"One o' those two dropped these keys when they ambushed me," he said, taking the ring of keys from his pocket. "This one fits Rankin's trunk—and I expect the other one will just fit the lock of your office, Kramer. If it does, it's just goin' to be too bad for you."

Kramer rolled his cigar to the side of his mouth and thrust his hands in his trouser-pockets.

"Not me," he returned calmly. "I'm through with them. I'll have no murderers in my association."

"You've reformed a little too late," sneered Tim. "Wait for me at the door, will you, Chad?"

Chad retreated to the door and stood there in case anyone should attempt to draw a gun, and Tim strode back to the cell in which Lynch was still holding his wounded arm.

"I'll be back with witnesses to hear what you've got to say," he rapped.

"You won't get anything outa me!" snarled Lynch.

"And you'll probably get twenty years for attempted murder." Tim joined Chad at the door, but looked back at Ludlow.

"Well, they're your prisoners now, Mr. Sheriff," he said significantly, "but I want 'em here when I get back—and they'd better be alive!"

He went out with Chad, leaving a very disoriented group behind.

"Somebody'd better get a doctor," wailed Lynch. "We're all shot up here!"

"Well, ain't that too bad?" jeered Kramer.

"Get a doctor, I tell you! I think Rankin's dyin'!"

"So much the better," retorted Kramer heartlessly. "You can blame everything on him when O'Neil comes back."

"O'Neil ain't comin' back," said Ludlow furiously. "Come on, Peters! Come on, Seitz!"

"Wait!" snapped Kramer. "You idiots have got us in deep enough with your guns as it is!"

"But I tell you we got—"

"Shut up! You'll never blast your way out o' this thing with six-guns. You keep out of it—I'll handle it myself."

"I hope I live to get out o' this cage with a gun in my hand," whispered Lynch; and Ludlow turned to Peters with a grimace.

"Oh, go and get him a doctor before he starts cryin'," he said disgustedly.

Tim and Chad crossed the street to the headquarters of the Cattlemen's Productive Association. Kramer's office was at the back of the assembly room, and three of his men were inside it, playing cards at a table. The outer door was open, but Tim did not hesitate. He took out the ring of keys and tried the smaller one in the lock of the door. It turned easily.

"We were right," he said to Chad. "It fits!"

The three card-players streamed out from the office to see what was going on, but Tim and Chad walked briskly up the street towards the Bonanza Hotel. Kramer emerged from the sheriff's office with Peters, who hurried away to Dr. Lindsay's house, in Mountain Street, while Kramer walked over to the three men.

"Say," one of them cried out as he approached, "O'Neil's got a key to this joint!"

"I know it," returned Kramer curtly. Chad glanced back and saw the group on the boardwalk.

"Kramer's men must have heard you try that key, Tim," he said nervously.

"I wanted them to," Tim coolly returned.

"They're liable to start something!"

"Let them. If they start something, it'll give us a chance to finish it. Meanwhile we're goin' up to Jerry's room to see what we can find there."

Jerry, a bachelor, had lived at the hotel. In spite of its hne-sounding name it was only a ramshackle building of wood, with a veranda along its front, and an outside staircase in an alleyway at its side for the benefit of residents who did not wish to go through a shabby lounge to the main stairs.

Tim turned into the alleyway, but at the foot of the ladder-like staircase Chad stopped him.

"It's no use, Tim," he said hoarsely, "I can't back you up. We're still on opposite sides."

"Opposite sides?" echoed Tim. "Don't be silly, your father's fight is my fight."

"No, it isn't," declared Chad unhappily. "I can't explain, Tim, and I can't ask you to quit, on account of Jerry. But if you win, it'll be the finish of dad."

Tim looked at him for a long moment, but forbore to ask any questions, sensing some other trouble beyond his knowledge. Chad turned away, and Tim ascended the stairs to a little platform at the top of them, where he opened a door and entered a long passage, the floor of which was covered with oilcloth and an occasional mat.

At the second door on the left of the passage he stopped and took a key from his pocket, and with the key he unlocked the door of a plainly furnished bed-sitting room which he entered.

Closing the door behind him, he walked over to a table in the middle of the room and sat down at it. There was an oil lamp on the table, and near it writing materials which his brother had used quite a lot. He pulled a scribbling pad towards him, and was trying the nib of a pen, when there came a rap at the door.

"Come in!" he called loudly.

The handle of the door was turned, the door itself was opened slowly, and Kramer sidled into the room.

"I came to have a little talk with you, Tim," he said, putting his hands in his pockets and closing the door with his shoulders. "I figure you're gettin' pretty close to the man behind your brother's death."

"I don't think I could get much closer to him," returned Tim pointedly.

"I hope you won't even try." The crook stepped nearer to the table. "It won't bring Jerry back, and it will send Jed Harmon to the gallows."

"Jed Harmon had nothing to do with Jerry's death!"

"No, but the man who did have has got something on him. If you get too close to him, he'll tell."

"Tell what?" challenged Tim.

"Well, it seems Jed's wanted, back on the Pecos, for a killing. I don't believe he's guilty, but the law does, and if they take him back he'll swing for it. That's why he had to let his brand be used to sell stolen cattle. He had to— to save his life."

Tim bit his lip. So that was the thing Chad could not explain—the thing that put him on opposite sides. He looked squarely at Kramer, and he said:

"I should think Harmon would be glad to have me put a man like that out of the way for him!"

"Well, if it was that easy," Kramer returned in a quiet and completely self-possessed manner, "Chad would have done it long ago. But it isn't. He's too smart. He's got his story written, signed and witnessed, where the law can find it if anything ever happens to him."

Tim tapped his hand upon the scribbling-pad.

"I'm glad you told me this, Kramer," he said after a while. "Alters things a bit. Naturally, I wouldn't want to do something that would hang Myra's father."

"I thought you'd be glad to have me tell you," said Kramer, "so that you could back out before you got in too deep."

He went out from the room and closed the door behind him, and for the better part of ten minutes Tim remained in the chair at the table, deep in thought. Then he went down to the dining-room of the hotel to get a badly needed meal because he had decided that there was nothing else he could do till after dark.

Gaol-break!

DR. LINDSAY was out on a case when Peters called at his home, and it was not till an hour afterwards that he entered the town gaol and attended to the two prisoners in their cell.

They were both lying on the bunk, side by side, when he put a hypodermic syringe back into his little black bag, closed the bag, and went out with it into the sheriff's office.

"Well," he said, "I've given them something to ease their pain. They'll probably sleep until morning."

"That won't make me mad," said Ludlow, with a grin.

The doctor departed, and Ludlow settled back in the chair at the desk, cocked his feet up on the blotting-pad and lit a cigar. He had half-smoked the cigar when Tim looked in at him through a barred window from the yard that led to the stables. There was a door beside the window, and it was not locked.

It was quite dark in the street, except for an oil lamp here and there and such light as streamed from windows, and the yard was a place of shadows.

The door between the office and the gaol was closed; the light in the office came from a hanging lamp over the desk. Abruptly, Tim took out his gun and fired through the window at the lamp.

His aim was true. The flame was extinguished, and fragments of the shattered glass chimney showered down upon the startled sheriff, who scrambled to his feet and stumbled across the room in the sudden darkness.

He reached the side door, fumbled for the latch, and rushed out into the yard with his gun in his hand.

He fired at a shadow that seemed deeper than the rest of the shadows out there—and whirled about in dismay as the door was slammed and halted. Tim had been waiting against the wall by the door, expecting to happen exactly what had happened, and he had slipped into the office.

"This one fits Rankin's trunk," said Tim, "and I expect the other one will just fit the lock of your office, Kramer."

Having fastened the side door, he made his way to the front door and bolted that, too, while Ludlow hammered and bellowed.

"Hi, open that door, d'you hear me? You let me in there, now. Open that door! Come on, open that door! Open the door, I tell you, or I'll blow the lock off!"

Tim acted swiftly. He was far better acquainted with the office and the gaol than the man who had been appointed sheriff only that day, and he made straight for the cell in which Jed Harmon was a prisoner, opened it, and tugged the elderly rancher forth.

Ludlow, reluctant to carry out his threat and shoot at the lock of the side door, scuttled out from the yard into the street and tried to open the front door. Tim bundled his bewildered captive out at the side door into the yard and along to the stables, and presently Ludlow returned to the side door, found it ajar, and dashed into the office.

Tim had been waiting for that, the key of the side door in his hand. Back he flew, and the door was locked on the outside.

Ludlow, whose intelligence was limited, immediately began to beat his fists upon its panels, instead of going to the front door.

"Hi, let me outa here!" he vociferated. "Open this door! I'm the sheriff here! You can't lock me in here this way!"

Tim, back in the stables, swept Jed Harmon over to a horse he himself had saddled.

"There's a gun there," he said crisply. "Use it!"

"I can't do it, Tim!" protested the rancher. "I'm through rummin'."

"You're not rummin'," retorted Tim. "but we're gonna make Kramer think you are. I'll explain later. Mount up, and ride out shooting!"

Reluctantly, but without further protest, Harmon swung himself up on to the back of the horse. Tim mounted his own white horse, and they rode out from the hotel, shooting at the starlit sky as they went.

The sound of the shots penetrated to Kramer's office, where the crook was conferring with some of his men, and Peters bounded up from the chair in which he was sitting.

"Gaol-break!" he cried excitedly. "Looks like somebody's sprung Harmon outa gaol!"

"Go get 'em, dead or alive!" shouted Kramer.

He and the five men who were with him rushed out from the headquarters of the Cattlemen's Protective Association, but the street appeared to be deserted. Tim and Jed Harmon had dismounted in the alleyway at the side of the Bonanza Hotel.

Ranchers and cowpunchers emerged from a saloon down the street to free their horses from a hitching-rail and ride about the town in search of the disturbers of the peace. Kramer and his men, having crossed the street, heard the frantic cries of Ludlow and gathered round the sheriff's office.

"Well, that gets rid of them," said Tim contentedly. "Now we'll go into the hotel."

"What are we goin' to do?" asked the flustered rancher.

"You're gonna help me find Jerry's murderer," was the reply. "And it won't take you back to the Pecos, either!"

"Pecos?" gulped Harmon. "What do you know about that?"

"I'll tell you later—there's no time now!"

The horses were left under the outside staircase, and they climbed the stairs to the platform, where Tim opened the door and led the way to the second room on the right of the passage.

Ludlow, meanwhile, had found an empty cell, blundered to the front door of the office, and tugged back the bolt. He opened the door—and nearly bowled Peters over as he rushed out at it. Kramer seized hold of his arm, and he tried to free himself.

"Hi, wait a minute!" he yelled. "Where'd they go? Where are they? Where'd they go?"

"What happened?" rasped Kramer.

"They got away with Harmon!"

"Who was it?"

"I don't know," lamented Ludlow.

"I never even saw 'em!"

"Who were you shooting at?"

"I wasn't shootin'!" The unhappy sheriff wrenched his arm free. "Oh, I wasn't shootin' at anybody! First they locked me out, and I couldn't get in; then they locked me in, and I couldn't get out. How could I shoot at anybody?"

"Well, somebody was shooting!" raged Kramer.

He turned to his companions.

"Take a look around the back and see if anybody's been hurt," he ordered.

The five dived into the yard, but they returned to report that there was nobody in it, or in the stables.

"It was a trick!" snorted Kramer.

"They weren't shootin' at anybody—they just wanted to attract attention!"

"What for?" asked the sheriff blankly.

"So we'd follow 'em. Then they'd double back and hide Harmon in town!"

"Now where could they hide anybody here?" growled Ludlow, staring up and down the ill-lit street.

Kramer rubbed his chin.

"Chad and his sister are at Dr. Lindsay's," he said. "You search there. I'll try the motel."

The Confession

IN the bed-sitting-room which had been his brother's, Tim pulled down the blinds over the windows, and after he had struck a match and lit the lamp he motioned to Jed Harmon to seat himself at the table.

"Now I want you to write a confession," he said, pointing to the writing materials and the scribbling-pad, "all about your part in Kramer's rustling. Tell everything."

The rancher picked up a pen.

"About the trouble in the Pecos, too?" he asked bleakly.

"No," Tim decided. "Just bear down on Kramer. Tell how he threatened you—forced you to let him use your brand—everything leading up to Jerry's death."

Harmon seemed to have no liking for the task.

"If you don't get that confession written before they find out where you are," said Tim, "it'll be too late to do any good."

He went to the door. The key was in the lock on the outside of it, but he transferred it to the inside.

"Now you'd better lock this door behind me," he advised. "I'm going down to put the horses away before somebody finds them and starts investigating."

He went out, closing the door behind him, and Harmon rose and turned the key.

Back at the table, with the pen in his hand, he glanced about the room, and noticed that there were two other doors in it. He opened one of them and looked into a cupboard containing clothes that Jerry O'Neil would never need again; but the other was bolted, and evidently communicated with the adjoining room. He returned to the table and began to write.

The confession was nearly completed, and the top sheet of the scribbling-pad was more than half-filled when Kramer entered the passage from the staircase and turned the handle of the door.

Jed Harmon looked up, but the handle had ceased to move, and as the sound was not repeated he came to the conclusion that his ears had deceived him, and went on writing.

But Kramer was still outside the door.

He waited there for a few moments, then pushed the end of a mat under it, knelt on the part of the mat that was still in the passage, and took a match from his waistcoat pocket.

With the aid of the match he managed to push the key out of the lock so that it fell on to the mat, and then he pulled the mat back into the passage and picked up the key.

Jed Harmon was reading through what he had written when the key was inserted in the lock on the outside of the door, and again he looked up; and this time he listened for the sound of footsteps.

No such sound reached his ears, however, and he was starting a fresh paragraph when Kramer turned first the key and then the handle. He opened the door slowly, and it did not creak on its hinges. With a six-shooter in his hand he slipped into the room with the stealth of a cat, and Harmon was unaware of his presence till he was beside him at the table.

The barrel of the gun was thrust almost into the rancher's face, and he sat up with a gasp.

Kramer, leaning over him, read the confession which had just been signed, November 14th, 1926.

then backed to the door and closed and locked it.

"A very interesting document," he said with an evil smile. "Hand over what you've written."

"You'll never take it from me alive!" cried the rancher, planting both hands on the pad.

"I'm afraid you've outlived your usefulness to me, Harmon," said Kramer.

Tim had put the two horses away in the hotel stables and had just re-ascended the stairs. He entered the passage, and he rapped on the door.

"Open up, Mr. Harmon!" he called out. "It's Tim!"

Harmon, at the table, gritted his teeth.

"Looks like it's up with both of us," he said.

"No," corrected Kramer. "Only one of us."

Tim, rapping at the door again, heard an anguished voice.

"Don't, Kramer!" it cried. "Don't shoot!"

A six-gun barked, and Tim was trying to force open the locked door when Ludlow burst into the passage from the staircase with a number of men, including Chad.

"You're under arrest for gaol-break!" shouted Ludlow.

"Don't be a fool!" snapped Tim.

"Help me break this door in! Kramer's killed Harmon in there!"

Chad thrust the sheriff out of the way and put his shoulder to the door beside Tim. It flew open after the third attempt, the box of the lock forced from the jam, and they all streamed into the room.

Jed Harmon was lying on the floor on his side, near the chair from which, obviously, he had fallen.

"Dad! Dad!" Chad cried, flinging himself down on his knees; but his father was unconscious.

"Where's Kramer?" demanded Ludlow sceptically.

"Did someone speak my name?" Kramer started them all by walking into the room from the passage.

"What's all the shooting? Why, it's Harmon! Who shot him?"

"That's a pretty good bluff, Kramer," roared Tim, "but it won't work! You shot him yourself, and made your getaway through that door!"

He pointed to the door between the two rooms, and Chad sprang to his feet and darted over to it.

"You're wrong Tim," he said. "This door's bolted on this side!"

A man who did not belong to Kramer's gang opened the door of the cupboard, but there was nobody in there among the clothes. Tim went to the two windows in turn, but they were both shut, and the catches were fastened. Kramer said:

"Looks like plain suicide to me. Doors, windows, all bolted on the inside!"

Ludlow had drifted to the table and had found half a sheet of paper on it near the scribbling-pad.

"Why, it is suicide!" he exclaimed.

"He left a note!"

The half-sheet of paper was passed from hand to hand. On it was written:

"My part in the cattle rustling has made me so miserable the last two years that I am taking this means as the only decent way out.

"JED HARMON."

The whole thing seemed clear enough to most of those present, but one of the men stooped over the prone figure of the rancher to make sure that the wound in his chest could have been self-inflicted.

"Hi, sheriff," he cried, "this man's still alive!"

"Alive?" echoed Kramer, by no means pleased to bear it, but contriving to conceal his dismay.

"Yes."

Kramer seized upon the opportunity to disarm even Tim's suspicions.

"Come on," he said urgently. "Let's get him over to Doc Lindsay's."

Chad and two of the others raised the wounded rancher between them and carried him out to the stairs. Kramer and his men followed; but Tim ran out into the passage with the half-sheet of paper in his hand and called Ludlow back.

"Just a minute, sheriff," he said. "That was no suicide in there, and I can prove it!"

"Aw, you're just wasting your time, O'Neil!" growled Ludlow. "There couldn't have been anybody with Harmon when he was shot."

"Then what became of the other half of this paper?" demanded Tim. "Somebody took it out of the room!"

Ludlow frowned at the piece of paper, but it had been cut with a knife, and had no rough edge. Murphy, the proprietor of the hotel, had closed the door on to the outside staircase, and he heard and stared at Tim.

"How do we know there was a full sheet to begin with?" challenged Ludlow.

"I can prove it," declared Tim, "but we'll skip that. Come back in here and I'll prove it wasn't suicide."

He caught hold of the sheriff's arm and pulled him back into the room. The hotel proprietor followed of his own accord, filled with curiosity.

There was a six-gun on the floor, between the chair and the table, where it might very well have fallen from the rancher's hand. Tim picked it up and held it out.

"This is the gun that shot Harmon, isn't it?" he said.

"Yeah, I reckon it is," admitted Ludlow.

"Where did it come from? Harmon didn't have a gun—he left it on his saddle! That's the killer's own gun, planted here to make it look like a suicide!"

"Well, it'll take more than your word to prove that!"

"All right." Tim leaned against the table with the gun in one hand and the half-sheet of paper in the other. "If my word doesn't count, let me ask you something you can answer yourself. Was that light burning when we came into the room?"

Ludlow stared at the lamp and scratched his chin.

"Yeah, I reckon it was," he said slowly.

"Either of you ever seen a gun fired alongside an oil-lamp?"

"I reckon we all have," said the proprietor of the hotel.

"What happens?"

"Well, the explosion puts the light out. It always does."

"Right!" Tim pointed to the lamp with the barrel of the gun. "When the shot was fired that light went out. Who lit it again? It couldn't have been Harmon!"

Ludlow blinked at the lamp and turned down the wick a little because the flame was too high.

"Well, there aro exceptions to all rules," he said.

"Yes," agreed Tim, "but they don't all happen at the same time. I'll tell you what I think happened. You see, I know why Harmon was here, because I brought him up here myself to write the truth about an outlaw. That out-

(Continued on page 26)

The beautiful, but trouble-making star of the show is found stabbed, and the knife that was used belongs to one of the dancers. She is arrested and charged with the crime, but her husband vows to find the real criminal—with startling results. Starring Douglas Fairbanks jun. and Dolores del Rio

The tantrums of a Star

A BEAUTIFUL woman, who could not hide by the most perfect make-up the ravages of time, leaned back in her chair and yawned. Yvette Delange, the star, did not like rehearsals.

The brisk, dapper little man with the bright eyes and hands that gestured so frequently was Morel, the producer.

Sitting next to Yvette, he studied the chorus-girls that were going through their act under the direction of Pierre, the stage manager.

Hovering behind the chair of the two most important people in "La Nouvelle Revue," which was to open in three weeks at this theatre, the Alhambra of Paris, was a bent, elderly man in shabby blue clothes. Alphonse had once been a very famous character actor. Morel employed him as an assistant more out of sentiment than anything else.

"Must I sit through all this?" inquired Yvette with another yawn.

"My darling," soothed Morel, "I want you to watch the audition of a young couple, Gaby and Tony. They do a novelty Apache dance, and I'm hoping you will like them, as we lack a good dance team in this revue. Alphonse." He turned to the old actor. "Tell Pierre that will do for the moment, and then inform Gaby and Tony that we are ready."

Yvette gazed languidly at the young couple who came on the stage. She noted that Gaby was dark and of obvious Spanish origin—she supposed that someone might consider this olive-skinned creature good-looking. The young man was more in Yvette's line. He was tall, broad-shouldered, handsome and most attractive when he smiled, showing gleaming white teeth.

The Apache dance was very realistic, and the end made Yvette gasp. The couple quarrel, and Gaby on being flung to the floor drew a long knife from her girdle. Tony had moved away as if tired of his partner—the knife was flung and stuck quivering in his back. Several of the chorus-girls screamed when Tony sank to the floor.

Everyone gave a sigh of relief when Tony got to his feet and laughed.

"You like them?" Morel turned to Yvette.

"Quite interesting."

"They're just what we need," enthused Morel. "They're young and attractive."

"He is," softly whispered the star.

"That knife finale will be a big success," stated Morel. "He wears a steel waistcoat with a scabbard arrangement in the side, and Gaby being an expert knife-thrower can flick the knife into the slot ninety-nine times out of a hundred. What do you think? Engage them?"

"I think so," agreed Yvette. "Do you want me any longer?"

When Yvette had gone to her dressing-room Morel told Pierre to rehearse the girls in their dance number for the second act and then to break for lunch. Morel informed Gaby and Tony that Yvette liked their act and that they would be included in the revue—Tony then went to Morel's office to sign the contract.

Some little while later Tony, Gaby and Alphonse went to have a drink at the small refreshment bar that was superintended by Dubec, the concierge. A fair-haired member of the chorus was perched on a stool; she smiled hopefully at the new-comers as she was very thirsty but very hard up.

"I'm Ninette Duvall!" she greeted them with a frank smile. "I thought your dance was ripping."

Naturally, that called for drinks, and Ninette's eyes sparkled when champagne cocktails were ordered. Alphonse drank his and shuffled away—Yvette Delange wanted to see him. He returned a few minutes later.

"Misa Delange's compliments, and she would like to see you in her dressing-room."

"Right!" Tony finished his drink, and took his wife's arm. "Come on, darling!"

Alphonse coughed.

"She omitted to mention that she desired to see you both." He gave the young man a significant glance.

"I won't be more than an hour," Tony laughed as if it were a joke. "Which is her room?"

Alphonse escorted Tony, leaving the two women together.

"Our star takes a great personal interest in new members of the company," Ninette said over her glass to Gaby, "if they happen to be young, handsome and male, so be warned."

"I'm not jealous, and I'm not frightened for Tony," Gaby shook her head. "She'll waste her time."

But Yvette was a persistent woman. Most men succumbed to her beauty, and it annoyed her immensely that Tony was not so easy to win. Her hints that he could take her out to supper were not accepted, and when Yvette learned that Gaby Ramarios was really Mrs. Gaby Seymour she still did not desist in her smiles and arch glances. The days passed and she was always inviting him to her room to take champagne or ask his advice, but when he told her kindly that there was only one woman in his life—in other words, his wife—her eyes flashed angrily.

Gaby was a mixture of Spanish, Mexican and South American. She did not like Yvette Delange, and her dark eyes looked contemptuously at the star. The two women barely spoke. At the final dress rehearsal Yvette behaved in a disgraceful manner. She talked to Morel whilst Tony and Gaby were doing their Apache dance, made loud and obvious comments.

"What's the matter with her? I think they're horrible!" Yvette said so that all the company could hear.

Then the woman was silent for about a minute.

"Bertha! Bertha!" she shrieked. "Fetch me a handkerchief and some cigarettes. Morel"—she turned to the patient producer. "I don't like those drums, they'll irritate people."

Tony asked if they might start their number again.

"I think they're terrible. Paris will laugh at them."

"My angel, you were enthusiastic when you first saw them," reasoned Morel.

"We had seen so many bad acts anything seemed good," she sneered. "That woman can't even keep her balance. People will walk out on us if that act goes on."

It was too much for high-spirited Gaby. In spite of Tony's protests, she told the star just what she thought of her.

"All the last shows you've been in have been failures. Why? Because you're over forty and trying to pretend to be twenty. You can't act, you can't dance, you can't sing. The public is tired of you and so is everybody else."

What a scene! What a row! It ended with Yvette shouting that either the Seymours left or she did. Morel dismissed the rehearsal until eleven o'clock the next morning. His next task was the invariable one of pouring oil on the ruffled waters. He was a fair and a just man. Yvette could sing and she could act when she put her whole soul into her work, but often she couldn't be bothered. The Seymours were good, and he wanted them in the revue. He started with Tony.

"Yvette refuses to open to-morrow night if you are in the show." He raised his hand against interruption. "I sympathise with Gaby and I understand Yvette. I wish all of you to remain in my show. It is impossible to reason with an angry woman—you might as well reason with the Eiffel Tower. I want you to see her and express some regret."

"She started the trouble. It was her fault. Why—"

"Tony, she is the star and you are just a good act," soothed Morel. "I'm asking you to do this because I know you will be a great success. I have put five thousand francs into this show. Then think of all these poor little chorus girls. If this show fails they will all starve. Now let me go and tell her you will go and have a drink at her flat. You will mumble an apology and leave as soon as you can."

"Why can't I see her now?"

"Because she is probably in a rage and throwing things about," Morel explained. "I shall probably have something thrown at my head when I go to speak with her. I know what she is like. You can be flattering and gallant without being unfaithful to your wife. Tact, my boy, is necessary, and Yvette can be so sweet."

Then Gaby heard about it and had the dickens of a row with her husband. Her jealous nature was aroused. If he were going to her flat then he must be crazy or falling for this peroxide blonde.

"Darling, don't act this way." He tried to keep his temper. "Don't you understand? If we're kicked out of the show, we don't eat. They'll say we're no good. We'll never get another chance like this. Morel is on our side. He's counting on us, he thinks we're grand. Do be reasonable."

"I hate a man that crawls to a woman."

That fired Tony.

"I've had enough of this. I'm not going to throw everything overboard that we've saved and worked for for years—because you're jealous over nothing. I'm going out to let you cool off. I shall go to her flat and I shall be as nice to her as I can." He went out and slammed the dressing-room door.

Tony was so enraged that he did not look where he was going and bumped into a man out in a deserted corridor.

"Sorry."

"Excuse me." It was a stranger. A man who looked ill and down on his luck. "Do you know where Yvette Delange's dressing-room is?"

"It's right across the other side of the stage," Tony pointed. "You'll find her name on the door."

Tony thought the man's smile was peculiar, almost thought of asking the nature of his business, then he thought of his own troubles and hastened from the theatre.

Out of the Past

YVETTE was before her mirror, and she was studying her complexion.

Morel had told her that Tony was very angry about his wife's behaviour and would like to apologise for what had happened. The star had been soothed and had agreed to see Tony at her flat. She was now putting the finishing touches to her make-up before leaving the theatre.

Suddenly the door opened, and Yvette was just about to rage at the person who had dared to enter without knocking, when in her mirror she saw the man's face.

She spun round, and now her eyes were wide and staring.

"You!"

"Who went to—" He saw the elderly woman, who was the dresser, and gave a significant gesture with his head.

"Bertha, you can go now." Yvette spoke quickly. "I won't want you any more. Don't argue, but go."

The man stood there in his shabby grey overcoat and smirked his satisfaction. He clucked softly as the door closed.

"Hallo, sweetheart," he mocked.

"So you're out already." Her eyes were hard now.

"Already!" He shrugged his shoulders. "Five years I've been away—what a charming reception."

"What do you want here?"

"Money, my love."

"I can let you have a little."

"I want twenty thousand francs."

Yvette jumped to her feet.

"That's impossible."

"If you haven't got it pick up the telephone and ask your manager to bring it here," the man answered.

Yvette hesitated, then picked up the phone.

"His office doesn't answer."

His smile was mocking.

"Don't try to bluff me. Get on to the concierge and tell him to find the manager."

Yvette shrugged her shoulders and rang Dubec; she instructed him to find Morel and tell the manager that she required at once twenty thousand francs. Five minutes later there was a knock at the star's door.

"Don't come in—I'm not dressed."

"What unexpected modesty," answered Morel. "Dubec tells me you want twenty thousand francs."

"Yes, yes." The door opened and a bare arm appeared. "Did you bring it?"

"Yes, but it's a lot of money."

"Give it to me!" The tone was imperious.

"I should like a receipt."

"I will give it you in the morning." Her fingers clawed for the money, and after a slight hesitation Morel passed the wad of notes to her. The door closed immediately. Knowing the whims of Yvette, it was a waste of time to argue, so Morel went away.

The eyes of the released gaolbird glittered at sight of all the money. Yvette went across the room to a wardrobe, and he wondered what was her purpose.

"Give me that money."

When Yvette turned she was holding a small revolver, and he knew why she had gone to the wardrobe. His eyes narrowed and his hands clenched.

"Keep your distance!" Yvette was cool now. "I want to talk to you."

"I haven't time to talk." He edged nearer.

"I said keep your distance!" Her smile was mocking and hard. "You know I am quite capable of shooting you. I might like an excuse to put a bullet into you, so if you value your life don't try anything foolish. If you think you're coming back here to spoil things for me you're mistaken."

"Give me that money!" the man snarled at her.

Yvette shook her head, and glancing down at the money she held in her left hand, flicked several of the notes so that they fluttered to the floor, the rest she tossed carelessly on to her dressing-table. The man stared down at the fallen money, then stopped and picked it up.

"I see you understand me," mocked Yvette when he straightened. "You realise that is all you're going to get."

"It's not enough."

"It's all you get." The star came a step nearer, and her tone was menacing. "If you come pestering me again you'll walk into trouble."

"Your bluff doesn't scare me." The man smiled unpleasantly. "You've got the whip-hand this time, but I'll be coming back."

"You always were a boaster," she derided. "Now get out."

The man would have gone by the door through which he had entered.

Yvette stayed him with a gesture of the hand.

"I trust no one saw you come in—a tramp. It will be as well that none see you leave." She backed to the wall and turned a handle. A cunningly concealed door that looked like the panelling opened. "This will take you into a side street. Hurry!"

"A charming reception." The man bowed. "I trust next time you may be more friendly." At the door he looked at her and then across at the money on the dressing-table. "I shall be seeing you again in the very near future. Au revoir, beloved."

Yvette closed the door after him with an angry slam.

Yvette looked at the money. Her mind was turning over a scheme to keep this money for herself. Could she tell Morel that she had been blackmailed into parting with twenty thousand frances? If it were charged up to the theatre it might deprive the shareholders of some of their interest. Now what was the best story to tell Morel? A knock made her slide a hand over the money. Before she could call out "Come in" the dressing-room door opened and Gaby Seymour, who was still dressed in the clothes she wore for her Apache act, entered the room. The star was startled, because Gaby's eyes were staring at her—nake's eyes, thought Yvette—then she saw Gaby's hand was resting on the knife that was tucked into her girdle.

Murder

TWO men lounged against the concierge's small bar. It was dark and gloomy and chilly. Old Alphonse had the moth-eaten astrakhan collar of his coat buttoned close round his neck. He had been on his way out of the theatre when the small bar had tempted him to stop for a brandy. After the scene to-night he felt a brandy was necessary. After a while he had been joined by a tall, sullen-faced individual in a blue uniform. They had several drinks together.

"After a dress rehearsal one relaxes," old Alphonse muttered. "It takes me back to 1888, when I was with the Divine Bernhardt at—"

Louis, chauffeur to Yvette, knowing that if Alphonse once started reminiscing it would be hard to stop him, placed his hand on the old actor's shoulder.

"You told me once before," Louis turned his head. "What's she doing in there? I'm fed up hanging around all this time."

"Composing herself, doubtless, after the little disturbance we had to-night," Alphonse replied. "Now, Sarah you must know—"

"I bet she started the row—she does nothing else. I reckon a drink wouldn't do us any harm." Louis glanced round. "Where's Dubec?"

"He's gone on his rounds." Alphonse came a little closer. "I was about to tell you of something which occurred when I was with the Divine Sarah. I was, as you know, her leading man—"

"Yes." Louis resigned himself to hear a story that he had heard quite ten times before. "Make it brief, old boy."

"We were playing 'Camille,' if I remember—" That was as far as the story got.

"Help! Help! Murder! Help!" came the hoarse voice of a man from the other side of the stage.

"That is Dubec's voice," muttered Louis.

Then the concierge came running and stumbling towards them. Louis steadied the man, who looked as white as a sheet and scarce able to stand.

"Who has been murdered?" he asked.

"Delange!" came in a hoarse whisper from the shuddering Dubec.

"Yvette!" shrieked Alphonse. "Impossible!"

"She's dead—murdered," Dubec cried. "I opened the door of her room—I saw her lying there."

Dubec had an electric lantern. Louis snatched this away from the wailing concierge and hurried across the stage, followed by Alphonse. Dubec ceased wailing and ran after them. The chauffeur opened the dressing-room door and flashed the light. Stretched on the floor lay Yvette Delange.

"Look! Look!" Louis grabbed at Alphonse's arm. "The knife!"

Alphonse went to the switch and flooded the room with light. He knelt beside the still figure, with Louis and Dubec peering over his shoulder. One touch of the wrist told the actor that the star was dead.

Suddenly Alphonse pointed at the knife that was buried deep in Yvette's chest. "Why, that's the knife Gaby Seymour uses in her number."

"We'd better call the police," fearfully muttered the chauffeur.

"The police?" The concierge looked dully at Louis.

"Louis is right, Dubec, the police must be informed at once," Alphonse decided. "Get police headquarters and tell them that Yvette Delange is dead under mysterious conditions, and will they come to the theatre immediately."

Arrested

TONY went to Yvette's flat, and it was a relief to find that the star had not yet arrived. The maid, Marie, said that madame had phoned that she was expecting M'sieu Seymour and would he please wait? So Tony waited in no very pleasing humour.

Yvette's interest was just what they wanted to get them higher up the ladder, but everything was spoiled because of Gaby's jealousy. Still, Gaby could not be blamed, because Yvette did not play the game. What should he say to the woman when she turned up? If Yvette expected him to flirt with her she was very much mistaken. He must be tactful and diplomatic. He wished she would hurry as he wanted to get back to his lodgings to pacify Gaby—that wouldn't be easy.

Tony waited some while, and then told the maid he could wait no longer. He found a stray taxi and was driven to his lodgings. He did not enter the place right away, but rushed off to a nearby market to see if he could find some flowers as a peace offering. With a bouquet of roses Tony tiptoed up the stairs and very stealthily opened the door.

Gaby was not there.

Tony became at once nearly mad with anxiety. What had happened to the poor girl? She had gone back to her mother—impossible, as her nearest relation was two hundred miles away. She had left him! That explanation did not fit, because Tony knew that if Gaby had decided to walk out she would have written a farewell message. But there was nothing, and no sign that she had been home since the rehearsal, as all her clothes were here. Tony was puzzling what he should do when he heard slow, dragging foot-steps on the stairs, and rushed to the door.

It was Gaby. She looked at him with large, unhappy eyes. Her whole demeanour was dejected and weary.

"Darling, I have been so frightened. Where have you been?"

"I don't know—walking."

Then she held out her arms to Tony, and with an eager cry he drew her close. He babbled about being a cad and fool, that he would never leave her again, and between his babbling, kissed her.

"No longer will I be the big business man," Tony assured her. "It was only because of Morel that I went to sea her."

And when Gaby had heard all his story she begged him to forgive her. She cried over the roses.

"Oh, Tony, I have been very foolish—you will never forgive me?"

"What have you done, my precious?"

"I was so consumed with jealous rage that I—I spoke to Yvette," Gaby confessed. "I think I was a little rude to her. Tony, I don't want to go back to the theatre. I don't want to see her again—ever!"

"We won't." He patted her shoulder. "We'll find another job." He laughed happily. "You leave it to me."

Gaby had no idea how far she had walked except that it had been along

"Why, that's the knife Gaby Seymour uses in her number," Alphonse muttered incredulously.

the banks of the Seine. She was very tired and very hungry. Tony insisted upon making her some breakfast. He had scarce put the kettle on the gas-ring when heavy footsteps were heard mounting the stairs. It was a surprise when there came a brisk knocking at their door. Two men stood outside.

"Is Gabrielle Seymour here?"

"Who are you?" Tony asked.

"Police Department." The two men walked into the room, for the spokesman had seen Gaby standing by an arm-chair. "You are Gabrielle Seymour?"

"Yes."

"I must ask you to come along with me," said the detective.

"What are you talking about?" demanded Tony. "What do you want with my wife?"

"Yvette Delange was murdered early this morning."

"Murdered!" Gaby recoiled in horror.

Tony looked startled for a moment. "What's that got to do with my wife?"

"The Sûreté would like to hear what she has to say about it," the detective replied, and looked at the girl. "Get your hat and coat, please."

"You can't do that," began Tony, and flung his arms round Gaby. "Produce your warrant."

"We will arrest you as well if you cause any trouble," rasped the second detective as he grabbed Tony by the arms and dragged him away from Gaby. "You may accompany your wife to the Sûreté, and if your wife's explanation is satisfactory she will be set free, but do not try to interfere with the law."

A Friend in Need

A THICK-SET young Englishman was busy at a typewriter. The big offices were almost deserted, save for those poor people who were on the night staff of Paris' leading journal. Guy Henry was preparing his story, and he thumped the typewriter, as he was not in the best of tempers.

The previous day he had been to interview the Seymours to try to get for them a good write-up and perhaps mention on the front page. All the copy he had obtained was Gaby's opinion of the star in the revue. Tony was apparently in the clutches of Yvette, and Gaby wanted to claw her eyes out. Guy Henry was an old school friend of Tony's, and had been at the wedding. He wanted to find out what they had been doing in the last two years, as the Seymours had gone on tour with a small company. Failing to secure very much information, Henry decided to use his own personal knowledge of the Seymours and to employ his own inventive faculties in regard to their tour. He was hard at work, when a brother reporter came into the office and strolled across.

"Not like you to be here at this hour—got something hot?"

"I'm getting out a boost for a couple of friends of mine."

"Bet there's a girl in it, and she's pretty."

Guy Henry laughed.

"Well, you should know her by reputation. A dancer named Gabrielle Seymour."

"What?"

The other's shout of incredulous amazement startled Henry.

"What's the matter?"

"Guy Henry, I take off my hat to you," was the answer. "It's amazing. You old sleuth. It only happened an hour ago, and you're writing the story." He picked up some photos. "And you've got pictures of her."

"What are you driving at?"

"Of course, you don't know that Yvette Delange was found murdered," mocked the newspaperman. He stabbed a finger at a photograph of Gabrielle. "And with this girl's dagger stuck into her."

"Good heavens!" Guy Henry jumped to his feet. He ripped the page out of the machine, picked up the photographs, and grabbed his coat.

"Where?"

"At the theatre."

Guy Henry struggled into his coat, and without another word rushed out of the office. He had got to be in on this story, and he had got to find Tony. As he had heard what Gaby thought of Yvette he felt certain that the Spanish temperament must have got the better of Tony's wife. They would have arrested her. That meant that it would be best to go to the Sûreté.

Sure enough, Tony was at the Sûreté, and it was as well that Guy turned up, because Tony was in a frenzy. How dare they arrest his wife? They had accused her of murder. It was infamous. Guy calmed the distraught young man and took him into a quiet corner. Shouting and yelling would do more harm than good. In Guy's opinion the only sane thing to do was to go and have legal advice. Eugene Roget was one of the finest counsels of the day and a personal friend. They must go and see Roget at once.

"He is the best lawyer in France," Guy assured his friend. "He will know what is the best thing to do."

Eugene Roget was dressing when the two young men called, and he interviewed them in his dressing-gown. Tony took an instant liking to this handsome, strong-featured man. Roget had a way of looking a person in the eye.

"I understand from Guy that you are in some sort of trouble," Roget said, after they were all seated in his study. "Tell me about it."

"My name is Tony Seymour. My wife has been arrested for murder. Arrested because the murder was committed with a dagger belonging to my wife, and—"

"Ono moment." Roget stayed him with a gesture. "You seem to be starting your story in the middle. I want to have it from the start, and don't miss anything, however trifling it may seem to you."

In silence Roget listened to Tony Seymour's story.

"Yvette Delange was not my idea of a good actress," he commented. "I don't think she was very much liked back-stage. Can you suggest anybody else who may have done it?"

Tony shook his head despairingly. "Delango must have had many enemies," interposed Guy.

"That isn't very helpful," said the famous counsel. "Frankly, the case does not look too good. Your wife goes to Delange's dressing-room after a quarrel with you and has the dickens of a quarrel with the star. She leaves and wanders through the streets of Paris, finally returning home to be reconciled to her husband. The police arrive, and madame is arrested. There is so much that implicates your wife and so little to indicate someone else having committed the crime."

"I know who did it!" suddenly cried Tony. "I must have been mad not to have thought of it before. As I left the theatre last night, or, rather, this morning, I met a sinister-looking man who was hanging about the stage door. He asked me to show him where Yvette Delange's dressing-room was."

"Did anyone else see the man?"

"I don't know; there was nobody about."

"Pretty thin, I'm afraid," Roget frowned. "Would you recognise this man if you saw him again?"

"Yes, I had a good look at him. He was about Guy's height, medium build, fair hair and moustache, and wearing a raincoat."

Roget tapped his desk with a pencil and they waited for his decision.

"I believe your story, though it sounds fantastic," he announced with a slight smile. "I will dress and go to see your wife. Guy, I suggest you take our friend to the Criminal Identification Department. I will give you a card that will be of assistance."

At the Criminal Identification Department the two men were conducted to a room with many shelves, sections, and files, and were informed that the photographs and descriptions of all criminals were filed here. It was a titanic task that Tony attempted, and his friend was not able to assist him in the search.

"I didn't know there were so many crooks in the world," gasped Tony when they were politely shown the door that evening.

Tony was back again early next morning, and Guy was half-asleep when awakened by a cry from Tony.

"I've got it. This is our man."

Guy looked over his shoulder.

"Are you sure?"

"Positive."

They called an official, who went off to another room and returned with a large cardboard slip.

"Henry Capelle," he read out. "Theft, Paris, 1914. Renoir gang. Convicted for blackmail 1931." The official looked at Tony. "Out of all these thousands of photographs you've looked through you must pick this one."

"That's the man I saw. I'd know him in a million."

"Henry Capelle was released from La Sante on April 8th."

"Well, that proves it," eagerly cried Tony. "The murder was committed on April 27th."

"This man left Paris on April 11th."

"He must have come back."

The official gave a decisive shake of his head.

"If he'd come back it would have been on this record sheet. This man was not in Paris on April 27th."

No amount of argument would convince the official that there was the slightest possibility of Capelle being in Paris. If the record said Capelle left on the 11th, that finished the matter; but he did allow Tony to have a copy of the photograph.

"The police can be very stubborn if they like," Guy Henry said as they left the building. "According to all their calculations, Capelle should not be in Paris, and they will not admit the possibility of him slipping through their fingers back into Paris. They won't do anything more about it."

"Then we must." Tony gripped his friend's arm. "As a newspaperman you should be able to pull some strings in the underworld."

"All right," Guy answered. "If he's in Paris we'll find him."

That evening they set out on their search, and Tony was taken into some dreadful underground cafés and clubs, but there was no sign of the man they wanted. At midnight Guy paused outside an evil-looking estaminet.

"I kept Marou up my sleeve," he whispered. "He's been useful to me more than once, and I've returned the compliment by saying nice things on his behalf to the police and paying through the nose for his rotten champagne. He's a blackguard—one of the worst in Paris

"We will arrest you as well if you cause any trouble," rasped the detective.

—cut anybody's throat for a price, but he amuses me."

The name of Guy Henry worked magic with the barman, who said he would find out.

Guy whispered in his friend's ear:

"I'll wager he hasn't been out of this place for the last ten years. His life wouldn't be worth a cent if he went out into the streets; he has bodyguards all over this place. Ah, here comes the barman!"

They were taken downstairs into the cellars, along dark, smelly passages to a stout, wooden door. Three raps and they were admitted. They saw a mountain of a man, who was greasy, unshaven, and in his shirt sleeves. He was seated at a round table with a large glass of beer in front of him. Close to his side sat a very thin individual, who wore his hat and peered at the two visitors covertly.

"My dear friend," Marou held out his hand. "What a pleasure. Sit down!"

"This is a friend of mine," Guy indicated Tony. "We want your help."

He glanced inquiringly at the thin individual.

"You know I'm at your service," Marou grinned. "You've met the Weasel, haven't you? He's my private secretary. What can I do for you?"

Tony held up the picture.

"Do you know this man?" he asked eagerly.

"Never saw him," Marou answered, and gave it to his secretary.

"No, I don't seem to remember—"

The Weasel gave Guy Henry a meaningful glance.

Guy Henry grinned and produced some money.

"Perhaps this will refresh your memory."

But as the Weasel reached out for the money the fat hand of Marou was there first and took the notes. Marou gave his assistant a glowering look.

"Go on, remember!" he snarled.

"It looks like Henry Capelle." The Weasel studied the picture closely. "But I don't know where he is. But I know where he was yesterday—I saw him."

"Where did you see him?" growled Marou.

"He was at Madame Didier's last night." The Weasel looked at the two visitors. "Madame does not ask her guests their private addresses, so she won't be able to help you."

"You will give madame my compliments"—Marou banged on the table—"and tell the old rat to talk all she knows." He grinned at Guy. "Maybe the Weasel won't find out much from the old hen, but give him time and he'll find Henry Capelle. Of course—"

He paused significantly.

"Find Henry Capelle and you can name your price!" recklessly cried Tony Seymour.

The two crooks of the underworld rubbed their hands in anticipation of their reward.

The Trial

TONY SEYMOUR was reading the Paris edition of the "New York Herald Tribune" for September 4th, 1936.

"Gaby Seymour Trial. Knife may prove Murder Guilty finding. No loophole seen for dancer. Gaby Seymour, charged with the murder of Yvette Delange, leading lady at the Alhambra Theatre, on the night of April 27th, faces her jurors again to-day. The verdict which may send her to the guillotine or give her her freedom is expected within twenty-four hours."

Tony flung down the paper and stared miserably at his two companions—Guy and the friendly little chorus-girl, Ninette. All looked tired and exhausted. They had searched, and so had the Weasel, but no sign had they found of Henry Capelle.

"It's hopeless!" cried Ninette. "He must have left Paris."

"I'll not give up!" said Tony. "He's got to be found."

At that moment his wife was being addressed by the President at the Palace of Justice.

"Gabrielle Seymour, before beginning your examination, it is my duty to remind you that you are being tried under the penal code of France. I must warn you to study attentively all the questions that may be put to you by the Public Prosecutor, by Mr. Roget, who is conducting your defence, and by myself. Your replies may greatly influence the jury, therefore you must answer distinctly and truthfully."

Gaby was dressed in black, and her face was very white, but she faced the President bravely.

"Yes, sir," she replied clearly.

The Public Prosecutor stood up.

"I feel I should warn the jury that no more appealing prisoner has ever stood at the Bar of Justice, and remind them that she is an actress, trained to simulate emotions that she does not feel."

Roget was on his feet at once.

"Mr. President, I ask that the Public Prosecutor withdraw those remarks, which are calculated to prejudice the jury against my client. It is true that she is talented and beautiful, but those qualities do not necessarily prove her either a liar or a criminal."

The President turned to the jury.

"I will ask the jury to disregard the suggestion of the Public Prosecutor." He stared intently at Gabrielle Seymour. "On April 10th last you and your husband were engaged to present a dance at the revue at the Alhambra. Is it true that your costume for this number included a dagger?"

"Yes, sir."

"Is it equally true that during your dance you had to use this dagger frequently, finally throwing it at your partner with great accuracy?"

"Yes, sir."

"During a rehearsal you resented some action of the victim of this tragedy and quarrelled with her violently."

Roget stood up.

"We will prove by six reliable and impartial witnesses that this quarrel was begun, not by the accused, but by the victim."

"If the jury wish to consider that fact a point in favour of the accused," the President replied, "they are privileged to do so."

The Public Prosecutor spoke next.

"We will also prove that the accused was intensely jealous of her husband and resentful of the dead woman's attitude towards him."

Roget did not make any protest, so the President motioned the Public Prosecutor to sit down.

"Shortly after your quarrel with Yvette Delage she was found dead in her dressing-room," stated the President. "She was murdered with the dagger that belonged to you. This weapon had been thrust into the victim with the same accuracy you employ in your dance. Although mortally wounded, she tried to defend herself. She fired at her assailant. The bullet has been found embedded in the paucelling. That assassin, Gabrielle Seymour, was you!"

"It wasn't me, I tell you!" Gaby cried hysterically. "It wasn't—it wasn't me."

"Then will you tell me why you armed yourself with a dagger before going to the dressing-room?"

"It was part of my costume. I didn't notice it."

"Yet in the course of the quarrel you threatened her with it."

"I didn't threaten her!" protested Gaby. "Only with words. I didn't realise I had the dagger until she asked me to put it down, then I threw it on the table, but had no thought of using it."

"Then why did the victim arm herself with the revolver?"

"I saw no revolver."

"Not at any time during the quarrel?"

"No."

The President pondered for a moment.

"You have admitted that you used threatening language to the victim. What were the words?"

"I don't remember what I said."

"I must beg of you to try and remember."

Gaby stared helplessly round the crowded court before turning to the President. "I insulted her—I don't know what I said. I was so miserable. She turned her back on me, and I went out."

"Jean Dubec, the stage doorkeeper of the theatre, has declared that he saw you leave ten minutes before the discovery of the crime. The crime was discovered at five minutes past four. Therefore, you must have left the theatre at five minutes to four."

"That isn't possible," answered Gaby. "I left long before that. I remember now. I saw the time later from the Pont de la Concorde. It was only four o'clock, then; I couldn't have walked the two miles from the theatre in five minutes."

"What were you doing at the Pont de la Concorde at four o'clock?"

"I was hopeless—I didn't know what to do. I didn't want to go back to an empty room. I wandered in the streets, along the Seine—I even thought of throwing myself into the water. The striking of the clock seemed to bring me to my senses."

"You then returned to your lodgings," spoke the unemotional voice of the President, "where you were arrested at half-past five. What did you do in the interval?"

November 14th, 1936.

"I must have walked in the streets."

"Did you meet or speak to anyone?"

"No one."

The President then signified to Eugene Roget that it was his turn to question for the defence. The counsel called the name of a famous doctor, who described his views on the case.

"The medical officer has just described with clarity and precision the way in which the victim was struck down at a distance of about seven feet," Roget said at the conclusion. "The weapon was thrown with such force that it caused almost instantaneous death. I will ask the doctor to look at my client, and to tell the court whether, in his opinion, the accused would have the physical strength to throw the weapon with the force he has described."

The doctor hesitated.

"I do not think so."

Prosecuting counsel was immediately on his feet.

"However, doctor, you do not contend that it would be impossible, after long training, for anyone, even a woman, to throw the weapon with the force you speak of?"

The doctor studied the prisoner.

"Perhaps it is possible, especially as the accused was an expert knife-thrower."

The next witness was Adolphe Morel, who stated that he was an impresario and forty-three years of age. He swore to speak the truth and nothing but the truth.

"Mr. Morel," asked the President, "in your testimony at the inquest you stated that, on the morning of the crime, the victim asked you for twenty thousand francs?" Morel nodded his agreement. "Mr. Morel, can you tell us at the exact time the money changed hands?"

"I think it was about three o'clock."

"Mr. Morel," Roget questioned, "am I correct in assuming that in your theatre the requirements of a dress rehearsal had brought together a very mixed crowd of people, some of whom may have been of questionable honesty?"

"It is possible."

"Did anyone see you take the twenty thousand francs to the dressing-room?"

Morel thought.

"I don't think so," he decided. "Almost everyone had left."

"Except Gabrielle Seymour," interrupted the Public Prosecutor. "Mr. Morel, when you came to the victim's dressing-room at three o'clock, did you meet anyone?"

"I didn't go into the room. I passed the money round the door."

"Was that because the victim was not fully clothed?" asked the President.

"Perhaps, but such modesty would hardly have been characteristic of her," Morel replied with a slight smile. "I was faintly surprised at the time."

"Then you are satisfied that no one could have seen you hand the money to the victim?" demanded Roget.

"Not unless someone else was in the room besides Yvette Delange."

"Then you get the impression that she wasn't alone?" Quickly Roget seized on this point.

"Well, it is very possible," Morel admitted.

The Public Prosecutor next called Gabrielle Seymour to the stand.

"You were the next person to enter that room. Did you see anyone except the victim?"

"No," answered the accused.

"When you went into the room you saw no large sum of money?"

"I didn't notice anything."

"The sum of twenty thousand francs has never been found," the President informed the jury.

"Neither, Mr. President, have we established the mysterious reason for which the victim demanded so large a sum of money at such a late hour," countered Roget. "Neither have we established the fact that she was alone. May it please the court to recall the stage doorkeeper. I would like to ask him a question."

"Recall Jean Dubec," ordered the President.

The concierge shuffled forward and stood there twisting his cap nervously.

"Now, Mr. Dubec, when the victim telephoned you to find Mr. Morel, what time was it?"

"It was—yes—it must have been about half-past three."

"It could not have been half-past three!" The interruption came from Morel, who was still near the witness stand.

"Why?" asked Roget.

"Because I left the theatre at ten minutes past three."

"What do you say, Mr. Dubec?"

"Well, it might have been earlier," mumbled Dubec. "I know it was just after the prisoner left my bar, and she had been there a long time drinking, and was very excited."

Gaby wondered why the concierge disliked her so much.

Roget also wondered.

"We know all that—you have already told us," he said harshly. "You have shown unnecessary hostility towards the prisoner, and on a question of supreme importance you are in disagreement with a witness whose honesty and sincerity are above question."

"But not more so than the witness you are accusing!" angrily protested the Public Prosecutor. "He also is on oath, and I will not permit his word to be doubted."

The President rapped on his desk.

"Accused, have you anything to add to the testimony of the witness?"

"No," whispered Gaby.

"Gentlemen of the jury." The President stood up. "Public Prosecutor. Counsel for the defence. You may retire."

So ended the first day of the trial.

Anthony is Ejected from Court

ON the next day the first witness was Alphonse de la Riviere.

"Your name, age, and profession" cried the President.

"My name is not unknown to the students of the drama—it is Alphonse de la Riviere," stated the old actor. "Once leading man to the divine Sarah Bernhardt, and once described by our most famous critics as—"

"Your age?"

"I was born at Bordeaux on August 3rd, 1868. My first appearance—"

"Raise your hand."

"Was at the age of twelve."

"Alphonse de la Riviere!" The President spoke sharply.

The actor came back to earth.

"Sir?"

"You swear to speak without hatred and without fear? To speak the truth and nothing but the truth?"

Alphonse swore. The questions put to him did not throw any light on the case.

He tried several times to speak of Sarah Bernhardt, but was stopped on every occasion and finally sent back to his seat.

Anthony Seymour was the next person called.

The President studied the young man closely:

"Your name, age, and profession?"

"Anthony Seymour. Twenty-nine. Dancer."

"I cannot take your oath as you are married to the accused," announced the President. "The jury must regard your statements as merely information. Have you anything to tell the jury?"

"I don't know what happened," Tony turned to the jury. "I can only tell you that my wife is innocent. She did not commit the crime. It's impossible."

A sharp rap from the President. "Please limit your testimony to facts which directly concern the crime."

"I beg your pardon," Tony bowed at the reproof. He faced the jury once more. "On the night of the crime my wife and I quarrelled. It was my fault—entirely my fault. If I had listened to her we would have left the theatre together and she would not stand unjustly accused. As I left the theatre on the night of the murder I saw a man lurking near the stage door."

"Yes, yes, you told us all that at the inquest," impatiently spoke the President. "But the police records show this man was not in France at the time of the murder."

"He was not only in France," argued Tony, "but in Paris on that night."

The Public Prosecutor smiled unpleasantly.

"I take it the defence is prepared to produce him as a witness."

"We haven't been able to find him yet," Roget had to admit.

"But the fact that the twenty thousand francs are missing means that that man got the money. Why was he hiding? Why did he go to Yvette Delange's room? When did he leave?"

The President rapped vigorously.

"You are not here to ask questions, but to answer them. If this man has not been found, it is probably because he does not exist."

That infuriated Tony.

"But he does exist!" he shouted. "The police have made no attempt to help me find him—a dozen times during the past few weeks I have asked for help. They've promised, but done nothing—absolutely nothing!"

"I will not allow the police to be criticised in this court," stated the President. "Kindly present the facts without becoming hysterical."

"My wife is on trial for her life," cried Tony, "and you tell me I am becoming hysterical. I have given you facts. You dismiss them. It is a fact that that man is in Paris. It is a fact that his presence in this court will prove the innocence of my wife. It is a fact that my wife is incapable of killing anyone."

"All this is getting us nowhere!" sneered the Public Prosecutor.

Tony turned on him.

"It's getting us nowhere because you don't want to hear the truth. You have built up a case against an innocent woman and you don't want it torn to pieces."

"I shall order you to be removed!" thundered the President. "This is a court of justice!"

"Justice!" Tony laughed harshly. "All through this building I see the word 'justice' written. If it is justice to condemn an innocent woman, then all my life I have misunderstood that word!"

"Silence!" the President cried, and gave an imperious signal.

At once three hefty gendarmes lined up on either side of Tony Seymour, and struggling in their grasp he was forced from the stand.

"The session is adjourned until 8.30 to-night," came the order.

The Message

THE court reassembled at 8.30. Roget looked harassed. It was not often that he lost a case. He had urged Gaby to change her plea to one of self-defence. With the bullet-hole in the wall and the gun in Delange's hand they would never convict her. But Gaby refused to plead guilty to a crime she had not committed.

When the court were all in their places the President ordered the Public Prosecutor to proceed.

The man was smirking in expectant triumph:

"Mr. President, gentlemen of the jury, I am here not to condemn out of hand someone who might be innocent, but someone who has been given a fair trial; someone who has had the advantage of a clever lawyer, eloquent on her behalf. But, with all his eloquence, I submit that her guilt has been fairly proved."

Tony sat there in agony of mind. Someone dug him in the ribs, and it was some while before he could drag his attention away from that pitiful picture in the box.

It was Gny Henry, who was holding out a dirty piece of paper.

"Just got this message from Marou. We've got to go at once."

Gaby Seymour saw her husband leave his seat and hasten from the court. Had he deserted her? Roget saw the two men leave, and new hope entered his soul. He decided to make a long speech in favour of the accused to gain time.

At Marou's estaminet they found the fat man behind the bar.

"Go and sit down." He spoke out of the corner of his mouth. "When the Weasel goes upstairs, follow him."

The Weasel got up from a table and lurched towards some stairs. The two men edged their way after him. On the stairs the Weasel was waiting for them.

"He came and asked Marou to hide him," hissed the Weasel. "He's upstairs, but I've got his gun. I think it's Capelle. Follow me."

They entered a bed-room, and there sprawled on a bed was a dirty figure.

"That's him! That's the man I saw that night!" cried Tony.

Tony held up the picture. "Do you know this man?" he asked eagerly.

The man opened his eyes and blinked at them.

"What do you want?" he demanded suspiciously.

"You're the man who asked me the way to Yvette Delange's room!" accused Tony.

"I don't know anything about it!" The man fumbled in his hip-pocket. "Get out!"

Tony pounced on the man and plucked him off the bed as if he had been a feather. He shook the wretch till the man's teeth rattled.

"You're coming with us!" Tony shouted. "Whether you want to or not!"

The New Witness

THE Public Prosecutor was enjoying himself. He swelled out his chest. "This girl killed; she killed in a cowardly fashion; and she fled away under cover of darkness. The weapon was thrown with such force—penetrated so deeply that it brought about instantaneous death—the unhappy victim died as though struck by lightning. Having killed, this girl stole—robbed the woman she had so cruelly murdered. Gentlemen of the jury, soon you will hear a clever lawyer. No doubt he will speak to you of frenzy, passion, blindness, jealousy. Perhaps he will enlarge upon that nightmare known as 'miscarriage of justice.' You must not let his eloquence sway you. You will, I feel sure, close your hearts to a false compassion, for you know that the woman Seymour is an actress.

"Her protestations of innocence, her tears, her lies, are a pretence. She has made no attempt to furnish herself with an alibi. Oh, no, she is content with childish denials." He paused to laugh. When he continued it was in imitation of her voice: "I have not killed—it wasn't me—I'm innocent!" He laughed again. "Lies! All lies!"

Roget knew that the jury would give a verdict of "Guilty," no matter how eloquent he could be.

"She has endeavoured to surround herself with mystery," continued the Public Prosecutor. "Gentlemen of the jury, you will not fall into this trap. You will remember the evidence and you will find this woman guilty of a foul crime. In replying 'yes' to the questions that will be asked of you, justice will triumph, truth will come to light. All pity, all mercy would be fatal. There is a dangerous and growing tendency in these days for the individual to take justice into his own hands. For this reason I shall expect from you a verdict of 'Guilty'; a just verdict; a verdict which, by its example, will surely be the saviour of many human lives." He sat down.

It was going to be his greatest triumph.

"Counsel for the defence," called the President.

Eugene Roget stood up and he was smiling. In his hand was a slip of paper that he had just received—it was a tonic.

"Mr. President, before beginning my plea for the defence, I must beg the court to listen to the evidence of a new witness."

"This is unprecedented!" The Public Prosecutor bounced to his feet. "The hearing of the witnesses is concluded."

"The verdict has not been given, and the evidence of this witness may prove of capital importance to the accused," Roget looked at his rival. "Permit me to remind you of your own words. You have just declared that 'Justice will triumph—' Truth will come to light.' Perhaps you spoke more truth than you know—the mysterious man about whom November 14th, 1936.

so much has been heard since the beginning of this trial has been found." He turned eagerly. "Mr. President, I beg you to exercise the discretionary power of this court."

"Let the witness come in."

Everyone stared at the unkempt, dejected creature that shambled down the centre of the court, with two gendarmes on either side and Henry and young Seymour close behind.

"Your name, age, and profession."

The man smirked at the President.

"Henry Carros—thirty-eight."
"Henry Carros!" Roget exclaimed in surprise. "Is it true that you served a sentence for blackmail under the name of Henry Capelle?"

"Yes."

"Then you left France under the name of Henry Capelle," stated Roget, "and returned under the name of Henry Carros?"

"Yes. That is my right name."

"Thank you, Mr. President." The counsel of the defence turned to his superior. "You will forgive the interruption?"

The President nodded, then gave the man in the stand a keen glance.

"As you have not been summoned I cannot take your oath. Now what do you know about the murder of Yvette Delange?"

"I don't know anything."

"Where were you on the night of April 27th?"

"I was at home."

"That's not true!" Tony was on his feet and pointing. "That's the man I saw at the theatre on the night of the crime!"

"I must have silence or I will clear the court!" cried the President. He eyed the witness. "Were you at home?"

"I was at home," answered Carros. "Then I went to the theatre. But I had nothing to do with the crime."

The President leaned forward.

"You admit you were in the theatre on the 27th. What were you doing there?"

"I went to see Yvette Delange."

"Why?"

"Why not?" The answer was defiant.

"She was my wife!"

"Your wife!" The President was staggered.

There was a rustle in court as everyone craned forward to try to get a view of this amazing new witness.

Carros seemed to enjoy the startled excitement and grinned.

"Yes, sir. We were married twelve years ago. When she started to be a success she wanted to get rid of me. She said I stood in the way of her career. Well, that was all right with me. That night I went to ask her for money. But I didn't kill her."

"If you are innocent, why have you not come forward before?"

A twisted grin.

"I've had a bit of trouble with the law, and I thought discretion the better part of chivalry."

"I see." The President smiled.

"You claim that you went to ask your wife for money. Did she give you any?"

"Yes, five thousand francs."

That caused a sensation, and it was some while before silence could be obtained.

"The manager of the theatre has stated that he gave her twenty thousand francs."

"He did," was the amazing answer.

"But she only gave me five."

"And kept fifteen?"

"Yes, she left them on her dressing-table."

Roget stood up to indicate that he wished to question the man, and the President signified his agreement.

"What time did you get to the theatre?"

"It must have been about three o'clock."

"Did you see the stage door-keeper when you came in?"

"No, he wasn't in his room."

"Mr. President, I should like the stage doorkeeper to verify that."

"Recall Jean Dubec," ordered the President.

"Now, Mr. Dubec," Roget glanced keenly at the concierge. "This man states that when he came into the theatre about three, on the night of the crime, you were not in your room. Is he speaking the truth?"

"I might have been taking a drink to one of the dressing-rooms," Dubec's eyes seemed to be flickering nervously.

"You might have been taking a drink to one of the dressing-rooms," Roget repeated. "Do you always leave the stage door unattended while you take drinks round to the artistes? Surely that is a very risky thing to do? Do you realise that you could be charged with complicity in this crime?"

"I don't know what you mean," stammered Dubec. "You ask so many questions."

"Well, I am trying to make myself clear. Let me ask you another question. You say you didn't see this man go in—well, did you see him come out?"

Dubec hesitated.

"Yes," was his answer.

"You saw me go out?" It was Carros who spoke.

"I saw you from my room," Dubec answered. "Perhaps you didn't see me, but I saw you when you went out."

"You're a liar—you didn't see me!" shouted Carros. "My wife didn't want me to meet anyone. So she sent me out through the front of the theatre."

"What have you got to say to that, Dubec?" demanded the President.

"Perhaps I was wrong."

"If you were not in your room where were you?"

"I don't remember. Perhaps I was on my rounds."

"It was while you were on your rounds that you discovered the crime?"

"Yes, sir," Dubec nodded. "And when I got to Yvette Delange's dressing-room I noticed that the door was half-open and the light on. I didn't hear any noise, so I said to myself: 'She must have gone and left the light on.' So I knocked at the door and went in. It was then that I saw her stretched out with the knife. I rushed out and—"

"Yes, yes, you told us all that in your evidence," the President interrupted.

"Mr. President," Eugene Roget dared to interrupt as well. "Dubec, you say that the light was on when you rushed out of the dressing-room?"

"Yes."

The concierge spoke slowly, as if fearful of his answer.

"How is it, then, that the light was off when Alphonse de la Riviere and the victim's chauffeur went in?"

Dubec looked startled.

"What do you mean?"

"Alphonse de la Riviere and Louis Dax have stated that when they went into the victim's room it was in darkness," Roget stated. "Another question: It has been established that before the victim was struck down she had time to fire a shot at her assailant. Did you hear that shot?"

"No, I didn't hear anything."

"That is very funny," Roget spoke slowly. "You cannot have been very

(Continued on page 25)

Never was there a more enduring comradeship than that which was formed between the king of wild horses and the outcast wonder dog. Together they braved a thousand perils, unswerving in their loyalty to each other. Follow their amazing adventures in this gripping serial drama, starring Kane Richmond, Norma Taylor and Rex and Rinty

EPISODE 3—
"Fangs of Flame"

The Adventures OF REX AND RINTY

READ THIS FIRST

Rex, a black Arabian stallion, is worshipped by a strange race of people on the remote tropical isle of Sujan.

To Sujan come three white men who are agents of a Californian rancher named Crawford. They steal Rex, realizing the fortune he can make for their employer, but one of them is captured by the Sujanese. This man, Wheeler, only earns his life and liberty by promising to recover the god horse, and travels to America in company with a native known as Pasha.

Meanwhile Rex is delivered to Crawford, but breaks free and takes to the hills, where he seeks refuge in an abandoned mine. Later that day the rancher plays in a polo game at the Bruce Riding Academy, but his team loses to a side led by Frank Bradley, a popular young sportsman, and after the game Crawford vents some of his spite on a stray police dog that has roamed into the district and is being cared for by a man named Jensen, who is a groom employed in the stables.

It is this dog, Rinty, which later comes across Rex, and which brings the god horse into contact with Frank Bradley and Dorothy Bruce, the daughter of the riding academy's owner.

Frank trains Rex, but, during a polo game, the god horse is taken from his stall by Crawford's agents, among whom is Wheeler, who has appeared on the scene again.

Meanwhile, at a critical stage in the polo game, Crawford fouls Frank, and brings horse and rider crashing to the ground.

Now Read On

On the Trail

CRAWFORD'S horse had fallen, too, but both mounts were soon on their feet again, and then, as Frank Bradley was seen to struggle up from the ground, a murmur of relief arose from the anxious spectators who had been watching the game.

The other players on the field were now gathering round Frank, but he waved them away cheerfully when they inquired if he was hurt.

"Who—me?" he said. "No, I'm all right. I got my feet out of the stirrups in time, and just let my horse roll over me. A bit shaken up, that's all. But what about Crawford?"

The rancher was still huddled on the turf, and, despite the fact that the man's tactics had been contemptible, Frank was the first to reach his side and lend him a hand.

"Are you okay, old man?" he asked, as he helped Crawford up.

The captain of the rival team made a grimace and fingered his left knee gingerly.

"Think I've wrenched my leg," he breathed, and then, in a gruff tone: "I'm sorry about the spill. Just couldn't hold my pony back."

"Oh, that's all right!" Frank assured him. "But how do you feel? Do you think you can carry on?"

"I'd better not risk it, I guess," Crawford muttered, whereupon Frank insisted on helping him off the field.

They were met at the touchline by Mitchell, the foreman of Crawford's ranch, and the latter took charge of the injured man and led him in the direction of the car park.

"Where's your horse, Mitchell?"

asked Crawford, as they were entering a powerful automobile.

"Back of the stables," was the reply. "I'll pick him up later. Better get you home first. Huh, seems like you came off worst in that little collision you arranged, boss."

"Shut up!" snapped Crawford irritably, and with a shrug Mitchell settled himself behind the steering-wheel and thumbed the self-starter.

He drove off with his employer, and, passing within earshot of the stables, heard the imprisoned Rinty barking furiously. Then he swung on to the road leading to the Crawford ranch and thrust his foot well down on the accelerator pedal.

Meanwhile, back at the stables, Rinty was still raising a din that must have attracted attention if any of the academy's staff had been in a position to hear it. But everyone except the unconscious Jensen was down at the polo field, and the dog's voice did not carry that far. Nor was the wolfhound successful in his efforts to burst open the door of the stall, and it was not until he turned his attention on a window at the back of the compartment that he was able to gain his freedom.

That window was open, and, though it was set high in the wall, Rinty managed to reach the sill with his paws at the third attempt. A moment later he had scrambled through and dropped to the ground.

He then dashed round to the front of the stables, and suddenly he began to sniff excitedly, as if he had picked up a scent. Next he made straight for the stall where Rex had been lodged, and, obviously following a trail, glided across the threshold to discover the prone form of Jensen.

Jensen was still insensible, and might not have recovered his wits for a considerable time if Rinty had not begun to lick his pallid cheek affectionately. As it was, the touch of the dog's tongue seemed to bring him round, and in a little while he slowly raised himself from the floor.

With a groan Jensen lifted a hand to his head. Then, looking about him dazedly, he realised all at once that Rex was missing, and a sharp exclamation broke from his lips as he remembered how he had been struck down.

He tottered out of the stall, and as he did so Rinty streaked after him and sped in the direction of the road, whereupon Jensen paused to watch the dog until it had disappeared from view.

The moment Rinty had vanished, the stable-hand made for the polo ground, and he reached the touchline to find Frank Bradley in conversation with Dorothy Bruce.

"Mr. Bradley!" Jensen gasped, breaking in on their discussion. "Mr. Bradley, sir, they've taken the black stallion!"

Frank whipped round and stared at him in bewilderment.

"Taken the black stallion?" he echoed. "Who?"

"I don't know, sir. I didn't see 'em. But somebody laid me out while I was groomin' him, and when I came round the horse had gone. I think Rinty's picked up a trail, though. He made for the road and headed west."

Frank and Dorothy exchanged startled glances. Then the young sportsman turned to Jensen again.

"Saddle me a fresh horse!" he jerked. "I'm going after Rinty to see if he can track down the thieves. Hurry, now!"

It was not long before Frank Bradley was galloping down the road that led westwards from the Bruce Academy, and to the tune of pounding hoofs he swept over the highway at breakneck speed. Yet, fast as he travelled, he had covered a distance of more than two miles before he saw the figure of Rinty ahead of him.

The wolfhound had reached a fork where a short cut branched off through the hills, and as Frank arrived at the spot he realised that the dog had lost the scent temporarily, for the creature was circling round in a puzzled fashion, his nose close to the ground.

Frank drew rein and spoke encouragingly to Rinty, who spared him only a glance and then resumed his quest with determination. But for several minutes the wolfhound seemed at a loss, and when at length he set off along the short cut his behaviour suggested that he was not sure, even now, whether he was on the right track or not.

So far as Frank was concerned, however, there was nothing to do but follow the animal, and, hoping that Rinty had not failed him, he clapped his heels to the flanks of his pony and rode in pursuit of the dog.

Wheeler Shows His Hand

RINTY might have been in doubt, and Frank even more so, but the short cut through the hills was the trail that their quarry had taken, and about the time that the wealthy young sportsman and his canine guide turned on to that by-way, Jones and Wheeler might have been discovered in the heart of a wood some miles farther on.

The trail that they were following was unsuited to motor-traffic, and therefore it was infrequently used. That was one good reason why it had been arranged that they should travel by this route, and they were riding now with Rex sandwiched between them, both men keeping a tight grip on the ropes which had been thrown over the stallion's neck.

For the god horse of Sujan was still in a restive mood, though there seemed little prospect of the magnificent creature escaping from its captors.

"Well, so far so good," Jones said presently. "I wonder if that guy Jensen has given the alarm at the academy yet."

Wheeler did not volunteer a response. He seemed strangely thoughtful, and kept glancing to right and left in a surreptitious manner, as if he expected to see someone amidst the trees that flanked the forest trail.

"Even if Bradley has found out that Rex is missin', I guess we've got nothin' to worry about," Jones went on complacently. "He wouldn't know which way we've gone, and, although he's bound to learn one day that Rex is in Crawford's stable, he won't be able to do anything about it, for he can't claim to be the owner of the horse."

Wheeler, in the meantime, had continued to scan the trees on either side of the rough track, and it was as his companion finished speaking that he detected a movement in some thickets on the right.

Almost immediately he brought his horse to a standstill, compelling Jones to do the same.

"Listen," Wheeler said then. "this black Arabian isn't going to Crawford's ranch."

The other man stared at him. "What are you talkin' about?" he demanded.

Wheeler laughed softly. There was a cunning expression on his sallow features.

"Do you think I'm fool enough to let Crawford have this horse," he queried, "when I can make a fortune takin' him back to Sujan where he belongs?"

Jones started at that, and a look of comprehension dawned in his narrow eyes. It was a look that was succeeded by one of menace as he lowered his hand to his hip.

"You can't get away with this, Wheeler!" he grated.

"No?" came the level-toned rejoinder. "Who's gonna stop me?"

"I am!" snapped Jones, and with the words he attempted to pluck out a six-gun.

Before he could do so a figure rose from the thickets that were growing close to the trail. It was the figure of Pasha, and there was a blowpipe between his teeth, a blowpipe that sent a dart straight to the wrist of Crawford's hireling.

A faint cry escaped Jones as the tiny missile pierced his skin, and with a startling suddenness every muscle in his body was paralysed. Then his mind became a blank, and, uttering a groan, he pitched from the saddle and fell to the dust in an inert heap.

From the thickets stepped Pasha, and, ignoring Jones, he hastened towards Rex, who had begun to plunge and cavort wildly.

"Halika! Halika!" the islander exclaimed in the native tongue, and at the same time made an obeisance, as one who bows his head in worship.

It was a startling revelation to Wheeler, but at the sight of Pasha and at the sound of that word of greeting in the Sujanese dialect the god horse was instantly pacified, and stood there submissively as the swarthy islander moved forward and caressed its sleek muzzle.

For a space Wheeler looked on in awe, and then he directed his attention on the prone form of Jones.

"Have you—have you—killed him, Pasha?" he asked huskily.

"Killed him? No, my friend. The dart was only smeared with a drug which produces insensibility the moment it enters the blood-stream. The man will be unconscious for a little while, that is all."

"How long, Pasha?"

The native shrugged. "It is impossible to tell," he answered. "With some men it is only a question of a minute or two—with others, an hour."

"Then we'd better get outa here quick!" said Wheeler. "Have you got the car and trailer handy?"

"Yes, on another road beyond the wood—just as we arranged. But we cannot risk taking the god horse to the docks in broad daylight. He has too many enemies in this country. I have been thinking things over, Wheeler, and we should be well advised to make the journey to the city after nightfall."

The white man frowned pensively, and was silent for a while. Then he snapped finger and thumb as if an inspiration had occurred to him.

"I've got it!" he ejaculated. "There's an old, deserted barn a couple of miles down the road where you've parked the trailer. We can hide Rex there till it's dark, and—"

He was interrupted by Pasha, as the latter indicated the prostrate figure of Jones.

"He moved just then," the native said. "He is coming round."

The Sujanese paused only to take charge of the revolver that had fallen from the hand of Crawford's hireling when he had been struck by the dart. A moment later he was climbing up behind Wheeler and grasping one of the ropes that encircled Rex's neck, and without further delay the native and his ally swung off to the right, the god horse trotting after them obediently.

They had scarcely disappeared when Jones struggled to his feet, and, withdrawing the dart from his wrist, he stared hazily through the trees that had swallowed Pasha and Wheeler.

Obviously in a confused state of mind, Jones made no attempt to shadow them. But, for that matter, he did not consider it necessary to do so, for, dazed as he was, he had heard Wheeler mention the deserted barn, and, so far as he knew, there was only one such building anywhere near this area.

Bracing himself Jones regained the saddle of his pony and set off along the woodland track, bent on making for the Crawford ranch and reporting to his employer there, and as the tattoo of his bronc's hoofs died away in the distance a brooding quiet settled upon the locality where Pasha and Wheeler had carried out their coup.

It was a silence that remained unbroken till Rinty arrived at the spot with Frank Bradley riding at a canter close behind him.

The wolfhound had become sure of himself once more, but, on reaching the point where the brief altercation between Jones and Wheeler had occurred, he again showed signs of uncertainty, and it was only after a good deal of hesitation that he finally turned off into the trees.

Frank spurred after him, and in another quarter of an hour they were moving clear of the forest on to a wide but uneven trail which was known as the Green Valley road.

Here Rinty lost the scent completely, and, standing in the middle of the trail, he looked up at Frank Bradley with an expression in his eyes that was almost human in its appeal. But, even if Rinty was baffled now, he had by no means failed the young man who had placed so much faith in the dog's instincts.

For there in the thick dust of the road were the tyre-marks of a vehicle that had been turned round and driven in an easterly direction.

Frank dismounted to examine them, and it was soon plain to him that more than one vehicle had been responsible for them.

"A car and a trailer, maybe," he said aloud. "Rinty, we'll follow these tyre-marks and find out where they lead to."

The Deserted Barn

JUST two miles down the road that skirted the forest, Wheeler and Pasha drew up beside a ramshackle building that had once been used for storing grain.

The two men were seated in a powerful automobile, and attached to this was an open trailer, through the laths of which a pair of horses could be seen, one of them being Rex and the other being the pony owned by Wheeler.

"All right, Pasha," said the American who was behind the steering-column of the auto. "You slide out an' open up the barn doors. I'll back in."

The native emerged from the car and did Wheeler's bidding. Then he acted as guide while the white man reversed the horse-box and the automobile into the barn, which accommodated both vehicles with plenty of room to spare.

"Fine," declared Wheeler, switching off the engine and descending to the straw-laden floor. "Now get them doors closed, Pasha—"

The Sujanese laid a hand on his arm. "Wait," he murmured. "I am going to borrow your horse and ride to the nearest town. I must telephone to San Francisco and make arrangements for our transportation to Sujan."

"You mean," the other faltered, "you mean you're gonna leave me alone with Rex?"

"Have no fear," the other replied.

"The god horse will not harm you. In the first place, he could never get out of that trailer. In the second place, he knows now that you and I are friends."

Wheeler was somewhat reassured, and indeed, when the American opened the gate of the trailer and helped Pasha to bring out the spare pony, Rex remained perfectly calm and betrayed no signs of hostility towards him.

A few seconds later Pasha was riding from the barn, and after fastening the gate of the trailer again, the white man strolled forth to watch the native until he had disappeared round a bend in the road. Then he went back into the dilapidated building and shut the doors.

Alone with the god horse, Wheeler glanced through the slats of the trailer and studied the animal appraisingly for a few minutes. Presently, however, he moved away and sat down on the running-board of the car, and he had been reclining there for some little time when he thought he heard movements outside the barn.

He stood up abruptly, well aware that Pasha could not have got back from his mission already, and it was with a suspicious gleam in his eyes that he drew a revolver from his pocket and advanced to the twin doors of the building.

He pushed those doors asunder, and immediately set eyes on a horseman whom he recognised as Frank Bradley. Next second he was levelling his gun to cover the young fellow, but even as he raised the weapon a lithe figure bounded at him and struck him fairly and squarely in the chest.

It was the figure of Rinty, who had been trotting alongside Frank's pony, and Wheeler staggered back from the impact of the wolfhound's body. Then before the man could recover himself, Frank Bradley had leaped from the saddle and was coming for him in flying style.

The wealthy sportsman swung a punch at him, and it connected with Wheeler's jaw, hurling him to the floor of the barn. Another instant and Frank was atop of him, pinning down the hand that held the revolver.

The forty-five was wrested from Wheeler's grasp, and a further blow to the point of the chin left him limp and unresisting. Nor did he regain his faculties until it was too late to continue the scuffle, for by the time that he opened his eyes his arms had been tied behind his back with some rope that Frank had discovered in the barn.

Discomfited, Wheeler was now dvagged to his feet, and without ceremony Frank marched him out of the building to a coppice some little distance away. It was situated to the rear of the barn, and here the prisoner was made fast to the stem of a tree with the remainder of the rope that the young polo player had found.

"That ought to hold you for a while," Frank stated grimly. "Meantime, I'll leave you to reflect on the folly of trying to get away with something that doesn't belong to you."

Wheeler glared at him.

"How do you know that the stallion don't belong to me?" he panted. "Or, leastways, to somebody that I'm actin' for?"

"How do I know?" the younger man retorted. "Would you go to the trouble of stealing him if you had any genuine claim on him? Listen, you rat, I don't pretend to hold any claim on him myself, but until someone shows up and satisfies me that he's the rightful owner—until then, that horse is in my charge."

The prisoner bit his lip and then attempted to make the situation clear.

"Now listen," he began, "if I'd thought you were willin' to give him up to the rightful owners I'd have come to you an' laid my cards on the table. Wait—gimme a chance to explain—"

But Frank was turning away. His one desire was to take Rex back to the Bruce Academy.

"Save your breath," he said. "You can do all the explaining you want to

It was a hard fight while it lasted, but Frank was a match for the two men who were at grips with him. November 14th, 1926.

when I send the county sheriff out to pick you up."

Wheeler swore at him and made a desperate effort to break the things that held him to the tree, but checked as he heard an ominous growl. It came from Rinty, for the dog had followed the two men from the barn and was now at Frank's side.

Frank looked at the wolfhound, then stooped to pat him.

"You stay here and look after this guy, old son," he declared. "See that he doesn't try to get away, huh?"

Rinty seemed to understand. At any rate, he squatted down and laid his chin on his forefeet, staring up at Wheeler in a way that struck the man as peculiarly significant and unnerving.

As for Frank, he retraced his steps to the barn and entered it by the front doors again. Then he walked up to the trailer and peered through the laths at Rex, who was standing inside the horse-box patiently.

"All right, boy," Frank said. "You and I are going back home."

News for Crawford

THE car that had brought Mitchell and Crawford from the Bruce

Academy was drawn up in front of the unscrupulous rancher's home. It had been there for some time now, and its owner was waiting impatiently on the veranda of the house with his chief henchman.

"I can't understand it, Mitchell," Crawford was saying. "They left the academy before us, and they took the short cut. They should've been here by this time."

"Yeah," the other granted. "I hope nothin' has happened to them, boss!"

Crawford bit his nails and scowled uneasily—was still scowling when the man known as Martin was seen approaching.

"Hey!" the rancher called to him. "Seen anything of Jones and Wheeler yet?"

"No, boss," was the reply. "It sure looks to me like something's gone wrong. I—"

He stopped speaking, for at that moment the drumming of hoofs reached the ears of the three men, and as they turned their heads they saw a lone rider come galloping round a bend in the road.

"There's Jones now!" Mitchell exclaimed.

"Yeah, it's Jones all right," Martin said tersely. "But where's Wheeler? An' where's the black stallion?"

Crawford spoke through clenched teeth.

"We'll soon find out," he rasped in a voice like a file. "Come on!"

The three of them hurried to meet Jones, and thirty seconds later the horseman was pulling up in front of them; and from the expression on the newcomer's face it was at once clear to Crawford that something was certainly wrong.

"What's up?" the rancher demanded.

Jones swung himself out of the saddle. "Wheeler's double-crossin' you, boss," he said. "He aims to take that horse back to Sujan. He only threw in with you so he could get his hands on him, and he's pulled a fast one."

Crawford was staring at Jones incredulously.

"What the blazes are you tryin' to tell me?" he queried sharply. "Why should Wheeler want to take that stallion back to Sujan?"

"On account of a reward that's been offered for the god horse by the islanders. That's the way I figure it,

November 14th, 1936.

anyhow. Wheeler said he'd be a fool to let you have the stallion when he could make a fortune by handin' him over to the Sujanese."

A look of realisation crossed the rancher's heavy features, and his eyes seemed to smoulder with savagery. Then all at once he drew back his clenched fist and stepped towards Jones threateningly.

"And you let him get away with that?" he snarled. "Why, you blamed fool—"

His employee had recoiled.

"Hold on, boss!" he panted. "I did my best to stop him. I almost had him lined up on the end o' my gun when this dart knocked me cold!"

He thrust a hand into his pocket and gingerly produced the needle-like object that had rendered him unconscious. It was an object upon which the other three men gazed with awe—particularly Mitchell and Martin, for although their stay in Sujan had been a short one, they had seen similar missiles to this while they had been there.

"It's—it's a dart from a Sujanese blow-gun," Mitchell stammered. "Crawford, the natives have come for their god horse. We'll all be killed."

Jones glanced at Mitchell quickly.

"Maybe you're right," he breathed. "The hombre that fired this dart at me was a foreign-lookin' guy. Boss, we'd better watch our step."

He had turned towards Crawford again as he spoke the last anxious words, but the rancher's face was as hard as granite.

"I don't care if the whole island comes over," he ground out. "That black stallion is worth a fortune, and I don't mean to lose him. Which road did Wheeler and this native take?"

Jones cleared his throat.

"I—I heard 'em talkin'—just as I was comin' to my sense, boss. I was—sorta hazy—but I remember Wheeler sayin' something about keepin' the Arabian till nightfall in an abandoned barn about two miles down a road where they had a car an' trailer waitin'."

"What road?" Crawford jerked.

"Well, that coyote Wheeler musta meant the Green Valley trail. Couldn't've been referrin' to any other, boss. And there's a deserted barn there all right. I know that."

Crawford jerked his thumb in the direction of his automobile.

"Get in that car and drive out to that barn," he ordered. "Take Mitchell and Martin with you. Better tell Anderson he's needed, too. You'll find him around somewhere. Go on, look lively."

Jones hurried off to locate Anderson, an individual who was employed at the ranch in the capacity of a general handyman, and he reappeared with him a minute or two afterwards, having explained to him briefly the object of their mission.

Jones and Anderson climbed into the front of Crawford's car. Martin and Mitchell were already occupying the back of it. As for Crawford himself, he was standing beside the vehicle with an ugly expression on his countenance.

"Remember," he said, as Jones was settling down behind the steering-column, "I want that black stallion. Yeah, and I want Wheeler, too. Bring him back with you, for I aim to show him that he can't double-cross me."

His men nodded grimly, and in another moment Jones had started up the ear and was taking it out on to the road, where he crammed his foot hard down on the accelerator and pushed it over the highway at top speed.

A mile farther on Jones swung off down a side turning. It was the Green Valley trail, and though it was a bad road for driving, he was clocking sixty miles an hour most of the way, and did not ease up appreciably until he sighted a lonely building which he recognised as his destination.

"That's the barn I had in mind," he told his accomplices, "and unless I've missed my guess that's where we'll find the black Arabian!"

He switched off the engine and allowed the car to roll to a standstill. Then he and the other three men scrambled out. Mitchell, Anderson and Martin each producing a forty-five and satisfying themselves that the guns were fully loaded.

"Where's your iron, Jones?" asked Mitchell. "You're liable to need it. No tellin' what we might run into."

"I lost it when that native laid me out with his cursed dart," Jones muttered. "If there's a fight, you fellows will have to do the shootin'. Come on, let's sneak up on that barn."

The car had halted at a distance of about two hundred yards from the ranshaakle building, and now Crawford's hireling proceeded to cover the ground warily. But, if they had only known it, their caution was futile, for their arrival in the vicinity had already been noted by an inmate of the barn.

The inmate of the barn was Frank Bradley, and he had been on the point of unfastening the gate of the trailer to release the black stallion when he had espied the newcomers through the open doors of the building.

The fact that they were armed was sufficient in itself to convince him that they were up to no good, and their mode of approach corroborated this. At the same time Frank quickly realised that although the barn doors were open he himself was invisible to the advancing gunmen on account of the gloom that prevailed within the barn.

He made haste to fasten the gate of the trailer again, and then, remembering the six-shooter that he had wrested from Wheeler, he slipped across to where it was lying and snatched it up from amidst the straw that littered the floor.

In another moment Frank had taken up a position in the darkest corner of the barn, and he stood there in a tense attitude, waiting for those four men to enter.

The seconds dragged by, and to Frank an eternity seemed to elapse, a silent eternity during which no sound was audible in the barn except his own quick breathing and the occasional scrape of a hoof as Rex pawed at the floor-boards of the trailer. Then at last the figures of the gunmen appeared on the threshold.

They moved in through the doorway, running their eyes over the vehicles that had been parked in the barn, and glancing to and fro suspiciously. But they failed to discern the watcher who was lurking in the shadows.

"Ain't nobody here?" Jones murmured. "I wonder what's happened to Wheeler an' his pal?"

"We'll scout around for them later," Mitchell rejoined. "Meantime, we'll take a look in that trailer there."

The four men advanced to the horse-box and stared through the gaps between its laths.

"That's Rex all right," said Jones. "What do you think of him, Anderson? A beauty, ain't he?"

"He sure is," was Anderson's reply. "A fortune in horseflesh. Boy, I—"

But the sentence was never finished,

(Continued on page 27)

"ACCUSED"

(Continued from page 20)

far from the spot when the crime was committed and the pistol fired."

"I'm a little deaf."

"Oh, you're a little deaf!" Paul Roget smiled. "Never mind, that is an unimportant detail." He faced the President. "I crave your permission to reconstruct the crime."

The Knife-thrower

EUGENE ROGET'S voice rang through the court-room. "I know now who is the guilty party, and in one moment I am going to denounce him to you. I will tell you of a dramatic scene which had no witnesses. A scene prompted by greed, which ended in tragedy. Let me take you back to the theatre on the night of the crime, with its long, deserted corridors, full of dark corners. The victim has left her brilliantly lighted room, the fifteen thousand francs, carelessly thrown on her dressing-table. Standing in the doorway is a man, his eyes fixed on the money. It fascinates him. Thinking himself alone, he creeps into the room, seizes the money, and is about to make off with it when he hears a noise. Yvette Delange is coming back. What shall he do? He will be caught. There is a small ante-room, and he darts in there. He seizes the dagger which the accused has left on a table. He grabs it just before the victim enters."

On a table were laid the various exhibitions attached to the crime, and, naturally, the chief one was the knife. Eugene Roget picked up the knife and Delange's gun. The President, the jury, the court held their breath.

"Unconscious of her danger, she is about to enter the dressing-room; the lights go out. Hold this, will you?"

He tossed the knife towards Dubec, who caught it adroitly and stood there staring as if mesmerised at the lawyer.

Eugene Roget's voice became hoarse with emotion:

"In the sudden darkness she can see nothing, hear nothing but the pounding of her own terrified heart. One minute passes, another minute—minutes that seem like hours. She hears a sound—something brushes against her in the dark. 'Who's there?' she cries. No answer. Then she remembers the gun in her dressing-gown pocket. Instinct tells her that someone—someone armed, perhaps—is lurking in the darkness." From his pocket he produced the gun. "And from a distance of about seven feet, in the direction from which she heard the noise, she fires."

As he spoke he raised the gun and pointed it straight at Dubec. There came the roar of the report, but as the gun spoke the mesmerised figure of Dubec jerked into activity.

In the nick of time Roget ducked his head. The knife quivered in stout, wooden panelling.

Slowly the madness died from Dubec's staring eyes. He realised what he had done.

"I had to do it—it was self-defence!" he screamed.

"Mr. President," Roget spoke when silence had been obtained with great difficulty. "I apologise for this melodrama, but I was sure that it would prove successful. You will notice that I stood so that if Dubec threw the knife it would hit no one but myself. Fortunately, I was just quick enough. Before I did this reconstruction of the crime I got my assistant to load Delange's gun with blank. It may interest you to know that for many years Dubec was on the variety stage in a knife-throwing act. Dubec murdered Yvette Delange. He will plead self-defence. You have just seen the whole crime, Mr. President, and a clearer case of murder I have seldom seen. I have stated my case."

The President threatened to clear the court if he did not have order. Everyone was trying to rush forward to shake Gabrielle Seymour by the hand or kiss her. Everyone seemed to be kissing Gaby save Tony, who was completely shut off by a wall of people.

At last the court cleared. Dubec was led away, and Henri Carros informed that it would be as well if he accepted the hospitality of the Sûreté for a few days, when they would make sure that he did not leave Paris. Gaby's name was cleared, and thus the trial came to its end.

Once more everyone tried to kiss Gabrielle and to ring Eugene Roget's hand because of his brilliant defence. The President wisely retired to his room. At last Tony got to his wife's side.

They looked at each other shyly.

"I suppose you couldn't spare me a kiss, could you?" he asked humbly.

"Oh, my dearest!" cried Gabrielle, and flung herself into his arms.

(By permission of Criterion Film Productions, Ltd., and United Artists Corporation, Ltd., starring Douglas Fairbanks jun. as Tony and Dolores del Rio as Gaby.)

PIANO ACCORDIONS

BY ALL THE MOST FAMOUS MAKERS

From
1/-
WEEKLY

BONELLI, STELDENI, VISSIMIO, PANCOTTI, HOHNER, PAOLO SOPRANI, CRUCIANELLI, Etc.

USED AND RECOMMENDED BY BAND LEADERS
—BUY AN ACCORDION BY A FAMOUS MAKER

£5. 5. 0 Value for 47/6.

Real Piano Accordions at specially reduced prices. Piano-finished cabinet. Tonal reeds, metal-bound bellows, triple-chord action. Complete with shoulder strap. 21 piano keys, 8 basses. Send 2/6 only first instalment. Balance payable 4/- monthly until 52/6 is paid; or cash within 7 days 47/6 only. Write for fully illustrated list of models with 25 keys, 12 bass; 25 keys, 24 bass; 34 keys, 48 bass; 41 keys, 120 bass, etc., etc. All on equally attractive terms. The remarkably Low Terms for Monthly Payments ensure the immediate popularity of these fine instruments.

J. A. DAVIS & Co. (Dept. A.P.50)

94-104, Denmark Hill, London, S.E.5.

Delete phrase that does not apply.

Please find enclosed P.O. 2/6. First Instalment for Accordion on approval, to be refunded if instrument not approved. Guaranteed by "Boy's Cinema."

Please send me, post free, fully illustrated brochure of Piano Accordion

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

THROW YOUR VOICE

Into a trunk under the bed or anywhere. Lots of fun fooling teacher, policeman or friends.

THE VENTRILO

A little instrument fits in the mouth out of sight; used with above for Bird Calls, etc. Anyone can use it. Never fails. A full course book on Ventriloquism, together with the Ventrilo. All for 6d., plus postage, 13d.

6d

CATALOGUE OF NOVELTIES FREE

ELLISDON & SON

(Dept. B.C.), 246, High Holborn, LONDON, W.C.1.

PLAY REAL BILLIARDS AT HOME

8/- DOWN brings you a Riley 'Home' Billiard Table, carriage paid, 7 days' free trial. Balance monthly.

E. J. RILEY, LTD., ENSIGN WORKS, ACCRINGTON, or Dept. 30, 147, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.1. Write for Art List.

32 FREE BILLIARD TABLES. Send for details and price list.

TALL

Your height increased in 12 days or no cost. New discovery adds 2-5ins. I gained 4ins. Guaranteed safe. Full Course, 5/-. Details:

J. B. MORLEY, 8, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.4.

BE MANLY

I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10-25 ins. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms), also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Complete Course, 5/-. Details free, privately—

STRENGTH INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Rd., LONDON, N.W.2.

BE TALLER!

Inches put you miles ahead! Increased my height to 6ft. 3ins. Thousands gratified clients since 1907. *Vare worthless imitations. 6d stamp brings details.—ROSS, Height-Specialist, SCARBOROUGH.

All Applications for Advertisement Space in this publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "BOY'S CINEMA," The Fleetway House, Farringdon St., London, E.C.4.

"REVENGE RIDER"

(Continued from page 12)

law was Kramer. How he got in this room, I don't know, but he was here, because I heard Harmon shout: 'Don't, Kramer! Don't shoot!'

That was news to Ludlow, and he could think of nothing to say.

"When the shot was fired," Tim went on, "that light went out. Kramer relit it so that he could see what Harmon had written about him. He left half the page because it read like a suicide note. Pretty smart. But he made one mistake—he forgot to blow out the light!"

"Well, that's all very good," conceded Ludlow, "but how did he get out of here and leave the doors locked on the inside?"

"I think I can answer that, too," said Tim. "If my guess is right, you'll find the key isn't turned in that lock," he pointed to the communicating door. "Try it, Murphy."

The proprietor of the hotel went over to the door. The bolt was shot, but the key in the lock had not been turned.

"Sure, that's right," announced Murphy.

Tim put down the paper and the gun. "Anybody got a piece of string?" he asked, walking over to the door and pulling back the bolt.

Both men groped in their pockets, but Tim opened the door, and, on the floor, just inside the adjoining room, he saw a length of string.

"Wait a minute!" he exclaimed. "Here's the same string Kramer used!"

He picked it up and showed it to them, then set the knob of the bolt straight with the slot and passed the string over it, holding both ends.

"Watch what happens when I pull that string," he said, and he went into the room. The ends of the string still in his hand, and closed the door.

Ludlow and the proprietor watched with fascinated eyes as the doubled string pulled the bolt along in the slot till it was shot; then Tim let go of one end of the string and pulled on the other till it all disappeared round the edge of the door.

"Well, I'm jiggered!" exclaimed Murphy.

Ludlow ran out as though to escape, but Tim stepped out from the adjoining room into the passage in time to prevent him from getting away.

"Oh, Ludlow, don't rush off!" he said grimly. "You've got a job ahead of you. As sheriff of this town, I guess it's up to you to arrest Kramer!"

Paid in Full

KRAMER had gone no farther than the headquarters of the Cattle-men's Protective Association with the bearers of Jed Harmon, and he was in his office, burning a number of papers in the fireplace, when Peters, Connors, and two other men entered it at a side door. Having helped the sheriff to search the doctor's house, they had looked all over the town for Tim and Jed Harmon, and they had not heard the shooting at the hotel. Kramer did not appear particularly pleased to see them.

"No use lookin' for them two in the dark, boss," said Peters. "We ain't had no luck, and I guess we'd better wait for daylight."

"They're both in town," snapped Kramer. "Both of 'em!"

"In town?" echoed a man named Vance.

"Yes." Kramer moved away from the fireplace. "Harmon got shot in a mix-up, and O'Neil knows all there is to know."

"Yeah?" Connors looked as concerned as he felt. "Then we'd better start leavin' while we're altogether. Now this fella O'Neil—"

"Is just one man, and we're five!" Kramer rapped at him.

"Yeah, I know," said Connors dismally, "but it don't take many men like O'Neil to make a dozen!"

"Then you'll stay right here and back my play! I'm gonna find this fellow O'Neil, and when I—"

The door from the assembly-room went back with a crash against the wall, and Tim stepped into the office with Ludlow.

"You don't have to look far, Kramer," he said sternly. "The sheriff you appointed is here to arrest you for murder!"

Kramer glared at the man he had invested with authority. The other four were not quite sure whether to reach for their guns or not.

"It ain't my idea," faltered Ludlow. "It's his."

"Then why don't you come and do it?" challenged Kramer.

"Well, I don't really want to," Ludlow mumbled, moving forward with marked reluctance, "but he said I had to face you or face him, and—"

"That's far enough, Ludlow!" Kramer bellowed at him. "You come any closer, I'll open fire!"

"Well," decided the frightened wretch, "I guess I'll have to shoot it out with him."

He turned about, his hand upon the butt of his gun, and in the same split fraction of a second Kramer and his hirelings went to draw. But Tim's gun was out first, and spat fire, and Ludlow fell heavily against him with a bullet between his ribs.

Kramer fired, but the sheriff was a

The battle seemed interminable, but actually lasted no more than half a minute. Then men surged into the room from the street, and after a while somebody ran off to fetch Dr. Lindsay.

Hardly any one of those who crowded into the smoke-laden room regretted the downfall of Kramer and the gunmen he had brought into the district; practically all of them sympathised with Tim, because his brother had been foully murdered.

The doctor arrived, and Chad and Myra were with him; but Myra was sent back to the house, and most of the crowd were driven forth, while Lindsay dealt with the wounded.

Ludlow was dead, and his body was carried away to the undertaker's. The others received attention in turn.

"Any hope, doc?" inquired Tim, as Lindsay knelt beside Kramer, dressing his wound.

"There's a chance for some of 'em," was the reply, "but I was at the gaol a while ago, and Rankin's dead."

Tim saw Kramer's eyes open, and judged that he had heard.

"It was Rankin got Jerry, wasn't it, Kramer?" he said, dropping down on one knee.

"How—did—you know?" asked the crook feebly.

"Jerry was shot with a forty-one," Tim replied. "Rankin's got the only forty-one carbine in the county."

Kramer tried to raise his head, but dropped it again.

"You're pretty smart, O'Neil," he said with a valiant effort at a sneer. "but the joke's on Harmon. He wasn't wanted on the Peecos—they caught the killer, and he confessed."

Dr. Lindsay was a very quiet-mannered man, but Myra and Chad had told him a lot, and he loathed and despised the man whose wound he had just dressed.

"The joke's on you, Kramer," he said almost in the voice of a judge pronouncing sentence on a murderer. "Harmon's hit bad, but he's not going to die. You are!"

Three weeks afterwards, Tim and Myra walked out from the Harmon ranch-house man and wife. The white-haired parson from Red Roek had married them in the living-room, and Jed Harmon—in a wheel-chair—had given the bride away, while Chad had acted as best man.

As bride and groom descended the steps from the porch and walked arm-in-arm towards the yard, Jed wheeled himself out over the front step to watch them. Chad leaned against the rail beside the steps and waved a hand, and the parson stood on the mat inside the door with a frown of marked disapproval.

In the yard a buckboard was standing, two horses attached to its shaft, five other horses tethered to the back of the vehicle. Tim kissed his bride and helped her up into the driving-seat, then climbed beside her and flourished the whip.

Instead of settling down at the Martin ranch, which his brother had bought, Tim had persuaded Myra to go off on a trading jaunt with him.

"A very unusual way to spend a honeymoon, I should say," remarked the parson; but Jed Harmon looked round at him with a chuckle.

"What's wrong with swapping a few horses while messing around the country I'd like to know?" he said. "They'll take up ranching, right enough, when they get back!"

(By permission of Columbia Pictures Corporation, Ltd., starring Tim McCoy.)

The Music Comes Out Here!

Post 3d.

A NEW HARMONICA OF THE HIGHEST MUSICAL PERFECTION.

Straight from the Continent. The Marvellous Accordion Harp Harmonica as used by bands and professionals. Note the large polished wood sound chamber, which amplifies and controls the tremolo tuned deep bass and rich treble chords, giving amazing volume just like a mighty organ. Bound in handsome coloured nacreous mother-of-pearl, with plated fittings, this full-size brass-reeded Harmonica is a most powerful, magnificent instrument on which you can quickly play any tunes with realistic piano-accordion effects. Wonderful value. Send P.O. 2/3 NOW, to:

Wm. PENN, Ltd., (Dept. 50), 623, HOLLOWAY ROAD, LONDON, N.19.

November 14th, 1936.

shield for Tim, who took aim over his shoulder, and Kramer crashed down on his face and lay still. Almost simultaneously the other four jerked the triggers of their guns, and the body of Ludlow became riddled with bullets; but Tim wasted no shots.

While the room became dense with acrid smoke he picked off one crook after another till all four were on the floor.

"THE ADVENTURES OF REX AND RINTY"

(Continued from page 24)

for it was at this instant that Frank chose to reveal himself, stepping out of the shadows with Wheeler's revolver held steadily in front of him.

"Drop your hardware, you fellows, and reach for the roof!" he jerked.

The surprised ranch-hands wheeled around, and confusion and astonishment were written on their faces as they beheld the young polo player.

"Bradley!" Mitchell gasped.

Frank nodded deliberately. "Bradley's the name," he observed. "Come on, throw away those guns and don't try any tricks—if you want to stay healthy."

Three six-shooters thudded into the straw that covered the floor of the barn, and four pairs of arms were raised on high. Frank looked and sounded as if he were in deadly earnest, and Crawford's agents valued their skins.

"Now we can talk," their captor went on. "Why are you after that stallion in there? What do you know about him?"

The four ranch-hands eyed him sourly, none of them volunteering any response at first. Then suddenly Jones moved forward.

"Listen," he said. "I'll tell you why we're here, mister."

His accomplices had darted sharp, angry glances at him, but a moment later they realised his purpose, for under the pretext of making a clean breast of everything Jones had drawn within striking distance of Frank, and with an unexpected gesture he brought down his hands and clutched the younger man by the wrist.

"All right, boys, I've got him!" he yelled, tearing Frank's gun aside.

His boast was a shade premature, for the stalwart polo player hit him with his left, landing a punch that set the fellow's head ringing. But Mitchell, Anderson and Martin were prompt to go to their comrade's aid, and next moment Frank was involved in a desperate scuffle.

He lost possession of the revolver, but lashed out with his bare knuckles, and he was giving a good account of himself when Jones sloped behind him and brought him to his knees with a cowardly blow on the base of the skull.

It was a blow that was followed by a savage and concerted onslaught by the other three rogues, and, kicked and beaten, Frank was huddled amidst the straw in a semi-conscious condition by the time they had spent their fury on him. Then the brutal ranch-hands collected their six-guns, Jones arming himself with the one that had fallen from Frank's grasp.

"I reckon we've taught Bradley a lesson," growled Anderson. "What are we gonna do—leave him here?"

"No," said Mitchell. "We'd better take him along with us and hold him till we've made a report to the boss. Jones, you an' Martin help me get him to the car. Anderson, you can drive that roadster and the trailer."

Thrusting their revolvers into their pockets, Mitchell and Jones and Martin pulled Frank to his feet and propelled him from the barn. As for Anderson, he clumbed into the automobile to which the horse-box was attached, and after switching on the engine he thumbed the self-starter.

Nothing happened, however. The battery seemed "dead," and, cursing, Anderson searched for the crank-handle,

You'll find them in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL—and are they tough? This grand, illustrated article tells you about the men you admire. And it's only one of dozens of gripping features, yarns of adventure and the glorious West, SEVEN long Film Stories, scores of photographs and articles about Filmland and the stars—160 pages in all!

Buy Your Copy Today!

Of all Newsagents and Booksellers 3/6

He found it, and made his way to the front of the roadster, where he attempted to start the engine by swinging it. But he was unsuccessful, and, during a pause in his efforts he took out a cigarette and struck a match.

It was as he was lighting the cigarette that he heard a movement behind him, and as he turned he saw a sleek form padding across the threshold of the barn, the form of a dog which he immediately recognised as the wolfhound that had attacked Mitchell a week or so before.

At sight of the dog Anderson dropped the match that he had lit and took a running kick at the animal.

The kick missed its mark as Rinty backed away from it, and in another instant Anderson was on the defensive, with the wolfhound springing at him like a mad thing. Then the man tripped and fell, and there ensued a primitive battle that was fought to the accompaniment of clashing teeth, and of mingled cries and snarls.

It was fought, too, in an atmosphere of thickening smoke, for the burning match that Anderson had thrown to the floor had ignited the dry straw, and as he and his canine antagonist rolled hither and thither the gleam of flames played sinisterly in their eyes.

Meanwhile, Frank Bradley and his captors were on their way to the automobile in which Crawford's henchlings had driven from the ranch. But their progress towards the vehicle had been slow, for the young sportsman had recovered somewhat, and was beginning to give his foes a good deal of trouble.

They were still a short distance from their objective when Martin happened to look back, and a hoarse exclamation broke from him as he saw smoke issuing from the doorway of the barn.

"Hey, fellers!" he blurted. "Something's wrong!"

The others turned their heads, and they also perceived the smoke that was coming out of the building. Then, even as the three ranch-hands were wondering what Anderson had been up to, Frank Bradley took advantage of the diversion and wrenched himself out of their clutches.

Martin tried to seized him again, but was sent to the dust by an upper cut that took him under the chin with shattering force. Before he had hit the ground, however, Mitchell and Jones were upon the young sportsman and were striving to overwhelm him.

It was a hard fight while it lasted, but Frank was a match for the two men who were at grips with him. A knock-out punch to the jaw spread-eagled the rogue known as Jones, and thirty seconds later Mitchell went down from a short-arm blow to the solar plexus; and as the last of his adversaries collapsed Frank Bradley made for the burning barn.

There were two hundred yards between him and the building, and he covered the distance in record time. Yet when he reached the threshold of the barn he could see nothing for the dense clouds of smoke that filled the interior—could only guess what was afoot by the sounds that greeted his ears.

The whimmying of a horse and the stamping of hoofs told him that Rex was making frantic efforts to escape from the trailer. At the same time he was aware of a commotion in which human cries and animal snarls seemed to be intermingled. Then all at once there came the blast of a shot, followed by a piteous yell of pain in the unmistakable tones of a dog.

(To be continued in another long episode next week. By permission of Associated British Film Distributors, Ltd., starring Kane Richmond, Norma Taylor and Rex and Rinty.)

November 14th, 1936.

(Continued from page 2)

West Socks William

The day when the screen featured a hero socking his lady fair to show his love is over! That was the day that gave birth to "Public Enemy," in which Jimmy Cagney introduced this type of tenderness.

To-day the fashion has changed. The lady socks the man!

And take it from Warren William, she can sock. Mae West unleashes a right cross to the jaw in Paramount's "Go West, Young Man" that almost sent him West.

In the picture William is the personal representative of Mae, who has the rôle of a temperamental film star on a personal appearance tour. His job is to keep her away from romantic mix-ups, but his interference provokes a sock in the jaw. No rehearsal was necessary. Mae, a fight fan herself, punched—and William went down.

"I can throw a pretty fair left hook, too," Mae added as an afterthought. But William didn't wait for a demonstration.

Swim as You Work

Good swimming technique was one of the requisites for the labour crew at work on "Lloyds of London" at 20th Century-Fox.

Four crews of five men to a crew were equipped with swimming trunks, blankets, and constant supplies of hot coffee and put to work filming scenes with Freddie Bartholomew, Douglas Scott, Montague Love, Arthur Holl and other members of the cast.

The huge tank on the 20th Century-Fox lot was turned into a portion of a Norfolk harbour in the 18th century. Two sloops of that period, half discernible through the artificial fog, rode at anchor while the actors did a good part of their action in rowing-boats and by swimming in hurried retreat.

In order to record this action, the camera was mounted on a raft on which Director Henry King worked with the camera crew. So that the raft could follow the actors in motion, five swimmers at a time were required to move the raft.

Due to the coldness of the water, no workman was allowed in it more than fifteen minutes at one time during the course of an hour. Four crews were thus kept busy all of the time.

Only those who could swim noiselessly and without splash were drafted into this chilly service.

Roman Galleys Float Again

Roman galleys will again sail the waters of San Pedro Channel.

The fleet of triremes, constructed by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer in 1928 for the production "Ben Hur," is again being made ship-shape, and will soon take the water for sequences in the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer two-reel musical comedy, "No Place Like Home," which Reginald Lo Borg is directing and Jack Chertok is producing.

The galleys, now moored at a shipyard in San Pedro, California, will be completely repainted and now standing and running rigging fitted to masts and spars.

Tarzan Chimpanzee Becomes Proud Father

While the entire "Tarzan Escapes" company of 150 waited most of the night with bated breath, and a veterinary, hastily summoned, worked with feverish anxiety, the stork arrived, signalling the first "blessed event" in the making of the new Tarzan jungle thriller.

Skippy, the trained chimpanzee, playing Johnny Weissmuller's friend and companion, would distribute cigars if he knew enough. He is now a proud father. Mamie, another chimpanzee, is the mother. The baby weighs five pounds.

The little chimpanzee is nearly white, but will darken in colour in a few weeks, according to George Emerson, animal man on the picture. It is kept cuddled in cotton batting, and won't be used in the picture. Baby chimps can't be worked for several months, as they are very delicate.

"A chimpanzee," explains Emerson, "has only one lung, so when it catches cold, it's usually a case of good-bye."

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"REVENGE RIDER."—Tim O'Neil, Tim McCoy; Chad Harmon, Robert Allen; Myra Harmon, Billie Seward; Martin Kramer, Edward Earle; Jed Harmon, Frank Sheridan; Matt Luddon, Jack Clifford; Dr. Lindsay, George Pearce; Ned Lynch, Allan Sears; Mike Rankin, Harry Semels.

"ACCUSED."—Tony Seymour, Douglas Fairbanks jun.; Gaby Seymour, Dolores del Rio; Yvette Delange, Florence Desmond; Eugene Roget, Basil Sydney; Ninette Duval, Googie Withers; President of Court, John Roberts; Prosecuting Counsel, Cecil Humphreys; Morel, Esme Percy; Alphonse de la Riviere, Edward Rigby; Dube, George Moore Marriott; Guy Henry, Cyril Raymond; Henry Capelle, Roland Culver.

Scottish Veteran in Hollywood

Hollywood, where things are seldom what they seem, the other day came forth with a real, life-blood hero in the person of 76-years-old James "Scotty" Robertson.

A fighting man since the age of 15, when he joined the "Boys' Brigade" in Edinburgh, "Scotty" has been "soldiering" since 1860.

Veteran of the bombardment of Alexandria in 1882 and a dozen other skirmishes, including action in Majuba Hill, Khartoum, the Sudan, Argia Heights, the South African War of 1900, and against the Afghans and Derivishes, "Scotty" received more than 30 wounds, smashed shoulders, broken legs, arms, fingers, and toes, as well as deep head wounds, during his scrapping career.

He now has a small part in Cecil B. DeMille's new Paramount film, which stars Gary Cooper and Jean Arthur.

Among mementoes presented him for bravery is a shell box from Queen Victoria. Together with his many medals, he proudly exhibited the gift to a member of the cast of "The Plainsman."

Filming Witchcraft Scenes

Some sort of a record for detailed research has been set by Frank Lloyd, Glasgow-born Paramount producer-director, who, with his staff, has directed more than 75 books in preparing his now historical romance, "Maid of Salem," which stars Claudette Colbert and Fred MacMurray.

In addition to the books, dozens of different sources, such as museums and libraries, were called upon to supply data for costumes, living habits, and other items. The British Museum was one of them.

The books were collected by Lance Baxter, technical director of the Lloyd production, and range from the Bible to bound volumes of the "National Geographic Magazine." Many of the books are original editions, and some are the only ones of their kind in existence.

The Lloyd staff had not only to make a complete study of the life of Puritans, but in addition the famous outbreak of witchcraft in Salem round about 1692 was studied to the last available detail. "Maid of Salem" is the first picture dealing with the witchcraft hysteria as it actually occurred.

Much of the picture will be filmed on location near Santa Cruz, California, where old Salem Village has been faithfully recreated from maps and drawings, supplied by the Essex Museum in Salem. Salem Town, which grew into the modern Salem, is being built at Paramount ranch, near Hollywood, for other scenes.

PLAY BILLIARDS
 Perfect Reproduction, Full-size Tables, Leather Covered Pockets, Rubber Cushions, adjustable Feet. Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Balls, Marking Board, Rules and Chalk.

Size	Dep.	Cash
3 ft. 2 ins. x 1 ft. 8 ins.	1/3 19 wkly. pay.	13 16
3 ft. 8 ins. x 1 ft. 11 ins.	1/3 19 wkly. pay.	16 19/6
4 ft. 2 ins. x 2 ft. 2 ins.	1/6 13 wkly. pay.	24 6
4 ft. 8 ins. x 2 ft. 5 ins.	1/10 19 wkly. pay.	23 29/6
5 ft. 2 ins. x 2 ft. 8 ins.	2/ 23 wkly. pay.	31 39/6
6 ft. 4 ins. x 3 ft. 3 ins.	2/ 31 wkly. pay.	4 52/6

SEND FOR FREE ART. ILLUS. LIST.

GEORGE GROSE • LUDGATE CIRCUS
 NEW BRIDGE ST., LONDON, E.C.4.

MAN-SIZED. FREE books. (Beautifully illustrated). These books explain a simple, quick way to become a man-sized man. Enclose 2d. stamp.—Percival Carne, Rhiwbina, Cardiff, S. Wales.

HAVE YOU A RED NOSE?
 Send a stamp, and you will learn how to rid yourself of such a terrible affliction free of charge. Address in confidence—T. J. TEMPLE, Specialist, "Palace House," 128, Shaftesbury Avenue, LONDON, W.1. (Est. 35 years.)

BLUSHING, Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured on money back. Complete Course, 5/- Details—L. A. Stebbing, (A), 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2

STAMMERING! Cure yourself as I did. Particulars Free.—FRANK B. HUGHES 7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.1.

STAMPS 300 DIFFERENT, incl. Annual, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Fictorials, Colonials. Price 6d. (Abroad 1/-).—W. A. WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS

BOY'S CINEMA

No. 885. EVERY TUESDAY November 28th, 1936.

2D

"THE LAST OF THE MOHICANS"

and

"POSTAL INSPECTOR"

Long Complete Film
Thrillers Inside!

THIS GRAND COLOURED POSTCARD
FREE Inside!

THE LAST OF THE MOHICANS

STARRING
RANDOLPH SCOTT

A THRILLING DRAMA
OF THE CANADIAN BACKWOODS

A gripping tale of those stirring times when England was having to fight hard to save her American colonies from the French. The adventures of Hawkeye, the famous scout, and his hated enemy, Magua, Chief of the Hurons; of Chingachgook, the Mohican Chief, and his son, Uncas; of Alice and Cora Munro, the brave daughters of Colonel Munro; and of the arrogant British officer, Major Heyward. Starring Randolph Scott, Binnie Barnes and Henry Wilcoxon

Pitt's Famous Prophecy

IT was in the year 1757, and the Seven Years War, which was fought in three continents, was raging. George II, of the House of Hanover, ruled the British throne and the famous Pitt was his Prime Minister. The latter was in favour of a vigorous prosecution of the war in North America, and suggested an advance against General Montcalm and his Huron allies. It was Pitt's idea that the troops stationed at Albany under the command of Colonel Munro should make the attack and that reinforcements be sent from England.

The pompous Newcastle was all against the scheme.

"Give this wilderness back to the Indians," Newcastle contemptuously told his king. "This war will be decided in Europe. Concentrate our forces there for a general attack on the main French Army!"

George II was impressed until Pitt stepped forward.

"Your Majesty," he cried, "his Grace would win you a battle—I would win you an Empire!"

That epigram decided the issue. The jubilant Pitt at once rushed with the glad tidings to the Duke of Marlborough, Britain's great military genius.

"We've won, my lord."

"Good!" answered the duke. "The scoop of war, Andromeda, is standing by to take Major Heyward to the Americas. He should be there in six weeks. I will send for the major at once."

November 28th, 1936.

In a few moments the tall, powerful, and elegantly garbed officer entered the duke's presence.

"Here is an urgent dispatch. On your arrival in New York, proceed at once to Colonel Munro. Also you will remain there as second-in-command. This dispatch means war, Major Heyward."

"I am glad, my lord."

"You may find it difficult to adapt yourself to the new country."

The major drew himself up proudly. "The British Army has always adapted a new country to England, sir."

The merry eyes of the duke twinkled. "Maybe—my respects to Colonel Munro—and you won't forget his two charming daughters."

Heyward grinned.

"No, sir."

In Albany, New York, frontier outpost of the British Colony, Colonel Munro's charming daughters, Alice and Cora, were being entertained by a wealthy Dutch patroon in one of the most magnificent houses in the territory. Outside the house were groups of British and Colonial soldiers. Lax discipline prevailed throughout the town. There was no dream of war or danger. Topsy soldiers drank, gambled, and caroused.

The clatter of horses' hoofs resounded, and a four-wheel coach came dashing madly down the post-road, scattering the gambling soldiers, who cursed angrily, right and left. Some of the Colonials laughed good-humouredly. From the coach alighted Major Heyward, who was followed by Jenkins, his orderly. The major frowned as he stared at the ill-dressed, drunken soldiers and the Colonials in their suits of skin. He marched up to one who was contentedly puffing at his pipe.

"You there! Direct me to Colonel Munro!"

Without removing his pipe the Colonial jerked a thumb in the direction of the patroon's mansion. The major snorted indignantly and then set off for the house, but his orderly, staggering under the weight of much baggage, was indignant.

"Are you in the habit of addressing an officer with a pipe in your mouth?"

The Colonial eyed Jenkins coolly and removed his pipe.

"No-o-o-o," he muttered. "Sometimes I chew snuff."

Jenkins turned away indignantly and began to collect together more baggage. The Colonial good-naturedly approached and lent a hand. He cocked an eye at the vast pile of equipage.

"Your officer travels light, don't he?" he said with heavy sarcasm.

But the irony was wasted on Jenkins. "Oh," he said, "the major don't mind roughing it."

Within the patroon's mansion the dance was in full progress. British officers in full regimentals, white-wigged and scarlet-coated, outshone the sober attire of the Colonial youths, captured the prettiest girls, and moved with more assurance through the stately measures of the minuet. The prettiest of the girls were Colonel Munro's daughters

Cora was fair, slight, and as dainty as a fairy, whilst Alice was dark, tall, sturdy of limb and bright of eye.

With indulgent eyes the elders watched the young dancers from a gallery. The patron's fat wife beat time to the music with a podgy finger. The patron, a corpulent Dutchman, in velvet knee-breeches and large horn-rimmed spectacles, beamed at the big-faced, square-jawed officer standing by his side.

"This is the first time," he remarked, "that I have seen your daughter so gay, so carefree, colonel."

Colonel Munro nodded.

"Yes, mynheer. The child had a sad experience—the lad she was to marry—lost at sea in a naval engagement. It has been my hope that this trip to America might help her forget."

He turned as a servant appeared and announced Major Heyward.

The colonel held out his hand as the handsome young officer strode forward.

"Duncan Heyward!" he cried jubilantly. "What wind blows you to America? Have you tricked Marlborough into granting you a furlough, after all?"

Heyward shook his head and held out a sealed parchment.

"Important dispatches, sir."

The colonel broke the seals and read the communications.

"Ah, action at last. Time we were on the move. My men need a brush with the French—they're getting stale here with too much easy living." He looked keenly at the major. "I suppose you know what this says?"

But Heyward's eyes had been roaming the room in search of someone who was dearly beloved to him. He gave an embarrassed laugh.

"Yes—you're looking very well yourself, sir."

Munro chuckled.

"Oh, I understand. Very well,

Duncan, go and find Alice. But report back to me in half an hour." He glanced at the happy throng. "I'm afraid I shall have to spoil a merry evening."

Alice was out in the garden conversing with a handsome young captain in the Regulars. She saw Heyward before he saw her, and in a gay voice called out:

"Looking for someone, Major Heyward?"

Heyward's face lit up and with hands outstretched he came towards her. The young captain realised he was not wanted and retired.

"Jove," cried Heyward, "I've looked forward to this!" He would have taken her in his arms, but she held him off and eyed him with a critical smile.

"You haven't changed a bit, Duncan."

"Can you blame me? You've no right to look so beautiful."

Alice was not ill-pleased with the compliment, and she tucked her arm in his. "As gallant as ever," she observed with a merry smile.

"And you're just as cruel." The major looked gloomy. "You know, I'd hoped that you might have changed your mind about me."

Sadly the girl shook her head.

"I haven't, Duncan. I'm sorry."

From the ball-room came loud cheering, and Alice gave her escort an inquiring glance.

"I brought dispatches from England," he told her.

They entered the ball-room in time to hear the booming voice of the colonel:

"We march to-morrow!"

Too soon Heyward had to leave Alice and seek out his superior officer. Remembering his duty and being a keen soldier, he expressed his indignation at the lack of discipline among the Colonials.

The colonel gave a gloomy nod of his head.

"The fact of the matter is that they aren't technically under our command," he explained. "They're civilian troops, organised to protect only this territory."

"Then they aren't soldiers at all?"

"No, but they're excellent fighting men." The colonel rubbed his big chin thoughtfully. "They may show no disposition to join our soldiers on the march to Fort William Henry."

Munro was concerned. His orders were to advance upon Fort William Henry and to engage General Montcalm until reinforced by General Webb. The War Office had not taken into account that fully half of his command were Colonials.

"I'll talk to the men," Munro made his decision and turned to Heyward. "Have them assembled, sir."

Alice's First Meeting with Hawkeye

THE drums sounded. The men gathered in the huge square.

From a platform Colonel Munro addressed the soldiers and Colonials. The soldiers cheered, but there was muttering and whispers from the Colonials. Colonel Munro beckoned Heyward to his side and whispered in his ear.

Major Heyward raised his hand for silence. He was confident in his own ability to win the support of the Colonials.

"Men," His powerful voice rang out. "Your colonel has asked me to say a few words. Having just arrived from London, I can assure you that his Majesty King George is eager for your support. I'm sure that, as loyal subjects of the Crown, you will be glad to render this valuable service to his Majesty."

But the appeal did not move the Colonials. They were more ready to "Make them stop that!" came Heyward's peremptory order

listen to Hawkeye, the renowned Colonial scout, who moved among them warning them against leaving their homes. With Hawkeye were his Indian friends, Chingachgook and Uncas, father and son and the last of the one-powerful tribe, the Mohicans.

Hawkeye was a good name for the scout. He was tall, wiry, sharp-featured, and with blue eyes that could glitter like steel and yet soften. He wore the clothes of a trapper, with the skin of a beaver as his headwear, and his long fingers clasped the barrel of a gun. He did not move among the Colonials whispering his warning, but openly and fearlessly.

"While you are cooped up in Fort William Henry, the Indians will burn your homes—butcher your families!" was his warning.

Colonel Munro realised that Hawkeye was swaying the Colonials against him and decided to take a hand in the matter.

"I've just learned that the French are advancing on Fort William Henry," he cried. "You know what that means. If they break through, what will prevent the Indians then from looting and pillaging every settlement this side of Lake George?"

It was a most convincing argument. Winthrop, who was the appointed leader of the Colonials, conferred with some of his officers, and then stepped forward to address Colonel Munro.

"I believe the men will enlist, sir, on one condition—if the Hurons break through, you let them return to protect their homes."

"Agreed!" cried Colonel Munro instantly.

One of the Colonials turned to Hawkeye inquiringly:

"What do you say to that, Hawkeye?"

"I've had my say," said the scout, and, accompanied by his grim, expressionless friends, moved away.

Alice had been allowed by her father to stand near the platform. The girl was very patriotic, and she had watched Hawkeye with growing distaste.

"Who was that impudent rascal?" she asked of her father.

"A fellow they call Hawkeye," was his answer. "A scout, and a good one, too. Seems to have a great deal of influence. Why?"

"Nothing." Alice's eyes gleamed. "Only I'm surprised that a traitor like that is left unhung."

On getting back to the barracks Colonel Munro spoke to an Indian scout, a smooth, evil-looking fellow, who received his instructions and departed in gloomy silence.

"Sullen beggar," commented Heyward, staring after the tall, muscular Indian.

"Name's Magua," Munro smiled. "Best spy I have. He's a Delaware. Had to give him a taste of the cat once—made a man of him."

A hard grin appeared on the major's face.

"Only way to treat savages," was his verdict.

Hawkeye and his Mohican friends were lounging under the trees. He had spoken little since the decision had been made by the Colonials that they would march with the Regulars to Fort William Henry, but the two Indians knew that Hawkeye was doing much thinking and that he was undecided about his own actions. But Hawkeye made a decision quick enough when he sighted the bronzed figure of Magua passing the sentries at headquarters.

"Magua!" he exclaimed. "I wonder what that weasel is doing here?"

November 28th, 1936.

"Him scout," said Chingachgook. "Him say him Delaware."

Hawkeye frowned.

"I bet a rifle against a powder horn that he's a Huron!" The two Indians exchanged glances of alarm. The scout saw their expression and nodded as if their concern settled the issue. "I think we'd better warn Munro; he's not very smart about trapping weasels. Come!"

At the colonel's headquarters Cora and Alice were busy packing for their long journey. There had been a certain amount of argument with their father, but when they stated that they refused to stay in Albany he gave in, as he usually did. The main door was open, and Hawkeye and the two Indians stood there for nearly a minute before Cora looked up and gave a little cry of startled alarm. Alice glanced round and, seeing Hawkeye, her expression became severe.

"What do you want?"

"I want to talk to the colonel," coolly answered Hawkeye.

"Colonel Munro is not here."

"It's sort of important, ma'am."

Alice was indignant at his sharp tone, and bridled at once. She decided that the more she saw of this man the more she detested him.

"I'm quite sure the colonel would not be interested in anything you might have to say," she said coldly.

"He'd be an awful fool, then," Hawkeye retorted. "I came here to be of service."

"You! Of service!" Alice laughed scornfully. "If you want to be of service, then why aren't you in uniform?"

Hawkeye just grinned as if amused.

"Maybe I have too much sense to wear a red coat in the woods."

All this while Uncas had been staring with obvious fascination at Cora, and the timid girl shrank before the Indian's compelling gaze. Chingachgook observed his son's interest, and his usually impassive features showed strong disapproval.

The incident ended with Alice rushing to the door, imperiously motioning the three men away and slamming it in their faces. Hawkeye shrugged his shoulders and made no further attempt to warn Colonel Munro; but he would certainly have done something if he had been present when the troops left Albany. As the main trail was through dense forest land, where there was just a chance of attack from French or Indians, it was suggested by Magua that he should take the girls by a short trail that he alone knew. Major Heyward should accompany the girls. Colonel Munro thought the idea excellent, and so did Heyward.

It was soon after dawn when the drums beat and the trumpets sounded. The army lined up for the march. The Colonial irregulars with colours flying were in the lead, behind followed a long line of transport wagons and camp followers, with the British regulars in the rearguard. As the army marched out of Albany to the sound of cheering it little knew of the hardships that lay ahead.

Magua's Treachery

AFTER travelling some ten miles Heyward's party, with the two girls and the Indian guide, turned off at a trail leading north from the main road. Their first day's journey seemed uneventful enough—in fact, it seemed to the girls a wonderful picnic. But they might not have been so cheerful if they could have seen and understood the actions of Magua. Whenever they broke camp the guide stayed behind to put out the fire. He held a blanket over the embers so that when he drew the blanket aside a huge billow of white smoke shot skywards. Had Heyward been blessed with knowledge of the Indians he might have been alarmed at the sound of a wolf call that rang out many times from the distance. He had no idea that the woods were alive with silent, swift-moving figures—Hurons in full war paint.

But the major did not expect treachery, and when Magua suggested that the party halt beside a pool to water the horses he made no objection.

Scarce had the girls and Heyward seated themselves beneath a great tree than the underbrush parted and four savage Hurons rushed towards them. Cora gave a scream of fear and clung to Alice, whilst Heyward leapt to his feet and pulled out a pistol, but Magua knocked his hand aside.

"No—these my people."

"Well, what do they want?" demanded Heyward, eyeing the four savages that circled them with anger and suspicion. Even the arrogant officer could see their attitude was not friendly.

"Want Paleface squaws." Magua grinned evilly.

Heyward faced the Indian.

"If this is treachery, Indian, I'll—" Again he levelled his pistol, but immediately strong arms grabbed him from behind. Magua's strong fingers wrested away the pistol and stepped back.

"Magua great warrior." Boastfully he tapped his massive chest. He whipped aside his blanket to reveal half-healed welts on his back. "White Chief Munro flog Magua like a dog. Now Magua wipe out scars. Squaws live, you die—slow death." The malicious joy in the steely blue eyes would have terrified most men. Heyward glared his defiance and struggled vainly.

The Indians seized the terrified girls and began to drag them towards the trees. Suddenly there was the report of a gun and one of the girl's captors spun round and slumped to the ground in a heap. Immediately afterwards there came another report, and this time the Huron who was holding Alice fell writhing to the ground. From the trees came a triumphant war whoop.

"Mohicans!" yelled Magua, and with his two unwounded companions vanished among the trees. There came the report of a gun again, and one of the Hurons crashed to the ground, but he got to his feet and at a staggering gait continued his flight.

Heyward tore across to one of the fallen Hurons and grabbed up the Redskin's musket, but the treacherous Magua was out of sight. Now, however, two more Indians, scalping knives in hand, emerged from the underbush. Heyward pointed the gun in their direction, but Cora grabbed his arm.

"Don't shoot!" she cried. "Can't you see they're different from the others?"

"I don't trust any of them," Heyward cried, and brushed her to one side. Once more he sighted the musket.

From behind him came a calm and mocking voice.

"If your aim is as bad as your judgment, major, I don't imagine there's much danger of your hitting 'em."

Alice stared in amazement at the smiling Hawkeye, who leaned on his gun and surveyed them with a certain amount of contempt. Heyward was first of all very surprised, but his reaction was one of anger. The scout's whole attitude infuriated him.

"What are you doing here?" he demanded.

"Among other things, trying to save you from being burned at the stake—if you aren't too green to burn."

A cry from Alice caused Hawkeye to smile cynically. The girl was pointing at the Mohicans, who were busy collecting the scalps of their fallen foes.

"Make them stop that," came Heyward's peremptory order as he clutched Hawkeye's arm.

"It's too late to put them back," Hawkeye answered. "And scalps to the Indians are like your medals."

Again from the distance sounded the wolf cry, but this time there were ears to interpret.

"What is it?" Cora cried nervously. "Wolves?"

Hawkeye grinned and nodded. "On two legs and headed this way—follow me."

"But our horses?" shouted Heyward, making no attempt to follow. "We will ride them."

"You won't! I had them killed."

Heyward was nearly speechless. "Killed, you fool! What for?"

"Think yourself lucky that I was fool enough to suspect treachery from Magua, who posed to Colonel Munro as a Delaware, that the same fool was able to dog your trail and be here when the Hurons attacked you. But for a fool you would be now on your way to be burnt in a most unpleasant manner. The same fool destroyed the horses because Indians can hear a horse for miles in the woods."

Again the wolf cry rang out, and this time very much closer. It was answered with another wolf cry in another direction. Chingachgook impatiently jerked Heyward's elbow and circled his scalp with his forefinger in a manner that made the girls shudder.

Hawkeye took hold of the girls by their arms.

"Quick now!" His voice was no longer a drawl, but brisk, like someone issuing a command. "We must get away from here if we want to sleep with our hair on our heads."

The Flight

SCARCE had Hawkeye led them into the densest part of the forest than Magua and twenty Hurons appeared in the clearing. Eagerly they searched about for the trail of their quarry, muttering ominously when they saw that their fellow Indians had been scalped. Finally they found the horse tracks, but they muttered curses when they found only the carcasses of the slaughtered animals. The Hurons were not to be thrown off the scent, and finally Magua picked up the proper trail.

In the meantime, Hawkeye was driving his party relentlessly. The girls hampered any swift progress, as their long dresses kept catching in the bushes and brambles. Their arms and legs were flailed. Now and again Hawkeye made unaccountable pauses—snatching Alice's scarf to drop it far off the trail, forcing them to wade for hundreds of yards along the bed of a stream.

At last sheer exhaustion caused Cora to sink to the ground, and Hawkeye was forced to call a brief halt. With a muttered request to Heyward to stay by the girls, the scout and the two Mohicans vanished among the trees.

Alice had protested at Hawkeye snatching her scarf and she had flashed her eyes when he had forced them into the water, but when Heyward, who was smarting under the way he had been tricked by Magua, began to grumble that the scout was exaggerating the danger, she began to defend him.

"He doesn't impress me as a man given to exaggeration," she told

Heyward. "We should all be dead or worse than dead but for his timely appearance."

"Your attitude towards him seems to have changed," sneered Heyward. "Only this morning you talked about him as a traitor."

"My attitude has changed—I think I was wrong," Alice admitted frankly. "After all, Duncan, when you consider that he dislikes us, it's rather generous of him to devote so much time to our rescue."

"If it is a rescue," Heyward said darkly.

The bushes parted and Uncas had returned.

"Huron no find trail yet," he muttered, and moved towards the tree, against which the exhausted Cora was reposing. He gathered some moss and made a cushion for her head. Cora, alarmed when he first approached, now smiled her thanks and lay down wearily.

"You sleep now," Uncas whispered. Impossible to mistake the reverence and adoration in the young Indian's eyes. Cora stared at him curiously.

"You're not a bit what I thought an Indian would be like. You're gentle for a warrior."

Uncas smiled for the first time. "Chief's daughter rest," he urged "Uncas watch."

While Cora slept Chingachgook and Hawkeye were busy concealing the trail and planning out how best to escape. They came to the river-bank, and here they found a half-dozen or so Huron canoes. A lone Huron was on guard. Chingachgook poised his tomahawk and flung it with all his strength at the sentry. The tomahawk caught the man in the shoulder and he toppled to the ground. Hawkeye and Chingachgook rushed forward, leaping into a couple of canoes—the Indian taking the larger one. The impetus of their leap carried the canoes out into the stream. They began to paddle furiously upstream.

"Put those men in irons!" shouted Major Heyward.

Cora was still sleeping when they returned. She was awakened, and the two girls rushed to the river-bank where the canoes were beached.

Heyward felt that he was playing a very minor part in this rescue and chose to become suspicious again.

"Where do you intend to take us?" he asked brusquely.

Hawkeye read the other's mind and grinned.

"Major, I am not asking you to trust me or to go along with me, but I am taking the ladies. If you'd rather wait for the Hurons, why, that's your affair."

Heyward glared, but stepped almost meekly into the large canoe. Hawkeye ordered Cora, Chingachgook and Uncas to go with him. He gestured for Alice to step into the smaller canoe. As the two canoes moved away from the bank a shot rang out. The wounded sentry had managed to crawl to his musket, and with a final convulsive movement had pulled the trigger, thus warning the other Hurons.

The sound of the shot caused Hawkeye and the others to paddle furiously. There was need for haste, for Magua and the rest of the band came to the river-bank to find two of their canoes missing. They clambered aboard the remainder and drove the canoes through the water at terrific speed. Hawkeye, astern of the smaller canoe, saw his pursuers, and ceased paddling. He waited until they were within range and then calmly fired. The Huron steering the leading canoe toppled into the water. There was momentary confusion among the pursuers. Heyward, seeing what Hawkeye had done, took up a musket and fired—his bullet struck a Huron on the shoulder.

"No good," Uncas called out. "Shoot through the head like Hawkeye."

The pursuers opened fire. Hawkeye's second shot found its mark, and another Huron marksman toppled overboard. Then he began to paddle swiftly and came alongside the bigger canoe.

"Take the right fork," Hawkeye yelled to Uncas. "Meet me at the falls—I'll lead them off."

The bullets were splashing about them as the two canoes took to the paddles. At the fork of the swift-flowing stream they separated, Uncas taking the right, but Hawkeye lingering long enough to be sighted by his pursuers. As he had hoped, the Hurons followed him.

Hawkeye was drawing away when a bullet fired by Magua struck the canoe just at the waterline. Despite all Alice's efforts with her cupped hands the canoe began to fill. Paddling desperately, the scout reached a bend in the river and was out of sight. Hastily he drove towards the shore.

"As soon as we touch leap and fling yourself flat in the nearest cover," he ordered.

Alice did as she was ordered as soon as the water-logged canoe grounded. Then Hawkeye leapt out after her, and dragging the canoe after him, disappeared into the dense foliage.

Lying flat, they watched the river. Alice heaved a sigh of relief when the Huron canoes flashed past.

"A hit close that!" she panted with a forced smile.

"We're not out of it yet." Hawkeye spoke grimly. He frowned as if deep in thought. "I know of a shelter ahead where we can lie hidden until sundown."

But this refuge was denied them.

Alice gave a gasp of horror when they reached the settlement—it was nothing but blackened ashes, and stretched out on the burnt ground were a number of charred bodies.

"What happened?" Alice asked, and buried her face in her hands to shut out the terrible spectacle.

"They had their hair cut by the Huron barbers," Hawkeye spoke with a twisted grin.

"How can you speak so unfeelingly?" Alice was shocked.

"Unfeeling?" Hawkeye gave a harsh laugh. "I blazed the trail that brought them here. This is how my parents died—fire and scalping knife!"

"I'm sorry," Alice touched his arm.

"This won't be all," Hawkeye told her. "With the men at Fort William Henry no settlement is safe."

Alice for the first time understood the reluctance of the Colonials to leave "I wish father could see this," she said, gazing at the scene of desolation.

"That won't make any difference," Hawkeye answered. "He has his own duty to perform."

Meanwhile, the larger canoe had been beached near a cave along the river-bank, and here the party took refuge. Hawkeye's face was white and drawn.

"That fool," he muttered venomously. "Separating our party like this."

Chingachgook heard and grunted.

"Two party alive—good. One party dead—no good." Suddenly the Indian put his head to the ground and appeared to be listening.

"Why are you doing that?"

Chingachgook looked up.

"Beaver downstream. Indian sentry.

When canoe come beaver flap tail."

Cora, seated near Uncas, was worrying over the absence of her sister, and it was Uncas who reassured her that Hawkeye would find a way. She allowed herself to be comforted and pointed to a tortoise-shaped mark on his chest.

"That means Mohican chief," Uncas explained.

"Are you taking us to your people?"

Uncas became sad.

"My people all gone. Killed in Huron wars."

"You're alone." Cora was full of sympathy. Her smile was sad. "So am I. My warrior died at sea."

Uncas became even more mournful. He offered the girl a chunk of pemican from the pouch slung over his shoulder.

Chingachgook scowled.

"Mohican chiefs no wait on squaws," he cried fiercely.

The sound of canoe paddles now was audible even to Heyward. Hawkeye beached the canoe, which he had repaired, and helped Alice to jump ashore. The two parties were united. Cora jumped up and flung herself into Alice's arms.

"Thank heaven you're safe."

Heyward looked at Hawkeye with baffled fury. This wretched fellow, probably the son of some lowly settler, was besting him at every turn. It irked him to be beholden to Hawkeye for his life and for the safety of Alice and Cora. Hawkeye's eyes never wavered, and with a muttered word of thanks Heyward moved away to speak to Alice. It was no comfort to hear Alice singing the praises of Hawkeye.

Fort William Henry

AT Fort William Henry, Colonel Munro awaited the arrival of his daughters. He paced the ramparts in his anxiety, repeatedly asking the sentries if they had seen any signs of Major Heyward's party. He did not suspect treachery, but feared that the guide had either lost the trail or that they had fallen in with a party of French. Their own march to the fort had been uneventful.

Late one afternoon he was questioning a sentry when the man suddenly shot out a finger.

"Look! There's a flicker in the woods—like a torch light, sir."

Munro turned eagerly to his aide.

"Hurry!" he snapped out. "Send a detail to guide them in."

The words were scarce spoken when the whole woods seemed to burst into flames, dozens of bright points at regular intervals.

"The French," cried the colonel.

"Sound the alarm!"

By forced marches Montcalm had reached the fort ahead of time. The garrison was surrounded.

Colonel Munro was in despair as he watched the soldiers tumbling out of their quarters. What chance had Alice and Cora of getting through to the fort now? He had not much time to dwell upon his own personal anguish. British and Colonial troops were pouring from the inner stockade, muskets in hand, to man the outer breastworks. The heavy guns were swung into position, with gun crews standing by with ammunition. There began some desultory firing, but this ceased when the officers realised the French were out of range.

The fort was little more than a long stockade, surrounded by earthworks built around heavy timbers, with a wide moat running around three sides. The unprotected side faced a wide lake, swampy on all sides and looked upon as impassable. The importance of the fort as an outpost was indicated by the fact that General Montcalm—the same that later fell before Quebec—headed the invading army. Accompanying him were his Huron allies, of whom Magua's band were a part. The French were superior not only in numbers, but in artillery and ammunition. The only hope of the beleaguered forces lay in holding out long enough for relief to arrive.

Montcalm was discussing this possibility with his officers as he rode along his lines. As they passed a group of Hurons, one of the Indians suddenly raised his rifle and fired at a log floating on the surface of the lake.

The French general reproved the man in his gentle style.

"Pardon, my friend. We brought you here to shoot Redcoats—not floating logs."

The Huron moistened his finger and held it up against the wind.

"Log float against wind," he cried.

General Montcalm was startled, and realised the man was right. Other Hurons began to fire, and the bullets splashed round the log.

The Hurons were right. Behind the long and tangled undergrowth were concealed Hawkeye, his Indian friends and their charges, the girls supporting themselves by clinging to the branches, whilst the men paddled frantically with their free hands and their feet. The bullets were coming dangerously close. The swimmers redoubled their efforts, and gradually they drew nearer the fort. Montcalm had instructed the Hurons and some of his own soldiers to make use of the banks. With several of his officers he followed, so interested was the general in the log that floated against the wind.

Hawkeye realised the desperate situation.

"We'll have to run for it," he called out. "We're in shallow water."

As they rushed up the shore, bending half double, they presented a not very difficult target. The girls were imped by their skirts, and though the men could have saved themselves they stayed to lend a helping hand.

Monteahn saw and suddenly threw up his hand.

"Stop firing!" he ordered. "They're women."

The Hurons stared at him in amazement, but obeyed the order long enough to give Hawkeye and the others time to reach the ramparts in safety. The gates were flung open to receive them, and hastily clauged shut. Alice and Cora flung themselves into their father's arms.

"My darlings," he cried hoarsely. "You're safe, safe at last!" He stared over their heads at Heyward. "I'm very grateful I'll never forget this."

"Don't think me, sir," Heyward answered with a glance at Hawkeye. "The credit belongs to this scout, sir."

Munro at once recognised the man who had warned the Colonials against going to Fort William Henry.

"I hadn't suspected you as an ally," he said with a friendly smile.

"I'm not," Hawkeye replied stiffly. "My only reason for helping the major was because of the ladies."

"At any rate"—Munro held out his hand—"accept my heartfelt thanks—my daughters mean a great deal to me."

Then it was Alice's turn to thank the scout, and her eyes were very bright as she laid a hand almost timidly on his arm.

"Will you come to the colonel's quarters?" she asked. "I should like to thank you, too."

Heyward was instantly very jealous, and rudely pushed in between them.

"I'll attend to that, my dear." He eyed Hawkeye angrily. "And reward him personally."

"Any reward I've got coming from you I can do without," Hawkeye's eyes narrowed, then without another word he turned on his heel and strode after Chingachgook and Uncas.

The Selge

FROM the treacherous spy, Magua, the French general learned that the English were two thousand strong and that their train had consisted of ten wagons. Montealm guessed that the besieged must be running short of food and ammunition, and gave the order for his heavy guns to open the attack soon after midnight.

That night, within the fort, Uncas and Cora stood talking on the ramparts. The English girl was greatly attracted to the gentle Uncas.

"I wonder if we'll ever meet again?"

"Some trails cross many times," Uncas answered solemnly.

"Some trails cross only once."

"I shall never forget you, Uncas."

"As many dawns as are mine," Uncas spoke solemnly, "so many shall my prayers be to the Great Spirit for the one with moon in her hair."

Not very far away, in a cannon embrasure stood Hawkeye and Chingachgook. The old Mohican stared moodily across at the young people, clearly silhouetted by the moon.

"Fair hair make heart of Uncas weak like water."

"Don't blame them, Sagamore."

The Indian eyed the scout curiously. "Hawkeye's heart like water, too."

When Chingachgook had gone Hawkeye leaned against the parapet, staring dreamily into the distance towards the lights of the French camp. A light footstep made him turn sharply.

"Alice!"

The girl gave him a reproving glance. "I asked you to come and see me," she said. "You didn't. Why?"

"I'm not much of a hand at saying good-bye."

"You're leaving?"

"Yes."

"But you can't." Alice was dismayed. "You'll never get through."

"I think I'll manage it." Hawkeye turned away as if the sight of her were more than he could endure. "I wasn't born to live in a stockade."

"Neither was I," whispered Alice, and drew close to him.

Inexplicably Hawkeye found himself holding the girl close in his arms. A heavy burst of firing brought them both to their senses.

"The French guns," Alice cried, and glanced at him eagerly. "Hawkeye, why don't you stay? Badly we have need of scouts."

Hawkeye nodded thoughtfully.

"Sounds like the French are changing my mind."

Alice laughed delightedly.

"I hope Montealm is decorated for this."

For ten days the bombardment continued without ceasing. Yet the starved garrison, outmanned, held out against the superior forces, and the British flag still fluttered over the battered ramparts. Munro would have been confident of holding out for months had it not been for the grumbling of the Colonials.

Why had the promised relief army, under General Webb, failed to arrive? They were not concerned so much with their own fate as fear for the settlements—for their homes, their wives and children. The Hurons could overrun the country whilst they were bottled up in the fort. They were sullen and on the verge of mutiny because nothing was being done by the British armies.

Major Heyward received a deputation and assured them that General Webb had started on the march with the fort as his destination.

"Suppose he doesn't get here?" one Colonial asked.

"Then we have three choices," spoke Heyward firmly. "Starving to death, fighting to the last man, or striking our colours—I promise you it won't be the last."

The muttering and murmuring that followed caused Heyward to hasten to Colonel Munro's headquarters. A hasty council of officers was called. Heyward suggested that if a messenger be sent to link up with General Webb it would appease the Colonials. An Indian might slip through the surrounding army where a white man would have no chance of succeeding. It was decided to send Uncas.

Uncas slipped through the gate and broke into a run in an effort to cover the ground separating the fort from the swamp. A French picket opened fire, but Uncas ran on unscathed. An Indian marksman, with bow and arrow, was more successful. Uncas fell to the ground with an arrow shaft quivering in his shoulder.

Without counting the danger, Heyward dashed out of the gate. Hawkeye was about to follow, but Colonel Munro pulled him back.

Magua seized the struggling Cora in a fierce grip.

"Keep him covered, you fool!" the colonel yelled.

It was as well that Munro gave these orders, otherwise two good men would have perished. The Indian marksman drew his bow for another shaft—Hawkeye's bullet struck the wretch between the eyes.

By now the whole French camp was alarmed, and soon French and Indian warriors were rushing out towards the wounded Uncas. But Heyward got there first, slung Uncas over his powerful shoulders, and headed back for the fort. Protected by the deadly shooting of Hawkeye, that drove the enemy to cover, Heyward reached the fort in safety.

Hawkeye held out his hand. "He is my friend," he said. "I'm—I'm grateful."

It was Heyward's chance to have ended an enmity, but his retort made it all the more bitter.

Ignoring the proffered hand, he spoke harshly.

"You needn't be. I didn't go to rescue him—but to keep a valuable dispatch from falling into enemy hands."

Traitor or Loyalist ?

UNCAS' wound was not so serious as expected. It was the force of the blow that had brought the Indian down. He hardly winced when Chingachgook, brushing the surgeon to one side, grasped the arrow shaft with both hands and forced the barb through. Uncas was taken to the fort hospital, where Cora insisted upon nursing him. She was sitting by his bed when Hawkeye entered with Chingachgook.

"Is he all right?" Hawkeye inquired. "No," muttered Chingachgook in his own language. "Got squaw fever."

Hawkeye had to laugh, but his smile faded when he noticed on a table the arrow taken from the wound.

"Ottawa arrow!" he cried, and exchanged a swift glance with Chingachgook. The Ottawa were a large tribe and notoriously cruel in their treatment of white prisoners.

As a result of that arrow Hawkeye and Chingachgook the next night went out on a reconnoitre on their own. As they sneaked towards the French lines they came upon two Indian pickets. Hawkeye's hands throttled one to silence, whilst Chingachgook's tomahawk settled the other poor wretch. Stealthily they crept towards the French lines.

Around a huge camp-fire Magua was addressing his fellow Hurons. His paint-daubed features were contorted with fury as he shouted out fiery words.

"Must we stay," he demanded, "and watch big guns firing at Yengeese fort? Our brothers, the Ottawa, are leaving—they will gather many scalps in Yengeese village. I do not speak with crooked tongue. There is no honour for Hurons if others gather Paleface scalps. We must make our tomahawks red with the blood of our enemies. I have spoken."

The tom-toms thumped. The Hurons broke into a savage war dance, and shook their spears and tomahawks.

Hawkeye and Chingachgook waited to hear no more, but sped back as swiftly as possible to Fort William Henry, where they sought out at once Munro's headquarters. The council of officers was summoned, but Heyward derided Hawkeye's story as exaggerated.

Hawkeye, in his anger, pounded on the colonel's desk with his clenched fist.

November 28th, 1936.

"I tell you we saw them—heard them. Magua's working them into a frenzy." He turned appealing to Winthrop, leader of the Colonial irregulars. "If they and the Ottawa raid the settlements it will be the bloodiest massacre the frontier has ever known." He spun round to face Munro again. "And the blood, colonel, will not be all on their hands."

"But my good fellow," Munro answered. "You forget that Montcalm is in command of them, and I assure you that he's a soldier and a gentleman, not a butcher."

"And I assure you," Hawkeye retorted, "that he hasn't the power to stop them."

But Colonel Munro was stubborn. It was in vain that Hawkeye reminded him of his promise to release the Colonials for the protection of their homes and families.

"My promise still holds, gentlemen," the colonel cried. "But I must have more definite proof than this man's word."

Winthrop was indignant.

"His word has been good enough on the frontier a long time before you came, colonel," he said coldly.

When the Colonials heard the news their rebellion became outright. A number of the single men agreed to stay with the British, but those with families decided to abandon the fort at once. Hawkeye, fully aware of the consequences of violating military law, aided them in their departure, showing them the trail through the swamp by which he had reached the lake. He elected to stay behind, and naturally Chingachgook and Uncas stayed with him.

The last Colonial had slipped over the parapet and was well on his way to the swamp when a British picket observed their shadows and rushed off to inform Major Heyward. That British officer rushed to the parapet in high rage and gave orders for the soldiers to fire at the deserters.

Without hesitation Hawkeye and the Mohicans emerged from their concealment and grabbed the muskets of the soldiers. The fight was brief, but it enabled the Colonials to escape. Hawkeye, Chingachgook and the still bandaged Uncas were overpowered.

"Put those men in irons," Heyward shouted, and laughed harshly as he saw the blood-streaked face of Hawkeye.

The three men were committed to the dungeons to await trial and sentence for their insubordination.

Somehow Alice managed to wheedle permission out of the sentry to see Hawkeye.

"Why did you do it?"

"You saw the settlement after an Indian raid," he reminded her.

"But they trusted you."

"The Colonials trusted your father," was his answer.

Alice was torn between two loyalties. "I don't know the right and wrong of it," she sobbed, "but I know they'll hang you as a traitor."

Hawkeye was nothing daunted, and grinned in his mocking, contemptuous way.

"Knowing the redecoats, I bet they don't tie the knot right."

But Alice refused to allow such levity. She came close to the small grille.

"Oh, Hawkeye, why didn't you leave with the others?"

His expression softened.

"I guess I'm in love with you."

Alice appealed in vain to Heyward and her father for mercy. The crime was mutiny, and mutiny must be punished by hanging. That was army regulations. The fact that Hawkeye had performed what he thought was his duty, that he had remained behind to face the consequences, those weighed nothing against the letter of the law.

"That's the army and that's justice," Heyward said with a smirk of satisfaction.

His words roused Alice to fury, and the two men stared at the white-faced girl in amazement as she accused them of being murderers.

"Justice!" she cried scornfully. "If that's your idea of justice, then the sooner French guns blow the British Army out of America, the better it will be for the Colonies."

Heyward was horrified.

"Alice, you don't know what you're saying!"

"Yes I do!" she retorted. "For the first time in my life I'm speaking from my heart and not out of a book of regulations. And if it's sedition, I'm proud of it."

From the distance came the roll of drums. Colonel Munro hastened to the window. In front of the earthworks stood a French officer, white flag in hand, seeking a parley.

The Massacre

THE parley was arranged. From the French lines came Montcalm himself, attended by a group of officers, and stopped half-way from the fort. A similar group, headed by Munro and Heyward, advanced from the fort to meet them. From the distance the Hurons watched the proceedings with sullen suspicion.

Montcalm was the first to speak.

"Colonel Munro, I have known you as a gallant antagonist. I have long realised that even outnumbered as you are, it would merely be a waste of breath to invite you to surrender."

"You are correct in your assumption, sir," came Colonel Munro's grim reply. Montcalm smiled.

"As a soldier I know that an officer of your proven courage does not surrender until his cause is proved without a doubt hopeless."

Munro and Heyward exchanged glances. There was something ominous about the French general's words. They were not to be kept long in suspense.

"Colonel," stated Montcalm, "my scouts intercepted this dispatch intended for you. Pray read it."

Colonel Munro began to read, and Heyward saw the strong face twitch—saw him bow his head. Silently he handed the message to Heyward.

The dispatch read:

"Colonel Munro, Fort William Henry. No reinforcements available—impossible to send provisions without escort—advise surrender of fort."

The signature was "Webb."

"It's a trick," protested Heyward.

Munro shook his head.

"It's Webb's signature," he said with a gloomy shake of his head.

"You have no alternative," Montcalm's voice was gentle. "Your own general advises surrender."

The quick-tempered Heyward answered and addressed his remarks to his superior officer.

"I know the temper of our men, Colonel Munro. Rather than spend the rest of the war in a French prison, they'll fight to the end."

The speech revived Munro, who flung up his head.

"You have heard your answer, Monsieur le Marquis," he saluted.

"Wait," Montcalm stayed him with a gesture of his hand. "I beg you not to sign the death warrant of your men until you have heard my terms. The fort must be destroyed. Your men must give up their arms and return to England. For the rest, ask what you will."

Munro stared at the French general incredulously.

"The honours of war?"

"Granted."

"My colours?"

The general bowed. "Carry them to England and show them to your king."

Tears came into the colonel's eyes at this unexpected generosity on the part of his gallant opponent.

"I accept your terms, sir," he answered at once. "The fort is yours."

By eventide the French and Hurons were in possession of the fort. The English, stripped of their arms, but still proudly bearing their colours, prepared to line up in military formation for their departure. Within the houses in the stockade the women were packing their few possessions.

But the Hurons had broken into the rum stores, and their whoops, their threatening gestures, their hostile attitudes, caused some alarm. Montcalm, preparing to strike camp, had only sent a handful of officers and men to take over the fort, so that the Hurons greatly outnumbered the French.

Hawkeye and his Mohican friends, still imprisoned in their cell, watching the scene through the grated windows, realised what the Hurons were shouting and their attitude towards the vanquished defenders. Chingachgook drew his finger round the top of his head in a scalping gesture, and Hawkeye nodded.

An Ottawa chieftain wandered past the prison, and Hawkeye decided hastily on a plan. In the Ottawa tongue he called out:

"Come here, great chief."

Suspecting nothing the Indian approached to stare at the prisoners. Suddenly Hawkeye's arms shot through the grilled window, grasping the Indian by the windpipe. Uncas reached through and seized the knife and tomahawk. The Ottawa chieftain slumped to the ground, strangled into unconsciousness by Hawkeye's powerful grip. With the aid of the tomahawk the prisoners attacked the bars, but before they could escape the massacre had commenced.

Magua had worked his warriors into a fury. Scores of drink-crazed Indians were wandering round the stockade, brandishing their knives and making threatening gestures at the unarmed British. Magua's voice rang out so that all could hear.

"The French tell us there is peace!" he raved. "They tell us to put away our hatchets. But your squaws will laugh with scorn if you return without honour. There are plenty Paleface scalps. We go get them!"

He raised his tomahawk and gave a wild whoop of malignant fury. The Hurons whooped their approval, and in mad haste charged upon their defenceless prey. That was the beginning of the massacre.

Gallantly but vainly several unarmed British officers sought to bar the way of the infuriated Redskins. They were cut down with tomahawks. The Indians swept on towards the houses inside the stockade. They would butcher the women and children first, but some of the younger women they would carry off as prisoners. Men that tried to fight them with their hands were cut down and scalped.

When the Indians broke into the barracks and attacked the women like a pack of bloodthirsty wolves, one poor woman sought safety in flight, but she was pounced upon by a giant Huron, who seized her by the hair and began dragging her across the ground. Her shrieks brought French soldiers to the rescue. A general mêlée ensued, the drink-maddened Indians making no distinction between Paleface friend or foe. The French were outnumbered—an urgent message was sent to Montcalm that the Indians were massacring the British.

With his knife Uncas blazed a notch in a tree.

Cora and Alice had barred the door of their room, and Alice had armed herself with a heavy horse-pistol. Colonel Munro, with two officers—armed with swords—were rushing to the rescue of the girls when Magua appeared. The treacherous Huron smiled exultantly and fired. The gallant colonel fell, mortally wounded. Others in the band shot down the two officers. Magua and several of his Hurons hurled themselves against the barred door. It gave way, and as the Indians poured in Alice fired, and the foremost dropped. One of the band wrenched the gun from her hands, and Magua seized the struggling Cora in a fierce grip.

Heyward had been cornered, but by desperate fighting he had killed or wounded the Indians attacking him. He reached the scene in time to see the girls being carried off by the Hurons. Recklessly he set out in pursuit. The Hurons sealed the barricade and vanished with their prey into the woods—they had seen French troops rushing towards the fort, and Magua had an idea that it might not be wise to stay.

It took Hawkeye and his companions some time to get out of their prison. Not long before, Hawkeye had killed a Huron and secured a pistol. Chingachgook and Uncas also armed themselves. The three did much to prevent all the women being massacred by their fearless fighting.

Eventually they fought their way to the room which had housed Cora and Alice. They read the signs of a struggle, and rushed out as General Montcalm made his belated arrival. The French general managed to put a stop to the massacre which had now become general. The ground was strewn with dead bodies. Many of the Indians sought cover in the woods, but some in their drunken frenzy tried to attack the French and were shot.

Near the barracks Montcalm came upon the body of the dying Colonel Munro. He knelt to the ground and begged forgiveness. With a feeble effort Munro held out his hand.

Hawkeye and his Mohicans soon found out that Magua and a band of Hurons had carried off Cora and Alice. Stealthily and swiftly they set out in pursuit. They came upon an officer wandering aimlessly in the forest. The once-faultless uniform was in rags and tatters. It was Heyward, and armed only with his sword he turned at bay as if to attack them, but he lowered his sword-point at a gesture from Hawkeye.

"You are seeking Cora and Alice?"

"They were carried off by Magua and his cursed Hurons," answered Heyward. "I lost the trail in these woods."

"We are seeking them also." For once Hawkeye's words were spoken softly. "Only an Indian or one skilled in Indian lore could follow the trail."

Heyward ungraciously consented to join the party.

"However," he said defiantly to Hawkeye, "I want you to understand that I still consider you a mutineer, and if we're ever under British jurisdiction again, I shall enjoy pressing charges against you."

"Very well, major," mocked Hawkeye, and his eyes glinted. "But don't forget that I am in command of this party, and you will obey the orders I shall give. Come, there is no time to waste."

In single file, with Hawkeye leading and Heyward in the rear, the little party hastened along the trail of the fleeing Hurons.

After a while Hawkeye called a halt. Chingachgook placed his ear near the ground.

"Huron village plenty close," the Indian stated.

"It is best for us to split up into two parties," Hawkeye decided. "Four are too large a party, and the Hurons are sure to have scouts on the watch. Chingachgook and I will bear to the west; you, major, will go with Uncas. Do as he does, because the Hurons must have no suspicion."

After a few more words of conference the party split up, and soon Uncas was leading Heyward along the bed of a narrow stream. At last Uncas left the stream, and Heyward saw the Indian begin to examine the ground. With his knife he blazed a notch in a tree.

"What's that for?" whispered Heyward.

"Magua and Paleface squaws come this way," answered Uncas.

"Oughtn't we to go back and find Hawkeye and tell him?"

The Indian shook his head.

"Hawkeye soon find he take wrong trail. Come this way and see blaze. Know right trail. They follow."

After a while Uncas announced that the Huron village was very close. He asked Heyward to lay hidden and wait for the appearance of Hawkeye and Chingachgook. He would go on and find out all he could of the Huron village and what had happened to the prisoners.

Uncas and Magua

CORA and Alice, captives of the Huron village, were surrounded by Indian warriors, met to decide their fate. Magua claimed Cora as his squaw. Though the girls did not understand the words, it was easy to understand by Magua's gestures, and Cora clung to her taller sister.

"But what of this one?" the Sachem, the wrinkled head man, asked, pointing at Alice.

"This one like warrior,"* Magua answered. "She kill Huron brave—she die in our fire."

Magua approached Cora and laid his hand on the shrinking girl's shoulder. As a scout for Munro he had learned the English tongue readily enough, and his words were clear, though spoken in a harsh whisper. He stared at the girl exultantly.

"I treat you well. You are daughter of little chief. I make you squaw of big chief."

"Why does such a big chief run from his enemies?" Cora answered scornfully. Magua patted her arm.

"Good spirit—chief's squaw." He turned to face the Sachem and again made his demand: "This one my squaw."

"My son." The wrinkled eyes were shrewd. "She is unwilling."

"But I have taken this woman!" shouted the hot-headed, impetuous Huron. "It is for me to say."

But the Sachem had other views and shook his head.

"The Manitou has given us a law. It is for the law to say. She has a right to choose between you and fire."

Magua's face was contorted with fury when Cora said she would rather be burnt than be the squaw of a filthy murderer.

"Until the sun rises Magua wait for answer!" Magua cried, and stalked away.

The girls were dragged back to the November 25th, 1936.

bark-and-grass tepee where they were being kept prisoners. They had to run the gauntlet of a number of snarling old crows who clawed at their faces and spat at them. The girls clung closely to each other.

"Cora—they offer you life," Alice said when they were at last alone in the tepee.

"Don't shame me by even suggesting it," Cora answered determinedly. "Death would be far sweeter."

A gasping cry suddenly came from Cora, and she pointed a shaking hand at the rear wall. A knife appeared, cutting a slit in the bark. The slit widened and a head appeared. It was Uncas. He placed a finger to his lips to warn them to be silent.

As suddenly his head was withdrawn. His sharp ears had heard someone approaching. Magua loomed in the doorway. Alice gave her sister a meaningful glance, and then moved to the side of the Huron.

"Come outside." Alice clasped his arm. "I must talk to you."

The squaws outside, at sight of the white girl, began to screech, hurl curses, and shake their fists menacingly. Alice laughed mockingly, goading them on,

NEXT WEEK'S LONG COMPLETE FILM THRILLERS!

PAT O'BRIEN

—IN—

"CHINA CLIPPER"

It was his great desire to see the United States linked up with the rest of the world by means of air lines. He drove his friends ruthlessly and sacrificed everything to attain his ambition. The drama of a pioneer who refused to admit defeat.

"BLACKMAILER"

An unwelcome guest at a dinner-party has a cat's-eye ring which is said to shine in the dark, and the lights are switched off to prove it. But in the dark the guest is murdered—and blundering Detective-Inspector Killian takes charge of a case which speedily becomes complicated by the murder of yet another guest. A sparkling, mystery thriller, starring William Gargan.

Also

Another big episode of:

"THE ADVENTURES OF REX AND RINTY"

Starring Kane Richmond, Norma Taylor and Rex and Rinty.

only too pleased to create as much noise and diversion as possible. But as she would not answer Magua's question about her reason for speaking with him alone, he became suspicious of her behaviour. He brushed her aside and was about to enter the tepee when Alice gripped his arm.

"Not yet," she cried. "Be patient! I have spoken to her. She will marry you! She will be your squaw! But now, let her rest."

Magua flung her away and dashed into the tepee. It was empty!

His shouts aroused the village. Two braves accompanied him in his pursuit of Uncas and Cora. A close watch was set on Alice.

Uncas was swift of foot. Unencumbered they could never have overtaken him, but Cora was weary and travelled with difficulty over the mountainous trail. They were climbing a narrow path when Magua sighted them. Several shots whined over their heads. The only weapon possessed by Uncas was a tomahawk. At the top of the cliff the trail broadened out on to a ledge, with a drop of many hundreds of feet into a raging torrent. Cora sank exhausted to the ground.

"Leave me!" the girl gasped. "Uncas, save yourself. They won't harm me."

Uncas shook his head.

"Uncas never leave one with moon in her hair," was his answer.

As the first of the Hurons reached the ledge Uncas was on him like a whirlwind. The Huron dropped with a smashed skull. Magua saw his comrade fall and his teeth showed in a vicious snarl. His arm drew back and, as Uncas turned to meet him, Magua's tomahawk struck him full in the side. Writhing on the ground Uncas sought to raise himself on one elbow. But Magua, with a brutal kick, forced the almost lifeless body to the edge of the ledge. Another kick and Uncas went hurtling through the air to the rapids below.

Magua gazed triumphantly upon Cora and reached out to seize her. She, facing him, her eyes courageous, backed slowly until she was poised on the very edge. He laughed exultantly, thinking that now she was his, and stepped forward, but the girl turned swiftly and, as his arms went out to grip her, flung herself impetuously over the edge. Magua recoiled—the Paleface woman had killed herself rather than be his squaw.

Her body struck rocks near the bank and she was killed instantly. Uncas, who had fallen into deep water, had managed to reach the bank. Painfully, Uncas crawled towards her until his outstretched hand was able to touch one of hers—and then his body, too, was still.

Magua and the remaining Huron peered over the cliff, grimly surveying their handiwork. A shot rang out and the Huron slumped down on the ledge, twitched spasmodically and was still. Magua jumped back to safety.

Hawkeye's deadly rifle had fired the shot. Now he began to reload, watching Magua, but Chingachgook shook his head. Hawkeye understood—Magua belonged to Uncas' father. The Mohican strode out of cover, cupped his hands and shouted:

"Magua! Come down!"

Chingachgook stood there with hands folded across his massive chest. Magua accepted the challenge and, tomahawk in hand, began to clamber down the cliff. Armed only with tomahawks the two Indians fought a battle to the death, whilst Hawkeye and Heyward

(Continued on page 94)

A city in the path of disaster. Somewhere in that city, a gang of desperate mail-robbers seeking to escape with their loot, while a determined employee of the Government strives to track them down. A powerful drama of a Service that knows no barriers, starring Ricardo Cortez, Patricia Ellis, Bela Lugosi and Michael Loring

"POSTAL INSPECTOR"

Hazardous Landing

"NEITHER snow, nor rain, nor heat nor gloom of night stays these couriers from the swift completion of their appointed rounds."

Those words, the slogan of the U.S. Mail Department, were running through the mind of Bill Davis as he hunched himself lower in one of the bucket seats aboard a passenger plane that was bound for Millstown.

He was on his way home from Washington, where he and certain other prominent officials of the Postal Service had been commended by the president for the skill and efficiency with which they had handled a gigantic task, the task of transferring the gold reserves of the United States to certain inland cities in accordance with a recent Government edict.

Bill Davis, chief postal inspector for the industrial city of Millstown, was not the only passenger aboard this cabin plane which was flying across Uncle Sam's northern territories. There were about ten other travellers beside himself, the majority of them in a state of high suspense, for the weather conditions were of the vilest sort.

Fog, the greatest enemy of aviation, had spread thickly over the countryside, shrouding the plains and the forests under its evil pall, choking the valleys, hiding the grim and treacherous mountain peaks, making the journey a nightmare of anxiety.

There was no telling what might happen under such conditions. There was always the sinister chance of an accident that might spell death for the divers collection of mortals who had trusted their lives to this winged craft of the skies.

Apart from its human freight, the plane was carrying mail. That was probably why the slogan of the Postal Service was figuring in Bill Davis' thoughts as he stared out through the nearest windows at the dense wreaths of mist which were surging past.

At the same time he was dwelling upon the weakness some individuals showed during a crisis. He himself was a fatalist, and had long since reflected that if he were to meet his end to-night, no amount of feverish concern on his part would change the course of his destiny. On the other hand, the people occupying the seats behind him were making fools of themselves: asking the stewardess all manner of stupid questions that advertised their fear; indicating by look and by word and by gesture that they were on the verge of panic.

Aside from Bill himself, there seemed to be only two other passengers in the plane who were not white to the lips. One was a blonde, clear-eyed and attractive girl who was sitting abreast of him on the other side of the gangway, and who appeared to be perfectly calm and self-possessed. The second person, obviously this girl's maid, was not nearly so calm and self-possessed, but was prevented by nature from revealing any trace of pallor—being an enormous negress whom her young employer had addressed as "Deborah."

Meanwhile, towards the rear of the ship, an infant child in the arms of a nurse was wailing disconsolately, and the sound was adding to the general agitation of the passengers. It even began to play on Bill's nerves to some extent, and it was partly to escape from it for a moment, partly to seek information, that he suddenly rose to his feet and walked forward to the door of the control cabin.

He opened that door and stepped through into the compartment where the pilot and the wireless operator were installed, and, being personally acquainted with both of them, he addressed them in a familiar tone.

"Well, boys," he said cheerfully, "how are we doing?"

"We should be over the Millstown aerodrome in about two minutes," the wireless operator replied.

Bill expressed satisfaction, and then spoke to the pilot.

"Think you'll be able to land all right?" he queried. "Or will you have to go on and try some other field where the soup isn't so thick?"

"We'll make it all right," said the pilot. "We've just been in touch with the aerodrome, and they're going to direct us by radio. There's nothing to it. Anyway, I've ordered 'em to have a plate of ham and eggs ready for me, and no crack-up is going to stop me from keeping my date with that grub."

Bill laughed, and was about to turn back into the passenger cabin when the wireless operator jerked his thumb in that direction.

"How's things in there?" he asked. "Most of 'em are plenty scared," Bill replied. "There's a youngster in there crying, too, and that doesn't help any."

He left the two airmen, and, closing the door of the forward compartment behind him, resumed his seat in the larger cabin. As he did so, the girl with the coloured maidservant leaned across to him.

"Is everything all right?" she inquired.

"Sure," Bill told her. "The people down at the field are going to guide us in by radio. I wish we could do something to keep that child quiet back there, though. She's making everyone jumpy—except you, that is."

The girl smiled at this tribute to her calmness. She was deciding inwardly that she rather liked this young man to whom she was talking. There was something very pleasing about his clean-cut face and the odd mixture of grimness and humour in his expression. He was handsome, too, in his tall, lithe way—almost commanding.

"You don't seem very jumpy yourself," she commented. "As for that baby girl back there, I might know what to do about her if I were in a theatre."

"A theatre?" Bill echoed in a puzzled fashion.

"Yes; I'm Connie Larrimore."

The name seemed to convey nothing to him, and she smiled.

"I see you've never heard of me," she remarked. "Well, I'm not really very important, I suppose—outside of the theatre."

"Forgive my ignorance, Miss Larrimore," he said. "The name does seem kind of familiar, but I'm kept so busy that I seldom get to a show. Er—what do you do on the stage?"

"I sing," Connie Larrimore answered. "That's what I meant when I said I might be able to keep that baby girl quiet."

Bill looked at her quickly, and then all at once he snapped his fingers as if an inspiration had occurred to him.

"Great!" he ejaculated. "Go ahead and sing. You may be able to soothe some of these scared grown-ups, too."

"You mean—sing right here?"

"Why not, Miss Larrimore? It will probably ease things up a bit."

The girl seemed to hesitate at first, and then, realising that there was a good deal of shrewdness in Bill's suggestion, she began to give a rendering of a popular melody which seemed eminently suited to the occasion.

"Here we are together, flying high. We're up in heaven, you and I . . ."

Such were the opening words of the ballad, and she sang them with an easy fluency and a silveriness of tone that nevertheless filled the cabin and arrested the attention of every person there. And, watching her as she smilingly entertained the company with her voice, Bill was not the only one who was held in thrall by the sweetness of that harmony.

The other passengers forgot their alarm, inspired by the courage of this girl and intrigued by the tuneful notes that rose from her lips. Gradually their attention became riveted upon her to the exclusion of everything else, and even that squawling child at the far end of the cabin was subdued into silence before long, as if appeased by that lullaby of the heavens.

Sure enough, Bill's proposal had been a brain-wave, and while the plane was being manoeuvred down through the fog in accordance with instructions wirelessed from the landing field, there was not the slightest sign of uneasiness among the inmates of the ship.

Connie Larrimore continued to sing until the craft had grounded safely in front of the aerodrome buildings, and it was only when the wheels bumped down on terra firma that her listeners were reminded of their situation. Then, with the plane rolling to a standstill and all danger at an end, a spontaneous burst of applause was accorded to the stage star.

A few seconds later the passengers were alighting from the machine, and after thanking her personally for what she had done, Bill Davis escorted Connie and her maid through the fog to the edge of the landing field.

Here the girl was greeted by a swarm of reporters from the Millstown newspapers, and as the other passengers from the plane recounted how she had quietened everyone by her singing, the Pressmen crowded around her with even keener interest.

"Hully gee, that makes you a heroine, Miss Larrimore!"

"The great, the gorgeous, the glamorous Connie Larrimore, doing her act 'way up in the sky to avert a near-panic! What a story! What a story!"

Laughingly Connie protested that she had been as frightened as anyone aboard the ship, and she was still endeavouring to make light of the whole affair when a tall, gaunt, foreign-looking man elbowed his way towards her through the crowd of reporters.

Bill Davis recognised him immediately as one Benez, owner of a fashionable Millstown night club known as the Golden Eagle, and the postal inspector frowned at sight of him, for although Benez was respected in some quarters, Bill had heard whispers that he was not altogether a desirable character. There was some talk of him having been mixed up in the liquor racket during those wild days when Prohibition had been in force.

Benez, at the moment, looked highly gratified about something or other, and from the first words which he addressed to Connie it was obvious why he was in so elated a mood.

"Miss Larrimore," he declared, speaking in almost faultless English, but pronouncing his words in a slightly sibilant manner, "Miss Larrimore, I have just heard about this incident in the plane. What wonderful publicity! Magnificent publicity!"

He turned to the assembled Pressmen.

"Was it not a splendid example of courage on Miss Larrimore's part, gentlemen?" he said. "Yes, indeed—the little lady who is honouring our city by bringing us the silver voice that has captivated Broadway, she should certainly figure prominently on the front pages of your papers now! And don't forget, gentlemen, she is under contract to me, and will be singing every night at the Golden Eagle until further notice!"

As he heard this flowery and insidious speech, Bill Davis turned away in disgust, feeling not a little sorry for the girl who had to stand by and listen to it. Then he made his way in the direction of the aerodrome café, and was headed for the inviting snack-bar there when he ran full tilt into a young fellow who was three or four years his junior.

It was his brother Charlie, who held a pretty responsible position in the Federal Reserve Bank at Millstown—an alert-looking, genial youngster whom Bill had sponsored ever since he had left college.

"Why, hallo, Charlie," Bill greeted. "What are you doing here?"

"Just thought I'd slip down and meet my important brother," was the cheerful reply. "Come on, Bill, the cats are on me."

He took his elder brother by the arm and marched him into the café, and presently the pair of them were sitting up at the snack-bar, where Bill proceeded to give an account of his sojourn in Washington while they drank coffee and consumed a meal.

It was as Bill was discussing his visit to the capital that the rest of the passengers from the plane filed into the restaurant, and the last to enter was the lovely theatrical star whose acquaintance the postal inspector had made.

"Why, there's Connie Larrimore!" Charlie exclaimed at sight of her.

Bill glanced at him sharply.

"What do you know about Connie Larrimore?" he asked. "You've never been to New York, and that's where she belongs."

"New York my eye," said Charlie. "She may belong there now, but she was born and reared in little old Millstown. Don't you remember, Bill? She was at college with me, and she and I used to see a whole lot of each other."

"So that's why the name sounded familiar to me," Bill mused, and then turned his head to watch Connie as she settled herself on a stool at the far end of the bar.

He noticed that Benez was still with her, and above the general hum of conversation he heard the man announce that he would drive her maid to the Grand Hotel with her luggage and then return to the aerodrome for her.

"I understand she's going to sing at that fellow's night club," Bill said to Charlie. "Too bad."

"Why, what's the matter with the Golden Eagle?" his brother countered.

Bill shrugged.

"Oh, the place is all right," he granted. "But that man Benez—"

He made a grimace, and then Charlie kicked his ankle. For Benez had left Connie and was passing close to them—was looking sharply at Bill, too, as if he had caught what had been said.

"I think he overheard you," Charlie stated, when the night-club proprietor had gone by.

"I should worry about that," Bill retorted. "But say, aren't you going over to talk to your old sweetheart? Or do you think she's too famous to remember you now?"

Charlie grinned at him, and then, motioning him to follow, he made his way to where Connie Larrimore was sitting and addressed her smilingly.

Next moment she and Charlie were shaking each other by the hand, and before long the two of them were laughing over old reminiscences of their early youth—and even of their childhood, for it seemed they had been friends when they were mere toddlers.

Then all at once Charlie recollected Bill and made haste to introduce him as his brother.

"So that's who you are!" Connie ejaculated. "Charlie Davis' brother? Why, I remember you now. You were a very awesome person in our eyes, being a few years older than we were."

"Believe me, he's still held in awe by some folks, Connie," Charlie put in jovially. "He's an inspector, you know."

"Police?" the girl asked, looking at Bill.

"No," the elder brother rejoined.

"Post Office."

"Post Office!" A merry twinkle appeared in Connie Larrimore's eyes. "Gee, we all used to play a game called post office when we were kids—"

A Night at the Golden Eagle

THOSE two words, "post office," may have reminded Connie Larrimore of a childhood game, but they constituted a serious enough business so far as Bill Davis was concerned, and a business which would have astonished the general public if they could have gained an insight into his department.

There were doubtless many people who imagined that the duties of a postal inspector merely consisted of superintending the collection, sorting and delivery of the mails. But Bill's job was far more complicated than that.

There was plenty of routine attached to it, but though Bill Davis and his colleagues in the upper branches of the service were never lauded like the police or the Department of Justice or other such guardians of the public welfare, yet they were men who safeguarded the interests of the nation, working quietly but effectively behind the scenes.

Witness, for instance, an interview that took place in Bill's private sanctum a few days after he arrived back in Millstown.

Bill's office was situated on the first floor of the mammoth building which formed the headquarters of the city's postal service, and an elderly man by the name of Ritter had been shown into the room, a man who looked the very picture of misery and distress.

"Inspector Davis," the old fellow was saying now, "I've—I've lost all my money. I've been to lawyers, I've been to the police, but they tell me they can't do anything because I've no proof to support my statement that I was swindled. Then somebody mentioned that the Post Office Department might be able to help me."

Bill leaned his elbows on his desk and cupped his chin in his hands.

"How did you lose your money, Mr. Ritter?" he asked.

The old man bit his lip. He seemed almost on the verge of tears.

"My wife and I," he explained, "we worked for forty year an' saved twenty thousand dollars. Then one day a man told me about a gold-mine, and he persuaded me to invest all my money in it. But it was all a fake, and now we haven't a cent."

Bill shook his head sympathetically. How often he came up against this sort of thing—innocent, trusting people who were preyed upon by smooth-tongued rogues.

"Did you have any correspondence with this man?" he inquired. "I mean, did you receive anything through the mails from him, Mr. Ritter?"

"No, sir," was the answer. "He always came to my house."

The young postal inspector frowned.

"That's too bad," he murmured. "It puts the case out of my reach. I'd like to help you, Mr. Ritter, but I don't see how it's possible. You see, we only handle things that come through the mails."

There was a pause, during which the victim of the gold-mining swindle looked utterly downcast. Then Bill went on speaking.

"Mr. Ritter," he said, "there are a lot of crooks in this world, and frauds are being perpetrated every day. Some of them are not so considerable as this one from which you have suffered. Many of them consist of commercial articles which are offered to the public for a few dollars, even a few cents. The price doesn't matter. If these articles don't do what they're claimed to do, they're frauds."

Old Ritter nodded dully.

"Yes, petty frauds," he agreed in a heavy tone, "and, whatever the cost, the people who are taken in by them are fools. I understand. But I was a great fool, for it wasn't a few dollars or a few cents with me. It was my life's savings."

"Whether the fraud happens to be petty or otherwise, Mr. Ritter, these crooks make a mistake when they allow the mails to be used in connection with their business. For a single letter from them, or a remittance sent through the post by their victims—that immediately makes Uncle Sam a party to the transaction, and it's their that we can step in and prosecute them. But, as I say, we can do nothing if the mails haven't been used by either party."

Ritter looked at him in a quick, hopeful manner.

"Oh, but, Mr. Davis, I used the mail!" he blurted. "I sent my cheque for twenty thousand dollars to this man through the mail."

Bill's handsome face brightened at that, and he leaned forward eagerly.

"Did you register it?" he queried.

"Oh, yes, inspector! I have the registration receipt right here."

He fumbled in his pocket and produced a wallet from which he took a slip of paper. This he handed to Bill, and, after scrutinising it, the latter stood up briskly.

"Fine, Mr. Ritter," he declared. "Now we have something to work with."

Mind you, I wouldn't bank too much on getting your money back if I were you, but if the man who swindled you is still in the country he'll be prosecuted all right. Now will you come with me and let my secretary have all the details of the affair? Then I'll go into the matter thoroughly and get in touch with you as soon as I have any definite news for you."

"Yes, Inspector Davis. But—don't you really think there's much chance of me recovering my savings?"

"Well, you never know, of course," said Bill. "I sincerely trust you will, anyhow, Mr. Ritter, but it remains to be seen."

A quarter of an hour later old man Ritter was leaving the post office building with a flicker of hope in his eyes. As for Bill, he returned to his desk, and apart from a midday break for lunch, he was kept busy there until evening.

That night he had a supper engagement with his brother Charlie, who had been seeing a great deal of Connie Larrimore since she had arrived in town, and who had persuaded Bill to go along with him to the Golden Eagle and enjoy her act.

The Golden Eagle night club was the haunt of Millstown's wealthier residents, and it was as bright and up-to-date as any of its Broadway counterparts in New York. And here, while they dined expensively, Bill and Charlie listened to Connie as she sang to the rhythm of a soft-toned band.

She was vigorously applauded by the patrons of the restaurant when she had finished, and then, her act over, she walked across to the table at which Bill and Charlie were sitting.

She was soon talking to them animatedly, and, watching her during that conversation, Bill could not help thinking that she and Charlie still seemed to have a great deal in common. Well, he reflected, if anything came of their renewed friendship it might turn out to be a good match. She was a nice girl, this Connie Larrimore—even if she did happen to be working for a man like Benez just now.

"How did those bandits find out what was in this van?" Bill murmured. "That's what beats me."

"You know," Bill said to her presently, "you must get a lot of fun out of your singing. You sound as if you enjoy it as much as the people who are listening to you."

"Well, I do enjoy singing," she confessed. "But, all the same, there are times when I think I'd like to give up the stage and settle down in Millstown. I'm not so crazy about New York."

"The old town has its advantages, eh?" Charlie interposed smilingly, and then, suddenly spying a girl who was passing amongst the tables with a tray of cigarettes, he lifted his hand and beckoned her over.

He bought a packet of cigarettes, and, as change for the money he tendered, he received a banknote that had seen many years of hard wear.

"Hallo, here's an ancient one," he said, showing it to his brother.

"Just about ripe for your collection," Bill commented. "You know, Connie, Charlie's in charge of all the money that's taken out of circulation at the Federal Reserve Bank. As soon as any notes come in that look as if they're falling apart, they're quietly sentenced to death."

Connie glanced at Charlie whimsically.

"And that one—is sentenced to death?" she asked, indicating the banknote which had been handed to him by

"Then everything is to your satisfaction," he snapped. "Everything—except me!"

Without waiting for a response he turned on his heel and strode off across the restaurant, making his way to a private office which adjoined the foyer. As he entered this, he found two men there; one of them a middle-aged individual who was known as Evans, and who was Benez's manager; the other a big, hulking fellow of about thirty, Roach by name, and tough by reputation—eminently useful on these occasions when a strong arm was necessary, for even in a fashionable night club like the Golden Eagle one sometimes had trouble with unruly patrons.

"Roach," Benez said viciously, "get Connie Larrimore away from the Davises. She's at their table, and I don't like either of them. The elder one doesn't approve of me for some reason, and his brother Charlie has been seeing too much of Connie ever since she came here. It's bad for business. She even cancelled a lunch party that I arranged the other day—a party to which I had invited a number of Press-said. "Roach, is there a copy of yesterday's 'Daily Courier' handy?"

Roach moved over to a side-table and rummaged through a collection of newspapers that littered it. After a few seconds he produced a "Courier" that had been issued the previous day, and in silence he passed it across to his employer.

Slowly Benez turned the pages of the newspaper, which was a national daily that was widely read over a large section of the United States. Then, as he located the column which had been referred to, and as he scrutinised an item of news which figured in it prominently, his sallow face seemed to become several shades paler.

"Listen to this!" he jerked: "Night Club Owner Mysteriously Slain. Fred Cummings, forty-year-old owner of the Jack o' Lantern Night Club, was found dead in his office from a bullet wound early this morning. Alfred Carter, known to have financed many night clubs, was questioned by the police, but later released."

Roach and Evans exchanged glances. "Carter!" the manager reiterated. "The big shot beer baron that had the booze racket tied up in New York when the Volstead Act was in force. So that racketeer's had Cummings wiped out? Huh, and the police released him after questioning. Well, that's not surprising. You can bet your life that Carter would have an alibi for himself and every member of his gang."

"But what's all this gotta do with you, boss?" Roach interposed, looking at Benez.

ANOTHER FREE GIFT NEXT WEEK!

the cigarette girl, who had now moved off.

"No," Charlie rejoined. "I'll pay for the supper with it, and give it a last fling before the graveyard. It'll come back to me at the bank in a day or two, I guess."

Connie nodded, and then:

"Tell me," she said laughingly, "do you bury these old fellows with full military honours?"

"They don't bury them," Charlie answered in the same jocular vein. "They go back to Washington. About three million dollars of them are going back next week."

"And you take them personally to Washington and turn them in?"

Charlie shook his head.

"Oh, no. I only escort them to the post office. From then on they're Bill's headache. He sees that they're dispatched by mail-van. You know the Post Office Department is the best safeguard in the world. Isn't it, Bill?"

Before Bill could make any reply a tall figure approached the table. It was the figure of Benez, and he interrupted the conversation in his suave, too-courteous way, addressing himself particularly to the postal inspector.

"Is everything all right?" he inquired.

"Perfectly," Bill assured him, eyeing him steadfastly.

"The food?"

"Excellent," said Bill.

There was a slight sneer playing around the foreigner's lips, and suddenly an unpleasant glitter revealed itself in his eyes.

A Splendid Coloured Postcard Portrait of JEAN HARLOW

The foreigner raised a hand to his throat.

"Carter financed me," he said luskily. "I owe him fifty thousand dollars on this place, and I'm two months behind. This telegram is a delicate way of reminding me. But I—I haven't the money. As you know, we weren't doing too well here until we signed up Connie Larrimore."

"So what?" Evans protested. "If you can't pay Carter—you can't."

Benez pointed to the newspaper.

"Cummings paid," he faltered, and for a long time there was a silence, a silence which Roach was the first to break.

"What was that you were sayin' about the Larrimore girl before this telegram arrived, boss?" he reminded Benez.

"The Larrimore girl?" the night-club owner echoed vaguely. "Oh, yes, she is with the Davises. Er—get her away from them. Tell her I want to see her."

Roach departed, and some time later Connie presented herself in Benez's office, nodding pleasantly to the foreigner and to his manager, who had remained in the room.

"You wanted to have a talk with me, Mr. Benez?"

"Yes, Miss Larrimore," Benez answered. "Listen, you have brought good business to my restaurant, and I am very pleased. But—this young fellow Davis—the one you call Charlie, I mean. I wish you wouldn't spend so much time with him. There are immen. And I learned afterwards that she was out with this bank fellow."

Roach grinned at him.

"Sure you're lookin' at it from the business angle, Benez?" he queried. "I mean, you ain't gettin' soft on the girl, are you?"

"Don't be a fool. I'm old enough to be her father."

Evans tapped the night-club proprietor on the arm.

"Well, anyway, forget the Davises for the moment," he said. "Here's something that may be more important than them."

He handed Benez a telegram which had apparently arrived a few minutes before. It was addressed to the owner of the Golden Eagle, and it read as follows:

"See yesterday's 'Daily Courier,' page ten, column two.

"UNSIGNED."

Benez frowned as he spelled out the message, and then he looked at his associates.

"This sounds like Greek to me," he portant guests here to-night, who would appreciate it if you paid a little attention to them, Miss Larrimore."

Connie was still smiling, but a resolute look had come into her lovely eyes.

"That wasn't in my contract," she remarked. "Besides, Charlie Davis is an old friend of mine. I'm very fond of him."

"Miss Larrimore," Benez appealed, "why waste your time on a clerk?"

Connie was not so much annoyed as amused, and, with that conversation at the supper-table fresh in her mind, she glanced at the foreigner archly.

"Never judge the pearl by the oyster, Mr. Benez," she said in a jesting tone. "Why, Charlie Davis has three million dollars."

"What?" Benez was startled.

"Where could he get such an amount?" "Of course," Connie went on laughingly, innocently, "it's a little old, but it's three million nevertheless."

"Do you mind telling me what you are talking about, Miss Larrimore?"

The girl flashed one of her gay smiles upon him.

"Well, I'm only fooling," she admitted. "The fact is, Charlie's shipping three million dollars in worn-out bills to Washington next week. So—quite seriously, Mr. Benez—you shouldn't sneer at him for being a clerk. He must be fairly important to handle a job like that."

Benez made an impatient gesture.

"Oh, Miss Larrimore, you make fun of me," he said. "But really now, will you help me a little by being pleasant to my patrons?"

"Of course I will," Connie told him. "I'll be pleasant to them all, so long as it doesn't prevent me from being especially pleasant to Charlie Davis."

With that she left Benez and Evans and returned to the restaurant, smiling to herself over the interview, and never dreaming what grim and sinister consequences were to arise from it.

News from the North

THERE had been heavy rains that week, and such individuals as were connected with the Weather Bureau had viewed them with concern, a concern that was shared before long by the population of that State in which Millstown was one of the principal cities.

For heavy rains meant swollen rivers and overtaxed dams. Heavy rains meant the risk of inundation over an area that had always been susceptible to the satanic prankishness of the elements.

Before the week was out, bulletins from the northern part of the State were telling their tale of crumbling river banks, of violent floods that had surged through valleys and gorges, swamping great tracts of countryside, destroying villages and small towns, bringing ruin and death to many homes and families.

And the danger looked like spreading still farther afield. Gainsborough, Little Falls, Yarborough and Red Bluff—townships not very far removed from the big city—were all in the path of the flood-waters, according to report.

One grey bleak morning at the office, a few days after the first ominous news of impending disaster had been circulated, Bill Davis received a message from Postmaster Long at Yarborough.

It was a message that roused him to action, and he promptly summoned a colleague known as Pottle, who was older than he, but who ranked as Bill's second-in-command.

"Long's just been on the 'phone," Bill announced. "The flood's hit Yarborough—taken out the bridge and cut off the town."

"It has?" Pottle's earnest face became several degrees more solemn. "H'm, I hope it doesn't get down here to Millstown."

"You never can tell," said Bill. "But,

Pottle, I want you to take over my work here. Long seems unable to cope with the situation, and I'm going up to Yarborough to see what I can do. I'll travel by 'plane. According to Long, the airport above the town isn't under water—yet."

Two hours later Bill Davis was in the sub-office at Yarborough with Postmaster Long, superintending the removal of all cash and mail and effects from the single-storied premises, the floor of which was eighteen inches below flood-level.

"See that empty building over there?" Bill was saying as he stood talking to Long in a pair of stout waders.

The elderly postmaster peered across a street that was awash, and down which all manner of wreckage was floating swiftly.

"Yes, inspector, I see it." "Well, we'll open up a temporary post office on the second story of it. And if the rising water gets up that far, you can move still higher on to the next floor. The mail must go through, Long, and the post office will keep open, flood or no flood."

For the rest of that day and until the following morning Bill was in Yarborough helping Long and his staff to adjust themselves to their new situation. Then he took a boat to the airport, and from there caught a 'plane that was bound for Millstown.

On the way south he looked down on a panorama of desolation, a landscape obliterated under river waters that had burst their banks. Here and there forlorn belts of trees rose above the swirling flood, but more often than not the only objects visible were timber roofs which had been torn from their fastening and which were travelling onward to the urge of wild currents—or rescue-boats crowded with homeless victims of the torrent.

"Thanks, Mr. Ritter," Bill said. "If these mail-robbers are caught there's going to be a reward, and I'll see that you get your share."

The plane winged its way clear of the flood area at last, but it needed no prophetic eye to see that the unleashed waters had not wreaked their full havoc. The deluge was moving relentlessly south. Hamlets and villages which Bill now beheld, as yet untouched, were certainly doomed to suffer destruction ere long. Even the fate of Millstown itself was in doubt. The lower-lying quarters of that great, sprawling city would be jeopardised, at any rate, if the flood did not abate.

Back in his office at Millstown, Bill held a consultation with Pottle, and volunteered the opinion that the city was bound to be affected.

"Meantime," he said, after they had discussed the prospect, "how have things been going while I've been away?"

"Everything's okay at present, Bill," was the reply. "Regular services are being maintained, and the railroads are still carrying the mail north on schedule."

"They won't be much longer," the younger man declared. "The floodwaters up there are rising. We'd better be prepared for emergencies, Pottle. Our first step is to call in all auxiliary carriers. Also, I want you to send some of the men down to the river and get all the small boats they can. And say, you might get the War Department on the wire. Ask them to assign four 'planes to this office in case they're required for moving the mail."

Pottle hurried off to carry out his instructions, and had been gone only a few minutes when a visitor was shown into Bill's private sanctum—a visitor who proved to be one Dr. Doyle, medical officer of health for the surrounding area.

"Inspector," Doyle said, "this sudden rise of floodwaters has put us in a dangerous position. I understand that there's a prospect of Millstown itself being cut off."

"It's my conviction, doctor," Bill rejoined, "that Millstown is certain to be cut off sooner or later."

Doyle pursed his lips.

"I've ordered medical supplies so that we'll be able to cope with any crisis that may occur," he observed, "but if the torrent engulfs this section the trains may not be able to get through."

Bill thrust out his strong jaw. There was a determined expression in his eyes.

"Doctor," he stated emphatically, "if the situation becomes so bad that the trains can't get through, we'll use aeroplanes. If we can't do it with aeroplanes we'll do it with boats. Anyhow, don't you worry about your supplies, for the post office will see that they reach you all right. The mails are going to remain open whatever happens."

Doyle left that office with the air of a man whose mind had been set at rest, and Bill then settled down to work—work that was interrupted by frequent messages informing him of the ruthless progress of the flood. Indeed, by nightfall—when the young inspector was still at his desk—it was all too plain that his prophecy was to materialise.

The torrent was moving down on Millstown, steadily and surely. It was only a question of hours before it reached the city and enveloped it in its wide-spread toils.

While Bill was thus preoccupied with making ready for the inevitable emergency, and while the entire staff at the general post office was being marshalled for the impending struggle against heavy odds, the teeming populace of Millstown was leading an existence that was more or less normal despite a slight atmosphere of tension that was noticeable in some quarters.

November 28th, 1936.

As yet, all was well with the city, and there was a chance that the flood would subside. At least, many were nursing that hope.

Among those who looked on the bright side were Charlie Davis and Connie Larrimore. But then, driving home in Charlie's car from an evening "spin" through the open country to the south, both of them were too taken up with each other to worry about the morrow.

It was only when they were bowling through the streets of Millstown en route for the Golden Eagle that they were reminded of the peril that threatened the city.

Charlie had switched on a radio that was fitted to his automobile, and "hot" music by a well-known dance band was coming over the air. Then all at once the programme was interrupted by the voice of an announcer.

"Attention, everyone, please," the voice said. "We break in to broadcast an important message. The authorities are requesting aid for emergency flood conditions. All police and firemen are to report to their stations immediately. Members of the National Guard will assemble at their armouries as soon as possible."

Connie looked at her escort quickly. "You're a National Guard, aren't you, Charlie?"

He nodded. Like many young Americans, he had enlisted in that military organisation and had devoted a good deal of his spare time to it, showing such keenness that he had risen in the space of a year or two to the commissioned ranks.

"The situation must be getting pretty serious when they call us out," he murmured. "I'll rush you to Benez's restaurant and then get back to my company's headquarters as fast as I can."

"No, no, you go there right away," she said. "I can take a taxi."

"Better still," Charlie suggested after a moment's thought, "I'll let you have my car after I drop off at the Armoury, and you can drive yourself to Benez's place. I can pick up the auto there any time I need it."

Connie agreed to this arrangement, and when Charlie alighted outside his headquarters she slipped behind the steering-wheel. Then with a cheerful wave of the hand she proceeded in the direction of the night club where she was due to entertain Benez's patrons, and some time later she might have been seen steering the car into a yard adjoining the restaurant.

It was a yard that was overlooked by the windows of the night-club proprietor's office, and Roach was standing beside the curtains of those windows when Connie appeared in the yard outside.

Roach saw her emerge from the car, but did not pay much heed to her at first. Then suddenly he turned towards Benez and Evans, who were also in the office and who were engrossed in earnest conversation.

"Say," Roach exclaimed, "here's the Larrimore girl, and she's got young Davis' car—leastways, it's a dead ringer for the one that we've seen him use."

"What of it?" Benez muttered gloomily.

"Well, it looks like a lucky break to me," his employee rejoined. "We can borrow it to pull off this job that Evans has suggested. It would be safer to use that sedan—rather than your own, boss."

Benez chewed his nails. He was obviously in a state of anxiety and indecision.

"I don't like the scheme at all," he faltered. "It's—it's dangerous. I'd rather 'phone Carter in New York and plead for a little time."

"You're wasting a 'phone call and you know it," Evans cut in. "You've had another message from Carter—more definite than the first—and in plain words he told you that you had twenty-four hours to pay that fifty grand. And, believe me, when Carter says twenty-four hours he means twenty-four hours."

With a nervous gesture Benez ran his fingers round the inside of his collar.

"But regarding this mail job, how should I know Connie Larrimore gave me the right information that night?" he demanded huskily. "She was only kidding."

"She may have been kidding," Evans countered, "but she had the right dope. Roach and I took the trouble to check up on it. Three million dollars in worn-out banknotes—but currency, nevertheless—and all neatly packed up for us to grab."

"But the risk, Evans—the risk," the night-club owner breathed.

"For three million bucks it's worth a try," Roach interposed. "Besides, what's gonna happen if you don't square Carter? His mob will track you down, Benez, wherever you go. Man, this mail job is a cinch. With that much dough you can pay off Carter, then split three ways with Evans and me—and we'll all be on easy street."

Evans tapped Benez on the shoulder. Both he and Roach were flushed with greed.

"We've got two chances at it," he said. "The money leaves the bank for the post office at three. And with the whole town liable to be disorganised on account of this flood menace, everything might well be in our favour."

Benez took a pace or two across the room. Then he returned to where Roach and Evans were standing, and mopped his brow with a handkerchief that was already sodden.

"You're right," he jerked in an unsteady tone. "It's worth the risk."

Mail Robbery

IT was during the following day that the floodwaters hit Millstown, swirling into its suburbs, inundating the lower-lying districts to a depth of several feet and moving ever southward to submerge the country on all sides, thus marooning the city.

By the middle of the afternoon Millstown was shut off from the rest of the world as regards over-land communication, and such was the state of affairs when word reached Bill Davis in his office that a daring hold-up had been carried out shortly after three o'clock.

It had taken place in an upper locality of the city, where the streets were comparatively free from water even now, and a mail van had been concerned in the affair—a mail van which had left the post office on the stroke of three in an attempt to reach the airport before the flood invaded the town.

The mail van in question had contained the three million dollars' worth of tattered banknotes which had been sent from the Federal Reserve Bank to the post office, and which had thence been dispatched on the first stage of the journey to Washington.

Within a quarter of an hour of receiving the news that the van had been held up, Bill Davis and his colleague Pottle were at the scene of the outrage.

It was in vain that the girl struggled. Eyes riveted on the door, awaiting the arrival of her companion, the two crooks saw to it that she gave no warning.

A crowd of people were there, and a number of police officers were among them. The mail truck itself had apparently been forced to the sidewalk and had overturned, and the driver was huddled beside it with a bullet-wound in his chest—was clearly at the point of death as he lay propped against the knee of a uniformed representative of the Law.

Bill and Pottle bent over the stricken man, and the former spoke to him gently.

"Were you able to see who did it?" he asked.

"I—didn't recognise 'em," was the feeble reply. "But there was—there was three of 'em. They drove up alongside me in—in a car."

Bill leaned closer to him

"What kind of a car?"

"A—a grey sedan."

The man's head fell back weakly, and Bill looked up at Pottle.

"How did those bandits find out what was in this van?" he murmured.

"That's what beats me. Pottle, you go to the Federal Reserve Bank and make a few inquiries there. I'll see you later at the office."

Pottle departed, and when next Bill saw him it was in his private sanetium at the postal department's headquarters.

"Well, I went to the bank," Pottle said slowly, "and there were only three people who knew that the money was being dispatched. They were Freeman, head of the shipping section—Ralph Massey, a clerk—and—your brother Charlie."

Bill was silent for a moment, and then he drew his brows together in a frown.

"There couldn't have been any leak here at the post office," he grunted. "You and I were the only ones. Pottle—"

He stopped speaking, for at that point one of his subordinates entered the room and announced a visitor in the person of a "Mr. Ritter."

"You remember, Inspector Davis. The man who was swindled out of twenty thousand dollars in that gold mining set-up."

"Oh, yes. Well, tell him that I'm afraid the man who took his money has absconded out of the country. I'm sorry—"

"But I don't think it's about his money that Mr. Ritter's called, sir. It's about a mail bag that he picked up a little while ago."

Bill started and immediately ordered his subordinate to show Ritter in at once, and as the old fellow entered the office the postal inspector saw that he was carrying a sack under his arm.

