognisable, and in a moment Banty, as cheerful as a schoolboy on holiday, took command of the whole gang.

"Bunch 'em down Circle B!" he chirruped. "Guess they will be glad to see 'em down there! Where's Tom now?"

He looked round eagerly—and then suddenly pushed his hat back upon his head.

"Say!" he murmured resentfully. "If I ain't a bad prophet, we'll be having a new hoss before long!"

For Tom Langdon and Bess were already in their saddle, looking at one another in a manner that gave Banty ample reason for his prophecy. When, five minutes later, the cavalcade was riding towards Circle B with the prisoners, Banty looked back and found that Tom's saddle had two people upon it, and a very discreet little horse that had been ridden by Bess was walking slowly behind a very much engaged couple, it wanted no one so bright as Banty to make such a forecast.

The trip to West of Cheyenne had been the most dangerous, but the most glorious, trip Tom Langdon had ever made.

(By permission of the British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Tom Tyler and Josephine Hill.)

KEEP YOUR BOYS AT HOME!

32 Free Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

A Riley! Billiard Table provides an attraction that makes it simple. There's hours of pleasure for the boys and all the family with a Riley "Home" Billiard Table. The 6 ft. size is delivered on first deposit of 13/3d., balance by monthly instalments. Cash Price £11 15s. 7days' Free Trial allowed to test the table, and Riley's pay carriage and take transit risks. Riley's "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables are also offered on easy terms. Send for Free Art List containing sizes and prices of all tables. Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Great Britain.

E. J. RILEY, LTD.,

Howard Works, Accrington, and Dept. 35,
147, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.1,
September 5th, 1931.

"SWEEPSTAKES."

(Continued from page 14.)

Six-Shooter and the Six Partners.

SLEEPY had been in Agua Caliente a week when he bought a horse, or, rather, paid a deposit on same. Now Buddy had introduced him to Jake, the head barman and his three assistants—they were crazy about horses. "I wanna let you boys into a fortune," Sleepy said in a knowing fashion. "How would you like to own a real live racehorse?" They scoffed, but soon they were all ears.

"I've just told you all about the horse and his condition. You would like to know why the horse is goin' so cheap. The reason is because the horse ain't easy to ride. Find the jockey that can ride him and you're on a fortune. After winning the Gold Cup, Six-Shooter—"

"The horse that—" cried Jake. "Shurrup, I'm talking!" growled Sleepy. "After winning, Six-Shooter wouldn't do a thing, and Pop Blake, the owner, sold up everything. The horse went from stable to stable, but he ain't had a victory. I've just bought him off a horse-dealer for three hundred and fifty. That ain't quite correct. I've paid a deposit of fifty dollars, and I know of a partner who will stand in for a hundred, leaving me to raise two hundred." He gave them a speculative glance. "Four into two hundred makes—"

"Guess it's time we went home," shouted one of the barmen. "I hear my nurse calling."

"You'll miss the chance of your life," hissed Sleepy in his most dramatic fashion. "Who rode Six-Shooter? Buddy Doyle! Buddy was suspended, but that ended three months ago—they cleared the lad's name. If I could produce Buddy as the jockey, what would you say?"

"We'd stand in with you," Jake was carried away. "Yes, we'd stand in: but where is Buddy Doyle?"

"Ever seen his picture," Sleepy grinned. "You have, Jake? Then take a look at a waiter what sings in this dive. Ain't his name Doyle?"

"Gosh, I've nearly driven myself crazy trying to think where I'd seen his face before," gasped Jake. "So that boy is Buddy Doyle!"

"Yeah, that boy sure is Buddy Doyle," sniggered Sleepy. "And as I was his trainer for several years I can tell you he can ride. If Six-Shooter, with Doyle up, were entered for the Agua Caliente Handicap, would we pull it off? You bet we would. Do you boys want to stand in on this deal?"

Sleepy Jones left the saloon the richer by two hundred dollars.

The race was to take place in a week's time, and it was necessary to enter the horse at once. Sleepy got busy on the long-distance 'phone and raised the entrance money, and when the entry form had been duly signed, Sleepy danced with joy and anticipation.

Next day he went first of all to the railway-station, where he met a very excited, nervous and attractive young woman.

"We're gonna surprise Buddy twice," chuckled Sleepy. "He gets off about September 5th, 1931.

two for a couple of hours, and I'll spring the first surprise on him then."

The saloon was empty save for Buddy Doyle, who was reading a racing paper. Though he scarcely ever mentioned a horse, he could not forget the old game. Now and again the old hankering to ride would grip him, and then a cold chill would go down his back.

"The old firm!" chortled a voice, and Sleepy walked across the saloon floor. "How's me lucky lad?"

"Pretty good, Sleepy," was the answer. "What have you been doing these last few days? Nothing but dodging about, whispering to Jake and the other lads. I'm all suspicious of you when you keep on rubbing your hands together."

"I've got a surprise for you—several of them, in fact." Sleepy smiled and gave a quick glance towards the saloon door. If only Buddy knew who was outside. "My first startler is that I've bought a hoss."

"You've bought a horse!" gasped Buddy. "I hope you haven't been razed—they're a slippery lot in these parts."

"The name of the hoss is Six-Shooter."

"Six-Shooter!" Buddy gripped the edge of a table. "Not my old pal? Oh, Sleepy, how does he look—is he fit?"

"Not as fit as he were when you rode him, Buddy." Sleepy gave a short laugh. "But still a mighty good horse. I've entered him for the Agua Caliente Handicap."

"Who's the jockey?" asked Buddy through tight lips.

"Name of Doyle." Sleepy rubbed his hands together.

"You haven't put me down to ride?" Buddy was on his feet and his eyes gleamed with a strange frenzy. "I'm through with riding. I won't ever ride again. You've got to get another jockey. I hate anything to do with racing." He passed his hands before his face as if he saw a ghost. "I can see their faces now—thousands of them—all leering at me; disgraced and suspended."

"But that's all finished with, Buddy." Sleepy was uneasy. "With you up this handicap is a cinch."

"I can't and won't ride!" muttered Buddy. "I'm finished."

From behind the bar four heads slowly appeared—Jake and his three assistants. Their glances of rage and despair must have penetrated to Sleepy, because he turned and saw them. At once his finger went to his lips, and he made a gesture for them to hide. When Sleepy pointed to the swing doors and made strange gestures they wondered what he could mean.

"I'm sorry, Sleepy." Buddy had sunk into a seat and was staring into space. "I've lost my courage. I'm a coward! I couldn't face the mob again."

"Jake and the boys have backed you," argued Sleepy. "I was so sure you would ride that they came in. Are you going to fail them, Buddy?"

"I should take a toss," came the dull reply. "I'd be scared stiff. I'm sorry, Sleepy, but I'm finished—finished!"

Sleepy glanced down at the bowed shoulders and began to tiptoe towards the swing doors. The four heads appeared and their gaze was suspicious. Sleepy edged towards them.

"I've got his gal outside," he hissed, and winked assurance, though he did not feel so certain.

Buddy did not look up when a hand was laid gently on his shoulder, but he fairly leaped to his feet when a soft voice called him.

"Buddy!" "Babe!" He stared at her, unable to say anything more.

Babe Ellis was changed. She was prettier, but the gay, laughing girl had changed into a woman; there were marks of suffering about the cheeks, and the whole body seemed slimmer. A tear trickled slowly down her cheeks.

"After all this time I've found you, Buddy," she whispered. "Please say you forgive me."

"I was too harsh in my judgment," admitted Buddy in a humble voice. "I ought to have known that Weber had a tongue like a snake and would double-cross his best friends. But how did you ever find me?"

"Sleepy." The girl came close to him. "Oh, Buddy, aren't you going to kiss me?"

Buddy hugged her close and for some moments he was sublimely happy. His Babe had come back to him, but all the sparkle and joy of life left him when she said quietly:

"Buddy, you must ride Six-Shooter." "I couldn't face the crowd!" His face was twisted as if with pain. "I've gone yellier, Babe. I should cut and run for it!"

"Listen, Buddy." She waited till he had finished a long tale of the hardships that he had experienced in his search for work. "We want to get you back once more on the ladder. Sleepy has got four good men to buy Six-Shooter, and I helped as much as I could. Are you going to fail us? It was I who caused your downfall, and for my sake I want you to fight back."

"I'm scared, Babe." Buddy clenched and unclenched his fists. He could see himself coming up the straight, and there ahead lay the winning-post, but on all sides were thousands of leering faces. "I haven't the pluck."

"Must I go away, knowing that not only have I ruined you, but caused Sleepy and his friends to lose a lot of money?" She laid her hands on his shoulders. "They believe in you, and so do I. Won't you do this just for my sake?"

"If only I could muster up enough courage."

"Why not try out Six-Shooter before you start work?" Babe felt she was winning. "Once you feel a horse under you the old courage will return. Try, Buddy, and if you still don't want to go on after that we won't worry you again."

"I'll do it." Buddy set his jaw. "But you've got to help me to be brave, Babe."

When they had gone, four heads rose slowly above the bar counter, and each man looked at the other.

"Boys, I ain't gonna sleep nut h tonight!"

The Agua Caliente Handicap.

HAD Buddy conquered his nerves? He had certainly ridden Six-Shooter many times round the course, but only his friends had been watching.

But it was a different thing on race day. Everywhere seethed a mass of people. They seemed to be staring at him. "Weighing-out" was an agony because one of the officials was very inquisitive when he heard the name of Doyle; even went so far as to find out when the suspension had been removed. His gruff manner badly shook the quaking Buddy. The walk round in the paddock was an agony with the smartly-dressed men and women. Did he see and hear someone pointing and talking about him as the jockey who had once been under a cloud? At last that was finished, and now came the saddling-up.

His tongue seemed swollen, and he could hardly speak as he mounted Six-Shooter. Would the eye deride him as he paraded past the grand-stand on the way to the start?

"Keep yer chin up, son!" said a voice, and Buddy stared down into the face of the Dude.

"I feel as if I were going to a funeral!" he gasped out.

"If you win you may go to a wedding," chipped in Sleepy. "If we lose there may be a funeral—maybe I'll be the corpse if Jake and his pals catch me."

"Go in and win," the Dude whispered. "And, remember, I've backed you for fifty bucks, and you're my star tip for the day. You've gone from fifties to tens, and before you're off the mark it will be fives. Whoop-te-do, Buddy!"

That talk did Buddy good, and he did not feel so afraid as he cantered up the course.

A perfect start, but Six-Shooter was a little late getting away. The distance was a mile and a half, and there was a big field of sixteen runners. Soon the field began to tail out, and those that had no chance in the race dropped back.

All the old tricks and cunning came back to Buddy with a rush. Not yet must he try to get past the four horses in front of him in order to challenge the Admiral, The Saxon, and Warship. "Whoop-te-do!" Buddy chanted the magic words, and Six-Shooter answered the call with a quickened stride.

"Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do—I'm coming through!" Buddy yelled. "Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do!" Like a streak Six-Shooter flashed through the stragglers.

Four furlongs to go and a difficult bend that made passing extremely difficult. Luck favoured Buddy, because he saw that Warship was overhauling The Saxon, and that The Admiral was only just holding off the challenge of The Saxon. If the straight of two furlongs could be reached with the leader only a few lengths in the lead, then it might be possible to sweep by to victory.

It timed out as Buddy had hoped. The Admiral and The Saxon were running neck-and-neck, with Warship coming up on the flank. Six-Shooter was half a length to the rear.

"Whoop-te-do!" chanted Buddy, and the horse was level with Warship.

"Six-Shooter! Six-Shooter!" came the cry from the stands, and then what a thrill as he heard the crowd shouting for him. "Ride him, Doyle! Six-Shooter! Doyle!"

"Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do!"

The Admiral and The Saxon were left standing as Six-Shooter flashed past them.

Even then Buddy was not going to take any risks. In the old days he might have eased, but to-day he was all out.

"Whoop-te-do! Whoop-te-do!" he shouted, and Six-Shooter flashed past the winning-post six lengths ahead of Warship.

The Dude had done his work well, and many had backed Six-Shooter at long odds. They howled and yelled their joy at Buddy's success, and it was music in the jockey's ears, but best of all was the joyous grin of Sleepy Jones and the glad light in the eyes of Babe Ellis—the girl who had won back his manhood.

(By permission of P.D.C., starring Eddie Quillan as Bud Doyle.)

"THE SEA GOD."

(Continued from page 24.)

"You'll see," sneered the trader. "Take her on board right now!"

Two of the men seized Daisy and carried her off in spite of her frantic struggles, and Schultz turned to Pink, who had been pinioned tightly by four of the gang.

"And now I'll deal with you," he cried. "Hand over any rubies or pearls you have, or I'll fill you with lead right now."

Pink still did not reply, and Schultz slowly raised his gun. His finger was just about to press the trigger when, with a tremendous howl and the beating of many drums, a horde of natives burst out of the woods. Too late Schultz remembered that in his eagerness to dispose of his rival he had neglected to watch for the cannibals. Several of his men were struck down before they even realised that enemies were upon them, and the rest began to retreat towards the shore, fighting desperately against overwhelming odds.

Pink's guards let their captive loose and rushed into the fight. The young sailor instantly dived into the undergrowth and began to crawl away on hands and knees. He was lucky enough to get away safely, and presently he reached the clearing. The empty diving dress was still there, and with some difficulty he got into it, though he was not able to secure the helmet properly.

Thus equipped once more as the God of the Sea, Pink started for the beach. He arrived there only just in time, for a raging mob of savages was manning the canoes to attack the schooner President. Of Schultz and his men there was no sign. Their bodies lay still amongst the trees, for the natives had killed every one of them.

The crowd on the beach saw Pink, and the howling ceased. The natives fell to the ground, praising this "god" who had helped them, as they thought, to overcome their enemies, and Pink walked between the prostrate ranks straight into the sea.

There were only four men on the President, together with Daisy and McCarthy, the prisoners. When the natives appeared on the shore, Square Deal was unbound so that he might help to defend the boat. Soon he saw Pink advancing and the savages falling prostrate before him. On he came until his helmet disappeared beneath the surface, and Daisy screamed in fear.

"Stand by to hoist the mainsail!" roared Square Deal. "He'll be coming on board."

Pink came swimming up to the side of the ship as the sail went up. He had managed to get off the diving suit under water, and he was hurriedly hauled on board just as the anchor was weighed and the ship began to move.

"Thank Heaven you're safe!" cried Daisy fervently.

The schooner sailed away, while on the beach a crowd of natives bewailed the disappearance of the "sea god." Presently Daisy and Pink, standing by the rail, looked back, to see the last of the sinister island of pearls.

"I'm sorry for Schultz and his men," whispered the girl. "He was a wicked wretch, but I don't like to think of his awful fate."

"Forget all about it, girl," said Pink. "Have you still got those rubies?"

"Yes. I was going to throw them into the sea when I thought you were dead, but Square Deal stopped me. Here they are."

"And you keep them, Daisy," replied Pink. "I give them to you, and you shall do what you like with them, even when—"

"Well, go on," smiled the girl, for Pink had stopped in some confusion.

"Even when we are married—that is, if you will marry me, after all."

"I don't know if I dare be the wife of a 'sea god,'" laughed Daisy. "but when we get home I think I'll risk it!"

(By permission of the Paramount Film Co., Ltd., starring Richard Arlen and Fay Wray.)

GRAND FILM NOVELS YOU SHOULD NOT MISS!

"SIN SHIP."

The gripping drama of a hard-living, two-fisted sea captain, reformed by a girl who proves to be herself a crook.

"THE MIDNIGHT SUN."

In order to secure her lover's pardon, the premier dancer in the Russian ballet foolishly goes to the Grand Duke's apartments. The whole situation is misconstrued by the lover, who goes over to the revolutionists. Starring Laura La Plante and Pat O'Malley.

"DAYBREAK."

A carefree officer flirts with a beautiful girl and has to fight tremendous odds to win her back to him. Starring Ramon Novarro and Helen Chandler.

The late Louis Wolheim and Mary Astor

"SIN SHIP."

Complete in this week's issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

On Sale Wednesday.

PRICE 2d.

September 5th, 1931.

(Continued from page 2.)

British International Pictures at Elstree.

The hero of the affair was Lance Fairfax, the Australian star who recently arrived in this country, and the cause of the excitement was a horse which went into a panic, broke loose from the man in whose charge it was placed, and dashed round the studio, wrecking everything that lay in its path.

Fairfax, who takes the part of Escamillo, the torador, in the film, was testing the horse on the set when the full battery of lights, suddenly put on, frightened it.

He had momentarily left the animal in charge of a studio hand while he was making an adjustment to his make-up, and in a flash, as the full glare of the great arc lamps flooded the studio, the horse was on its hind legs, kicking wildly right and left.

Artistes rushed for cover as the animal tore its bridle loose from the man who held it and stamped around the studio, dashing into sound apparatus and knocking over several lamps in its wild career.

The situation had become desperate indeed when Lance Fairfax dashed up to the horse, grabbed its bridle and began to fondle and talk to it. In a moment or so it had quietened down and was taken off the set, leaving a bewildered but grateful unit to thank Fairfax—who had been slightly bruised on the left knee by the flying hoofs of the horse—for his timely intervention.

It was afterwards revealed that Fairfax had spent many years in breaking in horses in New Zealand and Australia. He served in the cavalry during the war, and gained an M.C. He was twice mentioned in despatches by Sir Douglas Haig.

Cameraman Locked Up in Bankruptcy Court.

For the purposes of reconstructing in the studio a furniture of the interior of the Bankrupt Court in London, the art department of British International Pictures at Elstree sent a still photographer to take pictures inside the buildings.

The man duly arrived and was about to take the necessary photographs when his camera jammed, and a search ensued for a dark room in which the adjustment could be made. Various rooms in the building were visited, but none was found suitable. All had windows.

The position was getting critical as the pictures were needed by the evening, and the question of light had to be considered, when it was suggested that the safe seemed to be the only dark room available.

The next problem was: How were they to know outside when the cameraman had finished in the safe? No sound that he could make would be heard through the thick steel door. Finally it was decided to allow him five minutes in which to complete the job.

The minutes ticked away in the darkness of the safe. The five minutes passed and the door was flung open. But the camera was still jammed. Five more minutes were allowed him in the safe, and it was a perspiring but triumphant cameraman who emerged.

A Film Star's Mascot.

Gordon Harker, who plays the typical burglar-butler rôles in the British Lion-Gainsborough screen version of the Edgar Wallace racing thriller, "The Calendar," is possessed of an exceptionally clever mascot in the person of Jim, a blind terrier.

Jim unfortunately lost his sight just over a year ago, and since that time has been a pathetic and subdued figure unceasingly at Mr. Harker's side. They are, in fact, inseparable and devoted friends. Jim goes to the studio every day, where he follows his master from dressing-room to set, and so highly developed is his sense of intelligence that, despite his blindness, he can sense when filming is in progress and when it is ended. He understands that when the microphones are open he must remain perfectly quiet and still, which he does, stretched out behind the powerful arc-lamps and cameras, nose in paws. Once the shooting is over he shakes himself and hurriedly joins his master.

Jim's patient submission to the calmity of eternal darkness and his super-intelligence have captured the sympathy and admiration of the studio staff and also of Miss Edna Best and Mr. Herbert Marshall, who are playing the leading rôles in "The Calendar." Jim has won the highest studio recognition—he is a "great feller."

Answers to Questions.

Yes, we have readers in all parts of the world, R.F.B. (Beckenham). Thanks for your appreciation of this paper. Bob Steele's real name is Bradbury. He is still appearing in films, some new ones being "The Sunrise Trail," "Headin' North," "The Ridin' Fool" and "The Oklahoma Cyclone." Yakima Canutt during the war served in the United States Navy, and later took up film work. Among his pictures are "The Human Tornado," "Desert Creed," "The Fighting Stallion" and "The Man With the Car." He does not reveal his age. Jack Perrin meant to become a scenario writer, but changed his mind when a film company gave him the chance to act. His pictures include "Grey Devil," "Code of the Range," "The North-West Mounted Police" series and "The Flaming West." He is six foot in height, and has brown eyes. Yes, the ever-popular Tom Mix will be seen again in Westerns produced by Universal.

Albert E. Smith is an Englishman who was born in Faversham, Kent, C.R.B. (London, S.W.). He went out to America several years ago, and with Stuart J. Blackton, another Englishman, they founded the Vitagraph film company, which Warner Bros. took over a few years ago. I presume, however, your query relates to Albert J. Smith who, as far as I am aware, is no relation, and was born in Chicago. He made his film debut in 1915, and since then has appeared in a number of cowboy films. You can get a photo of Johnny Mack Brown for 9d. post free from the "Picture Show," Photo Dept., Bear Alley, Farringdon Street, E.C.4.

GROSE'S, LUDGATE CIRCUS, LONDON.

FOOTBALL JERSEYS

All Colours and Designs.

15/- per doz.

British Made.

Send for Illustrated List. Post Free.

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge St., London, E.C.4.

DON'T BE BULLIED

Some SPLENDID LESSONS in JUSTICE, interesting articles, etc., FREE on application. How to take care of yourself under ALL circumstances without weapons, by the Wonderful Japanese art of self-defence. Far better than boxing. Learn to beat 10 men. Supply sent two penny stamps postage or 1/- for first large part NOW to "Yawara" (Dept. A.P.), 10, Queensway, Hanworth, Feltham, Middlesex. School in London for Practical Tuition.

BLUSHING,

"Shyness," "Nerves," "Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/- Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

STAMMERING.

STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars free. FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

MY GREAT OFFER

Write for my free Bargain Lists of the best ALL BRITISH cycles. 14 DAYS APPROVAL. CARRIAGE PAID. Cash price £3 15s. 0d., or terms. All accessories FREE. Value 21/-.

2
WEEKLY

Edw. O'Brien THE WORLD'S LARGEST CYCLE DEALER, DEP 17 COVENTRY.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

BLUSHING,

SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d.

(Abroad 1/-), including Airpost, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W.A. White, 30, Eugenie Lane, L.Y.E., Stonebridge.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Boy's Cinema

"Gun Smoke" and "Heroes of the Flames."

A Long Complete and a Gripping Serial.

Boy's CINEMA 2

No. 613.

EVERY TUESDAY.

SEPTEMBER 12th, 1931.

An amusing farce, starring those popular comedians,
BERT WHEELER
and
ROBERT WOOLSEY.

CRACKED NUTS

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Cracked Nuts."

Wendell Graham, Bert Wheeler; Zander U. Parkhurst (Zup), Robert Woolsey; Aunt Minnie van Arden, Edna May Oliver; Betty Harrington, Dorothy Lee; Carlotta, Leni Stengel; Baron Bogardus, Stanley Fields.

"Gun Smoke."

Brad Farley, Richard Arlen; Sue Vaucy, Mary Brian; Stub Wallock, Eugene Pallette; Kedge Darvis, William Boyd; Hampsey Dell, Louise Fazenda; Tack Gillup, Charles Winniger; Posey Meed, Guy Oliver; John K. Horton, James Durkin; Spot Skee, Brooks Benedict; Strike Johnson, William V. Mong.

Doug's Love for Travel.

It would not be surprising if Douglas Fairbanks gave us on the screen in the near future some of the results of his sight-seeing abroad. As is generally known, he recently returned to Hollywood after several months in the East, but though he had announced his intention of making it a hunting trip, he did not overlook the valuable material to be found. Doug very wisely accumulated quite a lot of it to be used for screen purposes.

Doug's "wanderlust" evinced itself early in his career. He had not long begun his acting on the stage when he felt a desire to see something of the world. Other Americans were crossing the Atlantic to see what lay beyond. Why shouldn't he? So with two pals Doug started for Europe on a cattle-boat. Each had ten pounds.

They worked their way safely across, had a glorious time, and within three months were back again in New York. A few years later after having left the stage for a time and then gone back to it, Doug once again felt he must travel.

This time it was the mysterious Orient which captured his fancy. He wanted to see what Japan, in particular, was like. So once more he set out, but in London stumbled across a friend from New York and, changing his mind about Japan, shortly afterwards returned to the States.

Doug has been abroad more than once since then. The idea of rest does not appeal to him. He must be up and hurrying off somewhere, and travel enables him to satisfy the "wanderlust" he has always felt.

"Beau Hunks."

The Hal Roach studios are again busy with a picture which is sure to raise a laugh. About a hundred and fifty members of the Hollywood American

September 12th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

BUCK JONES

IN

"THE TEXAS RANGER."

A gang of night riders pillage and burn the houses of the homesteaders. A brave girl defies them, but she fights a losing battle until Ranger Jim comes to her aid.

"TRAPPED."

A gentleman of leisure saves a beautiful girl and becomes involved in a mix-up with desperate racketeers. Starring Nick Stuart.

"CREEPING SHADOWS."

A young man inherits an old house and at once strange things begin to happen—behind everything hovers the shadow of a limping man. Starring Franklin Dyll.

ALSO

The third episode of our grand new serial of thrills amongst the fire-fighters, starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley—

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

Legion are acting as soldiers of the Foreign Legion, and as desert Riffs in "Beau Hunks," in which will also appear those two inimitable comedians, Laurel and Hardy. There will not be many serious moments with them in the film. The desert scenes are being filmed on Hemmosa Beach.

An Interrupted Holiday.

Gary Cooper is now hard at work on his new talkie, and feeling quite fit once more after his illness. Following it he had gone abroad to recuperate, and after spending several weeks in Italy had come over to London to finish his holiday. But he had been here only a little more than a day when a cable was sent to him requesting his immediate return to Hollywood to begin work again in pictures.

Gary's interrupted visit to this country must have been, I am sure, a keen disappointment, for there is no doubt he hoped to revive memories of his stay here when a boy. His parents, both of them English, had gone to America before his birth. Cooper, senior, became a superior-court judge in Helena, Montana, and was also the owner of a cattle ranch sixty-five miles from the city on the headwaters of the Missouri River.

Gary was born in Helena, and soon learnt to ride and swim.

Then when he was nine years of age, his parents came back to England for a time, bringing Gary and his brother Arthur with them. For three and a half years the two boys attended school in Dunstable, and then returned to America. Gary is certain to come over here again, and when he does will probably arrange for a longer stay amid old English haunts.

Inspired by Lindbergh.

Jack Oakie is once more really happy, which may seem a strange thing to say of a comedian who has never looked anything else. Some weeks ago, however, Jack Oakie asked Paramount for an increase in salary. But there was no readiness to give it to him, and matters reached the stage when it seemed likely that Jack would be temporarily out of pictures. But things ended happily, and now he is.

Many of you may not know, perhaps, that it was Lindbergh's feat of flying the Atlantic which really inspired Jack Oakie to take up film work. There is, obviously, no connection between these two things. But until his fellow-countryman had attempted something really difficult and achieved success, Jack Oakie had fought shy of the screen as being beyond his powers.

It was Lindbergh's daring which changed his mind. Jack left the stage as soon as he could, and began haunting the studios. Then one day while trying his luck at First National, he saw Wesley Ruggles, the director. He asked him for a job, and was given a small and unnamed part in "Finders Keepers." About eight months later Jack Oakie joined Paramount and was cast in "The Fleet's In." It "made" him, and he found himself just as famous as Lindbergh.

Answers to Questions.

Harry Richman and Clara Bow have not acted together in a film, F.S. (Plymouth). Harry Richman has, in fact, appeared in only one picture, "Puttin' on the Ritz," after which he returned to New York to resume his stage work. Hero is the cast of "True to the Navy": Clara Bow (Ruby Nolan), Fredric March (Gummer McCoy), Harry Green (Solomon Bimberg), Rex Bell (Eddie), Eddie Fotherston (Michael), Eddie Dunn (Albert), Ray Cooke (Pee-wee), Harry Sweet (Artie), Adelo Windsor (Maizic), Sam Hardy (Grogan), Jed Proaty (manager of the dance hall).

Wendell bought a revolution, Zup gambled for a crown, and so they both became King of El Dorania—with comic complications. A joyous farce, starring Wheeler and Woolsey, who are aided and abetted by Dorothy Lee and Edna May Oliver.

Aunt Minnie Speaks Her Mind.

OVER the diminutive but tempestuous South American kingdom of El Dorania King Oscar happened to be still reigning as Wendell Graham approached a big block of flats on Park Avenue, New York City, on the second floor of which the girl he loved and her aunt—who despised and detested him—occupied luxurious apartments.

Wendell, however, was not at the moment interested either in King Oscar or in his kingdom, nor did it occur to him that he ever would be. His thoughts were occupied exclusively with beautiful Betty Harrington and the distressing intimation he had received—by telephone—that she was going away.

Wendell was young as well as ardent, clean-shaven, and not bad-looking. His brown hair was curly, and his eyes were grey—nearly as dark as grey as the smartly-cut lounge suit he was wearing, and considerably darker than the grey soft felt hat upon his head. In his right hand he carried a large and expensive bouquet of roses.

He stepped into the hallway of the building and approached the lift-shaft. A taller young man was already standing before the gate of ornamental ironwork, jabbing impatiently at the bell-push, and, according to the illuminated indicator above the gate, the cage was hovering somewhere between the fifteenth and sixteenth floors.

Wendell waited, sniffing appreciatively at his roses, but the tall young man smote the gate with his cane as the pointer proclaimed that the lift, instead of descending for his benefit, was ascending still higher. For a while the cage remained stationary at the twentieth floor, then began to move upwards again.

The tall young man lost his temper utterly. He kicked savagely at the gate; he caught hold of a portion of its filigree work with both hands, and he rattled the gate with all his might.

Wendell was beginning to feel impatient, but he stared at the tall one in surprise. And just then something happened. The gate, for all its ornamentation, was only of cast iron. The piece of filigree work snapped off in the hands that treated it so ill, and the young man, having stared at the fragment in dismay, flung it down on the marble floor, and fled up the adjacent staircase.

The illuminated pointer began to trace the downward career of the lift-cage. Wendell was sniffing at his roses when the door was flung open and the lift-man emerged.

The lift-man, a lurchy fellow, looked down at the broken ironwork on the floor, looked up at the damaged gate, and looked fiercely at Wendell.

Wendell said nothing; the lift-man said nothing; but abruptly a massive fist crashed into Wendell's jaw, and he went sprawling on his back, still holding the roses. As he picked himself up he perceived that his assailant was picking up the broken piece of iron, and his back was turned. He made a dive for the doorway, and descended the front steps to the street. Explanation, it seemed to him, would be useless, and might be painful.

On the pavement outside the building he stopped short. A long ladder had been left leaning against the wall by a man who had been attending to a broken window-pane on the second floor, and not far from the sill against which the ladder was resting was the open window of the bath-room of the flat in which Betty van Arden resided with her aunt, Minnie van Arden.

Depositing the roses on a step, Wendell struggled manfully with the swaying ladder till its topmost rung reposed against the open bath-room window. Then, retrieving his roses, he climbed gingerly upwards.

In the spacious drawing-room of the flat of which the bath-room was an essential detail, Aunt Minnie van Arden and Betty were packing.

Betty, a dainty little slip of a thing with a wistful expression and large blue-grey eyes, was standing beside a half-filled cabin trunk. Her aunt had just emerged from her own bed-room, tall, plain, severe, carrying some of her own frocks from a wardrobe.

Evidently in the intervals of stowing things in the trunk these two were carrying on a conversation concerning the young man who was in the act of climbing up the ladder.

"But Wendell said he's going to build up his fortune," said Betty defensively.

"Oh, he did, eh?" retorted her aunt, grabbing up a frock she had dropped on the carpet. "He's never made a cent! He inherited five hundred thousand dollars, and promptly reduced them to a hundred thousand. If he ever loses that, he'll never earn a penny."

September 12th, 1931.

HELP THE NEWSAGENT.

Have you ever thought how difficult it is for a newsagent to order just the right number of copies of any particular paper each week? You can make his task much easier if you place a regular order with him. You will not only help him to order correctly and avoid waste, but will make sure of getting your copy regularly each week.

And if you think you can live on love, try to pay the grocer with a kiss!"

Wendell by this time had reached the sill of the bath-room window and was clambering over it.

"He has a lot of sensible ideas," declared Betty. "He says that, with prudence, two can live as cheaply as one."

"Why doesn't he marry Prudence?" inquired Aunt Minnie tartly.

"Oh, auntie, please be nice to him—just for to-day."

Wendell, who was now standing behind the half-open bath-room door, heard that plea and smiled at the roses. What a darling Betty was, he reflected lovingly.

"As long as I have my strength," cried Aunt Minnie, "he'll never get in here! I'm sick and tired of shooing that insect off the premises!"

Having deposited the frock in the trunk she rose with clenched fists.

"If he comes here again," she went on vehemently, "he's likely to get his throat caught between my fingers."

Wendell stepped back from the half-open door on to the little marble platform, behind curtains, where one ordinarily retreated to indulge in a shower-bath. The chain which worked the contrivance was hanging beside him. He was concealed from view, but he could still hear everything that was said.

"Oh, auntie," protested Betty, "why are you so cold?"

"I'm not cold!" snapped Aunt Minnie. "I'm hot! I'm burning up! You shouldn't mention his name to me! I'm going to take a shower!"

Betty was fully dressed in a dainty frock of figured silk, but her aunt was wearing a wrap over an astonishing suit of pyjamas. She stalked from the drawing-room into her bed-room and out of her bed-room into the bath-room.

"Wendell Graham!" she snorted as she went. "A total loss!"

Soaked!

SHE closed the bath-room window and fastened it. She took a syringe from a glass shelf, opened her mouth, and sprayed her throat with an antiseptic lotion, as though washing away from her tonsils and her larynx the contamination of the name she had just uttered.

"That little sap!" she hissed, and sprayed again.

Betty looked in at her from the doorway leading to the hall.

"If he gets in here again," said her aunt, inhaling and exhaling, "to—propose to you—refer him—to me."

"Oh, but it's me he wants to marry!" laughed Betty. "Why do you dislike him so?"

"Why shouldn't I? He's a wealthy idler, who produces nothing, achieves nothing, and means nothing. He has a hundred thousand dollars—and isn't worth a cent!"

She put down the syringe and snapped her fingers.

"Oh, but Wendell is a deep thinker," persisted Betty. "He told me so. He's going to leave footprints on the sands of time."

"He's a lot more likely to leave fingerprints!" scoffed her aunt, shedding her wrap.

Betty pouted, and Betty looked perfectly adorable when she pouted. Wendell, imprisoned behind the curtains of the shower-bath, could see her with one eye, and appreciated the fact. Her aunt, who could see her with both eyes, relented slightly, stepped forward, and took her into her arms.

"Oh, can't you get it through your silly little head that I love you, too?" she exclaimed, and kissed her.

September 12th, 1931.

"Where's my cap?" she wondered, looking about the room.

The cap—a waterproof contrivance devised to protect its wearer's hair against the water from the shower—was hanging on a peg quite close to Wendell's face. He took it down and dropped it neatly through the tiny gap between the curtains clean into Aunt Minnie van Arden's hand.

She stared at it, but imagined that Betty had tossed it to her on her way out from the bath-room. She pulled the cap over her head, plunged a hand through the curtains, and pulled vigorously at the chain.

A stream of water descended upon Wendell's head, soaking him to the skin. He held up the roses, but they provided only a negligible protection.

"In my opinion," shouted Aunt Minnie to Betty, who had gone back to the cabin trunk, "he's all wet! Put him out of your mind—forget him! The next time I see him I shall ignore him completely. Oh, what's that?"

The sound of a crash had reached her ears, and she ran into the drawing-room. Betty had dropped a bottle of scent, which had spilled its contents all over the carpet, and when her aunt appeared she was mopping up a perfumed pool with a towel.

"Oh, good heavens, the carpet! Here, give me that!" And Aunt Minnie snatched away the towel and went down on her knees. "They'll probably make us pay for this."

Wendell crept out from the shower, and peeped round the drawing-room doorway.

"Wendell!" cried Betty involuntarily, and immediately Aunt Minnie scrambled to her feet. She was about to blaze at the intruder when she became aware of his saturated condition.

"Is it raining?" she exclaimed.

"No," replied Wendell facetiously. "I perspire so freely."

"Stop dripping on my carpet!"

On a little desk beside him there was a blotting-pad. He deposited it on the carpet and stood upon it.

"Get off!" shouted Aunt Minnie angrily.

Wendell stepped off the blotting-pad and sank into a chair.

"Get up!"

Wendell got up, and Aunt Minnie, restoring the blotting-pad to the desk, pointed imperiously to the front door.

"Get out!"

Wendell retreated into the hall, and she followed him; but the sound of running water sent her scurrying into the bath-room. She dashed clean into the shower in order to turn off the water, and Wendell promptly darted back to the drawing-room doorway.

"I brought these for you," he said to Betty, holding out the dripping bunch of roses. "I've been crying on them because you're going away."

"Oh, thanks, Wendell!" said Betty, taking the flowers and smelling them appreciatively. "I do hate to leave you."

"Where are you going?" he inquired. "Abroad."

"Yes, but what part of abroad?"

"The answer," boomed the voice of Aunt Minnie close behind him, "is non-essential."

"Is that far?" asked Wendell, facing her almost boldly.

"Just far enough to escape pests like you! Now wriggle, you worm!"

"Oh, but auntie," began Betty, "he's —"

"Yes, auntie," began Wendell, "I'm —"

"Don't speak when I'm interrupting!"

Aunt Minnie snatched the bunch of roses from her niece's hands and thrust them into Wendell's. "How dare you breathe into this apartment?"

Wendell observed that Betty's aun was very wet, if not quite so wet as he was.

"You're dripping on your carpet!" he informed her.

"Imbecile! Don't you realise that Betty is too healthy to catch a germ like you? Don't stand there acting like a fool!"

"I'm not acting!" protested Wendell. "I just came to say good-bye!"

"You've said it—now get out! We'll have nothing to do with one of your ilk."

"I'm not an elk! You think that I can't make good, don't you? Well, I'll show you! I've already advertised in the papers for an opportunity to invest my money. Mark these words, and mark them well—I'll make my mark—I'll come through with a crash!"

He waved his arms dramatically as he spoke, and one of them came into violent contact with a vase on a slender table near the door. The vase was smashed to atoms, and Aunt Minnie straightway bundled him out into the hall, and opened the front door.

"Get—get——" she spluttered.

Wendell stepped meekly forth into the corridor, and the door was slammed behind him.

The Winning of a Crown.

NEXT morning Wendell, having bathed and breakfasted, was sitting at an ornate table in the lounge of his own elaborate apartment at the other end of Park Avenue when his manservant announced that two gentlemen had called to see him in answer to his advertisement.

Wendell, who was wearing a decorative dressing-gown, fastened the cord around his waist and told the manservant to show the callers into his presence.

They came—two obvious foreigners, but of distinguished appearance, smartly dressed in morning clothes with white waistcoats. One of them was carrying a large portfolio under his arm.

They bowed before him, and, at his request, seated themselves. It transpired that the name of one was Boris Andrieff, the name of the other Ricardo Valdez.

"We have read with great pleasure your advertisement in the papers," explained Boris, caressing his tiny black moustache.

"Yes," said Wendell. "Pretty good, wasn't it? I wrote it myself."

Boris and Ricardo bowed politely. Boris said, with a smile:

"We have for sale a revolution in the beautiful country of El Dorania."

"Eh?" exclaimed Wendell in astonishment. "El Dorania? A revolution?"

They nodded, for all the world as though both were actuated by a single spring. Wendell rubbed his chin, recently shaved, and stared at them.

"I want to produce something," he said. "Achieve something! Mean something!" He rose to his feet to make his words really impressive, and they rose with him. "A revolution! El Dorania! Tell me, if I bought this revolution, would it distinguish me?"

Boris looked at Ricardo, and Ricardo looked at Boris. Boris, who spoke English well enough, but with a decided accent, gestured and replied:

"That's just what it would do. You will depose the present monarch, King Oscar. Then you will automatically become king!"

King! A wonderful word! An incredible proposition!

"You mean," gasped Wendell, "that I'd have a crown and a sceptre—and—and everything?"

"Everything!"

Boris did not even trouble to point out that it was a sceptre, and not a sceptre that a monarch—metaphorically—wielded.

Wendell became elated. Revolutions, as he knew quite well, were of fairly frequent occurrence in El Dorania, and money, he had always been given to understand, could accomplish anything—except Aunt Minnie's approval of his suit. Surely even she would surrender unconditionally to a king!

"It will take a man of your force, your aggressiveness, your leadership," declared Boris, "to rattle the ancient bones of El Dorania."

He saluted; Ricardo saluted; Wendell saluted—and then Wendell sank down into his chair entranced and clasped his hands. Boris and Ricardo regarded one another significantly—it is to be feared that one of them even winked—and a discussion ensued—a discussion which reached a conclusion entirely satisfactory to all parties.

But neither Boris Andrieff nor Ricardo Valdez were aware of what was happening at the moment in El Dorania. The voyage between that diminutive but tempestuous kingdom and New York Harbour took six days—and in less than six days El Dorania could make (and also unmake) history.

In the evening of the day upon which Wendell signed his name to a magnificent-looking document produced from the portfolio Ricardo carried beneath his arm a remarkable American with the remarkable name of Zander Ulysses Parkhurst was at the royal palace in Caldera, capital of El Dorania, as the guest of King Oscar.

Zander Ulysses Parkhurst—usually known as "Zup" for short—parted his red hair in the middle, wore tortoiseshell rimmed spectacles, and smoked innumerable cigars. His nose was long, his face was longer, his self-assurance was enormous.

He had met the king at a café which that monarch patronised incognito, and the king—for his own purposes—had invited Zup to dine with him at the palace.

Zup went, only too delighted to go, because—as he himself informed Oscar—he was keen to see all the sights.

The dinner was an excellent one, and Zup did full justice to all the courses which were set before him by a variety of flunkies.

Afterwards there was a ball in the ball-room, which did not specially interest the thin-faced American, and in another spacious chamber the cream of El Doranian nobility and society played roulette, dice, and a variety of other gambling games.

King Oscar, seeing that Zup was bored with the dancing, led him away to this spacious apartment, and a golden-haired beauty in a gorgeous evening-frock, which vaguely suggested mourning, followed them.

Zup and the king lost a few hundred dollars at the roulette-table, then gravitated towards another table at which dice were being thrown. The courtiers of both sexes made room for their monarch and his friends, then crowded round to watch the play that followed between Zup and Oscar.

It seemed that luck, instead of merely smiling upon the American, laughed aloud that night. Every time he threw he beat the monarch's throw. He won, and won and won till the heat of the room, combined with the champagne he had swallowed and the success he achieved, made him a trifle light-headed.

"There you are, Oscar, old king!" he exclaimed triumphantly as he picked up an absolute bundle of El Doranian banknotes. "You know, I'm kinda glad I dropped into your little village. I think I'm going to like it here."

"Most extraordinary," said King

Oscar, smiling, in spite of his losses. "But I shall venture again."

"Yeah," nodded Zup, puffing at a cigar and waving the notes. "Go ahead and venture. Anything you like, from your regal shoes to the royal baking-powder!"

"Very well, then," decided Oscar. "I shall wager the royal timepiece." And from a pocket of his resplendent uniform he produced a watch.

"The royal timepiece, eh?" said Zup, examining the watch. "Oscar, you've got to lay off those bazaar boards. This thing won't go—for you, or with me!"

King Oscar looked mildly surprised and retrieved the watch. He made his way across the room and came back with a square box, which he opened. Inside the box a golden crown, studded with diamonds, reposed in a nest of purple velvet.

"'Tis a pretty thing," decided Zup, glancing at it. "What do you call that, Oscar—the El Doranian panama?"

"'Tis the Imperial Royal Crown of El Dorania," said Oscar indignantly.

"Quit your kiddin', Oscar, quit your kiddin'," laughed Zup. "How many cigarette coupons did you have to save for that?"

"Coupons?" breathed the king aghast, while a murmur ran round the assembly like the sound of wind in a corn-field. "Man, that came from two of the greatest jewellers in the world!"

"Okay!" responded Zup cheerfully. "Anything to help out a king friend of mine!"

He picked up the dice-box with one hand and extracted his cigar from his mouth with the other.

"Come, babies," he cooed, "show me those seven wonders of the world!"

He emptied the box on to the baize-covered table. Three double-sixes!

King Oscar took the dice-box—and threw a three, a four—and a one!

"There you are, Oscar," chortled Zup, helping himself to the crown. "Another forward pass!"

He put the crown upon his head in the casual manner in which a more ordinary person might have donned his bowler hat, and beamed at the man he had defeated.

"It will take a man of your force, your aggressiveness, your leadership," declared Boris, "to rattle the ancient bones of El Dorania."

"Hail the king! Hail the king!" cried the crowd of elegant men and women; and the golden-haired beauty in the gorgeous evening-frock looked smilingly up at Zup.

"Oscar," said that young man, "take a bow."

"Ah, but they mean you!" was the amazing reply.

"Me?" scoffed Zup. "Nix, Oscar! You wouldn't give a pal the run-around, would you?"

"It is the custom in El Dorania," replied the king calmly, "that whosoever wins the crown by fair means shall automatically become king."

Zup's eyebrows went up and his eyes opened widely, but it seemed evident that Oscar was in earnest—and Zup had heard things about this quaint little kingdom.

"In that case," he decided, "I shall automatically take a bow." And he bowed in all directions.

"Hail the king! Hail the king!" chorused the crowd, but it occurred to Zup that the hailing was a trifle lukewarm.

"Aw, come, come, come, boys!" he cried. "You're not hailing—you're just drizzling! Come on now—let's have some real hail! Shoot!"

He waved his arms as though conducting them and set the pace.

"Hail the king! Hail the king! King! King! King!"

They shouted with gusto, and, having shouted, applauded their own efforts.

"That's better—that's better!" approved Zup, shaking hands with those nearest to him. "Zander is my name—I'm to be your new king. Come around to the palace any old night and see me, will you, boys? How d'you do?"

"Congratulations!" cried a voice. And Zup, grinning broadly, moved about amongst his new subjects, shaking hands with them till his own hand ached.

Something Like a King!

OSCAR, leading aside the golden-haired girl, said to her in a low voice:

"He thinks he's beaten me with my own loaded dice—but 'tis I who have won, by relinquishing the crown and escaping assassination, Carlotta."

"Oscar," replied Carlotta, "you're much too smart to be a king!"

Oscar nodded, and was making for a doorway when a shabbily dressed and wild-eyed man came running at him from the direction of the grand staircase, a revolver in hand. The fellow fired, and an electric fitting against one of the walls fell to the floor in fragments.

Oscar staggered, clapped a hand to his side and collapsed. Confusion reigned.

The would-be assassin was seized; a stretcher was brought, and Oscar was borne away upon it. Zup, deserted by his new subjects, puffed thoughtfully at his cigar. Evidently it was not all joy to be King of El Dorania!

But Oscar, even as Carlotta had said, was much too smart to be a king. The would-be assassin was in his pay, the men who carried the stretcher were his friends. In an ante-room the stretcher was lowered and Oscar bounded up from it, consulting the watch which Zup had despised.

"I've got just twenty minutes to catch the boat for Vera Cruz," he said. "Where are the tickets?"

"Here they are, you lucky Majesty," laughed one of the stretcher-bearers,

September 12th, 1931.

and handed him a strip of tickets, while another produced a cloak. "The luggage is already on board."

"Thanks," said Oscar cheerfully. "Good-bye, boys—don't miss the assassination of the new king!"

He scurried out from the palace, and the golden-haired Carlotta, having watched him go, returned to the room in which Zup was now mounted on a chair in response to a general demand for a speech. Oscar's supposed demise troubled nobody.

"This is," began Zup, "this is—er—Zander Ulysses Parkhurst speaking. The initials are Z-U-P, so just call me Zup, folks. Z-U-P—Zup!"

He waved his cigar in the air and looked down with a smile at Carlotta, who had reached his side and was looking archly up at him.

"My thoughts," he went on, "go back to a little farmhouse in America—and while my thoughts are away I would like to make a few remarks. Fellow subjects, you now stand on the threshold of prosperity."

He stepped from the chair on to the table at which he had dined so successfully. "Gather in a little closer, friends," he urged. "Get on the threshold. That's fine! As King of El Dorania I shall stand behind every home, inside every bank. We will endeavour to make this a land of milk and honey."

He leant down to Carlotta's left ear and repeated, "Honey!" then continued:

"My dear friends, what more can I say? I want you to know that we are all for one, and I'm for all, and you for me, and me for you, and two for tea and tea for two, and—and—"

He found that he was holding one of Carlotta's hands without quite knowing how it had happened.

"Thank you, folks, thank you!" he said, and jumped down from the table.

The crowd, thus dismissed, streamed towards the doors, but Carlotta lingered. "Your Royal Highness is cute," she told him roguishly.

"Yeah!" drawled Zup. "Well, you're not so bad, either."

And he slipped his arm through hers and was led away by her out of the overheated room on to a noble terrace overlooking the harbour and the sea.

"Well," she said softly, as they stood beside the pillared parapet, "I hope your Majesty will have a long reign." "Don't worry, honey," returned Zup brightly, "this isn't going to be a reign—it's going to be a cloudburst!"

King Zup slept that night in the royal bed in the royal bedchamber with a couple of armed guards outside the two doors, and by the time he went to bed he had consumed so much champagne that he was unpleasantly reminded of the proverb "uneasy lies a head that wears a crown," for he had neglected to remove that structure of gold and precious stones!

Next morning, after dealing with sundry affairs of state which struck him as being of singular unimportance, he arrayed himself in a stylish uniform as commander-in-chief of the El Doranian army, and went for a stroll in the palace grounds, followed by a bodyguard of four soldiers with fixed bayonets.

By seeming accident he encountered Carlotta, dressed in black velvet, wearing widow's weeds. The bodyguard was dismissed and the two walked and talked.

"Your Majesty," said Carlotta, after a while, "will, of course, take unto himself a queen?"

"Well," said Zup cheerfully, "my Majesty hasn't thought much about that. I notice, however, that you have annexed yourself to the royal right arm."

"It's an old El Doranian custom," she told him demurely.

They sat together on a marble bench. "Tell me all about yourself, honey, tell me all about yourself," said Zup encouragingly.

"Well," said Carlotta, nestling closer, "I have been the bride of every king this country has had in the past year—all twelve of them!"

"All twelve of them?" echoed Zup. "You're not a wife—you're a calendar."

She laughed at that and held up her left hand, from which she had removed a glove. Her fingers were loaded with wedding-rings.

"You see these?" she said. "These are the wedding-rings of my late royal husbands."

"Your late royal husbands, eh? What a great time you must have had shopping for widow's weeds."

"I get so tired of the funerals; they're very dull."

"Yes," he nodded, "and from now on we ought to cut 'em out, honey—we ought to cut 'em out."

She projected her thumb in his direction.

"This space," she said, "is for you."

"Me? Thirteenth? I should say not. I don't want to break your luck."

"Oh, but have you never thought seriously of marriage?"

"Certainly. That's why I'm single."

"Haven't you ever been in love?"

"Twice; but I'm all right now." And he nudged her playfully.

The Lord Chamberlain had approached unnoticed. He addressed Zup in El Doranian, which was Greek to that American.

"He's full of atmospheric," complained Zup.

"What he says, your Majesty," explained Carlotta, "is that next week you will get your face on all the coins of the realm."

"Never mind about getting my face on 'em," said Zup. "What I want is to get my hands on 'em!"

Carlotta laughed heartily. This King was certainly different in every way from his predecessors!

A Shock for Aunt Minnie.

THAT day Aunt Minnie and Betty set out from New York harbour in a liner bound for various South American ports including that of Caldera, capital of El Dorania. The Atlantic was comparatively calm, the weather was excellent, but Aunt Minnie did not emerge from her state-room. She was seasick.

She continued to feel ill throughout the voyage, and south of Florida the heat added to her troubles. It seemed to Betty that she was always groaning—and nearly always sniffing at a bottle of smelling-salts.

On the morning of the sixth day she was huddled in a chair with a towel soaked in ice-water round her forehead and the inevitable bottle of smelling-salts in her hand. Beside her was a little table loaded with all manner of supposed cures for sea-sickness.

"Auntie," cried Betty, "you really must pull yourself together. We shall be landing soon."

"Why pull myself together?" demanded Aunt Minnie with a loud groan. "I'll only fall apart again. Got any more aspirin?"

"The whole six boxes are empty."

"Well, give me the boxes. Do something. Put another cold compress on my head. Oh-h-h!"

Betty removed the towel, soaked it in fresh ice-water, and restored it to the sufferer's head.

"We haven't been outside this state-room since we started the trip," she complained. "It's a gorgeous day. It's a shame to stay inside."

She moved across to a window overlooking the promenade deck, but her aunt's only response was a groan. She opened the window and leaned out of it.

In a deck chair just below the window Wendell was lounging, though not at his ease, and beside him stood Boris and Ricardo.

"And did your Majesty have breakfast?" inquired Boris solicitously.

"Yes—for a while," Wendell gloomily responded.

"Ah, but do not worry, your Majesty. Soon we shall have arrived in El Dorania."

"You mustn't call me 'Majesty' till I'm king," protested Wendell. "I'm just Wendell to you."

Boris bowed. Betty listened. She had known all the time that her lover was on board, but so far she had found it impossible to converse with him.

"Thank you, your Majesty," said Boris, "but you must at once begin declaring yourself king for the sake of the morale of the revolutionary cause."

"All right, if you say so," growled Wendell; "but as soon as we land I'm going straight to bed."

Boris looked at Ricardo and frowned.

"Oh, but, your Majesty, your subjects will probably wish to crown you immediately."

"Yes? Well, they won't—see?"

"Every time I think of that little shrimp," complained Aunt Minnie, flinging aside the wet towel, "my temperature goes up to two hundred and sixty. The sap! Mark my words and mark them all—I'll come through with a crash!"

Betty made no response to this outburst, for Boris and Ricardo were leaving Wendell to make arrangements about the landing.

"Wendell!" whispered Betty, leaning still further out of the state-room window.

"Sweetheart!" exclaimed Wendell, looking up.

"S-s-sh!"

"What are you doing here?" he whispered, moving close to her.

"I'm going to El Dorania—your Majesty."

"What d'you mean?"

"Oh, I heard what he said. You're a king! I just knew you'd turn out to be something like that!"

"Whether I'm king or not, you're my queen—and I love you so much it hurts."

"Yes—it hurts auntie!"

"Honey, I've simply got to talk to you!"

"Well, I can't come out, and you can't come in. If Aunt Minnie sees you there'll be a riot!"

She held out her hand to him, and he kissed it. But Aunt Minnie, from her chair, cried out indignantly:

"Stop hanging out over that ocean, with me in here dying!"

"Wait a minute," whispered Betty to Wendell. "I'll be right back."

She pulled a little curtain across the window and went back to her aunt.

"Here I am in the last stages of something-or-other," wailed the suffering lady, "and you hanging out of that window! What's the big attraction out there?"

"Something marvellous," replied Betty. "You'd go wild if you saw it."

"You and your romantic surprises!" scoffed Aunt Minnie, holding her head. "Let me see it!" And she rose uncertainly to her feet.

"Oh, auntie," Betty cried in alarm, "you don't have to see it!"

But Betty was pushed unceremoniously aside, and Aunt Minnie tottered resolutely across to the window, pulled aside the curtain, and thrust forth her head.

Wendell, eagerly awaiting Betty's return, did not pause to look. His arms swept round Aunt Minnie's neck, and his lips were crushed on hers.

"Oooh!" she howled; and Wendell shrank back.

"I—I didn't mean it!" he stammered. "Honest, I didn't mean it."

"Runt!" howled Aunt Minnie, almost murdering him with her eyes. "What are you doing on the same ocean with me?"

"I'm a king," he told her proudly. "You're a what?"

"Well, that is, I'm going to be a king. I told you I'd make good. I bought a revolution—and they're going to make me King of El Dorania."

Aunt Minnie disappeared from view, but the door of the state-room opened, and she came running out from it, her physical condition entirely forgotten, her sufferings overwhelmed with mental panic.

"Say that again!" she cried, standing threateningly over him.

"I'm going to be King of El Dorania."

"Oh!" she shrieked. "Oh, my plantations! My sugar! My wheat! My corn!"

"Got a corn?" inquired Wendell sympathetically.

While Betty peeped out at him round the curtain she raved and stormed at him.

"You miserable ninny!" she shouted. "You idiot! You interfering fool! You listen to me! I've given King Oscar two hundred thousand dollars to save my plantations! If you dare to set foot on El Doranian soil, King Oscar will have your head!"

She bounced back into the state-room, and while he stared blankly at the spot where she had stood the door was slammed and the window beside him was closed with a crash.

Rival Monarchs.

CALDERA possessed a natural harbour, formed by a narrow inlet from the ocean which opened into its bay. Liners called there seldom, and their coming was an event. As the vessel from New York steamed majestically into the bay, King Zup proceeded across the palace grounds to the waterfront to welcome it, and beside him walked Carlotta. To suit the occasion he was dressed as Admiral of the non-existent El Doranian fleet, with a cocked hat (such as Nelson might have worn) perched upon his head.

By seeming accident, he encountered Carlotta, dressed in black velvet, wearing widow's weeds.

The quay was crowded with men, women and children, and several Court functionaries were gathered together on the edge of its granito wall.

Behind Zup and Carlotta marched four flunkies, one carrying a large box of cigars, another carrying an automatic lighter, the third a cigar-cutter, the fourth an ash-tray. Not an old El Doranian custom this, but one that Zup himself had initiated.

"My Majesty would have a cigar," said Zup, turning to the box-carrier, "and remember, none of those fireproof stogies like you handed me yesterday."

The box was opened and presented, a cigar was selected; the flunkie with the cutter clipped off the end, the man with the trick lighter created a flame in which Zup ignited his smoke.

"I'll meet you in the billiards-room in half an hour," he said with a wave of dismissal. "Scram!"

The flunkies returned to the palace, and Zup and Carlotta went out through a gateway on to the quay and stood beside a gun-carriage, looking out across the bay at the liner which was being anchored there.

"On the level, Carlotta," said Zup, turning to his fair companion, "you're a jewel."

"And you, your Majesty," breathed Carlotta, "you are my pearl."

"Don't string me, honey—don't string me," he said, waving his cigar.

"And your Carlotta—is she attractive to you?"

"Attractive? Why, your eyes are like the heavens—your hair is a golden cascade—your cheeks are like luscious peaches—your lips are like ripened cherries—"

"Oh, your Majesty!" exclaimed Carlotta, delighted.

"Yes," said Zup. "If only you had money you'd be beautiful!"

He stepped backwards, chuckling, stumbled against the cannon and clutched at a lever.

The cannon, which had been loaded for the firing of a salvo, went off with a deafening roar, causing the crowd on the quay to jump violently and causing Zup to look anxiously down at his nether garments.

"Did you hear something rip?" he inquired.

"No," responded Carlotta, somewhat coldly. "It was only your little joke misfired!"

A boat had been lowered from the liner and the third mate escorted Aunt Minnie and Betty over the side and down the iron ladderway into it. The sailors were pulling sturdily towards the quay when Boris and Ricardo emerged with Wendell from his state-room, and a second boat was lowered from its davits.

"So this is my country?" said Wendell, gazing across at the crowded quay. "Yes, your Majesty," replied Boris, "and we will now go ashore and arrange your reception."

"Okay!" said Wendell. "You go first." And he followed them down the steps.

An outburst of cheering from the shore, intended for the boat which was drawing near the landing-steps, caused him to look round just as he was stepping into the waiting boat. He slipped and fell with a splash into the water, and after floundering about for some minutes was hauled on board by a sailor who also saved his straw hat. He was soaked to the skin, and looked anything but a monarch as he sat dripping in the stern.

Zup, standing on the quay with his ministers around him, thoughtfully contemplated Aunt Minnie and Betty as they were helped ashore. He turned to an enormous fellow in uniform, Baron Bogardus, General of the El Doranian Army, and maker and unmaker of monarchs.

"By the way, baron," he said, "who is this woman we're saluting?"

"Mrs. Minnie van Arden, the richest property owner of our country," was the reply.

"You don't say?" exclaimed Zup. "Stand by, then, baron, while I unbend to the lady."

He strode majestically forward, cigar in hand; but it was to Betty that he mistakenly addressed himself.

"How do you do? On behalf of the Chamber of Commerce of El Dorania, I wish to welcome you to our sun-kissed shores."

"Oh, thank you so much," said Betty. "Who are you, then?"

Zup drew himself up to his full height and waved the cigar.

"I am the king."

Aunt Minnie, who was gazing about her, turned and stared. Betty exclaimed:

"You the king? Impossible!"

"Why, Mrs. van Arden—"

"I'm not Mrs. van Arden! I'm Betty Harrington."

"Then," reproved Zup, "you've made a very grave error. Who is Mrs. van Arden?"

"Why, my Aunt Minnie—over there."

"How do, Aunt Min?" said Zup, striding across to that lady.

"And who might you be?" she inquired frigidly.

"Why, I am the king."

"I'm hysterical!" howled Aunt Minnie. "Why isn't King Oscar here to greet me? If you're a king, I'm an ostrich!"

"Enough of this!" cried Zup disgustedly, and he turned commandingly to his congregated subjects. "Crowd up, men! It's time to hail!"

"Hail the king! Hail the king! King! King! King!" From hundreds of throats came the acclamation, and Zup grinned triumphantly at the flabbergasted property owner.

"You're an ostrich!" he informed her.

Aunt Minnie seized her niece by the arm and dragged her away.

"You come with me!" she snapped.

They entered a waiting carriage, and were being driven off to Caldera's principal hotel when Wendell climbed out of the second boat on to the quay, with the assistance of Boris and Ricardo.

Baron Bogardus immediately strode forward to greet the two immaculate emissaries, and Wendell stood wringing the water out of his garments.

"Well, Boris," said the baron, "then you have brought another one?"

"Yes, my general," Boris replied. "What they call in America, 'A live one.'"

"How much did he pay for my revolution?"

"One hundred thousand dollars."

"One hun— Why, the last time you sold the revolution it was for only fifty thousand!"

Zup, puffing at his cigar, caught sight of Wendell and moved over to him.

"Come up to the house and use our wringer," he said facetiously, tapping him on the shoulder.

Wendell swung round—and gaped.

Zup gaped.

"Zup!" cried Wendell.

"Wendell!" cried Zup.

They clasped hands.

"Well, well, well!" exclaimed Zup.

"How've you been?" inquired Wendell.

"Well. And you?"

"Well, I—"

"I know—you haven't been well! Ha, ha, ha!"

"This seems like old times," rejoiced Wendell.

"Yes, sir," boomed Zup. "Good old Brooklyn—good old Brooklyn! D'you know I haven't seen you since you fell into that half-million. What a fall! What a fall! But let me warn you, son—there are a lot of crooks around here."

Wendell sneezed, then laughed.

"Don't worry about me," he said.

"I've made a great investment. I've come down here to run this place. I'm the King of El Dorania."

"You—you—you're the king? There must be a slight mistake! I'm the king!"

"Zup, I cross my heart—I'm the king!"

"I reiterate for the sake of emphasis," exploded Zup. "I'm the king!"

"We'll see about this!" cried Wendell, losing his temper.

"Yes," said the voice of the enormous baron, close beside them, "we shall certainly see about this!"

"Whose side are you on?" demanded Wendell.

"Yours, your Majesty. I am Baron Bogardus, commanding the revolutionary forces."

He turned to Zup.

"This gentleman," he said fiercely, "has bought the revolution, and automatically becomes king. If his authority is questioned, we will settle the matter on the battlefield!"

"Don't be a sap!" expostulated Zup. "I'm the Royal Highness of this joint—and if there's any trouble I've got a standing army that won't sit down."

"Come with me," said the baron to both of them. "I'll show you, Mister Zup, just how perilous your position is!"

A Battle Postponed.

THE baron led the way with gigantic strides, and it was only by breaking into a sort of jog-trot that Wendell and Zup managed to keep up with him.

He plunged into a big building, situated in Caldera's principal street and facing the palace, and he mounted a flight of stairs and threw open the door of a room.

"I'm going to show you," he said to Zup, "that you haven't a chance to cope with King Wendell."

Large maps hung upon the walls of the room, but the baron went straight over to a huge table, the top of which was covered with a papier-mâché model representing the kingdom of El Dorania, complete with rivers, roads and mountains. Ranged on either side of the model were a number of lead soldiers!

"Here is the battlefield," said the baron with a sweep of his hand.

Zup blinked, and Wendell—in spite of his wet clothes and a tendency to sneeze his head off—felt inclined to laugh. But the baron was obviously in earnest. He made Zup stand on one side of the table and Wendell on the other.

"This is your army," he told Zup, indicating the toy soldiers on his side. "And this"—jerking a thumb at the leaden warriors on the other side, "is your army, your Majesty."

"What's this—a game?" inquired Zup indignantly.

"Not at all," retorted the baron. "It cost so much to keep real soldiers in training that the royal army was disbanded twelve kings ago."

"But the revolutionary army——" began Wendell.

"The battles of the last eleven kings," interrupted the baron, "have been fought on this table. It saves needless bloodshed!"

Zup picked up a fallen soldier on his side of the table.

"This man is drunk!" he exclaimed humorously, and sniffed. "Son, you've got to stop drinking that hair tonic! Get in the guard-house and sleep it off."

"Here," said the baron, jabbing a finger at a collection of miniature buildings on Zup's side of the table, "is the town of Azazaz."

"Serves it right," retorted the irrepressible Zup.

"And here," pursued the baron, jabbing a finger of his other hand at a collection of tiny buildings on Wendell's side, "is the town of Eep. From Eep to Azazaz is twenty miles as the crow flies."

"My, my!" murmured Zup. "Twenty miles as the fly crows."

"No," mis-corrected Wendell, "twenty miles as the cry flows."

"I hope I can control my nasty temper!" cried Zup indignantly.

"Listen, youth—absorb this! It isn't 'cry flows,' it's twenty miles as the flow cries."

"Bah!" thundered the baron. "I've had enough of this. I'll not be annoyed by two men who can't say a simple sentence like 'Twenty miles as the—as the fly flows.'"

"Please yourself," responded Zup. "Fight your own battle!" bellowed the baron, and went out and banged the door.

"Now we're getting together," said Zup with an air of relief. "This, as you will already have surmised, Wendell, is a comic kingdom. Shall we fight?"

"I'd sooner change my clothes. We'll have the battle on—er—well, say Monday."

"No," said Zup, shaking his head emphatically. "Monday is a holiday, celebrating the death of King Louis."

"How about Tuesday?"

"Fine! We'll have the battle on Tuesday."

"You might just as well go back to New York."

"Not me! I'm the king!"

"No. I'm the king!"

The argument might have continued indefinitely, only Wendell began to shiver violently and to feel that he didn't much care whether he was king or not so long as he had a hot bath and a change of clothes. So the argument was suspended, and Zup marched his chum across to the palace, where a chill was averted, and the two subsequently sat down to a meal they thoroughly enjoyed, the question of kingship having been shelved.

That afternoon the royal minstrels were playing in the palace grounds as Wendell sat by himself in a marble seat beneath a spreading palm, gloomily occupied with his thoughts.

Aunt Minnie, elaborately gowned, descended the stone steps from the palace, with Betty beside her.

Aunt Minnie was seeking the Baron Bogardus, to obtain from him a definite statement as to the affairs of El Dorania and the well-being of her plantations. She had not found him in the palace, and for this circumstance—as for all other disagreeable circumstances—she held Wendell largely responsible.

"Wendell Graham!" she exploded on the steps. "A fine specimen for a zoo! I told him an hour ago that you wanted nothing more to do with him."

"But, auntie," expostulated Betty, "we're engaged!"

"No, you're not! I've made up your mind for you on that point. And if I find you two together again, I'll pull his ears and throw him out! You stay here! I'm going to find that baron, wherever he's hiding!"

The bottom of the steps had been reached, and Aunt Minnie stalked off along a curving path and was lost to sight. Betty, with a sigh, seated herself on the bottom step.

Wendell crept over to her, seated himself beside her.

"I heard what she said," he told her miserably. "Honey, I guess we'll never be married."

"Don't worry, Wendell," she urged. "Everything'll turn out all right. You know, they say 'all the world loves a lover'."

"All the world except Aunt Minnie!" He held her hand, and if sadness was in his soul, at least the sound of romantic music was in his ears. She snuggled against him.

"Hear that music?" he said, after a while. "Let's dance! Come on!"

"I don't feel like dancing," she declared, but he coaxed her to her feet, and they began to dance a tango all about the broad expanse of paving at the bottom of the steps.

Both had forgotten their misery in the joy of dancing together when Aunt Minnie, who had failed to find the baron, reapproached the steps. She glared, rushed forward, and stamped viciously on one of Wendell's feet.

He swung round and saw her, and promptly stamped on one of hers. She stamped back, but it was the toe of Betty's left shoe that was caught beneath her heel.

Betty cried out with pain, stared at her angry aunt, and stamped back, then limped away up the steps, with tears in her eyes.

Regrettable as it may sound, Wendell straightway kicked out at Aunt Minnie's ankles, and flew upwards after Betty, and Aunt Minnie, groaning loudly, tried to follow, but fell sideways and rolled down again.

Wendell Wins a Gun.

THE court official who had assured Aunt Minnie that Baron Bogardus was not in the palace had lied to her, but that was not the official's fault. The baron had given him instructions.

"I win!" exulted Wendell. "I win! Look! Don't I win?"

Aunt Minnie's affairs could wait, but this question of kingship was urgent. It had been reported to the baron that Zup and Wendell had lunched together in perfect amity, and a close inspection of the remarkable table in the War Office had revealed only too plainly the fact that no battle had as yet been fought.

To deal with the situation the baron had repaired to the council chamber of the palace, whither he had summoned his two trusted agents, Boris and Ricardo.

"Our duty is clear," he decided after considerable discussion with them. "We must assassinate King Zup! He has provided the country with nothing but his own preposterous self, and he won the crown from King Oscar with a mere fortuitous throw of dice."

"Let us draw straws," suggested Boris, "to see who shall have the honour of eradicating him."

The baron laughed approvingly.

"'Tis a good idea," he said, "but we must not be selfish. We must let King Wendell have a chance at the drawing. I'll go and get him."

He picked up his military hat, jabbed it on his head, and went out.

Boris grinned at Ricardo, and Ricardo moved across the chamber to a desk, from a drawer of which he took four straws of equal length. Solemnly he broke pieces off three of them, so that their lengths varied.

A clock on a marble mantelpiece ticked away several minutes, and then the door opened, and the baron led Wendell into the room and up to the table, beside which Boris and Ricardo were patiently standing.

"The grand drawing," boomed the baron, "will now take place, and King Wendell will participate."

Wendell was puzzled, but not displeased.

"You know," he cried, "I've never won anything in my whole life, though once I almost won a turkey—in Brooklyn."

"This time you may win something," the baron declared. "The straws, Boris!"

Boris presented the straws, only their ends projecting from his closed hand.

"The short straw will win," explained the baron. "Draw!"

Wendell drew a straw, the baron drew a straw, Ricardo drew a straw, and the fourth was left in Boris' hand. They held them out, comparing lengths.

"I win!" exclaimed Wendell. "I win! Look! Don't I win?" He laughed loudly.

Undoubtedly his was by far the shortest straw.

The others nodded solemnly.

"That's the first time I ever won!" cried Wendell.

"Your Majesty is a very lucky fellow," said the baron.

"I certainly am. But what do I win? What do I—"

He broke off, to stare aghast at a large and formidable six-shooter which Ricardo was offering him by its barrel.

"B-but I—I can't carry this," he exclaimed. "I haven't got a licence."

"You don't need a licence," said the baron cheerfully. "You're the king."

"Yes, but I—I haven't any use for a gun."

"You haven't? Then how do you expect to kill King Zup?"

"K-kill Zup?" faltered Wendell.

"But I don't expect to kill him! He's a pal of mine."

He backed nervously towards the door, leaving the weapon still in Ricardo's hand, but Ricardo reversed it and pulled the trigger just as Wendell was opening the door. A shot rang out alarmingly, and a large vase fell in fragments from its pedestal just beside him. Wendell shivered with fear.

"Were you t-trying to attract my at-t-tention?" he stammered.

"I forgot to tell you," said the baron, snatching the gun from Ricardo and striding with it towards the terrified young man, "that if you refuse to kill King Zup I'll be glad to do it, but I shall have to kill you first! It's an old El Doranian custom."

The gun pointed, a finger was on its trigger.

"W-well, now you see, baron—er—I never did care much about traditions," shivered Wendell, "so we'll just let this one go by, eh? I'll be seeing you again."

"Stop!" roared the baron. "Where is your heart?"

"Betty has it. I—I—"

"Come here!"

Wendell tottered towards the mighty baron, shaking in every limb.

"It—it isn't really necessary to shoot me, baron," he said hoarsely. "I—I'm leaving here on the first."

"The first of what?"

"The first chance I get."

"Will you stand still?" barked the baron.

"You—you're getting serious about it, aren't you? I w-was only just kidding." He essayed a feeble laugh. "J-just tell me who you want me to shoot, and—and the why, and the when, and the w-where."

The baron lowered the gun.

"The why," he said sternly, "is because he is an insurgent and he threatens your throne. The where is at dinner, and the when is to-day."

Ho thrust the weapon into Wendell's quivering right hand and bundled him out of the room.

Aunt Minnie and Betty by this time had left the palace and returned to their hotel. Wendell, in a state of mind that baffles description, retired to his own royal apartments. Fortunately—or otherwise—there was not very long to wait for dinner.

Zup had been out for a drive with the golden-haired Carlotta during the afternoon, trying to believe that he was still a monarch, and trying not to dislike Wendell for butting in. But the populace had shown no great enthusiasm in the streets, and even Carlotta had seemed less demonstrative than usual.

On returning to the palace he amused himself by making further investigations into the royal wardrobe. He discovered a kilted uniform he had not as yet worn. It had fitted the ex-King Oscar when that fugitive monarch had created the Scottish El Doranian Guards and appointed himself their commander-in-chief—and dressed all four of them in somewhat similar garb, and Zup found that it fitted him none too badly. He decided to wear it for dinner.

Behold him, therefore, seated at table in the vast banquetting chamber close beside Wendell, and wearing four decorations on his tunic which meant nothing to him except added ornament.

"A cordial welcome," said Wendell, hiding the big six-shooter beneath his serviette.

"And a welcome cordial," quoth Zup, helping himself to a glass of wine. "Waiter!"

One of four gorgeous flunkeys approached his chair.

"How about my Majesty having the table of contents?" asked Zup.

"There's no menu," Wendell informed him, "but you can have anything you wish."

"Thanks," said Zup, and ordered some lobster, which was brought. The meal progressed and was nearly over when the gun fell from between Wendell's knees to the gorgeous carpet. He picked it up in haste and rammed it into the breast-pocket of his coat, but Zup had seen, and Zup, considerably surprised, inquired:

"What are you toting that revolver around for?"

"Well, you see," said Wendell unhappily, "I—I've got to shoot a fellow."

"Huh! Is that all?" said Zup airily.

"What's the best way to go about it?"

"Well, if you want to shoot a man and have him really enjoy it, always give him a good square meal first."

"That's just the system I'm following right now."

"Eh?" cried Zup, sitting bolt upright in his chair. "What was that last crack you made?"

"I said that's just what I'm doing—I'm giving you the best meal I can."

"Are you sitting there trying to tell me that you're going to put me on the spot?" howled Zup incredulously.

"Gee, pal, but I hate to do it," lamented Wendell, drawing the gun from his pocket. "But if I don't shoot you, I'll be shot."

"So you think more of yourself than you do of me, eh? I always knew you were conceited."

"Well, you'd be assassinated, anyway," Wendell assured him. "And I've got to live for Betty."

He rose to his feet with the gun in his hand, and he pushed back his chair. Zup looked down with distaste at his plate and rose, too, absent-mindedly thrusting a cigar between his lips.

"Boy," he said, patting Wendell affectionately on the shoulder, "you're in a jam! You know, I'm not so hungry as I thought I was!"

"No," growled Wendell. "And I never thought I was hungry. Stand still!"

He jabbed the barrel of the gun against a golden star on Zup's breast, over his heart, and he averted his face and held up his left hand to screen it.

Zup put his fingers in his ears, declaring tremulously that he never had liked the sound of firearms.

A nerveless finger trembled against the trigger but could not pull. Zup removed his fingers from his ears, pushed aside the gun, and caught Wendell by the arm.

"Boy, you are in a jam!" he exclaimed. "Let's take the air, and maybe we can figure a way out of this."

They went out from the banquetting chamber together, arm in arm, but their state of mind was such that instead of making their way into the grounds they descended the wrong flight of stairs, pushed open a door and found themselves above stone steps leading down into the royal cellar.

They blundered down into semi-darkness and stood blinking at one another. Then:

"Say, what is this?" exclaimed Wendell. "A brewery?"

There were shelves on two of the walls—shelves loaded with baskets and bottles; there were bottles in bins; there were at least a dozen barrels on wooden stands, some large, some small, all fitted with taps. On the flagstoned floor stood a rough table and several stools.

"This is one of our six best cellars, my boy," declared Zup, recognising the subterranean retreat. "As good old Caesar said, 'All roads lead to rum.'" The projected assassination temporarily forgotten, they prowled about among the bottles and barrels, and Zup presently pointed to a little barrel on which was chalked: "Napoleon Brandy, 100 years old." "A hundred years old!" breathed Wendell almost in worship. "How could they let it live that long?"

The Baron Decides.

HAVING discovered the Napoleon brandy it was perhaps only natural that they should decide to sample it. They found it remarkably palatable and potent. They sampled it again and again.

They became a trifle incoherent in their speech, but re-cemented their friendship.

"Who is this big four-flusher Baron Bogardus, anyway?" scoffed Zup.

"I'm glad you brought the matter of that pup up, Zup," said Wendell.

"What? Who? Which?"

"Pup—Zup."

"All right. Now where's this guy Bogardus going to get off, trying to put me on the spot?"

Wendell waved the drinking-cup which was in his right hand.

"I'll lead with my left," he said, "sock him with my right, and you can rub him off the floor with a darned big eraser."

Now Baron Bogardus had been informed by the royal servants that the rival kings had departed from the banquetting chamber, leaving their meal unfinished. He had been informed, also, that no shooting had taken place. He set out to find the pair, and having searched the grounds he returned to the palace.

The open door above the cellar attracted his attention and the sound of voices reached his ears from below. He crept stealthily down the stone steps.

"Now wait a minute, wait a minute," said Zup, quaffing Napoleon brandy.

"What you say's all very well, but I think I know better how to handle him. The last man I hit they arrested ten miles away—for flying without a licence."

Wendell laughed.

"You know what I'm goin' to do—when I see him?" he inquired thickly.

"I'm goin' to say, 'Hallo, Fishface!'"

"Oh, that's perfect!" chuckled Zup.

"Perfect! But lemme—let me call him fishface, will you? I'd like to!"

"No, I'm gonna call him fishface."

"No I wanta—"

"I thought of it first—I'm going to call him Fishface."

"All right, then. But when I see that big hunk of cheese—why, I'm goin' to walk right up to him—like this—and I'm goin' to say to him—"

Zup was lurching across to Wendell with a truculent air appropriate to the humiliation of a detestable baron. But he stopped short, and his eyes widened, and his jaw dropped, for the baron had now descended the last step and was towering over him.

"I'll see you later," gasped Zup, and would have scrambled up the steps in his panic, had not a massive paw shot out and dragged him back.

"What were you going to call me?" roared the baron.

"Fishface!" cried Wendell, whose back was turned to both of them.

"No, no!" cried Zup, and whistled warningly. "The baron!"

Wendell turned, went very white, and spilled a quantity of precious brandy.

"Why haven't you been assassinated?" demanded the baron, giving Zup a push that sent him staggering backwards against the table. And: "Why didn't you shoot him?" he bellowed, swinging round on Wendell.

"He—he's wearing my shirt," lied Wendell fearfully.

"Yeah, I got his shirt on," said Zup.

"My spies are everywhere," the baron roared. "Escape is impossible. You, king Zup, shall die!"

"Oh, but listen, baron—"

"You shall die! That's final!"

"Yeah," persisted Zup. "I—I got that point all right, but here's the—the thing I don't like about it. I don't like this shooting business. Never did! Surely there must be some clever modern way of bumping me off?"

The baron scowled and thought.

"A more modern way, eh?" he jeered.

"Well, you shall have it! What is the newest thing in science?"

"Einstein's theory about relatives," suggested Zup.

"No," said the baron.

"No?"

"No—the aeroplane."

"The aeroplane?" echoed Wendell.

"Yes. To-morrow we shall declare a holiday. There will be a ceremony—and some time during that ceremony a bomb will be dropped on you from an aeroplane."

"On me?" gasped Zup. "A bomb?"

"A bomb?" shivered Wendell.

"Yes!" cried the baron triumphantly. "It will be new—it will be novel. It will be remembered for years."

"Yes," groaned Zup, "but not by me."

"Oh, you—"

And the baron turned contemptuously on his heel and went up out of the cellar.

Wendell and Zup looked at one another in silence for a while.

"Well, that's all settled," said Wendell, finally. "You won't have anything to worry about now."

A black cat came out from the shadows beyond the barrels to rub its head against Zup's legs; but in the circumstances Zup was not prepared to believe that this portended good luck for him.

Wine was dripping from a tap of a barrel into a pan beneath it, and the cat, having made a fuss of Zup in vain, went over to the pan and lapped at its contents. The two unhappy monarchs stood watching curiously; they had never seen a cat drink wine before.

Presently the animal reeled, rolled over on its back, and pawed the air.

"Careful!" exclaimed Wendell, backing hastily away. "Don't let him kick you!"

Assassination Day.

THAT night criers were sent out into the streets to announce that the next day would be a public holiday, and the news was broadcast by radio all over the kingdom. "Assassination Day" became the topic of the hour.

By morning posters containing full details were to be seen everywhere, and the State Railway ran excursions from every corner of the little country to its capital.

By ten o'clock the royal park was crowded with people who had paid to enter it; flags and banners waved in the streets, and a military band paraded the city and marched proudly into the park, playing the El Doranian national anthem.

Trees were few in the park, and seats fewer. Two enterprising tradesmen made a small fortune by selling footstools and cushions to those who wanted to sit down. Refreshment stalls and booths sprang up like mushrooms all round the rails, but—by the baron's orders—the great central space of gravel paths and velvet lawns was kept clear.

"Rejoice, son, rejoice!" boomed Zup. "I am rejoicing," declared Wendell, September 12th, 1931.

Where two paths intersected, an elaborate throne had been placed—for Zup's benefit. On the palace side of the park a small grandstand had been erected (in the small hours of the morning) to provide members of the royal court and men and women of high social standing with a complete view of the proceedings.

At ten-thirty Zup descended the stone steps from the palace, arrayed in military uniform and a plumed helmet, carrying a gold-mounted cane, smoking a cigar, and trying to look cheerful. Behind him marched four soldiers and a young officer, full of importance.

"Squad—right! March!" cried this officer at the foot of the steps.

Carlotta came running up to Zup, appropriately dressed all in black.

"Squad—halt!" howled the officer.

"Ah, there you are, you little dumpling," said Zup.

"Your Majesty," exclaimed Carlotta, wiping away a tear, "I am sad."

"I don't blame you, honey," responded Zup. "This is going to be pretty tough on you."

"You'll be missed!"

"I hope so," said Zup, but without conviction.

"Your Majesty," said the officer, saluting, "the royal bomb chair awaits you."

"Thank you, my man, thank you," Zup answered, returning the salute, and then, whimsically to Carlotta:

"You know, I don't want to be late for this," he declared. "They tell me the house is nearly sold out."

"Be brave, your Majesty," wept Carlotta, "be brave. Promise me you won't go to pieces."

"That's up to the aviator," remarked Zup gloomily. "Come, men!"

"Forward—march!" barked the officer.

Carlotta moved away; Zup and his guardians marched on—and a thousand pairs of eyes were focused on them.

But as they approached the drive out of which opened the path that led to the waiting throne, Wendell stepped forward and beckoned.

He was neatly dressed in a light grey suit and was wearing a grey top-hat. He seemed to be bursting with eagerness, and Zup turned towards him.

"Guard—halt!" cried the officer. And the four soldiers stopped short, while Zup went on to meet his chum.

"What's the matter?" he inquired.

Wendell made signs that he did not want to be overheard by the guard, and Zup promptly waved his arm and cried out:

"Hi! Army—reverse!"

The soldiers turned about.

"Now what is it?"

"Boy," said Wendell excitedly, "have I got good news for you?"

"I suppose," growled Zup, "you're going to tell me that you've thought of a more enjoyable way of bumping me off?"

"No—no! Listen, Zup! I've been up most of the night taking out the caps that make the bombs explode!"

"Wait a minute—wait a minute!" said Zup incredulously. "You mean to tell me that the bombs won't explode?"

"They can't explode now!"

"Oh, well!" Zup drew a long and quivering sigh of relief. "Then I can speak freely." He held out his hand, which Wendell grasped and shook.

"What a pal! What a pal!"

On one of the lawns, far across the park, an aeroplane was resting, ready for flight. Its pilot, a cross-eyed man in overalls, was tinkering with a number of elongated bombs which he was attaching to a contrivance over the under-carriage. Baron Bogardus made his way heavily across to the machine.

"Is everything ready?" he demanded harshly.

"Sure!" replied the cross-eyed pilot. "Everything!"

"Look me in the eyes when you speak to me!" rasped the baron.

The pilot stood up and faced him, but his double squint prevented him from obeying the command in full. He scrambled over the side of the machine into the cockpit and leaned down.

"Lovely day for the assassination," he observed.

"How do you feel—pretty steady?" inquired the baron.

"No—rather shaky. I've been up half the night, putting back the caps so the bombs can explode!"

"Very good, my man—very good!" boomed the baron, and pointed to the distant throne. "There's your objective—King Zup will sit on that. And don't drop any of your bombs on the crowd!"

The baron strode away along the paths to one of the walls of the palace beneath which Boris and Ricardo were awaiting him. Two mechanics stood by the aeroplane, ready to swing the propeller.

The band, which had lapsed into silence, struck up the national anthem again as Zup and Wendell marched together in front of the four soldiers and the officer in the direction of the throne. The spectators waved and shouted; the throne was reached.

Wendell helped Zup into it, but Zup stood on its little dais and raised his cane—and thereupon a man in front of the little grandstand put a megaphone to his mouth and yelled:

"Now, boys, come on! Let's give a big shout for the king!"

The baron was annoyed. This interruption was not on the official programmes. But there came a tremendous roar from the grandstand.

"Rah! Rah! Rah! Siss—Boom—Bah! Rickety Rex! Rickety Rex! Rickety Rup—King Zup! King Zup! King Zup! Hooray!"

As if by magic huge cards were raised on high, spelling the word "Zup." And Zup bowed from his throne, or bomb chair.

Baron Bogardus was furious—and a little scared. Evidently Zup had far more friends than he had imagined. A dangerous fellow! Given a few more days, he might even have brought about the baron's own downfall!

He barked at Boris, and Boris waved a signal for the aeroplane to ascend. The engines roared, the propeller began to revolve, the machine went rushing across the grass on its wheels, then took off, skimmed just over the top of some bushes, circled and rose higher.

"Everyone out of the danger zone!" shouted Boris at the top of his voice, and the man with the megaphone heard, and took up the cry.

Immediately there was a stampede for safety, and the park was ringed with spectators, leaving the heart of it empty, save for Zup on his throne, and Wendell, lingering beside him.

"Zup," said Wendell gleefully, "you're getting another break! Guess who is going to be the aviator that drops the bombs!"

"Who?" asked Zup, puffing at his cigar.

"You remember cross-eyed Ben?"

"Old cross-eyed Ben?" exclaimed Zup.

"You mean that? Why, I knew him in Brooklyn!"

"Is he really cock-eyed, or does he just look that way?"

"Is he cock-eyed?" repeated Zup.

"Why he's so cock-eyed that he spent three years in the south-east trying to join the North-West Mounted Police!"

Wendell chuckled, and clapped his chum on the back.

"Look," he said, pointing, "the plane has taken the air."

"Take the air yourself, pal," recommended Zup. "This is the danger zone!"

They shook hands and parted, and Wendell made his way slowly towards the spot where the baron, Boris, Ricardo, and the soldiers were standing, pulling out a handkerchief as he went and pretending to shed tears into it.

The Final Bomb.

ALL round the park workmen were closing gaps in a ring of barbed wire erected to keep impetuous sightseers from venturing into danger.

Wendell, looking back at the lonely Zup, blundered clean into a patch of it, and was trying to extricate himself when the first bomb fell.

It exploded in the middle of a path about a hundred yards from Zup—exploded with a tremendous noise. A black cloud rose up into the air, and dust and stones were showered in all directions.

Wendell, still more entangled with the barbed wire by the force of the explosion, looked wildly towards the throne and shouted:

"I think I must have forgotten to take the cap out of that one!"

Zup had removed his cigar from his mouth in alarm as the bomb went off, but it hadn't fallen near him, so he restored the cigar and puffed vigorously.

"Boy," he called back, "this kills me!"

Two more bombs fell in rapid succession, while Ben, the cross-eyed aviator, circled above his intended victim. Zup stepped in haste from his throne as the first one exploded—perilously near the grandstand—then darted back to it as the second whined and burst right ahead of him.

"You must have forgotten to take the cap out of that one, too!" he shouted.

Wendell's clothes had become a wreck, and so had his hat, in his frenzied efforts to free himself from the barbed wire. Blood was trickling down his cheeks and arms—and now Ben, in his machine, was swooping lower.

Another bomb droned earthwards, buried itself in the ground, and exploded. A column of smoke and dirt arose—and the dirt descended. But as the air cleared it was seen that Zup was running back to the throne he had deserted and was unhurt. All round the park the spectators began to boo.

Ben, swooping low, released another bomb, and this one exploded so near Wendell that he was flung clear of the entanglement, but with barbed wire festooned all about him. He stared as he raised himself to his knees. Zup was sitting calmly on his throne, but the grandstand had collapsed, and men and women were crawling from the wreckage.

The baron danced with rage; after all, there was little else he could do without risking his life—a thing he wouldn't dream of doing on purpose!

Yet another bomb fell, but this one did not explode. Evidently Ben had not restored its cap.

It struck the path immediately in front of Zup's legs, bounced, rolled, and came to rest almost beneath his feet, its fuse sizzling.

Eastern gunmen, in the guise of capitalists, come to a Western ranch. Within a few weeks the finding of gold starts a war between the gunmen and a band of fearless men of the plains.

Gun Smoke

STARRING
RICHARD ARLEN
AND MARY BRIAN.

Welcome to Bunsen!

AN express train roared its way across the plateau of Wyoming, on its long journey to Seattle in the far north-west of the United States. Around a table in one carriage sat five men, well-dressed and, to all appearance, prosperous citizens of that great nation which stretches across America from Atlantic to Pacific. A tall, stern-looking man, about thirty-five years of age, was obviously the most important member of the party, and the others paid marked attention to everything he said.

"Seen this, boys?" he remarked. "Listen!"

From a newspaper in his hand he began to read. "Gang War Rages! Kedge Darvis, New King of the Underworld. His chief rival shot dead. Where are our police?"

"That's the most important news of the day. And the editor hands it out to the police good and strong."

The company laughed heartily, for the man who had read the glaring headlines from the newspaper was Kedge Darvis himself, and the others were the chief members of his gang.

"Just as well we moved out for a while," said "Spot" Skee, Kedge's right-hand man. "I reckon the excitement will be all over in a week or two, and, anyway, the cops won't put you in the chair this time."

"Me? You mean yourself, I guess, Spot," remarked Darvis. "You shot him."

"Anything you say, Kedge," grinned Spot. "I shot him, if you say so!"

"Can all that!" snapped Darvis, taking up another newspaper. "Now, boys, see here—an advertisement from the leading citizens of the rising city of Bunsen, Idaho. Ever heard of Bunsen?" "No!" cried the gangsters in chorus. "Nor I," said Darvis. "It's one of those little places in the West they try to boost as great cities. I reckon."

"Well, what about it?" asked Spot. "The advertisement says the citizens of Bunsen will welcome visitors, and will give concessions to capitalists. Now, that's us!"

"But we ain't capitalists, Kedge!" protested a gangster.

"We are capitalists, if I say so!" snapped Darvis, glaring angrily at his followers.

"Okay, Kedge," said Spot. "We're capitalists, sure, and what next?"

"I'm sending a telegram from the next station to the Mayor of Bunsen, saying that Darvis and friends, capitalists from the East, will arrive in his city this evening. We'll spend our vacation there."

"Think they'll have heard your name?" asked a gangster doubtfully.

"Heard my name? Heard of anything that's going on outside their own county, or the State of Idaho at the most? Not they! You don't know these Western States—they're out of date. Never heard the word gangster, very likely. You boys will be quite the 'gentlemen from the East' till I give the word."

"We may find nothing worth doing in a place like that," remarked Spot.

"Sure we may. Then we can go back East when the excitement there is over, can't we? But even Bunsen will have a bank and a few rich men. And I figure that Bunsen will want more capital when we've gone than it did before we came!"

The gangsters grinned at the idea of opening the eyes of the poor niftis at Bunsen, and Darvis duly sent his telegram when the train stopped again. The result of that message over the wires surprised even him, for when, some hours later, the train drew up at Bunsen, the town was apparently en fête. Flags and streamers decorated the station, and seemingly the whole population of Bunsen had assembled there.

Darvis got out and looked unconcernedly at the crowd. His followers grinned openly, until a sharp look from their leader set their faces into a look of rigid solemnity, just as John K. Horton, the Mayor of Bunsen, came forward to greet the "capitalists" from the East.

"Mr. Darvis?" he inquired. "Welcome to the city of Bunsen."

They shook hands, and a little girl came up with a bunch of flowers.

"I—I—" she stammered nervously. "Well—here's some flowers for you!"

Darvis took the bouquet amidst the irrepressible grins of his men, and the mayor then formed a procession to escort the distinguished visitors to the hotel. The town band led the way, playing with great strength and vigor. There was more drum than anything else, certainly, for the burly citizen who carried the drum seemed to think his instrument the most important of all. The cornet player, too, was a bar behind everyone else most of the time, but the intention was good if the result was poor.

Kedge Darvis marched solemnly along with the mayor, and the four gangsters followed, trying their best to look like "capitalists" from the East. Soon the company arrived at the hotel, and the mayor led Darvis and his men up the steps and began to introduce them to the chief citizens of Bunsen.

"This is Miss Vancey," said he presently, bringing forward a very pretty dark-haired girl. "She owns the biggest ranch in this county. Miss Vancey, meet Mr. Darvis."

"I'm honoured," said Darvis with a very creditable bow.

"I'm sure very pleased to meet you," exclaimed Sue Vancey, "and I hope you and your friends will come and stay on my ranch for a few days while you're looking round."

"We shall be delighted, Miss Vancey," replied Darvis with studied politeness, "and it's sure very kind of you to ask us."

"Speech!" yelled the crowd which had gathered in front of the hotel. Darvis started, and his followers looked with secret delight at the worried expression that came over his face. For Kedge's lino was not speech-making. His remarks in public had hitherto been confined to some such terse effort of eloquence as "Put 'em up!"

"I'm afraid you'll have to say something, Mr. Darvis," said the mayor, and the gang-leader went forward reluctantly.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he began, "I'm very pleased to visit Bunsen, and I hope—"

The crowd was denied the chance of learning what Darvis hoped, for his remarks were suddenly interrupted by an outburst of gun-firing. Round the corner of the street came an exuberant mob of mounted cowboys, galloping at full speed and firing their six-shooters in the air.

"Say, sheriff," cried the mayor angrily, "you going to stand for this?"

"I reckon I'm not," replied Posey Meed, the sheriff, as he went off to intercept the riders. At their head he saw a tall, handsome young fellow, with clear blue eyes and a frank, open face.

"Brad Farley," he shouted, as the leader of the cowboys reined up outside the hotel, "I've told you before—this town's grown up, and we ain't standing for this shooting any more."

"You don't say, sheriff," smiled Brad. "Well, we've had some luck to-day. Caught a fine lot of mustangs, and the boys are a bit excited, that's all."

"You've spoilt the reception," grumbled the sheriff. "We've got some gentlemen from the East in Bunsen, and they're going to invest some money here."

"Ain't that sweet of them?" laughed Brad.

"You laugh!" growled Meed. "We want some men with money in Bunsen, I reckon."

"Yes. If we pay 'em enough they'll put up buildings to hide the sky, and the country will be black with smoke and the streets foul with petrol fumes. I wanna keep this country clean and fresh."

"Huh!" snorted the sheriff. "You're too old-fashioned for these times. We aim to make Bunsen a real live town, and no more shooting up in the streets, Farley, or I'll sure gaol you!"

He went back to the hotel, and Stub Wallock, Brad's foreman, a stout, hearty, good-natured fellow, nudged his boss significantly.

"Say, Brad," he remarked, "there's Sue Vancey, talking to some strange guy—one of these millionaires Posey was yarning about, I reckon."

"You round up the horses and take 'em to Horton's corral," said Brad. "I'm going to speak to Sue."

As Stub rode off, Brad Farley mounted the steps and approached Sue, who looked at him with disgust, for the interruption of the reception had annoyed her very much. Still, she introduced him to Kedge Darvis.

"Mr. Darvis, meet Mr. Brad Farley," she said, and the two men shook hands, eying each other with instinctive dislike the while.

"Say, Brad," said Mayor Horton, coming up, "I'll give you 1,400 dollars for those mustangs."

"I've sent 'em to your corral, mayor," replied Brad, "and I'll take 1,300—all they're worth. I ain't robbing you any then."

"As you like," said Horton, and he turned to one of his men. "Give Mr. Farley the 1,300 right now."

The gangsters looked at each other in surprise, and they were still more astonished when the man went to an old-fashioned safe just inside the door, took out some notes, and gave them to Brad, who pocketed them at once.

"He didn't even count 'em," whispered Spot Skee, to whose mind such simple trustfulness was amazing.

"I'd like to show you some of the old-fashioned things we have about here," said Brad politely to Kedge Darvis.

"I don't think Mr. Darvis would be interested," cut in Sue at once.

"I'm giving you a horse that will be just okay for you, Sue," said Brad, in some dismay at the girl's tone. "You could come along as well."

"I've got quite enough horses," snapped Sue. "And I'm very busy—just now!"

This time Sue's tone was so significant that Brad turned and slowly descended the steps, while Darvis watched him with a derisive smile.

"I don't reckon to understand women," muttered Brad as he mounted his horse, "but Sue beats me. Smiles from her yesterday, snubs to-day! She's falling for that guy Darvis, I reckon, and if he ain't a crook I never saw one in my life!"

Brad Takes a Back Seat.

HAMPSEY DELL. Sue's cook, was busy setting the breakfast next morning on a table in the open air just outside the house on the Vancey Ranch. It was a bright, sunny morning, and the servants were full of excitement, for the "capitalists" from the East were coming out to stay on the ranch.

A feeble old man came stumbling up to the table and spoke to Hampsey.

"Say, girl, where's Miss Vancey?" he asked. "I've found gold—a real rich vein this time, an' I want to tell her about it."

"Go away!" cried Hampsey impatiently. "You're always finding rich veins, and they're always no good. Go away, and don't bother me!"

"Strike" Jackson, the old prospector, tottered away, looking disappointed, and Hampsey Dell thought no more about him, for she had noticed several cars coming up the road. To her surprise, they were accompanied by a crowd of men on horseback, amongst whom she recognised Brad Farley and Stub Wallock.

Brad had hoped to please Sue by getting his cowboys to escort her guests to the ranch that morning; but so far his hopes had been in vain, for the girl had not even looked at him. When the cars drew up, she beckoned to Stub Wallock, for she knew that the burly foreman was very fond of Hampsey Dell.

"I didn't expect to see you to-day, Stub," she said, as he came to the side of the car.

"Well, Brad just thought he'd come," replied Stub, glancing at his boss.

But Sue did not follow his glance, for she was still annoyed with Brad Farley. "You would like to come in and have breakfast—and see Hampsey, wouldn't you?" she asked.

"Sure I would, Miss Vancey," cried Stub, beaming with delight.

Sue got out and went up to the breakfast table, followed by the mayor, the sheriff, Kedge Darvis and his men, and Stub Wallock. Stub did not get as far as the table. He saw Hampsey Dell on the veranda, and at once made in that direction. As for Brad Farley, Sue had completely ignored his presence, and he sat moodily on his horse, watching her, with bitter jealousy in his heart.

"C'mon, boys!" he cried after a minute or two. "We ain't wanted. We'll be going right now."

"What about Stub?" objected a cowboy.

"He'll catch up," said Brad, turning his horse. "C'mon!"

"Wait a minute!" shouted Tack Gillup, Sue's foreman, running out and coming up to Brad. "What's your hurry? Ain't you coming in?"

"When a door is slammed in my face," replied Brad sourly, "I begin to think it is about time I went."

"Oh, shucks!" cried Tack, whose secret hope was that Sue would before long be Mrs. Brad Farley. "Girls go by contraries. Now, if Sue Vancey slams the door in your face, she really wants you to go and open it, I reckon."

"Don't think so," said Brad unbelievably.

"Well, you wait a minute!" exclaimed Tack Gillup. "I figure I've gotta plan, so you wait."

He ran off, and Brad decided to wait a few minutes, though he had no idea what Sue's foreman meant to do. But Tack did not reappear, and at length Brad called to his men and rode slowly off, looking back now and then.

The cowboys had not gone far when a terrific hubbub of shouts and cries arose behind them. Tack Gillup had carried out his plan. He had let a herd of lively young calves loose, and had carefully shepherded them towards the breakfast table in front of the ranch-house.

The guests were still at their meal when the calves came scampering along. In vain the mayor, the sheriff, and the gangsters tried to drive them off as they stormed the party. Over went the chairs as the startled guests scrambled to their feet, and, despite the best efforts of Kedge Darvis and Spot Skee, one calf, bolder than the rest, mounted the table and ran along it, scattering the crockery right and left.

Tack Gillup appeared suddenly and ran to the gate, shouting for Brad.

"Hi, Brad, come back and help! Calves broken loose!"

Brad and his men turned and came riding back. In a very few minutes the experienced cowboys had the animals back in their enclosure, and only Stub, running out hurriedly on foot from his talk with Hampsey Dell, had the worst of an encounter with a very lively calf, after a struggle in which both went to the ground.

"Say, Miss-Sue," said Tack Gillup, when the calves were safely corralled and the servants were repairing the ravages which the animals had made on the breakfast table—"say, ain't you going to ask those boys to breakfast? They sure did better work with the calves than those millionaires you've got."

Sue was annoyed at her foreman's tone, but she went out to the waiting cowboys with a smile.

"You boys come along and have something to eat," she called.

"Sure, miss!" yelled a dozen voices, and the cowboys rushed for the house in a body—all but one, for Brad Farley still sat on his horse, looking eagerly at Sue.

She turned her back on him and walked away, but Tack Gillup made frantic signs to the young man, who hurriedly dismounted and caught Sue up at the door.

"Can't we take up where we left off, Sue?" he said pleadingly.

"No!" snapped the girl, going into the house without another word, and Brad turned disconsolately away to Tack Gillup, who was holding his horse.

"You giving up like that for a word?" said Tack as Brad came up to him.

Still holding the reins with one hand, the foreman put the other on the young man's shoulder, and spoke very seriously.

"Sue wants your help, boy, though she don't know it. I've seen those guys from the East, and those fellows are rattlesnakes, Brad. They're dangerous. Don't give up. Go in after her, boy!"

Thus encouraged by the friendly foreman, Brad went back to the door, opened it, and found Sue Vancey inside the house.

"What," she cried, "you again? What do you want now?"

"I want to talk to you, Sue," said Brad determinedly. "We used to be good friends, and not long ago, either. Why not now?"

"I know, but things are different now, Brad," replied Sue.

"Why different?" asked Brad, in puzzled tones.

"Why don't you make something of yourself?" Sue burst out suddenly.

"Make something of myself? Why, I reckon I've done middling well these two years," said Brad. "Even this last six months—"

"Oh, yes," interrupted Sue impatiently, "well enough in your way. But the West is all behind, out of date—and you're part of it. Do you call looking after cattle a man's job?"

"Never seen any cripples make good at it," said Brad dryly.

"I wish you were more like these men from the East. There's Mr. Darvis, now. He's got money, power, position. He's up-to-date."

"Sue," cried Brad very gravely, "you know nothing about these men, except what they have told you, and—"

The door opened behind them, and Kedge Darvis came in. Sue turned and smiled on him, to Brad's ill-concealed disgust. She began to talk eagerly to the "capitalist," and Brad retreated to the window. Presently Darvis asked the girl to play something on the piano.

"I don't play well enough for you folk from the great cities," said Sue. "Why don't you play something yourself, Mr. Darvis?"

"Perhaps Mr.—er—Farley will play to us," sneered Darvis.

"I don't play," said Brad shortly.

"I thought you had a lot of cowboy songs ready to hand," came the scornful reply. "Must be very interesting!"

Sue laughed, and Brad turned on his heel and went out in disgust. And as he went he saw Kedge Darvis sit down at the piano to play, with Sue's eyes still fixed admiringly on the up-to-date man from the East.

Ordered Off!

STUB WALLOCK made much more progress with Hampsey Dell than his boss had done with Sue Vancey. The jovial foreman found his sweetheart very busy on the veranda, and, creeping up behind her, he seized her round the waist, laughing heartily.

"Oh," screamed Hampsey, "is that you, Stub? You're always coming at the wrong time, when I'm busy, or when I've got a cold or something."

"I come when I can, girl," protested Stub.

"Why don't you come and see me in the moonlight sometimes, instead of when I'm peeling potatoes or cooking the dinner?" wailed Hampsey. "And now I'm going to be ever so busy in the daytime, 'cos of these visitors we've got."

"Okay, Hampsey! I'll come along in the moonlight next time if I can," said Stub. "But say, girl, what d'you think of these millionaire guys, eh?"

"I've heard 'em sneering at the West already," replied Hampsey, "and that one they call Spot has been laughing at you cowboys—said you were a lot of out-of-date saps, or something like that."

"He did, eh?" cried Stub angrily. "I'll show 'em! You watch me!"

The conversation was interrupted at that moment by the arrival of the calves, and after the cowboys had driven the animals back into their corral, the cook was too busy to talk to Stub for a while. The foreman took his place at the breakfast-table when it was ready again, and he, with some of the guests, went on with the interrupted meal, though Sue Vancey and Kedge Darvis did not come back.

"Fine, the way you boys rounded up those calves," remarked Spot Sice in a sarcastic tone.

"Well, we're used to that kind of thing," replied Stub complacently, failing to observe the sarcasm in the gangster's voice.

"Way you fought that calf to the ground was sure the goods," observed another gangster with a grin.

"If that's your work I reckon it's like child's play," sneered Spot.

Stub saw the sneer this time, and Hampsey Dell, who happened to overhear the last remark, glared angrily at the gangster.

"You try it for a week," she snorted, tossing her head.

"Say, d'you remember that yarn about the man who made fun of my hat?" asked Stub, turning to the mayor.

"Sure, Stub," said Horton wearily. "I've heard you tell it twenty times."

"Maybe, mayor, but these guys ain't heard it, so I reckon I'll just tell 'em. I was getting off the train one day, and a fellow comes up and sees me, and he begins laughing at my hat."

"You don't say—laughing at your hat?" said Spot, winking at his companions.

"Sure he was laughing," repeated Stub. "Now that fellow was smoking a cigar, a big, fat cigar; so I gets out my gun, and—"

Stub checked himself and looked round for a mark. On the other side of the table he noticed a dead tree, and on it one branch which had broken off short, leaving a little stump.

"See that stump?" he cried. "Well, say that stump was the guy's cigar, and the tip of it was just the glow, see? Now, you watch!"

He raised his gun and fired at the stump. The tip of it vanished as the

"Sue wants your help, boy, though she don't know it," said the foreman seriously.

bullet reached its mark, and Stub looked round for the applause of the company. But no applause came, and no one seemed surprised.

"That's how I did it," remarked Stub, "and I'll tell you the guy didn't laugh at my hat again."

"Let's look at your gun," said Spot Skee. "I used to have a gun like that," he added, as Stub handed him the weapon, "and I used to be able to shoot some, too. Watch!"

He aimed at the remainder of the stump, and shot off another inch of it. One by one the gangsters showed Stub Wallock that they could shoot quite as well, if not better, than he could, and the foreman's face fell more and more as the firing proceeded.

"Don't get it into your head that the cowboys of the Wild West are the only guys who can shoot," sneered Spot Skee, as he gave the gun back to Stub.

"I thought so," replied Stub dejectedly, "but I'll allow I was wrong. You city men can shoot some, sure!"

Sue Vancey, fascinated by the conversation of the wily gang-leader, had remained in the house talking to him. She had put on her hat and coat in readiness to take Kedge Darvis for a walk round her gardens, when the sound of shooting came to her ears.

"What's that?" she exclaimed. "Come out, Mr. Darvis. They've got their guns out. I hope there's nothing wrong!"

She rushed out, followed by Darvis, to find nothing wrong, except that the gangsters were still tormenting Stub Wallock with their sneers at life in the West. Brad Farley had been walking disconsolately about by himself, but he had now come back to the front of the house and was talking to Mayor Horton. Sue was in time to overhear what he said.

"Well, mayor, I don't believe these guys are capitalists at all. I reckon they're just fakers."

"How dare you say such a thing!" flashed Sue angrily. "You ought to apologise to Mr. Darvis right now."

"Don't trouble, Miss Sue," said Darvis. "It isn't worth taking notice of such remarks as that."

"Are you going to apologise?" demanded Sue fiercely.

"I reckon not," replied Brad quietly but firmly, looking the gang-leader straight in the face. "I'll say it again—to him this time, if he likes!"

"You can't talk to my guests like that!" stormed Sue indignantly.

"I'm sure sorry if you're annoyed, Sue," said Brad calmly, "but I ain't apologising to anyone for saying what I think is the truth, even if he is your guest. Guest under false pretences, I reckon. Get that, Darvis?"

"Mr. Farley," remarked Sue in her iciest tones, before Darvis could reply, "you can get off my ranch—and keep off!"

"Okay, Sue!" said Brad quietly. "If that's the way you feel about it, I'm off. C'mon, Stub, we'll go!"

And in another minute Vancey Ranch had seen the last of Brad Farley and Stub Wallock, who rode off at a gallop to resume their mustang-hunting in the hills.

Darvis Shows His Hand.

FOR a whole week Kedge Darvis had played the gentleman. His followers were growing impatient, for rarely had they passed so long a time without some excitement, and in this remote country ranch there seemed little chance of any opportunity to show their prowess with the gun. No orders came from Kedge. Nobody was put "on the spot," nor did it seem likely that anyone would be "taken for a ride."

September 12th, 1931

Sue Vancey had forgotten the warnings of Brad, and she took no notice of the occasional well-meant hints of Tack Gillup, who distrusted the "capitalists" more and more as the days went on. She rode out daily with Kedge Darvis, taking him all round the great ranch until he was heartily tired of riding, for he was not at home on a horse. His conversation, with its suggestion of great wealth, power and position, still fascinated the girl, though, so far, none of the "millionaires" had shown any disposition to invest any money in Bunsen.

One day Sue and Darvis were riding together in a little valley some miles from the ranch-house. Down the middle of the valley ran a small stream, and in the distance they saw a man stooping over the water. Presently they came up to him, and Sue saw that it was "Strike" Jackson, the old prospector.

Hampsey Dell had told her mistress that the old man had announced the finding of gold. Sue did not believe the tale, for Strike had obtained his nickname by continually finding veins of gold which invariably turned out to be worthless.

"Say, Miss Vancey," cried the old man as Sue rode up, "I've struck it rich this time. See here. Nuggets. Real gold!"

He came up to Sue's horse, and put some nuggets into the girl's hand. She examined them carefully, and so did Kedge Darvis. His eyes gleamed at the sight, and he looked thoughtfully at the old prospector, who was still talking eagerly to Sue about his discovery.

"Well, Strike, I believe you really have found a good vein this time," exclaimed Sue at length. "Come back with me to the house and I'll make arrangements for working the vein. You shall have half of whatever we find."

"Thank you, Miss Vancey," said the old man. "That will sure be okay."

Sue, with Kedge Darvis and the old prospector, rode straight back to the house, where they found Tack Gillup talking to Spot Skee and the other gangsters.

"Strike Jackson really is Strike this time," cried Sue joyfully as she dismounted. "Show them the nuggets you found, Strike."

"I'll say they look good," remarked Spot Skee, examining them.

"It's sure the real thing this time," added Tack Gillup. "He found 'em on your land, I suppose, Miss Sue?"

"You going to work the vein?"

"Of course," cried Sue excitedly. "I'm going into Bunsen right now to register the claim."

Kedge Darvis looked at his men. That one glance was enough, and the next instant each of the gangsters had a gun in his hand.

"Put 'em up!" barked Darvis, as his men covered Sue, Strike Jackson and Hampsey Dell, who had just come out of the house, while the gang-leader himself thrust his gun ominously forward as Tack Gillup turned upon him.

The whole group seemed frozen stiff with astonishment for a moment, and then slowly the hands went up.

"You ain't going to town this morning," said Darvis to the bewildered Sue, who could hardly believe her eyes as she saw the "capitalist" change in a moment from a polished gentleman to a ruthless-looking gunman.

"No one's going to Bunsen," continued the gang-leader. "And I'm working that gold myself. Get that!"

"Why—why, whatever is the matter with you, Mr. Darvis?" gasped Sue.

"I'll put you poor mutts wise," said Darvis. "I'm what the papers call a gangster, and my business is murder."

"I ain't going to stand for this," stammered Strike Jackson, turning to walk away. "I'm going to fetch the sheriff. There's law for rotten skunks like you."

Darvis fired instantly at the old man's back, and before the report of the gun had died away Strike Jackson lay face downward on the ground, dead.

Sue Vancey shrieked with horror and fear as she witnessed the cowardly murder of the helpless old prospector, while Tack Gillup took an involuntary step towards the gang-leader, but the pressure of Spot Skee's gun in the small of his back was convincing proof that resistance was useless.

Brisk footsteps came along the path, and round the corner of the house appeared Mayor Horton and Posey Meed, the sheriff, who stopped short in amazement at the unexpected sight of the hold-up and the dead body of Strike Jackson.

"Stay there and put 'em up!" shouted Darvis. "Now, Mr. Mayor, I'll tell you I'm taking over the town of Bunsen and this ranch. You'll stay here and so will the sheriff. Don't move, or I shoot!"

"You take over the town of Bunsen?" gasped the mayor. "Who are you, then, to talk like that?"

"I'm a gang-leader," snapped Darvis, "and I run a town three hundred times the size of Bunsen. And what I say goes. Another word and you'll follow that old fool there," he added, nodding towards Strike's body.

The sheriff was an utterly fearless man. Disregarding the threatening gun, and wholly undeterred by the gangster's menaces, he advanced to do his duty.

"I arrest you for the murder of Strike Jackson," he said firmly. "I call on you to submit to the authority of the law. You—"

That word was the last the sheriff ever spoke. Kedge's gun barked again, and Posey Meed fell by the side of the old prospector, a bullet through his heart.

"That'll show you I mean business!" snarled Darvis, glaring angrily round. "There ain't any law where I am. The law is ME!"

Nobody thought it safe to reply to this statement, and Darvis continued his remarks to an audience petrified with horror.

"Now, Horton," he said, addressing the mayor, "there's this girl Sue. You wouldn't like anything to happen to her, would you?"

Horton managed somehow to gasp out "No," while Sue, her face drained of all colour, nearly fainted with horror at the sight of the murdered men and at the threat to her own life.

"Then you'll do as I say," continued Darvis. "Into the house, all of you!"

As the captives were hustled into the house, Kedge Darvis turned to Spot Skee.

"Go down and wire for the boys," he ordered. "We'll have the whole crowd up here right away."

Tack Gillup Escapes.

KEDGE DARVIS made sure of his ground at once. All Sue's servants were rounded up and imprisoned in the house, except for Hampsey's Chinese assistant, Yuan Lee, who was allowed some measure of freedom in order to do the cooking. Sue and Hampsey were shut into a room together, and the door was locked upon them, while Tack Gillup was thrust into the cellar. One gangster was ordered to keep a special watch on the Chinaman, particularly when he took food to the prisoners.

"Now," said Kedge to his men when these arrangements were completed, "I reckon the good folk of Bunsen are going to get a surprise to-morrow when the boys come. Some of 'em will work the vein. I'll see to that, and the others will take over Bunsen. Spot, you'll run the town."

"Okay, Kedge," grinned Spot Skee, "that's sure an easy job."

"There's only one guy who might butt in on us," said Kedge thoughtfully, "and that's Brad Farley. It's sure lucky Sue Vancey quarrelled with him."

"He won't trouble us, Kedge," laughed Spot. "I'll see that no news gets to him. Trust me!"

The next day the boys arrived, and Darvis had some seventy men at his disposal. The people of Bunsen had as yet no idea of what had happened on the Vancey Ranch, though they were beginning to wonder why the mayor and the sheriff stayed there so long. The townsfolk were amazed to see the mob of gangsters pour out of the station, and there were many rumours as to the reason for the arrival of so many strangers. It was not long before Bunsen found out the reason.

Kedge Darvis and Spot Skee met the gang, and while the former took half of them off to begin work at once on the vein of gold, Spot informed the others that Bunsen was to be "run." And, without delay he began to run the town.

Gangsters were posted at strategic spots, and all the roads leading into the town were patrolled. The railway station was picketed, and passengers wishing to leave Bunsen by railway were kept out, while the officials dared not inform the guards or drivers of passing trains about the situation, for they were working under the eyes of armed gangsters. The telegraph office received Spot's special attention, and a gunman sat there continually watching the operator, and handling his gun significantly whenever a message was sent off.

For the next few days Bunsen lived under a reign of terror. One or two of the bolder spirits made an attempt at first to shoot Spot Skee and some of his henchmen, but in vain. The gangsters were far quicker on the draw, and the dead bodies of several unfortunate fellow-townsmen told the citizens of Bunsen that resistance was useless.

Meanwhile at Vancey Ranch, Kedge Darvis was monarch of all he surveyed. His men were busy working the vein, which proved to be very rich. The prisoners were closely guarded, and no news of what was happening was allowed to reach them.

Tack Gillup, in the dismal cellar, had no idea whether Sue Vancey was alive or dead, and at length he determined to try to get some information from Yuan Lee.

"Say, Yuan," he remarked the next time the Chinaman brought him a meal, "these guys are sure doing the thing in style. Bread and water, eh? Well, I suppose I can live on that. What have they done with Miss Sue?"

"Me no talkce," said Yuan Lee in an unnaturally loud voice, looking fixedly not at Tack Gillup, but at the half loaf of bread he had brought to the prisoner. And Tack caught the faintest suspicion of a wink.

"No, you no talkce," cried a gangster from the cellar stairs. "You talkce, you die. You no talkce, you no die. Savvy?"

"Yis, sah, me savvy allee light," said Yuan, retiring hastily.

Tack Gillup waited until the Chinaman and the watching gunman had gone, and then he very carefully examined the bread. Cunningly concealed within it he found a tiny scrap of paper, which he smoothed out eagerly.

"Me dig hole. One day you come out," he read.

Tack destroyed the note at once, and that night he lay awake for a long time listening intently. He heard nothing to indicate that Yuan Lee was at work, either on that night or the next, but on the third night faint sounds outside seemed to show that the Chinaman was endeavouring to keep his promise.

"Sounds like digging," muttered Tack as he listened. "I wonder how he's managed to dodge that gunman. Too cunning for him, I reckon."

Tack was right. The cunning of the Oriental had proved more than a match for the brute force of the gangsters. The gunmen had treated Yuan Lee like a dog. Kicks and blows were showered on him daily, until he was filled with a bitter hatred of Kedge Darvis and his men. He showed no outward sign of his feelings, simulating a cowardly fear so well by cringing and cowering before his tormentors, that their vigilance began to relax.

The gangster appointed to guard the Chinaman began to grow careless, thinking that no danger could possibly come from such a mean-spirited coward as Yuan appeared to be. Little did he suspect that Yuan's cowardice was only a cloak that concealed a courage and resource far greater than that of the gangsters themselves.

"I'm a gang leader," snapped Darvis, "and I run a town three hundred times the size of Bunsen. And what I say goes!"

Yuan's door was locked at night, but he picked the lock with a wire and got out. Finding a spade, he began to dig a hole towards the cellar as he had promised to do. It was a slow job, for he had to convey the earth from the hole to the garden, where he had been digging trenches openly by daylight under pretence of planting various vegetables. He had also to cover the hole with boards before the dawn and to scatter earth on top to hide what he had done.

Slowly the work went on, and still the gangsters were unsuspecting. On the ninth night of his imprisonment, Tack Gillup heard the sound of the spade very close. Presently some bricks fell in from the side of the cellar, and Yuan's voice whispered faintly:

"You help make hole bigger, then you come out."

Tack helped with great vigour, and long before the dawn of the next day he stood unobserved outside the house.

"Now you go find Mr. Farley," said the Chinaman. "He in hills somewhere."

"What about you?" asked Tack. "They'll kill you if they find you. You come with me."

"No," said Yuan, shaking his head. "I stay here—help Miss Sue. She and Hampsey in prison in house. P'raps they not find me out. If they do, they kill me, yes, but Brad kill them. I not 'fraid. You go find him."

"Well, boy, I'll be as quick as I can," remarked Tack.

"Horse I got for you over here," said Yuan, leading the way silently down the road. A few minutes later Sue's foreman, mounted on a good horse which the Chinaman had managed to obtain from the stable, was making rapidly for the hills. Yuan Lee went back to his room after obliterating as well as he could the signs of Tack's escape, and in the morning the Chinese cook appeared as timid and as harmless as ever to the suspicious eyes of the gangster who had him in charge.

Brad Farley to the Rescue.

DURING the ten days of the gangsters' rule in Bunsen, Brad Farley and his boys were busy hunting mustangs in the hills, and no news of the astonishing events in the town reached their ears.

On the morning of Tack's escape, Brad had rounded up the mustangs they had captured, and the cowboys prepared to set off on the road to Bunsen. Before they started, however, Sue's foreman came galloping up. He had got clear away from the ranch, and after a hurried search in the early hours of the morning he came upon Brad and his boys just in time to warn them of the danger they would incur by going into the town.

"Stop, Brad!" gasped Tack Gillup. "I've got news. Don't go down to Bunsen. The town's in the hands of Darvis and his gang, and they've got Miss Sue, too."

Brad Farley and Stub Wallock looked in bewilderment at the foreman, for though they had been suspicious of the pretended capitalists, the news Tack brought seemed to them to be quite incredible.

"What are you talking about?" asked Brad, surveying the dishevelled figure of Tack Gillup as though he suspected the worthy foreman of being out of his right mind.

September 12th, 1931.

"I'm telling you the truth," replied Tack with great energy. "They're killing. They had me tied up, but I escaped. Yuan Lee got me away."

Brad still did not understand, and Tack had at last to tell the whole story, so far as he knew it.

"Strike Jackson found a vein of gold, and when Sue was going to ride off to register the claim, Darvis and his gang got out their guns and held us up."

"You don't say!" cried Brad. "Is that all?"

"All? No, Strike said he'd go for the sheriff, and Darvis shot the old man in the back. Shot him dead in cold blood; never gave him a chance. Then the sheriff came up and started in to arrest Darvis, and the skunk plugged him, too."

"If they're gunmen, they've come to where killing was invented," cried Brad fiercely, his face setting in hard and stern lines as Tack's narrative proceeded.

"Sure they have!" exclaimed Stub Wallock, getting out his gun as though he were ready to do a little killing there and then.

"And Sue?" asked Brad anxiously. "What about her?"

"She and Hampsey are shut up in the ranch-house," replied Tack.

"It's me for the ranch-house right now!" yelled Stub angrily, turning to get his horse.

"Wait a minute, Stub," said Brad calmly. "We ain't going to make any mistakes over this business. I reckon Tack has got more to tell."

"You bet I have," said Tack. "Yuan helped me to get away. I expect the skunks will plug him when they find I've gone, and he told me he's heard that the gangsters are running Bunsen. The place is thick with 'em, and so is the ranch."

"That so?" asked Brad. "Then it ain't any manner of use riding straight down into Bunsen. We've gotta go about this job carefully—get right into the town before they know we're coming."

"Can't be done, Brad," said Tack. "Yuan thinks they're watching all the roads."

"You leave this to me, Tack," replied Brad quietly, "and I'll fix it. Those guys are sure going to get a surprise this morning. We'll take the mustangs down to Horton's corral first, and then I'll tell you my plan."

Later that morning a wagon piled up with hay came into Bunsen, driven by a decrepit-looking old man. The gangster on guard at the entrance to the town stepped out into the road when he saw the wagon coming and hailed the driver.

"Where you going?" he demanded.

"I be a-going to take this load of hay to Grant's store," came the reply in a cracked feeble voice, as the old man pulled up. "He ordered it last week, and he'll sure be wanting it by now."

The gunman glanced casually at the loaded wagon, but saw nothing to make him suspicious.

"Okay," he said. "Get on with it!"

The wagon went on, and presently drew up in front of Grant's store. The driver got down, and with great difficulty pulled a number of planks from the back of the seat. Bending almost double beneath their weight, he staggered with them into the store, and deposited the timber in a corner.

Grant, the storekeeper, came forward to ask the driver what he wanted, and suddenly he saw an amazing change come over the feeble-looking figure. The man took off the old slouch hat which had nearly covered his face, raised himself to his full height, and stood revealed as Brad Farley himself.

"Why, if it ain't——" began Grant in astonishment.

As Brad put a finger to his mouth warningly, Grant stopped, and turned to the door. Rapid footsteps were coming along the street, and a moment later a man burst hurriedly into the store.

"Say, Grant," gasped the newcomer, "you heard? They say Darvis——"

"Another man, a gangster this time, rushed in, a gun in his hand.

"Another word, and I drill you!" he yelled fiercely.

"Is that so?" remarked Brad coolly, stepping out from behind the timber in the corner. "Then I'll say the next word right now!"

His gun barked as he spoke, and the gangster slumped to the floor and lay still.

"That's one less, anyway," Brad said calmly.

The report of Brad's gun seemed to rouse the street into life. Two gunmen who were strolling past the haycart ran for the store at full speed, but they were still some yards away when the young cowboy appeared at the doorway.

"You guys are downright careless," he remarked. "You're running right into it."

Twice Brad's gun spoke, and the two hurrying gangsters fell.

"And that's three of 'em," said Brad, as he dashed across the street for the cart. As he reached it, the hay suddenly lifted, and from beneath it appeared the cowboys, each ready with his gun. Bunsen was in an uproar a moment later, for a number of gunmen came running up, and a rapid exchange of shots began.

Most of the townsfolk lay low at first, but as the firing continued windows opened here and there, and some of the citizens joined in the fight, using guns which they had concealed while the gangsters were in possession of the town.

Brad Farley crawled beneath the cart, and lay between the wheels firing rapidly on the gunmen. The street of the little town was soon veiled in a mist of gunsmoke, and it became difficult to see how the fight was progressing. But the gangsters had been completely taken by surprise, and they were fighting a losing battle from the start.

The people of Bunsen were taking heart, and every moment more and more of them came out to help Brad and his boys. Soon many of the gunmen were down, while only three of Brad's followers had been hit, none seriously.

"I've got it, boss!" cried a cowboy who had come down to lie at Brad's side under the wagon. He rolled over, clutching his shoulder where a red stain began to appear.

"Where did that bullet come from?" asked Brad.

"That window over there, I think," gasped the wounded man faintly.

"See to him, Dave," said Brad to another of his men, "and I'll get that guy in the window."

Brad surveyed the house from which the shot had come. Spot Skee was there, for he had seen that the fight was going against his men, and had dived into a house. Establishing himself at an upstairs window, he had opened fire on the cart, hoping to plug Brad Farley. The last bullet from his six-shooter wounded the man next to Brad, and Spot dropped to the floor to reload his gun.

Brad sprang up, crossed the street at a run, and began to climb a stack pipe leading to the roof of the house. As he climbed, a gunman who had hidden himself in a doorway farther down the street peered out, saw Brad half-way up the pipe, and raised his gun to fire. Stub Wallock observed him just in time.

"That's for you!" growled the foreman. His gun barked a second before the gangster's, and the man fell, his bullet going well wide of Brad Farley.

Spot Skee poked his head cautiously above the sill, and looked out. He could no longer see Brad, and the cowboys appeared to be gazing at something farther down the street.

"I'll plug that fat guy, anyway," muttered Spot, taking aim at Stub. His finger was on the trigger, when a lithe, active form swung in at the window, and bore the gangster to the ground with a crash. Brad had contrived to scramble down from the roof and swing himself in at the window just in time to save Stub.

With the capture of Spot Skee the resistance of the gangsters ceased. Brad's boys combed the town, and rounded up all the gunmen who were still alive. Many of the gangsters had been killed outright, and most of the survivors were wounded.

Soon a jubilant crowd of townsfolk gathered in front of the store. Brad and his boys were there, once more on horseback, with a bunch of prisoners in their midst.

"Any of you seen Darvis?" asked Brad.

There came a chorus of "No," and Brad turned to Spot Skee.

"Where's your boss?" he demanded.

"Out on the ranch, I reckon," said Spot sullenly.

"You look after this bunch of rattlesnakes," cried Brad to the crowd of citizens. "C'mon, boys! It's us for the ranch, right now!"

Darvis Makes a Getaway.

KEDGE DARVIS sat in the ranch-house that morning reckoning out the amount of gold which the gangsters had already obtained from the vein. Several large nuggets figured amongst the spoil, and the gang-leader handled them thoughtfully.

"Say ten thousand dollars' worth here," he muttered to himself. "I'll give it a few days more, and then—"

The door burst open, and two gangsters hurriedly thrust in the Chinese cook, Yuan Lee.

"What's the meaning of this?" exclaimed Darvis angrily. "You wait till I ask you to come in."

"Boss," cried a gangster quickly, "that guy we put in the cellar—he's gone! An' this Chinese got him away, we reckon. He dug a hole, and—"

"Dug a hole, did he?" interrupted Darvis, glaring fiercely at his erstwhile confederates. "And where were you when he was digging a hole, may I ask? Ain't you got eyes? I told you to watch this yellow-faced heathen, didn't I?"

"Well, boss, it was this way," began one of the men.

"Shut your mouth," snarled Darvis, and he turned to the Chinaman.

"So you let that guy out, did you?" he said slowly, with menace in every word, and getting out his gun as he spoke.

"Mo do it, yis!" replied Yuan, facing the angry gangster with complete unconcern. "They beat Yuan, they kick him like dog, but Yuan trick them."

Darvis glared first at the Oriental, and then at his men, who wilted beneath his glance.

"You darned fools!" he breathed.

"Go and get the horses saddled, warn the others, and then come back here. And make it snappy!"

The men turned to go, and Darvis spoke again to Yuan Lee.

"When they come back, you die!"

"When Mr. Farley come, you die—and you—and you!" chuckled Yuan, pointing first at Darvis, and then at the departing gangsters. "Mr. Farley he clean you all up, and you all die quick."

"Not before you," growled Darvis.

"I die now," said Yuan, without a tremor in his voice, "you die presently; to-morrow or next day, allee same. All got to die sometime; no matter to Yuan when he die."

Darvis surveyed the impassive face of the Chinaman with unwilling admiration. The two gangsters came back a moment later, and reported that the horses were ready.

"You fools told me the other day that this Chink was a coward," said Darvis scornfully. "I'll say he's got more pluck than the whole darned lot of you. He'd have made a fine gangster. Take him away and tie him up, but don't drill him—yct."

All the gangsters who were on the ranch had by this time gathered at the house, and Darvis told them of the escape of Tack Gillup.

"There's a time to stay, and there's a time to move," he concluded, "and our time to move it right now. We'll take what gold there is, and make a getaway."

"Where to, boss?" asked a gunman.

"How about the boys in Bunsen?"

questioned another.

"Spot must make his own getaway, if he can. I figure he's been surprised this morning by the cowboys," replied Darvis. "Listen!"

The gunmen stood listening eagerly, and a faint crackling sound far off but distinct came to their ears.

"You're right, boss, sure enough!" cried the men. "That's guns, down in Bunsen."

"We'll make for Pine Creek, over the mountains, and get on the railroad there," Darvis went on. "Bunsen ain't healthy for us any more, unless Spot beats the cowboys off, and I ain't taking the chance of that."

"Too fond of your own skin," muttered a gangster under his breath, for the gunmen could not fail to see that Kedge Darvis was showing a yellow streak. A bold dash with the thirty or so gangsters from the ranch, and the cowboys might even yet be foiled.

"We don't know the way to Pine Creek," protested another gunman.

"The women do," answered Darvis. "We'll take 'em with us, and they'll show us the way. We'll take 'em right back to the city. If nothing happens to them, nothing happens to us."

Sue Vancey and Hampsey Dell had been kept as prisoners for the ten days that had passed since the murder of the sheriff. Once or twice they had been allowed to go out into the garden under an armed guard of gunmen, and during the last day or two their door had been unlocked, and they had been permitted to go about the house, but not to speak to anyone.

Hoping against hope to find some chance of escape, the two girls were about to go down to the kitchen that morning when the key was turned in the lock outside.

"They've locked us in again. Something's wrong!" gasped Hampsey, clutching Sue by the shoulder.

They waited in great anxiety behind the locked door for some time, listening eagerly. Presently footsteps sounded along the passage outside, the door was opened, and Darvis came in.

"Get yourselves ready!" he said harshly. "We're going to Pine Creek, and you are both coming with us." "We're not!" screamed both the girls at once.

"I say you are!" barked Darvis. "You'll do what I say. Get that!"

The girls saw that resistance was hopeless, and before long they were riding away from Vancey Ranch over the plains towards the mountains, in the midst of the armed party of gangsters.

"This country's too small for the two of us!" he cried. "Get up and fight it out, you dirty hound!"

From time to time they looked back, hoping to see Brad Farley and his boys in pursuit, but in vain. The plain was empty of horsemen, save for the gunmen, and the girls almost gave way to despair. When the party approached the mountains Kedge Darvis came up to Sue.

"You'll lead the way to Pine Creek now," he said sternly.

"And suppose I say I won't?" retorted Sue defiantly.

"Then you'll stay here, with several bullet holes through you!" snarled Darvis angrily. "You know me by now. I ain't playing. You'll show us the way, or I'll drill you—both of you," he added, turning to Hampsey Dell, who shrieked with fear.

Sue looked the gang-leader straight in the face, and his eyes could not meet her fearless glance.

"You cowardly hound," she said in a low voice of concentrated scorn, "to threaten two helpless women!"

"Maybe!" muttered Darvis. "Are you going to lead the way, or must I shoot?"

"I don't want to die just yet," said Sue, "especially at the hands of a cowardly murderer like you. I'll show you the way to Pine Creek, and I hope you'll like the journey!"

Sue and Hampsey were sent to the front of the party, and they led the way into a long, narrow mountain gorge which wound up and up into the heart of the hills. Darvis looked round apprehensively as they went on, for the gorge seemed the very place for an ambush, as Sue very well knew when she agreed to go on. But there was as yet no sign of an enemy, and Kedge Darvis began to congratulate himself on having made a smart getaway.

In Chase.

BRAD FARLEY and his boys were just turning their horses to ride off to Vancey Ranch when a man on horseback came galloping furiously up.

"Say, stop a minute!" he yelled. "One of the gangsters gave me this note, and told me to bring it along. You'd better read it before you start."

Brad Farley took the note, opened it, and read aloud:

"To any rube whom it may concern. If we take to the city the ladies will come back safe. If not—you may say it with flowers."

"They've taken Sue and Hampsey with 'em as hostages, and as a protection against bullets into the bargain, the low skunks!" growled Brad wrathfully.

"I'd sure fill that Jasper Darvis with lead!" cried Stub Wallock, his face lengthening as he thought of Hampsey's danger. "Sure I would—if I knew where he was!"

"I figure they're making for Pine Creek across the mountains," said Brad thoughtfully. "I suppose they reckon to get on a train there. They won't come down into Bunsen. Still, you folk guard the station, just to make sure, and we'll go off and try to catch 'em in the mountains."

A posse of townfolk was at once formed to guard the station, quite an unnecessary move, as it proved, while Brad and the cowboys set off at a gallop across the plain. Before a mile had been covered the young leader threw up his hand, and the men drew rein.

"Stub," he cried, "take half the men down to Horton's corral, and bring up that lot of mustangs we left there this morning. You'll find me along the

September 12th, 1931.

A Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

gorge—you know the old track that comes down into it half-way. We'll get there before 'em if we hurry, and so will you, too, I reckon. These guys will make a slow journey—they can't ride—they just sit on horseback."

"Okay, chief!" replied Stub, and he went off at once with half the men on his errand, while Brad rode on with the remainder, and in due course took the old track over the mountains, hoping to intercept the gangsters when the track led down into the gorge.

Meanwhile the gunmen were making very heavy weather as they slowly and painfully pursued their way along the gorge. The road was rough, and the gangsters were unaccustomed to horses. They were soon reduced to a walking pace, and even that was a labour and sorrow to most of them.

Suddenly a loud rumbling, followed by a crash, made all the gunmen jump.

"What's that?" howled one.

"Just a rock!" growled Darvis. "Don't get scared because a rock rolls down the hill."

"What made it roll down?" gasped a gangster, looking fearfully round.

"What d'you mean?" snarled Darvis. "It just fell, I reckon. There's another."

A second loud crash just behind the last of the party sent the gunmen scurrying forward in fear. They looked in affright at the sides of the gorge, but no one was to be seen there, and no more rocks moved as Darvis and his men went on.

Yet, though Darvis did not suspect it, Brad Farley and Stub Wallock were concealed behind some rocks on the mountainside. They had got ahead of the gangsters, and had sent off some of the men with instructions about the mustangs which Stub had brought up. Other cowboys were scattered here and there among the rocks, watching the gunmen until Brad gave the signal to attack.

"That's scared 'em," grinned Brad, as the rock he had pushed down fell at the rear of the gangsters' line. "We'll wait until the boys bring up the mustangs, and then we'll catch Darvis on that steep slope, half a mile down."

"They'll shoot the women," said Stub dolefully.

"Not they!" cried Brad. "This is our country, and we'll sure give 'em something to think about. And I've told Tack Gillup what to do about the girls."

The gangsters went on cautiously, and presently Sue and Hampsey, still in the lead, saw a steep slope in front. Down it the gunmen went, more slowly than ever, trying to make the horses pick their way amongst the stones. The two girls, looking back, choked with silent laughter as they saw the doleful faces of the uncomfortable riders, most of whom sat their horses as though they were afraid every moment of being thrown off.

"Say, I reckon you'd be more comfortable in a car," said Hampsey to Darvis, who was riding just behind her.

"You shut your mouth!" growled Darvis, looking enviously at the two girls, who were managing their horses with perfect ease. "If I can't ride I can shoot, so don't you try to run off."

"Oh, no," grinned Hampsey. "I'd sooner stay and watch you try to ride. It's so funny it makes me laugh."

Darvis, with a vicious oath, raised his hand to strike the girl, but a frantic yell from behind made him turn.

"Wild horses! Look out there!" Coming down the slope at a furious gallop, the gangsters saw a herd of mustangs, riderless and wild, snorting

(Continued on page 23.)

FUN FOR INDOORS AND OUTDOORS — FREE!

Table - tennis, boxing gloves, cricket bats, footballs, yachts, model engines. All kinds of things you want for indoor and outdoor sport are in the new Nestlé's Free Gift Book. Dozens of fine possessions offered to you free. Send for the whole illustrated list—to-day. With it, for a start, comes a voucher for five coupons. And there are one or more coupons with every pack of Nestlé's Chocolate, from the two-penny wrapped bar upwards. What a pleasant way to add to your fun!

- G.107. Boxing Gloves. Set of 4, best khaki drill. 185 coupons.
- G.77. Sheath Knife. Sheffield blade with leather case. 110 coupons.
- G.97. Table-tennis. Two bats, balls, net and table fittings. 45 coupons.

NESTLÉ'S CHOCOLATE

To Nestlé's (Gift Dept.), Silverthorne Road, Battersea, London, S.W.8.

Please send Voucher for 5 FREE COUPONS and the NEW Nestlé's Presentation List. 52:12.9.31.

NAME
IN BLOCK CAPITALS

Address.....

This offer applies only to Gt. Britain & N. Ireland. 1d. stamp sufficient if envelope is unsealed

FIVE FREE COUPONS

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. A grand new serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama. Starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

READ THIS FIRST.

While en route with his comrades to the scene of a fire, Bob Darrow, of the San Francisco Brigade, saves the life of a boy who falls in front of one of the monster engines.

Later, he calls on James Madison, head of a chemical company, to whom he puts up an idea for a patent fire-extinguisher. Madison is not interested, and Bob leaves disappointed, after meeting Dan Mitchell, a shady promoter who is befriending Madison for his own ends.

Out in the street, Bob remonstrates with a beautiful girl who has "parked" her car beside a fire-hydrant. The girl, though he does not know it, is Madison's daughter June.

An hour afterwards, an accident in the Madison laboratories fires the whole building in which the company's offices are situated. The brigade is called out, and Bob learns that a girl is trapped in a beauty parlour on the top floor.

The girl is June Madison, but, still unaware of her identity, Bob climbs fearlessly to her rescue. He fails to reach her with the escape, but fixes the grappling-iron of a hook-ladder on the parapet of the roof, and saves her from the flames.

He is descending the hook-ladder with her when the coping-stone comes asunder. Man and girl are plunged to—

Now Read On.

The Ledger.

IN that awful moment of the downward plunge towards the street, hundreds of feet below, Bob Darrow instinctively clenched his grasp on the cross-step of the falling hook-ladder.

It was that circumstance which saved his life and the life of the girl he had carried from the top-floor room of the burning building. For suddenly their hurtling rush through space was arrested with a violent jerk.

EPISODE 2.

"FLAMING HATE."

Bob's arm was almost wrenched from its socket, and the weight of the girl on his shoulder almost tore his fingers from the cross-step. But he hung on desperately.

The coping-stone that had come asunder swept past man and girl, missing their heads by inches. Bob watched it like one in a trance, and saw it twisting and turning in mid-air till it finally struck the sidewalk with smashing force, the sound of the impact coming to his ears like the crack of a gun heard at some distance.

A volume of smoke sweeping around himself and his inert burden recalled Bob to his situation and the miraculous escape that he and the girl had had from a terrible death. He looked up, and realised that by the merest chance the grappling-iron of the hook-ladder had clamped down on the ledge of a window immediately beneath the room from which he had rescued her.

The main fire-escape, from which he had pulled himself by means of the hook-ladder a few minutes before, was now within easy reach. Keeping a firm hold on the girl across his shoulder, he swung himself on to that escape with a litheness that came from strict training on the towers in the fire-station yard.

He descended rung by rung, and as he drew nearer to the street he became aware that his comrades and the crowd, which had gathered near by, had broken into a spontaneous storm of cheering. It embarrassed him, for he was not the one to seek public acclaim, and reckoned he had done no more than his duty.

The moment he stepped to the ground he handed June Madison to three or four of the other firemen. She had fainted again, and they were making efforts to revive her when the girl's father pushed his way through the group, an expression of indescribable thankfulness on his countenance.

Bob did not notice him, nor did he see the face of the girl he had rescued. For, with the ordeal over, the iron nerve and will-power that had sustained him almost gave way, and, reeling back, he stumbled like a sick man.

He would have fallen but for the grasp of a hand on his arm. The hold steadied him, and, turning his head, he recognised Captain Wilson.

"Darrow," the battalion chief said, "you were magnificent. I've seen some pretty heroic jobs done in my twenty-five years' service with the brigade, but never one to beat that."

"I guess luck was on my side, sir," Bob told him. "I thought the girl and I were finished when that coping-stone gave way."

"I'm not thinking of your luck, my boy," the captain rejoined. "I'm thinking of your grit. But you're all in, Darrow," he added. "You'd better rest for a spell. We can get along without you."

"No, sir, I'd rather stick to the job," Bob protested, and, heedless of the battalion's chief's advice, he joined those of his comrades who were still engaged in the task of fighting the fire.

Meanwhile, June Madison was being carried to the auto, which she had "parked" farther along the street, before she had kept her appointment at the hairdresser's on the top floor. Her father climbed in beside her, and, taking the wheel, drove towards his home on the outskirts of the city.

Long after Madison's departure, Wilson's men continued their battle with the flames, but it was not before a "General Call" had been sent, and the sub-stations had dispatched assistance, that the fire was eventually extinguished. A section of the roof had caved in by then, and, the danger of falling masonry being imminent, the street was condemned for traffic and pedestrians.

When Bob returned to his quarters that evening, he retired almost immediately. He was played out, and slept soundly, but the following morning awoke little the worse for his experience.

He was told to report to Captain Wilson, and the battalion chief received him at his desk.

"Darrow," he said at once, "I don't know whether you're aware of the identity of the girl whose life you saved yesterday?"

"No, sir," Bob confessed. "I didn't get a straight look at her face."

"Even if you had, I don't suppose it would have told you anything, except that she's mighty good to look at," Wilson observed with a smile. "But it might interest you to learn that she was June Madison."

Bob appeared startled.

"Not James Madison's daughter?" he exclaimed.

"The same," the captain answered. "And Madison's just been on the 'phone to me. He wants me to give you a few hours' leave, so that you can go down to his house. He'd like to thank you personally."

Bob did not seem too happy over the idea, for his natural modesty made him averse to praise or gratitude.

Yet he felt it would be ill-mannered to refuse the invitation, and consequently he changed into civilian clothes and took a taxi to the exclusive residential suburb where the Madisons lived.

Three-quarters of an hour after leaving the station he was admitted to James Madison's palatial home and announced by a footman. He found himself confronted by three people when he was shown into the lounge—Madison, his wife, and his small son Jackie.

The moment the latter caught sight of Bob he uttered a delighted cry.

"Why, it's the fireman who saved me from bein' run over!" he exclaimed.

Bob had recognised the boy, and he stooped and patted his head.

"Hallo, young man!" he said cheerfully. "I'm glad to see you again. Haven't been trying to knock over any more fire-engines, have you?" Then he looked up and caught James Madison's eye.

"Darrow," the scientist told him, "I wanted you to come here, so that I could express my gratitude for the way in which you saved my daughter's life. When I asked the captain to send you, I didn't know that I was indebted to you for my little boy's as well. Nothing I can do will ever wipe out that debt, Darrow, but I would like to show my appreciation somehow or other."

Bob fidgeted awkwardly.

"It's against my own principles and the principles of the service to accept any kind of reward, Mr. Madison," he said. "I did no more than my duty."

"You risked your life on two occasions," Madison rejoined, "and, whether you consider you were acting according to your duty or not, it does not alter the fact that I am more grateful than I can ever say—"

He was interrupted at that moment by the opening of the door, and as Madison caught sight of his daughter he called her over to introduce her.

"June," he began, "this is the young man who rescued you yesterday."

The girl turned towards Bob, and their recognition was mutual.

"You!" June ejaculated, and then, after an embarrassed silence, she broke into a charming smile and held out her hand.

"When I met you yesterday, Mr. Darrow," she said, "I didn't think I'd have to thank you for my life. But I do thank you whole-heartedly, and—and you were quite right about that hydrant. I had no business to park my car alongside it."

June's father spoke again.

"Darrow," he murmured, "I wouldn't insult a man of your calibre by pressing you to accept some financial reward. But nevertheless, I wish you'd let me do something. If there's any way whatsoever in which I can help you, please tell me."

It was perhaps natural that Bob's mind should revert to the interview he had held with Madison in the latter's office the previous day, when he had discussed his patent fire-fighting invention with such disappointing results.

He did not want to trade on Madison's gratitude to further his interests, but he at least desired a chance to show the world whether or not the extinguisher on which he had been working was a success.

"Mr. Madison," he said, "you'll remember I called on you yesterday and tried to interest you in an idea of mine dealing with the quelling of outbreaks of fire. I'm afraid I'm not a good talker, and perhaps the invention didn't sound very favourable, particularly as I haven't had much opportunity for perfecting it."

"That's so, Darrow," Madison interrupted, "and under the circumstances I'm prepared to look into it a good deal more thoroughly than I was then."

Bob shook his head.

"I don't want you to think I'm urging you to take it up merely as a personal favour," he mentioned. "But I sure would be obliged if I could have the use of a laboratory for a spell and carry out one or two experiments. If the idea proved a success, all well and good—I'd give you the first option on it, Mr. Madison. But if it didn't satisfy me, I'd be the first one to admit failure, and I wouldn't let you take it up simply as a means of repaying me for any service you think I may have done."

"Darrow," Madison answered, "it's the very least I can do to provide you with lab. space for conducting your experiments. Of course, there will be no facilities in Firth Street for some time to come. Yesterday's fire has disorganised everything there. But my own private laboratory attached to this house is at your disposal."

"There it is, Jackie," Bob declared. "The Darrow Fire-Bomb, all ready for use."

The Experiment in Sight.

IN the week or two that followed Bob Darrow took advantage of every moment of his spare time by frequenting the Madisons' house.

Not all of those moments were spent in the laboratory, for his acquaintance with June ripened into a sentiment that promised to be stronger even than friendship—a circumstance that Dan Mitchell was quick to notice during his occasional visits.

In spite of the pleasant distraction of June's company, however, Bob put in a great deal of work on his invention, and he took Madison thoroughly into his confidence.

Madison was helpful, and it soon became obvious that he was keenly interested in Bob's project, little as it had appealed to him at first.

"Dan," he said to Mitchell, when the latter called one morning, "that young fellow Darrow has brains as well as courage."

Mitchell's lip curled slightly. "You think so?" he drawled. "Well, he never struck me in that light. Climbing ladders with a hatchet in his fist seems about all he's good for to me."

"Which is something very much to his credit," Madison put in curtly, feeling some annoyance at the tone Mitchell had used. "But he's clever, too. He's no talker—that's why neither you nor I were impressed with him that day we met him in my office. But his knowledge of practical chemistry doesn't fall short of mine, and I tell you candidly that I have high hopes he is on the right lines with his invention. If it succeeds, as I think it will, it will revolutionise the accepted theories on the extinguishing of fires."

Mitchell affected a mere casual interest, but to anyone but the unsuspecting James Madison the glint in the man's eyes might have betrayed something of his innermost thoughts.

"What makes you think Darrow's idea will turn out a success, Madison?" he asked.

"I've been watching him at work," the scientist answered, "and he's discussed the invention with me in detail more than once since he's been coming about the house. I'm convinced there's something in it."

"Well, I hope you're not disappointed," Mitchell observed, without sincerity, and a few minutes later he took his departure.

Leaving Madison's house, he motored to a shady little office not far from the docks. It was occupied by a certain Bat Thompson, who had figured in many an unscrupulous enterprise during a chequered career, and who was at present involved in the patenting of a fire-extinguisher which he and Mitchell hoped to market.

Thompson, a short, stoutly-built man with a crafty eye, was in conversation with a rogue known as Spike Beldon when Dan Mitchell entered the office. He cut short that conversation on seeing Mitchell, and greeted him breezily.

"Hello, Dan," he said. "Any news?"

"Bad news," Mitchell snapped. "Listen, Bat, that guy Darrow is on velvet. Madison's taken him under his wing, and he's giving him all the help he can with his invention."

Thompson leaned back in his chair comfortably.

"We should worry," he sneered. September 12th, 1931.

"Madison naturally feels under an obligation to this fireman, but he surely ain't crazy enough with gratitude to put money into something that's bound to be a failure."

"I'm not so sure that it's going to be a failure," Mitchell retorted. "Madison seems to think a lot more of it than he did at the start. In fact, he just told me he was confident it was going to turn out to be 'the goods.' If it does—well, you know what that means, Thompson."

"Sure," was the rejoinder; "our own little patent goes up in smoke, as you might say."

Mitchell nodded. "Too true," he ground out. "I was banking on Madison to put it across, and though he didn't seem too interested, I felt pretty certain I could win him round. But this fellow Darrow is in the way. If he gets in first with his invention we're done."

"How are you gonna stop him, Dan?" Thompson demanded.

Mitchell leaned forward confidentially. "I don't know a lot about the principle of Darrow's invention," he said softly. "But I do know that it's a form of explosive—not damaging to life or property—but calculated to quell fire instantaneously. Does that suggest anything to you?"

"Can't say it does," answered Thompson, after pondering a moment. "Does it to you, Spike?" And he glanced inquiringly at Beldon.

Spike shook his head. He was a foxy-looking individual whose proper element was the gutter, possessed of a certain low cunning, but not much intelligence.

"Well, I'll tell you what it suggests to me," said Mitchell. "Supposing somebody was to tamper with that chemical compound Darrow has discovered. Supposing somebody was to substitute it for a dangerous explosive just before the final experiment was made. Get the idea?"

Thompson and Beldon glanced at each other.

"Who's gonna do the job?" the latter demanded.

"You, Beldon," said Mitchell. "I'll put you wise to just what I want of you, and I'll hang around Madison and watch points in the meantime. When you get the okay from me, you'll go ahead according to instructions."

An Impromptu Test.

ANOTHER week had passed, and Bob, working in the laboratory attached to James Madison's house, had completed a series of minor tests which led him to feel fairly confident that the final experiment, planned for that afternoon, would prove a success.

Young Jackie was in the laboratory with him, an interested spectator of the last stages of a process that resulted in a glass bulb being filled with a dull, yellowish fluid.

"There it is, Jackie," Bob declared. "The Darrow Fire-Bomb, all ready for use."

"Fire-bomb," murmured Jackie. "It'll go off with a bang, then?"

Bob nodded smilingly. "Not a very big bang," he said. "You see, Jackie, it isn't meant to blow things to pieces. But it is meant to blow out a fire. In fact, that's just about what it does—blows it out at one gust."

"Without hurting anybody at all?" Jackie asked, in a tone of awe.

"I could drop it right here between us," Bob told him, "and we'd come off without a scratch. But you wait and see."

The barking of a dog from a kennel not far away reached Bob's ears just then. He paid no heed to it—was scarcely aware of the sound, indeed—or he might have detected a quality of menace in it, the deep-throated meow with which a good watch-dog greets the appearance of an intruder.

There was an intruder in the vicinity. He was Spike Beldon, hirling of those partners in a shady enterprise—Mitchell and Thompson.

From Mitchell, only an hour or so before, Spike Beldon had received the "okay," and, according to instructions, he was "going ahead."

The discoloured end of a cigarette stuck in the corner of his mouth, he sealed the wall surrounding the Madison grounds. It was the scraping of his feet against the stonework that started the watch-dog barking, and as the animal saw Beldon's head rise above the parapet his manner became as agitated as it was ominous.

He was bound to his heavy kennel by a strong chain, which sprang taut as he bounded towards the wall. His paws slithered in his frenzied but vain efforts to reach this and the ruffianly-looking stranger on the parapet, and wisps of straw flew in all directions, straw that had been piled inside the kennel and around it, so that the dog could bask in the sun or retire to the shade at will, with the same maximum of comfort.

Beldon was alarmed at first, but felt reassured the instant he realised that the dog was on a chain. He peered over the wall and singled out the laboratory, which he recognised from a description that Mitchell had given him. Then he shifted his glance towards the right, and perceived a dense mass of shrubbery growing close to the wall.

The shrubbery suited his purpose. It was out of reach of the dog below him, and it was an effective place of concealment, through which he could worm his way close to the laboratory.

The dog was still harking, and, with an imprecation, Beldon took the cigarette butt from his mouth and flung it at the animal. It struck the dog's coat and then fell amongst the straw, to smoulder there. But Beldon was unaware of this. He had already dropped back to the road, and was running alongside the wall, which he sealed at the point where the shrubbery grew thickest.

He dropped into the bushes and stole through them in the direction of the lab. As he was approaching the building he heard voices coming through an open window, and, drawing still nearer, he glanced cautiously over the sill.

He saw Bob and Jackie standing at the bench.

Meanwhile, the cigarette which had been tossed so carelessly from the wall was burning into the straw around the dog's kennel, straw on which a fierce Pacific sun had been beating down the entire morning. Soon a flicker of flame started up from the pile, and in the space of a few seconds a formidable blaze was raging.

The dog's barking took on a panic-stricken note, and if it had not attracted the attention of Bob and Jackie before, it certainly did so now. They moved to the door of the laboratory and looked out, and as they saw the flaming straw they uttered a simultaneous cry.

Bob whipped round and made a dive for the fire-bomb that stood on the bench. He snatched it up, and, with Jackie at his heels, dashed in the direction of the kennel.

The flames had already gained a strong hold on the small wooden hut, and the dog was dragging at his chain in a frenzy of terror. Bob's first concern was to release the animal, and, having done so, he retreated with Jackie to about twenty paces and then hurled the fire-bomb at the kennel with all his might.

The bulb struck the hut, and there was a dull report. A cloud of gas arose immediately after the explosion, and for a few seconds obscured the scene. When that cloud cleared away there was not a trace of flame coming either from the straw or from the kennel, and not a spark glowed where but an instant before a miniature fire had been burning furiously. Nor did the kennel show any sign of having been damaged by the bomb.

"Gee, it's wonderful, Bob," Jackie exclaimed in awe. "It put out the flames quicker'n forty buckets of water could've done."

"You're right, Jackie," Bob declared. "The invention's had an impromptu test, and it's turned up trumps. I only wish your father had been on the spot to see it. Never mind, though. He'll see the real test for himself this afternoon."

"But where are you going to get another fire-bomb from?" Jackie asked.

Bob grinned. "That wasn't the only one I'd made ready," he explained. "That was the last of half a dozen. The rest are in a rack in the lab. But come on, pal. We'd better have some lunch. Then, when your dad comes home from the City, we'll get busy for the big experiment."

They walked on to the house, neither of them being aware that a pair of eyes had been watching them from the shrubbery.

The moment they had disappeared Beldon slipped out of his hiding-place, climbed in through the window of the laboratory, and scanned its interior.

Mitchell had told him exactly what to look for and exactly what to do. Above the bench he perceived the rack in which Bob had placed the fire-bombs as each in turn had been filled with the precious chemical he had created.

From his pocket Beldon took a bottle, and he added a few drops of its contents to the liquid in the bulbs. Then he clambered through the window again, plunged back to the wall through the shrubbery, and scrambled over the parapet.

Sky-High!

AT some distance from the Madison house there stood an old tool-shed that Madison had for some time thought of demolishing. Since Bob had been at work in the laboratory, however, he had abandoned this idea, for the young fireman had declared that it would suit his purpose admirably, and it had been spared for the experiment with the fire-extinguisher.

Shortly after lunch, James Madison arrived from the city in company with Dan Mitchell. The supercilious manner which the latter reserved for Bob seemed tempered with a curious air of expectancy to-day, and in some vague way Bob was aware of it, though it was not till long afterwards that he was to connect it with the events of that afternoon.

"Well, Darrow," said Madison, after he had greeted Bob, "I'm here to eye-witness that test, and I'm hoping the fire-bomb doesn't let you down."

"I'm hoping it doesn't blow you all up," put in Mitchell, with a sardonic smile. "I wish you every success, Darrow, but I rather anticipate failure." Bob gave him a straight glance.

"It remains to be seen," he made answer, "but I haven't much fear of the consequences. An incident cropped up this morning that gave me an opportunity to try it out unofficially. The dog-kennel caught fire, and I pitched one of my fire-bombs into it. Jackie will tell you that it put out the flames instantly."

"It did?" exclaimed Madison. "That sounds hopeful, Darrow."

"Still," sneered Mitchell, "a dog-kennel on fire is hardly to be compared with a city sky-scraper, or even a shed like the one you're going to experiment on, for that matter."

"But it's an indication," observed Madison impatiently, "and if Darrow's fire-bomb proves effective when that shed is ablaze I'm taking it up. Anyhow, we'll very soon know the result. Are you staying on, Dan?"

Mitchell thought of the grim work on which his hiring Beldon had been engaged, and decided that he had no desire to be anywhere near at hand when the shed was blown sky-high by the "doctored" chemical.

"No, I don't think so," he told Madison. "I have rather an urgent engagement in town. But I'd like to say 'hallo' to June if she's around."

"I saw her through the window just now," said Bob. "She was walking in the grounds."

The three men stepped out through the French windows of the lounge, and presently discovered June not far from the shed.

"All set for the experiment?" June asked Bob.

"Yes," he told her, "and if you people will excuse me I'll slip off to the laboratory and bring the fire-bombs."

He hurried away, and June, her father and Mitchell were left in conversation. Presently Jackie appeared on the scene, but he was romping with the dog which had had such a narrow escape that same morning from being burned to death.

The grown-ups paid little heed to Jackie while he was playing around with his pet, and, the dog suddenly eluding him, Jackie gave chase. It was a chase that led him through the shrubbery and then back to the shed which was to be prepared for the experiment.

The door of the shed was open, and the dog dashed inside. Jackie followed him in full cry and crossed the threshold. The dog turned and tried to dart past him again, but Jackie pulled the door to with a triumphant gesture and then made a grab at his canine playmate.

The dog evaded him, and Jackie stumbled, twisted his ankle and fell with a little exclamation of pain. As he went sprawling he saw his pet leap for a small window in the side of the shed, to vanish through the aperture with a frisk of his tail.

Jackie sat on the timber floor of the hut and nursed his foot.

Meanwhile Bob Darrow had returned to the spot where the Madisons and Dan Mitchell were standing. He was carrying the rack containing the fire-bombs, and this he laid on a garden table that had been placed near an old elm tree some little distance from the shed.

Mitchell glanced at his wrist-watch. "Well," he announced, "I guess I'd better be on my way."

"Aren't you going to stay and see the experiment?" June asked him. "It's going to be the latest thing in fire-extinguishers, you know."

"Take care that it isn't the last thing in fire-extinguishers for you and your father," Mitchell warned. "Since it is explosive in principle, I wouldn't advise anybody to stand too close to that shed, just in case something goes wrong. I suppose you agree, Darrow?" he added airily. "You don't propose to risk other people's lives for a theory, do you?"

Bob controlled the feelings of resentment that the man's manner invariably aroused in him.

"I don't consider my patent to be merely a theory, Mitchell," he retorted. "But at the same time I'm not foolhardy enough to let anyone take chances, even though I have every faith in the experiment's success. Standing by this tree, Mr. Madison and June would be safe even if a charge of dynamite were to go off under that shed."

"Most reassuring," Dan Mitchell murmured insolently. "Well, Darrow, in that case I guess I'll stick around after all and get a little amusement—from behind the tree, I may add. Go ahead."

Near the shed stood a considerable pile of dry brushwood that had been dumped there by James Madison's gardener, and Bob turned his attention to this and began pitch-forking it against the walls of the wooden out-house.

He packed it in great quantities around the shed, completely encircling it. Then he set light to a brand and moved from point to point, plunging it into the decayed twigs and foliage.

"I'm not concerned about the shed," Madison remarked to June, "but you'd think Darrow was starting something that no fire-extinguisher could possibly overcome. With all that brushwood packed against the hut, it's going to be a regular beacon."

"Bob certainly doesn't seem to believe in half measures," June agreed. "He's giving his invention a terribly severe test."

"There are a lot of shrubs near by, too," Madison added, "and we've had practically no rain for a month. If anything went wrong and they caught fire we'd have a pretty fierce time heating out the flames. Still, I suppose Darrow knows what he's doing."

(Continued on page 27.)

RILEY'S HOME BILLIARDS

13'3 DOWN

All the family will find endless pleasure during leisure hours with a Riley "Home" Billiard Table. The 6 ft. size is delivered to you immediately on first payment of 13 3d. Balance monthly. Cash Price £11 15s. 0d. Rileys pay carriage and take transit risks. 7 days' Free Trial allowed. Send to-day for Free Art List giving full details of Riley "Home" Billiard Tables and "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables, in all sizes, for cash or easy terms.

Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Great Britain.

September 12th, 1931.

32 Free Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
Howard Works, ACCRINGTON,
and Department 35, 147, Aldersgate Street, LONDON, E.C.1.

"GUN SMOKE."

(Continued from page 20.)

fiercely, charging full upon them. It was impossible to stop that rush, and Darvis shouted wildly to his men.

"Off your horses—quick!"

The gunmen hurriedly dismounted, some of them falling off in their haste, and tried to squeeze themselves against the sides of the gorge. Then with a thundering roar the mustangs swept down upon them, and stones flew in showers as the wild horses rushed past, taking all the gunmen's animals with them as they galloped on furiously down the hill.

Another moment, and the herd had disappeared round a corner, leaving the gangsters alone without their horses in a wild mountain gorge, in a country they did not know at all.

Sue and Hampsey had dismounted at the first alarm. They crouched together in a little crevice at the side of the gorge and watched the mustangs go by.

"Brad sent them down the hill, I reckon," whispered Sue.

"Maybe," replied Hampsey. "I wish I could see Stub before I'm shot."

"Shot!" cried Sue scornfully. "You're not going to be shot. Darvis has forgotten us by this time. I expect he's run away. Let's look."

The girls peered out of their hiding-place, but Darvis was not in sight. For Sue had spoken truly. The gang-leader had forgotten the girls. He had a sterner job on hand than the threatening of helpless women or the shooting of unprepared men. The West he had despised had him in its grip, and escape would prove no easy matter, even for the boasted "King of the Under-world."

The End of the Gunmen.

AS the mustangs thundered past, one of the gangsters saw something so strange that it appeared to him to be miraculous. Hanging on the side of one of the wild horses he observed a man, and he yelled a warning at the top of his voice.

"Look out, boys, there's a man on that horse!"

No one heard him amidst the noise and confusion, and Brad, for it was he, hung on to the mustang until he came level with Kedge Darvis, who had found a side gully in which he was sheltering till the herd had gone by.

Skilfully throwing himself off the horse, Brad hurled himself on the astounded gang-leader, and bore him to the ground. But the young cowboy came down himself rather awkwardly, and the two men were on their feet again almost together.

In another moment a fierce fight was in progress. Quite alone in the gully, Brad Farley fought out his quarrel with the gangster, and he soon found that Kedge Darvis, driven to bay, was no contemptible opponent. Twice the two men came to the ground together, and each time they rolled nearer to the end of the gully. They got to their feet again, and closed. With a swift upward jab to the chin, Brad sent Darvis down once more, and stood over him.

"This country's too small for the two of us," he cried. "Get up and fight it out, you dirty hound!"

Darvis got up, and with a tiger-like spring came at the young cowboy. He dodged Brad's right as he came, threw his arms around his opponent, and down they went for the third time.

Over and over they rolled, striking fiercely at each other, and soon they were at the very edge of the gully. Beneath them yawned a great chasm, hundreds of feet deep, at the bottom of which flowed a swift river.

Another roll, and Brad was underneath, his head overhanging the chasm. The gangster got one hand firmly on his opponent's chin, and thrust fiercely. Back went the cowboy's head, until it seemed that the next moment his neck must break. Darvis knew that he was throttling his enemy, and he let out a yell of triumph.

With a last despairing effort, Brad brought his knee up in a jab to the gunman's stomach. Darvis lost his grip, winded for the moment by the blow, and before he could recover, Brad had scrambled to his knees. With a swift punch to the jaw, the cowboy thrust his enemy back, and then again the two men were on their feet, gripping each other and struggling with mad fury on the dizzy edge of the precipice.

Brad's face was streaming with blood from a cut on the cheek, but he paid no heed to his injury. Youth and clean living were on his side, and Darvis at length began to weaken. Brad felt his grip slackening, and with a great effort he called up all his reserve of strength, and raised the gangster in his arms.

With a mighty heave he hurled Darvis over the edge of the precipice. The gangster, screaming with fear, fell sheer down hundreds of feet into the stream below, and there disappeared beneath the surface of the water, to be seen no more.

Brad, gasping for breath, and trembling from his exertions, watched his enemy's fearful death, and when Darvis had vanished in the water, he turned slowly away.

"Well, he plugged poor old Strike Jackson and Sheriff Meed," muttered Brad. "I ain't got any pity for a skunk like that; the world is well rid of him. Now I'll find the boys."

The boys had done their part manfully. Some of them lay on the slopes, well in cover, firing down on the gangsters; others heaved away at the rocks, sending them crashing down into the gorge beneath.

The gunmen were beaten from the start. Their leader had vanished, they knew not where. Invisible enemies were firing at them from all directions, and rocks kept crashing down on their heads. They fired back as well as they could, taking what cover was available, but none of the cowboys was hit, and minute by minute the gangsters were losing men.

After a while Brad's boys heaved a great rock out of its place, and a tremendous landslide hegan. Hundreds of tons of rock fell into the gorge, and buried a party of gunmen beneath the debris.

Presently only one of the gangsters was left. He threw away his gun, and fled down the hill as fast as he could go. Stub Wallock got on his horse and followed. Picking his way through the masses of fallen rock, the foreman came in sight of the fugitive and gave chase, whirling his lariat round his head.

A skilful throw, and the last gangster was down, the rope round his body. Stub did not trouble to dismount. He drew the lariat tight, turned his horse, and rode back, dragging the unfortunate gunman behind him.

Sue and Hampsey had long been safe. Tack Gillup had been given the task of rescuing them, and he had contrived to hang on to the side of a mustang until he saw the girls in the crevice at the side of the gorge. Then he dropped off, waited until the mustangs had passed, and rushed up to the women.

"Quick!" he shouted. "Come out of that. We'll go down to the end, out of the way of the fight."

"But Brad?" gasped Sue.

"And Stub?" cried Hampsey.

"Brad's orders," yelled Tack, dragging the girls on. "You're to wait at the end of the gorge until he comes."

Tack got Sue and Hampsey down to the end safely, and there they waited in terrible anxiety, listening to the firing and the crashing of rocks as the fight went on.

"Nobody's come this way yet," remarked Tack presently, as the firing began to slacken, and at last died away altogether. "I reckon the boys have put those guys on the spot this time, sure!"

Meanwhile Brad had found the boys just as Stub Wallock dragged up his captive. A burst of cheering went up as he appeared.

"Well, Stub, did you get 'em all?" he asked.

"Yeah! Cleaned up the whole bunch, all but Darvis. I ain't seen him. None of the others got away—here's the last of 'em," replied Stub triumphantly, as he indicated the bruised and groaning prisoner.

"I got Darvis," said Brad, and the boys cheered more vehemently than before. "I pitched him over the cliff. He won't plug any more helpless old men!"

"Say, what about the girls, Brad?" asked Stub anxiously.

"Tack has got 'em out of the gorge by this time, I reckon," replied Brad.

"We'll go and see. You boys ride back slowly. We'll catch you up."

Brad and Stub rode away. They came to the foot of the hill, and there, to their great joy, found Sue and Hampsey safe.

"Oh, Brad, you're hurt!" cried Sue.

"You're not hurt, Sue. That's more important," said Brad. "This ain't much. Just a cut or two."

"We wiped up that bunch," proclaimed Stub joyfully. "Every one of 'em."

"Sue," said Brad rather sternly. "I warned you Darvis was crooked, and you wouldn't listen!"

"I was wrong," replied Sue humbly. "I will listen to you—after this."

"You wanted me to make something of myself—to imitate Darvis, you meant. I reckon. But I ain't going to be any different, so if you don't want—"

"Brad," interrupted the girl tearfully. "I don't want you to be any different. I love you—as you are!"

"You mean that, Sue?" demanded Brad, taking her in his arms.

"Of course I do!" whispered the girl happily, as he kissed her.

Stub Wallock looked on, and then turned doubtfully to Hampsey Dell.

"You—you— What d'you think of that?" he asked dubiously.

"I think you're the worst foreman I've ever seen," said Hampsey dolefully. "Your boss shows you what to do, and you— Say, d'you think Sue's the only girl who wants to be kissed?"

"Why, no," replied Stub, as, taking his courage in both hands, he approached Hampsey and gathered her clumsily in his embrace. "I reckon I'll kiss you, too!"

And he did!

(By permission of the Paramount Film Service, Ltd., starring Richard Arlen and Mary Brian.)

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

(Continued from page 25.)

June nodded. "I'm sure he does," she declared loyally, and her father looked at her with a shrewd expression on his face. "You seem to have taken a fancy to Bob Darrow, June," he mused, while Mitchell stood by frowning. "How could anyone help taking a fancy to him?" she answered, with a slight flush. "I'll never forget that he saved my life, and besides—he's so genuine."

"A fine fellow," Madison rejoined, and glanced in the direction of the shed again.

The brushwood piled against three of the walls was now blazing fiercely, and Bob had passed out of sight to kindle that which had been pitchforked alongside the farthestmost wall, the one containing the window.

The flames reared up there only a moment after he had touched the brushwood with the burning brand, and it was as the ugly tongues of fire lifted to the level of the window that Jackie suddenly became aware of his peril.

He was still sitting on the floor when he saw the flames, and as he caught sight of them he sprang up with a squeal and rushed to the door.

The door was on that side of the shed where the brushwood had first begun to flare, and the heat had already taken effect. The door was jammed, and refused to budge under Jackie's frantic efforts to open it. Outside, an inferno roared and crackled, an inferno that wrapped the frail walls and roof of the shed—blistering the woodwork and eating its way into it.

A volume of smoke poured in through the window, rolling about the trapped boy as he struggled in vain to escape.

He screamed out in mortal terror. "Bob! Help, Bob! Oh, Bob, I can't get out!"

The young inventor heard the cries, and his face paled.

That was Jackie's voice, and it was coming from the blazing hut!

Dan Mitchell and the Madisons heard the lad's cries, too, and a look of horror passed between June and her father.

"Jackie!" Madison faltered. "Good heavens! My boy is in that shed!"

Bob Darrow was seen to wheel round. The burning brushwood seemed well-nigh impenetrable, but, stripping off his coat, he flung it about his head and shoulders and rushed into the flaming mass of twigs and foliage.

The impetus of his dash carried him through the barrier of fire, and the point of his shoulder hit the door with a shock that burst it open. He lurched across the threshold, flame and smoke whirling in behind him.

Bob slammed the door to gain a moment's relief, for, though his jacket had protected him to some extent, his clothes were smouldering in places and he had been burned about the hands.

Jackie was cowering in the middle of the hut, and Bob snatched him up and wrapped him in his coat. Then he turned back for the door and dragged it open.

He had managed to force his way into the shed, but to escape from it was a different proposition. For the brushwood through which he had hurled himself had tumbled back into position, and was blazing even more fiercely.

A solid sheet of fire challenged him, and the heat drove him back. Protected though he was by the coat, it was doubtful whether even Jackie could have survived an attempt to fight clear, and Bob himself was fairly at the mercy of the flames.

He closed the door again, and turned to examine the window. A glance told him that there was no possibility of effecting a getaway there. It was too small, and just beyond it the fire was raging as furiously as at the door.

There was only one chance. If he could smash his way through one of the walls bodily, the woodwork, in its collapse, might serve as a shield against the flames, driving them under as it fell.

He threw himself at the planks. The shed was the reverse of substantial, but the wall against which he levelled his attack did not give at the first impact. There was a slight splintering sound, however, and though he staggered back bruised and shaken, it nerved him for a second attempt.

Fifty paces from the blazing hut Dan Mitchell and the Madisons waited breathlessly for Bob to reappear. Then all at once June started forward.

"Jackie!" she sobbed, breaking into a run.

Dan Mitchell dashed after her and caught her by the wrist.

"Come back here!" he panted. "You can't go into that hell of flame, June—you'll be killed! This cursed experiment should never have taken place!"

He was pulling her towards the tree again when he heard her father utter a sharp exclamation, and out of the corner of his eye he saw Madison dart to the table and snatch one of Bob Darrow's fire-extinguishing grenades from the rack.

Drawing back his arm, Madison hurled the fire-bomb at the shed with all his force.

Dan Mitchell blanched, and promptly sprang for cover, for he knew what to expect when the glass bulb smashed to pieces and the "doctored" chemicals reacted to the flames!

(Don't miss next week's breath-taking episode of this thrilling new serial. By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.)

"CRACKED NUTS."

(Continued from page 12.)

Wendell saw what had happened, but Zup was looking anxiously up at the circling plane.

"Will you get out of there before it's too late?" he vociferated.

"Thanks!" shouted Zup scornfully. "I've had enough of your advice—I'm going to stay right here until something happens!"

"Come here! Come here!" howled Wendell. "Before it's too late!"

Cried Zup, unwittingly putting a foot on the sizzling bomb:

"You lied to me—and I'll never believe you again as long as I live!"

"You won't have long to live if you stop to argue!" yelled Wendell frantically.

"Something's burning around here!" remarked Zup to himself, as his nostrils were smitten by an acrid odour.

He sniffed at his cigar, but decided that it must be something else, and he was gazing inquiringly around when Ben, almost directly overhead, pulled the lever that released the last bomb the machine carried.

It was the largest, the heaviest, the most formidable of all the collection—and its cap had been replaced. Just as it was whistling through the air, Wendell, a human wreck, reached the throne, dragged Zup out of it, and tried to tug him to safety.

The bomb struck the deserted throne fair and square, blowing it to smithereens and exploding the other capless bomb that lay in its path. Wendell and Zup were flung on their faces, and for a few minutes everything was blotted out.

Indescribable noises followed, combined with shouts, shrieks, groans. By degrees the air cleared as a terrific shower of debris settled. Zup and Wendell found themselves sitting side by side on a patch of blackened grass, staring at what seemed to be a black fountain issuing from the earth where the throne had been and leaping towards the sky.

THREE COMPLETE FILM NOVELS.

"WHITE SHOULDERS."
After years of hardship a gold miner returns with wealth and rushes a young girl into marriage. She runs away with a crook, but the gold miner trails her and plans a clever revenge.

"THE GREAT MEADOW."
Read this story and follow a bride and bridegroom through privation and Indian fights to a pioneer log house in far-away Kentucky. Starring John Mack Brown and Eleanor Boardman.

"THE STUDENT OF PRAGUE."
A poor student who loved a beautiful and wealthy girl sold his shadow for a large sum of money. A weird tale of the supernatural, starring Conrad Veidt.

JACK HOLT, MARY ASTOR and RICARDO CORTEZ

in "WHITE SHOULDERS."

Complete in this week's issue of our companion paper:

"SCREEN STORIES."

On Sale Wednesday,

Price 2d.
September 12th, 1931.

"What is that?" gasped Wendell. "An inkwell?"

"No," said Zup, staggering excitedly to his feet. "It's an oil well!"

"An—an oil well?"

"Yeah—we're rich, Wendell! We're rich!"

He tugged his chum to his feet and, gripping both his hands, almost danced with joy.

"We're rich! We're rich! We're rich!"

He held his cane upright upon the grass.

"Your fist on mine," he boomed, "my fist on yours, your fist on mine! That's right! We're pals and partners! Wendell, my boy, I have more friends in this little kingdom than I knew—and all will be well. There goes cock-eyed Ben to earth, and the worst is over. Rejoice, son, rejoice!"

"I am rejoicing," declared Wendell.

Zup took his arm and marched him across the wrecked ground and around the spurting fountain of oil towards a little group dominated by the baron. Boris and Ricardo were there, their black coats in ribbons, their top hats smashed in, their trousers torn—and behind them stood the four soldiers with their fixed bayonets.

"It's great! It's marvellous!" the baron was exclaiming over and over again, his eyes fixed on the rising column of oil. "El Dorania is rich! We are rich!"

Zup stalked right up to him and knocked down his extended arm.

"Where do you get that 'we' stuff from?" he demanded angrily.

The baron glared at him.

"You should be dead," he said, "but as you've struck oil we will not proceed with the assassination."

"You shall be dead if you don't shut up!" retorted Zup.

"Yes," said Wendell. "You know, Zup, I've been thinking this thing over. El Dorania shouldn't be a kingdom—it should be a republic."

Ho looked at the four soldiers, and the four soldiers nodded.

"You're right!" decided Zup.

"It's a marvellous idea," cried the baron. "And I will be—"

"You'll be surprised!" interrupted Zup. "Remove him, men, remove him! Your first president speaking!"

Obediently enough the soldiers seized the baron.

"Them, too?" inquired the officer, indicating Boris and Ricardo.

"Both of them," directed Zup. And all three of the troublesome conspirators were taken off to the palace dungeons.

But Wendell, watching their departure, said petulantly to Zup:

"Who says you're first president?"

"Why not?"

"We haven't decided."

"All right," responded Zup, "let's decide right now."

He flung his cane into the air and they both made a grab at it. Wendell managed to get one fist round it, but Zup gripped it with both fists.

"Congratulations," said Wendell resignedly. "You're our first president."

"Yes," nodded Zup, "and, for your sake, we'll make Aunt Minnie Secretary for War."

Aunt Minnie Looks Down.

NEITHER Aunt Minnie nor Betty had been present at the attempted assassination. Aunt Minnie disapproved of such El Doranian tricks, and Betty was horror-stricken. So they remained fearfully in the sitting-room of their suite at the hotel, shuddering every time an explosion occurred.

"I wish I had never bought any plantations in this dreadful country," whimpered Aunt Minnie. "That wicked baron is the cause of all the trouble. I wish somebody would assassinate him!"

"Wendell will have him beheaded if I ask him," said Betty.

"That rat!" raved Aunt Minnie.

"Zup was a far better man than he. I was almost beginning to like Zup—and now they're murdering him!"

A messenger arrived from the palace with the startling news that the kingdom had become a republic, that Zup was very much alive and had become president, that Baron Bogardus was incarcerated in a dungeon in chains with Boris and Ricardo for company, and that an oil well had been discovered which would make everybody rich.

"And you, madam," said the messenger pompously—probably because he was decorated with a lot of gold braid—"have been appointed Secretary for War."

"Me?" exclaimed Aunt Minnie ungrammatically. "Secretary for War? Me? Who did that?"

"President Zup," was the bland reply. "And His Excellency the President desires you and your niece to be present at the palace at three this afternoon."

"I shan't go!"

"In that case, madam, I am instructed to inform you that your estates will be confiscated!"

Aunt Minnie changed her tone completely.

"At three o'clock, you said?" she inquired graciously. "Tell his Excellency that I shall have much pleasure in calling on him."

At precisely three o'clock she and Betty presented themselves at the palace and were escorted to the council chamber, where Zup sat importantly behind a massive desk with an entirely new set of ministers around him.

In the streets of the city the flags and banners still waved—there was something for them to wave about now. And out in the royal park a number of workmen were busy with the preliminaries of dealing with an entirely unexpected oil well.

"I'm afraid," said Zup, "that we can't admit your niece to our council, Aunt Min—she had better go for a stroll in the grounds."

Aunt Minnie concurred, and Betty left the chamber. In the wide corridor just outside the double doors she encountered an eager young man in a ceremonial suit with a piece of sticking-plaster on his face—a young man who embraced her feverishly and raced her away downstairs to the terrace.

President Zup was discussing affairs of State in the council chamber which failed to interest Aunt Minnie. She wandered petulantly away to a window overlooking the terrace, and since the window was wide open, she stepped out on to a little balcony.

Down below she saw, to her infinite annoyance, Betty and Wendell, standing side by side before a man in black clothes who held a book in his hand. She leaned over the balustrade, and at the top of her voice she shouted:

"Don't you remember my telling you to keep away from that runt?"

"I do!" said Betty quietly. But she was looking at the man in black clothes, not at her aunt.

"And—and do you remember the warning I gave you?" howled Aunt Minnie.

"I do!" said Wendell—but not to Aunt Minnie.

The man in black clothes was a minister; the whole thing had been neatly contrived.

"I now pronounce you man and wife," said the minister; and then he smiled up at the balcony above his head, while Betty and Wendell flung their arms about one another's necks—and kissed.

(By permission of Radio Pictures, Ltd., featuring Bert Wheeler and Robert Woolsey, supported by Dorothy Lee and Edna May Oliver.)

GROSE'S, LUDGATE CIRCUS, LONDON.

SPECIAL OFFER

FOOTBALL BOOTS

Heavy Cowhide Uppers, Riveted, Boveled, Waterproof Soles, Special Blocked Toes. Sizes 11-1, 4/11 pair, 2 to 5, 6/11, Mens, 6/11.

Send for coloured illustrated list post free.

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge St., London, E.C.4.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

BE STRONG

I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-Control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-.—STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

STAMMERING. STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars free. FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

BLUSHING, Shyness, "Nervous," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-), including Airport, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W.A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Boy's Cinema

"Trapped" and "Creeping Shadows."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 614.

EVERY TUESDAY.

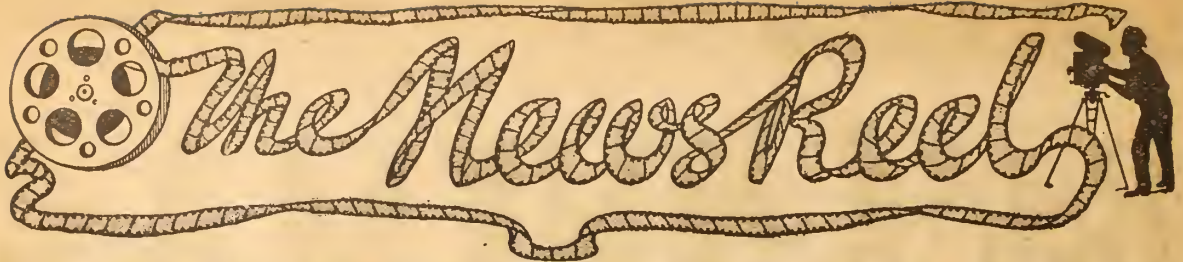

SEPTEMBER 19th, 1931.

BUCK JONES in

The TEXAS RANGER

A Fighting Drama of the West

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"The Texas Ranger."

Jim Logan, Buck Jones; Helen Clayton, Carmelita Geraghty; Matt Taylor, Harry Woods; Nevady, Ed Brady; Highpockets, Nelson McDowell; Tubby, Billy Bletcher; Lynn Alder, Harry Todd; Breed, Budd Fine; Mr. Clayton, Bert Woodruff.

"Trapped."

Jerry Coleman, Nick Stuart; Sally Moore, Nena Quartaro; Bettina Moore, Priscilla Dean; Captain Baxter, Tom Santschi; Jim Moore, George Regas; Joe Farley, Tom O'Brien; Ferguson, Jimmy Aubrey; Tiger Callahan, Reed Howes; Lena, Patsy Daly.

"Creeping Shadows."

Disher, Franklin Dyall; Sir Edwin Paget, Arthur Hardy; Lady Paget, Henrietta Watson; Gloria Paget, Margot Grahame; Brian Nash, Lester Matthews; Paul Tegle, Gerald Rawlinson; Cable, Hal Gordon; Sparrow, Ernest Stilwell; Peter Hoyt, David Hawthorne; Olga Hoyt, Jeanne Stuart; Inspector Potter, Matthew Boulton; The Limping Man, Percy Parsons; Chicago Joe, Charles Farrell; Sandel, Samuel Pringle.

Splendid Gifts.

Portable gramophones, pocket knives, pencil cases, wireless sets, wireless valves, accumulators, fountain pens, electric torches, watches, footballs, boxing gloves, etc. These are a few of the splendid gifts included in the Nestlé's Milk Chocolate Presentation List, which will be found in the revised and enlarged edition of Nestlé's Gift Book. Here is a splendid opportunity for you to obtain these attractive gifts by collecting the Free Gift Coupons which will be found in Nestlé's popular chocolate packings. You should send for one of these Gift Books, and with it will be sent a voucher for five free coupons to start your collection. Address your letter or postcard to Nestlé's (Gift Dept.), Silverthorne Road, Battersea, London, S.W.8, and be sure to mention BOY'S CINEMA. This offer only applies in Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

About Eddie Cantor.

Eddie Cantor, star of the £500,000 Ziegfeld-Goldwyn film "Whoopee," may be in Europe by the time this appears. His tour includes the principal cities, including London, Paris, Vienna, Rome and several other places of importance and interest. His visit is in connection with his second talking picture, "Palmy Days," recently completed by Samuel Goldwyn for United Artists. Both these films are based on Broadway stage successes.

Eddie Cantor's personal appearance in London will be his second since 1914, when he and his bride first came here for their honeymoon. In that year he appeared in Andre Charlot's revue, and introduced the song, "I Love the Ladies." Eddie's struggle for success has been a very real thing.

September 19th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

EDWARD G. ROBINSON

in

"SMART MONEY."

There was not a man who could beat him at gambling. He became famous for his luck at cards and at last the law went after him. They framed a girl to betray him. A crook drama that is one long thrill from start to finish.

"THE LAST RIDE."

A racketeer is "taken for a ride" by a rival and killed. When his brother found the body he swore revenge. A brave girl becomes his ally in his dangerous task. A gripping story, starring Dorothy Revier, Tom Santschi and Charles Morton.

ALSO

The fourth episode of our gripping new serial of the Fire Brigade, starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley:
"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

Left an orphan when he was only two, the streets became his playground, and he contributed not a little to the bedlam and chaos that is New York's East Side. When twelve years of age he began selling newspapers, and also picked up dance steps from those who knew the art. He was keen to go on the stage, and at Minor's Music Hall in the Bowery scored his first success during an exhibition of amateur talent.

Next he appeared as a singing waiter at a Concy Island open-air cafe, and in 1911 was given his first start as a vaudeville artiste in New York. Real popularity did not come to him, however, until some time after his return to the States from London. His silent appearances on the screen in "Kid Boots" and "Special Delivery" did not give much scope for his talent.

Eventually he became more famous on the stage, and in 1928 appeared as the star in "Whoopee." The play ended its successful run in March 1930, after which Eddie went to Hollywood for the film version and wider fame.

He Knew.

Matt Moore, who is Hollywood's most confirmed bachelor, was being directed in a love scene.

"Look here," said the director, growing impatient after three or four retakes. "don't you know what love is?" "Yeah," drawled Matt. "It's a term that's used in tennis."

Fog in Summer.

A fog indoors on a sunny day is a curious thing to have. But this queer happening for the screen was necessary when filming a November scene for "A Night Like This" at the British and Dominions Studio at Elstree. It was a fine sunny afternoon with only a few clouds flecking the sky, but within the studio a thick fog enveloped everybody and everything.

Along a London street there could be seen moving slowly the ghostly figure of policemen and a few other pedestrians. A spraying apparatus had created the fog, and as soon as the scene was over those who could were glad to get out and realise it was still summer.

Veteran Canine Artists.

About nine years ago in the silent version of "Penrod and Sam," there appeared a dog named Cameo who played the part of Duke. This same fox-terrier, despite her age, is still full of vigour, and will be seen barking her way through the talking version of the same picture, in which Leon Janney is the star. Incidentally, it may be of interest to know that Cameo is the only dog owning a motor-car in her own name. She has also her own room and her own little bed in her master's home.

Answers to Questions.

I shall be pleased, W.A.S. (Bristol), to send on letters to your favourites. With regard to artistes appearing in American films, remember when writing to them to give your address in full, including the name of your country. All letters should be in closed envelopes bearing only the names of those for whom they are intended, and the stamps should be loose.

Here is the cast, Edward (Winnipeg), of "The Indians Are Coming": Tim McCoy (Jack Manning), Allene Ray (Mary Woods), Francis Ford (Tom Woods and George Woods), Edmund Cobb (Bill Williams), Don Francis (Rance Carter), Charles Royal (Uncle Amos), Dynamite (Himself).

Helen Clayton became an outlaw to get even with a crook—and Jim Logan, a resourceful Texas Ranger, was sent to arrest her for a murder she had not committed. A splendid drama of the West, starring Buck Jones and Carmelita Geraghty.

The TEXAS RANGER

Burned Out!

IN Lorado Valley, Texas, one of the most fertile areas of rolling plain and wooded hollow in the cattle country of the Lone Star State, the name of Matt Taylor was hated and feared by all decent ranchers.

Avaricious and unscrupulous, he had persuaded the wilder and coerced the weaker of the settlers to join forces with him, so that he had become the head of a huge cattle syndicate and an absolute tyrant. But this was not enough to satiate his greed: he wanted the whole of the Valley to himself, and he had decided upon drastic measures to secure it.

Time and again he had interviewed and threatened the few who dared to hold out against his insolent demands. Now, considering himself to be above the law, he proposed to obtain by force what he could not obtain by cunning or intimidation.

He chuckled in a manner ugly to hear as he looked down through the dusty panes of a window of his office over the Syndicate Saloon in the little town of Bellington. A dozen of his hirelings were riding out into the valley to attach to the front doors of ranch-houses copies of an ultimatum which he had drawn up in this form:

"Be out of Lorado Valley by 5 o'clock or be smoked out.
"Last warning.

"MATT TAYLOR."

"By morning," he said triumphantly, moving back to his desk and addressing Ed Lanning, who was seated beside it tugging nervously at his moustache, and Sam Lanning, who was standing by the door as though he would like to escape, "there won't be a rancher left in the valley! Every acre of grazing land will belong to us!"

He dropped into his chair and glanced across at Ed Lanning. Ed and his brother Sam had been the last to fall in line with Taylor's demands, and their ranch—now absorbed by the syndicate—was one of the largest.

"I know it's pretty strong medicine, Lanning," he said, "but it's the only way we can get rid of these mangy homesteaders. There's only room for one ranch in Lorado Valley—and that's our Syndicate outfit."

"Don't you think you're going a bit too far, Matt?" ventured Ed Lanning. "There is such a thing as the law, and, though you may be sheriff around here, and owner of most of the town, there are such people as the Texas Rangers, and—"

"What's the matter with you?" broke in Taylor harshly. "You getting yellow? I don't want any welters trailin' with me. I'm after big stakes, and I want men I can depend on. It ain't too late for you Lanning brothers to go over to the other side—if you want to!"

Ed Lanning's hand slid from his moustache to his throat, which it caressed almost as though it were in danger. He smiled feebly at the narrow-eyed but otherwise good-looking schemer, and he liked not at all the malevolent twist of those thick lips beneath the fiery red moustache, the glint in those dark eyes that glared at him.

"Why, we're with you, Matt, whatever you think best," he managed to say.

"Sure," added his brother hastily, lest he, too, should be suspected of disloyalty. "Haven't we always done what you've asked of us?"

"Then you can help to-night, dear friends," taunted Taylor. "We shall need all the boys, I guess—and there may be trouble with the Clayton crowd."

He dismissed the two with a wave of his hand, and they were glad to go. But that night they were doomed to take part in a lawless raid that sickened them.

Taylor's men had attached the notices to ranch-house doors—mostly with the aid of knives, to give added significance to the threat—but not one of those who were warned had abandoned their property by nightfall, and at nightfall Taylor and all his men rode out of Bellington, carrying lanterns and flaming torches.

Six ranchers there remained in Lorado Valley who had defied Matt Taylor, and all save the Claytons had small holdings. One after another they were smoked out—which is to say that their barns and outbuildings and bunk-houses were burned to the ground and their ranch-houses set on fire.

Two of the six showed fight, but against overwhelming numbers bowed to the inevitable. At the M-Bar-M, the smallest ranch in the district, old Martin Spearman and his wife were deserted by their outfit as the horsemen came riding through the dark in a long procession, illuminated by the torches and lanterns they carried.

The outfit was hardly to be blamed, for already in three different directions

HELP THE NEWSAGENT.

Have you ever thought how difficult it is for a newsagent to order just the right number of copies of any particular paper each week? You can make his task much easier if you place a regular order with him. You will not only help him to order correctly and avoid waste, but will make sure of getting your copy regularly each week.

flames were leaping to the sky. Old Martin Spearman, white of beard and nearly seventy, hurriedly packed his most treasured possessions, assisted by his wife, then rushed to get out the buckboard. By this time the buildings and stacks were on fire.

"Don't cry, mother!" he urged, as he helped her up into the seat of the vehicle. "We'll get another home, some place. Them jaspers will pay for this before we're through. Look! They've turned away from here—they're headed for the Clayton ranch now! We'll have to warn 'em before it's too late! Giddap!"

Mrs. Spearman was weeping at the loss of a home and a livelihood, but she came of a stock that had faced with courage even worse dangers when the West was young.

"Hold tight, Mart!" she said. "And gimme that whip. If we're goin' to head Taylor's gang off, we've got to move lively!"

Mart drove with amazing recklessness for his years in the direction of the Clayton ranch-house, avoiding the beauteous trail, taking all manner of risks. But Helen Clayton and her father had already made preparations of a sort.

They had called the men into the pleasant ranch-house, and in the living-room Helen, slimly beautiful, but full of spirit, had addressed them collectively. Her father was the owner of the ranch and he dealt with details, but in most things she had been its manageress since her mother died.

"Well, what are we going to do?" she asked, her deep brown eyes flashing, her voice a trifle shrill. "Make our stand, or run like a lot of sheep?"

"We're in the right," responded Bob Nevady promptly, "and we've got the law behind us."

"Behind us is correct," growled Bill Garnham, a long, lean fellow with a remarkably ugly face and a tremendous walrus moustache, who was invariably known as "Highpockets." "So durned fur behind us it don't help any!"

"You've said a mouthful," agreed Tubby Bolt, the burly foreman of the outfit.

"What chance have we got against Matt Taylor and his gunmen?" demanded a more timorous cowman.

James Clayton, sitting uneasily in an easy chair, glanced up at his high-spirited daughter and shook his grey head. He had fought against all manner of odds in his younger days, but now he was old enough to desire peace at almost any price. So far he had resisted the overtures of Matt Taylor, but against gunfire and flame he felt unwilling to expose his daughter.

"Perhaps, after all—" he began.

But just then there came an urgent banging at the front door, and one of the men opened it, admitting Martin Spearman.

"The Taylor gang smoked me out, Miss Helen," he cried, "and they're headed this way."

Immediately the men who had responded so half-heartedly to Helen Clayton's appeal changed their attitude completely.

"Oh, they are, are they?" howled Highpockets, drawing his guns.

"Let 'em come!" chimed in Nevady; and there was a chorus of approval.

"Wait a minute!" commanded Helen crisply. "Are we going to fight—or only talk about it?"

"We're gonna fight, and we're gonna beat 'em, too!" shouted Tubby Bolt.

Mart Spearman ran back to his wife, who was still on the buckboard.

"Ma," he urged, "you get away with the things—I'm stayin' to see this thing through."

"All right, Mart, and Heaven bless you!" replied his wife. "If I was twenty years young—"

"Look!" exclaimed Helen, and pointed to a string of lights and flares moving down under a belt of trees. "Come on, boys, let's get ready for them. Hurry away, Mrs. Spearman. Turn out the lights, Tubby!"

Mrs. Spearman lashed at the horses and drove off, and her husband followed the others into the living-room. He was carrying a rifle, and was grimly determined to use it at the first opportunity.

All the lights in the ranchhouse were extinguished; the front door was barricaded.

"The back door—quick!" directed Helen.

And tables and chairs were piled against the back door, and beside and beneath the windows of the ground floor the men crouched ready to shoot.

Matt Taylor and his gang swept down into the farmyard and rode round and round the ranchhouse, Indian fashion, firing as they rode.

Broken glass fell from the window-frames in showers; six-shooters spat vicious jets of flame and bullets, and old Mart Spearman sent at least two of the night-riders to the dust with his rifle.

But Matt Taylor was taking no more chances than he could avoid. While he and most of his men circled the building the remainder were told off to fire the ricks, the bunkhouse, and the sheds, and after a while flames lit up the scene.

A wagon piled high with hay became a flaming furnace and was drawn by ropes to the porch of the ranchhouse, while all the time besieged and besiegers continued to fire. The porch was in flames when Matt Taylor himself rode close to a window and fired almost point-blank at the grey head of James Clayton.

The gun the old rancher was about to use fell from his hand, and he collapsed in a heap at Helen's feet. Tubby sent three bullets after Matt Taylor, but that schemer escaped without a wound, and, pulling up beyond revolver range, he shouted to his men:

"It's smoking now, boys. Let's go!"

They went, flinging their torches at the building, leaving behind three wounded men. Helen, who had been feeling feverishly at a heart which had ceased to beat, rose up and thrust her head out of a broken window.

"You'll pay for this, Matt Taylor!" she cried at the top of her voice.

"You'll pay for this till your dying day!"

One Thousand Dollars Reward.

AT eight o'clock in the evening of a dull day in March, eight months after this outrage, Ranger Jim Logan stepped smartly into headquarters of the Texas Rangers (Division "A") in Sterling City, entered the captain's office, and saluted that stern-faced officer.

"Ranger Logan reports, sir," he said.

Captain Jackson looked up from a mass of papers on his desk at the tall, broad-shouldered young man who stood before him. Jim was not specially handsome, but his clean-shaven face was a strong one, his grey eyes were quick and keen, and humour lurked around the corners of his mouth. A dare-devil by nature, a good friend, an implacable foe, and one of the most resourceful men in the service. That was why the captain had sent for him.