"Good-afternoon, Mr. Davis," Ritter began. "I—I thought this might interest you, because it looks like a mail bag to me—and I—I just heard on the radio that there had been a hold-up and a truck driver killed—"

"Where did you get that bag?" Bill struck in tersely.

"In a car that was caught by the flood, inspector. It's outside my grocery shop down on the south side of the town. I didn't see the men who got out of it, but I found this mail sack in the back of it."

Several police launches had been placed at the disposal of the postal authorities, and the nearest one was housed in a sub-office on the edge of one of the districts which had been flooded. This craft Bill requisitioned, and in company with Ritter and Pottle, he cruised through the water-logged thoroughfares of the lower part of the town until he reached the street in which his informant's shop was situated.

Outside that store was a grey sedan, submerged well above the axles, and as Bill climbed on to the gunwale of the launch to examine the auto, the first object that he saw on glancing inside it was a tiny mascot that was attached to the ignition key.

The mascot was in the shape of a white elephant, and the face of Bill Davis seemed to tighten as he removed it from the ignition key. For who should know better than he that his brother Charlie drove a grey sedan with such a lucky charm tied to the dashboard?

"There's a pair of waders here," Pottle was saying. "Shall I put them on and see if I can unhook the licence plates off that car? We can at least identify the owner then."

Bill turned slowly round.

"I don't need any licence plates," he answered in a heavy tone, and suddenly Pottle guessed his meaning as he remembered the make and colour of the automobile that the inspector's younger brother used.

There was a silence, and then Ritter spoke. The old man had been fidgeting uncomfortably for the past few minutes. "Inspector," he said tremulously, "I—want to tell you something. Look—twenty thousand dollars. It—it was in the mail bag I picked up. The bandits must have left it behind in their hurry."

He had produced a thick sheaf of banknotes, and Bill took them from him. Then he regarded old man Ritter understandingly. It was easy to guess how he had been tempted to keep this money which the thieves had overlooked, and how in the end his conscience had forced him to give it up.

"Twenty thousand dollars," Bill murmured. "That's just about what was stolen from you, wasn't it?"

Ritter nodded in a meek fashion, and the younger man leaned towards him.

"Thanks, Mr. Ritter," he said. "If these mail-robbers are caught there's going to be a reward, and I'll see that you get your share. It will recompense you for your own loss, I can tell you that much."

"If the mail-robbers are caught," Pottle broke in sceptically. "They were certainly balked by the flood, Bill, but it's on the cards that they've got away in a boat."

His colleague shook his head, however.

"Where would they find one?" he countered. "Every available boat was commandeered for the emergency services late last night, and has been in the hands of the authorities ever since."

"No, Pottle," he added, "those guys are still in this town—marooned here, because the railroad and the airport and every form of transport is out of commission, excepting water traffic. Those guys are still in this town—under cover somewhere—and we've got to find them."

Thirty minutes later Bill Davis was in his office again, but though he was no longer in the company of Pottle and Ritter, he was by no means alone. For his brother Charlie and Conno Larrimore were with him, and he was questioning the pair of them rigorously.

He had picked up Charlie as the latter had been leaving by a National Guard motor-boat for a camp which had been established on some high ground west of the town. Here a great number of homeless people were being looked after—people from the outlying countryside whose dwellings had been wrecked.

And Connie had been with Charlie, having volunteered her services as a relief worker in the field kitchen that had been organized at the camp.

Now, however, relief work and National Guard duty were far removed from the minds of the two young people who stood before Bill Davis.

"We've told you how my car got mixed up in this mail robbery," Charlie was saying. "I lent it to Connie last night, and she parked it in a yard beside the Golden Eagle. And it must have been stolen from that yard by the men who planned the hold-up."

Bill looked at Charlie for a few seconds, and then glanced at Connie scornfully.

"Stolen!" he reiterated. "I expected something more original from you!"

"Look here, Bill," Charlie, a trim, smart figure in his military uniform, exclaimed indignantly. "Connie doesn't know anything about this robbery."

"But you did know that three million dollars were going to leave the post office for Washington!" Bill rapped out, ignoring his brother's outburst and still addressing the girl. "Don't deny it, for I was there when Charlie told you about it at the Golden Eagle. Did you mention it to anybody else?"

Connie stared at him in confusion.

"Why, I—I'd forgotten all about that," she stammered. "I certainly don't remember saying anything—"

"You must have told someone!" Bill grated. "Who was it?"

Charlie interposed himself between the girl and his brother. His good-looking young face was white with anger. "Look here, Bill, you don't have to talk to her like that!" he cried. "You're acting like a stupid cop!"

"Keep quiet!" Bill flung at him. "I'll handle this!"

Charlie clenched his fists, and for an instant it seemed as if the two brothers might come to blows. But all at once Connie gave vent to an ejaculation.

"Wait a minute!" she gasped. "I did mention that money to someone. I mentioned it to Benez. I remember now. But I was only kidding."

Bill had brushed Charlie aside and was looking at her with a queer light in his eyes.

"Kidding!" he said hoarsely. "Three million dollars stolen, all but twenty thousand that was overlooked! A post-office employee murdered! And you call that kidding!"

November 28th, 1936.

"A post-office employee murdered!" Connie echoed, aghast. "Oh, no!"

Bill Davis gritted his teeth.

"So Benez pulled the job, did he?"

he said in a low voice.

"But he couldn't have," the girl protested. "He didn't take any notice of what I told him. Benez isn't a thief."

"Stop being naive!" Bill ground out. "You're not fooling me. You're in this—up to the neck. Where is Benez now?"

It was the girl's turn to experience the sense of indignation that Charlie had already felt on her behalf.

"Listen," she announced furiously, "I'm in a position to tell you that Benez isn't at the Golden Eagle, because the place has been deserted ever since mid-day. But more than that I can't tell you, because I don't know any more about this mail robbery than you do!"

She paused, breathless, and somehow Bill realised that she was speaking the truth, and that if Benez were indeed responsible for the crime which had been committed, Conno Larrimore had been an innocent party to it—merely guilty of letting slip a piece of vital information, which had seemed far from vital at the time.

Then Charlie moved forward again.

"Well, Bill," he said thickly, "what are you going to do? Hold us both as suspects—or what?"

"You'd both better get over to that relief camp where you were bound for when I picked you up," the elder brother retorted. "If I want you, I'll know where to find you."

Charlie and Connie left the office, and some time after their departure Bill went through to Pottle's room and held a brief consultation with him, telling him everything but announcing his intention of withholding the story from the police until he had made an investigation himself.

"You're taking a chance, Bill," Pottle muttered, shaking his head dubiously. "You may get into trouble for not reporting this right away."

"I can't help that," was the answer. "Those two kids are in a jam, and I've got to get them out of it if it's humanly possible. My idea is to go down to the Golden Eagle in the hope of picking up a clue. Should that fail, then I'll have no alternative but to give my information to the proper authorities."

Pottle was only too ready to accompany Bill on his mission, and soon the pair of them were again cruising through streets that had been swept by the flood. Nor was it long before they had reached the Golden Eagle and forced their way into Benez's private quarters, the floor of which was under a few inches of water.

They now proceeded to ransack the foreigner's desk and filing cabinet, and it was Pottle who suddenly came upon a document that seemed worth consideration.

"Here, look at this, Bill," he said. "A tax receipt for an apartment-house on the other side of town."

Bill glanced at the paper and frowned.

"Benez doesn't live there," he mused.

"That's a pretty shabby district, Pottle."

"He may not live there," the other rejoined. "But this receipt makes it clear that he's the landlord of an apartment-house in that quarter, and he may have hit on it as a hiding-place. It's worth looking into, Bill."

The younger man was silent for a space. Then he nodded grimly.

"Maybe you're right," he stated. "Come on, we'll try it, anyway. Make a note of that address, Pottle."

Hide-out

IN the gathering dusk, while Bill and Pottle were scuffling the Golden Eagle, a National Guard motor-boat might have been seen chugging through the flooded streets on the southwest side of the town.

It was the boat by which Charlie Davis and Conno Larrimore intended to make for the relief camp, but as they were wending their way towards Millstown's outskirts through one of the meaner neighbourhoods of the city, the girl caught her companion by the arm all at once.

"Charlie, just a minute!" she said. "I've suddenly remembered something."

"What?" he asked, dismally enough. "Benez owns some property in this locality," she told him. "When he wrote to me in New York and offered me a contract to sing in his night club, his letter carried a private address. Wait, I think I have that very letter here in my bag."

She opened her handbag, and sure enough the missive was tucked in one of the pockets of it, a missive that bore a printed heading which had been crossed out but which was still legible.

"No. 33a, Feltham Apartments, Lincoln Drive."

Charlie Davis scanned the address, and then looked at Connie swiftly.

"We're going there right now," he jerked. "If Benez knows anything about that hold-up, we'll make him talk."

He tapped a Service revolver that he was carrying on his hip, and a moment later he was turning the wheel of the motor-boat and swinging the vessel off the course that he had hitherto been holding.

In another ten minutes the craft was gliding into Lincoln Drive, and on locating the Feltham apartment-house the young bank clerk drew up alongside the porch, the top steps of which were still above water.

"All right," Connie said. "You wait here. I won't be long."

Charlie clutched her as she was on the point of scrambling from the boat.

"Wait a minute," he ejaculated. "You're not going up there alone."

"Don't be silly. Nothing's going to happen. Why, Benez might not even be here."

"But what if he is, Connie? No, I'm going up there with you."

The girl made a gesture of appeal. "Charlie, you're acting as though I were going into a lion's den. After all, we've no proof that Benez had anything to do with that mail robbery, and I'm inclined to doubt it myself. But if he did have a hand in it, I'm the one to worm the truth out of him."

"How?"

"By telling him that I'm suspected, and by appealing to him for help."

Charlie fidgeted uneasily.

"I don't like the idea of you going in alone," he persisted.

"Now be reasonable, dear," Connie urged. "It's the only way to find out if Benez is on the level or otherwise. If you came in with me it would spoil everything. He wouldn't talk with you around."

Charlie was compelled to admit that there was a great deal in which she had

(Continued on page 26)

Never was there a more enduring comradeship than that which was formed between the king of wild horses and the outcast wonder dog. Together they braved a thousand perils, unswerving in their loyalty to each other. Follow their amazing adventures in this gripping serial drama, starring Kane Richmond, Norma Taylor and Rex and Rinty

EPISODE 5—

“Lost in the Woods”

The Adventures OF REX AND RINTY

READ THIS FIRST

Rex, a black Arabian stallion, is worshipped by a strange race of people on the remote tropical isle of Sujan.

To Sujan come three white men who are agents of a Californian rancher named Crawford. They steal Rex, realising the fortune he can make for their employer, but one of them is captured by the Sujanese. This man, Wheeler, only earns his life and liberty by promising to recover the god horse, and travels to America in company with a native known as Pasha.

Meanwhile Rex is delivered to Crawford, but breaks free and takes to the hills. Later that day the rancher plays in a polo game at the Bruce Riding Academy, but his team loses to a side led by Frank Bradley, a popular young sportsman, and after the game Crawford vents some of his spite on a stray police dog that has roamed into the district.

It is this dog, Rinty, which later comes across Rex, and which brings the god horse into contact with Frank Bradley and Dorothy Bruce, the daughter of the riding academy's owner.

Frank takes Rex in hand, training him into the best polo pony in his string, but he is stolen by Crawford's agents, who afterwards lose him to Wheeler and Pasha.

These attempt to convey Rex to the coast in a closed motor-truck, but are intercepted and taken prisoners by Crawford's men. Then Frank and Rinty show up, and during the fierce fight the truck runs out of control down a long gradient, carrying Rex and Rinty with it.

Now Read On

A Vain Search

AT ever-increasing pace the runaway truck swept down the Red Ridge Trail, and by a miracle it kept to the road. But at the foot of the slope the highway took a sharp turn to the left, running through a cutting that was flanked by tall embankments, and it was on this bend that the van came to grief.

With battering-ram force it dashed into the right-hand wall of earth that hemmed in the road, and, its bonnet diving into the mould, it came to a jarring standstill.

The shock threw Rinty against the dashboard, and bruised him badly. But otherwise the dog was unhurt, and, scrambling to his feet, he had soon leapt from the truck. Then he scuttled to the other side of the highway, where he stood with his tail between his legs and ears a-droop, frightened almost out of his wits by the severe jolt he had received.

He was not the only creature who had been scared by the van's collision with the embankment, for the god horse, Rex, was even more alarmed than Rinty, and, standing by the roadside, the wolfhound heard him battering at the doors of his prison with his powerful hind legs.

Suddenly those doors flew open before the onslaught of the stallion's hoofs, and in another moment the horse was bounding from the interior of the truck; and as he jumped to the trail he swung around and bolted round the bend.

Rinty followed him, blindly enough, some instinct prompting him to flee with Rex from the scene of that fright which they had both sustained, and thus it was under the spur of their mutual panic that the two animals chased off along the highway, which they quitted on swerving out of the cutting.

Meanwhile, up on the brow of the declivity down which the truck had rolled, Frank Bradley was battling furiously with Mitchell and Anderson, and he managed to account for the first named by slugging him in the jaw with a fist that was as hard as a rock. Then he concentrated on Anderson, who had rushed to Mitchell's aid on falling from the motor-van, and in the space of two or three minutes that rogue was also huddled on the ground in an inert attitude.

The gangsters lay motionless, neither of them showing any inclination to renew the fight, and it was as he wheeled contemptuously from their prostrate bodies that Frank Bradley realised the truck was no longer standing nearby.

With an involuntary exclamation he turned his head, and then he saw the vehicle at the foot of the hill, piled up against the embankment that flanked the outer edge of the bend there, and a look of intense anxiety crossed his handsome face as he beheld the truck.

Filled with concern, he turned towards his horse and flung himself into the saddle, and an instant later he was galloping down the slope at top speed.

He drew rein within a yard of the motor-van, and discovered at a glance that the tail doors were ajar and the interior empty. Then he noticed tracks in the dust of the road—the tracks left by a horse and dog which had departed from the locality in full flight—and with a dig of the heels he sent his own pony round the bend in the highway.

He followed the imprints in the dust until he reached the spot where Rex and Rinty had left the road and struck off across the tough mesquite grass, where none but an old Indian scout could have gained any inkling of the course they had taken. Nor were the stallion and the wolfhound visible to the eye, for the plain across which they had raced was bounded by dense thickets that were only a quarter of a mile distant, and therefore Frank was compelled to ride at random and embark upon a quest which was doomed to failure from the start.

As for Mitchell and Anderson, they had struggled to their feet within a few seconds of Frank's abandoning them, and from the crown of the hill they had watched him make for the broken-down truck.

They were still watching him now as he spurred across the moonlit plain, since from their position at the top of the ridge they were able to command an extensive view of the surrounding country.

The view was not so extensive, however, that they could detect any sign of Rex and Rinty, and in a truer silence they gazed after the receding form of young Frank Bradley as he headed for the thickets.

They saw him enter the heart of that wide belt of vegetation, and for a considerable time he was lost to their view. But at length he reappeared, and they were quick to note that he and his horse were still alone. Clearly, his search for Rex had been fruitless.

"Well," growled Anderson, "it looks like that black Arabian has beat it into the blue, an' I doubt if any of us will ever lay hands on him again."

"Maybe not," breathed Mitchell, nursing his swollen jaw, "and ain't Crawford gonna be sore!"

Anderson nodded bleakly.

"I'll say he's gonna be sore—especially as Jones will get to the ranch ahead of us and tell him that everything's okay. Which reminds me, Mitchell, we've got a long walk in front of us."

"I know it," was the sulky reply. "Come on, let's get started."

They left the road and proceeded to tramp across country, taking the same course upon which Jones had set out with Wheeler and Pasha some time previously, and they had been walking for about a quarter of an hour when Anderson voiced a gloomy comment.

"Well, there's one thing, Mitch," he said. "We ain't got the god horse, but we helped to get Wheeler and that guy Pasha, an' that may be some sort of a consolation to the boss. I guess he'll sure give them the works for all the trouble they've caused us."

Had Anderson but known it then, even such poor consolation was to be denied. For at that moment, several miles away, Wheeler was working up a plan whereby he and Pasha might escape from their unwelcome escort.

Mounted on the ponies that had belonged to Mitchell and Anderson, the two prisoners were riding a little ahead of Jones, and though the latter was keeping a close eye on them and covering them with his revolver, Wheeler managed to exchange a surreptitious glance with Pasha and give the native some indication that he had a scheme in mind.

Thirty seconds after he had exchanged that significant glance with his companion, Wheeler suddenly looked round sharply and stared past Jones into empty space.

"Who's that comin' up behind us?" he jerked.

Actually there was not a soul in view, but Jones was deceived by those startling words, and he twisted his head to follow the direction in which the other man was gazing, and on the instant Wheeler swung his horse towards the armed gangster and clutched the fellow by the wrist.

Jones ripped out a curse and tried to wrench his hand free so that he could level his forty-five at the prisoner again. But now Pasha came up on the other side of him and seized the barrel of the weapon, tearing the gun from its owner's fingers and then bringing down the butt with crushing force upon the man's skull.

A groan broke from the victim's lips, and he swayed drunkenly in the saddle. Next moment he was struck a second blow, and this time he plunged from his brone to fall in a heap to the ground.

"Nice work, Pasha!" Wheeler rapped out. "All right, leave him where he is. We'll take his pony and turn it loose when we think fit. It'll do that homhre good to walk home. Yeah, and I wouldn't like to be in his shoes when he gets there."

"But the god horse," Pasha said. "What of him? We must recover the stallion, Wheeler. I have sworn never to return to Sujan unless I bring him with me—"

"I know, I know," the white man cut in impatiently. "But we've gotta lie low and bide our time. Don't worry, we'll take that stallion back to Sujan all right sooner or later."

They rode off across the range, taking the spare brone with them and leaving his master stretched out on the turf—a posture that the unconscious Jones still retained long after they had disappeared. In point of fact, the stricken gangster lay there without movement until two plodding figures came across his body about an hour later and devoted themselves to the difficult task of reviving him.

The newcomers succeeded in bringing him round at last, and as he opened his eyes dazedly Jones found himself looking into the faces of Mitchell and Anderson.

"What happened?" Mitchell barked at him. "Where's Pasha and Wheeler?"

Jones gaped at him in a stupid fashion. Then he remembered how he had been tricked by one of his prisoners and clubbed into oblivion by the other.

"They—they pulled a fast one on me," he moaned, pressing a hand to his aching skull. "and they—got away. That dirty rat Pasha, he sure enough crowned me—"

But all at once he paused and eyed his comrades with sudden apprehension.

"Say, what are you fellers doin' here, anyway?" he blurted. "Where's the truck? Where's the god horse?"

Mitchell bit his lip, and, helping Jones to rise, took him by one arm while Anderson laid hold of the other.

"Come on, Jones," said Mitchell heavily. "We'd better make tracks for the ranch."

"But the god horse," Jones persisted. "I left him with yuh, didn't I? Where is he?"

"That's what we'd like to know," Anderson put in. "He got away, just like Wheeler and Pasla got away. Come on, we've all got bad news for the boss, I reckon."

Lost

A NEW day had dawned, and the rising sun, striking through the tangled leafage that partially screened a lonely forest track, had awakened a small boy who had been lying with his back propped against the bole of a tree.

The forest was an immense area of tall timber that covered a section of the Californian countryside. The boy was one Jimmy Hammond, better known as Junior Hammond, the son of a millionaire who owned an estate some forty miles east of San Francisco; and the previous afternoon, while riding in the woods, young Junior had been unfortunate enough to fall from his pony when the animal had slid at the form of a dead rattlesnake lying in his path.

The horse had galloped off in a panic, leaving Junior to pick himself up and blunder through the forest on foot. He had soon lost his way, however, and, with night coming on, he had at last sunk down exhausted.

He roused himself now to greet the morning with a heavy heart, and to experience once again the terrors known only to a youngster who sees no prospect of finding the road home. He was suffering from thirst and hunger, too, and it was with tears in his eyes that he stumbled from his resting-place and began to wander as aimlessly as he had done on the previous afternoon.

The quiet woods were intersected by a maze of narrow trails which were covered with leaf-mould and which were seldom traversed by human footsteps. Through these labyrinthine paths Junior Hammond proceeded to roam disconsolately, seeking a route that would lead him out of the timber, but failing to perceive any break in the forest, and the sun was ascending to its zenith in the sky when all at once he heard sounds ahead of him.

A moment later a horse came plodding into view, and for a brief space Junior Hammond thought he was the pony that had thrown him the day before. But he quickly realised that he stood several hands higher than the mount from which he had become separated; even his young mind grasped the fact that this creature which was approaching him was far superior to any other he had ever seen.

Then he perceived that the horse was not alone, but was accompanied by a grey wolfhound that was trotting by his side.

The dog was Rinty and the horse Rex, and they were far from the scene of their adventure with the runaway truck. But, of course, Junior Hammond knew nothing of their story, and the look of joy that came into his eyes at sight of them was the expression of a lad who would have welcomed any living creature that seemed to indicate a link with civilisation.

He started forward to meet Rex and Rinty, whereupon the god horse paused. But Rinty padded on and sniffed curiously at the boy—then accepted a friendly caress of the youngster's hand.

"Hallo, old fellow!" Junior Hammond said tremulously. "Where did you come from?"

Rinty licked the boy's cheek with a swift movement of his tongue as Junior stooped lower, and after patting him a few times, the lad moved along the path to where Rex was standing.

He walked up to the stallion fearlessly, ignorant as he was that Rex had an uncertain temper where strangers were concerned. Yet it was as if some sixth sense told the god horse that he need fear no harm from this small boy, and he remained passive as Junior Hammond stroked his sleek muzzle.

And then an idea occurred to Junior, an idea that caused him to lay hold of a crude rope bridle which was the only riding-gear that the stallion possessed.

"Say, maybe you would take me out of these woods," he said.

The lad slipped round to Rex's flank and tried to pull himself up on to the horse's back. At the third attempt he succeeded, and the stallion showed no signs of protest as he took the slight burden of Junior's weight—even responded to the prod of the boy's heels when Junior urged him forward.

The god horse moved down the trail at a walking pace, and Rinty scampered ahead, barking loudly and apparently in high spirits. As for Junior Hammond, he sat perched on Rex's hack and allowed both the animals to go whither they pleased, reflecting that they must have strayed from some kind of a home and might take him back there—perhaps to a farmhouse, or a ranch.

But Rex and Rinty were not bound for any dwelling. They had been searching for water when Junior had met them, and within half an hour of his encountering them they brought him to the banks of a river that wound through the depths of the forest.

Junior was grateful enough for this small mercy, and while Rex and Rinty slaked their thirst he imitated their example. Then, having remounted, it suddenly dawned on the boy that he would do well to follow this river downstream. It would lead him out of the woods eventually, at any rate.

With this thought in mind he took hold of the rope bridle and turned Rex's head in the required direction, and it was with perfect willingness that the powerful stallion began to trot along the water's edge, Rinty bounding after him.

Towards noon, Junior Hammond and his two companions emerged from the widespread realms of the forest, and, once again in open country, the boy was able to recover his bearings and make tracks for his father's estate.

This he reached about three o'clock, riding through an imposing gateway on to a broad gravel drive which led to a stately house, and it was from one of the windows of that house that a distracted father saw his missing son cantering up the carriage-way on a strange horse, with a grey wolfhound bringing up the rear.

Hammond senior was hastening thankfully from the house a few seconds afterwards, followed by a small crowd of people consisting of servants, hired detectives and newspaper men. And a minute or two later he was hearing from Junior's lips a story that was to be headlined soon enough in the Press, a story that was to produce a dramatic sequel, had Jimmy Hammond's audience but known it.

been restored to his fond parent, Frank Bradley might have been seen in conversation with Dorothy Bruce at the academy owned by the girl's father.

"I guess we might as well give up all hope of seeing Rex again," Frank was saying dismally.

"Yes, and Rinty, too," Dorothy murmured. "Poor old Jensen, the stable-hand! He's really cut up about Rinty, and, to tell you the truth, I don't know which affects me most either—the loss of Rex, or the loss of that beautiful dog. I'd grown so fond of them both."

Frank nodded.

"Me, too," he observed. "But you know, I had an idea that Rinty might ultimately lead Rex back to the academy here. After all, it's been his home for the last week or so."

"I suppose both Rex and Rinty got so scared that they didn't stop running until they'd completely lost themselves," Dorothy suggested. "I wonder where they are now?"

Frank shrugged his shoulders in a despondent fashion and shook his head slowly.

"Goodness knows," he said. "I went out early this morning and reconnoitred the country around Red Ridge again, but there wasn't a trace of them. I'd like to think that someone would come across them and take care of them—or perhaps make some effort to find out where they'd wandered from."

"Yes," Dorothy began, and then paused as she saw a familiar figure hurrying towards them in a state of obvious excitement.

"Hallo," she exclaimed, "here comes Jensen, and he looks as if he's got something on his mind."

The fat stable-hand reached them a moment later, and as he stopped before them breathlessly they noticed that he was clutching a newspaper in his hand.

"Miss Dorothy!" he panted. "Mr.

Bradley, sir! I've just got back from town with a copy of the 'Tribune,' and look! Look what it says on the front page!"

He thrust the newspaper towards them, and, taking it, they glanced at the page he had mentioned.

There, spread over three columns, they saw the story of Junior Hammond's adventure in the Californian woods, a story which had been embellished by an enterprising reporter so that the outstanding feature of it was the part played by the two stray animals which had befriended the boy.

"MILLIONAIRE'S SON RESTORED TO HIS FATHER."

"STALLION AND POLICE DOG RESCUE HAMMOND HEIR."

"DUMB ANIMALS SAVE CHILD FROM DEATH BY THIRST."

Thus ran the headlines, and under them were pictures of Junior Hammond and his father, taken that afternoon with the horse and the wolfhound which had figured in the affair.

"Why, that's Rex and Rinty!" Dorothy Bruce ejaculated.

"I know, ma'am," Jensen blurted. "An' it seems they're at Mr. Hammond's estate. All you've gotta do is to see him and convince him that they belong here."

Frank suddenly laid a hand on Dorothy's sleeve.

"Jensen's right," he said tersely. "We've got to head for the Hammond estate, and we'll have to move fast. Crawford may see this report, and if he does you can bet he'll make straight for Hammond's home and claim Rex. He might even be on his way there now."

A look of anxiety appeared in the girl's eyes, and she turned in the direction of the car park.

"Come on," she declared, "we'll leave immediately. We can be there in my roadster within a couple of hours."

"Beggin' your pardon, Miss Dorothy," Jensen interposed. "But

Anderson gave vent to a hoarse cry. In that same instant Frank clutched him with one hand and with the other snapped his bunched knuckles to the point of the gangster's jaw.

News of the Missing

SOME time after the lost Junior Hammond had you'd be quicker to go across country on horseback. The Hammond estate lies over near San José, an' it's a long way round by road."

Dorothy nodded, realising that the stable-hand's information was correct. "Yes, of course," she said. "Very well, Jensen, saddle a couple of ponies for Mr. Bradley and myself. Hurry now."

Jensen dashed off with what speed he could muster, and ere long he returned leading a pair of sleek horses, one of them a stallion that could have passed for Rex at a distance.

Frank swung himself astride the black, and Dorothy took the other pony, a spirited sorrel. Then they clapped spurs to the flanks of their mounts, and in another moment they were galloping at top pace from the academy, with the Hammond estate near San José for their objective.

It was an hour's ride to the millionaire's home, and in order to reach it they had to travel through some pretty wild country, including a neck of those same woods where Junior Hammond had met Rex and Rinty. But at length Frank Bradley and his fair companion arrived at their destination, and after giving a manservant the reason for their visit they were conducted across the grounds to a sweep of lawn where Mr. Hammond and his small son were seated in two cane chairs.

Frank introduced himself and presented Dorothy. Then he proceeded to tell Hammond exactly why they were there, and, after hearing his narrative, the millionaire nodded pleasantly.

"Well, young man," he said to Frank, "I'm exceedingly glad to meet the owner of those two fine creatures, and to have the opportunity of expressing my gratitude personally. I'm quite sure that if it had not been for your horse and your dog I would never have seen my little boy again."

Frank glanced at Dorothy uncomfortably, and then looked at the millionaire again.

"Mr. Hammond," he remarked, "I'm afraid I haven't made myself thoroughly clear. I'm not the owner of Rex and Rinty, for they're what you might call two waifs and strays. But at least I've been taking care of them for the past week or two, and I'd like to go on taking care of them until their rightful owners show up."

"You see," he added, "I don't want them to fall into the wrong hands. This man Crawford, whom I've mentioned, for instance, he's particularly anxious to obtain possession of the stallion, though I'm positive he has no claim on him."

Hammond fingered his chin thoughtfully and eyed Frank and Dorothy in silence for a spell. Then he signed to them to follow him, and led them towards his private stables, where quarters had been found for Rex and Rinty.

The moment the horse and the wolfhound saw Hammond's visitors they made it abundantly clear that they were acquainted with them. For, while Rinty leaped up at them to paw them joyously, Rex whinnied contentedly and gave every indication of pleasure as they fondled his silken muzzle.

"Well," said Hammond, noting the behaviour of the animals, "that convinces me that you are their friends, anyhow, and I've no hesitation in surrendering them to you. But before you go, Mr. Bradley, would you and Miss Bruce honour me by having dinner with me?"

Frank and Dorothy thanked him, but excused themselves, being anxious to return to the academy without delay. Then, to the obvious disappointment of Junior Hammond, Rex and Rinty were given up to the visitors, the boy only being consoled when Frank assured him that he could come and see them at the Bruce Academy any time he wished.

A minute or two afterwards the young polo player and his companion were cantering from the estate, with Rex trotting between them and Rinty bounding along nearby. And in this fashion Frank and Dorothy set out for home, pushing steadily eastward until they picked up a rough track that ran through the hills.

They had not been following this track for long when all at once Dorothy drew rein abruptly and pointed ahead, and, staring in the direction indicated, Frank descried four horsemen riding towards them.

"Frank!" the girl exclaimed, "Those men look familiar to me. Is Crawford with them?"

The ace of the Bruce polo field gave vent to an imprecation.

"No," he jerked, "Crawford's not amongst them, but those fellows work for him. I know them only too well. That's Mitchell in front, and the others are called Jones, Anderson and Martin. Looks like we didn't fetch Rex any too soon, Dorothy. These men from the Crawford ranch are on their way to the Hammond estate, or I'm a Dutchman."

Dorothy gripped him by the arm.

"They've seen us, Frank!" she gasped.

She was right. It was all too plain that the gangsters had perceived them, for they had quickened pace and were galloping forward at full whip.

"This way!" shouted Frank, turning off down a side track that led to the right.

The track wound through a belt of tall thickets, and into the heart of these thickets the young fellow spurred, keeping a tight hold on Rex's bridle. As for Dorothy, she lost no time in riding after him, and Rinty took the same course, but they had gone no more than a couple of hundred yards when Frank pulled up with a sharp tug on his pony's rein.

"Dorothy," he rapped out, "Rex seems pretty fagged. I guess he's been doing a lot of travelling since last night. He sure is holding back, anyway, and Crawford's men are liable to catch up with us."

"What are you going to do, then, Frank?"

"Trick them," was the answer. "We'll turn my horse loose with Rinty. He'll pass for Rex, and there's every chance of those rats following him. Then we'll double back on to the other trail and make straight for the academy."

He dismounted quickly, and unhitching the girth-strap that was around his pony's belly, he removed the saddle from his back and slapped him smartly across the hind quarters.

"Go on!" he panted. "Get out of here, old fellow. Go on, now!"

The horse obeyed him, stressed as his command was by the prompting of his hand. Down the side track the animal sped, and then Frank called to Rinty.

"You, too, boy!" he ordered. "After him! That should help to fool Crawford's men. Go on, after him!"

Just as he had driven off his mount, so he managed to urge Rinty in pursuit of the horse, after which he turned to Dorothy and motioned to the depths of the vegetation.

"Now to hide," he said. "Go on,

Dorothy, push right into the middle of the thickets."

The girl forced her pony into the brushwood, and Frank accompanied her, pulling Rex with him. A few seconds later he and the girl were lost in the foliage, and they waited there in silence, holding the heads of the two horses to prevent them from uttering any sound that might betray them.

They had not been under cover long when the pounding of hoofs struck upon their ears, and in another moment Mitchell and his confederates were careering past their place of concealment.

Frank and Dorothy waited until the men had gone by, and then the stalwart young sportsman made haste to saddle Rex and climb astride him; and, almost before the hoof-beats of their enemies' mustangs had died away, the polo player and the girl were returning to the trail on which they had first espied the crooks.

Once on that trail they struck out for the east at the best speed which the somewhat wearied Rex could attain, and they had covered a distance of a quarter of a mile when Frank spoke to Dorothy in a hopeful tone.

"I wonder how long it will be before Crawford's men discover they're on a false scent?" he grunted. "If only we can get a good start they'll never catch up with us before we reach the academy."

He did not know it, but at that very instant Mitchell and his associates were on the far side of the brushwood thickets, and having cleared the vegetation, were riveting their eyes on Rinty and the stallion that resembled Rex.

"There they go!" Jones cried out, pointing to the fleeing animals. "But say, what's happened to Bradley and that Bruce girl?"

"Never mind them," Anderson rasped. "They've lost their nerve, I reckon, and turned the god horse adrift. Come on, that's Rex all right, for the wolfhound's with him."

The gangsters spurred on, galloping after the fugitive stallion and the dog which was accompanying it, and though they gained upon the two animals rapidly, it was not until they were within thirty or forty yards of them that they realised they had been fooled.

"Hey!" bellowed Mitchell. "That's not the black Arabian!"

He reined in, and the others did the same, peering suspiciously and malevolently at the stallion they had been chasing.

"You're right, Mitch!" Jones snarled all at once. "Bradley has out-smarted us. He's switched horses, and right now I'll bet he's ridin' the black Arabian to the academy on the upper trail."

Martin came out with a blistering oath.

"Yeah?" he barked. "Well, if you cut across by Navajo Draw we've still got a chance of headin' them off before they ever get to the academy. Come on, Mitchell—come on, you fellers!"

The men swung their broncs hard round, and, skirting the brushwood, they raced over the prairie levels until they reached Navajo Draw. Then, sweeping on through this, they left it behind them and set their mounts at a stiff slope, and five minutes later they were in sight of the upper trail, where it crossed a barren plateau.

"There's Bradley an' the Bruce dame now!"

The words were spoken by Mitchell, and as he flung out his arm the other men saw their quarry riding through some rocks a little way ahead of them. The crooks took up the pursuit, goring the flanks of their ponies with their spur-rowels. But already Frank and Dorothy had become aware of them, and man and girl pressed onward fiercely in an effort to keep their distance.

It was a forlorn effort, as Frank realised only too well on looking back just before they turned a bend in the road. For he was quick to note that the rogues were coming up fast—the four of them strung out in single file, with Mitchell in the lead, and Jones, Martin and Anderson following him in that order.

Immediately after he had rounded that bend in the trail, however, a plan of action occurred to Frank, and he rapidly outlined it to Dorothy as they rode neck-and-neck.

"Listen," he told her, "I'm going to duck into the rocks, but I want you to keep right on. Crawford's men won't miss me, for the road curves like a snake, and so long as they can only see your dust they'll never guess that you're alone."

"But what do you aim to do?" the girl panted.

"Take those guys from the rear one at a time," Frank answered. "Dorothy, you remember the year I went to South America with the U.S. polo team? Well, I lived down there on an Argentine ranch for a spell, and I learned a trick that's going to stand me in good stead now."

Dorothy failed to understand his meaning, but there was no time for lengthy explanations, and, entreating her to push forward without him, he swerved off into the boulders that lined the roadside and slid from Rex's back.

Obedient to his instructions, Dorothy rode on at unabated speed and disappeared along the trail; and by the time she had vanished Frank had unhitched a lariat that was slung on his saddle-peg and had cut a length from the rawhide rope.

He then selected a couple of fair-sized stones, many of which were lying around, and he bound these securely to the ends of the rawhide strip, thus making an improvised bola such as he had seen used by South American cowboys of Indian stock.

He had scarcely completed his preparations when Mitchell came charging round the bend, flailing his bone ruthlessly and driving it hard with the spur.

Hidden amongst the rocks, Frank let him go past, and also remained inactive when Jones and Martin hove into sight. But the instant that Anderson appeared, the ace of the Bruce polo field adopted a tense attitude.

Mitchell, Jones and Martin had dashed round another curve farther along the trail. Anderson was pounding after them when something sang through the air, something that whizzed straight and true for him.

It was the bola that Frank had improvised, and he had made his throw with a skill that might have drawn praise from an expert of the Argentine pampas, for the weighted rope snared Anderson cleanly and wrapped itself round his body like a whiplash, pinioning his arms.

Taken utterly by surprise, the man lost his seat and plunged from his mustang, crashing to the dusty trail and rolling for several yards before he brought up in the shadow of a huge boulder.

Breathless and shaken as he was, he managed somehow to disentangle himself from the bola and struggle to his feet. But even as he rose he saw Frank sprinting towards him, and before he could reach for his hip the younger man was upon him.

... You'll find them in the BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL—and are they tough? This grand, illustrated article tells you about the men you admire. And it's only one of dozens of gripping features, yarns of adventure and the glorious West, SEVEN long Film Stories, scores of photographs and articles about Filmland and the stars—160 pages in all!

Buy Your Copy Today!

Of all Newsagents and Booksellers 3/6

Anderson gave vent to a hoarse cry. In that same instant Frank clutched him with one hand and with the other snapped his bunched knuckles to the point of the gangster's jaw.

The punch travelled no more than six inches, but it landed like the kick of a mule, and the impact scattered Anderson's wits. Down he slumped, to sink in a heap on the roadway as Frank let go of him, and he was still lying there in an inert condition when the polo player darted back into the boulders to secure Rex.

Frank's object now was to catch up with Martin, and in anticipation of this he had recovered the bola with which he had unhorsed Anderson. At the same time he knew that he could not hope to overtake Martin by keeping to the trail, with Rex in such a poor condition. But, since the road wound so tortuously here, it might be possible to achieve his purpose if he forged a direct course amongst the scattered boulders.

It was an idea that might have occurred to Crawford's men themselves if they had been alert enough in mind. But, as it was, Frank's was the only brain that conceived it, and he wasted no time in putting it into practice.

About a minute later he reached a wide bend in the road just as Mitchell was swinging round it, and once again, in the shelter of the rocks, Frank allowed that worthy to pass unchallenged. Likewise did he permit Jones to flash by, but as Martin showed up he prepared himself for action.

It was many months since Frank Bradley had idly practised the throwing of a bola under the tuition of the South American ranches at whose home he had stayed. But he proved now that he had not forgotten the art, and that his adroit handling of Anderson had been no mere fluke.

For, just as Anderson had been snared and unhorsed, so the rogue known as Martin also met his downfall by the improvised bola.

It caught him with that same whiplash effect, and before he could utter so much as a cry he tumbled out of his saddle and dived to the ground, finishing up with his head in a patch of scrub alongside the trail.

Frank started out at him from the rocks, and at that same instant saw him struggle up, saw him cast off the improvised bola savagely. He was also alive to the fact that Mitchell and Jones were still in view, for the road here ran straight as an arrow for two or three hundred yards until it turned off along the edge of a steep declivity.

But he had to take the risk of Mitchell and Jones turning their heads and catching sight of him. For it was obvious that Martin would attract their attention unless he was silenced as effectively as Anderson had been.

It was as Frank was running towards Martin that the latter perceived him, and the man instantly dropped his hand to his hip, but the gun that he expected to find there was missing. It must have been jerked from its holster when the crook had fallen from his horse, and it was nowhere to be seen now though a search in the scrub may have located it.

Martin had no time to make that search, for Frank was almost upon him, so he chose the alternative of wheeling round and attempting to hail his accomplices.

Before he could raise a cry, however, Frank leaped on him and knocked him senseless with a punch that carried all his weight behind it.

(Continued on page 27)
November 28th, 1926.

"THE LAST OF THE MOHICANS"

(Continued from page 19)

watched but made no move to interfere.

The Indians parried and struck with their tomahawks with the skill of fencers. Suddenly they came to grips and rolled over and over on the ground. Though nigh on half a century in years Chingachgook possessed muscles of steel and at last was on top, holding Magua's armed hand helpless to the ground with his left, while in his right the tomahawk was poised aloft.

Magua's free hand tried to stay the blow. For a moment the two enemies glared their hatred at each other, and then Chingachgook wrenched his hand free and brought his tomahawk down with fearful force on Magua's skull.

Heyward Strikes

SILHOUETTED in the mist against the sky, near the edge of a huge lake, were two cairns containing the bodies of the unfortunate Uncas and Cora, united in death as they never could have been in life. Hawkeye and Heyward stood with bowed heads while Chingachgook spoke over the bier of his son.

"Great Spirit," cried Chingachgook, "a warrior goes to you, swift and straight and unseen as an arrow shot into the sun. Welcome him and let him take his place at the council fire of my tribe which burns for ever on the endless plains of the Happy Hunting Ground, for he is Uncas, my son. Bid them patience and bid death speed, for they are all there but one—I, Chingachgook—last of the Mohicans."

As solemnly, Heyward recited all he could remember of the Church of England burial service for Cora. The last rites observed, Hawkeye and Heyward held a consultation on the best method of saving Alice.

The chances seemed hopeless, for the guards would be more watchful than ever. To attack the Huron village was out of the question. Hawkeye could think of only one plan.

"If the Hurons had a prisoner they prized more highly than Alice," he said slowly, "they would make an exchange."

Heyward understood at once.

"I'll go."

Hawkeye shook his head.

"I said a prisoner they valued more highly. In this war they've had British officers by the bushel. But they've waited a long time to burn me."

Heyward was incensed, but this time he concealed his irritation because a plan was forming in his mind.

"Do these Hurons know you?" he asked.

"Only by costume," Hawkeye touched himself. "It's kind of distinctive. Magua knew, but he is dead."

Heyward smiled and waited his chance. It came sooner than he had expected. Hawkeye suggested that Chingachgook should watch out for signs of Huron scouts, and the two men were left alone. Heyward waited until the scout turned his back, then, wrenching out his pistol, hit Hawkeye a sharp blow over the head with the butt-end. The scout fell to the ground and lay still.

The officer bent over the still form, and was relieved to find that Hawkeye's heart was still beating. Then, with a grim smile, he began to unfasten Hawkeye's clothes. He stripped Hawkeye and took off his own tattered finery. Swiftly he dressed Hawkeye in his own uniform, before putting on the suit of skin and the helmet of fur. Picking up the long-barrelled musket, Heyward disappeared into the trees in the direction of the Huron village.

A few minutes later Hawkeye sat up and rubbed his head, then stared in amazement at his attire.

Which was the Dreaded Hawkeye?

IN the centre of the Huron village a stake had been erected—it was for Alice. The women were busy piling brushwood around the foot of the stake. Hundreds of torches lit up the scene as Heyward approached the village. Fearlessly he strode forward, holding up his hand in a sign of peace. The Hurons gave way and stared at him as he walked calmly up to the stake.

"I am Hawkeye," he said. "The blood brother of the Mohicans. My rifle has slain many of your warriors." The warriors muttered angrily, though they did not understand all that he said, but the withered old Sachem knew the English tongue, and peered at him from rheumy eyes.

"What does the Yengeese want?" he asked.

"You have Paleface woman prisoner here. What are you going to do with her?"

"She dies in our fire."

"There is no honour in burning a woman"—Heyward had gained a knowledge through Hawkeye of how to speak with Indians—"but there is honour for the Hurons if a warrior burns." He touched his chest. "A warrior as great as Hawkeye."

When the Sachem told the Hurons they were incredulous. They would not believe that so redoubtable a warrior as Hawkeye would go to the stake in place of a squaw. The Sachem asked if they were willing to let the squaw go and to burn Hawkeye in his place. Their screams of fiendish agreement brought Alice to the flap of her tepee.

"Hawkeye's word is good." The Sachem nodded his head. "The Hurons promise to let squaw go."

At a signal two warriors seized Heyward and swiftly bound him to the stake. Alice was led from the tepee, and she cried out when she saw him.

"Duncan!"

"I am Hawkeye!" Heyward flashed her a warning glance.

"Now that's interesting," a voice drawled out of the shadows. "And maybe I'm the major. I never thought they'd make me into a Redcoat."

Hawkeye stepped forward into the light, and the Hurons eyed the newcomer in amazement. The Sachem strode up to him.

"Who are you?"

"I am Hawkeye."

The Sachem stared in bewilderment at the two men who were so alike in build.

"Do you want proof?" demanded Hawkeye. "If so, bring us a rifle."

The Sachem rubbed his wrinkled chin, then his cunning brain caught the drift of Hawkeye's plan. Hawkeye was one of their most deadly enemies, and many had perished through his marvellous shooting. Yes, a gun would certainly prove which was Hawkeye. He spoke a few words, Heyward was freed, and Hawkeye's long-barrelled musket was produced.

"Pick your target, major," mocked Hawkeye.

Heyward considered himself a good shot. He must beat this boasting braggart. He was determined to make the great sacrifice.

"The gourd by the door," suggested Heyward.

"That?" Hawkeye laughed scornfully. "Why, I could spit in it." He looked round, then spoke in the Huron tongue to one of the warriors. "Put a clay jug on that stake."

The distance was so great that in the torchlight the jug was hardly visible. Heyward frowned angrily.

"You mean to try and hit that—by torchlight?"

The Sachem cackled shrilly.

"Hawkeye can hit it," he cried.

Heyward steeled himself, lifted the rifle and took careful aim. The bullet shattered the jug, leaving only a small fragment on the stake. The Hurons cried that surely this must be Hawkeye.

But the real Hawkeye only smiled, grasped the gun and let the barrel drop carelessly into his palm. The piece was fired as if by impact—the fragment of jug disappeared.

The Huron whooped their approval, their animosity for the moment forgotten. The Sachem came and stood in front of Heyward.

"You creep into village and tell lie like singing bird. Take squaw and go. When sun come over hills, my braves go look for you."

Alice was led forward and the bonds around her wrists removed. She stepped up to Hawkeye with a little cry of anguish, but he spoke softly and urgently.

"You have until sunrise before they start after you. Chingachgook's watching. He'll find you and take you to safety. He's not to come back for me. My orders, major. Do you understand? You have to think only of Miss Munro."

Alice flung her arms around Hawkeye and began to kiss him with the passion of despair. The guards pulled her away.

"Go!" the Sachem ordered.

Heyward stared at Hawkeye, and his heart was sad, for he knew now that this scout was the bravest man he had ever met. Heyward and Alice left the Indian village and trudged silently through the dark forest. Alice was weeping.

"Father—Cora—Uncas—and now Hawkeye—the greatest spirit of them all."

Heyward nodded a gloomy assent and gripped Hawkeye's rifle as the bushes rustled. It was Chingachgook, who for once seemed quite excited.

"What is it?" Heyward asked in alarm.

"Many come. Yengeese."

Heyward gave a cry of joy.

"Lead me to them quickly!" he ordered. "Providence has intervened in the nick of time. We will save Hawkeye."

They plunged through the underbrush after the swift-moving Chingachgook. Soon they heard the sounds of many marching feet.

A Terrible Ordeal

HAWKEYE, bound to the stake, viewed quietly the preparations for his torture. The crones piled brushwood round him till it was up to his knees. The Indians began to dance round to the sound of the tom-toms until all was in readiness. Then the Sachem gave an order and the Indian warriors squatted in rows around him, watching his face keenly for signs of fear. Screams of fiendish glee came from the women as an old hag brought in a burning brand and set fire to the brushwood. The brushwood was dry as tinder, and soon smoke began to curl around Hawkeye's body.

The tom-toms deadened the noises of the forest. The Hurons never expected an attack, and as it was not often one saw a warrior burn, every man was round that blazing stake. Therefore Chingachgook was able to lead the soldiers to the Huron village without anybody hearing their approach.

The flames were licking Hawkeye's face. The sweat poured down his tanned cheeks as he forced himself not to scream out in agony.

A volley rang out. Several Hurons plunged forward and lay still. The others jumped to their feet and rushed for their arms. The women and children scattered, screaming, adding to the confusion. The surprise was so sudden that the Hurons were unable to form any sort of defence. Guns blazed at them from all directions, and the blazing fire made them easy targets. They were mown down in dozens.

Chingachgook was the first to reach the stake, with Heyward close at his heels. They kicked away the burning brands, then Chingachgook slashed away the bonds with his knife. Hawkeye reeled forward unsteadily and was caught in Heyward's arms.

"Thanks, major," he muttered hoarsely. "It was getting a little warm."

Heyward's grin belied his words. "I was always sure you were born to hang," he cried, and held out his hand in friendship.

The Court-martial

HAWKEYE'S rescuers were part of an advance guard under General Abercrombie. Regulations were regulations, and having saved Hawkeye from torture, they took him back to Albany to be tried by court-martial. Alice was terribly worried, though Heyward assured her that there was a very good chance that Hawkeye would not hang.

Strangely enough, at the court-martial Hawkeye had an able defender in Major Heyward, who was presumably pressing the charges.

The officers of the court sat back in their chairs and stared at the prisoner. Their expression was admiring, because many of them knew of the bravery and sacrifice of this scout. Whether Hawkeye pleaded "Guilty" or otherwise, they were determined not to hang him. They had other ideas about his fate.

"He did instigate the men leaving the fort," stated Major Heyward. "But let me recall to you that had he not, those men would never have met your force to save them from an Ottawa ambush, and you, General Abercrombie, might not be here to pass judgment on him. Also it has been proven that the Hurons and Ottawas did intend to have a general massacre among the settlements. He could have gone with those Colonials, but he chose to stay and face the results of his insubordination. Also, it is true that on that occasion he struck an officer. I am that officer, so you may believe me when I say that if he is guilty of insubordination, I am guilty of exceeding my command by goading him to it."

General Abercrombie and the other officers smiled. The general rapped on the long table for silence.

"May I ask, major, if you stand before this court as his accuser, or his defender?"

"Neither, general—I am merely telling the whole truth."

"Since you are so familiar with the case," continued the general, "I would welcome a recommendation."

"I would recommend that he be attached to the British Army as a scout," Heyward cried, and smiled across at the erect Hawkeye.

The general laughed.

"An excellent suggestion, Major Heyward, and one that had occurred to this court. Not only is it our wish that you should join the British Army"—the general stood up and held out his hand—"but that you should take over the command of the scouts."

Hawkeye gripped the outstretched hand.

"I will be pleased to accept the ruling of this court, sir."

The time had come for parting. Major Heyward was to return to England to report to the king and Pitt that the Colonials were entirely on the side of the British and that a big force under Abercrombie was starting on the march against the French, and had every confidence of victory.

And Alice? Heyward had offered to escort her back to England. Quite simply she had told him that her place was in America. Was it because of Hawkeye that she stayed?

"I love him, Duncan," were her simple words. "But whether he needs me or not I feel that there is work for me to do here. I feel that my father—and Cora—would like me to remain. Good-bye, Duncan."

"Good-bye, Alice," Heyward said as he bade her farewell. "It is with regret that I go, but your decision is just what I expected. Good luck!"

And what of Hawkeye? His way led into the wilderness, to paths as yet untrod by the Paleface. He was a pathfinder—a pioneer. And his life was not one to be shared by a delicate English girl, used to the ways of the civilised world. He squared his shoulders and told her that it must be good-bye.

"You will return to England and forget."

"I will not return to England, and, even if I did, I should never forget you." Her eyes were bright. "Once you said you loved me."

"I do—I always shall," he told her.

"You have your duty to perform. You are a soldier now. I am a soldier's daughter. I shall be waiting for you here in Albany when you return. You will return to me."

"When we have crushed the French I will return to Albany as swift as an arrow." Hawkeye laughed happily, for he had hated the idea of parting from Alice for ever. Now he had two incentives—England and Alice.

On a glorious sunny morning the drums rolled and the bugles sounded, and once again the British Army mustered for parade. It was a larger, better-equipped force, with plenty of guns and a large wagon train. General Abercrombie reviewed his army, and on a raised platform was Alice.

An officer roared a command: "Forward! On to Canada!"

The whole army swung into line with the Colonial irregulars in the lead, with Hawkeye and Chingachgook leading them. Hawkeye's shoulders were squared and he marched like a man with a purpose—a purpose to help conquer Canada for the English and then return to claim the love of Alice Munro.

(The film story of this James Fenimore Cooper classic is by permission of United Artists Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Randolph Scott as Hawkeye, Binnie Barnes as Alice, and Henry Wilcoxon as Major Heyward.)

PIANO ACCORDIONS BY ALL THE MOST FAMOUS MAKERS

From WEEKLY

BONELLI, STELDENI, VISSIMIO, PANCOTTI, HOHNER, PAOLO SOPRANI, CRUCIANELLI, Etc.

USED AND RECOMMENDED BY BAND LEADERS —BUY AN ACCORDION BY A FAMED MAKER

£5.5.0 Value for 47/6.

Real Piano Accordions at specially reduced prices. Piano-finished cabinet. Tonal reeds, metal-bound bellows, triple-chord action. Complete with shoulder strap. 21 piano keys, 8 basses. Send 2/6 only first instalment. Balance payable 4/- monthly until 52/6 is paid; or cash within 7 days 47/6 only. Write for fully illustrated list of models with 25 keys, 12 bass; 25 keys, 24 bass; 34 keys, 48 bass; 41 keys, 120 bass, etc., etc. All on equally attractive terms. The remarkably Low Terms for Monthly Payments ensure the immediate popularity of these fine instruments.

J. A. DAVIS & Co. (Dept. A.P.50) 94-104, Denmark Hill, London, S.E.5.

Please find enclosed P.O. 2/6, First Instalment for Accordion on approval, to be refunded if instrument not approved. Guaranteed by 'Boy's Cinema.' Please send me, post free, fully illustrated brochure of Piano Accordions.

NAME..... ADDRESS.....

SHOW THIS TO DAD

32 FREE BILLIARD TABLES. Send for details and price list.

8/- DOWN obtains delivery of a Riley 'Home' Billiard Table, carriage paid. 7 Days' Free Trial. Balance monthly. Write for Art List.

E. J. RILEY, ENSIGN WORKS, ACCRINGTON, or Dept. 30, 147, Aldersgate Street, LONDON, E.C.1.

"POSTAL INSPECTOR"

(Continued from page 18)

said, and at last he consented to her plan.

"All right," he breathed. "But if you don't show up again in five minutes I'm coming in after you."

She climbed out of the motor-boat, and, entering the Feltham apartment-house, proceeded to mount a flight of stairs after directing a cursory glance at the doors which led off the hall. But it was not until she had ascended to the third floor that she came upon the flat that was numbered 33a.

She moved close to the door of the flat in question, and as she laid her ear against the panels she heard the murmur of voices; and though it was impossible for her to catch what was being said, she could have sworn that one of those voices was Benez's.

She was right. For Benez was on the other side of the door with Roach and Evans.

"So this is where you hid out when you first came to Millstown," Evans had just observed.

"Yes," Benez answered. "The Schultz mob were after me then, and I stayed here under cover till I heard that the gang had been wiped out in a gun-battle with the police. Then I negotiated that loan with Carter in New York, and came back to Millstown to open the Golden Eagle. But I had a sentimental attachment for this apartment-house, so I bought the place and kept number 33a vacant. I always had an idea that I might need a hide-out again sometime."

Evans drew in his breath.

"Lucky you had that idea," he commented. "It sure looked as if we were in a tough spot when we got caught in that flood."

"We're still in a tough spot," said Benez. "We managed to wade here and dry off our clothes. But we can't wade out of town, especially with the water up to the second story in some of the streets."

"Why worry?" put in Roach. "Nobody knows that we were the guys who pulled off that mail job."

His employer looked at him bitterly. "But the police have a way of finding out these things," he retorted. "I tell you I won't feel safe until we're across the State line with that three million dollars."

"And the only way of gettin' out of Millstown and across the State line is by boat," Evans growled. "That's what we need, Benez. A boat—and a fast boat at that. But how to lay our hands—"

He checked abruptly, for it was at this instant that there was a knock on the door, and on a sudden the three crooks were looking at one another in alarm. Then, while Roach and Evans dropped their hands to their hips significantly, Benez moved across to answer the summons.

He opened the door in a guarded fashion, and as he saw Connie his features registered an expression of mingled relief and surprise—an expression that was likewise reflected on the faces of his two accomplices as they withdrew their hands from the vicinity of their hip-pockets.

"Why, Miss Larrimore!" Benez exclaimed.

"I've been looking all over town for you," Connie said breathlessly. "Why didn't you let me know where you were?"

Benez admitted her, but closed the door somewhat hurriedly when she had entered. Meanwhile, in a cursory glance round the room, Connie had noticed three travelling bags that stood in a corner. She took care to pay no particular heed to them, however, for the eyes of Roach and Evans were upon her.

Was it possible that those bags contained the money that had been stolen from the mail truck? Was it possible that Bill Davis' suspicions were correct after all?

"Miss Larrimore, what is it you want to see me about?" Benez queried, interrupting her thoughts.

"Oh, I'm in an awful jam," she began, "and so are you, if you only knew it. It's about that mail robbery."

Benez exchanged a quick glance with his associates.

"Mail robbery?" he echoed in a tone of well-feigned bewilderment.

"Then you don't know anything about it!" Connie said. "Oh, that's what I thought, Mr. Benez. But will you come with me and tell Postal Inspector Davis so?"

"My dear, what are you talking about? What have I got to do with this matter?"

The girl made haste to explain.

"Well, the car that was used in the robbery was one that I had borrowed, you see. And Inspector Davis knows that I told you about those banknotes being shipped. You remember? So he thinks that we were working together, you and I. He thinks you organised the robbery, Mr. Benez."

"Ridiculous!" the foreigner scoffed.

"Of course it's ridiculous," Connie agreed. "But we've got to convince the inspector that we're innocent. Will you come with me?"

The man's impulse was to hedge, of course, but all at once a crafty gleam appeared in his eyes and he took a step nearer to the girl.

"Well," he murmured, "I'm pretty busy right now. But if you had a good fast boat, so I could get back here quickly—"

"Why, yes, Mr. Benez," Connie replied. "There's a boat downstairs—a National Guard speedboat."

Roach moved to the window, threw up the sash and stared down into the flooded street.

"Yeah, the dame's right, Benez," he said over his shoulder. "The boat's down there, and it's got young Charlie Davis in it."

"Young Davis, eh?" The foreigner's lids narrowed. "Tell him to come up here, Roach."

His confederate did his bidding, attracting Charlie's attention with a hail.

"Hey, Davis—Miss Larrimore wants you," he called, whereupon Connie started forward with a look of misgiving on her pretty face.

"What do you mean, Roach?" she demanded. "I didn't say I wanted to see Charlie. Benez, what's the idea of bringing Charlie Davis up here?"

The night-club owner had gripped her by the wrist. Roach was turning from the window and smiling a cryptic smile. Evans was also hovering near, with a devilish grin on his lips.

"I think the boat may be a little too crowded with you and young Davis in it, Miss Larrimore," Benez remarked.

For a moment Connie gazed at him in silence, and then she found her voice. "Benez!" she gasped. "You did do it!"

She tried to wrench free, and, failing to break his grasp, attempted to raise an alarm that would be heard all over the building. But before she could utter a sound Roach had leapt to his employer's aid and clapped a hand over the girl's mouth.

"Evans," the big fellow grated. "Davis is on his way up. Leave the door ajar and stand alongside it. Get him as he comes in."

"That's it, Evans," Benez assented. "Get him as he comes in."

Evans unfastened the door and took a position close to it, with his back against the wall and an automatic pistol in his hand. As for Benez and Roach, they kept a tight hold on Connie, making certain that she could neither move nor cry out.

It was in vain that the girl struggled. Eyes riveted on the door, awaiting the arrival of her companion, the two crooks saw to it that she gave no warning.

Thirty seconds elapsed, and then Charlie Davis crossed the threshold—to receive the full force of a stunning blow as Evans clubbed him with the butt of his gun. An instant later the young bank clerk was sprawled senseless on the floor, and, spurning his prostrate body, Roach and Benez dragged Connie towards a pantry at the far side of the room, locking her in there after they gagged and bound her.

This done, the three bandits lost no time in quitting their hide-out, snatching up those leather bags which Connie had noticed on first entering the flat; and ere long the scoundrels were installed in the speedboat that fate had placed in their possession.

Roach at the wheel, they stormed down the flooded street with the throttle wide open, and the note of the motor-boat's engine was fading away into the quiet of the night when another launch entered Lincoln Drive and glided to a halt outside the Feltham apartment-house.

It was the police launch occupied by Bill and Pottle, and the two representatives of the postal department were soon reconnoitring the building. But it was not until they gained the third floor that their attention was drawn to No. 33a by the sound of someone kicking against the panels of a door inside that particular flat.

They entered to discover the prone form of Charlie, and while Bill proceeded to revive the young fellow, Pottle traced the sounds which had brought them there, and which now seemed to be coming from a pantry in the far wall.

A few seconds later Connie Larrimore had been released and was telling her story, and by the time she had finished speaking Charlie Davis was on his feet again.

"So Benez and his confederates have got away in your boat, eh?" Bill said. "Well, we came into the drive from the north, and they didn't pass us. That means they must have headed south. Come on!"

They hurried downstairs and piled into the launch that was moored at the porch. Then they set out in pursuit, and as the craft swept forward along the water-logged thoroughfare Bill tuned-in to police headquarters on the radio with which the boat was equipped.

"Calling WLPD—calling WLPD! Hallo! Police department? This is Davis of the Post Office. We have located the mail-truck bandits. Headed south from Lincoln Drive. Notify your patrols in this area."

The launch raced on, and, with Pottle steering, Bill brought into play a searchlight that was a fitment of the sleek and powerful vessel. And less than five minutes afterwards the beam of that searchlight picked up the National Guard boat in which Benez and his accomplices were attempting to escape.

The craft that contained Bill and his party had a turn of speed which the fugitives' boat could not match, and it was soon clear to the bandits that they must be overtaken. Thus it was with the desperation of hard-pressed men that Benez and Evans opened fire on the pursuers, but even as the first shots blazed from their guns they heard the wail of a police siren, and in another moment they were cut off by a launch that came swerving out of a side-turning ahead of them.

There were four uniformed officers in it, and, caught between two hostile parties, the crooks pulled close to a block of single-storied timber buildings on the left.

They swarmed on to the flat roofs of these buildings and raced forward, hoping against hope that they could make their getaway across them. But they had not gone far when they were balked by a gap where the flood had undermined one of the structures and brought it crashing down earlier in the day.

Meanwhile the police boat had turned, and, travelling on a parallel course, it brought up on the other side of the street, opposite the spot where the bandits had been checked.

A vicious gun-duel now ensued—the officers of the law firing upwards from the water-logged thoroughfare, Benez and his associates pumping lead at them from the roof-top on which they were crouching—and the blasts of revolvers and automatics were echoing through the night when Bill Davis' launch moved alongside the police boat.

Charlie, quite recovered by this time, had drawn his service .45, and it was adding to the tumult when his brother Bill suddenly thrust Pottle out of the steering position and took the helm.

He had noticed that the roof on which the crooks had halted was perched precariously on one or two wooden pillars, all that remained of a building that had partially collapsed, and it had occurred to him that if one of those supports were knocked asunder the vantage-point of the gangsters might be completely wrecked.

"Sit tight!" he shouted to Charlie, Pottle and Connie, and then, switching open the throttle, he drove the speedboat straight for the corner-post.

The bandits realised his purpose too late. Before they could concentrate their fire on the launch it had passed beneath the scope of their view, and, smashing into the pillar for which Bill had aimed, it swerved off even as the beam of timber was split by the impact.

There was a rending crack, and the roof tipped crazily, plunging three desperate gunmen and their spoil into fourteen feet of water; and sixty seconds later those same three gunmen were glad enough to be hauled limply into the speedboats as sorry captives, each being relieved of a dripping leather bag as he was dragged aboard.

Some days later a young man and a girl were listening to a radio broadcast in a cosy apartment which overlooked one of the principal streets in Millstown.

The young man was Charlie Davis, and the girl was Connie Larrimore, late of the stage, for she had retired from the theatrical profession and was looking forward to the job of keeping house for a promising employee of the Federal Reserve Bank.

And the radio broadcast, after dealing with the steady decline of the floodwaters that had swept the State, was now commenting upon the fact that Benez, Evans and Roach were on their way to the penitentiary to serve life sentences in that institution.

It was just after this item of news had been retailed that a large coloured woman entered the room in which Charlie and Connie were seated. She was Deborah, the former stage star's maid, and she was grinning broadly.

"A 'phone call, Miss Larrimore," she announced. "From Washington. Ah guess it must be Mistah Bill. You-all said he'd gone to de Capitol agin to be pussanally commended by de President fo' his services, didn't you?"

Connie was already on her feet, and she hurried out into the hall to pick up the receiver of the telephone.

"Hallo!" she called. "Is that you, Bill? Oh, gee, we were hoping you'd be back to-night. Charlie and I are going to have a little celebration. But you'll be here to-morrow, won't you? We're depending on you to be the best man at our wedding, you know."

From distant Washington came Bill's enthusiastic reply.

"I'll be there," he declared. "Nothing will stop me. And say, Connie."

"Yes, brother-in-law to be?"

"Tell Charlie," said Bill, "that I think he's the luckiest guy in the world."

Connie replaced the telephone-receiver with a smile, and then made her way back to the lounge where Charlie was seated.

"It was Bill all right," she remarked. "He's still in Washington, so he won't be back to-night. But he's promised to be in in time for the wedding to-morrow."

"Then he'll be here," her fiance answered emphatically. "The Post Office never fails. You ought to know that by now, Connie."

She nodded gaily and sat down beside him, nestling close to his shoulder.

"Oh, by the way, Charlie," she mentioned presently. "Bill asked me to give you a message. He said I was to tell you that you are the luckiest fellow in the world."

"He did?" murmured Charlie, slipping his arm around her. "Well, I guess he's just about right, isn't he?"

Connie gave him a sidelong glance. "Maybe," she rejoined. "But I think I'm pretty lucky myself, Charlie!"

(A Universal Picture, by permission of London General Film Distributors, Ltd., starring Ricardo Cortez, Patricia Ellis, Bela Lugosi and Michael Loring.)

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"THE LAST OF THE MOHICANS"
—Hawkeye, Randolph Scott; Alice Munro, Binnie Barnes; Cora Munro, Heather Angel; Major Duncan Heyward, Henry Wilcoxon; Colonel Munro, Hugh Buckler; Magua, Bruce Cabot; Chingachgook, Robert Barrat; Uncas, Phillip Reed; Winthrop, Willard Robertson; Jenkins, Will Stanton.

"POSTAL INSPECTOR"—Bill Davis, Ricardo Cortez; Connie Larrimore, Patricia Ellis; Benez, Bela Lugosi; Charlie Davis, Michael Loring; Pottle, Wallis Clark; Deborah, Hattie McDaniels.

"THE ADVENTURES OF REX AND RINTY"

(Continued from page 23)

But, unluckily for Frank Bradley, Jones chanced to look back at that moment—saw Martin stretched out on the trail with his assailant bending over him—and promptly swung round a sharp corner to hail Mitchell, who was still in the lead.

"Hey, Mitch! Mitch, come back here!"

Mitchell pulled up, glanced round with a frown on his truculent features, and then turned to join his comrade on the bend.

"What's up?" he demanded.

"That hombre Bradley!" Jones hit out. "He's behind us."

"Behind us? What do you mean?"

Jones gave an impatient exclamation. "What I say," he retorted. "He's on the other side o' this bend. I just saw him snag Martin, and I reckon he's snagged Anderson, too, for there was no sign o' him."

"Did Bradley have that black stallion with him?"

"I think so," was the reply. "I saw somethin' movin' amongst the rocks. Smart guy, eh? Sends the Bruce girl ahead and then attacks us from the rear."

Mitchell scowled.

"Maybe not so smart!" he grated. "For this is where we snag him, pardner! Quick, get to cover. We'll stop him as he comes round the bend."

There was little cover at this point, for no rocks bordered the trail here. On one side of the road a sheer embankment rose to a height of fifty feet, with a few miserable saplings growing at its base. On the other the ground fell away in a long declivity matted with scrub.

"Down the slope," Mitchell went on. "You take the horses, Jones, and keep well outa sight. Here, gimme my lariat first."

He had dismounted, and, receiving the lasso, he slung the noose of it deftly across the trail and encircled one of the young saplings. Then he pulled on the lariat so that the sapling was bent to the ground and the rope lay taut athwart the roadway, almost unnoticeable.

Grasping the end of the lasso firmly, Mitchell sid over the brow of the slope and lay crouching there with his head just below the level of the trail. Meanwhile Jones had taken the horses still farther down to a forlorn coppice on the hillside.

A moment after he had settled himself in position, Mitchell heard the thudding of hoofs, and presently Frank and Rex were coming round the bend, for there was no opportunity of cutting off a corner here.

Raising himself, Mitchell saw horse and rider, and immediately let the taut rope slip through his hands—then clutched it again as the sapling on the other side of the trail took up the play.

The lariat had jerked to a height of eighteen inches, and Rex fouled it. Next instant the stallion was falling heavily, and, hurtling from his back, Frank hit the side of the road and went careering down the slope where Mitchell and Jones had been lying in wait.

(To be continued in another thrilling episode next week. By permission of Associated British Film Distributors, Ltd., starring Kane Richmond, Norma Taylor and Rex and Rinty.)

November 28th, 1936.

The News Reels

All letters to the Editor should be addressed to BOY'S CINEMA, Room 218, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Mob Outside DeMille Offices

A demonstration of eagerness on the part of several hundred extras to appear in Cecil B. DeMille's film, "The Plainsman," has resulted in the erection of a three-foot barbed-wire barrier at the Paramount studios. The wire was placed on top of the twelve-foot gate to the DeMille offices.

The gate afforded a daily mob scene for a week, since DeMille issued a call for "pioneer types" for "The Plainsman," in which Gary Cooper and Jean Arthur star. Hundreds of extras, old and young, bowshiskered and shaven, reported, most of them in costume.

DeMille soon selected the two hundred and fifty players he sought when he issued the call, but others kept on arriving.

Mixed with the Western types were turbaned Arabs, Hindus, Filipinos, Egyptians wearing fozzes, Hawaiians carrying instruments, Mexicans, Chinese, and Japanese. Many brought "trained" animals and birds, and parked outside the gate all day, hopeful of a chance to exhibit their pets' tricks to DeMille.

The strange feature of this curious congregation outside his office was that there was no reduction in the number of Biblical and Oriental types who appeared day after day, despite his announcement that the picture he was making was strictly a saga of the Western plains.

Paramount studio officials are prepared to provide DeMille with a moat, guards with swords and halberds, or machine-guns and tear gas bombs, and any other protection he needs if the demonstrations continue.

Hollywood's Little Men

Hollywood boasts of many strange institutions, but surely none stranger than the "Society of Little Men," a group of tiny people who make a living by "doubling" for child stars.

The members are not small enough to join a midget act, not large enough to be taken seriously in ordinary commercial or professional life.

"But," says Henry "Buddy" Stone, thirty-six years old, four feet ten inches tall, six stone six pounds in weight, and spokesman for the group, "Hollywood has provided a haven for us pint-size gentlemen.

"You see, child stars and feature players must have 'doubles' and 'stunt men' when they are called upon to do something dangerous. That's where we come in. Then, too, there is a law which prohibits children from working after ten o'clock at night. So when a studio finds it necessary to shoot late at night, that's where we come in again."

It is a combination of these circumstances that has given Stone and his fellows their latest picture assignment with Merle Oberon in Samuel Goldwyn's "Beloved Enemy." The script demanded that a number of children must fall from a fence. Stone and his group really do it, and because H. C. Potter, the director, likes to shoot his night scenes actually at night, the little men were in great demand throughout production.

"Growing," Stone points out, "is the great handicap. Only it's not our growing, it's the growth of the youngsters we double for. I stumped for Jackie Cooper in many of his pictures. In the past six months Jackie has grown so much he'd make two of me, so that's the end of that."

Occasionally Stone and his fellows can double for grown feminine players. He claims to have done some of his best work as Janet Gaynor and Rochelle Hudson—but in "long shots," of course.

So the next time you see your favourite feminine star fall from a horse, calm yourself with the thought that it is probably only little Buddy Stone.

"Go-getter" Harold

Harold Lloyd is nothing if not on the spot! The Paramount comedian has already applied for tickets for self and family for the 1940 Olympic Games in Tokyo.

He has been told that the order for seats will be duly honoured towards the end of 1939.

The Japanese, incidentally, are ardent supporters of Lloyd, who is now preparing to start on a new Paramount comedy. They call him Mik Ludo.

Music for "King Solomon's Mines"

The magnificent voice of Paul Robeson, internationally famous concert singer, screen, and stage star, will be heard in several songs in "King Solomon's Mines," the new Gaumont-British picture in which he plays the part of Unbopa, coloured Pretender to the throne of Kukuana.

Recording has already started on the three songs which Robeson will sing in the picture. These are "Kukuana Song," "Song of the Mountains," and "Trek Song."

All were composed by Miss Spoliansky, writer of the musical scores for many films starring Jan Kiepura and other singers.

THROW YOUR VOICE

Into a trunk under the bed or anywhere. Lots of fun fooling teacher, policemen or friends.

THE VENTRILO

A little instrument fits in the mouth out of sight; used with above for Bird Calls, etc. Anyone can use it. Never fails. A full course book on Ventriloquism, together with the Ventrilo. All for 6d., plus postage, 11d.

CATALOGUE OF NOVELTIES FREE
ELLISON & SON

(Dept. B.C.), 246, High Holborn, LONDON, W.C.1.

6d

BE TALL

Your Height increased in 12 days or no cost. Back. Complete Course, 5/-. Booklet free privately.
STEBBING SYSTEM (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

STAMMERING!

Cure yourself as I did. Particulars Free.—FRANK HUGHES, 7, Southampton Row, London, W.C.1.

STAMPS

300 DIFFERENT, incl. Airmail, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Pictorials, Colonials. Price 6d. (Abroad 1/4).—W. A. WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

NO DEPOSIT

A 30/- HAWAIIAN GUITAR FOR 6/9 CASH

Beautifully polished wahuhi finish. Wonderful volume and tone. Non-slip tuning. 8 melody strings. Overall length 17 1/2". Unbeatable value. You can learn to play this charming little instrument in a few hours with our Free Lightning Tutor. We will send you this Hawaiian Melody Guitar upon receipt of first payment of 1/-, and your promise to pay 1/- a week for 6 weeks. Send for our complete new Musical Catalogues, Post Paid.

GEORGE GROSE LUDGATE CIRCUS

TALL

Your height increased in 12 days or no cost. New discovery adds 2-5ins. I gained 4ins. Guaranteed safe. Full Course, 5/-. Details:

J. B. MORLEY, 8, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C.4.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry, Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back. Complete Course, 5/-. Details—L. A. Stebbing, (A), 28, Dean Rd., London N.W.2.

STAMPS

EXHIBITION SET FREE to approval applicants enclosing 2d. postage.
C. A. MASTERS, BROADSTONE, DORSET.

BE TALLER!

Inches put you miles ahead! Increased my height to 6ft. 3ins. Thousands gratified clients since 1907. Ware worthless imitators. 6d. stamp brings details.—A. P. ROSS, Height-Specialist, Scarborough.

BOYS'S CINEMA

THREE LONG
COMPLETE FILM THRILLERS
INSIDE!

No. 889. EVERY TUESDAY December 26th, 1936.

Starring

Freddie BARTHOLOMEW - Mickey ROONEY and Jackie COOPER

"THE DEVIL TAKES THE COUNT" A SCHOOLBOY THRILLER

A boy, unspoiled by luxury, goes to school in the Bowery and becomes involved with two older boys who are leaders of a gang. Their adventures bring them before the police and they are placed on probation, but they rebel and fall into the hands of desperate crooks. A thrilling yarn, starring Freddie Bartholomew, Mickey Rooney and Jackie Cooper

"THE DEVIL TAKES THE COUNT"

The Two Guardians

A LIMOUSINE drew up in front of a block of flats in a part of New York that could not have been termed fashionable. Children, ragged or badly clothed, gathered round to stare at the beautiful car. A woman, still handsome, got out of the car, and she drew her furs closer round her as if the atmosphere was chilly.

After her came a little lad. He was very clean and neatly dressed in an Etou suit.

"I shall only be a few minutes," the woman said to her chauffeur.

A frown appeared as she saw the way her son was looking towards the building and noted his eagerness to be on his way. They passed through swing doors into a cold stone corridor. Fancy having to climb stairs to the floors above—what a place! It infuriated her that her son was scampering up the stairs with an eagerness that made her heart ache with self-pity.

For six months she had done everything to banish from Claude's mind the memory of his father, and had failed miserably.

Jay and Hilda Pierce had quarrelled within a few months of their marriage, but the coming of a son had patched up their differences for a time. Eventually the boy was the issue that separated them. Jay had his ideas about his son, and Hilda had hers, and they were miles apart. She wanted his hair long, wearing velvet suits and acting as the best little boy ever born, but Jay wanted his son to grow up a man. Quarrels broke out afresh, and so there came a separation.

Mrs. Pierce was a very rich woman, but wealth had meant little to her husband. He was an artist, an architect, and a designer, and, in spite of his wife's money, had never given up working. Usually their quarrels had ended in the woman taunting her husband with the small success that had come his way.

A court of law had decided that they should have the custody of the child for six months at a time, but should either parent be considered unfit or unable to look after the child, then the custody would be reconsidered by the court. Hilda Pierce had thought that her husband would be unable to support the boy, and it enraged her shallow nature that he was making a small but reliable income. And provided he could provide his son with a roof over his head and proper food, Mrs. Pierce could litigate till she was blue in the face. Every six months she endeavoured to win the boy, and her earlier attempts to turn the boy against his father had taught her the folly of such conduct, for the only result was to make Claude adore his father all the more and turn against her. For five years this had been going on, and now another six months had passed.

Claude was going from the luxury of a beautiful home to live in a pigsty, and what maddened the woman so much was that she knew if Claude had been given his choice of luxury and every comfort with his mother or semi-poverty in Shumland with his father he would have chosen the latter.

They reached the fifth floor, and Claude turned to his mother.

"Do you think dad's at home?" he asked.

"I expect so, dear."

"If I whistle I wonder if he'll know it's me?" asked Claude. "I'll try."

He whistled not very well a few bars of a song that his father had taught him. Instantly there came the screeching of a chair, and then the door was flung open.

A tall, clean-shaven, handsome man stood there and held out his arms.

"Dad!" Claude shouted, and flung himself forward.

The two hugged each other, whilst the woman in the costly furs stood there and watched the scene with a bitter smile.

"I'm sorry, Hilda," Jay Pierce gave an apologetic smile. "Seeing the boy made me forget my manners. Do come inside."

"You need not bother to apologise," she said disdainfully as she swept by him into the room.

The big, well-lighted room seemed full of drawing-boards, easels, pictures, brushes, and paint-pots. This was no atmosphere for a carefully nurtured child. She walked to the windows and stared angrily at a sea of chimney-pots—smoke, squalor, and dirt. The homes of the poorer, working classes, and her son would rather be in this untidy, uncomfortable room than in the mansion that was his rightful home.

Claude left his father to come to the window.

"I love this view!" he cried, and suddenly turned eagerly. "Dad, do you hear that? A fire-engine. There's a fire somewhere. Oh, yes, there it is! See?" He pointed. "See all that smoke rising. Oh, isn't it thrilling!"

Never did Claude see things from the windows of his other home that he found thrilling. Mrs. Pierce glanced at some of the pictures on the wall. If only Jay had let her back up his painting he would have gone far, but he would prefer to be independent.

"Son, I've had your room done up," Jay told his son. "It's much the same except that I've put in a book-shelf."

"Are there any books?" came the eager question.

"Go and see—I'd like to talk with your mother," laughed the father.

They faced each other when the door had closed behind the boy.

"Hilda, I'm glad to say that I'm doing a bit better with my work." He shrugged his shoulders. "Not carrying a fortune, by any means, but—"

"Enough to keep the wolf from the door!" She spoke a trifle sharply. "Every time we meet you suggest starting all over again, so this time I'll save you wasting your breath. Your terms consist of a tenement in the slums and a very small cottage in the country, and—"

"Yours consist of a mansion in town and a shooting-box in the Sierra Nevadas, servants by the score, a yacht, several cars, and a life of indolent idleness." He shook his head. "Not for me, my dear." He glanced at the closed door. "I'm afraid you'd like to bring Claude up that way, but not if I can help it."

"Be careful what you do, or I'll lodge an appeal against that fool decision of the court!"

"I shouldn't waste your time or your money." His smile was cynical. "You think money buys everything. Well, it doesn't. And, talking of money, when did you last buy Claude a haircut?"

"Don't you touch his hair. It makes him look—"

"Like a poet," snapped the father. "One word more from you and I'll have that hair so short he'll look like a Hun."

When Mrs. Pierce had gone after a tearful parting—on her part—with her son, the father suggested that directly the coast was clear he thought they might go out and see how the fire was getting along. A suggestion that met with instant approval.

"By the way, son," remarked Pierce, as they walked briskly along the street. "Regulations in this district demand that every boy goes to school. You've been used to a tutor, and—"

"I'd like to go to school, dad," interrupted the boy. "I didn't like my tutor very much, though he was very, very clever. I believe he was a brilliant scholar, and I tried to like him because mother seemed to think he was so wonderful. I must say he did teach me a lot of French and Latin, but—"

"But why didn't you like him?"

"He used scent."

"Your mother would like him," muttered Jay Pierce. "Well, the district school won't have any scented masters or mistresses. There's no class distinction, Claude, in this school, and that's why you're having a haircut on the way back from the fire."

"I'm so glad," Claude cried. "I don't like it as long as this, really. When do I start school, dad?"

"Next Monday, son."

"That will be wonderful. I've always wanted to play with grown-up boys, but I seem to have been so much on boats that I never seemed to meet any boys."

"These lads will be a tough bunch," The father gazed a little anxiously at his son. "They're all pretty genuine at heart, but a bit rough. They call a spade a spade."

"Oh, I see!" Claude pondered that for a moment in his serious way. "What else could they call a spade?"

Jay Pierce laughed.

"You'll learn what I mean soon enough." He pointed. "Ah, there's the fire! See, they're running up an escape."

Father and son forgot everything in the excitement of watching the fire. Fortunately, no one was hurt, but they saw some thrilling rescues by the fire-escape.

Gig's Ordeal

TWO boys sat on the stone steps of the cheap and rather sordid lodging-house. Both wore old striped jerseys, patched trousers that were too large, heavy boots and caps on the back of their heads.

The freckled youngster sat there with his chin on his hands. His small, plain face seemed vicious and sullen, and the dark eyes seemed to be brooding. The lad with the broad shoulders, the mass of fair hair and the strong, though stubborn, chin, kept glancing at his companion. He was obviously worried by his friend's silence.

"How about taking a walk, Gig?" he said in a husky voice.

There came no answer.

"Snap out of it, pal." He touched the bowed shoulder. Eyes, steeped in misery and despair, turned to him. "How about a walk, Gig? You gotta snap out of acting this way."

"Okay, Buck," Gig answered.

Side by side the two boys moved down the dirty, ill-lit street. Both were sturdy youngsters, but Buck was nearly a head taller. They walked in silence till they came to the old wharf by the canal. They stared solemnly at the sluggish water.

"I feel like jumping in," muttered Gig.

"That ain't no way to talk," argued Buck, with a fierce scowl. "I say you gotta snap out of it. What did that lawyer tell yer ma?"

"That he'd done all he could. Ma just wasted her money." Gig's face twisted into a scowl. "Gee, if I'd been in pop's place I'd have done the same. A guy bumps off a couple of sewer rats, and they run him for murder. If I had a gun I'd shoot that judge stone dead."

"Snap out of it, can't ya?" cried Buck. "That ain't no way to talk."

Claude stepped forward. "I beg your pardon, sir," he interrupted. "It was I who threw the football."

"Maybe you think the judge was right?"

"Gig, that ain't sense. Your pop's a swell guy, but we got laws. Cops can kill them seum, but ordinary folks mustn't. They know Joe Salvin and Digger Dan were bad eggs, and chiselled your old man out of his dough, but the law don't permit your pop to go settle his score with a gat. I ain't saying I wouldna done the same as your pop. A lot of guys would have liked to have dono what your pop done, but shooting wants nerve. He settled the score, but the cops say it's agin the law to kill seum like Joe and Digger, and that your pop has gotta pay the price. Gee, it's tough, pal."

A clock boomed the hour of eight. "Ten more hours to live," muttered Gig, and then burying his face in his hands began to sob.

Never in his life had Buck seen Gig cry and Gig had never seen him let out a squawk, but the bigger boy reckoned that Gig was up against something that gave him the right to cry. Bendy Stevens, Gig's father, was going to be executed at seven in the morning for killing two men. True, Joe and Digger were crooks, but Bendy had a crime record. Buck had liked and feared Gig's father. A kindly man at times, but terrible in his rages. Poverty and the scarcity of work had driven Bendy to work for a dog track race gang. The father had gone to prison several times for doping dogs and horses. Then one evening a dog had been doped to allow an outsider to win. Bendy Stevens had done the doping and had tipped off Joe and Digger to put money for him on the outsider. They refused to cough up the money and threatened to squeal, so Bendy had waited for them and shot them up. It was the law that the killer should die. Buck stuck out his jaw rebelliously—the law was all wrong. All laws were wrong.

Gig stifled his sobs, and mouched off along the wharf, with Buck trailing along behind him. After a while Gig moved away from the canal.

"Where ye going, pal?" asked Buck. "Guess I gotta get back. Can't leave ma to face it alone."

"How's she taking it, Gig?"

"Pretty bad. Pop weren't too good when he was full of hooch," cried Gig. "But she's always stood by him, even the time when he struck her. Gee, there ain't many dames as well as ma. She takes it better than I do. She's cooked the grub and gone to her work at the laundry, and she's smiled at me—only me's heard her crying at nights."

They reached the lodging-house. Buck looked covertly at his friend, who was standing there with bowed head.

"Snap out of it," Buck cried in a hoarse whisper. "Don't wanna let your ma see you this way. Keep yer chin up, pal."

Without a word Gig Stevens went slowly up the stone steps, whilst his pal, Buck Murphy, watched with anguished eyes. The door closed. With hands sunk deep in his pocket Buck slouched off to the cheap tenement, in the next street, where he lived with his mother and father. He vowed that he and Gig would get even with the law some way for sending Bendy Stevens to the chair. The thought of the chair made Buck shiver and stuff his hands deeper into his pockets.

Quietly Gig Stevens let himself into the apartments where he had spent most of his young life. Everything seemed quiet. Then the boy winced as he heard a choked sob coming from his mother's room. Very quietly he opened the door, and went across to the bed, where a woman, fully dressed, lay with her face buried in a pillow.

December 28th, 1936.

The New Boy

THE bell ceased clanging and the boys filed off to their various classrooms. A young, capable mistress sat at a desk and watched her class take their places at their desks. The average age of her pupils was thirteen, though there were backward boys of fifteen—Buck and Gig were in that category.

When all appeared to be seated she called the roll, and when Gig Stevens' name was called Buck stood up.

"Gig ain't coming to-day, teacher."

Thirty eyes focused themselves on Buck, and he looked down at his desk. They knew well enough why Gig had not shown up that day.

The young teacher nodded.

"Thank you, Murphy," she said, with a friendly smile. "I expect he'll be in to-morrow." She continued reading the roll.

Buck sat down and stared solidly at the vacant desk. He wondered, unhappily, how his buddy was feeling.

The door opened and the young mistress saw with surprise that it was the principal of the school. The bald-headed, dapper little man gave the class a somewhat suspicious scrutiny before going forward.

"Miss Noble, I have a new pupil for you," he stated. "He is only twelve, but seems to be quite advanced. Will you require a new desk, Miss Noble?"

"I can manage this morning, sir," stated the mistress. "One pupil is sick."

"Very good, miss, I'll send him to report to you." The principal smirked, scowled at the boys and went out.

The subject that morning was history, and Miss Noble had scarce told her class to turn to a certain page when there came a timid tap, and Claude Pierce entered the class-room.

There was a suppressed titter that made the mistress rap sharply on her desk. Claude wondered if they could be laughing at him.

Claude wore serge knickers, a neat reefed jacket, an Eton collar and a tie. His hair was shorter, but neatly combed, and he looked conspicuously clean. Under his arm were a number of books. He smiled nervously at the teacher, and walked up to the desk.

"The headmaster told me to report to this room. I'm a new boy."

"I was told to expect you. What is your name?"

"Claude Pierce."

As the mistress bent over her desk to enter the new pupil's name in the register something whizzed past Claude's nose. He had no idea where it came from. He looked at the class, but every face was serious, but directly he turned his head a hard pea caught him a stinging blow on the cheek.

"What's the matter?" The teacher, hearing a faint noise, looked up and saw the new pupil holding his cheek.

"What's the matter with your face?"

"Oh, nothing, teacher, thank you." Miss Noble pointed towards the window.

"Gig Stevens is not here to-day, so you can sit at his desk. We are taking history, and the page in your book is fifty-nine. You can sit down, Pierce."

The desks were very close together, and a boy seated next to the vacant seat leaned across and placed something on the seat. Buck grinned his approval.

Slowly Claude made his way to the desk. He had never been in a big school like this, and it was all rather wonderful. He hoped he would make lots of friends. He wondered why all the boys were watching him so furtively. He sat down.

His yelp of pain as he shot up made the teacher glance round.

"Anything wrong, Pierce?" she asked.

The boys eyed the newcomer balefully. If he were a squealer heaven help him.

"No, teacher," Claude said in his clear, high-pitched voice.

"Then why did you make that noise?"

"I think I pinched myself on the seat," explained Claude. "You see, I've never sat at a desk before."

This remark caused all the pupils to laugh, and Miss Noble had to rap furiously on her desk before she could obtain silence. She was not quite satisfied with Claude's explanation.

"Very well—sit down." Another rap on the desk. "Are your history books all open at page fifty-nine? Now, quiet, please, whilst I read the first paragraph."

Claude opened his history book and—wonk—a pea hit him on the nose. A moment later another landed hard to the back of his head and, looking round, he caught sight of a big boy hiding a eatapult. When Claude stood up, the class gasped—he was going to sneak! The teacher looked inquiringly in his direction.

"Page fifty-nine is not in this book that the headmaster gave me," blandly stated Claude. "Someone has torn it out—I don't know why!"

"In Gig's desk you should find a history book," answered teacher.

Claude found a very dirty-looking book, and all down the margin were comic faces drawn in pencil.

The lesson proceeded, but had not gone far when the door opened and another boy appeared. It was Gig Stevens. The lad's face was chalky white, but the eyes seemed to blaze fiercely. He just stood there and gazed defiantly at the teacher, as if daring her to rebuke him for being late.

"We are doing the French Revolution, page sixty in your history book," stated Miss Noble. "You will have to share your seat with a new boy for this morning. Go to your desk as quietly as possible."

Every head turned slowly and followed Gig Stevens as he moved to his desk. Fancy him coming to school on the day they had killed his father. How dreadful Gig looked.

For the moment the excitement of the new boy had been overshadowed by the sudden appearance of the son of a killer. When Gig got to his desk they wondered what would happen. Gig would hate having a "cissy" new boy at his desk.

Sullenly and defiantly Gig glanced at Buck, who gave a slight grin of welcome. Gig had scarce heard the teacher's words. His brain was numbed from the misery he had suffered, but now he remembered, as he saw the small youth sitting at his desk.

Claude gazed up at Gig and moved over to give him plenty of room. Gig sat down and, gripping the desk, slid along the seat with a sharpness born of long practice. Claude was whisked off the seat to land with a bump on the floor. Gig slid back to his side of the desk.

"What are you doing on the floor, Pierce?" The teacher walked across the room. Every boy studied his book.

Claude smiled disarmingly as he got to his feet.

"I fell off the end of the seat," he explained. "They're rather short, and I didn't realise that I was so near the edge."

"Gig Stevens!" The teacher's tone was sharp. "You will see that Pierce does not fall off again by keeping strictly to your side of the desk."

The eyes of Gig Stevens flickered upwards at the teacher and then round at Claude. Suddenly he saw the history book.

"Here, that's my book!" He grabbed for it. "Where did you get it?"

"Out of your desk," answered Claude. "You see, my book had a page missing and—"

"Pierce, that will be enough." The teacher was now standing before the desk. "Stevens, a little less noise, please. You will share that history book with Pierce. I told him to take it from your desk. If I have any more noise or interruptions the whole class will be deprived of their ten minutes' break."

Buck Murphy gave an ominous glance at the small figure seated beside his pal. He decided that this namby-pamby youngster was a pest, and should be destroyed. He wagered this dolled-up "cissy" was a coward, and he knew the way to find out.

When Miss Noble dismissed her class the boys crowded out of the room, and Murphy got close behind young Pierce; he got busy with a piece of chalk. It amazed young Claude why several of the boys came up to him in the playground, during the interval, kicked him unexpectedly and then walked away laughing. He was glad the break was only a short one. He overheard some boys talking about Gig Stevens, and his eyes widened as he heard what had happened that morning to Gig's father, but it was a big thrill to know he was sitting next to a gangster's son.

The boys trooped back to class, and Claude tried to make friends by offering Gig a choice of his pencils. The savage look that he got made the younger boy edge away.

Gig's Aunt Rose

AT last school was over for the morning. Claude tried to talk with several of the boys, but they either laughed in his face or else kicked him in the pants when least expecting it. He was careful to keep near to the railings as he hastened home; already Claude was learning wisdom. His father found the trouble at once and made him remove his coat. The boy's eyes widened at sight of large chalk letters: "KICK ME."

"You mustn't mind that," laughed his father. "All schoolboys have a sense of humour."

"I think the boys were a little upset," stated Claude, seating himself gingerly on a chair. "One of their fathers is going to be electrified up the river."

"Electrified? Up the river?" Jay Pierce questioned sharply.

"Yes. It's what they do to you when you shoot someone in a gang war, without an alibi," solemnly answered Claude. "It's Gig Stevens' father."

"Oh, I see. Is Gig Stevens one of the boys you like?"

"Oh, yes, sir. He's captain of the football team. You'd like him, I'm sure. The boys spoke very highly of his father. What's a frame-up, sir?"

"Well, you might call that 'kick me' sign on your back a frame-up," Jay Pierce laughed. "Of course your mother has had you in England most of the time, so you aren't used to some of our underworld terms. Now, let's get back to football. Will Gig Stevens play you in his team or give you a try. You played some football in England."

"I had some coaching in Soccer," Claude frowned thoughtfully. "But this American game is very different, even the ball is different. I'd have to get one and handle it before I'd be any good over here."

That evening Jay Pierce left his son busy with his studies and went to the nearest shop, where he purchased a regulation ball. The attendant tried to sell him a smaller ball suitable for juvenile schools, but the father knew his son would be terribly hurt to have a kid's ball.

It was grand having his son back to cheer up his lonely life, and in very jubilation of spirits Jay tossed the ball into the air and caught it. How it reminded him of inter-collegiate games. His way lay past the Stevens' apartment house, and he was still playing with the ball.

A large car drew into the kerb and a girl got out, and at that precise moment Jay fumbled the catch and shot the ball straight into her arms. Luckily she saw it coming, and managed to hold it.

"Well played!" cried Pierce.

"Excuse me, but aren't you a little bit too old to be in the team?" mocked the girl with the laughing brown eyes.

"Oh, I'm only the coach," chuckled Pierce, catching the ball as she tossed it to him. "My star half-back is doing his home work. This is a surprise for him."

"You're the sort of coach that spoils his team," the girl said as she hastened up the stone steps. "Good-bye."

The man thought a lot of the girl's sweet face as he walked along the street. Little did he know that it was Gig Stevens' Aunt Rose whom he had met.

Rose Wilson had called to console her elder sister, whom she had not seen for over a year, though she had met Gig once or twice. That young fellow thought his Aunt Rose a grand dame and a swell-looker.

Jennie had gone to work at a laundry, and stayed there even when she got married; Rose had won a prize for singing and dancing at a local cinema, and been offered a job in the beauty chorus of a touring company. Jennie considered the stage as the most disgraceful place and regarded her sister as an outcast. By means of clever singing and dancing Rose had got to Broadway, where she became acquainted with Barkell, the famous producer. Jennie said she wanted nothing to do with a sister who had a flat in Park Avenue.

"Come on, you big bully!" cried Claude.

Now, after all these months, Rose had come to comfort her sister, but Jennie Stevens stated fiercely that she didn't want any help, and that she wouldn't touch a penny of her money.

It was a sad Rose who came down the stone stairs and entered the beautiful car, which glided away. Buck Murphy and his parents were calling to console the bereaved wife, and they gaped after the car. Old man Murphy was a thick-set, florid man, and easily angered.

"Pah!" he snorted. "And to think I fought in the war to make the world safe for them plutocrats."

"That was Gig's Aunt Rose!" cried Buck. "She looked like she was howling."

Mrs. Murphy folded her arms across her ample chest. "A lot she's got to howl about," she said with a loud sniff.

Solemnly the little party trooped upstairs, not so much to console poor Jennie Stevens as to hear all the gory details.

"I Threw the Football"

THE following day found Gig Stevens in a measure recovered from the harrowing tragedy. His father had become a hero. Many a time that same father had treated his wife and only son very badly, and, in his heart of hearts, Gig knew that time would easily soften the blow.

Wars, battles, sea engagements, fights in the air, and gang fights were meat and drink in young Gig's life. He would have loved to have been a second Dick Turpin. Unfortunately he and Buck had grown up to fear the law rather than to respect it. Those two boys were considered by the other ruffians of that school as being "on the level," but they weren't above a little quiet thieving, though they didn't look upon removing spare wheels from cars and taking car accessories as stealing, but as "slick" business.

On this morning they were stealing a ride on the back of a truck—an easy method of getting to school, and cheap, provided not caught by a cop.

"Did you read what my old man said?" shouted Gig.

"No, I didn't," Buck had to admit.

"They humped off a guy what had done a lot of killings and then squealed on his pals to save his neck. My old man said: 'Wipe down that chair, a rat just got through sitting in it.'" Florence eyes turned towards his friend.

"I'll say that was tough. You know how long he was in the chair?" Buck shook his head. "Nine minutes. They gave him four jolts of more than two thousand volts. That's more electricity than it takes to run a street car. Gee, it makes one feel fine—"

"You'll feel something else if you don't scram!" bellowed an angry voice. They did not wait for the man to repeat the threat.

Claude arrived at the school looking very neat and tidy with the football under his arm. The boys in the yard nudged each other. They were eyeing the boy enviously when Buck and Gig showed up.

"The new kid's gotta ball," someone hissed in Buck's ear.

Buck and Gig sauntered across the yard, but someone had just the same idea as these two bright lads. Claude was glancing rather nervously round when a fist punched the ball so hard that it was shot clean out of Claude's grasp. It was the signal for a grand rush. The ball was seized by one fellow, but he kept it for about two seconds. Then the ball came to Buck Murphy.

"Coming over, Gig?" he shouted, and drew back his arm for a throw.

December 26th, 1936.

Buck threw it all right, but someone tackled him at the psychological moment, and the ball, instead of going to Gig, went clean through a class-room window.

All the boys darted away, leaving three—Buck, who was rooted to the spot from horror and amazement; Gig, still waiting to catch the ball and also dumb-founded; and poor Claude, eager to get back his ball.

The principal appeared like magic, and it was too late to escape.

"Just a minute, you three!" he shouted. "Up to my office—right away."

Buck and Gig gazed at Claude as if he were some insect before marching off to the principal's room with Claude trailing behind. Outside the three paused, and Buck stuck out his chin.

"You didn't see me throw a football!" he rasped out. "Understand?"

"Well, naturally, I—" began Claude.

"You know what we do to squealers around here?" cried Buck. Claude shook his head. "We stuff them into a sack and drop 'em in the river."

"You do?" Claude seemed surprised.

"Isn't that rather drastic?" They blinked at this new kid. He was a "cissy," but the queerest one they had ever met. Solemnly they trooped into the principal's presence.

"Murphy, did you throw that football?"

"I don't know who threw it."

"Stevens?"

"I don't know."

"Pierce, this is your football, isn't it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you throw it?" the principal demanded.

"No, sir."

"Do you know who threw it?"

"I really can't say, sir," Claude said quietly. "I'm sorry."

The principal rapped with a cane on his desk.

"I cannot overlook deliberate lying and connivance to a falsehood!" he shouted. "Therefore, unless I know who threw that ball you will all stand punishment. I am surprised and disappointed—"

Claude stepped forward.

"I beg your pardon, sir," he interrupted. "It was I who threw the football."

"You did?" The principal seemed amazed.

"Yes, sir. I should have admitted it in the first place."

But the principal was not satisfied with Claude's explanation. It was almost impossible for a new boy to break a window on the second day of joining a school, and, moreover, the youngster did not look the type to go breaking windows. Also he had had more trouble with Buck and Gig than with any two other boys in the school. Solemnly he gave the ball to Claude.

"Very well. You're excused. Don't do it again."

Claude was a little surprised at being let off so lightly. He wondered why the headmaster was keeping Murphy and Stevens behind. He closed the door and hastened away, lest he be called back.

"Who threw that football?" the principal demanded, when Claude was gone.

"Answer me!"

They made no reply.

"Stevens?"

"I don't know."

"I'm not going to punish you for breaking a pane of glass. I'm going to punish you for refusing stubbornly and unreasonably to tell the truth." The principal wagged the cane. "Stevens, hold out your hand."

Gig winced as the master gave him three hard swipes.

"You may go."

Gig departed, leaving Murphy. Actually the principal suspected Murphy of the crime. The door closed.

"Put your hand out, Murphy."

Buck put out his hand, then whipped it away as the master gave a vicious swipe and missed badly.

"Oh, Mr. Crusenberry, don't hit me!" yelled the cunning Buck. "Please don't kill me—don't kill me!" Dexterously he missed another vicious swipe. "Oh, please, Mr. Crusenberry!" His voice became shrill. "Let me go—you're killing me—don't kill me—"

"Shhh—shhh—shhh!" The principal became alarmed, because Buck's voice must be carrying all over the college, and, if it were reported to the guardians, might cause a bother. "What do you think your fellow-students will think of you making a cowardly uproar like this? Answer me!"

Buck smiled cunningly.

"They're gonna think it's awful funny, a big guy like you hitting a kid like me."

The principal's hand with the cane trembled, but he knew this young rascal was too clever for him.

"Report to your teacher—and remain after school until you feel like telling the truth about that football."

Buck Murphy did not waste time getting to the door, where he had the impudence to make a rude face at the master before hurriedly getting to safety. Down in the quadrangle he found an anxious Gig Stevens waiting for him.

"He sure kept you a long time. Did you squeal?"

Buck turned up his top lip in a contemptuous grin.

"I didn't squeal—what you take me for?"

The two boys walked past the iron gates and out into the narrow street. Loitering there was Master Claude Pierce, who was throwing his ball against the wall and catching it as if he had not a care in the world, though actually he was wondering whether the two senior boys of his class would not be pally after he had lied to save them. He decided on a bold move.

"Oh, hallo, fellows—want to play?" he called out and tossed the ball to Buck, who caught it.

Buck, holding the ball securely, strode up to Claude, who stood his ground even though Buck's face was set in a ferocious grin.

"So you broke the window, huh?" sneered Buck. "Trying to go on record as a wise guy?"

"Why, no—you see—"

"Listen Mister Wise Guy, if it should happen that you're walking on the same side of the street as we are, you'd better get on the other side quick—otherwise you'll get your ears boxed. Come on, Gig." Buck turned to his friend. "Guess we'll have a game by ourselves. Pass"

Claude stood there and saw the two boys running down the street passing the ball to each other. His ball. The small chin stuck out sharply and the hands were clenched. Resolutely he set out for home, where he informed his father that he would like to be taught the noble art of fisticuffs. His father wanted to know why he was so keen to take up boxing.

"Well, there's a couple of fellows I'm afraid I'll have to lick," was the answer.

"I beg your pardon, but you're the concierge here, are you not?" demanded Claude.

One of the Gang

FOR three days Claude kept very much to himself. The teacher had provided him with a desk, so that he did not have to share with Gig. Several times he saw the boys playing with his football, and his dark eyes became angry but determined. He worked hard on his boxing over a week-end, and on the Monday set out for school full of fire and determination. It was in the lunch interval that he had the show-down.

Claude walked out into the street and there was Buck, Gig and a number of boys playing with the football. Claude placed his books very deliberately on a window ledge and waited his chance. Buck hurled the ball towards Gig, and Claude streaked out and intercepted the pass. He tucked it under his arm.

Buck stalked up to him. "Gimme that ball!" "It's my ball," stoutly affirmed Claude. "I'm very willing to let you fellows play with it if I'm in the game as well."

Buck bent down and thrust his snub nose within an inch of Claude's nose.

"What did I tell you would happen if you were on the same side of the street as me?"

"You can't make a rule like that. This is a free country."

"Pretty smart, ain't ye?" cried Buck, and turned. "Bugs, box this smarty's ears, he's too small for me."

"Oh, no, I'm not," Claude cried, and handed the ball to a gaping youth. He squared up. "Come on, you big bully!"

Buck gazed incredulously at the small figure. What a nerve! But he grunted when Claude punched him in the ribs. Buck came out of his trance and proceeded to place a large hand on Claude's forehead, and the more Claude tried to get free the harder became the grip. Claude lashed out with his arms, but he could not reach Buck, who had arched his body.

"Go on!" mocked Buck. "What are you waving at?"

In spite of being held at arm's length Claude strove to hit Buck, but with no better success. All the other boys gathered round and yelled encouragement. A policeman heard the noise and came round the corner to see what all the noise was about.

The taunting jeers maddened Claude and he wriggled free, charged forward, and Buck, losing his balance, crashed to the ground. Buck could not stand for that, and getting up he got hold of Claude's nose and tweaked it hard. Claude backed away, rubbed his aching nose and then rushed in with head down and arms swinging. One blow caught Buck in the stomach and the big boy retaliated with a nasty jab to the eye. Claude was hurled back, but was about to charge recklessly into the fight in a do or die effort when someone saw Muldoon, the policeman. There was a yell of "cops," and Claude found himself in a deserted street.

Claude stared up at the tall police officer and smiled.

"Good-morning, officer," he said coolly.

"Were you kids fighting?" demanded Muldoon.

"Fighting!" exclaimed Claude, blinking an eye that seemed to be closing. "It was just a friendly argument." He picked up his cap from the ground and dusted it.

"Then why did all them other scamps vamoose so quick?"

"They have a certain respect for the arm of the law," Claude smiled. "They might have thought you were going to pin something on them."

The police officer went off chuckling. Claude collected his books and walked down the street. Behind an old cart crouched Buck, Gig and a freckled youth who was Bugs.

"What was you saying to Muldoon?" demanded Buck.

"Nothing!" haughtily replied Claude. "I'd like my football, please."

Buck looked at Claude's eye.

"Did he ask you who gave you that shiner?"

"I told him nothing. What do you think I am—a squealer?"

That took Buck aback, and he licked his lips as if this small, upright young fellow was beyond his comprehension. He looked at Gig, who seemed rather dazed, and then at Bugs, who had hold of the football.

"Go on," Buck snarled at Bugs. "Give him his ball."

Claude took the ball and beamed happily. Though triumphant, he made that smile just politely friendly.

Buck looked at him under furrowed brows.

"Come on, if you're coming," he muttered. "And that goes for you as well."

Wondering what Buck meant, Claude solemnly followed the three other boys. No comment was made, though Gig and Bugs looked curiously at the smaller boy. They entered a sort of scrap yard. Bits of old cars, old wheels, worn tyres, and rusty iron of all shapes. Beyond was a small shed, containing a forge and a bench and a lot more rubbish. They passed through this curious building out of a back door into another waste heap. Near a fence was a queer, ramshackle construction made from old tarpaulins and crate boxes.

It was the gang headquarters. They all trooped inside. Two other boys sprawled on the floor. An ancient oil lamp fitfully glimmered.

"Hi, ya, Buck?"

Buck nodded and sat down on a crate. Gig touched his pal on the shoulder and pointed to Claude, who was standing in the doorway.

"What did you bring him along for?"

"Shucks, what's the difference," Buck suddenly glowered round. "He's in. Any arguments?"

No one had the nerve to protest, because Buck was a head taller than most of them. Solemnly they raised their hands as a sign that the motion passed.

Buck pointed to a chair, which had seen better days. "You're elected. Sit down, Dope."

Claude sat down in the chair and, of course, the bottom gave way and he went through.

"I'm sorry, fellows," apologised Claude. "I'm afraid I've broken the chair."

With great difficulty Claude was freed and he looked round nervously. He saw a chair.

"Bust that!" threatened Bugs, "and I'll bust you one in the—"

"Shut up, Bugs!" snapped Buck.

"Bugs?" Claude drew his brows together. "That's an odd name, isn't it?"

"No—he eats bugs, that's all," explained Buck.

"Oh, do you?" Claude looked at Bugs with awe and respect. "What do they taste like?"

"Just kinda bitter." Bugs grinned, for Claude was showing respect for his prowess. "I ate a bee once."

"Yeah, and you got stung," sneered Gig.

Buck touched Claude on the shoulder and pointed to a biggish boy.

"This is Six Toes. Better show him."

Claude's eyes goggled to see a boy who had six toes on both feet.

"Only about eight people in the world have feet like mine," boasted the owner. "I'm learning to write and draw with 'em, then my ma's gonna put me in a circus—guess I'll make a big draw. I can write pretty good, but she's getting mad 'cause I can't learn to spell."

"Shivvie said he'd give us half a buck for every tyre we got," announced Gig.

By listening, Claude learnt that Shivvie was the man who owned this rubbish heap and the shed.

"We can make a buck a day easy," decided Buck.

Gig became all thoughtful, and began muttering vaguely. At last he turned to his chief.

"Not every day. Eighty bucks—guess that'll take a hundred and sixty days."

"Eighty bucks!" gasped Buck. "What you want all that dough for?"

"I was looking at a tombstone for my old man. I saw one and the guy told me it was eighty bucks," Gig sighed. "It was a swell stone."

"Why don't you ask your Aunt Rose for the dough?" hinted Buck.

"She didn't like my old man."

Buck turned up his lips.

"You don't have to tell her what it's for. She's always trying to give you things. It's easy. Where does she live?"

"On Park Avenue. I've never been up there."

"Come on." Buck jumped up.

"Let's go up right now and ask her for the eighty."

When Buck and Gig departed they were followed by Claude. In the street Gig swung round angrily.

"Where do you think you're going?"

"I was just wondering if you fellows were going up town by subway," Claude answered.

"No, we're taking a taxi," sneered Buck.

"I've thirty cents." Claude produced this wealth. "We could take the subway."

Buck looked at the money, then at Gig.

"Gee, I reckon we've got time for an ice cream soda."

So the three boys spent the money on soda and instructed Claude in the art of "hitching" a ride up town on the back of a truck. Some time later they found themselves in Park Avenue, and before a great building, where Gig's Aunt Rose resided. They made to enter the building, but a gorgeous person in uniform appeared and barred their way.

"You kids keep outa here."

"We're going in to see my Aunt Rose!" shouted Gig.

"You may want to see President Roosevelt, but you ain't coming in here," the doorman laughed sneeringly. "Your Aunt Rose—oh, yeah!"

"You can't make a rule like that."

Buck remembered what Claude had said to him. "This is a free country."

The remark seemed to infuriate the doorman because he threatened them with violence if they didn't scam.

They moved away and the man turned his back. The three boys streaked past and his hands clenching at them caught only the air. In the vast hall they sighted a clerk at a reception office.

They arrived there a split second before the doorman.

"You boys can't come in here," the clerk cried in haughty tones.

"Hey, wait a minute," cried Gig.

"Rose Hawley lives here, don't she?"

"Why, yes, but—"

"Well, she's my aunt and she told me to come up and see her, see!"

"A lot of lies," panted out the doorman. "Come on, get out of here!" He gripped Gig and Buck by the coat-collar.

"Let me go, you big flatfoot." Buck struggled to break free.

"Wait a minute, my man!" spoke a clear, sharp voice. It was Claude. The doorman gazed at him doubtfully. Claude then turned to the clerk. "I beg your pardon, but you're the concierge here, are you not?"

Now the clerk goggled at him.

"Huh?" was all he could say.

Claude gestured towards his friends.

"This is Gig Stevens. And if you'll just kindly announce him to his aunt, Miss Hawley, I should be greatly obliged."

The clerk just obeyed. This small youth with his clear treble and compelling dark eyes had will power. The doorman relaxed his grip on Buck and Gig. A minute later the doorman was pressing the button of an elevator.

"You close the doors and—"

"I am fully conversant with lifts," coldly stated Claude. "Kindly close the doors."

With respect Buck and Gig gazed at this youth, who was so cool and calm, even though he did use words they did not understand. They saw him walk up to a lot of knobs and without hesitating press one of them. The elevator shot upwards to the eighteenth floor, where Claude pulled back the sliding grille and motioned the other two to step out. They followed him like lambs down the corridor.

Rose was delighted to see the boys. She was rehearsing a song she was to sing that night, and they listened spellbound. She told them of the time she was in a variety act and did cart-wheels. For Claude's benefit she did several. Then Maria, her black maid, brought in iced drinks, and it was a merry party which was brought to an end by the maid announcing that Mr. Barkell wanted to see her at the theatre at once.

It was then that Gig summed up courage and asked her if she could loan him eighty dollars.

"Eighty dollars!" cried Rose. "That is a touch. What do you want all that money for?"

Poor Gig shuffled his feet.

"Well—I—well—I just gotta have eighty dollars. It's on the level."

"I know it is," said Rose. "But you must tell me what you want the money for—it is a large sum."

Then Mr. Barkell rang up again and said he was sending a car—it was urgent. Aunt Rose flew into the next room to change her dress.

"You come to see me one afternoon next week and we'll talk it over," were her parting words. "Now I must rush."

Claude went home and told his father all about being allowed to join the gang, his friendship with Gig and Buck, and the visit to Aunt Rose, but he said nothing at first about the reason of their visit. Finally, he reminded his father that he had been promised a bicycle, and that instead of the bicycle—

"Listen," interrupted his father, "we're going to have to put off that bicycle for a time. Some plans have come back for changes, and we don't get paid till they're accepted. We haven't many dollars knocking around spare."

"You mean, dad, we're rather hard up?" questioned Claude.

"I'm afraid so."

"You mean we're poor like Gig and Buck?"

His father nodded.

"I'm afraid so, son," he said.

"Are we so poor that I might wear a pair of corduroy pants?" hinted Claude. "I look rather rich in these clothes, and I feel I'd be liked better by the boys if I wore a jersey and pants."

So Claude got his pants, but he did not get the eighty dollars. The money worried Claude in the happy days that followed, because he knew how set Gig was on getting a tombstone for his father.

Three Young Robbers

IN the succeeding days Claude went often to the gang hide-out, but Buck and Gig were seldom there. The two boys always seemed to have some business that took them away directly school hours were finished. They were quite friendly to Claude when he did see them, but they did not reveal the reason of their actions, and the younger boy knew they were up to something.

One day he saw them busy near a car, and when the owner appeared, Claude was surprised to see them vanish down an alley. The car drove away and Claude was amazed when a spare wheel fell off the back. He questioned Buck and found out that every spare tyre that they took to their friend Shivvie they received half a dollar.

Gig suggested that as they were not doing very well it would be a good idea if they speeded up trade and used Claude as a look-out. Claude did not wish to displease the two bigger boys by refusing, but he did not like taking these tyres, even if the money was for Gig's gravestone for his father. He made a slight protest.

"You're yellow!" sneered Buck.

Claude protested and thus became the look-out, but they had little luck because every time they found a car with an easy spare wheel there were always policemen about, and but for Claude's shrill whistling might easily have been caught. Finally, they abandoned work for the day.

"Fellows, I don't like being a look-out," Claude had the courage to state. "Besides, you'll never get eighty dollars this way."

"So what you got, smart guy, that's better?" demanded Gig.

"Why—why that's quite simple. You want to steal from the rich, like Mr. Raffles!"

"Raffles—what mob did he run with?" asked Buck.

"He didn't have to have a mob—he was a lone wolf," Claude explained. "My idea is to take things that boys like us can dispose of without suspicion."

"Like what?" asked Buck.

"Like toys and things. Shall we go down to the hide-out and make our plans?"

Gig looked at Buck, and the latter nodded.

"We've got nothing to lose. Let's go."

That night Claude's father had to go into town on business, so Claude was free. He arranged to meet Gig and Buck at the hide-out at seven o'clock. All they required was a sack and a torch. It was Claude's idea that they break into some place, which looked deserted. He led them up-town and into a select but quiet neighbourhood. There were a number of places that looked likely, but Claude was not satisfied. He gave a deep "Ah!" when they came to the gates of a big house. These were padlocked.

"It's all boarded up—the people are away," he hissed. "This is the crib, fellows. Now, you men, help me over this wall and then I'll help you over."

They found themselves in a dark, gloomy garden. Buck and Gig kept on jumping nervously as the bushes rustled—they would not have admitted that they were scared. Claude made them hide in some bushes whilst he went exploring. He returned to say that all was well. They climbed some steps in an area to a back door, and here Claude insisted upon extreme caution. Not a sound.

"The door's locked," whispered Gig. "Do we break it down?"

Claude produced a knife and some wire.

"Leave this to me, fellows," he ordered. "You mount guard whilst I work on the lock."

A sound made Buck and Gig swing round. Their eyes opened wide, because the back door stood open. Claude beckoned them and they tiptoed over the threshold. A nasty feeling ran down their spines when the door was closed.

"We can get twenty years for breaking into a house," Buck said with chattering teeth.

"When you steal, you have to take chances," Claude announced. "Say, you men aren't afraid, are you?"

"Who, me?" rasped Buck. "Let's go!"

"Yeah!" added Gig. "Let's go!"

Several times they fell over things and waited trembling to hear someone call out. They found their way to a large domed-shaped hall. Everything was covered in white sheets, and Gig thought one high-backed chair was a ghost.

"Shhh!" Claude hissed. "Tiptoe!"

"What are we going upstairs for?" Gig asked in hollow tones.

"People always keep their valuables upstairs," Claude answered, and led the way. His torch cut a white beam in the blackness.

"Are you cold, too, Buck?" asked Gig, hearing his pal breathing on his hands.

Buck had to admit that he was shivering, but not with fright.

Claude found a play room, and Buck and Gig gazed with envious eyes at the piles of toys and amusements in the room. There was a large steam-engine, a miniature dynamo that worked sets of machinery, a sled, some skis, boxes of marvellous soldiers, roller-skates and a number of air-guns.

"We've got no time to lose, men," Claude was businesslike. "Only take what we can carry. We may have to make two trips."

Now Officer Muldoon was suspicious of Gig and Buck, and had a strong idea that they were responsible for a number of petty thefts. This belief had arisen when he had seen a spare wheel bounce off a car when those two had been lurking near the car. By evil fortune he observed the three boys leaving a pawnshop, and he decided to find out what they had been doing in the shop. When he heard they had disposed of some very valuable toys Officer Muldoon at once got busy.

The boys saw a stone-cutter, and for his eighty dollars Gig got a fine stone with an angel on it. The man promised to have it delivered to the Lawnrest Cemetery as soon as the names of James Edward Stevens had been engraved on it.

That evening Gig hastened home to tell his mother that he had bought a tombstone, and he was disgusted to find that Paul Krump was there. Krump was a fat little man and owned some sort of business. He had been an admirer of Jennie Stevens for years, and wanted her to change her name. Mrs. Stevens was seriously considering the matter when Gig burst into the room.

Gig tried to get a chance to talk with his mother, but eventually in disgust went to his room. He was moping over a book when there came a ring at the bell. Two men were outside, and they asked to see Mrs. Stevens.

"You're to bring your boy down to the Hall of Justice to-morrow morning at ten o'clock," one man informed her. "The charge is a burglary suspect. Him and two other boys."

When the door had closed his mother turned on him.

"Oh, Gig, what have you done?" she wailed. "Am I going to have to go through with you what I did with your father?"

"You ain't caring much about my father!" flamed Gig, with an angry glare at peaceful little Krump.

"Just a moment, my boy—"

"I ain't your boy!" shouted Gig, and shut himself in his bed-room.

There was a terrible scene in the Murphy house when the plain-clothes man issued the order for Buck to appear on the following morning. Old man Murphy tried to thrash the truth out of his son, but though the blows with the leather belt hurt Buck he would not say a word. It was Mrs. Murphy who stopped her husband from half-killing the lad.

Jay Pierce looked inquiringly at his son when the police had gone.

"I can't tell you a thing—really I can't," Claude told his father.

"Why not?"

"Well, dad, you wouldn't want me to be a squealer, would you? You see I'm one of the gang now. You see we have a code, and—"

"What about our code?" interrupted Jay Pierce. "Are we supposed to have secrets from each other?"

"Dad, I—truly, you just don't understand, that's all."

"Claude, come here," his father commanded, and the boy obeyed. "Look straight at me. There's one thing I want to know. Examine yourself inside—in your heart. Have you done anything dishonourable—anything to be ashamed of?"

"No, sir."

Jay Pierce gave a sigh of relief.

"Right!" He patted his son's shoulder. "Then whatever it is we'll see it through, huh?"

The Hall of Justice

OFFICER MULDOON did his work thoroughly, and found out enough to convince him that the three boys were thieves.

The culprits, their parents and those concerned in the case took up two benches. The parents still had no idea

The doctor appeared and took one look at the limp form in Buck's arms. "Bring him inside at once," he cried. "Your friend looks pretty bad!"

what their boys had been doing. Rose received a tearful message from Jennie, and hastened down to the court. She recognised Claude's father at once. The nice man, who had thrown a football at her.

"Do you know what all this is about?" Jay Pierce whispered in Rose Hawley's ear. "None of us here know a thing, and the boys won't talk."

"No, I don't," Rose whispered back. "I've seen Gig, but he's gone stubbornly foolish on me. So your star half-back has done the same?"

They had to be silent whilst the judge, a clean-shaven, sharp-featured man of middle age, delivered sentence on a boy mixed up with a race-course gang of toughs.

"Joseph Wilson!" thundered the judge. "I usually pronounce sentence in chambers, but your case is so flagrantly full of misdemeanours, broken promises, open defiance to the law, that I feel the whole court should listen less any others be tempted to follow in your footsteps. For two years you have lied to the probation officers, who have tried to help you; you've lied to me, but what's worse you've lied to your mother. Stolen and lied and succeeded in making her very miserable. Therefore, it's my unpleasant duty to sentence you on this date to four years in the State Reformatory."

Buck swallowed, Gig gave a little gasp, and Claude gave his father a nervous glance. The judge announced that the next case would be heard in chambers.

"Robert Murphy, James Stevens, Claude Pierce!" boomed forth the voice of the clerk. "Their parents, witnesses and officers in the case, step this way, please."

"Hope they send us all to the same place!" Buck gave a feeble imitation of a defiant grin at Gig. The latter just looked miserable.

In the judge's chambers they were placed by the clerk in various benches and told to maintain silence. A door opened and the same judge appeared. The first person he called was the pawnbroker.

"Your Honour, you could have knocked me over with a feather when Officer Muldoon questioned me about the toys," concluded the old Hebrew. "You agree I was very generous on the deal, your Honour. They couldn't have got that price from any other establishment, and—"

"That will be all, Mr. Maltz."

"Can I go now?" the old rascal whined.

"No!" the judge barked out the command. "Be seated, please." He studied a report on the case closely, and all watched him anxiously. He looked up at last. "I see by this report that none of you boys will help us or yourselves by saying a word in this matter." His grey eyes were very compelling when he looked at Buck Murphy. "Is that right, Robert?"

"That's right."

"Robert, look at me when you're talking."

"Yes, sir, that's right." Buck held up his head defiantly.

"James, can't you help us?" questioned the judge.

"No, sir," muttered Gig.

The judge looked at Claude.

"What about you, Claude? Wouldn't you like to say something?"

"No, your Honour!"

The judge turned again to his report.

"I see that none of the parents recognised these toys, or that pocket-money was ever given in sufficient amounts to allow for such purchases. Is that correct, Mr. Murphy?"

December 26th, 1936.

"It is!" rasped that irate father. "I wouldn't spoil my son with such truck, your Honour. And if you'll let me have those kids for three minutes I'll show you how to get this thing out of them."

"Maybe, Mr. Murphy; but there are better methods than that," the judge said quietly. "Those methods often get a confession, but not necessarily the truth. We have no actual complaint against these boys. We only suspect, from the evidence, that their parents are guilty of improper supervision." He looked meaningfully at Murphy senior, who wriggled uncomfortably. "Mr. Pierce, your affidavit concerning the toys is the same?"

"Yes, your Honour."

"Mrs. Stevens, you also—"

Rose stood up.

"Your Honour, I'm Rose Hawley, Gig's aunt, his mother's sister. She couldn't be here to-day, so she called me up and asked me to take her place. You see, she works from ten until five at the University Laundry on Fourteenth Street."

"I understand." The judge nodded kindly, and then proceeded to question each of the grown-ups about the life each child spent. The three boys were friends, and they certainly came from different walks in life. He learnt very little from the grown-ups, and finally made the three come up close to his desk.

NEXT WEEK'S BIG HITS!

LEW AYRES

IN

"SHAKEDOWN"

Because her father appears to be opposed to her marriage to Bob Sanderson, an impecunious young engineer, Edith Stuart agrees to a crooked secretary's suggestion that she should be kidnapped—as a hoax—so that Bob can play the hero. But she walks right into a trap—and murder follows. A first-rate thriller.

"SKULL AND CROWN"

The tale of a dog that fought with slashing fangs to help his master wreak vengeance on a murderous band of outlaws. Starring Regis Toomey.

Also

Another splendid episode of
"THE ADVENTURES OF REX AND RINTY"

Starring Kane Richmond, Norma Taylor and Rex and Rinty.

"Now, look here, the best fun I get is making friends with the boys who come here to talk with me, and I mean friendships that last," he told them. "But sometimes friendships go through a lot of trouble. My hunch is that you and Gig know the real story behind these toys, and that Claude just found himself tagging along. Is that so?" Buck and Gig just stared back at him defiantly.

"Oh, no, sir!" Claude spoke. "We're all in this together."

"I was not addressing you, Claude," reproved the judge, and gazed intently at the two bigger boys. "Since you two both refuse to tell the simple truth I couldn't very well put you on probation, could I?"

"What are you gonna do to us?" demanded Buck.

The judge gave a despairing shrug of his shoulders.

"Well, you were out there and heard where I had to send Joe Wilson. If you refuse to tell the truth it'll only prove to me that you're starting on the road to the same place. I know it looks a merry old road while you're on it—you outsmart a lot of people—and you're big shots and have a lot of fun—you won't squeal. Then suddenly you land inside, and then all the fun's gone. No getting out to play after school, because there's school all the time up there. No going home to see your folks. Now, isn't it best to talk this over?"

"I got nothing to say, I tell ya!" shouted Buck defiantly.

"Me, neither!" cried Gig.

"I'm sorry for that attitude," said the judge. "In that case I have only one alternative, and it will be my painful duty—"

"If you please, your Honour!" piped a small voice. "It's nothing to do with Buck and Gig—I planned the whole robbery, sir!"

"Robbery, Claude?" the judge questioned sharply.

"Yes, sir!" Claude spoke clearly.

"You see, Gig needed eighty dollars, and—well, I didn't think it was right for us to steal tyres when I knew a perfectly good house we could rob all at once."

The judge blinked.

"What house did you rob?"

"Why, my own house, sir."

"Your own house?"

"Yes, sir. Well—my mother's—26, East 68th Street, sir. She's away in Florida. But she left me the keys." Claude gave his two friends a nervous glance, and he did not like their open-mouthed expressions. "Those are my toys, sir. I—I haven't told Gig and Buck until now, sir."

"Why haven't you told them?"

"Well, there was the eighty dollars needed, and I suppose I just wanted to be Raffles, that's all." He stared fearlessly at the judge. "But Raffles in the right way."

"I see." The judge fingered his chin, then looked over Claude's head. "Mr. Pierce, this is all quite possible?"

"More than probable, your Honour."

The judge turned to one of the culprits.

"Gig, do you mind telling me what you did with the eighty dollars?"

"I don't mind telling anybody." Gig scowled at Claude. "And I don't care how I was fooled into getting it, either. I bought a tombstone with it for my old man. And they can't take it away from him, 'cause it's bought and paid for."

Thus the clever judge got the whole truth out of the boys, and finally he passed sentence on Buck and Gig.

"Both you two fellows knew you were stealing something that didn't belong to you. You can't do those sort of

(Continued on page 25)

A hoard of loot hidden somewhere in America's famous National Park, and Death stalking the paths of the men who were seeking it. A gripping tale of the Wyoming Hills, starring Henry Hunter and Judith Barrett

"YELLOWSTONE"

Foster's Secret

THERE was a record crowd staying at the Old Faithful Camp, situated in the heart of the vast reservation known as Yellowstone Park. For the tourist season was in full swing, and citizens from all over the States had become aware that few corners of the globe were more attractive than this area which had been purchased by the nation and opened to the public as a holiday resort.

Old Faithful Camp was the site of an hotel built on the lines of a mammoth shooting lodge, and referred to as the Inn. Here you could live at a reasonable cost and enjoy the society of a motley throng of residents, or, if you liked a certain amount of privacy, you could rent one of the trim, well-furnished cabins which clustered around the main building like the huts of an army cantonment.

But wherever you lodged, whether at the Inn or in one of the cabins, you commanded a view from your windows of some of the finest scenery that the United States could boast—a landscape that held you breathless with wonder as you gazed on the natural beauty of the Wyoming mountains, or the dark belts of forest, or the barren plateaux dotted with those hot springs which men call geysers, and which sometimes hurled columns of steam high into the air when subterranean forces awoke them into furious activity.

"A veritable paradise"—thus was the Yellowstone Park described in the pamphlets that advertised it as a resort, and the phrase was well merited. You might be there to hunt game, to toy with rod and line, to ride or to motor or to mountaineer, to study plant life or rock formations; whatever your hobby, you would not be disappointed.

But what was the hobby of James Foster, fifty-year-old holiday-maker, who looked as if the cares of the world rested on his shoulders, and who had rented one of those trim, well-furnished cabins for himself and his daughter Ruth?

A slight, grey-haired and pale-faced individual, Foster had been heard to mention that his chief object in coming to Yellowstone was a desire to sample the fishing in its rivers. Yet, although he had been at the camp for a week or two, he had not been seen indulging in this sport that he professed to favour.

He still talked of fishing, however, on such occasions as anyone engaged him in conversation. He was discussing it now, on the evening of the fourteenth day of his stay—discussing it with a stalwart young man who had called in at his cabin.

The young man in question was Dick Sherwood, and he was a member of the Forest Ranger Service, a body of Government employees whose job it was to police the Yellowstone Park and see that tourists did not violate any of the regulations.

"Yes," Foster was saying to Dick Sherwood, "I've been told that the best fishing in the reservation is to be had on the northern reaches of the river, and I'm tempted to make a start to-night and spend the whole of to-morrow up there."

"I can sure recommend the fishing up that way, Mr. Foster," Dick Sherwood informed him, "and if you take my advice you'll pitch camp below Sioux Bluff. Er—would you be taking your daughter with you?"

The older man could not forbear from smiling.

"No, Sherwood," he said. "Would you mind looking after her for me while you're off duty?"

"Would I mind, sir!" the Ranger declared with unconcealed enthusiasm. "It would be a pleasure."

Again James Foster smiled.

"H'm, she is mighty pretty, isn't she?" he murmured, a faint twinkle appearing in his otherwise sombre eyes. "She tells me that you're taking her to the alfresco entertainment that the hotel management has arranged for to-night."

"That's right, sir," Dick Sherwood answered, with a grin.

There was a silence, and then James Foster spoke again.

"You'll take good care of Ruth, Sherwood, won't you?" he said. "You know, she means a great deal to me."

"I can understand that, sir. And she thinks the world of you, too. Why, the first time I met her—the day you arrived here—she was talking about you in no time. I could see that you rated pretty high with her, Mr. Foster."

It was almost as if a look of pain crossed the older man's features.

"Yes," he mused. "Poor Ruth, she must have missed me cruelly. You see, Sherwood, her mother died when she was a child, and I had to leave her in the care of an aunt for—for eighteen years. And all that time I never saw her once, for the nature of my business took me to the other side of the world, where I was constantly travelling from one country to another.

"This is the first holiday my daughter and I have ever had together, Sherwood," he added. "Two weeks ago, I set eyes on her for the first time in eighteen years—the girl from whom I had been separated when she was a mere baby, and who is now grown to womanhood. It—it was a moment I shall never forget, Sherwood—that moment when we were brought together again."

Dick could well realise the emotions that must have been roused in this man and his daughter after so long a separation, but before he could volunteer any comment a door swung open on its hinges and a radiantly beautiful girl emerged from one of the cabin's bedrooms.

She was the girl whom they had been discussing, and it was not to be wondered at that Dick Sherwood had noticed her on the day of her arrival and had resolved to make her acquaintance at the earliest possible moment.

"Well, Mr. Ranger," she announced gaily, "I'm ready to be taken into custody."

"Okay," Dick rejoined, offering her his arm, "and let me tell you, I never had a better-looking prisoner."

James Foster smiled at his daughter and her handsome escort, and then he spoke to the girl quietly.

"By the way, Ruth," he mentioned, "I think I'll set out on that fishing-trip in the north all right. So don't worry if you find me gone when you get back to-night. I'll return to the camp by to-morrow evening at the latest."

The girl nodded, and a moment afterwards she and Dick Sherwood were making their way from the cabin, Foster seeing them to the front door and watching them as they hurried in the direction of the Inn.

For the space of several seconds he followed them with his eyes, and then, drawing in a long breath, he turned to re-enter the cabin. But even as he was on the point of closing the door a figure stepped into the porch, the figure of a youngish, clean-shaven man who had apparently been waiting in the shadows until Ruth and Dick Sherwood were out of sight.

"Just a minute, Mr. Foster."

Foster pulled the door wide open again, and recognised his visitor as an individual who was staying at the Inn and who had casually introduced himself as Marty Ryan a few days previously. For although some of the holiday-makers had private cabins, all took their meals in the restaurant of the main building, and this man Ryan had been allocated to a table near the one reserved for the Fosters.

"I'd like to talk to you, Mr. Foster," Marty Ryan went on, as the older man looked at him inquiringly.

Foster moved aside for him to enter, and, closing the door, indicated a chair. Then, as Ryan seated himself, his host again directed a quizzical glance at him.

Ryan leaned forward, and suddenly Foster became aware that a change had taken place in the fellow's manner. His face, in repose, not unpleasing except for a certain shiftiness of the eyes, was rendered distasteful all at once by an expression of evil cunning.

"I think it's about time I had a showdown with you, Anderson," he said.

James Foster started, and for a moment a look of ghastly apprehension revealed itself on his features. Then with a visible effort he recovered himself.

"I don't think I understand, Mr. Ryan," he murmured. "Who told you my name was Anderson?"

"You needn't try to bluff," Ryan observed. "Listen, friend, in the days before this territory was made into a national reservation it was a pretty tough country, and some eighteen years ago there was a certain gang of Western bandits who got away with a lot of dough."

December 26th, 1936.

Foster's hands were twitching slightly, in plain agitation.

"That gang was rounded up," Ryan continued, "but not before one of them had planted the swag—a hundred thousand dollars that was never recovered. And the man who planted that money—the only man who knows where it is to-day—that man was you, James Anderson."

Foster spoke with difficulty. "Who—who are you, Ryan?" he faltered. "Who put you up to this?"

"The name's Jenkins, Anderson," came the deliberate reply. "Marty Jenkins, alias Ryan. The son of Tracy Jenkins, who was a member of the same gang that you belonged to—who went to San Quentin Prison with you—and who died soon after his release a year ago."

He paused, regarding Foster narrowly.

"My old man told me everything before he passed out," he continued. "That's why I picked up your trail when you came out of San Quentin just over two weeks ago. That's why I'm here, for I knew you'd figure on digging up the loot you hid away, and I want the cut that my old man was entitled to."

James Foster ran his fingers round the inside of his collar.

"Is that all you've got to say to me?" he breathed.

"Isn't it enough?" Marty Ryan queried grimly. "Or do I have to mention your daughter? Yes, Anderson, I know the whole story. I know how your daughter was brought up in the name of Foster and led to believe that you had some sort of a job that kept you jumping from place to place on the other side of the world. I wonder how she'd feel if somebody told her that you'd been a lot nearer home all these years—in San Quentin penitentiary."

Foster's shoulders seemed to droop. "All right," he muttered. "You're in on the deal. I'll split with you."

"When? I don't like to be kept waiting—Anderson."

"You may have to wait," Foster jerked. "I've waited eighteen years. I'm heading for the cache to-night, but it's possible I'll have to give up. There's a man named Hardigan living at the hotel—"

"Hardigan," Ryan interposed. "Sure, I know him. He checked in the same day as I arrived. A big, grizzly haired guy—interested in hunting, I think he said. What's he got to do with you, anyway?"

James Foster moistened his lips.

"He was careless enough to leave his wallet in a chair at the Inn the other day," he said. "Must have slipped out of his pocket, I guess. I took a look at that wallet, because I didn't like the way he's been trying to get me in conversation ever since he arrived. And I found out that he's a private detective, operating for the insurance company that had to make good the hundred thousand dollars which were stolen eighteen years ago."

Marty Ryan frowned, and stroked his chin thoughtfully. Then he gave Foster a sidelong glance.

"Did you give him back his wallet?" he asked.

"Of course not. I left it on the chair. Later he came back for it himself, and I don't think he suspects that I know who he is. But he's watching me—you can depend on that—and that's why I've got to be careful."

Ryan nodded, rising to his feet as he did so.

"There's just one more question I'd like to put to you, Anderson," he stated.

"Are any other members of the old gang alive? My father only talked of you."

"One man may be alive," Foster answered. "Bald Jack, we called him. That's the only name we knew him by. He got off with a lighter sentence than any of us, and I don't know what happened to him after he was released."

He was silent for a moment, and then he spoke again:

"There's one thing I'd like to ask you, Ryan," he said shakily. "Be careful about using that name 'Anderson.' I left it behind me when I came out of San Quentin last month."

"Okay!" the other responded in a cool tone. "You won't hear it from me again, unless you try to double-cross me. I'll be seein' you—Mr. Foster."

The Earth Gives Up Its Dead

FROM the Foster cabin Marty Ryan strolled in the direction of the Inn, and as he approached it he heard the strains of music and saw a considerable mob of tourists congregated in front of the building.

A big camp-fire had been lit out in the open there, and flapjacks, bacon sandwiches and cans of steaming coffee were being handed around. Meanwhile an orchestra, tricked out in the garb of hill-billies, was playing ballads of the old West, and genuine veterans of the Wyoming mountains and prairies were dancing to the music from time to time, or else reciting tales of the days when there had been no National Park at Yellowstone, and fends and forays between Palefaces and Redmen or outlaws and sheriffs had been common occurrences.

Among the onlookers Marty Ryan espied Dick Sherwood and Ruth Foster, but he did not approach them. Nor did he attempt to join the throng of tourists who had assembled in front of the Inn. His way took him round to the stables where horses were to be hired at moderate price, and here he instructed a groom to saddle him a pony.

It was while Ryan was waiting for the animal to be led forth that a small, thick-set man of mature years accosted him, a mild-looking old fellow with a shock of black hair, who was also staying at the Inn and who had sometimes bored Ryan by engaging him in long-winded discussions on plant life.

"Ha, my boy," this individual said now, "why aren't you at the open-air concert?"

"Open-air concert?" Ryan echoed contemptuously. "No, it doesn't appeal to me, Professor Ross. On a moonlit evening like this I prefer to go riding."

"I don't blame you," Professor Ross declared. "I'm afraid the concert doesn't appeal to me, either. For my part, I mean to take a canter south and study some of the flora and fauna by this same glorious moonlight to which you have just referred. As you know, I am deeply interested in botany—"

By this time a horse had been fetched for Ryan, and he interrupted the professor in a somewhat impatient tone.

"Quite," he said. "A very engrossing subject, I'm sure. Er—good-night, professor!"

He swung himself into the saddle, and a moment later he was riding off. As for the elderly botanist, he gazed after him pensively for a few seconds, and then he, too, requested one of the establishment's grooms to let him have a pony.

Within a minute or two of Ryan's departure Professor Ross was also leaving the neighbourhood of the Inn, and, travelling at a canter, he passed round the fringe of the crowd which was attending the alfresco concert.

As he trotted by, he might have been seen exchanging a nod here and there with people whose acquaintance he had made during his stay, and one of those to whom he inclined his head was Dick Sherwood, Forest Ranger.

Dick saluted him, turned to watch him amusedly as the old fellow cantered onward across the range and then grinned at Ruth Foster.

"Funny little old guy, that," he commented.

"Yes, who is he?" Ruth asked. "I don't think I've noticed him before. Has he been at the camp long?"

"About a fortnight," Dick told her. "But I'm not surprised you haven't spotted him. I understand he's generally late for meals, and when he's not out looking for queer plants he sticks fairly close to his room in the Inn. His name's Professor Ross, and he's a botanist. A bit eccentric, if you ask me."

He turned his attention upon the concert that was in progress, and before long he and Ruth had forgotten Professor Ross. Indeed, they gave no further thought to him that night, for the entertainment provided by the hotel was thoroughly diverting.

It was midnight before the camp-fire concert was brought to a close, and the throng was beginning to break up when a group of men came hurrying from a building some little distance away, a building which was the headquarters of the Ranger detachment to which Dick Sherwood belonged.

The men were headed by one Captain Radell, Dick's commanding officer, and the latter seemed in a state of high excitement, the cause of which was soon made apparent.

"Listen, everybody!" Radell called out. "We've just received a message from a tribe of Indians up in the north corner of the reservation, and they say that Old Bess has been showing signs of life. If any of you want to see her blow up, you'd better get started right away!"

His news created a tremendous stir, and in the space of thirty seconds the locality of the Old Faithful Inn was transformed into a scene reminiscent of gold-rush days, with people rushing to stable and garages in order to hire ponies or start up cars.

Ruth Foster was one of the few who did not show any signs of activity.

"What does it mean?" she asked Dick Sherwood in a bewildered tone. "Who is Old Bess?"

"The biggest geyser in the territory!" the young Ranger answered. "It's ten years since she spouted, and it's a sight not to be missed. Let me get you a horse, Ruth, and we'll ride over. You'll lose your beauty sleep, but you won't regret it, believe me."

She agreed to the proposal, and ere long she and Dick were astride a couple of fleet mustangs, on which they set out for the north; and, joining the stream of humanity that was headed in that direction, they spurred onward through the night until the dawn was breaking in the eastern sky.

The stars had vanished from the heavens, and it was broad daylight when they reached their destination, to find a considerable number of people already assembled around a pit from which boiling water was welling up spasmodically.

Captain Radell and some of his men were there, holding the crowd in check and making sure that no one approached too close to the geyser, and, after forcing his way through the mob of spectators and gaining a privileged vantage-point for Ruth, Dick Sherwood lent his comrades a hand in the task of keeping the spectators at a safe distance.

Meanwhile fresh groups of onlookers were continually appearing on the scene, and there must have been several hundreds of sightseers present when suddenly there came the deep rumble of a subterranean explosion, which was followed by intense activity on the part of Old Bess.

Hurled on high by the forces of Nature, an immense column of water shot towards the heavens, loud-hissing, swathed in steam, so that the crowd retreated rapidly out of harm's way, and then stood ranked with uplifted and attentive faces.

The whole neighbourhood became enveloped in a warm, clammy mist. From hidden sources far below the ground, the geyser sent its enormous jet of boiling spring-water aloft into the still morning air, and men and women watched in breathless wonder for the space of half an hour, until the "tantrums" of Old Bess began to die down.

Slowly the liquid column subsided, and the clouds of steam evaporated, borne aside on the wings of a faint breeze that had arisen. Slowly the geyser blew itself out till the hole in the ground was a mere bubbling well. And then all at once, as the last shreds of mist were swept away, a gasp went up from the assemblage that had witnessed the phenomenon.

Something was lying near the edge of that pit, a figure which had not been there when the geyser had first started to erupt, a figure which must have been thrown out of the crater to remain unseen and unsuspected while the outbreak had been at its height.

"It's a man!" someone shrieked, and the cry was taken up on all sides in accents of horror and amazement.

A man it was, lifeless, disfigured. Yet those who pressed towards him had no difficulty in recognising him. One glance revealed his identity—and at the same time disclosed the fact that it was not the geyser which had caused his death.

The man was James Foster, and there was a bullet-wound in his temple.

Dick Sherwood was among those who had been the first to reach the body, and as he saw who the man was he turned with an exclamation towards the spot where he had left Ruth, for his impulse was to prevent her from looking upon her father's huddled form.

But he was too late. The girl was by his side, staring aghast, swaying on her feet, and he was just in time to catch her in his arms as she pitched forward in a dead swoon.

Who Killed James Foster?

TWENTY-FOUR hours had elapsed since the discovery of James

Foster's murdered body, and four men and a girl were gathered in Captain Radell's office at the Ranger's headquarters.

The four men were Captain Radell himself, Dick Sherwood, Marty Ryan—and Hardigan, private detective. The girl was Ruth Foster, and she was sob-

"You!" Dick said tersely. "How did you get here?"

bing bitterly, for in a somewhat blunt and unsympathetic manner Hardigan had just informed her that she was the daughter of a man who had served eighteen years in a State penitentiary.

Now, however, Hardigan was addressing himself to Marty Ryan.

"Young man," Hardigan was saying, "as you probably know, the coroner has now ascertained that James Anderson—or Foster, as he called himself—was shot dead an hour or two before his body was found. It has also been established that he left Old Faithful in the early part of the evening."

Ryan looked at Hardigan nervously. There was something frightening about the detective. A commanding personality, with heavy features and a bulldog jaw, he had a pair of eyes that seemed to bore through and through you, and the brusqueness of his voice was that of a man who did not spare the feelings of anyone whom he had occasion to question.

"What has all this to do with me?" Ryan muttered. "Why have I been sent for?"

"I'm coming to that," Hardigan announced. "When we examined Foster's cabin yesterday, we found that the place had been ransacked. We also found a handkerchief bearing the initials 'M. R.', and you happen to be the only person at Old Faithful Camp whose name tallies with those initials."

Ryan turned angrily to Captain Radell.

"What is this man trying to suggest?" he blurted.

"Better not excite yourself, Mr. Ryan," the captain rejoined quietly. "Mr. Hardigan is co-operating with me in this case. As he has explained, his services were engaged by the insurance company which made good the loss of that hundred thousand dollars stolen eighteen years ago. Naturally the company would like to recover that money, and Mr. Hardigan is working on this mystery from that angle. At the same time, he is just as eager as I am to bring Foster's murderer to justice."

Marty Ryan spoke in a shaky tone. "Listen," he lied, "I don't know anything about a hundred thousand bucks, and I never had any idea that Foster wasn't what he professed to be. As for my handkerchief being found in his cabin—well, on the evening he left the camp I happened to be passing by and he asked me in for a drink. I must have dropped my handkerchief while I was there."

"Are you sure that you weren't in league with Foster?" Hardigan struck in. "Are you sure that you didn't go back to his cabin and ransack it—after you learned he was dead?"

"What would I do that for?" "To see if you could obtain a clue as to the whereabouts of the hundred thousand dollars," Hardigan retorted.

Ryan glared at him fiercely. "I tell you I knew nothing about that hidden loot!" he cried.

The private detective looked at him in silence for a while, and then he drew back a pace.

"All right, you may go, Ryan," he stated. "But don't try to leave the reservation. All roads leading from it are being patrolled, and no one will be allowed out until this business has been cleared up."

Marty Ryan made his way from the office sullenly enough, and when he had gone Hardigan turned to Ruth.

"Miss Foster," he observed, "when I told you about your father being an ex-convict, you appeared to be deeply shocked. But I'm not at all satisfied that you weren't fully aware of his record, and I want a straight answer to a straight question. Do you know where that money is?"
December 26th, 1936.

Dick Sherwood intervened. There was a set expression on his clean-cut face, and it was obvious that he was out of patience with the detective.

"Look here, Hardigan," he snapped, "I suggest that you have some consideration for Miss Foster's feelings. I—"

"You have a personal interest in the young lady," the older man interrupted sardonically. "I quite understand, for I've noticed she's been in your company a good deal during her stay here. But I think Captain Radell will agree with me when I suggest that sentiment must not enter into an affair of this kind. In short, I must be allowed to interrogate Miss Foster without being obstructed by you."

Dick clenched his fists, but he knew that Hardigan had every right to cross-examine Ruth, since Captain Radell had given him carte blanche to pursue an investigation.

"I fully realise the position, Mr. Hardigan," he said. "On the other hand, your methods—"

"Sherwood!" It was Radell who broke in on Dick now. "Sherwood, it is not for you to criticise Mr. Hardigan's methods. I propose that you make yourself useful by riding out to Old Bess again and reconnoitring the ground there for clues. That's an order."

Not without reluctance Dick took himself off, and Hardigan then concentrated his attention on Ruth once more. But although he tried to extract information from her, his persistent queries were met by impassioned denials, and, whatever impression the detective might have formed, Captain Radell was left in no doubt that the girl had been completely ignorant of her father's past.

Ruth was permitted to return to her cabin at last, and there she gave way to a fresh outburst of grief, sinking into a chair by the window of her bed-room and weeping as if her heart would break. And it was while the tears were still streaming from her eyes that she saw a man cantering by on horseback, a man whom she instantly recognised as Marty Ryan.

Her sobs died away, and, moving closer to the window, she watched him as he rode off across the range; and all at once she found herself wondering if there had been any link between him and her father.

She peered in the direction that Ryan was taking, and watched him until he had vanished beyond a fold in the landscape. Then, even as she was about to turn from the window, she perceived another figure ride past as if bent on the same course.

It was the figure of Professor Ross, the eccentric botanist whom Dick Sherwood had pointed out to her on the night of the alfresco concert, and there was something about the determined look on his face that convinced Ruth he was spurring in pursuit of Marty Ryan.

Startling as it was, this conviction seemed to be borne out as Ross disappeared over the low ridge at the exact spot where Ryan had crossed it, and, making up her mind to investigate the departure of these two men, Ruth left her cabin and hurried round to the stables.

She soon obtained a horse, and a minute or two later she was galloping to the summit of the ridge beyond which Ryan and the professor had passed.

Here she drew rein abruptly, sheltering in a coppice that concealed her from view. For away ahead of her she descried Ryan, craning round in his saddle as if to satisfy himself that he was not being trailed, and nearer at hand she observed Professor Ross, hiding behind a cluster of great boulders where he had gone to cover in order to avoid the young man's roving eyes.

The coppice screened Ruth effectively—and Ross, if visible enough to her, was not discernible to Ryan, who therefore pressed on in the belief that he was alone.

The moment he had vanished from sight again, Professor Ross worked clear of the rocks and galloped after him, and, utterly certain now that the botanist was tracking Ryan, Ruth Foster likewise took up the chase.

There were frequent stoppages, whenever Ryan chanced to pause and look behind him, and so far as the trackers were concerned, there was a perpetual anxiety to be within easy reach of cover. But fortune favoured both Ross and the girl who was stealthily bringing up the rear, and without incident they reached the vicinity of the geyser known as Old Bess.

This was not Ryan's destination, however. He passed it by and disappeared in the direction of the river that cleaves across the north corner of Yellowstone. A little while later Ross had followed him out of sight, and Ruth, in her turn, drew near the fatal geyser where her father's body had been discovered the previous morning.

It was as she was swinging aside to avoid it that she heard someone call her name, and, wheeling with a start, she saw Dick Sherwood spur from a mass of thickets a little to the right.

"Why, Ruth," he ejaculated, pulling up alongside her, "what are you doing here?"

As briefly as possible she told him how she had set out to trail Ryan and the professor, and when she had finished her story he drew his brows together in a frown.

"It certainly looks like Ryan knows something," Dick agreed. "though I can't figure out why the professor should be on his track. Come on, we'll find out what the game is, anyhow. Which way did they go?"

Ruth pointed northward, and the two of them rode in that direction, coming within view of the river a short time afterwards; and even as they were approaching its bank the girl caught her companion by the arm.

"Dick!" she gasped. "Look!" She had stretched out her arm to indicate a tumbling cascade some little distance up-stream, and, staring towards those falls, Dick Sherwood beheld a pony standing near them—Ryan's pony, he judged, for there was no sign of that worthy.

No, Ryan was nowhere to be seen. But Professor Ross was still visible, and the watchers saw him canter up to that riderless horse, saw him slide from the saddle of his own mount and then march straight into the drenching cataract, plodding knee-deep in swirling waters until he passed under the torrent of the falls and vanished from sight.

The Cavern of Doom

WHEN Ross forced his way through that deluge he scarcely knew what to expect, but, soaked to the skin, he suddenly found himself stumbling into a great cave hung with stalactites, pitted with craters that gave off alkaline fumes and charged with an

(Continued on page 23)

A drama of the prize ring and the underworld. A devoted girl and a faithful dog were his best allies, but he did not know until the fateful hour that revealed he had been tricked by a beautiful woman and a band of crooks. Starring Eddie Nugent

Doughnuts Once More

ROUND about the ring under the girdered roof was an unusual crowd of spectators. They were all men, and all were uniformed in grey loose clothes.

They were much the same as any other boxing enthusiasts in their clamorous support of their especial fancy: hoarse shouts and groans signified their approval or disgust, as the fight hetwixt two upstanding young fellows proceeded.

Well matched were these boys, and both boxing with skill and admirable fair play. A little too much of the latter, perhaps, was shown by the younger of the two, a presentable youth with dark hair, straightforward eyes and a hefty punch. His second, a hard-headed fellow, was yelling from a ring corner:

"Give him your right, Gene! Oh, hoy—give him your right!"

The bout was finishing. The boxers sparred for an extra effort. The youth called Gene smashed his left into his opponent's jaw and knocked him cold, but the bell rang for the end of the fight before he could be counted out.

The referee held up his hand whilst the boxers were in their corners, being tended by their seconds.

"The bout goes to Harris," he announced.

The roars that followed—the cheers and counter cheers—were cut into by the shrilling of a whistle. The entire company rose to their feet to stand to attention.

It could be seen, then, that all except the warders were convicts.

Gene Harris and his second formed up in the file to march out of the prison gymnasium. They went solemnly back to the caged cell they shared. Gene flung himself face down on the hard bench and his companion took the bottle of liniment handed in by the warder, who stood by waiting for its return.

The bottle uncorked, the bullet-headed second took a swig at it from force of habit. Next instant he was spitting wildly.

"Outward application, Moran," said the warder. "Get busy!"

"Can't forget old habits, Dave," ehuekled the prostrate Gene. "Rub my shoulders."

Dave Moran poured the liniment on his friend's back and commenced to massage. "Pity you've forgot your kicks, Gene," he grumbled. "You oughter knocked him out with your right."

"I'm afraid, Dave," Gene confessed. "I don't want to kill a second time."

Moran finished his rubbing in silence, then passed back the bottle. When they were alone, he whispered low:

"You didn't kill Sweeney."
"Court says I did. Hence my being here—two years' detention for manslaughter."

"It's a mystery to me," Dave grumbled. "I've never known a heavy-weight pass out because of one solitary punch on the jaw. You certainly hit him, Gene—I'll allow that. But for 'Rough-house' Sweeney to go all limp and croak, soon as they got him out of the ring—" He shook his head. "It don't look right to me."

The warder had returned.

"Governor wants you hoy," he stated. "Don't wish to annoy you, but I guess you're to be paroled."

"Gee—both of us?" Moran gasped. "You were only an accessory," the warder reminded him. "And your time's up next month, anyway."

An hour later Gene was outside the prison in his much-ereased lounge suit. Dave was to follow in a few hours.

George Miller, sports promoter, had been accepted as parole for the pair of them. They were to work with him "on their honour" for the term of their respective sentences. Gene was full of gratitude—he longed to get to Miller and shake him by the hand.

He stood there outside the great gates, glancing right and left. He had a kind of hope that someone might be there to meet him. A someone whose cool, golden beauty had been always in his thoughts since first he had met her.

A wire-haired, terribly excited little brown-and-white terrier came charging at him, filling the air with joyous barks. Gene caught up the little animal in his arms.

"Why, Babe—you come to meet me! Well, now—isn't that fine!"

The little dog covered his face with wet kisses, but Gene didn't try to stop her. It was such a splendid welcome; such unselfish, whole-hearted affection.

But Babe couldn't have come alone. Gene looked afield and saw a girl in an open car.

"That's Claire, bless her!" he muttered to the dog, putting her down. "Let's go, Babe—and say thanks for bringing me."

But the girl in the car was as dark-haired as himself. She gave him a radiant smile as he came to her.

"Hallo, Mister Gene Harris!"

"Hallo, Miss Mary Grant—did you bring Babe?"

"Well, of course. Miller told me you were coming out this afternoon, and so I got the car and fetched Babe along." She studied his face. "Did you expect anyone else?"

"Half expected," he admitted. "I thought, maybe, that Claire—" He checked himself. "But it's great seeing you. Let's go places."

"Tea," she suggested. "I know a place where the doughnuts are wonderful."

"Doughnuts?" Gene's eyes lit up. "Plenty of jam in 'em?"

"Sure. Jump in—Babe's taken her seat already." The little terrier was in the back seat, sitting there demurely. Babe liked doughnuts, too.

The young fellow climbed in the car beside the girl at the wheel. He said in deeply grateful tones:

"It's great of Miller to go bail for me. I must get around and thank him."

"Tea first," the girl decided. The car started away as she asked in a casual way: "Claire write you much while you've been inside?"

"Not a lot," he owned. "She isn't good at letter writing. But I reckon she hasn't forgotten me."

Mary Grant made no reply. She accelerated the car and presently they entered the great city. They stopped at a little bakery off Broadway. Here they parked the car and went into the shop parlour. At Gene's command they were supplied with a liberal meal of tea and doughnuts. Gene shook out his check-patterned serviette, peering over it at his companion.

"You sure are a sweet girl, Mary. These doughnuts look the goods to me."

"Don't waste time talking," she teased. "Eat and be happy."

"When I'm married," said Gene, helping her to one of the sugar-covered brown cakes, "I'll have doughnuts every meal."

"I don't think Claire likes them all that much," Mary hinted. She added: "You think a lot of her, Gene, don't you?"

He nodded, his mouth full of pastry. He turned to feed the little dog from his plate. He didn't see the hurt look in his companion's brown eyes.

"Killer" Harris

IN an expensively furnished office on the ninth floor of a tall building on Forty-third Street, a rather theatrical-looking man of about thirty-five was seated at his desk and sipping from a glass of cold tea with a slice of lemon floating on the top of it. "You know, Claire," he addressed the tall blonde girl at the other side of the desk, "this English habit of five o'clock tea is getting a hold of me."

"It's the fashion," came the drawled answer. "Every little café has its five o'clock now. I guess your Miss Grant's imbibing somewhere."

"She has gone to meet Harris." Grey questioning eyes studied the girl's big dolly-blue ones. "You and Gene were sort of engaged, weren't you?"

"Sort of," she answered. "What about it?"

"Oh, nothing! Have some more tea?"

"Not me. I'm not fashionable that way." She gave him a dazzling smile. "You needn't be jealous, George. I've forgotten Gene."

"You're going to be Mrs. Miller, huh?"

"I won't say all that." She got up to walk round to him and put an arm about his neck. "But I like you a lot, Mr. Miller."

December 26th, 1936.

"Thank you for those kind words!" Miller kissed the hand so near his face. "I've got an idea about Harris. I'm going to stage him for a big fight soon as he's fit—with Dynamite Murphy."

The girl considered this, her brows puckered.

"How much?"

"A purse of ten thousand."

"That's not so hot," she decided.

"Make it twenty. And I'll bet you another twenty Gene knocks him out in three rounds."

"Gene's been in prison six months," Miller warned her. "I wouldn't—"

A knock came at the door, and Mary Grant entered. She pulled up short on perceiving Miller's visitor.

"I didn't mean to disturb you—" she was beginning when Claire smiled at her in a cat-like way.

"I'm just going," she said. "Bye, Mr. Miller—see you again some day."

She nodded to Mary and sailed out of the office almost into the arms of young Harris.

"Why, Gene—this is fine!" she cried. She allowed him to kiss her, then disengaged herself. "You look all the better for your rest."

"I feel very fit," he laughed. "Especially now I've seen you. I was hoping you'd be at the gates."

"I was too nervous," she said. "I'm an awful duffer that way. Here's Dave, too—" She crossed the outer office to shake hands effusively with Gene's friend. "How's Mr. Moran?" she asked.

"Okay," Dave answered shortly. "Miller inside, Miss Thomas?"

"He is. Miss Grant's with him taking letters."

Gene was patting his dog. "Here's old Babe," he said. "Sitting up and taking notice. Gee, Claire—it's grand being with you again! Got my letters?"

"I did. I meant to write." Claire made him a little helpless face. "But I'm a rotten correspondent. I inquired after you every day. I heard they'd allowed you to box with—with the other prisoners. Pretty tough some of 'em, what?"

Dave had been fidgeting by the clerk's empty desk. "Ain't you going to see Miller?" he prompted Gene.

Mary came out of the inner office. "Gene," she called. "Go on in."

Her pretty eyes were troubled. "Mr. Miller wants to talk to you."

Gene went into Miller's room, almost running.

"Mr. Miller, I want to show how much—how deeply I feel your kindness in going parole for me." He gripped the other's outstretched hand. "I'll never forget it—never!"

"That's all right. Sit down." The two men regarded each other steadily. "You look pretty fit. I'll fix a fight for you, maybe at Christmas."

"Soon as you like. I've been boxing every day where I was. I can't begin the game again too soon. But I'm going to be dead careful."

"Sure," Miller helped himself to a cigar. "We've got to make up for lost time, Gene. We've got to earn big money, quick. I'll match you against Dynamite for twenty thousand, loser taking five."

"That won't be me," Gene declared. "We got to get a record gate at Madison Gardens. Listen; I'm going to rechristen you. Killer Harris—how's that?"

Gene shook his head vigorously. "I don't like it."

Miller bit off the end of his cigar and spat it across the room.

"That's the name you'll work under if you stay with me. Publicity's my business and fighting's yours."

"But I want to forget all that kind of thing. I'll keep the sore place open. I know I killed Sweeney—seeing's believing. But how beats me."

"That right of yours." Miller lit his cigar. "It's your great feature." He puffed at his cigar. "Well, Gene, I've got to tell you take it or leave it. And leaving means going back to gaol."

The young fellow's smiles had faded. To be known as a killer—when that was never in his mind. He loved a fight for a fight's sake—clean, good sport in which you gave and you took and the best man won. And then you shook hands with each other.

"I'd rather go back, Mr. Miller."

"Don't be a fool." Miller rang his bell. When Mary came in, he asked: "Miss Thomas gone?"

"She's playing with the little dog."

"Ask her to step inside."

When Claire entered, Miller spoke in crisp tones:

"I've been telling Gene that we must make a smashing hit with his next fight. I want him to be billed as Killer Harris. He says he'd sooner go back to clink."

"Why, Gene, what's the matter with you?" cried the girl. "Not afraid of that swab Murphy?"

"Why can't I be billed like I always was? Gene Harris?"

"Cuts no ice," Miller stated.

"Mr. Miller's right, Gene." Miller dismissed them with a wave of his cigar.

"Take him out, Claire, and teach him sense. I'll give him till to-morrow morning."

"This Man is Dead!"

IT was the night of the fight. Killer Harris, one hundred and eighty pounds, versus Dynamite Murphy, one hundred and ninety pounds. The Irishman was thus ten pounds heavier than Gene and had a punch like the kick of a couple of mules.

But neither Gene nor Dave were alarmed. Dynamite goes off on percussion, and blows up once only. Gene meant to see that Dynamite got his percussion all right—but Gene intended to keep clear of that one big explosion!

Murphy was to be seconded by Bert McNamee, an overgrown pug of older days. A hulking, dour fellow who knew his job through and through. Bert was confident his man would win. He had coached Murphy artfully, teaching him every trick and feint these is.

"You only got to keep away from Gene's right," Bert muttered in Murphy's ear as the big Irishman lay face down on the high, narrow trestle table in his dressing-room. Bert had been massaging those huge shoulders and back. "Gene's soft—he's afraid because of that business with Sweeney. He won't swing his right only as a last resort. Meantime, you hammer his face in, see?"

"I sure will!"

"I'm going to rub you down with spirit—to harden your ribs. Lie flat—that's it." Bert went over his patient with big, skilful hands. "You'll play with him, see? And you'll get in one of your swingers to his jaw. Make his teeth rattle in his head. Now take a deep breath—this towel I'm going to lay on your back's lot."

The Irishman gavo a grunt.

"I'll say it is!"

"Let it lie there a minute. I've got my winter's rent on you, Murphy. So's the boss—if all I hear is right."

Gene was undergoing like ministrations in his dressing-room. Dave was massaging and exhorting him.

"Play as pretty as you like, but don't forget the old right-hand punch. It's your speciality, Gene. It's unexpected—and it's lively to look at!"

"And feel, I guess," Gene answered, sitting up. "No, Dave, I'm going to be a dove just fluttering its wings. I'll win all right, don't you fret. I can do with fifteen thousand."

"What's left of it after Miller's had his rake-off," Dave grumbled. "It never seems right to me promoters should take what they do. They get the profits on the house—and what's the idea of saying you'll give a purse of twenty grand if you're going to grab most of it back?"

"I'll be glad of what's left, anyway." Gene stood up, his fine, athletic frame a picture of strength and youth. "Claire and I can't get married while I'm on parole. But we can start saving up against the minute my parole's over. Can't we, Babe?"

He stooped to pat the little terrier, who promptly rolled over on her back, stiff and still save for a tiny wag of her stumpy tail.

"Dead dog, eh?" Gene chuckled. "Died for your country, eh, old dear?" His face suddenly clouded. "Get up, Babe," he went on. "I don't like you doing that trick just now."

Dave scoffed.

"Aw, don't be so silly, Gene! And don't forget your right!"

All ring bouts are much the same. The good boxer is the fellow who never forgets his defence and doesn't try out for too many chances of a quick decision. Best to take stock of your man in the first few rounds and see what he's up to before launching in with any fancy work of your own. Gene was a sound fighter—a general at the game who commanded his forces with skill and caution. He had seen too many knockouts courted and caught by reckless boxers. And the business of a heavyweight is to wait and see, whilst not waiting too long.

The big place was packed out—every seat sold and standing room only. Miller's publicity had proved a winner—all the patrons of the ring had been captured by the allure of seeing Killer Harris do his stuff. Niggers from Harlem rolled their eyes and chuckled throatily in the cheap seats, or where they sweated in the "standing only."

Dave was at the ring corner watching every move in each round. There was little in-fighting; the referee had only to separate the men once in three rounds. Murphy was heavy and not too quick; he had got infected a little with the memory that Gene had killed Roughhouse Sweeney with that terrible right punch of his.

But Gene wasn't using it. In fact, he was rather allowing Murphy to make the running. Dave kept whispering hoarsely, gesticulating the while:

"Right hand, boy! Swing him one—jest one!"

A deafening chorus accompanied the fight. Shouts, groans, cat-calls, and cheers when either one or the other of the big men in the ring got home with a clever blow. Three rounds were fought with points slightly in favour of Dynamite Murphy. Dave was becoming frantic—Miller and Claire, sitting side by side, exchanged questioning glances every now and then.

Mary, in the front, just behind Gene's corner, looked very anxious. A kind of dread hung over her. There was a bad feeling in the air; a tenseness which she couldn't break through.

If Gene should get beaten—well, that would be the end of him. Miller would call in his bond for Gene's good behaviour, and Gene would go back to gaol to serve out his sentence. And Claire Thomas would go back on her word to marry him when free.

Mary glanced at the blonde. Hard as polished flint and as smoothly brilliant. Maybe a good thing for Gene if she did give him the go-by.

But Gene was crazy for her. Mary knew that deep in her heart, and she sighed again and again.

The gong sounded for the fourth round. Gene was attacking now. He had measured his opponent and knew what to do. Murphy ran in with one of his dynamite punches. Gene countered, stepped back, and, at long last, swung his right. It was a straight punch, and caught Murphy full on the breast, knocking him backwards.

The referee began to count as Murphy sprawled there amid the groans of the crowd. One, two, three, four—Then the Irishman was up again, looking groggy, but still full of fight. The round was near its end when Murphy, punching hard at Gene, was seen to overbalance and fall flat on his face.

He was counted out. The match and purse went to Gene, who was acclaimed the victor amid hoarse cheers and shrill yells of delight from his backers. Claire gave Miller a sideways wink.

"Seems to me I'm going to pick up the dibs, George."

"I laid most of it off, honey," Miller winked back. "Old George isn't all the mutt you take him for."

She nestled her hand in his.

"Good old George!" she murmured. Murphy's dour second, Bert McNamee, was bending over the still prostrate form of Murphy. Bert's big, gloomy face was gloomier still as he called out something to the referee which was lost in the confusion of noise around the ring.

Dave came across to him. Bert mouthed:

"Help me carry him out. He's fainted."

The Irishman, a dead weight in their arms, was carried to his dressing-room. They laid Murphy on the massaging bench on his back. His eyes were closed; his face a deep blue. There was no rise or fall of his great chest.

"Get the doctor!" Miller ordered, his lips suddenly dry as dust.

A police surgeon was fetched. He was followed by a plain-clothes inspector and a constable in uniform. Murphy was gone over, sounded. The surgeon listened through his stethoscope while silence reigned in the room.

The surgeon straightened himself, putting away his instrument. He told them, in four pregnant words:

"This man is dead!"

Babe Finds Out

AT the night court to which Gene and his second were taken there was no formal charge made against him. The matter was simply reported to the magistrate, who listened gravely.

"You killed Sweeney in a fight, didn't you?"

"Yes, captain—so they said," Gene answered. He was badly shaken. He had liked Murphy and knew that he was married to a decent girl. But I swear I never hit either Sweeney or Murphy hard enough." He turned his strained young face to Miller. "You saw the fight—you know that I didn't let myself go. I was too afraid. I purposely held back."

Miller nodded.

"I thought you were going to lose," he agreed. "The fellow's heart must have been weak."

The magistrate put in:

"Medical examination will tell us whether that was so. It's a bad business, Harris—you must keep a touch with the station."

"I can go?" Gene asked shakily.

"Leave your address with the officer and stay home," came the order. "I warn you not to attempt anything likely to injure yourself still further."

They went back to the Gardens, where other bouts were just finishing. Claire was all sympathy for Gene. She had won a tidy sum and could afford to be at her very best. She asked him to take her along home in his new sports car.

Gene stooped to touch the little dog and a whimper of joy sounded.

"I'll be only too glad. It's sweet of you, Claire, to be so—so sweet—" He scarcely knew what he was saying. All the time his thoughts were dining into him: "You've killed Murphy. You've killed a decent fellow who never did you wrong. He was married. He had a wife and two little kiddies. You've killed him!"

Useless to shout to himself: "I didn't! I didn't!" His eyes were dull; the bruises he sustained in the fight were all one huge, aching thought:

"Murphy's dead. You hit him with your right. You're a murderer!"

He turned with a sick smile towards Mary.

"You and Dave—you might take Babe along to my place. Tell the landlady I'll be home pretty soon."

Mary took his limp hand in hers.

"All right, Gene. Don't worry."

He tried to thank her. Claire took his arm in hers and led him away. Dave's ugly face was working queerly.

"Something's wrong somewhere," he grunted. "Gene never hit him at all."

"They said a weak heart," Mary offered.

"Yeah, they said so," Dave shrugged heavy shoulders. "But Murphy was as fit as a fiddle. I knew him. Let's go, Mary."

They went out of the Gardens and had walked along Eighth Avenue some distance under the cool night. Suddenly Mary remembered.

"Oh, Dave—we've forgotten Babe!" she exclaimed.

"Gee, Mary!" Dave turned about. "My head's all gone woolly. Let's skip back sharp. I didn't see the little dog in Gene's room."

"She must have followed into Murphy's room. I recollect now seeing her sniffing about. Maybe she's got locked in."

They hurried back to the Gardens. The big place was in darkness, except at the back where the porter lodged. They managed to make him hear at last, and he opened the door.

"Harris' little dog?" he questioned. "No, I ain't seen her. Maybe she ran out after him when he left with Miss Thomas?"

"We better look round," said Dave. "Gee, I hope she's here! If she ran out onto Eighth Avenue in all the traffic—"

He left the thought unfinished. Mary and he went hurrying after the night porter to the dressing-rooms.

Babe, left alone in Murphy's room and unable to get out, had been pursuing her sniffing inquiries. At last, at a badly shut dressing cabinet, she had found the edge of a towel hastily flung down at the bottom of the cabinet. Here was the smell she had been tracking.

With infinite patience she pulled and tugged at the towel until it had been drawn out of its hiding-place. Babe carried it to the middle of the room and nuzzled it with canine curiosity. A queer smell—a new smell. A rather fascinating smell. A sleepy smell; she laid down on the towel, then presently rolled over on her side.

Mary heard a faint, piteous crying—a dog in pain. A little dog lost and alone and very ill. With a smothered gasp of fear she led the way into Murphy's room. On the floor lay Babe, stretched out on the towel, her brown eyes glazing, little whines of fear sounding in her parched throat.

Mary knelt by the little terrier.

"We must get a vet! Quickly, Dave—she must have eaten something!"

December 26th, 1936.

"Take her to a doctor, miss," the night porter suggested.

Dave said, gruffly:

"I'll get Gene."

Gene was sitting in Claire's parlour. She had got supper ready for him—his favourite doughnuts and hot, sweet coffee. But Gene wasn't eating or drinking. He sat there like one in a trance. There was a constant humming inside his head: "You've killed again. A second time. A decent fellow. Married—two little kiddies."

The telephone cut in on Claire's gay chatter:

"Eat something, Gene! Don't sit there like an image." She answered the call: "It's for you—it's Moran. He says come quick to somewhere—here, you take the line."

Gene listened to Dave's urgent words. "I'll be there in five minutes!" He turned to Claire, "It's Babe—my little dog. She's eaten something. Dave says—" Gene choked suddenly. "Says she's dying!"

Poisoned!

THEY were in Murphy's room. Gene stooped to touch the little dog. A whimper of joy sounded, lost in a cry of pain. He took Babe into his arms.

"Where's the best doctor in this city?" he asked.

"Round the corner, sir," the porter told him. "It's the third house down Fiftieth Street. Ring the night bell twice."

Dave, Mary, and Gene were in the little operating-room at the surgery. The doctor had just covered up Babe's small, lifeless body.

"Poisoned," he told Gene as he rubbed his fingers dry on antiseptic wool flakes.

Gene couldn't speak. Blow upon blow. A faithful, loving little heart as still as poor Murphy's. Still for ever.

Dave said: "I brought away the towel she was lying on, doc."

The doctor took the towel from him and smelled at it.

"Leave this with me," he ordered.

At Claire's flat there was another visitor—big Bert McNamee. He was feasting on Gene's discarded doughnuts and washing down the indigestible doughy cakes with sealding coffee and milk. Claire was watching him with amused eyes.

"It's a pleasure getting supper for you, Bert!"

He nodded, mouth full of doughnut.

"I've cleared nigh on thirty grand," the blonde went on. "What say to hopping it?"

"Whaffor?" McNamee looked surprised. "Thirty thousand ain't so hot these times."

The telephone bell whirred. Again Claire took the call. She listened frowningly, saying "Oh!"—and "Ah!"—and finally:

"Isn't that just too bad, Gene. I'm sure sorry."

She put back the receiver, facing her visitor.

"The dog's dead—it found a towel and got playing with it. The towel was in Murphy's room."

McNamee started to his great feet.

"Gosh, I must have left it! I'll go get it—"

"Too late. They've taken it away."

She eyed him ragingly. "Of all the chumps!"

Bert's paniely alarm gave way to a confident laugh.

"They won't find anything. The stuff evaporates. Bust that dog!"

Claire said:

"You shouldn't have put it on so strong. I told you it was very dangerous. We only needed to get Murphy knocked out. That's twice you've mucked things up."

The big pro gave her an appealing glance.

"We had to win, didn't we? I'd do anything for you, Claire."

"Don't do for me quite so hard." She began to calm down; the deadly drug evaporated and there wouldn't be a trace. But "Killer" Harris couldn't be played for a mug all the time. "I've an idea," she said more easily. "Next fight you'll act second for Gene. I'll tell Miller to fix it so Moran takes the opposite chair. And as Gene will start at short odds, we'll back the other fellow and make half a million dollars."

McNamee grinned admiringly.

"You're sure the little wife, Claire! Half a million! A quarter's enough for me."

"That's what you say now." She came across to give him some more coffee. "I've a mind to poison you, you great lump." She gave him a kiss instead. "I've done with Miller—after the next fight. We'll go to Monte Carlo and have a snack at enjoying ourselves in peace."

"It's Not Evidence"

NEXT day in the magistrate's room at the court-house the coroner was instructing those present:

"Autopsy of the organs reveals no trace of weak heart or drugs. Murphy's death is a mystery. The bruising of his body is quite superficial—it wasn't your much-boomed right that killed him, Harris."

"I was sure of it," said Gene.

Dave whispered:

"Tell 'em about Babe and the towel."

The coroner listened.

"Let's have that towel."

"The vet examined it," Gene handed the towel to the magistrate. "He says there has been something on it, but it was so volatile it doesn't exist now."

"Let me have it," the coroner repeated. "I'm a bit of an expert in poisons. Let me have the dog, too."

"Oh, I can't! I can't!" cried Gene. "I—I loved that little dog!"

The coroner put a hand on his shoulder.

"I can't hurt it now, Harris. There's dirty work somewhere here. It's your duty to help justice. In fairness to others beside yourself."

"But—"

"I give an order for the dog's body to be examined," the magistrate settled it. "You can go, Harris. But you mustn't move from your diggings—and you must report here every morning."

In the busy streets again, Mary led Gene to where she had parked her car. Dave and the girl got in with him, Mary at the wheel. They drove to Forty Third Street and found Miller engaged with Claire Thomas.

The promoter seemed pleased to see Gene, and shook hands with him in his usual theatrical style.

"Gene, I've a proposition," he said. "Miss Thomas put the idea in my head. Murphy was a married man and leaves a young widow and children. How say dividing my purse—ten thousand for you, ten for her? I'll throw in my percentage—there was a grand house last night."

"I'd like Mrs. Murphy to take all of the purse," Gene said. "And that's little enough. I feel awful about it."

"Oh, cheer up! No fault of yours—Murphy had something wrong with his heart. You never know with these Irishmen; they seem all solid—yet often they're men of wood painted to look like iron. Murphy might have died any minute, anywhere. You really mean you'd like his widow to pouch the lot?"

"Please, Mr. Miller."
"It's great of you, Harris. And—well, it's great publicity, too. You let Claire take care of you—I want Mary here. We're busy nowadays—good-bye."

Dave tried to get in a word with Gene, but, under the glamour of Claire's smiles, Gene was lost to all else. Dave went off by himself. He called on the veterinary doctor in Fiftieth Street and had a long talk with him, coming away with puzzled eyes.

He went to the magistrate's court and had an interview with the captain there and the police surgeon.

"It's not evidence," said the captain, after Dave had said his say.

"Both these men were poisoned—same as the dog," Dave argued.

"But how? By whom?" The captain of police shook his head. "No traces of poison in Murphy's stomach. In the dog's—yes. But what was the motive?"

"So's Gene could win," said Dave. "They could have doped Murphy and Sweeney," the surgeon reminded him.

"I guess that's what they meant to do," Dave declared. "But, not being doctors, they overdid it."

"Poison absorbed through open pores of the skin?" questioned the captain. "It's a bit fancy, what?" He added: "But, listen, Moran—if you get a line on anything, come to us."

"I sure will," Dave answered grimly.

A Change Over

SOME week or so later, Miller was fixing up a fight for Gene with Kayo Reilly—a lumping fellow who had just beaten Hiram Black, the negro from New Orleans. Claire suggested that Dave might second him.

"McNamee can take Gene," she urged. "It'll make a change for everybody."

Miller considered the idea.

"I'm not so sure Moran will care to leave Harris. He's been his second all through."

"It will look better," Claire argued. "Nobody can think any harm for Reilly, with bull-dog Moran acting for him. There won't be any accidents."

"Harris will knock Reilly into the middle of next week," Miller boasted.

Claire shrugged pretty shoulders. "Maybe. What odds will you lay?"

"What you like?"

"I'll take you ten grand to one," smiled Claire.

Miller entered the bet in his pocket-book.

"Been quarrelling with Gene?"

"I'm through with him," Claire answered flippantly. "You're my big boy friend, George."

They had forgotten the partly open door. Mary, sitting at her desk just outside Miller's room, had heard every word. She sat there tense and suddenly afraid. Dave to second Reilly—and McNamee, the big brute, to stand for Gene. What did it mean?

Mischief, Mary decided. She was busy with her typewriter when Claire came out, beautifully attired and too full of herself to take notice of anybody.

As soon as she left the office, Mary went to Dave's lodgings.

"Isn't it too bad, Dave," she told him all in a rush. "Miller's fixing you for Reilly in the fight?"

"Me for Kayo?" Dave shook his head. "I have another guess, baby. I've always been in Gene's corner."

"Bert McNamee is to take Gene. I tell you it's all settled."

"Is that so?" Dave put on his hat. "Let's go see Gene."

"He's out with Claire."
Dave took her arm.

"He oughter be out with you, Mary. Gene's daft over some things." The girl made no reply. "Don't mind me, Mary—I'm an old fool. But you don't hate Gene, huh?"

She confessed in a shaky voice: "Gene knows I don't."

Moran gently propelled her towards the door.

"I gotter see a feller I know. I'll walk along with you part of the way. No use my calling on Miller, I guess?"

"None. When he's said a thing, it's settled. You know that."

Dave walked with her to the corner. "I gotter get a bus here. Take care of yourself, dear—don't mind about me or Gene. Just keep steady like, not worrying too much."

When she had gone, Dave tootled off to his friend the police surgeon. They talked together in whispers, although alone in the surgery. That walls have ears is an old saying and, often, a true one.

Dave also talked in whispers with Gene that night.

McNamee was a good trainer. He took Gene in hand and kept him in hand. Plenty of practice, plenty of exercise, plenty of getting to bed at ten o'clock every night. Plain diet; water—or fruit drinks. No smoking.

No doughnuts!

Gene had to admit that McNamee knew his job. On the night of the fight with Reilly both men were as fit as fiddles. Dave had been conscientious, too.

"Kayo's in the pink," he came to tell Gene in his dressing-room. "You'll have to watch your step," he whispered. "Bert shown you anything, accidental like?"

Gene gestured towards the clothes cabinet.

"In there—top shelf. He didn't dream I'd spotted him," he added loudly. "You heard I'm off with Claire?"

Dave, taking his cue, answered: "Is that so? Well, well—all my condolences." He tiptoed across to the cabinet.

"Bert's fetching in some boiling water." Gene went on. "He'll be back in a minute or two."

Dave's quick eyes had guided his quicker fingers to an innocent-looking little medicine bottle on the shelf in the cabinet. He substituted a similar bottle—deftly sliding the stolen one into his pocket.

Then he tiptoed back to Gene, whispering urgently:

"I'd hate to lose this fight, Dave,"

"Claire Thomas and Bert McNamee," said the Captain crisply, "you're arrested on a charge of conspiracy to murder!"

said Gene, just as McNamee entered with a kettle of steaming water. Bert grinned at Dave:

"He ain't going to lose. No, sir!"

Dave answered gruffly:

"All the same, I'm backing Reilly to give him the old fade out."

"Lay you hundred to ten Harris wins," Bert offered, shrugging.

"I'll take you," snapped Dave. "So long—see you both later."

Biter—Bitten!

THEY were in the ring being presented to the audience by the announcer, a bull-throated man in evening-dress.

"Ladies and gentlemen! We now have a fight to a finish between the two most famous heavyweights in the world! Killer Harris, one hundred and eighty pounds—"

Gene stood up in his corner to acknowledge the cheers. He seemed slow and a bit overtrained to experienced eyes. But he smiled in his old carefree way.

"And Kayo Reilly, one hundred and seventy-nine pounds!"

Reilly stood up. He shook a great fist in the air in answer to the roaring cheers of his backers. Dave, just behind him, nodded right and left to the crowd.

Miller, sitting with Claire, murmured:

"Like to double your bet?"

She smiled.

"I'll hate taking your money, George! But double it is. Gene's sore about my giving him the bird. He'll fight all wild. Reilly will win."

"Seconds out of the ring!" came the warning. The men advanced and shook hands. The gong sounded and the fight began.

Mary, watching them, wouldn't own to herself that Gene was not so quick as usual. She imagined him to be playing with Reilly and, when the latter fought Gene all over the ring, she only nodded to herself, in answer to the shouts and yells of the vast audience, as if saying: "You wait a minute!"

In the second round, Gene seemed all his old self—and a bit more. Points went to him and the great building shook with cheers. In the third bout, Reilly did a come back and floored Gene, just as the bell sounded, with a quick blow over the heart.

McNamee helped Gene to stagger to his corner.

"What are you doin'?" he growled. "You opened yourself wide to him! No more of that—keep in close and paste him one between the eyes with that old right of yours."

Gene nodded. He was perspiring freely, his chest rising and falling as his breath whistled in his throat.

The fourth round was a farce. Gene's punch had deserted him. He couldn't get a real one in on Reilly's tough hide. They fought all round the ring. Gene on the defence. Then Reilly clinched and the referee had to separate them, warning Reilly sharply. Gene got in a left hook which made his opponent more wary. Then again they were in-fighting and both were warned.

As they broke away, Gene slipped. Reilly's instant swinging punch on the chest knocked him flat. Amid yells, groans and hisses, Gene, despite a desperate attempt to get to his feet, was again saved by the gong.

To Mary's horror he didn't get up. McNamee and Dave ran to him, while the referee knelt by his side. Shouting and wild confusion covered the end—Killer Harris was carried out of the ring and borne to his room.

The referee held up his hand and waited for a chance to be heard.

"The fight is stopped. No decision." December 26th, 1936.

The ALL-SCHOOL STORY GIFT BOOK

The latest edition of this famous schoolboy Annual which has been a prime favourite for so many years. No boy can resist the fascination of its cheery stories of Harry Wharton & Co., and all the other famous schoolboy characters; its poems and its many humorous features. Also contains four fine coloured plates.

HOLIDAY ANNUAL 5/-

A Book of a Thousand Fascinations

MOTORS, SHIPS and ENGINES have never before been presented in so enthralling a way as in this magnificent book. It contains 192 pages, packed with action photographs, drawings and absorbing articles. Be sure you get a copy.

Modern Boy's New Book of MOTORS, SHIPS AND ENGINES 6/-

On Sale at all Newsagents and Booksellers

Yells and cat-calls drowned his voice. Everybody was talking and gesticulating at once. But in Gene's room there was silence—the uproar without sounding like a far-off sea.

The divisional police surgeon was leaning over Gene. The little bespectacled man put away his stethoscope almost at once. He drew a sheet over Gene's body, hiding him from the horrified eyes of those who had crowded into the room. "It's all over," came the verdict.

A strangled scream broke from Mary's ashen lips. Dave ran to catch her as she fell. McNamee stared at the covered-up body on the bed, his face wooden. Claire Thomas clung to Miller's arm.

"How awful! Poor Gene!" she whispered in a faint voice.

Dave carried Mary out of the room. Those who had pushed a way in, when Gene had been brought there, melted out. Miller removed Claire's hand from his sleeve.

"I must tell them," he said, forgetting all his gestures. "This is a terrible business."

The doctor packed up his bag. Claire, repulsed by Miller, came to McNamee. They were last to leave the room.

The blonde spoke urgently:

"Got the towel?"

"Yeah," McNamee answered. "We best get away. I didn't mean to croak him. That darned stuff's too hot."

They glanced backwards from the threshold towards the sheeted body on the high, narrow bed, their eyes drawn to it by a horrible fascination. A stifled shriek broke from the blonde.

The corpse had thrown back the sheet and was sitting up.

"You didn't use it, Bert," came Gene's cool voice. "Dave exchanged the bottle!"

At the spoken signal arranged by Dave the police jumped out of hiding. Two were in the dress cabinets in the room; the captain and his lieutenant entered by the door, followed by Dave and Mary. The captain spoke crisply:

"Claire Thomas and Bert McNamee: you're arrested on a charge of conspiracy to murder!"

Handcuffs were slipped on their wrists. Claire, cool to the last, merely smiled as she answered:

"You'll have to prove it, big boy!"

Miller talked straight to Gene one morning in his office:

"You've had a near call. I was all of a fool, too. How about you taking a skip round Niagara City for a month or so?"

"Dave can't get away."

"I'm not thinking of Moran." Miller stopped Gene's arguments. "I had Miss Grant in mind."

"But Mary don't care for me that way, Mr. Miller."

"Ask her," came the answer. "She's outside at her desk. I'm shutting down this office for a month, anyway." He rang his desk bell and Mary came to the inner office with pad and pencil.

"Gene wants to tell you something," said Miller, reaching for his hat. "I got to go out."

Gene and Mary were alone. The girl asked:

"What is it, Gene?"

"Will you come to Niagara Falls with me, Mary?" Gene's eyes were twinkling. "And go places as my wife? I know a shop there where the doughnuts are marvellous!"

Pad and pencil were on the floor, forgotten altogether, when Dave Moran came slyly peeping in a little later!

(By permission of Pathé Pictures, Ltd., starring Eddie Nugent.)

Never was there a more enduring comradeship than that which was formed between the king of wild horses and the outcast wonder dog. Together they braved a thousand perils, unswerving in their loyalty to each other. Follow their amazing adventures in this gripping serial drama, starring Kane Richmond, Norma Taylor and Rex and Rinty

EPISODE 9—
"The Stranger's Recall"

The Adventures OF REX AND RINTY

READ THIS FIRST

Rex, a black Arabian stallion, is worshipped by a strange race of people on the remote tropical island of Sujan.

To Sujan come three white men who are agents of a Californian rancher named Crawford. They steal Rex, realising the fortune he can make for their employer, but one of them is captured by the Sujanese. This man, Wheeler, only earns his life and liberty by promising to recover the god horse, and travels to America in company with a native known as Pasha.

Meanwhile, Rex is delivered to Crawford, but breaks free and takes to the hills. Later that day the rancher plays in a polo game at the Bruce Riding Academy, but his team loses to a side led by Frank Bradley, a popular young sportsman, and after the game Crawford vents some of his spite on a stray police dog that has roamed into the district.

It is this dog, Rinty, which later comes across Rex and which brings the god horse into contact with Frank Bradley and Dorothy Bruce.

Frank trains Rex, but later the god horse is secured by Wheeler and Pasha. Meanwhile, Crawford has become involved in a fatal quarrel with one of his own men, and takes to the hills to avoid the penalty of his crime.

Frank locates the missing stallion at an abandoned mine to which Pasha and Wheeler have taken the animal. Rinty is with the young polo ace, but, leaving the dog outside, he tackles the Sujanese and his ally alone.

In the resultant fight Wheeler fires point-blank at Frank with a six-gun.

(Now Read On)

Frank Learns the Truth

AN instant before Wheeler pulled the trigger Frank Bradley ducked low, and, the leaden slug zipping within an inch of his skull, he bullocked headlong into the gunman's midriff.

Wheeler went down, but Frank was carried on by his own impetus and he brought up against the wall of the mine gallery, his temple coming into violent contact with the rock so that he pitched to the floor and lay in a dazed condition.

As for Wheeler, he was soon on his feet once more. Yet even as he rose he heard the loud, angry bark of a dog, and next moment he saw the form of Rinty bounding into the cavern.

From his vantage point outside the mine the wolf-hound had witnessed the scuffle which had taken place, and now he was hurling himself to Frank's rescue with bared fangs—in an onset that brought a cry of alarm to Wheeler's lips and caused the man to level the revolver which he was still grasping in his fist.

Luckily for Rinty the gun jammed, and in another second the dog was at the armed ruffian's throat, but with a desperate clutch Wheeler buried one hand in the thick fur around the animal's neck, and with the other hand he changed his grip on the forty-five and wielded it like a club, hitting his canine antagonist savagely.

Rinty dropped like a log under the first cruel blow, and with an outburst of rage Wheeler lifted his boot to kick the huddled body of the wolfhound.

It was a kick that never landed, for suddenly the man's attention was diverted by the startling behaviour of the god horse Rex, whose primitive and lawless instincts had been aroused. And, if the stallion had shown signs of restiveness during the attack on Frank, the devil in him was fairly let loose by the treatment that had been meted out to Rinty, the dog for whom he had conceived so strong an affection.

Hitherto he had been held in check by the fact that Pasha had supported Wheeler. But now Pasha was lying on the ground where Frank had thrown him at the commencement of the fracas, and Rex promptly made for Wheeler in a way which sent that roguo skipping backwards in sheer terror.

Propped on one elbow, Pasha was the only eye-witness of the drama that ensued, and with awestricken gaze he saw Rex charging at Wheeler, to rear up on his hind-legs and lash out at the man with iron-shod hoofs.

Wheeler sprang out of range of those flashing forefeet, and had to spring again as the big stallion came after him. Meanwhile, Pasha was calling out to Rex in the native tongue, but for once the enraged creature did not heed him, and the Sujanese was wellnigh despairing of Wheeler's life when, all-at once, he realised the white man was trying to blaze at the horse with that revolver which he possessed.

True, the gun had jammed, but Wheeler was tugging at the trigger frantically, and there seemed every likelihood of the weapon functioning once more, to send a death-bolt through the brain of the black Arabian.

Pasha's entire outlook changed, and his concern for Wheeler's safety became a much sharper anxiety for the safety of the god horse. Then, with a swift gesture, he plucked out the blowpipe that he had used so effectively on two former occasions.
December 26th, 1930.

There was a dart already in the tube, one of those darts smeared with the native drug which could produce unconsciousness almost instantaneously, and Pasha directed it straight at Wheeler's wrist.

The missile pierced the white man's flesh and, stiffening, he dropped the forty-five that he had been brandishing and collapsed in a heap on the floor of the cavern, lying there at the mercy of Rex's hoofs. Nor could he have escaped the vengeance of those hoofs if Pasha had not gathered himself up and rushed at the stallion to seize the rope-bridle attached to the animal's head.

Hauling on that bridle and shouting to Rex insistently he managed to drag the god horse away from its intended victim, and it was while he was engaged in this task of pacifying the creature that Frank Bradley struggled to his feet.

The young sportsman had collected his wits in time to see how Pasha had disposed of Wheeler and cut short an ugly situation, and he had also noticed that the gun which had fallen from Wheeler's fingers had slid across the floor of the mine gallery so that it was now actually within his own reach.

Frank retrieved the six-shooter and covered Pasha, who had his back to him. But even as he stood watching the native, he could not help being struck by the strange power that the foreigner seemed to wield over Rex, could not help marvelling at the manner in which the fellow smoothed the stallion's ruffled temper.

"You seem to have a way with that horse, my friend," he remarked, when the black Arabian was at last completely under control.

Pasha whipped round, and his face fell as he perceived that Frank had the "drop" on him. Then, after a brief silence, he looked at the younger man appealingly.

"Truly I have a way with the god horse Rex," he said. "It comes of knowing him for many years."

"But you don't own him," declared Frank, speaking with an emphasis that nevertheless held the faintest trace of uncertainty. "You can't make me believe that—not after the methods you've used to try and obtain possession of him."

"The god horse has no owner, white man," Pasha replied. "Nor does he know any master, as you in your country understand the word. But I have a right to take him from you, and as to the methods I have used—well, I have adopted them because I felt that no other methods would serve."

He hesitated a moment, and then in a low and earnest voice he began to tell Frank the story of Rex, the god horse whom the people of Suján worshipped so profoundly; and, fantastic as the narrative sounded, yet there was a sincerity in Pasha's tone that impressed the listener with the growing conviction that the man was speaking the truth.

When the native had finished, Frank had only one dubious comment to make. "You certainly picked an unfortunate partner in Wheeler," he mused. "This fellow is a bad egg."

"But there was no choice in the matter," Pasha countered. "When the god horse was stolen from the sacred stables in Suján, this man was our only hope of tracing him."

"Yes, I suppose you're right," Frank had to admit.

He was silent for a space, and then all at once he lowered the gun with which he had been covering the foreigner.

December 26th, 1926.

"Pasha," he said, "I'm inclined to believe your story, but I'd like to check up on it as far as possible—by making a few inquiries regarding the island of Suján. And if I find out that they really do worship horses there, then I'll take your word for it that Rex belongs to your people and is sacred to them."

"Where will you obtain any information concerning Suján? No one, excepting Crawford and his men, seems to have heard of it, in this great country of yours."

"Don't worry," Frank rejoined, "I'll find out all I want to know from the Travel Bureaux. And when I'm satisfied that you're on the level, Pasha, I'll help you to get Rex to the coast and ship him to your island. All I ask of you is to trust me—come back to the Bruce Academy and stay there for the time being—and make a clean break with Wheeler."

"Whatever you say," the native answered. "Whatever you say."

With that Frank turned to Rinty, who was beginning to show signs of life, and a cursory examination told him that the dog was not seriously injured. Indeed, Rinty was actually on his feet again when a movement on the part of Wheeler caught the attention of Frank and Pasha.

Frank quickly fumbled with the six-gun that he had secured, and, restoring it to working order, he was training it on Wheeler when the latter raised himself into a sitting posture and stared up at him dully.

From Frank's menacing figure the gangster's narrow eyes travelled to Pasha, and as he saw the native standing calmly at the young sportsman's side his shifty countenance registered a look of mingled comprehension and anger.

"What's this?" he snarled. "The double-cross?"

"Call it what you like, Wheeler," Frank struck in. "But Pasha has told me everything, and I've advised him to cut adrift from you."

The crook's mouth tightened, and he flashed an evil glance at the Sujanese.

"Why, you can't get away with this!" he bit out. "You can't throw me over! I've got a reward comin' to me for the return o' that god horse, and you can't cheat me out of it, you dirty nigger!"

With a fierce cry Pasha threw himself on the man and gripped him by the throat.

"Call me that name and I will choke the life from your miserable body!" he grated.

His fingers clenched upon Wheeler's windpipe, and the white man gave vent to a hoarse cry of fear. Then, mastering his wrath, Pasha drew back from him and spoke in a voice that was well modulated, though none the less incisive.

"I have every right to break with you, Wheeler," he said. "If I had not stopped you a little while ago you would have killed the god horse."

"He was tryin' to kill me, wasn't he?" the gangster blurted. "He was tryin' to kill me!"

"Perhaps it is a pity that I did not let him," the Sujanese retorted, and then, turning to Frank, he proposed that they should leave Wheeler to his own resources and depart.

Crawford's Men

FRANK was only too eager to start back for the Bruce Academy, and, after warning Wheeler that he would be well advised to remove himself from this part of the country, he accompanied Pasha as the native led Rex from the mine with Rinty padding in the stallion's footsteps.

Outside the cavern Pasha mounted one of the horses that were standing there. Then he indicated Wheeler's bronc, suggesting that Frank should commandeer it, but the young polo player shook his head.

"No," he told the Sujanese, "my own pony is over there in the grove. We'll pick him up—come on."

They left Wheeler's bronc, and a minute or two later Frank secured the animal that he had borrowed from the Bruce Academy; and, having climbed into the saddle, he and Pasha set out across-country at a smart trot, the foreigner holding Rex in close attendance.

Pasha was apparently still thinking of Wheeler, for after a minute or two he addressed Frank thoughtfully.

"That man is a rogue," he said. "I have known that all along, but a bargain was struck with him—"

"Don't let that bother your conscience," Frank interrupted. "If I'm any judge of character, Wheeler would have double-crossed you without hesitation if it had suited his purpose."

"I think you are right," the native agreed. "In any case, he has no reason to harbour a grudge. Already I have advanced him a good deal of money for such services as he rendered me by putting me on the track of the god horse."

"Then you've certainly no cause to feel that you've done him an injustice," declared Frank. "But, forgetting Wheeler for the moment, my idea is that you stay over at the Bruce Academy till I've made a few inquiries and arranged transportation for you and Rex—that is, if I'm satisfied that your story is true."

Pasha looked at him gravely. "Will I be welcome at this academy which you speak of?" he asked.

"Miss Bruce and her father will be glad to make you comfortable, on my recommendation," Frank assured him. "Meantime, we'll groom that white paint off Rex—when we get him to the academy, I mean. It was a good idea to disguise him, but it won't be necessary now. I'll see that proper protection is afforded."

They rode on, but they had not travelled far, and were on the point of entering a belt of thickets, when all at once there was a movement in the vegetation and three horsemen suddenly started out at them.

They were Jones, Martin and Anderson, and so unexpectedly had they appeared that Frank found himself lined up under the sights of their guns before he could attempt to reach for his own forty-five.

"Take it easy, Bradley," Jones growled. "Huh, thought you'd given us the slip, didn't you? But fortunately Anderson here is mighty smart at followin' a trail, and he picked up yours all right when we back-tracked after losin' sight of you."

"Yeah, and we spotted you headin' this way again just as we got to the edge o' the bush," Anderson interposed. "So you've made the acquaintance of Pasha, eh? H'm, mighty nice lookin' horse you've got there, too."

He nodded towards Rex in a cursory fashion, and Frank held his breath. As for Pasha, he also became tense, wondering if these men would see through the disguise. But an impatient remark by Jones tended to reassure the Sujanese and the wealthy young American who was now prepared to befriend him.

"A nice horse all right," said Jones, "but not the one we're after. Come on, Bradley, where's the black Arabian?"

"You mean Rex?" Frank inquired coolly. "How should I know?"

"You know all right," Martin broke in viciously. "Either you know, or else Pasha does. Which of you is gonna talk?"

Neither Frank nor his companion offered any response, and Crawford's men glowered at them menacingly for a few seconds. Then Jones spoke up.

"Say," he announced to Martin and Anderson, "we're pretty close to that abandoned mine on Red Ridge. Pasha had the god horse hidden there one time. Do you suppose he might have cached it there again?"

Anderson and Martin exchanged glances, and then, after looking craftily at the prisoners, the first-named turned to Jones again.

"Maybe you're right," he said. "This guy Pasha very likely figured that we'd never think of lookin' there a second time."

"Well, we'll ride over to the mine, anyway," Jones stated. "Andy, you stay here and keep an eye on these two hombres. Martin, you follow me."

He kicked his heels into his mustang's flanks and started at a gallop for the ridge, Martin spurring after him, and, while his comrades rode off, Anderson focused his attention on Frank and Pasha.

He kept his gun trained on them, eyeing them guardedly as he did so, and for a spell there was silence, a silence which he brought to a close as his accomplices disappeared beyond a distant fold in the landscape.

"I didn't expect to find Pasha in tow with you, Bradley," Anderson observed. "What's the idea. Have you come to some arrangement with him about the god horse?"

"I don't know what you're talking about," said Frank.

Anderson's lip curled in a sneer. "Ah, don't give me that stuff," he retorted contemptuously. "But say, what about Wheeler? You ain't made pals with him as well, have you, Bradley?"

Frank did not deign to answer him, and, conversation languishing, the crook slid a glance upon Rex once more, still oblivious of the fact that he was looking at the very animal which Crawford coveted so greedily.

"Huh, that sure is a good-lookin' horse," he grunted. "Where did you pick him up?"

Again Frank made no reply, and, urging his own bronc closer to the white stallion, Anderson proceeded to scrutinize it with interest, at the same time keeping an eye on his prisoners.

Frank and Pasha watched him breathlessly, and, their gaze riveted on him, they suddenly saw him start, saw him peer at the stallion and stretch out a hand to touch its coat, running his fingers against the grain so that the hair was turned back to show him the deception which had been carried out.

Next instant, Anderson switched his eyes full on the faces of Frank and Pasha in a look of understanding.

"Paint!" he blurted. "Why, of all the cunning—"

He never finished the sentence, for, realising that Anderson had stumbled upon the truth, Frank Bradley took a chance and swung his left fist down on the barrel of the gangster's forty-five.

The blow knocked the weapon aside, and a split second later Frank whipped his right into action and drove his packed knuckles with sledge-hammer force against Anderson's jaw.

The man plunged from the saddle, the six-shooter flying from his grasp, and Frank swung himself quickly to the ground and pounced on the rogue to make sure of him. In another thirty seconds the younger man was rising to his feet again, having battered his foe into a state of complete insensibility, and without further delay he remounted his pony and called out to Pasha.

"Come on," he shouted, "we may as well get out of here before those other rats show up!"

The Sujanese made haste to follow the young American's example as the latter sent his horse bounding towards the thickets, and next moment the two men were striking off along a trail that was flanked by masses of brushwood, Rex careering in their wake on the end of the crude bridle that Pasha was holding.

Rinty brought up the rear, his tail whisking from side to side as if he had enjoyed the discomfiture of Anderson, and before long there was no sign of the fugitives, the drumming of hoofs being the only indication of the route that they were taking.

It was a sound that gradually died away, and, when Anderson recovered consciousness some time later to find his bronc standing over him with lowered head, the deep quiet of the range was disturbed only by the chirping of birds in the thickets nearby.

Slowly the gangster picked himself up, helping himself to rise by pulling on the drooping reins of his horse, and he was swaying dazedly on his feet when a hail reached his ears.

The cry was uttered by Jones, and, turning his head, Anderson saw that worthy bearing down on him in company with Martin and Wheeler.

The newcomers reached the spot where Anderson had been unhorsed, and Jones leapt to the ground. Martin, on the other hand, remained in the saddle, and Anderson noticed vaguely that he was covering Wheeler, who looked sullen and disconsolate.

"What happened to you, Anderson?" Jones barked.

"That hombre Bradley—he beat me up. I—I—"

"I can see he beat you up all right," Jones cut in, regarding his bruised face without sympathy. "You fool, what did you let him an' Pasha get away for? The god horse wasn't up at the mine.

We only found Wheeler there, and—"

He in turn was interrupted by Anderson.

"I know the god horse wasn't up at the mine," he panted. "He was right here all the time. The white stallion—that was Rex—painted! I spotted it soon after you left, but Bradley laid me out."

Jones and Martin stared at him incredulously.

"The white stallion?" the former echoed. "Rex—painted? What the heck are you talkin' about?"

"He's right," Wheeler volunteered. "Pasha and me, we thought of that trick—figured we could get the animal to the coast in spite of you if we disguised his coat, figured you'd never take him for Rex even if we happened to run foul of you. Then Bradley showed up, and Pasha gave me the air—decided to throw in with that cursed meddler."

Jones had turned towards him, and he still seemed dumbfounded by the disclosure of the ruse that had been practised. Then at last he found his voice.

"Do you know what Bradley an' Pasha planned to do with the god horse?" he demanded.

"Yeah, they were gonna take him to the Bruce Academy, where Bradley aims to hold him until he's checked up on Pasha. Then, if Bradley feels satisfied that Pasha's on the level, he'll arrange for the transport of the stallion."

Jones pursed his lips, and then glanced sardoniously once more at Anderson, who was in the act of retrieving the six-gun that Frank had knocked from his hand.

"How long is it since Bradley and Pasha got away from you?" he asked in a curt tone.

"I don't know," Anderson mumbled. "But it wasn't long after you left me."

Jones gave vent to an oath.

"And we were away the best part of half an hour," he grated. "We ain't got a chance of catchin' up with them now before they reach the academy."

"You're right, Jones," Martin agreed dismally. "Only thing we can

With a fierce cry Pasha threw himself upon the man and gripped him by the throat.

do is to ride over to Injun Gap and report to the boss."

Jones nodded, and then looked at Wheeler.

"Yeah, and you're comin' with us," he muttered. "I reckon Crawford might like to show you how much he appreciates the trouble you've given us."

There was a menacing quality in the words that sent a tremor of dread through Wheeler, but with Martin's revolver trained on him resistance or flight was alike impossible, and, glooming over the prospect that was ahead of him, he accompanied the other three men as they set out for the hide-away where Crawford had installed himself.

For two hours they rode, Jones and Anderson in advance, Martin keeping a close watch on Wheeler, and at the end of that time they sighted a remote cabin nestled in the heart of the hills. And here a halt was called, captive and captors dismounting and walking up to the door of the shack.

Wheeler was thrust roughly across the threshold to find himself in the presence of Crawford, who looked at him through narrowed lids and then directed a glance at the men who entered behind him.

"What's this?" the rancher demanded of his hirelings. "What's the idea of bringing Wheeler here?"

"Just a little present for you, boss," said Jones. "You see, in spite of that last warning you gave him, he's been tryin' to cross us up again—and it's partly his fault that we were fooled by some white paint."

Crawford was clearly perplexed by this speech, and he drew down his brows in an impatient scowl.

"Quit talking in conundrums!" he snapped. "What's on your mind, Jones? And what happened to Anderson? He looks like he's run into trouble."

"He did," Jones commented, and then launched into a detailed account of all that had taken place.

Crawford heard him out in silence, but the changing expressions on his countenance betrayed his feelings more eloquently than words could have done, and when the full facts had been made plain to him he took a step closer to Wheeler.

"So you and your friend Pasha have split, eh?" he said. "He's turned you down in favour of Bradley, eh? Well, that doesn't make me like you any better, Wheeler. You're still poison to me."

His hand moved significantly to his hip.

"Yeah, 'poison' is the term I used," he murmured, "and, seeing I've got one man's death to my credit, I'm tempted to make an end of you as well."

"One man's death?" Wheeler faltered. "What do you mean, Crawford?"

"Oh, you don't know about Mitchell, huh? Well, he got kind of hard to handle, and I had to rub him out. But he didn't cause me half as much trouble as you've done—"

"Crawford, don't shoot!" Wheeler cried out in terror. "No, no, don't shoot! Listen, I know I've crossed you up—but only because I was sore. We used to be on the same side o' the fence, Crawford, and I'll tie up with you again if you'll let me. I'll help you get that god horse, boss—honest I will. I'll do anything you say!"

The rancher eyed him steadfastly for a space, and then to Wheeler's unutterable relief his hand left the region of his hip.

"I wonder?" Crawford mused. "You might be useful, Wheeler."

"But don't run away with the idea that I'm trusting you," he added quickly.

December 26th, 1936.

"Don't even be too sure that I've changed my mind about bumpin' you off. I'm postponing sentence, as they say in a court of law—that's all."

Wheeler mopped his brow, and Crawford turned to Martin and Anderson.

"You two will stay here with Wheeler and me," he said, "and it will be your job to keep this bird under observation."

Anderson and Martin nodded grimly, and their employer glanced at Jones.

"I've got another job for you," he stated. "I want you to go back to the ranch. As you know, Foster and McDonald and Watt Mason are there, selling out the stock for me. I want you to tell 'em to get over to the Bruce Academy, taking the car and trailer with them."

"You mean—"

"I mean that it's up to them now to grab that black stallion for me," Crawford jerked. "They'll have to figure out a way themselves. But there's one thing in their favour. None of them is known around the academy, and, with the car and trailer hidden somewhere handy, they can show up at the Bruce outfit without raising any suspicions."

The Pool of Death

TWO men stood waiting on the road that led to the Bruce Academy, two men who were loitering beside an open car to which a cumbersome horse-box was attached.

The men in question were Foster and Watt Mason, and they had been keeping vigil there for some little time. But they had not much longer to wait, for presently they espied a familiar figure trudging towards them.

It was the figure of McDonald, and as he came up to them they glanced at him inquiringly.

"Well?" Foster asked him. "What did you find out?"

"Plenty," was the reply. "I drifted into the academy like we arranged, and pretended to be interested in takin' up polo. Jensen, the stable-hand, showed me around, and I actually got a squint at the god horse."

"Yeah?" breathed Mason.

McDonald nodded briskly.

"Jones told us he'd been painted, but they've groomed the stuff off him. There was a dark-skinned guy in the stall with him, and he turned out to be the hombre they call Pasha. Jensen talked to him a while, and from their conversation it seems that Bradley is satisfied Pasha is on the level, and drove into San Francisco this mornin' to fix up arrangements for transportin' the Sujanese and the god horse back home."

"He did?" exclaimed Foster. "And has he returned to the academy yet?"

"No, but he's expected to show up within the hour, and that means we've got to act fast. It's a cinch, fellers, I've been figurin' it out on the way from the academy. You drive up with the car and trailer and say you represent the Acme Shipping Corporation. Tell Pasha that you've come for him and Rex and will drive 'em to the docks, where Mr. Bradley will be waitin'."

The faces of Mason and Foster registered their approval of this scheme.

"The Acme Shipping Corporation, eh?" Foster murmured.

"Yeah, don't forget that name," said McDonald. "That's the company that Bradley was gonna call on, accordin' to Jensen. Now listen, I won't be with you, because it would look mighty queer if I was to show up in tow with you. But I'll be waitin' right here, and you can pick me up—and when you do, we'll ditch Pasha and head for Indian Gap."

"We get you, Mac," declared Foster, and then, climbing into the car with Watt Mason, he started up the motor and proceeded to drive along the road in the direction of the Bruce Riding School.

Five minutes later they turned a bend in the trail and saw the academy ahead of them, and before long the automobile and the horse-box which was attached to it were swinging through the main entrance of the establishment.

Foster drew up in a yard that was flanked by stables, and he and Mason alighted from their tourer. Then, glancing about them, they perceived two men standing outside one of the stalls, one being an individual in breeches, garters and open-necked shirt, the other a swarthy fellow in a suit of white duck and a turban.

They were Jensen and Pasha, and, exchanging a significant look, Crawford's hirelings walked across to them.

"We're from the Acme Shipping Corporation," announced Foster, as he and Mason halted in front of the stable-hand and the native of Sujan.

Jensen started, and laid a hand on Pasha's sleeve.

"The Acme Shippin' Corporation!" he ejaculated. "Say, these fellers must have been sent by Mr. Bradley."

"That's right," Foster interposed. "A Mr. Bradley called at the company's offices in San Francisco, and on his instructions the transport manager sent us to collect a stallion that's to be shipped to Sujan. We've also gotta see somebody by the name of Pasha."

Jensen indicated his companion.

"This is Pasha," he stated, and at that the native moved forward a step.

"But I don't understand," he said. "I thought Mr. Bradley was to come back here."

Watt Mason made haste to trump up an explanation.

"Yeah, I believe that was the idea," he informed the Sujanese. "But Mr. Bradley changed his mind. He figured he'd like to see you and the horse safely on board ship at the docks, so he's gonna wait there for you. We'll have to hurry if we're to get there on time, though. It's a long road, and the ship won't wait."

Thoroughly satisfied now that this arrangement was of Frank's choosing, Pasha opened the door of the stall in which Rex had been lodged, and without any difficulty he led the creature forth and walked him across to the car and trailer, Mason and Foster hurrying ahead to let down the tail-door of the horse-box.

The stallion was coaxed into the vehicle, and the tail-door was quickly fastened. Then, accompanied by Pasha, Crawford's two hirelings made their way round to the automobile.

Foster took up a position behind the steering-wheel, and motioned Pasha into the seat beside him while Mason climbed into the back of the car. In the meantime Jensen had summoned Dorothy Bruce, and the girl and the stable-hand approached to bid the Sujanese "good bye" and "bon voyage."

Foster and Mason concealed their impatience as best they could while these farewells were in progress. Actually they were feverishly anxious to be on their way, and were wishing that they could have left Pasha with instructions to travel to San Francisco by rail and thus be quit of him. But they had guessed that the islander would never consent to be separated from the god horse.

At last, however, Pasha was ready for the road.

"To you," he said to Dorothy in parting, "I offer you my deep gratitude for making my brief stay here so pleasant, and I beg of you to convey my thanks to your father. He has been most kind, and I should have liked to tell him so myself—only I know that he has been called away on business, and unfortunately I cannot await his return."

"He'll understand, Pasha," Dorothy rejoined. "Your mission here is fulfilled, and your native land recalls you. Good-bye, and good luck!"

With Pasha saluting the girl and Jensen gravely, Foster engaged the gear-lever thankfully enough, and a few seconds later the car and the trailer were turning out on to the road.

From the yard of the academy, Dorothy Bruce and the stable-hand watched the car and the horse-box roll off along the highway, and they were still watching the two vehicles when suddenly they swerved off the main San Francisco road and disappeared down a right-hand fork—to take the route on which McDonald was waiting.

"Hallo," Dorothy ejaculated, "why have they gone that way?"

"Maybe it's a short cut to town," Jensen remarked, but the girl knitted her brows.

"It's one I don't know, then," she began, only to stop short as a smart-looking roadster swung into view round a curve in the main highway.

It was a car that was coming from the direction of San Francisco, and Frank Bradley was at the wheel of it with Rinty perched on the seat beside him, and in less than thirty seconds the wealthy young sportsman was pulling up beside the bewildered Dorothy and her father's employe.

"Hallo, there!" Frank greeted them cheerfully. "Guess I got back in record time. But where's Pasha? Everything's fixed, and he and Rex are sailing to-morrow—"

Dorothy found her voice, and, stumbling close to the roadster, she clutched her admirer by the arm.

"Frank," she gasped, "Pasha's gone! Two men called here with a car and a trailer. They said they'd been sent on your instructions. Pasha left with them—and Rex!"

"Pasha—left with them!" Frank's countenance had paled, and there was a look of concern in his eyes. "Dorothy, I didn't send anyone here. It's a trick—a trick! Which way did these men go?"

The girl pointed shakily along the road by which he had approached.

"That way! But they switched off down the right fork just before you showed up. You can overtake them before they get very far. The trailer will hold up their speed."

Frank waited to hear no more. Nor did he give Dorothy and Jensen the chance to scramble into his roadster. With engine roaring he swung hard round and blazed in the direction that Crawford's men had taken, and he was already in top gear when he skidded on to the trail that branched away to the right.

Crouching behind the steering-column, he thrust his foot hard down on the accelerator and forced the speedometer up to the seventy mark, and he had been driving for no more than a couple of minutes when he saw a haze of dust ahead of him.

It was rising from the tyres of a car and trailer, and soon Frank was careering abreast to see the unsuspecting Pasha in the company of Foster and Watt Mason, both of whom were strangers to the young polo player, though he had no doubt that they were agents of Crawford.

"Pasha," he shouted, braking to the speed of the touring car, "those men are crooks!"

The Sujanese had turned his head and a look of astonishment had appeared on his swarthy features at sight of Frank. But at the latter's warning yell his astonishment changed to alarm, and with a hoarse cry he made a dive for the tourer's hand-brake.

Foster struck him across the face to prevent him from interfering with the controls, and at the same time Mason lunged forward from the back seat and clutched the hapless foreigner around the neck. Then the gangster in the driving-seat attempted to outstrip Frank Bradley's automobile by opening the throttle full out.

He did not succeed, for Frank had him beaten in acceleration, and, drawing into the lead almost immediately, steered across Foster's path to carry out the desperate plan of forcing the scoundrel off the road.

Foster had to wrench hard on the wheel to avoid a collision with the big two-scater, and, if he had been a more competent motorist, he might have pulled up on the range-grass alongside the trail. But he lost control, and in missing Frank's car he crashed into a telegraph pole with an impact that brought disaster.

The pole snapped and came hurtling down amid a tangle of broken wires. The tourer lurched wildly and overturned on the roadside, spilling out its occupants, and almost simultaneously the horse-box that contained Rex broke from its fastenings and went bowling across the rough ground on the right until it came to a standstill some little distance away.

Meanwhile Frank had brought his own car to a halt, and, Rinty leaping out after him, he dashed back to the wrecked tourer.

He had not anticipated such an eventuality when he had tried to force the crooks off the road, and anxiety was written on his face as he bent down beside Pasha, who was lying motionless. Then he became aware that Foster and Mason were picking themselves up, and he was just in time to defend himself against the sudden rush that they made at him.

Foster he checked with a hard jolt to the chin, and, staggering away, the man was attacked by Rinty before he could recover from the blow. But Mason closed with Frank, and was battling savagely with him when the sound of hurrying footsteps heralded the arrival of McDonald, who had been waiting down the road and who had witnessed the smash.

McDonald rushed to Mason's aid, and in another moment Frank was tripped and borne to the ground. But he carried his antagonists with him, and as they rolled in the dust the three struggling combatants realised dimly that the fumes of petrol were gathering in their nostrils.

It was petrol that was pouring out of the wrecked tourer's fuel tank by the gallon, for the filler-cap of that tank had sprung from its nozzle at the instant of the impact. But Frank and his foes were ignorant of the fact that the petrol would soon endanger their lives. They did not know that it was spreading slowly but surely towards a couple of broken telegraph wires, which had made contact on the road and which were spluttering in fierce electrical fire.

Frank and his enemies fought on, little dreaming that in the space of a few seconds they would be wiped out by a shattering explosion!

(To be continued in another long episode next week. By permission of Associated British Film Distributors, Ltd., starring Kane Richmond, Norma Taylor, and Rex and Rinty.)

"THE DEVIL takes the COUNT"

(Continued from page 10)

things, and just to remind you how important it is to go straight I'm going to put you both on probation for six months." The judge smiled at them as a friend. "And I want that to mean simply this, and only this: You're to come to the probation officer once a month and say to him: 'I'm doing great, and I'm never going to get into trouble again.' You understand?"

The two boys nodded.

The judge then dismissed the elder folks as he wished to have a private talk with the three boys. He told them that the Devil was always lurking around corners looking for foolish boys.

"The Devil is a weak sister," the judge concluded. "That surprises you. You see the Devil was an angel once, and an angel has to be tough to do his job. And the Devil couldn't be tough enough so they threw him out—and he's been hiding down here ever since. Always looking for weaklings and cissys. You boys must be tough, so the Devil hasn't got a chance. Keep to the strict letter of the law and you have him beaten. That's all, lads." He held out his hand. "Good luck to you!"

But though the judge was smiling, he was not quite happy about the expressions on the faces of Buck and Gig. The big boys were sore at being tricked by the smaller lad, but he didn't know how sore.

It was not till the next day that Buck and Gig managed to get Claude alone, and their faces were fierce.

"So you wanna be a Raffles!" sneered Buck. "Now, listen—get this into your dome, Dope. From now on you're out of the gang, see? We don't even know you're dead. You can go play by yourself. And if you come snooping round us we'll black both your eyes—"

"And break all your ribs," added Gig. "Get going, Mister Cissy Raffles."

The Fateful Friday

Buck and Gig were not pleased with life. The more they thought over the whole affair, the more discontented they became. They were the big noises at the school, and they had been made to look like a couple of suckers by a kid, but they couldn't punch Claude's head because it was his toys that had bought that tombstone. Everyone seemed to stare at them and ask what it felt like snooping into an empty house. Buck's parents were constantly reminding the boy of his folly, whilst Gig had a big grudge—his mother was thinking of marrying Paul Krumpp. The boys were due to report on the last Saturday of the month, and on the Friday evening there was a meeting of the gang.

"We ain't gonna report," Gig told the gang. "We're getting outa here. No guy is gonna hang around my hoise and call me 'his boy.' We're quitting to-night after supper."

"Where are you going?" asked Six Toes.

"Out west, first," decided Buck. "Maybe we'll get across the border into Canada."

It was from Six Toes that Claude learned that Buck and Gig were planning to run away that night. Gig had told Six Toes that he would pay a final visit to the cemetery where his father was buried, and, after that, shake the dust of the city from his feet for ever.

December 26th, 1936.

A little difficult, as it had been raining for days and looked like continuing. Claude went home very thoughtfully. He sneezed several times, and once had a sharp fit of coughing.

Claude arrived home to find that Rose Hawley had called. She had settled up with the pawnbroker and brought back all his toys. The boy thanked her politely for her kindness, but he seemed distraught and preoccupied. Jay Pierce could not understand his son showing such little appreciation, but he thought he had found out the reason when Claude sneezed violently.

Protesting violently, Claude was packed off to bed, while Jay Pierce showed Rose some of his work and told her that he had found someone eager to buy his lithographs.

"I intend to get Claude a bicycle out of these ill-gotten gains," laughingly he told Rose Hawley. "He thinks you're a grand person."

"I like him very much, too."

Jay frowned thoughtfully.

"I hope he can re-establish himself with Gig and Buck."

"Aren't you worried about him mixing with those two little demons?"

"I'm selfish about that friendship," he told her. "I think both those two demons are genuine lads. That trio can give a lot to each other. Claude should be in bed by now; let's go and have a word with him."

"Dad"—Claude sat up as soon as his father and Miss Hawley entered his bedroom—"what would happen if the boys didn't report to the probation officers?"

"Why, they'd find 'em and make 'em report," answered his father. "Now, you keep those covers over you." He laid a hand on the boy's forehead. "You look a bit feverish to me. Your mother would raise the deuce with me if she thought I wasn't keeping you fit."

"Dad, do I have to go back with mother?"

"Of course, son—at the end of six months."

"Why can't I stay here with you?"

The father solemnly shook his head.

"Because your mother loves you and wants you with her the same as I do. You love your mother, don't you?"

"Oh, yes," came the answer at once.

"But we're always in Europe or on boats—I never get a chance to know boys like Buck and Gig and Six Toes. Dad, what would happen if they ran away?"

"Who?"

"Buck and Gig."

Rose looked at Pierce senior.

"Say, you know I wouldn't put it past them," she whispered.

"Son, what's all this about?" the father asked sharply.

"Oh, nothing—nothing." Claude lay back. "I was just wondering what would happen if they did."

"The judge told them—the reform school. Probably for two years at least," said Jay Pierce. "Have you had your supper?" The girl shook her head and smiled invitingly.

Claude saw her smile.

"Dad," he called out, "why don't you and Miss Hawley go round to that restaurant we like? I'm all right here."

"That's a jolly good idea," Jay Pierce turned eagerly to the girl. "Shall we?" The answer was in her smiling eyes.

So Rose prepared some broth for Claude to have whilst they were gone, and they expected him to be sound asleep when they returned. Claude sipped a little of the broth and listened impatiently to the two grown-ups talking in the next room. Then came a cheery shout to sleep tight and the door closed behind them. Claude waited till their footsteps died away, and then he wriggled out of bed.

December 26th, 1936.

Strange Men

THE rain was descending in torrents. Two figures stood looking down at a grave. Stuck in a bottle were a few flowers.

"Gee, it's kinda little, ain't it?" "It's bigger than some of 'em," argued Buck.

They turned because they thought they had heard someone sneeze, and then forgot it in their interest in the tombstone.

"R.I.P.," Gig pointed. "I wonder what that means?"

"That means 'Rest in Peace,'" said a faint, lmsky voice.

They glowered at the intruder as if he were some evil spirit.

"Listen, Gig and Buck," cried Claude huskily. "I know what you're going to do, but truly, fellows, you musn't run away. They'll find you wherever you go, and they'll put you in a reform school."

"Let's get outa here," cried Gig. They pushed past him and made for the cemetery gates, but he stumbled after them. They heard him and swung round with fists clenched.

"Listen, I don't blame you for being angry with me." His voice was very hoarse. "But you can't solve your problems by running away; you've got to face them."

"Go on and beat it," Gig gave Claude a violent push. The smaller boy lost his balance and went sprawling into a muddy pool. They turned their backs on him and hastened away.

With an effort Claude staggered to his feet and ran after them. They had reached a main road that bordered a huge park before he caught them up.

"Listen, Buck and Gig, if you run away, people will think it's because you are afraid, and you aren't afraid, are you?"

"Dry up, will you?" Gig snarled.

A car whizzed past and Buck made a gesture which is known as "thumbing a lift," but the car did not stop. Gig began to thumb cars, and so did Claude. Many passed, but at last the headlights of a large car picked them out. Buck shouted that the driver was slowing.

It was a big car. Claude saw there was a thick-set man at the wheel. A door opened, and he saw that a dark, swarthy, smiling man was grinning at them, whilst an elderly woman was in the far corner.

"Come on, you kids, hurry up! Here, you get in front." He jabbed a finger at Buck. "You two in with me. Hurry!"

Claude found himself next to the woman, whom he saw wore a bonnet and had white hair. Somehow she reminded him of the wolf who dressed up to snare Little Red Riding Hood.

"Thank you, ma'am," Claude murmured.

The old hag grinned and mumbled something.

"Where you kids going?" asked the big man, who was driving, to Buck Murphy.

"Taking a little trip." Buck gazed quickly at this big man. He did not like his huge grin very much, nor the smile of the sleek, foreign-looking man.

This seemed to amuse the man, for he turned and shouted to the sleek foreigner who had invited the boys in the car:

"We're only too glad to give these three kids a lift, ain't we, Willie?"

"Sure," came the answer. "Especially on a night like this, Joe."

"He ain't with us, though," Gig pointed at Claude.

"That's right," added Buck. "We can get along without him—that is, if you're crowded."

"The more the merrier," laughed Willie. "We'll take you kids where you like, and— Hey, look out!"

Out of the darkness came flashes of light. To his surprise, Claude found arms round him, and next moment he was in the old hag's lap, with his head pressed against her shoulder. He thought it curious that the old lady's breath smelt strongly of alcohol—also he had heard of the "bearded lady."

"Now, you kids, keep your faces shut!" Joe snarled at Buck and then glared at Gig. "You grin and look cheerful, or else— You understand?"

"We don't want to get blamed for you kids running away," Willie said with a smile. "Leave this to me, boys."

The car began to slow and then the headlights picked out two policemen. When the car stopped they came alongside.

"You didn't happen to see anything of four fellows turning up this way in a green roadster, did you?" asked one officer.

"No; everything's been passing us pretty fast," softly answered Willie. "We've been travelling slow, as maw"—he indicated the old lady—"makes us drive very carefully when she has the kids with her."

The police waved the car on its way. Claude was pushed somewhat roughly back on to the seat.

"What did those officers stop us for?" he asked politely.

"Maybe they were looking for somebody," casually answered Willie. "Joe."

"Yeah, what is it?" answered the driver.

"We're going to get something to eat," Willie ordered, and grinned at Gig and Claude. "You want something to eat, don't you?"

"I dunno," mumbled Gig, who sensed that there was something wrong about these men and this car ride.

"We'll see you through—they'll never find you," chuckled Willie. "You kids stick with us—we'll get along nice together."

Some half-hour later the car slowed. "There's a joint right ahead!" sang out the driver.

Claude Bluffs the Crooks

THE three boys did not quite like the way the men led them into the small roadside eating-house by the arms. It was almost as if they were prisoners. These men were mighty like the sort of toughs Gig's father had been up against. Buck and Gig were not sure what to make of them; Claude, being wiser, had formed his opinions.

The place was quite deserted, but in a moment a smiling foreigner appeared. "Good-evening, madame. Good-evening, gentlemen."

"We're in a hurry," growled out Willie. "We want some food, quick."

"Yeah, one big plate all around of good, old-fashioned, Italian spaghetti," shouted Joe.

"Pardon," said the proprietor. "I am not an Italian—I am French."

"I don't care what you are." Joe banged the counter. "We want some spaghetti."

"But, m'sieu', we have no Italian spaghetti; but we have French flapjacks."

"Six flapjacks, and jump to it!" he ordered.

"But I want—" began Joe.

"Pipe down," coldly spoke the leader, and looked closely at the proprietor. "You all alone in this dump?"

"Sure, I'm alone," answered the proprietor. "My wife she sleep upstairs."

Willie nodded, and then his queer, rather malevolent gaze took note of Claude and noted the difference.

"What's your name, kid?"

"Claude—Claude Pierce." The boy sneezed. "Guess I've got a cold."

"Claude Pierce, eh. Your family got any money, Claude?"

"Oh, no, sir. My father's quite poor."

"Aw, go on! My old lady says your old lady's got over a million bucks," said young Murphy, and somehow wished he had not spoken when he saw the avid gleam in Willie's eyes.

"Then what brings you out here to-night?" asked Willie in silky tones.

"Does your ma know?"

"My father and mother live apart," Claude explained. "I wish that man would hurry; I am hungry."

Willie smiled broadly.

The proprietor appeared with six steaming French flapjacks, and everyone drew their stools closer to the counter. Willie touched Claude on the arm.

"You like to come, kid?"

"I think I'd like to go very much," Claude turned to the proprietor. "May I have a different kind of sauce on this?"

The proprietor did not understand what sort of sauce Claude required, and explained that at times his English was not very good, as he had not been very long in the country.

"N'avez pas peur, mais eoutez bien. Ces hommes sont des vauriens," Claude said, and smiled as he pointed at his flapjack. "Ils essaient de nous enlever. Appelez du secours si vous pouvez?"

"What's he saying to you?" Willie demanded of the proprietor.

"It's the sauce," the proprietor cried. "I do not quite understand."

"My French is a bit rusty, I imagine." Claude gave a little smile. "It's a special kind of meat sauce I require. Appelez quelqu'un. Je vous prie de me croire. Nous sommes en danger. Dans une sauce mauvaise. Can you understand that?"

"Mais oui, Je comprends maintenant," replied the proprietor. "I will go look, see what I have."

"Kid," drawled Willie, his eyes narrowing, "don't talk any more of that French around me; it ain't polite. Understand?"

"Certainly not, if you don't wish me to," Claude agreed.

It was then that Buck noticed that the old lady was wearing a wig, and he nudged Gig. The latter's eyes opened wide. Buck began to wish he had said nothing about Claude's mother being rich.

"Guess we should be on the move," muttered Willie. "Say, that danged froggy never brought your sauce." His eyes became hard, and in a flash he was round the counter and out into the small kitchen. He was back in the outer room in a second. "He's gone and—"

He got no further, because clearly there sounded the siren of a police car.

The crooks darted to the door, and after that all was confusion. A shot rang out and Joe crashed full length on the floor, and as the crooks fired blindly into the night a murderous fire was trained on them. The old lady dropped with a scream of pain, and off rolled her wig. With a snarl Willie turned to shoot the kid he knew had tricked them, but those three boys had dived behind the counter and had crawled through the kitchen to the back door.

They climbed an embankment and were only just across when a train roared past.

"Gee, that was a near squeeze," gasped Buck. "I wonder how the cops knew they were there."

"I told the proprietor they were crooks and trying to kidnap us," was Claude's simple explanation. "We were in danger and he was to call for help. I wasn't ordering a sauce, I was warning the man." He sneezed. "Luckily he—" Violent coughing and sneezing stopped Claude, but at last he spluttered out: "Understood and fetched the police."

"We'd better get away from here before they start looking for us," hinted Gig. "What we gonna do, Buck?"

"Guess we'd better go home," was the answer. "Guess maybe there was something in what the Dope said about running away."

After walking some distance they found that Claude was lagging behind and swaying dizzily. Claude collapsed in a heap and lay still.

They took it in turns to carry Claude, and in the small hours of the morning they came in sight of a tiny village. The sun rose as if in mockery of their sorry plight. A sleepy labourer pointed out the house of the doctor.

The doctor appeared and took one look at the limp form in Buck's arms.

"Bring him inside at once," he cried. "Your friend looks pretty bad."

An hour later Claude was in hospital. It was pneumonia, but his life was not in serious danger.

That Saturday Buck and Gig went and reported to the probation officer, and they saw the judge, and told him all about Claude's bravery and what he had done for them.

A Tough Fight

MRS. PIERCE heard about her son being in hospital, and came rushing down with her lawyer. Her son must not stay in a nasty cheap hospital; he must have specialists and every attention. She was told to go away as

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"THE DEVIL TAKES THE COUNT."—Claude Pierce, Freddie Bartholomew; Buck Murphy, Jackie Cooper; Gig Stevens, Mickey Rooney; Jay Pierce, Ian Hunter; Rose Hawley, Peggy Conklin; Hilda Pierce, Katharine Alexander; Mr. Murphy, Gene Lockhart; Mrs. Murphy, Kathleen Lockhart; Mrs. Stevens, Dorothy Peterson; Judge Holmes, Jonathan Hale; Principal, Etienne Girardot; "Bugs", Sherwood Bailey; "Six Toes", Buster Slavin; Paul Krump, Grant Mitchell; Willie, Harold Huber; Joe, Stanley Fields; "Grandma", Frank Puglia.

"YELLOWSTONE."—Dick Sherwood, Henry Hunter; Ruth Foster, Judith Barrett; James Foster, Ralph Morgan; Hardigan, Alan Hale; Marty Ryan, Monroe Owsley; Professor Ross, Rollo Lloyd.

"PRISON SHADOWS."—Gene Harris, Eddie Nugent; Claire Thomas, Lucille Lund; Mary Grant, Joan Barclay; George Miller, Forrest Taylor; Dave Morgan, Syd Saylor; Bert McNamee, Monte Blue.

Claude was having every care that was possible. She turned on Jay and raved at him for not looking after her boy.

"It might be very serious if he's moved," Jay told her.

Hilda Pierce rushed out of the ward, but she returned a few minutes later. She was accompanied by her lawyer and her chauffeur. The lawyer managed to get the nurse out of the private ward on some pretext, and that enabled Hilda Pierce to get into the room without being seen.

The poor, foolish woman nearly fainted when she got the unconscious form of her son to the expensive private hospital. The specialist told her that what she had done was almost equal to murder.

But Jay Pierce did not upbraid her when he came to the hospital with Rose and the two boys. The latter offered their blood for a transfusion if it were needed. Late that evening Claude seemed to grow weaker, and the doctor said the patient seemed to have something on his mind—he kept on muttering about Buck and Gig. The doctor said if they could relieve Claude of some worry there might be a chance.

"H'ya, Dope?" Buck whispered, as he and Gig stood beside the sick-bed. "What'll we say, Mr. Pierce?" He appealed to the father.

"Something he'd like," was the answer. "Talk loudly, so he can hear."

"H'ya, Dope?" shouted Buck. "We think you're swell."

Weary eyes opened and Claude stared solemnly at them. They could see the difficulty he had in breathing.

"We reported to the probation officer," shouted Gig. "He's a great guy."

"The judge is coming to see you," Buck took up the tale. "They've closed up Shivvies' tyre shop—you should have heard him holler. The fellows at the hide-out were asking about you."

"Yeah, Bugs and Six Toes," cried Gig. "They're coming up to see you some time. We're going to have a lot of fun from now on, me and you and Buck."

A happy smile appeared on Claude's face and he was smiling as he sank into a curing slumber.

"He heard us, Mister Pierce," cried Buck. Neither of the boys knew that tears were streaming down their cheeks.

Some weeks later Buck and Gig stood before a smiling judge, who shook both heads by the hand.

"I've struck you boys off probation," he told them. "You don't have to report any more. And I don't want to hear from you again until you're pitching for the Giants or running for Congress. Give my respects to young Claude."

Down below three people were waiting for them—Rose Hawley, Jay Pierce and young Claude. There were five bicycles. They were off for a picnic in the country. Jay Pierce had bought the bicycles with part of the reward for the capture of Willie and his gang of crooks.

How happy Claude was that sunny afternoon as he pedalled down the street in between his two cronies, Buck Murphy and Gig Stevens. Behind pedalled Jay Pierce and Rose Hawley. They were happy because Hilda had renounced all claim to Claude and had gone to Reno to get a divorce. No wonder that little party of five were happy that day. The Devil certainly had taken the count.

(By permission of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Film Co., Ltd., starring Freddie Bartholomew as Claude, Jackie Cooper as Buck, and Mickey Rooney as Gig.)

December 26th, 1936.

"YELLOWSTONE"

(Continued from page 14)

atmosphere that was Arctic in its character.

Then, shivering in the icy cold, he saw Ryan in the depths of the cavern, bent over mailbags that had been frozen in the course of the years.

Already Marty Ryan had succeeded in opening one of them, to reveal the coin and notes with which it was stuffed, and now he was in the act of forcing a second bag to disgorge its contents. But ere he could break the fastenings, Professor Ross drew a gun from a holster under his armpit, and next instant he was addressing the young man coolly.

"So it was you who killed Jim Anderson, eh?"

Ryan spun round with a startled cry and gaped at Ross in astonishment, confounded by the presence of this old fellow who had been wont to bore him with long-winded discourses on botany, but who looked anything but a mild and eccentric student of plant-life now.

"Thanks for finding the loot for me, anyway, Jenkins," the professor continued. "Yep, I know your right name. I've known it all along, and I've been watching you, for I guessed that you'd save me the trouble of dealing with Anderson."

"Who—who are you?" Ryan stammered.

With his free hand Ross clutched at his shock of raven hair and plucked it off to reveal a domed head which was completely devoid of any natural thatch.

"Bald Jack's the name," he said softly. "The only living member of the gang that filched those mailbags. And you can take it from me, Ryan-Jenkins, that I don't intend to split the dough with you. Nor am I going to give you the chance of rubbing me out like you did Anderson."

"I didn't kill Anderson!" Ryan panted.

"Then where did you go the night of the alfresco concert? I tried to follow you, but lost your trail."

"I only went ridin'," Ryan jerked. "I had no cause to kill Foster, or Anderson, as you call him. I'd made an agreement with him. I'll admit I ransacked his cabin, but that was after I heard he'd been murdered by somebody. I wanted to see if he'd left any clue to the money's whereabouts—and I found that clue, written in a diary that was among his private papers."

Bald Jack's eyes narrowed, and then he lifted the gun that he was grasping.

"Well, you found the money for me, kid," he said, "and this is the payoff!"

He pulled the trigger, and there was a racketing smash that drowned Marty Ryan's anguished death-cry. But even as the younger man thudded to the floor, a dense cloud of fumes surged from a crater near which Bald Jack was standing—fumes that enveloped the killer like some unearthly visitation, and then, dispersing slowly, left him rooted there as if he had been turned to stone.

Rigid-stiff, with Marty Ryan lying some yards from him, Bald Jack Ross was fixed in that attitude when Dick Sherwood and Ruth Foster entered the cavern a few seconds later, and it did not take the Ranger long to guess what had happened.

"Dead!" the young Government employee breathed. "Both dead! Ross plugged Ryan, and then he must have got caught in an eruption of ammonia gas!"

"Ammonia gas!"

"Yes, can't you smell it, Ruth? This cave's full of it, and that's why the place is so darn cold. The fumes come out of these craters that you see all around, and sometimes they gush out with deadly effect. If you get caught in them you're liable to be frozen stiff, and that's what must have happened to Ross—his wet clothes accelerating the effect. I know, for I've been in caves like this before. Ross was frozen to death, Ruth—almost instantaneously!"

At that moment he heard footsteps in the water-logged entrance of the cavern, and with a swift gesture he plucked his Service revolver from its holster. Next second, however, he gave vent to an exclamation of surprise, for the man who stepped into his view was none other than Hardigan.

"You!" Dick said tersely. "How did you get here?"

"By following Miss Foster," the private detective replied. "I wasn't satisfied that she was telling me the truth. I thought she might know something about those missing mailbags that I now see over there."

Dick had lowered his gun and was thrusting it back into its sheath.

"You were wrong, Hardigan," he stated. "Miss Foster knew nothing about the mailbags. She was trailing Ryan and Ross when I fell in with her."

"Yeah, I guessed that eventually," Hardigan remarked, and then, as he glanced at the frozen body of Ross, a startled expression dawned on the detective's countenance.

"Say, I know that face now," he rapped out. "I couldn't place him at the inn. The wig fooled me, I guess. But I know him now. He's Bald Jack, the last of the gang that stole this dough eighteen years ago."

He paused and slid his eyes upon the mailbags, and from them his gaze travelled to Dick and Ruth in a look that was singularly crafty. But the quality of that look was not divined by the girl and the young Ranger until Hardigan spoke what was in his mind.

"Anderson, Ryan and Bald Jack—all dead. And now you are the only ones who stand between me and a hundred thousand dollars."

Dick Sherwood and Ruth Foster became tense, and recoiled as Hardigan levelled the six-gun that was in his fist. "What do you mean?" Dick ground out.

"I mean that the insurance company can go to blazes!" Hardigan said. "They offered me a reward if I could find the loot, but I'm after more than their reward. I'm taking that hundred thousand, and I don't want any witnesses."

Dick was empty-handed, for he had replaced his forty-five in its holster. Helpless, with Ruth cowering at his side, he stared at the treacherous sleuth incredulously.

"I'm sorry," Hardigan went on in grim tones. "You're a couple of nice kids, but nobody's going to squeal on me. Anderson—or Foster if you like—he was different. I—"

A sharp cry broke from Ruth, a cry that was inspired by the detective's reference to her father.

"It was you! It was you who killed him!"

"Yeah," answered Hardigan, "you might as well know it before you go yourself. I trailed your father that night he left the camp, but he spotted me near Old Bess. I had a show-down with him then—tried to make a fifty-fifty deal with him—but he jumped me, and in the fight I shot him dead—"

The sentence was never finished, for at that instant there was a fresh outburst of fumes from the crater which had sealed Bald Jack's doom, and suddenly Hardigan was swallowed by that deadly cloud, vanishing before the eyes of his intended victims as they themselves leaped backwards.

When the dense, gaseous mist evaporated, Dick Sherwood and Ruth Foster knew that they had nothing more to fear from Hardigan. For, like the rogue who had been known as Bald Jack, he was lifeless as a statue, petrified by one of Nature's strangest and most terrible caprices. Hardigan, traitor to his calling, had breathed his last.

It was evening, and by the light of a mellow moon Dick Sherwood and Ruth Foster were riding through the foothills of the Rocky Mountains.

"Dick," Ruth was saying, "you know what my father was, and yet—you want me to marry you."

"Yes," he told her. "It makes no difference to me that your father was on the wrong side of the law, dear. You mean everything to me, and nothing else counts. And what's more, you're going to marry me."

He edged his horse nearer to the pony that was carrying her, and, his arm about her waist, they rode onward through the moonlight.

(A Universal Picture, by permission of General Film Distributors, Ltd., starring Henry Hunter and Judith Barrett.)

TALL STAMPS

Your Height increased in 12 days or no cost. New discovery adds 2.5 ins. I gained 4 ins. Guaranteed sale. Full Course 5/-. Details: J. B. Morley, 8, Bream's Bldgs., London, E.C.4.

300 DIFFERENT, incl. Airmail, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Pictorials, Colonials. Price 6d. (Abroad 1/-) —W. A. WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back. Complete Course, 5/-. Details: L. A. Stebbing, (A), 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2.

ALL applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "BOY'S CINEMA," The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

BOY'S CINEMA

"Get That Girl"

and

"Windbag the Sailor"

Long Complete Film
Thrillers Inside!

No. 893. EVERY TUESDAY January 23rd, 1937.

2^D

START
This Amazing
NEW SERIAL
OF Weird
Thrills in a Lost
Continent
TO-DAY

“UNDERSEA KINGDOM”

An old professor invents a submarine that can withstand tremendous pressure and thus reach the bottom of the deepest ocean. Together with a little band of intrepid adventurers, he sets sail in his invention and they discover the long lost continent of Atlantis. A mighty serial drama of amazing thrills, starring Ray Corrigan and Lois Wilde

EPISODE 1—

"Beneath the Ocean Floor"

Professor Norton is Interviewed

IN Boston, perhaps the most intellectual city in the States, Professor John Norton had been engaged for years on practical inventions in connection with both sea and land. He had just perfected a new type of submarine, driven on the principle of a huge rocket, or series of rockets, which, by continuous explosions through valvular tubes in the stern of the vessel, drove it at tremendous speed on or under water at any depth he wished. He planned to explore the beds of the great oceans, beginning with that one nearest to him—the great Atlantic.

He was also interested in the problem of earthquakes—those most terrible of all catastrophic visitations to which this earth is liable, owing to the intense heat of the everlasting fires raging beneath its crust. His variations of the well-known seismograph, which records the undulations, direction and duration of any earthquake, however remote from the instrument, was a remarkable affair. It was able to anticipate the calamity—and so, whilst unable to prevent it, the professor could issue a warning by which people might make ready to leave the threatened area. That many of them would not profit by such warnings was the most distressing part of the professor's waking life—he knew the earthquake was coming and could not bear to be disbelieved by the poor wretches so shortly to pay the penalty of their laughter at his warnings.

Of late, he had evolved the extraordinary theory that some earthquakes were due to a malign human agency. This theory had provoked even louder laughter. The editor of the "Boston Herald" sent along his star reporter,

Diana Compton, to get a story from this crazy inventor—to furnish a bright and amusing column for the next Sunday's issue.

She was a lively girl, easy to look at, and gifted with quick intelligence and a racy style of reporting. She chose a morning when a whisper came to her that old Norton was going to sail from the harbour in his rocket submarine on a test voyage.

The professor was in his laboratory with his young motherless son Billy. He greeted Diana in his usual excited way.

"Oh, I'm afraid I've no time for an interview! I'm leaving here almost at once."

"I won't keep you, professor. Just a few notes."

"Notes? Oh, well—here's the divining machine." He gestured towards a weird instrument composed of spiral glass tubes and brass rods and what appeared to be small wireless valves. "Any change in the earth's internal fires—I mean, when they are leaping up towards any part of the crust where that crust is thinning, is instantly registered by this variant of the usual seismograph. My machine tells what is likely to happen. Possibly it won't happen—probably it will."

He seated himself at a table in front of the machine, peering up at her bright eyes through his round-rimmed, large pince-nez. "My back is to it, now—my hands are on the table. No trickery. Miss—what's your name, please?"

"Diana Compton."

"Of course! Diana—dear me. I have your card here. Billy, put a chair for Diana—bless me, where is that boy?"

"He went out as I came in," Diana smiled, notebook in hand.

"Gone out?" The professor made a clicking sound under his iron-grey moustache. "Tiresome fellow—rushed off to the naval college, I expect. He's crazy on wrestling—and his especial hero, Lieutenant Crash Corrigan, is giving a display. Well, now, what was I saying?"

"No trickery, professor," Diana prompted.

"Ah, rather not! Just keep your eyes on that instrument behind me. Every ten minutes comes a signal." A sudden fierce crackling sound in the seismograph startled the girl. "There it is again." Blue lights flickered in the glass spirals. "You see—there it is! Every ten minutes, since eight o'clock this morning. Nothing but a human agency could do that. Somebody deliberately helping the fires below the earth, helping forward a disaster."

"But how?" Diana asked. "And why?"

"How and why? That's for us to find out. Some sinister power—perhaps on the earth, perhaps below it. Probably on the ocean bed."

"A gigantic electric whale?"

Norton shook his thinning grey locks. "Not a whale, definitely. Not anything so—so unable to reason. Every ten minutes, to the tick of the clock I take it a bad earthquake is being planned for—let me see—" He turned in his chair to stare at the machine. "Somewhere on the Pacific coast—Seattle or San Francisco? Or maybe in Japan? I'll set the indicator."

He rose up to bend over the machine.

"You can't plan earthquakes, professor," Diana argued.

He answered her:

"I believe that, below the Atlantic lies a huge submerged kingdom, Atlantis, maybe. Well—someone there."

"But Atlantis was drowned thousands of years ago—if ever there was such a continent."

"My dear young lady, there was such a continent. A vast and prosperous land lying between Africa and the Azores. A pagan land. The next earthquake will occur in the West Indies. It will take place to-night, our time. Now, if your editor cared to flash a wireless message to Martinique—"

"They wouldn't believe it," Diana told him.

"Any more than you do," Norton turned a grave face towards her. "I guess you're right. But it's very sad—very dreadful to think that you and I know beforehand of an awful catastrophe and can find no one to take heed."

"Atlantis?" mused Diana, impressed despite herself. "And fish people with intelligence and a kind of civilisation living there?"

"I didn't say fish people," Norton corrected her. "I said Pagans. People without any religion—except that of Might being Right. Well, if you and your editor won't warn them—" He came away from the machine. "You'd like to see my rocket boat?"

"I'd love to."

"Come back at two o'clock. Joe!" he called. "Joe, where are you?"

A rather wild-looking young man appeared from an inner room. He stared at Diana as if about to speak, then contented himself with a vacant grin as he turned to the professor.

"Joe, show this lady some of my inventions. And, afterwards, find my sons. Tell him I want him."

"Gone to fetch Lutenant Crash," Joe told him moodily. "You wanted the lutenant, didn't you?"

"Did I? Oh, yes, of course. Well, good-bye, Miss—er—"

"Diana," she prompted.

"Come back at two sharp, Diana. Good-bye."

Billy Norton and His Hero

YOUNG BILLY NORTON, fourteen and full of mischief, had seized the opportunity of rushing down to the Naval Barracks to see his friend and hero, Lieutenant Crash Corrigan. The sentry on the gates challenged him.

"I've got a message for Lieutenant Corrigan," Billy explained.

"Pass in. He's down at the gymnasium."

At the gym door Billy was again challenged.

"What d'you want, young Norton?"

"Dad told me to tell Crash that he's going out this afternoon in the Rocket."

"The lutenant's busy just now. I'll let him know."

"But I've got to see him myself. It's important."

"Busy. I tell you."

Sounds of heavy breathing and loud bumpings, mingled with bursts of applause, came wafting to Billy's quick ears from within the gym.

"Can't I just peep in?" he coaxed.

"You hop it! Here's the admiral and his party."

Billy went away disconsolately. The admiral and his aides passed him with scarcely a glance. He turned to watch them enter the gym. When all were safely inside and the white-capped sentry had his back to him, Billy made a dash for the rear of the high glass-roofed building and scuttled up the ladder fire escape to one of the gables where he guessed a fanlight might be open.

His guess was good, the morning being very warm. He clambered over the edge of the fanlight and got on to a little window-cleaning platform high up amid the girders. He peered down into the gym and saw that the wrestling mats and a staked ring were fixed in the centre of the wide, decked floor. About the ring were the admiral and some officers, watching a couple of young giants within the staked enclosure solemnly shaking hands with each other.

They were stripped to the waists of their "slips." They wore short socks and canvas shoes. Seen from above, they looked curiously fore-shortened. Their immense shoulders glistened whitely below their dark, cropped heads. Billy crouched down on to the little narrow platform to get a clear view of them.

Somebody blew a whistle. The two broke away and walked warily round each other. Suddenly one of them leapt in and gripped the other in his mighty arms. For a bare second the grip held—then the attacker made a deft movement, got the attacker by the ankles, and, with a jerk, shot him clean over his head, right across the ring. He fell with a bump on the mat, and the other at once pounced on him.

"Get his shoulder down. Crash!" squealed Billy from his perch. "Hold him! Get his shoulder down!"

His voice was drowned in the shouts from the ringside onlookers. All were yelling advice—some to Corrigan and others to his opponent, who had now got Corrigan once again in his mighty embrace. They wrestled with zest—quick tumbles and clever recoveries at every tick of the clock. They knew all the tricks, every feint—they were splendidly matched.

Billy became frantic. "Hold him, Crash! Get his shoulder to it! Oh, boy—hold him! Down him—oh, great work!"

Crash had just pitched the other on to his head with a marvellous body spin in which his opponent had been caught up, and held high above Corrigan's head.

Cheers rang out. Billy, in his tense excitement, overbalanced himself and went over the edge of the planks. He grabbed at the fore-edge of one of them and held on, his fingers clawing

Suddenly one of the wrestlers leapt in and gripped the other in his mighty arms.

frantically for a firm hold. A gasping cry went out of him, and Corrigan, looking upward, saw him. Without a word, Corrigan vaulted out of the ring and, seizing the padded hoop of a trapeze rope, swung himself up to the cross-ties which helped to support the high, glassed roof.

He reached the girders and gripped at one of them with his free hand; got a clutch, let go the hoop of the trapeze and swung himself on to the tie. While those below watched with hated breath, he walked swiftly along the narrow steel edge and reached the hanging boy, who was now almost spent.

"Leggo, Billy—I'll catch you," Corrigan whispered.

And the boy, with complete faith in his friend, let himself fall straight into Corrigan's arms—to be deftly caught and held on that precarious balance.

Those below were dead silent. The other wrestler placed himself quickly below Corrigan to break his fall, if fall he must. But the young giant had nerves of iron and stood on the narrow girder without the slightest fear of disaster. He held the boy like a balancing pole as he dropped astride the girder and reached out a hand for the trapeze rope, which one of them below instantly swung upward towards him. The rope caught, Corrigan swarmed down it with Billy safely held under one of his great arms.

"Well now!" cried Corrigan, putting the dazed and shaken boy on his feet, "what was the big idea?"

"I—I wanted to—to see you, Crash," Billy spluttered. He glanced fearfully towards the staring admiral. "Sorry, sir—I didn't mean to interrupt."

"I guess you didn't," the great man answered grimly. "Who is he, Corrigan?"

"Professor Norton's son, sir. He's a good boy—a great pal of mine."

"Norton's boy, eh?" The admiral's frowns relaxed. "Like father, like son, what?"

Corrigan smiled, his pleasant face lighting up. "They're a good team, sir, both of them."

The admiral signalled to his aides. "Come on, gentlemen—let's get along with the morning's duty. Send the boy home, Corrigan, and tell the professor I'll be obliged if he'll keep his earthquakes under strict control while manoeuvres are on."

Joe Gets Nerves

CORRIGAN went to the Norton house in Bunker Square just before two o'clock. He found the professor at his desk, explaining a new kind of sextant to Diana.

Said Corrigan: "Did Billy give you the message from H.Q.—to keep earthquakes under control, sir?"

Norton stared at him. "He certainly said something of the sort. But I can't do that."

"It was only a joke, sir," Corrigan had to explain. "Are you sailing at two?"

"Three o'clock. The tide will be then at the ebb. Oh, this is Miss Diana Somebody—from the 'Herald.' Diana, meet Lieutenant Crash Corrigan."

The girl glanced at Corrigan, half smiling. But he only bowed. Girls weren't much in his line. His clear-cut features and strong chin, his big square frame, made a lasting impression on Diana. She saw a hero in him, just as Billy did.

That young man entered the laboratory.

"Dad, are you going to take me this afternoon?"

January 23rd, 1937.

"Certainly not," his father checked him. "Perhaps another time, when we know more about the capabilities of the Rocket. We shall be back to-night. This afternoon is merely a test."

"But, dad, you promised—"

"Nothing of the sort. I'm not taking anybody. Merely Joe and the two sailors."

The door of the adjoining room was opened a little way. Joe's wild face appeared.

"How deep you going?" he asked.

"About ten thousand feet."

"The ship won't stand the pressure. Crumple up like a paper bag," Joe stated sulkily.

"Oh, nonsense." The professor waved him away. "Billy, where's that image the diver brought me? Oh, yes, I see." He turned to a shelf, and very carefully lifted down a bronze statuette of a sitting woman. "Look at this, Diana—thousands of years old. A beautiful piece of work, worthy of Phidias, the great Greek sculptor. This was found in comparatively shallow water after the great storm of last month."

"Sure it wasn't bought for you at some comic art show by a practical joker?" Corrigan queried.

"My dear Crash, who nowadays could fashion such a superb thing?" the professor retorted. "Besides, bronze—why it's worth a hundred dollars as metal alone. What is it, Joe?"

The assistant's face had appeared again at the door crack.

"I guess I won't go s'afternoon. You take Salty and Briny."

"They can't drive the engine—you know that. What's the matter with you? We shall take the two sailors, in any case."

"She'll act like a busted balloon. Pricked—squa-hed! She'll go flat into nothing—and us with her."

"Can I drive the submarine?" Corrigan asked. "I understand Diesel engines."

"It isn't a Diesel—it's my own invention," Norton snapped. "Dear me, Joe—how you worry! The Rocket is absolutely safe."

"Then you can take me, dad," Billy burst in. "I'll sit quiet and not ask questions—promise faithful!"

Diana saw that Norton was getting flurried. She tried to smooth things out.

"Let's hear some more about the earthquakes. The machine is starting again."

The seismograph was giving forth faint crackles. The professor's attention was at once directed to it. He put down the statuette and studied the indicator.

"Ah, this is from mid-Atlantic!" he cried. "The Azores area. A disturbance below the ocean—most odd. Almost like a signal." He turned to Corrigan. "You fellows will get news of an earthquake at Madeira at seven o'clock this evening. I placed it in the West Indies first of all, but it will be much farther away."

"I'd like to see the submarine, professor," said Diana.

"Eh? Certainly. You, too, Corrigan? I'll get ready—you two walk down to the docks. Billy—where is that boy?"

Billy had vanished. Joe was heard singing tunelessly to himself in the next room. Norton nodded to his guests.

"See you later."

Corrigan had winked at Diana when the professor had been predicting his earthquake.

"Salty" and "Briny," the two sailors who made up the crew of the Rocket, with Joe as engineer, were engaged in a little back-chat in the main cabin of the submarine. Salty considered that swabbing the floor was not his job.

"Then whose is it?" Briny demanded.

"Not mine."

"It certainly isn't my dooty," said Briny. "I'm first mate."

"And I'm steward. Stewards don't have to swab floors."

Briny flung the mop at his chum. Salty stepped backward and fell over the pail of soapy water. Joe yelled at them both:

"Clear up that mess! Guv'nor's coming aboard!"

The two sailors had brought their cockatoo with them, a scarlet and grey old bird who was always full of noise. It now echoed Joe in an eldritch scream:

"Clear up that mess—the ship's on fire!"

"Shut up!" Joe snapped at it. "Or I'll wring your neck!"

Briny was hurt. "Why, Joe—don't get huffy! Poll's okay—she's like me, she don't ever mean anything. We'll get this done in a minute."

The professor came along the dock with Corrigan and Diana. They descended into the cabin.

"What's all this?" Norton fumed. "Have we sprung a leak?"

Polly, perched on the top bar of a chair, screeched:

"Man the lifeboats—we'll all be drowned!"

Joe went into the engine-room and shut the iron door with a slam. Diana, who had glimpsed his dour face, asked: "Is Joe all right?"

Norton was busy with the two sailors and didn't hear. Corrigan was intensely interested in the many knobs and levers on the switchboard. Diana heard Joe lumping about in the engine-room. Salty and Briny went up the ladder.

The professor shouted after them:

"Close the tower!"

He spoke through a tube to Joe.

"Go ahead—steer carefully through the harbour traffic."

A periscope arrangement reflected the surface of the slack water around them. They began to move more and more quickly. When they were clear of the slipway and in the open sea Norton ordered:

"Submerge!"

He sat down to face Corrigan.

"What's that you say? No air? Plenty of air here, you needn't be afraid! We're going down to three thousand feet as soon as we are in deep water. No smell of oil on the Rocket—no discomfort. D'you hear the compressed foul air escaping?"

"A sort of hissing noise?" asked Diana.

Norton nodded.

"It helps drive the ship. I'd like to explain it all to you. Sit down, Corrigan—don't fidget about. Yes, that's priming powder—dangerous. Everything's labelled here, but there's no danger here except to inexperienced hands."

Corrigan looked too big for the tiny cabin. Diana felt twinges of discomfort when she remembered Joe's queer expression. This feeling was heightened when the engineer suddenly opened the iron door of his room to ask in a croaking voice:

"When do we turn?"

"Turn?" echoed Norton. "We've only just started! Put her full power ahead and send her down."

"She won't stand much more." Joe's voice was a moan. "She'll crumple up."

He popped back into his den, again slamming the door. The professor took no notice, but began to explain the many differences between the Rocket and the usual submarine.

Time passed. Norton glanced at the gauge—every now and again.

"Nearly three thousand feet!" he exclaimed. "And no sense of oppression. We might be at home."

As he spoke they felt a jerk—then a sudden feeling as if they were in a rapidly descending elevator. Norton moved to the door of the engine-room.

"Not so fast, Joe!" he called. Then: "He's locked himself in!" he cried. "What ever is the matter with him?"

Corrigan moved to the door to pull at it. He shouted:

"Open the door, Joe!"

A crazy laugh sounded. Again came that rather sickening sensation of descent.

"He'll smash us on the ocean bed!" Norton exclaimed furiously. "Joe, open this door at once!"

No effort of Corrigan's could move the tight-fitting sheet of steel.

"Here's a blow-pipe." The professor handed an oxy-acetylene lamp to Corrigan. "Burn out the lock. He's mad!"

They switched on the oxygen to the blow-pipe and a white-hot incandescence leaped out of its muzzle. Corrigan applied the flame to the door-lock, and almost at once the steel began to fuse and melt.

The blow-pipe was doing its work when quite suddenly it went out.

"He's cut off the gas!" The professor was aghast. He hammered at the door, yelling frantically. "Joe, don't be a fool! Open the door!"

Oxygen, highly compressed, came on again—the blue-white flames leaped out of the muzzle of the blow-pipe. The lock melted away.

As Corrigan forced the door, a shrill call came from inside the engine-room: "Dad! Dad!"

"Billy!" The professor was beside himself. "Why, what—how—"

Corrigan was holding back the half-demented Joe. Billy had stowed away in the chart locker—his father dashed in to help the boy out of his hiding. Diana put out her hands to take the young rascal.

"He turned off the gas, dad!" cried Billy. "But I turned it on again."

A Lost Continent

JOE sat with his head held in his hands, muttering to himself.

Billy worked the controls of the submarine under his father's direction. The boy was really as good an engineer as Joe and brought a sharp intelligence to his work. Corrigan and Diana sat in the main cabin within earshot of the professor.

"We are ten thousand feet below the surface," he called to them. "We are on the ocean floor. If we could but see through these walls of steel, what wonders we might behold!"

"Atlantis?" queried Corrigan, half smiling.

"Atlantis," Norton repeated impressively. "Or the ruins of it. A mighty continent drowned beneath a flood. Noah's flood, maybe. I often think about that—" He checked himself. "The seismograph is signalling. An earthquake—nay, a seaquake—is preparing itself. I shall try my counteracting ray."

He stepped into the main cabin to the strange machine which Diana had first seen in his laboratory. A new gadget had been added to it—a little finely balanced lever which Norton now gently depressed. Corrigan and Diana watched him attentively.

Nothing happened so far as they could make out. But a tense minute later the submarine ceased to move.

Joe looked up.

"We've struck a rock! We'll fill up—we'll be drowned like rats in a cage!"

"Shut up, Joe!" Norton rapped out. "Keep silent, all of you." He studied the seismograph.

"I'm certain that some human agency is at work against us. Some agency with a terrible intelligence and power behind it. Ah—we're moving again!"

"The steering-wheel was dragged out of my hands, dad!" called Billy. "I can't hold it. It's going just how it likes!"

"We are being drawn along as if by a magnet," Norton stared at them in turn. "Corrigan, I don't like this. I have a queer sensation of being looked at by some being we can't see."

They all felt the strange, irresistible motion. It was as if it had fixed a cable to the nose of the submarine and was now hauling it along the sea bottom. Then they felt the little wonder ship rise.

"I can't do a thing, dad," Billy called again. "The controls are working themselves."

It was a horrible feeling, this, of complete helplessness. They could only sit there and wait. The two sailors came out of their compartment.

"The old parrot's going on something frightful, sir," Salty told the professor. "Throwing fits—and making a kinder wheezing noise like he was dying."

"Don't bother me with your nonsense!" Norton snapped at him. "Get back to your work."

"No work to do, sir. Nothing answers. When we oils the engines they go slower instead of faster."

"We didn't ought to have come," put in Briny. "To-day being Friday. It's unlucky."

"The lights are going out," groaned Joe in hollow tones. "Power has failed. We'll die in the dark!"

"We aren't dead yet," Corrigan reminded him.

The lights went out; then flared on again. Then flickered up and down.

Corrigan held the half-demented Joe while the professor helped Billy out of his hiding-place.

"Somebody's monkeying with our dynamos," came Briny's voice. "Lummy, if I could only ketch 'em!"

A swift forward motion became evident. The Rocket was being drawn along on an even keel. This continued while they waited in heart-searing suspense. Then all motion ceased and they felt themselves rising straight upward as directly as if they were in a lift.

"Sorter makes your tummy feel it was dropping out," whispered Salty. "I'll be throwing fits in a minute!"

The submarine gave a little bounce. Then all was still again. Norton, studying the periscope in the fliffling light of the lamps, gazed incredulously.

"We're back on the surface!"

They heard Briny shouting:

"Tower's out of water, sir! Shall I run up and open it?"

"It's unbelievable," said Norton in hushed tones. "Yes, the coming tower is certainly above the surface. Go up, Joe, and open the tower."

"And let the sea in?" Joe growled. "Not me!"

Corrigan thrust past him and ascended the ladder of the tower. He unbolted and pushed up the lid. He called down to them:

"We're in a river somewhere. There's no sky."

They all came scrambling out of the cabin up the ladder to the little flat-surfaced deck. The Rocket was floating slowly and lazily down the middle of a dark-watered, brackish river, whose banks were lined with dwarfed forest trees which overshadowed its sandy banks.

"Amazing!" The professor spoke with awe. "We are actually in an unknown country—" His voice trailed away as he stared through his pince-nez at the strange trees.

"No sky overhead," Corrigan repeated. "Just a huge dome of what looks like dark glass. It's as if we were in an enormous diving bell." He paused in perplexity. "No sun—and yet there's light."

"That's clouds, sir," said Salty. "No glass could stand the pressure of the sea what's above it. But clouds, now—well, they're wet, ain't they? So it don't make any difference."

Diana had to smile—these two sailors amused her.

"Going to fetch Polly?" she asked Briny. "A little fresh air will do her good."

"Lummy, I was forgetting all about her!" He darted back into the submarine, closely followed by his chum.

"Let's go ashore," Billy suggested. "Maybe there's people."

The professor had recovered himself. "It is Atlantis," he declared. "Yes, beyond all doubt. Strange that, when I find my theories proved correct, I should begin to doubt. We will go ashore and see what sort of civilisation remains in a continent lost for so many thousands of years."

"You're a tough old bird!" suddenly screeched Polly, appearing on Salty's shoulder as he climbed out of the coming tower. "Man the lifeboats—the ship's on fire!"

The Robots

THE professor collected a small mahogany box from his special locker which was marked "Priming Powder. Danger! Handle with Care." This little box he tucked under his arm.

"Now we can go ashore," he decided. "Lead the way, Corrigan. I will come last."

January 23rd, 1937.

"Can we bring the parrot?" asked Salty.

"Yes. But don't let her talk or shriek."

They poled the Rocket near the southern bank, then disembarked—the professor shutting down the conning tower. He crossed the collapsible gangway, then folded it back on to the submarine. They watched him carrying his little box to the bole of a tree.

"We can hide it here," he said. "It is the switchboard which controls the submarine. I shall now submerge it. Watch me carefully, all of you. We do not know what dangers are around us. I have a strong suspicion that we are being overseen in all we do."

They stood round him whilst, crouching on the ground, he pressed down a switch on the outside of the box. Immediately the Rocket put off from the shore to the middle of the river, and, with gurgling bubbles, sank out of sight.

"You reverse the switch to bring it up," Norton told them. "Quite simple. Now we will hide the switchboard." He did so beneath the mossy undergrowth at the base of the tree. "Note where it is, Corrigan—but don't mark this tree. Memorise it. Salty and Briny can stay here with the parrot. We will go inland a little way and take our bearings."

They came out of the forest which fringed the river and clambered upward over rough, uneven ground which became more rocky and difficult with every few yards. They climbed in silence, strange forebodings keeping them wary and quiet.

At last they reached a cleft almost at the summit of the rocky, desolate hill. Norton, peering forward, put up a warning hand.

"Look!" he whispered. "A walled city!"

Through a gap in the next range of hills they espied a strange, Eastern-looking little town, high-walled about, except where two huge wooden gates were closed under an archway. There was no sign of life.

Billy climbed on to a flat rock to get a better view.

Suddenly a clattering of hoofs from behind them caused all to turn sharply. Tearing down the hills farther along the range, they saw a party of black-robed men on huge horses scouring into the river valley. They were armed with swords and spears, which they flourished wildly as they galloped.

"Looking for us," the professor muttered. "I knew we were being watched! We had better hide from them."

"What about Salty and Briny?" queried Corrigan.

"They must look after themselves. These horsemen will dismount if they are going in under the trees."

Joe was scuttling away as hard as he could.

"Come back!" cried Billy. "Stay with us, Joe!"

His shrill voice carried through the strangely still air. The horsemen heard, and, with fierce suddenness, drew rein. Corrigan saw them staring upward, trying to find them. A barked command came to their ears; the party below drew in about their leader.

The professor turned to Corrigan.

"What do you advise?" he asked.

"Frankly I don't like the look of them," Crash returned. "Ah, they have seen us! Follow me all!"

He ran into the gap, towards the walled city. A loud shouting was raised by the Blackrobes—they and their horses came pounding over the boulder-strewn earth in instant pursuit. Corrigan's quick eyes noted a ledge in the gap up to which an active man might spring. He did so, gaining the ledge easily; then, with down-stretched hand, he rapidly hauled up Diana, Billy, and the professor.

"Where's Joc?" Corrigan stared downward. The foolish young engineer was running down the gap towards the far-off city.

"Hope he has enough sense to hide himself." Corrigan seized Diana's hand. "Follow me!"

The ledge sloped inward to a crevice Hewitt the huge, piled-together boulders. One by one they squeezed through and came to a roughish kind of plateau, the sides of which seemed too precipitous to be climbed up. They crouched there, hearing the horsemen thunder along the gap they had just left.

"We had better get back to the Rocket."

Corrigan had taken over command. The professor seemed bewildered and frightened. Again he said:

"They can see us, Crash. I'm sure we are being watched."

"They can't," Corrigan declared positively. "Now then, let's see if we can drop over the cliffs and get back to the Rocket."

He went forward, while the others stood together, breathlessly watching him. He beckoned to them.

"There's a circular hole down there," he whispered. "It looks to me as if it were an entrance. It's concealed from below with creepers and trees—you can only glimpse it from here where we are higher up. See it?"

They all peered down. Billy spotted the hole first, and exclaimed:

"Gee, Crash, what a lark! Let's go!"

"It may be a trap."

Norton shook his grey head. He had put away his pince-nez, and looked very worried.

"We can't stay here," Corrigan argued. "Gosh, what's that?" A whining scream had torn the air. Almost as he spoke a strange kind of air-torpedo came hurtling through the sky downwards at them. It struck the cliffs to their left, exploding with a deafening report. Huge masses of rock came crashing down; then dense, stifling smoke enveloped them. "That's settled it," Corrigan called. "Your Atlanteans definitely aren't friendly, professor!"

"I'm utterly bewildered," Norton owned. "This land beneath the ocean; this clouded dome above us; this strange, dry light which comes from no sun. Plenty of air, but no wind. I shall have to read a paper to the learned societies about all this when we get back."

"When we get back," Diana put in with a wry smile.

A second projectile came at them, this time wide of its mark. It smashed into the cliffs as it exploded with devastating uproar. Loose rocks and shingle came down from the heights in a kind of avalanche.

Corrigan was already over the edge of the cliff, hanging by his hands. He dropped to his feet, calling up to his companions:

"One at a time! I'll catch you!"

But Billy didn't wait. If Crash wasn't afraid of the drop, he wasn't. But his pluck earned him a bad tumble.

Diana leapt into Corrigan's outstretched arms, light as a feather. The professor came down rather awkwardly, but Corrigan just caught him. They began to make their way over a rock-

(Continued on page 27.)

Ordered to arrest the girl whom he hoped one day to marry, Sheridan of the Mounted faced the cruellest dilemma that ever a man experienced. A tense drama of the Canadian forests, starring Francis X. Bushman jun. and Lois Wilde

"GET THAT GIRL"

The Open Safe

IT was eight o'clock in the evening, and in the city of Milwaukee, Wisconsin, the "rush" hour was long past.

The home-going crowds of workers had given up their daily tasks and migrated to the suburbs. The roar of traffic had whittled itself down to an intermittent play of clear-cut sounds that only accentuated the evening stillness—such as the occasional note of a motor-horn or the rattle of an infrequent street car.

In the business centre the majority of the premises had been abandoned to a meagre population of caretakers, and where there had been bustle and activity an hour or two before, there was now an air of desertion, sombre as the dusk that had spread across the sky.

High up in a certain building that overlooked Michigan Avenue, however, a light gleamed out like an unwinking eye. It was a light that came from the office of the Colvin Investment Company, a brokerage firm that had been in existence for several months.

The solitary occupant of that office was a girl of twenty-one. She was small and trim, with attractive features, a peach-like complexion, eyes of a soft blue colouring and ash-blonde hair; and if you had been connected in any way with the Colvin Investment Company you would have known that she was Caryl Foray, secretary to the president of that firm.

For the rest, she was of Canadian birth and upbringing, and half French and half English by parentage. She had been raised somewhere in the backwoods, but, spurred on by an urge to see the world, she had taken up a correspondence course in bookkeeping and clerical work, and had been overjoyed when she had answered an advertisement in an American paper and obtained this position in Milwaukee, on the U.S. side of the border.

That had been several months ago. But, seeing her now, no one could have imagined that she was happy in her job, for the expression on her lovely face was one of sharp anxiety coupled with a sort of nervous determination.

She had donned her hat and coat, but she had not yet made any move to leave the office. She was standing before a large safe, and, with her ear laid close to it, she was deliberately turning the dial of the combination lock, a procedure which continued to engross her until the door of the receptacle swung open.

Caryl Foray reached into the safe then and searched swiftly amongst its contents, leaving untouched a few hundred dollars in cash, but clutching eagerly at a sheaf of important-looking documents that presently caught her eye.

These documents she carried to a nearby desk, where she snatched up a blank sheet of paper and wrote a few hurried lines. Then, after drying the missive on a blotting-pad, she thrust it into an envelope together with the sheaf of documents that she had taken from the safe.

Having sealed the envelope, she scribbled an address on it in ink. Next she made use of the blotter again, and finally she produced a stamp from her handbag.

It was as she was affixing the stamp to the envelope that she heard footfalls outside the room, and a moment later a man pushed open the door and stepped across the threshold.

He was Enos Colvin, president of the Investment Company and Caryl's employer, a well-built individual in the late thirties, immaculately dressed and handsome enough in his appearance, though his sallow face sometimes betrayed a certain shiftness of demeanour and his dark eyes a vague impression of cunning.

"Why, Miss Foray," he exclaimed now, obviously surprised at finding his secretary in the office, "I thought you had gone home."

The girl answered him in a well-modulated tone, though he could not help noticing that there was a trace of excitement underlying her calm exterior.

"I was just leaving, Mr. Colvin," she said. "I had some work to finish up."

"I see," he murmured, glancing at the envelope which she was holding and wondering if it had any connection with the excitement which he seemed to divine in her manner. "Well, don't let me detain you. You've had a long day, I guess."

"Yes, Mr. Colvin," she replied. "Er—good-night, sir."

"Good-night, Miss Foray."

He watched her curiously as she made her way from the room, and even when she had gone he stood staring at the door that had closed behind her. Then, after a minute or two, he turned with a shrug and moved towards his safe.

It was only when he approached close to it that he discovered it was open, and on the instant a look of apprehension crossed his features. Next moment he was rummaging amongst the papers it contained, to recoil at last with a baffled air that rapidly changed to fury.

For the space of several seconds he remained motionless, his brows drawn together in a scowl of meditation. It was clear to him, of course, that the Foray girl had been at the safe. That was why she had been detained so late at the office. Doubtless she had been ransacking his desk for some clue to the key numbers of the combination lock—had found that clue—had opened the safe and obtained what she was after—and had either forgotten to close the safe again or had been taken unawares by his arrival on the scene.

Yes, there on his desk was a small scrap of paper bearing the key numbers to the safe's locking device.

With an oath Colvin wheeled towards the windows, and as he glared down into the street away below, he saw Caryl Foray hurrying past a sedan car that was drawn up at the kerb—his own car, in which he had driven back to the office after making certain arrangements that were not unconnected with the documents missing from his safe.

Angrily he watched her as she hastened along the side-walk, and then he saw her stop at a pillar-box and post that envelope which he had observed in her hand.

A scowl gathered on his forehead again. That envelope probably contained the documents she had removed from the safe. If so, where were those documents bound for?

What did it matter? There was no chance of recovering them now, anyway.

Bitting his lip, he returned to his desk and sank into the swivel-chair there—started to drum his fingers agitatedly on the blotting-pad that lay before him.

"Little thief," he ground out, yet it was significant that he made no attempt to communicate with the police.

And then, even as he sat there, his glance came to rest on the blotter which his fingers were tapping, and he realised that the pad was almost clean, except for some imprints that had been recently made on it.

A sudden thought occurred to him, and with a quick gesture he took out a pocket mirror that he was carrying in his waistcoat. Then, picking up the blotting-pad, he held the mirror in such a position that it reflected and reversed the impressions which had been left on the sheet of absorbent paper.

Those impressions were at once rendered legible to him, and he was not only enabled to read what Caryl Foray had written in her letter, but also succeeded in spelling out the address that she had scrawled on the envelope.

It was an address in Canada, on the other side of the border, and Enos Colvin lost no time in making a note of it. Then he clutched his hat and tumbled to the door, slamming out of the office like a man bent on some grim purpose.

Just five minutes later, Enos Colvin was diving rapidly through the streets of Milwaukee, headed in a northerly direction—for the border.

Sergeant Sheridan

A FAINT breeze was playing among the tall tree-stems of the forest belt through which the trail from Bord du Lac runs westward. It was spring, and the air was light as champagne, intoxicating in its sparkling freshness.

A lone rider drank deeply of that pure, wholesome air. He was attired in the smart uniform of the Royal North-West Mounted Police, which had established a post at the settlement of Bord du Lac in the early days of the pioneers, and he was a typical specimen of that fine breed of men who patrol the remote territories known as the Canadian backwoods.

Bradley Sheridan was his name, and the stripes attached to the sleeves of his tunic proclaimed him as a sergeant. He was, in fact, the senior officer at Bord du Lac, and it was his duty to see that law and order were maintained over a prescribed area, being answerable for that area to one Inspector Bradshaw, who was stationed farther to the south and who controlled a whole series of scattered posts from his headquarters.

At the moment Sergeant Brad Sheridan was travelling in the opposite direction to Bord du Lac, and he was actually a number of miles from the post when he struck into a clearing occupied by a trim, low-built cabin of logs with a well-swept porch and veranda.

It was the cabin of an old French-Canadian, Jean Foray by name, and he was a particular friend of Brad, who now dismounted in front of the dwelling and stepped up to the front door.

He knocked, and a voice calling to him to enter, he walked into a plain but comfortably furnished room, the walls of timber, like the exterior of the building, but the fireplace consisting of smooth stones that had been cemented together.

An old man and a magnificent-looking wolfhound were in that room, and, facing the open doorway, they saw the stalwart figure of the Mountie framed in the gap—six feet two of handsome manhood with smiling, weather-beaten countenance, bold grey eyes and light brown hair.

Small and slight by comparison with the police officer, old Jean Foray stood up to welcome him, and at the same time the wolfhound padded towards the Mountie with frisking tail.

"Hallo, there, Rinty!" Brad Sheridan exclaimed, bending down and extending his gloved hand to take one of the animal's paws. "And how are you, boy? Been a good dog since I saw you last?"

The motion of the wolfhound's tail seemed to quicken, and, laughing, Brad straightened up to greet the owner of the dog.

"Morning, Jean," he said. "How's tricks?"

"Oh, so-so, mon ami, so-so!" the old fellow rejoined. "But I am ver' happy to see you, sergeant. It has been quite a time since you drop' in on me—one, two, three weeks, yes? H'm—Rinty, he, too, is glad to see you."

Brad moved over to the table by which Jean had been sitting.

"I've been pretty busy lately," he observed, "otherwise I'd have looked you up before. But I had a fairly clear day to-day, and I figured I'd ride over for a friendly chat. And by the way, Jean, I have a letter for you. It arrived at the settlement this morning, and I thought I'd bring it along. I—er—think it's from Caryl. It's post-marked 'Milwaukee,' and it looks like her writing."

Old Jean glanced at him slyly. "Mebbe that is why you com' here to see me, hein?" he suggested with a smile. "Mebbo you like to hear what news there is from Caryl, hein?"

"Aw, no, Jean," Brad expostulated. "You know I like to call in on you and Rinty every once in a while."

"Sure," the aged French-Canadian chuckled. "Sure, but I theenk you still want to hear about my niece."

He paused, and then, in a more serious vein:

"Ah, mon brave," he went on, "I am afraid we both missed her when she went away. Of course, she wanted to see a leetle of the world, and then, after her mother died, she felt she had to get away from these parts for a leetle while. But she will com' back for good one of these days, and then mebbe you marry her—as I know you want to."

"You're right, Jean," Brad confessed. "About wanting to marry Caryl, I mean. But aren't you going to open her letter?"

He had produced a foolscap envelope which was unusually bulky, and was holding it out to the older man, but the latter motioned to him to open the missive himself.

"You read it to me, sergeant," he said. "I have mislaid my glasses, and without them these old eyes of mine are not much good."

The Mountie proceeded to oblige him, and, ripping open the envelope, he withdrew its contents, which proved to be a sheaf of papers fastened by a rubber band and accompanied by a brief note.

The sheaf of papers Brad laid aside, paying little attention to them. The note he read aloud for the benefit of the aged backwoodsman.

"Dear Uncle Jean," he quoted, "please keep these papers for me in a safe place. They are very valuable. I will tell you all about it when I come up for my spring vacation in a couple of weeks' time.—Love, CARYL."

He placed the letter on the table and looked at Jean Foray whimsically.

"That's all," he said, whereupon the old fellow seemed disappointed.

"That is all, sergeant? H'm, I expect more than that. Ah, it is always the same with girls to-day. Always in the hurry. Never mind, it will be good to see her in two weeks' time, and meanwhile I shall keep these papers for her as she asks."

He picked up the sheaf of documents that had been enclosed with Caryl's letter, and was turning them over in his withered hands when his attention was attracted to Rinty.

The dog was sniffing excitedly at the envelope which Brad had opened a minute or two before, and which had fallen from the table to the rug, and all at once he began to whine.

"He knows it's from Caryl, Jean," Brad Sheridan commented.

The older man nodded.

"You are right, sergeant," he declared. "That dog, he pick up a scent as quick as I snap my fingers—so! Sure, he can tell that Caryl has touch' that envelope. Eh bien, he, too, will welcome her in two weeks' time!"

He stooped to caress the dog, and then, seating himself in his chair again, he began to talk to Brad of his niece's intended visit, a subject so engrossing to both of them that it was high noon before the Mountie realised that he ought to be on his way back to Bord du Lac.

The big sergeant took his leave a few minutes later, and soon after he had departed old Jean Foray remembered the request that Caryl had pointed. He thereupon carried the sheaf of valuable papers across to the fireplace, and then, raising one hand, he dislodged one of the stones from that fireplace and revealed a cunning hiding-place which he himself used for the small store of savings that he had managed to acquire during his lifetime of hard work.

Into this cache he thrust the papers, and after pressing the loose stone back into position he glanced down at Rinty, who had moved across the room with him and watched him with interest.

"Those papers, they will be safe there,

Rinty, hein?" the French-Canadian said.

He returned to his chair by the table, and, dropping into it, stretched himself out comfortably while the wolfhound curled himself on the rug near by; and before long man and dog were sunk in a drowse, dreaming, perhaps, of that girl to whom they were both devoted and who was now far to the south beyond the Canadian border.

An hour slipped by, and the chime of a clock on the mantelpiece was echoing about the room, when suddenly Rinty started up out of his doze and began to bark, the sound awakening his master almost immediately.

Jean Foray opened his eyes and looked at the dog in a perplexed fashion. Then he heard a step on the veranda, and a moment later there was a knock on the door.

"Come in!" the old French-Canadian called out.

The door opened, and a man appeared on the threshold, a well-built man of about thirty-eight. A stranger to Jean Foray, he was dressed after the fashion of a woodsman, in breeches, field-boots, open-necked shirt and woollen jacket, but there was something about him that smacked of the cities.

Old Foray stood up to greet him courteously. Rinty, however, showed a remarkable and an unusual hostility, baring his teeth at the visitor and challenging his advance in a way that caused the man to eye him with alarm.

It was as if the dog sensed that the newcomer was there on no innocent mission, and it would have been well for Jean Foray if he had paid more heed to the animal's queer resentment of the caller's presence. He was merely puzzled by Rinty's behaviour, however, for although the wolfhound had always been shy of strangers he had never before displayed so violent an antagonism to anyone.

Then the man on the threshold spoke, eyeing Rinty askance as he did so.

"Your dog doesn't seem to like me," he said thickly. "Could you get him out of the way for a while? I'd like to talk to you."

"Sure, m'sieu, sure. Rinty, outside weeth you. Come, wait outside!"

The old fellow caught hold of the wolfhound and hustled him smilingly but none the less firmly through the doorway, the stranger keeping well out of the dog's reach until he had been disposed of. Then, Rinty having been banished from the cabin and the door closed against him, Jean Foray turned to his visitor and motioned to a chair.

"Well, m'sieu, and what can I do for you?"

"Your name is Jean Foray, isn't it?" the other asked.

"Oui, that is my name."

"And you have a niece who is called Caryl Foray?"

The aged French-Canadian nodded his white head, and a look of fondness came into his eyes.

"Oui, oui!" he said quickly. "Caryl is my niece. You know her, m'sieu?"

The stranger was sitting in the chair to which he had been ushered, and, leaning forward, he stared up at the older man in an intent fashion.

"I'm Enos Colvin," he stated grimly. "Your niece works for me. And I want those papers she sent to you!"

Jean Foray started, and then an expression of resolution dawned on his lean features. The menacing note in the caller's voice had not been to his liking. Besides, Caryl in her letter had said distinctly that he was to keep those papers for her. In view of that, it was not his place to give them up to anyone—not even to her employer, if this man was her employer.

NEXT WEEK'S LONG COMPLETE FILM THRILLERS!

EDWARD G. ROBINSON

IN

"BULLETS OR BALLOTS"

Degraded from the New York flying squad and afterwards dismissed the force altogether, Johnny Blake throws in his lot with Al Kruger, a powerful racketeer. While acting as a crook, however, he is intent upon discovering the identity of the men "higher up" from whom even Kruger takes his orders. A blazing drama.

"THE MAGNIFICENT BRUTE"

Big Steve Williams was a laughing, blustering giant. At the Aurora Steel Company he finds he is up against his old enemy, Bill Morgan. The latter was the strong man till Steve showed up and by a clever double-cross crushed his rival, but a brave woman and her small son inspired the giant to fight back. Starring Victor McLaglen.

"NAVY BORN"

Three fight-lieutenants of the United States Navy adopt the son of an officer who perished in a motor accident, and they aim to bring up their charge with a love for the sea. But the mother's family have other ideas and try their hardest to get the baby away from the Navy. Starring William Gargan.

Also

The second episode of the amazing new serial of weird adventure:

"UNDERSEA KINGDOM"

Starring Ray Corrigan and Lois Wilde.

"Papers?" Jean murmured. "I have no papers."

"Don't lie to me!" Enos Colvin bit out. "Give me those bonds!"

"Bonds? I know nothing about bonds, m'sieu," the old man answered, and this was at least the truth, for he had scarcely even glanced at the documents in question.

Colvin stood up, glaring at the French-Canadian. Then all at once his eyes fell upon Caryl's letter, lying unfolded on the table, and as he scanned it he reached inside his jacket and whipped out a six-gun.

"This letter proves you know plenty!" he grated. "Now you give me those bonds if you know what's good for you. Come on, hand them over or I'll—"

He never finished the sentence, for with a hoarse cry Jean Foray lunged towards him and clutched at the revolver to thrust it aside, and next moment the two men were involved in a fierce scuffle that carried them headlong towards the far side of the room.

The very impetuosity of old Foray's attack sent Colvin reeling at first, but he was quick to recover himself and gain the upper hand, as well he might when his adversary was a man almost twice his age. In the space of a few seconds the frail, veteran backwoodsman was being dragged across the floor, clinging with desperate tenacity to the American's wrist and the threatening barrel of that forty-five, while the infuriated Colvin struggled to break his hold.

Twenty years ago, Jean Foray would have made short work of a man of Enos Colvin's calibre. But he was over seventy now, and he could not hope to master him. He was fighting a losing battle, and it said much for the wiriness of his aged frame that he was able to retain his grip on the revolver as long as he did.

Cursing, the American tugged viciously at the gun in his efforts to wrench it away from the old fellow and get the drop on him, and he was still striving to achieve that purpose when a spasmodic movement of his trigger-finger discharged the weapon.

There was a racketing blast that seemed to fill the room with sound, and through a smother of blue fumes Colvin saw Jean Foray slump to the floorboards, felt the old man's hands slide nervelessly from his wrist and from the barrel of the forty-five. Even then, however, the American did not realise what had happened.

"Now will you tell me where those bonds are?" he stormed.

There was no answer. Jean Foray lay crumpled at his feet, his eyes wide open in a death-stare, a spreading patch of blood staining his shirt just over the heart.

Colvin looked down at him stupidly for a brief space, awed by what he had done, telling himself that he had never come here with the intention of killing, telling himself that he had only brought the gun in order to combat any stubbornness which he might encounter. Then a fit of rage took possession of him, and he spurned the dead man's body.

"You old fool!" he panted. "You brought this on yourself!"

Even as he uttered those words he became aware of a clamour at an open window in the opposite wall, and as he launched a glance in that direction he clapped eyes on the dog Rinty.

The wolfhound must have heard the scuffle, and had run round the cabin seeking admittance; had leapt at the sill of that open window and, after successive attempts to negotiate it, was now in the act of scrambling through with fangs bared for vengeance.

The mellow brown eyes of the dog had taken on a quality that was demonic, menacing, and there was primitive rage in the sight of those lips writhing back from the gleaming teeth, in the sound of the snarls that rose from his throat.

Colvin brought up the revolver with an ugly jerk and fired at the wolfhound, and the smash of the report was followed by an anguished howl that might have roused pity in any man but the scoundrel who had caused Jean Foray's death. Next instant Rinty was tumbling back from the window-sill, and as the reverberations of the gunshot died away an empty silence descended upon the cabin in the clearing.

In that silence Enos Colvin turned to scan the room in which he was standing, and then, first of all concentrating upon a small bureau, he began to make a search for the bonds that Caryl Foray had taken from his safe.

During the course of the next hour the American ransacked the whole dwelling from end to end. Nor did he neglect to run his hands through the clothing of the man whom he had slain. But not a trace of the missing papers did he find, for the cache in the stonework of the fireplace escaped his questing fingers completely, and at last he was forced to admit defeat.

Frustrated and enraged, he finally stamped out of the cabin, and with a black scowl on his sallow features, he set off into the woods, threading his way through the trees until he picked up a rough, broken trail.

It was not the trail that led to Bord du Lac, but a road that ran due south, and a short distance along it was the car in which he had driven from Milwaukee.

He climbed into the vehicle, and sat motionless behind the wheel for a little while, moodily reflecting upon the outcome of this trip he had made into the Canadian wilds.

Where were those bonds? He did not know, but they had cost an aged settler his life—and he, Colvin, had committed a crime which would render him liable to the extreme penalty of the law if ever his guilt were discovered.

It was lucky for him that he had automatically covered up his tracks pretty well. No one could check up on his movements—no one would be able to connect him with the tragedy which had occurred. He had broken his journey on the way from Milwaukee, but only to spend a night at a lonely shooting lodge he rented on the U.S. side of the line, and here he had changed out of his city clothes and armed himself with the forty-five, also filling up the tank of his car from a store of gasoline that he kept there.

Pursing his lips, Colvin started up the engine of his automobile and drove away, and soon the hum of the sedan's motor had faded into the prevailing quiet that reigned over the vicinity of old Jean Foray's cabin.

In that cabin a veteran backwoodsman lay dead, and outside one of the windows was the huddled form of the dog that had been his only companion. But, though unconscious, the wolfhound was still breathing, and some time after Colvin's departure the animal roused himself painfully and proceeded to drag himself round to the front porch of the dwelling.

Ernest Colvin had left the door open, and slowly, pitifully, the dog Rinty struggled up the steps and across the threshold, thence crawling towards the body of his master. And as he reached that lifeless figure he licked the pallid cheek forlornly.

For a minute or two the wolfhound could not seem to grasp that the old man was no more, but when at length the fact penetrated to his canine mind he broke into a tremulous whimper. Then, as painfully as he had entered the shack, he dragged himself forth again and wormed his way across the clearing, toiling in the direction of the trail that led to Bord du Lac.

Extradition Warrant

SERGEANT BRAD SHERIDAN was seated at his desk in the office attached to the quarters which he and his comrades occupied at the settlement. It was late afternoon, and he was poring over a batch of correspondence that he had received from Inspector Bradshaw.

He was still engaged in a scrutiny of that correspondence when his attention was distracted by a sharp cry outside the building. Then he heard one of his men calling to him, and recognised the voice as that of a trooper known as Constable O'Brien.

Brad rose from his chair and hurried from the office, and as he emerged from January 23rd, 1937.

it he came face to face with his subordinate, a keen, soldierly looking individual of about his own age.

"Sergeant," O'Brien exclaimed, pointing off to the right, "isn't that Jean Foray's dog?"

Brad glanced in the direction that the constable had indicated, and as he did so he caught sight of Rinty hauling himself feebly towards the post.

"Jean Foray's dog!" he reiterated in a tone of concern. "Yeah, it's Jean's dog all right, and something's happened to him!"

Next moment he was running across to the injured wolfhound, and as he knelt down and gathered the animal into his arms he saw that his fur was matted with blood.

"Rinty!" the sergeant cried. "Rinty, old boy, what have you been doing to yourself?"

The dog uttered a low whine, and, bending closer to him, Brad examined the wound more closely. Then he lifted the animal from the ground and stood up, turning to O'Brien with a set look on his handsome countenance.

"He's been shot!" he rapped out.

"Shot!" the constable echoed. "Who'd be skunk enough to shoot a dog like Rinty?"

"Wouldn't I like to know!" Brad rejoined grimly. "Come on, let's see what we can do for him. Get some hot water and bandages, O'Brien, will you?"

He carried the injured wolfhound back to his office, and presently O'Brien appeared there in company with another trooper who answered to the name of Gary.

"Here's a basin of hot water and the first-aid kit, sergeant," O'Brien announced, "and Gary here has raked out a basket that Rinty can have for a bed."

The dog was placed in the basket, which Constable Gary had padded with a rug, and Brad set to work on the animal's wound, doctoring it skilfully so that within a few minutes the creature had been made as comfortable as possible. Then, his task finished, the big sergeant reached for his hat.

"Keep an eye on Rinty, O'Brien," he said. "Better give him some food if he'll take it. I'm going to old Jean's cabin to tell him his dog's hurt."

He strode out of the office and made for a hitch-rail to which he had tethered his horse some time before, and ere long he was galloping at top speed along the road that linked the Foray cabin with the settlement.

The sun was dipping down behind the tree-tops when he reached the clearing in which the old French-Canadian's home was situated, and, swinging himself out of the saddle, the Mountie advanced to the steps of the porch and cupped his hands about his mouth.

"Hey, Jean!" he called. "Jean!"

There was no response, and, seeing that the front door stood open on its hinges, Brad hurried up the steps and walked across the threshold.

"Jean!" he repeated, and then came to a dead standstill as his awe-stricken gaze fell upon the crumpled body that lay on the floor in front of him.

The colour draining from his features, Brad Sheridan stumbled forward and sank down beside the old man, and one glance was enough to tell him that the veteran settler was dead. Then, with horror in his eyes, the Mountie turned to take stock of the room, which showed signs of the fatal struggle that had been enacted and the wild, impatient search that had been carried out after death had brought the scuffle to a close.

Still numbed by the shock of the discovery he had made, Brad began to examine the cabin's interior mechanically, but he found only one object that could be regarded as a possible clue—an ornamental coat-button which might have been torn from its threads during the fight, and which certainly did not tally with any of the buttons on Jean Foray's clothing.

Pocketing the article, Brad looked at the huddled figure on the floor again, and then, with an expression of mingled grief and resolution on his clean-cut face, he staggered from the dwelling and proceeded to reconnoitre the immediate neighbourhood.

He was hoping to obtain some further clue relating to the tragedy that had occurred, but it was not until he had extended his quest to the south trail beyond the clearing that he came upon anything of significance.

In the dust of that trail he observed the tracks of an automobile's tyres—tyres of a distinctive and unfamiliar tread, the like of which Brad could not remember having seen before, although he laid no claim to being particularly well versed in the patterns used by the various manufacturers.

For a long time he stood there, studying those tracks so as to impress the appearance of them on his mind, and then he returned to the cabin and climbed astride his horse.

An hour afterwards he was back at the post, and in the office there he held a consultation with O'Brien, describing the result of his visit to the Foray homestead and giving it as his opinion that the man who had shot old Jean was the man who had winged Rinty.

"The point is—who was that man?" he added slowly. "As far as I know, Jean had no enemies, and surely no chance thief would go to the length of murder for the few paltry dollars he was likely to find in a backwoodsman's cabin."

There was a silence, and then, with an effort, he roused himself from his brooding thoughts.

"Well, O'Brien," he said, "you and Gary had better drive out in a hack-board and bring in the poor old fellow's body. Meanwhile, I'll have to send off a report to Inspector Bradshaw and wire Caryl Foray in Milwaukee."

Forty-eight hours later, with the case receiving the earnest attention of the authorities, Jean Foray's niece walked into Brad Sheridan's office at Bord du Lac and sought the comfort of his enfolding arms, giving way to a flood of tears that she only checked when Constable O'Brien presented himself in the room.

"Excuse me, sergeant," the trooper apologised, holding out a telegram, "but this just arrived from headquarters."

"All right, constable," Brad answered huskily. "I'll attend to it later."

He turned his attention on Caryl again, and found that she was looking at Rinty, who was lying nearby in his basket, and although the dog was still suffering from the effects of his wound his tail was beating against the wicker sides of his crib to indicate his pleasure over the girl's presence.

"Oh, what a beast he must have been to shoot you, too, Rinty!" Caryl said in a pent-up tone.

She stooped to caress the wolfhound fondly, and then gazed up at Brad with tear-dimmed eyes.

"Poor Uncle Jean," she faltered. "He was all I had left. Do you—do you know who killed him?"

"No, not yet, honey," the sergeant breathed. "But I'll find out who it was, or die in the attempt!"

Caryl straightened and laid a hand on the big Mountie's sleeve.

"When I go back to Milwaukee," she said, "I'll take Rinty with me."

But first of all I must ride out to Uncle Jean's cabin. I'll hire a horse at the livery stable in the settlement."

Disappointed as he was at her hint of an early return to the States, Brad could nevertheless understand that she did not wish to remain in the vicinity of Bord du Lac, where she would be a prey to bitter memories.

"All right, Caryl," he murmured. "I'll ride over to the cabin with you, shall I?"

"No, Brad dear," she told him, "I'd rather go alone—if you don't mind."

He acquiesced without protest, and when she had left the office he lapsed into a gloomy conversation with O'Brien, discussing the girl's tragic bereavement to the exclusion of all else until the constable suddenly reminded him of the dispatch from headquarters.

The telegram was lying on the desk, and, picking it up, Brad ripped open the envelope and withdrew the missive. Then, as he read its contents, a look of dismay and incredulity appeared on his features.

"Why, this is impossible!" he ejaculated.

"What's up, sergeant?" O'Brien queried. "What does it say?"

Brad swung round towards him.

"It's an order from Bradshaw instructing me to arrest Caryl Foray," he blurted.

"Caryl Foray?"

"Yes, an extradition warrant has been issued for her return to the States on a charge of embezzlement!"

O'Brien's jaw had dropped, and he was staring at the sergeant blankly. For he knew what this unexpected development must mean to Brad, knew that he was in love with Caryl and that the idea of taking her into custody must go desperately against the grain.

"What—what are you going to do, sergeant?" the constable stammered.

Brad could not speak for a moment, but the look on his face betrayed his emotions. betrayed the vital struggle that was proceeding within him as his own personal sentiments battled against his duty to the service. Then all at once he found his voice.

"I'm going to see Caryl about this," he said hoarsely, and an instant later he was brushing past his comrade to stumble from the room.

In another quarter of a minute O'Brien heard him galloping off in a westerly direction, and the drumming of his horse's hoofs was dying away into the distance when Constable Gary entered the office.

"What's wrong with the sergeant, Jim?" he asked O'Brien. "He came out of here just now lookin' like a ghost."

"Yeah," was the reply. "He's got reason to look like a ghost. He had a wire from Inspector Bradshaw orderin' him to arrest the girl he hopes to marry. She's charged with embezzlement."

Gary's eyes widened. "You mean—Caryl Foray? Gosh, Jim, d'you think he'll bring her in?"

"What else can he do?" Jim O'Brien retorted. "If he doesn't bring her in he'll be in hot water himself. Say, you'd better write out a message and send it to headquarters telling Bradshaw that his instructions are being carried out."

Thus spoke O'Brien, assuming that Brad Sheridan would take the course that his oath to the service demanded of him. But at that moment Brad Sheridan was spurring through the woods with mixed feelings in his breast, and he was still in the throes of a dilemma when he finally sighted the Foray cabin and espied a horse tethered to the veranda there.

He drew rein in front of the porch, and, leaping to the ground, blundered up the steps and into the dwelling to find Caryl standing in the front room.

"Why, Brad," the girl exclaimed, perceiving by his manner that all was not well, "what's brought you out here? What's the matter?"

By way of response he showed her the dispatch that he had received from headquarters, and when she had read it he looked at her strainedly.

"Of course, there's been some mistake," he said. "You're no embezzler, Caryl. I know that. Why, you wouldn't steal from anybody."

The girl faced him candidly, a resolute expression in her eyes.

"Brad," she announced, "up to a point the charge against me is true. No, wait—don't interrupt—let me explain. I took those securities from the company's safe, but only to save the investors to whom they rightfully belonged."

"Caryl, I don't understand."

She drew a little nearer to him.

"I had cause to suspect that Enos Colvin, my employer, was planning to misappropriate certain bonds and leave for Europe, thereby robbing the people who had trusted him. I couldn't go to the police, because I had no definite proof, so I decided to take the securities and put them out of his reach."

She paused, and then went on in a low but distracted tone.

"I sent them to Uncle Jean with instructions to keep them for me. Then I notified the stockholders regarding my suspicions, and told them everything would be all right. Oh, maybe I didn't go about things the right way, but then I was pressed for time. The night I took the bonds I felt certain that Enos Colvin was practically ready to make a get-away. During the afternoon I'd heard him telephoning to arrange for a berth on the New York train which left Milwaukee at midnight—"

It was at this point that Brad cut in on her.

"Say, wait a minute," he jerked. "I was here when your uncle received those bonds. In fact, I brought them out to him from Bord du Lac. Leastways, I imagine it was the bonds I delivered, though, come to think of it, neither of us paid much attention to them. Anyhow, there was a letter from you that mentioned they were valuable."

"Yes," Caryl rejoined. "That's right. Those papers were the securities I'm talking about. Then perhaps you know where Uncle Jean put them, Brad."

The sergeant shook his head.

"No, I don't, honey," he answered. "They were still on the table when I left."

"In that case, they've been stolen," Caryl groaned. "Those bonds were negotiable, Brad, and the man who killed Uncle Jean must have realised that he could cash in on them, whoever he was. Oh, Brad, they must have been stolen, for I've searched everywhere and there isn't a trace of them."

"Maybe Jean had a secret cache of some description," Brad volunteered, but the suggestion failed to raise Caryl's hopes.

Cursing, the American tugged viciously at the gun in his efforts to wrench it away from the old fellow and get the drop on him.

"If he did," she said, "he never told me anything about it. No, Brad, the securities have gone, and I'm in a jam. The stockholders will think I stole them, and that I tried to play for time by libelling Colvin. And Colvin himself—he's turned prosecutor. He must have guessed that I had something to do with the disappearance of the bonds, for it's obvious that he's instituted these proceedings against me."

Brad's eyes were half-closed, and he was thinking hard.

"Could it have been this man Colvin," he breathed, "who came here and shot Jean?"

"But that's impossible, Brad," Caryl argued. "True, he was away from Milwaukee for a few days, but according to this dispatch he's back there now. And if he'd got the bonds he wouldn't have returned, would he? He'd have gone right ahead with his original plan of leaving for Europe. Besides, he didn't even know I had an uncle."

Once more she paused, and then she shrugged her shoulders helplessly and discolorately.

"Well," she said, "I—I guess I'm your prisoner, Brad dear. That's all there is to it."

"No," he muttered—"no. Not mine, honey. I can't take you in—I can't do it. I'll send O'Brien out for you, and should you decide to face the music it will be his job to take you into custody. If you decide otherwise—"

He did not finish the sentence, but, gathering her in his arms, held her close to him for a moment. Then he drew back, and, turning sharply, walked with uncertain steps from the cabin.

Reduced to the Ranks

ATALL, lean individual with a stern countenance and the air of a disciplinarian, Inspector Bradshaw was pacing the floor of Sergeant Sheridan's office in an impatient and irritable fashion.

Occasionally he glanced disinterestedly at the bandaged form of Rinty, who was still occupying the basket that had been placed in the room. But more frequently his eyes travelled to Brad Sheridan, who was standing nearby and who looked the picture of unhappiness.

"Inexcusable," the inspector said at length, halting in front of Brad. "Inexcusable, Sergeant Sheridan. As a man, I commend the frankness with which you have described the reasons for your conduct. But as an officer of the force, I deplore that conduct. Your plain duty was to get that girl and apprehend her, regardless of what she may mean to you. And I'm not at all sure that I'll overlook this breach of the regulations, even if O'Brien—"

He stopped short, for at that juncture there was a clatter of hoofs outside the post, and a few seconds later Jim O'Brien stepped into the office and saluted the inspector smartly.

"Well?" Bradshaw asked. "Where's your prisoner?"

"She wasn't there, inspector," the constable replied with an uncomfortable glance in Brad's direction. "I found this note pinned to the door. It's for Sergeant Sheridan."

With an angry imprecation the senior officer motioned him towards Brad, and the message was handed to the latter, who scanned it gloomily.

"Well, Sheridan?" the inspector demanded as Brad remained silent after perusing it. "Do you mind letting us know what it says?"

January 23rd, 1937.

The younger man read it aloud.

"'Forgive me, Brad,'" he quoted. "'I'm not staying to face the music. I may give myself up later, if I finally decide that it is the best course to take. In any case, I am innocent, and I want to figure out the best way to prove it.'"

"'CARYL.'"

He laid aside the note and eyed his superior officer steadfastly.

"That's all, sir," he said. "But I'd like to add that I believe in her innocence."

The inspector gave vent to an angry exclamation.

"Your opinion has no bearing on the case," he snapped. "The point is, you have failed in your duty, and your affection for the girl in question is no excuse. Personal feelings should not influence an officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Sheridan, and this prisoner should have been brought back to the post and placed under lock and key without delay."

"I know, sir," Brad murmured. "I'm—sorry."

"Regrets do not uphold the tradition of the service," was the terse rejoinder, "and I have no option but to reduce you to the ranks, Sheridan, until such time as you can vindicate yourself. Indeed, it is only your splendid record in the past that prevents me from recommending your dismissal. Or would you prefer to resign?"

Brad had gone white. It was clear the loss of his stripes had come as a blow to him, though it was one that he had expected. At the same time he was not prepared to withdraw from the force.

"Until the murderer of Jean Foray is brought to justice, sir," he told the inspector, "I do not care to resign."

"Very well, Sheridan. Er—Constable O'Brien, you will act as officer in command of this post till further orders."

O'Brien saluted the inspector again, though he could not refrain from directing a look of sympathy at Brad, who was now engaged in removing the chevrons from the sleeves of his tunic.

Having detached the chevrons, Brad placed them on the table, and after a brief silence the inspector addressed Constable O'Brien again.

"On the strength of the answer I received to my dispatch," he said, "I wired Mr. Colvin, who brought the charge against the Foray girl, and told him that she had been taken into custody. I also sent a wire to the Milwaukee Police Department, notifying them that the prisoner would be handed over to them at the Border."

He paused, biting his lip, and then went on in an embittered tone.

"Now Colvin and the Milwaukee Police will have to be advised that the Royal Canadian Mounted have failed, and I think you may as well attend to the matter from this office."

"Very good, sir," O'Brien replied. "I'll communicate with the Milwaukee Police Department at once. As to Mr. Colvin, sir, I shall have to have his address."

The inspector produced a letter from a pocket in his tunic.

"I had a note from him only this morning," he said, "urging me somewhat unnecessarily to do all I could to apprehend the Foray girl. Here, take it. You will find his address on it."

He leaned forward to give O'Brien the missive, and in doing so his hand passed close to the basket which Rinty occupied; and on a sudden a change came over the wolfhound, a change that took the three men in the room by complete surprise.

Lifting his head with a start, the dog bared his teeth unexpectedly and made a furious snatch which was apparently intended for Bradshaw's fingers, the inspector jerking away from him only in the nick of time.

"Here, whose savage beast is this?" the officer rasped. "What's he doing here, anyway?"

It was O'Brien who answered him.

"He belongs to Caryl Foray, sir," he informed Bradshaw. "He was wounded, we think, by the man who shot her uncle."

"Yes? Well, take him out and destroy him."

Brad Sheridan started forward at that, a look of distress on his handsome face.

"Sir, I don't think he meant any harm," he protested. "I'm sure it was an accident. You probably scared him for the moment by coming so close—"

"Nonsense!" the inspector interrupted. "He deliberately snapped at my hand!"

"If you ask me, sir," O'Brien put in, "I'd say 'twas the letter he snapped at."

Bradshaw came out with an expletive.

"Rubbish, O'Brien! The dog is dangerous. Sheridan, take him out and destroy him at once. That's an order."

"But, sir—"

"You heard what I said, Sheridan. In any case, he appears to be badly wounded, and death would probably spare him a good deal of suffering. Now let's have no more argument."

The finality in his tone told Brad and O'Brien that it was useless to raise any further expostulations, and with his teeth hard-clenched the former lifted Rinty out of the basket and bore him from the room, looking like a man who had been commanded to execute his dearest friend.

As for the inspector, he remained for a minute or two with O'Brien, discussing the telegrams that were to be dispatched to Colvin and the Milwaukee Police Department, and then at length he made his way from the office.

O'Brien accompanied him to where a couple of troopers from headquarters were waiting—two men who had expected to act as escort for the inspector and Caryl Foray.

"Well, O'Brien," the commanding officer said, "I want you to institute a search for that girl, and I'll see that all other patrols are ordered to keep a lookout for her. If you should pick her up, you'll let me know immediately."

With that he turned towards his horse, and he was climbing into the saddle when he heard the smash of a shot somewhere in the brushwood behind the police post.

It was the blast of Brad Sheridan's gun, and, if the inspector's countenance was a mask of impassivity, Constable O'Brien could not help wincing as he thought of the drastic fate that had been meted out to the dog Rinty.

The Bonds

LITTLE did O'Brien and the inspector know it, but the shot from Brad Sheridan's gun had flashed harmlessly into space, the weapon having been levelled at the sky as the stalwart Mountie had pulled the trigger.

For the second time in the lapse of a few hours Brad had disobeyed his superior's orders, and at the very moment when the inspector and his escort were turning to ride from the post the ex-sergeant was lifting Rinty in his powerful arms and wheeling round in the direction of the forest.

"I'd as soon kill a human being as you, old boy," Brad said to the dog. "But you're in disgrace the same as me, and I reckon you'll have to hide out for a spell."

Setting out at a brisk pace, he carried Rinty into the woods, and he had covered a distance of something like three quarters of a mile when he arrived at a solitary shack which belonged to a half-breed Indian trapper answering to the name of Joe.

The half-breed was a close friend of Brad, and one whom the Mountie knew he could trust. Therefore, the big fellow had no hesitation in looking in on the man, and, after explaining the difficulty in which he had been placed, he asked him if he could board Rinty at his cabin.

"I'll see that you're not out of pocket, Joe," he added. "You can have a dollar a week for your trouble, and I'll bring grub for him every day."

A thick-set man with the bronzed complexion and the sloe eyes of his forefathers, Indian Joe nodded his assent.

"Me take care of Rinty like he was papoose," he declared. "And I bet you no one see him while he is here."

"That's the ticket, Joe," Brad rejoined. "I knew you wouldn't fail me."

Thus Rinty was left in good hands, and during the days that followed Brad made a point of visiting the trapper's cabin at regular intervals, always bringing with him some tit-bits in the way of food.

Then one morning, about a week later, O'Brien accosted Brad in the office at the post as the former sergeant was preparing to set out on his daily rounds.

"Say, what have you got there, pardner?" O'Brien inquired, glancing at a package which his comrade was thrusting into his pocket.

"Oh, just some sandwiches," was the reply. "I might get hungry on patrol."

O'Brien eyed him quizzically.

"You seem to be quite fond of snacks just lately," he commented. "By the way, how's Rinty coming along?"

Brad gave a start, and then looked at the other man in a sheepish fashion.

"So you know, huh?" he murmured.

"Well, I happened to be passing Indian Joe's shack a couple of days ago," Jim O'Brien answered, "and I heard a dog barking. Then I remembered this sudden fancy you'd developed for taking along a snack with you whenever you went out on patrol, and I put two and two together. But don't worry, Brad. As far as I'm concerned, Rinty was shot according to the inspector's instructions."

The bigger fellow clasped him by the hand.

"Thanks, Jim," he said. "I—I just couldn't plug him. Besides, I think Rinty may hold the key to the solution of Jean Foray's murder. This last week I've been turning things over in my mind, and I have a theory—a theory that was suggested to me by you, Jim."

"By me?" echoed O'Brien.

"Yes. You remember when Rinty snapped at Bradshaw you put forward the opinion that it was Colvin's letter he had gone for, and not the inspector's hand at all?"

"Sure, that's right. It did look like that to me. But I don't see—"

"Jim," Brad interrupted, "Rinty has the keenest scent of any dog I know. And to my mind he snapped at that letter because he connected it with something unpleasant that had happened to him."

O'Brien stared at him open-mouthed, realising now the significance of his comrade's statements.

"You mean—Colvin may have had something to do with old Jean's murder, Brad?" he stammered. "But that isn't possible. How could a man away down in the States be mixed up in a crime that took place near Bord du Lac?"

Brad took a step closer to him and spoke to him in an earnest tone.

"Jim," he said, "I told you Caryl's story after I came back that morning without arresting her. But maybe I forgot to mention that Enos Colvin had been away from Milwaukee for a few days—round about the time of the killing. Not that Caryl suspected him of the murder. She assured me that Colvin didn't even know she had an uncle. Nevertheless, he may have found that out in some way—may even have discovered that Caryl had posted the bonds to Jean."

O'Brien pursed his lips.

"I get you, Brad," he muttered. "If Caryl was right about Colvin trying to rob the stockholders, he'd naturally sneak up here in the hope of recovering the securities."

"But he didn't recover them, Jim, otherwise he wouldn't have gone back to Milwaukee and started proceedings against Caryl. Which means that the securities are probably hidden somewhere in Jean's cabin."

"H'm," O'Brien reflected. "there's a good deal of supposition about your theory, Brad. But what do you intend to do, anyway?"

"I'm going out to Jean's cabin to make a further search," was the answer. "Meantime, I'd like you to send a wire to headquarters, stating that in connection with the Foray murder we'd appreciate any information regarding the movements of Enos Colvin on the fifteenth of April, the date of the crime. Bradshaw may be able to check up on him through the U.S. authorities."

O'Brien agreed to dispatch a telegram at once, and then on an afterthought Brad asked him if he would mind handing over the letter from Colvin which had been left at the office by the inspector.

That letter having been tendered, Brad

"Poor Uncle Jean," she faltered. "Do you—do you know who killed him?"

set off on horseback from the post. But instead of making his way direct to the cabin of the late Jean Foray he headed for Indian Joe's shack, where he was welcomed by the kind trapper and the faithful Rinty, now almost recovered from his wound.

"How are you, old fellow?" said Brad, bending down to caress the wolfhound. "Pretty good, huh?"

"Pretty good is right," Indian Joe put in. "Him nearly as good as new."

Brad nodded appreciatively. "You've looked after him well," he told the man, "and I won't forget you for it. You know, Joe, I've got an idea that this dog may put a gallows' rope around the man who killed his master."

"So?" the trapper murmured.

Without another word Brad took a letter from his pocket, a letter that had been written to him from a friend in the north, and leaning forward he held it close to the wolfhound's nose.

Rinty sniffed at it, but showed no particular interest.

"That doesn't seem to mean much to him, does it?" Brad remarked. "But what about this one?"

He produced Colvin's letter, and went through the same performance with it, and as soon as he caught the scent of the missive Rinty backed away with his teeth bared in a snarl.

"That is funny," said Indian Joe, who had been watching curiously. "Why he no' like that one?"

"That's just what I mean to find out, Joe," Brad stated. "Rinty, old boy, you and I are going to drop in at old Jean's cabin together, and we'll make a start just as soon as you've had a bite to eat."

He brought out the sandwiches that he had fetched, and the dog consumed them with healthy appetite. Then, telling Joe that he would return with Rinty in due course, Brad opened the door and let the wolfhound scamper forth into the sunlight.

The Mountie followed the animal across the threshold, and a few seconds later he had swung himself astride his horse and was cantering in a westerly direction through the woods, Rinty trotting joyously alongside him.

Within an hour they were in the vicinity of the late Jean Foray's homestead, and as they drew nearer to it Rinty's tail drooped noticeably. They were still some fifty paces from the dwelling, however, when the drumming of hoofs arrested Brad's attention.

"Rinty," he said, "someone's coming this way, and you'd better duck out of sight. I don't want everybody around Bord du Lac to know that you're still alive, or it might get to Bradshaw's ears. Go on now, beat it."

The dog seemed loath to leave him, but he managed to hustle him into the shelter of some bushes nearby, and a moment or two later he had good reason to feel thankful that he had done so, for all at once a couple of horsemen spurred into view; and with a start Brad recognised the foremost rider as Inspector Bradshaw.

The inspector was accompanied by O'Brien, and presently the two men were drawing rein beside the former sergeant.

"I want to have a word with you, Sheridan," the inspector announced. "I happened to look in at Bord du Lac this morning, and O'Brien mentioned that he'd just sent off a telegram to me—at your suggestion."

"That's right, sir," Brad told him respectfully.

"A telegram requesting information in connection with Enos Colvin's movements on April fifteenth," the inspector continued. "Now I ask you, Sheridan, January 23rd, 1937.

how could Colvin be implicated in the Foray murder? I know he is interested in these missing securities, but he wouldn't have to kill a man in order to get them back. Confound it, they belonged to him."

Brad shook his head.

"They were taken from the safe," he acknowledged, "but they didn't belong to him, sir. They belonged to his clients, and, according to Caryl Foray, he was planning to make a getaway with the bonds."

"According to Caryl Foray!" his superior officer retorted derisively.

"Well, sir," Brad replied in a quiet tone, "I'd like to run down every possible clue, if it's all the same to you."

The inspector eyed him thoughtfully for a few seconds, and then shrugged his shoulders.

"Very well," he said. "You can proceed along your own lines of investigation, and I'll see if I can obtain any information in regard to Colvin. But I'm afraid that you're barking up the wrong tree, nevertheless."

With that he wheeled around, and, accompanied by O'Brien, he rode off down the trail that led back to the post; and when the two of them had disappeared from view Brad summoned Rinty from the shrubs amidst which the dog had gone to cover.

"It's all right, boy," the Mountie declared, as the wolfhound came out into the open. "The coast's clear again."

He moved on towards old Jean's cabin, calling upon Rinty to follow him, and a little while afterwards man and dog were standing in the room where the aged French-Canadian had died.

As on a previous occasion, Brad began to search the dwelling carefully, hoping to find some fresh evidence apart from the coat-button that he had picked up on the day the crime had been committed. But his quest was fruitless, for he made no new discovery, and at length he turned to the wolfhound which had entered the homestead with him.

"Well, Rinty, I've done my best," he said, "and now it's up to you. Gee, if only you could talk—for I know you could tell me plenty."

He paused, and then reached for a letter that was lying on the table. It was the very letter that had been enclosed with the securities Caryl had posted to her uncle, and, taking it between his thumb and forefinger, Brad held it close to Rinty's nose.

"Now, if you could talk, old son," he mused, "you might be able to describe all that happened here after Jean took charge of those bonds. Still, seeing that conversation isn't one of your talents, we'd better concentrate on your other qualities. So how about it, boy? Go to it and see if your sharp nose can find any clue that I've overlooked."

Thus spoke Brad—while Rinty, sniffing at Caryl's letter, gazed up at him intelligently. Then the police-officer attempted to impress on the dog that he wanted him to play the sleuth, and, whether the wolfhound understood or not, the fact remained that he suddenly turned tail and trotted away from the table.

Watching him, Brad saw him pad across to the fireplace, and an instant later the animal was raising himself on his hind legs to scrape at the stonework there.

With a frown the trooper walked over to the hearth, and even as he reached Rinty's side the creature dislodged a stone that fell clattering to the floor and revealed old Jean's secret cache.

"Hallo!" Brad exclaimed tersely. "What's this?"

He thrust his hand into the cavity that the dog had laid bare, and the first object that he withdrew was a small canvas bag containing a hundred dollars in coin, the life's savings of the aged backwoodsman who had been murdered. Then he withdrew a batch of papers held together by a rubber band, and one glance at them told him they were the documents Caryl had sent.

"The missing securities," he breathed.

For a spell he stood staring at them, and was only aroused from his thoughts by a snarl that was uttered by Rinty, whereupon he looked down to see that the dog was baring his teeth at the packet of negotiable bonds.

"Okay, Rinty," Brad said in a tone of comprehension. "I get it. You can smell the scent of Colvin on these papers, too, huh? Well, he handled them all right, I guess—before Caryl took them from his office safe and put them in the mail."

He paused, and then swung round in the direction of the door.

"So much for the securities," he grunted. "Their recovery may help to prove that Caryl was on the level, anyway. Come on, Rinty, we'll take them back to the post."

A premature darkness was gathering in the sky as Brad and the dog left the cabin. It was a darkness that heralded an approaching storm, which broke when they were still a mile or two from Bord du Lac, and a howling gale was sweeping sheets of rain across the north woods as the Mountie pulled up outside Indian Joe's shack.

Here he turned Rinty over to the care of the trapper again, after which he proceeded to the post, and on entering the office there he found Inspector Bradshaw in the room with Constable O'Brien.

The inspector had decided to delay his departure for headquarters when he had seen the storm gathering, and now he looked at Brad inquiringly.

"Anything to report, Sheridan?" he asked. "You seem excited."

"I've got the bonds, sir," the ex-sergeant answered. "Rin—I mean, I found a cache in the fireplace—and—well, here they are."

He laid the securities in front of the inspector, who examined them cursorily and then glanced up with satisfaction.

"Good, Sheridan," Bradshaw said. "O'Brien, you'd better send a couple of telegrams right away—one to the Police Department in Milwaukee, and one to Enos Colvin—notifying them that the missing bonds are at this office."

Jim O'Brien hurried from the room, and when he had gone the inspector fixed his attention on Brad once more.

"Colvin will probably come up for these securities personally," he remarked. "I think I'll remain here at Bord du Lac and hand them over to him myself."

"Yes, sir," Brad murmured. "And by the way, sir, I guess things won't look so black against Caryl Foray now, will they?"

The older man knitted his brows.

"I don't know about that," he said, "I don't see that the recovery of the bonds proves she didn't intend to dispose of them for her own profit. Anyhow, you may be interested to know that Caryl Foray is now in the hands of the Milwaukee police."

"She is?" Brad jerked.

"Yes. A message to that effect was wired through to this office from headquarters less than half an hour ago. She apparently gave herself up, still maintaining that she had acted in the interests of Colvin's clients."

There was a silence a silence that was only broken when Constable O'Brien put in an appearance again.

"I sent off the telegram to Colvin, sir," the trooper reported, "but the one to the Milwaukee Police Department will have to be held over."

"Held over? What do you mean?"

"The storm, sir. They must be having it worse than us down South. The line suddenly went dead, and the operator figures that all the wires between us and the Border are probably down."

Inspector Bradshaw compressed his lips.

"That's awkward," he said. "Over a territory like this it will probably take days to repair the damage. As regards the Police Department at Milwaukee, however, I daresay Colvin will let them know about the securities."

Northward Bound

IT was evening in Milwaukee, and about the time that the workers of the city were pouring out on to the sidewalks, a police car entered the thoroughfare known as Michigan Avenue and drew up outside the building in which the offices of the Colvin Investment Company were situated.

A man and a girl alighted from that automobile. The girl, small and chic, was Caryl Foray. The man, a shrewd-looking individual of medium height and build, was Captain Edwards of the Milwaukee Police Department.

"Well, Miss Foray," Edwards was saying, "if we find our man here the Law is going to be indebted to you for the apprehension of a dangerous crook, if nothing else. In any case, I don't think there's much chance of your being convicted of embezzlement now—though it's a pity those bonds were lost."

"You mean—if they were recovered I'd be absolutely cleared?" Caryl asked as they crossed the pavement and entered the building outside which the car had been brought to a standstill.

Edwards nodded, and then, in the elevator that carried them towards one of the upper floors of the premises, the girl spoke to her companion again.

"You still haven't told me how you managed to check up on my story, captain," she observed. "Naturally, I felt that you would be able to check up on it, otherwise I don't think I'd have had the courage to give myself up. But I'd like to know the methods you adopted."

"Well, we checked up on Colvin," Edwards rejoined. "That's about the hang of it. And we not only found that he'd been making arrangements to sell the bonds in New York and take the first boat to Europe, but we also discovered that he'd been convicted of a similar offence in San Francisco four years ago."

The lift stopped at the thirteenth floor, which was their destination, and emerging from it they hastened along a corridor till they reached a door inscribed with the legend "Colvin Investment Company."

Caryl opened that door, and she and the captain entered the office in which Enos Colvin had employed her as secretary. But the instant they crossed the threshold they realised that the crooked financier had departed—and departed in haste, it seemed, for the floor was littered with papers, and the whole room presented a spectacle suggesting that he had ransacked the place to gather up any important documents which he did not care to leave behind.

"Looks like the bird has flown the coop," Edwards ground out.

"Maybe he suspected that you were making inquiries about him," Caryl suggested.

The police captain did not answer her at once, but stooped to pick up a telegram that had caught his eye. Then, after scanning the missive, he read it aloud to Caryl.

"Listen to this," he said. "Stolen securities recovered. Holding them for your instructions. Canadian Mounted Police Post, Bord du Lac' Now, why the dickens didn't they notify me as well?"

The girl laid a hand on his arm.

"Colvin's left for Bord du Lac. He's gone up there to get those bonds. I know he has. Listen, I'll phone his garage and see if his car's still there."

She made for the telephone, and put through a call, dialing the number of a garage which she knew that the financier patronised; and within a few seconds she heard a man's voice.

"Is Mr. Colvin's car there?" she queried.

"No," came the reply. "He left a few hours ago."

"Did he say where he was going?" Caryl wanted to know.

"He didn't, ma'm. But he settled up his account here, and mentioned he was leaving town."

Caryl replaced the receiver and turned to Captain Edwards.

"Left some hours ago," she announced laconically. "He's probably over the Border by now."

"I doubt it. The Border's a long way off from here. At any rate, he won't get away with those securities. I'll wire Bord du Lac and request them to hold him for extradition—and I'll use his 'phone to do it."

He picked up the receiver with the intention of telephoning a message which could be dispatched immediately by the postal authorities, but after a brief conversation he hung up and turned to Caryl.

"There's been a heavy storm in the North," he said. "Hundreds of wires are down all over the Border country. They say it's impossible to get through either by telegraph or by phone, and communication may be disorganised for days."

"Then what are we going to do?" the girl demanded anxiously. "We've got to prevent Colvin from obtaining those bonds."

Edwards started for the door.

"There's only one thing to do," he jerked. "He's got a long start, but a lot can happen in the space of a few hundred miles. We're going after him."

The Tell-tale Jacket

TRUE to his word, Inspector Bradshaw had remained at Bord du Lac in anticipation of a visit from Colvin, but the wire that had been dispatched to the financier was two and a half days' old when a car pulled up near the Mounted Police Post and a man in breeches, sports shirt and field-boots emerged from it.

The man was Enos Colvin, and he accosted Trooper O'Brien, who was loitering near by.

"I believe you have some securities for me here," the American said. "My

"You shot Jean Foray!" Brad accused. "Come on, talk! You shot Jean Foray, Colvin, didn't you?"

name is Colvin, of the Colvin Investment Company, Milwaukee."

"Oh, yes, Mr. Colvin," O'Brien replied, looking at him curiously. "Inspector Bradshaw is expecting you. You'll find him in the office."

He pointed off to the right, and Colvin strode in the direction indicated. A moment later he was tapping at the office door, and on receiving a summons to enter, he stepped into the room to confront two men there, one being Bradshaw and the other Constable Gary.

The crooked financier addressed himself to the elder of the two police officers.

"I was told I'd find Inspector Bradshaw here," he stated. "I am Enos Colvin."

Bradshaw stood up at once. "At your service, Mr. Colvin," he said. "You've come for those securities, of course."

The American inclined his head, and an expression of greed and anticipation dawned in his eyes as he watched the inspector open a drawer in the desk at which he had been seated.

From that drawer Bradshaw took out the bonds, but he did not pass them over to Colvin at once.

"You know," the inspector remarked, "it was very peculiar how we found these. They were hidden in a secret cache in Jean Foray's cabin—"

"Yes," Colvin interrupted, "but never mind the details. I'm exceedingly glad you located them, but I'm anxious to—er—to get back to Milwaukee. As a matter of fact, I'd have been here hours ago, but my car broke down on the way."

He held out his hand for the sheaf of securities, but still Bradshaw did not tender them.

"I'm sorry to take up your time with formalities, Mr. Colvin," he said. "But these bonds appear to be worth several hundred thousand dollars, and naturally, I have to take precautions. Er—you have proof of your identity, of course."

The American had no difficulty in convincing the inspector beyond all doubt that he was the president of the Colvin Investment Company, for he was able to produce ample evidence to that effect. Then, having received the securities, he proceeded to stuff them into his hip-pocket.

Bradshaw eyed him whimsically. "Don't you want to look over those bonds to make sure that they're all there?" he suggested.

"Oh, no," Colvin answered with a smile. "I'm sure they're all here, for I imagine I can trust the Mounted. anyhow, I'll have to check them when I get back to my—er—my office."

He paused, and then, extending his hand:

"Well, I'll have to be moving along, inspector," he said. "Thanks a lot for what you've done, and—"

"Just a minute, Mr. Colvin," Bradshaw interposed. "I'm afraid I must make out a report, and you'll have to sign a receipt. I regret having to delay you in this manner, but it's a question of rules and regulations, you know."

Enos Colvin did his best to conceal his impatience, though it was all too clear that he was anxious to be off.

"I understand," he muttered, and sat down in a chair as the inspector reached for pen and paper.

It was while the inspector was writing out his report and drafting a receipt which would require Colvin's signature that the clapping of hoofs proclaimed the arrival of a horseman at the post—a horseman who was none other than Constable Brad Sheridan, just coming in from patrol.

Pulling up at the hitch-rail, Brad dismounted from his horse and tethered the animal. Then he strolled across to where Constable O'Brien was interestedly examining Enos Colvin's automobile.

"Hallo, Brad!" Jim O'Brien greeted. "Anything to report?"

"Nope!" was the reply. "Most of the wires are still down, to the south of here. Huh, to look at the weather now you'd never think there could be a storm like that twister we had. It's like summer, isn't it?"

"Sure is," O'Brien rejoined. "Plumb hot, if you ask me."

He hesitated, and then, after glancing around surreptitiously, he leaned closer to Brad.

"Are you still exercising Rinty by taking him out on patrol with you?" he asked.

"Yes," the bigger fellow told him. "He's been with me all morning. Right now he's over there in the thickets. I left him there with orders not to move, and he'll stay where he is all right. I'll smuggle him over to Indian Joe's shack later."

He glanced at the car which O'Brien had been studying when he had approached.

"Say, who does this belong to, Jim?" he inquired. "Smart-lookin' outfit, isn't it?"

"Yeah," the other Mountie answered. "It's Enos Colvin's car."

Brad started, and gave a swift glance at his companion.

"Colvin's!" he reiterated. "So he's finally got here?"

O'Brien nodded, and all at once Brad moved round to the front of the car and bent down to examine its tyres. Then he straightened up slowly.

"Jim," he said, speaking through clenched teeth, "the tread on these tyres corresponds with the tracks I saw on the south trail near Jean Foray's cabin—the day the old fellow was murdered."

"They do?"

O'Brien was impressed for the moment, but soon cast doubts on the importance of Brad's discovery.

"H'm, looks kind of suspicious, I admit," he granted, "but after all it's no proof. I don't suppose Colvin's is the only car that's shod with tyres of that description."

Brad had joined him at the side of the automobile again.

"Maybe not, Jim," he declared. "But the fact remains—"

And then he stopped, for suddenly his eyes had come to rest on a woollen jacket that was lying on the front seat of the vehicle—a jacket which Colvin had apparently discarded on account of the unusual warmth in the air.

It was a jacket that was equipped with ornamental buttons of a distinctive pattern, and, giving vent to an exclamation, Brad reached into the car and snatched it up. Then he withdrew from a pocket in his tunic the button that he had discovered in Jean Foray's home-stead, on the evening when he had found the old French-Canadian's dead body lying in the front room.

He compared it with the buttons on Colvin's jacket, and it tallied. Moreover, one of the buttons was missing from the woollen garment.

"Maybe the tread of the tyres doesn't prove anything, Jim," Brad told O'Brien grimly. "But here's something that does."

He was unaware of the fact, but at that very instant the door of the nearby office had opened and Enos Colvin had appeared on the threshold, having duly signed the receipt that Inspector Bradshaw had drafted out.

"Well, thanks again, inspector," Colvin drawled, looking back into the room. "I'm sorry I have to hurry off like this, but I've a long road in front of me."

"That's all right, Mr. Colvin!" came Bradshaw's answer. "But if you ever happen to be in these parts again, look me up, won't you?"

The American nodded, and then turned to withdraw from the office, and it was as he swung round that he saw Brad Sheridan and Jim O'Brien standing beside his car some little distance away, the former still holding the woollen jacket in his hands.

Enos Colvin drew down his brows, and across his fallow face there passed an expression of mingled annoyance and perplexity. But, since he had no idea as to the reason why his coat should be subjected to a scrutiny, it was annoyance that chiefly marred his countenance as he pushed open the door of the office again and summoned Bradshaw to the threshold.

"Inspector," he snapped, "will you kindly tell me the meaning of this?"

Followed by Constable Gary, Bradshaw moved over to the doorway, and with an angry gesture Colvin pointed to the two Mounties by his automobile.

"What's wrong, Mr. Colvin?" the inspector queried.

"That's what I'd like to know," the American retorted. "The jacket those fellows are looking at—it happens to be mine."

Leaving Colvin in the doorway, the inspector and Constable Gary walked across to Brad and O'Brien, and on reaching them the senior officer spoke with some austerity.

"What are you doing, Sheridan?" he demanded.

Brad wheeled, and answered him in a strong, clear voice that carried to the ears of the man in the office porch.

"Putting a rope around the neck of Jean Foray's murderer, sir!" he said.

"The tyre-tracks of this car correspond with those I saw near the cabin on the evening of the crime. And this button that I found near Jean's body also tallies with the buttons on this coat. I—"

He broke off, for at that moment the drone of an engine was heard, and ten seconds later a big, powerful auto swept into view; and as it pulled up alongside Colvin's sedan Caryl Foray scrambled out of it in company with Captain Edwards.

"Brad!" the girl cried. "Oh, Brad, are we in time? This is Captain Edwards of the Milwaukee police, and he has a warrant for Colvin's arrest on a charge of attempted embezzlement."

"Embezzlement!" Brad grated. "That's only a secondary charge. We've pinned your uncle's murder on him!"

Even as he spoke those words a shout arose from Constable O'Brien, and, whipping round, the group beside the two cars saw Enos Colvin astride Brad's horse—saw him dig his heels savagely into his flanks, sending him straight for the woods that surrounded the settlement.

The scoundrel had heard the denunciations that had been launched against him and had snatched at his only possible chance of escape, swinging clear of the road to make for the heart of the forest. Nor was there much doubt that he would have effected a getaway, for no automobile could have followed him along the route that he had in mind, and Brad's mount had been the only one which was ready saddled.

Moreover, the equality had taken the officers of the Law so completely by surprise that Colvin might have been well within the shelter of the trees ere

(Continued on page 27)

In the local bar, Captain Cutlet told an admiring audience of his sea adventures, but one day his bluff was called and for the first time he went to sea in command of a cargo ship, which was to be scuttled by the mate. A mutiny of fun, starring Will Hay

"WINDBAG the SAILOR"

Tall Stories

"TEN days out we ran into the worst storm I've ever known." The speaker sniffed and paused. "And, believe me, I've been in some storms in my time. That ship seemed to stand on her head. The waves were terrific, and the ship would roll down one of 'em almost like dropping into a mighty valley. When you got to the bottom it was like the sides of the valley closing in on you. Sometimes those waves didn't break, and the ship was tossed out like a cork, but other times tons of water crashed down on our decks and stove in the planks."

"And you lived to tell the tale?"

"Yes, I certainly did." Captain Ben Cutlet peered over the top of his pince-nez at the little group in the four-ale bar of the Crown and Anchor Inn at Falport. The fishermen of this little Cornish town often dropped in for a drink and 'yarn, and, though they were a ruffe doubtful of Captain Ben's tales of the sea, it helped to pass the time. "If my throat wasn't so dry"—Captain Ben sniffed as he inspected his empty glass—"I could go on swapping tales all night."

"Another round, Jerry!" sang out someone, and a queer old boy, very bent and wizened, with only one tooth in his head, bobbed up from behind the bar and grinned inanely. Jeremiah Harbottle may have looked a bit queer, but he wasn't half so daft as he looked.

The drinks were brought and handed round. Old Jerry scratched his head.

"Well, ain't that strange? One drink over—who could that be for?"

"You've swung that trick twice already this evening," sniffed Captain Ben. "Don't you try it when it comes to my turn."

"When!"

Someone coughed sarcastically.

Jeremiah went off, cackling triumphantly, and was about to consume his ill-gotten drink when into the bar parlour swept a big, broad-shouldered, grey-haired woman, Jerry's wife, Ben's sister, and the master of the Crown and Anchor. Jeremiah Harbottle took one look at her grim face, placed the drink down hurriedly and departed behind the counter.

Captain Ben Cutlet smirked at her, and she did not smile back.

"Did anyone smash a glass?" she asked.

"No, ma'am!" cried one of the fishermen. "It weren't us."

"I heard it." Mrs. Harbottle folded her arms. "I'll go and talk to Albert."

She retired from the parlour amidst sighs of relief. Her husband swigged the drink in case she should come back.

"Well, here's mud in yer eye!" Captain Ben raised his glass and winked at its contents. "Yes, boys, that was the very worst storm I was ever in. All the rivets came out, and we looked like foundering. According to the charts we were a hundred miles south of Valparaiso—"

"Santa Cruz!"

Captain Ben Cutlet turned sharply and glared at old Harbottle.

"Valparaiso!"

"Santa Cruz!" persisted Jeremiah.

"We were lying off Valparaiso."

"Panama," drawled a lazy voice, and a very large, round-faced boy appeared. He was leisurely wiping a glass.

"Don't you butt in, Albert!" rasped Ben. "It was Valparaiso."

"It was Panama!" cried Albert. "At any rate, it was Panama the last time you told this yarn."

Captain Ben Cutlet eyed the boy disapprovingly, coughed, drained his glass, inspected its emptiness, and looked all round hopefully. Suddenly his eye lighted on the clock, and he started.

"Albert's as bad as Jerry," he cried with a sly grin. "I've been in so many blame storms that at times I kinda get confused myself. But I know this happened at Valparaiso." He stared belligerently at the pot-boy. "It was a typhoon what we struck at Panama."

"But I thought typhoons—"

"You ain't here to think!" cried Cutlet. He cleared his throat with much noise. "Wonder if I've got time to tell you about the Nancy Lee. What a tragedy! What a queen among ships!" He coughed and picked up his glass. "Hoarse work talking."

"It's your turn, Jim." Old Jerry had bobbed back into the picture. "Same again, boys?"

"And make it snappy."

Ben shuddered as he gazed at the clock.

The drinks were produced, and, needless to say, Jerry had again drawn a half-pint too many. The reluctant Jim, the stander of the round, was toasted, and the assembly gazed expectantly at Captain Cutlet. Every inch a seaman. Served before the mast since he was a kid, worked his way up till he got a master's ticket. His seaman's reofer jacket, his serge trousers, his striped jersey, and his peaked cap suited the captain to perfection, though the pince-nez somehow didn't seem to fit the picture. Perhaps bad sight had caused the captain to take a spell ashore.

"The Mary Anne was—"

"The Nancy Lee," corrected Albert without a smile.

"The Nancy Lee was built afore the War, and—"

"You said she was a queen among ships, and if she were built before the War she must be an old tub," argued a fisherman.

"Ships what was built afore the War was made of the finest timber," shouted Ben Cutlet. "After the War ships was made of any old junk. A mint of money was spent on fitting her out, and if it hadn't been for them pesky pirates she would be afloat to-day."

"Chinese pirates," said Albert.

"Who's telling this story—you or me?" shouted Ben. "Those Chinese pirates attacked us in a large junk—"

"Junk—junk—nothing but junk."

"Albert, did you speak?"

"No, I was just thinking aloud."

"You keep quiet." Ben sipped his drink. "That junk had four decks, and every one of 'em was alive with pirates. We hadn't a chance, though we put up a good fight." He shook his head. "Brave men are often fools. Because we killed a couple of dirty Chinks, their leader, whose name was Chung Ho, the famous pirate, was so mad that he had the cap'n tortured and the mate thrown overboard to the sharks."

"Weren't you captain?"

"I got my mate's ticket as a result of what happened that day." Ben gave an emphatic nod. "By the time those pirates had finished with us there was only six of us living, and we were forced to navigate our own ship. At night we anchored, and the pirates strapped us to the mast."

"Why?" asked a bullet-headed half-wit.

"To keep the mast from falling down. Four days we were in this plight when we comes to the mouth of a wide river. For days we had been in sight of land, and this river curled amidst wild and desolate mountains. Not a soul in sight, but along the banks ran crowds of wild animals, snarling and roaring. They smelt blood. Our blood ran cold when we heard we were going to be put ashore the next day. It was my turn at the wheel, and I drove that ship straight for a jagged rock that was sticking up in the middle of the river. That rock cut through the plates like cheese. My five shipmates was strapped to the mast, whilst I did my turn at the wheel, and I cut them free with my knife."

"How did you get a knife, Ben?"

"I stole it and hid it in my clothing." Ben was ready with his answers. "The ship sank like a stone; before she slid to the bottom we made that rock, and saw the water boiling with sharks. It was a dreadful sight to behold, and I shall see it if I live to be a hundred. The dhow what was following behind—"

"The junk!"

Ben withered Albert with a glance.

"The junk was behind because we were towing it. The Chinks were half-asleep, and before they could hoist sail they ran into the bank. It was a fair treat to see those animals trying to get at them, and—"

Mrs. Jeremiah Harbottle sailed back into the bar.

"Look at the clock!" she pointed. "Ten minutes past closing-time. Do you want to get my house a bad name?"

January 23rd, 1927.

The fishermen scoffed their drinks and departed quickly, because the landlady had a sharp tongue. Jerry and Albert retired to wash glasses, whilst Captain Ben settled down before the fire.

"Why not tidy up the place?" snapped his sister. "You do nothing but sit around all day and loaf. Fine brother you are. Been here six months and still out of work. When Henry was alive he used to say you was the laziest—"

"Have a heart, Emma!" begged Ben. "This pub was nigh empty when first I come home from foreign parts, and look how I've made trade look up. In getting the Crown and Anchor a fine name in the district."

"A bad name, you good-for-nothing!" She tossed a letter on the table. "That's just come. Maybe it's that legacy you keep expecting."

Captain Ben Cutlet adjusted his glasses, opened the envelope, and took out the contents.

"Emma." He glanced round. "Here's someone who appreciates me. I said I was getting the Crown and Anchor known. Well, here's a lady what's heard all about me and my adventures at sea."

"Does she offer you a job?"

"She waits me to come and see her, as she reckons the world should know of the terrors and dangers through which I have passed."

"Stuff and nonsense!" snorted Mrs. Harbottle. "Who's the letter from?"

"Olivia Potter-Porter," answered Ben. "Seemed to have heard that name."

"Miss Potter-Porter lives up at the big house," said Emma. "A very wealthy woman, they do say. Owns a steamship company, or something. Go and see her, Ben Cutlet, and get her to give you a job. If she won't give you a ship, see if she'll let you do a bit of gardening."

"Gardening, Emma?"

"It's about all you're fit for." Emma Harbottle slapped a jug down on the counter. "And if she'd take you on the staff there would be one person who wouldn't weep." She wagged a fat hand at Ben. "I've had almost enough of you, Captain Ben Cutlet. And if you think you're anchored to the Crown for the rest of your life you're very much mistaken."

"Oh dear!" sniffed the captain as his sister strode out of the bar parlour. "I hope she isn't serious."

The Rob Roy Without a Captain

MISS OLIVIA POTTER-PORTER was a tall, pleasant, kindly woman, inclined to talk rather a lot and to imagine herself a very capable, intelligent person. She made a great fuss of the captain and listened eagerly to some of his stories—and she believed them. Believed him even when he got confused with Cape of Good Hope and Cape Horn, and stated how he was wrecked off the northern coast of Australia and nearly eaten alive by Zulus.

After tea she told the captain that for centuries her family had been associated with the sea, and that her grandfather's sea chest had been bequeathed her. Ben sniffed and looked vague when she opened the chest and produced a sextant, and got out of explaining it by saying that that type was not used these days, and hurriedly changed the subject to telescopes.

"My father owned a shipping line, and I'm part-owner now," she told him. "I've sold half my interest to a Mr. Yates—you must meet him one day. I expect, Captain Cutlet, you may have wondered why I wrote to you. Well, being so interested in the sea, I am a sort of patron to Falport's troop of Sea Scouts. They have a meeting to-morrow, and the mayor will be present. Captain Cutlet, I wish you would tell the dear boys some of your wonderful and thrilling experiences."

"Well—er—I—"

"I won't take 'no' for an answer," purred Miss Potter-Porter.

She was so fulsome in her praises of his heroism that finally Captain Cutlet agreed—after refreshment composed of very old liqueur whisky. He would be delighted.

Mr Yates sat in the office of the shipping line which was owned by Miss Potter-Porter and controlled by himself. A middle-aged man whose eyes were dark and shrewd. He was studying a report.

The Rob Roy was ten days late, and all this stuff about head winds and storms was all nonsense. His 'phone went, and a clerk informed him that Captain Shaddiek and the mate, Marriott, of the Rob Roy, were outside. He growled for them to be shown into his office at once.

"Well, Captain Shaddiek, late as usual," was his greeting, spoken viciously. "What excuse have you this time?"

The bearded captain eyed the owner quite frankly.

"Bad weather and a bad ship," he answered.

"I don't quite get you, Captain Shaddiek. Are you suggesting that anything is wrong with the Rob Roy?"

"You've said it," answered the captain. "I've had to nurse that ship to port. In the first bad storm she'll break up and go to pieces. She won't pass the Board of Trade survey in her present condition. She's due for survey on the twenty-third, according to Lloyd's regulations, and they'll condemn her."

"The Rob Roy is in splendid condition," raged Yates. "Just some more of your excuses for being late and missing some valuable cargo."

"I don't lie, Mr. Yates," coolly answered the captain. "There isn't a decent bearing in her engines—she's a coffin ship. Ask Mr. Marriott if you don't believe me."

The big unshaven man in the shabby clothes twisted his cap between dirty fingers.

"Well, I won't go so far as to say she's in the best of condition," he muttered. "I think she's sea-worthy."

"I have a cargo that must sail on the twentieth for the West Indies," said Yates. "Those are your orders, Captain Shaddiek."

"Not mine they're not." The captain shook his head. "I'm not taking the Rob Roy out as she is, not with bad weather expected this month. I'd take her out if the Board pass her on the twenty-third, but I got a wife and kids to think of, and the Rob Roy leaks like a barrel."

Yates became very angry, and so did the captain, and it ended by the owner saying that the captain was no longer on the pay-roll of the company. The captain said he wasn't changing his master's certificate to run a ship that ought to be condemned, and departed, but the mate remained.

"Marriott"—Yates looked keenly at the mate—"you and I have worked together before. I want your real opinion of the Rob Roy."

"Wouldn't pass the Board, even if they was all blindfolded," was the answer. "She's had her day, and the first bad weather will see her break up. What's more, Mr. Yates, she would cost a lot of money to refit—more than she's worth. But I'll take her out, sir, if you'll give me the chance. I've got me master's ticket."

"Well, it's a big responsibility—with your record, Marriott." Yates gave the man a keen glance. "But I'll discuss it with my partner. I'm expecting her this morning, so hang around."

Not many minutes after Marriott had gone out of the room Miss Potter-Porter was announced. With carefully selected words Yates explained that Captain Shaddick was no longer with the company. The captain had stated that he was too old for the job and wished to retire. Most awkward, as it was essential the Rob Roy should sail on the twentieth for the West Indies.

"The first mate's just asked for the captain's job," added Yates. "What do you think about it?"

"It's a bit of a risk, George."
"We might do worse. Marriott's been with us a long time—good captains are hard to find."

Miss Potter-Porter had a brain-wave. "I know a good captain," she cried. "Captain Ben Cutlet."

"Never heard of him," cried Yates. "He's a famous sea captain—he's had years of experience," enthused Olivia.

"Captain Cutlet is giving a talk to my Sea Scouts to-morrow—come up and meet him before we make a decision."

"All right," agreed Yates. "I'll leave it till to-morrow."

On the platform stood Captain Ben Cutlet, whilst seated behind were Miss Potter-Porter, dressed as a scout-mistress, the mayor, the band leader, and several important members of the council.

Captain Ben wore his best reefer jacket. He was going to tell these boys of the Seagull Patrol stories that would make their hair stand on end. The only fly in the ointment was young Albert. He would be a Sea Scout—a boy who had a habit of asking awkward questions.

"It was in the winter of ninety-four. I was in command of the Mother Machree. We were bowling along in a high wind—in fact, the wind was so high that the bottom sails weren't getting any wind at all, which caused the ship to be pushed over on her beam ends. So I gave orders to the crew to hoist the mainsails to the top of the mast, but, much to our annoyance, we found the braces had come undone and the sails were falling down—"

Among the audience were Yates and Marriott. Yates looked at the mate, who was gaping at the platform with his mouth open.

"What's he talking about?"
"Blowed if I know, sir."

"There we were—helpless in the China Sea—and bearing down on us was a large Chinese junk—full of pirates. It wasn't even a medium-sized junk—it was a very large junk. It was fully four hundred feet long, had four decks and five masts—" Captain Ben Cutlet paused for breath.

"I think this fellow's a bluff," whispered Yates in the mate's ear. "He's talking a lot of drivel."

Marriott nodded his agreement. "If you want my opinion, sir, he's never been to sea at all."

"Is that so?" Yates gave a grim chuckle. "Come outside, Marriott, I've just thought of something."

They turned at the doorway and glanced at each other understandingly. Young Albert had asked Captain Cutlet to demonstrate how to make the knot known as a "short sheep shank"—it was obvious that the captain did not know anything about knots, except a "granny."

"He'll bluff his way with that audience, though I expect some of the scouts may be very suspicious." Yates laughed as he leaned across a table in an outer room of the scouts' hall. "But he'll be just the man to take out the Rob Roy."

"But that cuts me out," cried Marriott. "And that mug don't—"

"Not so loud," cautioned Yates. "Listen—if anything happens to a ship the captain takes full responsibility, doesn't he? He has to answer all the questions. You wouldn't want that to happen to you, would you?"

"What do you mean?"

"Listen, and I'll tell you how you can clean up a nice sum of money." Yates looked round. "This is what I want you to do. First of all—" his voice died down to the merest whisper.

"It sounds okay to me," hoarsely cried Marriott, when Yates had unfolded his scheme.

"All we've got to do is to get him signed on."

Marriott fingered his scrubby chin. "That's where you're going to be up against it—if that old windbag is as big a liar as I think he is he wouldn't dare sign on."

"You're right." Yates sat back, and then a smile appeared. "I think I know a way to fix the captain."

One evening, two days later, Marriott appeared outside the Crown and Anchor. He looked at the time. Yates should be along with Miss Potter-Porter in about five minutes. He pushed open the swing doors and lurched into the parlour.

Captain Ben Cutlet was in full swing. He had had several drinks which he had put "down the hatch" and was enthralled everybody with a grand tale of smuggling.

Marriott ordered some ale and then went across to listen to Ben. Old Harbottle and Albert saw the start the big man gave when he saw Ben's face, and so did some of the audience "That junk had four decks and every deck was alive with pirates!" proclaimed Captain Ben.

Marriott put down his beer and slapped Ben on the shoulder.

"Well, if it isn't my old ship-mate, Captain Cutlet!"

"Eh?" gasped Ben.

"Don't you remember me—I'm Jim Marriott."

Ben Cutlet opened his mouth, blinked his eyes and then shook his head. "Jim Marriott—never heard the name."

"But I was your first mate on the Mother Machree," cried Marriott. "You ain't forgotten when we were chased by them pirates? You haven't forgotten that Chinese junk?"

"Oh—er—that junk!"

"There's a captain for you," Marriott appealed to the audience. "We were heading for Shanghai and bearing right down on us was a Chinese junk full of pirates armed to the teeth. What a junk, too—four decks and five masts."

Captain Ben Cutlet gave the big man a nervous glance.

"You've never told us that one, Ben," cackled an old boy.

"Haven't I?" Ben grinned sheepishly.

"It's only just come back to me."

"I could tell you tales about this fellow you'd never believe," cried Marriott in ringing tones.

At that precise moment Yates escorted Miss Olivia Potter-Porter into the bar parlour.

"Those were the good old days, weren't they, captain," Marriott gave Ben a resounding clap on the back. "Doesn't it make you long to be back at sea—to stand on your own bridge again with the wind blowing through your hair and the lives of every soul on board in the hollow of your hand?"

"Yes, yes, it does—it certainly does," Ben Cutlet was so swept off his feet by these stirring words that he was guilty of making a rash remark. "For two pins I'd pack up and go back to sea tomorrow."

"I'm very glad to hear you say that," it was Miss Potter-Porter.

"What?" The captain was aghast at the unexpected sight of the scout-mistress in the bar parlour.

"I'm glad you would like to go back to sea because that's just what I've come to see you about," Olivia indicated her dapper escort. "This is Mr. Yates, the managing director of the Green Star Line."

As in a dream, Captain Ben Cutlet heard Yates offering him the command of one of the company's ships. It was some while before he could collect his wits.

"It's a wonderful offer and—er—I appreciate it. If only I had myself to think of—I'd jump at it," Ben sniffed and peered over his pince-nez. "But if I went to sea again who'd look after the old Crown and Anchor?"

"We would!" boomed the heavy tones of Mrs. Harbottle.

Captain Ben Cutlet then told a harrowing tale of losing his instruments, charts and master's certificate when his ship, the Rose Marie, was holed by an iceberg.

Yates had to admit that it was a little awkward, and winked at Marriott.

"Begging your pardon, sir, but if I can be of any help to Captain Cutlet, I can vouch for him." His arm went round the captain's neck. "I've sailed under him on seven different voyages, haven't I, captain?"

"Er—er—um—was it that many?" stammered the confused captain.

"Aye, and I mind the Rose Marie," Marriott stared almost aggressively at Miss Potter-Porter. "The seas were thick that year with icebergs. Captain Cutlet was the last to leave his ship, lady."

"Well, George, that should be satisfactory," Miss Olivia turned to her partner. "What do you think?"

"Good enough for me," Yates stopped forward. "Captain Cutlet, I herewith appoint you to command the Rob Roy. You sail Thursday."

"But I—er—I—" Ben's words were drowned in the cheering.

It was old Harbottle who took advantage of the situation.

"Drinks all round on Captain Ben!" he piped.

What could Captain Ben Cutlet say or do? Nothing. Except grin sheepishly and wonder how he could avoid sailing on the Thursday and save his face.

"All Visitors Ashore"

MRS. HARBOTTLE was taking no chances about losing her unwelcome lodger, and with the assistance of her husband and Albert was packing up the belongings of Captain Ben Cutlet.

"I don't suppose he wants to take this with him," cried Mrs. Harbottle, and held out a photograph she had found. "Look!"

Jerry Harbottle and Albert saw a picture of Ben posed majestically on the deck of a canal barge with his hand on the tiller.

"If they saw that he wouldn't be captain of the Rob Roy very long," cackled old Harbottle.

"And that means we'd lose a good chance of getting rid of him," cried Mrs. Harbottle.

"Getting rid of who?" said a voice outside the door, and Mrs. Harbottle was just in time to pass the incriminating picture to Albert.

"You!" Mrs. Harbottle glowered at her brother.

"Who is?" sniffed Ben.

"We are!" it was old Jerry Harbottle.

"You are not."

"I say we are," Old Jerry's one tooth gleamed vindictively. "You're as good as gone now."

"He's right," Mrs. Harbottle swept past. "Thank heavens this is the last night you sleep under my roof."

"She's going to get a big surprise," cried Captain Cutlet, closing the door after her. "Because I'm not going."

"What!" shouted Harbottle and Albert.

"I'm not sailing."

"You've got to—you can't get out of it," cried Albert.

"Oh, yes I can. You've got to help me."

"Not me," Albert answered.

"Nor me," said Harbottle.

Captain Ben Cutlet held out his hands appealingly. "Are you going to stand by and see me make a fool of myself?"

"Why not?" viciously cried Albert. "We're used to it."

"You've got to go," shouted old Harbottle. "If you don't go all the village will know you're a fake."

"But, Jeremiah," hoarsely cried Ben. "You know I've never been to sea—what on earth could I do on a big ship like that? If I own up it isn't going to do the Crown and Anchor any good. You've got to help me."

"What d'you want us to do?" surlily asked Albert.

"I'll tell you," Ben was all smiles. "I go on board and just as we are about to sail you dash on to the bridge with a telegram. It's from my aunt in Glasgow to say she is dying."

"Is she?" asked Albert.

"No, I haven't got an aunt."

"Well, how can she send a telegram to say she's dying?"

"It's part of the scheme," Ben glared irately at Albert, whom he half suspected of pulling his leg. "I open the telegram and say, 'Stop—hold everything—I can't sail.'"

"Why not?" asked Harbottle.

"Because my aunt in Glasgow is dying and I've got to go to her."

"But you haven't got an aunt in Glasgow!" shouted Albert.

"I know I haven't," shouted Ben.

"The telegram's a fake. Because if my aunt is dying in Glasgow and wants to see me I can't sail, can I?"

"No," Albert understood at last.

"All you've got to do is to bring the telegram," Ben looked anxiously at the pot-boy. "You'll do that for me, won't you?"

"No, can't be done," Albert shook his fat head. "I've got to be with the Sea Scouts to see you off." He stabbed a thumb at the opened-mouthed Jeremiah Harbottle. "Let him do it."

"I'll do it, Ben," said old Harbottle.

"Right," Ben mopped his brow with relief. "Listen. I shall be up on the bridge, and when you hear me shout 'all visitors ashore' you dash up and hand me the telegram. Think you can do it?"

"Yes."

"Then let's try it," Ben moved to the chest of drawers. "Now, I'm on the bridge." He walked to the window and back, then shouted: "All visitors ashore!"

Jeremiah Harbottle ran forward.

"Telegram for you, sir."

Ben took an imaginary envelope and opened it.

"Good heavens," he cried. "It's from my aunt in Glasgow."

"Yes," lisped old Harbottle. "She's dead."

After a lot of rehearsing Harbottle at last understood what he was expected to do, and Ben Cutlet retired to bed to dream peacefully. Everything was settled and he was saved.

On the next day Captain Ben Cutlet was driven down the wooden pile pier to where a somewhat weather-beaten cargo vessel was anchored. Most of Falport were there to see Captain Cutlet take over his new command. He bowed to all and felt quite sorry that his glory could only be short-lived. He saw old Harbottle in the crowd, and gave a slight nod as the old boy half-opened his hand to show a pink envelope.

Yates was there to welcome him.

"Glad to see you, Captain Cutlet," He held out his hand. "The Rob Roy's all ready for you to take over the command. I've got picked men for your crew."

When Ben Cutlet saw the hard-boiled, unshaven, powerful and ugly men of the crew he felt very glad he was not going to sea. It was another nasty shock to find that Marriott was the first mate. It was an ordeal taking Miss Olivia Potter-Porter over the ship and trying to avoid answering her many questions. On the bridge Ben became so agitated when she asked him to explain how the engine-room telegraph worked that he clutched the siren-lanyard in his agitation.

Twice the whistle sounded, making Captain Ben Cutlet shiver at the shrill derision of the sound. He let go of the cord hurriedly. Up to the bridge came Yates. Close behind was the mate.

"Well, good-bye, captain, good luck."

"You're not going yet, are you?" stammered Ben.

"You gave the signal for all visitors ashore, didn't you?" cried the first mate.

"Did I?" gasped Ben, and then grinned. "How remarkable." He leaned over the side of the bridge. "All visitors ashore!" he bellowed.

"Good-bye, captain, and a pleasant voyage," cried Miss Potter-Porter.

"Same to you—er—er—thank you." He grinned foolishly, and seeing no sign of old Harbottle, yelled loudly, "All visitors ashore!"

But in spite of all his shouting Jeremiah Harbottle did not appear, and at last the mate, looking somewhat bewildered and suspicious, hastened forward to report that all visitors had been ashore some minutes. They were casting off.

"We're ready to sail."
"I'm not ready." Ben was in a panic. "Tell 'em to cast on again."
"But steam's up and the tide's right—shall I give the signal or will you?" gruffly shouted Marriott.

"We don't sail until I say so," yelled Ben Cutlet, and rushed to the side. "All visitors ashore!"

Marriott tapped him on the shoulder. "Don't you see we're drifting—will you give orders to cast off the stern ropes or shall I?"

"When I want them cast off I'll tell you!" shouted Ben, glancing this way and that. "Je—rry!" he yelled frantically.

"But we're turning right round—give orders to cast off," sang out the mate.

"Not until I'm ready."
"Very well." The mate gave Ben a violent push. "If you won't—I will."

Ben staggered back, and clutching for support put his hand on the engine-room telegraph, the ship gave a slight lurch and Ben swayed still clutching the telegraph. He pulled it over to "FULL STEAM AHEAD."

The people of Falport had a thrill that day because the town lost part of the quay. Ben's order at once tightened the rope, which was very strong, and the quay being early Victorian its woodwork collapsed. A watchman's hut and a nice slice of pier fell down. The Rob Roy put out to sea towing part of the pier with it.

Stowaways

CAPTAIN BEN CUTLET was on the bridge. He did not know much about it, as the Rob Roy was good at pitching and rolling, and the inside of the redoubtable captain was not behaving at all well. To say that the captain looked green was to put it mildly.

"Red light on the starboard bow, sir," sang out the look-out man.

"Well, stop the ship and wait till it turns to green," muttered Captain Ben.

Marriott, clad in oilskins and sou'wester, came up on to the bridge, and grinned at sight of his captain.

"Well, captain, how does it feel to be back at sea again? I bet this is stirring up old memories."

"It's stirring up a lot of things."
"Would you like me to take over now, skipper?"

"Would I—not 'arf!" Ben cried eagerly. "That is if you're quite sure you can manage without me till—er—tomorrow—er—sometime."

"That's all right, skipper," Marriott grinned, and clutched the swaying captain. "You go and turn in." He turned. "Hey! Hulbert!" A man came quickly to the bridge. "Take the captain to his cabin."

Captain Ben Cutlet was carried to his cabin across Hulbert's shoulder and dumped none too gently on the floor. He lay there for a few minutes, and then with a great effort got to his feet. He observed two curtained bunks, and decided to rest and let his head clear, when maybe he could think how to get off this ship. He swayed towards the bunk, clutched at the side, and then staggered back as a head appeared—a head with only one tooth.

"Telegram from Glasgow," cackled old Jeremiah.

"You! What are you doing here?" gasped Ben.

The old boy grinned and held out the telegram.

"Go on—open it!"
"What's the good of opening it now?" raved Ben.

"Well, you never know," said Jerry. "She might be better."

"You know I haven't an aunt, you old fool!" Ben shook with impotent rage. "Now, thanks to you, I'm six hours out to sea with a ship on my hands—I don't know where I am or where I'm going, and I feel as sick as a dog. And it's all your fault, you old—"

"Aw—shut up!" And the head of Albert appeared from the top bunk.

"What are you doing here?" Albert grinned.

"I'm a stowaway."
"And so am I!" cackled Jeremiah.

"How dare you stow away on my ship?" cried Ben. "And in my cabin, and in my bunk! You get off this ship at once!"

"We will not!" cried Albert.

Ben swayed and sat down hard on the cabin floor. Albert and Jeremiah hooted with mirth.

"I'll have you thrown off!" spluttered the captain. "Just you wait till I call the mate."

"If you call the mate I'll show him this." Albert produced a picture postcard. "It's a picture of you on the bridge of your last ship—some barge!"

"You ain't got a captain's ticket!" chimed in Jeremiah. "And the penalty for a captain taking command of a ship on the high seas without a ticket is at least six months—without option." He cackled shrilly. "You leave us alone and we won't give you away."

"A couple of crooks!" spluttered Ben. "So you didn't hand in that telegram on purpose."

"You've guessed it, clever!" jeered Albert. "We're going to see the world—at your expense. Good night!" He drew his curtains.

"Here, where do I sleep?" demanded Ben, when he had recovered from Albert's statement.

"On the floor," cackled old Jeremiah, and drew his own curtain.

At daybreak Captain Ben Cutlet woke up with a stiff neck through reposing on the floor, and he was in the midst of telling Jeremiah and Albert that he wished to flay them alive when a black steward arrived with some breakfast. Food brought Albert out into the open, and in the end the mate heard about the stowaways. Knowing what they would say to the mate, the skipper assured the mate that they were friends of his.

"Hated to be parted from me," Ben smiled nervously at the irate mate. "So they came aboard. We'd better put back and land them."

Ben swayed and sat down hard on the cabin floor, while Albert and Jeremiah hooted with mirth.

"Out of the question, sir!" cried the mate. "Now they're here they'll have to stay. We're short-handed, so they can do some work."

"It had better be easy work," Albert hissed in a whisper, as they were ordered by the mate to go on deck.

Captain Ben Cutlet sank limply into a chair when they had gone. The excitement of the last few hours had made him forget all about being seasick. Maybe he was getting his sea-legs. He stood up, and at once his head seemed to be going round and round. A rat-tat at his door by hard knuckles.

"Eight bells have gone, sir. Your watch, sir."

"My watch?" Ben fumbled in his pocket and took out an ancient time-piece. "What about it?"

"It's your watch on the bridge, sir," patiently came the voice of the seaman. "The second mate will relieve you at noon."

"Oh, I see!" Ben answered. "I'll be along in five minutes."

The keen, sharp air did much to revive the captain, though it was unpleasant to scan the seas and see nothing on the horizon.

"Where—er—is the ship heading?" Ben asked the helmsman.

"Sou'west by south." The helmsman pointed to the binnacle. "There's the course, sir."

Captain Cutlet took a hasty glance at the binnacle, and to him it was worse than a jigsaw puzzle. Seeing a telescope, Ben picked it up and sniffed at the chilly picture.

"Not much traffic about this morning," he grinned at the helmsman nervously, and the grin faded before the look in the man's eyes. "Not many boats about, are there?" he added hastily.

"No, sir," muttered the helmsman, eyeing the captain as if he were an escaped lunatic.

"I think I—er—will take a turn at steering," stated Captain Ben, and relieved the helmsman of the wheel.

Down in the hold Marriott was talking to the crew.

"This mug ain't ever been to sea before," the mate told them. "He thinks we're on our way to Norway."

"What's he doing on this ship?" asked a sailor.

"I told you boys there was some easy money if you signed on for this trip, didn't I?" retorted Marriott. "Well, I'll tell you all about it later. In the meantime treat him as a captain, but take your orders from me. Best get back on deck."

The ship's course was that of a snake. "Edmunds!" Marriott grabbed one of the sailors. "Run up and take the wheel before he turns her turtle."

Mutiny

THE days passed, and seldom was land in sight. Captain Ben Cutlet strutted about the bridge and tried to imagine that all was well. Actually he was scared of the mate and his rascally crew. And so the ship rounded Cape Horn and worked up into the South Pacific.

In the mate's cabin was the second mate and the bo'sun. All wore very few clothes as it was sweltering hot.

"According to the noon position to-day that's where we are," Marriott placed a dirty thumb on an even dirtier map. "By dawn to-morrow we should be in the right place." He moved his thumb. "There! Bo'sun, get the men together in the fo'c'sle—I want to talk to them. And be sure the captain and his stow-aways don't get wind of it."

Albert was surlily peeling potatoes when Captain Cutlet came down from the bridge and came along the deck. He paused by Albert, and spoke out of the corner of his mouth.

"I want to see you in my cabin right away."

Farther on old Harbottle was making a poor effort at washing the decks. Captain Cutlet hissed the same order.

Some minutes later the three were in the captain's cabin. Ben closed the door and peered at them over his pince-nez.

"How far is it to Norway?" he whispered mysteriously.

"From where?" asked Jeremiah.

"From England, of course."

Jeremiah did not know, and Albert gave it as his opinion that the distance would be about three hundred miles. Why did Ben want to know?

"Why?" The pince-nez nearly fell off his nose in his excitement. "You say it's three hundred miles. Do you realise we've been at sea for nine weeks, and we haven't seen any land, let alone Norway?"

"Perhaps we passed it in the night," suggested Harbottle.

"Don't be more foolish than you look!" snapped Ben. "Norway's up north somewhere. Don't you think it's a bit too hot for Norway? I don't think we're anywhere near it."

"Well, you're running the ship!" cried Albert. "You ought to know where we are."

Ben gave a knowing sniff.

"That's what's worrying me—I think there's something funny going on. I don't reckon we're going to Norway at all."

"Why don't you ask the mate?" suggested Albert.

"I don't want to do that 'cos he might think I don't know where I am," argued Ben. "I want you two to help me get my bearings. You understand latitude and longitude, Albert, don't you?"

Albert did not, though he should have done as a Sea Scout. There was a globe in the cabin, and they tried to work out how many miles the ship had travelled, and when the answer came to eighty-two thousand Ben decided they must be wrong somewhere, as they had been round the world twice and should now be off Dover.

"Jerry," Ben said with his usual sniff, "I think you'd better go and pump the mate."

In the fo'c'sle Marriott, with the second mate and the bo'sun on either side, was addressing the crew.

"Listen, fellows, this is the set-up!" cried the mate. "Mr. Yates has got so much insurance on this old tub that it's worth more to him at the bottom of the sea than it is on top. Now this is what I want you to do. Listen carefully."

The mate explained his plans.

"We'll put the two starboard boats out of commission and get away in the port boats," he concluded. "Gunn, you take care of the starboard boats. Cowan, you put grub and water in the port boats—"

No one heard the cabin door open. Jeremiah Harbottle entered the fo'c'sle and wondered how to set about pumping the mate.

"At dawn we send the S.O.S. open up the sea-cocks, scuttle the ship, and down she goes."

A grey-haired, fierce little man stepped forward.

"You mean to tell me we leave the captain and the two stowaways on board?" he asked.

"Sure," answered the mate. "You don't think we're going to take anybody back with us to give us away?"

"That's a bit thick, isn't it? I don't mind standing in with the rest on the other, but I wash my hands of that part of it."

"All right, MacPhail, we'll fix 'em somchow. Dump 'em some place." The mate had no intention of doing any such thing. "Now, Gunn and Cowan, you get started."

The mate turned in time to see Jeremiah Harbottle stealthily edging towards the door.

They pounced on him.

"Let me go!" yelled Jeremiah. "I'll tell the captain about this. Help, help!"

But they did not let Jeremiah go. They took him up on deck and strapped him to the foremast. Albert from behind a ventilator watched the scene with dread. Then Captain Ben Cutlet appeared and demanded the reason for Harbottle being strapped to the mast. Two men seized the captain.

"This is—why, this is mutiny!" gasped Ben.

"That's right—mutiny!" leered a sailor.

Ben saw the mate approaching.

"Mr. Marriott, I want these men put in irons!" he shouted.

"What for?" grinned the mate.

"They've mutinied."

In turn the heavy iron bars of the three landed on his large head.

"Fancy that now!" Marriott laughed harshly. "All right, boys, tie him up and muzzle him—he talks too much."

Albert saw Ben strapped to the mast by the crew. Both prisoners were gagged.

"Where's the kid?" demanded Marriott.

And though Albert did a lot of dodging and took a lot of catching, he was secured at last and dragged towards the mast.

"Tie him up."

"Don't tie me up with those old fools!" shouted Albert, gazing with big round eyes at the mate. "I want to be on your side—I want to be a mutineer, too!"

The sailors roared with laughter.

"I know how it's done!" Albert cried, when the laughter had abated. "I've seen it on the pictures, and they always take the cabin-boy with them—it's supposed to be lucky."

round and then untied the gag from the captain's mouth.

"So you've turned mutineer!" Ben croaked—he was beyond sniffing.

"Sssh!" Albert glanced round fearfully. "I was only pretending."

"Why did you let me stay tied up all night?"

"I couldn't get away." Albert drew out a knife and began sawing at Cutlet's bonds. "We've got to get busy. They're opening the sea-cocks pretty soon."

"What for?" gasped Ben.

"They're going to settle the ship and leave you to sink with it." Albert was now busy on the ropes that bound old Harbottle.

"Oh, are they—we'll soon see about that!" Righteous indignation made Captain Cutlet forget his fear. "Where is everybody?"

"They are all in the fo'c'sle except the mate and the engineer," answered Albert.

"Good—come on!" cried Ben.

Albert and Jeremiah stalked after Ben and wondered what he was going to do. On tiptoe he went down to the fo'c'sle, and they saw him slide a hand round the door. Cutlet grinned as he held up the key—very quietly he locked the door on the outside.

"That settles him!" cackled Jeremiah. "We'll show 'em who's running this ship."

"Well, we won't be able to run it for long if it's sinking," wisely sniffed Captain Cutlet. "We'd better go off before they bust that door open." He turned. Shouting and hammering could be heard. "They seem to have found out they're locked in. We'd better get a boat lowered."

Near the lifeboat was the brace and bit used by Gunn for boring holes in the boats. How it got there and why did not dawn on Ben Cutlet.

"Jerry." He handed over the brace and bit. "You go and bore holes in all the other three boats whilst Albert and I lower this one."

"Hadn't we better take some food and water?" suggested Albert.

"Yes." Ben scowled impatiently. "We may need it—hurry!"

So Albert went off to collect some food whilst Cutlet got in a tangle with the ropes and old Harbottle bored holes in the other boats. Albert found a sack in the cookhouse and put in as much food as he could find, some ship's biscuits he hid under his scout jacket, and he also popped in the cook's portable wireless set. Albert had coveted that

"Boys," muttered Ben, edging away from the spear. "What they're saying don't sound like Norwegian to me!"

All sailors are superstitious, and now they looked at each other in perplexity. The nigger cook was worse than any of them.

"Listen, boss!" cried the darkie. "Les' don't take no chances wif ole man luck—maybe de kid's right."

Marriott grinned and nodded.

"All right, boys, let the kid alone. He can't do any harm." He cupped his hands. "Black! Keep the same course. Ring for full speed ahead."

The Raft

THE grey light of dawn. Captain Cutlet was awake and sagged limply in his bonds which had loosened during the night. Poor old Harbottle was snoring from sheer exhaustion. From below came the sound of a concertina and drunken singing.

Across the deck came a doubled-up figure. It was Albert. The boy looked "That settles them—now for my friend Marriott," whispered Captain Cutlet. "Are there any marling-spikes around?"

Marriott was with MacPhail. The engineer had opened the sea-cocks, and the water was spouting into the hold. It would be half an hour before the ship would sink. If Marriott had any trouble with the Scottish engineer he was going to see that there was an accident. If MacPhail went overboard the sharks would do the rest.

"I'll get the men on deck," Marriott climbed out of the hold. "Better stay here, Mac, and just watch those sea-cocks."

But when Marriott came out of the engine-room he did not know that Ben Cutlet and the two stowaways were lying in wait for him. Ping, pang, pong—in turn the heavy iron bars of the three landed on his large head. The mate collapsed in a heap.

set, and he reckoned it might keep them amused in the boat. Most of the food dropped out of a hole in the sack, but as the wireless set weighed a lot he did not notice.

They lowered the boat somehow or other. Ben was in the boat when it hit the water, and at once the sea spouted through the holes. He spluttered and floundered about. Amazing how quickly the boat filled. Surprising how fear can lend one strength. Ben Cutlet swarmed up the rope dangling from the davits like a monkey.

Crashing and renderings showed that the fo'c'sle door was going. The mate started to recover his senses—they tapped him on the head and settled that problem. It was Ben who found the ship's raft and said it was their only chance. They hurled the clumsy raft overboard. They were about to clamber over the side when MacPhail appeared and found the prone figure of Marriott on the deck. The engineer looked up and saw the three horrified faces at the rails and understood the situation in a flash.

They were thinking of raising their hands—all mutineers should carry guns—when to their surprise the engineer grinned encouragingly and waved to them to get off the boat. They did not waste time in asking for explanations.

As MacPhail helped the stunned Marriott to his feet the fo'c'sle door burst open and the scared crew came pouring up on deck.

Captain Cutlet was not good at sliding down ropes, and also did not look where he was going—he slid straight into the sea with a loud splash. Albert and Jeremiah dragged him on to the raft. With their oars they pushed the cumbersome craft away from the Rob Roy.

Marriott pushed MacPhail away and staggered to the rails. He looked down at the raft.

"Quick!" he yelled to the crew. "Bring them back—lower a boat."

"Go on, lower the boats," jeered Ben, damp but triumphant. "See what happens to them—they're full of holes."

"We'll drown like rats," Marriott saw MacPhail. "Shut off the sea-cocks till we repair the boats."

One of the mutineers produced a gun, but Marriott grabbed his arm. He leaned over the rails and cupped his hands.

"Good luck, skipper!" he yelled. "You've only got three thousand miles to paddle that thing—send me a post card from Norway."

"You cowardly dogs!" Ben shouted back. "You'll pay for this mutiny. Mutiny on the high seas. I'll live to see you hanged at the yard-arm." He shook his fists. "I'll get you, wherever you are, and don't forget this, I've got the might of the whole British Navy behind me."

The crew began to pelt the slowly drifting raft with anything they could lay hands on. It was a cabbage, hurled by the cook, that flopped the heroic Captain Ben Cutlet back into the sea. Albert and Jeremiah dragged him to safety. Slowly the raft drifted out of range of the jeers and laughter of the mutinous crew of the Rob Roy.

Among Savages

THE raft was the only thing upon the sea, or so it seemed to Captain Cutlet and his companions in distress. They had erected an oar, to which was tied a shirt as a signal, which they hoped might be seen by passing shipping, but as they were far off a trade course there was little chance of being sighted. Albert and Harbottle sat rowing half-heartedly, whilst Captain Cutlet was a prey to his thoughts.

"Isn't it about time we knocked off for lunch?" asked Albert.

"Is it that late?" Captain Cutlet studied a large watch. "Bless my soul, we must have been on this raft six hours or more. All right, empty out that grub and let's see what we've got."

"What did you bring that thing for?" Ben asked at sight of the wireless set.

"I thought we might send out an SOS on it."

"We can't send out an SOS on it—it's only a receiving set."

"Well, maybe you can receive an SOS," persisted Albert.

"What's the good of that?" snapped Ben. "We've got enough troubles of our own without receiving other people's—come on, let's see the grub."

What a shock when Albert found the hole, and he realised all the food had dropped through. All they had on the raft was a stone jar of water and the wireless set. When Ben had finished telling Albert what kind of an imbecile he was, it was almost dark. Reluctantly Albert produced the biscuits, and there was much squabbling over the division. There were twelve biscuits, but by some calculation of Albert's he secured six.

"One biscuit each now and no more," ordered Captain Cutlet. "We may be on this raft for days, so they've got to last. So has the water."

The sea was calm, and exhausted from their labours, they slept. How hopefully they scanned the horizon when the sun rose. Not a sign of a ship. The sun was blazing hot and there wasn't a cloud in the sky. The day passed wearily, and it was a relief to feel a cool evening breeze.

Captain Cutlet decided to keep his diary, which he determined to put in the water-bottle as a farewell message when the water had all gone.

"Still no sign of Norway," he wrote. "Water-jug half empty—not a bite to eat."

Six days and nights passed, and they were still alive. Albert looked as if he had lost a stone in weight, Ben had a beard, and old Harbottle was so thin he looked like a skeleton.

They sighted some seagulls, and Albert was of the opinion that land could not be far away. They rowed feverishly, but as no land appeared they gave up the attempt as hopeless, especially as they rowed in circles. It was Albert who thought the wireless might cheer them up, and switched it on to some station.

"This programme comes to you by courtesy of the Balaher Bi-carbonate of Soda Company," blared the radio. "Mrs. Smeeton will give you the third of her weekly cooking talks 'Appetising Meals for Hungry Husbands.' To-day we are going to cook a meal which should tickle the most jaded palate. The first dish consists of rich cream of tomato soup. This should be followed by a nice fried sole covered with melted butter—"

The three castaways held their stomachs and moaned.

"We now come to the main dish. Roast duck, stuffed with sweet chestnuts, and baked potatoes in a dish, garnished. Place in a slow oven and let it remain until it assumes that appetising shade of golden brown, and baste from time to time with the rich brown gravy from the dish. Serve steaming hot with apple sauce and fresh green peas. For the next course we have a choice of three dishes—apple dumplings, hot mince pies, or plum pudding. One can follow this with biscuits and cheese, coffee, fruit and nuts—"

It was more than Captain Cutlet could stand, and with a cry of rage he picked up the wireless and flung it into the sea. As it drifted away, they heard burblings about how to make "Pine-apple Fritters." If Albert had tuned in to another station they would have heard some interesting news. The Valencia reported picking up an SOS message from the Rob Roy in the South Seas, going to their assistance and finding no trace of ship or survivors.

Overcome by the talk by Mrs. Smeeton, the unfortunates flopped on the raft and gave themselves up to despair, and when night came they slept.

Captain Ben Cutlet was dreaming about roast duck when his dreams were disturbed by strange stabbing pains round the ribs. They became so acute that he at last opened his eyes. The sight that met his eyes made him sit up.

The raft was on a beach and all round were weirdly garbed savages. It was a spear that had been tickling the captain's ribs.

The New God

CAPTAIN CUTLET pinched himself to see if he were dreaming, but found it was no such luck. Evidently the raft had been washed up on a coast inhabited by cannibals. There was a nasty old man jumping about and jabbering, and Ben did not like all the skulls that were fastened to the man's waist. Two horns projected from the headdress of this Polynesian witch doctor.

The warrior with the spear tickled Ben with the weapon, and the captain's yell woke up Harbottle and Albert.

The natives became more excited, and about thirty villainous-looking blacks began shouting, dancing and brandishing their spears.

"Boys," muttered Ben, edging away from the spear, "what they're saying don't sound like Norwegian to me."

The fact that Ben Cutlet had spoken seemed to excite the savages to great anger, and they raised their spears. Ben quite expected his last hour had come.

"Gentlemen," he cried. "Please don't get so excited. I'll explain everything. My name is—er—Cutlet—Captain Ben Cutlet. We've been thrown off our ship, which was scuppered or scuttled or sank. We've been floating around for days—"

The savages became tired of Ben and suddenly the raft was hoisted on to their shoulders. The three adventurers were nearly thrown off. The savages moved up the beach.

"What's happening?" Albert gasped out. "Where are they taking us?"

"I don't know," muttered Ben gloomily. "But I don't think it's where we want to go."

Suddenly and unexpectedly there came the sound of a long-drawn zooming, as of a number of aeroplanes doing a power dive. The noise became louder and louder. The natives stopped and gazed round in terror. The noise of the aeroplanes ended in an explosion like three bombs dropping one after another. At the third explosion the natives dropped the raft and scampered for the cliffs, yelling with terror. They flung themselves behind rocks and lay there shivering with fear.

Ben was the first off the raft, but he could not see any aeroplanes in the sky. The sound came again and seemed to come from the waves breaking on the beach, and as they stood there gaping there came the sound of a voice:

"You are listening to the broadcast of the Aldershot Tattoo. It really is a magnificent sight. It must be a record crowd—"

"The radio!" gasped Ben Cutlet, and darted down the beach in time to grab the wireless set before it was sucked back into the sea. It was the same despised set that Ben had flung overboard.

From behind the rocks came the heads of the natives, peering in superstitious terror.

"That danged thing again," muttered Jeremiah Harbottle, and grabbed up a large rock from the beach.

Ben freed a hand and made him drop the rock.

"Don't do that," he cried excitedly. "This is going to save our bacon."

Solemnly Ben walked to the raft and placed the wireless set down, then he switched it off. At once the natives came from cover and advanced with their spears menacingly raised. Ben switched on the set and gave the dial a turn. A terrific blare of military trumpets was the result—the natives dropped their spears and tore back to cover.

"Listen," Ben spoke in a stage whisper. "Do as I tell you and we may be all right. Get down on your knees and bow to the radio."

"What good's that going to do us?" querulously questioned old Jeremiah.

"Never mind," rasped Ben with an angry sniff. "Do as you're told."

They got down and started salaaming to the radio, then Ben turned and beckoned the natives. After a while they came timidly towards them. The witch doctor started to wave his arms about, and Ben quietened him with another blare of trumpets.

"How long have we got to keep this up?" asked Albert.

"It's not doing my rheumatics any good," grumbled Jeremiah.

"Shut up," said Ben out of the corner of his mouth.

The natives watched the strange white men bowing to the radio set and were filled with awe. Fearfully they edged nearer to see this god that made noises that could be so soft and yet so harsh if roused to anger. One imagines that their curiosity overcame their fear.

Out of the corner of his eye Ben watched the natives, and though the spears gave him qualms and a desire for flight, he went on bowing and raising his hands above his head as if in prayer. Albert and Jeremiah imitated Ben's antics. After a while the natives went down on their knees and began to bow in respect.

When Ben thought the natives had had enough he stood up and raised his arms towards the sun, and when he looked down at the grovelling natives he smiled. The natives gasped their relief, because they felt that the strange god's wrath had been appeased. Ben then placed his ear to the radio and made several unearthly screeches before squatting cross-legged on the raft. He signalled to Jeremiah and Albert to follow his example. The natives watched the white men anxiously. Imperiously Ben touched himself and pointed towards the cliff. The natives were bewildered, but when Ben jabbed a finger at the wireless set they understood that the god was giving his orders. At last they got what Ben wanted them to do—to convey the god to the chief.

On a large throne sat the native chief. His headwear was more extensive than his clothing. The throne was covered with tiger skins. All round him were warriors armed with spears and shields, and behind the men peeped the shy faces of the Polynesian women.

Through the trees and into the clearing came the natives bearing on their shoulders the raft. Ben squatted close to the wireless as if he were a head priest. Whilst behind, Albert and Jeremiah sat with their heads bowed. Albert had secured some bananas somehow, and was chewing away in spite of his head being bowed; Jeremiah was sneaking surreptitiously at a coconut.

Before the throne the natives set down the raft. Ben touched the set and there came a harsh sound that put terror into the chief and his subjects. At an imperious gesture from Ben they flung themselves on their knees and began touching the ground with their foreheads. Ben picked up the wireless in his arms and walked slowly from the raft towards the throne. The witch doctor gave a howl and fled, but the chief, being a brave man, had the courage to remain.

"Moturkix lokumbi muala paganaka talafa malima!" cried the chief.

"What did he say?" asked old Jeremiah.

"I think he said 'Hallo,' " answered Ben, and beamed at the chief.

"Where from? How come?" asked the chief.

"Gee—he speaks English!" gasped the fat Albert.

"Old chap, where you learn English?"

Ben asked, and calmly sat down on the small throne which had been the property of the witch doctor. He signalled for the chief to be seated. That warlike individual was so impressed that he sat down.

"My father—him meet good missionary—missionary him good meat."

The three stared at each other, and Ben's nostrils twitched as if he could smell cooking.

"Me Chief Tanawanawaka—who you?" A brown finger pointed imperiously at Captain Cutlet.

"Who—me?" Ben hesitated, and turned the controls. "I'm—"

"You are listening to Radio Luxembourg!" wheezed the radio.

"Me big Chief Radio Luxembourg," cried Ben Cutlet, and pointed to Jeremiah.

"Him old Chief Weather Forecast." Last he indicated Albert.

"Him, little Chief Fat Stock Prices."

"What him—Voice-in-box?" questioned the chief, and moved forward as if to touch it. Ben turned on the volume control. A terrific blast came from out of the radio, and the chief leapt back as if he had been stung. The warriors and their women moaned and bowed their heads, as if the wrath of this new god was more than they could face.

"Voice-in-box belong to me." Ben touched his chest. "No touch him—him taboo."

The chief bowed and began to give orders. Ben sighed his relief as girls appeared with coconut shells filled with some sort of liquid. Other girls brought bananas and fruit—Albert began to smile again.

"It looks like we're going to be all right," cackled old Jeremiah.

"Yes," grinned Ben. "Just as long as the batteries hold out. After that, if we don't do something, we're likely to be eaten. They won't find much on you, you old wire-worm."

The chief gave Ben and his companions one of his best huts and expressed a wish that they might stay a very long time. He looked enviously at Voice-in-box, as if he coveted this wonderful magic.

The Triumphant Return

MARRIOTT had decided to go on with the scuttling though several of the crew were now opposed to the idea. They regarded the whole venture as being risky. The escape of Captain Cutlet and the two stowaways was a definite sign that the scuttling was doomed to failure, and that all they would get were long terms of imprisonment. But Marriott overruled their objections. Captain Cutlet and his companions were bound to be swept off the raft, or perish of thirst, so that the authorities could never learn the story of the sinking of the Rob Roy.

The SOS was sent out and the sea-cocks opened directly one of the boats had been repaired. Marriott and his ruffians then set out to row towards the coast. They had plenty of water and supplies, but they were all gone by the time land was sighted. They landed on a beach, and from the cliff-top one of the men reported a village distant about a mile. The mate decided that if they marched up in a body they would have no trouble with the natives.

Cutlet and his companions were fed on the fat of the land. It became a habit of the chief to consult Captain Cutlet on all matters of importance, and Ben, looking wise, would then do a lot of pantomime acting in front of the radio, turn the dial and make strange sounds, and finally hand out Voice-in-box's verdict.

It was Cutlet who told the chief that he must not go to war with his neighbours. In less than a week Ben was almost the ruler of this Polynesian village. What was going to happen when the batteries gave out worried him, and he was wondering whether he could train Albert or Jeremiah to do some sort of ventriloquial act. He used Voice-in-box as little as possible.

As their clothes were in rags, the three whites were given skirts of grass. Old Jeremiah said he was glad his Emma could not see him now, especially with all these pretty, half-naked Polynesian girls running around and making eyes at him.

One afternoon Ben was enjoying forty winks when he was startled by a bellowing sound outside his hut. He sat up and sniffed. The noise was made by the large horn that the chief had erected outside the hut and was blown on those occasions when the chief urgently required the help of Voice-in-box.

Marriott and his men sighted a number of pretty native girls. Foolishly the men chased the girls, who fled back to the village to report to the chief that a mob of white men was approaching the village. The chief gave his orders. As a result, the village seemed empty except for a few scared women and children when Marriott stalked in as if he owned the place.

Seated on his throne, the chief waited the coming of the white men. Instinct told him these were very bad men.

"How are you, Sambo?" cried Marriott. "Nice little place you've got here." He pointed to a couple of frightened girls huddled at the chief's feet. "Any more like that around?"

"Maui-facata puapua bagomono wai a lua kanako," bellowed the chief indignantly, and at once warriors, armed to the teeth, appeared from the various grass huts.

Before Marriott or the crew could draw a gun they had about thirty spears within several inches of their chests. Then the spear-points drove the white men to their knees. The chief then decreed that Voice-in-box should decide their fate.

Captain Ben Cutlet emerged, yawning, but he was wide awake when he saw those sprawling white men.

"Well, look what Santa Claus has sent me," he muttered, and walked across to the vacant throne next to the chief. "Good-morning, Mr. Marriott," he shouted in a loud voice. "Welcome to Norway!"

Marriott and the crew gaped at him. "Good meat—plenty meat!" cried the chief, who was a cannibal at heart.

"What does he mean?" quavered Marriott.

"Well, it looks as if you're in the soup," sniffed Ben.

"You wouldn't let him do anything to your old shipmates, would you, captain?"

Ben coughed and smiled.

"Well—er—I have a faint recollection that my old shipmates scuttled my ship."

"You can't hold that against us, captain," Marriott cried, almost shaking with fear. "I was acting under orders from Yates. Yates wanted to get the insurance, and he only engaged you as captain because you don't know anything about the sea."

"Who doesn't?" Ben gave an angry sniff, then grinned. "Well, I got here before you, didn't I?"

"Pooma—Pooma Mamagalo," impatiently cried the chief, and immediately the warriors began to prod their victims.

"Hey, wait a minute!" Ben imperiously held up his hand. He pointed at the grovelling men. "Ask Voice-in-box."

"Good! Bring Voice-in-box here," answered the chief.

Ben shook his head.

"Voice-in-box no speak strangers," He moved towards his hut. "You me go."

In the hut Ben prostrated himself before the radio set, which was decorated with flowers. Ben switched on at a point where there was a terrific oscillation. He increased the volume control so it sounded as if someone was being murdered.

"Voice-in-box very angry."

The chief grinned and patted his stomach.

"Me hungry, too."

"No, no; not hungry—angry," said Ben, and moved the dials.

"Football scores: Arsenal ten, Chelsea one; Sheffield Wednesday two, Everton three; Sunderland six, Leeds United two. Second Division: Fulham three, West Ham two; Aston Villa three—"

"What Voice-in-box say?" demanded the chief.

"He say, 'Very serious matter,' began Ben. "No good eat." He blinked because something was tugging at his grass skirts. He looked round. "What is it?"

"Look out the window," hissed Albert.

The chief was prostrate before Voice-in-box, so that Ben was able to get to his feet and peer through the open window. There was a ship lying off the island. It was the Rob Roy.

A gleam came into Ben's eyes as he went back to kneel beside the chief.

"Voice-in-box say bad men belong him—stay here no good for you. He send big ship. Me take bad men away."

"Me say no! Bad men stay here!" The chief was very decided.

Ben dramatically pointed to the window.

"Look! Voice-in-box send ship! Must go!" Ben touched the radio and it screeched. "Yes, must go pretty darn quick. Savvy?"

The chief was not too keen about it, but brightened when Ben said that Voice-in-box so liked the chief and his Polynesian island that he wished to stay here for the rest of his days.

Marriott and the crew were placed under a safe guard. Ben had MacPhail brought to him, and after a hurried conference the two men rowed out to the Rob Roy, which was gently drifting. They managed to get an anchor lowered, and when Ben returned to the shore he was alone. Some time later, native canoes assisted Ben in getting his prisoners out to the ship. A windlass rattled and down came a hook and chain. The prisoners were hoisted aboard and dumped like sacks in the hold.

The rascally mate was the last to appear, and, at a signal from Ben, was left dangling in the air above the open hold.

MacPhail appeared.

"Pumped all the water out," he reported. "Steam's up and we're ready to sail."

"Good work, Mac," grinned Ben. "You won't lose by this."

"I thought you said you opened those sea-cocks!" raved Marriott.

"Aye!" MacPhail chuckled. "They must ha' got clogged up."

"You dirty, double-crossing haggis-eater!" yelled Marriott, and said no more as Ben gave a nod. With a thud the mate was deposited into the hold.

The natives assisted in fixing the hatches. When that was complete, Ben, with much ceremony, passed over Voice-in-box. He rather enjoyed being kissed by several Polynesian girls, but had to speak severely to Jeremiah Harbottle for suggesting taking some of them back to England.

Ben walked to the bridge, rang for "Full speed ahead," and in sheer joy rang for "All visitors ashore." As the Rob Roy steamed away, Albert came on to the bridge and said that the chief was shaking the radio set and dancing about.

"Maybe Voice-in-box dead," Ben said, with an expressive sniff.

During the voyage Ben learnt how to steer, and he had hard work keeping Albert and Harbottle away from the wheel. MacPhail got the most contrite of the crew to serve as helmsman, two more were allowed to stoke the engines and promised a light sentence.

One more adventure befell Captain Cutlet. Jeremiah, who was taking a watch on the bridge, hastened down to the captain's cabin to come up and see the firework display. Ben said it was probably Blackpool or the Crystal Palace.

"See that star," Ben pointed it out to Jeremiah. "Steer straight for that and ring for 'Half speed.'"

"I like going fast," argued Jeremiah.

"I'll stop the ship altogether if you don't behave yourself," Ben threatened. "And no messing about with the wheel."

Jeremiah thought he would like to have a look at the fireworks, so he chose a star that seemed to help head the ship towards the display. A slight fog made visibility difficult. Then a rocket shot skywards and seemed to burst right over the Rob Roy. Old Jeremiah decided he had better make the most of this display, so he rang for "Dead slow." Just as well, because five minutes later something white loomed out of the mist. Jeremiah just clung to the wheel and gaped. There was a reading crash.

Captain Cutlet and Albert rushed on to the deck and on to the bridge. They helped a dazed Jeremiah to his feet. Then Ben blazed because there was a long white shape alongside.

"We've hit another ship!" gasped Ben. "Now we'll catch it. I oughtn't to have let that fool take the wheel. They're lowering a boat. Oh my, what do we do now?"

But to Cutlet's surprise they did not "catch it." It turned out that a large steam yacht had run aground, and that when the tide turned the ship would have probably broken her back. The Rob Roy had given her a blow that had slid her off the sandbank, and that, except for a few scratches, she was not damaged.

"I don't know how you did it," said the yacht's captain. "But I've never seen a piece of seamanship like that before."

Then the elderly owner stepped forward.

"I shall see that there is a suitable reward for you and your crew."

"Well, as a matter of fact, I haven't got a crew," answered Ben. "I had to lock them all up—a spot of mutiny."

"Mutiny?" gasped the owner.

"Yes, I am sailing the ship practically single-handed."

"In that case"—the captain of the yacht looked at the owner—"I'd better transfer some of my crew to you."

"Thanks very much," Ben grinned. "You might let me have someone to navigate the ship. You see, I haven't been to bed for a week."

"I bet you can do with some sleep now," said the yacht-owner.

"I bet I sleep all the way home," prophesied the hero.

The papers were full of the captain of a tramp steamer saving a millionaire's yacht. A thrilling rescue in the Pacific. And when the Rob Roy headed for Falport, most of Cornwall was there to welcome the hero. Yates might have been if the police had not arrested him. When the man who had planned the scuttling of the Rob Roy asked for an explanation the police sergeant said he did not know, but whatever it was the result would probably be three years or more.

A helmsman from the millionaire's yacht was at the wheel as the Rob Roy under reduced speed slowly steamed towards the harbour entrance. It gave Ben quite a thrill to see the crowd and to hear the Sea Scouts playing a martial air somewhat out of tune.

"Quite a crowd to welcome you, sir," cried the helmsman.

"Oh, is there?" Ben gave a modest sniff and laid his hand on the wheel. "I'd better take over then—this—er—is a very tricky channel."

Miss Potter-Porter and the crowd cheered, but they ran when the Rob Roy headed straight for the pier. At the last minute, with the help of the helmsman, the wheel was wrenched over, and the Rob Roy only removed that portion of the pier that had been rebuilt. Obviously the Rob Roy disapproved of this portion of the pier. But who cared about piers on this great day?

They handed Ben a purse of money, the Freedom of Falport and a half-share in the Crown and Anchor. Albert was made a patrol-leader in the Sea Scouts, and Jeremiah was treated with marked respect by Emma Harbottle for the rest of his days. Captain Ben Cutlet has announced that the Rob Roy was his first and last sea voyage.

(By permission of Gaumont-British Picture Corporation and Gainsborough Pictures, starring Will Hay as Captain Ben Cutlet.)

THE GAME EVERY BOY LIKES

BILLIARDS—and you can get a Riley 'Home' Billiard Table for 8/- down, balance monthly. 7 days' free trial given.

E. J. RILEY, LTD., ENSIGN WORKS, ACCRINGTON, or Dept. 30, 147, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.1.

Write to-day for FREE Art List.

January 23rd, 1937.

"UNDERSEA KINGDOM"

(Continued from page 6)

strewn path, working downwards towards the river.

"The bombs can't get us here," Corrigan decided. "We're out of their trajectory."

"I'm wondering about Joe," Diana spoke in a low voice. "I wish he had stayed with us."

A shout from behind them made all turn. Joe had found a way round and was racing down the hillside. He yelled out some kind of warning—they turned again to see and hear a stream-lined white tank lumbering up the slope. It was armed with small, pointed guns, and fired a volley at them, which luckily flew high.

"Down!" cried Corrigan. "On your hands and knees!"

They crouched, waiting for a second volley. But the tank pulled up across their path. It stopped with a jerk, its chromium plates gleaming in the queer, artificial daylight. Side doors opened, four of the strangest creatures imaginable emerged, two from either side. They were like tin canisters on spiral spring legs, the spirals covered with grey asbestos. Three looped pipes came from the upper part of their tin bodies and went back into the lid. A flat letter-box arrangement in front made a kind of face; their arms were spirals, again covered with asbestos. They stood quite still for a few moments, then their claw hands raised what looked like metal banjos with four rods apiece instead of shafts, these rods wired about with gleaming rings at their bases.

They presented these awkwardly at the cowering four. Joe, arrested in his flight, stood staring at them, erect and an easy mark.

Ere Corrigan could call to him, the Robots fired simultaneously. Forked lightning shot out from the rods which, directed at Joe, instantly consumed him to ashes. He was there one instant and gone the next; not a trace of him remaining save the fire-scorched spot on which he had been standing and staring.

"They've got atom guns!" gasped Norton. "Those people have harnessed the atom!"

The Robots, with clumsy, mechanical gestures, stepped forward in pairs, seeking a line of fire by which to annihilate the professor's horrified party. Corrigan seized a huge boulder and flung it at the advancing pair. It caught the machine-man full on the front of his metal body and knocked him sideways into his companion. The two behind marched into the fallen front pair, and for a few frantic moments all danger from them was arrested.

Corrigan led the way towards the hole he had seen from the heights. A wild scramble followed, during which they were aware that the Robots were lining up again in their fascinating, horrible fashion. But, even as their lightning flashed forth from their strange guns, their prey reached the cup-like shape.

"Down!" Corrigan commanded, and the four of them slid and slithered through the concealing forest growth over the edge of the cup into the strange hole, tumbling breathlessly into its deadly darkness.

(To be continued in another breath-taking episode next week. By permission of the British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Ray Corrigan and Lois Wilde.)

"GET THAT GIRL"

(Continued from page 16)

they could have opened fire on him with their revolvers.

Yet the crooked financier was not destined to elude justice. For even as he was approaching the edge of the woods a sleek grey object started out at him from some thickets.

It was the figure of Rinty, and the dog had recognised in that galloping fugitive the man who had slain his master. And now, with teeth bared yengefully, the wolfhound sprang snarling into the path of the horse that Enos Colvin had commandeered.

Started by Rinty's sudden appearance, the horse reared affrightedly, and in a second the rogue on his back was plunging from the saddle, to hit the ground with a shock that drove the breath from his body.

Before he could rise again, Rinty was upon him, and the scuffle that ensued was one that beggared description—a primitive battle betwixt man and beast, with Colvin striving to save himself from the dog's gleaming fangs and shrieking wildly for aid as he did so.

It would have gone hard with the American had he been left to the mercy of the dog that had frustrated his escape. But Caryl Foray and her companions were running towards the scene of the combat, and they managed to interrupt the struggle and prevent Rinty from doing any serious damage.

While the inspector chased Enos Colvin with his gun, Brad Sheridan caught hold of the wolfhound and dragged him from his victim.

He succeeded in pacifying the dog, and then he bent down towards the man on the ground, who was cowering there in terror.

"You shot Jean Foray!" Brad accused. "Come on, talk! You shot Jean Foray, didn't you?"

A pitiable, cringing figure, the embzzler looked at him abjectly.

"All right," he panted, "all right—I'll come clean. I did shoot Jean Foray. I did shoot him. But it was in self-defence. He drew a gun on me—"

"You're a liar, Colvin!" Brad cut in.

"Caryl's uncle never had a gun."

The American fell silent, and, at a

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"UNDERSEA KINGDOM."—Crash Corrigan, Ray Corrigan; Diana Compton, Lois Wilde; Unga Khan, Monte Blue; Sharad, William Farnum; Ditmar, Booth Howard; Professor John Norton, C. Montague Shaw; Billy Norton, Leo Van Atta; Briny, Smiley Burnette; Sally, Frankie Marvin; Hakur, Lon Chaney jun.; Lieutenant Andrews, Jack Mulhall; Martos, Ralph Holmes; Gaspom, Raymond Hatton.

"GET THAT GIRL."—Brad Sheridan, Francis X. Bushman jun.; Caryl Foray, Lois Wilde; Jean Foray, Joseph Swickard; Captain Bradshaw, Earle Dwire; Enos Colvin, Robert Walker; Constable O'Brien, George Chescbro; Constable Gary, Jack Hendricks; Captain Edwards, Steve Clark; Rinty, Rin-Tin-Tin jun.

"WINDBAG THE SAILOR."—Captain Ben Cutlet, Will Hay; Jeremiah Harbottle, Moore Marriott; Albert, Graham Moffatt; Olivia Potter Porter, Norma Varden; Yates, Kenneth Warrington; Marriott, Dennis Wyndham; Emna Harbottle, Amy Vaness.

sign from Inspector Bradshaw, Gary and O'Brien pulled him to his feet.

Colvin was led away, and Inspector Bradshaw turned to Captain Edwards.

"I'm afraid you've come up here on a fruitless errand, my friend," he stated. "I'll have to hold your man, as he's wanted here on a more serious charge than the one you can bring against him."

"I quite understand that, inspector," Edwards rejoined, "and I might add that I'll be perfectly satisfied with the result of my errand—if those missing securities are handed over to me for safe return to their rightful owners."

Inspector Bradshaw nodded. "They're in Colvin's possession at the moment," he said, "but I'll turn them over to you in my office. First of all, however, I'd like to congratulate Constable Sheridan here."

He swung round to face the man whom he had reduced to the ranks, but the big fellow shook his head.

"No, sir," he observed with a smile. "It's Rinty who deserves the bouquets this time."

He motioned to the wolfhound, and the inspector looked at him keenly.

"H'm," he remarked, "it seems you disobeyed my orders regarding that dog, Sheridan. Still, I can't say I'm sorry that you did, for I'm afraid I made a mistake in my estimation of him. It was the letter that he snapped at, after all, eh?"

"Absolutely, sir," Brad began, but before he could say more Caryl was beside him.

"Brad," she cried, "the inspector addressed you as Constable Sheridan just now. What happened? Where are your chevrons? Oh, Brad, it was on account of me that you lost them."

The inspector touched her on the arm, and at the same time produced the stripes from a pocket in his tunic.

"Perhaps you'd like to stitch them on again, Miss Foray," he suggested. "Here they are. And you may tell the sergeant—you may tell him, Miss Foray, that he's a credit to the Service."

He pressed the chevrons into her hand, and then glanced at Captain Edwards.

"Shall we go back to the post and get those securities now?" he proposed significantly. "I've an idea that Miss Foray and Sergeant Sheridan may have something to say to each other—in private."

Captain Edwards seemed bewildered for the moment. Then a look of understanding dawned in his eyes.

"Oh," he said. "Oh, sure—sure! Er—well—good-bye, Miss Foray!"

He moved off with Inspector Bradshaw, and as the two men made tracks for the settlement Brad Sheridan drew Caryl towards him.

"Honey," he murmured, "I know you hanker after city life, and I know Bord du Lac isn't likely to have happy memories for you. But maybe one day you'll have a different outlook, and I'll be waiting, dear—"

She gazed up at him, and suddenly nestled closer.

"You don't have to wait, Brad," she whispered. "I don't hanker after city life any more—and as for Bord du Lac—why, I guess I'd be happy anywhere, so long as you were around."

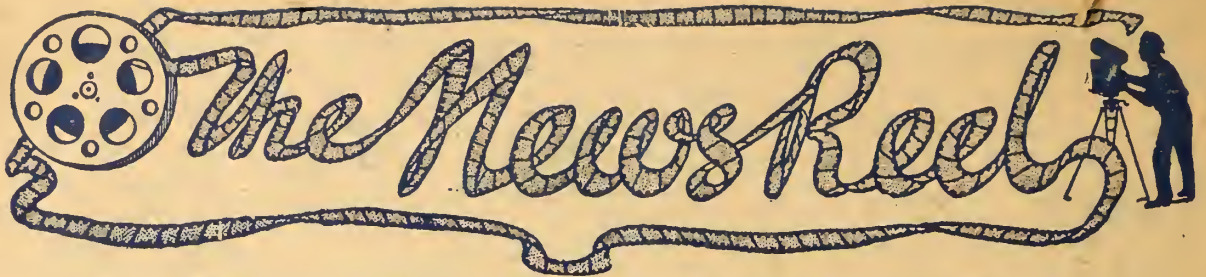

"Caryl you mean that?"

She nodded smilingly, and he was enfolding her tightly in his arms when he saw Rinty standing nearby, looking at them with his head on one side.

"Why, you old son of a gun," he called to the dog laughingly, "don't you know that gentlemen never spy on affairs that don't concern them?"