"Jim," he said, "you'll be relieved of patrol duty for the present. I've got some special work for you to do."

"Very good, sir."

"I suppose you've heard of that Clayton woman and her gang?"

"Yeah," Jim nodded. "Most everybody has. In the past few months she's become mighty popular."

The captain stared.

"And mighty unpopular," he said, "especially with those big ranchers in Lorado Valley. She's got 'em on the run, raid after raid, and nobody's been able to do anything about it. I heard something about those ranchers, but that was last year, and nothing came of it. Naturally, I know the story about this Clayton woman, and I've held my hand up to now out of sympathy—I had no absolute case against her. But now she's committed murder! One of the ranchers in that district was shot down in cold blood. Ed Lanning. Do you know him?"

"Seems I've heard of him."

"Well, pinned on his body was a note; 'With Helen Clayton's compliments.' Your orders are to bring in Miss Helen Clayton."

Jim looked as though he found the task little to his taste, and the captain interpreted his frown correctly.

"Sometimes the law compels us to do some mighty unpleasant things, Jim," he said, "but—"

"I understand, sir."

"All right—handle it your own way, and good luck."

"Right, sir."

Jim saluted again, went out and sought his quarters. An hour later he rode out of Sterling City on his white horse Silver, and any stranger who had met him would have imagined him to be a typical cowboy, for he had exchanged his uniform for cowboy rig, and was wearing a ten-gallon hat on his head and was carrying a lariat on his saddle-bow.

From Sterling City to the Lorado Valley is a matter of thirty miles, but in Texas thirty miles is considered quite an ordinary ride. Towards noon on the following day he dismounted outside the Syndicate Saloon in Bellington—and stumbled as he reached the ground.

He fastened Silver to a hitching-rail and went into the saloon, which was crowded with ranchers and cowhands. A few men were at the bar drinking, three dancing-girls were displaying their agility to the noise of a cracked piano and a banjo, but the majority of the patrons were grouped round a notice attached to one of the wooden walls.

Captain Edwards had taken action before he sent for Jim. Two rangers had visited the district the day before, and the notice on the wall was precisely similar to notices which decorated other buildings in the town and a considerable number of tree-trunks in the neighbourhood. It ran:

$1,000 REWARD

for the capture of HELEN CLAYTON,
Dead or Alive.

"Boy, that's a lot of money for one woman," remarked a little fellow whose cow-hat looked almost like an extinguisher on his head.

"Yeah—an expensive female," agreed another.

"I'd like to know what part of the country she's in," declared a third avariciously.

Jim heard and watched without appearing to watch. He lurched over to the bar, ordered some whisky, and gulped it down. He appeared to be already drunk, and his face was unshaven and his hat was awry. With a second drink in his hand he approached the group, pushed his way forward, and blinked at the notice.

"I'd know that woman if I met up with her," said a burly cowboy, conspicuous in his flaming red shirt, "but I'll say she wants some finding."

Matt Taylor descended the staircase from his office overhead in time to hear that observation.

"Boys," he proclaimed, "two thousand dollars to the man that brings her to me personally."

Jim swung round and nearly collided with the speaker.

"Two thousand," he said thickly, "thash a lot o' dough. Soon's I get caught up on my drinkin'—hie—I—I'll have her—that is I—I'll bring her to you pershon'ly."

Matt Taylor glared at Jim, and was completely misled. He gave him an impatient push which seemed nearly to upset his balance, but he returned with drunken gravity to inquire:

"Do any o' you hombres know where this fe-female bunch o' trouble is located?"

"That's something we'd all like to know," quoth the little man scornfully. But a bulky though short-legged rancher from an adjoining district declared emphatically:

"I wouldn't turn her in if I could. It would be blood-money! That girl's in the right!"

Instantly Matt Taylor's gun was in his hand and its barrel was thrust into the speaker's back.

"Is that it?" he snarled. "Well, now that you've had your say, get out of Lorado before morning—and stay out. Go on!"

The discomfited defender of Helen Clayton moved reluctantly towards the swing doors.

"It don't pay to talk too freely in this town," taunted one of Taylor's followers as he went.

"I'll shay it don't," guffawed Jim, and shuffled over to the bar again.

"With Helen Clayton's Compliments."

THAT morning Helen Clayton and her own faithful followers had ridden through a gulch in the foothills at the southern end of the pan-handle, forded the Lorado River—tributary of the Rio Grande—and raided Matt Taylor's own ranch.

Word had reached her in her hide-away that Taylor was in town with nearly all his men, and the opportunity had seemed to her too good to miss. A score of cattle had been driven down-stream, just far enough to lose their tracks, then headed for the gulch.

"There's some more stock Matt Taylor will be missin' when he gets back!" chuckled Bob Nevady.

"Take them over to our place," directed Helen, "and tell Lynn to go to Joel Winters at once and get that supply wagon out of town by midnight."

Bill Garnham, otherwise "Highpockets," rode up with four of Helen's outfit and a prisoner in their midst—a n ill-favoured, wide-faced rascal named Breed, who had been left in charge of the cattle.

"Just caught one o' them wabble-eyed, shoot-'em-in-the-back fellows," he reported. "Miss Helen, I'm wondering how it would be to plant a slug in the middle of such a nice, broad back!"

Helen, from her horse, looked down at the squirming captive.

"I've got a better idea," she said. "Tie him up and deliver him to Taylor—with my compliments."

"You won't let us boys have any fun," complained Highpockets. "All right—hog-tie him, then."

Breed was trussed up with a rope and replaced on his horse's back, whereafter he was conveyed to a spinney and dumped in the undergrowth till night-fall, with one of the outfit to keep guard over him.

After dark Highpockets returned, and Breed was conveyed cautiously into town. The main street was comparatively deserted, the saloon was full; but Matt Taylor was up in his office, talking to Sam Lanning, a bigger man than his dead brother had been, but a very nervous man since that brother had been murdered.

"Matt," he complained, "I can't stand this bounding any longer. Every turn I make I find a warning note from that Clayton girl. They're stuck in the doorway—they come flying through the window on the point of a knife in the dead of night. I haven't slept hardly since Ed was done in."

"Well," growled Matt Taylor, "don't you think I've been getting any little love-notes? The last one I found was wrapped round my cigar!"

"I half wish that bullet had got me, instead of Ed."

"Aw, come off it, Sam," said Matt, lighting a cigar which obviously was not wrapped in any message. "That reward will bring her in sooner or later. And remember—you can't play for high stakes unless you take some risks."

From the street came the sound of galloping horses.

"What's that?" cried Sam Lanning, starting to his feet.

The sound ceased outside the saloon. Highpockets and his companion had brought Breed to the very foot of the steps leading to the veranda, and there they pushed him from his horse so that he fell heavily to the ground and rolled over on his back, roped hand and foot.

Without dismounting, Highpockets turned about, and over the top of the swing doors he threw a screwed-up slip of paper, weighted with a stone.

The bald-headed bar-tender almost dropped a bottle in his haste to secure the missive. The habitués of the place crowded round him as he smoothed out the piece of paper and stared at its message.

"With Miss Helen Clayton's compliments," he gasped.

Jim, who had remained in the saloon ever since his arrival, and who had appeared to sleep away most of the afternoon with his head on a table, lurched forward.

"With Miss Helen Clayton's compliments, huh?" he cried. "I guess that's a good 'un."

In the noise and excitement of the moment, the sound of retreating hoofs went unnoticed. Matt Taylor had peered out of a window upstairs, but had assumed that some festive cow-hands had arrived, and had gone back to the table at which Sam Lanning was sitting.

But down in the saloon the receipt of that note and a shout from Breed sent nearly everyone running out into the street. Breed was lying in the roadway, shouting and cursing, and they gathered round him.

"Where's Taylor?" he howled.

Jim, stooping drunkenly beside the bar-tender, his hands on his knees, his hat on one side, and a foolish expression on his face, immediately replied:

Breed was lying in the roadway, shouting and cursing, and they gathered round him.

"Upstairs! S'pose you're not wantin' to wear that rope all night, eh?"

He produced a clasp-knife, but was shoved aside by the bar-tender while willing hands freed the sufferer from his bonds and helped him to his feet.

"Well," announced Jim, "I guess I gotta sleep off some o' this rye, so's I can go out and find that shertain party and catch the reward. My room's all ready, huh?"

The bar-tender nodded curtly, and Jim entered the saloon and tottered up the stairs. He was no more than half-way when Breed passed him, seeking Matt Taylor, and the bar-tender, watching from below, exclaimed disgustedly: "He's loco!" and went back to his duties.

The men who had surged out into the street re-entered the saloon—and Jim at last reached the landing and the wide passage on the floor above. But instead of making for the room he had engaged for the night he crept with the utmost sobriety and caution to a door which was slightly ajar—the door of Matt Taylor's office.

Breed was telling his story.

"And I found out where Helen Clayton gets her supplies," Jim heard him say. "Joel Winters is one of her sympathisers, and there's a wagon leaving the back of his store at midnight, bound for her hide-out."

"That's great news, Breed," rejoiced Matt Taylor, and filled a glass with raw spirit and pushed it over to him. "She's over-reached herself this time, lettin' you hear that and then sending you back here. Now we can get down to business! We'll stop Lynn Alder outside of town, hide in his wagon, and make him drive us to her hang-out. We'll take them by surprise—and when we've finished we won't be bothered any more with Helen Clayton and her gang."

Jim had heard enough to make him grin triumphantly. Resuming his imitation of a drunken man, he waddled along the passage to his room, entered it, and closed the door behind him. Then, once more, his alert and resourceful self, he went over to the window which he had opened.

Silver was still at the hitching-rail beneath. He clambered out on to the roof of the veranda, slid down it to the guttering, and after a low, warning whistle, descended neatly astride the horse's broad back.

The Hold-up!

At midnight, as arranged, elderly Joel Winters assisted Lynn Alder to load the covered wagon which was drawn up behind his store. Sacks of flour, numerous tins of corned beef and of fruit, together with household stores, were stowed away in the vehicle, and neither Joel Winters nor Lynn Alder had any idea that their movements were being watched with interest by a stranger whose right eye was glued to a knot-hole in the tarred fence of the yard.

"Looks like that's all," said Lynn finally.

"It is," responded Joel Winters. "Good-night, Lynn—and give my regards to Helen."

"I sure will." And Lynn Alder, a wiry, middle-aged man with a chin-beard, swung himself up into the driving-seat and picked up the reins.

"Good luck!" Joel Winters called after him.

The covered wagon careered across the waste behind the town, and Jim crouched behind the fence till the store-keeper had re-entered his establishment and bolted the door. Then he mounted the waiting Silver and shot off round the side of the building into the main road.

He had no wish to catch up with the vehicle; his aim was to head it off, and, quite as importantly, to discover on the way the spot where Matt Taylor and his men were lying in wait.

The road twisted and turned, and there was no moon. Jim very soon deserted the dusty way for the grassland bordering it, upon which he could ride without much sound. Half-an-hour out of town he heard voices beneath a clump of trees, and the rumble of the wagon behind him. He sought the shelter of a patch of mesquite, and crept closer to the waiting horsemen.

"There he comes now, boys!" exclaimed Matt Taylor. "Let's go down after him."

Between the trees and the roadway was a huddle of rocks, fallen at some time from a ledge that guarded the bank of the Lorado River just beyond. Taylor and half a dozen men rode down to wait behind these rocks and dismounted, but Jim sat motionless in his saddle.

The wagon approached, and Breed rushed out, flourishing guns.

"Stick 'em up!" he shouted at Lynn. "And get off that wagon pronto!"

Lynn, instead of obeying, lashed at the horses, and several shots rang out. Lynn clapped a hand to his right arm and dropped the reins, but the horses needed no urging now. With their ears laid right back they bolted, frightened by the bullets and the shouts.

"Follow that wagon!" yelled Taylor, from the middle of the roadway. And he and his men, having rushed out from the rocks in vain, went rushing back to re-mount their steeds.

But Jim had calculated things to a nicety. While the others were firing at the wagon he had ridden down to the horses and fired several shots over their heads, startling them into a stampede.

"Hi, stop those horses!" cried Taylor wildly. But the horses were not lightly to be stopped by seven men on foot. They had come tearing back towards the town, and it was not till the town was reached that they were re-captured.

Jim, meanwhile, had galloped off round the bushes and rejoined the roadway two hundred yards further south.

"Catch 'em up, Silver!" he directed. And the white horse sped like the wind after the runaway wagon, which was swaying precariously now over the bank of the river where the road ran.

A crescent moon came out from behind a bank of cloud in time to witness the daring act which followed. Silver drew level with the horses attached to the wagon, and Jim, braced ready to jump, his feet free of the stirrups, took a flying leap—and landed clean on the driving-seat beside the drooping figure of Lynn Alder, who was groaning.

"Oh-h-h, boy!"

"Where'd they get you?" inquired Jim sympathetically, as he snatched up the reins.

"In the arm, I believe. Oh-h-h!"

A masterly use of the reins restored confidence in the runaways. Their precipitate speed slackened gradually to a mere jog-trot, and Silver slowed down beside them.

"Let's have a look at that arm," said Jim, and stopping the horses completely he rolled back Lynn's shirt-sleeve and inspected a nasty flesh wound where a bullet had ploughed its way.

"I'll wrap it up for you, partner," he announced, and produced a large handkerchief which he bound tightly round the bare arm.

"Hurt much?" he inquired,

"Pretty bad, but I'm sure grateful to you, stranger."

"That's all right," said Jim. "Glad to be of service to Helen Clayton. Say, you'd better let me drive this team the rest of the way."

"Oh, I can handle 'em all right. I guess."

"Doubt it—and besides, I want to join up with Helen Clayton's gang."

Lynn stared at him suspiciously, but Jim seemed to be in earnest, and his grin was frank and friendly.

"You on the level, stranger?" demanded Lynn.

"Didn't I stop your dad-busted team?"

"Yes, that's right enough."

"How do you get there?"

"Well," replied Lynn, deciding to trust his rescuer, "you take this trail to Sentinel Rocks, then you take the lower trail through Hidden Valley, and cross the Lorado River."

"How far is it?"

"Well, after you take that curve it's about twelve miles, more or— Hi, what's the idea?"

The last four words were uttered in amazement; for Jim had abruptly drawn a six-shooter and its barrel was staring Lynn in the face.

"I'll tell you later," chuckled Jim. "But you've got to get down here!"

Nearly three hours afterwards Jim guided the horses across the Lorado River and reached the southern bank. He was alone on the driving-seat of the covered wagon, and Silver was trotting beside the leaders.

He saw the gulch ahead—and at the same moment was seen by two men, armed with rifles, who were perched on the wall of rock on the right of the gulch and were silhouetted against the grey sky of dawn.

"That's the wagon all right, Jack," said one.

"But there's a stranger driving it," growled the other, who was holding field-glasses to his eyes.

"Stranger?"

"Yeah—take a look!"

His companion took the glasses, examined the distant Jim through them, and handed them back.

"Gee!" he exclaimed. "I hope everything's all right. Let's go down there."

They clambered down to the far end of the gulch, where they took cover behind a tree, and Jim presently came driving the team neatly through the narrow opening.

"Pull up them there horses, stranger!" shouted the man who had been addressed as Jack, and he and his companion stepped out from their hiding-place with their rifles to their shoulders.

Obediently enough Jim obeyed, then held up his hands. He was not surprised; he had quite expected Helen Clayton's retreat to be well guarded.

"What are you doing with that there wagon?" demanded Jack.

"Driving it," replied Jim calmly.

"Don't fool with me!"

"I'm not fooling with you. Put down them guns, will you? They make me nervous."

One of the men climbed up beside him and poked the business end of his rifle into a broad chest.

"Where did you get this outfit, anyway?" he asked.

"Back about fifteen miles. Say, do you know old man Lynn Alder? They waylaid him back there, and me being a friend of his I thought I'd bring the wagon through for him."

"Yeah?" said the guard who was still on the ground. "You'd better take him over and let Miss Helen have a look at him, Bill."

A Close Shave.

THE gulch opened into a great fertile hollow, rimmed with hills, but its pasture-land was not immediately visible because a belt of trees intervened. Beyond those trees stood a ranch-house and outbuildings, and beyond the ranch-house was a large corral full of cattle.

Helen Clayton, in riding-kit with a gaily coloured scarf around her neck, rode over to the corral with Tubby Bolt, who was still her foreman, and Tubby contemplated with glee the latest additions to the stock.

"A couple more raids like that, Miss Helen," he chuckled, "and Taylor won't have enough beef left to fry himself a steak!"

"Yes, Tubby," said Helen gloomily, "but that doesn't bring my father back." And she turned her horse abruptly and rode back to the ranch-house.

She had dismounted and was standing in the doorway of the building when Jim, a prisoner between Highpockets and Nevady, was marched in at the back door and led into rather a bare room, used as an office.

"What did you hear about Miss Clayton in Lorado?" inquired Highpockets.

Jim, instead of answering, looked round at Nevady, who had taken up his stand by the door of the room and was whittling away at a piece of wood with a particularly formidable knife.

"What's he doing?" he inquired. "Building a house?"

"No—I'm making a trigger for a trap," snapped Nevady.

"I don't like that cowpuncher," Jim informed Highpockets; and at that moment became aware of a slim and very beautiful girl who was looking into the room over Nevady's broad shoulder. Her deep brown eyes enveloped him.

"What was that you wanted to know?" he said impishly. "What they told me about Miss Clayton? Well, one thing they told me was that she had big feet, and another was that she was knock-kneed."

The trick succeeded. Helen pushed her way past Nevady into the room and walked straight up to the prisoner.

"So I have big feet, have I?" she cried angrily.

Jim looked down at her feet, which were encased in riding-boots but were obviously small. Her riding skirt was short, but she raised it above her knees. "And I'm knock-kneed, am I?"

Jim rubbed his unshaven chin and contemplated a pair of knees that seemed to him absolutely perfect.

"Lady," he said apologetically, "somebody misinformed me."

"Who are you? And how did you get here?" she demanded icily.

Highpockets explained matters, and during the explanation she glanced frequently at the tall young man, so that Jim became acutely conscious of his unkempt appearance. Without waiting for her to decide what should be done with him he asked pleasantly:

"Can I clean up?"

She nodded and told Highpockets to take care of him.

Highpockets, highly disgusted, said:

"Well—er—you go on over to my cabin and make yourself at home."

"Thanks," said Jim gratefully to Helen, and was escorted to the back door of the ranch-house, where Highpockets jerked a grimy thumb in the direction of a cabin at the bottom of the yard.

The two guards who were waiting within call followed him across to the building, and Highpockets returned to his young mistress.

"I seem to have seen that Jasper some place before," Nevady said thoughtfully. "Can't just place him now, but I've got an idea it was along the border."

"Do you think he's a law man?" asked Highpockets.

"Well, I don't know—maybe it'll come back to me."

"I rather like the look of him," decided Helen, and left them standing there, staring rather blankly after her.

"I got an idea!" announced Highpockets. "Come on, Nevady!"

They went out together and crossed to the cabin. Jim was looking out of one of its windows as they entered. He had just washed his face and hands in a basin and was holding a towel.

"Reckon you'll want a shave," said Highpockets. "You'll find hot water back there on the stove."

"Thanks," said Jim, and took a tin cup from a table and filled it from a kettle on the stove, while Highpockets took an old-fashioned razor from its case on the dresser and proceeded to sharpen it carefully on a hone.

Jim, having made a lather in the soap-dish on the wash-stand, held out his hand for the instrument.

"Guess that's sharp enough," he said. "I can shave with that."

"Sit down," barked Highpockets, kicking forward a chair but withholding the razor. "I got a weakness for shaving gents. Close or medium shave?"

"Oh, just once over," replied Jim, soating himself rather reluctantly on the chair.

Highpockets draped a towel around his neck, pushed back his head, and lathered his face. Then re-opening the razor, which he had closed for the nonce, he began to shave his victim.

With the blade caressing a very exposed throat he said suddenly:

"By the way, you run across any Rangers down in town?"

"No—why?" inquired Jim.

"We heard one blew in last week."

"They're liable to blow in anywhere. Can't ever tell when them fellows are going to pop up."

"You're right, son," responded Highpockets grimly, sliding the blade over Jim's adam's apple. "You ever down around the border country?"

"No, I'm from the north. Why?"

"Nothin'. Have some friends down there. Thought maybe—Wait a minute—I'm not through!"

But Jim had pushed away the hand that wielded the razor and got to his feet.

"Oh, yes you are," he said, making

Helen, instead of obeying, snatched at Breed's whip and slashed Jim across the face with it.

once more for the wash-basin to remove the remains of the soap. "You know my skin's tender!"

Throughout the remainder of that day, Jim was permitted to roam the hollow, but was kept under surveillance. Late in the afternoon he came upon Nevady in the farmyard, fixing up his trap. The trigger was touched by accident, and the jaws of the trap closed mercilessly upon a podgy finger. Nevady gave vent to a howl of pain.

Jim raised his eyebrows, and Nevady scowled at him.

"It worked," he said. "I want to catch a skunk in it."

"You got one," laughed Jim. "Too bad you didn't have your neck in it!"

He went into Highpockets' cabin, and that lanky caricature of a man found him there tidying up the place—and stared. There came a thump at the door, and he opened it to find Minnie, a plump and middle-aged Indian squaw, who was Helen's faithful cook and housekeeper, peering through the window at Jim.

"What do you want?" growled Highpockets.

"Miss Helen, she say tell the stranger she expecting him to dinner to-night," was the unexpected reply, and Minnie stepped into the cabin to deliver the message in person, her plaits swinging defiantly.

"You tell Miss Helen I'll be delighted," said Jim.

The squaw retreated, but lingered outside the door to listen for comments. Highpockets was speechless with indignation, but Jim said confidentially:

"You know, Miss Helen is just the kind of girl I'd like to marry. Just my style!"

"Gar!" growled Highpockets, while Minnie ran back to her mistress, laughing as though she had heard a great joke.

"Minnie," said Helen severely, "what is that's so funny?"

"The stranger," cackled Minnie, "he say he like to marry a girl like you. You just his style."

"Oh!" exclaimed Helen involuntarily. And then: "He looks rather nice now he's shaved, doesn't he?" she said thoughtfully. "I've seen him several times out of the window. A real man, eh?"

"And his chest!" enthused Minnie. "It is so broad! And his jaw, so strong! And his eyes, so clear! I cook a nice dinner!"

§ Nevady Remembers.

THE dinner was a great success, though it was spied upon through the two windows of the living-room by nearly all the members of the outfit, who utterly disapproved of it.

Jim and Helen became friendly over the meal, and Jim was enrolled as a member of the gang long before it was over. A measure of intimacy having developed, Jim suggested a stroll in the moonlight, to which Helen quite readily agreed.

They walked and talked under the trees—and Jim appeared to be entirely unconscious of the suspicious men who followed them about at a discreet distance.

As day followed day, Highpockets and Nevady became more and more concerned about the increasing friendship between their young mistress and the stranger. But Jim proved a wonderful cowboy and a real help in the running of the ranch; and he treated Highpockets as a firm chum because he shared his cabin, and Highpockets struggled valiantly not to like him. Bad enough—from the lanky one's point of view—that Miss Helen had fallen under the stranger's spell.

A week after Jim's dramatic arrival, he and Helen indulged in a race across the hollow to a fallen tree on its southernmost side, one afternoon, and she beat him easily.

"Well, you won," laughed Jim, as he arrived ten lengths at least behind Helen.

"Yes, I won this time," responded Helen, seating herself on the tree-trunk. "But I wonder if I'll always win?"

Jim stood looking down at her. Her cheeks were flushed, her eyes were very bright.

"You're awfully mysterious, Miss Helen," he told her. "I don't know what you mean."

"I mean all this," she replied with a sweep of her hand. "Living like a hunted beast—outside the law. I'm wondering what the outcome will be."

"Well," said Jim gravely, "there's only one end for an outlaw. You know what that is."

"Yes, I know," she said quite frankly. "I've thought of it many times. Oh, I'm not thinking of myself, but of Tubby, Highpockets, Nevady and the others. They're outlaws just because of their loyalty to me."

At that very moment Tubby, Highpockets and Nevady were watching the pair from a distance, and their view of the situation was summarised by Highpockets thus:

"She's invited him to supper five times in succession. I'm wonderin' if she's fallin' for him."

"You wonder?" growled Tubby. "I know darned well she is! Come on—it's not for us to butt in."

The three retreated. Jim, dropping down beside Helen, said to her earnestly:

"Why didn't you let the law take care of all that happened, instead of taking revenge into your own hands?"

"The law!" she echoed bitterly. "Do you suppose I wanted to do what I'm doing? There's never been any law in Lorado Valley—except the law Matt Taylor made. If your father had been shot down in cold blood and your ranch destroyed with fire, what would you have done?"

"About the same thing as you did, I guess," admitted Jim.

That evening Highpockets, Tubby and Nevady, riding towards the gulch to receive reports from those who guarded it, stared blankly at a wiry, middle-aged man with a chin beard who was galloping in their direction. It was Lynn Alder.

"Why, what's the matter?" he cried as he drew near. "You fellows look like you'd seed a ghost!"

"That's what we thought you was, for a minute," declared Highpockets. "We figured you was dead."

"Yeah," put in Tubby. "The fellow who brought in the supply-wagon said you'd been bush-whacked."

"The heck he did!" laughed Lynn; but offered no further explanation, for Nevady's ugly face had become twisted with sudden recollection.

"It's just come to me!" he cried. "Who that stranger is! He's a Ranger!"

Lynn pursed his lips; but Highpockets howled:

"What?"

"He is that!" insisted Nevady. "Last time I saw him he was handcuffed to a prisoner down in Mexico Joe's place—on the border!"

Tubby gave vent to a shrill whistle; Highpockets, tugging at his enormous moustache, said thoughtfully:

"A Ranger, eh? That puts us in a tough spot, boys! We've got no direct quarrel with the law."

"No," snorted Nevady, "but we got to look after ourselves."

"And Miss Helen, too," nodded Highpockets. "I've got a plan, boys. Look! Here they come now. Quick—get out of sight!"

All four scattered, seeking cover behind a bush, as Helen and Jim wandered up together.

"I'm expecting you for dinner, don't forget," said Helen, and turned in the direction of the ranch-house.

Jim leaned against a tree-trunk, and was rolling a cigarette when the four bobbed up from behind the bush, with their guns in their hands.

"What's up?" inquired Jim—and grinned at Lynn Alder.

They surrounded him, and Highpockets assumed the rôle of spokesman. He informed Jim that they all knew now that he was a Ranger; and he did not deny the accusation.

"I gotta proposition to make," said Highpockets. "We got no quarrel with the Rangers, and we'd like to avoid having any. Give us your word of honour you'll leave and forget everything, and you'll ride out a free man."

"Thanks!" said Jim gruffly. "And I wish I could; but it's not on the cards, boys. I've already given my word of honour—to the Rangers."

"Well, there's only one course left," declared Highpockets significantly.

"I understand," nodded Jim resignedly. "Do what you're going to do—but don't let Miss Helen know who I am."

"We've decided that! We'll fix things, so that you just naturally disappear, and we'll tell her you deserted."

"Thanks!" said Jim ironically.

"Come on, fellows," barked Highpockets. "We gotta lot to do."

Jim was conveyed back to the cabin and made a prisoner in it; and at least five men mounted guard over him to see that he did not escape. But Minnie came to announce that dinner was ready—and this was a contingency for which Helen's devoted followers had not provided.

"Well, I guess you better go through with it," decided Highpockets gloomily. "We'll wait till after you've ate. But don't try anything funny, young fellow—we'll be watching you from every window."

"Yeah," drawled Nevady, "and you'd better make the most of 'this meal, Ranger, 'cause it's your last one on this earth!"

"Eat hearty, too," added Tubby. "They tell me the devil don't overfeed his guests!"

In the Hands of the Enemy.

IT was a remarkable meal that followed. Jim was escorted to the ranch-house, and in the living-room he sat beside Helen at table; but his appetite was conspicuous by its absence. He shifted uncomfortably in his chair, and every other minute he glanced from one window to another, wondering if the watchers would decide to shoot him while he offered so conspicuous a target, instead of waiting till the meal was over, as promised.

"What's the matter?" asked Helen. "You're the mysterious one to-night! Is it too hot in here? Shall I open a window?"

"No," said Jim hastily. "I—er—I just had a kink in my neck. A man gets it once in a lifetime, you know."

Somehow he managed to swallow some food, though he felt that it would choke him. And once when he looked at a window, Nevady displayed his clasp-knife as though he were slitting a throat, and once Highpockets pointed his six-shooter to indicate a growing impatience.

After the meal, Minnie brought in a teapot and cups and saucers, and Jim, only too eager to postpone his end, drank several cups of tea.

"Did you ever have your fortune told in a teacup?" Helen asked him, and insisted on telling his. But when she picked up his empty cup and examined the accumulation of leaves in it, she exclaimed:

"This is terrible! It looks like you're going away. I see a long, long road. No, I don't think it's a road. It could be a long rope."

Jim shivered slightly.

"I don't believe in those things," he said, and took the cup from her and set it down. "It's a wonderful night out to-night—with a great big moon. How would you like to take a walk with me?"

She sprang to her feet immediately, delighted with the suggestion; and together they went out into the scented night.

Five heads bobbed back out of sight as they emerged, five bodies were pressed close against walls or bushes; but after Jim and Helen had passed beneath the first of the trees all the nine men who formed the outfit followed stealthily in their wake.

"Isn't it quiet and peaceful?" exclaimed Helen. "It's a wonderful night—and you were right about the moon."

She turned abruptly, for Tubby had stumbled over a bucket, and she became aware of several shadowy figures behind.

"The boys seem playful to-night," she remarked.

"Yes," said Jim. "What say we fool 'em?"

She nodded readily, and he led her in the direction of the stables.

They entered one of them together, and the watchers immediately became suspicious and stole closer, quite prepared for Jim to come galloping out on his white horse in a desperate bid for freedom.

But Jim had fooled them. He and Helen strolled out from the stable and over the fields towards the distant gulch; and out in the open the watchers had to fall back or attract their young mistress' attention.

Five minutes elapsed, and then Jim, still strolling beside Helen, whistled shrilly; and out from the stable flashed the white form of Silver, hastening to the master who had summoned him; and while Highpockets and the others stared in consternation, Jim vaulted into the saddle—and lifted Helen up on to his knees.

"Oh, this is thrilling!" she cried delightedly.

It was! Jim shot off towards the gulch, and long before his discomfited custodians could saddle and mount their own horses he was through the gap, across the river, and careering through Hidden Valley.

But if Jim had left danger behind, danger lurked ahead. The trees were dense on either side of the trail in the heart of Hidden Valley, and as they rode out of the moonlight into the shadows they found themselves surrounded by horsemen.

"Oh!" gasped Helen.

"Helen Clayton!" cried the voice of Matt Taylor exultingly. "This sure is a great pleasure. We were looking for your hideout, and here you are! Rex, give the young lady your horse. She'll be more comfortable, because we've got a good way to go."

He turned to Jim.

"Who are you?" he barked, and his gun threatened.

Helen slid obediently to the ground and was helped on to another horse. There was no possibility of escape for at least ten men were gathered round them, and Jim had to think quickly.

"Don't you remember?" he said.

"I'm the fellow that promised to bring that girl to you—and you promised two thousand dollars reward. I want it!"

"The drunk!" exclaimed Matt Taylor.

"So you caught up with your drinking, eh? Well, she's worth that much and more to me. Head for the home ranch, boys."

The man addressed as Rex climbed up behind Breed on the horse which that ruffian was riding, and the whole party set off in the direction of Syndicate Ranch.

Highpockets and his companions streamed across the valley some little while later and drew rein on almost the very spot where Taylor had captured Helen.

"Well," exclaimed Nevada disgustedly, "that wabble-eyed son of a gun has got clean away! It's all your fault, Highpockets. We should have strung him up the minute we knowed who he was."

"Well, we're not giving up—not until we've scoured the entire panhandle!" declared Highpockets. "Let's get going, boys!"

Taylor and his gang were, by this time, well beyond Sentinel Rocks, and consequently out of sight. Almost a bee-line was made for the ranchhouse below Bellington, and in the very early hours of the morning the long, low wooden building was reached, and Helen was marched into a well-furnished living-room by Matt Taylor, Jim following of his own accord.

"I've been looking forward to this pleasure for a long time," said Taylor mockingly.

"Perhaps it won't be so pleasant for you when my men find out where I am," retorted Helen defiantly.

"It will be a pleasure to receive them, too," laughed Taylor. "I've been trying for months to draw them out of their hole so my men could wipe them out."

Breed appeared in the doorway, grinning maliciously, and Taylor turned to him.

"Show Miss Clayton to our guest room," he directed.

"Come on, Miss Clayton!" commanded Breed.

But Helen, instead of obeying, snatched his whip and slashed Jim across the face with it.

"She sure loves you, buddy!" jeered Matt Taylor.

"Yeah," drawled Jim, caressing a red welt on his right cheek.

And then Helen dropped the whip and moved past him, following Breed out into a passage which led to other ground-floor rooms and to the stairs.

She was escorted to a pleasant bedroom, and the door was closed upon her and locked. She went over to the window and looked down into the moonlit farmyard, torn between love and hatred for the man she misunderstood.

Downstairs, Sam Lanning had entered the living-room, and Taylor, motioning him to a chair, said to Jim:

"Here I am, Captain," said Jim cheerfully, "and I arrest Matt Taylor for the murder of Ed Lanning."

"Well, you've done me a great favour, pardner, and you're welcome to stay with the Syndicate outfit if you care to. Just wander around for a while, will you—we'll have a talk later."

"Thanks," said Jim, with every appearance of gratitude, and went out on to the veranda with a swinging stride. But once outside the building he crept along to the window of the living-room, which was open, and, crouching beside it, listened intently.

Sam Lanning was evidently uneasy. He and his dead brother had been coerced into joining Matt Taylor's precious syndicate, but neither had ever had any liking for the fellow, or for their association with him.

"What are you going to do with that girl?" he demanded anxiously.

"The same as I'd do with any other dangerous enemy," was the immediate retort. "When she's served my purpose she'll just disappear."

"Taylor," exsulated Lanning, "we've had enough of killing. It was rotten to shoot down her father in cold blood, but I won't stand for it being done to a woman."

"That's quite enough from you!" blazed Taylor. "I'm giving orders here. Will you listen to me?"

"No, I won't!"

"Then get out!"

A six-shooter gleamed in the light of the hanging oil-lamp, and Sam Lanning went out, passing Breed in the doorway.

"Shut that door!" snapped Taylor. "Listen, Breed: Lanning's getting dangerous; give him the same medicine you gave his brother. Understand?"

Breed nodded, and the listener outside the window crept away.

Lanning had crossed the veranda and was making for his horse. He had mounted it when Breed emerged from the building with a six-shooter in his hand; and he was taking aim at the man who was about to ride away when Jim's voice, close behind him, said urgently:

"Hi, half a minute!"

Breed turned his face—and in that instant a sledge-hammer blow caught him clean on the point of the jaw and sent him sprawling on his back, completely knocked out. Jim flew across the yard to Lanning.

"Breed was just going to shoot you in the back—Taylor's orders," he said. "Let's get him out of here, then I'll explain to you."

Sam Lanning nodded and slid to the ground. Together they crept back to the unconscious form of Breed, and between them they carried him into an outbuilding, where Jim roped him securely hand and foot, while Lanning stood on guard in the doorway with his gun.

"You say Taylor ordered him to get me?" inquired Lanning, as Jim rejoined him at the door.

"Yeah—just like he got your brother."

"What?" gasped Lanning. "But it was Helen Clayton—"

"It was that trussed-up guy back there," interrupted Jim with a jerk of his thumb. "I got the low-down when I heard Taylor instruct Breed to do the same with you."

"So Taylor killed my brother?" said Lanning savagely. "I'll settle with him now!"

"Wait a minute," urged Jim. "D'you want to commit suicide? Besides, Taylor belongs to me. Listen, I'm a Ranger, and I was sent down to bring in Helen Clayton for the murder of Ed Lanning, but this clears her. You do as I say, and I'll see the law gives you an even break. You can ride out of here all right, but I can't. I want you to go to Rangers Headquarters at Sterling City, and tell Captain Edwards I need him here immediately."
September 10th, 1931.

"I'll do it!"

"If you kill your horse, the Rangers will give you a new one—and you can sleep well in Sterling for as long as you like."

The Way of a Ranger.

OVER the lower half of the door of the outbuilding Jim watched Sam Lanning move stealthily across the farmyard to his horse and ride away. Then he looked up at the ranch-house—and Helen's face was plainly visible at an upstairs window, in the light of the moon.

Without a moment's hesitation he made his way cautiously to a post of the veranda, swarmed up it to the roof, and within a very few minutes was clambering in at the open window of the guest-room.

Helen started back in alarm, thinking at first that it was one of Taylor's creatures thus intruding—or even Taylor himself. With her back to the locked door she cried wildly: "Get out!" But Jim said masterfully:

"Miss Helen, I want you to listen to me. You've got to listen to me!"

"You get out of here!" she retorted, recognising his voice, and she punched him in the face with her little ineffectual fists. But he gripped her by both arms and drew her across to the window, where he swung her round so that they could see one another's faces.

"I'm not what you think I am," he said in a low voice. "I'm a Ranger, and I was detailed here to arrest you for the murder of Ed Lanning."

"I didn't kill him!" she shrieked. "I didn't kill him!"

"I know you didn't," he replied earnestly. "I just found out who did. Look!"

Still holding her tightly with one hand, he plunged the other into a pocket and displayed his badge. But at this moment Taylor ran out into the yard below, calling:

"Where's Breed? What's become of Breed?"

Several of the crook's followers came running to him—and then Breed called out from the darkness of the outbuilding in which he was lying on his back in bonds.

Immediately there was a rush for the doorway.

"Now we're in for it," groaned Jim. "They've found Breed!"

He told her hurriedly of the things he had overheard, and of the mission upon which he had dispatched Sam Lanning.

"But suppose Lanning should double-cross you, and not bring the Rangers back?" she exclaimed. "My men can't be far away; let me go after them."

"You'd be shot down before you got fifty yards. There's men all round this house."

"Jim," she whispered feverishly, "what can we do?"

"I got an idea," he answered reassuringly. "Get a piece of paper and write a note to Highpockets. Tell him to follow Silver, and sign it yourself. Guess it's about our only chance."

He himself found a piece of paper for her in one of his pockets, and while she scribbled a note with his pencil he pulled the curtains across the open window and stood behind them with his gun, ready to fire at any instant; for there was quite a commotion in the outbuilding where Breed had been found.

That shifty-eyed creature had recovered consciousness while he was being trussed up, and he had heard far too much.

"That cowpuncher you brought in with Miss Clayton," he informed Matt Taylor, while being freed of his bonds, "is a Ranger—and he knows who killed Lanning!"

Taylor's language was not fit to be heard, but his quick wit convinced him that Breed was not mistaken; every-thing fitted in only too well.

"Put a guard round the ranch, boys," he directed savagely. "If he gets away, we're finished!"

He darted out into the farmyard, and the others followed, Breed stretching his cramped limbs as he went. A score of men were summoned, and the farmyard and outbuildings were searched, but in vain. It did not occur to Taylor, or any of his men, that Jim could be up in the bed-room with Helen.

The search widened, the yard beneath the bed-room window became deserted. Jim, with the note in his pocket, said to Helen:

"The coast's more or less clear now. As soon as I get out, close these curtains."

"Be careful, Jim!" whispered Helen, as he clambered over the sill. "And I'm sorry I distrusted you."

From the edge of the veranda roof, where he crouched flat, Jim whistled, and Silver came cantering up.

His master slid off the veranda roof on to the broad white back and descended thence to the ground. He thrust the folded note under the bridle, and whispered in the intelligent animal's ear, and Silver immediately went galloping off in the direction of Hidden Valley, while Jim climbed back to the bed-room.

"I got Silver away all right," he told Helen, "but we'll have to make a stand till the gang comes. Here, take this gun and stand over there. I'll knock anybody who comes close."

Out in the roadway Silver was speedily sighted by Taylor's men, and by Taylor himself.

"He's sent that horse for help!" howled Taylor. "We've got to stop him!"

Guns spat and bullets whizzed after Silver, but the horse was soon beyond range of mere Colts. Horses were mounted, and more than half of Taylor's men set off in pursuit, while the rest, under their leader's direction, went back to the ranchhouse.

But Jim had been quick to take advantage of the diversion thus created, and all the doors of the ranchhouse were locked and all the ground-floor windows were shut and fastened.

Taylor, almost mad with fury at being defied in this fashion, shouted orders, and there followed a siege in which a girl and a Ranger held the building against the persistent attack of ten men.

A tree-trunk was being used as a battering-ram against the heavy front door when Highpockets, Tubby, Nevady, and the rest of Helen's men came galloping up. Silver had found them by the river, and Highpockets had found the note; but on the way to Syndicate Ranch there had been a battle with those who had pursued the white horse.

Taylor's men were routed, and two of them were left wounded in Hidden Valley, but the rest tore back to the ranchhouse, there to join forces with the attackers, who abruptly found themselves between two fires.

For hours the struggle continued. Breed went down, shot through the heart, and Nevady was badly wounded before Taylor resorted to subterfuge. He instructed half of his men to keep

(Continued on page 27.)

A gentleman of leisure saves a beautiful girl and becomes involved in a mix-up with desperate racketeers. Starring Nick Stuart and Nena Quartaro.

TRAPPED

The Mountain Road.

JERRY COLEMAN awoke with a swollen head, literally a swollen head, since it was not the result of having an excellent opinion of himself, but of having supped too liberally on excellent wines the previous night.

"Never again," quoth Jerry, holding a cool water-carafe against his aching temples, and then he called weakly for his manservant.

Ferguson by name, otherwise known as Fergie, the manservant speedily appeared. He was a dapper individual of timid mien, and though he had one of the most tolerant and generous of masters in young Jerry he had certain grounds for saying that being employed by a wealthy man-about-town was not always an ideal occupation, unless one's nerves were in perfect condition.

"Fergie," said Jerry, "where's my friend?"

The valet looked at him in bewilderment.

"Your friend, sir?" he echoed, looking around wonderingly.

Jerry nodded. He had crawled from under the blankets and was sitting on the edge of his bed, and he was still regarding Fergie inquiringly when he suddenly bethought himself of the top sheet and flung it back to reveal a bandy-legged, thick-set bulldog.

"Oh, here he is," exclaimed Jerry. "Isn't he cute, Fergie?"

"Your friend, sir?" the valet repeated dazedly. "Is that him, sir?"

Jerry nodded. "That's him," he announced. "Bought him off another fellow at the party last night."

Fergie coughed a disapproving cough. "Beg pardon, sir," he said, changing the subject. "But your breakfast is on the table."

"Breakfast!" wailed Jerry, with a grimace. "Fergie, where's your tact? Can't you see I don't feel like breakfast this morning? Listen, get me some ice-water. You hear? Ice-water. And then pack my things. I'm leaving for Monterey and going on a yachting cruise."

"Very good, sir."

Fergie departed, and Jerry made his way to the bath-room. He washed and shaved, and when he returned to his bed-room discovered that there was no longer any sign of his bulldog. He heard snuffling sounds next door, however, and passed through to the dining-room to see his pugnacious pup worrying the remnants of a pair of white trousers.

Fergie came into the room and gave a horrified cry at the spectacle which greeted his eyes.

"They're your yachting trousers, sir," he gasped. "And the only ones you have. The pair you ordered from the tailor's hasn't arrived yet."

"Great Scott!" said Jerry. "That means I'll have to go yachting in a lounge suit. Well, it can't be helped."

Twenty minutes later, attired in blue serge and yachting cap, Jerry stepped into a powerful roadster with Fergie, and took the road that leads from San Francisco through the Coast Range to Monterey Bay.

Had he but known it, it was a road destined to lead him into adventure such as he had often craved, but never dreamed of encountering.

Monterey was not the underworld, yet it was into the sinister realms of the underworld that that road was to take him.

The home of Bettina Moore, on the outskirts of San Francisco, was the home of a woman who had made a fortune out of the night club business, and who continued to swell her banking account from the profits of one of the most exclusive midnight restaurants in town.

Bettina Moore was a woman of some forty-odd years, still strikingly beautiful, though in her face a shrewd judge of character might have read traces of a past that had been marred by sadness and tragedy—a past that was like a closed book to Bettina Moore, hiding events that she sought to forget.

It was a past of which Sally, her daughter, had no inkling—Sally, fresh from the finishing-school, eager to see the world.

Bettina Moore leaned back in a deep armchair and watched Sally dressing before a mirror in her boudoir. She was following the girl's movements smilingly when a tap on the door diverted her attention.

It was the chauffeur, a man new to the Moore domicile, and none too savoury in his appearance, though his references had seemed adequate.

"My daughter wants you to drive her along the Monterey Road," Mrs. Moore told him. "Please bring round the car, will you?"

The chauffeur went off to do her bidding, and presently Sally came over from the mirror.

"Mother," she said, "supposing you take me to the Blue Moon Night Club to-night. I've never been, and I'm simply longing to go."

Her mother shook her head.

"No, Sally," she answered. "I want you to keep away from night clubs." "Oh, but mother," Sally protested, "the Blue Moon is your own night club. You're not trying to tell me that it isn't respectable enough for me to go to?"

Bettina Moore smiled. "The Blue Moon is one of the few night clubs that are respectable," she said. "But just the same, I'd rather you didn't go."

"Oh, all right," Sally murmured, "I won't ask again, mother. You know I wouldn't go to any place you didn't want me to. Good-bye," she added cheerfully, pulling on a close-fitting hat. "I'll be in for lunch."

She made her way to the hall and let herself out of the house. The chauffeur was waiting for her in the drive, and caught sight of her as he was taking a pull at a flask of bootleg liquor, which he quickly returned to his pocket.

Sally climbed into the car, and the chauffeur took his place at the wheel. They picked up the Monterey road in the hills, and had been driving for a little less than half an hour when Sally felt something steal about her shoulders.

She looked round swiftly, and saw that it was the chauffeur's arm. She could only stare at him in amazement for a moment, then with an indignant exclamation she pulled free.

"How dare you?" she cried. "Have you gone mad?"

He grinned at her insolently. "Aw, don't be sore, girlie," he coaxed. "A little pettin' never harmed anybody." And he slipped his arm around her again.

Sally became convinced that the man had been drinking.

"Stop the car!" she ordered fiercely, but he only drew her closer.

She began to struggle, thoroughly alarmed now. But the chauffeur did not release her, nor did he take his foot from the accelerator, and the car swayed from side to side of a road that was flanked by a lofty embankment on the one hand and by a cliff fifty feet in depth on the other.

Meanwhile, about half a mile to the rear, another automobile was travelling in the same direction at a high speed. It was Jerry Coleman's roadster, and with the speedometer registering seventy-five on a serpentine road Jerry was fairly enjoying the terror of his passenger.

"Mr. Jerry," Fergie howled, "Mr. Jerry, I can't stand it! My nerves, sir—oh, my poor nerves!"

The car flashed round a bend, its wheels showering dust into the ravine below. Fergie shut his eyes tightly as he glimpsed the fifty-foot drop, and uttered a prolonged wail.

But Jerry was no longer heeding him. He was now in sight of the auto in which Sally Moore was travelling, and as he saw it zigzagging along the road his gaze became riveted on it.

He was soon close behind the other car, and it did not take him long to realise what was wrong. At the first opportunity he pulled level with the chauffeur-driven auto, and then, setting the throttle, called to Fergie to take the wheel.

"The wheel!" screeched the valet. "But I don't know anything about cars. Oh, Mister Jerry!" This in an agonised yell as Jerry abandoned the steering, clambered over the side and leapt into Sally Moore's roadster.

The ruffianly chauffeur felt a grip on his collar, and, snarling, turned to strike out at Jerry. But the young man-about-town blocked the punch, and, dragging the fellow into the back of the car, battered his mercilessly ere finally tumbling him out on to the road.

Sally had had the presence of mind to take the wheel, and she brought the automobile to a standstill. Jerry instantly sprang from the car and sprinted to where the chauffeur was struggling to his feet. As he ran he realised that his own car was no longer in view, and imagined that Fergie had succeeded in drawing up.

But for an intervening turn in the September 19th, 1931.

road he might have seen the panic-stricken Fergie clinging to the steering-wheel like a limpet while the auto took a wild plunge over the fifty-foot slope to the right of the road.

Jerry came within striking distance of the chauffeur as the latter put himself in a posture of defence. But the man's guard failed to stop a stiff left to the mouth, and he was staggering back with blood on his lips when a smashing right-hander rolled him in the dust. He lay with one arm over his face in a cowardly attitude of surrender, and, his lip curling in contempt, Jerry made his way back to where Sally had pulled up.

"Oh, I—I don't know how to thank you," she said.

"That's all right," Jerry told her with a grin, brushing his yachting cap on his sleeve as he spoke. "You see, I—"

A scream from the girl arrested him, and, as he saw her point along the road, he whipped round and caught sight of the chauffeur moving towards him with a heavy piece of rock in his hand. His fists bunched, Jerry started forward to meet him, but the rogue took fright, dropped the rock and showed his heels.

Jerry turned to the girl again. She was smiling now.

"You certainly showed him where he got off," she said, and then, growing serious all at once. "But what about your master?" she went on. "He looked almost beside himself when you jumped out of his car to save me. He—he'll probably fire you, won't he?"

It took Jerry only a moment to realise that she had mistaken his yachting cap for a chauffeur's, but with an impulsiveness characteristic of him he decided not to enlighten her.

"Oh, yes," he murmured, "my employer. Well, I didn't care for the job much, anyway, and I daresay I'll be able to get another one."

"You don't have to look any farther," Sally told him. "Mother and I will be needing another chauffeur now. You can drive me home, if you like, and I'll recommend you right away."

The idea of keeping up the deception appealed to Jerry hugely, particularly as it would give him the opportunity of furthering his acquaintance with someone so attractive. So that afternoon, following an interview with Sally's mother, he returned home to don a chauffeur's uniform which he purchased at an outfitter's in the city.

He was studying his reflection in a mirror when the door of his room opened and a forlorn, battered figure appeared. It was the figure of Fergie, wearing a burst auto-tyre round his neck and carrying a broken steering-wheel in his hand.

"Your car, sir," he said bitterly.

Jerry laughed, and slapped him on the shoulder, a lusty gesture that brought a yelp from the valet.

"Fergie," he declared, "I'm through with driving my own car. I'm going to chauffeur for the prettiest girl in the world. And you, Fergie—you can take a holiday."

"I need one, sir," the valet groaned. "In a sanatorium—"

An Echo of the Past.

A BANK robbery was staged in Visalia, two or three hundred miles to the south-east of San Francisco. Three raiders figured in the hold-up, but as they piled into a car with their booty a town-marshal and a couple of deputies appeared on the scene, and one of the bandits was left in a heap by the roadside, shot dead.

Two hours later Bettina Moore's maid, Lena, announced a caller by the name of Farley, a name that seemed to draw something of the colour from her mistress's face.

"Show him in," she said, after a moment's hesitation.

Joe Farley crossed the hall and entered the lounge even as Jerry Coleman, spick and span in sky-blue uniform, descended a flight of stairs from his room on the top floor, to which he had been conducted a little while previously.

Farley did not notice the young gentleman-chauffeur. He was too eager to consult Bettina Moore to pay much heed to the household's staff of servants.

Rising from a chesterfield, Bettina Moore regarded Farley coldly. A thick-set man with a nose that had been broken at some stage in his chequered career, he looked out of place in that sumptuous room.

"You've got your nerve, Farley," Bettina said, "coming here like this."

Farley chewed the stump of a cigar. "Aw, that's no way to talk," he told her, in a tone of smug reproach. "I can remember a time when you wasn't so particular about what kind o' visitors you had."

"Farley," Bettina Moore answered bitterly, "that's a time I want to forget. It wasn't by any choice of mine that I mixed with a bunch of dirty crooks like yourself. And it wasn't through my influence that the man I married turned gangster. You were responsible for that, Farley—you rat!"

"Say, them's hard words, Bettina," Joe Farley protested, "an' I didn't come here to start any unpleasantness. I came to ask you a favour, for the sake of the old days before you bust into society as proprietress of the Blue Moon Night Club."

Bettina Moore laughed mirthlessly. "A favour?" she reiterated. "And you think I'm likely to do you one?"

"You'll do this one," Farley rejoined. "Listen, three friends of mine raided a bank this forenoon in Visalia. I've just had word that one of them got bumped off, but the other two are headed this way and they want me to hide 'em out. That's where you come in, Bettina. Nobody knows your record, and you're a personal friend of Baxter, captain of the police. These guys I'm tellin' you about would be safe with you—"

"So that's the idea," Bettina Moore interrupted. "I'm to hide a couple of your crook friends for you. Well, I won't do it. Understand? You and your talk of the old days. What do they mean to me? Do you think I'd jeopardise my daughter's happiness by letting her know that her father was a criminal?"

Farley blew a cloud of cigar-smoke towards the ceiling.

"I'm glad you mentioned that," he mused. "You see, Bettina, I was goin' on to tell you that one of those fellows who pulled off the Visalia bank robbery is Jim Moore."

If he had struck her the effect could not have been more staggering than that which those words produced. For a moment she seemed unable to speak, and then:

"You're lying," she said. "It's a cruel lie! Jim died ten years ago, five years after I cut loose from him and told him I never wanted to see him again."

Farley shook his head.

"You're wrong," he answered. "He was reported dead all right. But not long ago I learned the truth. Ten years ago Jim Moore was nailed in Oregon for killin' a night-watchman, but he was convicted under another name."

"I—I can't believe it," Bettina Moore whispered.

"I'm tellin' you the truth," Farley declared. "Jim's alive, Bettina, and it's him and his side-kick that you've gotta shelter. Listen, they've made a big haul, and you and me can make 'em share out for the protection they get—see?"

Bettina Moore's lip curled.

"Yes, I see," she said scornfully. "You want to make some easy money. Well, you can count me out. I don't want any of that dirty money. And as for Jim Moore, I wouldn't raise a finger to help him. What did he ever do for me except bring me unhappiness—while I was fool enough to stand by him?"

Farley's eyes hardened, and his ugly mouth tightened viciously.

"Supposin' your precious daughter was to find out about her father, though," he snarled. "Supposin' I was to drop the hint in certain quarters that one of the guys responsible for this Visalia job was Jim Moore, lawful husband of that prominent night club proprietress of the same name. Supposin' the newspapers was to blaze it out in the headlines."

Bettina Moore leaned weakly against a table. Her features no longer maintained that expression of fearlessness and resolution with which she had endeavoured to confront Farley. The man's cowardly threat seemed to have overwhelmed her.

There was a spell of silence. When ultimately she spoke, her voice was querulous.

"All right, Farley," she said. "I'll do it. You can bring Jim and the other man to the back door of the Blue Moon Night Club at ten o'clock. I'll see them in my office there and come to some arrangements for hiding them out for a few days. But get this and get it straight—if my daughter Sally ever hears what kind of man her father was, I'll never rest till you and every one of your gang are behind the bars."

"Bettina," Farley told her, "you don't have to worry about that." And with an air of supreme satisfaction he strolled out into the hall and let himself out of the house.

The moment the front door had closed behind him, a figure stole out from the folds of a velvet curtain near the entrance of the lounge. It was the figure of Jerry Coleman, and, approaching Sally's mother, he spoke to her urgently.

"Mrs. Moore," he said. "I couldn't help hearing part of your conversation just now. I thought that fellow sounded threatening, and so I hung around."

Bettina Moore was looking at him dully.

"How much—did you hear?" she murmured.

"Most everything," was the answer, "but your secret's safe with me. I wouldn't have dared to mention to you that I'd been listening, but I thought I might be able to help. If there's anything I can do, you can bank on me."

The woman studied him for a moment. He had shown the stuff he was made of that very morning, when he tackled Sally's chauffeur, and it suddenly occurred to her that he might be a useful ally in a vague plan that had been at the back of her mind during the interview with Farley.

"Listen," she said, "I've got an idea, and you can help me in putting it into practice."

At the Blue Moon.

SHORTLY after a hurried consultation with Jerry, Bettina Moore received a caller in the shape of Captain Baxter, of the San Francisco Police.

Captain Baxter was a fine, upstanding figure of a man, and a frequent and popular visitor at the Moore home.

"I happened to be passing, and thought I'd drop in, Bettina," he explained to Sally's mother.

"You know you're always welcome," Mrs. Moore told him. "Did you want to see me about anything important?"

Baxter took her hands in his own.

"Yes, Bettina," he said. "I wanted to ask the old, old question again. When are you going to marry me?"

"Did I ever tell you that I would marry you?" was the rejoinder.

Baxter gave her a rueful smile.

"No," he admitted, "I've never even been able to get you to promise that much. But you'd make me the happiest of men if you would."

Bettina Moore frowned. A little while ago she had been very near to accepting Baxter's proposal, but the news that Farley had brought her had changed her outlook entirely. She was no longer free, as she had imagined herself to be. She was tied—tied to a man who had long since lost all right to her affection, a man whom she had believed dead, but who was coming back into her life, unknowingly perhaps, to revive bitter memories.

"There was a time when you told me that you couldn't marry so long as Sally needed a mother's care," Baxter told her. "But Sally is of age now, and I don't think I'm wrong in thinking that I'd be quite acceptable to her as a stepfather. Bettina, won't you give me your answer here and now?"

She drew her hands from his grasp and turned away so that he could not see the expression on her face.

"John," she said, "I like you more than any other man I know, but I can't marry you. Please—please don't ask me why."

She had hardly spoken the words when Sally appeared on the threshold, and, running into the lounge, she kissed Baxter affectionately.

"You're almost a stranger, captain," she told him reproachfully. "Why, we haven't seen you for over a week, and usually you manage to look us up at least three times every seven days."

"The criminals in this town have been keeping me occupied lately, Sally," Baxter replied. "But I dropped in just now to ask your mother if she would consider me as a husband."

Sally glanced from one to the other.

"I see," she murmured, "and, judging by your face, mother turned you down again."

"That's about the hang of it, Sally," Baxter confessed. "What do you think about it?"

"Well, captain," the girl returned, "any man worth his salt shouldn't take 'no' for an answer."

Baxter looked at her mother and smiled.

"All right," he declared, "I won't. The next time I'm here, Sally, I'll still be asking your mother to change her name."

He said good-bye, and Sally saluted him comically. When he had gone she moved across to her mother and slipped an arm around her shoulders.

"Why won't you marry Captain Baxter?" she protested. "I know you're fond of him, and I'd just adore him for a father."

The ruffianly chauffeur felt a grip on his collar, and, snarling, turned to strike out at Jerry.

"Young girls shouldn't mind their mothers' business," Bettina Moore retorted laughingly. "Now listen, Sally, I want you to find that young chauffeur Coleman and tell him to have the car ready in a quarter of an hour."

Sally departed thoughtfully, and located Jerry near the garage.

"Mother wants you to drive her somewhere in the car," she told him. "Do you know where she's going?"

"Yes," said Jerry, "to the Blue Moon, I think."

Sally gave him a penetrating glance. "By the way," she said, "I saw you and mother in close conversation not long ago. What were you talking about?"

The question embarrassed Jerry, for he knew too well that the subject of his conversation with Bettina Moore was one which must on no account be divulged to Sally.

"You mustn't ask me that, miss," he stammered, and, beating a hasty retreat, he entered the garage and started up the car.

A few minutes later he was at the front door, which was presently opened by Sally's mother. She joined him in the automobile, and he drove her into the centre of the city, finally pulling up in a side street that flanked the premises of the Blue Moon Night Club. Telling Jerry to follow her, Bettina Moore let herself into the building and took him to an office with a door that opened immediately on to the restaurant, which was already half-filled with diners.

The office was occupied by a big man with an amiable but formidable countenance.

"I got your message, Mrs. Moore," the big man said, "and some of the boys are on hand."

"This is Tiger Callahan, my manager," Sally's mother told Jerry. "You must understand that, although this place is on the level, I have to have protection against the racketeers. Tiger has a gang of rough-necks at his beck and call, and no racketeer or black-mailer dares to dictate to me. Farley is going to find that out to-night."

Tiger Callahan smiled grim appreciation of the statement, and then broached the subject of their consultation. It was not long before full arrangements had been made.

"I get the idea," said Callahan. "Farley and these bank bandits are to show up in this office at ten. Sharp on time, the boys start a fight in the restaurant."

"Then you call the cops," put in Jerry, "and Farley and the bandits will be grabbed in the round-up. It'll look like just a plain accident, and they'll never suspect Mrs. Moore has arranged it. They'll go to gaol without squealing about anything that happened in the past."

They separated, Tiger and Mrs. Moore going out into the restaurant, Jerry returning to the car, where he waited for the space of an hour.

At the end of an hour he saw three stealthy figures enter the side door of the Blue Moon Night Club.

The Back Room.

WITH a good deal of caution Farley led his associates into that back room which was Bettina Moore's office.

His companions looked around them suspiciously. One was a tall, dark man with a hatchet face and a pair of brooding eyes; the other was a coarse-featured thug of scant intelligence.

"What's this, Joe—a double-cross?" the taller man demanded of Farley in September 19th, 1931.

a threatening tone. "It don't look much like a hide-out to me!"

"Ah, keep your shirt on!" snapped Farley, his eyes fastening greedily and covetously on a leather bag that the other was carrying. "When you find out who's runnin' this joint you'll feel as safe as a baby in a cradle, Moore."

"Okay, Joe," Jim Moore returned, "but I'll take no chances. Slug," he added to the third man, "go out and watch that side door we came in by."

The hour of ten was striking, and at that moment Tiger Callahan was phoning Baxter. He gave the captain only a few bare details, but as a result of that conversation a radio call was sent forth from the broadcasting-room at headquarters.

"Squad cars seven and nine," ran the message. "Squad cars seven and nine. Squad cars seven and nine. Hold up the Blue Moon Café. Hold up the Blue Moon Café. Hold up—"

But Farley and his associates had never an inkling of the net that was closing around them, though they stood on the qui vive when the door leading to the restaurant was opened.

Farley breathed again as he saw that it was only Bettina Moore. Then he heard a startled exclamation from the man by his side.

"You!" said Jim Moore.

"Yes, your wife, Jim," Bettina Moore answered.

"So you're with Farley's mob now," the man from the past said slowly.

Bettina's eyes flashed.

"Get this straight, Jim," she said curtly. "I'm not with any mob. I was forced into this hide-out act, and I'm doing it to save Sally."

"The kid!" breathed Moore, starting forward, and for a moment his face seemed to lose the villainy of its expression. "Betty, I'd like to see her. How is she?"

"What's it to you?" his wife rapped out. "She thinks you're dead. You are to her. And get this—if you try to open up to her and tell her who you are, I'll kill you!"

She had scarcely spoken the words when there was a sudden outcry in the restaurant, and next instant pandemonium was raging in the café. With an oath Farley wrenched open the door and saw a mob of men fighting in the middle of the dance-floor. They were Tiger Callahan's rough-necks, and they were playing their part convincingly.

Farley whipped round in time to see Bettina take to her heels in feigned alarm. He looked at Jim Moore sourly.

"Somebody's started a fight," he snarled. "Swell break for us, isn't it? Next thing we'll know, the cops will be here. Come on—let's beat it!"

He slid out of the office with Moore on his heels, and made for the side entrance by which they had gained admittance to the premises. As the two men approached the doorway they made out the form of Slug, and realised that he seemed to be having an altercation with someone.

That someone was Jerry Coleman; for, meaning to be in the thick of any excitement, Jerry had left his car and attempted to enter the building, only to be stopped by Slug.

"You can't go in there," Slug was now informing him, with grim emphasis. "Nobody gets past me!"

"Try and stop me!" Jerry challenged. And, with the words, he knocked Slug staggering with a right-hander to the jaw.

Even as he struck the blow Farley and Moore slipped from the shadows, and something round and hard was jammed into the small of Jerry's back.

"Be yourself, chauffeur!" Farley ground out. "Quick, where's your car?"

Jerry had lifted his hands, knowing that he was covered by a man desperate enough to shoot in cold blood. In answer to Farley's question, he now jerked his thumb to where the dim outline of Bettina Moore's limousine could be seen.

"Hop in and drive us to 16, Franklin Court!" Farley ordered.

Jerry did some fast thinking, and suddenly lowered his hands.

"Put down that gun!" he said. "I'm in the know. I'm driving for Mrs. Moore."

Farley and Jim Moore exchanged a glance. It was the latter who spoke.

"We'll take a chance on you, chauffeur," he growled; "but watch your step! Come on—get goin'!"

Jerry made for the car, Moore and Farley following him, and Slug bringing up the rear. A moment later the auto was swinging out of the side street.

Sixty seconds after it had vanished, Squad cars Nos. 7 and 9 skidded to a standstill outside the Blue Moon Night Club. They were joined at the kerb by another car containing Captain Baxter in person, and it was the captain himself who led the rush of uniformed officers into the café.

A flying bottle hurled by an over-enthusiastic rough-neck struck the captain a glancing blow on the temple, and as he recoiled Tiger Callahan sprang towards him anxiously.

"Are you hurt, captain?" he demanded.

"No," Baxter told him, recovering himself with an effort. "But these bank raiders who were supposed to be here! Are we too late?"

"I hope not," Tiger rejoined crisply. "They were in the back room."

Baxter hurried towards the office, but entered it only to find that the birds had flown.

"A clean get-away," he jerked. And then: "Where's Bettina?" he asked of Tiger.

"I don't know, captain," Callahan answered. "She went out of here during the fight."

Baxter turned to one of his subordinates in the force.

"Keep a couple of the boys here," he ordered. "I'm going to find Mrs. Moore and see if she is all right."

In a Corner.

STEERING the car into the drive of Bettina Moore's home, Jerry brought the automobile to a standstill and then led the crooks into the house.

He had no very clear plan in his mind, but he was playing for time. The scheme to have Farley, Moore and Slug rounded up as if by accident had unfortunately failed, and force of circumstances had compelled Jerry to bring them to the Night Club Queen's private residence after all. He was hoping, however, that a chance might occur to straighten things out and rescue Bettina Moore from her strange dilemma.

Jerry escorted the crooks to the lounge, and there found Sally. She started up at sight of him, and then looked at the men behind him in a bewildered fashion, for she was immediately struck by their scoundrelly bearing.

"These gentlemen want to see your mother," Jerry said, and at that he saw Jim Moore start forward, as if unable to restrain the impulse to take the girl in his arms and announce his identity.

If that were his intention, he never put it into practice, for at that same moment Farley swaggered towards Sally and laid his hand on her shoulder familiarly.

"Well, well," he said with a leer, "so you're Betty's little daughter. My old friend Betty's little girl—all grown up and everything."

Sally recoiled involuntarily. "Jerry," she said hurriedly, "you'd better try and get in touch with mother by 'phone."

Jerry went out of the room, and Sally was attempting to follow him when Farley caught her by the arm. There was an expression on his evil face that made the girl recoil, but the grasp of his hand tightened as she tried to draw away.

"Why don't you be a nice little girl an' entertain us until your mother comes?" said Farley, baring his teeth in an ugly grin.

Standing in the background, Jim Moore's eyes were blazing like live coals, and suddenly his voice cut across the room:

"Farley!"

That was all; but the fierceness with which he spoke expressed a threat as ominous as the gun he carried on his hip, and Farley's hold relaxed. The moment she was free, Sally hurriedly made her escape from the room, and as she disappeared Jim Moore stepped close to his associate.

"Still up to your old tricks, eh, Farley?" he snarled. "Well, you lay off this kid! You understand?"

Farley looked at him venomously, but held himself in check, reflecting that there would be plenty of opportunities, during the next day or two, of seeing Sally when Moore wasn't around.

"Ah, don't get het-up, Jim!" he scoffed. "I didn't mean no harm. Was just tryin' to be affable, see?"

The front door of the house opened and slammed before he could say more, and Sally's mother came into the room. As she caught sight of the three crooks she knew that her scheme to have them rounded up at the Blue Moon Café had failed completely, but, at the same time, she realised that for Sally's sake they must not be taken prisoner here.

"Quick!" she rapped out. "Upstairs! The police may be coming here!"

She had scarcely disposed of her unwelcome guests when she received another visitor in the person of Captain Baxter, and as she saw the wound on his temple her dilemma was for the moment forgotten in her concern for the police chief.

"Oh, my dear," she said anxiously, "you're hurt!"

"It's just a scratch," Baxter assured her, "and I wouldn't stop to have it attended to until I knew you were all right. But if you don't mind, I'll go upstairs and clean up a bit."

She caught his arm swiftly. "No," she gasped. "Let me—take care of it for you."

"All right," Baxter agreed, to her relief, and followed her into the lounge, where she made him sit down while she fetched water to bathe his injury.

"Tell me how it happened," she said, when she had finished dressing the wound.

"Well, I dropped into your club, and found you were gone," he explained. "There was a little trouble, and I got hit with a bottle."

Bettina Moore drew in her breath.

"Thank heaven it was no worse!" she said fervently. "You might have been killed."

"Not me!" the captain retorted. "It would take more than an empty bottle to finish me. You know," he added with a chuckle, "I'd take a sock on the head every day in the week if I knew you were to be my nurse. If I get another one to-night I'll be back."

"You're going now?" Bettina asked him.

"Yes," he replied, "I'll have to turn in a report to the district attorney. Thanks, Betty—and—good-night!"

He left the house and drove off in his car. As he was approaching the gates his headlights picked out a young couple sitting in a leafy bower, and he smiled as he recognised Sally and the new chauffeur.

He might not have smiled had he been in a position to overhear their conversation.

"Jerry," Sally was saying, "I'm simply terrified. Something queer is going on. Mother has been upset all day, and then—those awful-looking men! What are they doing here? You brought them, Jerry. You know more than you'll admit. Won't you tell me what it's all about?"

"There's nothing I dare tell you," Jerry murmured, "or I would."

"Don't you trust me?" she appealed.

"Of course I do!" he answered emphatically. "But I don't know what to do. This mix-up is too serious for a girl like you, and what you've got to do is to trust me."

She lowered her eyes. "I do trust you, Jerry," she told him, "and I'll do anything you say."

"All right, then," he declared, with a sudden change of manner, "then you'll marry me to-morrow, so that I can take you away from all this trouble."

Five minutes later Sally led Jerry into the house and walked through to the lounge, where she found her mother.

"Mother dear," she announced boldly, "Jerry has something to tell you."

Bettina Moore looked at her new chauffeur inquiringly, and Jerry cleared his throat.

"Yes, Mrs. Moore," he began, "you see, Sally and I have decided to get married. I—I want to take care of her."

Sally's mother leaned back in her chair and regarded the young couple in amazement.

"What a brilliant idea that is," she observed, as soon as she had found her voice. "It's too bad that it won't work."

"Won't work?" Jerry echoed. "That's what I said," Mrs. Moore rejoined. "You want to take care of Sally on a chauffeur's salary, do you? Why, you couldn't take care of yourself if you didn't get room and board."

A twinkle appeared in Jerry's eye. He was thinking of his palatial home on the other side of the city.

"It's true my salary as a chauffeur is small," he agreed, "but—"

Sally interrupted him.

"Mother," she insisted, "I'm in love with Jerry, and I wouldn't care if he didn't have a nickel. We could get along."

"Oh, that's nonsense!" Mrs. Moore retorted, and, turning to Jerry: "Young man," she continued, "my daughter has been raised in luxury, and, no matter how much she thinks she cares for you, I have other plans for her."

"But—"

"Let's hear no more about this," Mrs. Moore said with finality. "To-morrow you'll both realise how foolish you are."

Farley was still alive, but it was plain that he was very near the end.

A House of Fear.

THE three fugitives from the law had fairly installed themselves in Bettina Moore's residence by the following morning, and, with the exception of Jim Moore, seemed completely at their ease.

Reclining in the lounge, they read the morning papers, and they were engrossed in the headlines which dealt with the affair at the Blue Moon Café when Sally's mother hurriedly entered the room.

"Quick!" she said, in a tone of agitation. "Upstairs and out of sight. The police are here!"

A car was drawing up in the drive at that very moment, and from it stepped Baxter and three or four subordinates.

"Harrigan," the captain said to one of his men, "go round to the back of the house and watch it on that side. The rest of you boys spread out."

While the officers were scattering to surround the building, Baxter walked up the steps to the front door, which was opened by Lena, the maid. He was shown into the lounge, where he discovered Bettina Moore alone.

"Hallo, my dear!" she greeted him. "How's the head?" And then, as if noticing his serious mien for the first time: "Why, what's the matter?" she inquired. "Why so grim?"

"Bettina," he told her, "they aren't satisfied, back at headquarters, with that mix-up at your café last night. The men who pulled that bank job at Visalia were seen leaving the night club in a car registered to you, and are believed to have come here. The district attorney wants an investigation."

Bettina Moore's heart was pounding against her ribs, but she managed to control her emotions.

"Why, you're not accusing me of a tie-up with that kind of trash, are you?" she exclaimed. "My car's in the garage, and you're certainly welcome to search the house."

"Don't talk that way, dear," he urged. "I know you don't know anything about it, but the D. A. wants to speak to that new chauffeur of yours. Where is he?"

Bettina Moore shrugged.

"He's not in just now," she answered. "But this is so silly. Jerry is just a nice young fellow who wouldn't do any harm to anybody."

"I'm sorry, dear," Baxter rejoined. "but my orders are to bring him in, and you'll have to tell me where I can locate him."

"I fancy I'm the man you're looking for," said a voice behind him. "I'm Mrs. Moore's chauffeur."

Jerry stood in the doorway of the lounge, prepared to make some show of giving himself up in order to help Sally's mother out of her predicament and prevent any intensive search that might reveal the presence of the three men hiding there.

Baxter faced him

"I guess you'll have to come along," he declared. "If you're on the square, you can soon prove it. So long, Bettina!"

He escorted Jerry from the house, and recalled his men from the grounds. With their prisoner in their midst, the officers drove off, but as the auto swung on to the road Jerry made a sudden bid for liberty.

Taking his captors unawares, he eluded them and sprang from the back of the car. As he dropped to the ground he saw a familiar figure running towards him.

It was the figure of his valet Ferguson, and Fergie was leading his master's bow-legged bull-dog by a leash,

September 19th, 1931.

"Mr. Coleman," he wailed, "Mr. Coleman, I've been looking everywhere for you."

Jerry dived past him, and sprinted through the gateway to Bettina Moore's house. He was halfway up the drive when the police-car came to a standstill, and a couple of officers leapt from it to give chase.

On a lawn not far from the french windows of the lounge Jerry caught sight of Sally and raced across to where she was standing.

"Listen," he panted, "before anything else happens we're going to be married, right away. Meet me in twenty minutes at the little church parsonage. I'll be waiting there for you!"

His two pursuers appearing at that moment, Jerry dashed on, plunging into a dense mass of shrubbery. Meanwhile Sally slipped into the house and hurried upstairs to her room, where she began to make preparations for her appointment at the minister's.

She was pulling on a close-fitting hat when, in the mirror before which she stood, she saw the door slowly open, and next instant a sharp exclamation escaped her as she caught sight of a man's reflection.

The man was Farley, and, coming into the room, he grinned at her affably as she whipped round.

"Get out of here!" she cried indignantly.

He continued to advance, and suddenly caught her about the waist in his powerful arms.

"Get out of here, I tell you!" she cried, struggling in a frenzy of terror.

"Keep quiet, baby!" he cried. "I ain't gonna hurt you. Keep quiet!"

She beat at his face with her clenched fists, but he only laughed, and he was stooping to kiss her when a hand gripped his shoulder and wrenched him back. Staggering, he released Sally, and spun round to find himself face to face with Jim Moore.

Pale with fear, Sally slipped past the two men, and a moment later her feet were pattering on the staircase. But Farley and Moore did not hear her, nor did they hear the slam of the front door as she fled from the house. They were eyeing each other like two animals crouching for a spring. Moore's whole attitude one of quivering rage, Farley's reminiscent of a creature at bay.

"You rat!" Moore grated. "Can't take a warning, can you?"

"Ah, what's bitin' you?" sneered Farley.

"I told you to keep your hands off my little girl," Moore rasped, and with the words he whipped an automatic from his pocket.

Farley jerked back, a glint of fear in his eyes as he saw Moore level the gun deliberately.

"Listen, Farley," his partner in crime went on, "I'm going to do one decent thing in my life—and that's keep you from having hands on that girl again!"

"You've got me wrong, Jim," Farley protested huskily. "I wasn't going to touch your brat."

"Don't lie, you hound!" Moore barked. "I know you, Farley. If it hadn't been for you I'd be a respectable man now, living with my wife and child—instead of a dirty crook like yourself."

Farley scowled.

"Fine talk," he ground out. "So I'm a dirty crook, huh?"

"Yes," was the grim rejoinder. "And this is where you and I part company."

Moore's finger curled on the trigger, but at that instant the glint of fear in Farley's eyes was succeeded by a flicker of cunning.

"Put down that knife, Slug!" he jerked, glancing past Moore's shoulder to the doorway.

Moore turned with an exclamation of alarm, only to discover too late that the doorway was empty, and that Farley had tricked him.

Before he could face round again, Farley had snatched a "gat" from his hip-pocket and shot him through the breast at point-blank range.

A stab of pain seemed to sear through Moore's body. He reeled and fell, and, crouching on the floor in agony, he saw Farley through a blue swathe of gun-smoke—a grinning fiend mocking him in his death throes.

A froth of blood came to Moore's lips and ran warm and crimson down his chin. His eyes glazed, but still he saw that grinning, hateful face, and the taunt in its expression stung him into a fierce, dying effort. Up came his hand with a spasmodic movement—a hand which still clutched the gun with which he had intended to slay Farley.

A blast of flame leapt from the muzzle of the weapon, and the walls of the room echoed the smash of the shot.

Farley seemed to stiffen out and then come up on his toes. The grin vanished from his ugly features, and gave place to a startled expression that swiftly turned to agony. Next instant he pitched to the floor beside Moore, even as the latter slipped back and breathed his last.

To that room came Bettina Moore, panic stricken by the sound of shooting, and at sight of the two men she paled. Then, as she discerned a movement on Farley's part, she dropped to her knees beside him.

"You shot Jim?" she faltered. "Killed him?"

Farley turned his head slowly, painfully.

"Yeah," he groaned. "An' I ain't—sorry. Listen, Betty—this is my finish, too. I've been tipped off—you're in love with that cop—Baxter. Get him—on the 'phone—an' have him beat it here. I've something to tell him before I pass out. Quick—'phone him!"

Bettina Moore rose swiftly and crossed to a table on which the telephone stood. In a few seconds she was in touch with the Police Department.

"Give me Captain Baxter," she called. "It's urgent!"

She was put through to Baxter's office, and in a few brief sentences told him what had happened. Secrecy was no longer possible. The fatal gun-duel in her house must end in a complete revelation of the circumstances.

"I'll be over right away," said Baxter, when she had finished, and, hanging up the receiver, she turned back to Farley.

"Betty," he said weakly, "I want a favour you once did me. Remember—that time you hid me from the cops? It was a long while ago, and—you didn't know I was a crook then. Well, I'm gonna—tell Baxter everything—tell him it was me as got Jim Moore into his first jam and turned him crook. An' I'm gonna tell him that you—that you never was one of our mob—that you was always on the square and never did hold with my racket. It's the least I can do, Betty."

Fifteen minutes later the police-car swung into the drive of the Moore's home, and as it drew up at the front door Baxter saw a suspicious-looking character slinking through the grounds. He was the ruffianly Slug, and the captain held him up at the point of a gun.

Baxter then entered the house, driving Slug before him, and, on being admitted, made his way straight to the room in which Farley lay dying. On

(Continued on page 28.)

A young man inherits an old house and at once strange things begin to happen—behind everything hovers the shadow of a limping man. Starring Franklin Dyall.

CREeping SHADOWS

Tinker's Revel.

A WOMAN'S scream rang through the old house.

One moment she had been playing the piano with apparent unconcern, and the next she was on her feet staring at the panelling of the room with horrified eyes; then she screamed and ran blindly from the drawing-room.

And from the panelling came a shuffling noise like someone dragging a chain. The sound died slowly away; silence, and then a babble of voices from people hurrying towards the drawing-room.

Quite a crowd poured into the room, and they stared round, trying to denote anything unusual. Eight people, and all are worthy of description, because they were to look askance at each other within the next few hours.

The grey-haired man of fifty with the well-cut blue suit, dark cravat, and soldierly appearance was Sir Edwin Paget. His clean-shaven face was lined, but not from worry, as Sir Edwin always looked on the bright side of life. A kindly man, who had never experienced undue worry, and had been blessed with a splendid wife and a beautiful daughter.

Lady Paget was a white-haired, buxom woman, a year younger than her husband. She was still very good-looking, and her face was as free from wrinkles as that of a girl. She wore a travelling dress of blue serge, and did not look unduly distressed by the fact that the house seemed to be haunted.

The tall, fair-haired girl with the slim figure, soft skin, and smiling blue eyes so resembled her mother that sometimes people, for a joke, called them sisters. She was wearing a sports outfit of cream and buff, and her eyes were dancing with excitement. A healthy, athletic young woman, who could give any man a good game at tennis and could ride the fiercest of horses. Gloria was a typical sporting English girl.

By her side was a dark-haired young man with a well-knit body, a strong chin, and alert brown eyes. Brian Nash, the new owner of Tinker's Revel, stood there with clenched fists as if ready to do battle with an enemy. Seeing nothing, he turned for explanation to the two people behind him.

Mrs. Hoyt was rather too well-dressed, and, though she looked young, a close study of her features would have revealed that her beauty and youth were mainly due to the aids of beauty parlours. The type of woman who does not reveal her age, and who is always inclined to be gushing.

"I was playing the piano." She spoke on the high note of hysteria. "Suddenly I stopped as I heard a noise, then I heard a weird clanking noise, and it sounded like someone walking, but not properly."

The middle-aged man behind her watched his wife from narrowed eyes. A touch of the Spaniard about Peter Hoyt, and though the eyes were rather close, he seemed a very decent fellow, very much in love with his beautiful wife.

"Olga," he said, "are you sure you weren't dreaming?"

"Of course I wasn't dreaming!" she flashed at him. "It was behind that panelling."

"Tinker's Revel is very old," spoke a solemn voice, and Sparrow, the butler, gave a respectful bow. "They say that this place was the haunt of smugglers, and that secret passages are hidden all over the house and grounds. I would respectfully suggest that Mrs. Hoyt heard a mouse, or perhaps some old bricks—"

"Do mice wear chains?" Mrs. Hoyt retorted.

"Ha, ha! Mice wear chains—that's good!" guffawed Sir Edwin. "Bet I know one woman who would like to see 'em manacled." He grinned at his wife, then turned to Brian. "Well, my boy, you seem to have inherited a spooky old place."

"Sparrow's right about smugglers," stated Brian, walking slowly along the panelling and tapping with his knuckles. "I haven't been here since I was a kid, but I remember my uncle telling me some tales that made my hair stand on end. Smugglers, desperate men, soldiers in hiding. We're some miles out of Canterbury, and to the east lies marsh country and the sea—an ideal spot for smugglers in the old days.

Uncle told me that our family made all their money by smuggling brandy and silks, but he was a bit of a tale-teller. I never came here again, as my mother quarrelled with him, and he swore he did not want to see his sister again."

"Yet he left you this fine old place?" The question was asked by the eighth member of the party—a short, thick-set, sandy-haired young man with rather fierce blue eyes. "Wonder he didn't leave his money to a dog's home."

"Would have done if he hadn't died unexpectedly—groggy heart." Brian shrugged his shoulders. "Left no will, and I was next-of-kin, except for a younger—" He did not finish what he was going to say. "Paul, this panelling sounds hollow."

Paul Tegle grinned at Gloria, then joined Brian Nash. Both tapped the panelling, whilst the Hoyts watched in a nervous, expectant manner.

"Seems hollow," admitted Paul. "When I've got settled I'll have the panelling down," decided Brian. "At any rate, I think it was only a rat or some loose bricks, and I suggest we go back to the fire in the lounge."

"Hear, hear!" seconded Sir Edwin. "I hate spooks; besides, I've got something I've been itching to get off my chest—I loathe speeches."

Solemnly the party trooped back to the lounge, where Sparrow begged to be excused.

"Mabel and Agnes have gone out, sir," he said to the new master. "It was their evening, and they're in Canterbury. I did not know you were coming down so soon, sir, and servants are very difficult. They would not give up the evening, and, I'm afraid, sir, September 19th, 1931, we shall not see them till the morning. But I've got everything in hand, sir, and I will bring the sandwiches and the tea when you ring."

"Very good, Sparrow," Brian nodded, and, when the butler had gone, laughed. "I took over this place a fortnight ago and hired Sparrow about a week since. He's as solemn as an owl."

"And now for the announcement." Sir Edwin tucked his thumbs into his waistcoat and beamed at everybody. "Brian has invited you all down here for a preliminary house-warming, and I have decided that it is an auspicious occasion to announce the engagement of my dear daughter Gloria to Brian. I can't say how pleased I am that—"

The news of the engagement affected Paul Tegle strangely. His face was contorted for a moment as if with rage or disappointment, and only with an effort did he manage to smile at Brian, whom he had known ever since school-days. Both loved Gloria, but Brian did not know of his friend's infatuation—perhaps Gloria had guessed. Paul had not felt his financial position was good enough to offer marriage to the wealthy Gloria Paget, and now it was too late.

After the usual round of congratulations, Brian rang for Sparrow, who seemed strangely perturbed when he brought the sandwiches.

"I think I heard noises, sir," he stated respectfully. "I think some more stones must have fallen down in that panel."

"Never mind, Sparrow, I'll look into it in the morning—the days of ghosts are dead," Brian did not want his friends to get scared. "I think we'll have in the port." He noticed that Peter Hoyt was studying the huge painting of a soldier on the lounge wall near the fire.

Mrs. Hoyt, with a whisper to Lady Paget that she would take some aspirin for a headache, went out with the butler. The rest of the party studied the painting.

"That is supposed to be a Rembrandt," announced Brian. "Worth oodles of boodle if genuine—and about fourpence if a fake! Supposed to be a great, great ancestor—fine looking chap."

"What's that bell hanging near the picture?" asked Peter Hoyt. "Funny place for a bell."

"That's the bell of doom," chuckled Brian. "I remember uncle telling me about it as a kid. It is a sort of body-guard to the picture and rings when anything dire threatens this house."

"What a quaint idea!" cried Gloria. "Have you ever heard it ring, Brian?"

"Never, and don't suppose I ever shall," was his laughing answer. "It must be all rusty now, and—"

But what he might have added will not be recorded because suddenly and unexpectedly the bell of doom moved and rang three times.

A hush of superstitious fear descended on the lounge.

Shots in the Night.

It was Brian who saved a panic by blaming a draught for making the bell ring. It was all nonsense, because often it jingled on a windy day.

"Phew, I could do with a breath of air," Paul Tegle wanted to be alone with his thoughts. "Think I'll take a sharp walk down the lane to the cross-roads."

"And I'll come with you," decided Peter Hoyt. "Fresh air might clear away the spooks!"

Why did Peter Hoyt, as he went to put on his hat, give Sparrow—hovering in the hall—a deliberate wink? Why did Sparrow nod back as if he understood that signal?

September 19th, 1931.

Half an hour later they returned to the house to report that it was raining and blowing a gale.

"Went as far as Copp's Corner," explained Hoyt. "Any more weird doings?"

Brian smiled at Gloria's father. "We've decided that we're all far too jumpy and that Tinker's Revel is a very ordinary old-fashioned place. Nothing out of the ordinary ever happens here, and—"

The lounge door opened and Sparrow appeared.

"Did you ring, sir?" "We didn't ring," Brian was perplexed. "You heard the bell?"

"Yes, sir, I'm sure someone rang," insisted the butler.

"I must have an architect to look this place over," Brian frowned as he feared all these petty irritations would spoil the house party and he especially wanted Sir Edwin and Lady Paget to enjoy themselves. "By the way, Sparrow," Brian switched to a new topic. "Where's Sandel?"

"The chauffeur is out in the grounds," was the solemn reply. "He thought he saw someone moving down by the bushes. Perhaps it might be a poacher, sir, as I've been told that a raiian on a fish is a certain trap for pheasants and down by the Dell Copse I saw a number of birds."

"My word, Brian, this is a place," Lady Paget drew nearer the fire. "What with noises, bells, falling bricks and poachers! Whatever next shall we—"

A shot rang out from the gardens. "Good heavens!" Brian rushed to the window. "Someone must have spotted Sandel. Ah." He opened the french windows. "Here he comes—now we shall know."

Sandel was rather shame-faced; he was an earnest, very keen young man who hoped one day to own a garage.

"I can't abide these 'ere poachers, sir," he explained. "Mister Sparrow told me how he'd seen something down by the Dell, so I took that old rabbit gun. Of course, I never expected to see anyone and when it began to rain I thought about turning in and started for the house. Then something darted from behind a bush to another bush and I thought I was dreaming. I had half a mind to fire at the bush when the figure appeared again and I gave a yell. 'Here, what's the game?' I cried, and when the man limped off I put a shot close to his heels. They won't be no poachers round here for a bit, sir, but I'm sorry if I disturbed you."

"Not at all, not at all," approved Sir Edwin. "Very commendable conduct, should have done the same myself; hope you winged the fellow. Mary," this to his wife. "I think a little whisky would do my cold a lot of good."

"Did you say the man limped?" asked Brian of his chauffeur.

"Yes, sir, he wore a dark cloak and seemed to lug the ground," Sandel was enjoying his tale. "Kind of ghost-like he was—this limping man."

"Oh, send him away, Brian," came the petulant cry of Mrs. Hoyt. "I think it's dreadful all this talk of limping men and nasty ringing bells."

"Hang around for a bit with that gun," Brian gave Sandel a knowing glance. "Don't fire unless you can help it, but if you see any more shadows or figures come and find me."

"Very good, sir," Sandel went back into the gardens, and Brian closed the french windows. "Phew, I think I'll join you, Sir Edwin, in a small drink.

How about you, Paul, and you, Peter?"

"Great notion," decided Peter Hoyt. "I suppose, Paul, you wouldn't care for a game of billiards afterwards? I sort of feel I could enjoy a bit of fun. What with bells and—"

The ringing of the telephone in the study made all of them jump and catch their breath.

Brian laughed. "Wonder who the blazes that can be?" Sparrow appeared.

"A gentleman wishes to speak to you on the 'phone, sir." He bowed to his master. "He says it's important."

Brian, with apologies to Lady Paget, hurried off. Gloria picked up an illustrated paper.

"I would open the page at a picture of Satan amongst a lot of nasty flames!" She held up the colourful plate for all to see. "Hope that isn't a bad sign," she smiled at her father. "Your hand looks quite shaky, daddy."

"Nothing of the sort," cried Sir Edwin. "I nearly spilt some whisky. Well, Brian, what's the latest?"

Brian was all smiles as he came into the room.

"Great news, Lady Paget!" he told them all. "That was an old pal of mine who has just landed at Dover from the continent and wants to know if he can spend the night here as he need not go to London for a day or so. I told him I was delighted. You'll like him—Disher's a charming man."

"Disher," Peter Hoyt cried. "I seem to have heard that name somewhere before."

"He's the Disher," chuckled Brian. "The famous criminal investigator."

Mrs. Hoyt exchanged a quick and startled glance with her husband, who fingered his chin in a nervous fashion.

"I'm glad your friend is coming here, Brian," Gloria slithered an arm through that of her lover's. "He'll fairly revel in all this mystery." She screwed up her delightful chin. "I wish it wasn't raining, Brian. We might have had a walk. I wonder if it is still raining hard or just drizzling?"

Gloria walked to the french windows and peered forth.

"Oh, Brian, the moon has come out; it's quite nice!" she cried. "Let's take a walk before—O-oh!"

"Whatever's the matter?" demanded Brian, as he heard Gloria's agitated cry.

"There's a man in the garden!" came her quick answer. "Oh, Brian, he's coming in here!"

They gazed at the french windows with horror as Gloria slowly backed away with hands held against her blanched cheeks.

The Murder at Copp's Corner.

BRIAN NASH flung open the windows.

A smiling man in a much-stained old macintosh and carrying a spanner stepped over the ledge. He twirled a sandy moustache and beamed at the company.

"Evening, ladies and gents!" He nodded to Lady Paget. "Excuse me disturbing you: I've had a break-down at Copp's Corner. My little bus has flopped out, but a wee drop of petrol would soon put her on her legs again." He waved a spanner towards the grounds. "Got lost in a winding drive, and, seeing this yere light, I took the liberty of walking across the lawn. I'd be mighty obliged for a spot of gas."

"I'll ring for Sparrow to send down to the garage." Brian felt like heaving a few home truths at the man for scaring his friends.

"And might I be allowed to 'phone?" hopefully hinted the motorist. "My name's Hawkins, and I'm working for a garage in Canterbury, and they might think I've pinched the bus."

"Sparrow shall take you to the 'phone." Brian turned as the butler appeared. "Take this gentleman to the 'phone in the study and get him a tin of petrol up from the garage."

"Very good, sir." "Thanks, mister," Mr. Hawkins beamed affably. "Do the same for you one of these days. Lead on, Macduff."

"What a queer motor man," cried Lady Paget, when the door had shut. "I think he's been drinking, Brian."

Brian brightened visibly when three boots from a motor horn sounded.

"That's old Disher," he exclaimed. "I'll go and let him in."

"A most disturbing evening," Sir Edwin sipped his whisky. "I hope we shan't have any more bother. Ah, now we shall see a real sluth!"

Maurice Disher was a tall, quiet-spoken, refined type of man. He wore very plain, good clothes, and seemed like any ordinary individual; he was clean-shaven, dark-haired, lean and about forty years of age. Sir Edwin and Lady Paget liked him at once. The crime investigator showed no sign of any undue interest when he shook hands with Peter Hoyt and bowed to Olga Hoyt.

"Glad you're here," Sir Edwin cottoned on to Disher. "This house is haunted. I reckon you're in for a busman's holiday."

Whereupon Disher insisted upon Brian telling him all that had happened. He showed marked interest in the Rembrandt, and when Sparrow and Mr. Hawkins appeared he almost registered surprise. Even Brian noted the way Sparrow suddenly drew back at sight of the detective.

"The telephone is out of order, sir," Sparrow quickly regained his poise.

"We can get no reply, and I regret to say that all the petrol cans have been emptied."

"What's that?" gurgled Brian. "Someone poured away my petrol?"

"Y e p , and I reckon someone's cut your telephone wire," chuckled Mr. Hawkins. "I wonder if there are any burglars around?"

Lady Paget nearly went into hysterics at the idea, and would have done so if there had not come a thundering on the front door.

"Go and see who it is," Brian almost snarled the words at Sparrow. "Tell whoever it is to go and boil themselves!"

What a surprise when Sparrow, very frightened, returned with a police-inspector.

"My name is Potter—Inspector Potter." The man of the Force fixed them with steely glances. "I want to ask a few questions, please." He moistened his lips and produced a notebook. "Down in the copse near Copp's Corner a man has been shot in the back—murdered!"

Lady Paget went off in a dead faint.

The Dummy Bookcase.

PAUL DISHER had at once set to work to unravel the tangled skein.

He took charge of the proceedings, explained to Inspector Potter who he was, and asked everybody to remain in the lounge till he came back. One action of his completely surprised the company.

"Mr. Hawkins," said the investigator, "can I rely upon you to see that no one leaves the house?"

"You may," Hawkins spoke in changed, crisp accents. "I might have known you would have seen through this get-up."

"Why have Scotland Yard sent you down here?" asked Disher.

"Just to watch the movements of a certain man," was the answer. "Sparrow, you'd better stay right where you are."

When Disher had gone off with the inspector, everybody wanted to know the mystery about Sparrow, but the Scotland Yard man would not say much.

"My name's Cable, and Sparrow here knows me," he said grimly. "His references must have been faked. Maybe I can tell you more when Disher gets back. I don't quite get the angle on this shooting."

"I'm not a killer," Sparrow quite lost his suave manner. "I know nothing about this murder at Copp's Corner!"

Disher was not gone more than half an hour, during which time everybody sat and looked at each other. Everybody watched Sparrow to see if he were going to make a break for liberty, but the late butler seemed cowed and sullen.

The two detectives had a consultation, and the result was a curt order to Sparrow to stand up.

"Cable is taking Sparrow into Canterbury presently," explained Disher. "I think we've cleared up one small mystery."

"His references seemed all right to me," grumbled Brian. "What was his great idea?"

"That picture"—Disher pointed to the Rembrandt. "Cable rather thinks he was in league with someone else." For a moment his amused gaze rested on the Hoyts. "But that remains to be proved. We shall know more in the morning." His smile was reassuring. "I'm not the host, Brian, but I would like to suggest that the ladies retire. It must have been a tiring evening."

"Yes, and I'm locking my door," Lady Paget shuddered. "Come to bed, Edwin."

"In a few minutes, my dear." Sir Edwin eyed the decauter. "I must help lock up, now that Sparrow fellow has gone. I knew that chap was a crook—I always can tell 'em."

A white streak of forked lightning and a heavy clap of thunder did nothing to make Tinker's Revel more peaceful. Disher and Sir Edwin went to lock round the drawing-room and kitchens, whilst Brian tackled the study and lounge. Peter Hoyt and Paul Tegle acted as escort to the ladies, who were scared to go upstairs alone.

Brian was in his study. He was very angry that all these strange happenings should have upset his house-party. He had tried to pump his friend about the man murdered at Copp's Corner, but Disher was very reticent. All the crime investigator would say was that the murdered man was an American and looked like a gunman.

Deep in his own thoughts, Brian did not hear a faint click or see the bookcase near the fireplace swing open and reveal a black hollow in the wall.

A bowed figure crept out and with crooked fingers moved silently towards Brian. But the most amazing thing of all was that the mysterious newcomer was the living image of Brian.

A sudden spring forward and steel-like fingers were round Brian's throat. He tried to cry out, but the throttling pressure stifled all noise. The assailant forced Brian backwards and, with a tremendous effort, lugged his victim through the opening.

Slowly the dummy bookcase swung back into place. A dull crash sounded from behind the bookcase. Brian and his counterpart were engaged in a desperate struggle.

"I was lying helpless when a light was flashed in my face."

Minutes passed, and then came the voice of Disher, calling: "Brian! Brian!"—and the reply of Sir Edwin that the lad must be in the study.

The bookcase swung open, and Brian Nash, whose face was badly bruised, crawled through the opening, jerked to the bookcase, staggered towards the desk, and then appeared to collapse in a heap.

Sir Edwin gave a yell of fright when he saw the motionless figure on the carpet, and his urgent call brought Disher. Water soon brought life back to the young man.

"Came over suddenly giddy," Brian's voice seemed husky. "Must have fallen and hit my head against the desk. Not been feeling too fit lately."

"I didn't know you had been queer," said Sir Edwin. "Gloria never told mother and I that you were seedy."

Brian took another gulp of water. Disher rubbed his chin and frowned.

"Sir Edwin, you'd better help Brian to his room," Disher decided. "I'm going to stay around here for a spell."

"I'll stay with you," said Brian.

"You'll go to bed," Disher walked to a table and pointed to a chess-board. "This will keep me amused. I'll work out a few problems while waiting for something more exciting to happen."

"How folk can waste their time on chess I can't imagine," grumbled Brian, and clasped his head. "Guess I'll take a drop of something before I go to bed."

"And I'll join you, Brian," chuckled Sir Edwin. "Then we'll get Gloria to bathe that bruise."

"No, no, it's nothing," Brian poured out a liberal dose. "Well, here's to a quiet night!"

Disher stared ruminatingly after Sir Edwin and Brian as they ascended the stairs. Why did he follow them up and watch them along the corridor, then come back to the study and set out the chess-men? It was a long time before he made any effort to move any of the pieces.

After a few moves he got up and placed the ladder for the bookcase against the wall, and climbed up to look at the bell of doom. He found something that pleased him, for he gave a quiet chuckle. Back he toddled once more to his chess.

What had the murder at Copp's Corner to do with Tinker's Revel, if anything? Paul Tegle and Peter Hoyt had gone for a walk to Copp's Corner—did they know anything? He decided that the clue afforded by the Rembrandt cleared Hoyt of any part in the murder; but what of Paul Tegle, a one-time admirer of Gloria's?

"A jealous, hot-headed young man, but not the sort to shoot a person in the back," decided Disher, communing with his thoughts. "Potter found the pistol that did the murder in these grounds—yes, I'll only tell Cable about that until I know a bit more. That seems to indicate that the murderer is somewhere mighty close. Is the murderer in this household? And what the blazes was Chicago Joe, who did five years in the Tombs for robbery with violence, doing down here in Kent? Who would shoot him? An enemy—someone he knew in the States! There must be a link to all this—but where?"

Once during the night the crime investigator went to the window to watch the lightning. Distinctly he saw, near a great oak, the shrouded figure of a man.

Almost he decided to go after the September 19th, 1931.

A Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

follow; but as he watched the figure disappeared, and the next flash showed the man at the far end of the lawn. He walked with a limp.

The next morning heralded a glorious summer day. Disher was dozing over his chess-men when Gloria woke him.

"Hallo, you're up early! Pleasant night?" he greeted her. "I think I've solved one or two small problems, but nothing great. You look worried, my child."

"I think that bruise has driven Brian crazy," Gloria decided to speak frankly to the man who was his friend. "He has actually decided to sell Tinker's Revel after promising to live here with me."

"What!" gasped Disher, genuinely startled.

"I met him arm-in-arm with the Hoyts," cried Gloria. "Had hardly a word to say to me, except that he'd sold Tinker's Revel for ten thousand to Peter Hoyt, and that he would be leaving after breakfast to settle the deal. Not a word of apology or explanation of his strange action. He told me only yesterday that never would he sell Tinker's Revel, because it had belonged to his family for generations. That blow seems to have in one night changed him."

"Changed?" Disher started to his feet. "By gad, I believe you're on the scent! Where is Brian, Miss Paget?"

"In the study with the Hoyts," was her answer. "But I don't see what you mean." She stared at him in perplexity. "You think that the blow has—"

"Come with me, young lady!" Disher took her arm. "And don't say anything unless I give you a key."

Brian Nash frowned when Disher and Gloria appeared.

"I've got some business with Mr. and Mrs. Hoyt," he complained. "If you'll give us a few minutes more we'll be through. I'm selling Tinker's Revel."

"A very sound idea," approved the crime investigator. "You remember that when you and I were in Canada you saw a house at Quebec you said was just like Tinker's Revel? You remember, don't you?"

"Oh, sure I do," was the answer. Brian seemed ill-at-ease. "If you would excuse me, old boy, I'd like—"

"Remember how I wanted to go spinning for trout, and how you fished me out when I fell in?" Disher took an easy-chair. "Remember how we went camping together and I tried to teach you chess?"

"Never played chess in my life," Brian sneered the words. "Now, if you and Gloria would excuse me, I—"

"Why are you selling Tinker's Revel?" the crime investigator shot out the question.

"That's my business!" Brian snapped back. "I'll thank you not to meddle in this business. If I choose to sell Tinker's Revel to my old friends the Hoyts, I don't see what business—"

"Oh, Brian, how could you?" wailed Gloria. "You told me you would never part with this lovely old manor."

"Well, I've changed my mind," Brian seemed sullen. The Hoyts looked anxiously at each other.

"You mean you've changed!" Disher's voice became suddenly harsh.

"It was Brian who fell in and a lumberman who got him out of the river. I never went to Canada, and it was you, Brian, who first taught me how to play chess. Yet you don't play chess!"

In a flash a gun appeared and Gloria gave a scream of fright.

"Stay where you are!" snarled Brian. "Not a move, or I'll croak you,

(Continued on page 25.)

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. A grand new serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama. Starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

HEROES of the FLAMES

READ THIS FIRST.

While en route with his comrades to the scene of a fire, Bob Darrow, of the San Francisco Brigade, saves the life of a boy who falls in front of one of the monster engines.

Later he calls on James Madison, head of a chemical company, to whom he puts up an idea for a patent fire-extinguisher. Madison is not interested, and Bob leaves disappointed, after meeting Dan Mitchell, a shady promoter who is befriending Madison for his own ends.

That afternoon Bob rescues June Madison from a fire in her father's office, then learns that the boy he had saved from the wheels of the fire engine was Madison's son, Jackie.

In gratitude, Madison helps Bob to perfect his invention, the Darrow Fire Bomb. But Dan Mitchell is anxious to sell Madison an extinguisher of his own, and to discredit Bob he sends a hireling to "doctor" the fireman's invention with a deadly explosive.

To test the Darrow Fire Bomb, an old shed in the Madison grounds is set ablaze. Only when the fire is at its height does Bob discover that young Jackie is trapped in the hut.

Bob dashes into the shed, and is himself imprisoned by the flames. He is attempting to batter his way out when Madison throws one of the doctored bombs!

Now Read On.

Trickery.

THE walls of the hut had never been particularly solid, and the fire had weakened them still more when Bob gathered Jackie in his arms and made his desperate bid to break out of the ramshackle building.

His shoulder smashed into the rotten timbers in the very instant that Madison threw the grenade. The woodwork splintered under the impact of his charge, and he plunged through the mass of brush that had been piled against the shed and then fired by his own hand.

EPISODE 3.

"THE FIRE TRAP."

He was scarcely clear of the blazing structure when the fire-bomb struck it. There was a blinding flash and a terrific detonation, and the hut was blown sky-high in a thousand fragments.

The concussion hurled Bob to the ground; but, dazed as he was by the force of the explosion, the young fireman had the presence of mind to shield Jackie with his own body. For it was with the boy's safety and not his own that he was mainly concerned.

Debris rained down on Bob. He could hazard no guess at the cause of the explosion. He only knew that some accident had occurred to mar his experiment, and that pieces of flaming wood were falling all around him.

The last echoes of the report died away, and the scene cleared.

Bob struggled slowly to his feet, lifting Jackie with him, and then, reeling towards a tree and setting the boy in a fork of it, he looked in the direction where the hut had stood.

It had been blotted out of existence, only a few charred remains marking the site it had occupied. The fire had certainly been overcome, but not in the manner that Bob Darrow had intended, for had he acted with less promptitude neither he nor Jackie would have been alive to see the havoc which had been created.

Meanwhile, some distance away, June and her father were crouching on their knees, panic-stricken and horrified by what had taken place. It was only when they rose that they discovered to their intense relief that Jackie and Bob were safe.

"Look!" Madison breathed, pointing towards them. "Look, June!"

June ran forward, her father stumbling after her. As she reached the forked tree she flung her arms around Jackie almost hysterically.

"Jackie," she sobbed, "thank Heaven you're safe!"

"Aw, I'm all right!" the boy answered stoutly. "Say, lemme go, sis, will you? I'm not a little girl. I can take harder bumps than that. Quit fussin' over me, will you?"

Madison came up and gripped Bob by the hand. The fireman was in his shirt-sleeves, and had not escaped without one or two burns, while his clothes were blackened and scorched. He was scarcely aware of his hurts, however, counting them slight enough.

"Darrow," breathed Madison, "how can I ever thank you for getting my boy out of that death-trap?"

"Never mind about that now, Mr. Madison," Bob rejoined. "What blew up that shed, anyway?"

Madison answered him in a hoarse tone.

"When I saw you turn back to Jackie's rescue," he explained, "I picked up one of your extinguishers and threw it at the hut, hoping to put out the fire. The explosion followed immediately."

Dan Mitchell had drawn somewhat nearer, moving from behind a gnarled oak-tree, to which he had jumped for shelter when Madison had flung the fire-bomb. His satisfaction at the apparent failure of the experiment was not complete, since he realised that the whole affair had served to increase the debt of gratitude which the Madisons already owed Bob Darrow.

Bob's voice reached the shifty promoter's ears.

"But I don't understand, Mr. Madison," the fireman was saying. "I'll admit that a slight explosion should occur when one of the fire-grenades is thrown. But it's an entirely harmless explosion, and I doubt whether the force of it would knock over a matchbox. There's nothing in my chemicals to cause the complete destruction of that hut."

Madison pursed his lips.

"Well, I took the bomb from that tray you brought from the laboratory," he muttered.

Bob strode over to the table on which the rack containing the grenades had been placed. He lifted one of the glass receptacles and uncorked it, sniffing its contents suspiciously. Then he held it up to the light and scrutinised the liquid which had been poured into it, and finally he turned up the neck of it and moistened the end of his thumb with a few drops from it.

"Say, daddy," young Jackie declared, "something must have happened to that stuff after Bob made it in the laboratory."

Madison shook his head. It was plain that he had been bitterly disappointed by the test, and was under the impression that it had proved Bob's invention to be utterly worthless, as well as dangerous.

"Nothing could have happened to it, sonny," he mused.

"Then how was it that when the dog-kennel caught fire this morning Bob put it out in a jiffy?" the boy argued.

Madison shrugged.

"Well, if anything did happen to it," he said, "Darrow will find it out. That extinguisher seems to be about the only thing he can think of just now, and—"

He was interrupted by a shout from Bob, and turned to see the fireman hurrying towards him, clutching the uncorked fire-bomb which he had been examining.

"What's wrong, Darrow?" Madison demanded.

"Someone has tampered with this mixture," Bob told him quickly.

"There's nitro in it! You know what that means."

"Nitro!" Madison exclaimed, "Good heavens! No wonder we had an explosion!"

Bob looked at him earnestly.

"Mr. Madison," he said, "I want you to understand that what happened just now was no fault of mine. I want you to understand that it was caused by no flaw in my invention. I've got complete faith in the extinguisher, sir, and all I ask is another chance to prove its value to you. I'll have to scrap the 'doctored' contents of the remaining grenades, and make up a fresh supply of the true ingredients. Fortunately, I have a formula, and I can be ready for a fresh test in a few days. And, believe me, I'll take every precaution to see that the grenades aren't tampered with again."

"Very well, Darrow," Madison returned. "I guess the least I can do is to stand by you. My laboratory is still at your disposal."

The Nightingale Club.

"YOUR move," said Fireman Pat Heeley to a comrade who had challenged him to a game of chess.

September 19th, 1931.

The other "smoke-eater" pondered long and deliberately, and then shifted one of his pieces tentatively. Fireman Pat Heeley glanced up at Battalion Chief Watson, who was looking on with amusement.

"He moved, sorr," said Pat, with more than a trace of Irish brogue, and then he proceeded to make a series of manoeuvres that swept the board clean.

Not far away two other men were discussing a subject that had no relation to a chess-board, excepting perhaps that one of them was the pawn of a masterly schemer who played his own deep game from a checkered background of shifty enterprises.

He had given the name of Thompson, and had asked to see Bob Darrow, and, with his first words to the young fireman, had broached the reason for his call.

Facing him now in the entrance to the station, Bob looked at the man curiously.

"How did you know I was working on a chemical fire-extinguisher?" he asked.

Thompson smiled an oily smile. He was a small, stout, suave individual with a deceptive air of being a prosperous business man.

"It's my business to know about things that there's money in," he mentioned.

"And I believe that your extinguisher will be a big money-maker."

"If it's successful," Bob murmured.

"Well, I happen to know that it worked once," Thompson stated.

"That's enough for me. All I want is an opportunity to talk this thing over with you."

Bob was interested. Of course, he reflected, Madison had first claim on his process. But in the possible event of his turning it down, this fellow Thompson might take it up. There was no harm in following up this interview, at any rate. At least, so Bob imagined.

"I'm off on Thursday night," he said to Thompson. "But, by the way, I'd like to be perfectly fair with you. Mr. Madison is interested in this chemical fire-extinguisher of mine, and I'm indebted to him for some assistance in perfecting it. Naturally, I'd like him to handle it if it promises any success."

"Don't worry about that, Darrow," Thompson rejoined. "I can probably come to some mutual agreement with Mr. Madison after I've talked it over with you. So we'll make it Thursday night, eh? And if you've no objection we'll combine business with pleasure. Nothing like talking business over a good dinner in cheerful surroundings. What do you say to meeting me at the Nightingale Club?"

"I don't believe I know it," Bob told him. "Where is it?"

Thompson wrote out the address for him. Bob did not know that it was a place with a somewhat ugly reputation, and, having agreed to meet Thompson there at nine o'clock on the evening of the following Thursday, saw his visitor off the premises.

Leaving the fire-station, Thompson took a street-car to a block of offices down-town, and half an hour later he might have been seen opening a door which bore the legend, "D. Mitchell. Investments," that simple word "Investments" covering a multitude of shady activities.

Mitchell was dictating a statement to a girl secretary, but the moment he saw Thompson he dismissed his employe and sent her into an adjoining room.

"Well," he said, as soon as he was alone with Thompson, "what's the news?"

"Mitchell," was the snug answer, "he fell for it like a ton of coals!"

"Did you fix it for the Nightingale Club?"

Thompson grinned.

"He'll be there Thursday night—with bells on."

"Good!" said Mitchell. "I'll have the Madisons there."

Thompson leaned over the counter of Mitchell's desk.

"Say," he drawled, "do the Madisons know that you own the Nightingale Club?"

"No," Mitchell rejoined curtly; "and they'd better not find out, either. They don't know I'm connected in any way with that kind of a joint. They sort of figure that I'm of independent means. Get me?"

"Oh, don't worry about me!" Thompson told him. "I'm speechless. But I ain't so sure of that girl Trixie you've been runnin' around with. She's mighty jealous, Dan, an' if she sees you there with another dame—"

"I'll take care of Trixie," Mitchell interrupted. "Now let's get down to business. I want to have everything cut and dried."

Thursday Night.

HAUNT of notorious characters, the Nightingale Club was packed on the evening of Bob Darrow's appointment.

Entering it by an unpretentious doorway in a back street, one suddenly found oneself in a bizarre restaurant. Dancing-girls provided entertainment on a polished strip of floor surrounded by small tables, and through a glitter of bright lights stuffed elliges of song-birds flashed overhead on concealed wires, cunningly symbolical of the club's title.

The habitués of the place were an unsavoury-looking crowd, but not all of those present were regular patrons. There was a sprinkling of sightseers who had merely come to study the types of humanity to be found there, and to thank the fates that they themselves were decent, law-respecting citizens.

It was in the guise of a curious sight-seer that Dan Mitchell had prevailed upon June Madison and her father to visit the place, and, seated with them at a table in a corner of the restaurant, he affected to deplore the surroundings.

"Yes, Dan," said Madison, "it's an interesting enough place, but a regular plague-spot, for all that. I notice, for one thing, that they don't abide by the prohibition laws. It's the kind of place, Dan, that the police ought to get their hands on."

"I agree with you heartily," lied Mitchell, and then turned his attention to June.

At a table in a kind of alcove on the other side of the room a man and two girls were sitting. The man was Thompson, and his companions, a blonde and a brunette, had been chosen for their attractiveness, though they were somewhat too heavily made-up.

The brunette was Trixie Farrell, that same Trixie in whom Dan Mitchell had been interested, though his infatuation for her had begun to wane ever since he had met June Madison.

Trixie was staring at the table occupied by Mitchell and the Madisons, and there was a tiny glitter in her dark eyes that betrayed resentment.

"Who's that baby-faced dame with Dan?" she demanded of Thompson.

Thompson fidgeted a trifle anxiously.

"Oh, that's Madison's daughter June," he returned, trying to sound casual.

The woman at his side bit her lip.

"So that's Mitchell's game!" she snapped. "Playing up to the old man to get the girl, huh?"

"No, Trixie—no!" Thompson protested impatiently. "Mitchell is after the old man. He wants to pawn off that phoney fire-extinguisher that he's been handlin', and if he can fool Madison with it he'll rake in a lotta money. Mitchell don't want the girl."

"Well, he'd better not!" Trixie Farrell said ominously. "Mitchell can't give me the run-around."

"Aw, cut it out, Trixie, will you?" put in the other girl. "You don't want to start anything now. We're here to help Mitchell, if we can. Aren't we, Tommie?"

"Atta girl!" Thompson rejoined. "We gotta all stick together."

It was at that precise moment that Bob Darrow entered the Nightingale Club, and, having left his hat and coat in the cloak-room, he crossed the threshold of the restaurant and stood looking around him uncertainly.

A waiter approached.

"Have you a table reserved, sir?" he asked Bob.

"Why, yes, I think so," Bob answered. "I'm to join a Mr. Thompson."

"Oh, yes, sir. This way, if you please."

The waiter led him to where Thompson and his companions were sitting, and as the stout man recognised Bob he rose to his feet with an exclamation.

"Oh, hallo, Darrow!" he said breezily. "Glad to see you. By the way, I'd like to have you meet two lady friends of mine. Mr. Darrow—Miss Georgia Robinson and Miss Trixie Farrell."

Bob shook hands and then sat down in a chair next to Trixie. The girl's petulant expression had quite gone now, and she leaned towards Bob smilingly.

"You know, Mr. Darrow," she told him, "we're going to have a perfectly wonderful time after you and Mr. Thompson get through with that big business deal."

Bob grinned awkwardly. He had not anticipated feminine company, and somehow he felt ill at ease, though he could not have explained just why.

"It's rather embarrassing for me," he said, "because I—I feel as though I am sort of insinuating business into a very pleasant evening."

"Well, then, let's forget business for the meantime," Trixie suggested. "Have a drink, Mr. Darrow." And she poured out a glass of wine.

Bob shook his head.

"No, thanks," he said. "I don't drink."

Trixie endeavoured to persuade him, and while she was still pressing him to accept the glass, Dan Mitchell looked across and saw that Bob had arrived.

Mitchell spoke to Madison.

"There sure are a lot of queer people come to a place like this," he observed.

"Yes," said Madison grimly, "it's quite a melting-pot."

Mitchell glanced around him with apparent casualness, and then fixed his eyes on the table at which Bob had joined Thompson and the two girls.

"Why, isn't that young Darrow over there?" he exclaimed.

June and her father turned their heads quickly. Trixie was still attempting to coax Bob to take the wine, and there was something amorous about the manner in which she proffered the glass now. Dan Mitchell saw Madison purse his lips, and—what was even more to his liking—he detected an expression on June's lovely face that was akin to disillusionment. He knew then that the situation for which he had been secretly responsible had undermined the Madisons' regard for Bob, affecting the father's confidence in him, and the daughter's respect for him.

"I guess Darrow isn't so different from other men, after all," Dan Mitchell mused. "That is, where the ladies are concerned."

June said nothing; but her father spoke.

"I fancy you're right, Dan," he muttered. "I'm rather shocked to find him here at all, and I certainly don't admire the company he seems to be keeping."

Meanwhile Bob was making tentative efforts to discuss business with Thompson, but he met with no success, the other man seeming to be bent on hilarity, and at length the young fireman announced that he must be returning to the station.

A few minutes after his departure June Madison suggested leaving, but Mitchell prevailed upon her to dance with him, and when he escorted her back to the table he found her father in conversation with a business acquaintance, whom he introduced as Fowler.

"Mr. Fowler is sightseeing, too," said Madison, "and thinks about as much of this place as I do."

"It's certainly my last appearance here," declared Fowler. "Oh, by the way, Madison, I hear you're promoting a new motor engine that promises to revolutionise the auto industry. That right?"

Madison nodded.

"Correct," he said; "and you can take it from me it's a wonder. I've had scientists working in co-operation with skilled engineers for some time past now, and this motor is going to make a stir."

Mitchell turned to June.

"Your father seems in for a long discussion," he mentioned, "and this is your first visit to a night club. How would you like to see the inside of it before you go? It's forbidden ground to most people, but I happen to know the owner."

"Oh, it would be a novel experience!" June answered, and Mitchell repeated his suggestion to her father.

"Show her around, by all means," Madison agreed. "I'll wait for you in the car, June—after I've had a chat with Mr. Fowler."

Mitchell gave June his arm and escorted her along a corridor that led from the restaurant to a flight of steps which descended to a basement. Near the foot of the steps was the doorway of a wine-cellar, stacked with barrels of illicit liquor, and Mitchell spoke to a man who was on guard there.

"Can't you get to that door?" Dan Mitchell jerked.

"The boss said I might show Miss Madison where the treasure was kept," he explained, with a wink that escaped June's notice.

The man at the doorway moved off, and Mitchell took June across the threshold.

"Well, there's the treasure," he said, indicating the casks, "and it's guarded like the United States Mint."

"Guarded?" June echoed. "From whom?"

Mitchell smiled. "From lots of people," he told her, "who would like to get their hands on those barrels. But they'd have a hard time getting in here. You see, the cellar is built like a bank vault. Take a look at that window over there. The iron bars on the outside of it are set in cement."

"Then the weird tales you read in the newspapers about hi-jackers and bootleggers are really true?" June asked.

"They certainly are," Mitchell answered.

June did not know that she was at that very moment in the presence of one of San Francisco's most active bootleggers. Nor did she dream that this cellar, built like a vault, was to be transformed by force of circumstances into a deadly trap.

The Outbreak.

TRIXIE FARRELL stood face to face with Spike Beldon in a private room behind the restaurant. Her face was white with temper, and it was with a fierce gesture that she struck a match and lit a cigarette.

"You heard me!" she said shrilly. "Go and tell Mitchell that I want to see him—and see him quick!"

One of Mitchell's most valued hirelings, Spike tried to reason with the woman.

"Listen, you!" he ground out. "Don't you get red-headed and spoil the whole game, or—"

Trixie snatched something from a table beside which she was standing. It was a whisky bottle and, like a fiend, she swung it up threateningly.

"You beat it and do as I tell you, Spike!" she screamed.

The gangster struck at her arm with the side of his hand, and the blow took her smartly on the wrist and sent the bottle flying out of her grasp. It burst against the wall, its contents drenching a curtain that decorated a window close to the spot where the bottle had been smashed.

Trixie clawed at Spike with her nails like a woman in a frenzy, but the gangster managed to seize her hands and hold her at bay.

"Listen, will yuh?" he appealed. "I'll go for Mitchell, but you gotta pipe down. If you lose your head an' spoil his plans there's liable to be trouble, I guess."

"Tell Mitchell I'm waiting for him here," Trixie said through clenched teeth.

Spike left her, and two or three minutes later he located Dan in the doorway of the wine cellar.

"Oh, Mr. Mitchell," he said, pausing on the steps, "may I see you a moment, please?"

Dan Mitchell turned his head. "Yes, surely." And, to June: "Pardon me."

He moved up the stairs to where Spike was standing.

"Trixie's on the rampage," the gangster whispered, "and wants to see you right away. Thought I'd better tell yuh, for she don't seem in her right mind."

Mitchell's eyes narrowed dangerously. Then he glanced over his shoulder to where his fair companion was still inspecting the wine cellar.

"Oh, June," he called, "I'll be right back in a moment. Don't go away from here."

He hurried along the corridor to the room where Trixie was awaiting him. She was pulling viciously at a cigarette, but flung it away as he entered.

Neither she nor Mitchell noticed that the cigarette-butt, so carelessly thrown aside, fell among the folds of the curtain that had been soaked with whisky.

"Well, what's eating you?" snapped Mitchell.

"Plenty!" the girl retorted. "Maybe you thought I didn't see you dancin' with that Madison dame."

"What of it?" Mitchell said with an ugly scowl.

Trixie's eyes flashed. "I'll show you what of it!" she cried. "You can't give me the air for her and get away with it, Mitchell!"

He caught her by the arm, grasping her so fiercely that his fingers bruised her flesh.

"I'm telling you that you'd better watch your step," he grated harshly, "or I'll have you thrown out of here! Understand?"

"You will, will you?" the woman shrieked. "Let me go!" She began to strike at him with her free hand. "D'you hear me? Let me go, you pig!"

There was a violent scuffle, and Mitchell was compelled to use rough tactics to defend himself. The woman's tones rose still higher and still louder, Mitchell's low-pitched but angry voice breaking in on the abusive words that poured from her lips.

"Be yourself, confound you! What's the matter with you? Don't be a nut—"

"You pig! You dirty four-flusher! You talked a lotta bunk to me, an' I was fool enough to believe it—"

Spike slid into the room.

"What's the trouble, Mitch?" he jerked, holding himself in readiness to lend assistance.

"Come on, Spike!" Mitchell panted. "Help me to get this wild-cat out of here."

The gangster obeyed. Fighting and screaming in the arms of the two men, Trixie Farrell was dragged into the corridor and thence to a back door, through which she was hurriedly propelled.

Meanwhile, in the room where the "scene" between Mitchell and Trixie had taken place, the glowing cigarette-butt was burning into the spirit-soaked material of the window curtains.

A few thin wraiths of smoke rose from the silken folds at first, but it was not long before the inflammable spirit caught fire. In a moment the window was enveloped in a fierce blaze, a blaze that rapidly spread from the curtains to the oak-panelled wall, to the thick rugs on the floor, to the costly furniture.

Alone in the basement, June Madison ventured farther into the cobwebbed recesses of the wine cellar, reading the names on the various casks of bootleg liquor, and picturing the dark deeds of crime for which these barrels had been responsible.

The guard, whom Dan had accosted some time before, returned to his post at the cellar doorway. He glanced inside, but failed to see June, who had passed out of sight behind a tall stack of kegs.

The guard presumed that Mitchell and his girl-friend had both gone upstairs again, and decided that he might as well fasten the cellar door. The restaurant would shortly be closing.

He pushed the door to and shot a heavy bolt. At that same instant he heard a panic-stricken cry from the corridor above.

"Fire! The joint's on fire! Everybody out! The place is on fire!"

The guard rushed up the stairs.

Fire-fighters to the Rescue.

BACK at the station, Bob Darrow was accosted by the battalion chief, in whom he had confided.

"Well, Darrow," Wilson said, "did you clinch the deal with that fellow Thompson?"

Bob shook his head.

"Not yet," he answered. "Thompson had a couple of girls with him. He seemed to be having too good a time to talk business. They were thinking of going on to another night-club when I left, and as a matter of fact it was all I could do to get away. I guess I'll turn in now, chief."

He made his way upstairs to the dormitory and slipped off his clothes. He was asleep shortly after his head touched the pillow, but he seemed to have been scarcely five minutes in bed when the ringing of the alarm bell aroused him.

Every man in the dormitory was stirring himself. Bed-covers were thrown back as the firemen sprang to the floor. In the space of a couple of minutes uniforms had been donned and the stalwarts of District Number Five were sliding down the poles to the engine-room where the fire-wagons stood—shining monsters of scarlet and brass.

Bob Darrow was one of the first to clamber aboard the leading engine, Pat Heeley sharing the distinction with him, and in thirty seconds less than the regulation three minutes the big trucks were surging forth into the street.

Engines and escapes stormed through the city, sirens wailing, bells clanging. Folk gathered on the sidewalks to watch their passing, and others leaned anxiously from bed-room windows and then gazed towards an ominous red glow that seemed to hover in the sky some distance away.

The Nightingale Club had flared up with a rapidity that was well-nigh incredible. But timber figured prominently in its scheme of interior decoration, and this factor was responsible for the swiftness with which the fire had spread.

Half an hour after the outbreak in that room where Trixie Farrell had quarrelled with Mitchell, the ground floor and the first floor were both ablaze.

Down in the wine-cellar June Madison remained ignorant of her danger for some time, for the basement was last to suffer. It was only when she moved to the barred window and saw people gathering outside that she realised something must be wrong. Then a whiff of smoke found its way into the cellar through the crevice under the door.

She guessed the reason for the commotion outside then, and with a stab of alarm she ran to the door. Alarm was succeeded by terror as she discovered that the door had been bolted on the outside, and, rushing back to the window, she clutched at the bars in a frenzy of panic.

Only a few paces away stood her father. He had been waiting for her with the car when the fire had started, and now he was mingling with the crowds who came pouring out of the doomed night-club. With growing anxiety he scanned the hurrying passers-by in the hope of seeing his daughter among them, and, suddenly discerning Mitchell, he sprang towards the man.

"Is June out here?" Mitchell panted. "No," the older man jerked. "Where is she? Quick, man—where is she? Where did you leave her? You were with her last!"

Mitchell stared at him stupidly. "I left her in the store-room—downstairs," he faltered. "I was called away while I was showing her around. Then the fire started."

"Good heavens, Dan, didn't you go back and make sure that she was safe?" Madison cried.

"I thought she'd be out here—" Mitchell did not complete the sentence, for at that moment a girl's voice reached the ears of the two men. It was June's voice, and as they whipped round they caught sight of her pale face framed in the basement window.

With one accord they ran to the wall of the night-club and knelt down, so close to the girl that they could have touched her by reaching forward. She was standing on tiptoe, her fingers clenched on the bars that held her a prisoner.

"Daddy!" she sobbed. "Oh, daddy, get me out of here!"

"June," Madison cried, "why didn't you make your escape when you knew the building was on fire? The whole place is blazing now!"

"Can't you get to that door?" Dan Mitchell jerked, pointing across the cellar.

"It's bolted!" June answered frantically. "I'm trapped, Dan—trapped! The smoke's beginning to pour in under the door. Get help—quickly!"

"My little girl!" groaned Madison, in the voice of a man distracted, and he turned in the direction of the night-club entrance.

Mitchell guessed his intention and tried to hold him back. The two men were struggling when the fire-wagons from Number Five Station swerved into the street with a warning clamour of bells.

Helmeted figures in blue sprang from the trucks, and, running out the hoses and the escapes, made ready for the perilous work ahead of them. The battalion chief's special car drew up, and Wilson stepped out to superintend operations. He was giving a string of orders when he caught sight of Madison endeavouring to break away from Dan Mitchell and entered the burning building.

"Madison," jerked Wilson, "what's wrong? You can't go in there!"

"My daughter—" Madison began hoarsely, and, with that, a fireman who was running past pulled up short in his tracks.

It was Bob Darrow. "Mr. Madison," he gasped, "where's June?"

"Locked in the vault downstairs," cried Madison, fighting to free himself.

Bob's glance leapt to the cellar window, and he saw June. Behind her there was a background of flame, for the fire had eaten its way under the door and was taking a hold on the stacked casks of spirit that lined the walls.

"Bob!" she called, recognising him. Few men could have resisted the direct appeal in that voice, and Bob Darrow never even hesitated. Wheeling, he made a rush for the blazing entrance of the night-club.

"Darrow!" the chief called. "Darrow, you can't go in there! Don't be a fool!"

But Bob did not heed him. Plunging into the flames, he fought his way to the steps leading down to the basement.

Burned and half-blinded, he found the hasement was a roaring furnace. The wooden staircase was enveloped in fire, and the paintwork on the steel door of the wine-cellar was blistered with the intense heat.

Bob drew the bolt and pressed against that door. It had jammed, and he had to use force to shift it. It stood firm against two assaults, but at the third attempt his shoulder hurled it open.

It flew wide and struck a pile of kegs. The barrels toppled, and then crashed to the floor. One or two of them splintered, and their contents spilled forth at Bob's feet, so that as he stumbled across the threshold his boots were spattered with the spirit and the strong fumes of it assailed his nostrils.

The accident had almost instantaneous consequences. The flames that had already found their way into the cellar swept across the spreading pools of bootleg liquor. There was a vivid flash like the flash of an explosion, and next moment, as Bob reeled on to where June was cowering, a fierce and steady blaze reared up between him and the doorway.

"Oh, Boh," June moaned, as he reached her side, "take me out of here!"

She swayed uncertainly, and he was just in time to catch her in his arms as she fell. Swinging her up, he spun round towards the door, but as he saw the inferno that the spirit from the shattered barrels had created he knew that the only way of escape was blocked.

The belt of fire that had risen by the door was impenetrable. No man could have entered it and lived long enough to pierce it, for, swift-spreading, it had already covered a wide section of the floor.

The heat drove Bob back to the window. He knew that he was trapped, and could only wait for the end, with June in his arms. That the end would not be long in coming he had no doubt, for the roof had already been affected by the flames on the floor above.

A blazing mass of timber fell at his feet.

(To be continued in another thrilling episode next week. By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.)

"Creeping Shadows."

(Continued from page 20.)

Disher." He had reached the bookcase and must have touched some secret knob, for the bookcase swung open. "Curse you for a meddling fool!"

The bookcase shut with a metallic clang.

"Brian has gone mad!" moaned Gloria. "Oh, what shall we do?"

"Don't worry." Disher laid a comforting hand on her shoulder. "Ah, now we can get moving!" The sound of a car had taken him to the window. "Cable and a company of special men."

Cable did not waste time when he came into the study. A signal to his men and they lined up on either side of the Hoyts.

"In league with Sparrow," briefly explained the Scotland Yard man. "After that picture. Probably would have given Nash a dud cheque for house and grounds and then cleared off with the Rembrandt. What's your news, sir?"

"Quite a lot," Disher answered. "I tumbled to the Hoyts, and I'm pretty certain one of them left their fingerprints on that bell of doom. With some black thread they rang the bell, hoping to create a scare and get Brian to sell. We can deal with them later, so I suggest the boys take them away, because we've got a big job before us." He pointed to the bookcase. "There's a secret passage behind there, and only a few moments ago Brian Nash held us up with a gun and disappeared."

"Let him go," Gloria implored. "Far better to let him go—he must be out of his mind."

Disher made no answer. His thin fingers were feeling over the bookcase. "Ah, here's the secret knob," came his eager cry. "Now we'll search this secret passage. Be ready for emer-

(Continued on page 27.)

32

RILEY'S "HOME" BILLIARD TABLES

GIVEN AWAY FREE

Write for particulars to
E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
 Howard Works, ACCRINGTON,
 and at Dept. 35 147, Aldersgate
 Street, LONDON, E.C.1.

BOY DETECTIVES! GREAT NEWS!!

Now ready! The NEW IMPROVED BOYS' SECRET SERVICE OUTFITS. Better value than ever before! Be up-to-date! SEND RIGHT NOW and get yours by RETURN OF POST!!

Contents:—1. Novel New "S.S." Secret Codebook (35 different codes by simply turning a dial—a most useful instrument). 2. New "S.S." Call-Whistle (for Outdoor Signals). 3. Handsome Silver-finish "S.S." Membership Badge. 4. Phial of marvellous "S.S." Radio Ink (it shines in the dark). 5. Packet of the new Mystic Fire Ink. 6. Phial of "S.S." Invisible Ink (for Secret Messages). 7. Packet of "S.S." Fingerprint Powder. 8. "S.S." Secret Code-Mask. 9. New enlarged edition of the fascinating book: "Things the Boy Detective Should Know" 10. Illustrated Bargain Price List of the very latest Boy Tee Outfits and Equipment, jokes, magical goods and novelties. PRICE, complete in box, 1/- only. POST FREE. Also the new IMPROVED SPECIAL PRESENTATION OUTFIT, with contents similar to above, but larger and even better. This Outfit also contains one handsome new "S.S." Fingerprint Album, with inking pad combined (a great new novelty), one extra-powerful folding magnifying lens, and the new engrossing book: "Secret Service Clubs and How to Run Them." Price only 2/6, POST FREE.

These Outfits absolutely SMASH all previous records for value. Don't hesitate, send TO-DAY to—

THE BOY DETECTIVE SUPPLY STORES, DESK B.C.,
 32, GATHCRAFT STREET, GREENGATE,
 (Foreign Postage 3d. and 6d. extra respectively.)
 September 19th, 1931.

RICHARD BARTHELMESS
as Francisco Delfino in the First National Production, "Adios."

"THE TEXAS RANGER."

(Continued from page 10.)

Helen's gang at bay while the other concentrated their attack on the front of the ranchhouse.

"You hold 'em here," he said, "and I'll take care of that Ranger."

He had received a slight flesh wound in his shoulder, but he was determined at all costs to settle accounts with Jim. He made for the back door of the building, and, stealing close to it, shot away the lock and the bolts.

Jim heard, divined what was happening, and thrust Helen behind an open door between two rooms, then rushed to the back door; and as Taylor kicked it open he fired point-blank at the outlaw's head.

But his last cartridge had been used, and the trigger pulled on an empty chamber. He flung the useless weapon at Taylor's head.

Taylor dodged, but he did not succeed in dodging the terrific blow Jim aimed at him with his fist, and he went down with a crash on the concrete floor of the kitchen.

Dawn had begun to break some little time before, and now daylight was rapidly increasing in strength. From the farmyard came the mingled din of shouts and shooting, Matt Taylor raised himself painfully on an elbow and glared defiantly up at Jim. He reached furtively for the gun which had been knocked from his hand, but Jim, with a dexterous kick, sent it spinning across the floor.

"Come on!" he shouted, jerking his enemy to his feet. "If you've got any fight left in you, fight!"

With the snarl of a wild animal, Taylor hurled himself forward, clutching at Jim's throat, but Jim tore away the murderous hands, and, with a sudden effort, lifted Taylor up bodily and sent him somersaulting over a table.

The table went down on its side with him, but he crawled from beneath it, and, battered, dishevelled, and nearly spent, he made once more for his opponent.

But Jim's left fist came up with a terrific swing, caught Taylor under the chin, and sent him clean out through an open doorway into the passage, where he fell in a crumpled heap.

Silence followed—a silence that sent Jim running fearfully into the living-room. Helen had sunk into an easy-chair, her face very white, her right hand holding her left forearm, where a patch of crimson stained a grey sleeve.

"I'm—all right," she faltered with a wan smile. "It was the last shot—the Rangers are here!"

Jim flew to a window and looked out. The sudden silence was explained! A score of Rangers had arrived, and such of Taylor's men as had escaped crippling wounds were riding for dear life in all directions across the plains.

Sam Lanning had not ridden all the way to Sterling City, or even half the way. He had encountered Captain Edwards and a party of his men only a few miles beyond Bellington on their way to that unimportant little town because no word had come from Ranger Jim Logan, and no news could be gleaned of him in the neighbourhood by a man who had been detailed to find out what had become of him.

Jim was bandaging Helen's arm when Captain Edwards himself entered the ranchhouse by the open back door, in company with Highpockets and others. He looked round the wrecked kitchen.

"Where's Jim Logan?" he shouted. Jim appeared from the passage, pushing before him by his coat-collar the dazed and damaged Taylor.

"Here I am, captain," he said cheerfully. "And I arrest Matt Taylor for the murder of Ed Lanning—not to mention a few other things!"

"Why, but, Jim, I thought that—er—" began the captain in surprise.

"So that's the way of it?" howled Highpockets delightedly. "Well, when I got that message—"

"I'll see you later, captain," interrupted Jim, and, without any regard whatever for official etiquette, he ran back to the living-room.

Helen had just risen to her feet, but she was lifted clean off them as he took her in his arms.

"The captain," he fibbed, "has told me to hold you as a material witness."

"He didn't tell you to hold me this way, did he?" inquired Helen with a radiant smile.

(By permission of United Artists Corporation, Ltd., and Columbia Pictures, starring Buck Jones, Carmelita Geraghty, Harry Woods, and Nelson McDowell.)

FOUR SPLENDID FILM NOVELS.

Fate forced her to embrace the man she hated. Life's bitter lesson—the tinsel and the gold. A tale of love and infatuation, starring Gloria Swanson and Ben Lyon.

"THE HOT HEIRESS."

An engineer drops a rivet through the window of a wealthy young woman, and becomes involved in a romantic tangle. Starring Ben Lyon and Ona Munson.

"AS YOUNG AS YOU FEEL."

For twenty years Lemuel had been a crank and faddist, but when he met Fleurette his rejuvenation started. Starring Will Rogers and Fifi Dorsay.

"FIFTY MILLION FRENCHMEN."

A young millionaire is accused of winning all his girl friends with his money and to disprove this wagers a big sum he will woo and wed a girl within two weeks and without a cent in his pocket. Starring William Gaxton and Claudia Dell.

Complete in this week's issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY. PRICE 2d.

"Creeping Shadows."

(Continued from page 25.)

gencies—Brian is a desperate man. If my theory is right we shall find—"

Even as he spoke there came from behind the panelling the sound of shooting; then the scream of a man in mortal agony.

The Limping Man.

DISHER waited just long enough for Cable and three plain-clothes men to join him before pressing the secret spring. The bookcase swung back and they piled down some stone stairs into a cellar. The pale light from an iron grating in the stone wall showed a strange scene.

"Seize that man!" shouted the crime investigator, pointing to a figure in the shadows.

The police hurled themselves forward, and Cable managed to grab away a big gun. A brief struggle and they had secured a prisoner.

"You've got me proper." The man's voice was hoarse with a gloating triumph. He spoke with a nasal twang. "But I got that skunk, though I nearly croaked the wrong 'un."

Disher spied a bound figure lying helplessly on the floor. The links were slowly forming and joining together.

Down the stone stairs came Sir Edwin and Gloria. They ran to the bound man and began to untie his bonds. Gloria stared down at Brian with anxious eyes, then gave a scream as she saw a huddled figure against the wall. She could see a white face—there were two Brians.

"That's the Squealer," muttered the prisoner. "That cove on the floor is the guy I nearly croaked."

"You're the limping man," accused Disher.

"What of it?" was the scornful answer. "Chicago Joe and I swore vengeance. He got Joe—but I got him. The Squealer won't do any more whining."

Sir Edwin and Disher helped the real Brian to his feet.

"I was in the study when fingers gripped me by the throat and I was dragged down here. We fought, but he stunned me with a stone." Brian fingered a bruise on his forehead. "He must have taken my clothes and impersonated me. This man and his pal, Chicago Joe, know him as the Squealer—I know him as someone else. They trailed him here, and your prisoner"—he pointed to the captive—"must have found the secret entrance in the old oak. I was lying here helpless when a light was flashed in my face, and—"

"And I'd a-croaked you, if yer double hadn't showed up on those stairs," interrupted the limping man. "Then I knew which was which—knew you wasn't the Squealer. Guess he won't try and more of his dirty tricks." He laughed. "I got him through his black heart."

Gloria had her arms round Brian Nash.

"Darling, I'm so glad you're safe!" She shuddered as she glanced towards the still figure, which two men were gently raising. "Who is that man, Brian? He's so like you."

"And who is the limping man?" demanded Disher. "Guess we'll get out of this gloomy place back to the study, and clear up these mysteries for good!"

(By permission of Wardour Films, Ltd., starring Franklin Dyall, Margot Gramme, and Lester Matthews.)

September 19th, 1931.

"TRAPPED."

(Continued from page 18.)

the threshold of it he was met by Bettina Moore.

"Farley and this other man," he asked her quickly, "where are they?"

"In here," Sally's mother answered, and led him through the doorway, where he saw the bodies of the two crooks.

Farley was still alive, but it was plain that he was very near the end. Bettina left Baxter with him, but a few minutes later was joined by the police captain outside the room.

"Don't worry, dear," he said, taking her hands. "Farley cleaned up everything before he died, and you can rely on me to see that no scandal attaches itself to you or Sally."

The Runaways.

JERRY arrived at the parsonage on time, complete with the marriage lines, and he had not long to wait ere Sally put in an appearance.

The minister was only too willing to perform the simple ceremony, and examined the certificate that Jerry handed him.

"Yes, this is all right—all in order," he declared, "but where are your witnesses?"

"Witnesses?" Jerry murmured. "Do we have to bring our own witnesses? You see, we—we don't know much about it. We've never been married before."

The minister smiled.

"It is customary for marrying couples to bring their own witnesses," he explained. "However, if you'll wait here a moment I'll go out and see if I can find someone."

He made his way to the front door, leaving Jerry and Sally together.

"Gee, I didn't know we had to have witnesses!" Jerry said.

"I didn't, either," Sally confessed. "I hope the minister can find somebody."

Her hope was at that moment on the very point of being realised, for, standing in the porch, the divine caught sight of two police officers prowling near by. They appeared to be looking for someone. Not for a moment did the minister suspect that they were looking for the young man he was about to marry.

"Oh, gentlemen," he called; "just a minute, if you please!"

The officers approached inquiringly, and the minister explained the situation.

"All right, we'll be your witnesses," one of the cops agreed, and added to his companion: "I reckon that guy we were chasin' has given us the slip, anyhow."

The parson led them into his sitting-room, and as they appeared Jerry recognised his pursuers. The recognition was mutual, and the officers started forward involuntarily.

"You thought you'd got away, didn't you?" one of them growled.

"No," Jerry stammered. "I'll come with you right after the ceremony."

"We'll see to that," he was told.

The minister stepped forward.

"Will you take your positions, please?" he suggested, and, with the police-officers behind them, Jerry and Sally edged closer to one another.

"I hope you don't mind waiting a minute," Jerry said, glancing over his shoulder at the cops.

"No, take your time."

The parson proceeded with the ceremony, and finished by raising his hands above the young couple's heads.

"I now pronounce you man and wife," he chanted, and scarcely were the words uttered when one of the police-officers advanced and snapped a pair of manacles on Jerry's wrists.

"Come on!" he ordered, and, with Sally hurrying after him, Jerry was escorted from the parsonage.

A cab was hailed outside, and the cops gave Bettina Moore's address, then pushed their captive into the taxi's dim interior.

Sally followed, and sat opposite Jerry. Presently she began to look tearful, and dabbed at her eyes with a handkerchief.

"Don't worry, dear," Jerry told her, while the cops maintained a stolid silence. "Everything is going to be all right."

Ten minutes later the taxi swerved into the drive of 16, Franklin Court. Jerry was dragged from it, and, still with Sally at his heels, was marched up to the front door.

The maid answered the police-officers' summons.

"Is Captain Baxter here?" she was asked.

"He's in the lounge with Mrs. Moore," the girl answered, gazing in consternation at Jerry and Sally.

The two policemen pushed past her unceremoniously, and hurried their prisoner across the hall and into the lounge, where Baxter and Bettina Moore were sitting on a chesterfield.

The captain and Mrs. Moore started to their feet as the officers appeared with Jerry and Sally.

"Say, what's the idea?" Baxter demanded.

"We got our man, captain," was the answer. "Do you want us to go on to headquarters with him?"

Baxter exchanged a smile with Mrs. Moore, and then:

"No," he said; "take off those bracelets. This case is closed. By the way, if you go upstairs you'll find two men lying in a room there. Have them carried away—to the morgue."

A key was produced, and the manacles were removed from Jerry. As the two policemen departed he began to rub his numbened wrists.

"Sally," said Mrs. Moore, coming across to where her daughter stood, "this is one of the happiest days of my life. Captain Baxter and I have just decided to be married."

"Oh, mother," Sally cried, "I'm so happy, too. Jerry and I are married!"

"What?"

Mrs. Moore's face registered amazement. Watching her anxiously, both Jerry and Sally expected indignation to follow, and waited for the storm to break. But quite unexpectedly Bettina turned to Jerry and held out her hands.

"Congratulations, Mr. Jerry Coleman," she said. "Mr. Jerry Coleman, of Park Avenue, I believe."

Jerry stared at her. In the background Captain Baxter was grinning a broad grin.

"Why didn't you tell us who you were in the first place?" Mrs. Moore went on.

Jerry found his voice.

"I might have lost my job as your driver," he answered laughingly. "You see, that day I first met Sally, I sort of scented adventure, and—well, romance. So when she mistook me for a chauffeur, I let her go on thinking I was. Just that, and no more."

"Well, you certainly found adventure," Mrs. Moore commented, "and you seem to have found romance, too."

"But how did you discover who I really was?" Jerry asked.

Sally's mother beckoned him to the threshold of an adjoining room.

"Look," she said, and, following the direction of her hand, Jerry caught sight of two old acquaintances.

One was the valet Ferguson, sitting in a deep armchair and mopping his brow with a handkerchief as if he were burdened by all the cares in the world. The other was a thick-set, bow-legged bulldog, squatting contentedly at Fergie's feet.

(By permission of the Filmophone Renters, Ltd., starring Nick Stuart and Nena Quartaro.)

GROSE'S, LUDGATE CIRCUS, LONDON.

FOOTBALL JERSEYS

All Colours and Designs.

15/- per doz.

British Made.

Send for Illustrated List. Post Free.

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge St., London, E.C.4.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES, STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1

BE TALL Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

STAMMERING. STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

STAMMERING

Stuttering. New, remarkable, Certain Cure. Complete, 2/-. Details—L. A. STEBBING, (Stammer Dpt. A.P.), 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

HANDSOME MEN ARE SLIGHTLY SUNBRUNT. "SUNBRONZE" remarkably improves appearance. 1/6. 2/9. 7,000 Testimonials. (Booklet, stamp.)—Sunbronze Laboratories (Dept. A.7), Colwyn Bay, Wales. (Est. 1902.)

BLUSHING, BE TALLER! Shyness, Nervous, Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/-. Details, striking testimonials. Free—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

Increased my own height to 6ft. 3ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Alroad 1/-) including Allport, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W.A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Boy's Cinema

"SMART MONEY" and "THE LAST RIDE."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^d

No. 615.

EVERY TUESDAY.

SEPTEMBER 26th, 1931.

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Smart Money."

Nick Venizelos, Edward G. Robinson; Irene, Evalyn Knapp; Jack, James Cagney; Marie, Noel Francis; District Attorney, Morgan Wallace; Mr. Amnoppoulos, Paul Porcasi; Schultz, Clark Burroughs; Sleepy Sam, Ralf Harold; Sport Williams, Boris Karloff; Dealer Barnes, Walter Percival; Snake Eyes, John Larkin; Lola Polly, Walters.

"The Last Ride."

Lita Alvaro, Dorothy Revier; Big Boy, Tom Santschi; Brady, Francis Ford; Roy Smith, Charles Morton; Doris White, Virginia Brown Faire; Piccardi, Frank Mayo.

Where Did You Get That Hat?

That's probably what you would ask your favourite movie star if you happened to meet him—or her—away from the studio.

Greta Garbo always wears a round tam, pulled down until nary a wisp of hair is showing. John Gilbert wears an old grey felt, with the top crushed in by hard usage and stuffing into his overcoat pocket. Marion Davies comes to work with a sailor cap on, and Buster Keaton may be seen sauntering from a hard day at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer plant with a white cap that accentuates his swarthy complexion.

Ramon Novarro invariably wears a green felt, several sizes too small. Adolphe Menjou, ever immaculate, favours a smart black felt with turned-down brim. Norma Shearer, usually wears close-fitting green turbans, and Wallace Beery is seldom without his tweed cap with crumpled peak. Marie Dressler's hats made her famous on the stage many years ago, but in private she goes in for plain toques with simple ornaments. Cliff Edwards always wears his hats backwards, and Hedda Hopper may be sure to have a skull-bonnet pushed far back on her head.

Anita Page usually wears only a scarf about her blonde tresses, and Robert Montgomery goes hatless.

Not Enough Rain!

Norman Lee, the director of "Four Winds," now being produced at Welwyn Studios, must surely be the only person in England to complain that insufficient rain has fallen this summer.

Officially, the English summer should have arrived just as "Four Winds" was due for production, and accordingly rain storms descended unceasingly. Lee, however, required a constant torrential downpour for scenes in the film, and had hoped to harness Nature for his purpose, but in his opinion the falling rain was too mild, and there was not enough of it!

To provide Lee's idea of real rain, a system was introduced by which water was conveyed into the Studio itself and released through a huge sifter. The unfortunate members of the cast were

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

HENRY KENDALL

in

"THE FLYING FOOL."

A young English detective swears to get a murderer within a week, and a battle of wits follows with a desperate gang of crooks. A mysterious and beautiful young girl becomes involved in this grim story of crime.

"THE LONESOME TRAIL."

A girl and a brave cowpuncher have to fight with brawn and brain to escape from the attack of a band of Western bad men. Starring Charles Delaney.

"SUBWAY EXPRESS."

Who killed Edward Tracy? A baffling murder mystery that will keep you guessing till the end. Starring Jack Holt and Eileen Pringle.

ALSO

The fifth episode of our thrilling serial of the fire brigade, starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

grouped under the sifter, and there received the full benefit of Lee's rain-storms. Every precaution was taken, however, to prevent chills and colds. Hot baths and welcome drinks were provided, and though this damp climate was maintained for three days, no one even sneezed.

The cameramen and sound engineers were in such close proximity to the actors that they were also drenched to the skin throughout the three days, but Lee had somehow managed to keep dry. At last, even he was forced to come within the rain's radius, but owing to a misunderstanding the most violent flood of all was precipitated at that moment, and he was soaked to the skin. Anxious inquiries immediately followed:

"Have you got enough rain now, Mr. Lee?"

A Cruising Holiday.

When Richard Arlen and Walter Huston were working together in "The Virginian," they bought a yacht and frequently went sailing in it during week-ends. On completion of the above picture, however, the two men found little opportunity for meeting as before, and Dick is said to have bought up Huston's interests in the yacht, and hopes shortly to take a cruise in it. His latest picture is called "The Secret Call."

Nearly Knocked Out.

Charles Bickford relates an incident which made him feel really sore—so much so, in fact, that he is now more careful of the microphone than ever before.

It happened when he was playing in his new picture, "East of Borneo." The scene required that Charles should recline in a chair, say a few words, and then jump hurriedly to his feet. The filming began and the actor did exactly as directed. With a dull thud, however, his head came in forceful contact with the heavy microphone suspended directly above him.

Charles let out a yell and then said a few words about microphones and things in general. But you won't hear them in the film. The director thought it best to cut out this part of the dialogue so that our ears might be spared!

Why They Changed Their Names.

Do you know why film artistes changed their names? The reasons are many and varied, but the following few will suffice.

Stan Laurel's real name is Arthur Stanley Jefferson, and his reason for adopting his present one was simply due to an old variety trick. When he left Fred Karno's Mummings Birds, Stan arranged to strike out on his own. But Arthur Stanley Jefferson was too long for bill displays, programmes, etc., and so he changed to another and shorter name.

Claude Allister's real name is Palmer, but his father, a general, forbade his son to use the family name in a conjuring act he was going to perform in London. So young Palmer borrowed a name he had seen somewhere and became Claude Allister. John Loder's father, also a military officer, forbade his son to take up a stage career. But John Lowe, as he was, would not give up his ambition and became John Loder.

James Hall was at one time known as James Brown. He ran away from home to go on the stage, changed his name to Hamilton, and then when he went into pictures was persuaded by Jesse Lasky, the producer, to make yet another change and call himself Hall.

(Continued on page 27.)

There was not a man who could beat him at gambling. He became famous for his luck at cards and at last the law went after him. They framed a girl to betray him. A crook drama that is one long thrill from start to finish. Starring Edward G. Robinson and Evalyn Knapp.

Luck!

NICK VENIZELOS, of Irontown, lounged behind the counter of his hair-dressing saloon. His assistants were busy with razor and scissors, shearing hair and whiskers and conversing with the customers as they did so.

Nick toyed with a dice-box, and for his own amusement rolled forth the little cubes colloquially known as "the bones." He was of Greek parentage, Nick, but hundred per cent American for all that, and a personality in the small Middle-Western township.

A newly-shaven customer rose from the chair wherein he had sat while Jack, Nick's chief assistant, had removed the stubble from his chin. He came over to the counter and handed Nick a check and a coin.

Nick lifted the coin and grinned at his client.

"Aha," he said, "double or nothing, Joe?"

"Not me," the customer rejoined. "Gimme my change. I've paid you double too many times, Nick."

Nick's grin broadened, and into his eyes came the glint of the gambling lure. It had ever been so with Nick Venizelos. Dimes, nickels and dollars—dice, ponies and card-decks—the very sight of them roused in him the urge to take a chance, and the fact that his small business was one of the most flourishing of its kind in Irontown was a testimonial to his good fortune.

"Faint heart never won fair lady or fat turkey," Joe," he coaxed. "Come on, what do you say—heads or tails?" And he spun the coin deftly and clapped it on the back of his hand.

"Oh, well—tails!" the customer muttered, and then, as Nick uncovered the coin, gave a rueful laugh.

"Heads," Nick observed. "Better luck next time, Joe."

"I never seen such a lucky stiff," his customer grumbled on his way to the door.

Nick slipped the coin in the till and came round the counter to where his assistants were operating on the last two customers.

"Well," he declared, "I guess we've got enough money to close up!"

He paused, and looked hard at the neckwear of Jack. "Say, that's one o' my ties, ain't it?" he challenged.

Jack shared a room with Nick, and had a habit of borrowing certain items of attire which happened to appeal to him.

"Why—er—when I got up this mornin'," he stammered, "I sort of—er—"

"Yeah, I know," Nick put in sarcastically. "Why didn't you put on my new check suit while you were about it?"

"It didn't fit," answered Jack, whereupon both of them burst out laughing.

They were more like brothers than employer and assistant, and Nick had entirely recovered his good-nature and was clapping Jack on the shoulder when one of the last two customers spoke to him.

"Hey, Nick," he asked, "what do you fancy in the final race at Louisville?"

"Why, I got my dough on Abie Kabibble," Nick rejoined complacently. "Think he'll win?"

Nick smiled. "Sure he'll win," he said. "If nothing else, he'll win by a nose."

When Nick spoke of shutting up shop he meant that business was over for the day, but nevertheless the premises continued to witness the passing of money, and the mute walls to hear the clink of coin and the crisp rustle of notes.

Nick collected dimes and dollars during the day behind the counter. Of nights, he collected them in a discreet back room, raking them across a long gaming table as he matched his luck successfully against the luck of a number of cronies.

To that back room Nick now made his way, and presently men began to drop in on him and stand around the table—men of a sportive persuasion, willing to risk a dollar or two on the goddess Chance. By dusk, some eight or nine men were gathered for the "play," and the number was brought up to a dozen by the appearance of Jack and the other assistant, a swarthy Greek known as Mitros Bikelas.

"I'm looking for action to-night, Nick," someone said, speaking through the buzz of conversation and the haze of tobacco smoke which by this time filled the room.

"Don't worry, boy," Nick retorted with a grin, "you'll get it."

The dice rattled in the little box, and play began. A dozen pairs of eyes watched the white cubes with the black dots roll forth upon the table as throw after throw was made. Small bets were placed, and coin and small bills were soon changing hands—their destination generally tending towards that part of the table where Nick Venizelos stood.

Dark and dapper, smiling the smile that rarely seemed to leave his queer, twisted mouth, Nick gathered in the little piles of money with monotonous regularity, and he had just taken a ten-dollar bet when a darkie entered the room, his ebony face shining like a new shoe.

"Hallo, Snake Eyes!" Nick greeted September 26th, 1931.

him, recognising the coloured handyman who did odd jobs about the shop. "What do you want?"

"Mistah Nick," the darkie announced, "dere's a lady outside what wants to see you."

"How do you know she's a lady, Snake Eyes?"

The darkie grinned, and mirth lurked in the whites of his rolling optics.

"Well, boss, she done got a skirt on," he murmured.

"All right," said Nick, laughing, "I'll see her."

Mitros Bikelas laid a hand on his arm.

"Don't forget to remember, boss," he observed prophetically. "'Lucky weeth the cards, onlucky weeth lov.'"

"Ah, that's a lotta bunkaroo," Nick rejoined. "Don't forget to remember—I'm lucky with the women, too."

"But mebbe sometime you gonna pick de wrong filly," Bikelas muttered, whereupon Nick chuckled placidly.

"Not a chance," he drawled, inspecting himself appraisingly in a mirror. "Nothing but favourites in my stable. Well, lady, here I come."

And he made his way out into the street, where he found a flaxen-haired, innocent-eyed girl of his acquaintance awaiting him.

"Oh, Nick," she said in a distracted tone, "I've got to have some money right away."

She proceeded to tell him a hard-up story that touched the little barber's heart, and before she was fairly through with it he interrupted her gently.

"How much do you need?" he asked. "I've got to have a hundred dollars," she told him in a pathetic little whisper.

"Well, you know Nick," he said, patting her on the shoulder, and forthwith produced a wad of bills.

He took one from the top of the sheaf. It was a note that had received rough handling in its time. Its corners were frayed, and at one time it had been torn in halves, the two fragments having been gummed together again with strips of stamp paper. Nick casually noticed its condition as he handed it over.

"Gee, you're a swell fellow," the girl told him with a wealth of gratitude in her voice.

"Glad to do it," Nick assured her. "Glad to do it, baby."

They parted. Nick did not see the girl make straight for a shop doorway and hand the hundred-dollar bill to a tall man in a slouch hat who had been waiting in the shadows there. For by the time the note had been passed over to the loiterer Nick was already back with his cronies.

Snake Eyes was still there, and, with the true negro's weakness for a dice-game, proclaimed his intention of making a bet on the "bones."

"Who'll give me half-a-dollah fo' mah hand?" he called, as he made his first throw.

"I wouldn't give a nickel for your whole body," Nick grinned. "No vivisection hospital would take it as a gift."

The nigger was hardly listening. His eyes were fastened on the dice, which had now come to rest.

"Eight's the point," he said. "Ah'll bet a dollah, Mistah Nick."

Nick, as banker, took the bet, and collected the money when Snake Eyes threw a fatal seven.

"Up pops de Devil," the darkie murmured sadly. "Mistah Nick, you sho' is one lucky white man."

Nick looked at him shrewdly.

"You got carfare home, Snake Eyes?" he asked.

"No, suh, I ain't, boss," was the answer. "I ain't got a red cent."

"Then take this," said Nick, pushing some money into his dusky paw. "And stay out of this game, from now on."

He turned back to the table, and at the same moment became aware that a tall man in a slouch hat had appeared in the room, and was elbowing his way to the fore. The geniality faded from Nick's countenance as he recognised in the newcomer a certain "Sport" Williams, whom he had no reason to admire.

Even gamblers have their scale of honour and respectability, and Nick knew Williams for a sponger and a rogue.

"Say," he mentioned, barring the way with his arm, "we're not takin' any two-bit bets to-night, Sport."

Williams scowled.

"I'm not makin' any two-bit bets to-night," he said. "Does that look like two bits to you?"

He threw down a hundred-dollar bill, and Nick picked it up. At once his glance became riveted on it, for he saw that the corners of the note were frayed, and that at one time it had been torn in two, then pasted together again with stamp paper.

Nick's face hardened. So the pitiful story of the flaxen-haired girl had been just a trick, engineered by Williams to secure ready cash, break in on the dice-game and play his luck against the little barber's.

And the proverbial Venizelos' luck had already been in the balance against him when Nick had chanced to give that girl a note that lent itself so readily to recognition.

"I'll shoot ten of that hundred," Williams said.

Nick looked up. His eyes seemed to bore into the sponger.

"You'll shoot all of it or nothing," he rapped out.

"Eh?" Williams blurted. "Say, what are you talkin' about?"

"You heard me—you'll shoot the hundred or nothing!"

Williams hesitated, and then nodded reluctantly. "All right," he growled. "Shoot the piece."

The rest of the group gathered round to watch the play, for hundred-dollar bets were rare occurrences in the back room of the Irontown barber's shop.

The dice began to roll, and looking on excitedly, the bystanders quoted the numbers that turned up.

"Three and two. The point is five." Again they rolled, and: "A six, and the Sport wants a five."

The rattle of the "bones" as they were picked up and returned to the box seemed to echo those words: "The Sport wants a five."

Once more the little white cubes danced over the table. They came to rest, and a murmur arose at the sight of that number which is the dice-player's despair.

"Seven makes Williams a loser!"

"Huh!" grunted Nick Venizelos, pocketing his patched hundred-dollar bill. "And the prisoner ate a hearty breakfast. Go on, Williams—breeze—scram—pull your freight. And as you go out that door take the 'Welcome' sign off it."

Williams departed savagely, and Nick turned to resume the game. But he found the boys unwilling to take any further chances, for it was plain that the little barber's luck was running especially strong to-night.

"Say, Nick," observed one of them conversationally, "you're wasting your time in a small tank like this. You should be in that big game in the city. Why, Hickory Short would be a cinch for you."

The speaker was a travelling salesman who had occasion to visit New York pretty frequently, and the Hickory Short he had mentioned was perhaps one of the greatest gamblers of a city that almost boasted of its personalities in that sphere—though now and then they were singled out for attention by the police.

"You ain't kidding me, are you?" asked Nick. "You see," he added reflectively, "I've been kind of thinking, myself, that this town's getting too soft for me. How much do you figure it would take to bust in on that game in the big city, anyhow?"

The salesman shrugged.

"Well, a fellow shouldn't try to bust in on it unless he has at least ten thousand dollars."

Ten thousand dollars was an amount that the big city gamblers lost in an evening without turning a hair, but to the small-time plungers of Irontown it was a fortune, and the salesman's estimate was received with awe.

"Ten thousand bucks," Nick mused, while the rest of the fellows were commenting on the magnificence of the sum. "I'll have that one day!" His dark, live eyes were agleam. "And when I do, I'll show those city birds something!"

It was Jack who conceived the inspiration that was to equip Nick for the big city game earlier than he anticipated.

"Say, listen," the young assistant exclaimed, "why don't we make up a pool amongst us, and stake Nick to that Hickory Short racket? I'll put in all I've got for a start."

"You can bank on me for a couple hundred," declared the salesman who had been to New York.

Nick looked round.

"That's a great idea!" he jerked. "Why, I could raise five thousand on the barber shop."

"I geev' you da thousand dollar what I was gonna send back for my wife to bring her here," cried Mitros Bikelas excitedly, and from all around came offers of various other amounts.

Nick wandered thoughtfully to the far side of the room. A bird-cage hung from the ceiling, and a coverlet drooped over it. The little barber took off the coverlet to reveal a twittering canary bird, a tiny creature on which he lavished a tremendous amount of affection.

"Well, Blondie," he asked, "what do you say about us two going to the big city, huh?" Then, turning all at once with an odd, pent-up laugh, "Boys," he proclaimed, "you're on!"

"Attaboy, Nicky!" Jack said. "And you'll knock those big city gamblers for a loop."

Thus it came about that, two or three days later, Nick Venizelos prepared to step aboard the New York train with something just over ten thousand dollars in his wallet.

He was attired in the classiest suit that the best tailor in Irontown could provide, carried a brand-new valise in one hand and Blondie's cage in the other. Around him, as he stood on the steps of a Pullman car, a crowd of his associates gathered—the men financially interested in his trip, and a party of former girl friends—every one of them as fair as he was dark.

Snake Eyes was among those present, and, edging his way to the front, he handed Nick a rabbit's foot.

"Jes' keep that in yo' pocket, Mistah

Nick," he said, "and you'll win fo' sho'."

"Thanks, Snake Eyes," Nick answered. "You know, I've practically cleaned up that big game now. Come here, nigger, and gimme luck." And to the amusement of the onlookers he rubbed the palm of his hand on Snake Eyes' crop of woolly hair.

"Say, Nick," someone called, "you know where to send my share of the dough you make?"

"Sure, I know," Nick answered laughingly. "Of course, you boys all understand. I pay you back your original investments, and we split the winnings in proportion."

"How much you t'eenk you gonna win, boss?" asked Bikelas the Greek.

"Why, I ween so much," Nick rejoined, imitating the Greek's accent, "you can send back to de old country for your wife—and your sweetheart, too."

Jack came forward.

"Nick," he said, a little unsteadily, "I'll miss you."

"Boy, as soon as I make my killing I'll send for you," Nick assured him, "and that won't be long."

"All aboard," came the voice of an official, and a moment later the gambling coterie of Irontown was waving farewell to their "best bet" as the train pulled out.

Nick dumped his luggage and made his way to the observation car. Standing on the small platform there, he watched familiar scenes till Irontown was out of sight, and then he turned briskly to an official who happened to be near by.

"Say, conductor," he asked, "what time do we get into New York?"

"We're due in there at six-forty-two," the official answered, "and we've never been late yet."

"Bet you ten to five we don't make it on time," Nick offered quickly.

The Big City.

NICK emerged from the room he had booked at a certain New York super-hotel, and took the elevator to the ground floor. A rapid descent through sixteen stories brought him to the palatial foyer and lounge.

"Nice ride—thanks," he drawled to the lift attendant, and with the air of a man entirely at his ease he strolled over to the register clerk's desk.

"Good-morning, Mr. Venizelos," the clerk greeted politely. "I hope you are finding everything satisfactory."

"Oh, yeah!" Nick rejoined. "Fine hotel you got here. Er—by the way, you haven't seen Hickory Short around to-day, have you?"

A queer look passed across the clerk's face.

"Oh, you mean—Hickory Short the gambler?" he said. "He doesn't live here."

"No? I heard he did," Nick eyed the clerk keenly. He was convinced that the fellow was evading the truth, and could hardly blame him. With the authorities always on the look-out for any breach of the gaming laws, the utmost caution had to be exercised.

"Oh, say," he went on, leaning closer and speaking to the clerk in an undertone, "you don't happen to know in which room the—er—the big roving poker game is going on to-night?"

"No, sir, I don't," the clerk answered. "We don't permit anything like that around this hotel, sir."

"Oh, I see! Thanks."

Nick moved away, looking around him casually till his glance encountered two things which, in unison, were as irresistible to him as the gambling lure—a blonde head and a pretty face.

They belonged to a girl behind a candy and tobacco counter, and Nick walked over and asked for a good cigar.

"These are very nice," the girl said, producing a box of cheroots. "A dollar each. I can recommend them."

"Do you smoke them yourself?" Nick inquired whimsically, and then, as she shook her head with a pretty laugh: "I'll take five of them."

He had handed her a bill, and was telling her to keep the change when he observed a familiar-looking object on the counter—a small, cylindrical wooden box containing two ivory cubes.

"What are these things for?" he asked innocently.

"Poker dice," the girl explained. "It's a dollar if you lose, and if you win you get two dollars' worth of merchandise."

"Anything behind the counter?"

"Anything in merchandise," the girl informed him, with a twinkle in her eye.

Nick grinned.

"Well, you're a cute little package," he declared. "Mind you, I'm a little green at this sort of thing, but here goes. Poker dice, one flop." And he picked up the box and rattled the "bones."

Three times he played his luck against the girl's, and three times he won.

"Look here," he said then, "we'd better quit this. I'd hate to see a nice little girl like you lose her job."

"All right, we quit," the girl answered. "That's three games on the house. My, but you're lucky! Do you gamble much—I mean for big money?"

"Well, do I look like a tinhorn?" Nick retorted. "Sure, I take a little flutter once in a while. But how much do I owe you?"

"Three dollars for the games," the girl told him, "and you got six dollars' worth of merchandise. What will you have?"

Nick pointed.

"I've got my eye on that big box of candy marked six bucks," he said. "No, no, don't wrap it up. You keep it, baby."

"Oh, I couldn't do that!" she protested sweetly.

"That's all right," Nick rejoined. "I don't eat candy. It gets in my teeth. Look here, I'm a stranger in town, you know, and I'm kinda lonesome. How'd you like to come out and have dinner with me to-night?"

She shook her blonde head.

"Oh, I couldn't—my mother doesn't let me stay out at night."

"Too bad," Nick murmured. "Are

Nick seemed to sag in his chair. Said Hickory Short, sitting on his left: "The luck's certainly running against you to-night, barber."

you sure you won't change your mind?"

"Oh, I couldn't," she said. "I really couldn't!"

That evening Nick was dining with her in a Broadway restaurant and calling her by her first name.

"This is one of the best places I've been in, Marie," he declared, while enjoying a cigar after the last course.

"I thought you'd like it," Marie told him sweetly.

Nick inclined his head.

"Not a bad cigar you sold me this morning, either," he mentioned. "Of course, at home I smoke my own brand—"

"This with an airy gesture. "A fellow in Havana makes em up for me."

"Is that so?"

"It is," Nick declared, and then, leaning forward confidentially: "Say, Marie, he went on, "I suppose you know most of the regulars that hang around the hotel, don't you?"

"Well—yes," she answered. "Why?"

"Ever see Hickory Short around?" Nick asked her. "You know, the big gambler."

Marie nodded.

"He's an awfully nice fellow," she said. "He's around most of the time."

Nick's voice took on an eager note.

"You don't happen to know in which room they're holding the game to-night, do you?" he questioned.

"I just happen to know," was the rejoinder, "but you won't say I told you, will you? Mr. Short ordered some cigars to be sent up to his room this afternoon—and it's three-forty-six."

"Boy," said Nick, rubbing his hands, "Am I itching to get in that game?"

"Oh, Mr. Venizelos," Marie went on, concernedly, "I hope you don't think I'm butting in, but—but I'd suggest you put some money in the hotel safe for car fare home—just in case—"

Nick laughed genially.

"There won't be any 'in case', baby," he announced, with confidence. "But I'll tell you what I'll do. Here—take this hundred dollars and keep it for me. After the game I'll make you a present of it."

"Oh, I couldn't—"

"Keep it, baby," Nick insisted. "And if I should lose—gee, that sounds funny—but if I should lose— Well, I'll need that hundred for cigar money."

"But you don't know me," Marie protested. "I might run away with the money. You can easily put it in the hotel safe."

"You're safe enough for me," Nick declared. "Listen, baby, I'm a gambler. It's my business to read human nature—to know people—and I can tell that you're on the level."

The girl slipped the hundred dollar bill into her handbag.

"Oh, well, if you insist," she murmured.

The Game.

NICK tapped at the door of Room 346, situated on the floor above his own. He was answered by a tall, lean man with a sharp caste of countenance and a pair of heavy-lidded eyes.

"I'd like to see Hickory Short," said Nick promptly.

"Well," was the slow, drawing rejoinder, "I'm Hickory Short."

"Yeah?" Nick held out his hand. "I'm Nick Venizelos of Irontown. Nick the Barber, they call me."

Short drew back.

"Oh, come in, Mr. Venizelos," he said. "I've often heard of you. Of course"—as he closed the door—"you have some way of identifying yourself."

Nick produced papers and photographs, and, after glancing through them, Hickory Short drew him towards a table at which four other men were sitting—a table littered with cards and chips.

"Boys," said Hickory Short, "I want you to meet Mr. Venizelos. Nick, this is Mr. Tompkins—"

"Honest John Tompkins!" Nick exclaimed.

"And this is Mr. River," Hickory Short continued.

"Old Deep River himself, huh?"

"And on the other side of the table," Short proceeded, "Back-to-Back Schultz and Mr. Barnes. Say, Nick, how about a drink?"

Nick accepted the offer, and Hickory Short poured him out a glass of champagne.

"Fizz water, huh?" said Nick, testing it. "Good stuff, too. Where'd you get it, Hickory? I'd like a case of it myself."

"Well, I'll send you down a case to-morrow," Hickory Short told him with a smile.

"Maybe I'll be better able to pay for it to-morrow," Nick retorted with a broader smile. "Well, what are we waitin' fer? How about a little game of skill and chance?"

"I've heard of such things," Short drawled. "We're playin' five card stud, Nick, and the roof's the limit. Now we're all friends here, Nick, and, though we ain't playin' marbles, we don't want no arguments. Anything ain't right, you just say so."

"Right," Nick answered, and then called a waiter who was in attendance. "Bring a dozen new decks of cards," he said.

"What's the matter, Nick?" asked Hickory Short. "Ain't the cards we've been usin' good enough for you?"

"Oh, sure, it's just an old barber-shop custom," Nick answered wisely. "A fresh towel with every shave—that's my motto. Here, gimme five thousand dollars' worth of chips."

He handed over the money and received in exchange a number of poker discs, the lowest of which stood for a hundred dollars, and the highest for a thousand.

"If you run out of those," observed Barnes, "there's more where they came from."

"Brother," Nick retorted, "you'll be buyin' 'em off me before the night's over."

Hickory Short laughed.

"Well, you're an optimist anyway," he commented, and the game began.

In the small hours of the morning Nick Venizelos was still occupying the chair which had been drawn up for him at the commencement of play, but the genial confidence had gone from him and he was no longer the dapper figure that he had cut on his arrival.

He was sitting in his shirt-sleeves, his tie was disarranged and his hair was rumpled, while his face seemed to have become almost haggard. And the pile of chips that had rested at his elbow had been considerably reduced.

Nor were those remaining chips the survivors of the first batch he had bought. They were the relics of a second five thousand dollars' worth, purchased in the desperate hope that the initial losses would be retrieved.

It looked as if the goddess of fortune had at last abandoned Nick the Barber

Hand after hand was dealt, and Nick's store of chips dwindled. The high cards were not coming his way, but, though the memory of his friends in Irontown was like a spectre haunting his mind, he was not the man to whine. He had struck a bad patch—that was all—and it could not last indefinitely.

Nor could his money—

A hand was dealt to him that looked good for a wager. He had had many such during the course of the evening, and had backed them only to find himself beaten by a 'spot.' But now or never was his chance, and he resolved to plunge.

"I'll call," came the voice of Hickory Short.

"Raise you," said Schultz.

Barnes, Tompkins and River dropped out of the bidding, but Nick sat tight and played his hand up to the last chip.

"A pair of aces," observed Hickory Short, laying down his cards, "with the queen."

Nick drew in his breath.

"I think I got you, Hickory," he said in a voice that quavered. "Aces too, but with the king."

He leaned forward with the intention of raking in the hoard of chips in the middle of the table, but Schultz anticipated him with a smile.

"Thanks, gentlemen," he stated. "Mine are two jacks and three sixes. I guess that beats the band."

Nick seemed to sag in his chair. Said Hickory Short, sitting on his left:

"The luck's certainly running against you to-night, barber."

Nick stood up with an effort and forced a game grin. He was cleaned out, but he knew how to take a trimming.

"Oh, it's just a matter of the breaks," he declared. "Now, don't worry about me, boys. My brother works in the mint."

The gamblers laughed at the jest, and their laughter was in Nick's ears as he pulled on his coat and left Room 346 for his own apartment.

He was awakened next morning by a splitting headache and a knock on the door. A bell-boy appeared, carrying in one hand a telegram, and in the other a heavy erate.

Nick rose and ripped open the telegram.

"Hope you knocked 'em dead," it ran. "The Gang from Irontown."

A kind of groan escaped Nick.

"Knocked 'em dead," he muttered, and then, turning, he saw that the bell-boy was waiting for a tip.

Nick looked at the erate which the hotel messenger had also brought. When he opened it, he found that it contained the champagne that Hickory Short had promised him; but, far from expressing a friendly sentiment, the gift seemed to Nick a mockery. For he remembered his own boast of the previous night that he would be sending a case to Short.

In lieu of a tip, Nick gave the bell-boy one of the bottles, and the messenger departed jubilantly. Half an hour later Nick took the elevator to the ground floor and walked over to the candy and cigar counter, dismally reflecting that he would want that hundred dollars from Marie after all.

But the girl he found in attendance there was a dark-eyed brunette.

"Where's Marie?" he inquired.

"Marie?" the brunette echoed. "Oh, you mean the girl that worked here. I don't know, sir. She left suddenly, I think. I got a call to report here this morning."

Nick went away with a dull suspicion in his mind, and, scarcely realising where his steps took him, wandered into a cafeteria and dropped into a chair.

An elderly man sat opposite him, reading a paper. The front page was turned towards Nick, and suddenly a headline caught his eye—a headline that seemed to transmit a violent shock to him, so that all at once he sprang to his feet and snatched the paper from the stranger's grasp.

"Say, what's the idea?" gasped the man. "Give me back my paper! You've got a nerve!"

But Nick was not listening. He was glaring like a madman at that headline:

"HICKORY SHORT TO BE RELEASED FROM GAOL AT END OF THE MONTH."

There in cold print Nick Venizelos read of the genuine Hickory Short's arrest six weeks previously for a breach of the gaming laws. There, before his eyes he saw a revelation that told him he had been fooled into entering the wrong game, and he knew then that he had been amongst a school of card-sharpping swindlers.

That was the news he would have to take back to Irontown unless—

The Return of the Trimmed.

A KNOCK on the door of Room 346 brought the bogus Hickory Short, otherwise known in crook gambling circles as Sleepy Sam, to his feet.

"Well, well," he said, as he recognized his caller, "if it isn't Nick."

"It ain't his sister," the little Irontown barber replied with an affability that masked the volcanic rage in his soul. "By the way, Hickory, it was nice of you to send me down that fizz water."

"Not at all," drawled Sleepy Sam. "The pleasure was all mine. But is this a social visit, or did you locate some fresh money, Nick?"

Nick pulled out a thick wad, held by an elastic band. The top note was genuine currency, and, before a close examination could detect that those beneath were mere blank slips of paper cut to the same shape, he returned the package to his wallet.

"I told you my brother works in the mint," said Nick, and, fairly into the room now, he greeted Schultz, Tompkins, Barnes and River, who were sitting at the card table.

"Sit in, Nick," called Barnes.

"Sure," Nick answered, taking a chair. "Gimme some chips. I'll take three thousand dollars' worth."

A stack of discs was pushed across the table, and Nick contrived to take them without immediately offering cash in return. There was nothing unusual in this so long as the other gamblers continued to believe he carried a bank-roll.

Cards were dealt. If the procedure of the previous evening was followed, Nick knew that he would be allowed to win a fairly comfortable amount on the first few hands, merely to encourage him.

He was not disappointed. Hundred-dollar chips and thousand-dollar chips were pushed into the pool as the players backed their cards, and, with the stack in the middle of the table representing five thousand "bucks," the betting was brought to a close.

"Pair of kings," said Schultz, showing his hand. "That beats you and Barnes, Tompkins"—as these two laid out their cards.

"Beats me, too," put in River.

"But not me," said Sleepy Sam. "Mine are aces, and a queen."

Nick leaned forward and revealed his hand.

"I think I top you, Hickory," he observed. "Aces, and a king."

"You win, Nick," Sleepy Sam agreed. "Looks like your lucky day."

But as he said the words he exchanged a sardonic smile with his confederates.

Nick raked in the chips, kept two thousand to himself and then pushed the rest across the table.

"Here's my three thousand back," he explained. "I'll play with the two-grand I won."

"Ah, you keep those three thousand as well, Nick," Sleepy Sam told him.

"Keep 'em—pay for 'em. You may need 'em later."

"That's all right," Nick persisted. "If I need more than the two thousand I've won, I'll buy some. But why buy now?"

A glitter began to assert itself in the heavy-lidded eyes of Sleepy Sam.

"Well, that ain't the idea, Nick," he argued. "I mean, a guy can come in here and sit in cold, without any dough. Oh, I know you've got dough, but it just ain't done—that's all. We like to see the colour of the money. You buy your chips and then cash in on your winnings when you're through playin'."

"Oh, what's the difference, Hickory?" put in Schultz. "We're holdin' up the game."

"This is my room and my game," Sleepy Sam rapped out, his voice rising a key. "An' the game is gonna be played according to rules."

Nick stood up, feigning indignation. "All right," he jerked. "Pay me off. I blew another game to come up here to-night, and I reckon I'll go back to it."

"We ain't runnin' any credit system," Sleepy Sam barked. "You ain't in Irontown now. Let's see your dough."

"You saw my dough yesterday—ten grand of it!" snapped Nick. "Pay me off!"

"Yesterday was another day," Barnes cut in. "What's the idea, Venizelos? Tryin' to pull a fast one on us? Say, who do you think you're playin' with—a lotta chumps? Come on, show us your dough!"

Nick bared his teeth.

"I don't show nothin'," he blazed. "You cheap bunch of chiselers. I know who you are! Hickory Short, huh? Didn't take you long to get out of that gaol in Florida, did it—Sleepy Sam?"

"Supposin' I ain't Hickory Short," sneered the leader of the gang. "Supposin' I am Sleepy Sam."

"Yeah, an' supposin' these guys ain't Schultz, Tompkins, River an' Barnes either," Nick flung at him. "Ah, you guys ain't gamblers—you're burglars. How'd you like somebody to show your racket to the police, huh?" he added fiercely. "Come on—do I get my dough or not?"

"You get nothin'," snarled Sleepy Sam. "You small-time squaler—you tinhorn from the sticks. You get nothin' from us."

"Well, I'll show you!" Nick shouted, and, reckless of the odds against him, he threw himself at the leader of the card-sharp ring.

The following morning, a large plaster over one eye and a mournful countenance betrayed the fact that the odds had been too heavy for Nick Venizelos, and that he had received rather more than nothing—in short, a good deal of punishment, but not a cent in cash.

The little gambler laid her on a couch, Jack watching him the while.

He was not the man to carry out his threat of informing the police, who would have shown scant sympathy for him anyway, and would probably have found that Room 346 was no longer tenanted by Sleepy Sam. His chief concern was to locate, without delay, the girl Marie, and from the hotel management he was able to learn her address.

He called there before noon, and rung the door-bell of her flat. She answered the summons in person, and looked at him coldly as he addressed her.

"You must have the wrong apartment," she said.

"Why, you know me," he stammered. "You remember, I gave you that hundred bucks to keep for me?"

"I never saw you before," she lied with emphasis; and at that moment Nick saw a man standing in the hallway behind her—a man whose grinning face he recognised as Sleepy Sam's.

"Say, what's this?" the little barber ground out.

"It's the big city, Hiram," Marie sneered. "Scram!"

She slammed the door in his face. For a moment he did not move, but stood there like a man paralysed. Then suddenly he gave vent to his fury in a shower of harmless blows.

"Open this door!" he screamed. "I thought so! You were band-in-glove with those burglars! Stole the money that belonged to my friends! Sent up packs of marked cards from that hotel service-counter! I've figured out the whole dirty game, and now I know I've figured right. Open the door, you dirty little cheat!"

A mocking laugh reached his ears—a girl's laugh and a man's laugh intermingling beyond the door. He drew back, quivering with fury.

"All right," he shouted; "all right. If that's the way you play the game in this town, I'll play it the same way. Only I'll play it in spades, and that means you'll pay double. You little thief, I'll have you on your knees beggin' for a cup o' coffee before I'm through. And as for that guy you're workin' for, I'll run him right into the mud!"

Backing!

TIME had passed, and Nick had returned to his profession as a barber. He had not returned to Irontown, however, but had secured a post as assistant in one of New York's super hairdressing saloons, where he speedily became known for that characteristic luck which had made him famous among former cronies and customers.

His experience with Sleepy Sam and his gang had left him a sadder and a wiser man, but a man with a purpose, too. He knew that it had not been his luck which had impoverished him, but the swindling tactics of the card-sharping ring, and he intended one day to square accounts.

Among the many patrons who made a point of having Nick attend to them on their visits to the hairdressing saloon was a certain Mr. Amenoppopulos. Like Nick, he was of Greek origin, seemed to be fairly well-to-do, and had a decided leaning towards a little flutter on the cards or the horses.

One day, while Nick was shaving Amenoppopulos, he chanced to look through the doorway of the saloon and see a familiar figure signalling to him from the sidewalk. It was the figure of his friend and former employee, Jack, who had left Irontown for New York shortly after receiving the news that Nick had been "cleaned out."

"Oh, excuse me just a minute, Mr. Amenoppopulos," Nick apologised, and, September 26th, 1931.

leaving the elderly and portly Greek, he hurried outside.

"Well, have you got a job yet, boy?" he demanded.

Jack shook his fair head, and his clean-cut face took on a rueful expression.

"Nope," he answered. "I just missed one this morning. That makes the eighth in succession. Aw, I know you didn't want me to come here on the off-chance like I did. But I couldn't stand Irontown after you left, Nick."

Nick laid a hand on his shoulder.

"You'll find a job yet," he said. "Have you had any lunch?"

"Not to-day," Jack confessed.

"Then here's two dollars," said Nick.

"Put it on Flying Feet in the third race at Churchill Downs. And here's two hits for your lunch. Now go and put on the feed-bag."

"Thanks, Nick," Jack murmured, and his benefactor returned to Mr. Amenoppopulos.

"Sorry I had to leave you, sir," he said, "but I had to speak to an old friend."

"That's all right, Nick," Amenoppopulos told him. "By the way, what do you like in that fifth race at Louisville?"

Nick smiled.

"I've got a little bet on No Regrets," he informed the older man.

"Huh, how have you been doing lately, Nick?"

"Oh, swell," was the answer. "You see, the boys in the saloon here have been staking me in a little card-party I attend, and I've won quite a lot of dough for them—and a little bit for myself."

"I see," said Amenoppopulos through a lather of soap. "They've been making a pool for you, huh?"

"Yeah, that's it," Nick rejoined. "but it's small-time money. Oh, if I had some really important dough," he added, with a gleam in his eye, "I could get into a big game where the sugar is sweet."

The elderly Greek's interest was aroused.

"Oh," he said, "And how much would it take to get into that big game?"

"A lotta money. Mr. Amenoppopulos," Nick replied. "But with what I know now about the racket, I could trim 'em plenty."

Ten days later Mr. Amenoppopulos introduced Nick to a Greek merchant with whom he was acquainted, and then broached the subject of backing the little barber.

"I tell you he is the luckiest man in the world," Amenoppopulos declared. "I've been staking him in a small way myself, and he's won for me every time. Now, if we could put him in this big game, I'm sure he could make a lot of money."

"Well, I tell you, Alex," the merchant observed, "what's good enough for you is good enough for me to take a chance on. I am not gambling man, but you can count on me for 'ree thousand."

Thus, through the influence of Amenoppopulos, Nick again equipped himself from various sources to the tune of fifty thousand dollars, and, ready for the fray, he made preparations for another meeting with Sleepy Sam.

Those preparations culminated in a visit to a hotel to which Sleepy Sam and his confederates had shifted soon after Nick's previous encounter with them. Here Nick bought up the entire stock of card-packs available at the service-desk in the foyer, only to hand in a dozen of them the same evening.

"I'd like to return these," he said to the salesman behind the counter. "I took more than I needed. I'll have cash for them, but keep a dollar to buy yourself a cigar."

"Thank you, sir," the salesman answered, and Nick strolled across the foyer.

On his way to the elevator he passed Jack and another man, notorious for some skill with a gun. He exchanged a glance with them and then passed into the lift which carried him swiftly to the tenth floor.

By judicious inquiry he had found out Sleepy Sam's exact address, and, locating the gambler's room, he knocked on the door. It was opened an inch or two, and the voice of Sleepy Sam asked to know who was there.

"It's only me, Sam. Nick the Barber."

The door was pulled wide, and Nick stepped across the threshold to find himself in the presence of that same bunch of rogues who had swindled him out of his first stake.

"Why, hallo, Nick," Sleepy Sam greeted him, with a peculiar twist of the lip. "How are you? I haven't seen you in six months."

"It's taken me that long to catch up with you," Nick retorted crisply. "Now listen, you lotta mugs. It's no use chicken-scratelin' around. You know what happened to me once, and I've got something to say to you. Especially to you, Sam."

"No hard feelin's, I hope," drawled Sam.

"No, just lookin' for evens," was the answer. "You haven't any objections, Sam, have you? You can see me dough this time!" And he displayed the fifty thousand dollars he was carrying on his person.

"Oh, you're okay with me, Nick," said Sleepy Sam, his eyes fastening greedily on the roll. "I'll play."

"Yeah," Nick rejoined, "and we'll play freeze-out for fifty thousand—pay after each hand."

"Phew!" breathed Schultz. "That's a lot of dough."

The little barber looked at him.

"Not for Nick Venizelos," he said. "That brother of mine owns the mint now. Hey, Sun-Tan," he added to a coloured waiter, "go downstairs and get half a dozen new decks of cards. Here's some money, and keep the change."

"You're still superstitious, huh?" mused Sleepy Sam.

"No," Nick answered, "Just careful. Come on, let's get set. Just you and me, Sam, and we'll deal our own. The rest of you fellows stand aside."

"Don't mind if I take a piece of Sam's play, do you?" asked Barnes, and Nick shook his head.

"I don't care what you do," he rejoined. "If you want to cut in on his losses you can, but only him and me are sittin' down at the table. And by the way, Sam, let's see your dough."

"I think I can match you all right," Sleepy Sam observed, and laid a thick sheaf of bills on the baize.

The darkie waiter returned with the cards—purchased, of course, from the service-desk in the foyer. A pack was split and the game opened.

An hour later Nick was sitting with a pile of notes before him, and Sleepy Sam with a thin wad of five; and the twister was marvelling, in no very pleasant mood, at the run of luck that had favoured his antagonist.

Meanwhile the rest of the gang stood in a group and watched a pool that was assuming a formidable aspect as the two players laid bet after bet on a couple of hands that had just been dealt.

"How much money have you got left?" Nick asked all at once.

"I've got five 'hundreds,'" Sleepy Sam replied.

"Well, you'd better put 'em in the centre," Nick told him, "because that's just what I'm going to raise you."

Sleepy Sam shrugged.

"I've got to call you," he muttered, and, as the notes fluttered into the pool, he displayed the cards he held.

Nick did the same, an unholy grin on his face, and Sleepy Sam leaned back in his chair.

"You win," he said slowly, "and I'm cleaned."

Nick gathered the notes, one hundred thousand dollars' worth of them, and began to stuff them into his hip-pocket.

"Sorry, Sleepy," he declared. "Tough luck. Can't say that you got the breaks. Gee, I wish those tailors would make these pockets a little bigger. Er—Sun-Tan, my hat, my cane and my gloves. I heard that in a play once. And here, Sun-Tan, take this ten-dollar bill and go with it as far as it'll take you."

"Thank you, bawss," said the nigger.

Nick moved towards the door, but, with his fingers on the handle of it, paused and looked over his shoulder.

"So the Barber gave you a trimming, huh?" he laughed. "Well, I'll be seein' yuh—"

"Just a minute!"

"Wait a minute, Nick!"

The voices of Barnes and Schultz spoke as one. Schultz reached for his hip. Barnes for the inside of his waist-coat. But before they could draw their guns Nick whipped open the door, and across the threshold stepped Jack and the hired gunman, each levelling an automatic in his right hand.

Nick chuckled light-heartedly.

"How do you like it, boys?" he said to the gamblers. "What you singin' the blues about, anyway? I told you I was gonna get even, and I once told Sleepy Sam I was goin' to play your way."

The sharpers stood by, raging inwardly but impotently. The disaster to the finances of Sleepy Sam, who was banker for them all, had broken up their ring more effectively than a police-raid could have done.

"Of course," Nick went on. "you smart gamblers have heard of marked cards—shaved cards, as we call them in the profession. Well, Nick the Barber can shave 'em a little closer than you can. Just take a good look at those decks I sent out for and you'll see what I mean."

The eyes of Sleepy Sam and his confederates darted to the table. As they snatched at the cards lying there they again heard the voice of Nick.

"Well, good-bye, hoys. And—thanks for the buggy ride."

The door closed behind him and his bodyguards, blocking out the taunting laughter that was on his lips.

Stepping High.

NICK the Barber reclined in the sitting-room of the sumptuous hotel suite that he had rented. Beside him was a blonde and attractive manicurist, and as the girl was paring his nails Nick took a cigar from the corner of his mouth and spoke to her.

"Is the smoke bothering you?" he asked solicitously.

"Oh, no," the manicurist assured him. "I like the smell of a good cigar."

"That so?" Nick murmured. "You know, a fellow in Havana makes these up for me."

"You don't say," the girl rejoined, and then, after a pause: "I suppose you're very happy this morning, Mr. Venizelos? I've just been reading in the papers about you winning a lot of money from that gambler—er—Sleepy Sam, I think his name was."

"Those guys in the Press get hold of everything," Nick observed. "But that was nothing. I'm just starting. Before long you'll be reading a whole lot about me."

"My, it must be wonderful to win a lot of money like that!" the girl sighed.

Nick shrugged.

"Oh, money don't mean anything to me," he told her, and then, leaning forward: "Say," he went on, "you're a pretty smart girl. Maybe you can give me a little advice. Now, if you were a man, and a certain girl had made a sap out of you—huh—once upon a time—how would you get even with her? I don't mean hurt her, or anything like that—but just make her change her mind about me being a sap."

"Oh, you're only kidding, Mr. Venizelos. How could anyone make a sap out of you?"

"I'm not kidding," Nick said emphatically. "And I'd just like to get a little satisfaction out of that lady. Now how would you go about it?"

The blonde manicurist pondered a moment.

"Well, if I were a man," she told him at length, "I'd send her some flowers. Then I'd follow up with a bracelet—you know, one with diamonds in it."

"Diamonds!" Nick echoed. "You're not this girl's manager, are you?"

The girl shook her head laughingly, and, despite the bewilderment which her suggestion first aroused in him, Nick began to see the subtlety of it.

It was a suggestion that he put into practice, and three months later Marie had been coaxed from Sleepy Sam by costly gifts, and was irrefragably at the service of Nick the Barber.

And, once on the list of his growing army of hirelings, she ceased to receive expensive presents, and received only curt orders.

One day, six months after he had triumphed Sleepy Sam, Nick stepped aboard the New York to Louisville train and passed along the corridor to a private saloon, Jack, Marie and a nigger porter on his heels.

Nick himself was carrying the cage containing his precious canary bird, without which he never travelled any long distance. But as he entered the saloon he turned to Marie.

"Here, take care of Blondie," he said, in a tone that was like a knife-cut.

The girl obeyed him with a flush of humiliation, and Nick turned to the porter. He took out a ten-dollar bill, tore it in halves and handed one fragment to the darkie.

"You'll get the other half at the end of the line," he explained, "if you're good."

The darkie grinned.

"Yes, sir," he said. "Ah won't be good. Ah'll be perfect."

"Come here," Nick beckoned him nearer, and rubbed his palm over the nigger's woolly crop of hair. "Gimme luck. And say, what room is Hickory Short in?"

"Mistah Sho't, suh? Oh, he's in 3 A, suh."

Nick's eyes glistened. At last, he reflected, he was going to meet the prince of gamblers face to face.

"Marie," he snapped, rousing himself all at once, "open the suitcase and hang up my check suit." Then, turning to Jack: "Well, boy, I wish the Jack clutched him by the shoulder. "Lay off, Nick," he said earnestly. "She's framing evidence on you."

crowd back in the old barber shop could see us now," he continued. "Louisville-bound with a bank roll big enough to choke a cow." He laughed complacently. "I guess after to-night I'll be able to send the boys back home a few thou."

"You've already paid 'em double," Jack protested.

Nick shrugged. "What of it?" he argued. "I got plenty. Besides, ain't they still my pals? Listen, Jack, I'm goin' in there to trim the great Hickory and make him look like a hick. If I lose I'll be back in the old barber shop matching pennies with Snake Eyes. But how can I lose?" And again he laughed.

It was not till some time later that the whole story leaked out concerning Nick the Barber's clean-up on the Louisville Express, and the instantaneous departure of the famous Hickory Short from the realms of big-time gambling.

By the time that story was on everybody's lips Nick was adding countless others to it—stories that intrigued and mystified—stories that placed him in the limelight even more effectively than his connection with a certain magnificent gaming saloon which was secretly opened off Fifth Avenue.

One night about a month after Hickory Short's fade-out Nick stepped out of a fifteen-thousand dollar limousine and crossed the sidewalk to the portals of his new venture, which to all appearances was merely a private house of palatial design.

A couple of uniformed doormen saluted him, and Nick handed each of them a cigar.

"Try these," he said. "A fellow in Havana makes 'em up for me."

Nick passed on, handed his hat, coat and scarf to a cloak-room attendant, and, looking more dapper than ever in an immaculate evening suit, walked into a big room crowded with fashionable women and well-dressed men.

Nick had to be careful, and an introduction to the salon could only be effected by recommendation. It was astonishing how quickly smart society flocked to the tables of Nick Venizelos, however, bringing rolls of greenbacks that found their way via the roulette croupiers to the little Irontown barber's coffers.

The room into which Nick now strolled was packed, but amid the throng he suddenly perceived Marie, whom he found useful as a "hostess." Her job was to see that any new "guests" were made to feel at home, and in the course of her duties she was permitted to take a little flutter on the wheel herself if she chose to risk the scanty salary that Nick paid her.

Nick caught sight of her as she was drawing back from one of the tables, and next moment she was hurrying towards him excitedly, a bundle of notes clutched in her hand.

"Oh, Nick, Nick," she gasped joyously, "look at what I've won! My luck's changed, and I just can't seem to lose! I've made a hundred and ten dollars."

"Here, let me see." Nick took the money out of her hand and began to count it. "Twenty, forty, sixty, eighty, ninety—a hundred. Great! Just what you owe me." And he handed her back the odd ten dollars.

Mario stared at him blankly.

"What I owe you?"

"You never did have a good memory, sister," Nick told her with a twisted smile, and then he moved away from her and approached another fair-haired girl on whom he had lately been showering attentions.

"How you doin' now, Lola?" he asked.

"Great," the girl answered, leaning forward over one of the gaming tables. "I'm playing the red."

"Well, here's a hundred," said Nick, giving her Marie's winnings. "Put that on the red, too."

He glanced at Marie over his shoulder as he spoke, and saw that she was watching the money change hands. Her face was scarlet.

The Stool Pigeon.

NICK the Barber had become a figure as prominent in the public eye as the president, though a figure far less meritorious. His gaming-palaces, now legion, were the objects of seathing attacks by reformers who demanded that the city be purged of such dens of ill fame.