(By permission of Pathé Pictures, Ltd., starring Francis X. Bushman jun. and Lois Wilde.)

January 23rd, 1927.

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed to BOY'S CINEMA, Room 218, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Time Off for Fire-fighting

Loretta Young, Tyrone Power and Don Ameche recently turned fire-fighters.

Tay Garnett, directing the young stars in "Love Is News," at 20th Century-Fox, was informed that his home at Laurel Canyon was threatened by a blaze in the district. In vaults at his home were stored several cans of extremely valuable film—part of the fruits of his recent round-the-world cruise.

Shooting was called to a halt while the three stars rushed to Laurel Canyon with Garnett and helped in efforts to get the fire under control.

The cans of film, which could not be replaced, and completed scripts of two films were saved, there were no casualties and the company returned to work.

Successful Disguise

Jerome Cowan, New York actor who has just been signed by Samuel Goldwyn, owes his contract to a moustache.

Cowan recently went to Hollywood at Goldwyn's invitation to play an important rôle in "Beloved Enemy," with Merle Oberon and Brian Aherne. Upon its completion, Cowan signed to appear in two Broadway plays, and was preparing to depart.

But during his wait until "Beloved Enemy" was previewed, Cowan grew a moustache. Passing Goldwyn in the studio one day, he smiled a friendly greeting.

"That chap is wonderful," said Goldwyn. "He has the quality of a Bill Powell."

He was amazed to find that it was merely Cowan with a moustache, so amazed, that he offered the actor a long term contract provided he retains the fungus.

Now Cowan is trying to estimate the commercial possibilities of a beard.

Preston Foster Goes Irish

Everyone has experienced the tendency to adopt a dialect when mixing continuously with people speaking this dialect. When, in addition to mixing with them, it is your job to pick it up as accurately as possible, it is not easily dropped when no longer needed.

This is just what Preston Foster found when he stepped straight from the principal part on Radio's "The Plough and the Stars," into a part of "We Who Are About to Die."

In the Sean O'Casey play of the Irish Rebellion he was playing with six members of the Abbey Players from Dublin. From them he picked up the Irish brogue, which he used to good purpose in his part.

Then he stepped right into the part of a New York detective, and found his voice had become a mixture of Dublin rhetoric, underworld guttural and Yankee twang.

Buying the Milk

One of the oddest orders ever received by a milk company was given by 20th Century-Fox recently when eight tons of skimmed milk were purchased for the ice-skating rink for "The Girl in a Million," the ice-skating musical extravaganza which will introduce the beautiful Sonja Henie to the screen.

Test shots of the rink gave the illusion that the ballet of 84 boys and girls were skating with Sonja on a hardwood floor and not an ice rink. The freezing pipes running through the transparent ice looked like narrow floor planking.

Tests were conducted, first with white paint and then with table cream, but they were not satisfactory. Skimmed milk froze readily, gave a better illusion of ice in the picture than pure ice did, and it hid all the freezing pipes.

So the ring of 12,000 square feet was thawed out and several inches of the clear water were drained off and the skimmed milk poured in and frozen.

Whalen "Swings" a Hefty Punch

Until Michael Whalen was cast for the leading male rôle in the 20th Century-Fox picture, "Peach Edition," now in production, he knew nothing about boxing.

Fidel la Barba, former world flyweight champion, trained Whalen to use his fists for three weeks—and to good effect.

Pat Flaherty, one time amateur heavyweight champion, appears in a scene in which Whalen swings a strong left at him. The script, of course, calls for Flaherty to dodge, but he forgot to do so, and Whalen's left struck home, spinning Flaherty into the ropes and leaving him with a swollen jaw.

"Whalen should take time off for a ring career," Flaherty said.

He played baseball for twelve years for the Boston Red Sox, New York Giants, and other leading teams.

One of the Screen's Unsung "Heroes"

What is a "grip"? This is a question which comparatively few people outside a film studio could answer correctly. Nevertheless, he is a most important person and one of the unsung "heroes" of motion-picture production.

The "grip" is a jack-of-all-trades, a handy man who does anything that is asked of him. His rather odd name is derived from the familiar cry of the old-time gang bosses: "Here, get a grip on this!"

Despite his humble position, the "grip" is one of the biggest time and money savers in the industry. During a film's production he is always ready to answer anybody's call, and armed with his saw, his hammer and a few nails, he performs feats that would make the average musician blush with shame.

HOHNER
THE WORLD'S BEST
HARMONICAS
THE WORLD'S GREATEST USE
ARTISTS AND PLAYERS
HOHNER CHROMATIC AND DIA-
TONIC HARMONICAS.
WHY—Because they have proved by experience that all Hohner instruments are faultless in construction, faithful in tone, perfect in pitch and matchless in quality, which is the standard of the world. Models to suit every taste and pocket.
STOCKED BY DEALERS EVERYWHERE

BLUSHING,

Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back! Complete Course, 5/-. Details: L. A. Stebbing, (A), 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2.

TALL

Your Height increased in 12 days or no cost. New discovery adds 2.5 ins. I gained 4 ins. Guaranteed safe. Full Course 5/-. Details: J. B. Morley, 8, Bream's Bldgs., London, E.C.4.

STAMPS

300 DIFFERENT, Incl. Airmail, Beautiful Uncounted Sets, Pictorials, Colorials, Price 6d (Abroad 1/-).—W. A. WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

ALL Applications for Advertisement Space in this publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager,
BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House,
Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

BOYS' CINEMA

Don't Miss the Opening Chapters
of
"THE MOUNTIES
ARE COMING"

No. 917. EVERY TUESDAY July 10th, 1937.

2D

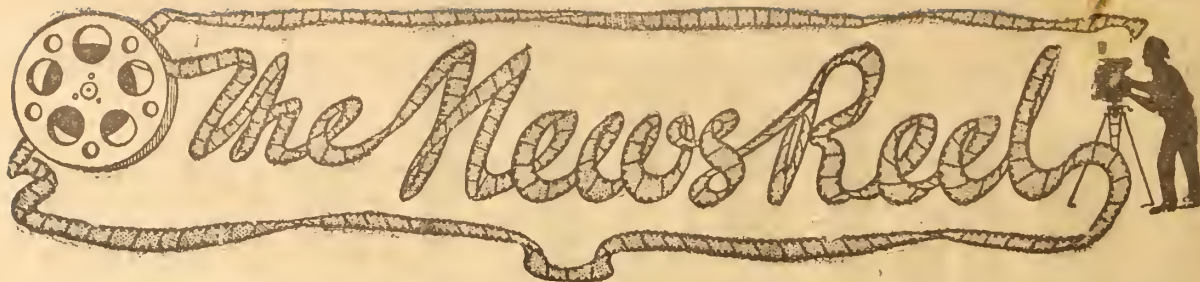

START
This Gripping
New Serial
TO-DAY!

The MOUNTIES ARE COMING

Starring
BOB LIVINGSTON

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed to BOY'S CINEMA, Room 199, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Building an Ice-rink for Sonja's Next

A score of welders, pipe-fitters and refrigerating experts have been working three shifts daily on Stage 15 at 20th Century-Fox, where the studio is constructing one of the largest indoor ice-rinks in existence. It will be 200 feet long by 125 wide and 2 feet thick.

Incredible figures accompany the building of this rink. Some 28,000 feet of iron pipe (the same piping which cooled the great concrete slabs forming the bulwarks of Boulder Dam) are the nerve centres of this gigantic rink, which will be the principal locale for scenes of Sonja Henie's forthcoming film, "Thin Ice."

On this slab of ice Miss Henie will perform five skating sequences—a practice number, a swan dance, a Russian ballet number, a Viennese waltz and a fox-trot. In at least one of these scenes she will be partnered by Tyrone Power, her co-star in the picture.

The rink is approximately twice the size of the one used in her first motion-picture, "One in a Million," and more suited to her purposes. The first rink gave trouble for the cameras until the studio technicians toned down the icy glare with milk.

The new rink will be pure white in the first sequences, through a patented process, and in the swan dance number will be pure black—two innovations which should lend added beauty to Miss Henie's performances.

Two changes of sets will surround the rink. The first will be a representation of a mountain lake, to match the two weeks of exterior shooting at Mount Ranier, already photographed. The last set will depict an hotel in the Alps.

Mikeman's Minor Problem

The usual custom of flooding a set with light during the filming of a picture has been reversed by Director George Seitz for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer's "The Thirteenth Chair."

The mystery picture, which is an adaptation of the famous play by Bayard Veiller, has two important sequences which were photographed in almost pitch darkness. The only light on the set filtered in through a window from a street lamp.

As a result, the thirteen people seated about the table where a seance was being conducted by Dame May Whitty, famous English actress, were scarcely distinguishable. The cameraman had quite a bit of trouble arranging his lens to catch the outlines of each person in the room. It was absolutely necessary that each of the actors be clearly defined, yet there could be no light to spoil the impression of a real seance.

But the "mikeman" had an even greater difficulty to surmount. The mikeman operates a sensitive microphone on the end of a portable boom to pick up the dialogue of the actors. As each actor speaks in turn, the mikeman swings the microphone to a point near the actor, but just out of camera range.

July 10th, 1937.

NEXT WEEK'S SMASH HITS

PAT O'BRIEN

IN

"THE GREAT O'MALLEY"

As a police officer, James Aloysius O'Malley is too fond of the rule-book, enforcing ordinances nobody else remembers, and over a trivial offence he causes John Phillips to lose a job and commit a crime. Relegated to a school crossing by his disgusted captain, O'Malley becomes quite a changed character—but trouble follows when Phillips is released from gaol. A powerfully human story.

"WINDS OF THE WASTELAND"

Two Pony Express riders find that the telegraph has done them out of their jobs, so they buy a coach route from a crook—and they find that Crescent City is a ruin with only two inhabitants. Read how these two fight to put the town back on the map, in spite of the crook and his gang. A gripping Western yarn, starring John Wayne.

Also

Another episode of the fighting serial:

"THE MOUNTIES ARE COMING"

Starring Bob Livingston.

In the seance sequences of "The Thirteenth Chair," the mikeman was forced to memorise all the lines of the actors as well as their exact positions about the table. Then, in the intense darkness, as the scene was being filmed and recorded, he had to swing his microphone to exactly the right spot as each actor spoke his lines. These scenes ran over three minutes each, and during those periods each of the thirteen players spoke at least one line. The mikeman was kept busy.

Madge Evans and Elissa Landi both stated that they almost forgot their lines because they expected any moment to be struck by the boom. Henry Daniell and Thomas Beck both insisted that they could hear the rush of air past their ears.

Other members of the cast of "The Thirteenth Chair" include Ralph Forbes, Lewis Stone, Matthew Boulton, Janet Beecher, Holmes Herbert and Charles Trowbridge.

They Couldn't Take It!

Fifteen schoolchildren film extras whooped for joy the other day when they took up their positions on a refreshment-bar set erected in the Samuel Goldwyn studios for scenes in "Stella Dallas." The director, King Vidor, carefully gave them their instructions. All they had to do was to sit and drink ice-cream sodas and make plenty of noise.

"Easy," they scoffed. But after the ninth drink one of them dropped out, and the rest weren't feeling so noisy, either. The next day fourteen originals and one substitute reported at the studios for further punishment. Survivors and substitute carried on gallantly, but just before midday a deputation was sent to Vidor announcing a hunger strike. Vidor saw the point, relented, and allowed them soda without ice-cream.

Jane Learns Rope-spinning

The man who taught Will Rogers to twirl a rope, Shorty Miller, is now giving Jane Withers lessons in the art for her rôle in "Wild and Woolly," her new 20th Century-Fox picture.

Miller, who is one of America's best-known rodeo performers, and holder of more than one hundred trophies for his skill in trick roping, taught Rogers at the time the latter was preparing to make his debut in the Follies.

Although the famous humorist was well known as a monologist at the time, he felt he needed something to do to keep his hands occupied while telling his stories. He hit upon the rope-twirling idea and engaged Miller to teach him the foundations of this cowboy art. Fascinated by it, Rogers developed into a real artist with the lariat under Miller's tutelage.

"Jane grasped the tricks of the trade more rapidly than anyone I have ever taught," Miller stated after several days of coaching the little star.

Locomotive of 1871 in a Picture of 1937

The Paramount studio has acquired a museum piece, a locomotive of 1871, from the Virginia and Truckee Railway. The ancient steam engine is in perfect running order, and following a series of "road" tests it was given a certificate of "good health" by the Railway Commission.

It will be seen in Paramount's big musical romance, "High, Wide and Handsome," starring Irene Dunne with Randolph Scott. The story deals with the war between railroads and Pennsylvania farmers in their struggle for the control of the oil industry.

(Continued on page 28)

It was not for vengeance alone that the masked rider struck at Jason Burr's sinister organisation. He was out to smash a tyrant's ambition to build an empire beyond the Rockies. A thrill-packed serial of the early West, when California was a pawn on the chess-board of a scheming nation, starring Bob Livingston

Don Loring

IT was spring in California, the spring of the year 1844, when that sun-steeped and glamorous territory was still under the Mexican flag—a land renowned for its rich orchards and verdant pastures, but not yet for the gold that veined the mountains of its north-eastern frontier.

In all that vast province there was no fairer prospect than the Sonoma Valley, and it was here that the hacienda of Senor Loring was situated.

The Loring hacienda was the home of a wealthy cattle baron in whom the graciousness of the Spaniard was coupled with the more rugged qualities of the Anglo-Saxon. For, as in the case of many proud Castilian families living in the path of American immigration, the Lorings could claim kinship with both races.

Indeed, it was their association with the United States which had prompted that government to communicate with the Lorings and request a certain favour of them. In short, Senor Loring had been asked if he would permit his elder son to act as guide to an expedition which was destined for the little-known wilds of Oregon, away to the north and within the boundaries of the U.S.

Senor Loring had acceded to the request, and now his elder son was preparing to take his leave of home and kindred.

Donald by name, the young man in question favoured the American side of his family rather than the Spanish. True, his hair was dark, but he was clear of skin and his eyes were grey, and, in contrast to the average Latin, he was of singularly stalwart build, being well over six feet in height and turning the scales at a hundred and ninety pounds.

EPISODE 1—
"The Eagle Strikes!"

Standing in the shadow of the hacienda's colonnaded portico, Don Loring embraced his father affectionately. Then he turned to clasp the extended hand of his brother Robert, a slim youth of nineteen.

These two were the only near relatives that Don possessed, but there was another man present, a man in the cassock of a priest, with the face of a saint and a gentleness of demeanour that had earned him the affection of rich and poor alike.

He was Father Jose, from the chapel in the nearby town of San Antonio, and he had hastened over to the Loring hacienda to bid the elder son of the house farewell.

"May your expedition meet with every success," the padre murmured, and then, smiling at the young man's father: "You must be proud that your son has been chosen to guide Captain Fremont into the great North-West, senor," he added.

"Proud indeed, Father," Senor Loring replied. "But, then, who is better fitted for such a task than my son? He has roamed far and wide, and he is familiar with the Oregon country."

He paused, then glanced down all at once at a ring which adorned the third finger of his left hand. It was a heavy gold ring with a crest that bore an inscription in Latin.

"My son," he said to Don, indicating the ring as he spoke, "I need hardly ask that you for ever respect the motto of your family: 'Faithfulness—and bravery.'"

Don Loring inclined his head. His handsome, clean-cut features wore an expression of profound earnestness.

"Faithfulness—and bravery," he repeated.

There was a silence, which was terminated suddenly by a beating of hoofs on a trail that lay somewhat to the east. It was a trail that marked the boundary-line between U.S. and Mexican territory, and round a bend in the road a cavalcade of horsemen had appeared, the majority of the troop being in uniform, though two individuals who were riding near the head of the column were dressed in the buckskin outfits to which Yankee frontiersmen were so partial.

"Here's Captain Fremont and his men now!" exclaimed Don.

An unenlightened onlooker might have imagined from the aspect of the newcomers that the Fremont expedition was warlike in character. But, on the contrary, the venture on which it was about to set forth was merely a peaceable survey.

Nor was it unusual, at that stage in the development of the United States, for a body of cavalymen to engage upon such a mission. In those days the job of exploring the far-flung western realms of the Union was an important feature of army routine.

To be sure, there was always the prospect of trouble with hostile Redskins in those remote tracts. However, that possibility did not seem to occupy any place in Don Loring's thoughts as he made haste to secure a pony that was standing near by, and led the animal across to the trail with his father, his brother and the aged padre in close attendance.

They joined the cavalcade that had trotted into view, and an officer who was in charge of the detachment saluted them courteously. He was Captain Fremont, of the U.S. Dragoons, a fine, soldierly individual in the thirties.

Greetings were exchanged, and Fremont, who had come to know the Loring's pretty well during the past week or two, was in the act of thanking Don's father for the many kindnesses the latter had shown him, when suddenly his attention was diverted by the unruly behaviour of a horse close by.

The horse was ridden by one of the two buckskin-clad frontiersmen who were attached to the column, and, cream-white in colour, it was a truly magnificent specimen. But it was clear that it had not been thoroughly broken in, and it was equally clear that its owner, a big, hulking fellow who sat his saddle awkwardly, was not sufficiently expert to handle so spirited a brone.

The restive pony cavorting around in circles, the man on its back shouted to the other frontiersman, who was of small but wiry build.

"Hey, Whipsaw," he wailed, "how about you takin' a turn on this hoss?"

Whipsaw was evidently not in favour of the suggestion.

"I told yuh not to buy him in the first place, Salvation," he retorted. "I told yuh he was an ornery critter. No wonder the hombre that sold him to yuh was so anxious to git rid o' him."

The words were hardly uttered when the brone took it into its head to start buck-jumping, and in an instant the man known as Salvation was soaring through the air, to land with a resounding thump by the edge of the trail. Then, amid the laughter of the spectators, the pony cantered off across the range, and was already some little distance away when Don Loring asked Captain Fremont if he might recover the animal.

The captain, nodding in response, Don galloped in pursuit of the runaway, and on overtaking it he elected to transfer himself from his own horse to the other brone, whereupon the stubborn creature indicated that it was as resentful of Don's contact as it had been of Salvation's.

But as a rider Don Loring was a very different proposition from the frontiersman, and although that pony did its utmost to throw him the young fellow remained firmly planted in the saddle. And within five minutes the horse had recognised him as a master, so that, quiescent in defeat, it finally allowed itself to be walked back to the trail.

Collecting his own brone on the way, Don rejoined the cavalcade and looked smilingly at the burly Salvation, who had picked himself up by this time.

"The horse only needed breaking in," Don commented. "He won't give you any more trouble."

Salvation nursed his bruised body. "I'll say he won't give me no more trouble," he declared feelingly. "I'm much obliged to yuh, amigo, but I'd rather walk to Oregon than take another chance astride that critter."

"Well, in that case," Don proposed, "how about you and I trading ponies? I can recommend mine for docility."

Salvation and Whipsaw exchanged a glance.

"It's a good idea," Whipsaw opined. "A good idea!" announced Salvation. "It's a perfect idea. Okay, Don Loring, it's a deal."

Don therefore kept the white brone and turned his own mount over to the frontiersman, and a minute or two later the column was on the move, Don and Captain Fremont waving cheerfully to Senor Loring, Robert and Father Jose as the two of them spurred forward at the head of the troop.

July 10th 1937.

From a rise of the ground a quarter of a mile farther on, Don Loring turned in the saddle to take a last view of the home where he had been born and bred, and as he gazed back he saw his father, his brother and the padre walking slowly towards the hacienda.

A moment afterwards the stately ranch-house and the three men who were approaching it were lost to view, as Don crossed the rim of the upland with Fremont by his side and the other members of the expedition cantering behind in military formation.

It would be weeks, Don reflected, ere he would set eyes on the Loring hacienda again, and although he had left it many times in the past with a light heart, and although he had agreed to act as Fremont's guide eagerly enough, yet somehow he was conscious of a vague pang.

It was a sensation that he quickly suppressed, and he had forgotten it in the space of a few seconds. But on his return to Sonoma Valley a month or two hence, he was to remember that short-lived feeling of regret and to wonder whether it had been a premonition of disaster.

A Tyrant's Dream

MEN called him General Jason Burr, though it was debatable whether he held any rightful claim to military title. Certainly his name had never figured on the army list of the United States, of which he had formerly been a citizen, but it was possible that he may have attained high rank as a mercenary in the service of some third-rate foreign power.

The fact remained that Burr used the prefix "General" whenever he had occasion to put his signature to any document. And indeed, the home that he had purchased for himself in the Sonoma Valley, up near Ortega Pass, was more like a grim stronghold than a private residence—a stronghold of Spanish design, with a spacious courtyard enclosed on three sides by high, impregnable walls, and on the fourth side by a block of tall buildings dominated by a watch-tower.

About the time that Don Loring took his leave of the Sonoma Valley, Jason Burr might have been located in a sumptuous study on the first floor of his remarkable establishment. It was a study whose windows overlooked the pleasant waters of the Yuba river and commanded an extensive view of mountains and forest, but Burr was not interested in the beauties of Nature. He was interested in a collection of small nuggets that were scattered on his desk.

There were three other people in the room with him—two men and a girl. One of the men, an elderly person of nervous demeanour, was an American mining engineer known as Colton. The second, heavily built and coarse-grained, was a trusted henchman in the pay of Burr, answering to the name of Talbot and holding a position as foreman over a powerful gang of roughnecks whom the general had banded together.

The girl, who was about nineteen or twenty, was also an American. She was Colton's daughter Doris, and tall and slender, with a winsome loveliness characteristic of a young woman who had spent much of her time in the open air. She seemed strangely out of place in the company of such individuals as Talbot and Jason Burr.

She was watching Burr narrowly, watching his face as he inspected those nuggets that lay on his desk. It was a gross and ugly face, as gross and ugly as his thickest body. It was the face of a man whose character was ruthless—it was the face of a tyrant, its broad, blunt features giving the impression that they had been carved out of granite.

There was a glitter in the eyes of Jason Burr. It had been inspired by his scrutiny of the nuggets before him, for those nuggets were of the purest gold—gold taken out of the sierras that hemmed in the valley—gold which had been discovered in the mountains by Burr and his associates, and which had been secretly mined.

"Yes, it's high grade all right," said Burr, looking up at Colton all at once. "But the trouble is, you don't produce enough of it. What do you suppose I hired you for?"

His voice was deep and gruff, in keeping with his bullish appearance, and his words wrought a pitiable effect on Colton, who leaned forward with an expression of acute anxiety on his countenance.

"General Burr," the mining engineer faltered querulously, "you know yourself that I'm working with primitive equipment. True, if I had more men—"

Jason Burr interrupted him, and glanced sharply at Talbot.

"That's your job," he said, "getting miners for Colton here. What about it?"

"Me and the boys have been quietly roundin' up peons all along, general," Talbot answered. "But if too many disappear, somebody's liable to get wind of what we're doin'."

Burr made an impatient gesture, and was about to offer some retort when Doris Colton struck in on him.

Unlike her father, she was in no way submissive to Jason Burr. Her manner towards the general, in fact, was openly hostile and contemptuous.

"You have no right to this gold," she cried. "It's on land that belongs to Senor Loring!"

"Doris!" the girl's father appealed, as if fearful that her rebellious spirit would bring unpleasant consequences.

His daughter ignored him. So did Jason Burr, who had flashed a sinister glance upon the girl.

"What do I care whose property this gold has come from?" he bit out. "Gold is only a means to an end, and I have need of it."

"Listen, Jason Burr," Doris Colton said to him heatedly, "when you first inveigled my father and me into coming here, this country was a land of peace. Now look what you've done to it, you and your men! You have murdered innocent people—you have pressed them into slavery! Why, my father and I are no better than prisoners ourselves, if it comes to that."

Burr inclined his massive head grimly.

"You are prisoners, Miss Colton," he observed in a significant tone, "and prisoners you'll remain, just as long as I happen to need your father's mining skill."

It was at this moment that a commotion reached his ears from the direction of the courtyard, and, terminating his discussion with Doris Colton, he instructed Talbot to find out what was going on below.

Talbot departed, to return a few minutes later.

"Count Raspinoff to see you, General Burr," he announced.

A look of satisfaction dawned on Jason Burr's malevolent features, and with a peremptory movement of his hand he signed to the Coltons to withdraw, whereupon the elderly mining engineer took his daughter by the arm and led her persuasively from the room.

They had scarcely disappeared when the man known as Raspinoff was shown into the study. He proved to be a tall, bearded individual who carried himself with an air of authority.

Talbot making himself scarce and closing the door behind him, Burr rose to greet the newcomer heartily.

"Ah, your Excellency," he said, "I've been looking forward to this meeting for some time."

Raspinoff ignored Burr's proffered hand somewhat pointedly. He was a man whose striking countenance was marred by a pair of cunning eyes and an expression which suggested he might have a good deal in common with the American. But, as a member of the Russian aristocracy and the ambassadorial representative of his country in the province of California, he considered himself a person of quality.

And Burr was too obviously sprung from a lower social order. Even the pretentious nature of his surroundings, even the elegant clothes that he wore, could not disguise his boorish manners.

Without a word Count Raspinoff presented his credentials in the form of a document that bore the Imperial Russian seal. Then, with unconcealed hauteur, he looked at Burr inquiringly.

"Your message to my government stated that you had something of great importance to discuss," he remarked.

Burr nodded. He was alive to the cynical note of condescension in Raspinoff's tone, but he overlooked it because he required the man's aid.

"Your Excellency," he began, "we both know that certain countries would like to own California—your country, for instance, and the United States. We also know that the people of California are not altogether satisfied with their Mexican status, feeling, as they do, that the Mexican Government is sadly neglecting them."

He paused, and then went on speaking in a sly and crafty voice.

"The population of California is being swelled by immigrants," he continued. "Many come from the United States. A certain proportion are from your country. The great bulk of the people in Fort Russe, I understand, are of Cossack origin."

"Well?" queried Raspinoff.

"Naturally," Burr proceeded, "these new settlers from the United States and Russia have no loyalty to Mexico. But, apart from them, the very Spanish-speaking elements are discontented. In short, California is just about ripe for cutting adrift from the Mexican flag."

"And how does all this affect my government?"

Jason Burr drew a step nearer to the count.

"I hold an official appointment here under the Mexican Republic, although I was previously a U.S. citizen," Burr explained. "I could forget my oath of allegiance to that republic, and, with the backing of Imperial Russia, I could establish a colonial empire west of the Rocky Mountains."

"I see," Raspinoff murmured, "and what do you personally expect to gain?"

Jason Burr squared his heavy shoulders, and a look of ambition revealed itself in his villainous eyes.

"Dictatorship," he answered. "Dictatorship, under the protection of the Russian banner."

Count Raspinoff waved his hand negatively.

"I fully realise that California is a desirable territory," he said, "but under no circumstances would my country consider laying claim to it. Annexation would mean war with Mexico, and you may be sure that the United States would rise in arms against Russia as well. They would not take kindly to the existence of a Russian dependency on their frontier."

"I know my project might lead to war," Burr rejoined deliberately, "but Russia might think it well worth the risk—for a prize so great, for a land rich in gold. Yes, gold, your Excellency—gold mined from the sierras."

He indicated the nuggets that he had been examining prior to Raspinoff's arrival, and the count stared in awe at this evidence of unimagined wealth.

"Gold in California?" he exclaimed.

"Is this really true? But no, it can't be; otherwise the United States would have gone to greater lengths in their attempts to separate this province from Mexico."

Jason Burr smiled a crooked smile. "You don't understand, count," he said. "Outside of me and my men, and now yourself, no one knows that gold has been discovered here."

Raspinoff was silent for a spell. He had regarded Burr with disdain. He had been scornful of his wild-sounding plan. But with gold in this country, would not the Russian Government be only too ready to lend an ear to this man's proposal, a dictatorship paying homage to none but the Czar?

"There is just one point you seem to have forgotten," he mused. "There are no troops here in California, but there is a detachment of U.S. cavalry just across the frontier, and at the first sign of any coup they would probably receive instructions to ride against you and nip this plan of yours in the bud."

Jason Burr grinned at him. "That detachment isn't strong enough to make me turn a hair. In any case, it left for Oregon to map out trails in that territory. So you can take it from me that by the time either the Mexican Government or the U.S. Government realised what was happening here my dictatorship would be firmly established."

Beckoning to the count, he led him across to a wall on which a huge map of California and its environs was suspended.

"Supposing we forget the Mexican Government," he continued. "Their name stinks throughout the province, and, in their present weak and vacillating condition, they wouldn't cause us much trouble anyway. That leaves us to reckon with the U.S., who could only send troops against us via the Ortega Pass. All right, here's the Ortega Pass—and right here is General Jason Burr. Give him men and munitions, and he'll hold that pass against the whole of Uncle Sam's army."

Raspinoff's eyes contracted thoughtfully.

"Yes," he muttered, "there are distinct possibilities in your plan. But I'm afraid your proposal that you should be furnished with Russian troops is out of the question. The Imperial Government would never consent to that."

The padre stooped beside the trap-door as the Eagle pushed it open, and he took from Don's hand the mask which the younger man made haste to peel off.

"Not if they were made to realise that I stand ready to deliver them a very wealthy colony?"

Raspinoff shook his head, and then fingered his bearded chin.

"I cannot conceive them providing you with regular Russian troops, Burr. Yet an alternative has occurred to me. I could negotiate secretly with my Government, and, if they approved, I could arrange to furnish you with ex-soldiers from the Russian settlement at Fort Russe. From what I can see, they would probably be sufficient for your needs."

"How about guns and ammunition?" Burr asked eagerly.

"I could arrange that also—on condition that I profited by the deal. My estates in Russia are in none too healthy a condition—and, confidentially, I could use some of this gold which you say you have discovered."

Jason Burr leered at him. It amused him to hear this haughty aristocrat angling for a bribe, and sacrificing his pride in the process.

"I understand, Excellency," he rejoined. "At the moment, the output of gold isn't what I'd like it to be. But pretty soon I hope to recruit more labour, and when our hidden mine is being worked at full pressure I'll take you over it. Then you'll see for yourself that you can command any price you care to name—for your valuable assistance in this matter."

Reign of Terror

FOR some time past the Sonoma Valley had been agitated by the deeds of armed ruffians who had swept down on isolated hamlets and carried off groups of able-bodied peons, poor half-breed labourers who had been snatched from their homes and herded across the range to an unknown destination.

But, following Jason Burr's interview with Raspinoff, the activities of those raiders increased alarmingly. Not only hamlets, but villages and even small towns were assailed, and peasants and citizens were dragged out of their dwellings in ever-growing numbers.

Some resisted with violence, only to be shot down as an example to their fellows. A veritable reign of terror was instituted—inexplicable to the population of the valley, for none knew of Jason Burr's discovery of gold, and none knew that the wretches who were seized and spirited away were embarking upon a life of slavery in a secret mine.

A month after that intensive campaign had been launched, Senor Loring and his son Robert called on Father Jose and learned that San Antonio itself had been the scene of a visitation a few hours before their arrival there. And as the padre described how anguished men had been torn from their loved ones, and how he himself had been threatened with death when he had tried to interfere, the Lorings felt the blood run hot in their veins.

"Whoever these scoundrels are," the senor ground out, "the people of this valley must unite against them. Again and again I have advocated a Vigilante committee, and the time has come when such a step has got to be taken, otherwise no man will be safe."

Thus spoke Senor Loring, and a little while later, when he and his son Robert left San Antonio to ride homeward across their range, the question of forming a committee of defense occupied a prominent place in their conversation.

July 10th, 1937.

They were still discussing the subject when, crossing a knoll in the distance, they suddenly espied three men cantering from a belt of chaparral about a quarter of a mile away, and at sight of them old Loring and his son altered their course to intercept them.

The three men were Count Raspinoff, Jason Burr and a fellow named Barson who was in the general's pay, and they were returning from a visit to the secret mine on the north-eastern fringe of the Loring property.

Senor Loring and Robert knew nothing of that mine. They only knew that Burr and his companions had no right to be riding over their range, and, resentful of the trespass of a man whom he had always disliked instinctively, old Loring accosted the general with an air of unmistakable annoyance.

"What are you doing on my land, Senor Burr?" he demanded, as he and Robert drew rein before the trio.

Burr regarded him coolly.

"Oh, just looking it over with the idea of making you an offer for it," he drawled.

"You know that not an acre of my rancho is for sale," old Loring retorted. "I have told you that more than once, and I shall be pleased if you will stay away from my property."

A baleful glint appeared momentarily in Jason Burr's eyes. He had reason to consider Loring as an obstacle in his path—not only because the senor's refusal to sell his land compelled the general to exercise a great many irksome precautions relating to the mine, but because Loring had given so much support to the idea of establishing a company of Vigilantes.

When Burr spoke, however, his tone revealed no hint of his innermost thoughts.

"I'm sorry you feel that way, Senor Loring," he murmured.

The rancher gave him a cold glance, and then, without another word, he turned to resume his homeward journey with Robert, and father and son had their backs to the three trespassers when Burr darted a meaning look at the man known as Barson.

It was a look which the general's hireling was quick to comprehend, and, inclining his head, he reached for his hip and drew out a revolver. Next instant the silence of the range was shattered by the blasts of two shots fired in swift succession, and before the cool breeze from the mountains had wafted away the blue gun-smoke, Senor Loring and his younger son lay stretched on the ground.

Barson moved forward to examine the bodies, and, reflecting on an afterthought that he might as well relieve them of any valuables, he rifled their pockets and ended his act of pilferage by taking the ring that Senor Loring had worn on the third finger of his left hand.

Meanwhile Count Raspinoff was looking on with raised eyebrows, but he offered no comment until Barson rejoined him and the general. Then the Russian addressed Burr thoughtfully.

"I see you have all the qualities of a dictator," he remarked with some dryness.

Jason Burr grinned, but said nothing, and a few seconds afterwards he and his companions were spurring from the scene; and they were no longer in view when the inert figures of Barson's victims were discovered by an Indian who had been in the Lorings' employ.

The Indian was a faithful servitor known as "Dark Feather," and no later than that same night he departed for the north to seek out Don Loring in the wilds of Oregon and a quaint him with the tragic tidings of his father's and his brother's murder.

Dark Feather himself was familiar with the Oregon country, and, aware of the route Don had planned to take, he anticipated little difficulty in locating the Fremont expedition. Yet it was not until many days had elapsed that the Indian reappeared in the neighbourhood of San Antonio with Don Loring.

Those inseparable frontiersmen, Whipsaw and Salvation, arrived there as well, for when Captain Fremont had regretfully but unhesitatingly accepted Don's resignation from the expedition they had begged the cavalry officer to release them from their duties as well.

It was in Don's nature to make friends readily, but he had never won greater esteem than that with which Salvation and Whipsaw had come to regard him during their travels in Oregon. That was why they had been so eager to accompany him back to California, and on the evening of their return to the young fellow's birthplace they followed him like a couple of devoted bloodhounds when he elected to call on Father Jose at the mission in town.

Within the precincts of the chapel Don held a long consultation with the padre, and in the course of it the priest volunteered the opinion that the murder of Don's father and brother had been connected with the activities of the raiders who had been carrying off so many peons.

"As one of the leading men in the community of this valley," he said, "your father made no secret of the fact that he intended to organise armed resistance against these lawless ruffians. I am convinced that is why he and your brother were killed, my son."

Don Loring clenched his hands. Grief and rage were struggling for the mastery on his sunburned features.

"Padre mio," he told the priest brokenly, "I shall not rest until their deaths have been avenged."

"Think not of vengeance, my son," Father Jose answered slowly, "but rather of justice. And let me give you counsel, my son. All the forces of evil seem to be at work in our land, but no one knows who is really responsible, and therefore you must be very careful."

Don Loring was silent for a space. Then he directed a queer glance at the padre.

"Good Father," he said, "in the cause of vengeance or justice—call it what you will—I am going to fight fire with fire. And if at first I do not know the man who is behind these forces of evil, he and his satellites will alike be ignorant of my identity. But they will learn to dread my shadow, padre mio, for when I strike it will be with the swiftness of an eagle."

With the swiftness of an eagle. It was a phrase that was to take on a particular meaning in the days and weeks that ensued, for during that time a masked horseman garbed in black riding-kit made his advent in the Sonoma Valley—a horseman calling himself the Eagle and seemingly wedded to the purpose of frustrating the activities of the terrorists.

Few were aware that he was Don Loring. Few, indeed, could claim acquaintance with Don Loring, even in San Antonio, for because of his roving disposition in the past he was almost a stranger in his homeland.

But as the mysterious Eagle he became a personality whose deeds were the talk of the whole valley, since news of his prowess was spread far and wide by groups of peons whom he rescued while they were being driven across the range as helpless captives.

"The Eagle!" Burr shouted. "A thousand dollars in gold for the man who captures the Eagle!"

Again and again parties of kidnappers were unexpectedly held up by him at the revolver's point and forced to release their convoys of humanity. Then, having come to know many of the slavers by sight, the Eagle began to intensify his campaign against them.

Wherever he encountered them, individual members of the gang were thrashed by him. And when he had beaten them into unconsciousness he would tie them to their ponies and attach some defiant missive to them, usually pinned to their shirts by an eagle's feather. He knew that sooner or later their horses would carry them home, and that the messages would be read by the unidentified leader of the organisation—with a chagrin which Don could only imagine.

Nor did Don's imagination play him false. If it had been possible for him to see that leader scanning one of his notes he would have enjoyed the expression of impotent fury on the man's countenance.

The fury of Jason Burr reached its peak, however, when he learned that a carriage driven by one of his hirelings had been stopped and examined by the Eagle, and had been relieved of a shipment of gold taken from the secret mine.

Don did not know that the gold had been obtained within the boundaries of his own property. For that matter, he was surprised to stumble upon a shipment of gold in California at all. But he commandeered it with alacrity, and handed it over to Father Jose for charitable purposes that same day.

Twenty-four hours later the Eagle was striking anew, this time at a party of three gangsters in charge of a dozen peons who had been taken from a village known as Corilia. Yet scarcely had Don intercepted the peasants' captors and disarmed them than a formidable body of horsemen suddenly hove into view.

Don was quick to realise that the slave convoy had been used as a decoy, and he was equally prompt in showing a clean pair of heels to the band of riders who had been craftily following up that convoy in the hope that he would stop it and fall into a trap. But swiftly as he rode the troop of rogues clung to his trail determinedly, and they were only two or three hundred yards behind him when he at length gained the outskirts of San Antonio.

His objective was a ruined wing of the mission hall where Father Jose preached, and, parting company with his horse in the neighbourhood of that wing, he ducked into the ruins and shifted a fallen block of stone that concealed a hole in the ground.

Lowering himself into the aperture, Don eased the block of stone into place again. Then he stumbled through the gloom of a subterranean passage with which the padre had made him familiar, for the priest was naturally among those whom the Eagle had taken into his confidence.

The passage was linked with the main transept of the chapel, and ten seconds later the fugitive was thrusting up a trapdoor in the floor of the place of worship to find himself in the presence of Father Jose.

The padre stooped beside the trapdoor as the Eagle pushed it open, and he took from Don's hand the mask which the younger man made haste to peel off.

"They're after me, Father," Don said, smiling calmly. "But we'll fool them all right, never fear."

Climbing out of the underground passage he dropped the trapdoor into position and hurried over to a chest that was set against the wall. From this he removed a suit of grey clothes such as a townsman of moderate means might wear, and he lost no time in donning them, over the black rig which he used in his rôle as the Eagle.

Meanwhile, he could hear his foes scouring through the debris of the ruined wing, but discovering no trace of their quarry there, they finally swarmed round to the front of the chapel and dismounted from their broncs to tramp into the building with a whirring of spurs.

By then Father Jose had disposed of the tell-tale mask that Don had relinquished, and Don himself was seated at an organ which he was apparently on the point of playing.

"We're lookin' for the Eagle," one of the intruders rapped out. "Where is he, sky-pilot? We trailed him this far."

The speaker was Barson, and although Don had never seen him before, yet he knew him almost at once as a man who had been concerned in the slaying of his father and brother. For there on Barson's hand was the ring that bore the Loring crest, with its motto of faithfulness and bravery.

It was as much as Don could do to restrain himself, but he kept a tight rein on his emotions and remained silent while the priest denied all knowledge of the Eagle. Barson, however, was not prepared to accept the priest's word that there was no one in the chapel but himself and the young man who was at the organ, and the outlaw instructed his comrades to search the entire mission.

The search was, of course, unavailing, and, thoroughly disgruntled, Barson and his associates eventually made their way from the building, with the padre accompanying them as far as the street and chiding them for having so rudely invaded the sanctuary of a holy place.

His reproaches fell upon deaf ears. Barson, in fact, suddenly turned on him, July 10th, 1937.

and from the interior of the church Don heard the ruffian's snarling voice. "Listen, sky-pilot, I reckon you know more about the Eagle than you'd care to admit. I reckon you an' that organist o' yours managed to smuggle lun outa reach afore we showed up. And in case I'm right, here's something that'll make you sorry you ever lent the coyote a helpin' hand."

There followed the sound of a whip's throng flailing through the air, and, starting to his feet, Don ran out of the chapel. But, fortunately for him perhaps, the crooks had mounted and were spurting away when he stumbled forth into the street.

Father Jose was lying on the ground, his body smarting from the weals inflicted by the two or three strokes that Barson had dealt him, and there was a black look on Don Loring's countenance as he raised the priest and helped him back into the mission.

It was a look that boded ill for the man known as Barson, though in very truth Barson had already been singled out for doom in the moment when Don had seen his father's ring on the black-guard's grimy hand.

In the Enemy's Stronghold

THAT same afternoon Barson was detailed to pin up a series of notices in various prominent positions in the neighbourhood of San Antonio, and it was an assignment that he carried out alone.

The notices indicated that General Burr wished to interview the man who called himself the Eagle, since he regarded the latter as a public benefactor and was anxious to support him in his campaign against lawlessness.

The contents of those bills were cunningly worded, and Burr had high hopes that the Eagle would be deceived by them. So had Barson, and having enthusiastically disposed of several of the notices, he was in the act of nailing the last one to a roadside tree about two miles from San Antonio when he was startled by a voice immediately behind him.

"That's a beautiful ring you're wearing, senor."

Barson swung round in his saddle to find himself confronted by a masked, black-clad figure who was covering him with a Colt. It was the figure of the Eagle, and the gangster realised that the mysterious rider must have crept up on him through some thickets nearby.

Barson glanced down at the ring to which the other had referred. Then, after a brief silence, the Eagle spoke again, indicating as he did so the notice which the outlaw had pinned up.

"General Burr," Don remarked. "Is he the same man whom people know as Jason Burr?"

"Yeah," Barson answered. "The most powerful hombre in the whole of California. You should be glad he wants to see yuh. He can do a lot for anybody that he's interested in."

Don appeared to consider the notice for a space.

"Very well," he said at length, "I'm ready to go to him. Will you take me to him?"

Barson replied in the affirmative with a little too much alacrity, and with a certain slyness playing in his eyes. Nor was that crafty gleam lost on Don Loring, although for that matter he had never had any intention of exposing himself to treachery.

He knew Barson's character, had sampled it at the mission where he had pretended to be a meek and innocent organ player. And it was now obvious to him that Jason Burr must be the true leader of the organisation to which this thug belonged.

Nevertheless, Don allowed Barson to think that he had been duped by the general's offer, and though keeping a close watch on the gangster, he appeared to accompany him willingly enough across the range.

They rode side by side at a steady trot, Don mounted on the white pony that had formerly belonged to Salvation, and they had covered a distance of a good many miles when the younger man suddenly drew rein.

"We're pretty close to Burr's place, now, aren't we?" he asked.

"Yeah," Barson rejoined. "It lies just beyond the ridge there."

"Good enough," Don said. "You will now change clothes with me, my friend. You see, I have a little more sense than you gave me credit for." He was still handling the gun with which he had covered Barson at the outset, and at the first sign of defiance he threatened the rogue with it. Then, giving him the choice of obeying his instructions or dying like a dog, he compelled the man to dismount and strip to his underwear.

A minute or two later they had exchanged clothes, and when Barson had rigged himself out in the garb of the Eagle, Don addressed him significantly.

"You will now ride over the ridge and make straight for Burr's hacienda," he stated. "I want to know what kind of a welcome the Eagle might expect there. And remember, keep going forward, for my revolver will be trained on you."

Barson was white to the lips. He tried to expostulate, and his whole manner told Don that he anticipated disaster. But the last of the Loring was in no mood to show mercy to the scoundrel who had murdered his father and brother.

Barson was forced onward. He crossed the ridge and came within view of the stronghold by the Yuba river. Then his approaching figure, clad in the unmistakable attire of the Eagle, was sighted by a look-out, and in a moment the gateway and the walls of Jason Burr's forbidding residence had become alive with armed men.

A volley rang out, and Barson's lifeless body pitched to the dust, riddled with bullets. And as the crook's inert form rolled over the ground Don Loring veered off to return in the direction of San Antonio, picturing as he rode the expressions that would dawn on the faces of Barson's killers when they hurried out to discover that they had butchered one of their own cronies.

It was no inexcusable vindictiveness that had caused Don to send Barson to his death. The man had met a fate which he had richly deserved, and well might Don permit himself a feeling of satisfaction now. Justice had been done, and, without soiling his own hands, he had seen his father and his brother avenged.

More, he had learned the identity of the arch-rogue who was responsible for the misery that had been inflicted on the people of the Sonoma Valley; and in the course of the following week Don Loring concentrated his activities in the immediate vicinity of Burr's headquarters.

He gleaned a good deal of information by keeping a secret watch on the stronghold. He discovered, for instance, that a man and a girl were being held there as virtual prisoners, and from subsequent inquiries in San Antonio he heard that Burr was supposed to be entertaining an American mining engineer named Colton, together with the latter's daughter.

Likewise in San Antonio he gained secondhand knowledge of the interior of Burr's residence from a master carpenter who had recently been engaged in carrying out repairs there.

Then one morning Don proceeded to put into execution a scheme that he had in mind.

It was a plan which necessitated some slight assistance from Salvation and Whipsaw, who were completely in Don's confidence, and who had frequently expressed a desire to aid him, although hitherto he had refused to let them undertake any risks on his behalf.

Their help even now was of a minor character. They rode with him until they were almost in sight of Burr's stronghold. Then Don climbed down off his horse and transferred himself to the saddle of a flea-bitten mule that they had fetched along with them.

"Now tie me up just as I told you," he said to Whipsaw and Salvation. "And don't forget to fix that note to my clothes."

The clothes which he was wearing, incidentally, were those which he had donned as the supposed organist of Father Jose's chapel; and the note to which he had made reference was one purporting to be from the Eagle, advising Burr that he, the Eagle, would pay him a visit ere long.

In silence Whipsaw and Salvation carried out Don's instructions. Then the last-named volunteered a comment.

"You know you're takin' an awful chance," he muttered. "The rat that murdered your father an' your brother has been knocked off. Ain't you satisfied?"

"No," Don answered. "There's more behind this than I thought. But don't worry—I know what I'm doing. Leave my horse in the thickets by the river. I'll pick him up there when I want him."

With that he kicked his heels into the flanks of the mule astride which he now sat, and not long afterwards he might have been seen approaching the main gateway of Jason Burr's stronghold, where he was promptly seized by two or three men posted on guard at the entrance.

He was escorted through to the courtyard, and Burr himself happening to emerge from his quarters at that moment, the note affixed to Don's clothes was soon in the general's possession.

He read it through while one of his hirelings was untying Don. Then he looked at the young fellow through narrowed lids.

"How does it happen that the Eagle has selected you to deliver this message?" he demanded.

"I—I don't know, senor," Don faltered with an assumed nervousness of tone. "I'm a poor musician—the organist at the chapel in San Antonio—"

He was interrupted just then by a drumming of hoofs, and all at once he was amazed to see a squadron of men in the picturesque uniform of Russian Cossacks entering the gateway—men armed to the teeth, and led by a hatchet-faced individual who made straight for Burr and saluted him smartly.

"You are the general, I presume," the Muscovite announced in very fair English. "I am Boris Petroff, reporting to you with volunteers from Fort Russe in accordance with the orders of Count Raspinoff."

Jason Burr nodded.

(Continued in page 27)

Because she happens to be present when a murder is committed by a notorious crook, Polly Dunlop is afraid for her own life and flees from New York. She is befriended by a young reporter, but the crook's hirelings eventually track her down—with sensational consequences. A thriller distinctly out of the ordinary, starring Mary Astor and Charles Quigley

LADY FROM NOWHERE

The Man in Nine-sixteen

AT her own little table, in a corner of the busy barber's shop adjoining the lobby of the Courtland Hotel, Fifth Avenue, auburn-haired Polly Dunlop was putting away the tools of her trade, believing that she had completed the last manicure for the day, when a telephone-bell rang and Mabel Donner, second manicurist on the hotel staff, sped to an adjacent wall instrument.

"Barber's shop," she said into the transmitter, and then: "Nine-sixteen? Yes, sir. No, I'm sorry, she's just going off duty. Oh, all right, I'll tell her. Thank you."

Polly rose from her table, tucked her manicure-case under her arm, and walked over to the colleague who was also a chum.

"Nine-sixteen wants a manicure?" she inquired.

Mabel Donner nodded, hanging up the receiver.

"He says if you don't mind working overtime."

"Mind?" Polly laughed. "He's the one that gave me that ten-dollar tip the other day! If I'm not mistaken, the man in nine-sixteen has that certain indefinable something called a solid bank account. See you at the flat, Mabel."

"I'll keep your dinner warm."

Nine hundred and sixteen was the number of a small suite, comprising sitting-room, bed-room and bath-room, on the eighteenth floor of the hotel, and, according to the register, the present occupant of the suite was Alfred Brewster. Such, however, was not the occupant's real name, but only one of many names he had used in the course of a very chequered career. In police records he figured as Al Lustig, a racketeer and a crook.

He was a very tall man and a powerfully built one, somewhere in the early thirties; a red-headed giant who might have been fairly good-looking but for the fact that his evil ways had left their mark upon his clean-shaven face.

He had just changed into evening clothes when he telephoned down to the barber's shop, and with him in the sitting-room was a bulbous-eyed member of his gang, Mike Dugan, who looked something like a pugilist but was alleged to be a valet.

Mike Dugan was scared, and, in his own way, he confessed it to Al Lustig. "You know, boss, I'm worried," he said.

"What have you got to worry with?" jeered his employer, ripping undone a dress-bow he had failed to tie properly.

"Well, maybe I ain't got a trigger brain like you got," said Mike, "but I know Fletcher, and I know he ain't gonna take this slap lying down."

"I'm letting Fletcher off easy," returned Lustig with an impatient flip of his left hand. "He's helped himself to plenty off of me."

"Yeah. I know, but you got to be careful, because as long as Fletcher's on the loose he's gonna make trouble."

"Let me do the worrying! Relax, Mike, and give me a hand with this bow."

The bow was being adjusted when there came a knock at the door.

"Come in!" shouted Lustig, and Polly Dunlop stepped into the room with her manicure-case, a vision of beauty even in the white uniform-overall she had to wear for her work.

"Oh, excuse me," she murmured. "That's all right," said Lustig. "My valet, here, was just leaving."

He whisked up a soft felt hat from a chair and thrust it upon Mike's head. "You've got the night off, Mike," he said. "Go take a nice long trolley ride some place."

The alleged valet went off like a lamb, and Lustig helped himself to a glass of wine at a sideboard.

"Thanks for coming up," he said, turning to Polly.

"Didn't I give you a manicure only a few days ago?" she asked, opening her case on a little low table.

"Yes," he replied, "that's why I asked them to send you again."

"Been biting your nails?"

"No, not exactly," he laughed.

"Just didn't want to eat alone. I thought you might have dinner with me."

As a manicurist she very often received invitations which did not appeal to her, and she had her own way of dealing with them.

"Oh, I'm sorry," she said, "but I have a date. I'm going to the fight to-night with my uncle. He's just got in from Syracuse, and—"

"Now, wait a minute!" Lustig interrupted, not in the least bit deceived. "You don't really want to go to any fights, and I'm the kind of guy who'd do anything to keep from eating alone."

"Well, there's a nice crowd in the coffee-room downstairs," she informed him.

"I don't like crowds. In fact, I'm particular who I have dinner with."

July 10th, 1937.

"I'm very flattered." She moved towards a telephone on the sideboard. "If we're having dinner, what about food?"

"Tell 'em to send up a waiter," he replied expansively. "Order anything you want."

The telephone was removed from its plunger and a girl at a switchboard down in the lobby answered the call.

"Oh, hallo, Maisie!" said Polly. "This is Polly. If I'm not out of here by eight o'clock, send for me."

Lustig seemed to be amused rather than offended.

"Now just give the Marines a ring," he suggested, "and we'll be all set."

"That's right," Polly said to the girl at the switchboard. "Now give me room service, dear."

Room service was connected, and Polly looked over her shoulder at her very determined host.

"What would you like?" she asked.

"Oh, a steak, I guess," he decided.

"This is nine-sixteen," she said into the telephone. "Two steak dinners. No, no potatoes—just the spinach, and salad, and coffee. That's right, thank you."

She replaced the telephone.

"How was that?" she asked smilingly.

"The spinach has me worried."

"Wait until you see it! I can get a better meal with a telephone than mother ever could with a stove!"

The door from the corridor was opened, and a thin and ugly man slipped almost furtively into the room. His cheeks were sunken, his lips were thick, and the expression in his eyes caused Polly's heart to miss a beat.

"Hallo, Al!" he said, closing the door.

"Hallo, Fletcher!" drawled Lustig. "Nice of you to drop in this way."

"Don't kid me." The intruder stalked across the carpet. "They told me you were out of town."

"If I'm in the way, or anything," faltered Polly, "I can—"

"Mr. Fletcher and I have a little business to talk over, if you don't mind," said Lustig, and he jerked a thumb in the direction of the door that had just been closed.

But Fletcher immediately barred the way.

"Oh, no, Lustig," he rapped, "your friend stays here! I'm taking no chances on her telling the boys I paid you a call. I'm not going to let you get away with anything. I know all about you and your rackets, Lustig!"

Polly heard that name with horror; she had seen it in the papers in connection with all sorts of crimes.

"Don't you think you're trying to cover an awful lot of ground?" sneered its owner.

"No," Fletcher retorted, "and I'm offering you a good business proposition. For ten thousand dollars I can go far away and keep my mouth shut."

"I know a better way of keeping your mouth shut," said Lustig.

"But you won't have a chance to use it!" Fletcher dived over to the sideboard and grabbed up the telephone.

"Put that down!"

"Not unless you see this thing my way," defied Fletcher. "The D.A. will have a dozen men here in ten minutes, and then we can all sit down and talk."

"All right, you win this round, You'll get your ten grand. But show your face around this town again, and I'll help to carry the coffin!"

Fletcher put down the telephone. With a complete change of expression he went back to Lustig.

July 10th, 1937.

"You know I'll keep my word, Al," he said. "All I want is the cash, and you'll never see me again."

"I've got the money right here." Lustig tapped the left side of his dinner jacket.

"I knew you and I could get together," exulted Fletcher. "I'm going to take a little trip, maybe to the coast."

Lustig reached a hand into his jacket, but it was not money that he produced from a pocket there; it was an ugly automatic.

"When you get there," he drawled, "write me a little post card and tell me how you're doing."

Polly screamed and flew into the bedroom with the sound of a shot in her ears. She saw Fletcher fall dead as she turned to slam the door, and she rushed to another one that gave access to the corridor.

Her one idea was to escape, and though she was trembling all over, fear gave her strength. She reached the stairs and stumbled down them, floor after floor, till she found herself in the basement, then made her way past the kitchens to stone steps that led up to the employees' entrance. Mounting the steps, she rushed out past a staring timekeeper into a wide alleyway, through which she went more slowly to the street.

Up in the room she had left behind, Al Lustig looked down at the man he had killed for several seconds before he put the automatic back in his pocket. Then, with a shrug of broad shoulders, he darted into the bedroom. The door into the corridor was wide open, and he knew that the girl must have escaped that way. He kicked the door shut and went into the bathroom, and in the bath-room he opened a window.

Outside was a fire-escape, a ladder-way of steel attached to the wall of the hotel, and, without the slightest hesitation, he climbed over the sill on to it and began to descend.

Polly Runs Away

POLLY and Mabel Donner lived together in a little three-roomed flat in East Eighteenth Street; and Mabel had reached home, and was about to prepare the evening meal for herself and her chum, when a frantic banging at the front door sent her running to it from the kitchen.

Polly staggered past her into the living-room, bare-headed, and almost as white as the overall she was wearing. She looked as though she had seen several ghosts.

"Why, Polly, what's wrong?" Mabel exclaimed.

"Oh, something terrible has happened!" was the breathless reply. "D'you know who it was in nine-sixteen?"

"Yes, a man named Brewster."

"No, that's not his real name. He's Al Lustig!"

"Lustig? What, the crook?"

"Yes, and he's just killed a man! Some fellow came in, and there was an argument, and Lustig shot him!"

"Who was it?" Mabel closed the door. "Who did he shoot?"

"Oh, his name was Fletcher, or something. I'd better call the police, hadn't I?"

"Are you crazy? D'you know what it means to be the only witness against a guy like Lustig? You're going to pack up and get out of town as fast as you can!"

"But, Mabel, I didn't have anything to do with it!" Polly protested.

Mabel swept her off into the bedroom.

"If you stick around," he said, "the police will make you testify, and Lustig won't waste a second getting rid of you. He'd have to, to save himself from the electric chair!"

Polly took off the overall that covered her own plaid frock.

"But where can I go?" she asked bleakly.

"Any place. The quicker the better." Mabel got out a suitcase, opened it on the bed, and proceeded to collect her chum's wearing apparel from a wardrobe and a dressing-chest.

"Oh, I left my hat and coat at the shop!" exclaimed Polly.

"Wear mine."

Polly put on a hat that was thrust upon her, and then a dark coat. The suitcase was packed and fastened, and she remembered that she had left her handbag at the shop.

"I haven't any money!" she cried.

"I have!" Mabel got her purse and opened it. "There's fifteen dollars here—take it. Write me and I'll send you some more. Oh, honey, get off somewhere out of town quick! And for the love of Mike don't talk to anybody!"

"Mabel, you're an angel!" Polly declared gratefully. But Mabel bundled her off to the front door.

"Good-bye, honey," she said. "Good luck!"

The Grand Central Station was not very far from the flat, and Polly was in a train travelling across the State of Connecticut when Mike Dugan returned to the Courtland Hotel—and walked right into the arms of the police.

He was taken down to headquarters, and there the Commissioner of Police dealt with him in person after several plain-clothes men had failed to obtain any useful information from him.

"Why did Lustig kill Fletcher, Mike?" the Commissioner asked in quite a friendly way.

"Aw, Commissioner, you got Al all wrong," declared the thick-lipped henchman. "Why, he and Ed Fletcher were just like brothers."

"Like Cain and Abel," suggested the Commissioner with sarcasm.

"Yeah, that's right," agreed the innocent.

"Where were you when Fletcher was shot?"

"Who, me? Why, I was on a West-side trolley."

"What were you doing on a trolley-car?"

"Just sitting, riding around and enjoying myself, Commissioner."

"Of all the phoney alibis!" fumed the Commissioner.

"No, that's on the level," expostulated Mike. "Why, the conductor will remember me, because we had an argument. He thought I tried to gyp him out of a nickel, and you know I wouldn't do a thing like that."

The Commissioner knew nothing of the kind, but he judged it likely that there had been an argument with a conductor and that the alibi was a sound one.

"Where's Lustig now?" he demanded, gripping Mike by the shoulder.

"Oh, I ain't seen him," was the glib but unconvincing reply. "I think he's out o' town on business, 'cause one o' the boys was telling me—"

"Where's the girl—the manicurist?"

"The girl?" Mike's face was a blank. "I don't know nothing about no girl."

The Commissioner turned with an air of disgust to a uniformed policeman at the door.

"All right, all right; get rid of him!" he said.

Mike was marched out from the room and set at liberty, but two plain-clothes men remained with the Commissioner, who dropped into a chair at a desk.

"Well, boys," he said with gloom, "we're starting from scratch. That gorilla, Mike Dugan, knows more about Lustig than he's willing to tell, but it's more than just getting the man who killed Fletcher. We won't be able to convict Lustig, or even hold him, unless we find that manicurist, Polly Dunlop. Lustig's always had an alibi. He's chiselled out of every rap we've ever pinned on him. But this time, if we get the girl, we've got him! She must have been an eye-witness, and her testimony will send him to the chair. We've got to find that girl!"

In one of his numerous hideaways, a flat in a mean street over in Jersey City, Al Lustig uttered those last six words about an hour after the Commissioner had uttered them. He was sitting at a table, in a room not at all badly furnished, and three members of the gang he ruled were with him. Mike was one of them.

"We've got to find that girl!" declared the crook emphatically. "So far, she's playing dead, but we can't take any chances. If she decides to talk, and the cops pick her up like they did Mike, here, it's my finish. We've got to find her first!"

He turned to two of the men, who were standing on his left.

"I want you, Frankie," he said, "and you, Nick, to cover the hotel she worked at. Talk to the bell-boys and the people in the barber's shop—somebody there might give you a lead."

He looked across at Mike, who was sprawling in an easy-chair.

"I want you to find out where she lives and get a line on her. See if she's got any sweethearts or relatives out of town she might write to. Maybe she's hopped to a relative somewhere."

He waved his hand towards the door.

"Now step on it, boys, and remember they've got two strikes on me as long as that dame's alive! Now get going!"

Polly had taken a ticket to Hartford, the capital of Connecticut, not because she knew anything about that city, but because the next train out from the Grand Central Station was bound for it. The first stop was at New Rochelle, and there a middle-aged woman entered the carriage in which Polly was seated near a window and sat down beside her with an evening paper in her hand.

Polly turned her head away and appeared to be interested in a fleeting landscape, enveloped in darkness. The woman read for a while, but suddenly exclaimed:

"My, isn't it the limit the way that girl's run away!"

Polly looked round in alarm.

"What girl?" she asked faintly.

"That one." The paper was held towards her and a gloved finger pointed. "Dorothy Barnes. The idea! A rich girl like that running away from school all because of some silly love affair, and worrying her people half to death. Don't you think she ought to have better sense?"

Polly repressed a sigh of relief and glanced at the paper.

"Yes," she murmured.

"Don't it beat all, the way young people carry on nowadays? The police have had plenty of time to find her—I suppose she's married that prince of hers. I'll guarantee he only wants her for her money."

"Yes," Polly started to rise. "Now if you'll excuse me I think I'll—"

She broke off abruptly, and her brown eyes widened. A young man whose hands she had manicured that evening, and who was one of her numerous unwanted admirers, had entered the carriage from an adjoining one and was advancing towards the conductor.

"How are you there, brother?" boomed the young man. "How long before we get into Norwalk?"

"About an hour," the conductor replied.

"What time is it now?"

The conductor consulted his watch and replied that it was eight-twenty.

"Thanks, pal." The young man dropped into a seat quite close to the stool on which the conductor was perched, and Polly sat down again.

"I thought you were leaving?" said the middle-aged woman.

"Well—er—I thought I'd like to hear more about the Barnes girl," said Polly, and saw that the paper had been turned inside out. "Is that the story?"

"Yes," nodded the woman, "it's continued from page one. Here, read it for yourself."

Polly thanked her, took the paper, and appeared to become immersed in the story of Dorothy Barnes, who had run away from college to marry a foreign prince, to the intense annoyance of a millionaire father who was offering a reward to anyone who found her before she had taken the fatal step.

The young man who had asked about Norwalk took out a watch and wound it. He said to the conductor in a voice loud enough for everyone in the carriage to hear:

"You know, I never can remember to wind this thing. It's a swell watch, too. The company gave it to me last year for my sales record."

Polly did not look round, but she was badly disturbed. She felt certain that if she remained on the train the young man would catch sight of her before Norwalk was reached.

Five long minutes elapsed, and then the train steamed into a station and came to a full stop. The conductor rose from his stool.

"Clearview Junction," he shouted for the benefit of the passengers. "Ten minutes."

The young man stood up.

"Well, I guess a little hamburger would kind of hit the spot," he proclaimed. "How about you, brother? Going to feed the inner man?"

Lustig reached a hand into his jacket, but it was not money that he produced from a pocket there—it was an ugly automatic.

An elderly male passenger thus addressed shook his head.

"No, thanks," he said.

"You know opportunity only knocks once. Make hay while the train stops, that's my motto."

The young man went off to the door and disappeared; the middle-aged woman beside Polly followed him. Presumably they had both gone off to the refreshment-room. Polly gave them a couple of minutes to reach it, then took down her suitcase from the rack above her head and left the train.

A Friend in Need

CLEARVIEW JUNCTION had been built not so much for the convenience of people who lived in Clearview as for the convenience of the New York, New Haven, and Hartford Railroad Company. All manner of lines converged upon it, but the unimportant little town was nowhere near it.

Polly discovered this fact after she had surrendered her ticket and walked but from the station. She found herself in a dark lane, fringed with trees, and with not a lamp to light the way in either direction.

She went back into the station and asked an aged porter the nearest way to the nearest town.

"You just turn to the left, missie," was the reply, "and keep on till you get to it. Clearview is its name, but it's a tidy step, especially in them sort o' shoes you're wearin'. Maybe if you was to use the 'phone in the bookin'-office old Ike Merrivale might come and collect you with his cab."

"I'll walk," decided Polly.

There was a faint suggestion of a moon behind the clouds that covered the sky, and the darkness of the lane did not seem so intense after she had covered half a mile. But the suitcase became heavier, and high heels were not suited to ruts and pot-holes.

She was trudging wearily along the lane that seemed to have no turning and no end when the headlights of a car behind her caused her to stop and to turn. An open two-seater caught up with her, and at its wheel was a bareheaded young man, who immediately braked and waved a hand.

"I've got a lot of room in here," he said invitingly.

"No, thank you." With her head in the air she walked on past the car. But the car caught up with her almost immediately.

"I'm going into Clearview," the young man informed her. "I'll give you a lift."

"Thanks again," she returned stiffly. "I can walk."

Once more she preceded the car for a little way, but it caught up again and was slowed down to keep her company.

"You certainly can," said the persistent young man. "It's only eight miles. Of course, the one snag is that there aren't any signs on these roads, and this lane opens out into another one directly."

"I'll find my way," said Polly.

"All right," he nodded. "Make sure you take the left-hand turn when you hit Barrett's swamp. It looks kind of ghostly and haunted."

She looked across at him.

"You're not trying to scare me, are you?"

"Oh, no." He shook his head. "It's not really haunted. There's nothing to get scared about—except snakes."

"Snakes?" she gasped.

"Yes."

"Oh!"

July 10th, 1937.

That was the end of her resistance. She was terrified of snakes, knew nothing about their nocturnal habits, and had noticed that he was attractively good-looking. She liked his smile as he opened the door of the two-seater for her, and she liked his mop of very dark and very wavy hair.

He jumped down to relieve her of the suitcase, which he stowed in the dicky, and he helped her up into a seat which seemed to her to be singularly comfortable.

"Are you going to stay in Clearview for a while?" he inquired as he drove on along the lane.

"I don't know," she replied slowly.

"I—I came up here for my health."

"Well, you'll like it here. Great climate—nice and dry."

"That's just what I need."

"You'll like the people, too. Know any of 'em?"

"Not a soul," she confessed.

"Then how did you happen to pick out Clearview?"

"Well," she hesitated, "I—I didn't pick it out exactly. All the doctor told me was that I was to get out of the city, and that he thought the country up here might help."

The end of the lane had been reached. He swung the two-seater to the left into a wider thoroughfare, and at that moment the clouds parted and the moon shone down upon them.

"You're not kidding me," he said.

"No doctor sent you up to Clearview. You see, I happen to be a reporter. It's even money I know all about you."

That gave her a jolt, but she tried not to show her dismay.

"You're a reporter?"

"Yes," he replied. "'Clearview Clarion.' I'm the whole staff. I've talked to dozens of girls like you. Even wrote a story about 'em."

"Dozens like me?" She didn't like that. "I'm unique."

"Maybe. But not a week passes that some girl down on her luck doesn't go through Clearview, working her way to the city in search of a job. Isn't that what you're doing?"

She decided to let him think so.

"Well, you can't blame a girl for trying to keep a secret," she said evasively.

"Oh, it's nothing to be ashamed of," he assured her. "We're all just looking for a chance to make good, aren't we?"

"That's it."

"It's the same with you as it is with me. Being chief cook and bottle-washer on a four-page weekly isn't much. But then there's the 'New York Express.'"

"Oh, you work for the 'Express,' too?"

"Well, not steady," he admitted.

"You see, there's not enough news happens around here. But one of these days a big story will walk into Clearview, and when it does I'll be able to go to the 'Express' and hold 'em up for a regular job."

They were descending a hill into a hollow that looked all misty in the moonlight. Barrett's swamp, she presumed.

"Well, I hope your chance comes, and that you get your big job real soon," she said.

"Thanks. Here comes hoping for both of us."

The two-seater whizzed down into the mist, swung round a corner on two wheels, and began to climb again upon a real road.

"Say, would you like to stay in Clearview for a while if you could make a living?" he inquired.

"I like everything you've told me about it so far."

"I might be able to get you a job."

"Really?"

"Yes, I think I can fix it. Do you mind being a waitress?"

She shook her head.

"It's not that I mind," she said. "But I've never waited on tables before."

"Oh, I didn't say anything about waiting on tables—I said being a waitress. No tables in Alec's diner. He's looking for a girl, because the one he had got married last week. I'll talk to Alec about it, if you like."

"It would be awfully nice of you to take all that trouble over a stranger."

"Aw, that's nothing," he responded.

"You can arrange about a room at the Union Hotel, and then I'll have a talk with Alec. He's a Greek, you know, but he's a good chap."

Polly liked what she saw of Clearview that night, and she liked the old-fashioned Union Hotel, which stood on a corner of Market Square. She booked a top-floor room, without board, for a ridiculously small sum, and she had only just made herself at home in it when the young man of the two-seater called for her.

His name, she had learned, was Earl Daniels, and he had proved a very good friend in need, for he wanted to take her straight round to the Greek of whom he had spoken.

She went with him across the square into Main Street, and they mounted wooden steps outside a quaint little restaurant labelled "Alec's Diner."

There were no tables in the place, but there was a long counter at which several customers were perched on stools. Behind the counter hovered an elderly man with very black brows, very bright eyes, and a bald pate from each side of which tufts of black hair sprouted.

He was the bulky proprietor of the establishment, Alexander Scorzo, and he viewed Polly with obvious approval, then motioned to her companion to conduct her to a room at the far end of the counter.

There she was interviewed, gave the name of Mary Jones, and was engaged on the spot without any mention whatever of references, her duties to commence next morning.

Having worked as a manicurist in a fashionable New York hotel for several years, Polly found it easy enough to serve behind a counter. She found favour with the customers, all of them males and many of them quaint characters, and her employer expressed himself to Earl as being more than satisfied with her.

Earl dropped in quite frequently for a cup of coffee and a chat during the next four days, and friendship ripened between him and Polly.

On the Friday evening he had just climbed on to his favourite stool when an old farmer walked up to him with an air of importance.

"Oh, say, Earl, I got a piece for that there paper o' yours," he announced.

"You have?" Earl stewed round on the stool. "Well, what happened?"

"A sow and three sucking pigs broke out o' my pig-pen this afternoon. We're still lookin' for 'em."

"Thanks for the scoop," laughed Earl. "That ought to make page one."

"Oh, that's all right." The imparter of news went out from the restaurant, doubtless to renew his search for the wandering sow and its offspring.

"Escape from pen stirs countryside," Earl said dryly to Polly, as though quoting a headline.

"Will you get out an extra," she inquired, "or do you think it will hold until next week's edition?"

Earl waggled an admonitory finger at her.

"Say, those runaway hogs and the strawberry festival to-morrow night are my big stories for the week." He opened out a newspaper he had taken from his pocket. "Ah well," he sighed. "I guess we can't all have murders and robberies like the 'New York Express.'"

"Well, that's one thing to be thankful for." Polly glanced left and right, saw that no customer was in immediate need of service, and proceeded to wipe the glass-covered top of the counter. "Is there anything exciting in the paper to-day?" she presently inquired.

"Well," said Earl, "the police haven't caught up with that fellow Lustig yet."

"Really?" She wished they had, but disliked the subject. "Anything else?"

"There's an article about that Barnes girl who's still missing. Now there's a young lady I'd like to run into. She'd make a great story."

"She's probably very nice," said Polly.

"As far as she herself is concerned," he retorted, "I'd like to take a hair-brush to her."

"Why?" asked Polly.

"Because she stands for everything that's wrong. Her father's given her all a girl could want, but now because he doesn't see fit to buy her a title or let her marry that prince she ups and runs out on him."

"Well, she knows what she wants and goes after it," said Polly, warm in defence of a member of her own sex. "I admire her."

"Admire her?" snorted Earl. "How can you admire a spoiled, selfish, money-drunk little debutante?"

"Because she's got a mind of her own."

"Mind?" Earl brought his fist down upon the counter in such a fashion that the cup of coffee with which Polly had just presented him almost danced upon the edge of it. "All she's got is a couple o' millions."

Polly took away the cup and saucer, emptied spilled coffee from the saucer into a sink and refilled the cup from a tall urn. Earl grinned sheepishly.

"This is getting to be a real family fight," he remarked. "We're almost breaking up the chinaware."

"And of all things over Dorothy Barnes' millions," said Polly, setting the replenished cup before him in its saucer. "Which reminds me that I got paid to-day."

"Well, I'm glad to hear Alec is paying you something."

Alec had just walked up to their end of the counter.

"Sure," said he in his curiously clipped English, "I always pay with plenty cash, and the waitress got to sling the hash." He struck an attitude, fancying himself as a poet in a language that was none too familiar to him. "How's that?"

"I should have warned you about this before you took the job," Earl said to Polly, with a grimace.

"Well, it's your own fault," retorted Alec. "You teach me the English, I make the poem. Me, I got brains!"

"I suppose you'll be blowing your salary on an ermine wrap?" Earl suggested facetiously to Polly.

"No, that comes next week," she laughed. "This one goes to pay a debt I owe in New York. Will you mail it for me?"

"Sure." Earl pocketed a sealed and stamped envelope she took from a shelf and handed to him. "How would you like to go to a good old-fashioned strawberry festival to-morrow night?"

"Oh, I—" She looked doubtfully at her employer's broad back, but he immediately turned to say:

"Anything Earl wants. There is workings every day, sometimes peoples gotta play. It's a good idea."

"Fine," said Earl. "Is it a date?"

"Yes," said Polly.

"I'll call for you at seven-thirty."

"That'll be splendid. Don't forget to mail my letter."

"Glad you reminded me." Earl drank his coffee and paid for it. "I'll mail it right away."

On the Trail

IN the living-room of the little three-roomed flat in East Eighteenth Street, New York City, Mabel Donner was ironing a gaily patterned frock on the following Sunday morning when there arose a persistent banging at the door.

She put down the electric iron she was using.

"All right, I'm coming," she called out as she crossed the room. "Or do you want to play knock-knock?"

She opened the door and with indignant eyes regarded the unattractive features of Mike Dugan, an utter stranger to her.

"Good-morning," he said cheerfully.

"What's good about it?" she snapped.

"I don't want to see any more reporters, and I don't like cops! Go away!"

Instead of obeying, Mike squeezed past her into the room.

"Aw, now wait a minute," he said. "I ask you, is that nice? I come up here to give you a hundred dollars and you start insulting me."

"A hundred dollars?" Mabel stared at him.

"Sure, I got it right here."

"Mister, I'd manure an elephant for a hundred dollars! Who do I have to kill?"

"You don't have to kill anyone," he laughed. "I work for Kramer, over on Sixth Avenue, the bookie. He was over to the hotel you work at about a week or ten days ago, and he made a five dollar bet with your room-mate. Ah, what's her name?"

"You mean Polly Dunlop?"

"Yeah."

"She never bet on anything in her life."

Mike shrugged his shoulders and produced a hundred dollars in notes.

"Well, she bet on Flyaway," he stated, "and Kramer has to pay her out at twenty to one, and here's the dough."

Mabel held out a hand.

"She can certainly use that," she said.

The notes were withheld.

"Ah, but I have to give it to her personal," said Mike. "She has to sign the slip. Where is she?"

"Well, she's out of town for a little while. But it's all right—you can give it to me. I'm her best friend."

"We can't do it like that," scoffed Mike. "You give me her address, and it'll be mailed to her. You see, the boss has a rep to keep up. Honest John Kramer always pays off, but we can't go running around paying out money to people we don't know. Come on, are you gonna give me that address, girl? Hi, what's the matter with you?"

An ominous odour had sent Mabel scurrying across to the ironing-board.

She had omitted to switch off the current, and the electric iron was doing its worst.

"My dress!" she cried in dismay, snatching up the iron. "It's ruined; My best print dress, and I've only worn it a couple of times. Oh, gee, I would be Scotch and try to save a nickel! Four dollars, ninety-five cents lost."

Mike viewed the damaged dress without any sympathy whatever.

"Yeah, and you've lost your girl friend a hundred bucks," he said, "if you don't come across with that address."

"But I don't know her address!" Mabel shouted at him.

"Well, that's her tough luck, picking 'em right and not getting paid for it." Mike drifted towards the door, and on a table near the door he caught sight of an envelope which had been through the post.

Mabel had switched off the current, put down the iron, and picked up the badly scorched frock. The envelope vanished into a pocket and the door was opened.

"I could get it to her," Mabel turned to say. "Couldn't you stretch a point?"

"Honest John Kramer stretches no points, sister," Mike responded over his shoulder. "I'll be seeing you."

"You mug!" she shouted after him as he went out.

Mike made straight for Al Lustig's hideaway in Jersey City and handed him the envelope. The two men known as Frankie and Nick were present, and they listened with amusement to the story Mike had to tell; but Lustig took some notes from the envelope and threw the envelope on a table.

"Fifteen dollars," he said disgustedly. "That's all there is—and no letter."

"Probably she tore the letter up," suggested Frankie, a thickest but undersized man whose surname was Haines—according to police records.

Nick Morton had picked up the envelope.

"This is from Clearview, Al," he said, as though he had made an important discovery. "That's the postmark on it."

"I saw that," growled Lustig; "and how much good does it do us? Her Aunt Johanna might be living in Clearview. I can't risk touring the country on a lead like this."

"I can go up and take a look around," said Nick.

"You don't know the girl. Mike, do you remember her?"

"Sure, boss," replied Mike instantly. "She was too much of a good-looker to forget."

"Never mind her looks. Take a run up to Clearview. Hop the first train, and call me if you find her."

"Okay."

Mike went off, smoking a cigar, and he arrived at Clearview Junction late in the afternoon.

The idea of walking nine miles or more to the little town did not appeal to him at all, and he got the clerk in the booking-office to telephone for a car.

The car that arrived, after a considerable interval, was an ancient one; its driver was by no means young. During a very noisy journey Mike asked questions in vain, and outside the Union Hotel he was set down and paid the fare.

Dusk was gathering in the Market Square as he looked about him. He went up to an elderly man sitting on a wooden bench under a tree.

"How do, professor?" he said.

July 10th, 1937.

"I'm trying to find a girl that got here about a week ago. Do you know anybody like that?"

"I don't know anything about a girl, son," replied the man. "I'm the veterinarian from Adamsville. Come down to see a cow myself."

Mike wandered off across the roadway, and by a stone memorial in the middle of the square he spoke to a bearded man who was smoking a pipe and wore a metal badge upon his waistcoat. He was the local constable, and he proceeded to describe all the youngish women who had arrived in the town during the past week.

Mike listened with growing impatience to quite a lengthy list.

"Then there was Mrs. Harper's sister," said the constable reflectively. "Good-looking she was, too. But she went back to Bridgeport yesterday."

"Oh, she went back to Bridgeport?" Mike clamped his teeth upon the end of a half-consumed cigar and wished himself back in New York.

"Yeah." The constable removed his pipe from his mouth and scratched the back of his neck. "That's all I can think of now, except that they got a new waitress down there to Alec's Diner. Come to think of it, she's just about the age you was saying, too."

"A new waitress?" Mike's flagging spirits rose. "Hi, where's this diner at?"

"Turn the corner and right down there." The constable pointed with the stem of his pipe. "Say, are you any relation to this girl?"

"No, I'm just a friend of hers. I got some good news for her."

In Main Street Mike found the restaurant without any difficulty. He found also an alleyway at the side of it and an open window in the alleyway. He looked in at the window and he saw Polly behind the counter.

She was serving the old farmer who had lost his sow and three sucking pigs the previous Friday, and the farmer was informing her that he had found them.

"And bless me if they don't look like they've took on more weight," he added.

"Oh, that's fine," said Polly, and at that moment saw Mike's ugly face at the open window and recognised it.

She moved hastily past her employer to Earl, who was on his favourite stool, and she whispered urgently to him:

"Earl, meet me out the back. Don't ask questions. It's important."

She made in haste for the room at the far end of the counter, snatched her coat from a peg, and went out at the back door just as Mike entered the restaurant.

Alec advanced to the stranger as the stranger climbed upon a stool.

"Hallo," he said, "what do you want?"

"Scramble me up a cup of coffee," said Mike.

Earl had passed him out on the steps and then had sped along the alleyway. He met Polly at the back door.

"What's the matter?" he asked. "I've got to get out of here!" she replied agitatedly.

"Why, what's all the excitement?" "That man in there—he mustn't see me. I've got to get out of this town right away."

"Oh! Well, I could run you out to my grandfather's farm. Nobody would find you there."

"Good!" she breathed. "Let's go at once."

"My car's parked at the corner. We can cut through this way into Union Street."

July 10th, 1937.

A Place of Refuge

THE two-seater was reached while Mike was drinking his coffee, and in a very few minutes' time it was speeding out from the town in a westerly direction. Polly settled back in her seat with a sigh of relief.

"You see, he knows who I am," she said.

"A lot of people know me," said Earl, "but I don't run away from them."

"Yes, but he came up here to take me back to town."

"Why?" Earl slowed to a sharp bend. "What's this all about?"

"The trouble is I haven't told you the truth."

"About yourself?"

She nodded, and then the bend was negotiated and the two-seater moved smoothly upon a flat stretch of road with trees and fields on either side of it. Dusk had merged into darkness, and a number of stars were twinkling in the sky.

"I couldn't stay where I was," said Polly unhappily. "I couldn't let the police—" She broke off, biting her lip because she was afraid to tell him the truth; and then suddenly she blurted: "Earl, I—I'm Dorothy Barnes."

"The heiress?" He looked swiftly round at her and his voice was curt. "The one that ran off to marry that prince?"

"Yes, but that—that isn't right. I—I—I didn't want to marry any prince."

"That's what it said in the papers."

"It was wrong. My father wanted the marriage. That's why I ran away. Really, he twisted the story round. You believe me, don't you?"

"What a story!" cried Earl. "Front-page headlines as big as your hand! The 'Express' would get out an extra."

She hadn't thought of the way he would look at it as a reporter, and she gasped in dismay:

"You're not going to send it in, are you?"

"It's funny the way things break, isn't it?" he said. "I've been waiting for a big story for years, and here comes one bigger than I ever hoped for, and I can't use it. Oh, well, there'll be other stories come along some day."

"Earl," she began gratefully, "I wouldn't ask you to do this, except that—"

"Oh, that's all right," he broke in. "The only thing we have to worry about now is Gramp. He'll probably kick up a fuss, but we'll handle him."

A mile or so farther on the road was deserted for a winding lane, and in the lane the two-seater was stopped outside the gate of a farmyard. At the side of the yard was quite a large garden, fronting a house built partly of brick and partly of wood.

"Well, here we are!" announced Earl.

"It's nice and quiet around here," she remarked appreciatively.

"Yes," said he, "while Gramp and Zeke aren't around. Zeke Hopper is the hired man, though you'd never know it from the amount of work he does. Gramp's been firing him for the last eighteen years. They're always arguing about something."

The house was in darkness.

"It doesn't look as though there's anybody at home," said Polly.

"They're probably out fishing," he returned.

"At night?"

"Oh, you can't go by what they do!" He jumped down from his side of the car and helped her down from hers, and they went through the garden to the porch of the house. The front door was on the latch, and in the light of a match he led the way across a lounge-hall into a living-room furnished more for comfort than for appearance.

"Gee, this is nice and homey!" she exclaimed, after he had lit a hanging lamp over a table.

"Glad you like it," said he.

"But what about my things? They're at the hotel."

"Oh, I'll get them for you."

Two elderly men had entered the farmyard from a field at the back of it and were advancing towards the house. Both were carrying fishing-rods and creels, but the creels were empty—and that was a source of annoyance to the shorter of the pair, who was Jeff Daniels, Earl's grandfather.

The other man, considerably taller and considerably leaner than his companion, was Zeke Hopper, and they both wore steel-rimmed spectacles.

"This time you are fired!" Jeff Daniels snapped at the hired man, stopping short at the back porch.

"You can't fire me," retorted Zeke. "I'm a-quittin'. Why, you ain't got sense enough to—"

"It's just plain crazy, that's what!" howled his employer. "I've never heard tell of such a thing. Keepin' me out there after dark. I bet I caught my death o' cold!"

"Always caught 'em that way down to Frog Hollow," declared Zeke.

"Colds?" barked Jeff.

"No, fish, you darn fool! Good big 'uns, too!"

The back door was opened, and Earl looked down at them from the porch.

"Well, about time you two got home," he said. "What are you scrapping about now?"

"This darn fool keeping me out there tryin' to catch fish with glow-worms!" raged his grandfather.

"Always caught 'em that way down to Frog Hollow," maintained Zeke.

"It stands to reason," fumed Jeff, "when you put a glow-worm in the water the light goes out."

"It don't do no such thing!" Zeke retorted.

They ascended the steps of the porch to Earl, and they entered the living-room; but at sight of Polly standing there by the table the two old fellows stopped short in astonishment.

"Who's the lady?" demanded Jeff.

Earl put a hand on Polly's shoulder and he said:

"This, is my grandfather, Jeff Daniels."

"Never mind who I am," barked Jeff. "Who's the lady?"

"All right to tell him?" asked Earl.

"Oh, I suppose so," murmured Polly.

"She's Dorothy Barnes."

"You know," explained Polly, "the Society girl who ran away from school because her father wanted her to marry some foreigner. Well, I—I wouldn't; that's why I ran away."

Jeff screwed up his eyes at her. Zeke burst out:

"Why, they was tellin' about it over the rady this mornin'! So you're the Barnes girl?"

Polly nodded.

"I brought her out to stay here," said Earl. "Miss Barnes can't marry a man she doesn't love, especially a foreigner."

"Foreigner, eh?" said Jeff. "Never had much use for foreigners. How long d'you want to stay?"

Polly tried to think of a suitable answer.

"Oh, about two weeks," she decided.

"I'll be twenty-one then."

"What's that got to do with it?"
 "Why, then I inherit four million dollars from my grandmother. That's on my mother's side. And then I can do anything I like."

Jeff Daniels did not seem to be very favourably impressed, either by the four millions—which were entirely imaginary—or by her beauty—which was very real.

"Oh, I won't be any trouble to you," she added pleadingly.

"Of course you won't!" said Earl. "You've got to let her stay, Gramp! You can't put her out when she's in a fix like this!"

Jeff looked over the top of his spectacles at beauty in distress.

"You'll probably get us into a lot of trouble with your rich kin-folks," he said dubiously.

"Oh, no," Polly assured him, "my folks won't bother you."

Zeke Hopper broke the awkward little silence that followed.

"Well, 'tain't none o' my business," he began, "but if I was doin' this—"

"But ye ain't!" Jeff whirled round on him. "You're just the kind of a man that would turn a girl out into the night when she's in a fix! Ain't you got any feelin's? Can't you show some hospitality?"

He turned to Polly again.

"Now don't expect anything fancy," he said.

Polly murmured her thanks, but Jeff told her to thank his grandson.

"I'll show you the spare room," said Earl, and he took her arm and led her off to the lounge-hall and up the staircase in it.

Zeke scowled at his employer.

"I declare, Jeff Daniels, if you ain't gettin' soft in the head!" he complained. "Takin' in a perfect stranger—and a woman, too!"

"It was Earl's idea, wasn't it?" challenged Jeff. "You know how he is when he gets set on something."

"Huh! From the way he was actin' I calculate he's kind o' set on her."

"You think so?"

"She's got a powerful lot o' money."

"I shouldn't like to see him get mixed up with a rich city girl," growled Jeff. "Only lead him on and then disappoint him. If I thought that boy was really—"

"S-s-sh!"

Earl and Polly were descending the stairs. Zeke began to stir some paste in an earthenware bowl he took from a dresser, and Jeff put away the fishing-rods and creels.

"I'm sure I'll be quite comfortable," Polly said as she entered the room. "It's awfully kind of you."

Earl announced that he must be getting back to Clearview and departed. Polly watched Zeke's manipulation of a spoon.

"That looks good," she remarked.

"Breakfast," said Jeff. "Cakes. Buckwheat."

"Can I help?"

"No, thanks," said Zeke coldly. "I do all the work."

"I'll go to bed, then," decided Polly. "Good-night."

The Telegram

EARL drove straight to the Union Hotel in Clearview, gathered Polly's things together in her room with the aid of a chambermaid, and went back to the farm with them tidily packed in her suitcase.

He left the suitcase with his grandfather, Polly being in bed, and returned to the little town. His intention was to see the manager of the hotel, but in the first instance he dropped in at Alce's Diner to find out what had happened there.

Mike Dugan was at the counter, talking to the Greek.

"Why don't you be a good guy and stop fronting for her?" he was saying as Earl entered. "Where is she?"

"I tell you the only thing I know is the Union Hotel," Alce replied with marked impatience.

"I've been over there four times and nobody's seen her! Come on, now!"

"Mister, you make me crazy!" Alce exploded. "I'm gonna throw you right out on your face!"

Earl walked up to the counter.

"If you're looking for that waitress of yours," he said, "I saw her get on the bus about an hour ago."

"A bus?" Mike exclaimed eagerly. "What bus?"

"Why, the one that goes to Boston," Earl replied.

"Well, how can I get there? Can I hire a car or something?"

"You could take a taxi over to New Haven," Earl informed him, "and catch the midnight train at Springfield. You'll probably meet the bus there the first thing in the morning."

"Oh, thanks, pal," Mike gave Alce's bald head a pat with his hand and went off in haste.

"Give me a cup of coffee," said Earl.

Alce did so, but he was nearly bursting with indignation.

"She don't even say good-bye," he complained. "Women's mind change took quick! The way she act make me sick! How's that?"

"Perfect," said Earl.

In the circumstances he decided not to see the manager of the hotel, but he bribed the chambermaid to secrecy before he set off once more for the farm, this time to seek his own bed.

Next day he was busy gleanng news for the "Clearview Clarion," but he had arranged, over breakfast, to take Polly out on the lake in the evening, and he was home before eight o'clock.

They strolled together across the fields at the back of the farmhouse to the magnificent stretch of water in which Jeff and Zeke had fished with glow-worms the night before, but the canoe he had intended to use proved to have a hole in it, so Polly sat on the bank of the lake, under a tree, while he dealt with the hole.

"Ready to launch," he said finally.

"It's awfully nice here," she murmured dreamily. "I've never looked at the moon through a tree before. The leaves break it up in little pieces like chunks of silver."

"Wait till you see the moon from across the lake," said he.

"Do we really have to go? I love it here! It's funny, because I've always wanted something different than I had—wanted to be somewhere else—and now I wouldn't even paddle across the lake for the moon."

"I don't get it," said Earl, dropping down beside her. "Everything I've ever dreamed of having I want twice as much on a night like this. Don't you really want to go for a canoe ride?"

"No," she said quite definitely, and they stayed on the bank and talked.

Time passed, and in the living-room of the farmhouse Jeff Daniels was darning one of his own socks when Zeke

Jeff Daniels entered with a tray containing eight assorted glasses, and he beamed at the supposed prince.

descended from the regions above wearing a trapper's fur cap upon his head and a belt round his waist. Over his shoulder he carried a rifle, and he looked a comie figure.

"What're you sittin' there for, worryin' about Earl and that young woman?" he demanded. "Come on to the meetin'!"

"I'm staying right here," declared Jeff.

"Why, this is the first meetin' of the Clearview Minute Men you've missed in five years!"

"Minute Men, eh?" Jeff eyed the hired man with scorn. "If you go out in that rig the dogs will run you into a tree for a 'coon!"

"Well, you fellows elected me sergeant-at-arms, and I got to have some kind of a uniform!"

"You certainly look like a fool in that get-up."

Zeke tossed his head.

"You're only sore because they didn't elect you!" he snorted. "Come on, we're late."

"I ain't going!"

"Well, I'm stayin', too!" Zeke laid the rifle on the table and picked up an apple.

"Here they come!" exclaimed Jeff.

Earl and Polly were mounting the steps of the back porch, and the door was open. As Earl was going back to town he said good-night to Polly on the top of the steps, then went straight off to his two-seater.

"Did you have a nice walk, Miss Barnes?" inquired Zeke as Polly stepped into the living-room.

"Yes," she replied. "We went down to the lake. The moon was simply gorgeous."

Jeff looked up at her over the top of his spectacles, and the atmosphere seemed to her to be distinctly chilly.

"Well, I'll go to bed," she decided. "Good-night."

She went out to the stairs, closing the door behind her, and Zeke said in a horrified voice to his employer:

"Did you see that? He wasn't a-kissin' her—she was a-kissin' him!"

"I know it!" returned Jeff grimly. "My eyes are as good as yours. Well, I guess that just about settles it!"

"What'cha goin' to do about it?" challenged Zeke. "Betcha don't do nothin'!"

"I won't, eh?" Jeff rose and went to an ancient little bureau, and he returned from it with a pad and a pencil which he banged down upon the table. "I'm goin' to send a telegram to her father to come right here and fetch her."

"Telegram?" echoed Zeke in amazement.

"Yes, collect. Sit down and write what I tell you."

Zeke seated himself at the table and picked up the pencil. Jeff sat down in his easy-chair and began to dictate.

"J. G. Barnes, New York City, New York."

"What about the address?" asked Zeke. "Don't you need a number to it?"

"The telegraph people will find him—everybody knows who he is. Go ahead. Your daughter is staying here with us. Please come and fetch her.—Yours truly, Jeff Daniels, Lakeside Farm, Clearview, Connecticut."

"There's more'n ten words there," said Zeke.

"So there is. Well, you better take out 'yours,' 'staying' and 'please.'"

"Takin' out 'please' makes it kind of impolite, don't you think?"

"So it does," Jeff scratched his head—and then Zeke laughed.

"Say, what are you worryin' about?"

July 10th, 1937.

he chuckled. "We're sendin' it collect."

"That's right." Jeff got up and walked about the room. "Well, you might as well add this into it: 'If you don't come up right soon we won't be responsible for what happens. We folks up here got our pride, and we don't hold with you city folks coming up here and upsetting things. And what's more I've stood for just about—'"

"Hi, you're goin' too fast!" howled Zeke.

"Aw, that's always the way! When I get a chance to do a little oratory you can't keep up!"

On the following morning Nick Morton and Frankie Haines visited Al Lustig in his Jersey City retreat, but only to report non-success.

"Mike was right," Frankie declared. "That dame Mabel has no more idea where the girl is than we have."

"You keep tailing her," barked Lustig. "And you stick in that barber's shop, Nick!"

Nick looked pained.

"Aw, can't I lay off, boss?" he asked plaintively. "I've been having so many treatments and tonics in that barber's shop you could smell me a mile away! And that isn't all! He stretched out a pair of perfectly manicured hands. "Look at these—and they call me the Gorilla!"

A telephone-bell rang, and Frankie answered its summons.

"It's Mike!" he exclaimed. "Yeah, this is Frankie. What? You found the girl?"

"Gimme that 'phone!" Lustig snatched away the instrument. "Hallo, Mike! This is Lustig. What? Well, of all the slug-nutty idiots in this world! Boston, huh! Get back to Clearview and wait until you hear from me!"

He banged down the telephone and turned to his two henchmen.

"Mike got caught in a fast shuffle," he said savagely. "Took a phoney steer and lost the girl!"

"So now we're right back to where we started from!" lamented Frankie.

"And why?" raged Lustig. "Because I've been leaving it up to you clucks to get me out of this jam. Mike goes chasing a foul ball, and you two guys have been falling for that dame Mabel's animal act. Well, she's gonna stop playing dumb! She knows her girl friend was in Clearview, and she knows where she is now. You've been using the wrong technique. From now on I'm going to give our friend Mabel my personal attention!"

That evening, when Mabel returned from the Courtland Hotel to the flat in East Eighteenth Street, she opened the door upon a scene of disorder and saw three men in the living-room, all of whom she recognised.

She emitted a cry of dismay, but Frankie Haines immediately slammed the door, and Nick Morton gripped her by the arm.

"Keep quiet!" he snarled.

"Take your hands off me!" she stormed.

"Let her go," said Lustig.

Nick let go of her, and she walked across a litter of papers, cushions and sheet music to a table on which she had left the breakfast things that morning.

"You gentlemen seem to have missed this!" she shrieked, and she hurled a cup and saucer across the room.

"Good for a laugh, eh?" rasped Lustig. "Well, you're through playing us for laughs, see?"

"Can I help it if you strike me as funny?" she retorted.

He smacked her in the face with the back of his hand.

"We've stopped kidding you, Mabel," he said. "We don't want to hurt you—we don't even want to hurt your girl friend Polly. But we want to make sure she's safe. Now, where is she?"

"I don't know, you dirty crook!" raged Mabel. "And if I did I wouldn't tell you!"

"You didn't know she was in Clearview, did you? She didn't write you from there?"

"No, she didn't. And if she did, what business is it of yours?"

"Let's take her out of here, Al," suggested Frankie.

"You guys could take me to China for all the good it'd do you!" she shouted; and then Lustig had her by one arm and Frankie had her by the other, and they bundled her out from the flat.

She tried to scream for help, but Lustig's hand was clapped over her mouth, and Nick jabbed the barrel of a gun against her back.

Down in East Eighteenth Street a closed car was waiting at the kerb.

Bad News!

MIKE DUGAN was kicking his heels on the veranda of the Union Hotel on the following afternoon, when a long, dark saloon came sweeping across the square and drew up below the steps. He rushed down to it and opened a door, and Al Lustig got out on to the pavement.

"Hallo, boss!" said Mike. "Gee, I thought you'd never get here!"

"Never mind that!" snapped Lustig. "What have you got?"

"Well, I—I got the bridal suite."

Nick, who was at the wheel of the car, laughed loudly. Frankie, beside him, made a grimace.

"I'm talking about the girl," said Lustig. "Have you found out anything?"

Mike replied that nobody seemed to know where she had gone.

"How about the guy that gave you the fake lead?"

"Well, I haven't been able to check on him yet."

"He must know something, or he wouldn't have gone to all that trouble to throw you a bone! We'll find him if we have to take this town apart. Come on, boys, may as well get something to eat."

Earl, at that moment, was in a field with Polly at some little distance from the farmhouse, and he was digging potatoes.

"I guess I'll always be a rube at heart," he said. "I love working out here when I get the chance. It's the peasant in me."

She was gathering up the potatoes as he dug them and putting them into a sack. A coloured handkerchief was knotted round her auburn hair, and her face was flushed.

"I like it here," she said. "Ever so much!"

"I kind of like having you here." He walked over to her. "Do you understand? What I'm trying to say is that I've fallen in love with you."

"That's what I've been hoping you'd say."

"You have?" He took her in his arms and kissed her.

"Earl!" she protested. "Out here in broad daylight?"

"There's no one to see us!" A soft nose rubbed against his shoulder—the nose of the horse they had brought with them to carry the potatoes. "Oh, I'd forgotten Ned! He seems to think it's time we started back."

"It is," said she.

They had left the field, and they were walking along the lane towards the farmhouse when he stopped abruptly and said:

"Maybe that shouldn't have happened back there."

"Why not, Earl?" she inquired, gazing at him in surprise.

"Well, I don't amount to anything—just one in a million, waiting for a break. Even when it comes it won't be much—nothing compared with what you're used to!"

"Oh, don't let's talk about it," she urged.

"But we must," he insisted. "It's not an easy decision for you to make, giving up all you have for what I have to offer. And that's the only way it'd work out. We wouldn't be happy otherwise."

"Oh, it'll all arrange itself somehow."

"It never will unless we take care of it. It's up to us. Let's both go down and have a talk with your father."

"It's not that simple, Earl." She was wishing she had told him the truth at the beginning. "We've found something much too wonderful to throw away, but—but there are other people."

"Well, let's go and see your—"

He broke off because a shock-headed youth on a buckboard had nearly caught up with them—a youth who collected New Haven papers from the junction and delivered some of them on his way to a newsagent in the town.

"Hi, Oscar!" he shouted.

A copy of a special edition of the "New Haven Evening News" was flung at his feet as the buckboard passed, and he picked it up.

"Speak of the devil!" he exclaimed.

"Let me see," said Polly.

"Look at that!" Earl pointed to a headline on the front page. "He's increased the reward. Say, if you went back to-night and walked in on your father, wouldn't he be surprised?"

But Polly had caught sight of another headline that horrified her: "Manicurist found slain." She took the paper from him, and somehow she found her voice.

"Earl, I'm not going back!" she said tremulously. "I can't involve you or anybody else in this!"

"Involve?" he echoed in astonishment. "But it's so simple. All you have to do is talk to your father."

"I can't. And I can't give you any reason. Let me go, Earl!"

She broke away from a hand that would have held her, and she flew along the lane to the house.

Up in the spare bed-room she read the story she had not dared to read in Earl's presence. There was not much of it. It ran:

"The bullet-riddled body of a woman identified as Mabel Donner, of Manhattan, was discovered early to-day in a ditch near Reidville by Matt Bennett, produce farmer, who immediately notified State police. Miss Donner was employed as a manicurist at a New York hotel. She is believed to be the victim of a gang."

Polly dropped the newspaper on the floor and flung herself upon the bed, sobbing bitterly.

Al Lustig and his companions were sitting on the veranda of the Union Hotel when the shock-headed youth delivered copies of the newspaper there, and Mike secured a copy.

He read the front page story with eyes that bulged nearly out of his head.

"Sure is news to me about Mabel!" he exclaimed, tossing the paper to Lustig. "I thought she—"

"Nobody's interested in what you thought!" retorted Lustig. "We couldn't let her talk—that's all!"

A few minutes later Mike caught sight of a two-seater coming towards the hotel across Market Square.

"Hi, look!" he cried, flinging out a hand. "There's the guy that sent me off to Boston!"

"Get him!" snapped Lustig. "Bring him here!"

Mike rushed down the steps, and at the corner of Main Street he caught up with Earl as that young man stopped the two-seater.

"Say, you're just the guy I'm looking for!" he shouted.

"Well, that's fine," returned Earl, "because you're just the man I want to see. We can quit kidding each other. I know you're after Dorothy Barnes."

"Dorothy Barnes?" Mike gaped at him in bewilderment.

"Yes," Earl joined him on the sidewalk. "I want you to do something for me. You tell the man you're working for that he should get in touch with me—Earl Daniels, 'Clearview Clarion.'"

"Got that?"

"Yeah," said Mike, "but wait a minute. He's here right now—he's over at the Union Hotel."

"J. G. Barnes is in town?"

"Oh, I don't mean J. G. Barnes."

"So it's Prince D'Aglio? He's here? Well, come on—I don't want to talk to you. He's the man I want to see!"

Mike could not make head or tail of it, but he went back to the veranda of the hotel, and Earl went with him.

"I've been looking forward to this, Prince D'Aglio," Earl said as Lustig rose to meet him. "I've been wanting to look at the man who'd let a thing like this go on. Dorothy Barnes ran away because of a quarrel over you, and she's been chased from pillar to post, driven half crazy. And what have you done about it?"

Nick and Frankie exchanged wondering glances, but Al Lustig was equal to almost any occasion.

"I've gone to a lot of trouble looking for her," he replied.

"Why don't you get Mr. Barnes to call off his bloodhounds?" raged Earl. "She'd come back to you then if she cared two cents for you!"

"They're offerin' five thousand dollars for him," cried Zeke, pointing his rifle at Lustig.

"But she does," said the supposed prince, "just like it says in the paper. She loves me."

"Well, I happen to think she's in love with me," Earl retorted. "So let's put the question up to her."

"You mean you'll take me to her?"

"Why not? I want to get this thing settled once and for all. If she wants to go with you, I bow out. And if she wants to stay, she stays, no matter what you or anybody else can say or do!"

"That'll be fine," purred Lustig. "Just lead me to her."

J. G. Barnes Arrives

JEFF DANIELS had captured a white chicken in the farmyard and had picked up a chopper by the wood-pile with the intention of decapitating the bird so that it could be eaten that evening. Zeke had wandered out to watch the operation and was squatting on a trestle.

"I can't understand how a man like this here Mr. Barnes could have made all his money," he remarked, "being so unpunctual. It's nigh on four o'clock. 'Pears to me like if he cared two hoots for his daughter he'd have been here 'fore now!"

"What're talking about?" scoffed Jeff. "He might have had trouble with his automobile. Don't it say in the papers how her folks are near crazy worrying about her? Didn't he offer two thousand dollars in the paper to-day?"

"What? Hi, look what you're doin'!"

Jeff had raised the chopper, but the white chicken had escaped from the block on which he had been holding it.

"Hi, catch that chicken!" he howled, and there followed a chase all over the farmyard.

Up in her bed-room, Polly had packed her suitcase, written a note, and put on a hat. She slipped the note under a porcelain lamp that stood on a table, and she was moving towards the door when Al Lustig's dark saloon drew up outside the gate behind Earl's two-seater, and he and Earl and Mike walked up the garden path together, Nick and Frankie bringing up the rear.

"Nice quiet place you've got here," observed Lustig. "Not many neighbours."

"Nearest one's about three miles," said Earl.

Polly had reached the bottom of the stairs when they entered the lounge-hall, Mabel's coat over her arm and a suitcase in her hand. She stopped short with a gasp at sight of Lustig.

"I told you she'd be surprised," said Earl.

"She'll get over it," said Lustig evenly, and stepped forward. "Why have you been running away from me, Dorothy? I've been looking everywhere for you these past two weeks."

Polly stared at him, but she made no response whatever.

"You see the little lady's embarrassed," he said to Earl, and caught hold of her arm. "Let's go off by ourselves and have a nice long talk."

But Earl caught hold of Lustig's arm.

"We agreed to do this openly while we're all together," he objected.

"If the prince wants to talk to the little lady," drawled Frankie, "why don't you let him?"

"Because he doesn't have to!" Earl retorted. "I brought Prince D'Aglio out here only because I wanted to get at the truth once and for all. Dorothy, are you really running away from him because of your father, or are the papers right? Do you want to marry him?"

July 10th, 1937.

"You brought him here to find that out?" gasped Polly.

"It was the only sure way to get everything settled. We're here, now, both of us. All you have to do is to make up your mind."

Lustig turned fiercely upon him.

"Listen, Daniels, if you want to get blunt—"

"Oh, no, please don't!" cried Polly.

"Let me talk to him alone, Earl."

"All right, if you say so," growled Earl; and Lustig led the girl away to the far end of the lounge-hall.

"How much have you told that rube?" he demanded in a low but menacing voice.

"Not a thing," she replied. "He believes I'm Dorothy Barnes. You heard him."

"You mean that whole routine is on the level?" he asked incredulously.

"Why, he wouldn't have brought you here if it weren't, would he?"

"I don't know. If I remember right, you're pretty good at framing fast alibis."

"You mustn't hurt him," pleaded Polly. "It won't do you any good to show your hand. If you leave now they won't find out who we are until—well, until it doesn't make any difference."

He looked at her searchingly for a moment, then nodded.

"Okay!" he said. "Keep up the act, and we'll get out of here."

"Oh, I will!" she faltered. "I promise!"

"But if this guy Earl makes one phoney move I'll count him in the party—and we'll finish the job right here in this house!"

He strode back to Earl.

"We're leaving," he said curtly.

"Leaving?" Earl looked blankly at Polly. "What is this?"

"I'm leaving, and she's going with me—that's all!" snapped Lustig.

"But I don't understand."

"What is there to understand, or to explain?" said Polly in what seemed to him an utterly heartless fashion. "I had to stay somewhere, and this was as good a place as any. Now he's come for me, and I'm going! You didn't think I was serious about settling down in a place like this, did you?"

"But I did," he said bitterly.

"That's the mind of a yokel, I guess."

"Take her bag, Mike," directed Lustig. "We'll find a Justice of the Peace and get married on our way to town."

Jeff Daniels and Zeke Hopper had entered the kitchen by way of the back door, and Mike was in the act of picking up the suitcase when Jeff rushed out into the lounge-hall.

"Here, hold on, hold on!" he shouted. "Hold your horses! Wait a minute, wait a minute! Who's gonna get married?"

"Miss Barnes and Prince D'Aglio," said his grandson most unhappily.

"Oh, is that the prince?" Jeff frowned at Lustig over the top of his spectacles, and Zeke screwed up his face.

"This is Mr. Daniels and Zeke Hopper," said Polly.

"How d'you do?" said Jeff, with every appearance of cordiality. "So you two are gonna get married, eh? Well—well, congratulations. You're gonna make the same colour hair!"

Polly found the situation almost intolerable.

"Hadn't we better get going?" she suggested.

"No, sree!" cried Jeff indignantly. "I won't hear of it! This is an occasion that'll stand a mite of celebration."

"Gramp," protested Earl, "they want to be on their way."

"Oh, there's plenty o' time!" Jeff turned to the hired man. "Go on and get some o' that apple cider in from the barn."

"Now, listen," said Lustig impatiently, "we haven't got time."

"Can't stop five minutes?" scoffed Jeff. "Sure you can! Ain't you princes got no bringing up? Go ahead, Earl, take 'em all into the parlour. And you, Zeke, go to the smoke-house and bring in some o' that elderberry wine."

"All the way out there?" grumbled Zeke. "We got some good ten-year-old grape wine down in the cellar."

Lustig motioned to his companions and followed Earl into the best room with Polly, where he and she became seated in adjacent chairs. Earl left them there because he had no desire to take part in any celebration, and he went off into the kitchen. His grandfather had bundled Zeke out on to the back porch, still arguing about the needlessness of going all the way to the smoke-house.

"Will you shut up, Zeke?" said Jeff. "We gotta keep 'em all here, ain't we? If the girl is gone when the father comes we don't get our money! Barnes offered the reward, not the prince. You get that elderberry wine—and take your time about it!"

Five minutes passed, and in the parlour Mike stalked about the carpet.

"How long do we have to stick around with these jug-heads?" he asked bleakly.

"May as well keep kidding 'em," said Lustig. "We'll have a fast one and then beat it."

Jeff Daniels entered with a tray containing eight assorted glasses, and he beamed at the supposed prince.

"Well, I shouldn't wonder if you folks wouldn't find Niagara Falls a right nice place for a honeymoon," he said. "You oughta be able to get excursion rates up there this time o' year."

"The guy you sent out for that elderberry wine," remarked Frankie from the other side of the room, "oughta be one of those Minute Men!"

"He is," chuckled Jeff. "He's sergeant-at-arms, and a great shot, too, Zeke is. I don't expect you city folks know much about guns."

"Guns?" echoed Frankie, with a glance for Nick. "We do all right."

Out in the lane a costly sedan had stopped behind Al Lustig's saloon, and the sound of a motor-horn reached the ears of those who were in the parlour.

"I'll bet that's one o' them tourists wants water for his radiator," said Jeff, and he put the tray on a table. "Well, just keep yourselves comfy, folks—I'll be right back."

He went out on to the front porch just in time to meet a tall, elderly, and very bulky man, wearing smoked glasses, who was ascending the steps.

"I'm Mr. Barnes," said the stranger. Jeff's mouth opened wide in company with his eyes.

"Not the—" he began excitedly.

"J. G. Barnes."

"Oh! Nice weather we're having."

"Yes, yes," said the millionaire impatiently, "but where's Dorothy?"

"In the parlour," said Jeff. "Come on!"

They entered the parlour, but the parlour was deserted. The voice of J. G. Barnes had penetrated to it, and a french window was wide open.

"Why, they were here!" exclaimed Jeff. "They must have gone into the kitchen!"

He led the way to the kitchen, and

(Continued on page 25)

The old railroad was in the hands of the receiver, for a motor-transport company, by modern methods and a great deal of underhand scheming, had taken away most of its trade. Finally, the railroad's fate rests on a race with the transport company. A gripping tale, starring Grant Withers and Dorothy Appleby

A Railroad in Jeopardy

THE driver and fireman leaned over the side of the cab of their engine and stared at the nearby road, along which a huge truck was clattering at a speed slightly faster than the goods train. The words "ARM-STRONG A.T.C. TRUCKING CORP." were easily distinguishable as they were painted in bright red on the side of the lorry.

"Hauling the freight that would've kept us out of bankruptcy," muttered Gus, the fireman, angrily.

The driver nodded his agreement.

"They've sure put the skids on the Moon Valley Railroad. Them and"—he paused to spit his disgust—"that new receiver."

"I'd like to get my hands on Mr. Doyle for just about five minutes."

"I'm afraid you'd have to stand in line for that, Gus."

"Well, maybe you can grin about it, this ain't your last run."

"I'm sorry, boy," Tom, the driver, laid a hand on the other's shoulder. "You got anything put by?"

"How could I—with a wife and baby to support."

"If I went to Jed Carson, maybe I could talk him into keeping you on. I started with him when this line was just a pup, so I reckon he'll listen to me."

"Thanks, Tom!" cried the fireman. "You're a pal."

The main offices of the Moon Valley Short Line were at Eden, and the skeleton staff went about their duties with gloomy faces. In a large office sat a white-haired old man, whose forehead was creased with lines of anger and worry as he perused over the note that had come by that morning's post.

"Kay! Kay!" he shouted fiercely. "I want you."

"Coming, grandfather!" came the answer in a clear, girlish voice, and the door opened to admit Kay Carson, who was an attractive and slim young brunette.

"Take a letter," snapped Jed Carson. "To Mr. Lawrence Doyle, receiver Moon Valley Short Line, Moon two-one-seven, Great Lakes Buildings, Chicago, Illinois."

"What is it this time?" sharply asked the girl. "More dismissals?"

"Yes." The pretty face was suffused with the red flush of anger.

"It's a pity someone can't dismiss Mr. Doyle with a well-aimed sledgehammer—I'd like to apply for the job personally."

"My dear sir," the old man began to dictate. "In reply to yours of the seventeenth allow me to point out that I have reduced my personnel to vanishing point—possibly you are going to run the railroad with robots. Of course, I have only devoted a paltry fifty years to railroading which can't be compared with four years in a law school. However, I have managed to struggle along without the aid of some egotistical, half-baked nineonpooop who thinks he can sit at a desk two thousand miles away and tell me how to run my business. Moreover—"

"Your blood pressure, dear," warned the girl, who knew how excited the old man could get.

"What did you stop me for?" belloved the old man. "Just as I was getting steam up."

Grandfather was unable to finish his letter because a nervous little man appeared and said in a hoarse whisper that Tom and Gus were outside. Old Jed sent his granddaughter out of the room on some pretext and told Trotter to bring the two men in. He sat in his chair, but would not look at Tom, as the driver began to ask that Gus be kept on because of his wife and child.

"I guess you don't realise it, Tom, but I don't run this railway any more," Jed said at last. "I'm just an office-boy. I can't keep Gus on, Tom, and what's worse I can't keep you on—your train's been cancelled."

"Thanks for trying, Jed," Tom murmured when he had got over the shock. "I wish I could tell you how it makes me feel—seeing you lose everything you worked for."

"Who says I've lost everything?" raved the old man. "I've fought competition in this before and I won, didn't I? It's going to take a lot more than a bull-headed receiver and those painted circus wagons to put me on the rocks, and don't forget it!"

In nearby offices of a luxurious nature a smooth-faced, smartly dressed man of thirty-five sat at a huge desk that had many telephones. He twirled his small black moustache and smoothed his greasy hair as if very pleased with himself. A door opened and a thickset, hard-eyed man entered.

"We'll need six new trucks, Mr. Armstrong, to handle the business that's piling in."

"Get along with what you have for the time being, Glover," ordered the president of the trucking company. "I expect to have control of the railroad within thirty days."

"Well, that'll give us a monopoly on the freight business," answered his manager. "What about this new receiver?"

Armstrong smiled.

"I think we'll find him quite friendly toward our interests. You see, I'm responsible for the appointment of Mr. Lawrence Doyle."

Close to the railroad depot was a small hotel run by a woman. There were only two railwaymen in the place when the swing doors opened to admit a tall young man. She smiled a welcome, and he took a stool at the bar. He asked if she had accommodation, and she told him that he could have his choice of two elegant rooms, and he took the one upstairs. He signed the book, and went upstairs to view the room and was very satisfied.

"Someone's honking the horn of my car a little impatiently," the young man said in a pleasant voice. "Guess I'd better go and see what's the matter."

He found a very charming and irate young woman, who pointed at the cars against the kerb. Kay Carson's car was jammed in the centre.

"They ought to give tickets to people who park like this." She stabbed her hand at a large white two-seater. "Look at this idiot—does he think my car's equipped with wings?"

"I don't suppose the young man thought at all," he answered, and, grinning broadly, moved his car so that she could get out.

Kay gave him a withering look, and, getting into her car, drove away. The young man stared after her admiringly, and then became aware of an old man who had been an interested spectator.

"Which is the way to the railroad depot, pop?" he asked.

"Follow her, and you can't miss it," the old man chuckled, and went on his way.

Kay Carson was furious when she found that the young man of the parking incident was following her, and she tried to shake him off by turning down a side road, but his car was speedy, and he was soon on her trail again. She flung out of her car at the depot, and stalked into the company offices. To her amazement she was followed.

"Don't you think this has gone far enough?" Her eyes flashed. "Run along, little boy, I work here."

"So do I," was the quiet and amused retort. "The name's Doyle."

"Not Lawrence Doyle?" she questioned.

"At your service."

Kay looked him up and down as if he were some kind of unpleasant worm. "I'll tell my grandfather you're here."

Doyle grinned at Trotter, who was eyeing him in a scared sort of way, and the young receiver grinned even more when he heard an irate voice:

"You mean to say he has the all-fired nerve to stick his face in here?"

"Grandfather, please remember your blood pressure," came the persuasive tones of the girl.

The next moment the dividing door was flung open and old Jed Carson stood there. His hair was on end and his eyes were glaring.

"Permit me to introduce myself—"

"I don't need any introduction to you!" shouted Jed. "One look at those glittering eyes, that selfish mouth and adding-machine heart—"

"Grandfather," anxiously the girl took his arm.

"This reception touches me deeply." Doyle was still smiling.

"Nothing could touch you deeply. Mr. Doyle," Jed Carson snapped out. "You're responsible for a tragic situation in this town. The people are facing starvation, and you seem to find it amusing."

July 10th, 1937.

The smile vanished.

"I don't find it amusing," quietly answered Doyle. "Nor do I consider myself responsible for the situation."

"Are you insinuating that I am, you impudent young whippersnapper?"

"Certainly," Doyle stared straight at the angry old president. "If you'd used your head and adopted a more drastic policy the last few years you wouldn't need me now."

"Need you. Why, you insufferable—"

"Grandfather!"

"Shut up!" Jed shook off her hand.

"I've run this railroad—"

"Right into bankruptcy," interrupted Lawrence Doyle. "I'm sorry, Mr. Carson, but we've got to face facts. I'm the doctor now, and if I consider that surgery's necessary to save the patient's life I'll operate."

"Surgery! Bah! Butchery! Very well, but remember, I'm going to stay right in this office and see that you don't steal one penny more than I can help—I know you receivers." He stepped back into his office. "And this door is the dividing line. Don't you dare to cross this threshold!"

Jed Carson crashed the door shut so violently that the glass window shattered. Jed glared through the aperture and then dragged down a blind. The girl gave Doyle a look of contempt and disdain and went into her grandfather's room.

"I hope you won't think too harshly of our esteemed president," nervously murmured Trotter. "I'm afraid he's a little upset. Permit me to introduce myself. I am Phineas K. Trotter, claims agent for the Moon Valley Short Line."

"Glad to know you, Trotter." Doyle held out a large hand, and gave the little man's hand a hearty grip. "Say, that last work-out has given me an appetite. Where do you eat around here?"

"At Mrs. Casey's Dinner Bucket, right close to the yards."

"Lead me to it," said Doyle.

In the short walk he learned that Trotter and Mrs. Casey were engaged, and Mrs. Casey was a wonderful woman, but she had rather a hasty temper. Doyle found she was another firework, but for all that he liked the look of her homely features.

"Bad cess to Mr. Lawrence Doyle," she cried, before they had scarce sat down on stools at the counter. "May all his children be stolen from the cradle, the crawling reptile. After his ruination of my business just let him have the nerve to step up here and ask for the rent."

"Maggie! Maggie!" wailed Trotter, making feeble signs for her to cease.

"Have you heard of the latest exploits of Mr. Lawrence Doyle?" Mrs. Casey was worked up. "Another train crew he's murdered wid one stroke of his cowardly pen, and five more foine men turned out to worry and freeze this winter. And what does he care, sitting up there in his foine steam-heated office. I wish his radiator would burst and blow him to perdition entirety."

"Always joking is Maggie," bleated Trotter.

"Joking is it I am?" snorted Maggie.

"What's the matter wid ye now? Have you got St. Vitus' dance?"

"Maggie, will you please let Mr. Doyle have some of your Irish stew?" Trotter stammered.

Maggie Casey now turned her fiery gaze on Lawrence Doyle.

"Mr. Doyle is it? Well, now that ye know what I think of ye I suppose you'll be throwing me out, too. It's two months I am overdue on the rent, so go ahead."

The young receiver chuckled.

"Not on a fine day like this, Mrs. Casey," he told her. "I'm going to wait two or three months and then I'm going to throw you out in a blizzard, when the snowdrifts are very deep. Your stew smells good, Mrs. Casey."

"You can't blame her for taking the viewpoint of the men," whispered Trotter as Maggie went across to a blazing fire. "She doesn't realise that this road needed a receiver."

Mrs. Casey had sharp ears, for she whipped round.

"What this road needs ain't a receiver," she cried. "But more tonnage."

An Uphill Fight

THE words of Mrs. Casey's had given Lawrence Doyle an idea, and on the morrow he decided to drive round the district and talk to some of the farmers. When he had been appointed receiver to the Moon Valley Short Line he had thought that all he would have to do would be to wind up the company, but he had not been very long in Eden before his ideas had changed. Old Jed Carson was a fine fighter and so was his granddaughter, and so seemed all the people associated with the railroad, and it was obvious that old methods, inferior rolling stock and general slackness had allowed dangerous rivals to steal the ground from under their feet. He was aroused from his thoughts by a hail, and saw a girl standing in the road waving her arms. It was Kay Carson, and she did not look very pleased to find that it was Larry Doyle that she had stopped. She had a puncture and the spare tyre was flat, and as it was four miles from town she had to accept a lift.

"Aren't you going back to town?" Kay was forced to ask when Larry took a right-hand turn at the cross-roads.

"I want to look up some of the farmers," he explained. "A man named Beasley was a regular customer of the line for years, and he dropped out about six months ago. Do you know him?"

"Certainly I know him," said the girl. "That's his farm ahead. Want to talk to him?"

"If you please."

Beasley himself came out to greet them, and after a few minutes' talk about conditions and the weather Larry brought the talk round to business, then Beasley stated why he gave his goods to Armstrong.

"But even if Armstrong's rates are lower, in the long run you're going to make a bigger profit shipping by freight," argued Larry. "By that I mean the condition of your produce when it reaches the market. In hot, dry trucks it's bound to wilt, but in iced, air-conditioned refrigerator cars it's gonna reach the market in A1 condition."

When Larry drove away he had an order for a shipment of lettuce, and Kay was beginning to wonder if this strong-jawed young Irishman was the interfering fool they had thought. They stopped at the next farm owned by Jones, and this time Larry stated that though the trucking company were cheaper he hoped very soon that the railroad would be quoting the same rates. Jones was stubborn, so Kay did some arguing.

"Mr. Jones, don't you owe the railroad something?"

"Not a penny."

"How about gratitude and loyalty?" said Kay. "Have you ever considered what the railroad's done for you? It brought your father out here, sold him this land at a very small down payment. Taught him to turn a barren desert into a farm. The railroad hasn't outlived its usefulness. All we need is the support of important men like yourself, Mr. Jones. If we had your account naturally others would follow. The farmers all rely on your good judgment."

They drove away, having secured a shipment of tomatoes.

"Nice team work, partner," admiringly cried Larry. "We're finding out what we've got to meet in the way of competition. We'll give Armstrong and his trucks a run for their money."

Jed Carson had a few things to say when he saw his granddaughter get out of Doyle's car.

"What do you mean traipsing round with that crook?" he demanded.

Jed Carson snorted when he heard that she had had to accept a lift because of a puncture, and more snorting when she reported that Doyle had been around getting business for the railroad. They had got back two old customers, Jones and Beasley.

"I'll have something to say to those two when I see 'em," muttered Jed. "And I still think Doyle's a road wrecker. This must be some trick."

When Glover heard that Jones and Beasley had gone back to the railroad he asked a man named Stymie to step into the room. Stymie was a tough and typical gangster.

"We've lost a couple of good customers, and they've got to be taught a lesson," stated Glover. "Their names are Jones and Beasley, and you'll find their names on some box-cars down at the valley siding. You will see that something happens to those box-cars."

One box-car was on a grade, and it was a simple matter for Stymie to release the brakes. Naturally, he perpetrated this sporting action in the middle of the night. The box-car went hurtling off the line and was smashed to pieces. For the other car Stymie had a more original method.

The next morning Glover had a visitor.

"My name's Doyle, receiver for the railroad. Are you Armstrong?"

"He isn't in," answered the crook manager. "My name's Glover. Glad to know you, Mr. Doyle. Won't you have a chair, Mr. Doyle?"

"Listen, Glover, one of our refrigerator cars was wrecked last night and a shipment of lettuce was sprayed with gasoline."

"That's the first I've heard of it," Glover answered, but there was a slight smile hovering round his thin lips. "That's too bad, isn't it?"

"Yes, both the shippers happen to be your former customers."

"You don't think we had anything to do with it?"

"I know you did, but I can't prove it."

"Then if I were you, Mr. Doyle, I wouldn't do too much talking," sneered Glover.

Next moment Glover started back in his seat in alarm, because the big Irishman was towering over him.

"I won't confine myself to talk. Get this. The next time anything happens to our shipments you're going to wake up and find half a dozen of those shiny trucks of yours ready for the scrap heap. Two can play that sort of game. That's all!"

Not many minutes later Armstrong appeared.

"Hallo, chief. Say, are you sure this new receiver understands about playing ball with us? He's been cutting into our business, and—"

"That isn't all he's cutting," Armstrong spoke viciously, and threw a blue paper on to the desk. "Look at those new rulings. He's obtained an okay from the Interstate Commerce Commission to meet our rates."

"This will hit us pretty hard," muttered Glover. "We've held the farmers in line only because our rates were lower. What do you make of it?"

"I think those Chicago attorneys picked me a very bright boy," Armstrong snarled. "I'll go across and offer him some inducements."

Larry walked into the office and had to listen for some moments to the ravings of Jed Carson. He got a little tired after a while, and told the old man that the wrecking of the box-cars was not his fault. The president snorted and retired back into his room.

"Trotter, tell Tom Wilson I want to see him right away."

Larry was busy over some papers when the outer door opened, and, glancing up, he found himself gazing at a visitor. There was an assured manner about this man that Larry did not like.

"My name's Armstrong."

"I've just come from your office."

"I'm sorry I missed you."

"I've been looking forward to having a talk with you," Larry answered quietly. "You and I have to come to some sort of understanding."

"Exactly, Doyle, that's what I had in mind when I had you appointed."

"Really?" This was a surprise to Larry.

"Yes, you owe your job to me," smoothly spoke Armstrong. "And I trust—"

The blind was jerked up and old Jed glowered through the hole in the smashed window. "I knew it! You conniving, two-faced double-crosser!" he bellowed. "You rat, so you'd hatch your dastardly plots in my office, would you? Well, I'll not stay here and listen to 'em!"

"We've lost a couple of good customers," said Glover. "And they've got to be taught a lesson!"

"Mr. Carson," began Larry, but the old man just slammed out of the room. The Irishman looked at the grinning transport president.

"Armstrong, I had no idea that you picked me, but I'm taking this job seriously. I'm going to build this road up, not break it."

"You're licked before you start," sneered Armstrong. "The whole town's against you, Doyle—even Carson. Why not be smart and co-operate with me? Make yourself an additional twenty thousand above your receiver's fees."

"That's very tempting—you certainly must want this road pretty badly." Larry glanced at the door as he heard a knock. "Come in."

"You sent for me, Mr. Doyle?" asked Tom Wilson.

"Yes, Tom, you're just in time." Larry looked at his visitor. "Now that our rates are even, Armstrong, I'm out to beat your time." He turned to the driver. "If I turn you loose with a cannonball freight could you cut off two hours on the run to Paradise?"

"I think I could do even better than that, Mr. Doyle."

"You'll get everything you care to ask for in the way of equipment. You will make the run Saturday."

"Saturday. Is that all, Mr. Doyle?"

"That's all."

"Just exactly what do you expect to gain by this?" Armstrong asked when they were alone.

"Mainly a crack at the Farmers' Co-operative Contract that you've been getting fat on. I'm going to run you out of business, Armstrong. You're not a legitimate trucking outfit—you're a racketeer. Now get out of here."

"You're making a bad mistake, fellow. I'll have a new receiver here in ten days."

"And you'll be thrown out of this office," Larry grinned as Trotter came into the office. "The very man for the job. Trotter, throw him out."

Trotter shook with fright, but Armstrong went because he did not like the steely glint in Doyle's eyes.

Speeding to Doom

THE papers had quite a lot to say about the Moon Valley Short Line's effort to regain its lost tonnage. Tom Wilson was at the throttle and would attempt to establish a four-hour schedule between Eden and Paradise, cutting three hours off the old run. If successful the railroad would have a decided advantage in bidding for the Farmers' Co-operative Contract, the richest transportation plum in the State.

The yards at Eden hummed with activity as engines and equipment were overhauled for the run, and on Saturday morning Larry had a final word with the driver. Old Jed Carson, behind his broken window, listened to every word.

"Don't take any chances, Tom," warned Larry. "We're not out to prove how fast a daredevil can yank tonnage over this line."

"I understand, sir. You want a fast schedule set up, but one we can make every day, rain or shine?"

"Exactly." Larry held out his hand. "Good luck, Tom."

When Larry left his office to go down to the track to witness the start he bumped into Kay in one of the corridors.

"Larry, there's something I've been wanting to tell you. That here's one Carson who appreciates what you've done. I'm awfully ashamed of the things I said about you."

July 10th, 1937.

"Forget it!" He slipped his hand through her arm and smiled at her fondly. "Maybe there's something I want to tell you, but—" There came three short and fierce whistle blasts. "That's the train. We'll have to run."

A small crowd saw Tom Wilson and Jake Harvey, his fireman, off from Eden on its test run. The engine and the freight cars had been cleaned up and overhauled, so the goods train made a grand picture.

Larry had given all the staff that could be spared the rest of the day off, and as they were all foregathering at Mrs. Casey, he decided to have all the reports of the run sent there from the various signal boxes.

"So the receiver's an honest man," Mrs. Casey said to Trotter. "It's a great wrong we've been doing the boy. I might have known it all along—there never was a blackguard by the name of Doyle."

And when Larry came into her eating-house she looked at him pleadingly.

"Mr. Doyle, I hope you'll forgive me for what I said the other day—I was a bit hasty like."

"What was it, Maggie?" chuckled Larry. "I've forgotten."

The good woman grinned happily.

"The minute I clapped eyes on you I knew you for the fine, upstanding, honest young fella that ye are."

"Now it's my head you'll be turning with your blarney," countered Larry.

Jed Carson was too proud to admit he had made a mistake in Larry Doyle and go to Mrs. Casey's, but he had to hear about the progress of the freight special, so he went and listened-in at one of the signal boxes. He became as excited as the signalman, especially when Tom Wilson did the run of ten miles to Red Butte in eleven minutes.

Naturally, there was tremendous excitement at Mrs. Casey's and the place was packed. The men may be excused for being a little dubious of Larry Doyle, but the fact that Kay Carson and Mrs. Casey seemed to like him was in his favour.

As Tom Wilson began to eat up the miles and gain time rapidly for the making of an improved schedule the men began to cheer, because they realised that trade would come back again to the Moon Valley Short Line, and there was only heard one pessimist, who kept on muttering that the speed was too fast for old equipment. The freight special passed through Whiteoaks, Pasito, Granite, Sherman, and at last reached Summit.

"More than half-way and just over two hours. Over fifty miles an hour and uphill. He'll be coasting downhill from now on," cried a man.

"Tom reckons he'll do the run in four hours," Kay whispered.

"And what an argument for the co-operative contract," chuckled Larry. "He's making that run too fast," muttered that lone but persistent moaner.

Larry would not have been so cheerful if he had known that Armstrong had given Stymie certain instructions.

The 'phone rang at Mrs. Casey's and Trotter took the call. The little man went as white as a sheet.

"They've piled up!" he gasped out. "Outside of Blackrock Tunnel. Tom and the fireman killed."

Larry did not loose his head, but rushed out of the eating house, at once and ordered the breakdown gang to get out to the tunnel with the wrecker.

That night the men began to gather together in groups, and it was Gus, whom Tom Wilson had done his best to befriend, who was stirring up trouble now.

"He's a murderer!" he shouted, his eyes blazing. "He killed old Tom as sure as if he'd shot him. He lays off crews of track men, and then he orders that speed with old equipment."

In the morning the Eden newspaper's front page was all devoted to the train smash, and there was one statement that goaded Gus to fury.

"He thinks he can pull wool over our eyes with this!" Gus cried to the men. "A thousand dollars reward will be paid for the arrest and conviction of the person or persons responsible for the wrecking of freight train X19 at Blackrock Tunnel, and it's signed 'Lawrence Doyle, receiver.' He's the man responsible for dozens of railway men being out of work, he's responsible for this accident. Are we going to let him get away with it?"

The wild words of one man inflamed the listeners so that they lost sight of reason. A mob went pouring down Main Street towards the company offices. The sheriff heard about it.

"The mob's gone crazy," he shouted to his deputies. "We'll have to get Doyle outa town quick."

Kay saw the mob and tore through the streets in her car. Larry was working when she rushed into the office.

"Larry, they're after you!" she panted out. "My car's downstairs! Take it, quick!"

Larry Doyle took the news calmly. He had heard the mutterings on the previous day, but it made him glad that this girl had taken a risk in coming here to warn him. He walked to a window and pulled aside the curtain. Already men were swarming through the depot gates.

"Phew, what a mob!"

"This is no time for bravery," Kay screamed at him. "Every man and woman out there hates you."

"I'm not brave." He shook his head. "I'm scared stiff. Besides, we Doyles are notoriously poor runners, but thanks for warning me."

The sheriff and some of his deputies got to the depot first and they gripped their shot-guns. The crowd milled forward, shouting and yelling that they wanted Doyle. Then little Trotter lined up beside the sheriff and glared at the mob—he was a hundred per cent for Doyle.

Larry flung open the doors and walked out on to the veranda. The mob hesitated as if daunted by such courage.

"Before you men do anything"—Larry spoke in ringing tones—"you'd better make sure you've got the right man!"

"We've got the right man all right!" shouted Gus. "You're not fooling us! If you'd kept on full section crews there wouldn't have been a loose rail!"

"There wasn't a loose rail."

"Liar! Murderer!" yelled Gus, and then the crowd began to yell and sway forward.

"Get back, you fools!" bellowed the sheriff. "Stop it, I tell you, or I'll have to shoot!"

It was the sudden and unexpected appearance of Jed Carson that quietened the mob. Their beloved president raised his hands and there was instant quiet.

"I've got something to say about this as well as you," Carson cried. "Now listen, men." He paused and glanced at Larry, standing very stiff and straight. Kay was by the young Irishman's side and trying to smile to hide her fear. "I'll tell you the truth about this man." Jed faced the crowd again. "In all the years we've worked together, have you ever known me to fail you?"

There were yells of "No!"

"Have I ever made you a promise that I didn't keep?"

The cries of dissent were deafening.

"Have I ever lied to you?"

There were stentorian yells of denial.

"Well, then, when I tell you something I know to be true, you'll believe me, won't you?"

"We sure will!" came the cry of the crowd.

"Well, there wasn't a loose rail," Jed cried. "Now listen. I didn't trust this man, so I checked up on him myself. And, men, he took every precaution that either you or I could have taken and Tom told me himself that he asked him to be careful. The road-master will tell you that he ordered an official investigation of every inch of track from here to Paradise." He held out his hand in token of friendship to Larry.

Larry, after a hearty handshake, raised his hands for silence.

"Listen, men, somebody's out to wreck this road," he shouted. "A carload of tomatoes doesn't smash itself. Gasoline doesn't spray itself over a shipment of lettuce. The wreck that killed those two men last night tied up this entire road, and who gets the freight that we lose?"

Glover had heard that there was unrest among the men, and he had joined with the mob and encouraged their fiery tempers. Larry had spotted him, and his last remarks were directed at the crook.

Glover pushed forward.

"Take that back or prove it!"

"I can't prove anything yet, Glover," said Doyle. "But get this, I'm putting on armed guards, and the next time you or your men set foot on railroad property you'll regret it."

"This platform's railroad property, isn't it?" jeered Glover.

"Yes."

Glover considered he was being smart when he stepped on to the veranda, but he regretted it, because a fist like a piston shot out and hurled him backwards.

The crowd applauded, and Glover got many a punch and kick as he ran the gauntlet of the railroad men.

Trapped

ARMSTRONG gazed contemptuously at his bruised and battered manager.

"So you flopped. With this muffing we may lose the Farmers' Co-operative Contract."

"So I muffed it, huh?" shouted Glover. "I told you we ought to get rid of that Doyle bird."

"The farmers are meeting to-morrow, and that tonnage contract will be a w a r d e d," said Armstrong. "If the railroad gets it, it's curtains for us. It's up to you and Stymie to see that Doyle don't get there, but there must be no shooting. We can't afford any publicity."

Kay and Larry were clearing up a few things at the office, when the phone went and Kay took it.

"It's for you, Larry."

"This is one of the new specials guarding the yards." It was Stymie making the call. "I wanna report a door open on a loaded refrigerator car, P.F.E. five one four, track six, and it looks like someone's been around."

"I'll look into it right away." Larry hung up, then looked at the girl. "Trace that call for me, Kay, will you, please?"

"Hallo, hallo! Operator, where'd that call come from, please? Yard-master's office. Thank you!"

Larry handed her some notes.

"Could you type that up for me? It's about the contract. I'll sign it when I come back. Then you run along home."

Larry touched his pocket and felt to see if his gun were there, then he took a torch from a drawer and went down to the depot sidings. He soon found the open refrigerator door and glanced round, but did not see the figure of Stymie crouching beneath the bogies.

Larry flashed his torch inside and then climbed up for a better investigation. Instantly Stymie crawled out of hiding and tiptoed forward. A swift rush and he had flung the door shut before Larry was able to get there. Stymie laughed as he locked the door. Doyle could yell himself hoarse, but no one would be likely to hear him. He would be frozen stiff before anyone found him, and naturally it would look like an accident.

A shrill whistle made the crook turn and he saw an engine and some trucks moving down the siding. He scuttled away to watch, and how he roared to himself when a linesman linked up the freight cars and he saw the refrigerator car, with much clutter and noise, drawn out of the depot yard and away for some distant destination.

It was freezing cold in the car, and after making a number of attempts to break open the doors Larry drew his coat closer to himself.

Jed Carson came to the office the next morning and found a worried and distracted Kay.

"I can't find Larry," she told her grandfather. "He went to see about some freight car with a door open and told me to go home after I'd finished. No one seems to know where he is."

"Well, you've picked a fine time to lose him," snapped old Carson.

"Something must have happened to him," the girl cried anxiously. "Everything that Larry's been working for depends on that contract to-day."

"The damned fool!" snorted Jed. "Well, if he's not here he can't get it, but we can. Come on, Kay."

It seemed hours to the prisoner as the refrigerator car jolted along the track. It was so cold that Larry was frightened he would be numbed into slumber. It was in the small hours of the morning that the goods train stopped in a siding, and Larry heard a noise above him. What could that be? Then he knew. It was a brakeman walking along on top of the cars and seeing that everything was all right. The prisoner took out his gun and aimed it in as safe a direction as he could. That brakeman got a shock when a bullet passed through the roof about three yards behind him. At first he did not know what it was. He glanced round, and two more bullets zoomed through the roof, and then the man knew that someone must be imprisoned in the refrigerator car. The brake man gave a signal to the driver that something was amiss.

The Co-operative meeting was for 2.30. There was a certain amount of discussion first, and then the chairman sent a messenger to bring in the applicants for the contract. Armstrong stepped into the room, and handed over his bid for the contract.

Larry found the open refrigerator door and glanced round, but he did not see the figure of Stymie crouching under the next car.

"I wonder what's detaining Doyle?" cried the chairman.

"Possibly he realises he can't meet this bid," Armstrong murmured with a cynical sneer.

"I hope Doyle's trains keep better time than he does," cried one of the committee.

"Sorry to be late, gentlemen," murmured a voice, and Jed Carson stepped into the room, followed by his daughter.

"Here's our bid, Mr. Knox." Kay handed over the document that she had typed for Larry and which he had intended to sign.

"This offers to meet the Armstrong bid," murmured the chairman. "But it's signed by Mr. Carson."

"Well, what difference does that make?" demanded Jed.

"Because your road's in receivership, Mr. Carson," Armstrong stated with a triumphant smile. "Its only legal representative is the receiver."

"Is that so?" Jed was roused at once. "Well, let me tell you something. I've signed papers for this road ever since it was—"

"Never mind, darling, never mind—" Kay stopped the old man.

"Seeing as how Mr. Doyle don't think enough of us to show up, I move we give the contract to Armstrong," cried one of the fruit growers, who had been studying the two offers. "The rates are the same."

"The rates may be the same, but our time's faster," argued Kay.

"Our new freight schedule is four hours from here to Paradise. Can you beat that?" stated Jed, truculently glowering at Armstrong.

The racketeer smiled serenely.

"Faster than any train you've got— for money, marbles or chalk. The roof's off for that wager."

"Why not make it for the Co-op contract?" demanded Kay eagerly.

"If a qualified representative of the road were here I'd take up that proposition." Armstrong answered, but the smile went from his face as Larry Doyle stepped into the room.

"I'll call that proposition, Armstrong."

"Where in blazes have you been?" Jed wanted to know.

"I'll tell you later," Larry soothed the old president, and addressed the chairman. "I'm sorry to be so late, but unfortunate circumstances delayed me. The railroad rates are the same as the Trucking Company, but we're hours quicker. Armstrong does not seem to agree with me, and he seems willing to back his trucks against the railroad, and if possible, gentlemen, I should like to take up this bet."

The chairman glanced round for a decision.

"Very well," he said after a show of hands. "We'll award the contract to the bidder making the fastest run next Saturday, starting at 2 p.m."

"But this is ridiculous," shouted Armstrong. "The railroad hasn't a chance."

"Don't be too sure, Armstrong." Larry stuck out his jaw aggressively. "You can't put the whole railroad in a refrigerator car."

Armstrong curled his lip in an ugly glance, and hurried from the meeting without answering.

Larry told the whole story to the sheriff.

"Did you get a look at the man?"

"Sure I did," Larry nodded. "He looked inside for a moment, and I picked him out with my torch, just before he July 10th, 1937.

slammed the door. It was Glover's man, Stymie."

"We'll be on the look out for that bright bird," the sheriff vowed. "Think they'll try anything more, Larry?"

"They won't dare," answered Larry confidently.

But Armstrong was a desperate man and his cunning brain had thought out a method that would successfully stop the train from ever completing the run.

The Empty Water-tank

MAGGIE CASEY often had some of the Armstrong Trucking drivers into her eating-house, and they made her so mad when they said that the race was as good as won. She would bet them any money they liked.

"You haven't got another decent engine in the company," one driver sneered. "These other old crocks can't do more than thirty miles an hour."

"There's three of the B Class that can do fifty and more," Maggie flashed back. "And it may surprise you to know that when the Lincoln went off the track by Blackrock Tunnel she wasn't so much damaged as you think. If ye would be after seeing a foine sight jest see her when she pulls outa here on Saturday."

"It's all right to bet the rent money," called out a voice from the counter. It was Larry.

Maggie smiled at him proudly, and accepted another bet of a level fifty bucks.

At a quarter to two the town was almost deserted, for every man, woman and child was at the railway depot.

A howl of rage went up when a messenger came down from the Armstrong Company to say that the trucks had started, but Larry Doyle would not let his freight train start till the stroke of two.

"But where's grandfather?" Kay asked Larry anxiously. "He'd have a fit if he missed seeing you off, the poor old darling."

"Not so much of the old," shouted a voice, and they turned round to see grandfather leaning over the cab of the engine. "Look here, young lady, when you're my age you'll be much older than I am."

Larry laughed, then glanced at his watch. "Almost time."

"Larry, I'm frightened." The girl clung to his arm.

"Well, don't be. They won't do anything to us this time," Larry pointed to a truck that bristled with armed men. "Look at those boys, and they're all armed."

"But if they wrecked a train once, they might—"

"That's just one thing they won't dare try again."

"I suppose you're right, darling." Kay flung her arms round his neck.

"The best of luck, darling."

In the guardsvan were Trotter, Mrs. Casey and Kay. Maggie was armed with an umbrella should any of the varmints try any of their tricks.

The report of a pistol, a shrill blast from the locomotive, and then the freight train began to move. The men and women and children screamed themselves hoarse as the train moved gracefully away down the track.

Soon the train was moving at a steady thirty. The speed increased to forty and then to fifty.

"Faster—faster!" Jed Carson yelled at the driver. "Give her more steam, boys."

But Stymie had been busy, and before dawn he had sneaked away from the town in a fast car. His destination was a distant halt where there was a water tank. He sneered contemptuously when he found that no one had been placed on guard, and very soon he had completed his evil work.

The freight train was now thundering along the track at over sixty miles an hour, and Jed Carson was leaning over the side of the cab and shading his eyes. Very soon they would come in sight of the road, which ran by the side of the track for several miles.

"It won't be long now before we pass them varmints," Maggie shouted at Kay. "Look at the speed we're going."

Little Trotter blinked nervously and hoped the train would not go off the line.

"We certainly are travelling," agreed Kay. "Look how we are flashing past the trees."

Old Jed had constituted himself the person in charge of the engine.

"Give me steam, Ben," he shouted to Ben Hudson, the driver.

"Any more steam and we'll run out of water before we hit Brown's tank," said Ben.

"If we can hold her at this we'll catch 'em," commented Larry, who was helping as a spare fireman.

"Catch 'em!" Jed gave a snort. "We want to pass 'em! By gosh, there they are."

They crowded to the side of the cab, and ahead on the dusty road could be discerned three moving objects that glittered in the sun.

Gradually the train began to gain. Ben opened the throttle and the great engine seemed to leap forward.

"We're gaining on 'em!" yelled Jed.

The distant lessened and lessened, and at last the train and the trucks were level. Old Jed waved his hand tauntingly at the Armstrong drivers as the freight train began to pass. The old man yelled with joy because just ahead the road crossed the railroad, and the trucks put on all speed in an effort to beat the train to the crossing. They had to stop to avoid a crash, and the train got a good lead before the trucks were able to resume the race.

"Brown's tank ahead," yelled Ben, as he began to slow. "Get ready to take on water."

The engine pulled up by the huge water tank. An engineer reached out with a long pole and pulled down the tank spout.

"Ben," he shouted. "She's bone dry!"

They stared at the tank and the engineer in consternation.

Jed Carson pointed a shaking hand towards the distant road. "There go the trucks."

"Start refilling the tank right away," ordered Larry.

"We can't," answered the engineer. "Look at this!"

Larry found himself gazing at a smashed valve.

"They've smashed the valve," stated the engineer.

"The vandals!" cried Jed Carson, who had seized a gun. "How much water in the tank?"

"About knee deep," came the report.

"And there they go with the contracts," mumbled Jed Carson savagely. "If I could get my hands on—" He broke off, because he had seen a man hiding in some bushes. He gripped his gun and crouched like a stalker after his prey.

None saw Jed Carson leave the tank and go down the track, and it was only Jed that saw a man—it was Stymie—open a door of a truck and jump quickly inside. Jed gripped the gun more eagerly.

(Continued on page 26)

"LADY FROM NOWHERE"

(Continued from page 18)

Earl started up from a chair in which he had been brooding over the fickleness of Polly. But there was nobody else in there.

"This gentleman wired me my daughter was here," said Barnes. "My name is Barnes."

"Where's that lady, Earl?" asked Jeff.

Earl heard a sound as of a car being backed up, and he went to an open window and looked out from it into the lane.

"The lovers have flown the coop," he said sourly. "There they go!"

Zeke burst into the kitchen from the back porch on which he had dumped an earthenware jar.

"They just went down the lane!" he cried. "I seed 'em! Oh, are you Mr. Barnes?"

"Yes," replied that very annoyed millionaire. "J. G. Barnes. Get out of the way!"

But Zeke clung to him.

"Beg your pardon," he said, "but I want to ask you about the reward."

"You'll get the reward when you hand over my daughter, and not before!" roared the distracted father. "Now let me out of here!"

"Mr. Barnes," began Jeff, following him through the lounge-hall to the front door, "I just wanted to tell you—"

"Don't tell me anything! Call the police! Tell them to get my daughter!"

J. G. Barnes, in spite of his bulk, jumped the steps and sped down the path to the gate, and out at the gate into the waiting sedan.

"Follow that car!" he blared at the uniformed chauffeur behind the wheel.

Captured!

IN the lounge-hall of the farmhouse Jeff and Zeke blinked at one another in consternation.

"Did you hear what he said?" howled Jeff. "Police! If they get hold of her we won't get the reward! We got to take this in our own hands. Go on, Zeke, roust out them Minute Men!"

"Gramp," said Zeke, "they're roused!" And he snatched the receiver from a wall telephone under the stairs.

Minute Men were originally a product of the American War of Independence, and they are a kind of militia, following their own occupations, but undertaking to turn out for service at a moment's notice. Zeke commanded, as sergeant-at-arms, the exclusive attention of the girl at the local exchange.

"The Minute Men are mobilising," he told her, "and I want to talk to 'em all. No, no, no; one at a time! Gimme Rufe Wallace first."

Jeff got a pad and pencil from the living-room and sat down beside his hired man to make notes, while away in the distance J. G. Barnes urged his chauffeur to greater effort because Lustig's dark saloon had disappeared round a bend.

"Listen, Rufe," said Zeke urgently, when the captain of the Minute Men had been obtained for him, "drop whatever you're doin' and get the fellows out on the road in that 'Q' formation we've been practising. We're gonna catch the Barnes girl. What?" He turned dismally to Jeff. "Rufe says it ain't fittin' for the Minute Men to chase anything but a public enemy," he lamented. "He won't go!"

"We'll get him," said Jeff confidently. "Offer him ten dollars."

But Rufe knew all about the reward offered by J. G. Barnes, and he demanded a hundred dollars.

"Chiseller!" snorted Jeff. "Give it to him! Still leaves us nineteen hundred."

Zeke said into the telephone:

"All right, Rufe, you horse-trader, we'll pay it. Get out on that road!"

The saloon, by this time, was seven miles away, travelling through a pleasant landscape of meadows and trees and grassy hills upon a road that was distinctly rough. Polly, seated between Lustig and Nick, felt that she needed something to steady her nerves, and she asked for a cigarette.

"It's a bad habit, girlie," said Nick, proffering his own case, "but maybe you won't have it for long!"

Rufe Wallace, encouraged by the prospect of receiving a hundred dollars, was doing some telephoning on his own account, and the Minute Men were springing into action, one after another, north, south, east and west. Abner Wood, for instance, had herded his cows and was driving them across some pasture-land towards a very narrow bridge.

But Zeke was having trouble with some of the others.

"Al Faneher wants fifty dollars and our spotted cow," he turned to inform Jeff.

"You mean my spotted Jersey cow?" gulped Jeff. "Ask him to take the bull."

The bull was offered, but the cow was insisted upon.

"Give it to him," said Jeff recklessly.

The telephoning continued, the notes on Jeff's pad accumulated.

"That blocks everything within twenty miles," he announced gleefully, "excepting Breakneck Road. Call out the Fire Department for that. They'll block it!"

"The Fire Department will go for nothing," Zeke presently announced.

"Now, there's honest men," said Jeff.

"But they want to know if they should wear their uniforms."

"Well, they got to wear something."

Zeke informed the captain of the Fire Department that the "boys" could wear what they liked, and then went off to get his rifle. Jeff rushed into the kitchen.

"The Minute Men are mobilising," he said to Earl. "Are you coming?"

"No," Earl replied. "I've been waiting to use the 'phone."

"Come on, Gramp!" called Zeke. "I got your gun!"

Jeff was still carrying the pad and the pencil. He joined Zeke in the lounge-hall, and they scurried off to Earl's two-seater and went off in it, Zeke at the wheel.

The dark saloon had just descended a hill at tremendous speed, but Mike, who was driving, had to slow down at the bottom of the hill, for there the road twisted abruptly to the right and narrowed to a bridge. In the middle of the road, round the corner, Abner Wood was standing with his legs wide and his arms outflung.

Mike braked in haste, and Lustig thrust his head out of a window.

"What's the matter?" he shouted.

"Stop there, you darn fool!" Abner roared back at him. "Can't you see my cows?"

Lustig certainly could see his cows, completely blocking the bridge from end to end, and on his instructions Mike backed and turned the saloon and set off to find another road.

The sedan in which J. G. Barnes was pursuing the saloon had been left behind, but it shot past the saloon a quarter of a mile up the hill, and it had to go to the bottom to turn. The saloon laboured upwards.

Earl, meanwhile, had put through a call to the "New York Express," the reporter in him having triumphed over the disappointed lover. After a very brief period of waiting he got through to the news editor of the paper and told him that Dorothy Barnes was in the neighbourhood, escaping with her Prince D'Aglio, and that old man Barnes was chasing after them.

"My good young man," retorted the news editor, "you're crazy! Dorothy Barnes and Prince D'Aglio sailed just an hour ago for Europe on the Normandie. Take my advice and forget about princes and fairy tales, but there's a rumour that Al Lustig, the killer, is up in your neck of the woods, and he's after some girl up there. Now, if you could get me a lead on him, that'd be a story."

"Al Lustig?" gasped Earl. "Why, it must be him, not the prince. Okay, I'll call you back."

He hung up the receiver and he tore out from the house. But his two-seater had gone, and there was not another vehicle in sight except an ancient buggy in the yard and a motor-tractor in a shed. He decided to use the tractor.

At the top of the hill which it so recently had descended, the dark saloon was turned to the left down another hill; but Rufe Wallace had taken charge of that way out of the district, and at the foot of it one of his men was standing with him beside a cart piled high with coops containing chickens.

"Here they come!" Rufe exclaimed as he caught sight of two cars descending the hill, one a considerable distance behind the other. "Two of 'em! Pull her across the road, Joe!"

Joe pulled the cart across the road broadside on to the approaching saloon, and he and Rufe climbed a bank. The saloon drew nearer, and there was no room for it to pass.

"Don't lift your foot, Mike!" bellowed Lustig, who was beginning to think that these obstructions could not be accidental.

"Okay," gritted Mike.

There followed a terrific crash, the cart collapsed, the coops fell in all directions, breaking open as they fell, and scores of chickens rose up into the air.

The saloon swept on, hardly damaged at all, but Rufe had provided another barrier a hundred yards or so farther along the narrow road—a barrier in the shape of a heavy wagon, springless, and piled high with hay.

"Keep going!" snarled Lustig.

But Mike jammed on the brakes instead.

"Hit that, and the only way we're going is back!" he growled.

At almost the same moment a motor fire-engine came roaring along the road out of a side turning beyond the hay-wagon and was brought to a standstill. Its siren shrieked, and then from it the men of the fire department descended in all the glory of their uniforms, their helmets glittering in the sunlight.

The siren acted as a signal to all the other Minute Men who had taken other roads, and immediately all manner of vehicles began to converge upon what was in fact the tail of the "Q" they had formed.

It was the owner of the hay-wagon who opened the back door of the saloon, and he had a pitchfork in his hand.

"Speed her up, Prince!" he said commandingly.

Behind him crowded other men, most of them armed with rifles, and Lustig and his three henchmen knew better than to try to draw their guns.

"You crazy loon, do I look like a prince?" demanded Lustig. "Does she look like a millionaire's daughter?"

"Can't say if you do, or if you don't," returned the farmer impartially. "Never associated with princes or such. But you're gonna wait until Zeke gets here. Give 'em the signal, boys—the two and the three."

The siren of the fire-engine shrieked again and again across the landscape, and Zeke heard the signal just as he was about to turn down the hill that led to the cow-packed bridge.

"That's 'em!" cried Jeff. "They're down Breakneck Road, by the sound of it!"

The two-seater shot off down the other hill, at the bottom of which Lustig was being detained.

"If you insist on keeping us here," raged the crook, "I'll take this to court!"

"I've heard that before, Prince," said the owner of the hay-wagon placidly; and then the sedan pulled up behind the saloon and J. G. Barnes jumped down from it amongst the Minute Men. "I'm J. G. Barnes," he said.

"You Barnes?" Rufe Wallace stepped forward. "Well, we got your daughter!"

"Get out of my way!" Barnes forced a passage for himself to the saloon, and Lustig immediately got out from it to meet him.

"Where's my daughter, sir?" snapped the millionaire.

"Mr. Barnes," responded Lustig, "you've arrived just in time! These farmers have made a terrible mistake—they think she's your daughter!"

Barnes gave one swift glance at Polly, who was still sitting in the saloon, and then he whirled round on the crowd of armed men.

"Why, this is preposterous!" he exploded. "I've never seen this man, or that woman, in my life before!"

"You mean she ain't your daughter?" asked Rufe Wallace in amazement.

"I mean this is all rubbish!"

"D'you think we oughta let 'em go?" Rufe Wallace inquired of the captain of the fire department.

"Sure," decided that official. "It's all that fool Zeke's doing! He got us into this!"

"We oughta ride him outa town on a rail," said a farmer; and then the two-seater arrived and Zeke and Jeff were seen to be getting out from it.

"Did you catch 'em?" Zeke panted, as he came running over with his rifle in his hands.

"Yeah, we caught 'em," returned an irate farmer, "but it ain't them!"

"Talk sense, Ed!" rebuked Jeff.

"You're tellin' us to talk sense?" howled Rufe. "I want my money!"

Other voices clamoured for payment. "Listen," Zeke broke in desperately, "this fellow said he was the prince, and she over there said she was the Barnes girl!"

Lustig emitted a scornful laugh. "If you keep listening to these G-men," he jeered, "they'll tell you I'm Dillinger."

"And let me advise you," roared J. G. Barnes, "that obstructing a public highway is a civil offence. Now you fellows clear this road at once!"

July 10th, 1937.

"I can't understand," complained Zeke.

"I can," said Jeff miserably. "We lose two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars and a Jersey cow!"

Down the hill across the grass came a motor-tractor at a speed which suggested it was out of control, and Earl was driving it.

"Here comes our boy friend," said Lustig, scrambling back into the saloon. "Let's cut our way out of here!"

The thing he suggested was practically impossible, and in any case he spoke too late. The tractor broke through a rail fence and smashed into the left front wing of the saloon with such violence that Earl was flung clean over the bonnet.

"Don't let him get away!" he yelled frantically as he picked himself up. "He's Lustig the killer!"

Lustig got out at the other door of the saloon with a wild idea of escaping on foot; but Earl was over the bonnet again before he could start running, and they went down together with a thud and rolled in the dust, clawing at one another's throats.

They rose together, fighting furiously, but the battle was of brief duration. Earl sprawled on the ground from a left hook that caught him on the side of the jaw, and Lustig was immediately grabbed by some of the Minute Men and held prisoner.

His three companions were hauled out from their seats, and Polly stood on the running-board.

"They're offerin' five thousand dollars for him!" cried Zeke, pointing his rifle at Lustig; and Jeff immediately began to work out a sum on his pad.

"That gives us a profit!" he exulted. "Two hundred and fifty—"

"Are you Lustig?" demanded Zeke. Lustig did not reply, and Jeff completed his sum, but got the total wrong.

"That gives us a profit of two thousand seven hundred dollars to the good," he said joyfully. "You are our prisoners! Carry on, men!"

Polly jumped down from the running-board and squeezed her way through the crowd to Earl.

"Are you hurt?" she asked anxiously.

"I've been looking for you," he said with a shake of his dishevelled head. "Come on, I've got a story to get out!"

In the lounge-hall of the farmhouse, nearly an hour later, he told the story over the telephone to the news editor of the "New York Express."

"And they're in the county gaol right this time," he wound up. "The two men officially credited with the capture are Jeff Daniels and Zeke Hopper. Yes, that's right—and that's the whole story. What?"

He turned to Polly, who was close beside him, with excitement shining in his eyes.

"They want me to go to New York," he said rather breathlessly. "Write an eye-witness' account—take a steady job! What d'you think o' that?"

"I think it's great!" declared Polly with enthusiasm.

"Okay!" he said into the telephone. "I'll be leaving right away!"

Jeff and Zeke looked into the lounge-hall from the front porch a moment after he had hung up the receiver, and they saw Polly in his arms.

"He's kissin' her now!" said Zeke.

"So he is," said Jeff. "Well, let 'em carry on."

(By permission of Columbia Pictures Corporation, Ltd., starring Mary Astor and Charles Quigley.)

"PARADISE EXPRESS"

(Continued from page 24)

"We can't let the trucking company win." Larry's brains were working fast. "I've got an idea. Back to the cab, everyone. Ben, start her rolling."

"Without water?" gasped the driver. "We'll blow up the boiler," cried the engineer.

"I'll take that responsibility," snapped Larry. "Start the engine. All you trainmen get on the roof of that first refrigerator car. Trotter, you get up with the men and help."

"What we gonna use for water?" Ben asked.

"There's frozen water in that refrigerator car," answered the receiver. "The boys are going to open up the hatch of that car, smash up the ice with crowbars and then pass it back to the tender. It will soon melt in the boiler. Boys, get going!"

No one missed Jed Carson as the train gathered speed.

A Desperate Finish

THE driver gave a sigh of relief as he looked at the gauges on the boiler. It had been touch and go because they had been almost out of water. Already the boiler was half full, and the boys were forming a chain passing the ice along the roof. Naturally, he could not go very fast or the men would all be swept away.

"Pass that ice along as quickly as you can," ordered Larry.

Old Trotter had never worked on the roof of a moving train and he was scared stiff, but he stuck to it. If Maggie did not marry him after this heroism—well, he would be surprised. Several times he almost fell off the roof, but somehow he stuck it.

It was Stymie who had hidden in the refrigerator car. He had stayed to gloat over his evil work. He would hide in the train, and get a good laugh as it crawled along the track. Besides, he wanted to see that they did not get any water.

Jed Carson saw Stymie enter the car, and his lined face creased into a grin. Very quietly he opened the door of the truck and clumbed in, but he kept his gun ready. Stymie crouched in a corner, and feared to draw his gun lest the report be heard. If he were caught on this train he looked like being torn to pieces. He picked up a crowbar that he had found. He would brain whoever it was and make a get-away.

"Drop that!" snapped Jed, who had the eyes of a cat where darkness was concerned. "One move from you and I'll fill you full of lead. Now chuck your gun over here."

Sullenly the crook obeyed.

"Now take off your coat!"

"What for?"

"Do as I say," snarled old Jedson, like an angry tiger. "If you don't take it off in five seconds—"

Stymie obeyed.

"Have a heart." The wretch began to shiver. "This is a refrigerator car—I'll freeze."

"It'll do you a lot of good. You're too hot-blooded, anyway," cackled Jed, who was enjoying himself, especially now the train was going fast. "Now take off your shirt."

Jed Carson wrapped most of Stymie's attire round himself. "I'm all for warmth, young man," Jed cackled at the shivering crook. "You can walk up and down, but by heck if you try any funny stuff I'll let daylight into you."

The pressure gauge was at ninety and the train was roaring down the track. Safely it passed the spot where Tom Wilson and the fireman lost their lives, and at last there came the down grade. Anxiously they scanned the brief glimpses of the road for sight of the trucks, but considerable time had been lost. The breaking up of the ice and getting it to the tender had meant a reduced speed.

At the end of the race there was a crowd twice the size of the one at Eden. Armstrong and Glover were there, and they were smiling as they listened to the reports that came in by phone. The trucks were still well ahead.

"I guess you'd better give me that contract now, sheriff, and save time," triumphantly cried the gloating Armstrong.

"The race ain't over yet." The sheriff had no liking for this man.

Not until five miles from the end of the race did they glimpse the trucks.

"They have to take a hill and a bad bend," Larry yelled to the driver. "The railroad cuts through the hill, so we've got a good chance. Ben, let her have every bit of steam you've got."

The last mile had the road and railway running side by side, but the road crossed the railroad. Once again the trucks tried to get to the crossing first.

"Smash 'em to blazes if they don't pull up," yelled the engineer excitedly. "Show the dirty chisellers no mercy!"

The truck-drivers had no desire to be smashed to pulp, and they braked. The road into the town was good, and they trod on their accelerators in a desperate effort to save the race.

But the train was slightly ahead, and though the driver had to brake hard to avoid smashing through into the buffers beyond it made no difference. The Moon Valley Short Line finished up a good train-length to the good.

"Nice work, boys, nice work," commented Larry, as he jumped down from the cab.

The noise of the cheering was deafening. Armstrong and Glover looked at Larry with baffled fury. The chairman of the Farmers' Co-operative handed Larry the prize.

"Thanks for this contract, Mr. Knox," he said simply. "And thanks for helping to put every man back to work."

Kay came running along the track, and she smiled proudly at Larry, then she began to peer round. She pushed through and touched Larry on the arm.

"Where's grandfather?"

"Didn't he get in the guard's van with you?" asked Larry. "Why, I thought the old man—"

A sudden yell made everyone glance round, and they saw a strange spectacle. A figure all muffled in garments and clutching a gun had jumped down and was pointing the gun and yelling at someone to come out. A half-naked, shivering creature appeared and rolled out of the car.

"Get up—go on!" yelled grandfather.

Armstrong and Glover glanced apprehensively at each other when they saw the quaking wretch was Stymie. Triumphantly the old boy herded his man towards the group.

"Grandfather, where have you been?"

"Where'd you think—the Tropics?"

Jed laughed fiercely, and then pointed the gun at Stymie. "Sheriff, arrest this man!" He pointed the gun at Armstrong and Glover. "And those two men as well."

"This is ridiculous!" shouted Armstrong.

"Oh, is it?" chuckled Jed, and handed over a piece of paper. "You just wait till you read the confession your man Stymie signed."

Glover capitulated at once.

"I didn't have anything to do with wrecking that freight!" he screamed as men gripped him by the shoulder. "I swear I didn't!" He pointed to Armstrong. "It was his idea. He told Stymie to do it."

Armstrong saw that he was cornered and suddenly crashed his fist into the nearest man. It gave Glover a chance to break free, and the two men raced blindly down the track in a hopeless endeavour to escape. But they were soon captured and marched away by the sheriff to the gaol.

"I'll take along the confession, Jed," stated the sheriff, and then laughed heartily because the confession was written on the back of an unpaid grocery bill. "You should have this framed when I give it to you back, 'cause I reckon you won't be getting any more of 'em."

At last the crowd dribbled away to the nearest saloons to celebrate. Maggie even allowed Trotter to take her arm. Old Jed Carson winked and nudged the sheriff as Larry went off with his arm round Kay.

"I'm going to let him marry her," he whispered. "And the day of the wedding I'll make him vice-president of the Moon Valley Short Line," he laughed, and winked. "Too good a man to lose."

(By permission of the British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Grant Withers as Larry Doyle and Dorothy Appleby as Kay Carson.)

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"THE MOUNTIES ARE COMING."

—Don Loring, Bob Livingston; Doris Colton Kay Hughes; Salvation, Guinn "Big Boy" Williams; Whipsaw, Raymond Hutton; Burr, Fred Kohler; Raspinaff, Robert Warwick; Father Jose, William Farnum; Petroff, Bob Kortman; Talbot, John Merton; Captain Fremont, Ray Corrigan; Colton, Lloyd Ingraham; Anderson, William Desmond; Barson, Yakima Canutt; Peters, Tracy Layne; Ivan Bud Hope; Pedro, Steve Clemente; Harris, Bud Osborne; Robert Loring, John O'Brien; Senor Loring, Henry Hall; Dark Feather, Philip Armenta; Kramer, Stanley Blystone.

"LADY FROM NOWHERE."

—Polly Dunlop, Mary Astor; Earl Daniels, Charles Quigley; James Gordon Barnes, Thurston Hall; Zeke Hopper, Victor Kilian; Jeff Daniels, Spencer Charters; Al Lustig, Norman Willis; Mike Dugan, Gene Morgan; Mabel Donner, Rita la Roy; Frankie Haines, Matty Fain; Nick Morton, John Tyrell.

"PARADISE EXPRESS."

—Larry Doyle, Grant Withers; Kay Carson, Dorothy Appleby; Trotter, Arthur Hoyt; Maggie Casey, Maud Eburne; Jed Carson, Harry Davenport; Armstrong, Donald Kirke; Glover, Arthur Loft; Tom Wilson, Lew Kelly; Stymie, Anthony Pawley; Gus, John Holland.

"THE MOUNTIES ARE COMING"

(Continued from page 8)

"I was expecting you," he said. "Tell me, are these all trained soldiers you have with you?"

"To a man," was the reply. "All of them have seen service in the Czar's army."

Burr seemed well satisfied, and was about to make some remark when he remembered the existence of Don.

"Here," he growled, beckoning to two of his hirelings, "put this fellow under lock and key. I want to question him, but I haven't time now."

Don was marched away, and a minute or two later was bundled into a dark and noisome room that apparently served as a dungeon. No sooner had he been left alone, however, than he began to peel off his grey suit, to disclose a black riding-kit identical to that in which Barson had died.

He then produced a mask, and, adjusting it so that it disguised his features, he unwrapped a phable whip which had been wound about his waist and which he invariably carried in his rôle of mystery rider.

He now stood revealed as the Eagle, and it remained for him to escape from his cell.

The door did not look too stout, but Don did not choose to force it. Instead he turned his attention on the roof of his prison, which was in a singularly dilapidated condition, the plaster having fallen away from the rafters in many places.

Don raised the long whip that was in his possession. He had brought it for a special purpose, but it served another use now, for he was able to snare one of the roof beams with its thong and pull himself upward. Then, climbing through a gap in the ceiling, he found himself in a disused corridor above the dungeon.

A back-stair linked this corridor with an upper floor, and he mounted the steps and let himself quietly into a room at the top of them. But that room was not empty, for it was occupied by an elderly man and a young and beautiful girl—the Coltons.

Father and daughter recoiled at sight of the masked interloper, and then the girl spoke in a hushed voice:

"You—you are the Eagle!" she faltered.

"Yes," Don answered. "But I know that you are no friends of Jason Burr. Where is he?"

"I—saw him go to the library on the ground floor," Doris Colton told him. "He came in from the courtyard a few seconds ago. What are you going to do?"

Don's eyes were hard.

"Teach him a lesson, that's all. The library, eh? Good! I think I can find my way there."

Thanks to the information he had obtained regarding the stronghold during the past week, he had little difficulty in locating the apartment to which Burr had retired after the arrival of the Cossacks, and as he stole into that room he saw the man standing there with his back to him, poring over a volume that dealt with the subject of mining.

"Keep still, Jason Burr," Don warned, covering him with a revolver. "Your first move will be your last."

The general dropped the book that he was holding, and his ugly mouth fell agape as he turned his head to see the black-clad figure who faced him with a whip in one hand and a gun in the other.

"Yes, I am the Eagle," Don remarked, drawing back a pace and contriving to lock the door that he had closed behind him. "You don't seem to have expected me, in spite of the message I sent you by that fool organ-player."

Jason Burr found his voice.

"Listen," he said hoarsely. "I know I've tried to get you, but it strikes me that I can use a smart man like you. Yes, and I can make you one of the richest men in this province if you're so minded. I have unlimited gold, and the backing of one of the greatest countries in the world, and with the conquest of California as my goal—"

Don interrupted him. He was beginning to see Burr's gigantic project now—the motive behind the reign of terror he had instituted. But he was not impressed by the man's suggestion that he should throw in with him. Burr was frightened by the gun in Don's fist, and was trying to make terms, which he would break only too readily at the first opportunity.

"Does your campaign include the whipping of innocent priests?" the masked intruder asked deliberately.

"Yes, if they stand in my way."

"Then here is my answer," Don ground out. "Take off your coat!"

He had to repeat the command and stress it with a movement of the revolver before Burr would obey. Then, with fear and malevolence in his eyes, the general slid his glance to the whip that Don was grasping.

"You hit me with that and I'll make you regret it as long as you live!" he said through clenched teeth.

The only response was a slashing stroke of the thong, the first of a series of blows that drove Burr screaming to his knees. But even though the black-guard grovelled abjectly Don continued to flog him—until the man's clothing was ripped in a dozen places and the flesh beneath scored with innumerable weals—and until his loud-lunged shrieks brought a party of his gangsters to the door.

Only then did Don cease to belabour him, and, his own safety at stake, he scrambled through a window that opened on to a small patio separated from the main courtyard by an archway.

Thirty seconds later Burr's men had smashed their way into the library, and, struggling to his feet, babbling incoherently, the general blundered from the room with them.

They stumbled out into the sunlight, and were met by Petroff and several of the recently arrived Cossacks.

"The Eagle!" Burr shouted. "A thousand dollars in gold for the man who captures the Eagle!"

Petroff and the other Russians were staring at the general in bewilderment, amazed by his dishevelled appearance and by the marks of the punishment he had received. For the moment, indeed, they seemed too dumbfounded to make any move, and their inactivity seemed to incense Burr the more.

"The Eagle, I tell you!" he screamed. "Get him, Petroff! Summon your troops! He's somewhere in the hacienda. He can't have escaped, for there are sentries at every exit."

He finally succeeded in rousing the Cossack hetman, who dashed off across the courtyard to round up his compatriots in full force. At the same time Burr swung round on those of his hirelings who had broken into the library, and ordered them to scatter and search every nook and cranny of the stronghold.

Attracted by the bellowing voice of their leader, other members of Burr's gang were issuing from their quarters by now, and ere long Petroff reappeared with a mob of Cossacks at his heels. But as yet there was no sign of Don. He had vanished completely, although Jason Burr was certain that he was still within the fortified hacienda, and continued to rave and shout like one demented.

Meanwhile armed men were assembling at all points, and, news of the mystery intruder's presence spreading like wildfire, a roar suddenly went up as a dark figure was espied on the watch-tower that dominated the stronghold.

It was the figure of the Eagle, and, knowing that the gates of the fortress were too well guarded to permit of his escape, he had ascended to the summit of the tower and was now making his way round its parapet to gain that side of it which overlooked the deep waters of the Yuba River.

"Get him, you fools!" Jason Burr howled to his swarming partisans, gangsters and Cossacks alike. "Open fire on him, curse you!"

A carbine was discharged by one of the Russians. Then a blattering salvo arose on every hand, and all at once that lone figure high up on the summit of the watch-tower was seen to reel—to lose his foothold—and to plunge into empty space!

(To be continued in another thrilling episode next week. By permission of the British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Bob Livingston.)

(Continued from page 2)

Curious Accident to Ann Southern

A curious accident, yet one that can easily happen—and probably frequently has done—occurred and kept Ann Southern out of the cast of the Radio picture, "There Goes My Girl" for seven days. Playing a scene with Geno Raymond, Miss Southern was supposed to duck behind a couch to avoid being seen by her fellow-player. The actress ducked so swiftly, however, that her chin struck the arm of the couch with such force that her teeth bit through her lower lip. Four stitches were put in the wound, but fortunately, no scar followed.

The picture, "There Goes My Girl," which is a story of newspaper reporters whose love for each other battles with their anxiety to succeed as reporters, is to be presented in this country shortly.

American Who Likes Cricket

Noel Madison, playing a gangster chief in Jessie Matthews' "Gangway," now being produced at Pinewood, is an American citizen who knows nothing about baseball but a lot about cricket; doesn't understand American football, but closely follows the fortunes of Soccer teams playing in the English League.

The explanation is that Madison was brought to England just before the War by his famous actor father, Maurice Moscovitch, and was educated here.

Eventually he returned to America to go on the stage, and in three plays respectively appeared as an English undergraduate, a Cockney crook and a Cockney sailor!

Something had to be done about what his countrymen called his "English accent," so when he went to Hollywood to play in pictures he got Jimmy Cagney to coach him in the native idiom and slang.

He has since appeared in numerous gangster rôles, each an incisive, menacing and polished portrait of lawlessness.

Altogether Madison has played in some 70 films, notable pictures being "Manhattan Melodrama," "G-Men" and "Manhattan Madness."

Madison has a son, aged nine, who is at school in Sussex, and largely for this reason hopes to remain in England for some time.

Next to cricket and Soccer his interests lie in collecting first editions, old engravings and mezzos-tints, and acting as treasurer of the Screen Actors' Guild, of which he is a founder-member.

XMAS CLUBS

Spare-Time Agents Wanted

for OLDEST, LARGEST and BEST CLUB. Write for Giant Art Catalogue and full particulars. No Outlay. Excellent Commission. FREE GIFT TO ALL APPLICANTS.

SAMUEL DRIVER, Ltd., Burton Rd., Leeds.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back! Complete Course, 5/-. Details—L. A. Stebbing, (A), 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2.

STAMPS

300 DIFFERENT, inc. Airmail, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Pictorials, Colonials Price 6d. (Abroad 1/-).—W. A. WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

HAVE YOU A RED NOSE?

Send a stamp, and you will learn how to rid yourself of such a terrible affliction free of charge. Address in confidence—T. J. TEMPLE, Specialist, "Palace House," 128, Shaftesbury Avenue, LONDON, W.1. (Est. 35 years.)

BE MANLY

I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing Jan. 2 Course adds 10-25 lbs. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms), also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism. Surprise your friends! Complete Course, 5/-. Details from privately—STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Rd., LONDON, N.W.2.

TALL

Your Height increased in 12 days or no cost. New discovery adds 2.5 ins. I gained 4 ins. Guaranteed safe. Full Course 5/-. Details: J. B. MORLEY, 17, Cheapside, London, E.C.2.

ALL applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "BOY'S CINEMA," The Fleetway House, Farringdon St., London, E.C.4.

BOY'S CINEMA

FOUR COMPLETE FILM DRAMAS
INSIDE!

No. 919.

EVERY TUESDAY

July 24th, 1937.

2^D

A SAGA
OF THE SEAS

CAPTAINS COURAGEOUS

Starring SPENCER TRACY and FREDDIE BARTHOLOMEW

"CAPTAINS

July 24th, 1937.

A rich man's spoiled son falls overboard from a liner and is picked up by a Portuguese fisherman. As a member of the fishing fleet, he has to work hard, and gradually the influence of these rough, but honest folk begins to have its effect on the lad. A stirring drama of the sea, starring Freddie Bartholomew, Spencer Tracy, and Lionel Barrymore

COURAGEOUS

The Rich Man's Spoiled Son

HARVEY CHEYNE was the only son of a very wealthy and very busy man. The father owned so many companies and interests that he devoted all his time to business—since his wife had died work helped him to forget his sorrow. That the boy had a lot of pocket-money, was sent to the best of schools, and had every wish granted was what the father imagined to be sufficient in parental duty.

When Harvey came home for the holidays he could do just as he pleased. If he wanted to ask six boys for the holidays it was all right; he could have his breakfast in bed; if he fancied some expensive toy he could order it. The servants referred to the ten-year-old son of the house as a "spoiled brat," and they weren't far wrong.

Mr. Cheyne was immensely proud of his son, and he told everybody that his son was editor of the school magazine. He did not realize that Harvey had obtained that rank because the printing press had been donated to the school by himself. Now, Harvey had a tremendous admiration for his father, and he tried to copy his father's methods, but the boy's ideas of how big business men made their money were a trifle warped through reading the wrong kind of books.

The boys did not dislike Harvey, but they wished he would not swank so much. He had so much pocket-money, and his father was so generous to the school, that Harvey's head missed the cuffing that might have done so much good.

Tyler was a young master at the school, and he objected to Harvey trying to bribe the boys to make him a member of the Buffaloes, the lodge of the school. Tyler, who was not very wealthy, found an envelope containing fifty dollars in his study, and was furious when he found that Harvey had put it there so that Tyler would be his friend.

As a result, Harvey Cheyne was placed in Coventry for forty-eight hours by Dr. Finley, the headmaster.

Nobody would speak to the boy, and that made the rich man's son very rebellious. They would not let him help with the editing of the school magazine, and he tried hard to make them talk so that he could report on them. Harvey was so rude to one big boy that the latter lost his temper and knocked him down.

The boys left him, nursing a swollen cheek and wiping a blood trickle from a cut lip. Harvey got up and found that a bottle of printing ink had been spilled and some had gone on his clothes. The dark eyes in the pale face lit up. He wiped ink all over his clothes and on his face and sneaked out of the school without being seen.

A taxi took him to his father's office. The driver had refused at first, but ten dollars is a lot of money.

Harvey staggered in with his face all twisted. He had disarranged his clothing and dabbed ink in his curly hair, and he looked a sight. He limped, and when questioned by his amazed father and the family doctor, at first pretended he would not tell. Finally Harvey informed them it was printing ink, and he had got his leg hurt trying to escape.

"What do you mean, trying to escape?" questioned the father.

"Cause they had me a prisoner at the school and nobody could talk to me," solemnly answered the boy. "I guess they were scared I would talk."

"Who was scared?"

"Tyler and all of them. Tyler's a master. He kept me out of the Buffaloes and he took a bribe."

The boy told such a tale that the father decided on action. He instructed his secretary to get in touch with Dr. Finley and ask the headmaster to call round that night and see him and to bring Mr. Tyler as well.

That night from kindly Dr. Finley the rich man awoke to the fact that his wonderful son was not all that a father might desire.

"You have placed extraordinary sums of money at his disposal," explained the Head. "Too large for a small boy. Your accusation that your son has been bullied and made a prisoner is not the truth. He was put into Coventry on the complaint of Mr. Tyler by myself, and he deserved it. If your son came home covered in ink and complaining of injuries, then they were self-inflicted." He then explained the boy's attempt to bribe the young master. "He seems to think he's a specially privileged character," concluded Dr. Finley. "His attempt to resist the normal, healthy discipline of being put into Coventry brought no further discipline from us, but it did bring him a solid bash on the nose from one of his fellow pupils. It was a blow, I'm sorry to say, that any one of the other hundred and twenty boys in the school would have been glad to deliver."

It was Tyler who soothed the worried father.

"Harvey, Mr. Cheyne, is great material. He's simply been mis-directed, that's all. He has a mind and brain keener than any boy in the school. Perhaps it's not my place to say this, Mr. Cheyne, but it's simply because you and he have never had any relationship. To him you're just a machine pouring out money, a machine he's trying to imitate."

"Thank you, Mr. Tyler, it seems to me that you're right." Cheyne turned to the headmaster. "I give you permission to deal with Harvey as drastically as his future conduct deserves."

"I'm afraid we'll have to leave that in your hands for a while, Mr. Cheyne. For the rest of the spring term, at least, Harvey will have to be rusticated," the Head said decisively. "That means temporarily sent down. I'm sorry, Mr. Cheyne."

"I'm sure that when Harvey comes back in the autumn"—Tyler tried to soften the bad news—"he'll be a boy we'll all be proud of."

So Cheyne was forced to put aside his business for a while and consider the problem of his son. As he had to go to England on business on one of his own ships he decided to take the boy with him. Perhaps he would be able to learn the rôle of a father.

Harvey was delighted not to be going back to school, and to be going abroad with his father on the Queen Anne. But the boy noticed a change in his parent. A certain sternness of manner, and there was no longer such a liberal supply of pocket-money.

On board, Harvey was again left a great deal to himself, and he had to swank to other boys about the liner being owned by his father and how he could go on the bridge if he wanted.

One afternoon the ship ran into a fog, and on that occasion Master Harvey was feeling rather queer, because he had been consuming too many ice-cream sodas. He wanted to be sick, but his pride made him fight against such a babyish weakness. He went up on deck and hoped no one would see him.

The ship rolled unexpectedly, and Harvey, who was feeling very ill and giddy, fell overboard. No one heard the splash on board the ship or his faint cries for help.

Beginning of a New Life

A FISHING dory wallowed in the waves, with a big fellow keeping it moving quite fast by the oar he used so expertly over the stern. A dark, smiling, queer sort of fellow with a great woollen helmet over his tousled brown hair. He stared at a vague shape in the fog.

"Uh, you try run Manuel down. You big killer whale with smoke spout, you try swaller Manuel like he little smelt, huh?" He laughed, and forgetting the fact that the liner had nearly run him down, began to sing: "On the Isle of Fishamingo lived a chief called Bingo-Bingo—" He broke off to glance round. Knowing all the noises of the sea, he detected at once a sound that was unfamiliar.

"Help! Help!" came a very faint cry.

Manuel pulled a limp, scarcely conscious body out of the water.

"Fifteen years I been fishing, and first time I ever catch fish like you," he said, and began to squeeze and punnel the boy to get the water out of his stomach.

July 24th, 1937.

Satisfied that the boy was all right, Manuel picked up a conch shell and made a queer echoing noise that carried far. A hail came out of the fog and Manuel started rowing. A shadow became the shape of a fishing schooner with the queer name of "We're Here" blazoned on her stern.

"I got a new kind of fish," Manuel shouted as he came alongside. "He got no tail and he's got pants on his dorsal fin. I think maybe he about ten year old."

"Well, well, if it ain't a boy," exclaimed Captain Disko.

The hands of the fishing schooner wanted to know how this boy had got into the sea, and Manuel told them that he must have fallen off the liner that had passed so close to him in the fog. The kindly captain said that unless the kid wanted to get his death of cold he must be put to bed.

It was a shock for Harvey Cheyne when he woke feeling weak and sick to find himself in a place that smelt of fish. He managed to turn, and found himself in a bunk which looked like a cook-house. A black fellow was busy at a stove, and, hearing the boy move, brought him some gruel. Harvey managed to sit up and swallow some of the liquid, which tasted terrible.

(Top) Harvey informed them that he had got his leg hurt trying to escape.

(Bottom) Harvey wanted to be sick, but his pride made him fight against such a babyish weakness.

"Howse you feeling, boy?" asked the cook, who was known as "Doc."

"I—fell, didn't I?" said the boy. "Did you pull me out of the water?"

"Nooo. Manuel, he fished you aboard."

"Is this a fishing boat?" the boy asked. "Something smells terribly bad."

"Ain't nothing smells bad around here," cried Doc. "The fish, them's nice clean, salt fish. Seventy crates already done salted down in the fore-hold."

When Harvey found that he was alone on this ship, and that the liner had gone on, he insisted on going on deck to speak to the captain. He looked a queer figure in Manuel's long, thick blue shirt and the shoes the cook lent him.

The captain listened with his head on one side to Harvey's demand that the ship go at once to Europe, so he could join his father. The boy was furious when the captain answered that the schooner was from Gloucester, Massachusetts, and had just arrived off the Grand Banks and would not be returning till the autumn. When they were through with fishing they'd take him. Harvey cried that his father was rich, but Captain Disko said he could not take a chance of losing a lot of money for a boy. The fish must come first.

A solemn, round-eyed youngster stood by the captain and looked at Harvey with contempt. It was Dan, the captain's son. He laughed when Harvey said that Frank Burton Cheyne, his father, owned the boat off which he had fallen. The captain ordered his son to take Harvey below and fix him up with some clothes.

(Top) "Well, well, if it ain't a boy!" exclaimed Captain Disko.

(Bottom) "Is this a fishing boat?" Harvey asked. "Something smells terribly bad."

Harvey complained that the clothes made him itch, but Dan only laughed. A shout from above, and Dan said he must get on deck and help unload the dories of their fish. No one paid any attention to the boy when he climbed up the stairs and saw fish of all shapes and sizes being hurled aboard.

"Ah, there my new kind of fish," said a kindly voice. "How you feel, little fish?"

It was Manuel.

Harvey tried to talk to the captain, but Disko was too busy giving orders about the cleaning and stowing of the fish, though he did shout over his shoulder that it would be three months before they got back with full holds to Gloucester. Later the captain found time to talk to the boy.

"All of us here share in the fishing," he explained. "And heading back to Gloucester now, we'd maybe lose all next winter's daily bread for us and our folks. You wouldn't want that, now, would you?"

"Are you crazy?" rudely shouted Harvey. "I told you my father had more money than nearly anybody. Why—"

The grizzled face of the captain hardened at the tone.

"Gangway, boy!" he rasped out, and pushed Harvey to one side. "I'm not gambling good fishing agin a yarn given out by an upset boy." He turned and the anger had gone. "But I'm a fair-minded man, and while you're aboard I'll pay you wages. Three dollars a month."

Harvey had to help Dan wash fish. He refused at first, but they would not give him anything to eat till he did. It was Manuel, who told him not to be hands came to tolerate the boy good-naturedly. Harvey soon got his sea-legs, and did not talk so much about having the captain and crew thrown into prison.

Manuel told the boy quite a lot about his father, and how he was one of a family of eighteen. How his father used to play this instrument and sing about the wind and the storm. Harvey learnt that Captain Disko was the most popular captain in the whole fleet, and that his deadliest rival was the Jennie Cushman, owned by Walt Cushman. They were heading for a spot where there would be some wonderful cod to be caught by lines or netted. He found out how many men were aboard, and what knots they did to the hour. Uncle Salters, the helmsman, who was always arguing with the captain, was a fine man; in fact, they were all fine men. He learnt that when the lead went overboard and it was found that the bottom was "blue pebbles," then they, were near good fishing.

Strange how the man and boy were attracted to each other. Manuel fussed over young Harvey like a father, but he did not stand for any nonsense. Manuel always fished with a hand-line, and one day he had a wager with Long Jack that he would catch more fish his way than Long Jack could with his trawl-net. Harvey was allowed as a great treat to go in the dory with Manuel to row and to fish, and the boy clapped his hands when much strong language came from the other dory.

"What low-livered squid done this?" Long Jack yelled out. How angry Manuel was when he learnt that Harvey a foolish little fish, that helped the boy to give in and do this work that made him feel sick.

The men got tired of hearing the boy complaining and making threats about having them all thrown into gaol as kidnapers. Some would have liked to have thrown him overboard, as they were superstitious about bad luck. Taking a passenger meant ill-fortune.

"I'd like to wallop him with a rope's end," opined one man.

"I made him a member of the crew," stated the captain.

"But I hold he's still a passenger long's he ain't done no work," cried a thin, hard-eyed Canadian known as Long Jack.

"Manuel make him work," answered the captain. "Already he has done a little work—give Manuel time."

One night whilst Manuel was taking his watch Harvey came to him and offered him ten thousand dollars if he would take one of the dories and row him to New York. Manuel laughed uproariously at the idea. Then he produced a strange-looking musical instrument and began to sing as he strummed. The sulking Harvey found the music very soothing. Manuel was a poor Portuguese fisherman, but there was something strangely fascinating about the man.

At last Harvey resigned himself to the inevitable. Besides, he was taking an interest in all that went on. He learnt how to clean fish, and he surprised Manuel with his knowledge of names of the various parts of the ship. The July 24th, 1937.

(Top) Harvey was allowed as a great treat to go in the dory with Manuel to row and to fish.

(Bottom) "You touch that kid, I tear you apart, see?" very quietly spoke Manuel.

had sneaked up on deck and knotted up his trawl. The Portuguese gave Harvey one look of scorn and threw the fish that he had caught overboard, then he rowed back to the schooner. The bet had been a fine safety-razor that Manuel owned against a fifty-cent piece. Manuel handed over his razor, but that was not the end of the matter. Long Jack, on account of the trawl being tangled, got a hook in his arm, and his threats against the person who had done it were murderous.

Manuel would not have said a word about the boy's trick, but Long Jack openly accused Manuel. Then the shame-faced Harvey did one of the first decent actions of his life—he confessed.

"You sneaking little rat!" snarled the Canadian, his face contorted with fury. "I'll beat—"

"You touch that kid, I tear you apart, see?" Very quietly spoke Manuel, and before the deadly menace in the other's eyes Long Jack lowered his own.

"Manuel, keep that kid away from me," was all Long Jack said.

Later, a boy with tears in his eyes came and humbly begged Manuel to forgive him, and the Portuguese, after reading him a long lecture, gave him an apple. The incident was forgotten, but often Harvey winced before the menace in the eyes of Long Jack.

On Virgin Rock the cod-fishing was marvellous, and here were several dozen boats. All fishing and cleaning and stowing night and day. It was a great triumph for the captain who got first back to Gloucester with full holds.

Harvey was allowed to go fishing with Manuel once more, and now he was happier than he had ever been in his life. In the few short weeks that had passed he had forgotten about school, his father, and the life of ease that he had led. He became fairly friendly with Dan. At last the We're Here had her holds full, and Captain Disko went round the other ships to take back their mail and to have a quiet chortle over their discomfiture. And when the captain got back he found the Jennie Cushman had sailed. It was the custom to ring a bell when the holds were full, but Walt Cushman was a sly rascal.

"Get that anchor in!" yelled Disko, coming alongside. "Up with the port-sail. I'll beat that sneaking sand-shark!"

Too Much Canvas

THERE was tremendous excitement aboard the We're Here, and young Harvey got entangled in some fishing gear and never said a word till the schooner was under full canvas about the hook caught in his arm. He did not wince when Manuel pulled through that hook, and for once the look in the eye of Long Jack was not quite so hard.

"He's got a good lead on us, captain," said old Salters.

"He's got his topsails set already, running like a scared sardine," rasped Disko. "I'll climb over his stern rail or sail the bottom out of us!"

"It's awful heavy going, Disko," sang out Salters some time later, when the We're Here was heeling over under every inch of canvas. "If a big wave hits us we'll—"

"Don't you worry about this lady," cackled Captain Disko. "She can take care of herself."

When Walt Cushman realised that his rival was slowly but surely gaining, he decided to take a short cut across the Franklin Shoals, and as the We're Here had a bigger draft, he did not think he would be followed. But Disko knew every inch of that reef, and he took his ship through water where the depth was only three and a half fathoms.

"We're going to pass them soon, aren't we?" Harvey asked Manuel.

"That Disko he pass anything," laughed the Portuguese. "He half porpoise, I think."

Manuel told Harvey what he would do with all the money he would get. He would go to the church store and buy a little gold candlestick he saw there last time. He would take it to the church and light candles for his father's birthday, which was on the third of August. Then the two of them would have a very good time ashore.

"When you ashore you talk to your father on telephone, huh?" asked Manuel. "You tell him you live and happy, huh?"

Harvey was silent for a while, and then he said with tears in his eyes that he did not want to go back to his father, but wanted to stay in Gloucester with Manuel and go out with the fishing fleet.

"But how about your father, little fish?"

"Maybe I could see him between trips—if he wanted to see me."

"What you mean—if he want to see you?"

"Well, he's got his business and everything. He'd be all right," was the answer. "I want to be with you."

Two days later the We're Here passed the Jennie Cushman. But Captain Disko was carrying every inch of canvas.

"Them topsails'll carry away if we keep this up," muttered Long Jack.

The breeze freshened, and Long Jack spoke a warning to the captain, who glanced back and saw that his rival was but a speck on the horizon.

"Well, since you're such a nervous galoot, and we got old Walt lieked to a frazzle, I'll mind what you say," Disko raised his voice. "Go aloft with Jack, Manuel; stand by to trim the topsails."

The two men were close to the mast-head when a rope that had been fraying unnoticed broke, a pulley hook then snapped, another rope broke under the strain, and then there came a report like a pistol-shot and a great crack appeared in the mast. A long, rendering crash, and then the main mast snapped off like a rotten carrot.

Long Jack was able to slide down a rope to safety, but Manuel, who had reached the masthead, was swept overboard in a tangle of ropes, sails and cables.

There was tangled wreckage on the deck, and a lot more in the sea, Manuel was clinging to a rope close to the broken mast.

"Get a dory overside!" yelled Disko. "Are you all right, Manuel?"

"E escusado ajudades me," muttered Manuel. "Este e o ñen fin. Mas nao digas ao pe' geno."

"What does he mean?" the captain asked the cook, who understood the language.

Doc's face was a picture of horror.

"It's no use helping me," he said," he whispered. "This is my end. Tell the captain, but do not tell the kid."

"Ask him what's wrong," said the captain.

Doc spoke, and with a smile Manuel spoke, though he must have been in terrible agony.

"He says he's as good as dead," Doc's thick lips were quivering. "He's stove in—all the bottom half of him gone. He don't want the kid to know. No good putting dory overside."

"You're not hurt, Manuel, are you?" gasped out Harvey.

"I all' right, little fish," Manuel laughed.

"He's caught in the back stay," Long Jack spoke in the captain's ear. "The drift's tightening. You'll have to cut him loose, or it'll take him in half."

Manuel must have understood, for he called out:

"Cut me away, Disko. You hear me?"

"Get me an axe," muttered the captain.

Thus perished a hero of the sea. The We're Here limped into harbour. Everyone on board had done their best to give solace to the heartbroken and desolate boy. Young Dan did, all he could to help Harvey with his grief. All had loved Manuel.

When the We're Here docked Harvey collected nine dollars as pay, and no was given Manuel's razor by Long Jack, who no longer bore the boy any enmity. Captain Disko told the boy that they were proud of him, and that if he wanted to come out with him again he'd be pleased to sign him on. A message had come through to say that Cheyne senior was hurrying to Gloucester, and Captain Disko thought Harvey had better see what plans his father might have. The old captain blinked his eyes to cover his emotion.

Harvey asked Dan who would get Manuel's quaint musical instrument.

"His next of kin should have it, but he ain't got any. Pop thought maybe you'd like to have it."

With his money Harvey went to the church store, and he bought the little candlestick, and he took it to the church. He prayed that he might grow to be as fine a man as Manuel Fidello.

Captain Disko had a talk to the father when he came to the former's comfortable bungalow. In simple words he told of the friendship of Manuel and Harvey, and how the boy had changed.

"They were real dory mates, Mr. Cheyne. You set your course a little too late, and Manuel sailed it for you. But that don't say you can't sail it after him."

The father went to the church and saw his son praying. Later the father lost his son again. His suggestion about going to their ranch for the big rodeos had roused no interest in Harvey. This time the father found the boy on his knees in the dory that had belonged to Manuel. The father was able after a while to persuade his son to go back to the hotel. On the following day father and son stood side by side near the harbour, and close to a monument dedicated to "THEY THAT GO DOWN TO THE SEA IN SHIPS." Several people had died during the last voyage of the fishing fleet, and as every name was called out relatives and friends threw wreaths and flowers into the sea. When the name of Manuel Fidello was called, Captain Disko and Harvey threw their wreaths, and old Disko allowed himself a little smile as the boy slid his hand for comfort into his father's. Cheyne was steering the right course.

And when father and son left Gloucester, bound for the ranch, the colour had come back to Harvey's cheeks. The boy talked of the wonderful things that he had seen and done, and now and again he would break off to peer through the back window of the car at the trailer. On that trailer was Manuel's dory.

(By permission of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Film Co., Ltd., starring Freddie Bartholomew as Harvey, Spencer Tracy as Manuel, and Lionel Barrymore as Captain Disko.)

Chip Douglas was a carefree young cowboy until his father was murdered by a rustler, then he turned into a hard-riding, hard-shooting avenger. A stirring yarn of the Bad Lands, starring Dick Foran

Bitter Creek

IN the little New Mexico town of Bitter Creek business was proceeding as usual on this fine summer's morn—that is to say, the ranchers were in from the farms for a gossip, and all were doing their shopping in their carefree and leisurely manner.

A few buggies joggled along the dusty roadway; saddle horses were hitched to the bar outside "Cattle" Kate's, where that buxom and quick-tongued lady was serving customers in her saloon, famous for miles for home-brewed and fiery rye whisky.

It was just a pleasant peaceful weekday—with nothing much to worry about.

Then down the street came the sound of high, melodious voices raised in harmony above the clatter of hoofs.

Kate Legrand in her new check dress and turn-down broad white collar came out briskly from her saloon to stand, arms akimbo, on the porch.

"It's the Circle Bar Boys," she exclaimed to those in the street who had turned their heads. "And now we'll have excitement!"

Shorty, the bar-keeper, had followed his employer. He looked very knowing as he winked a twinkling eye:

"Reckon that's what you want, Kate."

"I don't get it from you," she retorted. "Except when chasing you round to see you get your work done!"

"Kate," said Shorty, "I'm your leading man. You know it. And I can sing, too."

"Sing inside, then," snapped Kate. "And get ready for those boys."

A troop of cowboys came galloping up the little street, headed by three young fellows singing lustily as they reared their mounts and fired their guns in the air. The crowd scattered; shopkeepers ran out to hastily put up shutters. Dogs barked, windows slammed down, folk scuttled into side streets—Bitter Creek went hastily into cover! Only Kate remained, smiling to herself as the cowboys drew up with a final fusillade and burst of song before her saloon. She gave the centre youth of the three leaders an appraising stare as he raised his hat with a wide sweep.

"If it isn't Chip Douglas," she said as if communing with herself. "Now, isn't that surprising!"

The tall, good-looking young man with red hair and frank blue eyes dismounted from his grey mare and came forward to read a notice pasted up on the door. He motioned to Kate to stand clear.

"Look at this, boys!" he cried. "If sheriff didn't expect us!"

The cowboys dismounted and came crowding round him, their forty-fives still smoking from wasted cartridges. Chip Douglas read out loudly and solemnly:

"Bitter Creek Township. Lord and Order Amendment. Take notice that any disturbance or gun firing in the streets is forbidden and will be strictly dealt with on and from this day, June tenth, eighteen hundred and seventy. Signed by General Lewis Wallace and to be administered by Henry S. Spence, Sheriff."

Douglas turned to the boys: "Take notice, Dave Massey. And you, Bandy Malarkey. You have been warned!" His two chums grinned. "It's nothing to laugh about. It's the order of Henry S. Spence."

"Aw, shucks, Chip!" spoke Massey, a bare-headed, tousle-haired, freckled young man. "I've been deaf, both ears, to Henry ever since I grew up."

Hook-nosed Malarkey, bandy-legged sure enough, aimed a vicious shot at Sheriff Spence's name on the notice, scoring a bullseye on the "S." The bullet sped through the thin boarding, and those within the saloon bar made a dash behind the counter.

Kate put up a hand.

"That's not the talk I want," she stated firmly. "The sheriff's doing what the general told him. And General Lew Wallace is all of a man. Stop 'em, Chip, and come inside. Your dad's around this morning."

But Malarkey's shot had inspired the rest of the wild youngsters. A dozen bullets followed his and the notice was shot to rags. The excitement inside the saloon was certainly intense!

"Come on in, you silly boys," Kate repeated. "Don't make me cross—or I'll have to spank you!"

Laughing and joking, the Circle Bar cowboys came trooping into the saloon. The other customers peeped up from behind the bar; Shorty's round head being the most wary. Douglas called to them:

"Sorry, folks—don't let us disturb you. We're only having a little trip round town."

He came across to the bar to face a grim-looking oldish man who studied him with narrowed eyes as he laid cold fingers on Chip's hand resting on the bar counter.

"Why, dad!"

"I'm ashamed of you," spoke the other, his mouth closing in a thin line. "You've no manners, nor sense."

"Only fun, dad," Chip smiled. "We don't mean any harm."

"Fun?" echoed old Douglas. "I call it tomfoolery. It's part of Slade Hemberry's plan to upset Bitter Creek."

"You got Slade wrong, dad," said Chip. "You think Henaberry's out to boss the valley. But he isn't. I get along fine with him and most of the fellows at Circle Bar."

"You couldn't work with me, I'll own," spoke old Douglas, still grim. "No, your father wasn't good enough. Not that I want you. I can manage my ranch for many years yet, I reckon." He turned away. "But you'll come to repent it, son—going with that crooked bunch of guys. I've done with you."

He strode out of the saloon, leaving Chip staring.

The youngster suddenly ran out after his father, already swinging into his buggy. "Dad, here—wait a minute!"

But old Douglas didn't even give him a glance. He shook up his horse and the buggy joltingly rattled away up the street. Chip went back into the bar to be confronted by Cattle Kate.

"Your dad's real mad with you, Chip," she allowed.

"He sure is," the youngster agreed. Then his light-hearted nature reasserted itself. "He'll come round in a day or two. He didn't like me leaving him for Henaberry's. But dad isn't so easy to work with. Kate. Where's Dave?"

"Inside with Shorty." Kate put a detaining hand on the boy's arm. "Chip, I'm worried. I got my girl coming in from college to-morrow and she's grown up a lot. She's nineteen."

"You got a girl of nineteen?" exclaimed Chip. "Why, Kate—you're not old enough!"

"Stop that nonsense!" But Kate was pleased. "You soft soap all the women, Chip. Yes, Louise is nigh on twenty and, though she's my girl, I'll allow she's pretty as a picture."

"Kate, that's grand news. Nothing to worry about that I can see."

"She's always thought I kept an hotel, Chip. See what I mean?"

Chip gave Kate full attention.

"I sort of get you," he half agreed. "You mean you don't want us boys shooting off guns just because we're high spirited?"

"Not only that," Kate said, her pleasant face puckered with her doubts. "But this bar—an hotel, Chip?" She shook her slightly greying head. "No, sir—it's just a drinking parlour, and Louise won't think so much of her mother any more."

Chip led her along to where Bandy Malarkey was sitting at a small table with some of the other Circle Bar cowboys. Chip put a hand on the tankard in front of Bandy.

"Listen, you," he declaimed. "Drink up your last pot of home-brewed. Kate's going to turn this room into a caffay. Little tables with cloths on 'em and a vase with a bunch of wild flowers. And chairs to sit on instead of stools. And tea and coffee to be served with bread and butter—not crabs and big hunks of cheese."

Bandy thought his chum had gone suddenly crazy.

"Why, Chip—what's the big idea?" he gasped.

"Kate's little girl Louise is coming to stay," said Chip. "And she's just down from college. And she's educated—she don't hold with beer tankards and hunks of cheese cut with your jack-knives. And Louise don't like shooting off of gats and fellers making a row they call singing."

"For pity's sake, Chip," cried Bandy, "what does she like?"

Chip grinned. "I'm hoping she'll like me," he chuckled. "And, if so—maybe I'll become sheriff when old Henry gives up."

Kate gave an approving nod.

"And maybe you will," she declared. "And you boys might heed what Chip says. Louise is my gal and I'd like her to think well of us all."