The district attorney stirred himself. He issued orders that were carried out to the letter by the police. The house off Fifth Avenue was raided. Others were discovered, and shared a similar fate. But Nick the Barber maintained his liberty, his joviality and the even tenor of his way to fabulous wealth.

The district attorney consulted his chief deputy.

"Well, what are we going to do about it?" he demanded.

"Every time we raid Nick," the deputy explained, "he proves he doesn't own the place. None of 'em are leased in his name. He's got a phoney front for every one of his joints, and you can't pin anything on him."

The district attorney pursed his lips. "That isn't a suggestion," he said. "That's an alibi."

"We close him one night," the deputy went on gloomily, "and he opens up the next—in another spot."

"Another alibi," observed the D. A. in a curt tone. "Now, look here, I demand a show-down. With the election coming up and the reformers howling for blood, I'm not going to let this tin-horn gambler's activities throw me out of office."

There was a knock on the door, and a detective put in an appearance.

"We found Sleepy Sam, chief," he told the district attorney. "He got in from 'Frisco last week."

"Good," said the D. A. "I'd like to see him alone."

Sleepy Sam was brought in from the outer office. He looked sullen, and gave the impression that he intended to be reticent whatever the purpose for which he had been brought to headquarters.

"What's up, Black?" he demanded. District Attorney Black smiled affably.

"Just want to get some gambling information from you, Sam," he explained.

"Yeah? Well, three of a kind still beat two pairs," was the sneering rejoinder. "Ah, lay off me, D. A. I've got no dope for you. I've been outta the gambling racket for months. I got tired of it."

"Yes, after Nick the Barber pushed you over and rubbed it in," the district attorney retorted. "I understand he took your girl, too."

Sam scowled.

"If you know so much, why did you send for me?" he asked.

"Now, listen, Sam," the district attorney appealed. "We're both holding the same bag. This little grease-ball, Nick Venizelos, is giving us both the run-around. Why don't you come clean and tell me how to bring him down? He must have some weakness."

"If I knew how to bring him down," Sam rapped out viciously, "I'd do it myself. Nick the Barber, eh? A small-time hick at heart, but just dumb enough to be smart." He slid his eyes to the D. A.'s face all at once, and: "You know his weakness, don't you?" he finished.

"What?"

Sam laughed and turned towards the door.

"He's nuts for blondes," he drawled. "Yeah. Send your wife around. He'll fall for any old hag—"

The district attorney leapt to his feet. "Why, you rotten—" But Sam had slipped hastily from the office.

Meanwhile, not exactly oblivious of the stir he was causing at police headquarters, Nick Venizelos was holding audience with a group of reporters.

He did not receive them in his latest gaming-palace, the ownership of which he so flatly and humorously denied. He received them in a hairdressing saloon that he had opened as a mild blind to his other activities, and here, while Mitros Bikelas shaved him, he answered the questions of the Press.

"We'd like to know what you've got to say to this latest blast from the district attorney," one of the reporters announced.

Looking round at the newspaper men from his barber's chair, Nick affected an expression of innocence.

"Oh," he murmured. "Has he been talking about me?"

Another reporter showed him an early edition which quoted a blistering speech that had been directed against Nick by the irate and harassed D. A.

Nick read it and then spread out his hands in a gesture of injured protest.

"Why, he's got me all wrong, boys," he declared. "I'm not a gambler, I'm a barber. This is my shop. This is the only business I got. Nick the Barber—ain't that what everybody calls me?"

The reporters smirked facetiously, and Nick grinned, too, but continued in the same style, saying nothing that would incriminate him.

"Now what's he want to go ahead and make a lotta trouble for?" he asked.

"I'm just a nice little fella tryin' to get along. Now what's he want to go ahead and blow a lot of steam off for?"

"Then you're going to keep open, as usual?" one of the newspapermen inquired, slyly referring to the latest house where Nick had instituted his casino.

"There's no law against running a barber shop, is there?" Nick retorted craftily. "Say, have some cigars, you boys. A fella in Havana makes 'em up for me."

The reporters helped themselves, and then left in high spirits.

"So long, Nick," one of them called over his shoulder. "See you in the gaol-house."

"Sure," Nick answered, waving. "I'll come and visit you in the can any time, brother."

Bikelas leaned over the chair.

"Boss," he said, when the Presmen had gone, "you sure one smart fella. You sure tell 'em big mouthful. But eef that doeristrict attorney get too fresh, Nick the Barber geev him eloso shave, huh?" And he made a pass with the razor in his hand.

Five minutes later Nick left the shop and made his way to his new gaming-palace. Passing through the salon, he went up to a second-floor room which he had converted into an office, and he was looking over some accounts here when Jack entered, spick and span in a tuxedo suit.

By signs Jack indicated that a lady of arresting beauty desired an interview with Nick, who immediately gave instructions that she was to be shown in.

She proved to be all that Jack had indicated, and—she was a blonde.

"Oh, how do you do?" she said, coming forward with an almost regal carriage of her lissom figure. "Are you Mr. Venizelos?" And then, as Nick inclined his head "Oh, I—I wonder, Mr. Venizelos, if I—if you could—"

She stammered prettily, and the little barber indicated a chair.

"Sit down," he invited, "and call me Nick."

The blonde took the chair smilingly, and then leaned forward, her face becoming troubled.

"I'm in an awful plight," she explained. "I lost all my money at the roulette table, and I wondered if you could lend me some to get home with."

Nick fingered his chin.

"Well, I don't believe in lending," he stated, "but I'll give you ten."

"Ten?" the woman repeated. "Oh, I—I need five hundred."

"Where do you live, lady?" Nick inquired politely. "China?"

She laughed, then took a diamond bracelet from her wrist.

"I could leave this for security," she offered. "If you know jewellery, you'll believe me when I tell you that's worth a thousand."

"I know jewellery," Nick said, "and I know women, too. You see, it's my business to make a study of human nature, and I can see you're on the level. How about a little drink?"

She accepted the invitation, and Nick filled two glasses.

"Here's to the most charming man I've ever met," the blonde toasted. "You're certainly a friend in need."

"Big-hearted Nick, they call me," was the rejoinder. "Never said 'no' to a woman in my life. Say, I'll take you to the cashier's and get that money." And he slipped an arm around her waist familiarly.

The blonde did not seem to object, and he escorted her to the door and opened it.

"Tell me," he said, "when am I going to see you again?"

"When would you like to?"

"To-morrow?" Nick suggested.

"For lunch? At the Savoy? You could give me your address and I'd send my car for you."

"Oh, no, that's all right," she assured him. "I'll meet you there, at one o'clock. Good-bye—Nick."

"Good-bye," he said in his most charming tone—"And tell the district attorney I'll see him on Tuesday," he added with sudden violence.

As he spoke he pushed the woman through the door and then propelled her forward with a lusty thrust of his boot. Down she went on her hands and knees with a startled squeal, and almost before she had fallen Nick had spun around and reached for a phone.

"Hallo, hallo," he shouted into the mouth-piece, snatching up the receiver. "Say, operator—get me the district attorney at his home right away—Hallo! Is that you, Black? Well, this is Nick the Barber. I just kicked your stool-pigeon right out of office, and what's more—if you don't quit messing around in my affairs I'm goin' to kick you right out of town!"

He hung up savagely, and turned to find that Jack had come into the room.

"Stool-pigeon?" Jack echoed. "How did you know it, Nick?"

"Boy, I can tell 'em," was the complacent answer. "She had district attorney written right across her kisser."

"Congratulations," said Jack.

"You've got wise to yourself at last, so far as blondes are concerned."

Nick had by now cooled down considerably.

"Say," he declared, thinking of Marie, "no woman will ever make a sap out of me again. Nick is plenty smart these days. Yes, sir," Then he began to laugh. "Oh, boy, I'll never forget the expression on that dame's face when I gave her the boot, though."

The Girl from the River.

DRIVING home to the gaming-palace after a little recreation in the way of a late party one night, Nick and Jack were held up on Brooklyn Bridge by two or three men who waved to the little Greek's chauffeur excitedly.

"What's the matter?" Nick demanded, as the car drew to a standstill.

"We just dragged a girl out of the river," one of the men on the bridge answered. "Will you take her to town? She's alive, but unconscious."

Nick laid hold of a rug.

"Wrap this around her and bring her here," he commanded. "Bill,"—to his chauffeur—"give them a hand. We'll take her to the hospital."

Jack clutched Nick's arm.

"Wait a minute," he hissed. "What do you know about this dame? How do you know she ain't another plant from the district attorney's office?"

"Yeah?" Nick scoffed. "I suppose they brought her here and threw her into the water, huh?"

"Don't forget, you can still pour water," Jack retorted, but, heedless of his friend's arguments, Nick helped to lift the girl into the car and then ordered his chauffeur to drive on.

A hundred yards from the bridge the girl stirred and opened her eyes wearily. In the light of a lamp that the car was passing, Nick saw that she was lovelier than any girl he had ever known, and he found himself marvelling at the transparency of her complexion, and the silken texture of her pale-gold hair.

"You dirty double-crosser, you!" Nick raged.

"Where am I?" she whispered.
 "You're all right," Nick assured her.
 "We're taking you to hospital."
 She started up at that.
 "Oh, don't take me there, don't take me there!" she panted. "Let me out here. I'll go home. I can get a bus."
 "You're wet—you'll get pneumonia."

"Let her go if she wants to," Jack broke in. "We might get in a jam, Nick. You don't know what her racket might be."

Nick agreed reluctantly, and, as the car was drawn up, he let the girl climb out. But she had only gone a few paces when she reeled dizzily, so that Nick was just in time to leap from the limousine and catch her as she fell.

"Ah, the act's on again," Jack sneered contemptuously.

"It looks to me as if the kid was starved," Nick jerked. "I suppose you think that's actin' too. Come on, help me put her in the car, and we'll take her home—"

So the girl from the river was carried to Nick's magnificent casino-residence. The little gambler laid her on a couch, Jack watching him the while. Then the two men left a maid in charge of her.

In an adjoining room Jack appealed to the little barber's judgment for the last time.

"Just what do you aim to do about this dame?" he demanded. "Are you runnin' a sanatorium, or something?"

"Say, are you still harping on that girl?" Nick rejoined impatiently. "Why don't you snap out of it? Your face looks so long I'd charge you two prices for a shave—"

Before he could proceed further a door opened, and the girl with the golden hair came through from the other room, where she had been placed in the care of the maid.

"What!" exclaimed Nick. "You up?"

"I'm leaving," the girl answered. "I just wanted to thank you for being so kind."

"But you can't walk out like this," Nick protested. "I had a doctor in to see you a few minutes ago, and he said you might get pneumonia."

Jack put in a word.
 "I have a few questions to ask you, young lady," he began grimly, but before he could learn any more than her name, which was Irene Graham, Nick interrupted him.

"Say, what do you think you are—a policeman?" he demanded. "You get out and leave me to talk to her."

Jack departed sourly, and as the door closed behind him the girl Irene stole a glance at Nick.

"Your friend doesn't seem to like me," she murmured.

"Aw, don't mind him," Nick told her. "He's a swell guy, really. Say, listen, were you—were you working?"

She bit her lip.

"I lost my job, and then I got sick," she answered. "I had a few dollars, but everything seemed to go wrong—and then, last night— Oh, I was a coward!"

"Lots of people would be cowards if they went through what you've had to go through," Nick said gently.

"But I'm straightened out now," she declared, brightening a little. "I feel like a new person, and—and I must go. I can't stay here."

"You'll need some money, anyway," Nick said, and would not hear of her refusing the wad of notes that he offered.

"But I'll probably never be able to pay it back," she told him, whereupon he laughed.

"That's all right," he announced. "I own the mint. My brother gave it to me. Well, good-bye, sister, if you're bent on going. Keep off the bridges."

He stopped, for all at once she swayed and drew her hand across her forehead dazedly. He started forward at once, concern in his manner.

"Look here," he insisted, "you're stayin' here until you're better and can get some colour in those cheeks. You're set on keepin' that date with the undertakers, aren't you? But there's nothing doing. You take orders from me, and I take 'em from the doctor. See?"

So the girl Irene remained under Nick the Barber's roof, recuperating from the effects of her ordeal, and so far as Nick was concerned, a new sentiment began to play a part in his life. He knew what it was to be in love, genuinely and wholeheartedly.

Then, one day, meeting him as he came into the lounge with some flowers for her, she asked him to sit down while she spoke to him of something that was on her mind.

"You've been so nice to me," she said, "you've done so much. And—there doesn't seem to be anything I can do for you."

"Why, you've done plenty," he told her. "Just being around is enough. You don't owe me anything." Then, as he saw that her eyes were swimming with tears: "Here, here," he cried, "what's all this about? Now, don't cry, baby—don't! What's bothering you, honey, anyway?"

"I—I haven't been on the level with you, Nick," she sobbed.

"You're not from the District Attorney's office?" he jerked.

"No, but I haven't told you the whole truth about myself."

Nick laughed.

"Oh, that's all right!" he answered. "I haven't told you the whole truth about myself, either. Say, apart from bein' Nick Venizelos, the gambler, I used to play a saxophone in the Iron-town band."

"I'm serious, Nick," she said distractedly. "I'm wanted by the police—for blackmail! Oh, it wasn't really blackmail—I didn't mean to blackmail the man in the case at all. But I think you should know that I might get you into some trouble with the police, for I seem to be a jinx wherever I go."

"Well, you haven't been a jinx to me," Nick grinned. "And as for the cops, they've got nothing on me. I'm just a barber-shop proprietor so far as they're concerned."

She looked at him meekly.

"And you don't want me to get out of here now?" she asked.

"What for?" he rejoined. "I wouldn't care what you'd done. I'm not exactly a Sunday School teacher myself."

The Snare.

THE district attorney drummed his fingers on the edge of his desk.

"I hate to do this," he said.

"but it's the only way we can nail him."

"Of course," the deputy pointed out,

"it's really compounding a felony."

The D.A. shrugged.

"Well, what of it?" he reported.

"The end justifies the means, and we've got to drive Nick Venizelos out of town. The disgrace is we have to resort to such round-about methods to get him. But if we can put him in gaol for only a few months, we can break up his gambling ring. Then the public and the Press will lay off me."

There was a knock on the door, and a woman operator appeared.

"The girl's here," she announced.

"I picked her up at the Savoy."

"Send her in," ordered the D.A., and, turning, the woman operator spoke to someone behind her.

"Miss Graham," she said. "Come in."

Pale and tremulous, Irene crossed the threshold hesitantly. The district attorney, politeness personified, drew up a chair for her and then indicated to the woman operator and his chief deputy that he desired to be alone with the girl.

"Miss Graham," he said, as the door closed behind his departing subordinates, "I have a warrant charging you with blackmail, together with enough evidence to convict you."

"I—I didn't mean to blackmail him!" Irene cried, with a pitiful break in her voice.

"That's your story," observed the district attorney, "but what you did was extortion in the eyes of the law, and you can be sent to the penitentiary. Now there's a way you can avoid going there, Miss Graham. A very simple way."

She looked at him fearfully.

"What do you want me to do?" she asked him in a querulous tone.

"Just a little favour," he said.

"While we were checking up on Nick the Barber, we found that you were staying at his place. The sentence for blackmail, Miss Graham, is from two to ten years in the penitentiary, but you can avoid it if you will just do what I ask you."

"Well, what is it?" she faltered.

"Not much," the D.A. rejoined. "I want you to get some of those gold keys that Nick's customers use as an 'open, Sesame' to his gambling house—"

"I won't!" she cried out. "I won't do it! You can send me up for trial!"

"Now, don't be foolish," the district attorney said. "It's a case of you or him, and he'll never know you did it."

"I—won't!" she answered again and again, yet somehow with more desperation than finally. "I won't! I won't!"

"Don't get excited," the D.A. soothed. "All we want to do is to give Nick a good scare. He'll be out in a month. That wouldn't hurt him at all, while if you went to the penitentiary for a long sentence—"

She began to cry, and the sound of her sobbing made the D.A. set his teeth. He could not say that he had at any moment looked forward to this task with pleasurable anticipation, and it was proving as unenviable as he had imagined it would be.

"He's the only person that's ever been kind to me," the girl moaned.

"He's a public menace," the district attorney rapped out. "He's trying to corrupt public officials. He's put his filthy hands on policemen, State's attorneys—even made overtures to our judges with the intention of bribing them."

"I don't care," Irene sobbed. "I can't help it. Let me alone. Please don't make me do it!" The tears streamed down her cheeks. "Oh, please—please don't make me do it!"

That night, in the lounge of his apartment above the gaming salon, Nick Venizelos sat on the edge of a chair and fondled Irene's golden hair.

"You look swell, baby," he declared, looking at the fashionable evening gown and fur-trimmed coat she was wear-

(Continued on page 26.)

A racketeer is "taken for a ride" by a rival and killed. When his brother found the body he swore revenge. A brave girl becomes his ally in his dangerous task.

Starring
DOROTHY REVIER,
TOM SANTSCHI
 and
CHARLES MORTON.

The Ambush—and Afterwards.

THE Bowery, New York City, were live some of the most desperate criminals in the world—men who never hesitate to use the gun when in tight corners or up against some rival gang. Racketeers and bootleggers for the most part, making big money "running" illicit liquor in and around the city.

A dangerous spot and generally seething with sinister activity, but at this time, with the hands of the clocks approaching one in the morning, all seemed quiet and still. Yet at one end of a narrow and squalid street there lurked three shadowy forms, hat brims pulled down over foreheads, coat-collars turned up about necks, hands thrust deep into overcoat pockets.

Still as statues they were, till suddenly the roar of a high-powered engine shattered the silence, and almost instantly a tarpaulin-covered lorry came sweeping out of a garage some hundred yards down the road. Straight towards the three waiting men the heavy vehicle came, rapidly gaining speed.

"Now!" came the hoarse whisper from a thick-set fellow who was obviously leader of the trio.

On the instant, guns flashed from overcoat pockets and almost instantaneously three shots crashed out, the bullets narrowly missing the driver and the man who sat next to him on the oncoming lorry. Cursing violently they quickly snatched out their own revolvers, but before either could fire their assailants again loosed their guns at them.

There came a sobbing gasp from the man beside the lorry driver as a bullet took him clean in the chest and, slumping sideways, he pitched from the vehicle to the road. Clutching frantically at the steering-wheel with one hand, the driver fired back at those three shadowy figures now but a few yards distant. Whether he hit them or not he did not care over much—but he did fervently hope to get the lorry past the ambush.

But there was no escape for him. Again there came three shattering reports, and with never so much as a sound the driver crumpled in his seat, three slugs imbedded in his limp body.

Out of control now, the lorry rocketed on, swaying dangerously, threatening to crash on to the pavement at any moment. But with a terse command from their leader the killers sprang forward, and heedless of the risk they ran, they leaped on to the vehicle and quickly got it under control again.

Behind came hoarse shouts, the running of many feet, and then the loud reports of revolver shots. But the men who rushed from the garage, from whence had come the ambushed lorry, were much too late, for in a matter of seconds the heavy vehicle had disappeared round the end of the road at a wild, reckless speed.

A private apartment, luxuriously furnished as a drawing-room, in the Blue Dragon restaurant. Seated in deep armchairs, their bodies tense, four well-dressed men, but with the unprepossessing countenances of crooks, and a rather pretty, fair-haired girl—all looking inquiringly at the imposing figure of the man who had just slammed the telephone receiver savagely back upon its hooks.

"What the heck's the matter, boss?" ventured one of the seated men.

"Matter?" Piccardi, owner of the restaurant and one of the most powerful racketeers in New York, clenched his hands as he fixed his hirelings with his smouldering grey eyes. "Big Boy's the matter, curse him! Just bad word from the garage that he ambushed the lorry running out to Gondoza's, shot Jake and Mike, and made off with the cargo. The swine! But we'll get him for it—hell we will!"

His satellites were on their feet in an instant, revengeful expressions upon their coarse features, hands clasped tightly around the butts of guns that lay concealed in their pockets. Each of them was ready to set out at that moment to settle with Big Boy, the rival gangster who for so long had been a thorn in Piccardi's side. He it was who had stolen a goodly portion of their trade in the last few weeks, audaciously encroaching on their territory. And now the successful raid on their cargo of contraband liquor—that was the very last straw!

"We'll get the dirty skunk in his apartments, boss," growled Tony Havers, Piccardi's chief lieutenant, his pig-like eyes flashing ominously.

But Piccardi waved the suggestion aside with an angry motion of his hand.

"No good—his house is full of burglar alarms. If we broke in he'd be warned. The only way is to take him unawares." He bit his nails savagely, fingered the small, neatly clipped moustache that adorned his upper lip, meditating the while. Then suddenly an ugly smile crept into his face, and his eyes settled themselves on the fair-haired girl who still reclined in her chair as if uninterested in what had occurred. "Lita, my pretty, this is where you can prove how very real your affection is for me. Big Boy's going to pay, and pay dearly for having the darned nerve to cross my path, and you can help materially in getting him."

"Me?" Lita Alvaro, a cabaret star who had recently fallen on evil times and drifted into the Bowery, where she had soon become acquainted with most of the gang leaders there, got languidly to her feet and came over to Piccardi. "But, Piccardi, Big Boy's a friend of mine. I couldn't—"

"That's just it, Lita." The gangster caught at the girl's arms and squeezed them affectionately, smiling down into her pretty face. "Big Boy's a friend of yours. That makes your task easier."

"But, Piccardi—"

"Now, now, Lita, you know where your bread's buttered. Big Boy's never given you the clothes and the handsome presents I've given you, has he?" Piccardi's smile vanished suddenly, and again his face took on a vicious expression. "Just you forget him, Lita, and do what you're told. There's a lot in it for you, if you do, but if you defy me—"

He did not finish, but shrugged his shoulders expressively, causing the girl to shudder. But quickly mastering the fear that had invaded her soul, she smiled up at him and nodded.

"Very well, Piccardi," she said in a steady voice. "What is it you want me to do?"

While plans were being made in that room at the Blue Dragon to put Big Boy "on the spot," in another such well-appointed apartment, in a house on Fourteenth Street, there sat a man, fast asleep, his head resting on his arms, which were sprawled upon the table before him. A thick-set man, with huge shoulders, heavy features, and hair that was fast thinning and turning grey.

Undisturbed he slept till, in the region of seven in the morning, footsteps descended the stairs from the floor above, and there came into the drawing-room a well-built and not bad-looking youngster, with dark curly hair and clear brown eyes. At sight of the sleeping man, he whistled in amazement, then went across to him, took him by the shoulders and shook him.

"What tho Hades!" The sleeper started up in alarm, his hand going instinctively to his jacket pocket. But next second it dropped to his side as he became aware of his surroundings, recognised the boy gazing down at him so curiously. "Oh, it's you, Roy! Jove, but you gave me quite a start."

He got to his feet, stretched his cramped limbs, then went and sat down in an armchair beside the empty grate.

For a moment or two there was silence, then Roy Smith seated himself in the chair on the opposite side of the fireplace and gazed across at the thick-set man with a wistful expression in his eyes.

"Was it necessary to sleep down here all night, Howard?" he said reproachfully.

"Well, no." The big man smiled and shrugged his shoulders. "But you see, kid, I was exceptionally late home, and I didn't want to disturb you when I came in. Extra work. A darned nuisance, but it couldn't be helped."

"But it's knocking you up, old man." A worried frown settled on Roy's brow. "And it's all my fault. Howard, you're too darned good to me. My brother, but father and mother to me as well. No, no, you can't deny it. Ever since the old folk died, you've looked after me and kept me, working yourself almost to breaking point. Oh, but if only I could end all that—give you a chance to ease down. But I don't seem to have the least opportunity to—"

"That's all right, Roy," his brother broke in soothingly. "You do your best I know. No fault of yours that the paper doesn't pay you more than ten dollars a week. A measly wage, but I suppose, with its poor circulation, it can't go to more."

September 26th, 1931.

"That's because of the dud reporters we've got. They never bring in anything worth while—they haven't the guts to go out for the big stories. Why, when Miller had the chance to—" Roy suddenly sprang to his feet, a determined light flashing into his eyes. "But hang Miller! Howard, I tell you I'm not going to stick in a groove—remain a proof reader and junior sub. all my life. I'm going to do something big, force them to give me a better wage. And I'll see Mr. Jackson as soon as I get to the office this morning, and ask him to let me go out after news. Gang stuff. There's Piccardi and the fellow they call Big Boy to be exposed, and I'll—"

Howard Smith started violently and half rose from his chair. Then sank back in it again as he saw the curious look his younger brother gave him. With an effort he summoned up a smile.

"Gee, kid, you go easy," he said in a somewhat strained voice. "I admire your pluck, your determination to do something worth while, but I'd rather work till I dropped than have you run yourself into danger for the sake of a few more bucks. And let me tell you there is real danger for anyone who noses into the affairs of such crooks as Piccardi and this fellow Big Boy."

"But, Howard," protested Roy glumly, "I—I—"

"Forget it, kid." There was a note of appeal in Howard's voice now. "You stick to inside work. Sooner or later your chance will come."

He rose wearily to his feet, came over and patted his brother affectionately on the shoulder, then went from the room, quite sure that Roy would take his advice as he had been wont to do in the past. But in this belief, Howard Smith was wrong, for Roy was grimly resolved that nothing should stop him from making headway on the "Daily Bulletin," and his own experience on the paper told him that the quickest way to do this was to become a news-hound, as reporters were popularly called.

Revenge!

OBSESSED with the resolve, Roy was all eager to ask Mr. Jackson, the managing editor of the "Daily Bulletin," to allow him to transfer to the outside staff. But Mr. Jackson did not put in an appearance at the office that morning and so Roy sat at his desk fuming with impatience—and he fumed all the more when the news came of the previous night's raid on a lorry of illicit liquor that belonged to Piccardi, the racketeer. Big Boy they said had held it up and run off with it and Roy simply itched to go out and try his hand at fathoming the mystery of Big Boy's identity.

Who was this sinister racketeer and gunman? If only he could get his life's history for the "Bulletin," Roy knew that he would be made.

Afternoon came and still no Mr. Jackson. Five o'clock, and Roy was due to leave. And then, just as he was thinking it was useless to hang on a moment longer, the editor came in and with a casual nod to the staff went over to his desk and sat down. Roy allowed a few minutes to elapse and then summoning his courage, he approached the big man's desk.

"Mr. Jackson," he said a trifle hesitantly, "can you spare me a minute?"

"Well?" The editor was busy with some copy for the next day's issue and he did not raise his head.

"I—I want to ask you if you'd be good enough to transfer me to the outside staff, sir?" Roy fidgeted with the lapel of his jacket, for Mr. Jackson was somewhat of a tyrant and the youngster was fearful lest he should turn round on him and rail him. But the editor made no move, no answer, and regaining courage Roy went on: "You see, sir, I want to advance my position on the paper, to make more money and—"

"And you think you can do it by becoming a newsgetter, huh?" Mr. Jackson shot at him almost fiercely.

"Yes, that's right, Mr. Jackson," Roy replied stoutly enough. "I'm ambitious—I feel that if I had the chance I could get the dope on people like Piccardi and his gang, solve the identity of Big Boy—"

"What?" The editor spun round in his chair and looked up at Roy with a sneer on his hard lean face. But as he saw the eager light in the boy's eyes his expression softened and he caught at Roy's arm. "By heck, but I'll say you've got guts and that's something this paper is sadly lacking. Want to be a news-hound, do you? Right, then you shall. Get busy, young man, get busy, and if you bring in the goods, I promise you you'll get a darned good rise."

In the seventh heaven of delight, Roy flew from the office to the street. Already his keen young brain had formed a plan. He was quite friendly with detective Brady, who was attached to the local police station and Brady, as he knew, was at present engaged in trying to bring in Piccardi and Big Boy, and other such powerful gang leaders. He was bound to know their hide-outs, their haunts and that was just what Roy himself wanted to know; with such information in his possession he might find some way of learning quite a lot about them.

It was as Roy was half-walking, half-running in the direction of the police station that Lita Alvaro, dressed in a smart black evening gown with a rope of exquisite pearls around her neck, came into that private room at the Blue Dragon.

Piccardi and his "boys" were already there, lounging in chairs, but as she swept into the apartment they rose to their feet, the gang leader hurrying to meet her with a sinister smile playing about the corners of his hard cruel mouth.

"Okay, Lita?" he inquired eagerly.

"Dead easy. Thought he'd still be as keen as mustard on me. Coming along here for a friendly little pow-wow." She glanced at the expensive gold watch on her wrist, then shrugged her shapely shoulders. "Should be here any moment now—and he's not the faintest suspicion that you've anything to do with this place. Trust me to tap him gently and find that out."

"Good girl." Piccardi beamed with pleasure and squeezed her arm. "When that big stiff's out of the way you're going to be well rewarded, my dear. You'll find Piccardi can be very grateful for services rendered."

Lita shivered a little, for though immensely fond of this brute she could not bear the thought of being in the tiniest degree responsible for sending a man to his death. But there was no turning back now—she had given her promise and any hesitancy on her part to carry out the part she was to play could have but one ending. Men and women alike—Piccardi treated any who hesitated to do his bidding or who double-crossed him in but one way. Death from his fell gun!

A knock on the door that made the girl start violently, then she felt the pressure of Piccardi's fingers on her arms again—saw his hirelings instinctively stiffen as their hands flashed to coat pockets where their fingers fastened around the butts of their guns.

"You know what you've to do, Lita," Piccardi hissed through gritted teeth. "Act naturally and he won't suspect—then we'll get him."

She nodded slowly; watched the racketeer and his men tip-toe swiftly to a door that gave access to a smaller room, then, as they disappeared, she dropped into the chesterfield and picked up a magazine that was lying there.

"Come in." She glanced up with every appearance of casualness as the door from the restaurant opened, then smiled bewitchingly as her visitor strode into the room. "Oh, it's you, Big Boy. Sharp on time, too. Splendid, for I've only engaged this room for half an hour. Time enough for a nice little chat, though, isn't it?"

Howard Smith alias Big Boy nodded and coming across to her, he dropped on to the couch and took her hands in his.

"Look here, kid," he said somewhat gruffly, "when I met up with you last month I thought we were going to be mighty good friends. Then what happened? I went off for a spell and on my return found that you'd been mixing with another crowd. Too bad, Lita. Of course, Pecunni's all right, but—"

"Piccardi did you say?" she interrupted him teasingly.

"Hell!" The word ripped from between Big Boy's curling lips and his eyes blazed with an ugly gleam. "Why, Lita, if I thought you'd been mixing with that skunk I'd kill you both—I swear I would!"

But Lita only smiled. It pacified her to know that he had not the slightest suspicion of her relationship with his rival and it also gave her the necessary bit of confidence to go right through with the diabolical part she had to play.

"Then I'm glad I don't know this Piccardi, Big Boy, if that's what you'd feel about such a friendship," she said with a disarming smile.

"Yeah." He squeezed her hands, gazing wistfully into her pale blue eyes. "But forget Piccardi, Lita, and let's talk of more pleasant things. Now I'm back in the city and have lit on you once more, why not join up with me again? You're a pretty kid and I'm mighty fond of you. What do you say?"

Lita was silent. Not because she was at a loss for words, but because her gaze was riveted on the door across the room that led into the adjoining apartment. Slowly and stealthily it was being pushed open by avenging hands!

"Stick 'em up, you rat!"

The words were spat out with savage intensity, but if Big Boy felt any qualms he did not show them even by the merest flicker of an eyelid. Slowly, he turned his head, and Lita, watching him closely, could not help but admire the coolness of the man.

"Ah, Piccardi. Let me congratulate you on this very clever prearranged meeting." He looked with an air of bravado at his deadly rival, and then at the five men with him, who were claspng revolvers which were directed at him through their jacket pockets. "But why get a woman to frame me for you, Piccardi? That shows that you are—"

"Silence, you skunk, or by heavens I'll drill you just where you are!" Piccardi's face was a mask of cold fury, and his finger trembled on the trigger of the gun that he gripped in his hand. A moment of silence while the two eyed each other levelly, then: "You get up, Big Boy, and keep your blamed hand away from that pocket. You hear me?"

Big Boy rose languidly to his feet, dropping Lita's hands, then smiled quizzically as Piccardi's hirelings ranged themselves around him, still covering him with their guns.

"Well, and what's the big idea?" Big Boy inquired, though he knew the answer.

"You know well enough!" snapped Piccardi, glowering savagely at him. "Encroach on my territory, steal my trade; run off with my booze, kill my men! You'd do that, would you, you swine! Well, you'll not do it again, by heavens you won't! I've got you—got you at last, Big Boy, and, by heck, you're going for your last ride! You hear me, you scum?"

Big Boy drew himself up, eyes agleam, hands clenching tightly at his sides. For a moment it seemed that he would fling himself at his rival, but a sudden threatening movement of those hands held ready in the pockets of Piccardi's henchmen told Big Boy that violence would avail him nothing.

"Through that door there!" Piccardi stabbed a finger viciously towards a door opposite the one that led into the small communicating room. This was a way out to the back of the premises. "And keep moving, Big Boy. Understand?"

Big Boy inclined his head, gazed deep into Piccardi's burning eyes for a moment or two, then bracing his shoulders he turned on his heel and strode towards the indicated door.

Not a sound in the room, then, save the shuffling of feet as Big Boy strode onwards to his doom followed by Piccardi's men with their guns trained on his back. They disappeared, then Piccardi, lighting a cigarette, turned to Lita who was standing white-faced by the chesterfield striving to master the emotions that stormed her breast.

"I'll be seeing you, Lita," he said in a cool gloating voice, and quickly turning from her he sped after that grim little procession.

Big Boy's Homecoming.

AT the precise moment that Big Boy was forced from that room at the pistol's point a man and a boy came into the almost deserted restaurant. Roy Smith and Detective Brady, a wizen-faced little man with steely grey eyes and dressed in a shabby brown suit and grease-stained velour hat that gave him the appearance of anything but a sharp and very successful detective.

Sight of Roy standing at the door evidently listening to what was being said by Piccardi and his men in the conference room sent a thrill down Lita's spine. A spy!

Roy's request for information concerning Piccardi and Big Boy had met with immediate response. Brady would be pleased to tell him all he knew about those two powerful gangsters, and what was more show him where Piccardi had his hide-out—perhaps even give him the chance to come face to face with that terror of the underworld.

So it was that Roy came to the Blue Dragon, and as he cast his eyes about the trim and neat little restaurant he marvelled that such a place should harbour so desperate a character as Piccardi.

Then Roy's gaze came to rest on the prettiest girl he had ever seen. Dark-haired, with big blue eyes and neatly, though quietly, dressed in a pale-blue frock with lace trimmings. She was sitting by herself at one of the tables in a far corner of the room, and as she became aware that the boy was looking at her she gave him the faintest of smiles that caused the youngster's heart to beat a trifle faster.

Little did Roy dream that Doris White, looking for all the world like some demure schoolgirl, was in reality a very close friend of Piccardi's, one of the two gangsters he hoped to expose through the medium of the "Daily Bulletin"!

"Come along, kid," Brady touched Roy's arm, and as the youngster turned back to him the detective jerked his head towards a door on the left-hand side of the restaurant. "If Piccardi's anywhere around he'll be in there. A private room, and as the door's bound to be locked we'll have to knock."

He drove Roy over to the door and rapped upon its panels. A wait of a moment or two during which time the door was unlocked so quietly, that even the alert detective failed to hear any sound, then:

"Come in," came the call in a feminine voice.

Brady grasped the handle, turned it and opened the door. Then, with another motion of his head to Roy, he marched into the room with the youngster close at his heels.

"Hallo, Lita," Brady nodded in a casual way as the girl looked up from the chesterfield where she had swiftly seated herself after unlocking the door. "Piccardi not at home?"

"The boss?" Lita arched her eyebrows as she dropped the magazine she had caught up. "No, I don't think he is."

"Too bad. Just my luck when I'd brought a young friend specially round to meet him." He indicated Roy with a jerk of his thumb while his keen eyes were sweeping the room. Obvious to him that Piccardi had been there quite recently, and others with him. The thick pile of carpet was ruffled as by many pairs of feet while the smell of scented tobacco smoke hung thickly on the air—the scent of the perfumed cigarettes that Brady knew Piccardi smoked. A long, lingering look at that door across the room that opened into the smaller apartment, then the detective's gaze came back to the girl who, after a cursory nod to Roy, had been watching Brady closely. "Well, Lita, tell Piccardi I called and that I'll be seeing him some time. You won't forget, will you?"

She nodded, wondering, with fear clutching at her heart, if Brady had at last got something on Piccardi. But that it was impossible to tell—the detective's inscrutable face gave nothing away.

And then Brady was gone, with never another word, and Roy with him.

Roy was partaking of a somewhat belated tea on that pleasant summer's evening. Though a trifle disappointed at not having come face to face with the dread Piccardi, he nevertheless felt more than a little elated that he was acquainted with the scoundrel's hide-out, knew the description of the man. With this information in his possession he could form his own plans—work all he knew to expose him in the sheet for which he was now a news-hound.

It was as the boy was thus ruminating that a high-powered car came racing along the street down below. Some dozen or so yards from the building in which Roy was munching his tea, its speed slackened considerably, and the nearside door swung wide. Level with Roy's home, and then something shot out of the vehicle and came to rest in the gutter in a grotesque heap. Barely had it touched ground than the car was speeding away again, its doors reclosed.

A bullet riddled body, and a woman who happened to be passing along the side-walk at that moment let out a frantic scream as her horrified eyes encountered the corpse.

Instantly there came the sound of running feet, growing clearer as the purr of the high-powered car died in the distance. Next second, half a dozen men and women, with a uniformed policeman in their midst, crowded around the hysterically shouting woman and the form that lay so lifeless by the kerb.

"By gar—murder!" exclaimed Police Officer Simms after a brief glance at the corpse, and promptly whipped out his whistle and blew three thrill blasts on it.

Attracted by the sudden commotion Roy rose from the tea-table, went over to the window and peered down into the street. Clearly he could see the lifeless figure of the man, the little knot of people clustered curiously around with the policeman striving to keep them back, and his journalistic instincts were at once aroused. Perhaps here was the makings of an excellent story for the "Bulletin"—perhaps even a scoop!

No sooner did the thought occur to him than he was darting from the room. Down the two flights of stairs to the street. He came to the little cluster of people gathered on the pavement, and pushed eagerly through them. But then his progress was impeded by the grim-faced policeman who thrust out a gnarled fist and held him back.

"Now then, younker, you clear off!" he growled officiously.

"But I'm Press—see this!" Roy quickly jerked his official pass from his breast-pocket and thrust it under the officer's nose. "I'm hoping there's a story here for my paper, officer."

Police-officer Simms nodded, satisfied with the youngster's credentials.

"Right! Fire ahead, sir!" he said tersely. "It's murder!"

Roy replaced his pass, and as the policeman again set to work to keep back the curious crowd which was fast increasing its numbers, he dropped to his knees beside the dead man. But the face was turned downwards, so it was necessary for Roy to lift the head if he was to obtain a description of the man's features.

Gently he did this and then a horrified expression leaped into his face, and he gave an agonised cry.

"Heavens, it—it's Howard—Howard!" he gasped pathetically

With the tears rushing to his eyes he swept the lifeless body into his arms, hugging it close, while those on the pavement cast curious eyes at him. Then Police-officer Simms turned his head, quickly moved forward and clutched Roy's arm imperatively.

"Say, you can't do that!" he said commandingly. "The body mustn't be moved till—"

"But, officer"—Roy turned his tear-dimmed eyes on the man—"he—he's my brother."

A gasp ran around the watchers and the officer looked at the boy incredulously.

"Your brother?" he echoed. "Why, kid, he's—"

The officer broke off as there came the unmistakable whine of a police tender, and next second the van came swinging round a near-by corner into Fourteenth Street. It pulled up almost in its own length beside Roy, who still clung to his brother's lifeless form, and at once three uniformed figures leaped out from the back, to be followed more slowly by a shabbily-dressed, wizened-faced little man with steely grey eyes.

A hurried conclave with Police-officer Simms, and then the plain-clothes man strode up to Roy and touched him on the shoulder, while two of the uniformed men from police headquarters went back to the tender and dragged out the stretcher that reposed there.

"Come along, kid; take it easy." But as Roy looked dully up at him, the plain-clothes man caught in his breath. "Gee, it's you, Roy Smith!"

"Ye-yes, Mr. Brady." Roy's voice was little more than a hoarse whisper as he dragged himself wretchedly to his feet, his face white and strained, the tears still glistening in his eyes, striving to find an outlet. "He—he was my brother."

"Your brother!" Detective Brady looked as astounded as Police-officer Simms had done. "Big Boy—your brother?"

"Big Boy?" echoed Roy dazedly. "What do you mean? I—I don't understand."

The detective glanced towards the uniformed men who had placed the dead gangster on the stretcher and were now bearing it towards the back of the police tender, followed by many pairs of curious eyes.

"Just that that man's Big Boy, the notorious gang-leader, kid," Brady said quietly. "And I'll wager all I've got that he's been bumped off by his greatest enemy, Piccardi!"

Big Boy—his brother! The revelation almost stunned Roy, and it was with the utmost effort that he took a grip on his reeling senses. A terrible discovery. To think his brother was a gangster—a murderer!

But his brotherly affection for the dead man did not allow Roy to turn against him in revulsion. Howard had always been so good and kind to him—had kept him for years; had been both father and mother to him since the death of their parents many years ago. Only Howard's good side did he know; and, knowing it, a hot rage stormed up in his breast.

"Piccardi killed my brother!" he hissed through clenched teeth. "By heavens, I'll not rest till I've avenged Howard's death! I swear I won't!"

The police tender had sped away and Police-officer Simms had succeeded in dispersing the curious onlookers, though one or two still remained at a distance, their eyes focused on the raging boy and Detective Brady standing so quietly beside him.

"Don't take it so hard, Roy." Brady was an understanding man, and he was aware how deeply the youngster was grieved. Poor kid, he had never known just what type of man his brother really was; obviously he had believed him an honest and good fellow. "Let's forget about Big Boy and think only of the man who was your brother, shall we? See what I mean? Big Boy is gone; he's suffered to the full. But Piccardi—he can't get away with it. I'll have him and you can help me a whole heap to put him away. Your revenge, see? Now, just you come along home with me, and I'll tell you what we'll do."

Roy nodded, unable to speak on account of the emotions that raged within him. But he followed Brady down the side-walk when that shrewd detective touched his arm and set off towards his apartments on Twenty-fifth Street.

Into the Lion's Den.

YOU run along, and don't be so infernally jealous, Lita."

A smile on his cruel lips, Piccardi stabbed his cigarette-end into an ash-tray, rose languidly to his feet, and, reaching out his hand, patted Lita Alvaro patronisingly on the shoulder. But the fair-haired girl made no move—just stood looking at him with angrily blazing eyes.

"But I tell you I won't stand it, Piccardi!" Lita suddenly shot at him. "I won't be second to anyone. That girl, Doris—you're absolutely crazy on her. You buy her presents, take her out in your car, while I have to kick my heels and run this rotten restaurant for you. It's got to stop. I love you, and, by heavens, I'm not letting anyone—"

"That's enough, you darned fool!" Piccardi caught at her arm with brutal force, digging his fingers into the soft flesh till she cried out with the pain. "Now, you get an earful of this, my pretty! I'll do what I like—go out with any girl I choose without any darned interference from you. See?"

"Very well." The words hissed from between the girl's white lips with the venom of a serpent. "Then you'll only have yourself to blame if I tell the cops what I know about—"

She broke off with a choking gasp as his hand clapped violently over her mouth. But there was no terror in her eyes as he thrust his face threateningly into hers; only a cold defiance.

"So that's it, huh?" Piccardi pushed her away from him and gave a brutal laugh as she staggered into a chair. "Well, Lita, you know I'm a dangerous man to double-cross. A word to the bulls, and, by hades, it'll be your last!"

But his threat did not scare her in the least, for Lita knew well enough that the overwhelming love she bore this brute would not permit her to go back on him. She must regain his affection for her somehow, and, woman-like, she did not doubt her ability to do this, even though Doris White was good-looking and had captured Piccardi's interest.

"Better be going, Lita, for the boys'll be here any minute for a pow-wow." Piccardi jerked his head commandingly towards the door that led to the back of the premises. "And remember, my dear, to keep your mouth shut!"

She made no answer, just gave a sneering laugh as she flounced to the door that caused the crook to bite his lip with rage.

The door opened and closed on her, and, quickly mastering his wrath, Piccardi lit a cigarette and dropped into a chair. There were other and far more important things to think of than this refractory girl. But he was not left to his musing for long, for bare seconds later the door through which Lita had passed opened again, and in trooped half a dozen members of his gang with Tony Havers, his chief lieutenant, among them.

"Decided, boss?" asked one of the gangsters, a tall, vicious-looking man in a grey lounge suit and grey felt hat.

"Sure thing, Mike. Pedelty's going to get his liquor to-night even if we have to blaze a way through a regiment of cops." Piccardi rose to his feet and nodded towards the door of the adjoining room. "But we'll discuss plans inside. Come on."

But as Tony Havers stepped to the door of the communicating room to open it there came a knock on the door leading from the back of the premises that caused him to instantly pull up in his stride. In a flash his hand was around the butt of a gun nesting in his jacket pocket, and his colleagues were not a fraction of a second behind him in reaching for their own automatics.

"Well, boss?" inquired Tony, shooting a glance at Piccardi.

"See who the heck it is," The gangster shrugged his shoulders expressively. "And be ready to shoot."

Tony nodded, an ugly grin spreading over his coarse features, then he slouched to the door and jerked it open. Outside stood a well-built and quietly-dressed young man with dark hair and brown eyes.

"Well?" Tony scrutinised the caller carefully, his hand all the while clutching the butt of his concealed gun. "What the blazes you want, huh?"

"Mr. Piccardi—he about?" Though his heart was beating faster than usual, Roy Smith's voice did not betray the sudden anxiety he felt now that he was fully embarked on his great venture. "He is? Good! Then tell him I'd like to see him. Danny Holtz from Chicago."

Out of the tail of his eye Tony saw his chief nod his head, for Piccardi and his hirelings had heard every word that Roy had uttered.

"Come in, kid." Tony closed the door as Roy stepped past him, then quickly turned to the youngster again and jerked a thumb in Piccardi's direction. "That's the boss, there, waiting to hear your piece, so just you spit it out and make it snappy."

Roy advanced into the room and confronted Piccardi while the gangster's satellites

"You rotten hound!" he bellowed wildly. "Kill Big Boy, my brother, would you! Why, I'll—" kept their guns trained on the boy in case of emergency.

"Well, what is it you want?" Piccardi asked smoothly.

"A job. I was with Don Rawson in Chicago, but had to beat it sudden like. Not healthy for me there any longer." Roy winked an eye, marvelling at the easy manner in which he was falling into his part. Then he took from his pocket a letter which Mr. Jackson, of the "Daily Bulletin," had written and concocted for Piccardi's special benefit, and handed it to the gangster. "A letter of introduction from Rawson. You'll find it okay."

Piccardi took the missive and read it through. He had heard of Don Rawson—one of the most powerful gangsters in Chicago. And Rawson asked him in the letter to take in Danny Holtz, the bearer of the missive, who was a two-gun man. "An acquisition to any racketeer," so ended the epistle.

"Sounds good enough. I'll take you on," Piccardi handed the letter of introduction back to Roy, then turned to his hirelings, motioning them to lay up on their guns. "Boys, meet Danny Holtz from Chicago. He's going to be one of you."

Words of greeting were exchanged, during which there again came a knock on the door. But the knock had a peculiar sound to it, and, without waiting for any signal from Piccardi, Tony Havers went across and opened the door.

Into the room came Doris White, and at sight of her a pained expression instantly came into Roy's brown eyes. So she was friendly with these men—a girl he had believed to be clean and good—a girl he had lost his heart to at sight as she had sat out in the restaurant the previous day.

A swift glance she gave him, and then she came up to Piccardi and held out her hand, smiling bewitchingly up at him.

"Hallo, my dear!" He took her outstretched hand, drew her close to him, and, before them all, kissed her on the lips. "So sorry that I'll have to disappoint you, but I've some important work to do. Just going to have a conference with the boys. Shall we say to-morrow?"

"Sure."

Piccardi smiled and squeezed the hand he held, then a thought suddenly occurred to him. This Danny Holtz. His credentials were all right as far as one could judge, but it would be best to make certain of him before trusting him with any inside secrets. He was in the way at the moment, with such important plans to be discussed, but Doris' presence offered a good way out.

"Look here, Doris. I promised you a nice little drive in the country to-night, and I hate to disappoint you," Piccardi indicated Roy with a jerk of the head. "So Danny Holtz here shall take you. You'll find my tourer in the garage at the back. Suppose you can drive, Holtz?"

"Sure I can." Though disappointed that he could not start right away to probe into the secrets of this arch-crook, Roy was nevertheless elated at the chance to become really acquainted with the girl. Somehow he felt that she was out of her natural environment—here with these crooks. Perhaps he could persuade her from the crooked path and— Then it came to him in a flash that she might know much about Piccardi—sufficient, at least, to put the crook behind prison bars, and with the thought he was all eagerness to be off with her. "And when shall I report back—you'll want me again to-night, huh, boss?"

September 26th, 1931.

"To-morrow will do. But get this. You take good care of Miss White. See?" Roy nodded, and Piccardi turned back to the girl and kissed her again. "And I'll see you to-morrow, Doris, huh? Perhaps we may do a show—a cabaret or a theatre?"

She nodded with apparent eagerness, then, with a gay wave of the hand to Piccardi, she went from the room, followed by Roy. Out to the garage at the back of the premises, where she indicated to the youngster a comparatively new open tourer.

"I'll drive," she told him, and took the wheel while he clambered in beside her.

For some half-hour or so the girl drove in silence, with Roy gazing at her pretty averted face in adoration. Then the hum of the city's traffic was left behind, and they entered a winding country lane with green fields on either side, and the sun, a golden ball, slowly dipping to the West before the approaching night.

"I say," Roy ventured suddenly. "it gave me a bit of a shock when you marched into Piccardi's place to-night."

"Did it?" Not for a moment did she take her eyes off the road ahead. "But why, may I ask?"

"Well, you see, you—you—" Roy hesitated, at a loss to know exactly what to say. "Well, because when I saw you in the restaurant last night it struck me that you were a darned nice girl—too good to—"

Again he broke down, but his words had sent a rosy flush into Doris White's cheeks, had caused her heart to beat a trifle faster.

"You think I'm too nice to mix with crooks like Piccardi, eh?" She looked at him out of the corner of her eyes and smiled as he nodded. "Well, how about yourself? I should think you're too decent to be a crook."

Roy did not know what to say to that, so he remained silent. But her next words staggered him, though when they sank in he realised that they were only to be expected.

"And you're not a crook, I know that." She saw him start, and looked at him for a long moment with what seemed to him accusing eyes. "You came into Piccardi's place last night with Brady, the cop. You deny it?"

"No." Now that she suspected him he felt that he could put on a bold front, and his brown eyes met hers unflinchingly. "But look here, Miss White. Something tells me you're decent—that—"

"You're going to give me a lecture—try to get me to run straight, eh?" she interrupted him. "Why?"

"Because—because I—well, because I rather like you," Roy blustered.

She blushed deeper than ever, and in that moment she realised that she returned his affection—that here was the one boy in the world for her.

"But supposing I'm straight enough—that it is for a very special reason that I'm friendly with Piccardi," she said, with a whimsical smile. "What then?"

"Why, it'd make me happier than I've ever been in my life before," Roy replied with much fervour.

Silence again fell between them. Roy watching the girl with longing gaze as she drove on down the country lane. Then suddenly she swung the car into a side turning, brought it to a standstill outside the gates of a little church, jumped out, and beckoned to him to follow her. Mystified, he did so, and she led him into the churchyard, stopping presently before a large grave with a massive marble stone rearing at its head.

"There lies all I had in the world." There was a catch in her voice and her eyes were moist with tears as she pointed to the stone. "My mother, my father, and my brother."

He bowed his head reverently, more mystified than ever. That here was some great calamity in her young life was evident, and he felt deeply sorry for her.

"But I don't understand," he said in little more than a whisper.

"I'll tell you. My brother, a good enough boy but very easily led, fell in with that brute Piccardi. After a while he got sick of the whole dirty business and wanted to get out—and he went out riddled by the bullets from the guns of Piccardi and his men. They were afraid he'd squeal, I suppose." Her voice very nearly broke, but with an effort she regained control of herself and brushed the tears from her eyes. "It was a terrible blow to mother and father, for they almost worshipped Dick. Poor souls, they pined, and eventually died of broken hearts. Now you can see, of course: why I'm friendly with Piccardi. Revenge—and I'll not rest till—"

"And I'm after revenge, too, Doris." Roy told her grimly as she hesitated. "That brute Piccardi killed my brother, the best and only pal I had in the wide, wide world. Howard was a gangster, though I didn't suspect it—a rival of Piccardi's. But that our shall pay—I've sworn it, and you and I'll now work together to bring him to justice."

She nodded her head, for she could not trust herself to speak, such was the torture of her soul as she stood there looking at the gravestone with tear-dimmed eyes.

Presently Roy touched her arm, gently and tenderly, and moments later the two were back in the car, driving towards the city, the bond of suffering bringing them even closer together.

Denounced.

ANOTHER meeting of Piccardi's gang and still the master-crook did not see fit to bring Roy into the conference. A letter had been written to Rawson in Chicago, and till such time as an answer was forthcoming guaranteeing Danny Holtz's credentials beyond question, Piccardi was resolved not to let him into any secrets connected with the workings of the gang.

So Roy had to kick his heels in the large apartment at the Blue Dragon while Piccardi and his "boys" repaired to the smaller room to discuss their plans. But they had scarce been in there a moment before Roy rose from the chesterfield on which he had been sitting and crept stealthily across to the door, where he applied his ear to the keyhole.

An opportunity to learn what coup they were planning next. If only he could get a line on them and pass the information on to the police they might be caught in the act—ambushed by the police and either killed or captured and sent up river to the dread Sing-Sing, there to spend many a long day behind prison bars. And for one at least the chair—Piccardi, if he were taken alive!

The boy could hear the drone of voices beyond the door, but the words were undistinguishable. Greatly daring, he caught the handle, turned it quietly as he could, and pushed the door open an inch or two. An eager gleam coming into his eyes, he leaned his head sideways the better to hear what was being said within the small room.

Then it was that the door giving access to the back of the Blue Dragon was softly opened, and Lita Alvaro crept into the large apartment.

Jealousy had brought her here, for she expected to find Doris White in Piccardi's arms, and was ready to make a scene—to again threaten to expose the gangster to the police if he did not at once send Doris away. Love Piccardi she did, but this seemed the only way to win him back, and, what was more, she was resolved now to keep her threat if he persisted in slighting her.

Sight of Roy standing at the door, evidently listening to what was being said by Piccardi and his men in the conference room, sent a thrill down Lita's spine. A spy! And then she caught a glimpse of his profile—recognised him as the youngster Detective Erady had brought in with him two nights ago, and knew beyond all doubt that he was indeed a spy.

Triumph sung in the girl's breast. Here was a way to win Piccardi over to her for all time. But it was no good raising the alarm now—the listener might get away before Piccardi and the others could dash out and secure him.

Crafty Lita! She decided that her best course was to go out and round to the front entrance of the restaurant, and there send a message into Piccardi by one of his men.

She backed to the door without the listening youngster being aware of the menace that threatened him, opened it without the least sound and slid out into the passage beyond. But in closing the door the catch clicked slightly, and Roy, hearing it, turned his head with a startled jerk.

No one, but his heart was pounding so madly with the sudden shock he had received that he pulled the door to the council chamber quietly to and returned to the chesterfield.

Five minutes passed during which time he recovered his nerve, and then the door to the smaller apartment opened and Piccardi and his men returned.

"Don't forget—twelve o'clock it's to be, boys," announced Piccardi as he lit a cigarette he had just taken from a handsome gold case.

"Sure, boss," nodded Tony Havers, and, glancing at Roy, who had risen to his feet as the gangsters had filed back into the room, he beckoned to the youngster with a motion of his head.

"Come on, Danny—off you go! You'll not be wanted on this little jaunt of ours."

"No?" Roy arched his eyebrows, jerking the brim of his hat down over his eyes in what he thought was the best gangster style. Then he turned to Piccardi. "See here, boss, I hate this life of idleness. You'll let me do something soon, won't you? And the bigger the better, for I'm a glutton for big work."

"All in good time, Danny." Piccardi smiled behind the cloud of tobacco smoke he blew ceilingwards.

"But you just trot along now and take it easy till I can fix you. See?"

It was the signal for dismissal, and Roy turned to follow Tony and the others as they slouched across the room. But he had taken no more than two or three strides when there came a knock on the door leading from the restaurant. On the instant Piccardi's men pulled up in their tracks, Roy with them, and in answer to the gang leader's "come in," a short, thick-set man with an unprepossessing face entered and came straight over to Piccardi. In the man's hand was a folded piece of paper which he handed to the crook with never a word.

A Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

Wonderingly Piccardi took it, opened it out and read the pencilled words thereon. And as he did so his eyes gleamed, and his face took on an expression that was ugly to behold. For the missive was from Lita Alvaro denouncing Roy as a spy!

"Here, you!" Piccardi swung round on Roy in a flash. "Come here—I want you!"

Thinking that the crook intended to assign him to a job, Roy quickly approached and confronted him.

"So you're a spy, huh?" Piccardi clenched his fists, his eyes blazing at the youngster with murderous intensity as Roy started back under the suddenness of the accusation. "A stool pigeon! Here to find out enough dope to put us safely away. Well, you little swine, you've run into a hornet's nest, and, by heck, you'll find you won't get out of it!"

The fury within the man rose with his words, and of a sudden he brought up his fist and crashed it with all his savage strength to the point of Roy's chin. Back went the youngster as if propelled by some giant catapult to bring up against the chesterfield with a painful gasp.

Tense silence for several seconds while Roy slumped there striving to regain his shattered senses. Then, the daze clearing from his brain, he straightened quickly, and, with a furious cry bursting from him, hurled himself at Piccardi like some mad-dened bull.

"You rotten bound!" he bellowed wildly. "Kill Big Boy, my brother, would you? Why, I'll—"

"That's enough of that, you little runt!" broke in Tony Havers' harsh voice. "Another move, and I'll drill you! You hear me?"

Out of the tail of his eye Roy saw Piccardi's men threatening him with their guns, and the sight had the instant effect of steadying him. But he faced Piccardi bravely enough, a defiant look in his brown eyes.

"Aw, so that's the lay of it! Big Boy's kid brother out for revenge, huh?" Piccardi thrust his face into Roy's, and there was a sardonic sneer on his cruel lips. "Well, now, if that isn't darned funny. A chance for me to pay a little more back. Yes, you poor simp, you're going on your last ride! Know what that means?"

The colour drained instantly from Roy's fury-distorted face, and a terrified expression came into his eyes, for he knew well enough what those grim words meant. And he was powerless to do anything to save himself with those guns threatening him on either hand.

A nod from Piccardi and his underlings quickly closed in on the boy. But as they did so there came a knock on the door leading to the back of the premises, and they pulled up with a jerk.

"See who it is, Tony," said Piccardi, calmly enough. "But keep your gun ready. See?"

Face to Face with Death.

BUT it was only Doris White at the door, and as Tony stood aside for her to pass into the room she almost cried out in terror as she saw Roy standing there with Piccardi's men threatening him with their revolvers.

A moment only did she waver, however, for in a flash she realised that any hesitancy on her part, any show of friendly sympathy for the boy, might arouse Piccardi's suspicions. If she was to save Roy, as save him she must now that it was obvious they knew him for what he was, she must resort to all the craft of which she was capable. And what better way than to wheedle to this brute of a man?

"Hallo, Piccardi!" She came over to the gangster, smiled bewitchingly up at him and held out her hands. "Sorry I've butted in at such an inopportune moment; but you promised me a ride, you know!"

Piccardi laughed boisterously as he thought of the ride that his victim was destined to take, then he caught at Doris' arms, pulled her close to him and kissed her affectionately.

"It's all right, my dear," he told her lightly. "That ride stands, for I'm through with business for to-night."

"But Danny Holtz?" She waved her hand carelessly towards Roy, who was watching her closely, knowing full well that she would make some effort to save him from his terrible plight. "What's he done—why the guns?"

"What's he done, huh?" Piccardi's face again took on a vicious expression. "Well, my dear Doris, I've discovered that he's a spy. And, by heck, he's going to suffer dearly!"

"But he's only a kid." Doris gently pushed Piccardi into an armchair, sat down on an arm and ruffled his hair with soft fingers. "Isn't it rather degrading to harm a mere boy?"

"In a way, perhaps you're right," conceded the gangster, but there was no relenting of his hard soul. "But this is different, Doris. The brother of an old enemy—a dangerous stripling. If I was to allow him to go free he'd have all the cops in New York blazing around our heads in next to no time."

She bit her lip, knowing that no words of hers would have any effect on him. His mind, cruel and relentless, was made up and nothing would shake it from its purpose.

With tears in her eyes, writhing at her helplessness to do anything to save the boy she loved she saw Piccardi grimly nod his head—saw his ruthless hirelings crowd in on Roy, and at the pistol's point march him from the room.

Another helpless victim going for his last ride!

The door closed with hardly a sound on the grim cortège, and Doris shuddered with repulsion at the sinister laugh that broke from Piccardi's twisted lips.

"Well, my dear, that's what happens to all who are darned saps enough to cross my path. But why be morbid. He's gone—finished!" The brutal expression on his face relaxed, and he smiled almost pleasantly as he looked into the girl's white, strained face. "Doris, our little ride. We'll go right away. A blow in the country; then, afterwards, a cabaret show. What say?"

She wanted to shriek, such was the agony that tore at her soul—to fly from that grim apartment in a last desperate endeavour to save Roy from the avenging guns of those brutal fiends of Piccardi's. But Piccardi held her tight, an arm around her waist, though even if she had been free she doubted if she would have had sufficient strength to move a muscle just then.

"Well, you don't seem particularly keen for a night out, baby," said Piccardi, with an impatient note in his voice. "Don't tell me that that little affair's given you the willies?"

She felt she could not answer him, though she realised she must say something, for otherwise he might smell a rat. That boy—he had meant a great deal to her, but she was powerless to do anything to save him. All she could do now was to carry on with the part she had been playing. Her time would come. There would be an additional death to avenge. Piccardi should pay—pay in full when her hour struck!

"Of course I'm keen." She laughed, though it was somewhat shakily. "Let's go at once, dear. It's so very stuffy in this room that I feel I shall faint if I don't soon get some fresh air."

She rose to her feet and he quickly followed her example, reaching for his soft felt hat that lay upon the table.

"Anything you say goes for me, Doris." He thrust the hat on his head, caught her in his arms and kissed her. "There, that shows you just how I feel about you—"

But the rest of the sentence remained unsaid, for at that moment there came the sudden slamming of a door, and with a startled gasp Piccardi released his hold on Doris and spun round on his heel, reaching for his gun as he did so.

"A very pretty little speech." Lita Alvaro looked at the pair with mocking eyes as she advanced into the room. Straight to Piccardi she came, ignoring Doris completely. "So this is all the thanks I get for tipping you off about that spy. You still spurn my love for this other woman. Well—"

"That's enough, curse you!" Piccardi's face reddened with the fury that suddenly flamed within him, and, thrusting out his hand, he caught Lita savagely by the arm, squeezing it with brutal strength till she whimpered with pain. "You know what I told you last time, don't you? That I'm a dangerous man to cross. Now, you get out, you poor fool, while it's healthy, and bear that well in mind."

A sudden twist of his arm and he sent Lita hurtling across the room, to crash into a small table which rocked precariously on its legs. But the girl caught at it instinctively, thereby steadying the table and herself.

Eyes in which blazed a sudden deep hatred fixed themselves on Piccardi, while Doris White crouched against the chesterfield, fearful what the gangster might do, sorry for the girl who believed that she had stolen her man.

"You think I'm scared, Piccardi, don't you?" Lita gave a wild, reckless laugh. "Well, you're darned well mistaken. I warned you before that I wouldn't let any other girl come between us, and I meant it. You thought I'd given in without a murmur, but I aimed to win you back without stirring up trouble. But I'm through with you now—through! Hear me?"

Piccardi laughed uproariously. Such wild threats, coming as they did from the hot-headed Lita, amused him vastly. Men he could take seriously, but a woman—never.

"Laugh, would you?" Lita Alvaro almost danced with the insane fury that blazed in her outraged heart. Then she swiftly ran to the telephone that reposed on a window-sill and snatched the receiver from its hooks. "Well, this'll make you laugh on the other side of your ugly face!"

Then it was that Piccardi realised that the girl was in dead earnest. Obvious that she intended to ring the police, as she had threatened to do on that other occasion, and to turn informer against him.

A vicious oath ripping from between his bared teeth, the gangster reached for his jacket pocket, dragged out his gun and levelled it straight at the girl whose blazing eyes never left his face for a single moment.

A shriek of fear from Doris White as she clutched frantically at the chesterfield, her legs growing suddenly weak beneath her as she realised the man's deadly purpose, then came Piccardi's harsh voice.

"Drop that receiver, you little cat, or, by heavens, I'll drill you! You hear me?"

But Lita only laughed wildly, and as the operator's voice sounded in her ear she imperatively demanded to be put through to police headquarters.

"You would, would you, you dirty little rat!" Piccardi's face was working with the terrible fury that had him in its grip, and his evil eyes glinted like those of a madman. "Well, Lita, it's coming to you now, by heck it is!"

Doris White let out a terrified scream as she saw the brute's finger curling round the trigger of the gun, while Lita, with sudden and amazing coolness, now that she realised that her end was near, returned the telephone receiver to its hooks, a wan smile playing around the corners of her white lips as she did so.

A shot came, crashing out with the sound of some vast explosion in the confines of that room. Followed instantly a shriek of terror—but in a masculine voice, as Piccardi went tumbling head first to the floor. Then in at the door from the restaurant came a wizen-faced little man with steely grey eyes, dressed in a shabby brown suit and greastained velour hat.

Detective Brady, and in his hand—a still smoking revolver which he promptly stowed away after one swift glance at the fallen gangster.

"Just in time, I think," he said to no one in particular.

A groan came from the stricken crook, and it had the instant effect of rousing Lita Alvaro from the stupor that had her in its grip. It came to her swiftly, then, that there on the floor lay the one man that she had ever loved, and though he had turned against her, her loyalty to him came back with a rush now that he was sorely injured.

"Oh, Piccardi, Piccardi, my dear!" She ran to him, went down on her knees and gathered his head in her arms. Then as she saw his hand go weakly to his side, where a trickle of blood showed, saw the ghastly pallor of his cheeks, the glassiness in his eyes, she burst into heart-rending sobs. "Piccardi, don't die—for heaven's sake don't die! Oh, don't leave me, for I love you, dear! I—I didn't mean to ring the cops—it—it's just that I was—"

She could say no more, for her distressed state of mind completely overwhelmed her then. A pitiful object she looked as she knelt there, clutching frantically at the stricken man, the tears streaming down her haggard face.

Doris White looked at her with deeply sympathetic eyes, knowing just how it felt to lose a loved one, and even the stony-hearted Brady was touched by the pathetic sight.

"It—it's all right—Lita, for-get it."

Just for a moment a wan smile showed on Piccardi's pain-twisted face, then his body gave a convulsive shudder and he went limp in Lita's clutching arms, causing her to scream hysterically in her terrible grief.

And then the door from the restaurant opened and someone came into the room. Roy Smith, his face white and drawn, his dark curly hair tousled.

"Roy! Roy! Is—is it really you?" Doris White gazed at him incredulously as she stood there and was joined at that moment by a tall, thick-set man—

(Continued on page 27.)

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. A grand new serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama. Starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

"HEROES of the FLAMES"

READ THIS FIRST.

While en route with his comrades to the scene of a fire, Bob Darrow, of the San Francisco Brigade, saves the life of a boy who falls in front of one of the monster engines.

Later he calls on James Madison, head of a chemical company, to whom he puts up an idea for a patent fire-extinguisher. Madison is not interested, and Bob leaves disappointed, after meeting Dan Mitchell, a shady promoter who is befriending Madison for his own ends.

That afternoon Bob rescues June Madison from a fire in her father's office, then learns that the boy he had saved from the wheels of the fire-engine was Madison's son, Jackie.

In gratitude, Madison helps Bob to perfect his invention, the Darrow Fire-Bomb. But Dan Mitchell is anxious to sell Madison an extinguisher of his own, and to discredit Bob he sends a hireling to "doctor" the fireman's invention with a deadly explosive.

The experiment fails, but Madison's faith in the invention is unshaken, whereupon Mitchell has Bob tricked into attending a low night-club. He then points him out to the Madisons, and afterwards takes the disillusioned June over the premises.

June is accidentally locked in a vault filled with bootleg liquor. A fire breaks out, and the brigade answers the call. Going to her rescue, Bob enters the vault, but is trapped by the flames!

Now Read On.

Help From Outside.

WITH blazing fragments of the ceiling falling around him, and the farther end of the wine cellar a raging mass of flame, it seemed to Bob Darrow that he and June Madison were doomed.

EPISODE 4.

"DEATH'S CHARIOT."

But as he stood there with the girl in his arms he suddenly heard a familiar voice calling to him through the bars of the basement window, and, turning, he saw the sturdy figure of Fireman Pat Heeley.

The Battalion Chief was with him, while June's father and Dan Mitchell were crouching near by.

"Back away, Darrow," said the chief. "We're coming through."

A glance at something in Pat Heeley's hand told Bob how the last-minute effort at rescue was to be made. The Irishman was carrying an oxy-acetylene burner, and, levelling the muzzle at one of the bars, he directed the fierce jet of flame against the metal.

At the point where the iron met the cement the bar began to weaken. The hissing blast of concentrated fire, gradually cut through it, and Pat then shifted the burner so that the jet played on the topmost end of the rod. But the task of severing it was one that took up precious moments, and in the meanwhile the fire in the cellar was rolling nearer to the man and the girl imprisoned there.

Battalion Chief Wilson turned and shouted for a hose, and a few seconds later a powerful stream of water was challenging the flames in the basement. It could not quench the blaze, but it held it in check as Pat Heeley worked on the bars.

The first bar came asunder, but there were three more to be disposed of, and the inflammable bootleg liquor in the cellar continued to feed the inferno in spite of the hose. Masses of suffocating smoke rolled about Bob, too, and he cough racked his lungs. He felt that he could not last much longer, and all at once he stumbled with his burden.

"He can't hold out!" cried Madison distractedly, and like a man in a frenzy he tore at the remaining bars with his bare hands.

Captain Wilson dragged him back by main force.

"Steady, Madison, steady," he jerked, struggling with him on the sidewalk. "If it's humanly possible, Heeley and Darrow will save your daughter. Hang on, Bob!" he called in a louder voice. "We'll soon be through!"

Bob pulled himself together with a tremendous effort, and stood waiting. Another bar was severed, and then another. The fire in the cellar was now closing in. A fall of blazing timber missed Bob's shoulder by inches and showered sparks over him.

The last bar was cut near its base, and without waiting for Pat Heeley to complete its destruction, Wilson and one or two others seized the iron rod and bent it upward. Next moment willing hands were reaching through the aperture for June Madison.

Bob lifted her towards the rescuers, and she was pulled through the window and carried across the sidewalk to Madison's waiting car. Then Bob himself was dragged out of the death-trap, and as he scrambled clear the remains of the cellar roof fell in with a crash that raised a mass of angry, lurid flames.

Bob straightened up, reeled uncertainly for an instant, and then felt the steady grip of Pat Heeley's arm about his waist.

"Are yez all right, me bhoy?" the Irishman gasped.

"Sure, Pat—sure," Bob told him huskily. "But, June—is she—"

"Och, she'll be as roight as rain to—morrow," Pat assured him. "Look, she's beginnin' to come round now."
September 26th, 1931

He pointed to Madison's car. June had been lifted into it, and she was lying with her head against her father's shoulder, sobbing hysterically in her semi-conscious state. Dan Mitchell had climbed into the auto as well, and now that June was safe, he inwardly cursed the turn that events had taken—events that had added to the esteem in which the Madisons already held Bob.

Captain Wilson was standing by the car, and Madison spoke to him.

"Chief," he said, "take good care of Darrow. I owe him more than I can ever repay."

Bob did not hear those words of gratitude, for at that moment Pat Heeley was addressing him, voicing a question that had been on his mind for some time.

"Say, Bob," he asked, "phwat wuz that explosion that went off just as ye got into the basement?"

"Oh, that," Bob answered casually. "That was a barrel of bootleg whisky going up."

Pat's eyes seemed to dilate. "A barrel of whisky?" he echoed. "Down there in that cellar? Begorra, and it might be prime Irish!"

No sooner had he uttered the words than he made a bee-line for the basement window, but before he could reach it Bob hailed Captain Wilson laughingly.

"Oh, chief," he shouted, "you'd better call that thirsty Irishman. I just told him there was whisky in the cellar there."

Wilson glanced in Pat's direction, and:

"Hey, Pat!" he roared. "Back out—back out!"

The sturdy Irishman stopped, hesitated, and then sadly retraced his steps. Chuckling, Bob watched his mournful return.

New Tactics.

IN his down-town office, where he carried on business as a promoter, Dan Mitchell sat at his desk and pored over the headlines on the front page of a morning newspaper. They read as follows:

"JAMES MADISON, WELL-KNOWN CHEMIST AND FINANCIER, WILL ENTER MYSTERY CAR IN THE ROAD RACE NEXT SATURDAY.

"Brown Special," With Recently-Invented Motor, is Rumoured to be in Class by Itself.

Mitchell handed the paper to a man standing at his shoulder. The man was Spike Beldon, Dan Mitchell's henchman.

"This is just the chance I've been waiting for—to trip Madison," the unscrupulous promoter said. "Gus Pollard is going to win that race in the Hayden Special."

"Yeah?" Spike muttered. "An' how is that gonna do you any good?"

"Because I've got money invested in the Hayden outfit," Mitchell answered. "I happen to know, too, that Madison has a lot of cash tied up in the exploitation of this new Brown motor-engine, and if it lets him down he's going to be pretty near a financial failure."

"Well?"

Mitchell smiled crookedly. "Let me put it to you this way, Spike," he said. "Supposing Madison was in a jam, and supposing I showed up with an offer to lend him big money—in exchange for an interest in his company. I reckon I'd be in a position then to market some of those phoney inventions we've got hold of—particularly that fire-extinguisher I'm interested in. I could make a million dollars on the initial rake-in."

"I think I get you," Spike murmured. "The name 'Madison' would be enough to sell our stuff, huh?"

"Yes," Mitchell rejoined, "to start with, anyway. And before the orders fall away and the crash comes I'd have feathered my nest and sold out my interest in the company."

"Yeah, sounds all right," Spike granted. "But about this road race, Madison is bound to win. He wouldn't be in the race unless he knew the Brown Special was the fastest car. Besides, Tim Shayne is drivin' for him, and Shayne is the best man on the track."

Mitchell looked at his hireling narrowly.

"It isn't always the fastest car that wins," he said, "and as for Shayne—I know how to handle him."

Shortly after his conference with Spike, Mitchell left his office and drove to Madison's home. Parked in the drive he saw another car, which he recognised as a run-about that Bob Darrow sometimes used, and an unpleasant frown appeared on his sallow face as he observed it.

A maid admitted him to the house, and as he entered the hall he found Madison in conversation with a slightly-built, keen-looking young man whose features were familiar. He was none other than Tim Shayne, racing-driver, and it was in connection with the Brown Special that Shayne had called.

"I took her out over the course at daylight this morning, Mr. Madison," Tim Shayne was saying, "and I can tell you she has everything. Her speed is limited only by the nerve of the man at the wheel."

"Well, I reckon you've got all the nerve that's needed, Shayne," Madison declared, "and I'm glad to hear of your confidence in the Brown Special. Good luck, boy," he added, holding out his hand. "I'll see you on the day of the race. And remember, I'm depending on you."

Shayne said "good-bye," and, walking towards the front door, caught sight of Dan Mitchell. The race-driver checked and looked at the promoter with sharp distrust, for he knew Mitchell and the man's unsavoury reputation.

Mitchell returned his glance mockingly, then strolled on to greet Madison as Tim Shayne left the house.

"How are you, Dan?" Madison asked him affably.

"Fine," Mitchell answered, "but mighty sorry to learn that you've fallen for that triek motor. You'll lose money and prestige on this Brown Special venture, Mr. Madison."

Madison laughed.

"You heard what Tim Shayne just said?" he inquired. "He said that, in his opinion, the Brown Special would leave everything standing, and I'm willing to back his judgment."

"Pollard will beat you by a mile in his Hayden turn-out," Mitchell stated. "And when I say that, I'm willing to back my judgment against Shayne's. By the way, where's June? And how is she feeling after her ordeal?"

"She's fine," Madison told him. "I think she's out in the garden with Bob Darrow just now."

He was right, and at that particular moment Bob was relating to June the combination of circumstances that had brought him to the notorious Nightingale Club the previous evening.

"And that," he observed, in conclusion—"that explains my first visit to the café."

June smiled bewitchingly.

"I was terribly disappointed at seeing you there on your first visit," she confessed. "But you'll never know how glad I was to see you on your second visit—in fireman's uniform, Bob."

"Thank Heaven I got to you in time!" he murmured earnestly. "You see, June, I—I—"

He faltered, and lapsed into an awkward silence. Her eyes bent on the ground and a slight flush in her cheeks, June spoke in a low tone.

"Was there—anything else—you wanted to say?" she coaxed.

Bob's arm moved towards her waist, but he checked himself. He wanted to tell her how much he cared for her, but felt that he had no right to do so. She was the daughter of a wealthy man, a girl reared in luxury. He was only a smoke-eater—with ambitions, perhaps—but ambitions that had yet to be realised. Until he had something to offer her he must continue to be no more than a friend.

"Well," he stammered, "I—I want you to know that I've a great regard for—you and your father. But say," he added, glancing at his watch, "I'd better be getting back to the station."

Had he but known it, June found it difficult to conceal her disappointment, for she had sensed that he had been on the point of proposing, and had eagerly awaited the moment when he would ask her to marry him. She managed to affect a matter-of-fact air, however, and after seeing him to his car, made her way indoors.

She was about to hurry upstairs when she saw her father and Dan Mitchell in the hall.

Mitchell was speaking, and she could not help overhearing his words.

"I'll tell you what I'll do, Mr. Madison," he said. "I need just ten thousand dollars to buy an engagement ring for June, and I'm prepared to bet that amount that Pollard's Hayden wins on Saturday."

Madison pursed his lips, and seemed about to turn down the suggestion when June called to him from the staircase.

"Take his bet, dad!" she urged.

The two men whipped round and caught sight of her. She was smiling, and turned her eyes on Mitchell challengingly as he came towards the banisters.

"You mean, June," he asked, "that if I won you'd accept my engagement ring and marry me?"

"Yes," she declared, with that reckless smile lingering about her pretty mouth.

Mitchell looked at her keenly. "I hope you're in earnest, June," he said. "For I am. Is it a promise?"

June gave vent to a light-hearted laugh.

"Yes, definitely it's a promise," she rejoined, "because you haven't a chance, Dan. I watched Tim Shayne drive the Brown Special this morning, and it's the fastest thing ever."

Mitchell wheeled towards Madison again, and at the same time June caught her father's eye and winked at him encouragingly.

Madison squared his shoulders. "Mitchell," he announced, without another moment's hesitation, "I'll take that bet. We'll both write out our cheques, and June will be the stakeholder."

June came down the stairs. Not for an instant did she suspect the consequences that were to arise out of that impetuous wager.

Foul Play.

A BIG touring car pulled into a thickly-wooded side road leading off the main Oakland to San Francisco highway. It contained three men —Mitchell, Spike Beldon, and a villainous-looking confederate.

Spike remained at the wheel as Dan Mitchell and the other man alighted. To the latter Mitchell spoke in an undertone.

"Tim Shayne will be covering this stretch in his sports single-seater at any minute," he explained, "heading for the starting-point where he intends to take over the Brown Special from Madison's mechanic. All you have to do is to go up to the brow of that hill and tip me off when you see Shayne coming. I'll be posted at the edge of the trees here, and I'll give Spike the word as soon as I get your signal."

The look-out nodded and ran to the brow of the hill Mitchell had indicated. The promoter himself stood at the junction of the side road and the highway, and was waiting there when Spike called to him from the tourer.

"Say, boss," Beldon mentioned, "supposin' Shayne dodges the crack-up. What are you gonna do then?"

"He'll crack up if you're smart enough to do this job the way I want it done," Mitchell retorted. "If you're not, I've still got a trick left in my hand. I've been in touch with Spud Rossiter, the mechanic working on the Brown Special, and I oiled his palm to the tune of a hundred dollars last night."

He turned his attention to the brow of the hill, and had not long to wait before he saw the look-out turn and wave his arm, then dart out of sight. On the instant Mitchell backed into the side-road and gave Spike Beldon the signal for action.

A high-pitched engine whine suddenly became audible on the highway—the whine of a light car travelling at top speed. Next second Tim Shayne hurtled into view in a bullet-shaped auto.

He was touching seventy in a dash to the San Francisco Speedway, from which the competitors were to set forth on a two-hundred-mile road race, following a course that would bring them back to the stadium and the finishing-point. Crouched behind the steering column and the segment of wind-shield that protected his face, he looked like some dare-devil demon symbolical of the cult for Speed.

With foot crammed on the accelerator and exhaust throbbing out the vibrant scream of the engine, Shayne flashed down the long hill, from the crest of which he had first been sighted. He was almost level with the side-road at the foot of the descent, when Spike Beldon drove out into the middle of the highway.

Tim Shayne slung round the steering-wheel madly and swerved to avoid the crash. Spike swerved, too, and wheel to wheel, crowded Shayne off the road. The race-driver's bullet-shaped auto seemed to leap from the highway, then plunged down an embankment, turning over and over in its wild career, and finishing up with its wheels to the sky.

Luckily Shayne had been flung clear, or he must have been pinned down and crushed by the weight of his machine. He was found by two passers-by not long afterwards, lying at some distance from the car, with both legs broken and his right arm fractured.

But he was conscious, and a pitiful moan escaped him as the two men who had found him tried to lift him from the ground.

"I'll get to the nearest 'phone and call an ambulance," said one of the men.

To the other, who remained with him, Tim Shayne spoke falteringly, giving out a brief message before he sank back in a dead faint.

"Shoot a wire to James Madison at the speedway," he groaned, and the man beside him took out pencil and paper.

An hour later, standing by the sleek, grey racing car known as the Brown Special, James Madison received that fateful missive, and as he read it his face blanched.

"Why, what's wrong, daddy?" asked June, who was beside him.

Without a word Madison handed the telegram to his daughter.

"Hurt in accident," she read. "Unable to drive.—TIM SHAYNE."

A familiar figure approached at that moment, and, looking up with dismay written on her lovely face, June saw Dan Mitchell. She held out the wire to him in that same stricken silence with which her father had passed it over an instant before.

"That's tough luck," observed Mitchell, when he had scanned it. "And no time to find another driver, huh?"

He glanced towards the starting-line, to which the entrants were already beginning to drive their cars, and June and her father looked at each other hopelessly—June because the horror of that thoughtless promise she had made was weighing on her mind almost intolerably.

She had given her word that she would marry Dan Mitchell if Pollard's Hayden

Special won the race, and, with the Brown Special out of the running, Pollard was a certainty for first place!

It was while June was facing this unforeseen and overwhelming dilemma that Bob Darrow reached the speedway. From the grand-stand he caught sight of the Madisons and Dan Mitchell near the starting-point, and he was making his way down the terraces when he was hailed by Pat Hooey, who, like himself, was off duty and in civvies.

Bob exchanged a few cheery words with the Irishman, and then continued his descent to the track. As he approached the spot where the Brown Special was standing he could not help noticing the Madisons' gloom.

"Hallo!" he said, coming up to June. "Is anything wrong?"

She answered him with an effort. "Oh, Bob," she told him, "Tim Shayne has been hurt—and there's no one to drive the Brown Special."

Bob did not realise the magnitude of the catastrophe.

"Why, that's too bad," he murmured. "But still, there will be other races, and—"

June interrupted him. Her father was close by, but Mitchell's attention had been diverted and was out of carshot.

"You don't understand, Bob," June said desperately. "Dad had a ten thousand dollar bet with Mitchell, and—and I agreed to accept an engagement ring from Mitchell if Pollard won in the Hayden car. Oh, I must have been mad, but I felt so confident about the Brown Special, and I never dreamed this would happen."

Bob was staring at her incredulously, as if he could scarcely grasp the situation.

"It's a promise I can't break," June went on tremulously. "I gave Dan my word in all seriousness, and if the

Spud Rossiter tried to stop him, but Pat tweaked him violently by the nose and then reached for a suit of overalls.

Hayden car wins I've got to go through with it."

Bob clenched his hands involuntarily, then all at once he turned from her and confronted her father.

"Mr. Madison," he said quickly, "I had some experience of racing before I joined the brigade. The excitement of it appealed to me until I got the idea for my fire-extinguisher, and I've driven in both track races and road races. If you'll take a chance on me, I'll pilot the Brown Special!"

Madison looked at him doubtfully for a moment, and was still deliberating when Dan Mitchell arrived back on the scene and discovered what was afoot.

"Let Bob drive, daddy," June urged. "I believe in him, and after all—he's our only hope of winning to-day's race."

Madison compressed his lips. Tim Shayne had told him that the speed of the Brown Special would be limited only by the nerve of the man at the wheel. Well, if Bob Darrow showed as much nerve in a racing car as he did in an outbreak of fire, he would be worth a chance.

"Go ahead, Bob," he said.

Loitering in the background, Dan Mitchell touched the arm of a man in overalls who was examining the engine of the Brown Special. The man was Spud Rossiter, and he lifted his head and slid a sidelong glance of inquiry at Mitchell.

"Refuse to ride with him," Mitchell said out of the corner of his mouth.

Rossiter nodded, and then, dropping the hood of the car with a clang as Bob reached for a suit of white overalls that Tim Shayne was to have worn, he called out to Madison in a harsh and rasping voice.

"Just a minute!" he grated. "I ain't ridin' in this car with any amatoor at the wheel. Count me out."

Madison exchanged a glance with Bob.

"I guess we're helpless, Darrow," he said gloomily; but the fireman was not of the same mind. Running towards the grand-stand, he located Pat Heeley and brought him back to where the Madisons stood.

"Pat," he explained to the Irishman, "I'm driving the Brown Special, and I need a mechanic. There isn't much about an engine that you don't know. D'you want the job?"

"Do I want it?" Pat cried. "I've got it." And with the words he began to clamber into the racing-car.

Spud Rossiter tried to stop him, but Pat tweaked him violently by the nose and then reached for a suit of overalls. Meanwhile Bob was talking to the Madisons, and assuring them that he would do his level best to win.

"I know you will, Darrow," said Madison, as Bob was peeling off his jacket. "But I may as well tell you that I've got a fortune at stake, and it's on the nose of that car."

"There's more than a fortune at stake, Bob," put in June, and on a sudden impulsively she stood on tiptoe and kissed him.

Before he could recover from his surprise she had turned and was running in the direction of the grand-stand, Bob gazed after her for a few moments, and then jubilantly began to don overalls.

Pat Heeley was similarly occupied when Dan Mitchell drew near Spud Rossiter and again addressed him in an undertone.

"Get busy," he snapped, indicating the car. "Fix it."

Rossiter gave him a look of understanding, and, spanner in hand, stooped beside the off-side front wheel. He had slackened off one or two vital nuts when Pat chanced to turn his head.

"Hey, youse," the Irishman rapped out, "what do ye think ye're doin'? I'm the mechanic on this car."

"I was only tightenin' up some screws," growled Spud Rossiter.

Rossiter slunk away. In passing Mitchell, he inclined his head meaningly.

Mitchell strolled off to join June, but James Madison lingered to address a few final words to Bob as the latter climbed into the Brown Special racing-car.

"Good luck, Darrow," he said. "We have seats booked in the stand, and we'll be watching you as you leave—and waiting for you to come in—first."

The Race.

THE starter was flagging the competitors individually and sending them on their way. Looking down from the grand-stand, the crowd on the terraces saw a big red racer slide forward to the line, a figure "3" painted on each side of its bonnet.

"That's Pollard," said Dan Mitchell, sitting next to June and her father. "No. 3—Hayden Special. He's got the race in the bag, June—and my ring or your finger—right now."

"I think you're wrong," declared June, with perhaps more confidence than she felt, and then followed the Hayden machine with her eyes as it stormed forward over the straight.

The next to move up into position was Number 7, the Brown Special, with Bob and Pat in the cockpit, and, as he paused by the starter and let the engine tick over with deep-toned throb, the young fireman at the wheel lifted his goggles and waved to June.

The signal was given, and Number 7 rolled forward. With engine-note rising to a full, thunderous roar as Bob nursed the gear-lever from "low" to "top," the Brown Special hurtled on her way.

Once round the track and then out on to the open road. This was the programme, and with bated breath and an unuttered prayer on her lips, June Madison watched car Number 7 till it was out of sight.

With the highway stretching away in front of him, and a string of rival cars ahead, Bob Darrow coaxed the accelerator and watched the speed indicator climb from sixty to seventy, seventy to eighty, eighty to ninety—up to the hundred mark and past it.

Masses of spectators were gathered at various vantage-points on the route. The long procession of flashing racers screamed past a knot of them on the rim of a hill and tore down a long declivity. A car numbered fourteen was leading, and Number Three was running fifth, but before another mile was covered Gus Pollard had forged into third place.

Ten miles from the starting-point the racers hit an ugly bend, but no mishap occurred there. Running sixth as he approached it, Bob Darrow negotiated it in a neck-or-nothing skid, slashed past a rival car almost broadside-on, and then straightened up to give the Brown Special the "gas." Over a three-mile stretch he kept her at the hundred-and-thirty mark and fought his way into fourth position.

Wind and engine-roar shrilled in his ears deafeningly. He felt as if he were battling his way through a terrific gale, a hurricane of hot air that burned his face with the concentrated force of its impact.

Ahead lay the worst curve in the route. Raking into the bend to challenge a car immediately in front of him. Bob was enveloped in a mad smother of dust that obscured the scene. Through that dust the torpedo-body of a gleaming racer was seen suddenly to leave the road and plunge to its ruin down a forty-foot embankment, hurling two mangled, human bodies from its cockpit.

Back at the speedway, loud-speakers were carrying intelligence of the race to the crowds which packed the stands. An announcer imparted news of the tragedy.

"Wreck at Hell's Corner," his terse voice came. "Will give particulars as soon as received."

Moments of breathless silence—and, for the Madisons, the agony of suspense. Dan Mitchell's anxiety was plain as well, though it sprang from very different sentiments.

"The wreck at Hell's Corner was Car Number—"

June's hand travelled to her heart.

"Car Number Ten—"

Meanwhile the race was being fought out at lightning pace. Gus Pollard's Hayden stormed into second place and then challenged Number Fourteen for the lead. At Redwood Cliff, where the road wound along the coast, the Hayden's stream-lined bonnet bored in front.

But the Brown Special was not losing ground, and Bob forced her past another rival. He was on a bend at the time, and two wheels were thumping on the rim of the precipice as he slammed the gear-lever from "top" to "third" and made the curve.

He was hardly past when the car he had beaten out of third place took a wild swerve to the left and dived over the cliff into the sea, with engine shrieking at top pitch.

"Car Number Three now leads the field," came the voice of the announcer at the speedway. "But Number Seven is coming up like a rocket—only fifty yards behind Number Fourteen now."

"Daddy, daddy," June breathed, "Bob's going to do it! He's—"

The announcer's laconic tones interrupted her.

"Third wreck of the race. Car Number Six jumped road and piled up in hay-rick. Driver and mechanic fortunately uninjured—"

Seven, Fourteen, and Three were now in a bunch. But wild driving by the man at the wheel of Number Fourteen held Bob Darrow in check, and Pollard in his Hayden began to increase his lead steadily, putting a mile between himself and his nearest challenger.

Bob awaited his chance, and, when it came, slipped through to take second position in masterly style. Next moment the Brown Special was beginning to lop yard after yard from the Hayden racer's advantage.

The news came through that Bob Darrow was gaining, and, up in the grand-stand, Dan Mitchell scowled darkly. He had imagined that by now Spud Rossiter's last-minute handiwork would have taken effect. Had the fool bungled in his attempt to cripple the car?

Rossiter had not bungled the job, but Pat Heeley had interrupted him ere he had slackened off those nuts to the extent that he had intended, and only now was the strain beginning to tell on them.

It was not Rossiter's handiwork that threatened to spoil Bob Darrow's chances of victory, however. For, speeding along the home course at something over a hundred-and-thirty, he and Pat suddenly became aware of a fierce heat playing on them.

"Begorra!" yelled the Irishman, in a voice that was almost drowned by the engine-roar. "She's on foire!"

He was right. A trail of flame lined the sleek form of Car Number Seven. The wind drove it along the gleaming body and swept the cruel, lurid tongues into the cockpit to blister driver and mechanic. A whirling stream of smoke wrapped the red-hot exhaust pipes and enveloped the racer's two occupants in strangling clouds.

"Car on fire!" shrilled the voice of the announcer at the speedway. "Car Number—Car Number Seven!"

Bob drovo on grimly. He could see Pollard's Hayden just ahead of him, and soon the Brown Special was clinging to its tail. Another mile and the speedway would be reached, the track circled for the last spurt to the finishing-line!

Number Seven crept up on its rival. Wreathed in flame and scurrying fumes, it moved abreast, held its position quivering for thirty desperate seconds, and then stole ahead.

"Cars Number Seven, and Three approaching the track—"

The masses in the stands rose as one. Tension and excitement were at fever-pitch, but the sentiment of June Madison and her father was anxiety. The Brown Special was on fire, and the two men in its cockpit were in peril of their lives!

"Number Seven is blazing, but her driver is staying the course. Number Seven takes the lead!"

The cars thundered on to the track.

and a simultaneous cry arose from a hundred thousand throats as Number Seven stormed into view, with fire and smoke beating back into the faces of driver and mechanic.

The Brown Special slackened momentarily as Bob's foot eased up on the accelerator. Flames were rising through the floor-boards, searing his legs. He was in agony, and out of the corner of his eye he saw that Pat Heeley was sinking lower in his seat, half-stupefied by the pain of his burns and the wild smother of smoke.

Gus Pollard's Hayden pushed level, and, skidding on the banking of a bend, regained the lead. But next instant Bob had crammed his foot on the accelerator again, and, hitting the straight, he fought abreast once more.

The stands were in an uproar, but Bob did not hear the din of shouting, and scarcely heard the dual scream of the engines. His brain was reeling. He was driving automatically now, his tortured body obeying the fierce resolution of his iron will.

Then suddenly his mind grasped the fact that something else was amiss. A vicious drag on the offside front wheel told him that another danger had been added to the peril of the flames.

Spud Rossiter's handiwork was beginning to reveal itself, had Bob but known it. But he only knew that the racer was threatening to leave the straight, and his hands clenched on the steering wheel like grim death.

Fifty yards in front of him Bob saw the checked flag fluttering in the hands of the official at the finishing-line, and he forced the last ounce of power out of the Brown Special. Number Seven moved ahead, rocking crazily, but making certain of the lead.

Ten yards in advance of Pollard's Hayden, it crossed the line in a stream of smoke and fire, and the checked flag signalled Bob's triumph with a flourish as a vast throng rose in one mass and cheered him frantically.

Up in the grand-stand, James Madison wheeled towards the discomfited Mitchell.

"Well, Dan," he said, "I'm afraid we've won, and your—"

He never finished the sentence. The cheering ceased, and was succeeded almost instantly by a shout of horror, a shout that almost drowned the shriek which sprang to the lips of June.

For, immediately beyond the line, the offside front wheel of Number Seven came adrift, and next moment the Brown Special swept round in a mad spin and crashed near the fencing of the track.

The car could be seen lying on its side amidst a welter of dust and black smoke, with lurid tongues of flame belching from it.

Mitchell looked at Madison and saw that his face was ashen hue.

"Yes, Madison," he said hoarsely. "your Brown Special won—and killed Darrow."

(Don't miss next week's enthralling episode of this thrilling serial. By permission of the Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.)

A few more miles to go

The flavour lasts—British made

A FEW more weary miles to go before there is a halt for tea. Now is the time for Wrigley's. The delightful flavour of Wrigley's Chewing Gum will buck you up—will refresh the mouth and take away the parched feeling.

And Wrigley's "after every meal" will aid digestion and cleanse the teeth.

In two flavours—P.K., a pure peppermint flavour; and Spearmint, a pure mint leaf flavour. Only 1d. a packet, but the finest quality money can buy.

EL 24

"SMART MONEY."

(Continued from page 12.)

ing. "You've got class. That's what I like about you. You know, I think you're about the prettiest little thing I've ever seen—and the sweetest!"

A shudder seemed to pass through her. She could not bear to hear him talking like that, when her conscience was telling her that she was a coward and a traitor—a traitor to the man who had done so much for her.

"Nick," she told him dully, "I'm not what you think I am."

"What, not sweet?" he cried. "Now, don't tell me; I know. Nick used to be a sugar-taster." He laughed, and: "Say, look at this! Something I got for you." And he pulled out a jewelled bracelet and snapped it on her wrist.

"I can't take it, Nick," she faltered. "Oh, yes, you can!" he told her. "And what's more, before long I'm goin' to give you a ring for that third finger of yours. But what's the matter?" he added with sudden concern. "Honey, you're shaking like a leaf."

"I—I'm all upset to-night, Nick," she said, and even as she spoke there was a sudden uproar in the salon below.

Nick seemed to stiffen, and then, wheeling, he darted to a small, concealed trap-door and lifted it. Beneath him he saw men and women running in a panic as the district attorney and his minions burst into the room. He saw tables overturned, gambling paraphernalia wantonly smashed by the representatives of the law. He saw Jack in the grip of a plain-clothes man, fighting like mad to free himself.

Nick whipped round. "It's a raid," he said to Irene. "You stay right here."

And with the words he dashed through to his office with the intention of destroying all incriminating papers in his desk.

Irene rose to her feet slowly. Tears were glistening in her eyes, and her under-lip was quivering. She opened her handbag and took out a folded sheet of paper. Then she moved towards a clothes-stand on which Nick's overcoat was hanging.

With a hand that trembled she slipped the folded sheet of paper into an inside pocket.

Evidence.

IT was only after he had lost his jacket and bruised both knuckles with a considerable amount of hard punching that Jack managed to escape the attentions of the plain-clothes man who had seized him.

At the top of his speed Jack raced to the head of the staircase, turned sharp to the left along the landing and then hurled himself at the door of Nick's private sitting-room.

As he flung it open and lurched across the threshold he saw Irene at the clothes-stand—saw her in the very act of thrusting that folded sheet of paper into the inside pocket of Nick's overcoat.

She had turned her head quickly as Jack had plunged into the room, and now, as her eyes met his own, Jack detected the guilt written on her face. Pausing in the doorway, dishevelled, breathless, he remained motionless for a spell, and, while pandemonium continued to rage in the salon below, he looked at her in mute accusation. Then all at once he closed the door behind him and moved across to her.

"I thought so," he said, his lip curling scornfully. "It was you who let those coppers in. You dirty little stool-pigeon!" And he took his hand across her cheek with a sting that left a red weal.

"Oh!" she cried sharply, stumbling back, and in that same instant a pantherish figure leapt from the adjoining office.

It was the figure of Nick, and he was white with rage. He had turned in time to see the blow struck, without realising the reason for it, and in a bound he was between Jack and Irene.

"What's all this about?" he rasped, gripping hold of Jack and drawing back a clenched fist.

Jack clutched him by the shoulder.

"Lay off, Nick," he said earnestly.

"She's framing evidence on you!"

"Ah, you and your suspicions—"

"She's fram'in' you, I tell you!" Jack blurted. "She put somethin' in the inside pocket of your coat. Look for yourself."

Nick glared at him and dipped into the garment. He glanced at the folded sheet of paper and then thrust it back.

"Hub, nothing but a racing-form, you smack-off!" he blazed. "And you struck her, eh?"

A fit of ungovernable rage seized Nick. He lashed out at Jack, his bunched knuckles battering into the younger man's face. Jack cannoned against the wall and Nick pounced on him, hitting at him with both fists.

"Lay off, Nick, I tell you!" Jack panted. "Quit it, will you? I'm trying to steer you straight—tryin' to steer you straight—"

A savage blow to the mouth cut short his protests, and his temper flared up.

"Hang you, Nick!" Jack ground out. "I'm goin' to let you have it!" And he rushed blindly.

He had the reach, but in Nick's stocky form there was a reserve of strength which more than counter-balanced that advantage. Nick broke the attack and took the offensive again, hammering fiercely, connecting at last with a terrific jolt that swept Jack off his feet and hurled him to the floor.

His head struck the "surround" of parquet with a sickening smack, and he lay still, with arms wide-spread. And in the very instant of his fall the door was flung open and District Attorney Black stepped into the room with three or four plain-clothes men.

"Come on, Nick," Black said quietly, "let's go down-town."

"What for?" snapped Nick, glowering at him. "You got nothin' on me. I'm just a guest here, like a hundred others. You can't hang anything on me. I don't own this place—look up the deed in the County Recorder's office. All I own here is what I've got on."

One of the detectives went to the clothes-stand and took Nick's overcoat. From a chair into which she had sunk miserably, Irene watched the man remove it from the hook, and there seemed to be an agonised expression on her face.

"It's hot and stuffy in here, Nick," said the district attorney. "Let's take a walk."

The detective came over from the clothes-stand with Nick's coat and held it open for him.

"H'm," Nick mused. "You got good manners for cops, you guys. All right," he added, with a laugh. "I'll oblige you, for all the good it's gonna do you."

The district attorney leaned forward before the coat could be donned, and he took something that was protruding from the inside pocket.

"So all you own here is what you've got on, eh?" drawled the D.A. "Then, in that case, you've got plenty."

"That's nothin' but a racing form," Nick retorted.

The district attorney smiled.

"You probably don't know that there's an old Blue Law that classifies a racing form as gambling paraphernalia," he observed. "That same law makes possession of one punishable by a six months' gaol sentence. I didn't know it myself till just a few days ago, but I know it now—and so do you. It's a law that most of us have forgotten."

Nick's eyes blazed. He realised all at once how he had been tricked and "framed," so that he could be put away for six months while his gambling-ring was systematically broken up.

Round he wheeled, and started for the bowed figure of the girl in the chair. But before he could reach her the district attorney and one of his men had seized him.

"You dirty double-crosser, you!" Nick raged. "You—"

"Say, what's the matter with this fellow?" came the voice of a detective who had come upon the still form of Jack.

Nick turned his head. "I socked him," he said between his teeth, "and I'm darned sorry! He didn't have it coming to him."

"He's unconscious," observed the 'tec. "Let's be going, Nick," said the district attorney. "I—"

"Wait a minute!" It was the voice of the detective stooping beside Jack. "This fellow ain't unconscious. He's dead!"

Nick blanched. "What's that?" He suddenly tore free and rushed to where his friend lay. "Jack—Jack!" he cried. "Jack, I'm talkin' to you! Jack!"

He lifted the dead man's head, and then he understood. There was a pointed door-stop screwed into the floor, and Jack, in his fall, had struck it just between the neck and the skull.

Someone drew the little barber to his feet. Like one in a trance he heard the voice of the district attorney, a voice which betrayed Black's feeling of awe.

"It looks like manslaughter now, Nick—"

Nick turned slowly and looked at the girl who had betrayed him.

THE GREATEST GAME ON THE FINEST "HOME" BILLIARD TABLE

13/3 DOWN

brings prompt delivery of the 6 ft. size Riley "Home" Billiard Table to rest on an ordinary dining table. You pay the balance by easy instalments. Cash Price £11 15 0. 7 days' Free Trial allowed, and Rileys pay carriage and take all transit risks.

32 FREE

Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

Riley "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables, in various sizes and styles, are also offered for cash or easy terms. Send for Free Art List, describing them. Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Gt. Britain.

E. J. RILEY, LTD., Howard Works, ACCRINGTON, and Dept. 35, 147, Aldersgate Street, LONDON E.C.1.

"So you gave me the works, huh?" he muttered vaguely.

"Yes, Nick," she moaned, "I did. But I—I didn't think it would be for anything like this. I've always been a little coward. Oh, Nick, could you forgive me?" And all at once she was raked with a fit of sobbing.

Nick drew back and made a gesture with his hand.

"That's all right, Irene," he said in a toneless voice. "I've always been a sap with women. Come on, Black, let's go!"

The trial was over, and Nick was about to take a train journey—up the river at the State's expense.

A little party of friends and reporters were gathered to see him off, and as he was moving towards the steps of one of the railroad cars Nick perceived a black, shiny face amidst the group.

The faithful Snake Eyes came forward, carrying the cage that contained Nick's favourite canary bird, Blondie.

Nick glanced at the detective to whom he was handcuffed.

"Are you sure I can't take her along with me?" he asked.

"Not a chance," was the answer. "No blondes where you're going, Nick."

"Well, I got a rabbit's foot heah, boss," suggested Snake Eyes; but Nick shook his head.

"Nothing doing," he stated. "You gave me one of those once before. Here's the way to bring me luck, Snake Eyes." And he rubbed his palm over the negro's woolly pate.

He was moving on when he saw the figure of a girl near by, and once again he paused.

"Hallo, Marie!" he called.

The girl drew near him.

"I suppose I should be glad you're going up, Nick," she said with a catch in her voice, "after the way you treated me. But I'm not. I came down here to laugh in your face, and—I can't! A sob broke from her. "You're a swell guy—and I deserved what I got!"

"Oh, that's all right, Marie," Nick told her. "I'm sorry the way everything turned out between us. Here"—pushing some money into her hand—"buy yourself a box of candy. You know, I can't eat it—it gets in my teeth."

He laughed whimsically, and was laughing still when the cry of "All aboard!" went up.

"Any final statement, Nick?" a reporter shouted, as the gambler and his escort climbed into the car.

"Sure," was the answer. "You tell my public I've put close clippers on a lot of other fellows, and now I'm going to find out what it's like myself. Say, I wonder how I'll look with that monkey hair-cut they give you up there."

There was a general laugh, and then a photographer pushed his way to the fore.

"Hey, Nick," he suggested, "how about a picture?"

"All right. Just a minute. I'll tell you when." The little barber straightened his tie. "Go ahead."

The camera clicked, and the detective who was to escort Nick to the penitentiary tugged his prisoner's sleeve.

"So long, Nick," called a Press man. "See you in seven years."

Nick turned half-round as he was climbing the steps of the Pullman.

"Seven years?" he grinned. "I'll bet you two-to-one I'm out in five!"

(By permission of Warner Bros. Pictures, Ltd., starring Edward G. Robinson and Evalyn Knapp.)

"THE LAST RIDE."

(Continued from Page 20.)

one of Brady's colleagues from the station. A nod from the boy, and quickly brushing away the tears that dimmed her eyes, the girl flew to him and almost flung herself into the haven of his arms. "Oh, Roy, dear, to think you escaped those brutes. But how—how—"

"A darned near thing, missy." Brady shrugged his shoulders expressively. "If I hadn't thought to have this place watched to-night Master Roy would have got his as sure as eggs are eggs. But I had a feeling he'd be wanting me this evening—we were working together in this little stunt of his, as I believe you know—so I came along with a car load of the lads. And we struck lucky. Out came the kid with those killers, and we soon nabbed the lot. Got the dope on them proper then, and on Piccardi, too. Safe to shoot the brute when he was threatening the woman."

But Roy and Doris were paying him no heed, for they were clasped in each other's arms, gazing rapturously into each other's eyes. Brady grunted disgustedly as he became aware of their inattention, and his colleague chuckled. Then the wizen-faced little detective touched the boy's arm.

With a start Roy swung round and blushed as he saw Brady grinning at him. Then the detective jerked a thumb imperatively towards the door.

"Best be getting along, Roy," he mentioned. "This is no place for that girl—revenge has been exacted, and there's that story to do for your paper. The smashing of Piccardi and his gang, like you told me you hoped to do. Gee, kid, it'll make fine reading, huh?"

Roy nodded, and with his arm about Doris' waist he led the girl from the room, followed by the heartrending sobs of Lita Alvaro as she mourned over the dead body of Piccardi, whose reign of brutality and terror had at last been crushed.

(By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Dorothy Revier, Charles Morton and Tom Santschi.)

(Continued from page 2.)

Noah Beery as Host.

When Noah Beery is not at work at the studio he is usually to be found playing the genial host at his Paradise Mountain Trout Resort. There he dons old corduroy trousers, a flannel shirt and a Stetson hat, and is then ready to welcome his friends. He is always glad to have them call, and extends them the glad hand, a cheery smile. In his latest picture, "The Millionaire," to be released later on, you will once again see him playing the "bad man."

Tom Tyler's First Film Lessons.

Among cowboy heroes Tom Tyler still has after a number of years a good following among picturegoers, and there are many of you who will by now have seen him in his recent release, "West of Cheyenne."

It may not be generally known that this popular actor once tried to learn film acting through the post. Tom Tyler was in his teens when this curious idea possessed him. He had seen advertised in some magazine that for quite a modest payment each week he would receive a correspondence course. All he had to do then was to study the lessons at home in front of his own mirror, after which he would be sent a certificate of proficiency, and then film fame would be his for the asking.

Well, it seemed easy and tempting enough, and for weeks Tom saved up and bought the lessons. But neither what he learnt nor the certificate which duly arrived helped him a bit. Casting directors placed no value on the instruction he had gained in this way, and for three years he tried studio after studio without getting even a bit in a crowd.

Then one day Tom Tyler's perseverance secured him a beginning. He was asked to make up as a Red Indian chief. So in paint and feathers he appeared before the camera, and years later attained his ambition of being famous in films.

But he smiles now when he thinks of what he expected to gain through those correspondence lessons in acting.

FILM NOVELS YOU SHOULD NOT MISS!

"SALLY IN OUR ALLEY."

The enthralling drama of a girl who was the life and soul of an East End coffee-shop, and of a lover who wished her to think he was dead, because he had been badly injured in the War. A tale of mean streets, but very human beings.

"THE FLOOD."

Not caring whether she lived or died, a girl is rescued from a threatened flood by a young engineer. Happiness results until the first man comes back to haunt her life. Then the waters burst through the banks, and— A gripping drama, starring Monte Blue and Eleanor Boardman.

"THE SPELL OF THE CIRCUS." EPISODE 1.

Intrigue, mystery and romance beneath the big tops. A vivid and gripping drama of the same ring, starring Francis X. Bushmen, Albert Vaughn.

Don't

“

The News Reel

(Continued from page 27.)

The Strangest Village in the World.

At the back of the huge buildings which enclose the sound stages of the B.I.P. Studios at Elstree stands a collection of structures which would give a casual observer much food for thought, were it not evident that they are part of the neighbouring buildings where films are made.

The houses built therein consist, for the greater part, of one wall only, that is the front wall, which in the majority of cases is merely a thin coating of plaster on three-ply wood. These walls are shored up at the back by timber, which is cunningly placed so that no evidence of them is visible when walking along the "streets."

The first thoroughfare that one enters on is a reproduction of a street in Port Said, complete with a tramway which would be the joy, if not the pride, of any municipal council. This particular "street," which contains about twenty different shops, stores, steamship offices, etc., is a reproduction of an actual street existing in Port Said, which will appear in Alfred Hitchcock's next picture, "Rich and Strange." Actual scenes were photographed in Port Said for this film, but it was necessary that certain important "close-ups" should be filmed at Elstree, and therefore this particular spot was reproduced in all its detail at the back of the Elstree Studios.

Five yards farther on and we enter a partly enclosed stretch of sand, whose walls obviously indicate the corner of a bull ring. The transition from Egypt to Spain, passing an English rustic bridge en route, is amazingly sudden, but one gets used to these things in the film industry. The bull ring "set" was seen in the Stanley Lupino comedy, "Love Lies," interspersed with some remarkable real life exterior shots of bull-fight scenes actually photographed in Spain.

From the bull ring we turn half-right and find ourselves confronted with five or six houses that might be seen in any typical London street. Macadam road and grey pavement are wonderfully realistic, even to the most critical eye, and yet both have been made out of the studio carpenter's best friend, three-ply wood. The houses themselves are four stories high, complete with glass windows, genuine front doors, with the usual knockers, bells and letter-boxes. One instinctively looks for signs of life behind the curtained windows, or milk bottles standing on the doorsteps as evidence of human residents of such realistic-looking buildings.

One of these houses has obviously suffered from serious fire, for the windows are missing, and the front of the house has that incurably desolate and stained appearance resulting from the blackening smoke and the water from the fire brigade's hoses. Such is the London street constructed at Elstree for the scenes in "The House Opposite."

An acute observer could see in the vicinity the remains of Flanders trenches, and farther over in the same field stand the smouldering remains of an English water-mill; relics of former British International Productions.

This is a rough description of what could be rightly termed—the strangest village in the world.

Getting Dad into Pictures.

You have seen Chester Morris in pictures, and in "The Gang Buster," Jack Oakie's new comedy, you will see Chester's dad, William Morris, playing a big part.

"It took more than a year of constant persuading on my part," said Chester, "to get dad out to Hollywood and into pictures. You see, dad has been more than forty years on the stage, and veterans of the stage are not always keen to leave the footlights. They think that acting before a camera cheapens their art. However, after I got a foothold in pictures, I persuaded dad in coming to pay me a visit. He came and just mooched around, said the climate of Hollywood was grand, but that he couldn't stand doing nothing.

"Those long waits in the studio, which every artiste has to experience, nearly drove him crazy. Then he was offered a part in Bert Lytell's picture "Blood Brothers," and because he was bored he accepted it. Well, he got much more salary for that than he ever had on the stage, and now he loves pictures. He's Hollywood to stay."

Hollywood's Circus Specialist.

"Everything from a trained flea to a five ring circus." This is the slogan of A. W. Copeland, who is recognised as Hollywood's official circus provider for the films. Copeland was at one time an acrobat, but found that there was more money to be made by establishing himself in a line of business which was not overeroded.

Not only does he supply the animals required, but he furnishes all the props, and can obtain as many as a thousand people to fill the big circus tent. All this saves producers a deal of worry. But as circus pictures are not always being made, Copeland does not wait for Hollywood to engage his services. He sends out circuses to tour the States while keeping an organisation in readiness in Hollywood.

Answers to Questions.

For reasons of space, Clifford (Aberdare), I am obliged to give only two of the casts you mention, but don't hesitate to write again. "Racing Hearts": Agnes Ayres (Virginia Kent), Richard Dix (Roddy Smith), Theodore Robert (John Kent), Robert Cain (Fred Claxton), Warren Rogers (Jimmy Britt), J. E. MacDonald (Martini), James A. Murphy (Racing Driver), Edwin Brady (Pete Delaney), Fred J. Butler (Burton Smith), Robert Brower (Horatio Whipple), Kalla Pasha (Mechanic). "Lure of the Wild": Jane Novak (Agnes Belmont), Alan Roscoe (James Belmont), Little Billie Jean ("Cuddles"), Richard Tucker (Gordon Daniels), Pat Harmon (Polcon Dufresne), "Lightning" (Laddie Boy).

Ramon Novarro and John Boles are both very popular without a doubt, Thomas (Widnes), but when you ask me to express my opinion of their singing in order of merit, you must think, my boy, of the brickbats that would be hurled at me by picturegoers who disagreed. But to tell you something of Ramon keeps me on safe ground. Born in Durango, Mexico, on February 6th, 1899, he displayed his vocal ability from an early age, and sang not only in his bath but everywhere else. His talent led him to the stage, and later he made his first big screen hit in "The Prisoner of Zenda." His latest picture is "Son of India." Sure you can write again. One more letter won't do any harm.

GROSE'S, LUDGATE CIRCUS, LONDON.FOOTBALL JERSEYS

All Colours and Designs.

15/- per doz. British Made.

Send for Illustrated List. Post Free.

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge St., London, E.C.4.BE TALLER!

Increased my own height to 6ft. 3 1/2 ins.
STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—
A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist,
SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back!
Amazing Course, 5/- Send STAMP NOW for Free
Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road,
London, N.W.2.

BE STRONG

I promise you Robust Health, Doubled
Strength Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1
Course adds 10 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms) also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-Control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-—STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

HEIGHT INCREASED.

Complete course 5/-. Clients gain
1 to 5 ins. Particulars, testimonials free—P. A. CLIVE, Harrocks, Colwyn Bay, N. Wales.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 6/-.
Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A.
STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d.

(Abroad 1/-) including Airport,
Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W.A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

GROW TALLER!

ADD INCHES to your height.
Details free.—JEDISON, 39,
BOND STREET, BLACKPOOL.

Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.
Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad, 11/- per annum;
1/-; and for South Africa: Central News Agency,
S.G.

Boy's Cinema

"SUBWAY EXPRESS" and
"THE LONESOME TRAIL."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 616.

EVERY TUESDAY.

OCTOBER 3rd, 1931.

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"The Flying Fool."

Vincent Floyd, Henry Kendall; Marion Lee, Benita Hume; Morella Arlen, Ursula Jeans; Michael Marlow, Wallace Geoffrey; Jim Lanzer, Martin Walker; Madame Charron, Barbara Gott; Hicks, Charles Farrell.

"Subway Express."

Police-inspector Killian, Jack Holt; Kearney, Fred Kesley; Dale Tracy, Eileen Pringle; Edward Tracy, Alan Roscoe; Paul Borden, James Robards; Herman Stevens, Sidney Bracey; Mason, Selmer Jackson; Mrs. Cotton, Ethel Wales; Mr. Cotton, William Humphrey.

"The Lonesome Trail."

Judd Rascomb, Charles Delaney; Sweetheart, Ben Corbett; Teuderfoot, Jimmie Aubrey; Gila Red, Monte Mantague; Martha, Virginia Brown Faire; Rankin, William McCall; Enoch Crabb, George Berkner; Oswald, George Hackathorne; Mau In The White Sombrero, William Von Brincken; Sheriff, Lafe McKee; Slim, Art Mix.

Our Grand Annual.

No reader can afford to miss the first handsome copy of BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, which is on sale at all news-agents and bookstalls, and can be had for the very small sum of six shillings. In this wonder book you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting things as Film Making, Life Stories of Famous Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and all the big pictures of the year. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen full-page plates of Famous Stars.

In a nutshell, the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book for the ardent film fan.

Teaching Dogs to Act.

There are few men better qualified to speak on "How to bring up a dog to be an actor" than Rennie Renfro. For it is he who trains most of the canines used in Hollywood's "talking dog" productions.

Renfro has a dog farm near Hollywood. There he keeps a collection of hounds of all varieties, among them being his two famous stars, Buster and Oscar. There is one kind of dog, however, which does not appeal to him for his work. That is the thoroughbred. Not one is to be found among the hundred canines in his collection. He believes the "mutt" dog, as he calls the other type, to be much easier to work with in a company of different dogs without becoming excited.

"The first step necessary in training dogs for pictures," says Renfro, "is to pick the smart dogs from each litter. By a 'smart dog,' I mean one who shows more general intelligence and nervous organisation than the others. It is possible to judge this by looking

October 3rd, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

ROBERT WOOLSEY

in

"EVERYTHING'S ROSIE."

"Doc" Droop has stood in many market-places — without a licence — selling quack medicines, when a little waif named Rosie followed him out of town and insisted upon being adopted. Years afterwards, when a lover for Rosie had appeared on the scene, Doc was charged with theft and thrust into jail, while Rosie was bundled into a home. But Doc was resourceful, and in the end everything became rosy — for Rosie.

"UP FOR MURDER."

A cub reporter accidentally kills his boss during a fierce quarrel, and the sentence of the court is — death! Read of a girl's sacrifice to save him. Starring Lew Ayres and Genevieve Tobin.

ALSO

The sixth episode of our thrilling serial, starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley:

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

a pup in the eyes. There is a certain alert fire and gleam denoting possibilities that can be brought out in training."

Mr. Renfro begins his teaching after the pup is two months old. First comes simple tricks, such as sitting up, crawling, rolling over, and so on, all of which serves as a foundation for more difficult stunts at later stages. Intensive training follows when the dog is about six months old. He is taught to walk on his hind legs, open doors, pick up different objects and other tricks. The most important of these is the movement of the jaws in response to a hand signal.

For example, when making "Trader Airedale," a skit on "Trader Horn," one dog used for the part of an African savage did not know any mouth movements. So Mr. Renfro had to teach him for several days before filming began. This is what he does. First, he massages the animal's jaws so as to make them supple, then gently opens and shuts them. In time the dog gets to know that when the command "speak" is given by a hand signal to move his jaws as though talking.

The dogs not able to learn this trick are given a bit of toffee to chew while the filming is being done. Then they move their jaws sometimes more than is required. Patience and kindness are essential in teaching a dog tricks. Frightening the animal by cruelty will do no good at all.

Thanks to His Nose.

There is at least one actor in Hollywood who has reason to be thankful for a broken nose. This is Stanley Fields. He was at one time a professional boxer and had made quite a name for himself with his nose in perfectly good condition. Then he met Benny Leonard, retired lightweight champion, in the ring, and as a result of that boxing match Stanley Fields found his nose quite out of joint.

Fields, however, decided to make the best of a bad thing, and trading on his battered nose he entered vaudeville in partnership with Frank Fay. For eight years the two played before the footlights until the coming of the talkies dealt a severe blow to variety and threw numbers of artistes out of work. Frank Fay went to Hollywood and soon obtained parts in pictures. Inspired by his partner's success, Stanley Fields followed him.

There again his broken nose helped him. Norma Talmadge was so impressed by his ferocious appearance that she signed him to play the part of the gunman in her first sound picture, "New York Nights." Fields made such a hit in this picture that Al Jolson next engaged him to play as "Pig Eyes," a tramp, in "Mammy." Paramount has since used him as the menace in "Street of Chance" and "Ladies Love Brutes." Stanley Fields has now a featured player's contract, and his other films include "Dangerous Paradise," "The Border Legion," and "Manslaughter."

Quick Rise to Fame.

Fate has a strange way of dealing with those who seek film fame. There are hundreds of artistes in Hollywood who began years ago to climb the ladder to success and are still nowhere near the top. Lew Ayres, however, is among the specially blessed.

About a year ago he was a novice and unknown. Now, at the age of twenty-three, he is among the stars of the cinema firmament and with a brand new five-year contract. He began work recently on "Heaven on Earth," will ap-

(Continued on page 23.)

A young English detective swears to get a murderer within a week and a battle of wits follows with a desperate gang of crooks. A mysterious and beautiful young girl becomes involved in this grim story of crime. Starring Henry Kendall and Benita Hume.

The Challenge.

"MORNING, James. A pint of your best and brightest Burton, and step on it as I've a thirst I wouldn't sell for thousands!"

The speaker was a lanky, sprawling young fellow in check plus-fours. Strong clean-shaven features, a thatch of thick brown hair, powerful shoulders, a fine physique, and yet he looked only half-awake.

Vincent Floyd was something of an enigma to those who thought they knew him. His age was twenty-eight, he had plenty of money, was very fond of sport, always seemed to enjoy life, and he did everything in a hurry. He would tear down to Walton for a game of golf in his sports racing car, then would charge back to Hendon and go flying for an hour, land and tear away somewhere else for a game of squash, and finally finish with a night club. And yet he always seemed rather bored with life.

"Too much money, that's his trouble," was what his friends and enemies thought, and would have been surprised to learn that his wealth consisted of four hundred a year. But Vincent was well off, and the reason was "work," and hardly a soul knew this or what was his particular form of obtaining money.

Vincent was lounging in an armchair of the Terrace Club on the London Embankment, and his chief thought at the moment was beer.

A young man in a blue suit came into the room.

"Fancy seeing you here at the hour of eleven o'clock, emuna!" cried Jim Lancer, a friend in whom Floyd confided more than anybody else. "Not playing golf?"

"I've knocked the cover off the ball down in the Surrey Hills," came the happy answer. "Started soon after breakfast. Jim, I've developed an appalling hook."

"Swinging the club round the body or too much right hand," decided his friend. "Having hacked up the course, you're drowning your sorrows in drink?"

"Nothing of the sort." Vincent did not move from his lolling position. "I'm searching for a—" He stopped suddenly, and Jim saw his friend give him a warning glance. The butler had appeared with the beer. "Thanks," drawled Vincent, and then when the servant was out of hearing shot out a remark that shook Lancer. "I'm searching for a murderer."

"W-w-what's that?" gurgled his friend since schooldays. "Did you say murderer?"

"Yep, you know my hobby." Vincent sat up and took a deep draught of ale. "Ah, that's the stuff! Marlow knows his goods. I've let you into one of several of my small doings and you've been very useful at times. Just as well to keep in with a big noise at the Croydon airport, and it may be that you can help me this time. At the moment I'm working on shreds, but they're patching up."

"I haven't heard about any murder," came the puzzled question. "Are the Yard keeping—"

"Not so loud with your yards," warned Vincent Floyd, and dived his hand into his pockets. "Take a squint at these."

Many a time Jim Lancer had been startled by the deeds of his dare-devil friend. He was one of the very few who knew Vincent was one of Scotland Yard's ablest investigators. But the glinting necklace fairly startled him.

"Why, those are—"

"Lady Angela's sparklers," came the cool reply. "Got those last night."

"You were here last night and slightly binged, old top," Jim reminded him. "I was surprised to see you so bottled."

"Maybe I wasn't quite so binged as you thought," Vincent said quietly. "One can appear to drink and yet not drink. Many a full glass I've parked under my chair or out of a window. At any rate, I got 'em last night, and they're my first big clue to the murder."

"What murder?"

"Ever hear of James Hirst?"

"Hirst—Hirst?" Jim frowned. "Yes, I did somewhere. I remember—he was a detective who came over from America, and then something happened."

"Yep, disappeared; he was one of Pinkerton's best men." Vincent finished his beer. "Marvellous stuff to get the brain busy. He was found drowned a week ago. Yes, Jim, drowned in the Seine, on the mud flats near those underground sewers. There was no evidence of violence, but we know he was murdered. What's more, old boy, how did it happen that Hirst should disappear in England and his body turn up in the Seine? That is the problem in a nutshell. Those sparklers I associate with the bunch who caused Hirst's death. Sounds easy, don't it? Join me in another beer?"

"No, thanks, Vincent." The Croydon official got to his feet. "I just popped into the club to see if there were any letters. By the way, didn't you promise to meet Morella this morning?"

Vincent Floyd clapped his hand to his mouth in a typical schoolboy gesture.

October 3rd, 1931.

"So I did. The balloon will certainly go up now." He banged a bell. "Gee, I must have another beer to get my strength up! Now to think of some tale. My uncle in Norfolk is ill. No. One of my dogs has the mange. No. Important business affairs. Poor excuse. I went to the wrong meeting place. A poor lie. I—"

Jim's vigorous shake on his arm brought him to a stop. Someone had entered the lounge.

Morella Arlen was tall, sweeping and very haughty. Her hair was brown, but clever work at beauty parlours had made it almost blonde; her figure and carriage were perfect, her clothes the latest word, and her age not more than twenty-five. Society knew and approved of Morella because of her beauty and her brains. She knew everyone and every place, but should she go to some low night club she went not so much for the fun as to tell her world of her experiences. She never did anything that Society would disapprove.

The glance from her blue eyes and the slight lift of pencilled eyebrows made Jim Lancer give his chum a quick glance. Morella was in a bad mood.

"Morning, my dear, I hope this fine morning is to your liking?" Vincent beamed good humour. "You're looking remarkably well, Morella."

"More than I can say of you," was the sharp answer. "Are you aware that you arranged to meet me at Barings this morning?"

"Oh, bless my soul!" Vincent frowned. "I have some recollection of a fur coat, but surely I never promised—"

"You said you would be there at eleven, and it is now half-past." Morella studied a small diamond wrist-watch. "I rather imagined that you might be here." Her sensitive nostrils quivered as she gazed at the beer tankard. "Thirsty so early in the morning? I should have thought that after last night you—"

"Well, I'll be getting along," hastily interposed Jim Lancer, not liking the signs. "Ring me up some time, Vincent."

"It may be pretty soon," Vincent grinned. "I want to pop over to Paris soon. So-long, old boy."

"Well, have you nothing to say?" Morella tapped her heel impatiently. "Why did you not keep the appointment, and what is your explanation of last night's disgraceful conduct? Don't deny it, Vincent, because I heard all about your excesses."

"Oh, Morella, I wish you wouldn't be so hard." Vincent looked dismal. "I did not forget this morning, and I rang up the stores to say I had urgent business."

"Urgent business!" Morella gave a scornful laugh. "You who have never done a stroke of work in your life to talk of business! I got your message and I guessed the rest. You came here to drink."

"The beer is mighty good." Vincent started to grin, then saw her frown and subsided. "There were some shares, stocks and stuff, had to meet my broker, and talking is thirsty work. But this afternoon, darling, I could manage—"

"I am going to Hurlingham this afternoon," was her answer. "Michael Marlow is taking me. You had better ring me this evening some time. A little more of this treatment, Vincent, October 3rd, 1931.

and our engagement will be definitely at an end."

"Oh, but Morella darling, I—" Vincent tailed off as the lady left him. He stared after her. "I wonder if I should be dreadfully upset if she did break off our engagement? Let's read the racing news, more interesting. So she's keen on Marlow. Ah, ha, the plot thickens!"

Some five minutes later Vincent looked up as someone paused by his side. A well-groomed man in a morning coat. Dark, suave, with bold, sparkling eyes. Spanish or South American origin and a great favourite with the ladies.

"Good-morning, I trust your head is better this morning?"

"Hallo, Marlow. I was going to send for you." Vincent got to his feet and his face was one large smile. "You've just missed Morella. I want to tell you how good the beer is, and also to have a little talk. Busy?"

"I am. Is it of importance?" Marlow asked, and his tone implied that nothing Floyd said could ever be of any great matter.

"Yes." Slowly the big fellow withdrew his hand from his pocket. "Ever seen these pretty little things?"

In a moment Marlow had changed from the suave proprietor of the latest type of modern club into a thin-faced, slant-eyed man, whose eyes gleamed balefully and whose fingers were crooked as if he would claw the other's face. His whole body was rocking with the effort to control a terrible spasm of rage.

The light in the eyes died down and Michael Marlow became once more the polite official and kindly proprietor.

"Pretty, where did you pick them up? Off my floor?" he asked, but his eyes were watching.

"I reckon you've got time for a quiet talk, Marlow." Vincent Floyd was no longer smiling, and his voice was dangerously quiet. "Those jewels came out of your safe, and I want to talk to you about them." He took Marlow's arm. "Lead me to your den of iniquity."

"The pleasure is mine." Marlow showed no sign of perturbation.

The Challenge.

THOSE who saw Marlow and Floyd strolling through the lounge of the Terrace Club thought how friendly the two men seemed. Some even went so far as to whisper:

"Floyd is a good customer! No wonder Marlow is friendly! You should have seen Floyd last night—oiled up and no mistake. A fellow like Floyd ought to be made to work!"

Whilst there were other criticisms, mainly from keen sportsmen:

"Fine three-quarter—plays a clean game! I've never seen a man hit such a long ball! Do you remember when he was at the Varsity—how he won everything, including the heavy-weight boxing? If Floyd had to work he would make a name for himself!"

Little did they guess that Vincent Floyd was one of the most valued men at Scotland Yard, and that most of his indolent attitude was a pose that had deceived many a criminal.

In the privacy of Michael Marlow's private sanctum the two faced each other, Floyd amused and Marlow smiling apparently good-naturedly. The proprietor bowed his guest to a chair, and then walked across to the safe in the wall.

Vincent lit a cigarette and watched him, and his eyes were mocking until Marlow straightened his back—when they became very much alert.

"You are an enigma that interests me," coolly stated Marlow. "Might I ask how you obtained possession of that necklace? Of course I deny ever having seen it before, and have invited you here because I feared that last night's—"

"Binge," prompted Floyd. "You would like to say that the fumes of many quarts of priceless alcohol have changed a rather pleasant young man into a muddled owl. I suggest that we put our cards on the table, and—he patted his pocket—"let us talk like friends, and—"

"May I offer you a cocktail?" Marlow picked up a shaker. "I can assure you it is not poisoned or drugged."

"An admirable idea." The big athlete sprawled in his chair. "Only a mild one, please. Now, Mr. Marlow, I presume you would like to know something about me. Why I have taken this sudden interest in your affairs?"

"You interest me." Marlow poured out two drinks with a steady hand. "For some while I have not been altogether satisfied with your attitude. For instance, you are much too clear-eyed this morning after your potations of last night." He raised his glass. "Here's fun."

"May we have plenty of it before we're through," was the retort. "Many think I do nothing, Marlow, but I will lay my first card on the table, and tell you that I am attached to Scotland Yard."

"One of those terrible amateur sleuths?" mocked Marlow.

"You've said it." Vincent sipped his drink. "Good stuff this, almost as good as your beer. Another card is the robbery at the home of Lady Angela. The Yard suspect that a bright little gang, recently arrived from America, which they had made too hot for them, have had a hand in this robbery. The methods were similar to those of New York, and the finding of the necklace in your safe is fairly conclusive evidence. As a thief of international fame I presume, Marlow, you have few equals?"

"With equal frankness, may I say that you honour me." Marlow watched Floyd with twinkling eyes. "Perhaps I have not always run exactly according to law. Now that you've found those jewels, what do you propose to do? You will find no finger prints on them, and I can produce witnesses to—"

"Swear you are as innocent as a child." Floyd chuckled to himself. "I could run you to Vine Street, but you might get away with it, and such a course would hinder my main object. Lady Angela's necklace was not my chief reason in wasting so much money on liquor—by the way, I poured most of it away. A scandalous waste, but needs must on some occasions."

"You relieve my anxiety." Marlow drained his glass. "Might I ask what other robbery you have fastened on to me?"

"I hinted that you had found the States too warm for you. So warm that it was necessary to quit! America was most annoyed about it, but determined to have a shot to get you back. Does the name of James Hirst mean anything?"

Again Michael Marlow changed to a narrow-eyed scoundrel, whose hand was near his pocket, but the pat that Floyd gave his pocket restored the man to the calm demeanour of a moment before.

"You have heard his name?" Vincent Floyd blew out a cloud of smoke. "Hirst was a Pinkerton's man, and he got on the trail of his quarry; yet soon after his arrival in England, not so many weeks ago, he disappeared."

"They never found him. Very sad—" and very curious. You suspect foul play?"

"Oh, yes, there was foul play right enough." Floyd's eyes seemed accusing. "Hirst disappeared in England, and the Yard were perturbed, because they knew he was on your—pardon—the gang's trail. He had only given the Yard the briefest statement over the 'phone of what he knew. Then he disappeared."

Marlow asked sharply:

"Well, has he turned up again?"

"Oh, yeah, as you say!" Vincent's smile hid his thoughts. "His body was found in the Seine on a mudbank—three days ago."

This time Marlow showed no vestige of surprise—just cynical amusement.

"You are not seriously suggesting, Floyd, that I murdered this man, are you?"

"I have no proof yet, but I think I'm on a very good trail." The athlete lifted himself to his feet. "What's more, I'm willing to wager that I'll have that murderer under lock and key within a week."

"You are clever, my friend, and very frank." Marlow shrugged his shoulders. "I should think the waters of the Seine must be very unpleasant. You know I might be inclined to take your wager. I am a born gambler, and I usually win."

"A gamble against a hangman's rope," Vincent Floyd stubbed out his cigarette. "If you lost, Marlow, you might not be able to pay the wager out. Think that out."

"I will," Marlow opened the door. "I have a habit of removing things from my path—especially when they annoy me."

"Do I annoy you?"

"I trust you won't be conceited when I admit the fact," Marlow smiled. "It is not often that I am bluffed; it makes me terribly angry. I want to square accounts."

"You'll pay your account right enough," growled Vincent Floyd. "Guess I'll go and consume some more of your excellent beer. Be seeing you soon—behind bars!"

"Maybe you won't laugh when you do," thought Marlow as he stared after Floyd, who was calmly whistling and not even glancing back. "If you do!"

The Fainting Girl.

AFTER consuming half a pint of beer Vincent ambled over to a call-box, and was soon talking to Jim Lancer.

"What's that? Just arrived at Croydon? You must have been going some! I say, Jim, can you let me know all about your jolly old machines because —"

"Are you wanting to go to Paris again?"

"Yep, I am and all," Vincent laughed gaily. "Why the suspicious growl, O Fat One?"

"You've been over to Paris too much lately, and that's one reason why Morella is so angry. It may be your husiness, but you can bet she thinks there's some other reason."

"She would, but, all the same, I'd like to go." He jotted down various times and, when he had checked them, concluded: "I may want to book a berth some time to-day, but should Morella talk about Paris to you, remember to act your normal self—just dumb. 'Bye!'"

As Vincent lounged out into the main hall he became aware of a small group of people clustered round a bench. One servant in blue livery held a glass of water.

"Stand back! Stand back! Give the lady air!"

"Hallo, a damsel in distress," decided Vincent, and craned his neck.

He saw a slim girl, very white of face, dressed in neat, dark coat and skirt, small felt hat, apparently on the point of collapse. Vincent watched as she tried to sip the glass of water.

From his pocket Vincent produced a small bottle—a very strong restorative that a medical practitioner had made up for him—the mixture was a lightning cure for morning after the night before!

One sniff made the girl jerk back her head; eyes that almost seemed to express indignation stared up into his. Then the girl—she could scarce be twenty, gave a faint smile.

"I feel better now." Her voice was soft and rather sweet. Obviously she was well educated. Vincent was of opinion that she was distinctly good-looking. He liked the small nose, dark hair and perfect features—a faint colour stole into her cheeks and she lowered her eyes.

"Sudden change in the weather," Vincent suggested. "How do you feel? You stay quiet for a bit and then I'll get a taxi."

"Oh, I'm much better," the girl answered quickly. "I've been on my feet since daybreak, and I've been so busy I haven't bothered about food. I sort of forgot about eating." The girl stood up and revealed herself as tall, slim and graceful. "Oh, I feel quite recovered now. So stupid of me to faint—a thing I've never done before."

"You'll take a taxi straight home." Vincent was quite decided.

"I've got to call somewhere first," was her reply. "It's in this street. I'll go home afterwards."

"Have you far to go?"

"Number thirty-six."

"Thirty-six," Vincent stared at the girl in astonishment. "But thirty-six is next door, and the place is empty."

"Thirty-six was the number." She smiled timidly at the staring onlookers. "Thank you all so much. I'm so sorry I fainted on your doorstep."

"They wanted to put the case on the roof of this cab and take it away. You've got to stop 'em—I want to know what's inside it," said Vincent.

Quietly a figure stole up to watch the little scene. It was Michael Marlow, and his small moustache hid the ghost of a smile.

"I'll see you to the street," announced Vincent in a determined manner. The other members turned away—the incident was apparently at an end. "Are you sure you haven't made a mistake?"

"The number is thirty-six." She smiled shyly. "Don't bother about me, please. I'm quite all right."

At the door of the club she held out a gloved hand.

"Good-bye!" The girl spoke firmly. She did not require his assistance any further.

"Good-bye!" blurted out Vincent. He watched the girl go down the steps, scratched his chin, then resolutely turned his back. Why should he feel such an interest in this young girl? Why had he not insisted upon getting a taxi and seeing her home?

"A chance to become friends and I neglect it," he murmured as he scowled at the club notice-board. "What the blazes does she want to go to number thirty-six for? I'll see if she has made anyone hear."

Cautiously Vincent walked the few steps to the front door and stepped out on to the stone steps leading to the main entrance of the Terrace Club.

The girl was standing before the door of number thirty-six, and was actually letting herself in with a latch key. Even as he gasped over this baffling incident she opened the door and stepped inside. Vincent ran down the club steps and gave the empty house, with its broken and shuttered windows, a keen look-over. The front door was half open, and he glimpsed for a moment a bare, dusty hall and stairs; before the door closed noiselessly he had seen two figures coming down the stairs. Men with caps over their eyes and dressed in dark suits.

Boldly Vincent walked up to the door of number thirty-six and tried to peer through the keyhole. He would have liked to have knocked, but could think of no good excuse. He decided he had better go back to the club before a lot of inquisitive pedestrians formed themselves into a crowd.

Reluctantly he walked down the stone steps and stood rubbing his chin and staring.

Obviously the place was empty, although there was no "To Let" sign pasted on the windows. The place had caused several of the members to complain, as it was an eyesore in a stylish neighbourhood. There was a rumour that the owner wanted too big a rental. Yet this queer girl had a key! Perhaps she had an order to view?

Then he almost leaped in the air. He had heard a sharp scream of fear.

Vincent ran up the steps and thundered his fists on the closed door.

Michael Marlow had hastened back to his room.

"Curiosity killed the cat," he chuckled softly. "I wonder if it will get young Floyd?"

Swiftly he put on a dark overcoat and picked up a felt hat, then he rang a bell and a sleek man-servant appeared.

"Deliver this letter at once to Miss Morella Arlen," were his orders. "At once—you will find her in the main restaurant having coffee with some friends."

When the servant had gone, Marlow walked over to what looked like solid wall. He pressed a hidden spring and a panel slid back on oiled wheels.

Beyond was the dirty, dusty hall of number thirty-six.

October 3rd, 1931.

The Mysterious Packing Case.

VINCENT hammered on the door. A click and it swung open. A pasty-faced, dirty-looking ruffian in an old brown suit and a filthy felt hat stared at Vincent from narrowed eyes.

"Hi! Hi, mind our door!" he grumbled. "We ain't deaf."

"What's going on here?" demanded Vincent. "A young lady came in a few moments ago. I heard a cry for help."

"Ho, did yer!" The fellow sneered. "Honest-to-goodness folk live here, and they can't make a sound without nosey-parkers shutting in! The stairs ain't too good, and maybe you heard someone slip on a loose board—or maybe it was just your imagination. Guess you're making a mistake."

"I'll come in and look round." "You'll do nix of the sort," was the answer, and then a big, burly fellow appeared by the speaker's side. A typical water-front tough, with cauliflower ears and a great red face. "Bill, this guy thinks he heard a scream," said the first fellow.

"He'd better take the air. Had a drop too much, mate?" growled the big man. "Come on, Sid! We gotta move that box."

"You run along and tell your mother all about it," jeered the man called Sid, and slammed the door in Vincent's face.

He retreated down the steps. Impossible to break into the house—and quite probably there were other customers like these two. If ever he had seen two ruffians, he had seen them in this old house. Why were they there? He had not overlooked the presence of Marlow when the girl had fainted, and he wondered if that arch-scoundrel knew anything about this house.

"Something fishy going on." He paced slowly up the road. "I wouldn't mind staking a level quid that those bright lads are some of Marlow's gang—the chaps who helped him in that Lady Angela business. Have I got enough evidence to persuade the Yard to give me a search warrant, and, if I go away, will the birds have flown by the time I get back? I might 'phone from the club, and—"

His murmurings died away. A taxi had drawn up before No. 36.

The front door opened, and the two men that Vincent had seen came down the stone steps. They spoke to the driver, who got out. They appeared to be discussing the roof of the taxi, at which they kept gazing from time to time.

"What the blazes is up now?" ruminated Vincent.

He was not long kept in doubt, because the two men went back into No. 36, and a few moments later reappeared, carrying a huge packing-case. Sid and Bill carried the front portion, whilst two other pleasant-looking ruffians supported the end of the case, which was over seven foot long, about three foot broad, by two in depth. It was evidently very heavy.

The men had just got the case to the pavement when Vincent strolled up.

"Hullo!" Sid nudged the big fellow. "Here's little Willie again! What yer want now, Nosey?"

"What's inside that case?" "Grape fruit." Sid's remark made the other men guffaw.

"Well, I'm not swallowing them," Vincent holdly walked up to the box, by which two of the men were standing. He did not see Bill and Sid wink at each other.

The amateur detective passed his hand down the wood and rapped with his knuckles.

"Come in!" Bill chuckled. "I dunno what's coming to this country. Why is he at large? He's a danger to the public."

"Reckon he's escaped from some place," Sid cried. "Come on, boys, get the case on the roof. We ain't got too much time. Now then, Nosey, stand back—unless you want a punch on the jaw!"

"Are you going to give me one?" Vincent strode up to Sid, over whom he towered. "One flip from my fist, and you wouldn't have so much to say: What's in that case?"

A policeman came leisurely along the street, and quickened his pace when he saw that trouble was evidently brewing.

"What's going on here?" demanded the man in blue.

"Officer, you see that case?" cried Vincent. "They wanted to put it on the roof of this cab and take it away. You've got to stop 'em. I want to know what's inside that case!"

"He's talking out of his hat!" Sid explained, in an aggressive manner. "That there box ain't got nothing what would interest him inside of it. We got orders to come here and take that case away, and all the while this guy keeps badgering us. If you likes to take a look, constable, you'll see it's marked fragile. I dunno, but I reckons it's one of them valuable foreign mummies, or maybe glass. We ain't got to drop it on no account. We'd be obliged if you'd ask this gentleman to pass on. We're in a hurry."

"Fraid I can't do anything, Mister Floyd." The policeman had often been inside the Terrace Club, and knew Vincent as a somewhat eccentric sportsman.

The four men proceeded to lift the case to the roof of the taxi, whilst Vincent tried to argue with the rather stupid police-constable.

"Officer, why can't you demand to know what's inside that case?" he said. "I'm pretty certain some dirty work is going on here. They came out of a deserted house carrying that case. Why can't they be burglars?"

"That house ain't deserted, though it looks it." The constable stared at No. 36. "It was sold a month ago, and that gentleman"—he pointed to Sid, who smirked—"is the new owner. Took over about a fortnight ago, didn't you, sir?"

"Quite right—quite right!" Sid waved his men into the taxi. "We'll be getting along, sonny boy!"

"Ask 'em where they're taking that case!" raged Vincent.

"Croydon air-port for France, Nosey!" shouted Sid from the window. "Anything else you want to know? I'm thirty-two, got a wife and two children, and—" His sally caused much mirth. "Would you like to come and call some time, sonny boy?"

Even the policeman had to smile. He waved them off, and the taxi-driver shoved in his gears.

Floyd stood there with clenched fists, watching the taxi drive away, with Sid and Bill waving their hands to him.

"I'm sorry, Mister Floyd, but I couldn't say anything to them." The policeman shook his head. "If they chooses to cart cases like that about, it ain't none of my business."

"You'd be a sergeant if you made it your business," snapped Vincent. "But I'm not beaten yet."

Up the steps into the Terrace Club he ran, and at once got himself put through to the Croydon air-port.

"I want to speak to Jim Lancer." An interval that seemed like hours before his friend answered, with a:

"Hullo! Who's that speaking?" "Vincent Floyd. Jim, is there a machine going to Paris in about an hour? Not down on any schedule?" A pause. "There is a specially chartered machine? Is there a vacancy for a passenger? What's that? One only? Hold it for me—I'm coming right along. 'Bye!'"

Seconds later his car was speeding south to Croydon.

Scarcely had Jim Lancer finished talking to Vincent Floyd when Morella Arlen came through on the 'phone.

"I've heard dreadful news about Vincent," came her angry voice. "You know he's been going to Paris quite a lot recently—and do you know why? He's a drug fiend! I've thought for some while it might be something like that. Yes, I've got proof." Morella did not say it was Michael Marlow who had supplied the information. "And has Vincent rung you up to-day? He is going to Paris? You must try to stop him, Jim. We must keep him away from these drugs—they will kill him. You promise you'll do your best? All right. I'll come down to the air-port at once."

The Prisoner.

VINCENT FLOYD made good time down to Croydon—half an hour before the machine for France was due to start. The sight of an ancient taxi made him smile. He would deal with those gentlemen some other time. First he must get his ticket.

Now Floyd was often at Croydon, and he knew all the little tricks of the game. Many of the officials and staff knew him, though the clerk in the office was apparently a new man. Vincent had just got his ticket when a buzzer went and the clerk went to speak on the 'phone.

The passage booked in the name of Vincent Floyd was cancelled.

"Excuse me, sir." The clerk was worried. "Didn't you say your name was Floyd? May I see your passport for a moment? There's been a slight mistake."

"My name's not Floyd—it's Lloyd," blandly answered the detective. "And I should just hate to have a name like Vincent. I think it's going to be a nice crossing. 'Bye!'"

Vincent left the office before the clerk could quite make up his mind what to do. Floyd declared that, after locating the 'plane, he would lurk around in dark places till just before starting time. Who the dickens wanted to stop him going to France?

It was therefore a distinct surprise when he noticed Jim Lancer nosing round the aerodrome as if he were looking for someone. Vincent decided not to show himself; he did not like the watchdog look on his friend's face.

Then a few moments before time of departure a car drove out and Morella appeared. He managed to get close enough to hear what she said to Jim.

"Where is he?"

"Can't find him. My clerk, a new man, reports a tall man in plus fours something like Vincent, but the name given was Lloyd. There is a Lloyd crossing this afternoon, but —"

"Can Vincent have guessed we're trying to stop him?" cried Morella. "Oh, Jim, what can we do?"

"The 'plane's being watched by two of my lads." Jim took her arm. "I've left the seat in his name because I can't monkey about without due reason; don't want the company on my trail. But those two lads will see that Vincent doesn't get on the 'plane leaving at one-thirty, or on any other machine."

"Is that so?" Vincent slunk back into hiding behind some crates. "I'd like to know why dear darling Morella wants to stop me. Some crazy idea, I expect. Ah!"

The exclamation came from him as he saw the big packing-case being loaded on to a passenger cross-Channel machine. The four thugs carried the case as if it were very precious.

Vincent had a pretty good idea that two hefty mechanics lounging near the machine were Jim's men.

At last the packing-case was on board and various officials and passengers appeared. Vincent decided to dive back into cover.

Not until he heard shouts and orders did he show his nose, but on the word "Contact" he hared towards the machine. The two mechanics heard him and turned, but he did a ruggier swerve and gave an easy miss. The 'plane was on the move and the cabin door was on the point of closing when Vincent clutched a rail to run alongside. He dragged open the door and stumbled inside into the arms of a steward.

"Name of Floyd!" panted Vincent. "Only just made it!"

"Mr. Vincent Floyd?" The steward touched his peaked cap. "That was a close shave, sir. Your seat is along this way, sir."

Vincent sank into an armchair and mopped his brow. He gazed out of the glass windows and saw the ground sliding away below. He wondered what Jim was saying to his two hirelings. Idly the young detective turned to scan his fellow-passengers.

The machine was one of the latest models, divided into fore and aft cabins. Vincent shared the aft cabin with an unenviable assortment. There was Bill and Sid, the other two rascals, and three men whom Vincent decided were also of the gang and—

The girl who had fainted and had gone into No. 36 was also in the cabin. She was gazing at him with eyes large with fear. Her face was ashen white and she seemed about to cry out.

"Well, this is a pleasure," began Vincent, and paused because something hard was tickling his ribs.

"There's a gun agin yer side," snarled Sid's voice. "One shout from you and it goes off."

"Has it got a silencer?" Vincent smiled as if he did not care in the least. "I'm sure it has." He waved his hand towards the packing-case that was standing on the floor of the passenger cabin. "I hope you haven't got bombs inside that?"

"Can it, Buddy!" came a threat. "We ain't in a mood for laughing, and you ain't in a position that's too healthy."

"What a nasty rough man," gurgled Vincent, and suddenly caught the man's gun hand, whilst his left banged a nasty jab to the chin.

Like a flash the whole cabin leaped on Vincent and he hadn't a chance. He opened his mouth to yell for help when a life-preserver crashed down on his skull and he sagged back a limp heap.

"Back to yer seats!" hissed Bill, and raised Vincent so it seemed as if he were sleeping. "That steward may be back any second. If he gets wise we gotta get him."

The steward looked in and asked if anyone required anything to drink, but the passengers all looked so glum he hastily retired.

"Shut the door," Sid motioned to Bill. "Give us the wire if that "I swore I'd get the murderer of James Hirst," Vincent cried. "Down in that cell I found a message from Hirst and a Pinkerton badge—enough evidence to make you swing, my dear Michael!"

"Thank heavens, you're safe!" she gasped. "There's no time to waste as the water will soon be over this grating!"

steward comes back. Now, boys, open the case."

Seals were cut, two padlocks unfastened and rope dragged off, then Sid undid a lock and lifted the lid.

Inside lay the form of a man in a smart overcoat.

Michael Marlow was speedily helped out of his prison.

"Our little trick worked like magic." Marlow went across to the limp figure. "Help me search Floyd. I want his passport."

All this while the girl had crouched in her seat, staring with agonised eyes at what was proceeding. Her mouth was half-open as if she were going to scream, though in her fear she knew that such an action would mean sudden, swift death.

It was a simple matter for Marlow to remove the photograph of Vincent Floyd from the passport and substitute a picture of himself.

"Shall we pitch him out, boss?" asked Bill.

"Don't talk like a fool!" Marlow gave a nasty laugh. "I haven't finished with our friend yet. Put him in the case and fasten it up quick. When you've done that we'll ring for the steward. Myself and Miss Lee would like some tea, wouldn't you, Marion?" "Thank you," the girl managed to say.

Marlow smiled. "A dash of brandy won't do you any harm. Bill, you sit in Vincent's chair, because you're not unlike his build. I don't suppose that fool steward will notice any difference. If he does, then he'll get a ride without a parachute. Get slippery with fastening down that case."

The Writing on the Wall.

ON the floor of a stone cell lay the prostrate figure of Vincent Floyd.

There was a bruise on his forehead, and a thin stream of clotted blood had dried on one side of his face. He was so still that the girl, who had been admitted by a big, heavy-faced Frenchwoman, wondered if he were alive.

"You can have ten minutes, cherie," winked the woman. "And remember, we go halves in all you get."

"I won't forget."

October 3rd, 1931.

When the door had closed the girl knelt beside Vincent Floyd.

"Hallo!" drawled the apparently lifeless body. "What's the game—going through my pockets?" Vincent had opened his eyes and was grinning at her.

"Thank heavens, you're not badly hurt." The girl turned to glance towards the closed door. "We must speak low—she may hear us. I thought you were dead when I first looked at you."

"I was pretending to be." Vincent scrambled to his feet with the aid of the girl. "Didn't know what to expect, and thought it better to look dead. Now, young woman, are you friend or foe? You should be a foe, as you got me into this mess, but somehow I can't quite get used to the idea of you being a wrong 'un."

"My name is Marion Lee, and I was mad on dancing. A misguided friend introduced me to Marlow, and he took me into his show. He has places in London, New York, Paris and all over the world. London was all right, but Paris was different. This cellar is below the Chat Noir."

"On the hill of Montmartre—a pretty spot," murmured Vincent. "The ladies are a swift lot of hussies."

"I wouldn't mix with them, so Marlow made me his secretary." The girl sighed. "I entertained his friends, and after a while found what sort of a man he was. But I was in his clutches. He swore to frame me if I breathed a word. Always they watched me, and I had no one who could help. I was taken to London to deal with the correspondence of the Terrace Club, and I worked in a room upstairs. Marlow made me do that fainting business in the hall, but if I had known the real reason then I would never—"

"You found out, when you went into number thirty-six?" asked Vincent. The girl nodded. "And you feared to give the alarm on the cross-Channel 'plane?"

"That would have meant certain death for both of us. Alive I might be of service to you. I laughed and danced when you got here, and that bluffed them; finally I persuaded Madame Charon to let me see you, on the condition that if I could get you to pay out any money, she should have a half share."

Dim light streamed through rusty bars, and Vincent drew the girl nearer so that he could see her face. For a long time he stared into the dark eyes, but they faced him bravely.

"Yes, you're telling the truth," was his verdict. "Well, I'm a Scotland Yard man, and I'm after Marlow."

"Guessed that," admitted Marion. "But what has Marlow done that he should want to murder you?"

"Murdered another poor 'tec. Hallo!" His gaze roaming round the stagnant, crumbling walls of the cell had seen something. "What's that writing?"

"I've never seen it before." Thoughtfully Vincent Floyd studied the letters, and then a glad cry escaped his lips.

"It's a code." He pointed. "See that word—Knnj—well, add the next letter after each one. After K comes L, after N an O, then another O, and finally after J comes K—that spells L-o-o-k—look." Quietly he did the other three words, and his eyes gleamed. "The two top words spell James Hirst, whilst the word next to 'look' is Zanud, or, translated reads as 'above.' James Hirst wrote his last message on that wall, and he wants us to look above."

"Was Hirst the murdered detective?" "Found in the Seine near here a few days ago," Vincent was staring at the cobwebbed roof. "Where they'd like to put me if I give 'em the chance. Ah, I see the clue. May I lift you up—there's something stuck in the plaster."

Easily he lifted the girl, and then the two were staring thoughtfully at a badge—Pinkerton's.

"Madame will be back any minute," spoke the girl. "What can I do to help you?"

"Take this badge and get in touch with Scotland Yard. Tell them I'll bring the murderer of James Hirst in before the week's out. Tell them about this badge and don't lose it. I don't want any help at the moment, but the Yard is to be ready for quick action and to watch all ports, especially airports. Tell them about the Chat Noir and Marlow, but they are not to act unless they hear nothing from me after twenty-four hours. The man you want is Colonel Gardner. Have you got all that, Miss Lee?"

"Yes, but your life is in danger." She clung to his arm.

"I've been in worse scrapes than this," from the heel of his shoe, which slid back, he produced some notes. "Here is some money—you'll need it. You'll have to give madame her share. I—"

"Madame is knocking for me," whispered the girl. "She is coming in here."

"Okay; watch me go dead." Vincent suited the words by flopping on to the stone floor.

Madame made a stare at the still figure.

"He looks mighty queer," she mumbled. "Did you find any money, cherie?"

"Here you are." The girl passed over some notes into clutched fingers. "He's doped, so you needn't worry about him."

Arm in arm with the cackling and villainous old Frenchwoman she left the cell, and not till the door had clanged did Vincent Floyd show any signs of life. Then he moved to the bars of the cell and shivered a little as he spied the muddy waters of the Seine.

Marlow's Vengeance.

IN a filthy underground cellar of the Chat Noir Michael Marlow prepared to deal with Vincent Floyd. All round were wine and beer casks, and the atmosphere was stale and musty. A table and two comfortable chairs had been brought down from the restaurant, and on a tray were bottles and glasses.

A rap on the table brought madame. "Bring in our worthy friend."

"Very good, m'sieur." The old hag disappeared, and Vincent Floyd, a little ruffled and dirty, marched firmly into the presence of his captor, who seemed surprised at his alert appearance.

"I understood, my dear Vincent, that you were rather ill?" he said. "I'm glad to see you so much recovered."

"We 'tees are hard nuts to crack," Vincent beamed. "What's the latest? How about a spot of torture?"

"Ratlier mediæval," was the answer. "The other day you put your cards on the table, and I always like to return a compliment."

"Ah, this sounds interesting," Vincent said quietly, taking in all details of the cellar. "Do I ask questions, or do you prefer to tell the tale in your own way?"

"In my own way." Marlow flicked a speck of dust off his immaculate dress trousers. "Let me tell you what has happened since your trip from England. I guessed your fatal curiosity might lead you into my trap. I was inside that case, and you were placed inside, after we had secured you. I took your passport, and it was all quite simple, my photo inserted in place of yours. You were brought to the Chat Noir in Montmartre and given a comfortable bed in one of my rooms."

"Cut out the heavy sarcasm and come to the point. I hate the smell of the Seine."

"You were drugged and remained unconscious for a day and night," Marlow proceeded, with evident enjoyment. "Now I had informed a certain lady, Miss Morella Arlen, that the reason of your repeated visits to Paris was drugs, and she thinks you are a drug addict. On arrival here I put through a long-distance call, and told Morella that I could prove my statement about drugs. She flew over, and about six hours ago had the pleasure of viewing your inanimate form—I laid you on that bench there. There is a small puncture in your arm, and she saw that. I rather like Morella, and she likes me—we understand each other. She was disgusted, and washed her hands of you for good. She is staying in a near-by hotel, and will shortly return to London after—"

Marlow paused. "After you have disposed of my body," blandly hinted Vincent. "So you've stolen my beautiful Morella," he went on. "Frankly I think you've done me a favour, old boy. Morella is a very domineering woman, and you may be the biggest villain in the world—but you won't boss her! I am not sorry the engagement is at an end, though I should have preferred some other method of disentanglement."

"It doesn't really matter, because I've got to get rid of you," Marlow smiled at this cold-blooded statement. "You know what happened to Hirst. Well, I have a more refined method, and it is as follows: You will be doped with gas, then drugs inserted into your body, and lastly you will be lowered through that trapdoor." He pointed to a huge ring in the floor. "And your body will be placed on the mud—at low tide. Some time later you will be found." Vincent Floyd, drug-fiend, found drowned in the Seine. So simple, is it not?"

"Jolly little scheme! Phew!" Vincent indicated the glasses. "I'd love a spot before the programme commences, as I'm not feeling like knocking a house down."

"Certainly, let me help you!" Marlow had one hand in his pocket, and from this he produced a gun. "Sorry to have to take this, but you are apt to be violent." He placed the gun on the table. "Would you mind standing back a little way? Thank you."

"I've learnt that Hirst shared the same cell as myself." Vincent saw Marlow start. "I found evidence he had left behind, so I know who was his murderer."

"Pity you will have no chance of using your knowledge," sneered Marlow, passing a glass. "Well, here's fun!"

Vincent took the glass and drank half of the whisky. He sipped a little more, swayed uncertainly and clutched at his heart.

"I feel terrible," hoarsely cried Vincent. "I believe you've drugged me again, you swine!"

"I've done nothing of the sort!" cried Marlow, and was just in time to catch Floyd as the latter sagged forward, a dead weight in his arms. The crook laughed. "The poor fool is scared stiff, and thinks I doped him. I'll get the boys to bring him round, and—"

Suddenly the limp figure stiffened, and steely arms gripped Marlow. The surprised scoundrel was suddenly flung away from the table, and when he recovered his balance he turned to find Floyd on his feet. In his hand was the gun.

"I swore I'd get the murderer of James Hirst before a week," Vincent cried. "and I'm going to do it! Down in that cell I found a message from Hirst and a Pinkerton badge—enough evidence to make you swing, my dear Michael."

Marlow's face had for a few moments depicted rage and chagrin, but now he assumed his old rôle.

"Very clever, my dear Vincent," he drawled. "For the moment you have the upper hand, but I always win in the end. Besides, you've found out a little too much, and one of us has got to visit another world."

Marlow had set one of his men on the stairs leading down to the cellar, and he knew that the gang would be warned at once of what had happened. Behind Floyd a door opened, and a man gently slid into the cellar. He crept towards the unsuspecting detective, and two other men—Sid and Bill—came after the first crook.

"I don't feel like trying the next world yet," Vincent retorted.

"No more do I," Marlow agreed with him. "And I still think that I hold the trump cards."

In an instant Floyd became suspicious—his enemy was too confident. Some instinct of self-preservation made him turn, and as he did so a sack came down over his head.

The Bentley shot over the cliff like a streak of light—

The gun was snatched out of his hand as Bill and Sid flung themselves on the detective. He managed to flatten out one ruffian with a hefty punch before they got him pinned down across the table. Several more of the gang had appeared, so that five were holding him down.

"Take away that sacking," ordered Marlow. His face was gloating with triumph. "Not quite so clever as you thought, my dear Vincent! And now for the final act." He beckoned, and a man came forward with a mask, a cylinder and various tubes. "We are going to give you a mixture of chloroform and ether first, then another gas that will keep you under for several hours. Then you will be placed on the mire of our beautiful sewers to await the tide. Good-bye—sorry I can't shake hands with you, old boy."

"You murderer!" yelled Vincent, struggling desperately. "If I could get free I'd wring your neck."

"I'd rather not," Marlow motioned to a white, flabby-faced evil little man of Slavonic origin. "Doctor, your patient!"

Struggle as he might, Vincent could do nothing. Soon the nozzle was over his mouth, and then everything went black.

The gang stood away, and Marlow surveyed his victim.

"The syringe," he ordered. "I'll fill him so full of cocaine that it will leave no doubt. In half an hour take him down into the sewers."

The drug had been injected, and the final dose of gas administered when Marlow donned hat and coat.

"I'm flying to England within the hour. You stay here, and don't bungle this business," were his crisp orders. "In a short while place Floyd on the mud. Remain here until further orders." He bowed in mockery to the gassed detective.

The Paris Sewers.

TWO hours had passed. Long since Marlow had sped away with Morella Arlen for England.

The cellar was deserted. The gang had done their work, and had gone upstairs to celebrate their foul work. Into the cellar stole Marion Lee. This was her first chance of getting away unseen from the too attentive madame—from whom she had learned the fate of Vincent Floyd.

Desperately the girl tugged at the iron ring, but it would not move. She was not strong enough to open the trapdoor, but Marion would not give up. She knew where the sewer entered the Seine, and perhaps the tide might carry Floyd towards the entrance.

And as Marion rushed out of the Chat Noir to find a boat Vincent Floyd was battling for life.

His fitness and strength had saved him so far. The majority would have been overcome by the gas, drugs and sewer water, but Vincent possessed stubborn vitality.

For two hours he had lain on the mud, and at last the water had lapped round his feet. Another hour passed, and the water was rippling over and around him. Sometimes a current banged his legs and head against the slimy, smelly walls of the sewer, but the detective showed no signs of life.

But when foul water poured into his open mouth he spluttered and stirred. Everything was vague and distorted, but the desire to live made him struggle to get back his strength. Somehow he pulled himself on to a higher mud-bank and lay there prone whilst the water splashed over his feet.

His whole body was limp, his head ached, and he longed to give up the fight. The tide came in with a rush and weakly he tried to keep afloat. His head began to clear of the gas fumes and his strokes became stronger.

A dim light pervaded the sewer, and he wondered from whence it came. Soon his strength would go and he would drown.

"Vincent! Vincent!" A voice was calling, and at once his mind completely cleared. Strength came back with a rush—Marion's voice, and it brought a message of hope.

Strongly he struck out towards the light, and coming round a bend saw a narrow pinprick ahead.

"Vincent! Vincent!" cried Marion. "I'm here!" he shouted back. "Keep on calling."

Her voice helped to guide him and give him encouragement to fight against the foul odours of the sewer.

The patch of light grew larger and larger, and at last Vincent managed to reach rusty iron bars. Outside was a boat and an anxious Marion.

"Thank heaven you're safe!" she gasped. "There's no time to waste, as the water will soon be over this grating."

"Push that oar between the bars," cried Vincent, but the iron was much too strong.

"Can I go for help?" wailed a white-faced Marion. "The water rises so swiftly."

"Back away, my girl." Vincent still managed to smile though death was so close. "I'm going to dive down through the mud and try to get through underneath this grill; but listen first. If I don't get through, get in touch with the Yard and tell them what happened. How they drugged me and put me on the mud of the sewer like Hirst."

"I've already been in touch with the Yard," was her reply in anguished tones. "Oh, don't waste time, but try to get through the mud, and you must get through—for my sake!"

"That gives me double strength," was his fearless reply. "Here goes!" Gurglings and many bubbles and what seemed hours passed.

The girl was almost on the point of screaming hysterically when out of the river bobbed a muddy head.

"Help me in!" spluttered Vincent. "That stench nearly finished me!"

Sid and two of the gang stared down through the open trapdoor. One of the gang held a powerful torch in his hand.

"Floyd's not there!" shouted Sid. "Listen, do you hear that voice; it's that danged girl. I always thought she was a spy. Floyd's escaped, and we'll all swing if we don't stop him!"

"What can we do?" moaned the flabby-faced rascal known as the "Doctor." "Can we get a boat and—"

"Too late; he'll be free!" Sid clenched his fists. "Floyd will charter a machine and fly back to England. Marlow was so sure of killing Floyd that he talked a lot, talked enough to put us all in queer street. We've got to pick up the trail of Floyd and the girl at once. Should they fly to England we can follow in the 'plane that the boss keeps in that hangar near Le Bourget; there's a machine-gun on board and we'll bring them down. Come on, let's get going."

The Fight in the Air.

VINCENT FLOYD was an experienced pilot and had no difficulty in borrowing a machine from the aerodrome at Le Bourget.

Marion had got him some clean clothes and found a place where he could remove some of the evil-smelling traces of the sewer, then a fast car had taken them to the aerodrome. Vincent soon obtained suitable flying-kit for himself and Marion.

"We're going to see a lot of each other when this is through," Vincent said to her before she climbed into the passenger cockpit, and the light in her eyes gladdened his heart.

Vincent had decided that no time could be wasted on telling the French police all that had happened, but planned to speak to Croydon from his machine, which was fitted with wireless. It was late afternoon when the machine gracefully took off and they soared away over France towards the Channel and England.

All went well until halfway over the Channel, when Vincent cursed under his breath and spoke by telephone to his passenger.

"Fog-bank!" came his clipped words. "I shall soon have to ask Croydon for bearings. Comfortable?"

"Fine!" A pause. "Vincent, there's a machine about a mile behind us. I've noticed them for some while. They're gaining. Could they be following us?"

"I shouldn't think so," came his answer. "I'll push the bus a bit faster, in case of accidents."

The following machine drew closer and closer and anxiously Marion watched. A powerful monoplane, and she could read the markings. Were they genuine? Why should she feel so uneasy?

The machine was directly behind them and about two hundred yards' range when there sounded a sinister plop, plop, plop, and bullets whined dangerously close to their heads.

"Vincent, they're some of Marlow's gang!" came her warning.

"The fog will save us if I can reach those banks," Vincent answered. "Hold tight, dear, I'm going to try and shake these fellows off. Hold tight, Marion!"

Morella and Marlow were still at the Croydon Aerodrome. Marlow was cursing and fuming, but he had already learnt that Morella was a very determined woman. She had decided that she would like to be shown over the aerodrome, and a word to Jim Lancer had gained the permission. She had grandly swept aside all Marlow's objections.

They came at last to a dome-shaped office of glass with a gallery outside. A tired official was explaining various gadgets to Morella whilst Marlow stifled a yawn.

A loud speaker blared forth, and the official explained.

"There is a fog over the Channel. That is one of our pilots telling us his altitude. I shall get one of my operators to instruct our man to go up five hundred feet, because there is a Belgian 'plane returning to Europe flying on his present altitude. In this way a collision is avoided. We keep in touch with all our pilots by wireless." He broke off to hurry over to Marlow. "You mustn't touch those instruments, sir. They regulate our ground signals."

[Continued on page 26.]

Who killed Edward Tracy? A baffling murder mystery that will keep you guessing till the end. Starring Jack Holt and Eileen Pringle.

The Slaying.

THE New York subway train crashed into the underground station and came to a grinding standstill as the motorman at the front of the first car applied the brakes. The guard turned the switch that operated the doors, and they slid open to admit a mob of passengers, among them a party of three men and a girl.

The foursome called for some attention, by reason of the various sentiments that their faces betrayed. The girl was attractive, but there was something about her that suggested life had not dealt too kindly with her. Between two of the men there seemed to exist a subdued air of hostility, and the third was plainly in a state of agitation.

There was a row of vacant seats near the right-hand central doors, looking front. A woman and a husband with an ear-trumpet that betrayed defective hearing occupied the two nearest the motorman's compartment. The next seat was taken by the agitated member of that party of four already described. Three more remained vacant, and the nervous man's companions dropped into these.

The girl of the party chose the one between the two men who seemed at loggerheads, but the younger of these—a good-looking fellow with a small, dark moustache—indicated an open window.

"You'd better change places with me, Dale," he said to the girl, offering her the seat next to the central doors. "She's in a draught there, Tracy," he added to the man next him, using a tone that seemed to reproach the other for a lack of attentiveness.

"That's so, Borden," Tracy agreed curtly. "You'd better change with him, my dear," he continued, speaking to the girl without any real affection in his voice.

The girl accepted Borden's invitation, and Borden planted himself between her and his hostile associate as the train moved out of the station.

The car had become fairly crowded, and two men were standing near by. One wore the uniform of a police-officer. The other was in plain clothes, but from his conversation appeared to be a detective. Both were bound for headquarters to take up their duties, and they addressed each other as Mulvaney and Kearney respectively.

At 14th Street Station the motorman entered the car from the control cabin and asked Tracy to rise.

Tracy looked up at him almost truculently. He was a sour-tempered man, Tracy, of about forty-five.

"I've got to fix the 'juice,'" explained the motorman.

Tracy stood up. The motorman lifted the seat, tampered with a switch-box for a spell and then returned to the control cabin. Tracy sat down again as the train resumed its journey.

At Times Square a couple of Italians stumbled into the car. They were both the worse for liquor, and one of them sprawled into the lap of the girl sitting next to Borden.

"Hallo, kid," he said with a stupid grin, whereupon Borden launched forward aggressively with an angry exclamation.

The Italian lurched to his feet. "I do nothing, Boss," he mumbled in a scared tone. "I do nothing, I say nothing."

He blundered on with his companion. A moment later a stout little woman of fifty moved in front of Borden, who politely gave up his seat. He stood strap-hanging beside a tall, lean man who was bracing himself against the swaying of the car.

Thirty seconds out of Times Square Station the motorman had occasion to apply the brakes while the train was hurtling over its underground track, and at the same instant the lights temporarily failed. In the darkness the standing passengers were almost thrown off their feet by the sudden jolt, and the two unsteady Italians were fairly taken off their balance. The one who had previously annoyed Borden again finished up in the lap of the girl Dale, and as the lights came on once more he grinned a foolish grin of recognition.

"I com-a back," he announced, pawing at her.

Borden wheeled on him. "Get up out of there," he ground out, seizing the Italian by the collar.

The Italian swung at him, but the train was still moving forward, though its speed had been considerably slackened, and the blow went wide.

Borden retaliated, battering the Italian against the central doors.

"Oh, don't, Paul," the girl cried, but Borden was not in the mood to hear her.

The other Italian came to the rescue of his compatriot and friend, and a fierce scuffle ensued. Then all at once the stout little woman sitting next to Tracy screamed and shut her eyes. For somehow a gun had found its way into the struggle, and Borden and the Italian who had been the cause of the disturbance were fighting for possession of it.

A shot crashed out, and almost simultaneously the second Italian landed a lucky punch that took Borden in the jaw.

Borden fell, and the Italians stumbled away. Meanwhile, the car was in an uproar which was only quelled when the raucous voice of Detective Kearney made itself audible.

"Hey, guard," he bellowed, "keep the doors closed. Don't let anybody out!" Then, to the girl known as Dale: "It's all right, miss," he said. "Don't get excited. Your friend ain't shot. Just took a bump in the jaw. Mulvaney, put the bracelets on them two Italians an' get 'em seated."

"He's hurt," panted the girl Dale, falling on her knees beside Borden.

"Serves him right for startin' a fight," was Kearney's unsympathetic comment.

"But he didn't start it," the girl protested. "Edward," she added, turning to Tracy, "you can tell the officer what happened. Edward! Edward!"

Then she stopped, a look of unripled horror and incredulity on her face. Tracy was sitting with his hands on his knees, his eyes wide in an expressionless stare, his face a ghastly complexion and his body rigid.

Kearney ripped out an exclamation and bent over him.

"Yeah, he got it all right," he said. "Mulvaney, pull the communication cord."

Mulvaney obeyed, and as the train squealed to a standstill the motorman came through from his cabin.

"Man shot," Kearney told him cursorily. "He's dead. Can we 'phone from anywhere?"

"Outside on the tracks," was the rejoinder. "There's an emergency 'phone every two hundred feet. But say, we're tying up the whole subway system stayin' here."

Kearney was of the type whose brain acted according to the regulations of the Force, when it acted at all—a block-headed ex-patrolman who had by some strange piece of good fortune been promoted to the investigation bureau.

"You'll start the train when I tell yuh to," he roared. "Mulvaney, get headquarters on the 'phone and tell 'em a murder's been committed. And watch the live rail."

The central doors were opened for Mulvaney. Several people tried to rush them and escape from the car, which had so unexpectedly become a setting for death, drama and—though the circumstances at first belied it—mystery—Kearney held them in check, but had some difficulty in driving back a big fellow in a sweater.

"I'm One-Round Dolan," he of the sweater appealed, "and I've gotta get off. I'm fightin' Bull Yancy in half-an-hour."

Kearney shoved him into his seat, and Mulvaney dropped to the track. In a few minutes he returned.

"They're sending Inspector Killian to meet us at 72nd Street," he announced. "We've gotta hold everybody in the car until he gets there."

"Inspector Killian," Kearney echoed smugly. "He'll be glad to see me on the job. I'm his right-hand man. Hey, you, motorman—start this train up-town, and don't stop till you hit Seventy-Second. And guard, when we pull in, don't open them doors till I give you the word."

Killian.

THE train ran into 72nd Street station, and Inspector Killian and a couple of subway officials stepped across the platform to the central doors of Number One car. At Kearney's signal the doors were opened, and Killian entered.

"Get the passengers out of the other cars," Inspector Killian said to the two subway officials over his shoulder. "I won't need them. But everybody in this car will have to remain."

Kearney confronted him. "Listen, chief," he began to explain, "that Italian over there shot this guy here." And he pointed to the dead, rigid body of Tracy.

"No, no," cried the accused Italian. "I no' have gun."

"Did you see the Italian do it, Kearney?" asked Killian, ignoring the suspect's outburst.

"No," Kearney confessed. "But I almost did. He's your man, anyway. You see, a fight starts with that guy there"—indicating Borden, who had come round some time before—"and somebody pulls a gat. It goes off accidental-like, and that other guy gets the works." And once more he motioned to Tracy.

Killian's strong face registered an expression of mild scorn.

"Accidental?" he repeated. "Then why did you send for me, Kearney? All you had to do was to take these men down to the station house on a charge of manslaughter."

"Sure, that was my idea," said the unabashed Kearney. "Shall I call up for a wagon?"

"No," was the rejoinder, "I've got a medical examiner meeting the train at 145th Street. Tell the motorman to drive there, and no stops on the way."

The motorman obeyed the instructions sourly, and, the train on the move, Killian spoke to Kearney again.

"What's the dead man's name?" he demanded.

"Well, I hadn't got round to askin' that yet," Kearney muttered. "But the dame called him by his first name."

He motioned to the girl known as Dale, and Killian repeated his question to her.

"His name is Edward Tracy," the girl answered. "Mine is Dale Tracy. He was—my husband!"

"Huh?" interrupted Kearney in a startled tone. "Then who's this guy that got the sock in the jaw?"

"My husband's partner—and his best friend—Paul Borden," the girl told him.

"Triangle," Kearney breathed darkly. "Listen," put in Killian. "What did Borden do when he found out his partner had been shot?"

Kearney took it upon himself to answer.

"He said he didn't do it, chief. He only knew about it when he came round from a sock on the jaw that he got in the fight."

"Was the blow struck before or after the shot was fired?" Killian asked.

"Well, I don't know, inspector," Kearney replied. "It all happened so fast. But, anyway, that Italian's your man. I've got it all figured out, chief."

"How many times have I told you not to jump to conclusions, Kearney?" Killian snapped. "Listen, we'll get the names of everybody in the car to start with. I'll start with these two Italians."

"I no' shoot," wailed the one on whom Kearney had fixed the crime. "I no' have da gun, inspect! Aw, meester, you no put dees in da paper. My wife she raisa da devil—she tink I'm in Brooklyn with sicka da friend."

"I want your name," said Killian, "and the name of this countryman of yours, too."

Both names were well-nigh unpronounceable to an Anglo-Saxon. Killian bade them write them down, the suspect's beginning with Antonio, and his companion's with Giuseppe—Tony and Zippy for short.

Meanwhile Kearney and Mulvaney were scouring the identities of the other passengers. The woman with the deaf husband answered to the name of Cotton, and the stout little person to whom Paul Borden had given up his seat pronounced herself, "Mrs. Mary Mullins—housewife."

"Kearney," said Inspector Killian presently, "give me the gun that was fired." And the weapon being handed to him; "Which of you fellows owns this?" he continued, addressing Borden and the two Italians.

None of them admitted ownership, and Killian's face hardened. "All right," he jerked, "but I'm going to find out whose gun this is if we stay here all night. Everybody take up the positions they were in when Tracy was killed."

He was obeyed, the dead man staring impassively before him the while. Then Killian beckoned to the Cottons.

"Move over, you two," he said. "You were sitting on the dead man's right, weren't you?"

"Oh, no," Mrs. Cotton put in, glance-

ing at the empty seat next to Tracy. "The other man was next to Tracy, the nervous little man that was with Tracy's party. I—I don't see him now."

"That's right," Mrs. Mary Mullins interposed. "There was another man. He was wearing a brown suit, so help me." And she raised her hand aloft as she had seen witnesses do in a police-court.

"Would you know him again?" Killian demanded.

"Yes, yer honour," was the reply. "That's the man over there. I remember the brown suit."

Mrs. Mullins had made a mistake. The man she pointed to was the tall individual who had been standing next to Borden after the latter had offered her his seat.

"She's wrong, inspector," said the man in the brown suit. "I never saw Tracy in my life before. I'm only an employee here in the subway—George Mason, Switch Inspector. Here's my card."

Mrs. Mullins was not ready to admit her blunder, but Killian was satisfied.

"Kearney," he ordered, "take the bracelets off those two Italians."

"Right, chief," said Kearney, and did as he had been told.

Killian then compelled the principals to re-enact the struggle, which they did half-heartedly. Then Mrs. Mullins spoke again.

"That's just how it was, inspector," she declared. "Only more violent. And suddenly the Italian—Tony or whatever you call him—pulled the gun out of Borden's pocket."

"That's right," another passenger corroborated. "I saw that much."

"So the gun did belong to you, Borden," Killian said, turning round.

Dale Tracy interrupted.

"No," she explained quickly. "It belonged to my husband. He asked Paul to take it home and clean it for him, as he himself knew very little about firearms."

Killian considered for a moment. "Mrs. Tracy," he said at length, "from what I can understand it was Borden, and not your husband, who resisted this Italian's conduct. Were you happily married? If so, you don't seem to show any extraordinary signs of grief at your husband's death!"

"This has gone far enough," Borden began heatedly, but the inspector cut in on him.

"Keep quiet, Borden," he said. "Maybe I'm through questioning Mrs. Tracy, maybe I'm not. But I'll ask you one question. What business were you in before you tied up with Tracy?"

"Electrical engineering," Borden answered, "but I found it was too crowded. So I went into the brokerage business with Tracy."

"I suppose you carry business insurance," Killian observed.

"For two hundred thousand dollars," was the rejoinder. "Tracy and I covered each other for a hundred thousand apiece."

Killian looked thoughtfully at the ceiling of the swaying car. "Meaning that, in the event of your death Tracy would stand to get a hundred thousand dollars," he mused. "And now he's dead, you collect the hundred thousand."

"So you think I shot him to collect the insurance," Borden ground out.

"I don't think anything," Killian retorted. "Now, Mrs. Mullins—and you, Mrs. Cotton—I want you to sit over there and see if you can identify that man who was sitting on Tracy's right. Kearney, have all the males in the car file past me and give their names."

"Right, chief," said Kearney, and he and Mulvaney proceeded to hustle the men forward.

The impatient prize-fighter was amongst the first batch. "One-Round Dolan," he announced, introducing himself. "The Kansas City Terror. One hundred and ninety-five pounds." And he waved his clasped hands aloft as he might have done to an appreciative ring-side audience.

"Come on, get goin'," snarled Kearney, giving him a shove.

Several other men filed past, and then a small, agitated individual was thrust forward.

He called himself "Herman Stevens," and had hardly given his name when Mrs. Mullins and Mrs. Cotton pronounced him the man who had been sitting on Tracy's right. He was immediately seized by Kearney.

"No, no," Stevens babbled. "I was at the other end of the car. You can't do this to me. I didn't kill him. I had no gun! I couldn't kill anyone."

"But you came into the car with Tracy, his wife and Borden, and you took the seat next to Tracy, didn't you?" Killian rapped out. "Come on, answer me!"

Kearney twisted the fellow's arm, and he sobbed out an answer in the affirmative.

"I—I'm a clerk in Tracy's office," he said, in response to further questioning. "I—I hid myself just now because—because I didn't want to get mixed up in any murder!"

Too late he realised what he had said, for Killian fairly pounced on those last words.

"So it was a murder, was it?" he jerked out. "Now we're getting somewhere. Why did Borden and Mrs. Tracy keep so quiet when there was some mention of you by these other passengers just now? Why didn't they confirm the impression that you had been with them?"

Stevens was in a sweat of terror.

"They—they may have been frightened I'd say something about the quarrel Borden had with Tracy at the office this evening," he blurted.

"Tracy—accused Borden of being in love with his wife, Borden said he'd like to kill Tracy for the way he treated her—"

Borden started forward impetuously, but Killian held him in check.

"Hold it, Borden," he rapped out. "I reckon I've found out all I wanted to know, and I'll have to arrest you—for the murder of Edward Tracy—"

"Hundred-and-forty-fifth Street," called the motorman, opening the door of the control cabin as the train ran into its terminus.

The passengers looked hopeful, but Killian was not prepared to release them yet. He ordered them to remain in their seats while the medical examiner and a couple of attendants came aboard.

"Hallo, doc," Killian greeted the examiner. "A little shooting affair here. Man drilled through the heart. There he is."

The doctor stooped to make his examination.

"Didn't bleed much," he observed as he opened Tracy's waistcoat and glanced at the spot where the bullet had entered the body.

"Yeah, that's funny, isn't it?" Killian murmured.

The doctor straightened up.

"Inspector," he said startingly, "that man was not killed by a gunshot. He was already dead when the bullet entered his body!"

Killian gaped at him.

"You mean—heart failure?"

"No," said the doctor, "it wasn't heart failure. This man was electrocuted."

The Mystery Deepens.

THERE was a blank silence. Then the medical examiner spoke again.

"You will notice the rigidity of the body," he pointed out, "which is always characteristic with electrocution. Furthermore, in a case of electrocution there is always a burn left on the body at the point of contact. Look at that right wrist," he added, pointing to a round blister above the dead man's hand. "The contact was made by a piece of metal the size and shape of that burn."

Killian pushed his hat back on his head.

"What a help you turned out to be," he declared. "Here we have a murder mystery already solved, then you come in and ruin everything."

"I'm sorry, Killian," said the doctor with a smile. "Well, if you've finished with the body I'll have it taken along and will perform an autopsy to-night."

The rigid form of Tracy was removed from the car, and Killian ordered the guard to close the doors again.

"Now listen, folks," he told the passengers, "there's been a murder committed, and the culprit is still in this car. I'm going to find out who it is if I stay here all week. Has anybody got anything to say?"

Someone remembered that the motorman had tampered with the switch-box under Tracy's seat, but the driver explained that he had merely tightened a loose connection. Killian then called across the man who had given his name as George Mason and his profession as switch inspector on the subway.

"I'd like your help, Mason," he said. "Is there enough voltage in that switch-box to electrocute a man?"

"Not unless there was a contact from the third rail," was the reply.

"Then enough voltage to electrocute a man sitting there would have to come from direct contact with that outside rail?" said Killian. "Yet the only connection is outside, the shoe underneath the car making the only contact. All right, but would it be possible to run a wire from that shoe up the outside of the car and in through the window?"

Mason's thin face wore a thoughtful expression. He admitted the feasibility of Killian's theory, and Kearney was sent down to the track to investigate, only to return with the information that there was no such wire in evidence.

It was at this moment that one of the attendants who had borne Tracy's body from the car returned to the platform and, on being admitted to the train, handed Killian a wallet.

"It belonged to the dead man," he explained. "The doctor said to turn it over to you."

Killian opened the wallet. It contained a watch which the doctor must have stuffed inside it, and, after studying the timepiece for a moment, Killian turned to Dale Tracy.

"No, no," Stevens babbled. "I didn't kill him. I had no gun. I couldn't kill anyone!"

"What business was your husband in when he went into the brokerage?" he asked, a queer note in his voice.

"He was employed by the subway," Dale answered, "as a dispatcher."

"I see," Killian faced George Mason again. "Listen," he went on, "would it be possible to drop a wire from that open window there and touch the third rail?"

Mason shrugged.

"That's only one chance in a million," he replied. "You see, the third rail is covered most of the way."

"Nevertheless, Tracy was electrocuted, and the man who committed the crime used a wire," declared Killian. "Hey, motorman, take us back to Fourteenth Street, and no stops on the way."

The train was started, and Killian made his way to where the tremulous Herman Stevens was standing.

"Just what did Borden say during that quarrel at the office?" he demanded.

"Well, I can't remember exactly," Stevens whimpered. "But after he'd accused Tracy of ill-treating Mrs. Tracy he said something about his former wife. And then he—he threatened Tracy with violence."

Killian looked keenly interested.

"Oh, so Tracy had a former wife, did he?" he murmured.

"Yes," put in Borden. "I only learned to-day that she was destitute, and in hospital. Tracy was a cad, and he'd have served Dale the same way. He forced his first wife to break with him on account of his treatment, and Dale would have had to break with him, too, sooner or later."

Killian pursed his lips.

"Stevens," he said, turning to the clerk again, "I want you to tell me exactly how the electrocution happened. Come through with it. You know how it was arranged. That's why you ran and hid."

"No, no," Stevens whined. "Honestly, I didn't know anything. I thought he was just shot. I felt his body stiffen up after the gun went off."

"You're lying. The body stiffened before the shot!"

A look of panic crossed Stevens' face as he realized he had blundered.

"How long before?" rasped Killian, gripping him. "Answer, will you? Was it before Borden got up and gave his seat to Mrs. Mullins?"

"Yes," Stevens faltered, "I think so—just before that."

"Did you see Borden fooling with any wires after he came into the car?" Killian demanded. "Did you see anybody with any wire? Did you have any?"

"No!" Stevens panted.

"Search him, Kearney," Killian ordered.

"Now, inspector?" asked Kearney. "Right, chief."

But no wire was forthcoming. Only a leather case containing a certificate of stock that the clerk had purchased.

Killian regarded this certificate.

"I want to know your salary, Stevens," he said, "and if you've any family."

"I get forty dollars a week," the clerk muttered, "and I've got a wife and four kids."

"Which makes it pretty tough to save, I guess," drawled Killian. "Yet you were able to buy three hundred dollars' worth of stock. Where did you get the money?"

"I—I borrowed it from Tracy," Stevens answered evasively.

"You mean you stole it," jerked Killian, fancying he had found a new motive for the slaying. "And Tracy found out about it. Didn't he?"

"Yes, but it was only three hundred dollars. Tracy was playing with the same stock. He went down on it the same as me, but what he lost was fifty thousand dollars of the firm's money."

Borden started forward.

"He did, did he?" he said. "He was playing the market, was he, with my money as well as his own? Thanks for the information, Stevens—"

He was interrupted by a commotion at the other end of the car, whence two boys came running with a pair of gloves. Curious gloves they were, for on examining them, Killian discovered that they were lined with rubber, and that a copper disc was fastened to each palm—the shape and size of the burn on Tracy's wrists!

Killian's astute brain grappled with a theory. These gloves, lined as they were with rubber, would make it possible to seize a live wire without receiving a shock.

He showed the gloves to Borden.

"You were once an electrical engineer," he said. "If I made a connection between these two copper discs with a wire and then grabbed a live wire with one gloved hand and somebody's wrist with the other. Do you follow me?"

"The man you touched would be killed under the proper conditions," declared Borden. "I mean, if the current were strong enough and if the man were 'grounded.'"

"The current from the third rail would be strong enough," Killian stated. "And if the victim were seated with his feet in a pool of water—would that constitute a ground?"

Borden admitted that the circuit would thereby be completed, and Killian pointed to a pool of water in front of the seat where Tracy had died.

"It's been raining all day," he said. "And there's the pool of water from a dripping umbrella. Would you mind trying these gloves on, Borden?"

Borden obeyed, and looked relieved when they proved several sizes too small for him. But Killian seemed dissatisfied.

"Where did you get the current, Borden?" he asked sharply.

"I didn't do it!" Borden protested hotly. "You see for yourself the gloves don't fit me. And even if I had done it I wouldn't have been fool enough to shoot the man on the top of it."

"I'll admit the shot was accidental," Killian granted. "But the fight may have been a clever trick to draw attention from an accomplice, we'll say Stevens."

He wheeled on the trembling clerk, and ordering Kearney to hold him, obtained a piece of string in lieu of wire. This he slipped under Stevens' coat, and then he forced him to thrust his hands into the rubber gloves and grasp the ends of the cord.

"Pretty smart, weren't you?" Killian jerked. "To pick out a rainy night and let your umbrella drip a pool of water around Tracy's feet to make the 'ground' you needed."

"Here's an umbrella here," called the voice of Mrs. Cotton. "Lying under the seat that man Stevens occupied."

"I didn't do it!" screamed Stevens.

"I tell you, I didn't—" "You killed Tracy!" Killian rapped out. "Where'd you get the current? Come clean, Stevens. Was it Borden who hired you to do it? Talk, will you? I've got enough evidence to send you to the chair!"

"I didn't do it," Stevens moaned.

"Then tell me who did," Killian threatened, "or it's the chair for you."

A sob escaped Stevens.

"Wait," he whimpered. "Wait. I'll—I'll tell—"

Killian leaned forward attentively. Tugging at his collar Stevens tried to speak. But ere he could utter a single word a hand touched the switch that operated the lights in the car.

For the second time that day the train was plunged in darkness, and in the gloom there arose a sudden scuffle, punctuated by the crash of a shot.

The Killer.

It was the guard who turned up the lights again and revealed a scene that was to be imprinted on the memories of all in the car.

Stevens was dead, with a bullet in his back. The gun that had killed him was Kearney's, the unseen slayer having lifted it from the detective's pocket and then flung it to the floor. Nor was that all, for Killian discovered a length of wire that had been planted on his own person.

There was no doubt in Killian's mind that it was the wire which had been used in the electrocution of Tracy.

"Listen, folks," he said grimly, "there's been two murders in this car, and Stevens was shot because he knew who did the first one. Now I'm going to find out the killer. Kearney, tell the motorman to take us straight to Times Square without a stop, and while we're headed there have the passengers seated as they were before Tracy was electrocuted."

Kearney obeyed, but looked uncomfortable when he was told to take the seat Stevens had occupied.

"Now," said Killian, "we'll assume for the moment that Stevens was the man who had the gloves on."

"Pardon me, inspector?" Mrs. Cotton interposed, "but that Mr. Stevens didn't wear gloves. I remember distinctly, because he had such thin nervous hands."

"But I recollect seeing a man who did wear gloves," exclaimed Mrs. Mullins. "He was standing right in front of Tracy—not for long, though he was there when the lights failed just outside Times Square station. Then he sort of stumbled, and after that he went away. I don't know that I'd recognise him again, for I didn't specially look at him."

Killian's eyes narrowed thoughtfully. "Thank you, Mrs. Mullins," he said, and then he began to don the rubber gloves with the discs, after which he made a contact with the wire that had been mysteriously planted on him.

"Mason," he said, turning and facing the switch inspector, "would you mind taking Tracy's place?"

"Surely," Mason agreed, and sat down, the spreading pool of water at his feet.

"I know it's not very pleasant, swapping places with a dead man," said Killian. "But it will only be for a few moments."

"Approach!" Times Square, Sherlock Holmes," came the voice of the disgruntled motorman from the control cabin.

"All right," answered Killian. "Go ahead—very slowly. Now, Mrs. Mullins, the man with the gloves was standing right here. Then the train

(Continued on page 27.)

A girl and a brave cowpuncher have to fight with brawn and brain to escape from the attack of a band of Western bad-men. Starring Charles Delaney and Virginia Brown Faire.

El Jacinto.

ENOCH CRABB had seen many curious things since he had first started in partnership with James Rankin at Rancho Jacinto. But never in his life had he seen anything so curious as that which attracted his attention on his return from the corral they were busily getting ready for a new herd.

Cowboys are wont to use any kind of garb that is different from that of their fellow-workers. But no cowboy ever went so far as to display brilliantly-marked riding chaps, gorgeously-but-toned revolver-belt, thin city shoes, and gauntlets so long that they reached nearly to the elbow.

James Rankin laughed heartily as he answered his partner's question.

"That is my nephew, Oswald."

"The name suits the dress!" grunted Crabb, and sneered. "You've got a fine big holster, son. How about your gun?"

"Oh, I've got a gun all right!" said Oswald, and dived his fingers deep into the holster to pick out a tiny revolver, the sight of which made Crabb roar afresh.

It was a neat little weapon, with a wonderful pearl butt that would have pleased the most fastidious woman in the world. Martha, Rankin's daughter, coming in at that moment, looked at it and joined in the laughter.

"What's that, Oswald?" she asked.

"Just for my protection," said Oswald loftily. "I understand a man wants a gun in these parts."

"A gun is sure handy," said Rankin. "But—well—I should call that a peashooter. However, drop it in your holster, Oswald. Martha is going to take you for a run round whilst I talk business with my partner."

Still smiling, the hardy girl of the plains led her cousin out of the ranch towards the horse corral, and it was some minutes after they had gone before Crabb got the sneer off his face and announced himself as being ready for business.

"Martha would just about eat him up in a scrap, Rankin," he observed, as he sat down.

"Sure she would. He's just a harmless city feller—guess he reckons cowboy outfit is the proper thing to wear out here, and bought his from a theatre property store!" laughed Rankin.

"Well, how's the corral?"

"All ready," replied Crabb. "Say, when does that herd come into Corral City from Bar W, Rankin? Is it to-morrow, or the next day?"

"To-morrow. The last I heard of them was that they were within a few miles of the town, and they had not lost a single animal. Pretty smart punchers, I guess." Rankin shook his head slowly from side to side, and frowned. "Crabb, I'm real anxious about the journey from Corral City to El Jacinto."

"Anxious! Why?"

"Well, it's a pretty trail with an ugly name, as you know. Three outfits have lost their stuff coming through—and one man who went on the lonesome trail, taking in his own money, never came back. I know that as we have lost nothing that—that—well, they are saying that we have a hand in the game."

"Punk!" snapped Crabb. "However, I tell you what we will do. We will have the Bar W herd checked in at Corral City, and I'll come back and report. Then I'll take all the boys over every man-jack on the ranch, and bring 'em in myself. How's that?"

"That sounds O.K. to me, Crabb!" assented Rankin. "You'd better leave to-night."

It was just as well that Rankin did not see the contemptuous, curious sneer that curled at the corners of Crabb's lips when once he had passed out of the ranch-house and closed the door behind him. It might have made Rankin a little more anxious than he was.

Crabb started out within a very few minutes of his suggestion being agreed to by his partner, and in due course arrived in Corral City.

He strolled into the saloon, and was surprised when news was instantly forthcoming that the punchers from Bar W had arrived, and were even then checking in one of the great corrals of which the town boasted.

"Gee! But they're sure slick punchers!" said Crabb, in amazement.

"Guess so! I saw them handle their herd, and, believe me, pard, that herd was just like a troupe of well-trained beasts. They walked in just as those cowpunchers wanted them—and here they come."

Crabb turned curiously to the door, just as four men entered.

They were a pretty motley crowd. One of them, rather a grim-faced, short man of the stature that spells immense strength, was in front of three others. The four of them were covered in dirt and dust from head to foot, and their unwashed, unshaven faces told clearly of the long journey they had accomplished.

"Say, which of you is foreman?" asked Crabb. "You look four pretty mangy cowboys, but I suppose one of you was in charge of the herd?"

"You said it, mister—and I'm the one," said the leader quietly. "My name is Judd Rascomb, and I'm foreman of Bar W. My pals—Tenderfoot, Gila Red, and Sweetheart. Quick with their tongues, but quicker with their guns. I reckon your herd is safe in the corral—and we ain't lost a single animal on the three-hundred-mile trail!"

"That's sure smart work, Rascomb. Have a drink, and then I'll talk to you."

"Who are you?" asked Judd pertinently.

"I'm Rankin's partner from El Jacinto. Say, I'm going back to report that you have checked in. Suppose you follow me on when you have had a rest?"

"Suits me plenty!" said Judd.

So that was settled—so far as Judd Rascomb knew.

What he did not know was that Crabb, when he left Corral City for El Jacinto, chose the difficult Canyon Jacinto as his trail home.

It was not without reason. The canyon trail was the place where Crabb knew where to find the Man with the White Sombrero. But, as a matter of strict fact, it was the mysterious man who found Crabb.

Rankin's partner was riding up towards the gorge when a voice hailed him—a silky-toned voice that, somehow or other, always made Crabb loosen his gun in its holster.

"Hallo, Crabb! In a hurry?"

Crabb pulled up with a jerk, to find himself face to face with a small, pleasant-faced man upon whose head was a white sombrero.

"I hoped to see you—the herd is in. Listen—I've got to hit the trail plenty hard to get in and back again. And—we're in luck's way. I'm going back now, and it won't be difficult for me to persuade Rankin to let me take in the bank roll to the express office, where I should pay in to release the cattle. You look out for me. I'll ride the Canyon Jacinto trail—I guess you can hold me up for the bank roll. Later, you can rustle the cattle, so we get it both ways. O.K.?"

"A very pretty little plot, my friend," said the stranger, with a faint smile. "And who is going to look after you?" "Don't be a gump!" snapped Crabb. "We're partners, ain't we?" "Sure—we're partners, my friend. We share troubles just the same as pleasures—eh? It's a good job I'm as good a shot as you, my friend, for I should not like to be in the shadow!"

Crabb looked at the stranger grimly. He knew exactly what was meant by that remark.

He swung his horse to the trail and rode off savagely, leaving the stranger to stare after him, still with that pleasant smile at the corners of his lips.

Judd's Way!

DOWN in the Cowpuncher's Rest in Corral City, Judd Rascomb looked thoughtfully at his men.

"Say, boys, I've a sort o' hunch to ride in to El Jacinto ahead of you," he said. "You fellows are nearly all in, and I reckon your hosses ain't quite so good as mine."

"You mean you didn't sort o' take to the Crabb feller," said Gila Red coolly. "Well, he got me, too, Judd. What you says goes."

Judd nodded his thanks.

"I'm gonna ride ahead, boys, and you follow me on," he said. "There's a story or two I've been picking up from the boys around here. Crabb and Rankin are suspected of not being too clean on the line—there's some rustling going on, and they don't seem to drop in for any, like their neighbours. And, seeing that we have come three hundred miles without losing a beast, we may as well see that nobody loses our pay-roll. Got me?"

The others nodded.

"If you don't get through, we might?" murmured Gila Red.

It was Judd's turn to nod. But he smiled quite cheerily, whereas his men were distinctly on the grim side.

"Well, I'm off, boys—see you later!" he said breezily.

Judd's horse was certainly a fine creature. It had the stocky appearance of most range horses, but its legs were thinner and more muscled than the majority. Its head, too, was finer drawn, and suggested an intelligence well above the ordinary.

Judd set him going at a gentle trot, remembering that there were thirty miles to be covered, and, once he had cleared his mind of the stories he had heard from "the boys" around Corral City, he had plenty of time in which to study the ground he was travelling.

Miles of the trail were through a lonely desert, in which there was little or no undergrowth, and no signs of the woods which were so plentiful down Bar W way. Ahead of the desert was Canyon Jacinto, and it was not until he had come to the fork roads, which admitted riders either to the canyon or to the lower pass, that Judd showed any signs of hesitation.

He did not know the trail. An examination of the ground revealed that a fairly equal number of travellers had gone either way—there was apparently very little to choose between the trails, so far as distance went.

"I guess we'll take the lower trail, boy!" he said aloud. "We ain't in no particular hurry, I guess, and we shall know whether or not this is the way back for us when we bring in that bank-roll."

He turned his horse into the pass, the Jacinto Canyon rising magnificently at his side. Here the bushes were numerous, and some of them were tall enough to hide a mounted man and his horse. They made Judd remember again the stories of the mysterious happenings that occurred in the pass, and his keen eyes once again assumed an alertness peculiar to lonely riders of the plains.

He had got just about into the middle of the pass, when something white, moving amidst the bushes, caught his eye.

In an instant he had pulled up his horse and his hand dropped to his gun. He watched, every nerve tense.

For the first minute nothing happened, and then he caught sight of a white sombrero, moving rapidly behind a cluster of bushes.

"We're bein' watched, boy," muttered Judd. "Seems as though some of those stories were right. If that feller was an open sort of guy he would ride out and pass the time of the day. Seein' as he don't, we can take it that he ain't no open guy. Reckon he won't be alone, either. Well, we'll give them something to do."

Spur and knee got to work on his mount's side, and in a flash he had left the trail and was charging up the side of the gorge. He brought his voice into play, to encourage his horse to the terrific effort necessary to mount the side, for it was more like a steep cliff than anything else.

He did not once look behind to see whether or not he was being followed, and no shot came shrieking through the air in his direction. He gave all his attention to keep those four hoofs digging at the gorge side, turning the horse from its course only when it was absolutely necessary.

The plucky beast was panting for breath when at last it staggered on to the top of the gorge, but Judd, thinking more grimly now of the fact that a bank-roll would be coming through in the course of the next few hours, set off at a hard gallop over the crest of the hill, and joined the trail that led to El Jacinto.

In the meantime, Crabb had arrived back at the ranch. Rankin was in the house, and he looked up in some considerable surprise when Crabb entered his room without the preliminary knock. "Gee—you've sure been slick, partner," said Rankin in surprise. "Anything happened?"

"The herd has been checked in at Corral City," explained Crabb, and even to Rankin his voice sounded particularly hard. "I had a word with Judd Rascomb, the foreman of Bar W, who brought in the herd. He's a purty good cowboy, that. Never lost a beast on the whole of the three-hundred-mile trail. But he's anxious about his money."

"Anxious? What do you mean? We're good enough to pay for what we order, ain't we?" demanded Rankin angrily.

"Sure enough, partner. He's evidently heard stories of what sometimes happens to outfits travelling between here and the city, and he thinks my suggestion that I take in the money alone is quite a good one."

"Well, that ain't a bad notion, either!" said Rankin. "One might get through, even if there are bandits about—Hallo, Martha!"

Martha came in at that moment, and, although her father greeted her cheerily enough, it was easy for her to see that her company was not very welcome at that time. But she had news to give, and she gave it.

"I met the sheriff a few minutes back, father," she said. "He asked me to tell you that Boston the Bandit has escaped, and you'd better warn the boys to keep their eyes open if they are moving cattle."

Rankin looked up, startled, toward Crabb—and that worthy drew in his lips in a manner that suggested more contempt than fear.

"Boston the Bandit won't come around these parts," he said shortly. "There are too many who know him."

Rankin looked troubled. Boston the Bandit was a gentleman of the plains, in spite of the fact that he had an unenviable record. He used cunning to trap his victims, instead of blowing holes in them and getting whatever they had. True, one rider who had passed through the territory he worked had never come back, but there was no definite proof that Boston the Bandit had held him up.

Rankin did not open his lips until Martha had passed out of the room.

"Say, Crabb," he said slowly. "Don't you think a crowd of the boys had better take in that bank-roll?"

"A crowd would attract any bandits there were about," growled Crabb, as if he pitied his partner's lack of intelligence. "One man would stand a much better chance of getting through. I'll go myself."

"All right—you'd better pack the dollar-bills into separate pouches, and stick them inside your saddle-bags," said Rankin. "I'll be mighty glad when that payment is made into the express office at Corral City. Crabb, and I don't care who knows it!"

Crabb could not quite keep from his eyes the keen delight he felt at the easy manner in which Rankin had fallen in with his suggestion, but much of that delight went when there came a tap at the door, and it opened to admit Judd Rascomb.

"Can I come in, folks?" he asked coolly. "I'm Judd Rascomb, foreman of Bar W."

"Come in, by all means," said Rankin, and shook hands heartily with the newcomer. "You're sure welcome to my house, Rascomb."

"Thanks."

"We were just arranging for Crabb to take the money into Corral City express office," went on Rankin. "He thinks, and I agree, that one rider would stand a good chance of getting through O.K., but that a bunch might attract attention of any bandits who might be around the trail."

"Sure, that's right—only there'll be two on the trail," said Rascomb coolly. "I'm gonna take that money in myself!"

"You're not!" almost hissed Crabb, and his eyes glared furiously at the calm, if decidedly bedraggled, cowboy.

"That's funny—I reckon I am!" said Judd, in that same quiet strain. "You see, you ain't got what we call a plenty clean name. I brought in that herd without losing a beast, and I just ain't gonna have that bank roll lifted. Complete the job—that's my way, gents!"

To add to Crabb's discomfiture, Rankin showed a warm inclination to fall in with that plan in preference to the one to which he had already agreed—and Rankin had a share in the business.

"Why, if there are any bandits around they'll go for a stranger a mighty sight quicker than they would me—and I am well known all down the trail from here to Corral City!" exclaimed Crabb angrily. "You are sure asking for trouble, Rascomb!"

Rascomb laughed easily. "I've got three good fellers coming in the mornin'," he explained coolly. "They're gonna stop here until I get a message in that I am safe in with that bank roll. If they don't get that message they'll sure find the excuse they want to show how they can shoot. They're real slick guys, them fellers, although they don't look it!"

Crabb was biting his lips with baffled rage, and his eyes were gleaming at the cool Rascomb as though he would like to draw a gun and shoot him there and then. But, with Rankin there, he had to avoid showing any decidedly strong preference for taking the trail alone.

"All right," he agreed. "We'll ride together in the morning. I'll get the money packed, and the dust in the saddle-bags."

And he went out without another glance at Judd Rascomb.

"You'll spend the night here at my house?" asked Rankin.

"No, sir—not me. I'm spending the night beside my horse," replied Rascomb quickly. "I'm gonna give him a mighty good rub down—and get a tub for myself. Thanks all the same—suffering snakes—what's this?"

It was Oswald, coming in with Martha, that made him break off with that gasp of amazement.

"Oh, I didn't know you had a stranger with you, father," laughed Martha. "I saw Mr. Crabb go, and—"

"I was just asking Mr. Rascomb—this is my daughter, Mr. Rascomb—and my nephew Oswald up from the city," said Rankin, making the introductions. "I was asking Mr. Rascomb to spend the night here—strangers are always welcome to shelter under my roof. But he prefers to spend the night with his horse."

"But you must have come a long way, Mr. Rascomb—a bed would rest you more than a bundle of straw!" put in Martha.

Judd Rascomb laughed. There was something decidedly more attractive about the offer of hospitality now that it came from Martha Rankin. She was pretty. Moreover, it would be impossible to associate her with any of the stories that were blackening the name of her father and Crabb.

"Thanks—I'll change my mind and stop," he said suddenly. "But, say, Oswald, what's that pea-shooter you've got there?"

"It isn't a pea-shooter—it fires bullets!" replied Oswald indignantly. "And it's mighty pretty, too!"

"Much too pretty for a regular cowboy!" said Rascomb, with a disarming smile. "Say, you'd better have one of my guns, and I'll take that pip as a souvenir of my visit here."

He held out one of his own big guns as he spoke and Oswald hesitated only a fraction of a second. A regular cowboy should have a regular, big gun, and this was his chance to get one. With a seriousness that nearly had Rankin and Martha in fits of laughter the exchange was made.

The rest of the evening Judd spent with Martha Rankin, and, judging by her expression, she found Judd Rascomb just as interesting a person as he very obviously found her. Oswald was out of the way, swaggering amongst the ranch hands, displaying the butt of his gun in its huge holster.

Rankin retired early, and there was a serene quietness about the place that suggested anything but that, in one particular room, there sat a man who was planning a robbery which must inevitably mean the shooting of Judd Rascomb.

Treachery!

DAWN the next morning saw Gila Red, Tenderfoot and Sweetheart riding into El Jacinto, where Judd Rascomb received them with far more pleasure than did Crabb.

"All fixed up O.K., boys," said Rascomb, in the presence of both Rankin and Crabb. "I'm riding in with Crabb here, taking half the dough with me, whilst he carries the other half. When I get in Corral City I'll send you a message—and that message will be that the two of us have got in. If only one of us gets in I reckon you'll start hunting up the lost rider."

"Shootin' up, you means," said Sweetheart, and gave his guns a slap that sent a shiver down Crabb's spine. "Well, come on—let's get going, Rascomb!" Crabb said curtly, after a while. "I've got the bills packed in two envelopes—one for you and one for me. I'll take the saddle-bags—"

"I'm taking the saddle-bags!" put in Judd calmly. "Well, see you later, boys!"

"There'll be heck to play if you don't!" grunted Sweetheart.

"Miss Rankin—I guess I'm coming back this way." Judd turned to the girl and spoke quietly. "I sort o' enjoyed last evening so much that I'm hungry for lots more of them!"

She just nodded, but there was something more than a hostess' dutiful wish for his pleasant journey and a safe return when she bade him good-bye.

She was still looking down the trail when the riders had become but black blobs in the distance. She was feeling, only too keenly, the tense air that was over the ranch—and the sight of Judd's three cowboys did not lessen that feeling. They were so grim, so bedraggled and unkempt after their long journey, and they moved about in the manner of men who expect to be attacked every second.

Down through the desert Judd Rascomb was thinking of her. It was a

"I'm taking the saddle-bags!" put in Judd calmly.

nity that his mind was so occupied, for it made Crabb's task so much easier.

"Well, here we come to the fork, Rascomb," said Crabb easily. "I'll take the lower pass, and you get through the Jacinto Canyon. I reckon we'll meet at the fork on the other side. Pleasant journey!"

"Thanks," said Judd indifferently, but suddenly started and pulled himself into an alertness that was just too late.

He was staring down the muzzle of Crabb's gun.

"Get your hands away from your gun, Rascomb!" snarled Crabb. "I'm taking in this money myself!"

Rascomb bit his lip in helpless rage. Crabb was fixing him with a glare that meant grim business.

"Thought you'd get down the Canyon with your half, did you?" grinned Crabb. "I'll have your gun; keep your hands up or I'll blow holes in you as big as silver dollars. And I'll take the saddle-bags, Mr. Foreman Rascomb. Now get moving towards the Canyon trail, and keep moving!"

Rascomb, apparently resigning himself to his fate, dropped his hands. But his right hand, farthest away from Crabb, dropped straight into the apparently empty holster. In a flash the tiny revolver he had taken from Oswald in exchange for one of his own guns glittered for a split second in the sun, and from it came a tiny report that would have made him laugh at a time less serious than this.

But if the report was tiny, the bullet was effective. It went straight through the fleshy part of Crabb's revolver hand, and his gun dropped from his nerveless fingers.

"Never thought of that pea-shooter, did you?" grated Judd, and he snatched at the gun which Crabb had taken from him but a few seconds before. "I'll have your envelope now, Crabb. And I'll take the saddle-bags again!"

"You ain't getting away with this, Rascomb!" panted Crabb.

"You get down the lower pass, and when you meet up with my boys, tell 'em I'll be getting that message through all O.K., and mighty soon now!"

He was laughing derisively as with a wave of his hand he spurred his horse into a gallop and darted down the Canyon trail.

Crabb started along the other trail, sucking at his wounded wrist as he rode. But he did not get far before there was a movement in the bushes at the fork trails, and a white sombrero showed for a second and disappeared.

It was just luck that made Judd Rascomb turn his head at that precise second. He saw nothing of Crabb, who was hidden by the bushes, but he saw the white sombrero.

"Suffering snakes, that guy was sure handy to see the parting!" muttered Judd, and jerked his horse hard upon its haunches. "Boy, I dunno that this is a healthy trail for you and me. We're going up the gorge again. Get going, boy!"

His ride up the rocky wall of the canyon was something he would never forget. His horse did everything except the one fatal thing—slip up and break his neck. He staggered, swayed, dug frantically at times for a foothold, but somehow or other always managed to put another few yards between them and the man in the white sombrero.

Judd knew now that there was reason enough for the stories of the mysterious happenings in the passes between Corral City and El Jacinto, but what he did not know was what was happening down below him whilst he made a daring, frantic ride for the top of the Canyon Jacinto.

Crabb got to know quickly enough, for he had not ridden half a mile before he was aware that he was being chased by a rider who was certainly not Judd Rascomb.

It was the man with the white sombrero, and his hail brought the wounded Crabb to a quick halt, for he could not have hoped to have ridden a hard race to escape.

The mystery man dismounted at Crabb's side and jerked both his guns into a handy position for action. The expression on his face was grim, even though his eyes were showing a certain amount of amusement.

"I saw the cowpuncher get the money back, my friend," said the stranger very quietly. "I thought my partner was a pretty slick guy, but it appears he is nothing more than a muddler. Bah! He handled you as if you were a child!"

"He got the drop on me. I tell you, if you hurry you'll get him in the pass!" snarled Crabb.

"You'll not get him in the pass; he's ridden up the rocky wall of the canyon, and up there he will take some getting out. I suppose, my friend, that you were not thinking of double-crossing me?"

"Double-crossing you? Don't be a fool!" growled Crabb, but he avoided the steady stare of the other's eyes in spite of the vehemence of his answer.

"You told me you were riding the Canyon Jacinto trail with the bank-roll. Instead, you hold up our young friend and send him with nothing through the Canyon Jacinto, whilst you were taking the other pass. It is suspicious, my friend—very suspicious!"

"Oh, shucks! You're talking through your neck!" growled Crabb.

"I have scattered my men, Crabb, and they are surrounding the end of the canyon where this pass meets. They will shoot anybody who comes out of it. You had better return through the desert," said the stranger, ignoring Crabb's bitter remarks.

"And you pick up the bank-roll?" sneered Crabb.

"And I pick up the bank-roll," agreed the stranger calmly. "That is better than picking up you, my friend."

"But listen hyer. If I go back alone and no message gets through from Judd Rascomb, his mangy pals are goin' gunning!" ejaculated Crabb in sudden alarm. "I—"

"You're a clever man, Crabb, a very clever man, except when it comes to meeting up with a real he-man like Rascomb," cut in the other, and with a sudden jerk of his gun he blew a hole in the centre of Crabb's water can. "The nearest place for a fill-up, my friend, is El Jacinto. Get moving. I am displeased with the trouble to which you have put me. Get moving, before I start saving those mangy cowboys a chance of going gunning!"

Crabb obeyed, there was nothing for it, but his thoughts were in a turmoil of unpleasantness as he set his horse at a gallop for the desert.

He was riding on to the first stretch of the desert before he became aware that hoofs were thundering upon the sunbaked ground not far away from him, and fresh alarm leapt into his heart as he saw that the riders were the sheriff and two of his men.

But as quickly as there came alarm there came relief. His eyes glinted as he spurred his horse towards the sheriff.

"Hi! Sheriff!" he shouted. "I've been held up and robbed!"

The sheriff jerked his horse up and waited for the now eager Crabb to come up. But there was very little sympathy in the sheriff's eyes. He did not like Crabb, and in consequence paid a little more heed to the rumours involving his and Rankin's names than might otherwise have been the case.

"Well, what happened?" he demanded shortly.

"I was taking in a bank-roll with Judd Rascomb, foreman of Bar W, from which we've taken over a big herd," explained Crabb breathlessly. "He shot me through the wrist. Look at it!"

"Looks more like a bee sting!" grunted the sheriff.

"It's a bullet right enough. I've got it, suppose I ought to know!" growled Crabb, stung into a retort. "He was joined by a man with a white sombrero. They've gone up into the mountain, and I reckon if you send your man round the pass and cut them off they'll fight."

"That means trouble; we shan't escape altogether," murmured the sheriff, with a thoughtful stare towards the towering mountains.

"Then shoot 'em out. They've got revolvers, but you can get rifles," said Crabb. "I'll tell you, they've got a bank-roll belonging to Rankin and me. You've got to shoot 'em out!"

The sheriff did not reply. He drew his gun instead and sent three shots up into the air as a signal to his posse, which was scattered over the fringe of the desert.

"I see Judd Rascomb also shot a hole in your water can," he observed, whilst he awaited the coming of his men.

"Sure he did," agreed Crabb. The sheriff merely nodded, and looked round keenly to see that his men were riding in to him from all directions. But it was from the front that the most startling rider came—a rider the sight of whom nearly sent Crabb into a fit.

It was a rider with a great white sombrero!

Crabb fairly panted for breath, and his hands went down in a panic for his guns. But his holsters were empty.

"That's the man with the white sombrero—shoot him down before he gets the drop on the whole bunch of us—I ain't got a gun!" he gasped.

"I ain't shooting no man until I has to," said the sheriff. "Looks to me, by the way he's swaying in his saddle, that he's been hurt. Keep your guns handy, boys, but don't shoot unless he starts monkey—"

"It's Slim!" exclaimed one of the men. "Hi, Slim! Where did you get that bonnet?"

"I'm all tied up, you gump! Come and cut these darned ropes!" hooted Slim, who was one of the sheriff's posse.

There was considerable laughter whilst the rider was freed from the ropes, but they had to wait for Slim's explanation until he had finished telling the world exactly what he thought of a certain person.

"I ain't seen him before, but I'm just longing to see him again!" he grunted. "I am goin' to sock that guy in the jaw! Roped me, he did, as I rode in at your signal, sheriff, and put his sombrero on my head—just to give some of you some gun play, as he put it!"

"It was Judd Rascomb's pal!" said Crabb with emphasis.

"I don't know about that—Rascomb wasn't with him," said Slim. "I saw that guy last night at the ranch house, and I saw him this morning talking to his cowpunchers. No—Judd Rascomb weren't there. It was the mystery galoot of the passes!"

"Anyway," said Crabb, growing a little more desperate in his desire to get the bandit well into the sheriff's net. "The man with the white sombrero was with Rascomb, because they both held me up!"

The sheriff again did not reply. He was looking up towards the mountains with a thoughtful stare upon his face.

"They'll have to stick up there—and the sun ain't too kind to them as has to cross the mountain. Slim—get some of the boys around the other side, and they'll stop any escape that way. I'll shoot 'em out if necessary, but I reckon it would be better to let 'em stay up there until thirst drives 'em down with their hands reachin' fer the skies. Get going!"

"O.K., sheriff."

"You come on back to the ranch with me, Crabb. I want to talk with Rankin."

On the Mountain Top!

JUDD RASCOMB rode up the mountain side with anxiety beginning to tear at his heart. He had twenty thousand dollars in his shirt and saddle bags—and those dollars had got to be taken over the top of the mountain, down the other side, and to the express office in Corral City if it was the last thing he ever did.

But he knew that he was face to face with the most difficult task he had ever been set. If, as he now suspected more than ever, Crabb was in league with the Man in the White Sombrero, it was certain that the whole range would be guarded by their men.

His greatest hope was that if he could get into a position from which he could shoot on either side of him without being got at from the rear, Gila Red, Tenderfoot and Sweetheart would come out hunting for him. They were reliable fellows, great gunners, and even if they came against the bandits, they would get back for the sheriff and his posse, return to the fight, and thus get at him.

It was the white sombrero that played the greatest part in that mountain drama.

Once he had got to the mountain top, and had hidden his horse behind some sheltering boulders, Judd slipped from the saddle and had a good look round.

Below him, clustered into a little black, dot-like cluster, was a gang of men, amongst whom none was really prominent except a man with a white sombrero.

Judd watched them, his guns in his hands, a grim smile at the corners of his lips.

He moved a few inches, and poked his hat over the top of the boulder which was acting as his rear shield. A fraction of a second later a bullet whistled through the air, and up from the valley came the sound of the gun report.

The grim smile became more grim than ever. Already the sun was beginning to scorch his shoulders. His throat was getting dry, his lips becoming hard and like sandpaper to his tongue, and his eyes blurred by the fierceness of the glare.

He watched the party on the plain below, and saw them scatter around the mountain, whilst a number of them spread themselves out at the foot of the mountain. Two of them mounted their horses and rode at a hand gallop across the desert, and disappeared in a cloud of dust in the distance. That was a move Judd could not understand.

"Might be going for rifles," he muttered. "I can hold 'em off so long as they keep to their guns, but rifles—Judd, my son, if they start up with

Our Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

rifles before Gila Red and the others get anxious and come out around here, you're for a bit of lead!"

It was in his mind in a flash that even if the rifles did not get him out of his little fortress, the sun was going to make things equally unpleasant. He reflected, grimly, that one thing he would have to do was drive his horse down, for he was not going to have the gallant beast suffering the agonies of thirst if he could help it.

For hours he laid up there amidst the sheltering boulders, now and again sending a warning shot whistling down into the valley to show that he was very much on the look-out. Once or twice a bullet spattered against the boulders in a manner that confirmed his suspicions that he was not the only one who was on the watch!

His throat was more than parched an hour before sundown. It was positively cracking, so dry was it. His head was aching, his hands were feeling swollen and burning with the exposure to the glaring rays of the sun—but the fingers around his triggers were steady enough.

It was nature that beat him in the long run. His spirit kept him going until he became so sleepy that the heavy lids dropped over his eyes and he fell into a doze.

For five minutes he lay as still as though he were part of the massive mountain top, his head below cover of a great boulder and between his outstretched arms.

Then there came an interruption he did not see. It was from a man who crawled cautiously forward until he could reach out and silently draw away the saddle-bags. They were pushed back behind the newcomer, who then started the more difficult task of getting his hand into Judd's shirt to remove the envelopes containing the dollars.

It was only the slightest touch that his fingers made upon Judd's chest—but it brought Judd back to life with startling suddenness—and his two guns bearing upon the stranger.

"Leave those saddle-bags!" he snapped out, but his eyes were dizzy from the glare of the sun.

"You may have them, my friend," said the stranger. "I have just peeped into them. You have more money in your shirt."

"And it is stopping there if I have to blow holes in you as big as dollars!" growled Judd.

"That would do you no good, my friend. I am in just the same position as you. Perhaps, if we get through here, you may be inclined to pass over a share of that money. Look!"

He held his hand cautiously over the boulder, and a second later brought it back quickly as a bullet crashed against the boulder within an inch of it.

"You see," he explained, with a smile. "I also am wanted."

Judd nodded, and lowered his guns again.

"Those bandits have sure got us tied up here, stranger!" he said, and wondered what made him think the stranger's smile was sarcastic. "Say, now that there are two of us, what about one keeping a watch and the other taking a bit of sleep?"

"Suits me plenty!" agreed the other.

The stranger had reason to be positively grateful for that suggestion. He knew that the men who fired up at them at the slightest sign of a hand, foot or head were the sheriff's men—it would be quite useful to him to have Judd's watchful eyes on their possible approach whilst he himself had a sleep.

So, turn and turn about, they watched ceaselessly through the short night, grateful for the fact that there was no burning sun to add to their difficulties, but longing for the dawn to relieve them of the necessity of constantly straining their eyes.

It was just after dawn that Judd's horse gave a sudden, warning whinny—and in a flash Judd was peering cautiously over the boulders down towards the valley.

Two men were coming up the trail—one with a rifle, and the other with a big white sombrero on his head. Two flashing shots from Judd's guns sent the men scattering back—without the rifle or the hat. They reposed upon the trail, with a bullet-hole in the hat and the blue barrel of the rifle broken and useless.

"They have no need to come for us, my friend," said the stranger, with a grim smile. "The sun will crack us as surely as any belt of bullets. Pleasant thought, is it not?"

"I have some friends on the other side of that gang," said Judd hopefully. "They'll sure be out after me before the day has gone through. And then, mister, helieve me, there'll be some scatterin' by those bandits below!"

And once again, to save drying up their throats and tongues more than they already were dry, they relapsed into a watchful silence.

Down in the valley the sheriff and Crabb, with Rankin, watched from the moment dawn showed up the mountain top. Crabb had a rifle, and only the presence of the sheriff stopped him taking aim on the two little blobs that occasionally offered him a mark.

"There's to be no shooting if we can help it—the sun will get 'em down before midday!" the sheriff had said.

Crabb was furious. He wanted nothing better than that dead men should be brought down the trail. Both the man who had sent Slim in, roped and with his own white sombrero, and Judd Rascomb would spill a few beans if they came down alive.

On the other hand, the sheriff was distinctly curious.

"I just can't make out, Crabb," he said, without taking his eyes from the mountain top, "how you came to have a hole in your wrist from a bullet as big as a pea, and a hole in your water-cann which was made by a forty-five."

That question was not to be answered then. Two shots broke upon the stillness of the air, and the sheriff jumped. He jumped again as an answering two shots came from the mountain top.

But those that flew downwards did not damage. Those that had swept upwards had found a billet.

It was not Judd who suffered. It was the stranger, who had crawled to the rear boulders to see how they were covered on the pass, who stopped those bullets.

He crawled back to Judd, gasping: "They've got me, my friend!" he muttered.

Judd just looked at him. He could do nothing then—there was not a drop of water between them. But he winced at the thought of what would be the situation a few hours later, when the sun, already warm and rising, was at its height.

Brought Down.

THREE horsemen thundered up to the sheriff an hour after dawn. They were Gila Red, Tenderfoot and Sweetheart, and they looked up the mountain trail in a vain effort to catch sight of their foreman. They had scorned the idea of Judd having held up Crabb, but it certainly seemed funny that Judd was still up there—and shoot-

"Say, I reckons that if I walks up that trail, sheriff, Judd will recognise me and not shoot!" said Gila Red. "Better still—if Sweetheart and Tenderfoot come with me, he'll recognise all three of us. Judd Rascomb ain't no bandit—he won't shoot his own pals!"

The sheriff hesitated, and Crabb hung on to the law man's answer with far more eagerness than he hoped he was showing.

"I think that's a likely plan, boys," said the sheriff quietly. "If you are ready to take the risk—"

"Risk?" Gila Red sneered. "There ain't no risk, sheriff. Judd won't shoot me up, for one!"

"None of us!" added Tenderfoot and Sweetheart together, and as if an order had been given, they dropped from their saddles and started the walk up the trail.

The sheriff moved up with them, keeping on to the sheltering boulders as much as possible—and it was when they had mounted two hundred feet of the trail that they were joined by Martha.

Her pretty face expressed her anxiety. It might have been because her father was amidst the men below, but it might also have been because Judd Rascomb was up there on the mountain-top.

Suddenly a gun flashed out from one of the posse, who was watching from a hiding-place on their right—and a shriek went up from Martha that echoed far across the valley.

"Oh, don't shoot him—don't shoot him!" she cried.

The effect was amazing. Judd Rascomb's form appeared at its full height upon the top of the mountain, his hands held high above his head.

He had recognised Martha's voice, and the fact that this party was Rankin's or the sheriff's, and not the bandits was instantly impressed upon him.

Crabb, from the rear, knew that the game was up. Without an instant's hesitation he raised his rifle, took a quick aim, and pulled the trigger.

Martha shrieked again, and Gila Red turned round savagely.

"You blamed dolt!" he snarled. "He had his hands reachin' fer the skies!"

"I thought he was dropping them for his guns!" muttered Crabb. "I ain't taking no risks with that bandit—I have had one bullet!"

"If you've done him in, there's another follerin' him to the happy huntin' grounds mighty quick!" grated Tenderfoot. "That's you, mister—so get your prayers back to mind!"

They fairly flashed up the trail, the Bar W men well in the lead, with Martha ahead of the others.

The sight that met their eyes was not a pleasant one. Judd was lying on the ground, a tiny trickle of red flowing down the side of his face. Another man was lying on his side, groaning.

Martha rushed to Judd, with Gila and Tenderfoot at her side. The sheriff moved to the stranger, with Crabb standing just behind him, hoping against hope that no word would come from those lips. Judd could not do him nearly so much damage—there was a good chance of his being able to explain away any accusations from Rascomb.

But the dreaded words came. "Who are you, stranger?" asked the sheriff, as he gently turned the man over on to his back, and got his arms under the shoulders to raise him.

"Me? Me?" said the other dully. "Oh—you're the sheriff! Gee! I don't think you're going to have much on me, sheriff. I'm Boston the Bandit!"

"Boston!"
The man nodded.

"When I have passed in, sheriff, have a look round and pick up my partner, Crabb!" he went on, his voice growing very soft and dim. "He double-crossed me. You will find that the saddle-bags contain only strips of paper and sand; there is no gold-dust or notes. He's got them. Judd Rascomb is all O.K., sheriff. You've just got to pick up Crabb, even though it is I, Boston the Bandit, who asks you. He is a yellow-spined rat!"

Crabb was frantic. He took one fleeting glimpse at Judd's pals, who were already getting their foreman back to life. He took another glance at the sheriff, who shot him one grim glance before again turning to Boston the Bandit.

In a flash Crabb stumbled over to Gila Red and snatched at the gun in his belt. A split second later he had grabbed at Martha and dragged her to him.

"Stay where you are, you bunch!" he said, between his teeth. "Shoot—and you shoot the girl! Stay where you are!"

"Put down that gun, Crabb!" snapped the sheriff.

"I'll put it down when I've got a horse and can make for the border!" sneered Crabb.

And he started to move backwards down the trail, using Martha as a shield, and Gila Red's gun poking straight at the rest of them.

Judd Rascomb rose as Crabb moved, and followed him down the trail. But he had very faint hopes of being able to do anything, for Crabb had the drop on them. He would shoot if one of them moved a hand towards a gun.

But help came from a totally unexpected quarter.

Oswald, arriving after having been thrown from his horse—which necessitated a long and careful dusting of his gorgeous raiment—saw what was happening, and took out the big revolver Judd had given him in exchange for the "pea-shooter."

He grasped the butt with two hands, not at all sure what was going to happen, levelled it at Crabb, shut his eyes hard, and pulled the trigger.

The shock of the explosion sent him backwards. It made a thoroughly startled Crabb turn in amazement and despair. And it gave Judd Rascomb just sufficient time to take a short run and a flying leap at Crabb's gun arm, bend it down, and twist it behind his back.

"That's where Oswald plays a man's part," chuckled Judd. "You may as well pack in, Crabb! You're for the sheriff!"

Crabb tried to fight; it was useless and hopeless. Big as he was, he was as putty in Judd's grip. In a matter of only seconds he was standing, a prisoner, panting and gasping with fear.

"Boston lied," he almost moaned.

"Sure, that's why you tried to get away!" snapped the sheriff. "Take him down, boys! Comin', Rankin?"

"Sure. But I'd like to know if this foreman is looking for a partnership," said Rankin. "I shall want another now that Crabb is going!"

"A partnership?" Judd laughed, as he turned his gleaming eyes to Martha.

"Sure, I'm looking for a partnership, mister!"

And they wondered why Martha suddenly turned and ran down the trail.

But they ceased to wonder when Judd Rascomb ran after her, caught up with her, and pushed his arm gently around her, shoulders.

(By permission of the British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Charles Delaney and Virginia Brown Faire.)

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. A grand serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama. Starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

"HEROES of the FLAMES"

READ THIS FIRST.

While en route with his comrades to the scene of a fire, Bob Darrow, of the San Francisco Brigade, saves the life of a boy who falls in front of one of the monster engines.

Later he calls on James Madison, head of a chemical company, to whom he puts up an idea for a patent fire-extinguisher. Madison is not interested, and Bob leaves disappointed, after meeting Dan Mitchell, a shady promoter who is befriending Madison for his own ends.

That afternoon Bob rescues June Madison from a fire in her father's office, then learns that the boy he had saved from the wheels of the fire-engine was Madison's son, Jackie.

In gratitude, Madison helps Bob to perfect his invention, the Darrow Fire-Bomb. But Dan Mitchell is anxious to sell Madison an extinguisher of his own, and to discredit Bob he sends a hireling to "doctor" the fireman's invention with a deadly explosive.

The ruse fails to shake Madison's faith, particularly as Bob agrees to drive a car that Madison is sponsoring in a big road race. Bob wins the event, with Pat Heeley, a fellow fireman, as mechanic. But the machine has been tampered with by one of Mitchell's hirelings, and crashes just beyond the finishing-line.

Now Read On.

The Casualties.

THE smouldering wreckage of the Brown Special racing-car lay on its side near the fencing of the track, and as the dust raised by the crash cleared away the figures of Bob Darrow and Pat Heeley were disclosed. They had been flung from the machine and were stretched out a few yards from it, neither of them showing the least sign of life as the masses of spectators in the stands gazed down at them in awe and horror.

EPISODE 5.

"THE AVALANCHE."

In all that vast crowd, however, none was more moved by the catastrophe than June or her father. Nor was anyone more secretly elated than Dan Mitchell, whose conviction that Bob Darrow was dead detracted from his chagrin at the Brown Special's triumph in the race.

"Yes," he repeated to James Madison, "your car was first across the line. You won all right, but you killed Darrow to do it."

Madison was standing with bowed head, but suddenly he roused himself and strode for the gangway that led to the track. Pale and trembling, June followed him, and Dan Mitchell brought up the rear.

Already a party of police-officers, track-attendants and Pressmen were running towards the scene of the disaster, but the first to reach the spot was the official medical officer of the Speedway. Sinking to his knees beside Bob's prone form he made a cursory examination.

"Is he hurt badly?" a policeman asked.

The doctor shook his head. "No," he answered, to the relief of those who heard him. "He's all right. Just stunned, that's all. He's lucky, though."

Some of those who had dashed on to the track had made for Pat, and now they called to the medical officer urgently.

"Hey, doctor, come over here. - It looks like this fella is hurt plenty."

The doctor hurried across to Pat, and was running his hands over him when a stretcher arrived, and it was as the medical officer was giving instructions for the injured Irishman to be lifted on to the stretcher that Mitchell and the Madisons gained the track.

James Madison pushed his way towards Bob, and June stumbled after him. They sank down beside the fireman and raised his head.

"Bob!" June cried distractedly. "Oh, Bob! Are you hurt?"

His eyes were closed. His blackened face looked deathly pale under the grime and oil that streaked it. With an agony of terror in her expression, June turned to a police-officer close by. "Is he dead?" she whispered.

The doctor returned at that moment, having rendered first-aid to Pat Heeley, and as he heard June's words he glanced down at her with a reassuring smile.

"No, he isn't dead, Miss Madison," he put in. "He isn't even hurt. Just stunned, that's all. Got the wind knocked out of him. Hallo, he seems to be coming round!"

He was right, for with a half-stifled groan Bob raised himself a little higher. Next second he found himself gazing up at familiar faces.

"Mr. Madison," he breathed, and then: "June-June!"

"You won, Bob!" June told him with a hysterical catch in her voice. "You won!"

Bob propped himself on his elbow with an effort. A look of anxiety had appeared in his eyes all at once.

"Pat!" he exclaimed. "Where's Pat? Is he—is he hurt?"

"Get him into the ambulance, boys," he heard someone say just then, and struggling round, he saw the Irishman being carried across the track.

The doctor laid a hand on Bob's arm. "Don't worry," he told him. "Your friend will be all right."

"Is he badly hurt, doctor?" asked June's father.

"A dislocated shoulder-blade, I think," the medical man replied, "but he'll soon mend. His kind take a lot of killing," he added with a twinkle in his eye.

Bob was now trying to rise, and willing hands helped him to his feet. He swayed a little, so that June and her father clutched him anxiously.

"You ought to lie down for a spell," June pleaded. "You've had a bad shake-up, Bob."

"No, I'll be okay," Bob answered gamely, and managed to steady himself. June's father gripped him by the arm.

"Darrow," he said gratefully, "you were magnificent. The Brown Special's victory will make motoring history, and, incidentally, a fortune for me. As for that ten thousand dollar bet I made with Dan Mitchell, it's yours. You've earned every cent of it."

Bob scarcely seemed to be listening.

"I've got to get to the hospital and find out just how seriously Pat has been injured," he faltered. "If he's badly hurt, the race hasn't been worth winning."

"That's a fine thought, Darrow," Madison declared. "We'll all go and see that he's taken care of. I'll get my car out of the parking ground."

He hurried off, leaving Bob with June. Dan Mitchell remained, too, a silent figure standing with lips compressed into a thin, vicious line.

The Face at the Window.

A CAR drew up outside the imposing iron gates that opened on to the drive of the Madison home. A figure stepped out of the automobile and slipped stealthily through the gateway to plunge into the dense masses of shrubbery that covered the grounds.

It was the burly figure of the ruffianly Spike Beldon, Dan Mitchell's henchman.

Night had fallen an hour previously, a night without stars or moon, and the gloom favoured Spike as he advanced towards the house. Creeping through the bushes, he made his objective a light which gleamed in the sitting-room window, and, after a cautious approach, he reached the sill.

The sound of music came from beyond the window, and as Spike raised his head warily and peered into the room he saw June Madison's profile.

She was sitting at a piano, and her fingers were running delicately and skillfully over the keys. Beside her stood Bob Darrow, and he was listening to her playing with keen appreciation.

June brought the melody to its conclusion and turned to Bob smilingly. Crouching by the window, Spike Beldon ducked down at once, but, lifting his head again a moment later, he observed that the girl seemed too engrossed in her companion to notice any eaves-dropper.

"You played that exquisitely, June," Bob was saying. "Thank you."

"I always strive to please," June told him, with a whimsical curtsy. "Have you any other favourites?"

"Plenty," he rejoined, "but it would take you the whole evening to play them all, and you must be tired, anyway. Let's talk."

She nodded.

"Yes, let's talk," she said. "Let's talk about the race you won. Oh, Bob," she added fervently, "you've no idea how I felt when I saw you open your eyes after you'd been hurt."

"I guess it was my lucky day," he murmured. "By all theories, Pat and I should have been killed."

"It was my lucky day, too," June mused. "If you hadn't come in first with the Brown Special I'd have been on my way to the altar now—and all because of a mad, reckless promise."

There was a moment's silence, and then June spoke again.

"If Dan Mitchell had won that ten thousand dollars," she said, "he was going to buy an engagement ring."

"Yes," Bob answered. "And maybe that's why I was so determined he wouldn't win the bet."

June lowered her glance.

"Well, he didn't win it," she said softly. "Dad won the wager, and made over the ten thousand to you. What are you going to buy with it?"

Bob started. Could she mean that, if he chose to make her a present of an engagement ring, she would accept him? He could see no other significance in her words, and was overjoyed to put that conception on them. But at the same time he felt tremendously embarrassed, for, like a good many men of proven courage, he fairly flinched from a proposal of marriage.

"Well," he stammered, "I thought—I thought that—that if your father—"

"My father likes you, Bob," June coaxed.

"Yes, he seems to, doesn't he?" Bob agreed. "Of course, I didn't want to take that ten thousand, but, since he insisted, I split it with Pat, and—"

"Yes, Bob?"

"Well, you know your father has been having a new laboratory fitted out in his warehouse," Bob continued. "It's complete now, and I've got enough money to carry on with my experiments."

June's face fell.

"Oh, experiments!" she reiterated.

"Why, yes—experiments on my fire-extinguisher," he explained. "You see, the chemicals I bought were ruined that day I discovered they'd been tampered with. You remember—the day we were to have tried out the fire-bombs on that old shed in your father's grounds."

"I remember, Bob," June told him.

"Those chemicals are pretty costly," Bob went on, "but with the cash your father gave me I can get hold of some more. Now Thursday's my day off at the Fire Department, and I'm going to take the formula for my extinguisher to the warehouse laboratory then."

June looked away.

"And experiment, of course," she said.

"Yes," he replied, "and if everything turns out the way I hope it will, there's something—I'm going to tell you. At least—something I'm going to ask you."

Their eyes met.

"Can't you ask me now?" she urged, and then, with a slight flush, glanced away again.

With the movement her gaze travelled to the window, and suddenly a scream broke from her lips. Bob jerked round, but was too late to see the figure of the man who darted from the sill and took to his heels through the shrubbery.

"June—what is it?" Bob demanded.

"A face!" she gasped. "A man's face at the window!"

Bob waited to hear no more, but, crossing the room in a few swift strides, swung himself over the sill and dropped to the grounds. Somewhere ahead of him he heard the thrashing of foliage as the interloper charged through the shrubbery, and he set off in full pursuit, running at the top of his speed.

Not once did he sight the fugitive in the gloom, but he knew he was heading for the gateway at the end of the drive, and he dashed in the same direction—only to reach it as Spike Beldon scrambled into the waiting car and drove off.

Bob came to a baffled standstill, unable even to obtain a glimpse of the auto's number plate, and he returned to the house empty-handed. When he showed up in the sitting-room again it was to find that June had been joined by her father, who had heard her cry.

"I saw a man's face at the window," June was saying. "Bob chased him."

"Did you know the man?" her father asked, and June shook her head.

"No," she answered. "It wasn't anyone I'd ever seen before. It was a mean, crafty face."

"The fellow got clear away," said Bob, entering at that juncture. "He had a car parked in the middle of the road. I didn't even get a good look at him."

Madison pursed his lips.

"Darrow," he announced emphatically, "someone is after your formula."

"Yes," Bob rejoined, "someone who probably thinks I'm still carrying on my experiments here. But I complete my work on Thursday, Mr. Madison, and then—"

Spike Receives His Orders.

IN the office where he affected to carry on business as a genuine promoter, Dan Mitchell outlined a fresh plan of action to his hireling Beldon.

"Never mind about June Madison, Spike," he said, as Beldon introduced the girl's name into the conversation. "I'll take care of her. All you've got to do is to get Darrow."

Spike settled himself on the edge of Mitchell's desk.

"I can get him," he drawled. "Thursday night—at the new laboratory in the Madison warehouse."

Mitchell nodded.

"And he'll have the formula with him, you say? Good—that's what I want. Listen, Spike, I'm trying new tactics. Once I can lay my hands on Darrow's extinguisher and get Darrow himself out of the way, I can put our own patent over on Madison. And as for June—well, I know how to bring her round." And he smiled complacently.

Spike Beldon slid from the corner of the desk and gave vent to a scuffling laugh.

"You think you do," he retorted. "But I'm telling you that June Madison is nuts about this gny Darrow, and you ain't got a chance."

He turned away mockingly, and was lighting the stub of a cigarette that hung from the corner of his mouth when Mitchell jerked to his feet and gripped him by the arm.

"Listen, Spike," he snapped, swinging him round. "If June Madison—"

Whatever he had intended to say was left unsaid, for suddenly he checked himself and glanced at the door of his office. Against the glass panel of it he saw a woman's shadow, and, signing to Spike to remain silent, he moved to the door on tip-toe and unexpectedly wrenched it open.

A flashily-dressed girl stumbled across the threshold, and Mitchell caught her viciously by the wrists as she recovered her balance.

"Trixie Farrell, huh?" he snarled. "Spying on me, huh?"

The woman's dark eyes blazed ominously. A few months before, she had been a favourite of Mitchell's. But she had reason to believe that he was putting her to one side, and the snatch of conversation that had just reached her ears seemed to confirm her suspicions.

"No," she told him, "I wasn't spying! I came here to see you. But I heard what you said about June Madison!" she added fiercely. "And if you think you can give me the gate for another dame—"

"Shut up and come in here!" Mitchell interrupted, and, pulling her into the office, he slammed the door.

He glared at her for a moment and then turned to Spike Beldon.

"All right," he jerked, "get after that formula. Take Butch and Merlin with you, and don't make any blunders."

"Okay, Mitch," Spike answered, and took his leave.

As he departed, Mitchell faced Trixie again. His resentment towards her had cooled somewhat, and he decided that it would be wise to appease her. She was a woman of temperament, and consequently dangerous, and he was shrewd enough to realise that it would not be policy to antagonise someone who knew so much concerning his affairs.

"Now, listen, Honey," he appealed, "I'm not interested in June Madison, not in the way you think, anyhow. She's only a means to get at her father's money, and if we lay hands on Darrow's formula to-night—I'll never see her again."

"But you told Spike—"

Mitchell interrupted her. "Bah," he explained, "I don't tell Spike Beldon everything. Now you run along and I'll see you to-night." And he took her in his arms and kissed her.

"All right, Dan," Trixie Farrell murmured. "To-night, then."

He led her to the door, said 'good-bye' to her and retraced his steps to his desk. As he reached it he at once took up the telephone and spoke into the mouth-piece.

"Give me Bayside 7710," he called.

He did not guess that Trixie had not altogether been deceived by his lies, and that on an afterthought she had paused outside the door.

"Hallo," he went on, "Bayside 7710? Oh, is that you, June?"

A pause, and then:

"I'm coming over to see you, June," Mitchell continued. "I've something very important to tell you. I know you'll be interested."

Standing outside the office door, listening to the charm in his voice, Trixie Farrell clenched her hands furiously. For an instant her impulse was to confront Mitchell again and create a 'scene', but it was an impulse that she quelled, and with a brooding expression on her face she made her way to the lift.

When Dan Mitchell left the premises there was no sign of her, and his mind was completely at ease as he hailed a taxi and gave the Madisons' address. He arrived at the palatial home on the outskirts of the city twenty minutes later, and a maid showed him into a room where June was sitting at a bureau.

"Oh, hallo, Dan," she greeted him, as he pulled up a chair beside her.

"Good evening, June," Mitchell returned. "Gee! You're looking lovelier than ever."

"You always were good at flattery, Dan," June reproached. "But what was it you wanted to see me about?"

He leaned forward and took her hands, but with a whimsical little smile she drew them free.

"June," he said, "I want to tell you how much I think of you—because I believe that you once cared for me."

"Oh, dad and I have always regarded you as a very good friend, Dan," June told him.

"But you might have looked on me as something more than a friend if this fortune-hunting fireman hadn't come between us," Mitchell retorted bitterly.

June resented the words, but kept her feelings under control.

"Now, Dan," she said, "that isn't nice—"

She was interrupted by the ringing of a 'phone bell, and, cutting short the conversation, reached for the instrument.

"Pardon me, Dan," she murmured. Then, lifting the receiver: "Hallo—? Yes, this is Mr. Madison's home—No. Mr. Darrow is not here. Who wants to speak to him?"

It was a woman's voice at the other end of the wire, and the woman was Trixie Farrell.

"Never mind who I am, sister," she told June, her lip curling viciously as she spoke into the mouth-piece. "Just tell that sap fireman there's a gang after his formula—and they're going to lay for him to-night. Do you get me?"

June's face had paled. "Wait!" she exclaimed. "Don't ring off—" But even as she uttered the words she heard the click of the receiver as the other woman replaced it on its hook.

"She's gone!" breathed June, turning to Dan Mitchell.

"She?" he echoed. "What do you mean, June? What's the matter? You look as if you'd heard the voice of a ghost or something."

June faltered out an explanation. "It was some woman, calling from a public 'phone-hooth," she panted. "She said a gang was going to attack Bob. I've got to warn him!" And she picked up the receiver again.

"Hallo, hallo—Operator—"

Mitchell's face had hardened. A woman—giving away his plans. Trixie Farrell!

But this was no moment to rage inwardly against betrayal. In a few seconds June would be in touch with Bob Darrow, and Mitchell had to do some fast thinking, or his scheme must fail.

The 'phone-wire ran past his foot, and, with June crouching over the mouth-piece with her back to him, he entangled the cord around his shoe and snapped the connection with a single wrench.

"Hallo, operator— Operator—"

June crammed down the receiver and scrambled to her feet.

"The 'phone's dead!" she gasped. "Listen, Dan, Bob is at the warehouse with dad. I've got to get to them!"

She wheeled and ran from the room. Mitchell, snatching his hat, hurried after her, but he did not make up to her until she was out on the drive, where her roadster was standing.

"June!" he shouted, as he saw her climbing into the car. "Wait, June. There's nothing you can do down there."

But June did not heed him.

"Hurry, if you're coming!" she cried, pressing the self-starter and stepping on the clutch-pedal.

Mitchell bundled himself into the car as it swept forward along the drive.

The Attack.

TRAVELLING from his City office to the warehouse where the new laboratory had been fitted up, James Madison found Bob Darrow already installed there.

"Hallo, Darrow!" said Madison, as he entered the lab.

"Evening, Mr. Madison," Bob rejoined, holding up a vial into which he had just poured some liquid. "I've just finished mixing up a small quantity of my extinguisher, following the directions of the formula there." And he indicated a document lying on a bench near by.

"Fine!" said Madison. "Then we're all set for the test?"

"Yes," Bob answered, "and I'm going to prove to you, right here in this room, that this small amount of the mixture I've invented will put out a pretty fair-sized fire."

His eyes were closed. His blackened face looked deathly pale under the grime and oil that streaked it.

Laying down the vial he walked to the far end of the laboratory and returned with a large sheet of tin which he placed in the middle of the floor. On this metal base he then proceeded to build a formidable beacon out of quantities of wastepaper and inflammable rubbish.

"You're sure it's safe to start a fire as big as that in this old warehouse, Bob?" Madison asked doubtfully.

"Safe?" Bob echoed. "Of course it's safe. If I didn't think it was safe I wouldn't do it. I hate fires."

And he grinned amusedly.

Alone in the old warehouse, Bob and Madison completed the preparations for the experiment. At least, they imagined they were alone, but from behind the door of a cupboard in a dim corner of the laboratory three pairs of eyes were watching every movement, and three ruffianly intruders awaiting their opportunity to launch a surprise rush.

"There, Mr. Madison," said Bob at length, "I'll set light to this heap of rubbish now and show you why I think the experiment is perfectly safe. For I guarantee my extinguisher will quench it at once."

Stooping, he struck a match and held it to the pile. Flames began to rise from it, coiling rapidly towards the lofty ceiling.

"That ought to make a pretty good blaze," Bob commented, as he drew back to give the fire time to reach its height.

Sixty seconds passed. The pile of rubbish in the middle of the floor was fairly in the grip of the flames now, flames that writhed up in a fierce, lurid column.

Compelled to retreat from the blast of heat that smote him Madison glanced at Bob anxiously.

"If your extinguisher quells that fire," he declared, "there won't be any doubt as to its effectiveness."

Bob reached for the vial on the bench.

"And this is all I'm going to use," he reminded Madison. "Something less than a pint of the mixture. Now for it!"

He lifted the vial, but as he was in the very act of raising it above his head a shout from Madison arrested him. He spun round and saw that the older man was staring towards the far end of the laboratory, and, following the direction of his startled gaze, he discerned Spike Beldon and his associates slinking from the cupboard where they had been concealed.

The thugs rushed forward the instant they knew that their victims had taken the alarm, and before he could put himself on the defensive a smashing blow to the face drove Bob into the wall.

The vial dropped from his hand with a crash, and its precious contents spilled over the floor ten paces from the inferno on which Bob had intended to throw them.

But the vial and fire-extinguishing chemicals had ceased to be of prime importance to Bob. Recovering, he flung himself at the rogue who had struck him, and with a terrific uppercut knocked him flying into the midst of the blazing rubbish.

Flaming scraps of paper were littered over the floor. The crook, squealing in a panic, picked himself up and stumbled clear of the beacon with hair singed and clothes scorched.

Meanwhile Spike Beldon had pounced on Bob and was grappling with him savagely, while the third man tackled Madison.

Madison struck out gamely, but he was past the days when he might have been a formidable proposition in a scuffle. He managed to land a punch that rattled his assailant, but the man came back at him and launched a vicious attack that battered Madison to the floor.

Madison attempted to rise, but the thug lifted his boot and drove it with stunning force against the older man's temple, and with a groan Madison sank again.

The man who had felled him whipped round to lend his comrades a hand, and he speedily realised that his help was needed. For at that moment Bob swung Beldon up in his strong arms and hurled him down with a shock that knocked the breath out of his burly form.

The rogue who had been thrown into the fire now received the brunt of Bob's counter-attack, and was staggered by the fury of it.

"Butch!" he panted. "Get into him, Butch!"

"Okay, Merlin!" Madison's attacker rapped out, and with the words he leapt at Bob pantherishly and tackled him from the rear.

A whirling mix-up ensued, and, locked with his adversaries, Bob reeled back and forth across the laboratory. Sometimes they trampled through the flaming rubbish that had been piled in the middle of the floor, and burning litter was scattered in all directions. Sometimes they crashed heavily into the benches, bringing down costly apparatus in their mêlée and shattering it to fragments.

Butch worked for a trip that would throw the fireman on his back, but was himself swept off his balance and dashed to the floor. Blundering over the prostrate ruffian's body, Bob now broke Merlin's hold, thrust him at arm's-length, and then slammed his fist to the scoundrel's mouth.

Merlin shot backward and hit a tall cupboard set against the wall. The cupboard rocked and swayed as he rebounded from it, then tipped forward on to the beacon in the middle of the floor.

Its doors swung open as it fell, and from its shelves bottles rained down by the score. The smash of wood and the splintering of glass was drowned in the roar of an explosion as a heavy jar shattered itself to pieces and poured a gallon of deadly chemicals into the blaze.

The flash of the report blinded Bob for the instant, but as the scene partially cleared he caught a sudden glimpse of Spike Beldon clutching at a paper on one of the benches. The formula for the Darrow fire-bomb, Bob realised, and with a shout he jumped at the crook and wrested the document from his grasp.

"So that's what you're after," he flung at the three thugs, thrusting the paper into an inside pocket as he backed on the defensive again. "Well, come and get it!"

Butch and Merlin had struggled to their feet, and as Spike was joined by them he led a concerted rush, a rush that was half-checked as a gust of flame intervened. The chemicals that had been spilled from the cupboard were responsible for it, and it was now clear that in a very few minutes the whole laboratory would be ablaze.

The crooks continued their rush, but not with the intention of tackling Bob. Escape was their chief anxiety now, and they flung themselves at Bob only because he happened to stand in their way.

Bob stopped Beldon with a right to the mouth, but Merlin closed with him, and, while they were at grips, Butch dodged to the rear and drove his fist with all his force at the back of the young fireman's neck.

Bob's legs seemed to give, and he sagged to the floor in a senseless heap, and as the cowardly blow felled him the crooks darted from the laboratory.

Debris!

DRIVING at reckless speed towards the docks, where her father's warehouse was situated, June suddenly heard the clang of fire-bells behind her.

Both she and Mitchell turned their heads and saw the giant scarlet engines hurtling into view. Traffic pulled into the gutter at the imperious clamour of their approach, and, swinging aside into a cross-street, June realised that they were the wagons from District Station Number Five, to which Bob was attached.

She steered back into the main thoroughfare when they had passed, and resumed her journey to the Madison warehouse at top speed. It was only when she was in sight of it that she realised the warehouse was the very building to which the Brigade had been called.

The building was in flames. Coils of fire were breaking through its roof and rolling from the windows of its upper floors. A stab of terror seemed to pierce June as she remembered that the laboratory was on the top storey, where the blaze was fiercest.

June pulled up her car on the fringe of a crowd that had gathered to watch the firemen train the hoses on the burning warehouse. Descending from the auto, she began to elbow her way through the mob, and Mitchell was on the point of following her when he saw a man standing on a street-corner.

The man was Spike Beldon, and Spike was beckoning to him frantically. Changing his course, Mitchell hastened towards him.

"They're in there—both of them!" Spike panted, as the promoter joined him.

Mitchell scowled. "Who?" he rapped out. "What are you babbling about, man?"

"Madison and Darrow," Spike blurted. "We got into a fight with 'em, an' they're both knocked out. A fire started in the laboratory, an' they're lyin' up there—the two of them."

Mitchell looked at the blazing warehouse, and his face became a shade paler.

"Come on," he said, gripping Beldon by the arm, "let's get out of here."

They turned and slipped away. Meanwhile, under the directions of Battalion Chief Wilson, the firemen of District Station Number Five were pouring hundreds of gallons of water on to the blaze, the powerful jets from the hoses hissing upward and falling like a deluge into the heart of the inferno.

At that very moment, Bob Darrow was recovering consciousness to find himself surrounded by flames, the heat from which was beating intolerably against his face and hands. Yet his first thought as he struggled to his feet was not of himself, but of June's father, and he called the older man by name.

"Madison!" he shouted hoarsely. "Madison—where are you?"

There was no response, but all at once he made out a figure lying near a bench that had not yet been seized by the fire. It was the senseless form

(Continued on page 27.)

FUN FOR INDOORS AND OUTDOORS — FREE!

Table - tennis, boxing gloves, cricket bats, footballs, yachts, model engines. All kinds of things you want for indoor and outdoor sport are in the new Nestlé's Free Gift Book. Dozens of fine possessions offered to you free. Send for the whole illustrated list—to-day. With it, for a start, comes a voucher for five coupons. And there are one or more coupons with every pack of Nestlé's Chocolate, from the two-penny wrapped bar upwards. What a pleasant way to add to your fun!

G.107. Boxing Gloves. Set of 4, best khaki drill. 185 coupons.

G.77. Sheath Knife. Sheffield blade with leather case. 110 coupons.

G.97. Table-tennis. Two bats, balls, net and table fittings. 45 coupons.

NESTLÉ'S CHOCOLATE

To Nestlé's (Gift Dept.), Silverthorne Road, Battersea, London, S.W.8.

Please send Voucher for 5 FREE COUPONS and the NEW Nestlé's Presentation List. 52.3.10.31

NAME
IN BLOCK CAPITALS

Address.....

This offer applies only to Gt. Britain & N. Ireland. 1d. stamp sufficient if envelope is unsealed

FIVE FREE COUPONS

"THE FLYING FOOL."

(Continued from page 10.)

"What are ground signals?" asked Morella.

The fog was very thick as the official led them on to the gallery. On the ground below gleamed lights that formed the letter "T."

"Those signals are placed according to the wind. A plane must land against the wind. The pilot will see that letter and know that the top of the 'T' indicates the direction of the wind. He can land down the 'T' with safety. If he tried with the wind there would be a serious accident."

Bored Marlow strolled back into the observatory and he heard something that made his face go livid.

"Vincent Floyd. Vincent Floyd. Two thousand feet and needing bearings. Think somewhere over aerodrome, but fog-banks obscure visibility—"

There was more, but Marlow scarcely heeded. Floyd had escaped by some miracle, and was about to land. They had wasted two precious hours in this cursed aerodrome, and now his enemy was on his heels. He glanced at the regulators for the ground signals, and a fiendish scheme flashed to his nimble brain.

Morella was still out on the gallery, and as the woman turned to come back to the observatory, Marlow acted. Swiftly he changed the landing signals.

"Morella, I can't stay another minute." His tone was forceful. "Thanks so much for showing us round. Morella, we must go."

He almost dragged the girl down the spiral stairs into the aerodrome.

"I won't be rushed like this!" cried the outraged Morella. "I want to speak to Jim Lancer."

"Well, I must be off," was Marlow's answer. "I'll ring you up later. Sorry, but I must go."

Outside was his high-powered racing Bentley. The drone of an aeroplane sounded above as he drove fiercely on to the main road.

Floyd did every trick he had ever learnt to avoid the murderous attack of the pursuing plane. A sudden dive and then a climb upwards, a daring loop, a breath-catching spin, and always zigzagging to avoid the ominous machine-gun.

Their nearest escape was when bullets smashed some of his instruments, and would have got the pilot if he hadn't ducked. At last the clouds hid them from sight, and Sid decided to land.

"Floyd's got away—darn him!" he told his two passengers—Bill and the Doctor. "We've got to warn the boss or our number's up. I'm going low, as I'm pretty certain we're nearing Croydon."

And the first pilot to see the ground-lights was Sid.

There was an appalling crash when the machine was carried against the walls of the aerodrome. An explosion, and then lurid tongues of flame. There was never a chance of saving those three men.

The changing of the landing signals had been discovered some minutes after Marlow had sped away, but too late to prevent the catastrophe.

Retribution.

VINCENT FLOYD and Marion made a safe landing.

"Someone's had a crash," were Vincent's first words, pointing towards the flames.

"The ground signals were altered, Mister Floyd," explained a mechanic. "A Mister Marlow was being shown round the aerodrome, and they think he changed them by accident."

"Accident my foot!" rasped Vincent. "He got my message that I wanted to land, and played his last card. Is Marlow here now?"

"Drove off in a powerful Bentley," was the reply. "I believe Mister Lancer is in touch with the police."

"Marion"—Vincent clambered back into his machine—"find Jim and tell him what you know. He'll make for the coast—I wonder which way?"

"Deal and Dover," opined the mechanic. "The fog has lifted from most of Kent as the wind is due west."

"Ring the Yard at once and have every port watched," cried Vincent. "That's in case I don't spot our man. Is he driving a big two-seater Bentley?" The mechanic nodded. "I know the car. Swing the prop—I must be off."

"Oh, do take care, Vincent—dear!" yelled Marion as the engine woke to life.

His answer was a wave of the hand, and soon he vanished into the foggy murk.

Soon Vincent was through the fog and able to look down at the countryside. The light was fading, but objects still stood out clearly. If Marlow were making for Dover he would work round the outskirts of London and then on to the wide main road, or he could work south to Tunbridge Wells and thence to Ashford and Folkestone. Floyd decided to make straight for Dover and to scour all the main roads for his quarry.

And on the road from Folkestone to Dover Floyd espied a speeding car. Quickly he gained and peered earthwards. It was a Bentley, and travelling at an incredible speed.

Vincent came down to two hundred feet and roared along behind the Bentley. Michael Marlow turned, and realised what the plane meant.

For once in his life Marlow lost his head. He felt the hangman's rope round his neck, and his one desire was to escape from a relentless enemy—an enemy who seemed to possess a dozen lives.

On two wheels he slithered the great car round difficult corners, but never could he shake off the pursuing plane.

Mad with fear, Marlow tried to take a corner at reckless speed, and lost control. The Bentley shot over the banking and tore over the grass with Marlow trying to regain control.

At this part of the road the cliff is but a hundred yards from the road. Vincent saw Marlow make an effort to get out of the car, but too late.

The Bentley shot over the cliff like a streak of light, and as the car turned over and over, Vincent Floyd shut his eyes. A dull crash and then a puff of smoke—on the rocks below the chalk cliffs was a blazing wreck.

Vincent made a perfect landing on the cliff. He went forward to peer down at the blazing car. Not a chance of Marlow escaping alive. A violent and a swift death.

The persistent sounds of a motor-horn made Vincent get to his feet. A car was bumping over the grass. Jim Lancer was driving, and by his side was Marion Lee.

"Chasing after you for miles," cried Jim. "Folkestone put us wise. What's happened, Vincent?"

"Fius."

The detective told them of Marlow's end. The three stared down at the burning car.

"I'll run along to Dover and handle this smash," Lancer had noticed the interest that his pal was taking in the girl. "Would you care for me to 'phone Mor—"

"No, thanks," quickly spoke Vincent. "Marion can fly back to London with me. Are you game, dear?" He put an arm round her. "I'd like to have you with me always."

"That suits me," Marion smiled up at him. "But first I must make a confession. I'm not quite all that I seem to be. You see, I joined up with Marlow for a special reason." From a pocket she produced a badge. "This belonged to Hirst." Then, to his surprise, she produced another Pinkerton badge. "This is mine—I was sent to find Hirst."

"You little wonder woman!" Vincent hugged her close, then frowned as Jim Lancer laughed. "Let's beat it, lass. Give me a swing, Jim, and then go and handle those Dover folk."

Somehow Marion managed to squeeze in beside Vincent. A wave of their hands and the machine soared gracefully towards the heavens. (By permission of British International Pictures, starring Henry Kendall, Benita Hume, and Wallace Geoffrey.)

KEEP YOUR BOYS AT HOME!

A family with a Riley "Home" Billiard Table. The 6 ft. size is delivered on first deposit of 13/3d., balance by monthly instalments. Cash Price £11 15s. 7 days' Free Trial allowed to test the table, and Riley's pay carriage and take transit risks, Riley's "Comblne" Billiard and Dining Tables are also offered on easy terms. Send for Free Art List containing sizes and prices of all tables. Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Great Britain.

E. J. RILEY, LTD.,

Howard Works, Accrington, and Dept. 35, 147, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.1.

32 Free Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

BOY DETECTIVES! GREAT NEWS!!

Now ready! THE NEW IMPROVED BOYS' SECRET SERVICE OUTFITS. Better value than ever before! Be up-to-date! SEND RIGHT NOW and get yours by RETURN OF POST!!
 Contents:—1. Novel New "S.S." Secret Odometer (35 different codes by simply turning a dial—a most useful instrument). 2. New "S.S." Call-whistle (for Outdoor Signals). 3. Handsome Silver-finish "S.S." Membership Badge. 4. Phial of marvellous "S.S." Radio Ink (it shines in the dark). 5. Packet of the new Mystic Fire Ink. 6. Phial of "S.S." Invisible Ink (for Secret Messages). 7. Packet of "S.S." Fingerprint Powder. 8. "S.S." Secret Code-Book. 9. New enlarged edition of the fascinating book: "Things the Boy Detective Should Know." 10. Illustrated Bargain Price List of the very latest Boy Tee Outfits and Equipment, jokes, magical goods and novelties. PRICE, complete in box, 1/- only. POST FREE. Also the new IMPROVED SPECIAL PRESENTATION OUTFIT, with contents similar to above, but larger and even better. This outfit also contains one handsome new "S.S." Fingerprint Album, with inking pad combined (a great new novelty), one extra-powerful folding magnifying lens, and the new engrossing book: "Secret Service Glubs and How to Run Them." Price only 2/6. POST FREE. These Outfits absolutely SMASH all previous records for value. Don't hesitate, send TO-DAY to—

THE BOY DETECTIVE SUPPLY STORES, DESK B.C., 32, CATHCART STREET, GREENOCK.
 (Foreign Postage 3d. and 6d. extra respectively.)

October 3rd, 1931.

"SUBWAY EXPRESS."

(Continued from page 14.)

gave a lurch and he fell forward, like this." And he imitated a stumble. "No, no," said Mrs. Mullins, "one of his hands kind of slipped through the open window, like he had clutched at the framework and missed. The other arm was hanging down. Yes, that's right. Now—now he fell forward."

"Oh, like this," exclaimed Killian, and pitched towards Mason as if to clutch his wrist.

"Don't!" Mason screamed the word. His voice, so assured a moment before, rang shrill with terror.

"Don't touch me! Look out!" "Kearney, stop the car," Killian snapped. "Pull the emergency!"

The train squealed to a standstill. "Now we've got somewhere," drawled Killian. "There's an outside connection that you're afraid of, Mason—that's why you cried out the way you did. Kearney, take a look along the track."

"I don't know what you're talking about," Mason panted, his face deathly-white.

Killian made no answer, and stood waiting while the central doors were opened for Kearney. They closed behind the detective, and then re-opened again to admit him a minute or two later. As Kearney climbed into the car with an air of excitement One-Round Dolan, Kansas City Terror, made a stampede for the exit, only to be forced back.

"Where d'yuh think you're goin'?" Kearney roared.

"I gotta fight," Dolan pleaded. Kearney's fist took him neatly in the jaw and threw him back into his seat insensible.

"It's on the posts, inspector," announced Kearney. "The posts in the tunnel between the up-line an' the down. A wire runnin' from the third rail, up one of the pillars to the height o' that window and then along three others. Four in all—I counted 'em."

Killian fixed Mason with a steely eye. "A live wire carrying the current along four posts on a level with the window, eh?" he said. "You weren't taking any chances, Mason, were you? I suppose, by the way, that only a subway employe would have access to those posts?"

"You think that pins the crime on to me?" sneered Mason.

"Not that alone," answered Killian. "You made a slight mistake when you said you didn't know Edward Tracy. On this watch of his there's an inscription that shows it was presented by former associates of the subway. There are six names engraved, and yours happens to be one of them. Put these gloves on him and see if they fit."

"Don't bother," said Mason thickly. "They fit all right."

He was handcuffed. Then, at Killian's command, Kearney ordered the motor-man to head for 72nd Street.

Meanwhile, Killian was demanding details from Mason.

"Did Borden hire you to kill Tracy?" he demanded.

Mason shook his head.

"No, Tracy did the hiring," he rejoined startlingly. "Yes, Tracy. He came to me a month ago with the plan all worked out, and offered me $10,000."

"But—"

"Wait a minute," said Mason. "Just as we reached the posts where I was to do the job the lights went out, and I got Tracy by mistake. I'd meant to get off at 72nd Street and go back to get the wire down, before anything was discovered. But the fight started and the shot ruined everything—"

The train ran alongside the platform of Seventy-Second, and Killian allowed the passengers to alight.

"You can go, too, Borden," he said, "and take Mrs. Tracy with you. Good luck to you both," he added sincerely.

When the crowd had departed Killian turned to his prisoner, who still sat in the seat Tracy had occupied.

"Mason," he asked, "how did a fellow of your intelligence get the wrong man in the dark?"

"That's one of the things I'll keep to myself," Mason answered through clenched teeth.

"Mason," Killian persisted, "between you and me, did you ever know the former Mrs. Tracy—the one that got the rough deal? Were you ever—perhaps—in love with her?"

Mason smiled.

"Between you and me," he said, "that's none of your business."

Killian smiled, too. He knew that his surmise was correct, and all was clear to him now.

Tracy, defaulting to the tune of fifty thousand dollars, and seeing a chance of making a hundred thousand in insurance, had gone to Mason with his dastardly proposal to kill Borden, and had blackmailed Stevens into playing a minor part with the dripping umbrella.

Mason must have pretended to agree, all along seeing his chance of squaring accounts with Tracy. And so these three men—Tracy, Mason, Stevens—had awaited the first wet night.

The wire had been rigged. All was in readiness. To-night, Stevens' umbrella had dripped rain-water—rain-water that had spread in a wide pool about the feet of Tracy and Borden—a pool harmless enough in itself, but a deadly "ground" to the one who was to receive the contact of the copper disc.

Mason had seen to it that that one was Tracy, not Borden.

"Let's go, Mason," said Killian. "The wagon will be waiting."

(By permission of United Artists Film Corporation and Columbia Pictures, Ltd., starring Jack Holt.)

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

(Continued from page 24.)

of Madison, and, lifting him with an effort, Bob managed to revive him a little.

The blaze seemed to have swept towards the door and thence to other parts of the building, and now, with one arm supporting Madison, Bob had to fight his way through a dense swathe of flame. He never knew how he and his companion gained the head of the stairs that led to the floor below, but he did know that a huge fragment of burning roof fell at their heels and peppered them with hot sparks.

They reeled down slight after flight of stairs. On the lower floors there was less danger from fire, but suffocating volumes of smoke filled the entire building and tortured their lungs as they inhaled it. Nor were they by any means beyond the risk of sudden and awful death, for once a mass of flaring timber hurtled past them and crashed into the depths of the staircase well.

They reached the ground floor at last, and, staggering to a door, let themselves out into the street. Madison was at the end of his tether, and with a moan collapsed, but Bob caught him as he fell and, hoisting him over his shoulder, tottered to the sidewalk.

A cry went up the moment the two men were seen, and it was a cry which June lent her voice. Next second she was running towards them.

"Daddy!" she called thankfully. "Bob!"

Bob swayed uncertainly, and in that same moment June chanced to lift her glance. Next second a scream broke from her lips as she saw a huge section of the warehouse wall bulge outward through the masses of smoke and flame that capped the building.

With the thunder of a landslide a hundred tons of debris broke from the doomed structure, an avalanche of blackened masonry and blazing timber that hurtled into the street immediately where Bob and June were standing.

(To be continued in another breath-taking episode next week. By permission of Universal Pictures Ltd., starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.)

GRAND FILM NOVELS YOU SHOULD NOT MISS!

"DISHONOURED."
A beautiful spy in the employ of the Austrian Secret Service is ordered to betray a handsome young Russian officer. Which shall she obey—duty or love?

"THE LOVE DUET."
An intense drama of passion and heroism in the musical life of Vienna. Starring Gustav Frolich.

ALSO
The second episode of the gripping drama of the sawdust ring, starring Francis X. Bushman Jr. and Alberta Vaughn—

"THE SPELL OF THE CIRCUS."

Victor McLaglen and Marlene Dietrich in "Dishonoured."

Don't miss these splendid yarns in this week's issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY.

PRICE 2d.
October 3rd, 1931.

(Continued from page 2.)

pear next in "Baby Face Killer," and will follow that with "Man Hunt," a story by Bret Harte.

An Expensive Snore.

Ever heard of a snore costing four hundred pounds? There is one film company in Hollywood which had its day's expenses increased by this figure. Making a talkie is always an expensive thing, for, in addition to the high salaries of the artistes, the director, his assistants and a small army of experts in every department, there are a hundred and one other items which find their way on to the expense sheet each day before the studio can finally say "goodbye" to a production.

Among these extra items are always delays of one kind or another which mount up the cost of a picture that is scheduled to be finished by a certain date. Unwanted sounds, for example, which reach the microphone, despite all precautions, and so get recorded, have to be traced and stopped so that another re-take of the spoilt scene can be made.

The snore which cost four hundred pounds was one of these unwanted sounds. Curiously enough it had not been noticed until the film had been "run over" in the company's private theatre. Then it became necessary to take the particular scene again. Inquiries had also to be made as to who had made the offending snore.

Then after hours of inquiries, it was discovered that a carpenter had fallen asleep amid some rafters. His snoring had cost the company a tidy sum.

Dix Too Tired to Think.

For once in his film acting career Richard Dix had to admit himself beaten. This happened during the making of "Cimarron." Its dialogue on one occasion proved too much for him. He and the company had been working on a scene from early morning, and delay after delay had interrupted the filming.

There had been camera difficulties, unwanted noises which had to be traced and constant re-takes. This went on till late in the afternoon, with Dix already physically tired and brain fagged by a week of hard work. At last, when everything seemed straight, he came forward before the microphone to make his big speech in the trial.

Then he found he could not remember all his lines. Three times he tried, but it was no use. Finally, he tore off his wig, smeared his make-up and said:

"Well, boys, I guess I am beaten today. We must try again to-morrow."

Sounds for the Talkies.

Nowadays it is hard to believe all you hear in the talkies. For in all the sound departments of Hollywood's studios there are strange looking gadgets for imitating various sounds.

Canaries, for example, may sometimes sing before the microphone, but there is, of course, the bother of getting them to do so when required. So the sound expert prefers to get the same notes from a wooden box with a key protruding from the side. He merely has to turn the key and the imitation of canaries singing is perfect.

Does the director want to record the pounding of horses' hoofs? Well, this can be done by rubber plungers working on a wooden board. A cau with a resin string produces a dog's bark. The sound of footsteps can be imitated by hinged sticks being slapped together. Other sticks imitate a slap in the face. The roar of a speeding train can be created by turning the crank of a large box.

If the recording is to be that of the smashing of glass in a window, the twist of a crank in a different box will give the exact sound. There are heaps of other ways, however, in which sounds can be produced.

There are, for example, instruments to imitate cathedral chimes, mooing of cows, crying of babies, the snarl of wild beasts and many other sounds. At the same time it must not be thought that only imitations are used. Whenever possible real sound effects are recorded and filed under different headings in the sound library.

When Hollywood had a recent thunder-storm, technicians succeeded in recording a genuine peal of thunder. On other occasional weeks have been spent in New York harbour recording ships' sirens and different dock sounds.

Wallace Beery as Naval Aviator

Wallace Beery, who is an aviator in real life, will appear as an aviator in the navy in his new picture, "Hell's Divers." Beery holds a full transport licence, which is proof of his skill as an airman.

One of the most delicate tasks in connection with the making of this picture was the sending of a huge naval aeroplane carrier through the locks on the Panama Canal. The vessel had to pass through with barely six inches to spare. With the co-operation of the American Navy Department, the aeroplane carrier was converted into a gigantic sound studio specially for the occasion, so that the big "punch" scenes could be filmed with realism.

Lucky Fido.

Lew Ayres sincerely believes in the old saying "A man's best friend is his dog." Some months ago the popular Universal star found a full-blooded mongrel wandering disconsolately near his home, and looking as though life did not seem worth living. Lew took the mongrel in, gave it the first good meal it had had for days, and nursed it through a bad case of distemper. The dog was christened Fido.

Recently Lew left for location on the Sacramento River, which is being used as a "double" for the Mississippi in his new picture "Heaven on Earth." In a letter he received while he was there Lew was told that Fido was pining for his master. Lew himself felt a bit lonely about the time the letter arrived, and so he telegraphed to Universal to pick up the dog and send him to Sacramento post-haste.

The studio complied, and Fido arrived at the Hotel Sacramento in all his puppy splendour. The canine was added to the cast of "Heaven on Earth," and will be seen trotting proudly along the river front beside his idolised master.

GROSE'S, LUDGATE CIRCUS, LONDON

FOOTBALL JERSEYS

All Colours and Designs.

15/- per doz.

British Made.

Send for Illustrated List. Post Free.

GEO. GROSE & CO., 8, New Bridge St., London, E.C.4.

BE TALLER!

Increased my own height to 6ft. 3ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars or simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1

PARCEL OF 200 Interesting Stamps, such as Persia, Siam, Roumania (Boy King), Triangular, etc., price 3d, with Approvals only.—W. A. WHITE, 30, Engue Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

DON'T BE BULLIED

Some SPLENDID LESSONS in JUJITSU, interesting articles, etc., FREE on application. How to take care of yourself under ALL circumstances without weapons, by the Wonderful Japanese art of self-defence. Far better than boxing. Learn to fear no man. Simply send two penny stamps postage or 1/- for first large part NOW to "Yawara" (Dept. A.P.), 10, Queensway, Hanworth, Feltham, Middlesex. School in London for Practical Tuition.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/- Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

STAMMERING. STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars free. FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

BLUSHING, Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/- Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Boys Cinema

"EVERYTHING'S ROSIE" and
"UP FOR MURDER."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boys' CINEMA 2^D

No. 617.

EVERY TUESDAY.

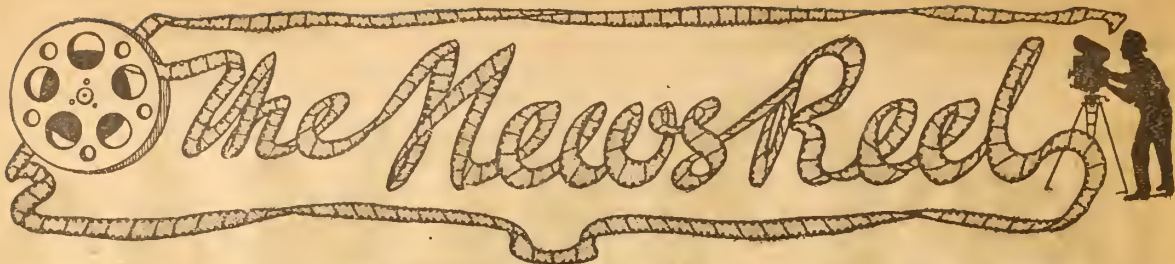

OCTOBER 10th, 1931.

The Hilarious Adventures of a Circus Miracle Man.

Robert Woolsey in //
EVERYTHING'S ROSIE

The illustration depicts a man in a top hat and glasses, sitting on a bench with a young girl. The man is wearing a patterned suit and has his hand to his chin. The girl is sitting next to him, looking thoughtful. The background is a simple outdoor setting.

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Everything's Rosie."

Dr. J. Dockweiler Droop, Robert Woolsey; Rosie, Anita Louise; Billy Lowe, John Darrow; Mrs. Lowe, Florence Roberts; Mr. Lowe, Frank Beal; Adolf Oberdorf, Alfred James; Miss Van Dorn, Lita Chevret; Sheriff, Hopkins, Clifford Dempsey.

"Up For Murder."

Robert Marshall, Lew Ayres; Myra Deane, Genevieve Tobin; Mrs. Marshall, Dorothy Peterson; William Winter, Purnell Pratt; Charlie Collins, Frank McHugh; Reginald Herk, Richard Tucker; Frank Smithson, Frederick Burt.

Films for Scottish Schools.

Here is something that may be of special interest to Scottish readers. The Edinburgh Education Committee has, following the example of the Middlesex Education authorities, been considering the introduction in schools of suitable talking pictures.

Among the subjects submitted for the committee's consideration are the "Secrets of Nature" studies, including zoological and botanical talks such as "The Daily Dozen at the Zoo," "The Frog," "The Flight Machine," introducing slow-motion pictures of birds in flight as compared with aeroplanes, and "Peas and Cues," which is the life story of a green pea plant. Geography is also represented by "Cyprus," a study of the island, and "The Benguela Railway," showing activity in Africa.

Valet for Pete.

If Pete the Pup, canine member of Hal Roach's Our Gang, seems more immaculately groomed nowadays, his vanity and the efforts of a French beauty specialist are responsible. He now has a "dog valet" who gives him his morning bath, bathes his eyes in a boric solution, keeps his eyebrows in trim, brushes his coat, and manicures his nails. Fortunately Pete does not shave!

Yes—We Have No Vegetables.

Buster Keaton's new picture, "East Side," was being made at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios, and a hundred children were taking part in one of the crowd scenes. They were supposed to be "toughs" from New York's Bowery. The youngsters were energetically engaged in a street battle for which the projectiles were two tens of vegetables. It was the intention of the studio officials to salvage as many of the vegetables as was possible and send them to a charity home.

But when that battle was finished there weren't any vegetables left. The whole of them had been used with such force and frequency that only bits remained, and the wonder is that none of the youthful combatants bore any marks of injury.

October 10th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

RICHARD BARTHELMESS

in

"ADIOS."

A fighting romance of the dangerous days following Mexico's ceding of California to the United States, when desperadoes infested the country.

"DEFENDERS OF THE LAW."

A young police officer undertakes to rid the town of gangsters. A gripping tale of action and thrills, starring Edmund Breese and Catherine Dale Owen.

"THE MALTESE FALCON."

Filled with precious jewels, this ancient statuette of a bird brought evil on all connected with it. A strange and gruesome thriller, starring Bebe Daniels and Ricardo Cortez.

ALSO

The seventh episode of our thrilling serial :
"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

Old Schooner in British Film.

One of the most interesting features of "McGlusky—the Sea Rover," a new British International picture, is the use of an old three-masted barquentine, the only one now sailing under the British flag. The search for a schooner of this type occupied several weeks, and eventually one was located in Cornwall. The old barquentine had only just arrived in port, battered by seas, and with most of her sails torn almost to ribbons as the result of a strenuous fight with raging gales in the North Sea. Her safe passage home is a tribute to the wonderful skill of the old shipbuilders whose "wooden walls" proved such an excellent bulwark against the attacks of England's enemies in the past.

Not the least interesting "ornament" on board the old ship is Capt. Deacon, a real ear-ringed old sea-dog who has sailed the seas for fifty-one years. Capt. Deacon himself will not be seen in the film, but it will bear his influence to some extent, for he has been retained in an advisory capacity. He was torpedoed three times during the War, and on the old windjammer are still to be seen the holes through which the guns were trained at submarines, for she was used as a "Q" ship. During the production of the film she will go into action once more.

Hoot Gibson's Rodeo.

I mentioned some time ago on this page that Hoot Gibson was holding a rodeo on his ranch. The affair proved a big success, and was attended by thirty thousand people, among whom were many famous stars, including Reginald Denny, Nick Stuart, Russell Gleason, Lew Cody, and that old screen favourite, William S. Hart.

As may be guessed, many of the events were too good to be missed for the screen, and some of the most exciting of them, such as bronco-busting and steer bulldogging, have been incorporated in Hoot Gibson's new picture, "Wild Horses." Hoot, you will find, proves himself just as finished and thrilling a horseman as ever. "Sketcher Bill," who also took part in the rodeo, is certain to draw again numerous laughs with his comedy antics.

People With "Nerve."

The average picturegoer is content with worrying his or her favourite with nothing worse than a written request for an autograph or a photograph. This, after all, is what all artists expect, and the requests are, whenever possible, granted. But there is in Hollywood a small percentage of individuals who are, to say the least, somewhat brazen in their attitude towards film celebrities.

"These people," remarked one star recently, "apparently imagine that the few pence or shillings they spend at the cinema gives them sort of right on the personal attentions of each and every star. They don't worry about a star's natural desire for privacy."

There are several stories told in the film city to illustrate this. There is one, for example, relating to Douglas Fairbanks and Mary Pickford.

"We didn't mind," said Doug., "when people peeped through the front gates of Pickfair, or even came in and took pictures of the house. But when we woke up one Sunday morning and

(Continued on page 28.)

"Doc" Droop had stood in many market places—without a licence—selling quack medicines, when a little waif named Rosie insisted upon being adopted. Years afterwards, when a lover for Rosie had appeared on the scene, Doc was charged with theft and thrust into jail, while Rosie was bundled into a home. But Doc was resourceful, and in the end everything became rosy—for Rosie.

"Everything's Rosie!"

Starring
ROBERT WOOLSEY
and ANITA LOUISE.

Warned Off!

THE year was 1916, the month was May, and it was carnival week in the little town of Burlington. On a piece of waste ground less than a mile from the heart of Main Street, a fair had sprung up, mushroom fashion, in a single night, complete with roundabouts, swings, coconut shies, and all manner of side shows. And the air was filled with the sound of many voices, the whirring of machinery, the blare of a massive steam organ.

On the tail of a gaudily painted van Dr. Aloysius Smith was holding up a bottle and holding forth concerning the virtues of its contents to a little group of townspeople and farmhands.

"Believe me my friends, after one bottle of this tonic all kinds of aches and pains disappear. It builds the muscles, tones the system, stimulates the appetite."

He glared down at two yokels who were devouring sandwiches out of a paper bag with a snacking of lips which irritated, and he went on, with heavy scorn:

"Remember that, my friends—it stimulates the appetite."

Dr. Aloysius Smith had stood in market-places and on fair grounds for several years, lauding his tonic and endeavouring to sell it, but his manner was bullying rather than persuasive; he looked anything but a doctor, and his patter was dull.

"Let's go over and listen to the other fellow," suggested one of the yokels in a loud voice. "He's a lot funnier than this one."

"Sure, Tom—come on!" was the ready response from a full mouth, and the two sauntered off to the portable stand of Dr. J. Dockweiler Droop, just beyond a tiny platform on which an alleged Hawaiian girl was dancing an alleged native dance.

Dr. Aloysius Smith watched them depart, saw most of his other listeners follow them, and scowled across at his tall, red-headed rival, who was dressed conspicuously in a frock-coat suit, with check trousers and a grey top hat, and who beamed at his growing audience through a pair of tortoise-shell-rimmed spectacles.

Another man approached the van of Dr. Aloysius Smith—a short and heavily-built individual, sombrely dressed in black.

"Here you are, brother," said the doctor, competing with the steam organ to make himself heard, and offering the bottle he held in his hand. "Just a dollar for a bottle of eternal health!"

The man in black looked up from beneath bushy brows and with a single movement of his right hand flipped back the lapel of his coat, displaying beneath it a little shield in German silver.

"Let me see your licence!" he barked.

Dr. Aloysius Smith put the bottle down in a case amongst other bottles and groped in his pockets.

"Why, certainly, sheriff," he said, producing a sheet of blue paper and reaching down with it over the side of the van. "I'm a strict observer of the law."

The sheriff examined the licence, nodded, and handed it back.

"Okay," he said gruffly, and was turning away when the doctor called him back.

"I want to tell you something, sheriff," said he confidentially. "Here am I trying to make an honest living, and you let a guy like that one over there, that ain't even connected with the carnival, peddle a lot o' phoney bologna that he calls medicine."

"What do you mean?" demanded the sheriff.

"I mean that ant-eater," cried Dr. Aloysius Smith indignantly, and he pointed in the direction of Dr. J. Dockweiler Droop, who by this time was almost completely surrounded by an amused crowd.

"He never buys a licence—he just follows us around, grabbing all the gravy, selling something he calls a health builder that should be used for rat poison!"

"Is that so?" said the sheriff, tugging at a particularly scrubby moustache. "Well, I'll just anble over and have a look at him. Maybe we can do something about it."

Dr. J. Dockweiler Droop carried his wares in a suitcase, and the suitcase was opened out on a little folding trestle one could carry under the arm without inconvenience. The sheriff drew near without ostentation.

"It's Dreko, folks—Dreko," announced the doctor, waving a cigar. "Don't forget the name, folks, don't forget the name!" He took a puff at the cigar and beckoned. "Gather in a little closer, folks," he urged. "You mustn't block the sidewalk."

"Haw, haw!" laughed a man derisively.

"What a train announcer you'd make, sir," observed the doctor pleasantly. "Folks, Dreko, the wonder tonic, has saved many people from a feeble old age, and an early marriage. Why, I've been taking it for years, and I'm growing younger every day! As a matter of fact, if I take it much longer, I wouldn't be surprised to see my name in the birth notices."

There was a general laugh. Dr. J. Dockweiler Droop certainly had a sense of humour, and he knew how to put over his little jokes.

"Haw, haw!" jeered the nuisance again. But the "Doc," as he called himself, was equal to the occasion. Addressing a fair and fat woman in the friendliest possible manner, he said:

"Lady, you can stay, but the jackass has got to go."

The "jackass" went, considerably crushed.

"Now, friends," said the Doc confidentially, "I want to advise you. This is the greatest remedy in the world for sore throats and for hoarseness." His voice became husky and faded almost to a painful whisper. "Folks, it has no equal for hoarseness. Folks, if you ever—" His voice seemed to desert him completely. "Folks—" he croaked with an effort, then drew the cork of the bottle he was displaying and gulped down some of its crimson contents.

His eyes widened delightedly, and he lifted up his voice once more, clear, musical, triumphant.

"It cures hoarseness, folks," he declared, "just like that! It cures it! It also restores personality and cures nerves. Why, friends, my own wife was so nervous that she would scream if I kissed her. Yes, and two years ago, folks, it was an effort for me to stagger two feet. Now, thanks to Dreko, you'd be surprised how I can walk!"

The crowd laughed, but the laugh died away as the sheriff stepped forward and displayed his shield to the red-headed vendor of medicine.

"Let's see you take a walk—a long one!"

Doc stared at the shield, made a wry face, re-corked the bottle and laid it amongst the other bottles in the suitcase.

"Do I understand, sir," he said sadly, "that you are addressing me? Addressing one of the Dockweiler Droops of Virginia—to say nothing of Europe and all points East?"

"I'll give you," said the sheriff grimly, "ten minutes to get out of this town."

The Doc took a puff at his cigar, closed the suitcase, gave his top hat a pat, and said in pained surprise:

"You'll give me ten minutes to get out of town? Why, sir, I've sold my medicine in some of the finest burghs in this world, and never has a sheriff given me less than twenty minutes to get out of town!"

There were chuckles from the crowd, but the sheriff said significantly:

"So there have been other sheriffs in your life, eh? I smell a rat!"

"Don't get personal, sheriff, don't get personal," urged Doc; and, folding the little trestle and tucking it under his left arm, he picked up the suitcase and walked briskly from the fair ground.

A Persistent Waif.

ON his way out of the town, Doc passed through several rather mean streets. On the corner of one there stood a drinking saloon of a low type, and as he approached it he heard a child crying and a woman scolding. He quickened his pace, turned the corner, and came upon a slatternly creature, railing at a little blue-eyed girl.

"You little brat, you!" cried the hag. "Shut up! Will you shut up. You've never done anything else but squall! I'd like to knock the head off you!"

Doc stared at the woman, then looked down at the ragged little mite. Her face and hands were dirty, her clothes were ragged, but she was pretty in spite of her dirt, and she was hugging a dilapidated doll.

"Hi, hi, hi!" reproved Doc. "Lay off that Simon Legree stuff!"

"Who are you?" snapped the woman.

"Ah!" said Doc mysteriously. "You'd be surprised if you knew! You ought to be ashamed of yourself, abusing your little daughter like that."

"She ain't my kid," retorted the woman. "I didn't ask nobody to leave her in my front yard!"

"You don't mean to tell me you've got a front yard?"

He went down on his knees before the child, who ceased her crying to regard him with round eyes.

"What's your name, my good woman?" he inquired gently.

"My name's Rosie," was the reply.

"Rosie? Gosh, what a pretty name! Rosie!"

"I call her Rosie," put in the woman, "because I found her under a rose bush."

"You ought to be tickled to death you weren't found under a eucalyptus," said Doc to the girl, with a grin, and addressed the woman again. "Who does she belong to?"

"I don't know," replied the slattern ungraciously. "I found her one morning about a year ago—naked and squallin', and she's been squallin' ever since. I've tried to give her to somebody about a dozen times, but no such luck. S'pose you take her?"

"Me?" exclaimed Doc, rising to his feet and dusting his knees. "Oh, no, thanks! No, not me—not me!"

He dived a hand into a pocket and brought out a note.

"Here's ten dollars," he said. "Suppose you feed her up—clean her up—dress her up—but don't beat her up! Listen, if I hear of your abusing her again, I'll have the law on you."

But the woman did not hear. She had snatched at the note and was looking at it with disgust.

"Why, this is only a dollar!" she complained.

Doc patted the child's golden-brown head and picked up his suitcase.

"You're quite right," he nodded, "but surely my credit's good for nine dollars."

He tipped his hat and walked slowly on; but the woman immediately dived into the saloon, and the little girl followed him, hugging the doll.

Presently a grimy little hand plucked at one of the tails of his grey frock-coat, and he stopped short and looked down at the solemn-faced mite.

"Don't follow me," he said in some alarm. "I'm not your mamma."

He moved on again, but Rosie followed, still clinging to his coat-tail. All the way down the street she followed him and round another corner, and there he stopped again, sat down on the kerb, and motioned to her to sit beside him.

"Now, look here, my good woman," he said whimsically, "you can't get away with a thing like this on me. I know your type—you gold digger!" And he patted her affectionately on the shoulder.

Immediately she flung her little arms round his neck and kissed him.

"Uh-huh!" growled Doc. "So that's your little game, is it? Think you'll sue me for breach of promise and make me pay, eh? But you've got no letters, and I defy you! Here, take this!" He kissed her. "And this!" He kissed her again. "And remember, you've got nothing on me whatsoever, and if you continue to follow me, I'll box your little ears!"

She sat there clutching the doll, her elbow on her knee, her chin in her hand. Not more than three years old, Doc decided, but the sadness in her eyes recorded months of unhappiness. Doc, biting on his cigar, rested his own chin in his hand and considered the problem of what to do with the waif.

"I'm going away," he said finally. "Right away—and right now! You're not to follow me, young woman. Understand?"

Rosie nodded gravely, and kissed him again. He rose, took up his suitcase, and stepped slowly across the roadway. But Rosie caught up with him before he reached the opposite pavement, and once more she held on to a tail of his coat.

"You heard what I said—I shall spank you," he said warningly, but without looking down.

"I don't mind if you do spank me," said Rosie.

Doc was not out of Burlington within ten minutes of leaving the fair-ground, but in less than half an hour he had left the little town behind and was walking the dusty high road that led to the larger town of Champlain. And Rosie walked beside him, holding on to his coat-tail.

But after darkness had fallen he carried her, as well as the suitcase.

After Fifteen Years.

FIFTEEN years later, in the present year of grace and general unrest, Doc and Rosie were strolling about a fair ground in the Pennsylvania town of Arcadia. They had arrived overnight in a horse-drawn covered van which was their home.

It was early in the morning and the fair was not yet ready for the general public. Booths were being erected; side-shows of all sorts were being arranged for opening time, and a steam-organ was wheezily grinding out the appropriate tune of "Sweet Rosie O'Grady."

Pegs were being hammered into the ground to support the tents; a vendor of balloons was inflating his wares with the aid of a cycle pump, and Rosie, now a beautiful girl of eighteen or thereabouts, was holding on to a tail of Doc's smartly-cut grey morning coat.

In the intervening years business had flourished with Dr. J. Dockweiler Droop. He had added to his enterprises, and recently he had abandoned the selling of tonics and other nostrums to embrace the more profitable occupation of telling fortunes, disguised as an Indian seer. Through all the years Rosie had been his constant companion, his mascot—and the only living creature in the world upon whom to lavish his affection.

He had fed her, washed her, clothed her, educated her, till she had grown old enough to attend to her own personal affairs. He had devoted every spare cent to her upbringing, and she had grown into a young woman of whom secretly he was very proud.

"Now, look here, Rosie, old woman," he said in that whimsical way of his as they strolled together. "You can't get away with anything on me. Tell me, did you clean your teeth this morning?"

She showed him two rows of perfect teeth, dazzlingly white.

"Back ones, too?"

She opened her mouth still wider.

"Good!" said he, having inspected the molars.

"Did you clean yours?" demanded Rosie, who had reached the age when she considered it her duty to look after her benefactor.

"Why, the very idea!" he growled.

"Certainly I cleaned my teeth!"

"Let me see!"

He blinked at her through his horn-rimmed glasses and groped in his pocket for a eigar.

"You mind your own business, will you?" he said sharply. "And let me look at those ears."

She presented her little ears for his inspection.

"Okay?" she inquired archly.

"They ought to be. I've been working on them for about fifteen years!"

"Tell me, Doc," said Rosie seriously,

"is your headache all gone?"

"Yep—all gone. You're a great little nurse, Rosie. By the way, what was that medicine you gave me last night, anyway?"

They had reached their van, which was really a glorified caravan. It was standing beside a newly-erected tent, while Evelyn, the somewhat scraggy brown mare which had drawn it all the way from Clymer to its present resting-place, was nibbling the turf on the other side of the tent.

"I don't know," confessed Rosie. "I found it in the bottom of that old trunk you've been carrying round. According to the label it's called Dreko."

"Dreko?" exclaimed Doc, wincing and making a wry face. "You gave me Dreko? What are you trying to do—poison me?"

Rosie climbed up to the tail of the van, which was hanging horizontally on its chains, and thrusting a hand through the narrow dooway, produced an ancient and battered doll.

"I found this at the bottom of that old trunk, too," she said.

"Where did it come from?"

Doc forgot all about the Dreko he had been induced to swallow.

"Don't you remember?" he said, sitting on the tail of the van and looking up at her graceful figure. "Gosh, that's funny! You mean to say you don't remember?"

"No."

He took the doll from her and regarded it critically.

"Rosie," he said solemnly, "you were holding this close to your heart, the day I found you."

"And you've been holding me close to yours ever since—haven't you, doc?" she whispered.

He smiled slowly and handed her back the doll.

"You put that right back where you found it," he directed. "Put it right back where you found it! And it's time for you to practice. Get that violin out!"

"I don't want to practise," she pouted.

"Get that violin out and start to work!"

She vanished into the van, and he threw away the stub of his cigar and produced a new one, which he was lighting when she reappeared, carrying a violin and a bow.

"Fiddle while aroma burns," he jested, and puffed luxuriously while she played execrably on the instrument.

He listened and puffed for several minutes, suffering anguish.

"Rosie," he said, waving her to silence, "if you keep that up I'll have you on the concert platform—in about a hundred-and-eight years!"

She laughed merrily, played a few more notes, then stopped to inquire:

"Why did you make me learn to play the violin?"

"I didn't," he replied. "I haven't! You don't! But I couldn't afford a piano!"

She looked after him as he slid from the tail of the van and made his way over to the brown mare, to which he raised his hat gravely and said:

"Morning, Evelyn—morning! Did you sleep okay?"

Evelyn left off munching grass to rub her nose against a long, lean face.

"That's fine!" declared Doc. "You know, I've got to look out for you, old lass. Lately you've only been doing twelve miles on a gallon of oats!"

Within sight of the van—and of Evelyn—Dr. Aloysius Smith was holding up a bottle and practising his patter with only a coconut-shy man, who had known him for years, as his audience.

"Remember that, my friends. It stimulates the appetite!"

"What's the matter?" inquired the coconut-shy man. "You seem dead off form to me."

"Guess I've lost my punch," admitted Aloysius gloomily. "I can't even hold 'em for five minutes any more!"

"Wait till Doc Droop gets set up down there! He'll show 'em how it's done!"

"He's come off my line o' business long ago, and I got no grouch on him now," declared Aloysius confidentially,

"but that guy is a mystery to me. He never pays for a licence, always gets the money, and never has a cent."

"Spends it all on that kid!"

Aloysius Smith nodded.

"You know, that's the one decent thing about that drifter," he remarked, almost reverently. "He's been father, mother, and everything else to that girl."

"I'll say he ain't a bad guy," testified the coconut-shy man, and he glanced with warm sympathy at Doc, who had shed his coat, and was preparing his show for opening time, talking the while to Rosie, who had arrayed herself in a gipsy costume of gay colours, and was swinging her shapely legs from the tail of the van.

"Tell me more about your folks, Doc," she said eagerly. "It's so interesting."

"Well," responded Doc, hanging on the side of the van a huge card showing the signs of the Zodiac, "as you know, my uncle—he's the King of Spain."

"Yesterday," protested Rosie, "you told me he was the King of Siam!"

"That's another uncle," explained Doc glibly. "The big, tall, dark one."

"Doc," said Rosie gravely, "why don't you go to Europe and be a prince or something?"

Doc, busy with the ropes of the tent he had erected, made a face as though the idea did not appeal.

"Well, I don't know," he observed. "As I said to my brother Benedictine—he's a prince, honey, he's a prince—I said: 'Look here, Ben, there's no sense both of us hanging around the palace. One of us has got to go out and get a job.' So we went and talked it over with my cousin. He's a count."

"Count what?" inquired Rosie curiously.

"Well, I don't know that he can count anything, but he suggested that we flip a coin. I won, but I went."

Without the slightest ceremony, Doc plunged his hand into a pocket of the white waistcoat and fished out a cheap watch.

"Doc, if you were to go back and be a king, what would that make me?"

He dropped a rope to go straight over to her, and he took one of her little hands in his.

"Listen, honey," he said, with unwonted seriousness, "regardless of what I am, you're a queen—my little queen. Here, there, or anywhere!"

He became suddenly business-like. "Haven't sold any medicine at any fairs for quite a while," he said. "How does this town look to you for a little tonic?"

Rosie glanced up at a sign on the van beside the narrow door:

"Criminologists and the Police Continually Want Me."

"The clerk at the hotel," she said. "I told me that there were three medicine men in gaol already."

"What about this?" suggested Doc, producing from a box a sign:

"Dr. Droops, Oculist."

"Have to have a licence—and that costs five dollars."

"That's out!" He tossed the sign back in the box. "Hair straightener?" he inquired.

"Not enough coloured people in town."

He held up another card, inscribed:

"Mind Reading. Fortunes Told.
Your Problems Solved."

"Okay," nodded Rosie. "Tell their fortunes. That's all right."

"Fortunes it shall be, child. There's millions in it—millions!"

Always an optimist, Dr. J. Dockweiler droop! The card was hung in a prominent position, and Doc became busy preparing for the public, while Rosie vanished into the van.

A Good Beginning.

THAT morning the sheriff of Arcadia, a slightly bald and very bulky man, called at a house on the outskirts of the town, almost large enough to be described as a mansion.

His object was to discuss various matters pertaining to law and order with Mr. James William Lowe, a councillor and a man of considerable standing in the community. But Mrs. Lowe, a woman of self-importance, diverted the conversation the moment she entered the drawing-room.

"Sheriff Hopkins," she said impressively, "I promised the members of our Social Improvement League that this carnival would operate only under our supervision. I insist that you keep the carnival in order. There must be no gambling or fakers permitted on the grounds."

"Very good, Mrs. Lowe," bowed the sheriff.

"They must be driven from the town, these fakers and quacks."

"Oh, come now, mother," protested Mr. Lowe mildly. "we mustn't be too hard on them."

"I'll handle this in my own way, father," insisted his wife. "We must protect our young folks."

Mr. Lowe looked at the sheriff, and the sheriff looked at Mr. Lowe. The sheriff shrugged his broad shoulders.

On a chesterfield near the grand piano a black-haired girl who was obviously aware that she was good-looking was powdering her little nose, and beside her lounged the son of the house, a tall young man with an unaffected manner, intelligent brown eyes, and a light-hearted nature.

The girl was Madeline van Dern, and it was her ambition to marry Billy Lowe. She looked across at his mother, and she said impishly:

October 10th, 1931.

"Especially if the term 'young folks' happens to include Billy Lowe, the rising young lawyer."

"Thank you," responded Billy, with a mock bow, "but I assure you that I am quite capable of taking care of myself."

"That will do, Billy," said his mother austerely, and turned to the sheriff again. "We rely on you," she told him, "to rid the carnival of its undesirable elements."

The sheriff nodded and picked up his hat. Mr. Lowe and his wife accompanied the official to the front door, while Billy, leaning down over Madeline, said laughingly:

"Let's run down and see this carnival, shall we, before mother takes all the fun out of it?"

"Carnivals," scoffed Madeline, "are for children. I'm not in the least interested."

"Okay. Then I'll drop you off at your house on my way there."

"Thanks, but I'll stay here. I want to talk to your mother."

"I'm off, then," he informed her. "Bye!" And he disappeared to get out his two-seater, in which he made for the fair-ground.

By this time Doc, from the end of his van, was addressing a crowd that increased in size every minute, while Rosie, in her gipsy costume, stood beside him.

"Now, folks," boomed Doc, "we're just starting—just commencing. Come up a little closer, we mustn't block the sidewalk."

The crowd squeezed forward.

"That's fine," approved Doc. "And now, ladies and gentlemen, behold the eighth and ninth wonders of the world! The professor sees the past and the future, identifies articles, calls your full name, solves your troubles, also repairs motor-cycles. Ha, ha! Pardon me, that was last week!"

"And now, folks, for a demonstration you will never forget. The young lady will blindfold herself, and I will then select from among you articles at random, and with the aid of mental telepathy and thought-waves I will transfer the information to the blindfolded mademoiselle. Are you ready?"

He handed Rosie a black handkerchief which she tied round her head, covering her eyes, while he stepped down amongst the interested onlookers.

Rosie announced that she was ready, and he reached out a hand and touched a gold pin projecting from a hideous tie worn by a sniggering man badly in need of a shave.

"I have my hand on an article here, mademoiselle," he announced. "What is it? Don't let it stick you."

"It's a pin," said Rosie.

"A pin," said Doc. "But I haven't collared it."

"It's a tie-pin," said Rosie.

"Right!" cried Doc. "The young lady is right. She's always right!"

Doc was, as usual, smoking a cigar. He sniffed the air, in which he detected an offensive aroma. An ugly little man, with a white waistcoat and a remarkably seraggy neck, was smoking a perfectly dreadful cigar in his immediate vicinity. Without the slightest ceremony Doc plunged his hand into a pocket of the white waistcoat and fished out a cheap watch.

"Another article, mademoiselle," he said loudly, "and I ask you to name it."

Rosie hesitated, raised her hands.

"Watch out, and you can't go wrong!"

"It's a watch," decided Rosie.

"Right! The young lady is right! She's always right!"

Puffing at his cigar, he restored the watch and moved away to an enormous man from whose waistcoat pocket he removed a pencil. Rosie, with his artful aid, decided that it was a fountain-pen, whereat Doc winced.

"Come, come," he exclaimed impatiently, "get this right. Do you have to be led?"

"It's a pencil."

There came a burst of applause, and Doc proceeded from one onlooker to another, selecting in turn some candy from a small girl and an umbrella from a fat woman.

"And now, folks," he said, after satisfactory answers had been given to his leading questions by his blindfolded accomplice, "that's just a slight idea of what you can expect on the inside. I shall now step into the big tent and prepare myself for the strenuous ordeal that lies before me."

He disappeared into the newly-erected tent to invest himself in the garments of an Indian seer, complete with turban and a pair of spectacles set in square frames, while Rosie removed the handkerchief from her eyes and endeavoured to coax people to have their fortunes told.

It was not long before she escorted into the tent a credulous-looking person who had former written all over his clothes, and who carried in his hand a low-crowned bowler-hat.

"Professor," said Rosie softly, "here's a gentleman who wants to have his hand read."

Doc looked at the man—and looked into the hat. On its band had been written in ink: "Sam Hall, Rockford."

"Come right in and take a seat," welcomed Doc. "How are things in Rockford?"

Sam Hall gaped, and seemed half-inclined to run away, but Rosie propelled him to a chair facing a small portable table, and Doc, in his robes, sat down on the other side of it. An upturned metal urn was on the table, and on the urn was a crystal. Rosie disappeared to round up other clients.

"That's right, sit down, Mr. Hall," said Doc pleasantly. "Or may I call you Sam?"

"Well I'll be darned!" gasped Sam Hall. "I was never in this town up to about an hour ago, and here you know my name and where I come from."

"A mere bagatelle," declared Doc, airily waving his cigar. "And what is it that's troubling you, Sam?"

It appeared that the farmer was in love with two women, one not very good-looking, but the richest woman in Rockford, the other very poor but very beautiful, and the question was, which should he marry.

"Why, you marry the good-looking girl that is very poor, of course," Doc told him promptly, and pushed across to him a pencil and a notepad.

"What do you want me to write?" inquired Sam Hall.

"The name and address of the other girl. That will be two dollars, please."

The Sheriff Intrudes.

THE client, patient, or customer who followed Sam Hall was a particularly harassed-looking man, who blinked at the charts on the canvas walls of the tent, blinked at Doc, and nervously announced that his name was Oberdorf—Adolf Oberdorf.

To the noise of a hurdy-gurdy which an Italian had begun to grind outside the tent, Doc said sympathetically:

"You're having troubles, Mr. Oberdorf?"

He gazed intently into the crystal.

"Don't tell me, Mr. Oberdorf—don't tell me," he said. "I seem to see a lot of—a lot of—"

"Jewellery?" inquired the victim hopefully.

"That's it! You're in the jewellery business, and business is bad. But it won't be for long. It's bound to pick up. You know, there may be a man in to see you before the day is over. He—he'll have a proposition for you, perhaps, and you mustn't turn it down. You must not turn it down."

He stared into the crystal. The light in the tent was feeble; the robes and the turban and the square-rimmed glasses almost completely disguised Doc, who was a quick thinker. The conversation that followed fascinated middle-aged Adolf Oberdorf, and completely convinced him of Doc's uncanny power of foretelling the future. Incidentally, it provided the artful seer with quite a lot of useful information—for which he charged.

Outside the tent, Rosie was still endeavouring to attract custom, but the crowd had drifted away. There had been rain overnight, and there were puddles in the rough roadway beside which the van and the tent were pitched. A two-seater car came careering into the fair-ground, swerved to avoid the hurdy-gurdy man, and splashed into a puddle.

Up from the wheels splashed a quantity of muddy water, and Rosie, who had just picked up her violin to attract customers with a tune, received most of it over her person. Her pretty face was spattered with mud, the short sleeves of the white blouse beneath her zouave were smothered, and her bare arms received most of the residue.

"Oh!" she cried in dismay.

The two-seater stopped abruptly with a grinding of brakes, and a tall young man sprang down from it and stood before her in concern.

"I'm awfully sorry," he apologised, producing a large white handkerchief.

"Is that all you've got to do?" inquired Rosie angrily. "Just go around splashing muddy water all over everybody!"

"Oh, I don't go around splashing mud on everybody," he said penitently. "I just splashed on you."

"Oh! So you saved all your mud for me, did you?"

"Yes—no. Oh, I didn't mean that! Won't you please let me help you? I'm dreadfully sorry."

He proceeded to wipe the mud from her face while she stood looking up at him. Billy Lowe, as already recorded, was a tall young man, with intelligent brown eyes. He was rather handsome into the bargain, and Rosie decided that she liked his humorous face and his friendly smile.

"I never realised," he said, with frank admiration as he plied the handkerchief, "that mud could be so becoming to a girl."

"What?" exclaimed Rosie.

"That is, I—I realise how pretty you would be without the mud. That is, I mean—well, you—you're pretty. That's what I mean."

No girl is deaf to a compliment honestly bestowed. Rosie smiled and seated herself on the tail of the van, and Billy persisted with the cleansing operations till her face was free from mud and his handkerchief was fit only for the washtub.

"There you are!" said he at last.

"Do you know I could sue you for a new dress?" inquired Rosie, but without resentment.

"Great!" cried Billy. "I'll be your attorney! I'm studying to be a lawyer, you know. What a case! Miss—er—Droop versus Mud."

"What?" said Rosie, to whom this legal terminology was almost double-dutch.

"There's an awful lot of mud in our town, isn't there?"

"Well," she murmured, considering the point, "yes, there is. But we've been in muddier towns before—and their mud wasn't nearly as nice as the mud here."

"And you do forgive me?" he asked hopefully.

"I don't know," she told him doubtfully. "I'll have to ask the professor. He sees and knows all."

Billy seemed surprised.

"And where is this marvel of a man?" he inquired. "In there?" And he pointed to the tent.

She nodded.

"He's busy at present," she said "so we mustn't trouble him."

They did not trouble Doc. Instead, they sat together on the tail-board of the van, and, much to the neglect of business, they talked—as young people always will talk.

But business was progressing quite satisfactorily inside the tent despite Rosie's inattention thereto. Adolf Oberdorf departed, but a singularly fat woman in a patterned muslin frock made her way into the tent immediately that perturbed jeweller emerged from it. The bills outside had lured her into the seer's dim presence.

"Is this the place where you have your fortune told?" she inquired bashfully.

Doc assured her that it was, and, giggling nervously, she sat down in the chair he offered her.

"Oh, professor," she simpered, "I—I'm all hot and bothered!"

"You may be hot," said he calmly, "but you'll never be bothered. What's your name, my good woman? What's your name?"

"Olive," she told him.

"Olive, eh? Give me your palm, Olive! Give me your palm."

He took her hand in his, and appeared to examine it thoughtfully.

"'Tis a beautiful hand," he purred. "Beautiful! And what do you call that thing there?"

"It's a wart."

"Oh! So that's a wart, eh?"

"Yes, professor. And is it true that you can get rid of a wart by burying a cat?"

"Certainly—if the wart's on the out. How old are you, my good woman?"

"I have just passed my twentieth birthday."

Doc bit hard on his cigar and rolled it from one end of his mouth to the other. The woman was obviously forty, at least.

"You must have passed it coming

"Well, professor," said the fat woman with a self-conscious snigger, "I'm just seventeen!"

back," he remarked calmly. "I see here that you want to get married."

"Professor, you're uncanny! Am I going to be married and live in a big house?"

"You'll need one! I shall have to gaze in the crystal for that. Pardon me!"

He stared into the crystal, still holding her plump hand in his.

"Ah!" he said dreamily. "Yes. Ah! 'Tis evening time. Your husband comes home from a hard day's work. It's a big house, but he's a little husband. He reaches the gate. He whistles for the dog—and you come running out! Ah, the crystal clouds! I can tell you no more without knowing your exact age within thirty or forty years."

"Well, professor," said the fat woman, with a self-conscious snigger, "I'm just seventeen."

"In that case," observed Doc, "I'm going to be born next Friday!"

He looked at the crystal again.

"I see a little church," he declared. "The altar! I hear the wedding bells. I see—"

"And shall I be happy?"

"To answer that question," said Doc, with a grimace, "I shall have to go into a double trance, and I only do that once a week on account of the strain on my nerves. The strain will amount to exactly two dollars and eighty-five cents."

"Oh, but that's very reasonable," cried the woman delightedly. "I should so love to see you in a double trance!"

"I'm a bear in a double trance," declared Doc, and he closed his eyes and swayed from side to side and backwards and forwards in his chair, uttering strange sounds.

The sounds became stranger and stranger, the swaying became almost violent, and the fat woman shrank back in alarm.

"Oh, oh, oh, oh, oh!" groaned Doc—and was totally unaware of the fact that the flap of the tent had been raised, and Sheriff Hopkins had stepped from the sunshine into the gloom. "I see it all—I see it all! The stars above—the stars above tell me that you're going to take a long trip."

The woman had risen to her feet. The sheriff waved her away with an arm, and she tottered from the tent. Doc, his eyes still closed, continued.

"Yes," he chanted, "a long trip. The stars tell me so."

"What does this star tell you?" rasped the sheriff, and Doc opened his eyes, to find himself staring at a little star of german silver beneath the lapel of the sheriff's coat. He gulped and rose.

"That star," said he dolefully, "tells me that I'm going to take a long trip. I am now packing, sheriff—now packing."

"Have you got a licence?" demanded the sheriff, tugging at his ginger moustache.

"Licence?" echoed Doc. "What kind of a licence?"

"You must have a licence to tell fortunes in this town."

"How am I supposed to know that?" complained Doc. "I'm no mind reader."

The sheriff smiled grimly.

"Come on," he said. "I'll give you twenty minutes to get out of this town."

Doc shed his robe, took off his turban and his square-rimmed spectacles, and depositing the crystal on the ground, closed the folding table. The sheriff jerked his thumb in the direction of the tent-flap, and together they stepped out into the sunshine.

Doc blinked. Rosie was sitting on the tail-flap of the van beside an attractive and clean-shaven young man, and both were swinging their legs.

October 10th, 1931.

"Don't forget," said Billy, "I'll see you to-night. Remember—that's an appointment!"

"And remember you promised to have your fortune told," Rosie reminded him.

"Okay," said Billy joyously, and went and clambered into his two-seater.

The sheriff, who had failed to note these things, turned officiously to Doc, who had stopped short.

"Understand," he said brusquely, "I give you ten minutes to leave this town. If you're here at the end of that time, it's the gaol-house for you!"

Evelyn, the brown mare, lifted up her head and neighed complainingly, while the sheriff stalked off to seek for other frauds and fakers. Rosie came running over to Doc, just as he was about to coax Evelyn between the shafts of the van.

"What ever's the matter now?" she cried.

"There are two people I hate in this world," responded Doc, "and both of them are sheriffs!"

"Are we leaving town?" she asked quickly.

"In ten minutes," he nodded. "I don't know what I'm going to do with that other eight."

Much to his astonishment she reached her hands up to his shoulders and, clinging to them, exclaimed:

"I wish we could have stayed a little longer. I get so tired of moving around from pillar to post, and never knowing where we're going to be next."

It was the very first time she had ever complained against their fate, and he, being an observant person, immediately linked her protest with the astonishing spectacle he had witnessed on leaving the tent which he must now strike with the utmost dispatch.

"But, honey," he reproved, "that's our life—always on the go. New faces, new places—excitement—adventure. Why, it's in our blood! Why, honey, the world is our home."

She looked out of the fair-ground into the street it adjoined, and he followed her gaze with his eyes. She was looking at the shops and houses with a wistful air.

"Home!" she whispered. "Gee, what I'd give for a home!"

She sighed, let go of him, and looked up into his face.

"It's selfish of me, I suppose," she sighed.

"Selfish?" he echoed. "You selfish? Say, how do you get that way, honey?" And his arms embraced her, held her close.

"Gee, Doc," she remarked, mainly to the spotted bow against which her head was nestling, "you've got a great gift of the gab—you can sell anything! Why don't you settle down in some little town?"

"What little town?" he inquired.

"This little town."

A New Line of Action.

THE tent was dismantled in less than five minutes, the canvas was stowed in the van, the poles were tied to the roof. With the paraphernalia of his calling packed away in trunks, Doc and Rosie sat on the trunks, side by side. The sheriff had disappeared.

Doc, gazing thoughtfully at the shops beyond the fair-ground, said abruptly:

"Everything's rosy—we'll stay."

Evelyn was harnessed between the shafts of the van, the trunks and cases were bundled on board, and the pair left the fair-ground with their possessions. But instead of driving out of Arcadia, as the sheriff had ordered, they proceeded to the Union Hotel, where an ostler attended to the van and a porter attended to the luggage.

Ten minutes later Doc and Rosie walked side by side along Main Street, and paused before the premises of Adolf Oberdorf, jeweller.

"We are now in the jewellery business," proclaimed Doc. "You know, it's funny, Rosie, but I told this old man's fortune a while ago. He's having trouble with his affairs. I told him he might expect me, but I was thinking I'd have to pawn this ring again."

He indicated a signet-ring on the little finger of his left hand, a ring which had often proved a friend in need during their wanderings. "But now," he went on, "I've got a different idea."

"You don't know a thing about the jewellery business," said Rosie.

"Don't I? Honey, there's millions in it—millions! Wait for me, I'll be back in a minute."

He plunged into the shop. There were no customers in it, but Oberdorf himself was standing behind the counter, and his face brightened considerably. Here, possibly, was the visitor the fortune-teller had predicted!

Doc talked, and Oberdorf listened not merely readily, but almost greedily. The jeweller was persuaded that what his store needed was young blood, a live wire, someone to stimulate business—in other words, Doc! And in the end Doc's proffered services were accepted. He examined the books; he examined the show-cases and their contents.

"We'll have a sale," he decided. "That's it—we'll have an auction sale."

"Do you know anything about auctions?" inquired Oberdorf dubiously.

"Do I know anything about auctions!" exclaimed Doc. "Why, my dear man, do you know that my uncle, the King of Spain, would never think of buying a crown unless I passed it! Jewellery, auctions—oh, just wait and see what I can do for you!"

It was arranged that the auction should take place the next day, and Doc swept Rosie back to the hotel and went off to fix up details such as the printing of bills and the posting thereof.

Incidentally he acquired the services of four men, through a labour bureau, who were told to meet him at Oberdorf's establishment at seven o'clock that evening.

Rosie, elated at the prospect of staying indefinitely in Arcadia, kept her appointment with Billy Lowe, while her guardian interviewed the men. He had acquired an auctioneer's hammer in the town, and with this instrument he waved the four men into seats.

They were not a prepossessing quartet, but he decided that they would do for his purpose. He took down their names—Quinn, Young, Shill, and Willis.

"Now, boys," he said, "I think we ought to have a little rehearsal of what we're going to do to-morrow. At the present moment bills are being stuck all over the town; to-morrow afternoon there is going to be an auction sale on these premises. Hence the bills, and hence your presence."

"What's an auction?" inquired Young, eyeing a large safe which bore the jeweller's name.

Doc laughed.

"I can see right now that I'm going to have a lot of trouble with you," he remarked. "An auction is a sale at which the most important thing is to keep raising the price by bidding. Raising the price will be your job."

What about your pay? How much do you expect?"

"Two dollars," said Young promptly. "Three dollars," said Shill.

Down came the hammer with a bang on the counter.

"Sold for three dollars!" boomed Doc. "And now you have the whole principle of an auction sale. But there's one thing you've got to remember." He waved his inevitable cigar. "When I hold this in my right hand, that means bid, but when I hold it in my left hand that means stop bidding."

"Which is your right hand?" asked Quinn.

Doc gazed at him disgustedly, and explained.

"Take a good look at each other," he pursued, "so you'll know one another to-morrow, because if anyone comes in who's a stranger to you, and starts to bid—why, you keep your mouths shut, because that will be somebody with cash."

There was further discussion, after which the four rose to go. But on his way to the shop door Quinn furtively tried the dial of the big safe, and out on the pavement he said in a low voice to Willis:

"It's a cinch. I could open it with a tin-opener!"

"Better wait till they get the dough in from the auction," suggested Willis.

Shill and Young were already beyond earshot. In spite of their appearance they were comparatively honest men.

"Don't want them around, either," said Quinn, with a jerk of his thumb in the direction of the two receding figures. "Guess the auction won't be over till after the banks are shut, so we'll do the job late at night."

Madeline Pays a Visit.

ROSIE was installed behind a counter in the back room of the jewellery store next morning as cashier, while Doc and Oberdorf made final arrangements for the auction. By three o'clock in the afternoon a crowd of satisfactory dimensions had gathered in the shop, and Doc took his stand on a little platform which had been supplied by a local carpenter, and waved his hammer.

"Here we are, folks! Here we are!" he said cheerfully, puffing at a long cigar. "All ready to go!"

Oberdorf handed up to him an oval leather case.

"Now the first article," he boomed, opening the case and taking out a pair of hair-brushes, "is—or are—a beautiful set of military hair-brushes. Folks, these military hair-brushes have gone through three wars without a scratch!"

He leaned down over a man who was wearing a cap.

"Could I interest you in these brushes?" he asked.

The man pulled off his cap, revealing a totally bald head, and there was a burst of laughter.

"My mistake—my mistake," said Doc hurriedly. "Anybody else?"

Young started the bidding at a dollar, and a real customer offered two dollars. Shill made it three dollars, and the customer made it four. Doc removed his cigar from his mouth with his left hand, and the military hair-brushes were sold.

"Now just step into the back room," said Doc. "The young lady there will take your money and wrap up your articles."

Rosie had been provided with paper, string, and other essentials in the back room, and there was a way out from it into a side street. The purchaser passed into her presence, but having paid for the brushes and had them made into a neat little parcel, returned to the sale. Doc was endeavouring to sell what he described as "a beautiful solid gold-plated guaranteed timekeeper."

"Folks," he said, in that amusing way of his, "I had considerable trouble getting this watch in Switzerland. They gave me the case one month and the works the next month. Look at it, men—look at it! It would run eight days without winding—goodness knows how long it would run if you wound it!"

The watch was sold for four dollars fifty cents, but in his exuberance Doc brought the hammer down on the purchaser's head instead of on the table beside him.

The sale continued, with the help of the four paid bidders and Doc's patter. Adolf Oberdorf beamed.

Billy Lowe, who had seen announcements of the auction all over the town, and who had heard about it from Rosie's lips, paid a visit to the establishment, but entered at the side door because he wanted to talk to the golden-brown haired girl.

"I'm glad to see you," she told him. "but if you haven't come to buy anything, you really mustn't stay."

Billy leaned over the counter, picked up a pen she had been using, and wrote on a piece of packing-paper which lay there. "I love you."

Rosie saw and was thrilled, but affected not to see.

"Listen," she said, "during business hours only business conversation."

"Well," responded Billy, gazing ardently into her blue eyes. "this is business. I want you to promise to come and meet mother and dad on Friday night."

"If Doc says it's okay——" began Rosie.

"I'll ask him now."

"No, he's too busy—you'll have to wait."

"But you must come," insisted Billy. "Friday night is going to be my big night. It's my birthday, and, besides, I'm going to——"

"You're going to get right out of here and let me do my work. Good-bye!"

Billy ambled away into the shop and mingled with the crowd. Doc had just announced that every afternoon of that week an auction sale would be held, and some genuine art object would be disposed of at a very low price to advertise the establishment. On this particular afternoon an oil-painting had been selected, and he stepped down from the platform to stand before a shrouded picture on the wall.

"An old masterpiece," he declared. "I think it's by Michael Angelo, but I couldn't get him on the phone to verify it. The title is 'Grandma at her work.'"

He pulled a cord, causing two little curtains to glide back from the painting, which was of an old dame at a spinning-wheel.

The picture was sold for three dollars—one dollar more than it was worth. And then an engagement-ring was offered for sale, and Billy acquired it.

Other rings followed: clocks, necklaces, bracelets, bangles. Doc, with his persuasive manner and his four accomplices, did wonders with the stock, but through the half-open door leading into the back room Quinn watched Rosie out of the tail of his eye every time she went to the safe.

Doc, gazing thoughtfully at the shops beyond the fair-ground, said abruptly, "Everything's rosy—we'll stay!"

Madeline van Dern, elegantly dressed, with a costly fur collar round her slim neck, stepped into the back room from the side street and sailed up to the counter, where she studied Rosie critically.

"The sale seems to be a big success," she said pleasantly. "You're Rosie, of course?"

"Yes," said Rosie. "Did you want to buy something?"

"Oh, no, I just came down to find Billy."

"I think he's in the shop," said Rosie, not without a pang of jealousy. "Shall I find him for you?"

"No, I'll find him. He's expecting me. Oh, by the way, he says you're coming to our party on Friday night."

"He did invite us," admitted Rosie. "It's his birthday, isn't it?"

Madeline nodded, and became aware of the words in Billy's handwriting on the packing-paper: "I love you."

"But that's not the real reason for his party," she said. "I rather imagines he intends to announce our Rosie started as the beautiful visitor broke off abruptly.

"Do you mean——" she began faintly.

"Oh, everyone knows that Billy and I are——"

A bottle of ink was standing beside the packing-paper and a pen was in it. Rosie, in her agitation, upset the bottle, and the ink was spilled all over the words Billy had written. Madeline laughed and walked away, but after she had gone it was with tears in her eyes that Rosie mopped up the ink and dealt with a bandy-legged man who had just acquired an alarm clock.

She saw no more of Billy that day. He was swept off by Madeline before the sale was over, and though he telephoned to the hotel in the evening, asking Rosie to meet him, she declined to do so, pleading that ancient excuse—a headache.

It was on a Tuesday that this series of auction sales began, and from day to day they continued, greatly to the profit of Adolf Oberdorf, and not without profit to the man who had suggested and conducted them. Quinn and Willis decided to postpone their projected attack upon the safe till the Friday night.

On the Wednesday Billy saw Rosie, but only in the presence of Doc, who readily agreed to accept the invitation to the party. On the Thursday Billy haunted the hack room, despite Rosie's protests, and did his best to make love to her, while she took money, gave change, and packed parcels.

She did not mention Madeline to him; she was far too proud to do that; but whenever he picked up her pen she swept every bit of paper out of his reach—a circumstance which puzzled him and led him to the erroneous conclusion that she did not welcome his attentions.

By this time Doc had become quite a figure in the town. The sheriff had no idea that he was the man he had ordered to depart, and Mrs. Lowe had heard so much about him that she made quite a point of his promised presence at the party.

To a Mrs. Craig she said over the telephone:

"Yes, we're entertaining Mr. Droop. Of course you've heard that he is of the nobility?"

"I'll be delighted to come," responded Mrs. Craig. "I understand that his uncle is the King of Czecho-Slovakia!"

October 10th, 1931.

Mrs. North, similiarly informed, replied gushingly:

"That's very kind of you, Mrs. Lowe. Mr. Oberdorf tells me that Mr. Droop's uncle is the King of Lithuania!"

Oh, Doc!

At the Party.

FRIDAY came; and the series of auction sales wound up in a blaze of profit. In his bed-room at the Union Hotel Doc arrayed himself in his ceremonial (and rather ancient) dress clothes, to say nothing of a white waistcoat. He then proceeded to play with three sections of walnut-shell and a pea, talking aloud as he manipulated them.

"One, two, three, folks. It's a game called the three musketeers. Three little shells and one little pea. Now we place the shell over the little pea, so! Wo make a few forward passes, so! Hocus, pocus, ice-cream soda—where is the little pea? Under here? No! Under this one? No! Now where is that little— Ah, here we are!"

It was a trick he had practised at many fairs, to the complete befogment of yokels and others who had staked money on the particular shell beneath which they believed the pea to have found a resting-place. Always out to make money, Doc believed that this little trick would amuse the guests at the Lowes' party—and add considerably to the cash in his own pockets.

Having assured himself that he was as adept at the trick as of yore, he put away the shells and the pea and crossed a corridor to knock on Rosie's door.

She was looking particularly sweet in a frock of printed silk when he entered the room.

"Ah, there you are, kitten—there you are!" he said fondly. "How does the old master look, eh? How does he look?"

"You look swell," she declared, after inspecting him.

"And you look sweller," he informed her. "Do you know that's the best seven dollar dress in the whole town? Honey, we're going to knock 'em dead at that party to-night!"

"I don't think I'm going," she said to his surprise. "I've changed my mind."

"You've changed— What did you go and do a thing like that for? Let me look at you! Uh-huh—just as I thought! You're tired—that's what's the matter with you. This party is just what you need. We'll have a lot of fun."

He fished out the shells and the pea and began to toy with them on her bed.

"I'm taking the three musketeers along," he informed her.

"Oh, Doc," she exclaimed in dismay, "but you can't do that! I won't let you."

"You won't let me, eh? Shucks! You've got to stop picking on me, d'you hear? I'm going to have my bit of fun."

Rosie had made up her mind not to go, but the sight of the "three musketeers" and Doc's determination to exploit them at a social function caused her to change her mind again. At all costs she must try to prevent him from cheating Billy's people and their friends.

So Doc and Rosie arrived at the house that was almost a mansion soon after eight o'clock, and Doc hammered on the door as became (more or less) one whose relatives were supposed to wear crowns.

Mr. Lowe himself opened the door because he happened to be in the hall and near it.

"Jeeves," said Doc, assuming a grand manner, "kindly tell Mr. Lowe that we're here, will you?"

"I am Mr. Lowe," said that gentleman, closing the door.

"Oh!" murmured Doc, all unabashed. "Well, this is Rosie, Mr. Lowe."

Mr. Lowe responded that he was charmed to meet Rosie, and then Billy came bounding towards them, greeting Rosie delightedly.

"You two young people run away and amuse yourselves while I show Mr. Droop around," suggested Mr. Lowe. And Doc, pinching his ward's cheek, chimed in:

"Yes, honey, you just run along and have a good time, while he shows me up—I mean shows me round."

Rosie departed, somewhat reluctantly, with Billy. Mr. Lowe led Doc into the drawing-room and introduced him to Mrs. Lowe, who was there with a number of guests.

"So you're Billy's mother," said Doc.

"Yes, thank you," said Mrs. Lowe graciously.

"Don't thank me, don't thank me," he laughed, waving his cigar.

He was introduced to Mr. and Mrs. Smith, to Miss West, to Judge Wall, and to others. He had a little quip for each of them that caused laughter. The grand piano was reached, and from it he took up an exquisite vase.

"Here's a pretty thing," he remarked.

"Pretty!"

"Oh, that," enthused Mr. Lowe, "is my pride and joy. That vase is a genuine Suryantes—it's worth a thousand dollars."

"Its value lies in the fact that there are only two of them in the world," supplemented Mrs. Lowe.

"Only two of 'em, eh?" said Doc, and pretended to drop the vase, but neatly caught it before it could reach the floor—though not before Mr. and Mrs. Lowe had cried out in alarm.

"I never muff 'em—I never muff 'em," declared Doc. "I knew it must be valuable because you called it a 'vawse.' Anything less than a thousand dollars in value would be called a 'varse'!"

He was introduced to others—and to cocktails. With a little group around him he gave a toast.

"You know," said a Mrs. Raymond, "we feel flattered, having a real nobleman in our midst."

"Nobleman?" echoed Doc in surprise. "Oh, yes, but keep that dark, won't you?"

"To think that we are talking to a real knight!" breathed Mrs. North.

"Yeah," drawled Doc, "but don't let the nights worry you—it's the morning after. And, oh, how I suffer!"

"Did they make you a Knight of the Bath?" inquired Mrs. Raymond.

"They wanted to," said Doc gravely, "but I wanted my Saturday night to myself."

They all laughed at that sally, and Doc proceeded to crack more jokes—and to drink more cocktails.

Billy and Rosie had wandered away to the stairs and were sitting on them and talking when Madeline bore jealously down on them and swept Rosie off to show her around, as she expressed it.

"You won't see her again till dinner," she said to Billy. "Come on, dear. I want you to meet these people."

Billy, being left high and dry, sought his mother, who had just left her guests to have a word with the butler.

"Well," he asked anxiously, "what do you think of them, eh?"

"He's a little eccentric, I think," decided Mrs. Lowe, "but she seems rather sweet. I've been studying her."

"Gee, but it's nice of you to say that, mother!" he cried. "It means a lot to me"

She shook her head at him, but smiled.

"You mustn't be too hasty, Billy," she said. "Look—you see this ring? There's a legend in our family that the youngest bride always wears this, and when you decide to marry I will signify my approval of your choice by taking it off my finger and giving it to your sweetheart. But be very sure, Billy."

"Gee, mother, you're a peach!" he exclaimed. And just then the curtains over the dining-room doorway were thrown back, and the butler announced loudly: "Dinner is served!"

"The Three Musketeers."

At the long dining-table Doc sat between Judge Wall and white-haired Mrs. Raymond, and he kept the table in a roar. Rosie was marched to a chair by Madeline, who sat beside her till Billy insisted on Madeline moving up so that he could sit between the two girls.

Exactly what had transpired between these two Billy could only conjecture, but Rosie seemed quiet, almost sad.

Something was said which Judge Wall discredited.

"It all sounds like a myth to me," he declared.

"Myth?" echoed Doc.

"Surely you know what a myth is?" rebuked the judge.

"Oh, yes, I know," responded Doc brightly, "it's a female moth!"

Judge Wall looked annoyed, but everybody else laughed—even a deaf man named Doanes, after the joke had been repeated to him three times.

"What's the matter?" whispered Billy anxiously to Rosie. "You don't seem to be a bit happy."

"I'm having a wonderful time," she assured him. "Everybody is so nice to me, and—"

Madeline, listening alertly, winced. Billy interrupted.

"It's my birthday, you know," he said; and squeezed her hand.

After the sweets had been served the butler marched into the room bearing with great solemnity a massive iced cake, decorated with twenty-one candles. He placed it on the table in front of Billy, and Mrs. Lowe rose to her feet.

"It's Billy's birthday," she said. "He's twenty-one. Who do you want to cut the cake, Billy?"

Billy looked across the table and grinned at Doc.

"Will you do the honours?" he asked.

"Okay, son—okay!" Doc immediately responded, and, pushing back his chair, went round to the cake, receiving a big knife from the butler on his way.

"Here's to the birthday, boy!" he cried, sharpening the knife on a steel. "And here's to little Rosie, the only girl with two birthdays in a year!"

Mrs. Lowe looked up, startled.

"Two birthdays?" she exclaimed.

"Yes," proclaimed Doc, waving the knife. "One on the day she was born, the other on the day I picked her up."

Mrs. Lowe and Judge Wall frowned at one another; Mr. Lowe bit his lip, and Madeline's red lips curled contemptuously. It is to be feared that the rest of the company stared.

"Picked her up?" repeated Mrs. Lowe faintly.

"Remember that, Rosie?" inquired Doc, flushed with cocktails and wine and rather reckless. "You were mighty dirty, but you were cute. You followed me—I didn't follow you. Don't forget that!"

"Fifteen years ago, wasn't it, Doc?" said Rosie quietly. "But you always say I'm a real, grown-up lady now."

"And what a lady!" cried Doc. "The sweetest lady in the world!"

"You'll always say that, Doc?"

"You bet your young life I'll always say it! Well, here's where we attack the cake!"

The cake was cut, the pieces were served, and some of the guests nibbled while others devoured. They were not to know that while they were celebrating Billy's birthday, two ugly crooks named Quinn and Willis were cracking a safe in a certain jewellery establishment, the property of Adolf Oberdorf.

From the dining-room, the guests streamed away to the drawing-room, and there Doc produced his walnut-shells and his pea, displaying them on a small table.

"Here we are, folks," he said in his best fair-ground manner—"here we are! All ready to go—all ready to go! This is a great little game, so step a little closer, folks—step a little closer, and don't block the sidewalk."

Men and women gathered curiously around him, while Rosie looked on askance.

"I knew you all wanted a little excitement," declared Doc, "so I brought the three musketeers along."

"Well," said Madeline, somewhat superciliously, as she squeezed in between Mrs. Lowe and the exponent of the trick, "how does it work?"

"Oh, very simple—very simple!"

He proceeded to show them all

"Here we have three little shells and one little pea," he said. "We put the little pea under this little shell—so! We make a few forward passes"—suing the action to the words and moving the shells about. "Now you guess where the little pea is!"

Madeline guessed, and guessed wrongly. Judge Wall moved up beside Doc.

"Is it a gambling game?" inquired a girl nervously.

"Gambling?" echoed Doc, as though in pain. "Tut, tut, tut! No, no, no—well, of course, I mean—just to add a little zest to the party, perhaps— But only for small stakes—only for very small stakes."

There was a fumbling in pockets, a searching in handbags.

"Well," said Madeline loudly, "I'll bet two dollars."

Mrs. Raymond cautiously decided to bet fifty cents on Madeline. Others bet more.

Madeline, watching closely as Doc manipulated the shells, selected the middle one—but the pea was not beneath it. In some mysterious fashion it had secreted itself beneath the shell on the right.

"She loses," said Doc regretfully. "It was under there all the time. So I take the money—see?"

Rosie looked sadly away as Doc scooped in the notes and coins; but Billy, pressing forward, cried:

"Sounds exciting. I think I'll try."

He tried—and lost. Madeline tried again and again, while Judge Wall stood with his hand behind his back, grimly looking on.

"Sold for three dollars!" boomed Doc. "And now you have the whole principle of an auction sale!"
October 10th, 1911.

"I've lost ten dollars," announced Madeline. "I think that's enough."

"I don't like to see women gambling," reproved Mrs. Lowe.

"I'll bet five dollars!" cried Billy, and tossed a note of that amount on the table.

"Five dollars," said Doc. "The gentleman bets five dollars. Anyone else care to back his judgment?"

Several sums were forthcoming.

"All right," said Doc. "The money is down. We place the shell over the pea—so! We make a few short forward passes—so! Now then, you guess where the little pea is."

"This one," said Billy—and his guess proved correct.

He collected eleven dollars, all told, and promptly staked ten on another try. His former success prompted even Mrs. Raymond to risk a dollar, while nearly all the others, save the judge, had a flutter.

But this time Billy selected the wrong shell, and Doc acquired the stakes.

"Mr. Droop seems to be doing all right, doesn't he?" remarked Mr. Lowe to Judge Wall.

"I'm positive the man is cheating," said the judge in a low voice.

"Oh, judge, I wouldn't say that," protested Mr. Lowe. "I don't much like this thing in my house, but—"

"Well," growled the judge. "I may be mistaken, but I don't think so."

Turned Out!

THE peanut game continued, and Bill, making efforts to recoup his losses, plunged rather heavily, and continued to lose. Rosie, all the more distressed because the boy was wasting his money, wandered away from the players.

Madeline saw her standing all alone near the doorway and went over to her.

"I was surprised to hear that he is not really your father," she said silkily, but with intended venom.

"He's the only man in the world who really loves me," Rosie retorted.

"After all, that's something," sneered Madeline.

"It's everything!"

Madeline retired hurt, and in the hall Billy encountered her.

"Well, I guess it's not my lucky night," he said somewhat gloomily. "I've lost a hundred and twenty-five dollars."

"Billy, how could you?"

Rosie heard, and moved nearer to the curtain screening the doorway, in order to hear more.

"He says it's because I can't concentrate."

"No wonder!" said Madeline, and then: "Weren't you surprised to hear that she's not his daughter?"

"Not a bit," declared Billy. "She told me that days ago. What difference does it make?"

"She's a little nobody!"

"Please," said Billy earnestly. "She means everything in the world to me—and before the night's out I'm going to ask her to marry me. That is, if she'll have me. She's the sweetest girl I've ever known. No mother, no father, no background—why, she deserves all the credit in the world. And so does he!"

Madeline was horrified, beaten, and crestfallen.

"Well, you've always been a little bit crazy," she said spitefully. "Good luck!"

Listeners do not always hear ill of themselves. Rosie, with a flushed face and shining eyes, ran back to the group of players.

"Anyone else, folks—anyone else?" asked Doc, as she tugged excitedly at his coat-sleeve.

October 10th, 1931.

"Wait a minute, Doc," she cried excitedly. "Wait a minute!"

She raised her hand and her voice. "Billy—Miss Van Dorn—everyone!" she called.

"Anything wrong, kitten—anything wrong?" inquired Doc, as everyone gathered wonderingly round.

"Wrong, of course not!" said she. "Everything's rosy! What do you say—we'll give them all a chance to get even again."

"Eh?"

"Sure we will! What do you say, Doc? We'll make the last bet—double or quits!"

"What a girl! What a girl!" exclaimed Doc, with evident relief. "Double or quits it is, folks. Step right up and call."

Rosie addressed each of the losers in turn, asking what they had lost, and as they named the various sums, Doc pushed notes and coins before them.

"And how much did you lose?" she said to Madeline.

"I lost ten dollars, and that's all I care to lose, thank you," was the icy retort.

"Make it twenty or nothing—your credit is good with Doc."

"Credit is extended," said Doc, and tossed twenty dollars in notes across the table.

"Billy, how much did you lose?"

"I lost a hundred and twenty-five."

"Make it two hundred and fifty, or nothing," urged Rosie. But Mrs. Lowe said rather sternly:

"He'll do nothing of the kind."

"You'll trust him to pay, won't you, Doc," insisted Rosie.

"Well, I don't know about that," said Doc reluctantly. "My motto is—"

"Your motto is that you trust everyone," Rosie interrupted.

"Okay! Everything's rosy with me, too." He pushed the specified sum in front of Billy, and began to move the shells, finally resting one—as it seemed—over the pea.

"Now we're all set," he announced.

"Who is going to guess where the little pea is?"

"I am," declared Rosie firmly.

Doc blinked at her, but surrendered graciously.

"Rosie is going to guess where the little pea is," he said. "Good—good! Go ahead, Rosie."

"It's under there," said Rosie, pointing to the middle shell. "They win, don't they, Doc?"

The urgency in her voice warned him that she wished them to win, but he was unwilling to lose twice as much as he had won, whatever her reason.

"Well, I don't know," he said slowly. "We'll have to see, Rosie," and his hand reached out to the shell.

But down came her little right hand over his, and with her left hand she picked up the shell on the right.

"It isn't under here," she said, and swiftly lifted the shell on the left.

"And it isn't under here. So it's got to be under the middle one, hasn't it, Doc?"

He tried to remove his hand, but she held it down, and for an appreciable space of time they looked at one another, while the judge frowned behind them.

"Yeah, sure," said Doc at last. "That's right—sure. If you say so. Yes, sure."

Rosie removed her hand, but the Doc continued to keep his over the shell. The players picked up their double stakes with alacrity, but Judge Wall suddenly reached down, tore away Doc's hand, and picked up the middle shell.

There was nothing beneath it but the table-cloth, and everyone stared,

"What's the big idea—what's the big idea?" exclaimed Doc indignantly.

"That's what we'd all like to know!" said the judge sternly.

"What does it mean?" faltered Mrs. Lowe, while Rosie shrank back in alarm.

"It means," exploded the judge, "that this man is a cheat—a thief! He came into your house to rob you—that's what it means!"

"But no one's been robbed—everyone is even," cried Rosie.

"I think I begin to understand," said Mrs. Lowe slowly.

"They're two of a kind," stormed the judge. "He came to rob your guests of their money—she came to rob you of your son."

"Now wait a minute—wait a minute," Doc began defensively. But Rosie, disregarding Billy's attempt to take her hand in his, clung to Doc, crying tearfully:

"Take me home, Papa Doc—take me home!"

"Yes, take her home—if you have one," said Mrs. Lowe scornfully. "But leave this house!"

"Now wait a minute," protested Doc. "I think I can explain—"

"You don't need to explain," snapped his hostess. "This town will not tolerate you or your kind. Go!"

"Yes, come on, Doc," whispered Rosie. But Doc went back to the table to pick up his "three musketeers" and the half-consumed cigar he had placed on an ash-tray. Then with an arm about the girl and his head erect, he went out from the room, and, presently, out from the house.

It was not till they had passed from the garden into the road that Doc spoke again. Then he said complainingly:

"Rosie, I still don't understand."

"Of course you don't, you old darling," said Rosie. "But it's all right."

"Well, if you say it's all right with you, honey," he told her, with a final effort at cheerfulness, "it's double all right with me."

The Parting of the Ways.

OUTSIDE the door of her room at the Union Hotel, Doc made yet another effort to fathom Rosie's reason for bringing about his downfall, but she shook her head sadly. She had borne herself bravely enough on the way back, but now she was an abject little figure of misery.

"I'm afraid you'll never understand, Doc," she said. "but it wasn't your fault. I think I want to leave this town. When can we start?"

"Pack your things," he said tenderly. "We're leaving right away, kitten. I never did like this burg, anyway. We'll go."

"You won't!" cried a gruff voice behind them, and they swung round, startled, to see bulky Sheriff Hopkins standing there, while his deputy was mounting the stairs.

"Now what?" demanded Doc.

"You're wanted for robbery," said the sheriff, and the long, lean deputy-sheriff reached the landing and stood waiting.

"Robbery!" gasped Rosie.

"What do you mean?" asked Doc blankly.

"You know what I mean—the Oberdorf store."

"The Oberdorf store been robbed?"

"Yes, it's been robbed," drawled the sheriff menacingly. "Money, jewellery—everything! And you did it!"

"Why, sheriff," cried Rosie, "we've been at the Lowes' house all the evening."

(Continued on page 26.)

A cub reporter accidentally kills his boss during a fierce quarrel and the sentence of the court is—death! Read of a girl's great sacrifice to save him.
Starring Lew Ayres and Genevieve Tobin.

Ambitions.

BROADWAY, New York City, on a summer's morning. Seething with people who jostled shoulder to shoulder, some on shopping expeditions, others, workers in the mighty city, hastening along the broad sidewalks to do some allotted task as quickly as they could.

On all sides a veritable bedlam of sound. The hum of voices, the din of traffic—taxi-cabs, private cars, lorries and trolley-cars all mingling to make the air hideous with a nerve-shattering noise.

And not only in the street was it pandemonium, but in the shops and palatial offices that fringed the Great White Way as well.

One building in particular was in a perfect hubbub, a thirty-storey skyscraper that caught the eye at once with its newness and very modern architecture. Here it was the same day and night—noise, nothing but noise all the time.

The publishing office and printing works of "The World," New York's foremost and leading newspaper, that had recently removed its home from the Bronx to these wonderful new premises

A "quick-fire" paper, fearless of what it published, with a very efficient staff working upon it—a staff that was proud of the paper and ever seeking to advance into better positions upon it.

"One such who was impatiently eager for a lift on "The World" was Bob Marshall, a well-built and handsome youngster with clear blue-grey eyes and a mass of dark curly hair. Bob was little more than the printers' devil, the boy who did all the donkey work, such as running hither and thither on odd jobs, collecting news items for the giant presses, distributing the first copies as they ran from the machines to the various departments for their edification.

Bob's ambition was big—he wanted to "break" from the printing side, to become a member of the editorial staff. News writing was in his blood and the pinnacle for which he aimed was that of reporter.

With the midday edition of the paper "gone to bed," Bob, in shirt sleeves and dirty overalls, took up a position near an elevator window in a small room on the ground floor of the newspaper building. From the basement came the roar of machinery as the presses churned out the news-sheets at record speed, but the youngster was lost to all save his rosy dreams of the future.

He had got to get on—to attain his ambition somehow!

It was as he was thus ruminating that the small, wooden service lift came shooting up from below bringing him back to his present job with a jerk. The lift stopped, and quickly raising the window, he drew out some two score copies of the new edition of "The World," and started on his rounds.

Up the stairs he plodded, going into many of the rooms on the various floors, distributing the specimen copies. The eighth storey eventually reached, the youngster turned in at a door that was marked on its frosted, glass panel: "Chief Editorial Offices."

Here it was all activity and noise. Reporters scattered about the large apartment, pounding typewriters for all they were worth, scribbling with pencils so fast that the points seemed in danger of becoming red-hot.

In the centre of the room stood a massive flat-topped desk literally strewn with type-written pages, cuttings, and other paraphernalia of the newspaper office. Here sat two men of vastly difference appearances. A tall, thin-faced fellow with piercing grey eyes, sparse brown hair that was inclined to be curly, and a determined jaw. A small but straggly moustache adorned his upper lip, a pipe was in his mouth, and he was in his shirt-sleeves. This man was the editor of "The World," a clever man in his job and greatly respected by his subordinates. Next to him was Mr. Winter, proprietor of the paper, a cynical-looking man, neatly dressed, with hair that was turning grey, brown eyes, and a neatly-trimmed moustache.

The two were evidently in consultation as Bob drifted in and placed a copy of "The World" on the editor's desk, for the latter was pointing something out to the proprietor that had appeared in an earlier edition.

Bob paused, listening, not through any desire to play the eavesdropper, but simply because anything and everything connected with "The World" interested him now that he was set on advancing his position on the paper. News gleaned might stand him in good stead later on.

"By the way, Smithson," Mr. Winter was saying at the moment "did that story of Senator Stanford's death come through?"

The political man in question had been shot at the night before while returning to his home from the theatre. What it was all about was not known, but a reporter had been assigned to the job of discovering the exact details for the paper.

"Al Stanton did his part, boss, and did it darned well." Frank Smithson took a pull at his pipe before continuing. "Yes, we got his story all set up in type, but Stanford's still hanging on. Suppose the old codger's going to die for the evening papers."

William Winter laughed, then caught sight of Bob standing there, and frowned heavily. Instantly the youngster took to his heels and hastened from the room.

The telephone operator was next to receive a copy of "The World," and she gave Bob some candy and passed a few pleasantries with him. Then again the boy went on his way.

Half an hour later Bob returned to the lower regions of the newspaper buildings. As he came down the wooden stairs into a small room in the basement that adjoined the machine-room, the compositors were streaming out for the dinner hour.

"Hallo, Bob!" called one genial fellow who had a great liking for the boy. "You coming along?"

"No, Dick!" Bob gave him a cheery smile and moved across to a row of clothes pegs where his hat and coat were hanging. "I'm on the dog-watch!"

"Then I hope it keeps fine for you, boy."

A wave of the hand and the compositor was gone, mingling with a crowd of his fellow-workers as they swarmed up the stairs towards the street.

From the pocket of his coat Bob took out a small brown-paper package, then crossed to a rough wooden bench, upon which he sprawled at full length, cupping his head in one hand. When he was on duty during the dinner-hour, minding the machines, it was his wont to perch there, munching the sandwiches that his mother had packed for him, dreaming of the success for which he longed.

But Bob was not left alone with his thoughts for long. Presently the door at the top of the wooden stairs crashed open, and a thick-set young man in the early thirties came staggering down into the room. Charlie Collins, attached to the reporters' staff, clever in his work but possessing a weakness for bootleg whisky and a propensity for borrowing money which he seldom returned.

"How are yuh, kid!" Collins grinned at the boy in a silly kind of way, took from his hip pocket a flask which he uncorked and raised to his lips. A long drink, a grunt of contentment, and then the flask was replaced. "But say, boy, what the dickens you doing down in this damp hole?"

"I work here," Bob told him, and took a bite at the sandwich he held.

"Well, if that isn't too bad." Collins cast a bleary eye around the small room and grunted disgustedly. "Gee, but you'll sure catch your death of cold in this damp place. Still, I suppose you know your own darned business best."

"Don't think I'm here because I like it," Bob shook his head so vigorously that he nearly choked himself with the piece of sandwich that was in his mouth. "I'd give anything to be shot of this hole—to become a reporter. Gee, if only I had the chance I'd—"

"No, no, no." Collins calmly picked up a banana that was included with Bob's lunch, peeled it, and took a good bite, then wagged what was left under the boy's nose. "Don't do that, son—it's a dog's life!"

"I'd like to be a reporter, anyway," Bob smiled.

Collins looked at him curiously, noticed the earnest expression on Bob's face, grinned inanely, then took another bite at the banana.

"Wh-wh-what ever made you wanna write, boy?" he said thickly.

For a moment Bob was silent, gazing vacantly at the wall opposite as he chewed at his meal.

"Oh, when I was a kid—a little girl died, but just before she died she—she pointed out of the window—and she had a beautiful look on her face." Tears were very close to Bob's eyes, for that little girl of whom he spoke had been his playmate at school, and he had been very fond of her. "I guess to most people it was just a gesture of death—but I thought she pointed to something. I suppose it sounds kind of silly, but ever since then I've wanted to write about it."

Collins was looking very sheepish, for the sadness of the story had penetrated his maudlin brain, touched his heart. But he quickly recovered from the sudden depression that had gripped him, stuffed the last piece of banana in his mouth, then patted Bob's knee.

"No, it ain't silly, kid, it ain't silly. It's poetry—that's what it is—poetry. I wanted to write a play once, but the pencil broke." He grinned inanely, for the fumes of the bootleg whisky had taken a strong grip on his brain. "I never had a chance after that. But I'll see that you get a chance, kid, you'll get a chance—"

He broke off at the sound of a feminine voice, and, glancing round, perceived through a small glass window, set high in the wall, a pretty telephone operator busy at her switchboard. Again he grinned, then turned back to Bob.

"Say, kid," he said eagerly, "you couldn't let me have two dollars till pay day, could you? You see, there's a girl I want to take out, and I'm stony."

Bob smiled good-naturedly and nodded. The two dollars were produced, which was about all the money Bob had at the moment, and they quickly changed hands.

"Thanks," Collins readjusted his hat, which had slipped to the back of his head. "I'll see that you get a chance, kid. A reporter you want to be? Yeah, you'll get your chance all right—you'll get your chance."

And, with another of his inanely grins, he went lurching up the wooden stairs and disappeared.

Bob Writes a Story.

CHARLIE COLLINS was as good as his word. As star reporter on "The World," he was in a position to ask for things and have his requests granted. Mr. Smithson knew it was the only way to retain his services, for many a rival paper would have given almost anything to number Collins among their staff.

So Bob Marshall transferred from the printing side to the editorial offices, and started as sub-reporter at twenty dollars a week. But he was by no means satisfied, for all his assignments were small—he wanted to do big stories—to earn the big salaries that his colleagues earned.

He had been on the editorial side about two weeks, when one particular evening a beautiful girl tapped on the door of Mr. Winter's office, and, in answer to his "Come in," entered that sumptuous apartment, where the proprietor, garbed in evening-dress, was reclining at ease in a deep armchair.

"How were the flowers, Myra?" William Winter was on his feet in a moment, and coming across to the girl he took her hands eagerly in his. "Did I guess right?"

Myra Deane—blonde, pretty as a picture in a gorgeous evening-gown of palest blue—smiled bewitchingly up at him, and the smile had a pleasing effect on the man. For the newspaper proprietor was madly in love with this girl who held the important post of Society Editor on "The World."

"You don't guess, Bill." There was a mischievous twinkle in Myra's blue eyes. "You know very well roses are my favourite flower."

He laughed and kissed her. Almost it seemed that she recoiled from the salutation, but in a moment she was laughing up at him again. He was twenty years her senior, double her own age, and, girl-like, she felt that this was sufficient barrier between friendship and something far greater. But he was very kind to her—she who was an orphan, and who had only been out of the orphanage little more than a year. He had given her a job and a home, and bestowed presents upon her, had taken her to cinemas, dances and theatres. She felt she owed him so much, and must humour him in consequence.

"Look here, Myra," he said, releasing her hands to light a cigarette. "I wish you'd write me a good yarn about the International Ball to-night. One of those bright stories you used to turn out."

"Slave driver!" Again the mischievous twinkle was in her eyes. "But don't worry, old thing, I'm covering it."

"Good!" he enthused, his eyes sparkling.

She nodded and smiled, then with a cheery wave of the hand she swept from the room. Straight across the passage she went and into the editorial offices, where typewriters pounded at high pressure and pencils sped across paper.

"Say, Frank"—she came up to the editor's desk and touched the big man's arm—"have you found an escort for me yet? For the International Ball, you know."

"But I haven't anybody," Smithson jerked his pipe from his mouth and glanced impatiently up at her. Then he replaced the pipe and let his eyes drift back to the typewritten copy he had been reading. "I thought I told you ten minutes ago that every reporter on the sheet is busy."

"I believe you did, but that doesn't cut any ice. I must have someone. You can't expect me to go alone. Besides, I shall want to dance, and simply must have a partner." The editor grunted and paid her little heed—just went on reading the "copy" for the next edition of "The World."

With a frown, Myra cast her eyes about her, glancing at first one and then another of the reporters busy at their desks. Eventually her gaze came to rest on Bob Marshall, and though his head was bent over his work, and she could not see his face, she knew that he was young and new to the office.

"Well, Frank, what about that young man over there?"

The editor looked up with a snort and followed the direction of her pointing finger.

"Him?" Smithson grinned up at Myra. The sub-reporter. Of course she could have him if she wanted, but the editor was sure she would get bored with such a kid. Still, it was none of his business, and as she nodded her head, he took his pipe from his mouth and belowered: "Hey, you!"

Heads were lifted on all sides of the room, but Smithson beckoned to Bob and the other reporters resumed their work. Wondering what was wanted of him Bob rose to his feet, came over to the editor's desk and stood there respectfully, glancing with ill-concealed admiration at Myra, who smiled reassuringly back at him.

"You got a dress suit, Marshall?" Smithson snapped at the boy.

"No, sir," replied Bob, somewhat puzzled.

"Then get an order from the cashier and go and rent one. And be back here dressed as quickly as you can."

Bob hesitated, scarcely knowing what to do—puzzling over this strange command. The editor waved an impatient hand.

"Don't gape like that—drat you—get moving!" he barked.

"Yes, sir."

Bob caught the smiling eyes of the beautiful girl standing beside the desk, and Myra nodded her head as if to substantiate the editor's instructions. A moment only did the boy pause after that and then went quickly from the room, his brain still pondering upon the editor's strange request.

Bob lost no time in getting the necessary money from the cashier to pay for the hiring of the suit of dress clothes, nor did he waste much time in obtaining the suit itself. Some half an hour later he came back to the office, looking as immaculate as any titled man, complete with top-hat and white gardenia in his button-hole.

Straight to the editor's desk he went, feeling somewhat embarrassed in the unaccustomed clothes, conscious that many of the reporters stopped in their labour to cast curious glances at him.

But Frank Smithson, busily writing, was not aware that the boy stood beside his desk till Bob coughed to draw his attention.

"Well, what the heck you standing there for?" The editor looked up and scowled, then waved an impatient hand towards the door. "Go and see the Society editor, Miss Deane, and for heaven's sake leave me in peace!"

Smithson's eyes went back to his work immediately, and, more mystified than ever, Bob walked from the room, crossed the corridor outside and tapped at a door upon which was inscribed the words "Society Editor." A feminine voice bade him enter, and he opened the door and went in, taking off his top-hat as Myra Deane rose from a chesterfield, where she had been reading a book.

"My, you look splendid!" She surveyed him critically, and became aware of his good looks, the frank expression on his face as he gazed at her in undisguised admiration. Then she found herself blushing, and impatiently shrugged her shoulders. "But we'd better be hurrying. We're going to the International Ball, and you're to be my escort."

Bob's face lit up with pleasurable pride. Here was something he had never dreamed of—to accompany such a wonderful girl to the biggest social event in the city. The International Ball at the Municipal Auditorium.

It was a grand affair. Everybody who was anybody in New York was there—well-groomed and handsome men—beautifully gowned women; but, to Bob, not one of the ladies present could compare with the girl he escorted, either in looks, charm or in dress. Not that he noticed many of them, because his admiring eyes seldom left Myra's pretty face. It was the same when he was dancing with her—and Bob could dance well—when he was sitting beside her during the brief intervals and when they were partaking of refreshment. His gaze was on her the whole while, drinking in her beauty, watching the gay light that seemed always to dance in her eyes.

Bob had lost his heart to Myra Deane and lost it badly, and he could not have denied it.

The ball over at last, he escorted her back to the office, and was sorry when the time for parting came.

"Well, I must get on with my story," she told him, holding out her hand as they reached the door of her room. "It was a splendid evening. Thanks so much for your trouble. Good-night!"

He took off his hat as he grasped her hand, gazing with adoration into her pretty face, his heart pumping like a sledgehammer within him. For the second time that evening she blushed and shrugged her shoulders impatiently.

"No need to thank me," said Bob happily. "It was a pleasure, believe me."

And then she was gone, breaking from his grasp and quickly darting into her room. For several seconds Bob stood there, gazing wistfully at the closed door, then turned slowly and went into the main editorial offices, where, as usual, all was activity and bustle.

His desk reached, he sat down in his chair, cupped his head in his hands, his thoughts dwelling on his wonderful good fortune of that evening. The one girl in the world—charming—exquisite,

He sighed, then suddenly reaching for a sheet of paper, he placed it in his typewriter and began to tap the keys slowly and laboriously. His story of the International Ball.

"I have just come from the International Ball. I escorted the society editor. She was the most beautiful of all among the vast assembly—"

He paused, gazing around the office dreamily as if seeking inspiration, then suddenly continued, praising the girl who had captured his heart, lauding her to the skies.

Half an hour he stuck at the machine, and then Frank Smithson yelled for him. Two or three more words pounded out at record speed, and his story was completed, then he hurried over to the editor, who sent him off to Mr. Winter's apartments with some "copy" for the proprietor's "O.K."

"No need to come back again to-night, kid," Smithson informed him. "That copy'll do first thing in the morning. And, by the way, see that those glad rags are returned—get me?"

Bob nodded and went out. And no sooner had he disappeared than the reporter who occupied the next desk to his was at the boy's typewriter gazing down at the sheet of paper Bob had left there. He was curious to see what the boy had been writing, and as he read it through he whistled and grinned.

Next moment the sheet of paper was out of the machine and the reporter was striding across to Mr. Smithson's desk.

"Found this on my desk, boss," he lied, placing the typewritten sheet before the editor.

As the reporter went on his way, Mr. Smithson took up the sheet, read it through, and chuckled.

"Heck, this is good," he told himself with a trace of excitement in his face. "I'll put it in the paper alongside Myra's story. It'll make darned good reading, or I'm a Dutchman."

And quickly adding at the top in blue pencil, "Cub Reporter Attends International Ball, by Robert Marshall," Smithson passed Bob's "story" on to

"By the way, Smithson," Mr. Winter was saying at that moment, "did that story of Senator Stanford's death come through?"

the printing department to be included in the next issue of "The World."

The Way of a Boy.

NEEDLESS to say, Bob Marshall was astounded when, on coming down to breakfast next morning, he picked up the copy of "The World" which had just been delivered to his home, and saw, staring at him in cold print from the centre column of the front page that which he had written about Myra Deane at the office the previous night.

His mother, who had seen the paper first, looked at him rather curiously as he read it, but made no comment. But she was nevertheless more than a little perturbed that her boy should have been so carried away by a girl to write in that way about her. And her perturbation was added to by the knowledge, gleaned in a talk with a neighbour whose husband worked on "The World," that this girl, Myra Deane, was practically engaged to Mr. Winter, the proprietor of the paper.

What would Winter say if he knew that Bob had lost his heart to the girl as apparently seemed to be the case? Probably would dismiss him from his work in a fit of jealousy. And having no husband, only Bob to support her, Mrs. Marshall felt sad at such a distressing thought.

But the good lady would have felt more ill at ease if she had known that that morning her son sent Myra some flowers, saw her later in the day in her office, and received her congratulations on his write-up of her.

"It was good, but very flattering," the girl told him somewhat shyly.

Bob smiled and felt encouraged. "I didn't expect it would get in the paper. I left it lying about, and I suppose someone spotted it." He gazed at her with longing eyes as she sat at her typewriter, looking round at him. "I suppose it was rather absurd of me writing all that, but so much happened to me last night, I just couldn't let it fade away, so I just wrote it."

"Um-um, but it was nice what you wrote about me." In that moment Myra had forgotten William Winter, his love for her, and how much she owed him for her present substantial position. This boy had come into her life, and she felt that there was no harm in cultivating his acquaintance.

Bob came closer to her, and greatly daring, took hold of her hand.

"Miss Deane—Myra, I meant all I said in that—er—story," he said earnestly.

Again Myra blushed. Flattery she was used to, but there was something in this simple and earnest praise of her that went straight to her heart—made her forget Winter more and more.

"You did?" Her eyes twinkled mischievously. "Well, let me tell you something. I wasn't the most beautiful girl at the ball."

Bob was about to assure her emphatically that she was when a knock at the door interrupted him. But it was only a man from the chief editorial offices, and when he had dumped some papers on Myra's desk he took his departure, though as he went from the room he shot Bob a curious glance.

"Look here," said Bob, as the door closed behind the fellow, "I was wondering—"

Another interruption. This time in the shape of the telephone-bell, which tinkled noisily.

"You wondered—what?" prompted Myra as her hand went out to the receiver of the phone.

October 10th, 1931.

"Well, how about Sunday?"

"Well, how about it?" she said archly.

"Well, I didn't have anything planned." Again Bob felt somewhat nervous, and he fidgeted with the lapel of his jacket. Then as he saw she was smiling amusedly at him, he squared his shoulders and forced a laugh. "I thought we could walk through the park and—"

"Oh, you're inviting me to step out, eh?" She feigned surprise, though his invitation thrilled her inwardly. But when he nodded she affected not to see the motion of his head. Her attention went to the telephone whose bell was still ringing with marked persistence, and, lifting the receiver from its hooks, she clapped it to her ear. "Hallo? Are you there?" she said into the mouthpiece.

A voice, easily recognisable, came over the wire, and what the caller had to say caused the girl to smile faintly.

"You'll be out of town for the weekend?" Cleverly she forced into her voice a tone of disappointment. "Well, what am I supposed to do? Sit at home and twiddle my thumbs? Oh, all right—I'll manage somehow."

Disillusioned, Bob was half-way to the door when Myra hung up the receiver and turned round. So she had a boy friend already? Well, it was no use, then, his trying to foster an acquaintance with her. It was not likely she would turn aside this other fellow for a new and struggling reporter.

"Oh, wait a minute!" Myra smiled bewitchingly as Bob stopped and glanced back at her dubiously. "When was it you wanted me to—er—step out?"

"Sunday," he told her, with sudden renewed eagerness.

"Very well, it's a date, Bob," she cried. "I'll meet you at three at the corner of Twenty-third."

Bob nodded and went away highly elated. How he got through his work between then and the Saturday he hardly knew, for he found himself thinking of the pretty girl every moment of the time. But Sunday came at last, and he met her, looking radiantly beautiful in a pale pink frock and big picture hat.

They went into the park, listened to the band, then roamed around the large zoo adjoining, laughing heartily at the queer antics of some of the animals, thoroughly enjoying every moment of the time. Myra found herself really beginning to take an interest in her companion. She discovered that Bob was so different to all the other men she knew, and especially did this apply to William Winter, who always affected a patronising air whenever he took her out anywhere.

Clear that she was falling for this boy, and she was forced to admit it to herself when he whirled her away to a delightful spot beneath a cluster of trees, and there, on the fresh green grass, laid out the contents of the picnic-basket he had brought with him.

A delightful time, during which they chatted lightheartedly, and only marred when rain came down and sent them scuttling for home.

She took Bob to her apartments to dry his clothes, and he was amazed at the luxurious furnishing of the place. He was in the drawing-room, she in the kitchenette drying his hat and coat over the gas-stove, when, wandering around the room, Bob saw several packages with labels attached to them. "Happy Birthday, Myra—From Dodo," and various other names.

Boblike, he felt that he must give her a present, too, and directly he got home he went to a jar that stood on the dresser in the kitchen and took from it a wad of dollar bills. His and his mother's savings!

Not a qualm did he have that he was taking money that rightly belonged to Mrs. Marshall—all that obsessed him was the thought that he must give the girl, who had completely captured his heart, a present that would be worthy of her.

Bob Hits Out.

"GEE, it's the nicest present I've ever had!"

Myra's eyes shone with real pleasure as she gazed at the magnificent gold bracelet, studded with diamonds that scintillated in the light streaming through the office window.

"I'm glad you like it." Bob felt delighted that she should be so pleased with his birthday gift. "Here, let me put it on for you."

He took the bracelet from her, encircled it round her right wrist, and fastened it there. At that moment, and unbeknown to them, the office door opened and a face peered in. Charlie Collins, in a maudlin state as usual, and looking for someone from whom to borrow a few dollar bills. Perhaps Myra would oblige him, but at sight of the girl with Bob fastening that bracelet around her wrist, he caught in his breath in amazement, and retreated, drawing the door quietly to behind him.

"Oh, Bob, it really is a beauty!" Myra stepped back and admired the bracelet again. "Oh, you are a dear boy! I hardly know how to thank you enough!"

"Don't try." Bob stepped up to her, took her hands in his, gazing deep into her shining eyes. "Look here, Myra. I have so much I want to say to you. Can't I see you later—after work?"

Myra hesitated, for she knew how jealous William Winter would be if he found out about their friendship. But she paused only a moment, then nodded her head as she realised that Winter did not return, as a rule, from a weekend till the Tuesday morning. Safe enough to take a chance.

"Yes, Bob," she said. "Call for me to-night."

He went away in the seventh heaven of delight, but once outside the room someone lurched up to him and caught him by the arm. Bob started, then seeing who it was, he smiled.

"Hard up, old man!" The boy shrugged his shoulders expressively. "It's a fact. I haven't a dollar—"

"It's not that, kid." The reporter blinked around as if to make sure he wouldn't be overheard. "A little bit of sound advice. Go easy, or you'll get yourself in the devil of a jam. Oh, but perhaps you don't know! Well, I'll tell you. That girl—she's Winter's, and—"

Bob shook off Collins' grasp and seized him fiercely by the lapel of his jacket, his face crimsoning with sudden rage. He had heard tales about Winter—how the proprietor of "The World" gadded about with numerous girls, spent his money freely on them, encouraged them to smoke and drink. But Myra—he knew that such a sweet girl could never indulge in such vices.

"You dirty hound!" Bob's voice was raised in the fury that possessed him. "You dare say anything—"

"But it's a fact, kid," the reporter gasped, alarmed at the fierceness of Bob's tone, the light blazing in his eyes. "I know—"

His words broke off in a gasp as Bob suddenly swung up his fist and crashed it clean into his chest just above the heart. For a moment Collins swayed precariously on his feet, then, with an infuriated snort, he launched himself at the boy and grasped him round the neck.

"You'd do that, you darned little fool!" he raved. "Well, by heck, you've only yourself to blame fer what's coming to you!"

Bob struggled furiously to release himself from the other's fierce grip, and together they lurched across the passage, panting heavily with their exertions. Then suddenly the door of the chief editorial offices opened, and Frank Smithson strode out, puffing furiously at his pipe, a heavy frown upon his brows.

"Hey, you two! What the blazes you think you're doing? You hear me? stop this scuffling at once." He flung himself forward as they paid him no heed, grasped them one in each hand, and dragged them apart. Sheepishly they looked at him as he thrust out his jaw pugnaciously. "A nice pair of beauties, I must say! Go on there, now—get back to your work, or, by heavens, I'll sack you!"

Without a word they went, but as they passed into the editorial office Bob shot Collins a furious glance, a glance that was a warning that he should be careful what he said about Myra in the future.

Bob Again Loses His Head.

IT was just after six o'clock, and the day's work was finished. Myra was tidying her desk when suddenly the door of her room opened and, glancing round, she beheld William Winter, a mug expression on his rather handsome face, standing on the threshold.

A surprise return from his week-end, and sight of the man caused her heart to sink, the colour to drain from her face. Of course, he would expect her to go out with him that night, and she had promised to see Bob.

"Surprised to see me, eh?" Winter came over to her and took hold of her arms. She nodded slowly, and he smiled, then kissed her on the cheek. "Couldn't be away from you a moment longer, darling. Just had to come back. Bored with fishing, and simply long for a dance with you. We'll go to the Blue Tavern to-night and—"

"Oh, I can't see you to-night, Bill!" Her heart revolted that he expected her to fall in with his wishes like this. It was always the same. Never did he ask her what she would like to do or what place she would like to visit. It was like being tied to a chain. Well, she would alter all that now. She had promised to see Bob, and though she did not take his affection for her too seriously, she liked his companionship and the change it meant. "You see, I'm going to a concert, and the seats are booked."

But, shrewd that he was, Winter could tell that she was lying; and, what was more, he suspected that she had an engagement with some other fellow. And the very thought made the blood run riot in his veins, caused him to clench his hands fiercely.

"I'll see you to-night at eight, Myra." His voice was commanding, and held a trace of menace in it. "Understand?"

She nodded, utterly cowed, knowing that she must obey him or lose the very remunerative post she held on "The World." So, as he went from the room, a smile of infinite satisfaction playing about the corners of his mouth, she dropped disconsolately into her chair and wrote a note to Bob, which she sent to him by express messenger.

It arrived at Bob's home just as the boy was having dinner, and his mother brought it in to him. Wondering who it could be from, he tore open the envelope, took out the folded sheet of paper inside, and opened it out. Then, as he read the brief message written thereon, his jaw dropped, and an expression of vexation came into his good-looking face.

"Dear Bob," ran the message—"I'm sorry, but I can't see you to-night, but will explain everything in the morning. MYRA."

Why couldn't she see him? No sooner did the thought occur than he remembered those words of Collins that had aroused him to fury. "That girl—she's Winter's!"—remembered, too, that as he had left the office that evening he had passed the proprietor of "The World" coming into the building, back earlier than expected from his week-end. Was there any truth in what the reporter had told him, after all? If there was, and Myra was indeed Winter's girl, then that might account for her putting him off this evening!

The bare thought infuriated him. He loved the girl deeply. So much, in fact, that he would have done anything for her just to please her and win her affections. But he knew there could be no rival. He must know just how things stood, whether it was true she was indeed friendly with the boss.

As he rose to his feet, pushing aside his unfinished dinner, he became aware that his mother was standing by the dresser eyeing him curiously, while in her hand she held the jar in which they kept their savings. He guessed what was on her mind, and it added to the anger that already possessed him.

"Well, you needn't look at me as though I'd stolen it," he growled. "It—it was my money."

"Of course it was yours." She smiled ruefully, replacing the jar on the shelf. "You earned it right enough. But, you see, you used to say it was ours, and naturally—"

"I had to have it," he interrupted impatiently. "I needed it for something important."

He snatched up his hat from where it had been lying on a chair, rammed it on his head. The mother frowned. It was not like Bob to speak to her in this brusque manner, and she guessed that something had disturbed him.

"Why, is anything wrong, Bob?" she asked gently.

"No!" he stormed, his face crimsoning. "I took the money—that's all there is to it!"

"Now, now, don't get angry, son." Mrs. Marshall came over to him, placed a hand soothingly on his arm. "It's all right, of course. The money's nothing. We'll manage somehow."

"Oh, I don't care what happens!"

Thoughts that Myra might indeed be Winter's drove him nearly crazy with jealousy. Fiercely he flung off his mother's hand.

"Oh, Bob, don't act like that!" Tears were very near Mrs. Marshall's eyes. Intuition told her what was upsetting him. That girl he had lauded to the skies in the paper. Perhaps he had found out her friendship with Winter. "You've worked hard, so you deserve some fun. But this fascination for that girl's changed you—she's taking you away from me and—"

"That's enough of that!" Bob stormed at her. "Leave her out of this, can't you!"

"But, Bob," protested his mother, "She's not the girl for you. I heard that she's—"

Again he shouted to her that it was none of her business, then made a sudden rush to the door and went out,

Bob caught Winter's wrist as, with murder in his eyes, the newspaper proprietor swung back his arm to launch the heavy missile at the youngster's head.

slamming the door violently behind him. He would see Myra immediately, discover once and for all if it was indeed true that she was Winter's girl.

A Fight that Ended Disastrously.

MYRA herself opened the door in answer to Bob's knocking, and sight of the boy standing on the steps caused her to catch her breath sharply. Nearly eight o'clock, and Winter was due at any moment now to call for her. If he found Bob here there would be a scene, for she knew the jealous disposition of the man. At the least he would sack Bob from his employ—might possibly resort to more violent measures.

"What is it you want, Bob?" she asked agitatedly. "Didn't you get my note?"

"Yes, but I had to see you." As he gazed into her pretty face all the fury ebbed from him, and he felt that nothing could shatter the affection he bore her. But in another moment he remembered what had brought him here—realised that for his own peace of mind he must discover the truth. "Myra, there's something I want to talk to you about. May I come in?"

"Well, I haven't much time," she told him hesitatingly. "So you must make it short and snappy."

Wondering what he could want she closed the door as he stepped into the hall, then led him to her drawing-room. Then it was that Bob noticed the wonderful dress she was wearing, the costly jewels that adorned her neck and hands. Obviously she expected a caller—was going out. Savagely he clenched his fists, for he felt that there was something in what he had heard, after all—that Myra was indeed on friendly terms with their employer.

"You're waiting for someone, aren't you?" he accused her.

She shrugged her shoulders as she dropped into a chair. It was imperative that she get rid of Bob as quickly as was possible, and the only way to do this that she could think of was to deliberately set out to hurt his feelings.

"My dear boy." Her tone was mocking. "You're not seriously cross-examining me, are you?"

"It's Winter, isn't it?" Bob shot at her fiercely.

"Um—am!" Another shrug of the shoulders. Then suddenly she frowned. "But what right have you to put such a question to me?"

Bob faced her squarely, gazing deep into her pools of eyes.

"Because I love you, Myra!" he stated boldly, and would have caught at her hands had she not leaped to her feet at that precise moment.

"You silly boy. You don't know what you're talking about. It's just youthful infatuation. Why, if you never saw me again you'd—" She broke off as the clock on the mantelpiece chimed the hour, and a look of deep concern leaped into her face. She knew now that she loved Bob as much as he did her; knew, too, that it could never be. The last tinkling note of the clock and she caught at the boy's arm. "Bob, you must really go now. I—"

A knock at the front door that caused her face to blanch, followed instantly by footsteps in the passage. Her maid answering the summons. Myra seemed powerless to move—and then the drawing-room door opened and William Winter came in smoking a large cigar.

"Oh, I'm sorry." There was a sneer in his tone and he frowned darkly. "Didn't know you had visitors, Myra."

"It's quite all right, Bill." She pulled herself together, summoned up a smile. "He—he just came in from the office with some copy. You know each other, don't you? Mr. Winter—Mr. Marshall."

Winter bowed his head mockingly to Bob, who glared at him ferociously. Then the youngster turned to the girl.

"Why, don't you tell him the truth?" he said somewhat fiercely.

"What on earth do you mean, boy?" Winter came up to Bob and thrust out his jaw menacingly. "The truth? What is it?"

Bob paid no heed to Myra's warning glance, the distressed expression that had come into her pretty face.

"Well, I didn't come here from the office," Bob said quietly. "I came because I love Myra, and—"

"Is that so?" Winter laughed sardonically. "Well, then, you'd better be going. It's me Myra loves—you don't stand an earthly."

The air of assurance of the man nettled Bob, aroused the streak of obstinacy in his nature. Somehow, he felt that the girl could not possibly like so cynical and cold-hearted a man as Winter appeared to be. No doubt he was trading on the fact that he was her boss—that she feared he might dismiss her from her post if she did not humour him.

"Myra," Bob turned determinedly to the distracted girl. "Out of the office I'm not taking orders from Mr. Winter. Until you ask me to go I'm not leaving here."

"Then, Bob," Myra quickly began, intending to ask him to leave at once, and so avoid possible trouble, "do, please—"

"You impertinent little rat!" The infuriated words burst from Winter as, livid of face, he suddenly leaped forward, caught at Bob's arm, and swung him round. "What the blazes do you mean? You'll not leave till Myra asks you. Well, let me tell you this is my place and—"

"You lie!" Bob flung at him fiercely, clenching his hands.

"All the same it is my apartment!" sneered the newspaper proprietor. "Miss Deane is not well off, certainly not in a position to run such a place as this. But she's clever, a good Society editor, and as such it is necessary for her to have good rooms. But, Marshall, perhaps next month she will allow you to pay the rent. A bold cavalier. But a whipper-snapper who couldn't—"

He said no more, for, with a cry of rage, Bob whipped up his fist and crashed it clean into the leering face, sending Winter staggering. Right into an inlaid mahogany table the newspaper proprietor crashed, and, as he shot out his hand to save himself from falling, his fingers came into contact with a bronze statue standing on the polished surface of the table.

A terrified scream burst from Myra as she shrank back against the chesterfield, white of face, trembling in every limb. Next second Bob, sensing Winter's intention, flung himself bodily at the man. In the nick of time he caught the other's wrist as, with murder in his eyes, the newspaper proprietor swung back his arm to launch the heavy missile at the youngster's head. And then they were struggling furiously.

The bronze statue went to the floor with a crash, and grasping fiercely at each other they lurched all over the room, each striving to throw the other, while Myra watched with terrified eyes, calling frantically to them to stop.

For two or three minutes the battle raged, then Bob's foot caught in the thick pile of a rug. Desperately he strove to save himself from falling, but Winter, quick to seize the advantage, wrenched himself free from the boy's clinging embrace, uttering a savage cry of triumph. Next second, and an iron-hard fist thudded to the side of Bob's head, sending him hurtling across the room to crash to the floor beside the window.

"Oh, don't!" screamed Myra imploringly, as Winter rushed down on the fallen boy. "Please don't!"

But Bob was quickly on his feet again, and though dazed from the heavy blow, he was ready as Winter reached him. A clever feint and he dodged the vicious right that was aimed at him, then caught the newspaper proprietor a hefty blow clean between the eyes.

Back went Winter to cannon into the chesterfield and Myra, with a frightened gasp, dodged quickly out of the way. Furiously Bob charged after his man. But Winter parried the blow that was aimed at his head and the two locked again. But late nights and too much wine had taken toll of the newspaper proprietor's stamina and suddenly, Bob, wriggling free from Winter's weakening grasp, whipped up his right and again landed heavily between the other's eyes.

A sobbing gasp ceasing him, Winter went toppling backwards over the chesterfield—then came a thud as he crashed to the floor and the back of his head struck the curb of the fireplace.

"Ooooh!" Horror in her eyes, fearful that he might be badly hurt, Myra ran to the fallen man and dropped to her knees besides him. His eyes were closed, his face white and bleeding. Wildly she caught at his wrist, feeling for the pulse. Just a faint sign of beating—that was all. Supposing he was to die? The dread thought sent an icy chill down her spine and she glanced quickly at Bob, who stood beside the chesterfield, clothes rumpled, hair tousled, breathing heavily from the result of his exertions of the past few minutes. "He's—he's unconscious! I'll take care of him. Go now. Please—please go, for my sake. There mustn't be any scandal. See what I mean? Hurry—oh, hurry!"

Bob pulled himself together instantly. Well he knew what would happen if he stayed there a moment longer and someone happened on the scene. A terrible scandal—with the three of them involved. Besides, he might even be arrested for assault.

A nod to Myra and then he was gone. But scarce had the door closed behind him than the horrified girl saw the inert figure of Winter give a sudden convulsive tremor and then become strangely still.

The man was dead!

A while she knelt there stunned. What should she do? What could she do? A scandal simply had to be avoided and above all that boy—Bob Marshall, whom she realised in that terrible moment meant more than life itself to her—Bob must be saved from the consequences of that terrible scene.

At last a thought occurred to her and, jumping to her feet, she rushed to the telephone, called up Frederick Herk, Winter's secretary, and after telling him that the newspaper proprietor was dead, implored him to come straight to her apartments without breathing a word to anyone of what had taken place.

Herk agreed to her frantic request somewhat reluctantly, and with a sigh of relief the distracted girl sank limply into a chair to wait for him.

(Continued on page 20.)

EDMUND LOWE

as he appears in the Fox film "Women of All Nations," with Victor McLaglen.

"UP FOR MURDER."

(Continued from page 18.)

A Way Out.

FREDERICK HERK looked down at the dead body of the man who had been his chief, then picked up the bronze statue from where it had fallen to the floor. For several moments he weighed it in his hand, gazing at it intently, his brows furrowed as if in deep thought.

"Well, it's a good story, Myra." He set the statue down upon the mahogany table, then turned to Myra, who sat watching him from narrowed lids, and slowly shook his head. "But let me tell you this. I said I'm willing to try and hush up this terrible thing, but that yarn of yours isn't good enough for a jury."

"You mean you don't believe it?" Myra said with sinking heart.

"I don't say that—I said I didn't think a jury would." The shrewd secretary smiled grimly. "Think how it would sound. Mr. Winter crosses the room, trips over a rug, stumbles and falls, striking his head against the table. Um—um—not good enough. We've got to find something better than that. Now come, Myra—did you do it?"

"Yes," she lied, realising he did not believe her tale about how Winter had met his death and feeling it would be safer to blame herself than to tell the real truth. Herk might not be so willing to hush up matters if he knew that Bob was the culprit.

"I thought so." But the secretary did not think anything of the kind. It was just his way of getting eventually at the true facts. "Why—and how did you kill him?"

"Why, I—I struck him with that statue!" she told him desperately.

But her tone was not convincing, as Herk was quick to notice.

"Come on, Myra," he coaxed. "Who else was here?"

"I tell you—no one." The girl felt her heart pumping furiously against her ribs. It was obvious that he didn't believe she had done it after all. Did he know of Bob and that they had been friendly? She looked at him as fearlessly as she could. "I did it. Don't you believe me?"

"Myra, listen to me and listen carefully." He came right up to her, grim determination on his set face. "You answer my question truthfully or this thing goes further than you or I—or that boy!"

"How do you know about—?" Myra bit her lip as she realised she had made a false step. Desperately she tried to cover it. "What boy?"

"Oh, that's all right—we'll forget him for the moment." Herk smiled, well-satisfied. That Sunday in the park—he had seen Myra and Bob together. Then there was that absurd "story" the boy had written about the girl. Obvious to him that the two were very friendly. And the signs of a scuffle in this room. More than likely Bob Marshall had been here when Winter had called and a scene had followed. So Herk had reasoned and he knew now it was the truth. "Now, Myra, understand this—we can't afford a scandal. You can't, poor Winter's people can't and above all the paper can't. Now I've got an idea. We've got to get Winter out of here—and back to the office. That's where he died. Get that straight, my girl. He was killed in his office—by an unknown October 10th, 1931.

assailant. I was in an adjacent room, my own office, and— But there's no time to waste. I'll tell you all about it later."

Out in the streets of New York, newsboys were rushing hither and thither yelling of the murder of William Winter, proprietor of "The World." If ever there was a sensation this was it, and the papers sold like hot cakes. People of all classes and descriptions were acquainted with the dead man and all were eager to know just how the unfortunate victim had met his end.

And the police were anxious to know that, too. At that very moment, Detective-inspector Mitchell of the City police was interrogating Frederick Herk up in the dead man's office, where the secretary in the early hours had contrived in his car to bring the body unseen from Myra's apartments.

"And who was the last to see Mr. Winter alive?" the detective asked Herk. "I believe I was," the secretary calmly replied. "You see, Mr. Winter is not usually in his office so late at night. He came down especially to read over his editorial on Farm Relief. Poor Mr. Winter. He was a public benefactor, Mr. Mitchell, and—"

"Quite so." The detective did not want to hear the dead man's good points, for they did not concern him in the least. He was here to discover all he could about the crime—to gather information and clues that might lead to the arrest of the assailant. But there was not much to gain in the newspaper offices, for Herk said he knew very little beyond the fact that as he had sat in his own office adjoining Winter's he had heard the mutter of voices seemingly to come from Winter's room—voices that appeared to be raised in anger. Mitchell knew that he must now continue his investigations elsewhere and so he rose to his feet, jerking his hat well down over his forehead. "Well, Mr. Herk, you can rest assured that the District Attorney's Office will leave no stone unturned to run down this foul assassin. We're up against a brick wall at the moment, but we'll find him never fear."

But as the detective tramped from the room, Herk smiled to himself. He thought it very unlikely that the police would make an arrest with nothing whatever to go on. And as for Bob Marshall—he would be sure to keep well out of the way—would probably flee the country. It was almost certain a scandal would be avoided.

"I Killed Him!"

IT came as a great shock to Reginald Herk when the telephone bell rang that evening and the chief of police, from the other end of the line, told him that a young fellow had given himself up as the murderer of the dead newspaper proprietor. Robert Marshall, employed by "The World," he said he was. Would Mr. Herk come along and identify him?

"He says he murdered Mr. Winter?" Herk groaned to himself as he realised that this meant the crushing of his hopes—that a scandal was now imminent unless— He scarcely dare ask the chief the question: "What—what else does he say?"

"Nothing beyond that he killed the man!"

"I'll be right over, chief!" cried Herk, his face brightening swiftly, and he lunged up the receiver.

There was just a chance that all would be well after all. So long as Bob Marshall did not speak. But it was imperative that he should see the boy at once, before the police had time to force the truth from him by their dread third degree methods, and warn him to keep silent.

Quickly he called Myra on the telephone, asked her to look into his office at once. Bare seconds later the girl came in, looking at him inquiringly.

"Marshall's confessed." Herk had risen to his feet, and as the girl reeled under the enormity of his words he caught at her arm to steady her. "Now, now, Myra, pull yourself together. So far, we're in luck—he hasn't talked. But I've got to get right down to police headquarters to him as quickly as I can."

"All right." With an effort Myra mastered the fear that gripped her. "I'll go with you."

She turned with the intention of getting her hat and coat, but the secretary quickly drew her back.

"You'll do nothing unless I tell you." There was no mistaking the command in Herk's tone. "You'll stay right here at work and keep your mouth shut. We've gone too far with this—we can't back out now."

"But it's all my fault!" The girl clasped her hands distractedly, tears very near her eyes. "What about Bob—what about him?"

"Oh, don't worry about the boy. I'll save him. I've got to save him." He reached for his hat that lay on a chair, rammed it on his head. "But I can't do it with lawyers, Myra, and I can't do it by telling the truth."

"Well, how then?" the girl asked him anxiously.

"Well, I—I'll have to let the D.A.'s office convict him." Herk smiled wryly as the girl clapped her hands to her face in horror, sharply caught in her breath. "Believe me, Myra, it's our only chance. Afterwards I'll fix it to get him off."

"Are you sure you can do it?" she cried hoarsely.

"Yes—providing you help me and the paper doesn't become involved in a scandal I know we can swing it." He patted her shoulder reassuringly, and felt relieved as a wan smile broke over her pretty face. "Now, come on, Myra, get back to your work and leave it all to me."

She went then, satisfied, and Frederick Herk once more lifted the receiver of the telephone. This time he called up Charlie Collins, at work in the chief editorial offices, and requested his presence. To the maudlin reporter he confided all that had happened, and swore him to silence, then asked him to go along to Bob's home and impress upon the mother that whatever she did she must remain dumb about the whole terrible affair.

"Remember, Collins," Herk said imperatively when the reporter had agreed to undertake the mission. "Mrs. Marshall knows nothing—she doesn't even know where the kid went when he left the house that night. And get this—she doesn't even know Myra Deane."

"I understand." The reporter winked knowingly.

"Explain to her," went on the secretary, "that the kid'll have to stand trial—probably be convicted—but that I'll get him off. It's his only chance."

Collins nodded and sped away, and some ten minutes later while he was extracting from Mrs. Marshall a promise that she would not utter a word that might help the police in their investigations, Frederick Herk came into the room at police headquarters where sat Bob, white-faced, tight-lipped, surrounded by half a dozen plain-clothes men, who were putting him through the

(Continued on page 25.)

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. A grand serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama. Starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

READ THIS FIRST.

While en route with his comrades to the scene of a fire, Bob Darrow, of the San Francisco Brigade, saves the life of a boy who falls in front of one of the monster engines.

Later he calls on James Madison, head of a chemical company, to whom he puts up an idea for a patent fire-extinguisher. Madison is not interested, and Bob leaves disappointed, after meeting Dan Mitchell, a shady promoter who is befriending Madison for his own ends.

That afternoon Bob rescues June Madison from a fire in her father's office, then learns that the boy he had saved from the wheels of the fire-engine was Madison's son, Jackie.

In gratitude, Madison helps Bob to perfect his invention, the Darrow Fire-Bomb.

But Dan Mitchell is anxious to sell Madison an extinguisher of his own, and to discredit Bob he scuds a hireling to "doctor" the fireman's invention with a deadly explosive.

Madison's faith in the invention remains unshaken. He lends Bob his warehouse laboratory and joins him there for an experiment, which is interrupted by Mitchell's hirelings.

A scuffle for possession of Bob's formula results in a fire. Meanwhile, June receives a mysterious warning from Trixie Farrell, a scorned sweetheart of Mitchell's, and reaches the scene with Mitchell in her car as the Brigade arrives.

Bob appears with Madison in his arms.

June rushes forward with a glad cry of thankfulness to help Bob.

But as Bob lays Madison on the sidewalk an avalanche of bricks and flaming debris hurtles down to overwhelm both men!

Now Read On.

EPISODE 6.

"THE JAWS OF DEATH."

Under the Debris.

JUNE MADISON involuntarily sprang back, and to that she probably owed her life. But she gained a vivid and horrible impression of the mass of flaming timber and masonry hurtling down on Bob Darrow.

Bob flung himself forward in a heroic effort to shield the prone form of June's father with his own body, and a moment later the thundering cataract of stone had completely overwhelmed him.

June screamed, and her shriek of despair was echoed by a horrified shout from firemen, police officers and civilians. There was an immediate rush to the spot, Battalion Chief Wilson and the stalwarts of Number Five Station being the first on the scene.

A hose truck stood by the kerb, and this had borne the brunt of the fall of masonry, the debris being piled against the vehicle. June was scrambling over the mass of wreckage when Wilson and his subordinates came up, and was tearing frenziedly at the fragments of stone with her bare hands, regardless of the smouldering pieces of timber that blistered her.

Wilson caught her about the waist and dragged her away.

"Oh, chief," she sobbed distractedly, "dad and Bob Darrow are buried under there! You've got to get them clear!"

Wilson shouted orders to his men, "Get picks and shovels!" he called. "Dig 'em out before the rest of the building caves in. Quick, boys—there's no time to lose."

The firemen sprang to obey his commands. In the space of a few seconds they were working like Trojans to throw aside the debris, and as it was dragged away a reassuring cry went up, offering June a ray of hope.

"They're under the hose truck! They've missed the bulk of it, anyway!"

A limp figure was pulled from under the battered vehicle. It was the figure of Madison, and he was borne swiftly to the other side of the street. Before the men carrying him could reach the opposite sidewalk, Bob Darrow had been rescued in the same fashion.

The two victims of the collapse were laid down on the pavement, and presently Bob opened his eyes dazedly. He was bruised and burned, but otherwise seemed to have taken no serious hurt.

"Mr. Madison!" he faltered, as he struggled into a sitting posture. "Is he all right?"

It was Battalion Chief Wilson who answered him.

"Yes, Darrow," he assured the young fireman. "He's safe, but he hasn't come round yet. Lucky for the two of you that you were under that fire truck, or you'd both have been crushed to death."

"I saw the crash coming," Bob explained, "and managed to drag him beneath the wagon. Then everything went dark. Something hit us, I suppose?"

"The back-axle snapped and took the pair of you across the head," one of his comrades on the Brigade put in. "That's what laid you out. But, say, Madison's comin' round!"

Bob turned his head, and saw that

June was holding her father in her arms.

"Dad," she said with a hysterical catch in her voice, "oh, dad, I thought you and Bob were killed! Are you badly hurt?"

Madison raised himself with a groan. "I'll soon be all right, dear," he panted. "Thanks to Bob—we got out in time. He carried me from the top floor. But my head feels as if it's splitting."