"Sounds like a funeral to me," Malarkey sighed gustily. "But provided you don't try us too hard, Kate—okay."

At the "Caffay"

NEXT day Chip rode into Bitter Creek to meet the mail coach.

But he was too early, and it came rattling up to Kate's saloon whilst he was up-town trying to find his father, who generally came into the little town to bank his money on Fridays.

So Louise only had her mother to welcome her when she stepped out of the ramshackle stage-coach.

She was a pleasant height, trim in figure; her blue eyes made an Irish contrast to her dark brown hair, which she wore neatly coiled and ringleted on one side of her pretty face. Her simple grey bodice and skirt and the tartan ribbon tie-on for her bonnet suited her charmingly, and Kate's heart grew big as she came bustling forward to take her girl by the hand.

Louise walked into the spring-cleaned saloon with her mother and gave a quick glance round the room, with its small tables and vases of flowers and the new chairs. Some customers were sitting at the tables looking very respectable, if not too cheery. Teapots and milk-jugs were before them, with sugar done up in white papers, and there were plates of bread-and-butter and home-made cakes which the customers were studying with grave faces.

At Kate's entry with Louise all stood up, doffing their hats.

Shorty came forward with a large, extended hand.

"Welcome home, missy," he cried, his face all smiles. "This here's your mother's caffay, all done reg'lar and according to order. We're steady folks in Bitter Creek—not like some of them Western towns where order ain't—!" He got lost for the right word. "Ain't ordered, as you might say."

Kate gave him a warning look.

"This is Shorty, Louise," she stated. "He does his best as my steward and—!" She also was out of the right word. "And general nuisance! These are the boys from the ranches and their gals—and townsfolk. And— and this is my gal Louise, from college."

Kate spoke with pride as Louise dropped them all a pretty curtsy.

"And this young man here is Dave Massey," Kate went on. "He's a good boy, in spite of his freckles. And a dandy daucer—we're going to have a dance to-night to celebrate your coming."

Dave grinned as he shook the girl's hand.

"Your ma's okay, Miss Louise. And I sure hope you'll honour me in the quadrilles. I guess I won't step on your feet too much."

Henaberry was speaking to the new sheriff when Tascosa came creeping up behind Chip with a knife in his hand.

Malarkey came next and greeted Louise in his dour fashion.

"I ain't so hot at dancing," he told her. "But if you come riding with us, we'll do fine. There's plenty going on around here—we ain't so quiet!"

He went back to his table, where another of the cowboys was grimacing at the tea in his cup. Malarkey stopped him from spitting it out of his mouth on the floor.

All was going along very nicely indeed. Kate was saying "Yes, we don't forget this is an hotel," when in strode Chip Douglas. He had missed his father and was rather worried—but a big smile came over his face when he clapped eyes on Louise. He stepped up to her.

"So here's little Lou," he beamed at her. "Well, now, she does you proud, Kate. I'm Douglas, from the Circle Bar." He took the girl's hand in his great fist and pulled her to him, giving her a hearty kiss on each cheek.

Louise struggled free and handed him a sound slap on the face, her blue eyes flashing with anger. Chip stared at her in amazement, while Kate put in quickly:

"Don't mind her, Chip—she don't understand our ways yet."

Chip rubbed his smarting cheek.

"She ought to be spanked," he said. "And I'm going to do it!"

There followed a brief struggle in which Louise more than held her own. Chip got another slap and Kate pulled her girl behind her.

"Now, then, Chip, you leave that kind of thing to me." Kate was vexed with both of them. "I'm her ma—and we don't want any rough play."

The boys were laughing and Chip was a bit out of countenance.

Louise was very angry.

"You're an ill-mannered, badly brought-up young man!" she snapped at him. "And you had better get out of here before we have you thrown out!"

Chip shook his head.

"There isn't anyone could do it, Lou."

"And don't call me Lou! I'm Miss Legrand!"

Chip nodded.

"Okay."

He went with Kate to a table to help her. She said:

"Sit down, Chip. Don't get eross."

He was just pulling out a chair when a boy came bursting into the saloon.

"Pete Johnson's cattle has been rustled!" he called. "Done last night! Pete's all out with a shot-gun! Come on, you oughta help him!"

At once there was a big commotion. Kate ran back to Louise and almost pushed her into the bar parlour, whilst the cowboys and ranchmen rose up shouting and all talking at once. Everyone got busy—except three older men who sat silent at the table amid all the hurry and scurry. Chip rushed a squad of Circle Bar boys out to their horses and dashed off with the boys in a great clattering, to go to assist the Johnson ranchers.

A darkly, good-looking man, most noticeable of the three at the quiet table, fingered his small moustache. One of the others leaned forward.

"Ain't we doing anything, Tascosa?" he muttered.

Tascosa, foreman at Henaberry's Circle Bar ranch, shook his head.

"Let them boys run around shooting and cussing," he answered. "Looks good for the Circle Bar, don't it?"

The others exchanged knowing glances. All three drank their tea with relish—Tascosa had poured a stiff dose July 24th, 1937.

of whisky into the teapot out of a secret flask whilst Kate hadn't been looking.

Old Douglas Goes Riding

THAT night the younger members of the Circle Bar were dancing in Kate's saloon. The chairs and tables had been cleared away and Kate had got in the best of the town band. All was going merrily, despite the fact that Pete Johnson's cattle were still to seek. All the hunting around and scouting had not solved the mystery of their overnight disappearance.

Pete swore that the cowboys themselves knew something of his loss and there had been rough words betwixt him and Chip Douglas. But Chip had presently forgiven the old man and had continued scouting for the cattle long after the rest of them had given up.

So Chip came in late to the dance—to see Louise dancing away in the arms of Dave Massey.

Shorty, sitting next to Kate and thoroughly enjoying himself, winked at Chip.

"Cut out, ain't you? Dave's doin' all the running." Shorty glanced sideways at Kate. "I'm an easy dancer, too. What say havin' a turn, Kate?"

"Just for once, maybe," the buxom widow agreed. But before she could join in the foxtrot with Shorty, Chip asked:

"Could you loan me a pin, Kate?"

"I got one somewhere." Kate found a goodish-sized pin under the collar of her blouse. Chip took it from her and walked into the dancers. He thrust his way up to the grinning Dave, who half turned his head.

"Hallo, Chip—can't you get a partner?" he chuckled.

Chip suddenly stuck the pin into Dave's pants. A sharp squeal broke from the youngster, and he had to let go of Louise to clap a hand to the affected part. Chip immediately grabbed Louise and swung off into the dance with her, heedless of Dave's:

"Here, hi, vou! Wait a minute!"

Louise tried to break away.

"Let go!" she stammered. "I won't dance with you. Let me, I say!"

But Chip wouldn't let go, and she had to dance or get in everyone's way. She moved like a mechanical doll in his arms, glaring at him all the time.

When the dance was over he took her back to Kate. But Louise wouldn't speak. Kate had had too much of a "turn" with Shorty and was out of breath.

"I'm sorry, Lou," Chip said at last.

"That's the first sign of decent manners you've shown," she snapped at him. "Keep on being sorry—and keep out!"

"She don't love me, Kate," said Chip. "Isn't that too bad?"

"It's your own fault," Kate answered. "You've behaved badly." She gave the young man a straight look. "Chip, have you made it up with your dad?"

"I couldn't find him this morning."

"Didn't you ride in to his ranch to-day?" Kate asked reprovingly.

"I sort of didn't like to," Chip confessed. "Dad's riled with me. 'Bye, Lou.' The girl had gone off with Dave into a barn dance. She turned up her little nose at Chip, who called after her:

"Who's got bad manners now, eh?"

Kate wasn't satisfied.

"You ought to be with your father, Chip, instead of up at Henaberry's. 'Tisn't natural for a son to be at a rival ranch."

"Henaberry doesn't work against anyone, Kate. He's a square deal. He treats me as if I were a man."

Kate gave him another straight look.

"That's what I take you for, Chip. A man. So you'll just run along to your pap's to-morrow early and make friends. I got an idea he'll need friends pretty soon."

"What d'you mean, Kate?" Chip asked in a puzzled way.

"Pete Johnson's cattle being rustled is a beginning, Chip. I overheard a feller saying so here this morning. One who ought to know. It was Mason—your Mister Henaberry's secundo. He was talking with Tascosa and Kirby."

Chip laughed.

"They were only talking, Kate. Nothing in it—I get along fine with them. Circle Bar don't need to rustle cattle." He checked himself. "Pete Johnson was saying something of the kind, too—but, of course, he's off his head just now—letting his cattle go straying."

"I don't reckon they've strayed, Chip," Kate persisted. "Now ask a dance pretty of Louise—and maybe she'll give you one."

But Lou wouldn't. She was half afraid of Chip. And she was pleased when she saw her refusal seemed to hurt him.

Next morning Chip rode into his father's ranch. The old man greeted him with:

"Out of a job?"

"Henaberry's given me a day off." Chip answered. "So I thought I'd come along and see if I could help any. I heard you're running your stock into market."

"I an," said Douglas senior dourly. "I'm selling out before the trouble begins."

"There won't be trouble, dad. Pete Johnson let his cattle stray, that's all. There aren't any rustlers around in Santa Fé district."

"Oh, no?" sneered old Douglas. "I ain't got two eyes, then. No, thanks, son—I can move my own beasts. I got plenty help."

"I'd like to join in—" Chip was beginning, but his father went back into the ranch without another word.

Chip was hurt this time. He had great affection for his dad, but he was too high-spirited to put up with continual kicking-off. And old Douglas was proud of Chip, but he was vexed that Chip should have gone to a rival ranch. For Henaberry was all a rival.

Douglas suspected the smooth-faced, plump trader, who was always so hail-fellow-well-met, of something more than rivalry. Old man Douglas suspected that Henaberry and his foreman, Tascosa, could find Pete Johnson's cattle in a minute—if they wanted to.

Chip rided off on his grey mare, feeling sore. Well, dad didn't want him. Didn't like him—and had no use for him. And Kate's girl had shown him a frozen face that morning, too. Things weren't so good.

Old Douglas was clearing his cattle that evening, and driving them towards the market town with a few hands helping him. A fine herd of steers and the old man was mentally patting himself on the back for having reared them and having got a good offer for them at the right moment.

Then, when a couple of miles short of the market town, a shot rang out through the dusk, and his foreman gave a choking cry as he fell sideways off his mount. Next thing, out of the dusk came a band of masked riders shouting and whooping. Old Douglas shouted furiously:

"Who fired that shot?" And rode straight at them, a hand feeling for his gun.

But the bandits gave no chances. One of them fired almost point-blank at the old fellow and got him through the left lung. He fell forward, then back, and with a groan came to the ground.

His secundo fled for his life, a fusillade adding panic to a mad dash for safety. He made for Kate's so soon as he got into Bitter Creek, panting and sweating. As he had hoped, Chip was there.

"Your dad," gasped the man. "He's been shot down in the valley. Rustlers—masked—they got him, Chip, and they got the foreman!"

Chip was in the saddle almost as the man told him.

"Come with me!" he yelled. "Show me the place." They dashed off in a welter of dust, sudden dread at Chip's heart. The old man had been right—rustlers and killers were abroad. Law and order had departed from Bitter Creek—Chip should have called up the sheriff. But he knew that old Henry S. Spence would never have turned out this time of night.

The foreman was lying where he had fallen, moaning feebly and wanting them to go after the cattle.

For some moments they searched vainly for old Douglas. He had crawled into cover.

Presently they found him, exhausted and at his last few breaths. He had bled inwardly, and Chip, as he knelt beside his father, knew that there could be no hope. The boy helped old Douglas to raise his grey head.

Father and son regarded each other in silence, a queer mist before Chip's eyes.

"Who did it, dad?" he managed to ask at last.

Old Douglas was almost past speech. He managed to whisper:

"I—I love you, Chip. Don't—ever think—different."

The New Sheriff

GENERAL LEW WALLACE, governor of New Mexico in the seventies, and well remembered to this day, not only as a brave soldier, but also as the author of that world's classic story, "Ben Hur," was in his private office at his home in Santa Fe. A messenger had brought him news of the tragedies at Bitter Creek; added to now by the burning of the Johnson ranch-house and corrals, the pillaging of other small ranches, and the wholesale robbery of cattle going on all along the valley since the night that Pete Johnson had lost his herd.

The general glanced up from the papers telling him of these things.

"A land beyond the law," he sighed. Then he asked: "What's the sheriff doing?"

"He's resigned, sir," spoke the messenger. "He's got cold feet. And so's most of 'em in the valley. Nobody knows who it is, see? These fellers wear masks and come out at nights—killers all, not holding a man's life worth a snap of their dirty fingers."

"We must have someone to take office. I don't want to call in the Federal Army." The general took up a letter from the mass of sworn occupants. "Here's something from a Mrs. Kate Legrand of the Bitter Creek Hotel. She says there's a young man named Douglas, son of one of the murdered men. She writes suggesting his name as sheriff."

"Chip Douglas, sir?" The messenger was plainly surprised. "Well, he's certainly a fine young feller—" He remembered Kate's last words when she had handed him the letter. "Yes, sir—that's certainly a fine feller. We'll be glad to have him as sheriff."

"Go back and tell him he's appointed." The general was a man of quick decisions. "I will make out the certificate of authority. Of course, the appointment will have to be confirmed at a public meeting of the people."

The messenger, accompanied by Major Adair, the general's orderly, rode all night. They arrived at Bitter Creek in the small hours of the morning. Cattle Kate got up to open the door to them.

The "authority" was handed to her to read over.

"I'll call him," said Kate. "He's staying here just now."

She went upstairs and roused Chip. He came down to the barc saloon, and Kate told him he was temporarily appointed sheriff, in the place of Henry S. Spence, retired.

"But I can't do that," objected Chip. "I'm at the Circle Bar."

"You can leave the Circle Bar," said Kate.

Chip shook his head. "Kate, this is just a crazy notion of yours. I couldn't do it—the boys would believe I'd gone back on them."

A bed-room door opened. Louise came out in her dressing-gown. She addressed herself to Major Adair.

NEXT WEEK'S SMASH HITS!

JAMES DUNN

"MYSTERIOUS CROSSING"

What Addison Francis Murphy, a roving newspaper man, saw dimly in the dark on a train-ferry crossing the Mississippi was quite sufficient to set him off upon the trail of a front-page story; but he had to deal with a cold-blooded killer, and it was into dangerous adventure that he plunged in his own light-hearted fashion. A high-speed mystery story.

"BREEZING HOME"

A trainer is obliged to turn a famous racehorse over to a notorious bookmaker in payment of a debt. As he cannot race the horse himself, the crook transfers the ownership to a pretty singer, but when the girl refuses to run the horse to orders he succeeds in getting the horse injured and the girl warned off. With the help of a gallant horse and the friendship of the trainer the girl fights back. A grand story of the race-track, starring William Gargan and Wendy Barrie.

Also

Another long episode of the fighting serial:

"THE MOUNTIES ARE COMING"

Starring Bob Livingston.

"Tell Governor Wallace that Mr. Douglas is yellow, will you?" She spoke in a clear, cold voice. "Mr. Douglas is a great hand at bullying women—but he's afraid of men."

She stepped back into her bed-room and slammed the door.

Chip said, through gritted teeth:

"I'll accept that authority, major. Don't take any heed of that girl. Tell the general my respectful thanks for the honour he's done me. Tell him I'll see things through—and administer the law!"

A public meeting was called at Cattle Kate's next morning. All the "nesters" and ranchers and shopkeepers of the valley were present. Kate opened the proceedings.

"Folks," she began, "I've been asked to act as chairman, but I haven't anything to say beyond asking Chip Douglas to tell you what's happened."

Chip came forward and stood up very straight.

"The governor of this State has sent an authority appointing me to act as sheriff, subject to election by you." He regarded them steadily. "I want to tell you I'm ready to act and that I'll do my utmost to serve you faithfully. This is a bit of a surprise, folks. I guess—but you got to have a sheriff some way, and—here I am!"

There were murmurs and some shuffling of feet. A harsh laugh sounded from somewhere at the back of the motley company, but this was checked when a thicket man in the front rose to his feet.

"I propose we accept young Douglas," he called. "You all know me, Slade Henaberry, of the biggest ranch in the valley."

He glared right and left, and, although there was still some shuffling of feet, no one spoke.

After an awkward pause, Kate put in her word.

"I second Mr. Henaberry. All those in favour?"

A good show of hands in Chip's favour followed.

"On the contrary!" shouted Henaberry truculently. "None? Right—I declare Chip Douglas duly elected."

A voice from the back muttered:

"Oughta have a poll. Secret ballot."

But no one supported this, and Chip stood up again.

"Thank you, Slade and Kate. And thanks all round. I'll shoot straight. Bitter Creek isn't going to be a land beyond the law from this moment henceforward."

Out in the streets amongst the crowd, now all very talkative, Chip was approached by the dark foreman of the Circle Bar.

"Sorter got to chair you round the town, Douglas," he stated. "Up you get."

Chip eyed him.

"Not for me, Tascosa," he said. "I'm not fooling any more."

"Yellow, eh?" sneered the other.

"I don't take that from you, Tascosa," Chip told him briefly. "Not from you or any other man."

Tascosa, disregarding Henaberry's frowns, made a rush at Chip.

"Up you get!" he shouted. "I'm gonna show our new baby sheriff round the town!"

Chip tried to hold him off, but Tascosa was in a rage. The pair of them scuffled, at first good-humouredly; by Chip. Tascosa got nasty and hit out.

Chip jumped back and then jumped into a fight. A swinging left lifted the foreman of the Circle Bar clean off his feet and sent him sprawling in the dust.

He was up in a flash to charge at Chip like a bull. This time he got in a nasty cut at the youngster's face, replied to by a crashing smash from Chip which again sent the foreman rolling in the dust. The crowd, always eager for a fight, began to form a ring, but Henaberry stepped in.

"That's enough," he ordered. "Quit fooling, you two!"

The crowd exchanged glances. Kate called "Drinks are on the house. Get inside, all of you!"

A voice cried:

"Tea, Kate?"

"What you like," she answered snappily. And in a minute the street had cleared and Shorty was serving home-brewed as fast as he could.

Tascosa got up and stayed, darkly glowering, by the hitching-rail where Chip's grey was tethered.

Henaberry was speaking to the new sheriff when Tascosa came creeping up behind Chip.

"Look out!" yelled the overnight messenger jerking out a forty-five. Tascosa had drawn a knife and was preparing to stick it into Chip's back. But Henaberry was quicker than any of them, and grabbed his foreman's wrist in a grip of iron.

"Didn't I say quit fooling?" he growled. "Give me that knife."

Tascosa, his mouth set in an ugly grin, gave up the weapon. Henaberry turned towards the major.

"Tell the general we ain't so bad," he said in his cool voice. "Okay, Douglas—you're sheriff, and we're gonna respect you."

Kate drew Chip into the private doorway that the others had gone.

"Get a wash—and don't be too long," she said, leading him to her own room.

While he was washing his hands, Louise looked in.

"Want a towel?" she asked.

"Got one," Chip answered.

She lingered by the door.

"I—I think you were very brave," she allowed. "I'm sorry I spoke that way to you last night."

Chip dried his hands and came to her. "Sorry I was rude the other day," he said.

They looked at each other solemnly for a moment or two. Then Louise put up her face to be kissed.

Rustlers

LATER that day, Chip rode over to the "Circle Bar" to get his things clear up there. The ranch seemed deserted, but he reckoned that the hands were out in the fields. All was quiet, too, in the ranch-house, but an open window on the back porch offered Chip a means of getting in. He was just there when he heard voices—Henaberry's and Tascosa's.

"I tell you it'll pay to have him there," came Henaberry's slow tones. "You know it, but you're so bad tempered—" A pause, then he went on: "We'll settle now for the first hold-up. The pool's a thousand dollars."

"You got more," Tascosa growled. "But I'll take the thousand."

"Your cut is just one hundred," Henaberry answered. "And here's the money."

Tascosa's answer came short and sharp:

"I ran the whole thing—with just Mason and Kirby. The thousand's ours—and I'm not standing for a cent less. Tip it up, Slade, or—"

Chip crept nearer the window. The precious pair were at grips. They struggled in grim silence; then it seemed that Tascosa had got at his gun—

Chip threw open the window with a crash. He vaulted over the sill into July 24th, 1937.

the parlour and caught at Tascosa's right hand. The gunman had got Henaberry against the wall, holding him back with his left hand whilst covering him point-blank. Chip, from behind, knocked the gun out of Tascosa's grasp.

Next instant the two of them were at him. The treacherous Henaberry got a left arm in a bear-like hug around Chip's neck from the back, whilst Tascosa held Chip's wrists in his gloved hands. It was no time for pretty work—Chip lifted and thrust a knee into the pit of Tascosa's stomach, winding him. Then he tore away Henaberry's throttling clutch and got home a swinging right on that fat chin.

The rancher went down like a felled ox.

Tascosa, his dark face livid, came at Chip. They closed and went backwards together over the table, sending money, plates, knives and forks smashing on the floor. They rolled over and over, Tascosa trying to reach the gun lying by the door, Chip determined that he shouldn't reach it.

They were hugging each other too tightly for any chance of a knock-out such as Chip had administered to Henaberry, still half-dazed in the corner, and Tascosa was a strong, ruthless man, willing to strangle his opponent with his gloved fingers, if he could get a grip. But the fact of his gauntlets was against him—he couldn't fasten his thumb deep enough in Chip's throat.

They spoke no words. At last luck favoured the youngster. Tascosa's knee slipped from under him—it had been bruised in the morning's fight at Bitter Creek—and Chip got on top.

He sprang away from Tascosa and snatched up the gun. He covered the fellow.

"Stay where you are—on your back! Don't move, or I'll have to shoot." He gave a glance towards Henaberry's corner. The fat man had sneaked away with the spilled dollar bills whilst the fight had been going on!

Chip smiled thinly. "You can settle with Slade," he said. "But I'll keep your Colt, Tascosa, and don't forget I'm sheriff."

He backed to the open window and vaulted out of the room. He walked quietly to the hitching-rail and mounted his grey mare. Much as he had expected, a bullet whizzed past him as he cantered away. Henaberry, no doubt, had sped that shot.

"I'll have to deal hard with these fellows," Chip told himself. "I hope Davo and Bandy aren't in the swim with them."

This was a disquieting thought. He had trusted his chums; hadn't they ridden all day with him in search of Johnson's rustled cattle? Could they be bluffing him—having him for a sucker?

He cantered along to his father's ranch, now his.

It had been cleared out. Not a beast left in the corrals. Not a hand in the ranch. All and everything gone.

That night came news that Johnson had been shot outside his ruined and empty ranch. Chip led a party of the town patrol, but was too late to help. And presently fires were seen at other small ranches—and the same bad story was told of masked men and lost cattle all along the valley.

Yet Chip couldn't bring himself to think he had heard aright that morning at Henaberry's. It had seemed to him that Henaberry and Tascosa, his lieutenant, had been quarrelling over money derived from the sale of Pete Johnson's rustled cattle. But it might have been something else

And if the Circle Bar was finding these masked men—what about Dave and Bandy and other good companions he had played and joked with for so long? It didn't hang together. It didn't seem possible.

Early next day Dave Massey came riding into Bitter Creek. He asked for Chip, and seemed so clean and straightforward in his freckled boyishness that you just couldn't think him anything but a decent, likeable lad. He told Chip that Tascosa had been fired by Henaberry over some quarrel and had gone away with Mason and Kirby.

"Where to?" asked Chip.

Dave thought they had gone along up the San Luis pass towards the border.

"I'd like a word with Tascosa before he quits the valley," said Chip. "I'll take along a couple of old Spence's men. They aren't much use, but they'll bear witness."

"I'll be getting back," Dave told him. "I only rode in to tell you Henaberry's squared up with Tascosa. A rat—if ever I saw one."

"I Killed Your Father—"

CHIP had to scout alone when he and the two old fellows neared San Luis. These ancient officers of the law were like the retired Henry S. Spence himself—not over anxious to take risks.

So Chip rode up the pass straight into the trap that Tascosa had prepared for him.

Rounding a bend, he ran slap into a company of Circle Bar hands, headed by Tascosa—with Slade Henaberry in the background.

"Well, now!" cried Tascosa. "Isn't this fine! Here's the sheriff come to visit us. We certainly ought to show him our very best respects. Get him, boys, and—tie him up to yon tree!"

There was a brief struggle, when Chip had been pulled down from his grey, but numbers were too many for him. He had to submit to being tightly corded to a forked tree. Tascosa helped tie him up; then, when Chip was secure:

"I could pick you off at ten paces," he stated. "A bullet for each eye—in case the first one couldn't find you had any brains. Or I could shoot you here and there as the fancy took me." His eyes narrowed into slits. "But that isn't in my mind. I got to get properly even with you, see? So this being a lonely spot, I'm going to let Sheriff Douglas stay here and die inch by inch of thirst and hunger, with the buzzards pecking at him and the sun scorching him blind."

Chip gave him look for look.

"I wouldn't risk it, Tascosa, if I were you. I might get away."

"You might," the foreman answered venomously. "But you won't. Kirby's going to stay here with his gun ready. If you move, you're as dead as your dad. And I'll tell you something, Mister Sheriff—I killed your old man."

Henaberry called:

"Quit talking. Let's go."

The men got to their horses. Kirby took his post a few yards from Chip, who had spied Bandy Malarkey and Davo amongst the gang. He felt sick at heart.

Bandy managed to brush past him, saying:

"Bye, Chip! Sorry, and all that." Davo looked flushed and sulky. He said nothing as he rode off with the rest. Chip had grabbed the jack-knife which Bandy had slipped into his hand as he passed.

Kirby sat down and filled his pipe. Silence reigned after the clattering of hoofs up the pass had died away.

(Continued on page 27)

Jim refuses to give up a holiday to look for some valuable jewels, until a young couple seek refuge at his shack from a pair of crooks. The jewels are found, but quickly vanish with a man in the struggle for their possession. Don't miss the detective's unique method of bringing the criminal to justice. Starring Guy Kibbee and Tom Brown.

The Frost Emeralds

JIM HANVEY stared fixedly at the bacon and beans sizzling in a saucepan over the fire. His methods of cooking were somewhat primitive, for he had a way of cooking everything together and chancing his luck that the results did not upset his digestive organs.

This morning he was in a bad temper. For months and months he had been hard at work. Time after time he had promised that directly a case was concluded he would take a vacation, and every time something had turned up to keep him away from his small farm, where his greatest relaxation was to wander round in awful old corduroys and shoot rabbits in the woods.

Jim Hanvey was round-faced, somewhat pop-eyed, corpulent, and his large mouth was just made for smiling. He did not smoke, but had a fad of chewing long straws. The latter reminded him of the country and helped him to concentrate. Jim was a detective, and though he did not look in the least like one he was mighty good at his job. The police had a great contempt for all private inquiry agents, but they admitted grudgingly that Hanvey sometimes picked up the scent quicker than themselves. Of course, it was sheer luck, but sufficient to say if Hanvey entered a case the police gave him every assistance and watched him very closely, because they knew that sooner or later he would get on the track of the criminal or his associates.

The detective was in a bad temper this morning because he had concluded a difficult case successfully, and sneaked out of town before anything else developed to keep him from his well-earned holiday, and he had been in the country exactly four days when a large car had driven up to the small shack and three men had alighted. The tall, heavy man whose hair was grey was Lambert, the president of a very big insurance company. The thickset, strong-jawed, grin and harsh-featured man was the head of the investigating department of the insurance company. The other member of the party was Brackett, confidential secretary to the vice-president. They had informed him that the Frost emeralds, which were insured with the Continental Insurance Company for a hundred thousand dollars, had vanished. They thought them stolen. Mrs. Frost had insisted that Hanvey take the case, as the lady considered him so much cleverer than the police. Very politely Jim had informed them that he was going to have a holiday and that there was nothing doing. They had offered a thousand dollars, and he said they could offer three thousand, and it would make no difference.

For three days Jim had forgotten all about crime and detecting, and now these rubes had to turn up to disturb his peace. He gave the bacon a vicious poke with a fork. Suppose they did offer three thousand, what would he do? It was a lot of money. No, he wouldn't take it. He turned over the beans and then turned his head. Two people had come into the sitting-room, and were whispering. Jim had an instinct that was uncanny. Though his door was shut he was certain that the two people were young, and that they were in some sort of trouble.

Calmly Jim saw the bacon and beans cooked to a turn, spooned the contents on to a plate and then entered his lounge parlour. He found a girl and a boy. Both were good-looking youngsters. Jim decided that they were spoiled and pampered members of society. Both had just left college and were eloping or doing something equally foolish.

"Our—our car broke down at the cross-roads," stammered the young man. "We saw your cottage in the distance and walked here."

Jim Hanvey studied their feet. "I'm mighty sure you didn't," he commented. "It's awful muddy between here and the cross-roads, and you two ain't got a speck of mud on your shoes."

The boy looked at the girl, who stepped forward in a resolute sort of way.

"Mr. Hanvey, I guess you've seen through us," she admitted. "We've brought you one of the biggest cases you've ever had. We heard you were on holiday, and—"

"Heard I wasn't going to be disturbed," Hanvey chuckled. "Well, I've got enough bacon and beans and coffee, so you'd best tell me what this is all about."

Jim heard a story that made him want to spank these two young people. The boy's name was Don Terry, and he had a big opinion of himself as a writer, but except for occasional insertions in the newspapers he could not get his work recognised. The girl was going to marry him. Jim flicked an eyelid when he heard her name was Joan Frost. The boy talked a lot about a wonderful book he was writing, and eventually the detective demanded to know what the big case might be.
July 24th, 1937.

"Oh, I forgot for the moment!" the boy grinned rather foolishly. "It's about some emeralds that belong to Joan's mother."

"The Frost emeralds!" exclaimed Hanvey. "Why are you so interested in them?"

It was then that Jim got a shock. "Why, I stole 'em," admitted the boy, and the girl smiled at the young fellow as if she were proud of the fact.

Piece by piece Jim Hanvey got the story out of them, and the more he heard the angrier he got. The boy had boasted to two men that he could write detective fiction, and had had a bet with these two men that he was as good a cracksmen as Raffles. This had happened at Joan's coming-out party, and everybody was very merry. The boy had swanked that he would crack a safe and show these men, so he cracked the Frost safe. He had failed to begin with, because safes are not easy to open, and he couldn't use dynamite, so Joan had assisted to save his honour and win the hundred bucks—Joan knew the combination of the safe.

The boy took the jewels and went off to his club to see the two men and show them that he was a cracksmen, and that was all he remembered, for the next thing he knew it was morning, he was lying on his own bed fully dressed and the emeralds were gone.

"And you're going to find them for us, Mr. Hanvey," announced Joan. "I'll pay you a fee of fifty dollars." She said the amount as if it were a fortune. Hanvey nearly choked. "You'll take it, won't you?" The girl gave him an anxious glance. "Perhaps we could pay you seventy-five if you got them back at once."

Jim pushed back his chair. "I'm on holiday, and I'm sorry. If you'll excuse me I'll go and make myself some more coffee."

They followed him out into the small kitchen.

"If you don't take the case I'm sunk," pleaded Don Terry. "They'll put the police on it and everything'll come out. Those two fellows knew I planned to take the emeralds, and I—I'll go to gaol."

"Well, gaol's the most peaceful sort of place to do your writing," Hanvey said with dry humour.

"But my father and mother will see that Don gets a long sentence—perhaps life," lamented Joan. "You've just got to take this case."

"I wouldn't touch it with a ten-foot pole!" snapped the old boy. "You thought you could come down here and buy me into getting you two out of a stupid scrape. You go back and face the music."

Jim looked so fierce that the two young people left him, and he heard them whispering in his parlour. He felt rather mean that he had been so hard on them, but why should he help foolish kids that went around cracking safes? They must face the consequences of their own folly—besides, he wanted to go rabbit shooting. He stared at the coffee-pot. Maybe they were not such bad kids—spoiled, of course, but they did seem fond of each other. As he reached out to pick up the coffee-pot he turned his head, for someone else had entered his parlour.

"You don't think you were skipping town with those emeralds without us following, do you?" a harsh voice grated out.

"What emeralds?" Joan said, and then her voice became shrill. "You leave him alone!"

Jim Hanvey quietly opened the door.

July 24th, 1937.

One man was holding Terry by the jacket and the girl was struggling with the other.

"I tell you I haven't got them!" Terry yelled. "Let go of me!"

"Yeah, let go of him," drawled Jim.

It was amazing how those two men whipped round with their hands on their hip-pockets. The round-faced, plump, dark-skinned gangster grinned and shuffled his feet, whilst the tall, scowling rascal with the scarred right cheek stared suspiciously at his companion.

"Hallo, Romo," drawled Jim Hanvey. "Fancy seeing you around."

"Who's this old haysced?" cried the tall fellow.

"He's all right," said Romo. "Saved me from doing a rap three years ago."

"Thought I reformed you, Romo"

"You did. I ain't a pickpocket no more," Romo admitted. "High-class jewellery, that's my line now. Smith here's my buddy."

"Well, if you're looking for those Frost jewels, they're not on these two kids," sharply spoke Jim Hanvey.

"Don't let 'im kid you," rasped Smith, whipping out his gun. "Maybe grandpa's carrying 'em around himself?"

"You're fixing to get yourself massacred," calmly said the detective.

"We farmers around here ain't got no truck with gangsters. I saw you two from my kitchen, and I shouldn't have walked in like this if I were expecting trouble. I got a hound dog, and Bud's mighty cute. He's high-tailing down the road to Twitchells."

"Why for?" demanded the big crook, pocketing his gun.

"Just to tell the Twitchells to get busy." Jim took out a straw and chewed it complacently. "This place'll be swarming with Vigilantes and shot-guns in three minutes. One time they made it in two."

Romo backed towards the door.

"If Hanvey says these brats ain't got the emeralds, I guess they ain't."

"Yeah, but what'll the boss say?" demanded Smith.

"There ain't no point in staying," cried Romo, and a moment later the two crooks were hastening down the track through the pines to their car.

"I don't know how to thank you," Joan said gratefully.

Jim Hanvey took off his old shooting jacket.

"We're going to town," he announced sharply. "You can keep your thanks till later. The only decent thing about you two is that you seem to love each other."

"Why are you helping us?" demanded Terry.

"I'd help a mangy cat if two gunmen like Romo and Smith was on its tail," fiercely spoke Hanvey. "You're in deep trouble now. Terry, you get on my 'phone there and tell those fellas you bet with to be at your place in town when we get there. Jump to it, my lad—we ain't got any time to waste."

The Emeralds Cause a Killing

IT was Jim Hanvey's theory that the two men who had made the wager with young Terry were crooks, and that one of them would be the boss to whom Romo and Smith had referred. Mr. Elwood, of the New York Stock Exchange, and Mr. Dunn, banker, stated that they had taken up the boy's challenge because they were a little tired of his bragging.

Hanvey told them frankly that he had suspected them of being instrumental in getting Romo and Smith to jump on Terry whilst on his way to the club, but this theory seemed to be blown sky-high when the landlady at Terry's rooms appeared and said there was a cab-driver to see him about something very important. The boy looked ashamed when the woman added that this cab-driver had brought him home the previous evening. The detective asked that the driver be shown up.

"What do you want to come here worrying us for?" querulously cried Terry. "Didn't I pay you?"

The man grinned.

"I picked him up out of the gutter the other night," he stated. "I've driven him home a good many times, but the other night I was travelling along empty and saw him staggering along the side-walk. When I got to him he had fallen into the gutter. I put him in my car, taxied him home, then took a dollar and ten cents out of his pocket for a fare."

"Well—er—thanks," Terry muttered sheepishly.

"But that's not all," stated the driver. "I picked up the back cushion in my back seat this morning, and—Mr. Terry, did you lose something?" From his pocket he took out a glittering pendant. "This?"

Some minutes later the taxi-driver was taking Hanvey and the two youngsters to Joan's home.

"I wouldn't trust either Elwood or Dunn as far as I could see 'em," Hanvey told them frankly, and chuckled as he saw their looks of surprise. "I was watching their expressions and their eyes. They encouraged you, Terry, to get pickled the other night, and I am sure that they commissioned Romo and Smith to lay in wait for you. Unfortunately for them you decided to sleep in the gutter, and a kindly taxi-driver brought you home. I noted how Dunn's eyes glittered and his mouth watered at sight of them emeralds, so that's why I'm in such a blamed hurry to get 'em back to your home, Joan, before half the crooks in New York are on our tail."

"What are you going to do?" asked Joan.

"Try to find some way to get them emeralds inside your mother's safe without anybody knowing anything about it," said Hanvey. "It ain't no good to walk in and hand back the necklace to your mother, because the story that goes with 'em ain't likely to make her desire Terry here as a son-in-law."

"I reckon I've been a young fool."

"That's about the first wise thing I've heard you say," grumbled Hanvey. "Now, Joan, just give me a plan of your house and see if I can't figure out something."

Jim Hanvey was correct in suspecting Dunn. Directly they were outside Terry's rooms Dunn got a message through to Romo and Smith, so that these two worthies were not far behind Hanvey when the latter set out for the Frost home. They found out quick enough where Hanvey had gone. It was decided that Romo should try and get into the Frost house, collar the gems and beat it to the car, which Smith would have ready with engine running.

Hanvey and his charges arrived at the big mansion, and Joan opened the door with her latchkey. The detective had sent the two youngsters into the house, Joan to open the safe, Don to put the gems back, whilst he kept guard outside the house. He muttered under his breath when a huge car drove up and a fair-haired, smartly dressed woman got out. By pictures in the paper he knew this was Mrs. Frost. She was accompanied by two men—the tall, pleasant man was her husband, and the other was Davis of the insurance company.

"What are you doing here, Jim?" demanded Davis.

"Well, I reconsidered, and I thought I'd come down and look the ground over and take the case," was all Jim could think to say.

"Great!" exclaimed Davis. "I'll report to the office that it's in your hands from now on."

Mrs. Frost insisted that though it was late he must come into the house. She was one of those voluble women and never gave anyone a chance to get a word in edgeways. Most trying for Hanvey, when he was trying to scheme how to warn those foolish youngsters.

"My emeralds were taken out of the library," burbled Mrs. Frost. "It's this way—I must show you. The daring of the thieves. I—"

Jim Hanvey stopped the flew by pushing a vase—accidentally, of course—off a table. Mrs. Frost was like her name as she surveyed the ruin of a vase, which, she stated, was two thousand years old. Jim didn't care, because he knew the youngsters would have heard the crash. He hoped that they would be able to get out of the library in time, but that hope was doomed to disappointment. The two young people were sitting on a couch and trying to look unconcerned.

"Joan, I disapprove of you sitting out with that young man," cried Mrs. Frost when she had recovered from her surprise. "How dare—"

Her husband coughed to remind his wife that they were not alone.

"Oh, this is my daughter, Mr. Hanvey." Mrs. Frost gave an acid smile. "This young person is Don Terry."

"Terry—Terry—I had a cousin by that name," Jim Hanvey grinned broadly. "One of the luckiest guys I know. How's your luck been, son?"

"Awful." Don Terry looked at Hanvey, and the latter knew that the emeralds had not been put back in the safe.

"Mr. Hanvey, they say you're awful quick at detecting," gushed Mrs. Frost. "Tell me, who do you think is the thief and where are my emeralds?"

"Adelaide," protested Mr. Frost, "give him time."

"I've a hunch this case is gonna be mighty simple," Hanvey replied. "I've got a theory already. I hope you'll have your emeralds, Mrs. Frost, by breakfast. Maybe we might talk this over in the other room. There's a fire there, and heat helps me to think." He managed to wink at Terry. "I'm all set for action."

"Who're you trying to kid, Jim?" asked Davis, as the party filed out of the library.

"Got to put on a show," whispered Hanvey. "But I know what I'm talking about. Now, you be on hand the first thing in the morning to open up the safe—they'll be there."

"So you know where the emeralds are?" Davis muttered. "Guess I'll go and ring Lambert."

Naturally, Joan had to come out of the library with Don, but significant gestures by Jim Hanvey were understood. The detective began to ask Mrs. Frost a number of questions about the time the jewels were missed, who were in the house, and who were at the dinner party the Frosts gave that night. Joan edged up to Don and whispered that Hanvey wanted him to slip back to the library when no one was looking. She slipped a piece of paper into his hand—it was the combination of the safe. The detective saw the boy slip away unnoticed and began to feel a little easier.

"I think a drink would be a good idea," suggested Mr. Frost. "I'll ring for Ellis and have him fix up something for us."

As Mr. Frost put his hand on the bell-push there came the sound of shots in quick succession. Jim Hanvey was the first to act. The shooting was in the library, and he wondered what could have happened. He burst into the library and switched on the light.

On the floor lay a man and standing over the prone figure was young Terry. Near the left hand of the man lay a gun.

Don Terry's face was piteous as he turned to Hanvey.

"I didn't do it, honest, I didn't. The lights went out and there was a voice and then a shot."

"Don't talk now," warned Hanvey, and hearing sounds, glanced round. The others had plucked up courage and followed him. He gripped the youngster. "You've got to get out here," he hissed. "Fourteen East Eighth Street. Hit me, and get going through that window."

"But don't you believe me, Mr. Hanvey?"

"Maybe, but thousands wouldn't." He began to shake Terry violently. "You young crook!" he shouted. "Call the police, someone!" Then in a lower voice: "Hit me and get!"

Don Terry lashed out with his fist, and Hanvey crashed backwards to land on his back. The boy scrambled through the window.

"Don't let him get away," screamed Mrs. Frost. "Oh—oh—oh—oh—"

She had seen the body on the floor. Hanvey was grateful that she fainted.

Hanvey had a call put through to the police to come over at once, as Ellis, the butler, had been shot and killed. The detective took a look out of the open window that backed on to a small garden. He heard a car rev up and the crash of a gear. He wondered if it could have anything to do with the shooting, and his fertile brain thought at once of Romo and Smith. And he was right. Romo, gasping and panting, had leapt into the car and told Smith to get going.

"I tell you I haven't got the emeralds!" Terry yelled. "Let me go!"

Riley, the police officer who patrolled that beat, arrived before the car from headquarters. He clambered out of the library window to see if he could find any clues in the garden. He discovered nothing, but Hanvey, who followed more leisurely on account of his size, found that a wall plant was badly smashed at one place and that there were marks on the stones, but what made the detective gasp was the gold watch that he saw. On getting back to the library he was told that the police car had arrived. A grizzled, harsh-featured officer scowled at sight of Hanvey.

"Hanvey, how are you tied up in this?" demanded Inspector Garrett.

"I just dropped into it like I have in other cases," answered Hanvey. "I've been out there looking for the guy that shot Ellis."

"It's obvious that only one person could have killed the butler," shouted Mr. Frost. "It was Don Terry."

"Father!" protested Joan. "He's your man." Mr. Frost was worked up into a fine rage. "A penniless, no-good tramp. I wouldn't let him marry my daughter or allow him to live on her money. What does he do? He resorts to this sort of thing—robbery and murder. He took the emeralds, and—"

"Stop it!" Joan was like a young tigress roused to fury. She glared at her mother and father. Mrs. Frost had recovered, but looked like doing another faint at any moment. "You two have done everything to take him away from me. I've laughed at your silly attempts. But when you try to send him to gaol, maybe to the electric chair, you're going too far. I won't stay in the same house with you—no other night!"

"My baby—my baby!" wailed Mrs. Frost, and had her second fainting fit. "Stop her—get her back!" cried Mr. Frost, busy supporting his wife.

"I came here to get a murderer, not a runaway girl," Inspector Garrett rasped out angrily.

Jim Hanvey sidled alongside the inspector.

"Remember, Mr. Garrett, cherchez la femme." He winked. "That girl loves Terry, and she'll lead you to him should you be interested."

"Mac, take one of the boys and follow the girl," ordered Garrett, and gave a grudging look of approval to Hanvey. "Say, you do get an idea once in a while—thanks!"

Jim Hanvey was smiling when he left the Frost house. He had sent the police on a wild-goose chase.

In Hiding

THE detective strolled down a quiet street until he came to a large wooden gate with a faded board bearing the words "PETE'S LIVERY STABLE." Hanvey took a quick look round, and, satisfied he was not being followed, went inside. Out of the shadows darted a figure.

"What happened, Hanvey?" demanded Terry. "Where are the police? Come on, man, tell me what happened." "Not so fast, young man," Hanvey answered. "You talk first."

"Well, I don't know what happened except—well—I opened the safe and somebody stuck a gun in my back and took the necklace. Then I heard Ellis say, 'Who's there?' Then came a shot and the sound of a fall close to my feet. Then the lights went on—you know the rest. Tell me, does Joan believe I did it?"

"She told her folk what she thought of 'em and then she nipped and ran July 24th, 1937.

away." Hanvey sat down on a bale. "The police followed her, thinking she would lead them to you, but all she's doing is decoying them away from you."

"I'm not gonna have her involved in this. I'll give myself up."

"That will settle your hash," mocked Hanvey. "You're so hog-tied with circumstantial evidence now, it'd take an electric chair to untangle you. You've got to stay here. Pete, the fellow that owns this place, is an old friend of mine—being buying my hay for thirty years. This is a perfect hide-out. No one will ever find you—"

"Yoo hoo!" sang out a voice. "It's Joan!" yelled Terry, and charged for the door.

When Jim Hanvey learnt that the girl had followed him because she was certain that Terry had been acting on the detective's orders he said a few cuss words. He was trying to think what to do when the sound of a police siren caused the two young people to clutch at one another and for him to do some more muttering.

But there was a hay chute that few knew about, and by sliding down this to an exit in another street Hanvey was able to get away with his two charges. They were scurrying down the street when an ancient hansom cab loomed up and Hanvey gave a cry of joy. It was Pete himself. They all piled into the old cab.

"Pete is about the only guy in this city with a hansom," Jim told his charges. "And believe me he can make that animal between the shafts get going. Pete's famous for his cab, and people fall over themselves to get a ride. His stable would have been a grand place to hide, but now it must be swarming with cops. Where in heck can I take you?"

Hanvey took out the watch that he had picked up near the garden wall and Terry gave an exclamation of surprise. It was his watch.

"When do you recollect having it last?"

"I was looking at it when those two fellows jumped on me at your farm."

"Romo!" Jim laughed. "A watch just sticks to his fingers naturally. Praise be—that's our man. He followed you to the Frost house. Well, that explains plenty." He pouched the watch. "I'll keep this evidence for the moment. Now to settle a hiding-place. Ah, I have it." He stood up, and old Pete opened the little trap-door in the roof. In a low voice the detective gave an address.

They entered some ten minutes later some apartments in a quiet street, and went upstairs. On a landing Hanvey faced the two young people.

"If you want me to get you two out of this jam you've got to do all that I say, and no arguments. Maybe I'll make something of you two before I'm through." He pointed to number eleven. "I'm going to have a talk with the lady who lives here. Don't you two go away."

It was five minutes before Hanvey returned and beckoned them. They stared in wonderment at a pale-faced, homely creature, who was either ill or in grief.

"Come on, get your duds off," said Hanvey. "This lady here ain't got no heart for house-keeping just now. She could use a hired girl."

Joan was thinking of uttering strong protests when the woman gave her a funny little curtsy. "You're Miss Joan. Fancy you coming way down here just to help me." She smiled at the young man. "I understand you're Mister Terry. You two are going to be married. Tom has often talked about you two."

"Tom?" questioned Joan. "Who's Tom?"

The woman seemed to wince, and bit her lip as if to check herself from breaking down. "Oh, I forgot," she whispered faintly. "You always called him Ellis, didn't you?"

"You're Mrs. Ellis?" gasped Terry. "But don't you know I'm suspected of—"

"Oh, you didn't do it." Mrs. Ellis shook her head. "Mr. Hanvey told me, and I'm sure he's right. I've known of Mr. Hanvey a good many years—he helped one of Tom's earlier employers in a big fraud case. So you can stay here; you're safe here."

"Thanks!" The two young people spoke in a hoarse whisper.

"Mrs. Ellis says the police've come and gone, so you can rest easy here for a spell."

"Why couldn't we have taken that watch down to headquarters—it proves that Romo was at the Frosts?" demanded Terry.

"That watch proves it only to us," answered Hanvey. "To the police that clue's a homing-pigeon—it comes right back to you. I'll take care of Romo and find out who he's working for. I'm the detective. You're supposed to be a writer, ain'teha?"

"Sure, there's my book."

"Well, you're going to forget all those highfalutin ideas about that five volume book and you're gonna write yourself an honest-to-goodness newspaper story. It's gotta be good enough to catch the murderer of this woman's husband, and good enough to save your own life. I'll help you write this article to the 'Globe' whilst Joan helps Mrs. Ellis with the dishes."

The next afternoon Jim Hanvey walked into the editorial office of the night editor of the "Globe," and plunked down some copy.

"Who are you? And what are you doing in here?"

Hanvey grinned at the editor. "I told 'em it was important. It's also important that your final edition comes out exactly at nine-thirty."

"Exactly at nine-thirty?" the editor shouted angrily. "Who are you?"

"I'm the man that's bringing you Don Terry's column on odds and ends," said Hanvey, and was gone.

The editor turned back to his work, having decided he had been listening to a madman. Suddenly he realised what the name Don Terry meant, and he looked at the copy. He read a few lines and then yelled for his chief sub. The latter stated it was too late to put this copy in the late final, whereupon the editor said that this copy was so good and so startling that the "Globe" would put out an extra edition.

Jim Hanvey knew a man in the police department who owed his promotion to him, and he was able to supply the address of Romo and Smith. Jim called at this address and left a note. Those two worthies read it and were so alarmed that Smith rang up Mr. Dunn.

"Mr. Dunn, why have you sent us this note?" Smith said over the 'phone. "It says 'Come to my office immediately. I got the tip you were spotted at the Frosts' last night,' and it's signed 'The Boss.'"

"I don't write notes, and I don't sign myself 'The Boss,'" snarled Dunn. "This is some sort of a trap."

A cry came from Romo, who was at the window. "I've just spotted that 'tee fella Hanvey and he's watching from a doorway across the street."

"We've spotted Hanvey watching this place. Guess he framed this note so we'd come chasing down to your place so he could follow us," Smith explained. "Guess we'll have to stay here."

"Oh, no, you're not," Dunn laughed unpleasantly. "Hanvey knows too much already. Come on down to my office as if you don't suspect, and let him follow you. We'll take care of him."

Smith hung up. "Pal, we gotta job of work. I'll get quite a kick out of killing this Hick Hanvey."

Hanvey's Bluff Nearly Fails

WHEN Romo and Smith left their lodgings they were followed by Jim Hanvey, and the two gunmen lured him down a very quiet street to a warehouse.

Hanvey entered the warehouse and looked round the place. It seemed dank and deserted. There was an open door leading down into a cellar, and he hesitated on the top step. He took a step or two down, then paused. Instinct that had saved his life before warned him to be careful. He noticed a small round bale and this he pushed down the stairs. It rolled from step to step with a dull thump, not unlike that of human foot-falls. Two guns roared.

Romo and Smith switched on torches and expected to see a corpse.

"T'aint fitting to shoot a man that's bringing you a first-class watch," drawled Hanvey. "Here, Romo, catch!"

Smith gaped and Romo just had enough presence of mind to catch the watch. He flashed his torch on it.

"Where'd you get this?" Romo demanded.

"What else did you find out?" growled Smith, fingering his gun and hesitating to fire.

"If I was speaking to your boss I might get real talkative," calmly stated Hanvey.

"Better take him to the boss," whispered Romo in his friend's ear. "He musta found this at the Frost house. He seems so gosh-darned sure of himself that I reckon he's got us enclosed."

They took Hanvey through a number of underground passages into another warehouse, where there was a telephone. Mr. Dunn soon made his appearance.

"I'm willing to trade you a thirty-hour start on the police for a signed confession," Hanvey looked at Dunn, as if not at all surprised to find he was the boss. "And Mrs. Frost's fancy necklaee."

"You can fool those two stooges," Hanvey, but not me," snarled Dunn, with a contemptuous leer. "You can't hang anything on us with this watch. As the boys didn't shoot you I'll show 'em a better way."

A trapdoor in the floor was lifted up and Hanvey, craning forward, could hear the swish of water. He was over one of the sewers.

"What's the time on that watch?" Hanvey seemed in no way alarmed.

"Nine twenty-five," Dunn answered. "Why?"

"In exactly five minutes the final edition of the 'Globe' is going to be out. Three hundred thousand people will be reading it then."

"Reading what?" "All about you." Hanvey laughed at Dunn and then looked at the two gunmen. "And all about you two killing Ellis. You will read how your boss put you up to do the shooting. Now you can shoot me, or drown me, but what about the other three hundred thousand people?"

Dunn looked keenly at Hanvey. "We'll wait and take a look at this final edition. Get him ready, boys, so that if it's a stall you'll know what to do."

They bound Hanvey's arms and fastened heavy weights to his legs and deposited him in a chair close to the open trap. One push and he was gone. At 9.30 Romo went up for the final edition, and returned in triumph to say that he could find nothing. Dunn took a good look, and Hanvey felt a chill of fear go up his spine.

"There's nothing in this paper, Hanvey," cried Dunn. "You were lying."

"Then that can't be the final edition," desperately Hanvey argued.

"Don't waste time with him," shouted Dunn. "Give him a push, and get it finished."

"I tell you you're making a mistake," cried Hanvey, as the two gunmen laid hands on the chair. "They've got you three down for the Ellis murder. Kill me and they'll get you for that as well."

Romo and Smith glanced questioningly at Dunn.

"Hanvey, we'd be fools not to do this," Dunn said at last. "You know too much, and—"

Dunn broke off because faintly the cry of a newsboy carried down to the dismal and chilly warehouse:

"Extra—Extra—Special Edition of the 'Globe.'"

"Get that paper!" Dunn rasped out. Romo returned in a wild rush a few seconds later.

"He's right, boss." He was whimpering with fear. "Terry names us as the Ellis killers. You're in it. Mr. Elwood's in it."

Dunn snatched the paper, and his eyes dilated as he saw the glaring headlines on the front page with the names of Romo, Smith and himself.

It was a very clever letter that Terry had written with the help of Jim Hanvey. He mentioned people who could have done the killing. Romo and Smith were his chief suspects, with Dunn as their chief.

"I stand accused," Terry had written. "To every one of you I am a man to be shot down at sight. I am innocent, though the first of my accusers is the father of the girl I love. W. B. Elwood knew the stones would be returned. If Romo and Smith and Dunn are not the guilty party, then why not Elwood? Davis, the insurance company's investigator, left the house not many minutes before the crime—has he got an alibi for those fatal minutes? Getting the emeralds as well as the hundred thousand dollars insurance would have been good business for Mr. Frost. Why should he not be suspected?"

There was a lot more, in fact, Don Terry had brought every person that was in any way connected with the crime into his story.

"What're you going to do, Mr. Dunn?" Romo demanded.

"I'm going to headquarters to see Inspector Garrett, and establish my alibi." Dunn was no longer the same assured crook. "I've got to prove I spent a very pleasant evening at my club."

"But how about us?" wailed Smith. "We ain't got no alibi."

"Mr. Hanvey put you on the spot, let him get you off," suggested Dunn. "I leave him in your hands."

"Now I started to talk about a trade," Hanvey said as the two gunmen began

Finally, the desired statement was approved by the detective.

to unfasten his bonds. "Give me the emeralds and—"

"We ain't got no emeralds, and we didn't kill nobody," interrupted Smith. "You've got us into a tough spot, and we didn't do a thing."

"You can tell that to the police, but you can't pull the wool over the eyes of James Wilford Hanvey."

"We can't tell the cops," shouted Smith. "Because we were up there last night trying to hi-jack Terry."

"But we never got near him," lamented Romo. "And we're going to take you up to the Frost house to prove it."

They took Hanvey out of the warehouse. He was not sorry to go. As they rode in a taxi the detective pointed out the people in the streets eagerly scanning the evening paper. How he chuckled when the taxi-driver asked them if they had heard of the Terry statement in the "Globe," and in his opinion it was a cinch that Romo and Smith bumped off Ellis!

Romo and Smith intimated to Hanvey that they would pose as his assistants. He would see Mr. or Mrs. Frost and make a statement that they had nothing to do with the shooting. If he refused then it would be just too bad. But their little plan was doomed to failure. Inspector Garrett was furious because every second his 'phone was ringing or suspects were trying to establish alibis. He went down with a squad car to the Frost house to make some inquiries into the amazing statements made by Terry. Now Hanvey had insisted that first of all he must make some investigations, and then he would endeavour to prove that Romo and Smith had no hand in the shooting. Frost was not at home, but Mrs. Frost was eager to answer questions. Then the gmmen heard the police siren and they hurried Hanvey away, much to Mrs. Frost's surprise.

Some time later, Mrs. Ellis opened the door of her apartments and started back in alarm as Romo and Smith marched into the room.

Joan and Terry appeared. "You murderers!" shouted Terry, and flung himself forward.

Jim Hanvey watched the scrimmage with a certain amount of amusement. He closed the outer door, and when he thought the gunmen were getting a little too rough he intervened.

"That'll be enough, Don," he called out. "I can handle these two thugs."

Mrs. Ellis picked up a poker. "What are they doing here?" She waved the weapon threateningly. "I'm not afraid of them. They can't do anything more to me."

"It wasn't them, Mrs. Ellis," Hanvey took the poker away. "They didn't kill your husband—"

"And he's gonna prove it," raved Smith, and whipped out a gun. "Or else someone will get killed."

"Providing that gun don't go off I might do something about it," Hanvey pulled up a chair to the table. "When we were up at the Frosts we had a look round so that you two mugs should look like my assistants, and I chanced to explore a small closet, and I found quite a stack of papers." He produced a wad of paper from his pocket. "These two were on top. I was about to question Mrs. Frost when our friends showed up and spoiled everything."

"Them newspapers don't mean a thing," cried Romo.

"Oh, yes they do. Someone had shoved them on the floor," coolly answered Hanvey. "Maybe it was the murderer. They were slid off in the last twenty-four hours, because the paper on top of the pile now don't July 24th, 1937.

carry any dust. There are heel marks on the papers, and these leather heels tell me quite a lot."

"What?" demanded Smith.

"Don't keep on bellowing so much."

Hanvey scowled at the tall gunman. "The more you shout the less chance I have of saving your miserable skin. Terry, take a pencil and make some notes. Ten and a half shoes, indicating a height of five foot eleven—soles worn on the outside, meaning a quite heavy man." He looked at the small party clustered round him. "And I've a fairly good notion who went into that closet, took those emeralds and killed Mr. Ellis. But there's only one way to trap him."

"Well, come on, we're listening," said Smith.

"Bait. The thirty thousand dollars the insurance company's offering for that necklace."

"But, Mr. Hanvey, he wouldn't dare to try and get that money now. There's a murder charge—"

"Yes, but that's hanging on you, Terry," the detective told the boy. "As long as the police suspect Don Terry, the real criminal can operate without showing his hand. Supposing you were in gaol, Don, the real criminal could go after that thirty thousand without tipping to the police they had juggled the wrong man."

"What do you want me to do, Mr. Hanvey?" Terry asked in quiet, resigned tones.

"Force this rascal to show his hand." Hanvey pushed some paper across the table. "We'll write to the 'Globe' that you're giving yourself up at the Central Street Police Station tomorrow."

Joan was all against the scheme, but Hanvey had a persuasive tongue, and finally the desired statement, approved by the detective, was forwarded to the editor of the "Globe."

The next morning, when Hanvey was certain that the "Globe" had been read by its three hundred thousand readers he put through a call from Mrs. Ellis' apartments to the insurance company. He was informed that Mr. Lambert was in conference with Mr. Davis.

"This concerns both of them," growled Hanvey. "Put me through." A pause. "This is Hanvey speaking."

That was as far as the detective got, for loud, angry sounds came out of the 'phone.

"I know you look like losing thirty thousand dollars, but you won't if you listen to me," Hanvey managed to speak at last. "You want to know where I am—well, if you'll listen I'll tell you where I am and what I want you to do. I'm sure Mr. Davis will agree to my plan of getting back the emeralds. Some time before midnight the thief is gonna get in touch with you. I am confident of that, but you'll have to take my word for it. I want you to tell him that I'm handling the case for the company, and tell him he can reach me at No. 20 Stratton Street. Send a messenger down to me with the thirty thousand dollars at once."

Hanvey stood back from the 'phone. "They're arguing," he whispered to his small audience. Then he waved them to be quiet. "Davis agrees. Brackett is coming down with the money at once. Thanks. Good-bye."

Within an hour Brackett handed the money to Hanvey, and when Romo and Smith saw the pile of notes their mouths watered, and their eyes bulged as they saw Hanvey take out a small bottle from his pocket and then with a brush begin to dab the notes.

It was dark when Mrs. Ellis appeared with a note that had been pushed under the door.

"INSURANCE COMPANY SAYS YOU'LL HANDLE. BE IN 'PHONE-BOOTH CORNER DRUGSTORE 10.45. ACT ALONE OR YOU DIE."

Just after ten Jim Hanvey prepared to leave, and the crooks offered to act as convoy.

"I've gotta act alone," the detective told them.

"Thirty thousand dollars can take you a long way," cried Smith. "How do we know you're not walking out on us?"

"For the first time in your lives, you two're gonna trust someone," Hanvey then turned to Terry. "Keep that appointment, son. I won't fail you."

But when Hanvey had gone the two gunmen looked at each other.

"That dough could take us a long way," hissed Smith. "I'm gonna follow that guy if you don't!"

"Oh, no you don't," viciously retorted Romo. "I'm gonna see that he don't get hurt, by you nor nobody else."

They slipped out before Joan or Terry could stop them. They stalked their quarry warily.

Hands Up!

JIM HANVEY was standing near the telephone booth when he heard the bell ring. He took off the receiver.

"Hanvey speaking."

"Come to No. 13 Mart Place, Apartment one. Make sure no one follows you. If you are followed you will be killed," a voice spoke in hollow tones.

The detective found the place and had no idea that Romo and Smith were trailing him. Those two worthies were not enjoying themselves, because they had a strong idea a police officer had recognised them, and if so, the whole force would soon be on their tail. No. 13 was an ordinary sort of building and the door was open. Hanvey entered and found himself confronting four doors, but one was open. He entered, and the door closed softly after him.

"Where's the money?" said the same hollow voice, and from behind a curtain came a hand holding a revolver.

Hanvey took the money out of the envelope and held it out. Another hand appeared and the money was seized. The money vanished behind the curtain.

"Hey, mister, where are the emeralds?"

"You've broken your bargain," spoke the hollow voice. "Two men followed you down here. I had the police take care of them. I have hidden the emeralds in the room. You can find them for yourself—if you can." A mocking laugh and then the sound of a key turning in the lock.

Hanvey found there were three doors and all were locked. He cursed Romo and Smith for following him. A faint hissing sound made him glance round in surprise. This room was a bit stuffy and it had no windows. The hissing grew louder. He bent down, and then started up quickly—gas! Soon his senses began to reel and he began to stagger round the room. He swayed and knocked into a vase, which broke. The emeralds lay on the floor beside the unconscious figure of Jim Hanvey!

The crowds at the police station were dense. Thousands of people had come to see Don Terry give himself up. Inspector Garrett was infuriated about all the publicity that Terry was getting.

At the station all those whom Terry had accused as possible criminals were present. Garrett was of the opinion that it was a bluff and that the boy

(Continued on page 28)

Known as the cleverest criminal lawyer in the State, Barry Brandon is appointed District Attorney, and he prosecutes many of his former clients ruthlessly, until the girl he loves is put "on the spot." A dramatic story, starring Lee Tracy and Margot Grahame

Guilty and—not Guilty

IN the court-room of General Sessions at Los Angeles a confident gentleman was seated in the witness-stand giving evidence against a prisoner who had been charged with theft. By his side, leaning casually against the left balustrade of the stand, was a young lawyer, cleanly shaved, neat and almost finicky in his carefully cut clothes—a white carnation in his coat lapel and a friendly, genial look on his clever face as he cross-examined the gentleman in the chair.

"And you identify the prisoner as the thief by his voice?"

"Yes."

"And by the way he swings his arms as he walks or runs? Very good." The young lawyer smiled. "And when he ran his hat fell off?"

"It did."

The lawyer lounged across the well of the court to where exhibits were placed on a table. He took up a hat and regarded it almost with affection as he turned to the jury.

"People's exhibit A," he told them. "One black Fedora hat—slightly the worse for wear." He turned to the witness. "This, you say, fell off his head when he ran?" He put it on the defendant's head a moment. "Not a very good fit!"

The jury allowed themselves to laugh. The prosecuting attorney jumped to his feet.

"I suggest that Mr. Brandon let the witness talk!"

"Sorry," said the defending counsel. "Well, this hat fell off the prisoner's head and you picked it up and examined it carefully. And you are prepared to swear that it belongs to the prisoner?"

"I am," the witness answered.

"You are positive because of the initials in the hat." Brandon glanced into the exhibit. "You are quite positive because of the initials J. B. on the lining—John Brittain?"

The witness gave him a steady stare. "That clinched it!"

"Do you know the penalty for perjury?" came the lawyer's next question, but before the witness could reply, the prosecuting attorney again sprang up.

"This is irrelevant and immaterial!" he cried, facing the judge. "The court is being treated to one of Mr. Brandon's conjuring tricks. He's going to get a rabbit out of the hat!"

Brandon caught him up.

"CRIMINAL LAWYER"

"A rabbit? No—a clean acquittal! There are no initials in this hat."

The witness' face was a study as the jury began to exchange significant nods. Brandon turned to the judge, handing him the exhibit with a little bow, as he said:

"And so, your Honour, the matter is ended. The people have based a case for conviction upon non-existent initials in a hat through which the prosecution has been talking!"

The judge glanced into the hat. He nodded to the jury who had risen. The foreman spoke:

"No case, your Honour. Mr. Brittain is acquitted."

As Brandon left the court many admiring glances were bestowed on him by those of both sexes. He was always so suspiciously gentle to a hostile witness. So ready to pounce—and then to turn away anger by a little joke.

Back in his rooms, Brandon was met in the hall by his Japanese servant.

"Miss Walker here, sir," he said. "She say she wait for you."

Brandon grimaced.

"And I have a jury case to read up!" He strode into the parlour to meet a brown-eyed, golden-haired girl who stood up from where she had been lolling in his easiest chair. "Betty, this is a surprise."

"Oh, yes?" she smiled. "Never mind your old cases. You've got to take me to the Larkin Club to-night. You promised."

"Did I?" He regarded her slight, shapely form, her pleading brown eyes. "Oh, well, okay! Mitsu," he called to the Japanese boy, "put out my things—I'm dining out."

"I'll call back for you." Betty Walker came close to him. "Daddy was very pleased with you to-day. He says you'll go far—getting people out of scrapes when they're guilty all the time! Bye, Barry—like me a little?"

"I like you a lot," Brandon told her. "But don't you believe all your father says about me."

Later that evening a very mixed crowd was gathered at Gene Larkin's night club, dancing, gambling and drinking.

Larkin, a good-looking, well-dressed fellow whose only fault seemed to lie in his somewhat tight-drawn, thin-lipped mouth, moved about among his guests, keeping keen eyes on everything without appearing to be anything more than just another of the many pleasure-seekers. He noted with a faintly approving smile that Barry Brandon was at the American bar chatting with a small knot of men whom Larkin knew to be rich and careless of money.

In one of the smaller rooms much quieter customers were sitting and standing round a roulette table, all eyes watching the jumpy antics of a small white ball in the spinning bowl-shaped wheel.

Larkin sauntered along the bar-room to Brandon, now alone on his high stool at the bar, rather moodily pulling at a cigar.

He asked, just above a whisper:

"Did you take care of the Martin matter, Barry?"

"Martin is in the County Gaol."

Larkin lighted a cigar. Then he said, very softly:

"I told you to get a writ."

"I don't like Martin," said Brandon stubbornly. "And so—he's in gaol."

Larkin took a drink from the barman, asking him:

"Plain tonic?" The man nodded and went along to serve other customers. Larkin spoke again:

"Barry, listen—I like Bill Martin and I want him on the street. What do you think I pay you money for?"

The young lawyer slid off the high stool.

"I've often wondered," he said coolly. "Good-night, Gene."

But Larkin wasn't to be shaken off. He followed Brandon into the roulette-room, where Betty Walker was watching the spinning-wheel, but not playing. She turned to Brandon with the plea:

"Oh, Barry—come and get rabbits out of this blamed thing! I can't pull even one of their whiskers!"

Before Brandon could answer, gruff voices were heard in the outer room; then a sharp order, loud and crisp above the murmuring din:

"Ladies and gentlemen, you are all under arrest! No one to leave the building!"

Betty uttered one of her little excited cries.

"Oh, just fancy—a raid! How perfectly thrilling!"

Larkin nudged Brandon with his elbow.

"Stick around, Barry—I'll need you at the night court."

Brandon took Betty's arm.

"Don't talk," he ordered. "Come with me—I'll get you out of this."

In the night court, Brandon found Larkin's guests formed up in a kind of bunch on the left-hand benches. Larkin himself was quite at ease, supremely confident that his pocket lawyer would get him, and the rest, out of trouble with one of his "tricks." The presiding judge was a straight-faced woman of about forty who answered Brandon's salute, as he approached the bench, with a half smile.

"Another gambling raid?" she inquired.

The prosecuting attorney answered:

"Yes, your Honour—another breach of the peace."

The judge glanced towards Brandon: "You representing the defendants?"

"Your Honour—yes." He gestured towards Larkin's crowd. "These ladies and gentlemen are accused of being found on premises under suspicion of the police. I shall plead guilty for the lot of them!"

Larkin stared, unable to believe his ears. And while he stared, the judge gave her ruling:

"In the case of the people versus defendants arrested in a gambling club, the said defendants are each and every one fined fifty dollars, with the alternative of thirty days in the county gaol."

Larkin came out of his trance. He advanced towards the Bench.

"Your Honour, don't worry. I'll pay the fines." He turned to Brandon. "Your joke—mine next time."

The late guests at the Larkin Club fled out, many of them glaring at Brandon for having let them down.

He was about to follow Larkin to the exit when his attention was taken by the next case. A plainly dressed, brown-haired girl was being piloted by the prosecuting attorney to the prisoner's stand at the end of the Bench. She seemed so out of luck that Brandon stood where he was. The bailiff read out from the charge sheet:

"The people versus Madge Carter, charged with picking pockets."

The judge asked in a kindly voice:

"Are you represented by counsel?"

The girl replied stammeringly:

"No, sir. No, my lady. Your Honour, I mean."

The bailiff called:

"Witness, please! Jack Doremus, take the stand."

A broken-nosed bully, with "tough" written all over him, slouched up to the witness chair and dropped into it. The district attorney addressed him:

"Now, Mr. Doremus, please tell the court, in your own words, exactly what happened."

"Well, your Honour, I'm walking down the street just minding my own business," Doremus answered in a sing-song voice. "And saying to myself it's a fine night and not thinking anything wrong with no one, when this dame comes walking by me and sorter stumbles against me and then rushes off. And, when I comes to feel my pockets, my wallet's gone. So then I understands that I've been touched for it and I buzz after her and—I get her."

Brandon drew near to him.

"And you got her? What then?"

The judge asked him:

"Are you acting in this case, too, Mr. Brandon?"

"I am. And I'm pleading not guilty." Brandon studied Doremus with keen eyes. "Let's hear the rest of it."

"Well, I got her and I ses, 'Sister, that wasn't the right thing to do. Where's my wallet?' And she ses, 'What wallet?' So then I sees plain—"

"Never mind what you saw," Brandon checked him. He glanced towards the prosecuting attorney. "Can I have the witness?"

"You already have him," the other lawyer shrugged, adding: "I may tell the court that no wallet has been found on the accused."

Brandon pointed a finger at Doremus' scowling face. "Isn't it a fact that you're known as Fingey Doremus and that you framed a charge against another young woman of stealing your purse only two months ago?"

Doremus glared at him.

"I did. And I got a verdict!"

"Isn't it a fact that the Higher Court quashed the verdict and gave back the young woman her freedom?"

The prosecutor interposed:

"How could he know about the Higher Courts?"

"It's a proper question," Brandon snapped. "And it can be answered in only one way. The records will show that, while there is nothing against my client, there is plenty—and more than plenty—against the witness. Your Honour should see that this city is made safe for our women folk—this poor girl is on her way home when the ruffian in the witness stand accosts her and attempts to put a false charge on her, so that he can extort money. 'Give me money, or I'll say you picked my pocket!' Why, I can hear him threatening her!"

Brandon's finger was still pointing, his eyes boring into Doremus' thick skull. "You never had a wallet—you haven't a cent on you! An importuning black-mailing beggar—that's what you are!"

Doremus croaked out:

"It ain't so! I swear I did have a wallet!"

"Answer me, weren't you trying to frighten this girl into giving you money? Yes or no?"

"I—I—" Doremus jumped up. "Oh, let me go! There ain't no justice here!"

The judge rapped her desk with her gavel.

"Case dismissed. Arrest the witness for perjury."

Brandon offered his arm to the girl in the dock.

"Allow me. My car is at the door."

She put her trembling hand on his arm.

"It's kind of you," she murmured. "You've saved me. But I don't know you."

"What's that matter?" Brandon smiled at her. "You come on out of here. A night court's no harvest home."

She told him, on their way, that she had been working late at a department store, and that her folk lived down south. That she had been engaged to a clerk in a bank, but he had been killed in a motor-bicycle accident. Then she had come to Los Angeles.

"To go on the films?" Brandon broke in, giving her a sideways glance as he steered the car.

"To get a job," she answered seriously. "So's to help myself and the folks at home. This is my lodging—thank you again and again."

"Call round at my office to-morrow at midday," Brandon told her. "Maybe I can find you something better than selling over a counter. Here's my card."

Next morning Brandon had just got rid of a lady who wanted a "cheap" divorce, when Betty Walker barged into his office unannounced. He regarded her without a smile.

"You shouldn't come hurtling into my den this way, Miss Walker."

"Why not—it's almost quitting time. There's nothing much for you to hang around for?"

Brandon stated:

"I'm not going places with you today."

She studied the set mouth and cool eyes.

"You seem to mean it," she allowed. "Can I use your phone?"

He handed her the receiver and she briskly dialed a number. Brandon went on with his work. Betty's voice broke in on his reading:

"Hallo, that you, Toni? Betty this end—I'm free for to-night. Yes, sure I'll go with you to the Clendenning party. I've just broke a date so's to go with you, Toni. No, you needn't pick me up—I'll come along to you. 'Bye-bye, beautiful!"

She put down the receiver.

"D'you know who that was?" she asked snappily.

"Couldn't even give a guess," Brandon answered.

"It was Toni Bandini—the newest crooning sensation. Haven't you heard him on the radio?"

"I get enough noise in court," said Brandon. Whereupon Betty breezed out of his office in a huff.

A Stepping-stone

IN the Larkin Welfare Club things were very quiet. Gene Larkin was going slow, marking time until the club was out of the police searchlights.

Brandon looked in, to find Larkin drinking butter-milk at the bar at five o'clock in the afternoon.

"Water wagon?" inquired Brandon.

"Yeah! I'm saving up to make good that fine you put me into the other night," Larkin added. "What's yours?"

"Brandy smash." Brandon seated himself on a high stool. "I've just heard they're going to make District Attorney Hopkins into a senator."

Larkin nodded.

"That's so." He eyed his companion. "And there'll be a vacancy. And they'll offer Lawyer Barry Brandon the job of D.A."

"Me?" Barry was genuinely surprised. "I'm a defending lawyer—not a prosecutor."

"When you take the job," said Larkin, who had finished off his milk. "we'll all be riding in the gravy train here."

"When!"

Larkin repeated the word "When—and it won't be too long!" He got up, lit a cigarette, still studying Brandon's suddenly set face. What he saw there evidently satisfied him: he strolled away to pass out through the swing doors into the late afternoon.

Almost at once a shot was heard from the street and the dancers on the tea-floor stopped in alarm. Larkin came staggering back into the club, his face a chalky white, his arm hanging loosely, his body swaying.

Some of the dancers rushed to catch him as Brandon came at a run from the bar. He took hold of Larkin's hanging right arm.

"What is it, Gene? What happened?" he asked.

Larkin's eyes challenged those gathered anxiously around him.

"Nothing. Just nothing. Get on with—with the dancing. Tell that fool conductor to—to go on playing. Get me to a hospital—the Polyclinic—"

"I'll get you there." Brandon's arm went about the nearly fainting man. "Lean on me, Gene—my ear's outside."

Brandon took up Madge Carter's references and duly appointed her as his secretary. He found her comfortable apartments with the caretaker in the flats where he lived.

He had now so much defence work in hand that he was more than glad of Madge Carter's quietly efficient assistance. He found her a great relief from all the Betty Walkers' of his acquaintance—with their empty talk and continuous pleasure seeking.

Madge asked her employer some two weeks later, at past seven o'clock:

"Haven't you finished yet?"

"Almost." He gave her a grateful glance. "You're a good scout. You never complain. Like to end up your day's good work by coming with me for a duty call on Gene Larkin?"

Madge would have liked to answer, "Anywhere with you." But she only said, "Of course," in her usual cheery way. Brandon was a puzzle to her, as he was to many others. One minute all smiles—and the next, moody and disposed to snap.

In the private ward at the hospital, Larkin was being interviewed by Inspector Burke and a stenographer—with the medical officer in attendance. The stenographer was saying:

"I didn't catch your last question, inspector."

"Let it go," said Burke. "I'll ask another."

The man sitting up in the bed grinned his thin-lipped smile. "Ask a million, you'll get the same answer."

"Aw, come on, Larkin—we know who shot you. It was Bird-Dog Finn. He walked into H.Q. this morning to ask if we were looking for him. We were."

"Were you?" asked Larkin, in an uninterested voice.

The inspector shut up his note book. "Okay—fight your own battles, if it suits you. But, listen—don't go travelling outside the lav!"

Burke and his typist were in the corridor with the doctor when Brandon came along with Madge.

In the ward, Brandon presented Madge:

"Gene, this is Madge Carter, my secretary."

Larkin's cool eyes studied her. "I've seen you somewhere," he said. "All the same—glad to meet you again. You'll excuse us, Miss Carter—I want to talk to Barry."

She moved away to the window, vaguely uneasy. She remembered Larkin at the night court and the way Brandon had put him and the rest of the chib in the cart.

Larkin whispered to the lawyer as he sat beside the bed.

"I want you to put Bird-Dog Finn on the street. Burke's holding him."

"So you can square the deal yourself?" Brandon inquired. "I wouldn't, Gene."

"Don't be dumb," the other whispered. Then, more loudly. "Barry, that D.A. job's yours."

"I couldn't take it," Brandon frowned. "You know that."

"I don't talk, Barry," Larkin countered. "You take it—it's all set. You'll hear from Bill Walker. I've fixed an appointment for you directly after you leave here. Walker phoned the hospital—knowing you were calling in."

Brandon rose.

"I don't like it," he declared. But he was thinking hard. District Attorney—a stepping-stone to something big, if he played his cards well.

But he'd have to be up against Gene, if he were D.A. An awkward position—he would have to walk warily. He turned to the girl:

"Let's go, Madge. And you might do that spring clean for me to-night with Mitsu—if you really want to. I've got to be at Mr. Walker's office."

Witness to a Crime

THE first big case that came to Brandon when he had become District Attorney was the Nora James murder trial—that of a handsome young woman who was accused of the murder of her husband, a man of more than double her age.

The case against her was not too strong, but Brandon, by the trick of producing in court the bed on which the old man had been killed, with its blood-stained sheets, contrived to force an admission out of the hard-featured woman that her story of burglars was untrue, and that she alone had killed him with a window-sash weight in a violent quarrel.

Afterwards, in his chambers, Brandon was being congratulated by old Walker and Betty, who had been sitting in court with Toni Bandini in the hope of making Brandon jealous.

Madge was there, saying: "I'd be terrified to be in the witness-stand with you pounding the truth out of me!"

"All you'd need to do is to say: 'I refuse to reply,'" Brandon told her.

Betty Walker shook him by the hand. "You're wonderful, Barry—simply wonderful!" She turned to Madge.

"Isn't he, Miss Carter?"

"Very," Madge replied.

Betty stood away to give her father a chance. Old Walker smiled under his moustache at Brandon.

"Pretty good work, what? You'd like a drink?"

"I could certainly use one," Brandon agreed. "Thanks, friends all, but I don't feel so wonderful. I don't like having to do things of this sort."

When alone with his secretary, Brandon spoke something of his thoughts.

"What kind of a world do we live in, Madge? Why must there be murderers —and men to prosecute murderers? And others to hang them? What happened to-day? I was a better actor than that poor wretch of a woman—that was all. I hate myself for having sent her down for life. And yet you can't let people go about killing each other." He put an arm around her. "Madge, you've helped me a lot—you deserve to share the glory, if it is glory. We'll go out to-night, some place where it's gay. I want to get this dreadful business out of my mind."

It was inevitable that Brandon should get into the black books of Larkin. As District Attorney, Brandon had to shut down Larkin's roulette-tables and stop much of the gambling. Larkin wanted to bribe him, but Barry told him plainly:

"Don't be silly, Gene. I warned you if I took the D.A. job I'd shoot straight."

"You and I have been friends a long time, Barry."

"You always had your money's worth," Brandon retorted.

"I know you're aiming at becoming governor of this State," Larkin went on. "Well, okay by me, if we work together. If not—watch your step!"

Brandon told Mitsu not to admit Larkin any more to his flat. Then, tired and annoyed, arranged over the phone to go out with Madge.

"I bring you cocktail, sir," said Mitsu. "In which much soothings!"

Betty Walker rang up just as he was starting out to ask him to call in at their place for a few minutes. She told him Bandini was going to sing.

"Oh!" Brandon's tone was expressive. But Betty, at the other end of the line, wouldn't let go. "Dad wants to see you. Something about an appointment he knows of. There's a vacancy for something or other big. You must come—even if it's only for half an hour."

So Barry went down to Madge's apartments to explain.

"I'll call back for you," he promised.

"I won't be long." He held her hand.

"I like you, Madge—and you like me. That's so?"

She nodded her brown head, hiding her eyes from him. He kissed her forehead; then, laughing at himself, let go her hand.

"Getting sentimental. Sign of old age. I'll be back by ten o'clock."

"You have lied, Madge Carter," Brandon thundered, "to save me, not Gene Larkin!"

There was a big reception on at the Walker home. And Mitsu's cocktail had not soothed Barry any more than the interview with Gene Larkin. Old Walker had some news.

"Hopkins is coming along," he said. "He's a big success in the Senate, and can pull strings. The post of governor is likely to become vacant." Old Walker put a hand before his mouth, speaking behind his fingers. "Hush, little bird—don't talk too loud! Get me, Barry?"

So Barry stopped to dinner. And the dinner was a good one, with plenty of champagne. Barry got rather excited, one way and another, and kept putting off his plan to 'phone Madge.

They all came trooping into the big drawing-room after dinner to hear Baudini sing. Barry had to stay and listen. Then there followed a hazy talk with Senator Hopkins—a vastly important fellow now—in Walker's private room.

"The governorship is in your pocket, Brandon," Hopkins told Barry. "You've only to stand fast and watch out."

"You know, I'm s'posed to be having dinner with Madge."

"It's rather late for that, Barry. It's nigh on twelve o'clock."

"Twelve?" Brandon swayed a little. "Why, that's just too bad of me! I got to—o—call her up."

"She's in bed long ago. Come and meet people, Barry. You must—I insist on it. Influential people." She put her soft, round arm through his. "I've always been your best friend, Barry. I can help—and dad can help. I know what's in the air."

"About—about what Hopkins told me?"

She gave his arm a squeeze. "Didn't I tell him that you were the right one of all the likely candidates?" she whispered. "You and me, Barry—governor and his lady. Oh, you're making me propose to you!"

Brandon got home at two o'clock—to find Madge waiting in the hall of the flats. He greeted her with a stupid grin.

"Barry, you've been drinking!" "Betty's proposed to me, see?" His voice rose shrill as he chuckled inanely. "So there you are! Jest had to—"

He became aware of the deeply hant look in her eyes.

"Didn't think you'd take it thish way, Madge," he hiccupped, suddenly solemn.

She turned away from him, and, without another word, entered her flat.

Ten minutes later Madge came forth with her bag packed. She had made up her mind. She would go back home. But first she must get a bed for to-night.

The Welfare Club? Yes, that would be still open.

She was shown into the waiting-room by the bar-tender, who went to his master.

"Dame called Madge Carter to see you, boss."

Larkin was just going up to his rooms. The club was closing down for the night. He signed for Madge to be sent in.

"Remember me, Mr. Larkin?" she asked.

"Sure. You're Brandon's secretary. Sit down. What is it?"

"I thought perhaps you'd cash a small cheque for me and let me stay here till the morning. I'm going home by the eight-ten."

"What's wrong?"

"Barry is going to marry Miss Walker," she told him simply.

Larkin nodded.

"I understand." He held out his hand for the cheque, took it, glanced at it, and got out his wallet. He gave Madge the amount in five-dollar bills. "No need to thank me. And I'll put you on to a quiet hotel for the night."

July 24th, 1937.

Madge rose from her chair. "I'm very grateful to you—" she was beginning when the bar-tender came in hurriedly. He whispered to Larkin:

"Bird-Dog Finn jest gone by—heading west."

He slipped a gun into Larkin's hand. Larkin smiled crookedly as he rose up.

"I'll take you along to that hotel, Miss Carter," he said.

They went out into the night together, Madge uneasy and alarmed. She had heard and she had seen. Larkin moved along the dark, almost deserted street with quick strides. She saw a furtive figure in front of her suddenly start to run, then came a flash and a stifled report. The figure in front of them collapsed on the pavement with choking, horrible cries.

Larkin, a little way ahead of her, turned about coolly.

"We'd best go back—something's happened."

He caught her hand in his and drew her along to the club.

Towards a New Life

IT was the last day of the trial of Gene Larkin for the murder of John Joseph, alias Bird-Dog Finn. The only evidence that District Attorney Brandon could call was that of the bar-tender, who stubbornly persisted that Finn had been hanging around the Welfare Club on the night of his death, determined to get in another shot at Larkin.

"Finn was up against the defendant," Brandon asked. "Can you say why?"

"Yeah. Finn and Bill Martin was friends—a couple of crooks together," came the answer. "And when Bill Martin come out of gaol—he got run over by a car."

"And Finn believed that Larkin was responsible for the accident?" Brandon stressed the last word.

Larkin, sitting next to him in the well of the court, gave him a black look.

Brandon was fiddling with his pencil, staring at the witness. After a few moments' thought he nodded to the defending counsel.

"Your witness, Mr. Gray."

Larkin's new pocket lawyer smiled. "I've finished with him. I am asking the single eye-witness to take the stand. I call Miss Madge Carter."

Brandon rose sharply to stare at the white-faced girl as she entered the court, and, without once looking at him, took her seat on the stand. He had tried vainly to find her since that disastrous night at the Walker reception—and this sudden reappearance in this sordid case took him completely by surprise. Meanwhile, Gray was having her sworn in.

"Miss Carter," he began when she had taken the oath, "please tell the jury where you were at three o'clock on the morning of October Fourth?"

"I was outside the Welfare Club in Seventh Avenue," came her answer, her eyes fixed steadily on Gray's. "Mr. Larkin came out of the Club with me. He walked quickly—I was just behind him. After he had gone a little way, a man came out of a doorway and— and shot at him."

"And then?"

"I saw Mr. Larkin being crowded against the building. Then Mr. Larkin pulled out a gun from his pocket and shot the man down in self-defence."

Gray turned to Brandon.

"Your witness."

Brandon seated himself beside Madge.

"Look at me, please. What were you doing at Gene Larkin's club at three in the morning?"

"I called in there because—"

"Because?"

She replied, giving him look for look: "I had left my lodgings very suddenly. And so I went to Mr. Larkin's club."

Brandon asked, in gentler tones:

"And your story of this shooting is your best recollection of the incident?"

"Yes."

Brandon rose and turned away from those blue eyes he had read on the instant. He addressed the judge:

"That is all, your Honour. The State rests."

Larkin, at the table with his solicitor, laughed sneeringly. Brandon whipped about.

"That laugh's going to cost you your neck! If your Honour please, I desire to question the witness a little further."

"Take the chair again, Miss Carter," the judge directed.

Brandon regard her steadily.

"Miss Carter, you were formerly an employee in the District Attorney's office. You left your job hurriedly. As a matter of fact, you hid yourself away. Where?"

"I lived with friends."

"You regard Gene Larkin as a friend?"

She hesitated. Then answered: "Not exactly a friend."

Brandon nodded.

"I begin to understand. Well, now, you say a man come out of a doorway near the Welfare Club and took a shot at the defendant?"

"Yes."

"As you stood there you noted that the two men were facing each other?"

"Er—yes!"

"Your honour"—Brandon turned to the judge—"I could stop right now. This girl has told a story so plainly false that out of her own mouth she has convicted Gene Larkin. The witness has testified that Finn and Larkin were facing each other. But Finn was shot through the back."

There was a buzz of talk in the court, instantly checked by the usher. The jury exchanged glances.

"I am going to find out why this girl has perjured herself," Brandon went on.

"Isn't it a fact that you have been hiding at the Welfare Club since you left my office?"

"Not hiding," Madge answered piteously. "I had a job there."

"You were virtually a prisoner," Brandon commented. "I see. Isn't it a fact that Larkin threatened you?"

She cried out emphatically:

"No! No!"

"Isn't it a fact that Larkin threatened the life of the District Attorney?" he snapped out. "Ah, I see you can't deny that! If told you, if you didn't lie for him, that my body would likely be found in a ditch one morning? That, if you didn't lie, he would certainly ruin me politically?"

Madge sat there, pale and shaken, unable to speak.

"You have lied, Madge Carter!" Brandon thundered. "To save me, not Gene Larkin!"

She faltered.

"Perhaps—a little—"

"Take the witness," Brandon told Gray curtly.

But the defending counsel shook his head.

"There will be no examination by me. The defendant himself will take the stand."

Larkin rose up, grinning evilly.

"And the defendant will tell you plenty!" he cried.

(Continued on page 27)

It was not for vengeance alone that the masked rider struck at Jason Burr's sinister organisation. He was out to smash a tyrant's ambition to build an empire beyond the Rockies. A thrill-packed serial of the early West, when California was a pawn on the chess-board of a scheming nation, starring Bob Livingston

The MOUNTIES ARE COMING

Read This First

The year is 1844 and the scene California, then a province of Mexico. But gold had been discovered by a powerful despot known as General Jason Burr, who conceives the idea of establishing a dictatorship with the aid of Imperial Russia.

The Russian ambassador, Count Raspinoff, exerts his influence to supply Burr with ex-soldier colonists from the Tsar's army. These, together with the men already under Burr's command, form the nucleus of a force whereby the would-be dictator plans to seize control of the country.

Gold is the mainstay of Burr's ambitions, and he has opened a secret mine which is worked by captive labour. But the land on which it is situated is the property of a family named Loring, and the Lorings proving troublesome, the father and the youngest son are murdered.

Burr, however, has reckoned without Don Loring, the elder son of the family, who returns from U.S. territory for the purpose of exacting vengeance.

Under the alias of the Eagle, Don harasses Jason Burr with the aid of two Yankee frontiersmen known as Salvation and Whipsaw, and a priest named Father Jose. Then, gaining the interior of Burr's headquarters, he finds the plotter is holding as captives Doris Colton and her father, a mining engineer.

He also discovers Burr's plan to seize California, and, forming a Vigilance Committee, tries to secure a supply of ammunition the man has bought. But the Vigilantes are betrayed and cornered in a warehouse by Cossacks in Burr's pay.

Nevertheless, Don reaches the ammunition shed and prepares to blow it sky-high. He has scarcely fired the train of powder, however, when a Cossack discovers him and locks him in the doomed building!

EPISODE 3— "Condemned by Cossacks"

Now Read On

To Save California

WITH no means of undoing what he had begun, and with the powder-magazine on the very point of going sky-high, Don Loring was in as desperate a plight as ever he had known. But, fortunately for him, the shed possessed a window in its rear wall, and as he realised that there was no hope of escaping via the locked door he made a dash for that window.

He dived head-first through it, and then, running as hard as he could, he raced across an expanse of open ground at the back of the ammunition shed.

There was a bellowing roar that smote the air like a terrific clap of thunder, and the ammunition shed disappeared in a blaze of fire that illuminated the whole township of Santa Rosalie.

Don flung himself down and felt the hot blast of the concussion sweep over him. Then, while he lay there with the echoes of the explosion ringing in his ears, fragments of stone and timber came showering about his prone form.

Behind him, where the shed had stood, a thick pall of smoke was spreading far and wide. He could see nothing of Petroff and his band of Cossacks, but a confusion of shouts told him that the majority, if not all, of them had managed to get clear before the powder-magazine had gone up.

Don now turned towards the warehouse where his friends had been cornered, and he soon realised that the Vigilantes had espied him, for, led by Salvation and Whipsaw, they suddenly swarmed into view and came streaming in his direction.

As they joined him Don spoke to them tersely.

"All right," he jerked out, "let's hit the trail before the Russians recover from their disorder."

The Vigilantes' horses had been left on the edge of a copple not far away, and Don and his companions made tracks for them—were in the act of scrambling astride the broncs when a man whom some of them recognised hove into sight.

He was the individual known as Peters, and it dawned on those who were acquainted with him that he had not kept the appointment which their youthful leader had made for that night. Little did they dream, however, that he was a spy in Jason Burr's pay and that after betraying their plans he had sneaked into Santa Rosalie to watch what transpired.

Nor did they dream that he was secretly cursing the turn that eventually had taken, and had only attached himself to the party now to learn what their next move would be.

Questioned as to his belated arrival, he gave an explanation that satisfied the other Vigilantes, and presently the whole company were galloping away from Santa Rosalie, whose streets were by now thronged with frightened citizens.

To the tune of clattering hoofs the night riders spurred across the range, and they had covered a distance of two or three miles when they reached a boulder-strewn canyada which immediately struck Don as being an advantageous hide-out.

"This looks a likely spot to hold our meetings in future," he said, drawing rein. "Supposing we make it our headquarters?"

The other men were in favour of the suggestion, and after detailing Whipsaw to go back through the rocks and keep an eye on the open terrain which they had just crossed Don turned to address the Vigilantes again.

"Friends," he stated, "to-night we've struck a blow against tyranny, but our work has only just begun.

"I want to impress on you that Jason Burr is no mean antagonist," he continued. "He has numerous resources, and he's adding to his power by conscripting an army. Therefore, we must stick together like brothers, and I've prepared an oath of allegiance which I hope you're all ready to sign."

He had written it in English, since the bulk of his followers were Yankees, and now he read the contents of the paper aloud.

"We, the undersigned," he quoted, "swear loyalty to the Vigilance Committee of the Sohomia Valley, whose aim is to protect California from the despotism of Jason Burr and the designs of Imperial Russia. And in support of this cause we pledge our lives, our fortunes and our sacred honour."

His listeners murmured their approval, and, pen and ink being produced, the Vigilantes began to scrawl their signatures, but before the list could be completed the proceedings were interrupted by a hail from Whipsaw.

"The Cossacks!" the diminutive look-out called.

The Vigilantes showed signs of apprehension, knowing as they did that Petroff's troop outnumbered them, but in a moment Don was reassuring them.

"Don't worry," he said. "I'll lead them off on a false scent. Salvation, you get the rest of the signatures and then bring the paper to me in San Antonio."

Thrusting into the frontiersman's hand the document which contained the oath of allegiance, Don wheeled abruptly and rode through the boulders until he reached the point where Whipsaw had stationed himself, and then he saw a cloud of horsemen advancing from the direction in which Santa Rosalie lay.

They were Petroff and his command, and having rallied from the confusion into which they had been thrown by the explosion of the powder-magazine, they had set out to scour the range in quest of the Vigilantes.

Blind chance had brought them within view of the hide-out selected by Don and his companions, yet they were not destined to investigate the canyada. For, outlining his plan to Whipsaw and ordering the latter to stay under cover, Don charged out into the open and disclosed himself to the Russians.

They recognised him as the Eagle by the white brogue he was riding and the dark clothes that he wore, and with a medley of cries they swerved to pursue him: as he galloped away in an easterly direction.

Yet they could give Don no points in riding, and neither were their ponies a match for the fugitive's in speed and endurance, so that the man whom they knew as the Eagle had no difficulty in keeping well ahead of them.

Working back to the Santa Rosalie road, he passed to the east of that July 24th, 1937.

town and then headed straight for San Antonio, which he reached as the day was breaking; and it was in the dawn's early light that he swung round by the ruined wing of Father Jose's chapel and let himself into the secret underground tunnel which was linked with the more recently-constructed portion of the building.

A few seconds later Don Loring was climbing up through a trapdoor to find himself in the presence of the padre, who was preparing for his daily ministrations in spite of the earliness of the hour, and without loss of time the newcomer attired himself in the clothes that he wore as the supposed organist of the mission.

When Petroff and his men stamped into the chapel a little while afterwards they discovered Father Jose quietly reading and Don seated at the organ.

The Cossack hetman scowled at them suspiciously. Not for an instant did he dream that the meek-looking organ-player was the quarry he was seeking, but he had a shrewd idea that he and the aged priest who was with him might know more about the Eagle than they cared to admit, and he ordered his subordinates to search the mission.

The search was unavailing, and a quarter of an hour later Petroff and his men were departing truculently. But when they had gone Father Jose looked at Don in an anxious fashion.

"My son," he counselled, "you should have a care. You take grave risks in this game of hide-and-seek that you are playing with Jason Burr's minions."

"Grave risks, indeed, padre mio," Don answered calmly. "But they will not be taken in vain—if I am able to avenge the murder of my father and my brother, and help to save California from a tyrant's rule."

The Traitor

WHILE Don Loring had been engaged in decoying Burr's mercenaries from the neighbourhood of the Vigilantes' hide-out, Salvation had been busy collecting the remaining signatures for the written oath of allegiance that the young leader of the organisation had composed.

Within ten minutes of Don leaving the canyada the last member of the committee had appended his name, and a short time later the band of men dispersed with the object of returning to their scattered homes.

A number of them made their way out of the ravine via the boulder-strewn gap where Whipsaw was still posted, and, satisfied that the coast was clear, they rode off across the range. Some, on the other hand, betook themselves to the farther end of the gorge, Peters being among these.

But, unlike his companions, Peters did not strike for his homestead, which was situated away to the north. Instead, he hung back, and then, dismounting from his horse, cautiously retraced his steps to the spot where the oath of allegiance had been signed.

Salvation had lingered there, and when Peters returned thither he saw the frontiersman standing with his back to him, poring over the document that bore the names of the Vigilantes.

Drawing his gun and gripping it by the barrel, Jason Burr's agent crept up on Salvation until he was within striking distance. Then, while his victim's attention was still focused on the paper that he was holding, the traitor brought down the butt of his revolver in a crushing blow that laid the big fellow senseless on the ground.

In another moment Peters had taken possession of the document bearing the Vigilantes' signatures, and, hastening from the canyada again, he climbed astride his bronc and galloped northward.

He was no longer in sight of the committee's future meeting-place when Whipsaw came plodding through the rocks to rejoin Salvation, whom he found in the act of rising into a sitting posture.

"Everybody gone?" Whipsaw inquired.

Salvation blinked up at him, and winced under the spasmodic stabs of pain that were darting through his head.

"Yeah," he said dazedly. "Yeah." "Then what are you a-sittin' there for?" demanded Whipsaw. "What's up with yuh?"

Salvation was trying hard to collect his wits.

"I dunno," he muttered. "Some-thin' seemed to hit me. I was lookin' over the oath of allegiance at the time—"

He stopped speaking all at once, and with an expression of intelligence dawning on his craggy face, he began to cast about him for the document to which he had referred. Then suddenly he scrambled to his feet.

"It's gone!" he blurted. "The paper with the names of all the Vigilantes! Whoever took that crack at me the paper was what he was after! Whipsaw, we getta get to San Toni an' tell the Eagle what's happened."

They mounted their ponies, and, riding hard, they reached San Antonio about half an hour after Don's arrival there, and on locating him in the mission they quickly informed him of the document's disappearance.

Don received the news with an air of concern.

"This means that there's a traitor in the Vigilantes," he announced grimly. "Yes, and that's why Petroff and his Cossacks were waiting for us in Santa Rosalie last night. Boys, we've got to learn who the informer is."

Salvation laid a hand on Don's sleeve. "I've got an idea," he said. "If I disguised myself as a pedlar an' gathered some knick-knacks together, I believe I could ride right into Burr's headquarters, an' by keepin' my ears and eyes open I might be able to find out who it is that's double-crossin' us."

Don was not altogether in favour of the frontiersman risking his life in such a venture, but Salvation persuaded him to let him undertake the project, and, the young fellow at length consenting, the details of the plan were discussed.

Some time later, in the garb of a pedlar, and with his face and hands stained to the colour of a half-breed's, Salvation was setting out from San Antonio on a cart laden with wares and drawn by a sorry-looking mule; and before another hour had elapsed he was approaching Burr's stronghold up near Ortega Pass.

He was seen by a sentry posted at the main gate of the fortified hacienda, and the latter called out to the gangster known as Harris, who was one of Burr's principal henchmen and who was loitering near at hand with a dark-skinned mestizo named Pedro.

"Say, Harris," the sentinel observed, "there's a guy headed this way that looks like a Mexican pedlar. Do you want to let him in?"

"Yeah, why not?" was the reply. "We might as well see what he's got ter sell."

"General Burr does not like strangers inside the wall," interposed the mestizo, but Harris grinned complacently.

"What the general don't know won't hurt him, Pedro," he commented. "He left for the mine with Petroff and the Cossacks as soon as they got back from Santa Rosalie, an' I don't suppose he'll be back for another hour. Anyway, we oughta be able to buy a little junk if we want to."

Salvation was consequently admitted to the courtyard of Burr's stronghold, and he had scarcely drawn his mule to a halt there when Harris and Pedro commenced to rummage through the wares that he had brought with him.

They were soon joined by other members of Burr's gang, and, grinning broadly, the rogues snatched up such articles as took their fancy without making any effort to pay for them. And, although Salvation was in no way dismayed by the brazen theft of his wares, he had to keep up appearances by wailing plaintive protests in the Spanish tongue.

They were protests that were somewhat muffled by the folds of a Mexican serape with which he contrived to keep his face partially hidden, for, if the traitor in the Vigilance Committee were here at the hacienda, Salvation had no desire to be recognised and denounced by him.

Meanwhile, Salvation's alert eyes were questing hither and thither shrewdly, and all at once he descried the figure of a young and lovely girl crossing the courtyard.

He knew that she must be Doris Colton, of whom Don had spoken.

Don had told him to contact this girl if possible, and, in the hope that he might succeed in doing so, had included amongst Salvation's merchandise a wooden cage that contained three or four pigeons—carrier-pigeons which were the property of Father Jose.

"Ah, senorita," the disguised frontiersman exclaimed, accosting Doris, "you buy something from me, yes?" "Not to-day, thank you," came the smiling response.

Doris Colton started to move on. With a quick glance over his shoulder Salvation saw that Burr's rough-necks were still engrossed in the articles that were piled on his cart.

He caught hold of the girl's arm and spoke to her in an undertone.

"Listen, I'm a friend of the Eagle. You've mentioned you to me—described you to me—and I know you're for him."

Doris started, but Salvation went on talking before she could utter a word.

"The Eagle has formed a Vigilance Committee, but there's a traitor in our organisation. I've reason ter believe that he's either in this stronghold now, or was here earlier this mornin'. Do you happen to know who he is?"

The girl found her voice. "No," she whispered, "but I'll try to find out."

Continuing to restrain her, Salvation turned towards his cart and lifted out the basket of pigeons, in which none of Burr's men had shown any interest.

"Ah, here is yeree fine gift for you, senorita," he said loudly. "They weel make beautiful pets. Si, I geev' them to you, in return for your sweet smile."

He leaned nearer to her, and added in his normal manner of speech:

"Take them, ma'in. An' if you do find out who the traitor is, tie a message to one o' these here birds. It'll fly straight to the Eagle."

She flashed him a look of comprehension, and, accepting the wooden cage that he had handed her, thanked him with a pretty graciousness and walked away. Then, as she disappeared from view, Salvation wheeled towards Burr's hirelings again and resumed his expostulations in a mixture of fluent Spanish and broken English.

He was still whining his protests, and meeting with jeers in response, when two men emerged from the main building of the stronghold and started to move across in his direction.

One was Talbot, Burr's chief aid. But it was the other who claimed Salvation's interest, and at sight of the fellow he knew that Doris Colton's assistance in learning the identity of the traitor was no longer necessary. For Talbot's companion was familiar to him as a member of Don's Vigilance Committee—the homesteader known as Peters.

"All right, all right," Salvation heard Talbot announce irritably. "You'll see Burr as soon as he gets back. He went up to the mine with the Cossacks. Yeah, an' he was plenty riled when Petroff told him about the loss o' that ammunition, too."

Burr's lieutenant had reached Salvation's cart by this time, and like the other gangsters he became intrigued by the contents of the vehicle. As for Peters, he moved aside and began to walk up and down impatiently—was still perambulating in this manner when he found himself confronted by the bogus pedlar.

"Stay where you are, Peters, an' take it easy," Salvation whispered. "There's a gun hidden under the folds of this serape, an' it's pointing right at your midriff."

The traitor had stiffened involuntarily, but he had enough good sense to offer no resistance and to keep silent, for it was plain to him that this supposed Mexican pedlar was in deadly earnest. Then Salvation spoke again.

"Unless I'm mistaken," he said,

HORNBY SPEED BOATS FROM 2/11d.

HORNBY RACING BOATS FROM 4/6d.

Boys! If you're out to get the last ounce of fun from the most thrilling outdoor hobby a boy can have, get a Hornby Speed Boat! Hornby Speed Boats and Racers are the finest model craft of their kind in the world—beautifully made and superbly finished. The Hornby clockwork mechanisms are amazingly powerful; they go farther, drive faster and last longer. Your local dealer will show you all the models—from the out-and-out racers to the smart limousines—and whichever you choose, you can be sure that it will be a champion of the pond!

FREE for the asking—a fine new price list in colours!

Meccano Ltd., (Dept. B.D.), Binns Road, LIVERPOOL, 13.

Please send me the new Hornby Speed Boat price list containing illustrations in full colour and all details of the Hornby fleet.

Name.....

Address.....

Post this coupon in unsealed envelope —1d. stamp.

HORNBY SPEED BOATS

"you've got that paper bearin' the names of the Vigilantes. An' if you want to stay healthy, Peters, you'd better hand it over."

The other man hesitated, and slid a glance in the direction of Burr's hirelings. But an ominous movement under the folds of the serape which hung over Salvation's shoulder was sufficient to convince him that the surrender of the document was advisable.

Sullenly he produced the oath of allegiance and Salvation took possession of it, thrusting it into his pocket. Yet he had hardly disposed of the paper when there was a shout from the sentinel posted at the main gateway.

"General Burr an' the Cossacks!" he sang out. "They've got back sooner than we expected."

The men who had gathered around Salvation's cart showed signs of confusion, and Harris raised his voice.

"Get that pedlar outa here!" he snapped.

Salvation remained cool and collected. "Peters," he breathed, "you'll do as I tell you, an' even though it means signin' my own death-warrant I'll plug you if you try any tricks."

Then, adopting a Spanish accent and addressing the traitor in a more audible tone:

"Si, senior," he added pleasantly, "I will be veree glad to geev' you a lift back to San Antonio."

He nodded towards the cart, from which Burr's gangsters were retreating, and Peters stumbled towards it anxiously.

"All right," Salvation muttered, "get up on the seat and keep your mouth shut."

Peters obeyed, and, never taking his eyes off him for an instant, Salvation climbed up beside him. A moment later the frontiersman had picked up the reins with one hand, and, covering his prisoner with the gun which he held in the other, he drove towards the gateway.

He hoped to depart without question, but unluckily for him Burr and the Cossacks showed up in the entrance of the patio before he could make his exit, and the general drew rein as he set eyes on Salvation's companion.

"Hallo, Peters," he grunted, "where are you going?"

With stealth and surreptitiousness Salvation contrived to press the muzzle of his revolver against the treacherous homesteader's ribs. In consequence the man remained mute, but his silence had the effect of arousing Burr's ire.

"Did you hear me?" he rapped out. "Where are you going? Speak up, will you?"

Still Salvation's prisoner made no reply, and then all at once Jason Burr saw something that gave him a clue to the situation. The folds of the serape, or blanket, that was slung over Salvation's shoulder had fallen aside a little, to disclose the barrel of the gun he was clutching.

"That Mexican!" the general roared suddenly. "He's a spy! Grab him!"

Realising that his deception had been discovered, the frontiersman made an attempt to whip his mule into a gallop, but in a trice the animal had been seized, and Salvation himself was gripped by two or three of the Cossacks.

Struggling, he was dragged from the cart and disarmed, and, his serape and his sombrero falling to the ground in the scuffle, Peters promptly recognised him.

"Yeah, he's a spy all right, general," he told Burr fiercely. "He's one o' the Eagle's right-hand men!"

With the words he jumped down from the cart and made haste to retrieve the July 24th, 1937.

Vigilance Committee's oath of allegiance from Salvation, who was now powerless in the grasp of the Russians who had thrown themselves on him.

"Take a look at this, General Burr," Peters went on. "I don't know all the Vigilantes by name, but this paper contains their signatures. I managed to get hold of it an' bring it here—and this fellow seemingly bluffed his way into the fort to recover it."

He passed the document over to Burr, who scowled as he read it. Then after a few seconds the general directed an ugly glance at Salvation.

"Very interesting," he stated. "This will enable me to track down the Vigilantes man by man and wipe them out on their own door-steps. In other words, my friend, the Vigilantes have sealed their doom. As for you, it will be my pleasure to witness your execution in the public square of Santa Rosalie, where your death will be an example to all who may feel inclined to rebel against my control."

He nodded to Petroff grimly.

"Tie him up and plant him in the saddle of a horse," he commanded. "We're taking him to Santa Rosalie right now."

A few minutes later Burr and the Cossacks were riding from the stronghold with the condemned man in their midst. But as they cantered from the fortified hacienda they little dreamed that a message acquainting the Eagle with their intentions was already in the course of preparation.

It was a message penned by Doris Colton, who had seen and heard everything that had taken place in the courtyard when Salvation had been arrested, and after writing her note of warning she hurried to a sideboard in the room which she occupied as an enforced guest.

In that sideboard she had lodged the cage of pigeons which Salvation had presented to her, and, removing one of the birds, she attached the message to it and carried the feathered courier to the open window of her apartment. Then she released the pigeon, and, as it winged its way into the void, she offered up a fervent prayer that its flight would help to avert a cold-blooded murder.

The Firing Squad

GATHERED in the Mission at San Antonio, Don Loring and Whipsaw and Father Jose were anxiously awaiting the return of Salvation, and it seemed to all of them that an eternity had elapsed when Don finally gave expression to his agitated thoughts.

"We ought to have seen something of Salvation by now," he said uneasily. "I impressed on him that he wasn't to stay too long at Burr's stronghold."

"Have patience, my son," Father Jose comforted.

"Yeah, don't get all het-up," Whipsaw put in, endeavouring to sound reassuring although it really he was as apprehensive as Don. "Nothing's happened to that ole alligator. He knows how to look after hisself, take it from me."

The little frontiersman's assumed heartiness failed to put Don's mind at rest, however.

"I'm worried about Salvation," the young fellow muttered. "I only wish I hadn't let him—"

He stopped, interrupted by a flutter of wings in a nearby window of the chapel, and as he turned he saw that a pigeon had come to rest on the ledge, a pigeon with a tightly folded scrap of paper tied to one of its legs.

With an exclamation Don strode to the window, and, capturing the bird, he unfasted the note which was attached to it. A moment later he was reading Doris Colton's message—reading it with a look on his handsome countenance that told his companions all was not well.

When he had finished scanning the note he thrust it into Whipsaw's hand.

"Summon the Vigilantes!" he ordered. "Bring them to Santa Rosalie by the east road! It will take time, but I may have need of them. Meanwhile, I'm going on alone!"

He was dressed in the clothes that he wore as the pseudo-organist of the chapel, but he had soon peeled them off to disclose the tell-tale garb of the Eagle.

Shortly afterwards, while Whipsaw was spurring on his way to round-up the Vigilantes, the black-clad figure of the Eagle might have been seen streaking across the range in the direction of Santa Rosalie, and when at length he drew near that town he could not help being impressed by the deserted aspect of its outskirts.

Steering clear of the main street, he entered Santa Rosalie via a maze of alleys that brought him close to the central square. But before he was actually in sight of that plaza he dismounted from his horse and dropped the reins to the ground, knowing that the faithful and well-trained animal would not stir from the spot. Then, grasping the long whip that he invariably carried in his rôle of the Eagle, he climbed to the roof of a building that faced the square.

The whip by means of which he could snare any projecting beam or cornice was of considerable aid to him in his ascent. It enabled him to gain his objective without difficulty, and once on the roof-top he glided across to the far parapet and looked down into the plaza.

He knew then why the environs of Santa Rosalie had been deserted. The whole population, predominantly Spanish or Indian, had been forced to assemble in the square, and were gazing nervously at a file of armed Cossacks who were partially hidden from Don's view by an awning which offered some protection from the fierce rays of the sun.

In the shade of that awning, the men of the Cossack firing squad were riveting their attention on a figure who had been planted against the blank wall of a building opposite. It was the figure of Salvation, his eyes blindfolded, his hands tied behind his back, but his whole attitude suggesting an indomitable courage in the face of imminent death.

Don gritted his teeth as he saw his heroic comrade standing there. Then he directed his glance at a group of horsemen who had taken up a position to the left of the firing squad.

These were in full view of Don, and they consisted of Petroff, the remainder of the Cossack squadron—and General Jason Burr. And Burr, a little apart from his Russian mercenaries, was addressing the citizens of Santa Rosalie in a loud voice that carried to every corner of the square.

"I hereby proclaim martial law in this territory," Don Loring heard him announce, "and I call upon you to witness the execution of one who has dared to defy my authority."

He paused, and held up a document that he had been fingering. It was the paper on which the Vigilance Committee's oath of allegiance had been drawn up.

(To be continued in another grand episode next week. By permission of British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Bob Livingston.)

"CRIMINAL LAWYER"

(Continued from page 22)

"Just a minute, I'm not quite through." Brandon spoke now without raising his voice. "Sit there, Miss Carter, a bit longer. Your Honour has heard this witness admit that the defendant forced her to perjure herself by making threats against me. When the defendant takes the stand he will tell the truth for once. And the truth will be that, before I became District Attorney, I represented the defendant in private practice, and that, as his counsel, I was a jury fixer and a briber."

He turned to the jury.

"Here is one jury I haven't fixed nor bribed, and it's going to convict Gene Larkin of the cowardly crime of shooting a man in the back. I will tell the court that I have reached my present position by a ladder of crime. I have protected racketeers. I have seen Justice thwarted. I have flouted the will of the people by conniving with law-breakers."

He checked himself a moment, pale now as Madge. The court was dead silent, with all eyes upon him. Larkin made a gesture for him to stop; the false smile fading out, leaving the face a mask of fear. But Brandon went on:

"I am a man unfit to hold office of any sort. I have taken tainted money. I have gone far, and was going even farther, seeking to be governor of this State. This girl on the witness-stand was trying to save Larkin, because she wished to save me. I am so poor a fellow that I wouldn't have questioned her evidence, but would have let it go if Larkin hadn't laughed. Laughed at you, your Honour, and at the court. And at Justice—and the people! So I had to get the truth out of her. And I have got truth into myself. I am a free man—free of all lies that held me. Free of all the things that have tied me, like a slave, to what I have been."

Brandon put out his hand towards Madge. She rose up and came to him, taking his hand in hers. A wonderful look was upon her pale face, transfiguring it. They stood, hand in hand.

"Your Honour, many times I have walked out of court-rooms—often insolently. I walk out of this room humbly. May it please your Honour and the court, the record of this trial now contains a confession of my culpability, and my last official act as District Attorney, when I return to the office, will be to turn that confession over to the grand jury of the State."

As they walked out together, the murmurings died down. People regarded them with strange eyes—some hostile, some pitying, some amazed—others with a curious mixture of all three emotions.

In the street, Brandon held open the door of his car for Madge to enter. But she shook her head. He whispered, with all his old dominance:

"Get in! Do you think I'm going to lose you again? I'm free, I tell you—free. Betty is going to marry Bandini, a decent lad—a wry smile crossed his lips—"a good fellow, even if he is a crooner! Come with me, dear—stand by me. Help me—I'm nothing without your help."

They drove away together. Towards a new life.

(By permission of Radio Pictures, Ltd., starring Lee Tracy and Margot Grahame.)

"LAND BEYOND THE LAW"

(Continued from page 12)

Kirby eyed the grey mare grazing by the trees which bordered the pass.

"Sheriff," Kirby called over his shoulder, "I like your hoss. She'll do me a treat. I wish you'd oblige me by moving a little. Then I can shoot you clean and quick and get the hoss and foller the boys."

He half-turned to Chip as he spoke—to see Chip slinging through the cords with Bandy's knife. Up went Kirby's forty-five, to be trained dead on to Chip's breast.

"Many thanks, sheriff," he drawled. "This sure is considerate of you—"

His finger was on the trigger when a bullet from behind a boulder took him full in the back. With a grunt of utter surprise, Kirby fell forward as the bullet from his gun flew wide of its mark.

Dave Massey came out from behind the boulder.

"Bandy's coming," he muttered. "We got to beat it back to Bitter Creek."

Chip's heart felt light. His chums were true. He freed himself and whistled for his grey. She came trotting to him.

The three rode off down the pass at a gallop. Suddenly Chip drew in.

"I'd like to settle with Tascosa," he told the others. "He killed my father. You two ride in and raise a posse from the town. Then come along towards San Luis."

"But he's got the whole outfit," Dave began.

THIS WEEK'S CASTS"CAPTAINS COURAGEOUS."

Harvey Cheyne, Freddie Bartholomew; Manuel, Spencer Tracy; Captain Disko, Lionel Barrymore; Mr. Cheyne, Melvyn Douglas; Uncle Salters, Charley Grapewin; Dan, Mickey Rooney; Long Jack, John Carradine; Cushman, Oscar O'Shea; Dr. Finley, Walter Kingsford; Mr. Tyler, Donald Briggs; Doc, Sam McDaniels.

"LAND BEYOND THE LAW."

—Chip Douglas, Dick Foran; Louise, Linda Perry; Dave Massey, Wayne Morris; Cattle Kate, Irene Franklin; General Lew Wallace, Joseph King; Major Adair, Gordon Hart; Slade Henaberry, Cy Kendall; Shorty, Frank Orth; Bandy, Glenn Strange; Yascosa, Harry Woods; Sheriff Spence, Milton Kibbee; Douglas sen., Tom Brewer.

"JIM HANVEY—DETECTIVE."

—Jim Hanvey, Guy Kibbee; Don Terry, Tom Brown; Joan Frost, Lucie Kaye; Mrs. Frost, Catharine Donnet; Rono, Edward S. Brophy; Smith, Edward Gargan; Mrs. Ellis, Helen Jerome Eddy; Dunn, Theodore von Eltz; Elwood, Kenneth Thomson; Frost, Howard Hickman; Lambert, Oscar Apfel; Davis, Wade Boteler.

"CRIMINAL LAWYER."

—Barry Brandon, Lee Tracy; Madge Carter, Margot Grahame; Larkin, Eduardo Ciannelli; Tony Bandini, Erik Rhodes; Betty Walker, Betty Lawford; William Walker, Frank M. Thomas; District-Attorney Hopkins, William Stack.

Chip checked him.

"Except you and Bandy. They'll all go along with Slade, I reckon. It's pretty clear who are the rustlers now."

Dave turned an anxious, freckled face towards him.

"Chip, I swear neither I, nor old Bandy, know a word about the rustling. Nor of the trap you walked into. Even now, I can't think it of Slade. He's always treated us right."

"Part of the game," Chip spoke grimly. "You go on, buddies. I trust you to get the townsfolk roused. I'm going to square the deal with Tascosa."

They saw that their chum was determined. They put their mounts to a gallop as Chip headed back to find the man who killed his father.

All Square

ALL signs of the Circle Bar punchers had gone from the San Luis pass.

Chip clattered along the rough track on his grey, staring right and left at the high mountains through which the track had been beaten out in many years by the feet of horsemen and cattle. He came through the pass into rugged country with nothing but sand and rocks to meet his keen gaze.

He turned back, puzzled and angry with himself. He had evidently overlooked some turn or twist in the pass where Henaberry had a hide-out.

He cantered back. About half-way through the pass, in its widest part, the quick ears of his mare pricked up. Chip drew rein behind a great pile of rocks. Coming up the track he heard voices; then the echoing report of a gun. He watched and waited—it was the townsfolk, headed by Bandy and Dave.

Almost as he made sure of them, Henaberry's men came out from a defile just behind him. He was seen at once, and a hail of bullets spattered the rock face above him. He jerked the grey into flight down the hill, then doubled at a bend, shouting to Dave to follow up.

A running fight commenced in this widespread part of the pass. Shots rang out, and two of the townsfolk were tumbled off their horses. It was open war now; Henaberry had no need to mask his men or his intentions. He was out to rule the valley as dictator.

But the Bitter Creek posse were equally determined to be ruled according to law and order. They had elected Chip Douglas as sheriff, and, even if that had been a mistake, they were going to stand by him. They rode into battle with the outlaws and put up a fight which surprised Henaberry as much as it surprised themselves.

Pete Johnson's death, the wanton burning of his ranch and the shooting of old Douglas were things to be put right.

Henaberry turned tail, calling off his men. He yelled orders to Tascosa, who disregarded them. Tascosa had got the thousand dollars out of Slade by threats, and he had spotted Chip. Therefore Kirby had failed. And Mason, the other of the masked three who had conducted the raids, was following Henaberry.

Tascosa thought to himself—a thousand in hand's worth a lot when you don't have to cut it up with two others.

So the dark-skinned traitor and double-crosser spurred straight up the pass towards the border.

Chip went after him, his teeth set, hard together. They were soon alone, far away from the rest. Tascosa kept half-turning to snap off random shots at the grey, and suddenly the great horse reared and fell over on its side, throwing its rider heavily. Tascosa jerked his mount to a halt and came back to finish with his pursuer and get everything worth taking from him.

Chip lay sprawled on his side in between some rocks, his hat showing just over them. The mare was cropping grass a few yards away. Tascosa dismounted and came creeping up, gun in hand, his eyes greedy for revenge.

A shot rang out, and the aimed forty-five flew from his hand. Chip leapt up from behind the rocks, and Tascosa saw death in the gun levelled at him. He dropped on his knees, putting up his hands, the fingers of his right hand shattered within the gauntlet that covered blood and broken bones.

"Tascosa," said Chip, his gun almost touching the other's belt, "you can choose trial by jury at Bitter Creek, or judgment by me at this moment. But before you decide, you'll say where the cattle are hidden."

That dark face had lost all its common good looks. It was grey and lined with fear. The lips drew back in a snarl.

"Slade's got 'em down in a secret valley. He ran the whole show. I'm through with him."

"Now answer me," Chip's voice was hard. "Trial by jury—or my judgment?"

Tascosa's lips writhed again.

"Guess I'll go to Bitter Creek. I got my story—I was acting under orders. Henaberry's—" He crouched there, a thing of lies and evil thoughts. "Slade's the one you want. You needn't shoot. I'll go—just to get my hand fixed up."

Chip walked him to where Dave and Bandy were searching for them.

Tascosa was roped up. Dave told Chip:

"Henaberry's surrendered with all hands. Says it was this fellow's idea to round up the cattle." Dave gestured towards Tascosa, roped on a horse in front of them. "And Kate told me if I didn't bring you back safe and sound she'd give me no rest. So I best get up behind you on your old grey."

Louise and Kate came out to meet them when the townsmen returned in triumph with the recovered cattle and their prisoners. Presently Louise had a chance to speak with Chip.

"Don't happen to want a sort of secretary and clerk in your office?" she asked off-handedly.

"You know of anyone?" Chip countered. He didn't wait for her answer. "So do I," he grinned. "And she's engaged—for the term of natural life!"

Louise didn't smile. She regarded him in that queerly defiant way he liked in her so much. "I'll ask her," she said. "Maybe she'll say yes."

"She'd better," said Chip. "I'm the sheriff!"

(By permission of Warner Brothers, Ltd., starring Dick Foran and Linda Perry.)

"JIM HANVEY—DETECTIVE"

(Continued from page 18)

would not show up. The editor of the "Globe" was there and feeling shaky, because he had visions of all kinds of libel suits if Terry did not appear.

Then Don Terry appeared in old Pete's cab, and Joan was with him. What an uproar outside the station, with Pressmen and cameramen all busy! Garrett and two officers got Terry into the station and the inspector announced pompously that Terry was under arrest.

Don Terry stared round the room. All the people that he had accused were here and not one friendly face—or so it seemed to him. Only Joan.

"Now, Terry, you can lay off journalism," cried Garrett. "You've accused everyone in this room, but you killed Tom Ellis. What have you to say?"

Before he could answer the door opened and into the room walked Jim Hanvey.

"Keep that cigar away from me," he shouted at the agitated editor of the "Globe," "or I'll explode like a gas balloon."

"Where have you been?" Terry asked. "You look ill."

"Did you get the emeralds?" demanded Lambert.

"Yes, but I nearly died doing it." Hanvey managed a grin. "If anyone had swallowed all the gas I've had they'd look ill. If it hadn't been for a couple of no-good scoundrels who'd rather see me shot than suffocated I wouldn't be here now."

"Say, what are you talking about?" Garrett demanded. "Where are the emeralds?"

From his pocket Hanvey produced the necklace.

"Here they are." He tossed them over to Lambert. "Just take a look and see if they are the real ones. I promised that when I had them emeralds I'd have the murderer.

The man who killed Ellis knew those emeralds was gonna be put back—that man got into the Frost house—he waited in that closet until Don Terry was alone at the safe—that man killed Ellis to make his get-away. Terry's story of how he came to take the jewels and that he was putting 'em back and not taking 'em out is true. The man that killed Ellis is in this room."

"Who is he?" Garrett cried.

"I'm going to give him a chance to tell that himself. They say confession is good for the soul." Hanvey glanced round. "Is the killer going to talk or do I get busy?" Still there was a stunned silence. "All right. Let's try it my way."

The station door was flung back and into the room jumped Romo and Smith.

"Everybody reach!" threatened Romo.

And when everybody's hands went up in the air Jim Hanvey nodded to Smith. "Okay, the lights."

The lights went out, but the room was not dark, because two hands were ghastly white, like ghost hands.

"Them lighted hands is the murderer," Hanvey cried. "Get him, boys!"

The lights went on, and it was Davis that Romo and Smith had covered with their guns.

"You pretended to go and 'phone, but you eepit into that closet," Hanvey accused. "You knew those jewels were gonna be put back. And you got caught because I had those bills treated with swamp fire—that's a solution of phosphorus. Search him, boys!"

Romo and Smith did it vigorously, and they found a belt stuffed full of money, which they handed reluctantly to Garrett, who by now was not quite certain whether this was a police station or an act in a comedy. But the money and the hands were sufficient evidence for the inspector, who ordered his men to take the cursing Davis off to the cells.

Hanvey hinted to Lambert that as he was prepared to pay thirty thousand for the return of the emeralds, and had got them back without paying a cent, he might consider giving some of the money to Mrs. Ellis. Lambert had been doubtful of Davis for some time, and he was so grateful for all that Hanvey had done that he announced that the whole of the money should go to Mrs. Ellis, and that he would like to hand a reward to Romo and Smith for their good work. And being Hanvey, who refused to take a cent, went off arm-in-arm with Romo and Smith, he had the pleasure of Mr. and Mrs. Frost fussing at young Terry.

"Say, Hanvey, we reckon we'd rather work for you than Dunn," suggested Romo. "What do ye say?"

"Yeah, I reckon I could do with some reforming," said Smith.

"I bet you've still got Terry's watch," chuckled Hanvey. "You boys can take me out to dinner and maybe I'll think it over. Guess you two would make a grand body-guard."

(By permission of the British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Guy Kibbee and Tom Brown.)

SPURPROOF TENTS

Made from specially Proofed Canvas, complete with 3-Piece Jointed Poles, Guy Lines, Pegs and Runners. Packed in waterproof hold-all with handle. Size 6ft. x 4ft. 3 x 3ft. 6, with 6in. walls. Superior Model Egyptian Cloth, 7/9 carriage paid.

6ft. long
6/9
carr. paid

Complete List Post Free 2d.

GEORGE GROSE LTD. LUDGATE CIRCUS
NEW BRIDGE ST. LONDON, E.C.4

TALL Your Height increased in 12 days or no cost. New discovery adds 2.5 ins. I gained 4 ins. Guaranteed safe. Full Course 5/-. Details: J. B. MORLEY, 17, Cheapside, London, E.C.2.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS

Printed in England and published every Tuesday by the Proprietors, THE AMALGAMATED PRESS, LTD., The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Advertisement Offices: The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad: 11/- per annum; 5/6 for six months. Sole Agents for Australia and New Zealand: Messrs. Gordon & Gotch, Ltd.; and for South Africa: Central News Agency, Ltd. Registered for transmission to Canada at Magazine Rates. S.G.

XMAS CLUBS

SPARE-TIME AGENTS WANTED

for OLDEST, LARGEST and BEST CLUB. Write for Giant Art Catalogue and full particulars. No Outlay. Excellent Commission. FREE GIFT TO ALL APPLICANTS.

SAMUEL DRIVER, Ltd., Burton Rd., Leeds.

STAMPS

300 DIFFERENT, incl. Airmail, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Victorials, Colonials. Price 6d. (Abroad 1/-).—WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back! Complete Course, 5/- Details: L. A. Stebbing, (A), 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2.

BOY'S CINEMA

No. 923. EVERY TUESDAY August 21st, 1937.

2^D

"OUR FIGHTING NAVY"
AND
"I PROMISE TO PAY"

*Long Complete Film
Thrillers Inside!*

A DRAMA OF
The CAPTAIN OF A DESTROYER who put DUTY BEFORE ALL

"OUR FIGHTING NAVY"

A rebellion breaks out and mutineers seize a large battleship; the captain of a British destroyer races to the rescue in this stirring tale of high adventure of the seas, starring Robert Douglas, Hazel Terry and Richard Cromwell

Trouble Brewing

A YEOMAN rapped sharply on the cabin door of the captain of H.M.S. Audacious.

"Hallo."

"Signal from the flagship, sir."

"Is it important?" asked Captain Markham.

"Yes, sir," stated the yeoman. "The Audacious is to proceed to La Santa and place herself under orders of Commander-in-Chief, Western Islands."

In the interior ward-room a number of officers were gathered round the piano and practising the sea shanty that they were going to sing at the next ship's concert. A bright-eyed young lieutenant entered.

"Enter the wild Canadian boy," grinned the officer at the piano. "I guess you'd better join our chorus party."

"You won't get much chance to rehearse in the next few weeks," replied the lieutenant.

"What is it, youngster?" questioned the grey-haired engineer commander. "Get it off your chest."

"It's nothing important really," modestly answered Bill Armstrong. "Just that we're off to the Western Islands."

"Who said so?" an officer demanded. "Signals just came from flagship—confidential, of course. I'm the only one who knows anything about it."

The engineer commander chuckled, and then glanced across at Armstrong. "How did the captain take the glad news?"

"I believe he was quite pleased," answered the lieutenant.

When the youngster had gone one of the officers asked the engineer commander what he meant by his question regarding the captain.

"I remember there was a girl, quite August 21st, 1937.

a flapper, daughter of a consul," the commander whispered. "Captain Markham's a confirmed bachelor, but that consul's daughter I think touched his heart strings."

Young Bill Armstrong was glad to be going to the Western Islands, because it was a part of the world he had never seen. His servant Stevens was not quite so eager.

"I went there once, sir. All I remember is that they charged us one and a tanner for a bottle of beer," was his complaint.

Bill Armstrong grinned happily because Pamela Brent, whom he met in Canada, was living with her father at La Santa.

Captain Markham had not forgotten the flapper daughter of the consul and wondered if the girl had forgotten him. He was a square-jawed, thickset man with a firm chin and frank blue eyes. He gave orders for the Audacious to change her course.

Some weeks later the Audacious anchored off La Santa.

On a terrace of a big house a young girl was peering through glasses at the destroyer.

"You seem very interested in the Audacious, my dear," remarked grey-haired Lady Carlton, with whom Pamela Brent was staying. "Someone you know on board?"

"Yes, I know Captain Markham," the girl answered. "I met him the last time he was here."

"You must have been very young then."

"Yes, I was, and there's a boy I met in Canada, too—Bill Armstrong. He's a lieutenant."

A pinnacle ploughed through the waves from the largest of the cruisers that rode at anchor in the bay. The admiral was on board. The sailors and Marines were at their stations to welcome the admiral, who shook hands warmly with the captain.

"Glad to see you on the station again."

"I'm pleased to be under your command once more, sir."

"Your ship's looking very nice, Markham." The admiral suddenly lowered his voice. "May I go into your cabin?"

"Stand at ease—stand easy!" came the command as the admiral went down a companionway to the captain's cabin.

"I shall be grateful for a few days to paint ship, sir," stated Captain Markham. "I want to be a credit to your squadron."

"I should very much like to put you out of routine, but as it is I'm afraid I shall have to keep you at short notice for steam. You are the only crew available for an emergency."

"You having trouble?"

"Nothing serious, but there has been a certain amount of friction with the Customs authorities at Bianco, and Brent, the consul, has enabled asking for a ship," the admiral remarked; and suddenly he reached forward and picked up a photograph frame. "Hallo, this is Brent's daughter, Pamela, isn't it?"

"Yes, sir, I knew her when I was here before."

"Charming girl. She's staying with us." The admiral put back the picture. "And that reminds me. My wife is giving a farewell party for her this afternoon."

"Miss Brent leaving, sir?" The captain spoke sharply.

"Yes, going south in the Black Prince to-morrow. You'll come along and say hail and farewell?"

"I'd like to very much, sir."

"Good!" The admiral moved towards the cabin door. "It'll give us time for a chat."

Not long after the admiral had left a message was received from shore inviting as many of the officers as could be spared, and among those granted leave was young Bill Armstrong. Captain Markham was welcomed by Pamela Brent shyly, and they were carrying on rather a stilted conversation when the admiral whisked Markham off to his study to discuss the present trouble. Needless to say, Bill Armstrong pounced on Pamela and they went off to the beautiful swimming-pool. Pamela turned and gazed a trifle discontentedly towards the house. She could have smacked the dear admiral.

But the admiral was far too busy to bother about Pamela in explaining to Markham the situation. On the wall was a huge map.

"This station covers the whole of the north and south sea wall. Swiftsure's here, the Invincible here, Intrepid here, and Ajax is in the dock being refitted. Now, how the deuce am I to show the flag at Bianco? Believe me, Markham, Government economy is all very well, but it can be carried too far. Everything seems so peaceful round here that there seems no need to worry, but they're queer people and they erupt like a volcano. Now this morning I was talking to Mrs. Vargas—a very clever woman who has just returned from Bianco, and has her finger on the pulse of things. She tells me that the editor of the 'Journal de Naranja' has got hold of some damaging facts about De Costa and the Minister of Marine and Customs—graft and so forth. The editor is going to publish a series of articles exposing him. Now that's the sort of thing that might lead to a political crisis."

"Indeed, sir," politely murmured Markham, who could hear the sound of gay laughter and much splashing. He wondered if Pamela had been glad to see him again.

"That's why I want the Audacious to stand by, Markham, in case of trouble. I do not trust De Costa."

Two Attempts on the President's Life

IN a cool alcove of a house in Bianco four men in uniform waited for the arrival of their president. Swing doors opened and a servant announced that his Excellency, the president, would be with them in a matter of seconds.

Actually it was about five minutes before a great, red-faced, smiling bull of a man appeared. He wore a somewhat soiled drill suit with a red band round his ample middle, a gaudy striped tie and a felt hat. He grinned from ear to ear at his bowing ministers.

"My apologies, signors, but I know that you will forgive me when I tell you I have been discussing important questions of policy"—he paused—"with my chef." This caused much laughter. The great man then turned to a dapper little man who was wearing a uniform not unlike a de luxe stationmaster. "And how is my trusted Minister of the Marines and the Customs?"

"As ever at your service, Excellency," replied De Costa.

"And my Chief of Police?" the president addressed a portly little man, who was littered with gold braid, but rather spoiled the effect by a pith helmet. "I trust the prison is not full?"

After more laughter, because it was best to be amused by the wit of the president, De Costa indicated the big, bearded man in the uniform of an admiral.

"May I present to your Excellency Captain Castellano, who commands your guardship, the El Mirante."

"A magnificent ship, my capitan—a ship worthy of its commander," cried the president.

De Costa beckoned and a tall officer wearing a cloak over his scarlet uniform stepped forward and saluted.

"May I present the gunnery officer—Lieutenant Enriqueo."

The president beamed on the young man.

"Yours are the fifteen-inch guns, I believe, lieutenant?"

"Yes, Excellency."

"Then I shall be well protected, eh? All that I now require is protecting from the people of Bianco."

"I assure you, your Excellency, our people have for you the greatest loyalty and affection," cried De Costa.

"I was but joking." The big bulk of the president shook with laughter.

"I come to this delightful resort of yours for one liddle holiday, but I am afraid the citizens they want to make me work."

"There is one ceremony we hoped you would undertake, Excellency." De Costa was the spokesman of the meeting. "Would you consent to lay a wreath on the statute of Stefano Rosa?"

"Ah, that is different. Need I say I shall be honoured," the president answered, and glanced round as a servant appeared. "What is it, Manuel?"

"The British consul has arrived, your Excellency."

"Si, si," the president nodded and smiled at De Costa. "I believe you have been seeing much of him of late?"

"A duty rather than a pleasure, your Excellency."

"You don't like my friend Signor Brent?"

"He is always complaining about nothing."

"Signor Brent sent me a letter, and I have asked him here to lunch," the president answered. "We will talk things over. Ah, but I must not keep the consul waiting." He beamed at the bearded sailor. "I will give myself the pleasure, my capitan, of a visit to your ship, and you, lieutenant, will show me your big guns. Adios, signors."

"You must come along with us as a witness," Enriqueo told Pamela Brent.

"Your Excellency will understand that Mr. Brent's version of the dispute with the British importers is not that of the Ministry of Marine and Custom."

"Naturally, my dear De Costa, but you need not worry," answered the president, and went off to meet the consul.

Brent was a tall, gaunt man with an austere, highly intelligent face and a kindly smile, but not till the splendid lunch was at an end and the two men were enjoying a glass of brandy did the Englishman mention that there was a matter that he wished to discuss.

"I know," the president chuckled. "You mean your little trouble with the Minister of the Customs?"

"It is more than a little trouble, your Excellency. The British traders have been complaining bitterly, sir, and frankly, I think they have cause for complaint."

"Then we must see what we can do about it," decided the president. "Great Britain has always been the very good friend of Naranja."

At the Ministry of Marine and Customs, Do Costa sat at a big table that was littered with papers. He was smoking a small cigar and by his elbow was a glass of beer. An unshaven-looking rascal stood before him. Lounging in a chair, reading a paper, a dark-haired girl sprawled.

"You understand your orders," De Costa rapped out, and the man nodded. "Do not forget that a mistake at this stage is liable to prove unhealthy. That will be all."

"My aim will be true, senor," the man answered.

A minute or so later Lieutenant Don Enriqueo entered the room.

"And what has the gunnery office of the El Mirante to report?" asked De Costa.

"Everything's ready as far as we're concerned, signor."

"Excellent, but first we must arrange the future of our benevolent president," De Costa smiled strangely. "Juanita."

The girl threw aside her paper and got to her feet. She was dark-skinned like a gypsy.

"Tell me when do I throw it?" she asked fiercely.

"When the president is laying the wreath on the statue of Steffano Rosa."

It was arranged that after lunching with the consul the president would lay the wreath. Brent, feeling that he should be present, hastened to the consulate to don his uniform. The president insisted that the consul drive with him to the memorial. Steffano Rosa, 1868-1933, was the man who had done a great deal for the little state of Naranja, and had been its finest president.

A wreath was handed to the president, who walked up to the memorial. De Costa, a number of soldiers and a good many people were at the ceremony.

"To the undying memory of that great citizen, Steffano Rosa," cried the president.

Juanita whipped a knife from the top of her stocking. De Costa and Enriqueo held their breaths, but as the girl flung the knife the president bent forward to place the wreath. It missed him by inches.

The chief of the police yelled to his men and Enriqueo made signs to some of his own hirelings, and there was a general scurrying with many men trying to lay their hands on the terrified Juanita.

August 21st, 1937.

"I will keep this knife and put it with my collection," the president said with a cheerful smile at the horrified consul. "Poor girl. Maybe she will have better luck next time."

De Costa paced his office angrily, and he swung round when a breathless Enriqueo burst into the room.

"Supposing she talks too much?"

"She daren't."

"I don't know so much," snarled De Costa. "Why did you let them arrest her?"

"They were too quick for us."

"If you had done your part Juanita would have been alive."

Loud voices and the sound of heavy feet.

"She is, and betraying us!" yelled Enriqueo. "It's the police!"

When the police burst into the room only De Costa was there.

"Signor De Costa, I arrest you in the name of the Republic."

"May I inquire on what charge?"

"Treason."

From beneath his cloak De Costa produced a round object which he hurled and there was a deafening explosion. Three policemen were killed.

De Costa had vanished when the police searched the building.

De Costa had joined the lieutenant in a dark and gloomy alley.

"Get on board the El Mirante at once," De Costa ordered. "When she's in your hands send up a rocket."

"You'll come on board then?"

"As soon as I can. Hurry!"

Don Enriqueo returned to the ship and went to the armoury, after giving a signal to one of the officers of the watch. Very soon sailors were cautiously making their way to the armoury. They were handed out guns.

Finally they were led by Enriqueo in the murder of the officers and those few men loyal to the cause of the president. The poor wretches were mostly murdered whilst they were asleep.

The president had insisted that Brent come back to his villa for dinner. He had laughed over the attempt on his life and the fact that De Costa was a traitor.

"I think your Excellency underestimates the seriousness of the situation," said the consul.

"You are worried for the safety of the British residents?" the president smiled. "I will be personally responsible for their safety."

"Pardon me, sir, that is definitely my responsibility," sharply spoke the Consul. "These business men with their wives and families, thousands of miles from their own country, naturally turn to me in a crisis like this. Already a great deal of their property has been damaged by unruly mobs."

"I will see that they are compensated."

"And what if it goes beyond damaged property?" Brent stated in his determined way. "Compensation demanded for the loss of British lives is apt to be very heavy."

"Oh, no, no, signor, that sounds like one big threat."

"Oh, no, I'm sorry if I spoke warmly. I assure you that no threat was intended. But I am very worried."

"My friend, you leave everything to me." The president picked up a bottle of brandy. "We drink to peace and prosperity. I think you will like this liqueur."

The ugly rascal that was in De Costa's pay was lurking in the garden and in his hand was a gun.

"Your taste in wine, your Excellency, is superb." Brent sipped the brandy.

"I trust that you may be right about peace and prosperity, but I fear—"

"Oh, my friend, you do not have these political melodramas in your country, eh?" interrupted the president, wishing to change the subject. "When is your charming daughter returning? Bianco is not the same place when Miss Brent is away."

The consul sighed.

"She left La Santa this morning, I am sorry to say."

"Sorry that your daughter is returning to Bianco?"

"Oh, no, I am sorry she is returning with conditions as they are."

"Oh, no, Signor Brent, this is a civilised country." The president smiled broadly at the consul as if the latter was making a great deal out of little. "To your daughter's speedy and safe return!" He raised his large brandy glass.

Crack! The gunman sent by De Costa had been waiting for a chance to shoot through the open window at the president, and every time he had hesitated because he did not wish to miss. Then he had seen a guard approaching, and knew that if he did not fire at once it would be too late. He fired, and it was the brandy glass that he smashed.

"Good heavens!" gasped Brent. "Are you hurt?"

"No, but the glass is broke and the brandy spilled." The president glanced round. "Poor, foolish one! It would seem that he has escaped. I am glad because I should have had to have hanged him." He frowned as servants peered nervously round the door. "Another glass. Make it quick, please."

Markham is Sent to Bianco

THE admiral looked at the message that an officer had handed him.

He studied it, then read it aloud: "Civil disturbance growing, our people have been threatened." The admiral glanced at the officer. "Where's the rest of this?"

"The message broke off there, sir."

"Can you get through to Bianco?"

"No, sir, the lines are dead." The admiral picked up the telephone and dialed a number. "That you, Flag Lieutenant? Make a signal to Audacious to raise steam for full speed, and for the captain to come and see me." The admiral hung up and stared again at the unfinished message. "This looks serious."

When Markham got hack from his summons to the admiral he sought out his first officer.

"I have seen the commander-in-chief. How soon can you get away?"

"By eight bells, sir."

"Good, I want to see you in my cabin. Tell the engineer and the gunnery officer I want to see them as well. It looks like a revolution in Bianco." The captain looked grim. "The populace seem to be in danger."

Directly the destroyer was sighted off Bianco the consul ordered his pinnace. He was on his way out to the destroyer before she dropped anchor. He was greeted by Markham.

"Glad to see you, sir."

"You've no idea how glad I am to see you." The consul gave a rueful grin.

"What is the situation like?" the captain asked when the two men were alone.

"So far they have made two attempts on the life of the president—their battleship El Mirante is in revolt and they have executed all the loyal officers."

"My word, this is serious." Markham had had no idea things were as grave as this. "Why, they could blow the place to pieces in five minutes. Who is behind all this?"

"The late Minister of Marine—a fellow by the name of De Costa. He is on board the El Mirante now. They tried to arrest him, but by means of a bomb he got away. I imagine he was hidden somewhere in the town until he got the signal that the El Mirante was in the power of his officers. Two red Verey lights went up from the battleship, and I imagine that that was the signal that told De Costa that the ship was now in the hands of the rebels. De Costa at once hastened from the town to the El Mirante."

"You are certain of these facts, sir?"

"One of the loyal officers was wounded, but managed to jump overboard," the consul answered. "He swam ashore. I do wish Pamela was not coming back to this place."

"Yes, so do I." The captain paced his cabin. "When is the Black Prince due?"

"In about an hour."

"It doesn't seem wise for her to anchor in this harbour. I'll tell you what I'll do. I'll send a message for her to anchor outside, then I'll send a boat over to take Pam off."

The consul smiled his gratitude.

"It would be a great relief if you would," he said.

Markham sent for the yeoman of the signals, and gave the necessary orders for a boat to be got ready. He would send an officer.

"Thanks very much." The consul got up from his chair. "I'll have my car at the wharf to meet them."

"What sort of fellow is the president?" Markham asked as he held open the door.

"A very decent sort of chap really," answered the consul. "Not only fearless, but in many ways like a child. Strange combination of optimist and fatalist."

"Doesn't sound helpful. Can he get any support from the capital?"

"I've urged him to send for a detachment of troops, but I have doubts if any of his soldiers are loyal. For the rest there is only a tiny destroyer that would be about as much use against El Mirante as a pop-gun. The situation is very grave, Markham."

Captain Markham escorted his visitor up on to the deck, and there both men instinctively turned to gaze towards the El Mirante which was anchored about a mile off shore.

"What do you think De Costa plans to do?"

"I don't know quite," was the consul's reply. "I expect he will send some sort of ultimatum to the president."

Lieutenant Bill Armstrong was detailed to go over to the Black Prince and collect Pamela as he was an old friend of the consul's daughter. He was instructed to escort the girl to the consulate and then come straight back to the Audacious.

The situation was just as grave as the consul had imagined. De Costa was a man without scruple. Even as Markham was giving orders for a boat to collect Pamela Brent he was making his plans.

Lieutenant Enriqueo lolled in a chair sucking at a cigarette.

"There is still our respective president to deal with," remarked De Costa, twisting his minute moustache.

"A shell dropped into his villa from one of my guns would settle him."

"That would be crude and un-economic," De Costa gave a sneering laugh. "I'm afraid, my dear Enriqueo,

The consul stared intently at the rebel officer. "The president will leave here when he chooses and not before!" he stated in firm tones.

you never see beyond the muzzle of one of your guns—but the president is not without financial resources."

"Oh!" Enriqueo grinned knowingly. "If we could persuade him to make a substantial contribution to our cause we might consider—" De Costa paused.

"You mean you'd let him go free?"

"I did not say so."

Enriqueo chuckled and rubbed his big hands together. He hoped De Costa would let him kill the president.

De Costa wrote swiftly, and then sealed his letter.

"I want you to go ashore with an armed party and deliver this to the president," De Costa smiled triumphantly. "It is my ultimatum. When we have the money, my dear Enriqueo, I will hand him over to your tender mercies."

Prisoners of De Costa

TO Bill Armstrong it was a grand adventure having to look after Pamela. Of course, there would be no trouble, but he hoped that the scare would last so that the Audacious were kept at Bianco. Pamela asked if the boat might not go over to the Audacious before taking her ashore. Naturally, Bill asked why, and Pam explained a little lamely that she thought it would be nice if she could have thanked the captain for his kindness.

"The captain's a confirmed bachelor," Bill had laughed heartily. "I should get it in the neck for not carrying out orders."

The boat drew in at the quayside and the two young people climbed up some slimy stone steps.

"Wait here, I won't be long," Armstrong told the seaman in charge of the boat's party. He took hold of the girl. "I don't see the car anywhere—do you?"

"It's not here," Pamela answered. "Let's go and meet it."

Bill Armstrong grinned his consent and they walked along the quay chatting, when the officer became aware that everything was not quite right.

"I say, Pam, do you notice anything funny about these people, or is it just my imagination? They all seem to be scuttling about as if scared out of their lives."

"It's quite clear that there is some sort of bother going on," agreed the girl. "I've seen it like this before, but it usually blows over in twenty-four hours."

"I hope you're right," Bill looked round. "But a lot of these birds carry nasty-looking knives, and there seem a lot of men—I presume by their uniforms that they're soldiers—have guns."

"They love display, but I don't expect they ever use them," laughed Pam. "Hallo, there comes our car."

The car came along the street at a fair pace, and Pam was just thinking of signalling it to stop when a soldier rushed out of a side-way. A revolver cracked twice, the chauffeur slumped across the wheel, and the car crashed into a stone pillar.

Scarce had the car crashed before Bill Armstrong was rushing across the road with Pam following. The killer darted for the side-street, but the boy was too quick. He did a flying leap and hurled the man to the ground.

They were struggling furiously when Lieutenant Enriqueo and some of his rebel sailors and soldiers came charging down the street. They grabbed hold of Armstrong and dragged him away.

"What is all this?" Enriqueo spoke in broken English.

It was Pam who answered:

"He fired at our chauffeur."

"Your chauffeur, eh?" Enriqueo's eyes narrowed.

"Yes, the British consul's chauffeur," indignantly shouted the young officer.

"He was a spy—an enemy of the people."

"I don't know what you're talking about," Bill argued aggressively and pointed to the fallen man. "This rat tried to murder him."

"You attacked our man," Enricquo's eyes narrowed. "Hold him prisoner."

"Take your hands off me!" Bill struggled vainly.

"It's no use, Bill," interposed Pam wisely. "When my father hears of this—"

"That'll be later," sneered Enricquo, and at a signal two sailors lined up on each side of the girl. "You must come along with us as a witness."

They were taken down ill-smelling streets to a great building that had been the office of the Marine and Customs, and they were thrust into a wired-in enclosure.

"Well, here we are," growled Bill furiously. "I wish I could lay my hands on that swine who put us here."

"We won't be here long," said Pam. "Father is certain to send out a search party for us."

Her father was at that moment having a talk with the president, who was smiling as if nothing were amiss. Markham had come ashore to assist Brent at this conference with the president.

"Tell me, signor, what is it you want to do?"

"The captain would like your permission, sir, for a small landing party from the Audacious."

"A small landing party. Why?"

"To protect the British consulate, your Excellency."

"Certainly, captain, but why a small landing party?" The president's eyes twinkled. "Why not land all your brave men and clear up Bianco?"

"That, sir," answered Markham, "would be going beyond what is permitted. We cannot interfere with your political affairs."

"Bah, this is not politics," the president argued. "This is what you would call a dog fight, and it is necessary that you shoot the mad dog."

Markham shook his head.

"Yes, but not with our guns."

"I understand that De Costa is on board the El Mirante," stated the consul.

"Si—look!" The president produced a paper. "I have a letter here from him to say that if I'm not on board the El Mirante by midnight he will take me by force—me, the president!"

Brent took the paper.

"This looks serious, sir."

"It is one big bluff," scoffed the president. "But I do not go on board the El Mirante at midnight—I stay here."

"If there is likely to be any fighting, sir, I must have time to evacuate the British residents," Markham said severely.

"Rest assured, captain, it will not be necessary. Land as many of your brave men as you wish—you have my full permission."

Markham hastened back to his ship, whilst the consul went to the consulate expecting to meet his daughter there.

The captain of the Audacious speedily had a landing party of Marines and sailors. He impressed on Adams, the officer in charge, that the man had no concern in the politics in Bianco. Their job was to assist the consul in providing protection for the British Nationals. Also on reaching the consulate he was to order Armstrong to return to the ship immediately.

The consul was stopped several times on his way back by anxious residents who wanted to know what was going on. He gave instructions for them to be ready to go on board the Audacious at a moment's notice. He got back to the consulate a few minutes after the landing-party had arrived.

"Are you quite comfortable here?" he asked Adams.

"Yes, sir, thank you."

"If there is anything you want, please let me know," Brent said, and hurried away to seek out his daughter. The consul was surprised that she had not been in the main reception hall. He tried his study, and she was not there. He went back into the hall and gazed towards the stairs.

"Pam! Pam!" he cried hoarsely.

"Are you there? Pam! Pam!"

His secretary, a dapper little man, appeared.

"Miss Brent isn't here, sir."

"Not here?" Brent gasped out.

"But the Black Prince has arrived and sailed again."

"Yes, sir, we were feeling anxious," the secretary answered.

"But Captain Markham promised to send Miss Brent here in charge of an officer." The consul hastened to the big dining-room that had been given to the landing-party. "Signalman," he called, and a sailor stepped smartly forward, "make a signal to your captain from Mr. Brent—just say, 'Where is Pam?'"

"Aye, aye, sir!"

When Markham got the message he knitted his brows together in bewilderment.

"Does this mean that Miss Brent hasn't arrived at the consulate?"

"I can't understand it, sir," answered second officer Walton, who had brought the message. "Armstrong's boat is still in shore, sir."

"Send a message to the consul that Lieutenant Armstrong was sent from here to meet her, and that he has not returned on board," Markham instructed. "Armstrong should have been back some while ago, and I think that after getting that message off, Walton, it would be as well if someone went ashore to make inquiries."

"Shall I go, sir?"

"Yes, do. Jump in my boat and go right away."

The reply sent by Markham made the consul even more anxious and worried. He consulted with Adams.

"Armstrong's a pretty reliable fellow," Adams stated gravely. "It beats me what can have happened to him. Shall I take a party of men, sir, and see if I can find out anything in the town?"

"I wish you would, lieutenant."

"I'll go at once, sir. It's not likely that they would touch Armstrong; he's in uniform."

Brent paced restlessly up and down his study. Where could Pamela have gone? Surely she had not gone sight-seeing? No, that was impossible. There was considerable rioting going on in the town, and perhaps Armstrong had taken her into some house for shelter. The harassed father was not satisfied with that explanation.

Hardcastle, a trader, was admitted to his study, and the latter did nothing to relieve the consul of his gloomy thoughts.

"I warned you some days ago that there was trouble brewing," stated the trader. "And every word I said has come true."

"What is it now?"

"You'll have to move our folk out of the lower town—it's terrible down there. Rioting and looting."

"Get them into the consulate as quickly as you can," the consul decidated. "I will have them transferred later to the Audacious."

"Thanks, Brent," Hardcastle paused at the door. "I must say this is a nice state of affairs for that bonny daughter of yours to come back to. Where is the lassie?"

"I don't know," muttered the unhappy consul. "She came ashore from the Black Prince and hasn't got here yet."

"You don't mean Miss Brent's lost in Bianco?" gasped Hardcastle. "And you sit there—"

"How do I know where she is?" the consul shouted. He was usually so quiet of voice. "I can't leave here. I can only pray that the search-party finds her."

When Adams returned he reported much disturbance in the town. He could find no trace of the consul's daughter or the officer who had escorted her from the Black Prince.

The President Complicates Matters

THE president was practising with his revolver—just in case he might need it—when a servant appeared.

"A message has come from Colonel Cortez, your Excellency, that the lower town is in the hands of the rebels."

"What's that?" The president was startled.

"The messenger was fired at but managed to get through."

"This means the British residents are in danger, Louis." The president thought for a moment. "Louis, my hat and cloak."

"Your Excellency is not going to leave the villa?"

"I must, Louis. All the time I tell the consul there is no danger. You will tell Juan to meet me with the car round at the back, near the pagoda. Try to get a message through to Colonel Cortez to meet me at the consulate." The president stuck out his chest proudly. "I, the president, will warn my friend, Signor Brent!"

By keeping his cloak muffled close round him the president succeeded in reaching the consulate.

"I am sorry, my friend, I am so very sorry," he said with an apologetic smile. "I told you that your people would be safe, and I made a great big mistake. I see you have many people here."

"We are evacuating them as quickly as possible," answered the consul, who looked drawn and haggard. "Many are already on the way to the Audacious."

"My friend, if you don't mind, I should like very much to speak to your people you have here and tell them that the president is sorry and regrets their treatment."

"I am sure they would find that very consoling," Brent said with a touch of bitter irony.

"I go out and speak to your people now, and then I return to my villa."

Scarce had the president spoken when there came the sound of shots. He smiled a little foolishly, but pulled up as there came the unmistakable and sinister sound of a machine-gun.

"You can hardly do that now, sir," the consul told him. "Perhaps you had better remain here for a while until things are quieter."

The president hesitated. The firing broke out afresh and closer. "Perhaps I had better stay with you for just one little while to see if my friend Colonel Cortez comes to join me."

Captain Markham arrived at the consulate after seeing the first batch of refugees made comfortable on the Audacious.

"Still no news of Pam?"

"Nothing at all." The consul buried his face in his hands. "The suspense is killing me." He looked up eagerly. "How about the officer—"

"Armstrong did not show up," Markham answered. "I know that they landed and started to walk because the car was late. Armstrong did not return. If any harm comes to Pam I'll never forgive myself for not sending an armed escort. I can only hope that Lieutenant Walton and the search-party find them. The officer will report here."

Walton turned up at the consulate not many moments later.

"I haven't found any trace of Miss Brent or Armstrong, sir," he reported to his captain. "But I found the consul's car. It was in a side-street near the landing-stage. It was badly smashed up and it looks as if the wreckage had been dumped there. The chauffeur's body was huddled over the wheel—he had been shot, sir."

"Good heavens!" both Markham and the consul gasped out.

"I tried to question the people, sir," added Walton. "But I couldn't find out anything. Either they can't say or they won't."

"Anything to show whether my daughter was in the car?" asked the consul hoarsely.

"The car was going towards the landing-stage, in my opinion, sir. There's a smashed pillar in the nearby main street, which would be about a quarter of a mile from the landing-stage."

"Thanks, Walton." The captain turned to the consul. "Finding the car wasn't there to meet them, they apparently decided to walk, and vanished into thin air." He turned to his officer. "Do everything possible. If you find any trace of them, report here to the consul; if not, return to the ship."

"What do you think can have happened to them, Markham?" asked the anxious consul.

"I expect they have taken refuge in some place," decided Markham. "The mob wouldn't dare lay hands on an English officer."

The consul's secretary entered and announced that an officer from the El Mirante wished to speak with the consul.

"I thought they'd murdered all their officers," exclaimed Markham.

"The loyal ones, yes," the consul answered. "I think we'll see this man together." He waited till his secretary had gone. "This is a deuced awkward situation, Markham." He pointed to the large wide-brimmed hat on his desk. "That belongs to the president—he is here."

"That does complicate matters," agreed Markham.

Lieutenant Enriqueo swaggered into the room and stood at his ease before the consul's desk. Markham eyed the gunnery officer with anger and disapproval.

"You have in your house the late president of Bianco."

"The late president?"

Enriqueo grinned insolently.

"Yes. I have orders he is to accompany me on board the El Mirante."

The consul stared intently at the rebel officer.

"The president will leave here when he chooses and not before," he stated in firm tones.

"He must accompany me now!" cried Enriqueo truculently.

"May I remind you that you are in a British consulate?"

"And you refuse to let him go?"

"I do!"

"Very well, if in six hours he is still here, you must take the consequences."

"And what do you mean by that?" sharply asked Markham.

"You will find out soon enough if he is not on board, that is all," Enriqueo grinned insolently. "You will find out. Adios, signors!"

The consul and the captain of the Audacious stared blankly at each other after their unwelcome visitor had left.

"Why in heaven's name did the president come here at this time?"

"He meant well." The consul shrugged his shoulders despairingly.

"Do we throw him to the wolves or not?"

"How can we?"

"Precisely!" the consul agreed.

Captain Markham prepared to leave. "I'll go on board the El Mirante and have a talk with De Costa," he decided. "In the meantime, the president stays here. I'm afraid I can't take any more refugees. If you have any news of Pam you will signal the ship."

"Of course!" the consul answered. "I know you will do anything to stop De Costa trying to carry out any reprisals."

De Costa's Terms

CAPTAIN MARKHAM went out in his pinnace to the El Mirante, and as he walked up the gangway to the deck a slight, ironical smile twitched his strong mouth as he noticed rebel sailors and soldiers longing about on the decks, leaning on their guns with no sort of discipline prevailing.

Dusk was settling over the blue waters of the bay, and the lights of Bianco twinkled from the shore.

A sentry with fixed bayonet barred the captain's passage and glared suspiciously at him. The man called out something that Markham did not understand and a voice answered smoothly:

"I will see the captain of the Audacious."

De Costa was seated in the state cabin that had once belonged to Captain Castellano, who had been murdered at his instigation. He pointed to a chair.

"You wish to see me?"

"I wish to talk to you," coldly responded Markham as he sat down. "I have very little to say. I understand that you have presented an ultimatum to the British consul."

De Costa reached for a silver cigar-box and held it out to Markham, who ignored the gesture. The rebel leader smiled as if amused, poured himself a glass of wine, looked at it and then at the captain.

"I am here to warn you that any attempt to use force against the consulate will be prevented by all means in my power!" said Captain Markham.

"Very reluctantly," he said softly.

"I am here to warn you that any attempt to use force against the consulate will be prevented by all means in my power."

"Let's be logical." De Costa smiled more openly. "My ship is very large, yours is very small. My guns are fifteen-inch, yours only six."

"My warning stands." Markham rose. "If any harm comes to the consulate you will bitterly regret it."

"Possibly, captain, possibly." De Costa lit his cigar and puffed out the smoke with an air of satisfaction. "But in that case my young guests will also regret it."

"Guests?"

"Yes. A charming young English lady and one of your officers."

"So you have dared to detain Miss Brent and an officer of mine?"

"Your lieutenant attempted to kill one of my men," laughed De Costa. "The young lady is a witness. They were arrested and then brought aboard this ship."

"I demand the immediate release of these British subjects!" thundered Markham.

"By all means—as soon as the president is aboard this ship."

"I am not here to bargain with you."

"They are in no danger as my guests." De Costa flicked away the ash from the cigar. "Thought, of course, it would be most unfortunate if they were killed by one of your guns."

"You dirty swine! I'll—"

De Costa jumped up, his eyes blazing.

"Signor!"

Markham's momentary rage had gone. He looked at the rebel coldly and walked to the cabin door.

"You have had your warning."

De Costa laughed tauntingly. Markham went out on to the deck and was glad to breathe the fresh air. The pinnace took him back to the Audacious.

The rebel summoned Lieutenant Enrique to his cabin.

"The captain of the British cruiser has just been to see me. I informed him that the president must come on board at once."

"And what did he say?"

"He gave me a warning we can disregard." De Costa unrolled some parchment. "Here are the plans. At dawn we attack the British consulate."

"How about the British cruiser?"

"We can afford to disregard that. She is entirely cut off from reinforcements. Naturally—if for any reason they do—but I don't think they would fire on our guests." De Costa was amused at his lieutenant's laughter. "I see you agree with me. Here is a map of the whole position. The El Mirante is here, the British Consulate there, and the cruiser here."

"I will go and check the gun turrets," Enrique told his chief. "Maybe the officers need a little training. All shall be ready for the dawn attack."

In a dark and gloomy cabin that was being used as a store-room Pamela Brent and Bill Armstrong were seated on some sacks. They had had very little to eat since they had been arrested and they had smoked all their cigarettes.

"I'm sorry I let you in for this, Pam."

"It isn't your fault," the girl said wearily. "But if only Captain Markham had come to meet me this wouldn't have happened."

"I don't see what difference he could have made," grumbled Bill. "Besides, he's got to look after his ship."

"His ship—always his ship," irritably answered the girl. "He thinks of nothing else." She shivered. "What part of the ship is this?"

"Looks like an upper deck store-room to me."

"We seem fated to be always sitting around like this, side by side," Pam said gloomily.

"It's all right with me," grinned Bill, and put his arm round her.

"Don't, Bill."

"Sorry. Have you known him long?"

Pam looked at the youngster in surprise.

"Who?"

"Captain Markham. You like him, don't you?"

"Yes, Bill. I'm sorry, Bill." She gave a heavy sigh. "He doesn't care in the least for me."

"And I'm crazy about you." Bill got up. "You girls puzzle me."

Sounds outside made him turn. "Hallo, what's going on?"

He walked quietly over to a porthole and pulled back the curtain. He was staring into a turret. "Why do you suppose they're fooling around with a gun at this hour of the night?"

"Why do they do anything?" cried Pam. "Why did they bring us here?"

Bill had a good idea that there must be some very good reason, and it was something that he did not care to think too much about.

"I'm glad they didn't separate us, anyway." He tried to seem cheerful. He drew back the curtain. "I hope they're not planning to open fire on the Audacious."

"They'd more likely want to blow Bianco to bits," snapped the girl, little knowing how near to the truth she was.

Markham's Dilemma

CAPTAIN MARKHAM on reaching the Audacious at once called a meeting of his senior officers and told them all that had happened.

"That's the situation," he concluded. "And if they do open fire on the consulate, somehow or other we've got to stop them."

"Torpedoes, sir, that's the only way," cried the torpedo lieutenant.

"That's just what we can't do," answered his superior officer. "It's very important that we're not the aggressor."

"Sounds a difficult problem, sir," remarked the first officer.

"Darned difficult," nodded Markham. "In the meantime we must make preparations for anything this perishing fool might do. You, chief, raise steam for full speed."

"Aye, aye, sir!" responded the chief engineer, picking up his hat.

"Get the war heads on the torpedoes."

"Aye, aye, sir!" cried the torpedo lieutenant, as he got to his feet.

"See there's plenty of shells at the guns."

"Yes, sir!" cried the gunnery lieutenant. "H.E., sir?"

"Yes, I think that would be best."

He dismissed the lieutenant with a nod and turned to his first officer. "I shall want the cable ready for slipping."

"Very good, sir," answered Forbes.

"Pretty position, eh, Forbes?" The captain fingered his smooth jaw. "A ship five times the size of us threatening to smash the consulate. If I open fire first I shall be the aggressor; if I don't they may blow us to pieces. Needless to say, whatever I do now, I shall be in the wrong. And just to make things easier Miss Brent and Armstrong are in the ship I may have to attack."

"Pretty tough, sir," agreed the first officer. "I wonder what solution the war college would offer?"

"I wonder?" Markham gave a rueful grin. "If only we were in the North Sea a convenient fog would solve our difficulties for us."

"Yes, that would settle De Costa."

"By Gad! I've got it! We'll have a fog!" Markham shouted. "A smoke screen between El Mirante and the land. Yes, that's the idea. All right, action station!"

"Aye, aye, sir!" cried Forbes, and went to the double.

The bugle sounded the call, and soon the men were piling out of their hammocks and running in various directions to action stations.

Markham went round his ship. He told the men that they might be involved in an action with the El Mirante, as the rebel battleship was threatening to blow up the British consulate. As there was no likelihood of any action taking place before dawn, all men that could be spared were allowed to go back to their hammocks.

Shortly after midnight the chief engineer reported that the main engines were all ready, the gunnery lieutenant reported that he was ready to open fire, and the torpedo lieutenant that he was ready for action.

Markham then sought out Forbes.

"I can't take the refugees into action. You'd better get them into the boats—as few boats as possible. If there is any action it'll be about here. Tell the boats to keep well away. There is a bay three miles along the coast known as Sarrento. They can lie hidden there, but I do not advise landing. Put one officer in charge. Tell the refugees to make little noise when they leave the ship and not to talk when they get away. Not that it makes much difference, but it is just as well not to warn De Costa of activity on board."

"Aye, aye, sir!"

The refugees with much grumbling were got into three boats and vanished into the darkness. Markham had action stations called an hour before dawn.

Gradually the darkness lifted and it was a grey light. The El Mirante showed as a black smudge. Rapidly the light grew stronger, and Markham watched the El Mirante through his glasses.

There was activity on board the rebel ship, and the captain noticed in particular that the guns were being moved as if they were being sighted. The line of fire was shorewards.

"What's their range on the consulate?"

"About two thousand yards, sir," answered Forbes. "Hallo, the front turrets have opened fire."

There was a belch of smoke and the rumble of an explosion. Markham scanned Bianco anxiously and saw two bursts of flame on the cliffs that towered over Bianco. A pall of black smoke and the rumble of the explosions.

"Slip the cable," shouted Markham. "Full speed ahead both engines."

As Light as a Feather

THERE was little sleep for Brent that night. He had received a message from Markham that Pamela and Armstrong were prisoners on board the El Mirante. It was a consolation to know that his daughter was alive, but one could not tell what a murdering little fiend like De Costa might do.

Nobody else in the consulate slept, and about four in the morning the president, who had been spending all his time assuring the refugees that there was nothing to fear, sought out the consul.

"You're sad, my friend." He stared at the pallid, haggard face of the Englishman.

"I am very worried."

"You do not eat, that is very bad," the president shook his head, and from his pocket took out a small tin. "Try a lozenge. Extract of beef—very nourishing, my friend."

"No, thank you," cried the consul impatiently.

"If you do not eat, you lose courage," argued the president. "If you lose courage you lose everything."

The president grinned and put a lozenge into his mouth, but his smile vanished as he heard sounds of rifle fire and machine-gunning.

"Colonel Cortez is making a bold fight," he muttered.

"Your people seem to have gone mad," cried the consul.

"If you would only let me I would go out and talk to them," cried the president.

"You can't do that, sir," cried Brent.

De Costa frowned as he saw the shells burst and shouted to Enriqueco to decrease the range by three hundred yards. This time the shells hit houses in front of the consulate. That he might be butchering some of his own supporters did not even enter De Costa's head. The little rebel was drunk with power. He thought himself mightier than the British nation. He would fire until the consulate ran up the white flag, and perhaps he would still go on firing; but he would smash ruthlessly anyone who stood in the way of De Costa, the future President of Maranja.

"Increase range — one hundred yards," Enriqueco snarled at his gunners.

This time one shell pitched in the street near the consulate, blew in the side of a house and smashed one of the consulate walls. The next shells did little damage, though one crashed through the roof and failed to explode.

A little girl, terrified by the noise, came running into the hall, and it was the president who took the child on his knee.

"My little bambino, you don't want to cry," he grinned at her, and then at sorry," he whispered. "You were right. 'Death she as light as one leetle feather. Duty is as heavy—'" The president never finished the quotation.

The Smoke Screen

CAPTAIN MARKHAM watched the effects of the shelling and saw that the shells were pitching dangerously close to the consulate.

"Tell the engineer to make smoke," he ordered. "And order the gunnery lieutenant to stand by."

De Costa leaned over the rail of the bridge and watched the bursting shells create destruction in the town of Bianco. There was an ugly scowl on his forehead because Enriqueco had failed to destroy the British consulate. Shells cost a lot of money, and far too many were being used. He turned his head to see what H.M.S. Audacious was doing, and observed the cruiser steaming towards the shore. Surely this puny little ship of war did not intend to attack the mighty El Mirante? Suddenly from the funnels began to belch clouds of thick black smoke.

De Costa chuckled.

"So the British cruiser is trying to

The Audacious registered a direct hit on a forward conning-tower of the rebel ship.

"If you show yourself outside they would shoot you."

The president gave a shrug of his shoulders.

"Well, what is the difference—death is one little thing."

"'Death is as light as a feather. Duty is as heavy as a mountain,'" quoted the consul.

"What is that you say, my friend?"

"Oh, just a quotation, your Excellency!"

"'Death, she is as light as one leetle feather,'" the president smiled. "I like that—that is good."

It was not many minutes later that De Costa, from the bridge of the El Mirante, gave orders to Enriqueco to train his guns on the British consulate and gave the order to fire the front turrets.

The shells exploded two or three hundred yards beyond the consulate and did little damage, though it caused considerable panic among the refugees.

The small landing party showed no sign of perturbation, though all of them knew only too well that it was only a matter of time before one of the shells scored a direct hit on the consulate.

Brent. "I will look after her, my friend, if you wish to see to your peoples."

The president juggled the four-year-old on his knee and kept her attention away from the noise of the explosions, though the big man had difficulty in suppressing a start as the sounds grew closer. He showed the child how a nigger would eat a water-melon and so buried his teeth in the luscious fruit that he made his ears wet. The child laughed as the president consumed great mouthfuls of melon.

A shell hit the roof and exploded with a roar. Bits of shrapnel whined through the air, and involuntarily the child hid herself against the president's chest. The big man's face was contorted with pain, but he made no sound.

The mother of the child appeared and snatched up her child. Her shrill cry of alarm brought the consul.

A piece of stray shrapnel had hit the president, and a refugee, who was acting as doctor to the casualties, shook his head.

The president did not seem to mind dying, and he smiled quite contentedly at the consul.

"No, no, my friend, you must not feel shield the British consulate with smoke?" He watched the smoke grow denser and denser. "Two can play at this clever business," he decided, and summoned the gunnery lieutenant. "Get ready your big guns. I'm going to fire on the cruiser. Also tell an officer to bring those two English people on deck."

Bill Armstrong had been startled when the battleship had opened fire. He told Pamela that he reckoned the rebels must be firing on Bianco, and the girl had tried to keep up a brave front. What was happening to her father and the people of Bianco? Their prison was full of the smell of powder, and the whole place seemed to quiver when the 15-inch guns fired. It was a surprise to them when the door of the store-room was unlocked and an officer bade them in broken English to follow him on deck.

"A little change of air will do us good," Bill grinned as cheerfully as he could. "We'll be able to see what's going on."

The officer took them on to the deck.

"You stay there!" he ordered.

"Why have they brought us here?" Pamela asked.

"I don't know." Bill noted the two seamen with bayonets fixed. The men were watching them closely. It would be unwise to disobey the officer's order.

Bill Armstrong tried to figure out what was happening. The roar of the guns and the smoke made it no easy task. The smoke cleared, and first of all the young officer scanned the shore and saw clouds of smoke rising where the shells had landed, but the Union Jack still fluttered over the consulate. He took a step forward, and now he spotted the Audacious. The cruiser was passing between the battleship and the shore, and great clouds of smoke were hellowing from her. Captain Markham was making a smoke screen so that the gunners on the El Mirante would not be able to see their target. A glance upwards showed the guns were swinging.

"They seem to be training their guns on the Audacious," he shouted at Pamela.

But Markham, on the Audacious, had seen the guns trained towards his ship and hoped that the speed at which the cruiser was moving would make the target difficult. If their shooting was no better than their effort to hit the consulate then there was every chance of getting past unscathed. Once past, with the smoke screen as a cover, the cruiser would have a decided advantage.

The guns of the El Mirante belched forth their 15-inch shells straight at the Audacious, but the gunners had not taken any account of the fact that the target was moving swiftly through the water. Every shell burst in the wake of the cruiser, and that made De Costa rave and swear. They were to reload and fire again.

It was an unpleasant moment for Markham when an officer reported a girl on the upper deck of the insurgent battleship. He peered through his spyglass and recognised Pamela and young Armstrong. His own guns had opened fire on the battleship, and it had given him keen satisfaction in registering a direct hit on a forward coming-tower. "Tell them to cease fire," Markham ordered, and then to the navigator. "Get round behind the smoke."

As the Audacious swung shorewards a shell from the El Mirante landed amidships, and there was the roar of a mighty explosion.

"What's the damage?" Markham asked when Forbes came on to the bridge.

"Casualty to No. 3 gun," Forbes reported. "The gun platform's been damaged. I'm having it shored up."

De Costa had done a lot more cursing when the Audacious had disappeared behind her own smoke screen. The smoke was rising and drifting, and might easily obliterate Bianco from the view of the battleship. He yelled an order that Enriquego was to train his guns once more on the consulate.

The big guns roared, and Markham saw vivid red flashes near the consulate, and observed flames shooting up from some building that had been set alight. He had got to stop this madman somehow.

"There's nothing else for it," he muttered under his breath. "The torpedoes."

Markham sang out an order, and the torpedo lieutenant reported that he was all ready.

"What about those two on board the El Mirante?" ventured the second officer.

"Do you think I've forgotten them?" Markham almost lost his temper. Then he became his calm self again. "There are many more than two in the consulate. We must protect the greater number. We will drive back through the smoke. Instruct Walton to fire both torpedoes as soon as sights come on. Tell the gunnery lieutenant to stand by."

De Costa was just about to order Enriquego to decrease his range by fifty yards when out of the smoke screen came the bow of the cruiser and making straight towards the battleship. A slight feeling of panic seized the rebel, and he shouted hoarsely for the big guns to be trained once more on the cruiser.

Fortunately for the cruiser the gunners under Enriquego were slow and not very efficient, and the Audacious had come through the screen before Enriquego was ready to fire. Little did those wretches on board the battleship know that two deadly torpedoes had been sent on their way. The El Mirante was doomed.

As De Costa yelled to Enriquego to fire so was the Audacious changing her course—darting back towards the shelter of the smoke screen. One shell from the El Mirante landed dangerously close to the stern and another carried away part of the funnel, but that was the only damage.

And as Enriquego swung his guns to blow the Audacious to pieces the first torpedo caught the El Mirante close to the stern. There was a terrific explosion. A great column of water and black smoke shot into the air. A huge hole had been torn in the side of the battleship.

The second torpedo struck almost amidships, with deadly effect. The sea poured in and at once the great ship began to founder.

Everything was panic and confusion. Officers and men were rushing screaming in all directions. Fighting and struggling with each other in their panic. Another huge explosion, and it was the sea bursting the boilers. The battleship seemed to shudder.

Pamela and Bill had been flung to the deck by the explosion of the second torpedo.

"Now's our chance." Bill Armstrong was quick to see a hope of escape. "Come on, follow me. Straight across, Pam, and in."

They darted down some stairs from the upper deck. A rebel sailor rushed at them with his bayonet, but Bill jumped to one side, and stepping in landed a hefty punch to the rascal's dirty face. The fellow dropped.

"Come on, Pam!" shouted Bill running across the deck and getting ready to jump over.

The girl flung herself overboard, and Bill followed her a split second later. They swam vigorously. Several of the rebels ran out from one of the turrets and began to fire at the swimmers. Their fire was wild and erratic.

The two tremendous explosions occurred as the Audacious was slipping back into her smoke screen, and Markham at once changed course. One glance showed him that the torpedoes had torn out the vitals of the El Mirante, and that she was doomed. Already she was low in the water at the stern, and had a distinct list with her bows high.

"They're firing at someone in the water, sir," reported Forbes.

"Can you see who it is?"

Forbes peered through the spy glass. "Yes, there's a girl," he cried. "And Armstrong's near her, sir."

Markham could have shouted with joy and relief, but instead he said gruffly: "Send a boat and pick them up."

There was no foolish modesty about Pamela. She found her dress hampered her, so she tore it off. Several of the bullets had come unpleasantly close. Bill sang out to her to keep going, and that if once they got near the smoke screen they would be safe. Out of the blue appeared the boat sent by Markham, and the two young people were dragged on board. A coat was flung round the shivering Pamela.

The firing from the El Mirante had ceased because the list was so great that it was almost impossible to cling to the decks. It was obvious that the ship could not last many minutes, and now there was a mad rush by those still surviving to get away before the ship sucked them under.

Attempts were made to launch the boats, but there was such a wild scramble to get into them that they were capsized.

"Miss Brent and Lieutenant Armstrong are in the boat, sir," an officer reported to Markham.

"Good," rapped out Markham. "Have all remaining boats sent out to pick up survivors. Better hurry as the El Mirante can't last long. Warn boats not to get sucked in by the undertow."

"Aye, aye, sir!"

By now the rebel sailors were leaping in desperation from the battleship and swimming as hard as they could. Some poor wretches were unable to swim, and soon sank. The boats of the Audacious ventured as near as they dared and picked up many survivors.

Markham went over to a signalman: "Make signals to the consulate," came his crisp order. "Pamela safe."

From the bridge Markham watched the El Mirante as she sank deeper in the water till her stern was awash. He noticed with satisfaction that there were very few heads bobbing in the water, and that most of the boats were rowing towards the Audacious.

Suddenly the El Mirante seemed to shudder, her bow came high out of the water, there came the sound of a ship being torn apart, as her back broke. The stern vanished completely, and for a few minutes the bow seemed to be standing on end, then it sank lower and lower, to eventually disappear.

Before Markham went below he heard with grim satisfaction that one of the survivors was De Costa.

"He'll pay the penalty of his sins," grimly stated the captain.

Pamela was found some clothes that had been left behind by the refugees, and rather quaintly garbed she was brought to the captain's cabin.

Emotion for once overcame this sober son of the sea.

"Thank God you're safe, Pam! I've been through hell!" he told her. "There were you two on deck and De Costa thinking I would not open fire, so that he could blow Bianco and the consulate to blazes at his leisure."

"I admire you for doing your duty." Pamela smiled at him.

"I must compliment young Armstrong on the way he looked after you," hurriedly spoke Markham. "I've sent for him."

The girl's happy expression vanished and she stared moodily at the carpet.

A knock, and Bill Armstrong appeared.

"All right, Armstrong?"

"Fine, thank you, sir."

"Feel equal to another job of work?"

"Yes, sir."

"When you're ready I want you to escort Miss Brent back to the consulate," Markham smiled. "You should manage to get there all right this time. Good luck, Armstrong." He shook the young officer's hand. "The boat will be ready in a few minutes. That's all."

(Continued on page 25)

After Eddie Lang has borrowed fifty dollars in order to take his wife and two little children for a holiday, he finds himself in the merciless clutches of a gang of loan sharks, suffers violence in their hands, and in desperation tells his story to the District Attorney—only to be shot down on the steps of the Hall of Justice. A powerful story with a smashing climax, starring Chester Morris and Helen Mack

AS Eddie Lang, billing clerk on the staff of R. H. Morse, Incorporated, walked round a corner out of Broadway into West Twenty-ninth Street, the pavement felt hot beneath his feet, and several times he mopped his streaming face with a handkerchief.

New York was sweltering in a mid-summer heat-wave. Day after day the sun shone down upon the city from a sky that was like brass, and night after night its weary victims found sleep impossible in rooms that had become almost like ovens.

But Eddie was young and healthy, and he was hungry in spite of the fact that the shade temperature had reached ninety degrees an hour before noon.

Outside the modest restaurant in which he lunched regularly with colleagues from the office two perspiring men had paused to comment on the state of the weather.

"Phew!" exploded one of them, puffing hot air from his lungs into the hot air all about him. "Boy, is this a scorcher?"

"It sure is," agreed the other.

"And the papers say it's going to be worse to-morrow!"

"A guy just dropped dead down the street."

Eddie knew one of the men slightly, but he had neither time nor inclination to join in so fruitless a discussion. He squeezed past them into the hot and odorous restaurant, and on his way to a table on the right waved to a flax-haired girl behind a long counter on the left.

"Hallo, Goldie," he said cheerfully. "how's the queen of the beanery?"

"Fine and dandy," she replied, though her appearance belied her words.

Norman Davis, clerk in the foreign-order department of R. H. Morse, Incorporated, was already in his usual place at the table, and Bert Foster, ledger clerk, arrived while Eddie was pulling out a chair for himself. A waitress in a white overall which covered as few garments as possible arrived languidly with a bill of fare. Her hair was straight and limp, her features were heavy, and Eddie had a name for her.

"Hallo, Garbo!" he said facetiously.

"I'll have the special," decided Foster, "and bring the Java in right away."

"Make it two," said Davis, lighting a cigarette.

Eddie glanced at the list of dishes.

"I'd like a nice thick steak, smothered with mushrooms and asparagus," he said. "That's what I'd like. But you can bring me the special."

The waitress departed and the three smoked.

"B. G. sure was on the warpath this morning all right," remarked Foster.

"I'll say so, the old crab," confirmed Davis.

"Aw," said Eddie, "maybe the heat got him. If it's ninety in the shade I'll bet it's a hundred and ten under that hard-boiled collar of his!"

"B. G." was Bernard George Wilson, office manager and a martinet.

"Well, it certainly is warm," conceded Foster, "but you're one of the lucky ones. You've got your vacation coming up next week."

Eddie, thus addressed, made a grimace.

"That's right," he said, "but the place I'm in is hotter than the office. Mary takes the kids to the park every day, but it doesn't do any good—they don't get the sleep they should in that hot-box. The heat sure pulls them down."

"Oh, not going away, eh?" inquired Davis.

"On my pay, and with two kids?" returned Eddie. "What do you think?"

A tall young man, wearing a sports jacket and flannel trousers in conjunction with a straw hat, sauntered up to the table wiping the back of his neck. His nose was long and his lips were thick, but he had an affable manner and the three knew him as a regular patron of the restaurant.

"Well, boys, how's tricks?" he greeted.

"Hallo, Al!" said Foster. "Hot enough for you?"

"It'll do until some hot weather comes along." Al Anslie jerked a thumb and winked. "Say, has Eddie pulled any good ones lately?"

"What d'you mean, 'lately'?" demanded Davis. "When did he pull a good one?"

"I'm not appreciated," complained Eddie, "but you'll all be pretty sad when I'm gone."

"That's what you think," jeered Foster.

Al Anslie went off chuckling.

"Great fellow, that Al," commented Davis.

"Yeah," said Eddie, and added: "I see him around all the time. What does he do?"

"Oh, I don't know," shrugged

Foster. "He works around here somewhere."

Three cups of coffee were served by the girl with the limp hair and consumed by the three employees of R. H. Morse, Incorporated. Eddie groped in a pocket.

"Remember I told you I took some pictures of the kids last Sunday?" he asked. "Well, they came out fine. Wait till you see Judy in the wife's hat!"

Several snapshot photographs were produced with paternal pride, and one of them was offered for inspection.

"A little bit out of focus," admitted the photographer, "but, gee, they're swell! Is that a cute picture of the kid?"

Foster looked at Davis and Davis looked at Foster, but neither of them looked at the snapshot.

"What's biting you?" asked the fond father.

"Say, listen, Eddie," returned Foster reprovingly, "you've taken pictures of those kids of yours every fifteen minutes since they were born, and I've seen 'em all!"

"Bill biting his toes," scoffed Davis, "Judy eating her spinach. Bill biting his spinach, Judy eating her toes."

"Okay," growled Eddie, "skip it." And he thrust the despised snapshots back into his pocket and shouted across the restaurant to the waitress: "Say, where's that chow?"

"Aw, Norman, now we've hurt Eddie's feelings," laughed Foster; and Davis held a hand across the table.

"Listen, sap," he said, "can't you take it? We were kidding."

"Sure," chimed in Foster. "What's the matter with you, Eddie? Honest, I wish me and the wife had a couple."

"Yeah?" Eddie wasn't at all sure that he was in earnest.

"Well, one, anyway. Let's have a look!"

Once more the snapshots were produced, and they were being examined with exaggerated interest when the waitress arrived with the three specials.

"Say, she sure is cute all right," proclaimed Davis, studying the picture of a chubby little fair-haired girl in a hat that made her look remarkably sophisticated.

"She certainly is a doll," said the waitress over his shoulder. "How old is she, Mr. Lang?"

"Why, she's only six," replied Eddie, beaming all over his clean-shaven face, "but smart as a whip."

"She must take after her mother," said Davis maliciously. "Yes, she's cute all right."

After they had devoured their food the three played dominoes for a while, and then they returned to the office. The intense heat did not encourage exertion, and Eddie's thoughts strayed frequently to the delightful possibilities of his approaching holiday—if only he had money enough to take his wife and two children away from the sultry city.

The making out of bills became sheer tedium, and over the afternoon cup of tea which was brought to his desk at four o'clock he studied the holiday advertisements in the "New York Chronicle."

Round two of those advertisements he made red-ink frames because they fired his imagination, and both concerned lake-side camps away up in the hills, and both promised all manner of sports and good food at moderate rates.

He was sighing over the one that was headed "Vacation Paradise" when a clerk from the counting-house thumped him in the back and demanded fifty cents.

"Eh?" said Eddie, coming back to earth with a jar.

"Fifty cents—four bits. Viola Gray, over in the sales department, is getting married."

"Oh, Viola?" Eddie groped for the desired sum of money. "Sure, she's a swell kid, Viola. Here you are! Funny you asking me for dough, though—I was just wondering how I could promote some for myself. You know, I get my vacation next week, and I'd sure like to take the wife and kids out of this heat."

"Why don't you try B. G.?" suggested the clerk.

"Wilson?" Eddie screwed up his face and shook his head.

"What have you got to lose? He knows the bonus is coming through in a couple o' weeks, and he ain't a bad guy—as office managers go."

Eddie considered the suggestion from the angle of the annual bonus, which would become due the week after his holiday, and a few minutes later he summoned sufficient courage to beard the martinet in his den at the other end of the big general office.

The manager was at his desk, hard at work but suffering considerably from the oppressive heat, a pen in one hand and a handkerchief in the other. He was a man of nearly fifty, but without a trace of grey in his brown hair.

"What's on your mind, Lang?" he asked, and his voice was sharp and by no means encouraging.

"Well, Mr. Wilson," said Eddie hesitatingly, "I—I've got my vacation coming up next week, and I thought, with this heat-wave, I'd kind of like to take my wife and kids to— You see, that place we've got doesn't cool off much, even at night, and I thought that— Mr. Wilson, could I borrow fifty dollars?"

The manager picked up a sheet of paper, looked at it, and put it down again. The silence became almost intolerable.

"Lang," Wilson said abruptly, "you've been with us how long?"

"Six years, sir."

"I've kept an eye on you and your work, and it's been quite satisfactory."

"Thank you, sir," Eddie beamed.

"But we have made it a rule not to lend money to employees."

The beam faded.

"Well, I know, Mr. Wilson, but—but I thought, since we get the yearly bonus in a couple of weeks— Well, I thought—"

"In view of your record of loyal and efficient service," Wilson interrupted, "I would gladly make an exception in your case, but that would be establishing a precedent—and we can't do that, can we?"

"No," admitted Eddie unhappily.

"No, I guess we can't. Well, thanks just the same, Mr. Wilson."

With all his hopes shattered, he went out from the room and back to his own desk.

The Loan Shark Racket

EDDIE lived with his wife, Mary, and their two offspring in a little four-roomed flat up in the Bronx, and the flat seemed airless and stiflingly hot when he reached it that evening, though all the windows were wide open.

Even in his shirt-sleeves he perspired over a meal in the kitchen, and afterwards he rigged up a sort of fan over the crib in which his four-months-old son, Bill, was too hot to sleep. The fan consisted of a curtain on a rod, actuated by a string.

"This ought to keep snub-nose cool," he said when he had finished the contrivance. "Wish somebody'd do that for me. Hi, look, it works!"

Mary looked with smiling approval as the curtain moved backwards and forwards over the crib and little Bill settled down to slumber. She was a beautiful girl of twenty-five, and her husband was her hero.

"Why, you're wasting your time at Morse's!" she declared. "Gee, he is a cute-looking little baby, isn't he? You know, Eddie, when I look at him like this, and I remember how cross I get sometimes when he cries, I feel awful."

"You get cross!" scoffed Eddie. "That's a laugh!"

The crib was in their own bed-room: Judy occupied a tiny room next to it. She had been put to bed, but she was not by any means asleep.

"Daddy!" she called out. "Daddy! I want daddy!"

Eddie handed the string over to Mary. "She wants her daddy," he said. "Keep the old man cool, will you?"

So Mary pulled the string that worked the fan while Eddie went off to soothe his little daughter, and she was still pulling it when he returned.

"Aw, give me that, honey," he said. "It's too hot to go to bed yet—let's sit outside a while."

There was a landing of a fire-escape outside the french window of the bedroom. They sat together on one of the iron steps that led to the floor above, and Eddie did not forget to pull the string.

"It's a little cooler out here, isn't it?" sighed Mary.

Eddie fondled her dark-brown hair with his free hand.

"Aren't you glad we took the pent-house, Mrs. Lang?" he asked whimsically.

"Oh, yes, indeed," she replied in the same strain. "Twenty thousand a year, but what's twenty thousand?"

"Between friends, eh?" he laughed. "You want to know something?"

"What?"

"I guess you're the best friend I've got, man or woman. Leaving out loving you the way I do—why, I like you!"

"I like you, too, Eddie."

"Married seven years and still struck on each other!" He gave the dark-brown hair a tug. "Fine thing!"

"You bet it's a fine thing," said she; and then the baby began to whimper.

"What's the matter, Bill?" he called out, and pulled the string more frequently till the whimpering ceased.

"It's just the heat," said Mary. "Oh, it's been fierce to-day."

"You're telling me?" Eddie looked round at walls that were far too close, then up at the stars. "How much would it cost, darling, for the four of us to go away somewhere?"

"Oh, fifty, anyhow," she replied. "But what's the sense, Eddie? You know we only just get by."

"I get my office bonus."

"Not for two weeks."

Eddie visualised Pine Lake, and the camp there that was advertised as a vacation paradise.

"I bet I could teach Judy to swim in three days," he said.

"Listen, mister," rebuked Mary, "you'd better go to bed before you begin lighting cigarettes with ten-dollar bills!"

She rose from the iron step, whereupon he rose beside her—and took her into his arms.

"Seven years ago was nothing!" he declared.

"What do you mean, nothing?" she demurred. "It was wonderful!"

"Uhh! But it's taken me seven years to find out what a swell girl I've got, and I'm still learning!"

"Oh, Eddie, you darn fool!" she laughed.

The next day, as predicted, was hotter than ever. Even the special at the little restaurant in West Twenty-ninth Street seemed unappetising to Eddie, and he left half of it on the plate.

Al Anslie walked with him as far as the doorway of the Centre Building, in Broadway, where the offices of R. H. Morse, Incorporated, were situated.

"So you'd like to take the wife and kids out to the great open spaces, eh?" said Al.

"And how!" said Eddie emphatically. "It burns me up! Here I've got seventy-five berries coming to me in a couple of weeks, but my week's vacation comes first, so there's my wife and two swell kids broiling in that two-by-four place of ours, and I can't raise fifty bucks!"

"Sure you can!" Al astonished him by stating quite confidently.

"Yeah? How?"

"Oh, there are ways."

"Name me one!"

"Okay. I know a company that'll loan you fifty bucks, just like that." A finger and thumb were snapped expressively.

"Aw, you're kidding." Eddie mopped his face with a handkerchief. "On what?"

"On a steady job upstairs."

"Yeah?" Eddie was still incredulous.

"How long has this been going on?"

"Listen," said Al impressively, "lots of people borrow money from this company. You know Seaver, who works in your office?"

"Bill Seaver? Sure."

"Well, I told him about the joint, and he got sixty bucks without any trouble at all. Tell you what you do. D'you know the Welch Building?"

Eddie knew the Welch Building, in Madison Avenue, quite well. It was an office building of considerable height and bulk with an arcade of lock-up shops on its ground floor.

"Sure," he said; and Al handed him a slip of paste-board.

"You give this card to the man at the cigar counter to-morrow," he instructed, "and you'll get fifty bucks."

There was nothing on the card except Al Anslie's name, but somehow Eddie was convinced.

"Gee, that's white of you, Al," he murmured gratefully.

"Skip it, boy," said Al with a flip of his hand. "I'm glad I ran across you."

"I'm mighty glad I ran across you," Eddie fervently assured him.

Work did not seem nearly so tedious that afternoon as it had done in the morning, but he did quite a lot of day-dreaming over bills and manifests.

At half-past five Al Anslie entered the premises of the Aloha Social Club, in Second Avenue, and passed through a long billiards-room to a flight of stairs. At the top of the stairs he turned to the left along a corridor, rapped on a door, and stepped into a room furnished as an office.

There were two desks in the room, and at one of them a middle-aged man in spectacles was making entries in a loose-leaf ledger, while at the other a powerfully built fellow with a straw hat on the back of his head and a cigar in his mouth was making notes, on a pad, of details supplied by a crafty-looking younger man who faced him across the desk.

Lounging about the room were several other men, most of them smoking cigarettes.

"Margaret Jones, housewife, ninety West Third," reported the crafty-looking one, consulting a little notebook he held in one hand. "She only wants twenty now, but she'll be back for a century in ten days, or I'm crazy."

"You're crazy all right," drawled the man with the pad, whose name was Edwin Austin, but who was known as "Fats." "Okay."

Al Anslie approached the desk.

"Where have you been?" demanded Fats harshly. "After this, get around at four."

"Aw, take it easy, Fats," protested Al. "I've been busy. I did six to-day." He added with pride: "That makes fourteen this week."

"Well, ain't that nice?" sneered Fats. "All right, let's get started."

"Okay." Al took out a sheet of paper on which he had scribbled notes. "Thirty bucks. Patrick O'Halloran, motorman. Gets paid at the Centre Street car depot. Lives at eighteen Park Street, Floral Heights. That's a house, not a flat. Wife and four kids. Getting thirty-five."

Fats jotted down the details on his pad. The middle-aged man at the other desk made an entry in his loose-leaf ledger. His name was Nelson.

"Cigar counter, Welch Building, to-morrow," he said. "Check."

"Check," said Al, and proceeded to give details concerning four other people who desired to borrow money.

A rat-faced fellow in a striped suit leaned upon the end of the desk, listening. He affected a white hat of soft felt, and doubtless for that reason was known to his associates as "Whitehat."

Al came to the last name on his list.

"Fifty bucks, Edward Lang," he said. "Billing clerk with the Morse Corporation, three-eighth Centre Building. Lives at two-four-five Everett Place, apartment five D. Wife and two kids. Has worked for Morse's six years, getting twenty-seven dollars fifty."

"Check," said the spectacled Nelson. "Cigar counter, Welch Building, to-morrow."

Al drifted away to the men who had already made their reports. Fats looked up at Whitehat.

"He's the last, eh?" he inquired.

"Yeah," was the reply.

"Right. Let me have the figures on the week, Nelson. The big boss wants them up at the house to-night."

Fifty Dollars

THE "big boss," Fats had mentioned lived luxuriously in a pent-house on the roof of a tall apartment-house in Park Avenue. He was a dark-skinned man of Italian parentage, named Richard Farra, dapper, and in his Latin fashion, handsome. A wisp of a moustache decorated his rather full face, and he looked anything but a crook; but he had no conscience whatever.

At eight o'clock that night, when Nelson called at the pent-house with the desired figures, he was ushered by a Japanese butler into a drawing-room where two other men were seated with Farra in exceedingly comfortable chairs, and between Farra's knees a Siamese cat occupied a cushion on a stool.

The two men were racketeers who had been associated with their host in the days of boot-legging; one of them a huge fellow, named Mike Reardon, the other a younger and far slenderer man known as "Bunny."

Nelson became seated at a little table provided for him, and the Japanese butler dispensed drinks. Farra glanced at the figures on a sheet of paper presented to him and tossed the sheet back to the man who acted as his accountant.

"Well, I can't be bothered giving you a sales talk," he said to his two visitors in quite good English, but with a distinctly foreign accent. "Why should I? It's a simple proposition. This loan shark racket is getting too big for me, and I've got to have a couple of right guys to take over the Heights and the Harbour."

Reardon removed from thick lips an expensive cigar at which he had been puffing.

"Who's gonna run the policy game if I go in with you?" he asked.

"Who cares?" shrugged Farra.

"Listen, have you got any idea what my weekly take is up in Floral Heights alone?"

"I got a lot of ideas about everything," was the imperturbable reply. "I use that kind o' dough to buy cigars with."

NEXT WEEK'S BIG FILM DRAMA

SPENCER TRACY and FRANCHOT TONE

—IN—

"THEY GAVE HIM A GUN"

Two young men joined the Army at their country's call, became friends and played their part as heroes, but war has its aftermath and one of them, knowing now how to use a gun, became a gangster. A thrilling tale of human conflict.

"THE UNKNOWN RANGER"

Detailed to track down a band of horse-thieves, Bob Allen, a Texas Ranger, rides into Westville posing as a wandering cowpuncher, rescues a small boy from the hoofs of runaway horses, and obtains a job with the boy's father. He discovers that the rustling is done with the aid of a wild horse, but it is not till after many adventures that he gets his man. A fine Western, starring Bob Allen.

Also

Another grand episode of the serial:

"THE MOUNTIES ARE COMING"

Starring Bob Livingston.

"Twenty thousand dollars a week net to me personally, my friend!"

Farra laughed.

"Twenty thousand dollars a week? Oh, oh, that's your idea of dough, eh? Listen, boy, in every office building, in every dairy lunch place, in every post office, outside of every hospital, on the sidewalks down-town, wherever three or more suckers are, I've got a steerer. For every six blocks from the docks to the Heights I've got a collection office."

He paused to light a fresh cigar.

"Take to-day," he went on. "Not a good day, not a bad day—below ninety grand. Yesterday, eighty-eight. Tomorrow, maybe, a hundred and twenty. And it's a cinch of a proposition—one dollar interest for every five advanced."

"A month, eh?" suggested Bunny.

"No, not a month, eh?" mimicked Farra. "A week! Huh! One for five every seven days, and the sap still owes the five."

Reardon sat bolt upright.

"Let's get this straight," he said. "You loan, say, fifty dollars, and every week you get ten. That's interest, nothing to do with the fifty?"

"You catch on right away, don't you, sweetheart?" purred Farra.

"Yes, but people who need fifty bucks that bad," objected Bunny, "must find it mighty difficult to pay ten every week. That makes five hundred and twenty bucks a year on a fifty-dollar loan! Do they pay?"

"Certainly they pay," said Farra complacently. "We insist on it."

"I often think it's very tough on them," ventured Nelson, and his employer turned to scowl at him.

"Hi, in stir you had to mind your manners, didn't you?" he reproved. "Well, I've never been in gaol yet, so I do as I like without asking your advice."

Nelson flinched as though he had been struck and bowed his head.

"Suppose one of these guys gets tired of being bled?" said Reardon, rolling his cigar from one end of his mouth to the other.

"So what?" Farra spread his hands.

"And squawks to the law!"

"Yeah," chimed in Bunny, "what about that?"

"But they don't squawk," said Farra, quite calmly. "They're scared."

"But if they should squawk?" insisted Reardon.

Farra humped his broad shoulders again.

"Then one or two more of my collectors, maybe twice a year, gets pinched. We spring 'em when we can, and anyhow they don't squawk—they don't know anything except their own end of the job. Then we beat the ears off the wise guy who is gonna identify 'em. Once in a while one of the boys gets six months for assault, or usury, and that's too bad, eh?"

He waved his cigar as though dismissing so trivial a point.

"Now, listen, gentlemen," he said, "if you want to keep foolin' around with the poultry racket and this policy game it's okay by me. I need you, but not much, and I'm fed-up lookin' at your silly faces and answering your dopey questions. Now let's wind this thing up. Do you want to be in, or not?"

"Well, you can count me in," decided Reardon.

"Me, too, Farra," said Bunny.

On his way to the office, next morning, Eddie turned into Madison Avenue and proceeded along that thoroughfare to the Welch Building. The so-called "cigar counter" was actually a tobacconist's shop just inside the arcade, and the tobacconist was dealing with another customer when Eddie looked in at the doorway—a man in the uniform of a street-car driver who seemed nervous.

"Have you—I was to ask you about an envelope a party was to leave here for me," Eddie heard him say.

"What name?" asked the tobacconist, a tough and unpleasant-looking person.

"O'Halloran—Patrick," was the reply.

A printed form was placed on the counter and a fountain-pen was proffered.

"Sign here."

O'Halloran signed his name without even reading what was, in effect, a promissory note, and he was handed an envelope.

"You pay your interest here Fridays," said the tobacconist.

"Okay," nodded the driver. "Sure. Thanks."

He went off delightedly and the tobacconist eyed Eddie.

"What's yours?" he inquired.

"Oh, my name is Lang—Edward Lang. I was told that—"

"Check." A fresh form was laid on the counter. "Now you sign here, see? And every Saturday you pay here ten dollars."

Unlike the street-car driver, Eddie read the printed form. It was dated, in ink, August the 22nd, 1936, and it ran:

"For value received I promise to pay to the order of bearer, on demand, the sum of fifty dollars and no cents in lawful money of the United States."

"Hi, look," said Eddie, "this is worded kind of funny. It doesn't say anything about interest!"

The tobacconist did not look.

"I just act for the company, buddy, see?" he responded. "They only use my stand as a convenience. That guy who just went out signed okay. If you don't want the dough it's no skin off me, but make up your mind."

Eddie did not like the man's tone, and he did not like the form; but he wanted the money.

"Oh, well," he said, after a little hesitation, "it don't make any difference to me, seein' that I'm going to pay it all off in two weeks, anyway."

He signed the form, received an envelope, and hurried off to the office through streets that were already simmering with heat. But the heat did not seem nearly so oppressive to him that day; he had fifty extra dollars in his pocket, and the holiday at Pine Lake, Clarke County, was assured.

When he reached home in the evening, Mary had a little shopping to do, so he went with her, and they took the children as well. Snub-nosed little Bill gurgled in his pram, and Judy became excited when her father bought a sun-hat for her and put it on her head.

"Eddie, you shouldn't," protested Mary.

"Looks cute in it, doesn't she?" said Eddie.

"Yes, but she doesn't need it."

Eddie tweaked Judy's ear.

"That's what she thinks," he chuckled, "but we know better, don't we?"

Several other purchases he made, and Mary became more and more puzzled. But on the homeward way he explained matters.

"I can't hold out any longer, honey," he said. "We're pulling out for Pine Lake on Sunday morning. On the level!"

"Oh, Eddie!" she breathed delightedly. "But you didn't get your bonus ahead of time, did you?"

"No." He shook his head.

"Then how in the world—"

"Simple as one, two, three. There's an outfit that loans money to anybody with a steady job—anyone that's good for it."

"But what interest do they charge?" she asked anxiously.

"Oh, plenty, I guess—probably six per cent, or even ten. I didn't inquire, because it doesn't matter, honey. The week I go back to the office I get my bonus, and seventy-five dollars will cover the loan like a tent and plenty over."

"Oh, Eddie, I think you're wonderful!" she declared with enthusiasm. "I'd have just wanted and wanted and let it go at that, but you went out and got the money. Who told you about this loan company?"

"A guy I know, Al Anslie, works somewhere in the building. Oh, there are ways of getting things if you just know the angles."

"It seems like a dream!" Mary patted Judy on her sun-hat. "Do you know we're going to the country, and for a whole week, Judy?"

Farra Buys a Coat

THE holiday at Pine Lake proved a sheer delight from beginning to end. Up in the hilly region, where the vast lake is situated, the heat that afflicted New York City was tempered by cool breezes, and the camp itself fully justified its advertised description as a "vacation paradise."

But a nasty jar awaited Eddie's return to harness. On the Monday morning when he entered the general office of R. H. Morse, Incorporated, he found quite a number of his colleagues clustered round a notice-board on the wall, and their gloomy faces indicated all too clearly that they had found something unpleasant there.

"What's up?" inquired Eddie; and an indignant girl read aloud the notice which was fastened to the board:

"The management announces with regret that adverse conditions and unexpected reverses force it to omit the customary employes' dividend this year."

Eddie's consternation was beyond expression, but the others had plenty to say and the noise they made in saying it brought Bernard George Wilson out from his office with an angry face.

"Back to your desks, all of you!" he shouted. "The world hasn't come to an end! Back to your desks!"

All the discontented members of the staff drifted away to their duties with the exception of Eddie, and Eddie found his voice.

"You sure can keep a secret, Mr. Wilson," he said bitterly.

"What do you mean?" rapped the manager.

"Remember when I tried to horrow fifty dollars from you, and I said I'd get my bonus in a couple of weeks? You knew, then, that there wasn't going to be any bonus!"

"I wasn't at liberty to disens it at the time," returned Wilson stiffly.

"But let me remind you, Lang, that I prevented you from horrowing that money and getting into debt."

"Yeah," began Eddie miserably, "but I—"

"Back to your desk!"

"Yes, sir."

On the following Saturday afternoon Eddie paid a visit to the tobacconist in the arcade of the Welch building. He placed a two-dollar note on the counter and he said rather plaintively:

"Listen, I was expecting a bonus this week, see?"

"Don't give me a sob story, brother," snapped the tobacconist. "They only use my stand as a convenience."

The two-dollar note was flicked off the counter on to the floor, but Eddie picked it up and re-offered it.

"Now wait a minute, will you?" he said urgently. "Let me finish. Tell the loan company from me I can't pay ten a week. I'll give 'em two, see? That's the best I can do, and they can take it and like it."

"They won't like it, wise guy," warned the tobacconist curtly.

"Well, that's too bad," retorted Eddie; "but tell 'em that. Two dollars from Edward Lang from now on until I get that fifty paid up."

He left the note on the counter and went out to catch a subway train to the Bronx. But he was ill at ease. He had said nothing all the week to Mary about the notice on the office wall, and he knew well enough that there was an ominous threat behind the tobacconist's warning.

It was with a gloomy face and a complete lack of appetite that he sat down to a meal, and Mary asked him what was the matter.

"Oh, nothing, honey," he replied. "This is good soup."

"Might as well tell me."

He pushed back his chair, and little Judy immediately climbed on to his knees.

"We didn't get the bonus," he blurted.

"Oh, Eddie!" Mary exclaimed in dismay. "Oh, and that money you borrowed!"

"Yes, I know," he growled. "And they want me to pay ten a week."

"Ten dollars? Oh, honey, we couldn't!"

Judy drew attention to the fact that she had eaten all her beans, and clamoured for the "horseback ride" she had been promised, so for a while Eddie jiggled her up and down upon his knees.

"Two dollars is the most we can pay," said Mary.

"Will the budget stand two?" asked Eddie.

"Yes, if we cut down on food a little."

"I'm awfully sorry, honey."

"It wasn't your fault," she declared stoutly. "We'll get by."

"You're a great little woman," he said fervently; and then because his mind was considerably relieved he entered wholeheartedly into the "horseback ride" Judy so much enjoyed.

On the following Saturday when he visited the tobacconist's little shop, two men were standing by the counter. One of them was Whitehat, the other was a bruiser employed by the "company," named Scully, but Eddie did not know either of them.

"Yeah?" said the tobacconist.

"I'm Lang," said Eddie, "and I've come to pay the interest on that loan."

"Oh, yeah," nodded the tobacconist. "Edward Lang."

Eddie took out the pay envelope which contained his week's salary, and he was in the act of extracting a two-dollar note from it when it was snatched from his hand by Whitehat. The other man, who had a scarred face, seized hold of Eddie's arm and twisted it.

"Say, what is this, a stick-up?" howled Eddie. "You can't do that!"

"Take it easy," said Whitehat menacingly, and he emptied all his money out of the envelope. "Ten for this week and eight for last." He appropriated eighteen dollars and held out the rest. "Here's your change, buddy."

"But I told him last week I can't pay ten!" Eddie shouted.

"Keep it quiet," rasped Whitehat.

"Keep it quiet? Give me back that dough! I can't go home with nine bucks fifty. I've got a wife and two kids to feed."

"You borrowed fifty dollars, didn't you?" demanded the man with the scarred face.

"Yeah, but I thought—"

"Well, what you thought don't cut any ice," snarled Whitehat. "You borrowed fifty, and you know the rates."

"Yeah," admitted Eddie more quietly, "but ten a week! All I'm asking you to do is—"

The nine dollars fifty cents were rained into his coat pocket.

"Well, so-long, buddy," said Whitehat. "I'll see you next week."

He turned towards the door, and the man with the scarred face followed.

"Say, listen, you can't—" Eddie began hotly.

"Shut up!" the man with the scarred face whirled round, and with a sweep of his arm sent Eddie floundering against the counter.

Out at the kerb in Madison Avenue a long dark saloon was standing. The two men got into it, and by the time Eddie reached the pavement it had joined the up-town stream of traffic.

That evening the elegant drawing-room of Richard Farra's pent-house on the roof of the apartment house in Park Avenue became crowded at seven o'clock, by nearly thirty men employed by him in the loan shark racket he ran, and he addressed them collectively.

"I hear a lot about this being a big week," he said scornfully. "Big week my foot! We ain't had a big week yet—we're only just getting started. When this thing gets really rolling we'll have a big week all right."

"But listen, boss—" began one of his principal assistants.

"Shut up!" Farra stabbed the smoke-laden air with the cigar in his hand. "Ain't none of you got brains enough to know what you're in on? Think this over—not one sucker in ten ever pays a loan off. They have to sweat to keep up with the interest, let alone the principal. But you've got to keep the steerers on their toes, and if any of you mugs get picked up for drunk driving, assault, or carrying a gun and he's got a list of suckers on him, I'll let the police go over him, and he'll be sorry.

"When the police have done with him, my boys will go over and grease him good, and I mean good. Understand? You're not to beat up the suckers if you don't have to. Put it to them right and they'll pay. They're paying quicker and squawking less all the time the word gets round that it's smarter to come through quick and quiet."

He waved the cigar in dismissal.

"All right, now get out of here," he said.

Slowly the spacious drawing-room emptied, and then he walked into a smaller room that adjoined it and rang a bell.

"Také," he said to the Japanese butler who appeared with silent swiftness, "get in there and open up all the windows. That place stinks."

Five minutes later the butler re-entered the smaller room to find his master drinking a whisky-and-soda.

"The man with the coat, Mr. Farra," he announced in curiously clipped English.

A tubby little man with a big cardboard box under his arm sidled into the room, and Farra frowned at him.

"What's the idea, you dope?" he rapped. "I told you nine o'clock this morning."

"I'm sorry, Mr. Farra." The man, who was a furrier, opened the cardboard box upon a chesterfield and took out an elaborate fur coat, obviously intended for feminine wear, and wholly unsuitable for use in a heat-wave that was gradually declining. "I was putting in the figured-silk lining you wanted—all hand-sewn. Let me show you."

His arms were gripped in a fashion that threatened to break the bones in them, and he was forced backwards to the edge of the trench.

He held up the coat almost lovingly.

"It's a beautiful garment," he said. "If the lady doesn't like it," said Farra, "I'll shove it down your throat.

"Two grand, eh?"

"Yes, sir," nodded the furrier. "Two thousand dollars, and that's a special price I make for you, Mr. Farra."

"Special price?" scoffed the racketeer. "Don't kid me. I know all about this fur business, it's a racket."

While Farra was paying two thousand dollars for the fur coat, Eddie, in his own bed-room, was examining an overcoat which he proposed to take to a pawnbroker's.

"It's kind of worn round the edges," he said ruefully to Mary, "but they might give me a couple of bucks on it to carry us through the week."

Mary whisked a tweed coat, trimmed with cheap fur, from the wardrobe cupboard in front of which they were standing.

"Here, take mine," she said. "It won't be getting cold for a long time."

"No, honey," he protested.

"Don't be silly, take it!"

"Okay." He took the coat, but dropped it with his own upon the carpet and wandered over to the french window, biting his lip. "You know, I've a good mind to go to the police," he growled.

"What good would that do?" asked Mary. "You borrowed the money, and they'd only tell you that you had no business borrowing from an outfit like that."

She flung herself on the bed, and to his consternation she burst into tears.

"Oh, Eddie, what are we going to do?" she sobbed.

He turned away from the window and bent over her.

"Don't do that, darling," he pleaded. "Please don't cry. Gee, I feel terrible. It's all my fault. I got us into this."

She looked up at him with wet eyes. "No, I'm in it just as much as you are," she said. "You told me about it, and I thought it was wonderful."

"You sure picked a lemon when you picked me."

"Oh, Eddie!" She flung her arms round his neck. "I love you."

"They won't get away with it next week," he gritted. "I'm wise now. They'll get two bucks, and that's all they'll get."

A Visit to the Police

ON the Monday morning at the office Eddie had a word with Bill Seaver, who informed him that he had already paid in interest alone more than the amount originally advanced to him.

"What are you going to do?" asked Eddie.

"I'm going to tell them they can whistle for any more," Seaver declared.

"I wish I'd talked to you before they hooked me," lamented Eddie. "If they think they're going to get ten bucks a week out of me they're crazy."

"Most of the people they deal with are saps. If you stand up to them like I'm going to they won't get tough. They know they're illegal."

Saturday came, and when Eddie left the office he posted all his salary to Mary except two dollars. From the post-office in Broadway he went to the tobacconist's shop in the Welch Building, and he planked the two-dollar note on the counter with an air of defiance.

August 21st, 1937,

"That's all you can pay, eh?" challenged the tobacconist.

"Never mind if it's all I can pay," Eddie retorted. "It's all I'm going to pay."

"Okay, Mr. Lang," drawled the tobacconist, "it's up to you."

In the arcade Whitehat and another man were waiting, and they closed in on Eddie as he emerged from the shop, one on either side of him.

"Hi, what are you trying to do?" he stormed, trying to free himself from their grip. "Let go of me!"

"Easy, buddy," rapped Whitehat, "we just want to have a little talk with you."

The long dark saloon was standing at the kerb, and its rear door was opened by the man with the scarred face as Eddie was rushed towards it. He was bundled inside, and the other two followed. At the wheel was another member of the gang, and the engine was running. The car shot off up Madison Avenue.

"Say, what's the idea?" raged Eddie, grabbing at the handle of the door. "Let me out of here!"

"You don't want to get out while the car is going, buddy," jeered Whitehat. "You're liable to get hurt."

Eddie was jerked into a seat between two of the men, and one of them flourished in his face the printed form he had signed.

"Now listen, Lang," he said harshly, "we're only asking for what you signed this note to pay."

Eddie looked at the note, and he saw that above his signature these words had been added in ink:

"With interest at the rate of twenty per cent weekly."

"There was nothing in it about interest when I signed," he cried. "Twenty dollars interest weekly on a loan of fifty dollars. Why, that's robbery!"

"You signed the note, didn't you?" demanded Whitehat. "This is your name, isn't it?"

"Well, suppose it is. I didn't get my bonus, and I can't pay you ten bucks a week. I can only give you two, and you can't collect more."

"That's your story," scoffed the man with the scarred face. "You borrowed fifty bucks, sucker."

"Yeah, and I'll pay it back two dollars a week."

"Ten."

"Two," persisted Eddie hotly, "and if you try any more strong-arm stuff on me I'll turn you over to the cops."

They laughed derisively, and Whitehat said to the man at the wheel:

"Harry, stop by the Gates Street Station. Mr. Lang wants a policeman."

The saloon swept on up-town.

"You know, this is funny," Whitehat said with a chuckle that jarred on Eddie's nerves. "Your friend Seaver suggested the same thing."

"Yeah," chimed in the man who had displayed the altered note, "that's what Seaver said, but Seaver didn't go to the law, did you, Seaver?"

He reached over to the seat beside the driver and he jerked up from it the inanimate form of Bill Seaver, who had been huddled there out of sight. His mouth was open and streaming with blood, his eyes were closed and the flesh all round them was discoloured, and there was an ugly gash in his left cheek.

Eddie stared at his unconscious colleague with horror.

"Mr. Lang," said Whitehat in the smoothest of voices, "you'd better pay. You don't want nothin' to happen to you, or one o' those kids of yours, do you?"

Eddie was permitted to leave the saloon outside the police station in Gates Street and the saloon passed on along the street quite slowly. But Eddie did not enter the police station. Instead, he made his way to the nearest subway station and caught a train home.

Bill Seaver was at the office on Monday morning looking considerably the worse for wear, and Eddie talked to him about going to the police. But Bill Seaver seemed to have had all the fight knocked out of him and was frightened to do anything of the sort.

Eddie, however, was made of sterner stuff, and on his way home that evening he came to a decision which led him next morning to the police station of the fortieth precinct, in Ryer Avenue, where he told the desk sergeant the whole story.

"You don't know the name of any of these men?" asked the sergeant.

"No, sir," Eddie shook his head. "They just had 'for value received I promise to pay,' and that stuff about interest they wrote in after."

The sergeant gnawed the end of a pen with which he had made a few notes.

"The Welch Building is not in this precinct," he said. "That's downtown."

"Yes, sir, I know," nodded Eddie. "But I live in this precinct."

"That doesn't apply. What you have to do is to go to the station house down there in the fourteenth precinct.

They'll give you a couple of plain-clothes men who'll go with you on Saturday when you make this payment. Then they can pick up the cigar-store man and maybe these parties you claim rode you around in the car. The fourteenth precinct, that's in West Thirtieth Street."

Eddie thanked him.

"Gee," he said with a sigh of relief, "it sure is a load off my mind. The last couple o' weeks I've been kinda going nuts. But I can't go there now—I'll be late for work."

"Well, you'd better go round in your lunch-time," suggested the sergeant. "They'll give you all the protection you want down there."

Eddie worked that morning with a lighter heart than he had known since the day of his return from his holiday. He decided to have his lunch before he went to the police station, and he perched on a stool at the counter of the restaurant to save time.

Al Anslie found him there, devouring nothing more substantial than a roll and butter with a cup of coffee, and he climbed on to an adjoining stool.

"Haven't seen you for weeks," he said. "How have you been keeping yourself, old kid? Say, did you get fixed up with that dough all right?"

"I certainly got the fifty," said Eddie.

"Well, that's great. Have a bit of pastry; it's good."

Eddie shook his head, but a piece of pastry was ordered.

"Put it on my bill, George," Al Anslie said to the man behind the counter.

"Say, Al," Eddie ventured after a while, "how much do you know about that outfit that makes the loans?"

"Nothing," was the reply. "Why? Aren't they on the up and up?"

"Know what interest they charge?"

"Pretty steep, I guess. How much—ten per cent?"

"A thousand per cent. a year!" Al Anslie looked astounded.

"No kidding?"

"On the level," Eddie assured him.

"Ten dollars a week interest on a fifty-dollar loan!"

"Can they get away with that stuff?"

"If you don't pay they beat you up."

"Gee," exploded Al, "if I'd had any idea they were a bunch of crooks like that, why I—I— Gee, that certainly puts me in a bad spot, telling a friend of mine! Look, Eddie, you don't think I had any idea I was getting you into a mess like that?"

"Oh, I'm sure you didn't know what the outfit was like."

"Are you letting them get away with that ten-a-week stuff?"

"Not me!" gritted Eddie. "I've been to the police."

Al looked quite startled.

"Oh, you have, eh?" he exclaimed. "What did they say when you told 'em?"

"Well," explained Eddie, "I went to the station house up in our district, see, and the sergeant said I'd better go over to West Thirtieth, because that's the right precinct."

"Well, you're going, aren't you?"

Eddie looked at his watch.

"I'll have to leave it till after work, now," he said. "There isn't time enough."

"Well, I've certainly got to hand it to you for nerve. A lot of guys would be scared to go to the law."

"Oh, I was scared plenty," confessed Eddie.

Al insisted upon paying for the meagre luncheon. He said good-bye to Eddie at the door of the restaurant and then he dived into a telephone-box, close to it, and rang up the Aloha Social Club. He asked for Fats, the powerfully built fellow whose real name was Edwin Austin, and he conversed with him at some length.

Dismissed!

TOWARDS four o'clock in the afternoon, the clerk at the inquiry desk in the general office of R. H. Morse, Incorporated, called across to Eddie that he was wanted on the telephone, and Eddie went over to him, wonderingly, and took the instrument.

"Lang speaking," he said.

The voice that responded was strange to him, but it was the voice of Fats.

"This is your loan company talking, Mr. Lang," it said.

"Yeah?" snapped Eddie. "What can I do for you?"

"You can't do anything for us, Mr. Lang," was the significant reply.

"We're doing all right. But you can do something for your wife and kids, and if you don't want anything to happen to them don't go to the West Thirtieth Street Police Station like your friend the sergeant told you to do."

"I—I don't know what you're talking about," stammered Eddie.

"Okay, Mr. Lang, suit yourself. Go to West Thirtieth, but after you've been take another little walk down to the Emergency Hospital. You're liable to find someone you know down there!"

The line became dead, and Eddie replaced the telephone with a very shaky hand. An hour later he entered the manager's office with a sheet of paper in his hand.

"You asked for Tylor and Brown's July statement, Mr. Wilson," he said.

"Here it is. They still owe fourteen hundred dollars."

"All right." Wilson did not look up from a letter he was reading. "Put it down."

Eddie placed the statement on the desk, then coughed a little.

"There's something I want to ask you, Mr. Wilson," he said.

The letter was signed, and Wilson sat back in his chair with a frown on his face.

"Which reminds me, Lang," he said grimly, "that I've been meaning to speak to you. Your work's going downhill lately. Too much day-dreaming, I fancy."

"Oh, I'm sorry about that, sir."

Eddie swallowed what seemed to be a lump in his throat. "I—I'll try to watch it. What I—er—wanted to ask you was, could I have an advance on my salary?"

"Again?" barked Wilson. "Out of the question!"

"Oh, but this is an emergency, Mr. Wilson."

"You asked for an advance before your vacation, didn't you?"

"Yes, sir."

"I think you and your wife should have a frank talk about finances—work out an ironclad budget and never depart from it. You know, sometimes it's difficult for a woman to understand that there is just so much coming in and no more."

Eddie could not bear to hear Mary blamed so unjustly.

"But this isn't my wife's fault, Mr. Wilson," he said, with a warmth that caused the manager to blink. "There's nothing extravagant about her—or stupid, either!"

"I'm sorry, Lang, but there's nothing further the office can do." Wilson waved a hand in the direction of the door. "And I'd prefer that you didn't ask me again," he added.

Eddie was still hard at work at his desk, that evening, when the other clerks went off. He had got into arrears with the bills and manifests, since his holiday, as a result of worrying about the loan, and he was determined to catch up with those arrears.

Wilson, one of the last to leave the office, glanced across at him with approval on his way out; it seemed to the manager that his words had not been wasted.

At half-past seven, just before the cleaners were due to invade the rooms on that floor, Eddie put away books and papers, and reached up to a peg for his hat. It was then that temptation suddenly assailed him. He looked across at the desk of the clerk who had charge of the petty cash, and found himself walking over to it almost involuntarily.

The desk was unlocked and so was the cash-box inside it. He took ten dollars from the box and slipped them into his pocket; and then, with a horrible feeling of guilt, he switched off the lights and hurried away to catch a train.

Mary was crooning snub-nosed little Bill to sleep in his crib when he got home and tiptoed into the bed-room.

"Hallo, honey," she said, looking up from the crib, "what kept you?"

"I've been working," he replied.

The baby slumbered, and they crept away into the sitting-room.

"I've got a surprise," announced Mary. "Mrs. Barstow, downstairs, said she'd take care of the kids to-night."

Eddie, far from being pleased, became alarmed.

"Why should she take care of the kids?" he demanded. "What is this?"

"Eddie, don't snap at me like that!" she exclaimed, staring at him. "I was going to tell you. There's a band concert at the park to-night, and I thought—"

"You go along, honey," interrupted Eddie, afraid of what might happen if the children were left in the flat.

"Oh, no, I wouldn't do that!" she demurred, and sat beside him on the chesterfield. "What's the matter, sweetheart?"

"Nothing," said Eddie wearily, "nothing's the matter, darling. Just because I don't want to go to a band concert you needn't think something's the matter. Just tired, that's all."

So neither of them went to the band concert in the park. They went to bed early, instead. But Eddie could not sleep, although the night was comparatively cool; and he set off for the office in the morning tired-eyed and nervy.

He was so nervy that when one of the girl clerks sailed over to him with an open box of chocolates in her hand and tapped him on the back he jumped as though he had been shot.

Suddenly the light of an electric torch blazed in Eddie's face, and he raised his left arm defensively, clutching his right fist.

"What's the idea of sneaking up behind me and poking me when I'm working?" he rapped at her. "What do you want?"

"Well, you don't have to be so crabby about it," bridled the girl. "Stella's boy friend gave me a box of candy, last night, and I came over to see if you'd like some—sour puss!"

She went off with her head in the air to another clerk at another desk, and for more than ten minutes Eddie sat biting his lip and waging a battle with his conscience. Then, abruptly, he rose and went straight to the manager's room and burst into it in a fashion that caused its occupant to gape at him.

"Mr. Wilson," he blurted, "I stole some money from the firm!"

"You've what?" howled the manager.

"I stole some money from the company."

"How much? When?"

"Ten dollars from the petty-cash account." Eddie dropped a ten-dollar note on the blotting-pad. "It's been driving me crazy! It was last night."

For nearly a minute there was silence in the room; a painful silence, during which Wilson gnawed a finger-nail and scowled at an offensive inkpot.

"I'm sorry you did that, Lang," he said, and there was a real note of regret in his voice. "You've been with the company a long time. Why did you do it?"

"I had to have it," Eddie replied hoarsely.

"Why?"

"To pay back a loan. Are you going to prosecute, sir?"

"No." Wilson shook his head. "That wouldn't serve any good purpose."

"Thanks."

"You wouldn't have come in here and told me if you hadn't regretted it. But I'll have to let you go."

Eddie moistened his lips with his tongue.

"Yes, sir."

"I'm sorry about it, Lang. I—oh, well, I'm not going to preach to you—you know what you've done! I would have trusted you before anybody else here. You can tell them outside that you're leaving because we're cutting down the staff. Good-bye, Lang."

"Good-bye, Mr. Wilson."

Eddie went back to his desk with a heart of lead, did what had to be done in the matter of putting away books and papers, said good-bye to his colleagues, and went home.

He told Mary everything.

"So now you know, Mary," he said miserably when he had finished, "and if you haven't any use for me after what I've done I don't blame you."

"Oh, Eddie, don't say that!" she cried, and flung her arms round his neck. "You've gone through this whole thing all alone! You could have told me, dear."

"Yes, I could have told you," he growled. "I was a coward."

"No, not a coward," she corrected. "You don't know how to be a coward. Oh, if we could only get away from here! Eddie, let's move!"

"How?"

"Well, the rent's up on Saturday, and I've got eleven dollars saved from the housekeeping money. I've been keeping it for—well, for a time when—when we just had to have it—you know, in ease you took sick."

She let go of him and crossed the sitting-room to an easy-chair, and she pulled up the cushion and thrust a hand down into the lining of the chair, a hiding-place from which she produced eleven dollars in an envelope.

August 21st, 1937.

"If you'd had that," she said, "you needn't—"

"Don't!" he pleaded.

"Oh, I'm sorry, Eddie!" She gave him a kiss, and she gave him the eleven dollars. "If we could get out of here they could never find you. We could start new. You could get a job, and you're good at your work."

"How did a mug like me ever find a swell girl like you?" he said humbly.

A Brutal Attack

ON a sunny but pleasantly cool day, about three weeks after Eddie had left the firm of R. H. Morse, Incorporated, Richard Farra walked out from the Aloha Social Club in company with Bunny and one of the men who had bundled Eddie into the car in Madison Avenue—a man dubbed "Fancyface."

A black sedan was standing at the kerb, and a golden-haired girl was looking out from it, a petulant expression on her pretty but hard-featured face. She was expensively dressed, and she was wearing the fur coat Farra had bought for two thousand dollars in the middle of a heat-wave.

"Well, for crying out loud!" she exclaimed as Farra and his companions crossed the pavement. "You sure took your time!"

"I'm sorry, sweetheart." Farra turned to the tall lean Bunny. "Now remember what I said about letting too many get away from you. It's becoming so that we lose about fifty of them a week. Why?"

"Well," complained Bunny, "they move."

"Oh, they move?" drawled Farra. "That's sure smart of them, eh? That takes brains! Well, listen, brain-trust, I've given you some angles on getting the new addresses, and I want 'em got—understand?"

"Okay, Farra," nodded Bunny.

A streamlined car with a cream-coloured body and black wings had just drawn up some way in front of the sedan. It was very obviously brand new, and it bore red number plates. The blonde girl leaned out of the window and pointed excitedly to it.

"Look, Ricky, look!" she cried. "That's a kind of cute car!"

Farra bestowed an appraising glance upon the vehicle.

"You like that car, eh?" he inquired.

"Sure," she replied emphatically. "I'd look good in a cream-coloured car. It would match my hair!"

Farra grinned and pointed a finger for the benefit of the rather good-looking fellow he called Fancyface.

"Get that guy with the cream-coloured car," he directed.

Fancyface dashed along the pavement.

"Is this for sale?" he shouted to the man at the wheel of the streamlined car.

"Sure," was the reply. "You interested?"

"Boss wants to see it. Back up a bit, will you?"

The man at the wheel was a dealer on his way back to his own premises from those of a prospective client. He complied with alacrity, and the golden-haired girl descended to gaze with Farra at the strikingly handsome vehicle.

"You still like the colour, sweetheart, eh?" asked Farra indulgently.

"Love it!" she answered; and then the dealer stood beside them.

"You like this particular car, sir?" he inquired. "We have a number of other beautiful body designs this year, eight cylinder 'V'-type motor, guaranteed to do ninety miles an hour—"

"Shut up, will you, pal?" interrupted Farra. "I know the routine. The lady thinks this car is cute, and she's pretty cute herself. What she wants she gets mostly. Okay, I'll take it!"

"Right now, sir?" The dealer was astonished.

"Yeah, not to-morrow, or next week," Farra informed him. "To-day, this car. How much for cash?"

"Two thousand seven hundred—with tax."

"With tax?" snorted Farra. "Say, what's the matter with this country? They'll tax me out of business one of these days! Okay, Fancyface, get my bags and put 'em in this car."

The motor dealer gulped.

"But the registration and plates, sir?" he protested.

"Well, I'll use these plates this weekend. Don't worry, you'll get 'em back again."

The car was paid for and Bunny was instructed to attend to the minor details of the impulsive purchase. Farra took the wheel and the golden-haired girl seated herself beside him.

"Hi, boss, what d'you want me to do with the other car?" asked Fancyface, after he had transferred the luggage. "Drive it around to your place?"

"No," Farra replied with a wave of his hand. "I tell you what I want you to do with the other car, sweetheart. I'm gonna give it to you."

"Give it to me?" gasped the henchman.

"Yes. I think you'd look good in that car—it kinda matches your hair!"

An extraordinary man, Richard Farra, full of sudden whims and extravagances, but entirely merciless with the victims of the loan-shark racket he ran. He had told his lieutenants of various means of tracking down defaulters, and one of the defaulters was Eddie, who had obtained a job through the United States Works Progress Administration—usually known as the "W.P.A."—and had moved with his family from Everett Place to a wooden cabin in a whole colony of cabins up in Yonkers, where a lot of road work was in progress.

Eddie said to Mary, as he was setting out for a day of hard manual labour the morning after Farra had acquired the cream-coloured car:

"Well, I'd better be going, or Uncle Sam will fire me. We're laying some pipes over on North Tenth Street, and if anyone should ask you, Mrs. Lang, old W.P.A. is certainly getting its money's worth out of me!"

He was wearing corduroys and a shirt open at the neck, and his hands had become calloused, but he was in fine condition.

"I like this place, Eddie," said Mary.

"And the garden," put in little Judy, to whom a garden was a novelty.

"Oh, sure!" nodded Eddie, "this place is all right, and anyway we've shaken off those—"

"Now you promised!" warned Mary.

"Right," said Eddie; and he went off to work quite happily.

But that morning Fats went to the New York headquarters of the Works Progress Administration, and to the elderly clerk in charge of the files he told a feasible story inspired by Farra.

"Well, there you are, sir," said the clerk, conducting his visitor to a row of tall filing-cabinets. "These are the relief rolls from September the fifteenth to date. These files are open to the public."

"Thanks a lot," said Fats. "You see, we can't close these estates until we locate the heirs."

Mary squeezed between the two detectives with a bag full of groceries in one arm. Her right hand went to her throat, and she screamed.

"Are the inheritances large?" asked the clerk.

"No, a couple of hundred dollars, mostly," Fats glibly replied, "some smaller. But I guess any of these people would be glad of a little legacy like that."

"They certainly would," avowed the clerk, "and I hope you find some of them. Well, take your time with the files."

Fats took his time with the files, and on some of the cards in some of the drawers he found the names of borrowers who had disappeared—and their new addresses. One of the cards bore Eddie's name.

That evening, just as it was growing dusk, Eddie climbed up out of a trench in North Tenth Street, Yonkers, and stooped to tie a shoe-lace before following his fellow-workers to the time-keeper's shed nearly half a mile away.

He had not noticed a black sedan that had crept along the newly made road some time before; but Whitehat and Fancyface had been watching him from the sedan, and they were on him as he straightened his back.

His arms were gripped in a fashion that threatened to break the bones in them, and he was forced backwards to the edge of the trench and sent crashing to the bottom of it.

The back of his head came into violent contact with one of the pipes he had been helping to lay, and he was already unconscious when the two scrambled down to him; but they kicked and punched him till his body was a mass of bruises.

It was after nine o'clock, and the road was in darkness, when a night watchman, who was lighting red lamps along the side of the trench, heard groans from the bottom of it. He descended with his lantern, and he found Eddie.

An hour later Eddie was sitting up in bed in a ward of the Emergency Hospital, Yonkers, with a bandage round his head, talking to a big and full-faced plain-clothes man named Martin. His body was aching all over, but his head was clear in spite of pain.

"So we moved from Everett Place last month," he said. "and I thought I'd lost them, see? Hi, listen, I wonder if they 'phoned my wife? This is her birthday! I asked the nurse to 'phone her and tell her I might have to work late. Gee, I hope—"

"All right, buddy, now don't worry," interrupted Martin. "We 'phoned your wife all right. Let's get on with the story. You never saw these men again until to-day?"

"No." Eddie settled down again. "I was just going home from work when the two of them—they were in a car, too, that time when they showed me Bill Seaver—they came up behind me and—Gee, my head!"

"All right, Lang." The plain-clothes man put away a notebook and rose from the chair beside the bed. "Now you get yourself some rest and when we've got your statement typed you read it. If it's okay, you'll sign it, eh?"

"Sure I'll sign it," declared Eddie. "But will you find out for certain whether somebody 'phoned my wife? She'll be worried sick if I don't come home."

"I'll do that."

Martin went out from the ward, and a colleague who had not uttered a word went with him. But the colleague was Martin's senior, and it was he who telephoned from the office to police headquarters in New York City.

"Let me talk to Captain Hall, please," he said. "Oh, captain, this is Gregg."

Captain Hall, a massive man with greying brown hair and a pair of very shrewd blue eyes, was at his desk in his own room.

"What's on your mind, Gregg?" he asked in a voice that was both deep and pleasant.

"I'm calling from the Emergency Hospital, Yonkers," the plain-clothes man responded. "This assault case you sent Martin and me up here for—Edward Lang, the W.P.A. worker who was picked up on Tenth Street. Well, it's a lean-shark beating."

"I see." Captain Hall made a grimace. "The usual story, I suppose—he doesn't remember anything?"

"On the contrary," rejoiced Gregg, "he's just made a statement giving names, place, and times. I think for once we've got a guy with nerve enough to talk!"

"That's fine," boomed the captain. "I'll call up the District Attorney at his house."

With an air of satisfaction that equalled—if indeed it did not exceed—the satisfaction of his subordinate, Captain Hall rang up the District Attorney, a stocky little man with rather an Irish type of face, a mop of untidy brown hair, and a pair of brown eyes that gave life to the rest of his rather impassive face.

Morgan Curtis was his name, and he listened with suppressed excitement to what the captain had to tell him.

"Keep him at the hospital till I get there," he said. "I'll be along just as quickly as I can."

The Line-up

WHILE Martin and Gregg waited at Eddie's bedside for the arrival of the District Attorney, Martin gave voice to his anxiety.

"You're sure you won't go back on this statement when the D.A. gets here?" he inquired, waving a type-written sheet of paper.

"What d'you mean by go back on it?" challenged Eddie. "Why should I do that? It's the truth! Sav, listen, I may look kind of silly in this trick nightgown and this bandage, but I know what I'm doing, and I know what can happen."

"All right, buddy, I'm sold," said Martin with a very broad grin. "Just so long as you know what you're doing."

The District Attorney arrived, read the statement, and asked many questions of Eddie—who was up and dressed by then, and feeling a lot more like himself.

"About this Al Anslie," he said. "Didn't it ever occur to you that Al was a steerer—that he was working for these racketeers?"

"No, sir," confessed Eddie, and for the first time considered that possibility. "Al had a job, I understood, but, come to think of it, I never knew where. Oh, and I—I spilled everything to him. What a sap!"

"You're no sap," Curtis assured him. "All the banks and all the legitimate loan agencies have been trying to stamp out this racket. My office has been investigating the loan sharks for two years. I've personally interviewed five hundred victims—and you are the first man who has ever had the nerve to come through with a definite statement."

"Well, I don't know anything about that, sir," said Eddie, "but I've been scared plenty. I'm still scared."

"Well, you've agreed to make these identifications I've suggested—and that takes courage."

Eddie reached out to a glass of water standing on a table beside him and took a long drink.

"This is the way I look at it, sir," he said then. "Suppose we move again. Suppose I backed down and ran away. They'd find me. And every time my wife was ten minutes late coming home from anywhere I'd get cold inside. I'd be watching the kids all the time. After what happened to me today, why, I—I'd be always looking over my shoulder. Where's the sense of going on like that?"

"Suppose I give you the money to pay off your debt?"

The two plain-clothes men who were in the room looked at one another in dismay; but Eddie instantly shook his head—and winced because it hurt.

"No," he said definitely. "In a way, I'd be lining up with them by paying off and keeping quiet. No, I'll go through with it, sir. I want to do everything I can to put them out of business."

"Mr. Lang," said Curtis, "will you do me a favour?"

"Sure," replied Eddie.

"I've been around for a long time. I've been a criminal lawyer and a politician. I don't rate my fellow-citizens very high—there are some days when I'd give you the whole human race for a dime—yes, and give you nine cents change. If you don't mind, I'd like to shake your hand."

Eddie gripped the hand that was held out to him. He thought the District Attorney was a fine fellow; but he didn't like the District Attorney's next remark, which was:

"You're going to be our star boarder down at the gaol until Friday."

"The gaol?" he echoed in a horrified voice.

"They'll see that you're comfortable. I want you where we can find you when we need you."

"Oh, but Mr. Curtis, do I have to go? You see, I—I've got a family at home."

"We're taking care of them."

"Yes, but I think I ought to be there, too." He nearly mentioned the fact that it was Mary's birthday, but thought that might sound a poor argument. "I'll be at your office on Friday all right, but I—I think I ought to go home."

"All right, just as you say," returned Curtis. "So-long, Eddie."

Eddie went home in a squad car, and Martin and Gregg went with him. There were only three rooms in the little cabin, and the detectives proposed to occupy one of them, so they shifted the bed into the kitchen. Eddie wanted to help, but Mary made him go and sit down.

"Sorry there isn't an extra bed for you," she said to the plain-clothes men after the rearrangement had been completed.

"That's all right, Mrs. Lang," Gregg informed her cheerfully. "We've got a couple o' chairs in there—and Marty has a detective magazine. He likes to read about detectives in stories, then he looks in the glass, and does he feel embarrassed?"

"Come on," snorted Martin, "get out of here! Good-night."

"Good-night, fellows," said Eddie, "and thanks a lot."

Mary said good-night, and the two retired to the bedless bed-room. Mary immediately went over to her husband, who was sitting at the kitchen table close to an open window.

"Let me look at you, Eddie," she said anxiously. "I haven't seen you alone. Was it awful, honey? Did they hurt you very badly?"

"Well, it wasn't so good," he returned wryly, "but I'm okay now. Thanks for sending along my clothes—I had to make 'em take the handage off so I could wear the hat! Is Judy all right? I kinda thought she might wake up with all this noise."

"You hoped she would!" accused Mary.

"Aren't you going to take Bill up?"

Mary shook her head. Judy and little Bill were fast asleep in the third room, Judy in a bed, Bill in his crib.

"You know Bill always sleeps right through the night, Eddie," she said, studying his worried face. "Why are you so anxious to have the kids wake up?"

"Well, you see, I didn't talk to them to-night," he replied lamely, "and I like 'em."

She was not deceived. "Even with those two men in the next room," she said, "you're still afraid something's going to happen."

"What could hap—" He rose abruptly and thrust his head out at the open window because he had heard footsteps in the tiny garden.

"What is it?" she asked in alarm.

"What's the matter?" she asked of the answering, Eddie made for the back door and went out into the darkness, stumbling along a path he could not see.

Suddenly the light of an electric torch blazed in his face, and he raised his left arm defensively, clenching his right fist. But it was only the night-watchman from the newly made road who was holding the torch, and the night-watchman had deserted his job to inquire after Eddie.

"Well, I'm not much better for seeing you!" exclaimed the overwrought young man. "I thought it was one of those crooks!"

That night Captain Hall issued instructions to all the plain-clothes men under him, and next day there was considerable police activity in the city. The tobacconist in the arcade of the Welch Building was one of the first to be arrested, but Fats was caught very soon afterwards.

Al Anslie was playing snooker in the Aloha Social Club when its premises were invaded by half a dozen officers, but the detective who caught hold of his arm did not address him as Anslie. He said grimly:

"Come on, Johnson!"

"What's this, Lefty?" demanded Al indignantly. "You ain't got nothing on me!"

"D'you want the bracelets on?" inquired his captor.

"No, I'll go quiet," growled Al. "but I ain't done nothing. Say, are you guys gonna bound me till I'm eighty just because I did time five years back?"

"Shut up, sweetheart, will you?" snapped the detective. "Come on, we've got a date with the D.A."

Throughout that day every man with a record who could be found was taken down to headquarters and detained, and next morning nearly fifty men were marched out from the cells in which they had spent the night.

Fats turned on one of the guards in a fury.

"If you think some tin-horn flatfoot can pick me up on a vagrancy charge, hold me overnight, and give me no chance to talk to my lawyer—" he began.

"You were given a chance to use the 'phone, brother," interrupted the guard.

"A fine chance!" roared Fats. "The 'phone wouldn't work!"

"Can I help it if your friends don't want to talk to you?" jibed the guard. "Right face, forward march!"

The day was Friday, and Eddie was with Morgan Curtis in a big bleak room at police headquarters, sitting in comparative darkness with a long and narrow platform some twenty feet away in front of them. The arrested men were about to be subjected to an identity parade, or "line-up."

"Now, you won't see all of them," said Curtis, "that's too much to hope for. I've picked up most of those who have police records—got 'em for vagrancy, carrying weapons, failure to report to the parole board, reckless driving, illegal parking, and anything else we could think of, but I can't hold them beyond to-day. Take your time and make sure, because I'm counting on you."

"I couldn't forget one of them," declared Eddie.

Curtis pointed to the narrow platform, floodlighted from above and below by powerful arc lamps. Behind it was a white background, measured off with vertical and horizontal lines, and at each end of it were steps.

"They'll stand under those floodlights," he explained. "You'll be able to see them, but they won't be able to see you."

Several policemen were standing in the room, silhouetted against the lights. The District Attorney called across to one who was near a door of steel bars, and the door was opened and five men were marched into the room and made to ascend the platform.

"Stand between those vertical lines," directed a sergeant brusquely. "Take your hands out of your pockets!"

"I don't know any of those fellows," whispered Eddie.

The five men were marched away at the command of the District Attorney, and five others took their place on the platform.

"Face front!" barked the sergeant. "Take your hats off!"

Eddie drew a long breath.

"That's Al Anslie in the centre," he whispered, and pointed a finger. "That man on the left there is the tobacconist. I don't know the others."

The identity parade continued, but Eddie failed to recognise any of the other men except the one with the scarred face, and Fats was released with the rest of the unrecognised and went off to report to Farra at his penthouse.

Reardon was with Farra, and Farra was lying on a table in a room fitted up as a gymnasium, being pommelled and kneaded by a stalwart masseur.

"They got ten boys from my club," Fats informed a broad, bare back, "and they got the cigar-counter man with a book on him. They got me, and I'd

(Continued on page 26)

It was not for vengeance alone that the masked rider struck at Jason Burr's sinister organisation. He was out to smash a tyrant's ambition to build an empire beyond the Rockies. A thrill-packed serial of the early West, when California was a pawn on the chess-board of a scheming nation, starring Bob Livingston

Read This First

The year is 1844 and the scene California, then a province of Mexico. But gold had been discovered by a powerful despot known as General Jason Burr, who conceives the idea of establishing a dictatorship with the aid of Imperial Russia.

The Russian Ambassador, Count Raspinoff, exerts his influence to supply Burr with ex-soldier colonists from the Tsar's army. These, together with the men already under Burr's command, form the nucleus of a force whereby the would-be dictator plans to seize control of the country.

Gold is the mainstay of Burr's ambitions, and he has opened a secret mine which he worked by captive labour. But the land on which it is situated is the property of a family named Loring, and the Lorings proving troublesome the father and the younger son are murdered.

Burr, however, has reckoned without Don Loring, the elder son of the family, who returns from U.S. territory for the purpose of exacting vengeance.

Under the alias of the Eagle, Don harasses Jason Burr with the aid of two Yankee frontiersmen known as Salvation and Whipsaw, and a priest named Father Jose. Then, gaining the interior of Burr's headquarters, he finds the plotter is holding as captives Doris Colton and her father, a mining engineer.

Discovering Burr's plan to seize California, Don organises a band of Vigilantes to combat him. Later, while the Vigilantes are besieged in their rendezvous, he learns that gunpowder is to be used to blast them out of existence.

Don, Whipsaw and Salvation intercept Burr's powder wagon, but during a fight with a Russian, Don is knocked senseless in the vehicle as it rolls off the road into a deep gulch.

EPISODE 7— "Wings of Doom"

Now Read On

The Eagle's Horse

THE wagon, with its deadly freight, was hurtling down the declivity at a racking pace, and at the foot of the slope were those tumbled boulders against which it must dash itself with an impact that would explode the powder barrels.

To Petroff, who had leapt clear a few second before, it seemed that the career of the Eagle was fast drawing to a close.

Yet even while the Russian was gloating over that prospect Don Loring was collecting his wits and struggling to his knees on the floor of the runaway prairie schooner.

The young Californian realised his danger in an instant, and, serambling between the jolting kegs of gunpowder, he reached the driving seat of the wagon. Then he flung himself from the vehicle, hit the ground with a force that knocked the breath out of him, rolled through the scrub for a few yards and finally managed to check his descent by clutching at the twigs and foliage of a hardy shrub.

The wagon sped onward down the slope, and half a minute later it smashed into the rocks that littered the bed of the gulch; and in the very moment of impact the explosives which it contained went up with an ear-splitting roar.

A vivid blotch of flame sprang high into the air, and shattered fragments of timber were hurled in all directions. Debris fell around the spot where Don had come to rest, and a spreading pall of smoke came rolling aloft to envelop him. But by the time the fumes had drifted away the young ranch-owner was straightening up unharmed.

Away above him Petroff gave vent to an oath as he saw the masked, black-clad figure of the Eagle rising from the ground, and he cursed the fact that he no longer possessed his revolver, which he had lost during the scuffle in the wagon.

Without the weapon the Russian was not prepared to tackle Don, for he was fully aware that if the Californian had not struck his head in falling when the prairie schooner had lurched over the rim of the embankment he, Petroff, would never have been able to subdue so stalwart an antagonist.

Besides, Whipsaw and Salvation were up on the trail, and although the bigger of the two frontiersmen had been wounded, his diminutive companion was no mean foe.

Petroff therefore made himself scarce, and he had disappeared from view when Don Loring ultimately gained the summit of the slope to rejoin his friends.

Salvation was lying on the ground, clasping a blood-stained shoulder and swearing with the pain of his wound. Whipsaw was straddling the chest of the wagoner who had been dragged from the prairie schooner before its team of mules had been unhitched and the vehicle propelled towards the roadside.

The little fellow was belabouring his man with his fists, and he launched a blow that robbed Burr's hireling of his senses just as Don stumbled across to Salvation.

Whipsaw retreated from the prone figure of his victim then and lent the Californian a hand as the latter was helping Salvation to stand up.

"We've got to get out of here," Don said. "Whipsaw, you ride double with Salvation on that sorrel of his. I'll take care of your mustang."

"Doggone it, I'll do my own ridin'," Salvation broke in. "I ain't no baby."

He made that declaration gamely, but his appearance belied his words, and Don knew full well that the wounded man would never be able to stay in the saddle without support. Consequently, he insisted upon Whipsaw mounting behind him, and when the two frontiersmen had climbed astride the bigger man's brone Don swung himself on to his own pony and took Whipsaw's riderless mustang by the rein.

They started out in the direction of San Antonio, but had not gone far when they saw the escort of the destroyed powder-wagon burst clear of the thickets into which they had been lured.

The bellow of the explosion had fetched them back towards the trail, and as they gained the spot where they had last seen the heavy-laden prairie schooner, Petroff appeared as if from nowhere. Then, with the hetman in the lead, the whole party charged in pursuit of Don and his companions.

The Californian and the two Yankee frontiersmen were now approaching a tract of forest-land, and on entering the trees Don spoke to Whipsaw in an urgent voice.

"We'll never keep ahead of those Russians with Salvation in this condition," he said. "Look, you get him to Father Joso's chapel in San Antonio, where he can have the attention he needs. I'll lead Petroff and his crew off on a false scent, and join you later when I've given them the slip."

Whipsaw was loath to have Don take the risk of capture while he escaped scot-free. But he knew the futility of arguing with the young rancher, and into the bargain Salvation seemed to be on the verge of fainting. In consequence, the little frontiersman fell in with Don's arrangement, and presently he and his comrade had vanished amid the gloomy depths of the woods.

As for Don, he turned off to the north, keeping just within the fringe of the trees so that Petroff and his men gained an impression of his white horse streaking through the shadows of the forest.

Don had no means of knowing whether they could see that he had separated from his companions. The fact remained that they took up his trail in a hody, every mother's son of them intent on running to earth the masked rider who had proved such a thorn in Jason Burr's side, and with the whole band spurring after him Don congratulated himself on having drawn them away from Whipsaw and Salvation.

The Californian was still in charge of Whipsaw's mustang, which was pounding along beside his own brone, and for something like a quarter of an hour he had no difficulty in keeping well in front of his enemies. Then his pony began to lose ground, a circumstance not surprising, since it had been pretty hard-worked the night before and had not obtained much rest.

Don realised that to stay on its back would be fatal, and skirting a tangle of brushwood that grew amongst the tree-stems, he disengaged his feet from his gelding's stirrups and switched horses while momentarily hidden from the sight of his pursuers.

Transferring himself lithely to the mustang that had belonged to Whipsaw, he drove his own brone onward and then took cover amid the brushwood, and he was effectively concealed there when Petroff and the Cossacks rounded the mass of vegetation.

They caught a flash of the white pony Don had abandoned, but they were unable to tell that it was no longer carrying its master, and they pressed on determinedly, flailing their mounts and goading them with the spur. And shortly after they had gone by, the man whom they knew as the Eagle calmly emerged from his hiding-place and struck eastwards through the forest with the object of picking up the San Antonio trail.

Meanwhile, the cream-white gelding with which he had parted company was drumming its way towards the north, and, its saddle empty, it seemed to take on a new lease of life, so that it kept ahead of Petroff and his men for another mile or two—a dim-seen form galloping through the close-ranked trees like a tantalising will-o'-the-wisp that they could not overtake.

They caught up with it at last, however, and it was only then that they discovered they had been fooled. It was only then that they realised to their chagrin they had been chasing a riderless brone.

At what point during the pursuit had the Eagle left the gelding's saddle? This was a question which none of the Russians could answer, and it was all too clear that it would be futile to attempt picking up his trail now. Yet, in the midst of his disappointment at the masked rider's escape, Petroff hit upon a crafty scheme.

"We've lost the Eagle," he said, "but I think this horse of his is going to come in handy. Bring him along."

One of the Cossacks took charge of the gelding, and a moment afterwards Petroff was wheeling to lead the way across country in a southerly direction, his objective being the canyada which the main body of his troops were besieging.

He called a halt before he was actually in sight of the Vigilantes' hide-out, and, bidding his companions remain where they were, rode on alone.

As he advanced the sound of rifle and revolver fire reached his ears, and a little later he came in view of the position occupied by his squadron. Then he espied the artillery-piece that had been dispatched from Burr's stronghold the previous night.

It had been so placed that it commanded the ravine in which the Vigilantes were ensconced, and a group of gunners were assembled beside it.

Petroff cantered up to these men, and one of them saluted him.

"We're all ready to open the bombardment, sir," the fellow reported. "Is the powder on its way?"

"There will be no powder," the hetman answered gruffly, "and therefore there will be no bombardment. Get the field-piece hitched to its limber and prepare for retreat. We're moving out."

His instructions were carried out stoically, and in the meanwhile Petroff summoned the squads of carabineers who were lying amongst the scrub; and ere long the whole of the besieging force had mounted and was riding off in column, the field-gun bringing up the rear behind a team of plodding mules.

The departure of the Cossacks who had invested the canyada all through the night was greeted by a rousing cheer on the part of the Vigilantes. But that loud huzza, with its resounding note of triumph, only produced a sinister expression of crafty amusement on the features of Petroff.

Swinging along at the head of the squadron, he had soon rejoined the smaller party, who had been concerned in the fruitless pursuit of the Eagle. Then he led the entire column north under cover of a ridge that lay between them and the Vigilantes' hide-out, and finally he drew rein on a beaten track that was flanked by clusters of great boulders.

"Bring that gelding to me," he called out to the man who was in charge of the Eagle's pony.

The horse was fetched to his side, and, taking pencil and paper, Petroff carefully printed a message and pinned it to the brone's saddle. It was a message purporting to be from the Eagle, and that was the reason why the hetman had used printed lettering, fearing that the Vigilantes might be familiar with their leader's normal handwriting.

"Am hiding out in Stony Gulch," the message ran, "and need help. Come at once."

Petroff turned to the man who was grasping the white gelding's rein.

"Drive this horse in the direction of the Vigilantes' lair," he ordered, "but make sure that they don't see you. Unless I am mistaken, they will leave the canyada the minute they read this message, and we shall have them at our mercy then, for they must come this way."

His subordinate glanced at the note which the hetman had pinned to the gelding's saddle.

"H'in, a clever ruse, sir," he murmured. "But how do we know that the Eagle didn't work round to the canyada after we lost him? How do we know that he isn't at this very moment with the Vigilantes—or the Mounties, as they call themselves?"

"If he had made tracks for the canyada he would have been seen by the men who were besieging it," Petroff retorted. "Yes, even if he had effected a detour to come in from the far end of the ravine. I have already asked whether anyone joined the Vigilantes during the last hour, and have been assured that no one has done so. Now do as I have told you."

The man in charge of the gelding departed for the ridge that intervened between the Russians and the canyada, and presently he disappeared in a cospice on the summit of it. Meanwhile Petroff ordered the troopers of his squadron to conceal themselves amongst the rocks, and the field-gun also being hidden, the hetman alone was in view when the fellow who had been dispatched to the ridge came spurring back.

"The ruse worked, sir," he announced breathlessly. "I turned the gelding loose, and it went straight for the canyada. I waited to see what happened, and in a minute or two the Vigilantes came galloping out of their hide-out."

"And they're headed this way all right?" Petroff jerked. "They're headed for Stony Gulch?"

"Yes, sir."

The hetman promptly sought the shelter of the boulders with the Cossack who had returned from the ridge, and then he called out in a voice that was audible to the rest of the squadron.

"Wait until the Vigilantes are trapped between the rocks before you close in on them. And don't open fire unless you have to. I want them alive."

A silence now descended upon the scene of the ambushade, a silence that prevailed until Don Loring's Mounties hove into sight on the ridge, with the veteran rancher Anderson in the lead and the white gelding by his side. Then, the thunder of hoofs becoming ever more distinct to the men who waited in hiding among the rocks, the band of Vigilantes surged down the Stony Gulch trail at headlong pace.

They reached the locality where the track passed through the boulders, and, with every man of the Eagle's supporters penned in between the rocks, the Cossacks under Petroff's command suddenly disclosed themselves in full force, moving out of their countless hiding-places on horseback and levelling their carbines at the luckless Mounties.

Taken completely unawares, Anderson and his comrades pulled up abruptly, and as they looked about them they realised how hopelessly they were trapped. A formidable party of the Russians barred the trail in front of them, another party had mustered in their rear, and on both sides the cluttered houlders seemed alive with fur-capped Muscovites.

"Keep your hands away from your guns, or we'll mow you down like rats!" came the voice of Petroff.

Resistance was futile. Each rancher was covered by at least half a dozen carbines, so heavily did the odds favour the Russians, and any attempt to stage a battle would have been suicidal. Slowly, reluctantly, the Vigilantes lifted their hands in surrender, and at a command from Petroff a group of the Cossacks rode in amongst them to disarm them.

The Bargain

ONCE again General Jason Burr received a visit from Count Raspinoff, emissary of the Tsar, and the two men were discussing their plans in the would-be dictator's study when the murmur of their voices was interrupted by a commotion in the patio.

Rising from his chair, Jason Burr strode across to the windows of his sanctum, and as he looked out he saw the Yankee renegades in his employ hurrying from all directions to greet the arrival of Petroff's squadron of Cossacks and their Vigilante prisoners.

Burr's piggyish eyes gleamed as he beheld the captives, and, turning to find that Raspinoff had joined him at the windows, he spoke to the count in a voice that rang with exultation.

"Do you see what I see?" he jerked. "Do you see what I see? By thunder, this means our enemy's back is broken!"

Raspinoff was scanning the prisoners as the Cossacks escorted them to a long, low shed where they were apparently to be housed.

"The Eagle's white gelding has been taken by Petroff's men," he commented, "but there is no sign of the man in black to whom it belongs. General Burr, if he has escaped your troubles are far from ended. He can still incite opposition—"

"Here comes Petroff himself," Burr interrupted. "We'll wait till we've heard what he has to say before we discuss the Eagle."

The Cossack hetman entered the study a few seconds later, and the general looked at him approvingly.

"I notice you've rounded up those cursed Mounties, Petroff," he stated.

"Yes, but not by blasting them out of their hide-out with gunpowder," was the reply.

"I know that. The driver of the powder-wagon showed up here a little while ago. So did a bunch of my men who were to have rubbed out the Eagle before the real powder-wagon put in an appearance. I gathered from their stories that the Eagle had been too smart for us. But how did you manage to capture his Vigilantes, anyway?"

Petroff gave him a full report, and when the hetman had finished his narrative Raspinoff interposed a remark.

"You have done well, Petroff," he declared. "But the Eagle is still at large, and I have just been telling General Burr that he will continue to be a dangerous factor in this game that we are playing."

Burr took up the discussion at this juncture.

"His Excellency is right," he said. "The Eagle may stir up revolt against my regime, and I can't afford to have any unrest in my territory if I've got to meet trouble from the United States. But listen, Petroff, I think I know a way of laving the Eagle by the heels. You used his horse to trap his men. I'll use his men to trap him."

"How are you going to do it?" the hetman asked.

Burr's eyes narrowed thoughtfully.

"We know precious little about the Eagle," he mused, "but from our experience of him I figure he's one of these self-sacrificing fools who should have been born in the so-called age of chivalry. In other words, he'd throw away his own life to save his friends. Remember, for instance, how he risked the bullets of a firing-squad to rescue that fellow who answers to the name of Salvation."

Petroff failed to comprehend the project Burr had in mind, and Count Raspinoff seemed equally in the dark.

"Now, supposing," the general went on, "supposing I sent the Eagle a message, telling him that if he gave himself up I'd let his Vigilantes go free. I'm pretty well convinced he'd accept the proposition."

Raspinoff and the Cossack hetman glanced at each other dubiously. Then the latter spoke.

"If he did give himself up, would you let the others go free?"

"Of course not," Burr scoffed. "We'll delay their execution so that he can share their fate, that's all."

"How are you going to get in touch with the Eagle?" Raspinoff put in.

By way of answer, Jason Burr moved across to a cage that was hanging in one of the study windows. It was the cage containing the homing-pigeons which he had discovered in Doris Colton's possession.

"Any of these birds," the general said, "can be relied upon to fly straight to our man. Colton's daughter was caught last night in the act of sending a message to the Eagle by one of them."

He returned to his desk, and while Petroff and the count looked on in silence he wrote a few sentences on a sheet of paper. Then he folded the note tightly, and, removing one of the pigeons from the cage in the window, fastened the communication to its leg with a piece of strong twill.

He had scarcely accomplished this when there was a knock on the door, and as he called out in brusque response the figure of Doris Colton entered the room. For although she was not allowed beyond the gates of the fort she was at liberty to walk anywhere within its precincts.

"Ah," said Burr, grinning at her, though something in his manner belied the indulgent expression on his ugly face, "come right in, Miss Colton. What can I do for you?"

The girl was pale, and her fingers were twitching nervously.

"I saw the Cossacks arrive with those prisoners and I understand they're the Vigilantes," she faltered. "What are you going to do to them?"

Burr continued to smile at her.

"Well," he stated, "that depends on the Eagle. I'm just sending him a message, informing him that I'll turn his "Right now I ain't feelin' so good," Salvation said. "But you wait till I'm on my feet again. I'll show them Cossacks that they can't make a dictator outa that rattler Jason Burr!"

friends loose if he comes here and surrenders. That's a fair enough trade, isn't it?"

"You mean—you're demanding his life in return for theirs?"

"That's about the hang of it, Miss Colton. How do you suppose he'll react to my suggestion? You regard him as a pretty brave man, don't you?"

A far-away expression came into the girl's lovely eyes.

"He's the bravest man I've ever known," she answered.

"Well, if he's as brave as you think he is, I'm quite sure he'll take me up on this proposal," Burr observed smugly.

"Bearding the Lion"

WHEN Don Loring reached Father Jose's chapel in San Antonio he found Whipsaw and Salvation already installed within the kindly old padre's quarters.

Stripped to the waist, Salvation was lying on a divan, and while Father Jose looked on, Whipsaw was doctoring the big fellow's wound, which was obviously paining the injured man to a considerable extent.

Moving to the burly frontiersman's side, Don knelt down by the divan.

"How do you feel, amigo?" he inquired solicitously.

Salvation raised himself with an effort. "Right now I ain't feelin' so good," he said. "But you wait till I'm on me feet again. I'll show them Cossacks that they can't make a dictator outa that rattler Jason Burr!"

"You betcha you will," declared Whipsaw. "But say, Don, you really think the Vigilantes will be able ter hold off the Roosians at the canyada, don't yuh?"

"There's no reason why they shouldn't," was the reply. "They've got plenty of ammunition now, and, defended by a mere handful of determined men, that canyada could be made impregnable against a whole army."

There was a pause, and then Father Jose spoke.

"My son," he murmured, "I do not know whether you have heard the news, but it is said that many towns in the south have thrown off the yoke of Mexico and pronounced allegiance to Burr. The people down there do not realise, of course, that their lot under the general will be far unhappier than it was under the Mexican Government."

"No, and by the time they do realise it they won't be able to do nothin' about it," Whipsaw struck in, "because the Russian Tsar will have shown his hand an' flooded the country with troops. The point is, what's Uncle Sam gonna say about it in the meantime? I can't see the American Government standin' for a province that borders the U.S. frontier."

Don Loring clenched his fist.

"The U.S. Government never will stand for it," he said, "particularly as they've had hopes of bargaining for the possession of California themselves. And let me tell you this, Whipsaw: I may have Spanish blood in me, but I'd welcome U.S. rule above any other in this province. I have certainly no feelings of loyalty towards a Government so incompetent as that of Mexico, anyhow."

Salvation entered into the discussion. "Remont and his regiment up in Oregon are the nearest U.S. troops ter Californy," he mused. "If they got their marchin' orders they'd be down at the Ortega Pass in a brace o' shakes."

"Yes, the Ortega Pass," Don agreed. "The one route open to an invading force. And Salvation, I'm convinced it will come to that—I'm convinced the people of California must look to the United States if they want peace and prosperity in this territory. That's why we've got to prevent him from gaining a strangle-hold on the Sonoma Valley—the key to his ambitions—so that he will have no chance of concentrating his energies on defending the pass."

It was at this point in the conversation that a flutter of wings attracted his attention, and, turning his head, he saw a pigeon had settled on the ledge of a window near by. It was one of the pigeons which had belonged to Father Jose, and it had been smuggled to Doris Colton, and at sight of it Don started to his feet with an exclamation.

He had soon laid hold of the bird, and, espying a folded scrap of paper attached to its leg, he quickly unfastened the missive and read it. Then he looked at his companions with an expression of awe on his handsome features.

"What is it?" Whipsaw demanded. "A message from Miss Doris?"

"No," Don rejoined. "From Burr. He must have found out how Doris was passing information to us."

"From Burr!" Salvation ejaculated. "What's he say?"

"He says," the young Californian answered slowly, "he says that the Vigilantes have been taken and are imprisoned at his stronghold. He says that they will only be released if I give myself up in their stead. Should I fail to do so within twenty-four hours, they will be executed to a man."

Whipsaw gave vent to a cry.

"The Vigilantes—taken?" he ejaculated. "But it ain't possible. You said yourself the canyada was impregnable. It's a bluff, Don."

"I'm afraid it's no bluff. Somehow the Vigilantes have been trapped, otherwise Burr would not have wasted his time sending me this note."

"What are you gonna do, Don?"

"Go to Jason Burr's fort. The lives of those ranchers depend on me."

"But Burr will shoot yuh like a dog," Whipsaw protested. "Yeah, an' he'll massacre the Vigilantes whether you show up or not. You can't bank on a rattlesnake like him keepin' his word."

Don Loring gritted his teeth.

"Burr won't have the chance of shootin' me, or the Vigilantes either," he said.

A moment later he was hastening to the chest where he kept the suit of clothes that he wore as the supposed organist of Father Jose's chapel, and in the space of a few minutes he had rigged himself out in those garments, pulling them on over the sombre attire which was associated with his rôle of the Eagle.

"Don," Whipsaw appealed, "you're crazy if you think you can get away with that organ-player set-up. I know what you're gonna do. You're gonna pull the gag that let you into Burr's fort once before. But it won't work this time. Remember that hombre Pedro, the half-breed in the general's pay? He's seen yuh without your mask, an' he'll recognise yuh."

"I doubt it. I look a very different man in this guise, my friend. Anyhow, I'm going to take the chance of meeting Pedro face to face and being recognised by him."

Whipsaw bit his lip.

"All right," he grunted. "Have it your own way. But what am I gonna wear?"

"You're not coming with me," Don told him. "You're going to stay right here and look after Salvation."

It was in vain that the little frontiersman begged the Californian to let him travel to Burr's stronghold as well. Don would not hear of it, and shortly afterwards he left San Antonio alone, riding a sturdy little mule which was owned by Father Jose.

Noon found him in the vicinity of the tyrant general's fortified hacienda, and as he approached the main gateway of the stronghold several men showed up there. One of them was the gangster known as Harris, and it was he who challenged Don.

"What do you want here?" he demanded.

Already Don had assumed the timorous manner that he affected as the organist of the San Antonio Mission—a manner which might well have disarmed the suspicions of the most mistrustful of men.

"I—I have a message for your commander," he said to Harris. "I—I was asked to—give it to him personally."

Harris frowned, and then, taking Don's mule by the rein, he conducted the animal and its rider into the courtyard, where parties of Cossacks and ruffianly looking outlaws were lounging about in idleness.

Amongst one of those groups Don noticed the figure of the half-breed Pedro, and in passing that particular knot of men he was careful to keep his face somewhat averted. Then his glance was attracted to a horse which was plunging restively at a hitch-rail near the main building of the stronghold.

The horse was his own white gelding, and it had obviously become aware of its master's presence. But Don gave no indication that he was familiar with the brone, of course, though Harris escorted him straight across to it.

A tall, powerfully built individual was trying to pacify the gelding. He was Talbot, Burr's chief henchman, and Harris addressed himself to him.

"This guy here wants ter see the general," he reported.

Talbot slid his eyes on Don, and then gave a slight start.

"Say, I remember you," he growled. "You're the organ-player that was here a few days back. What do you want this time?"

"I—have a m-message—for the—for the general," Don stammered. "It's—it's from the man who calls himself the Eagle."

Talbot seemed to become tense.

"The Eagle, huh?" he jerked. "All right, get down off that mule an' follow me."

Don was lowering himself awkwardly to the ground, and, indicating the porch of Burr's private residence, Talbot preceded him into the building.

They passed into a sumptuously furnished hall, and Talbot led the way to the general's study. The door of the room was half open, and as they moved towards it Don caught a glimpse of Doris Colton emerging from the apartment. But, though she cast a look in his direction, the girl did not connect him with the masked man whom she knew as the Eagle, and he gained only a momentary impression of her pale, anxious face before she turned to ascend a staircase leading to the upper floor of the house.

She disappeared, and by that time Don and Talbot had reached the threshold of the study, which was occupied by Burr, Petroff and Count Raspinoff.

A snatch of conversation reached Don's ears.

"In my opinion," he heard Raspinoff say, "a shrewd man like the Eagle will not come here."

"No?" Burr retorted. "Well, I'm counting on the fellow's peculiar code of honour. From my experience of him—"

But the general did not complete the sentence, for it was at this juncture that Talbot strode through the doorway with Don shambling at his heels.

"Excuse me, general," Talbot announced, "but here's this organ-player back again. He claims he has another message from the Eagle."

There was a scraping of chairs as Burr, Petroff and the count rose to their feet and concentrated their gaze on Don Loring. Then the general stepped nearer to the supposed organist.

"A message from the Eagle, eh?" he barked. "Say, how is it he picks on you to deliver his messages?"

"I—I don't know. I only wish—he wouldn't pick on me. He makes me nervous—in those black clothes of his—and the mask—and—"

"All right, all right," Burr cut in. "What's his message, anyway?"

Don moistened his lips.

"Well, I—I haven't the slightest idea what he means," he blurted, "but he asked me to tell you that he'd be here five minutes after I arrived."

"Five minutes after you arrived?" Burr rapped out, and then: "Come on, friends, we'll get ready to receive our visitor!"

No further heed was paid to Don. With one accord, Burr, Petroff, Talbot and Raspinoff stampeded from the room, and, finding himself alone, the bogus organist from the San Antonio chapel promptly began to divest himself of the grey suit he was wearing.

Thirty seconds later he stood revealed as the Eagle, and, after thrusting the discarded suit under a couch and concealing his features with his mask, he plucked out a revolver and stepped forth into the hall.

Burr was at the front door of the hacienda with Raspinoff. Petroff and Talbot were hastening away in opposite directions with the general's orders ringing in their ears.

"Get the men to their posts. Tell them to grab the Eagle the moment he enters the courtyard. Bring out the Vigilantes and pick a firing-squad for them. Huh, so the Eagle thought I'd really set them free if he surrendered! He'll know different when we stick him amongst 'em and start shooting them down."

The great patio was soon transformed into a scene of activity, and the clamour that resounded within its confines only died down when the preparations for the Eagle's anticipated arrival had been completed. Then Jason Burr turned to Raspinoff.

"It won't be long now, count," he said, "before you have the pleasure of witnessing the mass execution of our enemies."

The emissary of the Tsar grimaced. "If you don't mind, general," he murmured, "I think I'll wait in the study until it's all over. I'm afraid I have a tendency to be a little squeamish on these occasions."

Burr shrugged his shoulders, and the count turned to retrace his steps. On his way to the study he saw no sign of Don, however, for the latter had dodged into an alcove, from which he only emerged when the Russian had passed by.

The coast clear, Don advanced stealthily to the doorway in which Jason Burr was standing, and, coming up behind the scoundrel, he glanced out into the courtyard to see the general's armed hirelings assembled in groups at every vantage-point, Cossacks and gangsters intermingling. Then his eyes became focused on a file of carabineers under the command of Petroff—furred-capped Muscovites who were levelling their guns at a band of defenceless men, the condemned Vigilantes.

Don's face tightened, and, careful to remain hidden from the view of those in the courtyard, he thrust the muzzle of his Colt towards the tyrant in the hacienda doorway.

"Keep perfectly still, Burr," he drawled, "if you know what's good for you."

The general stiffened in every limb, and, half turning his bullet head, he gave vent to a smothered imprecation as he saw the masked figure of the Eagle behind him. But, his glance dropping to the revolver, he made no further sound or movement.

"I've kept my appointment, Burr," Don went on. "Now release my men."

"Take it easy," the other croaked.

"Let's—let's talk this thing over."

"There's nothing to talk about. Do as I tell you, or I'll blow a hole clean through you. Release my men, give them their horses and disperse your own scum to their quarters."

There was no doubting the sincerity of the threat, and with the barrel of the revolver boring into his spine,

The BODY ON THE BEACH

What is the secret of the sinister, haunted castle on the cliff-top? What is the mystery behind the apparently drowned body found on the beach that Sexton Blake proved was never in the sea at all? Here is a grand, book-length thriller that will grip you all through. Ask for No. 588 of

SEXTON BLAKE
LIBRARY Of all Newsagents 4^d

Jason Burr suddenly called out to Petroff in an urgent tone:

"Hey, there, I've changed my mind! Turn those Vigilantes loose—let 'em take their ponies—and send 'em home."

Petroff could scarcely believe his ears. He gaped at Burr from the far side of the courtyard, but failed to see the black-clad form who was surreptitiously covering the general.

"Go on, do as I say!" General Burr shouted.

His instructions were carried out, the prisoners being set free; and when these had galloped from the stronghold with a bewilderment only exceeded by the wonder written on the countenances of Burr's own men, the general ordered his men to return to their cantonments.

"And now, friend Burr," Don said then, "we'll talk things over."

"I think it's time we all did some talking," another voice interposed.

It was the voice of Count Raspinoff. The astonishing commands of Burr must have reached his ears, and, dumbfounded at first, he had at length emerged from the study to perceive the reason for the change in the general's demeanour. And now the Russian was close behind Don Loring, and was holding the point of a sword against the young Californian's back.

The sword was one which Raspinoff wore merely as a decoration. It was questionable whether he had ever used it as an offensive weapon. Nor did it prove of much value to him now, for, wheeling, Don struck it aside and closed with the man to hurl him to the floor and wrest the blade from his clutch.

The brief scuffle cost Don his revolver, however, for he was unlucky enough to lose his grip on it, and in an instant Jason Burr had dived for it and snatched it up. Yet ere the general could cover him with the fire-arm the younger man had brought the flat of Raspinoff's sword across the tyrant's hand.

Burr dropped the Colt with a yelp of pain, and it was as he uttered that cry that Petroff appeared unexpectedly on the threshold of the house with four or five of his Muscovite troopers.

They had entered truculently enough for the purpose of asking why the Vigilantes had been allowed to go free after proving themselves so dangerous to Burr's cause. But at sight of the masked, dark-clad figure of the Eagle they understood the situation immediately, and a chorus of guttural exclamations broke from their throats.

Out came their sabres, the steel scraping in the scabbards and flashing on high. In the same moment Don sprang back to put himself on the defensive, but in doing so he tripped over the corner of a low bench, and next second, even as he sprawled his length, the party of Cossacks rushed for him in a body to hack the life out of him with their razor-edged swords!

(To be continued in another grand episode next week. By permission of British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Bob Livingston.)

"OUR FIGHTING NAVY"

(Continued from page 10.)

Now, Captain Markham was under the impression that Pamela was in love with young Armstrong; moreover, he was convinced that he was destined to be a bachelor. Also, he was too old for a girl like Pamela.

"Good fellow, Armstrong," he remarked when they were alone.

"I think he's a dear, but—"

"But what?"

"But I'm not in love with him." Pamela looked at the captain in a manner that even that dense hero could understand.

An officer knocked and entered. He coughed discreetly because the captain's arms were around the girl.

"Your boat is alongside, sir."

"Tell them to make it fast," cried the captain.

"Aye, aye, sir!" cried the officer.

When the door had closed Markham turned eagerly to the girl of his dreams.

"Do you really mean it?"

Pamela laughed.

"Aye, aye, sir!"

It was Markham, and not the unfortunate Bill Armstrong, who took Pamela Bront ashore.

(By permission of Herbert Wilcox Productions, Ltd., distributed throughout the United Kingdom and Irish Free State by General Film Distributors, Ltd., starring Robert Douglas, Hazel Terry and Richard Cromwell.)

August 21st, 1937.

"I PROMISE TO PAY"

(Continued from page 23)

be down there yet only the guy had never seen me before. The heat's on, boss!"

"It's nice and cool in here," said Farra complacently. "I sleep under blankets every night."

"The D.A. is guarding Lang like he was the mint," raged Reardon. "They mean business."

Farra waved away the masseur and sat up.

"So they've got the boys," he said scornfully, "and for what? Assault and misdemeanor—usury and misdemeanor. Huh! The D.A. will have his little party, and a few stupid lugs will go away for six months. So what? I'll still be in business."

"Well, it's more than that, boss," protested Fats. "This guy Lang's always been a trouble-maker. You see, Whitehat and John Scully grabbed his pay-envelope one time, and I guess the D.A. figures that's robbery. And once Whitehat and Fancyface had to push him into a car and talk to him some."

Farra heard that with manifest misgiving and sent for Fancyface, who was in the pent-house.

"Did you hurt this fellow Lang?" he demanded harshly.

"No," replied the thug.

"Don't lie to me! You slugged him!" Farra pointed an accusing finger. "D'you know what that means, you lug? That's a murder rap, if they want to get technical. You force a guy into a car, and that's kidnapping! In this State you get life! If you do him bodily harm while he's in that car you get the hot seat—death! Can you understand that, you thick-skulled idiot? They've got Scully, and they'll pick you up any day!"

"But listen, Farra—" began Reardon.

"Shut up!" snapped the racketeer. "I said I'd give my boys protection, and I will. But no mouthpiece living can laugh off this rap. If a Grand Jury indicts the boys, they burn! We'll have to get Lang before he talks to a Grand Jury."

Foiled!

NEARLY a week passed, and then the District Attorney sent again for Eddie, who was conveyed to the Hall of Justice in a squad car.

"We go before the Grand Jury tomorrow," said Curtis, "and with your help I think I can get indictments against ten men. But they are all small fry not one-tenth of one per cent of the loan-shark racketeers in this city. We haven't even touched the higher-ups, and even if I do get indictments and convictions against these ten men the racket still goes on. It's not good enough!"

"Well, look, Mr. Curtis," ventured Eddie. "I think I've got an idea. Of course, you're the D.A., and I'm just a mug that got in with this mob because I needed fifty bucks and didn't have brains enough—"

"Don't apologise for having an idea, Eddie," urged Curtis. "You've got nerve, and I like it. What were you going to say?"

"Well, you picked up a couple of hooks—collection hooks, with the names of the people and how much they owe."

"That's so, but these people are afraid to talk."

"My idea is that maybe they might listen to me, seeing as how I'm one of them. If I put it to them strong enough I think they might come through."

"Even then," said Curtis, "they couldn't identify the ringleader."

"No, but through them we can get more steers and more collectors, and then maybe—"

"Maybe we'll find the link we're looking for," Curtis completed. "It's not likely, but I'm willing to try. All right, I'll subpoena the lot of them. You be here at noon recess to-morrow, and I'll let you talk to them."

"You bet," said Eddie with enthusiasm, and rose to go. But Curtis stopped him as he was on the way to the door.

"Oh, Eddie," he said, "when this blows over I think I'll have a berth for you here."

Eddie gaped at him in mingled astonishment and gratitude.

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Curtis," he blurted, "but you know why I lost my job at Morse's?"

"Forget that," Curtis offered his hand. "I've forgotten it."

Eddie shook the hand with vigour.

"Is it all right if I tell my wife?" he asked. "I mean, about the job?"

"Certainly, Eddie," Curtis assured him. "Tell her by all means."

While Eddie was on his way back home in the squad car, with Gregg beside him and Martin in the front seat with the driver, Mary went out from the little cabin to do some shopping, leaving Judy in the kitchen to look after baby Bill in his crib.

Cautiously the back door was opened, and Whitehat slipped into the room. He had watched Mary leave the cabin.

"Hallo, girlie," he said with an ingratiating smile, "what's your name?"

"Judy," she replied. "What's yours?"

"Smith," he told her. "Your folks home?"

She shook her head.

"My mummy went to the store," she said, "and my daddy went in a car, and—"

"How would you like to go in a car?" he cut in.

"Have you got one?"

"Sure—just down the road. Say, let's you and me take a little ride."

He glanced across at the crib. "We'll take your little brother with us."

"Oh, that'd be fun!" she cried. "But my mummy said—"

"I met your mother at the store," lied Whitehat. "She told me to come up here and take you for a nice ride."

"She did?" Judy clapped her hands.

"Oh, goody, goody! Did she say I was to wear my sweater?"

"No," Whitehat moved over to the crib. "Come on, it ain't cold."

He was stooping to pick up the baby when the door from the lobby swung wide and a harsh voice rang out:

"Drop those hands!"

Whitehat dropped his hands—and swung round to face two burly plain-clothes men who had stepped into the room with guns in their hands.

"Say, what is this?" he gulped.

Mary, who had just returned, squeezed between the two detectives with a paper-bag full of groceries in one arm. Her right hand went to her throat, and she screamed.

"You guys have got me wrong," complained Whitehat. "I'm from the Capitol Laundry."

"Oh, no, fellow," drawled one of the detectives, stalking over to him and clamping a pair of handcuffs round his wrists, "we've got you right."

Whitehat was taken away prisoner, and Mary flung the bag of groceries on the table to take Judy into her arms. "Why did you scream, mummy?" asked Judy wonderingly.

That afternoon Fats and Fancyface went to Farra's pent-house with the news that Whitehat had been arrested in the act of trying to kidnap Eddie's children, and Farra lost his customary suavity and used quite a lot of bad language.

"Now you get this straight," he said, after he had calmed down. "Up to now you mugs have drawn blanks, but this time you've got to put that guy out of the way."

"But not where you say, boss," objected Fats. "It ain't so easy. Now up where he lives it'd be a pip."

"Yeah," chimed in Fancyface, "why don't you let us finish him off up there, Mr. Farra? You don't want no slips-ups?"

"No, I don't want no slips-ups," raged Farra, "and there ain't gonna be no slips-ups. It'll be where I said, when I said, and you'll do it like I said. Now I ain't askin' you to go to the City Hall and bring me the mayor—I want one guy taken care of so that two hundred saps will get the idea. If he gets in there and starts whooping it up with those dopes who know plenty they'll forget being scared, and the next thing you'll be doin' is sitting on the hot-seat. Now get out of here—and put new rubber in your sling shots!"

Next morning in the Hall of Justice, the District Attorney appeared before the members of the Grand Jury and addressed them in impassioned tones.

"These men against whom I hope you'll bring indictments," he said, "are loan sharks. Now the loan-shark racket is the best organised, the most profitable, and unquestionably the most vicious of all rackets. It finds its victims among workers in shops, offices, factories—men and women who work hard for small wages, people who spend their lives on the fringe of actual want."

"It is amongst such people as these that your loan-shark steers operate, and obviously it is difficult to find witnesses against such criminals because they are frightened. But I've found one man—one man—who is brave enough to tell the truth. From the day I first talked to him I've had him continuously guarded, but in spite of that he feels that in coming here he is risking his life. And, gentlemen, he is right. Until these criminals are wiped out no witness against the loan-shark racket is out of danger."

One of the members of the jury, an elderly and dignified-looking man in horn-rimmed spectacles, seemed the least impressed.

"Then your office has been able to find only one witness, Mr. Curtis?" he said dryly.

"My office, which has never relaxed in its efforts to catch these criminals," responded the District Attorney warmly, "has subpoenaed many known victims. They are downstairs now, and I am hoping they will follow the example of this one man. I am hoping that within two hours the first of many witnesses against the loan-shark racket will testify before you."

Eddie at that moment was saying good-bye to Mary and the children, and Gregg and Martin were waiting for him.

"Eddie," said Mary, "you're shaking."

"Yeah," he admitted. "I've got a little stage fright. I never spoke a piece before. Good-bye, darling. I'll see you later."

He went out with the two detectives to the squad car in the road, and a member of Farra's gang immediately dived into a public telephone-box and rang up Fats. Gregg flipped a hand to two colleagues who were on guard outside the cabin, then followed Eddie and Martin into the car.

A policeman in uniform was at the wheel, and the car shot off towards the city.

"That's a couple o' swell kids you've got," remarked Gregg, who was sitting on Eddie's left.

"They sure are, Eddie," confirmed Martin on the other side of him.

"You think so?" The proud parent produced a number of rather worn snapshots from his breast pocket. "I got some pictures here of them," he said. "They're a little out of focus, but they're kinda cute. Look, the little girl—the little boy."

Gregg looked out through the window on his side of the car, and Martin looked out through the window on his side.

The End of a Racket

IN a spacious ante-chamber of the Grand Jury on the second floor of the Hall of Justice nearly two hundred victims of Farra's racket had been assembled, and most of them were standing because there wasn't room for half of them to sit down. Almost as many women as men were there, and they all looked very ill-at-ease.

The District Attorney spoke to them. "In a few minutes," he said, "there's a man coming in here to talk to you. His name is Edward Lang, and he is a victim of the loan sharks like yourselves. He is going before the Grand Jury this afternoon, but first I want him to talk to you because he's got a different slant on this whole business."

"He can talk his head off," growled a tubby little man, "but I'm not going to say a word. It isn't healthy."

"Me, either," averred another victim.

"All I ask of you," said Curtis, "is that you listen to what Lang has to say."

A black sedan was standing outside the Hall of Justice when the squad car containing Eddie reached the building. Fancyface was at the wheel of the sedan and Fats was beside him, peering out of the window with an automatic in his hand.

"All right," said Fats, "there he is."

Eddie alighted and walked towards the steps between Gregg and Martin, and he was on the third step when the automatic blazed twice. He collapsed with a groan and rolled down on to the pavement on his back, while horrified pedestrians stopped to stare and the two detectives whirled round and whipped out their guns.

The black sedan shot off up Centre Street; police whistles sounded shrilly, and the District Attorney rushed out from the building. Eddie was lifted up and carried into a room and the police surgeon was summoned. Within a very few minutes a dispatcher in the radio transmitter room at police headquarters was sending out a wireless message to all patrol cars in the city.

"Man shot on Hall of Justice steps. Be on the look-out for black sedan last seen speeding north on Centre Street."

The black sedan, avoiding other vehicles by inches, careered out of Centre Street into Fourth Avenue, reached Union Square and beat the traffic lights across it. But patrol cars were converging upon Fourth Avenue from east and west in the region of Madison Square, and Fats became aware of two that were following.

"Cops behind us!" he shouted. "Step on it! In front of the Hall of Justice at noon. Farra's crazy!"

Fancyface drove madly on along the avenue, but the black sedan had been seen and police sirens were shrieking. At East Twenty-third Street all traffic had been stopped and patrol cars formed a solid barrier across the roadway. Fancyface looked back, saw that he and Fats were in a trap, and jammed on the brakes and the black sedan skidded on locked wheels into the barrier, and was instantly surrounded by police officers with drawn guns.

A crowd gathered, but was driven back; the doors of the sedan were opened.

"Come on out, you mugs!" commanded an armed sergeant.

Eddie had been shot in the back, just below the right shoulder-blade and in the upper part of the right arm. The police surgeon wanted to get him off to hospital immediately, but Eddie was conscious and determined. He was coughing blood and believed that he was on the point of death, yet he insisted upon being carried to a couch in the ante-room where the victims of the loan-shark racket were assembled.

The surgeon sat beside him, feeling his pulse as he lay back against a cushion coughing and gasping for breath; the District Attorney knelt near his head, filled with admiration for his grit, and nearly two hundred men and women stared at him agast.

Somehow he managed to turn in their direction and to speak, though speech was an agony.

"As long as there's only one of us," he panted, "they can scare him quiet. They can shoot one of us."

He coughed into a handkerchief that Curtis held for him, and several of the women present burst into tears.

"I got a wife and two kids, see?" he went on after a while. "I was twenty-eight a couple o' months back. Right now I can't let myself think that maybe to-morrow I won't be alive. I don't want to die, but I hate those crooks, so I—I figured that I ought to have a right to ask this much of you. Don't—let—me—die—for nothing."

The effort had been too much. A fit of coughing seized him and his head fell back, blood trickling from his mouth. Bill Seaver, who was present, cried out:

"I'll testify, Mr. Curtis!"

"So will I!" shouted another man.

"I'll talk!" shrieked a woman; and then, all of a sudden, every one of the victims became eager to give evidence.

Bill Seaver squeezed his way through the crowd to the couch with tears streaming down his face.

"You won't die, Eddie," he said brokenly. "You'll be all right—and we'll smash those rats out o' business!"

At police headquarters, Fats and Fancyface were questioned by Captain Hall after some of his men had put them through the third degree, and because they believed they were doomed for the electric chair on a charge of murdering Eddie they told everything.

Farra was arrested in his pent-house and brought down to headquarters. He faced the two prisoners brazenly enough, smoking a cigar, and he turned to Captain Hall with an air of injured innocence.

"These guys are crazy," he said. "I've never seen either of them before."

"Never seen us before?" bellowed Fats. "Why, we were his boys! He's the big shot—he's our boss! You can't take a powder now, Farra—you're in this thing, too, right up to your neck!"

"That's right," confirmed Fancyface savagely. "He said we were to hang around the Hall of Justice at noon, and when the sucker showed his face we was to plug him. He told us to kill him!"

Captain Hall's massive face beamed with satisfaction.

"Now that you've told your story," he said quietly, "I know you'll be glad to hear that the man you shot is still alive."

"How d'you like that?" Farra, in his utter disgust, betrayed himself. "These stupid lugs can't even shoot straight!"

The Grand Jury indicted Farra, the other members of his gang were arrested and imprisoned, and the trial was expedited. The loan-shark racket was smashed completely, and those concerned in it were sentenced to varying terms of penal servitude.

A month after Eddie had been swept off in an ambulance from the Hall of Justice to the Bellevue Hospital, he was able to sit up in bed and was well on the way to recovery. Mary visited him one afternoon to find him in quite a state of excitement.

"Hallo, darling!" he cried, and fished a letter from under his pillow. "Look at this!"

Mary kissed him and read the letter. It was from the District Attorney, and it ran:

"Hurry up and get well, Eddie, your job is waiting for you."

"He's kind of a nice fellow, eh?" suggested Eddie.

"I'll say he is!" She tucked the letter back under the pillow and slipped a soft arm round his neck. "Gee, Eddie, the doctor told me you were better, but I had to see for myself."

"You think you're smarter than the doctor, eh?" jeered Eddie.

"Sure," she nodded. "The doctor hasn't been married to you for over seven years. Oh, Eddie, I've been so scared!"

"Yeah I was scared, too," he confessed. "I was scared I'd never hold you in my arms again, or see the kids. Then I remembered that old crack—you know, the one about 'only the good die young.'"

She pressed her cheek against his and kissed him, and she said softly:

"Oh, Eddie, you silly fool!"

(By permission of Columbia Pictures Corporation, Ltd., starring Chester Morris, with Helen Mack and Leo Carrillo.)

August 21st, 1937.

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"OUR FIGHTING NAVY"—

Captain Markham, Robert Douglas; Lieutenant Bill Armstrong, Richard Cromwell; Pamela Brent, Hazel Terry; Mr. Brent, H. B. Warner; President, Noah Beery; De Costa, Esme Percy; Admiral, Frederick Culley; Enrique, Henry Victor.

"I PROMISE TO PAY"—Eddie

Lang, Chester Morris; Richard Farra, Leo Carrillo; Mary Lang, Helen Mack; District Attorney Curtis, Thomas Mitchell; Captain Hall, Thurston Hall; Al Anslie, John Gallaudet; Judy Lang, Patsy O'Connor; Bernard George Wilson, Wallis Clark; Bill Seaver, James Flavin; Mike Reardon, Edward Keane; Fats, Harry Woods; Fancyface, Henry Brandon; Whitehat, Marc Lawrence.

All letters to the Editor should be addressed to BOY'S CINEMA, Room 199, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Hollywood Rebel

Zasu Pitts has gone on strike. The owner of the fluttering hands and quavering voice has rebelled against collecting so many salary cheques.

Most screen personalities think they are busy if they make four or five pictures a year. Zasu has played as many as 35 rôles in twelve months. That means starting a new picture every ten days, with no rest in between. So Zasu has decided to accept only a few important rôles a year, say a dozen or so.

Zasu inaugurated her new policy by taking six weeks to complete her rôle in Walter Wanger's "52nd Street," in which she is featured with Ian Hunter, Pat Paterson, Leo Carrillo, and Kenny Baker. This will introduce Zasu in a new guise as singer and dancer.

Zasu's earliest ambition was to be a sweet girl heroine. Hollywood insisted that comedy was her forte. About fifteen years ago her talents as a serious actress were discovered, notably in "Greed." But it was too late. The public demanded her for laughs. She sighed, accepted the verdict, and watched her salary soar.

Although only 37, Zasu has appeared in more than 1,000 pictures. She cannot recall the titles of scores of them. For her first week's work in the studios she was paid £2 10s. Studios now clamour for her services at a three-figure salary. And still her admirers write that they don't see enough of her on the screen!

One of Hollywood's Strangest Sights

The sun over Hollywood recently looked down on one of the strangest sights since Samson went cavorting about with the jawbone of an ass. It was a collection of every trick horse, cat, parrot, owl, turkey, sheep, and duck, along with its owner, available in the film city.

This odd assemblage went to the Paramount studio in response to a call by Director Rouben Mamoulian, who needed the animals, not for a scene of the Ark, but to portray a period of life in Pennsylvania when the oil industry was first spawned in the last century.

It is part of the Irene Dunne starring vehicle, "High, Wide and Handsome," with Randolph Scott and Dorothy Lamour.

Mamoulian's call revealed that there were exactly 12 trick cats in Hollywood, 77 trained horses, an indeterminate number of sheep, seven parrots, 11 ducks, one turkey and one owl. The round-up was conducted by Russel

Pierce, of the studio property department, who found his job complicated by the fact that he had to bring in the owners as well as the animals and birds. This was done so that the said owners and not the studio would be responsible for their safety while working.

The necessity for trained animals resulted from the fact that they had to "stay put" or make certain noises, as the case might be. An unruly animal could have held up production for hours.

One of the horses had a particularly difficult rôle, but carried it off with aplomb. William Frawley was asleep in some hay, when the horse, on cue, walked up, and with his head shoved aside enough hay so that he could awaken the comedian with several licks on the face with his rough tongue!

"High, Wide and Handsome," which is one of Paramount's biggest pictures of the year, is a spectacular musical romance, with melodies composed by Jerome Kern.

Tough Guys!

Because of the physical risks he undertakes in his own special brand of leading-man rôles, Brian Donlevy, 20th Century-Fox star, has been elected a member in the Suicide Club, the exclusive organisation of Hollywood film-stunt men.

The executive committee, comprising Harvey Parry, Duke Green, Gordon Carveth and Allan Pomeroy, took time out during fight scenes with Donlevy in "Born Reckless" to induct him into the group.

Members of the Suicide Club all risk their lives hundreds of times yearly in creating screen thrills. Donlevy was told his ten-day stay in the hospital as the result of a fight injury in "Born Reckless" would be counted as the first step in his initiation.

Near His Work

Moore Marriott, the well-known British character actor who has an important rôle in "The Fatal Hour," the new Paramount film recently completed at Pinewood, is a film actor who is followed about by film studios!

Moore—whom everybody calls George—used to live at Edgware because it was handy for the film studios at Elstree. When the big fire at Elstree occurred, Moore decided to move, so he sold his place and built himself a new house in Buckinghamshire. No sooner had he moved in than it was announced that new studios were to be built at Pine-wood—a stone's throw away. Shortly after, twenty-four film companies took over accommodation in the neighbourhood.

It must be fate—or perhaps merely foresight.

All For Art!

Going under a shower-bath of flying glass five times in one day, Loretta Young again proved herself one of Hollywood's pluckiest actresses:

For a scene in "Love under Fire," which is before the camera at 20th Century-Fox, she and Don Ameche were required by the script to fall of their hands and knees as an expert marksman shot out several window panes with a machine-gun.

Since they were within two feet of the windows, the shattering glass covered both of them for the five "takes" that were necessary. Miss Young was cut about the neck and arms, Ameche escaped without a scratch.

Goldwyn's £10,000 Make-up Bill

Because the Chinese of the 13th century were nearly all big men of six feet or taller, Samuel Goldwyn has found it necessary to spend £10,000 more than he intended on his new picture, "The Adventures of Marco Polo."

This bill will be for make-up alone, as on some days 40 to 50 extra make-up men will be required. Explanation is that most modern Chinese are small, so Goldwyn is able to use only a few of the Chinese actors in Hollywood as atmosphere players. Deficiency will be made up with hefty Russians and Mexicans of Mongolian countenance who will be transformed into authentic-looking 13th century Chinese by the artifice of the make-up department.

Costumes also are expensive. Every one of the hundreds of costumes to be worn in the film have been made at the studio. The biggest job was the making of chain mail for a thousand soldiers to wear in fighting scenes. Copies of rare prints from the Peking museum were loaned to the studio, and six months were spent in research. The total cost of the costumes is estimated at £30,000. In addition to this Goldwyn is spending £8,000 for saddles, bridles and harness, all of which had to be specially made.

Under construction for the past month is the picture's biggest set, a replica of a section of the Great Wall of China and the west gates of Peking. The wall section is 100 feet high and 200 yards long. The gates are 80 feet high with towers more than 100 feet high. This one set added £10,000 to the production costs.

"The Adventures of Marco Polo," marks the return to the Goldwyn studio of Gary Cooper, who first won recognition three eleven years ago in "The Winning of Barbara Worth." Other members of the cast include Sigrid Gurie, a screen newcomer from Norway, Basil Rathbone, Ernest Truex and George Barbier.

STAMPS, 300 DIFFERENT, incl. Airmail, Beautiful Encomium Sets, Pictorials, Colonials, First 6d. (Abroad 1s.)—WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

ALL Applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, BOY'S CINEMA, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

BLUSHING, Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back! Complete Course, 5/-, Details—L.A. Stebbing, (A), 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2.

SMOKING HABIT POSITIVELY CURED in a few days. Complete treatment 2/9. Parties, testimony, stamp.—Specialist, "Gwynant," Clifton Road, Old Colwyn, North Wales.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS.

BOY'S CINEMA

No. 929. EVERY TUESDAY October 2nd, 1937.

2^D

Complete in This Issue!

"Strange Laws"

"The Crime Nobody Saw"

and

"Larceny on the Air"

START
This Gripping
NEW SERIAL of Stirring Adventure
TO-DAY

||
WILD WEST
DAYS ||

Starring
JOHN MACK BROWN

Into the bad lands of Arizona rode four staunch comrades of the Range, destined to match their wits and their prowess against an organisation of criminals who stopped at nothing to gain their own ends. A smashing serial drama of high adventure among renegades and Redskins beyond the Rio Grande, starring John Mack Brown

WILD WEST DAYS

EPISODE 1—

"Death Rides the Range"

A Brush with the Indians

THEY came riding through the foothills on the edge of the Gila Desert, with the scent of sage in their nostrils and the blistering Arizona sun striking against their backs. There were four of them—toughened, weather-beaten sons of the saddle bred on the banks of the Rio Grande in New Mexico, though they were far from their stamping-ground now.

The first member of the quartet was a handsome, six-foot American of twenty-five, square in the shoulder, deep in the chest, with sober features that could break readily into geniality. He was Kentucky Wade, bearing that nickname not because he hailed from the State in question, but because his parents had both been reared there before him.

Close behind Kentucky Wade was Trigger Benton, a long, lean fellow with a face burned to the hue and texture of leather, and the rear was brought up by Dude Hanford and Mike Morales, the former being a clean-cut buckaroo who was the youngest of the party, and the latter a bronze-skinned Mexican with flashing teeth and an inexpressible twinkle in his dark eyes.

The four of them were fast friends of long standing, and back home on the Rio Grande each had learned to throw a gun in the interests of law and order. At the moment, however, none of them had a thought for the six-shooters they were wearing on their hips. Kentucky, Trigger Benton and Dude Hanford held between their fingers nothing more ominous than the reins of their ponies, and Mike Morales nothing more sinister than a guitar on which he was strumming the refrain of a cow-camp ballad.

October 2nd, 1937.

He was acting as accompanist to Dude, who was rendering the song in a good, sonorous voice, and it was to the strains of the melody that the four comrades suddenly debouched from a pass in the hills and found themselves confronted by an expanse of rolling prairie. Then, as Dude and Mike Morales brought their ballad to a close, Kentucky Wade spoke in the slow-drawing accents of the south-west.

"Seems as if we should have come to some signs of civilisation before now," he observed.

"Yeah," Trigger Benton grunted. "Four days of hard ridin' without seein' a ranch-house. It don't seem possible."

A frown gathered upon his leathery forehead, and he was about to make some further comment when Mike Morales gave vent to an exclamation and held up his hand with a flourish characteristic of him.

"Lees'n!" he ejaculated. "Eet sounds to me like I hear wagon wheels."

There were no sharper ears west of the Rio Grande than this dapper Mexican's; and sure enough, within a few seconds of his uttering those words the head of a column of prairie schooners came winding up from a ragged arroyo that crossed the plain.

The four friends had paused, and they watched the long line of wagons lumber into full view. Then Kentucky Wade spoke again, an expression of perplexity on his good-looking countenance.

"They look like settlers to me," he said, "but they're pulling out of the same country we're making for, and immigrants don't usually travel east."

And then he checked, for at that instant he beheld a cloud of horsemen assembling on a ridge away beyond the toiling wagon-train—half-nude horsemen painted and befeathered, mounted on shaggy mustangs, flourishing bows and rifles and tomahawks, the last-named weapons glinting wickedly in the sun.

"Indians!" Kentucky jerked. It was in the days when the West was young, an empire into which pioneering white men had only begun to filter during the past twenty or thirty years, and a band of marauding Redskins was no uncommon sight. Yet after four days in the wilderness—four days in the course of which they had not encountered a living soul—Kentucky and his companions were so startled by the sudden appearance of those savages that for a brief interval they made no move.

While the wayfarers from New Mexico sat motionless in their saddles the Indians mustered swiftly upon the ridge. Meantime the intended victims of the war-band had sighted the foe, and were hurriedly circling the wagons to form a corral, but the barrage of prairie schooners was by no means complete when the Redskins surged to the attack with demonic cries.

The familiar, blood-curdling death-yell of the Indian braves reached the ears of Kentucky Wade and his three comrades, and soon the remote but piercing clamour of those shrill voices was punctuated by the blatter of gunfire—the antique muskets of the Redskins being answered by desultory volleys from rifles and revolvers of a more up-to-date pattern.

On rushed the fiendish warriors of the prairie, and, though they were some distance from the scene of the action, Kentucky and his colleagues could have fanced that they heard the swelling thunder of the Indian charge. But the foremost braves were not yet within bowshot of the wagons when Kentucky turned to address his three pardners.

"We can get within a hundred yards of the schooners by takin' that draw," he said tersely, indicating a dry gully that ran across from the spot where they had halted to the arroyo whence the settlers had issued a minute or two previously. "Come on, boys!"

Trigger, Dude and Mike Morales could not guess what was in his mind. But he was their accepted leader, and without question or hesitation they followed him at a gallop as he dipped down into the gully. Thus in the space of a few seconds they were reasonably close to the locale of the wagon-coral, and, flinging themselves from their brones, they scrambled up the slope of a sharp embankment with their forty-fives in their hands.

Gaining the summit of the acclivity they obtained a clear impression of the fight that was now being waged. There stood the coral of wagons, with too many gaps in the roughly formed circle; and there were the howling Redskins—rounding the barricades now in break-neck style, enfolding the defenders with musketry and arrows, and making sudden dashes that threatened to carry them within the ring of prairie schooners.

"Looks like they're gonna break through any second," Dude Hanford rapped out. "If they do, it will be all up with the whites. What's your play, Kentucky?"

"Spread out and start firing," was the laconic reply. "Make it look like there's a whole crowd of us."

He flung himself down amid the scrub that fringed the edge of the gully, and the others imitated his example, Dude selecting a vantage point a little to Kentucky's left, Trigger and Mike deploying to the right. And an instant later four Colts were belching death at the Indians from an unexpected quarter.

The Redskins speedily became aware that they were being attacked by a party of newcomers, and, the first half-dozen shots from the gully unhorsing five of the braves, the remainder of the savages wavered uncertainly. Then all at once they broke formation and began to ride off in the direction of the ridge where they had first appeared.

The guns of Kentucky and his friends helped to accelerate the retreat of the warriors, who were almost out of range when the four white men remounted their brones and spurred towards the wagon-coral.

A few seconds later the quartet were within the ring of prairie schooners, by which time the Indians had realised how meagre were the reinforcements that had come to the aid of the settlers. But, though the Redskins wheeled to launch a second onset, the defenders were able to close up the coral of wagons before the enemy could draw near once more.

The combat was renewed, the Indian braves making furious attempts to break through the circle of schooners. Now, however, the improvised barricade was well-nigh impregnable, and the withering blasts of gunfire that challenged the warriors took heavy toll, so that in less than five minutes the savages were again retiring.

This time they did not rally, but vanished over the crest of the ridge, leaving half their number dead or dying on the plain. As for the settlers, they had sustained only a handful of casualties, and it was while these were receiving attention that Kentucky Wade and his friends were approached by an elderly man who seemed to be the leader of the wagon-train.

"Well," this individual declared, "I reckon we won't have no more trouble with that partic'lar band of varmints, but they might've had our scalps if you fellers hadn't provided us with a chance of tightenin' up our defences. If you happen to be goin' our way, we'd be glad to have you trail along with us."

It was Kentucky who answered him.

"Thanks, old-timer," he said, "but we're heading west for a locale known as Paradise Valley. Maybe you can direct us there."

A frown seemed to gather upon the other man's brow, and he looked at Kentucky solemnly.

"Our wagon tracks will lead you right into Paradise Valley," he murmured, "but I wouldn't advise any friend of mine to go there."

"Why not?" Kentucky asked. "Indians?"

"The Indians are bad," the old fellow conceded. "But the whites in that district are worse than the Indians ever dared to be. That's why all these people here are pulling out and going back home to the east."

Kentucky Wade exchanged a glance with Trigger Benton, Dude Hanford and Mike Morales. Then he turned to the wagon-boss again.

"Do you happen to know a rancher in Paradise Valley by the name of Larry Munro?" he inquired.

"Larry Munro? Why, sure—he's one of the few decent men left there. I tried to persuade him to move out with the rest of us, but he wouldn't quit."

"No, Larry wouldn't," Kentucky mused. "Well, he's the man my friends and I want to see, and I'd be mighty obliged to you if you'd tell us exactly where his ranch lies."

The wagon-boss described the route to the Munro outfit, and, thanking him for the information, Kentucky and his comrades prepared to resume their westward journey. But prior to their departure the old man made a further effort to dissuade them from their project.

"There ought to be enough cash here to guarantee Larry's appearance on this trumped-up murder charge," Kentucky declared. "Now where will we find Judge Lawrence?"

"Why don't you turn back and ride with us?" he counselled. "I'm warnin' you that if you go into Paradise Valley—especially as friends of Larry Munro—you may never come out alive."

"I'm afraid that's a chance we've got to take," was Kentucky's reply, and a moment afterwards he and Trigger Benton were cantering out of the wagon-coral with Dude Hanford and Mike Morales.

They left to the accompaniment of shouts of farewell from the settlers whom they had encountered, and a little while later a fold in the landscape had hidden these from their view. Then, mindful of the directions they had received from the wagon-boss, they pushed on into a verdant expanse of country that was vastly different from the barren wastes they had crossed during the few preceding days.

It was in the early afternoon that they sighted a trim ranch-house ahead of them, and, judging it to be their destination, they made straight for it.

Even as they dismounted a girl emerged from the front door of the building. She was a stranger to the four callers, but they remembered that Larry had often spoken to them in the past of his sister, and when he had elected to set up as a rancher in Arizona he had told them that she had written to him, offering to give up a position as teacher at a school in Santa Fé, and keep house for him in his new venture.

Looking at her now, they saw that she was singularly attractive, with dark hair and dark eyes, a mouth as red as a rose, and the slender, supple figure of a girl who spent a good deal of her life out of doors.

She was dressed in riding-kit, and it was unusually becoming to her. Indeed, Kentucky Wade for one was profoundly impressed by the loveliness of her, though at the same time he was aware that the expression on her features suggested hostility.

"We're looking for Larry Munro, ma'am," he said to her. "Is he here?"

"What's your business with Larry Munro?" she countered suspiciously.

Kentucky regarded her in a whimsical fashion.

"We don't rightly know, ma'am, until we talk to him," he confessed. "You see, he sent for us—said he was in some sort of trouble. My name is Wade."

"Wade!" the girl ejaculated, her manner undergoing a complete change. "Kentucky Wade! Why, I might have known it! I'm Larry's sister—Lucy Munro."

"I kind of guessed that, ma'am," Kentucky rejoined. "But, since you seem to know me by name, maybe Larry's told you about Trigger Benton here—and Dude Hanford—an' Mike Morales."

He presented each of his comrades in turn, and after smilingly acknowledging the introductions Lucy Munro turned towards a window of the ranch-house, where the newcomers now observed the figure of a cowboy who had apparently been covering them.

"It's all right, Buck," the girl sang out. "These are Larry's best friends."

She turned to Kentucky and his partners again with an apologetic air.

"I'm sorry if I seemed a little unfriendly just now," she told them.

"But Larry wasn't fooling when he wrote to you and said he was in trouble, and I thought you might be some of the men who have been trying to scare him off his land. Gee, won't he be glad to see you, though!"

Kentucky nodded.

"We'll sure be glad to see him, too, Miss Lucy," he stated. "But supposing you let him know we're here."

October 2nd, 1937.

"He isn't around right now," the girl answered, a hint of uneasiness in her voice. "He left for town this morning without telling me, and when you showed up I was just on the point of going there myself—because—well, because he's made a good many enemies and I'm worried about him."

Kentucky addressed her crisply.

"In that case, Miss Lucy," he announced, "I reckon we'll ride along with you."

The cowboy known as Buck had emerged from the ranch-house by this time, and Lucy Munro dispatched him to a near-by stable with instructions to saddle a pony for her. Then, when he had returned with a mount, she climbed astride the animal, whereupon Kentucky Wade and his three friends likewise swung themselves on to their broncs.

"All right, Miss Lucy," Kentucky said. "Lead the way—and maybe while we're headin' into town you'll be good enough to give us the low-down on the situation."

The girl wheeled in a westerly direction, and the four men who had travelled from New Mexico in response to her brother's communication moved after her, Mike Morales first of all handling his guitar to the cowboy named Buck and requesting him to take care of it for him.

A little while later Lucy Munro and her companions had picked up a beaten track that wound through a belt of chaparral. It was a trail which led to a township that had sprung up when Paradise Valley had first been settled by white men—a township wherein Kentucky Wade and his friends were destined to recall the ominous warning of that veteran wagon-boss who had tried to dissuade them from penetrating farther into Arizona.

Under Arrest

TO all appearance the town of Brimstone was a thriving and prosperous settlement, but woven into the very roots of its existence were elements of vice and rascality which the efforts of a conscientious sheriff and an incorruptible judge had failed to erash.

Brimstone, founded by a group of hardy pioneers, had become the stamping-ground of a sinister organisation recruited from the scum of the West—gunmen, gamblers, renegades—human vultures who had not only driven honest, law-abiding citizens from the town itself, but who had made life intolerable for many of the ranchers owning property in that fair strip of territory known as Paradise Valley.

It had been difficult to collect evidence against the scoundrels responsible for the innumerable acts of violence that had been committed in and around Brimstone. Certain clear-thinking citizens, however, had formed the conviction that the lawless elements in the town were acting under the orders of some individual, or body of individuals, who were out to obtain a strangle-hold on the entire valley.

Yet it would have surprised those self-same citizens to learn that the headquarters of Brimstone's organised criminals were located in the offices of the local news-sheet, owned and edited by Matt Keeler.

On the day that Larry Munro left his outlying ranch to ride into town, Matt Keeler might have been seen in his private sanctum with half a dozen of his cronies, chief among whom was Doc Hardy, a stoop-shouldered man in the late thirties, whose sallow countenance wore an expression of smug complacency.

Keeler himself, the highly esteemed owner and editor of the "Brimstone

News," and a supposed crusader against the vice and villainy that reigned in the town, was a tall, spare man of about forty-five. Like Hardy, he was dressed in soberly elegant clothes which gave him an air of respectability, and there was nothing about him to suggest that he was the associate of criminals, though a keen judge of character might have observed that his puritanical face possessed certain defects—the eyes being too closely set, and the thin-lipped mouth indicating a streak of cruelty in his nature.

At the moment he was engaged in quoting the final paragraph of an article which had been written by himself and which had appeared in that morning's edition of the "Brimstone News."

"And it is this paper's opinion," he was proclaiming, in a dry, nasal voice that held more than a trace of amusement, "it is this paper's opinion that when peaceful settlers are driven from their homes by organised outlaws, it is high time the people of the whole section took matters into their own hands."

The statement was greeted with laughter by the other occupants of the room, and then Doc Hardy volunteered a comment.

"Comin' from you, Matt," he said with a grin, "that editorial is a classic."

Keeler laid aside the newspaper from which he had been reading.

"It's editorials like this that have fooled Brimstone and the whole of Paradise Valley," he remarked.

"Meanwhile, on my instructions, the boys have been going about their business, and in consequence nearly all the ranchers have gone, leaving us free to take over their property."

"Yes," Doc Hardy rejoined, "and when we get Larry Munro's place the organisation will control a fifteen-mile stretch of border. It will be easy then to slip over into Mexican territory from time to time—grab the cattle that are there for the taking—and run 'em back over the line."

Another of the company raised his voice. Known as Steve Claggett, he was a big, uncouth ruffian who had earned an ugly reputation for himself as a gunman.

"It might not be so easy to get Munro's ranch," he growled. "You take it from me, that hombre will put up a fight."

"Yeah?" said Doc Hardy, rounding on him. "Well, if it's a fight he wants, I reckon you know how to handle him, Steve."

"Steve ain't the only one in this outfit that knows how to handle the likes of Munro."

The words were uttered by a lank-haired customer who was seated on Claggett's left. The son of a renegade white man and an Indian squaw, he answered to the name of Buckskin, and he had inherited the worst qualities of both the races whose mingled blood flowed in his veins.

"You're right, Buckskin," declared Keeler. "There are plenty of men in the organisation who know how to handle Munro. On my authority Steve here has already offered him a price for his land, and if Munro continues to reject that offer—well, he'll go the way of other men who—"

It was at this juncture that the owner of the "Brimstone News" was interrupted by a man lounging near the window of the room, a swarthy, bearded man of unsavoury appearance.

"Hey, there's Larry Munro now, an' I he's stoppin' at the bank. Maybe he's ready to sell out."

The other inmates of the office crowded to the window, and saw a tall, strapping young fellow of twenty-five dismounting outside a building a little way along the main street of the town. He was Larry Munro, and after tethering his pony to a hitch-rail, he walked across the threshold of the premises outside which he had halted.

Keeler turned to the man who had first espied the rancher.

"Nevada," he said, "you and Steve Claggett get over there and see what you can find out. And if Munro isn't here to strike a bargain—well, now's as good a time as any for a show-down. You understand?"

The rogue who called himself Nevada inclined his head significantly, and, accompanied by Steve Claggett, made his way from the room, and some thirty seconds later the pair of them were abreast of an alley that separated the bank from a neighbouring saloon.

Here Claggett stopped short and indicated the passage-way.

"You wait in the alley, Nevada," he muttered, "and be ready to back up any play I make."

Nevada slunk into the fissure between the bank and the saloon, and with a lurch to the gun he was wearing on his hip, Steve Claggett strolled up to the doorway of the building into which Larry Munro had vanished.

As he entered the bank he saw the young rancher standing at the counter. He was in conversation with a man named Purvis, who was not only the cashier of the establishment, but also an essayer of precious metals, and Purvis was examining a chunk of quartz that Larry Munro had apparently handed over to him.

"It's not gold rock, Larry," Claggett heard Purvis say. "I can tell you that right now."

"There's some kind of metal in that ore, though," Larry Munro affirmed. "Look at those specks in it."

Purvis glanced up at that moment, caught sight of Steve Claggett in the doorway, but without making any comment, fixed his attention on the sample of rock again. Then he shrugged his shoulders and addressed Munro once more.

"I don't think this ore is going to add a cent to the value of your land," he said, "but I'll test it if you say so."

"All right," was the reply. "I've got one or two things to do in town, and I'll drop in on you to hear the result of your assay before I leave for home."

He moved away from the counter, and, as he did so, came face to face with Claggett, who eyed him through narrowed lids.

"Hallo, Munro," Claggett greeted. "I hear you've decided to sell your ranch."

The cattleman's tanned and rugged features seemed to harden.

"You heard wrong," he announced curtly.

"Yeah? Well I think you're makin' a mistake, Munro. If I was in your place—"

"You're not in my place and you never will be!" Larry broke in, and the sting in his voice whipped a dark flush into the other's countenance.

"It sounds like you're lookin' for trouble," Claggett growled ominously.

"No, but I ain't running away from any. And you can tell your boss, whoever he is, that he and all his hired killers are not running me off my ranch the Circle D."

Steve Claggett took a step nearer to Larry Munro.

"Are you huntin' that—"

"I don't hunt, Claggett! You heard what I said, and I reckon you know what I meant—and if you don't like the sound of it I'm ready for any move you care to make."

Claggett's fingers were within six inches of his gun, and for an instant it looked as if he meant to draw. But he happened to know that Larry Munro was reputed to be pretty quick on the trigger when the occasion demanded, and, restraining the impulse to reach for his "iron" there and then, he affected to recover his composure.

"Aw, shueks, Larry," he protested, "there's no sense in you and me havin' any trouble."

"That's up to you!" the younger man snapped, and, pushing past him strode out of the bank.

He had scarcely departed when Claggett exchanged a meaning glance with Purvis, and then, plucking his revolver from its holster, the gunman slipped out on to the porch.

Larry Munro was at the hitch-rail. He had his back to Claggett and was preparing to swing himself into the saddle of his horse, but, as if warned by some sixth sense, he chanced to turn his head and caught the would-be assassin in the act of lifting his forty-five to take aim at him.

With a gesture that was as swift as sleight of hand Larry whipped his own gun from its sheath, and a split-second later the weapon belched flame and lead, the bullet scoring Claggett's wrist so that he uttered a yelp of pain and dropped his revolver without discharging it.

Immediately afterwards another shot rang out. It was a shot that came from the alley where Nevada had posted himself, but it missed by an inch, and before the gangster could fire again Larry had blazed at him and drilled him through the body.

Nevada pitched to the ground, and lay there lifelessly with his face buried in the dust, and hardly had he fallen than the street, which had been empty a moment previously, became thronged with men—men who came running from all directions to learn the cause of the gunplay.

At that Steve Claggett bent down and retrieved his six-shooter. He made no attempt to level it at Larry again, however, but instead he darted to the huddled figure of Nevada and snatched up the latter's revolver, thrusting his own into the dead man's holster.

The interchange of weapons escaped the notice of Larry, and it likewise escaped the notice of the approaching groups of citizens, amongst whom was the sheriff of Brimstone, a sturdy, grey-haired officer who had served the cause of law and order faithfully, although here in Paradise Valley the dice had been heavily loaded against him.

The sheriff was the first to reach the scene of the gun-duel.

"What's happened here, Munro?" he demanded.

"Plenty," Larry answered hoily. "Claggett and that hombre Nevada tried to get me!"

"That's a lie!"

It was Claggett who shouted the words. He was still kneeling beside Nevada, with the man's forty-five in his grasp and his own gun reposing in the fallen crook's holster.

"Munro started it, sheriff!" Claggett went on. "He shot Nevada without givin' him a chance to draw! Take a look at Nevada's gun an' see for yourself!"

The sheriff moved over to him, and, stooping, tugged out the revolver that Claggett had planted in the dead man's

"Why don't you let Larry Munro out of his cell and give him back his forty-five, sheriff?" Kentucky said with clenched teeth. "If we're going to hold this mob at bay, we've got to make every bullet count, and Larry sure knows how to use a gun!"

holster. Then, after examining it, he returned to where the young rancher was standing.

"This looks bad, Larry," he said solemnly. "Nevada's gun was on his hip and it ain't been fired."

"Of course it ain't been fired!" Steve Claggett ground out. "Munro shot him down cold. I drew because he turned his iron on me after he'd rubbed out Nevada, an' he'd have finished me as well if I hadn't spoiled his aim by puttin' a bullet past his head."

Larry was staring at the forty-five which the sheriff had removed from Nevada's body, but he riveted his attention on the weapon in Claggett's possession as the rogue broke it open to reveal that it had been discharged.

"Claggett," he rasped, "you've swapped guns with your side-kick. You're tryin' to frame me. You know darn' well you came outa the bank and tried to plug me through the back. Then, when I was too quick for you, Nevada took a shot at me from the alley, an' I had to drill him in self-defence."

"A pack of lies, sheriff!" Steve Claggett expostulated, wheeling towards the representative of the law. "I was the one that had to fire in self-defence. Yeah, an' I was lucky to come outa the ruckus with nothin' worse than a blistered wrist. But poor Nevada—he didn't have a chance."

Larry turned to face the crowd of bystanders who had assembled in front of the bank.

"Say, didn't anybody see what took place?" he appealed.

There was a movement among the onlookers, and a man named Hudson thrust his way to the fore.

"Yeah, I saw the whole business," he volunteered stoutly. "I was a-sittin' in my front window across the street, and it all happened just as you—"

Hudson stopped. He had suddenly become aware that a knife was being pressed threateningly against his back. It was a knife held in the dusky fist of the half-breed known as Buckskin, who had been one of the earliest arrivals on the scene of the affray.

Hudson recalled that more than one man who had offered to testify against the ruffianly elements in Brimstone had never lived to tell his story before judge and jury, so that for their own safety honest citizens had of late closed their eyes to many a dark deed.

"Go on," urged Larry, but Hudson had lost his nerve with that dagger surreptitiously caressing his spine.

"Well, I—I was on the other side of the street," he mumbled lamely, "an' everything happened so quick that I couldn't rightly say who started it."

The sheriff spoke.

"A fine witness you'd make, Hudson," he said; and then to Larry Munro: "I'm sorry, young feller, but I'll have to lock you up pending an investigation into this affair."

He relieved the rancher of his six-gun, and, summoning a couple of deputies who had joined the crowd, gave them instructions concerning the disposal of Nevada's body, after which he marched Larry Munro in the direction of the gaol.

Outside the bank, Steve Claggett exchanged a glance with the half-breed known as Buckskin, then looked up the street towards the offices of the "Brimstone News," where the figures of Matt Keeler and Doc Hardy were distinctly visible in one of the windows.

October 2nd, 1937.

Siege

HALF an hour after Larry Munro had been confined in a cell behind the sheriff's office, four men and a girl walked into the gaol and confronted Brimstone's representative of the law.

The girl was Lucy; the men Kentucky Wade, Trigger Benton, Dude Hanford and Mike Morales; and although the sheriff looked upon Larry Munro's sister with a kindly enough eye he regarded her companions with a good deal of suspicion.

"What do you strangers want?" he demanded, observing the forty-fives that were packed on their hips. "It ain't customary to walk into my office wearin' so much hardware."

It was Kentucky who answered him.

"We've no intention of using our hardware, sheriff," he said. "We're friends of Larry Munro and his sister here, and we've just learned that Larry is under arrest—and we'd like to know the whys and wherefores, that's all."

Before the sheriff could offer any response there was a shout from the cell in which his prisoner was lodged.

"Kentucky Wade! Dude! Mike! Trigger! Why, you old scorpions! It's all right, sheriff. They used to be law officers themselves back home."

The voice was Larry's, of course, and in another moment his friends and his sister were before the bars of his cell. Then while the sheriff looked on, the prisoner gave Lucy and her companions a detailed account of the shooting affray that had occurred outside the bank.

When he had finished his story, Kentucky Wade turned to Brimstone's guardian of the peace.

"Say, couldn't we bail Larry out, sheriff?" he asked.

"You'll have to see Judge Lawrence about that," was the reply, "and it'll probably cost you a heap of money."

Kentucky produced a wad of notes and glanced at Mike, Trigger and Dude.

"Come on, boys, shell out," he said, and without hesitation his three comrades parted with all the money that they possessed, so that Kentucky was holding a considerable sum in his hands when he addressed the sheriff again.

"There ought to be enough cash here to guarantee Larry's appearance on this trumped-up murder charge," he declared. "Now where will we find Judge Lawrence?"

The sheriff looked at his watch.

"He'll most likely be over at the Silver Dollar saloon," he answered. "He generally drops in there for a quiet drink about this time of day. I'll take you to him if you like."

Leaving Lucy with her brother, Kentucky and his friends accompanied Brimstone's representative of the law from the gaol, and two or three minutes later they were seated at a table in the Silver Dollar bar-room with the aforementioned Judge Lawrence, a portly old fellow of sober mien.

The sheriff introduced them to the judge, adding that he understood they were former law officers from the State of New Mexico. Then he went on to refer to their proposal concerning the temporary release of Larry Munro, whereupon Lawrence knitted his brows.

"Granting bail to a man accused of murder is a serious business, sheriff," he muttered.

"Judge," Kentucky Wade interposed, "if you knew Larry Munro as well as I know him, nothing could convince you that he's a murderer. He claims to have shot this man Nevada in self-defence, and I'm certain in my own mind that he did."

The sheriff of Brimstone leaned forward at this point and spoke to Lawrence earnestly.

"I had to arrest Munro, judge," he said. "There was no alternative. But, personally, I'd rather trust his word than that of the man who accused him. I've never been able to pin anything on Steve Claggett, but I know he's a feller who's earned himself a bad record in other parts of the country. And come to that, Nevada wasn't my idea of a peaceable citizen either."

"Then you're in favour of granting bail, sheriff?" Judge Lawrence asked.

The sheriff nodded, and at that Lawrence stood up.

"Very well," he announced. "Since you recommend it, I'll make out the necessary papers and bring them over to your office."

He left the saloon there and then. As for the sheriff and the four men who had volunteered to put up bail for Larry Munro, they also departed from the building, repairing in the direction of the gaol-house. But they had scarcely trooped out of the Silver Dollar when one of the bar-tenders in the establishment beckoned to an individual leaning against the counter.

The individual in question was none other than Matt Keeler, and as he moved across to the barman the latter spoke to him in an undertone.

"Did yuh see them strangers that was here with the sheriff an' Judge Lawrence just now?" he whispered.

"Yes, who were they, Dan?"

"I dunno," rejoined the bar-tender, obviously an agent in Keeler's pay. "But they were talkin' about Larry Munro, an' it seems Judge Lawrence is gonna let Munro out on bail."

A sinister gleam revealed itself in Matt Keeler's eyes. Then he swung round and made for the street-door of the saloon—had almost reached it when Steve Claggett, Buckskin and several more of their ilk came in over the threshold.

Keeler accosted them, and addressed them out of the corner of his mouth, repeating the information that the barman had given him, after which he went on to outline a plan of campaign.

"Claggett, you break the news to the crowd and get 'em worked up," he said. "The rest of you boys support him. If you can stage a necktie party it will be one way of finishing Munro, and his land will be ours for the taking then, for his sister should be easy to handle."

He slipped out of the saloon, to locate Doc Hardy and to await the result of the orders he had given Claggett and his cronies. Nor was it long before those orders were being put into execution, for within a few minutes of Keeler's departure Steve Claggett was loudly haranguing the patrons of the Silver Dollar bar-room.

"I tell yuh, men," he shouted, "it's about time the citizens o' this town took the law into their own hands! Can yuh wonder that Brimstone has grown ter be a hang-out for all the outlaws in the territory when a guy like Munro can shoot a man dead an' then get his friends to buy him outa the pen?"

"It's the plain, unvarnished truth I'm givin' yuh!" he continued hoarsely.

"An' Buckskin here will bear me out!" "That's right," the half-breed corroborated. "We heard Judge Lawrence agree to turn Munro loose on bail. Now are we gonna stand behind a system that will set a killer free half an hour after he's committed his crime?"

"No, no! You bet we ain't!"

The chorus was raised by those who had entered the saloon in company with Steve, Claggett and Buckskin, and by their example they inspired disaffection

(Continued on page 25)

A young doctor exposes, via radio broadcasts, a number of fraudulent patent medicines, his bitterest attack being aimed at a manufacturer of radium cures. This results in a bitter fight, in which the manufacturer tries every means to defeat the young doctor. A stirring drama, starring Robert Livingston and Grace Bradley

"LARCENY ON THE AIR"

Radium Poisoning

DR. LAWRENCE BAXTER held a bottle of tablets in his hand. His strong, young face was drawn with an angry frown.

"Kennedy Radium Products," he muttered softly. "Radium Rejuvenating Tablets. The miraculous twentieth-century tonic! Pal!"

A trim nurse knocked and entered. "Mr. MacDonald to see you, doctor," she announced; but he was so abstracted in his work that he did not hear. "Mr. MacDonald, of the Bureau of Pure Foods and Drugs, is here," she said more loudly.

"MacDonald?" he questioned. "Oh, yes; I asked the inspector to look round. Send him in, please."

A grim, stern-faced, big-shouldered man. A typical hard-bitten inspector, who stared curiously round the large laboratory.

"Howdy, Larry!" The inspector held out his hand. "Bless my soul, what are these monkeys doing here?"

"Experiments," was the laconic answer. "See that old ape?" He pointed to a cage. "Doesn't look too good, does he?"

"What disease is he suffering from?"

"It's not a disease, Mac—he's dying of a cure." He held up the bottle.

"Lying from taking Kennedy's rejuvenating tablets. That's the result of a three months' course of treatment."

"Well, you know what radium is good for—you know what harm it can do. Why kill a poor monkey?"

"This old fellow was suffering from old age, and he hadn't long to live, anyhow," Larry explained. "I've been doing a good many experiments for your department, and I was not very keen on these tablets, so I tried them out on Sam. We want to stop Kennedy from killing humans. We've got to awaken people to their danger."

The detective nodded. "I've known for some while this stuff was dangerous," he stated.

"Then why don't you do something about it? There is a law—"

MacDonald interrupted with a bar-lr laugh. "Do you think Kennedy doesn't know the law?" He picked up the bottle from a table. "Look at his label. There isn't a definite claim on it. Suggested as a treatment for various complaints, and he also says it contains radium. Well, does it?"

"Yes." "That's all the law cares about."

"But, Mac, this man has to be stopped. He's a potential murderer."

"Your broadcasts are doing a lot of good," replied the inspector.

"But that is not enough," argued Larry. "We have to get to him. Why not get him into your office and I'll try to scare him?"

"Okay; but mind how you step. Kennedy knows all the answers."

In MacDonald's office the next day there was a meeting. Kennedy was a grey-haired, handsome man, with a hearty manner and friendly handshake. The inspector held out the bottle of tablets.

"This is your stuff, isn't it?" "Sure, that's one of my products," Kennedy seemed sure of himself. "So what?"

"Plenty."

"I presume, MacDonald, this is another of your warnings?"

MacDonald indicated the young doctor.

"You, no doubt, have heard Doctor Lawrence Baxter broadcast?"

"So you're the young medico who is determined to get me out of business. This is a pleasure," Kennedy said, with a beaming smile.

"Thanks," Larry answered, with a sardonic grin.

"He has something to say to you," stated MacDonald.

"I prefer to listen to him on the radio," laughed Kennedy. "I can always turn him off."

"I think you'll listen to this, Kennedy," tensely spoke the doctor. "I've been declaring over the air that this rejuvenator of yours is just the opposite—it's a destroyer of health. Maybe you'll stop smiling when I tell you that I have positive proof of what I'm saying."

"You amaze me, Doctor Baxter."

"That stuff caused a death."

"A death?" Kennedy questioned.

For the first time he seemed a trifle perturbed. "For the past three months I've been feeding it to a chimpanzee—it died last night."

Kennedy roared with laughter.

"A monkey!" he gasped at once. "I thought by the way you talked it might be a near relative." The smile vanished and he became serious. "But all joking aside, My medicine is grand stuff, and I'm strictly within the law."

"If it can kill a monkey it can kill a human."

"My dear Doctor Baxter, this remedy brings in a thousand testimonials a month," bragged Kennedy. "What do you say to that?"

"Do you think I don't know how testimonials are bought?"

"My dear boy, I assure you they were genuine, unsolicited, and many of them were accompanied by photographs." He took up his hat from the desk. "The next time you think you have to warn me—do so by telephone, as my time's valuable."

"Just a moment, Kennedy." MacDonald barred his way. "From now on your production is under suspicion. We'll appeal to every reputable drug firm to shut off your supply of radium."

"That doesn't worry me in the least. Good day, gentlemen."

"That rotten, low-down—" muttered Larry, when the door had closed.

"Now take it easy," begged the inspector. "What he says is right. The law has no teeth. There's nothing we can do."

"No, nothing we can do." Larry hesitated. "Unless, against his thousand phony testimonials we can find one—one person who's been hurt by taking his cure-all. Then we could get him."

An Advanced Case

KENNEDY sat in his huge room at the Radium Products factory.

Burke, one of his bodyguard, sprawled in a chair. Kennedy glanced at his watch and switched on a large wireless.

The voice of Dr. Lawrence Baxter filled the room.

"My subject to-day is Kennedy's Radium Rejuvenating Tablets. I have conducted exhaustive experiments with this dangerous drug to ascertain its harmfulness. The results of my test prove it to be a menace to the lives of the public. Mr. Kennedy is acting within the letter of the law in distributing this radium medicine—"

"He's sure asking for it," muttered Burke. "Why don't you let me take care of him?"

"Act like a grown man, Burke," grinned Kennedy.

"He's hurting our business."

"My business can hold out longer than he can."

"I am not attacking druggists and the makers of proprietary medicines in general," Larry stated in his clear tones. "I am talking about the exception. Radium Rejuvenator is the most dangerous of these. It claims to be the fountain of youth in capsule form. On the contrary, my friends, it ages you prematurely. It destroys vital organs and nerve fibres. If you have been taking any of these medicines for any length of time, and recognise the symptoms I have described, then you are a victim of radium poisoning, and I urge you to consult your physician at once."

Kennedy was no longer smiling as he switched off the wireless. He picked up a phone.

"Get my lawyer," he ordered curtly.

"I am not soliciting patients," Larry concluded his talk. "I will treat any sufferers from radium poisoning at my own expense. I intend to broadcast this appeal every time I speak over the radio."

The announcer informed Larry that Mr. Golden, the manager of the broadcasting station, wished to speak with him in his office. He walked down some corridors till he came to an ante-room. A very pretty, dark-haired girl jumped up from a lounge chair directly she saw him.

"Dr. Baxter."

October 2nd, 1937,

"Yes?"

"May I speak to you?"

"Just a moment, please," Larry smiled politely. "I'm wanted by the manager."

Mr. Golden was a thin, hairless, pallid individual.

"Dr. Baxter, I'm very sorry, but I am going to have to cancel your broadcast."

"Why?"

"Well, you see, this station is run on a commercial basis," the manager said nervously.

"Has somebody bought my time?"

"Oh, I'm so glad you understand. They offered three times the amount you were paying for a period of twenty-six weeks."

"Well, if it's just the question of a different hour—that wouldn't matter."

"I'm sorry, but that was the only available time we had."

"I see." Larry's eyes narrowed. "They really didn't want my time. They just didn't want to have any time. It wasn't a man by the name of Kennedy by any chance, was it?"

"Oh, no, doctor," the man answered much too quickly. "It's music—an Hawaiian orchestra to advertise some pineapples."

"Don't waste any more time explaining," Larry said with a hard smile. "Good-day."

Once again in the ante-room the pretty girl stopped him.

"Dr. Baxter!"

"I'm sorry I couldn't stop before. What is it?"

"I'm Jean Sterling," the girl said. "I suppose you've heard of my father, Professor Rexford Sterling."

"Yes—yes—of course." He was impatient to be gone—to tell Mac of Kennedy's latest trick.

"His work is somewhat similar to yours. He's publishing this monthly bulletin."

Larry hardly glanced at the paper which she gave him.

"All right, I'll take it for a year."

"Dr. Baxter, I'm not canvassing for new readers. My father would like to talk to you. In fact, he would like to sponsor you over a large station, where you could reach a greater audience. A daily programme, Dr. Baxter."

Now Larry sat up and took notice. This was a gift from the gods in a time of need.

"When can I see him?"

"Why not now?"

"It would suit me splendidly," agreed Larry, and followed the girl from the ante-room down to the entrance, where he helped her into his powerful two-seater car. A short ride took them to an imposing building that Larry knew had only been erected a few months before. A lift shot them to the top floor. The offices of "YOUR GOOD HEALTH" seemed very well fitted out, though the huge outer room only had one clerk, who was yawning over a racing paper.

"Hallo, Jimmy! Dad in?"

"Yes, Miss Sterling."

They entered a large room, where at a huge desk sat a round, bald-headed, learned-looking man. He was surrounded by phones and documents.

"Hallo, Dad. I've brought Dr. Baxter."

The fat man jumped up from his seat and held out a large hand.

"This is an honour, doctor," he cried enthusiastically. "I have the greatest admiration for your work."

The door into the outer office Jean had left open, and when Jimmy heard the name of Dr. Baxter, he put away his paper. He pressed a button that made his phone ring. He spoke loudly.

"Yes, this is the office of 'Your Good Health.'" Pause. "What? Certainly not!" Another pause. "There isn't enough money in the United States Treasury to make us stop. You can't buy us. The analysis is going to be printed as it is. Good-day."

"Shut the door, Jean," said Professor Sterling. "Sit down, Dr. Baxter. I expect you can guess what my clerk was talking about. You've probably had the same sort of experience yourself."

"Very often," answered Larry. "Bribes, and when they fail—threats."

"That's inevitable when you tread on the toes of profit-makers on behalf of the defenceless, as you are doing. Your broadcasts have made a deep impression on me."

"Thank you, professor."

"I asked you to come here to-day to see if we couldn't join forces." The professor looked keenly at his visitor.

"Would you be interested?"

"What have you in mind, sir?"

"An hour on the air, sponsored by my magazine."

"Do you mean this?" gasped Larry, scarce crediting his good fortune.

"Of course he does," spoke Jean.

"That's why I came to the station."

"Well, I can't say how grateful I am," Larry said eagerly.

"Perhaps you won't be when I discuss your fee," chuckled the professor.

"Fee be hanged," cried the doctor. "There won't be any fee. I'll do it just because I—"

"Because you believe in what you're doing?" Jean said very seriously.

"Naturally." Larry smiled from the girl to her father. "Do you mind if I use your phone? I haven't called the office in hours."

Professor Sterling gave his daughter a slight wink as Larry got through to his laboratory.

"Any news, nurse? Baxter speaking."

"There's an old man waiting to see you," reported Nurse Nelson. "He says he came in response to your radio appeal."

"Hold him there," shouted Larry. "I'll be over in about ten minutes." He lunged up and turned to the professor. "You'll excuse me, won't you? An urgent case. We can talk about the details later." He held out his hand to the girl. "Thanks a lot for coming to the station. You don't know what this means to me."

Larry hastened back to his laboratory, and he was tremendously excited directly he saw the old man. Pete Andorka was a Greek. A quaint, nervous creature, very thin, with bloodshot eyes and shaking hands. He persuaded Pete to strip, and made several tests.

"What kind of work do you do?"

"I sell newspaper—twenty-eight year sell newspaper—same corner."

"Did you ever work in a paint-shop or a watch-dial factory?"

"No."

"In a match factory?"

"No. I tell you I sell newspaper."

"All right," Larry soothed the old man with a kindly touch. "Why did you decide to buy that medicine?"

"I want to go back to old country. I not see old country in long time," was the pathetic reply.

"You wanted to look younger?"

"Yah—yah—so I buy make-you-young pills."

"How long have you been taking them?"

"Long time—maybe six months. It not make me young. It make me more old. Make me feel like you say on radio." He touched various parts of his body. "Hurt there—hurt here. Fresh air not come through."

"I understand," Larry nodded. "All right, you may get dressed now." He walked over to his nurse and lowered his voice. "Nelson, get me a private ambulance, phone Inspector MacDonald and tell him to meet me at the hospital."

On the way Larry told Pete there was nothing to worry about. He would be looked after free of charge and would soon be well. At the hospital he met MacDonald.

"All the symptoms of an advanced case of radium poisoning."

"Will he live?"

"I can't tell yet. Mac, I'm positive he got that way from taking Kennedy's pills, but the case would be thrown out of court if Kennedy could prove that my patient ever worked anywhere near radium. Check up on him, will you, Mac?"

"You bet I will." MacDonald gave a grin of appraisal. "Keep up the good work, Larry. We'll get this skunk Kennedy before we're much older."

The Patient Spirited Away

DR. LAWRENCE BAXTER was only too pleased to talk about other patent medicines and cures during his hour's broadcast.

"Your Good Health Magazine" wishes to thank you for the countless telephone calls, letters and telegrams received in response to our first broadcast," announced Jean at the commencement of the fourth broadcast.

"To-day I am going to devote my talk to a certain radiumised cough mixture. The advertisement says that it is just the thing for ailing children. An analysis of Swain's cough remedy shows it to contain enough radium to be dangerous to a hearty man, let alone an ailing child—"

Professor Sterling was at that moment interviewing Mr. Swain in person, who was spluttering with wrath.

"I admit Dr. Baxter may be causing you hundreds of cancellations. You see, Mr. Swain, you made a terrible mistake when you advertised that physicians recommended your medicine. Now, if you were a client of ours—"

"If I do advertise you'll forget about the analysis and shut the doctor up."

"Well"—the professor touched his finger-tips together and smiled like a cat—"I think that could be arranged."

That interview cost Mr. Swain the sum of four thousand dollars.

As Larry had nothing further on Kennedy until he had kept Pete under observation, he was quite willing to talk at the next broadcast about a certain Radium Hair Restorer patented by Jason Benner. The latter succeeded in quietening the professor with three thousand dollars.

At the end of the week Larry had a general talk.

"I'm sorry that television isn't in every home to-day," he announced. "So that instead of words I could show you the untold miseries brought on by these quack products. Then you would refrain from buying them. At this moment I have a patient in the Civic Hospital. A man condemned to death because of radium poisoning. His name is Pete Andorka. He was led to believe that some capsules would restore his waning vitality. I am now going back to hospital to see him to fight for his life."

Burke and Kennedy heard the broadcast.

"This guy is ten times as dangerous as he was, now he's on the air every day," Burke cried angrily. "Lemme take care of him, will ye, chief?"

"Burke, I want you to see that he doesn't get to the hospital in the next hour. You know the set-up, but don't get caught," rasped Kennedy.

"Leave it to me," chuckled Burke. "He won't get there in a hurry—and when he does, he'll stay there."

When Burke had gone Kennedy got in touch with Thomson, his lawyer.

As Larry was about to leave the offices of Dr. Sterling he was accosted by Jean, who begged him to take her along to the hospital. She wanted to see the patient.

"He's not a pleasant sight, Jean."

"I know, but I've had a little share in what you're doing and I'd like to help same way."

When they drove away from the building a powerful car, with Burke at the wheel, and two men in the back seats, tailed them.

Burke waited his opportunity, and it was as Larry was about to make a left-hand turn that the crook dashed up on the inside and charged the two-seater. Larry saw the danger and pushed his foot down. The crook's car, armed with powerful steel bumpers, caught the doctor's car a sideways blow. It was sufficient to topple the other car over, but not the fatal crash that Burke had planned.

Badly bruised and shaken, they were assisted by a policeman from the wreckage. The officer announced that it was a hit-and-run car that had struck them and a patrolman was trying to tail the offenders.

"That was no accident, Larry," Jean said tersely. "I reckon you made a mistake broadcasting Pete's whereabouts."

"Let's get to the hospital," Larry hailed a taxi. "I don't see how he can come to any harm—that hospital is as safe as a prison."

Thomson, the lawyer, was a smirking, shifty-eyed rascal with a plausible manner. He obtained permission to talk with Pete, who was in a private ward. Kennedy waited outside in a private ambulance.

"You should have come to us in the first place," Thomson told the not very intellectual Pete. "I handle the insurance for these remedies. Baxter

"I checked on 'em through the Federal Bureau of Investigation," stated the inspector. "A couple of grafters, and pretty slick ones."

isn't helping you. He's waiting for you to die."

"Me die?" Pete was seared. "Sure you'll die," cried the lawyer. "And he has a big case. We want to save you. We want you to live so we can give you the best doctors—many doctors, not just one doctor. We're anxious to make good. If there's been any mistake about your medicine we'll give you a thousand dollars."

"A thousand dollars!" It was a fortune to Pete. "All mine?" "Yes, and all you've got to do is sign this paper." The lawyer produced paper and pen. "Sign and you'll be taken to a good hospital."

When Larry came to the private ward and found his patient gone he got in touch with the superintendent. The latter reported that Pete Andorka had been discharged. He had paid his bill and signed his release. He had been taken away by a man who said he was his attorney.

Larry sent Jean home in a taxi whilst he rushed off to report to MacDonald, whom he had already warned by phone.

"Any luck?" he demanded, rushing into the inspector's office.

"No," was the answer. "I checked with every private ambulance and hospital in the vicinity, but I haven't given up hope yet."

"Oh, what's the use?" The young doctor sank dejectedly into a chair. "I was a first-class chump all right. I talked too much."

"You're a bigger chump than you think you are," MacDonald opened a drawer and pulled out two large cards. "Look at these."

Two pictures from the Rogues' Gallery. Though the two men were wearing convict uniform it was easy to recognise Professor Sterling and his fat clerk, Jimmy. Almost in a daze, Larry read their records.

"When you told me about 'em, I figured they were too good to be true," MacDonald said with a twisted smile. "So I checked on 'em through the Federal Bureau of Investigation. A couple of grafters, and pretty slick ones."

"And the girl?"

"Nothing on her so far."

"What's their racket this time?"

"A variation of the shakedown. You blast a patent medicine over the air, and they promise the manufacturer immunity from your attacks in return for advertising in the magazine. So simple."

Larry's smile was bitter. "I'm the prize mug."

"Well, you're lucky you found it out when you did. Another month, and you'd have been working for Kennedy himself."

Larry looked up quickly. "And that's exactly what I intend to do," he cried.

Kennedy's Trump Card

PROFESSOR STERLING shifted uncomfortably in his chair and Jimmy mopped his brow, because Jean was being difficult.

"I've known for some years that some of your dealings weren't above suspicion, but when I came back from college you got me to come into the business of editing the paper. Maybe I didn't know how contemptible we were. Well, I do now—and I'm the worst of the lot of us."

"You've done nothing, my dear." The old man tried to soothe her. "Why shouldn't we fleish some of the filthy lucre out of these crooked patent medicine manufacturers?"

"I'm not thinking about them," snapped Jean. "I brought him here, October 2nd, 1937.

didn't I? I covered you all the way, haven't I? I've lied and tricked and cheated—"

"Now, Jean, that's a bit unreasonable," argued her father. "We haven't hurt him at all. We've kept our promise and given the doc his chance on the air. We've never interfered with him."

"No, you've used him to prepare your victims," Jean glared at them with angry determination. "You're going to check out of this racket voluntarily, or I'll tell Larry the whole set-up."

"Larry, uh?" Professor Sterling gave a resigned sigh. "That young man's work means an awful lot to you, doesn't it?"

"Yes. Can't we help him and quit thinking about ourselves?"

"Is that what would make you happy?" asked the father, and when she gave a vehement nod of assent he glanced at Jimmy. "Looks as if we'll have to turn to the right."

The door opened to admit Larry, who was all smiles.

"Howdy, folks? How are you feeling, Jean, after the accident?"

"Oh, I'm fine, except for a slight cut on my knee."

"That's good news," grinned Larry. "You look a bit depressed, professor. Anything wrong?"

"Dr. Baxter, we were just discussing the—er—advisability of re-organising our activities," the professor said haltingly.

"That's good—you need to."

"I don't quite get your meaning?" the professor asked with a puzzled glance at the doctor.

Larry looked at the two men with a mocking expression.

"When I came here I thought you were all on the up-and-up, until I found out you were an outfit of petty chisellers."

The professor looked uncomfortable. "Well, doctor, a man has to live, and I don't see what wrong—"

"Forget it," interrupted Larry. "How much did you collect this week?"

"We took—" the professor began, and then looked suspiciously at Larry. "What did you say?"

"I asked how much you took this week?" The doctor spoke harshly. "You'd better tell me."

"Six thousand dollars."

"Is that all?" sneered Larry. "You're amateurs. Well, we'll change all that. In the meantime I'll take fifty per cent in cash."

"Larry!" gasped the horrified Jean. "Well?" He looked at her inquiringly.

"You don't mean that?"

"I mean that I always look a gift horse in the face, even a pretty one."

"Skip what I said, dad," Jean looked towards her father. "The little girl is on her feet again, coming up for the second round."

"Well, professor, you have my terms." Larry spoke briskly. "Reorganisation is what you want, and we'll have no more of this cheap-rate business."

"Of course not," smirked the delighted professor.

"I'm going to be in complete charge," stated the pseudo-crook. "I'll tell you who, why and when to shake down the clients. Now our first customer that we're going after is our old friend, Mr. Kennedy, and we're going after him in a big way. I think Mr. Kennedy will be ready to listen to reason by the time we get ready for him. Oh, and Jean, you can help. Just give him the honeyed smile that you gave me."

"Anything you say, my boy, goes with us," chuckled Sterling, and produced a piece of paper. "I have here a list of new victims"—he coughed—"I mean products, that need your immediate analysis. Do you think it wise to tackle Kennedy first, now these others seem—"

The professor broke off because the door opened, and into the room walked Kennedy, Swain and Burke. The professor and Jimmy had a bad attack of cold feet.

"Well, doctor, this is a surprise, but quite a pleasant one," affably spoke Kennedy, with a meaning glance at the people in the room. "I see all the partners are here." He gave his attention to Larry. "You know, doc, I thought I knew all the angles, but you've certainly dusted off a brand-new one."

"You're not wanted here, Kennedy," viciously spoke Larry. "Get out!" "Ha! Ha! That's a great act, doc," Kennedy roared with laughter. "But it's all right, you're among friends." With his hand he indicated his companion. "You gentlemen don't know Mr. Swain, do you? His cough syrup has been very profitable to you and your partners. Four thousand dollars you collected for a quarter column ad."

Larry began to get wise. His brain worked quickly. He must be very astute because it was obvious that Kennedy was very sure of himself. Swain must be the crook's master card.

"Have you the cancelled cheque, Mr. Swain?" Kennedy asked, and the other nodded. "You see, gentlemen, Mr. Swain is a member of my syndicate. The same as some of the others you've been paying attention to."

Larry grinned because he had been right about Swain.

"Gentlemen, I need your services as much as Mr. Swain does," stated Kennedy, looking round his eyes glinting triumphantly. They came to rest on Larry. "I could use a man like you, doc."

"Maybe I wouldn't care to go with you, Kennedy."

"Now, doctor, I should hate the idea of sending that cheque to the American Medical Association. It might cost you your licence to practise, and then you'd be of no use to me. So I'm keeping it, doc, but I expect a return for that kindness." He gave a sign, and Swain and Burke, who had watched but not spoken, moved to the door. "Now, you'll want some time to think over the many ways in which you may be of service to me." At the door he paused. "By the way, come to my Restorium to-night. The syndicate is having dinner, and you'll meet them all. I'll not take 'no' for an answer. Dinner at eight, shall we say?"

Larry spoke as if resigned to his fate. "Very well, dinner at eight."

"We shall be expecting you," Kennedy turned to the girl. "Of course, Miss Sterling, you'll come too, with the doctor and the professor. Good-day."

Kennedy walked to the lift. "Are you sure you can hold the doc in line?" Swain asked.

"As long as we've got that cheque there's nothing to worry about," Kennedy answered with confidence.

It was Jean who spoke first when Kennedy and his friends had gone.

"So your interest in the dear public was just an act," she said scornfully.

"And a pretty good act," was Larry's cheerful answer. "By the way, what was wrong with yours? Invited to a party and not even a smile for the nice man."

"And I thought you were a doctor!" cried Jean, and stalked out, slamming the door.

"You shall have the radium here by midnight," stated the man in black.

Larry is Arrested

AT eight o'clock all the guests had assembled at Kennedy's "Health Restorium" — amazing the number of businesses the man ran. After cocktails in a private room the party sat down at a long table in the main dining-room. Larry thought he had never sat down in such mixed company before—certainly the most crooked. Two of the guests were owners or manufacturers of patent medicines. A comical fellow named Andrews he imagined was in a similar position to Burke. Jean was the only woman present, and Larry guessed that her levity was forced. After the wine had gone round several times Kennedy roasted the syndicate, and in a short speech expressed a wish that there should be no hard feelings.

Over coffee and liqueurs the party became quite gay.

"With the doctor's co-operation we'll soon have the world by the tail," Kennedy said for all to hear.

"Oh, I'm afraid it's too late for that," said Larry.

"Doctor, don't be so gloomy. It won't take you long to undo any damage you may have done our business."

"That's not what I mean," Larry gave an impatient shake of his head. "I mean you've let your big chance go by."

"What do you mean—big chance?" questioned Swain.

"Listen, folks. You've got hold of radium, which, to the popular mind, sounds like a cure for anything that ails you, but you've missed the big chance."

"I think we've covered the field pretty thoroughly," Kennedy said, his brow furrowed in thought.

"I have my cough remedy," said Swain. "Stauber has a liniment for burns. Wilson has a hair restorer. Mr. Kennedy has a number of other products under his name."

"You, Mr. Swain, have to wait for somebody to get a cough before you can sell your medicine. Mr. Stauber has to wait for someone to get burned before he can sell his." Larry spoke in a manner that drew every eye to him. "Mr. Wilson can only do business with bald-headed men. But not one of you have thought of putting out a product for the one sickness that everybody gets—and not just once or twice in a lifetime, but about twice a year."

Suddenly Jimmy, who always seemed to have a cold, sneezed.

"Our friend has explained what I mean," chuckled Larry. "The common cold, and there's no sure cure for it."

"By Jove, there's something in what you say," Kennedy spoke eagerly. "What an idea!"

"It's not only an idea—it's an accomplished fact."

"What do you mean by that, doctor?"

Larry squared his shoulders.

"I have a cold cure, and what's more it works. I tested a thousand formulæ that failed, but the thousand and first worked."

"Doctor Baxter, we all take our hats off to you," said Swain. "I'm glad you told us about it. We're made."

"We?" questioned Larry. "Mr. Swain, formulæ one thousand and one belongs to me."

A cabaret act with a girl singing "I'm Sitting on a Moon" caused the conversation to cease, but it gave Swain the chance to speak in a whisper to Kennedy.

"You're not gonna let him keep this to himself, are you?"

"Don't worry," Kennedy answered, and smiled in that chilly way that so many of his underlings feared.

When the cabaret act came to an end Kennedy leaned across the table and touched Larry on the shoulder.

"Do you mind coming with me, doctor?" It was the same as an order. "I have an idea."

Jean watched with worried perplexity as Larry and Kennedy went off arm-in-arm in the manager's office Kennedy waved the doctor to a seat, and handed him a cigar box.

"No, thanks, Kennedy," he shook his head. "Well, what's on your mind?"

"I didn't realise when we talked this afternoon just what this association might mean," Kennedy explained in his frank way, "to both of us." He added this last bit with significance. He flicked the ash from his cigar, and went over to a wall safe. He returned with a sheet of paper. "All the people on this list make a radium product similar to mine, but they're not in the syndicate. Few of them can stand daylight, and have bad records."

"Is this a little gift for the professor?"

"And for you."

"Well, what's your cut?" demanded Larry, pocketing the paper.

"How about a little reciprocity. Such as—One thousand and one. After all, making medicine is my racket."

"No, Kennedy. I have a million-dollar radio audience and I'm just about ready to cash in on them," Larry said.

"Of course, there'll be a fortune in it for you," purred Kennedy. "Why not cut me in on it?"

"Well, simply because I don't see the advantage." Larry had set a lure and his quarry was being drawn, but he must not seem too eager. "I have the public ear—I have the formulæ—"

"And I have the manufacturing facilities—and the capital."

"Yes, I have to admit that." Larry agreed, then shook his head. "But the one thing that's indispensable, you can't supply."

"What's that?"

"Radium," tersely answered Larry. "And I'll need more than your whole syndicate uses."

A slow smile appeared on the master racketeer's face. "I can supply all you need—all you can use."

Larry simulated bewilderment.

"Are you forgetting that I was present when that old fox, MacDonald, shut down on you?"

"Forget it," Kennedy was smiling. "I can get all we need."

Larry shot out a hand.

"Then we'll call it a deal." His voice rang with enthusiasm.

The two men shook hands.

"Well, that's a great piece of work settled," Kennedy took the doctor's arm. "Let's get back to the party, Larry."

Larry avoided the eye of Jean, because he was quite certain that she was watching him with disdain and mistrust. The young doctor regarded the girl as a problem. She had tricked him, and yet he had the feeling that she disapproved very much of his present activities.

The dinner party proceeded merrily for some time, but Kennedy's face went red with anger when he saw MacDonald and a couple of plain-clothes detectives walking towards their table.

"Unless you have a search warrant and the proper officers I can have you thrown out of here," Kennedy said threateningly. "I've got a dinner party, and—"

"Forget it," rasped MacDonald. "I've got a search warrant and the proper officers, and I'll tell you what I'm here for. Just to look over this health factory of yours to see if a man by the name of Pete Andorka is hidden on the premises by any chance."

"If my guests will excuse me I will be charmed to show you round," Kennedy had recovered from his anger. "Will you follow me, please?"

Larry had become absorbed in his coffee, and did not once look up. Jean saw the sneering look that MacDonald gave to the bowed head.

After touring the many corridors and rooms, Kennedy at last conducted the officers to his laboratory.

"Don't forget to search the test tubes, inspector," mocked Kennedy.

Whilst Kennedy was showing the officers round Larry was able to make a copy of the names on the list that had been given him. The party was very merry and no one noticed. When he had finished he got up from his seat and walked round to Professor Sterling.

"Easy pickings with the compliments of Kennedy," he said in a loud voice, tossing the paper he had been given on to the table. "All of 'em drug manufacturers—with a record."

"Splendid." The professor rubbed his fat hands together. "I'll pay them a visit in the morning."

"Did you ever stop to think what this might mean to your career?" demanded Jean. "You'll get away with it just so long—"

"Long enough to make a lot of money," chuckled Larry. "Then I won't need a career."

Some minutes later Kennedy, with MacDonald and the two officers, came back to the table.

"The pleasure was all mine, inspector," sneaked Kennedy. "Would you and your Cossacks like a drink before you go?"

Without ceremony MacDonald pushed Kennedy to one side and stood behind Larry's chair. The latter looked round nervously.

"Well, I might have known you were playing ball with Kennedy," the inspector said in harsh tones. "In all my deals with the Bureau I never saw a doctor who turned out as black as you."

"Most dramatic, Mr. MacDonald," sneered Larry.

"What'd they pay you to hide Pete Andorka?"

"Well, if you must know, I'll tell October 2nd, 1937.

you. The sum represents about five years of your salary, as a trusted servant of the public." Larry stood up and laughed in the inspector's face. "You can't pin anything on me, and—"

Wallop! MacDonald, livid with rage, had brought up his fist with a mighty punch that caught Larry under the jaw. The doctor would have dropped if the inspector had not seized him and pushed him into the arms of the two officers.

"Here, you can't do this!" shouted Kennedy.

"Well, I've done it," snapped out the inspector. "Now I'm taking him out for questioning. Any objection?"

The party was silent, so MacDonald gave a sign, and the officers dragged the half-dazed Larry from the room.

"You're not going to let that guy get away with this, are you?" Burke hissed to his chief.

"Hold everything, Burke," Kennedy put a restraining hand on the gunman's arm. "The doc can take care of himself."

In the closed car Larry was given a restoring drink, and when MacDonald appeared was smoking a cigarette and chatting with the officers.

"That was the most welcome sock I ever got," Larry fingered his jaw.

"But you could have pulled it a little, Mac."

"I had to make it look real." The inspector stared down at the list of names Larry handed to him. "What's this?"

"A list of quacks who can stand a shakedown, but they can't stand the law. Kennedy denoted it as a goodwill gesture."

"I'll have them picked up to-morrow. Thanks, Larry." He put the paper carefully in his pocket. "Pete wasn't in the Restorium, and there's not much chance of picking up his trail. Kennedy's far too smart for that."

"He's not as smart as he thinks," stated Larry. "He fell for that cold-cure gag, hook, line and sinker. I'm on the inside, Mac."

"Well, you're playing with pretty bad boys, Larry."

"I know. Well, I just whetted Kennedy's appetite for big money, and in return he promised me a large quantity of radium." The doctor leaned forward. "Now, Mac, this is how I reckon we should get together. First of all—"

Kennedy Outwitted

JEAN STERLING had hurt her knee in the car crash, and as it was a little inflamed she made it an excuse to go round to Dr. Baxter's laboratory. Easy for a clever girl like Jean to get Nelson talking. The nurse complained bitterly that a doctor who could have hundreds of patients among the wealthy Society people preferred to mess about trying experiments with mice, monkeys and microphones. What few patients he had seldom got an account. He was always helping the Bureau of Pure Foods and Drugs and never making any charge.

Larry smiled gladly when he found Jean at his laboratory. The girl waited till the nurse had left them.

"Kennedy ready for a shakedown?" she asked, her eyes twinkling. "You fooled me yesterday, Larry, but I'm straightened up on you again."

"I don't know what you're talking about?"

"I don't know what your plan is," Jean answered. "But I do know you're not really thinking about fifty per cent. You're thinking about getting on the inside with Kennedy, so that you can trap him."

"Yes, you're right, Jean," Larry admitted. "I want to stop him and his kind once and for all."

"I've been a fool—I should never have stopped believing in you."

"Well, I did a bit of stopping myself," Larry took her two hands in his. "Everything's going to be grand once this business is over. By to-morrow things will be popping, and I don't want you involved. I want you to get away with your father and Jimmy."

"But what about you?"

"Don't worry about me. You look after yourself and your father. You can tell him that I've straightened him with MacDonald, and that he and I are even. Your pop made use of me, but I made better use of him. Now, you run along, Jean, and stay away till it's all over."

MacDonald and his men were busy that morning rounding up all the chiefs in the firms mentioned on Kennedy's list. They protested and demanded their lawyers, but it didn't help them at all because MacDonald found sufficient evidence in every case.

Burke was the first to bring in a morning paper that contained news of the round-up of quack-medicine dealers and manufacturers.

"Somebody's stooled," snarled the gunman. "There's nobody knew except the professor, Jimmy and the doc."

"Better get the professor and Jimmy in here," Kennedy decided. "Maybe they can tell us something. The doc's okay."

"Don't say I didn't warn you, chief," muttered Burke, before going out of the room. "But I think these mugs are all phonies."

The professor and Jimmy were brought none too politely to Kennedy's office, and when they heard that all the people on the list Larry had given them had been raided they looked nervously at each other. It looked as if Master Larry had been using them for suckers. But the professor was not the sort of man that squealed. He told Kennedy they knew nothing about it.

"Well, Larry will be around any minute," Kennedy said tersely. "Maybe he can tell us something. So stick around."

Some minutes later Larry got out of a lift and came along a corridor towards Kennedy's room. The ante-room was empty save for one man, who jumped up at sight of the doctor.

"Pardon me, but could I trouble you for a match?"

"Certainly." Larry held out a box. "Here they are."

"A friend of mine used to be a patient of yours," the man said as he lit his cigarette. "A chap named MacDonald."

"You're Dan Kellogg," Larry lowered his voice. "He told me about you. Stick around."

"But I tell you nobody ever saw the list except Jimmy," the professor was saying as the doctor opened the door.

"Yeah; but don't forget the doctor," sneered Burke.

"Was I being paged?" Larry inquired blandly.

"We were wondering just how much you know about this?"

Kennedy showed him the headlines on the special edition.

"I know all about that," Larry laughed. "I did it."

"What'd I tell you?" snarled Burke, his hand on his hip.

Larry gazed at Burke's leering face with surprise, and then shook his head as if he was bewildered. He gazed sharply at Kennedy.

"You look annoyed, Kennedy; but can you tell me a better way to cut out competition? The professor was around those mugs after your party, and we'd gotten our take. Why let them stay in business and cut in on our profits?"

Larry Baxter did his act so well and so calmly that Kennedy was convinced that he spoke the truth, though the surly Burke looked suspiciously at the doctor.

"It sounds phoney to me," said the gunman.

"Get out of here, Burke," rapped Kennedy. "And take Professor Sterling and Jimmy with you."

"That Burke fellow can't see an inch before his nose," Larry chuckled. "Maybe he's better with a gun."

"He's quick enough in an emergency," Kennedy replied. "Now I've assigned Andrews to assist you. He's had a lot of experience in my laboratories."

"With a few more experiments I hope to have the formula standardised. We'll be in production within forty-eight hours."

"Great work, doc," Kennedy looked closely at his new partner. "By the way, how did you come out with MacDonald?"

"Kennedy, you know what a grilling is?"

"I do."

"That's what I got," Larry shook his head. "But he hasn't got anything on me, except that list of names, and I guess now that he knows he hasn't got a chance of pinning anything on Kennedy Radium Products."

"Perfect this cold cure and you'll soon be worth a fortune," Kennedy smiled, well pleased. "You'll find Andrews waiting for you down in the laboratory."

Larry was able to carry out some research work of a technical nature far beyond the simple knowledge of Andrews. There was a small supply of radium, which he used for a number of picturesque experiments. At six in the afternoon he indicated to Andrews that enough work had been done for the day. The lights in the laboratory were switched on and the two men climbed out of the queer suits that protected the body from the dangerous radium rays.

"I feel like a deep-sea diver in this outfit."

"If you attempted deep-sea diving without the proper outfit what do you suppose would happen to you?"

"I'd drown."

"Well, if you work with radium without the necessary equipment you'll burn," Larry spoke casually, but he saw the nervous flicker of the assistant's eyelids. "How long have you been working for Kennedy?"

"About six years. Why?"

Larry leaned forward and stared into the other's face, then he laid his hand on the man's wrist and finally pulled down an eyelid.

"Any pain in your arms or legs?"

"No."

"Your breathing hard?"

"No. Why?"

Larry ignored the look of alarm in the other's expression.

"Have you worn a uniform always?" he asked. "I can see you haven't. Andrews, you'd better watch your step."

"What you mean, doc?"

"Certain signs I don't like." He looked round. "Here's Mr. Kennedy. I will talk to you later."

Kennedy was accompanied by a man whose face was unhealthily pallid and expressionless. He was garbed in black and never smiled.

"This is Dr. Baxter. How's it coming, Larry?"

"Oh, another day, I think. You get me a gram of radium and we're ready to start production."

Kennedy indicated his companion. "That's why he's here. He can get all we need."

"Can you get it by to-night?"

"I can easily meet your requirements by to-night. You shall have it here before midnight," the man stated.

Kennedy did not mention the man's name, and wisely Larry did not ask. But when they had departed the young doctor made some excuse to Andrews and went into the corridor. Seated in a waiting-room close to the laboratory was a man reading a paper.

"Pardon me, sir, have you a match?" asked Larry.

It was Kellogg who lowered the paper and held out a box of matches.

"There's a man with a black hat just gone out of the laboratory with Kennedy. Did you see him?" Larry asked, and Kellogg nodded. "Don't lose him. He's the one that gets the hot radium."

Kellogg waited till Larry had lit his cigarette before hastening out of the building to warn MacDonald.

Larry felt that the net was being drawn gradually round Kennedy; but he would not have been so elated if he had known that Jean had paid no heed to his suggestion that the staff of "Your Good Health" should go out of town. She told the professor and Jimmy that she was much too fond of Larry to leave him when danger threatened. If Kennedy found out how he was being tricked no mercy would be shown to Larry.

"Your father's agile mind has a solution to the problem already," the professor comforted his daughter. "I know just how to get Larry out of all this."

The Trailing of Pete Andorka

LARRY was at the laboratory early the next morning as he had made an appointment to examine Andrews. He found that the man was a spineless creature and easily scared. He told Larry in shaking tones that he had got pains like the doctor mentioned and his breathing was hard.

"Andrews, let me see those fingernails," Larry shook his head after an examination of his hands. "I'm afraid I'm going to have to tell you the truth."

Now Andrews had agonising pains—all imaginary—and the sweat was pouring down his face. He begged the doctor to do something for him.

"People suffering from radium-poisoning build up an immunity in their blood, and a serum taken from them is your only hope," was Larry's verdict. "Unfortunately, I don't know where I can lay my hands on such a case."

"I know a guy what's got it!" hoarsely cried Andrews. "If I take you to him will you do it? Can you?"

"Of course I can," Larry looked at his watch. "If the place is not too far we could go now. I have half an hour to spare."

Larry was sure that Andrews was going to lead him to the place where Kennedy had secreted Pete Andorka, and was congratulating himself on his own cleverness, when the door of the laboratory burst open and there was Kennedy and Burke. Larry did not like the expressions on the faces of these two men.

"Have you brought the radium,

Larry ordered the male nurse to bind Andrews to a chair.

Kennedy?" Larry asked eagerly; and, when Burke laughed hoarsely, added: "Anything wrong?"

"Thomson just got through to me that the police grabbed Butler and he had the stuff with him," Kennedy said slowly.

"Butler? Is that the man who came to the laboratory?" Larry asked. "How did they come to pick him up?"

"Because you tipped off the cops," snarled Burke, whisking out a gun. "I knew you was phoney."

"Frisk him," ordered Kennedy.

"He ain't packing a rod," mumbled Burke.

There was an amused smile on Larry's face.

"Surely you don't think that I had any hand—"

"I don't think—I know," shouted Kennedy, his eyes blazing. "I don't suppose your highly scientific imagination could possibly tell you what reward is coming to you!"

"Oh, I don't mind that either, Kennedy," was the fearless retort. "We don't care how we get you. A murder charge is as good as any."

"I can fix that nicely," Kennedy eyed Larry mockingly. "I'm going to pick up your partners and the girl, and you're all going for a ride. There may be an accident up in the hills and all the occupants killed."

"I guessed you might be revengeful, so I warned them to leave town till you were behind bars. So you'll have to think up—"

Larry broke off. The laboratory door had opened and Jean had appeared.

"Apparently she didn't take your advice," Kennedy said softly. "Delighted to see you, Miss Sterling."

"Why didn't you leave yesterday?" Larry asked, his face drawn with anxiety at the danger that threatened the girl he now loved.

"I couldn't. I want to talk to you, Larry." She took his arm. "Come out into the hall."

"Not quite so fast, young lady," Kennedy pointed to Burke. "You don't think he's holding that for fun, do you?"

"I know all about you, and I'm not scared of you." Jean faced him defiantly. "Unless I call my father in ten minutes he and Jimmy will be down here with the police."

"Why, you little minx, you would dare to make terms with me!" Kennedy shouted. "Burke, Andrews, tie him to that chair." He watched the two men busy strapping Larry to a chair with ropes. "All right, that will do." He gripped the girl cruelly by the arm. "Now get your father on the 'phone."

"I won't."

"You will, or Larry gets his."

Jean knew that Kennedy would not hesitate to murder Larry before her eyes unless she obeyed.

"All right," she whispered.

"And don't get any bright ideas," Kennedy warned her.

Jean got through to her father.

"Dad, this is Jean; it—it worked. Larry'll be over in a few minutes. I can't say any more."

"That'd do fine," Kennedy laughed mirthlessly. "Now, boys, tie her up as well. I think you two will keep until we get back. We're going to collect your precious father and Jimmy. Make the most of your last moments together. Now you two men come with me."

Kennedy made Andrews lock the door and stand guard outside.

"Jean, darling!" Larry smiled across at the girl. "When we get out of this will you remind me to propose to you?"

"I will, if you'll remind me to accept."

October 2nd, 1937.

Larry strove hard to undo his bonds, but without success, and he had almost given up hope when there was the sound of a key turning. It was Andrews, and the man's face twitched nervously.

"Doc!" His voice was hoarse with fear. "You're not kidding about me being sick, are you?"

"Andrews, I'm past the kidding point. You're not getting any better. You can see that for yourself. Every hour counts."

"Doc, if you'll give me that transfusion right away I'll take you to the old guy. But if this is a gag I'll let you have it."

"If I do this and check the disease I expect you to give me a break, Andrews," Larry asked. "Is it a bet?"

"Sure, doc, sure!" lied the man.

"Okay, then. Untie both of us, because I may need Miss Sterling's help."

Andrews untied them with shaking hands.

"We'll need some medicine," Larry picked up a writing-pad. "Can you get a prescription made up right away? One of the boys could take it across the street, whilst we wait here."

"Just write it out, doc," Andrews cried, and, going over to a 'phone, asked for a messenger boy to come round to the laboratory.

Andrews only glanced at the prescription before handing it to the boy. Larry had written his message in a code known only to himself and MacDonald. The

NEXT WEEK'S SMASH HITS!

CHARLES QUIGLEY

—IN—

"SPEED TO SPARE"

When Tommy Morton, a famous racing motorist, learns that his younger brother Larry—whom he has not seen since they were children together in an orphanage—has become a reckless and conceited driver of midget cars, he looks him up, and, without revealing the relationship, tries to make a real man of him. But Larry becomes an unscrupulous rival, and nearly kills his brother on the motor race-track. A thrill-packed drama.

"GHOST TOWN GOLD"

Another story of the Three Mesquiteers—the bold, roving and adventure-loving cowboys. In the town of Prospect they get mixed up in a bank robbery. What a thrill when they start cleaning up this cowtown of its bad element. Starring Bob Livingston, Ray Corrigan and Max Terhune.

Also

The second instalment of our grand serial:

"WILD WEST DAYS"

boy returned in about ten minutes with a small package.

"Did the druggist understand the prescription?"

"Yes, sir. He said he quite understood," the boy reported, and Larry had hard work not to grin with elation.

By now his warning should have reached MacDonald and the police!

Andrews busted them out of the building by a side door. The gunman was in such a panic that he was going to die that he did not reckon the consequences of disobeying Kennedy's orders. They were on the point of moving towards Larry's car when Jean clutched at the doctor's arm and pointed. They darted back in time to avoid being seen by Kennedy. They saw a big car pull up, and watched Kennedy and Burke get out first; Professor Sterling and Jimmy followed. Directly the four men had entered the building Larry darted towards his car. It was Andrews who took the wheel.

When Kennedy found the laboratory empty he was nonplussed. From a page-boy he learned that Larry, the girl, and Andrews had driven away not many minutes before. All he could think was that Larry had got free of his bonds and turned the tables on Andrews.

"The doc has made that fool Andrews talk," Kennedy rapped out. "He's either tricked Andrews into talking or forced him; but, whatever happened, I'm sure there's only one place they could have gone. We've got to go after them. Lock these other two mugs in the laboratory; we can settle them when we get back."

Andrews was so unsteady with his driving that he agreed readily to Larry taking the wheel; and did the doctor make the car move! Out of town went the car, and up in the hill country it took bends on two wheels. They came at last to a drive to a large, old-fashioned country house.

"What's this place?" Larry demanded.

"Kennedy's private institution for his own employees," Andrews explained. "He don't use it often."

The car pulled up before the front door, and after some hammering it was opened and a burly caretaker peered forth.

"The boss wants Dr. Baxter here to give Pete the once over," explained Andrews.

The door was opened and they entered. The caretaker took them down a corridor and rapped at another door. They were admitted into the sick-room.

Seconds to Spare

ON the bed lay Pete Andorka. The wretched man was moaning and groaning. Standing near the bed was a middle-aged man, wearing the uniform of a male nurse. The caretaker closed the door.

"Kennedy wants the doctor to look that guy over," Andrews explained.

Larry walked over to the bed and touched the groaning patient.

"Hallo, Pete," he said softly.

"Dr. Baxter!" Pete shot up in bed when he saw who it was. Fingers as thin as skeleton's clutched his hand.

"Thank heaven you're here! It hurts awful. I'm so sick—I'm—"

"We'll soon put you right, Pete. We're here to help you." Larry pushed the sick man back and glanced round. "Jean, put three of these tablets in a glass of water."

He handed her a small bottle.

The message that Larry had sent to MacDonald was to the effect that Kennedy must be trailed at all costs, and that it would more than likely lead to the place where Pete Andorka

(Continued on page 26)

Trickery and injustice were rife in Big Rock, and when Dick Hudson pitted himself against the men who held sway there it seemed as if he had taken on a superhuman task. Read how his purpose was at last achieved in this powerful drama of the Oklahoma cattle-country, starring Dick Foran and Jane Bryan

“STRANGE LAWS”

Land Rush

IT was the evening of the 21st of April, 1889, and the scene was Wichita Falls, near the border-line between the State of Texas and the former Indian territory of Oklahoma.

It was the eve of a memorable occasion that was to live in the annals of America. For, yielding to the demands of an expanding white population, the Federal Government had decided to concentrate the scattered Indian tribes farther to the north and throw open the hunting-grounds to land-hungry settlers.

Six million acres of virgin soil were now waiting to be staked out in claims in the territory of Oklahoma; soil that might be cultivated where previously it had yielded nothing but tumble-weed and scrub; soil on which towns might be built where previously the foot of man had seldom walked; soil that raised crops of mesquite grass where cattle might feed instead of dwindling herds of buffalo.

Oklahoma had been denied to the whites for too long. Much reduced in numbers since the days when they had been a barbarous race of killers, the Redskins there no longer required such vast tracts of fertile country. That was why it was only just that the remnants of them should be shepherded into a smaller reservation to make room for the Palefaces they had once hated.

And that was why Wichita Falls had become the rallying-point for an army of pioneers, a rendezvous from which eager bands of homesteaders and cattlemen might move up to the frontier the following morning, when the new territory would be officially announced as open for colonisation.

Hundreds of men and women had assembled at Wichita Falls, the majority being of good, honest, hard-working stock. But, as always when there was a chance of fortunes to be made, there was an element of rascality present—individuals who planned to batten like vultures on the hoped-for prosperity of the new and promised land.

Such an individual was Link Carter, a man with a black record and a band of hired gunmen at his beck and call. Yet, although his infamy had earned him a fairly wide-spread reputation in the State of Texas, it so happened that only a few of the people encamped at Wichita Falls were aware of his shady past. And none felt tempted to risk reminding him of it until a tall, strapping late-comer drifted into the great, sprawling camp as the dusk was coming down.

The fellow in question was Dick Hudson, who had once been a cow-puncher, but who had become a practising attorney when he had felt a desire to amount to something more than a herdsman and had elected to study law.

He came riding into the camp on a high-stepping brone, and he was singing a Western ballad in a fine tenor voice which drew attention to him, and which was one reason why Link Carter was made conscious of his presence so speedily. And on seeing him Link Carter lost no time in putting himself in the new arrival's path.

A well-built, sallow-featured and dark-haired man of some thirty-five years, Link Carter confronted the young lawyer and surveyed him mockingly,

“Well, well,” he said, his thin-lipped mouth twisting into an unpleasant sneer, “if it isn't the handsome shyster from the Panhandle!”

Dick Hudson had drawn rein. Now he slid from the saddle and regarded Carter placidly. He was about six-foot-two of red-headed Texan, topping Carter by an inch or so. His weather-beaten, good-looking face was genial in its expression, though in his ice-blue eyes there was a glint that spelled danger for men of Carter's ilk.

He remembered Carter well. When he had become a full-fledged attorney, he had acted as prosecutor at the hearing of a case in which the rogue had been defendant.

“What's the matter, Hudson?” Link Carter went on in a tone of insolent inquiry. “Did things get too hot for you back there in the Panhandle section?”

“Why, no,” Dick Hudson drawled. “No bunch of crooks ever ran me out of any section yet. But after I had the pleasure of sending you to a State penitentiary for two years there wasn't any work left for a good lawyer around the Panhandle area.”

Link Carter's brow had darkened at the reference to his sinister past.

“You've got a mighty sharp memory, Hudson, haven't you?” he graded.

“No, it's kind of poor,” was the mild reply. “Let's see, what was it you were charged with? Arson—forgery—or manslaughter?”

A snarl broke from Carter's lips, and on a sudden he launched himself at Dick Hudson with the intention of hitting out at him. But, though he had taken up the study of law, Dick Hudson had not neglected that physical fitness which had singled him out in his cow-punching days as "a tough hombre in a scrap."

With his left arm he blocked the punch that Link Carter aimed at him, and in the same instant he brought across the packed knuckles of his right hand in a jolt that was like the kick of a wild mustang.

Carter went down, and lay where he had fallen for the space of about ten seconds, by which time people had come running from some of the buckboards and prairie schooners with which the immediate vicinity was dotted. Then the ex-gaolbird picked himself up, but, although he glared at Dick savagely and seemed as if he were tempted to reach for his hip and pull a six-gun, he thought better of the impulse and turned away.

It was at this moment that he was accosted by an elderly man, who had appeared on the scene together with a freckled lad of thirteen and a young and radiant girl, who was about twenty years of age.

"What's up, Carter?" the elderly individual demanded.

"Nothing," was the muffled reply. "This guy makes trouble wherever he goes, that's all. But forget it, Walton. I ain't soilin' my hands on him."

Carter slouched off, and Walton moved after him together with the girl, who directed a scornful and indignant glance at Dick before departing. On the other hand, however, the freckled boy of thirteen remained behind and sidled up to the stalwart cowboy-lawyer.

"Say, that was swell elegant," he declared enthusiastically. "That guy Carter needed takin' down a peg er two. Huh, I can't imagine what dad an' my sister see in him, anyways."

Dick smiled down at the lad.

"So those were your dad and your sister, eh?" he remarked. "Well, maybe Link Carter has his good points, though I never noticed any. But, by the way, son, you don't happen to know if there's a feller called Valley in this camp, do you?"

"Valley? Why, sure. C'mon, I'll show yuh where he is."

The boy proceeded to escort him through the clutter of wagons, and at the far side of the camp they came upon two men and a young woman who were engaged in preparing a meal. One of the men was Tom Valley, a bronzed Westerner of about Dick's own age, and at sight of the attorney he gave vent to a whoop.

"Dick Hudson!" he shouted. "Gosh, am I glad to see you?"

"I'm mighty glad to see you, Tom," Dick rejoined. "I heard you'd moved north to take a hand in this land rush."

"That's right, Dick. There's a lot of us in this camp plannin' to build a town at Big Rock, thirty miles over the line. Me and my partner here aim to open up a ranch outside the settlement, and to start a general merchandise store in town as well. That will give us two strings to our bow, see? But I don't believe you know my side-kick, do you?"

Dick was introduced to Bill Tidewell, a sturdy, square-jawed fellow with a warm and friendly handshake. Then, with pardonable pride, Tom Valley turned to the young woman who was near-by.

"And Dick," he said, "I want you to meet my wife. I suppose you knew I was married, didn't you? No, you didn't? Well, it's been a long time since we saw each other. Ruth, this is my ole pal Dick Hudson, the worst lawyer in Texas. You've heard me speak of him."

"I'm glad to know you, Mr. Hudson,"

October 2nd, 1937.

Ruth Valley observed smilingly. "But don't take any notice of Tom. He told me you were going to be the greatest lawyer in Texas."

Dick looked at her with a twinkle in his eyes.

"He's wrong either way, Mrs. Valley," he announced. "I'm going to be the worst or the best lawyer in Oklahoma, according to how things break for me. Yep, I'm figuring to settle in this same town of Big Rock that will rise out of the prairies up there."

"You are?" Tom Valley put in. "Well, you ought to have a lot of customers, if this rush turns out to be the same as others. There's usually a leavening of land sharks and claim jumpers in the offing when a new strip is opened. And speakin' of such-like vermin, your old friend Link Carter is here."

Dick nodded.

"I know," he commented dryly. "I just tangled with him."

He paused, and turned to see whether the freckled boy who had conducted him through the camp were still in attendance on him. But the lad had sauntered off.

"Say, Tom," Dick queried then, "Carter appeared to be friendly with a family named Walton. Who are these Waltons?"

Tom Valley fingered his chin.

"The old man seems to be in partnership with Carter and a bunch of Carter's friends," he answered. "He has his daughter with him—a mighty nice-lookin' girl named Janie, who's been over here for a chat with Ruth once or twice. Then there's the boy who was with you just now—Barty, they call him. We only know 'em casually, but it seems to me they're a little too decent to be mixed up with a hombre like Carter."

Further conversation on the subject of the Waltons was interrupted just then by the entry into the camp of a small detachment of U.S. dragoons. They were headed by a major, who caused every living soul in the camp to be mustered so that they might hear what he had to say.

"Friends," he announced, "the starting shot will be fired to-morrow morning at nine o'clock sharp, and I want to take the opportunity now of reminding you that when the signal is given it will be every man for himself in the race to stake claims. At the same time, I warn you that any person entering the territory of Oklahoma before nine o'clock in an attempt to steal a march on other settlers will for ever forfeit all claims he may make."

There was a murmur of approval, but it was not echoed by Link Carter, who stood a little apart from the assemblage with a group of scoundrelly looking cronies.

Carter grinned slyly at his associates, and then lent an ear to the cavalry major again as the latter rounded off his speech.

"I'd also like to give you folks a little friendly advice," the officer said. "You have about fourteen hours at your disposal between now and nine o'clock to-morrow morning, and I suggest you devote the better part of the time to getting a good night's sleep."

Link Carter apparently found something amusing in those words, for he winked mirthfully at one of his satellites, a notorious gunman from Dallas.

"A good night's sleep," he reiterated with a smirk. "How about it, Joe Brady? You gonna sing me a lullaby?"

"Huh, you watch out you don't get rocked to sleep on the back o' that pinto of yours, boss," came the reply, delivered in a low tone of voice. "Say, when are you sneakin' out of camp, anyhow?"

"Ten o'clock, and by midnight I'll be over the border in Oklahoma. Then I'll snatch a few hours' rest."

"Don't doze too long," said Brady, whereupon Carter smiled a twisted smile.

"I won't," he said. "At nine o'clock I'll be high-tailin' it for Big Rock with an armful of stakes and a start on everybody."

Another of the group volunteered a comment. He was a frock-coated, middle-aged man named Abbott, and like Dick Hudson he was a lawyer, but a lawyer of ill-repute who specialised in earning reprieves for hardened criminals, and in turning his legal knowledge to their advantage.

"You'll have to watch out for the froopers who are guarding the frontier, Link," he muttered. "Also, folks are liable to miss you from the camp."

"I'll get past the soldiers all right," declared Carter. "As for the folks around camp, they'll be too busy lookin' after their own affairs to notice my absence. I'll wager that even old man Walton won't miss me."

"He doesn't know what you're plannin' to do, then?" Abbott queried.

Link Carter shook his head.

"No," he answered, "I didn't think it necessary to tell him. Not that he'd be likely to back out now."

Brady spoke again.

"What about this guy Hudson?" he asked. "I don't like the idea of him bein' around. He clamped down on you and me in the Panhandle section two or three years ago, an' he's dangerous. You say you had a run-in with him just now, an' I can't figure why you didn't plug him."

"In front of a crowd of people?" Carter retorted. "Don't be a fool. No, I left him for you, Brady. Listen, he's got a fast horse. I know the critter, for it's the one he always rides. But you've got a fast horse too, Brady, so if he's joinin' this land-rush keep track of him, and let him have a bullet in the back if you get the chance."

The foregoing discussion was carried on in a guarded fashion. Yet, although Carter did not know it, Janie Walton was standing within earshot and had not been able to help overhearing the substance of it; and presently, when the cavalry major and his escort had taken leave of the camp, the girl went off in quest of her father.

It did not take her long to locate him, and on joining him she addressed him tersely.

"Dad," she said, "I'm afraid we did that red-headed stranger an injustice by regardin' him as a trouble-maker. I mean the fellow who knocked Link Carter down. It seems Carter isn't the honest-to-goodness person we took him for, and, when you come to think of it, we ought to have suspected him if only on account of those shifty-looking customers who are always hanging around him."

The expression of bewilderment on old man Walton's face changed to one of dismay when Janie went on to give him a summary of the conversation which had reached her ears. Then when his daughter had brought her narrative to a close, he glanced at her wretchedly.

"This is terrible, Janie," he faltered. "But what can I do? I've got to stick with Carter now. I've sunk every cent I had into the purchase of equipment for this venture. I just can't back out, or I'm ruined."

Janie would have preferred bankruptcy to the dishonour of being associated with a man who could stoop to such methods as those which Link Carter proposed to employ. But Walton senior was not so strong-minded as his daughter, and could not be induced to court financial disaster by breaking off relations with the scoundrel.

Notwithstanding the old fellow's attitude, Janie resolved to approach Dick Hudson, and although she was unwilling to say anything that might injure her father, she spoke to the young attorney bluntly enough when she had succeeded in tracing him.

"I understand your name's Mr. Hudson," she began, and when he had acknowledged this: "Well, Mr. Hudson," she continued, "are you going to make the ren into the new strip to-morrow?"

"I am," he told her. "I'd advise you not to," she said "I'm not at liberty to enlarge on the statement, but it's made for your own good."

Dick Hudson looked down at her steadfastly.

"Is that so?" he remarked. "Well, having bothered to give me advice, why not supply me with a few details?"

"The fact that I'm warning you ought to be enough," she responded in an evasive manner.

Dick compressed his lips. "All right, if you won't talk, I will," he informed her, utterly misunderstanding her motive in coming to him "You can go back and tell Carter, or whoever sent you, that I trailed all the way up here to get in on this land-rush—and neither he nor anybody else is gonna keep me out of it!"

Thus spoke Dick Hudson. Yet the following morning, when the settlers moved up to the frontier to be marshalled there by U.S. troops, and when the crack of the pistol released a living wave of horseflesh and humanity into the new territory, two men who had been present at Wichita Falls the previous night were absent from the throng.

One was Link Carter, who had stolen away from the camp under cover of darkness and who was now several miles nearer to Big Rock than any of those who had a mind to stake out claims there.

The other was Dick, whose horse had developed a lameness that debarred him from the frantic scramble to obtain sites in this country which was being thrown open for settlement.

By the time he discovered that his pony had been purposely, though not seriously crippled, the hindmost competitors in the land-rush were far across the border-line, and there was no hope of the young lawyer's staking out so much as a square foot of the Oklahoma terrain.

He did not know, however, that his failure to start with the rest had probably spared him a bullet in the back. For when Dick had found himself unable to enter the race, the gunman known as Brady had felt that he was relieved of the necessity of "taking care of him," and had dashed off in company with the remainder of the contestants.

The Town of Big Rock

THE site intended for the town of Big Rock, and every acre of land for miles around, had been staked out for an hour or more by the time Dick Hudson put in an appearance there.

The town-site presented a remarkable spectacle. Every kind of conveyance was there, and people were engaged in tacking up notices which advertised the various businesses they proposed to carry on when the settlement had been thoroughly established. But it was significant that on every hand strips of property had been claimed in the name of Link Carter.

Here was the site of a saloon which was to be owned by him. Here were numerous smaller plots which he was willing to sell at his own price. And, out on the range, there was a huge tract of pasture-land where he intended to set up as a rancher as well.

Consequently, when Dick showed up and Link Carter perceived him, the ex-gaolbird was in high spirits, and accosted the young lawyer with an air of smugness rather than hostility.

"Well, if it ain't the 'late' Mr. Hudson!" he exclaimed. "I figured you'd come stragglin' behind with the rest o' the old women. H'm, too bad you couldn't have got here earlier, or you might have found a corner for yourself. But I'm afraid I own all the available property here, and I ain't just figurin' on selling to you—Mr. Hudson."

"Yeah, I see you've done pretty well for yourself," was Dick's comment. "The early bird, Carter, eh?"

There was a sting in the words, and the other man's eyes narrowed.

"You're not by any chance inferrin' I'm a 'sooner,' are you?" he demanded, using an expression that was applied to men who sneaked into a new territory before it was officially opened for settlement.

"I'm not inferrin' you're a sooner, no," Dick answered. "I'm calling you one, Link Carter, because I didn't see you anywhere around the camp at Wichita Falls this morning."

Carter's eyes blazed momentarily. Then, as he saw several of his cronies approaching, he beckoned to them in an ominous fashion.

"Boys," he said grimly, "for the benefit of those who ain't already acquainted with him, I want to introduce Mr. Hudson to you. Now—er—he's kinda gettin' in my hair, and I guess you all know what to do in a case like that."

The men apparently did know. They began to close in on Dick with the obvious intention of beating him up, but before a blow could be struck Janie Walton suddenly came into view.

"What's the trouble, Link?" she inquired, hurrying forward and addressing Carter in a tone that concealed her true opinion of him.

"Why, this shyster called me a sooner!"

Dick flung himself atop of him and clutched him by the wrist, forcing back the scoundrel's hand so that he could make no use of the forty-five.

"A sooner? Well but we're all sooner." Janie Walton glanced at Dick with studied irony as she made that observation. "You see, we rode horses and drove wagon-teams—whereas Mr. Hudson here, he travelled by turtle. And so, as we arrived sooner than he did—well, we're all sooner."

There was a guffaw at this, and the men who had been on the point of closing in on Dick drew back again with smirks on their ugly faces.

"Poor Mr. Hudson," Janie went on, to the delight of Carter and his accomplices. "We must take up a collection and buy him a real horse."

"I had a real horse," Dick ground out, "until somebody crippled him!"

Janie affected to turn her back on him scornfully.

"Oh, come on, Link," she said. "Don't listen to him. He's just sore because he got here late. Come on, there's a family over here who wants to buy one of your plots."

Dispersing his cronies with a nod, Carter accompanied her in the direction she had indicated, but he had not gone more than twenty paces when Janie Walton stopped and spoke to him in a very different tone from that which she had used in Dick Hudson's presence.

"Listen to me, Carter," she announced, "I walked you off for the simple reason that I wanted to prevent those rough-necks of yours from mauling that—that slyster, as you call him."

Carter slid his eyes on her.

"Oh, so the big lawyer-man needs a petticoat to protect him, eh?"

"If it comes to that, some of your friends may have needed protection, judging by that swollen jaw of yours. But I didn't want to see him going down under a whole pack of your satellites, Carter, and getting the worst of the fight in the end. I think Hudson ought to have an even break, to say the least—though I'm afraid that's something you may not understand."

With the words she swung away from him and walked off, and, after watching her thoughtfully until she was out of sight, Link Carter glanced back towards the spot where he had encountered Dick.

The cow-boy lawyer was no longer there, but Carter espied him in conversation with two men and a woman on a plot of land advertised as the site of a general store, the two men in question being Tom Valley and Bill Tidewell, and the woman, Tom's pleasant young wife.

Gritting his teeth, Carter sought out his confederates again, and, picking on Brady, he gave him a few terse instructions, whereupon Brady straightway betook himself to the locale of the future general store.

"Hudson," the man stated, interrupting Dick as the latter was talking to Bill Tidewell and the Valleys. "Link Carter wants to know when you're movin' on. He's rumin' things here, and he allows Big Rock ain't gonna be big enough for both of yuh."

"Is that so?" Dick Hudson drawled. "Well, you go and tell Carter that the firm of Tidewell and Valley have offered to rent me some office space, and I'm staying here to open up a law practice."

Brady's lip curled.

"You won't do no good as a lawyer," he sneered. "Because Walton's gonna be mayor; Carter's gonna be sheriff; me an' one o' the boys are gonna be deputies, and we've got a lawyer named Abbott that's better 'n you'll ever know how to be."

"Well, that's fine," Dick observed cooly. "I like all my peas in one pod. It makes 'em easier to shell."

"Talk's cheap," growled Brady. "Not when you're talkin' to a lawyer," was Dick's facetious reply, "and if you take up any more o' my time I'll have to send you a bill."

Brady muttered something under his breath and moved away, and Dick glanced at Tidewell and the Valleys smilingly. But their faces were serious.

"I'd keep my eyes peeled for trouble if I were you, Dick," Tom Valley counselled. "Say, why don't you give up this law business and throw in with us? We've got a site here for a store, and a hunk of land farther up on the range that's the finest sweep of cattle-grazin' country I ever saw. Moreover, we didn't have to buy a single square yard of our property from Carter, and in short Bill and me would be glad to have you as a partner—wouldn't we, Bill?"

Bill Tidewell gave an emphatic assent, but Dick had no mind to abandon his legal calling; and sure enough, when the industry of a pioneering community had raised a trim township out of the wilderness, the young attorney set up as a champion of such people as were the victims of injustice.

He occupied an office which he rented in the premises erected by Tom Valley and Bill Tidewell on the main street of the new town, and he had no lack of clients. For it was not long before Link Carter had begun to infringe upon the rights of honest settlers.

Nevertheless, Dick was far from successful in the briefs that he undertook. He had justice on his side, and time after time the judge appointed by the Federal Government to preside as magistrate over the section was completely in agreement with him. But the forces operating against the youthful attorney were too powerful.

As Brady had intimated, Carter had become sheriff—after a scandalous election that was not an election at all; Brady himself and a gangster named Blade Simpson had been appointed deputies; old Walton, who seemed completely under Carter's thumb, had been elevated to the position of mayor; and Abbott had proved ready and willing to use his legal talents in their interests.

For the rest, "hand-picked" juries were assembled in the court for the one purpose of going against all the evidence Dick Hudson could muster, and verdicts that were the result of bribery were given against him again and again.

One evening, after the hearing of a case in which Dick as usual had been frustrated at every turn, Link Carter and his partisans repaired to the saloon which the ex-gaolbird had built near the south end of the town; and in a back room there Carter drank a toast to the success of his organisation.

"Well, boys," he said, looking round at his cronies with an expression of satisfaction on his sallow countenance, "we've just witnessed another setback for that guy Hudson—thanks to Abbott an' a jury that knew how to vote."

There was a chorus of appreciation, Abbott smiling modestly as it was rendered. But there were two men present who did not register the sentiments of the majority; one being Mayor Walton, who merely appeared uncomfortable—and the other, Brady, who showed signs of impatience.

"Say, boss," the latter grunted, "how much rope you gonna give Hudson, anyways? Why don't you let me pick a fight with him an' shoot it out?"

Carter laughed easily. "Not on your life," he retorted. "I'm havin' too much fun watchin' him squirm. But listen, supposin' we forget Hudson for the time being and talk about that herd of cattle out on the range owned by Valley an' Tidewell? Blade Simpson tells me there's about a hundred head there, and only a couple of cowpokes guardin' them."

"That's right," put in Simpson, a hulking rogue with a growth of stubble on his chin. "It oughta be a cinch to-night—"

He was interrupted by Mayor Walton.

"Look here," the old man rapped out, "there's a limit to what I'll stand for."

Carter shifted his eyes upon him. "What are you beefin' about?" he demanded. "When you financed me in the first place, I promised you that I'd put big money your way, an' I've kept my promise, ain't I? You're gettin' your percentage out of all the dough we're makin' hand-over-fist."

"You listen to me, Link Carter," old Walton grated, rising to his feet. "I sank my last dollar in what I thought was a legitimate business venture, and even when I learned the kind of man you were I lacked the moral courage to back down. Yes, I'll admit, I've played ball with you in spite of my conscience and closed my eyes to many a shady deal whereby people have been swindled. But when it comes to cattle rustling I draw the line, and you can count me out!"

With that he stamped from the room, but, though his departure caused Link Carter's associates some uneasiness, Carter himself remained undisturbed.

"Don't worry about him," he stated. "He won't talk. He can't afford to. He's in too deep with us."

The Cattle Raid

LINK CARTER might not have treated Walton's rebellious outburst so lightly had he visualised the outcome of it. For, on leaving the saloon, the old man made straight for the house which he now occupied on the main street of Big Rock, and there he took his daughter into his confidence and told her that he had severed his connection with the town's crooked sheriff.

"Oh?" said Janie, whose relationship towards her father had been somewhat strained ever since the night before the land-rush. "And having gone so far with Carter, what's stopping you now, may I ask?"

"Janie," the old man begged, "don't take up that attitude. I know I've been weak, but, come what may, I'm not carrying out that scoundrel's instructions any longer. I've been a blind for him in many ways, but I'm not closing my eyes to cattle rustling, you can take it from me."

In a moment Janie's arm was about his shoulders, and her recent coldness to him was forgotten.

"Cattle rustling, dad?" she exclaimed. "What do you mean?"

"He's going to raid Tidewell and Valley's new herd to-night," her father answered. "I happen to know that they wouldn't take him in with them as a partner, so now he's going to help himself."

Janie's pretty face seemed to tighten.

"Dad," she said, "you've got to warn Tom Valley and Bill Tidewell. That's all there is to it."

"No, honey, I can't do that. Don't forget—if Carter and his gang are indicted on any testimony of mine, they'll denounce me for the part I've

"All right," Carter snarled. "I'm guilty on every count you've brought up against me, including the shooting of Tom Valley. But you'll never put a rope around my neck, for I'm blasin' my way out of this court!"

played in former transactions, and make sure that I go to gaol along with them."

Mayor Walton did not know it, but his conversation with his daughter had been heard by a third party in an adjoining room, and the occupant of that room was none other than the mayor's freckled, thirteen-year-old son, who had been undressing for bed when the earnest voices of his father and Janie had reached his inquisitive ears.

The discussion in the next apartment had still been in progress when Barty had chanced to see a group of horse-men mount up and ride away from the saloon across the street—Link Carter and Abbott waving to them from the porch of the building as they galloped off. And now the lad hurriedly threw on his clothes again and climbed out of the window of his first-floor bed room.

A few minutes later he was entering the general store that was owned by Tom Valley and Bill Tidewell, and as he crossed the threshold of it he saw them standing at the counter with Dick Hudson.

"It's no use," Dick was saying. "My experience in court to-day was the last straw. I guess it isn't on the cards for me or anybody else to beat Carter in this town by legal methods."

"I never before heard you talk as if you were licked, and amin' to run away," Tom Valley muttered, whereupon Dick thrust out his jaw.

"Who said anything about runnin' away?" he demanded. "I'm simply giving up my law practice, and biding my time for the day when Carter will overstep the mark, as his kind always do. And right now I'm accepting an offer to go into the cattle and store business of Messrs. Tidewell and Valley—if that offer still holds good."

Delighted ejaculations escaped Tom Valley and Bill Tidewell, and it was as they were elapping Dick Hudson on the back enthusiastically that Barty Walton came up to the counter. Then the boy proceeded to relate all that had passed between his father and his sister, the faces of his three listeners darkening as they heard his story.

"I figured somebody oughta put yeh wise," the lad finished pathetically. "But listen, don't go an' do nothin' that would hurt my ole man. It seems like he's been in deep with Link Carter, but he's cut adrift from him now, an' I couldn't bear it if he was to end up in gaol."

Dick laid a hand on the youngster's shoulder.

"Your dad won't come to any harm, Barty," he declared. "If he stands up in a court of law and turns State's evidence, he'll exonerate himself from any small part he may have played in Carter's shady dealings."

He turned to Tom Valley and Bill Tidewell.

"Bill," he said, "there are plenty of honest citizens in this town, and I suggest you raise a posse amongst 'em. And Tom, I reckon Mayor Walton might appreciate it if you looked in on him and set his mind at rest. Meanwhile, I'll ride out to your range and see if I can help your cow-hands to keep those rustlers busy until Bill and the posse arrive."

Tom and Bill acquiesced in this arrangement, and shortly afterwards Dick was spurring out of Big Rock, setting his course for the north, in which direction lay the acres of pasturage belonging to his two friends. And about half an hour later, as he was pushing through a tract of brushwood, he heard a sudden blatter of gunplay that cut across the silence of the range.

Emerging from the thickets into the full light of the moon, he beheld a herd of steers swinging away to the east, and at the same time he descried a band of men dismounting to take cover in a small coppice. They were Carter's associates, headed by "Deputies" Joe Brady and Blade Simpson, and it was obviously their intention to dispose of the two cowboys who had been guarding the cattle, and who had been forced to seek shelter when the gangsters had launched their onset.

These two herdsmen in the employ of Tom Valley and Bill Tidewell had opened fire on the rustlers, and now Carter's hirelings were evidently determined to wipe them out on the indisputable theory that "dead men tell no tales." With the cow-hands slain, there would be nobody to testify that any of Link Carter's associates had figured in the cattle-raid, and when the two punchers had been exterminated it would be a easy matter to round up the steers and drive them from the vicinity at the thieves' own leisure.

Such were the reflections that undoubtedly passed through the minds of the crooks. But while they blazed at the pair of cowboys who had challenged their presence on the Valley-Tidewell range, Dick Hudson effected a detour that brought him round to the vantage point where his friends' employees were located, and soon three guns instead of two were answering the fusillades of the Carter gang.

Out there on the moonlit prairie, the bellowing detonations of the forty-fives snote the air resoundingly, and leaden slugs sped on their mission of death. But Dick and the cow-hands remained unscathed, whereas a couple of the rustlers had been laid low when all at once Bill Tidewell's posse from Big Rock swept into view.

The crooks ran to their horses the moment they became aware of the newcomers' approach, but Joe Brady alone succeeded in reaching his pony and making his get-away. The others were overtaken, and resisting capture because they knew the penalty of cattle-lifting, they were shot down to a man in the point-blank gun-duel that ensued.

The firing had ceased when three late arrivals appeared on the scene. These were Tom Valley, old man Walton and Janie, and as they slowed up, Dick Hudson made it his business to single out the girl.

"Say," he told her, "I'm sort of getting a new angle on you. Until to-night, I thought you were one of my worst enemies."

"If you'd taken the trouble to study human nature instead of law," Janie answered whimsically, "you might have come to the conclusion that I was trying to be one of your best friends, though I'll admit I was handicapped by the position dad was in."

"One of my best friends?" Dick echoed.

Janie Walton nodded.

"Yes. Do you remember how I warned you against making the land-rush? Well, I said at the time it was for your own good, and so it was. And I might add that I was the one who crippled your horse, to save you from getting a bullet in the back."

"Oh, you were the one who crippled my horse, huh?"

"But it didn't keep you from coming to Big Rock and hunting up trouble, did it? Well, maybe it's a good thing you did come, because I've a feeling that you're going to take on one court-case that you'll win—the case of Link Carter versus the State."

The Last Throw

LINK CARTER was alone in his office behind the saloon when Joe Brady stumbled across the threshold to acquaint the scoundrel with the news that his gang had been annihilated, and when he had received a full account of all that had happened Carter jerked himself to his feet.

"You say that Hudson showed up, and was followed a little while afterwards by a posse?" he rasped.

"Yeah," came the rejoinder, "and although I'm pretty sure that none of the posse or them two-cowhands could identify me as one of the rustlers, I ain't so sure about Hudson. He may have been pretty close to us afore he worked round to join up with the Valley-Tidewell punchers."

Link Carter began to chew his nails, and Brady eyed him irritably.

"What are you lookin' so anxious about?" he demanded. "I'm the one that's liable to be in a spot. You can easily say you didn't know a thing about this cattle-raid, even though all your pals was mixed up in it."

Carter swung round on him.

"Oh, so I've no cause to feel anxious, huh?" he ground out. "Listen, you fool, how d'you suppose Hudson and that posse found out about the raid? Walton must have squealed. I was wrong in thinking that he'd keep his mouth shut. He's spilled the works, and if he takes the witness-stand against me in a court of law I'm through. Not even Abbott will be able to figure out a loop-hole for me."

There was a silence, and then, his eyes narrowing, Brady tapped the butt of a six-gun that he was wearing on his hip.

"Well," he said, "I can take care of Hudson so he'll never testify against me."

Carter drew in a long breath.

"Yeah," he muttered. "Yeah, Joe, that's right. And I can handle ole Walton."

A few seconds later Brady was letting himself out through the front door of the saloon, which had been closed for the night, and it was as he emerged into the street that he saw a crowd of riders entering the town.

They were headed by Mayor Walton and Janie, Dick Hudson, Bill Tidewell and Tom Valley, and at sight of them Brady drew back into the shadows of the saloon's porch. Then, from that October 2nd, 1937.

vantage point, he watched the party break up and noticed Dick making his way alone towards the court-house which was about the most imposing structure that Big Rock could boast.

Brady had no doubt that the young lawyer was bound for the quarters of Judge Ben Parkinson, who lived close to the court-house and presided over it in the name of the Federal Government; and, as the street emptied, Brady made haste to intercept the big fellow.

"Where you goin', Hudson?" he asked softly, accosting him in a by-way that led to the court-house.

Dick looked at him steadfastly.

"I'm goin' to Judge Parkinson, Brady," he said, "to see about bringing you up for trial as a cattle-rustler, and Carter as an accessory before the fact."

"And I wouldn't try to stop me, if I were you," he added, detecting a suspicious movement of the gangster's right hand. "Because although I dislike bloodshed I once had the name of bein' pretty quick on the draw and I've neither given up totin' a gun nor lost the knack of using one."