"The wall caved in," Wilson interposed. "Darrow managed to haul you over a fire truck, but you took a crack over the skull. You'll feel better after a minute or two."

"June," Bob advised, "you'd better take your father home. An experience of this kind isn't exactly a nerve tonic, you know."

June pressed his hand.

"You'd better come along with us, too," she declared. "I imagine a little rest would do your own nerves some good."

"Well, June," Bob retorted with a shaky laugh, "a fireman isn't supposed to have any nerves. And, besides, I'm needed here."

In spite of the fact that Wilson himself urged him to accept June's offer of a lift home, Bob insisted on giving his comrades a hand. So, with the help of a police officer, June supported her father and led him to the automobile in which she and Dan Mitchell had driven to the warehouse.

Mitchell was nowhere to be seen, and June did not wait to look for him, as her father seemed to be suffering severely from shock. Helping him into the car, she took the wheel and started the engine, and a moment afterwards she had turned the auto and was driving towards home.

From a side-street, into which he had darted after encountering his hireling, Spike Beldou, Mitchell saw the car flash by.

"That was June and her father," he jerked. "Well, Madison's safe—which is a good thing. I don't want anything to happen to him while I can make use of him."

"But it wouldn't worry you none if Darrow hasn't got clear, huh?" Spike mentioned with a leer.

Mitchell nodded grimly.

"It would be his hard luck," he rejoined, "and I guess I wouldn't go into mourning for him. But come on—while we're making ourselves scarce, tell me just what happened."

New Plans.

NO later than the following morning, Dan Mitchell had proof that Bob Darrow was very much alive, for, entering the drive of the Madisons' house, on the outskirts of the city, he caught sight of June and the young fireman in a leafy bower not far from the terrace.

It had been Mitchell's intention to call on Madison and express concern for the latter's ordeal of the previous night. But he changed his mind and slipped into the shrubbery of the grounds, working his way round towards the bower where he had seen Bob and June.

Gaining a vantage-point just behind the young couple, he parted the foliage of the bushes and peered at them. June was sitting with her back to him on a swing-seat with a striped awning. Bob was pacing to and fro before her.

"A penny for your thoughts," June murmured.

Bob paused in front of her. He was facing the shrubbery now, but Mitchell had quickly ducked behind the thickets and remained unseen.

"My thoughts have already cost your father entirely too much," Bob said earnestly.

"Well," June retorted with a smile, "if you'd sit down and pay some attention to me, instead of walking back and forward like a caged bear, you might change your mind about that."

Bob laughed, and settled himself beside her.

"That's better," she observed. "Now listen. When I told dad of the mysterious 'phone warning I'd received from that unknown woman, he felt convinced beyond all doubt that someone was trying to get the formula for your fire-extinguisher."

Bob nodded emphatically. "And that someone is the person who put nitro in the chemicals to ruin that first demonstration I made in the grounds here," he declared.

"Dad is of the same opinion," June told him. "And that's why he wants you to go to his mountain cabin in the Sierras without anyone knowing it. He thinks you'll be safe there from the mysterious agents who are working against you."

"Yes, he suggested the same thing to me," Bob replied. "It was his idea to have Pat Heeley go along with me, but I doubt if Pat will be able to get leave of absence from the Fire Department."

June smiled again. "Don't you worry about that," she said. "Dad usually gets what he goes after, and— Oh, here's dad now!" she exclaimed, as she saw her father approaching from the terrace. "And he looks as though he had good news."

From his place of concealment in the bushes, Dan Mitchell saw Madison walking across the grounds, and he listened attentively as June's father reached the bower and began to speak.

"Well, it's all set," Madison announced heartily. "You're to start immediately, Bob, and Pat is to go with you. Actually, he's ready to leave hospital, and he's none the worse for that crash in the motor-race. But the Fire Department is extending his sick-leave—as a special favour."

"Gee! I'm glad Pat is coming along," Bob said.

"Now didn't I tell you dad usually got what he went after?" June put in laughingly.

"You certainly did," Bob agreed. "and you sure were right."

Madison spoke again. "Well," he declared, "the sooner you make a start the better, Bob, so if you'll come into the house I'll show you how to get to the cabin at Hillsridge."

He led the way towards the terrace, and Mitchell watched them out of sight. Then, completely abandoning his intention of calling at the house, he hurried from the grounds.

In the meantime, Madison had shown Bob into his study. There he opened up a map and laid it on the table, indicating the environs of San Francisco and the route it would be necessary for Bob to take.

"You're to pick Pat up at the hospital," Madison began, as Bob leaned over his shoulder, "then you'll continue on out to the cabin. There's a work-bench there, of course, and all the apparatus you'll need. I do some experimenting there myself occasionally, when I feel like some good, clean mountain air, but can't break away entirely from business interests."

"It's mighty good of you to lend me the place, Mr. Madison," Bob said gratefully.

"Not at all," June's father rejoined.

"Now as to chemical materials, you needn't worry about them. I've already sent a load of stuff up there, so you'll find everything you require."

He fixed his attention on the map, and pointed to a thread of highway running north-east from the city.

"Very well, then," he proceeded. "Here's the road you're to take. You follow it out as far as here, then turn off through the old tunnel. It's a quick cut."

"I know it," Bob said.

"Once through the tunnel," Madison continued, "you swing sharp to your left and carry on for about a mile. After you've travelled a mile, you'll see a cabin—also on the left—with a lone tree in front of it. You can't miss it. Is that all clear to you?"

"Perfectly," Bob answered. "But I don't know how I can ever thank you enough for the trouble and expense you're putting yourself to on my account, Mr. Madison."

June's father laid a hand on his shoulder. "Young man," he retorted, "doesn't it ever occur to you that three members of the Madison family are so much in your debt that no trouble or expense could ever repay you? Jackie—June—myself—we all owe you our lives. So let's hear no more about you never being able to thank me. Here, you'd better take this map. It might be useful."

Five minutes later, Bob was climbing into the small two-seater that he ran when he was off-duty and in civvies. Saying "good-bye" to June and her father, who promised to follow him to the cabin within an hour or two, he drove off on the first stage of his journey to the mountains.

June and her father were true to their word, for immediately after Bob's departure they made preparations for the trip to the Sierras, and when lunch was over the chauffeur brought the sports car round to the front door.

"I won't need you, Sam," Madison told his employee. "June will drive." Then, as the chauffeur went off, he turned to Mrs. Madison, who had followed them out of the house.

"Now don't fret if you hear nothing from us," he said to his wife, "for I don't want anyone to know where we're going."

"I understand," Mrs. Madison rejoined. "I'll lead people to believe that I'm going to join you at Santa Barbara with Jackie."

"And mother," put in June, "I had an engagement with a girl friend—Eleanor Standish. Will you 'phone her and tell her I can't meet her Thursday?"

"I will, my dear," Mrs. Madison assured her. "Good-bye, and take care of yourselves, the two of you."

June settled herself behind the wheel, and, her father beside her, drove through the gates on to the road.

Dan Mitchell's Move.

SHORTLY after Bob Darrow had been directed to the cabin by Madison, Dan Mitchell held a conference with two of his hirelings—Spike Beldou and another back-street thug known as Silk Connolly.

Mitchell was also poring over a map of San Francisco and its environs, and, with Spike and Connolly standing at his side, he traced with a pencil that same route which Madison had outlined to Bob.

"Now you can't go wrong, Spike," he stated. "You follow the mountain road till you pass through the tunnel. Madison's place is just a short distance beyond."

Spike frowned. "Yeah," he muttered. "I ain't worryin' any about findin' the place. But if this bird Pat Heeley is half as tough as Darrow, we ain't gonna have no picnic gettin' that formula."

Mitchell straightened up and glanced at him with contempt.

"Aw, getting cold feet, are you?" he sneered. "Afraid of a guy that's just come out of the hospital. For that's where Heeley's been this last two weeks."

"Say, listen, boss," put in Connolly. "Spike's all right. But Darrow is plenty hard. You ain't never been up against a guy like him."

"All right," snapped Mitchell. "Then take the gang with you if you're afraid to go alone. But I want that formula! Understand?"

Spike stood up. "Sure, Mitch', an' we'll get it for yuh," he answered resolutely. "We'll get Butch and Merlin, an' the four of us'll wipe out those two firemen afore we're through."

Spike and Connolly left the office and entered a roadster parked in the street outside. At a low den near the docks they picked up Butch and Merlin, who had figured in the scuffle at the warehouse when the first and unsuccessful attempt had been made to secure Bob's formula.

Butch and Merlin piled in, and Connolly drove through town and made for the mountain road. Three or four hours later they were in the heart of the Sierras, and, following a trail cut into the side of one of the great, wooded hills, they entered the old tunnel which both Madison and Mitchell had mentioned.

A gang of labourers were working on the tunnel, but, after some slight delay entailed by the operations, Spike and his associates drove on, and a mile beyond they sighted the Madison cabin lying to the left of the road.

They pulled up in the shelter of some thickets, and climbed from the car. From where they stood they were able to see a two-seater outside the cabin, which nestled in a kind of hollow, and it at once became apparent that Bob and Pat Heeley had only arrived a few minutes before, for the two firemen were busy unloading some luggage from the back of the auto.

"You fellers stay right here," said Spike to his companions. "I'll go down into the hollow and get the low-down on that outfit."

He worked his way through the brush, and, still under cover, paused within a stone's throw of the cabin. In the silence he heard the voices of Bob and Pat quite distinctly.

"Sure and 'tis a foine place ye have here for yer job," Pat was saying in his rich Irish brogue. "It's so quiet ye can hear yersilf think."

Bob laughed. "Well, that's just the way we want it, Pat," he declared. "We'll be able to work much better, and there won't be anyone coming around—disturbing us. It sure is a great spot." And he looked round appreciatively at the dense forests and thickets of brushwood that closed in about the cabin on three sides.

The two firemen passed into the dwelling, and Spike Beldon stole nearer and took up his position at a window from which he commanded a view of the cabin's back room.

Bob and Pat had entered that room. It was fitted up as a laboratory, and, keen to begin work, Bob prepared the necessary apparatus and proceeded to mix the chemicals of his fire-extinguishing invention.

"I'll have a vial ready in no time," Spike heard Bob say, "and then I'll give you a demonstration, Pat."

"Gee, I'm bustin' to see it," the Irishman assured his colleague.

"You'll see it just as soon as I get these ingredients mixed in their correct proportions," Bob continued, poring over a scrap of paper on which Spike Beldon's eyes fastened eagerly.

Pat picked up the document curiously. "An' this is the formula for your chemical foire-extinguisher, is it?" he inquired. "A little scrap of paper that's worth a million dollars, hegorra! But who the blazes can read it?" he added, staring at the script, which was utterly meaningless to him.

"I can, Pat," Bob answered, juggling with a retort.

Spike Beldon had heard and seen enough. Drawing back from the window, he slipped into the brush and forced his way back to the spot where he had left his companions.

The gangsters looked at him questioningly as he appeared.

"What's the word, Spike?" asked Connolly.

"Darrow's at work in the cabin," Spike said. "Heeley's with him. Darrow aims to make up a vial and give a demonstration with the extinguisher on the spot, to satisfy himself it's the goods. An' he has the formula with him."

"Are there only the two of them?" put in Merlin.

Spike nodded. "Just the two—Heeley and Darrow," he rejoined. "Now listen, I've got a plan to fool 'em an' get what we're after. I want you an' Butch to go ahead, Connolly. Darrow an' Heeley will think you're alone. Merlin an' I will wait long enough for you to tackle 'em, and while you're keepin' 'em busy we'll slip in an' finish the job."

"You want Butch an' me to go down there an' lay into 'em," said Connolly. "Is that it?"

"Sure," Spike told him. "They won't suspect nothin' at first, so walk right up to the cabin friendly-like. That oughta fool 'em plenty, an' when you start rough-housin' 'em they'll be taken by surprise."

The limp figures of Madison and Bob Darrow were pulled from under the battered vehicle.

"I get you; but don't wait too long before you show up with Merlin," Connolly muttered anxiously. "Those two guys might be a handful for us." "We won't be too long," Spike answered testily. "Go on—get busy."

Connolly started for the cabin, jerking his head to Butch to indicate that he should follow. They did not advance by the same route that Spike had taken when he had reconnoitred the hollow, but marched boldly towards their objective, and they were about seventy-five yards from it when Butch suddenly checked.

"Say, Silk," he exclaimed, "it ain't occurred to Spike that I was mixed up in that shindy at the warehouse. Darrow might recognise me if he sees me a-comin', I guess. Let's hit the brush and work round under cover, the way Spike did just now."

"You're right, Butch," Connolly agreed, and they plunged into the thickets.

Meanwhile, standing at the bench in the cabin laboratory, Bob finished work on the sample he was making and poured the liquid into a small vial.

"Sure, an' it looks pretty enough to drink," Pat commented, as he admired the colour of the liquid.

"Yes, but this is not intended for a thirst," Bob replied. "Now we'll go outside and start a good, snappy fire and put it out instantly with just this amount of extinguisher. You know, back at the station the chief laughed at the idea of putting out a blaze with a chemical of this kind," he added, pocketing his formula.

Pat grinned. "I'd laugh at the chief," he observed, "but I wouldn't let him hear me."

They walked out of the cabin, and were immediately seen from the brush by Connolly and Butch, who hesitated a moment and then advanced with extreme caution.

Ignorant of the danger that was closing in on them, Bob and Pat picked upon a dead tree that had been blasted by lightning, and, gathering masses of brushwood, they piled it against the trunk. When he was satisfied with the dimensions of the beacon, Bob set a match to the fuel.

The dry brushwood blazed up almost at once, and Bob drew back. With Pat at his side, he watched the fire from a distance of twenty paces, and in as many seconds lurid tongues of flame were coiling up the dead tree-trunk to a height of fifteen feet.

"Pat," Bob announced, "I'm certainly enthusiastic about this experiment. I know it's going to work."

Pat had become the picture of anxiety, for it seemed to him that the bonfire was assuming a perilous degree of intensity.

"You'd better throw the thing," he urged. "You're goin' to burn the whole place up. Supposin' the woods catch fire!"

"Now don't get scared, Pat," Bob laughed. "I'm going to put out that blaze quicker than a cataract of water. Here goes!"

With the words he hurled the tiny vial at the base of the tree-trunk. There was an explosion that caused Pat to leap away in alarm, and a dense cloud of gas enveloped the bonfire. When the fumes cleared an instant later there was not even a glowing ember to be seen amid the pile of brushwood, and, what was equally remarkable, the explosion had not displaced a single twig.

Pat ran forward in amazement, and October 10th, 1931.

when Bob joined him at the tree-trunk the Irishman was reaching out gingerly to touch the dry vegetation that had been burning so furiously a moment previously.

"It's cold!" he exclaimed. "Bob, your fortune's made!"

"It sure is, Pat," Bob rejoined. "Just imagine what that extinguisher will do to a big fire. Just imagine what—"

He never completed the sentence, for at that instant Butch and Connolly leapt from the brush and pounced on the two firemen.

Connolly assailed Bob, and speedily had cause to regret his choice, for, though taken by surprise, the fireman-inventor soon recovered himself, and with lunched knuckles he proceeded to batter the crook relentlessly.

Butch had met with more success in the initial stages of attack. He was a thick-set, powerful ruffian, and he had hurled himself at Pat Heeley's back and felled him with a terrific blow to the neck.

Pat was flung to the ground, and Butch dropped a-top of him and struck at him savagely as he lay there. But though he had come straight out of hospital, and though he had been half-stunned by that first cowardly punch, the Irishman managed to pull himself together.

Twisting round, he threw Butch off and then scrambled to his feet. The crook was up with him, and they hit out at each other fiercely, Pat bellowing imprecations in his Irish brogue as he did so.

It gradually dawned on the sturdy Butch that he had met his match in Pat, and was taking a lot of punishment. That some impression had long since been made on Connolly by Bob Darrow, and both gangsters began to wish heartily that Spike and Merlin would show up.

The Blast.

THE foreman in charge of one of the shifts working on the mountain-road tunnel made his way to the superintendent.

OUR GRAND NEW ANNUAL.

Don't forget to get a copy of this wonderful new Annual. It is packed with thrilling film stories, pictorial articles and coloured plates.

Price 6/- net, at all Newsagents.

"We've struck solid rock, boss," he said, "and we'll have to blast it out. I've got the men drilling now."

"That means the tunnel will be closed for a while, huh?" the superintendent observed. "All right, I'll tell you what to do. Send a man round to the far end of the tunnel to turn all cars on to the other road."

His instructions were obeyed, and a flagman was despatched to the north-eastern end of the tunnel, the end farthest from San Francisco. Shortly afterwards June Madison and her father appeared in their sports car, but as they were coming from the direction of the city, and as it was too late to turn them on to the loop road, the superintendent let them through. The drilling had not been completed, anyhow, so there was as yet no danger.

"We're widening the tunnel at the other end," he explained to the Madisons after waving them down. "The men are working inside, so kindly drive with care."

June switched on her headlamps and took no risks. The tunnel extended for a distance of over a hundred yards, and only when she was clear of it did she turn out the lights and accelerate to a speed of more than ten miles an hour.

The Madisons were hardly through the tunnel when drilling ceased and the workmen trooped back to the end where the superintendent was standing. A detonating plunger was then made ready to explode the blast that had been laid, but the first attempt failed to produce any effect.

"Something wrong," muttered the man operating the plunger, and, after examining it, he tried it again with the same result.

"Say, get some fuse!" ordered the superintendent impatiently. "We can't wait for that plunger with the dynamite all set. And make sure that flagman's at the other end to stop all traffic."

Speeding along the left fork of the mountain road, the Madisons knew nothing of the details connected with the work on the tunnel. They certainly never imagined that the activities which were in progress there were yet to become bound up in their own interests.

When they were still less than a mile beyond the tunnel they caught a glimpse of the cabin through a break in the thickets, and at the spectacle which met her eyes June pulled up sharply.

"Dad," she gasped, "look down there in the hollow! Bob and Pat fighting with two men!"

She swung off the road and drove straight for the cabin. Approaching it on foot from another angle, Spike Beldon and Merlin saw the sports car coming, and they involuntarily ducked down.

June drew the auto to a standstill close to the scene of the scuffle, which was now almost at an end. For since Spike and Merlin had not come to their assistance, Connolly and Butch had been thoroughly overwhelmed.

Bob and Pat had turned them into a couple of punching-bags, but as June and her father appeared they seized the battered ruffians and shook them as terriers might have shaken a pair of rats.

"What's the trouble, Bob?" asked Madison, descending from the sports car.

"Why, these fellows took us by surprise," Bob explained. "I guess we'll run them down to the sheriff's office and make them tell who is back of it all."

(Continued on page 26.)

"UP FOR MURDER."

(Continued from page 20.)

third degree in an effort to discover why he had committed the crime.

But Bob would not speak. He had given himself up when he had learned that William Winter was dead, and was prepared to pay the penalty, but nothing, not even the cruel questioning of the police, would induce him to drag Myra, the girl he worshipped, into the wretched affair.

"Morning, Maloney." Herk greeted the chief detective with a nod of the head, then sat down in the chair Maloney indicated, and jerked a thumb towards the drooping figure of Bob. "What does he say, eh?"

Maloney grunted in disgust. "Nix. We can't get nothin' out of him except that he killed Winter."

Herk experienced a thrill of satisfaction. If the youngster persisted in that attitude all would be well.

"May I try him, Maloney? He may spill the beans for me." As the detective nodded Herk turned to the boy, who looked at the secretary with defiant eyes. "Marshall, come now, tell me why you killed poor Mr. Winter?"

"I killed him," Bob answered deliberately, "and that's all there is to it!"

Herk could almost have cried with delight at this proof of Bob's determination not to divulge the true facts of the case. Obvious to the secretary it was Myra the boy was thinking of, and that being so he would almost certainly not deny that Winter met his death in the office where his body was found by the police. Best to make sure, though.

"Won't speak, eh?" he said. "Only that you killed him in his office. That it?"

"Yes." Bob looked at Herk curiously, saw the suspicion of a wink, and was glad he had not hesitated in his answer. They were trying to hush up the matter—to save the good names of the newspaper and Myra from being dragged in the dust. Somehow Winter's body must have been smuggled to the office—and at the thought Bob's heart sang in his breast. Now he didn't care a jot what happened to him.

"And is that all you're going to say, kid?" As Bob vigorously nodded his head Detective Maloney turned to Herk with a grim smile playing about the corners of his hard mouth. "There's more behind this affair than meets the eye, Herk. Still, we've got enough on the boy to convict him. At the trial your evidence alone will be sufficient to send him to the chair."

The secretary smiled inwardly as he rose to take his departure. Everything was turning out as he had hoped it would. Myra—the newspaper—both were saved from an everlasting disgrace. It now remained for him to work all he knew to save young Marshall from the inevitable sentence.

At the Eleventh Hour.

THE trial had been short and brief. From the first it was obvious to all that Robert Marshall had deliberately and brutally murdered William Winter, the eminent newspaper proprietor. Herk's evidence was enough to condemn any man, and then, when counsel for the defence cross-examined the prisoner, all he would say was that he had killed the dead man. The jury was unanimous. They found Bob guilty without even retiring to debate among themselves. Sentence was therefore pronounced, and the boy was taken from the court under armed escort and placed in the condemned cell.

A week passed, but try as he would Herk had been unable to find a way to get the sentence repealed. And Bob's time was drawing near!

A distracted mother tried all she knew to coax her son to speak—to say such words that would at least obtain him a lighter sentence, but he was adamant. He had killed William Winter—that was all he would say. Bravely he awaited his fate, though he looked haggard and a wreck of his former athletic self. Myra, the girl he loved, shouldn't suffer because he feared to die.

But there was another who was well nigh on the verge of collapse as the time drew nigh for the boy to pay the supreme penalty. Myra Deane, who tossed restlessly in her bed at nights, unable to sleep for thinking of his terrible plight, who, during the daytime, went about listlessly, doing no work whatsoever, Bob for ever in her mind. She knew now that she loved the youngster as she could love no other, and writhed that Herk could not find a way to save him.

She could save Bob, of course, but only at the price of besmirching her name!

It was as she was bitterly reflecting thus as she sat in her apartment, smoking and drinking to excess in an effort to soothe her jangled nerves, that Mrs. Marshall was announced. Almost she could have screamed when her maid spoke the mother's name. Obviously Mrs. Marshall suspected something of what had occurred, and had come to threaten her. She would not see the woman. But Mrs. Marshall refused to go, and at last Myra was compelled to allow her to come in.

"Miss Deane." The mother, her face lined with deep sorrow, looked appealingly at the nervous girl as she reached hurriedly for a cigarette and applied a match to it with a hand that trembled. "My poor boy. You know all about him. He's there in that terrible place, his hours numbered, and—"

"Oh, don't—please don't!" Myra dropped her cigarette into an ashtray, the tears rushing to her eyes. "Oh, they told me he'd get off. They promised me he'd get off. His youth—"

"I thought that, too," Mrs. Marshall interrupted in a trembling voice. "But he's so stubborn. I can't do a thing with him. Why, he won't say a word to help us get it changed into a life term. But you—I'm sure that you—"

"V-s, yes!" The tears were trickling freely down Myra's ash white face now. Impulsively she flung an arm about the distraught mother's shoulders—gently squeezed her arm. In that poignant moment a great determination surged into Myra's heart. Bob must not die—she loved him, the mother loved him, and no matter what they said about her she would tell the truth. "Mrs. Marshall, please go—go! Bob will not die! I—I swear to you he will not die!"

Something in the girl's voice, in those eyes swimming with tears, reassured Mrs. Marshall, brought a great happiness surging into her aching heart. A warm pressure of the girl's hand, and she went slowly from the room, knowing that her visit had not been in vain.

Next morning the most sensational story ever printed by a newspaper appeared in "The World." It was written by Myra Deane, who stated simply and plainly the true facts concerning William Winter's death, and every word of it she afterwards repeated to the Chief of Police.

Obvious now that the newspaper proprietor had met his death during a quarrel, and, in consequence, Bob's sentence was instantly quashed. Some wanted to hold him on a charge of manslaughter, but it was put down in the records of the case that William Winter was "killed in self-defence."

Bob was vindicated—free!

Strangely enough, it was Bob's birthday that day he was released from prison, and Mrs. Marshall spared nothing to celebrate her boy's homecoming. A wonderful spread and a birthday cake, but as the two sat down to the meal a knock came at the door.

The caller was Charlie Collins, and as Bob opened the door to him he staggered drunkenly into the little parlour, almost dropping a small brown-paper package that he carried in his hand.

"Ah, ah, your birthday I see, kid." He grinned inanely as he held out the parcel to Bob. "Here, take it, old son! My birthday present to you!"

Mystified, Bob took the package, and, with his mother watching curiously, he pulled off the string, tore aside the brown-paper covering, revealing a small oblong jewel-case. He recognised the case at once, and, with a pang at his heart, he opened it, with fingers that trembled. Inside was the bracelet he had given Myra, together with a slip of paper, on which a message had been scrawled.

"If this is no longer mine, remember me by it," ran the words. "If I'm still worthy of it, give it to me again."

"MYRA."

Bob let out a great cry of joy. Eyes positively dancing, he quickly stuffed the bracelet in his pocket and snatched at his hat.

"She's waiting for you," grinned Collins, wise to the whole affair.

With another glad cry, Bob slapped the reporter heartily on the back, then turned to Mrs. Marshall, who had read the missive over her son's shoulder.

"Excuse me, mother!" he cried ecstatically. "But I've got a date—with the most wonderful girl in all the world. Be back in a little while."

And before his mother could utter a single word, Bob had dashed from the room as if pursued by a thousand demons.

(By permission of Universal Pictures Ltd., starring Lew Ayres and Genevieve Tobin.)

RILEY'S HOME BILLIARDS

13'3 DOWN

32 Free Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
Howard Works, ACCRINGTON,
and Department 35, 147, Aldersgate Street, LONDON, E.C.1.

All the family will find endless pleasure during leisure hours with a Riley "Home" Billiard Table. The 6 ft. size is delivered to you immediately on first payment of 13 3d. Balance monthly. Cash price £11 15s. 0d. Rileys pay carriage and take transit risks. 7 days' Free Trial allowed. Send to-day for Free Art List giving full details of Riley "Home" Billiard Tables and "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables, in all sizes, for cash or easy terms.

Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Great Britain.

October 10th, 1931.

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

(Continued from page 24.)

Spike Beldon moved forward at that moment, and, hurrying ahead of Merlin, pulled an automatic from his hip-pocket and scrambled down the slope of a long ridge. Pausing when he was seventy or eighty paces from the group near the cabin, he levelled the pistol and sent a bullet among them.

The smash of the shot split the silence startlingly. It was followed by another and another, and leaden slugs began to fly amongst the party in the hollow.

They crouched down, but were still in peril—particularly Bob and Pat, as their captives started to struggle violently in their grasp. Then Madison called out.

"Into the sports car—quickly!" he jerked. "Let's get away from here."

It was the wisest course, for they were completely at the mercy of the armed man on the ridge. So the two firemen abandoned their prisoners, though not before they had laid them out with a couple of well-timed jolts, and scrambled into the spare compartment at the back of the automobile, while Madison took his place beside June again.

The car swung round and headed for the road, whereupon Spike turned and raced back to the auto by which he and his associates had arrived. Merlin followed his example, and it was he who took the wheel.

"Pick up those two down at the cabin!" Spike jerked.

Merlin drove the tourer down into the hollow, where Butch and Connolly were roused. They clambered on to the running-board as the car swept forward in pursuit of the Madisons' two-seater, and by the time the road was reached they had dragged themselves into the back of the auto.

The Madisons' sports car was a hundred-and-fifty yards in front, and was speeding back in the direction of the tunnel. With her foot crammed on the accelerator, June watched the needle pass the fifty-five mark.

Spike opened fire again, and the fugitives crouched down as the bullets whined past their heads. Then Madison pulled something from his pocket and pushed it towards the back seat, which Bob and Pat occupied. It was a revolver that he had brought with him as a precaution.

"Here," he panted, "take this! Hit their tyres if you can!"

Pat seized the weapon, and, twisting round, tried to take aim. He pulled the trigger, and the gun kicked spitefully, the shot missing the tyres completely but ricocheting off one of the wings and grazing Spike Beldon's cheek.

The surface of the road was none too smooth, and straight shooting was impossible. But the fact that the fugitives possessed a gun had a pronounced effect on Beldon and his companions. They had been gaining appreciations on the Madisons' car, but now they kept their distance.

Some way ahead, in the gloom of the tunnel, a labourer was setting a match to a fuse that had been connected with the charge of dynamite. The quartette in the sports car knew nothing of this, however, and June continued to drive at high speed.

Spike Beldon was still blazing at the fugitives with the automatic, and Pat

Heeley was still firing at the touring-car's tyres. The reports punctuated the drone of the engines, the crashes of the revolver vibrating in the ears of the Irishman and his friends, the stabbing retort of Beldon's "gat" sounding like a vicious echo.

The sports car swung round a sharp bend and came in full view of the tunnel-mouth. The flagman stationed there immediately ran forward, waving the danger-signal imperatively.

"Stop that car!" he shouted. June kept her foot on the accelerator. She could not have pulled up even had she wanted to, and with a band of desperate men in full pursuit she had no intention of braking.

The flagman suddenly became frantic as he realised that the girl was coming on in spite of his command to halt.

"Hold that car!" he yelled. "Hold that car, will yuh?"

He sprang aside as the sports car bore down on him. It missed him by inches, and, blanching, he screamed a warning at its occupants.

"Don't go in that tunnel! They're goin' to blast!"

But June did not hear. Certainly she eased up a little, on account of the black darkness before her. But, switching on the lights, she drove into the cavernous mouth—drove into the jaws of death, had she but known it.

The tourer containing Mitchell's hirelings skidded round the bend that June had taken a moment previously. The flagman stationed near the tunnel mouth caught sight of it, and, determined to spare its occupants the fate that must overwhelm the quartette in the sports car, he jumped into the automobile's path.

"Ston!" he bellowed. "They're gonna blast! Take the loop road!"

Merlin paid as much heed to him as June had done, and again the flagman was compelled to leap for safety, but this time he was a second too late.

The running-board of the tourer caught his leg and bowled him over. He was flung down by the roadside and lay still. But he had at least achieved his purpose, for the tourer swerved wildly and rooked across the road towards a tall embankment.

Merlin crammed on the brakes, but it was with a certain amount of violence that the tourer thudded into the steep slope. The crooks were badly rattled by the shock, though the car itself sustained no damage beyond a burst tyre.

Meanwhile, the Madisons' auto was forging through the gloom of the tunnel. The wedge of brilliant light from the powerful headlamps danced spasmodically as the auto bumped over the broken ground, and suddenly the beam picked out a moving spark of fire.

It was the fatal spark that was eating its way along the fuse to the charge of dynamite!

The spark reached the explosive. There was a blinding flash of flame and a deafening roar. A shock of air met the car and stopped it, and from June's lips there came a scream that mingled shrilly with the reverberating echoes of the blast.

Then, with a sound like a thunder-clap, a section of the tunnel caved in. Shattered timbers and masses of rock rained down as walls and roof collapsed, and the car and its occupants were buried under a cataract of debris!

(Don't miss next week's enthralling episode. By permission of the Universal Pictures Ltd., starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.)

"EVERYTHING'S ROSIE."

(Continued from page 12.)

"It's all right, honey," soothed Doc—"it's all right. It's just a joke."

"You think so?" thundered the sheriff. "Well, you tell it to the judge and see if he laughs. Take him along, Sam!"

The deputy grabbed Doc by the arm and tried to drag him to the stairs, but Rosie lunged.

"Don't worry, honey," urged Doc. "I'll be right back in ten minutes. You wait here."

"She will not!" cried the sheriff. "Get your things, young lady—you're coming with me."

"Where are you taking her?" shouted Doc indignantly. "Surely you don't think she had anything to do with it? Why, she's only a child."

"That's just it," was the immediate retort. "She's under age, she's not your daughter, and you're not fit to take care of her. I'm going to put her in the orphanage where she belongs. Take him away."

"Onta orrywa," said Doc cheerfully to Rosie. "I'll be ackba."

"What are you saying to her?" demanded the sheriff.

"Just sayin' good-bye in Chinese," Doc replied. And while the sheriff held Rosie, the deputy marched him off down the stairs and away to the little town gaol, where he was shut in a barred cell with a singularly stupid-looking man in uniform outside it for laeler.

Doc, who was still in his dress clothes and top hat, sat down on a hard bunk and thought.

Half an hour passed, and the guard looked in through the door of iron bars to find that the prisoner was playing on the bunk with three halves of walnut shells and a pea, and talking to himself in this wise:

"Now, you see, Doc, it isn't under there, and it isn't under there. So it's got to be under there. Isn't that right, Dee? Yeah, sure that's right—if you say so. But I still don't understand."

"Ho, what are you doing there?" exclaimed the guard, in astonishment.

"Oh, hullo, hullo!" greeted Doc cheerfully. "You know, I was just hoping you'd come around."

"Who were you talking to?"

"Just having a little chat with the three musketeers."

"Three musketeers! Who are they?"

"Come on in, and I'll introduce you."

But the guard shook his head.

"Nop," he growled. "Us guards ain't allowed to fraternise with the prisoners."

"Well, there's no harm in just coming in here and locking them over," suggested Doc.

The guard was tempted and the guard fell. He unlocked the door of the cell and approached the bunk. Doc manipulated the shells and explained the game.

"I bet a guy could lose his shirt on a stunt like that," said the guard.

"I hope so," cooed Doc. "I mean—that's impossible! You see, the eye is much quicker than the hand. Let's try it! Now the pea goes under the little shell, so—so—so—"

In less than five minutes the guard was doing his best to win money. In less than an hour a uniformed man, whose clothes fitted him none too well, presented himself at the orphanage, demanded to see the matron, and, on being ushered into that dame's presence, explained that a mistake had been made, and that the sheriff desired a certain Miss Rosie Droop to be taken immediately to his office.

Rosie was produced, and, apart from a slight start, did not betray her rescuer.

"Please tell the sheriff," said the matron, "that we are always glad to co-operate with him in every possible way. Good-night, child!"

Together Doc, in his borrowed plumes, and Rosie in her printed silk frock descended the broad steps of the building to the street. Round a convenient corner stood the van, with scraggy Evelyn between the shafts. Doc had thought of everything.

He helped Rosie up into the front seat, and mounting hastily beside her, picked up the reins and a whip.

"Gee, Doc," exclaimed Rosie in wonderment, "how did you manage it?"

"The three musketeers, honey—the three musketeers," chuckled Doc, flourishing the whip. "Come on, Evelyn—do your stuff!"

The van swept noisily along the narrow street. The law-abiding inhabitants of Arcadia were in bed, it seemed, and the thoroughfares deserted.

In a country lane just outside the town Evelyn was given a rest, while Doc divested into the van and divested himself of the guard's uniform, which he tossed into the roadway.

Once more in the evening clothes over which he had worn the denuded guard's apparel, he whipped Evelyn into fresh activity and lit a cigar.

"Can't you go faster, Doc—faster?" asked Rosie nervously.

"We're doing the best we can, kitten," said Doc, tugging at the reins. "Gosh, if only Evelyn had a free wheel we could coast down this hill!"

The lane stretched steeply downwards, a wooded bank on one side, a deep ravine on the other. But since Evelyn was not fitted with a free wheel, Doc had to apply the brakes.

Two hours afterwards, in the faint light of dawn, a tunnel loomed up ahead—a tunnel, carrying the roadway beneath an aqueduct. At the same moment the shrill honk-honk of a motor-horn sounded behind them.

Rosie looked back round the side of the van.

"Doc," she cried in terror, "there's a car coming. It must be the sheriff!"

"Don't worry, honey—don't worry!" soothed Doc. "When we get through that tunnel we'll be across the county line, and we'll do that in five minutes if Evelyn doesn't blow out a tyre!"

The tunnel was reached just before the pursuing car, and the van plunged into pitch darkness. Doc, wily fellow, guided Evelyn to the left till the hubs of the wheels grazed the wall on that side, and then stopped. The car shot past the stationary vehicle towards the point of light that marked the other end of the tunnel, and after it had disappeared Doc drove slowly out into the daylight and a pleasant landscape.

"We've fooled 'em, honey—we've fooled 'em!" he cried triumphantly.

A spot was reached where the road divided. Doc waved his whip in the direction of an ill-made lane that branched left.

"That's a short cut to Weston," he said. "We'll take it, because a car would leave it."

Evelyn was directed into the lane, but the van had proceeded no more than a mile along it when again the honk-honk of a motor-horn was heard, this time close behind them. Rosie looked back and saw that the driver of the car was waving frantically.

"It—it's Billy!" she cried excitedly. "Billy?" echoed Doc. "Then we'll stop."

He brought Evelyn to a standstill, and the car came on and stopped beside the van. But though Billy was at the wheel of the car, Sheriff Hopkins was beside him.

"Rosie!" cried Billy rapturously, jumping up beside her and taking her in his arms.

But Doc, with a grimace, held out his wrists.

"Okay, sheriff," he said ruefully.

"We'll go quietly."

But the sheriff, laughing quite pleasantly, said:

"We don't want you, Droop; it's all a mistake."

"Yes," chimed in Billy, "it has all been a mistake. It was those two men who worked for you who robbed the store. They've been caught, and they've confessed."

"Two fellows named Quinn and Willis," said the sheriff.

Doc relit his cigar and puffed thoughtfully at it. Rosie laid her face against Billy's shoulder.

"Well, son," said Doc gratefully, "it's mighty nice of you to have gone to all this trouble for us."

"Doc," said Billy solemnly, "I'm in love with Rosie."

"Ah," mused Doc, "at last I think I understand! She loves you, too, eh? Yes, she does! I do understand. Well, what happens when two people love each other?"

"What do you say, Rosie?" asked Billy eagerly.

"She says 'Yes,' of course," decided Doc, his eyes regarding all that he could see of a very flushed face. "We need a good lawyer in the family, anyway."

"Look!" said Billy, producing a ring from his pocket. "Mother sent you this. We'll be married right away, won't we?"

Doc reached over and took the ring. He examined it, approved of it, and held it aloft.

"Folks," he cried in his best fair-ground manner, "what am I offered for this beautiful little ring?"

Rosie sat up and smiled happily at him. Billy grinned, and the sheriff looked over his shoulder at the trio.

"Sold!" boomed Doc, and, taking Rosie's left hand in his, slipped the ring on her engagement finger. "Sold to little Rosie for one good-bye kiss!"

"Good-bye?" she exclaimed blankly. "But, Doc, aren't you coming to my wedding?"

"No," he said slowly. "No, I don't think I'd better do it. I might be tempted to get the three musketeers out, and then floozy would go the whole works! Besides," he went on with affected gaiety, "you know I'm buying a big three-ring circus next week. I'm going to be awfully busy—awfully busy. But I'll always be around, somewhere close, you know, in case you need me."

"I love you, Doc!" cried Rosie, flinging her arms round his neck.

"Well," said Doc, with emotion he tried to conceal, "I don't exactly hate you."

"Doc," faltered Rosie, "you—you're crying!"

"Who's crying?" He removed her arms from his neck, and, pushing up his spectacles, rubbed his eyes. "Can't a man get a cinder in his eyes if he wants to?" he growled. "Get right out of here! Go on—got right out of here!"

He gave her a little push, and Billy immediately sprang to the ground and lifted her down beside him.

"Be good to her, son."

Billy nodded emphatically, and Doc reached into the van and brought out the dilapidated doll, which he perched on the seat beside him.

"Everything's still rosy with me," he said, picking up the reins. "Come on, Evelyn, let's move! Come on, Evelyn!"

But Evelyn refused to budge. She looked round at Rosie, who was in Billy's arms again, but was gazing wistfully at the man who had been a father to her for so many years. The sheriff, with his hands on his hips, took a step forward.

"Evelyn," said Doc, flicking the mare with the whip, "the sheriff's coming!"

Evelyn immediately bolted.

(By permission of Radio Pictures, Ltd., featuring Robert Woolsey, John Darrow, and Anita Louise.)

GRAND FILM NOVELS YOU SHOULD NOT MISS!

"WHY CHANGE YOUR HUSBAND?"

The riotous comedy of a girl who has made such a habit of getting married and divorced that complications set in of a fast and furious nature—and almost too funny for words. Starring the inimitable Winnie Lightner, supported by Olsen and Johnson as two of her forsaken husbands.

"LOVER COME BACK."

An innocent baby face lured him away from a girl of strong character. But when he married "the baby" she turned out to be worse than any vamp. Starring Jack Mulhall, Constance Cummings, Jameson Thomas, and Betty Bronson.

ALSO

The third episode of the splendid story of the sawdust ring. Starring Francis X. Bushman, Jr., and Alberta Vaughn.—"THE SPELL OF THE CIRCUS."

Don't miss these grand film novels in this week's issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

On Sale Wednesday.

Price 2d.
October 10th, 1931.

(Continued from page 2.)

heard a 'hot dog' vendor selling his wares on our property—well, that was the limit."

Robert Montgomery was having lunch one day in a Hollywood restaurant with his friend, Reginald Denny. A big, husky man in tweeds came up and, though a perfect stranger, said: "Say, Bob" (these people with "nerve" always address the stars by their first names), "what tho dickens are you eating? My folks can't see from where they're sitting."

James Cruze, the director, who has a sense of humour, gave a young couple a free meal one night because their colossal nerve tickled his funny-bone. They arrived, unasked, at his home, and coolly said they had come for dinner, as they had bet their friends that Cruze would feed them. But now they are sadder and wiser. For after dinner, Cruze took them into his library and made them sit for an hour while he sternly read out pages of stuff from a book on etiquette.

Wallace Beery, as everyone knows, is an enthusiastic aviator. Once when he was in San Francisco, the papers gave out the exact time he was to depart for Los Angeles. Fourteen people were clustered about his six-passenger plane when he arrived, and all fourteen were certain that he would give them a free ride. But Wallace, though always good-natured, had already made other arrangements, and there was "nothing doing."

Chariot Race in "Ben-Hur."

Now that "Ben-Hur" with sound is still showing at several cinemas interest has again been aroused in the filming of the chariot race.

Some 20,000 extras, besides a large army of Greco-Romans, were engaged for this particular scene, which was the most difficult task the director, Fred Nibo, had to face during the whole production. It is easy to imagine the risks that were present with forty-eight horses galloping round the course in the mad seven laps of the great chariot race, and with a hundred and fifty other horses also being used.

The director worked most of the time from a tower, 100 ft. high, his orders being delivered through loud-speakers to every part of the arena and auditorium. Forty-two cameramen were at work, and an aeroplane flew overhead so that "shots" could be taken from above of the enormous crowd.

No sooner had the buglers sounded the final signal than the huge tapestries were flung back and out dashed twelve chariot teams with drivers in gay colours. The sixth lap was the most exciting. Micky Millerick, a famous horseman, driving the Byzantine team of roans, caught the inner rail at the south turn and just behind the Roman team. In the awful crash that followed real shrieks came from the watching crowd, for it seemed certain to those present that someone must be injured, perhaps fatally. But by a miracle no one was killed.

'Cinema Attendant's Invention.

Though seventeen-year-old Francis Bowling works as an attendant in a cinema in Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, his mind has been occupied with something else beside pictures. For two years he was busy with a helicopter aeroplane of a new type, which he has just patented. The wings are attached to the motor in the new ship, and may be driven up and down like the side wheels of an old steamboat. He took up work in a cinema theatre for the purpose of obtaining enough money to carry on with his invention.

DON'T FORGET YOUR
"BOY'S CINEMA" ANNUAL.

Answers to Questions.

Wally Wales has appeared in the following films, John (Aberdeen): "The Meddling Stranger," "White Pebbles," "The Soda Water Cowboy," "The Desert of the Lost," "Desperate Courage," "Saddle Mates," and a new one, "Red Fork Range." Geno Corrado was born in Florence, Italy. His American films include: "Women's Wares," "The Devil's Skipper," "Prowlers of the Sea," and "The House of Scandals."

Here is the cast of "Four Feathers," L. R. (London, E.): Richard Arlen (Harry Foversham), Fay Wray (Ethne Eustace), Clive Brook (Capt. Durance), William Powell (Lieut. Trench), Theodore von Eltz (Lieut. Castleton), Noah Beery (Slave Trader), Noble Johnson (Ahmed), Harold Hightower (Ali), Phillippe de Lacy (Harry, aged 10), George Fawcett (General Faversham). Norma Shearer was born in Montreal, Canada, on August 10th, 1904; and Richard Barthelmess was born in New York City on May 9th, 1895.

Yes, it was Dorothy Jordan who played opposite Ramon Novarro in "Devil May Care," James (Dalmington). She was at one time in the chorus, and later rose to principal roles in musical comedies. She was born in Clarkesville, Tennessee, and is 5 ft. 2 in. in height, with brown hair and blue eyes. You can write to her care of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, California, U.S.A. Remember when writing to American artists to add the name of your country to your address.

You can get photos of Joan Crawford and John Mack Brown at 9d. each from the "Picture Show," Photos Dept., Bear Alley, Farringdon Street, E.C.4, C. R. B. (London, S.W.). Joan Crawford was born on May 23rd, 1904, in San Antonio, Texas, and has auburn hair and hazel eyes. John Mack Brown was born on September 1st, 1904, in Dothan, Alabama, and has black hair and brown eyes. Kay Johnson was born in Mount Vernon, New York. She is 5 ft. 7 in. in height, and has blonde hair and blue eyes.

GROSE'S		8, New Bridge Street, LONDON, E.C.4.	LUDGATE CIRCUS.
BILLIARDS AT HOME 1/- per week.
SIZE	DEPOSIT	4 monthly payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10/-	6/6	26/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8/6	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10/-	12/6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	15/6	52/-

Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls, guaranteed unbreakable, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk. COMPLETE LIST FREE.

BE TALLER! Increased my own height to 6ft. 3 1/2 ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

BE STRONG I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self Control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-.—STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

GROW TALLER! ADD INCHES to your height Details free.—JEDISON, 39, BOND STREET, BLACKPOOL.

BLUSHING, Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/- Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

BE TALL Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars, simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

HEIGHT INCREASED. Complete course 5/-. Clients gain testimonials free.—P. A. CLIVE, Harrocks, Colwyn Bay, N. Wales.

STAMMERING, STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I HUGHES, did. Particulars free. FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d. (Abroad 1/-), including Airpost, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W. A. White, 30, Engine Lane, L.Y.E. Stourbridge.

BOYS! MAKE MONEY from THE "NEWFOOTY" GAME. Best Table Football invention. BIG DISCOUNT on sales to friends. 22 Men, Ball and Goals. MEN FOLLOW BALL AND INTERCEPT PASSES AS FOOTBALLERS DO. Many 1st, 2nd, 3rd DIV. COLOURS. Played G.T. BRITAIN & COLONIES. Only 2/3. Post 3d. extra. THE "NEWFOOTY" CO., 6, YORK STREET, WALTON, LIVERPOOL. Buy now! Get orders! Keep this!

Boy's Cinema

"DEFENDERS OF THE LAW" and
"THE MALTESE FALCON."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^d

No. 618.

EVERY TUESDAY.

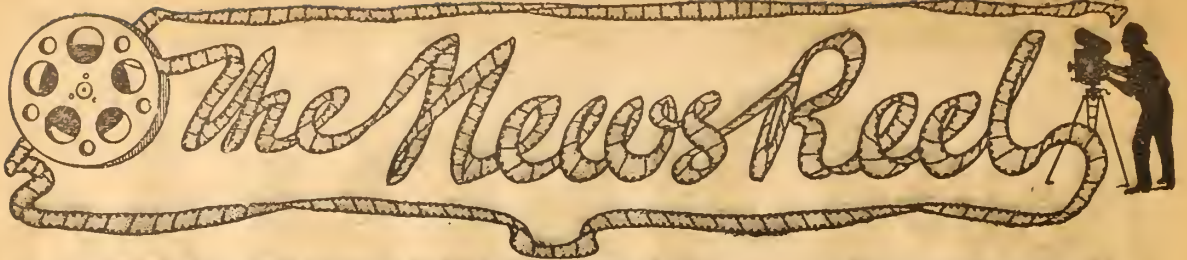

OCTOBER 17th, 1931.

ADIOS

A fighting romance of the Old West.

Starring
RICHARD BARTHELMESS.

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Adios."

Don Francisco Delfino (El Puma), Richard Barthelmess; David Howard, James Rennie; Rosita Garcia, Mary Astor; Dolores Delfino, Marion Nixon; Peter Harkness, Fred Kohler; Lupe, Barbara Bedford; Don Mariano Delfino, Robert Edson; Juan, Arthur Stone; Concha, Mathilde Comont; Judge Travers, Erville Alderson.

"Defenders of the Law."

Police Commissioner Lang, Edmund Broese; Alice Lang, Catherine Dale Owen; Chief of Police, Joseph Girard; Captain Houston, John Holland; Joe Valot, Robert Gleckler; Number Seventeen, Mac Busch; Detective Muldoon, Philo McCullough; Terone, Paul Panzer.

"The Maltese Falcon."

Ruth Wonderly, Bebe Daniels; Sam Spade, Ricardo Cortez; Gutman, Dudley Digges; Effie, Una Merkel; Lieutenant Dundy, Robert Elliott; Doctor Cairo, Otto Mattiesen; District Attorney, Oscar Apfel; Miles Archer, Walter Long; Wilmer Cook, Dwight Frye; Tom Polhaus, J. Farrell MacDonald; Captain Jacobbi, Agostino Borgato.

"On With the Motley."

When Robert Woolsey, the famous Radio Pictures comedian, takes his cigar from his mouth and utters a side-splitting wisecrack in his next picture, he will be doing it whilst his heart is breaking—more or less.

The fact is that "Rusty" is lost.

Rusty is a little black and tan dog of uncertain breed, but very dear to the hearts of the noted screen comedian and his wife.

Whilst Robert Woolsey and his wife were visiting England recently, Rusty was taken charge of by their maid. When the comedian returned, he heard the sad news that Rusty had disappeared, and at once offered a reward, which up to the moment has been unsuccessful.

When he starts work on his next picture, "Girl Crazy," it will be "I Pagliacci" brought up to date—unless Rusty is returned in the meantime.

Ken Maynard at a Fiesta.

Mexican ranchers in the hills back of Puento, California, held an impromptu fiesta, celebrating the informal visit of Ken Maynard, Tiffany Western star, and hero of the action-loving Latins.

Ken "dropped in" on the ranchers in an unexpected manner. Flying back from San Diego in his new Stearman plane, the flyer became fog-bound. His gasoline supply ran out while he was still searching for a landing field—Ken landed the plane on a hillside. He walked back to the nearest habitation to look for help in extricating the ship, and when the ranchers had finally cleared a way, preparatory for a take-off October 17th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

BOB STEELE

in

"THE RIDING FOOL."

Action, thrills, romance, and humour in a film showing how a couple of cow-punchers brought a crowd of bandits to justice.

"RODNEY STEPS IN."

A gallant young man sees a beautiful girl being attacked and goes to her rescue, which involves him in many amazing adventures. Starring Richard Cooper and Elizabeth Allan.

"RED FORK RANGE."

Men, horses, and action in a thrilling Western story of white men against red. Starring Wally Wales and Ruth Mix.

ALSO

The eighth episode of our thrilling serial:
"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

in the morning, they put on the informal fiesta.

Ranchers for miles around attended. Dancing, feasting—and the rest of the things that go with a real fiesta—were very much in evidence, and the party continued until the early hours of the morning.

Ken flew back to Los Angeles the following day.

"They're great people," said the star, discussing the ranchers from below the border. "I've never been treated more hospitably in my life, nor felt that any welcome was more sincere than the one those simple-living Mexicans gave me."

A Microphone Masterpiece.

One of the most successful demonstrations of realistic sound recording was recently performed at the First National studios at Burbank, California, during the making of "Too Young to Marry," starring Loretta Young.

The sound in question, which brought a strained expression to the faces of

First National's experts was that of the crunching of celery. Any sound engineer who has had any experience in the recording of this particular noise will admit that its reproduction is one of the most difficult feats known.

According to Nathan Levinson, of the Producer's Recording Department, it is a sound that cannot be duplicated. The difficulty is to record it in such a way as to ensure that the super-sensitive microphone will not register it as though it were a volcanic eruption or a landslide.

The finely adjusted microphone was placed over the dinner-table on the set where Loretta Young, Graut Withers, O. P. Heggie and Emma Dunne were filmed. Only after many tests was the final recording carried out, when the director looked and listened to the result in the private projection-room.

There was no mistaking it. The sound of crunching celery, the stripping of the strings from it and the breaking-off of the leafy top which had so eluded the experts—all was heard perfectly.

Thus celery experts will at once recognise it for the genuine sound, and be intrigued by the comic effect when they hear it in the picture.

Why Raymond Hatton Once Left the Movies.

Raymond Hatton, whose make-up ability ranks only slightly lower than that of the late Lon Chaney, once gave up working for motion pictures because of make-up.

He was wearing a beard during the filming of a picture, some fifteen years ago, and the artificial whiskers caught fire. Hatton's face was horribly burned, and he had to give up work for more than a year. He underwent a painful skin-grafting operation, and during the long recuperative period—actually about a year—he was, of course, unable to take any active part in the doings of the theatre or the screen.

He returned to the films after an unsuccessful attempt to make a living on the stage. Because of the unfortunate accident, he had harboured a prejudice against the cinema, and had resolved that he would never again face the camera. But he was not a sensational success in the travelling stock company which was the only acting job he had been able to obtain, although it was some time before, at the persuasion of his wife, he swallowed his anti-movie prejudice and became one of the famous Keystone Comedy Kops.

His first dramatic part came in "The Whispering Chorus," which Cecil B. De Mille directed, and this was followed by several highly successful comedy rôles. These he alternated later with serious parts, and he now stands as one of the few character actors at home in both kinds of rôle.

He has another important part in "The Challenge," the dramatic Lila Lee-Sidney Blackmer story which is one of First National's early releases.

A fighting romance of the dangerous days following Mexico's ceding of California to the United States, when desperadoes infested the country. Starring Richard Barthelmess and Mary Astor.

Don Francisco Comes Home.

IN the year 1846, the people of California were in a disturbed and anxious situation. War had broken out between Mexico and the United States, and California had been annexed by the Americans. Bitter was the chagrin of the proud Mexicans who had for so long ruled in California, and the rough Americans who poured into the State to take over the government were heartily despised by the haughty dons. Mexico had been beaten in battle, but it was long before the Californians were reconciled to their new rulers.

Don Mariano Delfino, owner of the great estate known as the Rancho de los Coyotes, had realized at length that there was no more hope of driving out the "gringos," as the Americans were called. The estate had been granted to the don's ancestors long years before by the King of Spain, and he did not wish to run the risk of losing his lands by defying the invaders. So he submitted to the authority of the United States, though with anger and sorrow in his heart.

All was excitement one summer day on the Rancho de los Coyotes, for the old don's son was coming home, after four years' absence in the city of Mexico, whither he had gone to complete his education.

A man came riding wildly into the courtyard, shouting and waving his arms excitedly.

"Don Francisco is coming!" he cried. "Go round and call the servants," exclaimed Don Mariano, coming out hastily. "Fetch all of them out here."

The man went off on his errand, and the old don turned to find his daughter Dolores, a beautiful dark-haired young girl, standing beside him.

"Francisco is coming," he said joyfully, "and he'll be anxious to see his little sister."

"Yes, father," replied Dolores with a smile; "and even more anxious to see you—and someone else."

"Rosita? Yes, so he will. But he won't like the changes here," said Don Mariano, thinking bitterly of the coming of the Americans. "Still, we won't think of the gringos now. We must give Francisco a royal welcome."

A mile away Francisco Delfino was riding towards the ranch-house, accompanied by Juan, an old servant of his father's, who had gone to Mexico to escort the young man home.

"I'm glad to be back," said Francisco to Juan. "Mexico is a great country, but California is home."

Juan glanced at the tall young man with the keen face and piercing eyes who rode so joyfully at his side, and remembered that Francisco could have no idea of the completely changed conditions in California since the annexation by the United States.

"We don't feel that way since the gringos came," he remarked slowly, "and so you'll find, Don Francisco."

"I'm not thinking of the gringos now," replied Francisco, as they came in sight of the house. He roused his horse to a gallop, and soon drew rein in the courtyard, and dismounted to greet his father and sister.

"Welcome home, Francisco!" exclaimed Don Mariano.

"Welcome, father! Welcome, Dolores!" cried Francisco, embracing the old man affectionately, and then turning to kiss his sister. "How glad I am to be home again at last!"

The servants pressed forward to greet the young master, and the old don ordered the field hands to be called in, for he had arranged a great "fiesta" that evening to celebrate the safe return of his son.

"I am glad you have come back," said Don Mariano, when the servant had gone. "I have been trying to manage the estate alone, but the task is getting too much for me now, especially since the gringos came."

"I will manage, father," replied the young man. "You can sit and rest now. But you must tell me about these gringos and their ways. Have they been worrying you much?"

"You'll hear quite enough of them soon," said his father; "but not to-day. To-day we are rejoicing over your return, and I don't want to talk about unpleasant things on such a day as this."

"Very well, father," replied Francisco. "You shall tell me about the gringos to-morrow. We won't think about them to-day."

Francisco was mistaken. Even on the joyful day of his return it proved to be impossible to avoid the Americans, for Juan, the old servant, did something that morning which brought the gringos down upon them before the day was out.

Juan had gone to the kitchen, there to talk to Concha, the cook, a lady of very ample proportions.

"Where's my wife, Concha?" asked Juan. "I haven't seen her about."

Concha turned up her eyes, pursed her lips, shook her head, and then looked pityingly at Juan, but she did not speak.

"What d'you mean?" demanded Juan angrily. "Where is she?"

"You'd better ask the American soldiers—the gringos in the camp over towards Los Angeles. She's been very friendly with them since you went away," said Concha meaningly.

Juan went out in a rage, and by asking one or two of the other servants, he found that Concha had spoken the truth. That afternoon he discovered his wife leaving the American camp. He dragged her to his cottage, and there and then showed her the error of her ways—with a big stick.

"I'll teach you to flirt with these gringos!" shouted Juan, as the stick rose and fell with resounding thwacks. The woman broke away at last, and ran out, sobbing.

"I'll see you punished for this," she cried furiously. "I'm going to the judge—there's law in this country now."

Juan went back to the ranch-house to tell his master of the affair, but Don Mariano was too busily engaged in preparations for the fiesta to take much notice of his servant's story.

The evening came, and a joyous company gathered at the don's house. The house servants and the range-hands were there in their best attire, and many friends had ridden in from neighbouring haciendas to greet the young don. With dancing, music and singing the hours passed, and Francisco went from one group to another, to be accorded everywhere a hearty welcome.

Presently Dolores led up to him a tall slim girl with raven-black hair and long-lashed eyes; a girl whose dazzling beauty outshone every other woman at the fiesta. Even Dolores, pretty though she was, could not but admit to herself that her friend, Rosita Garcia, was the most beautiful girl in southern California. But Dolores had no jealousy in her nature, and the secret wish of her heart was that her brother should one day make the lovely Rosita his wife.

"Here is Rosita," said Dolores to her brother. "She has been at school in Monterey."

"Not always," replied Francisco, with a graceful bow. "I remember you, senorita, when you were a little girl, and the most beautiful in all California, even then."

At that moment there entered the gate a man whose appearance contrasted strangely with that of the gay Mexicans who were enjoying the fiesta. Tall, thin, dressed in black, with an ancient top-hat on his head, Judge Travers was a typical "Uncle Sam" of the old days. He glanced disapprovingly at the revels, but said nothing until a servant asked him what he wanted.

"Tell your master that I must see him," said the American in a commanding voice, and a moment later Don Mariano was annoyed by the appearance of a servant with the message.

"Show him in to my study," said the don reluctantly as he went indoors.

"Good-evening, senor," said Don Mariano, with grave and stately politeness as his visitor entered the room. "I am glad to have the honour of your visit to our fiesta. We are rejoicing because my son has returned safely from his visit to Mexico."

"Say, don," replied the judge sharply, "I didn't come for your fiesta. I have had a serious complaint made to me, and I want to hear the truth of the matter from you."

Don Mariano knew Travers only too well. The judge was notorious throughout the district for his deliberate annoyance of the Mexican inhabitants. He tried to magnify every little peccadillo in which a Mexican was concerned into a serious crime, and the old don always felt himself to be no match for the wily gringo. He must have the help of his son.

"Tell Don Francisco to come here at once," cried the old man.

October 17th, 1931.

Judge Travers.

FRANCISCO had been getting a little tired of the fiesta, and the continual compliments showered upon him, though his old-fashioned courtliness of manner never failed. Then Dolores brought Rosita to him, and the evening forthwith became charged with glamour and romance. His sister soon discreetly slipped away, and Francisco proceeded to improve his opportunity.

"I'm beginning to believe, Rosita, that I've wasted four years of my life," he murmured, as he swung the girl round in a dance.

"Oh, no," smiled Rosita, "you dance so well now that I think you must have had plenty of practice with the ladies in Mexico."

"There are no ladies in Mexico to compare with you, Rosita," cried Francisco, as the dance ended. "You are the most beautiful, the most—"

A servant came up, and stood bowing before him. Francisco, much annoyed, had to cut short his compliments to ask the man what he wanted.

"Don Mariano requests you to come to him immediately, senor."

"Will you wait for me here?" said Francisco to Rosita. "I hope I shall not be long."

"Of course I will wait—for you," replied the girl, with a smile.

Francisco followed the servant to his father's room, and there he found the stern American judge, the first gringo he had seen since his return home.

"I want you to meet Judge Travers," said his father. "Judge, this is my son, the Don Francisco Delfino."

"I'm sure glad to meet you," replied the judge. "And now let's get to business. A woman from your ranch came to me this afternoon at Los Angeles and said that she had been severely beaten by her husband, one of your men."

Francisco looked at his father in astonishment. Don Mariano had thought no more of Juan's story, and his son knew nothing about the affair. The old man turned to the judge.

"Am I to understand that you think you are competent to arrange our treatment of women?" he asked coldly.

"Yes, I do," replied Travers. "You're in the United States now, Don Mariano, and don't you forget it."

"We are in no danger of forgetting it," said the don. "I have heard Juan's story. His wife has been spending most of her time in the camp of the gringos of the American soldiers, and the man has punished her. She is a totally unmoral woman, and she deserved all she got."

"She certainly did!" burst out Francisco fiercely, glaring at the American. "This is not your affair, judge."

"You'll find it is. There's a law to protect women from cowardly attacks, and I'll see that the law is kept."

"As you would if an American thrashed his wife for consorting with Mexicans, I suppose," sneered Francisco.

The shot told, for all three knew perfectly well that in such a case the judge would have done nothing, except to applaud his own countryman. Travers reddened beneath the indignant glare of the young don.

"You've just come from Mexico, I believe," he snarled, "and I reckon you ain't sort of realised that you live in the States now. You call to see me in Los Angeles to-morrow, or—"

Neither the old don nor his son could be bluffed by the implied threat, for even Travers could hardly hold them responsible for what Juan had done.

Still, Don Mariano guessed that his son would not be able to hold back for long a furious outburst of anger against the judge, and he at once devised a plan.

"My son can hardly do that," he said calmly. "He is going north to-morrow to deliver cattle to the Commissioner at Spanish Gulch."

Francisco looked surprisedly at his father, but something appealing in the old man's gaze made him nod his head in assent.

The delivery of the cattle to the Commissioner was a very important matter, as the judge knew well enough. He took up his hat in readiness to leave.

"In that case, Don Mariano, I will say no more to you or your son about the affair, but I must deal with the actual culprit according to law."

"It's lucky for you that you're a guest in this house," began Francisco angrily, but a warning look from his father sent him out. He returned to the fiesta with bitter rage against the gringos in his heart.

"I'm sorry I've been so long," said Francisco, when at length he reached Rosita's side.

"What is the matter, Francisco?" asked the girl, as she looked at the young man's perturbed face. "Has something gone wrong?"

"I'm going north to-morrow," he replied. "My father is sending me to Spanish Gulch, and I think it's to get me out of the way of that gringo, Judge Travers."

"Oh!" gasped Rosita. "That dreadful American! Yes, you must keep out of his way. But—you will return?"

"I must return, if only because of the anxiety in your voice," murmured Francisco tenderly.

At that moment the joyous sounds of the fiesta were hushed as a beautiful tenor voice arose in an old Mexican love song. The crowd listened spellbound, and when the song ceased and the applause had died away, Francisco whispered to Rosita the last words of the song.

"Good-bye, love! That's a warning to waste no time, I think. I'm in love—and you, Rosita?"

"I thought you were going to tell me all about your travels in Mexico," said Rosita, blushing and turning away.

Francisco took the hint, and began to describe the beautiful city of Mexico and its famous lake.

"I remember some delightful summer nights on the lake," he concluded.

"Floating idly along in a canoe to the music of a guitar, with the moon shining overhead."

"Is it always like that?" asked Rosita softly.

"It would be—with you!" replied Francisco, taking her hand in his. The girl did not attempt to draw it away, for she had loved Francisco since they were both children, though she did not intend to tell him so yet.

"Perhaps some day we shall see Mexico—together, Rosita!" breathed the young man eagerly.

"Perhaps we shall," whispered Rosita.

At Spanish Gulch.

VERY early on the next morning Francisco and Dolores went out together, for the young don wished to look round the ranch before he started with the cattle for the north.

As his sister talked of the war, and the conduct of the Americans since the annexation, Francisco grew more and more bitter against the gringos, and began to regret that he had given way to his father's desire to get him out of the way of Judge Travers.

"Look there," cried Dolores presently. "What is that under the tree?"
 "A man—he's hurt, I think," said Francisco. "We'll go and see to him."
 "Why, it's Raymondo, one of father's men," exclaimed Dolores, as they reached the tree. "Are you hurt, Raymondo? What has happened?"

"The gringos, senorita," groaned the man.
 "What did they do to you?" cried Francisco fiercely.

"I was bringing home some cattle last night," gasped Raymondo, "and I met some of the judge's men. They started firing guns to frighten the cattle, and I asked them to stop."

"Well?" queried Francisco eagerly, as the man stopped for breath.

"They laughed, and laid about me with their whips. Then they threw me under this tree. My leg's broken, I think—I can't move."

The man groaned again, and Francisco and his sister knelt down to attend to his injuries.

"Yes, I believe his leg is broken," said the young man, standing up. "I will go for help, and then I am riding to Los Angeles to settle our account with that judge."

"No, no," cried Dolores. "Don't make trouble with him just now, for father's sake. Go with the cattle, as you promised."

"Are we to sit still under an outrage like this?" stormed Francisco.

"I don't say that," said Dolores. "But you don't know enough about things in this country yet to do any good. All the chief gringos here are bad men. One day there will come better Americans, and then we can get justice. I'll see to Raymondo while you start with the cattle. For my sake, Francisco!" she added pleadingly.

"For your sake, little sister," said Francisco, taking her in his arms and kissing her lovingly. "For your sake, I will go as I promised, but—when I come back, let these accursed gringos beware!"

Francisco went away to the north, and some days later he drew rein a mile or two out of the town of Spanish Gulch. He had brought a great herd of cattle so far in safety, cattle to be delivered to Peter Harkness, the American Land Commissioner of North California.

"I want you to hold the cattle here," he called to Pedro, one of his men. "I will ride into the town with Juan, and find where we are to deliver them."

The young don rode into the town, noticing as he went along the street that most of the houses were wooden erections, very roughly built. Presently he came to the saloon, and there he stopped, for a notice on the wall attracted his attention.

"It has been agreed by all Americans here that all foreigners speaking Spanish better get out of this town within three days."

"(Signed) PETER HARKNESS."

Francisco's face flushed with anger as he read the notice. He dismounted, hitched his horse to a rail, and walked into the saloon, followed by Juan.

"Can you tell me where Senor Harkness is?" he asked the first man he saw.
 "It's a holiday," came the reply. "I reckon he's down town somewhere making a speech. He'll be along soon."

"Well, I'll wait here," said Francisco, going up to the bar to order a drink. Everyone in the saloon stared at the handsome stranger, and presently a girl came up to him.

"Won't you sit here with me, senor?" she asked with a persuasive smile, indicating a table. "My name is Lupe. I want you to meet my friend Carlos."

Carlos, a man with dark hair, obviously a Mexican half-breed, was sitting at the table, and Francisco summed up the couple at a glance. The girl was probably going to try to get him to drink heavily, and then to induce him to play cards with Carlos, who was plainly enough a crook. But the young don was always polite to women of whatever degree, so he bowed, sat down, and ordered drinks.

A loud burst of cheering and laughter in the street brought the whole company to the door to see a ridiculous sight. Up to the saloon rode a burly, florid-faced man, mounted on an exceedingly small donkey. A tumultuous mob accompanied him on either side, screaming with laughter.

The dignified young don, after one disdainful glance, went back again to the table in disgust, accompanied by Lupe and Carlos.

"Who is that—the one on top, I mean?" he asked scornfully.

Carlos grinned, but made no reply. Lupe, with a slight shudder which Francisco did not fail to notice, informed the don that the donkey-rider was the man he had come to meet.

"He's the big man of the town," she said. "That's Peter Harkness, the Land Commissioner."

Harkness got off the donkey at the door of the saloon, and came in. As soon as he entered the door he saw Lupe standing by Francisco's side, and an angry scowl came over his heavy face at once.

"What are you doing, Lupe?" he shouted harshly, beginning to push through the crowd towards the girl.

Don Francisco glared across at the advancing Commissioner, while Lupe and Carlos, anticipating a row, looked up at the young don anxiously.

"The senorita has done me the honour of asking me to drink with her," he said suavely.

"You greaser—you dirty, low-down greaser," shouted Harkness angrily. "You leave my girl alone, you Mexican scum! I thought I'd run all the greasers out of this town. Take that!"

Raising the whip he carried, he slashed Francisco viciously across the face, raising a long weal down the young man's cheek. Don Francisco instantly knocked Harkness down with a powerful right to the jaw. The American got up again in a flash, and charged like a wild beast, his face furious with wrath. As he came he drew his gun, but the "greaser" was too quick for him.

Francisco wrenched the gun away, hurled it through the window, and forthwith knocked Harkness down again. This time the Commissioner rose more slowly, and called to the crowd of Americans in the saloon to seize the "greaser."

A number of men rushed forward at the call. Francisco, ably seconded by Juan, fought furiously, and several of the "gringos" of Spanish Gulch bore marks of that fight for days afterwards. But the odds were too great, and in five minutes both the Mexicans had been securely roped to posts. Then Harkness came up to them, an evil grin on his face.

"Now, Mr. Greaser," he cried, "take that!"

He hit the helpless Francisco in the face with all his force, and his own followers murmured uneasily at the cowardly blow.

"Say your prayers, you Mexican skunks!" howled Harkness. "I'll give you five minutes, and then we'll decor-ate the nearest tree with both of you."

A stir at the door indicated a new arrival. The crowd made way as a cry of "The sheriff!" arose, and David Howard, sheriff of the county, came up.

Don Francisco glared across at the advancing commissioner.

Howard was a grave quiet man, dressed in neat black, but every man in the saloon knew that the sheriff was quicker on the draw than any man in Spanish Gulch. The men respected him, too, for his upright character and the fearless way in which he upheld the law. "What you blowing in here for, Howard?" snarled Harkness. "It's my affair."

"It's my affair, too," replied Howard with ominous calm, "so long as I'm sheriff of this county."

"Sure, it is, sheriff!" cried at least half the crowd, for Harkness was not popular at any time, and his cowardly attack on Francisco had alienated the sympathy of many who had no love for "greasers," but cared a great deal for fair play. The commissioner caught Howard's eye, fell back a pace sullenly, and said no more.

"Now, boys, what's all this?" asked the sheriff.

"Well, sheriff," began one of the men. "this stranger was talking to Lupe, and Harkness wouldn't stand for it, and they fought."

"Guns?" questioned Howard, glancing at Francisco's face.

"That was done with a whip," said the man, following the sheriff's glance; "but Harkness drew a gun first. The greaser grabbed it, and pitched it into the street."

"That's enough," said Howard quietly. "Cut these men loose!"

The order was promptly obeyed, and in another moment Francisco and Juan were free.

"I am sorry you have had such rough treatment here, senor," said Howard.

"I owe you a great debt," replied Francisco. "I hope to repay you some day."

He turned to Harkness, who was standing sullenly close at hand.

"I came here to deliver cattle—three thousand head—to Senor Harkness," he said.

"Why didn't you say so?" demanded Harkness. "Why don't you deliver them?"

Francisco walked towards the door. Reaching it, he turned once more to the Land Commissioner.

"I will—deliver them," he said deliberately as he went out.

Francisco Delivers the Cattle.

FRANCISCO rode out of the town silently, followed as silently by Juan. From time to time the faithful retainer glanced at his master's scarred face, and wondered what was passing in the don's mind. He had not long to wait, for when they reached the herd of cattle, Francisco rode round to each of his men, and in a few fiery words explained his scheme of revenge.

At nine o'clock that evening the young don gave a signal. The three thousand cattle had already been gathered into a compact herd, and when Francisco raised his hand the men began to urge the mass of animals forward.

Slowly at first they moved on towards Spanish Gulch. But behind them and on their flanks rode the horsemen, searing the backs of the cattle with their whips, exciting them to madness with their shouts and yells. Soon the pace increased, and with a thunder of thousands of hoofs the herd broke into a trot.

Spanish Gulch came into sight, and the huge mass of animals began to gallop down upon it. Maddened by the whips and the yells, urged on by the furious vaqueros, the cattle plunged down the slope, bellowing with fear. There was no stopping them now, and Francisco and his men drew aside and watched them go headlong into the street of the little town.

"Well, boys," said Francisco quietly, "Harkness wanted me to deliver the cattle, and I reckon I have delivered them."

In Spanish Gulch all was confusion. A few men caught sight of the great herd bearing down upon them, and they ran wildly through the street, shouting the alarm. It was too late. No human power could have stopped that rush, and before the people of Spanish Gulch had even realized their danger, the three thousand cattle were indeed being "delivered," as Francisco had promised.

The leaders of the herd passed along the street, running wildly and bellowing furiously, though doing little damage, but the pressure of the hundreds behind soon had its effect. There was no room in the street for that vast herd, in the madness of the stampede. Soon cattle were leaping upon wooden platforms outside the houses, charging furiously against every obstacle in their path, snapping stout beams and posts like threads of cotton, and bringing destruction to everything they met.

On and on they came in hundreds, and in a few minutes the wooden houses in the main street of Spanish Gulch had collapsed in ruins. Presently a tongue of fire rose up from one of the wrecked houses, and little by little, the flames spread. It seemed as though the town was doomed to complete destruction, for the fire would complete the ruin the great herd had begun.

Francisco saw a great cloud of dust rise slowly over Spanish Gulch, and heard the sounds of falling houses as the herd went through. A grim smile came over his face as he turned to Juan.

"You are a witness," he said, "that the cattle were delivered. Now, men, come here. I've got something to say."

The men dismounted and gathered round eagerly, and Francisco raised his right hand solemnly.

"From henceforward," he cried loudly, "war on every gringo!"

The men cheered wildly. They had all submitted to the Americans, but they chafed in secret against their conquerors, and the treatment of their young master had brought matters to a head. Each of Francisco's men burned for revenge.

"I am going down now to collect the dollars from Harkness," said Francisco.

"That will be dangerous, senor," protested Juan anxiously. "Take me with you."

"No, Juan," replied Francisco. "There's no danger. They will not expect me, and I'll soon be back. Stay here, all of you."

He rode off into the darkness, and soon came cautiously into Spanish Gulch. The fire had been put out by some of the townfolk, headed by the sheriff, and Francisco, lurking behind a pile of ruins, presently saw David Howard and a few men picking their way among the debris.

"Where's Harkness?" asked Howard, looking round.

"Don't know, sheriff," came the reply in contemptuous tones. "He's been busy saving his skin, I reckon, though his house wasn't in danger, anyway. I expect you'll find him there."

"I'll go along and see," said Howard. "I've sure got a few words to say to him."

The men grinned as they dispersed, and the sheriff went off alone to the Land Commissioner's house. Francisco followed, and waited outside the house until Howard came out. The sheriff did not stay long, and when he had gone the young don crept up to a window and looked in.

Harkness was angry, for the sheriff had spoken very bluntly to him, and to be told that the ruin of Spanish Gulch was due to his treatment of Francisco had annoyed the bullying Commissioner very much, particularly as the sheriff's words were true.

"Darn that greaser!" he cried aloud. "I wish I had him here!"

"Here is the greaser!" said Francisco, leaping in at the window. "Stick 'em up!"

Harkness had no option but to stick them up, and very angrily he did so, while the young Mexican relieved him of his gun.

"Now I'll have a receipt for those cattle, and I'll have the dollars, too," said Francisco calmly.

"You know I've had no cattle," muttered Harkness sullenly.

"Pardon me, senor," replied Francisco, with the utmost politeness, "but three thousand head were delivered in Spanish Gulch this evening, and I have plenty of witnesses to prove it. The cattle may have passed on beyond the town, but then, you see, you did not tell me exactly where to deliver them. You will give me the receipt and the dollars, if you please, at once."

Harkness sat sullenly silent for a moment, but the gun Francisco held menacingly before him soon sapped his resolution to hold out.

"I'll give you what you want," he growled.

"I think you had better, senor," said Francisco. "If you don't, Spanish Gulch will need a new Land Commissioner to-morrow. You called me a 'greaser.' I am a gentleman of Mexico, and we pay our debts."

Harkness signed a receipt for the cattle, and reluctantly handed over the dollars, growling:

"You'll pay for this," as he did so.

"I have paid, Senor Harkness," said Francisco, touching the livid scar on his face. And a moment later he had vanished into the darkness of the night.

"Now I Shall Be Hunted!"

AT the Rancho de los Coyotes everything went on quietly enough during the absence of Francisco in the north. Judge Travers sought out Juan, only to find that he had gone with the young don, and the American did not carry the matter any further. He had much more important business on hand, and his designs against Don Mariano could well wait until the arrival of the Land Commissioners who were touring California.

Travers had for long cast a covetous eye on the great Rancho de los Coyotes, and with the aid of the Commissioners the unscrupulous judge had determined to eject the old don on some plausible pretext or other, and to seize the land for his own.

Rosita Garcia was still staying at the ranch-house, and one evening she went along to the little chapel to pray, for an uneasy feeling that danger threatened Francisco had come over her. She knelt long before the statue of the Virgin in the quiet chapel, until suddenly she was roused by the sound of footsteps.

Save for the light of a few candles, the chapel was in darkness, and for the moment Rosita could not see who had come in. Then, to her great joy, she recognised the tall figure of Francisco, and she came forward eagerly to greet him.

"Oh, Francisco, how glad I am to see you again!" she whispered.

"It may be for the last time, Rosita," replied the young man sadly, and the astonished girl suddenly noticed a long scar on Francisco's face, while his manner was unusually grave and stern. "Why, what is wrong?" she asked in alarm. "Have you been wounded?"

"That is the sign of the estimation in which the Americans hold the best blood of Mexico," replied Francisco, in a low, stern voice.

"One of them struck you?" queried Rosita in horror.

"Yes, with a whip, as though I were a dog," said the young man quietly. "But I paid the debt. I've done enough to be an outlaw."

"Oh, Francisco," gasped the girl faintly, "surely you don't mean it!"

"It's true. I have suffered, and not only I. The Americans are cheating our people in the north, taking their lands and goods. I've heard enough. I hoped things would be different, but now I shall be hunted."

Rosita looked at him in speechless horror, for all her delightful dreams of a happy future were shattered by his words.

"I'm not afraid, Rosita mia," cried Francisco, seeing the terror in her face, "and whatever happens—I love you."

"But—but—I'll see you again. Promise me I shall see you again," stammered the girl. "Oh, Francisco, I can't bear it, for I love you, too."

"If you want to see an outlaw, send for me and I will come," said the young man sadly, putting his arms round the trembling girl. "And now—good-bye!"

With a last hurried embrace, he was gone, and Rosita heard the hoof-beats of his horse die away in the distance. She tottered out of the chapel to hear a feeble voice calling her.

"Rosita! What are you doing here, child?" said Don Mariano, coming up. "I thought I heard something," whispered Rosita, scarcely knowing what she said.

"Francisco has been here," cried the old man wildly. "I didn't see him, but he left the money for the cattle on the table, and a note. Read it!"

Rosita took the piece of paper and read aloud:

"I cannot stand the changed conditions. I am going away."

"I don't understand what it means," said Don Mariano in puzzled tones. "Did you see him anywhere about, Rosita?"

The girl was by this time beyond the power of speech, but she nodded, and the old man questioned her eagerly.

"Where was he going? What did he say? I must know. Tell me."

Dolores came running out to see what was wrong, for the old don had raised his voice almost to a shout in his eagerness, but Rosita burst into a storm of tears, and for some minutes did not reply.

"He told me that—oh, don't ask it!" she gasped at length, and then she fainted in the arms of Dolores.

Though Rosita would not say what dreadful message Francisco had given her, it was not long before Don Mariano and Dolores found out the truth. Not one of the men who had accompanied Francisco to Spanish Gulch came back to the ranch, and soon several of the remaining range hands vanished mysteriously. From neighbouring ranches, too, some of the best men began to disappear, and strange rumours arose in the district.

"Father," said Dolores one morning, "have you heard that the express rider came into Los Angeles yesterday without the mails? He was held up and robbed."

"Yes," remarked Concha, the cook, who happened to overhear, "and they say there's a bandit about who has sworn to avenge us on the gringos. He took a herd of cattle off that ranch Judge Travers stole from Don Juan, and he held up the stage-coach and made the gringos in it hand over their money. Good luck to him, I say. And down with all gringos!"

Don Mariano and Dolores looked at each other in horror, and when the cook had gone out they turned to Rosita, whose face had gone suddenly white. Her appearance was sufficient for the old don.

"My son," he muttered thickly. "My son! A bandit!"

And from that day forward Don Mariano Delfino was a broken man.

El Puma.

JUDGE TRAVERS walked through the street of the tiny settlement of Pueblo de los Angeles until he reached the Bella Union Hotel. At the door stood a knot of men, who saluted the judge as he came up.

"Is Mr. Howard here yet?" asked Travers.

"He's waiting for you inside, judge," said one of the men. "He's been looking round town this morning."

"I'll tell him that before long we shall have a regular town here," remarked Travers, going in. He found David Howard in the hotel, and greeted him warmly.

"What have you been doing up north, Howard?" asked the judge presently.

"I was acting as sheriff up at Spanish Gulch until I got orders to come here to help you," replied Howard.

"I'm sure glad you and I will be partners," said Travers. "I'm investigating title-deeds and rights of the Mexicans in these parts, and you're the man to help me, Howard."

Travers got out a big map, and the two men studied it for some time, the judge pointing out to Howard the principal ranches in the neighbourhood.

"You might go out to the largest ranch this afternoon," said Travers. "Here it is—Rancho de los Coyotes. The owner is Don Delfino. Says he got a deed of grant from the King of Spain, but he ain't shown it to me, for he don't care much for me. He might show you, and we've got to know. It's a rich ranch, the best in these parts."

Travers glanced at Howard's grave

"This is an outrage," cried Harkness angrily, as he stepped down into the road. "You'll pay for this!"

face, and decided to say nothing about his designs on the ranch. He felt sure that his new colleague would not stand for anything not strictly just and honourable, and he was perfectly correct.

"You say the don is old," remarked Howard. "Has he any children?"

"Two—a son and a daughter. The son came back from Mexico a while ago. He went north to Spanish Gulch, and I hear his cattle wrecked the town, but maybe you saw something of that. He ain't been heard of since."

"Yes, I saw something of that affair," replied Howard slowly. "Well, judge, I'll go out to the ranch this afternoon."

"Then you can give your report to the Land Commissioners to-night. They're due here this afternoon. Harkness is one of 'em. You know Harkness, of course."

"I know him," said Howard, turning to go. As he turned, a large placard on the wall caught his eye.

"5,000 DOLLARS REWARD."

"The above reward is offered for the capture, dead or alive, of the bandit known as

"EL PUMA."

"What's all this?" asked Howard.

"Ain't you heard of El Puma?" queried the judge. "Some Mexican, I reckon, but no one knows who he is. He's been holding up our people about here for the last month, and got away with it each time. I hope he ain't heard the Land Commissioners are coming to-day."

The judge's hopes were vain. Harkness and the other commissioners were travelling south from Spanish Gulch in the Californian stage-coach, when on a lonely stretch of road a few miles out of Los Angeles a swarm of horsemen suddenly swooped down upon them.

"El Puma!" shrieked the driver, dropping the reins and elevating his hands with lightning speed.

Harkness looked out of the coach window to find himself covered by half a dozen guns.

"Get out, all of you!" ordered a tall, dark young man on horseback, who was obviously the leader of the bandits.

"This is an outrage!" cried Harkness angrily, as he stepped down into the road. "You'll pay for this!"

"So you said before, senor," replied El Puma with ironical politeness. "Give this gentleman special attention," he added, turning to the grinning Juan.

Harkness glared at the bandit chief, but somehow in the excitement of the moment failed to recognise him, though the face of El Puma seemed to be vaguely familiar. The incidents of that day at Spanish Gulch were not very clear in the Land Commissioner's mind, for on that unpleasant occasion he had had more whisky than wit about him.

Juan took a large sack and made the round of the furious gringos, collecting their money and valuables. Harkness was more thoroughly scared than anyone, and all his property, even articles of the slightest value, went into the sack.

"The spoils, El Puma!" cried Juan at last, holding up the well-filled sack.

"Take the horses and the coach," came the sharp order.

A dozen men sprang forward at the words, and the coach was soon on its way to the bandits' hide-out in the mountains.

"What about us?" cried Harkness angrily.

"You will walk," replied El Puma with a smile. "It's only ten miles to Los Angeles, and the weather is fine.

October 17th, 1934.

A walk will do you good. Adios, senores!"

El Puma and his men galloped off down the road towards Los Angeles, and less than an hour afterwards they entered the little town in a body, shouting "Make way for El Puma!" as they swept along the street.

The few Americans in sight fled before the galloping horsemen, who took Los Angeles entirely by surprise. No one had expected that El Puma would be daring enough to raid the town in broad daylight, and the bandits drew rein before the Bella Union Hotel without meeting any check.

The crowd of gringos in the saloon gave back as a mob of Mexicans, all crying "Way for El Puma!" rushed in. Before the astonished Americans had realised what had happened they were covered by the guns of the bandits, and their hands went up. One man only drew his gun, and took aim at El Puma, but Juan was too quick for him. The bandit's pistol barked first, and the gringo slumped to the floor and lay still. "I had to do it," said Juan to his chief. "He'd have had you else."

El Puma nodded, walked to the bar, and called for drinks. The waiters hastily served him, and he gave a toast to his followers:

"Down with the gringos!"

Yells and cheers greeted his words, and then Juan got to work with a sack. There was no more resistance, and before long the Americans in the saloon had been despoiled of all their valuables.

"Finished, Juan?" asked El Puma at length. "Then we'll go."

He turned courteously to the hotel-keeper, who had been spared by Juan.

"I thank you for your hospitality, senor," he remarked. "I gave orders that your goods were not to be touched—except for your excellent wines, which of course we had to try. I think that by now some of my men have fired the town. Ah, yes! I see the smoke. I trust that Los Angeles will not soon forget the visit of El Puma. Adios, senores!"

He took off his sombrero in a sweeping bow, and a moment later the bandits were riding off at a gallop, leaving Los Angeles on fire behind them.

David Howard's New Job.

DAVID HOWARD rode out to the Rancho de los Coyotes that afternoon, and so escaped the raid on Los Angeles. Don Mariano received the American with his usual courtesy, and a few minutes' conversation showed him that here at last was a gringo of a very different character from the grasping adventurers who had annoyed and cheated the Mexicans since the annexation.

"You have a deed of grant from the King of Spain, I am told," said Howard presently.

"Yes, senor," replied the Don, "and I will show it to you with pleasure."

"This gives you an undoubted title to the estate," said Howard, when he had inspected the document. "I shall tell the Commissioners so, and they will not trouble you. Let me advise you to take great care of this deed."

Dolores came in, looking pale and troubled, but still very beautiful to the eyes of David Howard, who had never before seen a girl of her type, a Mexican of an ancient and noble family, with that unmistakable air of good-breeding so impossible to imitate.

At her father's request Dolores showed Howard round the house and the out-buildings, and presently he asked her the question she had all along feared.

"And your brother, senorita—am I to have the honour of meeting him?"

"He is not here," said Dolores as calmly as she could. "He didn't like it here, so he went back to Mexico."

"I think it must have been your brother that I saw at Spanish Gulch," said Howard thoughtfully. "I was ashamed of my countrymen that day, for—"

"Senor Howard," interrupted Dolores hurriedly, "I hope you will be good enough to take me indoors now. My father is becoming very feeble, and I cannot leave him long alone."

"Certainly, senorita," said Howard. "It is time I went back to Los Angeles, too. But may I come again?"

Dolores saw that the young American's eyes were fixed admiringly on her, and she knew that she had made a conquest. He was a gringo, of course, but he seemed to be a gentleman, and some advantage for her brother might come sooner or later from his friendship. So she smiled bewitchingly upon him.

"Of course, senor," she said; "we shall always be pleased to see you."

David Howard rode back to Los Angeles in abstracted mood, thinking of the charming Dolores. Halfway to the town he met the judge, who had been visiting a neighbouring ranch, and they went on together.

Los Angeles was in an uproar. The fire had been put out after several houses had been burned down, and a noisy crowd had then gathered in front of the hotel. Travers and Howard were greeted with cheers as they came up.

"What's going on?" asked the judge. "El Puma has held up the town!" yelled a score of voices.

"He held us up, too," cried Harkness, pushing through the crowd to the judge's side. "Took our money, the coach, and the horses, and left us to walk here. Nice reception for the Commissioners, I must say!"

"Very sorry for all this," said Travers. "It's a pity the troops have gone."

"This business has got to stop!" barked Harkness. "Why don't you form a company of vigilantes and hunt down these bandits?"

"We'll do it!" cried the judge. "And for captain—here's the man! Mr. Howard, will you do it?"

"I'll do it," said Howard, after a pause. "I'll make it my business to hunt down this El Puma, and hang him!"

The crowd cheered, and Howard was at once appointed captain of the vigilantes—or Rangers, as some preferred to call them. He selected his men, and began to scour the district for traces of El Puma. It was a difficult task, for every Mexican in the neighbourhood was on the side of the bandits, and Howard could obtain no information as to El Puma's hide-out. Yet the outlaw was still at work, for the raids and hold-ups continued, in spite of all the Rangers could do.

Several times Howard visited Don Mariano's ranch, but apparently no one there had so much as heard of El Puma. Dolores carefully avoided any mention of the famous bandit, and exerted all her powers of fascination so skillfully that the captain of the Rangers was soon deeply in love with her.

Then to David Howard came a dreadful shock. One day Harkness burst into the room at the hotel as the judge was talking to Howard.

"I know who El Puma is!" shouted Harkness. "I thought I'd seen that greaser who held us up somewhere, and I've been puzzling over it for days. Now I've got it!"

"Well, who is he?" asked the judge eagerly.

"He's the man who brought those cattle to Spanish Gulch, and wrecked the town," cried Harkness. "And that was—"

"Francisco Delfino!" howled Travers. "I might have guessed it!"

"But the senorita told me her brother had gone back to Mexico," said Howard incredulously. "You must be wrong, Harkness."

"The girl was lying to shield her brother," cried the judge. "Go up to the ranch at once, Howard. Maybe you'll find out something there."

Howard went out slowly, hoping against hope that Harkness was mistaken. Hardly had he gone when Travers turned jubilantly to the Commissioner.

"That's good news, if it's true," said the judge.

"I'm nearly sure," replied Harkness, "though I was a bit—well, excited that day at Spanish Gulch."

"Well, we'll get the old don's ranch now," cried Travers. "The only trouble is that Howard has seen the deed of grant, and he guarantees it as genuine."

"What will he take to come in with us?" asked Harkness.

"You can't bribe Howard," replied the judge. "I haven't dared to whisper a word of all this to him."

"You're right, judge," said Harkness. "We must do the job ourselves. I'll get that deed. I'll get it to-night, and we'll burn it."

"And Howard will hang Francisco sooner or later," remarked the judge.

"The Commissioners will declare the estate to be forfeited, and we'll buy it in for a mere song, eh?"

"Sure!" cried Harkness.

Harkness Uses His Gun.

DAVID HOWARD rode up once more to the Rancho de los Coyotes, where he saw Dolores in the courtyard. The girl still looked pale and worn, but her face lighted up when she saw the young American approaching.

Soon the two were seated at a little table on the veranda. For Dolores had invited Howard to stay for lunch. The girl noticed that the captain of the Rangers seemed to be pre-occupied, as indeed he was, for he did not know how to introduce the topic of El Puma.

"Why do you call us 'gringos'?" asked Howard presently, not that he cared in the least why the word was used, but because he felt that he must say something in response to the girl's gay chatter.

"I don't quite know," replied Dolores. "Some say it's because of a song your soldiers sang, something about a flag."

"A green flag they carried? Yes, I expect that is the reason," said Howard. "I know the song." He began to sing the words in a low voice.

"The green goes over the hill, my boys,
The green goes over the hill."

"That's it," cried Dolores—laughing. "The green goes—gringos! But I won't say the word again if you don't like it."

She smiled charmingly on the young captain, and he forgot El Puma instantly. Seizing a glass of wine, he stood up.

"I drink to love—and to you!" he cried, his grave face transfigured with eager excitement.

Dolores rose to her feet, looking startled. For many days she had been playing with fire, and now she realised suddenly that the game had become earnest.

"Surely you must know—I love you," said Howard softly. "And you, Dolores, could you be my wife?"

"I can't tell you—I can't!" cried the girl wildly, as the young man came forward. "Don't touch me, don't! Oh, you must go away! Go now!"

"Is it because of your brother, Dolores?" asked Howard gravely. "There is a rumour that he is El Puma. The judge thinks so."

Dolores, without a vestige of colour in her cheeks, faced the captain of the Rangers undauntedly, though she was almost fainting with fear.

"Tell the judge he is in Mexico," she whispered. "Tell him—if you love me—tell him that!"

A footstep sounded behind them, and Rosita Garcia came up, to look in astonishment from one to the other.

"Oh, Rosita, take me in!" cried Dolores wildly, throwing herself into her friend's arms.

"What have you been doing to frighten her so, Senior Howard?" asked Rosita reproachfully. "Come with me, Dolores. What have we to do with any gringo? Go away, Senior Capitan, and leave her to me!"

Howard rode back to Los Angeles in a very unenviable state of mind. He was sure now that the rumour was true. He was almost sure, too, that Dolores loved him, as he loved her. And he had made it his business to hang her brother!

"Rosita, they suspect the truth," gasped Dolores, when the girls were alone. "Senior Howard said there is a rumour that Francisco is El Puma."

"We must warn him," replied Rosita calmly. "Pedro came down this morning to see the fathers at the mission, and he is still somewhere about. I'll give him a message, and I don't fear that the Rangers will catch him. He's got Francisco's best horse."

Pedro was given a message, and rode off. Some of the Rangers saw him making for the mountains and gave chase, but he easily outdistanced them, and late in the afternoon he arrived safely at the bandit's camp.

"What news, Pedro?" asked El Puma, as his follower came up.

"I saw the fathers and gave them the money you sent," replied Pedro. "I told them a friend had sent it. Then I saw the Senorita Garcia, and she gave me a message for you." Pedro dropped his voice to a whisper before he went on. "She wants to see you to-night."

Francisco well knew that he was taking his life in his hands to venture near the ranch, but he had promised to go if Rosita sent for him, so when darkness fell he took Juan and some of his best men and set off.

Rosita spent the whole evening in the chapel, praying for her lover's safety. The hour grew late, and at last she rose from her knees, for she had heard the

"My father is dead—murdered," he said bitterly. "With his dying breath he asked me to give you this—" sound of a galloping horse. A moment later Francisco came in.

"Why did you scud for me, Rosita?" he asked, as they embraced.

"To warn you. They suspect who you are, for Captain Howard of the Rangers told Dolores to-day. You can't go on like this, Francisco. Think of your father and your sister. He seems quite an old man now, and Dolores is like a white ghost."

"And you, Rosita?" asked Francisco gently.

"Yes, think of me, too. I can't go on in fear all the time. If I were only with you—take me away with you, now, to-night!"

"I wish I could, Rosita," said Francisco, "but there's a price on my head."

"Rosita, Rosita!" called Dolores from the house.

"I suppose I must go now," said the girl. "If you want me, send for me."

One passionate embrace, one last word, and El Puma vanished into the night, while Rosita went into the house. Two minutes later a man rode up very quietly, and crept furtively towards the door. It was Harkness, bent on stealing the deed of grant. He was still at the foot of the steps when the door opened and Don Mariano appeared.

"Is that you, Francisco?" cried the old man eagerly.

"I'm Harkness, the Land Commissioner," came the reply "and in the name of the Government I demand that deed of grant."

"What!" cried the don. "Senor Howard told me—"

"Darn Howard!" growled Harkness. "Give me that deed, or—"

Harkness raised his gun threateningly, but Don Mariano, old and feeble though he was, showed no sign of fear. "Gomez! Diego!" he cried. "Help! A thief!"

Harkness lost his head, and did what he had not the least intention of doing when he set out. He pressed the trigger of his gun, and the old don fell just as two or three servants came running up. The Land Commissioner ran for his horse, and galloped like a madman down the road that Francisco had taken a few minutes before.

El Puma had just met Juan, whom he had left on guard, when there came the sound of a shot. The bandits drew rein and listened. A minute later Harkness rode furiously past, spurring desperately, and not even noticing El Puma and Juan.

"That was Harkness," said Francisco. "I'm going back to see who fired that shot."

The two men returned to the ranch-house, and found everything there in wild confusion. The old don had been carried in, and lay on a bed, dying, while Dolores, Rosita and the servants wept around him.

"Is that you, Francisco?" said Don Mariano feebly as his son entered.

Francisco stooped over the bed and kissed the old man's forehead. Then he stood upright, his brow dark and his eyes burning with an expression that made the onlookers shudder.

"Who did this?" he asked in a low, stern voice.

"I heard someone. I thought it was you!" gasped the dying man. "It was Harkness, and he came to steal the deed. See if it is still safe in the chest."

Francisco went to an old chest in the corner, and after a moment's search he found the deed and brought it to his father.

"Ah, it's safe," muttered the don. "Now, Francisco, see that this deed is October 17th, 1931."

given into the hands of the Senor Capitan Howard. Dolores will need protection, and you cannot give it. I trust the Senor Howard, and he loves your sister."

"Oh, father!" sobbed Dolores, "Don't talk so much. You must lie still and rest."

"I am dying, child," said the old man, "and I must speak. Francisco, you think you're helping your people, but you're not. You're only creating more distrust. The new order of things is here. It will do—no good—to fight."

The last words came in a faint whisper, and a moment later Don Mariano was dead. Francisco stood looking down on his father's body for a second, and then turned to go out.

"Where are you going?" cried Dolores and Rosita together.

"I'm going to give the grant to Howard," replied Francisco. "Do you love this American, Dolores?"

"I love him better than anyone in the world, except you and father!" cried Dolores, her body shaking with bitter sobs.

"Well, I'm going to see two men," said Francisco quietly. "El Senor Capitan Howard—and one other!"

El Puma's Revenge.

WITH frantic haste Harkness rode into Los Angeles, and found the judge in his room at the Bella Union Hotel.

"Well, did you get it?" asked Travers eagerly.

"No!" gasped Harkness. "I—I shot him—the don, I mean. He came out and called for his men, and I pressed the trigger instinctively. I didn't mean to shoot the old man."

"Is he dead?" queried Travers.

"I think so, and I'm off to Spanish Gulch in the morning to avoid suspicion. And remember we've been playing cards here all the evening."

"Of course we have," replied the judge. "No one saw you, I suppose?"

"Only the old don," said Harkness confidently, for he had not the least idea that El Puma was even then on his track.

Francisco had gone out from the house to find Juan on guard.

"My father has been shot—murdered by Harkness," he said. "Now listen. I've no time for mourning. I'm going to avenge him."

"I'm with you, Don Francisco!" cried Juan savagely.

"No," said Francisco. "While I go to Los Angeles, you will arrange a change of horses for me on the road to the border. Have good horses at Santa Anna and Santa Catalina and San Diego. I'm going back to Mexico."

"Pedro and Felipe are waiting for us up the road," said Juan. "I'll send them on to see to the horses."

"That will do," said Francisco. "Then go to the camp and tell the men. Let each man go quietly to his home. To-night is the end of El Puma."

Juan rode off, and Francisco went down alone into Los Angeles. He found the town in darkness, save for the hotel, where a few convivial spirits were still drinking in the bar, and lights still shined at the upper windows.

El Puma's spies had done him good service, and he knew which rooms were occupied by Howard and Harkness. Leaving his horse tethered outside, he shinned up a pillar, scrambled on to a balcony, and came to Howard's window.

The captain of the Rangers was there, studying a map. David Howard was still torn between love and duty, and, though he seemed to be making notes from the map of all the places in which it was possible that El Puma might have a hide-out, he was thinking all the time of Dolores Delfino.

A slight noise at the window made Howard look up to see a tall Mexican step into the room.

"El Senor Capitan Howard?" said the newcomer. "I am sorry to intrude, senor, but you did me a service at Spanish Gulch, and I have come to repay it. I am Francisco Delfino."

Howard stared at the young don without replying, and after a pause Francisco spoke again.

"My father is dead—murdered, and I know who shot him," he said bitterly. "With his dying breath he asked me to give you this—the deed of grant to the Rancho de los Coyotes. Will you take charge of it, senor? My sister Dolores—"

"I've heard that Dolores' brother and El Puma are the same man," interrupted Howard, taking the parchment.

"And I've heard that Dolores Delfino loves the Senor Howard," replied Francisco quietly. "That is one of the reasons why El Puma is disbanding his men and leaving for Mexico to-night."

"I have promised the citizens of Los Angeles to hang El Puma," replied Howard; "but I will give Dolores' brother ten minutes to leave the town if he really is going to Mexico."

"Very well, senor," said Francisco. "I agree to that, if you will tell the Senorita Garcia—you know her, I think."

"Yes; I have seen her at the ranch," answered Howard.

"If you will tell her to meet me in Mexico City in a week's time, at the house where I stayed when I was there. My servant Juan will show her where it is."

"I will do that," said Howard; "but I warn you that after the ten minutes I shall gather a posse, and do my best to catch you."

"I thank you for the ten minutes," replied Francisco. "Adios, senor!"

He swung out of the window and disappeared. Howard carefully locked up the deed of grant, took out his watch, and waited for the ten minutes to pass.

Francisco crept cautiously along the balcony to the room which Harkness occupied, and peered in. The room was empty. He slipped down into the street, saw that his horse was ready, and walked boldly into the saloon. There at the bar, with his back to the door, stood Harkness, with the judge and a few other men.

Harkness in a glass opposite saw the reflection of Francisco as he entered, and the Land Commissioner turned instantly. Several other men did the same as a cry of "El Puma!" was raised.

"Yes, senors, El Puma!" cried Francisco, and two guns barked at almost the same moment, as the young don and Harkness both fired. But the Mexicans was a shade quicker, and Harkness slumped against the bar counter, and then slid to the floor, dead, while his bullet passed harmlessly over Francisco's shoulder.

In two strides El Puma was through the door, with bullets splintering the woodwork behind him. Another moment, and he was on his horse, galloping down the street.

David Howard came down, and the men gathered around him.

"He's gone south, captain!" yelled a dozen voices.

In a few minutes Howard was leading a posse of riders southwards. Out of the town they galloped, and away on the trail towards the far-off Mexican border.

(Continued on page 25.)

A young police-officer undertakes to rid the town of a desperate gang of gunmen and racketeers. A gripping story of action and thrills, starring John Holland, Robert Gleckler, Edmund Breese and Catherine Dale Owen.

"This Crime Wave Must Cease!"
ANOTHER shooting affray—man riddled by machine-gun bullets—and have you arrested anyone? No!"

The speaker shot out the last word in a rasping growl. A grey-haired man with a much-lined face. He wore a smart morning-coat, butterfly collar and grey tie, and well-cut pin-stripe trousers. The bright, alert eyes were very angry, and the other two men looked distinctly uncomfortable. No wonder, because the commissioner was in a very bad temper.

On the big desk were a number of newspapers, and the commissioner jabbed his finger dramatically on one headline when he received no answer.

"Look what the Press are saying!" he cried. "What are the police doing? Will this crime wave go on without anything being done? Why doesn't the chief arrest the gang? And a lot more bunk."

The heavily built officer in the blue uniform, with four stripes on his cuff and three stars on his peaked cap and lapels, fingered his thick grey moustache whilst furtively eyeing his superior.

"I wish the Press could be put on the spot," the Chief of Police answered. "They do more harm than good."

The third man was a big, handsome fellow in a suit of blue cloth. Dark hair and moustache, broad of shoulder, and the brown eyes were full of sympathy for his superior. The commissioner had got them both on the mat, but it was the chief who had to take the responsibility. Ted Muldoon was only the head of the detective force, and obeying orders.

"It's not easy when fighting a bunch of rattlesnakes," commented the detective. "They've got money, and there's such a thing as graft. Besides, commissioner, the station is very much under full complement."

Commissioner Lang frowned at the detective.

"I know all that, and I don't want to hear it again." He banged his desk. "Something's got to be done—and sharp! I've spoken about this before, and yet things are going from bad to worse. We were under-staffed then, and you know as well as I do that we're likely to remain so for months. New York and Chicago have had a crime wave, and they've taken a lot of our best men, but we are expected to carry on just the same. I leave it to your imagination to guess what sort of criticism I have received from headquarters. I've got to take sterner methods."

The police commissioner had a very great admiration for the chief, Detective Muldoon, and the rest of the police force, but this morning he was almost frantic. For weeks headquarters had been rowing him over the increasing crime wave in Lincoln, and his nerves were frayed to their limit. This morning especially, because the mail had brought another censure and information that was far from encouraging.

"We're doing our best, sir." The chief shook his head. "Hardly a man has had a decent night's sleep for weeks. The main trouble is that the town's scared. The people know that by seeing nothing and saying still little, they'll keep out of trouble. They've no desire to be put on the 'spot,' and one can't blame 'em. Several valuable witnesses have either been plugged or intimidated or bribed. It is also common knowledge that we're considerably under strength."

"Your arguments are sound enough, chief, but they don't help." The commissioner got to his feet and paced restlessly up and down his room. "I've got to do something"—he paused to give both men a quick, meaning glance—"even to a change of those in command. That may not do a scrap of good, but that'll be the only thing that will pacify headquarters, except the suppression of some of the crooks. Something's got to be done within the next few weeks, or else we'll have changes."

"I see what you mean, sir." The chief had a wife and three children—the prospect of a reduction to captain meant a sad loss of prestige and salary. "A bright look-out, with Joe Valet thinking of making Lincoln his headquarters. Guess New York ought to do something now that gunman is coming here."

"New York has made it so hot for Valet that he's decided to have a change of climate." The lined face of the commissioner twisted in a sarcastic grin. "And New York don't want Valet or his thugs back again, and they knew that if they get rid of the extra police that's what he will do—the same applies to Chicago. I'm not wanting to be hard, chief, but I'm at my wits' end. I keep on giving you time to do something, and nothing is done. You are up against it, but that doesn't help me out, so unless Terone and Valet are arrested or driven from Lincoln, I've got to make changes."

"Valet is darned sight cuter than Terone!" growled Muldoon. "Terone's a half-caste Mexican, and handier with a knife than a gun. Valet's not only slick with a gun, but he's got brains and a gang that stick at nothing."

"Well, sir, I must try to carry out your instructions." The chief shrugged his shoulders in a helpless gesture. "Can you give me a week or so of grace before making these changes?"

"I can." The commissioner softened.

"You're too honest, chief, that's your trouble. You won't arrest anyone unless you think it's your man. So take my tip and arrest on the least suspicion." His voice became alert again. "And now, chief, have you any plans for dealing with this man Valet? He arrives by air to-morrow. Just like a gunman's nerve to make no secret of the fact he is coming to Lincoln."

"Valet's wanted for a killing down in Ohio." The chief's eyes were alight with a desperate chance of making good. "Valet may not know that an old companion, whom he side-lined, has squealed. I happened to get this information this morning, and it's enough for a warrant to arrest. I also want to put Captain Houston on this job."

"Bill Houston." The commissioner gave the chief an inquiring glance. "Any particular reason or scheme?"

Commissioner Lang had a charming daughter—his only child. Alice was twenty and a very great friend of Captain William Houston, and there were rumours that soon they were to be engaged. Houston was a comparative newcomer to Lincoln, having been sent to many stations in the last few years. His fine service had gained him promotion, and the capture of some notorious outlaws on the borders of Southern California had produced a captaincy. Whilst on a much-needed vacation in Los Angeles he had met Alice, who was on a visit to relations, and the two had become fast friends. Maybe Alice had had something to do with Houston being posted to Lincoln when there came a vacancy through illness.

Three months Houston had been in Lincoln, and during that time the chief had come to find in this young man a tower of strength. The few arrests that had been made were due to Houston.

The chief openly praised the young man.

"I'm not saying this to please you, sir, but Houston is a very capable officer. If it weren't for Bill and Muldoon I don't know where we should be. Most of the patrolmen are raw men, and my officers good fellows but not overburdened with brains. Houston fears no one, and he can't be bought. I'd like Bill to have full power to act as he pleases, because I believe bulldog, rough-shod methods will win this fight!"

"Want Bill to fight them all?"

"That lad has strength and a quick wit," was the answer. "With Muldoon's help he can tackle these scum. I shall assist in every way, but there is so much work in the office in regard to smaller cases that I cannot spare all my time to Terone and Valet. I'm sure that Captain Houston is just the lad to handle this sort of job."

"I think you're right, chief," admitted the commissioner. "I've a strong idea that my daughter is with Houston. She's gone slumming, and I made Bill act as a bodyguard. Directly he comes in I'd like to see the lad, and—"

The commissioner held out his hand to the sturdy, erect chief of police. "I trust we have no ill-feeling, but duty is duty, and I am only obeying orders."

"Can't blame you, sir," answered the chief. "Though I wish headquarters would give us a full complement and not expect miracles. I'll send Houston to you as soon as he arrives."

Muldoon and Houston Make Their Plans.

A CLEAN-SHAVEN, broad-shouldered young giant stood bare-headed by the side of a smart two-seater car. Brown eyes smiled down into blue. The driver and owner of the car was a charming, fair-haired young girl; obvious that Alice Lang was very much attached to the handsome young police officer.

"I'm sorry pop's put you on this new job." A frown creased her smooth forehead. "You must be very careful, Bill."

"Terone and Valet will have to be careful as well," came his laughing reassurance. "These gnyes are pretty yellow if you show a firm hand. Now I must be moving, honey, as I've a conference with Muldoon. If I can't look in after supper I will ring."

With proud eyes Bill Houston watched the girl of his dreams drive away. What a lucky chap he was to be loved by the prettiest and sweetest girl in Lincoln.

Briskly he turned and strode into the station. Duty must come first, and everything must be given up in this battle against the gunmen. Houston loathed gunmen and racketeers.

Detective Muldoon was waiting in Houston's own office, and the two men put their heads together.

"We know all about Terone." Muldoon pushed his soft felt hat to the back of his head. "A nasty little rat, who has several very good burrows and is mighty careful not to take too many risks. All the bootlegging round here is due to Terone, and that guy put on the spot was a would-be rival. The local Press made an awful song about the shooting in order to sell their trashy papers."

"I've seen Terone a score of times," admitted Houston. "But there's not enough to run him for a long stretch. We want that guy for keeps and we must get the evidence. In a way I'm glad this gunman is coming to the town. They may try some big coup, and then we'll get the whole bunch."

"Joe Valet will certainly start something," Muldoon laughed. "I had a slight brush with Joe when I was stationed in Chicago. He's one of those cool and casual sort of men whom you would not think capable of hurting a fly, but, by gosh, he's dangerous! He'll have a man bumped off and never turn a hair. If you serve in Valet's gang you stick if you value your life; start a squeal, and before you've opened your mouth he's got you. I trailed him for a month, and one day he nicked this chip out of my ear, and I got a message next mail to lay off. I was just mad to go after him, but the powers sent me off on a job in another town. I'll be glad to meet Joe again."

"What's Terone doing about Valet?"

"I've made a few inquiries round Conway, and it's common property that they're starting a partnership."

"I'd like to clean up Conway," decided Houston. "That area down by the river is alive with thugs and rafs that want exterminating. So Valet and Terone are becoming partners. How do you think they'll hit it off, Ted?"

"Valet will want to be the boss, Bill," Muldoon was decided. "He'll discuss plans with Terone, but Valet will do the bossing, and if Terone don't like it I'm mighty sure he'll get put in his place—pronto as they say in the West."

"This dope about Valet coming by air—is it genuine?"

"Genuine and reliable, but I don't think Valet will have broadcast the glad tidings. The message to Terone was intercepted, and that's how we know."

"How about a little party of welcome, Ted?"

"That's my idea." Muldoon straightened his shoulders. "If we arrest Valet on arrival we can hold him for that K.L. in Ohio. His Highness can be sent back to Chicago to await trial and—"

"The commissioner won't pester the poor old chief quite so much," chuckled Houston. "You arrest Valet and any of his gang that are with him, but be sure to go well armed. Better go a dozen strong, because Terone may be at the aerodrome. Bring Valet to my office. Should there look like trouble down at the aerodrome ring me, but otherwise leave me out. Let plain-clothes men try this out—the sight of flatfoots might start a fight."

Memories of the Trenches.

NEXT day a triumphant Ted Muldoon burst into Houston's office.

"Got Joe and the Kid—that's his right-hand man." He threw out his broad chest. "Got 'em both outside. Gee, wasn't Joe surprised to see me. I had hardly any trouble."

"Good for you, Ted," Houston laughed, then asked a question. "How about friend Terone?"

"Was there with all his little bunch. They were all dolled up for the occasion. Reckon Terone had prepared an address of welcome. We lay low when the plane landed and watched the meeting. Joe's face set like a mask when he saw that bunch, and I heard him talk. 'Say, what's the best idea. Reckon with all you guys around must be a sure tip to the cops.'"

"What did Terone say?"

"Looked kinda green," chuckled Muldoon. "Then got boastful and said there was no need to get scared. Joe got riled at that and said he wasn't scared of any cop, but he didn't believe in advertising his whereabouts. Then I gave my lads the tip."

"And you quietly stole up behind." Houston gave a knowing nod. "How did they act?"

"I didn't give Valet much of a chance," Muldoon smiled. "I jabbed a gun in his ribs and the boys covered the Kid and Terone's bunch. 'You're Joe Valet,' I said, 'and I've got a warrant for your arrest.' Both men parked guns, but they made no sign of resistance. Terone's gang, seeing I was a dozen strong, were too scared to try any tricks. Valet only spoke once more to Terone. 'Thanks for your welcome to this city. Maybe you'll be a wise guy some time.' Then Valet fastened those solemn eyes on me and, without a smile, said: 'You're a persistent sort of fool, Ted! How's your car?'"

"A humorist?"

"Yes, but his humour ain't funny." Muldoon shivered. "There was a cold, steely light in Valet's eyes when he said that, and I frankly confess I shall be glad to see him under lock and key. There's a cast in one eye that makes him look malignant. Still, Valet came quietly enough, and we brought him and the Kid straight along to the station. Almost a bit too easy for my liking."

"You seem to have a high respect for this man Valet." Bill Houston gave a sly chuckle. "Guess I'll brace myself for the ordeal. I think you might bring Valet in and let me meet this sinister gunman."

Handcuffed by the wrists, two men were pushed by husky police officers into the room.

Houston had his head bent over his desk as if the arrest of a master-gunner was a minor affair.

Joe Valet fingered his small moustache with his free hand, but otherwise showed no sign of perturbation. It looked as though he were in a mighty tight corner, but there was no reason to let the cops see that. If he did get free there would be a settlement with that fool Terone for making all that show—he blamed the dago more than anyone.

"Get Watson to hospital," Houston ordered. "Valet and the Kid have escaped—they plugged Watson!"

Idly Valet glanced at the police officer, and then a flicker appeared and was gone. That curly head was familiar, and then Houston looked up.

The two men stared at each other, and slowly in the eyes of each appeared the light of dawning recollection.

"Phil Terry!" Bill Houston jumped to his feet. "What in the name of goodness brings you here? I've often wondered what became of you."

"Howdy, Bill?" drawled the gunman. "When I met my old sparring partner I never expected to find a cop."

"Let's shake to old times," Houston, now that the first surprise had passed, wondered why Terry made no effort to hold out his hand. He pushed his own hand forward in an effort to grip his old friend's hand, and then his eyebrows went up in a question. Houston had seen the handcuffs on the right hand, and now his fingers moved aside a coat-sleeve and saw that the two men were linked together.

"That gets you guessing." The gunman gave a mirthless laugh. "We meet again, but under somewhat unusual circumstances."

Houston shot Muldoon an inquiring glance and read the answer.

"Are you Joe Valet?" he demanded of the man he called Terry.

"That's my monicker."

"So Phil Terry has become Joe Valet, gunman!" Houston was bewildered. "I'll wake up soon and find I'm dreaming."

"What's so strange about it, Bill?" Valet seemed indifferent and a little amused. "I was always a wanderer and adventurer. You knew nothing of my pre-war record, and I didn't shout it round the trenches. The War came when things were getting a bit warm for me, and it was a way out. I did my part and by luck got through—thanks to you."

"Did the wound affect your brain?" "Badly wounded, you got me to safety," Valet spoke evenly, and the east in his eye seemed more pronounced. "For months I was in hospital, and not fit for much when I was discharged. I went back to the old game and have no regrets."

"I'm sorry, Phil," Houston sighed. "You were always a bloodthirsty soldier. You know you're wanted for a killing in Ohio?"

"So that's come through," Valet pursed his lips and gave the Kid a knowing glance. "That was a bungled slow-down. The guy who died, Bill, won't ever wear wings. I got no compunction about killing squealers—I'm not admitting any hand in this affair, but just stating I'd kill squealers and laugh. Squealers and fools, Bill, I can't abide. I think you're a bit of a fool to have become a flatfoot."

"Opinions differ." Now Houston was smiling. "I'm on the right side of the law."

"You always were that way," Valet gave a scornful laugh. "Remember how I wanted to raid the quartermaster's stores one night and you got so sore? Remember those sardines and other junk that I swore came from home?"

"Yeah, I remember." "Well, you're a fence," Valet showed his white teeth in a grin. "They all came from the quartermaster's store."

"Lucky I didn't ask too many questions," Houston became once more the officer. "Well, Phil or Joe, I've got to put you behind bars. You'll go to Chicago as soon as an escort arrives. Sorry, but not my fault."

Houston gripped the gunman's left hand and there came an answering response.

"Not the first time," said Valet.

"Maybe I'll see you afore I go."

"Sure," Houston nodded to the officers to show the interview was at an end, then stayed the police as he remembered something. "Phil, do you still cut out silhouettes?"

"Thinking of the one I did of the German prisoner?"

"Yeah, and how darned angry I got when you punched him for not keeping still."

"That's my bad blood," Valet shook his head. "I'm a bad case, Bill. Come and see me if you get a spare minute."

"Maybe you can do another of those silhouettes?" Houston nodded to the officers. "Count on me to come along within an hour."

Joe Valet and the Kid were led away, the officers went, leaving only Detective Muldoon with the young captain.

"That's a queer meeting," ruminated Houston. "I ran away from school to join up—I was fifteen at the time, so you can work out my present age. With the gunners in action I ran across Phil Terry. He was a queer youngster, but quite fearless and wild. His reckless nature must have appealed to me and we became queer friends. He was always before the colonel for some scrape, and many a time I got him out of a jam. He always swore he would lead a reckless life and die as he had lived. Still, Muldoon, I liked him, and I'm danged sorry."

"It's a queer world," was all the detective could think to say.

The Telegram.

THE Kid was a typical underworld type with his broken nose, ugly mouth and small piggy eyes. He was in shirt-sleeves and perspiring freely.

"This is a nasty jam, boss."

"Sure it's a nasty jam," Valet leaned against the stout bars of the cell. "I never thought that fool Terone would act like an advertising agent, nor did I think the cops would have had the nerve to run us. I'd heard Lincoln was quaking in their shoes, but they've got two men who ain't scared in Muldoon and Houston. Muldoon ain't much, but Houston's different."

"Ain't getting soft, are yer, boss?"

"Your brains aren't your strongest point, Kid," sneered Valet. "I never

October 17th, 1931.

allow feelings to stand in my way. Houston has what you haven't got." He touched his forehead. "And I haven't forgotten what he was like in France. I don't fear much, Kid, but I'm a coward where Houston's concerned. What's more, if he starts out on a thing he's a stickler. If you told Bill to get through two lines of Hunns he would do it somehow."

"What we gonna do?"

"Dunno. That Ohio killing is another thing I didn't aim would come through to the cops yet awhile." Valet peered through the bars. "If I could get away from this place I'd show those cops something."

"Expect Terone ain't sorry." The Kid was somewhat of a pessimist. "He'll be king of the castle again."

"A cheap sap," sneered Valet. "One of those nasty slimy knife-throwers I would enjoy taking for a ride. Shush!" Valet waved a hand to his underling. "Pipe down, Kid; here comes Houston."

William Houston held a slip of paper in his hand, and Valet knew that it was a telegram.

"A code message that's just been intercepted," drawled the police captain. "It purports to come from your mother and was sent care of Terone."

"I still have a mother and she's alive." Valet never flickered an eyelid. "I happen to be rather fond of the old lady. She lives in Chicago and, strange as it may seem, is mighty fond of her black sheep of a son. Actually, Bill, she knows very little of my business. To her I am Phil Terry, shipping clerk. You may have seen me occasionally writing letters in the trenches—they were to my mother. You say she's written to me in code?"

Valet was a clever actor as he looked bewildered.

"That beats me. Like to give me an idea of what she's said?"

"Oh, it sounds reasonable enough," admitted Houston. "But I still think it might be in code."

"Did you ever find me a liar, Bill?" Valet smiled.

"I admit that I never found you out," laughed Houston. "I'll read it to you."

The Kid and Joe Valet were tense with expectancy.

"Sorry you have gone away. Am sending two parcels on to you—"

Houston paused to eye Valet inquiringly.

"One's a new suit of clothes, and I guess the other parcel must be cigars." Valet rubbed his chin. "Can't think of anything else. She's a dear old soul."

"Am sending two parcels on to you at once," Houston went on reading. "Everything all right at home. Wire me your permanent address. Your worried mother."

"Sing-Sing may be my permanent address." Valet gave a quiet chuckle. "Still, it's no good crying over spilt milk. I'm sorry for the old lady." One eye flickered a glance at the Kid. "I hope I'll be here when those two parcels arrive."

"You'll be here until your escort turns up," announced Houston, and passed the message through the bars. "I'm taking your word this is from your mother."

"Thanks, Bill." Valet gave the piece of paper a glance, then carelessly stuffed it in his pocket. "What a fine chance this could be, Bill. In the war you and I were buddies, fighting on the same side, but now we're on opposite sides, yet—" He coughed slightly. "And yet what a clean-up it would be if we still worked together."

October 17th, 1931.

"Meaning?" Houston grinned slightly.

"If you and I went hand-in-hand," spoke Joe Valet. "Like Jack and Jill going up the hill. I on the outside and you on the inside. No one would ever get wise and—"

"That'll be quite enough," interposed Houston. "This place is a police-station, but for the sake of argument we will imagine that your cell is the German lines, and where I stand is the front line of the Allies. Do you get my meaning?"

"Clearly, Bill—we're enemies!—yes!" Houston studied his watch. "I've got work to do. See you again, Valet, before you leave."

The gunman stared thoughtfully after the young officer, then gave a contemptuous snort as he turned to the smiling Kid.

"My name oughta be George Washington," he whispered. "Though I must say I didn't over enjoy that bluff. Houston's kinda different. Can't help admiring a man, Kid, for sticking to his principles, even though they are sheer punk." He took from his pocket the telegram. "Lucky Terone had the sense to tell my lads about this jam—maybe I'll forgive Terone." His smile was benign but sinister. "If we get out of this. If Houston knew what this meant he would have a fit. Hope the boys pick out two good parcels."

"They'll send Leopold and Pop." The Kid rubbed his hands together. "By gar, I'll be glad to get out of this place."

"Not so loud, fool!" rasped Valet. "The walls in here have ears. Come close, we gotta rehearse our plans when those two parcels arrive. Reckon the time to act will be on the way to the railway-station, and we mustn't fail."

"You mean, boss?" The Kid's face was white and drawn.

"You know as well as I do that the shooting in Ohio is enough to send us to the chair." Valet drew his confederate close. "Nothing has got to stop us making our getaway."

The Escape.

CAPTAIN HOUSTON was seated in his office when Detective Muldoon announced that the escort had arrived.

"Here sooner than I expected," commented Houston. "They should go by the four o'clock. I expect you've got through to the railway, Ted?"

"I have, and the escort are now with the prisoners." Ted Muldoon lit a cigarette. "We'll soon have those two off our hands. The police car is outside and everything's set."

"The papers of the escort in order?"

"Sure they were." Muldoon seemed surprised. "What made you ask that question?"

"We've arrested Valet and disposed of him in too easy a style." Houston scowled at his writing-pad. "Joe was a queer card in the war, but he had an uncanny way of achieving whatever he set out to do. This looks like finish for Joe, and yet he doesn't seem a bit perturbed. I've seen him twice in the cells, and he's all smiles and bright chat, as if he were going on a picnic." He gave his friend a hard glance and his voice was serious. "Joe knows that there's a chair at the end of this ride."

"He's a cool hand. No good showing the white feather."

"White feather be darned!" growled Houston. "I know Valet is brave enough, but he's so cool that I'm suspicious."

"What of, Bill?"

"Dunno." Houston ran a pencil through his hair in a worried gesture. "Has the chief had a talk to the escort, explained their responsibility and told them to take no chances?"

"The chief's done all that." Muldoon had never seen his friend and colleague so jumpy. "It's all over bar the shouting."

"Glad you think so. Who's driving the car?"

"Watson. Prisoner and escort in the back. I thought of going with them."

"Ted, I'll go along." Houston pushed his chair back. "I'm going to see our friends off myself. Will you stay around my office till I get back?"

The prisoners and escort were waiting.

"Good-bye, Bill." Valet gave a twisted grin. "Hope Lincoln has a nice time when we're gone. Give my love to Terone."

"I would rather give him a sock on the jaw!" cried the frank-spoken Houston. "Best get moving, boys."

Usually he took stock of the two plain-clothes men. One was a big, heavily-built man with rather too much fat in the wrong parts. Dull but amiable, decided Houston, and passed on to the second man. Sallow, slightly foreign type, silent and reserved—probably the more intelligent of the two. Houston wondered why the police used these half-caste fellows for such important work. Perhaps appearances were deceptive.

Houston did not see the lock that passed between Valet and the dark escort.

"Good-bye, Bill!" cried Valet. "Oh, I'm coming along to the station," grunted Bill, and wondered why Valet looked distinctly annoyed. "Want to see you on the way, Phil."

"Guess I'd have preferred the parting here." The crook seemed perturbed. "Better know me as Joe Valet—that other part of my life is a closed book."

"Have it your own way." Houston motioned the prisoners and escort to get into the car and for Watson to start up the engine. "Don't forget to stand by at the office, Muldoon."

A wave to his detective friend and then the police car glided away, blaring its warning to pedestrians. Houston sat in his seat next to the driver and stared along the road. A quiet section of Lincoln lay ahead. Something made the police officer glance up at the mirror fixed above the windscreen for observing following traffic.

Houston stiffened. Why were the heads of the escort and prisoners so close together? A faint murmur also told him that the four men were whispering to each other. This could only mean one thing—treachery—a frame-up for an escape.

The angle of his head must have been noticed, also his interest in the mirror, because next moment a hand reached forward between the two officers and moved the mirror to an angle that prevented any observance of the actions of those behind.

William Houston had to think and act quickly. The escort were crooks, but how they had managed this business was a mystery, and they were probably armed.

Watson was aware that something was wrong, and glanced sideways at his superior for instructions. Houston made a turning motion with his hand—it meant switch off the engine and slow down.

And, as the driver obeyed, Houston whipped out his gun, but Valet had been expecting some such action. Hands gripped the police captain's throat, his peaked cap rolled off, and then there was a fearful crash on the base of the skull. The butt end of a revolver had done the deed. Vaguely, Houston heard the sound of a shot, and then knew no more.

When he opened his eyes Houston groaned, because his head ached abominably. He rubbed a spot on which was congealed blood and tried to recover his wits. Where was he? The police officer sat up and stared round. The car was under some trees on a quiet stretch of the road, and his companion was huddled over the wheel.

One glance round confirmed his fears. Valet, the Kid, and the escort were gone.

"Watson!" Houston shook the driver, but there came no response.

A closer glance, and then the youngster started back with a horrified look on his face. They had shot Watson and the officer was dead.

Out of the car he scrambled and glanced up and down the road. In the distance a few pedestrians and a car were approaching. The crooks had got clean away.

Quickly he drew Watson from his seat into the place where he had sat. Better not stop the approaching car as it would be as well to keep the shooting quiet. It would cause a sensation when it leaked out. Houston jumped into the driver's seat and was soon tearing back to headquarters, where a crowd at once collected.

"Get Watson to hospital," Houston ordered. "Valet and the Kid have escaped—they plugged Watson."

In Houston's office was Muldoon and two battered plain-clothes men—the real escort. They had been met on arrival by two supposed officers, and remembered little more till they woke up in a disused barn on the outskirts of Lincoln.

Valet and Terone.

THERE was a part of Lincoln known as the "Steps." It was close to a sluggish, winding river and was a locality best avoided after dark. Every big city has its slum neighbourhood and its doubtful district, and the Steps certainly answered that description. The police patrolled in couples after dark and were always on the alert.

Near the water-front Terone and his gang had several hide-outs, but the police did not know which one. There were secret passages between many of these old houses and crooks could live there like so many moles. The police were trying to get these houses destroyed and condemned, but so far had been unsuccessful.

In one of these houses Joe Valet and Terone met. Valet had been reinforced by five men who had come into the town by car. One of the bogus escort had been one of Terone's gang, and this man guided the gunman to the hide-out.

"Mighty glad to see you among us," Terone was a dark-skinned, oily Mexican half-caste, and he grinned, showing gleaming teeth. "Guess that get-away was well staged, eh?"

Joe Valet took no notice of the outstretched hand. He just scowled round the bare, dirty house and sniffed disdainfully.

"Gee, this is a hole," he sneered. "Have you guys got to live in this sort of a sink?"

"It's safer, Joe." Terone looked ill at ease at Valet's refusal to shake. The cast in his new partner's eye and the silent, sneering demeanour did not put him at his ease. "The cops know I'm down in the Steps, but they don't know which house. All these four houses are linked up with secret passages."

"Shouldn't broadcast the glad news," sneered Valet, and held out his hand at last. "Wouldn't stand for this sort of dive in Chicago or New York, but you should know Lincoln."

"I hear you bumped off a cop," whined Terone. "That was mighty bad business. They will be round this place like hornets."

"Showed fight and he got it," was the cold, icy reply. "Had to act quickly as there were some cars on the road. The gun had a silencer. The croaking of a cop don't make me waste any sleep—not the first I've had to shoot. What's more, Terone, it will show the town we mean business—be a warning to any folk round these parts who might aim to do some squealing to claim a reward."

"Guess you're right, though I wish you—" Terone saw the steady light in his partner's eyes and changed the subject. "Come right in, Joe, and make yourself at home."

Soon the air of the lounge was full of smoke. Terone's gang and Valet's made about fourteen strong. They lent back in their chairs, and between spasms of talk watched Valet and Terone. The two leaders had had a short conference and decided that for a day or two it would be advisable to lie low.

"How are funds?" Valet had asked.

"Good for a month."

"Then we'll get busy before the week's out," affirmed Valet, and picked up a pair of scissors. "Keep still, Terone, and I'll show you something." He chuckled softly to himself. "I can't sit still and scheme, must be doing something, so I amuse myself with this hobby. Sit still, Terone, like you were in the chair."

"Cut out those funny cracks." Terone jumped nervously, then uncomfortably avoided the other's amused glance. "Better get on with your hobby."

Joe Valet proceeded to cut away at a piece of paper, giving occasional glances at his model, whilst the rest of the gang watched. It was really a marvellous likeness, and Terone's gang were all anxious to have a silhouette. Valet, in good humour after his narrow escape, was in an obliging mood, but at last he tired.

"Business, business." He waved them away and lit a cigarette. "Let's have a look at some of the newspapers. Expect the stop press of the midday papers will be pretty lurid, and I want to read the Society notes and scandal."

"Society notes." Terone screwed up his ugly mouth in a puzzled manner. "What's the big idea?"

Valet bestowed on the dago a sarcastic and contemptuous glance.

"Maybe I'll find something of interest," he explained. "You read these notes about people that are often very usual. Senator Wiggs and family have gone away; the Browns have had a fortune left them, and Miss Angela, the famous heiress, reported engaged to a chauffeur. What do I gather from three such bits of news, Terone?"

"Ask me another."

"If the Wiggs family are away the house is probably empty, and therefore presents possibilities; if the Browns have had a fortune left them I am interested, because I like fortunes and having come into unexpected wealth they may not

"They tricked me here, they threaten to kill me, but I'm not frightened. Come and get them, Bill, I'm at the Steps, near the river—" know how to look after it, and if Miss Angela falls for a chauffeur I know she might be easy and the chauffeur is probably out for money, easy to bribe, and a lot more. Little things, but I file them away and they come in mighty useful."

"Won't find much in our papers," affirmed Terone.

"You never know," Valet began to read. He scanned four newspapers before his "Ah" aroused instant attention.

"What yer found?" cried Terone.

"It is reported that the engagement of Captain William Houston to Alice, only daughter of Commissioner Lang, is shortly to be announced, and—" He broke off, grinned, and proceeded to cut out the paragraph. "You could have told me that, but you might have had no idea the information was of any value. This bit of Society gossip may be of use and it may not."

"In what way?"

"If we get in a jam," was the answer.

The Raid on the Green Dragon.

WILLIAM HOUSTON frowned at Muldoon, who looked gloomy.

"Combed the place, and we can't find them," the detective cried. "They'll have to come out soon. A week's gone by, and Valet doesn't usually love idleness. The papers and headquarters keep on clamouring for some retaliation, and because we're stuck aren't making things too easy."

"No, they're not," Houston shook his head. "We've got double the force round the Steps, and I'm certain sure both our men are skulking down in that cess-pit. Any news from No. 17?"

"Nope, but she's met Terone several times," Muldoon fingered his small moustache. "She reckons there isn't much love lost between the two men, and Terone sorta hinted to her that there were big things in the wind."

"Let's hope they start something soon!" Houston cried. "I'll be on night duty." The telephone-bell rang. "Hullo, hullo! Who? Oh, yes!" He motioned to Muldoon to take up the other receiver. "Want to come in?"

"No thanks, Bill." It was Valet speaking. "I thought I'd ring up and tell you I was well."

"You bumped off a pal of mine!" Houston's voice was harsh. "I'll get you for that if it takes me a lifetime!"

"Guessed you might be a bit het-up," Valet answered. "But your pal showed fight, and you spotted our game too soon. We had to act quick. Sorry you boys haven't found me yet."

"We will, Jec."

"Maybe I'll be seeing you soon. Give my love to your sweetie."

A harsh laugh, and Valet had rung off.

"Get that exchange and number," rapped Houston, "quick!"

There was a disappointed grin on Muldoon's face when the detective came back.

"That call came through from a sub-station," he snapped. "I guess Valet put through that call by means of those tapping-in machines. Link up with a main wire at any old place, and no means of trailing. Darned nerve about your sweetheart!"

"He's laughing now, but not for long!" Houston clenched a big fist. "I liked that guy once, though he was always cruel, but now I'm flat-out to get him. I'm relying a lot on No. 17."

It was soon after Valet had disconnected the 'phone to the wires that ran October 17th, 1931.

past the house in the Steps when the Kid came hurrying into the room.

"Boss, it's getting mighty warm outside!" he growled. "Take a look-see from the attic."

Terone and Valet saw enough to make one seared and the other angry. Every corner seemed to have a cop or a plain-clothes man.

"Guess that's a signal to get busy," decided Valet on their return. "Besides, I hate living here like a caged rat. What's the swell restaurant in this burg?"

"The Chandos is pretty swell," Terone gave the other an inquiring scrutiny.

"Have you an idea we—" "Yeah, you've said it," Valet paced the room. "To-night is the time as a Saturday should have a full house. Listen, and I'll tell you how I've pulled off these shows before."

For a while the two men talked, with the Kid occasionally making suggestions, then the rest of the gang were sent for and consulted.

"Everyone to be in their places by seven, and the time a quarter past," Valet gave his orders. "You will muster here about six, and I'll give you the once-over."

"What for?" demanded one of Terone's gang.

"Because you for one ain't going!" rasped out the gunman. "You'd look like a broken-down waiter in a dress suit. You others should pass inspection, and don't do any broadcasting. I have my ways of shutting mouths! Get going!"

Diners at the Chandos were somewhat annoyed that they had extras at their tables, men who sat themselves down and glared aggressively round, and looked as if they were little used to dress shirts. The men looked truculent, and most of the diners decided it was wisest to ignore their unwelcome guests. At isolated tables sat men and women.

In a far corner sat a man and a woman. Terone was quite presentable in his clothes, whilst the woman was fashionably gowned. By the way she smiled at the crook, it seemed as if she were much attached to him. Several times she squeezed his hand.

"You look grand to-night!" The crook had consumed considerable wine.

"You're a beautiful woman, Meg," he countered. "I'm terribly thrilled to think that Valet is coming here to-night. Will you introduce me?"

"Shush! Shush!" Terone touched his lips in a warning gesture. "Ain't wise, girl, to mention that name too loud." He looked at his watch. "Five minutes to seven. He'll be here soon."

The woman called Meg poured some more champagne into his glass.

"I hear he's one of these silent, awe-inspiring men," she whispered. "One look and you shrivel up, though that doesn't get past you."

"You bet it doesn't!" Terone boasted. "I'm not seared of any gunman. He couldn't have put this shew over to-night if it hadn't been for me. You're coming away with me, Meg, when we've cleaned up this place. We'll have to lie low for a spell."

"If you make a big haul I'll be with you." She gave him an arch glance. "Will I see his Highness before the fun starts?"

"Not till the half-hour," hissed Terone, gulping down the liquor. "He'll be here any moment, though he may stay around outside to see the coast's clear. A waiter will let Joe in by a side entrance." He pointed towards the main part of the restaurant. "See those two dames at that table?" He gave a heavy wink. "They're in with us. Gosh, we'll clear a pile! Look at the gems on that woman's neck!"

"Isn't that man over there being a little troublesome?" Meg pointed to a table at which three men and a girl were seated. "Can't you tip that fool to cut out the drink?"

"You're right, kid," growled Terone. "That's that drunken fool, Andy. I'll go and warn the big boob to keep a still tongue. He can bump 'em off later."

Terone staggered away, and directly he was gone Meg darted from her seat towards a big palm near the stairs. Behind was a writing-table and a crinoline doll. It was quiet in this corner. Not far away was a thick velvet hanging that concealed a doorway.

Meg removed the doll, and underneath was a 'phone.

"Police headquarters—at once!" she rapped out. A pause. "Is that headquarters? Put through to Captain Houston." Another pause. "This is No. 17 speaking, Bill. Valet and Terone have got it set for to-night at seven-thirty at the Chandos. Just got the dope from Terone; he's been drinking. You'll get at once—good!"

Meg was back in her chair when Terone staggered back to the table.

"Settled that boob. If he talks again he'll go for a ride in the morning!" he hiccupped drunkenly. "Let's have some more wine. Let's—" He broke off to stare over her shoulder. "Shush! Shush! He's here!"

Meg spun round as the velvet hanging was drawn aside.

There was no smile on Joe Valet's face as he stepped forward.

Terone ran forward to meet his partner.

"Joe, I wanta introduce you to my best girl," he cried. "She's one of us. Not a word to a soul."

"How do you do—No. 17?" Valet's voice was cold and hard. "I was behind that curtain. Unfortunately I didn't have the pleasure of hearing all you said till you gave your number. If I could have shot you in time, I would have done!"

The girl backed away with hand to ashen cheeks. There was murder in the gunman's blazing eyes.

"But, Joe, she's on the level," whined Terone.

"Shut up, you stinking dago!" spat out Terone. "A woman has only got to smile at you and your blab forth all our plans, you dirty, little squealing rat!"

"But, Joe, you don't mean that Meg—"

"Your Meg is a police spy," snarled Valet. "You've spilt the game to a nark. You've betrayed me, my men, and your own bunch of fools into Houston's hands."

Terone could not take his eyes from the steely glare. The fumes of the alcohol were fading and he was beginning to understand. His hand slithered down towards his hip.

"Keep your hand where it is," barked Valet, and drew out a whistle. "There's just a chance I'll win through yet." Three times he blew a shrill blast.

It was the signal to start the raid at once.

But Valet had not known all. Number Seventeen had warned Houston that Valet and Terone were planning a raid and two police cars were standing by. A matter of seconds after getting the warning the cars, crowded with police men, were racing through the half deserted streets.

What a surprise when the diners a

(Continued on page 25.)

Filled with precious jewels, this ancient statuette of a bird brought evil on all connected with it. A strange and gruesome thriller.

"The Maltese Falcon"

The Mystery Woman.

"THERE'S a girl outside to see you, Sam," said Effie, the very confidential secretary of Samuel Spade, private detective. "Name of Ruth Wonderly, and you'll see her. She's a knock-out."

Sam Spade smiled the smile of a charmer, a handsome charmer of the opposite sex who simply could not resist a pretty face.

"Send her in," he drawled. Miss Ruth Wonderly was shown into his sanctum. She was small, but what there was of her—was good. From the slenderness of her ankles to the languorous depths of her blue eyes she radiated appeal, an appeal that was accentuated just now by an air of nervousness and distress.

"Mr. Spade," she said in a low, urgent voice, as soon as they were alone. "could you—I mean, I thought that if you—"

"Perhaps you had better start at the beginning," Sam Spade murmured gently.

"That was in New York," Ruth Wonderly told him. "She met him there—my sister, I mean. And I must get her back home before mother and father return from Europe on the first of the month."

She was interrupted by the appearance of Miss Effie.

"Excuse me, Mr. Spade," the secretary apologized, in the formal tone she employed when clients were around. "Mrs. Archer is on the phone, and wishes to speak with you urgently."

Sam Spade frowned impatiently.

"All right," he muttered, "switch the call through to my room."

The secretary retired to the outer office, and found a man with a traveling-bag standing there.

"Oh, hallo, Mr. Archer," she greeted him, as she replaced the receiver of the telephone that stood on her desk. "Have a good trip?"

Archer had watched her hanging up the phone-receiver with a certain air of suspicion. A big, somewhat taciturn individual, Archer was Sam Spade's partner in the detection of crime, but of late he had detected something more personal than the ordinary run of cases which came under his attention in the way of business.

"Yes," he said, "I had a good trip. Found out all I wanted to know about the Retford affair. Will you put these on the desk in my room, please?" he added, producing some documents. "And you might get out the other papers dealing with the case, will you?"

Effie walked through to Archer's private sanctum, which adjoined Sam Spade's. The moment she had gone Archer lifted the receiver from the phone on the secretary's table and held it to his ear.

Archer heard the voice of his wife, Iva.

"I love you, Sam," she was saying. "but you sound so cold—"

"Listen," came the voice of Sam. "You've got to be sensible, and do nothing rash. I can't say more just now, as I'm busy with a client."

Archer crammed down the receiver with which he had been eavesdropping. He hesitated for a minute or two, and then with a sour expression on his face, walked to the door of Sam's room and pushed it open.

"Oh, beg pardon," he said curtly, as he saw his colleague's visitor. "I thought you were alone, Sam."

"Come on in, Miles," Sam drawled. "Miss Wonderly, this is my partner, Miles Archer. Miles, Miss Wonderly's sister ran away with a man named Floyd Thursby. It seems to be a clear case of abduction. Miss Wonderly's located Thursby here in San Francisco, but he won't tell her where her sister is, and she wants us to follow Thursby till we find out just where he's hiding the girl. Miss Wonderly tells me she's going to meet him to-night at her hotel at eight o'clock."

Miss Ruth Wonderly looked at the two anxiously.

"Thursby is dangerous," she said. "He would stop at nothing to save himself, and I—I am afraid—on my sister's account. Mr. Spade, could either you or Mr. Archer handle this matter—personally? I'd be willing to pay most anything if you would." And she laid a couple of hundred-dollar bills on the desk.

Archer's eyes sparkled. His wife's phone conversation a few minutes before was almost forgotten.

"I'll look after this myself, Miss Wonderly," he declared, and smiled as she thanked him prettily.

Ruth Wonderly took her departure, but the memory of her strangely compelling eyes lingered. There was a silence during which Archer fingered the two hundred-dollar bills—till Sam Spade drew one of them from his hand and pocketed it.

Archer glanced at him. "By the way, Sam," he said, "were there any phone-calls for me?"

"Yes," was the reply. "your wife called. She wanted to know when you were coming home, and said she'd missed you an awful lot."

"Yeah?" mused Archer, with the suggestion of a sneer.

The Passing of Archer.

A BODY lay on the sidewalk in San Francisco's Chinese quarter. The body was Miles Archer, and around it stood a number of police officers, one of them a detective in plain clothes answering to the name of Tom Polhaus.

An ambulance had been sent for, but it had not arrived when a taxi drew up at the kerb. The taxi had conveyed Sam Spade to the scene of the crime, and as the private sleuth stepped out of the cab Polhaus greeted him solemnly.

"I got your message, Tom," Sam stated. "Dead, is he?"

"Yeah," was the answer. "I thought you might want to see the body before we took it away. He was plugged right through the back, the bullet fired so close that the powder burnt his overcoat. Archer didn't have time to draw. His gun was tucked away in his hip-pocket. I guess it's up to you to break the news to the widow, Sam."

Sam inclined his head. "Yes, I guess so," he muttered, and turned away.

A few paces from the spot where Archer lay, a Chinaman stepped out of a doorway and accosted Sam, whose activities had provided him with many strange acquaintances in various walks of life. The Oriental spoke rapidly in his native dialect, and Sam Spade made some rejoinder in the same tongue ere passing on.

Some time later, Sam received visitors at his apartment on Stockton Street. One was Tom Polhaus and the other was the latter's immediate superior in the force, Lieutenant Dundy, who did not share Tom's regard for the private detective.

"Was Archer working on any job to-night, Spade?" Dundy demanded.

"Supposed to be trailing a guy named Thursby," Sam answered laconically. "And if you want to know why, he was trailing Thursby because a client was paying us good old-fashioned American coin to have him trailed."

Dundy eyed him narrowly.

"Do you happen to have a gun around the place, Spade?" he inquired.

"No," Sam told him, with a contemptuous curl of the lip. "Have a look round, and if you find one I'll make you a present of it. Is there anything else you'd like to know?"

"Yeah," snapped Dundy, "and you'll tell me just what I do want to know, or maybe you'll be tellin' it in court. This is murder, Spade, and don't you forget it. Listen—at one o'clock this morning Archer was shot dead. Another man named Floyd Thursby was bumped off in front of his hotel—thirty-five minutes after you left Archer in the alley."

Sam stood up.

"After I left Archer in the alley?" he rapped out. "What have I got to do with all this?"

"I'm followin' up a line of investigation, Spade," Dundy said. "You were in such a hurry to-night that you scarcely stopped to look at your dead partner when you joined Tom Polhaus in Chinatown. And you didn't break the news to Mrs. Archer."

"I called on my secretary and asked her to do it," Sam retorted. "I reckoned she'd handle the job better. As for Archer, what good could I have done stopping to look at him? Would that have brought him back to life? Say, Dundy, now that your fool brain has figured everything out, maybe you'll tell me how I killed Thursby."

"Thursby died before he could name his killer," said Dundy. "I may as well tell you that—if you don't know it already."

Sam made an impatient gesture. "I never saw Thursby—dead or alive," he announced. "Now clear out of here and let me get some sleep."

Followed by Polhaus, Dundy took his leave with the threatening promise that the District Attorney should hear of the affair the first thing in the morning. But Sam did not sleep after the lieutenant's departure, and, early astir, he called at the address of Miss Ruth Wonderly immediately after breakfast.

He found her looking as radiantly beautiful as ever, and as appealing as she had seemed the day before.

"Too bad we couldn't find that little sister of yours," he observed, as she invited him to sit down.

Her face clouded.

"Mr. Spade," she murmured, "I have a terrible confession to make. That story I told you yesterday wasn't true."

"We didn't believe you," he smiled, "but we believed the two hundred dollars. Baby, for that amount of money I'd let you tell me a lie every day."

"You'll go on with the case just the October 17th, 1931.

same, won't you?" Ruth Wonderly pleaded. "You must help me, Mr. Spade. I haven't anyone else. I can't explain things now, but I will later. You see, I—I trusted Thursby, and he betrayed that trust. But I'm depending on you to save me. I know I haven't any right to ask you to help me blindly, but I do ask it of you."

Few men could have resisted the urgent note in her voice, but, impressed as he was by her, Sam Spade was too level-headed by far to enter into any situation on a mere impulse of emotion.

"Tell me about Thursby," he commanded. "Tell me the truth."

"I met Thursby in the Orient," she said. "We came here together from Hong Kong about a week ago. By the time we landed I was afraid I couldn't trust him. That's why I wanted to have him shadowed. He killed Archer—with the gun he always carried in his overcoat pocket."

"You picked a nice playmate," observed Sam.

"The only kind that could help me," Ruth Wonderly answered. "Mr. Spade, I'm in danger of my life. Unless you help me, there can only be one ultimate end for me—death!"

Sam pursed his lips.

"How can I help you?" he retorted, looking at her keenly. "You won't tell me all the facts. Who killed Thursby—his enemies or yours?"

"I—don't—know," she said.

"Oh, you're impossible!" he snapped. "Listen," she appealed, "there's so much that I daren't and can't explain, but you must believe in me. You won't go to the police? You'll keep my name out of it, won't you?"

Sam grinned.

"Baby," he drawled, "I don't have to go to the police. They're all swarming around me like a bunch of bees. But I'll call you when I get some news for you."

He rose and moved to the door. In passing a small table he saw a book lying in its coloured wrapper. The title, which caught his eye, was one destined to recur to him at no very remote date in the future.

"The Story of the Little Black Bird," it read.

Doctor Cairo.

AT his office that night Sam Spade received a caller just as his secretary, Effie, was in the act of leaving. He gave the obvious pseudonym of Doctor Cairo, and proved to be a small man of slightly Asiatic appearance.

It was not until Doctor Cairo had taken a chair that Sam realised the man was covering him with an automatic pistol.

"I am going to search your office, Mr. Spade," he said, "and if you attempt to prevent me I shall certainly shoot you. Will you stand up, please, since I must assure myself that you are unarmed?"

Sam obeyed him, but as the man drew nearer he suddenly struck aside the gun and at the same instant whipped his bunched knuckles to the point of the doctor's jaw. When Cairo came round some sixty seconds later, it was to find Sam smiling down on him.

"I took the liberty of searching you," Sam observed, "and I see you have the address of my apartment. I presume you've been up there already. Come, Friend Doctor, supposing you explain?"

Cairo struggled to his feet.

"I will," he said, nursing his jaw. "In the first place, was there any connection between your partner's death and the death of the man Thursby—the newspapers seem to hint?"

"Why should there be?" Sam inquired.

"Mr. Spade," said the doctor, "I am not merely curious, but it occurred to me that the two killings might have something to do with a certain ornament I am trying to recover for the rightful owner. On behalf of that owner, I am prepared to pay five thousand dollars for its recovery."

"What kind of an ornament is it?" Sam demanded.

"A statuette," was the answer. "A figure in black enamel about twelve inches high. The black figure, Mr. Spade, of a bird."

Sam statted. In an instant he recalled the title of that book in Ruth Wonderly's apartment.

"Who is its rightful owner, doctor?" he asked.

"I can't tell you that," was the reply. "But I'll put a question to you. Is it in this office?"

Sam shook his head.

"No," he said, "but for five thousand dollars I'd do my best to get it here. But remember—you wouldn't be hiring me out to kill or steal. I'd try to trace and procure the black bird for you in a lawful and honest way."

"At least, with discretion," Cairo murmured. "It is a deal, then, Mr. Spade, and here is my address if you wish to communicate with me. And, by the way, may I have my gun?"

Sam obliged by passing the weapon over, whereupon Doctor Cairo immediately covered him with it.

"I am going to search your office, Mr. Spade," he said. "You see, if the black bird were here, I should like to save the rightful owner that five thousand dollars."

Sam laughed.

"Go ahead," he agreed, and watched Cairo amusedly while the latter made an examination of the premises.

When Cairo had gone, empty-handed, Sam Spade made his way home to his apartment in Stockton Street thoughtfully. He knew himself to be in the thick of a mystery that would take some unravelling, but he did not intend to join hands with the police in the solving of the problem and see Dundy take the credit. He would play the lone hand, and take what risks were coming to him in the venture. That there would be risks in plenty he had no doubt.

Archer slain. The man Thursby slain. And, like a spectre overshadowing their doom, the figure of the black enamel bird—Or was it, rather, the strange spell of Ruth Wonderly's eyes that had dominated their abysmal fate?

Back at his rooms, Sam Spade phoned Ruth Wonderly's apartment, and in less than half an hour she was seated with him in his comfortable lounge.

"I saw your friend Cairo to-night," he told her, and, watching her closely the while, saw that she paled at the words. He had not guessed wrong, then. The man was known to her, and feared by her.

"He offered me five thousand dollars for the black bird," he continued.

She clutched at his arm. "Surely you're not considering it?" she cried. "You promised to help me, and I trusted you."

"Don't let's figure out how much you've trusted me," he retorted scornfully. "I promised to help you, but you didn't say anything about black birds. And five thousand dollars is a lot of money—"

The door-bell rang before he could say more, and, answering it, he found

Dundy and Tom Polhaus in the passage. "Say, what's on your mind besides your hat, Dundy?" Sam asked irritably. "Just this," was the curt reply. "There's a lot of talk going round about you and Archer's wife. It's even said that was why Archer was put on the spot."

"Lieutenant," drawled Sam, "drop around when I'm not so busy—"

He never finished the sentence, for from the lounge there came a sudden scream in Ruth Wonderly's voice. Sam whipped round and dived across the threshold, Dundy and Polhaus stumbling after him—and in the room he had left the private detective saw Ruth and Doctor Cairo face to face.

"What's all this?" growled Dundy. Sam had no intention of allowing the police officers to share the scanty knowledge he had already gained, and he took it upon himself to speak.

"Miss Wonderly," he said. "I'd like you to meet Lieutenant Dundy and Detective-sergeant Polhaus. Miss Wonderly is an operator in my employ. And this gentleman is Doctor Cairo, an old college chum of mine from back East. Miss Wonderly never saw Doctor Cairo before, and when he came into my apartment by the back way, she was naturally frightened, I guess."

"Oh, I was," Ruth Wonderly said quickly. "I'm so glad you aren't a burglar, Doctor Cairo. You will forgive me for striking you, won't you?"

"Most certainly, mademoiselle." Cairo muttered, glad to fall in with the story Sam had told, but flashing an ugly glance at Ruth as he nursed a bruise on his head, inflicted by a paper-weight the girl had snatched up.

Dundy looked the reverse of satisfied.

"Why should your old college chum come through the back way, Spade?" he wanted to know.

"Why, I have a large sum of money on me," put in Cairo, "and I was afraid of being trailed. I'm not generally timid, but in a strange city one never knows. If I may go with you when you leave, lieutenant, I—I'd feel much safer."

"Rather a brief visit your friend is making, Spade," Dundy remarked to Sam. "And Miss Wonderly—is she also afraid to go home in the dark alone?"

"Miss Wonderly is taking some notes that I haven't finished yet," Sam answered.

Dundy smiled.

"I see," he mused. "In that case we'll leave you to your—conference. Good-night."

The police officers departed, Cairo in their company, and Sam turned to Ruth Wonderly.

"You'd better stay here," he suggested. "I can make a shake-down for myself."

He sank on to a couch, and as she sat beside him he slipped his arm around her.

"Come on, Baby," he urged, "tell me all about that black bird."

"Oh, I'm so tired, Sam," she whispered. "Tired of everything—of myself—of lying—thinking up lies till I don't know a lie from the truth."

She nestled closer. Her compelling loveliness seemed to go to his head like wine, and he drew her nearer and yet nearer, till all at once his mouth closed down on her lips in a long and passionate kiss.

Yet infatuation did not rob him entirely of his wits. If she intended to use him for some deep game of her own, she would not find him a mere blind pawn; and early the following morning, before she was awake, he put in half an hour at the apartment she had been occupying during her stay in San Francisco.

During that half-hour he ransacked her suite, searching in vain for some clue that would explain all, searching in vain for—the black bird.

Gutman.

"MR. GUTMAN, I presume," said Sam Spade, eyeing the elderly, florid man on whom he had called. "I'm here in answer to the note you sent referring to—the black bird."

"And as—Miss Wonderly's agent?" Gutman inquired with a sly oiliness of manner.

Sam shook his head.

"No," was his reply. "I'm here looking out for myself. But let's talk about the black bird. It must be—pretty valuable?"

"You don't know what it is, eh?" Gutman murmured. "Well then, what do you know, sir, of the Ancient Order of St. John of Jerusalem, afterwards called the Knights of Rhodes?"

"They were Crusaders, weren't they?"

"Right," said Gutman suavely. "And when the Emperor Charles gave the island of Malta to those knights, he made the condition that each year they were to pay him the tribute of—one falcon—in acknowledgment that Malta was still under Spain, as it was then. Now, sir, the wealth of the knights was immeasurable. For years they had taken the riches of the East as spoils of victory."

"Yes?" Sam urged.

"Well," Gutman continued, "the knights wanted to express their gratitude to the emperor. So the bird they sent for the first year's tribute was no

It was Sam who disarmed him and pocketed the gun.

insignificant live bird, but a glorious falcon of gold, encrusted with the finest jewels in their coffers—the finest, largest jewels of Asia. But it never reached the emperor! Pirates took the boat on which it was being shipped to Spain. These are historical facts, sir.”

Sam nodded.

“Well?”

“I’ve traced the history of that bird all over Europe, sir,” Gutman declared. “In 1840 it turned up in Paris, its real identity hidden under a coat of enamel. In that disguise it kicked around the gutters of Paris for seventy years, then a Greek found it and discovered its real value.”

Gutman leaned forward in his chair. “His home was raided,” he said softly, “and he was murdered by brigands who did not know what the bird was. So it was lost again—for twenty years. It took me that time to trace it to the home of a Russian, Kemidov, in Constantinople. He refused to sell, so I sent some agents to get it for me. They got it, and—I haven’t got it!” And he added the last words in impassioned accents.

“So it really belongs to Kemidov,” observed Sam.

“You might as well say it belongs to the King of Spain,” cried Gutman. “It doesn’t belong to anyone except by right of possession.”

Sam smiled.

“Then it belongs to Miss Wonderly now?”

“No, sir,” Gutman snapped, “except as my agent. You are sure she has it?”

“I’m not sure of anything,” Sam drawled, “but I might be able to get it at the right price—say, in a couple of days.”

Gutman rubbed his hands.

“Listen, I’ll give you the choice of two propositions,” he said. “Either you take fifty thousand down for it, or, when I sell it, a fourth share in the proceeds—a share that will amount to nothing less than half a million dollars. Yes, my dear sir, for the Maltese Falcon is worth every cent of two million!”

“It’s a deal,” Sam told him. “But how about a thousand on account, just to clinch matters?”

Gutman had parted with the deposit, when a shifty-looking young fellow entered the lounge. Gutman introduced him as Wilmer Cook, and then, learning that there was a caller in the next room, went through to find himself confronted by—Doctor Cairo.

“Get rid of that fellow Spade,” said Cairo. “He hasn’t got the Falcon. You remember Jacobi—Captain Jacobi, of the Paloma? I mentioned, in my report from Hong Kong, that I’d seen the Wonderly girl with him there. Well, I’m now certain of one thing—Ruth Wonderly gave the Falcon to Jacobi in Hong Kong, and asked him to bring it to America while she and Thursby took another boat. The Paloma docks to-night, Gutman, at midnight.”

“But I’ve given Spade a thousand dollars on account—”

“Wilmer can take care of him,” put in Cairo.

Gutman shook his head.

“No,” he said. “No. I have a better way. My technique is not so abrupt as Wilmer’s.”

He returned to the lounge, alone.

“Ah, Mr. Spade,” he said, “you will pardon the interruption. Now let me see, we had finished our discussion, hadn’t we? Well, I think the occasion calls for a drink.”

Half an hour later, Sam Spade recovered from the effects of drugged wine to find himself in the gutter of a back street, minus Gutman’s thousand dollars.

October 17th, 1921.

Jacobi.

SAM SPADE entered his office to find his secretary, Effie, still there.

“Say,” he exclaimed, “it’s after midnight. What are you doing in the office?”

“Well, you asked me to stick around till you came back,” Effie began, and then stopped blankly.

For the outer door had opened, and a seafaring man with the pallor of death on his face had stumbled across the threshold. He was carrying a suit-case, but as he lurched forward his fingers relaxed on the bag’s leather handle, and with a queer, strangled groan he fell to the floor.

Sam dropped on his knees beside him. “Shot in the back,” he muttered, after a brief scrutiny. “Listen, Effie, lock that door. No use phoning for a doctor. He’s dead. Quick, hand that bag of his across.”

She lifted the case, and he examined it. He saw the initials “R. W.” and knew that in some way the fatal spell of Ruth Wonderly had brought this seaman to the same end as Archer and Thursby.

He forced the case open, and a dark object was revealed lying in a bed of straw—the twelve-inch figure of the black-enamelled bird.

“It’s the thing they’re all after,” Sam Spade breathed.

“Oh, Sam,” gasped Effie, “whoever shot that sea-captain will do the same to you. I’m afraid. Get rid of that statuette.”

“Now don’t worry,” Sam told her. “I’m going to take this case and the black bird down to the station and plant it in the left-luggage office, and I’ll slip the baggage-check in an envelope and shove it in the general delivery box at the post office—”

Less than an hour afterwards, with the suit-case deposited and the police informed of the death of one John Jacobi, captain of the Paloma, Sam Spade made his way to his apartment, and on the landing outside the door of his suite came face to face with Ruth Wonderly.

“I’m afraid,” she said. “I think there’s been someone following me.”

He opened the door and motioned her to enter, and as he followed her and switched on the light he found himself in the presence of three men—Gutman, Cairo and Wilmer Cook.

“Well, sir,” observed Gutman with a dangerous smile, “now we’re all here shall we discuss the matter of the Falcon? Of course, you have it, and I am now prepared to offer you ten thousand for it, in full settlement. For permit me to remind you that although you have the Falcon, we have you.” And he indicated a gun in Wilmer Cook’s hand.

Ruth Wonderly was standing behind Sam, pale as death. Sam looked at the three men, and then spoke to Gutman.

“There’s an angle to this deal you’ve all overlooked,” he stated. “We’ve got to have a fall guy—a victim to feed the police—somebody they can stick for the murders of Archer, Thursby and Jacobi.”

Gutman laughed grimly.

“You can’t expect us to believe you’re afraid of the police and not able to handle them,” he scoffed. “My dear sir, a fall guy—as you call it—would only lead them to the Falcon. No, we’ll leave well alone.”

“Now get this through your brains, Gutman,” Sam rapped out. “I’m up to the neck in this mess, and the police know it. I’m in business here—remember that—and I’m not staying here to stand the racket while you skip abroad.

We’ve got to have a fall guy, or we’re sunk.”

He beckoned him nearer, and addressing him in an undertone, nodded towards Wilmer Cook, whose face suddenly took on a hunted look as he realised he was the subject of discussion.

“My dear sir,” protested Gutman, “it’s too ridiculous. I feel toward Wilmer exactly as if he were my own son. Besides, what would prevent Wilmer from telling the police about the Falcon and all of us?”

“Oh, we could have him shot for resisting arrest,” explained Sam, watching the effect of his words on Cook. “I’d fix that all right. Remember, Gutman, you can easily pick another son, but there’s only one black bird.”

Gutman coughed. “My foudness for Wilmer,” he murmured slyly, “makes it impossible.”

“Well, what about Cairo?” Sam suggested.

“What about Gutman or Miss Wonderly?” Cairo cried hotly.

Sam shrugged.

“I don’t care who,” he said. “All I insist on is a fall guy, and I’m in a position to insist. You may have the drop on me, but putting a bullet in my hide won’t get you the Falcon.”

“I am giving you ten thousand dollars, though,” said Gutman, handing over that amount in notes.

Sam fingered the bills, then asked Ruth Wonderly to take care of them.

“I want double that,” he declared, “and besides, I can’t get the Falcon till daylight.”

“Daylight,” mused Gutman. “Then I think we had all better stay here and keep one another in sight.”

“Okay,” Sam agreed. “Ruth, in that case you might go through to the kitchen and fix up some coffee and sandwiches.”

The girl moved to obey him, but Gutman stopped her.

“Better leave those dollar-bills,” he observed. “We don’t want any grease spots on them, do we?”

She surrendered them and went out of the room. Gutman proceeded to count them, and then looked up.

“I gave you ten thousand-dollar notes, Spade,” he said. “There are only nine here.”

Sam snatched the money, whipped round and strode into the kitchen. He reappeared a few minutes later.

“She hasn’t got the missing bill,” he snapped. “I’ve convinced myself of that. You pained it, Gutman.” And with a sudden gesture he dipped into the crook’s waistcoat pocket and conjured from it a folded thousand-dollar note, the edge of which had been protruding.

Gutman shrugged.

“I admit it,” he said, discomfited. “I was curious to know what you would do.”

“You liar,” Sam ground out. “You were going to let Miss Wonderly be the fall guy, by making out that she had double-crossed me over the money. Well, I’m deciding right now. The fall guy is going to be Wilmer.”

Wilmer Cook’s face was working Cat-like, he watched Gutman and Cairo move aside and hold a whispered consultation.

“I’ll lay you two to one they’re selling you out, kid,” Sam said to the gunman, with a grin.

Cook sprang to his feet.

“Hang you, Spade,” he shouted fiercely, and jerked his arm forward to shoot. But before he could fire, Gutman, Cairo and Sam leapt on him.

It was Sam who disarmed him and pocketed the gun.

(Continued on page 28.)

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. A grand serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama. Starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

"HEROES of the FLAMES"

READ THIS FIRST.

While en-route with his comrades to the scene of a fire, Bob Darrow, of the San Francisco Brigade, saves the life of a boy who falls in front of one of the monster engines.

Later he calls on James Madison, head of a chemical company, to whom he puts up an idea for a patent fire-extinguisher. Madison is not interested, and Bob leaves disappointed, after meeting Dan Mitchell, a shady promoter who is befriendng Madison for his own ends.

That afternoon Bob rescues June Madison from a fire in her father's office, then learns that the boy he had saved from the wheels of the fire-engine was Madison's son, Jackie.

In gratitude Madison helps Bob to perfect his invention, the Darrow Fire-Bomb. But Dan Mitchell is anxious to sell Madison an extinguisher of his own, and to discredit Bob he sends a hireling to "doctor" the fireman's invention with a deadly explosive.

Madison's faith in the invention remains unshaken. He sends Bob and another fireman, Pat Healey, to a mountain lodge, where experiments can be resumed. But Mitchell dispatches hirelings to secure Bob's formula.

The Madisons arrive on the scene, and Bob and Pat escape with them by car, the gangsters following. The fugitives enter a tunnel where blasting is in progress, and as an explosion occurs they are overwhelmed by falling rock!

Now Read On.

Prisoner!

A WORKMAN on the loop road had seen all that had passed, and straightway hurried towards the ar end of the tunnel to acquaint the superintendent of the calamity.

Meanwhile, Spike Beldon and his

EPISODE 7.

"FORESTS OF FIRE."

companions descended from their auto.

"Lucky for us we bumped into that embankment," said Spike laconically. "We might have been in that tunnel, too."

"Yeah, I reckon so!" gasped Merlin. "But what do we do now, Spike?"

"You stay and change that burst tyre," was the curt rejoinder. "You an' Silk come with me, Butch. We're goin' in after Darrow."

Followed by Connolly and Butch, he ran towards the tunnel and entered the gloom of it. Thirty paces from the entrance they came upon the Madisons' car, almost completely buried under the fall of rock and timber.

They began to tear at the debris with their bare hands, and all at once Connolly gave an exclamation

"Here's Darrow!" he said.

Spike and Butch scrambled towards the spot where their associate was working.

"Never mind the rest of 'em," Beldon rapped out. "Darrow's the one we want!"

Dirt and timbers were cleared away, and Bob was dragged from the back seat of the sports car. He was senseless, and showed no signs of recovering consciousness as Connolly hoisted him over his shoulder.

"That's it," said Spike Beldon. "Now get him out of here. Quick, before anybody shows up. Take him back to the auto."

The young fireman was carried from the tunnel and bundled into the crooks' tourer. Merlin had jacked up the car and changed the wheel that had been damaged in the collision with the embankment, and as he completed the task the gangsters piled into the vehicle.

Merlin took the driving-position.

"Where to, Spike?" he demanded. "Back to Madison's cabin," Beldon answered craftily. "That'll be the last place they'll look for him, after what happened."

Merlin backed away from the embankment, turned the car in the width of the road and then stepped on the accelerator. The tourer stormed away with gathering speed, and swept past the spot where it had knocked down the flagman who had attempted to wave it to a stop.

The flagman had escaped with a shaking, and he struggled to his feet as the auto drove by. He watched it out of sight, and it had hardly disappeared round the bend in the mountain road when the superintendent and a crowd of workmen came into view, running round from the far end of the tunnel.

The flagman limped towards them, and as he joined them the superintendent fired a question at him.

"I'm told a car passed you just before the blast," he jerked. "Why didn't you stop it?"

"I tried to, boss," the flagman protested. "But there was a girl at the wheel, an' she ignored the signal. Another car turned the bend a minute afterwards, an' knocked me down. It just drove off."

The superintendent hurried into the tunnel, and his men trooped after him. Reaching the sports car that had been overwhelmed by the blast, they proceeded to dig out the three remaining occupants.

Pat Heeley had come round and was struggling to escape from the debris.

"Help him, boys," the superintendent ordered. "But watch overhead." And he pointed to the roof, from which muck was still falling in small showers, as if threatening another collapse.

Pat was extricated, and, in spite of his bruises, immediately assisted the workmen to locate June and her father. Madison was pulled out in a semi-conscious condition, and then June was dragged clear.

"Aisy, boys—take her aisy!" Pat urged with anxiety, but, though she was dazed, and aching in every limb, June managed to speak reassuringly.

"Oh—I'm all right," she faltered. "But—but where's Bob?"

The superintendent had turned to Madison.

"What was the idea of going past that flag?" he was saying gruffly.

"Were you trying to kill yourselves?"

"Never mind that," June's father retorted, rousing himself with an effort.

"There's another man in that car!"

The workmen turned their attention on the debris once more, only to discover that the fourth occupant of the car had vanished. Pat Heeley and the Madisons received the news of his disappearance with consternation, and were gazing at one another blankly when the flagman approached.

"Say," he observed, "the fellow you're lookin' for must be the same guy that was carried off by those men that were chasing you. I saw 'em pile somebody into their car and drive away."

June looked at her father.

"Daddy!" she panted. "Those men have got Bob! Oh, isn't there anything we can do?"

Madison bit his lip, and then turned all at once to the superintendent of the road gang.

"Perhaps you can help us," he said.

"Have you a telephone here, or a car I can use?"

"I haven't a telephone," was the answer, "but I'll lend you my car. Come on round to the other end of the tunnel."

They followed him, June being helped by two of the workmen, for her hip had been bruised and she was lame. They reached the far end of the tunnel and climbed into the auto the superintendent had been generous enough to offer them.

"We'll drive up to the Mountain Inn," said Madison. "I'll have your car sent down from there, my friend," he added to the superintendent.

At the Cabin.

ARRIVED at their destination in the heart of the mountain forests, Beldon and his companions lifted their prisoner out of the car and bore him into the Madison lodge.

"We'll see if he's got what we're after," said Spike, as the unconscious captive was placed in a chair. "Butch—Merlin—get busy, will yuh?"

Deft hands proceeded to search Bob, and, while he remained insensible, a thorough examination was carried out. But it failed to produce the precious document that the crooks were so anxious to secure.

Spike pursed his lips as Butch and Merlin drew back and looked at him hopelessly.

"The boss'll have a fit if we don't find that formula," he muttered. "He had it with him in this cabin not twenty minutes ago. I saw it with me own eyes through that window."

With a sudden air of resolution he leaned forward and struck Bob smartly across the cheek, repeating the procedure till the prisoner began to show signs of recovering his wits.

"Come on, snap out of it!" Spike Beldon snarled. "Do you wanna sleep for ever?"

The harsh voice impressed itself on Bob's dawning consciousness. He opened his eyes, stared blankly at his captors for a moment and then, as the memory of all that had happened recurred to him in a flash, sat up with a start.

"June!" he panted, his first and foremost thought being of her. "Where's June? Is she—is she hurt?"

"Never mind about the girl!" Spike ground out. "I want that formula of yours, and I want it right now!"

Bob was still in too weak a state to show fight, and his bruised limbs felt like leaden weights. But no physical injuries could have impaired his iron will, and at Beldon's words his mouth seemed to tighten into a firm line of determination.

"I haven't got it with me," he said doggedly, "and you'll never find out where it is from me."

Spike turned to his associates.

"Keep a hold on him, boys," he ordered. "Don't let him get away! This cabin is wired for a telephone, an' I'm gonna find it and put through a call."

He located the instrument in another room, and, after closing the door to make certain that Bob should not overhear his conversation, he picked up the receiver.

"Hallo, operator," he growled. "Gimme the Mountain Inn, will yuh? No, I don't know the number, but you get it for me an' make it snappy."

There was a pause, and a few seconds later a telephone-bell rang in the annexe of the Mountain Inn, a hotel much frequented by visitors during the holiday season.

The desk-clerk answered it, and heard Spike Beldon's gruff voice.

"Yes, this is the Mountain Inn," the clerk said. "A Mr. Mitchell, sir? Yes, he arrived here an hour ago. Do you wish to speak with him?"

He laid down the receiver and emerged from the 'phone box just as Dan Mitchell came downstairs from his room and entered the hotel annexe.

"Oh, Mr. Mitchell," the clerk hailed him. "You're wanted on the 'phone, sir."

Mitchell thanked him, slipped a coin in his hand and entered the booth. As he lifted the receiver and spoke into the mouthpiece Spike's well-known tones reached his ear.

"Hallo—that you, Mitchell? Say, we didn't make out at all. Darrow hasn't the formula with him, an' Heeley an' the Madisons got smashed up in an accident."

"Accident?" Mitchell exclaimed. "What accident? Was June hurt?"

"I guess not," Spike answered. "But we didn't have much time to look, boss—"

Mitchell cut him short. Through a hotel window near by he had seen a car draw up, and had recognised Heeley, June and her father.

"They've just arrived, Spike," he said, "and they're all right. Now listen, we've got to get that formula, and I've got a plan that ought to work—"

He made certain that the door of the 'phone-box was closed, and then proceeded to outline a cunning scheme, which was received enthusiastically by Beldon. A little later Mitchell left the

'phone-booth and strolled out to the porch to see June limping up the steps with the support of her father and Pat Heeley.

"A good hot bath and a rub down and you'll feel fine," Madison was saying.

"Oh, I'm all right, dad," June assured him. "It's just my hip."

Mitchell hastened forward with feigned surprise and astonishment.

"Why, what's happened?" he exclaimed. "Is there anything I can do, June?"

"No, thank you, Dan," the girl answered him, wincing a little with pain. "I'm all right—really."

"You'd better go on in, dear," her father advised. "But say, Mitchell, what are you doing here? We never expected to run across you in these parts."

"Why, I—well, I have business interests here," Mitchell replied. "Connected with the timber."

"H'm!" Madison murmured. "You never told me you had business interests up here among the mountain forests."

Mitchell eyed him blandly.

"No," he rejoined, "I don't believe I did, now you come to mention it. But what happened? What kind of trouble have you been running into?"

"We had an accident," Madison explained, "and Darrow has disappeared. I stopped on the way to the inn and sent for some rangers to start a search. But come into the hotel and I'll tell you all about it."

Meanwhile, at the cabin from which he had 'phoned Mitchell, Spike Beldon had joined his confederates in the room where Bob was a prisoner.

"Come on, fellers," Spike said briskly. "We'll fix this bird so he's ready to talk. Tie him up to that pillar," he added, pointing to a strong post built as a support to the ceiling. "I reckon he won't tear that down."

Bob was lifted bodily and pinioned to the timber column that Spike had indicated. Then the gangsters drew off, and, lowering his voice so that Bob could not hear a single word, Beldon proceeded to explain the plan that Mitchell had detailed over the telephone.

It was greeted with approval, Connolly being loudest in his praise of it.

"Say, that's a great idea!" he declared.

"It sure is," Spike stated. "Now you get goin', Silk."

Connolly departed after some further whispering and as the door closed behind him Spike walked over to Bob.

"So you don't want to tell us where that formula is, huh?" he sneered.

"No," Bob answered firmly, "and what's more—I don't intend to tell you."

Spike's eyes narrowed. "Maybe we got a way to make yuh tell," he drawled.

Bob met his glance unflinchingly, his lip curling with contempt as he looked at the man.

"Maybe," he retorted in a sarcastic tone.

The Searchers.

A LONE horseman drew rein on a mountain track a few miles from the cabin to which Mitchell's hirelings had carried their prisoner. He was wearing the khaki uniform of a trooper of the California Ranger Service.

Another mounted figure had appeared on the crest of a ridge. He was dressed in the same outfit, and, recognising him the first horseman lifted his hands to his mouth and hailed him.

"Hey, Tom!" he called. "Down here!"

The man on the ridge answered the two words of command by putting his horse at the stiff slope. He joined the first trooper amid a smother of dust and rubble dislodged by his pony's hoofs.

"What's wrong?" he asked.

"Chief wants us to go up to the Mountain Inn and report to a Mr. Madison there," was the laconic reply. "I understand we're to look out for a lost man."

They set off together, and reached the Mountain Inn about fifteen minutes later. They found Madison awaiting them on horseback, and in riding kit.

"We have orders to report to you, Mr. Madison," one of the Rangers said.

"Yes, I sent for you gentlemen," Madison answered, and proceeded to relate exactly what had occurred.

"You intend to come with us, sir?" the other trooper inquired, and Madison nodded.

"Yes," he said. "Now I think we'd better pick up the trail at the old tunnel—"

June hurried up at that moment, in company with Dan Mitchell. She, too, had changed into riding kit, and seemed intent on accompanying her father and the Rangers, but Madison would not hear of the proposal.

"No, dear," he told her, "you stay close to the telephone. I'll call you up if there's any good news."

He galloped off with the troopers, and June and Mitchell were left by the horse-corral which was attached to the hotel.

"Now don't feel so badly, June," Mitchell urged as he saw the harassed expression on her pretty face. "They'll find Darrow."

"I wish I could believe that," she said tremulously.

Mitchell pursed his lips. "Well, would you feel any better if I were to ride out in another direction and search?" he offered, a queer light playing in the depths of his eyes.

"Oh, thanks, Dan," she rejoined. "And I'll go with you!"

Mitchell had hoped that she would make that announcement, but he pretended to argue against her accompanying him, knowing that she was wilful enough to disregard all protests.

"Yes," he murmured, "but your father said you were to stay close to the 'phone."

"But he's not here now," June retorted. "And I can take care of myself. Which horse do I ride?" she added to a hotel groom who was standing near by.

The groom helped her into the saddle of a pony, and, Dan Mitchell swinging himself astride another horse, the two of them entered away in a direction opposite to the one which Madison and the Rangers had taken.

They entered dense forest-land, following tortuous tracks that led between tall pines and thickets of brushwood, without the girl realising

Mitchell insinuated his way to the front and chose the route, and about half an hour had elapsed since their departure from the Mountain Inn when, apparently by chance, he turned into a pathway that led direct to the Madison cabin.

They had proceeded only fifty yards along it when Silk Connolly turned a corner and stepped into full view.

June drew rein abruptly.

"Look," she gasped, "there's one of the men that was in the gang! I recognise him!"

Even as she spoke Silk whipped round and ran back the way he had come, vanishing beyond a bend in the track.

"Perhaps those crooks have Darrow a prisoner near here," Mitchell suggested crisply. "Let's follow him!"

They spurred forward, and, once past the bend, caught sight of their quarry again. But as he dodged around another twist in the track he immediately disappeared from view once more.

"This trail leads directly to our cabin," June panted. "Do you suppose this gang would dare hide Bob there?"

"Judging from what I hear of them," Mitchell answered, "they'd dare anything."

June glanced at him determinedly.

"Well, I'm going to look, anyhow!" she declared.

"Wait, June," Mitchell said, restraining her. "Have you a gun?"

She shook her head, and he took one from his own pocket and handled it with a great show of resolution.

"We may need this," he stated; and then, dismounting, he proceeded to lead his horse along the track.

June followed his example, and a few seconds later they reached the point where they had last seen Silk Connolly. It was as they were turning the corner that two men sprang out on them—one of them the gangster they had been shadowing, the other the burly ruffian known as Butch.

They seized Dan Mitchell, and, though June attempted to go to his assistance, her companion was overpowered and disarmed after a convincing struggle. Man and girl were then forced towards the cabin, which stood close by, and as they were pushed across the threshold they caught sight of the helpless figure of Bob Darrow, defiantly confronting Spike Beldon and Morlin.

"Bob," June cried, running across to the young fireman, "were you hurt?"

It was Beldon who answered her question.

"No, he wasn't hurt," he mentioned gruffly. "But he will be unless he comes through with what we want, Darrow," he added, "I'm gonna give you just five minutes to think things over, and then it's the works for you."

He made a sign to his confederates, and then walked through to an adjoining room with them—though not before he had exchanged a sly, surreptitious glance with Mitchell. The latter turned to Bob the moment he and June were alone with the fireman-inventor.

"Listen, Darrow," he urged. "It seems pretty clear to me that we're in the hands of desperate men—men who'll stop at nothing to gain their own ends. They want your formula, and the three of us are at their mercy. Surely that formula is not as valuable as our lives?"

"Dan's right, Bob," June interposed. "I'm not afraid on my own account, but I'm scared of what they might do to you if you don't talk. I saw you slip the formula to daddy when we were all in the car. Why don't you tell them so?"

"June, I don't want to drag your father in any danger," Bob protested; but before he could say more the door opened again and Beldon and his associates re-entered the room.

June faced the gangsters and spoke to them curtly.

"I know where the formula is," she told them, "and I'll get it for you if you'll promise to let Bob go free when it's handed over to you."

"Darrow," he said, "I'm gonna give you just five minutes to think things over, and then it's the works for you!"

Spike Beldon pursed his lips. "All right," he said, after a moment's consideration. "But I'll have to send a man along with you. And don't try any tricks, or you'll never see Darrow again. Silky, you'd better go along with her—"

"June," Bob exclaimed, "you can't do this—"

"I have to, Bob," the girl answered querulously. "It's the only way."

Bob tried to reason with her, but was cut short by Beldon.

"Come on, miss," the ruffian said to June, "you're losin' time. And Merlin, you take this guy into the other room."

He indicated Mitchell, who allowed himself to be escorted into an adjoining apartment. Then, in company with Butch, Spike saw Silk and June to the front door and watched them climb into the saddles of the two horses that had carried the girl and Dan Mitchell from the Mountain Hotel.

Spike then retraced his steps to the back room of the cabin. Butch followed on his heels. Mitchell was there with Merlin, and, all pretence at an end, the scoundrelly promoter and his hirelings slipped out through the rear door of the shack.

The two-seater in which Bob and Pat Heeley had originally travelled to the cabin was still outside the dwelling, and, assured that Bob could neither see nor hear him, Mitchell made his way to the auto.

"It looks as if everything is panning out the way I want it to," he said. "Now listen, Spike. I'll take Darrow's car, and drive back at my leisure to the Mountain Hotel. You boys take your own tourer and trail me there. I may need you if there's any hitch in our plans."

"Yeah, but what about Darrow?" Spike demanded.

Mitchell laughed shortly. "The way you've got him tied to that pillar, he'll stay put till you get back," he declared, and, with the words, he climbed into the two-seater and started up the engine.

Meanwhile, at some distance from the cabin, June and Silk Connolly were following the tortuous track that led to the Mountain Hotel, and they had travelled something like a mile when they came to a fork.

Both routes led to their destination, and June glanced at Silk inquiringly. Pausing to light a cigarette, the crook indicated the right-hand branch.

"We'll take this trail," he said, as he threw aside the match that he had struck. "It's shorter—and safer."

They cantered on. Behind them the match that Silk had tossed to the ground had dropped amidst a clump of dry undergrowth. It continued to burn, its flame finding fuel in the twigs and foliage.

The undergrowth crackled sinisterly, and the blaze rose higher. Spreading from the clump into which the carelessly flung match had fallen, it enveloped brushwood and tree-stem, and soon a column of smoke was climbing through the topmost boughs of the forest.

Forest Fire.

RIDING through the dense woodland of the mountains, Madison and the two Rangers must have covered a distance of two or three miles when they were startled by a loud voice hailing them in a rich, Irish brogue.

It was the voice of Pat Heeley, and as they turned in the saddle they saw the burly form of Bob Darrow's colleague galloping towards them.

"Why, hallo, Pat!" Madison greeted, as the Irishman came abreast and drew rein. "What are you doing here?"

October 17th, 1931.

"Faith, an' I couldn't wait any longer, Mither Madison," the fireman rejoined. "I had to git me a horse and help foind Bob. Ye see—"

He was interrupted by one of the Rangers, who suddenly laid a hand on his arm.

"Just a minute!" the trooper exclaimed. "Let's get this!" And he pointed to a heliograph that was flashing out a message from a distant hill-top.

"Fire sighted," he spelled out. "Dark Canyon. Working—towards—Mountain Hotel."

The other Ranger turned to Madison. "I'm sorry, sir," he stated. "We've got to go. The search for Darrow will have to be postponed."

The troopers wheeled and began to ride in the direction whence they had come.

"Hey!" Pat Heeley called after them. "Wait a minute, will yez?"

But the Rangers did not heed him, and he looked at Madison in dismay.

"Can ye beat that for luck, sorr?" he declared. "Well, Oi know what Oi'll do, anyway. Oi'll foind Bob meself."

"No, Pat," said Madison, restraining him. "It's no use. We know practically nothing of this country, and we'd better get back to the hotel. June may need us there."

He did not know that at that very moment June was almost within call, still riding alongside Silk Connolly; and it was while Madison and Pat were preparing to retrace their steps to the hotel that June chanced to turn her head and see the dark swirls of smoke rising above the tree-tops.

"Look!" she gasped, drawing rein abruptly. "The forest's afire!"

"By gum, you're right!" jerked Connolly. "We'd better get outa here."

"It's burning towards the cabin," June cried, a shrill note of panic in her voice, "and Bob's a prisoner there!"

She attempted to turn her horse, whereupon Silk clutched at her wrist. But with a quick movement she evaded him, and in the same instant she snatched something from his coat-pocket. It was the gun he had wrested from Dan Mitchell in the fake struggle by the cabin, and Connolly recoiled as he found himself covered.

OUR GRAND NEW ANNUAL.

Don't forget to get a copy of this wonderful new Annual. It is packed with thrilling film stories, pictorial articles and coloured plates.

Price 6/- net, at all Newsagents.

"You get along down the trail!" June commanded. "I'm going back for Bob!"

"Keep that gat away from me!" Connolly panted. "You gotta come with me!"

"Move on!" June ordered insistently. "Move on, and keep moving—or I'll shoot!"

Connolly's nerve failed him, for the girl seemed in deadly earnest, and with a muttered curse he wheeled and cantered in the direction she had indicated. June immediately clapped her heels to her pony's flanks and galloped back along the route that led to the cabin.

As she rode on at top speed the gloom of the forest glades became tinged with a lurid and sinister glow, and fifteen minutes after parting with Connolly she felt the bitter tang of smoke in her nostrils—smoke that drifted through the thickets in stray wisps, like wreaths of morning mist.

The smoke thickened. Soon it was sweeping about her in wild, dense folds, and soon the fierce heat of flames was beating against her face and hands. A thunder filled her ears, the thunder of a storm of fire that was roaring across the wooded heights and valleys, and her heart sickened as she thought of Bob Darrow, a helpless captive at the mercy of the inferno.

Tongues of flame coiled from the thickets on either side and wrapped themselves about her as she galloped. She heard great trees come crashing down in the depths of the forest as the blaze ate through their trunks. Her pony was in a sweat of terror, but, at the same time, answered gallantly to every touch on the rein.

She came in-sight of a rustic bridge that spanned a deep chasm. She had crossed it some time before with Connolly, but as she saw it now she realised that it was on the very point of collapse, for the entire structure was a mass of flame.

Yet she did not hesitate, and, leaning forward in the saddle, she put her horse at the bridge. The timbers rumbled and groaned under the animal's stride, and fiery splinters sprang hither and thither behind its iron-shod hoofs.

Horse and rider were scarcely on firm ground again when the bridge snapped, and, throwing a dread glance over her shoulder, June saw it hurtle into the dark cleft.

She raced on, with fire and smoke beating against her. She was burned badly about the wrists, but did not heed the pain. Her one thought was of the man who had been left a prisoner in the doomed cabin.

At the Mercy of the Flames.

NOT long after Dan Mitchell had left the vicinity of the cabin in Bob's car, Spike Beldon and his two remaining associates prepared to take the same trail.

They piled into the tourer and drove off, travelling at a slow pace, and they had proceeded only a mile or so when Merlin let out a startled cry.

Merlin was occupying the back seat alone, and, turning, Spike and Butch saw that he was pointing towards the country they had left behind them.

"Forest fire!" Butch breathed in awe. "It's between us and the cabin." Spike jerked. "We've gotta pull outa here. Step on it, Butch!"

Meanwhile, Bob was standing in the cabin with his hands bound to the pillar. At that particular moment he had no suspicion of his danger, but there was a window on his left, and presently, as he stared through it gloomily, he saw smoke rising above the trees and caught the glint of fire in the underbrush.

For an instant he failed to grasp the truth. Then the grim nature of his plight dawned on him. The woods were ablaze, and the terror was closing in on him relentlessly.

He began to struggle with the cords around his wrists, but they had been tied by a man who had intended to give the captive no opportunity of effecting his escape. In vain Bob fought to free himself, and while he maintained his futile efforts he watched the menace of the forest fire draw nearer.

The flames came surging through the thickets and towered amid the trees. Grass and underbush were swiftly burned to cinders, and the lofty pines around the cabin became so many fiery columns. Masses of smoke obscured the glare and found their way through every crevice of the dwelling in which Bob was imprisoned, and his whole body was racked with an agonising cough.

He was still striving to break or loosen the cords that bound him, but he met with no success. They were too strong to sever, too cunningly tied to slacken, and, his strength expended, he leaned weakly against the pillar and gave himself up for lost.

The smoke that had found its way into the cabin was overpowering, and the flames raging outside were already beginning to wrap themselves about the dwelling, the fierce heat of them even penetrating the thick log walls.

Bob made a last despairing attempt to gain his freedom, but it was unavailing, and its only effect was to exhaust him. And then, his aching eyes fixed on the window, he caught sight of a figure approaching through the flames.

It was the figure of a girl in riding-kit, and on horseback. For a moment he thought his imagination was playing some cruel trick on him, but as she galloped nearer he knew that the girl was no illusion.

"June!" he cried involuntarily, though he knew that she could not possibly hear him.

He guessed what had happened—guessed that she had given her escort the slip and dashed back to his rescue when she had realised that the cabin was doomed—and her courage filled him with admiration. He had saved her life more than once, but this time she was to save his, having risked her own in the process.

He watched her as she came riding through the flaming trees and the whirling clouds of smoke. Then all at once a shout of dismay escaped him, for he saw her pony plant one forefoot in a rabbit's scrape, and in another instant the creature had stumbled and fallen.

He came down heavily, and June was thrown clear over his head, to land in a crumpled heap some yards in front of the animal.

The horse scrambled to his feet, but June did not stir. She lay prone in that world of flame, while Bob watched her in an agony of suspense, wondering if she had been badly hurt, wondering if she would recover in time to escape the forest fire. His own plight was forgotten in the anxiety that he felt for her.

He thought he saw her move, but in the same moment his attention was diverted to a gigantic pine-tree that stood not far away.

Its tall trunk was wrapped in fire, and was a red-hot mass near the base. It was tottering, and a cry of horror rang to Bob's lips as it snapped and fell, crashing towards the very spot where June lay.

(To be continued in another breathing episode next week. By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.)

"ADIOS."

(Continued from page 10.)

Through the short summer night they rode, and when the dawn came they were still on the right track. They had gained considerably, for Francisco's horse had travelled many miles on the previous day.

So as Howard and his men neared the village of Santa Anna, they saw the fugitive not more than a quarter of a mile in front, and they raised a shout of triumph. Francisco heard the shouting, and urged his tired horse to a final effort. Into the village he swept, and there stood Pedro, holding a great white horse.

Francisco slowed his horse a little as he came level, swung himself to the fresh steed's back, and was off again without a second's delay. The posse galloped past and kept up the chase for a few miles more, continually losing ground. At last all trace of El Puma was lost, and Howard returned to Los Angeles, glad at heart that Dolores' brother had escaped.

El Puma had gone, and his men returned to their homes. Judge Travers found it advisable to return to the north, and under the firm but just rule of David Howard the district round Los Angeles settled down in peace.

A few weeks after Francisco had escaped, Howard called at the Rancho de los Coyotes, and Dolores, dressed in black, and very pale, but more beautiful than ever in the eyes of the young American, came out to meet him.

"I've had a letter from your brother, Dolores," said Howard. "He says he's sorry he led me a wild-goose chase. He had arranged for a change of horses at several villages on the way to the border."

"I'm glad you didn't catch him," smiled the girl.

"So am I," laughed Howard. "Listen to this."

He read aloud from the letter.

"There is nothing between you and Dolores now that I have gone out of your lives. Rosita and I are spending our honeymoon in Mexico City. We are very happy here in Mexico, and I hope that you and my sister will be just as happy in California. Adios!"

"What do you say, Dolores? We can be just as happy, if you are willing to marry—a gringo!"

Dolores looked reproachfully at David Howard, and the next moment she was in his arms, her face buried against his coat.

"David," she whispered softly, "my father is dead, and my brother is far away. I have no one left in the world but you. What does it matter that you are an American, if we love each other?"

And, judging by the way he kissed her, David Howard did not seem to think that it mattered at all.

(By permission of First National Pathé, Ltd., starring Richard Barthelmess and Mary Astor.)

"DEFENDERS OF THE LAW."

(Continued from page 16.)

the Chandos found themselves covered by wicked-looking guns! Greedy hands snatched at necklaces and jewels, whilst fierce voices demanded that the men hand over their money or pay the consequences of refusal.

A pounding of heavy feet and into the restaurant charged the police.

Guns barked, women screamed, and tables were flung over with a crash.

Joe Valet had not moved since he had given the signal, but had kept Terone and the woman covered. If he made the raid before the arrival of the police he intended to take Terone and the woman as his prisoners. With one he could dictate to the police, and the other to checkmate the activities of Terone's men. Or perhaps he aimed to clean-up the swag for himself and shake the dust of Lincoln from his feet.

But all that was changed by the advent of the police. Everything was ruined, half his men and Terone's would be captured or killed, and his own life was endangered. A blind rage gripped him. It was this crawling snake who had betrayed him, and—

His gun spoke once, and with a scream of mortal agony Terone sank to the ground.

With a cry of fear Meg flung herself towards the curtain. The gun spoke again. The woman clawed at the heavy velvet, hung suspended, and then slithered to the ground.

One glance at the chaos in the Chandos and then Valet jumped over the woman's prostrate body and disappeared the way he had come.

It was Houston who first found them. One glance at Terone showed that the crook was dead, but the woman groaned.

"He shot his partner," she whispered gaspingly. "Got wise to me and shot me. He escaped through there—"

"Muldoon!" shouted Houston. "Take two men and comb that passage—reckon you'll be too late."

"Terone got drunk and talked," whispered the wounded spy. "Valet overheard me give the warning, but he didn't shoot till the boys appeared and he knew the hold-up had failed."

"You've done fino work, Meg." Houston had traced the stream of blood. "Thank heaven, he only got you through the shoulder!"

Two of Terone's gang were dead and three were prisoners—all of Valet's men had escaped because their chief had told them about the back way. When escaping they had almost walked on the 32

RILEY'S "HOME" BILLIARD TABLES
GIVEN AWAY FREE

Write for particulars to
E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
Howard Works, ACCRINGTON,
and at Dept. 35, 147, Aldersgate
Street, LONDON, E.C.1.

bodies of Terone and Number Seven-teen.

"Valet can't get out of Lincoln," Houston told Muldoon as they took the wounded spy off to hospital. "It won't be long before I get Valet. If it gets out that he shot Terone he'll have a fine bunch of dagoes thirsting for his blood."

Valet Secures a Hostage.

JOE VALET had got back to the hiding-place in the Steps. It was the morning of the next day.

The Kid stared anxiously at his chief. "I don't like it, Joe." His voice was hoarse. "Four of the Terone gang came back with us, but they've gone. Why?"

"Don't ask me riddles!" raved Valet. "They were a worthless bunch of fools. Why the blazes did I ever come to this frowsy town?"

"A pity you plugged Terone," the Kid sighed. "That guy was a poor fish, but these scum are a vengeful lot."

"You reckon they've got wise?" asked Valet, then shrugged his shoulders. "If they try anything I'll settle the whole bunch."

The telephone bell shrilled, and the two men stared at it suspiciously. Only Terone's men and their own knew the number.

The Kid, at a nod from his chief, stepped forward and took off the receiver.

"Yeah, who's that?" He listened for a moment, then placed his hand over the mouthpiece. "Wanna speak to you, Joe. Sounds mighty like Terone's young brother."

Joe Valet took the instrument: "Hallo! What's doing?"

"This is Jack Terone speaking." A voice spoke very clearly. "You shot down my brother at the Chandos, and I thought I would warn you that the partnership is finished. What's more, you're finished. I've got a knife her with your name on it, and there's lead poisoning for some of you dumb gang. Try and get out, then see what's coming to you."

Joe Valet replaced the 'phone. "We're in a nasty jam, Kid." He lit a cigarette and sat down at the table. "Funds are getting low." He took out a pocket-book. "Forty bucks won't go far."

"How about quitting this place?" cried the Kid. "I feel as if I were trapped."

"Houston will have the outskirts well watched." Valet was looking through his papers. "He'll probably have an extra hundred cops under his command after last night's show-down. We're in a jam, but I've been in others, and— His voice trailed away, and the Kid saw the intent way Valet was reading a cutting.

"What's that, Joe?"

"The way out," Valet grinned. "Read it."

A paper cutting announcing the probable engagement of Alice Lang to Captain William Houston.

Alice had driven Bill to headquarters, and after he had kissed her looked at him reproachfully.

"I've scarcely seen you these last few days. I shall be glad when that terrible gunman is captured."

"Won't be long now, sweetheart." He smiled down at the sweet face. "Now you go straight home. The light's fading and I don't like to think of you out at night."

"Oh, I'm safe enough," scoffed Alice. "Try and come round some time this evening."

October 17th 1931

A salute, and for a moment William Houston watched the powerful two-seater speed away. He did not see the shabby touring four-seater car that came round a corner and took the same route.

Four men sat in that car, and their faces were set in grim lines.

Alice was almost home when the car came abreast of her, and when she edged towards the kerb so did the other car.

"What are you men doing?" cried the girl, and tried to accelerate to get clear.

The only answer was the roar of a powerful engine. The girl gave a startled scream as a door opened and a man stood poised on the running-board. She screamed again when the man leapt.

Valet Dictates Terms.

THE police commissioner's office. At the huge mahogany desk sat a bowed, frightened man, whilst the chief, Detective Muldoon and Houston stared at each other in perplexity.

"What's happened to Alice? What's happened to Alice?" wailed Commissioner Lang for the hundredth time. "Where's my darling gone?"

"Perhaps the car went wrong!" weakly suggested the chief.

"Would the car be found half through a hedge," raved the father. "And there's nothing the matter with the car. In spite of smashed and bent wings, it was driven back here. There are a number of parcels in the back, Alice's gloves and yet no sign of my daughter. She's been kidnapped! But by whom?" His face was contorted as he stared at his officers. "Why can't you fools do something? Why can't you find her?"

The outburst was excusable. The commissioner was driven frantic with worry over his only child.

Houston was worried, but he tried to disguise his fears. Could one man have kidnapped Alice? Was the reason ransom? Lang was a popular commissioner, and the perpetrator of such a deed must know that the whole of Lincoln would be roused. The commissioner was not a poor man, yet not sufficiently wealthy to warrant a ransom. Was there some other motive behind this abduction?

"What do you make of this, Houston?" The police chief turned to his subordinate. "The commissioner has no enemies. Might not Miss Lang have hurt herself and received attention from a doctor?"

"The car was found two hours ago and the radiator was still warm." Houston stared before him with gloomy eyes. "Only one man might have done this."

"You mean Valet?" asked the detective.

"I hope to heaven I'm wrong." Houston could not face the agony on the commissioner's face. "Who else—"

The telephone bell made them all jump, so great was the nervous strain.

Commissioner Lang answered the call—perhaps one of the patrols had gained some important clue or even found Alice.

"Is that Commissioner Lang's office?" drawled a voice.

"Yes—speaking."

"Feeling a bit hot-up, aren't you?" came the soft, mocking voice. "Wondering where your dear daughter Alice can have got to."

"Alice! Alice! What do you know about my daughter?"

William Houston grabbed up another instrument, for he knew in a flash who was speaking to the commissioner.

"You've found a deserted car and you don't know what's happened to her. You needn't bother to look any further, because she's in safe hands. This is Joe Valet talking."

"Valet!" The commissioner turned a haggard face to Houston. "He's got Alice."

"Find out his game, sir," whispered Houston. "Then let me talk to him."

"You say Alice is with you?" The commissioner spoke in a shaky voice. "Are you crazy to have done such a thing? What little chance you had of a light sentence is gone."

"Oh, yeah, I know all that," Valet laughed. "I was due for the hot squat in any case and the abduction of a beautiful young girl don't make matters any worse. Yeah, I'll say she's pretty—I'm looking at her now. Like to know why I've invited her to my abode? I won't waste time, but just tell you. Her life or mine—make your choice!"

"My G— You can't mean—" The commissioner was palsied with fright.

"Let me speak, sir," cried Houston, and took the 'phone from the trembling fingers. "Valet, this is Houston speaking."

"Dear old Bill."

"Cut out the smooth stuff," raged his one-time friend. "If you harm Alice I'll kill you with my own hands."

"You might try," was the answer; "but at the moment that's impossible. Unless the cops are withdrawn from the Steps and I'm allowed to leave this town something may happen to Alice. It is now six o'clock—I give you an hour to decide. In one hour I'll ring up again, and then it's up to you and the commissioner. Perhaps you'd like to decide now—I'll hold on."

The commissioner had taken up the other 'phone. Duty was forgotten in his love for his daughter.

"We've got to let him go," came his agonised cry. "I'll order the withdrawal of the cordon at once. Tell him I'll be responsible that no harm comes to him." He glared at his future son-in-law. "Why waste time—tell Valet he is free!"

"Wait." Houston spoke into the 'phone, and then put his big hand back over the mouthpiece before answering the commissioner. "We must not be too hasty, sir, to give way to Valet. If we give in without a fight headquarters—"

"What the heck do I care about headquarters?" the commissioner almost screamed. "It's my daughter I'm thinking about. You're supposed to be in love with Alice and yet you waste time arguing when every moment is precious."

"I'm as anxious as you, sir." Houston's voice was hoarse. "But there's the chief to be considered and our own reputations. I want to try and get Alice back, because if we give Valet his freedom the Press and the general public will jeer as us for being tricked. We'll play for time, sir—I think I can trust Valet to keep his word."

"But Alice, Alice—" The commissioner glanced from Houston to the other two men, and read their expressions. They were defenders of the law and, though Alice was his daughter, hated the idea of giving way to a crook gunman without a fight. "You're right gentlemen." The commissioner bowed his head. "I mustn't be a coward. We must fight Valet."

"Valet." Houston spoke into the 'phone, "you still hanging on?"

"Yeah—you been trying to trace it call?" came the sneering voice. "You be unlucky because—"

"You're so smart," interrupted Houston. "It's now a quarter-past and I want an hour from now. You see, Valet, you're in a jam, and we reckon your terms rather too excessive."

"Maybe you don't think I've got your dame a prisoner," Valet cried. "Just listen to this." A pause, and then a faint whisper. "Tell 'em you're scared stiff and that when I say you've got an hour to live I mean it."

"Bill, Bill!" Now he could hear Alice. "They tricked me here; they threaten to kill me, but I'm not frightened of them. Come and get them, Bill. I'm at the Steps, near the river."

Her voice trailed away in a scream of pain, and Houston, hands clenched impatiently, heard Valet speak again:

"The little fool nearly got a broken wrist for that. I'll give you an hour. I'm down in the Steps, but you can't find me in that time. In one hour I ring again, and if—" Valet rang off.

William Houston turned eagerly to the commissioner and the chief of police.

"I've got one hour," he cried. "It you've heard nothing from me when Valet rings up again, then let him have his liberty."

The Fight to a Finish.

WILLIAM HOUSTON had no definite plan when he left the commissioner's office. He was terribly anxious for Alice's safety, but mad at the idea of having to give in to a crook, even though that crook had once shared a dug-out with him.

Luck for the first time favoured them for a plain-clothes detective hurried up to them directly Muldoon and himself arrived in the dismal district known as the Steps.

"No trace of Valet," was the report. "Though I picked this up near the river." It was a silhouette. "I remembered what you told me about Valet and wondered if—"

"Done by Valet himself—a silhouette of the Kid, his chief gangster," cried Houston. "Muldoon, will you get back to headquarters and muster the flying squad, also the two armoured cars. Return here at once. You'll find Williams." That was the plain-clothes man. "And he'll report any progress or instructions."

Muldoon went away in the police car. "Now lead me to where you found this silhouette," ordered the captain.

Williams led his superior along several evil-smelling alleys into a narrow street. From the shadows of a wall he indicated three isolated tenement houses and a stretch of waste ground.

"Found the silhouette among rubbish shot on that waste," whispered the detective. "Those three tenements are joined together and honeycombed with passages, but I doubt if there are passages under the road, though there might be one down to that small building over there on the river bank."

"Smart work, Williams, it shan't be overlooked," approved Houston. "Get hold of two men to watch that shed, and get any others to hang around here and keep their eyes skinned. You get back and fetch Muldoon. I'm going to get into these buildings."

Houston drew his sloach hat over his eyes, turned up his collar and when an old car snorted past, gained the other side of the road.

Wooden stairs formed a fire-escape to the building on the extreme right, which appeared to be deserted as the windows were either filthy or broken. There were no lights though the building at the left end had several lighted windows and an air of occupation.

Houston suddenly ran up three steps and then flung himself backwards to the ground.

Crack! A bullet splintered the wood-work of the stairs.

How could he get up those stairs? The problem was solved for him.

A gun spoke twice from the opposite side of the street and there came a yell of pain from above. For a moment Houston was puzzled, then gave a gleeful grunt. Terone's old gang must be on the war-path against Valet for the killing of their chief.

Taking a chance Bill went up the wooden stairs and came to the exit on the first floor. At once a fusillade of shots rang out from both sides of the street, but none came near the police officer. Terone's gang was out for revenge.

Houston tried the door but it was locked. From his pocket came an affair of wire, which opened that door in a trice and without hesitation he entered, but in his hand was his gun.

A murmur of voices and Houston crept forward.

"Stop moaning, you little fool." It was Valet's harsh voice. "I'm going to put a call through to the police headquarters and if they don't draw off the cops something's gonna happen to you."

Houston flattened himself against the wall as he heard someone running towards him. A torch flashed but the beam did not show up the captain. A door opened, a streak of light, and then closed.

"Chief, it ain't the cops—it's Terone's gang," shouted the Kid. "They're on the other side of the road. All this shooting will bring the cops—we're in a proper jam now, chief."

"Oh, cut out the moaning," snarled Valet. "Get back to the roof and turn a machine-gun on any of Terone's gang you see, but lay off shooting cops if you can help it. I'll get through to that old fool of a commissioner and tell him that if he wants to see his daughter alive he'd better get busy."

The Kid reappeared and darted along the passage. Houston edged near the closed door. Quietly he turned the handle and then flung the door open.

"Stick 'em up, Valet," he shouted, and wisely kept well back in the shadows.

Like a flash Valet, who had been holding a telephone receiver, had whipped out a gun and fired. The bullet missed Houston and then the police officer's gun spoke. A yell of rage and the gun was smashed from Valet's hand.

Alice, with hands to athen cheeks, had backed against a wall.

But Valet was not captured yet. Behind him was an open doorway and like a hare he jumped backwards, and the door was flung shut.

"Stay there, Alice," barked her sweetheart and flung himself against the door. Next moment he was in a lighted room and there at his feet was an open trapdoor. Down a steel ladder Valet was swiftly descending and without hesitation, Houston went after him by sliding down the sides of the ladder. He could have shot Valet, but that was not his way of fighting an unarmed enemy.

Alice, disobeying orders, had crept to the opening and saw the two men fighting on the ladder. Locked together they crashed to the ground, which was a good fifteen feet drop. The girl cried out and closed her eyes in horror.

Outside a battle had been raging, but with the arrival of heavy bodies of police the fight went out of the two gangs. Already Terone's old gang had lost two men killed by the machine-gun, whilst the Kid and two of Valet's men were badly wounded. Muldoon led the police into the tenement houses whilst Williams dealt with the Terone gang.

It was Muldoon who found Alice.

The girl pointed to the trapdoor.

"They went down there," she cried. William Houston, bedraggled, with blood on hands and streaming from a cut on the face, drew himself wearily into the room. Next minute Alice was clasped tight in his arms.

"How about Valet, Bill?" asked Muldoon.

"We fell and lucky for me Valet was underneath." Bill freed a hand and pointed to the trap. "You'll find him—yeah, he's finished—broke his neck—I'm glad."

And whilst Alice cling to her lover and sobbed tears of relief Muldoon and the cops stared down at the still figure of Joe Valet.

"A proper clean-up," muttered the chief-detective. "Guess we'll have some peace round these parts for a spell," he chuckled. "The only excitement will be a wedding."

(By permission of W. and F. Film Service, Ltd., starring John Holland and Robert Gleckler.)

GRAND FILM NOVELS YOU SHOULD NOT MISS!

"TOO MANY COOKS."

Albert decided to build a house for himself and Alice Cook, the girl he was going to marry, but the members of her family, her friend, his uncle, and his chum did their utmost to upset everything with the best of intentions.

"HONOUR AMONG LOVERS."

A strong and dramatic tale of a young financier who loved a girl but lost her. Soon the girl found that the man she had married was a weakling. Starring Fredric March and Claudette Colbert.

ALSO
The fourth episode of the splendid serial drama of the sawdust ring, starring Francis X. Bushman, jun., and Alberta Vaughn.
"THE SPELL OF THE CIRCUS."

Bert Wheeler and Dorothy Lee in "Too Many Cooks." Don't miss these splendid yarns in this week's issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY. PRICE 2d. October 17th, 1931.

"THE MALTESE FALCON."

(Continued from page 20.)

"Well," he said. "Wilmer's our fall guy." And, as Gutman offered a protest: "There's no argument. You say 'yes' right now, or I'll turn the black bird and the whole gang of you over."

Gutman fingered his chin.

"Well—er—you can have him," he muttered, while Cook leaned limply against the wall.

Sam picked up the telephone, called up Effie, his secretary, apologised for rousing her and asked her to collect the suit case with the black bird.

"Now, Gutman," he said, turning, "let's get the details. Why did Wilmer kill Thursby, and how did he kill Jacobi?"

"Thursby was a notorious gunman," Gutman answered, "and Miss Wonderly's protector. We tried to persuade him to join us. When he refused, Wilmer got him outside his hotel. As for Jacobi, he knew nothing of the Falcon, except as a precious statuette that Miss Wonderly entrusted to him in Hong Kong. You see, he came under the influence of Miss Wonderly's charm, and agreed to bring the Falcon to America while she came on a fast boat. The Falcon went from Thursby to Jacobi, and from Jacobi, at her instructions, to you. Miss Wonderly's admirers have been many, sir, and she has used them all to her advantage."

"And I was next in line, huh?" mused Sam, and it was a subject on which he had ample time to ponder ere Effie showed up with the case.

The moment the secretary had gone, the case was hurriedly opened by Gutman, who then proceeded to scrape the enamel of the black bird with a knife. He had made several incisions in its surface when an expression of the keenest chagrin appeared on his florid face.

"A fake!" he snarled. "This isn't the real Falcon!"

"It's the only one I know about," said Sam Spade, and then, rounding on Ruth Wonderly: "Maybe you can tell them where the real one is," he jerked.

"No," she cried, and seemed sincere enough. "I swear this is the one I got from Kemidov in Constantinople. It's Gutman's fault. He was idiot enough to let Kemidov know the Falcon's value, and the Russian made a duplicate. Kemidov's made fools of us. Oh, what fools, chasing each other around the world for a lump of lead!"

"Too bad," Gutman murmured. "Oh, by the way, Spade, I'll trouble you for my ten thousand dollars."

"Don't be silly, Gutman," said Sam. "It's your hard luck, not mine."

As he spoke he realised that Gutman was covering him with a wicked-looking pistol. It was Cairo who relieved Sam of the money.

When the crooks had departed, Sam crossed to the 'phone and called up police headquarters. A moment later he was in conversation with Tom Polhaus.

That conversation over, he faced Ruth Wonderly. Never had she looked more appealing, never in his brief acquaintance with her had he had to fight so hard against that spell which had brought those other men to their ruin.

"You and Thursby double-crossed Gutman," he said quietly. "Then you double-crossed Thursby in favour of the more innocent Jacobi. Listen, Baby, don't lie to me. Thursby didn't kill Archer. Archer was not dumb enough to let Thursby catch him in a blind alley with his gun stuck away in his hip and his overcoat buttoned. But Archer went up that alley with you, and you—you shot him in the back! Why—?"

"Oh, Sam, don't talk that way," she pleaded.

"Cut it out," he jerked. "I'll tell you why you killed him—because you figured Thursby would be nailed for the murder, and then you would have the black bird all for yourself. But when you found out Thursby had been shot by Gutman's crowd, you got scared—thought you needed a protector—and came back to me."

She flung her arms around him.

"Sam," she cried, with a break in her voice, "I'd have come back to you anyway. The first time I saw you I knew, somehow, that sooner or later I would come back to you. I want you to believe that—"

The door-bell rang. When Sam answered the summons Polhaus and Lieutenant Dundy crossed the threshold. "Here you are," said Sam, producing an automatic. "The gun Cook used to kill Thursby and Jacobi."

"He's used another one since," Tom Polhaus rejoined grimly. "We acted on your information and went round to Gutman's hotel. We grabbed Cook, but Gutman and Cairo are dead. Cook—shot 'em."

"That ain't all," put in Dundy. "There's another murder to clear up—Archer's."

Sam laughed.

"And you've got it all figured out how I did it, huh?" he said. "Well, I reckon you know Miss Wonderly. She killed Archer—" Perhaps he faltered a little as he made the accusation, but he was not entirely the blind fool that those other men had been. "She was an accomplice of Cairo, Gutman, and Cook—until she double-crossed 'em."

"She's in cell number ten, sir," the matron of the women's prison told Sam Spade, several days after the trial and conviction of Ruth Wonderly.

Sam walked down the long stone corridor till he came to the barred door of the room whence Ruth Wonderly would walk to the gallows. She was sitting on a hard couch with her head between her hands, but looked up as she heard his step.

"You just couldn't keep away from me, could you?" she said, with a defiant trace of mockery in her voice.

He smiled a twisted smile, but deep down within him he felt a pang. In spite of everything he had cared for her, and since her imprisonment he had spent nights as sleepless as hers.

"They've just made me chief investigator for the District Attorney's office," he told her. "I thought you'd like to know, since it was through you I got the job."

"I assure you," she said, "it was a labour of love. Yes, just that, Sam." And suddenly she broke down, sobbing distractedly.

Could it be possible that some corner of her crooked heart had really belonged to him, that in the end she had come to look on him as something other than a pawn to be used as her wiles and cunning should direct, or as the force of circumstances should decree?

When Sam Spade made his way back to the end of the prison corridor he spoke to the matron earnestly.

"I want you to be very nice to that girl in number ten," he said. "Give her anything she wants."

"Very well, Sam. But who will I charge the extras to?"

"Send the bill to the District Attorney's office," he answered. "It's 'okay' it."

"But will that be all right?"

Sam laughed quietly.

"Yes, sir," he declared.

(By permission of Warner Bros. Pictures, Ltd., starring Bebe Daniels and Ricardo Cortez.)

HALLOWE'EN AND 'THE FIFTH'!

BOY DETECTIVE OUTFITS ARE ESPECIALLY HANDY AT THIS EXCITING TIME OF THE YEAR! DISGUISE OUTFITS, containing Grease Paints (Sallow or Chinese, Sumburn or Red Indian), Moustaches, Hair (assorted colours), removable Scars and Warts, Liquid for blacking out front teeth, etc. TWELVE DIFFERENT ITEMS, including valuable book, "Secrets of Disguise," only 1/6. Or larger, with extra grease paints, comic beard, monocle, etc., only 2/6. REVOLVER ELECTRIC TORCH. Pull the trigger and it lights! A bargain! Only 1/2. THE RANGING RAY TORCH. Gives out a beam that can be narrowed down to a searchlight ray carrying over great distances. Only 1/11. BLACK DOMINO OUTFIT (the set you use when you round up your man!). Contents: 1. Black Domino Mask. 2. Handsome Repeater Pistol which fires bullets rapidly over 80 feet. 3. FOUR boxes of extra bullets. 4. Pair of Boy "Tec Handcuffs" (strong and well made). 5. Boys' Secret Service Gold Finish Badge. 6. Spicendid Call Whistle for Outdoor Signals. Fun! Thrills! Excitement! Price complete, only 2/1. FOREIGN POSTAGE, 3d. in the shilling extra. These are all GENUINE BARGAINS. DON'T LOSE A MINUTE! SEND NOW TO THE BOY DETECTIVE SUPPLY STORES, Desk EC, 32, Cathcart Street, GREENOCK.

BE TALLER!

Increased my own height to 6ft. 3ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/- Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

GROSE'S		8, New Bridge Street, LONDON, E.C.4.		LUDGATE CIRCUS.
BILLIARDS AT HOME 1/- per week.
SIZE	DEPOSIT	4 monthly payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10/-	6/6	26/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8/6	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	20/-	12/6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	15/6	52/-

Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls, guaranteed unbreakable, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk COMPLETE LIST FREE.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book.—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d.

(Abroad 1/-, including Airport, Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W.A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.)

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Boys' Cinema

"RODNEY STEPS IN" and
"RED FORK RANGE."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boys' CINEMA 2^D

No. 619.

EVERY TUESDAY.

OCTOBER 24th, 1931.

Wanted for murder!

A thrilling drama of Western justice.

Starring BOB STEELE

The RIDING FOOL

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"The Riding Fool."

Steve Kendall, Bob Steele; Sally Warren, Frances Morris; Juanita, Josephino Velez; Ma Warren, Florence Turner; Bud Warren, Eddie Featherston; Boston Harry, Ted Adams; Nikkos, Al Bridges; Miss Scully, Fern Emmett; Sheriff Anderson, Gordon de Main; Col. Butterfield, Jack Henderson.

"Red Fork Range."

Wally Hamilton, Wally Wales; Ruth Farell, Ruth Mix; Black Bard, Al Ferguson; "Whip" Roden, Bud Osborne; Charles Farell, Lafe McKee; Sergeant O'Flaherty, Will Armstrong; "Apache" Joe, Jim Corey; Chief Barking Fox, Chief Big Tree.

"Rodney Steps In."

Rodney Perch, Richard Cooper; The Masked Lady, Elizabeth Allan; Stephen Dalston, Walter Piers; Tapper, Leo Sheffield; Inspector Grimshaw, John R. Turnbull; Detective Billings, Alexander Field.

The Brave Days of Old.

It is not very often that an extra in pictures is able to cut the figure that Manuel Vegas Canero did during the filming of "Adios," the new drama of California's fighting days.

Canero, an eighty-six-year-old native of Southern California, was of great value to the First National director, Frank Lloyd. Many of the picturesque scenes in "Adios" were made in accordance with the descriptions furnished by this extra, who was one of the two hundred working in the picture.

"Life among the early Californians was very agreeable," declared Canero. "I remember well the bandits, the gringo miners and the stage-coaches that followed rapidly the discovery of gold at Sutter's Mill. I was but a child in those days, but things didn't happen so fast as they do to-day. As I grew up I, too, felt the resentment against the ever-encroaching gringo. But that has all passed now. I would rather look back on the old days as I used to know and live them. Our pleasures, too, were organised on a business-like basis. Before the holidays there were committees of eight fiestejeros, or feasters, whose duty it was to plan the course of a series of celebrations from rancho to rancho.

"Each feaster had his vaquero—and let me remind you, please, that a vaquero is a man of distinction. The first officers of the State of California, all the men of proud families, were vaqueros. The term literally means 'all-round horsemen.' Actually, a vaquero was one who was sent riding on a mission, and accomplished his purpose despite all hardships.

"Let us say we would start the festivities at the old Santa Monica Rancho. Beforehand, the first feaster's vaquero had ridden up to warn the family of our coming, so that they might make ready the feast and prepare the October 24th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

JAMES HALL

"THE LIGHTNING FLYER."

Owing to his wild life, a rich young man is driven from home. Almost he has made good when tragedy intervenes. A gripping railroad drama.

"THE HUNCHBACK OF NOTRE DAME."

Paris in the grim days when revolution threatened to break in all its terror and ghastliness. A powerful story centring around the life of Quasimodo, the deformed bellringer of the famous cathedral of Notre Dame. Starring the late Lon Chaney, Patsy Ruth Miller and Norman Kerry.

"MAID TO ORDER."

A gripping detective story of a man's daring plot to unmask a gang of thieves. Starring Julian Eltinge.

ALSO

The ninth episode of our thrilling serial drama,

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

horses for our next journey. In a day or two we would arrive all on horseback, with the women riding on men's saddles with one knee over the saddlehorn. Generally we would arrange to arrive about four o'clock in the afternoon. After exchanging general greetings, the fiesta would start, and in it would be mixed serenading, dancing, feasting and merry-making, which often lasted until dawn.

"In 1881," Canero continued, "the Californians organised the Vaquero Club in order to perpetuate the old dances and traditions, which were rapidly passing with the picturesque customs. This club still meets regularly—but," he added, with a sad note in his voice, "the old days are gone for ever. Automobiles have ruined the vaqueros."

Many of the interesting and colourful episodes of the pioneer days described by Canero have been incorporated in the picture. In "Adios," Richard Bartholmess plays a rôle based upon the actual history of Marietta, the notorious Spanish bandit who was the Robin Hood of California.

The "Clapper Boy."

If the "clapper boy" were a seeker after film fame he would have good reason to feel sorely disappointed. For he is the one person in a studio who is filmed hundreds of times for a picture and yet is never seen on the screen.

His face, in fact, is always left on the cutting-room floor. It is there that his film career ends. Yet no picture can be produced without him. Imagine him, if you can, a youth in shirt-sleeves who, unlike the artistes, needs no make-up ere he steps in front of the camera. His emblem of office consists of two long and narrow pieces of wood. These, the "clappers" as they are called, are as necessary to him as the megaphone used to be for different purposes to the director in the old days of silent films.

But now two separate films must be made at the same time, one for sound and one for the picture. Immediately before the artistes are to begin their parts, the "clapper" boy springs forward and quickly opens and snaps together his pieces of wood. Then just as quickly and modestly he retires to allow the artistes to start. His action and sound have, meanwhile, been recorded, and the instant the artistes have finished the "clapper" boy repeats his little performance.

The reason for all this is to enable the film cutters to know afterwards the exact point at which each scene began and finished before the whole is jomed together. The completed film then goes to the cinemas minus the face of the "clapper" boy and his sound.

From Aviation to Films.

One of the new artistes who have been signed on a long term contract by Columbia Pictures is Robert Alden, who created such an impression in "Paramount on Parade" and "Only the Brave."

When Alden left college he became a civil engineer, but soon tired of the life and secured an engagement with a small theatrical company. Then he became interested in aviation and soon earned his pilot's certificate. About seven months ago, however, he had a marvellous escape from death when a broken wing caused him to crash from a height of 3,200 feet.

For several months he lost the power of speech and it seemed as though he would never again be able to take up acting. But skilful medical attention and his own will-power combined to pull him through, with his speech as good as it was before. He is now determined to climb the ladder of success to film stardom.

Action, thrills, romance and humour in a story showing how a dare-devil cowpuncher and a reckless gambler brought a desperate bandit to justice.

THE RIDING FOOL

Starring
BOB STEELE, TED ADAMS and FRANCES MORRIS.

The Neck-Tie Party.

TWO men stood near the end of the long bar in the saloon at Gulf Centre, Nevada. One was a blond young fellow whose manner seemed peculiarly agitated. The other was a big, swarthy Mexican known as Nikkos, a figure of some notoriety in and around the little Western township.

"Here's to Boston Harry," said Nikkos, raising his glass of mezcal whisky. "Eef he could draw a gun so quick as he draw the ace from his sleeve, then they would not be hanging heem now."

The other clawed at his arm feverishly. He seemed distraught to the point of terror.

"Cut it out, Nick," he pleaded. "Don't talk that way. Cut it out, will yuh?"

Nikkos smiled, and then, lowering his voice, leaned nearer to him.

"Lees'n, Bud Warren," he said, "do you think I would tell anyone I saw you keel Jim Beckworth? Boston Harry Preston, he is no friend of mine, hut do you theenk I would let them string heem up in your place eef I wasn't your partner?"

Bud Warren looked at him piteously. In spite of the Mexican's declaration of loyalty, there was a queer, sinister expression on his dark-skinned features.

"You always claimed you was my friend, Nick," Bud Warren faltered.

"Sure I am your friend," the Mexican rejoined. "So much your friend that I am going to stick weeth you when you take that stage to Poker City." And he looked at Warren slyly. Bud started.

"Who told you I was goin' there?" he jerked, and with that the Mexican's manner seemed to undergo a change. The ambiguous smile vanished from his countenance, and the scowl that took its place was one of dark menace.

"Don't try to fool me," he warned. "We have been friends too long for you to be playing the lone hand."

"I'll be back," Bud Warren protested. "I just want to go an' see my folks."

"You will be back?" Nikkos echoed. "I am going weeth you, anigo."

At that particular moment a young man who had figured in their conversation was being led forth on horseback to a tract of convenient woodland some distance from Gulf Centre.

He was Boston Harry Preston, gambler by profession, gentleman of fortune by inclination, and, by an unlucky turn in the wheel of Fate, a victim of circumstantial evidence.

He was dressed with the care and expense which men of his calling generally lavished on their personal appearance. A Stetson with a well-turned brim cast a shadow over his thin, good-looking face. The ends of a cravat drooped over his fancy vest. The breeze that sighed across the hill-tops and fanned the mesquite grass of the rolling range stirred the skirts of his immaculate frock coat.

Thus, in sartorial splendour, with his hands bound behind him and a troop of stern-minded citizens riding alongside him as an escort, Boston Harry was conducted to a gallows tree that had already seen yeoman service in its time.

The fatal tree stood near the foot of a ridge, and, arrived beneath its spreading branches, the escort called a halt. A hand then withdrew Boston Harry's Stetson from his head, while another tossed a lariat over one of the stoutest boughs and adjusted the dangling noose around the captive's throat.

Boston Harry looked about him, his glance scanning the faces of the lynching-party as he made a final appeal.

"I didn't kill Jim Beckworth," he said steadily. "I believe in every man sticking to his own game—and mine is cards."

"You might as well save your breath," one of the escort observed, and, seeing no mercy in the grim looks of those around him, Boston Harry prepared to reconcile himself to his end.

"Oh, Bill," he murmured, addressing a horseman at his side, "take my watch. It's yours. Be sure you wind it regular."

"Thanks!" was the rejoinder, and the time-piece was removed from Boston Harry's waistcoat.

"You've got my gun, Dusty," the condemned gambler said to another of the band. "You can keep it."

"I was goin' to," came the answer.

"And, Bill," Boston Harry continued, "take my bank-roll, will you? And when you get through burying me—kind of decent—see that Juanita gets the money. This is just about going to break her heart," he added with a sigh.

"Break her heart?" someone echoed mockingly. "Ain't you figurin' on Steve Kendall to repair that busted heart?"

Boston Harry turned his head.

"Why, Juanita's in love with me," he retorted hotly, forgetting his plight for the moment as he answered the doubts cast on his sweetheart's sincerity. "She told me so."

"Ah, quit the speech-makin'!" another member of the escort growled. "You're takin' the high-jump, Boston. A killin' is a killin', an' we're takin' the law into our own hands because State justice has a habit o' wastin' a lotta time. An' that's jest what this speech-makin' is doin' right now—wastin' time."

The escort drew aside, and the man with the lariat made certain that the rawhide was fixed firmly to his saddlepeg. Then without a word he looped his reins and struck Boston's pony smartly across the flank.

The gambler's horse leapt forward. The rope sprang taut— And in the same instant a shot crashed out from the ridge.

The rawhide snapped as a bullet sliced it as cleanly as a knife-cut. Galloping on in full career, Boston's pony dashed across the prairie, the gambler erect in the saddle and a length of lariat trailing from his neck. From the lynching-party there came a sudden outcry, and every man in the troop reached for his holster. But before a single six-gun could be drawn a voice arrested them.

"Stick 'em in the air and keep 'em there!"

The men of the lynching-party glanced towards the ridge and saw a lone horseman riding down the slope, a forty-five in each hand. His leather chaps flapped against the thorny clumps of chaparral through which his cow-pony was picking its way. His sombrero, pushed to the back of his head, offered a full view of a bronzed, genial face crowned by a mass of dark, curly hair.

"Steve Kendall!" one of the escort blurted.

Steve Kendall drew nearer. The men of the lynching-party remained motionless. They were ten-to-one, but the newcomer had the drop on them, and they had already had an instance of his straight shooting.

"Throw your guns on the ground one at a time!" Steve ordered as he reined up before them.

The escort obeyed him, and as the last "iron" thudded into the mesquite grass one of their number spoke.

"Have you gone plumb loco, Steve?" he demanded. "You know Boston had it comin' to him."

"Maybe," Steve Kendall retorted. "But he never had a fair trial, an' I reckon the sheriff would be all riled up if he came back to town and found you'd been stringing him."

"Takin' a healthy interest in the law all of a sudden, ain't you?" another of the band sneered. "After the way you an' Boston have been fightin' over that Spanish dame Juanita you oughta thank us for stringin' him up."

Steve's lip curled.

"I don't need any assistance in my love affairs," he observed, and then: "Dusty," he added, "you and Bill ride over here. I'll take Boston's gun, an' likewise the wallet and watch he passed up."

These articles having been obtained, Bill and Dusty were ordered to rejoin their companions, and, after assuring himself that Boston Harry was far on the road to freedom, Steve commanded the lynching-party to face in the opposite direction.

"Turn around," he said, with a flourish of his forty-fives, "and take a nice long look at the scenery."

They wheeled reluctantly, and Steve backed his horse to some distance. Then with a touch of his spurs he rode off at top speed.

The men of the escort dived from their broncs and grabbed their six-guns from the ground. But before a shot could be fired Steve Kendall had vanished over the crest of the ridge.

Juanita.

TAKING the short cut that leads to Yuma across the Gila River Steve Kendall did not draw rein till he sighted an adobe Mexican jacal October 24th, 1931.

standing near a thicket of prickly pear.

He entered the dwelling to find a dark-eyed Spanish girl reclining on a couch, and as she saw him she sprang up with a joyous exclamation.

"Glad to see your little amigo?" he asked her, with a grin, as he caught her in his arms and lifted her off her feet.

"Steve, I 'ave been so lonesome," she told him. "I thought you were not coming back to Juanita. Ah, but I am so full of love for you."

"I always knew you were crazy about me," Steve declared. "That's what I told Boston, only the cuss wouldn't believe me. Oh, by the way, look what I got," he added, reaching inside his shirt with the intention of producing the gambler's wallet and watch.

Before he could bring them forth, however, there was a clapping of hoofs outside the jacal, and a moment later a heavy body blundered against the door. It jerked open to reveal the figure of Boston Harry, his hands still bound, and the sinister rawhide necktie still circling his throat.

"Mi madre!" screamed Juanita.

"He is a ghost!"

Steve grinned.

"You're not afraid of a poor little ghost, are you, Juanita?" he scoffed.

"You're a brave guy when my hands are tied, ain't you?" shouted Boston, glaring at Steve and fairly infuriated at discovering him in Juanita's home.

"Untie his hands, baby," Steve immediately ordered, turning to Juanita, and, as the girl obeyed hesitantly, Boston peeled off his frock coat.

The two men faced each other in the middle of the room where Juanita cowered in a corner. There was a moment of suspense while they circled watchfully, and then Boston sprang.

Steve parried a savage swing and snapped his right to the gambler's jaw. The shock of the punch seemed to sweep Boston's feet from under him, and he plunged backward over a table.

He picked himself up and charged like a maddened steer, breaking through Steve's guard by the sheer impetus of his rush and battering the cowboy against a wall. But Steve fought back at him, and, though he took more than one telling blow, he speedily proved himself the better man.

Boston was the taller, but lacked Steve's physique, a physique hardened by life in the cow-camps. The gambler went down from a terrific jolt to the solar, and rose, only to be floored again. Still he attempted to prolong the battle, but the frequency with which he assumed a horizontal position began to grow monotonous.

Within five minutes he could scarcely stand, but he was tottering forward gamely when he saw Steve withdraw something from inside his shirt. It was a timepiece, the glass of which had been shattered in the course of the conflict, and at sight of it Boston ripped out an exclamation.

"Say, that's my watch!" he cried.

"Where'd you get it?"

"The same place I got the wallet you willed to Juanita," Steve answered. "And here's your gun, too—in case you want to practise shooting a rope or anything!"

Boston's jaw dropped, and at the same time a sheepish expression of gratitude appeared on his face.

"So you're the guy that saved my neck!" he stammered. "Aw, why didn't you say so sooner, Steve? I wouldn't have given you this lickin'."

"What?" Steve raged. "Say, listen, I only saved you from that rope to let you see I was getting along with Juanita!"

The Mexican girl darted between them. Her eyes were fixed greedily on Boston's wallet.

"Do not believe his lies!" she told the gambler quickly. "He is a coyote—he let me go on thinking you had been hanged. Ah, it is you I care for! I am full of love for you!"

Steve could scarcely believe his ears, and stood gaping at Juanita.

"See, what did I tell you?" Boston observed to the cowboy with a smirk. "They all fall for me." And he kissed Juanita wholeheartedly on the lips.

Juanita returned the kiss and then wheeled on Steve.

"Give him back his money," she ordered fiercely. "Give him back his wallet, or—"

She never finished the sentence, for at that moment a figure stepped through the open doorway. It was the figure of the rascally Nikkos, and in his fist he grasped a six-gun.

"Up with your hands," he drawled mockingly, and as Steve and Boston whipped round: "I hate to see trouble with money, so I will take it from you," he continued.

He held out his palm with an imperious gesture, but Steve ignored it and pushed the wallet into Boston Harry's grasp.

"I'm giving you back your dough," he said to the gambler. "I reckon you know me well enough to believe me when I tell you I didn't mean to keep it, anyway."

Nikkos switched his six-gun on Boston, who was thereupon compelled to relinquish the wallet. Nikkos swiftly transferred it to his pocket, and then jerked his gun towards Steve as the latter attempted to reach for his hip.

"Careful, amigo," the Mexican warned.

Steve's eyes bored into him.

"I knew you were a dirty thief," he ground out, "but I thought you were smart enough to play safe."

"Play safe, eh?" Nikkos chuckled. "That ces good joke." Then his manner changed, and: "Get in that other room, the two of you—pronto! Juanita, open the door for them!"

The girl obeyed, and at the point of the gun Steve and Boston backed into a small, dingy apartment to which the light penetrated only through a narrow slit of a window.

The door was fastened on them, and Nikkos thrust his gun back into its holster and turned to Juanita.

"And now, sweet'art," he said, "who is the best man in the world, eh?"

Mindful of the wallet now in her compatriot's possession, the fickle Juanita sidled towards Nikkos affectionately.

"You are the best man, amigo," she told him. "And I am all full of love for you."

Nikkos grinned a wolfish grin.

"I knew it," he observed, "but to show I am not a thief, I leave you here with your two admirers." And with a taunting laugh that stung her into a fury he turned on his heel.

"Dirty peeg!" the girl flung at him, as she realised that he was proof against her wile. "I hope they catch you and keel you!"

Nikkos paid no heed to her. Pausing at the door of the room in which Steve and Boston were imprisoned, he called farewell to them.

"Good-bye, boys," he said. "Look out for tight collars, and keep the feet on the ground."

Steve and Boston heard him leave the jacal, mount his horse and ride away, but if the gambler had reason to vow vengeance on him for the theft of the wallet, the cowboy's mind was occupied by another feature of the whole affair. He was thinking of Juanita.

"I am so full of lov' for you," Steve quoted presently, in a bitter tone of voice.

Boston grunted. "Just a sap!" he observed, and Steve nodded gloomily.

"Me, too," he confessed. Boston glanced at him. "Well, who'd you think I meant?" he rapped out.

"You're not calling me a sap!" Steve raved, and next instant he was at Boston's throat.

It was the signal for hostilities to be resumed between them, and in the fury of their mix-up they hurtled across the room and crashed into the frail door. It gave way with a splintering sound, and they were precipitated into the larger apartment, finishing up in a heap at Juanita's feet.

The girl kicked at them viciously and indiscriminately.

"Get out!" she screamed. "Get out of here!" But it was neither her tongue nor the point of her shoe that put an end to the conflict. The drumming of hoofs suddenly caught the ears of the combatants, and, scrambling up, they rushed to the window.

They saw a band of men riding towards the jacal, and as they recognised the lynching-party from Gulf Centre they knew that the posse was headed for Juanita's home in the belief that they would be found there.

Steve and Boston dashed from the jacal and sprang astride their horses. They took different directions, and as they parted Boston Harry threw violent words over his shoulder.

"Just our luck to have them stop a good fight!" he shouted to Steve.

"You can thank them for savin' your life this time!" the cowboy retorted, clapping spurs to his bronco's flanks and heading for the pear thicket.

Poker City.

THE stage-coach ran into Poker City, the main township in a section a couple of hundred miles to the north of Gulf Centre, and as the lathered team of horses came to a standstill two passengers alighted.

One was a blonde and alluring girl of nineteen. The other was a young man of elegant manners and appearance—none other than Boston Harry, though he had forsaken that name for the pseudonym of Jones.

A man with a sheriff's badge stood near by, and as Boston helped the girl to descend the representative of Law and Order in Poker City touched his hat to her.

"Oh, hallo, Mr. Anderson," the girl greeted him. "Where's mother?"

"Your ma's up in the store, busy servin'," the sheriff told her. "Reckon she'll be powerful glad to see you back, Miss Sally."

He had hardly spoken the words when a little woman came bustling from the store he had indicated. She proved to be the mother of Miss Sally, and, after they had embraced, the girl turned to introduce Boston.

"Mother, I want you to meet Mr. Jones," she said. "We met on the coach, and he has been most kind to me the whole of the trip."

Boston doffed his hat and bowed gallantly.

"I am honoured, madam," he said to the old lady. "I would have known you were her mother, because no one but her mother could be so charming as—Miss Sally."

"Oh, Mr. Jones is a terrible flatterer, mother," Sally mentioned laughingly, "but really amusing if you don't take him too seriously. By the way, I've got a surprise for you."

"Wait till you see the surprise I've got for you," the older woman rejoined, and, leading Sally to the store, she hurried her across the threshold and pointed to a fair-headed young fellow standing near the counter.

He was that same Bud Warren who had been the particular crony of Nikkos at Gulf Centre. But, whatever his record, he was obviously a welcome figure to Sally.

"Bud!" she exclaimed, recognising her brother. "Oh, Bud, where in the world have you been all these months, and what have you been doing?"

"Oh, knocking around from one place to another," Bud answered evasively.

"He's been back a whole week," his mother put in, "and now that he is back we're going to keep him here."

Bud slipped one arm around Sally's shoulders and one arm around his mother's. "Try to get rid of me," he said fervently.

Meanwhile, back at the coach, Boston Harry was lifting down a suit-case that belonged to Sally Warren, and as he was handling it Sheriff Anderson moved past him and addressed the stage driver.

"Good trip, California?" he inquired.

"Yeah," the driver reported, "but I understand a lone highwayman tried to hold up Mormon Joe with the other coach this afternoon. It happened about an hour before I got to Twin Forks. Joe took a shot at him, and claims he shaved his wrist."

The sheriff pursed his lips, and then turned away thoughtfully. In turning, he caught sight of Boston, whom he had already noticed with the eagle eye of a man who made it his business to scrutinise strangers.

"Stopping long?" he asked Boston casually.

Boston coughed. "Yeah," the driver reported, "but I understand a lone highwayman tried to hold up Mormon Joe with the other coach this afternoon. It happened about an hour before I got to Twin Forks. Joe took a shot at him, and claims he shaved his wrist."

"Stopping long?" he asked Boston casually.

Boston coughed. "Yeah," the driver reported, "but I understand a lone highwayman tried to hold up Mormon Joe with the other coach this afternoon. It happened about an hour before I got to Twin Forks. Joe took a shot at him, and claims he shaved his wrist."

"Stopping long?" he asked Boston casually.

Boston coughed. "Yeah," the driver reported, "but I understand a lone highwayman tried to hold up Mormon Joe with the other coach this afternoon. It happened about an hour before I got to Twin Forks. Joe took a shot at him, and claims he shaved his wrist."

"Stopping long?" he asked Boston casually.

Boston coughed. "Yeah," the driver reported, "but I understand a lone highwayman tried to hold up Mormon Joe with the other coach this afternoon. It happened about an hour before I got to Twin Forks. Joe took a shot at him, and claims he shaved his wrist."

"Careful, amigo," the Mexican warned.

as he entered the building and saw Bud he stopped dead. But before he could beat a retreat Sally had turned and caught sight of him, and she immediately called him over.

"Oh, Mr. Jones," she said. "Mr. Jones, this is my brother."

Bud Warren's glance shifted to Boston's face, and as he recognised the gambler he blanched to the lips. His expression was one that Boston misapprehended, since he never dreamed that here was the real culprit of that killing for which he had so nearly been lynched.

"Why, I know your brother," the gambler said in the friendliest of tones, though his eyes seemed to hold a threat as they met Bud's. "He never told me he had a sister, though."

"Land sakes," Mrs. Warren exclaimed, "the world's a small place. Fancy you two bein' acquainted."

"Yes," Boston agreed cryptically, "the world's getting so small that you have to keep on the move to avoid bumping into one another."

Then, as the attention of the two womenfolk was diverted by the appearance of a neighbour, he drew Bud Warren aside.

"What's the matter, kid?" he demanded in an undertone. "You looked like a ghost when you first spotted me. I guess you left Gulf Centre before the boys discovered that slight mistake."

"Mistake?" Bud repeated huskily. "You don't think I did that killing, do you?" Boston asked him softly, and Bud shook his head with nervous conviction.

"No, Boston," he faltered, "not a chance."

Boston reached inside his coat and tapped a gun that he wore on a shoulder-sling which the garment concealed.

"There wouldn't be a chance," he warned, "for the fellow that talked too much. But we'll forget all about that, Bud. Let's go and take a drink."

Bud accepted the invitation querulously, but at the first opportunity he parted from Boston and took horse, riding westward from Poker City and pushing into the hills till he reached a gully where the smoke of a camp-fire was rising from the brush.

Sixty seconds later he was face to face with Nikkos.

"I'm glad to see you're all right," he blurted. "I heard Mormon Joe had winged you."

"Eet was a near thing," answered the Mexican, "but eet would not have been so near eef you had been with me."

Bud Warren bit his lip. "I had to be at the store," he protested. "It might have looked suspicious if I hadn't been there when my sister came in off the stage."

"All right," Nikkos muttered, "Only—don't have too many sisters. Lees'en, did you find out when that express money is due?"

"Not yet," Bud rejoined, "but there's somethin' else I've gotta tell you. Boston Harry is in town."

The Mexican's eyes narrowed. "Is that so?" he mused with a crooked smile. "Well, you don't have to worry about beem so long as you are friends with me. And if you want to keep friendly with me," he added darkly, "you won't find any more excuses to let me play lone hand again. You understand?"

Anderson Investigates.

A HORSEMAN rode through the brush and approached the out-buildings of the Bar Circle Ranch, owned by Colonel Butterfield, October 24th, 1931.

He was recognised by one or two of the hands as Sheriff Anderson.

The representative of the law dismounted, tethered his bronc and asked to see Butterfield, who emerged presently from the ranch-house, a small, spare man of about fifty-five.

"Have you put on any new men lately, colonel?" the sheriff asked.

"Yes," was the answer, "a man named Smith started last week, busting broncs. Why do you ask?"

"Never found out anything without askin'," the sheriff rejoined. "Matter o' fact, I'm driftin' around tryin' to pick up the trail of a man who held up the stage Mormon Joe was drivin'. Joe says he clipped him in the arm."

The colonel fingered his chin.

"Well, I'm sorry we're going to have trouble with road agents again," he stated, "but if you're looking for the culprit among my men you're barking up the wrong tree, sheriff."

"Where does this new hand of yours come from?" demanded Anderson.

Butterfield shrugged. "I don't ask any man his pedigree so long as he knows his business," he observed, "and this boy is the ridin'est fool you ever saw. You can take a good look at him now, sheriff, for here he comes with some of the boys."

A bronzed youngster, who sat a horse as if he had been born to the saddle, came galloping from the brush with three or four more of Butterfield's employees. His sombrero, pushed to the back of his head, offered a full view of the genial face of—Steve Kendall.

He swung himself to the ground close to where Butterfield and Anderson were standing, and the colonel beckoned him over.

"Steve, meet the sheriff," he said.

Steve held out his hand, whereupon Anderson immediately observed that his wrist was bandaged. An odd glint appeared in the sheriff's eye.

"Hurt yourself, Smith?" he suggested.

"One of those wild ponies I was riding the other day tried to scrape me off on the fence," Steve explained.

The sheriff looked at him keenly.

"Where you from, Smith?" he asked.

"Plumas County was my last stampin' ground," Steve answered.

Anderson put no further questions for the time being, but, turning to Butterfield, announced that he would have to be making tracks for Poker City.

"I'll come right along with you," the colonel told him. "I ain't been to town in some while."

The hands watched Butterfield mount and ride off in the sheriff's company, and when the colonel was out of earshot one of them spoke with a grin.

"Too bad the colonel has that case of heart trouble," he mentioned.

"Heart trouble?" Steve repeated, looking round. "I'm sorry to hear that. Must be sort of dangerous for a man of his age."

"Sure is," another of the boys declared humorously. "Specially when it's heart trouble over a woman. The colonel's been tryin' to ask the Widow Warren to marry him for the last two years. But he ain't got nerve enough to ask her when he's sober, and when he's liquored up she won't let him."

"He'll be liquored up afore the day's out," someone else put in.

The words were prophetic, for, shortly after dusk, Colonel Butterfield might have been seen tottering from the Poker City saloon, supported by the firm hand of Sheriff Anderson.

"You've had enough, colonel," the sheriff told him sternly, "and you're going right home."

"Now, sheriff, lishen," Colonel Butterfield protested stupidly, "there's a woman in this town—the shweetest li'l woman in the world, an' I gotta shee her. I gotta shee 'er an'—"

"Say, colonel, I've been lookin' for you."

It was the voice of Steve Kendall, alias Smith, and, on recognising him, Butterfield transferred himself from the sheriff's support.

"Steve," he said, "you're just in time. I'm gonna shee Ma Warren. We'll both go an' shee her together. I told her I wouldn't d-drink another drop, an' I gotta ap-ap-apologise for breakin' my promise. You tell her—you tell her it was your fault."

And in spite of Steve's protests the colonel conducted him along to the Warrens' Store, and blundered across the threshold with him into Ma Warren's presence.

There he introduced Steve, but had hardly presented the new hand when Mrs. Warren accused him of being under the influence of alcohol.

The colonel blinked at Steve. "Tell her," he said, and Steve loyally figured out an excuse.

"You see, Mrs. Warren, it was like this," he explained. "The colonel caught a little cold, and the boys thought a little drink would do him good—"

"I've heard that same story every Saturday night," Mrs. Warren interrupted, "but this time he's worse than ever he was. You take him back home and put him to bed, where he belongs."

Sally came round from the back of the counter, and, seeing her for the first time, Steve removed his hat.

"Oh, mother," said Sally, highly amused by Butterfield's latest escapade, "don't you think the colonel had better stay with us to-night?"

"Certainly not!" her mother began; but, after a moment's consideration:

"Oh, well, all right!" she granted. "Come along, then, John Butterfield, I'll take you to the house and put you in the spare room. Sally, you close the store."

"Yes, mother," the girl answered. "Mr. Jones will see me home."

"Er—Smith is the name," said Steve, as Mrs. Warren and the colonel were departing, "and I'll be delighted, miss."

Sally looked at him coldly.

"Good-night—Mr. Smith," she replied.

"I'm waiting for Mr. Jones."

"Oh—" Steve hesitated, and then: "In that case we'll both wait for him," he observed.

"You needn't trouble," she said. Steve grinned.

"Why, it's no trouble," he assured her. "I haven't anything to do."

She flashed an angry glance at him, and, turning on her heel, went behind the counter. But as she was passing along the back of it her elbow caught a pile of canned peaches and scattered them over the floor, and on the instant Steve hurried round to help her pick them up.

It was while he was stooping out of sight behind the counter that Boston Harry came into the shop. He saw only Sally, and doffed his Stetson with fine courtesy.

"Well," he announced, "I'm here on time."

"You couldn't have come any too soon to please me, Mr. Jones," Sally answered, still resentful at Steve's persistence in remaining.

Never suspecting the true meaning of her words, Boston looked at her ardently.

"If I had known it meant that much to you I wouldn't have waited this long," he told her in poetic accents, "counting each second until I should see you again."

Behind the counter, Steve recognised that unmistakable voice, and with a can of peaches in each hand he rose startlingly into view.

"Well now isn't that just too sweet for words?" he declared. "My name is Smith. Haven't I seen you somewhere before? The last time we met, I believe you were going away in a hurry. It was a farewell party—"

Boston's face portrayed amazement, chagrin and then fury in rapid succession. But Steve maintained his geniality of manner, and, setting down the cans of peaches, placed his hands on the counter with a salesman-like air.

"What can we do for you?" he continued. "How about a nice corn-plaster? We have a store-full of corn-plasters. I know"—on an afterthought—"a necktie. Here's one that would look very nice on you," he added, picking up a rope.

"Will you please stop this nonsense so we can close up the store?" snapped Sally irritably.

Steve laid down the rope.

"Are we ready to go?" he asked. "All right, You can come along, too, Mr. Jones."

"I wish I had your nerve," Boston said through his clenched teeth.

Nikkos.

ONCE again Boston Harry and Steve Kendall were rivals in romance, but this time the girl in the case was more worthy by far than the faithless Juanita, and both men had soon dedicated themselves whole-heartedly to her service.

Nor did Sally seem to look upon either of them with disfavour, for, in spite of a poor beginning, Steve's irrepressible good-humour speedily earned her regard, just as Boston's unflinching politeness and gallantry likewise won her esteem.

Boston had perhaps more opportunity of seeing her than Steve, and one day, while on the trail of a yearling that had wandered from the herd, the cowboy reined up on the edge of a gully and saw Sally and the gambler immediately below him.

Both were on horseback, and they had halted their ponies at the foot of the steep embankment. To the ears of Steve the voice of Boston came distinctly, waxing sonorous in a soulful oration.

"Ever since the first moment I met you on the stage-coach," he was saying, "I knew you were one in a million—"

Steve leaned from the saddle and reached down to pick up a piece of rock. When he looked into the gully again he observed that Boston had carried one hand to his heart and was gazing at Sally devotedly.

"No one," he cried—"no one has ever seen a man fall head-over-heels in love with a girl as I have for you—"

Steve threw the stone with unerring aim, and it struck Boston's bronc smartly on the hindquarters. The ravel of a spur could not have had a more instantaneous effect, for with a bound the animal launched forward, and, taken unawares, its rider described a backward dive through mid-air to land with a thud that raised a cloud of dust.

His horse dashed on at the gallop, and with an exclamation Sally whipped up her pony to give chase and overtake the runaway. Steve at once wheeled sharply and rode along the rim of the gully, but descended the slope half a mile farther on, and caught Boston's mount as it was dashing past.

He brought the runaway to a standstill and then waited for Sally to come up.

"Thanks, Steve!" she gasped, as he handed the animal's reins to her. "Boston took a fall."

Steve looked at her earnestly.

"That's all right, Sally," he told her. "I'd like to have the chance to do this for you every time I see you riding with Boston. I hope that fall wasn't his last."

"Oh, don't be silly, Steve," Sally answered. "He was kind enough to offer to ride over with me to Mrs. Harris's place. I promised to take some medicine over to her."

"Here he is now," said Steve, indicating a figure that was limping along the gully. Then, as Boston drew nearer:

"Did you enjoy your walk, Mr. Jones?" he inquired innocently. "It seems to me you were on a horse once before when you almost had your neck broken."

"I wonder what made the animal bolt that way," Sally murmured.

"I don't know," growled Boston, "but I'm thinking. What are you doing here, anyway, Steve?"

"Lookin' for a stray calf that hasn't the sense to take care of itself," Steve rejoined, with a grin. "But I'd better come along and take care of you," he added to Sally.

"Mrs. Harris' place is only a mile down the trail," she protested, and, after thanking Boston for seeing her so far on her way, she cantered on.

Boston mounted his horse, and, glaring at Steve, rode from the gully. Steve continued his search for the stray calf, but, also leaving the gully a few minutes later, caught sight of Boston crossing a strip of open ground that dipped towards an arroyo, and suddenly realised that he was walking his horse with an air of great caution.

Looking in the direction for which the gambler was headed, Steve realised why. Two men were in the arroyo, and seemed to be in close conversation. One of them was Bud Warren and the other—was Nikkos.

Steve changed his course, approaching the arroyo from another angle, but before either he or Boston were in earshot Nikkos and Bud Warren had completed a certain transaction that was occupying their attention.

"Here is your share, amigo," Nikkos said, handing the younger man a bundle of notes. "I am keeping these."

And he stuffed a wad of dollar bills inside his shirt, together with some articles of jewellery that included a necklace with a locket.

"That is fair, eh, my compañero?" he added.

"Yeah, I guess that's fine," Bud Warren answered nervously. "I'll see you later."

He flicked his horse with the rein and galloped off towards Poker City, leaving Nikkos to withdraw his portion of the spoil again and examine it greedily.

He was scrutinising the money and the valuables when he heard a rattle of stones, dislodged by horses' hoofs. Turning sharply, he saw Steve Kendall approaching from one side and Boston Harry from the other.

He made a snatch for his six-gun, but Steve had covered him already.

"Stick 'em up, Nikkos!" the cowboy rapped out.

"I hope you didn't think you'd have this little party all to yourself," he drawled.

Boston spurred close.

"Do you feel as safe as you did the last time I saw you, Nick?" he said.

"What do you want?" snarled

"But Nikkos is the guy you want!" Steve jerked, and on a sudden impulse of rage flung himself at the Mexican.

Nikkos, sticking his loot back into his shirt.

"I've been waiting for a settlement with you ever since you took that roll away from me," Boston answered grimly. "Come through! I want all you've got."

And as the Mexican made no attempt to oblige him, he dived for the money and trinkets that he had seen in the rogue's hand a moment before.

Boston counted the bills and examined the jewellery, which consisted of two or three rings, a watch, and the necklace with the locket.

"This don't cover half of what you took from me," he said, somewhat disappointed. "But it'll do on account. I'll have the rest off you the next time I see you."

He drew back, and Steve spoke again.

"Bud Warren was with you just now, Nikkos," he mentioned. "In the future, stay away from him. I don't think his sister would approve of you. Now, get goin'! Go on—beat it!"

"Remember, I get even with both of you for thees some day," Nikkos said darkly.

"Beat it," Steve repeated, with a significant flourish of his six-gun, and, wheeling, the Mexican rode away.

Steve turned, to see Boston stowing away the money and valuables he had taken from Nikkos in lieu of the bank-roll that the Mexican had stolen at Jupaia's.

"Don't I get anything out of this, Boston?" he demanded.

"Yeah," said Boston, "a bottle of nerve tonic."

Held for Murder.

STEVE rode into town that evening, to find a crowd gathered on the veranda of the Warrens' General Store. The sheriff was present and an air of excitement seemed to prevail.

Steve inquired if anything were amiss.

"Bandits held up the stage the other side of the pass," he was informed. "Ole California, the driver, was killed."

Steve shook his head at the news, and then walked on into the store. Sally was at the counter, and he walked over to her.

"Hello, Sally," he greeted, and then, dropping his glance to her throat: "That's a pretty locket you're wearing," he complimented.

"Boston gave it to me," Sally told him. "I didn't want to take it, but I didn't like to hurt his feelings."

Steve bit his lip.

"Take anything you can get from him," he said gloomily. "Why not?"

"You're jealous, aren't you, Steve?" she murmured.

He shook his head, but she reached across the counter and touched his hand, looking at him with her appealing eyes as she did so. He grinned a sheepish grin, then.

"I guess you called my bluff, Sally," he confessed. "I'm plumb loco-ed with jealousy."

Meanwhile, the group on the veranda had been joined by a small spinster who had been on California's coach when it had been held up.

"I am Miss Scully," she said to Sheriff Anderson, "the passenger who lost the valuable necklace on the stage. Have you captured the bandits yet?"

"No, ma'am," the sheriff replied. "We've scoured the whole country, but ain't found a trace of them hold-up men."

"Hold-up men?" a voice inquired.

It was the voice of Boston Harry, October 24th, 1931.

who had strolled up at that moment, and Miss Scully turned to him.

"They robbed me of the most precious thing I had," she explained. "It was a trinket my mother gave me to wear when I was wedded, but, you see"—regretfully—"I was never wedded."

"I'm terribly sorry," Boston observed politely.

Miss Scully was looking for sympathy, and as yet had found little, since her loss seemed trivial compared to the fate of California.

"I knew you'd be sorry," she said to Boston. "I knew you were a gentleman the minute I set eyes on you. Pity there weren't more gentlemen in this uncivilised place!"

"Er—pardon me," Boston rejoined hurriedly, "I am going into the store."

"I have a purchase or two to make as well," Miss Scully declared, and walked along the veranda with him.

On his way to the door Boston saw Nikkos lounging nearby, and shot an ominous glance at the Mexican. It was a glance that Nikkos returned with an expression of mockery that Boston did not understand just then.

With the little spinster at his side, the gambler entered the store, and Sally's conversation with Steve was interrupted as Miss Scully hurried across to the counter.

"I suppose you've heard about my being robbed?" the spinster announced.

"I want to write home about it at once, and need some stamps. I—"

Then she stopped, and next instant, with a swift snatch and a shrill cry, she seized the necklace that Boston had unsuspectingly presented to Sally.

"My locket!" Miss Scully squealed. "Where did you get it? Young woman, where did you get it? Sheriff!" she added in loud accents. "Sheriff!"

Anderson hurried across the threshold in answer to the commotion. He was followed by an inquisitive crowd, and soon the store was packed, the mob including Nikkos and Bud Warren.

"This young woman had my necklace!" Miss Scully accused. "The necklace that was stolen from me on the stage!"

Sally was standing with a look of bewilderment on her pretty face.

"There's some mistake, sheriff," she said. "The necklace she's talking about was a gift from Mr. Jones here!"

Anderson wheeled and looked directly at Boston, whose face had changed colour. As the sheriff's keen glance fastened on him, the gambler took a step towards Nikkos.

"You tell 'em where I got it!" he rapped out. "Tell 'em I got it off you this afternoon."

Nikkos looked him up and down. His glance was like a taunt.

"I knew you would com' gunning for me, Boston, after I took that girl away from you in Gulf Centre," he observed craftily. "That's why I stick with my friend Bud all time. I do not know where you go this afternoon, but I keep out of your way."

He looked to Bud Warren for corroboration, and the weak-willed youngster nodded quickly.

"That's right," he faltered. "Nikkos was with me when I was deliverin' the mail."

"But Mr. Jones and Mr. Smith were with me up till three o'clock, sheriff," put in Sally.

"And the coach was robbed between four and five," Anderson retorted grimly.

Boston made a gesture of appeal.

"Smith and I aren't murderers, sheriff," he protested, only to be interrupted by Nikkos.

"No," the Mexican sneered. "That is what you told them when they try to hang you in Phumas County, eh? Leesen, sheriff. This man's name is not Jones; it is Boston Harry Preston. An' dees one is Kendall, not Smith. They are partners—Kendall saved Boston's neck at Gulf Centre. Bud Warren, ho tell you the same."

"That's right," Bud said huskily.

"Boston threatened me not to squeal."

Anderson faced the two suspects.

"Kinda fits in, I reckon," ho stated. "A lone bandit tried to hold up the stage last week. Then his friend comes along, and California's outfit is held up by two men."

"But Nikkos is the guy you want!" Steve jerked, and on a sudden impulse of rage he flung himself at the Mexican.

Ho was dragged back by Anderson and several others, and at the same time Boston was made prisoner. The pair of them were being marched from the store when Sally ran after them.

"I believe in you," she cried distractedly. "I believe in you both!"

"I'd like to believe 'em, too, Miss Sally," the sheriff mentioned. "But the evidence is too strong."

Ho strode on, leading the way to the gaol, where Boston and Steve were placed in a cell and left in the care of a warden. There, more or less alone, with their solitary guard occupying a chair in the sheriff's office, the two rivals in romance but partners in misfortune looked at each other hopelessly.

"I'd like to get a shot at Nikkos," said Steve, in a bitter undertone. "And as for Bud Warren—well, it's just too bad Sally has such a skunk for a brother."

Boston nodded.

"We know now that Nikkos held up that stage," ho muttered, "and Bud Warren sure is hand-in-glove with him. Gee! I guess it would break that old lady's heart if she knew the truth about her son."

"And that's why you and I are never going to tell, Boston," Steve rejoined.

There was a spell of silence, which Boston was the first to break.

"Pretty square of Sally to stick to me the way she did," he muscd with satisfaction. "She must think a lot of me."

"Almost as much as you think yourself," snapped Steve, and it looked as if they were to come to blows there and then, when the subject of their rivalry entered the office attached to the cells.

The warden rose to greet her.

"Evening, Miss Sally," he said.

"I've come to see your prisoners," Sally told him. "Mr. Anderson gave me permission."

The warden shrugged.

"It's unusual," he declared, "but if the sheriff said so I guess it's all right. They're in the cell on the left."

Sally made her way to the door behind which Steve and Boston were standing.

"I just locked up the store," she told them through the bars, "and thought I'd look in on you before I went home."

"It's mighty nice of you to come and see me," Boston said enthusiastically.

"I was just tellin' Steve that no matter what the rest might say, you'd never doubt my word."

A troubled expression appeared on the girl's pretty face.

"I know you're both innocent," she murmured, "but if that man Nikkos is the culprit, how could he have been with Bud all this afternoon?"

Steve pursed his lips.

"Don't worry, Sally," ho said, taking it upon himself to answer her question—or, at least, to evade it. "We've got out of worse jams than this before."

Assuring herself with a furtive glance that the warden's back was turned,

Sally held a note through the bars. Boston reached for it, but it was to Steve that she handed it.

"Wait till after I've gone," it read. Steve scanned it, passed it on to Boston, and then glanced at Sally inquiringly. By way of explanation she drew aside a shawl she was wearing and revealed a pair of loaded forty-fives.

Steve took them through the bars cautiously and gave one to Boston, keeping up some trivial conversation as he effected the exchange in order that the warden's suspicions should not be aroused by a spell of silence.

A little later Sally said "good-bye," and, waiting till five minutes had elapsed since her departure, Steve moved close up to the bars again and called to the guard.

"Hey, Bill," he said, "have you got a smoke?"

"Sure," the warden answered, turning his head. Then, rising, he produced a packet of cigarettes and strolled towards the cell door.

As he reached it he found himself covered by a couple of six-guns, one in Steve's hand and one in Boston's.

"I'd hate to see you come to any harm, Bill," Steve mentioned, "but we sure mean business. Open up—an' open up pronto."

The warden reached for a bunch of keys attached to his belt. His hand was not quite steady.

The Two-Gun Garrison.

FROM the windows of their parlour, Sally and her mother watched a crowd that had gathered in the street. Nikkos was addressing the mob, but the two womenfolk could not hear his voice, and they were wondering what was afoot when Colonel Butterfield came into the house.

"What's wrong out there?" Sally asked him quickly.

"For some reason that Mexican seems to be urging them on to a lynching," the colonel stated. "But I fancy it's just a lot of talk."

Ho was wrong, however, for the sinister eloquence of Nikkos had inflamed the minds of his listeners, and the situation was assuming an ugly aspect when Sheriff Anderson appeared on the scene.

"Hold on, there," Anderson said curtly. "I reckon you hombres ought not to start anything around here. I'll see justice done in this town so long as I hold office."

"The law is too slow for us," a man in the crowd growled, and, that sentiment being echoed by others, Nikkos spoke up again.

"If the law is too slow," he declared, "you weel get quick justice if you string up Kendall and Boston Harry pronto."

The sheriff wheeled on him.

"Listen, Nikkos," he ground out. "You're a stranger in Poker City, and I'm warnin' you that if there's any more of this talk I'll put you under lock and key. And that goes for the rest of—"

He never completed the sentence, for at that instant there was a loud outcry. Every head was immediately turned, and the figures of Steve and Boston were seen to emerge from the gaol and make a dash for an alley-way.

The sheriff plucked out his six-gun, and a dozen other men did the same. A broken volley crashed out, and flame stabbed the gloom, but the fugitives dived into cover with lead zipping viciously at their heels.

"All right, boys!" yelled the sheriff. "Some of you head round to the back of the general store an' cut 'em off!"

It was an astute, tactical move, and effectively blocked the gaol-breakers' one route to freedom. Yet the two were in no mood to surrender, and, caught between two fires, they soon made it clear that they intended to defend themselves to the last cartridge.

Halfway along the alley, Steve darted to a side-window of the Warrens' store.

"Get in here, Boston!" he jerked, flinging up the sash, and the gambler clambered through the aperture, Steve following him swiftly.

They tumbled to the floor and ducked behind the counter. From the street came a regular storm of bullets that raked the interior of the shop, but the solid barrier behind which they were crouching shielded them effectively, and they answered the firing with half a dozen well-directed shots.

By tacit understanding they aimed "wide," meaning to refrain from drawing blood unless they were utterly compelled to do so in self-defence. There was only one man against whom they nursed any hard feelings—and that man was Nikkos.

Those few shots brought about the effect they desired, and checked the crowd's first impulse to rush the store. The men in the street scattered, and those who had worked round to the back of the store were likewise beaten off as Steve and Boston opened up on them through windows in that quarter.

The odds against the two gaol-breakers were overwhelming. Yet they were in a strong position, and, though it seemed that they must inevitably suffer death or capture in the end, it was equally plain that the affair would not close without several of the attackers biting the dust.

The sheriff held a consultation, in which he expressed his aversion to launching a direct onslaught. He had the entire man-power of the little western township at his back, but hesitated before a course that would mean loss of life.

"I reckon our best plan is to lay siege and wear 'em down without makin' targets of ourselves," he declared. "Somebody call those men round from the back of the store. We'll plant a barricade in the street and blaze off all our artillery at Boston and Kendall. It may make 'em see reason."

His scheme was put into operation, and willing hands dragged furniture and bedding from the houses to erect a formidable breastwork opposite the store. Behind this the attacking-party took up position, and a heavy fire was concentrated on the building in which Steve and Boston had taken refuge.

The six-guns of the two defenders barked in response, and were soon emptied. But, from a shelf close by, Steve and Boston obtained fresh ammunition and, presently exchanging their forty-fives for a couple of Winchester rifles that they discovered on the premises, they settled down for a prolonged duel.

"If they aim to smoke us out," Steve said between his teeth, "we'll let 'em see we can stand a lotta heat."

"Give me the chance to plug Nikkos, and I'll die laughin'!" Boston answered grimly.

The smashing racket of gunplay continued to echo through Poker City, and within the store the acrid drifts of smoke swathed the long counter from behind which the defenders maintained the uneven battle. Lead splintered the windows, and they heard the slugs thud-

"Let me talk to them, sheriff," he appealed. "It may save a lot of lives."

ding into the woodwork or ricocheting off the canned goods with which the premises were stocked, yet neither Steve nor Boston sustained any hurt.

No casualties occurred amongst the besiegers, but one or two men had their hats whipped off their heads, and Nikkos speedily found that he would be specially wise to keep his body under cover.

Twenty minutes after the firing of the first shot, Boston caught Steve by the arm and jerked his thumb towards the rear of the store.

"The sheriff's concentrated his men in the street, and we could beat it through the back door," he suggested. But Steve shook his head.

"Not a chance," he said. "If there were a couple of horses there we could do it, but there ain't. Before we'd gone fifty yards that bunch out there would be after us on broncs."

At that moment, which was marked by a lull in the shooting, the sheriff was holding another conference with those immediately around him.

"This may last for hours," he said, "and we appear to be wastin' a parcel of lead."

"We could starve 'em out, sheriff," someone observed.

Anderson frowned.

"That would take longer," he argued. "They've got enough grub in there to last 'em a month."

"Then why not go in after them?"

"Yeah," the sheriff muttered. "Only— we might be a little short-handed when we were comin' out again. If we leave this barricade they've got the drop on us—fair an' square. Be careful, there!" he added sharply to a man at his side, who had raised himself and been greeted by a warning blast of rifle-fire. "No use takin' unnecessary chances."

Even as he spoke, and while he was still deliberating upon the situation, there was a commotion farther along the street, and as he turned his head he saw a girl running frantically towards the barricade.

"Hold fire!" he shouted, as he recognised her. "Here's Sally Warren!"

With old Colonel Butterfield pounding along on her heels in a vain endeavour to overtake and stop her, Sally sped into the danger zone. The shooting on both sides ceased at once, and Sally reached the sheriff unharmed.

"Sally," Anderson gasped, "you might have got hurt! You can't take risks like that!"

"Oh, sheriff," the girl gasped, "can't you do something to stop the fight?"

There was an expression of wild appeal in her eyes, and Anderson looked at her sternly.

"There's no other way," he told her. "We could never get them to come out of their own accord. The whole thing is your fault, Sally. The warden tells me that you called at the gaol, and must have slipped those guns to them, and I'm telling you the law would have been mighty severe with you if they'd got away."

"But I know they're innocent," Sally cried frantically. "I just know it!"

The sheriff pursed his lips.

"I guess you must care a lot for one of them," he said shrewdly, and, with the tears streaming down her cheeks, Sally answered him in a fervent tone.

"I love him!" she confessed.

Colonel Butterfield came up. He was breathless from his exertions, but managed to find his voice as he dropped on one knee beside the sheriff and Sally.

"I don't know what it is," he faltered, "but something tells me this October 24th, 1921.

is all wrong—something inside of me. I—"

"Ho, there, sheriff! When are you going to go inside? How long we skulk here and let them hold us off, huh?"

It was the voice of Nikkos that had interrupted Colonel Butterfield, and the sheriff looked round to see the Mexican crouching at the far end of the barricade with Bud Warren. Before Anderson could make any rejoinder, however, old Butterfield spoke again.

"Let me talk to them, sheriff," he appealed. "It may save a lot of lives."

"All right," Anderson muttered. "Go ahead."

The colonel lifted his head to the top of the barricade and called out loudly.

"Can you hear me, Steve?" he demanded, and then, as a faint answer reached his ears: "Give yourselves up, you and Boston," he advised. "They're comin' in after you."

"And we're comin' in a shootin'," the sheriff added warningly.

"When you come," was the steady reply, "put Nikkos out in front!"

Nikkos caught the words, and with a snarl he raised himself to fire a challenging shot through the barricade. But even as he was in the act of drawing trigger he saw Bud Warren start to move from his side, and he swung around.

"Where are you going, Bud?" he hissed.

Bud threw an answer over his shoulder, an answer that was querulous and evasive, for the pangs of conscience were harrying his weak temperament and urging him to make a clean breast of everything ere two innocent men suffered for his own follies and the villainy of Nikkos.

"I'm goin' to my sister," he blurted.

A look of mistrust crossed the Mexican's face, and with all eyes fastened on the store he levelled his gun at Bud Warren's back. In the same instant that Steve and Boston fired at the crown of the greaser's sombrero, which had become visible to them, Nikkos shot his unwilling accomplice between the shoulder-blades.

Bud fell with an agonised sob, and there was an immediate outcry.

"Kendall and Boston have got Bud Warren!" someone shrieked.

Point-Blank Range.

SALLY and Colonel Butterfield were the first to reach the stricken youngster, and in a moment the girl was pillowing her brother's head in her lap.

"Bud!" she cried. "Bud!" But he lay motionless, betraying no sign of life, and a moan escaped her.

"They've killed him," she said distractedly. "Killed him!"

Sheriff Anderson tightened his grip on the butt of his gun. He had been contemplating action for some minutes past, and the shedding of blood resolved him.

"That settles it!" he called to the men about him. "We're going in!"

His voice carried to the two inside the store, and they rose from behind the counter determinedly.

"We've been able to hold them off so far without pluggin' anyone, Boston," Steve said, "but this looks like a show-down."

Boston did not answer, but he followed Steve's example as the latter laid aside his Winchester and replaced it by his six-gun.

"Hold on," Steve exclaimed all at once. "We've got a slim chance yet. If we plant ourselves one on each side of the front door we might slip out when they break in, and if we can grab our horses we might win clear."

"We'll try it," Boston agreed, and then, with a slight break in his voice: "If I don't make it, Steve—good luck!"

He held out his hand to the cowboy—for the first time in a gesture of friendship.

"We're making it together, Boston," Steve told him, and a moment later they had taken up their positions.

The sheriff and his party had risen to their feet, and, pushing aside the barricade, they advanced boldly on the store, covering the last few paces in a rush that brought them to the veranda.

Nikkos did not include himself in that rush, knowing that if he did so Steve and Boston were liable to make certain of him before they were seized. He skulked behind the barricade and watched the attackers hurl themselves against the door, and not till that door had been burst from lock and hinges did he move out into the open.

With the door falling before their onslaught, the sheriff and his followers swarmed into the premises in a body. Six-guns in their fists, they stampeded through the store, peering into the darkness as they blundered in the direction of the counter.

"Come on out," Anderson was shouting. "Wherever you're hiding we've got you now."

At that very instant Steve and Boston slid out through the doorway unobserved—unobserved, at least, by those who were seeking them at the shop.

Just beyond the threshold they came face to face with Nikkos—Nikkos

(Continued on page 25.)

OUR GRAND NEW ANNUAL.

Don't forget to get a copy of this wonderful new Annual. It is packed with thrilling film stories, pictorial articles and coloured plates.

Price 6/- net, at all Newsagents.

Men, horses and action in a thrilling Western story of White men against Red. Starring Wally Wales and Ruth Mix.

"RIED FORK Range"

Black Bard.

OVER the trail in a smother of dust dashed the Farrell stage, plying 'twixt Hangtown and Placerville in the gold-bearing frontier territory of Upper California.

Wally Hamilton, driver, was laying on the whip. His motive was not to break the record for the trip, but to save the shipment of precious yellow dust that the coach was carrying. For a hundred yards behind him a band of armed men were riding at full gallop, and the drumming of their horses' hoofs was punctuated with the smashing uproar of their six-guns.

The dust that rolled in dense clouds from under the carriage wheels formed a protective screen for Wally Hamilton. Bullets zipped through that haze, but they were fired at random, and though one ripped a hole in the sleeve of his buckskin tunic, he was still unharmed when another troop of horsemen appeared on the rim of a bluff to the right of the trail.

They were dressed in the dark-blue uniform of the U.S. cavalry, that body of well-drilled men who helped the town marshals of the frontier States to maintain order in the roughneck settlements, and at the same time kept a wary eye on the turbulent Redskin tribes. For in that year of '43 the West was a melting-pot of human passions and racial antagonism—lust of riches branding men's souls with evil, and the hatred of Indian for Paleface burning high.

Wally recognised the soldiery on the bluff as a detachment of dragoons from Hangtown, his destination, and he had no difficulty in placing the non-commissioned officer in command of them as a sturdy Irish sergeant known as O'Flaherty.

A slow-thinking man was O'Flaherty, with a mind hedged in by the rules and regulations of the Service. But there were occasions when he proved himself a man of action, and the present situation was one of them. At a glance he took in the scene on the prairie below him, and with a stentorian shout he led his troopers down the steep slope of the bluff and charged Wally Hamilton's pursuers.

The gunmen wavered before the impending onslaught of the bluecoats, then swerved with the intention of showing them their heels. But the suddenness of the troopers' appearance had left them with but a slender chance of making their escape, and before their pones were fairly in their stride O'Flaherty and his comrades had come up with them.

Two of the rogues had gained a start on account of having been hindmost in the pursuit of the coach. These two alone effected their getaway, the other three being quickly surrounded by the soldiery.

"Halt, ye spalpeens!" O'Flaherty rapped out threateningly, flourishing a revolver as he uttered the command. "Halt there, or we'll riddle yez wid bullets."

The ruffians obeyed him, and were dragged from the saddle by O'Flaherty's troopers. Meanwhile, Wally Hamilton had drawn his team to a standstill, and was returning on foot to the spot where the crooks had been overtaken.

He singled out one of the scoundrels, a big, scowling individual with a week's growth of stubble on his jowl. "Black Bard, huh?" he jerked, gripping the bandit by the lapels of his jacket. "Well, I reckon the marshal will be powerful glad to make your acquaintance. I understand he's been aimin' to offer you his hospitality for a long time—behind the bars."

O'Flaherty spoke:

"Did I hear yez say this was Black Bard, Wally?" he demanded. "The scoundril that's been murtherin' av innocent folk and stealin' av their money for the last twelvemonth?"

"The same, sergeant!" Wally answered. "And I advise you to keep a close watch on him. He's about as bad a hombre as you could find between here an' Las Vegas, which is sayin' a whole lot. An' he has a habit of breakin' loose from captivity."

"Begorra, he'll not break loose this toime," the Irishman declared. "McDermid"—to one of the troopers—"take him up wid yez on yer saddle. And two more of yez attend to thim other rascals."

Three or four soldiers who had spurred after the other two members of the gang rejoined O'Flaherty's party a few minutes later, and tendered the information that the fugitives had given them the slip among the hills. O'Flaherty was well satisfied with the capture that had been made, however, and he and his troopers followed up the stage-coach with their prisoners as Wally Hamilton drovo on.

The cavalcade reached Hangtown within an hour, and before Black Bard and his accomplices had been handed over to the town marshal the news of their seizure had spread through the settlement.

By the time they had been lodged in gaol, Hangtown was preparing to live up to its name, a body of the more prominent citizens marching upon the marshal's quarters with the intention of demanding summary justice.

They found a couple of soldiers guarding the door leading to the marshal's office and the cells, and one of their number, who took it upon himself to act as spokesman, demanded an audience with the representative of the law. The latter appeared on the threshold a moment afterwards, in company with Wally Hamilton.

The mob's spokesman addressed the marshal.

"Black Bard has terrorised the country from here to Placerville," he declared, "an' there's some of us here that hev' lost friends and kin at the hands o' him and his cutthroat gang. So naturally we don't aim to leave nothing to chance with the coyote, and we've brung a rope. I reckon you take my meanin', marshal?"

The officer of the law stroked his chin.

"Listen," he said, "Black Bard is all you claim, and I'm not the man to wish him well. But it's for the law and not for us to judge him, and it's for the law to decide on his punishment. At the same time I reckon I can promise you that punishment will be—the death penalty."

"The law is mighty long-winded, though," argued the crowd's spokesman. The marshal shrugged.

"That may be so," he admitted. "But the law is gonna be the bulwark o' this State, and for the sake of every honest man in California it's gotta be upheld. Can't you see that, folks? Supposin' you take justice into your own hands and ignore the proper course o' true justice—what hold is justice gonna have in the West? If well-meanin' citizens defy its principles, how are the seum to be kept under?"

It was plain that the marshal's shrewdly chosen words impressed the mob, and even the hot-headed spokesman saw the wisdom of them. He turned to the crowd and addressed it in a changed tone.

"I guess there's somethin' in what the marshal says," he observed. "An' I'm inclined to think, after all, that it's up to us to let the law take its course in the normal way. C'mon, folks, let's get back to our homes an' mind our own business."

Ho might have been less willing to leave Black Bard and his accomplices to the marshal's care had it been possible for him to overhear a conversation that was in progress in a wooden building across the street—the premises of the Frontier Express Company.

The Getaway.

WHIP RODEN had received callers—secret callers who had stolen in by the back door under cover of the night. They were the two ruffians who had been concerned with Black Bard and his fellow prisoners in the attempted hold-up of the Farrell stage, and who had been lucky enough to make their escape from the troopers.

Whip Roden was proprietor of the Frontier Express Company, running a coach in opposition to the Golden West outfit, owned by Charles Farrell, Wally Hamilton's employer. He was a powerfully-built individual of medium height, with a pair of shifty eyes and a streak of villainy equal to that of Black Bard himself, whom he found useful.

"We came here, Roden," said one of the fugitive gangsters, a bearded scoundrel known as Fresno, "because we figured it 'ud be in yore interests to git Bard outa that gaol."

"You figured right," was Roden's answer, "and I've thought up a hunch already. One of my men has got O'Flaherty out of the way by invitin' him into the saloon for a drink, and the only men left at the gaol are the two soldiers and the marshal. Now, listen—you wait here till Black and the others show up—see? I'll join you all after the town's cooled off. An' don't forget to tell Bard to lie low here an' keep away from the doors, for there's gonna be a rukus when the settlement finds out he's bust free."

"Ef he does bust free," Fresno said doubtfully.

"Aw, it's a cinch," Roden declared, and, opening his coat a little, showed

October 24th, 1931.

Fresno the handles of three six-shooters.

Roden left his quarters a few minutes afterwards and crossed the street to the town marshal's office. The two sentries at the door challenged him, but the marshal happened to be standing on the threshold with old Charles Farrell, and greeted Roden genially.

"Howdy, marshal," Whip Roden returned, and then, to the owner of the Golden West outfit: "Well, Farrell," he said, "I suppose you're lookin' after them relay horses o' yours, an' gettin' them all set for the Hangtown-Placerville run."

He referred to an approaching event that had been organised by the U.S. Government, who were opening up a regular mail service through the frontier territories, and had offered the Hangtown-Placerville contract to the outfit which could cover the distance between the two townships in the shortest space of time. That contract was of considerable value to any private enterprise such as the pair that were involved, and in this case success for the one must mean ruin for the other. Hence there was a spirit of keen rivalry between Roden and Farrell.

"I certainly am keeping those ponies in train, Roden," observed Farrell, "for a whole lot depends on the race."

Roden's smile was almost a sneer. "Yeah, a whole lot," he agreed. "In fact, when that race has been run one of us will be outa business—an' I don't intend that it should be me."

Farrell shrugged, and then, nodding to the marshal, made his way along the street to a building that constituted his home as well as the premises of the Golden West concern. When he had gone Roden turned to the officer of the law.

"Say, marshal," he drawled, "is that right you've got Black Bard and two of his men in the cell back of your office?"

"It is," was the rejoinder. "Sergeant O'Flaherty was out with a troop of the Dragoons late this afternoon and caught 'em red-handed tryin' to hold up Farrell's coach."

"Then I reckon the community's indebted to O'Flaherty," said Roden. "Wonder if I could take a peek at those coyotes, marshal? Black Bard is a hombre I've heard a lot about but never seen."

"Well, this office ain't exactly a peep-show," the marshal told him, "but seein' you're a personal friend o' mine, Whip, I guess it'll be all right for you to step inside."

Roden followed him into the office and across to the iron gate of the cell in which Black Bard and his gangsters had been lodged. The faces of the three rogues lit up as they saw Roden, but by the time he reached the bars their expression betrayed nothing of their thoughts.

"There they are, Whip," the town marshal said. "Make a pretty picture, don't they?"

"They'll look better swingin' from a gallows," Roden announced, and then, after studying the prisoners for a moment in feigned contempt: "Oh, unmarshal," he said, "what I actually dropped in to see you about was that race the government has organised between my outfit and Farrell's. I ain't altogether clear on the terms, an' I'd like to have another look at that paper they sent you."

The marshal nodded.

"Sure," he answered. "I've got it in the desk somewhere."

He moved over to a roll-top at the far side of the room, and, with his back to the ecell, began to search for the document in question.

With the marshal's attention thus diverted, Whip Roden stepped close to the bars and pulled aside the lapel of his coat to reveal the hidden "artillery" he was carrying. On the instant three griny hands reached forth and relieved him of the six-guns. "Wait till I'm outa the way," Roden whispered, and, drawing back, joined the marshal at the desk.

"Here we are," said the officer all at once, producing a paper from a drawer.

The terms of the race were already clear in Roden's mind, but he affected to read them again.

"Thanks, marshal," he drawled at length, handing back the document. "I reckon that's pretty straightforward. Well, I'll be driftin'. So-long." And he strolled out of the office and walked across the street to his own quarters.

Ten minutes later Black Bard pushed the muzzle of a forty-five through the bars of the cell door. The marshal had dropped into the chair before his desk, and was occupied in the writing of a report on the capture of O'Flaherty and his troopers had made. He had never an inkling of his danger until the weapon in Black Bard's hand blazed flame and lead with a smashing report.

The marshal jerked to his feet with a sharp cry of agony, spun around, reached for his hip, but pitched to the floor ere his fingers could close on the butt of his Colt. In the same instant the lock of the cell door was shot to pieces by one of Black Bard's companions, a notorious ruffian with Indian blood in his veins answering to the name of Apache Joe.

The crooks stumbled out of their prison and heard an outcry in the street. Next moment the two sentries appeared on the threshold of the marshal's office, their rifles in their hands. But Black Bard and his satellites had the drop on them, and their guns crashed at point-blank range.

The troopers dropped to the ground, and, running from the office, Black Bard and his men jumped their prone forms. Fifty yards to the right they saw a mob of citizens pouring out of the saloon, with Sergeant O'Flaherty at their head. The crooks' forty-fives stabbed the gloom with blasts of flame, and there was a yell of mingled rage and alarm as two of the crowd bit the dust.

Half-a-dozen revolvers answered the bandits' fusillade, but Black Bard and his men had dived into the shadows, and, the darkness swallowing them, they made a rapid detour and won their way to the back door of Whip Roden's premises.

In the meantime, while Hangtown's streets and environs were being scoured, three or four men dashed into the marshal's office. Wally Hamilton and old Charles Farrell were among these latter, and they waited anxiously while a doctor made a cursory examination of the escaped gangster's victims.

The two soldiers were dead, but the medical man announced that the marshal had a strong chance of living. This last piece of intelligence came as a relief to Wally and Farrell, but nevertheless it was in a gloomy silence that they eventually made their way into the street again.

Farrell was the first to break that silence.

"Wally," he said, "with Black Bard on the rampage again I'm glad my daughter is travelling West with the wagon-train that's due in to-morrow. I wouldn't feel any too easy if she was comin' by coach."

Wally came to a halt.

"I've been thinkin' of Ruth, too, Mr. Farrell," he stated. "I reckon you know what she means to me, and I sure would like to ride out a-ways and meet them prairie schooners. It's three months since she left to visit those relations in the East, and three months is a long time for a fellow to be without someone he's fond of. If I hit the trail to-night I could meet the wagon-train about sun-up, in the Injun country."

"Go to it, boy," said Farrell. "But watch out you don't run into Black Bard," he added solemnly.

The Indian Country.

BEHIND shuttered windows and bolted doors Whip Roden held consultation with Black Bard and the latter's gangsters.

"Bard," he was saying, "Farrell has gotta withdraw from that race for the Government contract and leave the field clear for me. And you can help me to make him withdraw."

"How?" the bandit leader demanded.

"Through Barking Fox, head-chief of the Arapahoes," was the answer. "Listen, Bard, you're pretty thick with that crafty old Redskin, and with a little persuasion an' some bribery I reckon he'd be willin' to let loose his bottled-up hatred o' white men and attack the wagon-train that's due here to-morrow."

"The wagon-train?" Black Bard echoed in bewilderment. "Whaddya want Barkin' Fox an' his braves to cut up a lotta immigrants for?"

Whip Roden smiled a sinister smile.

"Ruth Farrell is travellin' with that train," he said softly. "I want her—alive. I want her brought here, Bard, so I can hold her as a hostage—until such a time as her father agrees to back out of the race."

The renegade outlaws left Roden's premises shortly afterwards, and, climbing the saddles of a bunch of brones tethered in a near-by copse, filed quietly into the black darkness of the night.

They followed the Death Valley trail for a spell, but ere they came to that tragic graveyard of wagon-trains they struck off at the Tonopah Fork and pushed into the Arapaho hunting grounds of the Indian country. Three hours after leaving Hangtown they were in sight of the fires of the Redskin village that was their destination.

Apache Joe acted as interpreter, his knowledge of Indian dialects and customs standing him in good stead, and over a calumet filled with k'nick-k'neck tobacco the renegades put Roden's proposal to the Arapaho chief.

The Red Man's greed was patent from the glitter which appeared in his sloodark eyes as generous terms were offered him for the part he and his warriors should play, and he was not long in coming to a decision. The instant that decision was made, the Indian village took on a new and grim aspect, braves and squaws joining in a dance of death and rending the air with shrill, piercing yells, while the war drums throbbed an ominous, deep-toned accompaniment.

The uproar overwhelmed a sound that might otherwise have been detected by the savages. It was the sound of hoofbeats as a horseman, speeding through the night, approached the scene—a horseman who drew rein on the slope of a wooded upland and gaped upon the forms of the demon warriors capering through the lurid firelight.

The horseman was Wally Hamilton, and, dismounting, he scanned the village with steely grey eyes that suddenly picked out the figures of Black Bard and his outlaws.

Leaving his horse, he stole down the hillside, and as the clamour of the braves waned a little he heard the voices of Apache Joe and Barking Fox sealing the bargain that had been made. Then, a moment later, he saw the chieftain rise and beckon Black Bard to accompany him to his lodge.

They disappeared within the tepee, and, knowing that he was hazarding his life in the enterprise, Wally glided through a tract of underbrush and scrambled over the trunk of a felled tree lying at the back of the buffalo-skin tent. He was now within arm's length of the lodge, and, stooping, he distinguished the voices of Barking Fox and Black Bard.

In the council that had been held a minute or two previously the Redskin chief had spoken only in his own tongue, so that his people might understand what was afoot. But he knew a fair amount of English, and he was employing it now in his conversation with Black Bard.

"And what do Black Bard and his followers want with the white girl Farrell?" he asked the outlaw leader.

Wally started violently at the mention of Ruth Farrell's name and leaned closer to make certain of catching the answer.

"That is our business, O Barking Fox," said Black Bard. "The business of Barking Fox is to attack the wagon-train, slayin' and plunderin' at will. But you're on your oath to let us get clear with the white girl, or—no trade."

Wally was unaware of a figure creeping upon him from behind the big tree-trunk. It was the figure of a solitary Red Man who had discovered him eavesdropping at the chief's tepee, and with silent tread and upraised tomahawk the warrior moved nearer and nearer. It was only when the Indian was climbing over the log that the faint scuffling sound of a mocasin sole on the rough bark warned the young stage-driver of his peril.

Wally whipped round in time to see the Redskin springing at him. The glittering edge of the tomahawk swept down, but the white man caught the falling wrist and with his other hand seized the Indian by the throat, strangling the cry that sprang to the brave's lips.

Red Man and Paleface wrestled fiercely, but the muscular young stage-coach driver was more than a match for the savage. He forced the Indian back and back. The tree-log took the painted warrior behind the calves and tripped him. Both men pitched sprawling over the trunk, but Wally was uppermost and with a desperate effort he wrenched the tomahawk from the brave's grasp and struck hard and true.

As the youngster's head rose into view he swung up the bludgeon.

The Redskin lay still, and Wally rose to his feet and dived into the underbrush again, working his way through the thickets till he gained the strip of woodland where he had left his pony. He swung himself into the saddle and with a pressure of the knees sent the animal forward at the gallop.

The first grey streaks of daybreak that marked the eastern fringe of a vast sea of prairie found him still riding at the top of his horse's speed—riding to warn the wagon-train of the red hordes that were even now filing through the hills on the war-path.

The Attack.

A VETERAN Scout, in buckskin, crossed the rim of an upland with two or three immigrants at his back, and, drawing rein, turned his gaze upon a herd of buffalo that had gathered towards the south-west on the fringe of a vast salt meadow that had the appearance of a field of snow.

The Scout took a feather and held it before him. By this means he divined that the wind was blowing from the right quarter, and would not carry their "scent" to the animals until they were within forty or fifty rods.

"There's our meat, boys," he said—"enough to stock up the wagon-train through the rest of the Injun country."

And he was on the point of giving the word to advance when one of the other men pointed to the crest of a lofty hill a mile or so in their front.

"Look at that horseman," he exclaimed, "ridin' leather-ter-split."

A figure had topped the crown of the hill, and was coming down the slope at full gallop. It was the figure of Wally Hamilton, and before Wally had reached the group from the wagon-train another form had appeared on the skyline behind him, the form of a feathered Indian brave.

"Indians!" Wally gasped, reining in before the veteran Scout and his companions. "Arapahoes on the war-path! They're headed this way, and mean to launch a dawn attack on your wagons."

Even as he spoke the figure on the ridge was joined by others. They lined the crest, painted, half-nude demons, brandishing war-club, tomahawk, bow, and musket, and the wind carried a faint echo of their hideous yells to the ears of the Paleface watchers.

The veteran Scout pulled his horse round with a tug on the rein.

"Back to the wagon-train!" he jerked, and in a moment the hunting party was streaming over the upland to give the alarm.

They sighted the wagons half a mile away, and Wally was one of the first to reach them. As he threw himself out of the saddle he saw the tall, slender figure of a girl with dark brown hair and hazel eyes, and recognised her instantly.

"Ruth!" he cried, gathering her in his arms.

"Oh, Wally," the girl breathed, "it's good to see you! Somehow I thought you might come out and meet the wagon-train. I—"

Then she stopped, for all around her a dreaded shout was ringing.

"The Indians! The Indians are coming! Bring up those wagons! Bunch those cattle! The Indians!"

There were frenzied preparations for the onslaught, the cumbersome prairie-schooners being drawn up and formed into a corral. Ere the last wagon had been pulled in to place the upland to the west had become alive with swift-riding fiends, who filled the air with their terrifying death-howls.

October 24th, 1931.

The veteran in buckskin who had scouted the wagon-train across the vastnesses of the prairies watched the Redskin charge from the centre of the corral, and when the Indian masses were still several hundred yards distant he caught Wally by the wrist.

"We're outnumbered," he said grimly. "Every man, woman, and child is doomed unless help can get through to us! Son, will you ride for help?"

Wally's lips tightened into a firm line. He knew that he would stand one chance in a hundred, but it was not on account of the risk that he hesitated. He was thinking of Ruth.

"All right, old-timer," he made answer. "I'll ride if you'll guarantee to guard Ruth with your life!"

"While there's a cartridge in my six-gun and a blow in my fist," was the stern rejoinder, and with a word of farewell to Ruth the young stage-driver sprang into the saddle of his horse and dashed through the wagon-line into the open prairie.

He swerved out of the line of the Redskin attack. A couple of braves detached themselves and made after him at full whip, firing as they rode. Wally slipped one foot clear of its stirrup and slid to the flank of his brone, leg crooked over the animal's back. It was a trick he had learned from the Comanches, finest of Indian horsemen, and it served him well.

Drawing his six-gun from its holster, he craned round and fired over his shoulder. The foremost red man flung up his arms and pitched from his mustang. From the other brave's rifle came a vengeful blast of flame, and a bullet snatched off the young white man's sombrero.

Wally fired again and missed. But his third shot thudded into the bronze chest of the Indian and brought him crashing to the ground.

Wally pulled himself back into the saddle and raced on towards the hills. Yet still Wally was not beyond the gauntlet of red man and renegade wrath, for, fairly in the hills, he almost ran headlong into a small troop of Arapahoes, hurrying eastward to join the main body of their tribe in the assault on the wagons.

He avoided them and struck off into a deep canyon. Three of the band doubled back to pursue him, and bullet and arrow whizzed close to him. He blazed at them in return, and one of the warriors tumbled from his mustang, but the other two pushed after him determinedly.

The Kidnapping of Ruth Farrell.

WITH shrill yell and drumming of hoofs, the Indians flashed past the wagons in an ever-closing circle, even as the snake coils itself around its victim.

Bullets and feathered shafts raked the prairie-schooners, and from behind the wagon-wheels volley after volley answered the Redskin fusillade with snashing uproar.

Inside the wagon-corral, the veteran Scout directed operations, and strove to encourage the immigrants to maintain the unequal battle, knowing that no quarter was to be hoped for. Nor were the defenders lacking in courage. From behind the big prairie-schooners the men fired stoically at the whooping savages, and here and there a woman was to be seen standing shoulder to shoulder with the menfolk, finger curled around a trigger.

Such an one was Ruth Farrell, who evaded the vigilance of the Scout in whose care Wally had left her and picked up a wounded man's revolver to empty it into the Redskin masses.

Every now and then a defender staggered back from the barricades and collapsed, to stain the prairie grass with his blood, and those who still lived offered up a silent prayer that Wally Hamilton had gained Hangtown, and that the soldiers quartered there would reach the scene of battle in time.

The Redskins drew off, but not with the intention of abandoning the conflict—only to muster their forces and launch a second attack, more determined than the first, an onslaught in which a powerful body of them flung themselves from their mustangs and charged the wagon-line on foot.

Next moment a bitter hand-to-hand struggle was in progress at that part of the wagon-line which had borne the brunt of the rush. Revolvers blazed at point-blank range, and clubbed rifles fell with smashing force on feathered heads. But as a warrior fell another took his place, and ever and anon a tomahawk dripped blood.

It was the opportunity that Black Bard and his villainous associates had waited, and, unmoved by the fate of so many of their own colour, the renegades galloped towards the wagons, dismounted on the heels of the Redskins who had broken into the corral and ducked between the prairie-schooners.

They saw Ruth Farrell, the girl whom they were seeking. She was standing with an empty six-gun in her hand, and the veteran who had scouted the wagon-train was near by, ready to keep his promise to Wally Hamilton and protect Ruth to the last cartridge and the last blow.

Apache Joe stepped towards the Scout and diverted his attention for an instant while another of the gang approached the veteran from the rear. Next second a gun-butt crashed down on the Scout's head, and with a low moan he sank to the ground.

Meanwhile, Black Bard had seized Ruth and forced her through the wagon-line. She struggled frantically, but, swinging her off her feet, he planted her in the saddle of his brone and climbed up behind her. He was joined a moment later by his gangsters, and, without hindrance from their Redskin allies, the renegades dashed on the scene.

The Dash to the Rescue.

WALLY'S pony was already wearied by its long ride through the night, yet for some time it kept its lead, and only when Hangtown was in sight did its steps begin to flag.

With the township in view the two Redskins who had pursued Wally did not turn back, but pressed on boldly, gaining on the young stage-driver till they were within seventy or eighty yards, when one of them brought his musket to his shoulder, took steady aim, and pulled the trigger.

There was a flash of flame and a report, and almost simultaneously Wally carried his hand to his head with a sudden gesture and reeled in the saddle. His brain in a whirl, he was nevertheless conscious of an outcry in front of him, as a number of men on the outskirts of Hangtown raised a yell and opened fire on the youngster's pursuers.

The Indians wheeled and made off, but they were destined to pay dearly for their boldness in approaching so close to the town. A shower of lead zipped around them, and two of the bullets thudded home. The Redskins plunged to the dust, one with a slug in

(Continued on page 27.)

A gallant young man sees a beautiful girl being attacked and goes to the rescue, thus becoming involved in many amazing adventures.

RODNEY STEPS IN

Starring
RICHARD
COOPER
and ELIZABETH
ALLAN.

The Mysterious Masked Lady.

"SHE'S really a remarkable young woman!" murmured Rodney Perch. "Holding up fellows at the point of a pistol in the heart of London and ransacking safes, leaving the cash intact and slipping away. Soft, cultured voice, probably good-looking—"

"As she wears a mask, why do you assume that she's good-looking?" interrupted Stephen Dalston in tones that betrayed exasperation and impatience.

"I'll bet she's good-looking!" retorted Rodney Perch smilingly. "And something tells me that she's no ordinary crook. She—"

"You've got a touch of romance in your make-up, Perch!" broke in Dalston sneeringly. "You've been soaking up some of the nonsense in the papers. Not a soul has seen the features of the mysterious masked lady, as the fool writers call her. She's just a common crook, and she'll soon be laid by the heels. By gad, I wish she'd try to hold me up!"

A savage gleam came into the eyes of Dalston. He was a large-framed, rather fleshy individual with a heavy jowl. Seated in one corner of the Electric Club, he faced Rodney Perch, debonair, youthful, gay and faultlessly dressed. The two men were physical opposites, their one bond of communion being the fact that Dalston, prominent financier, held in trust the securities which yielded the younger man his more than comfortable income.

"Now what would you do supposing she held you up, Dalston?" inquired Rodney, masking a grin.

"I'd be ready for her," boasted Dalston. "I'm not exactly a fool with a revolver, and—"

"My dear fellow," interrupted Rodney, "by all accounts we've read the mysterious masked lady is a fast worker. You would be looking down the muzzle of a nasty thing that could swiftly terminate your flourishing career. A sharp command to elevate your hands and—"

"Rot!" breathed Dalston heavily. "Do you think that female crook would risk the rope? Not she. She has bluffed these cowards. Quite possibly her weapon isn't even loaded. One would only have to grapple with her and her bluff would be called."

"Possibly, Dalston!" murmured Rodney. "You may be right, but, candidly, I shouldn't care to take the risk myself."

"You—an old Rugby International!" cried Dalston scornfully. "Do you mean to tell me that you—"

"Up would go my paws," said Rodney. "It's perfectly true, Dalston, that I was fairly useful at football, but this dame isn't playing football. I don't think I'm a coward, but life is pleasant, although a trifle monotonous at times. I wouldn't risk losing the chance of watching the Yorkshire versus Kent match. That match may decide the Championship."

"I'm not interested in football!" rapped out Dalston.

"It happens to be cricket," corrected Rodney gently.

"Fool games, both of 'em!" snapped Dalston. He rose from his chair.

"Afraid you'll have to excuse me, Perch," he continued. "I've got rather a lot to do—"

"And I must pop off and dress," babbled Rodney. "I'm dining somewhere or other. Well, so long, Dalston. See that the masked lady doesn't pinch my boodle. Working for a living at my time of life would be very trying—particularly to the poor devil who employed me. The fair bandit—" "She'll be behind the bars soon," snorted Dalston. "And if I've got anything to do with it she'll be serving a stiff term."

"Can't say I agree with you, Dalston," drawled Rodney as he sauntered to the door. "The mysterious masked lady is giving us all a thrill. And we're badly in want of thrills nowadays. I wish one would come my way. But nothing ever happens to me—"

When the door had closed on Rodney, Stephen Dalston, a scowl on his heavy features, sank back into his chair again. He picked up an evening paper which lay on the table, gazed at the screaming headlines, then, suddenly, tossed it impatiently aside.

For a while he remained plunged in thought. They were not pleasant thoughts. Stephen Dalston, the rich and influential financier, the man whose monied interests covered so many enterprises, was facing a crisis. Things had gone wrong recently. The anticipated "boom" had developed into a slump. Some clever juggling would be necessary to preserve his precious credit.

Dalston felt quite equal to this. He had the utmost confidence in his abilities. It was a comparative trifle that was worrying him. The mysterious masked lady had made her raids on the offices of the various enterprises in which he held a controlling interest. Such a thing could not be pure coincidence. At first he had leaned to this hope, but now he could no longer deceive himself.

This woman knew—what was hidden from all but a select few. She knew his financial secrets. How? It was this constantly-repeated query which furrowed Dalston's brow. The daring raids had followed in swift succession. The safes had been rifled and the contents left intact. It seemed as though some qucer practical joker was at work.

The police were mystified. Stephen Dalston had poured the vials of his contempt upon them, and upon the cowardly fools who had been scared into doing the woman's bidding. All useless. The woman was still at large, the police as mystified as ever.

Stephen Dalston sat in his chair, October 24th, 1931.

thinking hard. Occasionally some club-man entered the room, but Dalston paid no heed to conversational gambits. His frown turned the gossips away. A plan was hatching in his agile mind. He rose and hurriedly left the club. He had formed his resolution. He would dine outside, free from the talk of garrulous bores, and—test the "hunch" that had come to him.

Darkness was falling when Dalston entered the ground floor of some unpretentious offices in one of the by streets off the Strand. Here was harboured another of his many enterprises, and one of the most secret.

Here he could make the test. A quiet street even in the day-time it was, at night, completely deserted. Rarely indeed did a passing wayfarer venture along the ill-lighted and uninviting thoroughfare. There was no caretaker on the premises. The somewhat gloomy building was divided into small offices. Dalston's enterprise was housed on the ground floor, the best offices the ancient house could boast of.

In the back office Dalston switched on the light, unlocked the roll-topped desk and let his gaze rest on the safe that stood in the far corner. He smiled sardonically. Then he whipped a bunch of keys from his pocket. With one of these he opened a bottom drawer in the desk, extracting therefrom a wicked-looking automatic pistol. He slipped the weapon into his pocket.

"Self-defence," he muttered. "That can't be argued away. If I have the chance—"

The words halted on his lips. Stephen Dalston at that moment, wore an expression which would have startled some of his club fellows. He was not regarded as a genial man, but had they seen him just now—

Impatiently he gripped the 'phone. A swift turn of the dial. A few seconds later Dalston was speaking incisively.

"Is that Scotland Yard? Then listen carefully, please. This call comes from No. 11, Well Street, Charing Cross. Ground floor of a block of offices. The mysterious masked bandit may pay this place a visit. Of course she may not. I'm acting upon something more than surmise. You can check the genuineness of this by ringing me back—Gerrard 4035. Yes, I am alone, but I'm taking no chances. My name is Dalston—it's a well-known name in the City. Right."

He replaced the receiver, an unpleasant grin on his full lips. In less than a minute the 'phone tringed and Dalston listened.

"Thanks," he said finally. "Maybe I'm troubling you for nothing. Yes, we'll talk later."

He replaced the receiver, the evil grin still on his lips. Then a soft sound caught his ear. He swung around in his swivel-chair, a gasp from his throat.

"Hand me the weapon in your pocket, Dalston. And hand it quickly. Believe me that nothing would give me greater satisfaction than to put a bullet in your brain. If you value your life act quickly."

He confronted a slim, girlish figure. Through the aperture in her mask came the words of command in tones cultured, feminine, but vibrant with icy determination. Her slender fingers grasped a small, silver-plated automatic, and the barrel was unshakingly directed at Dalston's head.

For a moment the financier gaped at this apparition as though doubting the evidence of his eyesight. Slowly his hand travelled to his pocket.

"You will hand me that revolver with the muzzle pointed your way," said the masked intruder.

Impotent fury surged through Dalston's being. This girl was holding him up as she had held up the others. He writhed in bitter humiliation at the thought. Yet the savage satisfaction came to him that his "hunch" was right; the police were on their way. If only he could delay her a little.

She took the revolver from his unwilling hand and tossed it expertly into a far corner of the room.

"Now, please open that safe," she whispered tensely.

"I'll be hanged if I will!" burst forth Dalston, half-starting from his chair, his eyes blazing.

"You'll be shot if you don't!" retorted the masked intruder. "Let's understand one another, Dalston. You have 'phoned for the police. I am, therefore, in a hurry. You have pulled out a revolver on me. It lies in this room as evidence. If I shoot you, I think I stand a chance of getting off. Perhaps you understand? Open the safe, Stephen Dalston, and open it quickly."

The tones of her voice sent a chill down his spine. He was no coward, but suddenly it was borne upon him that discretion was the better part of courage.

He fumbled for the bunch of keys, drops of perspiration standing on his brow.

"Quickly," she urged, menace in her tones. "I've warned you, Dalston."

A moment later he was hastening to obey her command. A purple flush dyed his cheeks. Sudden, savage joy sang in his heart. This female crook, this mysterious masked intruder, was a blessing in disguise. Let her rob the safe. Let her get away with its paltry contents.

For an idea had been suddenly born in Dalston's brain, an idea that meant to him a new lease of life and fortune.

Rodney Steps Into It.

WHEN Rodney Perch left the club, he made his way to the luxurious flat he occupied in the region of Knightsbridge, and, a moment later, was conferring with Tapper, his most efficient man servant.

"Any messages, Tapper?" queried Rodney.

"Captain Eekersley 'phoned to ask if you would play bridge to-night," replied Tapper. "He said—"

"You can 'phone him when I've gone and say that I'm engaged," interrupted Rodney. "I'm not in the humour for bridge, Tapper. I want something more exciting. I suppose you can't make a suggestion, Tapper?"

"Not at the moment, sir," answered the faithful servitor deferentially. "I'll think it over, sir. Perhaps something may occur to me."

"I'll prow! about and look for a spot of excitement," declared Rodney, half gloomily. "Things must be happening somewhere. Take the case of this mysterious masked lady, holding up cashiers in the heart of London."

"I've been reading about her, sir," murmured Tapper. "I should say that she's dotty. Robs safes and leaves the loot behind. No sense in that, sir. The police will soon nab her."

"So friend Dalston says," muttered Rodney. "We were talking about her this afternoon. He declares that she would never hold him up. And he was disgusted with me when I told him that I shouldn't argue with a lady holding a pistol to my head."

"And you're right, sir," affirmed Tapper. "You never know what a woman will do with a pistol. She might even aim straight. Better be on the safe side—no pun intended, sir. By the way, may I ask where you intend to promenade for this spot of excitement?"

There was a note of anxiety in Tapper's tones. It was not dictated by the fact that he had a very comfortable job and good wages. Tapper liked his young master.

"I'm not quite sure, Tapper," smiled Rodney. "I shall take a walk near the Thames and cruise round some of the dark, narrow streets."

"Would you think it a liberty if I came along with you?" murmured Tapper. "I'd hang behind, sir, only there if wanted, so to speak."

"I appreciate the suggestion, Tapper," replied his employe, friendliness and gratitude shining from his attractive grey eyes. "But I'm going alone—with my trusty stick. I fear, Tapper, that I shall spend a very dull evening. Nothing ever happens to me."

Rodney walked to his bedroom. He stripped and contemplated his excellent muscles in the long mirror.

"No use for muscles nowadays," he sighed. "I suppose I could make a fairly useful boxer, but I'd be too lazy to train properly. Pity I wasn't made to work for a living."

There was truth in this, more truth than Rodney suspected. The more than comfortable fortune inherited from a wealthy father, plus a streak of indolence, had deprived the world of a likely champion. For Rodney was more than useful at boxing; he had the makings of a great exponent of the noble art.

He dressed in leisurely fashion. Evening clothes were a ritual with him, and it was something to do. He reflected that, if the excitement failed to materialise, as was most likely, he could drop into the Cosmos Club for a dance or two.

It was a warm, pleasant evening. A taxi took him to the Embankment, and he strolled along the side of the Thames. He had lunched rather well that day, and felt that he could wait till late in the evening for another meal. The walk, anyway, would give him an appetite.

The shades of night began to gather. Rodney paused to light a cigarette. A somewhat tough-looking fellow, in company with another, flung a jeering remark at the "toff."

With a glow at his heart Rodney tossed aside the cigarette. Here, at last, was a spot of excitement. In another moment he was confronting the jeering tough.

"I shall have to teach you manners," he said briskly. "There'll be no charge, and your pal can join in if he feels like it."

The tough took a look at Rodney. Quite possibly he was a judge of what might be concealed under faultlessly cut evening clothes. At all events, he grabbed his inhandsome pal by the arm and growled:

"Garn, gov'nor. Can't you take a joke?"

A second afterwards Rodney was alone once more. He took his gold case from his pocket, extracted another cigarette, and sighed:

"Now that did look promising. But no luck again. Nothing ever happens to me."

Rodney took a seat, smoked his cigarette, and contemplated the great river that serves the world's mightiest city. That grey river held the key to a thousand mysteries. Many a fight to the death had been battled on its murky bosom; many a tragedy enacted. But now it looked as peaceful as a parish pump in the fast gathering darkness.

Rodney sighed again. He was suddenly conscious of a twitch of returning appetite. He would seek some restaurant off the beaten track.

He rose and walked on aimlessly. He left the Embankment and, ultimately, found himself in a netway of narrow streets leading northwards from the river. It was unfamiliar territory to Rodney. He looked around for someone to direct him, but the street in which he stood contained apparently no living soul but himself.

Then suddenly a gasping, half-exulting cry came from his astonished lips. The feeble glimmer of a gas-lamp revealed a man clutching fiercely at the arm of a girl. The two figures stood at the bottom of some stone steps that led to the front door of one of the old buildings.

"A bag-snatcher!" cried Rodney. He gripped his stick and rushed forward. A moment later that very effective weapon had come into violent contact with the bag-snatcher's cranium.

A Wild Ride.

THANK you! You have saved me." The words came gaspingly from the girl's lips. Rodney Perch, startled, a little breathless, gazed at her, noted that she was a most attractive girl, then looked at the prostrate figure at his feet.

"I say, I hope I haven't hurt this fellow too much," he babbled, suddenly and ruefully conscious of the strength of his arm—and the quality of his weapon.

"Come away—come away, quickly," was the girl's response. Her voice was sweet but imperious. She gripped her rescuer by the arm, and a moment later Rodney Perch, dazed, was flying with her up the dark street.

"I say," he gasped. "What—" "There's a taxi," she flung at him tensely. Her slender finger pointed to the vehicle slowly emerging from a side-turning. "Tell the man to drive to Gordon Mansions, Queen's Gate. Hurry. You—we are in danger."

Rodney needed no further bidding. His heart was filled with mingled joy and apprehension. He rushed to obey her command. And the young Cockney taxi-driver, peacefully smoking a cigarette, let it fall from his lips as he confronted the immaculate figure of Rodney, and saw, a second later, the slender figure of his woman companion.

"Gordon Mansions, Queen's Gate," commanded Rodney. "Step on it."

Bill Mullins, whose dream was to race at Brooklands, needed to hear no more. He "stepped on it" with the gay feeling that, at last, something interesting had come his way—something worth while, with a touch of romance.

Fortune favoured Bill as it is alleged to favour the brave. There was little traffic about. He swept into the Strand like a whirlwind, cut across a bus, missing it by a fraction of an inch, and was blissfully unconscious of the driver's pointed remarks, although they could have been heard by a stone-deaf man on the opposite side of the great London artery.

Inside the taxi Rodney again essayed conversation. But the girl, with a smile that dazzled him, answered:

"Wait till we get to the flat. I—I don't feel like talking just now."

"Of course you don't," replied Rodney contritely. "You've been upset. That bag-snatcher must have scared you. Fancy the fellow working his game in such a neighbourhood! The rascal. But I hope I haven't hurt him too much."

"What—what did you hit him with?" whispered the girl, a suspicion of a shudder in her tones.

"With this stick," confessed Rodney, holding it forth for her inspection. "It's loaded at one end and—"

"You are very strong," interrupted the girl. She gazed at him with a look which both fascinated and baffled Rodney.

"Ye-e-s, I am," admitted Rodney. "And I felt so angry when I saw that brute—"

"I can't say how much I owe to you," she broke in. "But, please, don't let us discuss that now. We're getting near. Will you give this to the man? He deserves it."

Rodney found himself gripping a pound note. He started to object, but the girl silenced him, imperiously yet charmingly.

When Bill Mullins, having cut all taxi records to ribbons, drew up at Gordon Mansions, he clasped two one-pound notes in his delighted hand.

"You drove wonderfully!" cried Rodney.

Bill could only gasp. He saw the two figures rapidly disappear from his view. He examined the notes closely and was satisfied.

"A couple of real toffs!" he murmured. "I don't care wot they've done—they're toffs! If I could only pick up a few more like 'em!"

Unconscious of the tribute they had received, Rodney and the girl made their way to the second floor of the well-equipped mansions. The girl opened the door, closed it carefully, and led the wondering Rodney into a luxuriously furnished room.

"First of all, I'll get you a drink," she smiled at him.

"That would be awfully nice of you," murmured Rodney. "If—if it's no trouble."

"Not the slightest," she retorted. "Everything is at hand. Will you please sit down? Oh, by the way, are you in a hurry?"

"Not the least little bit," affirmed Rodney enthusiastically. "I can stay as long as you like to put up with me."

"I'm so glad," she murmured, her eyes full upon him. "I owe you an explanation."

"That's easily explained," returned Rodney gaily. "And don't worry about thanking me again. What I did was a mere nothing."

"Are you used to—to knocking men out?" she asked, a strange look in her dark blue eyes.

"Well, I—I've done it before," answered Rodney, a glow at his heart, the words somehow forced from his lips because—because of that look in her eyes.

"I knew it," she said triumphantly. Her smile dazzled him. "Please sit down. I want a long talk with you. I won't be a minute."

She glided into an adjoining room. Rodney sat down. Alone, he murmured to himself:

"Well, I certainly have struck it at last! By Jove, what a story for Tapper! Wonder if he'll believe it?" Then suddenly a chill feeling doused his exultation. He saw again the prostrate figure of the "bag-snatcher," lying prone and—lifeless.

A bead of sweat gathered on Rodney's brow. He wiped it away with a silk handkerchief extracted from his sleeve.

The feeble glimmer of a gas-jet revealed a man clutching fiercely at the arm of a girl.

"I—I wish I hadn't hit that fellow—so hard," he muttered. "I could have knocked him cold with a dig on the mark. Wish I'd thought of it. I wonder—"

He ceased his self-communings. The girl was back in the room. He rose to his feet and took from her dainty hands the silver tray with its load of thirst-quenching implements.

"My maid is asleep," she said, smiling at him. "I told her not to stay up for me. Please help yourself."

"You Are a Crook!"

RODNEY PERCH, his thirst satisfied—or, at least, appeased—a cigarette between his lips, reclining in a luxuriously comfortable chair, in the presence of one whose fascination enveloped him more and more, forgot those qualms.

Rodney was an easy-going person, and the young woman he had been lucky enough to serve was a girl of undeniable charm. A lady, obviously, well born, well educated. So far she had not told him her name, nor asked his own. Their encounter had been so dramatic, Rodney thrilled at the thought. Her voice, soft and musical, an integral part of her charm, flowed to him.

"Do you think we got away safely?"

"Why, yes," replied Rodney, puzzled. "That taxi fellow drove like—like Kaye Don. But why?"

"The time has come to explain matters," interrupted the girl, that touch of sweet imperiousness in her tones. "There's no reason why we shouldn't put all the cards on the table. I know you—"

"You—you know me!" gasped Rodney.

"I don't know your name," smiled the girl. "Perhaps you have more than one. But I know what you are. It doesn't need much discernment. And I'm so glad."

"You—you are so glad," echoed Rodney, wondering if he would suddenly wake up and find he had been dreaming it all.

"I'm glad, because—because, like you, I am a crook," she murmured softly.

The room seemed to spin around. Rodney clutched at the arms of the chair. His lips opened, but no sound came from them.

"I am the mysterious masked lady," she continued. "Thanks to you. I was saved from capture to-night. Crook helps crook. Our meeting was providential."

"You—you are the safe robber!" gasped Rodney.

"The safe inspector," she corrected. "I'm no ordinary robber. I'm after something—but I can't tell even you that. Not yet."

"That—that fellow I knocked out," whispered Rodney huskily, icy fingers clutching at his heart, "he—he—"

"He was Detective-officer Billings," said the girl. "You see, I was running things very close. A bit too close—but for you."

Rodney rose unsteadily to his feet.

"Do you mind if I take another drink?" he babbled.

"Of course," she smiled. "And as many as you like. To-night has made us partners. We'll stick together, won't we?"

Rodney poured himself out a stiff bracer. He gulped it down and turned to meet the entreaty in her eyes.

"We'll stick together," he repeated, those eyes vanquishing abruptly the objections that rose to his lips.

"We must stick together," she said softly yet imperiously. "You came so gallantly to my rescue. You knocked out that man—"

October 24th, 1931.

"A detective!" gasped Rodney. "And I thought he was a bag-snatcher."

"You meant just to knock him out," continued the girl. "You didn't mean to kill him."

A sound came from Rodney's lips—a curious gurgling sound. Instinctively his hand rose and clutched at his neck, as though the tightness of his collar oppressed him.

"You may be a crook, but you are a brave man," whispered the girl. "Brave and wonderfully strong. I—I've never met a man like you."

"And I—I've never met a girl like you," gasped Rodney, and never had he spoken with greater sincerity.

With an impulsive gesture she placed her hand in his. Her eyes dazzled him.

"You—you know how to open a safe?" she whispered.

"Rather," breathed Rodney. He had never opened a safe in his life; but, under the spell of those eyes, he would have avowed his ability to open the Bank of England.

"I knew it," she murmured. "I want your help. So far I have failed, but failure has taught me where I can gain success. We'll open the next safe together."

Rodney dragged himself from the fascination of those sparkling eyes. He came to earth. He released her hand, which he had been holding in a fervent clasp, and stepped back.

"I—I'm afraid that's impossible," he said huskily. "You see, I—I happen to have a special job—"

"You must put that off," she commanded. "I shall make it worth your while. Whether we fail or succeed I shall pay you—"

"I wouldn't dream of taking money from you," cried Rodney indignantly. "I'm not hard up."

"Do you mean that you have done so well that you don't need money?" she demanded.

"That's it," affirmed Rodney delightedly. "I—I've had a lot of—er—good luck lately. In fact, I was thinking of taking a holiday."

"But you have another job in view," she said quickly. "You said so just now."

"Ye-c-s," murmured Rodney confusedly, "but really that—that was more to help a pal. You see, he—he's rather broke, and—"

"Then my money can go to him!" she cried, triumph flooding her tones. "And you can help me. I want your help. Can't you look upon me as a pal?"

"As more than a pal," replied Rodney, lifted from earth again.

"Then you will help me," she whispered, a faint colour in her cheeks. "I knew you would."

"Rely upon me," said the enraptured Rodney. "If I'm any good—"

"You—you're wonderful," she interrupted him. "With you as a partner I can't fail. Sit down, please. Let's go over the whole thing together. There's no time to be lost. And this is no ordinary safe. It's one of the latest. You know the kind?"

"I know the kind," affirmed Rodney, as he sat close by her side.

"But it will be easy for you," she murmured. "Just child's play. How wonderful that I should meet you!"

"Wonderful!" echoed Rodney, taking her hand again.

"Listen to me, please," she whispered, gently withdrawing her white, slender fingers from his clasp. "I want to give you all the details. I know you'll understand how important it is to hang these together."

"Don't say 'hang,'" interrupted Rodney, shudderingly, his hand shooting again to his neck.

"To have the details right," she corrected herself. "I'm not very familiar with crook language. You must teach me. You see, I'm only an amateur, after all."

"Heaven help the poor cashiers if ever you became a professional," murmured Rodney.

Her laughter was music.

"You are witty as well as wonderful," she cried, admiration in her eyes. "Promise me to make me laugh when we are on the job to-morrow night."

"To-morrow night!" gasped Rodney. "And to-morrow is Friday. I've never opened a safe on Friday."

"Then you're going to put up a new record," she said merrily. "And let me tell you that Friday is my lucky day."

A Lesson in Safe Opening.

THEN you were disappointed, sir? You found no spot of excitement?"

Tapper gazed on the just awakened figure of his young master. A neighbouring clock had struck the hour of ten.

"No, nothing to speak of, Tapper," replied Rodney, rubbing his eyes. He felt an urge to tell Tapper the amazing story of the previous night, but he restrained the impulse. Even the faithful Tapper might find his loyalty unequal to the task of preserving the dark secret.

"Bad luck, sir," babbled Tapper as he let the morning light into the bedroom. "You must have been pretty near the scene of the crime, too."

"The—the crime!" gasped Rodney. He sat bolt upright.

"This bumping off a detective," chattered Tapper. "The papers are full of it. But you'll read the account for yourself, sir. I won't spoil it."

"No, don't spoil it, Tapper," shuddered Rodney. "What—what sort of a morning is it?"

"Cold and drizzly," responded Tapper. "Nasty change in the weather, sir."

"Nasty change," shivered Rodney.

"Well, a good breakfast will make you forget the weather," retorted the voluble manservant. "Nothing like a good breakfast. They say, sir, that even condemned prisoners feel better for it. They always give 'em just what they fancy. The condemned man ate a hearty breakfast. How often you read that, sir. Well, now I'll be getting your breakfast."

Tapper eclipsed himself, and Rodney got up slowly and almost painfully. He gazed at himself in the mirror, then turned his eyes away.

"Excitement," he muttered. "I asked for it and I've got it. And more to come. Lots more. And yesterday I was moaning about being bored."

His dark thoughts switched suddenly to his new partner, his partner in crime. A glow radiated through him. How wonderful she was! The embodiment of charm, courage, resource. And a crook!

"Well, I'm a crook myself," muttered Rodney. "In fact, I'm worse. I'm a—"

"The bath's all ready, sir," sang the voice of Tapper from behind the door.

Rodney jerked himself into activity. Tapper, with all his deference, was a bit of a tyrant in the matter of prompt arrival at the breakfast-table.

Tapper knew what a breakfast should be. And Rodney, usually, showed full appreciation. But this morning—

A quarter of an hour afterwards Tapper found his master looking fixedly into vacancy.

"Why, you've hardly eaten anything, sir," cried the servitor, a pained look on his plump countenance.

"I—P've got no appetite this morning, Tapper," replied Rodney. "I—I'm not feeling well."

"Sort of strung up, sir," muttered Tapper sympathetically.

"Strung up!" gasped Rodney, clutching at his collar. "Don't say that, Tapper."

"A bit nervy, I mean, sir," explained the manservant apologetically.

"I bet you've been reading about the crime. Now you ought to have left that till after breakfast, sir. I make a point of never readin' the paper till—"

"I haven't read about the crime," interrupted Rodney, half hysterically. "I'm not feeling in the mood. Can't you see the bally paper isn't even opened. Use your eyes, Tapper."

"Quite so, sir," murmured the servitor, shooting a puzzled glance at his master. "Excuse my lack of observation, sir. I wish I could tempt you to eat something, sir. I—"

"I don't want to eat anything," groaned Rodney. "It's a good thing to fast now and then, Tapper. The medical men all recommend it. By the way, Tapper, do you happen to know anything about opening safes?"

"Opening safes?" gurgled Tapper.

"I said opening safes," retorted Rodney. "Supposing you had to open a safe, Tapper. You're a very handy fellow. I—I bet you'd do it somehow."

Tapper glowed at the compliment, not undeserved.

"Opening a safe, sir," he replied, "is a matter of delicate manipulation. You twiddle the dial—"

"Twiddle the dial?" echoed Rodney.

"Twiddle the dial," repeated Tapper, his hands illustrating the movement. "You keep on twiddling until—by the way, sir, I am talking of the modern combination lock safe."

"The combination lock safe?" breathed Rodney. "I wonder if—but go on, Tapper. I suppose you weren't by any chance a safe-breaker before—"

"Certainly not, sir," replied Tapper.

"A pity," murmured Rodney. "You seem to know such a lot—"

"Mere general knowledge, sir," replied Tapper. "But to resume. You twiddle the dial carefully, delicately. You listen carefully until you hear—"

The bell tringed. Rodney leaped to his feet.

"Someone at the door, sir," said Tapper solemnly. "Are you in or out?"

"Out," cried Rodney.

A few moments later Tapper returned, gravity imprinted on his plump features.

"It's Inspector Grimshaw from Scotland Yard, sir," he whispered. "Matter of great urgency, he says. I thought it best to say you were in, sir."

"You're right, Tapper," groaned Rodney. "I'm in right enough. The police are fast workers, Tapper. Don't believe anyone who tells you they're not."

"He's waiting in the library, sir," replied the puzzled Tapper. "Says he won't keep you long."

"I'm afraid he's right, Tapper," moaned Rodney. "Good-bye, Tapper. I shall see that you don't suffer."

Before the startled Tapper could gasp an answer to this amazing remark

At Last— A NEW Dictionary for EVERY Home, within the reach of EVERY Purse!

Nearly 100,000 WORDS

The Only Dictionary Entirely Written Since the War

Here's a chance to get a really wonderful new Dictionary—one that will be invaluable to you at school and will help you with your homework—for sixpence a week! The UNIVERSAL ENGLISH DICTIONARY will give you the complete history of every word in the English language—and what a fascinating history, too! It tells you what part of speech the word is, how to pronounce it, how it is used in everyday conversation, and so on.

For the past eight years Professor H. C. Wyld and many more clever people have been engaged on its preparation, and now it is to be issued in fifty-two weekly parts at sixpence a part. So you see that it is well within the range of the most modest pocket-money, binding included.

There is more—far more—in the UNIVERSAL ENGLISH than there is in the ordinary desk dictionary. And yet it will be completed in one large-page work, unlike the many-volume dictionaries of the libraries. In the solution of word-puzzles it will help you immeasurably, to name but one of the innumerable uses to which it may be put.

Accurately yet simply defined.

Over 300,000 shades of meaning clearly and interestingly differentiated.

Full etymologies.

Pronunciations simply indicated for the man-in-the-street and phonetically indicated for the scholar.

Hundreds of thousands of quotations illustrating phrases, modern usages and idioms.

A book for every home, every school, every library, and every office.

Binds into ONE Large Page Volume!

THE UNIVERSAL ENGLISH DICTIONARY

Edited by H. C. WYLD

Merton Professor of English Language and Literature, Oxford.

Buy PART 1 TO-DAY

6d.

On Sale Everywhere

Rodney slithered from the room. He entered the small library, his hands outstretched, and confronted a stern-faced, heavily built visitor.

"Here I am, inspector," murmured Rodney. "Slip 'em on. I'll go quietly."

Inspector Grimshaw laughed, although his laugh was more like a bark.

"You're good at joking, Mr. Perch," he said, "but I'm afraid you won't feel like joking again when you've heard my news."

"Joke! News!" gasped Rodney. "I'll come straight to the point, Mr. Perch," said the inspector brusquely. "Last night the mysterious masked woman held up Stephen Dalston at the point of a pistol. She forced him to open the safe. She got away with the contents. We were unlucky, Mr. Perch. My colleague, Billings, grabbed her, but she had a confederate near. Billings was knocked out—"

"Murdered!" gasped Rodney. "But, Inspector Grimshaw, I never—"

"Murdered be langed!" interrupted the inspector. "That's the silly yarn that's got in the morning papers. Billings had a nasty crack, but his head is thick. He's all right except—"

The astounded Grimshaw found himself suddenly violently embraced.

"Billings is all right!" shouted Rodney. "Dear old Billings! I can't tell you, inspector, how delighted I am. I'm just crazy—"

"I guess you are crazy, Mr. Perch," yelled the indignant official, violently tearing himself from Rodney's loving clasp. "Do you realise that I've got bad news for you? Listen to me. That girl robbed the safe. And your securities were in that safe, Mr. Perch. The securities Mr. Dalston held in trust for you. Dalston is so prostrate that he has asked me to convey the news to you."

Inspector Grimshaw stepped back, gasping. Rodney Perch was smiling.

"The fellow's an idiot," murmured the inspector to himself. "Or perhaps he doesn't understand."

"I'm afraid this is a very serious business, Mr. Perch," he resumed. "You see, all these securities are very easily negotiated. I mean the robber can soon turn them into cash."

"Don't worry about that, inspector," replied Rodney blithely. "I'll get 'em back."

"You'll get them back!" gasped Grimshaw. "I say, Mr. Perch—"

"I mean that you'll get them back," corrected Rodney hastily. "You and dear old Billings."

"Thanks for the compliment, Mr. Perch," answered the inspector dryly, "but I wouldn't be too hopeful if I were you. We shall do our best. That's the principal reason for my call on you. Dalston suggested that you might—"

Grimshaw broke off, amazement and alarm in his eyes. For Rodney Perch had been suddenly seized by a violent spasm of merriment.

"I—I can't help it, old chap," spluttered Rodney. "It—it's so funny."

"Funny!" yelled the inspector, backing towards the door.

"Dalston," gasped Rodney, "Dalston being held up. I wish I could have seen it. Old Dalston, who bragged that no masked lady would ever—"

The spectacle of the subjugated Dawson, forced to the bidding of the fair "bandit," came so clearly to Rodney's inner vision that he plumped into a chair and rooked in uncontrollable laughter.

Inspector Grimshaw, whose sense of humour at the best of times was barely noticeable, gazed upon Rodney's shaking form frowningly. Then, abruptly, he left the room.

October 24th, 1931.

Inspector Grimshaw at Work.

AT headquarters Grimshaw was in consultation with Billings. The "murdered" detective had made an amazing recovery. He was pale, and under his hat a bandage enwrapped his head. The hospital doctor affirmed that Billings had the thickest skull tabulated in the hospital records.

Grimshaw was annoyed. The newspapers had flung out early editions contradicting the "murder," and, baulked of this sensation, they were poking fun at the Yard.

"Mysterious Masked Lady Baffles the Sleuths Again."

Headlines of this description were splashing the pages. One sarcastic leader writer asked if sufficient use was being made of the women police. And so on.

"So there's no news from that end?" commented Grimshaw.

"Not yet," admitted Billings. "We're still on the job, and—"

"They ought to have found the taxi-driver by now," snapped Grimshaw. "Dalston and Baines saw that cab rushing up the street—"

"But they can't be certain the birds were inside it," objected Billings.

"I'll bet they were," affirmed Grimshaw. "The taxi was speeding like a streak of lightning. Not exactly a normal thing in that quiet neighbourhood, Billings. And Baines is a reliable fellow. We've got to find the driver. Most likely one of the young 'uns. The oldsters would shy at a speed like that. Maybe he's holding back for some reason. Well, we know how to deal with that kind."

"We're not forgetting that," growled Billings. "We've got the dragnet out, and every man on night duty is being put through it. But isn't it likely that the taxi dropped those two birds any old place and—"

"All things are likely," snapped Grimshaw. "Don't waste time, Billings, reciting the obvious. You're having this fellow Perch covered?"

"Parker and Gale are on that," answered Billings. "But what's the idea? The girl pinched Perch's securities. He—"

"He may be just a natural idiot, or he may not," interrupted Grimshaw. "If he's an idiot, then he's about the biggest I've seen yet. When I splashed the news that he'd lost his pile he just laughed."

"Laughed?" gasped Billings.

"Said he'd soon get 'em back," continued Grimshaw. "And a minute or so afterwards he was laughing his head off at what he called the funny picture of Dalston being held up. Just tickled to death."

"Well, he's a cuckoo," growled Billings. "Them young swells with pots of money and not enough brains to come out of the wet—"

"I've met a few young swells in my time, Billings," interrupted Grimshaw. "and some of 'em with no brains you'd notice. But I've never met one till this morning who laughed at being robbed of his pile. I don't think they're made as cuckoo as all that, although I'm willing to live and learn. That's why I got the hunch to have this laughing jackass shadowed."

"And I guess you're right, chief," murmured Billings. There was respect in his tones. He realised that such an idea would never have occurred to him. Grimshaw had the brains, and the fact had been demonstrated more than once. He, Billings, was a bulldog on the trail, but when it came to the think tank—

"I may be right or wrong," was Grimshaw's rejoinder. "We've got to cover all the points, likely and unlikely. This woman is putting us in the comic section. Holding up one of the chief men in the city. And after he tipped us the office—"

"And that's mighty funny, chief," broke in Billings. "Why should Dalston get the notion that the woman was after him?"

"Because Dalston has got a head-piece," retorted Grimshaw pointedly. "The girl had been holding up cashiers in offices of his various enterprises. Dalston has a finger in a lot of financial pies. The girl drew blank. Dalston surmised that she might try the office in Well Street. And she did—and got away with the loot she'd been after."

"And I had her," groaned Billings.

"But for that guy who cracked me—"

"That was bad luck, Billings," said Grimshaw sympathetically. "No fault of yours. Anyway, you'll know the dame again."

"You bet I'll know her," retorted Billings. "A high-stepper she was and a real good-looker. You'd never think—"

"That's the trouble with women, Billings," murmured his superior. "They look like angels sometimes, and they're worse than a Chicago thug. Remember Silkie Sylvester? Why that woman almost vamped the judge."

"Not sure that she didn't," muttered Billings gruffly. "Anyway, she got off with—"

The tring of the telephone stayed the detective's utterance. Hastily he gripped the receiver, listened, then barked:

"Hold on."

There was excitement in the cold blue eyes of Billings as he passed the receiver to his superior.

"Parker on the wire, chief," he whispered. "He's got news about Perch. Chief, I reckon that hunch of yours—"

With an imperious gesture Grimshaw silenced his subordinate. A moment later he was talking swiftly and earnestly to the "shadow" at the other end of the wire.

The Amateur Cracksmen.

RODNEY PERCH, garbed in a lounge suit, a mask in his pocket reposing alongside a small automatic pistol, sat in the train that, an hour later, was to put him down at Crowborough.

Near that delightfully situated countryside station Rodney was to meet his fair partner in crime. She would be waiting in a car and soon afterwards, under cover of darkness—

Rodney shivered, but the agitation of his athletic frame was not due to physical fear. He was afraid he might bungle the job, despite the fact that he had again most carefully rehearsed the instructions given by the gifted Tapper.

"Last night I knocked out a detective," whispered Rodney to himself, in the solitude of the first-class compartment. "To-night I'm going burbling. And early last evening I was yearning for a spot of excitement."

Rodney exhaled a deep breath. This was only part of all that had happened to him in those crowded hours. He had met the mysterious masked lady—and fallen in love with her.

All too soon the train drew up at Crowborough and Rodney descended—with other passengers. He had his instructions, and he had carefully committed them to memory. Turn to the right on leaving the station. A walk of about four hundred yards would bring him to a narrow road. He was to stroll

(Continued on page 26.)

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. A grand serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama. Starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

HEROES of the FLAMES

READ THIS FIRST.

While en route with his comrades to the scene of a fire, Bob Darrow, of the San Francisco Brigade, saves the life of a boy who falls in front of one of the monster engines.

Later, he calls on James Madison, head of a chemical company, to whom he puts up an idea for a patent fire-extinguisher. Madison is not interested, and Bob leaves disappointed, after meeting Dan Mitchell, a shady promoter who is befriending Madison for his own ends.

That afternoon Bob rescues June Madison from a fire in her father's office, and learns that the boy he had saved from the wheels of the fire-engine was Madison's son, Jackie.

In gratitude Madison helps Bob to perfect his invention, the Darrow Fire-Bomb. But Dan Mitchell is anxious to sell Madison an extinguisher of his own, and to discredit Bob he sends a hireling to "doctor" the fireman's invention with a deadly explosive.

Madison's faith in the invention remains unshaken. He sends Bob and another fireman, Pat Heeley, to a mountain lodge, where experiments can be resumed. But Mitchell dispatches four of his scoundrelly hirelings to secure Bob's formula.

Bob is made prisoner, and, according to plan, June is also snared. To save Bob she agrees to bring the formula, which is in her father's possession. But a forest fire breaks out, and, eluding her escort, June rides back to the cabin, where Bob has been left alone, securely tied to a post and unable to get free.

Near the cabin June's frightened horse throws her, and in the same instant a blazing tree-trunk falls towards her.

Now Read On.

EPISODE 8.

"BLANK CARTRIDGES."

Through the Blaze.

EVEN as the tree was falling, June rolled aside, and it crashed to the ground only a few feet from her. She struggled up a moment later—to the unutterable relief of Bob, who was staring through the cabin window.

She was bruised and shaken, but limped doggedly towards the log dwelling and pushed her way inside.

"Bob!" she faltered. "Oh, Bob, I thought I might be too late!"

"Get that knife, June!" Bob said, nodding towards a sheathed blade that decorated the wall, and then, as she snatched it and began to sever his bonds: "When I saw your horse fall," he went on, "I thought you were gone. You shouldn't have turned back, dear."

"I had to," she told him, as she cut the last strand. "I couldn't leave you here. But the fire has us hemmed in, Bob. We'll have to travel fast if we're to get out alive!"

They stumbled from the cabin and at once felt the full heat of the deadly blaze in their faces. Flames roared in the forest and crackled through the thickets—fire ran leaping amid the topmost boughs and wrapped themselves around the roof of the dwelling from which man and girl had just emerged. The world seemed an inferno and the heavens a dark, shifting pall. It was true that they were hemmed in, and by a conflagration such as the mountains had never before witnessed.

The pony that had carried June back to the cabin was no longer in sight, for, panic-stricken, the animal had scrambled to its feet and galloped blindly through the woods. Trusting, therefore, to the speed at which their legs could carry them, Bob and his fair rescuer set off along a narrow track, ugly tongues of flame licking at them as they ran, and burning masses of foliage tumbling all around them.

Meanwhile, in another part of the forest, James Madison and Pat Heeley were pushing on through dense clouds of smoke that were rolling in the direction of the Mountain Hotel, and it was only because the former had a fair idea of his bearings that they ever gained the open.

Arrived at the Mountain Hotel, they dismounted just as Dan Mitchell appeared on the terrace, and, as the latter approached, Madison spoke to him earnestly.

"Oh, Mitchell," he said, "have you seen June around?"

Mitchell frowned. "I'm looking for her myself," he confessed. "I thought she came back to the hotel, but she doesn't appear to be here."

"Came back to the hotel?" Madison echoed in a bewildered tone. "Came back from where, Dan? What do you mean?"

"She insisted on joining in the search for Darrow, and I went with her," Mitchell explained. "We were attacked by a couple of ruffians and they took us to your cabin, where they're holding Darrow—"

Pat Heeley started forward at the mention of Bob's name.

"Darrow?" he exclaimed. "Say—"

"Wait a minute, Pat." It was Madison who interrupted him, and, laying a hand on the Irishman's arm, he faced

Mitchell again. "Tell us just what happened, Dan."

Mitchell proceeded to relate what had occurred.

"Shortly after June left with this gangster," he finished, "I made my escape and hurried back here—only to learn that she hadn't returned."

Madison's face was a ghastly hue. "She may be trapped in that forest fire!" he jerked. "Come on, Pat, we've no time to lose!"

They turned towards their horses, and, remounting, galloped in the direction of the sinister pall of smoke that marked the progress of the blaze. Mitchell watched them out of sight, and was still standing there when a horseman rode up and flung himself to the ground beside the promoter. The horseman was Silk Connolly.

"Well," said Mitchell crisply, "what did you do with the girl? Did Spike pick her up or something?"

"No," Silk answered, "When that fire broke loose she flashed a gun on me and beat it back to the cabin for Darrow."

Mitchell's lip curled. "You're a fine one," he sneered, "to let a girl slip it over on you."

He had hardly spoken when the sound of a car's engine was heard, and a moment later Spike Beldon drove into view with Butch and Merlin.

"Mitchell!" Spike gasped as he brought the car to a standstill in front of the promoter. "We've got to get outa here. At the rate this fire's travellin', it'll beat us to safety."

Mitchell nodded. "You fellows make for the city," he ordered. "I'll follow in my own car. You go with the boys, Silk."

The gangsters drove on without delay, and a minute or two later Dan Mitchell also took the road. About that same time, James Madison and Pat Heeley were riding steadily into the forest blaze and braving the terrors of smoke and flame in a hazardous attempt to locate June and Bob.

Fairly in the heart of the conflagration, they cupped their hands about their lips and shouted the names of the man and the girl whom they were seeking.

"June! Bob! Bob Darrow!" Their cries mingled with the thunder of the forest fire, and for some time their only answer was the echo of their own voices. Then all at once there came a responsive hail in Bob's well-known tones.

Two or three hundred yards away, staggering through the blinding smoke and the scorching flames, with one arm around June's slender form, Bob Darrow had heard those friendly shouts with a sense of tremendous thankfulness.

"June," he said to the girl beside him, "there's help near at hand. Keep up your courage, dear."

He could see that she was near the end of her tether, however, and with a sudden movement he swung her off her feet and carried her in the direction whence the voices of Pat and Madison had seemed to come. A few minutes afterwards he made out their dim figures as they came riding through the smoke, and again he experienced a powerful sensation of relief as he saw that they were on horseback.

Afoot, he and June had stood only the remotest chance of escape, but there was every prospect of eluding the flames once they were in the saddle.

"Thank heavens ye're safe, Bob," Pat Heeley said huskily, as he drew rein. "Come on, me bhoy, I'll take Miss June if ye'll lift her up."

October 24th, 1931.

"You and Mr. Madison are just about in time, Pat, and no more," Bob panted, as he passed the girl up to his comrade. "We were trying to head for the river, but we could never have made it."

With June in Pat's charge, Bob turned to climb astride the horse that Madison was riding, and a moment later both mounts had been spurred into a gallop.

The Armed Guard.

THE forest fire was but a memory, and, quite recovered from her ordeal, June watched Bob Darrow as he stood before a table in a ground-floor room of the Madison home outside San Francisco.

The room had been turned into a temporary laboratory and placed at his disposal, so that he could go ahead with his experiments during the term of special leave that had been granted him by the Fire Department.

June attempted to engage his attention, but he was too engrossed in the technicalities of his work on the scientific fire-extinguisher to notice her efforts to divert him, and at last she felt compelled to make some comment on his neglect of her.

"Do you think it's polite to be so busy when a lady comes to see you?" she inquired.

Bob started and looked round. "Oh, I'm sorry, June," he apologised sheepishly. "But, you know, it wouldn't be fair to your father if I didn't devote every minute to perfecting the Darrow Fire-Bomb. I'm only trying to repay him for his kindness in allowing me to stay here."

"And also for supplying you with a guard to protect you," June added, laughingly. "As if a man like you needed protection. Judging from what I know of you, you're not only capable of taking care of yourself, but of other people as well."

"All the same, June, that guard has kept our unknown enemies away," Bob declared. "There hasn't been a sign of them since he's been on the job. Or perhaps it's because they've heard your father insists on me carrying this artillery," he added smilingly, producing a loaded revolver.

June took the gun and examined it, and she was clutching the formidable weapon in her hands when a man's voice became audible.

Bob and his fair companion turned their heads, and just beyond the open French windows of the room they saw the man whom Madison had engaged as a guard.

"Have a heart, lady," the fellow protested. "You're pointing that gun right at me, and it might go off."

June laughed and handed the revolver back to Bob, who laid it on the table and turned his attention to the apparatus in which he had been mixing the chemical ingredients of the Darrow fire-extinguisher. June immediately slid from a stool on which she had been poised and walked out of the room irritably.

"Well," she said over her shoulder, "since you insist on being so busy, I won't disturb you any longer."

Bob abandoned his work and hurried after her.

"June," he exclaimed, "please don't go. You're not disturbing me—honestly—"

He followed her through the doorway, and the room was left unoccupied. But the armed guard employed by James Madison was still standing by the French windows, and the moment that Bob disappeared after June the man slipped across the threshold and made for the table on which the loaded revolver had been laid.

The guard's subsequent activities might have intrigued Bob Darrow had he been in a position to observe them. As it was no one saw the fellow pick up the revolver, break it open and empty it of its cartridges, for which he substituted half-a-dozen "blanks."

He replaced the gun on the table, stuffed into his pocket the live bullets that he had removed from it, and then stole out on to the terrace again through the open French windows.

Two or three minutes later he was putting through a call to a certain office in the city.

The office was Dan Mitchell's, and, with Spike and his cronies grouped around him, Mitchell answered the telephone in person as the bell rang.

"Hallo, is Mitchell there?" came the voice of the guard at the Madison home.

"Mitchell speaking," the promoter rejoined. "Is that you, Buck? Any news?"

"I'll say so, boss," the guard answered. "Hot news. I just got the chance to lay hold of Darrow's gun while he was outa the room. I ducked in and changed the cartridges."

"What do you mean—changed the cartridges?"

"Why, took out the live ones and planted blanks in the chambers," the guard explained.

Mitchell smiled a twisted smile.

"You've fixed Darrow's gun, huh?" he mused. "All right, Buck. Good work. Now keep your eyes open and be on the look-out to-night. I'll be sending the boys around."

He replaced the receiver and turned to Spike and the other gangsters.

"That's fine," he drawled, rubbing his hands. "You heard what was just said, didn't you—about the cartridges in Darrow's gun?"

"What of it?" Spike inquired dully.

"With Darrow's gun fixed," Dan Mitchell observed, "it certainly shouldn't be very difficult to get that formula we want so badly, should it?"

"Yeah, but what I want to know is this," Spike grumbled. "Why didn't Buck snitch that gat when he had the chance?"

"Yeah," sneered Silk Connolly, "au' let Darrow know that somethin' was goin' to happen, eh? Ah, blow some o' the dust outa them brains o' yours, Spike."

Dan Mitchell spoke again:

"Silk is right," he stated. "I'm not taking any chances this time. Listen, Spike, I got wise just about the time Madison was thinking of planting a guard at his house, and—I got one of my own men on the job."

There was a murmur of appreciation, and Mitchell perched himself on the corner of his desk with an air of self-assurance.

"All right, boys," he went on. "Now, here's the scheme. Two of you are to search Darrow's room while the others lay low—"

The Prowlers.

BOB DARROW and the Madisons had spent the evening playing cribbage and bridge, and, though Bob was very indifferent at the latter game, he had found an excellent partner in Mrs. Madison.

"Dad," exclaimed June, when her father had made a tally of the scoring, "have they really beaten us three out of five rubbers?"

"They certainly have," declared Madison. "I guess they were too strong a combination for us, June."

"Why, it's eleven o'clock," observed Bob, glancing at his wrist-watch. "I didn't realise it was so late, and as I have to be at work early in the morning I think I'd better say 'good-night.'

"You know the old saying," June murmured smilingly. "'Early to bed and early to rise—'"

"And a very applicable saying under the circumstances," put in her father. "Bob is right. He ought to work fast on his experiments while he can. You know, Bob, we haven't heard or seen anything of those crooks since we've been back, and I'm inclined to think that this guard I've hired has done the trick."

"Either that or this cannon I've been packing," Bob rejoined, producing the revolver that Madison had urged him to carry. "Well, good-night, Mrs. Madison—I promise never to trump your ace again. Good-night, Mr. Madison!"

June accompanied him to the stairs, and lingered for a moment near the banisters.

"Tell me, Bob," she said, "why is it firemen play such excellent cribbage and such awful bridge?"

Bob grinned.

"Oh, that's simple!" he answered. "You have to think when you play bridge. Good-night!" he added laughingly, and made his way up to his room.

The Madisons did not immediately retire, but sat up for another three-quarters of an hour, Bob being the subject of their conversation. At the end of that time they decided to turn in, but they were still talking animatedly of their guest when they went upstairs.

"I like that young man's persistence," Madison stated. "If the experiment he's going to make on Thursday turns out successfully he will be worth a fortune."

"Great!" exclaimed June. "I hope it does turn out successfully."

"I'm sure it will," her father rejoined in a confident tone. "He's certainly worked very, very hard on his invention."

They parted at the top of the stairs, Mr. and Mrs. Madison turning along the landing towards their room, June making for her own, and as their doors closed a clock in the hall solemnly struck the hour of twelve.

At that instant a car was drawing up outside the gates of the Madison home, and four men climbed out of it. They were Spike Beldon, Silk Connolly, Butch and Merlin, and, entering the drive on foot, they took to the shrubbery and worked round to the back of the house, where they were met by the guard in whom Madison placed so much trust.

"All set, Buck?" Beldon whispered hoarsely.

"All set, Spike," was the answer. "The kitchen door's open. Come on!"

Spike turned to his followers.

"Silk, you an' Butch know what to do," he said. "Go ahead!"

"Hey, wait a minute!" growled Silk. "Maybe you know what to do as well as me."

"Aw, there's no danger!" Beldon interrupted impatiently. "Didn't Mitch say Darrow's gun had been fixed? Now get in there, an' don't make any mistake."

Silk and Butch moved towards the kitchen door.

"Darrow's room is the second on the right at the top of the hall stairs," the man Buck told them. "He'll have the formula there. He never lets it outa his sight."

With Butch on his heels Silk passed into the house and stole through the gloom towards the hall. There was a fire burning, and it showed him and his companion the staircase.

They began to climb it. A board creaked under Butch's tread, and Silk shot a malevolent glance at him in the darkness.

"Quiet, will yuh?" he hissed.

"I couldn't help it," was the husky rejoinder. "It was a loose plank under the carpet."

They had paused, but nothing transpired to show that the creaking of the board had been heard, and, their confidence restored, the two rogues proceeded to the landing.

They paused at the door of the first room. Not a sound came from it, and it seemed safe to assume that its occupant—June—was asleep.

"It's the next room," breathed Silk, and led the way to the door of the apartment that had been placed at Bob's disposal.

Bob had not gone to bed immediately on retiring, but had enjoyed a cigarette by the window and lost himself for a while in thoughts of the future. Now, however, he prepared to undress, and drowsily peeled off his coat and vest.

He took a wallet from an inside pocket, and was holding it thoughtfully in his hand when he fancied he heard a foot-fall on the drive outside. He went to the window, which opened on to a balcony, but saw nothing, and, inclined to laugh at himself for being "jumpy," he closed the window and turned towards the dressing-table again.

In turning, his glance came to rest on the handle of the door, and all at once he stiffened. His imagination might have played a trick on him a moment before, but there was no doubting what his eyes beheld now. That handle was slowly and surreptitiously revolving.

For an instant Bob stood rooted to the spot. Then suddenly he stuffed his wallet into his hip-pocket and pulled out the six-chambered gun that Madison had given him.

He tip-toed towards the door and posted himself alongside it, so that in opening it would conceal him from the intruders. Not for a moment did he guess that the weapon in his hand was loaded only with blank cartridges.

"Hold him there while I search for the formula," Connolly hissed.

The door moved inward inch by inch and swung slowly towards him. It shielded him from Silk's view as the latter stepped across the threshold and peered into the room. Next second Bob gained an impression of the crook's profile, and, believing the man to be alone, he rapped out a command.

"Put up your hands!" he barked.

Silk started and shot his arms towards the ceiling with a prompt and involuntary gesture. Butch was at Connolly's heels, and he flung his burly form at the door and jammed Bob against the wall.

"All right, Silk!" he jerked.

"Hold him there while I search for the formula," Connolly hissed, and, dropping his hands, he ran towards the dressing-table.

But Bob was not so easily held, and with a powerful effort he forced the door outward from the wall and slid free to engage Butch in a desperate hand-to-hand struggle.

They fought for possession of the gun, for although Butch knew that it was only loaded with blanks, he was equally well aware that it would have a mighty unpleasant effect if discharged in his face.

Wrestling savagely, the two of them staggered across the room and tumbled sprawling over the bed. Butch was undermost, but brought up both feet and sent Bob hurtling backward with a terrific lunge, and in the same instant Silk turned from the dressing-table and grabbed the fireman's wrist.

He snatched the revolver from Bob's hand and flung it over his shoulder. The weapon crashed through the window, and there was a tinkling of glass.

Silk and Bob closed with each other, and in the fury of their scuffle they reeled back and forth across the room. But Bob was the stronger, and suddenly he swung the crook off his feet and dashed him with tremendous force against the window through which the gun had been thrown.

The ruffian's flying body hit the pane with a shattering impact, and there was a loud smash as he vanished amidst a wreckage of glass and wood.

Swift footfalls warned Bob that the formidable Butch was coming at him again, and he wheeled in time to meet the rogue's attack with a pile-driving left. It stopped Butch in his tracks, and a crushing right-hander to the point of the jaw hurled him against the wall. But the man could take punishment, and he rushed Bob furiously, breaking down the fireman's guard by the sheer impetus of his charge.

Butch grappled, and the two men stumbled towards the broken window. Still battling fiercely, they tripped and pitched headlong through the aperture, disappearing as Silk had done before them.

On the Balcony.

JUNE sat up in bed, and as she listened attentively a scared expression appeared on her face. Then with a hurried gesture she flung off the blankets and slipped to the floor.

A moment later she had donned a wrap and was hastening from her room to make her way downstairs.

The commotion in the house had also awakened Mr. and Mrs. Madison, and only a few seconds after June was astir her mother and father were likewise preparing to investigate the disturbance.

"What can it be?" Mrs. Madison gaped. "I'm certain it isn't burglars—"

October 24th, 1931.

they would never make such a noise. It sounds more like a scuffle—"

"I don't know what it is," her husband told her grimly, as he pulled on a bath-robe. "But I'll soon find out!"

They stepped out on to the landing, and immediately heard the voice of young Jackie.

"Mother! Mother!" he was calling. "What's the matter?"

"You'd better go to him," Madison said to his wife. "The little fellow's probably badly frightened." And Mrs. Madison made off in the direction of Jackie's room.

Meanwhile, the sound of the fight had reached the ears of Spike, Merlin and Buck, who had remained in the grounds.

"What's that noise, Spike?" said Merlin huskily, as they stood near the kitchen door.

"I don't know," Beldon answered. "But it sounds like a battle. Let's go."

They sprinted round to the front of the house, and as they dashed into view of the balcony they made out the figures of Bob Darrow, Silk Connolly, and Butch. Coming to a standstill, they watched breathlessly the gruelling combat that was in progress thirty feet above their heads.

Silk was lying where he had fallen after plunging through the window. Bob and Butch were grovelling on the floor of the balcony, battering at each other savagely. They rolled over and over as they fought, and then presently they struggled to their feet and lurched apart.

Butch was the first to resume the conflict, and he charged at Bob like a maddened bull. But the young fireman was ready for him, and lifted him clean off his feet with a devastating uppercut.

Butch tumbled over a cane chair and hit his head a resounding thump on the floor of the balcony.

Silk had risen surreptitiously an instant before Butch's fall, and he tried to take Bob unawares from the rear. Bob heard the slither of the man's feet, however, and, wheeling smartly, he rammed his fist in Connolly's face and bowled him over like a ninopin.

There was still plenty of fight left in Butch, and, scrambling up, he attacked Bob before the latter could put himself on the defensive. A wild, sledge-hammer blow to the temple brought Bob to his knees, and in another instant Butch had laid him flat and was kneeling on his chest.

Out of the corner of his eye Bob saw the gun that Silk had wrested from him earlier in the struggle, and, still believing it contained live cartridges, he flung out his hand towards it.

It was within arm's length, and his fingers closed on the butt. Seizing the weapon, he attempted to level it at his assailant.

Butch clutched his wrist, and threw all his weight into the effort of turning the barrel aside, for it was uncomfortably near his face. But his muscles were flabby in comparison with Bob's, and cracked under the strain.

The gun went off with three successive blasts. No lead left the muzzle, but the jets of flame blistered Butch's jowl so that he cursed with the pain and abandoned his hold of Bob to spring to his feet.

With an oath he lunged at Bob's fist with his boot, and the fingers that gripped the gun-butt took the full impact of that heavy kick.

The revolver spun from the fireman's grasp, slipped through the balcony rails, and dropped to the gravel drive thirty feet below.

Bob stood up and put himself in readiness for action before Butch could overwhelm him with one of his rushes. There was a fierce exchange of blows, and then the two men closed again, each striving for a throw.

Silk Connolly pulled himself to his feet, stood swaying stupidly for a spell, and then marked Butch and Bob. The latter had his back to him, and once more Silk endeavoured to take him unawares.

He darted towards the two men, but tripped over a mat, and the sound of the slight stumble warned Bob. As Silk recovered himself and came on, the fireman suddenly swung himself off his feet and lashed out backward with both legs.

He was grappling with Butch at the same time, and continued to cling to the burly ruffian. Advancing to the attack, Silk took Bob's lunge fairly and squarely in the chest.

As if he had been kicked by a mule, Connolly staggered to the far end of the balcony and collapsed. He had received a good many hard knocks in the course of the affray, and, lying where he had fallen, bruised, breathless, and sorely punished, he decided that he would leave everything in Butch's hands.

At the moment Butch seemed capable of maintaining the struggle alone, for with a herculean effort he bore Bob to the balcony rails and forced him back until he was hanging over them.

Spike, Merlin and Buck were watching from below, and Spike called out excitedly as he saw Butch gaining the advantage.

"Heave him over, Butch!" he jerked. "Give him a tumble, and throw him down here. We'll finish him off if he's got any kick left in him!"

"You're right, Spike," Merlin was saying, when all at once Buck caught him by the arm.

"Look!" he said, and pointed towards the porch.

The front door was being wrenched

THE ROMANCE OF WORDS.

A NEW DICTIONARY IN 6d.
WEEKLY PARTS.

The notion of a dictionary being an interesting book would probably make you smile. And yet what a strange charm there is in the study of words! For words, like peoples, have histories. Down the long vista of time they come to us through many vicissitudes and changes, the raw material of all our poets and prose-writers, from which our national literature has been built up. There is, indeed, an abundance of fascinating knowledge in any good dictionary; one, for instance, like the UNIVERSAL ENGLISH DICTIONARY, which has been compiled entirely in the past few years, and is, therefore, up-to-date in every detail.

Here, in a single-volume, large-page work, nearly one hundred thousand words are clearly defined and there are many thousands of quotations illustrating phrases, modern usages and idioms. Such a book you might expect to be expensive. But, on the contrary, it is being published in sixpenny weekly parts and, since there is a wonderful "Self-binding Case," which you may buy at a very reduced price, you may have the completed, bound volume without making a very big hole in your pocket-money. In any case, get a copy of Part 1, which is on sale to-day, and see how interesting a Dictionary can be.

open, and silhouetted in the light that streamed from the hall the gangsters distinguished the figure of June Madison.

"Beat it!"

It was the voice of Spike again, and he made a dash for the corner of the house. Buck and Merliu followed his example and joined him beyond the angle of the building, where he had pulled up, and from this vantage-point the crooks prepared to observe all that ensued.

June came running from the house and paused near the spot where Spike and his associates had been standing a few seconds before. Looking up through the gloom, she saw the figures on the balcony—saw Bob lunging over the rails as the man Butch tried to bundle him into mid-air.

"Bob!" she cried out in alarm. "Bob!"

Bob was scarcely aware of her voice, for at that instant he summed up all his strength in a desperate attempt to gain the upper hand, and it was an attempt that succeeded.

Hurling Butch aside, he sprang after the man, and battered him with both fists. The crook tottered dazedly under a rain of punches, and was knocked flying with a flashing hook to the jaw.

He cannoned against the wall, and stood with his back to it while Bob pounded him mercilessly. It was in vain that the gangster tried to defend himself against the shower of blows that the young fireman launched, for they penetrated his guard and bruised both face and body.

Silk Connolly was crouching near by, and, in spite of his former resolution to keep out of trouble, some latent spark of courage inspired him to go to his comrade's assistance. Dragging himself to his feet, he stumbled towards Bob aggressively.

Bob saw him approaching, landed a final punch that thickened Butch's lips, and snapped a couple of his teeth, then spun to meet the fresh attack.

"I'll flay you, Darrow!" Silk raved hoarsely, and with the words he lashed out at Bob with his right.

Bob swung up his arm, and the blow glanced off. Simultaneously he ripped his own right to Silk's stomach, and with an agonised grunt the gangster wilted.

Bob hit him again, with an uppercut this time, and Silk caved backward. He bumped against the balcony rails with a shock that splintered them, and then sagged to the floor once more.

A sullen growl warned Bob that Butch was not through with fighting, and he turned in time to brace himself against the bear's hug in which the big crook seized him.

From the grounds June saw them blunder across the balcony. They collided with the rails at the very point where Silk had tumbled against them a moment previously, and, splintered as they were, those rails were in no condition to withstand the impact of two powerfully-built men.

There was a resounding crash as the wooden balustrade gave way and fell into the drive. Bob and his assailant plunged after it, both of them still locked in each other's grip.

A scream broke from June's lips as she saw them dive headlong from the balcony.

(To be continued in another thrilling episode next week. By permission of Universal Pictures Ltd., starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.)

"THE RIDING FOOL."

(Continued from page 10.)

striding towards the veranda with the intention of gloating safely over their recapture.

The Mexican's face changed colour as he caught sight of them, and a look of terror darted into his eyes. With a panic-stricken cry he brought up his revolver, but before he could pull the trigger Steve and Boston fired at point-blank range.

Their forty-fives blazed flame and death simultaneously, and a scream burst from the throat of Nikkos as he fell writhing in the last throes.

Steve and Boston dashed past him. Their ponies were tethered to a hitch-rack ten paces distant, and, slipping the reins, they vaulted into the saddle and clattered along the street at full gallop.

Anderson and his party came running from the store. A blast of gunfire rang in the ears of Steve and Boston, but they were crouching over their horses' necks and were unseathed.

The night had swallowed them when Bud Warren opened his eyes to find himself in the arms of his sister. He had not been slain instantaneously, as Sally had at first imagined; but it was clear that he had not much longer to live, and it was only with an effort that he managed to speak.

"I—wanna talk," he whispered. "Nikkos—Nikkos—"

A camp-fire burned in a hollow of the hills, and its glow played upon the brooding faces of the two fugitives from the law.

They shivered, for the warmth afforded by the fire was not sufficient to dispel the chill of the night-breeze that fanned the flames.

Steve Kendall and Boston Harry sat there in silence, each thinking his thoughts. They were thoughts that centred around Sally Warren, and while the light of Western stars twinkled overhead, the two who had been rivals for her hand dwelt on her loveliness and charm.

Boston Harry was the first to break the silence.

"Bud Warren was shot during the siege," he murmured reminiscently, "and by the shout that went up they reckoned it was one of us that plugged him. I wonder—if Sally still believes in us?"

"I wish I knew that, too," Steve answered, and even as he spoke he heard a rustling of foliage behind him.

The sound might have been caused by some small wild creature, but Steve and Boston were keyed up, and both of them reached for their six-shooters and whipped round instantly.

A figure stepped into the firelight. It was the figure of a girl—Sally!

"Boys," she said, and in a moment they had scrambled to their feet and laid aside their guns.

Boston took a step towards her, but it was to Steve that she involuntarily turned, and as he detected the expression in her eyes he knew he would never be more to her than a valued friend—knew that it was Steve for whom she cared.

The gambler drew back, and saw Steve take her hands. But there was no bitterness or envy in Boston's voice when he spoke.

"Well," he said awkwardly, "I guess I'll be going."

Steve and Sally turned towards him, and, disengaging her hands, the girl moved nearer to Boston.

"They won't want you in Plumas County any more, Boston," she told him.

The gambler looked at Steve, and then returned his glance to Sally again.

"Yeah!" he said with a rueful smile. "That's why I'm not goin' there—because they don't want me. They nearly made a mistake once, and I wouldn't like to risk my health around Gulf Centre again."

"But you don't understand, Boston," Sally rejoined. "By now they'll have heard at Gulf Centre that you weren't the man responsible for that killing there—just as they know at Poker City that you and Steve weren't responsible for poor California's."

Both Steve and Boston glanced at her quickly.

"You mean—we've been cleared?" Boston stammered.

When Sally answered him there were tears in her eyes.

"That's just what I do mean," she said. "The man they wanted was my brother—And Nikkos, too—"

Steve slipped an arm around her shoulders.

"We didn't want you to know—about Bud," he told her huskily. "Boston and I—we'd kind of planned to keep it from you."

"Nikkos shot Bud," Sally went on. "But before Bud died he explained everything—about the hold-up—and about the killing in Plumas County. I'm glad—that he lived long enough—to redeem himself and tell the truth."

Boston did not speak, but, in a silence more eloquent than words could have been, he pressed Sally's hands and laid a grasp of comradeship on Steve's shoulder. Then he mounted his horse and rode slowly into the gloom.

(By permission of the Gaumont Film Co., Ltd., starring Bob Steele, Frances Morris and Ted Adams.)

THE GREATEST GAME ON THE FINEST "HOME" BILLIARD TABLE

13/3 DOWN brings prompt delivery of the 6 ft. size Riley "Home" Billiard Table to rest on an ordinary dining table. You pay the balance by easy instalments. Cash Price £11 15 0. 7 days' Free Trial allowed, and Rileys pay carriage and take all transit risks.

32 FREE Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

Riley "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables, in various sizes and styles, are also offered for cash or easy terms. Send for Free Art List, describing them. Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Gt. Britain.

E. J. RILEY, LTD., Howard Works, ACCRINGTON, and Dept. 35, 147, Aldersgate Street, LONDON E.C.1.

October 24th, 1931.

"RODNEY STEPS IN."

(Continued from page 20.)

along this road with the care-free air of a man returning to his homestead after a hard day's work. A small Riley car would be coming towards him in the course of a minute or two. The car would slow down—and Rodney would swiftly open the door and take his place beside the fair driver.

All her planning. A wonderful little woman. Rodney felt the tingle of adventure in his veins. He had reached the narrow road, but it looked as deserted as a strip of the desert. Not a car in sight. Had something happened? That morning she had told him—

He breathed a great sigh of relief. He had breasted the small rise and he could see in the distance the lights of an approaching car coming cautiously round the bend. Swiftly he strode on. Nearer and nearer came the car, the headlights dimmed. Then, for a fraction of a second, the lamps flashed full and were almost instantly dimmed again. The car slowed down. There was the faintest sound of the horn.

Rodney walked faster. The car was now but a few yards away and was crawling at a snail's pace. Then it halted altogether.

Another second and Rodney was seated by the side of the fair driver.

"Splendidly done," she murmured.

"Not too bad, was it?" he purred.

"The coast all clear?" she queried softly. "No one following you?"

"Not a soul," replied Rodney, uneasily aware of the fact that he had never troubled to look. "I say, what about a spot of dinner before—"

"Don't be silly!" she reproved him. "We're on business, and we can't take the risk of being seen together. There are no restaurants around here."

"Of course not," murmured Rodney. "I'd forgotten."

"We've got no time to lose," continued his partner. "I suspect that Grimshaw has been trailing us, but we've thrown him off the scent. You're sure no one shadowed you?"

"Sure!" murmured Rodney, striving to put sincerity in his tones.

Trapped!

THE house that stood in its own grounds about six miles from Crowborough, an ideal countryside residence from the view of position and surroundings, was plunged in darkness.

Darkness save for two pin-points of light that came from the flashlamps of two nocturnal visitors who had invaded the comfortable, roony apartment that formed the southern wing of the firs.

A soft whisper in feminine tones, and Rodney Perch, the foremost of the two invaders, crept to the corner of the room. A moment later he was kneeling down, his heart beating fast, his fingers trembling a little.

The safe was before his eyes, or, at least, that portion of it which was illuminated by his flashlamp.

Resolutely he collected all his nerve. He must not fail. He gripped the dial and slowly, very slowly, he began that twiddling movement which Tapper had so eloquently described and illustrated.

He twiddled—and, holding his breath, he listened.

Never was there a more emphatic response to "twiddling." Suddenly the dark, silent house was flooded with gay jazz music, music loud and lively enough to awaken the parish.

"What have you done?" half-screamed the feminine figure.

"I—I've turned on the wireless!" bawled poor Rodney. Frantically he tugged at the "dial." Ear-splitting sounds smote on his anguished ears—then swift and sudden silence.

Then the room was brightly illuminated. A voice harsh and commanding cried:

"Don't move—either of you—till you're told!"

Blinkingly Rodney looked up. A gasp came from his lips. Facing him was Inspector Grimshaw, and behind Grimshaw stood the triumphant figure of Stephen Dalston.

"Well, this is a surprise, Perch!" grinned the financier. "I never thought you were the masked bandit's accomplice. A pretty dud burglar you are—mistaking the wireless for the safe."

Dalston laughed heartily. Then he turned his gaze to Rodney's fair partner, who was in the grip of Billings.

"Well, that settles your account, young woman!" he chuckled. "Better put the cuffs on both of 'em, inspector."

"That's just what we propose to do," retorted Grimshaw. He advanced towards Rodney grimly.

The heat of the game

The flavour lasts - British made

SWOTTING is over, so now for it! Put a piece of Wrigley's in your mouth, it keeps you going, alert and ready. The pure cool flavour refreshes and steadies you, enabling you to put your best into the game.

And Wrigley's "after every meal" aids digestion and cleanses the teeth. It is surprising the difference it makes.

In two flavours - P.K., a pure peppermint flavour; and Spearmint, a pure mint leaf flavour. Only 1d. a packet, but the finest quality money can buy.

WRIGLEY'S

1^D PER PACKET

"One moment, Inspector Grimshaw!" It was the girl's voice, imperious and commanding. She continued:

"I suggest you ask Mr. Dalston to open the safe in the other corner of the room. In that safe I feel sure you will find the securities he alleges were stolen from him."

"Take the woman away!" exploded Dalston. "A common thief—"

"I ain Lady Muriel Goring," interrupted the girl. "This man Dalston ruined my brother by a series of deliberate frauds. My poor brother shot himself in despair. I swore to get even with this scoundrel. Inspector Grimshaw, I ask you to look in that safe. If I am not mistaken you will find there Dalston's private record of these frauds as well as the missing securities."

Inspector Grimshaw let loose a startled exclamation. It was a rare thing for him to do.

Lady Muriel Goring. Yes, it was she. The Society debutante, the daring woman motorist, the young woman who flew her own aeroplane. He had seen her portrait in the papers.

Rodney Perch released a gasping sound.

"Why, I've always wanted to meet you—," he babbled. "I—I—"

"I'm disappointed in you, Rodney Perch," she murmured, her smile entrancing him. "You made my acquaintance under false pretences."

"They came to rob my safe. Do your duty, inspector!"

The words were barked from Dalston's livid lips.

"You are Mr. Perch's trustee!" rapped out Grimshaw. "You held his securities."

"They were stolen!" gasped the other. "Stolen from my safe in Well Street—by that woman!"

Grimshaw shot a searching look at the convulsed features of the speaker. Then, slowly and deliberately, he walked up to the livid financier.

"Let me look at that safe, Dalston!" he said quietly and determinedly.

For a tense moment there was silence. Then Dalston sagged into a chair like a man crumpling from a blow. Billings left the girl and looked towards him.

"The game's up," whispered the financier. "Tough luck. I was making a get-away to-night. She—she's right. The securities are in the safe—and the other things. Here's the key, inspector. I'm making a clean breast of it. Don't forget that."

His voice had changed to a whine. Dalston, the braggart, was cowed and broken. He whimpered as Billings deftly fixed the handcuffs on his wrists.

Inspector Grimshaw turned his eyes from the limp figure of the captured swindler. He directed them to Rodney. "You're a lucky young fellow, Mr. Perch!" he said.

"I am," responded Rodney. He had moved to the girl's side and was clasping her hand. Inspector Grimshaw smiled one of his very rare smiles.

"I wouldn't advise you to go into the safe-breaking game, Mr. Perch," murmured Grimshaw.

"Never again, inspector," answered Rodney fervently. "I'm going to marry and settle down."

"I hope you'll make a better husband than you do a crook," whispered Lady Muriel Goring, moving a little closer to her "partner in crime."

And it may be said that Rodney Perch, so far, has given complete satisfaction.

(By permission of the Fox Film Co., Ltd., starring Richard Cooper and Elizabeth Allan.)

"RED FORK RANGE."
 (Continued from page 14.)

the back of his neck, the other drilled between the shoulder-blades.

Fifteen seconds later Wally Hamilton was falling into the arms of friends. He was half-carried to the veranda of a store-building and propped against it, but as someone was shouting for a doctor he revived with an effort and drew his hand across his temple, where blood was beginning to flow.

"It's nothing!" he panted. "Just creased me—that's all. Don't worry about me. Get the soldiers."

"Here's Sergeant O'Flaherty!" a man in the crowd announced, and as the sturdy Irish soldier approached Wally struggled to his feet.

"Get back to your commanding officer, sergeant," Wally jerked—"fast as you can! Tell him—the Indians are out!"

O'Flaherty sprinted back in the direction whence he had come, and in a space of time that was a credit to the U.S. Cavalry, a bugle was blowing and two squadrons of horse were mustering.

They filed through Hangtown's main street, and as their commanding officer came abreast of the spot where Wally was standing the youngster called for a fresh mount to lead the soldiers to the scene of the Indian attack. A horse was brought him, and, taking his place in the van of the column, he urged the animal into a gallop.

Hangtown was soon left far behind, and the hills swallowed the relief force. They pushed through dark canyons, skirted the Arapaho village from which Barking Fox and his braves had set forth some hours previously, and finally sighted the gently-sloping upland that masked the spot where the immigrant wagons had been corralled to break the Redskin rush.

At an ever-quickening pace, Wally and the troopers stormed up the hillside, and from the rim of it gazed down upon the closing stages of a desperate hand-to-hand conflict.

The Indians had swarmed through the wagon-lines in overwhelming numbers, and were at grips with the immigrants, and Wally did not care to think of the scene that his gaze might have encountered had he and the troopers been fifteen minutes later. As it was, the Redskins were thrown into a panic at the very sight of the cavalymen, and, abandoning the fight, they fled in all directions.

But the troopers were already thundering down the hillside at the gallop, and they gained the wagon-corral ere the majority of the Arapahocs could make their escape.

Sabre and carbine took heavy toll, the heavy cavalry blades biting deep into flesh and bone, the bullets bringing down those who had managed to put distance between themselves and the relief force.

One of the last to fall was Barking Fox—

Wally had been in the van of the charge, and he had done his share in helping to rout the savages when he saw a familiar figure rise up from the ground. It was the figure of the old Scout, and, throwing himself from his horse's back, Wally seized the veteran by the arm.

"Where's Ruth?" he demanded.

The Scout drew a hand across his brow.

"She was—with me—when the Injuns broke through!" he faltered. "Then someone struck me over the head—laid me out—"

"If it's Ruth Farrell you want, I saw her, mister—," It was the voice of a boy who had been sheltering under the awning of a prairie schooner at the moment of the Arapaho rush. "Some white mea came through the barricade. They took Miss Ruth away with 'em."

Wally clenched his fists. He had no doubt that the white men in question were Black Bard and his renegades.

"Which way did they go?" he rapped out, and, as the lad pointed towards the south-west, he wheeled with the intention of scouring his horse.

"Wait, Wally!" the old Scout appealed. "The soldiers'll help you to search for her. It's suicidal to ride out there alone, with the country full o' scattered bands of Injuns—"

But Wally shook free. He was in no mood to listen to reason, and once in the saddle he spurred in the direction which Black Bard and his men had taken. Nor was he seen again until after nightfall, when he rode disconsolately into Hangtown and was met by Sergeant O'Flaherty and a troop of soldiers.

"Not a trace of her!" Wally said, in answer to the Irishman's query. "I managed to follow tracks for a spell, but lost them in the hills."

The sergeant laid a hand on his shoulder.

"Never mind, me boy," he declared. "To-morrow we'll scour them hills for her, an' if she's anywhere within a fifty moile radius we'll find her."

Wally was not to be consoled, however, and as the troopers cantered off towards their quarters he led his horse morosely to the stables and walked round in the direction of old Charles Farcell's office.

FILM STORIES YOU SHOULD NOT MISS.

Godfrey Tearle

in
"THE SHADOW BETWEEN."

A man and a woman make a strange marriage pact. Read the story of a woman's great sacrifice to start level with a convict husband.

"NO LADY."

The woes of a man who possessed a very large family. An escaped convict impersonated the poor man and he became involved in riotous and strange adventures.
 Starring Lupino Lane.

ALSO

The fifth episode of our splendid serial drama of the sawdust ring, starring Francis X. Bushman, jun., and Alberta Vaughn—

"THE SPELL OF THE CIRCUS."

In this week's splendid issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY. PRICE 2s.

It was as he was passing the window that he heard voices, and, looking into the room, he saw Farrell and—Apache Joe.

The presence of Black Bard's henchman brought him to an abrupt standstill, and the first words that he heard gave him a clue to the motive behind the renegade's visit.

"I'm here with news o' your daughter, Farrell," the crook was saying. "Take a look at this, will yuh?"

He handed Farrell a note. Its contents, which Wally gathered from the subsequent conversation, read as follows:

"Your daughter is in our hands. If you withdraw unconditionally from the race for the government contract, she will be returned to you unharmed. If you refuse, you will never see her again."

A sharp cry escaped Charles Farrell, and with an impulsive movement he dragged open a drawer in his desk and clutched a six-gun that was lying there. But as the revolver barrel was levelled at his breast Apache Joe scarcely flinched.

"That won't do no good, Farrell," he observed. "That's the surest way of saying good-bye to your daughter for all time."

The forty-five in the old man's grasp wavered. Then, with a groan, he laid the weapon down and looked at Black Bard's emissary hopelessly.

"If I withdraw from that race," he said, "I'm out of business. A ruined man!"

"Ef you run in that race," Apache Joe reminded him, "your daughter will never be seen again—alive. Make up your mind, Farrell, for I gotta take back an answer one way or the other."

Farrell's hands twitched convulsively. "There's only one answer," he said heavily. "I give you my word that I won't enter my coach in the race."

"Then your daughter will be returned to you after the race is run tomorrow mornin'," Apache Joe told him, and made his way to the door.

As the crook emerged from the office Wally ducked back into the shadows. He saw the ruffian stroll along the street, and, resolved not to lose sight of him, began to follow him.

Apache Joe's destination was only fifty yards away—the back door of Whip Roden's premises. From a vantage point twenty or thirty paces distant Wally heard him give three knocks and saw him pass across the threshold. Then he stole close to the building, and, after making a tour around its walls, climbed noiselessly to the roof and took up his position by a skylight, which he opened two or three inches.

Immediately below him, seated at a table, he discerned Whip Roden. Black Bard and his ruffians were with him, and all eyes were on Apache Joe.

"It didn't take long for Farrell ter see sense," Apache Joe was saying. "The Golden West outfit won't be runnin' between Hangtown an' Placerville to-morrow."

"Good!" put in Black Bard. "Reckon that satisfies yuh, Whip, don't it?"

Roden fingered his chin. "Kind of," he murmured. "But, all the same, I want you to post men along the road, Bard."

"What's the idea, Whip?" Black Bard interrupted. "Farrell was your only rival, an' with him backin' outa the runnin' where's the sense in plantin' the boys along the trail? A down-right waste o' time, I call it, and—"

"I'm takin' no chances," Whip Roden told him. "Farrell's given his word he'll withdraw, but for all that I want the road watched. Understand?"

"What about the Farrell girl?" asked Black Bard. "We ain't gonna leave her here alone, are we?"

"Buzz Bryant can stay an' keep an eye on her," Roden answered, indicating a burly rogue on his right.

"When the contract for the Government mails is in my hands she can be turned over to her father."

He stood up and reached for his hat. His scoundrelly associates rose with him, and all but Bryant filed out of the room. From the roof Wally heard them mounting their horses, and listened to the clapping of the animals' hoofs as they cantered away into the night. Then he quietly pulled back the skylight.

Bryant was taken completely by surprise when Wally dropped into the room, and in a few minutes the stage driver had accounted for him. Yet he might have made more certain of the man, for by the time Wally had descended through a trap-door and discovered Ruth in a dingy cellar, Bryant had recovered his wits.

Seizing a heavy piece of wood that lay near the fireplace, he waited for Wally to ascend. As the youngster's head rose into view he swung up the bludgeon; but, swift as thought, Wally seized his wrist, and after a desperate scuffle managed to disarm him and make him secure.

Five minutes later Wally was presenting Ruth to her father, who sprang to his feet with an exclamation of joy as he caught sight of the girl.

"Now, listen, Mr. Farrell," said Wally, when father and daughter had embraced. "With Ruth safe home again you can run that race, so—"

The old man laid a hand on his arm. "No, Wally," he interposed, "that's where you make a mistake. You see, I gave my word that I'd withdraw from the race."

Nor would his high sense of honour permit him to break his promise, and it was only Wally Hamilton's astuteness that saved the Golden West outfit.

"Mr. Farrell," he said, "supposing you sold out to me—for one dollar," He grinned. "Yes, one dollar—just to make the deal legal and satisfy that conscience of yours. Then I could enter for the race without interfering with the promise you made."

The following day, at Placerville, Whip Roden received the shock of his life when the Golden West team showed up at the finishing-point ahead of his own outfit, and he was fairly rooted to the spot when the town marshal approached him and laid a hand on his shoulder.

"Roden," he said, "you're under arrest. Thanks to Wally Hamilton, Black Bard and his gang have been rounded up, and we've got all the evidence we need to show that you were working hand-in-glove with them. Come on!"

Meanwhile, Wally was receiving the congratulations of Charles Farrell and Ruth.

"Son," the old man declared, "from now on you're half-owner of the Golden West Express Company."

"Half-owner?" Wally reiterated laughingly. "Say, don't forget I bought the whole outfit for a dollar. But, on the level, Mr. Farrell, you can have the outfit back on one condition—that you give your consent to Ruth and I marrying."

"I give you my consent right now," Farrell answered. "And that half-ownership in the company can be my wedding present."

(By permission of the Filmophone Renters, Ltd., starring Wally Wales and Ruth Mix.)

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-, Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

GROSE'S

8, New Bridge Street, LONDON, E.C.4.

LUDGATE CIRCUS.

BILLIARDS AT HOME 1/- per week.

SIZE	DEPOSIT	4 monthly payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10/-	6/8	26/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8/8	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10/-	12/6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	15/6	52/-

Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls, guaranteed unbreakable, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk. COMPLETE LIST FREE.

BE TALLER!

Increased my own height to 6ft. 3ins. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, "Nerve," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

STAMMERING.

STOP NOW! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars free. FRANK B. HUGHES, 26, HART STREET, LONDON, W.C.1.

PARCEL OF 200

Interesting Stamps; such as Persia, Siam, Roumania (Boy King), Triangular, etc. price 3d. with Approvals only.—W. A. WHITE, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, Stourbridge.

HEIGHT INCREASED.

Complete course 5/-. Clients gain 1 to 5 ins. Particulars, testimonials free.—P. A. CLIVE, Harrocks, Colwyn Bay, N. Wales.

BE STRONG

I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-Control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-. STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

GROW TALLER!

ADD INCHES to your height. Details free.—JEDISON, 39 BOND STREET, BLACKPOOL.

BLUSHING, SHYNESS, TIMIDITY. For FREE particulars, simple home cure, send stamp. MR. HUGHES 26, HART STREET (ROOM 16), LONDON, W.C.1.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Electric House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Boy's Cinema

"THE HUNCHBACK OF NOTRE DAME"
and "MAID TO ORDER."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

NO. 620.

EVERY TUESDAY.

OCTOBER 31st, 1931.

A gripping
railroad drama.
Starring
JAMES HALL.

THE

FLYER

Owing to his wild life, a rich young man is driven from home. Almost he has made good when tragedy intervenes. A gripping railroad drama, starring James Hall and Dorothy Sebastian.

"Get Out and Stay Out!"

IT was four o'clock in the morning. From the speakeasy there appeared a party of roysterers. There were several girls and a number of young men. One wore a paper cap and a false nose and kept on shouting—obvious that he was far from sober.

With much shouting and blowing of tin trumpets, the overladen car drove away, and the commissionaire rubbed his tired eyes and murmured:

"Thank heaven that bunch have gone home at last! Suppose they'll be here again to-morrow—cuss them!"

But the young gentleman with the false nose did not patronise the speakeasy the following night and the reason was a very good one. He awoke about nine with a fat head and the fact that the telephone was ringing. His father would like to see him, the secretary warned him.

"Ought to have been there at eight-thirty," Jimmy Nelson ruffled his hair and yawned prodigiously. "Gosh, the old man will be stuffy! Better have a cold bath and pull myself together a bit."

At half-past ten Jimmy reached the big building which was the offices of the C.G. & F. Railroad—his father was the president.

"Your father wants to see you." The secretary's snile was not a pleasant one. It implied that behind the door marked "President" lay a lot of trouble.

"I'll go right in." Jim squared his shoulders and beamed at the secretary. "Suppose I'll have to tell him a bed-time story."

Jimmy Nelson was a square-built, clean-shaven youngster of twenty-two. A pleasant, dark-haired young man, whose face looked rather white, and around the eyes were too many dark lines. The shoulders seemed a trifle bowed, but this was not from hard work.

October 31st, 1931.

James Nelson, president of the railroad, was like his son, but with additional qualities. The same features, but every line was one of determination; the jaw was square, whilst the cheeks had the flush of health and the blue eyes had a steely quality lacking in that of the boy. His age was fifty, his hair was white, but he was far fitter than his son.

When his son entered the office the president did not look up.

"Morning, dad!"

"Morning, son!" The president was writing a cheque. He blotted the wet ink, then raised his eyes. "Suppose you've got the usual headache? You look half baked."

"I did go out with a few friends last night," Jimmy laughed in a somewhat shamefaced manner. "But I wasn't too late. Reckon that game of golf I played took it out of me."

"Oh, a game of golf is terribly strenuous!" The father looked his son up and down. "So tired that you get here two hours after time."

"I'm sorry, dad, but I didn't reckon there would be much doing this morning, and I'm not much good till about eleven. I'm a poor hand at figures—"

"And a darned poor hand for work." There was a rasp to the president's voice. "Take a seat, son, I'm going to talk to you. It may be for the last time."

"The last time, dad?"

"You heard!" The rasp was now a fierce growl. "Sit down and just listen. Try and get what I'm going to say into that thick head of yours. It ain't going to be a pleasant listen. For a year I've given you chance after chance, and you've gone from bad to worse."

"Dad, I can't stand a lecture." Jimmy got to his feet. "I'll come back and see you later."

"Sit down!" raged his parent—all the muscles on his neck standing out like whipcords. "I want you to learn what I'm going to do."

A hint of impending trouble made the youngster shoot his father a suspicious glance. The old man was very sore this morning.

"You've had education, money, pleasure—everything." The president spoke in a suddenly composed voice.

"And I was fool enough to imagine that after doing all this for you I might hope that you would settle down in the office. Time and again I made excuses for your lateness, afternoons off, long vacations, rowdy parties, and so forth.

During the last six months I've paid over a thousand dollars in road fines and a lot more to various speakeasies where you hit the high spots. The exuberance of youth—I thought you would get over it. You don't; but go from bad to worse. On my desk here are bills for six thousand dollars, a bill of damages for two thousand from a speakeasy where you pushed a waiter down some stairs, and a small item of two bucks from the traffic cops. I told you last time it would be the last, and you swore to make a change."

"But, dad—"

"Shurrnp!" The words came in a snarl. "I've tried to make a man out of you, and I've failed—so far. You've got a strong body, because I know how many trophies you've won for athletics, but now you're tired after a game of golf. You're a dissipated, spineless wreck, and I'm ashamed of you! I've finished with giving you chances. Here is a cheque for a thousand dollars, and it's the last you'll get. I'm through! Does your fuddled head grasp what I mean by that?"

"Well—er—"

"Then let me make it clear." The president gave a harsh, bellowing laugh. "You're fired from this business. You're fired from my home. You're fired as my son. I don't want to see you again. You're a knock-kneed, gutless sop!"

Jimmy Nelson was a shade whiter as he got to his feet. He tried to face his father as the old man stepped from behind the desk.

"Take your cheque." The president grasped the lapels of his son's coat with both hands and almost shook him. "I'm through with you, finished—done! Get out and stay out—and the sooner you go the better!"

No sign of relenting in the harsh eyes. Jimmy knew that at last he had gone too far and it was too late. His father released him, and automatically he took the cheque, scarcely able to believe that a moment ago he had been the son of a millionaire, and now was an outcast.

He looked at the cheque, and the four figures seemed to stand out in letters of fire. The price of his folly! He had been a fool, but he was not the sort to admit that fact. A vision flashed before him when his college shouted and roared his name. If he played football or baseball now he would be whacked in about five minutes. His father had called him a spineless wreck. It was true.

His father speaking over the phone made him raise his head.

"I want the traffic returns on the Eastern Sector." The old man ignored his son as if he were not in the room. "And when you've put that through I want you to take down a few letters. Yes, half an hour's time."

"Guess I'll be going." Something of his lost manhood was coming back to Jim Nelson. "You can keep this." He tossed the cheque on the desk table, but the president paid no heed.

The young-ter hesitated, looked at his father uncertainly, and then walked slowly out of the room, closing the door behind him.

Not till his son had gone did the president glance at the cheque, then he balanced it in his hand, and there was a faint smile—almost of hope—on the rugged features. There were a number of electric buttons on his desk, and he pressed one.

The door opened and a short, thick-set man lounged into the office. He was the company detective.

"Saunders, have that boy of mine trailed. He's just left here feeling a bit sore. I handed him a few home truths, and told him I was through. I want to see if he's got the nous to fight out his own salvation, and I want you to bring me a report of everything that happens to him. I shan't interfere unless he gets absolutely desperate. Get the idea?"

"Leave it to me, chief," was the answer.

When Courtesy Pays.

A LONG line of men were waiting for chance of temporary or permanent employment. South Orkney was a goods station and important junction. Many men were employed as the company also had a big repair works and engine houses.

A nondescript collection of men. Some were big burly fellows, who had been firemen, whilst some were weedy youths who wanted jobs as clerks in the offices, whilst others were just hangers-on. A month ago Jim Nelson might have looked conspicuous in his smart clothes, but they were smart no longer. They were fairly clean but threadbare, whilst his hat showed the ravages of the weather.

In a month Jim reckoned he had wandered half over the Northern States, and now he was back to within a hundred miles of his home town of Boston. In his pocket was enough for one more meal. He had learnt the art of stealing free rides on freight trains, and had roughed it. One or two odd jobs had come his way, but somehow the idea of working on a railway had appealed most. He had worked for a fortnight as a fireman on a mineral train running backwards and forwards from a mine until an aggressive foreman had made Jim seek work elsewhere.

Curiously enough, Jim was not unhappy. He grumbled and grizzled to himself, yet he knew this outdoor, hard life had brought back his strength. If they wanted him to play football now, he wouldn't have been a failure. He laughed to himself at another thought. What would his fine friends say if they could see him now? One bitter pill had been swallowed a week after leaving home. He had run across a man to whom he had often lent money and taken to many gay evenings. The man was with a girl who had often had her arms round Jim's neck. He knew her now as a gold-digger. They had ignored him—passed him by.

The clugging of a small car awoke his interest. A two-seater of somewhat ancient appearance had stopped before the wooden hut where the out-of-works waited to interview the yard master.

A pretty, rosy-checked young girl climbed out. Though her clothes were plain and serviceable they fitted the youthful figure to perfection. Home-made, but well-made! A sporting check serge with a small black hat, the outfit suited the dark-haired young woman. The pleasant expression made Jim smile. This girl would make a fellow a jolly good pal.

The girl gathered up in her arms about a dozen small parcels of all shapes and sizes. One slipped and nearly fell. The girl tried to make the pile more secure and made matters worse, because two small parcels rolled to the muddy ground.

The girl retrieved them quickly and flicked off the mud. Again she gathered them all together in her arms, whereupon one began to slide at the top of the pile. She made a vain effort to balance the parcel but it would not stay and rolled out of her arms to the ground.

It was more than Jim could bear. He left his place in the long line and hurried forward. He did not notice the line instantly close up after him.

The heap of parcels were wobbling precariously when Jim got to the girl's side. He retrieved the small parcel.

"If you'll stand still I'll arrange them for you." He raised his hat.

"Oh, thanks so much." The girl flashed him a look of thanks, and in her glance she summed up this young man very quickly.

"Let me just alter that bulky little chap." Jim moved one packet and substituted another. "This one on top, and now I think you're all right. Can I open a door or do anything else?"

"I'm through with you, finished—done!" The President almost shook him.
"Get out—and stay out!"

"Yes, that one 'Yard Master' on it," was her answer. "Thanks so much for helping me. One of those parcels is dad's lunch."

Jim smiled in response and opened the door. With a friendly glance from her blue eyes the girl disappeared. Jim closed the door and hurried back to the line of waiting men. His place was filled.

Jim tried to get back, but the man who had closed up was a surly, big-chested ruffian.

"End of the line!" he growled.

"But I was in front of you," protested Jim.

"Yeah, and you quitted the line," was the answer. "That means you go back to the end."

Several of the men waiting laughed discordantly, and Jim glared round.

"I only left the line to help that lady," he complained. "You've no right to take my place."

"Is that so?" grinned the ruffian. "You just try and get back and see what happens to you."

"I'm not scared of you, you big stiff!" cried the boy. "Are you standing away or am I going to paste you?"

The fellow weighed about fourteen stone or more, whilst Jim could not have been more than eleven, but it was destined that there should be no fight.

"Come on, you dolled-up worm," the heavy-weight began, and then became silent.

The door marked "Yard Master" had opened and a clean-shaven, grey-haired man had stepped out. Instantly the whole line stiffened and endeavoured to look very earnest. He wore a battered felt hat, a cardigan pulled over his waist, and grey serge trousers, but for all his clothes there was an air of command in the sharp eyes and alert expression.

"I'll see the men wanting work," he called in a pleasant voice. "I don't want any shoving or hustling. One at a time—in order."

Jim felt he would only jeopardise his chance and every one else's if he started to brawl. With a vicious look at the triumphant bully he was forced to go right to the end of the line. Not much chance of getting a job at South Orkney.

From behind the yard master appeared the girl Jim had helped. She scanned the line almost eagerly; then came down the few steps and pointed to the end.

"Hi—you!" The yard master was calling to Jim.

The youngster removed his hat and hurried forward, whilst the waiting line scowled.

"He's going to click," murmured the man in front of the bully. "And all through helping that dame. Gosh, some guys have all the luck!"

"Yes, sir?" Jim stood as if on parade. The yard master looked the athletic figure over and nodded.

"He helped me just now," whispered the girl. "I think he wants a job, dad."

"What can you do, lad?"

"Anything, sir. Don't mind what it is," stated Jim. "Last job was as fireman and cleaner on an engine carrying ore from a mine."

"Fit?" The yard master went on when the youngster nodded. "Any references?"

"None, sir. I've only recently started working. The last was my first job."

The yard master decided that here was a gentleman's son down on his luck. He had helped his daughter, and that was good enough to give the lad a trial.

"Take you on for a week," the yard master decided. "Up to you if you want to stay longer."

October 31st, 1931.

"You bet I do, sir," cried Jim, and his eyes stared frankly and admiringly at the girl, who blushed a little as she smiled at him.

A Fight and Promotion.

IT is seldom that a person goes through life without making some enemies. No matter how pleasant a person may be, there will be someone who will dislike him; envy or jealousy may be the cause. Jim Nelson had been very popular at college, and, in spite of the fact that he was a cut above the employees at South Orkney, he soon became fast friends with drivers, cleaners, engineers, and general staff. Of these friends, two were of great importance. Naturally the lady should be mentioned first.

Jimmy had thanked Rose for getting him a chance to make good, and it was curious how often they seemed to be running into each other. His work was that of a cleaner, but he did his task so well that the Yard-Master frankly told Rose that the new hand was a grand fellow! At the end of the second week Rose gave Jimmy some of her home-made ginger-bread. She had been taking some to her father, met Jimmy, and, of course, they had to talk. The third Sunday, Jimmy and his male friend were asked to tea.

Tom Summers was a goods foreman, and had been able to give Jimmy plenty of sound advice. They had sat next to each other in the mess-room, and had got talking. Tom was also a great friend of Rose's, so it is not surprising to find the two lads being invited up to the Rogers' neat bungalow, almost on the edge of the station, to a high tea. As Tom told another pal, it was a "case" between Rose and Jimmy.