It was a warning that Brady chose to disregard. In a flash he was reaching for his holster. But, swift as he was, Dick Hudson beat him to the trigger by a split-second, and as the cowboy-lawyer's "iron" belched flame and lead Carter's hireling pitched to the ground in a heap.

Alarmed by the shot, a crowd had soon collected, and it was a crowd that speedily expressed approval at the fate of Joe Brady, for there was more than one citizen amongst the throng who had reason to bear a grudge against Link Carter and all who had been connected with him.

Then, even as Dick was assuring the bystanders that he had in any case been compelled to fire in self-defence, a young woman put in an appearance and elbowed her way to the handsome attorney's side.

The woman was Ruth Valley, and there was a look of terror in her eyes.

"Dick," she panted. "Oh, Dick, Tom has gone to Carter's saloon for a show-down, and he's gone unarmed. He said he was going to give Carter a man-size beating before he let the law take care of him. I tried to stop him, but he wouldn't listen to me."

Dick gripped her by the arm.

"You mean to tell me Bill Tidewell let him go to Carter's saloon alone?"

"Bill wasn't there to prevent him. Bill had gone over to the Waltons' house. Oh, Dick, I'm scared! I—"

She stopped, for the report of a gunshot had interrupted her. It was a sound that seemed to come from somewhere near the south end of the town, and in a moment Dick was racing in that direction, with Ruth Valley and the crowd of citizens hurrying after him.

Sixty seconds later Dick Hudson was outside the back door of Carter's saloon, and was catching Tom Valley in his arms as the latter reeled out across the threshold of the land-shark's office with a bullet in his body—a bullet that had inflicted a mortal wound, for even as Dick lowered him to the ground the stricken man drew his last breath in a hollow groan.

His teeth clenched, Dick Hudson blundered into Carter's office. The rogue was not there, but the stalwart intruder caught sight of him in a kind of store-room; and Carter was engrossed in the task of extracting a spent cartridge-case from one of the cylinders of his revolver, with the object of replacing it by a fresh slug in order to cover up the crime he had committed.

"That won't do you any good, Link

Carter," Dick ripped out. "You're caught red-handed."

The crook swung round, and as he clapped eyes on his accuser he made a desperate attempt to turn the six-shooter on him. But ere the man could pull the trigger Dick was upon him and had struck him to the floor with a smashing right-hand punch.

Carter was still in possession of the revolver, however, and still in possession of his wits; and again he tried to direct the barrel of the gun at the lawyer.

Dick flung himself atop of him and clutched him by the wrist, forcing back the scoundrel's hand so that he could make no use of the forty-five. Then he succeeded in wresting the weapon from the fellow's grasp, and before another minute had elapsed he had battered the senses out of him with his bunched fists.

Outside, Ruth Valley was weeping distractedly over her husband's body; and when Dick appeared in the back doorway of the saloon, dragging Carter after him, the mob of onlookers who had gathered around the bereaved woman were all for dealing with the killer there and then.

But they were restrained by the young attorney who had beaten the land-hark into submission.

"Folks," Dick Hudson stated, "some mighty strange laws have been in operation here in Big Rock while Carter has been sheriff. But lynch law is no better than any that he ever obeyed, and that's why we've got to give him a fair trial, with Judge Ben Parkinson presiding."

And so, before that week was out, Link Carter stood arraigned in the court-house where case after case had formerly been decided in his favour. But now there was no "hand-picked" jury there to give a verdict that was all against the evidence; and Abbott, representing the defendant, made a poor showing when he found himself in the presence of twelve good men who were above bribery and corruption.

With Dick Hudson acting as prosecuting attorney, and the bench occupied by a judge who could scarcely conceal his distaste for the prisoner, the net of the law closed about Link Carter.

In the first place, Dick volunteered a testimony which left little room for doubt that the bullet that had slain Tom Valley had been fired from Carter's gun. Then he called upon Mayor Walton to take the stand, and proceeded to question him on his past association with the accused.

Old Walton did not spare himself in his indictment of the shady operations that Carter had carried out, and was speaking of the swindles the man had perpetrated when Dick cut in on him.

"All right, Mr. Walton," he said. "I think we all know now the methods Carter used when he pretended to sell plots of land to settlers, and tricked them with title-deeds which weren't worth the paper they were written on, and which enabled him to reclaim the properties and charge them rent. But there's just one other question I want to ask you. Did Link Carter make the land-rush according to Government rules and regulations?"

"I object," Abbott shouted. "My client's not on trial for breaking the rules and regulations governing a land-rush."

Dick glanced at him ominously.

"No, my learned friend," he said. "Your client is on trial for an offence far more serious than that. But if it pleases the court, I'm not only trying to establish the character of the prisoner—and those who consorted with him, Mr. Abbott—but I'm also endeavouring to

(Continued on page 28)

Three authors seek a plot for a play. They are still on page one when an intoxicated man wanders into their flat, collapses, and 15,000 dollars fall out of his pocket. Thinking he is a blackmailer, the three decide to build up a story round him, but everything becomes very involved when their subject is really murdered. Starring Lew Ayres, Ruth Coleman, Eugene Palette, and Benny Baker

"THE CRIME NOBODY SAW"

Three Authors in Search of a Plot

HORACE DRYDEN sat at the typewriter, his clean-shaven, round, bespectacled face the picture of patient gloom.

"Page 1," he ejaculated in a voice that resembled the first grave-digger from Hamlet.

Nick Milburn, in his shirt-sleeves, with his head buried in his hands, looked up angrily.

"Don't keep saying 'Page 1,'" he snapped. "I'm getting tired of it."

"Babe," Lawton walked to the table and poured himself out a drink. He was large and round, and, like Horace, he looked unhappy.

"He's got to say somethin'," he murmured. "We never get much further than the headin'. I wish I sold pea-nuts for a livin'. That's a man's job—writin' plays ain't."

Nick Milburn threw him an angry glance.

"You couldn't sell fresh fish to a starving seal," he retorted. "Haven't either of you got any ideas?"

Babe scratched his head ruefully.

"I'm beginning to think—"

"Marvelous," interrupted Nick witheringly. "In ten years' time something might result. Unfortunately Atherton will be here in half an hour."

"Know any other funny stories?" asked Lawton.

Silence then, while they all sat regarding the carpet as if it had done them some mortal injury. For John Atherton a month previously had commissioned them to write a play for him, and had parted with five hundred dollars in advance through the glowing accounts they had given him of a certain "wonderful idea." And now the money had come to an end.

Unfortunately, the play hadn't even come to a beginning. Horace had sat regularly at his typewriter and had neatly inscribed "Page 1" at the top of innumerable sheets of paper. Though that was about as far as he had ever got—beyond a line or two. Each one in turn had weighed in with suggestions, only to have them scornfully rejected by the other two.

Atherton, moreover, had been calling latterly with the persistence of a tax-collector, and though hitherto they had managed to stall him with fictitious stories of how the play was progressing, they knew only too well that his suspicions were aroused and the day of reckoning was at hand. He was to call that morning to "hear the play"—and though they knew only too well that he wouldn't hear it, they needed no telling that they would hear things.

And then suddenly into their gloomy silence broke the whirring of the outside bell.

Nick rose to his feet with a sigh. "And now for the day of judgment," he said as he walked to the door.

"The condemned man walked bravely to the scaffold," bleated Horace.

John Atherton walked briskly into the room, but he was eyeing them closely as they shook hands with him offensively while they expressed their delight at seeing him.

"We were only just talking about you," bleated Horace.

Atherton sat down in a chair, rubbing his hands.

"Fine, gentlemen," he said, "and so now I'm going to hear the play?"

It was not exactly a happy opening. Babe looked at the carpet, Nick looked at Horace, Horace looked like a cat that has swallowed an outside in fish-bones.

Nick broke the painful silence.

"Well, I don't know that you really ought to hear it this morning, Mr. Atherton," he began. "It seems—a pity—to—er—tell it you before it's—er—quite complete."

"That's just what I was saying as you came in," urged Horace, picking up the cue. "It's so good that we don't want to spoil it for you."

Babe added his little piece.

"Quite right," he said. "In a day or two's time—"

But Atherton broke in with the calm finality of a judge pronouncing sentence.

"Oh, I don't mind a bit about its not being quite complete," he said calmly. "You can just tell me the main outline of the story. That will do quite well for me."

Horace swallowed. He could see from the faces of his companions that it would about "do" for all of them.

"You tell him the beginning of the plot, Babe," he murmured with charming modesty.

"Oh, I couldn't, really," exclaimed Lawton hastily. "It's Nick's story. He must tell it."

Milburn sent him a glance which should have annihilated him on the spot.

"How nice of you, Babe," he said between clenched teeth.

Atherton settled himself more comfortably in his chair.

"Go right ahead, Mr. Milburn," he said pleasantly.

Nick's opening, as a fictional flight composed on the spur of the moment, had points in originality if nothing else. Though as a play to be presented to an audience composed of other than congenital lunatics or mentally deficient infants, it was slightly lacking in conviction and probability. Though if it suffered at all in the latter two, it was certainly not wanting in dramatic force. Nick declaimed the story with tone and gesture that the late Sir Henry Irving might almost have envied.

All the same, it is scarcely likely that the great actor's envy would have gone beyond the dramatic force of the budding young author.

It began apparently on the steppes of Russia in the dead of night, and out of a perfect forest of "moujikis," "vodkas" and "vitch's" there emerged a lovely heroine in priceless sables and passionate tears, who was fleeing for her life in a drosky driven by a grand duke (in disguise)—he was really a grand duke, although he didn't know it, having been brought up as a butcher's assistant—to save her from the clutches of another grand duke who really wasn't one at all. And the first curtain fell in an impenetrable icy gorge, with the wolves closing in on three sides and the nearest village fifty miles away.

"Which, of course, is a magnificent situation," said the teller of the story, who had by now reached the end of his resources. "As Horace wrote the second act he must tell it you himself. It wouldn't be fair for me to do it."

Dryden's eyes thanked him. So did his gulp which suggested that something inside was seriously arguing with him. Lawton was scratching his head desperately in his endeavours to stimulate his brain to cope with Act 3, which he could see was coming his way.

Horace began:

"The lovely Olga Poppoffwitch—I mean 'vitch'—is now in the burning desert of the Congo." His statement seemed to suggest that she had jumped there from Russia. "The sun is streaming down upon the palm trees, and by her side stands her faithful white-maned camel. She—Olga, not the camel—"

But Atherton rose. And if his words, unlike theirs, lacked originality of expression, they certainly were not wanting in dramatic force. And the three who listened knew that the days of their procrastination were at an end.

"I'll have no more of your sabled heroines and your droskies and your white-maned camels," he stormed. "You're swindlers, cheats, rogues, charlatans—that's what you are! You've had my money under false pretences, and I don't believe you've ever written a line, tried to write a line, or could write a line if you tried for a hundred years. But you're not getting away with my money like this, let me tell you, so you needn't think you are. Listen, you fiction-fakers, you swindling swaggerers, you snatching snoopers, I'll give you till four o'clock this afternoon to produce my play. Four o'clock, and not one minute afterwards! And if it isn't ready, you can use your inventive geniuses on the magistrate and see what he'll have to say to it. Good-morning!"

As he walked out, slamming the door behind him, Babe walked slowly over to the table and poured himself out another drink, which he proceeded to pour down his capacious throat.

"Ain't it fun, ben' an author?" he queried.

"Darned funnier to know you are one," growled Nick. "You can bet your life I shan't give you away."

Horace had ambled over to the typewriter and sat down in front of it like a sick sheep.

"I've got as far as Page 1," he said.

October 2nd, 1937.

The Man from the Flat Opposite

THERE is nothing unusual when a man rings your bell and you find on opening the door that he is in a pretty advanced state of intoxication. Nor is there anything unusual in his announcing to you in drunken gravity what his name is and the fact that he lives in the opposite apartment.

But it is unusual when, having done these things, he brushes you calmly aside, and, walking straight into your flat, drops down on the divan as if it were his own and proceeds to fall asleep without taking the slightest notice of any of you.

And all this the man from the apartment opposite had done soon after John Atherton's exit and while the three friends were feverishly wrestling with the problem of producing a play by four o'clock that afternoon.

They stood staring at each other in bewilderment—at the stranger, too. He was a small man. He was wearing evening dress beneath his overcoat, and he had a black trilby hat, and a white flower in his buttonhole, and a white muffler round his neck. For the rest he wore large, rimmed pince-nez, and had a neatly trimmed beard and moustache.

"I don't know him," murmured Horace at length, "but as his name's Duval, and he lives opposite, and there's a Mrs. Duval living there whom I do know, we may assume, I think, that he's her husband."

"My dear Hobnes, you're marvellous," retorted Nick.

"I'll remember her nightly in my prayers," said Babe as he gazed disgustedly at the sleeping man.

"What would you say he was?" asked Nick presently.

But an answer came in a somewhat unexpected fashion, for the stranger turned over at that moment to settle himself in a more comfortable position, and something slid from his hand to the floor which brought a sharp exclamation from all of them simultaneously.

Nick stooped down in a flash.

"Gosh, fellows—it's money!" he exclaimed excitedly. And then running his fingers quickly over the roll of notes, he added in awe-stricken tones:

"Fifteen thousand dollars!"

They stared blankly at each other.

"It seems to me," began Horace thoughtfully, "that the sooner we get him out of here the better."

He looked at the roll of notes lovingly.

"Drunken men never remember where they've been," he added. "It will teach him a salutary lesson."

"Don't be a fool," retorted Nick angrily. "We aren't thieves."

"Atherton said we were—he ought to know," murmured Horace.

"We must turn out his pockets and find out some more. Get to it, Babe."

"Try it yourself. He's sittin' on most of 'em."

"Then help me hoist him and see if we can stuff some sense into him."

Babe lifted him to his feet, and they all three shouted at him while they shook him. But it was of no avail. His head lolled back and there was not the slightest sign of consciousness about him.

"What do we do now, Nick?" asked Babe, who was still supporting him.

Nick looked up from the notes in his hand.

"Go through his pockets carefully," he said.

He stood turning over the pages of a small black book which they had taken from the insensible stranger's breast-pocket. There was a heavy frown on his face.

"There's something mighty queer about this chap," he said at length. "He's got a bunch of well-known men in this book, with their telephone numbers and certain entries of sums of money against each name. I wonder what the deuce it all means?"

"Looks to me like blackmail," remarked Babe laconically.

Nick looked up quickly.

"Jove, that's a notion," he replied. "Now, just one second and let me think. I've got an idea."

At length he spoke.

"Say, you chaps," he said. "I've got the whale of an idea, and it seems to me that there's money in it, too. We're goin' to ring up one or two of those guys whose numbers are in this little book and we're goin' to tell 'em that we've got Duval here in a dyin' condition, but wantin' to make a last statement before he pegs out. But he won't make it except in front of 'em."

"Where does that get us?" asked Horace.

"Use any atom of intelligence you've got," retorted Nick, "though I allow it isn't much. We're the police, you mutt, and each victim is goin' to pay to keep this matter hushed up."

Horace blinked at him helplessly.

"Oh, we're the police, are we?" he got out feebly.

"We are. I'm Inspector Milburn. Babe here will go and borrow Tim Harrigan's uniform—fake up a decent excuse, Babe"—Tim Harrigan was a sergeant of police who lived in the building, and a friend of Babe's as well—"while you, Horace, are—"

He paused for a moment, deep in thought.

"Now, what the dickens can you be?"

Oh, I've got it. You're a doctor—

Divisional Surgeon Dryden."

"Oh, I say, I've never been a doctor. I don't know what to do," expostulated Horace.

"You'll have nothing to do. You can talk a lot of high-falutin' stuff—they won't know what you're talkin' about—"

"But I don't want to be a divisional surgeon."

"You're not asked. You do what you're told. I'll do all the talking. You can endorse what I say when I ask you to do so. Now help me shove this guy behind the screen, and then Babe shall run away and get his uniform, and then we'll select three big names out of this book and call 'em up."

They decided on their three victims eventually. They were of the names of Brookes, Mallory and Underhill, all apparently men of wealth, from their addresses.

And Nick, when he had finished telephoning, turned to his companions with a grin.

"Seems to me we're on something good," he ejaculated. "Each one hummed and ha'ed and tried to bluff. But all three are coming right enough."

"I wish I weren't a doctor," wailed Horace.

Surprises for the Conspirators

AS the electric bell whirred out

Nick strode to the door and opened it, disclosing a tall, well-dressed young man in the middle thirties with a small, dark moustache.

"I'm Inspector Milburn," he said coolly, "and may I ask if you're Mr. Brookes?"

"My friends and patients usually call me Dr. Brookes," replied the other easily. "What's all the trouble about?"

Horace's jaw dropped a yard, and he glanced despairingly about him as though he was contemplating making a hurried exit. Nick, however, closed the door coolly.

"Come right in, doctor," he said. "This is Sergeant Lawton and this is Dr. Dryden, the divisional surgeon."

"Charmed, I'm sure," murmured Brookes.

Horace stammered out that it was mutual, and looked rather like a man for whom the executioner has just called.

Nick proceeded in a business-like manner.

"Now, doctor," he said, "be good enough to tell us what your relations were with Mr Duval. As I told you, and as Dr. Dryden will also tell you, he can't possibly live for more than a few hours at the most."

"Sorry about that," replied the other. "He's an old patient of mine and I've treated him for some time past for chronic alcoholism."

He turned to Horace, whose mouth had opened limply at this unexpected new development.

"What's he dying of, doctor?" he asked blandly.

"Oh—er—quite a lot of things. But he can't possibly recover, I can assure you."

"Being his doctor, of course you have no objection to my having a look at him, have you?"

Nick, however, answered the question. He wanted no telling from the panic-stricken look on his friend's face that he had every objection to it.

"I really can't allow that, doctor," he said firmly. "Besides, there's no need for it. I have every faith in Doctor Dryden's opinion, and there is not the slightest need for another."

Brookes shrugged his shoulders indifferently. But he addressed Horace.

"You haven't yet told me what's the matter with him," he said persuasively.

Horace gulped and creaked like a fish newly grassed.

"As a matter of fact—" he began; but at that moment there came another ring at the bell, and Milburn hastily laid his hand on Brookes' shoulder.

"O n e moment, please, doctor," he said. "I must ask you to be good enough to step into the adjoining room. This is someone I'm expecting, and I'll go on with you in a minute."

As the door closed behind Brookes, and Milburn made for the front door, Horace wiped his face with his handkerchief.

"If this is another doctor, Nick," he bleated. "I'm going out through the window."

The next man who came in and who gave the name of Underhill was quite a different type from Brookes. For he was short and inclined to stoutness. He was clean-shaven, wore horn-rimmed glasses, and had a definitely truculent manner.

"Now then, what's all this about?" he demanded, as he came into the room.

"It has come to our knowledge," said Nick, in his very best professional manner, "that you not only know this man Duval, who is dying in the next room, but have had extensive and rather peculiar dealings with him," he said.

Underhill's truculent frown deepened. "What's the big idea, inspector?" he queried. "Who's this guy Duval, anyway?"

But Nick shook his head.

"Better come clean," he said. "It'll save trouble in the end."

"I tell you," rasped Underhill angrily, "I haven't the least idea what you're talking about."

But sudden interruption came to Nick's assistance as he put his next question to Underhill and asked whether he had been in the building before, to which he received a flat denial. For at that moment a stout, round-faced coloured woman entered the room, but stopped short as she did so.

"Oh, I beg pardon, Mr. Milburn," she said. "I didn't know there was anyone here, and I thought it was a good chance to clean— Why, Mr. Underhill, how's you?"

There was a rather strained silence. Underhill was looking as if he could cheerfully murder the old woman, and Nick didn't miss it. He swung round on her.

"D'you know this gentleman, Ambrosia?" he asked gently.

A broad smile illuminated her face.

"Know him, sir? Why, sir, he's the owner of this block of apartments. Do I know my own mother?"

"Thank you, Ambrosia, that will be all."

"Thank you, sir."

As the door closed behind her, Nick spoke with his eyes fixed intently on Underhill.

"And now perhaps you're comin' clean, Underhill?" he suggested. "What were the relations between you and Duval?"

The other scowled.

"I refuse to say a word without my solicitor," he snapped angrily.

Another ring at the bell stopped Nick's answer. It was occurring to him that he hadn't got very far with his first two ventures, and he was wondering what to do. Hustling Underhill unceremoniously into an adjoining room he went to the door. Before him stood an exceedingly pretty and well-dressed girl.

Nick stood blinking a little. This was a development for which he was not prepared.

"May I ask what you want?" he queried politely.

"My name's Mallory—Kay Mallory. You rang my father up, and as he's not well I came along for him."

"Please come in and sit down. I've got a few questions I'd like to ask you, Miss Mallory."

But almost before she was seated she began, considerably to his surprise:

"You want to know doubtless what my father's relations were with Duval, and I can tell you just this. Duval has blackmailed him for fifteen thousand pounds, which my father was foolish enough to pay. Though what it was all about I just don't know."

Nick stared at her blankly. It was dawning on him that things were turning out far differently from his expectations. Her straightforwardness, her prettiness, and her very obvious distress worried him not a little.

"My dear Miss Mallory—" he began, but that was as far as he ever got, for at that moment Underhill rushed in from the balcony, his eyes bulging with fear.

"Quick!" he panted. "Duval's been murdered!"

They all spun round and stared at him. Nick was the first to speak.

"Come on, we'll buy it."

"Oh, for the love of Mike! I saw him lying on the couch behind the screen there—"

"Maybe you'll find a finger-print or two on that which will help," he said as he handed the ice-pick to the detective.

"I thought you didn't know him?"

"Oh, never mind that! I'm telling you—"

Brookes had come quickly into the room while all this was going on. He had gone at once behind the screen where they had laid Duval, and he now reappeared.

"It's quite true," he announced calmly. "Someone's murdered him. He's lying there with an ice-pick driven into his heart."

There was a deathly silence. Horace was positively goggling with fright.

Then one and all dived for the back of the screen.

They stood staring at the murdered man. Horace was wiping the perspiration from his forehead. Babe was looking particularly glum, while Nick was engorging his brains to try to discover what the proper duties of a police-inspector were at a moment like this.

Brookes was the first to speak calmly, but with slight sarcasm in his voice.

"Well, inspector, what happens now?" he asked.

Nick pulled himself together with a jerk. He realised that the situation had changed with startling rapidity; but he realised, too, that the time for fooling was past.

He spun round in a flash on Underhill.

"You were the first to discover the body," he snapped in his best professional manner. "What were you doing out of the room I put you in?"

"Why should I stay there?" retorted the other coolly. "I'm no criminal. I wandered out on to the balcony, looked in through the window, and saw this chap lying with the pick in his heart. D'you expect me to walk back into the room and take no notice of it?"

Nick bit his lip. The explanation sounded plausible enough. He addressed Brookes.

"What have you got to say for yourself?" he queried.

"I stayed put in my room," replied Brookes coolly. "You saw me come out of it, attracted by the noise I heard and the word 'murdered.' Why should I stay inside?"

Nick decided to play for time. It seemed the only thing to do.

"No one leaves this flat," he said. "Sergeant, you remain here with the body."

"Wouldn't our friend Dr. Dryden like to examine the corpse so that he can certify the cause of death?" asked Brookes politely.

Horace's face was a study. He was about to stammer out that he was perfectly satisfied with it when Nick interrupted sharply.

"I'm giving instructions here, not you," he snapped. "And when I want your advice I'll ask for it. Underhill, get back to your room, and you, Dr. Dryden, go with him and see he doesn't leave it. Brookes, you and Miss Mallory stay here with me. I'm getting to the bottom of this."

The Body Disappears

BABE LAWTON sat in a chair behind the screen with the dead body of Duval lying before him. And he was plunged in the deepest gloom. It seemed to him that Nick's alleged brain-wave had landed all of them into a mess a thousand times worse than the one in which they had previously been involved, and he was wondering vaguely how on earth Nick was ever going to get them out of it.

From the other side of the screen he could hear the voices of the three people. He could hear Nick doing most of the talking, and found himself wondering how he could keep his voice so calmly indifferent. He and Kay

Mallory seemed to be having a discussion, and he wondered what it was all about.

But from that moment he ceased to wonder, for something crashed in on his head, and the world faded into nothingness.

He sat up blinking, gradually made out Nick supporting him and the rest crowded round him.

"Something hit me," he murmured a little feebly.

"I'll say it did," replied Nick grimly. "We found you lying in a heap on the floor just now, and the person who did it was thoughtful enough to switch the lights off at the main and we've only just managed to get 'em on again."

Lawton blinked, stared. Duval's body should have been on the couch in front of him. But it was no longer there!

"Where—where's the body?" he managed to get out.

"That's what I want to know," replied Nick. "I hoped you'd be able to tell us. It's been good enough to disappear."

"It—it was there when I passed out," Brookes shrugged his shoulders.

"We've only got your word for it," he said.

Nick spun round on him in a second.

"What d'you mean?" he flashed out.

Brookes regarded him with a cynical smile.

"Trying to tell me," rejoined the other coolly, "that your pal here"—he indicated Horace—"is a real doctor! Because I'm telling you he's no more a doctor than Underhill here. So how do we know that this guy is a real policeman? He may have disposed of the body himself."

"Shouldn't be a bit surprised," growled Underhill.

There was rather an uncomfortable silence. Horace looked in the last stages of feebleness, and Lawton seemed by no means happy. Nick, however, refused to give in. Ideas had suddenly come to him, and more than ever now he decided to see this thing through.

"You're talking through the back of your neck," he replied sharply. "At any rate, I'm running this show, and none of you are leaving here. I'm going into the flat opposite to make some investigations, and I'm locking you all in here, whether you like it or whether you don't."

But even as he reached the door there came another ring, and as he opened the door he found himself confronted by a small, elderly looking man with a very worried face. Yet before he could speak there came a cry from Kay Mallory:

"Daddy!"

Nick's eyebrows went up.

"Oh, so you are Mr. Mallory?" he queried politely. "Please come in. We only wanted you to make the party complete."

Outside the flat he locked the door and pocketed the key.

"Gosh!" he murmured. "What the blazes of a mess! But I'm inclined to think I know the solution of it all. The only job will be to prove it. However—"

Inside the Duvals' flat Nick stood interviewing the old coloured woman. Though to her, because she knew him well, he had made a clean breast of the whole story from the beginning, begging her assistance before he finally decided to throw up the sponge and call in the police.

She listened open-mouthed.

"Gosh, Mr. Milburn, yo' sure have got yourself into a hole."

"It looks to me, Ambrosia, more like a bottomless pit than a hole," he answered with a smile; "but we won't argue about that. I've got a shrewd idea who killed this man Duval, and I want to ask you one or two questions before I go any further."

"Go right ahead, Mr. Milburn. I'll sure be helping you all I can."

"This man Duval, who's been murdered. You know everyone in this building, Ambrosia. How often have you seen him?"

"Well, I've seen him coming home very drunk sometimes, sir."

"And Mrs. Duval? Was she fond of him?"

"Far as I know, Mr. Milburn. She used to talk a mighty lot about him."

"Did they go out much together?"

"Can't say I ever saw 'em together at all. I used to see her when I came to do this flat. Once or twice I've seen him. But I sure never saw them together."

Nick's eyebrows went up.

"Like that, was it? Did the lady have any boy friends?"

"Well, between you and me, sir, she had one particular one who used to come here quite a lot when her husband wasn't here. But he hasn't been here for quite a while, and, between you and me, I sort of fancy that he'd given her the go-by. And I reckon she was mighty sore about it. For she's a mighty good-looker, Mr. Milburn, and I reckons they don't sort of like bein' turned down."

"I'll say they don't," said Nick reflectively.

He stood by the open grand piano deep in thought. For what she had just told him was giving him an unexpected surprise, and seemed to make matters even more complicated than before.

"Anything more I can tell you, Mr. Milburn?" queried the old woman.

"Can't think of anything at the moment, Ambrosia."

"Then I'll be gettin' along with my work. I was just doin' the other room."

She bustled away, and he stood staring gloomily at the piano. The solution seemed to be farther away than ever. Quite thoughtlessly he started to tap the keyboard of the piano, but even as he did so he stopped, and a frown came to his face.

"That's funny!" he muttered.

It certainly was; though what followed was surely funnier still. For, as he proceeded to touch more keys, he was surprised to find that none of them would sound.

For a moment he stood frowning. Then he lifted the big lid. But even as he did so he gave a gasp and stood petrified with amazement. For there, huddled up inside the grand piano, was the body of Duval!

Ambrosia to the Rescue!

MILBURN never knew how long he stood staring at the dead man.

All he knew was that, as he stared, certain tiny things about Duval seemed suddenly to attract his attention, to invite his closer inspection. But even as they did so his breath came faster, and presently, with a trembling hand, he touched the small moustache on the corpse's cold face.

And then he gave it a sudden pull, though even as it came away in his hand he gave an excited exclamation and flopped heavily down on the music-stool.

"Gosh!" he exclaimed. "I believe I see it all!"

In a flash he had closed the piano, lighted cigarette, and, trying to control the trembling of his hands, closed the piano.

"Ambrosia!" he called out gently.

She came in, stood before him.

(Continued on page 27)

"WILD WEST DAYS"

(Continued from page 6)

amongst townsmen who had always been respecters of the law. Like wildfire a sense of resentment spread through the crowd, so that when someone gave vent to the words "lynch law," the grim phrase was echoed and re-echoed until the rafters of the bar-room rang with it.

And soon the Silver Dollar was emptying its mob of enraged humanity into the street, a mob headed by those who were secretly in the pay of Matt Keeler, but consisting mainly of honest citizens who were filled with righteous indignation, and who believed that justice in Brimstone had become a travesty.

"We'll show the rats in this town they can't get away with murder! When we're through with Munro, every other crook in this section will know what to expect!"

Cries such as these reflected the ugly mood of the crowd as they marched towards the gaol, and en route the throng was swelled in numbers by groups of loungers, while from a side-road came a further batch of ruffians belonging to Keeler's organisation—men who had presumably been sought out by the newspaper owner and detailed to join in any demonstration that might ensue.

Meanwhile, in the gaol itself, Kentucky Wade and his comrades were informing Larry Munro and his sister of the successful outcome of their interview with Judge Lawrence, and they were assuring the prisoner that they would do all in their power to help him exonerate himself, when suddenly the sheriff called to them from the outer doorway of his office.

"There's a mob headed this way!" he jerked. "I don't like the look of it!"

Kentucky hurried to the threshold, followed by Dude, Mike Morales and Trigger Benton, and the four of them beheld the solid phalanx of men who were advancing down the main street; beheld, well in the lead, two individuals who were strangers to them, though not to the sheriff.

They were Steve Claggett and Buckskin, and from a horse tethered outside the saloon the latter had obtained a lariat which was doubtless intended for Larry Munro's neck.

"You'd better close this door and get under cover, sheriff," Kentucky said tersely; but the other shook his head.

"I ain't never been scared by a mob yet," he stated. "I'm goin' out to talk to 'em."

With that he stepped forth on to the porch, and, holding up his hand, called out to the oncoming throng.

"That's close enough," he warned them imperatively.

The crowd paused, and for a moment seemed undecided. Then the rogue known as Buckskin lifted his voice.

"We got nothing against you, sheriff," he began, "but you've a prisoner in there that—"

"I've a prisoner in here that's going to stay where he is," the sheriff cut in, "safe in the hands of the law."

Once more there was a brief silence, which was again broken by Buckskin as the half-breed wheeled round to incite the mob.

"Are you goin' to stand there and let one man back you down?" he grated, and all at once the crowd raised a clamorous response, hurling cat-calls at the guardian of the peace and working themselves up into a fury of determination.

Within a few seconds men were reaching for their hips, and, realising that they were in the grip of the blood-lust and that no amount of argument would bring them to their senses, the sheriff ducked back into his office and slammed the door.

As he bolted that door he saw that Kentucky and his three companions had drawn their six-guns, and, following suit, he addressed them curtly.

"All right, let 'em have it!" he rapped out. "But shoot over their heads first."

The one-time law officers from New Mexico posted themselves at the windows, and the sheriff took up a position alongside Kentucky. An instant later their revolvers were helching a challenge to the mob, the shots flying high above the press of angry men.

The challenge failed to restrain the crowd. Still led by Buckskin and Steve Claggett, the throng surged forward at the double and poured in a volley of bullets that whistled through the open windows of the sheriff's office or struck splinters from the frames.

"They're not fooling, sheriff!" Kentucky said grimly.

"Are you tellin' me?" was the older man's rejoinder. "Okay, fire into the thick of 'em!"

Again the forty-fives of the defenders blazed out, but this time with a vengeance, and, three or four of the rioters biting the dust, the rest of the mob scattered for cover. Then from innumerable vantage-points they proceeded to rake the windows of the sheriff's office with deadly fusillades.

The occupants of that office pumped lead at the besiegers resolutely, discharging their guns until the barrels of the weapons were hot to the touch and the air in the room foul with the reek of smoke. Meanwhile groups of the attackers were making frequent rushes at the gaol in the hope of carrying it by storm, but, suffering heavy casualties, these were forced to retreat again and again by the withering fire of the sheriff and his supporters.

It was during one of these attempted assaults that a stage-coach rolled into the main street from the east end of the town, but, seeing what was afoot, the driver of the vehicle swung into a side turning, and presently Kentucky Wade heard the equipage draw up behind the gaol.

He paid little heed to the circumstance, for just then he was intent on the battle that was in progress—a battle that seemed likely to end in ultimate victory for the mob because of their overwhelming numbers.

Crouching at one of the windows with a fuming six-gun in his fist, Kentucky suddenly half-turned towards Brimstone's representative of the law.

"Why don't you let Larry Munro out of his cell and give him back his forty-five, sheriff?" he said through clenched teeth. "If we're going to hold this BANG . . . boom . . . whizz! Up they go! All the colours of the rainbow splatter the sky. What a thrill! Yes, you'll have a real, rip-snorting 'Fifth' if you hurry up and join BROCK'S Club. And it's so easy. Simply go to a shop displaying BROCK'S FIREWORK CLUB Notice in the window and ask for a Club Card. Give the shopman a penny or whatever you can spare and he'll enter it on the card. When you have saved a lot of pennies, no doubt Dad and Uncle Bill will add a bob or two. Then what a thrill you'll have choosing a grand selection of BROCK'S latest wonderful firework surprises.

Join BROCK'S
CRYSTAL PALACE
FIREWORK CLUB
now!
GET YOUR CLUB CARD TO-DAY

THINK OF THE FUN

for you and your chums and family if you had a Riley 'Home' Billiard Table. 8-DOWN brings delivery on 7 days' free trial. Balance monthly. Ask your dad to write for Art List.

32 Free Billiard Tables. Write for details.

E. J. RILEY, Ltd., Ensign Works, ACCRINGTON, or Dept. 36, 147, Aldersgate St., London, E.C.1.

October 2nd, 1927.

mob at bay we've got to make every bullet count and Larry sure knows how to use a gun!"

Without a word the sheriff removed a bunch of keys from his hip-pocket, unfastened the cell-door, and, as Larry emerged, pointed to a desk on which the cattlemen's six-shooter was lying. Next moment the released prisoner was striding towards that desk, but he was never destined to reach it, for a stray bullet that zipped through one of the windows plugged him in the shoulder before he had taken three steps, and with an exclamation of pain he tumbled to the floor.

Lucy and the sheriff fell on their knees beside him, the girl crying out in alarm. Kentucky joined the sheriff and Lucy Munro, and helped them to doctor the fallen man's wound. But, even when they had done their best for him, it was plain that he was suffering and needed expert attention.

"He's in a bad way," Lucy moaned. "Oh, if only we could get him to a surgeon!"

"A surgeon!" the sheriff reiterated. "A surgeon won't be much use to him if that mob out there lay hands on him. I wish there was some way of smugglin' him clear of the town and carrying him to the gaol in Yuma. He'd be safe enough there."

It was then that Kentucky remembered Brimstone a little while, previously, and on a sudden he gripped the sheriff by the arm.

"Is there a back way out of the gaol?" he demanded.

"Yes. Why?"

"You saw that stage pull in, didn't you?"

"Yeah," the sheriff answered. "It's bound for Yuma, but—"

"If I can get Larry aboard it, maybe I can make Yuma with him." Kentucky interrupted. "Supposing you let me try it, sheriff, while you and my friends are giving the mob something to think about."

The sheriff pursed his lips.

"All right," he agreed. "It's either that or a lynching party. Go ahead."

Larry Munro was in a half-fainting condition, but, lifting him in his strong arms, Kentucky bore him from the office, and within the space of a quarter of a minute the two of them were alongside the Yuma stage-coach.

It had drawn up in a back street at the rear of the gaol, and the driver of the vehicle was perched on its box-seat, the picture of indecision.

"What's goin' on in this town?" he asked of Kentucky. "I'm supposed to stop at the Wells-Fargo agency, but the place is under fire."

"You'd better give up the notion of trying to reach it and head straight for Yuma instead," Kentucky advised him. "I've got a passenger here for you—"

He checked, becoming aware all at once that Lucy had followed him from the gaol, and, though he was averse to her undertaking the journey to Yuma, she refused to be separated from her brother.

It was in vain that he warned her of the danger she was courting. The girl was adamant, and in the end he helped her into the coach with her brother, he himself electing to follow on horseback.

His bronc, together with those of Dude, Mike, and Trigger, was tethered to a hitch-rail behind the sheriff's quarters. He swung himself astride it, and, with the stage-coach on the move, clapped his heels to the pony's flanks, calling out to the driver of the vehicle in front of him to keep to the side roads until he was quit of the town.

Away went the coach, with Kentucky in close attendance. Yet even as the dust was rising thickly from hoofs and wheels, a party of men turned a corner some little distance away to spy the receding vehicle and the horseman who was galloping close to its tail.

The men were gangsters in the pay of Matt Keeler, and Claggett was among them. It was he, in fact, who had led the party round to the back of the gaol, with the intention of launching an attack from that quarter. But now he abandoned that project, and, exchanging a significant glance with his accomplices, he turned on his track and hurried in the direction of Keeler's office.

The other men filed after him, and soon they were confronting Matt Keeler and Doc Hardy in the former's private sanctum.

"Listen, boss," Steve Claggett reported. "I've got an idea Munro may have been smuggled outa town. We just saw the Yuma coach start up back of the gaol, an' a stranger was trailin' along with it—one o' them guys that was fixin' bail with Judge Lawrence maybe."

Keeler had risen to his feet.

"What are you telling me for?" he bit out. "Get after that coach. But wait, don't spread the alarm. Let the mob keep up the siege of the gaol, in case you're mistaken. You get after that coach like I told you, and if Munro happens to be aboard it—well, you know what to do."

Thirty seconds later Claggett and his party were spurring from the town, and, picking up the Yuma road, they had left Brimstone far to the rear when they crossed a low ridge and descried the stage and its attendant rider about a quarter of a mile ahead of them.

With Kentucky Wade galloping in close proximity to it, the vehicle was bowling over the trail at a good pace, and though Claggett and his accomplices gored their horses ruthlessly they had not gained on the fugitives to any appreciable extent, when all of a sudden another band of mounted men hove into view.

These were not white men. They were lank-haired warriors of the prairie—Indian braves armed with bow and musket—marauding savages to whom all Palefaces were hated foes. Out from a belt of timber they rode, midway between the coach and the troop of gangsters led by Claggett, and, failing to perceive the crooks but setting eyes on the stage and Kentucky Wade, they let loose a concerted yell.

Claggett and his confederates drew rein abruptly, and through narrowed lids they watched the Redskins swing on to the trail and give chase to the coach and its lone outrider. Then Claggett swung round.

"If Munro's aboard that stage them Injuns will fix him," he rasped. "But we'd better pull outa here in case they spot us an' take it into their heads to fix us as well. Come on."

The group of rogues lost no time in making themselves scarce, streaming back in the direction whence they had come. Meanwhile, to the west, the Redskins were pounding in pursuit of Kentucky and the coach, uttering the fearsome death-howl that was the battle-cry of their race, and discharging musket-bullets and barbed arrows at their prey.

(To be continued in another smashing episode next week. A New Universal picture, distributed throughout the United Kingdom and the Irish Free State by General Film Distributors, Ltd., starring John Mack Brown.)

"LARCENY ON THE AIR"

(Continued from page 14)

being hidden. With Jean he was on the way to the hide-out, but was in no immediate danger.

Kennedy and Burke, as they hurtled along the roads, did not know that the cops were watching for his yellow sedan car, and when they did see the car they followed at a discreet distance, so that he should not get wise.

The tablets soon soothed Pete Andorka into slumber. The male nurse watched the doctor, as if not quite sure if the proceedings were on the level.

"Strip to the waist—quick." Larry spoke sharply to Andrews, and, as the crook obeyed, he held out his arm for the clothes. In the jacket pocket of the coat was a gun. He waited till Andrews was stripped to his singlet before covering the two men. "Now reach for the ceiling—both of you"

Larry ordered the nurse to bind Andrews to a chair. Suddenly there was a screeching of brakes outside, and the doctor guessed it must be Kennedy.

"Jean, look that door, will you?"

A moment later Kennedy was banging on the door and demanding that it be opened at once.

"Stand away from the door, Jean," Larry ordered, and he spoke just in time.

A gun blazed, and Andrews, with a cry of pain, slumped in the chair.

As the doctor glanced at the unfortunate man the nurse seized the opportunity and rushed in, swinging his arms. Larry was taken by surprise and the gun was knocked from his hand. He fought back and with mighty punches dropped the nurse to the floor; but as Larry reached for the gun there came a tinkling of glass.

"Let that alone, doc," drawled Burke. "And keep 'em up."

Kennedy, with the help of the caretaker, managed to burst open the door. "You asked for it, and you're going to get it," he snarled out. "Let him have it, Burke."

A shot rang out and Jean screamed, but it was not Larry who dropped. A heavy body crashed against the window and smashed through to lie in a heap near Jean's feet.

"I've got you covered, Kennedy," said a calm voice, and Larry gave a sigh of relief to find that it was his old friend MacDonald. A second later the inspector and several officers were in the sick-room. "I got that prescription just in time, doc."

Larry pointed to the bed.

"There's Pete, Mac."

"Well, that makes our case water-tight. Who's this?"

"Andrews, one of Kennedy's men," Larry answered. "Kennedy shot him by accident."

"Take him away, boys," MacDonald said to the officers, and they seized the discomfited Kennedy. "Go easy with him, as he's more valuable alive. His conviction will be a warning to the quacks that they can't get away with it." He held out his hand to the doctor. "Good work, Larry! There should be a reward for what you've done."

"And here it is," chuckled Larry, and, with a grin, slipped his arm round the waist of the blushing Jean.

(By permission of British Lion Films, starring Robert Livingston as Lawrence Baxter and Grace Bradley as Jean Sterling.)

"THE CRIME NOBODY SAW"

(Continued from page 24)

"That boy friend of Mrs. Duval's?" he queried. "D'you think you'd know him again if you saw him?"

A broad smile came to her face.

"Why, Mr. Milburn, I'd know him anywhere."

"Fine. Then you'll have your chance. I'm going to blindfold you and lead you into the room opposite, where there are half-a-dozen people. And when I take the bandage off I want you to see if you can pick out the man who used to come and see Mrs. Duval. You don't happen to know if he had a key to the flat, do you?"

"I know he did, Mr. Milburn. I've been there when he let himself in."

"Better and better. Now let's put a bandage round your eyes and see if we can't have some fun and games."

He walked into his own flat, leading the old woman by the hand. They all stared, but Underhill spoke first.

"What in thunder's all this about?" he demanded.

"Merely a little experiment I'm about to conduct," replied Milburn easily. "I think it may show us the murderer of Duval."

But Mallory stepped forward. "I murdered Duval," he said. "He had got money out of me, and I got on to the balcony long before I came in here, and killed him."

"You're not to believe him," exclaimed Kay Mallory excitedly. "I've already told them that I murdered him for robbing my father."

Underhill spoke.

"Well, I've rung up the police, and they're on their way along. So maybe they'll tell us who the real murderer is."

Nick's eyes strayed from father to daughter.

"Let me see if I can tell you," he said coolly, and stripped the bandage from Ambrosia's eyes.

Just for a second her eyes roamed round the room. But the moment they came to Brookes she flung out an accusing finger.

"That's the man, Mr. Milburn, who used to come and see Mrs. Duval," she exclaimed triumphantly.

Brookes, who had changed colour, looked distinctly angry in the amazed silence that followed.

"May I ask how that proves I killed her husband?" he queried.

"You may," replied Nick, with his eyes fixed on the other. "And I'll tell you. There was no husband at all, and only recently you tumbled to it. Mrs. Duval, dressed to represent a mythical husband, lies doubled up in the piano in the opposite flat. And I am in a position to prove"—he wasn't, and knew it, but he was staking everything on one last throw—"that you are the only person in this room who has a key of the opposite flat. Want anything more?"

It was a duel between the two now, and the rest of the room looked on spellbound. For Brookes had gone pale, and his breath was coming fast as he faced his accuser.

But his eyes were those of a man whose enemies have at last closed on him.

"Aren't you clever, you fake inspector?" he sneered. "I wonder how you'll convince the police?"

And then, in a flash, out leaped a revolver from his pocket, menacing them.

Part One Today!
MODERN ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PHOTOGRAPHY

A NEW Standard Work of Reference in Weekly Parts 1/6 EACH

2,500

Practical and Beautiful Photographs and Diagrams

150 FINE ART and COLOUR PLATES

Hundreds of valuable tables and formulae.

Photographic Principles and Practice
 Open-air Photography
 Photography for Novice and Amateur Chemicals and Chemistry
 Processes and Materials
 Colour Photography
 "Miniature"

Photography
 Cinematography
 Cameras, Lenses and Other Apparatus
 Commercial and Process (Printing)

Press Photography
 Group and Portrait Photography
 Special Processes
 Professional Photography

£300

IN PRIZES FOR PHOTOS

Part 1 of this new work contains full details of an important competition in which big prizes are offered. There are chances for every type of photo. Make up your mind now to enter this great contest.

Buy PART ONE Now and place a standing order with your News-agent or Bookstall for each part as published

Whatever your standard in photography—novice, ambitious amateur, student or professional—you will find this new Encyclopedia invaluable. The MODERN ENCYCLOPEDIA OF PHOTOGRAPHY will contain, in simple form, a detailed and comprehensive account of the whole art of photography.

It will show you how to choose your camera, how to make the best of it all the time, how to avoid errors and pitfalls, and how to do everything in photography from taking the actual picture to developing, printing and enlarging.

There is no single branch of this great everyday hobby that is not covered in a practical and authoritative way.

It shows you how to make money with your camera, and gives full explanations of every technical term and full descriptions of every photographic accessory.

The illustrations, in addition to the pick of the world's finest photographs, will include a large number of helpful diagrams and explanatory pictures.

THE WHOLE ART OF PHOTOGRAPHY FROM "A" TO "Z"

For Amateur and Expert

"Now who wins?" he snarled. There was no moving with that gun sweeping to and fro, and as he backed to the door there was evil triumph in his eyes.

"You weren't quite clever enough, Mr. Milburn," he said.

With the gun still covering them his left hand groped for the handle, opened the door. But only those who stood still and watched saw the three uniformed policemen, who were just behind him, about to enter.

But they had their hands on him in a second, and led him back into the room, demanding an explanation.

This time, however, Nick told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, while Brookes, with police officers all round him, and one with a gun in his hand, made no attempt to say anything.

"So maybe you won't hold it up against me now," went on Nick at the finish, "that I did a bit of impersonation stuff. For, at any rate, I've given you the real criminal."

He handed the detective the ice-pick. "Maybe you'll find a finger-print or two on that which will help you come," he added.

Brookes had quite a record with the police department. As a doctor he had been able to carry on a trade with dangerous drugs, but the police had never been able to pin anything on to him. This murder would mean the finish for Dr. Brookes, and so the police were willing to take a lenient attitude towards the three conspirators. Kay Mallory was advised to take her father away for a holiday. She promised to write to Nick.

The police then took Brookes down to the police car.

Three men no longer gloomy now sat alone in their flat after Brookes, handcuffed, had been taken away.

Nick was whistling cheerfully, Babe was enjoying a drink, and Horace was sitting before his typewriter, and, for once, in a way, seemed eager to begin.

"Gosh, this will make the whale of a plot," said Nick, as he rubbed his hands together.

"And the police behaved darned decently about it," replied Babe. "Whatever made you tumble to Brookes, Nick?"

The latter settled down more easily in his chair. When he started to speak it was after the manner of a trained professor explaining a simple matter to a particularly obtuse infant.

"In the detection of crime, Babe—" he began.

Horace waited patiently until Nick lauded for breath. Then he spoke, loudly but firmly:

"Page 1," he said.

(By permission of Paramount Pictures, Ltd., starring Lew Ayres and Ruth Coleman.)

"STRANGE LAWS"

(Continued from page 20)

take the opportunity of showing that all those good people who were swindled by Carter can claim their property through forfeiture."

Judge Parkinson looked down at old man Walton.

"You may answer the prosecuting attorney's question," he observed calmly.

"All right," the mayor announced. "Carter did not make the land-rush according to rules and regulations, and every square inch of property he owns here is open to forfeiture. For, ashamed as I am that I've waited so long before denouncing him, I say now that he crossed the Oklahoma border on the night before the signal to enter this territory was given."

Link Carter had heard enough. He knew that Abbott's talents as a lawyer had proved inadequate in this instance, and that Abbott himself was likely to find himself charged with sharp practice ere long. And he knew that he—Carter—had not only been exposed as a rogue and a swindler, but that the evidence concerning the death of Tom Valley had been sufficient to send him to the gallows.

But there on a table nearby lay the gun which had killed Tom Valley. It had been accepted as evidence, and had been set down there by an officer of the court, and with a bound Link Carter reached it and snatched it up.

"All right," he snarled, "I'm guilty on every count you've brought up against me, including the shootin' of Tom Valley. But you'll never put a rope around my neck, for I'm blastin' my way out of this court!"

Dick Hudson took a step towards him. There was a smile playing around the young attorney's lips.

"You don't think a loaded revolver would be left lying around within your grasp at a time like this, Carter, do you?" he remarked. "Just pull that trigger, will you?"

Link Carter did so, jabbing the forty-five at the handsome lawyer in the same instant. But the result was a harmless click, and next second Dick had seized the blackguard; and as Carter struggled vainly in the big fellow's vice-like embrace he heard the stern voice of Judge Parkinson addressing him.

"Link Carter, you are a self-confessed murderer, and by your own words you have relieved the jurymen of the necessity of bringing in a verdict. And for the crime which you have committed I now sentence you to be hanged by the neck until you are dead."

Link Carter had paid the penalty of his misdeeds, and Abbot was languishing in a distant penitentiary, when young Barty Walton and his father listened one night to the strains of music drifting through the sitting-room windows of the mayoral home.

For old man Walton was still mayor of Big Rock. True, he had resigned after the trial in which he had figured as a witness, but he had been re-elected amid popular acclaim.

The music to which Mayor Walton and his son were listening was provided by a guitar and a fine tenor voice; and both the guitar and the voice belonged to Dick Hudson, who was seated out on the porch with Janie.

"I can picture a home,
Just west of the sun. . . ."

Barty glanced at his father. "I wouldn't be surprised if they get married one o' these days."

"I think you're right, son," said the mayor. "Yep, I'll lay any amount o' money you're right."

(By permission of First National Pictures, Ltd., starring Dick Foran and Jane Bryan.)

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"WILD WEST DAYS"—Kentucky Wade, John Maek Brown; Lucy Monroe, Lynn Gilbert; Dude, George Shelley; Trigger, Robert Kortman; Mike, Frank Yaconelli; Larry Monroe, Frank McGlynn; Keeler, Russell Simpson; Purvis, Francis McDonald; Doc Hardy, Walter Miller; Buckskin, Charles Stevens; Red Hatchet, Chief Thunderbird.

"LARCENY ON THE AIR"—Lawrence Baxter, Robert Livingston; Jean Sterling, Grace Bradley; W. MacDonald, Willard Robertson; Kennedy, Pierre Watkin; Jimmy, Smiley Burnette; Professor Sterling, Granville Bates; Andrews, William Newell; Pete Andorka, Byron Foulger; F. J. Thompson, Wilbur Mack; Burke, Matty Fain.

"STRANGE LAWS"—Dick Hudson, Dick Foran; Tom Valley, David Carlyle; Janie Walton, Jane Bryan; Army Officer, Joseph Crehan; Blade Simpson, Milton Kibbee; Walton, Tom Brower; Barty Walton, Tommy Bupp; Ruth Valley, Helen Valkis; Link Carter, Ed Cobb; Judge Ben Parkinson, Gordon Hart; Bill Tidewell, Jack Mower; Abbott, Walter Soderling.

"THE CRIME NOBODY SAW"—Nick Milburn, Lew Ayres; Kay Mallory, Ruth Coleman; Babe Lawton, Eugene Pilette; Horace Dryden, Benny Baker; Doctor Brookes, Colin Tapley; Robert Mallory, Howard C. Hickman; William Underhill, Jed Prouty; Ambrosia, Hattie McDaniel; John Atherton, Ferdinand Gottschalk.

HAVE YOU A RED NOSE?

Send a stamp, and you will learn how to rid yourself of such a terrible affliction free of charge. Address in confidence—T. J. TEMPLE, Specialist, "Palace House," 128, Shaftesbury Avenue, LONDON, W.1. (Est. 35 years.)

BLUSHING,

Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry Habit Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back! Complete Course, 5/- Details—L. A. Stebbins, (A), 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2

WHY BE BULLIED?

Learn to defend yourself in the easiest and best way. Articles, illus. lessons, and full particulars of Garrud's complete Jujitsu Course free on application or 1/- for sample part to:—A. P. "Yawara," 20, Durham Road, Feltham, Middlesex.

STAMMERING, Stuttering, New, remarkable, Certain Cure, Booklet free, privately. —SPECIALIST, Dept. (A), 28, Dean Road, London, N.W.2.

All applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "BOY'S CINEMA," The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

BOYS' CINEMA

No. 941. EVERY TUESDAY December 25th, 1937.

Grand Xmas
Number!

"SLIM"

PAT O'BRIEN
and HENRY FONDA

in a
High Tension Thriller

On his uncle's farm "Slim" Kincaid watches a gang of linesmen building steel towers to carry high-tension wires across country and aspires to become a linesman himself. "Red" Blayd, one of the men, helps him to do so, and the two become firm friends; but Slim meets Red's girl, and the two fall in love—with dramatic consequences. A powerful story of lives in jeopardy, starring Pat O'Brien and Henry Fonda

"A Job for Men!"

IN a ten-acre field, the property of a farmer, a steel tower was being erected to carry high-tension wires across country—one of many such towers that littered the landscape—and half a dozen linesmen were at work on different parts of the structure.

When finished, the tower was to be a hundred feet high from its four concrete bases, and the bases were forty feet apart in the form of a square; but as yet its height was no more than seventy feet.

From a big wooden pole fixed to one of the steel uprights a winch line ran through a pulley for the hoisting of heavy sections which had been bolted together on the ground, and from a smaller pole hand-lines dangled within a few feet of one of the bases for the use of "grunts," or ground workers. A motor-truck containing every variety of equipment was standing not very far away, and at times the power of its engines was used to work the winch-line.

Each linesman up aloft had a grunt down below to look after his needs; but Clarence Stumpy, known to his associates as "Stumpy," was squatting on an empty box at a safe distance from falling nuts or belts and singing in a raucous voice:

"Mother said to Mabel,
"Always tell the truth,"
But then the salesman came along,
Admirin' Mabel's youth—"

A misshapen hat was on his head, and he was wearing a very conspicuous plaid woolen jacket with his dungarees. His face was quaintly ugly, his green eyes were sleepy, and he was one of the most accomplished shirkers on the job.

Pop Traver, the bald-headed foreman of the gang, strode up behind him, and Stumpy sprawled upon the earth as the box was kicked from under him.

"Get up, Stumpy!" roared the foreman. "That steel ain't got no wings! It can't get up to Red by itself!" Stumpy scrambled to his feet.

"Yes, sir," he said, and joined the other grunts to help attach a latticed framework of steel to the winch-line. "Hi, come on here! Let's get goin'! Come on, you fellas, put that old steel ladder right up on top there!"

"Take it away!" Pop Traver shouted to the driver of the truck when the line had been attached, and up went the framework.

"Here it comes, Red!" Stumpy cupped his hands to his mouth to yell.

Two linesmen, straddling cross-pieces of the skeleton high above, caught hold of the thing as it reached them, snub-wrenches flashed through bolt-holes to hold it in position. With almost incredible speed each linesman plunged a gloved hand into a bag on his belt, brought forth a bolt and inserted it into a hole beneath the one occupied by the snub-wrench.

"Right!" shouted one of the two experts, a thick-set and cheerful fellow whose name was Blayd and who was known as "Red" because the hair beneath his hat was of that colour. "Slack off!"

While these operations were in progress, Slim Kincaid, nephew of the farmer who owned the field, completed the plunging of a long furrow close to the base of the tower, stopped the two horses attached to the plough, removed their reins from around his neck, and jumped down from his seat to stare upwards.

He was a black-haired young fellow in shirt and trousers, both of which garments were considerably the worse for wear, but his face was clean and clean-shaven, and he looked far more intelligent than the average farmer's boy.

Pop Traver eyed this intruder with disfavour. Stumpy, having finished his task of the moment, sat down on

With All Good Wishes For Christmas From
And The New Year Your Editor

the empty box again and addressed him chidingly.

"Hi, there, country boy," he said, "you back ag'in?"

"That's what's the matter," responded Slim without shifting his fascinated gaze from the linesmen up aloft.

"How d'you expect to get your chores done if you spend all your time around here watchin' me build this tower?"

"I ain't got nothin' more important to do than watchin' you build these things," declared Slim; and then Pop Traver stalked over.

"Look here, son," he said severely, "I'm gettin' tired o' tellin' you to keep away from these towers before you get hurt."

"Who's gonna hurt me?" Slim lowered his head to inquire.

"Well, one o' those linesmen might drop a wrench or somethin' on your head."

"Do they do that often?" "You think they don't?" cried Stumpy, and swept off his misshapen hat. "Feel those bumps on top of my head!"

Red, at that moment, shouted down from his perch:

"Hi, Stumpy, you can't fill these towers with matches! Throw up some more two-inch bolts right away!"

"Yes, Red; yes, sir," Stumpy rose, took some bolts from a keg on the ground, and with a curious overhand throw hurled them upwards, one at a time.

"Don't take any notice o' that boy," Pop said to Slim, who was watching Red catch the bolts. "He ain't got the brains heaven promised a goat."

A linesman named Tom Mauders dropped a steel nut, either by accident or deliberate intent.

"Headache!" he shouted. "Head-ache below!"

Stumpy side-stepped the falling missile and looked up to jeer.

"You missed me ag'in, Tom! Next time I'll hold still and make you a better target!"

"Well, stay out o' the way, then!" retorted the offender; and Pop addressed him wrathfully:

"Hi, Tom! You get dropsy once more and I'm gonna send you down the road!"

"What d'you mean by 'send him down the road'?" asked Slim, as the foreman turned away from the tower.

"Five him!" was the reply. "Better than sending one o' those grunts home in a box. You'd better be careful, before you get hurt."

"I bet I can climb one o' those towers," asserted Slim.

"So could a monkey, but what good would he be when he got up there?"

"I could be some good up there."

"Listen, kid," said Pop seriously, "climbing a tower's only the first part of bein' a linesman. It's what you do when you get up there that counts. There'll be millions o' people depending on this tower line for electricity. It's got to feed power to trains, trolley-cars and factories. It's gotta carry light to streets, homes and hospitals. It's gotta be built so it'll never fail. That's line work, and it takes a linesman to do it."

"That's just what I wanta do," declared Slim with enthusiasm. "Ever since I've been watching your gang I—well, it just seems like I'm obliged to be a linesman. Will you give me a chance?"

Pop shook his head.

"Sorry, son, you're too young. This is a job for men, not boys."

"What were those men when they were my age—girls?"

"You stick to your farm," counselled Pop. "These men have had experience."

"Experience is just what I want," persisted Slim. "I'll never get to be a linesman ploughin' fields."

"Sorry, son," Pop gave him a pat of dismissal and looked at an old-fashioned watch. "Come on down and eat, boys!"

He walked off as the linesmen began to descend the tower, but Slim remained to admire the agility with which they descended, and to marvel at Red and a man named Wyatt Ransstead, who slid down the lines in an endeavour to race one another.

Red won.

"All right, Stump," he said, "get the lunches, will you?"

Linesmen and grunts became seated on boxes and kegs and drums, and Stumpy brought them their lunch-boxes from the motor-truck. Slim advanced towards Red, and he said:

"I'm goin' to learn how to do that."

"Yeah?" Red's very blue eyes twinkled. "Think you can handle a rope better than you can handle a plough?"

"That's what's the matter," nodded Slim. "I'm gonna be a linesman. I'm goin' to wear a harness just like yours."

Red, who was acknowledged to be the best linesman in the whole outfit and one of the best in the whole country, did not even glance down at the safety-belt he was wearing; he looked instead at the patient horses attached to the plough.

"You'd better let those horses carry the lines," he said.

"Yeah," jibed a burly grunt named Griffin, "I s'pose you're gonna drive your old nags up the tower next?"

"I'd rather try that than stay on the ground like you do!" Slim retorted.

Griffin jumped up and advanced fiercely.

"Listen, clothopper, you couldn't climb anything!" he roared.

"I can climb you high enough to reach your mouth and shut it!"

A fight seemed imminent, but Red was instantly on his feet and between the pair.

"Take it easy, Griff," he said masterfully. "Sit down and eat while you still have your teeth."

"What do you know about it?" Corton demanded in a voice like a wisp. "There's something wrong here, and I mean to get to the bottom of it!"

Griffin retired scowlingly to the box he had deserted, and Red eyed Slim with approval.

"Say, kid, you're all right," he remarked. "So you really think you want a job here, eh?"

"More than I ever wanted anything," was the emphatic reply.

"All right, maybe we can do something about it. Come on over here."

He caught hold of Slim's arm and led him across to the foreman, who was sitting on a running-board of the truck with a very thick sandwich in his hand, half eaten.

"How about it, Pop," he inquired without any preliminaries, "you got a job for this kid?"

"He'll get yours if you don't quit that stuntin'!" snapped the foreman, and he glared at Slim. "Will you stop botherin' me? I told you before, this gang is full!"

"Oh, Mr. Pop," pleaded Slim, "I never wanted to do nothin' as bad as I want to be a linesman."

"Wait a minute, son, not so fast," rebuked Red, whimsically. "To be a linesman you've gotta start on the ground—be a grunt, and earn your way to the top."

"I'll do that!" Slim cried eagerly. "I'll do anything! I'll work for nothin' till you say I can do it!"

"Not on my job you won't!" declared Pop indignantly. "If a man's fit to hire he's fit to pay. Now, if I need a man I'll give you a break, but just now the crew's full and I can't use you."

"I'll remember that," said Slim fervently. "Thanks, Mr. Red. I'll be back."

He went off to the neglected plough quite joyfully, and Red said with a grin:

"Gee, I like that kid!"

Slim Gets His Chance

IT was late on the following afternoon that Tom Manders, working up on one "leg" of the tower, let go of a steel cross-stay while in the act of thrusting a snub-wrench through one of its bolt-holes and a corresponding bolt-hole in the structure.

The cross-stay fell, to the imminent danger of all who were below it, and Tom Manders nearly lost his balance.

"Headache!" yelled a linesman; and the long strip of steel, capable of killing anyone in its path as it gathered velocity, fell harmlessly to earth and bounced there.

Pop Traver craned his neck to shout:

"Are you hurt, Tom?"

"No," returned the linesman shakily. "I'm all right."

"How'd it happen?"

"I didn't catch it with the pin."

"Oh, you didn't catch it with the pin? Come on down before you fall down!"

Tom Manders descended slowly, possibly because he knew his fate.

"You get your money to-night," Pop informed him sternly. "You're through!" He shouted up to the linesman who had been working with the bungler: "Ed, you sign up for top man in the morning and take Manders' place!"

Slim, most opportunely, had completed a furrow quite close to the tower, and he scrambled down from the plough.

"Hi, Stumpy and the rest of you grunts," directed Pop. "pick up this stuff and put it on the truck so we can go home. Come on down, boys, it's quittin' time!"

Slim arrived, breathless and excited.

December 25th, 1937.

"Hi, Mr. Pop," he cried, "you need a man now, and I'm the man you need! You've just gotta give me a job!"

"Will you stop botherin' me and leave me alone?" Pop howled at him. "I'm busy."

"You promised me!"

Red looked down from the leg he was about to descend.

"Looks like he's got you, Pop!" he shouted laughingly. "You told him you'd give him the first job that was open!"

"I ain't sure he could cut it," the foreman objected.

"Put him on as a grunt with me—I'll teach him to cut it."

Pop rubbed his chin, frowning at Slim.

"All right, Red," he surrendered; "if you want the trouble of breakin' in a new grunt, he's yours. Report to camp at six o'clock in the morning, kid, and I'll sign you on as Red's helper. You'll be his grunt. That means you'll tend to all the hand-lines and do all the work to be done on the ground."

Slim beamed all over his face.

"I'll be there, sir," he said elatedly, and with his hands to his mouth, yelled up to his champion: "Thank you again, Mr. Red."

That evening there was dissension in the farmhouse, Slim's uncle objecting strongly to his departure, his aunt favouring his opportunity to do better for himself.

Aunt and nephew triumphed, and next morning Slim was up before daybreak and tramping through woods and fields to the distant camp, because the winding lanes of the district would have doubled the length of the journey.

In the grey light of dawn he looked down from a hill upon a veritable town of sheds and huts and tents, bounded on one side by a deeply rutted roadway and on another by a stream. Somewhere in the camp a man in a more or less white jacket was banging on a triangle to announce that breakfast was ready and about to be served in a long mess-hut.

Slim sped down the hill, entered a gateway, passed a whole string of motor-trucks, and came upon Pop Traver and Red Blayd.

"Well, look who's here!" exclaimed Pop. "Slim, you're right on time."

"Had breakfast yet?" inquired Red. "No, sir."

"Sign him up, Red," said Pop, "and then take him to eat, eh?"

Red took charge of Slim and led him to the open window of a hut in which the timekeeper functioned.

"How are you, skipper?" he said to the gloomy-faced man inside the window. "Givo us a startin' ticket."

"Okay." A pink card was thrust out upon a wooden flap in front of the window, together with a pencil. "Fill in your name, address, age, experience, and who to notify if you break the law."

Slim picked up the pencil.

"Break what law?" he asked.

"The law of gravity," replied the timekeeper. "Who do we notify if you fall off a tower?"

"Notify the guy that's underneath me to get out of the way," said Slim; and the answer pleased Red immensely.

The card was filled in and exchanged for a brass disc, and Slim soon afterwards became seated at a long table in the mess-hut with the members of Pop's gang and ate ravenously. He started to count the men present, but gave it up as hopeless because there were so many of them.

Subsequently, under Red's guidance, he reached a huge shed which served as a warehouse and contained every unimaginable thing necessary to the construction of power lines. Motor-trucks were being loaded outside it, grunts of various gangs were entering empty-handed and emerging fully laden with coiled ropes, picks and shovels, kegs of bolts, hook ladders, and all manner of hardware.

"Well, there's plenty to do," said Red.

"It's okay with me," said Slim.

Stumpy appeared with a box which was evidently as much as he could carry, and Red hailed him.

"Show Slim what to do," he said.

"Sure." Stumpy was only too delighted. "Slim, everything in this box has gotta go on that truck there. I'll let you help me. Share and share alike—that's my motto."

The box was thrust upon the novice.

"It's hard, but it's fair!" chuckled his tutor. "You had a good home, but you wouldn't stay there."

Red went off grinning, and Stumpy took full advantage of his pupil, who was called upon to carry from the warehouse to the truck everything that Stumpy ordinarily would have carried. Other grunts were amused and showed their amusement; but Slim was not a fool.

Griffin, with a cigarette between his lips, walked up to the novice when his arms were laden with a huge coil of rope.

"Got a match, Slim?" he asked facetiously.

Slim immediately dumped his load upon Stumpy, who was walking beside him with empty hands.

"Hold this for me," he said.

"Oh!" grunted the shirker.

The coil of rope was conveyed to the truck while a match was produced and struck, and there was laughter at Stumpy's expense. But Pop arrived on the scene in time to see Slim once more encumbered with implements while Stumpy accompanied him carrying nothing.

"You think that old Slim boy can't carry loads?" gurgled Stumpy for the benefit of his colleagues. "He can carry loads so big they oughta nail his shoes on and start feedin' him oats!"

Pop administered a swift kick.

"If you don't get to loadin' this truck," he threatened, "I ain't gonna feed you with nothin' but hemp!"

"Pop," complained Stumpy, "if you don't stop kickin' me there, even if I had a chance to sit down and rest, I couldn't!"

He carried his own share after that, but the grunts were not working quickly enough to satisfy Pop.

"Well, they ain't gonna bring that tower to us," he said. "Let's get away before them other trucks beat us to it. C'm on!"

Speed was increased, but Griffin growled:

"Looks to me like we're the first truck out every morning. Pop is sure makin' himself a good record out of our hard work."

"Slim," said Stumpy, "don't pay no attention to that old Griff. He's lazier than I am. If you think I ain't gonna make about the gruntingest grunt outa you, why you're plumb mistook."

After the truck had been loaded the linesmen and the grunts of Pop's gang climbed up upon it, finding more or less comfortable seats upon the materials that were to be used, and the truck set off along the roadway. Slim said to Stumpy, who was beside him on a box: "Red's a fine boss, ain't he?"

"Red ain't the boss," corrected Stumpy. "They asked him to be one when he fust come here, but he said his hands fitted a spud-wrench better than a pencil. They do fit a spud-wrench mighty good, too. Red's about the best linesman that ever buckled on a belt."

"How come they asked him to be a boss and he wouldn't?" asked Slim in astonishment, gazing at the broad back of his hero who was sitting up in front.

"How come anything about Red?" said Stumpy. "He does what he wants to do, not what other people wants. Nobody knows where he comes from, or where he's goin' to. But there ain't an outfit in the whole country wouldn't like to have Red work for 'em."

The unfinished tower upon the land that belonged to Slim's uncle was reached soon after the morning sun had risen over the hills, away to the east, and Slim began to do the things he so often had watched the grunts do before he himself had become one of them.

Before the day was out he had become quite good at hauling struts and stays and fish-plates up to Red upon a hand-line, and his skill at throwing up bolts and pins compelled even Pop's admiration.

Throughout the rest of that week he worked harder than any other grunt, labouring with zest; and when the toil of each day was over he practised the tying of knots, the splicing and coiling of ropes, and all the other things a grunt should know.

His hands were hard from farm-work, but they became blistered by the steel he lifted and carried, in spite of the heavy gloves he wore when at work. But his heart was in the work, and he did not make any fuss. He lived in a hut with Stumpy and two other men, and he thoroughly enjoyed camp life.

When pay-day came he lined up with the rest of the men to reach the window at which envelopes were being handed out by the paymaster, and after he had acquired his own envelope he was standing aside to contemplate with pleasurable surprise the amount he had earned when two flashily dressed men strolled up to him.

"Say, you make pretty good money here, don't you?" inquired one of them.

"That's what's the matter," laughed Slim. "When I'm a linesman I'm goin' to make a lot more."

"You don't have to wait that long," said the second man. "A smart fellow like you can make his money grow."

"What d'you generally do with your money?" asked the one who had spoken first—a gambler named Allerd.

"I'm fixin' to send most of it home," Slim replied.

"How'd you like to make twice as much money to send the folks?"

"How can I do that?"

"Well, I'll tell you. Did you ever hear of—"

"Hi!" Red came striding up to the group, and his voice was harsh. "It's a little early for your business, Allerd, isn't it? Why don't you lay off this kid?"

"Well, what's the harm of a little game?" challenged Allerd. "You play with us plenty yourself."

"Sure I do," retorted Red, "but I'm old enough to vote. Now, listen, I'm tipping you off to something, and this"—turning to the other man—"goes for you, too! If I catch you messin' around with this kid again I'll bust that kisser o' yours wide open! Now get out of here, both of you!"

The two opportunists made themselves scarce, but Slim was not at all sure that he appreciated Red's interference.

"What'd you do that for?" he asked.

"For your folks," replied Red.

Wilcox gripped Slim by the shirt with his gloved left hand, and in his right hand flashed a knife.

Trouble in a Pool Room

THAT evening, as was usual on pay-days, most of the men washed and shaved and changed into their best clothes to go into the nearest town and spend some of their money. Stumpy was going to meet a red-headed girl of his acquaintance, and Slim accompanied him.

Most of the linesmen had ears of their own, but the grunts were conveyed in a couple of motor-trucks, and after the evening meal there was a general exodus from the camp.

The town of Elliston was neither large, nor important. Electricity had not yet reached it, and the streets were lit by gas-lamps; but at least it contained plenty of shops, saloons, pool parlours, and places of amusement.

Slim, in his shabby best, witnessed the meeting between Stumpy and the red-headed girl outside a drug-store and then invaded a post office to send off some of his earnings to his aunt, in company with a quaint if badly written note:

"Dear Aunt,—Cold don't worry me, I feel swell. I am enclosing some money, and, auntie, I want you to use this money for anything you and uncle want.

"Your loving nephew,

"SLIM."

Having posted this letter, he was standing on the pavement, wondering what he should do next, when Wyatt Ranstead came along. Ranstead was the linesman who had tried to race Red down from the top of the tower and a thoroughly likeable fellow.

"Hallo, Slim!" he said. "Say, are you any good in a fight?"

"I can take care of myself," Slim cautiously replied. "Why?"

"Pop and Red are in a little game down at the pool room, and it looks like there might be trouble. There are five of 'em, and they're pretty tough."

The fact that Red and Pop were in some sort of danger was quite enough for Slim.

"Where's the pool room?" he asked.

"Around the corner," Ranstead pointed, "but don't start anything until I get back."

Slim went off round the corner and found the pool room. There was a counter between its entrance and the first of the billiards-tables, and there was a heavily-built man behind the counter.

Slim acquired a cigar and paid for it.

"Where's the card game, mister?" he then inquired.

The man jerked a thumb in the direction of a door nearly opposite the counter, and Slim walked into a room in which Pop and Red were playing poker with three other men at a table, watched by two men who were standing. Amongst the players Slim perceived Allerd and the other gambler who had conversed with him outside the pay-office. Allerd was just gathering up some money he had won.

"What're you doin' here, Slim?" demanded Pop sharply.

"Lookin' for a poker game," Slim answered.

"I seen Ranstead down the street, and he told me there'd be one here."

"So this is the boy that isn't old enough to vote, eh?" drawled Allerd with a grin for Red.

"All right, so what?" retorted Red.

"Get out of here, Slim—the game's too steep for you!"

"Yeah, Ranstead told me all about it," said Slim, "but him and me figured I could hold up my end."

"How much money you got?" asked Allerd's companion.

"That's what you'll find out if you're good enough."

Pop laughed.

"You'll do, son," he said. "Pull up a chair and sit down."

Slim did so, and Allerd asked him if he wished to be included in the fresh deal.

"No, I'll watch a couple o' hands," Slim decided.

The cards were dealt, and Red was content with his hand—and Pop appeared to be content with his.

"Cards?" inquired Allerd, who had dealt.

"Three," said the gambler addressed. Three cards were flipped to him in place of three discarded.

"And two to the dealer," said Allerd. Slim, who had been watching intently, saw two cards exchanged and a third one palmed.

"I thought you was old enough to vote, Red," he said across the table.

"What're you talkin' about?" Red looked up from his cards to ask.

"You ain't old enough to count. He said he was gonna take two cards. He took three. So that's what's the matter!"

Allerd sprang up and smashed a fist into Slim's mouth, and instantly a first fight was in progress.

There were five men against three, but the three held their own magnificently. Pop was sixty-two, but he was hard as nails and used to handling men, and he knocked senseless a rat-faced fellow who tried to draw a gun.

Red's strength was immense. He felled two antagonists, and had Allerd by the throat when Slim saw the fifth crook about to pounce, struck out at him, and received a whack on the point of the chin that knocked him down against a wall in a very dazed condition.

Wyatt Ranstead burst into the room just then, dodged a chair that was flung at him, and locked the door before he joined in the battle. Contestants who had fallen rose again to attack, and the room resounded with blows and the noise of overturning furniture.

Slim recovered his wits to some extent and saw the cigar he had bought. Someone had trodden on it, but he reached out a hand to it, thrust it between his lips—and received a broken chair upon his head.

The battle ended as abruptly as it had begun, and the victors gazed at one another over prone bodies.

"Well, Pop," panted Red, "that's what I call cleanin' house."

"I haven't enjoyed a fight like this in thirty years!" declared Pop, snatching up his coat.

Red opened a window and flung up its bottom sash.

"Come on, let's get goin' before the law comes in," he urged. "Where's Slim?"

They found Slim sitting owlishly against the wall, the broken cigar in his mouth and a ruffian lying across his legs. His face was bruised and bleeding, but he smiled wanly as they raised him to his feet and held him.

"How are you, kid—all right?" asked Red.

"I reckon so," he muttered.

"Let's get outa here, then," said Pop.

"Wait a minute!" Red let go of Slim's arm to jerk Allerd up from under the table. "Listen, you," he said fiercely, "we figured you were runnin' a crooked game when you cleaned us out two weeks ago. Now don't be here when we come back next pay-day!"

The crook went down again from a blow between the eyes, and then Slim was helped out over the window-sill into a yard and the others followed. From the yard they reached another street with the sound of police whistles in their ears.

December 25th, 1937.

"Back to camp in a hurry!" gritted Pop.

Slim, who was feeling a lot better, fished from his coat-pocket a roll of notes he had snatched from the table at an early stage of the fight.

"For your folks," he said, thrusting the notes into Red's hand.

Fired!

SPRING merged into summer and summer waned. Many towers had been built, and insulators were being attached to one of them, when Red shouted down for a hook-ladder one morning. Stumpy obtained the ladder from the truck, and Slim fastened it to a hand-line.

"Comin' right up, Red!" he shouted. The ladder was hauled upwards and hung over a steel arm, the rope was slacked off and released, and Wyatt Ranstead began to descend the rungs of the swaying thing that dangled in empty space.

"I'll get this, Ran," said Red hastily. "You had a tough night."

"I'm all right, Red," Ranstead assured him. "You don't have to do all the work up here."

Slim held his breath as he watched the perilous descent. Ranstead had a string of insulators over his left shoulder, and it was almost sickening to see the way the ladder rocked and swung.

"Watch yourself, Ran!" cried Red from the arm to which he had fastened himself with his safety belt.

"Don't worry about me," Ranstead looked up to say. "I've had hangers before."

The words were hardly out of his mouth when one of his feet slipped, the weight of his body was transferred suddenly to his hands, and his hands let go.

"Headache!" yelled Red. "Headache below!"

Like a stone Ranstead fell to the ground, and he was dead before the horrified grunts reached the spot where he lay beside a litter of broken insulators.

Stumpy took off his hat and stood with bowed head; but Pop was more practical, though no less upset.

"You two get the stretcher," he said hoarsely.

There was always stretchers on the truck. Slim and Stumpy fetched one, the body of the dead linesman was placed upon it and carried back to the truck, and Pop and all the men in his gang rode with the body to the camp.

On the following morning Slim was conveying materials from the warehouse to the truck when Pop walked up to him with Red.

"That'll be all, Slim," said the foreman.

Slim deposited a keg of bolts and turned to stare.

"But we ain't finished loadin' yet, Pop," he expostulated.

"You are, son," returned Pop quietly. "You've finished for life."

Slim was aghast.

"What've I done?" he asked blankly.

"You've made good, kid," said Red, producing a safety-belt from behind his back. "Here's your harness. Strap it on!"

"You—you mean I'm a linesman?" Slim's head was in a whirl.

"I don't mean anything else," said Red, "and I wanta tell you something. If I catch you takin' any foolish chances—

Well, don't take any!"

"Thanks, Red."

"Congratulations, son," said Pop. "Good luck to you!"

Stumpy and the rest of the grunts and linesmen gathered round to add their congratulations. Stumpy, patting Slim on the back and chuckling, cried out:

"You think this old Slim boy ain't goin' up in the world? You think he ain't gonna be about the highest climbin' linesman there is? I always said a linesman was nothin' but a grunt that'd lost his good sense—and now you've gone and done it, Slim! That's what you get for lettin' me learn you so much!"

Slim bore the laughter of the others for a few moments, then exercised his new authority.

"Go on, grunt," he said to Stumpy, "get that truck loaded!"

"Yes, sir, Mr. Linesman," bowed the humourist.

"Well, let's get at it!" rapped Pop. Slim rode with the linesmen on the truck, but at the base of the new tower he had qualms as he looked upwards.

"That's it, Slim," said Red. "That's where the trouble is. Get to climbin'!"

"Good luck, Slim," said Stumpy mournfully. "And don't drop nothin' now. I got quite enough bumps on my head!"

Slim found it easy enough to climb the tower with the aid of the bolts that protruded from the leg to which Red pointed; but Red was up another leg long before he reached the top and watched him from a cross-section member.

Slim was used to the appearance of the towers from the ground at all angles, but its appearance was utterly different from above, and seemed to change as he climbed. He felt badly encumbered by the bag of bolts fastened to his safety-belt, and he began to feel giddy and slightly sick. But he reached the top of the leg and clung to it.

"Nice going, Slim," Red called across to him. "You come up there just like a squirrel."

"Yeah," panted Slim, out of breath from fear as much as exertion. "I feel like a squirrel. Ground squirrel."

"All right. Hold on tight till you get used to it, and then take a look at the ground."

Slim looked down inside the tower, and the remoteness of the ground appalled him.

"Yeah," he gasped.

An X-brace was to be holted in position, and the grunts below were ready to raise it.

"Let's have it!" Red shouted down.

The X-brace rose, and Red explained to Slim how it was to be held at his end with his snub-wrench and bolted. But Slim was hanging on to the steelwork with both hands when the X-brace dangled on a level with him and Red made fast his end of it.

"You can't work with your hands full of steel like that!" he rebuked.

"You want me to let go of it?" gulped Slim.

"These towers'll stay up by themselves."

"I ain't worried about the tower stayin' up."

"Well, turn loose of it before you bend it outa shape!"

With his feet on a step-bolt, Slim gingerly freed one hand, fished out his snub-wrench, and tried to thrust its end through holes that corresponded. The X-brace evaded him, but at last he had it in position.

"All right, Slim," said Red approvingly, "holt her up!"

Slim endeavoured to obey, but the wrench slipped from his hand and went whizzing downwards.

"Headache!" yelled Red, and the grunts scuttled out of the way till the wrench had buried its point in the ground.

"Hi!" roared Red as he saw Slim wavering on his perch. "Droppin' one o' those is just an accident—goin' after it is suicide! That's not a parachute you're on, you know! Hi, Stumpy, put my wrench on that hand-line!"

"Your wrench?" exclaimed Slim.
 "Never mind. Let's get this bolted up."

The snub-wrench ascended and Red freed it from the rope.

"Here!"
 He hardly expected to be obeyed, but Slim walked steel to reach him and collect the wrench, and his face did not betray too much of the fear that was in his heart.

"Go ahead and finish it," directed Red, and back across the framework Slim went to deal with the brace.

As the morning progressed the novice became more accustomed to the height and more and more daring. He found that he felt vastly more at ease with his muscles relaxed than with them taut, and under Red's expert guidance he developed a sense almost more important to the job than sight.

Next morning, at breakfast in the mess-hut, Pop asked him if he liked it up on top.

"That's what's the matter," said Slim. "Am I doin' all right, Pop?"

"You're doin' fine," declared the foreman. "You're gonna be a real linesman."

Slim was delighted, but there was one thing on his conscience.

"Pop," he said after a while, "it wasn't Red dropped that wrench—it was me."

Pop liked him all the better for that confession, but he did not show it.

"Well, everybody makes mistakes," he drawled. "But remember, when you do drop a wrench, be sure it ain't still in your hand!"

He went out to superintend the loading of the truck, and Slim turned to Red.

"I'm sure obliged to you for all you learned me," he said.

"Well, I want to show you all I can," Red responded, "but I don't think I'll be with you very long."

"Where're you goin'?" asked Slim in dismay.

"Aw, I don't know!" Red gave an expressive shrug. "Somebody's squealed about Ranstead gettin' drunk, and it looks like there'll have to be an investigation. Some big shot's comin' down from the main office. Somebody's bound to get fired, and I don't want it to be Pop."

"What can you do?"
 "Wait and see. I guess you know what a transposition tower is now. If I'm not around, just watch yourself."

As they went out together from the hut the timekeeper came running towards them.

"Red!" he shouted. "Red, one of the company vice-presidents is down at the office and wants to see you right away."

"Down at the office?" Red uttered a scornful laugh. "Tell him if he wants to see me to come where I am."

"I thought you'd say that," remarked the timekeeper, and he went off quite gleefully in the direction of the camp office.

Red walked away to the bunkhouse he shared with other linesmen, and Slim walked with him.

"Well, kid," said Red, perching on the end of a long table in the deserted room, "that washes me up. You'd better not be here when the vice-president comes in."

"Why not?" challenged Slim.

"Because I don't feel like arguin' with any big shot, and I'm a cinch to run into trouble."

"I ain't been backin' away from trouble, have I?"

"You'll lose your job if you stay!"
 Slim dumped his safety-belt on the table.

"I didn't have a job when I came here," he said, "and I ain't gonna have one when I go. This is their job. I've just been usin' it."

In at the door strode a very indignant man in a belted overcoat and a soft-felt hat. His name was Corton, and he was vice-president of the Empire Power Corporation. A cigar was in his hand, but he had not smoked it since he had received Red's message.

"Which one of you is Blayd?" he rasped.

"Mr. Blayd to you," said Red, whose back was towards the visitor, and he picked up a book from the table and opened it.

"Oh!" Corton did his best to keep his temper under control. "I'd like to talk to Mr. Blayd alone, if you please!" he said to Slim.

"Well, he doesn't please!" snapped Red. "Come on, what's on your mind?"

"I've come down here to investigate the death of Ranstead. What do you know about it?"

"I know all about it," said Slim. "I seen it."

"Well, what caused it?"

"He was heavier than air, and he just naturally broke the law—of gravity."

Red laughed, but Corton did not appreciate such levity.

"Blayd—er—Mr. Blayd, what do you know about it?" he demanded in a voice like a whip. "There's something wrong here, and I mean to get to the bottom of it! It's pretty queer when the foreman of a job won't tell why an accident happened and the men won't talk."

"We're talking," drawled Red, "but we're not sayin' anything."

"What would you say if I were to ask you whether that man had been drinking?"

"What would you say if I didn't tell you?"

"Now, look here," roared Corton. "I've given you fellows a chance to talk. If you don't come clean, I'm going to fire you both!"

Down went the book, and Red slid from the table.

"Is that all?" he inquired.

"Yes, that's all."
 "That's all I wanted to know!"

Two of the men knelt over Wilcox, and Steve and another man looked down at Slim.

Corton was grabbed by the collar and the belt of his coat and ejected from the hut.

"You're both fired!" he bellowed from outside it.

Red slammed the door and grinned at Slim.

"Well, fellow," he said cheerfully, "you might as well start packin' your things. We're gonna be lookin' for a new job."

"We?" questioned Slim eagerly.

"Sure. I'm in the market for a new side-kick. Don't you wanta go with me?"

"That's what's the matter," said Slim.

A Journey South

CORTON made no further attempt to investigate the rumour that Ranstead had met his death through drunkenness, but returned to New York forthwith. Red and Slim collected the pay to which they were entitled and spent the day in idleness except for packing.

Next morning, after breakfast, they stowed their belongings in the back of Red's open car while the others gathered round to see them off.

"You think Red and Slim ain't gonna travel faster than two wild geese with their tail-feathers on fire?" Stumpy inquired of no one in particular. "And I suppose you think Slim ain't so proud o' that belt he sleeps with it?"

"Well, Stumpy," said Slim, "I suppose when I see you next time you'll be a linesman."

"Me a linesman?" Stumpy's face registered horror. "Say, you couldn't get me up on one o' them there towers if there was an eagle up there layin' gold eggs! No, sir!"

Red got into the car at the wheel, and Slim settled down beside him. The sun was rising, and the day was fine.

"So-long, Slim!" waved Stumpy. "Any time you bump into anything you don't know about, why, just come back and I'll learn you."

Pop leaned over the side of the car to say:

"You're a good man, Slim, and I hate to lose you. I'll be havin' other jobs some day, and I'm countin' on you and Red to come back to me when I send for you."

"I'm mighty grateful to you, Pop," Slim declared with considerable feeling. "We'll come back the day you send for us."

"Gangway, boys!" shouted Red. "We're off!"

The crowd in front of the bonnet moved aside, and the car went slowly out from the camp.

"Pop," said Stumpy, "you think there don't go the two best friends you ever had?"

"I don't think," returned Pop gruffly, "I know! Come on, get to work, everybody! Get back on the job!"

Red drove away from the camp with a contented expression on his face and a cigarette between his lips. A federal highway was reached, but he did not increase speed upon its excellent surface. He seemed to be at peace with the world.

"Reckon we can get another job right away?" asked Slim with some anxiety after several miles had been covered without a word spoken.

"Sure we can," replied Red. "How much money you got?"

"Two hundred bucks."

"All right. That's two hundred reasons why you shouldn't worry about it, and I've got a lot more. Money complicates reasoning."

"What d'you figure on doin' with it?" asked Slim 'n surprise.

"Spend it. That makes everything simple. Then we gotta go back to work again."

Slim dealt mentally with this strange philosophy.

"That's not what most folks do, is it?" he ventured.

"No, you're right." Red removed his left hand from the wheel to wave it contemptuously. "Most folks just settle down in one place for the rest o' their lives—to buy fancy funerals with! This world's a great place, Slim, and we're only here a little while. Don't you wanta see something of it?"

"That's what's the matter," said Slim, but added hastily: "I wanna do a lot more line work, too. I like it."

"Well, so do I," said Red. "We will do a lot more. Ah, that's the great thing about bein' a linesman—you get a chance to see something of the world and have a lot o' fun between jobs."

There were mountains in the distance, woods to the right and left, and the trees were beginning to take upon themselves the tints of autumn. Slim viewed the landscape without any great enthusiasm—it seemed to be empty of high-tension towers.

"Do all linesmen wander around like this?" he asked.

"Well," responded the philosopher, "if you follow construction work you've gotta go where the jobs are. Of course, if you want to settle down and get married you'd better get yourself a maintenance job with some company."

"I'm figurin' on raisin' a lot more towers 'fore I worry about raisin' a family," said Slim.

"And that's mighty good figurin'," said Red.

They were heading for Chicago, a fact which Red communicated to his companion in his own time—without communicating the fact that he had no intention of taking any job till after Chicago had been visited.

On the journey south, which occupied two days, they came upon several construction camps, and at some of them Red stopped awhile to converse with old acquaintances, and at one of them they spent the intervening night. The general foreman offered them jobs, but Red declined the jobs without even consulting Slim.

And so they came to Chicago, late in the afternoon of the second day, and the height of the buildings in the central part of that city astounded the country boy as he gazed up at them from the car.

"Red," he exclaimed, "these buildings are twice as high as them B extension towers we built at the river crossing!"

"Higher than that, Slim," said Red, "and you make 'em possible."

"I do?"

"Well, linesmen do. You can't have high buildings without elevators and electricity to run 'em!"

In State Street Slim pointed to the Dennison Hotel, a massive structure six hundred and thirty-five feet high.

"That's the biggest hotel I've ever seen!"

"Yeah," nodded Red. "You'll be seein' the inside of it pretty soon. That's where we're stoppin'."

"Us stoppin' there?" asked Slim in an awed voice.

"Sure. You know we build the towers that bring the juice to these places. I'm gonna show you what goes on inside 'em."

To Slim's disappointment, the hotel was left behind.

"Red, we passed it!" said he.

"Yeah," said Red. "We'll be back. I'm gonna show you the fanciest sight in Chicago."

"Fancier than that hotel?"

"Wait and see."

The car came to a standstill outside a white building in Madison Street.

"What're you stoppin' in front of a hospital for?" asked Slim.

"Same place," mused Red, contemplating the building. "Hasn't changed a bit."

"You been here before?"

"Yeah. First time I was here they carried me into the accident ward—feet first. Come on! See how it feels to walk in!"

They got out from the car and they entered the hall of the hospital. At the far end of the hall a nurse was about to pass through a doorway when Red caught sight of her and shouted:

"Cally!"

The nurse turned about, a vision of beauty in starched linen, and Slim gaped at her as she sped towards them and became embraced by Red.

"So you did come back?" she said in a voice that seemed to Slim to be full of music. "Oh, gosh, I'm glad to see you, Red!"

"It's great to see you," said Red, and held her at arm's length to feast his eyes upon her. "Well, I warned you I'd be back some day for another visit."

"How long this time, Red?"

"Same old story," he shrugged. "As long as the money lasts."

"Same old story—same old Red!"

"Well, you didn't expect me to change, did you? Oh—er—this is my pal Slim. Meet Mr. Kincaid."

A pair of singularly expressive hazel eyes enveloped Slim.

"How d'you do, Mr. Kincaid?" inquired their owner.

"I'm glad to meet you, Mrs.—" Slim mumbled.

"It's miss," she informed him smilingly. "But if you're Red's friend it's Cally—Cally Richards."

"That's what's the matter, then, Miss Cally," said Slim.

Red remarked that the reunion called for a celebration.

"Anything you say," laughed Cally. "I'm off duty at six o'clock."

"Listen," protested Slim, "you two wanta just be together. I ain't fixin' to get in your way."

"Ah, no, you're goin' with us, Slim," declared Red. "You know a lot about line work, but there's one thing I haven't shown you."

"What's that?" asked Slim.

"How to step up the high voltage in the bright lights. See you at your apartment, Cally. Come on, Slim!"

The End of a Spree

THE splendour of the Dennison Hotel almost took Slim's breath away; but Red booked a suite consisting of two bed-rooms and a sitting-room with characteristic nonchalance, and in that suite—which was on the thirtieth floor—they removed the stains of travel and changed into their best clothes.

At seven o'clock they collected Cally Richards from the flat in which she lived, and by half-past eight the three were sitting round a table in a brilliantly lit restaurant with the music of an excellent dance band in their ears and empty coffee-cups in front of them.

A waiter had presented the bill, and Red had paid it with the air of one possessing wealth. He looked across at Slim.

"So you kinda like it, eh, fellow?" he said.

"Swell!" breathed Slim. "But that's a sight o' money to pay for a dinner—even a dinner like this!"

"You can't get groceries like we've had at a construction camp," laughed Red.

"Well, look, let me pay my share."

"Save it and buy a spud-wrench!" Red got to his feet. "Cally, look after Slim, will you? I'll be back with enough dough to buy this joint!"

In Chicago gambling is done quite openly, and a roulette table was quite as much a feature of the restaurant as the dance floor beyond which it was situated. Red made his way to the roulette table, greeted the croupier as an old acquaintance, and found a vacant chair. Slim, remembering the pool parlour at Elliston, fidgeted in his seat.

"Reckon I oughta go over there?" he asked. "He might need me."

"No," said Cally, quite definitely, "he can take care of himself. Stay here and talk to me."

He settled down again, though not without misgiving. She looked wonderful to him in a semi-evening frock that set off her slim beauty, and he was quite sure that if he had been Red he would not have deserted her. He broke a long silence by asking how long she had known Red.

"A long time," she replied. "We're old friends. But tell me about yourself, Slim. How did you happen to become a linesman?"

Slim told her quite a lot about himself while Red lost money at the roulette table and time passed.

"Shall we dance?" she suggested.

"Well, that's somethin' I ain't never learned yet," Slim confessed.

"Then it's time you did, and that's one thing I can teach you," said she. "Come along!"

The band was playing a fox-trot, and upon the polished floor he held her with a feeling of exhilaration and did his best to master the steps.

"You reckon I could learn to do this if I kept at it?" he asked anxiously, as she guided him skilfully amongst other dancing couples.

"Of course," she encouraged. "You're doing beautifully."

The fox-trot was encored, and half-way through its repetition she told him in all sincerity that he was getting much better.

"You're a good teacher," said Slim fervently.

Red was back at the table when they returned to it. He had lost quite a lot of money, but he said complacently:

"Well, for once I quit ahead of the game."

"You mean you won?" asked Slim.

"No," was the reply, "but I've still got some left. Enough for a few more nights. Come on, let's have a drink!"

Slim slept, that night, in a bed that was almost too comfortable, and he rose late to another day of excitement. In the evening Cally went out with them again, and she and Slim became more friendly than ever while Red gambled—and won.

The round of pleasure continued, and one morning Stumpy received a postcard from Slim with a picture of the Dennison Hotel on the back of it and this message on the front:

"Dear Stumpy.—On the other side is a picture of the hotel we're boarding at. 'X' marks the window of our room. Having a fine time. Wish you was here, only you couldn't live high like this on account of because you won't get off the ground.

"Yours truly,

"SLIM."

"P.S.—Red bought me a new suit today."

Stumpy showed the card to everybody in Pop's gang, and to anybody else who cared to see it.

That night, while Red gambled in the restaurant where he had gambled before, Slim danced with Cally till the band started a tango which was utterly beyond him. He was leaning against a gilded railing beside his partner when she said suddenly in a serious voice:

"Slim, why don't you give it up?"

"Give up dancin'?" he asked.

"No, of course not!" she replied.

"Line work. You know how dangerous it is!"

"Sure it's dangerous," he agreed.

"And it isn't only the danger," she went on, "it's the tumbleweed life. All there is to this construction business is working yourself out of one job and trying to find another."

"But I like it," said Slim. "It's fun to travel around workin' like we do."

"Sure it's fun." She gnawed her lip. "So is a parachute jump—if the parachute opens! Did you ever stop to think, Slim, that it's selfish fun? That it might be getting you into it deeper and deeper till it gets a hold on you, like it has on Red? So that you can't get out even if you want to?"

Slim glanced across at Red's flaming hair, conspicuous at the roulette table.

"But I don't wanta," he said. "Neither does Red."

"Yes, but you're young enough to quit and go back to that farm you told me about," she persisted, "or to do something."

"Cally, you don't understand!"

"Slim, I understood about line work the first time I ever met Red. He was on a job near here, working over live wire—hot wire! Something went wrong, and when he was brought into the hospital he was burned so badly that it was a week before they knew whether he'd live. It was eleven weeks before he could walk."

She sighed.

"I tried to get him to quit then," she said, "and I've tried since. But none of it did any good. He'll never quit!"

She looked into Slim's dark eyes, and her own were moist.

"So you see, Slim, I've learned a lot about linesmen. I've learned that it all adds up to one thing—that some day the parachute won't open!"

Slim knew, by this time, that he was very much in love with her; but she was Red's girl and not for him.

"That may work out for some folks," he growled, "but no one else will get hurt if my belt breaks. It's not like as if I had parents, or kids, or—a wife."

"Perhaps not now," said she, and changed her manner abruptly. "Well, if it's to be a short life, let's make it a merry one!"

On the following day, Red swept Slim into a jeweller's shop and to an assistant behind a showcase stated that he wanted to see something good enough for the "sweetest gal" in Chicago.

As they approached the leg of the tower from which Red and Kelly had fallen Stumpy held on to it as though to bar Slim's way.

"We have some very beautiful engagement rings," said the assistant.

"Who said anything about engagement rings?" barked Red. "Show me something in—or—show me some bracelets. I'm lookin' for a present, not a future."

The assistant laughed at the jest and went off to get some bracelets.

"I believe that gny thought I was gonna get married!" scoffed Red.

"Aren't you?" asked Slim.

"No!" The negative was emphatic. "No, Slim, I've got my faults, but I'm not mean enough to tie Cally to 'em for life. I think too much of her to make a young widow out of her."

"What d'you mean?"

"Slim, supposin' Ranstead had been married and had a couple o' kids—where d'you think they'd be now? Linesmen haven't anything to offer a wife. Nope, this is strictly a roller-coaster career of ours."

Slim looked almost horrified, and Red laughed.

"Oh, some day I might settle down and get married," he said. "But until then the best thing I can give Cally is just what I'm givin' her—a nice good-bye present. You see, the moving finger having writ moves on."

Slim had no knowledge of the Persian poet Red had quoted and was puzzled.

"What're you talkin' about?" he asked blankly.

"Everything's simple again. We go back to work." Red fished out some notes amounting in all to about seventy dollars. "Incidentally, that's all we have between us and the next job!"

"No it ain't!" declared Slim. "You haven't let me spend a cent! I've still got two hundred bucks—that'll keep us goin'!"

"My boy," said Red in quite a fatherly fashion, "you shouldn't spend all your substance in riotous living. You may get old and need it some day."

"If you're so wise," retorted Slim, "why ain't you rich? Where's the eighteen hundred bucks you had when you hit this town?"

Red laughed.

"Where's the snow that was here last January?" he countered; and then the assistant arrived with quite a large assortment of bracelets.

The farewell party took place in Cally's flat, where a meal she herself had cooked was demolished. Over the coffee Red broached the subject of departure in his own casual fashion.

"Well, Cally," he said, "it's the old story, I guess. We've had a grand time and now it's all over. Slim and I are shovin' off."

Cally rose abruptly, her mouth all twisted as though she were on the point of tears, and she fled into her bed-room and closed the door.

"She sure hates to see you go, Red," said Slim hoarsely.

"You know I never figured she'd take it that tough." Red stared at the closed door, then took from his pocket a little package containing the bracelet. Cally's handbag was lying on a sideboard and he slipped the package into it, replaced the handbag, and moved towards the kitchen.

"Aw, we all need a drink!" he grunted. "I'm gonna mix a flock o' 'em!"

While he was out in the kitchen Cally reappeared from the bed-room and walked slowly over to Slim, who was still sitting at the table.

"Well, I—er—I guess it's all over but the shovin'," she said bitterly. "Oh, it's always been like this. I—I look up from my work and there he is. He plays until his money's gone, and all of a sud—den he's gone! And this time you're going, too!"

Slim drew a long and uncertain breath.

"I guess it's the only thing to do," he said, avoiding her eyes.

She dropped into a chair beside him.

"Slim, will you write to me?" she asked. "Red never would, and I'd never know between visits where he was or—how he was." She laughed pitifully. "Now I—I won't know about you, either."

"I don't write good," said Slim, "but if you want me to—"

"Please do!" She stood up and put both her hands on his shoulders. "There's only one thing I—I'd like better. Oh, I'm off on the old subject again!"

"What's that?" Slim looked up into her face. "Quit line work? Cally, I can't! I like line work—and, besides, if I quit I'd have to leave Red. I like him, too. I reckon I like him about as well as—well as well as you do."

"Slim!" Her hands were holding his shoulders tightly when Red walked into the room from the kitchen with a tray in his hands and brimming glasses upon the tray. He stopped short to blink, then grinned and advanced to the table.

"Remember me?" he inquired quite pleasantly. "I don't want any complaints about these drinks, now—I mixed 'em myself. There you are, Cally."

Cally removed her hands to take the proffered glass in one of them.

"Where are you off to this time, Red?" she asked.

"Well," said he, putting down the tray, "the money's gone. Winter's comin' on. We're headin' where the climate fits our clothes." He raised a glass. "Cally, till we meet again!"

An Unexpected Visitor

CHICAGO was left behind early next morning, and Red drove south at what seemed to Slim to be an excessive speed. Thirty miles away from the city, on a very second-class road, he said pointedly:

"You could go faster, if we had a long hill to go down!"

"We will!" Red assured him. "We'll be goin' down the other side o' the mountains pretty soon!"

"Yeah?" grimaced Slim. "We'll be goin' down somewhere deeper than that! If they'd made this car to be a bullet there'd be a charge o' powder behind it, wouldn't there?"

Red did not reply, but shot up a long and winding hill, raising a cloud of dust behind the car.

The long descent on the other side of the hill was accomplished at such a speed, and with such a bumping, that Slim felt sure there would be a smash, and as a heavy motor-truck swung out from a side turning he held his hands over his eyes.

But the truck was avoided by inches, and Slim breathed again.

"I can't figure you out, Red," he complained. "Coming to Chicago you drove like a snail afraid it was too early. Coming out o' Chicago you drive like this! What's the matter? Didn't you like it there?"

"Sure," replied Red, "but that's behind us. Now I want to drive fast to see what's ahead."

It became evident that he had an objective, for in the afternoon of the following day, in a dreary region of sand and scribe some miles from an unattractive town called Cactus Thorn, he drove into a construction camp and hailed a stoutly built man who was noticeable for the length of his nose and the redness of his ears.

"Well!" exclaimed the man, and came hurrying over to the car to shake hands. "Red, I'm glad to see you! Pop wrote me you were headed this way. How are he and Stumpy?"

"Pop's fine," said Red, "and Stumpy's still talkin' about his pa. Slim, this is an old friend o' mine, Steve Vincent. This is Slim Kincaid, my partner, Steve—and I don't mind tellin' you he can really cut it."

"Well, if you're lookin' for work," said Steve Vincent, "you've come to the right place. I need a coupla good men right now."

"You don't need 'em any worse than we need the job," Red assured him; and terms were arranged.

"You're hired," said Steve. "Check in at the camp and start work in the morning. See you later."

The transmission lines in this part of the country were strung from wooden poles, instead of steel towers, and Slim was not used to working on poles. He quickly became expert at climbing them, however, with the aid of "gaffs," or spurs, strapped to the inside of his ankles, and for six weeks he and Red bolted cross-pieces to the tops of poles, fixed insulators to the cross-pieces, and ran wire.

Then, one morning, the general foreman of the camp arrived on the scene in his car and descended to talk to Steve Vincent, who was foreman of the gang.

"I've got bad news for you, Steve," he said. "I'm takin' Red Blayd away from you."

"Why, he's the best man I've got," protested Steve.

"That's why I'm takin' him! I'm makin' him foreman over at Camp Eight."

"Camp Eight?" Steve glanced at an ugly, long-faced fellow who was at work on the top of an adjacent pole. "That's gonna make Wilcox sore—he was counting on that job himself."

"Never mind Wilcox," said the general foreman, Sam Blake by name. "I want Red!"

"Okay—orders are orders." Steve shouted up to Red: "Hi, Red. I've got orders to send you over to Camp Eight as foreman. How about it?"

Red shouted down that he didn't want the job; but Slim urged him to take it.

"You'll make twice as much dough," he said.

"Yeah, and I'll stay up twice as late at night losin' it!" Red retorted.

"You go on over there as foreman and take me along as straw boss, see?"

"That's right." What Red wouldn't do for his own advantage he was prepared to do for Slim's. "I never thought o' that." He called down: "Okay, Steve, it's a deal!"

Howard Wilcox, a thoroughly unpleasant fellow, disliked by all the linesmen in the camp, had been listening and was furious. After Steve had walked away with the general foreman he descended from his perch on a pulley-rope and moved furtively along to the pole on which Red and Slim were working. They were sitting on frames held by pulley-ropes, and he began to unfasten the rope that held Red's frame.

Slim looked down. "What're you tryin' to do, Wilcox?" he bellowed.

"Red's rig was slippin'," lied the linesman. "I wanted to fix it—that's all."

Slim descended his own rope with all speed.

"Red's rigs don't slip," he said fiercely, "not unless someone slips 'em!"

"Aw, now listen, Slim, you know I wouldn't do a thing like that," pro-

NEXT WEEK'S BUMPER NUMBER!

GEORGE ARLISS

—IN—
"DR. SYN"

An excise officer comes to the quiet village of Dymchurch in search of smugglers. He hears stories of ghostly figures that haunt the marshes and soon begins to have his suspicions. His chief suspect is Dr. Syn, but the latter is more than a match for the officer. A stirring drama of long ago that centres round a once-famous pirate.

"HEADIN' FOR THE RIO GRANDE"

The sheriff of Rio County was fighting a losing battle against an organisation of racketeers. Then out of the North came two hard-riding, straight-shooting buckeroos who helped him turn the tide and restore Law and Order. A gripping drama of the cattle country, starring Tex Ritter and Eleanor Stewart.

"S.O.S. CLIPPER ISLAND"

Mala, a Polynesian in the employ of the U.S. Intelligence Service, is sent to a lonely island to investigate sabotage that resulted in the wrecking of a giant airship. With the help of the Princess Melani he fights to break up an international spy ring. Starring Mala and Mamo Clark.

"HILLS OF OLD WYOMING"

A thrilling tale of rustlers and Redskins, and Hopalong Cassidy, starring William Boyd.

tested Wilcox. "I just wanted to help."

"Don't give me that! I seen you monkeyin' with the knot!"

Wilcox showed his temper.

"You can't prove that, and you know it!" he roared.

"I ain't gonna try to prove it," said Slim. "Red's too good a guy to go to gaol for killin' a rat like you! Get away from that sling!"

Wilcox went off and climbed his own pole again, and Slim re-ascended his. But a few minutes later Red called down for a ladder.

"Hi, one o' you grunts, send Red's ladder up to him!" ordered the foreman.

"I'll do it, Steve!" Wilcox shouted, and he was down on the ground almost instantly. But Slim was down before the linesman had time to do anything with the ladder.

"You ain't rigging no ladder that Red works on!" he stormed. "I wouldn't trust a knot o' yours in a necktie!"

Wilcox gripped him by the shirt with his gloved left hand and in his right hand flashed a knife. Slim was holding a pair of pliers, and with them he defended himself.

The fight was too brief for anyone to interfere, but it was horrible to witness. The two staggered apart and fell upon their backs almost simultaneously, Slim badly wounded in the body just above the edge of his safety-belt, Wilcox with his face battered and torn by the pliers.

Two of the grunts knelt over Wilcox, and Steve and another man looked down at Slim.

"Get a stretcher, quick!" cried the foreman.

Red was down from the pole and over at the truck before any of the grunts could reach it, and he helped to carry his unconscious chum on the stretcher. Others carried Wilcox, and the two were conveyed to the camp on the truck, and from the camp to the hospital in Cactus Thorn by car.

Red drove the car, and Steve rode with him. At the hospital he directed the internes to leave Wilcox where he was till Slim had been put to bed.

"But he's got one eye knocked out!" protested Steve.

"If the doctor can't fix Slim up," declared Red grimly, "he won't need that eye!"

After what seemed an interminable wait in the hall of the hospital a little grey-haired doctor walked out to him from a ward.

"How is he, doc?" asked Red.

"Well," was the slow reply, "if there are no complications he'll be all right."

"You're quite sure now?"

"Yes," decided the doctor. "He'll have to stay here a long time, but as that wound didn't kill him I shouldn't think anything ever will! How on earth did he get it?"

"He got it in a trade," said Red. "A trade?"

"Yeah, for a broken head. Well, as long as he's gettin' along all right I guess we can patch up that other guy." Red turned to the two internes he had overawed. "All right, boys," he said, "bring him in! Thanks, doc."

The doctor had not exaggerated when he had said that Slim would have to stay in hospital for a long time. As a matter of fact, he hovered between life and death for several days, and a fortnight elapsed before he was able to write a note to Cally.

In the note he dealt chiefly with Red, and it was only in the last paragraph that he mentioned himself:

"Changed my address real quick, but it ain't nothing very serious. I guess you better write to me here at the hospital for a few weeks."

The response to that epistle was swift and of an entirely unexpected nature. A nurse entered his ward one evening to inform him that he had a visitor.

"Oh," said Slim, "they must have finished up early out at the camp today. Send him in."

"It's not a him," said the nurse, and she went to the door and admitted Cally.

"Cally!" Slim had seen her so often in his dreams that he could scarcely believe he was gazing at her in the flesh.

"Are you glad to see me, Slim?" she asked, walking over to his bed.

"Glad? I've never been so monstrous glad about anything in my whole life! I've just been lyin' here thinkin' about you and dreamin' about you. I been writin' you another letter."

He held out a sheet of paper, but she put it in her handbag without even looking at it.

"I'll read it to-night," she said. "After this you—you won't have to write me any more."

"You mean you're gonna stay here?" asked Slim excitedly.

"I'm going to stay as long as—as you need me."

The nurse intervened to take Slim's temperature, and the thermometer was still in his mouth when Red walked into the ward—and stopped short in astonishment.

"Hallo, Red," said Cally.

"Cally!" Red advanced rapturously. "For the love o' Pete, I'm glad to see you! What're you doin' here?"

The nurse requested them both to go. "Mr. Kincaid is not allowed to have visitors for long," she said.

"Okay, sister," Red caught hold of Cally's arm. "I'll be in again soon, Slim. Come on, Cally, let's get something to eat."

Cally squeezed Slim's hand.

"Have a good night's sleep," she said, "and I'll be back to see you to-morrow. Good-bye, Slim!"

Slim Decides

RED took Cally to a restaurant in the town, and they had a meal together at a table in a little curtained recess.

"This is like old times, Cally," he said. "Gee, it's gonna be a big load off my mind to know you're looking after Slim after I'm gone."

"Where are you going, Red?" she asked quickly.

"Well, you see, I promised 'em I'd take care of a job way up the line if they'd let me stay here till Slim was out o' danger. Should complete the job in a month. Gee, I'm gonna miss that kid! Yeah, and we need money to pay the bills."

"How much?" asked Cally.

"A lot more than I'll ever make up there in a month."

Cally took from her handbag the bracelet he had bought her in Chicago.

"Will that cover it?"

He frowned at his gift.

"That's swell of you, Cally," he muttered, "but I—I bought that for you."

"I know," said she, "but what better use could we make of it than taking care of Slim? Look, let me handle this—I'll sell it and get enough to—well—to cover almost everything."

"Same old Cally, aren't you?" he laughed. "Haven't changed a bit!"

The winter daylight had faded to dusk before they entered the restaurant, and it was night when they went out from it.

"There's my car over there," said Red. "Let's travel. I could tell you a lot o' lies under that moon!"

"And there's my hotel right over there," said Cally, "and I didn't come here to look at the moon. I'm going to have a good night's sleep so that I can get up early and see the head of the hospital to-morrow."

Red protested that it had been a long time since they had seen one another.

"You've got a whole month to take care of Slim," he said, "and I've got to leave in a couple of hours."

"Same old Red," said Cally with a twisted smile. "Always leaving! Good-bye."

They shook hands on the pavement, and Red went back to camp in his car.

and Cally entered the hotel. She had arranged with the hospital authorities in Chicago to be transferred to the hospital in Cactus Thorn till Slim was well again, and next morning she took the place of the nurse who had been looking after him.

Slim was happy and progressed quite rapidly to convalescence. He had some characteristic cards from Stumpy and some brief epistles from Pop, and about a month after Cally's arrival the doctor pronounced him as good as new again.

"I could have told you that a week ago, doc," said Slim. "But I'm right grateful to you for fixin' me up so good."

"You'd better save your thanks for the nurse of yours," said the grey-haired little doctor with a twinkle in his eyes. "I never saw anyone recover so quickly as you've done since she's been taking care of you. And if I'm any judge, she's going to keep right on taking care of you!"

After the doctor had gone Cally entered the ward with a suitcase Red had bought for Slim in Chicago.

"Well, you've had your final examination," she said.

"Yeah," nodded Slim. "He told me I'm as good as new. D'you think I ain't glad to be gettin' out of here?"

"I'm glad for you, Slim," she declared, opening the suitcase on the bed he had deserted for good. "It's been a long siege, hasn't it?"

"It was till you came out here!" Slim began to toss things into the suitcase. "I don't know what I'd have done if you hadn't—"

"You don't have to thank me," she interrupted. "I wanted to take care of you and get you well again. Here, that's no way to pack—let me do it!"

She began to fold garments and to pack them neatly, moving from dressing-chest to bed, and back again, while Slim completed his dressing.

"Slim," she said suddenly, "where are you going? You're not going back to that camp?"

"I've got to, Cally," he replied. "I reckon the job's almost done, but—"

"Slim, I didn't come here just to nurse you," she blurted. "I came because I had to! When I heard that you were hurt I—I realised just how much you meant to me." Her voice wavered a little, and it sounded to him as though there were tears in it. "I—I found that I loved you—and after I'd been here a while I knew that you loved me, too."

Slim took her in his arms, though not without a feeling of guilt.

"I think I knowed about it first in Chicago," he confided in her ear. "I tried to fight against it then 'cause I didn't know how you felt—and then there was Red." He sighed heavily. "And there still is Red. He loves you, too, Cally!"

"No!" she cried. "No, Slim, I'm only a small part of his life. He never loved anything but gambling and wandering around and—line work. That's his life."

The door opened, and they started apart as Steve Vincent entered the ward. He had been a fairly frequent visitor, and Cally had come to know him and to like him.

"Hallo, Cally," said the foreman. "Hallo, kid—glad to see you on your feet again. Are you all right?"

"Fine, boss," declared Slim. "I was just fixin' to come back to work."

"Well, that's what I came over to see you about," Steve tugged at one of his very red ears. "The construction job finished up this morning—but we've got something better for you in the maintenance. This is a good company, and we know you're a good man."

"Tell him you'll do it, Slim," pleaded Cally. "Don't you see what it means? I'll tell you for him, Steve. He'll stay!"

"That's fine," said the foreman. "You just keep listenin' to her, kid, and you won't go wrong. Well, I gotta get back to the office—I'll see you later."

He was on his way out when Slim stopped him with a question.

"Steve, what's Red gonna do?"

"Why," Steve replied, "he got a wire from Pop Traver about a construction job back East, and I guess he's gonna take it. So long!"

"Slim," said Cally, after the foreman had gone, "you just don't know how happy it makes me to think of spending the rest of my life right with you."

She was in his arms again, but Slim's face was troubled.

"I'm thinkin' about it, too, Cally," he said. "You're gonna spend the rest of your life with me, but not here—not if Pop needs us! The first thing we've got to do is to see Red and tell him the truth!"

Once more the door had been opened, and Red's voice rang out behind them, harsh and strained:

"What is it you wanted to tell me?"

They started violently and turned to stare at him, but they did not let go of one another.

"It ain't much, Red," Slim managed to say, "but we just naturally fell in love, and—we're fixin' to get married."

"Gonna get married, eh?" Red bore the blow extraordinarily well, compressing his lips. "Well, I don't know, that—that oughta work out swell—for you two. Great!" He advanced with outstretched hand. "Good luck, fellow! Good luck, Cally!"

Almost automatically they shook hands with him in turn, and then he was gone. Slim fastened the suitcase on the bed.

"How soon can you get your stuff together?" he asked.

"Stuff together?" echoed Cally blankly. "For what?"

"For travellin'. We gotta get married right away and catch the first train back to Pop. He wouldn't have wired Red if he hadn't needed us."

"But—but, Slim—"

"We'll get married here and go on there together."

"Yes," said Cally bitterly, "go on there—and then go on to another job, and still another, never knowing which one will be the last! I wouldn't mind you being a linesman a little longer, here in the maintenance where there's security and a chance to build a future, but if you go back to your old gang I'm going back to Chicago, and we're not going to be married!"

He stared at her in consternation.

"Do—do you mean that?" he stammered.

"Yes," she said definitely.

"That's what's the matter then!" He snatched up the suitcase. "Cally, I was a linesman before you knowed me, and that's the one thing about me I can't change to suit you. If you figure you can't stand it, why that's it!"

She walked out from the ward and slammed the door; whereupon Slim dived across to a window and opened it. Down in the street Red was starting up his car.

"Hi, Red!" bellowed Slim. "Red! Wait a minute! Wait—I'm comin' with you!"

Cally was in the hall as he dashed across it and out to the steps of the building, and she was horrified to see that he was really going.

"Slim!" she cried imploringly; but Slim stumbled down the steps and scrambled into Red's car.

An Emergency Call

LATE in the evening of the 25th of December, Pop and the members of his gang were seated round a long table in the dining-room of a boarding-house in Brinkfield, New Hampshire. They had reached the last stage of a highly satisfactory meal prepared by their tall and buxom landlady, Mrs. Johnson, and Stumpy's tongue was wagging.

Down in the south of Illinois the weather was still mild and pleasant, but the State of New Hampshire was in the grip of a blizzard that raged all along the upper Atlantic coast. The wind was howling round the boarding-house, the air was thick with snow, and snow was already two inches deep upon the ground.

Mrs. Johnson did not expect any visitors on such a night, but the front-door bell rang suddenly and she crossed the hall to answer its summons. Red and Slim were on the top step, covered with snow and sheltering from the blast as well as they could in the narrow porch.

"Mr. Traver?" shivered the landlady in response to Red's question. "Why, he's eatin' his dinner! Just come right in, both of you."

A very warm greeting awaited the two in the dining-room. Stumpy cried:

"You think I ain't been pinin' for you boys worse'n that ol' red-headed girl's been pinin' for me?"

"Same old Stumpy!" laughed Red. "You been talkin' for twenty years!"

"Mrs. Johnson," said Pop, "these are the two boys I wanted you to save rooms for."

Mrs. Johnson said that she guessed they'd be wanting dinner.

"Well, we sure could stand it," said Red. "We've been sleepin' and catin' in the car for the last five days."

"That's terrible! I'll get you some right away!"

Stumpy and a man named Lafe Garretson gave up their places at the table, and Red and Slim sat down to a hearty meal.

"Well," said Pop, rubbing his hands, "this looks like old times. Just been waitin' for the day when my old gang'd be around me again."

"Is Joe Braithwaite still with you?" inquired Slim.

"No, Joe ain't with me any more," regretted the foreman. "You see, he got married, and his wife made him settle down and take a maintenance job."

"Yeah," chimed in Stumpy. "d'you think that woman ain't made Joe settle down worse'n a ground squirrel with the gout?"

There was a radio set in the room, and he switched it on right at the beginning of a news bulletin.

"Storm warnings are flying for the whole Atlantic coast as far south as Richmond," said a voice from the loud-speaker, "and all air-lines have suspended services. The weather bureau reports a falling temperature and rising wind velocity, and the storm is moving westward at the rate of fifty miles per hour. From all indications, the great

"Boo-oo!" Stumpy switched off the set. "That guy was freezin' me to death! You think we ain't gonna have a blizzard? You think you boys ain't gonna have to wear snow-shoes up them

(Continued on page 27)

Racketeers caused an old man's death when he held the winning ticket in a sweepstake. Two grandchildren, aided by a young reporter, seek the solution of the mystery and become involved in a counterfeit swindle. Starring Frankie Darro and Kane Richmond

"TOUGH TO HANDLE"

The Lucky Sweepstake Number

"EXTRA! Sweepstake extra here! Read your lucky number! Paper! Paper! Read your lucky number!"

The sturdy, thickset youngster with the square jaw and fierce, dark eyes yelled lustily as he held his papers. Quite a good trade he was doing, because a very great percentage of the American public were investing their savings every week in sweepstakes and hoping to get rich quick.

"Hi, gramp!" The boy caught sight of an elderly man coming slowly along the street.

"Hallo, Mickey." The old boy held out a shaking hand. "Give me a paper—maybe we won."

"Yeah—maybe is right." He handed his grandfather a paper. "The chances are a million to one against you."

"Well, somebody's got to win," said old man Sanford. "And I might be that one in a million. Just think, Mike, you could give up selling papers, and—"

"What, me give up this corner, after I had to lick seven guys to get it? Not likely!"

"Hey, kid!" A man rushed up. "Gimme a paper."

Grandfather began to amble away with his head buried in the paper.

"I'll see you supper-time, gramp!" the boy shouted, but the old man was so occupied with his paper that he did not answer.

Old man Sanford went down all the small prizewinners first, because he knew he could not hope for a big win, but when he did not find his name among the lucky ones he glanced at the main prizes. Not a hope, of course! Suddenly his eyes centred on a number. It was mighty close to his own. He took out a slip on which he had written the number. It was the same.

"Don't tell me you've got a winning number, Sanford!" a hearty voice exclaimed.

The old man looked up eagerly at the smart, swarthy fellow grinning at him.

"Look here, that ticket you sold me—it's a winner!" Sanford exclaimed excitedly.

"Let me see."

"It is—says so clear as day."

"But that's impossible," the man exclaimed, taking the newspaper, looking at the paper and then comparing the number on the slip.

"Why do you say that? It's my number, isn't it?" Sanford cried. "That's the same as is on the actual ticket."

"Then there must be a mistake in printing the name, that's all." The fellow put the slip of paper in his pocket. "These newspapers are always getting the names mixed up. I'll see that you get the dough. You go right home and wait for me."

"That two dollars sixty I gave you is the luckiest money I ever spent, and as soon as I get the prize money I'm going to give you a little present, Jake."

"No, thanks." Jake shook his head and grinned. "It's your ticket—winner take all. I'll be seeing ya."

After a Story

THE City Editor of the "Tribune" was a busy man. He was in his shirtsleeves, his hair in disorder, and between writing and shouting instructions he was answering dozens of "phone calls.

"Yeah? Henderson, what you want? So he threw you out, huh? You go right back in there and get that story. That guy sold his winning ticket for ten dollars, and I want to know how he feels."

"But, boss, I already know how," came back the anxious voice of a reporter. "He must have been a dummy the way he expressed himself—he talked with his hands. He landed me a couple of beauties."

"Make him talk, even if you have to use a gun on him." The editor slammed down the receiver and had written about ten words when the bell shrilled again. "Hallo, yes—who? We haven't got anybody by that name. Oh, yes, we have. Just a minute." He put the receiver down and bellowed: "Gloria Sanford—telephone."

A pretty, brown-haired girl hastened into the office.

"Thank you, Mr. Kendall." She picked up the receiver. "Hallo, oh, hallo, grandpa. What's that? You have a winning number. Some woman's name on it?" A pause. "Yes, grandpa—right away." She hung up. "That's funny, isn't it, Mr. Kendall, my grandfather—"

"I heard you," interrupted the editor. "He's stuck with a phoney sweepstake ticket. Who sold it to him?"

"I don't know."

"McIntyre!" yelled the editor.

"Coming!" came the answer.

A tall, dark, strikingly handsome young fellow rushed to answer his chief's call.

"This girl's grandfather drew a winning number in the sweepstake," stated the editor.

"Is that so?" The young fellow smiled at the girl. "Do you remember, Miss Sanford, I'm the reporter who took you out to lunch to-day."

"You'll probably go on paying for my lunches for a long time," she answered, and looked at her boss.

"Mr. Kendall says the ticket is a fake."

"A fake?" The smile vanished.

"I'm terribly sorry, Gloria."

"Interview him," barked the editor.

"Find out who's behind it and who sold it to him. It's a racket. Get all the dope and we'll bust this graft wide open."

"Very good, chief."

"Wait a minute." The editor snorted as the two young people got to the door.

"Romance has spoiled a lot of scoops, McIntyre."

"And scoops have spoiled a lot of romances," retorted the young reporter.

"Go ahead." The editor, who was quite human, grinned.

Franco Gives Orders

YOUNG MIKE had sold a good many of his papers, so he left his corner and made his way down the street to the swing doors of the Red Domino, which was an obvious night club. He would have entered if a thickest man in a dark suit had not come out and gripped him by the collar.

"You stay outa here!"

"Why?" Mike demanded. "Mr. Franco told me I could come in any time I wanted."

"Yeah? Well, I say you can't. Now beat it!"

"Hey, mister, who'd you think you are?"

The man retorted by cuffing Mike's ears, and that roused the lad to fury. He dropped his papers, lowered his head and charged his tormentor. Crash! The big fellow landed on his back and got up yelling like an enraged bull. He rushed at the youngster, who was an adept at street fighting. Mike dodged and out went a foot. Crash! The fellow was down for a second time.

Mike leaped on the fallen man and did his best to strangle him. The man was on the point of flinging the youngster from him when Patrolman Reilly chanced on the scene.

"What's the idea trying to beat up a kid like this?" the patrolman demanded when the two had got to their feet. "Shame on you." He glowered at the big fellow. "Get going, buddy." The man slouched away, whereupon the officer grinned at the boy. "Michael, me lad, run along and peddle your papers."

"Let that be a lesson to you, Barney, me lad," the boy shouted after his enemy. "It's a good thing for you O'Reilly came along when he did, you big patooka."

Mike winked at the patrolman, and after picking up his papers hastened into the Red Domino, while the grinning cop walked down the street to see if Barney had any further arguments in mind.

But Barney had not stayed. In a side street he encountered Jake.

"Barney! You're the guy I wanna see," Jake shouted. "Old man Sanford just grabbed off a winning ticket on the sweepstake."

"So what?"

December 25th, 1937,

"Why, you're the guy that printed it."

"You're kidding."

"That's what you think." Jake showed the paper and the slip. "You slipped up some place in numbering those notes."

"By gee, what do we do?" Barney gaped at the paper.

"We better give Franco the low-down and find out what to do. Come on."

The two men hastened back to the Red Domino.

Meanwhile, Mike had been stopped by a waiter.

"Where you going, Mike?"

"I want to see Mr. Franco."

"You can't see Franco now. He's busy holding a kind of reception with a lot of folk in his office. Take a seat, Mike, and stick around."

"Okay, I've got lots of time," nodded Mike, and parked himself at a table in the deserted restaurant.

Not quite deserted, because there was one pasty-faced individual sagging in a chair with a glass of wine before him. Mike grimed, because whenever he came into the Red Domino this drunk was sure to be there.

In the big office of Mr. Franco were gathered a number of men who were standing round a large desk. Franco, a dark, pale-faced man with very intent blue eyes, was addressing them.

"It's in your hand. You can make this the juiciest racket in the country. The plates are ready for the next tickets on the sweepstakes. I'll have the books here in the next few days. Then I want each and every one of you to make a record sale. Our goal ought to be a million dollars on the next drawing."

"That's talking, Franco," came the general answer. "We'll sure get it. You can count on us."

"Go out and get your territory organised. I'm counting on every one of you." Franco went to a door hardly visible—it fitted so close to the panelled walls—and opened it. "Good-day, gentlemen." There was a satisfied smirk on the thin lips as he locked this door and went out to the outer office, where a pretty girl with attractively dyed fair hair sat before a switchboard.

"How did you like the pep talk?"

"It was a masterpiece," agreed Myra, who had been listening-in. "There isn't a foothall coach in the country that could have done better." Her eyes hardened. "Did you mean that soft soap you handed Clara?"

"Want me to think of you as a blonde, green-eyed mouster?" He chided and then put his hand on her shoulder. "Forget it, honey—only business. If a pat on the back and a little compliment make a customer happy, what harm is there in it?"

"None, I suppose," admitted the jealous Myra.

"Of course there isn't. Want to do me a favour?" He smiled as she nodded eagerly. "Then check with the engraver about the new plates and hustle him along all you can."

"I'll call him right away."

Franco went back to his room, and had scarcely sat down at his desk when the door burst open. Instantly he dived his hand into a pocket and whipped out a gun.

His eyes glinted when he saw it was Jake and Barney.

"What the heck d'you mean bursting in like that?" he demanded. "Well, what's on your mind?" He saw that something was amiss.

"I peddled one of those tickets to old man Sanford and it turns out to be a winner," spoke Jake. "Some woman out in Iowa has the real number. There's gonna be a squawk." He tossed the slip on the desk. "There it is—Kg 13313."

"Sure this is right?"

"Absolutely."

"This isn't one of our tickets," Franco looked at Barney.

"There should've been another three in front of those numbers," Barney admitted, eyeing Franco nervously. "I thought I destroyed all of 'em off that plate."

"You once got seven years in the pen for thinking," Franco said with biting scorn. Then his eyes flashed to Jake. "I want that ticket back."

"It'll be a cinch to shut up old man Sanford," Barney cried.

That made Franco even more furious. "Now get this, you two." He glared from one to the other. "We're on the biggest thing we've ever pulled, and I'm not going to have it messed up by any rough stuff. Now get that ticket back."

When Jake and Barney had gone out by the private way Franco went down to the main restaurant, and an amused smile appeared on his face as he noted young Mike. It was audition morning, and Del Roy, an agent, had turned up with a number of acts.

"Hallo, Mr. Franco," cried Mike. "Here's your paper."

"Thanks, Mike." He tossed over a note. "Keep the change, son. Many a time I've had a paper on tick from you." He gestured with his hand. "Care to watch a try-out?"

"Gee, sure!"

The first act was a girl who tried to do a step dance and to sing. Mike frowned and Franco gave an understanding nod. The drunken man, apparently disturbed by the noise, woke up and hissed loudly.

The agent was furious and tried out another girl, who was a singer. The drunk hissed more loudly, and Mike thought he was right. The girl's voice gave him earache.

"I'm going to sock that drunk," cried the agent.

"He's my best customer," laughed Franco. "Opens and closes the club, serves himself—and pays."

All the rest of the acts were just as bad, and finally Franco told the agent to get out and stay away if he could not produce anything better. This gave Mike courage.

"Mr. Franco, I don't like to butt in, but do you need a girl singer?"

"The boy press agent, huh?" Franco said with an amused grin. "Don't tell me that you've got a sister."

"Yeah. How did you guess it?"

"Bring her around, Mike," Franco chuckled. "I'll listen to her."

"Do you mean it?"

"Of course."

"When shall I bring her?"

"Any time."

"Gosh, Mr. Franco, you sure are a swell guy." The boy stuttered over his gratitude. "Geo, I'll be getting along to tell her."

Mike hurried away. The restaurant was empty. Franco glanced across at the drunk man.

Tragedy

OLD Sanford was at home by himself. Very soon his two grandchildren with whom he lived would be there to rejoice in his good luck. Ah, someone at the door! It must be them.

It was Jake and Barney.

"Hallo, Mr. Sanford. Meet my friend," greeted Jake.

"Glad to meet a winner." Barney held out a great hand. "Congratulations."

"My friend's going to fix up things about that ticket," Jake explained.

"Oh, that's fine," said Sanford. "Hand over that ticket," muttered Barney, who was on edge.

"Well, I—er—" The old man was not sure of this burly fellow.

"Make it snappy, Sanford," Barney cried tersely. "You know it takes time to fix things like this."

"I can't give anybody that ticket," quavered the old man. "It's my only proof I won."

"But you can't collect with the ticket in your pocket," argued Barney.

"And I'm guaranteeing this man," added Jake.

"I can't give you the ticket," Sanford was suddenly apprehensive.

It was more than Barney could stand, and he flashed out a fist that caught the old man a cruel blow on the jaw. He crashed back against the table and rolled to the floor.

"Get his wallet—quick!" Barney shouted.

"Why, it ain't here!" Jake cried a few moments later, after he had emptied every pocket. Suddenly he looked intently at the still figure, and bent closer. "Why, he's—he's—"

He got slowly to his feet. Barney heard that note of dread, and then he peered at the still face. With a cry he got to his feet.

"I didn't mean to do it, Jake."

Mike on his way suddenly saw ahead two figures that he recognised.

"Hey! Sis! Sis!" he shouted. "I've got swell news!"

"We know already, Michael, but it's not true," Gloria said in grave tones.

"It's not true!" The sixteen-year-old youngster scowled. "What do you mean, you know already it's not true? How do you know? You weren't there?"

"Where? Where's there?" asked Ed McIntyre.

"What in the world are you talking about, Michael?" asked his sister.

"Wait a minute! Wait a minute! One at a time!" Mike panted out. "First—I just met Mr. Franco. Second—I told him you got a swell voice, with looks, personality—"

"I'll say she has!" laughed Ed.

"Quiet! No remarks from the gallery," reproved the boy.

"And he says you can come over any time you want to and try out."

"Here, you don't mean Franco who runs the Red Domino?"

"Sure thing. Why?" Mike asked the young reporter.

"You can't sing there, Gloria," McIntyre said to the girl in appealing tones.

"That's just a dive."

"What do you mean—a dive?" cried Mike.

"It's an Al joint."

"Now, wait a minute, boys," Gloria saw that there was likelihood of high words. "Maybe I'm not good enough for this dive or joint. Let's get on home and see grandpa. You see, Mike, he's got a lucky number, but we fear it's a phoney ticket."

They let themselves into the small flat and pulled up with a gasp at sight of drawers open and everything in disarray, then Mike saw that motionless figure on the ground.

"It's grandpa!" he shouted, and flung himself down beside the still figure. He lifted the head and then gave a cry as he felt blood. He looked round at the others. "I—I—I believe he's dead!"

"How could it have happened?" cried Gloria as she sank on to the sofa.

When the two men appeared in Franco's room he took one look at their ashen faces and his eyes narrowed.

"What did you do—bungle it?"

"I didn't have nothing to do with it!" whined Jake.

"If it isn't a secret—tell me about it."

"Old man Sanford croaked!" Barney stammered.

"I didn't do it!" Jake shouted hoarsely.

"We'll go into that later," Franco held out his hand. "Let's have the ticket."

"He wouldn't come through with it," Barney cried. "I didn't pull any rough stuff, honest; but he must have had a weak pump."

"Say, this puts me in a spot," Jake was shaking with fright. "I sold the ticket to the old man. I gotta get outa here, and it's up to you to help me!"

"You couple of fools!" Franco almost gave way to a wild outburst of anger. "And now it's up to me to save your worthless skins. All right, you mugs, get out to the plant and stay there. I'll figure out something Go on, beat it!"

Franco was sitting at his desk in thought when there came a loud buzzing and a small lamp on his desk glowed red. He looked at it with a shade of apprehension. After seeing that both doors were locked, he went across the room to a bookshelf, which swung back when he touched a spring. Beyond was a small room. A man, hard of eye, stared intently at Franco.

"I don't often make mistakes in men," he said harshly, "but I'm wondering if I didn't when I picked you to take charge of things."

"What do you mean?" asked Franco.

"I know all about the Sanford mess."

"It was only an accident," Franco's tone was whining in the same sort of way as Jake's. "The boys were trying to get back a ticket we sold him."

"Why?"

"It was from the plates we destroyed—you know, with the right numbers. It turned up a winner."

"You should have paid him off."

"What!" Franco gasped. "Sixteen grand?"

"What's that to the millions we stand to make?" gritted out the man, who was the real noise behind this sweep-stake racket.

"But I thought—"

"Listen!" harshly interrupted that hoarse voice. "I'm doing the thinking for both of us—understand?"

"Ye-yes."

"Where's the ticket?"

"I don't know—they couldn't find it."

"If it shows up, pay it. Is that clear?"

"You're giving the orders."

"Best remember that, and we'll get along fine." The chief's eyes were ominous. "I know how to deal with those who fail or disobey me."

The man was on the point of flinging the youngster from him when Patrolman Reilly chanced on the scene.

McIntyre Becomes Suspicious

THREE young people sat disconsolately on a sofa. The doctor had been and said that death was due to heart failure brought on by striking the base of the skull on the table.

"Oh, Ed," Gloria sobbed on McIntyre's broad shoulder, "why did anybody do this to us?"

"Don't worry, honey, we'll straighten it up." He tried to comfort the girl. She had adored her grandfather, who had been so kind to them when their parents had died when they were mites.

"They went through this place like a cyclone." Mike stared round with hard, angry gaze. "I wonder who did it?"

"I don't know, but I believe it was somebody who was after that ticket."

"What ticket?"

"Your grandfather's sweepstake ticket."

"But you said it was a fake."

"It is," Ed drew his brows together in a frown of bewilderment.

"If it's a fake, what would anybody want with it?" Mike wanted to know.

"I hesitated to say anything about this until now, but it's better for you both to know what you're up against." McIntyre was very serious.

"What is all this mystery stuff?" Mike demanded.

"You needn't be afraid to tell us," whispered Gloria, drying her eyes.

"The doctor pronounced your grandfather's death as due to natural causes—heart failure—but I am convinced there is more behind it than that. Moreover, I think you two have had your suspicions on account of the disordered state of this room." McIntyre paused. "It is not necessary to call in the police on account of the doctor's verdict, but that depends on what we think is best. Now, let us take a few facts. First, your grandfather held a questionable sweepstake ticket with a winning number. Immediately after the winner was proved your grandfather was found dead. And we discovered your house in this condition. It's obvious that someone was after that ticket."

"Yeah, but they didn't find it."

"How do you know?" the reporter asked.

"Because I've got it here." Mike held out the ticket.

"Where did you get it?"

"Why, it was in the back of gramp's watch," the boy answered. "I guess he hid it there when he thought it was a lucky number. I found the watch on the floor."

Ed McIntyre turned the ticket over and held it up to the light.

"It certainly looks like the real thing," he declared, and looked at Mike. "I've got a good hunch that if we found out who sold this ticket to him we would solve your grandfather's death and learn who's behind the sweepstakes racket."

"I know who sold it to gramp," Mike said sharply.

"Who?" asked Gloria and Ed together.

"A fellow named Jake—he hangs out over at the Red Domino."

"One of Franco's boys, eh? Doesn't look so good for Franco," Ed argued.

"But Michael tells me that Mr. Franco is a fine man," Gloria interposed.

"And if you think Franco's double-crossing us, give us the low-down!" demanded the fiery young Irish newsboy.

"All that I can tell you is that Franco has been mixed up in a couple of rackets. Mr. Franco is the brains of the whole set-up."

Gloria shook her head.

"Ed, I think you're wrong."

"What's more, I'll prove he's wrong," added Mike.

"How?" questioned Ed.

"Well, I'll bet if I take this ticket over to Mr. Franco and explain everything to him he'll do all he can to help."

"Maybe, though chances are a thousand to one Franco will tell you to run along and sell your papers—or he'll take the ticket away from you."

Mike jumped up.

"Just to prove you're wrong, I'm going to take the ticket over to Franco right now." He strode towards the door.

"Wait, Mike—you mustn't," pleaded Gloria.

"Don't worry, Gloria." Ed lifted his big frame from the sofa. "I'll go along and see that nothing happens to him."

There was a sprinkling of diners in the Red Domino when the two got there. Mike went off to find Franco, whilst McIntyre went into the restaurant. The boy would not allow the reporter to go with him, as he was so sure that Mr. Franco was on the level.

McIntyre found a table and had not been seated more than a few minutes when a very staggery man rolled to the table, mumbled some apologies and sat down. The drunk yelled for a waiter to bring him some brandy.

Franco was sitting in his office think about the words of the chief. He had to get that ticket back. Bad publicity might ruin the whole campaign and he would go out on his ear as a failure. One of the boys had suggested that the Sanford kids had the ticket, and he was wondering about this when a waiter announced that Michael Sanford was outside.

"Hallo, Mike!" cordially cried Franco when the newsboy was shown in. "How's my pal?"

"Not so good, Mr. Franco."

"What's wrong?"

"Have you heard about my grandpa being dead?"

"One of the men told me, Mike. I hoped it wasn't true," Franco answered.

"Still, I believe he was an old man. Probably it was shock that caused heart failure. Didn't he have a ticket that was very close to a winning number?"

"It was a winning number," cried the boy. "What's more, someone came in and half wrecked the flat."

"Wrecked the flat? What do you mean?"

"Well, they might have been after that fake sweepstake ticket somebody sold my grandpa."

"What makes you think it is a fake?" Franco asked.

"Well, it's listed as a winning number, but somebody in Iowa is listed as owner of the ticket." Mike fumbled in his pocket. "I've got the fake ticket with me. I found it in the back of my grandpa's watch."

Franco's eyes glistened as Mike produced the ticket, but he held out his hand in a casual sort of manner.

"Let me see it, Mike. Maybe I can help you."

"Gee, I knew you would!" Without hesitation the trusting youngster passed it over.

Franco studied it thoughtfully, peering at it through a magnifying glass, and then placed it before him on his blotter.

"You think this is a fake. Is that so, Mike?"

"That's how it stands, Mr. Franco." "As Jake sold you that ticket, I'll gamble it's the real thing, and, to prove it to you, I'll make you a sporting proposition." Franco spoke in a quiet, serious manner that seemed so sincere and convincing. "If this ticket is good it's worth sixteen thousand dollars, but if it is a fake, then it is worth nothing." He paused. "I'm prepared to give you five thousand for it here and now."

"You will?" gasped Mike. "Gee, I knew you'd help us out somehow."

"Is it a deal?"

"You bet!"

Franco counted out notes to the value of five thousand, shook hands warmly with the grateful youngster, and told him to run along home. But when the boy had left he got through on the phone to Myra—he wanted to see Bud and Spike at once.

Ed could not help being amused at the drunk, who kept on making strange noises.

"You all right?" McIntyre asked.

"Sorry, old man, but I'm just practising," mumbled the drunk. "Last night, when a sour tenor was singing, I got the hiccougs and couldn't hiss, so I'm just getting up steam. Pssss!" He grinned. "How was that one?"

"Grand! You come here often?"

"Every night."

McIntyre caught sight of Mike beckoning him, and he swallowed his drink hurriedly.

"Excuse me, but I got to be getting along."

"But the show is coming on in just a minute. You can hiss with me."

"I'll try to get back." The reporter knew it was best to humour drunkards.

"You carry on for both of us."

In the lobby Mike waved the money excitedly.

"Hey, Ed—look what Mr. Franco gave me!"

"What?" The reporter could not believe his eyes.

"Five thousand dollars!"

McIntyre grabbed him and put a hand over his mouth.

"Don't ever do anything like that in a place like this," he hissed. "Put it away. Maybe I had better look after it."

"I'd like to see anybody get it away from me," cried Mike, his fists clenched.

"Let's get out of here before anybody tries," urged the reporter.

They were hurrying along the street, which was quiet and deserted, when two men—Bud and Spike—sprang out on them. If they had not been taken by surprise they might have beaten off the attack, but the two crooks started the fight by lamming them over the head with short lengths of rubber tubing. Mike did manage to land one stinging blow to an unshaven jaw before he was laid low, whilst Ed landed a wild swing that made his man grunt. The sound of a police siren sent the stick-up men scurrying for safety.

It was McIntyre who recovered first and crawled over to the boy.

"Mike—Mike, are you all right?"

The boy sat up, rubbing his head; then he remembered and dived his hand into his pocket.

"Ed!" he gasped out. "They got the money!"

"I'm sorry, kid, but I guess that's just the way Franco planned it."

"Well, go back and see Franco." Mike staggered to his feet. "I'm gonna find out!"

"And we'll take the law with us," added Ed. "I'm ringing the police."

Franco's Last Chance

YOUNG Mike stalked into the Red Domino with his jaw set. He pushed into Franco's room without any ceremony with McIntyre and two detectives close behind him. Franco had been expecting some such visit.

"Hallo, Mike! I'm glad you came back," he cried, all smiles. "I wanted to talk to you. Mike, you were right about that dirty rat, Jake. That sweep-stake ticket was a fake."

This statement completely satisfied Mike, who was somewhat stubborn where opinions were concerned. He had made up his mind that Franco was on the level, and surely this proved it.

"You knew it was when you bought it," McIntyre had other views. "That's why you sent your thugs to stage the hold-up."

"What hold-up?"

Franco looked bewildered.

"The one that just got you back your five thousand dollars," sneered the reporter.

"So you've been held up and robbed?" Franco turned to the young Irish lad. "Do you believe that, Mike?"

"No, Mr. Franco, but it did look queer. Maybe some guy saw me show the money to Ed here."

McIntyre laughed shortly and strode up to Franco's desk.

"If this wasn't a cover-up, why should you give the kid five grand for a questionable ticket?" he demanded.

"I felt sorry for Mike and his sister Gloria. I merely took a gambler's chance," smoothly answered the crook. "If it worked out, I got sixteen thousand. If I lost I was out five."

"How did you know the ticket was no good?"

"I called Dublin," Franco smiled with complete assurance. "Then I called the police."

"Check on the telephone company, will you, lieutenant?" McIntyre requested of the chief detective.

The officer nodded and took up the phone.

"This is Lieutenant Detective Gray of the Homicide Squad. I want the superintendent." A pause. "I want to know if there's been a call put in from this phone for Dublin, Ireland. Yeah, I'll hang on." Seconds later he put back the phone and looked at McIntyre. "There was—about twenty minutes ago." His eyes were stern as he faced the smirking racketeer. "Okay, Franco, we'll see if we can pick up your slippery friend Jake. Sorry to have bothered you."

"Not at all. Drop in any time."

"This doesn't mean a thing," McIntyre said when the detectives had gone.

"Do you think I framed you?"

Franco gave Mike a sad, solemn glance.

"No, I didn't Mr. Franco; it wasn't my idea."

"Okay, Mike, I don't blame you." Franco took out his pocket-book. "I'm awfully sorry about your money—take this."

"No, thanks," vigorously cried Mike. "We can't keep taking money from you! Gosh! It's my fault you're stuck for five grand already."

"Bring your sister in," Franco thankfully put the pocket-book away. "I'll put her to work if she's as good as you say she is."

"Thanks. I'm sure you're going to like her."

Franco nodded to the reporter.

"I won't object at all if you print what's in your mind in to-night's paper, McIntyre," he said in magnanimous generosity.

"Wouldn't you like the follow-up better? It'll read something like this: 'Franco sues "Tribune" for libel.'"

"Away ahead of me, aren't you?" mocked Franco.

"When I break this story, Franco, you won't be in any position to appreciate it."

"Come on, Ed—come on!"

Mike tugged impatiently at his friend's arm. In his mind Ed was a good fellow, but dead from the neck upwards.

Franco smiled when they had gone, but the smile vanished when there came that buzz and the red light. His real boss flayed him.

"You're a petty larceny crook at heart, and you'll never be anything else," said the cold, condemning voice.

"I made dough before I ever met you," snarled Franco. "For two cents, Ed—"

"No, you wouldn't, not for two cents, nor two million. Nobody ever walks out on me, Franco. If you make one more blundering move—if you do one single thing without orders from me—" The speaker paused, and then added in a whisper that was almost a hiss. "It will be just too bad!"

The Drunkard's Disguise Penetrated

EDWARD MCINTYRE parked his hat and coat in the cloak-room and walked slowly, almost reluctantly, to the entrance of the restaurant. He looked a fine figure of a man in his dress clothes. Against his will he had come to this haunt. Gloria had insisted upon going to see Franco, and she had been given a job in the cabaret as a singer. Ed felt he had to go along and see that no harm befell her.

Looking across the room, the reporter saw Gloria and her brother at a table. His fingers twitched and his brows knitted together in a scowl when Franco appeared and laid his hand on Gloria's shoulder. The reporter guessed the slimy trickster was paying some soft compliment. He was quite correct in his surmise. Somebody else was also taking a great deal of interest in Franco, and that was Myra. Franco had been to every rehearsal, and his car had taken Gloria home whenever it was wet.

McIntyre realised that he must find a table to sit down at, and grinned as two people stood up and indicated that they were leaving. Scarcely had he sat down when into the restaurant rolled the drunk. He made straight for the table.

"Well, well! If it isn't my old friend McIntyre," he said, swaying on his feet.

"Hallo!"

Ed was far from cordial in his greeting.

"Mind if I sit?" The drunk sank into a chair. "You look like you've lost your last million. How about a little drink to cheer you up?"

"Suits me. But, remember, no bisses when Miss Sanford sings," warned the young man.

"Hst!" It was a mixture of a hiss and a splutter. The drunk waved his arms. "Let's have a little attention here." A waiter appeared. "You know what I want." He peered at Ed through half-closed eyes. "What will you have?"

"I'll take the same," answered Ed, whose whole attention was on the platform because it was obvious that the band were getting ready for some act. Sure enough, Gloria was to sing.

Gloria sang divinely, and the crowded restaurant were enthusiastic. The

"It's grandpa!" he said. "I—I—I believe he's dead!"

waiter arrived with two glasses on a tray and placed the tray on the table. Ed glanced round and noticed that one glass was not as full as the other, and though it was closer to the drunk, whose name was apparently Reggie, he reached over and took it. Reggie's drink was certain to be red-hot, so he took a small sip. Then he took another sip and glanced round at Reggie, who was swaying on his feet and yelling "Encore." Finally, a head-waiter persuaded Reggie to sit down, and with an inane grin at Ed picked up the remaining glass. He tossed down the drink and then gulped as he clutched his throat.

"Was that too strong?" Ed inquired. "No. Bad liquor!" growled Reggie. "I'm going home."

The reporter noted that he walked remarkably steady. He tossed a dollar-note on to the table and went out after him.

"You're leaving early, Mr. Whitley," he heard the cloak-room attendant remark.

"Yes, not feeling too good."

Reggie Whitley rolled up the stairs of a comfortable apartment-house, fumbled in his pockets, sang a song in raucous tones, and, after much fumbling, got a key into the Yale lock. The door opened, and he staggered inside. He proceeded to lock the door and to become at once completely sober. He was studying some letters when there came a knock at his door. He swung round, eyeing the door apprehensively, and, finally, his hand in one pocket, unlocked the door. The reporter walked into the room.

"Well, well, look who's here! Come in—come right in!"

"That sarsaparilla seems to be a mighty potent drink, old man."

"Yes, potent enough for all practical purposes." Whitley waved him to a chair as he spoke. "So you have found me out, McIntyre. I don't know if it was deliberate or accidental. However, it doesn't make any difference—the result is the same."

Ed, with a wave of his hand, refused the offer of a chair.

"What's the big idea?" he demanded.

"I'm investigating the counterfeit sweepstake tickets that are flooding the country."

"You seem to know me, but I don't know you. I thought I knew most of the boys in the department. I'm crime reporter to the 'Tribune,' as I expect you know."

"Yes, and if you had recognised me, I'd have been disappointed," Reggie said with a grin. "You see, I just work up the evidence and turn it over to someone else to handle. I never appear in court—publicity would ruin my usefulness."

Ed nodded.

"Oh, I see—an undercover man."

Convinced that he had found an ally, young McIntyre accepted a drink and a cigarette.

"You must have discovered something that led you to the Red Domino."

"Suspicious—that's all," Reggie said, sipping his drink. "And I was just about ready to conclude I was wrong when you made your first appearance. I know how you news-hounds ferret out stories, and I guessed that the sweepstake racket must have led you to the Red Domino. Have you struck any leads?"

"Until to-night I thought I was up against a blank wall."

"You mean you stumbled across something?"

"It was more good luck than anything else," Ed admitted. "About a year ago I was able to help out a girl who was in a jam with the police—and she has a bit of a record. Maybe you know her—Myra George?"

"The name isn't familiar."

"I saw her to-night at Franco's."

"Does she know him?"

"Undoubtedly. She works at the club," Ed answered. "And I should imagine she's as well in with Franco as she was with some people in the restaurant this evening. I saw her smile across at him."

"This is great news!" cried Reggie excitedly. "A fling at the bright lights with Myra, and I'll soon know everything about this racket."

"A swell idea, but there's one thing wrong with it."

"What?"

Reggie looked puzzled.

"I'll do the wining and dining with her," Ed said in determined tones.

Reggie argued, but Ed got his own way. They parted the best of friends. Ed went back to the restaurant, and when Myra was left alone at a table, went across and asked her to dance. The girl seemed delighted to see him, and when later on he suggested going to a theatre one night she accepted gladly.

Jake Becomes Panicky

McINTYRE spent quite a lot of money on Myra, and tried to act as if he were crazy about her. Ed's editor had advanced the money with the warning that Ed was likely to be out on his ear if he did not bring off a scoop.

The young reporter spent a whole week taking the girl out, and he thought that it was going to be easy to get something from Myra. Gloria seemed to be always at the Red Domino. Owing to the hours she had given up her job at the "Tribune." The pay for her act was three times as much as her salary as a typist, and Franco was talking about a contract at most advantageous terms.

One night Myra allowed Ed to escort her home, and he noted that her apartment was quite luxuriously furnished. She must be well in with Franco to afford a sitting-room.

"Mind if I ask you a question?"

"Not at all."

"How long have you known Franco?"

"I met him when I was singing in a cabaret at the Red Domino," she smiled at him. "Didn't know I could warble, did you?"

"No."

"I'll sing you a number that was written especially for me."

Myra may have been pretty, but Ed thought her voice compared with Gloria's was rotten, but he had to listen and pretend to think it was the most marvellous song he had ever heard. It was some while before he could lead the conversation back to Franco.

"Why are you so interested in Franco?"

Her eyes watched him steadily.

"Well, I did you a good turn once, Myra, and now you can help me out." He tried to sound non-committal. "It's my job to chase round after stories, and my chief is trying to start a campaign about the city's night life."

"You want something on Franco?" Her voice had hardened. "I can't say I bear the man any great love, so maybe I can help you. What do you want?" The 'phone in her room rang. "Excuse me a moment."

Myra closed her bed-room door.

"Yes, Spike, he's here now. Don't make any mistakes. Two of the boys will be around in a few minutes? Okay!"

It was a minute or so before Myra came back to Ed, who was kicking his heels with impatience.

"Sorry to have left you," Myra said as she sat down on a couch beside him. "Some stupid dressmaker would bother me. Now, what is it you want to know about Franco?"

"You've been at the Red Domino some time, so I should imagine you know quite a lot," Ed answered. "Does he do anything else beside run the Red Domino?"

There came two rings at the bell, and Ed felt like sweating.

"Now, who can that be?" Myra cried. "Get rid of whoever is at the door, Ed, and I'll tell you."

Unsuspecting, McIntyre opened the door, and instantly two men leapt at him. Taken by surprise, the reporter was thrown to the floor, but he managed to get to his feet. He crashed his fist into one ruffian's face before the other thug got in a blow on the back of his head.

There was an early rehearsal the next morning at the Red Domino, and Franco, as usual, was present to listen to Gloria sing a new number.

"That was excellent, Gloria," he cried approvingly. "We'll use that number in the show to-night."

"Do you want to try it again, Mr. Franco?"

"No, Gloria, that'll do."

"Mr. Franco." A waiter appeared.

"May I see you for a moment, please?"

Franco went out of hearing.

"What is it?"

"Jake's in your office, boss."

Franco muttered a curse under his breath and hurried away to see what had brought Jake to the club.

Mike and Gloria were left alone.

"Gee, sis, you were tops," Mike told his sister. "I've been practising an act, and I want you to see it. Then you can tell me if it's good enough to show to Mr. Franco. If you think it's any good, then we might do a brother-and-sister act."

Gloria had known that her brother was tough. He was a grand little boxer and very quick with his feet. At the local gymnasium he had been quite the star pupil. Now the boy did a step-dancing act that amazed her. Not only was the dancing in good time, but he mixed his dancing with handspings, balancing, and dazing cart-wheels.

"That was good," Gloria said when he had panted for want of breath.

"You really like it?"

"I really do. Why don't you go and talk to Mr. Franco right away?"

Mike grinned.

"I'm practically there," he cried as he wriggled into his coat. "Better come with me, sis."

Franco stormed into his office and glowered at Jake.

"What do you mean by coming here?"

"They brought that reporter to the hide-out," stated Jake angrily. "I'm not going to be in on another murder."

"You're not, eh?"

"No. I'm skipping the country."

Franco eyed the cringing crook.

"Maybe you had better get out."

He went to his desk and stared intently at Jake. "But why are you so certain that McIntyre will be killed?"

Neither of them had heard the door open.

"Well, you know what happened to old man Sanford?" sneered Jake.

"Maybe you had better get out."

Franco answered. "The Sumaria sails at midnight. See that you're on board."

Franco saw Jake's hand go to his pocket, saw the man's staring eyes, and swung round in his chair. In the doorway were Gloria and young Mike.

Prisoners

MIKE had listened in horrified amazement to this callous conversation. His quick temper was roused at the manner in which this smooth-tongued rascal had gulled him.

"You double-crosser," Mike shouted. "Saying you were my friend and killing my granddad! And now you're planning to do the same to Ed."

"Close the door, Jake," rapped out Franco, and then he looked at the boy. "I'm sorry you found out, Mike."

Gloria, not quite comprehending what this all meant, was pushed into the room and the door locked behind her. She saw Jake covering them with a gun.

"What does this mean?" she demanded.

"It means that Mr. Franco is responsible for grandpa's death," cried her brother.

"I'm sorry you came in here, Gloria," Franco said in his smooth way. "I'm very fond of you—and Mike. But this makes everything a little different. Jake, tell Spike to bring the closed car to the side entrance."

"What are you going to do?" fearfully demanded the girl.

"What can I do? I'm sending you and Mike home." Franco turned his attention to Jake. "Tell Spike to hurry, and then you'd better beat it."

When alone, Franco paced his room. Though a crook, he was not all bad. To make things safe, Gloria and Mike should be taken for a ride, but the girl was so beautiful that he had not the nerve to give the order. Perhaps if he locked them up in the hide-out and waited till the money had come in for the sweep tickets he could make a get-away out of this racket, taking Gloria with him. It was certain that his plausible tongue and the fact that he had money would make this a simple matter. He had an overwhelming confidence in his own powers to attract the opposite sex.

Franco was busy making his own plans when Myra walked into his room, and the woman was in a foul temper.

"What's going on between you and this Sanford girl?"

"You're not idiot enough to believe I care anything about her, are you?" he questioned.

"She's been here about a week, and all the time you've been following her around like a dog on a leash."

"I had to play up to her after what happened to her grandfather."

"By sending her home most days in your car? I saw her go off this very afternoon."

"Myra, I'm not sending her home. I'm sending her—"

"I don't care where you're sending her," Myra stamped her foot. "But I'm walking out of here once and for all."

Franco jumped up in alarm. "Don't be so hasty, my dear," he cried. "If you'll just listen a minute—"

"Not a minute! Not half a minute! I'm through!" she stormed. "I'd hate to be in your boat. The police picked up Jake a little while ago." She paused at the door, her face twisted into a mocking grin. "Just think that over."

Franco bit his lip and fingered his chin nervously. Once more he paced his room. Perhaps it was as well Myra was getting out—she would not interfere with his plans. He must think quickly. Jake would not talk at first, but if the cops put the third degree on that yellow crook he would talk and the whole racket would be exposed. Franco knew he must get out of the district with all speed. He grabbed up the 'phone and found that it was through to the exchange—Myra had evidently gone. He dialed a number.

"Hallo, Franco speaking. When will those new tickets be ready?" He smiled to hear that they were all ready. "Fire—deliver them to me here immediately."

Little did he know that Myra had been on the point of leaving when he had made his call and that she had listened in to his conversation. She listened in and heard him make more calls.

Within an hour a great pile of sweep tickets were delivered and these Franco feverishly sorted into bundles. He was finished when a number of men were admitted to his room.

"Boys, I called you here because I've got to go to Palm Beach on business, and I want you to get started selling the books," he announced. "I may be gone for some time and I don't want my absence to keep you from making a clean-up."

"We're not likely to run into any trouble, are we?" one seller asked.

"Not at all. If there is any suspicion on the part of the police, they'll be watching me down there. That will clear the way in all the other districts." Franco turned to one man who had brought out a cheque book. "I can't use cheques—I said cash."

The sellers had to pay for their books in advance. On settling-day they were able to claim a refund for any tickets not sold. There was a large pile of notes on Franco's desk when the sellers left. He chuckled as he stared at all this wealth, but he would not have smiled if he had known that Myra was at that moment talking to the chief.

"Franco's cashing in all the tickets and planning on making a get-away. I should imagine that he would go out to the plant first—you can catch him there."

Meanwhile, Jake was breaking under a terrific grilling, and the police knew that it would not be long before the rascal talked.

The scrap developed into a rough and tumble.

In the Nick of Time

GLORIA and Mike were taken in the closed car for a long ride and they guessed the car was dodging about so that they should not know the direction taken after leaving the Red Domino. They were blindfolded and led into a building, which Mike guessed was some sort of warehouse. They were pushed into a room. The other occupant was Ed.

The three prisoners found that there were massive bars over the windows, so that escape seemed impossible. The door was too strong to force, and moreover Spike and two other gangsters were acting guard in the outside room.—

It was young Mike who thought out a daring idea.

"Ed, come and give me a boost up here," Mike called out.

"What's the idea?" Ed demanded.

"See this bit of panelling where it ends and see that picture rail?" whispered Mike. "Well, I can stand on one and cling to the rail if you give me a boost up. Then you hammer on the door and say you want a drink of water. Tell them anything, but get them in here."

"I get it," Ed nodded, and gave the youngster a lift up. "But they'll see you."

"The door will open and hide me. Besides, these mugs won't suspect anything—they're too dumb!"

Ed hammered on the door.

"Hey, you!" he shouted hoarsely.

"How about a drink of water?"

"Dry up," came a hoarse answer.

"I want a drink!" Ed renewed his hammering. "I've got to have some water. Miss Sanford's fainted."

"All right. I'll give you some water," came the reply.

One of the other toughs decided that it would be best to go with Spike just in case the prisoners tried anything. He unlocked the door and Spike walked in carrying a jug. The other thug followed, keeping Ed covered with a gun.

"Here, what's the game?" demanded Spike, seeing Gloria near the window. "If you think you can play tricks you're mistaken."

Very quietly Mike pushed the door so that it did not get between him and the gunman, then the boy jumped on the latter's back and brought him crashing to the ground. Spike turned to see what was happening, and Ed hit him squarely on the point. The scrap developed into a rough and tumble.

The third gangster heard the commotion and rushed to the rescue. Mike was on his feet and crouching by the door. As it burst open, his hand shot out and gripped the man's wrist. A twist and a gun went clattering to the floor.

The expression on Mike's face was one of savage delight as he banged his fist into the man's face. The first gunman got to his feet, saw that Spike was holding his own with Ed and gripped Mike by the shoulders. The three went down in a heap.

Spike was hurled backwards by another great blow and sprawled on the floor. He tried to reach out for a fallen gun, but Ed kicked it into a corner. Spike staggered up and stopped another punch that put him out for the count.

Meantime, Mike was getting a battering between the two crooks, but he was landing out punishment in spite of the uneven odds. Ed dragged one gunman away, held him with one hand and socked him. That was two of them out. The third dived for the gun that had been wrenched from his hand, but Mike took a running dive at the man and down he came with a crash.

When Franco entered the building he heard sounds of fighting, and drawing his gun softly tiptoed up the wooden stairs.

"Give me the gun," Ed ordered as Mike picked up the weapon. "See if you can find something to tie these rats up with."

"All right," Mike answered, and tossed Ed the gun.

Ed McIntyre watched the battered crooks closely whilst Mike prowled round the room in search of something to use to tie up their prisoners; finding nothing he went out of the room and began to explore. He found a spiral staircase that went down into the basement. Franco came into the guard-room about a minute after Mike went down the spiral staircase.

"Keep quite still," Ed was keeping a watchful eye on the gangsters. "You can stand up, but don't try anything as I shan't hesitate to shoot."

Spike and one man got to their feet, but the third was likely to stay out for a long while.

"Nice party we're having," Ed said with a mocking grin.

"Yes, isn't it?" drawled a voice behind him. "Drop that gun! Crude of you not to invite me. I hope my presence is not an intrusion. I hate to embarrass anybody, especially a young lady."

Never suspecting any danger, McIntyre had stood with his back to the half-open door. Franco had been able to slip into the room unobserved. Nothing for the reporter to do but drop the gun.

But the drawing voice of Franco had been overheard by the returning Mike. There was a fanlight over the door and by standing on a chair he could see through the dirty glass. Franco was standing within a yard of the door with the gun in his right hand and his elbow bent. Mike got down, quietly turned the handle and suddenly flung wide the door, which caught Franco a violent blow on the funny bone. Scarcely had the howl of agony left his lips than he got a violent blow in his stomach from a hard fist. He reeled back and that gave Mike time to grab up his gun.

"Get back there, all of you," Mike menaced Franco and the two gangsters. "I'm kinda itching to try out this gat on somebody." His keen eyes saw the bulging portfolio that Franco had been carrying. "Hold the gun, Ed, whilst I see what's in this." He tossed the gun to the reporter. "I bet my five thousand is in here."

"Sure it is and plenty more." Franco gave a resigned shrug of his shoulders. "Help yourself."

"No, thanks, Mr. Franco," muttered Mike, after glancing inside the case and noting that it was bulging with money. He tossed it carelessly into a chair. "Say, Ed, what d'you think I found down in the basement? A printing press and about a million of those phoney sweepstake tickets."

"That settles everything," Ed answered. "Mike, I guess it would be wise if you took Franco's car—or any car you can find—and go after the police."

"I think Gloria had better go alone," decided Mike. "You might need some help."

Up the spiral staircase came Reggie Whitley. He made no attempt to deaden his footsteps. Boldly he walked into the room and grinned as McIntyre covered him with a gun.

"Well, well, this is a pleasant surprise." Reggie surveyed the scene with an amused grin.

"Hallo, Whitley." The reporter lowered his gun point. "Mike, meet

Mr. Whitley. He's a special investigator on the case."

"You were the drunk," Mike said in admiring tones. "Corks, and I thought you were genuine."

If Ed and Mike had taken more notice of Franco they might have got a warning from the look of terror on his shifty face.

"Well, the Press seems to have wou again. Like me to take charge?" mildly suggested Reggie. "Just as you like, of course."

"Sure, take over these prisoners, Whitley." Ed handed over the gun. "I want to get on to my paper and let them have the story. Maybe I should call the police?"

"No." Reggie's voice had changed suddenly. The gun was pointing at the reporter. "This story is one your paper is never going to print, McIntyre."

"What do you mean?"

"That you got me wrong," sneered Reggie, and then his eyes narrowed to mere slits as he stared at the terror-stricken Franco. "So you thought you would run out on me, you rat! You know what happens to double-crossers?"

The gun roared, and Gloria gave a scream of horror as an expression of agony twisted Franco's face. His hands clasped his stomach and then with an awful groan he dropped in a heap, squirmed for a moment or so and then was still.

Men stealthily approaching the disused warehouse heard that shot. Lieutenant-detective Gray gave the signal to his men to hurry.

Whitley laughed as he stared down at the dead man, and then his gun swung round to cover the shrinking girl.

"Look here, Whitley." Ed was desperate with fear for the girl he loved. "These kids had nothing to do with this. If they promise to keep their mouths shut, will you let them go?"

"There's only one kind of people that never talk," was the ominous reply of the killer. "I'm taking no chances."

Whitley's finger tightened round the trigger, but before he could carry out his fell purpose a voice rang out from the doorway.

"Drop that gun!"

Whitley swung round, saw the police at the door and swung up the gun, but he fired a split second too late. The cop had shot first. The bullet smashed the arch crook's shoulder. A moment later he was being handled none too gently by the lieutenant's men.

"In the nick of time," gasped Ed. "That's the man you're after." He pointed to Whitley. "He's the ringleader."

"Put the handcuffs on the whole bunch," the officer ordered. "And take 'em in."

"You put up a great fight, Ed," Gloria said as the three went down to a waiting car.

"Mike did most of the fighting," Ed answered, with one arm round her waist. "But you deserve all the credit."

"Nothing more than Mike."

"Let's forget it," suggested the young hero. "We'll just keep it in the family."

"Haven't I anything to say about this?" Gloria argued.

"Not a thing!" chuckled Mike. "I'm the head of this family."

"Oh, no you aren't." Ed answered with a possessive glance at the smiling, happy girl.

"Well, I was," murmured Mike, and winked slyly and approvingly at his brother-in-law to be.

(By permission of Pathé Pictures, Ltd., starring Frankle Darro as Mike, Kane Richmond as Ed, and Phyllis Fraser as Gloria.)

The Concluding Chapters of:—

EPISODE 13—

“The Rustlers’ Round-up”

The Hunters Snared

KENTUCKY WADE and his bronc hit the surface of the river, vanished in a terrific smother of spray that shot into the air with an explosive effect reminiscent of the bursting of a bombshell, then came into view again as the cascade raised by their plunge was pattering in a myriad drops on the bosom of the torrent.

Kentucky had parted company with the saddle, but was clinging to the off stirrup, and he hung on as his pony started to swim for the far bank. Before man and beast were halfway across the river, however, the blatter of gunfire was resounding in their ears, and leaden slugs were smacking into the water all around them.

Looking back at the cliff-top from which he and his mount had dived, Kentucky saw the figures of the Indians and the half-breed Buckskin silhouetted against the blue skyline. They were blazing viciously at the ex-deputy, but their marksmanship was poor, and it was without so much as a scratch that the fugitive and his horse gained the opposite bank of the Gila River.

A few seconds later Kentucky and the palomino were under cover of a belt of thickets that ranged along the edge of the water, and from the shelter of those thickets the one-time officer of the law focused his attention on his enemies again.

They had ceased fire and seemed to be holding a pow-wow, and although they gazed frequently across the river, it was clear that none of them possessed the courage to imitate Kentucky's reckless example and plunge from the summit of the bluffs.

Apparently deciding to admit themselves baffled, they at last wheeled round and cantered away, and from his vantage-point Kentucky saw Buckskin separate himself from the troop of Indians, striking off in the direction of Brimstone City, while the red men made tracks for their native village.

As for Kentucky, he now proceeded to follow the river downstream, seeking a means of returning to the other side of it. But he had been riding for an hour and a half before the heeling and insurmountable heights that guarded it on the west finally levelled out into a stretch of shallow pastureland.

There was a ford in this reach of the river, too, and at the urge of its master's heels the palomino splashed its way to the far bank. Then, as it plodded on to dry ground, Kentucky turned its head northward and set out for Brimstone.

He rode at a fast clip, and another hour or so must have elapsed when suddenly he espied a lone horseman issuing from a cleft in a bunch of low foothills ahead of him—a horseman whom he immediately identified as Buckskin, and who was no doubt returning from a brief visit to town.

Recognition was mutual, and without the support of his Indian allies Buckskin speedily betrayed the fact that there was a streak of cowardice in him, for he sawed abruptly on the reins of his mustang and made as if to turn tail.

Before he could resort to flight, however, Kentucky swung right-about and galloped off himself—not because he was scared of the half-breed, but because he had done some pretty fast thinking in the moment of clapping eyes on the man.

He wanted to capture Buckskin, and to take him alive, in the hope of forcing him to reveal the name of the scoundrel who was the secret leader of that organisation which had terrorised Paradise Valley. But he knew that in its “fagged” condition his palomino was not likely to overhaul the half-breed's mustang in a chase, and therefore he had hit upon the notion of enticing Buckskin to play the rôle of pursuer and luring him into a trap.

Buckskin was fooled by the ruse. Recovering his nerve as he saw Kentucky spurring away in apparent alarm, he promptly kicked his heels into his pony's flanks and charged after the ex-deputy, and although a fair distance separated him from his quarry he presently drew his gun and pumped lead at the fugitive.

Not one of the shots discharged by Buckskin came anywhere near Kentucky, but the half-breed had an over-rated opinion of his skill with firearms, and consequently he did not doubt that he had scored a hit when the white man pitched sideways from his horse all at once.

Kentucky was riding at the time over an expanse of ground that was littered with big rocks, and he rolled out of view amongst the boulders. Then, as he heard Buckskin approaching to the tune of drumming hoofs, he scrambled up and weaved his way through the clustering rocks until he was some twenty or thirty paces from the scene of his fall.

He was unseated, of course, and he was none the worse for the tumble he had purposely taken, for he knew how to throw himself to the ground from a galloping bronc without sustaining injury.

Into the bargain he was clutching a lariat which he had removed from his saddle-peg an instant before he had left his horse's back, and, thus equipped, he waited until Buckskin reached the spot where he, Kentucky, had dropped from his mount.

The half-breed drew rein, and failing to desery the body of his foe, started to ride through the rocks in a puzzled fashion; and he was still searching for Kentucky when a lasso snaked towards him as if from nowhere, the noose falling neatly over his head and shoulders.

That nose was dragged taut as it encircled him, and, his arms pinned to his sides, Buckskin was wrenched out of the saddle and thudded heavily to the ground—so heavily, indeed, that several seconds elapsed ere he was able to collect his wits.

By the time the half-breed had regained his feet Kentucky was beside him, and, held powerless by the coil of rope, the swarthy captive turned a scared face towards the white man as the latter gripped him by the shoulder.

"I wasn't sure that a smart man like you would fall for so old a trick, Buckskin," Kentucky said tersely. "But now I've got you where I want you I reckon you're going to do some talking."

A hint of defiance appeared on the half-breed's evil countenance.

"You won't get notin' outa me, Wade," he panted.

"No?" Kentucky drawled. "We'll see about that later. But first I'm takin' you to a safe place, and I reckon none could be safer than that hide-out you and your friends once used. We aren't so very far from it, Buckskin, and it's the last place any of your outfit would be liable to drop in on."

He was referring to the cavern in which Larry Munro had formerly been imprisoned, and not long afterwards he was conveying Buckskin through the tumbling waterfall that screened it. Then, gaining that same compartment wherein Larry had been confined, he lashed the half-breed securely to a chair and took every precaution to assure himself that there was no chance of the rogue escaping.

Having satisfied himself on that score, he left Buckskin to his own bitter thoughts and made tracks for Brimstone, and, reaching the township as the sun was going down in the west, he was entering the main street at a trot when he saw Larry Munro come out of the Silver Dollar saloon.

He hailed the owner of the Circle D and cantered up to him. Then, after dismounting and tethering his bronc to the Silver Dollar's hitch-rail, he laid a hand on his friend's shoulder.

"I'm glad you haven't left town, Larry," he declared. "I've got plenty to tell you, and it's in connection with the gang that's been trying to fasten a strangle-hold on Paradise Valley."

Larry Munro eyed him ruefully.

"I'm through with Paradise Valley and its troubles, Kentucky," he said. "I've sold the Circle D, and Driscoll's got the deed to the outfit."

"Driscoll did have the deed to the Circle D," was the quiet rejoinder, "but I've got it now, pardner, and I'm handin' it back to you."

He produced the document in question, and turning it over to Larry, he launched into an account of the incidents that had led up to Tobias Driscoll's death and the ultimate capture of Buckskin.

"As to selling your ranch, Larry," he finished, "you were tricked into that transaction, as you can see now—and before he died Driscoll admitted it so he could go out with a clean slate. Consequently, I reckon you can tear up that deed and still call the Circle D your own."

"But that isn't all, Larry," he added. "Driscoll also told me that he'd discovered the main vein of your platinum strike wasn't in Apache Gulch at all, but in the north-east corner of your range—which is something you'd better check up on when you've got the time to do it."

There was a short silence, during which Larry Munro seemed at a loss for words that would express his emotions, though the look on his face was eloquent of the gratitude he felt for all that Kentucky had done. Then the latter spoke again.

December 25th, 1937.

"By the way, Larry," he asked, "have you seen Judge Lawrence around anywhere?"

The other nodded towards the saloon. "He's in there, along with the sheriff," he rejoined.

Without further discussion Kentucky mounted the steps of the Silver Dollar and thrust his way through the swing-doors of the bar-room, and Larry following him, the two friends had hardly entered the premises when a tall man accosted them.

He was Matt Keeler, proprietor and editor of the "Brimstone News," and he came forward and greeted Kentucky heartily.

"Hallo, Wade," he said. "How are you? Would you and Larry care to join me in a drink?"

"Not now, thanks," Kentucky refused. "I've got to talk to Judge Lawrence and the sheriff."

A flicker of something more than mere interest revealed itself in Keeler's eyes.

"Say, has anything happened that might make news for the paper?" he asked.

"Maybe," was the non-committal reply. "I'll let you know later, Mr. Keeler."

Already Kentucky had discerned Judge Lawrence and the sheriff seated in one of a row of alcoves, and leaving Keeler, he strode across to the two representatives of the law, with Larry Munro at his heels. Then, when he and his friend had joined the sheriff and the judge, he drew a pair of heavy curtains that enabled him to render the alcove more private.

"Gentlemen," he began, "I'm sorry to bust in on your conversation, but I've got a little job to do and I need your help to make it legal."

"Yes?" Judge Lawrence queried. "What kind of a job?"

"I've got that fellow Buckskin and I'm holding him a prisoner out in the hills," Kentucky explained. "I want to charge him with complicity in the killing of Tobe Driscoll—aside from which I think we might be able to grill a lot of information out of him concerning the gang that's been terrorising this section."

Both the judge and the sheriff were sitting bolt upright in their chairs now.

"What's that you say?" the sheriff jerked. "Tobe Driscoll's dead and Buckskin had a hand in his murder? Then why the heck haven't you brought that half-breed into town?"

"Because I doubt if he'd ever reach court," Kentucky returned. "I've just told you I believe we can get him to spill plenty of information, but the men he's liable to betray would make sure he didn't talk—even if they had to shoot him while he was in gaol."

He went on to relate the narrative he had already detailed to Larry Munro. Then he put forward a proposition he had in mind.

"My idea is for you, Judge Lawrence, to try Buckskin right where I'm holding him," he said, "and give him the chance of turning State's evidence. Does that idea meet with your approval?"

"Where have you got him?" the judge asked.

"In a cave back of a waterfall on Driscoll's range. Larry here was a prisoner in that cave himself, after he was ransomed from the Indians by that gang of kidnapers."

Old man Lawrence frowned, and then shook his head.

"No," he murmured. "I'm afraid your notion is a bit too irregular, Wade. But I'll tell you what we could do. The sheriff here could quietly escort Buckskin to Yuma, and he could be brought to a speedy trial in the courthouse there—before anybody could 'get' at him."

"Judge," Kentucky declared, "that's a good idea—"

He stopped abruptly. His attention had been focused on Lawrence, but suddenly, out of the corner of his eye, he had detected a slight fluttering of the curtains that screened the alcove from the main bar-room, and suddenly he knew that someone had been playing the rôle of eavesdropper.

And then, through the narrow chink between the fringes of the two wavering curtains, he saw a familiar figure turning sharply away to head for the swing-doors that opened on to the street—a tall, lean, dark-clad figure which there was no mistaking—the figure of Matthew Keeler!

The Fight at the Cave

NEITHER Larry Munro, Judge Lawrence nor the sheriff had observed Keeler, but they were aware of the shrewd expression that dawned on Kentucky Wade's handsome features, and they looked at him inquiringly.

"What's up, Wade?" the sheriff demanded.

Kentucky did not answer him at once. The suspicion had arisen in his mind that Keeler had some significantly good reason for having listened-in to their conversation, but on an after-thought he recalled that the man might have been merely exercising his instincts as a news-hound.

He realised that in any case he could not accuse Keeler of eavesdropping with any ulterior motive, and decided it would be best to make no mention of what he had seen, though at the same time he resolved to return to Buckskin's place of captivity at the earliest possible moment.

"I asked you if anything was wrong, Wade," the sheriff was persisting.

"Oh, no," Kentucky rejoined. "No. I—er—I just thought of something. I—well, as a matter of fact, I just remembered we've got four other prisoners over at the Circle D ranch. They haven't talked, and I figure they're not so likely to come across with any information as Buckskin, whose neck is in danger on account of what happened to Driscoll. But just the same, we might as well take them to Yuma as well."

Larry Munro interposed a remark.

"I'll attend to those four men," he said. "I'll high-tail it to the ranch and get the boys to bring them along to the cave behind the waterfall. We'll meet you and the sheriff there, Kentucky."

"And I'll meet you all in Yuma," Judge Lawrence cut in.

Larry, Kentucky and the sheriff rose to their feet and made their way from the saloon. Then, mounting their horses, they galloped off down the main street and separated as they swung out of town, Larry riding across the open country in the direction of his ranch, the other two men heading for the hills.

It was night when the sheriff and Kentucky reached their destination, and the waters of the cascade that screened the entrance of the cave were glistening under the rays of a mellow moon as the pair of them slid from their saddles and ducked into the cunning hide-away.

Buckskin's mustang was standing, patiently in the cave-mouth behind the tumbling cataract, just as Kentucky had left the animal; and Buckskin himself was still tied securely to the chair in the rock-walled apartment where he had been confined.

The sheriff and Kentucky moved to the half-breed's side, and the younger of the two newcomers addressed the captive.

"Buckskin," he said, "the sheriff here has decided to take you to Yuma, and you're going to be tried there. What's more, I'm going to testify that you had a hand in the murder of Tobo Driscoll."

The half-breed eyed him truculently. "It'll be your word against mine," he muttered. "I ain't admittin' to anything."

"I reckon my word will carry more weight than yours, Buckskin—especially when Larry Munro gets up in the witness chair and identifies you as one of the men concerned in his kidnaping."

Kentucky paused, and then leaned closer to him.

"That isn't all, Buckskin," he added. "Driscoll wasn't able to say much before he died, but I found some papers on him, and I took the opportunity of running through them after I got away from you and the Indians. There wasn't anything in them to tell me who is the real brain behind the organisation you belong to, but you and Claggett and one or two others were mentioned in a way that don't leave much doubt as to the kind of activities you've been engaged in."

The half-breed looked uneasy, but volunteered no response.

"Buckskin, you're in a spot," Kentucky said to him deliberately, "and when you stand your trial in Yuma it might be to your advantage to make a clean breast of everything—and to expose the man you've been working for."

Still the prisoner made no reply, and by and by the sheriff spoke.

"Let's get this feller out of here, Wade," he suggested, "so we can be ready to hit the breeze as soon as Munro and his men show up with them other four hombres."

Kentucky nodded, and Buckskin was released from the chair. But his captors took the precaution of pinioning his arms with the rope which had bound him to that crude article of furniture, and, unresisting, the half-breed was conducted towards the mouth of the cave.

Here Kentucky took charge of the prisoner's mustang, and, followed by Buckskin and the representative of the law, he led the pony out through the cataract and walked it across to a group of rocks beside which his own brone and the sheriff's were standing.

There was nothing to do now but await the arrival of Larry's party and the gangsters who had been held in custody at the Circle D outfit, and about half an hour had elapsed when suddenly Kentucky's sharp ears detected the sound of approaching hoof-beats.

"I can hear a bunch of horsemen comin' this way now," he said to the sheriff. "It must be Larry Munro and his crowd."

Brimstone's guardian of the peace tilted his head to one side in an attentive attitude. Then all at once a frown gathered upon his brow.

"It's a bunch o' horsemen all right," he conceded, "but they ain't comin' from the direction of the Circle D ranch. They're bearin' down from the north."

Kentucky had already realised that himself, and he gripped the sheriff by the arm.

"Red Hatcher's Indian encampment lies to the north," he jerked. "Maybe it's some of his warriors that are headed this way. We'd better get out of sight. Quick, hustle Buckskin into the rocks—I'll take care of the horses."

But he had hardly spoken those words when the horsemen whose approach had been audible topped a ridge a short distance away, and he saw that although the majority of them were Indians, there were several white men among them.

He recognised Steve Claggett, Braden the storekeeper, and one or two others whom he had associated in his mind with Buckskin, and it was instantly made clear to him that they and their Indian allies had not put in an appearance in the vicinity of the waterfall by mere coincidence. For on espying Kentucky and his companions they immediately opened fire on them.

Hot lead whistled around Kentucky as he was in the act of gathering up the reins of the horses, and, frightened by the ringing echoes of the gun-blasts on the ridge, the brones tore loose from his grip and swerved off towards the river. At the same time Kentucky heard a sharp cry of pain near by, and, turning, he saw Buckskin crumpling to the ground.

A bullet, intended no doubt for the sheriff, had missed the latter by a hair's breadth and drilled the half-breed, who lay where he had fallen and uttered never a sound when Brimstone's representative of the law stooped to drag him into the shelter of the rocks.

Kentucky joined the sheriff, and together they hauled the wounded man under cover. Then, crouching amid the boulders themselves, they plucked out their six-guns and took aim at their assailants.

The mixed troop of Indians and white men were starting down the slope of the ridge now in a body, but, blazing at them determinedly, Kentucky and the sheriff unhorsed four of them ere the band gained the foot of the declivity, and in spite of their superiority in numbers, the attackers threw themselves from their ponies and burrowed down in a tract of scrub.

By the time the half-breed had regained his feet Kentucky was beside him, and, held powerless by the coil of rope, the swarthy captive turned a scared face towards the white man as the latter gripped him by the shoulder.

From the thick of that scrub they began to enfilade the rocks where the sheriff and Kentucky had gone to cover, Claggett and the other renegades using their six-guns, the Redmen using the rifles that Bradeu had traded to them from time to time.

Crouching amongst the big stones that offered them protection, Buckskin's two captors returned the fire of the enemy in resolute fashion. As for their half-breed prisoner, he remained in an inert posture behind them—oblivious, it seemed, of the shots that were whining about the rocky covert or chipping fragments of granite from the clustering boulders.

Presently the gunplay died down for a spell, and during that lull Kentucky spoke to the sheriff in a low voice.

"Those outlaws and their Indian allies knew we were here," he said. "They were tipped off to get us."

The sheriff nodded.

"I kinda figured that myself," he muttered, "from the way they began to sling lead at us the minute they came over the ridge. But who could've put them wise? You didn't tell anybody but me an' Judge Lawrence and Larry Munro that you were holdin' Buckskin here, did you?"

"No, but I've got a good idea who gave us away," Kentucky answered, "and if we ever get out of this jam I'm going to have a word with the hombre in question."

His companion bit his lip.

"If we ever get out of this jam," he retorted grimly. "But I doubt whether we will, son. The odds against us are mighty heavy, and if those rats get close enough to jump us it will be our finish."

But the outlaws and savages had no intention of making a direct onset upon the vantage-point occupied by Kentucky Wade and Brimstone's sheriff. Knowing as they did that such an onset must triumph by sheer weight of numbers, they were equally well aware that the two defenders might inflict heavy casualties on them before being overwhelmed, and Kentucky had made no mistake when he had cast doubts upon their courage.

Instead, the gangsters and their allies elected to employ a strategy which would entail less risk to themselves, even though it was bound to prolong the affair.

The council of war having been brought to a conclusion, the Indians stayed where they were and proceeded to resume hostilities, discharging fusillade after fusillade at the rocks which sheltered Kentucky and his comrade. Meanwhile Steve Claggett and his cronies commenced to sneak off to the left, probably hoping that the Navajo braves would keep the two defenders so busy that their own stealthy movements would escape notice.

But if the renegade white men did nurse any such hope, it was not fulfilled. For Kentucky and the sheriff were quick to perceive their game.

"The Indians are still in the scrub," the former ejaculated suddenly, "but Claggett and his side-kicks are worming their way out of it. They're going to circle round and try to take us from behind."

The sheriff gritted his teeth.

"I'll tend to them," he said. "You trade lead with them red devils, Wade. I'll keep my eye on Claggett and his party."

Kentucky concentrated his attention on the scrub, and, defiant of the bullets that zipped viciously around his head, he fired at the flashes of the Indians' rifles. In the meantime the sheriff watched the figures of Claggett and the other renegades as they continued to crawl to the left, and he was still following them with his eyes when they changed their course and began to carry out a flanking movement that would fetch them to the rear of the group of boulders.

The sheriff made no attempt to pick them off yet, but bided his time, and, believing that they were unobserved, the gangsters eventually reached a point about a hundred yards south of the rocks. Then, rising to their feet, they started to pad cautiously towards those rocks, confident that within the next minute or so they would be emptying their revolvers into the backs of the two men ensconced there.

Their confidence was swiftly dispelled, for, having straightened up, they had taken no more than half a dozen steps when the sheriff's forty-five roared a challenge to their advance.

One of them was hit, and, screaming with pain, clapped a hand to his right knee-cap and pitched to the dust, where he lay grovelling. The others, scattering in alarm, sought safety in the lee of a few humps that rose like beehives out of the ground, and from behind these they opened fire.

Amidst the shelter of the rocks the sheriff spoke to Kentucky Wade tersely.

"I kinda surprised Claggett an' his party," he stated with satisfaction. "Right now they're eatin' dirt. How you makin' 'em out with them Injuns, son?"

"I think I've knocked off two of 'em," Kentucky returned. "Sheriff, if we can only hold out until Larry Munro gets here—"

And then he stopped, for he was interrupted by a hoarse cry that broke from the older man's lips, and, twisting round, he saw the veteran officer of the law fall back.

In an instant he was close beside the sheriff, and as he bent over him he perceived a stain of blood spreading over his shoulder.

"You'll—you'll have to hold out alone, Wade," the old fellow groaned, wincing. "They've plugged me—an' my arm feels like it's paralysed—my gun arm, too."

Kentucky took a firmer grip on his revolver and directed a glance southward through the rocks. As he did so he saw Claggett and his accomplices issuing into view and moving forward at the double. They were obviously aware that one of the defenders had been hit, and had summoned up enough courage to stage a headlong onslaught. Moreover, they were shouting to their Indian allies to close in from the north.

Kentucky braced himself. He expected no mercy from his foes; was convinced that both he and the sheriff would receive short shrift at their hands. But he made up his mind to give a good account of himself ere he was laid low, and he resolved there and then that Steve Claggett at least would precede him into eternity.

Yet, even as he was slinging out the hulking figure of Claggett and drawing a bead on the man, there was a startling outburst of gunplay from an unexpected quarter, and, wheeling confusedly, he saw a posse of horsemen sweeping through a cleft in the foothills to the west.

It was a posse consisting of Larry Munro and his ranch-hands, and riding stirrup to stirrup with the Circle D boys were Trigger Benton, Mike Morales and Dnde Hauford.

To the tune of bellowing Colts and pounding hoofs they came on in break-neck style, and at sight of them the Navajo braves who had risen from the scrub took to their heels and scuttled for their mustangs. And in the space of a few seconds the Indians were fleeing over the ridge where they had first appeared.

There was no escape for Claggett and his confederates, however. They had left their mounts in the scrub, and before they could circle back to them the men from the Munro ranch had intercepted them, forcing them to surrender at the points of their guns, then deftly snaring the rogues with lariats and marching them over to the cluster of rocks where Kentucky stood waiting.

"You just about got here in time, Larry," Kentucky greeted, as the rancher joined him with the rest of his party and the gangsters who had been taken prisoner. "But where are the four outlaws you were to bring along from the Circle D?"

"They're on the other side of the foothills there," was the reply. "I left 'em in charge of a couple of the boys when we heard the shootin'. The rest of us came on lickety-split. But you ain't alone, are you? What's happened to the sheriff—an' Buckskin?"

"Buckskin's got a bad case of lead poisonin'," Kentucky stated. "The sheriff has been drilled, too. Nothing serious, though. Just through the shoulder."

"Through the shoulder, eh?" grunted Larry. "Will he be able to make the trip to Yuma?"

A queer look dawned on Kentucky Wade's features.

"He won't have to make that trip to Yuma now," he said slowly. "We've got the gang, and I can give you the name of the man behind 'em. He's—Matt Keeler, Larry."

"Matt Keeler!"

Kentucky inclined his head.

"Yep, Brimstone's highly respected newspaper owner," he announced.

"What makes you so sure Matt Keeler is in on this, Kentucky?" Trigger Benton inquired.

"He was listening-in to my conversation with Larry and Judge Lawrence and the sheriff earlier this evening. I thought at the time he might just be snoopin' on account of that paper he runs. But now I figure different, and if the sheriff will let me deputise for him I aim to take care of Matt Keeler. Meantime you fellows can ride hard on the prisoners and fetch 'em into town."

Unmasked

THE hands of the clock above the long bar of the Silver Dollar were pointing to the hour of ten when Kentucky Wade entered the saloon.

There were only one or two customers on the premises, but Matthew Keeler was there, for it was now common knowledge in Brimstone that he had acquired the establishment on the death of its former proprietor, Doe Hardy.

Matt Keeler had his back to the bar, and he had been watching the swing-doors of the saloon expectantly, so that he perceived Kentucky the moment the latter crossed the threshold. But if the younger man's arrival caused him any surprise he did not betray the fact, and greeted the newcomer with his characteristic blandness of demeanour.

"Hallo, Wade!" he said. "What are you having?"

He accompanied the words with an inviting gesture—a movement of his hand towards the bar—but Kentucky ignored that gesture and looked him straight in the face.

"I'm having a show-down with you, Keeler," he announced.

A slight change came over the other's cadaverous features, a fleeting look of awareness that was swiftly succeeded by an expression of assumed perplexity.

"A show-down?" he echoed. "I don't think I understand you, Wade."

"You understand all right!" Kentucky bit out. "Keeler, I'm naming you as the head of the outlaw gang that's been terrorising Paradise Valley for more than a year."

There was a dead silence. Catching what had been said, the other occupants of the bar-room suddenly became mute and awestruck. Then Kentucky spoke again.

"You sent word to your men—probably via Braden—that the sheriff and I were going to take Buckskin to Yuma and see if we could make him talk. You told them to get Buckskin away from us."

Keeler found his voice.

"Wade, I don't know what this is all about."

"Don't bluff, Keeler," the younger man cut in. "When Larry Mumro and the sheriff and Judge Lawrence and I were talking privately in that alcove over there this evening, you were spying on us. You needn't deny it. I caught a flash of you turning away from the curtains."

Matt Keeler laughed easily.

"Oh, well, I'm in the newspaper profession, Wade, you know. When I scent a story—"

Again Kentucky broke in on him.

"You didn't wait to hear the end of the story," he said. "That's where you made your mistake. If you'd listened a little while longer you might have warned your men to make a quick job of dealing with the sheriff and me—before Larry Mumro and the Circle D boys showed up. As it is, we've got your whole gang hog-tied, and I reckon one or another of those hombies is liable to break down under a third-degree grilling."

Keeler's face had tightened, and he had clenched his hands involuntarily.

"Meanwhile I'm arresting you as a suspect," Kentucky went on quietly.

"You're arresting me!" Keeler's voice rose in sudden wrath. "Since when were you made sheriff of this county?"

"I'm not the sheriff, Keeler, but he's given me leave to deputise for him, and you're stepping across to the gal with me. Or do I have to use force?"

The owner of the "Brimstone News" answered those last words with a swift upward jerk of his hand—a hand that darted between the lapels of his frock-coat and closed on the butt of a revolver that was strapped to his chest. Yet even as he whipped the gun from its concealed holster the fist of Kentucky Wade crashed home against his jaw.

The punch travelled from somewhere in the region of Kentucky's hips, and all his weight and strength were behind it. Back went Keeler's head, and, tottering, he let his six-shooter drop to the floor and reeled against the bar. Then his knees folded beneath him, and all at once he crumpled in a heap.

Kentucky moved towards him and stooped to clutch him by the collar of his coat.

He had pulled him halfway across the bar-room when there was a clatter of hoofs outside the saloon, and immediately afterwards the long, lean form of Trigger Benton thrust his way into the Silver Dollar, halting abruptly as he saw Kentucky Wade and his captive, then smiling a twisted smile.

"So you got him, pardner, huh?" Trigger drawled. "Well, your guess

There's STILL TIME to get these grand Xmas Gift Books!

The CHAMPION Annual

A book that interests the modern schoolboy between the ages of eleven and sixteen. Fully illustrated, including four coloured plates. 6/-

The Boys Book of MECHANICS and EXPERIMENT

A magnificently illustrated book dealing with all kinds of mechanical devices and machinery. It includes many simple experiments and gives particulars of how to make inexpensive working models. 6/-

On sale at all Newsagents and Booksellers hit the target fair an' square. I pushed on ahead of the others to let you know Keeler was our man all right, Kentucky."

"One of his side-kicks squealed on him?"

Trigger nodded. There was an expression of keen satisfaction on his leathery face.

"Yeah," he declared. "That guy they call Braden. He cracked soon after you left us, Kentucky—come out with a full confession. Cattle-rustin', gun-runnin' to the Injuns, the murder of Doc Hardy—them's just three o' the counts that Matt Keeler will stand trial for, and I guess they're enough to hang him."

Justice had been done, and Paradise Valley was no longer a hotbed of crime. Peace and prosperity had come to the section—especially as Red Hatchet, head chief of the Indians, had realised nothing was to be gained by waging war on a well-organised community which was no longer undermined by lawless elements.

A month or two after sentence had been passed on Keeler and his associates, and shortly after Larry Mumro had received a fabulous sum for the mineral rights on his property, three horsemen might have been seen preparing to take their leave of the Circle D Ranch.

They were Kentucky Wade, Mike Morales and Trigger Benton, and, as they climbed astride their broncs, Larry Mumro moved close to them.

"I sure hate to see you fellows hitting the trail," he said to them regretfully. "I was kinda hopin' you'd settle down in this part o' the country. You know, buy up some land hereabouts with that dough I made you take when I sold the mineral rights. Come to that, you could even make your home right here at the Circle D—if you didn't feel like rummin' a ranch of your own."

"You're a trier, Larry," Kentucky observed. "Even when we're on the point of makin' tracks, you still figure there's a chance of gettin' as to change our minds."

"Well, I managed to persuade Dude to stay, didn't I?" Larry countered.

Kentucky glanced in the direction of the ranch-house veranda, where, fingers strumming on his guitar, Dude Hanford was singing a cow-camp ballad to lovely Lucy Mumro.

"Don't kid yourself, Larry," Kentucky said. "You didn't have anything to do with persuadin' Dude to stay. Maybe if you had three more sisters as pretty as Lucy—well, maybe Trig and Mike and I wouldn't be bothered with the wanderlust, either."

He laughed, and then added, in a sober tone:

"But seriously, Larry, you know how it is with Mike and Trigger and I. We've been drifting around too long to settle down in any one place."

A little while later Kentucky Wade, Trigger Benton and Mike Morales were cantering across the range, and as they looked back from the crest of a hillock to wave farewell to their friends of the Circle D the melody of Dude Hanford's voice carried to their ears.

"Settin' easy in the saddle and a-singin' along. Singing a song of the sage."

THE END.

(A New Universal Picture, distributed throughout the United Kingdom and the Irish Free State by General Film Distributors, Ltd., starring John Mack Brown.)

December 25th, 1937.

GENE AUTRY
The Singing Cowboy
Star

"SLIM"

(Continued from page 12)

towers in the mornin' and dig your way back down?"

"Cold ain't gonna bother you none, Stumpy, the way I'll work you to-morrow!" promised Pop with a grin. "But if it's as bad as this to-morrow we can wait for a decent day, can't we?" asked Lafe Garretson rather plaintively.

"The company don't wait for decent days to pay you, do they?" Pop retorted.

Most of them were sitting round the fire, and Mrs. Johnson had cleared the table, when a motor-truck skidded to a standstill outside the house and the man at its wheel jumped down into the snow and climbed the steps.

Pop and the others were out in the hall directly they heard the sound of his voice at the door, and he brushed past Mrs. Johnson to address Pop.

"They want you and your gang down at the south sub-station right away!" he said urgently. "The storm's tearin' out our distribution lines. Truck's waitin' outside."

"We gotta go!" boomed Pop, and he started to put on a thick plaid jacket.

But Lafe Garretson made no move to get his overcoat.

"South sub-station?" he said in a scared fashion. "But that's all hot wire down there! Why, that yard's as hot as an electric chair—it'll be a death-trap in a storm like this. It isn't safe!"

"Whoever told you line work was safe?" Pop rated at him. "Sorry, boys. I don't like this any better than you do, but we're supposed to be linesmen. Come on, let's get her goin'! Be right with you, Mac. Oh, Mrs. Johnson, keep the heat on in the rooms, will you? We'll need it when we get back."

"I hate to see you go out in this awful weather," declared the landlady. "I'll keep some hot coffee for you."

"That's fine," Pop, with a muffled sound his neck and his coat-collar turned up about his ears, led the way out to the truck and the others followed, Lafe Garretson bringing up the rear.

The south sub-station was only about five miles away, but it was a most unpleasant ride. Half the town was in darkness before their destination was reached, but there was plenty of light outside the sub-station, for some of the cables had been blown across live cables between two of the towers and the flashing of the enrent was like continuous lightning.

"There's where the trouble is!" said Pop. "Come on, let's get her goin'!"

They swarmed down from the truck in the yard of the sub-station, and the linesmen approached one of the towers. But Lafe Garretson turned to Pop as Red began to climb the steel.

"It's no use, Pop," he said huskily. "I can't go up there."

"There's only two can'ts in this job," returned the foreman sternly. "If you can't cut it, you can't stop!"

"Well, I'm sorry," muttered the faint-hearted one. "I'm quittin'."

He turned and walked out from the yard; whereupon Red called across to Slim, who was climbing the opposite leg of the tower.

"Looks like this job is beginnin' to separate 'em!"

"Separate who?" Slim called back.

"The men from the boys. Hi, wait a minute! That's hot wire up there!

Stick close to me and keep your eyes open!"

"You boys be careful up there, now!" warned Pop from below as their two heads became surrounded by wires charged with eighty thousand volts of enrent.

At the top of the tower Slim and Red clambered out upon the bridge-like cross-section, there to swing precariously from their safety belts and restore loose cables to their proper positions in the teeth of a biting wind and at the risk of being "burnt."

While they were engaged upon this perilous task a taxicab drew up outside the boarding-house they had left behind, and Cally alighted from it, paid the driver, and scurried up to the front door.

Two days after Slim had left the hospital in Cactus Thorn she had received a note from him at her flat in Chicago, and she had set off by train next morning to find him. The driver of the taxicab had condescended to take her from the station to the boarding-house only after she had undertaken to pay him double the legal fare for the journey.

Mrs. Johnson opened the door to her, and in the light of a guttering candle on the hall table stared in astonishment. All the lights in the house had failed.

"Is Mr. Kineaid here?" asked Cally. "Oh—er—come inside—come in!" said the landlady and as Cally stepped into the hall she forced the door shut against the wind. "Who was it you wanted to see?"

"Mr. Kineaid," replied Cally. "Slim."

"Oh, Slim Kineaid? Yes, he's one of the new boys that arrived to-night. Why, no, he's not here. They're out workin'—they're all out workin'. They've been gone almost an hour."

"Out working to-night?" gasped Cally. "Where are they working?"

"Well," confessed the dame, "I don't know. Wherever it is that makes the lights go on, I suppose. The lights are all out, so they haven't finished yet. Won't you come right in here and wait for him?"

OUTSIDE the sub-station, Red and Slim and the others had recaptured and restored nearly all the cables that had been blown astray, and were now taut upon their instantly. "Pop looked up to go home!" Red, "we'll get a lot o' mugs are sittin' for the lights to work out a crossword puzzle!"

A few minutes later Stumpy said to Pop:

"You think them boys up on top ain't doin' about the best night's work ever done? You think they ain't cuttin' it up there where the wind's colder than my paw's heart? You think—"

"I think if you don't quit talkin' and go to work," interrupted Pop, "I'm gonna chase you up there with 'em!"

"You chase me up that tower?" snorted Stumpy. "You couldn't get me up there if there was a rattlesnake after me with red-hot teeth!"

Time dragged for Cally in the dining-room of the boarding-house, though Mrs. Johnson gave her hot coffee and chattered cheerfully. The sound of the front door being opened brought them both to their feet.

"There they are now, I guess!" exclaimed the landlady. But it was Lafe Garretson who stepped into the room, and she cried out at him: "Why, Mr. Garretson, where are all the others? Are you through?"

"Well, I'm through," growled the linesman, gaping at Cally. "I quit!"

"Quit?" echoed Mrs. Johnson scornfully. "Without turnin' on my lights? You're a fine linesman!"

"Mrs. Johnson," said Garretson defensively, "you don't know what it's like working right over hot wire."

"They're working over hot wire?" gasped Cally.

"Yeah—eighty thousand volts! Hot enough to burn a tower down. They're working right next to it and kiddin' about it!"

Cally snatched up her coat, but did not trouble about her hat.

"Listen, Mr. Garretson," she said frantically. "I have to get where those men are working. Will you take me? Please!"

Garretson yielded to her appeal and telephoned for a taxicab, and within twenty minutes they were on their way to the south sub-station.

Red was on the bottom rung of a hook ladder that swayed in space over a network of live cables when the taxicab stopped in the yard and she jumped down from it. Slim and a linesman named Kelly were dangling on their safety-belts, straining at a recalcitrant line which they were trying to get back on to its insulators.