But there was one person who did not like Jimmy. Durkin was chief foreman, and was disliked by most people. A tall, fierce-looking man, with scowling eyebrows and a bullying, blustering nature. He revelled in ordering people about and making them uncomfortable. His age was about thirty-six, and his features were of a type that some call handsome, though Tom always reckoned the foreman's eyes were too small. Tom did not like his superior, and warned Jim against him.

"Steer clear of Durkin," he had warned his new friend. "A sour, suspicious chap, with a streak of the brute in his make-up. He's a hard worker, and therefore old man Rogers reckons Durkin is okay. If he tries to razz you, keep your tongue in your mouth and your temper under control."

Sound advice, because three days later the foreman came into the engine-sheds during breakfast rest, calmly took the wooden box that Jim had arranged against a counter, and pushed the youngster's mess-can carelessly away. It fell to the ground, and Jimmy, coming back from a vain effort to remove some of the dirt from his hands and face with a greasy rag, saw, and would have argued the point if Tom had not laid a warning hand on his shoulder.

Durkin had scowled at the two.

"What's the matter with you two?" he had growled at them. "You with the check-cap!" This was Jimmy. "Get outside, and see if there is any news of that down goods."

"Go!" whispered Tom, and reluctantly Jimmy obeyed.

Jim would have liked to have punched the foreman's head, but he realised when he had cooled down what that would have meant. The loss of a job, and no further chance of seeing Rose. No wonder he came to like Tom almost as a brother.

A month passed, and one night the two chums and Rose went to the pictures. Jim chucked to himself as he sat in the medium-priced seats, and thought of the times when he had flung money about like water. Once his hand touched Rose's hand, and even in the darkness he became aware of her smile. Next week they went to the pictures alone, and held hands like two school-children. Tom had refused to come, pretending that the picture wasn't the sort he liked.

The growing friendship between Rose and Jimmy irritated Durkin. It was his boast that he had only to smile at a dame and she would almost eat out of his hand. A wizened, comic little driver brought the matter to a head.

"You say you're slick with the dames," he sneered. "You ain't dore much of the Rounco act with Rogers' daughter. She's a high-stepper, and I don't reckon she'd even look at you."

"What yer mean?"

"She's goofy on that new hand. The guy what got raised to fireman a week ago. The guy what spends five evenings a week a-sweatin' over books and papers so he can get promotion. Fine chap he looks, and Rose ain't half taken up with him."

"Spineless cove!" contemptuously snorted the foreman. "Wears la-de-da clothes, and is always washing his hands. Probably been one of these society crooks—confidence stuff—and is now lying low."

"That ain't Jim Benson," stoutly averred the driver, who loved to get a dig at the foreman. "He's class, but that don't say he's crooked."

"I'll bet you three things!" The foreman puffed out his chest. "One, that his name ain't Benson; second, that he's yellin'; and third, that I could cut him out with that Rogers kid as easy as flyin'."

"I'm skinned this month," grinned the driver, "but I can take that bet to a dollar!"

That very afternoon Durkin tried to win the money.

The man was full of conceit about himself. Rose was on her way to her father's office, and she was hoping that she might see some sign of Jim, who knew that about this time she brought her father some tea.

Rose had never liked the foreman very much. He was too sure of himself; nothing he didn't know, and always yelling his orders in a domineering, hectoring fashion that she thought bordered on the side of tyranny. As her father thought quite a lot of Durkin, she had never said anything against the man.

Therefore she summoned a smile when she came along past some carriages to meet the foreman face to face.

"Good afternoon, Miss Rogers." The foreman grinned, doffed his slouch-hat, and opened the attack. "Suppose you know you're trespassing?"

"Trespassing, Mr. Durkin?" The girl was puzzled. "I don't understand."

"This is the sector that I'm in charge of." The big man laughed. "I reckon I shall have to exact a forfeit."

"A forfeit?"

"I can't condone the offence," cried the schemer. "You haven't got my permission, so I must exact toll. It won't be a very heavy penalty."

"Oh, I'm glad of that," Rose laughed nervously. The foreman was behaving strangely, and she did not like the mocking glint in his eyes. "What kind of toll?"

"Just a little kiss," laughed Durkin. "You dare to try, and I'll box your ears!" flared up the girl. "Are you mad, or have you been drinking?"

The contempt and disdain in the girl's flashing eyes roused the man's anger. He'd kiss this girl and conquer her by sheer will-power. Some of these proud, haughty young women didn't know how to appreciate a fine man like himself. Previous to the encounter he had been sampling some smuggled hooch, and his bullying nature was roused.

With open arms, the foreman advanced on the girl, and she shrank back against a carriage. There was horror as well as anger now in the pretty eyes.

"Leave me alone, you drunken brute!" she stormed. "I'll call my father! He'll fire you!"

"Come here, you little spitfire!" cried the foreman, and swept her into a bear-like hug.

Jim had been working so hard and patiently that the yard master had given instructions for the lad to be tested and tried out as a driver of an engine.

He first became aware of a group of cleaners and other men grouped together, and it was obvious from their laughter and gesticulations that they were watching something. Naturally, Jim looked in the same direction. Some coaches stood in his way, and it was behind these coaches that a lot of dust seemed to be kicked up.

The youngster guided his engine further along the track and then he could look round the end of the box. An anticipatory smile twitched his lips, because he expected to see something amusing, such as a fight or a coach on fire. But when he saw Rose struggling in the arms of the foreman he gave a snort of rage and leaped down from the cab.

Steel-like fingers gripped the foreman by the throat and the brute at once relaxed his grip of the girl, who staggered back with a sob of relief.

Durkin was livid with rage when he saw his opponent was Jim. Now he would smash this kid to pulp for his interference; but he did not get the chance.

As Durkin drew back his arm to whip a punch to Jim's face the younger man flashed in with a hard left that knocked the bully's head back, and before he could recover a painful right landed like lightning on his unshaven jaw. It was more surprise than damage that toppled the big man backwards, that and a trip over a railway line.

In a flash he was on his feet, and again that left and right landed before his own wild lunges were anywhere near the boy.

Again Durkin fell back, tripped over a loose sleeper and crashed on top of a rail.

Rose ran to Jim, who put his arm protectively round her shoulders.

"Get up!" ordered Jim. "And say you're sorry."

For a moment Durkin hesitated.

"You go to blazes!" he cried.

Rose clutched at Jim.

"Let him go!" she begged. "He's been drinking."

"Don't you try making any mischief," Durkin blustered, "or I'll make it hot for everybody round these parts! I was only teasing the little fool."

"You'd better get back to your job!" Jim snapped out. "Try tricks like that again and I'll smash you!"

Without a word Durkin slunk away, but he looked up like a tiger at bay when a yell of laughter rang out. His hands became crooked and his teeth showed in a vicious snarl. Wildly he ran towards the grinning railwaymen; they did not wait.

"Durkin could cause trouble," Rose told Jim. "Father's very busy, and if he had to fire Durkin now it would be awkward. Let's say nothing about it. A man of his type doesn't know what he's doing when he gets some of that smuggled spirit into him."

"Have it your own way," Jim was not pleased. "I hate telling tales out of school, but I don't like a skunk like that remaining around. Durkin's a dangerous man. A bully and a mystery; you ought to hear what Tom thinks of him. Well, Rose, we'll say nothing; but next time I see anything I go straight to your old man."

The Census Collector.

JAMES NELSON, SEN., sat in his office, and before him was a pile of accounts and a cheque-book. Standing by the side of the desk was the railroad detective.

"When he got that job I wrote off one heavy account," the president was chuckling. "When he got promotion to fireman I wrote off several more; but wasn't I cheered when I heard about promotion to engineman. Reckon I'll pay off the lot and give the boy a clean sheet."

"Well, chief, I guess you ought to know something." The detective rubbed his chin. "Maybe it won't be such good news. There's a gal."

"Jim carrying on with some girl?" Instantly the president turned into a war-horse. "What kind of a girl?"

"Daughter of the yard master," was the answer. "Of course, she isn't his sort, chief, and I thought—"

"Never mind what you thought. What is she like?"

"She's a good-looker and seems a nice sort of girl." The detective pursed his lips. "But it did occur to me that she might have recognised your son and be thinking of the future."

"You're right. What's her name?"

"Rose Rogers, chief."

"Rogers—Rogers! Not Rocky Rogers?" the president demanded.

"Thin, clean-shaven, hard-jawed, determined sort of a man, piercing eyes and slightly bowed shoulders?"

"Sounds like him, chief."

"Rocky and I were buddies together," the president mused. "He went to Canada and for years we kept in touch, but when I got on the board I offered him a job. The proud old fool said he could make his way without any favours. I'll lay every cent I've got up's Rocky, and the old dog has joined up with my railroad and made good. Kinda surprise him when I go to South Orkney. I'll go right away." He pressed on several buttons. "I'll have a special and go north and I'll take an eye-ful of this girl."

Jim had Durkin by the throat. . . .

Rose was busy cooking when there came a knock at the front door. None too pleased to be interrupted, the girl answered the summons and found herself smiling at a tall, white-haired, kindly-looking old man.

"Might I come in for a moment?" the president requested. "I'm a census-taker for the railway, and maybe you can help me."

"You're a census-taker?" The girl invited him to enter. "Why, they only did that a few months ago."

"Yeah, I thought they did it badly, so I"—he laughed hurriedly—"so I've got the job of doing it again. Comfortable place you've got here. Your name is Rogers, isn't it?"

"Yes; Rose Rogers."

The president observed a picture of a young man.

"Your brother, I suppose?"

"Something more than a brother." The girl spoke in a whisper, her eyes turned towards the picture. How surprised she would have been if she had seen the census-taker raise his eyebrows and finger his lips—her expression had been noted.

"A handsome-looking young man," opined Mr. Nelson. "Don't you think the eyes are a little too close, and—?" He saw the battle-light. "No, perhaps you're right. Still, the jaw might be a little firmer."

"You should have seen him lay out someone who got fresh with me the other day," snapped Rose. "If he were here now you wouldn't say his jaw was weak. Any questions I can answer?"

"I like a girl who stands up for her man." James Nelson nodded his approval. "I apologise for even suggesting the chin was weak. Now I look at the picture again I see my mistake, and"—he sniffed—"surely that smell—gingerbread?"

"Oh, oh, and it's burning!" Rose fled to the kitchen.

James Nelson followed her and watched deft fingers removing a cake from the oven. He licked his lips.

"Haven't tasted gingerbread for years," he commented. "Mother always used three eggs."

"This has two. Three's too rich," answered the girl. "Like to try a bit?"

James Nelson tried two bits, and when he left took a third portion in his handkerchief.

"Rocky's daughter is just the girl for Jim," were his thoughts. "If I weren't so fat I could do a war-dance."

Not till the nice old man had gone did Rose give a gasp. Why, he hadn't asked a single question about the census. Another thing that perplexed her was that his face seemed vaguely familiar. Perhaps father would be able to explain the mystery.

MURDER!

TOM SUMMERS seemed moody and distracted as he lounged against a stack of heavy packing-cases. Jimmy, seated on another and munching some bread and cheese, studied his friend.

"What's worrying you, Tom?"

October 31st, 1931.

"Letter from the yard master. Can't blame him for it."

"Old Rogers not complaining, is he?"

"Complaining! Gee, you oughta read his letter!" Tom gave his friend a glance. "And if I knew who the skunk was, I'd wring his neck!"

"Wring whose neck?" Jim was puzzled. "I don't get the hang of the trouble. Not anything to with that thieving, is it?"

"You've hit it on the head, Jim," sighed the goods foreman. "I've told you that goods have been vamoosing into thin air. Well, I ain't said a lot about it, as I hate moaning, and I've tried to trace the thefts myself. Not a bit of luck. The guy what does the trick must be well informed. Last week from my yard two bales of cotton, two huge cases of tinned goods, and a case containing six very expensive shot-guns vanished. To-day's Wednesday, and, so far, the loss amounts to four bales of mixed goods, a packing-case full of expensive china, a portable outboard motor, and several other items!"

"Gosh, Tom, why didn't you tell me before?"

"Wanted to get the skunk myself, and I hate making a lot of fuss." Tom scowled. "Three nights last week and two this I haven't gone to bed, but not a sign. The chief is naturally riding the high horse, and says that if this pilfering doesn't stop, something's going to happen. Can't blame the old man for getting riled, because it sure looks as if I ain't taking proper precautions. If I don't get this guy mighty soon I look like going out on my ear!"

"Tom, I'm going to help you in this business," cried Jim. "I'll keep my eyes open, and to-night I'll do a prowling round the yard."

"That's mighty good of you, pal." Tom looked up as a whistle shrilled.

"Hallo, time to get back to work! You're shunting this morning?"

"Yes, and I'm hoping to be out on the open road before long," Jim grinned. "Now, you're not to worry, old chap; we'll get this crook and his gang. See you mid-day."

Tom went about his business and chance took him, some two hours later, to a quiet sector of the yard. A goods train was parked on a side line, and Tom knew it was due out that afternoon. A perplexed frown creased his forehead, because he could see through the bogeys the wheels of a motor-lorry. Evidently someone was loading or unloading!

Quietly Tom ran over several sets of lines until he had reached the freight car on the other side of which was the lorry. The hum of voices came to the listener, and then his teeth showed in a triumphant gleam as he heard something heavy being moved. A pause, and then, by peering beneath the car, Tom saw the lorry jolt and creak—something heavy had been dumped on to it.

Tom reached up and ever so slowly worked open the sliding doors of the freight car and peered in. On the motor-lorry, which he could see, owing to the other doors being wide open, were various bales and packing-cases, whilst the freight car was half empty. Two men were arranging the goods on the open lorry, another was at the driver's seat, and supervising the loading was Durkin.

So that skunk Durkin—the bully and blusterer—was the thief!

Tom was so mad that he could hardly think. The yard-foreman, whom the old man trusted, was nothing more nor less than a dirty sneak-thief! Tom's fingers itched to get a throttle-hold on the scoundrel.

He was so enraged that he started to crawl under the car; but he had sense enough to know that Durkin and his bunch would hear him, knock him stiff and make a get-away. To run round the freight train meant a journey past two more cars. Best to do that and watch the gang, whilst endeavouring to attract someone's attention to fetch assistance.

But Tom, as he closed the sliding doors, made sufficient noise to attract the sharp ears of Durkin.

"What was that?" hissed the crook foreman, and at once leaped into the freight car. Cautiously he pulled back the doors and saw the figure of Tom. "Hades, a sneaking spy! Boys, Tom Summers has got wise to our game!"

The foreman leaped out of the van.

"I've got to try and get Summers," he shouted.

Jim Nelson had just finished shunting a number of trucks and had just banked up the fires to await further instructions. He was leaning out of the cab, dreaming and smiling to himself, thinking of Rose, and the fact that she had confessed her love for him.

The dreamy look left his eyes as they registered someone waving a red handkerchief. He peered under shaded hand. He saw an engineless freight train and, running along the lines, someone waving a red handkerchief, or so. It was Tom Summers. He waved his cap and Tom stopped running to point excitedly at the goods train.

"By gar, Tom's rumbled something!" Jim guessed the truth and jumped to the starting-lever.

The big engine quivered and then moved forward with gathering speed.

Durkin came to a panting stop when he got a clear view of the yard. His bloodshot eyes saw the engine moving down the next set of lines and Tom Summers waving and gesticulating. Desperately Durkin glanced round for his best way of escape, and his eyes gleamed with a fiendish light as he saw a hand-lever that controlled some catch-points. If he pushed the lever back it would change the points, thus diverting the oncoming engine on to the same track as the freight train.

His idea was to cause confusion and stop Tom Summers from getting at them before a get-away could be carried out with success.

To think was to act, and Durkin dragged over the lever. Little did he guess the terrible result of this deed!

Jim had disappeared into the cab as Durkin changed the lever, and therefore did not notice the altered points at first glance. He saw Tom scurry across the lines, with the evident intention of attacking Durkin. His hand was prepared to set the brakes, when his eyes nearly bulged out of his head.

Before him were the points, and he saw that his engine would be switched on to the same line as the freighter. He had not bothered about these points before, because they were not supposed to be touched.

Tom had one foot over the side line that joined the two sets when the whistle from Jim's engine made him look round. He misunderstood the signal as being one of encouragement to attack Durkin. Tom knew the points and expected Jim's engine to remain on the other set of rails.

A screeching of brakes made Tom turn and realise his danger. He would have got clear if he had not caught his foot and fallen.

Next moment the giant engine seemed to be upon him. A scream of mortal anguish, and then silence.

Jim had seen the whole tragedy, and when he had brought his engine to a stop, stood on the footplate, with arms over his eyes, slowly rocking to and fro.

That scream had paralysed him into a sort of coma.

Suddenly blind, murderous rage dispersed the coma, and Jim jerked his arms from his eyes. Just before the engine had run Tom down he had seen the lever and how close it was to Durkin. The foreman stood as if rooted to the spot, staring with horrified gaze at the still figure beneath the wheels. Jim leaped from the cab.

The yell of agony and the scream of the brakes had been heard. Men came running from sheds, and saw an engine almost on top of a freight train; some with keener sight saw the figure under the wheels and scented a tragedy. From all parts they ran towards the scene.

Jim had got Durkin by the throat, and so fierce was his rage that the other looters had not the courage to interfere. Vainly the foreman struggled to break away, but, in the nick of time, railway-men pulled Jim off.

"He's murdered Tom! Murdered Tom!" babbled Jim. "Let me kill him! Let me kill him!"

They dragged him away—Jim was almost foaming at the mouth. Then someone saw the lorry and the three thieves, who had been staring as if hypnotised. An angry mob seized them and made them prisoners.

Two Fathers and a Heart-broken Girl.

JAMES NELSON, president of the C.G. & F. Railroad, paced the comfortable sitting-room of the Rogers' shack. The yard-master looked gloomy and worried. It was two days after the death of Tom Summers.

To meet again after all this time—and at once tragedy had set in! James Nelson had gone to the yard-master's office, and the two old friends were talking over old times when the accident had happened. Then Rogers had learnt the true name of the lad who loved his daughter.

"It's a terrible business."

Rocky Rogers spoke at last.

"It's enough to unnerve the strongest of men. I thought for a little while that Jim had gone off his head. It took about six men to hold him down. All the rest of that day he babbled and raved, yelling the name of Durkin and trying to fight an imaginary person. Doc got him off with a sleeping draught at last, and you know what the boy was like when he recovered his wits."

"Yeah, I know," muttered James Nelson. "He can't get over the fact that Tom Summers is dead. He feels he's killed his best friend and—"

He turned for consolation to his old buddy. "Do you think his nerve has gone for good, Rocky?"

"He surely took on in a dreadful fashion," confessed Rocky. "Wouldn't see Rose, because he said he was tainted with blood, and acted so queerly that I advised my girl not to go to him. The only chance seemed to get him right away."

"So you detailed him for Three Beeches?" The president nodded his head with approval. "Guess you did the right thing, Rocky. I wondered if I did right in keeping to the background?"

"After what happened with Rose—yes," answered Rocky. "He would have edged away and said there was blood between him and you. Three Beeches is a quiet spot up in the hills. We have a cabin there, because a sector of several miles has two sets of tracks, where goods and 'slows' can be switched off the main track to let through expresses. He swore he could never handle an engine again; but time is a marvellous healer, James, and the strong air up there will put him on better terms with himself."

"He won't do anything crazy up there?" the president asked.

"Oh, he's sensible enough now, but can't get out of his mind the terrible end of Tom Summers." Rocky put his arm round the president. "I've got a suggestion. I like that boy of yours and so does Rose. I haven't seen her upset many times, but she's almost off her head. I'll fetch her in, James."

Rose was white-faced, and her pretty eyes showed signs of tears. Her father drew her into his arms.

"There, there, my dear," he comforted the girl.

"Can't we do something, daddy?"

"Yeah, I've got a suggestion." Rocky gave a smile as he saw the eager light in the president's eyes. "You've got your own train down here. That sector's pretty clear after eleven to-night. I've got a heavy goods going through, and after that the main line will be free for nigh on four hours. Soon after the freight pulls out, you might pull out as well."

"You mean go and see Jim?" cried the president. "That's a swell idea!"

"And maybe Rose might like to go with you," hinted the yard-master.

"You two might work a genuine cure." "Will you come with me, Rose?" asked the president, and her answer was to leave her father and hold out both hands to him.

What was the prisoner in his solitary cell doing? He was slashing at the wall with a long-bladed knife, and already had chipped away a mass of old and rotten mortar to expose portions of a stone slab.

That morning Durkin had been sentenced to four years, and in the morning he would be removed to the State Penitentiary.

The rascally foreman knew what the inside of a prison was like. He blamed what had befallen him on the shoulders of Jim Nelson. What the blazes did the fool want to kill Tom Summers for, and why should he have to suffer? Crazy reasoning, but Durkin was half mad, and he thirsted for vengeance.

To-morrow they would take him away, so if he wanted to escape, now was his only chance. The dagger hidden in his clothes had not been found, and a few probes with the point showed him a way to use it. If he could dig away the mortar he would get to stone slabs, and if the cement between the slabs could be chipped away he could push out a hole and crawl to freedom.

At last the mortar had been removed and a stone slab loosened. A hard thrust and the slab toppled backwards. Durkin was aware that his cell backed on to a refuse heap and would be unwatched. Not many moments later he stood up outside the gaol and stretched his arms.

Free! Free! His teeth came together in a vicious grimace as he thought of Jim snatched away the telephone just as Durkin tried to break the flex.

Jim Nelson. He would get that young fool and then aim north for the border.

Durkin crept into a railwaymen's shelter and stole a soft felt hat. With the hat pulled down over his eyes, he made his way to the railway. From a cleaner whom he recognised as a new hand, Durkin learnt of Jim's post up in the hills.

With clenched fists and bloodlust in his heart, the ex-foreman set out to tramp the six miles up to Three Beeches.

The Runaway Trucks.

JIM NELSON sat in his lonely cabin. There was a strained, tense look about the youngster. Every now and again he would get up and pace the cabin or walk out on to the veranda round the signal-box. The stars twinkled in the sky, and a moon was edging above the pines. How peaceful, and yet Jim was far from feeling at rest. No wonder where he looked he seemed to see the blood-stained body of his friend.

"I shall go mad—mad!" He pressed his knuckles to his forehead.

It was with relief that he heard the telephone summon him.

Old Pudge doing duty at a box two miles down the grade was reporting a heavy freight train on the way. Jim set his signals and fell again to pacing up and down. Now and again he seemed to shiver and a queer light appeared in his eyes. Was he going mad? Perhaps this was all some hideous nightmare—

A wheezing, grunting chug warned him that the "goods" was approaching, and he went out on to the veranda. He felt better at seeing signs of human life, the fireman and driver standing in the glow of an open fire-box, and the rumbling thud of the heavy freighter as it cranked and groaned past the box.

The men waved to Jim and he waved back, but when the train had disappeared round a bend all the misery and anguish returned. In the darkness he seemed to see grinning, mocking faces. An engine madly rushing towards a man, who waved his arms in despair, and screamed in terror as the engine mowed him down.

Jim cleared the train to the box two-and-a-half miles farther on, at the top of the grade. Then he tried a smoke, but that had no effect. A magazine drove him crazy, because the first picture he looked at was an engine running some person down. He flung the paper from him.

A call came from South Orkney that a special had left the junction.

He was sitting with bowed head when the telephone-bell brought another message. The freight train was passing the summit. Nothing more for hours to relieve the monotony.

Along the line a figure was stalking. In the darkness the man's eyes seemed to blaze.

The signal-box at last. Cautiously he climbed the wooden steps and grinned as he saw Jim Nelson sitting by a table with his head on his hands.

Durkin had come for his revenge.

Anderson, in charge of the summit signal-box, was smoking his pipe and reading yesterday's paper when a rumbling roar made him jump to his feet. What in the name of heck was that row?

Out on to the veranda he charged. A red light was moving rapidly towards him. What could it mean? He understood when three freight trucks rumbled past his cabin. The goods train had broken in halves—and the three heavy bogies were sliding back towards

October 31st, 1931.

Three Beeches. At once Anderson remembered the special train he had been signalled about.

He darted to the 'phone to warn Three Beeches about the trucks. There was no answer to his frantic calls.

Fighting with a Madman.

JIM NELSON had covered his eyes with his hands, but that did not help. Even though he closed his eyes his brain weaved terrible pictures, with Tom Summers grimaicing through them.

The shutting of a door disturbed Jim, and he took a hand from his eyes. What was that? The spirit of Tom Summers came to mock him?

A sneering laugh, and Jim spun round, with ashen cheeks. But it was not the ghost of Tom Summers that stood there, but the evil, snarling Durkin. The man's hands were crooked, and his lips were drawn back, showing the broken teeth clenched in fierce hate.

Jim was spell-bound, unable to move as he watched the man, with bated breath, coming towards him.

"I'm gonna smash you to a pulp!" leered Durkin. "Kill you! And I'm gonna leave your body on the line, so that no one will know who did the killing!"

Durkin for the time was out of his mind, and had only one idea—to kill.

Slowly Jim stood up, but he was unconscious of the act. Though he recognised Durkin, his mind was a nightmare. This was all part of a dreadful dream! In a moment Tom Summers would appear, and would see Durkin murder him.

As Jim shrank back, Durkin mistook the action for fear, and laughed crazily. He strode forward and drove his fist into Jim Nelson's face, and the youngster crashed to the floor. Durkin yelled with laughter. He would smash Nelson, and then throw the body on the lines! Why bother to use a knife?

But that blow acted as a tonic to Jim. The blow had hurt him, and so had the fall to the ground. This was no nightmare! He had been knocked down! He opened his eyes and glared into Durkin's evilly grinning face.

"I escaped!" shouted the maniac. "You thought I was safe behind prison bars, but I got free because I had sworn to kill you!"

Jim leapt to his feet. Before Durkin could reach him, the youngster's fist had landed to the jaw.

"Take that, you murdering skunk!"

Durkin saw that Nelson was going to make a fight for it. Perhaps he had better use the knife, after all! Directly the knife appeared, Jim shot out a straight kick with his right foot, and, with a yell of pain, Durkin's fingers opened and the knife flew through the air, to bury itself in the wall. Like two tigers, the men faced each other and then sprang.

Backwards and forwards they rocked, a table crashed over, and they rolled to the floor. First Durkin was on top, trying to batter Jim's head against the boards; then Jim would wriggle his man over, and they would try to crush the breath from each other's bodies.

They got to their feet and swapped punches. By now their clothes were half torn from their backs. Their chests rose and fell under the intensity of the struggle. Durkin raised a chair above his head and rushed at Jim, but the youngster ducked and banged his fist into the others' ribs. The chair smashed against the door of the signal-box. Jim sprang at Durkin. They clinched, and once more crashed to the floor.

Then the telephone-bell began to ring—and ring—and ring!

Desperately Jim struggled with Durkin, who seemed possessed of the strength of a demon. Every foul trick possible did he try. With his fingers he clawed at Jim's eyes and tried to seize the youngster by the hair, when only by hard jabs to the ribs could Jim break free.

Jim snatched away and saved the telephone just as Durkin tried to break the flex, but he could not attempt to get the message, as Durkin was on him again in a flash.

All the while the bell kept ringing, and Jim knew that a call at this time meant something terribly urgent.

Durkin had both eyes badly pumelled and his body was sore, but Jim had not escaped unscathed. A vicious kick had seemed to smash his right ankle, and he could hardly stand, whilst Durkin's claws had caused his left cheek to bleed. No word was spoken between the two fighters: they panted and grunted under the exertion of this titanic battle.

Jim knew he must get his man by boxing, for Durkin knew too many dirty tricks. He landed a heavy punch to the jaw and right above the heart, but Durkin just shook his head and fought on.

All the while the telephone-bell kept up its insistent ringing.

Jim was flung back by a lucky right-

(Continued on page 27.)

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

LLOYD HUGHES

in

"THE SKY RAIDERS."

Secret drinking loses a daring pilot his job and the love of a fine girl. A gang of crooks try to make use of him for daring robberies, but he fights them to regain his manhood and the girl he loves.

"LASCA OF THE RIO GRANDE."

A tempestuous dancing girl, a half-breed rustler, and a Texas Ranger. A tale of a cattle stampede and a girl's brave sacrifice, starring John Mack Brown and Dorothy Burgess.

"THE BLACK WIDOW."

A mysterious death—a nephew accused of the crime—a girl reporter's fight to prove his innocence. A true story taken from the notebook of William J. Burns of the U.S. Secret Service.

ALSO

The concluding chapters of our thrilling serial:

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

Paris in the grim days when revolution threatened to break in all its terror and ghastliness. A powerful story centring round the life of Quasimodo, the deformed bellringer of the famous Cathedral of Notre Dame. Starring the late Lon Chaney, Patsy Ruth Miller and Norman Kerry.

The Festival of the Fools.

THE fifteenth century with Paris in the throes of internal strife. Troublesome times indeed, for the throne of King Louis XI was threatened with extinction, while members of the nobility of the city moved about in danger of their lives.

"Down with the aristocrats!" The cry had gone forth among the people, and it needed but the semblance of a flame to set fire to the grim torches of revolution.

The trouble had started with the shortage of money brought about by pitiless taxation. Soon the Parisians found themselves in rags and tatters, slowly starving on account of their inability to afford food that was at high prices. And for this parlous state of affairs the king and the cursed aristocrats were to blame. Self alone counted with them—so long as they had money and fine clothes, wine with their dainty dishes, and generally led a gay life it did not matter a hang what happened to those outside their avaricious world.

Discontent therefore rapidly merged into bitter hatred against the oppressors, though on the day of the Festival of the Fools, an annual event of great importance in Paris, no one would have thought that revolution was so near to knocking at the door.

The market square, with the famous Cathedral of Notre Dame as its background, was seething with a riotous and jolly throng. Some with masks covering their faces, others in fancy dress made for the most part with paper—all singing at the top note of their voices and dancing with great abandon.

A stir among the masses when the king came driving through the square—stopped his carriage to frown on them with displeasure and to pass a word of disapproval to his chamberlain.

The singing stopped as did the dancing, and angry mutterings ran around the dense crowd. But the king did not bat an eyelid, and no hostile move was made. For all his arrogance, his extravagance and dissipation King Louis XI was a brave and courageous man, and he appeared frequently in the streets despite the disturbing rumours of pending revolution that reached him from time to time.

For two or three minutes he eyed his dissatisfied subjects levelly, a sncer on his lips, then motioned to the royal driver with a superior wave of the hand. His carriage, rumbling away over the cobblestones of the square, was the signal of a renewal of the festivities of the day, and in another moment the air was hideous with ribald laughter and lusty song as the people again flung themselves into the gay spirit of carnival.

And so it went on while afternoon merged into evening, then with the approach of dusk there sounded above the wild revelry the ringing of the giant bell of Notre Dame. Almost time now for the ceremony that would mark the end of the festivities for yet another year—none other than crowning the ugliest man in Paris "King of the Fools."

An outstanding event, yet there were two of the multitude that thronged the square at that moment who were not interested in that function in the least. One was a tall, evil-looking ruffian dressed almost in rags with a straggly beard and side-whiskers and cruel, sinister grey eyes. Clopin, robber, vagrant, murderer, recognised king of the underworld and the throne's most dangerous enemy. Clopin it was who was for ever urging the populace to unleash the hounds of revolution.

He was on the steps of the cathedral, lounging against one of the stately pillars, a sneer on his thin, cruel lips, scorn flashing from his eyes as he gazed down upon the revellers, when suddenly he felt a touch on his arm. A startled oath escaping him he swung round, his grimy hand going to the haft of the knife that was concealed beneath the folds of the ragged cloak he wore.

"You, Jehan!" Clopin let his hand fall to his side as he recognised the other, but not for a moment did the fierce expression leave his face. "You gave me quite a fright, curse you. What in hades do you want?"

"Nothing, my friend," came the smooth answer. "But how fares the revolutionary cause? When do you strike?"

"Sooner than you may expect!" Clopin shot him a shrewd glance. Well he knew the evil nature of Jehan, unworthy brother of Dom Claude, the arch-deacon of Notre Dame. But he could not fathom whether the man was for or against the revolutionists. It was quite possible he was a spy, for he was always keen to glean information concerning the movement, yet knowing him for what he was, a heavy drinker and gambler and a clever thief into the bargain, Clopin felt sure he could not be a royalist. "Yes, Jehan, the time is almost at hand, then heaven help all those who are against us!"

A glance at the arch-deacon's brother that held as much meaning as did the tone of his voice, then Clopin drew his cloak closer about him and strode away. For several seconds Jehan watched the tall figure shouldering a way through the roystering crowd, then as the ringing of the bell high up in the tower of the cathedral suddenly ceased, he swung on his heels and made off, a crafty light in his evil eyes that showed he was planning some fell scheme.

Deafening cheers arose on the air now, and with one accord the revellers turned eager eyes upwards to where a small figure could be seen on the topmost balcony of the cathedral. Quasimodo, the bell-ringer of Notre Dame, a pathetic little figure though repulsive to the eye.

Poor Quasimodo! The fates had not been kind to him, for he was a hunchback, was blind in one eye, and almost deaf. In addition to which he had a deformed nose, was knock-kneed, had but a few stumps of teeth in his head, and possessed the brain of a child. But for all his terrible deformity he had a heart of gold, though he would do anything he was told to do not knowing if it were right or wrong.

The ugliest man in Paris, and he had been crowned as such at the Festival of the Fools for years now!

To the accompaniment of wild cheering, Quasimodo leaned over the stone balustrade at the top of Notre Dame, dancing about like some delighted child and pulling hideous faces at the roystering crowd in the square below.

"Come on down, Quasimodo! We want to crown you!"

As the cry was taken up with much fervour, the hunchback swung himself over the balustrade, and with amazing agility and without any apparent regard for his own safety he came shinning down the face of the cathedral, seeking handholds and footholds where he could among the massive stonework.

The ground reached in safety, he was immediately pounced on by some dozen men, and there on the steps of the cathedral a gilded cardboard crown was rammed upon his head, and then he was marched around the square on the shoulders of two powerful fellows while the mob laughed and cheered with great gusto.

But at last he was let down, grinning happily in an absurd kind of way, and he joined in the singing and shouting, pushing his way hither and thither among the seething crowd.

He came presently to one end of the square where a cluster of people was gathered. From beyond the ring they formed came the sound of a tambourine and the liquid notes of a girl's voice raised in song. Though he could hear nothing of what was going on, Quasimodo's curiosity was aroused and he pushed his way through the crowd and came to the inner edge of the circle.

On the instant his ugly face lit up as he gazed with his one sound eye at the vision of loveliness who was entertaining the crowd with a song and dance, the tambourine in her hand her only accompaniment. A slip of a girl little more than eighteen, bare-footed, with dancing china-blue eyes and golden-brown hair that hung in masses about her shapely shoulders. Esmeralda, ward of the rascally Clopin, who had kidnapped her in the streets when she was barely out of the cradle and who forced her to work in this way to bring money to his greedy pockets.

As she came to the end of her song and dance the audience applauded her vociferously, and none more so than Quasimodo. In his enthusiasm the little hunchback hopped about excitedly, clapping his gnarled hands and uttering gurgling sounds at the back of his throat.

A wonderful girl—this Esmeralda whom he had only seen once before. He felt he wanted to make her acquaintance, and with this object in view he shuffled towards her. It was at that moment that Esmeralda, bowing to the plaudits, caught sight of him and the grotesque figure he cut caused her to recoil involuntarily and to utter a cry of fear.

"Very, very good, my dear." The hunchback grinned as he confronted her. In a vague kind of way he wondered why she shrank from him, and he placed his hand on her arm to reassure her as an inkling of the truth penetrated his dull brain. "But you are scared of me. Now, now, I won't hurt you—not I."

But the twisted grin on his face, the laughter of the watching crowd, completely unnerved Esmeralda and, with a frightened cry, she flung off Quasimodo's hand and ran into a nearby tent which she used as a place of rest in the intervals between her entertaining.

Next second those who had watched her act had shuffled away to rejoin the waning festivities of that memorable day, and they swept Quasimodo along with them.

A Sinister Plot.

THE next night while Clopin was addressing a full muster of his revolutionary followers, pouring vindictive words against the king into their ears and telling them that it was absolutely necessary to the success of their cause that they should strike without further delay, Jehan, the brother of the arch-deacon of Notre Dame, confronted Quasimodo as the hunchback came out of the cathedral on his way to buy himself some food.

"Quasimodo, I want you to help me." Jehan glanced about him to make sure that he would not be overheard. Then he took hold of the hunchback's arm and bent very close to his ear. "There's a girl—Esmeralda, the ward of that rascal Clopin—that I want to take away from this terrible city before the trouble starts. You know what I mean—the talk of revolution. I should hate to see anything happen to her, so I've decided to take on the task of protecting her. I'm better fitted to do that than anyone, and I'm sure my brother, the arch-deacon, would wish it thus."

Artful Jehan. He had long since coveted the beautiful Esmeralda, but knew that he stood not a chance of winning her affections by fair court, so he had determined to kidnap her, to take her right away from Paris, and then to force her to marry him. But he must have help. Quasimodo was just the man to assist him—a simple, guileless fellow, but Jehan was wise to tell the hunchback that his scheme would meet with the arch-deacon's approval. A crafty way to obtain Quasimodo's co-operation, for the rascal was aware of the wonderful faith the hunchback had in Dom Claude's judgment.

"A kindly thought and very wise." The hunchback grinned up at Jehan as he nodded his head with approval. "You want me to help kidnap her? You don't think she would go of her own free-will?"

"I most certainly don't," Jehan replied. "You see, she's very grateful to Clopin for all he's done for her, and wouldn't dream of deserting him even at the price of her own life. A wonderful girl, Quasimodo, and very loyal even to that brute."

"Very well, I'll help you," said Quasimodo, a trace of excitement in his voice.

"Good, then let us hasten. Esmeralda will be along soon to buy Clopin's supper. She gets it every night for him from Michel's place."

At the moment that Jehan and Quasimodo moved stealthily across the darkened square, Clopin, surrounded by his revolutionary followers in the underground cellar of a tumbledown warehouse that backed on to the River Seine, paused in his traitorous oratory to cast suspicious eyes on a short, dark-haired man who sat not a dozen yards from him. Where had he seen that face before? A moment's thought, and then it came to him. A man he had once seen riding with the king. A spy!

With a bound Clopin was upon the fellow and he caught his arm in a grip of steel while his followers gazed at him in open-mouthed amazement, wondering what could be wrong.

"Ah, ha, a spy!" Clopin's teeth bared in an ugly smile and viciously he shook his captive. "You know what we do to spies, fellow?"

The victim bravely squared his shoulders. Useless to deny the accusation, for he remembered now how Clopin had looked at him searchingly that day he had ridden with the king and the carriage had passed close to the revolutionary leader. No doubt at all that Clopin had recognised him.

"I don't, my dear Clopin." Gringoire, poet and singer to King Louis XI, smiled defiantly at his captor. "But this I do know. You dare not harm me, for you'd have the king's guard about your ears before you knew where you were!"

"Oh, oh, so you think I'm scared of the soldiery, do you? Well, I'll show you I'm not, you dirty knave!" His face blazing with fierce rage, Clopin flung up his free arm to enjoin silence, then ran his eyes around the motley throng gathered about him. "Citizens, hark you! This man is a spy! I recognise him as one in the king's pay. A spy and a dirty aristocrat who must be punished forthwith. Now, citizens, what form shall that punishment take?"

Wild shouts and ugly threats ripped the air while fiercely blazing eyes were directed at the prisoner. Almost it seemed that a concerted rush would be made and Gringoire torn limb from limb.

"Best string him up!" came in a vicious shout from one grey-bearded man. "Hang the dirty rat!"

"Ay, hang him! Hang him!"

The cry was taken up, and it echoed eerily in the confined space of the cellar, causing Gringoire to shudder violently, brave man though he undoubtedly was. A sign from Clopin and three husky ruffians caught hold of the victim and dragged him to where stood an improvised gibbet which Clopin had recently had erected in readiness for prisoners when the grim business of revolution started in earnest.

Already a rope had been produced by Clopin's right-hand man and slung over the cross-piece of wood at the top of the rough structure. A noose was made at one end of the rope and dropped over Gringoire's head, the while the revolutionaries hurled vicious oaths and threats at the white-faced prisoner.

"Right, string the rat up!" commanded Clopin, stepping forward with a diabolical grin on his sinister face when all was ready. "And may his cursed bones rot!"

Loud laughter as Clopin's lieutenant began to pull on the rope—and then came an unexpected interruption.

"You brutes! Let him alone! Let him alone!" Esmeralda, white of face, came thrusting her way wildly through the mob. Bravely she confronted Clopin, her tiny hands clenching and unclenching at her sides. "Order those men to release that poor fellow at once. You hear me, Clopin?"

Clopin grinned nastily and thrust her roughly aside. But the girl was not to be denied. Quickly she seized his arm and raised her voice so that it could be heard above the angry mutterings and the jeers of his fanatical followers.

"Clopin, you let him go at once, or by the saints I swear you'll pay for it!" Esmeralda's face was grimly set, determination blazed in the depths of her wondrous eyes. "Yes, I mean it. My guardian though you may be, I'll expose your revolutionary schemes to the King immediately if you carry on with this vile business. You understand?"

Clopin's glinting eyes bore into the girl's, but she met the fierce look unflinchingly. Well she knew that the scoundrel worshipped her and would hesitate to harm her even though she threatened him thus. And it was upon this knowledge she was banking to force his hand now.

"Very well, Esmeralda, have it your own way." He smiled somewhat ruefully and shrugged his massive shoulders. Then he swung round on his chief lieutenant, who had paused in his gruesome task. "Desist, Jean, and release the knave. Then see him to the street; but whatever you do kick him hard before you let him go."

"But the man's a spy—he must hang!" protested a cross-eyed fellow standing at Clopin's elbow. "Don't let the girl overrule you!"

His words were taken up by all present in the cellar, but Clopin turned on them fiercely, his hand clasped around the hilt of the knife that was concealed beneath his cloak.

"Dogs, you would defy me, eh?" he shouted vehemently. "Well, I say the fellow is to be released, and my word goes. Now what do you say to that?"

Silence. All were aware of Clopin's tremendous power and all feared him. Not a dissentient voice now, and their leader smiled with satisfaction.

Moments later and Griegoire was released, and as he was hustled from the dank cellar he cast a grateful glance at Esmeralda. As he disappeared in the grip of Jean and two other evil ruffians, Clopin turned to his followers again. A further half-hour's speech to them, then he dismissed them to their homes.

"My supper, Esmeralda." He tossed the girl a coin as they passed out of the warehouse together. "The usual, and see you're not long in getting it."

She nodded and hurried away, making in the direction of the market-place. Down tortuous alleyways and mean streets, and then suddenly there slid from the shadows of a dilapidated house two men who seized her roughly by the arms.

"Let me go, canaille! Let me go!" She struggled to free herself, but in vain. Slowly she was dragged along the street by the powerful hands that gripped her. Her heart racing madly, frightened high out of her wits, she renewed her struggles and almost succeeded in breaking free. And then she caught sight of one of her abductors—saw he was the deformed and grotesque little man who had grinned at her so strangely the previous night when she had been dancing in the square, and yelled again in the panic that instantly seized her.

"Let me go, you beast! Help, help! Oh, help!"

The sudden clatter of horses' hoofs on cobblestones, a clatter that swiftly grew louder. Quickly Jehan released his grip on the half-fainting girl, his face growing white as he realised the dread punishment that would be meted out if he were caught trying to abduct this girl. For kidnapping was a serious offence in France in those grim and terrible days.

"Quick, Quasimodo, we must away!" he hissed in the hunchback's ear. "Riders coming—perhaps the soldiery. Make haste or it'll go hard with us!"

But deaf as he was, Quasimodo did not hear the warning, and as Jehan slid quickly into the shadows he continued to struggle with the girl. Bare seconds later two figures in gleaming armour swept on to the scene, and one of them instantly leaped from his superb white horse and gripped the hunchback in fingers of steel.

"Bind that knave and hold him for the King's justice, Francois!" Phœbus de Chateaupers, captain of the King's Guard, urged his horse close to the dazed Esmeralda, leaned over sideways in the saddle, caught her about the waist and swung her up in front of him. "All's well, mams'elle, you're safe now. But methinks it was fortunate for you that we happened along this way. Trying to kidnap you, eh?"

She nodded her head, gazing into the handsome face of her rescuer with unconcealed admiration. And for his part Phœbus looked at her covetously, his heart pounding madly against his ribs. A dream of a girl, he told himself, one he would be proud to win for his own. "I will see you safely to your home." A pause while he watched Quasimodo pinioned and led away trailing behind Francois' horse at the end of a rope, then he bent his mouth close to Esmeralda's ear. "Where to, fair maiden?"

Esmeralda's courage had now returned, and she smiled at him.

"Oh, see me to the market-place," she told him. "I can soon get to my home from there."

He nodded and rode away, with Esmeralda seated in front of him, but the market-place reached, he would not let her go till she had taken wine with him in a small tavern. While in the place he learned much about her, and though he discovered that she was the ward of Clopin, recognised in Court circles as the King's most dangerous enemy, the knowledge in no way damped the ardent love for her that had so swiftly surged up in his breast.

Thus romance was born, and Phœbus de Chateaupers, bold soldier of the King, was determined to win the fair Esmeralda for his bride.

A Terrible Punishment.

A BIG crowd was gathered in the market-place to witness the punishment of Quasimodo, who had been sentenced to be whipped in public for two turus of the hour-glass on a charge of attempted abduction.

The court findings, were read as the hunchback was fettered to the whipping-stone and the clothes ripped from his back. At last all was ready, and the first cruel blow was struck with all the power of the giant who wielded the many-thonged whip.

He gazed with his one sound eye at the vision of loveliness who was entertaining the crowd with song and dance.

A whimper of pain from the victim as he writhed under the lash, while the watching crowd laughed and jeered at him.

Again the thongs whipped across the bare back, then again and again and with each savage cut Quasimodo uttered a painful gasp, his one sound eye rolling wildly in its socket.

The punishment went on, cruel and relentless, while the sand in the hour-glass slowly drained from the top receptacle into the bottom one. Then the glass was turned and the whipping continued, the victim being jeered and ridiculed by the watching crowd each time he yelped and wilted under the inhuman punishment.

But at last it ended, and Quasimodo was left a limp and almost unconscious figure, back bleeding profusely, his tongue lolling in his parched mouth, his one eye goggling hideously.

"Water! Water!" he croaked pathetically. "For the love of the saints please give me water!"

It happened that at that moment Esmeralda was passing through the square. A pitcher was in her hand, for she was on her way to buy Clopin a measure of wine from the nearby tavern. At sound of the hunchback's pleading voice she glanced his way, and sight of him sagging there touched her tender little heart.

One of the men who had tried to kidnap her and as she now knew the bell-ringer of Notre Dame. He had been punished enough—more than enough, to her way of thinking. And it was cruel to leave him like that, a pitiable, almost broken, object, his throat obviously burning for the want of water.

In a second the girl was at the fountain that stood on one side of the square, and quickly filling the pitcher with the clear cool water she hastened to the whipping-stone.

"Here." She held the vessel to Quasimodo's foam-flecked lips, and the tears started to her eyes as she saw the broken and bleeding flesh of his back, the ugly red weals that showed there. "Tis water, you poor man. Drink it and you'll soon feel better."

He quaffed it greedily, the while he looked at her with deep gratitude in his eye. Then when he had drained the pitcher to the last drop she untied his bonds.

"The saints preserve you, girl." Quasimodo lifted his face heavenwards and uttered a silent prayer, but in his heart was fierce hatred for Jehan, whom he considered wholly responsible for his terrible plight.

Why had not the man come forward and owned to the truth, told the court the reason why they had tried to kidnap the girl? Surely if it was to save her from the terrible outcome of revolution the judge would have taken a lenient view of the affair. Dull-witted though he was, the hunchback had a vague idea that Jehan's plans had not been honourable after all, and the thought had the effect of working up within him the red fires of bitter hate. But when he lowered his gaze and looked at the girl again, the expression of his face was soft, while a wan smile flickered around the corners of his twisted mouth.

"You will never regret your kindness to a poor broken man, maim'selle." He shook his head to lend emphasis to his words. "I am your slave for ever. If ever you need help I will give it you—" will lay down my worthless life if the need arises."

October 31st, 1931.

She smiled at him through her tears and gently ruffled his mop of matted hair.

"Thank you," she said simply, and then was gone.

An Ugly Scene.

IN the week that followed Esmeralda saw much of Phœbus de Chateaufers, and in consequence their love for each other grew more and more. But when the gallant young officer suggested marriage the girl put him off, for she was fearful that if she were to marry the man it would invoke her guardian's wrath.

So the two young people had to be content, for the time being, at least, to remain just lovers, though the position greatly nettled Phœbus.

Then one night he persuaded the girl to attend a party at his house, and he bought her a wonderful new-patterned silk dress for her to wear at the function.

Little did the two dream, as they danced together in the spacious and marvellously-furnished ball-room, that Clopin was wise to their courtship—knew from a report received from one of his spies that this night Esmeralda was at Phœbus' house, that the rascal was even then planning to raid the place for the purpose of dragging the girl away from the society of the cursed aristocrats.

A thunderous knocking on the massive front door, then a hoarse voice raised in fury was the first warning of trouble to those in the ball-room. The dance that was in progress instantly stopped, and Phœbus swept Esmeralda protectively into his arms as he saw that the girl was trembling, that her pretty face had gone deathly white.

"Mon dieu, it's my guardian—Clopin!" she gasped tremulously. "He's found out about us. He—he'll kill you, Phœbus. Oh, I know he will, for he hates all aristocrats like poison."

There came the voice of Phœbus' retainer, who was doing his utmost to persuade Clopin and his followers to go peaceably away. But his words were drowned in an ugly menacing roar, and next second there was a crash in the hall outside that told of the front door being thrust violently back on its hinges.

A stamping of heavy feet and loud angry voices, further crashings indicative of chairs and suits of armour being bowled over, then in at the ball-room door came Clopin followed by a horde of his dirty and fierce-faced followers.

"What is the meaning of this unseemly intrusion?" Bravely Phœbus stepped forward, his hand on the jewelled hilt of his sword, and barred Clopin's path.

Clopin glared at him ferociously and snatched out the knife from beneath the folds of his cloak.

"It means, you dirty aristocrat," the rascal hissed from between bared teeth, "that we've come to take Esmeralda away from all this pomp and show—back to where she belongs. Mix with scum like you? Why, I'll see her dead first!"

"Then let me tell you you'll do no such thing, Clopin." Phœbus smiled grimly as he took a firmer grip on his sword. "If Esmeralda wishes to remain here it is no concern of yours. After all, she's only your ward."

"You'd defy me, would you?" rasped Clopin, and took a step nearer the gallant captain.

"Not only that, but I'll call out the guard and have you flung into gaol for daring to defile my house," Phœbus answered coolly.

"Cut out his arrogant heart, Clopin!" came the hoarse voice of one of Clopin's most ardent supporters.

"That's right!" shouted another fiercely. "It'll show the cursed aristocrats what they may expect from the people who are sucked dry by them. Tax us right and left—laugh that we starve. The dogs—death to them!"

Angry mutterings and threats arose, and the members of Phœbus' household together with their guests started back in alarm. But Phœbus bravely stood his ground, and he whipped out his sword as Clopin, his lips curling in an ugly snarl, came ever nearer him.

"Oh, stop! Stop!" Fearful of bloodshed that at that fearsome moment seemed so imminent, Esmeralda ran forward and thrust herself between the two angry men. Pleading eyes looked up into Clopin's blazing ones. "I meant no harm in coming here, really I didn't, Clopin—and I'm sure these people mean no ill towards you. But I'll come away with you at once, Clopin, if only you'll promise not to do them any harm."

A triumphant and sinister grin spread across the revolutionary leader's ugly face, and he snatched at Esmeralda's wrist. Next second and he turned back to Phœbus, whose face was working with fury on account of the humiliation he had suffered, and openly sneered at him.

"Tis lucky the girl pleads for you, aristocrat," he spat out, "or by now you'd be worth little more than dead meat. But take warning. Don't you dare entice my girl into your company again, or by the powers I'll split your hide!"

He turned about heedless of the wild urgings of his followers to "kill the cursed aristocrats," yelled to them to follow him, then dragged Esmeralda towards the door. Almost sullenly the motley crowd obeyed, muttering discontentedly among themselves as they filed from the house.

Straight to the underground meeting place they followed Clopin, and once there their leader decided them for their stupidity in trying to cause trouble when their numbers were so few. He harangued with them—did they consider the time now ripe to strike their blow for freedom and justice? In his opinion the hour was at hand. They should at once arouse the whole populace, and, armed, set forth to destroy their oppressors.

But there were some who were fearful of the consequences of such a drastic action—whose anger had not yet been fully aroused by Clopin's fiery tongue, and the dissentient voices caused their leader to realise that it was wisdom to wait a few more days before igniting the dread fires of grim revolution. The doubtful ones must be entirely won over to the cause.

Sentenced to Death.

IN secret Esmeralda and Phœbus carried on their courtship, but they were never seen together in the streets. It was their wont to meet some distance down the river, and after spending a joyous hour together they parted from each other there.

But if Clopin did not know of the secret trysting place, Jehan did, and the knowledge that the two young people were greatly attached to each other caused his evil heart to flame with bitter jealousy. How to shatter the romance—to win the girl he coveted for himself? The thought possessed him day and night, but he could find no way to attain his fell ambition.

He felt he could kill them both. But one day his chance came. One of Clopin's followers had seen Esmeralda going off in the direction of the river, and the girl's guardian had promptly taxed her on the matter, for he had wondered where she had gone the last few nights. She had told him that she had been dancing and singing outside a tavern there, but though he had appeared to be satisfied when she had handed him some money she had tried to save, telling him that that was what she had earned at her new pitch, she somehow felt he did not believe her.

The meeting place must be changed forthwith. Chancing to meet Gringoire, whom she had learned was attached to Phœbus' regiment, Esmeralda sent an urgent message to her lover by him. Would Phœbus meet her in the churchyard of Notre Dame instead of by the river that night?

He came in his bright, smart uniform at the usual time, just as the sun was sinking in the west, and there on a wooden seat in the churchyard she told him the reason why she had changed their trysting place.

"Oh, well, it's best to be cautious, dear." He squeezed the small hands affectionately. "We don't want to have that rascal Clopin down on us if we can possibly avoid it. He's on the look-out as it is for the least chance to stir up strife in the city. A terrible man."

But danger did threaten them nevertheless. Jehan had seen them sitting there, and the jealousy in his mean soul flamed to a terrible rage. A knife was beneath the folds of his cloak, and as his hand sought the hilt, a murderous gleam came into his crafty brown eyes.

He despaired of ever winning the fair Esmeralda. It was too evident from the way they sat with their heads close together, chatting so very confidentially, that the girl would never dream of giving up Phœbus in favour of him. Revenge was all he could hope for now.

Slowly he wormed his way towards them, came stealthily up behind the unsuspecting young couple. The rays of the setting sun glistened on the knife as he whipped it suddenly from under his cloak and brought it down in a vicious thrust.

A gasp of pain from Phœbus as the blade plunged into his side and was quickly withdrawn. Down he slid from the seat to the ground, and as Esmeralda sprang up with a cry of alarm, Jehan dropped his knife and scuttled away as fast as his legs would carry him.

"Phœbus! Phœbus! What is it? What is the matter, dear?" Esmeralda dropped to her knees beside the fallen man. Then she saw the trickle of blood coming from his side, and, her face draining of all colour, she clapped her hand to her mouth in horror. "Help! Help! Oh, quick! Help!"

In a moment or two a crowd had gathered, and among them was an officer of Phœbus' own regiment. A glance at the unconscious man, the wound in his side, then Maurice Le Grande saw the knife that lay by the seat. One grim look he shot at the girl, whom he had seen at his brother officer's party that eventful night, then he gave quick orders to a private soldier who came dashing up at that very moment.

"Fetch a stretcher!" he roared. "Be quick, man!"

As the private ran off the officer dropped to his knees and rendered first aid to the wounded man, staunching the flow of blood as best he could with a large pocket handkerchief.

Moments later and the stretcher arrived, borne by four sturdy soldiers, and Phœbus was carried away to his home, there to be tended to by a doctor who had been hastily summoned. A bad flesh wound, but the gallant young officer would quickly recover—such was the medico's verdict.

Meanwhile Esmeralda, despite vigorous and tearful denials, had been placed under arrest for attempting the life of an officer of the King's Guard. The blood-stained knife, lying by the seat, seemed conclusive evidence to Maurice Le Grande of the girl's guilt. He remembered the scene at Phœbus' house when Clopin and his fanatics had forced themselves in and taken the girl away with them. Perhaps that scoundrelly revolutionist had persuaded the girl to commit this crime. It seemed very likely, and poor Esmeralda could offer no defence other than to swear she was not guilty. Jehan had escaped as quickly and as stealthily as he had appeared, and neither the girl nor Phœbus had seen him.

She was brought to trial, and again vigorously protested her innocence. But the court would have none of it. She was the ward of a traitor to the king, and, even as Maurice suspected, so did the relentless justices believe that that was sufficient to warrant her committing this foul and unpardonable deed.

But she must be made to confess to the crime!

Poor Esmeralda! She was flung into the inquisition chamber and ruthlessly tortured, and to escape the terrible pain she endured she at last admitted to stabbing Phœbus.

Back before the court she heard her fate, and as the judge pronounced that she be "put to death" she fell in a swoon. When she awakened to consciousness she found herself in a grim and forbidding cell into which filtered very little light.

Several days she remained there, a complete mental wreck, white-faced, hollow-eyed, unable to sleep or eat the bread and water that was set before her from time to time. And always she thought of Phœbus—the love she knew he had borne her alone keeping her from entirely slipping into the throes of madness. Was he alive or dead? Not a word reached her that he was well on the road to recovery and had been asking for her.

Then, the day before that fixed for her execution, she received a visitor. A tall man in ecclesiastical dress, Jehan, wearing his brother's clothes so that he might gain access to the girl on the pretext of giving her the comfort of the Church in these her last hours.

"Esmeralda, I was horrified to learn of this terrible misfortune that has befallen you." He came across to the girl and tried to take her in his arms as the cell door closed on him. But she shrank from him, as she had done so many times in the past when he had tried to make love to her. "Now, now, my dear, don't be so very silly! I am here as your friend—your one and only friend. I want to help you—to have you set free. But in return you must be nice to me."

"Meaning?" she inquired listlessly.

"That if you will promise to marry me I will get my brother, the arch-deacon, to plead for you. He alone can exert any influence over the king in such a matter as this. Now what do you say?"

"Oh, oh, you'd fetch her, would you?" Quasimodo shook his fist under Clopin's jaw. "I kill you if you so much as try to get the girl!"

"That I'd rather die first—innocent though I am—than marry a man I do not love," she told him bravely.

"Very well"—Jehan's lips curled in baffled fury—"then die, and to Hades with you, you little fool!"

Another moment and he was gone, and the door of the cell, slamming behind him, sounded like a death-knell in the ears of the distracted girl.

The Hunchback to the Rescue.

THOUSANDS of people were gathered in the market-place to witness the execution of Esmeralda. Some had come out of morbid curiosity, treating the grim affair as something of a spectacle, but the majority present were there to make a violent demonstration against what they considered was a foul and tyrannical miscarriage of justice on the part of the king and his aristocratic judges.

The bell of Notre Dame tolled mournfully, though for what poor wretch's doom he sounded, Quasimodo, the hunchback, did not know.

The minutes slipped by, then suddenly there came the sound of cart-wheels rumbling over the rough cobblestones of the road, and there hove into view Esmeralda shackled to the lumbering vehicle in which she rode, and guarded by some two hundred mounted soldiers of the king.

Angry murmurings arose as the girl was dragged from the cart, forced to the steps of the magnificent cathedral, there to pay penitence for the crime for which she was to be punished. But no move was made, for the prisoner's guard was far too strong for the crowd to show any hostility.

His duty of ringing the bell for the execution finished, Quasimodo made his way to the balcony at the top of the cathedral and from there peered curiously down into the square. A girl! Then his sound eye rolled wildly in its socket and he caught in his breath sharply as he recognised her. Esmeralda—the girl Jehan had persuaded him to help kidnap that night—the girl he had sworn to befriend when she had taken compassion on him and had given him water after the cruel flogging he had been subjected to.

She to be punished for some crime! But surely the girl, obviously of a gentle and kind disposition, could never be guilty of even harming a fly! The thing was impossible. A grave injustice was being done.

The bare thought made Quasimodo's blood boil, and in an instant a daring plan had formed itself in his usually dull brain. Next moment he had swung himself over the stone balustrade of the balcony and was shining down the face of the cathedral with far more speed and agility than he had displayed that night he had been crowned king of the fools.

The ground reached in safety, he swept down on Esmeralda like some grotesque bird of prey and swiftly gathered her in his arms.

"Be not afraid, my pretty one," he shot at her as she gave a frightened gasp. "It is I, your friend, Quasimodo. I'm here to save you from these carrion."

He was on the point of swinging round when, with angry shouts, two or three of the soldiers who had been standing on the cathedral steps guarding the girl leaped at him. As the first reached him, Quasimodo gave an inano grin, quickly shot up his foot, and, catcling the man in the pit of the stomach, sent him flying backwards with a painful gasp. The second he treated likewise, October 31st, 1931.

and as the fellow went staggering he crashed into the third member of the King's Guard, and together the two collapsed in a heap, the breath knocked clean from their bodies.

And then the hunchback, with Esmeralda in his arms, was racing for the massive door of the cathedral, in the threshold of which stood Don Claude, the archdeacon.

"Sire, we must save this girl!" Quasimodo shot the archdeacon a pleading glance as he dodged past him, now hotly pursued by some score of the King's Guard. "She's innocent—I know she is!"

Don Claude's lips set grimly, for he was well acquainted with the girl and knew that she was the last person who would do anything punishable by death. As the soldiers dashed up he held up his arm, barring their way.

"Back, back!" he commanded sternly. "The Church gives the girl sanctuary—you cannot defile this holy place, king's soldiers though you may be."

They fell back uncertainly, till an officer of their regiment came on the scene and ordered them away. He knew that what Don Claude said was right—that if the archdeacon took Esmeralda into the holy precincts of Notre Dame they were powerless to lay hands on her till such time as she ventured forth again.

For the moment, at least, poor, distracted Esmeralda was saved from a terrible fate and a grave miscarriage of justice.

A Grim Fight for Esmeralda.

IN the days that followed Esmeralda lived at the very top of Notre Dame in a small niche that Quasimodo was wont to use as his own quarters. The hunchback gave up his all to her, sleeping on the cold stone of the balcony outside, and he provided her with clothes and food, tending her as if she were some new-born baby.

But trouble threatened. Clopin, though thankful that Esmeralda had been saved from the scaffold, was desirous of having the girl back with him, and one night he went to the cathedral, determined to bring her away. He found Don Claude at the door, and the archdeacon barred his path as he tried to step into the place.

"Well, Clopin, what is it you want?" Don Claude inquired in his soft, gentle voice.

"You know well enough!" Clopin growled, an ugly gleam in his sinister eyes. "I want Esmeralda, my ward—and, by the powers, I'll have her or——"

"And I say you won't have her, Clopin!" Quasimodo, in the act of lighting the candles in the cathedral, one of his daily tasks, had heard the rascal's voice and had quickly hurried to the door. His one eye rolling hideously, he faced the other defiantly. "If she leaves here without a pardon she'll be taken by the soldiers again. Besides, you're not a fit person to look after her. She's——"

"Why, you ugly canaille!" Clopin made a threatening step towards the hunchback, but again Don Claude barred his way. Sinister eyes glared at the archdeacon. "The girl—are you going to give her up, Don Claude, or must I go in and fetch her?"

"Oh, oh, you'd fetch her, would you?" Quasimodo lumbered forward and shook his fist under Clopin's jaw. "I kill you if you so much as try to get the girl!"

"Now, now, Quasimodo!" The peace-loving archdeacon placed a restraining hand on the hunchback's arm. "No good can come of losing your temper. Clopin knows well enough that evil overtakes all those who dare defile the church."

Don Claude glanced at Clopin's fury-distorted face, and in his fine grey eyes was a light that made the rascal shrink back in alarm. Superstitious as he was, Clopin took to heart the archdeacon's words and in another moment he swung on his heel and strode rapidly away.

But the evil Jehan, lurking in the shadows near by, had heard every word that had passed between the three, and a fell scheme for lining his pockets had leaped into his sinister mind. Why not urge Clopin to make a mass attack on Notre Dame to secure Esmeralda? During the turmoil that ensued he could loot the treasure vaults, get away with all the silver and gold ornaments they contained, and sell them at a good price.

At once he went after the rascally revolutionist, and the sinister words he poured into Clopin's ears resulted in that arch villain returning to Notre Dame in the region of midnight at the head of some three hundred armed followers, many of whom bore flaming torches. Getting no answer to his thunderous knocking on the closed door, Clopin ordered that the door be broken down. Instantly cudgels smashed against the richly carved panels, but they made no impression upon the stout wood, and the crowd began to stamp and curse in baffled fury.

"Get axes—get something that'll act as a battering-ram!" raged Clopin, not to be thwarted in his determination to storm the cathedral and get Esmeralda away.

Wild cheers from the crowd as some fifty of them rushed away to secure these formidable weapons, then the cudgels again attacked the door.

Meanwhile, in the cathedral, Don Claude, Quasimodo, and Esmeralda had heard the sounds of Clopin's onslaught, and, while the girl crouched fearfully upon her bed, feeling that the fracas must concern her, the archdeacon and the hunchback peered forth from windows to discover that the revolutionist and his followers were making a mass attack on the cathedral door. The reason for this sacrilege was obvious to both. They were after the girl they protected.

And then Quasimodo saw a lone figure, in the glare of the revolutionists' torches, standing at some distance from

(Continued on page 28.)

SUCCESS OF THE UNIVERSAL ENGLISH DICTIONARY.

If you are among those who have seen a copy of the first part of the new UNIVERSAL ENGLISH DICTIONARY, you will probably have realised how really useful the completed volume is going to be to you. Something in between the ordinary school dictionary and the several-volume works of the Public Libraries has long been wanted. And now—here it is—published in convenient weekly parts at sixpence each, so that it isn't beyond the most modest pocket money.

There are nearly one hundred thousand definitions in the Universal English Dictionary and thousands of quotations, illustrative phrases and colloquialisms as well. And since it has been entirely compiled during the last eight years, it is absolutely up-to-date. You're bound to find what you want in it. Part 2 of the Universal is now on sale, price 6d., at all Newsagents and Bookstalls.

A gripping detective story of a man's daring plot to unmask a gang of international jewel smugglers.

"Maid to Order"

Just After Midnight.

A SMALL motor-boat nosed its way slowly and cautiously towards a flight of waterside stairs not a mile away from that southernmost extreme of New York—Battery Point.

Its engine had been stopped some distance out, and it drifted in silently. There was a reason for this. As a rule a cop was on duty at the small wharf to which the stairs led, and it was important that his suspicions should not be roused.

As the boat bumped gently against the coconut fibre ropes hanging over the side of the wharf, two shadows crept out from the darkness of a near-by warehouse. They went to the head of the stairs and looked down at the craft below.

"That you, Joe?" said a voice. "Yes," came the reply from the boat. "I've got three tins for you this time. Wait a minute and I'll come up and give them to you."

The two shadows on the wharf looked about them furtively, and satisfied themselves that they were not observed. Meanwhile, down in the boat, a man in oilskins and sou'-wester opened a small locker and produced three round tins, on the sides of which was the wording:

"Tiger Brand" High-Grade Coffee.

He tucked them under his arm, and slowly mounted the stone steps by the side of the craft. Halfway up he paused and muttered to the men waiting above:

"Is it all clear?"

"Yes. Come on up." The man in oilskins continued his journey and presently stood on the wharf by the side of the two others. One of these latter glanced at his watch.

"You're in good time," he said. "Two minutes after twelve."

The man in oilskins grunted. "There's a devil of a wind blowing across the mouth of Hudson River," he said. "I wonder I made it. Anyway, here are the tins. Cash out, and I'll be getting along."

The tins changed hands, and the soft rustle of Treasury notes being counted was the only sound in the silence that followed.

Finally the man in oilskins tucked a wad of money into his pocket and turned away. He went down the stairs again, climbed into the boat, and quietly gave orders for the engine to be started.

Starring
JULIAN ELTINGE

The two men on the wharf did not wait to watch the boat put off. They turned also, and slipped softly along the wharf to where a car was standing. They climbed into it; there was a metallic hum as the self-starter was pressed, and the vehicle shot forward out of the dock area, swung left round a sharp corner and headed north through the dingy streets of Lower Manhattan.

The car had proceeded for about half a mile when the man sitting by the side of the driver turned and looked through the back window. As he did so, he grew rigid.

"Step on it!" he said in a tense whisper. "We've got a police tender behind!"

"Curse it!" growled the driver. "They could catch us, whatever we did. I ought to have brought the fast car." He paused to negotiate another turn. "Is it still trailing us?"

"Yes."

The driver pressed the accelerator to the floorboards, and began to twist and turn through the narrow streets desperately, hoping to shake the pursuers off. He was unsuccessful. The two headlights of the car following reappeared in his driving-mirror with irritating persistency.

"Shorty," said the driver.

"Yes?"

"Those cops don't know who we are. If they did they'd run us down. What they reckon to do is to follow us to the club, and then make a raid. They know something—more than they should. See?"

"Well?"

"We daren't let them get a line on us. We've got to fight it out. How many rods did you bring with you?"

"Two."

"And how many cops are there?"

"Four. It's only an open tourer."

"All right. Let them have it when I stop!"

The car sped on. Suddenly it swung round hard into a narrow street, with the pursuing car twenty yards behind, and slid to a stop in the middle of the roadway. Its two occupants clambered out quickly, and took cover behind the radiator.

With a squeal of tyres, the police car rounded the corner also, and its driver jammed on his brakes as he saw the other vehicle ahead.

As he came to a halt, two vivid stabs of flame pierced the darkness. The windscreen of the police car shattered, and a cry of pain mingled with the noise of the explosions.

In a second the street was deafened by the sound of battle. The two crooks blazed away steadily, carefully checking on each other so that their weapons would not be empty simultaneously.

The firing from the police car stopped suddenly, but almost at the same moment the air was rent by the shriek of whistles.

"Back into the car, Shorty!" yelled the crook driver. "We've got to make a break for it."

The crooks dived into the front seat, and the car shot forward once more. The driver leaned forward and switched off his lights as he plunged into the purlieus of that maze of streets which led north to the Bowery. In ten seconds the crooks were lost—no pursuer could hope to catch them.

Meanwhile, at the scene of the street battle, police arrived in large numbers, and a belated cordon was thrown around the district. A quarter of an hour afterwards, Detective Scranton, of Headquarters, arrived and started to ask questions of the senior officer present.

"What damage was done?"

"Four Revenue officers killed. Stiff with lead, all of them."

"Tommy guns?"

"No; ordinary pistols. I heard the shooting, but couldn't get here in time."

Detective Scranton nodded briefly and started wandering towards the derelict police car, looking about him shrewdly. Suddenly he stopped and bent down.

"That's funny!" he said. "A tin of coffee pierced by a bullet!"

Ground coffee was lying in the roadway, and he ran his fingers through it thoughtfully. As he did so he felt something hard slip between his thumb and the side of his palm—something that shone like white fire in the light of a street lamp.

"Great heavens!" he cried. "A diamond!"

He tipped more of the coffee out of the tin, and with it came several more stones—blue, like ice, and harder than steel, and already the cause of four deaths.

He straightened himself up thoughtfully, dragging the diamonds into his pocket as he did so, and stood in the middle of the roadway for several seconds, deep in thought. Then he turned as a uniformed officer approached him hesitatingly.

"Well, what is it?"

"One of those four men, Seranton—well, you'd better come and look for yourself."

Seranton looked sharply at the other, then walked to the bullet-riddled car. He gazed at the faces of the dead men slowly.

"Gosh!" he muttered. "Tim!"

He turned away brokenly, shivering as though the night air was cold, and started back with dragging footsteps to his office at Police Headquarters.

Find the "Lady."

DETECTIVE SCRANTON was attached to that somewhat grim and merciless body of men known as the "Homicide Squad." His job was that of investigating murder, and a grimmer, more thorough man could not be found for it.

He paced his severely-furnished office back at Headquarters for a full hour after his return, his furrowed forehead and his firm lips combining in a stern expression that boded the murderers no good. From the crooks' point of view, they could not have picked upon a worse police squad for their massacre, for one of the dead officers was Seranton's own brother.

As he paced, Seranton's fists were clenched, and beads of perspiration stood out upon his brow. Suddenly, as though his mind was made up, he swung round on his heel and made his way to the office of his chief, Captain Randall.

He did not trouble to knock. He just slammed open the door and walked in, kicking the door shut behind him.

"Four of our men murdered two hours back," he said without any preliminaries.

"I know, Seranton," replied Chief Randall. "One was young Tim, too. I'm darned sorry about that. Anything I can do?"

Seranton dropped into a chair opposite his chief and surveyed the round, spectacled face thoughtfully. His eyes were narrowed, and there was a glint in them that made Captain Randall glad he was a friend and not an enemy.

"I've got a line on the job," said Seranton, speaking slowly and choosing every word with care. "I found a coffee tin down where the job was done, and it had diamonds hidden inside it. Does that suggest anything to you?"

"Diamonds, eh?" Randall puckered his brow for a minute. "You mean McGuire?"

"I do," said Seranton. "Jim McGuire has been edging diamonds on to the market for a long time now, and nobody knows where he gets them from. About three days ago the Customs department sent us a report that smuggling was going on through one of the coastal docks in Lower Manhattan, and the murdered officers were sent along to see what it was about. The Customs didn't know for certain what was happening, but it's evident that they had good suspicions. Anyway, four of our men were killed in a street battle, and a tin of coffee concealing diamonds was found afterwards. Put two and two together, and it doesn't make anything else except four."

October 31st, 1931.

"I see," muttered the chief.

"We don't know for certain that McGuire did it—not enough to bring him before a jury, anyway," Seranton went on. "That's what we've got to find out."

The chief nodded.

"Good!" he said. "Go right ahead. Pick the best men you can find, and have McGuire's club combed out. I'll give you a free hand."

Seranton made no movement to show that he had heard. He was still thinking. Essentially a man of action, he realised that here was a case in which, if he rushed in, he would spoil everything.

"It's no use," he said after a while.

"Every one of McGuire's men know me. As soon as I put in an appearance they'd guess what was on, and I'd never get to the bottom of the job. And I'm going to, chief, by heaven, I'm going to!" His jaw set in grim determination. "We've got to get someone new down here, someone who has never been in New York before."

There was a knock, and a man entered, carrying a telegram. He laid it before the chief and departed again.

The chief picked the envelope up and tore it open. Then he uttered a startled exclamation.

"It's from Scotland Yard," he said.

"Read it."

Seranton took the grey cable form and read:

"Chief of Police, New York. Loti Lorraine, Int. No. G 6283, arrested charge smuggling diamonds. Do you know anything about her?"

"COMMISSIONER, London."

"Loti Lorraine," said Seranton thoughtfully. "Just a minute."

He pressed a bell and a messenger appeared. He was sent away for the docket concerning this Loti Lorraine, and returned with it in a few minutes.

Seranton opened it and glanced through the contents.

"No, we've got nothing against her," he said quietly. "But here's some of the information I want. She paid a visit to New York a couple of years ago, and she was seen constantly in the company of Dan Kernan. We've got Dan and his gang in the big house now, but it was McGuire who took over his club. Let me see now, wasn't McGuire and his crowd up the river round about that time?"

"He was," replied the chief.

"Then he doesn't know Loti Lorraine," Seranton jumped up from his chair and began pacing the office. Suddenly he stopped opposite to the chief, his face alight with eagerness. "Chief, will you send a wire to London asking them to keep the fact of Loti's arrest out of the papers?"

"Sure," replied the chief. "But I don't see—"

"That's all right," Seranton went on quickly. "If everything works out as I want it, I'm going to fix McGuire good and proper. He's going to meet Loti Lorraine for the first time in his life."

The chief at once protested.

"Look here, Seranton, I know your brother's been bumped off, but you've got to draw the line somewhere. I won't have a woman mixed up in this. It's too dangerous."

"No woman is going to be mixed up in it," said Seranton. "I'm going to get an old pal of mine, Julian Eltinge, to get right inside McGuire's haunt as Loti Lorraine. He's a female impersonator on the halls, and when he gets into skirts his own mother gets muddled."

"It's impossible," objected the chief. "No man can kid people along like that."

"Can't he? You just watch," said Seranton, and there was an eager expression on his face. "Oh, boy, you just watch!"

At McGuire's.

IT was just a week later, and Jim McGuire was sitting in his luxurious apartment above the Arab night-club, a tooth-pick in one hand and a lighted cigarette in the other, awaiting the arrival of the renowned Loti Lorraine. A soft felt hat was perched on the back of his head, and his harsh yellow face bore an expression of pleasant anticipation.

Two of his "boys" were with him—Shorty and Harry. Shorty had "class," which meant that he wore spats and the nattiest of gents' suitings, well-creased down the trouser, and well spread at the lapel. A slight, hair-line moustache adorned his upper lip, and when he smiled he exposed a row of perfectly even white teeth.

Harry was not so natty. He was broad-shouldered and thick-set, with a round and very smooth face and a bulge just under his left arm where he carried his shoulder holster. His particular ambition in life was for neater and slicker bumping-off.

McGuire put in some deft work with his tooth-pick, his eyes roving shrewdly over his "boys." Finally he shifted a little in his chair and spoke.

"I want you guys to behave properly when Miss Lorraine arrives," he said. "None of the usual hot-mamma stuff."

"Sure," replied Shorty amiably. "But seeing she's French, shouldn't we call her mam'selle?"

"Shut up, and listen to me!" growled McGuire. He never had liked Shorty's superior manners, they gave him, to use his own expression, a pain in the neck. "Seeing she's one of us, she's going to live here. I've arranged to put her in the apartment on the left wing, and you two will keep away from there. See?"

"Sure," said Shorty again. "I see." McGuire shifted in his chair once more, and plied the tooth-pick again. It helped him to think.

"By the way," he said to Shorty, "what about the police car we shot up a week back? Any news?"

"Naw," Shorty replied. "One of the cops tipped me off. We got young Seranton, brother of the homicide dick, and I reckoned there might be trouble from that quarter. But no such thing. Seranton himself is keeping to Headquarters, and he's still working on that other killing that the Times Square outfit pulled. Seems to think the same outfit did our job."

"Else they know something and are scared of you, McGuire," said Harry. McGuire's chest swelled out an extra couple of inches, and the evil gleam of blood-lust appeared in his eyes.

"I guess that's it," he said, doing his best to sound modest about it. "They realise by now that I'll stand for no interference. Any cop that tries to get me goes for a ride—I don't care who he is."

Harry and Shorty nodded in admiring agreement, knowing that it was always best to humour him. McGuire had a fierce temper, and when it was roused by opposition he was apt to cut loose with a gun.

McGuire was still brooding over what he was going to do to all cops who tried to get one, when one of the waiters from the club downstairs knocked on the door.

"Come in," called McGuire.

The waiter thrust his head into the room.

"Lady to see you below," he announced. "Says she's Miss Lorraine."

"Fine!" McGuire shot a triumphant glance at Shorty. "Miss Lorraine, Shorty. She said so herself." He turned back to the waiter. "Show her straight up here."

"Right, boss," replied the waiter, and withdrew.

The three gangsters waited eagerly. Meanwhile, sitting in the vestibule downstairs was Julian Eltinge, trying hard not to perspire under a blonde wig and a pair of tightly-laced corsets that hid his manly figure. He wore a tightly-fitting black toque edged with white on his head and a brocade coat with a white ermine collar that had set him back several thousand dollars in Paris the previous year. His ankles were encased in perfectly-fitting silk stockings, and his feet were pinched into an elegantly-pointed Court shoe several sizes too small for him.

The waiter who had taken Julian's newly-assumed name returned and told him that McGuire would see him at once. Julian promptly rose and followed.

As he went he felt a sudden apprehension. McGuire was a noted killer—what would he do if he discovered that Julian was a man and not Loti Lorraine?

The apprehension did not last, however. Julian recollected that he had deceived even Detective Scranton. In his feminine garb he had gone boldly to Police Headquarters and had presented himself to Scranton's clerk, saying that he had some important news about a crime that had recently been committed. Scranton fell for it, and did not know it was Julian until Julian spoke in his natural voice.

If Scranton, knowing him by sight, could not penetrate the disguise, McGuire, not knowing him, must be completely deceived.

The waiter halted before a door and knocked. The summons to come in was heard from behind it, and he threw it open.

"Miss Loti Lorraine," he announced.

Julian walked into the room.

McGuire rose to his feet and turned around. Frank admiration appeared in his eyes. He gazed appraisingly at the crimson lips, the perfect complexion that Julian had obtained from a box, and the obviously expensive clothes, and grinned a welcome.

"Come right along, Miss Lorraine, and meet the boys," he said. "My name is McGuire, and these are Shorty and Harry."

Julian conjured up one of his most devastating smiles.

"How do you do?" he said in his best mezzo-soprano voice. Hurriedly, as though so much male beauty dazed him, he pulled out his compact and carefully powdered his nose. As he did so he glanced over the three men swiftly, and promptly hit upon Shorty as the one most likely to tell him all he wanted to find out. "I've heard so much about you all," he went on with a dazzling smile. "Especially you, Mr. Shorty."

Shorty turned away, blushing.

McGuire made an impatient gesture. "Keep the social stuff until later," he said shortly. "You'd better come with me, Miss Lorraine. I'll show you to your apartment first, and then we can talk business. By the way, where is your luggage?"

"Down below, Mr. McGuire," replied Julian. "Three trunks, a travelling wardrobe, and a hatbox."

McGuire nodded.

"Shorty, have Miss Lorraine's boxes sent right up to her room at once. Come along, Miss Lorraine; I'll get you settled down."

Julian meekly followed him, but as he was on the point of leaving the room he paused by the doorway and turned his head towards Shorty. He smiled invitingly, and his left eye gave the slightest of twitches.

Shorty blushed again and started to draw patterns on the carpet with the point of his bespatted shoe.

Julian continued on his way, and on his face was the faintest suggestion of a grin. The rounding-up of the McGuire gang had started in earnest.

"Loti" Gets Busy.

TEN days passed, and during that time Julian kept his eyes open, but learnt very little.

For one thing, he had to play his part carefully, and he knew that one of the first things a woman does when arriving in New York is to make a round of the shops. This he did with every appearance of enjoyment, the result being that he was out most of the day and did not have the opportunity of keeping McGuire and the boys under close observation. The only time he came in contact with the gang was in the club downstairs in the evenings, and McGuire was not such a fool as to have anything on view in a public place.

During all this time Shorty was showing signs of falling completely into Julian's net. Believing him to be a woman, Shorty's natty little soul was stirred to its depths, particularly as McGuire did not appear to be particularly interested for once.

At the end of the ten days, while Julian was in his room attiring himself in one of his most ravishing evening gowns, he heard a knock on the door. He hastily finished fastening his gown, and called:

"Come in!"

The door opened and McGuire entered. Julian gave him a bright glance, and was about to turn back to his dressing-table when he caught sight of someone coming in behind the gangster.

It was a girl. She was dressed in white, had had golden hair and deep blue eyes. Julian caught his breath sharply, convinced that he had never seen anyone quite so lovely.

As he stared he became aware that the girl was looking at him curiously, and hurriedly turned away.

Sent his right smashing to the side of McGuire's jaw.

McGuire spoke.

"I want to introduce Joyee Carlyle to you, Miss Lorraine," he said. "Joyce, this is Miss Loti Lorraine."

Joyce smiled and held out her hand, advancing into the room.

"How do you do, Miss Lorraine," she said, and her eyes seemed to be alternately dancing with fun and clouding with anxiety.

"Joyce is one of us," McGuire explained before Julian could return her greeting. "I hope you two get on well together."

He went out, closing the door behind him.

Julian stood by his dressing-table uncertainly, wondering what to say or do next. A sudden complication had arisen which altered the whole atmosphere of his job.

At the very first meeting—from the very first moment he had set eyes on Joyee Carlyle—he was in love!

Joyce, meanwhile, looked at him uncertainly. Julian began to feel uncomfortable. Did she know the real Loti Lorraine? If so, she would realise that he—Julian—was not Loti. Then what would happen?

Julian tensed himself for what might happen next, watching her as a cat watches a mouse.

Joyce advanced towards him slowly and stared into his eyes. Finally she said:

"Don't you think you ought to explain?"

"Explain? Explain what?" Julian recovered his poise and managed to get into his feminine voice a hint of surprise. "I don't think I understand."

Joyce opened her lips to speak again, but changed her mind. Suddenly, as though she had been living under a strain that had become too much for her, she buried her face in her hands.

"Oh, why did I come back here—to this horrible place, and these horrible people?" she cried.

Julian was staggered. Her quick breakdown had taken him completely unawares. He was shaken out of his pose.

Quickly he went to her side, and put an arm round her shoulders.

"Please don't cry!" he begged. "I don't know what it is that's wrong, but I dare say I can put it right for you if only you'll tell me all about it."

Joyce started back from him in alarm, forgetting her tear-stained face.

"You're a man—" she began.

Julian clapped his hand over her mouth, silently cursing that he had forgotten to speak in his feminine voice.

"Ssh!" he warned. "If McGuire hears you, he'll come looking for me with a gun."

Joyce hastily dabbed at her face with a tiny wisp of a handkerchief, still watching Julian.

"I—I don't understand," she faltered.

"Then I'll explain in a minute," said Julian. "But first tell me—why did you cry just now?"

A tiny frown appeared on her brow, and the corners of her mouth drooped again.

"I'm afraid," she whispered.

"Who of?"

"McGuire. He knows something about my father—something that would get my father into awful trouble—and I am to be the price of his silence. He wants me to join him here—help him run the club—and afterwards he wants to marry me." Joyce clenched her hands in a paroxysm of desperation. "But I won't! I swear I won't! I'll kill myself first!"

Julian nodded with satisfaction. This was good news to him.

October 31st, 1931.

"Would it help you at all if he was put away in gaol for a few years—or even sent to the electric chair?" he ventured.

She looked at him with eyes that were immediately grateful.

"You can do that?" she asked eagerly. "Oh, I do hope you can! I do hope you can!"

Julian laughed, as though a great load had been lifted from his mind. Whoever this mysterious Joyee Carlyle was, he was quite satisfied that she was to be trusted.

"Leave everything to me and I'll do my best," he said reassuringly. "And now go down to the café as though nothing had happened. I'll follow in a little while."

She nodded obediently, and removed the final traces of tears from her face. Slowly she walked to the door, but before she reached it she turned.

"Who are you?" she asked. "What is your name?"

"Julian Eltinge," he replied.

"I've heard of you somewhere," she said musingly. "Won't you show me what you look like?"

Julian hesitated. Then he realised that there was no object in holding any of his secrets from her. He reached up and took off the blonde wig that concealed his smooth, dark hair.

"There you are," he said. "That's me at my worst."

She looked at him critically, her head on one side, and finally smiled at him.

"I knew you were a man right from the first," she said. "Do you know how?"

"No. Tell me."

"Well, when you first saw me, there was a look in your eyes—" She broke off in confusion. "You see," she went on, "a woman doesn't generally fall in love with one of her own sex, does she? And—oh, what am I saying?"

The door suddenly slammed behind her. Julian stood looking at it for a whole minute, his mind dazed. Then he woke up.

"By gosh!" he muttered joyfully.

"By gosh! I've got something to say to that girl when I'm through with McGuire. And it won't be long now!"

McGuire Has a Visitor.

THE following night McGuire was sitting in his office, going through his accounts. There was a look of self-satisfaction on his face, for his figures showed that he was doing well. The Arab night club was paying handsome profits, and the last consignment of diamonds had sold fairly well. Therefore he could afford to look with equanimity on the fact that he had lost a few of the stones during the recent battle with the police car.

There was a knock on the door, and a waiter entered. McGuire looked up from his writing.

"Well—what do you want?"

"Lady outside to see you, Mr. McGuire," said the waiter. "She wouldn't give her name, but she's all burnt up about something."

"Who is she?" McGuire, with his usual caution when anything unusual occurred, asked the question quickly.

"I don't know. She's been sitting in the café since dinner, watching Miss Lorraine."

McGuire thought for a minute. An unknown woman wanted to see him, eh? Some old flame of his, he supposed—and jealous of Loti Lorraine, too!

His eyes narrowed. He was not in the habit of being chased around by anyone, and whoever this woman was, she had better be told so quickly.

"All right," he said. "Send her in." The waiter departed, and during the time that he was gone McGuire took the opportunity of opening a drawer in his desk and slipping a heavy automatic into his pocket.

The door opened once more, and the unknown woman entered. Her dark eyes were blazing angrily. She was dressed in evening kit, and McGuire, watching her closely, saw that she was trembling with suppressed emotion.

"Are you Jim McGuire?" she demanded, stopping a bare two paces away, her arms folded.

McGuire felt a twinge of inward surprise. She spoke with a foreign accent, and had all the outward semblances of a typical Frenchwoman.

"That is my name," he replied.

"Then what do you mean by letting a woman masquerade here as me?" she flamed.

McGuire looked at her in sheer astonishment.

"I don't quite understand you," he said. "Who are you, anyway?"

"You don't know me?" The woman stamped her foot impatiently. "Fool! Dolt! I am Loti Lorraine!"

McGuire started as though a rival gangster had shot him, and stared at her speechlessly. Loti Lorraine! The woman must be completely mad. Loti Lorraine was outside in the café.

"You'd better try something else," he said ironically. "Miss Lorraine is an old friend of mine."

The excitable Frenchwoman almost danced round the room in sheer exasperation.

"She is, eh?" she almost screamed.

"Oh, you're mad! Listen and I will explain myself. I was arrested about two weeks ago in England for smuggling diamonds and was finally released because the police there could not get enough evidence against me. During that time I knew that a big consignment of stones was on its way here, so I came across on the first boat I could catch."

"Diamonds!" exclaimed McGuire, a suspicion dawning upon him that something was wrong somewhere. "Can you prove this?"

"Can I prove it?" She uttered an expression of contemptuous scorn. "Do I not tell you I am Loti Lorraine? Here—" She pulled a paper out of her handbag and unfolded it. "Read that! It is a consignment note for the largest haul of precious stones I have ever sent you, and it is on its way here now. To-night, at eleven o'clock, an aeroplane will pick it up from a small boat standing out to sea, and will bring it straight here. The gems will be dropped on the roof of this building in response to a signal light that I arranged before I left Europe. Now will you believe what I say?"

McGuire stood there stunned, not knowing what to do. He was convinced all right. This was the genuine Loti Lorraine. She must be, to know so much about the ramifications of the international diamond smuggling plans.

But if this was Loti, who was the other woman?

He remembered what Loti Lorraine—the woman before him now—had just said about being in the hands of the English police. He knew enough about police methods to realise that upon Loti's arrest they would at once get in touch with New York to see if the police there knew anything about her.

"By gosh!" he exclaimed suddenly. "Scranton! That other woman is a police spy!"

He turned to Loti Lorraine.

"Wait here!" he said. "I will see to everything!"

He crossed to the door and flung it open.

"Harry!" he called.

"Here, boss," came the voice of Harry from outside.

"Come in here. I want you."

Harry came in, and closed the door behind him. He saw from the expression on McGuire's face that something was wrong, and a gleam came into his eye. When McGuire got brisk, it generally meant another bumping off.

"Get hold of that Lorraine woman," said McGuire quickly, "and take her to her room. I want her deader than cold mutton inside ten minutes. Get me?"

Harry staggered back a pace. This was all too sudden for his slow brain to grasp all at once.

"Aw, now look here, boss, we all like little Loti," he protested. "What's she done, anyway?"

"Don't ask questions. Do as I say," snapped McGuire. "She's a police spy."

Harry wasted no more words. He hitched his shoulder holster forward a little so that it could be more easily reached, and charged through the door.

McGuire turned back to Loti Lorraine. "Find your way up to the roof, and get that light fixed," he said. "I'll send my own electrician up to you—he'll do anything you say. Hurry!"

Loti, infected by the briskness of McGuire's actions, hurried off. McGuire followed her to the door, and went down the passage outside until he came to the café. He looked round until he had located Joyce Carlyle, who was sitting at a table some distance away with Shorty and the fake Loti, with Harry standing close by talking to them.

McGuire beckoned to Joyce, and she rose and went to him.

"I want to talk to you a minute," McGuire said. "Come with me to my office."

Mystified, Joyce obeyed. When they reached the office McGuire cautiously closed the door.

"We've got to skip to-night," he said. "And you're coming with us, so get your things packed and have them in the car inside ten minutes."

Joyce went white. She sensed danger.

"I—I don't understand," she faltered. "Why are we going, and where to?"

"The police are on our trail," said McGuire. "That darned woman we know as Loti Lorraine was nothing more than a police spy. Harry's going to fix her good and proper, and—"

He broke off, seeing the expression on her face. "Hallo, what's wrong?"

Joyce said nothing. She turned suddenly and made a rush for the door, intent upon getting to Julian and warning him.

But McGuire gave her no chance. In two quick strides he overtook her, and hauled her back.

"What's the big idea?" he demanded.

"Where are you going?"

"Let me go!" she cried. "Let me go!"

"Do I look like a fool?" said McGuire. "There's something about this I don't quite like, and I'm going to keep you safe until I find out what it is."

He dragged her across the office to a door on the other side, and thrust her through it.

"You'll stay in there until I come for you," he said, and made to close the door.

"McGuire! McGuire!" she cried desperately. "Don't let Harry loose with his gun! I'll go away with you—anything—but don't let—"

The door slammed hard, and McGuire turned the key. Then he swung round, and started across the office on his way to the roof. As he went, his hand rested for a moment on the bulge which con-

A Grand NEW Dictionary for Sixpence a week!

Here's a chance to get a really wonderful new Dictionary—one that will be invaluable to you at school, and will help you with your homework—for sixpence a week! The UNIVERSAL ENGLISH DICTIONARY will give you the complete history of every word in the English language—and what a fascinating history, too! It tells you what part of speech the word is, how to pronounce it, how it is used in everyday conversation, and so on.

For the past eight years Professor H. C. Wyld and many more clever people have been engaged on its preparation, and now it is to be issued in fifty-two weekly parts at sixpence a part. So you see that it is well within the range of the most modest pocket money, binding included.

There is more—far more—in the UNIVERSAL ENGLISH than there is in the ordinary desk dictionary. And yet it will be completed in one large-page work, unlike the many-volume dictionaries of the libraries. In the solution of word-puzzles it will help you immeasurably, to name but one of the innumerable uses to which it may be put.

THE UNIVERSAL ENGLISH DICTIONARY

Buy PARTS 1 and 2 TO-DAY

6d. each.

cealed his gun, and an evil grin covered his face. He was thinking of a scheme whereby he could get the new consignment of gems entirely for himself! For once, seeing that he had to fly, it was not worth his while to split the proceeds amongst the boys.

Out in the passage leading to the café, he paused and stopped a passing waiter.

"Tell Shorty to get the car out and have it at the back entrance," he said briefly. "I'll be with him in half an hour."

"Right, boss," replied the waiter.

Then McGuire, satisfied that all his plans were laid, entered the lift that would take him to where the real Loti Lorraine was preparing to signal the aeroplane.

A Bumping-Off Party.

MEANWHILE, Julian was sitting in the café, idly sipping a cocktail and listening to the orchestra. Twice already Shorty had tried to grab his hand, and he was having a difficult task to prevent himself from bursting out laughing.

Joyce's departure troubled him a little, but he did not have a great deal of time to think about it. Events had taken a new turn—Harry the notorious bumper-off, was taking an unusual interest in him, still believing him to be Loti Lorraine.

Harry threw out a few hints that if they were alone they would have quite a lot to talk about, and Julian realised that the chance he had waited for so long had come. If only he could make Harry tell him all he wanted to know—

He looked up at Harry, and replied with a come-lither look. Julian deliberately produced his compact, powdered his nose and touched up his lips. Then he rose to his feet.

"Well, I think I'll go to bed," he said. "I feel terribly tired."

Harry immediately became suspiciously attentive.

"I'd like to see you to your door," he said artlessly. "May I?"

Julian bestowed on him his most fascinating smile.

"Of course," he replied. "I'd like you to."

They went together to the lift, and it shot upwards to the floor on which Julian had his room. With the utmost politeness, Harry stood aside to let Julian leave the lift first, and then followed him closely.

Julian came to a halt outside his door, and half turned.

"Coming in, Harry?" he murmured. "We've never had a chance to become acquainted yet, have we?"

"Sure, I'll come in! I was hoping you'd ask me," he replied truthfully.

Julian opened the door and walked into the room, Harry close to his heels.

Then he realised that something was seriously wrong. He heard the click of the lock behind him.

He did not turn. Instinct told him that Harry the killer had been attentive that evening for a set purpose, and during that moment when he heard the key turned he knew why. McGuire had found out something.

In effect, this was to be a bumping-off party.

Julian kept his nerve. Still keeping up his rôle as a woman, he said nervously:

"You shouldn't have locked the door, you know. It might be misunderstood."

"It won't be misunderstood by anybody," came Harry's grim reply.

Julian emitted a little cry of fright, and turned. What he saw made him

(Continued on page 25).

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. A grand serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama. Starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

HEROES of the FLAMES

READ THIS FIRST.

While en route with his comrades to the scene of a fire, Bob Darrow, of the San Francisco Brigade, saves the life of a boy who falls in front of one of the monster engines.

Later he calls on James Madison, head of a chemical company, to whom he puts up an idea for a patent fire-extinguisher. Madison is not interested, and Bob leaves disappointed, after meeting Dan Mitchell, a shady promoter who is befriending Madison for his own ends.

That afternoon Bob rescues June Madison from a fire in her father's office, then learns that the boy he had saved from the wheels of the fire-engine was Madison's son, Jackie.

In gratitude Madison helps Bob to perfect his invention, the Darrow Fire-Bomb. But Dan Mitchell is anxious to sell Madison an extinguisher of his own, and to discredit Bob he sends a hireling to "doctor" the fireman's invention with a deadly explosive.

Madison's faith in the invention remains unshaken. He allows Bob to continue his experiments at his home, and, at the instigation of Mitchell, gangsters close in on the house to secure the formula of the extinguisher.

Bob is armed, but the cartridges in his revolver have been cunningly substituted by blanks. Two of the crooks tackle him. One is accounted for, but, struggling fiercely, Bob and the other plunge from a high balcony to the grounds!

Now Read On.

Flight.

BOB was unlucky enough to be undermost as he and the rascally Butch fell from the balcony, and the shock with which he struck the ground rendered the young fireman senseless. October 31st, 1931.

EPISODE 9.

"The House of Terror."

June immediately ran to where he lay, but before she could sink to her knees beside him Spike Beldon and his companions darted into view.

They saw their chance of seizing Bob, and wasted no time in putting that project into action. With a sudden rush they swept June aside, and, while Spike helped the groaning Butch to his feet, Buck and Merlin lifted Bob between them.

"Come on," Spike ordered curtly, "get Darrow to the car."

June attempted to intervene, but she was pushed away with a violence that sent her staggering. At that same moment Silk Connolly lowered himself from the balcony, and, dropping into the grounds, joined the other gangsters as they were making tracks for the auto beyond the gates.

From the house came James Madison, appearing on the scene just as June discovered, near by, the revolver that had fallen from Bob Darrow's grasp a few minutes previously.

"Daddy, they've taken Bob away!" the girl panted as her father reached the spot where she was standing.

"Give me that gun, dear," Madison jerked, and, snatching the revolver from her hand, he levelled it at the hindmost of the fleeing crooks.

He could see them quite distinctly, and the range was only thirty or forty paces. He fired off two shots, and the dual smash of the reports echoed through the night. But the fugitives sped on unharmed.

"Missed with both shots," Madison ground out laconically, and his tone betrayed astonishment, for he had always prided himself on being a useful marksman.

Then he broke open the gun, and slid a cartridge into his palm to examine it, and his first glance at the bullet confirmed a vague suspicion that had occurred to him.

"This weapon has been tampered with," he declared. "I loaded it myself, but the cartridges I just fired off were blanks. Who could have substituted them for the live bullets?"

It was a question that Spike Beldon and his companions could have answered, but at that instant they were piling into the waiting car with their captive. Merlin took the wheel, and before the auto's door had been slammed and shut he was driving along the road that led to the city centre.

The crooks headed west, and soon the lights of town were shining into the car's interior as it travelled at high speed through the streets.

"Has Darrow come round yet?" Spike Beldon asked all at once.

"No," came the answer in Silk Connolly's voice. "How about searchin' him for that formula?"

"Wait till we get to the dive," Spike rejoined.

Now when he had informed Spike that Bob Darrow was unconscious Connolly had been mistaken, for, though he was still suffering from the shock of his fall from the balcony, the kidnaped fireman had recovered his wits shortly after he had been dumped in the car. And by the time the auto came to a standstill in a mean back street, Bob had effectively disposed of that document which his captors were so anxious to secure.

It was two o'clock in the morning when the ruffians gained their destination, and, after a preliminary glance up and down the street, Spike gave the word that the coast was clear. Bob was carried swiftly across the sidewalk into a dingy house, and, while Spike, Butch and Connolly climbed to a room on the second floor, Merlin and Buck dragged the prisoner down a flight of wooden stairs to a cellar.

They flung him roughly to the floor, and proceeded to make a search of him. Bob cautiously opened his eyes and looked at them sidelong as they examined some papers that they had discovered in his wallet, and then he lowered his lids again as they turned their attention on him once more.

"Here it is," said Merlin all at once, as he pulled something from Bob's pocket. "It's the formula—written out in code!"

"What a brain you've got," Buck retorted with sarcasm. "That's a Chinese laundry slip, you poor sap!"

Meanwhile, Spike and the others were awaiting the results of the search in the room upstairs, and when Buck and Merlin appeared with the news that the formula was certainly not on Bob's person their faces fell.

"That's queer," Spike muttered. "I thought he always carried it around. Well, I'll report to Mitchell. You boys stay here."

Butch spoke, in a voice that seemed pent-up with agitation.

"Listen, Spike," he said. "Couldn't we take Darrow some place else? I don't like this house. A guy named Grogan was shot up here by the cops one night, and they say his ghost has haunted the dump ever since."

"Ah, cut that dope!" scoffed Beldon. "I've heard that tale, and it's nothing but a lotta boloney."

Leaving the house, Spike made his way to Dan Mitchell's office, and, though it was early morning, he found his employer there, eager to learn the outcome of the raid on the Madisons' home.

"Nothing doin', boss," Beldon told him. "Wherever that formula is, Darrow ain't get it on him."

Mitchell cursed under his breath, and then, after a minute's thought—

"All right," he said. "I'll go and see what I can find at the Madison's, and you—Say"—this with a sudden air of hopefulness—"sav, it's just possible that the formula is in Darrow's locker at the fire-station!"

"Huh, a fat chance I've got of searchin' that locker," Spike retorted, "with all them smoke-eaters there!"

"But maybe they wouldn't be there," Mitchell retorted. "There's such a thing as a false alarm, Spike. Now you get busy."

Spike departed; and some time later, after an early breakfast, Mitchell drove to the Madisons' home. As he entered the gates he saw June preparing to climb into her own sports automobile, and he affected surprise and concern when she informed him of all that had occurred the previous night.

"Have the police found any clues?" he asked, when she told him that her father had notified the authorities.

"No," June answered; "but I'm going to try myself. I know what those men look like, and so does Pat Heeley, Bob's chum in the Fire Department. I'm going to ask him to help me."

She started up her car and said good-bye, and Mitchell passed on into the house, where he presented himself to Madison.

"This is terrible about Darrow," he declared. "I suppose the ruffians got away with his formula?"

"I'm afraid so," was the rejoinder. "I've just been through the things in the room Bob was occupying, and it's not there."

This was precisely the information that Dan Mitchell wished to obtain, and, after some further conversation, he left the house.

On the Trail.

ACTING on Mitchell's instructions, Spike Beldon smashed the glass of an alarm in the territory of District Number Five's station, and then drove to that same fire-house at top speed.

Only a minute or two after the giant engines and escapes had swept out of the station in answer to the fake call, Spike drew up at the kerb. But unfortunately for him, his arrival synchronised with that of June Madison, who was bound for the same destination with the intention of seeking out Pat Heeley.

June saw Beldon from the other side of the street, and, recognising him instantly, steered her car into a side-street. Unseen herself, she watched him from the corner and saw him enter the fire-station surreptitiously, to reappear empty-handed.

Spike climbed into his car again and made off, never suspecting that he was now being trailed. For June did not miss the opportunity that chance had cast in her way, and, once more behind the wheel of her roadster, she followed the crook to that sinister house where he had left his companions.

The house had once been a tenement, though it had long since been abandoned to vermin and decay until Spike and his associates had found a use for it. Into this questionable building June stealthily made her way after Beldon had crossed the threshold, and, hearing her quarry on the stairs, she proceeded to climb them also.

Spike entered the room where his companions were waiting for him. They had been playing cards, but looked up from their game as he appeared.

"Nothing found yet," Spike told them gloomily. "Well, the chief'll be here to-night, and he'll settle with Darrow. Is there any news?"

"No," was the answer. "Darrow's still locked in the cellar."

June had by this time reached the landing on which the crooks' lair was situated, and she was approaching the door of the room when something scuttled past her feet. It was a fat, loathsome rat, and from June's lips broke an involuntary cry, a cry that she stifled too late.

From the room into which Beldon had passed a moment before there came an exclamation, and, with terror in her heart, June sped back down the stairs and strank into a dim corner.

She heard a door open, and the gangsters emerged. Then the awestruck voice of Butch became audible. "It's Grogan's ghost, fellers!"

Even as he spoke, there was a furious hammering in the depths of the tenement; but if the sound convinced Butch that his phantom was on the prowl, Spike and the others held a very different view.

"That's Darrow tryin' to bust outa the cellar," snarled Spike. "Let's go down an' quieten him."

June acted promptly as she distinguished those words, and, knowing where Bob was to be found, but realising

Bob cautiously opened his eyes and looked at them sidelong as they examined some papers that they had discovered in his wallet.

that there was not a second to be lost if she were to rescue him, she flung caution to the winds and made a dash for the basement steps.

There was an immediate hue and cry, but June gained the cellar before the crooks could descend to the ground floor. Unlocking the solid door of Bob's place of captivity, she threw it open and stumbled into the fireman's arms as he was on the point of swinging up a broken chair-leg.

"June!" he cried, dropping the improvised bludgeon as he recognised her. "They're coming down the stairs, Bob!" she panted. "Quick—we've got to get out of here!"

Almost before she finished the sentence she knew that the one way of escape was barred to them, for, stampeding down the steps that led to the basement, the crooks swarmed into the cellar in a body.

There were no windows to the cellar, and no light penetrated from outside. But, some time previously, Bob had turned on the electric switch, and a powerful bulb now illuminated the place.

In the very first moment of attack that light was extinguished, with disastrous consequences that were not at first apparent.

The first to hurl himself at Bob was Merlin, and, seizing the rogue in his powerful arms, the fireman swept him off his feet and flung him headlong at his companions. Merlin clutched blindly as he dived backward through space, and his hand gripped the lamp that hung from the low ceiling, tearing down both bulb and wire and plunging the cellar into darkness.

The accident fused the electric light system and, behind the wainscoting, unseen threads of metal carried the spectre of fire through the tenement. But, oblivious of the peril, the crooks closed in on the dim-seen figure of their victim.

Bob fought back at them savagely, and speedily discovered that the odds against him were not so desperately overwhelming as they at first seemed. For the ruffians impeded one another, and the darkness, while it lasted, was actually an advantage in Bob's favour.

It was not long, however, before vicious tongues of flame were beginning to rise near the cellar steps, and in the space of a few minutes the basement seemed a death-trap.

Bob lashed out at his assailants the more fiercely, and with a sudden irresistible rush he scattered them to right and left and gained the doorway. June was cowering near by, and, grasping her hand, he hurried her out of the cellar.

Flames beat in their faces as they climbed the basement steps, and a thick pall of smoke closed over them. From the cellar rose an angry outcry as the crooks started in pursuit.

Bob and June reached the floor above, only to discover that the blaze was a hundred times more devastating than it had been in the basement. They blundered on, but were not quite certain which way they should turn for the street door, and while they hesitated Spike and his men intervened between them and the direct way of escape.

Still grasping June's hand, Bob dashed for the stairs that led to the next storey. The gangsters followed—all with the exception of Butch, who fled the tenement convinced that some supernatural force had started the fire.

Flames seemed to be raging on every floor, but the crooks continued the pursuit determinedly, and they were on the fugitives' very heels when Bob turned at bay. He hit Merlin, the first man, full in the jaw, and Merlin plunged back into a belt of fire, throwing his companions into confusion as he did so.

The pursuit was checked for a moment, and Bob and June sped on up the stairs. But the crooks quickly resumed the chase, and three flights had been climbed before the danger of their situation drove them down again in a helter-skelter rush for the street.

Bob did not choose to descend after them. He was in his shirtsleeves, and had no coat to throw over June, whose steps were already beginning to falter. The fire seemed worse, moreover, on the floors that they had left below them.

"We've got to get to the roof," Bob coughed out. "It's our only chance!"

They made for the top landing. Even there the blaze raged menacingly, though it was less intense than on the other storeys, and flames were coiling around Bob as he lifted June through a scuttle in the ceiling and then clambered after her.

He had hoped that they might make their getaway across the roofs, but as he looked about him he saw that the deserted tenement stood isolated. There seemed no way of escape, and he was trying to fight down a feeling of despair when the familiar clang of fire-bells reached his ears.

He strode to the parapet, and, peering down into the street through the flames and smoke that were pouring from the tenement windows, he saw a big scarlet engine swinging into view. It was followed by another truck, and another, and in a few seconds the hoses were being turned on to the burning building. But the escapes were not yet in sight, and it was plain to Bob that the roof of the tenement was due to cave in at any minute.

Then suddenly his glance came to rest on a number of telephone cables running from the tenement to a building across the street, and in a moment an idea was suggested to him.

"There's our way out, June!" he cried, pointing. "Give me your hands!"

She recoiled from the daring project, but he drew her arms about his neck and bound her wrists around him with a handkerchief. Next instant he had gripped the cables and was swinging himself out across the street.

Far below, the pavements were lined with crowds of anxious spectators, who watched Bob and the girl in an agony of suspense, and all at once the tension fairly became nerve-racking as it was seen that the cross-arm to which the telephone cables were attached was breaking off under the strain.

A jerk warned Bob of this new terror. He turned his head and saw that the cross-arm was coming asunder from the post on the tenement roof, and he swung farther out along the cables, in the hope of reaching the building opposite before the support was completely torn away by the strain laid upon it.

But he and June were still swaying above the heads of the crowd in the street when the cross-arm was dragged from its fastenings, and a hoarse cry rose from hundreds of throats as man and girl hurtled down through space.

Morgan's Point.

IT was to Bob's comrades of the fire department that June and her companion owed their lives. For a few seconds before the cross-arm snapped, Pat Heeley and several of the other men dashed into the middle of the street with a safety-net.

Plunging through mid-air, Bob and June were caught in the net and hurried to the sidewalk, where they were set on their feet. June's hands were then untied, and as she seemed to be suffering from shock she was packed into a taxi and driven home, Bob electing to remain on the spot and help extinguish one of the worst fires the city had seen.

June felt considerably more composed when she reached home, and, locating her father in his study with Dan Mitchell, she soon related all that had happened.

Her father listened to her with awe, Mitchell with secret chagrin, though he managed to conceal the sentiment pretty effectively.

"And what about the formula?" Mitchell asked when the girl had finished her story.

"I don't know," June answered, with a frown. "Things happened so quickly that I didn't get a chance to ask Bob."

Eager to learn the answer to the question that was foremost in his mind, Mitchell made some excuse and left the house, driving straight to his office, to find that Spike and the rest of the gang were awaiting him there. He was not long in discovering that the coveted formula was still beyond his grasp.

"A fine bunch of tripe you are!" he accused his hirelings. "One girl walks in on you, and upsets all my plans!"

"Now hold on, Mitch," Spike argued. "It wasn't the girl that beat us; it was the fire. And Darrow didn't have the formula, anyhow."

"Use your head!" snapped Mitchell. "He had the formula when you started, but he didn't have it when you arrived. You thought he was unconscious in that car, but he was smart enough to fool a lot of half-wits like you! Where is the car?"

"It's at Morgan's Point now," growled Spike.

Mitchell eyed him keenly. "All right," he said. "You and the boys drive out there. Butch, you go up to Madison's place, watch points there, and report at once if you hear or see anything that might help us."

At that precise moment, just lately returned from the tenement fire, Bob Darrow was taking Pat Heeley and Battalion Chief Wilson into his confidence regarding the whereabouts of his formula, and his conversation was one that would have convinced Mitchell his suspicions were correct.

"When these fellows had me in that car," Bob said as he stood before his chief's desk at the station, "they thought I was unconscious. But before they had a chance to search me I slipped the formula behind one of the seat cushions. Now, it seems to me I remember hearing one of the gang mentioning that the car would have to be taken to some garage under a water-tower at Morgan's Point, after they'd finished with it, and hidden there so that they wouldn't be traced by it. That's where I mean to go right now."

"Can't Oi be after going wid him, chief?" Pat Heeley interposed. "Oi'm off duty now, and Oi've got me old motor-bike. Oi can droive it now wid-out hittin' annything."

Wilson smiled. "All right, Pat," he agreed. "Bob may need you. But I think he'd better do the driving. By the way, Bob, I'll ring Madison for you and tell him your plans."

James Madison entered his study to find June sitting at his desk.

"I'm going down to police head-quarters, my dear," he said, "and I'm going to take your sports car. The

(Continued on page 24.)

CUPBOARD LOVE

A NOVEMBER IDYLL

*When it's early in November
And the Kiddies lie in wait
For you coming home from business
Growing anxious if you're late*

*When your chair is by the fire
And your slippers warm as toast
And there seems a competition
As to who can serve you most*

*When you wonder where the catch is
As to every whim they've pandered
They murmur "It's November fifth
And the fireworks must be....."*

What do YOU think?

THERE'S A SHOP IN EVERY TOWN SELLING

"Standard"

STANDARD FIREWORKS
LIMITED, HUDDERSFIELD

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

(Continued from page 22.)

hand-brake on my roadster seems to be out of order."

He went out of the house, and June heard him start up her auto and drive off. He could not have been gone for more than a few minutes when the 'phone bell rang, and as she picked up the receiver she heard the voice of Battalion Chief Wilson.

"Oh, hallo, chief!" she called. "No, dad isn't in. Oh, yes, about Bob. Morgan's Point, you say? Bob's going there."

She chanced to raise her glance, and with the movement saw a man's reflection in a mirror on the wall. He was standing on the threshold of a pair of french windows, listening attentively to all she said, and as she recognised him as the rascally Butch she slammed down the receiver, wrenched open a drawer in the desk and snatched a revolver that was lying there.

"What are you doing here?" she rapped out, wheeling round.

Butch took one look at the gun and then fled. Running to the french windows, June saw him sprint along the drive and clamber into a car outside the gates. On the spur of the moment she darted to her father's roadster, which stood near the front door of the house, and in another second or two she was speeding in pursuit of the gangster.

The chase that ensued was one that covered a distance of two or three miles, and June quickly realised that her quarry was travelling in the direction of Morgan's Point. It seemed imperative to her then that he must be prevented from warning any of his associates of Bob's intention, and with this object in view, June did her utmost to overtake him.

Her father's roadster was considerably faster than the auto Butch was driving, and, drawing ahead of him on a lonely stretch of road, she swerved precariously into his track. To avoid a crash the gangster wrenched his car aside, and in an instant it had driven its bonnet into a steep embankment that flanked the trail.

June carried on, and by the time Butch had crawled from his auto she was out of sight. The gangster's machine was crippled, and he had resigned himself to a long walk when another car came into view.

It was travelling from the city, and it contained Spike and the rest of the gang. Butch waved them down, and as they came abreast he hurriedly explained what had happened.

"That Madison Jane ran me off the road," he snarled. "Wrecked my car an' nearly wrecked me. I heard her answer a 'phone call at her house, an' it seems Darrow is headed for Morgan's Point."

"Get in here, Butch," jerked Spike Beldon. "We'll have to hurry."

Meanwhile, a mile down the road, June was approaching a fork. She was uncertain of the route to Morgan's Point, and chose the left-hand branch, and she had proceeded some distance along it before she realised that she was on the wrong trail.

Bringing the car to a standstill she turned and drove back towards the fork.

October 31st, 1931.

praying that she might yet be able to warn Bob that he was in danger.

Into the Depths.

REACHING the garage under the water-tower at Morgan's Point, the crooks drove round to the back of the structure and scrambled out of their car.

"Well, I don't see any tracks," said Spike, after scrutinising the immediate vicinity. "Darrow ain't here yet. Come on, let's get in that garage and search the auto we used last night."

They filed into the building and proceeded to ransack the car that stood inside, and it was as he was dragging out the upholstery in the back of the automobile that Silk Connolly gave vent to a triumphant exclamation.

"Hey, fellers," he announced, "I've got it! Here it is!"

And he produced a paper that was covered with chemical symbols.

"It's Greek to me," said Spike, taking it from him and examining it.

"Yeah, but it's the formula all right," declared Merlin, who could boast of some education. "I took chemistry at the school I went to when I was a kid, an' even though I couldn't tell you what they mean now, I recognise some of them ciphers. Spike, you can get in touch with Mitchell an'—"

He did not finish the sentence, for at that moment the unmistakable sound of a motor-bike's engine was heard. The machine was brought to a halt outside the garage, and, with a significant look at his companions, Spike suddenly threw open the door.

The gangsters saw Bob Darrow and Pat Heely climbing from the bike, and made a concerted rush at the two firemen. It was an attack that took the newcomers completely by surprise, but though they were driven across the road at the outset they speedily asserted their fighting qualities.

Silk Connolly and Buck had launched themselves on Pat, but they learned to their cost that he was more than a match for them, and though they landed one or two early blows, the Irishman levelled Buck with a terrific swing and then gave Silk his undivided attention in hurricane style.

In the meantime, Bob was tackling Spike, Merlin and Butch with devastating effect. Spike he laid low with a smashing right-cross that swept the gang-leader off his balance and hurled him to the ground where he seemed content to remain. Merlin was hammered into a dazed condition by a slashing attack that finally bundled him into a ditch by the roadside.

Butch proved a tougher handful, and, in the instant of Merlin's fall scored with a dastardly blow that caught Bob behind the ear and knocked him staggering. But Bob recovered in time to swing around and meet the formidable rush with which his adversary followed up his success.

He checked that rush with a stiff left, and the two men fought toe to toe, with Bob gradually taking the offensive. A sledgehammer drive to the ribs winded the big gangster, and a smart clip across the point of the jaw rattled him badly. He was floundering backward in an ignominious retreat when Spike Beldon struggled to his feet, reluctantly summing up enough courage to tackle Bob again.

Bob diverted his attention from Butch and slammed his right to the point of Spike's chin, and Dan Mitchell's henchman tumbled to the dust once more.

But the brief interlude had given Butch a chance to redeem himself, and he launched a fresh onslaught on Bob. This time the young fireman sidestepped, and as his man blundered past he ripped a punch to his heavy jaw.

It was at this juncture that June Madison appeared on the scene, and, drawing up close to where Bob was standing, she pulled on the hand-brake. The ratchet that should have held it fast was ineffective, but in her agitated frame of mind she did not notice the circumstance, and her father's reason for using her car completely slipped her memory.

She climbed out of the roadster as Butch spun around and made another rush at Bob. Bob hit the gangster with a force that battered him against the door of the car, and under the impact of the man's bulk it swung violently on its hinges and struck June on the temple.

She sank to the ground with a little moan, and in a moment Bob was beside her.

"June!" he panted, lifting her anxiously in his arms. "June, you should never have come here!"

She made no answer, and he realised that the collision with the door had stunned her. Then he saw Butch approaching him once more, and, bundling the girl into the roadster, he closed the door and wheeled to face his assailant.

Butch grappled with him, and, locked in a fierce struggle, the two men staggered towards the back of the car where, with a sudden herculean effort Bob swung his man clear of his feet and flung him away.

The burly ruffian struck the roadster and, standing as it did on a slight incline, with the ratchet of its hand-brake failing to hold fast, it needed only the single shock to set the automobile in motion.

It rolled forward, and, before Bob realised that it was on the move, it was running to the brow of a steep hill.

OUR GRAND NEW ANNUAL.

Don't forget to get a copy of this wonderful new Annual. It is packed with thrilling film stories, pictorial articles and coloured plates.

Price 6/- net, at all Newsagents.

where the road dipped to the rim of a high bluff overlooking a reach of the deep, broad river.

Butch lumbered towards Bob, but, with a hoarse cry, the fireman lashed out with his right and bowled him over. Then he jumped the gangster's prone form and ran forward a few paces, in the direction that the runaway car was taking.

He stopped. The automobile had gone over the brow of the hill and was gathering speed. He could never hope to overtake it on foot, and a hundred yards ahead the road came to a blind end on the very edge of the bluff!

There was only one chance of coming up with it—astride Pat Heeley's motor-bike—and, his face ghastly pale, Bob sprang to the machine, dragged it from its stand and kicked the starter. Next second he was in the saddle and driving at full throttle in pursuit of the roadster.

The roar of the bike's engine drew Pat Heeley's attention from his battle with Silk, and, leaving the battered crook to sag against the wall of the garage, the Irishman turned to see Bob disappearing over the brow of the hill. Connolly took the opportunity to pull himself together and attempt an attack from the rear, but Pat was warned by the shuffle of his feet, and spun round to deliver an upper-cut that floored the ruffian.

The fight no longer interested the Irishman, and he ran to the crest of the hill. The gangsters did not follow him, but, climbing to their feet, stood in a sorry group by the roadside.

Pat gained the brow of the hill and stopped in his tracks. He saw the runaway car heading for the end of the bluff and the edge of the bluff, and he saw his friend racing after it in a neck-or-nothing bid to overhaul it.

"Glory be!" he gasped. And then, at the top of his voice: "Bob!" he yelled. "Stop, Bob! Ye'll go over!"

Bob did not hear him, for the screaming engine of the motor-bike shut out every other sound. Nor would Bob have heeded Pat had the Irishman's distracted shout reached his ears.

He was making up on the car, but the edge of the bluff was very near by now, and he could see the sheen of deep water far down beyond it. There seemed to be not the remotest possibility of drawing abreast of the roadster and saving June from the fatal plunge to doom, yet he kept the throttle wide open.

The automobile was just ahead of him now, and all at once he discerned a movement in the front of the car. June was stirring, and slowly she struggled to a sitting posture and drew her hand across her forehead dazedly. Then she was on the brink of the cliff immediately before her, and the river away below.

A look of horror crossed her face, and then a shriek she clutched at the door. Then as her fingers closed on the handle the roadster hurtled over the edge of the bluff and dived through mid-air with impetus that snatched the girl's path away and turned her sick.

A moment later the motor-bike had slowed it, carrying Bob down, down, towards the chill bosom of the waters.

There was a double splash as roadster and bike struck the surface and vanished under a welter of foam!

to be concluded next week. By permission of the Universal Pictures, Ltd., bring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.)

"MAID TO ORDER."
(Continued from page 19.)

bring into use every ounce of self-control. In Harry's hand was a gun, and it was pointed straight at Julian's head!

Julian thought quickly, and realised that unless he did something at once his chances of doing anything at all were gone. Harry was no longer the awkward, smiling simp that he had been in the café, but an ice-cold maniac, filled with the desire to kill.

Julian shrank back as though scared out of his wits.

"Oh, put it away!" he cried. "It frightens me!"

Harry advanced, his whole demeanour one of gloating. It mattered nothing that he was going to kill someone whom he believed to be a woman. On the contrary, the fact that he had apparently inspired so much fear flattered his vanity.

He jammed the gun hard against Julian's stomach, and grinned.

"Say your prayers, sister," he said. "I'll give you twenty seconds."

That last speech of his was his undoing. Julian, letting out a fake sob, sank to his knees, thus bringing the gun within easy reach.

He clenched his fist, and lashed out at Harry's hand. His knuckles caught the gunman's wrist squarely, and Harry let out a howl of pain as his weapon exploded harmlessly and sailed across the room.

Julian got to his feet, and looked about hurriedly for a weapon. He saw only one—a weapon that has been used by women from time immemorial.

It was an umbrella!

Julian grabbed it, and swung it upwards as Harry rushed in. Crash! It landed neatly on the top of his head, sending him staggering backwards with tears in his eyes.

Julian took another swipe. The handle of the umbrella caught Harry behind the ear this time, and the gangster went backwards across the bed with a roar of pain.

"And now what's it all about?" asked Julian politely. "Why the gun?" He advanced menacingly, the umbrella held high, when Harry did not speak. "Want some more?"

"No, no!" said Harry quickly. "I'll tell you. McGuire said you were a police spy, and was to be bumped off."

"He did, did he?" snorted Julian. "That means I've got to fix the whole lot of you single-handed." He looked at Harry sternly. "Come here, Harry."

Harry slowly rose from the bed.

"Say," he said sullenly, "you're pretty fierce for a woman, aren't you?"

"I ain't that," said Julian. "But it needn't worry you any more."

He planted a straight left clean on Harry's jaw, and followed it up with a right that had all his weight behind it. Harry gulped, staggered backwards, and dropped to the floor.

"That'll keep you asleep for a bit," muttered Julian gleefully. "Now for the rest of the bunch!"

In the Café.

THE clock on Times Building struck the hour of eleven as the distant drone of an aeroplane was heard in the sky. Loti Lorraine, waiting on the roof of the Arab night club, a powerful reflector-lamp by her side, strained her eyes to see if she could locate it.

The drone got louder until it was practically overhead. Quickly she uncovered her lamp, flashing the aviator above an agreed signal—three long beams and two short.

The aeroplane dived low towards the roof, almost skimming the tops of the chimneys. As it zoomed overhead there was a metallic thud from close by the door that led to the building below.

Loti Lorraine was about to leave the lamp, when the door suddenly opened and McGuire appeared. He looked down, and saw lying at his feet a bundle. It had burst open, clearly displaying its contents—gems and costly jewellery of every description.

He bent down and grabbed hold of it. His act was so furtive, and so completely a departure from the agreed plan, that Loti realised she was being double-crossed.

"Put that down, McGuire!" she shrieked.

McGuire laughed, and straightened himself. The next moment there was a crash as the door from the roof was slammed and bolted from the inside.

Loti Lorraine was a prisoner!

McGuire charged down the first flight of stairs to the lift, got into it, and flashed still further downwards to the café floor. He swung the gates back, and so reached the café itself.

The place was deserted. Julian had seen to that—he did not want any of the gang to slip through his fingers in the crowds.

McGuire paused uncertainly in the middle of the floor, still clutching the bundle of gems. Suddenly a voice behind him said:

"Looking for me, McGuire?"

McGuire spun round, to find himself face to face with the fake Loti Lorraine. Only this time the fake Loti did not speak in that soft mezzo-soprano, but in the tone of a very healthy and robust male—namely, Julian.

With a snarl of rage, McGuire swung up the heavy bundle of gems and aimed it full at Julian's face.

Julian was not taken unawares. He dodged and rushed in, sending McGuire sprawling backwards over a chair.

McGuire recovered quickly, and picked the chair up. He raised it above his head, and stood there threateningly.

Julian did not falter. He charged in again, this time snatching another chair from the floor as he ran. He braced his

KEEP YOUR BOYS AT HOME!

13'3" DOWN

A Riley Billiard Table provides an attraction that makes it simple. There's hours of pleasure for the boys and all the family with a Riley "Home" Billiard Table. The 6 ft. size is delivered on first deposit of 13/3d., balance by monthly instalments. Cash Price £11 15s. 7 days' Free Trial allowed to test the table, and Riley's pay carriage and take transit risks. Riley's "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables are also offered on easy terms. Send for Free Art List containing sizes and prices of all tables. Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Great Britain.

E. J. RILEY, LTD.,
Howard Works, Accrington, and Dept. 35,
147, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.1.
October 31st, 1931.

32 Free Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

arms for the stock, and met McGuire's weapon squarely with his own.

For a few moments the two fighters stood there glaring at each other. Julian's wig had come off, and McGuire was no longer under any false impressions as to the kind of antagonist he was up against.

At last Julian spoke.

"I'm going to smash you to pieces, McGuire," he said distinctly. "And I'll tell you why. You had the infernal nerve to lock Miss Carlyle up. Well, I found her, and now she's on her way for the cops. Moreover, she knows enough to have you put away for murder. So get busy—you've got precious little time left."

He flung his chair away, and got a grip on McGuire's. With a quick jerk he broke McGuire's grip, and sent the second chair spinning after the first.

"Now, McGuire," he said, and leapt back.

McGuire hurled himself on his opponent in a tempest of fury. Julian dodged swiftly, feeling the rush of air as McGuire's fists lashed past his head.

He jerked himself half-round, and as he did so, sent his right smashing to the side of McGuire's jaw. McGuire's features contracted in a spasm of pain, and he staggered backwards, stunned.

Julian gave him no chance to recover. He leapt in again, and sent home another stinging blow to the gangster's jaw. McGuire let up a shout, tottered for a few seconds, and then dropped to the floor with a crash.

Julian sprang on him, and felt in his pockets. As he did so, he heard a slight sound behind him.

"Hi, what's the big idea?" came the voice of Shorty. "What have you been doing to Miss Lorraine, McGuire?"

Julian straightened himself, McGuire's gun in his hand.

"Find out for yourself, Shorty," he said, and Shorty's eyes almost started from his head as he saw his beloved, a man's cropped head in the place of the blonde waves, leveling a gun unwaveringly at his waistcoat.

"Gor!" he said elegantly, raising his hands above his head. "And you was the one I reckoned would be my sweetie!"

Five minutes later McGuire began to show signs of life. Julian kicked him into wakefulness, and made him get to his feet.

At that moment the doors burst open and Detective Seranton came in, followed by a dozen police officers. The cops took charge of the two crooks, and went away to collect Harry and Loti Lorraine.

Seranton turned to Julian when he had finished giving his instructions.

"Good work, Julian!" he said admiringly. "Only you could have done it. I—"

He broke off. Julian was half-way across the café floor, talking to Joyce in a low but earnest voice. He had just asked her a question, and she hesitated over her answer.

"Go on—say 'yes,'" implored Julian. "I won't take anything else, and if you dare tell me that all I can be is a sister to you—"

Detective Seranton delicately turned away as Joyce suddenly laughed, and Julian swept her into his arms.

(By permission of the Sterling Film Co., Ltd., starring Julian Eltinge as Julian Eltinge; Jane Reid as Joyce Carlyle; Georgie Stone as Shorty; Betty Boyd as Loti Lorraine; Jack Richardson as Jim McGuire; Al Hill as Harry; Kernan Gripps as Detective Seranton; Charles Giblin as Captain Randall.)

October 31st, 1931.

The News Reels

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

He Bit.

Bert Wheeler tried this wisecrack on his partner, Robert Woolsey.

"Had an awful time with Amos last night," Bert remarked.

"You mean Amos 'n' Andy?" asked Woolsey interested.

"No, a mosquito."

An Undersea Drama.

The most interesting of Elstree's nine stages the other week was undoubtedly that on which Capt. Walter Summers and his assistants were filming the B.I.P. picture "Submarine."

A huge square had been cut of the middle of this particular "set" to permit the construction of a tank. In it lay a portion of a submarine filled with levers and dials that had been specially lent for the film by the Admiralty. The interest of the scene was capped by the thrilling spectacle of the submarine crew making frantic and real efforts to escape when more than fourteen tons of water began flooding the vessel.

Everyone got soaking wet, including the director and cameramen. Chief Petty Officer Willis, hero of the Poseidon, was also there giving directions. The exterior scenes were taken at Portsmouth, where a real submarine was used.

GRAND FILM NOVELS

Elissa Landi

in "ALWAYS GOODBYE."

The adventures of a girl who seized her one chance to enjoy life to the full—and found herself in the power of a daring crook.

"TEN NIGHTS IN A BAR-ROOM."

The story of two men, and liquor, that set their souls adrift—and a little girl who came between them. Starring William Farnum and Tom Santschi.

ALSO

The sixth episode of the splendid serial drama of the sawdust ring, starring Francis X. Bushman, jun., and Alberta Vaughn.

"THE SPELL OF THE CIRCUS."

Don't miss this splendid issue of our companion paper

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY.

PRICE 2d.

"The Hunchback of Notre Dame."

(Continued from page 14.)

the raving mob. Gringoire—and in an instant the hunchback scrambled out of the window, and went climbing down the cathedral, edging his way to the left of the mighty structure, so as to avoid the insurgents clamouring around the door below.

"Gringoire!" Quasimodo was panting heavily as he came up to the man, and there was an acute pain in his chest. Strong as he was, the hunchback's heart was none too sound, and the least exertion had the effect of weakening it still more. "See those devils—Clopin and his scum. They're after Esmeralda, and they'll get her if we can't get help. Will you—"

"I understand—you want me to get out the soldiers?" Gringoire quickly interrupted. "I'll do it, never fear. But 'tis strange that I should happen along to-night. As a matter of fact, Phœbus De Chateaupers is at last fit and well again, and only this evening did he hear that the fair Esmeralda had been sentenced to death for the attempt made on his life. He had imagined she had gone away and left him. My, but wasn't he mad when he heard the truth! She never stabbed him—Phœbus swears to that. Said someone must have crept up behind them—someone who bore him a grudge. Anyhow, he's secured for the girl the king's pardon—that was why I came along—to tell Dom Claude. But enough of this. If I don't hasten those scurvy knaves will break a way into the cathedral and get the girl. Farewell, Quasimodo; rely upon me to get out the King's Guard."

As he sped away the hunchback went back to the cathedral, gaining admittance in the same way as he had left it.

Up he climbed to the very top of the magnificent building, where Esmeralda still crouched, terror-stricken, on her bed.

"Be not afraid, Esmeralda," he comforted her. "It's Clopin and his dogs. They're trying to force their way into Notre Dame to get at you. But they'll not succeed. Oh, dear no. I've sent for the King's Guard—and Phœbus De Chateaupers will be here in—"

"Phœbus!" The girl caught in her breath, an eager light shining in her eyes. "Is he well again then?"

"Not only that," grinned the hunchback, "but he's secured your pardon. Told the King that it wasn't you who attempted his life, and he's mad to thin they suspected you. Unfortunately he's only just heard about it, and—"

He broke off as a mighty thud drifted up from below, and shuffled out to the stone balcony. As he peered over the balustrade—saw the huge trunk of tree which some score of Clopin's revolutionists were using as a battering-ram against the cathedral door, something seemed to snap in his brain, leaving him a raging maniac.

Back he stamped to warn Esmeralda that the threatened danger was now very real, and as he came into her improvised bedchamber he stopped in she alarm. Jehan was there, struggling with the girl—Jehan, who had raided the treasure vaults and, having stowed so priceless gold and silver candlestick and other tokens in a sack, had come here with the intention of again trying to persuade Esmeralda to marry him.

(Continued on page 28.)

"THE LIGHTNING FLYER."

(Continued from page 8.)

handed swing, and, landing against the signal-box door, burst it open and fell on to the top of the wooden steps. Durkin leapt in to finish the fight, but Jim brought up his left leg, caught Durkin in the waist, and, exerting all his strength and utilising the forward rush of the madman, managed to lift him over his head. Durkin crashed against the wooden rails, smashed them, and fell headlong to the ground fifteen feet below.

A groan, and no sound but the rasping telephone-bell.

The fight was finished. Jim was so exhausted that he just wanted to lie there and sleep, but the bell kept his senses from failing. With an effort, he turned on his side and then to his knees. His head was buzzing, and he felt on the verge of collapse, yet he knew he must answer the call.

An effort to stand up brought a moan of agony. His right ankle hurt terribly, and every bone in his body was sore. Clutching at the sides of the cabin, Jim crawled to the phone and raised the receiver off the hook.

"Hullo!" His voice was no more than a croak.

"Good G— Where have you been?" a voice answered hoarsely. "The freight has broken in half—three trucks are hurtling down the line—the special coming up will smash into them—and unless you derail them a fearful accident must occur! There's not a moment to lose!"

Doom Threatens the Special.

JIM was so dazed and exhausted that his brain seemed incapable of functioning. Derail the freight truck! But how could he do that? There was a special apparatus to be put on the lines. But where was it? If he found it, could he lift it?

The fighting spirit that had caused his father to rise from the shops to the presidency of a huge railroad came to his aid. He clenched his teeth and told himself that he must find the derailing gear and set it in place.

Under some sacking he found a metal instrument, two foot in length by almost a foot in height, and it was terribly heavy. It was a block of metal with a huge groove in the centre and a slot underneath. The underneath portion fitted over the rail, causing the top groove to rest plumb with the rail. The wheel that entered the groove must be diverted, impossible to jump over the obstacle because the angle and depth of this groove was specially constructed—it had been tried and tested hundreds of times.

Somehow Jim dragged the cumbersome article to the top of the steps, nearly toppled over when he reached for the smashed rail, then, with a last effort, pushed it down the steps.

What was that noise? He stared down the incline and saw a red glow in the distance. The special? Jim, muttering fervent prayers for strength, staggered down the wooden steps. The noise was the rumble of the runaway trucks, the red glow the lamp on the last truck, now the first—since the trucks were running backwards.

Exerting what remained of his strength he swayed down the incline. On the right was a sheer drop of many thousands of feet, and to derail the trucks by the signal-box might only cause a wreck into which the express would charge.

The derailing apparatus was across the rail, and then fear gripped Jim afresh. The express would know nothing of the danger and might get so close that the derailing would come too late. The express must be made to slow—but how?

Like a drunken, lame man Jim returned to the signal-box. Thank heaven, a sound lamp was still hooked to the wall. With shaking fingers he lit the wick and closed the shutter.

The clatter of the approaching trucks sounded like thunder—they could not be more than six hundred yards away. Past the derailing metal limped Jim, drawing his red lamp above his head, whilst useless, croaking words came from his parched lips.

The express seemed, to his distorted vision, to be almost on him and rushing up the incline at a terrific speed.

Then the ankle gave out and Jim slumped to the ground. He lay where he had fallen.

The driver of the special was leaning over the side of his engine cab. He saw the red light and yelled to the fireman.

"Danger ahead!"

But even though the red light suddenly wavered and vanished, the driver was a man of caution and was taking no chances. The brakes were violently jammed on, and Rose, talking earnestly to the president, was flung into his arms.

"Something wrong," shouted James Nelson. He pushed the girl away and hurried to the window.

The moon came over the pines and he gasped as round the bend ahead of them he distinguished the oncoming trucks. The express had almost come to a standstill.

"We've got to jump for it!" yelled the president, and grabbed at Rose, who had come to his side.

But as he spoke a strange thing happened. The leading truck seemed to shoot straight up in the air and turn. A crashing, rumbling roar of destruction, and then the three trucks leapt from the track and like black shadows disappeared down the precipice.

James Nelson and Rose stood there with palpitating hearts. A terrible smashing, grinding noise told them of the trucks sliding and banging together in chaos down the steep sides of the mountains, smashing trees, loosening rocks and battering themselves to pulp before reaching the bottom of the ravine.

But these two were not concerned with the wreckage. What had been happening in the signal-box, and how had Jim fared?

When Jim opened his eyes a lamp was shining on him, and he blinked up into the anxious eyes of his father and Rose. A faint smile twisted his lips.

"Durkin—back there—freight train coupling broke—nearly too late—I'm feeling fine—" He lapsed off into oblivion.

"He'll do," the president grunted. "For the love of Mike, stand back, girl, or you'll get that dress all gory!"

"Who cares?" cried Rose, and cradled Jim's head on her lap. "He's my man!" Whereat the unconscious Jim smiled in his dreams.

(By permission of the W. & F. Film Service, Ltd., starring James Hall as Jim Nelson; Dorothy Sebastian as Rose Rogers; Walter Merrill as Tom Summers; Robert Homans as Mr. Nelson; Albert J. Smith as Durkin; Ethan Allen as Rocky Rogers.)

FIREWORK DAY.

HOW AND WHERE THE BIG BANGS ARE MADE.

WHERE do fireworks come from, boys? I never thought about it at all until I visited a certain big factory at Huddersfield and saw "Standard" fireworks actually being made.

From Land's End to John o' Groats, November 5th spells fun and fireworks to every boy in the British Isles. It is the day above all others when squibs and rockets are let off without hindrance, and the "man in blue" is obligingly blind and deaf to the doings of youthful disturbers of the peace.

To provide one night's entertainment, the entire staff of several large firms in different parts of England are kept busy throughout the year. The Standard Fireworks firm in Yorkshire—the county in which Guy Fawkes was born—employs over four hundred people all the year round, and it has depots in London, Manchester, Newcastle, Cardiff, and Southampton which bear a strong likeness to munition works.

No one seems to know who was the actual inventor of fireworks—some say they began with the Romans, and others think that the Chinese had a good deal to do with their origin. Bonfires have been used as a signal of rejoicing from the earliest days, but a bonfire is a tame affair compared with the startling effects obtained from the fireworks of to-day.

A knowledge of saltpetre, gunpowder, and other inflammable substances was brought to England by the Crusaders from the East, and the chemists of that time evidently made some successful experiments with these materials in the years that followed, for a firework display was given at the wedding of King Henry VII, and one of the features of the celebration was a red firework dragon which spouted flames.

Dragons seem to have been popular in England in those times. A firework display given on the occasion of another Royal wedding—that of the daughter of King James—illustrated the story of St. George and the Dragon. It was performed by Army gunners, and was dangerous business even for these men, as their knowledge of the explosives they were handling must have been very incomplete.

Provided that the fireworks come from a reputable maker, such as Standard Fireworks, Limited, and that the instructions accompanying them are carefully followed, a modern firework display is exciting enough for anyone without being in the least dangerous. Remember, though, that you can hardly blame the make if trouble results from holding a firework labelled "Not to be held in the hand." The head of the Standard Firework firm made that very plain.

He also told me he calculates that about half a million of money is spent every year on Guy Fawkes Day on the purchase of fireworks, and you can imagine what a great deal this means, especially as the great majority of fireworks sold are the cheap varieties, ranging in price from one halfpenny to sixpence.

If you want the best fireworks, boys, insist on the "Standard" brand!

October 21st, 1921.

"The Hunchback of Notre Dame."

(Continued from page 26.)

But the girl would have none of the rascal and was now striving desperately to keep him at a distance as he tried to take her in his arms and kiss her.

"Leave me alone, you canaille!" she screamed in terror. "Leave me alone! Oh, help! Help!"

With a bellow of rage, Quasimodo suddenly flung himself forward, clutched fiercely at Jehan's throat and bore him backwards over Esmeralda's bed. No heed of Jehan's wild cries and pleadings did he take—a red mist was before the hunchback's rolling eye—in his brain the wild urge to revenge himself for the thrashing he had had for helping this man in his fell attempt to kidnap Esmeralda that fatal night.

His fingers pressed savagely on the whimpering man's windpipe, while Esmeralda crouched back in terror, covering her eyes with her hands to shut out the grim sight.

Eyes bloodshot and goggling hideously in their sockets, Jehan made one last vain effort for his life. But the hunchback's grip was relentless, and a moment later the rascal gave a choking sob and went strangely limp.

The sound of splintering wood came up from below, and with a sudden cry of rage, Quasimodo released his grip on his victim's throat and hobbled out to the balcony. Esmeralda, fear clutching at her heart, face white as chalk, followed him, and she shuddered as she saw him dancing in his mad fury, first on one leg and then on the other, as he peered over the stone balustrade.

The cathedral door was giving now under the sustained blows of the battering-ram and the axes of the mob below.

Where were the soldiers? Quasimodo cursed that they should be so long delayed.

But Clopin and his dogs should not get into the cathedral without paying a heavy price. A wild chuckle burst from the hunchback's lips as he cast his staring eye on the large blocks of masonry a little further along the balcony and on the two large melting-pots beyond them. Almost he blessed the fact that the cathedral was under repairs—these huge blocks of stone, which were to replace slabs that were crumbling with age, and the lead in the melting-pots would make formidable weapons to turn against the invaders.

In another moment Quasimodo had seized one of the huge blocks, and, though it called for tremendous strength, he somehow got it to the balustrade and thrust it over. Down it went, crushing some half-dozen or so of the clamouring men around the cathedral door, causing others to cry out in alarm at this sudden and unexpected blow that had been dealt them.

Block after block hurtled down upon the insurgents, and always they took their toll; then, cackling hideously, Quasimodo lit the brushwood that was set beneath the two melting-pots, while Esmeralda watched him with horrified amazement, quite unable to move or utter a word of protest.

Again the hunchback resorted to flinging blocks of stone down on Clopin and his followers, and the missiles greatly hampered the attack on the door. But, urged on by their leader, the revolutionists swarmed forward after each fall of masonry and smashed their weapons on the splintering wood.

Then, just as the stout oak door crashed inward, Quasimodo tilted the melting-pots above and a stream of molten lead swished over the balcony, poured through embrasures in the balustrade and descended on the howling crowd below.

Wild shrieks and moans as the molten lead engulfed the revolutionists—and the terrible weapon claimed as one of its victims none other than Clopin himself.

Up on the balcony Quasimodo danced with fiendish glee as he peered down and saw the havoc he had wrought—then the sound of thundering hoofs set him cheering wildly. The King's Guard at last!

"You're saved, my pretty! You're saved!" The hunchback turned to Esmeralda as Phœbus, at the head of his regiment, galloped into the market square to engage instantly the disorganised revolutionists in a grim but one-sided battle. "Yonder comes Phœbus De Chateaupers with his fine soldiers. They'll soon settle with the rest of those dirty knaves!"

A sudden shooting pain in his chest caused Quasimodo to wince. The strenuous exertions of the past twenty minutes had greatly sapped his strength, had strained that already weakened heart. But the hunchback paid it very little heed. He shuffled away, a twisted grin on his ugly face, and a few minutes later he came to the rope that tolled the giant bell of Notre Dame. As he grasped it, another and more excruciating pain shot through him, causing him to stagger.

But only for a moment did he hesitate—he must sound the bell as a signal of the defeat of the revolutionists. A vigorous pull and the toll of the bell drowned all sounds of the battle waging down below.

For a minute or two Quasimodo dragged on the rope, his efforts ever growing weaker, then again a sharp pain stabbed his heart and he staggered drunkenly. Flat on his back he crashed, his face contorted with pain, his breath hissing in between his teeth in short gasps. A second later his body gave a convulsive shudder and then was still.

And there on the cold stone, Dom Claude and the reunited lovers, Phœbus and Esmeralda, found him when they came along to see the reason for the tolling of the bell.

Quasimodo's hoart had given out—only had the hunchback of Notre Dame tolled the bell in defeat of the revolutionists, but he had sounded his own dirge as well.

(By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring the late Lon Chaney as Quasimodo; Patsy Ruth Miller as Esmeralda; Norman Kerry as Phœbus De Chateaupers; Nigel De Brulier as Dom Claude; Brandon Hurst as Jehan; Ernest Torrence as Clopin; Tully Marshall as King Louis XI; Raymond Hatton as Gringoire.)

HALLOWE'EN AND 'THE FIFTH'!

BOY DETECTIVE OUTFITS ARE SPECIALLY HANDY AT THIS EXCITING TIME OF THE YEAR! DISGUISE OUTFITS, containing Grease Paints (Sallow or Chinese, Sunburn or Red Indian), Moustaches, Hair (assorted colours), removable Scars and Warts, Liquid for blacking out front teeth, etc., etc. TWELVE DIFFERENT ITEMS, including valuable book, "Secrets of Disguise," only 1/6. Or larger, with extra grease paints, comic beard, monocle, etc., only 2/6. REVOLVER ELECTRIC TORCH. Pull the trigger and it lights! A bargain! Only 1/2. THE RANGING RAY TORCH. Gives out a beam that can be narrowed down to a searchlight ray carrying over great distances. Only 1/11. BLACK DOMINO OUTFIT (the set you use when you round up your man!). Contents: 1. Black Domino Mask. 2. Handsome Repeater Pistol which fires bullets rapidly over 80 feet. 3. FOUR boxes of extra bullets. 4. Pair of Boy 'Tec Handcuffs (strong and well made). 5. Boys' Secret Service Gold Finish Badge. 6. Splendid Call Whistle for Outdoor Signals. Fun! Thrills! Excitement! Price complete, only 2/11. FOREIGN POSTAGE, 3d. in the shipping extra. These are all GENUINE BARGAINS. DON'T LOSE A MINUTE; SEND NOW to THE BOY DETECTIVE SUPPLY STORES, Desk BC, 32, Cathcart Street, GREENOCK.

BE TALL

Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-, Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEEBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

GROSE'S BILLIARDS AT HOME 1/- per week.

SIZE	DEPOSIT	4 monthly payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft.	10/-	6/6	26/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8/6	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	12/6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 8 in.	10/-	15/6	52/-

Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls guaranteed unbreakable, Marking Board, Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk. COMPLETE LIST FREE

BLUSHING, BE TALLER!

Increased my own height to 6ft. 3 3/4. STAMP brings FREE DETAILS. A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

300 STAMPS FOR 6d.

(Abroad 1/-, including Airpost. Barbados, Old India, Nigeria, New South Wales, Gold Coast, etc.—W.A. White, 30, Engine Lane, LYE, STOURBOROUGH.)

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Boy's Cinema

"LASCA OF THE RIO GRANDE"
AND "THE BLACK WIDOW."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 621.

EVERY TUESDAY.

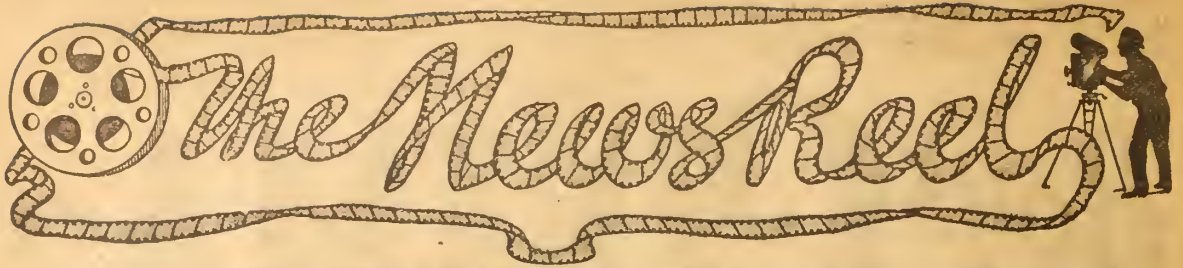

NOVEMBER 7th, 1931.

A gripping drama of a daring pilot's fight against crooks.

Starring
LLOYD HUGHES.

The SKY RAIDERS

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"The Sky Raiders."

Bob Rogers, Lloyd Hughes; Grace Devine, Marceline Day; Willard, Wheeler Oakman; Kelley, Walter Miller; Jimmy Devine, Emerson Treacy; Bradford, Ed le Saint; Pete Johnson, Kit Guard; Lefty, Ashley Buck; Hansen, Jerome K. Jerome; Louie, William H. O'Brien; Blondy, Jay Eaton; Sergeant, Dick Rush.

"Lasca of the Rio Grande."

Jose Santa Cruz, Leo Carillo; Ranger Miles Kincaid, John Mack Brown; Lasca, Dorothy Burgess; Crabapple Thompson, Slim Summer-ville; Jehoshaphat Smith, Frank Campeau.

"Heroes of the Flames."

Bob Darrow, Tim McCoy; June Madison, Marion Shockley; Mrs. Madison, Grace Cunard; Jackie Madison, Bobby Nelson; Dan Mitchell, Gayno Whitman; Pat Heeley, Monte Montague.

Pastimes Between Scenes.

Stranger than the proverbial uses of adversity are the pastimes and pursuits by which screen players, between scenes or waits on a sound stage, seek recreation.

For instance, Lupe Velez may be seen cracking a large bull whip between scenes at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer studios. She handles it like a veteran. It is both exercise and recreation for her, she says. She learned the trick from Douglas Fairbanks when she appeared in "The Gaucho" with him.

Lawrence Tibbett, opera and film star, likes to get a piece of rope from the stage hands and practice twirling it in cowboy fashion. He learned this as a boy, when he used to ride on his uncle's ranch. Tibbett was an expert cow-puncher long before anyone dreamed he was destined to become a famous baritone.

Buster Keaton, between scenes, likes to pick up any bit of machinery lying around the stage and put it together or take it apart. He has a natural aptitude for mechanics, and in fact holds a government licence as a marine engineer. As a youth, he used to serve as engineer on a Great Lakes steamer between variety engagements.

Clark Gable likes to work cross-word puzzles, or mechanical puzzles of any kind, and has infinite patience in solving them. John Gilbert reads between scenes, and so does Conrad Nagel.

Wallace Beery loves to wander about the set and play practical jokes—particularly on Cliff Edwards if the latter is available as a victim.

Joan Crawford always has a gramophone on the set where she is working, and during any wait plays records. She is intensely fond of music.

William Haines has a violinist and pianist—the regular old time "set orchestra" on his stages. Of course, they can't play "inspirational" music

November 7th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES.

CHARLES DELANEY

— IN —

"HELL BENT FOR 'FRISCO."

A young reporter plays a lone hand to solve the shooting of a young bank director on a track. Gangsters try to take him for a ride, but he foils them, securing a big scoop for his newspaper and the girl of his dreams.

"TRANSATLANTIC."

On a liner bound for England a tense drama is enacted. How a crook, for the sake of a girl, played a straight game. Starring Edmund Lowe and Lois Moran.

"TRAPPED."

A gripping drama of how the Police cunningly tricked two rascally crooks. Another true story from the notebook of William J. Burns of the U.S. Secret Service.

as was done in the days of silent pictures, but they play for him between scenes. He says it not only rests his nerves but actually helps him to concentrate and remember his lines.

Behind the Scenes.

More than once when watching the production of films at Elstree, Welwyn Garden City, and elsewhere, I have wondered what some of those who think film acting is all "honey" would say if they could but peep behind the scenes.

They would certainly look in vain for that glamour which grips so many people when the finished picture is being viewed in the comfort of a cinema. Within the studio you find yourself instead in an atmosphere which is both uninviting and unreal. Lofty bare walls surround you; entanglements of cables lying on the floors are apt to trip you if you do not mind your step; studio paraphernalia of all kinds are anywhere and everywhere.

There can be no attempt at tidiness where almost everything as well as everyone must be on the move. Carpenters are busy on half-finished "sets"; electricians are being told where and how to arrange their lights; the director is advising the artistes what to do. All this hub-bub must cease, of course, directly the whistle blows announcing that filming is to begin.

But even then the acting is by no means as simple and as straightforward as appears on the screen. The artistes may have already rehearsed their parts on the "set" a dozen times. Yet again and again a re-take is demanded. It is not only the director who may have faults to find, but the sound engineer, too. The artistes may feel weary and bored to death, but neither the camera nor the microphone must be allowed to record their real feelings. They have to keep on with the same thing until everything is O.K.

Meanwhile, there are other artistes who are not doing anything at the moment. They may have to stand about for hours in their make-up waiting for minor parts that may take no more than a few minutes to act. And this sort of thing goes on day after day from early morning till, often, 9 or 10 at night. But in the finished picture you see only the glory and the glamour that appears to surround film life.

Acting and Influenza.

Acting, if you will believe Leslie Howard, is like influenza—you can never tell when it will seize you and lay you low!

Howard was a peaceful and prosaic bank clerk in London until he was picked up in the maelstrom of the World War and thrown into the trenches, where he remained until demobilisation sent him back to "Blighty."

"I didn't know what to do or where to go," he related. "I was bewildered. All about were men looking for jobs they had forgotten how to hold. In the midst of this mad turmoil I was stricken with acting and dashed into an agent's office. There I sat for weeks and weeks, finally landing a small part in a provincial "Peg o' My Heart" touring company.

"Why I chose acting I do not know. But, like a bad attack of the 'flu, I couldn't shake it off. I knew I should be back in London at a bank office, but the acting germ had me, and I stayed through the most miserable of experiences. That I happened to succeed was mere chance."

Howard, known for his performance in "Outward Bound," "Berkeley Square," and other dramatic stage hits, is regarded as one of the outstanding men on the English or American stages. He was persuaded to join films by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer while playing a theatre engagement in Los Angeles, and played in "Never the Twain Shall Meet" and "A Free Soul."

His latest rôle is with Marion Davies in "Daughter of Luxury."

Secret drinking loses a young pilot his job and he becomes an outcast. A gang of crooks try to make use of him for daring robberies, but he fights them to regain his manhood and the girl he loves. Starring Lloyd Hughes and Marceline Day.

The Crash.

ONE evening in early autumn an aeroplane was flying high over the mountains of Southern California on its way to Mexico. Starting from a great airport near Los Angeles some hours before in bright sunshine, it had now run into mists hanging over the mountains, and every moment the fog seemed to grow thicker.

In the plane were two men. Bob Rogers, a tall, dark young fellow, reputed to be the best pilot employed at the airport, was at the controls. His friend, Jimmy Devine, sat beside him, listening to wireless messages which came through from headquarters from time to time. Jimmy was somewhat the younger of the two, of slighter build, and not so experienced as Bob, yet quite capable of taking charge of the aeroplane in any ordinary circumstances.

"Fog increasing over the Ridge Route," said Jimmy presently. "That's the last message."

"I've flown in worse fogs than this," growled Bob. "Tell 'em we're okay."

Something in Bob's tone made Jimmy glance at him thoughtfully, but he sent the message as his friend gave it.

"Devine speaking. We're going okay!"

Jimmy looked again at Bob. For some time he had been suspicious that something was wrong with his friend, and now, seeing the settled look of gloom on Bob's face, he made up his mind to speak.

"What's wrong, Bob?" he asked.

Bob Rogers did not reply. His whole attention seemed to be concentrated on the controls, but a frown spread over his face at Jimmy's question.

"Didn't I see you talking to Grace before we started?" asked Jimmy.

"Have you two had a quarrel?"

Grace was Jimmy's sister, and Bob

Rogers was in love with her, as Jimmy well knew. From the expression of the pilot's face as his friend asked the question, it was quite obvious that Jimmy had guessed the reason for Bob's ill-humour.

"We have, if you must know!" snarled Bob fiercely. "And now suppose you mind your own business."

"I reckon this is my business," retorted Jimmy angrily. "You quarrelled over the same thing, as usual, of course. Why don't you leave the stuff alone, Bob? You'll ruin your career if you keep on drinking at the rate you have been doing."

"Shut your trap!" howled Bob, all the more angry because he knew that Jimmy had spoken the exact truth. "I've had enough of it from your sister, and I'm not taking any sermons from you."

Jimmy did not reply, for at that moment came another wireless message from the airport.

"Thicker fog ahead," he announced ruefully, after listening to the report.

"Here, take over," growled Bob, as though he had not heard a word of the message. "I'm going to have a drink."

"Not now, Bob!" exclaimed Jimmy in astonished tones. "You can't mean it. You know I ain't had any experience of flying in a fog."

"Take the controls, I tell you!" snarled Bob. "I'm in command on this trip, and you'll do as I tell you!"

Seeing no help for it, Jimmy gave way and slipped into the pilot's seat, while Bob went into the small cabin just behind, found a bottle and glass, and began to drink.

Headquarters called again, and Jimmy answered:

"We're still on our course. Fog? Yes, getting worse, but we're going right on."

Jimmy Devine had replied confidently enough, but as time went on he found more and more difficulty in keeping on the course. The fog bothered him a great deal, and as it became thicker and thicker he became confused, and began to fumble uneasily with the controls.

Suddenly the aeroplane tilted into a steep dive, Jimmy wrenched desperately at the levers, but his nerve had gone, and he failed to force the machine out of the dive. Down they went, ever more and more steeply, and Jimmy screamed in frenzied accents for his friend.

"Bob, we're out of control! Bob! Bob!"

Bob Rogers crawled out of the cabin, roused at last by the sensation of the falling plane. He was far too late. Before he could grasp the controls the inevitable crash had come. With a tremendous impact the unfortunate craft came down at the edge of a wood on the mountain side, and from the crumpled wreckage there rose almost at once a flicker of flame.

It seemed impossible that the occupants of the machine could have survived such a crash, and yet a moment after the plane came to the ground a figure crawled from beneath it. Bob Rogers staggered to his feet, moved away a few paces uncertainly, and gazed stupidly at the wreckage. The shock had sobered him, but he was dazed, and a minute or two passed before he realised that there was no sign of Jimmy Devine.

The flames rose higher, and Bob suddenly rushed back to the wrecked plane to search for his friend. A still form lay in the midst of the heap of splintered metal, and Bob, with a great effort, succeeded in pulling Jimmy out.

Meanwhile, repeated calls from headquarters had obtained no reply from the aeroplane, and at last the operator turned to Mr. Willard, the manager of the airport, who had just come in.

"I'm afraid there's something wrong, sir," he remarked. "Last thing I heard was a sort of scream, 'We're out of control!' I can't get them now. I'm afraid they've crashed."

"I can hardly think that," said Willard. "Rogers is one of the best pilots we have. Still, if you can't get an answer, I'll send out another plane to look for them."

A few minutes later a fast machine took off, and flew out over the Ridge Route. A strong wind had by this time cleared the fog from the mountain slopes, and in less than two hours the plane reached the scene of the crash. Creeping above the wreckage, the pilot was about to make a landing when his observer touched him on the shoulder.

"Look over there!" he cried, pointing to some low ground at the base of the mountain.

The pilot looked, and saw, some three miles away, a man stumbling slowly along, carrying an inert form across his shoulders. Soon the rescuers had landed close alongside Bob Rogers, who had carried Jimmy a long distance, seeking in vain for some place where he could obtain help.

Swiftly the plane returned to the airport, carrying both the injured men. Bob Rogers was not badly hurt. Save for a few cuts and bruises, he was little the worse for the crash; but he knew that Jimmy Devine had not come off so easily.

Jimmy Devine had not recovered consciousness, and when the doctor saw him it was evident that the young pilot's condition was very serious indeed.

"You had better send for his relatives at once," said the doctor gravely, when he had concluded his examination of Jimmy's injuries.

The manager rang up Grace Devine, telling her little beyond that her brother had met with a slight accident, and soon the girl came along in some alarm. Outside the door of the hospital ward she saw Bob Rogers, who was standing there uneasily, waiting for news.

"Thank Heaven you're safe, Bob!" she exclaimed. "Where's Jimmy? Is he much hurt?"

"He's in there," muttered Bob, and when Grace saw the haunting look of fear in his face she guessed at once that her brother must be seriously injured. She rushed at once into the ward, and after a moment Bob followed her slowly.

An anxious group surrounded Jimmy Devine's bed as Bob crept in to stand at the foot. The doctor was bending over the injured pilot, while Grace had seated herself on the bed, with Willard, the manager, standing behind her. Bradford, the assistant manager, had also come in.

"How is he, doctor?" asked Grace in a whisper. "I want to know the truth." "There's not much hope, I'm afraid," replied the doctor very gravely. "I am not even sure that he will regain consciousness."

A minute or two later, however, Jimmy opened his eyes.

"Guess I'm through, doc," he muttered feebly; and then, closing his eyes again, he lay still.

Bob Rogers cast one agonised glance at his friend; but the doctor signed to all of them to go out, and outside the door Willard tackled the unfortunate pilot at once.

"What's happened, Rogers? Who was at the controls when you crashed?"

"I had charge of the ship, hadn't I?" growled Bob.

"If'n! And is that all you have to say?"

"Yes," replied Bob shortly.

"I can guess what happened," commented the manager. "Drunk again, eh? Well, Rogers, you've been warned before. This time you're through. We shall not need your services again, and your licence will be cancelled."

The manager turned to walk away, while Bob Rogers stumbled out, disgraced and without a job, his mind in a whirl. But, uppermost in his thoughts was the terrible idea that his friend Jimmy Devine lay at death's door, and that Jimmy was dying through his fault.

Bob walked dazedly across the flying field towards the planes, and as he went another pilot, Pete Johnson by name, came up to him.

"Say, I don't believe you crashed into that mountain, Bob," said Pete. "Was Jimmy steering?"

Bob made no reply. He walked up to an old aeroplane, examined it, and got in.

"Where are you going, Bob?" asked Pete in astonishment.

"Don't know where I'm going," said Bob shortly, and a few minutes later he was high in the air, flying away towards the south.

A Leap for Life.

IT was a week or so later that Bob Rogers walked slowly along the street of a small town in the north of Mexico. His eyes were bent upon the ground, his face was haggard, and he had the appearance of a man brooding continually over dark thoughts. How he had reached Mexico he hardly knew. Without any prospect of a job, and with hardly any money left, he had come to the end, he thought.

"I'll go in here and have a drink!" he muttered to himself as he passed a saloon. "Then I'll go and end it, somehow."

He turned into the saloon, grim thoughts of suicide in his mind. Suddenly, to Bob's great surprise, a voice hailed him in English. He glanced towards the bar, where he saw several Americans, one of whom he recognised as a man named Kelley, once a pilot at the airport.

"Hallo, Rogers! What are you doing down here?" cried Kelley.

"Nothing particular, Kelley," replied Bob. "I didn't know you had fetched up in Mexico, either."

"I heard some talk of you getting into a jam," remarked Kelley. "Come and have a drink. I've got a job for you, I reckon. I happen to want a good pilot just now."

"Want me to pilot a plane, do you?" asked Bob, accepting the drink.

"Sure! I want you to pilot a plane up north," replied Kelley. "You can earn real money at this job. Are you interested?"

Bob Rogers hesitated, for Kelley had not the best of reputations, and he had left the airport some months before in suspicious circumstances. Moreover, the four men who were with him were shifty-looking individuals to whom the young pilot took an instant dislike. Still, Bob knew nothing certain to Kelley's discredit, and a job of some sort he must get.

"Okay, I'm on!" said Bob at length.

"When do you want to start?" "Early to-morrow morning," replied Kelley. "Come over now and I'll show you my plane."

The next morning found Bob Rogers seated once more at the controls of an aeroplane, flying steadily towards the north. Kelley had told him nothing of the object of the journey, beyond that he wished to make for Los Angeles, but as Bob glanced from time to time at his employer and the men with him, he felt very doubtful as to whether their business was of a legitimate kind. Presently he overheard some words which made him still more doubtful.

"Think we shall be in time?" said one of the men to Kelley.

"I guess so," replied Kelley. "The express leaves this afternoon at one o'clock. We shall do it easily enough."

"The pilot will have a gun, I suppose," remarked another man.

"Ain't we got guns?" growled Kelley.

"Time to tell that fellow, ain't it?" said a third man, a thin, wiry-looking individual known as "Louie."

"Not yet," muttered Kelley angrily in a low tone.

"What have you got to tell me?" asked Bob, turning round to the men.

"Nothing special—yet," replied Kelley, somewhat confused.

"He'll have to know, Kelley," snarled Louie, "and you might as well tell him now, or I will. We're after the dollars in the express plane that leaves the airport to-day, an' we're goin' to get 'em, too. You join in with us, an' get your share, Rogers."

"Going to join us, Rogers?" asked Kelley, as Bob made no reply. "There's money in this job, as I told you, and you ain't going to earn much money any other way, since that jam you got into. What d'you say?"

Still Bob Rogers did not speak, and the crooks felt the plane swinging round again towards the south. Instantly Kelley and his gang rose to their feet, their faces glaring angrily, while each man felt for his gun.

"No, you don't!" howled Kelley, springing upon Bob and plucking him from the pilot's seat. "Take care of him, boys."

Kelley seized the controls and turned the plane once more towards the airport, while Bob Rogers, helpless in the grip of the four angry crooks, was thrown roughly into a corner of the cabin. Louie, gun in hand, kept a wary eye upon him, and Bob lay quiet, thinking hard.

"Keep still!" growled Louie. "I'll fill you with lead if you don't."

"A better way would be to drop him overboard," remarked "Blondy," another of the crooks. "I reckon it would be a fine sight to see a fellow drop six thousand feet."

"We're over the town!" cried Kelley presently, and the gangsters turned their attention for a moment from their captive. Beneath them lay the airport, and their eager gaze was at once focused on the flying field, where stood a large aeroplane round which a number of men were gathered.

Bob Rogers saw his opportunity in a flash. As he lay still in the corner of the cabin, he had observed a parachute on the other side, and near it a small door. The moment Louie turned his head, Bob sprang to his feet, and in one stride he had seized the parachute. The next second he had hurled himself through the door, and before the astonished crooks had realised what he was doing, Bob Rogers was hurtling down to earth.

He had taken a chance with the parachute, and even as he pulled the ring he wondered whether the folds above him would open, or whether Blondy would have his wish, and see a fellow drop like a stone for six thousand feet. The parachute opened, and Bob's furious downward flight changed to a gentle glide earthwards.

"He's jumped for it!" howled Louie angrily. "Swing her down, Kelley, and I'll take a shot at him."

"Talk sense!" sneered Kelley. "If you do that, you'll give the game away."

"He'll give us away if he gets to the field!" shouted Louie wildly, fidgeting impatiently with his gun.

"He'll be too late, I reckon," said another of the crooks, Hansen by name, peering out. "The express is ready to start."

A strong wind helped the parachute towards the flying field, and Bob Rogers came gently to earth a few hundred yards from the express, just as the mechanics drew back for it to start.

Disentangling himself from the clinging folds of the parachute, Bob rose to his feet and ran at full speed for the field, shouting as he went. The group around the express caught sight of him, and stared in astonishment at the hurrying figure.

"Stop! Stop!" yelled Bob. "Danger!" "Wait a moment," said Mr. Bradford to the pilot of the express. "I must see what that fellow means."

"It's Bob Rogers!" cried a dozen voices as the ex-pilot ran up.

"What's the matter, Rogers?" asked Bradford as Bob reached his side.

"Why, that 'plane up there!" gasped Bob. "There's a gang of crooks in it, and they plan to follow the express and steal the dollars."

"How do you know that?" demanded Bradford suspiciously.

"I was in the 'plane with 'em," said Bob, "but I didn't know what they were after until ten minutes ago. Then I took a chance on the parachute, and jumped."

"I saw someone jump from that 'plane, sir," remarked a mechanic, turning to Bradford eagerly.

"They're going off!" cried another mechanic, looking up at the strange 'plane.

It was true enough. Through their glasses the crooks had watched Rogers run up to the express, and they knew then that the game was up. Kelley turned the aeroplane, and headed away for the south, while the other gangsters commented bitterly on his management of the affair.

"We've sure said a lot, Kelley," remarked Louie finally, "but we ain't said as much as the boss will. I sure don't envy you when you meet him!"

And Kelley cursing his unlucky idea of enlisting the services of Bob Rogers, was too much cast down even to answer.

The New Mechanic.

"WELL, boss, it wasn't our fault," said Kelley plaintively. "We didn't guess the guy was going to jump."

"I'd have plugged him before he reached ground, only Kelley stopped me," grumbled Louie.

"Yes, that's it. You're all too fast with your guns and not fast enough with your brains," growled the tall, good-looking man to whom these remarks were addressed as he glared angrily from one to the other.

Kelley had not taken the 'plane very far after his failure to intercept the express. He had left it in the gang's secret hiding-place, not many miles from the air port, and now, the next morning, the crooks had assembled in their apartment on the outskirts of the town. The boss had come to meet them, very angry at their failure on the previous day, and, as Louie had guessed, Kelley heard some caustic comments on his bad management of the affair.

"What could we have done but make a get-away?" wailed Kelley.

"That's not the point," thundered the boss. "I gave you all the information, and you've no more brains than to come right over the town. You knew when the express was leaving, and you knew the way it was going. Why didn't you wait for it along the route?"

"Didn't think of it," muttered Kelley.

"As I said. No brains," came the sneering reply. "And anyone but a fool would have found out if Rogers would stand in with us before bringing him along. Why did you have him to pilot the 'plane, anyway?"

"He's a better pilot than any of us," replied Kelley.

"No doubt," said the boss, "but you were a fool to bring him, all the same. Now get this. Next time I'll do the thinking, and you'll do exactly what I tell you."

"Wish I'd plugged that guy," mourned Louie from a corner, and the boss instantly turned on him in fierce anger.

"There'll be no killing," he cried. "There's too much at stake to take such risks!"

"Okay, boss," muttered Louie sullenly, "but surely you ain't goin' to let that guy Rogers get away with it like this?"

"No," replied the boss. "I'm putting Rogers where I can get him when I want him. You'll see."

"Where is he now?" asked Kelley.

"That's my business," came the sharp retort, and the boss of the gang went out without saying anything as to Bob's whereabouts, an omission which afterwards caused the crooks considerable trouble.

Bob Rogers was still at the airport. He told his story in full to Mr. Bradford, who went off to report to the manager, asking Bob to wait.

"Are you out of a job, Rogers?" asked Bradford when he came back.

"Guess I am," replied Bob ruefully. "I thought I'd got one with Kelley before I know he was a crook, but —"

"How would you like to work here as a mechanic?" interrupted Bradford. "I've asked Mr. Willard, and he agrees."

"Thank you, Mr. Bradford," said Bob slowly. "I'll think it over."

Bob Rogers presently walked across the flying fields, wondering whether Jimmy Devine was still alive. He had not dared to ask Mr. Bradford, for he felt almost sure that the reply would be that his friend was dead. And, if so, how could Bob accept a job as mechanic at the airport, where he would certainly meet Grace Devine again?

Presently someone hailed him. "Why, if it ain't Bob Rogers! Glad to see you, Bob. How are you?"

"Hallo, Pete," said Bob, recognising the pilot who had seen him fly off in despair on the day of the crash.

"Have you come back to see Jimmy?" asked Pete.

"To see—Jimmy?" gasped Bob, staring at the speaker in mingled astonishment and hope. "Then he isn't—he isn't—"

"How is he, doctor?" asked Grace, in a whisper. "I want to know the truth."

"Of course not!" cried Pete cheerfully. "He's almost well now. Didn't you know?"

"No, I hadn't heard," said Boh, "but I'm sure glad to hear he's better." "He's in that office over there," remarked Pete, pointing to the other side of the field. "You go right over and see him."

Bob Rogers walked joyfully across to the office, his natural cheery self once more. His gloom had vanished as though it had never existed, and he walked eagerly in to find his friend. Sure enough, Jimmy Devine was there, looking a little shaky and pale, but otherwise none the worse for the accident.

"Thank Heaven you're better, Jimmy!" cried Bob as he came in. "I'd never have forgiven myself if you hadn't pulled round."

"Nonsense, Boh!" said Jimmy. "I'm okay now, and, anyway, I let the ship crash, not you. I was sorry you went away. What are you doing now?"

"Bradford says I can come back as a mechanic if I like," replied Bob.

"It would be a bad break after being the crack pilot, but I reckon you'd better do it," said Jimmy thoughtfully, putting his hand on Bob's shoulder. "You see, you've got to make good, and then you'll get back your pilot's licence after a time."

"I told him I'd think it over," remarked Boh.

"You accept, Bob," urged Jimmy earnestly. "I want you here, and—well, Grace will be here soon. She'll tell you what she wants herself."

A car drew up outside as he spoke. "There she is. Go and bring her in," said Jimmy, hiding a smile as Bob got up, looking very dubious.

He went out slowly, wondering what sort of a greeting he was likely to get, but he soon discovered that there was no need for worry.

"Hallo, Bob!" cried Grace brightly. "I heard you had come back. You're looking well. Tell me where you've been and why you went away."

"Listen, Grace," said Bob earnestly. "I took a chance with Jimmy, and I thought you wouldn't want to see me again, so I went off to Mexico out of the way."

"I'm glad you've had the pluck to come back again," replied Grace, and she smiled to herself as Bob's face flushed red. "Now you've come back you're going to stay, of course."

"Yes," said Bob hastily, making up his mind to accept the job as mechanic. "I'm going on as a mechanic, and I'm going to work to get my licence back. And I'll make you a promise, Grace. I'm through with the drink from now on."

"Oh, Bob," cried Grace joyfully, "that's the best news I've heard since they told me Jimmy would get better!"

They moved towards the door, and as they reached it the manager came out. Bob had not seen him since the day of the crash, and the harsh manner in which Willard had dismissed him still rankled in his mind.

The manager glanced at Grace and Bob, and a flicker of annoyance passed over his face. His voice sounded cordial enough, however, as he spoke.

"Hallo, Rogers, you're quite a stranger!"

"Always will be—with some people," replied Boh coolly, passing on with the girl to rejoin Jimmy in the office.

"Have you taken any 'planes out yet, Jimmy?" asked Bob after a while.

"I've had one or two short flights," replied his friend. "I think they'll be sending me on a longer trip next week if the doctor will pass me for it."

November 7th, 1931.

Presently Bob went off to the flying field to find Mr. Bradford.

"Is that mechanic's job still open?" he asked when he met the assistant-manager.

"Sure, Rogers," came the reply. "You can take it right now."

"Thank you very much, Mr. Bradford," cried Bob. "I will."

And Bob Rogers, the new mechanic, ran off to the aeroplane sheds to get on with the job.

Captured.

A FEW evenings later, as Bob Rogers was leaving the flying field after a hard day's work, he happened to pass near a 'plane at rest upon the ground not far from the shed in which he was employed. Two men stood just behind the machine, talking, and Bob glanced casually at them as he went by. It was getting dark, but there was light enough for the new mechanic to recognise the men.

"That's Kelley," muttered Bob, instantly drawing back behind the 'plane. "What's he hanging around here for, I wonder?"

The men had, apparently, not noticed Bob, and they went on talking quietly.

"The express goes in the morning, you say?" asked Kelley eagerly.

"Sure, at ten o'clock," replied the other man, who was one of the mechanics employed at the flying field.

"We'd better get on to the boss, then, and see what he thinks about trying again. Maybe we'll have better luck this time. Come on, let's beat it!"

The two men made off, and Bob Rogers, after a moment's pause, followed them, convinced that the crooks were once again planning to rob the express. He wondered what to do, for Willard and Bradford had both gone home, he thought, and yet somehow he must get in touch with one or the other, or with the police, and that without delay. As he reached the road, a car drew up, and he saw Grace Devine at the wheel. Jimmy was at her side, and he sprang out to hail Bob cheerfully.

"Hallo, Bob! I'm just going to look over the express. I'm taking her off in the morning. Stay and talk to Grace. I'll see you presently."

"Just a minute, Jimmy," cried Bob. "I've got something important to tell you."

"Presently," replied Jimmy, running off, and Bob had perforce to turn to Grace. For a moment he was tempted to tell her what he had heard Kelley say, but he reflected that the news would rouse her fears for the safety of her brother, and he decided to say nothing until he had seen the manager or the police.

"Have you got your new pilot's licence yet, Bob?" asked Grace eagerly.

"No, not yet," replied Bob. "I don't expect to get it for some while."

"I hope you soon will," said Grace earnestly. "How do you like working as a mechanic?"

"It's a good job—a man's job, and I like it well enough," answered Bob. "I'd sooner be flying, though, any day."

Bob Rogers, talking to the girl he loved, had no eyes for anyone but her. He failed to observe that Kelley and his companions had stopped a little way down the road. Nor did he notice that a tall man had come up, and that all three were regarding him curiously. Presently the newcomer whispered to Kelley, and the crook started up a car, and slid away down the road.

"You'll soon be flying again, Bob," said Grace, "but after that crash I don't know—I think I'd almost rather you stayed on the ground, even though you were only a mechanic."

"Do you care so much for me?" whispered Bob. "Listen, Grace, I want to tell you something. I—"

"Good evening, Miss Devine," said a voice, and the two young people started as Willard suddenly appeared at the side of the car. The manager smiled at Grace, but completely ignored her companion, and the girl replied very coldly: "Good evening, Mr. Willard. You quite startled us, coming up quietly like that."

"I called at your house," said the manager, "and I was told you had come along here. I wanted to remind you of that dance this evening. You said you might perhaps do me the honour of allowing me to take you. May I hope you will come?"

"I am sorry, Mr. Willard," replied Grace in her iciest tones, for she was much annoyed at the interruption of what promised to be a most interesting conversation with Bob. "I am very busy to-night. I'll come some other night, perhaps."

"Good-night, Grace," said Bob Rogers suddenly, walking off.

"Oh, Bob, please!" called the girl. "Come back, I want you to wait for Jimmy."

Bob Rogers did not return, for at the sight of Willard an unreasoning jealousy had flared up in him. He had never liked the manager, and Willard's obvious admiration of Grace Devine annoyed him beyond measure.

"I won't tell that fellow about Kelley," he muttered. "I'll find Bradford and tell him."

Getting into a small car which one of the pilots had lent him, Bob drove off down the road towards the town. A quarter of a mile away he passed another car which was moving slowly along, but he took no notice of it. He was already ashamed of the abrupt way in which he had left Grace, and he slackened speed, almost inclined to return and apologise for his behaviour.

"Hey, Rogers, stop!" came a menacing voice just behind him. Bob looked round in surprise, and saw the car which he had just passed. In it was Kelley, gun in hand, and Bob instantly stepped on the gas. A bullet sang past his head as his car rushed on, with the gangsters in full chase. Try as he would, Bob could not shake off the crooks, and their car kept close behind him.

"That's done it, sure!" groaned Bob a moment later, for a bullet crashed into his back tyre, which collapsed with a hissing of escaping air. The car slowed down and the gangsters drew alongside in triumph.

Bob saw that escape was out of the question, for he was on a lonely stretch of road, and there was no one in sight. He pulled up, and the crooks were soon at the side of his car.

"So you've been spying around on us, have you, Rogers?" cried Kelley angrily.

"Lucky I happened to spot you talking to that girl. Think you can stop us again, do you?"

"It doesn't take much to stop a guy like you," replied Bob contemptuously.

"You'll find you can't stop us this time," growled Kelley. "Out with him, boys, and we'll take him to our place right now, and tie him up."

"You'd better let me put a bullet through him," came the plaintive voice of Louie, who stood behind Bob, gun in hand, evidently itching to pull the trigger.

"None of that, Louie," growled Kelley. "The boss said no shooting, and what he says goes."

"Boss? What boss?" cried Bob in surprise, for he had imagined Kelley to be the leader of the gang.

"You shut your mouth!" snarled Kelley. "Get him out, boys."

Louie jammed his gun into Bob's back, and though the young airman had heard Kelley forbid his follower to shoot, he did not feel any too certain that the gangster would obey. He attempted no resistance, and the crooks forced him into their car. Kelley drove rapidly down the road, and soon reached the gang's apartment on the outskirts of the town.

"We've got him, boys!" cried Kelley jubilantly as he pushed his captive into a room on the first floor of the house. The other members of the gang were already there, and they smiled significantly as they looked at Bob.

"What d'you mean to do with the guy, now you've got him?" asked Blondy, toying carelessly with an automatic.

"He can stay here until we come back from that little trip of ours to-morrow, I reckon," said Kelley, "but I'll ask the boss first."

"We are going to-morrow, then?" asked another of the gang, an unpleasant-looking individual known as "Lefty."

"Sure we are, if the boss says so, and I think he will," replied Kelley.

"So you're going to try again, are you?" remarked Boh quietly.

"Very slick bit of thinking, that," sneered Kelley. "If we go to-morrow we shall not have the pleasure of your company. We're leaving here in ten minutes, and there's only five of us going."

"Five!" said Bob, looking round at the scowling gangsters. "You're reckoning to leave me here alone, eh?"

"Why not?" asked Kelley. "You don't think you can bust out of here, do you? Hansen used to be a sailor, and he'll tie you up to rights."

"Sure, Kelley," remarked Hansen. "You leave that to me." At that moment the telephone bell rang.

"Watch Rogers, boys," ordered Kelley. "That's the boss calling. I'll just tell him the news."

"Say, Kelley," cried Louie eagerly, "just ask the boss if I can shoot this guy Rogers? I reckon we'll be safer if I do."

The Police Take a Hand.

KELLEY walked across the room to answer the telephone call, and Bob wondered whether he might now get some clue to the identity of the mysterious "boss." But, as he almost expected, Kelley was too cunning to mention any name.

"That you, boss?" said the crook. "Yes, we've got him safe enough. What shall we do with him? Louie wants— Okay, boss, okay, I'll see he doesn't. Tie him up? Hansen will see to that, and we'll be along in a few minutes."

Kelley hung up the receiver, and turned to Louie with a grin.

"The boss guessed what you wanted to do, Louie," he remarked, "and he said some things about you that I won't repeat. You're not to use your gun on Rogers—or anyone else, if it comes to that. Not without orders from the boss, anyway. Got that?"

"I've got it," said Louie sulkily. "Don't quite know why I carry a gun—it ain't ever used."

Bob Rogers had stood quietly all this time, but as Kelley and Louie were talking he sprang suddenly into swift action. Leaping straight at Blondy, who happened to be nearest, he sent the crook down with a flush hit to the jaw. As the gangster fell, Bob grabbed his gun and, with a swift jerk of the wrist, he sent it hurtling through the window into the street below.

Louie's automatic instantly covered Bob, but Kelley sprang forward and pushed down his follower's arm before he could press the trigger.

"No shooting, you young fool!" he shouted.

"I'm going to plug him, Kelley!" yelled Louie. "Lemme go!"

"The cops will be here in a minute," cried Kelley furiously. "Did you see that gun go through the window? On him, boys!"

Kelley hurled himself at Bob, but staggered back as the young airman's fist connected with his chin. Hansen and Lefty sprang at Bob from the other side, the former grabbing him round the waist, while Lefty ran into Bob's right, which took him on the nose. Lefty sat down and took no interest in the proceedings for some moments, but Blondy rose to his feet and joined in the fray, eager to revenge that crack on the jaw.

Louie had reluctantly put away his gun, and he hovered on the outskirts of the fight, seeking for some chance to help. The centre of the floor was a whirling mass of struggling men for the next two minutes, but at length Bob broke loose, hurling Kelley and Hansen right and left. The young airman ran for the door, but he had not taken three strides before he fell over Louie's foot, opportunely placed in his way by the wily gangster.

Bob Rogers went down, and Louie fell on top of him. Before Bob could extricate himself from the crook's grasp, the rest of the gang swooped upon him, and in another moment he was securely held, while Hansen got to work with a rope.

When he had seen that Bob was firmly tied up, Kelley stepped over to the window and looked out.

"Quick, boys!" he cried. "I can see two cops prowling along the street."

In another moment Bob Rogers, so tightly roped that he could move neither hand nor foot, had been securely gagged and thrust roughly into a cupboard at the back of the room. Having thus disposed of the young airman, the gangsters grouped themselves round the piano, all but Lefty, who had retired to the bath-room to administer first aid to his injured nose. He came back after a few minutes, somewhat recovered, to be greeted with amused grins by his companions.

"No shooting, you young fool!" he shouted.

Blondy, who fancied himself as a musician, seated himself at the piano and began to play, and soon the gangsters, led by Hansen, were roaring the chorus of a sea-shanty as tunefully as they could. They were interrupted by a thunderous knock at the door. Louie went to open it, and saw, as he expected, two policemen.

The cops came in and looked around. The gangsters gazed silently at them, trying to assume as innocent and peaceful an appearance as they could. Blondy began to play soft music, but the policemen were not to be taken in.

"Just a little musical evening, I see," remarked one of them, a sergeant, in a genial tone. "Very nice, I must say, only you sang that shanty a bit too loud, I reckon."

"Maybe we did," said Louie, "but "That your gun?" barked the sergeant, producing the weapon which Bob had thrown out of the window.

"No, sir, I never saw it before," replied Louie in well-acted surprise.

"Any of you nightingales own that gun?" asked the sergeant, with a piercing glance at the crooks.

"No, sir," cried the gangsters in chorus, shaking their heads indignantly at the notion that any gun could possibly belong to them.

"That gun was thrown out of this apartment," remarked the sergeant in a significant tone. "I found it in the street right now, so quit your kidding. It belongs to one of you guys, and I'm asking you what the game is."

"Thrown out of our apartment?" exclaimed Kelley, rather over-acting in indignant astonishment. "You must sure have made a mistake, sergeant. We ain't had guns on this building this long while."

"Says you!" sneered the cop, swiftly producing his automatic. "Put 'em up, an' keep 'em up! Mike," he added to the man with him, "you take a look round."

"Here's a window smashed," said Mike, after a look round the room. "That's where the gun went through, sergeant."

"Of course," remarked the sergeant. "I'm taking this bunch down to the station, and they can explain this business to the captain. Get their guns off 'em, Mike, and make it slipper. I'm in a hurry!"

All five crooks still had their hands above their heads as Mike came forward to search for their guns. He did not get them, for as soon as the policemen had entered, Hansen had posted himself conveniently near the electric light switch. Now he stumbled backwards and with a swift movement put the room in darkness.

Without a second's hesitation the five crooks dived headlong for the door, stooping low as they went. The cops fired at random into the darkness, and Kelley, who was last, felt a bullet sear his wrist as he rushed out. The others were not touched, and they tore down the stairs with the police at their heels. Into their car they tumbled, and Blondy started her up just as the sergeant reached the pavement. In another second they were beyond the reach of the policemen, who fired a shot or two after them, but without effect.

"Well, Mike," said the sergeant, "they've beaten us this time, but I'll have 'em yet."

"Sure, sergeant," remarked Mike loyally, though he was by no means sure in his own mind. "What do we do now? Shall I go and search that apartment?"

For a moment Bob's fate trembled in the balance. For a moment the carefully laid plot of the crooks to rob the express seemed likely to be foiled. The sergeant hesitated, half-turned to go back to the house, and then appeared to make up his mind not to return.

"You go and tell the landlady to lock up the apartment," he said. "I'm going down to the station to tell the captain, and we'll get on the track of those guys. You come down after me."

"Okay, chief," replied Mike, going back to the door. He gave the message to the landlady, saw her lock up the apartment, warned her not to allow anyone to enter until the police returned, and then followed the sergeant to the station.

Meanwhile, Bob Rogers lay helpless in the cupboard, unable to move and completely exhausted after his fierce struggle with the crooks. He heard the voices of the gangsters raised in song, then a sudden silence, and finally the sound of guns. He began to hope that the police were taking a hand in the game, thinking that perhaps the automatic he had thrown out of the window had been found by a cop.

Desperately he strove to make some noise which might attract attention to his plight, but in vain. Hansen had done his work too well, and Bob could not utter a sound, could not even drum with his heels on the floor, so thoroughly had the ex-sailor trussed him up.

The sound of the guns died away, and silence succeeded. Bob strained his ears to listen, hoping against hope that the police would search the rooms. No sound came, and gradually Bob's hopes faded, and he began to give way to despair.

Through the long hours of the night the young airman lay where the crooks had thrown him. Once or twice at first he tried to wriggle himself loose from the ropes, but he presently gave up the attempt as hopeless. His thoughts were very bitter as the night wore on. The express was due to leave in a few hours, the gangsters had planned to rob it, and he was powerless to help. Bob had foiled Kelley's first attempt, but it did not seem likely that he could stop the crook this time.

And Jimmy Devine, his friend, was to be the pilot of the express!

Too Late!

AN hour before the express was due to leave the airport on the following day, a solitary plane glided down and made a landing on a field some five miles out of the town. As the machine came to rest in the middle of the field, a car drew up on a road near by, and a tall dark man got out of it. Walking across to the plane, he saw Kelley leaning out.

"I've just been talking to Louie on the 'phone," he said to Kelley. "He says Rogers is still in the apartment, safe enough. The police didn't go back last night."

"That's okay, boss," replied Kelley, with a sigh of satisfaction. "I was afraid they might go in and search around when we left."

"The fools wasted their time trying to get on your track instead," said the boss contemptuously. "You can wait here for half an hour. I'll go back to the town and get another report from Louie. If I don't return you'll know it's okay, and you can take off. You will wait for the express at the edge of the desert, and force it down. No shooting of the pilot, remember! Get the dollars, and then make for the rendezvous. I'll meet you there."

"I get you, boss," said Kelley. "We'll do as you say this time."

On the flying-field a few miles away another plane was waiting, almost ready to start. Jimmy Devine stood by the side of the great express, talking to his sister Grace, while a crowd of mechanics and officials waited near at hand. Just before ten o'clock Mr. Bradford came up, and Jimmy climbed into the cockpit.

"Good-bye, Jimmy," said Bradford, "and watch your step. I don't mind telling you there is a very valuable cargo on board this time."

"Good-bye, Mr. Bradford," cried Jimmy Devine cheerfully. "I'll sure be careful. Good-bye, Grace! Okay, boys, get her going."

A mechanic began to swing the propeller, and soon the express was gliding over the level stretch of ground towards the end of the field. She rose into the air and was soon a mere dot in the sky far away to the east.

"Well, he's away right enough," remarked Bradford. "No sign of pirates this time, so far as I can see. That reminds me! Where's Rogers this morning? Has anyone seen him?"

No one could give any news of Bob, and presently Bradford walked back to his office, puzzled and somewhat annoyed at the non-appearance of his new mechanic.

Bob Rogers still lay in the cupboard at the gang's apartment, while Louie prowled about in the street outside the house, keeping watch on the door.

A policeman came strolling along the pavement, and Louie shrank back into the doorway. The officer passed by apparently without noticing the crook, and Louie breathed again as he saw the cop go down a side turning. The gangster came out into the street again, and walked up and down for a minute or two. He looked at his watch, saw that it was time for the express to start, and thought with relief that his job as guard would soon be over.

"Put 'em up!" said a voice behind him. Louie jumped, and his hands went instinctively above his head as he turned to find himself gazing at the cop's automatic. The policeman had crept noiselessly up behind him, and Louie found himself fairly caught.

"You're one of the gang that ran out on us last night, ain't you?" asked the policeman.

Louie preserved a dignified silence, and the cop proceeded to relieve him of his gun, and then to handcuff him.

"You come along down to the station," continued the policeman genially. "I want you to meet our sergeant again. You had a few words with him last night, and I reckon he'll be very pleased to see you this morning. And he's a nice fellow—you'll like him when you really get to know him."

Louie did not share the policeman's enthusiasm at the idea of meeting the sergeant, but with a gun jabbing in his side he was helpless, and reluctantly he began to walk down the street, just as two men approached the house from opposite directions. One of the newcomers was the sergeant himself, the other a Chinaman carrying a vacuum cleaner.

"Why, here is the sergeant," said Louie's captor joyfully. "Say, sergeant, I've got one of 'em."

"You sure have, Mike," replied the sergeant, surveying the shrinking Louie attentively. "This is the guy who opened the door to me last night."

"He said he hadn't got a gun then," chuckled Mike. "He's found one since, and here it is."

He held up the six-shooter he had taken from Louie, and the sergeant took it with a chuckle of amusement, which died away as he saw the Chinaman walk up to the door of the house.

"What do you want in there?" he asked the Oriental sharply.

"Me go to clean carpets, sir," answered the man blandly.

"Knock at the door then," said the sergeant. The Chinaman obeyed, and the landlady appeared. She confirmed the man's statement, and the policeman was satisfied.

"Okay, go in then," said the sergeant. "I'll take this guy down to the station. The captain will want to ask him some questions, I reckon. You wait outside, Mike, and I'll be back in a few minutes."

The Chinaman went into the house, and a few moments later he was busy cleaning the carpet in the gang's apartment. Suddenly he stopped, and a look of surprise, not unmingled with fear, came over his face. He had heard a dull knocking somewhere in the room.

He left the vacuum cleaner, half-turned to run away, but seemed to regain his courage and began to investigate. The knocking continued, and soon he discovered that it came from a cupboard at the back of the room. Cautiously he pulled at the door, which opened outwards, and forthwith Bob Rogers rolled on the floor at his feet.

A little while before Bob had managed, after painful efforts, to wriggle himself into such a position that his head rested against the door of the cupboard. When he heard that someone had at last come into the room, he began to knock the door time after time with the back of his head, and to his great joy he soon found that help was at hand.

The Chinaman gazed open-mouthed for a second at the helpless Bob, and then bolted out of the room and down the stairs into the street. Mike was just outside the door, and the sergeant with Louie was still in sight down the street.

"You come, you come!" gasped the Chinaman to Mike. "Me found man in cupboard—man tied up. You come quick."

"Hey, sergeant!" yelled Mike at the top of his voice.

The sergeant heard and turned round. A few minutes later the two policemen stood with Louie in the apartment, looking in astonishment at Bob Rogers. Kneeling down by the helpless man, the sergeant unfastened the gag, cut the ropes, and helped Bob to his feet.

"That's one of the gang," muttered Bob huskily as he saw Louie, who stood near, with Mike gripping his arm.

"Did he help to put you in there?" asked the sergeant.

"Sure he did," said Bob. "But what's the time, sergeant? I haven't the least idea."

"It's a few minutes past ten," replied the policeman, somewhat surprised by the urgent note in Bob's voice. "Why d'you ask?"

"Quick, lemme get at that 'phone!" cried Bob, hobbling painfully across the room. He called up the flying-field, and began to ask rapid questions.

"Has the express ship gone? What? You don't know! You'll do—what? You'll ask Mr. Willard? You'll—"

Bob Rogers threw down the receiver in disgust, muttering by no means complimentary remarks about the girl who had answered his call.

"Can you get me a car, sergeant?" he cried. "I must get down to the airport at once. There's a plot to rob the express, and I must warn them."

"Come down to the station, Mr. Rogers," replied the sergeant, who had recognised Bob. "I'll get our fastest car and go with you."

A few minutes later Bob Rogers and the sergeant were making for the flying-field at the utmost speed of the swift police-car. In a quarter of an hour they drew up at the airport.

"The express!" cried Bob, scrambling out and seizing a mechanic by the arm.

"Has it gone yet?"

"Gone? Why, yes, it left at ten o'clock," replied the man.

"Who piloted it?" asked Bob anxiously. "Was it Jimmy Devine?"

"Of course," came the reply. "If you want Jimmy, you're sure enough too late."

The Robbery of the Express.

BOB ROGERS was much too late to stop the express ship from leaving the airport, but he missed the departure of a smaller 'plane by only a few minutes. Had he but known who were the occupants of the second machine, he would have been just as eager to prevent that from starting, too.

Willard, the manager of the airport, was not on the ground to see the express take off, but he came up immediately afterwards and spoke to Grace, who was gazing up into the air, still watching the ship her brother was piloting.

"Good-morning, Miss Devine," remarked the manager. "I'm glad your brother has got safely away. And now, how about that little trip you promised to take in my 'plane? It's a perfect morning for flying. Shall we go now?"

"Thank you, Mr. Willard," replied Grace coolly. "I don't care very much about going up to-day."

"Not just for a few minutes?" asked Willard, trying to keep within bounds his intense eagerness that the girl should come. "I wouldn't keep you up long—say a quarter of an hour. Come and look at my ship, anyway."

Grace walked over to look at the manager's private 'plane. It was a beautiful machine, the fastest ship at the airport, and the girl's resolve not to go up began to weaken as she gazed at it.

"Well, Mr. Willard"—she hesitated—"if you promise not to go very far—"

"Sure we won't go very far," said Willard, concealing his satisfaction. "Get in, Miss Devine, and I'll just take you for a short trip around."

Grace climbed into the manager's 'plane, and Willard followed. Just as the police car carrying Bob Rogers came rushing along the road to the gate, the machine rose into the air and flew swiftly away in the direction of the express. Bob took no notice of it, for all his thoughts were centred on the danger to the express ship. He went across to the office, walking stiffly, for he had not yet recovered from the effects of the long night spent in the gang's apartment.

"Those crooks are after the express ship, Mr. Bradford!" he cried, as he met the assistant manager at the door.

"Where have you been, Rogers?" asked Bradford, staring at him unbelievably. "You ought to have been here this morning to help with the ship."

"Kelley got me last night and tied me up," replied Bob. "The police found me not twenty minutes ago."

"I don't know whether you expect me to believe that," said Bradford, look-

The sergeant unfastened the gag and cut the ropes that bound Bob.

ing oddly at Bob's wild appearance and torn attire. "I reckon you're dreaming. There are no gangsters in this town that I know of—you told me that lot of Kelley's came from Mexico."

"I tell you Kelley's after the express!" shouted Bob. "You're wasting time arguing with me!"

"He's right enough, Mr. Bradford," said the police-sergeant who had accompanied Bob into the office. "I found him roped up and gagged in an apartment just outside this town. We raided the place last night, but the gang ran out on us, and I didn't go back to look over the rooms until this morning. I sure made a mistake there. We got one of the guys this morning and we'll make him talk, but I guess you'd better do something about that express."

"Sorry I doubted you, Bob," said Bradford in tones of regret. "What had we better do?"

"Is that 'plane ready to start?" asked Bob, pointing out a small machine that stood not far away. Bradford nodded, and Bob at once went out and climbed into the cockpit.

"I'm reckoning to go along to help Jimmy if I can," cried Bob leaning out to speak to Bradford, who had followed him. "I should 'phone army headquarters, Mr. Bradford, I think, and get a government 'plane sent along after the express. Kelley has got a machine-gun, and Jimmy won't be able to cope with that."

Bob was away in another minute, and the assistant manager went back to his office. He informed the nearest army airport of the danger which threatened the express, and soon he had the satisfaction of hearing that a great fighting 'plane was ready to start on the track of the raiders. Hardly had this news come through than a messenger ran in.

"Message from the express ship, sir," he said, handing a slip of paper to Bradford.

"H'm! Rogers was right, I see," muttered Bradford as he read the message, in which Jimmy Devine stated that a strange machine was following and forcing him down. "When did this come through?"

"Just now, sir," replied the messenger. "The operator sent me straight to you with it."

"You should have taken it to Mr. Willard first, if he's back," remarked Bradford slowly. "He ought to know about this."

"Mr. Willard isn't back yet, sir," said the man.

"Well, let him know when he comes," said Bradford, "and tell the operator to send along any further messages from Devine straight away."

No other message came from Jimmy Devine, for the express ship was indeed in trouble. As soon as Jimmy reached the edge of the great desert of Arizona the air raiders swooped down upon him. Flying high overhead at first, Kelley gradually swung his 'plane lower and lower above the express, until Jimmy at last became aware that the strange machine was deliberately endeavouring to force him down. He got off a wireless message to the airport, but it soon became evident to him that his position was very grave.

Try as he would, he could neither distance the bandit 'plane nor rise above it. Kelley's machine was much faster than the express, and the sky raiders were before long successful in their attempt to force Jimmy to the earth.

Down to the ground at length came the express, and Jimmy climbed out, only to find that the gangsters had been quicker. As he looked round he found

November 7th, 1931,

Our Grand New Annual

Gripping Film Stories and Pictures

HERE'S a topping gift book that will make a big hit with every boy—a world of adventure in pictures and stories—that's what you'll find in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL, the splendid new film story book. Here you will find pages and pages of gripping film stories, numerous pictorial articles which tell you all about such interesting subjects as Film Making, Life Stories of Well-Known Film Stars, Filming Wild Animals, Sports and Pastimes, and the Big Pictures of the moment. There are also three beautiful coloured plates and sixteen plates of famous film stars. If you want a tip-top gift for yourself or for a friend—the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL is the very book to choose.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

At all Newsagents and Booksellers

6/- net

himself covered by Kelley and three other crooks, and reluctantly he raised his hands above his head.

"You keep reaching for the sky and you'll be okay, Devine," growled Kelley. "We ain't aiming to do you any damage so long as we get the dollars. Get busy, boys. I'll take care of this guy."

Hansen, Blondy and Lefty got very busy at once, and they began to transfer the packages of notes from the express to their own 'plane, while Jimmy looked helplessly on, glancing now and then at the sky in the faint hope that his hasty message would bring help in time.

"You needn't look up there," sneered Kelley. "I'll tell you there ain't a chance of anyone interfering with us even if you did get off a call for help."

A few minutes later the robbery of the express was completed. Blondy broke a gas-line on the great machine so that Jimmy could not possibly take off again until he had repaired the damage, and soon the bandit 'plane soared up into the air on its way to the rendezvous across the desert where the boss had promised to meet the gang.

The pilot of the robbed express watched the raiders until their ship was almost out of sight in the eastern sky. Then he turned to look back to the west, for he knew that sooner or later help would come. Far above, almost overhead, he noticed a small 'plane travelling very swiftly. He focused his glasses upon it, hoping to see it swoop down to his relief.

"Looks like Willard's ship," he muttered. "Why doesn't he come down?"

The small 'plane passed on towards the east, and Jimmy watched it for a few minutes, extremely puzzled. Then he turned with a start, for behind him he heard a familiar sound. Coming swiftly towards him was another machine, which glided down until it was flying but a few feet above the ground. As it neared him Jimmy saw that Bob Rogers was leaning out, eager for news.

"They've got the dollars, Bob," yelled Jimmy at the top of his voice, "and they've gone that way."

He pointed out the direction the bandits had taken, and Bob nodded his head in comprehension. His engine roared out again, and at full speed the young airman followed hard on the track of the sky raiders.

The Boss of the Gang.

BOB ROGERS flew on over the desert, but as mile after mile of the monotonous, arid land passed beneath him without a sound of human life, he began to fear he would not discover the bandits' hide-out so easily as he had hoped to do.

At last, far in the distance on the farther edge of the desert, he observed a small house. As he came nearer he saw two aeroplanes at rest on the ground just in front of the building, and he felt sure that he had at length traced the gangsters, to their rendezvous.

Shutting off his engine lest the crooks should become aware of his approach, he made a long glide down and landed skilfully a few hundred yards from the house, just behind a ridge of rock which concealed his machine from view. Here he got out and moved cautiously up to the two 'planes, noticing with satisfaction that as yet the gangsters had not apparently observed his coming.

One 'plane he instantly recognised as the machine used by the gang on their first attempt to rob the express, but at the sight of the other he stopped short in astonishment, for he knew that ship,

(Continued on page 26.)

A tempestuous dancing girl, a half-breed rustler, and a Texas Ranger. A tale of a cattle stampede and a girl's brave sacrifice.

"Lasca of the RIO GRANDE"

Starring
JOHN MACK BROWN
and
DOROTHY BURGESS.

The Fiesta.

THE cantina at Tres Vacas was so full that many of the merry-makers had overflowed into the wide main street of the little border town. Every kind of vehicle along the banks of the Rio Grande del Norte, that half civilised, half baked cattle-raising country, had lumbered into Tres Vacas for the coming fiesta; a procession of navigable buckboards, democrat wagons, "one-hoss" shays; almost anything that went, continued to pour in its human load of senors, señoritas, and sun-burned cowboys from the plains, the mountains, and the riverside villages.

It was the beginning of summer, the longest days and the shortest nights—a brief respite from toil before life became too lively for one to even think of fiestas!

The first fine shades of evening were falling, giving excuse for the cantina to light up its many brightly coloured lamps. Dancing and dicing and drinking, the three D's dear to the hearts of these happy-go-lucky folk, were in full swing.

The landlord was busy serving customers, laughing and jesting with them whilst the little gaily-uniformed orchestra thrummed and piped brisk tunes for the twinkling feet of a lithe, dark-eyed, red-lipped slip of a girl who danced with abandon on the polished floor in the smoke-clouded lounge of the cantina.

She danced alone, her mop of deep black curls flying out from her shapely head much in the same way as her silken skirts flew out as she spun and twisted and twirled herself around, keeping time with the haunting melody. She danced with every part of her; eyes, hands, feet—humming the tune as she moved in perfect rhythm.

At the conclusion of her performance loud "bravas!" and tremendous clapping of hands followed. Shouts for an encore made the lamps lung in the high roof quiver; but she shook her head impudently and decisively as, after curtseying many times, she ran lightly off the floor and up the stairway leading to the rooms above.

An unshaven, loose-jointed, untidy old fellow of doubtful age still kept up his raucous shoutings.

"Lasca! I want Lasca!" he hooted, banging his great top-booted feet on the floor and clapping none too clean hands.

She stopped half-way up the stairs to blow a kiss to him, whereupon the old lad's face broke into a beatific grin. He turned to his neighbour at the table.

"If it wasn't for Jose, I reckon I'd have a chance with that gal," he stated. "She sure knows a good thing when she sees it."

"Jeho Smith's been lookin' around for you, Crab," grunted the other. "He seems kinder peeved about you."

"Jeho? H'm!" The old fellow's grin faded. "They let him out of gaol early, huh?"

"He's done six months," came the slow voice. "It was what you told the sheriff that got him gaoled, so he says. I dunno nothing about it."

"Reckon I'll be movin' along," decided Crabapple Thompson. "I got my li'l donkey outside waitin' for me. 'Night!"

As he lounged out of the saloon into the open, his watery eyes became aware of a black-shirted, black-breeched, strapping young fellow talking with a round-shouldered old man whose features were hidden under his flopping broad-brimmed ruin of a hat. Crabapple nodded to himself.

"I'll suttinly git along home," he muttered. "Jehoshaphat's talking business to Ranger Kincaid, which ain't so good for me!" Still muttering, he shambled round to the stables, pushing his way through the throng of excited, chattering patrons of the Fiesta until he came to an ancient, half-asleep donkey tethered against a rail.

"Why, Rosie—did you think I was forgettin' yer?" asked Crabapple, producing a flat glass bottle from a capacious hip-pocket. "Ketch hold!" He drew out the cork and pushed the bottle-neck into the donkey's mouth. Rosie woke up promptly and took in a gulp that half-emptied the flask.

"Say, what yer doin'?" Crab jerked the bottle away. "Father's got to have some, ain't he?" He wiped the bottle-neck and helped himself to a swig which disposed of the rest of the spirituous contents.

He untied Rosie and led her away with unsteady, hasty steps into the night of Tres Vacas.

Meantime, the round-shouldered Jehoshaphat Smith was unburdening himself to Ranger Miles Kincaid.

"If he'd a-kept his big mouth shut, I'd 'a' got off!" he declared for about the fifth time. "But that's the worst of Crab—he ain't got no discretion. There's a time to talk an' a place to talk; but when you're up at the sheriff's office you oughter fancy you was in church, an' listen to the preacher without saying nothing but 'Amen.'"

"Sure!" agreed Kincaid, his pleasant, clean-shaven face smiling in acquiescence. "I've come over from El Paso to-night to see things don't get out of hand. I'll have to be looking round, Jeho. Good-bye for now."

"I've promised myself to cut his ear when we meet—" But Jehoshaphat Smith found himself speaking to the air. Ranger Kincaid, with long, easy strides, was pacing through the crowd, nodding here and sniling there as he recognised various senors and señoritas of his acquaintance.

Suddenly a fusillade of gun-shots punctured the happy laughter and shrill cries of the motley crowd—which scattered in all directions as a band of horsemen came galloping down the street.

They were a magnificently appparelled little company, all rigged out in their best velvet short coats embroidered with gold; their flat-brimmed felt hats also braided with gold lace and loosely tied.

under their chins with corded silk ropes, their bell-bottomed long velvet trousers tight fitting over their hips—holsters with six-shooters carried under their brilliantly scarlet sashes; snowy shirts with soft white collars caught together neatly by still more scarlet ties.

Their bronzed faces, cleanly shaved save for the tiniest line of moustache, were alight with eager life; their lips, wreathed in grins, half-savage, half-mocking, were widely parted, revealing their flashing white teeth.

Kincaid stood aside to watch them wheel and curvet on their small horses as they came tearing down on the cantina. Their leader, a thick-set, handsome fellow, snatched off his velvet hat and waved it high.

"Viva, senores! Muy bueno!" he shouted as he leapt from his mount.

His fellows, a round dozen, sprang from their saddles with similar shouts of greeting and goodwill. They rushed headlong into the saloon.

The Token.

LASCA had changed her dress and was about to give another performance. She was attired now as a young Mexican, trousered and trim, and looking even more charming. Her wild tresses were bound around with a gaily-coloured scarf; her Zouave coatee was lavish with gold lacings and froggings. She paused as the newcomers came tearing into the lounge, clattering their high-heeled boots on the polished floor.

"Buenos dias, Lasea!" cried the leader of the gang, flinging away his hat and seizing her around the waist. "Diablo, how good it is to see you again!"

"Ah, Jose, my small eagle!" She gave herself to his wild embrace. "So you return to me, yes? Almost I think you are dead!"

"I am much alive. I have plenty dollars—" crowed the young fellow. "I make plenty money with my cattle—you shall see how I spend it! Senor landlord, this way!" he shouted to the smiling host. "I invite all to join in a cup with Jose Santa Cruz, the wealthy, the fortunate! Cigarillos all round with me, if you please!"

Loud cheerings greeted this invitation as he threw a gold-embroidered purse on the table nearest him. The delighted landlord took it up, shook it—made a wide gesture with both hands after he had dropped it down with a clink on the table.

"Caramba, it is heavy!" he chuckled. "Don Jose, I fly to perform your esteemed order. Muchas gracias!"

Jose joined in the drinks and cigars that followed. Most of them accepted the long, thin black cigars, even some of the women. The girls clapped their hands and blew kisses to him when they lifted their glasses of iced fruit drinks to their lips; the cowboys, the senors, the townsfolk toasted him over and over again. Jose, highly pleased with himself, bowed right and left. The orchestra struck up a languorous air, and soon the floor was crowded with waltzing couples.

"It is many days you leave me, Jose," whispered Lasea as their feet moved over the floor.

"I have the business," he answered. "I buy many cattle. A new rancho, chiquita! You are very beautiful, very smiling—I do not believe that you miss me, no?"

"Always I miss you, Jose," she murmured.

He danced her away to a quiet corner and seated himself in a high rush-bottomed chair while she perched herself on the arm of it. He put his arm about her waist and drew her face down to his. They kissed, unseen and unnoticed by anyone, save old Crabapple Thompson who had come back to the cantina, attracted by the noise of the new arrivals.

The old fellow shook his head. Lasca would blow him no more kisses until Santa Cruz departed.

"Now, listen, amigo," said Jose. "Allow me to withhold my arm for a moment. Be careful you do not fall into my lap—" Lasca, with an arch glance, steadied herself. "What is it that you have there?" He touched with light fingers the hilt of a small dagger projecting from her sash. "It is for my heart, yes?"

"Never would I hurt thee, Jose," she murmured fondly. "If anyone should hurt thee, my heart would beat no more."

"Gracias!" he laughed. "That is very good to hear. Now I will show to you the ring which I have had fashioned for the finger of the girl who is true and faithful to her vows—" He felt in the inside pocket of his magnificent velvet and gold coat and brought out a small box. Hastily shaking it open, he took out a ring set with flashing stones.

"Oh, Jose!" breathed the girl, enraptured. "It is for me, yes?"

"For the true friend of Jose Santa Cruz," he stated significantly. "There are nine diamonds, count them. Honour and faith sparkling from each facet! There is a legend concerning these stones; I get them from an Indiano, a great thief—" His laughter rang out. "Also a liar, beyond all doubt. But we shall believe the story, you and me, querida. While you keep this ring, nine times you love and die."

"Die?" she broke in, her pretty face clouding. "I do not wish it. I am young—not for me the ending of happiness and life."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Who can read the future?" he asked. "Not me!" Again he laughed loudly. "Take it, amigo mia—it is for you to prove the story false or true, as you will." He pushed the ring gently down over the third finger of her left hand. "Now you belong to me, Lasca," he concluded, standing up. "Let us finish our dance."

While they were on the floor, gyrating to the tinkling music of guitars, drums, and piano, a loutish fellow sitting at a side table watched them with squinting eyes. He had been drinking heavily before Jose had come in, now the extra free drinks had completely muddled him. He grinned at Lasca when her face was turned his way, but she only curled her lips in scorn.

"Now we rest a little," stated Santa Cruz. "I have ridden a long way from my rancho, and I wish to play the cards with some of the senors."

"But, Jose—"

"One must make himself agreeable to the senors, if one is a trader," interrupted her lover. "One must not be always with the senoritas."

"I will dance with another if you leave me," threatened the girl. "There are many who will be glad—" Her lips parted and her eyes darkened. "Perhaps, when you have done with your senors, you shall find me gone." "You are pledged to me, querida!" he chuckled carelessly.

With a bow he left her and pushed his way to where a party were busy at a game of poker. Lasca stood staring after him, her frowns deepening.

The squinting fellow took his chance, and, getting up, came lurching across to her.

"Sen-rita—dانش—" he muttered thickly, putting an arm about her. At once she leapt free, her quick temper flaring.

"How dare you!" she shrilled at him. "Don't I tell you always never to touch me, you peeg gringo!"

"Lasca, I'm friend!" he argued. "Respectable man. Marry you. Make good husband."

She snapped her fingers under his nose and thrust at him with both hands so violently that he fell backwards on to the floor. As she flounced out of the cantina, laughter and applause followed her, but she was too angry to care.

Jose glanced up from his seat at the card table.

"It is Lasca amusing herself," said one of the players. "She has knocked him down!"

Santa Cruz shrugged his padded shoulders and smiled in a knowing way.

"She needs a master—yes," he commented. "Presently she find one," he added with a sly little chuckle.

Lasca, with a blow of her fist, banged open the swing shutter doors of the side entrance to the saloon with such violence that one of them swung into the tall young fellow just entering. He started back; then, as he noted the flushed face, the stormy eyes of the girl, he checked an angry word and raised his ten-ounce sombrero.

"Senorita," he drawled, "excuse me if I annoy you!"

"You?" she retorted. "I think nothing of Americanos! For me they do not exist!"

"So?"

"So!" She stamped her foot; then, as he still stood in her path, she put out a hand to push him away.

"I was going to ask you for a dance," the young fellow invited, hat in hand.

She regarded him haughtily, taking in the black shirt, the smart black breeches, the painted Texas riding-boots. She raised her eyes to his serious, clean cut face, with its steady grey eyes, square chin, faintly smiling mouth. He wasn't precisely handsome, but there was a likeable air about him.

Yes, he would serve very well. She would dance with this stranger and show Jose that he was not the only man in the world.

"I am sorry if I hurt you with the door," she apologised. "For the moment I was enraged."

"Not with me, I guess?" he told her. "You know who I am? Ranger Miles Kincaid, of the Texas Constabulary. I'm here to keep the peace."

"I will dance with the senor"—she suddenly beamed at him as she laid her hand on his arm—"but the senor must not tread upon my feet with the great boots."

Kincaid had scarcely noticed her attire, so interested was he in those large, dark eyes half-hidden under their sweeping long lashes. She danced like an inspiration, and he was no duffer at waltzing, despite his clumsy boots with their wheeled spurs. They swayed dreamily together as the little orchestra droned out the melody; Lasea's hand rested against the strong shoulder of the Ranger, and a strange peace came into her wild little heart.

But Jose was soon on his feet. His sweetheart was dancing with one of the hated Rangers! One of those whom he had reason to dread secretly. They were so inquisitive, so interfering. He kept within the law, almost, on his rancho and elsewhere; but almost isn't quite, as he knew!

He was within his rights, however, in objecting to Lasca resting her head on the fellow's shoulder! He suddenly drew the filigreed pistol from his hip and fired high into the palm-thatched room, disturbing the dust and the many spiders.

The music stopped dead. All eyes were turned towards Jose—some inquiringly, some terrified. The landlord ran to him.

"What is it, Jose?" he asked. "Please to calm yourself! At the Fiesta all is meant to be happy."

"I wish to give an order," said Santa Cruz. "You are so dull I cannot make you hear." He strode towards Kincaid, who was still holding the girl. "Senor, you will drink with me!" he cried. "It is the first time we meet. Meanwhile"—with a rough hand on Lasca's shoulder, he pulled her away from her partner. "The senorita forgets she is promised to me."

Kincaid eyed him coolly.

"The senorita can change her mind, I suppose?" he inquired.

Jose recovered his usual half-sneering smile. He became very polite and suave, but insistent.

"The senor will honour the house by emptying a glass with me," he repeated his invitation.

The Ranger turned to Lasca.

"What do you wish, senorita?" he asked her.

"Me; I care nothing"—she shrugged—"the dance is ended." She made Kincaid a mocking little bow. "Buenos dias!" She turned sharply away and stalked off the dance-floor.

Jose took not the slightest notice of her behaviour, but laid a persuasive hand on Kincaid's arm.

"You will drink with me?" he said.

"This is three times I ask you."

The Ranger nodded, dropping his arm so that Jose's touch fell from him. They moved to the bar, where the Mexican snapped out an order for a "white rum," a fiery, sweet drink. He glanced towards Kincaid.

"That'll suit me," he drawled.

"The senor is not aware of the rule when one is betrothed?" came Jose's smooth question. "The senorita, in such a case, asks usually for permission to dance with anyone other than her affianced. It is not so for the Americanos, possibly?"

"American girls are free," Kincaid stated. He took up the small glass and nodded curtly towards Santa Cruz. "Here's to freedom!"

A scowl clouded Jose's face, but he shook it away.

"To freedom, senor!" he agreed, raising his glass. "You come to enjoy yourself at the fiesta?"

"I hope so," answered Kincaid.

The Accident.

LASCA was in a thoroughly bad humour. Generally she had it all her own way at the Cantina—she was the star turn, everyone applauded and paid court to her.

Now, no one seemed to care! Jose was the star—with his drinks all round and his cigars. As for the ring he had given her, likely as not it was as flashy and cheap as himself!

She had taken a sudden violent fancy to the Ranger, and she knew that he had taken more than a fancy to her. He was strong, and he had power over these wild people, and he was somebody new. She hurried down the street, not caring where she was going and taking little heed of those she passed or overtook.

The grinning stares of the men were an insult. They stared because she was dressed as a boy, the fools! She, Lasca of the Rio Grande, dressed as she chose.

A lumping great fellow stood in her path. It was the Americano who had molested her in the cantina; he was stretching out his long arms so that she should not pass by. He leered foolishly at her glance of scorn.

"Now I got you!" he chuckled. "I'm gonna dance with you—see?"

"Stand away from me!" she flamed at him.

But he made a sudden grab at her and his long arms enfolded her instantly struggling figure. Despite all her scratches, kicks and blows, he began to move with her in a clumsy dance over the rough roadway. Maddened by the humiliation of it, Lasca got at her dagger and struck blindly at him.

"You peeg! Let me go!"

He tried to snatch at the weapon and, losing his balance, fell sideways. Her dagger buried itself in his breast; a loud groaning sound came from him as Lasca, horrified, fought free of him.

A crowd gathered on the instant, thrusting each other aside and shouting excitedly. One of the town vigilantes pushed his way through and lifted the victim's head to his knee. His piercing yell for a stretcher was taken up by the crowd, who commenced to run hither and thither like a bunch of frightened mavericks.

Kincaid came running out of the cantina.

"There's a fellow killed," a youth told him importantly. "I seen them fighting together. A little chap, no more'n a boy, done it. Got his knife out and struck the big 'un right in the heart!"

The grave faces of the vigilantes as they carried the still body to the rough cart that served Tres Vacas as an ambulance confirmed the story.

"There he goes!" shouted one of the crowd, pointing up the street. "The little feller with no hat! Gee, he's jumped on Jose's boss! Getting astride of him, see? Who's goin' to ketch him now?"

Kincaid ran like the wind, while the horse, taken so violently, bucked viciously before settling down to a gallop. Just as the mettlesome beast began to race, Kincaid's .45, snatched from his belt, spoke crisply. The bullet reached its billet, and the escaping culprit reeled in the saddle, to fall sideways into the road.

At once the crowd poured that way, clustering round the horse and rider. When it was seen that it was Lasca, clutching at her shoulder and muttering to herself, a veritable hubbub broke out.

"Let me pass!"

Kincaid's voice and badge carried weight. They made a lane for him to pass through. He came to the girl and lifted her in his arms like a feather.

"Lasca!" he gasped. "You?"

"The senor is not aware of the rule when one is betrothed?" came Jose's smooth question.

Her face was dead white, and her eyes were closed. She moaned as he carried her to the cantina. There he ran with her up the stairs to her room, calling sharply:

"Get a doctor, one of you! Quickly as you can!"

He had laid her on the bed just as Jose Santa Cruz came bursting in. The two men regarded each other.

"You shoot her—yes?"

The Mexican's lips curled.

"I did." Kincaid's words seemed forced out of his dry mouth. "I didn't know it was a girl. I guess she's not hurt so very much."

"You fight with women?" Jose's face was livid. "It is very brave of you! But maybe presently you fight with a man."

Kincaid nodded.

"I shan't run away," he stated. "First of all we'll have the doctor to her."

A quietish old fellow came in carrying the little bag without which no doctor seems complete. He went straight to the bed and bared the girl's shoulder. She winced at his touch, and her eyelids lifted their dark fringes.

"Don't be alarmed," spoke the doctor. "You are not much hurt. A flesh wound only—a mere scratch. It was the sudden fall which knocked you out."

"The horse—is he dead?" came her question.

"He's hitched up at the rail," spoke Kincaid, who had moved to the window.

The doctor dressed the wound with deft fingers and put her blood-flecked blouse comfortably about her.

"Rest until the shock passes," he ordered; then came across to the Ranger.

"The fellow who insulted her is in a bad way," he whispered. "I don't think he can live. What are you going to do?"

"Take her to El Paso as soon as she gets off the bed," answered Kincaid. "It's my duty."

Jose had crept near and had overheard.

"You take her to prison, yes?" he sneered. "Let me remind you, senior, it is a long way to El Paso!"

"She's got to stand her trial," said Kincaid curtly, at which Jose's hand slid towards his hip and came to rest on the butt of his gun.

"No more shooting," warned the doctor. "The girl has a good defence." He looked Jose full in the eyes. "If you're her friend, you'd best let her go. There's more danger here for her than at El Paso. The Americano has many friends at Tres Vacas."

"I go with the senior policeman," came Lasca's voice from the bed. "I am a wicked girl; it is right I should be locked up."

She met Jose's savage frowns with a little flick of one eyelid.

"As you will, seniorita," said Jose, smooth as silk.

He came to Kincaid and regarded him fixedly, as though choosing fitting words.

But suddenly he snapped his fingers and went away in silence.

Kincaid shrugged his broad shoulders, unconcerned. He moved to Lasca.

"I'll expect you to leave here in ten minutes' time," he said. "I'll get the horses and outfit together. We'll be travelling over the mesa best part of the night."

"I go with you, senior," she murmured. "It is right. I am a wicked girl. But that one make me enraged."

"You get enraged too easily, my girl," said the Ranger dryly. "That's the big trouble with you."

November 7th, 1931.

"Promise Never To See That Fellow Again!"

KINCAID pitched camp when about ten miles from Tres Vacas, nearly a clump of trees and a little waterfall under cover of the hills. He rigged a rough tent and lit a fire, Lasca sitting on a flattened stone, watching him covertly.

The moon was high in the heavens, and the dry, scrubby mesa looked beautiful under the silver light. Faint scurrings and whinnings of small animals and night birds reached her ever-listening ears from time to time.

She hoped that Jose would ride out and rescue her. Then she didn't wish it. She wanted to go with the big Ranger and be put into prison, yes! She had stabbed the Americano, and it was right she should be punished.

All the same, it would be fine to be rescued. Jose and the big Ranger would fight for her, which would be very exciting. Perhaps Jose would be hurt. She twisted the ring on her finger with its nine white stones, honour and truth in every facet! Nine times she would love and die while she wore it!

That was absurd! How could one die nine times, unless one were a cat?

"Want any food?"

Kincaid's drawl broke into her thoughts.

"Me? No. I will not eat."

"Suit yourself," he answered.

He had taken a pan from his "outfit," and was mixing up a doughlike mass, stirring it deftly. This cake he began to fry over the fire he had lighted.

It smelled savoury enough, and Lasca got up from her seat.

"Me, I help you," she offered in a subdued voice. "You have tied the horses safe, yes?"

"To yon tree," he replied, pointing through the gleaming night. "Thinking of running off while I'm asleep?"

"Only if you let me go, Miles," she told him, her dark eyes trying to read his.

"That's not very likely," he smiled. "You've got my name all right," he added.

"You tell it me," she said. "Also it is painted on the tent."

He gave her a tin plateful of the fried cake, then seated himself next to her, eating out of the pan with his fingers. Lasca forked over the cake and ate a little, then suddenly flung down the tin plate in a fit of temper.

"It is burnt!" she complained.

"A little," agreed Kincaid placidly. "But there's nothing else."

"I go to sleep in the tent," she announced. "I am tired of you."

"That's all right, Lasca," came his drawl. "I'll sleep out here and see the wild dogs and coyotes don't get either of us."

She made an angry little noise at him as she went towards the small, so-called tent. Miles went on eating, using his fingers as before.

"All Gringos are peegs!" she cried. "Yes!"

He took no heed of her, and she came back to him, putting a little hand on his shoulder.

"I am sorry, Miles. Forgive me."

"That's all right," he answered.

She stayed a moment, her hand on his shoulder. Then, swiftly, she stooped and brushed his hair with her lips. Then, like a shadow, she slid from him into the tent while Kincaid sat there silent and thoughtful.

Later, he peeped in at her lying snuggled up in the tent on the blankets he had spread.

"Sleeps like a little kid," he muttered.

"I s'pose I got to take her to gaol?"

He filled his pipe and lit up, walking backwards and forwards like a sentry under the pale stars and white moon.

He went to sleep just before daybreak, lying on the hard ground. He dreamed about her, queer rushing distorted dreams that had no beginning nor end, no kind of meaning, except that her dark eyes were always on him, reproachfully pleading. In the morning he awoke to find her busy trying to get him a kind of breakfast over the kindled fire.

He sat up and watched her awhile. "Tell me just how it happened, kid," he said presently.

"Ah, Miles, you wake up?" she beamed at him. "How you sleep! Easily I could have run away—" She brought him a pannikin of coffee and a hunk of bread. "How it happen, you ask? Truly I do not know. He always follow me, that one. Many times I say to him—if you please, do not touch me! I do not like to be touched—" She drew herself up proudly. "Me, I am a seniorita of the Rio Grande, but now so poor that I must dance for a living at the cantina."

"A rough life, Lasca," he put in, sipping his coffee.

She sighed.

"I make money there to keep myself," she said. "And they respect me, yes, because they know I am a seniorita. But that fellow—he is always peeg with me. In the streets, before every one, he snatch at me and make me to dance. Ah, I could scream with rage to be made a laughter for the crowd!" Her dark eyes flashed. "So, without thinking, I draw my little knife—" She shuddered. "And, in the struggle, we fall, and the dagger sticks itself into him. That is all."

Kincaid rose to his feet.

"See here, kid—if I let you go, I'll get into big trouble at El Paso. You'll get into big trouble, if I take you there. They won't listen to your story."

"It is true, Miles—all true!" He nodded.

"I'll make a bargain with you and I'll take what's coming to me," he declared. "I'll let you go, if you'll promise never to see that dago again."

"Santa Cruz?" she asked, in a queer little voice.

"Jose Santa Cruz. He's no good to anybody. I've got things about Jose that one day we'll have to fix on him," said Kincaid. "You promise?"

"I promise, Miles."

"Get on your horse and—hop it," he told her. "I'm a fool, maybe. Maybe I'm not."

Lasca stared at him as if unable to credit her ears. Then, with a laugh, she ran to the tethered horses. The Ranger followed her with slow steps, his face deadly serious. He was taking a tremendous risk, but he wanted to believe in Lasca, who had bewitched him with those dark eyes of hers.

A few minutes later she turned in her saddle to wave her hand. He watched her out of sight as she cantered back along the dusty trail to Tres Vacas. Then he packed up and went on his way to El Paso, to make a report that would probably mean the end of his career.

The chief sat at his desk, drumming with his fingers on the hard wood. Standing opposite him, erect and stiff, was Kincaid.

"You deliberately let her go?" asked the stern-faced man at the desk.

"Yes."

"It's a bad business, Miles," said the other, rising. "I'll have to report to Denton Headquarters. Meantime, you're under arrest." He came round to Kincaid and unpinned the badge from under the lapel of the black shirt. "I hate doing this," he stated. "You're one of my best men, and I've never had reason before to doubt your integrity and loyalty to the force. But it must be done—go straight to the detention-room and remain there."

"It's just, chief," spoke Kincaid. "I've nothing more to say."

"I shall do my utmost for you, Miles," went on the stern voice. "But it'll mean disrating, I fear. And I shall not have a decision from Denton for a month at least."

Kincaid saluted; then marched out of the superintendent's office at El Paso without another word.

Crab and Jeho Have a Word to Say.

THE fiesta had lasted for three days. Tres Vacas did not seem able to get back into working mood. The weather was fine and hot, too hot for one to think of labour and everyday affairs. Jose was still spending his money, and there were plenty of amusing things going on.

The Americano who had asked for trouble was making some kind of recovery, and Lasca had been forgiven by the easy-going folk of the border, most of whom had interests, relatives, and friends both in the States and out of it.

Kincaid heard little or nothing. He lived in the detention-room practically all of his time, gloomy and morose. The guards were decent fellows; sorry for him, but regarding him as a fool for having so thrown away his chances.

On the afternoon of the fourth day of the festivities, two of the liveliest rioters left the little village on their mules and came trooping into El Paso at dusk. One of them was an overhatted old wreck of a man, half-bearded and none too clean, the other was a sad-looking person with his right ear tied up in a cotton-wool bandage.

Later on, they presented themselves at the superintendent's office.

"We wanna see Ranger Kincaid," stated the earless man. "Important business. You give him our names, see?"

The guard looked them over. "If it isn't old Crab!" he cried. "What you been doing with your face, huh?"

"Ask him," replied Crabapple Thompson, jerking his thumb in the direction of his companion.

"I hed to cut his ear," explained Jehoshaphat Smith apologetically.

"I thought you were such cronies?" questioned the guard.

"It's a private matter," said Crab. "Seems that Jeho made a sorter promise to the saints to cut my ear off becase I had to give evidence agin him—see? Well, you can't go agin a vow of that kind if you're religious, same as me and Jeho. What about seeing Kincaid, Peter?"

"I'll take you to him," the guard agreed. "But you mustn't stay more than ten minutes. He's under arrest."

The two old scarecrows were ushered into Kincaid's room with its barred windows and heavily bolted door. He started up with a very pleased smile as they came shuffling in.

"Thought all my friends had deserted me," he said, gripping their rough old hands in turn.

Jeho shook his head at him. "We ain't thet sort, Miles," he answered. "No, sir. We come to tell you something you oughter know. Never mind looking at Crab—he got what was coming to him, and, maybe, he'll grow a new ear one of these days—"

He glanced round the bare room with the open door outside which Peter the guard was on duty. "Say, can't we have a word with you quiet?" he whispered.

Kincaid pushed to the door, whereupon Jeho Smith motioned him to come closer.

"Thet gal fooled you, Miles," he rumbled in a low voice. "She played it on you, boy. She's back at the Cantina, thick as mud with thet there Santa Cruz."

Kincaid's face set hard. "She broke her solemn word to me?" he ground out.

"She done thet," put in Crabapple. "Some folks ain't got no religion! D'you think I wanted Jeho to cut my ear? No, sir. But when he tole me how things was fixed between him and me, well—I just stood up to it! But thet gal—mind you, I like her, Miles. I can't help it. All the same, I got to tell you Jeho's speaking gospel."

Kincaid had scarcely listened. His eyes had gone a cold grey, his lips were thin lines. He had sacrificed himself in vain; Lasca was false and utterly heartless.

"I'd like to—to strangle her!" he muttered.

"Listen here, boy," whispered Jeho cautiously. "Me and Crab reckon it's all Jose's fault. He's got a holt over Lasca. Give her a magical ring or some such tomfoolery. What we figure is to get you outer here, so's you can take her away from where she won't never do any good."

"Escape?" questioned Kincaid, his face changing. "I suppose that would finish me—". His forehead puckered itself, his lean fingers clenched hard.

"You're done for here," coaxed old Crab. "You'll have to resign and start again somewheres. I got a bit of a farm where you can lie low till the racket's died down."

"But how escape?" Kincaid asked irritably. "It's good of you fellows, but—"

"The chief here will be glad if you hoo it," broke in Crab. "You know he will. He likes you and he'll hate having to take away your badge." Kincaid winced. "I'm right, ain't I? Well, now, I'll call Peter in here and push him sudden like over Jeho, who'll be crouching jest behind him. Then we pounce on poor old Peter, not to hurt him, but jest to gag his mouth and tie him inside of this here sack what I've brought with me. Then we'll all three hustle out of the office quicker'n lightning. We've hired a boss for you, so's you can make good running."

In the evening came another visitor to Kincaid's prison— Lasca herself.

Kineaid gripped his hand hard.

"Right! I'll do it!"

Jeho sidled towards the barred window and pretended to be gazing outward. Crab opened the heavily made door.

"Peter, old pard," he called, "I want yet a minute."

The guard came in carrying his carbine at the slope.

"I was going to tell you time's up, anyways," he said. "What's the big news, Crab?"

"You come here, Peter." Crab put a persuasive hand on his arm and got him to turn away from Jeho, who promptly dropped on all fours just behind the unsuspecting guard. "I hate doing it, Peter," went on Crab as he gave a sudden vicious push at Peter's breast. "I surely do!"

The guard, taken by complete surprise, gave a gasp and staggered back, tripped backwards over Jeho, and found himself pinned down by the two hardy old lads in less than a second. Ere he could call out they had him gagged and tied up in the sack. They plumped him, kicking and plunging, on Kineaid's bed.

"Come on!" whispered Crab hoarsely. The three slid out of the room and were out of the office almost as he spoke. The very audacity of the rescue brought about its success.

They hurried to where they had tethered their mules, together with the stocky horse which they had hired.

"You hop it, Miles," said Jeho. "Me and Crab will just fade away, see? Here's a gun for yer." He thrust a .45 into Kineaid's hand.

Kineaid rode hard and fast. He was dimly aware of pursuit, but this died away as he raced towards Tres Vecas. Crab and Jeho evidently had drawn the chase to themselves.

He had no exact plans beyond recapturing Lasca. Whether he should take her then to El Paso a prisoner, and surrender both her and himself to the Rangers, he could not decide. One thing at a time.

He reached the little border town at midnight, to find it still en fête. The cantina was brilliantly lit up, and the clatter and music issuing forth gave him an idea. He would steal in from the back, watch for Lasca and seize her suddenly under cover of his gun. Then run out with her into the darkness and get away on a horse. There were several hitched to the rails, drooping their heads as they patiently waited for their owners merry-making in the gay cantina.

"It is My Honour to Kill Him!"

KINEAID had little difficulty in taking up a post just behind the half-drawn curtains which cut off the lounge from the kitchens. In the shadows he waited, peering in on the motley throng of dancers and drinkers at the tables. He saw Lasca, dressed in a white flounced dress, dancing in the arms of Jose, laughing and whispering as they moved riotously to the air of a quick fox-trot. Her coal black hair flew out as she whirled with her grinning partner, her bare arms were about his neck, her face brushing his. The orchestra were singing as they drummed and fiddled out the lively melody.

"I'll ne'er forget the night we met!" they sang. "Your lips met mine—"

November 23, 1931.

moment divine! Down by the Rio Grande!"

Kineaid's lips moved in a mocking smile.

"When shadows fall—mem'ries recall that hour on the Rio Grande!"

He drew his .45 and held it down by his side. The music ended, and Jose led Lasca to a seat. His boasting voice rang out above the applause.

"That hour on the Rio Grande!" he shouted. "When you fooled the clever Ranger, Lasca! Tell them again how you twisted him round your little finger; how you make him the breakfast and—make him the promise you never mean to keep!"

"Ah, but no!" she said, when many voices called to her. "It is not kind. He is gone; he is in prison, poor fellow! One does not laugh then at him."

"Tell them, Lasca," spoke Jose masterfully. "I like to hear the story again and again!"

She climbed up on to the little platform, whereupon the orchestra moved away a little to give her room. Kineaid suddenly jumped in upon her from behind, his gun covering Santa Cruz.

"Tell how he came back and carried you away, Lasca!" cried Kineaid. His free arm went round her waist. "Hands up, all of you; I kill the first man who doesn't!"

"Let me go!" But Lasca, strangely, did not struggle. Instead she rather helped him to pull her step by step backwards to the half-drawn curtains. Santa Cruz was staring as if he could not believe his eyes; in the crowd some put up their hands, while the others gasped stupidly.

Only when Kineaid and the girl had vanished from their sight did those in the cantina seem to wake up.

Santa Cruz yelled, "Per Dios!" and made a rush for the platform, stumbling in his haste. He got up, his face hideous with baffled rage as he charged out into the night. One or two followed him, but the rest went on with their dancing, the orchestra having instantly struck into a tango. It was Jose's affair—no one else's.

Kineaid was already in the saddle with Lasca across his lap. She made no effort to escape. She clung to him in a queer, frightened way, her eyes half closed, her breath coming and going quickly. Jose fired blindly at them, but his aim was uncertain—he feared to hit the girl. With a derisive yell Kineaid spurred his horse and dashed into the faintly luminous night.

The Mexican gazed after them, muttering to himself. Then he ran back into the cantina, calling, "Pedro! Gonzalez! Tomasso—all of you, come here!" His men clustered round him. "We fetch her back!" ordered Santa Cruz with a snarling mouth. "Yes! Follow me, they go down to the river. Hurry to your horses!"

"We kill him, yes?" asked a flashy young half-caste, but Jose smiled in a hateful way.

"It is my honour to kill him, Pedro!" he answered fiercely.

The fugitives made good progress once clear of the town. They reached the banks of the Rio Grande del Norte and pounded northward along the track. No words had come from Lasca; she simply held on to Kineaid loosely, making no struggle.

Under the dim high stars they journeyed at a steady pace until the lights of Tres Vecas were lost in the rising valley mists. Then Kineaid steered his mount up the banks towards higher ground and drew rein by a clump of trees which masked a rocky fissure in the hills. He steadied the horse and listened intently. Only the calls of night birds and animals of the wild broke the silence.

"We'll camp here," he stated. "Sorry I've no tent. You must sleep under the sky." He put her off the horse and leapt down.

"Do not stay, Miles," she whispered. "Let us go on. You take me to El Paso, yes?"

"To prison," he answered grimly. "You don't fool me this time!"

She came close to him, shivering a little. "Do not stay," she urged again. "They catch us—then there is bad work. Jose never forgave me. Also, he keel you."

"Maybe I'll shoot first," said Kineaid. He tethered the panting horse and began to search about for some crevice or cranny in the rocks where the girl would be sheltered from the night dews. He took off the silk handkerchief about his neck and put it about her shoulders.

"You do not hate me, Miles?" she asked. "No?"

"Don't talk," he told her gruffly.

"Jose will not come alone," she whispered. "Please to go on, Miles. I am not tired."

"You want to get to gaol, I guess?" he growled at her. "It isn't so amusing, being locked up on bread and water." He took her cold hand in his and drew her nearer to the rocks. "We're safe here—"

Even as he spoke there came the beating of hoofs on the track.

They listened in dead silence. Faintly the sound of voices carried to them.

"They'll never find us," murmured Kineaid. "Unless you call out—"

Lasca made no answer.

Their pursuers had halted. Lights flashed dimly down by the riverside; they were searching for horse tracks. For a long time nothing happened and Kineaid began to think that all danger had passed. Then, startlingly, out of the near darkness, came Jose's smooth voice:

"Do not move, Ranger, if you please. You are covered from all sides."

He stepped out of the night, a gun held steadily in his hand.

"You forget the white dress, Ranger," he said very politely. "It shows so plain—it is a pity, yes?"

Kineaid jumped at him and bore him to the ground, the gun going off harmlessly. For a few instants they fought madly together; then Jose's men closed in on them and tore Kineaid away. Despite all his struggles, they overpowered him and tied his hands behind his back.

"Now we go to my rancho," said Jose, who had been dusting down his fine clothes. "I think we enjoy ourselves there, perhaps? Come, Lasca—do not be afraid any more. With me you are safe."

Kineaid awoke next morning Jose's prisoner in a kind of harness-room attached to the low rambling building which served the Mexican for headquarters. All night the lowing of cows and the bellowing of steers had broken in on his fitful slumbers.

The small open cross-barred window gave him a view of the wild pasture lands surrounding the adobe ranch; cattle in what seemed countless hundreds were moving about the huge fields, cropping the sunbaked grass and complaining continuously of the lack of water.

In the sky, great clouds had blown along from the west during the night, threatening rain at last.

(Continued on page 25.)

A mysterious death—a nephew accused of the crime—a girl reporter's fight to prove his innocence. A true story taken from the notebook of William J. Burns of the U.S. Secret Service.

"The Black Widow"

The Rifled Safe.

"THERE are times," said the eminent American detective, a man whose uncanny exploits in crime detection may well be classed with those of Sherlock Holmes, "when one sympathises, and sympathises most deeply, with those who have to administer justice. There are times when I thank my lucky stars that my place in life is the detection of crime, rather than the punishment of the offender."

He meant every word of it, and for very good reason. These stories, of which "The Black Widow" is the first, are real, true-to-life narratives from his case-book. They may seem, as we term it, far-fetched. They may appear to be too uncanny to be true. But true they are, every word of them. And in their very truth lies their undoubted fascination.

The majority of these stories prove up to the hilt how tragically easy it is for justice to err; how possible it is for a precious human life to be sacrificed on the altar of "evidence."

It seemed so clear, on the face of it. Murder—then robbery. No confusion, nothing to indicate that anything in the nature of a struggle had taken place. Just the tiny, open door—a porthole in miniature—of that circular wall-safe in the study. And at the feet of the detectives, the body of William Ramsey, stabbed to the heart. Cold-blooded, to say the least. Ramsey must have been taken entirely unawares. Not a rumple on the carpet. On the face of the dead man no agonised expression that might have told of a last bold bid for his very life!

A tap at the door of his bed-room had aroused no response. A harder rap, and then, thoroughly alarmed—for Ramsey invariably awakened with the regularity of a clock—the housekeeper turned the handle of the door and entered. The bed had not been slept in!

With unnameable fear at her heart, the distraught woman had gone to each room in turn, fearing she knew not what. And then, the morning sun streaming through the study windows, the electric lamps still burning palely, there lay her master, face downwards on the study floor.

An eccentric bachelor, long retired from business, William Ramsey was reputed by his neighbours in the select New York suburb to be worth a couple of million dollars. A tall, thin, spare man of studious disposition, he had made a fortune during a Wall Street boom, and having made his pile, was fortunate enough to be in a position to keep it, a feat which few who succumb to the lure of "easy money" are able to accomplish.

Having achieved his object, Ramsey settled down to the evening of his days, his interests centred upon his books and his garden, his aversion to visitors notorious. His days were mapped out with old-maidish precision, his meals served to the second, his trim establishment a tribute to the efficiency of his housekeeper and the taste of its owner. And even with his tragic death, apparently by violence, not a rumple on that lovely Persian carpet!

A woman of resource, the summoning of doctor and police was a matter of moments.

Came the flop-flop of carpet slippers, and shyly hesitant, the sturdy, middle-aged woman glanced again at all that remained of her master, brushed her hand wearily across her forehead, and faced her questioners.

"Who lives in the house besides yourself?" inquired the detective.

"Mr. Ramsey's nephew, Jack."

"Any idea where he is now?"

"Not the least, sir."

"When did you last see young Mr. Ramsey?"

"It would be, I imagine, about eleven o'clock last night."

"How is it you are so certain about the time?"

"Well, sir, I brought in Mr. Ramsey's coffee, as I always do. They were both in the room at the time, and I remember that they seemed to be having a fierce argument. Young Mr. Jack Ramsey seemed to be 'laying down the law.' He had a knife in his hand, and seemed so excited that I was only able to catch a word or so here and there. As soon as I came into the room with the coffee, they ceased their arguing."

"Any special remark that you recall?"

"Yes, I do remember that Master Jack, very excited, pleaded to his uncle: 'Uncle, give me the money now. I must have it!'"

"You're perfectly certain that you are not imagining this?"

"Of course, sir. Fifteen minutes or so later, I saw Master Jack hurrying out of the house, and that was the last I saw of him."

"And you think that Jack Ramsey killed his uncle?"

"I think nothing, sir!" replied the housekeeper, with grim finality. "And if you've no objection, sir, I'll get on with my work."

"Very well. But we'll probably be wanting you again."

"I'm here if you want me," she replied. And the carpet slippers resumed their flop-flopping, and the housekeeper busied herself with her kitchen duties, shedding a tear or so for her dead master, for Ramsey was a generous, if irascible employer.

"Clear as mud," observed the detective to his colleague. "Simple as eating pie. Here's young Ramsey in difficulties, begging the uncle for a loan, emphasising his necessity with the knife in his hand. Here's the uncle determined that the nephew shan't have a penny. The quarrel, the knife-thrust, the open safe, and Jack Ramsey running from the house as if Old Nick were after him. And disappearing completely! Perfectly plain, 'my dear Watson,' plain as the cigar you've half-chewed in your excitement." His colleague lit up the half-mangled smoke!

"Seems to me," remarked his colleague, scrutinising the handle of the safe with a magnifying glass, "that these young people, with all their sense, are not so smart as they imagine. How any fellow in his senses can imagine that he'll get away with a crime like this, knowing the efficiency of the American police system, is beyond understanding. Well, he's for it!"

The police photographer was called in, and in the blinding glare of the magnesium flash, a photograph of the undisturbed remains of the unfortunate man was secured. With machine-like precision, the detective telephoned the bank concerning Ramsey's recent withdrawals, learned that a somewhat large sum had been withdrawn fairly recently, and jotted down the numbers of notes of the larger denominations.

"Well, little nephew," mused the detective's assistant, "these bank-note numbers are as good as a bloodhound."

The American newspapers joined in the hue and cry. The wireless was enlisted, the ports were searched for the fugitive from justice, and detailed descriptions adorned the notice-boards of every police station throughout America and Canada. Then, as so often happens to be the case, the interest of the public became fastened upon matters of more immediate interest, and the unsolved murder of Mr. Ramsey was relegated to the limbo of murders that seem to baffle solution.

The Nephew Who Disappeared.

A MONTH had passed, with Jack Ramsey far from the haunts of men, feeling very like a monarch in these deserted Canadian pinewoods, whither he had speeded those few weeks ago. Here, in these silent fastnesses, far from the distracting turmoil of the American cities, a man might call his soul his own, retain his manhood, discover happiness in the fight for his daily bread. If only his uncle hadn't shown such obstinacy, there might have been more sweetness, more satisfaction, in this thing that he had done. And then, one fine, bright morning, when young Ramsey began to realise that life was surely worth the living, a plain-clothes officer tapped him on the shoulder!

"For what?" he repeated, hoping that he had not heard aright.

"For the murder of your uncle, just four weeks ago. And robbery."

"Surely you've seen the papers?" persisted the officer. "They're full of it. There's your portrait, too, in most of them. Seems to me the folk hereabout are pretty blind not to have discovered the resemblance weeks ago."

"As a matter of fact," replied Ramsey, "I haven't seen a paper, or a neighbour, for weeks. We're right out of touch here. And in any case, as my stay was only temporary, there's been no reason for me to make friends."

"That's as may be," was the reply. "Anyhow, you're going back with me. And at once! Don't bother to pack. You'll hardly be needing luggage where you're bound for," he added significantly.

"But you're mad, man! I've a perfect answer to everything. It's ridiculous! Why on earth should I murder my uncle, who's proved—"

"Listen, Ramsey," said the officer kindly, "it'd be better for you to say nothing, just for the present. Better to get along and face the music. If you're innocent—why, there's such a thing as justice. But if you're guilty—well," he drawled, "there's justice also."

There was a rustle in court, a buzz of suppressed excitement when, an officer on either side of him, Jack Ramsey faced his accusers.

Three newspaper reporters were busily jotting down their impressions as Ramsey cast a rapid glance around the tiny court, as if attempting to sense its reactions towards him. His glance rested upon the three reporters with something akin to anger, but the glint in his eyes vanished when those same eyes met the sympathetic glance of a girl reporter. Slim, neat, grey-eyed, alert, she met his glance with a smile, a smile that heartened him, reminded him of that bright morning not so very long ago, when life had seemed particularly worth the living. And now—life seemed a very tenuous thing indeed.

A crisp, cold voice recalled the prisoner to realities.

"Now, Ramsey, this is your chance to tell your story. Why don't you do the right thing, and confess? It's clear as anything. You murder your uncle, you rob him, you disappear to the backwoods of Canada without a word to anyone, and—here you are, thanks to the law!"

"Confess?" he replied, in tones in which no attempt was made to conceal his opinion of its absurdity. "I've nothing to confess."

"Then perhaps you can explain your sudden disappearance and your calculated silence all this time?"

"My uncle," said Ramsey, "gave me the money that you suggest I have stolen, to purchase some timber land in Canada for him, and I rushed away at the very last moment in order not to miss my train connections."

"Sounds pretty plausible," was the comment. "But, if, as you say, you are innocent, why have you been in hiding all this time?"

"Hiding? Why, I've already told you! I was up in the timber country, out of touch with the world, until your man came with his ridiculous story and brought me here. God alone knows why."

At the feet of the detectives lay the body of William Ramsey, stabbed to the heart.

My uncle and I were the very best of friends. He'd always been good to me, ever since I was so high. Why, then, should I kill the best friend I ever had?"

"That will do. We'll keep you here—for a bit."

"Keep me here?" Young Ramsey seemed stunned at the news. Surely this thing was a nightmare! "You'll let me have legal assistance, I suppose?"

"Surely," answered the District Attorney

"And, at the same time, I'm going to find my uncle's murderer. He didn't have an enemy in the world."

"One thing at a time!" replied the Attorney coldly. "You can arrange to have legal assistance. As to discovering your uncle's murderer, you can safely leave that to the American police. You surely appreciate the position?" he added significantly.

Ramsey was being led away, when a remark of the girl reporter reached his astonished and grateful ears.

"Somehow," she was saying to her colleague, "I believe Jack Ramsey's story."

"Oh, you do, do you?" came the cynical reply of a colleague. "And you believe in Santa Claus, too. I suppose!"

"Maybe I do. But I know enough about circumstantial evidence to realise that there's a mighty big chance of the law making an error here."

"What is it that's caught you fancy, Gertrude?" was the unkind comment. "Is it the young gentleman's nice blue eyes, or can it be—"

"Shut up, Jim, you're impossible!"

"Or jealous!" Jim retorted.

The Verdict of the Court.

THE days dragged on. Jack Ramsey, chafing at inaction, suffered the tortures of the damned. Then came the bombshell.

"I have discovered," stated the coroner, "that the knife-wound did not kill Mr. Ramsey!"

"Ridiculous!" said the authorities.

"Ridiculous or not, there it is.

My autopsy discloses that Ramsey died from a mysterious unknown poison. I have endeavoured to discover just what that poison is, but so far without success. It seems to me to bear some resemblance to the poison with which some of the pygmy Africans tip their arrows, the source of which varies considerably. In some cases it is extracted from a rare plant and causes death within a few seconds of being used. In other instances the poison is said to be of animal origin and is just as swift in its action."

The judge made no attempt to conceal his impatience.

"The court is obliged to you," he observed, "for your interesting observations upon exotic poisons, but I personally feel that those observations are beside the point."

"I bow to your decision," replied the coroner, who thereupon left the witness-stand, his composure ruffled and his dignity offended.

Knife or poison, the scales seemed weighted against Jack Ramsey. The evidence in his own favour was of the slenderest, and of all the thousands of fellow-humans who followed the case with breathless interest, there was but one who retained untarnished faith in Jack Ramsey's innocence. The hours passed slowly along, and it seemed to the girl reporter, as she sat there noting down the evidence against him, that every tick of the clock was bringing the unfortunate lad nearer eternity. A little prayer escaped her—she who had hitherto scoffed at prayer—that Ramsey might be found innocent of the monstrous crime of which he stood accused, a crime of which this fine, keen-eyed fellow was surely not capable—not if she knew a real man when she saw one!

"Guilty?" echoed the girl, when the jury had brought in its verdict. "How anybody in their senses could give such a verdict is beyond me! It's unjust—terribly unjust!"

"Silence in court!" thundered the usher.

"What's the matter?" inquired the girl's gum-chewing colleague. "If murder trials upset you, tell the news editor you want to be quit of 'em in future. Better have a rest," he suggested.

"No, thanks," came the steady answer. "I'm all right."

The reporter sniggered, but looked startled when the girl gripped his arm.

"But I'll tell you this, my friend," she said, uttering her words with slow deliberation, "if it's the last act of my life I'll prove him to be innocent."

"Don't be foolish, Gertrude. It will take all the king's horses and all the king's men to reverse the decision that has demanded the life of Jack Ramsey. You're on the wrong track. I'll bet he'll pay the full penalty—as why shouldn't he?"

"We'll see," was her final reply, as, thrusting notebook into satchel, the girl strode away, her head full of plans to free this stranger from the awful fate that encompassed him.

The Girl Reporter Shows Her Hand.

"MR. RAMSEY." The wan-faced prisoner came to the door of his cell to meet the calm, grey eyes of the girl reporter. "Well," he asked, "is there anything new?"

The girl shook her head.

"Not yet. But listen, I've got a real, honest-to-goodness brain-wave. Guess what it is?"

"I haven't an idea. But I do know this: You've been wonderfully kind to me, a stranger almost without a friend in the world. You've been a real angel, but I don't think anything in the world can help me now. I'm afraid it's too late."

"You haven't heard me yet," she pleaded. "I'm going to get a famous detective to help us, someone who seems to have worked miracles in the past. He's succeeded where others have come up against a blank wall. I'm sure that if anyone's going to find a way out of this terrible business it is he."

"If there were time, I'd tell you some of the things he has done, the mysteries he's unravelled, the innocent folk he's released, snatched from the very jaws of death. He's uncanny. He has a sort of sixth sense that he places to wonderful uses. And he's going to set you free, if it costs every cent I've got in the world."

"Mr. Ramsey," she went on, with a catch in her voice, "You're not guilty of this terrible crime, are you?"

"I swear to you I am innocent! But what matter? It's too late. There's nothing in the world can save me now. But listen. I'm not short of funds, and I'll only consent to this new man taking up the bare chance of my case if I am responsible for the cost."

She touched his hand reassuringly through the iron bars, and he returned to his rough couch, a new, strange hope

"Is there anything new?" asked the wan-faced prisoner.

in his heart, hope born of the assurance of this keen grey-eyed girl, who seemed so certain of his ultimate freedom.

The Coffee Mill.

WILLIAM HAYDON, for such was the name of the famous detective, had searched the Ramsey home from top to bottom. He was a thin, wizened man with the appearance of an under-nourished clerk, and yet he possessed the brain of a super-man. Nothing missed his eagle eye as he assembled such data as might help him in this case.

"I've missed something," he kept on saying to himself. "I've noted everything in this place, and yet I'm sure I've overlooked some very important factor."

He sent for the housekeeper and questioned her again, but learned nothing of value.

The girl-reporter who had persuaded him to take up the case was with him, and after the detective had shuffled off on another hunt for clues she turned impulsively to the woman.

"Tell me you think young Mr. Ramsay is innocent. Do you believe in your heart he could have committed this wicked crime?"

"Suppose I do think him innocent," the woman answered stubbornly. "Even so, there's nothing in the world I can do to help him. The facts are too plain. Master Jack has had every chance to dispute those facts. I saw him and his uncle quarrelling. I know the money disappeared. I saw Mr. Jack rushing away from the house that night. Aren't they facts that have to be faced—and answered?"

Before the girl was able to protest, a voice came to her from the pantry.

"Miss Clark! Miss Clark! Come in at once. There's something here that wants looking into!"

The voice of the detective seemed a blend of hope and excitement.

The two women hurried towards the sound of his voice—it came from the kitchen.

"Tell me," said the detective to the housekeeper, pointing to a coffee-grinder fastened to the wall, "who in this house drinks coffee?"

"No one, sir, but the late Mr. Ramsey. He had his coffee freshly ground here each day."

"Ah!" he said, turning triumphantly to the girl. "I think I have made a startling discovery."

"Oh, tell me, please!" begged Miss Clark. "Quickly, quickly!"

"Well, have you ever heard of that deadly spider that is known as the black widow?"

"Never."

"Well, I believe I have the solution of the mysterious unknown poison that killed Ramsey."

Very excitedly the girl replied:

"How? What?"

Then she followed the detective's pointing finger.

"Do you see that spider-web up there, almost immediately over the coffee-grinder?"

"Yes, I see it."

"Well, I noticed a moment ago a black spider, such as I told you of, darting into that web to kill one of the house spiders."

"Look," he said, "there's another, almost on the edge of the coffee-grinder. Why, there must be a regular nest of them!"

"Yes," said the girl; "but how can you connect this spider, or nest of black spiders, with the death of Mr. Ramsey?"

"I wouldn't swear to it, but it seems to me that one of these black widow spiders must have dropped into the coffee machine."

November 7th, 1931.

"How can we prove it?"

"In the only possible way. Tell you what we'll do. We'll capture one of the spiders, take it to the analyst, together with some of the coffee, and compare it with the poison which is said to have caused Ramsey death."

"But how on earth could the spiders have got into the house?" The girl was puzzled.

"Well, miss, maybe I could explain that," cried the housekeeper. "The master was very fond of curios and stuff that I thought rubbish. You've seen all those old knives, bows and arrows, head-dresses and images in the library—they're from some long-dead Indian race. One time he had some snakes that came from their country and other pests, and I told the master I wouldn't stay in the same house with the creatures. And I remember now that he did say something about a collection of spiders what were dreadfully poisonous, but when he sent the pests to some museum I forgot all about the matter. Could some of them have escaped, Mr. Haydon?"

"More than likely." The detective stared at the web. "Our next task is to catch one of them. We must take every precaution."

As the housekeeper was much too scared it resolved on the detective and the girl. With the aid of a pencil and a matchbox the man endeavoured to secure a spider, whilst the girl assisted with a duster.

The spiders had bodies half an inch in length, whilst the hairy legs made them nearly two inches overall. Before they had seemed rather ordinary, but now that they were being attacked they moved with great speed, and often turned as if to fight.

There they hung, things of ill-omen, repulsive in appearance, insects such as one dreams of, but never hopes to see. Hideous things they were. Even the hard-bitten detective, inured to many a strange experience in many a corner of the world, could scarce repress a shudder as these dark forms darted about in their flimsy eyrie.

"Ugh!" he muttered, and the housekeeper hid her ruddy face behind a voluminous apron!

Suddenly the detective heard a little, stifled scream.

"What's the matter?" he demanded as the girl's face was twisted with pain. "I think one of the spiders bit me," she managed to smile. "But it's nothing very much."

The detective would have assisted her, but with a determined smile the girl discouraged his help.

"It's all right," she said. "Maybe I imagined it. But we haven't much time. Do, please, let's hurry!"

With all possible speed, a specimen of the black widow safely enclosed in a box, the pair made their way to the office of the coroner's analyst.

Impatiently the detective awaited the expert's verdict, the while the girl drowsed on a seat near at hand.

"Sleepy?" he asked the girl-reporter. "Very—I feel almost ill. The very sight of those horrible things seems to have upset me. They're unnatural!"

"You'll be better when you're in the air again. We shan't be long now."

"It's done!" said the chemist, at length, after interminable business with his hissing retorts.

"These poisons are identical. There is no question in my mind now, but that this is what caused Ramsey's death."

"You mean," said the girl weakly, "that the black widow and not Jack Ramsey was responsible?"

"I do, young lady. And I'll stake my professional reputation upon it."

The girl's face was illuminated with a smile of real happiness. Then, practical as ever, she came down to earth again.

"Tell me quickly, what time is it?"

"It's just two a.m."

"Then," whipped out the girl-reporter, emerging suddenly from her drowsiness, "we haven't a second to spare. The execution of poor Ramsey is at six. We must reach the governor at any cost. One precious human life is at stake."

Without a moment's loss, detective, Miss Clark, analyst, and Ramsey's lawyer made for the prison, covering the miles with a fine disregard for speed limits, routed the governor from his bed, placed before him the new and startling facts which the analyst had disclosed, and begged him, in the name of justice, to rescind the order for Ramsey's execution.

"From what you have heard," said the lawyer, "you should be able to realise just what happened. The coffee was poisoned, unintentionally, of course. When Mr. Ramsey drank that coffee and absorbed the poison, he toppled over unconscious on to the knife. But the poison was the real cause of Ramsey's death."

The governor listened, but to their intense dismay, was apparently unconvinced. Routed out as he had been from a comfortable bed, he seemed unable to grasp fully the significance of the discovery.

"I'm sorry," he said, in a voice as cold as death itself, "but I'll have to allow the law to take its course."

"But, governor," pleaded the lawyer, hardly crediting the evidence of his ears, "can't you see that—"

His words were interrupted by the strange appearance of Miss Clark. Rising with difficulty, she attempted to stagger across the floor, then collapsed all in a heap.

"What's wrong?" flew to the lips of them all, as they surveyed the prostrate, unconscious girl.

"Did this young lady come into contact with the poison?" rapped out the analyst.

"Not that I know of," said the detective, then gave a gasp of dismay. "She thought one of the spiders bit her when we were capturing a specimen. But she made so little of it that I imagined she was mistaken. Do you think the spider injected poison into her?"

"Well," came the reply, "she shows the same symptoms of poisoning as the late Mr. Ramsey."

"Then for Heaven's sake let us do something for her!" The detective faced the governor. "Guess it's up to you, sir, to do something now. Do you want further evidence? We've got to get this girl to hospital, and you would be advised to stay the execution of young Ramsey."

The governor realised that here was evidence of a startling character. The girl was undoubtedly very ill, and she was displaying, as he knew, all the symptoms of the dead man.

In a few seconds he was speaking to the warden.

"Stay the execution of Jack Ramsey. Evidence has just been put before me that is so convincing that it must be inquired into before the law takes its course. Frankly I think there has been a terrible mistake. See that Ramsey is treated with every consideration. Yes, you can tell him that he can hope for the best."

(Continued on page 28.)

A fearless young fireman invents a fire-fighting machine, but a fiendish enemy does everything to steal the plans and rob the hero of the girl he worships. A grand serial of breathless suspense and thrilling drama. Starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.

"HEROES of the FLAMES"

A Fight for Life.

A YELL of horror escaped Pat Heeley as he watched car and motor-bike plunge over the bluff into the depths of the river. Then, from his vantage point, he saw a head rise through the whirl of water that marked the spot where the two machines had disappeared.

The head was Bob's, and with bated breath Pat watched him dive again and again below the surface, obviously searching for June Madison. Nor was the search in vain, for at last, when hope of discovering her alive was almost abandoned, Bob came to the top with the girl's limp figure in his arms.

She was unconscious, perhaps dead, and she remained inert as Bob kicked out for the shore. Swimming on his back, and supporting her by the shoulders with a light but secure grasp, he gained the river's edge after a grim battle with the strong current and staggered on to firm ground with her.

Meanwhile Pat was not idle, for the instant he perceived Bob wading ashore he turned to scan the vicinity for some habitation, and as he caught sight of a bungalow two or three hundred yards away he made for it at the double.

As far as Pat was concerned, Spike Belton and his rough-necks were forgotten. Indeed, they were no longer in sight, for, with the coveted formula in their possession, they had quickly made themselves scarce when the fight with Bob and his Irish chum had been so tragically interrupted.

Pat raced on to the bungalow. An elderly woman was sitting in the porch, and as he came up the Irishman quickly explained the situation and asked if he could make a 'phone-call, and just thirty seconds later he was in touch with the station-house of Number Five District, San Francisco.

EPISODE 10.

"A Flaming Death."

"Hallo!" he panted. "Oh, is that you, Jerry? Pat Heeley talkin'. Send out a rescue car, will yez? Morgan's Point. Drowning case. Hurry up wid yez—"

The call made, Pat made for the shore and helped Bob to carry June to the bungalow, the elderly woman showing them into a spacious and airy room.

"They're sendin' a rescue car from the foire station, Bob," Pat said as June was being laid on the floor. "Do ye think she's gonna pull through?"

"She's in a bad way," Bob answered, his voice trembling with emotion. "Her heart doesn't seem to be beating—"

He dropped on his knees and began to work her arms to and fro, hoping against hope that she would revive. In the meantime Pat made for the 'phone again—this time to call up June's father.

A maid answered the 'phone, and, asking Pat to hang on, passed through to a library where James Madison was engaged in conversation with Dan Mitchell.

"A Mr. Heeley?" Madison repeated as the maid gave him the message. And then to Mitchell: "Maybe Pat has some news about the formula," he added. "You'll excuse me, won't you?"

He hurried to the telephone, and as he spoke into the mouthpiece Pat's voice came to him through the receiver.

"Misther Madison," the Irishman stammered, "Oi—Oi think ye'd better jump into yer car an' droive out to Morgan's Point. Ye see, June's a little bit hurt—"

"What! What's that, Pat? June hurt—"

"Oh, just a little bit, Mr. Madison," Pat said hastily; but Madison sensed that he was trying to hide the gravity of the situation, and he was in an agony of suspense when he informed Mitchell of what had happened.

"My car's outside," Mitchell declared, eager to learn the full facts and to discover the fate of the formula. "I'll get you there in no time."

At that same moment the rescue van from the fire station was passing the gates of the Madison home en route to Morgan's Point, and, fast as Mitchell travelled, the ambulance reached the riverside bungalow some time before the automobile.

Pat Heeley met the occupants of the rescue car at the door and hurried them into the room where June lay, still apparently lifeless in spite of Bob's desperate attempts to revive her.

"Is she breathing at all?" one of the newcomers asked.

"I can't tell, Riley," Bob answered hoarsely. "I'm not sure."

"We'd better give her the respirator," Riley announced; and, to the fireman who had accompanied him: "Turn her right over, Mac," he said.

Bob stood by while the life-saving apparatus was made ready, and, as he awaited the result of the rescue men's efforts, the anxiety he experienced was almost unendurable.

"It's all right, Bob," Pat Heeley kept telling him. "She'll come out of it. She'll pull through."

Pat's confidence was justified, for, after what seemed an eternity, Riley gave an exclamation of satisfaction.

"She's coming round," he stated, and with that Bob stumbled forward and again dropped on his knees beside June.

"Bob?" she whispered as she turned her eyes full upon him.

"Oh, June, thank Heaven you're safe," Bob breathed. "I thought I'd lost you, dear. If anything ever happened to you—"

He did not finish the sentence, for Riley tapped him on the shoulder.

"Say, Bob," he advised, "put her on that couch and get a lot of blankets around her. Keep her warm. And Pat, you can give me a report on how this happened."

"Never mind the report now, Riley," Pat rejoined. "I'll give it to ye at the station."

He walked out to the rescue car with the two firemen, Riley and Mae, and as he was talking to them the car containing Mitchell and Madison drew up alongside.

"Where's June?" Madison panted as he caught sight of the Irishman.

"In the house, Mr. Madison," Pat answered cheerfully. "An' she's come out of it fine."

Followed by Dan Mitchell, Madison entered the bungalow and crossed the threshold of the room where June had been the cause of so many anxious moments.

"Here she is, Mr. Madison," Bob greeted him. "She's all right now, I guess."

"June!" the scientist cried, visibly relieved, but still showing signs of agitation. "June, how did this happen?"

It was Bob who explained, and when he had related all that had occurred there was a spell of silence, which Mitchell was the first to break.

"And this gang that attacked you," he said, trying to subdue any intonation of the voice that might betray his hunger for information. "I hope they didn't get what they were after."

"They did," Bob answered curtly. "I'm afraid they got clear away with my formula. I mean to make sure, of course, but I haven't the slightest doubt that it's in their possession."

James Madison pursed his lips. "If it is, Bob," he declared, "we'll get it back. I tell you we'll hound down this gang—and the man who is responsible for their cowardly attacks. For I'm convinced that there's some big brain working behind the scenes in this affair."

Standing in the background, Mitchell looked from one to the other narrowly, but when he spoke it was to mask his guilt with an offer of assistance.

"If I can be of any help, Darrow," he observed, "you can count on me as well."

"Much obliged, I'm sure," Bob returned. "But in the meantime I'm chiefly concerned about June, and I think we ought to get her home as soon as possible. You see, her safety means more to me than all the formulas in the world."

The Double-Cross.

SPIKE BELDON and his fellow gangsters were gathered in a lofty apartment on the top floor of a dockland tenement, within sight and sound of the shipping in Frisco's harbour waters.

"We've done all the dirty work," Spike was saying, "an' we're entitled to a bigger cut-out than Mitchell agreed to give us when he hired us. So if he wants that formula, he's gotta come across with some real money."

There was a murmur of approval from the others.

"It's okay with us, Spike," put in Silk Connolly, "if you reckon you can get away with it."

"We'll get away with it all right," Spike announced with confidence. "I got in touch with Mitchell an' told him where he could find us, and he oughta be here pretty soon. An' believe me, he'll come across."

November 7th, 1931.

The gang was not quite complete until the burly Butch came through from a back room, where he had been sponging a pair of trousers with petrol from a two-gallon can. He cut a somewhat comical figure, standing in his underwear, but listened earnestly as the situation was explained to him, and he was voicing his appreciation of Spike's suggestion when Connolly interrupted him.

"Here comes Mitchell now," he blurted, peering from the window. "What'll we do, Spike?"

"Now don't get panicky," Beldon snapped, as he saw that the gangsters betrayed immediate signs of uneasiness in spite of the resolution they had shown a moment before. "All we gotta do is keep cool and sit tight, and we'll get exactly what we want for this formula."

The rogues nodded, and assumed an air of leisurely indifference.

"I'll finish cleanin' my pants in the kitchen," said Butch, retiring to the other room, and he had hardly disappeared beyond the threshold when Mitchell showed up.

Spike and his associates greeted him casually, and Mitchell eyed them with an eagerness that he could not conceal.

"Well," he said, "where is it?" Silk Connolly was the first to make any rejoinder.

"Where's what?" he inquired innocently. "What are you talkin' about?"

"Darrow's formula," Mitchell retorted impatiently.

"Darrow's formula?" It was Spike who addressed him now. "We didn't say we had any formula, did we?"

"Now listen, Spike," Mitchell rapped out. "Don't try and pull any funny stuff on me. I know you've got it, for I've seen Darrow and the Madisons. With that formula in my hands, I can put the fire-bomb on the market in place of that phoney extinguisher I once tried to palm off on Madison, and I can clean up a fortune. Darrow hasn't had a chance to take out a patent on it yet, and—"

"Wait a minute, Mitchell," Spike interrupted. "What do we get out of all this?"

Mitchell's glance seemed to bore into him. If he had not suspected it an instant before, he knew now that his hirelings were trying to hold out on him.

"You know what you're getting out of it," he grated. "That was fixed when you agreed to tie up with me. I warn you, Spike—and the rest of you, too—don't try any tricks on me! I want that formula—and I'm going to get it!"

"You can't scare us, Mitchell," sneered Spike. "We got the formula all right, but we had to fight for it while you were takin' it easy. So me an' the boys have decided that, if you want it, you've gotta pay—an' pay plenty."

Mitchell's face was livid with passion. "Aw, so that's your gag, huh?" he blazed; and then, rounding on the other gangsters in the room: "You fellers get out of here!" he ordered harshly. "Spike and I will settle this alone."

The rogues hesitated, but, at a mute signal from Spike, they obeyed Mitchell and filed out on to the landing, closing the door behind them.

Mitchell controlled his anger. "Well," he said softly, "before we decide how much I'm going to pay, I'd like to be sure that you've got that formula, Spike."

Spike laughed. "I've got the formula all right," he stated, producing a folded sheet of paper.

Mitchell snatched at it, but, with a rapidity that baffled the promoter, Spike thrust it back into his pocket, and almost at the same instant he had Mitchell covered by a wicked-looking automatic.

"Not so fast!" he snarled. "I said if you wanted that formula you'd have to pay!"

Mitchell had raised his hands. Indubitably he was seething with rage and chagrin, but the gun was an argument against any immediate violence, and he saw that he would have to use strategy. "All right, Spike," he said, with a shrug that seemed to imply defeat.

He reached for the inside pocket where he kept his wallet, and, grinning a crooked grin of satisfaction, Spike momentarily allowed himself to be taken off his guard.

Mitchell was quick to seize his chance. With a sudden rush he crowded Beldon across the room and clutched the gun, and next moment the two men were involved in a savage struggle for possession of the weapon.

In the kitchen, where he had retired to sponge his trousers, Butch had abandoned his task a few seconds before to hear what passed between Spike and the promoter. The can of petrol was in his grasp, minus the screw-stopper, and the instant he became aware of the scuffle in the next room he whipped round with the intention of setting down the two-gallon tin and going to Spike's rescue.

He was in the very act of wheeling when the gun in Beldon's hand went off with a crash, and a slug of lead burst through the kitchen door and missed Butch by a hair's breadth. He sprang away with a shout, even as a second and a third random bullet ripped their way through the panelling.

The last shot clipped the petrol-can, and Butch uttered a yelp as he let it fall from his grasp. The tin spilled its contents over the floor, and formed a spreading pool around a lighted oil-stove standing in a corner, and suddenly there was a blinding flash of blue flame as the fumes exploded.

Panic-stricken and bewildered, Butch stumbled aside. Only when a rug caught fire did he recognise the peril of the situation, and he made a tentative attempt to stamp the flames underfoot, but the linoleum was ablaze as well and, still clad in his underwear, Butch was in no condition to fight a conflagration.

He lost his nerve and made his escape via a side-exit that opened on to the landing, and as he ran out of the apartment he saw the rest of the gang gathered near the head of the staircase.

"What's goin' on in there?" Connolly demanded. "Does Spike need—"

"Beat it!" Butch interrupted hoarsely. "The dump is burnin', an' in another five minutes there'll be an army o' firemen round here—an' cops, too!"

There was an immediate stampede for the stairs. Meanwhile Spike Beldon and Mitchell were battling furiously, and not even the swifter approach of fire could check them in their life-and-death struggle. The flames roared in the kitchen, enveloped everything in their greedy coils and writhed through into the front room, destroying the communicating door and seizing carpet and furniture in their lurid grip. Still the two men fought on, as the blaze waxed fiercer around them.

Rocking back and forth through smoke and flames, stumbling, cursing, wrestling, they seemed scarcely aware of their danger. The gun remained in Spike's grasp, but Mitchell managed to keep its muzzle turned aside, and at intervals a bullet pierced the inferno that was raging about the figures of the two men. Only when the last cartridge had been fired harmlessly into the floor was the weapon abandoned, Spike letting it fall from his fingers.

The crooks were evenly matched, and there was every prospect of the struggle being prolonged until the room actually became untenable. Even now the flames had risen to the ceiling and were eating away plaster and timbers.

With a sudden supreme effort Mitchell threw Spike backward, then sprang after the gangster as he was tottering off his balance. Spike dived over a table and plunged senseless into a whirling chaos of smoke and fire, and with an exultant shout Mitchell started towards his prone form to relieve the thug of the precious document he was carrying.

Before he could reach Spike, a section of the roof collapsed, and a smouldering beam struck Mitchell a glancing blow on the head. He sank with a groan.

The Call.

BOB and Pat Heeley were lounging in the entrance of the Fire-House when a car drew up near by, and as they glanced towards the auto they saw June and her father emerge from it.

"Hallo, Bob," June greeted, "I thought I'd surprise you. I knew you'd be worried about me—wondering if that cold plunge had had any bad effects—so here I am to prove to you that I'm perfectly all right."

"I was worried, dear," Bob confessed. "But, say, now that you and your father are here how would you like to look over the station?"

"Oh, I'd love it," June declared, but before Bob could make good the invitation the alarm-bell pealed loudly and insistently through the entire building.

Bob and Pat seemed to stiffen, and the former spoke to June and her father laconically.

"That's a run for us," he jerked. "See you later!" And next moment he and Pat were sprinting for their fire-jackets and helmets.

Well within the regulation time the chief's car swept out of the fire-house into the street, and it was followed by the big engines and escapes of the Flame-Fighting Squad.

As the last one stormed past the spot where June was standing the girl turned to her father excitedly.

"Dad," she exclaimed, "let's follow the fire-trucks and see where the blaze is!"

They scrambled into the auto and drove after the red giants that were clanging through the city streets, and they were on the scene of the fire just after the first nose was turned on the burning building.

It was the tenement in which Beldon and Mitchell had come to grips, and all at once the head and shoulders of Mitchell were observed in the window of the top-floor room where he had been fighting. The man seemed at the last gasp, and could only drag himself to the aperture and utter a single shout for help ere sinking back in a stupor again.

Bob, Pat Heeley, and several other men were already preparing to enter the building, and, while his comrades searched the other floors for casualties, Bob raced up to the top story. He had to fight his way through a sea of flame, but at last he located the apartment in which Mitchell had been seen, and, forcing an entry, he discovered him amidst the debris and lifted him to his feet.

At that instant Pat Heeley and the other firemen were hurrying from the building to report that the second floor was threatening collapse, and Battalion Chief Wilson had received this grim intelligence when the figure of Bob Darrow appeared in the top-story window where Mitchell had previously been discerned.

"Below there!" he hailed. "Get ready with the life-net."

Bob was supporting the form of Mitchell in his arms, and as he saw a number of his comrades rush across the street with a safety-net he helped the promoter to the sill.

Mitchell was conscious now, but he was dazed and badly frightened, and Bob had to take grip of him as he crouched on the window-ledge.

"Remember, Mitchell," he said, "when you jump throw your feet ahead of you and land on your back!"

Mitchell was sufficiently in possession of his wits to turn sick with dread at the prospect of the plunge through space. But he knew it was his one chance of escaping death, and, clenching his teeth, he sprang from the sill.

The hurtling flight through mid-air took his breath away, and terror seized him like a cold chill. Then he struck the net and lay gasping in it.

Strong hands set him on his feet, and he stumbled to the other side of the street, where he was for the time being forgotten. For Bob Darrow was now the object of everyone's concern, and, while the hoses were streaming on the burning tenement, Pat Heeley raised his voice.

"Hey, Bob," he yelled, "you gotta come down roight away! Chief's orders."

"There's another man in here!" Bob shouted back, and disappeared from the window.

Bob had seen the body of Spike Beldon lying on the floor of the blazing room, and had already recognised him for an old and unwelcome acquaintance. But, though he had every excuse for abandoning the ruffian to his well-deserved fate, he had no intention of doing so, and he stumbled through the flames to where the gangster was huddled.

The man's eyes were open, and he was propped on one elbow. But as Bob stooped over him he slipped back in a faint, and he was a dead weight when the young fireman pulled him on to his back.

It was too hazardous to drop the senseless rogue to the life-net, and there was nothing for it but to carry him down the stairs. Taking a firm grip on his burden, Bob started for the door.

It had swung to, but he dragged it open. A mass of scorching flame swept in from the landing and enveloped Bob, burning his hands and face, and the smoke that he swallowed tortured his lungs. But he struggled on through the inferno and reached the head of the staircase.

The unconscious thug was slung over Bob's shoulder.

He descended the first flight laboriously, and had hardly reached the lower landing when there was a collapse from above. Flaming timber fell in showers, and the corner of a heavy beam struck him on the shoulder, almost falling him.

Tottering momentarily, he managed to regain his balance, however, and blundered down towards the ground level.

That descent was as hazardous as any he had ever experienced, but he gained the side-walk without serious mishap, and a shout of relief went up as he was sighted by those in the street.

He staggered towards some crates that had been removed from a store and carried to a place of safety, and here he laid Spike Beldon.

He had hardly lowered the gangster to the pavement when he was joined by the Madisons and Battalion Chief Wilson.

"Are you all right, Bob?" James Madison and the chief asked in one breath.

"Sure, I'm all right," Bob coughed. "I'll feel a lot better when I get some of this smoke out of my windpipe, though."

"Oh, Bob," June sobbed, "when I saw you up at that window I thought I'd faint, and when you turned back into the room I couldn't believe you'd ever get clear."

Wilson laughed.

"You're not going to lose him so easily as that, Miss June," he observed. "Bob's got to eat a lot of smoke yet before he's through."

A surgeon and a couple of police officers had approached, and, while Bob was assuring June that he was in perfect trim, the medical officer made a quick examination of Spike Beldon.

The man had suffered injuries to the head during a collapse of the ceiling, and he showed no signs of recovering consciousness during the time that the surgeon took to bandage him.

"This fellow's in a bad way," the doctor said, looking up all at once. "Some debris must have fallen on him, and he's swallowed a lot of smoke besides. He doesn't seem to be taking much interest in anything at the moment, I guess."

Bob turned at the medical man's words. Dan Mitchell's presence in the tenement with Spike Beldon was a circumstance that had set him thinking, and he now saw an opportunity of unravelling the problem that had baffled him for so long.

"Chief," he said to Wilson, "I want to keep my hands on this man, for I think he can lead me to the real head of the gang that's been working against me."

"By all means, Bob," Wilson rejoined. "Do exactly as you think fit. I'll put you on sick leave."

"Thanks," Bob murmured, and then he turned to the medical officer who had examined Beldon.

"Say, doc," he urged, "will you do me a favour and let this fellow think he's badly hurt when he recovers? I want him to imagine he's due to attend his own funeral. I want to throw a scare into him."

The surgeon demurred.

"I'm afraid that's one favour I can't do," he began. "You see, it's a pretty big scare to give a man—"

"Ah, don't waste any soft feelings on that guy, doc!" It was the voice of one of the police officers who interrupted him. "He's a notorious hard case that hangs out in this neighbourhood. One of the worst things that hasn't yet been roped in."

"And I have a special reason for putting my request," put in Bob. "It November 7th, 1931.

would take too long to tell you the whole story, doc, but this man has been concerned in one or two ugly attacks on me. At the same time, I'm convinced he's been hired by someone else, and I want to find out the name of the man he's working for. If he thinks he's passing out, he's likely to talk—at least, I'm hoping so."

"Say, that's a good idea," declared the other police officer appreciatively, "and I'd like to see this bird in gaol, anyhow."

Satisfied that he need waste no sentiment on Spike Beldon, the doctor agreed to Bob's suggestion.

"All right," he said, "when he comes round I'll make him think he's ready for the coroner."

It was arranged that Beldon should be taken to the Madisons' home, and, while June and her father hurried on to their car, Wilson and the police officer lifted the crook from the ground.

The unconscious thug was slung over Bob's shoulder, and the fireman started along the sidewalk with his inert burden.

From a street corner hard by a man watched his progress. The man was Dan Mitchell, and Mitchell was staring after Bob intently when he felt a touch on his arm, and whipped round to discover Silk Connolly at his elbow.

"Say," Connolly jerked, "what are they gonna do with Spike? D'you think he'll squeal, Mitch?"

"Shut up!" Dan Mitchell rejoined harshly. "And listen—keep your eyes and ears open. Follow 'em, and let me know at the office if Spike is made to talk."

"Say," Connolly began truculently, "I don't see why I should do—"

"It's for your own safety as well as mine," Mitchell interrupted in a heated tone. "Get busy, will you? Get busy!"

The Confession.

WHEN Spike Beldon recovered consciousness it was to find himself lying in a chair with a group of people about him. The group included Bob Darrow, the Madisons, a couple of police officers, and the surgeon.

The latter spoke as the crook opened his eyes, and Spike did not see the significant look that passed between the medical man and the rest of the company. He only heard the doctor's ominous words.

"I'm afraid he's a hopeless case. A man can't possibly survive those injuries."

Spike blanched. Could it be possible that he was the subject of conversation?

He raised his bandaged head and met the doctor's solemn glance.

"Take it easy, my friend," the medical man advised. "You can help us by answering a question or two. There don't seem to be any papers of identity on you, and we'd like to know who we should notify if—well, if you don't pull through."

Spike was white to the lips.

"Doc," he moaned, "am I—am I really as bad as that?"

It was Bob who answered him.

"I guess so," he told the crook. "Why don't you come clean before it's too late? Who's been behind all these attempts to get my formula? Who's your boss?"

Spike moistened his lips.

"I'll tell yuh, Darrow," he faltered. "I ain't got nothin' against yuh. The guy that hired me an' the boys was—was Dan Mitchell."

"I thought so," Bob ground out. "When I found the pair of you in that tenement room to-day I guessed as much, but I wanted to be sure. And where's the formula?"

"Mitchell took it off me just before you showed up," Spike answered. "Then he sorta stumped down alongside me, an' that's the last thing I know— for I fainted off—"

The words were scarcely uttered when there was a commotion in the hall, and a moment afterwards Pat Heeley burst into the room.

"Bob," he gasped, "I've just seen one o' them gangsters beatin' it through the grounds. Oi got leave from the chief to come here after the foire, an' Oi was walkin' along the droive when Oi got a squint at the spalpeen skulkin' by the Frinch windows."

"He must have been listening," Bob rapped out, "and he'll warn Mitchell. What we've got to do is to make straight for Mitchell's office. Doc, you and Mr. Madison hold Spike. You two officers come with Pat and me. And Spike," he added, a twinkle in his eye, "cheer up, will you? You're going to live to do a long stretch in the penitentiary."

He wheeled and made for the door, and as he entered the hall he found that June, as well as Pat and the two police officers, was following him.

"I'm going, too, Bob," the girl declared resolutely.

Bob was about to protest when he realised that Spike Beldon was on the point of giving utterance to his feelings, the truth having dawned on him.

"Yes, maybe you'd better come with us, June," the young fireman said with a grin. "I believe Spike's getting ready to use some bad language."

The party left the house and climbed into a touring-car in which the police officers had driven to the house. At that same instant Silk Connolly was starting the engine of an automobile beyond the gates of the drive.

Connolly drove cityward at the top speed of his car, and, losing the other vehicle amid the traffic of San Francisco's crowded streets, he swung into a side-turning and pulled up outside a phone-box.

A few seconds later a bell rang in Dan Mitchell's down-town office, and Mitchell was about to cross to the telephone when his secretary came through from another room.

"I'll answer that call if you like, Mr. Mitchell," she offered.

The promoter scowled at her.

"Who asked you to stay here?" he demanded irritably. "Get your hat and coat and go home. You understand? Get out of here."

The girl departed, and Mitchell picked up the receiver of the phone.

"Hallo," he called. "No—Mitchell's not here— Oh, is that you, Silk? Well, why in the name of Creation didn't you say so? I'm busy here—getting ready to burn my private papers. I may have to make a quick getaway if things go wrong."

"You'll have to make your getaway all right," came the voice of Silk. "Spike has spilled the works, Mitch. Darrow's wise, and he's on his way now—with the cops."

Mitchell crammed the receiver on to its hook and turned towards the waste paper basket, which was packed with documents.

"Spike spilled the works, huh?" he ground out. "The dirty double-crosser—"

He struck a match and held it to the papers in the basket. They blazed up almost at once, and, pausing only to light a cigarette from the beacon, Mitchell reached for his hat and slipped out of the office.

He took the lift to the ground floor, and, emerging on to the sidewalk,

(Continued on page 25.)

"LASCA OF THE RIO GRANDE."

(Continued from page 16.)

"A blanketed Indian brought a rough breakfast. Kincaid told him:

"I must speak with your master."

The fellow shook his hair-braided head and departed. Heavy bolts were shot into their staples—hour after hour went by; the prisoner standing by the tiny look-out window, watching and waiting.

At last came a sign from his gaoler. A smooth, oily-looking dago unbarred the door and peered in.

"The Senor Santa Cruz presents compliments to the Senor Ranger," he grinned. "There is to be a wedding this evening." He grinned still more evilly at Kincaid. "To-morrow the Senor Santa Cruz will entertain the Senor Ranger," he ended, making a gesture as if putting a rope about his neck.

For a mad moment Kincaid had thoughts of springing out on this smirking fellow and overpowering him, then fighting his way out. But he controlled his rage; Lasca had to be brought to El Paso and delivered into custody. Then would come Jose's turn.

He listened to the dago without moving a muscle of his set face.

In the early evening came another visitor—Lasca herself. She was admitted by the burly bearded cowpuncher outside with whom she seemed to be on friendly footing.

"Miles, my poor friend," she murmured. "Jose has sent for a padre. We are to be married this evening." She drew her long cloak round about her, as if she were cold, as she tipped to where he stood stonily regarding her. "You shall escape from here while Jose and the rest are busy with the wedding. I have given money to Gonzalez, who is on guard outside the door, and when there is a good chance he will unlock the door very quiet and go away. Then you go."

"Is it a trap?" he asked brutally. "A good chance for me to be shot in the back as I run?"

"But how can you think so of me?" she reproached him, her eyes full of tears. "Me, I hate them all—even Jose. One time I think him very fine, very wonderful. Then you come, Miles, and I see no one else."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"It is true, Miles," she said passionately. "See, I throw away the ring Jose give me." She plucked the shining ring from her finger and threw it out of the little cross-barred window. "Forgive me, Miles—forget me!" she cried wildly, as she ran from the prison chamber.

Outside, below the window, Jose stood listening. He had followed her unseen and unsuspected. He picked up the mis-stoned ring, smiling softly to himself as he put it into his pocket. Like a cat he crept away.

He called Pedro to him when again in his own room.

"Listen, my little Pedro," he ordered. "The Senor Ranger is a runaway from the office of the Chief Ranger at El Paso. We capture him last night because we are always on the side of the law, yes?"

"Yes," agreed Pedro, watching for a hint.

"It would be correct for you to shoot him down, if he try to get away from here," went on Jose.

(Continued on page 27.)

"HEROES OF THE FLAMES."

(Continued from page 24.)

crossed to a roadster standing at the kerb. The scoundrelly promoter entered it, took his place behind the steering wheel and pressed the self-starter, and as the auto was moving forward he saw in his side-mirror the reflection of another car swinging into the street.

It was the touter that contained Bob Darrow and his party, and with an oath Mitchell jammed his foot on the accelerator.

The chase that followed was maintained at break-neck pace, Mitchell driving recklessly through the busy streets, and the pursuing touter storming in his trail. Half a dozen times one or the other of the two autos was within an ace of being piled up on the kerb, but without serious misadventure they raced on through the city till the less populous environs were reached.

Mitchell was heading for the coast road, and once he gained it he fairly gave his roadster "the gas." But if they had been unable to make up on him amid the traffic of the city, the police officers soon showed that their touring car was capable of overtaking the fugitive on the open highway.

Its speed exceeded the other auto's by a clear ten miles an hour, and the distance between the two cars was steadily reduced. In the space of a few minutes they were racing abreast.

Bob was occupying the back of the police car with June, and now, though the girl tried to restrain him, he swung open the door and stepped out on to the running-board. For a moment he braced himself, and in that moment heard June's voice, shrill with alarm.

"Bob, you'll be killed! Don't, Bob!" But he disregarded the warning, and with a sudden plunge he threw himself from the police car to Mitchell's roadster. He tumbled over the side of the crook's machine, and in another instant was struggling to reach the controls.

Mitchell tried to strike at him with one fist, but Bob's fingers closed on the hand-brake and he wrenched on it with all his might, counteracting the acceleration. The roadster slackened pace considerably, and the police car immediately forged ahead and swerved into its path, forcing Mitchell to bring his machine to a standstill.

The crook dived from the auto and attempted to run for it, but Bob sprang after him and seized him. There was a sharp scuffle, which ended in Mitchell finding himself a prisoner in Bob's powerful grasp, and police officers came along at the double.

"Keep hold of him, boys," Bob said, handing his captive over to the representatives of the law.

Mitchell began to struggle, and he proved a handful for the police officers till Pat Heeley lent his assistance.

"Aisy, there e, or it's a punch in the snoot O'll be givin' yez!"

Mitchell was dragged into the police car, from which June had by this time descended, and, while the rascally promoter was held powerless in the grip of Pat and the officers, Bob searched him rapidly. From an inside pocket in the crook's jacket he produced a wallet, and it was as he opened this that he found what he wanted—a sheet of paper on which a number of chemical symbols had been written out.

"This is my formula," Bob announced, "and I'd like you officers to testify that I found it on this man's person."

"We'll do that all right, Fireman," one of the officers answered.

"Okay," said Bob. "You'd better take him along, then. I'll be down at headquarters to prefer charges against him later."

A pair of manacles were slipped over Mitchell's wrists, and, resigned to his fate, he sunk sullenly into a corner of the car. One of the police officers settled himself beside him, and the other took the wheel.

"Say, Darrow," the man behind the steering-column drawled, "why wait till later to prefer those charges? There's room in this car for us all—at a squeeze."

"No," Bob replied. "I think Miss Madison and I will travel back in Mitchell's outfit. You can drive for us, Pat."

Bob and June turned towards the other car, and Pat winked at the police officers.

"He'd rather have a squeeze in the roadster," the Irishman said with a grin. "An' can ye blame him when ye look at the colleen he's with?"

The officers laughed, and drove off with their scowling prisoner. Pat then made his way to the roadster, and by the time he had taken his place at the wheel Bob and June had already installed themselves in the back of the vehicle.

"Don't be in too much of a hurry, Pat," Bob stated. "Remember, I'm still officially on sick-leave."

"It's sick ye are," declared Pat, "the both av ye. Love-sick, O'd call it." And, laughing, he started up the car.

Pat was discreet, and he kept his face towards the road ahead, but he could not help seeing, in the side-mirror, a reflection of Bob and June drawing nearer to each other, and presently he saw Bob stoop to her lips and kiss her tenderly.

Pat gave vent to a dreamy sigh.

"It must be wonderful to be in love," he murmured; and then he twisted the side-mirror to another angle, so that it reflected only the empty highway behind the lovers.

THE END.

(By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Tim McCoy and Marion Shockley.)

32 Free Billiard Tables. Send for details and price list.

E. J. RILEY, LTD.,

Howard Works, ACCRINGTON, and Dept. 35, 147, Aldersgate Street, LONDON, E.C.1.

All the family will find endless pleasure during leisure hours with a Riley "Home" Billiard Table. The 6 ft. size is delivered to you immediately on first payment of 13/3d. Balance monthly. Cash Price £11 15s. 0d. Rileys pay carriage and take transit risks. 7 days' Free Trial allowed. Send to-day for Free Art List giving full details of Riley "Home" Billiard Tables and "Combine" Billiard and Dining Tables, in all sizes, for cash or easy terms.

Rileys are the largest makers of full-size Billiard Tables in Great Britain.

November 7th, 1931.

"THE SKY RAIDERS."

(Continued from page 10.)

too. It was the manager's private 'plane, and uneasy suspicious as to the real identity of the mysterious boss of the gang crossed Bob's mind as he crawled noiselessly up to the house.

A few moments later those suspicions were fully confirmed. Bob crept up to a side window, stooping low, for he had heard voices within the building.

"Well, boss, you can't say we've not done the job good and proper this time," remarked a voice that Bob instantly recognised as Kelley's.

"Sure I can't, Kelley," came the reply. "I take back all I said before. You've managed the affair very well this time."

"I thought so when I saw the 'plane," muttered Bob to himself, for the voice was that of Willard, the manager of the airport.

Vaguely suspicious though he had been of Willard, it came as a shock to Bob Rogers to find that the manager was actually in league with the crooks, but the young airman was about to receive a much greater shock, a surprise that almost caused him to betray his presence to the gang.

Moving quietly from the window, Bob crept round to the door, for he had noticed that it was not quite closed. Though he had been able to hear the crooks talking from his first position, he could not see them, and he hoped to have better luck at the doorway. Peering cautiously round, he saw the gang at a table in the middle of the room, a table strewn with currency notes. The gangsters appeared to be busy in counting out the spoils.

"By the way," said Kelley presently, "where are you and the girl planning out to make your future home?"

"Some place in Europe," replied Willard, "and if you take my advice you'll get to Europe as soon as you can, all of you."

Bob Rogers could not repress a start of astonishment and dismay as the manager spoke, for though the name of the girl had not been mentioned, the young pilot felt certain that Willard and Kelley had referred to Grace Devine. Instinctively, Bob seemed to realise in that moment that the girl he loved was somewhere in the house, in the power of the gang.

"What's that?" cried Willard, who had heard a sound outside the door as Bob gave his involuntary start of surprise.

The crooks turned to gaze at the door, listening intently. Bob had instantly drawn back, and they did not see him, but Kelley rose to his feet to investigate. Drawing his gun, he rushed to the door and looked out.

"Okay, boss!" he said. "No one there—only a dog scratching about."

Bob Rogers was only a few yards away, round a corner of the house, but as luck would have it a mongrel dog happened to come prowling along just at that moment, and Kelley naturally assumed that the animal had made the slight noise the crooks had heard.

Kelley turned back into the house, and as soon as he had disappeared from view, Bob ran quickly across to the bandit 'plane and climbed into it. A few minutes later Kelley again came out, and walked over towards the ship, for Willard had ordered him to see that the machines were ready to resume the journey.

As the gangster climbed into the November 7th, 1931.

'plane he got the surprise of his life. A terrific uppercut from a powerful fist rattled every tooth in his head, and he went backwards to the ground and lay still. Bob Rogers instantly jumped out, bringing with him a length of rope. In two minutes Kelley was bound and gagged, and Bob threw him, none too gently, into a neighbouring ditch.

Five minutes afterwards Willard came out of the house, dragging Grace Devine with him and followed by his men, who were carrying the packages of notes. Bob Rogers had, meanwhile, donned Kelley's flying kit, and was apparently very busy with the 'planes. He saw the manager pulling Grace along, and burned to fly at his throat, but he had formed his plan, and he restrained himself from any attack on Willard at the moment.

"Kelley," cried Willard, failing to recognise Bob in his disguise, "you will come with me and the girl. The others will take the small 'plane and follow. You had better pilot it, Blondy."

It was not surprising that Willard had taken Bob Rogers to be Kelley, for the young airman was much about the same height and build as the crook. He had drawn the goggles over his eyes, and he kept his face turned away from the manager as much as he could. Without a word he climbed into the cockpit of the bandit 'plane, and Willard was just forcing Grace to follow when a sharp exclamation from Blondy attracted his attention.

"We've got a broken gas-line, Mr. Willard!" cried the crook in dismay.

Bob Rogers smiled to himself, for he had managed to break a gas-line on the manager's 'plane a minute before the gang came out of the house.

"What!" roared Willard angrily. "How long will it take to repair?"

"An hour, maybe, perhaps more," replied Blondy ruefully.

A humming sound, faint at first, but growing louder every moment, caused the crooks to look up. High in the air a few miles away a great Army fighting 'plane was sweeping rapidly down upon them.

"Quick!" screamed Willard. "In with you!"

He pushed Grace Devine into the 'plane, climbed in himself, and howled furiously to the man he thought to be Kelley.

"Get her going, quick!" he cried, forgetting all about the rest of the gang in his anxiety to escape with Grace before the Government ship came up.

Bob Rogers hesitated for a second whether or not to reveal himself there and then. If he did, there would probably be a fight in the presence of Grace, for the other crooks were standing near, each man holding a gun. Bob knew that he could get Willard, but the others would most likely get him, so he decided to take off and fly back to the airport.

The Army 'plane was almost overhead as Bob Rogers left the ground, and in a few minutes the young pilot felt that he had made a grave mistake. For the Government machine, ignoring the disabled aeroplane and the crooks standing by it, swung round instantly after him. Bob realised with dismay that the bandit 'plane was known, and that he was being chased.

And at any moment the machine-guns of the Army ship might open fire!

The Rescue of Grace Devine.

THE officer in command of the Army airport had lost no time in sending out one of his best machines in charge of a young lieutenant reputed to be the most daring and skilful pilot on the Government flying field. Exulting at the prospect of a fight with the sky raiders, the lieutenant took off, and flew at his utmost speed for the desert of Arizona.

Jimmy Devine, still waiting by the disabled express half an hour after Bob Rogers had passed, saw the Army 'plane approaching, and presently it glided down and landed almost alongside the express.

"Are you Devine?" asked the lieutenant, leaning out to speak to Jimmy. "Have they got away with it?"

"Yes, they got the dollars more than half an hour ago," replied Jimmy ruefully. "You're too late, lieutenant."

"You jump in," came the reply. "I'll show you whether I'm too late! I'm going to get those guys somehow. Tell me which way they went and what their machine is like."

Jimmy Devine climbed into the Army ship, and he described the bandit 'plane to the officer as they went along. The lieutenant took his machine thousands of feet in the air, and, relinquishing the controls to a sergeant, he began to survey the country carefully through powerful glasses as they neared the confines of the desert.

"See that?" he cried presently, handing the glasses to Jimmy, who put down his own and picked up the officer's more powerful pair. Looking in the direction the lieutenant had pointed out, Jimmy saw, far away to the right, a small house with two tiny objects on the ground in front of it.

The lieutenant took charge of the ship again, and soon he was swinging her rapidly down upon the house which he had noticed, while Jimmy still kept his glasses focused upon it.

"Yes, that's the 'plane, I'm sure, the larger one," cried Jimmy as they approached. "There are some men by it now. Quick! They're going up—"

"My orders are to take those fellows dead or alive, and I'm going to do it," said the lieutenant grimly. "If they go up, we must follow and shoot the 'plane down. Are those machine-guns ready for action there?"

"All ready, sir!" cried the men eagerly as the ship swept on.

Jimmy Devine looked down excitedly as they swooped lower and lower. He noticed an aeroplane which he thought to be one of these from the airport, partly hidden behind a ridge of rock, and he guessed that Bob Rogers had left it there. His friend he could not see, and little did he imagine that Bob, in the guise of Kelley, was piloting the bandit 'plane. Still less did he think that his sister Grace, too, was there, for he had, of course, not the slightest idea that Willard had kidnapped her that morning.

"They've got off," said Jimmy. "or some of 'em have. The larger 'plane is up."

"You sure that's the machine, Devine?" asked the officer.

"Yes, sir," replied Jimmy formally. "The other machine appears to be disabled—one of 'em is working on it now."

"We'll come back for that, then," remarked the lieutenant, as he swung round in chase of the 'plane which Bob Rogers was piloting.

And Bob was in a terrible quandary. Too late he realised that he ought to have revealed himself, at all risks, or to have delayed Willard somehow until the Army 'plane had arrived. He was already a thousand feet up before he saw that it was impossible for him to fly back to the airport as he had hoped to do. The machine he was piloting was not good enough, and the Army 'plane was catching up.

(Continued on page 28.)

"LASCA OF THE RIO GRANDE."

(Continued from page 25.)

Pedro nodded:

"I understand you, Jose. I know well what is to be done."

The Stampede.

THE oncoming storm had darkened the country of the Rio Grande, and Kincaid could see that lights were already reflecting from the roofs of the rancho. He tried the door softly once or twice, but ever found it barred against him. Presently, a voice was heard calling: "Gonzalez, come this way a moment! You are wanted."

A minute later Kincaid tried the door a third time. It had been unbolted; it opened—he was free!

Warily, and suspecting a plot, he stepped outside. The rancho seemed busy enough within, but there was no one on guard, no one about the gardens. Ahead of him was a low stone wall, protecting the flower beds from the browsing cattle; beyond it stretched the arid pastures and the clouded hills. Kincaid crouched low as he ran for the wall.

He reached it and vaulted over—into the ambush prepared for him by Pedro. Shots rang out on either side; Kincaid dropped as if hit, and three fellows rushed upon him. He rose on the instant to meet them; a smashing uppercut from his clenched fist knocking Pedro flat on his back. Then, right and left, he dealt with the others—one clean cut between the eyes, but the second managed to grapple and close with him. They rolled over and over until Kincaid, well used to mob fighting, got the fellow's head between his hands, when he soon bumped the cowpuncher into silence.

Then he ran again, this time towards an outbuilt stable, only just pausing to pick up the writhing Pedro's carbine. Kincaid had almost made the shelter when a single shot rang out, and with a stifled cry he stumbled and fell as if dead.

For a few tense moments he lay there. A girl came to an upper window of the rancho, glanced out, then climbed on to the sill. With a flying rush she leapt into the gardens, coming to ground on all fours with a little scream of fear. As she scrambled to her feet and began to run towards Kincaid, a blanketed Indian stole from the outbuilding, tomahawk upraised.

He was preparing to smash down his weapon on that seemingly helpless figure when a sudden mighty upward kick from Kincaid hurled him sideways. Then Kincaid was upon him, wrenching the tomahawk from those frantically clutching fingers. The girl heard the terrible weapon thud upon the Indian's head and a scream came from her.

Kincaid had given her scarcely a glance. He ran to the stable and flung himself on a horse. When the girl reached the stable he was already galloping for the hills, but she wasted no breath in calling after him. With a spring she leapt on to the bare back of another horse; then, with little heels pressed against the animal's smooth flanks, started hotly in pursuit.

Heavy drops of rain descended from the lowering clouds, a thin wind began to whine down the hills. As the two raced away from the now thoroughly alarmed rancho a vivid flash of lightning forked the skyline. Loud rumbling thunder followed, echoing and re-echoing through the valleys of the Rio Grande. The browsing lowing herds of cattle raised frightened heads and began to stir, pressing against each other as they crowded unsteadily down from the hills.

Out from the rancho came Jose with some of his fellows. When he saw the flying figure of Lasca heading wildly after Kincaid, a cry broke from his lips, high above the cannonading of the storm. Lightning flashed and zig-zagged as if the elements mocked him; rain swept in torrents with the wind, now blowing a hurricane.

"To horse! To horse!" shrieked Santa Cruz. His fellows hurried to obey him, but Kincaid and the girl were well down the valley ere the pursuit could become dangerous to them. They raced in desperation, Lasca seeking to catch up with him, while he spurred his mount along the straight stretch for the river bed.

Above them the cattle were massing on the hills, crowding each other and bellowing with fear. The storm, with all its pent-up electric energies so suddenly loosened, filled the beasts with terror. They herded together; jostling and charging each other—then one of them in the forefront, an old bull, began to run.

At once all the herd was moving, gathering terrific momentum as they swept down from the heights, under the blinding rain, in their serried scores. An earth-shaking roll of thunder was lost in the crashing of their hoofs as they charged across the plains, utterly beyond all control.

FILM NOVELS YOU SHOULD NOT MISS.

Lily Damita
in

"MADAME JULIE."

The poignant drama of an alluring French modiste who, after marrying a millionaire widower, met and fell in love with his son, who had run away from Oxford under an assumed name.

"TO-DAY."

Used to riches and every luxury, a beautiful young woman suddenly learnt of her husband's ruin. The husband thought she would be willing to start afresh, but—Starring Conrad Nagel and Catherine Dale Owen.

ALSO

The seventh episode of the exciting serial drama of the sawdust ring, starring Francis X. Bushman, jun., and Alberta Vaughn—
"THE SPELL OF THE CIRCUS."

In this week's splendid issue of our companion paper,

"SCREEN STORIES."

ON SALE WEDNESDAY. PRICE 2d.

Lasca caught up with Kincaid, who had, at last, become aware of her.

"Miles," she panted as her horse raced beside his "You are hurt, yes?"

His face was deathly white, and, as he reined in his mount with his left hand and arm, his right hand seemed to hang uselessly from his shoulder.

"That fellow got me," he called to her. "The Indian. Don't worry about me, I'll manage." He gave her a side-long look. "You coming with me, Lasca? I shall have to take you to El Paso."

"I come with you, Miles," she shouted back to him through the sheeting rain. "I love you, Miles." Her voice changed suddenly, piteously. "Miles, Miles—see them! The steers are mad! They are coming down at us—"

He saw, too late, that they were right in the path of the frantic, maddened cattle. Herd upon herd, hundreds crowded together, were rushing down in blind panic from the hills. Lost to everything but fear, they charged onwards, over-running and smashing everything in their path.

Kincaid yelled to her to race before the oncoming black mass, in the hope of outpacing them. For a few minutes their horses led the cattle, then Kincaid's mount caught its foot in a hole, stumbled, and flung its rider like a stone from a catapult. The Ranger crashed to earth beside the rolling horse.

Lasca never hesitated. She reined in her mount, sprang from its bare back, and, as the maddened steers smashed down upon them, flung herself upon Kincaid, covering him with herself as best she could.

Jose, following them, saw the cattle sweep over them and rush onward. His face went white as chalk, a terrible cry came from his lips. His men reined in behind the stampede, glancing at each other.

Already the tearing wind had driven the storm onwards. The clouds were breaking, the rain had ceased. Ahead, a dark moving mass, the steers moved heavily towards the river, their lowings sounding more faintly as their terrors ended. Already some of them were falling away from the rest and cropping the saturated grass with greedy relish.

Santa Cruz led the way to where Lasca and Kincaid were lying; the horse had borne the worst of the charge and lay there broken and dead. The Mexican dismounted and lifted Lasca tenderly from the body of Kincaid. He laid her upon the horse rug which one of his men had silently placed upon the steaming ground.

He stood up and took off his gay broad-brimmed hat with its gold lace. His eyes were dry and burning; his lips moved without speech. One by one, his men took off their hats, staring awkwardly at each other. Then one of them fetched another rug from his horse and with it covered the piteous figure of the girl from sight.

Kincaid stirred a little, groaningly. Santa Cruz made a sign to his men.

"Lift him up," he ordered. "Carefully—carefully! She gave her life for him." His voice broke. "Take him to El Paso." He forced himself to say: "Tell the Senor Chief of the Rangers that I send him, me, Jose Santa Cruz, of the Rio Grande, with my compliments sincere." He waved them away; then knelt with bowed head beside that hidden, pitiful form:

"Lasca!" he called vainly. "Oh, my beloved—do not leave me so all alone!" (By permission of Universal Pictures, Ltd., starring Leo Carillo, John Mack Brown, and Dorothy Burgess.)

November 7th, 1931.

"THE SKY RAIDERS."

(Continued from page 26.)

Bob Rogers decided to land as soon as he saw a suitable spot, but the lieutenant of the government machine gave him no time. Convinced by Jimmy's assurance that the bandit 'plane was trying to escape, the officer ordered his men to open fire at once.

A burst of machine-gun fire came, and bullets tore through the cabin where Bob, Grace and Willard sat, without, as it happened, hitting any of them.

"Lie down, Grace!" shouted Bob Rogers, tearing off the goggles, and revealing herself to the astonished gaze of his companions.

Grace Devine, amazed as she was to realise that Bob was actually in the 'plane with her, obeyed without a word. She lay flat on the floor of the cabin, while Willard drew his gun, his fear of the machine-gun bullets overcome for the moment by the unexpected sight of the young airman.

"So it's you, is it?" he growled angrily, covering Bob. "Take—"

Another hail of bullets swept through the 'plane, tearing holes in the wings, damaging the propeller, and splintering the cabin. Willard slumped to the floor even as his finger pressed the trigger, and there he lay still, riddled through and through by the deadly burst of fire, while his bullet went wide of Bob's head.

Circling round the supposed sky raiders, the government machine kept up the attack, and Bob saw that there was only one chance left. Both he and Grace had miraculously escaped so far, but the next burst of fire would probably get one of them, and, moreover, the 'plane was already badly damaged.

"Crawl along to that parachute, Grace," he cried. "I can't control the 'plane any longer—she's a wreck, and we'll have to try the parachute."

"There's just about room for the two of us on the bar," gasped Bob, as the girl began hurriedly to get out the parachute. "Let's hurry. She's going!"

Just as the battered machine dipped into a nose-dive, Bob and Grace threw themselves out. They fell like stones for fifty feet, but Bob pulled the ring of the parachute at the right moment, and the silken folds above spread out safely. Down they floated gently earthwards, while the men in the Army 'plane, still circling above, watched in astonishment.

"What's that?" cried the lieutenant. "Good Heavens, one of them is a woman! Say, Devine, you've sure made a mistake about that ship."

He pointed to the bandit 'plane, now spinning downwards to earth, where it crashed a moment later into a splintered heap of wreckage.

Jimmy Devine's face drained of all colour as he looked at the parachute through his glasses.

"It's my sister—and Bob Rogers!" he gasped. "Thank Heaven they're going down safely. I can't understand it, sir. That was certainly the 'plane the crooks had when they robbed the express."

"We'll go down and see," remarked the lieutenant. "Then I must go back and clean up that house. We left some of the guys there."

Meanwhile, Grace was telling Bob the story of Willard's treachery.

"He said he would take me up for just a quarter of an hour," she concluded, "but he brought me out here, and threatened to make me go with him to Europe."

"Don't think about it any more, Grace dear," said Bob gently. "Look out now. We're nearly down."

They braced themselves for the coming shock, and soon they touched earth, the white folds of the parachute falling over them as they rolled on the ground.

"Are you hurt, Grace?" asked Bob anxiously, sitting up and beginning to disentangle himself and the girl from the parachute.

"Not a bit, Bob. Are you?" cried Grace, as his arm went round her shoulders.

"Of course not," said Bob. "I'm okay, and now—"

"Now where do we go next?" interrupted Grace.

"Where do you want to go?" asked the young pilot.

"Anywhere—with you!" came the girl's soft reply, as Bob's lips met hers in a long kiss.

Two hundred feet above, the lieutenant barked an order to the sergeant who had taken over the controls.

"Up again and back to that house," he cried.

"I'm going to leave those two alone for a while," he added, turning to Jimmy with a grin. "I guess they don't want any guys butting in just now."

"Sure they don't," chuckled Jimmy. "I'll say they've got all the company they want for the next hour or two. Well, I came with you to find those Sky Raiders, and I reckon I've found something else, too."

"Yeah!" smiled the lieutenant. "A brother-in-law! Invite me to the wedding, Devine!"

"We sure will," came Jimmy's laughing reply.

(By permission of the Ideal Films, Ltd., starring Lloyd Hughes and Marceline Day.)

"THE BLACK WIDOW."

(Continued from page 20.)

The receiver was banged down, and then another exchange called.

"Is that the Central Hospital—Dr. Rowland, please. It is the governor speaking, and I must talk to him at once."

It was hours later when the girl opened her eyes.

"Only just in time," murmured Dr. Rowlands. "Not a second too soon. You're a plucky girl and a lucky one also!"

"And Ramsey?" she whispered in a voice in which anxiety was plain to hear. "Is safe," she was told, "and free!"

The eyes closed, the lips smiled, and the plucky girl passed into a profound sleep that was surely peopled by the most enchanting of dreams.

Some dreams are destined to remain dreams. Others happily and incredibly come true—such as the wedding of Gertrude Clark and Jack Ramsey. Gertrude's newspaper rose nobly to the occasion, with headlines that caused the happy pair to blush in embarrassment. And after all it was literally true. For did she not in very truth save his life? And, having saved it, what fitter than that this life should remain in her keeping?

(Story by courtesy of Ideal Films, Ltd., who are releasing the Burns Detective Mystery Dramas.)

GROSE'S 8, New Bridge Street, LONDON, E.C.4. LUDGATE CIRCUS.

BILLIARDS AT HOME 1/- per week.

SIZE	DEPOSIT	4 monthly payments	CASH
3 ft. 2 in. x 1 ft. 8 in.	10/-	4/-	19/-
3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	6/6	28/-
4 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 3 in.	10/-	8/6	32/-
4 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10/-	12/6	42/-
5 ft. 4 in. x 2 ft. 6 in.	10/-	15/6	52/-

Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Turned Balls guaranteed unbreakable, Marking Board Spirit Level, Rules and Chalk COMPLETE LIST FREE.

BE TALL Your Height Increased in 14 days, or money back! Amazing Course, 5/-. Send STAMP NOW for Free Book—STEBBING SYSTEM, 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

DON'T BE BULLIED

Some SPLENDID LESSONS in JUJITSU, interesting articles, etc., FREE on application. How to take care of yourself under ALL circumstances without weapons, by the wonderful Japanese art of self-defence. Far better than boxing. Learn to fear no man. Simply send two penny stamps postage or 1/- for first large part. NOW to "Yawara" (Dept. A.P.), 10, Queensway, Hanworth, Feltham, Middlesex. School in London for Practical Tuition.

BE STRONG I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength Stimants, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10 lbs. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms); also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-Control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Testimony FREE, or Complete Course 5/-. STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

HEIGHT INCREASED IN 10 DAYS, 3 TO 6 INCHES. ASTOUNDING COURSE, 1/6. WHY PAY MORE FOR LESS RESULTS? PARTIOLARS, STAMP.—A. ANDERSON, 165, FLEET STREET, E.C.4.

BLUSHING, Shyness, "Nerves," Self-consciousness cured or money back! Complete Treatment, 5/-. Details, striking testimonials Free.—L. A. STEBBING, 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2

BE TALLER! Increased my own height to 6ft. 3ins STAMP brings FREE DETAILS.—A. B. M. ROSS, Height Specialist, SCARBOROUGH, ENGLAND.

GROW TALLER! ADD INCHES to your height. Details free.—JEDISON, 39, BOND STREET, BLACKPOOL.

CODOGRAM FOR BOY DETECTIVES. ZZZ32.

U-4)c' 136 c6=1 +/4)c'3) .6 746 "6")c' 1/ 565@64' //c'†
 136 c6. . 1. // "3")c' +c'64)4)c' 1/ -1+) | +/1/2 //c6 7cU
 +)V6.6c'6 13) //+ +64 1"/6" c'1V65@64 +/ -4)6c6 @6'
 ..36" 1/ 7" //† 16' 46'674'3 U)4611/4

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Boy's Cinema

"TRANSATLANTIC" and "TRAPPED."

Complete Film Stories in This Issue.

Boy's CINEMA 2^D

No. 622.

EVERY TUESDAY.

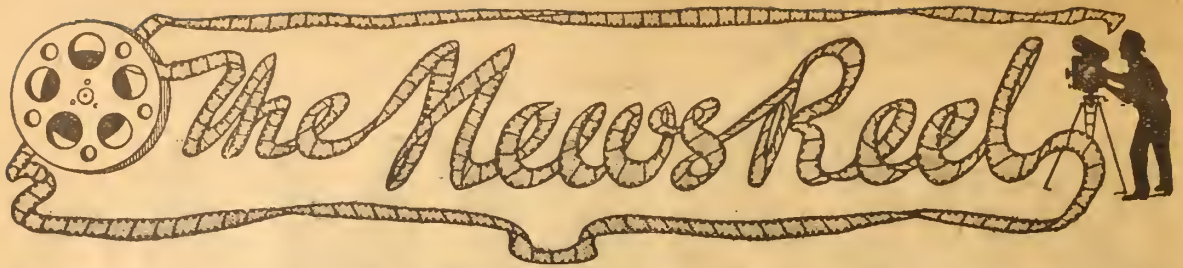

NOVEMBER 14th, 1931.

A Daring
Reporter's fight for Vengeance against Ruthless Gangsters

STARRING
Charles DELANEY

HELL BENT for' FRISCO

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed c/o BOY'S CINEMA, Room 163, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

"Hell Bent for 'Frisco."

Jimmy Gray, Charles Delancy; Ellen Garwood, Vera Reynolds; Frank Kenton, Edmund Burns; "Re-L." Reed Howes; Doctor Clayton, Charles Craig; Nick Corrigan, Richard Cramer; Graham, William Desmond; Lane Garwood, Carol Nye; The News-boy, Wesley Barry; Tony, George Pegas; Fogerty, Tom O'Brien.

"Transatlantic."

Monty Greer, Edmund Lowe; Judy Kramer, Lois Moran; Henry D. Graham, John Halliday; Sigrid Carlene, Greta Nissen; Rudolph Kramer, Jean Hersholt; Kay Graham, Myrna Loy; "Handsome" Moran, Earle Foxe; Hodgkins, Billy Bevan; Captain, Claude King; First Officer, Crauford Kent.

An Under-Water Thrill.

Wang Wong is a Chinese extra who now realises that it is not possible to talk under-water. In an exciting moment, however, Wang Wong tried to do so and was saved from a watery grave only just in time. This is how it happened: The exterior scenes of "Submarine," the new B.I.P. picture, were being filmed at Portsmouth, and six actors, including Wang Wong, after being fitted with the Davis life-saving apparatus, had to descend into the depths of the sea by means of a rope, and then be filmed as they rose to the surface.

But when below water Wang Wong found his feet had been wound round by the rope and he could not get them free. In his excitement he removed the mouthpiece of the apparatus and tried to call to another actor who was above him. The water at once rushed into Wang Wong's apparatus and increased his difficulty. Luckily the other actor, Sidney Seaward, saw what was happening and hauled the Chinese boy to the surface, where he was found to be in a distressed condition.

But the thrill of the occasion was not all over. As the rest of the actors came to the surface, a swift current began sweeping them out to sea. All of them could swim, but their ordinary clothing with the addition of the apparatus hampered their movements. By the time the last man was rescued he was literally at his last gasp. It was only through the prompt action of the sailors on the whaler, the Allecto, that a disaster was prevented.

A Radio Favourite "Goes Talkie."

One of Britain's most popular radio entertainers makes his debut in a full length talkie in the screen version of Edgar Middleton's sensational play, "Potiphar's Wife," which First National Pathé have released.

He is Ronald Frankau, who has delighted millions of listeners by his "silly ass" type of fooling in various radio revue. His disarming pleasantries

November 14th, 1931.

NEXT WEEK'S THREE COMPLETE FILM STORIES

CHARLES (CHIC) SALE

IN

"THE STAR WITNESS."

Eye-witnesses to a terrible crime. Threatened—beaten—kidnapped. Their duty is to tell all—but their lives are worthless if they speak! A heart-stirring story of a family who found themselves menaced by ruthless gangsters.

"SUNDOWN TRAIL."

A haughty young beauty came with a cowardly attorney to take over her father's ranch, but the daredevil manager and a gang of rustlers upset her plans. Starring Tom Keene and Marion Shilling.

"THE WARDEN'S PEN."

A gripping story of a risky plot by a prison official to capture a callous, fearless gunman. Another true story from the notebook of William J. Burns, of the U.S. Secret Service.

have won for him a reputation that has meant regular appearances in the broadcasting studios.

Ronald Frankau, however, has paid the penalty of fame. Fame means work, and more fame means more work. With stage plays, cabarets, broadcasting, and now the screen, he has very few worlds to conquer nowadays. Many people may not be aware of the fact, but he is one of the few entertainers who writes his own material, and he is his sternest critic.

It is not to be supposed, though, that "Potiphar's Wife" represents his first appearance before the movie camera, for many flinggoers will recall his several appearances in the topical screen magazine, "Pathéone Weekly," in which he has built up a considerable advance reputation.

It was a happy inspiration of Maurice Elvey, the director of "Potiphar's Wife," to select him for one of the featured portrayals in the picture, although the offer of the rôle was easier than the accepting. The part was offered at short notice, when Frankau was even busier than usual. He was appearing in "The Skin Game," and his night's work included a wireless act and a couple of cabaret turns. Elvey informed him that it was essential to be word perfect by the next morning, as the production would otherwise be held up, a costly business.

Frankau set to work on his lines, learning them between his various other activities, and the next morning turned up, full of smiles, at Elstree ready to proceed with the production!

Keeping Slim on a Skyscraper."

Ask the majority of film stars what is their pet aversion, and nine out of ten of them will agree that it is the necessity of keeping fit and keeping to the correct proportions stipulated in their motion picture contracts.

Keeping fit and slim, they will agree, presents more difficulties than any work involved by the actual acting in pictures. But during the making of "The Hot Heiress," the First National and Vitaphone comedy, Ben Lyon and Ona Munson, the principals playing in this scintillating comedy, had no choice in the matter. Their work required plenty of strenuous exercise to get back and forth from the set.

"The Hot Heiress" narrates the adventures of a riveter, working on a skyscraper, and his sweetheart, a wealthy debutante, who watches him from the window of a neighbouring window.

An exact replica of the steel structure of a tall skyscraper was erected by First National in Hollywood, and in order to produce the correct effect the debutante's apartment was constructed on a platform some forty feet from the ground in order that the cameras, shooting through the apartment windows, recorded exactly the scene that would take place as if it were in a great American town.

The apartment set was reached by means of a series of ladders, which the principals were forced to climb at least three times per day. In the morning, at noon, and when the day's work was completed. On most days, however, they made even more than the minimum number of daily trips because the picture was made in the summer. Thus the temperature, coupled with the powerful, heat-generating incandescent lights, made the set almost unbearably warm. After each scene Ben Lyon and Ona Munson had to scramble down for cool air.

"If you don't think climbing forty feet so many times a day isn't enough exercise," says Ona Munson, "just try it. I lost three pounds the first week and a pound or so every week thereafter."

(Continued on page 26.)

A young reporter plays a lone hand to solve the shooting of his chum on a race track. Gangsters try to take him for a ride, but he foils them, securing a big scoop for his newspaper and the girl of his dreams. Starring Charles Delaney and Vera Reynolds.

Hell Bent for Frisco

The News-Getter.

ADMITTANCE to the Garwood Garden Party and Charity Bazaar was by invitation only, but the two young men who drove up to the pretentious colonial home possessed no card.

For one of them was Lane Garwood, whose sister was on the committee of the Los Angeles charity movement, and had lent the extensive grounds of the manor for the affair.

Lane Garwood was just out of his teens, a youth with money to burn and time to waste, a modern sample of rich young manhood looking for pace and excitement. His companion, however, seemed of a different stamp, being a year or two his senior and rather more experienced in the ways of the world.

Jimmy Gray by name, Lane's friend was a Press-man, and, in the rôle of crime reporter on one of California's most prominent news-sheets, he found excitement without having to search for it. He had also found in Lane Garwood a youngster after his own heart, although at the moment he—Jimmy—seemed considerably disgruntled.

"Well, here we are, Good-natured!" said Lane, with sly reference to Jimmy's air of gloom.

"So I see," the newspaper man retorted. "Say, Lane, what's the idea of dragging me out here to this Society tea-fight, anyway?"

"Jimmy," Lane answered, "I promised my sister I'd bring you along. She's crazy to meet you, and wants to see whether or not you're the proper companion for her baby brother."

"Is that so?" growled Jimmy.

"Well, I don't like sisters."

Lane regarded him whimsically.

"I suppose you'd rather be draped over a card-table with a lot of Press-men," he observed. "But you're coming with me instead."

Aud, taking Jimmy's arm, he walked him across a green sward of lawn that was thronged with fashionable guests.

There was a variety of side-shows, and presently Lane and Jimmy paused before a booth that represented a shooting gallery.

"Say, this joint isn't such a bad spot, after all," declared Jimmy, brightening visibly. "I guess I'll try my luck here."

He handed a coin to a pretty brunette behind the counter and received a pistol in exchange. At the end of the booth there were half a dozen rows of clay pipes, targets on which to practise marksmanship, and Jimmy levelled the gun and drew trigger.

"Too bad," said the pretty brunette behind the counter, as his first shot missed by a hair's breadth. "Better luck next time."

Jimmy grimed, and, pulling up his sleeve, revealed on his wrist a metal disc, a memento of his war service in the American Expeditionary Force. He rubbed his hand over it, and, standing at his shoulder, Lane Garwood laughed good-humouredly.

"You'll wear that lucky charm out one of these days, Jimmy," he commented.

"It hasn't let me down yet," was the rejoinder. "Watch me this time."

Jimmy raised his arm again and fired off the remaining five shots in quick succession. With every blast a pipe-stem snapped, and Jimmy handed the gun back to the brunette while one or two bystanders were marvelling at his skill.

"You haven't forgotten your Army training, after all," Lane told him.

"Say, Jimmy, how'd you like to amuse yourself around the sideshows while I find my sister Ellen?"

"That's a good idea," Jimmy answered. "And don't hurry back."

Lane walked off, and his steps led him to a swimming pool which was one of the main centres of attraction. He did not find his sister here, but met someone he knew in the form of Frank Kenton, a tall, immaculately-dressed individual with a keen, shrewd face and a trim moustache.

Kenton was an institution at the Garwood home, and, ever since the death of Lane's father, had looked after the vast business interests connected with the bank of which old Garwood had been president.

"Hallo, Frank!" Lane greeted him genially.

"Why, hallo, Lane, how are you?" Kenton rejoined. "Seen anything of Ellen?"

Lane shook his head.

"No, I'm looking for her myself," he mentioned. "Say, it's great here to-day! I guess my social career is ending in a blaze of glory."

Kenton eyed him curiously, and the swift, penetrating glance seemed to belie the smile that was playing around his mouth.

"Well, it's true that business does interfere with social events at times," he murmured. "You're quite serious, then, about starting work next Monday."

"Absolutely," Lane told him. "I hope you've got my desk down at the bank all dusted and ready for me."

Kenton nodded.

"Yes, everything's prepared for you," he said, "and I'm glad you've decided to settle down."

"Well, it's about time I did," Lane mused. "I should have gone to work when poor old dad passed away instead of playing around and letting you do all the hard graft."

Kenton shrugged.

"I'm very happy to do it, Lane," he answered. "You know, your father was very good to me. He really gave me my first chance, and I'm trying to repay him for it by looking after your interests and Ellen's."

"You've been a mighty good friend to us," Lane said, "and I'm afraid I've been such a sap about money. I guess Ellen and I would have been in the poor-house if you hadn't taken hold of our affairs."

"It's very nice of you to say so, Lane," Kenton murmured. "But let's go and find Ellen."

At that moment Jimmy Gray was confirming his impression that the Garwood Fête was not such a dull affair after all, and, having moved on from the shooting gallery, he was now lingering in front of a booth that for some reason had engaged his attention.

The reason was not hard to locate, being an attractive, fair-haired girl who was in control of the side-show.

"Remember," she was saying, "it's for sweet charity, and the holder of the winning number gets a kiss. And there are only two numbers left—seven and ten."

"I'll take both of them," Jimmy announced impulsively, and handed her some money.

The girl smilingly tendered two tickets with the numbers seven and ten, and then she turned towards an array of dolls, picked up a dart, and, closing her eyes, threw it straight and true.

The dart struck a doll bearing the number seven, and the girl behind the counter faced the onlookers again.

"Who holds number seven?" she asked.

"Right here in person," Jimmy answered with a grin.

There was an envious murmur from the other men who had bought tickets as the girl behind the counter offered her lips to the winner. But Jimmy hesitated.

"Er—don't you think we could do this much better in private?" he suggested.

The girl nodded and slipped round the counter laughingly, guiding Jimmy to an old elm-tree that stood in a more secluded part of the grounds.

"Well, here we are," she said. "And I always pay my debts."

Jimmy stooped to kiss her, and their lips had hardly met when a familiar voice interrupted them. Turning quickly, Jimmy and his fair companion saw Lane Garwood and Frank Kenton approaching.

"Are you in the habit of going around kissing strange fellows?" Lane inquired of the girl. Then to Jimmy: "And you kidded me you didn't like sisters," he added with a grin.

"Oh, don't mind him!" the girl said to Jimmy. "He's only my brother, and this other gentleman—Mr. Kenton—is merely my fiancé. You know, Frank," she went on, addressing Kenton, "this isn't as bad as it looks. The kiss was for sweet charity. I promised it to the gentleman holding the lucky number."

"Well, I think someone ought to introduce me to the lucky gentleman," Kenton suggested, genially enough.

Lane moved forward.

"I'll do the honours," he said. "On my left, old 'Stick in the Mud' Jimmy Gray, the greatest news-hound in the newspaper game. And on my right, Frank Kenton, the boy wonder of the banking business."

Jimmy and Kenton shook hands, and then the latter turned to Lane's sister Ellen.

"I wonder if you could tear yourself from your sweet charity for a while, dear," he murmured, and, as Ellen agreed, Lane and Jimmy were left alone.

The two friends strolled off towards the swimming-pool, and as they walked Lane began to talk animatedly on a subject that was of particular interest to him at the moment.

"Wait until you see her, Jimmy," he was saying, as they passed along the edge of the pool. "She's a beauty!"

"I have seen her," Jimmy mused abstractedly, "and she is a beauty."

"What do you mean?" Lane demanded. "Say, I'm talking about my racing-car—the one I'm driving in the race at the speedway to-morrow."

Jimmy put Ellen out of his thoughts. It was not much use dwelling on her charms, anyway, when she was already engaged to be married to another fellow.

"Oh, yes," he said, "your car. So you're driving in the race to-morrow, are you?"

"Yep, for the last time," Lane told him. "Then it's good-bye to the high-speed life. I step right from the driver's seat to a seat behind a desk at the bank."

He had said it was to be his last race. Had he but known it, those words possessed a grim significance.

The Race.

ALONE with Ellen Garwood in a remote part of the grounds, Frank Kenton broached the subject of his romance with her.

"Ellen," he said, "I'm getting awfully tired of being engaged."

"Why, Frank," she exclaimed, "do you mean you want our engagement to be broken off?"

Kenton took her hands.

"You know what I mean, dear," he retorted. "When are we going to be married?"

Ellen glanced away for a moment, and then looked at him whimsically.

"You've been wonderfully patient, Frank," she told him, "and I suppose I should make up my mind. You know, I've always wanted to be a June bride."

"June," he said, with a frown. "But that's a long way off. Well, all right," he added with a shrug, "June it will be."

He left the Garwood estate shortly afterwards, and if he could have been traced to his destination, both Ellen and Lane might have gained a very different impression of the man who had for two or three years been their close friend and adviser.

Kenton's destination was a garage on the other side of the city, and as he drove into the building he was greeted by a man who was to all appearances a mechanic. Yet that garage was not what it seemed, for the moment Kenton stepped out of his car the mechanic lifted a trap-door to reveal a flight of stairs which descended into a unsuspected cellar.

Kenton lowered himself through the trap-door and it was closed over his head. A moment later the bank manager passed along a short, subterranean corridor and found himself in a secret room, dimly lit by a shaded lamp.

The lamp stood on a table, and it shone in the faces of two men. One was seated, a big, bluff individual familiar to police records, since he had figured on more than one charge-sheet as Nick Corrigan. The other was a swarthy alien known as Tony, and both men seemed strange company for one of Kenton's standing.

"Hallo, chief," Nick greeted the bank manager. "Say, what's the matter? You look kinda sick."

Kenton's manner had indeed undergone a change, and it was difficult to reconcile him with the well-bred and popular guest who had figured at the Garwood Fête. His smiling geniality was no longer in evidence, but had given place in this underground den to an air of mingled craftiness and agitation.

"I'll be all right," he said to Corrigan. "You and the boys can go ahead to-morrow. You know what I mean."

"Sure," Nick answered, with an heartiness that was somehow unwholesome and sinister. "Leave it to us. But listen, if you're going to have the 'jimmies' like this you'd better keep out of sight."

"I'll be all right," Kenton repeated, and then, with sudden heat: "Why couldn't the kid have kept out of the bank's affairs? Everything was great until he got the idea he ought to go to work."

"Work's killed better men than him," Nick observed, whereat Tony gave an ugly laugh. "You know, chief, I'll admit that you've got the brains in this outfit, but you have to have something more than brains in our racket. You have to have nerve."

"Bumping off your girl's brother isn't exactly a pleasant job," Kenton ground out.

Thus did Frank Kenton show himself in a very different light to that in which Society saw him, but the following day, when he drove Ellen to the Los Angeles Speedway in his roadster, he was again the perfect friend and attentive suitor. Moreover, he managed to assume a composure that was a mask to his true feelings.

Over at the pits where the racers were being conditioned for the gruelling test, Jimmy Gray was wishing Lane Garwood every success as the latter donned helmet and goggles and climbed into his single-seater track model.

"Go to it, boy," the young reporter was saying, "and burn up that speedway."

"I'll do my darndest," Lane assured him. "This is my last race, and it's going to be a good one."

Jimmy strolled off, and, wandering around the fencing of the track, suddenly perceived Kenton's car parked near one of the bends. As he recognised its occupants he hurried over to greet them, and was soon in conversation with them.

They were discussing Lane's prospects when Kenton noticed a closed-in automobile draw up to the fence some distance away, and, excusing himself on the plea that he needed some cigarettes, he left Jimmy and Ellen.

Three men had stepped from the closed-in car—Nick Corrigan, Tony, and another thug. In passing them Kenton contrived to attract their attention, and exchanged a meaning glance with them.

In the meantime, Jimmy and Ellen were still talking of Lane, and presently Jimmy referred to his friendship with the youngster.

"You know," he said, "I think he's a swell kid."

"And that's what Lane says about you," Ellen told him. "And I think he's right."

Kenton returned at that moment, and Ellen spoke to him smilingly.

"You're just back in time, Frank," she said. "Look, the cars are coming up to the line."

Kenton took his place beside her again, and an instant later the race was on, the cars storming forward in a bunch. Kenton watched them as they gathered speed to hurtle along the furthest stretch of track, and his pulses seemed to beat time to the fierce throb of the engines, whilst his eyes became fixed on a gleaming torpedo-shape that was sweeping from the rear to challenge the leaders.

For a spell he watched it weaving its way through the other competitors. In the neck-or-nothing race that followed there was half a dozen hair-raising incidents on the bends as one or another of the cars failed to hold the surface and skidded fearsomely. But Kenton scarcely noticed these circumstances, for his attention was riveted on the torpedo-like shape of Lane Garwood's machine.

He watched it coming round the last corner into the straight beside which he had parked his roadster, and as the scream of the high-tuned engines drew nearer he heard Ellen's voice raised in a tone of excitement.

"Lane's gaining!" she cried. "Look, he's taking the lead from the rest of them! He's ahead!"

Kenton turned his head and glanced along the fencing at the closed-in car which had brought his associates to the speedway. He could not see the gangsters now, but he knew full well that they were awaiting the fatal moment that would be Lane Garwood's last.

Corrigan, Tony, and the other man were standing on the other side of the closed-in car, and as the racers came forging over the track Corrigan stooped and drew a gun from under his jacket. It was in a leather case, and proved to be the favourite long-range firearm of the gangster, a miniature high-powered rifle with thin barrel and squat butt.

Dropping on one knee, Nick took up his position beside a wing of the car, and Tony and the other man moved close to shield him completely from view.

Lane's racer flashed by, and Nick swung the rifle on its occupant. Forefinger on the trigger, left hand steadying the sinister muzzle, he glanced along the sights and followed his victim's course with the gun-barrel. Then he fired.

The competitors on the track were hurtling past in a stream. The muffled report of the rifle was drowned in the roar of auto-engines. But the din from the exhausts could not overwhelm the shriek that arose as Lane Garwood's racer suddenly swerved from the track to plunge over the banking and overturn.

In Kenton's roadster, Ellen gave vent to a sharp cry of horror and involuntarily buried her face against Jimmy Gray's breast. Then, pale to the lips, she looked at her two companions piteously.

"It's Lane!" she faltered. "Lane's crashed!"

Jimmy slid out of the car and raced towards the wreckage. He was kneeling beside Lane with an ambulance man when Ellen and Kenton came up.

"I think he's dead," the ambulance man was saying.

A moment later Lane had been lifted on to a stretcher, to be carried off in a hospital ambulance.

Foul Play.

JIMMY GRAY paced back and forth outside the door of the operating theatre. As a news-man and a privileged friend of the house-surgeon, Doctor Clayton, he had been admitted to the very threshold of the room to which Lane had been carried for examination.

The door opened, and the surgeon emerged. Jimmy looked at him haggardly, and from his grim countenance read the worst possible news.

"His last race, huh?" he murmured, with a break in his voice, and was turning away when Clayton took him by the arm.

"Wait a minute, Jimmy," he said. "There's something strange about this."

He held a small fragment of lead between his fingers, and Jimmy looked at it in a puzzled fashion.

"What is it?" he demanded.

"A steel slug from a high powered rifle," Clayton answered. "Garwood was probably dead before his car hit the fence. He was shot down while driving."

The doctor's words staggered Jimmy. For a moment he could only stare at the medical man.

"Shot—while driving!" he reiterated at last. "But—I don't understand. How could anything like that happen? Who could have it in for a kid like Lane?"

"That's for the police to find out," Clayton rejoined. "All I know is that this bullet killed him. At any rate, they were slick workers, whoever they were. They figured they could make the killing look like an accident—and they nearly got away with it."

Jimmy was silent for a little while. Then all at once he spoke to Clayton earnestly.

"Doc," he said, "do me a favour, will you? Put this down on your report as an accident."

"I'm afraid I can't do that, Jimmy."

"Now wait a minute," Jimmy interrupted. "It would just be for a couple of days—to let those fellows think they had got away with it. And it would give us a chance to take them off their guard."

Clayton agreed reluctantly after some persuasion.

"All right," he said, "but only for a couple of days. I wouldn't take the chance for anybody else, but—I haven't forgotten a certain favour you did me, Jimmy."

Jimmy thanked him fervently, and then walked out into a waiting-room where Ellen and Kenton were sitting, Ellen almost beside herself with suspense.

She looked at Jimmy anxiously as he entered, but he could not meet her eyes and lowered his glance miserably. She began to sob distractedly then, and was still weeping when the two men drove her home.

"Bumping off your girl's brother isn't exactly a pleasant job," Kenton ground out.

When Ellen had gone to her room Jimmy took the opportunity of talking to her fiancé alone.

"Kenton," he said, "I guess your connection with Lane and Ellen entitles you to my confidence, and I know I can rely on your help. Doctor Clayton, at the hospital, gave me some information that I mean to pass on to you. It wasn't the crash that killed Lane. He was shot dead at the wheel."

Kenton managed to conceal the real sentiments that the statement aroused in him, and assumed horror.

"Shot dead at the wheel?" he stammered.

"Yes, but Clayton has agreed to keep it quiet for a couple of days," Jimmy went on. "We three are the only living mortals that know the truth—excluding the hounds that killed Lane—and I don't think we ought to tell Ellen right away. She's got enough to stand as it is."

"You're right, Gray," Kenton muttered, and as he spoke he was trying to think fast.

"But in the next two days," said Jimmy determinedly, "I'm going to do everything I can to trace Lane's slayer or slayers, and—"

"Hold on, Jimmy," Kenton gripped him by the arm. "I wouldn't do that if I were you. Listen, I can give you some inside information on this affair myself. Lane came to me a day or two ago and said he was in a 'jam.' He confessed that he'd got mixed up in a booze racket, but meant to cut loose from it. Well, you know what those racketeers do to a fellow when he tries to pass them up. They just wouldn't let Jimmy cut loose as he wanted to, and—they bumped him off, I guess."

Jimmy's eyes narrowed.

"Knowing this makes things a whole lot easier," he stated. "For it shouldn't be so hard to get on the track of that Looze gang."

"Jimmy, you don't understand," said Kenton, lying glibly. "Think what it would mean if the whole ugly story became known. Think how Ellen would feel if the papers were blazoning the full facts—her kid brother a rum-runner, associate of thugs. Why, the disgrace would kill her!"

Jimmy pursed his lips, and Kenton saw that his convincing arguments were bringing about the effect he desired.

"If you've any respect for Lane's good name, and if you've any respect for Ellen's feelings," he appealed, "you'll keep this to yourself, Jimmy."

The young newspaper man nodded slowly.

"I guess you're right, Frank," he murmured. "We'll sing dumb, you and I."

Kenton shook hands with him, and they parted—Kenton to drive straight-way to the secret rendezvous under the garage, where he found Nick and one or two of the gang.

"Nick," said Kenton, "the slug that hit Lane Garwood has been found. The buck was against us, and Clayton, the house-surgeon, discovered it. That reporter Jimmy Gray told me so. I've fixed him so that he'll keep his mouth shut, but Clayton will be handing in his report in a couple of days—"

Nick Corrigan turned to Tony. "I think," he said, "you'd better get the typewriter."

"Fine," Tony rejoined with an ugly grin. "I have to write som' letters, Neek."

November 14th, 1931.

"Yeah," drawled Corrigan, "well, you're gonna write one to that doctor over at the hospital. Get the little fellow out of the safe."

Tony moved over to the wall. From a safe there he withdrew "the typewriter"—gangland's term for a machine-gun.

Frank Kenton bit his lip.

"Is that necessary?" he muttered.

"We never waste bullets unless it is necessary," Nick retorted. "And listen, maybe it wouldn't be a bad idea to pump a few into that snooty reporter."

"Oh, he's all right," Kenton protested. "He gave me his word. You see, I gave him a good line about the honour of his dead pal."

Nick frowned.

"We oughta make sure he don't talk," he growled.

"I tell you he'll keep his mouth shut," Kenton answered impatiently. "And if he should get dangerous—well, then I'll let you do your stuff."

On the Track.

JIMMY GRAY was lounging in the press room at police headquarters when a detective of his acquaintance showed up, and from the plain-clothes man's expression Jimmy saw that something was wrong.

"Hallo, Fogerty," he greeted the detective, "what's up?"

"Your old pal, Doc Clayton," Fogerty answered tersely. "They just rubbed him out!"

"They just rubbed him out? You mean—"

"Bumped him off as he was walkin' home," Fogerty explained. "Got the news over the phone this minute. Come on, I'll drive you to the spot."

Ten minutes later Jimmy and Fogerty were alighting at a street-corner where the body of Doctor Clayton lay, awaiting removal to the mortuary.

"So they got him," Jimmy murmured, as he stood looking down at the still form of the surgeon.

An officer was on his knees beside Clayton, and he raised his glance as Jimmy spoke.

"He never knew what hit him," the officer observed. "Friend of yours?"

"Yes," said Jimmy quietly, and drew back.

It was at this moment that he became aware of a newsboy standing near by. The newsboy was one of Jimmy's wide circle of acquaintances, and the reporter walked over to him as he interpreted a sign from the lad.

"Say, Jimmy," the newsboy whispered excitedly, "I think I can spill you a little dope."

"Go ahead and spill it," said Jimmy.

"Well, it was this way," the boy answered. "I was standin' on the corner when I saw the doc comin' down the road. Then an armoured car drove by—you know, the kind they use to take money to a bank. And the guys inside shot him down without ever stoppin'."

"An armoured car?" breathed Jimmy.

The newsboy nodded.

"Yeah, a grey car," he told the reporter. "Had the word 'Monitor' printed on it."

Jimmy took his informant by the arm. "Remember," he said, "this is exclusive."

"Sure," was the rejoinder, "ain't we workin' for the same sheet? You write for it an' I sell it—"

Jimmy acted upon the information he had received, and for the next day or two was a familiar figure in the tough quarters of the city. Then he decided that it was time he called on Ellen Garwood, and the idea had no sooner occurred to him than he was on his way to her home.

He found her reclining in a hammock on the terrace, fingering a toy doll which Jimmy recognised as the one to which his lucky number had been attached on the day of the fête.

"Well, how did she get here?" he said, with a smile.

"She's yours by rights," Ellen told him, "but you deserted her, so I decided I'd better adopt her. She's been asking about you," she added in a tone of mild reproach, "and wondering why you haven't been to see your friends."

Jimmy's face grew serious.

"I've been pretty busy," he muttered. "I've been trying to get on the track of a gang of dirty killers— But I guess that's not the sort of thing a nice little doll wants to hear about."

"It sounds like a dangerous job for a nice reporter," Ellen rejoined.

"It is," Jimmy answered grimly; "but when two of your best friends have been bumped off it's no time to play safe."

"Was this doctor I've been reading about a friend of yours?" Ellen exclaimed. "Oh, I'm so sorry, Jimmy. But you said there were two. Who was the other?"

Jimmy was momentarily off his guard.

"Why, La—" This much he had said when he stopped himself, and added abruptly: "Oh, nobody that you know—"

But Ellen was leaning forward, her eyes fixed on him intently.

"You started to say 'Lane,' she challenged. "Oh, don't lie to me, Jimmy! Is there anything about Lane's death that I don't know?"

Jimmy tried to stammer out some denial, but she was not prepared to accept it.

"Jimmy, you've got to explain," she insisted tremulously. "You mean—that Lane's death—wasn't an accident. Tell me, Jimmy."

"I can't tell you anything until I'm certain," Jimmy said awkwardly. "But I've got a hunch that there is some connection between Lane's death and Clayton's, and within the next twenty-four hours I hope to have the straight of it, Ellen."

"Do you think you know who killed the doctor?" Ellen asked breathlessly.

Before Jimmy could make any rejoinder there was a footfall close by, and, turning their heads, they saw Frank Kenton approaching, and his first words told them that at least part of their conversation had been overheard by him.

"Do all reporters go in for sleuthing as well as newspaper work?" he inquired, with a smile that masked the glint in his eyes.

Jimmy shrugged his shoulders.

"Well, we sort of come by it naturally," he confessed. "How are you, Frank?"

"Pretty good," Kenton told him. "Hallo, dear," he added to Ellen, laying an affectionate hand on her shoulder.

Jimmy stood up.

"I guess I'll be drifting along," he stated, whereupon Kenton spoke to Ellen again.

"You'll pardon me a moment, dear, will you?" he said. "I'll see Jimmy to the porch. I'd like to speak to him for a second."

He accompanied Jimmy through the house to the front door, where the two men paused.

"Jimmy," Kenton began, "I overheard the conversation you had with Ellen—about Lane. You know, I understood that was a closed issue between us."

A moment later Lane had been lifted on to a stretcher.

"It was," Jimmy answered, "until Doctor Clayton was shot down."

"What had that to do with Lane's death?" Kenton retorted.

"Plenty," Jimmy told him. "Don't you see, Frank—someone must have figured that Clayton knew too much. I've got to get to the bottom of this business now," he added determinedly.

Kenton's brows contracted in a frown.

"Don't you think you're taking a pretty big chance?" he suggested.

"Maybe," was the reply, "but that's my look-out."

Kenton followed the reporter with his eyes as Jimmy walked down the steps to the drive. Then, with an ugly expression on his sallow face, he made his way back to the terrace, where Ellen had been reclining in the hammock. As he approached the girl, however, he betrayed no sign of the chagrin and agitation that had been aroused in him by Jimmy's resolution.

"Frank," Ellen said quickly, as he came over to her, "Jimmy told me that Lane—"

Kenton interrupted her. He was a man accustomed to fast thinking, for, to one practising a double game like himself, initiative was an essential characteristic.

"Yes, dear," he announced, "he told me, too. But it's just a reporter's brain storm. You know, they get a lot of wild theories about things. Anything for a story."

"But Jimmy seemed to think—"

"Ellen, dear, it's all a lot of nonsense," Kenton assured her. "Now listen," he added, changing the subject. "I want you to drive to San Francisco with me to-morrow. I'm settling up Lane's estate and having everything turned over to you, and there are some very important papers that you will have to sign."

"All right," Ellen agreed unsuspectingly. "What time do we start?"

"Well, we could drive up to-night," Kenton mused. "It would be a wonderful trip, I'm sure."

"I'd love it," Ellen declared.

The Armoured Car.

THE telephone in the press-room of police headquarters rang insistently, and Jimmy Gray answered it in person.

"Hallo?" he called inquiringly, and immediately heard a familiar voice.

"That you, Jimmy? This is Red—"

Jimmy's interest quickened. "Red" was a certain taxi-driver who had sworn eternal friendship for Jimmy ever since the young reporter had set him on his feet when his luck was out, and it was to Red that Jimmy had gone shortly after the slaying of Clayton.

"Hallo, Red," he said. "Any luck yet?"

"Sure, lots," was the answer. "I spotted that armoured car for you, and I've got it located. I'm at the cab-rank now, and if you'll come down I'll take you along to the dump."

"I'll be with you in ten minutes," said Jimmy. "Wait for me."

He hung up the receiver, reached for his hat and then stepped over to a desk. From a drawer he produced a loaded Service revolver, and when he had examined it he hurried from the press-room.

Ten minutes later he joined Red at his cab-rank, and the taxi-driver carried him to a street on the far side of the city, where he pulled up within view of the garage that was Nick Corrigan's secret lair.

Jimmy climbed out of the taxi.

"So that's the place, is it, Red?" he muttered.

Red remained behind the wheel, a thick-set, burly fellow with a broad, honest face.

"Yeah," he answered. "And Jim, there's an awful tough bunch of babies hang around that joint, so watch your step. It's no health resort."

"But I've got to get in there," Jimmy retorted firmly. "Red, you know what to do."

"You can depend on me, Jimmy," the taxi-driver assured him, and with the words he cast his eye in the direction of a cross-road near by.

"There's your chance now," said Jimmy, indicating a lorry that was approaching the junction of the streets.

It was Jimmy's object to gain admittance to the garage unobserved, and he knew this was to be difficult, for he could see two men standing in front of it, obviously there to prevent intrusion. But the events that followed, instigated by Jimmy and carried out by Red, were to give the young reporter the opportunity he needed.

Driving to the cross-roads, Red purposely swung his taxi into the track of an approaching lorry and grazed his wing against the bigger vehicle.

There was an immediate conflict of words, the truck-driver descending from his lorry to threaten Red with physical violence.

"Why doncha look where you're goin'?" he snarled. "You taxi-drivers think you own the town! Say, I'd like to bat you on the nose for this—"

The altercation which ensued drew a large crowd, and the two men in front of the garage strolled towards the scene of the trouble with the curiosity of the average human being. Next moment Jimmy Gray was heading for the building, and while the men on guard were giving their attention to Red's argument with the truck-driver, he slipped unseen across the threshold.

Inside the garage, standing well back from the entrance, was an armoured car bearing the name Monitor.

Jimmy moved towards it, and he had opened the door of it to examine its interior when he heard footsteps. He quickly entered the armoured car and ducked out of sight behind the steering-wheel, and an instant later two men walked into the garage.

One was Nick Corrigan, and the other was the rascally Tony. Peering cautiously from the armoured car, Jimmy saw them come to a halt a few paces from the bonnet of the vehicle, and watched Tony lift the trap-door in the floor.

Nick descended, and Tony closed the trap-door over his head and then strode back to the entrance of the garage, where he encountered the other two gangsters as they were returning from the scene of Red's argument with the lorry-driver.

"Where have you fellas been?" Jimmy heard Tony say. "I thought you were supposed to be keeping an eye on de joint."

"We was down the street," came the reply. "But we was watchin' the joint just the same."

"You sure nobody sleep in while you are gone?" Tony demanded, and the other two shook their heads.

But at that instant Jimmy was lowering himself noiselessly from the armoured car and stealing towards the trap-door, and while the backs of the gangsters were still turned to him, he lifted the panel and began to descend the flight of steps which was revealed.

Voices reached his ears from the secret room, and one of them struck him as familiar, though he could not quite place the harsh impatience of its tone.

"Where the devil have you been, anyway, Nick? You got my 'phone message, didn't you?"

"I sure did," was the answer.

"Well, we don't want any slipping-up on this."

"There won't be no slip-ups," drawled Nick. "I've been over arranging details for the funeral of that ambitious young reporter, and I'm gonna see that he breaks into the front page—but not the way he wants to."

Jimmy held his breath. Could it be possible that he himself was the reporter to whom the grim reference had been made? Undoubtedly he was, for the men who had known that Dr. Clayton was dangerous to them must know that he was a menace, too.

Jimmy was now at the foot of the stairs, and, his hand travelling to his pocket, he drew the revolver that he had brought with him. A moment later he was on the very threshold of the lamp-lit, underground room, and as he glanced into it warily, he saw the two men on whom he was cavedropping.

It was with a shock of amazement that Jimmy recognised Frank Kenton, and the feeling was quickly followed by one of rage as he thought of the man's assumed friendship for Lane Garwood, his attachment to the youngster's sister. At the same time he was mystified by the motive for the scoundrel's treachery.

"I wish I'd had Gray bumped off right at the start," Kenton was saying. "But I thought he would keep quiet."

"How do you know he hasn't blown everything already?" Nick argued.

"Yes, that's it," Kenton rejoined. "I don't know, and the police may be on the track right now. That's why I'm not taking any chances. We're leaving here."

"Oh, are we?" Nick drawled. "Where are we goin'?"

Kenton leaned towards him.

November 14th, 1931.

"We're going to San Francisco to-night," he made answer. "You and a certain young lady and myself."

"What's the idea of draggin' a dame along?" Nick snapped.

"Well, she happens to be my fiancée," Kenton replied. "And I need her signature for certain securities that we can realise a lot of money on."

Nick grinned.

"I get you, chief," he murmured.

"And from 'Frisco we leave at eight o'clock in the morning," Kenton continued. "On the John Bolton steamship."

"But what about the rest of the gang?" Nick wanted to know.

"Let them take care of themselves," Kenton sneered. "We've got to look after our own skins, Nick, and—"

He was permitted to say no more, for at that precise moment Jimmy Gray crossed the threshold with levelled gun and stepped into the light of the lamp. "Get 'em up!" he rapped out.

If ever a man's face betrayed astonishment and alarm it was Frank Kenton's in that instant when he realised that his villainy had been discovered. For a spell he could only stare at Jimmy, and two or three seconds elapsed before he raised his hands.

"Did you want to see me, Frank?" Jimmy inquired ominously.

Kenton seemed to have lost his voice, but Nick spoke. He was made of sterner stuff than his accomplice.

"We did, friend," he drawled. "An' it was real nice of you to drop in on us."

With the words he tried to reach for his hip-pocket, but Jimmy jerked the revolver in his direction.

"Don't move," he warned, "and keep those hands high!"

Nick obeyed reluctantly, and cursed softly under his breath.

The Battle.

UP at the entrance of the garage, Tony and his companions were idly keeping watch on the street when the former indicated the armoured car. "We better geev' da truck da once-over," he suggested. "Mebbe we need it soon, huh?"

The crooks moved in the direction of the armoured car, and about the same time Red drove back from the cross-roads, where he had recently concluded his argument with the lorry-driver. As he saw that the threshold of the garage was for the time being unguarded, he resolved to take the opportunity of joining Jimmy Gray and giving him a hand if necessary.

He entered the garage, saw the gangsters walking towards the armoured car, and ducked behind an automobile close by. Next second he heard the man Tony utter a sharp exclamation.

"Look!" the gangster said, pointing at the floor. "Da trap-door—open!"

The other two men looked at him in awe.

"Somebody musta slipped in," one of them blurted.

"Jake, you com' with me," Tony babbled. "You stay and keep an eye on da street, Blink."

Jake and Tony blundered down the steps, but by the time they had reached the underground room Jimmy was ready for them, and as they stumbled into it he switched the revolver on them.

"Stick 'em up!" he ordered. "Stick 'em up! And get over there beside Kenton and the other guy!"

Tony and Jake sullenly obeyed, and a few seconds later fresh footfalls were heard on the stairs. But the newcomer proved to be Red, and, entering the room, he grinned at the reporter.

"Good work, Jimmy," he said. "Gettin' to be quite a nice little gatherin' here, ain't there?"

Jimmy was watching the captives, but he did not see Frank Kenton shift his foot. Nor did he observe a button on the floor, which, when depressed under Kenton's toe, shone a danger-light in the garage up above.

Nick Corrigan spoke.

"Well, where do we go from here, Gray?" he asked Jimmy.

"For a ride maybe," the reporter answered. "Red, run your hands over these fellows and search 'em for guns!"

The taxi-driver obeyed. Kenton was unarmed, but the other three were carrying an automatic apiece, and Red collected the firearms and stepped back.

"There's another guy upstairs," said Jimmy. "We'll get him as we go out. Come on! Let's go, fellers!"

The words were scarcely uttered when Blink darted unexpectedly into the room. He had seen Kenton's signal, and, descending with more caution than Jake and Tony had shown, had arrived in time to surprise Jimmy.

Jimmy was not aware of his presence till he was actually across the threshold. He attempted to wheel and cover the man with the revolver, but before he could bring the muzzle in line with his body the thug seized the reporter's wrist.

Next instant Kenton and the others charged forward in a bunch, Tony and Kenton to give Blink a hand against Jimmy, Nick and Jake to tackle Red as the latter was in the very act of laying the commandeered guns on the table.

Pandemonium immediately broke loose, a pandemonium of shouts and blows and stamping feet, with curses punctuating the din. Then someone swept the lamp from the table, and the underground room was plunged into a darkness that temporarily blinded the combatants.

Their eyes rapidly grew accustomed to the gloom, however, and, far from being checked, the fight raged more furiously, bunched knuckles thudding heavily into flesh and bone.

Jimmy was striving to retain possession of his revolver, but it was wrested from his grasp and turned against him by the man Blink only a few seconds after the lamp had been smashed.

"Back up, Small-time, an' reach for the air," Blink threatened, "or I'll plug yuh!"

Jimmy's answer was to hit out with both hands, and he proved himself to be as useful with his fists as he had been with a gun. His left struck the revolver-barrel a violent slicing blow, and simultaneously his clenched right drove into Blink's face and hurled him to a far corner.

The gun in the gangster's hand went off, but its muzzle was pointing at the floor, and the bullet embedded itself harmlessly in the boards. Then, as Blink fell in a sprawling heap, the weapon jumped from his grasp and spun away into the darkness.

Kenton and Tony had closed in on Jimmy, and as they tried to pull him down the struggle developed into a fierce scramble. But Jimmy managed to tug free with a sudden effort, and again he hit out with his bunched knuckles.

Tony was his target this time, and a slashing punch caught him fairly and squarely on the point. The blow snapped home to his jawbone, and the alien's face was swallowed in the gloom as he dropped with a grunt at Jimmy's feet.

Kenton lashed out at Jimmy while the reporter was tottering over Tony's prone form, and his fist caught Jimmy off his guard. The young newsman was staggered, and, as Kenton followed up his advantage with an ugly swing, was knocked across the room.

The wall brought him up with a jolt, and, flinging off the effects of Kenton's blows, he retaliated with a straight left that stopped Kenton as the crook was rushing forward. A savage exchange of punches ensued, and Kenton scored with a vicious hook that staggered Jimmy. But the reporter came back at him, battered him against the table, and then gripped him by the throat.

Kenton managed to hurl him away by doubling up his legs and lunging at Jimmy's body with them. Then he reached his feet and laid hold of a chair, but as he swung it up to hurl it at Jimmy's head the reporter leapt to close quarters and hit him with a pile-driving right.

Meanwhile, Red was battling against his two assailants manfully, and, though Nick proved a tough proposition and landed more than one telling blow, the taxi-driver fought like a titan, hammering the crooks with his big, coarse-grained hands.

Jake lurched aside, severely punished, his enthusiasm for the conflict waning, and Red gave Nick his full attention with devastating effect.

It was at this juncture, when the situation seemed so favourable for Jimmy and his friend, that Blink and Tony struggled to their feet and discovered their guns, which Red had laid aside just before the start of the fight.

So long as the gangsters had been unarmed, Jimmy had felt inclined to maintain the battle. But, with firearms figuring in the mêlée, he knew that he and Red stood no chance of winning through. Their one object must now be to escape, ere the underground room became a death-trap for them.

Jimmy dropped Kenton with a shattering uppercut and then wheeled to search the gloom for Red. He saw a group of dim figures between him and the staircase, and, with a flying rush, helped the taxi-driver to hurl his antagonists aside.

"Come on, Red!" he shouted, grasping his friend by the arm. "We've got to make our get-away! Quick, man—up to the trap-door!"

"They're tryin' to beat it!" It was the hoarse voice of Nick Corrigan. "Don't let 'em reach those stairs!"

There was a stampede by the crooks, and a pair of hands clutched Jimmy, but the young reporter whipped round and tripped the man who had tried to stop him, then sped on with Red.

It was Jake who had been thrown to the floor, and his sprawled form threw the rest of the gang into confusion. They were still blundering around the threshold of the room when the fugitives gained the staircase, and when they staggered through to the corridor it was to see Jimmy and Red vanishing through the trap-door.

Blink and Tony fired, but missed, the blast of their guns echoing through the underground room and the shots ripping their way harmlessly into the roof of the garage.

"Quick! After them, you fools!" belowered the voice of Nick, and, followed by Jake, Blink and Tony raced up the stairs.

Meanwhile, Red and Jimmy were standing by the edge of the trap-door.

"You go on to your taxi," Jimmy said, "and let her rip! Don't worry about me. I'll be right behind you—in the armoured car!"

Red tore on, dashing out of the garage and sprinting across the street to where his cab stood. He climbed in behind the wheel, started up the engine, and slipped the gear-lever into the "first-speed" slot.

Meanwhile, Jimmy had turned in the direction of the armoured car, and, opening the near-side door of it, he scrambled into the driving position even as Tony, Jake, and Blink rose into view.

They paid no heed to the armoured truck, but ran forward to the garage entrance just as Red's taxi was moving away.

"There they go!" Jake ground out. "In that cab! We'll chase 'em up in the tourer."

He was wheeling towards a five-seater automobile when Tony checked him.

"Better still," he suggested, "let's get da amour'-car, huh?"

"That's a good idea," declared Blink, and the words were hardly uttered when an unexpected sound caused the three rogues to spin round in alarm.

The engine of the bullet-proof truck had burst into a sudden roar, and the vehicle was storming straight for them. They had to jump to avoid the impact of its blunt radiator, and as they flung themselves aside with shouts of alarm they caught a flash of Jimmy Gray at the wheel.

Frank Kenton and Nick Corrigan had remained downstairs in the underground room. The secret rendezvous was still in darkness, but presently Nick found his way to a switch and turned on a wall light, and in the flood of illumination the two accomplices regarded each other gloomily.

Their appearance was dishevelled, their faces bore the marks of punishment, and Kenton, for one, was clearly in a state of panic. Nick was the first to speak, however, and his voice rang harshly through the room.

"This is a fine mess, ain't it?" he snarled. "If you'd let me rub that reporter out at the start, like I wanted to, this wouldn't have happened!"

"I wish I had," Kenton whined, "but how was I to know he was on our trail? I didn't know he was going to locate us in our hide-out—"

"No, you don't know anything," Nick retorted savagely. "A fine guy you've turned out to be for a racketeer. Why, you ain't even got the brains—let alone the nerve!"

Tony came hurrying down the stairs and lurched into the room, chagrined written on his civil face.

"Well, spill it!" Nick barked at him. "They got clear away, I suppose."

"Yeah," was the answer, "clear away. An' dey pinched da amour'-car, too."

Nick's eyes widened.

"What's that?" he raved. "Pinched the armoured-car? Stole our bullet-

He looked in the direction of the window, but Tony had climbed through and was advancing on him.

proof wagon? Why, the dirty racketeers—"

"What are we going to do, Nick?" Kenton babbled, his voice querulous with fear. "We've got to stay away from this place. We can't get here."

"Ah, shut your trap!" Nick retorted contemptuously.

"But listen, Nick," Kenton appealed. "That reporter is going to bring the cops. They may be here at any minute. We've got to pull our freight right now."

"Yeah, an' you pull yourself together, Kenton," Nick ground out. "Listen, you've run this racket long enough. From now on I'm gonna take charge, an' so long as you do what I say you're on Easy Street. Do you get me, Kenton?"

"You can count on me, Nick," Kenton blurted. "I'm ready to do whatever you think is best."

"All right," said Nick, and then, to Tony: "Go upstairs an' wait for me with the boys," he drawled.

Tony departed, and when they were alone Nick turned to Kenton again.

"Now listen," he said, "an' I'll tell you what I'm gonna do. We're goin' over to that Garwood dump. We're goin' to get the jane, and we're goin' to 'Frisco."

The Ride.

OVERTAKING Red's taxi in the armoured-car, Jimmy drove out to the Garwood home, and, leaving his companion in the carriage-way, was admitted by a maid.

Ellen was in the lounge, and started to her feet as he entered, for it was plain that he had been in some kind of trouble.

"Why, Jimmy," she exclaimed, "what's the matter? You look as if you'd been in a fight."

"I have," he told her. "Listen, Ellen, I want to ask you something."

"What is it, Jimmy?"

He drew nearer to her and looked into her eyes earnestly.

"Do you really care for Frank Kenton, Ellen?" he demanded.

She started violently, and wondered how Jimmy could have guessed that she had somehow felt uncertain of her affection for Frank during the last week or two.

"Why do you ask?" she faltered.

"Because, if you care for Kenton, what I'm going to tell you will hurt, Jimmy said."

"Hurt?" Ellen repeated the word, and then paused. "Is it something I should know?" she added after a moment.

Jimmy nodded.

"Yes, Ellen," he answered. "Your father appointed Kenton guardian of your estate, didn't he? And Kenton had access to all money and securities belonging to you and Lane."

"That's right," Ellen agreed.

"Well, he was evidently afraid that Lane would find out what he was doing with the money," Jimmy tried to explain. "That is, if Lane came to the bank to work. I mean, if Lane had gone there he'd have discovered, sooner or later—"

"Jimmy, what are you driving at?" she pleaded.

He bit his lip.

"It's not easy to break this to you," he said, "but, Ellen, Frank Kenton killed your brother!"

The girl stared at him with a dumbfounded expression on her lovely face.

"Frank — killed — Lane!" she stammered. "Oh—oh, but how could he have done that? Frank was with us when it happened—"

"He had his gang pull the job," Jimmy interrupted. "And when I told him what Doctor Clayton had said at the hospital—about Lane having been shot—"

Ellen gripped his arm.

"They killed him, too!" she gasped.

"Jimmy, does Frank know that you suspect him?"

"He knows more than that," was the grim rejoinder. "And it looks like I'm the next prospect."

"Jimmy! Oh, Jimmy—"

The anxiety in her voice sent a thrill through him, and in a moment he had enfolded her in his arms. But before he could stoop to kiss her he heard the sound of a car's engine in the drive, and, releasing her, he crossed to the window and looked out.

A tourer had drawn up beside the armoured car, and Kenton and his gang were emerging from it. Red was nowhere in sight, and it gave Jimmy some satisfaction to know that his friend had escaped.

"Jimmy, what is it?" came the voice of Ellen.

"Frank Kenton and his men," the reporter said without turning his head.

"The 'phone!" gasped Ellen. "Get in touch with the police!"

Jimmy nodded and stepped to the instrument, but the line was dead, and there was no response when he picked up the receiver. It was easy for him to guess that the crooks had cut the wire outside the gates of the drive.

"The 'phone's out of order," Jimmy muttered, and then he heard a footstep, and spun around to see Nick, Kenton, and Jake entering the room.

He looked in the direction of the window, but Tony had climbed through it and was advancing on him, followed by Blink.

It was clear to Jimmy that he was in a corner, and the muzzle of a gun compelled him to accept the situation.

"Well," drawled Nick, "quite a family gathering, huh?"

The gangsters closed in on Jimmy, and, when they were grouped around their victim, Nick spoke again.

"I ought to smash you in the nose!" he snarled, raising his fist savagely.

Jimmy lunged forward, but Tony thrust his gun into his ribs and forced him back, and Nick was drawing back his arm when Ellen pushed past him and appealed to Kenton.

"Isn't there any decency in you?" she flashed. "You killed Lane—"

"Keep your mouth shut!" Kenton interrupted harshly. "You'll find it might pay you not to make any fuss."

"Kenton's right," put in Nick. "I understand, miss, that you were leaving for San Francisco to-night. Well, you're leaving with us right now. Take her away, Kenton, and get her into her car."

Kenton gripped Ellen's arm, and, in spite of her struggles, dragged her from the room. Jimmy made a frenzied attempt to follow, but was held by his captors, and once more found himself confronted by Nick.

"We've made other plans for you," Nick said. "The boys are taking you for a ride—your last one. So it's goodbye, News-hound."

Red to the Rescue.

JIMMY had imagined that his friend Red had made his escape, but his surmise was wrong. Red had merely concealed himself in the shrubbery at the approach of Kenton and the gangsters, and when the crooks had gone into the house he stole from his hiding-place.

An idea had occurred to Red, and, making straight for the tourer in which the rogues had arrived, he lifted the bonnet and tampered with the magnet-leads. He had barely achieved his object and lowered the bonnet when the front door of the house opened, and Red at once dived into the armoured car, crouching behind the steering-wheel.

Jimmy appeared in the charge of Tony, Jake, and Blink. The crooks marched him to the tourer, and, while Tony and Blink hustled him into the back of the auto, Jake settled himself in the driving seat.

Jake pressed the starter-button. There was a whirring sound, but the engine did not respond, and, in spite of the gangster's persistence, not a spark was to be raised.

"What's the matter with this thing?" he growled.

"Didn't you fill her up with gasoline?" Blink demanded from the back of the auto.

"Of course I did," Jake answered irritably. "Something's gone wrong."

Tony spoke.

"We'll use da armour' car!" he snapped. "We got no time to waste. Come on!"

They ordered Jimmy from the car and pushed him towards the bullet-proof truck, Jake pulling open the near-side door of it.

"Get in!" came the order.

Jimmy climbed into the vehicle. Next instant the engine roared stridently, and with an unexpectedness that left the crooks paralysed the armoured car stormed down the drive and through the gateway to the road under the skilful control of Red's hands.

It was thirty paces away before Tony and his companions recovered from their amazement. Then, with one accord, they snatched out their guns and blazed at the truck, only to hear their bullets clang harmlessly against its armour-plating.

"We gotta start that tourer!" howled Jake, and, running to the crippled auto, he flung up the bonnet, and at once realised why the engine had failed to respond to his efforts.

"Why, it's disconnected!" he raged.

"Fix it, then!" roared Blink, and in the space of a few seconds Jake put the car in order again.

The thugs scrambled into it, and, his foot jammed on the accelerator, Jake drove out of the grounds and on to the road. He swerved in the direction that the armoured car had taken, and on the open highway the tourer showed a turn of speed that the bullet-proof truck could not equal.

They followed a trail that penetrated the hills, and presently both vehicles were travelling alongside the brink of a cliff one hundred feet in depth. Scarcely fifty yards separated the tourer from the truck, and the distance was steadily decreasing as Jake kept his shoe hard down on the accelerator pedal.

Blink and Tony looked to their guns. They were a bare thirty yards behind the armoured car now—twenty—ten. They were abreast.

The two crooks in the back of the tourer tried to take a shot at the fugitives, but the bullet-proof truck had been built on lines calculated to safeguard its occupants against a regular fusillade. There was hardly a chunk where a slug might penetrate.

Jake swerved closer.

"I'll run 'em off the road!" he shrilled to his accomplices, and attempted to drive Red into an embankment on the far side of the trail.

The tourer grazed the side of the armoured car, and then recoiled. Again Jake tried to wreck the other vehicle, but he had tackled more than he could achieve. The bullet-proof truck possessed the advantage in bulk, and its driver a nerve equal to the gangster's.

Red retaliated by swinging the armoured car against the tourer, and the effect was disastrous—for Jake and his companions.

Every Tuesday

There was a violent bump, and the crooks' car swung aside, weaving across the trail to the very brink of the cliff. Jake made a frantic effort to steer it back to safety, but the armoured truck balked him and crowded him to the verge of the precipice again.

"Look out!" screamed Blink and Tony in one breath.

They were the last words that they uttered; for as the dual shriek broke from their lips the tourer plunged over the edge.

It hurtled through space amidst a shower of dust and stones. Fifty feet down it struck the cliff-face with a shock that buckled it, then crashed to the foot of the precipice. As it hit the ground there was a sound like a thunder-clap, and as the dust cleared away three mangled, lifeless bodies might have been seen half-buried in the wreckage.

On the trail above, Red made grim comment on the crash he had engineered.

"It had to be done," he stated, "and I guess they won't bother us any more. But where did you want me to head for when you told me to take this road, Jimmy?"

"The flying field," was the answer. "I'm bound for 'Frisco, Red, and I'm going there in a hurry. For unless I'm mistaken, Kenton, Nick, and Ellen are on the road right now."

He was right. For the three he had named were motoring at high speed over the San Francisco trail—Nick at the wheel, Kenton and Ellen in the back behind drawn blinds.

They had travelled a distance of several miles when the engine-roar of another machine reached Nick's ears, and shortly afterwards a speed-cop drew abreast on a powerful motor-bike. With a disgruntled air the crook lifted his foot from the accelerator and cased on the brakes to bring the car to a standstill.

"Just what is your hurry, friend?" the cop demanded. "Have you got a driving licence?"

Before Nick could answer, Kenton stepped quickly out of the limousine, shutting the door behind him so that the speed-cop should not see the bound and gagged figure of the girl in the interior of the automobile.

"Here you are, officer," he said, producing his card. "I'm on my way to an important meeting in San Francisco."

The speed-cop read the impressive business-card that Kenton had tendered, and his manner became respectful.

"I see," he rejoined. "That's all right, Mr. Kenton."

"Have a cigar," Kenton offered, scarcely able to disguise his relief.

"Thanks!" said the speed-cop. "I don't mind if I do. Good-day, sir!"

About that same time Red and Jimmy were driving on to the flying field, and a few minutes later the young reporter had engaged a pilot to carry him to his destination.

"Well, so-long, Red!" he said to his cabman friend as he was pulling on a flying-helmet and preparing to enter the waiting machine. "And thanks a lot for everything you've done."

BOY'S CINEMA

"Aw, forget it," Red told him cheerfully. "You know, I ain't forgot what you did for the missus an' me when I was down-an'-out. An' I'd have named my first kid after you if she'd been a boy."

Jimmy laughed, and then climbed into the passenger cockpit of the plane.

"Anyway, I reckon I'm still in your debt, Red," he declared. "And here I go—hell-bent for 'Frisco."

"Contact!" came the voice of the pilot, and next moment the engine roared deafeningly.

"So long!" yelled Red.

The plane moved forward, gathering speed for the "take-off" as it bumped lightly over the "field." Then it rose like a bird into the deep-blue vault of the sky.

News from Jimmy.

IT was early morning when a figure slipped into a 'phone-box near the San Francisco docks. The figure was that of Jimmy Gray.

"Hallo, operator!" he called, lifting the receiver. "Give me Long Distance—Los Angeles, 'Morning World.' Reverse the charges and step on it, will you, sister— Eh, what do you say? Well, maybe you don't like strange guys calling you 'sister,' but you can reverse the charges and step on it, all the same."

There was a pause that seemed interminable to Jimmy, and then a 'phone-bell rang in the editorial office of the "Morning World."

A big man wearing an eye-shade answered it. He was Graham, editor-in-chief, and as he picked up the receiver he heard his star reporter's distant voice.

"Hallo, chief, this is Jimmy Gray talking—"

Graham's brow darkened. "Say," he snarled, "where the devil have you been?"

"Why, I'm in San Francisco," came the answer.

"What!" blazed Graham. "You're where?"

"Now wait a minute, chief," Jimmy appealed. "Don't get excited. Keep your shirt on, will you, and get this— What's that— No, I haven't been drinking—"

"Well, don't you know you're working for this paper?" Graham roared into the 'phone. "You've no business to be trillin' around 'Frisco—"

"Now wait a minute!" Jimmy interrupted. "Listen, now, will you, for the love o' Pete? All right, but get this— just get this—" He cleared his throat, and: "'Murderers of Lane Garwood and Doctor Albert Clayton Captured!' That's your headline, chief."

"What the blazes are you talking about?"

Jimmy began to explain, and he was only half-way through with his narration when Graham broke in excitedly.

"Great!" he shouted, his face alight with interest. "Great! Hold the wire, Jimmy! I'll get the re-write man!"

He turned from the transmitter and called to a fellow at a desk near-by.

"Here, get this!" he ordered. "Story from Jimmy Gray!"

The re-write man settled himself at a typewriter and fixed a pair of head-phones over his ears to listen-in to Jimmy's call.

"Ready?" came the voice of the "Morning World's" star news-hound. "Then take this: 'Frank Kenton was arrested while attempting to board the s.s. John Benton at eight a.m. to-day.'"

The re-write man hammered the keys of his typewriter, and Graham leaned over his shoulder to read the words.

"Hey, wait a minute!" the editor jerked all at once, and, calling through the 'phone to Jimmy again: "Say, what do you mean 'eight o'clock to-day'?" he demanded. "It's only one o'clock in the mornin' now."

"I know," was the reply; "but get

"I reckon he had it comin' to him," said one of the officers.

this straight. You don't want to miss a front-page spread, do you? Well, put this on the presses or you'll be scooped."

Graham abandoned the 'phone again. He knew Jimmy. He knew that he must be on a big story—the sensation of the year. Double slaying of Lano Garwood and Dr. Albert Clayton—and Frank Kenton, prominent banker, involved.

"Boy!" he roared to a messenger. "Tell Jake to hold the front page. Mickey"—this to another lad—"get upstairs to the library and find a picture of Kenton—Frank Kenton! Jump to it!"

He wheeled to the 'phone once more. "Now, listen, Jimmy," he went on, "if this thing don't go through you'd better not show your handsome pan around this office again—not even to collect any back pay. Do you understand?"

"Absolutely!" Jimmy answered heartily.

"We're holding the front page blank," Graham continued. "The moment the cops make the pinch, 'phone me. I'll be right here, waitin'!"

"Don't worry, chief," said Jimmy. "What I've told you is advance information, but the pinch is coming off. I'll call you and give details at eight a.m. sharp."

Graham hung up and turned to issue a fresh batch of orders to a number of subordinates who had gathered round.

"Boys, this is going to be the biggest scoop we've ever had," he declared. "Listen, and I'll tell you what I want you to do. Bill, you beat it over to Kenton's house as fast as you can, and get some flashlight pictures of the dump. Andy, you take a run over to the Garwood place, find out what you can from any of the servant-staff there—and 'phone me. Now snap into it!"

His instructions having been given, Graham and the remainder of his staff settled themselves for the long and anxious wait, and never had hours dragged as they seemed to drag that night. Nor were the hands of the clock above the editorial desk ever watched with so much suspense.

Down in the printing works the giant presses were stamping out the facts already known, and flaring headlines proclaimed a capture not yet effected. If Kenton eluded the snare into which he was running, then the "Morning World" was sunk. A million folios of paper wasted. Its editorial staff the laughing-stock of Los Angeles.

And the name of Jimmy Gray—mud! Graham broke into a cold sweat as he summed up the consequences that would result from the risk he had taken if the scoop failed. At five-thirty he was pacing the room like a caged lion. At six-thirty he was staring haggardly at the hands of the clock. At seven-thirty he was a raving madman, leaping at every buzz of the telephone-bell, groaning audibly as each successive call proved to be in connection with some triviality.

Meanwhile, at the docks in San Francisco, a body of police-officers in plain-clothes and in uniform were taking up position at various vantage-points near the John Benton.

Two or three were waiting at the car-park station. Another lurked in the doorway of a warehouse. Three more, in company with Jimmy Gray, were actually on board the steamship on which Kenton had booked three passages.

November 14th, 1931.

At seven-forty-five a limousine moved into the parking-place.

Gun Play.

NICK CORRIGAN climbed out of the automobile, and had hardly set foot to the ground when Kenton emerged, pulling Ellen after him.

The girl was no longer bound and gagged, and was struggling to free herself.

"Let me go, Frank!" she panted.

"Let me go, will you?"

But he did not heed her, and, exerting all his strength, dragged her towards the John Benton's berth.

Nick was in the act of following him when three figures sprang from hiding. They were the officers who had been detailed to watch the car-park, and, though Kenton raced on with Ellen to elude them, one of their number overtook Corrigan and jammed a gun-muzzle in his back.

"Well, Nick," he drawled, as the gangster pulled up with a jerk, "this looks like the finish for you."

Nick turned round. His captor, a plain-clothes man, was smiling grimly.

"Yeah," said Nick, with a deceptive note of surrender in his voice, "it sure looks like it."

And with the words he ripped his fist to the point of the detective's jaw!

The plain-clothes man went over as if he had been pole-axed, his gun spitting flame and lead as he fell. But the bullet missed Nick by a yard, and the gangster whipped round and ran for it.

The detective reached his feet as his two companions came up, and all three opened fire on Nick's flying figure.

The bullets zipped around the crook, but he raced on, for the time being unscathed. Yet he knew full well that he must be brought down sooner or later if he remained in the open, and like a hare he dashed across the car park and vaulted the fencing of a freight yard.

He crouched down behind the paling and pulled out a revolver. His pursuers were sprinting towards him when he let them have it, and the smashing blast of his gun sent them helter-skelter for cover. They ducked down behind the wing of a car, and blazed at him across the bonnet.

Lead slugs splintered the fencing in front of Nick, or whined through it to flatten themselves on the wheels of a railway truck at his back. He returned the fusillade savagely and shot after shot ricocheted off the bonnet of the car behind which the officers crouched.

"Keep down, boys," one of them warned. "I know this bird, and he's a dead-moral-certainty with that gat of his if he can get a fair squint at us."

Nick emptied his revolver and reloaded. He was holding the Law at bay, but he knew that presently, when his ammunition was exhausted, he would be at the mercy of his antagonists.

Moreover, he was not blind to the possibility that there might be others in the neighbourhood, and that a cordon might eventually be thrown around him.

He resolved to take to his heels again, in the hope of giving the officers the slip among the freight wagons of the railroad depot, then doubling on his tracks and reaching the maze of streets behind the docks.

He scrambled to his feet and wheeled round, and with the movement he saw a couple of detectives step into view round the tail of a goods truck thirty yards away.

Nick brought up his revolver with a snarl, but ere he could pull the trigger one of the officers had beaten him to the "throw."

There was a stabbing bark, and a .44 cartridge thudded into Nick's breast. He seemed to come up on his toes and he gave a kind of stagger—then braced himself and tried to fire a belated shot at the officer who had hit him. But the agony in his chest caught him in a sudden violent spasm, and with death rattling in his throat he tumbled backward and lay still.

When the representatives of the Law gathered around his prone body he had breathed his last. His gun was still grasped in his fist, but he had used it for the last time, and Society would never more dread the threat of it. A crimson trickle of blood ran from the corner of his mouth across his cheek.

"I reckon he had it comin' to him," said one of the officers, kneeling beside him. "But what about Kenton and the Garwood girl?"

"The last I saw of Kenton he was dragging her off to the John Benton," said a uniformed cop told him. "But if everything goes right that crime reporter and the rest of the boys will make the pinch."

Eight O'clock.

CLUTCHING Ellen's wrist and forcing her along with him, Frank Kenton fled along the docks at the top of his speed and reached the s.s. John Benton.

He stumbled to the gangway and was setting foot on it when Ellen pulled him back with a desperate effort.

"I'm not going!" she gasped, beating at him with her free hand. "I'm not going, I tell you! Let me go, you—you beast! You killer!"

"Keep quiet!" Kenton barked at her. "Keep your mouth shut, or it'll be so much worse for you!"

He flung an arm about her waist and, pushing her in front of him, began to ascend the gangway.

He imagined he was safe. There was no one in view, and it seemed as if the officers who had been waiting at the docks had confined their attention to Nick Corrigan, knowing him for a dangerous slayer.

Kenton did not see the group of men crouching on the bridge of the John Benton, a group that included Jimmy Gray.

"Here he comes," Jimmy whispered to his companions, as Kenton stumbled up the gangway with his captive.

Kenton gained the deck of the steamship, and in the same instant Jimmy led a flying rush down the bridge-ladder. The stampede seemed to bewilder Kenton for a second, and he was still standing by the rail when Ellen uttered a thankful cry.

"Jimmy!"

Kenton suddenly became galvanised, whipped round to make his escape, and abandoned his hold of Ellen as he did so. Hurling himself past the girl, Jimmy overtook the fugitive and seized him by the arm, and with a desperate wrench Kenton tugged free and bolted down the gangway.

"After him!" yelled a police officer who was close on Jimmy's heels.

Jimmy needed no incentive. In one bound he reached the gangway, and, covering the length of it in a few rapid strides, he swung after his man as the latter sprinted along the docks.

Jimmy could cover the hundred yards in less than average time, but Kenton ran with the speed of a man panic-stricken, and he was keeping his dis-

(Continued on page 24.)

On a liner bound for England a tense drama is enacted. How a crook, for the sake of a girl, played a straight game.

Starring
EDMUND
LOWE
and
LOIS MORAN.

The Gangway Watch.

It was a quarter to four in the afternoon. The Transatlantic, that giant ocean liner which had recently lowered the United States to England record by half a day, was due to cast off at four. Already the pilot was aboard, and five tugs were fussing around the dock, busily getting their hawsers made fast in readiness to tow the magnificent vessel from the quay-side.

At the top of the gangway, up which a steady stream of passengers moved, stood the fourth officer and a quiet, unassuming man in plain clothes. They occupied their time by peering into the faces of the passengers that passed them.

The fourth officer nudged his companion, and indicated a small, tubby man puffing his way towards the promenade deck.

"That him?" he asked in an undertone.

The other looked, and shook his head. "No. He doesn't tally with headquarters' description, anyway. Greer is tall, upright bearing, dark hair, slight moustache—"

"Obviously not him," cut in the fourth officer, and devoted his attention to the stream of passengers once more.

The deep, throaty note of the siren reverberated to their ears. The fourth officer glanced at his watch.

"Well, I'm afraid he's not sailing by this ship," he said. "Most of the passengers are aboard, and that siren was the signal for their friends to go ashore. The gangway will be hauled off in five minutes."

"Okay," was the reply. "I'll hang around the quay for a while—until you're on your way, at any rate. Meanwhile, should you see him, send one of your stewards after me. Detective Glennon is the name. So long!"

"So long!" returned the fourth officer. The detective ambled ashore, still peering at the few remaining passengers who fought their way up the gangway against the tide of downcoming passengers' friends. He peered in vain. No one who looked like Monty Greer, notorious gambler, tall, erect, dark, with slight moustache, passed him.

He was new to the game of dockside detection, and he made no allowances for the obvious defects of official descriptions. Such descriptions lacked imagination, otherwise they would have added that Monty Greer, in addition to the more obvious points of his appearance, was a good loser, and that there was a humorous twinkle in his eyes.

And if Detective Glennon had looked for such a twinkle, he would have seen it in the eyes of a smart and extremely good-looking porter who had walked boldly up the gangway only five minutes before, with a small suitcase in his left hand and a larger one on his right shoulder.

As it was, Glennon went ashore empty-handed, and continued gazing at the fashionable New York crowd that lunged about in groups, waving to their friends on the promenade deck of the Transatlantic, and occasionally shouting some last-minute message up to them.

Meanwhile, the smart young porter had ceased to be. He had divested himself of his brass-buttoned tunic and shiny peaked-cap, and had donned a long rain-coat and a soft-brimmed hat, the front of which had been pulled down well over his eyes.

He stood now some distance along the promenade deck, well away from the gangway, and the twinkle in his eyes became more pronounced as he caught sight of Detective Glennon in the crowds below.

The fact was, Monty Greer saw no reason whatsoever why he should stay in New York. For one thing, the place was getting too hot for him; and for another, he had not had a holiday for years, and he felt that a trip to Europe would do him good.

The Department of Justice at New York felt otherwise. A very important court case was pending at about that time, and it involved serious graft allegations against several prominent people.

Monty had been required as a witness. Because he was the friend of prominent people wherever he went, and because he was such a good sportsman that they never minded losing to him over a crap game or any other form of gambling that happened to be fashionable at the moment, the police knew that what Monty could say if he chose would send quite a few big shots up the river.

Monty, not being a squealer, had decided not to be a witness, and refused to attend the court. The Department of Justice replied by having served on him a subpoena, ordering him to attend, otherwise he would be guilty of contempt. It was exactly that move which had finally decided Monty to fade into the far distance for a while.

Hence the presence of Detective Glennon on the gangway. The officers of the Department of Justice, finding that Monty had ignored the subpoena, applied for and were granted a bench warrant for Monty's arrest.

And now Monty, a gentle smile on his lips, was gazing on the top of Detective Glennon's hat from the promenade deck of the Transatlantic. Being a decent chap, he felt no particular triumph over the fact. Such things were all in his game—part of his day's work.

Even as he stood there, his arms resting on the rail, the ship's bell struck six times. Four o'clock!

Neatly and efficiently the cables fixed to the gangway tattered, and the gangway itself swung clear. At the same moment the hawsers mooring the liner to the side of the dock were cast off, and the tugs surrounding her serched their signal to start towing.
November 14th, 1931.

Like some gigantic and self-contained city, the Transatlantic glided away. Five days of adventure lay before her—five days of battling with mighty seas, ploughing her way through the carefully charted northern Atlantic Ocean, the one thousand three hundred odd souls aboard her depending upon her and those responsible for her navigation for a safe and joyous crossing.

Getting Acquainted.

ALMOST as soon as the vessel began to move, Monty turned from the rail and slowly retraced his footsteps towards his cabin on C deck.

It was a roomy one and occupied one of the best positions on the ship, testifying to the fact that he was a good gambler. Decorated in the latest style, it had the quiet comfort and luxury to which Monty had long been accustomed.

Monty kept out of sight until well into the evening, deeming it advisable to make himself as little prominent as possible. He passed the time in reading, unpacking, and so on until the bugle on the top deck announced that he had a bare half an hour before dinner.

Then, and not till then, did he ring the bell for his steward.

After a minute or two, a discreet knock on the door announced the steward's arrival.

"Come in!" Monty called out.

The door opened, and a short, fat man in a white coat appeared. He had a round, chubby face which always shone under the lights, and always smiled.

"You're my steward?" asked Monty. "Yes, sir," was the reply. "Me number's seven, and me name's 'Odgkins, sir—at your service."

Monty nodded.

"And this is not your first voyage, I take it?" he said.

"No, sir—it's me two 'undredth."

"Good heavens!" Monty rolled his eyes upwards. "What a monotonous life!"

"Not a bit of it, sir," Hodgkins took a deep breath. "Don't you believe it, sir. No two crossings are the same." He struck an attitude, like a little boy at a party about to recite that celebrated passage from Shakespeare's "As You Like It" which commences, "All the world's a stage." "A ship is like a little world, sir, with all sorts of people bundled together—coming from 'eaven knows where, and shakin' 'ands, an' makin' friends, and lovin' each other, an' 'ating each other. They're five or six days away from everybody and everything, sir, and things might 'appen to them, sir, which changes their 'ole lives for ever."

"Hallelujah, Hodgkins, hallelujah," chanted Monty with mock seriousness.

"Yes, sir. Certainly, sir," replied Hodgkins.

Monty nodded pleasantly, and moved towards the door.

"And now, after that profound philosophy of yours, I think I'll take a turn on deck while you lay out my dinner clothes. I'll be back in ten minutes."

"Yes, sir. Certainly, sir."

Monty went out, and started climbing the companion-way slowly. When he reached the open, he saw the lights of New York a long way astern, and gazed at them musingly.

"Things happen to some of them that change their whole lives for ever," he muttered thoughtfully. "I wonder, Hodgkins, if you are anything of a prophct."

Hidden Challenge.

IT was not until after dinner that he decided to look his fellow-passengers over, an idea in his mind that he might be able to make his trip profitable. Therefore, he strolled along to the ship's notice-board and glanced over the published list of passengers.

As the names came before his eyes, his expression changed. At first it became puzzled, then it became anxious; finally it became the hardened mask of the born gambler who has a great stake on the table.

For the names he saw were those of Henry D. Graham, banker, and president of the Graham Investment Corporation, Mrs. Graham, Sigrid Carlene, a notorious dancer, and "Handsome" Moran, one of the toughest gang leaders in America.

Quickly his mind ran over what he knew of each. Graham's banks were believed to be on the verge of a crash, and also his name had been connected with Sigrid Carlene's. Mrs. Graham, Graham's wife—well, Monty had known her long before she had married, and still remembered how beautiful she was. As for Handsome, he was always around whenever big money was in the air.

Monty strolled away from the notice-board thoughtfully, the sight of the beautiful Kay Graham's face before his eyes. For the best part of an hour he wandered up and down the promenade-deck, wondering about the significance of Sigrid and Handsome in the scheme of things.

Suddenly he stopped his pacing and turned on his heel. He had an old grudge against Handsome, and it might be a good thing to do something about settling it right now.

A minute later he was on B deck, knocking at a door. A voice from inside called out:

"Come in!"

He entered, and gave a quick, comprehensive glance around the cabin.

"I'm sorry to intrude like this," he said with a disarming smile, "but, you see, I've misplaced one of my bags."

The man he had addressed was Henry D. Graham himself. Monty found himself looking with curiosity at him, and wondering why the happy, carefree girl he had once loved could have had the courage to become Mrs. Graham. The banker's face was sallow, his forehead was lined, and his eyes seemed always to be looking away.

"What reason have you to suppose your bag is in my cabin?" he asked curtly.

"Well, you see, I occupy the corresponding cabin on C deck," Monty explained. "And—well, my name, like yours, begins with G."

Graham made a gesture of dismissal, and turned back to the desk at which he was sitting.

"There are no strange bags here," he said in a tone that indicated the interview to be at an end.

Monty bowed and made to withdraw. But before he could go, Graham said:

"My wife has a mountain of luggage. You can look in there if you like." He motioned towards a closed door that connected his own cabin with that of his wife's. "But you'll have to go through the corridor outside," he added. "That's locked."

Monty's eyebrows were raised at this information, but he made no comment. He only reflected that apparently Graham and Kay were not on speaking terms—a bad sign.

He went along the corridor and found

Kay's cabin. He knocked, and was bidden to enter.

He opened the door and found Kay seated at her dressing-table. His experienced glance told him that she had been crying—red rims were about her lovely grey eyes.

"I'm so sorry to trouble you," he said apologetically, "but I've lost one of my bags. Do you mind if I look?"

He glanced around and shook his head.

"No. No luck," he continued. "Many thanks for your kindness. If I can be of any service to you on the voyage, will you let me know?"

She looked at him in some surprise, and he caught his breath sharply. She had lost none of the beauty he had once loved her for.

"I can imagine no service you could possibly do for me," she said politely.

"Think it over," said Monty enigmatically, aware that she had apparently not recognised him.

Then he quietly left the cabin.

He retraced his steps slowly towards his own deck, painfully aware that he still cared enough about Kay Graham to want to see her happy. But so far as he could see, there was nothing to be done.

As he was approaching his own door, he caught sight of a slim figure in a dinner-jacket leaning against the bulk-head. He paused and frowned. Then he continued on his way.

The slim figure turned, and Monty immediately recognised him.