From the bottom of the tower she looked up at them with the snow in her face and fear in her heart, and just then Red shouted:

"All right, Slim, go up and give Pop the signals. About half another inch!"

Slim pulled himself up on the steel-work, but as he did so Kelly cried:

"It's overstrained now, Red! We can't make it!"

"We've gotta make it!" insisted Red. "Give us another inch!"

Two linesmen on another tower were doing their best to feed the cable to Red. Slim yelled down:

"Let's have a hair more!"

With terrifying abruptness the cable

December 25th, 1957.

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"SLIM."—Red Blygd, Pat O'Brien; Slim Kineaid, Henry Fonda; Cally Richards, Margaret Lindsay; Pop Traver, J. Farrell MacDonald; Clarence Stump ("Stumpy"), Stuart Erwin; Hyatt Ransstead, John Litel; Lafe Garretson, Harlan Tucker; Griffin, Max Wagner; Allerd, Craig Reynolds; Tom Manders, Dick Purcell; Steve Vincent, Joseph King; Howard Wilcox, Joseph Sawyer; Mrs. Johnson, Maudel Turner.

"TOUGH TO HANDLE."—Mike Sanford, Frankie Darro; Ed McIntyre, Kane Richmond; Gloria Sanford, Phyllis Fraser; Franço, Harry Worth; Reggie Rhidley, Johnstone White; Myra George, Lorraine Hayes; Grandpa Sanford, Burr Caruth; Barney, Bill Hunter; Spike, Jack Ingram; Bud, Harry Anderson; Jake, Stanley Price; Mr. Kendall, Lee Phelps.

"WILD WEST DAYS."—Kentucky Wade, John Mack Brown; Dade Hanforth, George Shelley; Trigger Benton, Robert Kortman; Mike Morales, Frank Yaconelli; Lucy Monroe, Lynn Gilbert; Larry Monroe, Frank McGlynn; Keeler, Russell Simpson; Purvis, Francis McDonald; Doc Hardy, Walter Miller; Buckskin, Charles Stevens; Steve Claggitt, Al Bridge; Red Hatchet, Chief Thunderbird.

snapped, and as it snapped Red lost his balance and his grip upon the ladder and fell. The "hot" wires were immediately beneath him, but he managed to catch hold of a seven-foot string of insulators and he clung dizzily to the slippery things.

"Hold on, Red!" Slim and Cally called from the steel tower. Slim was perched on the edge of the tower. Kelly freed himself to grab at a rope and his hasty grip on the rope fell headlong.

There was a blind spot where he struck the charged wire with a sickening thud his mind struck the ground within a few feet of Cally.

Slim was scrambling down the swinging string of insulators to seize his chum and hold him till help arrived, when Red's numbed hands released their grip and he, too, pitched downwards.

Cally fainted, and she knew nothing of how Slim was hauled back to safety on a rope by his colleagues and brought down from the tower, a limp and unconscious figure drooping over Pop's shoulder.

In the office of the sub-station, five minutes later, she was kneeling beside a couch on which Slim lay with closed eyes while Pop stood beside her. Stumpy was gazing morosely down at two stretchers covered with blankets on the other side of the office.

Slim opened his eyes and remembered.

"Cally," he murmured.

"Yes, Slim?" she asked gently.

"Red—"

"Slim, please!"

He knew, then, that Red was dead, and his face became tortured with grief. "I don't know what to say, Slim!" growled Pop miserably. "You know how we all feel. You take it easy. We'll finish the job." He turned towards the rest of his men, who were standing bareheaded just inside the doorway. "Come on, boys!"

Slim and Cally were left alone in the office with the two dead linsmen; but almost immediately Slim started up from the couch and began to put on his overcoat and his safety-belt and his cap. "You're not going back up there?" Cally faltered.

"That's what's the matter, Cally," said Slim resolutely. "Red said I was a linsman."

She offered no further protest, but went out with him into the snow and the wind. As they approached a leg of the tower from which Red and Kelly had fallen, Stumpy held on to it as though to bar Slim's way.

"You ain't goin' up here no more to-night!" he asserted.

Slim thrust him aside without a word and started to climb.

"Slim," Cally called up as he ascended, "I'll be waiting for you!"

(By permission of Warner Brothers Pictures, Ltd., starring Pat O'Brien and Henry Fonda.)

All letters to the Editor should be addressed to BOY'S CINEMA, Room 199, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Robert Taylor's Next Film

Following intensive research in the European locale of the story, Stromberg announced the other novel, "They Seek a Country," which Francis Brett Young, will be the next Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer starring vehicle for Robert Taylor. On a recent trip to the Continent, Stromberg, accompanied by Noel Langley who is writing the screen play, travelled through some of the country described in the novel.

"Before he returns from England on completion of 'A Yank at Oxford,' Taylor will begin preparations for his new rôle," Stromberg said. Director Jack Conway will accompany the star on his trip through English territory for background material, continuing the research which Stromberg and Langley began.

"They Seek a Country" is a dramatic narrative of an Englishman who transferred to South Africa to escape from prison and eventually wins the love of a girl who befriended him on the journey.

The rôle promises to provide Taylor with the most dramatic characterisation of his career, according to Stromberg.

Unusual Set Built for Film

One of the most unusual sets ever built for a motion picture was constructed at Warner Bros. studios for scenes in "Slim," our long complete story.

Simple in appearance but novel in its usage, the set consisted of a steel wire-carrying tower 100 feet high and, immediately beside it, a wooden tower 120 feet high.

The steel tower was for O'Brien, Fonda, Stuart Erwin, J. Farrell MacDonald, Dick Purcell and other male members of the cast, together with a crew of bona-fide linsmen hired from the Southern California Edison Company, to perform on.

The wooden tower, which, despite its bulk and weight, could be moved with jacks and rollers to any desired position around its steel neighbour, was for technical equipment, including cameras, microphone booms and their crews, together with Director Ray Enright and his staff.

Elevators permitted cameras and crew to follow the actors up or down the tower at any desired speed, or to work at any given level from the ground to a height 20 feet in excess of the steel tower.

An example of the flexibility of camera equipment of the crew on the wooden tower was provided by one shot requiring a member of the crew of linsmen working on the steel tower to slide from the top to the ground on a rope. The camera followed the man perfectly as he whizzed down the rope and slowed up as he neared the ground. The full 100-foot drop required less than five seconds.

Did You Know That—

Carole Lombard started her film career as leading lady in "horse operas"—Westerns to you—with Buck Jones and Tom Mix.

Fredric March, star of Cecil B. DeMille's "The Rucancer," posed for commercial advertisements printed in national magazines before entering films.

John Boles, now co-starring with Gladys Swarthout and John Barrymore in "Romance In The Dark," served as an American spy during the World War.

While Hollywood can provide every type of actor and stunt man, there are only ten expert drivers who can handle six galloping horses attached to a thundering old stage-coach, and Joel McCrea had to learn the trick in a few hours for a scene in "Wells Fargo."

Working on a W. C. Fields picture may be a laugh for all concerned, but it is just a headache for the poor script girl who has to write down every change he makes in his lines, and in "The Big Broadcast of 1938" the comedian goes to town in a riot of ad-libbing!

James Meade, former star football player for Rice Institute, makes his screen debut in "Buckaroo," which has been set as the release title for the new Zane Grey production, on the schedule as "Arizona Amos," in which Gilbert Roland, Marsha Hunt and Charles Bickford are featured.

Ernest Toch, who wrote the musical score for Paramount's "Peter Ibbotson," has been assigned to compose the background music for "On Such a Night." This film, produced by Emanuel Cohen, is based on events in the recent Ohio river floods, and calls for unusual orchestral effects.

The 'DOLLA' AIR PISTOL

No Licence Required to Purchase.

The Best 5' Air Pistol made. Junior Model. Fires Darts and Slugs. Length 10 ins. Nickel finish. With ammunition, 5'—Senior Model; with Ammunition, 7'. All GUNS—Best make at 8'—10'—12'—each. Extra Ammunition Post 6d. for any of the above 1'—and 2'—Postage 6d. each article (Colonial 2'—).

HERBERTS & CO. (Dept. L.43), 48, Clapham Park Road, London, S.W.4.

All applications for Advertisement Space in this publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "BOY'S CINEMA," The Fleetway House, Farringdon St., London, E.C.4.

5/- RARE STAMP FREE! GENUINE PERFECT Yours by return post with pkt. 500 stamps 1/- postage 2d. (Abroad 2/-) LOCKTON, 4, ROSEHILL ROAD, LONDON, S.W.18.

SPORTS Packet 20 pictorial stamps, including Coronations and the latest Sports issue, 2d. postage. Ask for particulars of continuous free gift scheme.—C. A. MASTERS, Broadstone, Dorset.

BLUSHING, STAMPS Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back! Complete Course, 6/- Details—L. A. Stebbins, (A1, 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2. 300 DIFFERENT, Inc. Airmail, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Pictorials, Colonials, Price 6d. (Abroad 1/3)—WRITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BOYS' CINEMA

No. 947. EVERY TUESDAY February 5th, 1938.

2^D

Complete Thrillers

"Outlaws of the Orient"

and

"Non-stop New York"

ERROL FLYNN

ANOTHER Grand Double GIET NUMBER

LUISE RAINER

These Two Full Coloured
POST CARD SIZE ART PLATES
GIVEN AWAY
FREE

INSIDE

The News Reel

Room 199,
The Fleetway House,
Farringdon Street,
London, E.C.4.

My dear Readers,—Another of the superb coloured plates will be given away absolutely FREE in next week's issue, full particulars will be found on page 14. After that there will be three more weeks in which a plate will be given away, and in the issue dated February 26th you will find the full details of the Presentation Scheme which I mentioned last week. So be sure and make certain of getting a copy, because I can assure you that it is an offer that can never be repeated. It would be a sound policy to order your copy of BOY'S CINEMA from your local Newsagent NOW, otherwise you might find that he has sold out.

At all times I am pleased to hear from Readers and to answer any questions on careers, general knowledge, and film matters. Don't forget, a stamped addressed envelope will get you a speedy reply.

Your EDITOR.

Comic Whale

The Ritz Brothers have just completed a whale of a comedy routine for Samuel Goldwyn's musical extravaganza, "The Goldwyn Follies."

The principal actor supporting the brothers in the scenes was a plaster whale, thirty feet long. Made to Ritz specifications by studio carpenters, it could do almost everything but talk.

Among its accomplishments were the ability to wink, to move forward and backward and to spout a stream of water with deadly accuracy a distance of twenty yards. The Brothers will testify to that accuracy. Their faces were on the receiving end of several of its volleys.

Mechanics which operated the sea beast were concealed in its spacious "innards."

When the routine was completed, the Ritz boys bought the whale.

Stunt Ace

Britain, like Hollywood, has a stunt squad, and its chief is thirty-five-year-old Manor Park-born Sam Lee, who has done more dangerous tricks for British films than anyone.

Sam, whose parents were on the stage, started films when he was seven, at a studio in Snaresbrook; he played urchins and got five shillings, a bottle of ginger beer and a ham sandwich a day. Joined a circus acrobatic troupe, and later became physical training instructor in the Army, winning the Challenge Cup for acrobatics.

Re-entered films in 1925 when he heard that someone was wanted to take a toss down some stairs. Sam took the job and got through without a scratch. Since then he has been constantly in demand, and although he has been knocked downstairs, has smashed cars and fallen into water innumerable times, he has had only one real injury—a broken leg.

He recalls the time when he had to jump off the top of the Eiffel Tower on to a platform fifteen feet below. He landed two inches from the edge, a thousand feet from the ground. He once fell off the Mauretania's boat-deck, sixty feet into the water, for a film, at 3 a.m. And he has been knocked out by all the best people—recently Victor McLaglen threw him through a window.

One of his earliest thrills was tight-rope walking across forty feet of wire between two telegraph poles over a burning building. He saw the pole behind him catch fire, and just reached the other one before it crashed in flames.

He played the part of the irate pier-master in "Windbag the Sailor," whose pier is pulled from under him by Will Hay's tug. The local people who built the pier at Falmouth made a good job of it, using strong piles and heavy beams. Consequently, when the pier gave way and he fell into the water, real solid beams came crashing down around him, a blow from any of which would have meant serious business. He swam underwater and came up for air just in time to go down again to avoid more flying beams. The camera unit which had raced back to the tug punched him black and blue to make sure that he was really alive.

In his current film, "Strange Boarders," which Gainsborough are producing at Pinewood, he has the comparatively peaceful job of damaging a taxicab.

The only hint he can give to prospective stunt artistes is—to keep limp, try falling downstairs without contracting a muscle and see how little it hurts—or so Sam says.

Shaving With Egg

A dozen eggs were on call for the new Tom Walls' film, "Strange Boarders"—for shaving purposes.

Tom had to be photographed shaving in an art studio set near some very powerful lamps. He lathered with ordinary shaving soap, but he was too near the hot lamps, and wouldn't stay on; in fact, the more he lathered the less he got.

Then one of the make-up men suggested that the white of an egg whisked well and applied like shaving soap might do the trick—it did, and Tom, who was willing to try anything once, had to lather with egg twelve times for the sequence. His only complaints were that it felt a little slimy and one of the eggs was not up to scratch.

Jack Holt

Jack Holt, the famous he-man star of outdoor action and adventure films for the last two decades, was born with a natural love of life in the open and a desire to be an adventurer into the far romantic places of the earth. He has lived that sort of life, too; actually before he entered films, and vicariously on the screen.

Charles John Holt was born in Winchester, Virginia. His father, an Episcopalian minister, could trace his descent to John Holt, a Lord Chief Justice of England. His mother was a

(Continued on page 28)

NEXT WEEK'S THRILLING FILM STORIES!

EDWARD G. ROBINSON

IN

"THE LAST GANGSTER"

Public Enemy Number One was a ruthless, cold-blooded killer, and for a crime of vengeance the police were baffled, but finally got him on an income tax charge. His one thought on getting his freedom was his only son, but his old gang thought only of the money he had hidden. A powerful and thrilling drama of the underworld.

"AVENGING WATERS"

Ken Morley arrives at El Mirasol Ranch to find trouble between Mortimer, its new owner, and Slater, a rascally rancher who contends that his cattle have a right to graze on his neighbour's pasture-land. Slater causes a stampede and dams the head-waters of a stream that flows through Mortimer's property; but Ken stops the stampede and discovers the dam—only to be made captive by Slater's men. A rousing Western, starring Ken Maynard.

Also

Another episode of the grand new serial:

"RADIO PATROL"

Starring Grant Withers.

AND ANOTHER FREE GIFT!

Because his brother Johnny has failed to make good in the Gobi Desert, where the Thatcher Petroleum Corporation are developing an oilfield, Chet Eaton goes to China on the eve of his marriage—and finds that he must stay there. Encouraged by the unscrupulous representative of a rival concern, Ho-Fang, a bandit chief, raids Chet's supply caravan, makes outrageous demands for money, and finally attacks the settlement in force. A blazing drama, starring Jack Holt

OUTLAWS of the ORIENT

Back to China

"THIS," said Leonard Claude Freemont Thatcher, chairman of the Thatcher Petroleum Corporation, "has just arrived from Kwei-Yong."

Across the rather ornate desk at which he was seated he passed to Chet Eaton, who had just dropped into a chair on the other side of it, a cablegram which read:

"Unless Gobi oilfield on full operating basis by end of the month General Moy Ku Ting will transfer franchise to Gobi Development Corporation.

"W. P. SNYDER."

Willard Percival Snyder was the resident manager of the Kwei-Yong branch of the Thatcher Petroleum Corporation; Chet Eaton was chief engineer of the concern.

"Looks bad, doesn't it?" said Thatcher.

"Oh, I don't know." Chet handed back the flimsy sheet of paper. "All you need is an extension of time."

"Do you think you'll have any trouble getting it?"

"Me?"

The word was exploded rather than uttered, and Chet's dark brown eyes and the set of his very strong jaw expressed both dismay and resistance.

"You're the only one who can save the situation for the company," said the middle-aged chairman gravely.

"I've heard that before," growled Chet.

"But it's true. You got the general to arrange the franchise. You understand the people and the conditions."

Chet flung out a hand that held a half-consumed cigarette.

"Get this straight!" he gritted. "I'm not going back to China!"

"But we've sunk so much money in that field we can't afford to lose it now," protested Thatcher.

"Let Johnny handle it—he's on the job."

Thatcher bit his lip, dropped the cablegram on a very large blotting-pad, and said regretfully:

"Well, I didn't want to tell you this, but your brother's not making good."

For a few moments there was dead silence in the room, then Chet rubbed the back of his hand across his mouth and blurted:

"Why haven't you said something about this before?"

"I haven't had to," replied Thatcher, "until now."

"Well, that's different. But do you realize the spot you're putting me in?"

"All you have to do is get the franchise extended."

"I'm not thinking about the franchise. I'm getting married next month."

"Well, if you catch the 'plane to-night and take the China Clipper you'll be back in plenty of time." Thatcher turned to a dictograph and through it spoke to a secretary in an adjoining room. "Order a reservation on the China Clipper to-morrow for Mr. Eaton."

Chet stood up with an air of most unwilling surrender, a fine figure of a man, and one more accustomed to command than to obey.

"Better get your things together," suggested Thatcher, "you haven't much time."

From the head office of the company in Broadway, New York City, Chet took a taxicab to a huge apartment-house in Fifth Avenue, facing Central Park. The sun was shining and spring was in the air; there were only four more days of April, and already the trees in the park were beginning to dress themselves in green.

Having dismissed the taxicab, Chet turned his back on the attractive scene, entered the apartment-house, and was swept up to the tenth floor in an elevator.

He was admitted to a sumptuous flat by a butler, who greeted him with a smile, and in the drawing-room of the flat he embraced the girl he had planned to marry in May. Her name was Alice Sylvester, and she was very beautiful.

"Oh, Chet, I'm so glad you've come!" she exclaimed. "I've just sent out millions of invitations and I've missed everybody we wanted."

"That's easy," he laughed. "Send out another million."

He led her over to a chesterfield and pulled her down beside him on its cushions.

"Listen, Alice," he said, slipping an arm round her waist, "would it be too tough if I left all the wedding preparations to you?"

She looked at him in rather blank dismay and perceived that something had gone wrong.

"What's happened?" she asked.

"I've got to go to China," he replied. "Johnny's let the company down."

"What's he done?"

"Nothing, that's the trouble. But there's an important lease that has to be extended."

"But you can't go now, Chet."

"I've got to go," he returned gruffly. "Listen. Why can't we get married this afternoon and both go?"

"Chet, you're insane!"

"No, I'm not insane." He removed his arm from her waist to take both of her hands in his. "The trip will be our honeymoon."

"What about the people and the presents?"

"Forget about the people and keep the presents. We'd be married, wouldn't we?"

"We could be," she said bleakly, "if there wasn't a three-day marriage notice law in this State."

Chet drew a long breath. He had forgotten that circumstance.

"Well, I guess my idea wasn't so good," he lamented. "There's no way out of it, then. I've got to go."

"I understand," she nodded. "Yes, I guess you've got to go. But, Chet Eaton, don't you leave me waiting at the church."

He kissed her for that.

"Alic, you're a peach," he declared fervently. "Don't worry, I'll be back in plenty of time."

That night he caught a fast air liner from New York to Alameda, and next morning he embarked upon the famous flying-boat, China Clipper, bound for Hong-Kong.

From Hong-Kong he proceeded by boat and rail and road to the town of Kwei-Yong, familiar with the route because he had travelled it before when he had lived in China, and, reaching the town late at night, put up at an hotel managed by a European although it was staffed mainly by Orientals.

Willard Percival Snyder had retired to bed in his flat over the local headquarters of the Thatcher Petroleum Corporation when a telephone bell disturbed his slumbers. Chet had rung him up from the hotel despite the lateness of the hour.

The stocky little broad-faced manager had a great idea of his own importance, and, despite the fact that Chet had just completed a journey of several thousand miles, was not prepared to sacrifice any sleep on his account.

"I'll see you at the hotel in the morning, Eaton," he said primly. "About eight-thirty."

"Okay," returned Chet with a grimace; and he himself sought the comfort of clean sheets in a room that was fairly airy.

Next morning he breakfasted early, and he was standing on the front steps of the hotel, gazing out upon a typically Chinese scene, when a cheerful voice hailed him and a full-faced and full-lipped young fellow, brown-haired, clean-shaven, and wearing a cloth cap in conjunction with a lounge suit of very sporting cut, rushed up and grabbed him by the hand.

"Hallo, Lucky!" said Chet.

But Phelps was the young fellow's real name, and he was pilot of the company's aeroplane used as a means of communication between the oilfield in the desert and the office in the town. His happy-go-lucky nature, doubtless, was responsible for the name by which he was known.

"It's good to see you back again," he boomed. "Kwei-Yong hasn't been February 5th, 1938.

the same since you left. Oh, we've got a new landing field here, back of the office."

"Yeah?" said Chet. "How's the old crate?"

"Still safer than these things!"

Lucky pointed to a jinricksha which was approaching the hotel with Snyder in its seat and a coolie between its shafts.

The resident manager and the pilot ascended to Chet's room, talking on the way, and in the room Snyder advanced towards the telephone Chet had used the night before.

"I'll put a call through to the general," he said.

"Wait a minute." Chet raised a hand. "There are several things I want to find out before I talk to him."

"What do you want to find out?" inquired Lucky.

"What's wrong with the Gobi? What's the matter with Johnny?"

Lucky made a motion as though consuming a drink.

"Well, why didn't you cable me?"

"I'm the company flyer, not the boss."

Chet turned to Snyder.

"Why didn't you throw him off the job?" he demanded.

"What good would that have done?" shrugged the manager. "You're the only one that could stay up there without liquor. That kid's been flying down here every week."

"Yeah," said Lucky, "it's a good thing you're back on the job."

"Now get this through your thick heads," rapped Chet. "I came here to get a year's extension on that lease, and as soon as I get it I'm going back to the States."

Ho-Fang Listens

THAT afternoon Chet called by appointment at the very modern offices of the military guard, and was ushered into the presence of General Moy Ku Ting, a tall and rather handsome officer for a Chinaman. His eyes were Oriental enough, but his nose was straight, and the moustache beneath his nose would not have disgraced an American officer.

He spoke perfect English, though in a curiously stilted fashion, and he was quite friendly; yet he did not seem disposed to grant the desired renewal of the franchise.

"But our interests are the same, general," said Chet persuasively. "We're both trying to get oil for China."

The general spread his hands, hunching his shoulders almost like a Frenchman.

"My dear Eaton," he returned, "where your company has failed the Gobi Development Corporation assure us they can succeed. My government allows no alternative. Despite my personal desires I must close the contract with them."

"Then you haven't signed yet?" asked Chet.

"Mr. Sheldon is waiting outside now with the papers."

Chet knew Sheldon and his unscrupulous ways as local manager of the rival concern; but he knew the general, too, and he did not lose heart.

"If you grant my company a year's extension," he said, "I promise you there will be no failure this time."

"Promises cannot bring oil to China," responded Moy Ku Ting bluntly, "and you are making no progress. What assurance have I that your company will live up to its promise this time?"

"My personal assurance, general. Besides, if you turn this concession over to a company that has had no experience in the Gobi Desert you might be defeating your own purpose."

"I realise that."

"Have I ever broken a personal promise to you?"

The general shook his head and for a few moments tapped upon the desk at which he was seated with a paper-knife shaped like a dragon.

"If, because of our personal friendship," he said, "I granted an extension, would you do something for me?"

"Name it."

"Remain here yourself until the work is completed."

That was a nasty blow, and one that made Chet wince. He rose from his chair and walked about the room with clenched fists, fighting a battle between his own desires and his duty to the company.

"You know, Mr. Eaton," said the general, watching him, "most of China's troubles have been caused by Western adventurers whose only ambition is to despoil our country. I respect your company, but my confidence is in you, and unless you agree—"

"All right, general," Chet broke in, walking back to the desk, "you have my word. Give Thatcher Petroleum another year and I'll stay until the job's finished."

Moy Ku Ting was a very observant man.

"I'm sorry if my demand causes you any inconvenience," he said, rising and offering his hand. "The papers will be ready for signature in two hours' time."

"Thank you," Chet shook the hand and turned towards the door; whereupon the general spoke into a dictograph on his desk:

"Send Mr. Sheldon in."

The two rival representatives met in the doorway, and Howard Sheldon, a thin-faced fellow with a long and pointed nose, eyed Chet with obvious surprise and dismay.

"Hallo, Sheldon," said Chet casually.

"Hallo, Eaton," returned Sheldon.

"I thought you were back in the States."

"I was," said Chet, and went on out.

Lucky was waiting for him in the outer office, where an almond-eyed girl was busy at a typewriter.

"Well?" he asked eagerly.

"I fixed it," said Chet, mainly between his teeth.

"Is that what makes you look so cheerful?"

"Aw, cut out the kidding!" Chet strode forth into a wide hall, and Lucky kept pace with him along the hall and out on to the front steps of the building. "Look here, I've got to send a cable to Alic. Tell Snyder to get those supplies out of the warehouse."

"Say," protested Lucky, "with the weather we've been having the trucks haven't been able to get through for two months—"

"I know that," Chet interrupted. "I'm going to caravan them through. You fly back and tell them I'm coming."

"Okay," said Lucky; "but you're a glibton for punishment."

"That's my business!"

While Chet was on his way to the post-office General Moy Ku Ting imparted to Sheldon the very unpleasant news that the Gobi Development Corporation were not going to be granted the concession that had seemed almost within their grasp.

"I'm sorry, Mr. Sheldon," said the general, noticing the expression of mingled rage and disappointment on the representative's ugly face. "but ethics and common sense would have forbidden any other course."

"You mean you used me and my company to force your own terms on the Thatcher crowd?" suggested Sheldon bitterly.

"Certainly not!" denied the general stiffly. "Mr. Eaton's arrival has changed the whole situation."

Next morning a whole string of loaded camels set out for the Gobi Desert, passing slowly under the archway in the western wall of the town with their native drivers, and Chet rode with them on horseback beside a little Chinese servant of the company named Wong.

As the caravan wound its way along the road, that eventually lost itself in a wild waste of sand and scrub, an aeroplane came roaring overhead from the direction of the town, banked, turned and swooped low from one end of the long train to the other. Lucky's goggled but grinning face looked down over the side of the cockpit, and he waved a gloved hand in salute to Chet, then sent the machine climbing into the sky and vanished into the distance.

Chet turned to his little yellow-faced companion.

"Wong," he said, "you stay behind and keep them moving. I'm going up in front."

The nearest place of habitation to the oilfield that was being developed in the Gobi Desert was a small and entirely native village named Tak Tao, and it was nearly a hundred and fifty miles north by west of Kwei-Yong.

Sheldon flew to Tak Tao in an aeroplane belonging to the Gobi Development Corporation immediately after he had witnessed Chet's departure from Kwei-Yong, and having landed on the sand outside the little walled village, he made his way on foot to the Café of the Bronze Dragon.

This semi-underground resort, with its earthen floor and its clumsy tables, he knew to be practically the headquarters of Ho-Fang, a Mongolian half-breed who considered himself to be a war lord and called himself a general. Ho-Fang's "army" consisted of a band of yellow ruffians, undisciplined but loyal to their master, and fully a dozen of them were lounging about the big smoke-laden room when Sheldon reached the bottom of the steps that led down to it from the street.

Ho-Fang was at a table by himself, drinking tea, a repulsive-looking man with scars upon his face, heavy-lidded eyes, and a moustache not altogether unlike a couple of rats' tails. Under a padded coat the haft of a long knife projected from a leather belt, and on his head was an extraordinary cap of fur.

Watched narrowly by the "soldiers," Sheldon walked over to the table, and Ho-Fang listened with expressionless features to what he had to say, drinking his tea and refilling the cup from a pot at intervals.

"Eaton is already on his way to the field by caravan," said Sheldon. "That's why I flew up here. You've got to work fast, Ho-Fang."

"General Ho-Fang," corrected the Mongolian in a deep and guttural voice.

"I'm sorry," nodded Sheldon. "General Ho-Fang. Now listen. What do you care for China? Anything you do is all right. Raid their supplies, destroy their pipe-lines, but don't let Eaton complete his contract on time."

Significantly, Ho-Fang held out his left hand, palm upwards.

"Certainly I expect to pay you for your services, general," Sheldon assured him.

In his own language, which was Kalmuk, Ho-Fang barked a command at his men, and they went out from the café.

"Now," he said, putting down his teacup, "we talk business."

The New Book-keeper

THE Gobi Desert is high above sea level and of vast expanse. For three days the caravan led by Chet progressed slowly across sand and scrub, pitching camp at nightfall, moving onwards again at dawn. Not a tree was to be seen in all the landscape, but here and there were patches of grass, at less frequent intervals wells of brackish water, and in the distance were the Yablouoi Mountains.

The foothills of the mountain range were reached during the morning of the third day, and it was then that Ho-Fang and his "army" swooped. The heavily laden camels were straggling patiently between rocks when rifle fire broke out to left and right of them. The coolies flung themselves flat, the animals stopped, and Chet put away a six-gun he had drawn as a score of Ho-Fang's men came riding out from their hiding-places.

Ho-Fang himself remained concealed, but his voice rang out from behind a tall boulder:

"Dismount! Take their guns!"

Chet, who was acquainted with a number of Chinese dialects, understood as well as the coolies what the harshly uttered words implied, and the barrel of a rifle within a few inches of his chest and the barrel of another in his back caused him hurriedly to unfasten the belt he was wearing and let it fall into the dust. Then he slid down from the saddle and stood with upraised hands.

Wong, his face a mask, had dropped the rifle he carried. The coolies flung away their weapons before they ventured to rise.

Ho-Fang rode out from behind his boulder and looked on with a smile of wicked satisfaction as the camels were turned and driven back along the rock-strewn way in company with the coolies and the horses. Then he, too, disappeared after his men, and Chet and Wong were left standing together in the blazing sunshine.

"Well, that's that!" gritted Chet. "Let's get going."

The oilfield, with its derricks and sheds and huts and cabins, was still a good ten miles away to the west, and they were trudging towards it when a foreman who had been superintending boring operations in the oilfield turned towards the camp, looking for Chet's brother Johnny.

The foreman, a tall, lean-faced and middle-aged expert who had learned

"You are the only man who can save the situation for the company," said the middle-aged chairman gravely February 5th, 1938.

his business in the oilfields of California, was named Speed, and his Christian name was Ernest, but he was known to everybody as "Red" on account of the colour of his hair.

Johnny Eaton, several years younger than Chet, was quite a handsome young fellow, but his clean-shaven face was beginning to show signs of dissipation; life in the desert had got on his nerves, and in the last six months he had taken to drinking far more whisky than was good for him—or for the Thatcher Petroleum Corporation.

He was sitting on the edge of a table in the office, a glass containing neat whisky in one hand and a half-smoked cigarette in the other, when Red Speed reached the doorway and shouted:

"Johnny, you in there?"

"What is it now?" Johnny put down the glass and walked none too steadily across the room.

"Why don't you get next to yourself?" Red took it upon himself to rebuke. "You're supposed to be the boss up here, and a fine example you're setting."

"I am boss," retorted Johnny, a trifle thickly, "and I don't need any advice from you. Well, did you take a boring to-day?"

"Yeah, they were pulling it out when I came over. Come on, let's take a look at it."

The two-seater aeroplane piloted by Lucky was standing on the sand not far from the wooden office building, and they passed it on their way to the spot where a rotary drill was at work. Johnny stooped to examine the mass of earth and rock brought up from the bore-hole—and also some very obvious petroleum.

"It looks good, Red," he said. "High gravity."

"Yeah," confirmed the foreman. "We oughta be able to send down the gun in two weeks and bring 'em in."

Lucky joined them, but almost immediately his attention became diverted to two figures plodding wearily towards the camp.

"Hi, fellows, look!" he exclaimed, pointing a finger.

"It's Chet!" cried Johnny.

Lucky ran to meet the travellers.

"Where's the caravan?" he inquired. "Couldn't it keep up with you?"

"If you think walking ten miles across the desert in riding-boots is any fun," snapped Chet, "you're crazy! We were hi-jacked."

"Hi-jacked?"

"Yeah. You've got to fly back and tell Snyder what's happened."

Johnny and Red came up just then, and the two brothers gripped hands.

"Chet, I am glad to see you," declared Johnny. "Say, but what's happened? What are you doing on foot? Where's the caravan?"

"I'll explain all that later." Chet caught hold of Johnny's arm. "I want to talk to you, Johnny. Tell the boys I'll see them in just a minute, Red."

He marched his brother into a cabin which had formed his own quarters before he had gone back to America, and in the plainly furnished living-room he said sternly:

"What's all this I hear about you spending most of your time in town drunk?"

"Chet," began Johnny half-defiantly, "I—I couldn't—"

"I left you in charge, didn't I? What kind of an example are you setting for your men? If you can't stay out here sober, how do you expect them to?"

February 5th, 1938.

"But it got on my nerves, Chet. I couldn't stand it."

"Well, you're going to stand it, and we're both going to stay here and see this thing through."

"I've been stuck out here for over a year," complained Johnny. "I'm quitting."

He dived into his bed-room, which adjoined the living-room, and he was pouring more whisky into a tumbler when Chet followed him.

"I'll tell you when we're quitting," rapped Chet; "and you might as well cut that out right now."

On the following morning Lucky flew to Kwei-Yong with a letter from Chet to Snyder. He reached the branch headquarters of the Thatcher Petroleum Corporation well before noon, and in the outer room of that office he greeted a little slip of Chinese womanhood who was typing at a desk, then turned to blink at another girl who was a total stranger to him.

"Well, now look here," he exclaimed, walking over to the desk at which the strange but beautiful white girl was writing in a loose-leaf ledger, "where did you come from? Say, I don't think you've met me. I'm—"

"Yes, yes, I know," interrupted the girl, looking him up and down with a pair of particularly luminous brown eyes. "You're the company's super flying ace. I think I'm going to swoon. Oh, you flyers are so wonderful!"

The sarcasm was wasted on Lucky.

"That's just what I was going to tell you," he informed her with a grin. "Well, I'm certainly glad to meet you, Angel-Face."

"The name is Miss Manning, Mr. Phelps."

"Aw, just call me Lucky."

"Okay, Lucky," was the freezing response. "And you may call me Miss Manning."

"I see. Well, in that case, Miss Manning, will you tell Mr. Snyder that Mr. Phelps requests an interview?"

The sarcasm was wasted on her.

"Mr. Snyder has been waiting and waiting," she said. "You may go in, Mr. Phelps."

"Thank you, Miss Manning." Lucky went to the door of Snyder's room and opened it, but he took a pea-shooter from the pocket of his leather jacket and turned to fire a pea at her bowed head before he crossed the threshold.

"Phelps!" exploded the resident manager, rising from his desk. "What are you doing? This is a business office, and I'm sick and tired of having you use it as a target range."

Lucky closed the door, advanced to the desk, and perched himself on a corner of it.

"I see you've decorated the front office," he remarked.

"Her name is Manning!" rapped Snyder.

"And she's the new book-keeper," nodded Lucky. "I know. Tell me something I don't know."

"That's impossible! What about Eaton? How is he?"

"Oh, same as always—growling and barking. Everything's under control, except he lost the caravan."

"Lost the caravan?" howled Snyder.

"Yeah." Lucky deserted the desk for a window overlooking the street in order to put in some more "target practice" there. "A bunch of half-breed bandits hi-jacked him. He had to walk to camp—ten miles."

An innocent pedestrian in the street received a pea in the back of his neck.

"Listen, you clown!" roared Snyder. "Give me some details!"

"Details?" Lucky looked round from the window.

"Yes, what happened? Who are the bandits?"

"Ho-Fang and his mob. They took everything from Eaton and left him to thumb a ride in the middle of the Gobi. Here, you'll find all you want to know in this."

Snyder snatched at a letter Lucky tugged from his pocket and offered, and Lucky shot peas at more people in the street while the letter was read.

"What does he mean by this post-script?" demanded Snyder. "'Have Lucky bring me a good cook by plane—one that won't give me indigestion.' What's the matter with the old one?"

"Don't ask me—I'm only the company flyer. All I know is that indigestion makes him awfully grouchy, and that guy's grouchy enough now. So you'd better send him a cook, and darn quick, too!"

On his way out from Snyder's presence Lucky stopped to have another word with Miss Manning—Joan Manning, to give her name in full.

"How good a cook are you?" he asked.

"That all depends upon for whom I'm cooking," she replied.

"Well, suppose you were to cook for me, Glorious?"

"In that case," said she, "I'm sorry, but I couldn't cook at all. Good-bye, Mr. Phelps."

"Okay, Precious," drawled Lucky, with a flip of his hand. "So-long, Cho-Cho!"

The little Chinese typist beamed and nodded, but Joan Manning became immersed in her loose-leaf ledger—and looked up too late because a pea had struck her on the head an instant before the outer door was closed.

"Buying Protection"

IN the afternoon of the following day Chet stood upon the platform of a derrick studying with expert eyes the shaft of the last well that had been constructed. In his tour of inspection he had found many things wrong, and his brother to blame for most of them.

That brother was standing sullenly beside him, and Red Speed was there as well.

"This should have been pulled at four thousand," said Chet. "No wonder you're getting hardly anything out!"

"That's what I thought, Mr. Eaton!" blurted Red. "But—" He broke off abruptly as Johnny scowled at him; but Johnny shouted:

"Go on, say it! I told you not to!"

Red made no response.

"What's all the argument about?" asked Chet.

"Well, I made a mistake," said Johnny defiantly. "So what?"

The noise of an aeroplane overhead caused them to look up. The Chinese workmen were scurrying for cover with cries of alarm because Lucky was celebrating his return from Kwei-Yong by swooping and rising and banking and turning as though playing leapfrog with the derricks.

"Look at that nut!" exclaimed Red.

Abruptly the stunting ceased and the machine descended to a perfect landing and taxied across the sand, raising a cloud of dust behind it. Almost outside the door of the office it came to a standstill, and Lucky clambered down from the front cockpit, looked into the rear one, and hoisted out from it what appeared at first to be a bundle of clothing, but proved to be a plump and quivering little Chinese woman who looked scared out of her wits as she was set down upon her feet.

"Well, how did you like the ride?" asked Lucky impishly.

Chet came striding up, and the practical joker turned to him.

"See what I've brought you?" he said. "Mah Ling, this is your new boss, Mr. Eaton."

"How do you do, Mah Ling?" said Chet, eyeing the dumpy little figure with some amusement.

Mah Ling burst suddenly into a torrent of Chinese, and finished up in English: "He's crazy!"

"You just finding that out?" laughed Chet. "Hi, Wong, show this lady to her quarters!"

Wong appeared from one of the huts and took charge of the new cook provided by Snyder, and Lucky accompanied Chet into the office.

"Well, where is it?" demanded Chet. Lucky handed over some papers from the branch office, but there was no eablegram amongst them, and Chet's disappointment was manifest upon his face.

"I see an awful future for you," chanted Lucky—"always grouchy, and unlucky in love."

"Cut out the kidding!" snapped Chet. "Where's the cable?"

"Maybe she wrote one and forgot to send it off."

"Yeah, maybe she did," said Chet bitterly.

Lucky turned to depart, but in the doorway he stopped short to stare at a band of armed horsemen who were galloping towards the settlement. As they drew nearer he recognised Ho-Fang, and he heard that self-styled war lord shout an order to his followers.

"Say," he gulped, "what do you suppose—"

"I sent for him," interrupted Chet quite calmly.

"You sent for him?" Lucky could hardly believe his ears.

"I know how to take care of that hi-jack. Beat it. I want to talk to him alone!"

Lucky went off to his own quarters, and Chet walked over to Ho-Fang, who had halted with his men some twenty yards away.

"General Ho-Fang?" he asked, looking up at the ugly brigand.

"You Mr. Eaton?"

"Yes—won't you come into the office?"

Ho-Fang swung himself down from his horse, rasped at his men to stand guard, and entered the office with Chet. He seated himself with excessive dignity in a chair set against a rough counter, and Chet regarded him appraisingly.

"General," he said, thrusting his thumbs in the pockets of his riding breeches, "I understand this land is yours."

"I take this land," Ho-Fang replied. "Mine long time."

"Of course. Well, our office has made arrangements with the new Government, but since the land really belongs to you I think you should also profit. Say we pay you a rent of—"

"How much?" Ho-Fang held out a hand, palm upwards.

"That would be determined by our success."

The hand was dropped again, the furrowed head was nodded ever so slightly.

"Then it's a deal, general?" asked Chet. "I can expect your full co-operation? Equipment, pipe-lines, and everything will be safe, is that it?"

"I am General Ho-Fang," was the reply, "very honourable." The hand was held out again. "You pay now."

"Well, I'll have to take it up with the office first."

"Now!" insisted the brigand.

"All right, general." Chet moved round the counter to a safe upon the floor behind it, and he opened the safe and took some notes from one of its shelves.

Ho-Fang did not turn his head perceptibly, but his eyes were watchful.

"Suppose I pay you a small amount now," said Chet, returning from the safe, "just to bind the agreement? As soon as I get in touch with the office I will—"

"Good!" Ho-Fang rose and took the notes. "I will be back next week."

"That'll be fine," said Chet; and then his unpleasant visitor went back to his horse and rode away with his men.

Chet was standing on the low veranda that stretched all along the front of the office building when Johnny joined him, in company with Red and Lucky.

"Chet," said Johnny, pointing a finger in the direction of the disappearing horsemen, "aren't those the bandits who—"

"Yeah." Chet cut him short. "Come inside and I'll tell you about it."

Red drifted back to the men who were working under him at the new well, and Lucky and the two brothers entered the office.

"I closed a deal with that fellow," said Chet.

"You closed a deal?" Johnny was amazed.

"Sure. I let him believe he owned this land, and I started him in a nice little racket. He's the racketeer, and I'm supposed to be the chump."

"What d'you mean, supposed to be?"

"There's too much at stake to have him for an enemy. I'm buying protection."

"Well," growled Johnny, "that wouldn't be my way! I'd have General Moy Ku Ting send some Nationalist troops down here, and—"

"Now, wouldn't that be fine?" derided Chet. "Start a little war, eh? We'd get a lot of work done then, wouldn't we?"

"Well," said Lucky, "I think buying him off is a swell idea, but who's gonna pay the tap?"

"The company," Chet replied.

"Are you sure?"

Chet shrugged.

"I'm going to have you take a letter into Snyder this afternoon," he said.

"Okay." Lucky made a grimace.

"After all, I'm the company flyer, and my home is a crate in the air!"

The evening meal that day was a great success. Mah Ling not only cooked it perfectly, but waited upon Chet and Johnny at table.

"Do you know," Chet said to her with enthusiasm, "this is the best food I ever had!"

"General," said Chet, thrusting his thumbs in the pockets of his riding breeches, "I understand this land is yours."

Mah Ling beamed all over her moon of a face.

"You like?" she purred.

"Sure! You married, Mah Ling?"

"Um," she nodded. "Me got husband."

"Aw, that's too bad! You know, you're the first woman I ever met that could really cook, and I was sort of hoping that—"

Johnny, with a snort of impatience, pushed his plate aside and flung down his serviette.

"I'm getting out of this rotten hole!" he cried, jumping to his feet. "You come back here to finish the field and take all the credit! You're making a fool out of me! I won't let you do it!"

He went off into his bed-room, and he was putting on a coat when Chet followed him there, disturbed by the sudden outburst.

"Where are you going?" he demanded, catching hold of his arm.

"I'm going to Tak Tao."

"Don't be a sap, Johnny; you're doing all right. If you want a drink, take one here. You don't have to go to town."

"No?" Johnny raged at him. "Well, I'm getting out of this dump, see? I'll take a drink wherever I want to, and you're not going to stop me!"

He wrenched his arm free and tried to thrust his brother aside.

"Get out of my way!" he roared.

"You're asking for it," said Chet grimly.

A violent blow was aimed at his jaw, but the blow was warded off, and Johnny went crashing to the floor from a sledge-hammer left between the eyes.

It was rough treatment, but it served its purpose. Johnny did not ride out of camp that evening.

Lucky got back from Kwei-Yong late in the afternoon of the next day, and as he climbed down from his machine and sped towards the office he waved a letter above his head. Chet ran out to him, and quite a subdued Johnny followed.

"Greetings from your pal Snyder!" proclaimed Lucky, handing over the letter with a flourish. "Just another monkey-wrench in the works!"

"I might have known that nit-wit wouldn't understand," raged Chet, tearing open the envelope, and he frowned heavily as he read the letter.

"Well, what does he say?" asked Johnny impatiently.

"No dough for Ho-Fang," Lucky took it upon himself to reply. "It's the principle of the thing he objects to. Boy, you should have seen him boil!"

Chet screwed up the letter from the manager.

"Well, what do you tell Mr. Ho-Fang now?" jeered Johnny.

"There's more than one way of skinning a cat," retorted Chet. "I'll handle Ho-Fang!"

"What are you going to do?"

"Keep right on the job until we get it finished! Come on, kid, let's look at Number Five!"

Ho-Fang Strikes Again

MONTHS of hard work followed. Chet paid regular tribute to Ho-Fang and forged ahead with the development of the oilfield, eager to get back to New York. Wells that had proved unproductive were closed down, and fresh wells were bored. Derrick after derrick was erected, and a second pipe-line was laid all across the desert to Kwei-Yong, buried beneath the sand and earth wherever it could be buried, but carried across gaps in the foothills and hollows among the dunes upon trestle bridges.

February 5th, 1938.

Chet's accounts became not merely complicated, but almost beyond any book-keeper's comprehension as a result of his endeavours to cover up the weekly payments to Ho-Fang, but the Thatcher Petroleum Corporation profited by his work as an engineer, and General Moy Kn Ting had every reason to be satisfied with the increasing revenue his Government derived from the concession.

But Howard Sheldon found the very pointed reproaches of the Gobi Development Corporation hard to bear. A considerable sum of money had been paid to Ho-Fang, on behalf of that corporation, to harass and hinder Chet in his labours so that the specified year should expire without any great success and the franchise should become lost to the Thatcher Company, and Sheldon knew quite well that he was in danger of losing his own job.

He flew to Tak Tao, and in the Café of the Bronze Dragon he interviewed the impassive bandit who had taken his bribes and done nothing in return since the capture of the caravan. Ho-Fang saw that he was in a fury, and that suited him well.

"Wait!" he commanded; and Sheldon suppressed his wrath till the gang of ruffians had been sent out from the building. "Well?"

"I don't understand how Eaton has got that field going," raged Sheldon.

"What have you been doing, Ho-Fang?"

"General Ho-Fang," corrected the bandit.

"At the rate he's going the whole project will be completed ahead of time. It's up to you to do something!"

Ho-Fang held out a hand.

"This is very big job," he said. "I want more money."

"Just show me some results," retorted Sheldon, "then I'll pay you."

Ho-Fang inclined his head.

"You are a very smart man, too," he murmured. "All right, you will see."

Two days after this conversation, Ho-Fang and his men set off across the eastern part of the desert, left their horses to graze on a patch of vegetation, and made their way along a winding trench beneath the bottom of which part of the long pipe-line was buried.

At the western end of the trench the big pipe emerged from the ground to pass across a wide rocky gap upon a wooden bridge, and there Ho-Fang gave instructions to Ming Yen, his repulsive second-in-command, and some of the men remained in the trench with their rifles while the others climbed the bridge and began to disconnect several joints in the pipe.

Crude oil was streaming down over the woodwork of the bridge, and Ho-Fang was nodding approval at the work of destruction, when the roar of an approaching aeroplane caused him to look up.

"Hurry! Hurry! Aeroplane!" he shouted in his own language. "Hide! Hide!"

The men on the bridge dropped from it in haste, and there was a general rush for the trench. But Lucky was in the aeroplane, returning from one of his frequent visits to the Kwei-Yong headquarters, and he had sighted the gang.

He came swooping down over the hills towards the bridge, and three of the bandits promptly flung themselves down on the sand and blazed away with their rifles. Those in the trench also opened fire; but Lucky defied the rain of bullets, cleared the bridge by no more than a couple of yards, saw the damage that had been done, and shot upwards to bank and turn.

On each side of the front cockpit a machine-gun was mounted, and for the next five minutes or so Lucky thoroughly enjoyed himself. He raked the trench with machine-gun fire; he spattered bullets at the three out upon the sand; and he had the satisfaction of seeing some of the men fall and the rest scatter in all directions.

Ho-Fang, a rank coward at heart, had squeezed himself between some upright timbers of the bridge and a jagged wall of rock, and from that place of concealment he fired a perfectly useless pistol at the aeroplane as it soared away towards the distant camp.

Less than an hour afterwards, Lucky burst in upon Chet, who was hard at work upon some accounts in the office.

"I just caught Ho-Fang and his mob tearing up your pipe-line!" he cried.

"What?" Chet flung down the pen he was using.

"Yeah, they took a couple o' shots at me, so I had to let 'em have it!"

"Aw, you're crazy, Lucky! It can't be Ho-Fang—it must have been some other outfit."

"Well, whoever it was," said Lucky, "I shot 'em up, anyway!"

"Any mail?"

"Yeah." Lucky produced some letters and handed them over, knowing quite well that one was from New York addressed in a feminine handwriting.

"It's a good thing General Moy Ku Ting gave us permission to carry machine-guns."

Chet did not even hear that remark. He had torn open the letter from New York, and those words seemed to hit him in the face before he had read the whole thing through:

"... a month made little difference, but anything can happen in a year, Chet. If I am so much less important to you than an oilfield in a desert—"

"Bad news?" inquired Lucky, studying his gloomy face.

"Yeah," Chet replied most unhappily.

"Alice?"

"Given you the air? Well, you're the kind of a guy that shouldn't get married, anyway. Now, I always say—"

"Oh, shut up!" Chet bellowed at him.

"My loyalty to this company has kept us apart for over two years. No sooner do I leave this confounded country behind than back I have to come again! Well, it's not going to keep us apart any longer—I'm going back to the States!"

"But, Chet, you can't do that!" protested Lucky.

"Oh, can't I, eh? Just keep those motors of yours warmed up!"

"But who's gonna take your place?"

"I don't know, and I don't care!"

"Well, what about your promise to the general? Better think that over!"

He left Chet to recover at leisure from the bitterness created by Alice's letter, and the subject of departure was not mentioned again that day. Next morning he was in the office with Chet when the sound of hoofs sent them both to a window.

"It's Ho-Fang," said Lucky, and reached into a hip-pocket for a six-gun he kept there. "Now you'll find out!"

"Keep that gun where it is," barked Chet, "and I'll take care of Ho-Fang."

They went out together on to the veranda as the bandit and his horse-men drew rein facing it.

"Hallo, Ho-Fang," greeted Chet. "On time, as usual."

"General Ho-Fang," insisted the bandit in a very unfriendly voice.

"General!" scoffed Lucky. "He may think he's a general!"

"Shut up!" hissed Chet. "Shut up!"

Ho-Fang flung out an accusing hand.

"He killed three of my men!" he rasped. "I want more money!"

"You know why I killed 'em?" demanded Lucky. "I caught you wrecking our pipe-line!"

"Other men wreck pipe-line," corrected the bandit. "I fix."

It was quite true that the pipe-line had been mended, but that was after Lucky had flown away and was due to Ho-Fang's artfulness.

"He's a cock-eyed liar!" exploded Lucky.

"Don't I know it?" growled Chet.

"What he say?" inquired the bandit suspiciously.

"He didn't say anything, general." Chet motioned to Lucky.

"Beat it, you fool," he whispered; and then, as Lucky backed into the office: "You know, general, all flyers are a little bit crazy."

"From now on," thundered the "general," "you pay double!"

"All right," shrugged Chet; "but you'll have to wait until the money comes from Kwei-Yong."

"I wait one week—no more." Ho-Fang waved a hand, uttered a curt command to his men, and rode away with them past the little forest of derricks in the general direction of Tak Tao.

Chet re-entered the office, and he said severely to Lucky:

"What were you trying to do, get us all killed?"

"Never mind that," said Lucky. "Now I understand why the duchess can't balance your accounts!"

"What are you driving at?" growled Chet. "And who's the duchess?"

"The new book-keeper Snyder installed just after you got here. You're a smart guy, aren't you? Snyder says no dough for Ho-Fang, so you pad the pay-roll to shell out to that bandit!"

Chet did not attempt to deny the charge.

"What else can I do?" he returned wearily. "Snyder doesn't understand my problems, or even try to."

"Oh, well, what's the difference?" drawled Lucky. "You say you're leaving, anyway."

"Sure I am," declared Chet—"just as soon as I can fix it with the general, that is. But you can tell Snyder, hot or cold, I'm pulling out of here!"

Lucky Has an Idea

Lucky flew off to Kwei-Yong again, partly to deliver that message, partly to send a cable to Alice Sylvester for Chet; and in Snyder's room he took up his favourite position on a corner of the resident manager's desk.

"What does he mean, he's quitting?" howled Snyder. "He can't do that!"

"Maybe he can't," said Lucky, "but he's going to. He swears he's catching the next boat home."

The wide-faced little manager scowled through his gold-rimmed spectacles at a harmless calendar.

"Three months to go on the renewal of the franchise!" he barked. "What does he expect me to do?"

"Well," expounded Lucky, "he promised the general he'd stay, you know. He wants you to talk Moy Ku Ting into letting him go."

"What does he think I am, a hypnotist?"

"Don't ask me, I'm only the company flyer."

The door from the outer office was opened, and Joan Manning walked towards the desk with several sheets from a loose-leaf ledger in her hand.

"That fellow Eaton's enough to drive anybody mad!" said Snyder explosively.

"That's what I say," complained Joan Manning. "I can't straighten out his figures—anybody who could would be a wizard."

Snyder's temper was not improved by that statement.

"No other book-keeper ever had any trouble, Miss Manning!" he blared.

"But let me show you," she pleaded. "I haven't any time to waste upon your inability to balance our books! I don't think we require your services any longer!"

Lucky shifted from the edge of the desk to a chair at the end of it, full of sympathy for the unfortunate girl who looked so utterly dismayed.

"Oh, but you can't mean that, Mr. Snyder," she protested, almost in tears.

"I'm doing the best I can with Mr. Eaton's accounts, but look—"

She held out the sheets, but the manager waved them aside.

"Sorry," he snapped, "that's all!"

She went out, biting her lip, yet carrying her head high, and Lucky had a word to say in her defence as soon as the door was closed.

"Now, look Snyder," he objected, "it isn't fair to have anybody take the rap for Eaton's dizzy book-keeping."

"What are you talking about?" rapped the manager.

"Well, nothing." Lucky had no desire to give Chet away. "But the duchess is stranded out here, you know, and—"

"Are you trying to tell me how to run this office?"

"Oh, no, no—I'm only the company flyer. But I know a mistake when I see one."

"Now, hsten, Phelps; you run your ship and I'll run this office. The question is what are we going to do about Eaton?"

"Don't ask me," retorted Lucky. "You're running this office."

"Can't you think of anything?"

Lucky rose with a sudden idea in his head and made for the door.

"What's the matter?" demanded Snyder.

"I'll tell you later—I don't know yet whether it'll work."

Only the Chinese typist was in the outer office, and Lucky turned to her after he had gazed blankly at Joan Manning's deserted desk.

"Cho-Cho, where's the duchess?" he asked.

"She just left," was the reply. "Gone home."

Off went Lucky, out from the building into the street, and he shouldered aside yellow men and white to catch up with the girl, shouting:

"Hi, Duchess! Duchess! Duchess! Wait a minute!"

It was in a crowded market that he reached her side and stopped her.

"Duchess," he said, breathless from running, "how would you like a new job?"

"Doing what?" she asked.

"I've got an idea, but first I've got to find out if you are willing."

"Willing to do what?"

"Well, this is something different. Lucky found it no easy task to express what was in his mind. "All you've got to do is to—er—be nice and friendly to a guy—a lonely guy who's discontented."

"I thought you were a flyer," she said scornfully, "not a match-maker. Now, listen, Don Juan, I'm not making love to anybody, least of all you!"

"You've got it all wrong! If you don't like the idea you can always say 'No,' but you might hear what it is. All you've got to do is to go up to camp and make Eaton like you."

"Eaton?" she exclaimed.

"Yeah," he nodded.

"I want to break his neck, not his heart!"

"Well, you can work on his neck in your own time. You see, there's a dame back in the States who's giving Eaton the air, and for her sake he wants to leave the company flat."

"A break for the company, I'd say offhand!" decided the sufferer from Chet's fantastic method of trying to balance his accounts.

Three of the bandits promptly flung themselves down on the sand and blazed away at the swooping aeroplane with their rifles.

February 5th, 1933.

"If he leaves," declared Lucky, "the company's sunk!"

"Why?"

Lucky explained.

"I don't see what I can do about it," said Joan.

"Well, he might realise there are other girls in the world with you around, because you're perfect—just the type he'd like. You've got the looks, the brains, and everything."

"Thanks for the testimonial," she bowed mockingly.

"You could go up there to audit the books, see? Snyder couldn't do a thing about it once you're fixed—and you'd like to let him know where he gets down, wouldn't you? There are quite nice quarters up there, and there's even a Chinese chaperon waiting for you."

Joan was tempted.

"But supposing it doesn't work?" she questioned.

"It will!" Lucky averred. "But whether it does or not, I'll guarantee your passage back to the States."

"Well, you've got me there," she confessed. "I guess you know how badly I want to go back home."

"Okay!" said Lucky joyfully. "Well, come on—we'll get your duds and fly right back there!"

On the return journey to the camp Joan occupied the rear cockpit, with a suitcase at her feet and a handbag on her knees, wearing a leather jacket with which Lucky provided her; and Lucky did no stunting on that trip.

He landed neatly on the sand outside the office, and she discarded the leather jacket and readjusted her little hat with the aid of a mirror in her handbag after he had helped her down. The suitcase was left in the cockpit, and on the veranda he motioned to her to wait while he went into the building.

Chet sprang up from a chair at sight of him, eager for news.

"What happened?" he asked.

"Well," said Lucky, "Snyder hasn't had time yet to see the general."

"Did he send any money?"

"No." Lucky shook his head. "He sent a book-keeper."

"A book-keeper?" howled Chet. "What in the world did you bring a book-keeper out here for?"

"Aw, it wasn't my fault," lied Lucky. "It was Snyder's idea. Wait a minute!"

He went to the door and beckoned, and Joan stepped in over the threshold, neatly arrayed in a grey costume with a little blue scarf round her neck, and looking very self-conscious.

"Miss Manning," said Lucky, "this is Mr. Eaton."

"How do you do?" she murmured.

"How do you do?" said Chet, staring at her.

"No one seems to be able to decipher your accounts, Mr. Eaton. That's why I'm here."

"I'm sorry, Miss Manning," returned Chet stiffly, "but I have a peculiar way of keeping my books. I'm afraid you've made this trip out here for nothing. Besides, this is no place for a woman."

"Oh, I don't mind!" she said.

Chet shook his head, and the set of his jaw indicated quite plainly that he did not intend to let her stay.

"Don't be a chump," urged Lucky. "Snyder won't send any money until you get the books audited."

"What I say still goes," Chet retorted. "Take Miss Manning back!"

Lucky gazed wryly at Joan and scratched the back of his neck.

"Well, orders are orders, I guess," he said dolefully. "I'm just the company flyer."

At that moment Johnny walked into the office, gaped at Joan, and whisked off his hat.

"I didn't know we had a visitor!" he exclaimed.

Chet scowled.

"Oh, Miss Manning," he said, "this is my brother Johnny."

Joan and Johnny exchanged greetings.

"Why don't you see the lady to the plane?" said Chet.

"Oh, sure!" Johnny restored his hat to his head. "I'm sorry you have to leave so soon, Miss Manning," he said regretfully. "Can't we induce you to stay?"

She made a little gesture of dissent, and they went out together. Chet immediately wrote on a pad and tore off the sheet.

"I want you to send this cable," he said to Lucky. "I'm going over Snyder's head to Thatcher himself. If I don't get money to that half-breed Ho-Fang he'll be on the rampage. Now get rolling!"

Johnny and Joan had reached the aeroplane, and Johnny was leaning against the side of it, studying the girl with interest.

"What was the idea of your coming here, anyhow?" he asked. "No one could call it a joy-ride."

"I've been trying to figure that out for myself," she returned.

"Well, where's the next stop?"

"Kwei-Yong, I guess."

"Kwei-Yong? I haven't been there since my brother got back from New York, but I'll be down there before the week is over."

"Good!" said she. "Then I'll see you."

Lucky arrived, climbed on to a wing of the machine, and offered a hand to help her up into the cockpit.

"Okay, dneess," he said. "let's go."

Joan shook hands with Johnny, and after she had become seated and Lucky had started the engines she waved to him.

Johnny stood staring out through the window, trying to summon the courage he needed for a task fraught with infinite danger.

The End of Wong

THE machine rose up into the air beyond the derricks, and soon was flying over the foothills of the Yablonoi Mountains. But Ho-Fang and his men were waiting for it in a trench, not far from the trestle bridge where the pipe-line had been damaged and repaired, and Ho-Fang bellowed an order as soon as it was within rifle range.

Bullets rained all about the machine, and two of them became buried in one of the engines, putting it out of action. Lucky saw the grinning faces of the bandits down below, but had as much as he could do to bank and turn with only one engine running, and he made for the camp again.

In spite of the damaged engine he achieved a perfect three-point landing in a cloud of black smoke, and he was down on the ground almost instantly with a fire-extinguisher in his hands, from which he squirted foamite upon the overheated motor.

Johnny rushed over from a well to help Joan down from her cockpit, and she said bitterly as she descended:

"I seem to be popular with everybody around here!"

Chet dived out from the office to Lucky.

"What's happened?" he shouted.

"Your friends from Tak Tao put a couple o' bullets in the engine," replied Lucky, still busy with the fire-extinguisher. "I think I can fix it."

Chet turned away and bellowed for Wong, who came running over from the native workers' mess-hut.

"You know where to find Ho-Fang?"

"Um," replied the little Chinaman. "Tak Tao."

"All right," said Chet. "You go tell him he has to wait for his money, but it come pretty soon. Now hurry!"

Wong set off on horseback for the little village on the fringe of the desert, and he reached it before sundown. In the Café of the Bronze Dragon he found Ho-Fang sprawling in a chair at his favourite table with several of his men around him.

The men eyed Wong narrowly as he crossed the big room, but Ho-Fang did not move, and in his own dialect the little Chinaman delivered Chet's message:

"General, I am sorry to say Mr. Eaton asked me to tell you he cannot give you more money yet, but you will get it soon."

Ho-Fang remained as motionless as an idol.

"Did you not hear me?" asked Wong.

The bandit motioned with one finger, and the repulsive Ming Yen closed in on one side of the messenger and another man gripped his left arm. Ming Yen reached a hand to a knife in his belt, and a cold sweat of fear broke out upon Wong's brow.

"I am only a messenger," he faltered, "do not harm me."

The knife was drawn. "Please!" shrieked Wong. "I am a messenger. Don't harm me! Don't harm me!"

Ming Yen looked inquiringly at Ho-Fang, and Ho-Fang raised a hand and dropped it with a thud upon the table. The knife was raised, and its blade flashed downwards. Wong collapsed to the earthen floor with a cry that died in his throat.

That night Joan slept in a perfectly comfortable bed of the camp-variety, made up for her by Mah Ling in the cabin the Chinese cook herself occupied. Johnny and she had become quite friendly by that time, and Chet had accepted her as an inevitable guest until the engine of the aeroplane had been repaired.

Time and again Johnny caught hold of the metal cap and tried to pull it down over the pipe that had become a volcano of flame.

Chet was quite pleasant to her at breakfast next morning, but breakfast was late, and he left her and Johnny at table after he had swallowed some tea and consumed some huttered toast.

Lucky entered the living-room as he went out, and Lucky said to the dumpy little cook:

"Step on it, Mah Ling; you'll have us bawled out for loafing!"

"Me no can help!" protested Mah Ling. "Wong go to Tak Tao, no come back. Me build fire and cook, too."

Lucky was served, and he devoured eggs and bacon with speed; but Johnny was in no hurry.

"You know," he said to Joan, "I don't think Ho-Fang is such a bad fellow, because if it weren't for him you wouldn't be here right now."

"Well, at least I'm popular with somebody!" laughed Joan.

"Popular? You're absolutely the —"

"You coming, Johnny?" interrupted Lucky, pushing back his chair.

"Why, sure—in just a minute," replied that rather infatuated young man. "Go ahead!"

Lucky departed, but he went no farther than the outside of the cabin, and through one of its windows he saw Johnny put a handkerchief over an empty glass and make passes above the handkerchief.

"What on earth are you doing?" asked Joan, watching him from the other side of the table.

"Magic," said Johnny, who hadn't had any intoxicating liquor for months, and he removed the handkerchief to grimace at the empty glass. "Do it every morning. Never have any luck!"

"Well, of course not," said Joan. "You haven't got your silk hat!"

"The magic book says it doesn't make any difference," he informed her with mock gravity; and he spread the handkerchief over an empty plate and made more passes.

The plate was just as empty as the tumbler when he removed the handkerchief, but he uttered a contented "Ah-h-h!"

"What is it?" she inquired, leaning forward.

"One of those big, beautiful, indigestible doughnuts you used to get in the States!" he proclaimed.

"Oh! May I have half?"

"Well, maybe."

"Oh, please!"

"All right, but it's the only one I've had in years."

He divided nothing with a knife, and conveyed nothing to her own plate with much ceremony.

"Hector was never that stingy!" she pouted.

"Hector? Who's Hector? My rival?"

"Uhuh!" She made a pretence of picking up the imaginary piece of doughnut and eating it. "Hector drove the bakery truck when I was eight years old. He had little freckles across his nose—and he gave me doughnuts." "Doughnuts?" echoed Johnny.

"Why, I'd give you whole pies!" "Oh, no, you wouldn't," she demurred. "Hector wouldn't like it."

"That doesn't make any difference, because I don't like him, anyway." Johnny moved round to an empty chair beside her, and his face became very close to hers. "I bet you were a homely little kid."

"So?"

"Yeah, because you've grown up to be so pretty."

Lucky put his head in at the doorway, and he shouted:

"Hi, Johnny! Chet wants to see you right away in the office. You'd better hurry."

Johnny stood up. "Stick around this dump," he said to Joan. "We'll have doughnuts for breakfast every morning."

"All right," she nodded; and then he went out.

Lucky promptly went in and walked straight over to the table.

"Hi, duchess," he rebuked, "that's Johnny, not Chet!"

"I know," she responded meekly.

"I think he'd have kissed you in another minute."

"Oh, Lucky, whatever made you think that?"

"Well, never mind—but I've got eyes. You want to start getting Chet under control?"

"And you'd begrudge just one little kiss from Johnny?"

"Why, sure I would! After all, if there are any spare kisses that Chet doesn't rate, what's the matter with me?"

He stooped suddenly and kissed her on the lips; but Johnny had returned from the office, and he burst wrathfully in upon them.

"Now I know why you lied about Chet wanting me!" he cried.

"Oh, he didn't want you?" asked Lucky with an air of innocence. "Well, maybe I was wrong."

He went out, leaving the two of them with very flushed faces.

"Just who haven't you kissed around here this morning?" demanded Johnny jealously.

"Oh, don't be silly," said Joan. "You don't understand."

"I understand," he raged.

"Oh, Johnny, listen to me!"

"Tell it to Chet, or Lucky! And you can tell all your friends they can find me in Tak Tao."

He dived into his own bed-room, slamming the door violently behind him, and she ran out to Lucky, who was at work on the engine of the aeroplane.

"Lucky," she said in an agitated voice, "I didn't like this idea from the beginning, and I like it even less now."

Lucky deserted the engine.

"Why, what's the matter?" he asked, surprised and dismayed to see tears in her eyes.

"I want Mr. Eaton to know the truth."

"But why this sudden change? What's happened?"

"Well, something that— Oh, never mind. Are you going to tell him, or am I?"

Lucky puffed out his cheeks and scratched the back of his neck.

"I can't very well do that," he complained.

"All right, then I will!" She turned in a very determined fashion towards the office.

"Wait a minute!" Lucky flew after her. "Listen! You can't do that!"

But Joan entered the office and went straight to Chet, who was at his desk.

"Mr. Eaton," she began tremulously, "I want to straighten out a few things that you don't understand. I—I—"

"Wait a minute! Wait a minute!" howled Lucky, standing beside her. "I'll tell him. It's my fault, boss. I—I thought—"

"Have you two taken leave of your senses?" Chet broke in, staring from one to the other. "What are you driving at?"

"Well, I had an idea," blurted Lucky. "I brought Miss Manning up here to help delay your departure. I thought that— Well, it didn't work."

To the infinite surprise and relief of both culprits, Chet did not seem to be in the least annoyed; on the contrary, he grinned.

February 5th, 1938.

"Miss Manning," he said quite affably, "are you really a book-keeper?"

"Yes, I am," she replied.

"Then I'll lay my cards on the table. I tried to make Snyder understand that I had to have money to buy protection from that half-breed brigand Ho-Fang. But he didn't give it to me, so I had to pad the pay-roll—and now I've got my books into such a mess that I can't even figure them out myself. I wonder if you could help me?"

"I'm sure I can," declared Joan. "May I look at the books?"

"I'll say you may!"

Lucky went back to the aeroplane, delighted that his scheme had not proved such a failure after all, and Joan became busy with the books.

"I must admit, Mr. Eaton," she said, about an hour later "that you were right when you said your methods of book-keeping were slightly peculiar."

"Well, you can't say I didn't warn you," said he.

In the Enemy's Hands

DARKNESS had enshrouded the desert, but Chet and Joan were still busy with the books in the lighted office, when Ho-Fang and his men rode up to the edge of the oilfield. There they all reined in their horses, except Ming Yen, and he rode on towards the buildings of the camp with the dead body of Wong across his knees.

Nobody saw him approach the office and drop his burden on the sand in front of the veranda, for the outdoor work of the day was over and the men were in their respective quarters. But Red Speed heard the beat of hoofs as Ming Yen galloped back to the waiting hand, and he looked out from the shack he shared with other white men. He ran to the office to report to Chet, and he stumbled over the dead body.

He looked into the office, and he saw Joan at the desk with Chet.

"Boss, will you come out here a minute?" he shouted.

"Yeah," Chet walked out to him, stepped off the veranda, and knelt beside the still form of the little Chinaman.

"Wong," he said, and gritted his teeth. "This looks like trouble, Red."

Lucky thrust his head and shoulders out of a window of the adjoining cabin.

"What's happened?" he asked.

"They've killed Wong," Chet answered.

"What?" Lucky deserted the window to make for the door; but Chet went back into the office.

"Where's Johnny?" he asked.

"He went to Tak Tao," Joan replied. "Or, at least, he said he was going there. I don't know when he left camp."

Chet turned to Lucky, who had just crossed the threshold.

"Stay here and take care of Miss Manning," he said. "I've got to go after Johnny."

Red had carried the body of Wong away from the buildings, and he was instructing some coolies to dig a grave when Chet found him.

"Get Burton and Jackson," he said, "and four horses. Johnny's gone to Tak Tao, and we've got to find him before Ho-Fang treats him the way he treated Wong!"

In less than five minutes Chet was galloping across the desert under a crescent moon with Red and the two white men he had specified; but Johnny had reached Tak Tao a full hour before, and he was at a table in the Café of the Bronze Dragon with a second bottle of wine before him when Ho-Fang and his ruffians descended the steps after they had returned from the oilfield.

Other customers of the establishment made themselves scarce as the brigand crossed the floor to his favourite table, but Johnny paid no attention to him whatever. The half-breed dropped into a chair, and from it eyed the drinker thoughtfully.

"Eaton's brother," whispered Ming Yen.

"So," nodded Ho-Fang, and then he rose and walked over to Johnny's table.

"Good-evening, young Mr. Eaton," he said. "I am very happy to see brother of my good friend. You drink with me?"

Johnny stared at him, saw that the other bandits were gathering round the table, and stood up without a word to put on the tweed coat he had discarded because of the heat of the semi-underground den.

"Ah, don't go," said Ho-Fang menacingly. "You be my guest—"

Still without a word, Johnny made to leave the table; but Ho-Fang shouted in Kahnuk, and Ming Yen's right hand went to the knife in his belt, while the others barred the way to the steps. Johnny sat down again, knowing quite well that escape was impossible.

"I say you be my guest!" Ho-Fang banged the flat of his hand upon the table, shouted for wine, and ordered his men to keep back.

A fresh bottle of wine was conveyed with fresh cups to the table by a slippered Chinaman, and Ho-Fang himself filled the two cups from the bottle and set one of them in front of the virtual prisoner.

"It is impolite for guest not to drink with host," he said.

Johnny spoke at last.

"Just what do you propose to do?" he challenged hoarsely.

"Prepare to make guest comfortable for long stay," was the ominous reply.

Chet and his companions had ridden into the village by this time, and had dismounted in the narrow street. But Chet found his brother's horse outside a tavern some little way from the Café of the Bronze Dragon—a tavern Johnny had visited first—and he wasted several minutes inside the place, looking into head-curtained alcoves and questioning the parchment-skinned proprietor.

He went out to the others, gazed up and down the street—and saw a lighted lantern hanging from a bronze dragon over a doorway.

"Let's try this one," he said.

The cup of wine Ho-Fang had set before Johnny was still untouched, and Ho-Fang considered himself insulted.

"You are very fortunate your brother is a wealthy man," he barked.

"If you think he's going to pay ransom for me," retorted Johnny, "you're crazy!"

"Oh, no," The brigand shook his head. "The message I sent to him by his servant Wong should convince Mr. Eaton I mean business."

Johnny knew nothing of what had happened to Wong, but he cried defiantly:

"You can't get away with this, Ho-Fang! There's a law in China that takes care of racketeers like you!"

"Here I make my own laws," boasted the brigand.

At that moment Chet descended the steps into the big room, alert and unafraid. He had left Red and the others in the entrance, but he was wearing a belt, and there was a six-gun in its holster.

He took in the situation at one swift glance, and he strode towards the table.

"Hallo, Ho-Fang," he said.

"General Ho-Fang," insisted the Mongolian half-breed, apparently in no

(Continued on page 26)

A New York gangster kills his lawyer and a tramp is arrested for the crime. Only one person can save him from the death sentence, and that is a girl witness to the killing. A broadcast fails to find her because she is in prison on a faked charge. On gaining her freedom she determines to get to New York by air, and stows away on a giant flying machine, where she is befriended by a Scotland Yard detective. A thrilling drama, starring John Loder and Anna Lee

'NON-STOP NEW YORK'

The Only Witness

WHEN Jenny Carr walked into a cheap open-all-night eating-house and ordered a cup of coffee and a ham sandwich she found that the price was twenty cents, and as she only possessed half that amount she had to content herself with coffee only. She went to a table and her eyes bulged so much with famished greed that a middle-aged fellow took compassion on her. Jenny had not eaten for two days, and though it was wrong to accept an offer of food from a strange man she had no scruples.

This food was such a long time coming, as it was New Year's Eve, that the man, whose name was Billy Cowper, invited her to come back to his apartment house where she could eat her fill.

The frank blue eyes of the girl studied the man, and she made up her mind that he could be trusted. Just before they left a little incident happened that she did not think much of at the time. A tough-looking man came up to her new friend and said that Brandt wanted to see him.

"Brandt can get himself another new lawyer for his dirty work," Cowper had answered. "I'm quitting and quitting for good."

"Brant'll have something to say about that!" growled the stranger, and vanished in the crowds.

In the taxi ride to his apartments Jenny frankly told the lawyer that she was down on her luck. She was English, back row of the chorus, and had come out with a show from England and opened in Philadelphia. Sadly she shook her curls and said that the show had closed in Philadelphia. She was being shipped back to England to-morrow alone, as she was the only girl for whom they had not been able to secure another job.

"Well, isn't that a laugh," Cowper chuckled. "I'm sailing for England myself to-morrow."

Jenny was surprised at the sumptuousness of Cowper's apartment, but being a perfect little lady she made no comment. A long table was covered with viands that made her mouth water.

"All the eats in the world," laughed the man, and waved his hand towards a door. "If you want to take your coat off and have a wash you can use that spare room."

And in that room she encountered a man, or rather a ragged, dirty little scrap of humanity, who cowered down at sight of her. Though terrified, Jenny asked in severe tones what he was doing there.

"Don't be scared, lady," the man whined. "I ain't going to hurt you. I ain't going to hurt nobody. I was hungry, that's all."

The tramp had stolen up the fire-escape and had seen all the food on the table. A window was open and he had entered and he had snatched a cold leg of chicken when he had heard a key in the door. He had darted into the bedroom, where she had found him.

"Give me a break, lady," the wretch whined. "I ain't stolen nothin'—I swear I ain't. Don't turn me in, lady."

Being a kindly, simple soul, the girl agreed to go back into the living-room, and, on the pretence of being cold, draw some heavy curtains that divided the room into two, forming a dining-room on one side and a small lounge on the other. This would enable the tramp to make the fire-escape. Jenny went to the room and Cowper smiled his permission for her to draw the curtains, and she was nibbling contentedly at a chicken bone when just the faintest sound told her that her friend the tramp had made his get-away.

Well, Jenny was not destined to enjoy this glorious spread because there was the sound of a key in the lock and three men strolled in. Jenny gave a slight gasp, because two were such big, tough-looking men, and the third a fat, affluent fellow in a fur-lined overcoat.

"Hope we're not busting up your party, Mr. Cowper," one of the newcomers remarked significantly.

"It's okay," the man in the centre said. "The lady's just leaving."

Jenny looked at her benefactor and saw he was not at all pleased at the intrusion, and that with difficulty he was restricting his temper.

"Would you like me to go?" "Maybe it would be as well," muttered Billy Cowper. "I'm sorry this should happen."

"All right. Thanks for all your kindness," Jenny picked up the largest chicken leg she could find. "Hope you don't mind me taking this with me. See you on the boat to-morrow."

"I hope so!" muttered Cowper, and he looked at the silent, fat man.

Now, Jennie did not know then that the silent man's name was Brandt, and that he was one of the highest racketeers in the United States. She would have shuddered if she had known his record of callous crime. She did not know as she went back to her diggings contentedly gnawing the chicken-bone that she was followed, and a considerable time was to pass before she learnt that the tramp she had befriended was arrested by the janitor as he was trying to slip away from the building.

When Jenny had gone, the fat man in the fur coat had smiled unpleasantly. He had heard that Bill Cowper was quitting, and he did not like people who quitted from his racket. Cowper, bravely and foolishly, had defied Brandt. He was tired and disgusted with the job of attorney to Brandt, with keeping him and his mob out of prison, and he hoped that he would never see the racketeer again. Brandt smiled and then shot him dead.

The next morning a thin, ferrety individual called at Jenny's lodgings and pretended that he was from the Emigration Department and learnt the name of the ship, the pier and time of departure, and that Jenny had left ten minutes before. Considering he had been watching the place for the last hour he did not need the last bit of information. In a side street a car waited, and here sat a plump, benevolent, smooth-cheeked man of at least sixty years. He cocked his head on one side as he listened and seemed very distressed. He hastened to a big hotel, where he was admitted to a magnificent suite. There were several men there, including Brandt.

"Pier II, 4.30," hurriedly exclaimed the plump man, whose name was Mortimer. "The girl sails to-day. I've got Harrigan for the job."

Brandt puffed lazily at his cigar. "Tell him to book a passage himself," decided the arch schemer. "He can do anything he likes, so long as he keeps her mouth shut."

"Isn't it a bit hard—the girl so young—so tender?" murmured Mortimer.

"She is the only person alive who knows that we were in that apartment last night," Brandt murmured. "A pity, of course, but there is no other course."

The early editions of the papers contained no mention of the crime, because it was not till midday that the body was found. No mention was made of the arrest of the tramp because it was only a vagrancy charge—then.

The liner was some hours out of New York before Jenny Carr found out from the purser that there was no Billy Cowper travelling to England on the ship. Just before sailing, some papers had been brought on board, and in the lounge Jenny saw the special edition containing the photo of Billy Cowper. "Times Square Lawyer Slain." She read with horror, and very white of face hastened to her cabin. The man Harrigan watched her with half-closed eyes.

The very next morning Harrigan complained to the purser that his cabin had been rifled of some valuable jewels. He was taken before the captain, and he stated that he had seen a woman leaving his cabin. Jenny was sent for and indignantly denied it. Her one small suit-case was fetched and there in a corner were gems worth a small fortune. The captain was in the position of a magistrate, and he ordered that Jenny be kept under lock and key for the rest of the voyage. Harrigan stated that he wished to prosecute, and the captain wirelessly for the police to meet the boat.

February 5th, 1938.

What a home-coming for poor Jenny Carr! She was whisked off to a court and sentenced to a month's imprisonment. The sentence should have been heavier but the magistrate was not quite satisfied with Harrigan's story, and the girl was so passionate in her plea of innocence.

Brandt Decides to Visit England

WHEN the case of the man Abel came up for trial Brandt and Mortimer sat at the back of the court.

"So you just dropped in for a meal," the District Attorney said with biting contempt. "Just climbed to the fourteenth floor to get a crust of bread?"

"I was hungry—honest I was," whined Henry Abel, the tramp. "I swear I didn't do it. It must have been one of the other men."

"What were their names?"

"I don't know."

"What did they look like?"

"I don't know." Abel shook his head. "I was hiding on the fire-escape and only saw 'em through a chink in the curtains. I was scared, and I beat it."

"It is curious, Abel, that no one else has seen these men you speak of," persisted the D.A.

"But the girl did."

"Ah, so we're going back to the girl again!"

"She saw me leave while Mr. Cowper was still alive."

"Doubtless your attorney"—here the D.A. paused to stare across at the lawyer for the defence—"a man of the greatest attainments, has searched persistently for this missing witness."

"Sure he has," answered the prisoner.

"And your appeal has been spread far and wide?"

"Sure."

NEXT WEEK'S GRAND FREE GIFT!

This Full-coloured
Postcard-size Art
Plate of
MAX MILLER
Given Away
FREE!

"And she has nothing to fear in coming forward?"

"No."

"Then if your story is true, and if this girl really does exist—," The D.A. looked at the jury. "Isn't it rather strange we have seen nothing of her? I don't think this rather vague person ever existed."

"I'm going to England," Brandt whispered to his companion.

"But Scotland Yard, dear boy."

"What about it?"

"Let's face it—the name Brandt—it stinks," said Mortimer.

"That is why I'm not going to use it," Brandt retorted. "I'm sailing to-night, and you're coming with me."

"But, dear boy, I'm not popular in England."

"When the girl comes out of gaol none of us will be popular. She knows too much, and you're coming to stop her talking."

"But supposing we are seen together?"

"Don't worry—we won't be seen together."

"But on the ship as first-class passengers?"

Brandt smiled.

"You won't be a first-class passenger!" he said with a slight sneer.

They read in a paper that night that Henry Abel had been found guilty of murder in the first degree. The sentence of the court was that he be delivered to the warden at Sing Sing, there to be put to death in the manner prescribed by law.

The lawyer for the defence believed his client's story, and as a result the National Broadcasting Company issued a world appeal. If the girl would come forward a man's life would be saved.

The matter got into the English papers because it was thought that the missing girl was English, but the S.O.S. was not answered because Jenny Carr was in prison.

Brandt and Mortimer were masters at the art of disguise. Brandt travelled as General Costello, a distinguished officer from Paraguay, whilst Mortimer went steerage as a clergyman very much down on his luck. On arrival in England the general went to a luxurious hotel, but the clergyman went and obtained lodgings at the humble home of Mrs. Carr, the widowed mother of Jenny Carr.

Mrs. Carr was at Holloway to greet her daughter on the day of her release, and not one word of reprimand did she make. She took her daughter straight home.

Jenny Goes to Scotland Yard

ON the way Jenny told her mother how she had been sent to prison for something she had never done. Mrs. Carr consoled her daughter, and, having a great respect for the law, was not quite certain that Jenny was telling the truth. Mr. Carr had once been in prison for altering a cheque, and Jenny might have taken after her father. On reaching the dingy apartment house the mother and daughter went to their rooms in the basement. Jenny looked up when she heard heavy footfalls on the stairs.

"Who's that?"

"That's the new gentleman upstairs," explained Mrs. Carr. "Such a nice-spoken gentleman—sort of religious. He wanted to come down and meet you." The door opened and the new guest beamed at them shyly. "Good-morning, Mr. Mortimer, come right in!"

"Good-morning!" Mortimer rubbed his chubby hands together as he stared solemnly at Jenny. "So this is the little girl we've heard so much about?"

Mr. Mortimer accepted Mrs. Carr's offer of a cup of tea, and chatted brightly about nothing in particular. Jenny wished he would go, and moved restlessly round the room that was their kitchen and their parlour. Mr. Mortimer watched her furtively. Jenny picked up a daily paper, and, turning it over, saw a face that she recognised.

"My goodness, but I know that man!"

"Don't talk so silly, my dear!" Mrs. Carr looked over her shoulder. "Stop pointing at a murderer and come and have your tea."

With dilated eyes and little gasps of horror Jenny read how this man Henry Abel had been convicted of the murder of Billy Cowper, and was shortly to die.

"But he didn't do it!" Jenny cried. "You come and have your tea," begged her mother.

"I know he didn't—I was there!" "She's so imaginative, Mr. Mortimer," Mrs. Carr said in sorrowful tones. "When she was a little girl—always seeing elephants in the Old Kent Road. Now where are you going?" she added sharply, as Jenny picked up her hat and coat.

"Scotland Yard!" "Young lady," Mortimer came towards her, his hands held out pleadingly, "we know you've been through a trying experience which might make any girl suffer from delusions. Don't forget that you have just come out of prison. Suppose you did persuade the police that it wasn't an illusion—and that this man is innocent—after all, somebody did shoot Billy Cowper. How could you prove it wasn't you?"

"That's right, dear," Mrs. Carr put her arms round her daughter. "You sit down and drink your tea. Besides, I got a little surprise for you. They're rather shorthanded down at one of the offices what I chaps, and the manager said that if you would like the job you could have it."

Reluctantly Jenny stayed. The words of Mortimer had frightened her. They might fix the crime on her, especially as she had been in prison for the theft.

When Mr. Mortimer had gone she tried to bring up the matter, but she could not convince her mother.

"All right—you needn't believe me!" Jenny cried in anguish. "But it's true. Now he's in the death house and everybody's nice to him because they know he's going to die."

"Don't talk so horrible!"

"The day after tomorrow it is. And everyone in the prison will know it's going to happen. And he didn't do it!" Jenny heat her hands together. "Oh, what shall I do?" She grabbed up her coat. "I will go to Scotland Yard, no matter what you say!"

And when she left the house fat Mr. Mortimer followed her.

Inspector Jim

Grant amused himself playing patience whilst he listened to the tale of Miss Harvey, a dark, sparkling-eyed creature. He disliked her make-up and the reek of seent.

"Poor Mr. Abel! I think of him always as the man with the haunting eyes!" she cried dramatically. "Believe it or not, inspector, night after night, I've laid without closing my eyes, listening to his voice crying out to me in New York to come to his help."

"Why didn't you come forward before?" the inspector asked, moving a card and frowning over it.

"I would have done—only I couldn't bear to think of the publicity."

"What made you think there'd be any publicity?"

"Won't there be? Won't there be?" the woman demanded in sharp tones.

"First of all you could not remember the name of the boat you came over on," Grant said, without looking up. "You had no idea how many funnels she had, finally you said it was the Mauretania. Well, the Mauretania's on the scrap heap, and you've never been to America in your life. You're the fourth person who has come here pretending to be the missing witness. I'm sorry, but we're not supplying free trips to New York."

The good-looking young inspector just smiled when the woman began to rave about Scotland Yard. When she had gone he continued his game, and was so engrossed he did not hear a door open.

"I'm Jenny Carr, 127, Appleby Road, Southwark, and I went to New York to act in a play—"

The inspector glanced round. Another one. He sighed resignedly.

"I was bumped into by a man in the street," Jenny went on, gabbling out her words in her nervousness. "He was bumped off on New Year's Eve, and he took me to his flat—apartments they call them—and whilst I was there I saw a man—"

"Here—wait a minute—wait a minute," the inspector interrupted.

"But it's true."

"But I haven't said it wasn't," Grant opened a notebook. "Let's have the name and address first, and then the story afterwards."

Jim Grant took down her story, and even allowed her to draw a plan of the rooms. He thought she was rather attractive, and certainly her yarn was the best to date, though the bit about leaving the apartment gnawing a chicken-bone gave him his doubts.

"Can you tell me anything about these men you saw?"

"No. I didn't take much notice of them," answered Jenny. "I didn't dream they were going to be mixed up in a murder. I would remember one man if I saw him strike a match."

"Saw him strike a match?"

"I couldn't imitate him, but he did it in such an odd way. He was a big, fat man—greasy-looking."

"I'm afraid, Miss Carr, that there are a lot of fat, greasy men in this world." The inspector was gazing longingly at his cards. "Lots of people strike matches in queer ways. Are you sure you ever went to New York. This is not imagination—"

"Don't you dare lay hands on me!" stormed a voice, and into the room burst the portly Mr. Mortimer. He pushed the policeman away and rushed forward, arms extended. "Jenny! In the nick of time! You'll excuse me, inspector, won't you?"

"Any time you're passing, just break in," Grant's smile was a little mocking.

"My name is Mortimer." The fat man was all out of breath. "I lodge at the house of this unfortunate girl's mother."

"Don't you listen to him—he tried to stop me coming here!" stormed Jenny.

"Oh dear, oh dear!" Mortimer wiped his brow. "And Jenny just out of prison and her poor mother in tears."

Brandt smiled evilly and shot the lawyer dead.

"Don't listen to him, I tell you!" cried the girl.

"Don't be too hard on her!" Mortimer looked pleadingly at the inspector. "She's stage-struck—no job—a craving for publicity."

"Then there is no truth to her story?" asked Grant.

"Her claim to have been present at the Ruislip murder?" asked Mortimer. "Ruislip? I'm talking about a murder in New York."

Mortimer raised his eyes heavenwards.

"Is there no end to her imagination?" He turned to the inspector. "I begged her not to come here."

"Is it true you're an actress out of a job? Have you just come out of prison?"

"Yes, but——"

"And if you were announced as the missing witness you would get publicity!" stormed the inspector. He pointed to the door. "And publicity would help you to get a job as an actress. Come and see me when you've had your pearls stolen. Good-morning!"

"Well, of all the flat-footed——" began Jenny, and checked herself.

"Don't be too hard on her!" begged Mortimer.

"Don't worry."

"Then we won't hear any more about this?"

"As long as you go and leave me in peace!" Grant rapped out.

Mortimer heaved.

"Thanks, dear boy. Come, Jenny!" But Jenny had already gone.

Blackmailers

GENERAL FRANCIS XAVIER COSTELLO had a suite of rooms at the Hotel Majestic, and he was allotted a personal servant by the name of Spurgeon to attend to his needs. This valet was big like his master, but with very small eyes, and was the perfect valet.

He entered the room where Costello reclined on a couch, and bowed over the tray he carried.

"A letter for you, sir."

The general took the letter and opened it.

"I am glad to say that we shall hear no further of the young lady. She got to Scotland Yard with two days in hand, but our friend in Sing Sing still goes to that uncomfortable chair."

Costello smiled. His underlings never failed him. He tore the letter up and tossed it into a waste-paper basket. He was unaware that those small eyes watched him covertly.

"Anything else, sir?"

"No. Tell the manager I do not wish to be disturbed, and particularly I do not wish to see reporters."

"New York reporters, sir?"

Costello eyed the man sharply.

"Why did you say New York reporters?" he demanded.

"Oh, nothing, sir!" the valet answered with his usual suave smile. "Your manner—I rather formed the impression."

"I have lived there," Costello admitted. "But I come from Paraguay. That is my heaven and my hell. And very soon I go back to my country. I shall be dictator or martyr. The President's palace or the firing squad. It is life. We live even when we die—in Paraguay."

"Yes, sir." Spurgeon bowed himself from the room. But when the general was out for an airing he collected those pieces of torn letter.

That evening he hung around a certain street till a flashily dressed man appeared. Mr. Pryor was a bookmaker among many other professions, and he eyed Spurgeon craftily.

"Mr. Pryor, I once supplied you with a letter acquired in the course of my professional duties," Spurgeon said in soft tones. "You resold it to a lady for fifty pounds."

"That's past history."

"I've found another letter just by chance—much more valuable. I thought as you were interested in blackmail——"

"Me, interested in——" Pryor looked indignant. "How dare you call me a blackmailer! If I buy something somebody else wants that's business. For two pins I'd hand you over to the nearest cop. For two pins——" He paused. "All right, come inside!"

The two men entered the house where Pryor conducted his business, and soon were seated in a room where the doors were padded. Pryor trusted no one, not even his servants.

"Who dies in Sing Sing in two days?" questioned Spurgeon. "A gentleman called Abel. The missing witness, you've heard of her—somebody wants to keep her out of the way. I have a letter."

"Who's the letter to?"

"Finders keepers—you'll have to buy it."

"All right." Pryor tucked his fingers into his waistcoat and revealed the massive gold chain on his waistcoat. "Thirty bob."

"The police would give me more."

"How do I know it's genuine?"

"You don't trust me?"

"As far as I can throw a grand piano," sneered the bookie. "Three quid."

The price eventually struck was five guineas. Pryor studied the letter that Spurgeon had pasted together and decided he had got a good bargain. He rang through to the Majestic and learnt that General Costello had left and was flying to New York on the air mail.

"What are you doing to do?" asked Spurgeon.

"Buy a bathing-suit and swim after him!" snapped Pryor, and dialed another number. "Is that Atlantic Airways? Have you a private cabin? You have. I'll take it."

Spurgeon left and went straight to Scotland Yard. He was going to get all he could out of that letter. He saw Inspector Grant, and told a tale about Grant opened a notebook. "Let's have the name and address first, and then the story afterwards," he said.

February 5th, 1935.

a letter he had seen Pryor receive whilst he was in the bookie's office. He was too honourable to reveal all he knew.

"Judge my astonishment, Mr. Grant, when Sam Pryor rang up and booked a place on the Air Mail."

"What's he up to?"

"Business, Mr. Grant. Blackmail, if I may use the word."

All Spurgeon got from Scotland Yard was the handsome reward of five shillings. The superintendent had been present at the interview.

"Think there's anything to this tale?"

"Occasionally that double-crosser speaks the truth," Grant admitted. "It sounds to me that Pryor's got hold of some man tied up with a girl, and business men usually pay up."

"How'd you like a trip to New York?"

"Very much."

"I want Sam kept out of mischief," stated the superintendent. "You'd better book on the Air Mail. It's about time we had Sam behind bars—he's been out too long."

Meanwhile, Mrs. Carr had at last been convinced that Jenny's story was not imagination. When she heard that Mr. Mortimer had followed her to Scotland Yard and made that extraordinary statement, she realised that there must be something to her daughter's story.

"I was framed on the boat, mother. And now I've been framed again!" cried Jenny. "And you've just told me that Mr. Mortimer had his trunk collected just before I got back, and you remember seeing a New York label on it."

"To think that I may have been harbouring a murderer!" gasped Mrs. Carr. "I'll have his room fumigated from floor to ceiling."

"What are we going to do?"

"It's no good going to the police," murmured Mrs. Carr.

"If only I could get to New York," cried Jenny. "They'd believe me there."

"But it takes four days, and they electrify the poor gentleman to-morrow evening!" Mrs. Carr suddenly stiffened.

"Look!" She pointed to a poster on the wall. "I pined—took them from the travel bureau where I works. Kinda ornamental I thought 'em for the walls. Look what it says. London to New York in eighteen hours—fares sixty-five pounds."

"And we've only got seventeen-and-fourpence between us!" mocked Jenny. Her eyes suddenly shone with determination. "But I'm going to get on that plane somehow. Mother, we've got to do it!"

Non-stop New York

BY the side of a wharf at Southampton rested the giant air-liner. The service had started in 1938, and now in 1940 these giant machines flew daily across the Atlantic.

One of the first to arrive was a fussy, middle-aged woman and a boy with very long hair. The boy carried a violin-case under his arm, and all the officials paid respects to him, whilst reporters and Press photographers crowded round. Arnold James was a boy prodigy on the violin, and was going to America with his Aunt Veronica to open in New York. General Costello arrived about the same time.

"Who is that?" he asked a porter.

"The infant prodigy; plays the violin like an angel."

"Oh!" Costello shrugged his shoulders. "In my country we shoot them."

He passed into the huge machine, to

Sam walked across to the bunk, and from his pocket produced the letter.

he followed seconds later by Sam Pryor. From a steward Pryor found out that Costello's cabin was D.2.—he tipped the man a dud half-crown.

The prodigy would have liked to have gone on board, but the reporters surrounded him. The boy scowled because he knew his dear aunt loved all this publicity.

"Aren't you excited at playing with the Philharmonic?" a reporter asked.

"No, I'm not."

"Of course he is," interposed Aunt Veronica. "Dreadfully excited."

"Auntie is," the boy grinned. "It means dough."

"Arnold!" Her eyes flashed, and then she was all smiles. "Please excuse him—airplanes always excite him."

Standing quite close to the gangway were Jenny and her mother. There was an official at the gangway, and she had to get past that man somehow.

"Promise me you'll have a mustard bath afterwards and put a stocking round your throat?" whispered Jenny.

"Yes, dear, I will!" Mrs. Carr said in tragic tones.

"Good-bye!"

"Good-bye!" Mrs. Carr straightened her shoulders, clutched her umbrella and edged to the side of the wharf.

No one noticed her because everyone was so occupied with the boy prodigy, and sightseers just had to gaze at the mammoth flying machine. Mrs. Carr walked over the edge and screamed lustily as she fell—she screamed even more in the water. Everyone rushed to the wharf. It was Jenny's chance to walk casually up the gangway because the one official was busy flinging Mrs. Carr a rope. Aunt Veronica had pushed the boy towards the gangway because she was always frightened something was going to happen to him—whilst she went and had a look. Thus Arnold was the only person to see Jenny go up that gangway.

Jenny was inside and wondering where all the various corridors went when she became aware of a small boy at her side.

"You didn't give up your ticket."

"Didn't I?"

"Shall I give it up for you?"

"No, no, please don't bother—it's quite all right really."

"It wouldn't be any trouble," persisted Arnold.

"That's what you think," answered Jenny, staring over the boy's head. She could just see a dripping form in the midst of a small crowd. Her mother was safe. She did hope she did not catch a cold.

"I know why you want to keep it," Arnold interrupted her thoughts. "You collect tickets."

"Yes, that's it—how did you guess?"

"I do, too," the boy grinned. "I've got a marvellous collection. You give me your ticket and I'll swap it for two London to Leeds and a second-class to Vienna."

"What! For an air mail to New York? No fear!"

"I'll make it first-class to Vienna," said the young dealer.

"Arnold, what are you suggesting?" Aunt Veronica had arrived on the scene. "Don't take any notice of him, my dear. He's always inviting people to travel with us—so generous."

"I'll have another talk with you later," Arnold cried, as his aunt whisked him away.

"Yes—make it much later," prayed Jenny.

The next obstacle that Jenny encountered was a steward, who made persistent inquiries about luggage, and in order to avoid him Jenny tried to enter a cabin, which he informed her suspiciously was the control-room, but she got rid of him somehow. Her one hope was an unoccupied cabin, and a light of hope appeared in her eyes when she came to a door and there was no card in the reservation slot.

Five minutes before the giant was due to take off a taxi deposited Inspector Grant at the dock. The willing steward took his suitcase and led him to the door without a reservation.

"By rights your name should be on February 5th, 1938."

this door, sir," stated the steward. "But as you booked late there wasn't time." He turned the handle, but the door remained closed. "That's funny—seems to be closed. Shan't keep you half a jiffy, sir."

The steward returned in a few minutes with a key.

"Is there a Mr. Sam Pryor among your passengers?" the inspector inquired.

"Yes, sir. No. 15."

"Thanks."

"Excuse me, sir. Is he a friend of yours?"

Grant's sensitive mouth twitched.

"In a kind of way he is." He eyed the steward keenly. "Why?"

"Well, sir, perhaps you wouldn't mind giving him back his 'arf-crown." He handed it over with a sniff. "E ain't finished it."

The inspector studied the half-crown and laughed heartily because it was a very obvious dud. He tossed the steward a genuine half-crown and entered his cabin.

Considering it was an air-liner it was quite a commodious cabin, and after a quick rinse in the basin Jim Grant decided to unpack his bag and put his spare suit on a hanger in the wardrobe. The inspector had had a life full of experience, but it was quite a shock to find that the wardrobe had an occupant.

"I'm awfully sorry!" cried Jenny. "I didn't know that this was your cabin."

"It's a small world," remarked Jim, and motioned for the girl to climb out of the wardrobe. "You aren't by any chance a stowaway?"

"Oh, no!"

"You just live in wardrobes during the winter months?"

"Yes, that's right. Moths do, too."

"Come on—get out!" gruffly ordered the inspector, angry that this girl should ruffle his serenity so easily. Since she had visited Scotland Yard he had thought about her quite a lot. Terrible for so cool and calm a young man to grow fond of someone slightly mentally deficient.

"Where to?" Jenny's eyes did not waver.

"Anywhere. But get off this 'plane."

"Mr. Grant, I've a special reason for being here."

"I suppose you are going to tell me that you were there and Dr. Crippen had nothing to do with it."

"Don't be idiotic—I'm serious."

He studied her.

"Why are you so keen to get to New York?"

"I've told you once," she answered angrily. "And you wouldn't believe me. You're just a policeman—all your mind about is stringing people up. A lot you care if they're innocent or guilty."

"But you do care?"

"Yes, I do."

Grant fingered his chin.

"I've a good mind to let you get away with this."

She screwed up her small nose.

"Inspector Grant, I'm afraid you'll have to. I've a strong idea we're taking off." She darted to the door. "Thanks so much for our nice talk."

The steward got a shock to find the young lady coming out of the cabin, and was gaping after her when the inspector called him.

"Steward, that young lady who just went out is a Miss Carr." He produced a ten-shilling note. "She fancies herself as a stowaway."

"A stowaway! Who let her in?"

"Vo! did, for one. Now, listen. Go tell the captain I'll be responsible for February 5th, 1935.

her ticket, but don't let her know who's doing it."

"Yes, sir." The steward pocketed the money. "Nice-looking young lady, sir."

"That's got nothing whatever to do with it."

"No, sir," said the steward, and winked brazenly.

The steward found Miss Carr and placed her in a cabin that had not been reserved, and was going away this time the richer by a shilling when he heard a queer wailing noise. Round the corner came Arnold, and he was clutching a glittering instrument.

"I'm looking for an empty cabin, steward."

"Well, there isn't one. I've given it to the stowaway—I mean the—er—late arrival."

"But where can I practise my saxophone?"

"Oh, that reminds me!" The steward nodded his head. "The captain specially asked me to tell you not to play that on account of the passenger that's balmy."

"There isn't a passenger that's balmy."

"No, but there will be if you play that saxophone."

The Blackmailer Almost Foiled

GENERAL COSTELLO was reclining in his bunk. He selected a cigarette from a gold case, placed it in a long holder, and then with his left hand struck a match sharply. A moment later there came a knock at his door, and Sam Pryor entered.

"General Costello?"

"I do not talk with strangers."

"I'll do the talking," Sam walked across to the bunk, and from his pocket produced the letter. He turned it so that Costello could read, "Seen that before?"

Though the startled racketeer did not betray himself, he answered at once:

"Never!"

"That's funny!" purred Sam. "Because it's addressed to you. It's to tell you that they've got rid of the witness in the Abel case."

"Very kind of them to tell me." The general blew a cloud of smoke in Sam's face. "But why should it interest me?"

"Never mind the bluff, general. I want a thousand pounds for this letter."

"Do I misunderstand you, or are you a blackmailer?"

"We don't call it that."

"I meet so many. I am rich. They make a target of me."

"And I bet they score a few bulls-eyes."

"Usually it is a woman." The general yawned carelessly. "They make up letters from me—very bad letters. Sometimes I pay because I am a fool."

"That's enough, general!" snarled Sam Pryor. "Do I get the thousand pounds or do I go to the police?"

"Whether you go to the police or not depends on whether you stop this absurd nonsense. You bring me a letter I have never seen—"

"It was in your room."

"How do you know? Did you see it there? You did not. Someone sold it to you? Someone you trust?" The general laughed. "No, I see you do not!"

Sam Pryor fidgeted uneasily, but said nothing.

"You buy a letter from a man you do not trust and you try to blackmail General Costello." Again the racketeer blew smoke contemptuously in the other's face. "In my country, in Paraguay, I have had men shot for less.

Did you think to inquire at the Embassy? If you had they would have told you that I was in Paraguay when this murder was committed."

"Come orf it, general!" muttered Sam, but his tones had lost much of their aggressiveness. "I want money."

The general sat up.

"So you persist? Now I shall punish!" He slid from the bunk and went over to the 'phone on a table. "It is a matter for the captain. He will radio to my Government in Paraguay. I shall demand your arrest."

The bluff worked. Sam Pryor was scared. The last thing he wanted was the captain drawn into this. Suppose Spurgeon had double-crossed him—he wouldn't put it beyond that slick chiseller. Apologising and bowing, Sam Pryor backed to the door.

"I didn't mean it, general. It was only a joke."

"You should keep your fun for those who do not take it too seriously. Now leave me, please."

"Certainly, general. No offence, general." Sam opened the cabin door and got out. He stood there staring at the closed door, and a voice behind made him jump.

"So you didn't bring it off?"

"Well, if it isn't Mr. Grant?" cried Sam, quickly recovering from the shock of seeing an arch enemy. "Always pleased to see old friends."

"They're better than new ones."

Grant answered in grim tones with a significant glance at the closed door. "You don't look as if you'd been very successful with General Costello, which means you were on the wrong scent."

"I don't know what you're talking about." Sam raised his eyebrows in indignant denial. "It's difficult to notice scent when there's a policeman about."

"Sam, if you're thinking of looking round for a new victim—don't!"

"We workers never let up, Mr. Grant."

"So I gather." The inspector fumbled in his pocket. "By the way, you haven't change for half-a-crown, have you?"

"Certainly—anything to oblige. A shilling and three sixpences."

"Thanks very much." Grant took the money and handed over the half-crown. At that moment the steward appeared and he hailed him. The shilling and three sixpences changed hands. "With Mr. Pryor's compliments."

"What's the idea?" demanded the bewildered Sam.

"You look at that half-crown," chuckled the inspector, and strolled away whistling.

Sam, very depressed, went off to his cabin and pulled up sharply at the weird sounds that came from inside. He opened the door to find the long-haired boy prodigy playing his saxophone.

"What's the idea?" truculently demanded Sam.

"Auntie doesn't like me to play this—it's so common," explained Arnold. "So I came in here."

"Well, I hate it, so you can go away."

"But I've got nowhere else to go. They gave the empty cabin to the stowaway."

"Stowaway? What stowaway?"

"Mr. Grant's friend," explained Arnold. "I think he found her in his cabin. The steward told me."

Sam tried tweaking the prodigy's ear, but that gained for him only a howl of resentment; but an offer of money caused Arnold to grin. The boy grinned when asked how much he wanted.

"Three shillings."

"How much?" snapped Sam.

"Two shillings."

"Don't let's be ungenerous." Sam dived in his pocket. "Make it half-a-crown."

After Sam had gone to his cabin Jim Grant knocked at the general's door and a gruff voice bade him enter. He explained that he was from Scotland Yard, and that he knew the reputation of Sam Pryor so well that he feared the general might have been worried by the man.

"It is a flea bite," Costello smiled. "In my country we are used to flea bites."

"Well, if he worries you any more just let me know."

"Thank you. You shall be my guest and kill him. You are a policeman—you will like it."

The inspector left the general's cabin and his face was thoughtful. He had studied Costello closely and though the light was not good the disguise and make-up were so perfect that he had not noticed any flaws. No harm in keeping the general under observation. On the way back to his own cabin he passed Sam's, and the click of the door made him glance round. Arnold came out, and then Sam's head showed, and the rascal had a finger on his lip.

"Blackmailing small boys?"

"Certainly not. You misjudge me."

"You look much more cheerful." The inspector gazed critically at the man. "Sam Pryor, have you got anything on the general?"

"I don't follow you, Mr. Grant."

"Well, you can't blackmail a man unless he's done something to be ashamed of."

Sam grinned mockingly and almost closed his door so that only part of his face could be seen.

"Perhaps he was once a policeman," he jeered, and closed the door with a slam.

Pryor Tricks Jenny

THE mammoth of the air covered mile after mile in almost monotonous regularity. There was a captain and three pilots, a crew of six, several stewards, a chef, a maid, and even a barman. By now more than half the Atlantic had been crossed. Most of the passengers were resting in their cabins, when Jenny, restless and worrying what was going to happen when she reached New York, went into the small and empty lounge.

Having little money Jenny was sipping some iced water when Sam Pryor poked his head round the door, gave a satisfied nod at seeing Jenny alone and entered. He stared through the windows down at the sea that shimmered silvery in the sun. Luck favoured him because the steward appeared and that gave him a chance to say something that he wanted Jenny to overhear.

"What rabin did you give Miss Carr?"

"D5, sir."

"Is that a nice one?"

"One of our best, sir."

The steward went up to the bar to collect some drinks, and the girl moved across to Pryor.

"Excuse me, did you say Miss Carr?"

"I did." Pryor watched the steward craftily.

"But I'm Miss Carr."

"Exactly," Pryor whispered, and noticed the steward leaving with a loaded tray.

"But—"

"I couldn't let you work your passage in the galley or be imprisoned as a stowaway."

"Thank you, it's very kind of you."

"Not a bit—pleasure to do anything for a friend of Jim Grant's."

"You haven't got anything to do with Scotland Yard?"

"Yes, quite a lot, from time to time," Pryor admitted.

"I didn't notice you when I saw Inspector Grant."

"Well, he's in a different part of the building; what we jokingly call the slim end, you know."

"I suppose you're in the classy part?" questioned the all-nuspecting girl.

"Well, I don't want to boast." His eyes became shrewd. "By the way, what exactly did you tell Jim Grant?" He saw her hesitate. "I will be frank with you, Miss Carr. My name is Pryor, Superintendent Sam Pryor of the C.I.D. Now I know you won't repeat this."

"Cross my heart."

"Jim Grant has been overworking. Such a nice fellow, too. A sort of nervous breakdown. That's why we're giving him this little holiday. I'm taking over his work."

"Then you'll be able to help me."

"Of course—of course. Now just what did you tell poor Jim?"

"That I saw the man who killed Billy Cowper," stated Jenny.

"My dear girl, do you realise this is very valuable information?" cried Sam.

"Of course I do. They're going to kill an innocent man to-morrow, and I'm going to stop it."

"Miss Carr, what you've told me rather alters my plans," Sam said with an air of great trust in the girl. "You didn't happen to notice if one of 'em was a foreign-looking chap, very military moustache—kind of bull-fighter?"

"There wasn't anybody at all like that. Two of them were quite ordinary, and the third—I didn't see

He produced a strip of grey silk. "This is a piece I cut out of Auntie's parachute," he told the inspector.

February 5th, 1938.

his face properly—but he had a funny way of striking a match with his left hand."

Jenny demonstrated and Sam could hardly restrain his joy. He had been watching Costello closely and he had seen that curious way of striking a match.

"Don't breathe a word of this to anybody," Sam hissed dramatically. "And remember, don't call me superintendent in public, as I'm strictly incognito. Now you'd better get along to your cabin, but if you could get hold of that Arnold kid I'd like a word with him."

Being a curious-minded boy, Arnold was in the lounge in about two minutes. "Are you really a superintendent?" he asked.

Sam muttered under his breath. Of course that fool girl would go and let it out.

"Never mind who I am. I've a job for you." Sam gazed round, and was glad to see that they were alone save for the barman, who was yawning. "Now, we've a notion this General Costello isn't General Costello."

"Who is he then?"

"Can't say—confidential." Sam's voice became low and tense. "I want you to find out if he really comes from Paraguay."

"But I don't know anything about Paraguay."

"There's a town there called Villa Rica. Pretend you've been there, and mention some person whom you think is a big noise there. See if he rises to it. If he does, you're on another half-dollar."

"Suppose he gets tough, shall I knock him down?"

"No need to do that. Just threaten him with your saxophone."

General Costello was not at all pleased when he was disturbed by a small boy, who said he had a grandmother living in Villa Rica.

"If you come from Paraguay you must know Mrs. James," the boy cried. "Why, she owns half the place!"

Costello smiled at the boy and said he remembered Mrs. James, but it was a town that he did not often visit and so for the moment he had forgotten her.

"No one sent you to ask questions?" Costello demanded, when the boy gave a curious smirk.

"Oh, no, sir."

"Not a gentleman with a loud voice and a check suit?"

"Oh, no, sir," lied Arnold. "I only came because auntie didn't think you'd know grandma—because she thinks her common."

"You should tell your aunt to take a broader view of things, my boy," Costello said patronisingly. "Your grandmother is a very remarkable woman. Only don't tell auntie I told you so."

"No, sir, I won't," Arnold answered, and breathed a sigh of relief when he was outside the cabin, as General Costello could look terribly fierce.

Sam Underrates Costello

JIM was sitting in the lounge enjoying his dinner. He was hoping that Jenny might join him, but as there was no sign of her he feared she must be air-sick. Then Aunt Veronica came to pester him. Somehow she had found out he was a detective, and she explained volubly that whilst she was enjoying a nap Arnold had vanished. His hands were insured for ten thousand pounds. She dried her eyes and became shrill with anger when Arnold showed up and grinned at her brazenly.

February 5th, 1938.

A steward brought her some soup, and that did not appease her.

"I can't eat soup in the air. I'm so nervous," Aunt Veronica fidgeted nervously. "Of course, I've never actually been in a crash, but I'm what you might call crash conscious. Steward, why doesn't this company provide parachutes for the passengers?"

"Seeing as 'ow we're over the Atlantic Ocean, they don't encourage mixed bathing."

That made Jim gulp over his soup. General Costello, sitting at a nearby table, frowned and put down his paper. It seemed to be all about the Cowper case and was not pleasant reading. Of course, Aunt Veronica had to talk to everybody, and she informed them that she put no trust in aeroplanes and that she had brought her own parachute.

Jenny entered and came over to Jim. "I hope you're feeling better?" she asked.

"I don't look like an invalid, do I?" gasped the surprised Jim.

Before Jim could think of anything else to say Sam Pryor appeared, and in a most familiar way whisked the girl off to the table where General Costello sat in lonely state. The inspector glowered at his fish.

"General"—Sam Pryor spoke in a voice that did not carry far—"I know you'll be interested to meet Miss Carr."

The general lowered his paper again and favoured the girl with a very cold bow.

"How do you do?" he murmured politely.

"Haven't I seen you before?" Jenny said, her brows furrowed.

"Alas, no," was the answer.

Sam leaned forward.

"Between you and me, and you won't let it go any further, Miss Carr is the missing witness in the Cowper murder case."

Costello smiled at the girl.

"How very exciting for you," he stated in his calm way.

"And I don't mind letting you into a secret." Sam's face was twisted into an ugly, sneering leer. "It won't be Abel that goes to the chair."

After dinner Jenny managed to get away from her escort and went to her cabin, and on the way she encountered Jim Grant.

"I'm sorry I couldn't sit at your table to-night," Jenny said in her frank, pleasant way. "You know, I didn't like you a bit when I met you at Scotland Yard."

"Thanks a lot," Jim said. "But I don't see why you couldn't have sat at my table."

"Superintendent Pryor insisted—" The effect of this remark on Grant was startling. He gripped her fiercely by the shoulder.

"Did you say Superintendent Pryor?" he demanded, and when she gave a little nod, he pushed her to one side. "Excuse me." And was gone.

Sam Pryor was about to knock at Costello's door when a cough stopped him.

"Hallo, inspector"

"Hallo, superintendent!" Grant spoke with ominous meaning.

"Er—er, yes, just a little harmless vanity, you know," spluttered the rogue.

"I don't know quite why you kidded Miss Carr you were a superintendent," Jim said, glaring angrily at Sam. "Perhaps she's told you she's a witness in the Abel case. She's told everybody else. Maybe you were after some information that you could turn into money."

"What a dreadful idea."

"Sam, you're wasting your time. In the first place, I've got my eye on you. In the second place, I won't have you interfering with that girl. In the third place, she knows nothing worth speaking of about the murder. In the fourth place, I don't think she was there at all."

"In the fifth and last place, you may be most kind to children." It was the voice of Jenny. "But as a policeman you're just too dumb for words!"

Murder!

IT was nearing midnight. There were only three people in the small lounge, for all the others had apparently gone to bed. Jenny was there because she felt too restless to sleep. The death sentence on Abel was being carried out at noon, and the plane would land at New York in the early hours of the morning. General Costello was there and pretending to read the paper. The only other person was the tired barman.

Costello put down his paper.

"We go along the coast of Newfoundland?" he inquired in suave tones.

"Yes, sir."

"In how long shall we be over land?"

"In about half an hour, sir," answered the barman. "Will you be wanting anything else, sir?"

The barman retired to his quarters and Costello stared over his paper at Jenny. She was unaware of the scrutiny, and was fidgeting with the dials on a radio set. At last she got what she wanted.

"Albany, New York. The last-minute attempt to save the life of Abel, convicted murderer of William Cowper, the New York lawyer, has failed. The news was broken to Abel in his cell, where he received the grim tidings quietly. He thanked the warden for his helpfulness and calmly went to sleep, apparently without a thought of his fate."

"Perhaps he has a feeling that somebody is coming to help him," said Jenny, who had confided in Costello the reason for her hurried trip to New York. "It's funny to think that if anything happened to this plane—or I jumped through that window—they'd kill an innocent man and never know."

"That, indeed, would be a tragedy," said General Costello.

Restlessly the girl went to a window. "I wonder if that's the boat I came over on. She looks grand all lit up."

Costello moved to her side.

"There is a little platform where we can see better." He took her arm persuasively. "Shall we have a look before turning in?"

Quite unsuspectingly Jenny followed the man she thought was a general. He opened a door, and they went out on to a small gallery, where the wind almost hurled them off their feet. The general closed the door and braced his shoulders. Unconscious of danger, Jenny stared down at the liner.

The door opened, and there stood Sam.

"I'm surprised at you, general," he shouted. "Why, it's perishing out here. You don't want the young lady's death on your hands."

"It is rather cold," Jenny smiled at the man she still thought her benefactor.

"Run along to bed, my dear," Sam said in fatherly tones.

The two men bade the girl good-night in the lounge and then Sam grinned mockingly.

"In my country—in Paraguay—I have had men shot for less," he mimicked. "And as you're not General Costello—the joke's on you. My price was a

(Continued on page 27)

The formula of an invention calculated to revolutionise modern warfare—that was the secret which cost one man his life and involved others in a network of deadly intrigue. A smashing serial-drama packed with thrills, starring Grant Withers

Read This First

Pat O'Hara and Sam Maloney, police officers attached to the Los Angeles radio patrol, are summoned to the Wellington Steel Works, where John P. Adams is demonstrating a bullet-proof vest manufactured from flexible steel, a metal which he has invented.

The police have received an anonymous warning to the effect that an attempt is to be made on the life of Adams, with whose small son Pinky the two radio patrolmen happen to be acquainted.

It is a warning that proves to be genuine, for before Pat O'Hara and Sam Maloney can reach the steel works Adams is shot dead, and the formula of his invention disappears mysteriously.

A man named Selkirk is arrested on suspicion of having committed the crime, and it transpires he was formerly employed by Harrison, head of a steel company which has always competed with the Wellington plant. Into the bargain, it appears that Harrison considers he has some claim on the Adams invention.

The question of the formula is one of considerable importance to two Orientals known as Tahata and Zutta. The first of these exercises a strange hold over a man named Franklyn, who receives instructions from him to send four men to the Wellington Steel Works in order to search for the missing formula.

Meanwhile, Pat O'Hara learns that Selkirk has been visited in prison by his sister Molly, and that night he sees the girl enter the Wellington plant in the guise of a mill-hand.

She obtains the formula, only to be pursued by Franklyn's men. Then Pat takes a hand in the drama, but during a scuffle on a girder he is struck down with a blackjack and falls on to a kind of conveyor that is carrying scrap-metal into the blazing jaws of a smelting furnace.

Now Read On

Getaway

THE furnace door yawned wide, and beyond it was the raging welter of flame towards which the insensible police officer was being carried. But even as the massive conveyor was on the point of entering the blazing confines of that furnace Pat O'Hara hestirred himself feebly, and next instant he had tumbled from the contraption on which he lay.

Up above, on the girder whence Pat had fallen, Henry Selkirk's sister gave vent to an exclamation of relief as she saw him pitch to the floor in front of the furnace and espied a number of workmen hurrying towards his prostrate form. Then she directed a glance at the rogue who had sent the policeman hurtling to the depths, and she immediately perceived that the fellow had straightened up and had turned to face her again.

Moreover, his three accomplices had now appeared at the far end of the girder.

Selkirk's sister was reminded of her plight and, clutching the precious formula that she had obtained, she whipped round and began to climb down the ladder she had been preparing to descend when Pat had attempted to engage the individual known as Watkins.

It did not take her long to reach the floor of the mill, but Watkins was pursuing her closely, and she had only sped some ten or fifteen paces from the foot of the ladder when she heard him drop from the last rung and start pounding after her.

A moment afterwards she set eyes on a heavy bucket which was suspended from aloft by a strong chain, and as she came abreast of this bucket she seized it and swung it back towards her foe with all her might.

It took him in the chest and he went down like a skittled ninepin. Nor did he manage to rise for about a quarter of a minute, by which time the resourceful fugitive was disappearing through the doorway of the mill.

Watkins' associates joined him as he was struggling up from the ground, and together all four of the men gave chase to the Selkirk girl. But in the meantime the latter was running like a hare across the yard of the Wellington Steel Works, her objective being a motor truck that was travelling slowly in the direction of the gates.

It was the same lorry on which she had stowed away in order to gain admittance to the Wellington plant, and, catching up to the vehicle, she scrambled over its tailboard a second time and was thus enabled to quit the premises unchallenged. As for Watkins and his confederates, they burst out into the yard just as the motor truck passed from view, and after scanning the enclosure in vain for their quarry the four of them moved across to the gates, trying to look as casual as they possibly could.

The regulations of the Wellington steel plant were unusually strict, since a good deal of government work was carried out there, and employees had to show their passes whether coming or going. But Watkins and his cronies were equipped with forged permits, and, taking care to keep their faces averted as they showed the watchman these permits, they were allowed to depart without question.

EPISODE 2—
"The Hypnotic Eye"

Even as they filed out through the gateway a police officer showed up near the entrance of the yard. He was Sam Maloney, and, although Pat had instructed him to remain by the car, Sam had become weary of the inactivity of waiting, and now, after a brief hesitation, he exchanged a few words with the watchman and then strode into the works.

Only a minute or two afterwards Sam Maloney was brought face to face with Pat as the latter was assisted from the interior of the mill by a group of furnace men and machinists, and presently these were joined by none other than Wellington himself and Pinky Adams, who had his dog Irish with him.

It appeared that Wellington had sent for Pinky, inviting the boy to call at his office that evening, and, concerned over the young orphan's welfare, the steel magnate had been interrogating the lad regarding his future plans when he had received a message that something was wrong over in the mill.

Pat, badly shaken as he was by his fall, had now recovered sufficiently to give an account of all that had taken place in the works, and when he had told his story Wellington ordered his employees to assist Sam Maloney in carrying out a search of the whole premises for the Selkirk girl and the four men who had likewise been after the late John Adams' formula. Then, left alone with the steel magnate and the murdered inventor's son, Pat spoke in a thoughtful tone.

"I wonder who those guys were," he muttered. "The guys who were so dead-set on taking that formula away from Selkirk's sister, I mean?"

"I don't know, O'Hara," Wellington rejoined. "Your description of them doesn't fit any of the men who are in my employ, so far as I can recall. But whoever they are, I only hope they're rounded up."

Pat bit his lip.

"The formula's my chief concern," he said, putting his arm round John Adams' orphaned son. "It's worth a cool million dollars, and it's the rightful property of young Pinky here. And Pinky and I are good friends, aren't we, Pinky?"

The boy nodded, and a silence fell upon the trio, a silence that lasted until Sam Maloney finally reappeared on the scene.

"It's no use," Pat's burly comrade reported. "We've searched high and low, and there ain't a trace of that Selkirk girl or the fellers you described to us, pardner."

Pat O'Hara looked at him keenly.

"Listen, Sam," he said, "are you sure nobody left the yard before you came in?"

Maloney frowned.

"Well, a bunch o' men did stroll out, come to think of it," he admitted. "I couldn't say just how many, for I didn't take much notice of 'em, except to satisfy myself none of 'em was the Selkirk dame in disguise. Anyway, they all had passes."

"Oh, they all had passes." Pat reiterated the words in a sarcastic vein.

"Well, just the same they were probably the guys that you've spent the last half-hour trying to locate. Still, that doesn't account for Selkirk's sister."

"She didn't leave by the gateway, anyway," Sam declared emphatically.

February 5th, 1938.

"If she had, I'd have spotted her—"

And then he stopped short, a disquieting possibility occurring to him, and, seeing the look of uneasiness that dawned on his moon of a face, Pat eyed him in a penetrating fashion.

"What's up, Sam?"

"Pat, a motor truck pulled out—that same truck she boarded so as to smuggle herself into the plant. You don't suppose—"

He did not finish the sentence. Pat finished it for him.

"That she boarded it again to make her getaway?" he said. "Of course she did, you sap. Aw, come on, we may as well get back to the car."

"What about your head, O'Hara?" Wellington interposed. "You took a nasty bump, you know. Hadn't you better come to our plant hospital and let the doctor have a look at it?"

"Thanks, Mr. Wellington," Pat rejoined, "my head's all right. But it might not be a bad idea to have Maloney's examined."

Later that night, in the suite they had rented at an exotic hotel down in the Oriental quarter of Los Angeles, the two foreigners known as Tahata and Zutta received a visitor in the shape of Franklyn, that pallid-faced individual who was a slave to the will of the first-named Asiatic.

Tahata stepped close to Franklyn as the latter put in an appearance, and he fixed the white man with his strangely compelling gaze.

"Well," he asked tensely, "have you done my bidding? Did you send those four men to the Wellington Steel Plant? Have you brought the formula?"

Franklyn stared straight ahead of him, hypnotised by the sloe-black eyes that peered into his own, his mind held captive by the influence of a stronger personality.

"The men failed," he answered slowly. "They were forestalled by a girl—a girl who is Selkirk's sister. I understand. The formula is now in her possession."

He went on to describe the events that had transpired at the mill, Tahata listening to him in a disgruntled silence the while. Then, when the white man had finished speaking, the Asiatic dismissed him with a gesture and turned to his own compatriot.

"This police officer who was on the scene to-night sounds like Patrolman O'Hara, our acquaintance of the morning," he said. "I gained the impression then that he was no ordinary guardian of the peace, Zutta. He struck me as being an exceptionally shrewd young man, and it seems he may be a dangerous one as well—from our point of view."

Zutta looked at him askance.

"This whole situation may become too dangerous for our liking, Excellency," he muttered. "Perhaps we should leave."

"No," Tahata made the pronouncement in deliberate accents. "No, we are not going to leave, Zutta—at least, not without the formula."

Harrison

THE following morning a car drew up near the city dump outside Los Angeles, and, alighting from the vehicle, a stockily-built individual made his way on foot down the road leading between the mounds of lumber that had been tipped on to the stretch of waste ground.

His objective was that shanty where John Adams and his son had lived after the inventor had sunk every cent of his capital into his project for the manufacture of flexible steel, and on reaching the crude dwelling in question the newcomer glanced about him furtively before sidling up to one of the windows of the hut.

Thirty seconds later the man had satisfied himself that no one was at home and had forced an entry into the abode. Then he proceeded to carry out an intensive search of the shack, a search which ended when he came across a sheet of strong but pliable metal that was about a foot square.

Thrusting this under his coat, he made a hurried exit and retraced his steps to the car in which he had arrived, and not long afterwards he might have been seen driving into town, ultimately pulling up in the vicinity of a steel company's plant.

The premises were those of the Harrison Corporation, and the man who had ransacked Pinky Adams' home had no difficulty in gaining admittance to the office of the president's secretary, a young girl of attractive appearance.

That girl was known as Miss Day, and had been in Harrison's employ for several months, proving herself a highly efficient young woman. Even Harrison, who was not given to praise, and who often went out of his way to find fault with members of his staff, seemed to consider her well-fitted for the position she occupied.

He would have regarded her in a very different light, however, if he had been aware of her true identity. For this girl who went under the name of Day was in reality Molly Selkirk, sister of the man who was being held in connection with the Adams murder, and that same resourceful interloper who had entered the Wellington Works the previous night, to secure, for reasons best known to herself and her brother, the formula relating to the manufacture of flexible steel.

It was to Molly Selkirk, then, that the individual who had just come from the city dump now addressed himself.

"You might tell your chief that a Mr. Pollard is here to see him," he said. "He's expectin' me."

Molly Selkirk announced the caller, and in another moment the man was being shown into the inner sanctum tenanted by Harrison, of the Harrison Steel Works.

Thin and spare, with sharp, sour-looking features, Harrison was seated at a big mahogany desk. He glanced at Pollard expectantly as the door closed behind the visitor.

"Well, did you get it?" he demanded, little dreaming that his secretary had posted herself in an attentive attitude outside the door of his private office.

"Sure," Pollard answered, withdrawing from under his coat the sheet of metal he had found in the shanty home of the late John Adams. "It was a cinch."

Harrison picked up a 'phone, and asked to be connected with the company's laboratory. Then, having been put through, he delivered a brusque command:

"Send Stevens up here," he ordered.

Within a minute or two a studious-looking individual of about forty was making his way into Harrison's private office by a side door. He was wearing a white laboratory-coat, and was chief research chemist of the Harrison Steel Corporation.

"Stevens," Harrison said, handing over the sheet of metal Pollard had produced, "take a look at this."

The chemist examined the substance closely, and an expression of awe appeared on his face. Presently he gave a low whistle.

"Flexible steel!" he breathed. "I didn't think Adams or anybody else could ever make a go of it."

"What I want to know is—how he did it," Harrison retorted. "Stop whatever you're working on, and break that sample of metal down."

"I'm not sure I can analyse it, Mr. Harrison."

"You've got to," was the harsh rejoinder. "Listen, Stevens, if you can find out the components of that alloy and the process of manufacture I'll register the invention with the Patent Office. It won't matter to me who has the formula then."

Stevens took his leave with a dubious expression on his countenance, departing via the door by which he had entered. Then Pollard leaned forward and addressed Harrison.

"Say, wasn't that sample of metal the stuff I've been reading about in the papers this morning?" he queried. "And isn't that guy Adams your chemist mentioned the same feller that got murdered yesterday?"

Harrison eyed him narrowly.

"Did you ever hear about the man who got hurt because he wouldn't mind his own business?" he countered.

"Sorry," Pollard grunted in a tone of comprehension. "I didn't mean to speak out of turn. Well, if you ever have any other job you want done, you know where to find me."

With that he made his exit, passing out through the room occupied by Molly Selkirk, who was seated innocently at her typewriter by this time.

Once Pollard had gone, the Selkirk girl appeared to lapse into a deep reverie, no doubt meditating upon all she had heard while listening at the door of her chief's private sanctum. But, whatever the nature of her thoughts, they were interrupted in a little while by the buzzer of a dictograph on her desk.

She pressed down a switch, and a voice reached her. It was the voice of a doorman at the main entrance of the office building.

"Is Mr. Harrison in, Miss Day? A Radio Patrolman O'Hara wants to see him."

Molly Selkirk started. Then, after a moment's pause, she told the doorman to send the representative of the law up to her office, for it seemed to her she could do nothing else.

She herself had no desire to come face to face with any policeman, however. For, although she did not know this O'Hara by name, it occurred to her that he might turn out to be some member of the Force who had seen her when she had visited her brother at the station, and she was anxious to avoid any risk of being denounced to Harrison.

Consequently, she hid herself in a cupboard where her coat and hat were hanging, and shortly afterwards, through a chink in the door of that recess, she saw Pat O'Hara come into her room—whereupon she congratulated herself upon her prudence, for she recognised him immediately as the patrolman who had so nearly met his death in the Wellington mill the night before.

As for Pat, he now looked round the vacant office in an uncertain fashion. Then, hearing a movement in the adjoining room, he knocked on the door of that inner apartment and found himself a couple of seconds later in the presence of Harrison.

"I beg your pardon," the young policeman said, "but your secretary must have stepped out, and a cop hasn't much time to waste. Er—you are Mr. Harrison, aren't you?"

"Yes," was the reply. "What do you want?"

"I've a few questions I'd like to ask you," Pat observed. "We're holding a man by the name of Selkirk for the murder of John P. Adams, the inventor. According to police records, Selkirk was sent to the penitentiary two years ago, largely on your testimony."

Harrison inclined his head.

"Yes. He was an employee of this company. Unfortunately, he embezzled a sum of money, and we had to prosecute him."

"I know all that, sir," Pat commented. "As a matter of fact, I really came here to find out if you could tell me anything about his sister."

"Sister?" Harrison echoed. "I didn't know he had one."

"He has one all right. She got away with the formula for Adams' invention last night."

Harrison's countenance took on an expression of the keenest interest.

"Well, that is news!" he declared. "It looks like theft runs in the Selkirk family. However, she can't possibly dispose of that formula—except to a foreign country. If'm, so you came here hoping to get a line on her from me, eh?"

"And you never even heard of her." Pat said wryly. "Too bad, sir. I'd sure like to have some dope on that girl."

"I'm sorry I can't be of assistance to the police in regard to her," Harrison returned, little dreaming that the young woman in question was his own secretary. "But John Adams was a good friend of mine, and if there's ever anything I can do to help clear up this case don't hesitate to call on me."

Pat thanked him, and was striding back towards the door when he thought he detected a scuffle of feet just beyond it. But he gave little heed to the circumstance until he opened that door and caught a glimpse of a familiar figure retreating hastily across the outer threshold of the office attached to Harrison's—the figure of a girl whom he identified as Selkirk's sister.

Pat instantly gave chase, not even delaying the pursuit long enough to turn back and acquaint Harrison with the discovery he had made. Yet so fleet of foot was the girl that she had gained the street outside the steel company's premises before the radio cop managed to overtake her.

Sam Maloney was waiting at the kerb with the police car, and his face registered surprise as Pat joined him with the struggling captive.

"The Selkirk dame!" he ejaculated. "Nobody else," Pat rejoined laconically. "I don't know how she came to be there, but I caught her snooping in the office of Harrison's secretary."

His words told Molly Selkirk that he did not realise she was employed by the head of the steel works. Nor did she enlighten him on that score when she addressed him in an appealing tone.

"Listen," she began, "I—I wanted to see Mr. Harrison about my brother. His secretary wasn't there, so I started to open the door of his room, but I heard your conversation with him, and realised you wouldn't believe anything I said after what happened last night. Then I lost my head and ran away."

She felt that the story sounded lame, and it certainly made no favourable impression on her two listeners.

"Lady," Pat stated, "I'm not interested in fairy tales. Now, tell the truth. Why were you snooping around up there? How did you get into the Harrison Company's offices in the first place? And, most important of all, what have you done with that formula

"The formula's my chief concern," Pat said, putting his arm round John Adams' orphaned son. "It's worth a cool million dollars, and it's the rightful property of young Pinky here."

you picked up in the Wellington plant last night?"

The girl looked at him nervously.

"I'm not going to answer any of your questions at all—until I've talked to my brother."

"That can easily be arranged," Pat retorted. "We won't bother Mr. Harrison for the time being. You're going down to headquarters in this car right now."

He thrust her into the back of the police automobile, and, ordering Sam to take the wheel, climbed in beside the prisoner, and a few seconds later the vehicle was pulling away from the kerb and travelling in the direction of the city centre.

The Oriental Quarter

TWENTY minutes after quitting the neighbourhood of the Harrison Steel Works, Radio Car 11 drew up outside police headquarters, and out of it stepped Pat O'Hara, Sam Maloney and Molly Selkirk—to be confronted immediately by a dejected-looking boy who had just emerged from the station.

The boy was Pinky Adams, and he was holding his dog Irish on a leash, and at sight of him Pat spoke to him inquiringly.

"Hallo, kid!" he said. "What are you doing here?"

"A detective came an' fetched me from the dump early this morning," Pinky answered. "The Homicide Squad wanted to ask me some questions about—about dad. But what's the use of asking me questions, I'd like to know, when they turn loose the man that killed him?"

There was a wealth of bitterness in the boy's tone as he uttered that last sentence, which fell startlingly enough upon the ears of Pat, Sam and the girl who was in their charge.

"What's that?" Pat jerked. "They've released Selkirk?"

"Yes, they've let him go—the man that murdered my dad!" Pinky cried, unaware as yet that the girl with the two radio cops was Selkirk's sister. "Some lawyer came and got him out of gaol."

"When, Pinky?"

"Only a minute or two ago. There's Selkirk now."

The lad pointed along the sidewalk, and, turning their heads, the two police officers and their captive saw Henry Selkirk preparing to enter a closed car with a couple of other men some little distance down the street.

Pat and Sam were silent, but on perceiving her brother Molly Selkirk gave vent to a spontaneous cry.

"Harry!" she called, keyed up to a pitch of excitement by the knowledge that his release had been secured. "Harry!"

Her voice reached Selkirk's ears, and he swung round. Then, discerning her, he made as if to hasten along the pavement in her direction. Yet his companions, whoever they were, had no intention of permitting him an interview with his sister. On the contrary they seemed anxious to be off, and laid restraining hands on him.

He tried to wrench away from them, but their manner changed from persuasiveness to determination, and suddenly one of them thrust a gun into Selkirk's back, forcing him to enter the automobile and then scrambled in after him. At the same time the other man leapt into the front of the vehicle, and in an instant it was on the move.

Standing at the foot of the steps that led up to the main entrance of police headquarters, Molly Selkirk and her captors together with Pinky Adams were thunderstruck by the unexpected turn that events had taken. But before that departing auto had gone fifty yards Pat O'Hara had found his voice.

"There's something phoney about those guys with Selkirk!" he rapped out, wheeling abruptly towards his colleague and the girl they had apprehended. "Sam, I'm going after them. You take his sister into the station and keep her there till I get back."

He had a last glimpse of Molly Selkirk's anxious face as he spun round to retrace his steps to the police car. Then a moment later he was in the driving-seat, and he had started up the engine and slipped the gear-lever home when he heard the rear offside door open and shut, and glanced round to find that Pinky Adams had jumped in behind him with Irish.

There was no time to order Pinky and his dog out of the car, for the auto containing Selkirk and his companions was already turning off down a side-road. Therefore, Pat crammed his foot on the accelerator without a word, and the police car surged forward in pursuit of the other machine.

The chase that followed was one that took Pinky Adams' breath away, for it was replete with hairbreadth escapes—a mad dash through the city's populous streets, with the whine of the motor rising high in the ears and the scream of tyres mingling with it on every corner that was turned. And meanwhile, well aware that he was being trailed, the driver of the other auto was setting the pace, cutting in and out of the traffic with a recklessness and a skill that few men could have excelled.

Pat could not excel him. But at least he was the fellow's equal, and kept track of the fugitive vehicle without losing an inch of ground, though in the first half-mile he came within an ace of colliding with other users of the road a dozen times.

Another half-mile had been covered when Pat suddenly picked up a microphone and spoke into the radio.

"Car One-One calling headquarters," he intoned. "Car Eleven calling headquarters!"

"Go ahead, Eleven," came an answering voice.

"Trailing blue sedan occupied by Selkirk and two men whom I suspect are kidnapers," Pat began, but was interrupted by the officer who had responded to his signal from the radio control-room at the station.

"Sure, we know. Maloney just reported the incident, O'Hara. Confine yourself to details of the suspect's car and the route it's taking."

Still driving with his foot hard down on the accelerator, still keeping his eyes on the auto in front of him, Pat went on talking into the microphone crisply:

"It's headed east right now—on State Street. A blue sedan—licence number 5M 2225."

"Five M, two-two-two-five? That's the number of a car reported stolen from a parking-place a few minutes ago. All right, O'Hara, we'll broadcast a general alarm to all radio patrols in the neighbourhood of State Street."

Pat replaced the "mike" and concentrated his whole attention on the automobile ahead of him. In the meantime, on the back seat of the police car, Pinky and Irish were being rocked from side to side by the wild swerves that Pat was making in order to forge his way through the traffic, and it was as he was picking himself up after having been bundled into a corner of the vehicle that the orphaned son of John Adams chanced to look out through the back window.

The boy at once discovered that a third auto was involved in the chase—an open tourer that was speeding along in the same break-neck fashion as the radio car and the fugitive sedan—and all of a sudden he remembered he had casually noticed it standing in a side street opposite police headquarters when he had first issued from the station after the release of Henry Selkirk.

Pinky was a quick-thinking youngster, and it dawned on him that the occupants of the open car, a couple of men who were crouching slyly behind its windscreen, had been waiting near headquarters to aid and abet Selkirk's kidnapers in the event of any trouble occurring. But before he could acquaint Pat with his suspicion the tourer swept abreast of the police auto in a spurt that showed it was capable of terrific acceleration, and next second its driver was forcing the patrolman off the roadway.

The police car hit the kerb, and the impact ripped one of the tyres wide open, with a blast that was like the report of a gun. Another instant and the machine was slewing clear round in a terrifying skid, but luckily it kept squat to the ground and finished up half-way across the pavement on its four wheels.

The tourer responsible for bringing it to a halt raced on in the wake of the sedan, and both the automobiles in question were out of sight by the time Pat had climbed out of Car 11 with Pinky Adams and Irish. But the patrolman had recognised the two men who had been in the open vehicle, and after satisfying himself that Pinky and his dog were all right, he spoke to the lad grimly.

"Those birds in that tourer, Pinky," he said, "they were two of the guys who were after your father's formula at the Wellington Works last night. One was the fellow named Watkins, and the other was the man who answers to the monicker of 'Bill.' Huh, they certainly put the skids on us. But there's still a chance the sedan will be picked up by another police car."

A crowd was beginning to collect on the sidewalk, but, ignoring the questions that were fired at him, Pat set himself to the task of jacking-up his machine and changing the wheel whose tyre had been blown out.

It was a task that he had hardly accomplished when a message from headquarters came through on the auto's radio.

"Calling Car One-one. Calling Car 11. Blue sedan 5M 2225 found abandoned in front of 1337, Delacy Street. No trace of occupants. Car 27 standing by."

A quarter of an hour later Pat was driving into Delacy Street in company with Pinky and that youngster's canine friend, and there he found the blue sedan parked outside a deserted warehouse with Car 27 drawn up close at hand and a couple of patrolmen on the sidewalk.

Pat nodded to the other two officers and then glanced ruefully at the sedan.

"So they flew the coop, eh?" he grunted. "Did you see anything of them at all?"

"There wasn't a sign of them when we got here, Pat," one of the other officers announced.

"You didn't happen to spot a tourer anywhere in the vicinity when you showed up, did you?" was Pat's next query.

The answer was in the negative, and before any further conversation could take place the men attached to Car 27 received an emergency radio call ordering them to investigate a hold-up at a bank on the south-east side of the city. Consequently Pat O'Hara, Pinky Adams and the dog Irish were left alone beside the abandoned sedan, and after a brief silence Pat addressed the boy in a gloomy tone.

"Well, kid," he said, "it looks like we've lost the scent. I guess Selkirk and his kidnapers switched over to the tourer here, and there's no telling where they might be now. If I had the licence number of that tourer we might still be in the hunt, but I didn't get it."

Pinky did not answer him at once. He was looking fixedly at Irish, who was straining at the leash by which he was being held.

"Say, Pat," the lad exclaimed suddenly, "I don't think Selkirk and the men with him switched over to the tourer. I think they walked away from here."

"What gives you that idea?" the patrolman demanded.

"Look at Irish. He's got his nose to the ground an' he seems as if he's doin' his best to drag my arm off. That's the way he acted after Selkirk was let out of the police station. Irish seemed to pick up his scent, and he fairly lugged me out into the street. Don't forget that scent is fresh to him, because it's only twenty-four hours since he chased Selkirk out of the shanty down at the city dump. And remember how he went for Selkirk when you arrested him for—for killin' dad."

Pat eyed the dog in a none-too-hopeful manner.

"You mean he's picked up Selkirk's scent now? I doubt it, Pinky. I know Irish is smart, but—"

The boy interrupted him. "I'm gonna give him his head, anyway," he declared. "Come on, Pat, let's see where he takes us."

He released the dog, and the animal promptly set off along the street with his nose close to the paving-stones, and, prevailing on Pat to accompany him, its youthful master started after it at a brisk walk.

For ten minutes man and boy followed Irish on his dubious quest, and by that time they had turned several corners and landed in a section of the city which was familiar enough to the police officer but completely strange to Pinky. For it was that locality known as the Oriental quarter, a realm of narrow by-ways peopled by swarthy aliens, and flanked by exotic buildings whose domes and minarets typified the East—buildings that exuded the flavour of rich spices, buildings that echoed the babble of foreign tongues, or invited the passer-by to pause and hearken to the strains of haunting pipe-music.

"This is the Oriental quarter, Pinky," the stalwart police officer informed him. "If you go right into the heart of it you can forget that you're in America."

Irish was still ahead of them, but what with the narrow, tortuous streets and the crowds of Asiatics thronging them it would have been impossible for Pat and the boy to keep him in view if he had maintained the steady trot at which he had covered ground when first he had been let off the leash.

Now, however, the dog was beginning to show signs of perplexity, and had soon slackened his pace considerably. If he had in truth been following a scent, it appeared that it was becoming increasingly difficult to detect—probably because it was well-nigh obliterated by the passage of so many other individuals over it.

At last, indeed, the animal came to a dead standstill, and, as Pat O'Hara and Pinky moved alongside it, it looked up at them with an expression in its brown eyes that was almost human in its significance of defeat and frustration.

"Well," Pat muttered, after looking at the dog in silence for a spell, "if Irish was giving us a lead he's sure up a gum-tree now."

Pinky nodded.

"Yeah, I guess so," he had to admit, and then, following upon another interval of silence: "Say, Pat," he added, "how d'you suppose those guys were able to walk Selkirk right through these streets with so many people about? Surely Selkirk could have made a fuss if he didn't want to go this far with them."

"One of those men was armed," Pat reminded him. "Maybe both of 'em. If they did come this way, they very likely covered Selkirk from their coat-pockets and made it clear to him that he'd be well advised to go along with them quietly."

"And what did they want with him, I wonder?"

Pat drew down his brows thoughtfully.

"I don't reckon there's much doubt that their motive in kidnapping him had something to do with your father's formula," he replied.

Pinky had stooped to caress Irish's smooth grey coat. At the same time he was displaying a certain amount of interest in an open-air café outside whose entrance the dog had halted. Tables were dotted around in it under colourful sunshades, and dusky waiters were serving refreshments to groups of chattering Orientals who were seated at those tables. The place was obviously a favourite rendezvous of the better-class element in the "quarter," for there was scarcely a chair that was not occupied by some prosperous-looking immigrant from the continent of Asia.

Pinky ran his eyes over the unusual and intriguing spectacle presented by this café, with its picturesque, bustling attendants and its equally picturesque but lounging patrons. Then, turning his attention on Pat again, he broached the subject of Selkirk's release once more.

"Listen," he said earnestly, "there's something I can't make out—something that seems all wrong to me. How is it that a man held for murder can get out of gaol without first having to stand his trial?"

"Well, I guess Selkirk's lawyer must have had a writ of habeas corpus, Pinky. Yep, and those men who kidnapped him must have got wise to that and waited for him to come out—"

And then he stopped, for at that moment his glance came to rest on two men who had just stepped out of the nearby hotel's portals into the open-air café of the forecourt—two men who stood out in that setting because they were whites—two men who were none other than those rogues answering to the names of Watkins and Bill!

With an involuntary shout Pat started through the entrance of the café, and almost simultaneously Bill and Watkins perceived him.

They turned tail at once and dived back into the hotel, and Pat, leaving Pinky and Irish, charged across the forecourt in hot pursuit, threading his way through the crowded tables that were dotted about it.

He did not know that he had also been seen from the windows of a room in the hotel—a room occupied by Tahata, Zutra, Franklyn and Harry Selkirk—the last-named being covered by a revolver held in the grasp of Tahata's secretary.

It was not towards this room that Bill and Watkins beat a retreat. Instead they rushed clear through the hotel lobby to an apartment at the rear of the building, and they were on the point of blundering into it as Pat entered the premises.

The police officer gained an impression of them as they reached the threshold of that apartment, and he noticed that Watkins lifted his hand and touched something over the door. Then both men disappeared into the room, and even as they vanished into its interior and slammed the door behind them Pat saw a section of the wall above the transom swing out and then down in a circular motion—an iron shutter in reality, as solid as the door of a bank vault, and slowly descending so as to form a barrier over the existing door.

Hurling himself forward through the lobby, Pat ducked under the shutter as it was lowering itself beyond a horizontal position. Then he gripped the handle of the apartment's door, but almost in the same moment he heard the rasping of a bolt within, and the door refused to budge in spite of his attempts to burst it in.

In the meantime the iron shutter was continuing its deliberate descent, and suddenly, as he was still struggling to force the door, Pat felt the heavy metal contraption fold in on him.

He squirmed round, only to find himself trapped between the massive shutter and the door beyond which Bill and Watkins had sought refuge from him; and, although he strove might and main to hold it away from him, the great block of iron moved against him with crushing pressure.

(To be continued in another sensational episode next week. A New Universal Picture, controlled throughout the United Kingdom and the Irish Free State by General Film Distributors, Ltd., starring Grant Withers.)

RISE TO THE HEIGHT of Fitness and Success

Short people can gain height and health with the aid of a box of Challoner's Famous Formula and easy system—well tried and safe. No strenuous exercises or old-fashioned appliances. If one box is insufficient we guarantee to supply a further box FREE. A. L. (Wilts) writes: "Since I started your treatment, I have gained 3 inches in height." Act now! Full particulars 1/6d. Sample 7/6d. Book on height improvement 3d. Stamps or P.O. only. Sent under plain sealed cover.

H.T.N. TABLETS

THE CHALLONER CO. (late Bond Street), Dept. P55, Laboratory and Works: Hyde Heath, Amersham, Bucks

THINK OF THE FUN

—for you and your chums and family if you had a Riley 'Home' Billiard Table. B'DOWN brings delivery on 7 Days' Free Trial. Balance monthly. Ask your dad to write to-day for Riley Free Art List.

E. J. RILEY, LTD., Ensign Works, ACCRINGTON, or Dept. 36, 147, Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.1.

February 5th, 1935.

"OUTLAWS OF THE ORIENT"

(Continued from page 12)

way surprised by the white man's abrupt appearance.

"Ho-Fang still goes!" Chet seated himself in a chair beside his brother, drawing the gun unobtrusively as he did so; and under the table he held the gun within a couple of feet of the brigand's paunch. "I've got you covered, and I understand Chinese," he warned, "so be careful what you say!"

Ho-Fang blinked, but otherwise did not move.

"Tell your men that Johnny's going out!"

In his own dialect Ho-Fang did so. "Go on," said Chet to Johnny, "and take it easy. Tell the boys I'll be with them directly."

Johnny rose and went slowly to the steps.

"Send your men out," directed Chet, after he had gone; "we're going to talk business."

Ho-Fang obeyed, and the members of his band mounted the steps to the street, and in the street looked sullenly on as Johnny mounted his horse and sat waiting upon it with Red and Burton and Jackson. Chet immediately brought his gun from under the table to the top of it, and for nearly two minutes he sat facing Ho-Fang, his eyes as cold as the steel that could spit death.

"Now get up and walk towards the door!" he rasped. And as Ho-Fang rose heavily to his feet he also rose.

Together they reached the foot of the steps, and there Chet stood in front of the defeated brigand.

"That's for Wong!" he suddenly thundered; and out shot his left fist with such violence that Ho-Fang's jaw was nearly dislocated by the blow that landed on the point of it, and he was unconscious before he fell.

Chet ascended the steps and saw the members of the band clustered round the entrance.

"Good-bye, general," he turned to shout down into the café. "Take care of yourself!"

Ming Yen was suspicious, but he moved aside, and Chet walked over to Johnny and the others and got on his horse.

"Come on, boys," he said, "let's get going!"

Paid in Full!

IN the cool night air of the desert, Chet had plenty of time for reflection as he and his companions galloped back towards the distant camp. He could not bring himself to regret that final knockout blow he had administered, but he realised that Ho-Fang would be swift to retaliate.

"Don't spare your horses!" he shouted. "We've got to get back just as soon as we know how! Ho-Fang will strike before the night's out, and we've got to be ready for him!"

Before they were half-way to the camp Ho-Fang had mustered the whole of his gang of ruffians, and was riding at their head with an aching jaw and a thirst for blood. But the camp was reached, and outside the office building Chet issued orders.

"See that the coolies are armed," he said to Red, "and send all the men over here."

Joan came running out from the adjoining cabin with Lucky, and uttered a cry of relief as she saw Johnny standing there. But she and Lucky had to be content with what Johnny could tell them while Chet directed Burton to put away the horses and Jackson to help get rifles and ammunition from the shed in which arms were stored.

A period of intense activity followed, and crates full of rifles were on the veranda when the coolies were lined up in front of it, and Chet addressed them.

"Men," he said, "there's going to be trouble with Ho-Fang. Now, you were hired as oil workers, not as soldiers. There may be fighting to-night, and if any one of you wants to get out of it before it's too late now's your chance."

He called an intelligent-looking yellow man forward.

"Chang," he said, "tell them what it is."

Chang translated at some length into Cantonese, and he translated into English the replies the men made.

"These men all good Chinese," he declared proudly. "They say Ho-Fang not Chinese, or his army, but bad bandits from border country. They stay and fight."

"Give them rifles and ammunition!" cried Red.

Under Chang's command some of the coolies were distributed about the oil-fields, using the derricks for cover, and the rest were posted round about the buildings with Jackson and another white man. Red, Johnny, Lucky, and Burton mounted guard in the office with Joan, and Chet made a final tour of inspection.

He returned to the office in a stillness that seemed uncanny, and the half-hour of waiting that followed was almost more of a strain on taut nerves than actual conflict.

The two windows in the office were open, and at one of them Johnny and Lucky were crouched with rifles in their hands, and at the other Red had mounted a sub-machine-gun on the sill, and Burton was on his knees with a rifle. Joan was standing beside Johnny, an easy target for any creeping enemy, and Chet made her retreat behind the counter and sit down in a chair there.

"I'm getting fed-up with this suspense," growled Red.

"We'll hear from them soon enough," said Chet. "Lucky, how's that aeroplane?"

"All set and ready to go," Lucky replied.

"Machine-guns loaded?"

"Yeah, and there's half a dozen dynamite bombs on board, too."

"Good!" approved Chet.

The expected attack began with a direct raid on horseback. Ho-Fang evidently imagining that there had been no time for any elaborate defence to be organised. He swept with his men across the oilfield towards the buildings; but a coolie perched high on the timbers of a derrick saw the approaching riders and opened fire with a rifle.

One of the bandits pitched headlong from the saddle, and the others stopped at a harsh shout from their leader. A coolie who had crept under a motor-truck blazed away at them through the spokes of a wheel, and shots rang out from all sides.

Off went the horsemen into the darkness; but behind some rocks they dismounted, and then they crept towards the camp again on foot, at least fifty strong. They reached a trench and spread out in it, and the first intimation of their return was a volley of rifle fire that shattered the windows of cabins and shacks and caused several casualties among the defenders in the open.

Red raked the top of the trench with his machine-gun, but the bandits could not have chosen a stronger position, or one from which more damage could be done.

"Keep them busy while I get to that aeroplane," said Chet, who had put on a leather jacket and helmet.

"All right, boss," said Red, and his machine-gun rained bullets at the distant trench while Chet slipped out at a back door of the office building and sped to the machine.

Lucky, firing out at the other window to help keep the enemy occupied, dropped his rifle and staggered backwards with a wound in his right forearm; and Joan promptly ran to him, led him away into the adjacent room, and washed and bandaged the arm with all the skill of a nurse.

"There's no bullet in it," she told him. "I guess the bullet's somewhere in the office, but it's ploughed up a lot of flesh, hasn't it? Sit still, I'm going to put that arm in a sling for you."

Chet reached the aeroplane, though it was almost a miracle that he did so without being hit, and he heaved himself into the front cockpit and started up the engines.

Off went the machine across the sand, and instantly the bandits' fire became concentrated upon it; but it rose into the air, went roaring over the foothills, and presently came sweeping back above the trench.

Chet rattled away with one of the machine-guns in its passage, and there was more than one casualty amongst the enemy before he soared off again to circuit the camp and return to the attack.

But Ho-Fang, meanwhile, had shouted to Ming Yen, and Ming Yen was creeping towards the nearest of the wells with a bomb. He hurled the bomb, and it exploded close to the base of the derrick of well No. 4.

The timbers were shaken by that explosion, the stream of oil from the well caught fire, and its blaze lit up the whole camp.

"There goes Number Four!" exclaimed Red; and Johnny immediately dropped his rifle and stood staring out through the window, clenching his hands and trying to summon the courage he needed for a task fraught with infinite danger.

Joan caught hold of his arm with both hands, and somehow that decided him.

"I've got to cap that fire!" he cried hoarsely. "Give me the asbestos suit, quick!"

"Oh, Johnny!" shivered Joan; but she fetched him the suit, and the gloves and the mask to go with the suit, and she helped him into the very clumsy garments.

Gunfire was still continuous outside, but Ho-Fang and his bandits had deserted the trench to take cover behind the rocks because Chet was sweeping back again in the aeroplane. Once more the machine-gun rat-tatted lead, hut to no purpose; and Chet flew off again.

Johnny became a target for bullets as he made his way to the blazing well, but he knew that Joan was watching him from inside the office, and the knowledge inspired him. He reached the platform and the open pipe, which had become a volcano of flame. The cross-beams of the derrick were alight, and blazing fragments of wood showered down upon him as time and again he caught hold of the metal cap and tried to pull it down over the pipe.

Ten times, at least, he was driven back by the almost intolerable heat just as success seemed assured; but at last he managed to get the cap down over the flaming vent and to fasten it there.

The well was saved, but the derrick was burning fiercely as he tottered back towards the office. He was a little less than half-way when a terrific explosion, over by the rocks, caused him to fall flat on his face. Chet had flown back in the aeroplane and had dropped a dynamite bomb amongst the enemy sheltered there.

Slowly Johnny got to his feet again, and not another shot rang out during the rest of his journey to the office. He stumbled in over the step, and Joan was waiting for him with shining eyes.

"Johnny, I'm proud of you!" she cried.

Chet was high in the air again, grimly satisfied with the effect of the bomb he had dropped because half of Ho-Fang's men had been blown to pieces by it. But as the machine came roaring back he saw that the rest had run to their horses and mounted them, and before he could change his course they were riding furiously across the desert, the unmistakable headgear of Ho-Fang conspicuous in front of what remained of his "army."

Chet banked in a huge semicircle, then straightened out the machine and planed down above the heads of the fugitives, one hand over the side of the cockpit and a bomb in it ready to let fall.

Down went the bomb, and the aeroplane shot upwards a second before it exploded, almost at the feet of the horse Ho-Fang was spurring frantically towards Tak Tao.

It took Chet several minutes to circle back and look down upon the havoc he had created with the bomb. Ho-Fang and his horse had been blown to pieces, and the rest of his men were dead upon the sand.

Soon after Willard Percival Snyder had descended to his office next morning, from his quarters on the upper floor of the local headquarters of the company in Kwei-Yong, he sallied forth to call upon General Moy Ku Ting. There had been no word from the camp since Lucky had disappeared without expounding his "idea," and the resident manager was worried.

The general received him courteously, though he had no great liking for the self-important representative of the Thatcher Petroleum Corporation.

"An early visitor, Mr. Snyder," he commented.

"Yes," said Snyder. "The fact is that Eaton has sent me word that he wants you to release him from his promise to remain in China, general."

Moy Ku Ting raised his brows.

"For what reason?" he inquired.

"I've been waiting to learn that myself," Snyder complained. "Our plane is long overdue, and I have a feeling that something has happened at the field. There's a gang of renegades up there, headed by that half-breed bandit Ho-Fang, who has been causing trouble."

The general's brows descended in a frown.

"You should have brought this matter to my attention at once!" he said quite severely. "I can't understand why Mr. Eaton did not request my co-operation."

"Perhaps he felt that it would have precipitated open warfare," suggested Snyder.

"Nevertheless," returned the general, "we cannot tolerate such enemies of China within our borders. I believe this warrants my personal investigation. I shall fly to the oilfield immediately, and if you are as anxious as you say, Mr. Snyder, I think it would be well for you to accompany me."

"There's nothing I'd like better!" Snyder declared.

It was a military aeroplane of considerable size that conveyed the two across the desert, and a flying officer was at the controls. The noise of twin engines in the sky brought everybody out from the buildings in the camp, and they stared in astonishment as the machine landed and first the general and then Snyder climbed down from it.

Chet walked forward to meet the entirely unexpected visitors, but Johnny rushed Joan away to the living-room of the adjoining cabin, and Red and the rest went back to their duties, save Lucky, who hovered on the veranda, his arm still in a sling.

General Moy Ku Ting explained to Chet the reason for his presence in the camp with Snyder.

"I was much concerned to hear of these activities of the brigand Ho-Fang," he said. "I only wish you had reported to me sooner. Do you need any troops for protection?"

Chet grinned broadly.

"You don't have to worry about those bandits, general," he said. "We've paid them off in full!"

"Eaton," barked Snyder, "how many times have I told you no pay-offs?"

"Well," shrugged Chet, "I suggest, Mr. Snyder, that you fire me. Come on into the office, general, and I'll explain things."

As the three stepped into the office, Lucky went off to the next cabin and burst in upon Joan and Johnny.

"Hi, duchess," he boomed, "now your friend Snyder is here maybe I can fix it for you to get your old job back."

"Thank you, Lucky," said Joan, "but I think you've done enough fixing."

"I see," nodded Lucky, "but I'll get you that ticket back home I promised you."

Joan turned to Johnny, whose face had dropped at this mention of a ticket.

"Johnny dear," she said softly, "how much do you think my ticket home should cost?"

Thus encouraged, Johnny's face brightened again—and he took her into his arms and hugged her.

"Well, let's see," he pondered. "Our home is going to be about a quarter of a mile down the sands—when it's built—and I think you can make a fair deal with Lucky for a rickshaw."

Lucky made a face at him.

"Well, now look here," he said disconsolately. "Why didn't you tell me you were going to fix everything up yourself, duchess?"

"Don't you have to make a report to Snyder?" asked Johnny pointedly.

"Oh, yes, Snyder," Lucky scratched the back of his neck with his left hand, gave one more glance at two radiant faces, and went slowly out to the office.

Snyder was in there, leaning against the counter; General Moy Ku Ting was shaking hands with Chet. Lucky dived away from the open door, and from a trouser pocket he took out his precious pea-shooter. He heard Chet say, in a very grateful voice:

"Thank you for relieving me of my promise, general. I'm sorry it's of no use inviting you to my wedding, but maybe you'll get an invitation to another one in Kwei-Yong. I rather fancy my brother is going to marry and settle down right here on the job."

"Well," said Snyder, "that seems to settle everything except my crippled flyer."

Lucky heard that, too. He stepped in at the doorway with the pea-shooter to his mouth—and Snyder clapped a hand to his face as a tiny missile struck it and rolled upon the floor.

"I'm afraid," laughed Chet, "he's far from crippled, Snyder!"

(By permission of Columbia Pictures Corporation, Ltd., starring Jack Holt.)

"NON-STOP NEW YORK"

(Continued from page 20)

thousand pounds." His face screwed up into a vicious grin. "Now it's twenty thousand! I've got something more valuable to sell—the right to murder an innocent young lady."

"Very well," Brandt gave a resigned shrug. "But I'll have to pay you in New York."

"Nothing doing. When we get to New York there'll be no little girl, and so the poor dog gets none."

"What do you think I am?"

"A man who travels with a roll of bills. Cash down and you can do what you like—no cash, and I'll be a father to the girl," Sam cried, his vicious nature uppermost. He would have sold his soul for money.

"I have not all that money in my pocket," Brandt answered. "But there is money in my baggage, but it is in the baggage room."

"Why did you put it there?"

"The custody of a solid British Air Company is better than carrying it on me—with people like you about." The eyes of the killer were mocking. "And the baggage room is locked. If you could open it with your nimble fingers, Mr. Pryor, I could grant your request. You've picked a lock before."

"That's as maybe, but I'm going straight."

"Pity," Brandt shrugged his shoulders. "It's my money, so it wouldn't be stealing. Twenty thousand pounds."

"All right," Sam decided. "I'm a bit out of practice, but I'll try."

Except for the steady hum of the engines, there seemed no other sound. Nobody was about, or so those two men thought. But Master Arnold was awake, and he saw them enter the baggage room. He followed, and cautiously peered inside. There he saw Sam Pryor bending over a safe deposit door, which was open, and Sam was fumbling inside. It was a big room and crammed with luggage, so that the boy could watch without being seen. He saw General Costello draw a gun and shoot Sam Pryor in the back.

Jim was awakened out of a sound sleep by the precipitous entrance of young Arnold, who shook the inspector violently and shouted that he had seen a murder committed.

"I saw it," Arnold shouted. "General Costello isn't General Costello at all, and he's killed Superintendent Pryor."

It took Jim about a minute to realise the gravity of the situation. Up to now he had thought Jenny a nice girl, but had pool-pooched her story, but if Costello had killed Pryor, who seemed to have been kidding everyone he was a superintendent, then it put a different complexion on things. He jumped into his clothes.

Jenny must have heard Arnold's excited voice because she had not started to go to bed. She followed the inspector and Arnold to the lounge. She stood with Arnold by the baggage room door as Grant stared down at the motionless body of Sam Pryor.

Grant cursed himself for being so slow-witted as never to have guessed Jenny was speaking the truth. He joined them outside the baggage-room and was just about to question the girl when Brandt appeared. He covered them with a gun. Under his right arm was a lumpy object.

"Stand still!" His voice was menacing. "If you move I shall be compelled to shoot. At the girl first, but I don't want to do it, as it might disturb the other passengers."

"Well, what are you going to do about it?"

The killer laughed.

"In a few minutes we shall be beyond Newfoundland," he explained. "I shall take my leave of you in Aunt Veronica's parachute."

Brandt backed away and then turned and ran. Jim Grant pelted after him, but the gunman was too quick. He gained his objective—the control-room, and once on the other side, locked the door. Without any compunction he shot both pilots, switched off the engines, then drawing back the emergency door flung himself into space.

Grant crashed his fist against the control-room door. A gasp of horror left his lips as he heard those muffled reports. Suddenly the 'plane gave a sickening lurch, and then followed a curious silence.

"What has he done?" gasped Jenny.

"Jumped off over land and cut off the engines to wreck the 'plane as well," Grant snapped out. "I've got to get into that control-room some way."

The captain came staggering and swaying along the corridor. He told Grant that the only way into the control-room was by climbing over the top of the 'plane. Jenny gave a cry of fear as Grant rushed off to the lounge. Though the machine was pitching and tossing he dragged open the door that led on to the small platform, where Jenny had been so near to death.

The machine was rapidly losing height and might at any moment go into a disastrous nose dive. Many times the rushing wind almost dragged Grant from his precarious hold, but he stuck grimly to his task for the lives of everyone in the 'plane depended on him. His hands were torn and bleeding as he clawed his way along the fuselage and over the roof of the 'plane. He looked down once and saw that the Atlantic was little more than a thousand feet below him. He found the emergency exit that the killer had opened, and a roll of the 'plane allowed him to edge his way over and tumble inside. He crashed into the inanimate figure of one of the pilots.

The sea was five hundred feet below them when he staggered down some stairs and opened the control-room door. The relief pilot hurled himself at the controls. The engines roared to life.

But in those seconds the 'plane had dropped another two hundred feet, and the pilot dare not attempt to immediately flatten out. Actually the pilot got the 'plane under control a bare fifty feet from the great waves of the Atlantic.

When the 'plane was cruising safely at two thousand feet Jim Grant got the captain to put through a wireless call to the police at St. John giving them all information and requesting them to search for the killer. A radio message was sent to Police Chief O'Brien in New York to stay the execution of Abel as there was new evidence that proved his innocence.

Aunt Veronica kicked up an awful song when she found her parachute had been stolen, and then wanted to know where Arnold was. They found him in a corner quietly playing his beloved saxophone.

"Poor old general," Arnold sighed, and played a mournful note.

"Why poor?" demanded Jim Grant.

"Well, you all complained so much about my sax being noisy that I borrowed 'auntie's' parachute." He produced from the saxophone a strip of grey silk. "This is a piece I cut out of it."

"I don't think the police will need that cordon after all," muttered Inspector Grant.

Abel was saved from the chair and Jenny became the heroine of New York. She had thousands of offers of jobs and even marriage, but she turned them all down, and when the boy prodigy made his bow at the opening recital of his tour Jenny and Jim were in the fourth row of the stalls. All the time the fourteen-year old virtuoso played his violin better than he had ever done, his bright, twinkling eyes watched them, and when Jenny's hand stole into Jim's great paw the boy had the impudence to wink.

(By permission of the Gaumont British Picture Corporation, Ltd., starring John Loder as Inspector Grant and Anna Lee as Jenny Carr.)

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"OUTLAWS OF THE ORIENT."

—Chet Eaton, Jack Holt; Joan Manning, Mae Clarke; Ho-Fang, Harold Huber; Lucky Phelps, Ray Walker; Johnny Eaton, James Bush; Willard P. Snyder, Joseph Crehan; Alice Sylvester, Bernice Roberts; Howard Sheldon, Harry Worth.

"NON-STOP NEW YORK."

—Jenny Carr, Anna Lee; Inspector Jim Grant, John Loder; Sam Pryor, Frank Collier; Arnold James, Desmond Tester; Mortimer, William Dewhurst; Billy Couper, James Pirrie; Brandt, Francis L. Sullivan; Mrs. Carr, Drusilla Wills; Steward, Jerry Verno; Aunt Veronica, Athene Seyler; Miss Harvey, Ellen Pollock; Abel, Arthur Goulette; Spurgeon, Peter Bull; Harrigan, Tony Quinn.

(Continued from page 2)

descendant of John Marshall, first Chief Justice of the United States. With such a professional background, it might have seemed natural that Jack should have been lured by the law or called by the clergy. But the indoor life that lawyers or rectors led did not appeal to him.

Realising, however, that he must obtain an education, young Holt selected a course which seemed most certain to lead into adventure. He chose engineering. His people finally agreed to this. The boy was entered for pre-engineering at Trinity Preparatory School in New York and, graduated from there, sent to the celebrated Virginia Military Institute in his native State for the completion of his studies.

While still a student at the military school, Jack demonstrated his enthusiasm for hard work of a dramatic turn by getting a job during vacations as a "sand hog," and worked on the great Hoboken tunnel for the Pennsylvania Railroad.

When he finished at the Virginia Military Institute, he went to the far-flung wastes of the Yukon frontier and found opportunities a-plenty for his restless, trouble-seeking spirit. At first he prospected for gold. Then, for a brief time, he was a mule skinner. Finally he obtained the most picturesque and dangerous job of all, as a U.S. mail carrier delivering the mail to remote trading posts by dogsled.

Finally, being slightly "fed-up" with the Frozen North, Holt decided to return to the States. Landing in Seattle, he drifted down into Oregon and back to the cattle ranch where, as a working "cow poke," he ran into rustling trouble and became a real hide-and-hair top-hand.

He had his start in pictures shortly thereafter when he was in San Francisco. A Hollywood picture company was there on "location." A double was wanted for a daring horseback leap scheduled for the star. Holt did the stunt, was offered a regular job, and has been in pictures ever since, a total of over twenty years, seventeen of which he has been a star or leading man.

Since starting his motion-picture career he has been on location in almost every part of the world, including China, the locale of his current "Outlaws of the Orient."

Among the better known Holt films are "Flight," "Submarine," "War Correspondent," "Dirigible," "Roaring Timber," and "Trouble in Morocco."

Dynamo set complete 1/3 extra.

Grose Spur LIGHT ROADSTER

- ★ Any size frame for boys and gents. All-British Birmingham Super Fitments.
- ★ Rained or Dropped Handlebars, Super Chromium Finish, Dunlop Tyres, Saddle and Rims, Phillips Roller Brakes.
- ★ Free Insurance and full set of accessories fitted.
- ★ Special Factory cash price 50/6. Lady's model 55/6 worth 53/10/0.
- ★ Easy Terms 12 monthly payments of 6/- or 1/6 weekly.

2 D. a day

Free art list of 100 models

GEORGE GROSE, LTD., LUDGATE CIRCUS, LONDON, E.C.4.

STAMMERING. Stuttering—Cured, or money back, 5/-. Details free, privately. —SPECIALIST, (A), 28, DEAN ROAD, N.W.2.

HAVE YOU A RED NOSE? Send a stamp, and you will learn how to rid yourself of such a terrible affliction free of charge. Address in confidence—T. J. TEMPLE, Specialist, "Palace House," 128, Shaftesbury Avenue, LONDON, W.1. (Est. 37 years.)

WHY BE BULLIED? Learn to defend yourself in the easiest and best way. Articles, illus. lessons, and full particulars of Garrud's complete Jujitsu Course free on application or 1/- for sample part to:—A. P. "Yawara," 20, Durham Road, Feltham, Middlesex.

BLUSHING, Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry Habit, Unreasonable Fears, etc., cured or money back! Complete Course, 5/-. Details—L. A. Stebbing (A), 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.2.

STAMPS 300 DIFFERENT, incl. Airmail, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Pictorials, Colonials. Price 6d. (Abroad 1/1).—WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BOY'S CINEMA

No. 960. EVERY TUESDAY May 7th, 1938.

2^D

PRIZE NEWS!
THE GREAT
ARMAMENTS RACE

See Special Announcement on Page 2

III
RENFREW
OF THE ROYAL MOUNTED"
A STIRRING
DRAMA OF COUNTERFEIT SMUGGLERS

Starring James NEWILL

PRIZE NEWS

THE GREAT ARMAMENTS RACE

FOR YOU

15 First Prizes of Hercules Bikes

6000 Other TIP-TOP PRIZES

LOOK, chum . . . staggering news, PRIZE NEWS . . . for YOU. Fifteen Spanking new Bikes, and Thousands and Thousands and THOUSANDS of other top-hole prizes all going FREE. And here's how:

Each week in "Boy's Cinema" I am going to print Armaments Stamps: BOMBERS, GUNS, SEARCHLIGHTS, and so on—8 kinds altogether—and all you have to do is just CUT 'EM OUT AND COLLECT 'EM. You have 20 stamps to start with this week. If you also take the other best boys' papers like "Champion" and "Triumph," you'll find more stamps in them to swell your total.

At the end of this month I shall ask you how many of one or more kinds of stamps you've collected. It may be Bombers or Battleships, or perhaps Tanks and Destroyers together. Which . . . well, that's my secret!

So get busy, collect all the stamps you can so as to be right in front for the first prize-giving. I shall ask you which prize you want, too—the biggest collections of the stamps I call for will win. But don't send any yet; I'll tell you how and where when the time comes.

There you are . . . and Nothing to Pay! Isn't it great! THE EDITOR.

RULES: Five First Prizes of 24 7s. 6d. "Hercules" Cycles and up to 2,000 other prizes will be awarded in order of merit each month during the contest to the readers declaring and sending the largest collections of the stamps called for. Cash value of any of the first prizes may be divided in case of a tie or ties for such prizes. Ties for any other prizes will be decided by the Editor.

All claims for prizes to be sent on the proper coupon (to be given later); no allowance made for any coupon or stamps mutilated or lost or delayed in the post or otherwise. No correspondence. No one connected with this paper may enter, and the Editor's decision will be final and legally binding throughout.

N.B.—You can also collect or swap Armaments Stamps with pals who read "Triumph," "Champion," "Magnum," "Gem," "Modern Boy," "Sports," "Budget," "Detective Weekly," and "Thriller."

For Collecting Armaments Stamps

There are Eight More Stamps on Page 27!

OVERSEAS READERS, TOO! You pals who are far away—you're in this great scheme also, and special awards will be given for the best collections from overseas readers. There will be a special closing date for you as well, of course!

Counterfeit money is being smuggled into the States from Canada, and a Mountie is killed by a treacherous Indian member of the gang, but an intrepid sergeant of the famous force never falters from the trail until the crooks are brought to justice. A smashing drama, starring James Newill

Trout in Ice

IT was a barrier post between Canada and the United States. An elderly sportsman drove up, and his car was laden with rods and fishing kit. He was well known to the official in charge. The latter gave his baggage a cursory glance and marked it as being in order.

"Where are you going this time, Mr. Williams?" asked the officer.

"Well, I'm a little uncertain," replied the elderly sportsman. "When I came up a month ago I had permission to fish the Green River district and its lakes, and I had a most disappointing catch. All the fish ran small, and they were few and far between. The water was gin clear. Frankly, I'd like to try somewhere else."

The officer fingered his chin thoughtfully.

"Yeah, I'd heard the Green River was fishing very bad." He looked up to see a car approaching. "Now, why didn't I think of him?" He pointed.

"See that car? Well, you come along with me and I'll show you something."

The small van pulled to a stop at the barrier, and the officer grinned pleasantly at the driver.

"What luck this time, Duke?" he asked.

"Look in the back and see for yourself."

The officer unlatched the small doors at the rear of the van, and the sportsman gave a whistle of delight. There were almost a dozen huge blocks of ice, and embedded in each were a number of fine trout.

"That block on top is for you, officer," Duke called out.

Almost reverently the officer lifted out a block, and the sportsman's eyes bulged with excitement.

"Twelve-inch fish," he said. "And they look in grand condition. Where do they come from?"

"Pine Lodge," was the answer of the officer. "After crossing into Canada you keep this road for ten miles, then you fork left for the hills, and in some twenty miles or so you come to Pine Lodge. You're two thousand feet up and there are streams and lakes galore. Pine Lodge is run by George Hollis. Ever heard of him?"

"Can't say I have."

"He's won prizes and championships all over the world as a chef. Now he's got this health resort in the hills, and they say it has every modern comfort. Shooting, fishing, dance band and everything. Ain't that right, Duke?"

"It sure is," cried the driver. "I caught most of them fish this morning in a lake that ain't a mile from the lodge. Any sort of colourful fly, small and double hooked, will get 'em."

"By Jove, I must make a note of this." The sportsman was all smiles.

"Would I get accommodation there?"

"Sure," answered Duke. "We're pretty full—always are—but I'm mighty certain Hollis could take you. He gives preference to all sporting gents."

Duke went on his way after the officer had given him permission, and the sportsman, after giving the officer a substantial tip, hastened over the border.

Five miles down the road Duke pulled up at a lonely gas-station. He honked three times, and at once the sliding doors of the garage rolled back. He drove inside and the doors slid shut. Three men appeared.

"Everything okay, Duke?" sang out a big fellow.

"Like taking toffee from a kid," Duke sneered.

The men opened the doors of the van and dragged out the ice blocks.

"Which one this time?" asked the man in charge.

"The one with three big 'uns."

They smashed the ice-block and took out the three trout. The biggest fish, when opened, revealed a small wad of notes, which were protected by an oil-skin covering.

"It's easy enough getting them past that dumb guy at the barrier," commented Duke. "But that paper ain't so hot."

The other man held the bills close to the light.

"Yeah, so I see," he muttered. "Pity, when we got such a swell set-up."

Meanwhile, in Canada, at the headquarters of the Royal Mounted in Regina, Inspector Newcombe was addressing his men.

"A lot of fake money is in circulation in the United States, and they have asked us to work with them in rounding up the gang behind this counterfeiting," he stated. "For a long while the United States Customs and police thought the money was being made on their side of the border, and they've rounded up nearly every forger in the land. Well, they reckoned to make someone do a squawk. They have methods for faking crooks talk, but they didn't get much, except a whisper that the money wasn't coming from the States. Recently some of this fake money showed up at Winnipeg, and now we're pretty sure it is being forged in Canada and most of it being shipped across the border." He held up a note. "This is one of 'em. Now compare it with the genuine article and you can see it is a poor copy, but the man operating this business must be pretty cute. Somehow he's getting past our men and the officers of the United States. Well, it's got to stop! Pictures and records have been made of all forgers whom the States cannot account for, and to that I have added a few on this side. The inquiry has been going on for some while and the search has narrowed down to the Western Provinces."

After dismissing the men Inspector Newcombe had a talk with Constable Martin.

"You're riding out towards Wood Mountain, and I want you to link up with Sergeant Renfrew. He's only just settled that Brady kidnapping case—got his man, too."

"You sound as if you were surprised, sir," said the constable.

"Renfrew is the most amazing fellow. The last person in the world one would expect to be a Mountie," answered the inspector. "He goes around the country singing and enjoying himself, and yet he has a record that most of us envy."

"If those forgers are in Renfrew's district, sir, he'll get 'em," confidently opined the constable.

"I hope so. Well, give him all details, Martin, and this packet of pictures and records. Tell him I want results. Do you know where to locate the sergeant?"

"Heading for the Souris River, sir," the constable grinned. "There's some sort of a do organised by the lumbermen and their families. An annual affair, and Renfrew is going there to mix the sauce."

"Sauce?"

"Well, they roast game and venison on spits, and Renfrew is a grand cook, sir. There isn't a person that can beat him for making sauces. This is going to be a great day, because George Hollis, who was once a Continental chef, and now owns the Pine Lodge Sportsman's Hotel, is having a contest with him."

"One who makes the best sauce!" The inspector looked most indignant. "I've never heard of such a thing. Why, it must be contrary to regulations."

"I think we all know that Renfrew is a type all his own, sir," the constable smiled. "And I wouldn't have mentioned it if I thought Renfrew would be in any sort of trouble over it, but it's just one of his methods."

"His name, sir, is known for hundreds of miles as a friend of all good people and a demon where wrongdoers are concerned."

"Yes, I guess you're right." The inspector smiled a little. "He may have a curious way of working, but he does get results. Give him my regards and say that besides wanting results he and his men have got to sing at our summer concert on the twenty-second of next month."

The Barbeque

CONSTABLE MARTIN had little trouble in finding Sergeant Renfrew. In Mooso Jaw Canyon he heard the sound of distant singing. Hearty, powerful lungs were filling the valley with melodious sound. He knew that would be Renfrew and his singing Mounties.

Sergeant Renfrew was tall, well-built and good-looking. There was a merry twinkle in the dark eyes and a pleasant smile to the firm mouth. There was a cut to his uniform that almost amounted to fastidiousness, and a jaunty tilt to the wide felt hat that was hardly according to regulations. His men were almost as smart. A dozen of them, and all willing to die for the sergeant, for whose gallantry and fearlessness they had the greatest respect.

Renfrew listened carefully to the instructions brought by Constable Martin, and studied carefully the pictures of criminals under suspicion. One picture in particular interested him, and that was of an ugly, but pathetic elderly man. This man Bronson was one of the cleverest engravers of counterfeit money in America. Bronson had been recently released from prison. Renfrew was given one of the counterfeit notes, and he knew this poor imitation was not the work of an artist. But Renfrew knew from reports received from Border Patrols that on the previous day Bronson had entered Canada. If this gang could get a man like Bronson to work for them they could flood the world with notes that would be hard to detect as forgeries.

If only Renfrew had known about this before, Bronson could have been followed. The report stated Bronson was going to Canada to join up with his only daughter.

Renfrew assured Constable Martin that he would round up the gang if they were in his territory, and promised to bring his men to sing at the summer concert.

The Mounties rode on their way, and at a secluded spot on the Souris River they found the Barbeque Festival in full swing. There were a good two hundred men, women and children at the great feast, and what a shout of welcome went up when they heard the singing and saw the bright uniforms amongst the pines.

True to his promise, Sergeant Renfrew had ridden a hundred miles or more to make sauce for their feast. The girls smiled at the handsome sergeant, but their hearts did not flutter very much because he was reputed to be a confirmed bachelor.

Renfrew received a warm welcome from young Tommy MacDonald. Mrs. MacDonald was present at the Barbeque, but Sergeant MacDonald had duties further up the river.

"I suppose when you get older you'll be a Mountie like your father?" chuckled Renfrew.

"Not me." The boy shook his head. "I'm going to be an engine driver. Much more fun."

"You'll think different one of these days," laughed Renfrew, and then looked round. "Hey, Johnson, where's my hated rival?"

One of the chief organisers of the Barbeque looked up from turning a spit on which a duck was basting, and smiled.

"Mister Hollis will be here, Jimmy. He say you very good fellow, but no make sauce."

A car appeared on the rough track through the woods, and out of it stepped a red-faced, hearty individual in astoundingly loud check clothes. He beamed from ear to ear and held out his arms as if he wished to embrace everybody.

"George Hollis, he come more than a hundred mile." He spoke with a strong accent. "Parbleu, he never forget a promise!" George liked people to think he was of French origin. "Ah, there is ze pauvre homme that think he can make sauce. I fill myself with compassion for him."

Sergeant Renfrew shook hands warmly.

"Well, popular opinion shall decide, George. I'm ready for the fray when you are."

The sergeant had considerable experience of Indian methods of cooking, and he knew certain herbs that gave a perfect blend to a sauce. Lustily did the sergeant respond to the general request for a song, and as he sang he made the sauce. Even the great George Hollis had to admit, after many shrugs of the shoulder, that he had smelt worse—but not much.

Afterwards the men decided to do a little fishing, and Hollis produced a rod, which he handed with loving care to Renfrew.

"Sergeant, I beg you to handle it with respect," said George. "It is a Hardy Special. A very good friend send it to me all the way from England. Feel the whip, my friend, but do not snap ze top. Look at ze line—fine as gossamer. And the flies. They are of my own making."

Renfrew examined the flies.

"This looks like a red spider with a bit of gold tissue wrapped round it. If they'll take that they must be hungry." He fingered the line. "Yes, this isn't so bad, though it can't have much of a breaking strain. Must say the balance of this rod seems good. I think it's wasted on you, George." The urge to make a cast was more than Renfrew could withstand. "Now watch me land the fly on that stone."

But when Renfrew tried to flick the line forward with a dexterous twist he was startled by a scream behind him. He turned to find that in flicking back his line to make the cast he had thought there was no one behind him. He had hooked an extremely pretty but very angry girl. She was trying to hold down her skirts and get the hook out of the silk at the same time.

Renfrew laughed and she glared at him.

"It is not in the least funny. You might have hooked my leg or my face."

"My humble apologies." Renfrew handed the rod to Hollis. "Permit me to remove the hook."

Her dark eyes were still full of anger when he had freed her.

"Lady, I'm sorry, but there had been nobody behind me a moment before, and I thought it was all clear." He smiled. "I must say it was a good catch."

"But you're not likely to land it!" retorted the girl, and angrily walked away.

Sergeant Renfrew walked across to Mrs. MacDonald.

"Who is that girl, ma'am?"

"Her name's Bronson. She's rented a small shooting cabin along the riverbank near the Indian village," Mrs. MacDonald answered. "Must be a bit lonely, though I did hear as how she were waiting for her father."

"Bronson, and she is waiting for her father," Sergeant Renfrew said softly. "That's curious. I must have a talk to Mac when he gets in. I guess I'll stick around till your husband shows up."

But that meeting was never destined to take place.

A Knife in the Back

PINE LODGE had originally been the residence of a wealthy financier, and when the latter had gone broke the place had been converted into a health resort. Situated in glorious country, the place was ideal for a holiday. Here one could indulge in riding, hunting, shooting and fishing, or laze around in the sun all day. Some months previous George Hollis had bought Pine Lodge and brought it right up to date with swimming-pools, central heating and a jazz band.

One morning a hotel car brought an elderly visitor from the railroad, which was twenty miles away. The newcomer was a heavily built man, small beady eyes peered from beneath bushy eyebrows, and he walked with bowed shoulders, as if in poor health. His glance at the people in the sun lounge was furtive. A liveried servant carried his suitcase up to the reception desk.

"I've been commissioned to come here to do some landscape pictures," the newcomer stated. "My name is Bronson."

"We were expecting you, sir," smirked the reception clerk.

"Yeah, we were expecting you," drawled a voice.

Bronson jerked round, and then recoiled at sight of the man who had approached so quietly. Nolan, the under-manager, was a clean-shaven, square-jawed individual. He was very correctly dressed, and he bowed in mock reverence.

"What's this mean? I don't understand," stammered Bronson.

"If you will step into the next room, sir, I shall be delighted to explain," murmured Nolan, holding open a glass door. "After you, sir."

Bronson looked as if he would have liked to have run, but he thought it better to obey. The door closed behind him.

"We always keep tag of our friends," Nolan's voice had hardened, now that the door was closed. "Naturally, we imagined that you would like to see your old friends again when you came out of jug. We instructed an agent to get in touch with you and offer you the job of painting delightful scenic pictures for the Pine Lodge Hotel. You jumped at the chance—and here you are."

"You don't want me here to paint pictures!"

"How clever of you to guess that," mocked Nolan. "No, the chief—" He laughed as Bronson started. "So you haven't forgotten him? Well, he owns this place, and he had the idea that you would be able to board here free of charge in exchange for some simple engraving."

"I won't do it!" cried Bronson. "I've finished with all that racket. I'm running straight. When the cops bust up our joint most of the blame landed on me, and the chief swore that if I kept your names out of this he'd let up on me when I got out."

"I believe there was some such arrangement, but—" Nolan paused and shook his head. "But we have discovered that you are invaluable. We have a perfect set-up here, but no one, Bronson, seems to know the art of engraving. We have all the apparatus and necessary printing press, but our artist is not good. Only one person in ten is bluffed by one of his notes, and so the chief reluctantly came to the conclusion that we must appeal to you. Thinking you might prove a trifle difficult, we had to have recourse to this trick to get you here." He changed his tone. "There's a mint of easy money in this racket. We've got the cops completely baffled, and with you doing the engraving—"

"I won't do it!" cried Bronson. "I'm running straight! I'm on my way to join my daughter, and I'm not staying here a second longer."

A gun appeared in Nolan's hand.

"You're gonna do just as we say or else it'll be just too bad!" he gritted out. "And now that the heroics are over we'll go and see the chief."

George Hollis beamed genially when Bronson was brought into his luxurious room. Bronson seemed more bowed than before. Hollis, for all his smiles, was a ruthless man. Once, desperately hard up when his wife had been ill, Bronson had come into contact with this man, and he had never been able to get free of his clutches.

Hollis listened to Nolan politely.

"I'm surprised you don't want to work in with us, Bronson," he murmured regretfully. "You shall have every comfort. We will send for your daughter and you shall be our guests. A little work for us, Bronson, is all we ask in return, then you can be free of us and have a nice little sum in your pocket."

"You said that before," cried the old man. "I swore when I was in prison that I was through with counterfeit work, and I mean it."

"He'll feel better when he's had a rest," George Hollis grinned at Nolan. "Take him down and show him our workshops and fix him with quarters. I'll see you later, Bronson."

The ex-convict was taken down some iron stairs into the cellars. What chance had he of refusing when Nolan had a gun, and there were two other men close at his heels. The room into which they flung his suitcase reminded him of his cell. In another room he found a young man working on a plate with the aid of a powerful microscope.

"Dugan, I've brought a companion for you," drawled Nolan. "This is Bronson."

"Bronson?" The pallid young fellow with the twitching eyes jumped to his feet. He seemed unusually excited. "This is marvellous. I've always wanted to meet such a great artist."

"Cut out the sentiment," sneered Nolan, and pointed to the table. "Get busy."

"I will not do it!" defiantly cried Bronson.

"I'll beat you to a jelly if you don't get busy," raged Nolan.

They were just in time to stop Nolan from hitting the older man.

Hollis and another member of the gang entered the room, and they were just in time to stop Nolan hitting the older man.

"Steady! Steady!" cried Hollis. "We do not want to hurt our guest. I think if we leave Bronson here to talk it over with his assistant he will realise the futility of argument. Come on, Nolan, I want to talk to you."

"Okay, chief."

"This daughter is a slight problem," George said when they were alone in his office. There was no trace of French accent, in fact, he spoke like a Bowery thug. "She will be expecting her father, and if he don't show up she may get in touch with the cops or the Mounties."

"We don't want the Mounties after us."

"I agree," Hollis sat back in his swivel chair. "We must persuade Bronson to send a message to his daughter to come here. Should Bronson not be willing, then I think we can do without his consent. Dugan can copy his signature, and I have in my desk a small drawing that he did for me once. We will send Pierre for the girl. He is to use no rough methods, but persuade the girl, with the aid of the message we will send, that her father needs her urgently. She must come at once."

Later that day Pierre, a half-caste Indian of evil reputation, slunk down to the river, and from beneath some bushes drew out a canoe. Tucked in his belt was a forged message from Bronson on one of the old man's own pictures. Then Duke and two men appeared with some heavy blocks of ice, in which were embedded some front.

"You might as well deliver these at Barrow Creek and get Jules there to give you a receipt."

"Not safe—plenty danger."

"You do as you're told! Now get going!" threatened Duke.

Sullenly the Indian climbed into his canoe and paddled out into mid-stream. For some miles he steered his craft cunningly amidst the boulders, and as the current was swift he travelled fast, but when the canoe reached the placid waters of a long, winding lake, Pierre proceeded with extreme caution.

Several times he had seen people on the banks, and it was suspicious for an Indian to be out alone in a canoe and heading for the border. Also Pierre was known to the Mounties.

There were rushes, strange, tall grasses and stunted bushes that provided cover, but this dodging in and out was causing a delay. The sun was getting low and Pierre decided he must venture away from the banks. A Mountie, walking his horse among the trees, spotted the lone Indian, and he cupped his hands and ordered the fellow to make for the bank.

Pierre's reply was to paddle furiously.

The Mountie cantered along the bank, keeping level and continually shouting the command for the Indian to land.

Realising that it was impossible to out-distance the Mountie, Pierre paddled furiously towards a small peninsula that jutted out into the lake. Directly he was hidden by the rushes he dumped the ice-blocks overboard, dragged the canoe into the rushes and fled.

Sergeant MacDonald, with his glasses, had located the place where the Indian had vanished and soon found the spot. He saw the canoe and was thinking of trying to get the Indian's trail when something in the water attracted his attention. What was that object that caused a ripple?

Ho bent down and dragged to view a great block of ice containing frozen trout. Why should the Indian dump these fish so hurriedly. Ho found two more blocks and all he carried to dry land. MacDonald picked up a large stone and smashed open one block. He peered at the trout in his hand, but it seemed just a fish, but the third fish was bulgy. He gutted it and fished out a small water-proofed packet of notes.

The rushes parted and there stood Pierre. From his belt he whipped out a knife and flung it with deadly aim. It sank up to the hilt in the sergeant's back. With a groan the Mountie fell forward into the shallow water.

With callous indifference the half-caste wrenched the small packet of notes from the dead man's hand, salvaged the two intact ice-blocks and flung the remnants of the other block into deep water. Satisfied that he had left no evidence to convict him, the half-caste climbed into his canoe and paddled swiftly away.

Sergeant Renfrew camped out near MacDonald's cabin. Owing to Mrs. MacDonald's frail health she was allowed to stay with her husband at this lonely spot. By midnight she was alarmed that there was no sign of her husband. Renfrew and his men decided to find out why the usually punctual MacDonald was delayed. Renfrew picked up the trail of a horse and followed it to the peninsula. They found the sergeant's horse hitched to a tree. The footsteps clearly showed in the soft and treacherous ground of the peninsula.

They found the unfortunate sergeant lying face downwards in the water. Renfrew, with the help of a torch, soon spotted that a canoe had grounded. There were also the marks of incoasins on the bank, and as they led nowhere he guessed the killer had escaped in his canoe.

MacDonald must have seen the Indian acting suspiciously and trailed him. The Indian had knifed him in the back.

It was a terrible task that fell on Renfrew's shoulders, the comforting of a heart-broken woman and her child. Sergeant MacDonald had been one of his staunchest friends, and he vowed as he held young Tommy in his arms that the Mountie's death would not go un-avenged.

Renfrew and Lightning

VIRGINIA BRONSON was worried at the non-appearance of her father. He had promised faithfully to join her here and he was overdue. There had been no message at the telegraph-post for two days. It was lonely at the small hunting cabin. She wondered what she ought to do. Almost she had spoken to the Mounties, but she did not want to broadcast the fact that her father was an ex-convict. They might be evicted from Canada.

But when she came back to the cabin at dusk on the second night she gave a gasp when she found an Indian calmly squatting cross-legged on the floor. Pierre took out the message he had been told to deliver.

"Your father—he send me—letter explain," he said softly.

The girl took the scroll gingerly, as if suspecting some act of treachery. Indians had always been repulsive to her, and there was an intentness of gaze from half-closed eyes that made her feel very mistrustful of this strange visitor. But when she opened the scroll she found it was one of her father's pictures—she would have known it anywhere. Then there was the message and her father's familiar signature.

"You know what this says?"

"Plenty well—start now!"

"Is my father in some sort of trouble?"

"Me not think so. You just come with me. Your father pleased."

The girl scanned the message again. Her father said she could place explicit trust in Pierre. She was to accompany the Indian at once and he would explain everything when he saw her. She was not to worry. But when she took out a suitcase the Indian raised his hand solemnly.

"No take baggage—go in canoe. Plenty everything where we go."

The girl was wearing riding breeches and she decided that if she had got to do a journey by canoe and probably some part on horseback she might as well go as she was. She pushed a toothbrush, a comb and some thin pyjamas into the pocket of a heavy overcoat, and with that slung over her arm she followed the Indian from the cabin.

The night was warm. They reached a river, and in the moonlight they travelled slowly till they came to a large lake. Virginia put on her overcoat as there was a cold mist rising from the water. The moon vanished and Virginia slept. Pierre paddled on with swift strokes. Once or twice the Indian would pause and look towards the distant banks, and several times he cupped an ear with a lean brown hand. There seemed hardly a sound except the ripple of the canoe through the placid waters.

Just before dawn Pierre headed towards the bank, and he had to paddle hard as there was now a strong current. Suddenly an opening appeared among the bushes and trees and there was quite a wide, deep river.

Virginia stirred and opened her eyes. She looked at her watch.

"Are we getting close, Pierre?"

"Plenty mile. Sun high time we get place."

The sun appeared, and it was so warm that Virginia took off her coat and lay back enjoying the beauty of the wild scenery. The trees, the streams that trickled over the rocks to the river, the leap and splash of trout, and the many birds in the trees.

The Indian ceased paddling, and after a moment or so the canoe began to drift with the current.

"Anything wrong, Pierre?"

The Indian stared intently back along the river and up at the hills that towered on either side of the river. He did not answer, but took up his paddle, but after going for a few minutes he paused again.

"What is it?"

"Think someone follow," fiercely replied the Indian.

"But why should anyone want to follow us?" Virginia asked.

This question Pierre ignored and went on paddling for a while. At the end of a straight stretch he made for the bank. They landed. Carrying the canoe, they threaded their way by a well-beaten track through the woods till they came to another river. This time they went swiftly down-stream, but in a deep stretch of the river where the current was not so rapid the Indian stopped paddling and his eyes glinted angrily as he shot out an arm.

Virginia turned and she gave a slight gasp to see a horseman riding along the cliff without any attempt at concealment. She could see it was a Mountie, and besides a led horse there was a big Alsatian dog.

It was Sergeant Renfrew and Lightning. The dog was attached to the company, but would only admit one real master, and that was Renfrew. The sergeant always took the dog when moving by night, as Lightning would give warning of most lurking dangers. Moreover Lightning was a marvel at following a trail. Renfrew had learnt that Virginia had been several times to the telegraph office and he was certain that she was the daughter of Bronson, the forger. She was expecting someone, and that should be her father. He did not connect her, then, with the death of Sergeant MacDonald, but it chanced that he was in the neighbourhood of her cabin when Pierre and the girl appeared. When they disappeared among the shadows of the trees he followed stealthily and saw them embark. Renfrew hastened back to camp, saddled a spare horse and took Lightning. He had an idea that the girl might need a horse.

It amused him to note the perturbation of the Indian at sight of his scarlet uniform.

Renfrew made no attempt to stop them or catch them up, yet he maintained the same distance. Pierre tried paddling hard and shooting rapids at terrific speed, but whenever he paused in the smooth water beyond he had but to gaze towards the towering banks to see their persistent pursuer.

The Indian shot some rapids a mile long, and as the bank was broken and rocky, thought that the Mountie would have been left behind. Yes, there was no sign. The neigh of a horse, and this time saw Renfrew directly above him.

"I'll get him!" cried Pierre, and snatched up the shot-gun in the bottom of the canoe.

Renfrew was in grave danger of being murdered, and but for the intervention of the girl would have been, without doubt, badly wounded. Unusual sounds below made him turn his head. The Indian and the girl were standing up in the wobbling canoe and seemed to be struggling for the possession of a long-barrelled shot-gun. Virginia had no great love for the law after what had been done to her father, but she could not sit by and see a half-caste Indian shoot down a Mountie in cold blood. When Pierre had raised the gun she had tried to wrench it away.

The canoe suddenly capsized and the two occupants fell into the river. The current was strong now as there were rapids a short way ahead. Callously the Indian left the girl and swam towards the shore. Renfrew jumped from his horse. One glance below was sufficient to show that the girl, though swimming gamely, was powerless in this current. Without hesitation Renfrew leapt from the cliff in a magnificent outward dive. Scarcely had his body touched the water than Lightning had leapt from the cliff.

Virginia had sunk once when the strong arm of the Mountie went round her. They were now in a small rapid, and Renfrew contented himself with going with the current and keeping clear of all boulders. A stretch of water not quite so swift, and here Renfrew made his effort to get the girl to the bank. She was a dead weight in his arms. Gradually he drew nearer the bank, and then his feet touched slippery stones. With his limp burden in his arms he staggered ashore, and a few seconds later Lightning followed with the stotson of the Mountie between his teeth.

From the cover of a bush Pierre watched, and his hand slid to his belt, but he had no knife and the distance was too far. The Mountie put down his burden and began to scan carefully the bushes and the trees, and Pierre decided it was wise to get away. When it was dark he would return.

Renfrew laid the girl down under a pine and saw that her eyes were open.

"Thanks for stopping that Indian from plugging me. Now, don't talk, just relax."

Renfrew built a fire and fixed a blanket over a tree, then he proceeded to light the fire.

"Feel strong enough to get up and get out of those wet clothes?"

"I'm quite all right." Virginia struggled to her feet. "Thanks for getting me out of the river."

"You change and we'll talk afterwards." It was almost an order. "Wrap a blanket round you and undress behind that blanket. Dangerous to stick around in wet clothes."

Meekly the girl obeyed, though there was a rebellious light in her blue eyes.

Renfrew busied himself tending the fire. Peeping over the top of the blanket the girl marvelled at his skill at fire-making. In a few minutes he had got a small but heating fire going, and with very little smoke, and had erected a sort of bracket on which he could hang the wet clothing.

Soon the clothing was all drying nicely, and Sergeant Renfrew came back to duty. Out came a small notebook.

"Naturally, it is my duty to ask you a few questions." He moistened the end of a pencil, and gazed up at the pretty face peering over the blanket. "It is not done for a young white girl to go chasing round Canada with a half-caste Indian, and when they travel by dead of night it makes a person curious."

"So you were following us all the time." Virginia's eyes flashed. "Pierre kept on looking round as if he scented something. I don't see that it's any business of the Mounted Police if I choose to go out with an Indian."

"Oh, we're a most suspicious lot!" His eyes were twinkling. "First of all I want to know name, age, height, weight, address, occupation and even colour of your hair and eyes. We'll start with the name, please."

She told him, knowing full well that this information he knew already. She tried to find out why he had followed her, and all he would say was that the Indian seemed to be behaving in a manner that was suspicious and furtive, and it was his duty to follow. The fact that the half-caste had tried to shoot him rather went to prove that these suspicions were well founded. Her explanation was that she had been sent for by her father, who was on a fishing and sketching holiday. It was some little place in the mountains, and that she had no idea whereabouts now that he had driven away the Indian guide.

Renfrew did not persist with his questioning. Towards dusk he went down to the lake to see if he could shoot a wild duck for food or catch some trout. During that time Virginia made a discovery that confirmed her worst fears. His jacket he had left near the fire to dry, and in the pocket she found some photographs of wanted men. One of them was her own father.

This Mountie knew that her father was an ex-convict, and was trailing her so that she would take him to her father. But why should he want to find her father? The mysterious manner in which her father had sent for her sent a cold shiver down her spine. Her father was in some sort of trouble. He had promised faithfully that once free of the grim prison walls he would run straight—surely he had not linked up with his old companions.

"Naturally, it is my duty to ask you a few questions," Renfrew told the girl behind the blanket.

Renfrew secured a duck and some trout, and he cooked both perfectly, and, though worried, Virginia quite enjoyed the meal. They turned in early. Virginia was given a bed not far from the embers of the fire, whilst Renfrew and his dog slept some little distance away.

Virginia lay there wide awake, staring up at the moon. What should she do? Sergeant Renfrew had told her nothing of what he intended to do on the morrow. She was his prisoner and must obey his orders. A twig snapped and she glanced round startled. A soft, hissing sound and she saw Pierre crouching, half hidden by the trunk of a tree. He was cautioning her against making any noise. Then he beckoned. The girl flung back the blankets. She was dressed save for her boots. A glance across at the sergeant showed that he was sleeping. She tiptoed across to the Indian, who laid his finger on his lip.

Silently they stole away.

A very faint whimper came from the dog, but this was instantly silenced by a hand over Lightning's mouth.

"Not a sound, old scout," Renfrew hissed.

Through half-closed eyes the sergeant saw Pierre and the girl take his horse and the led horse, saw them saddle up and then ride away into the darkness.

"I thought that Indian would come back," Renfrew said to his dog. "I counted on this happening. They'll lead me to her father's hide-out, and I hope it isn't too many miles away from here. Well, it's no good doing anything till dawn, so shut your eyes, pal, and get some sleep. We mayn't get another chance."

The Two Killers

DUKE and another of the counterfeit gang who was known as Tiny—the latter was six feet tall and was an ex-prizefighter—were sent for by George Hollis.

"Pierre should have been back," Hollis said to them. "Find out what's going on. I don't trust that half-breed. A Mountie's been killed, found with a knife in his back, and it sounds to me mighty like some of Pierre's work. If he's trying a snatch with the girl you gotta get busy. If you link up with Pierre and he's heading for Pine Lodge with the girl, then just say I sent you out as I was worried. I'll deal with Pierre when he gets here. I got a perfect set-up out here, and I ain't having any of my plans jammed." He handed them a packet of notes. "Here's the first batch of Bronson's engraving, and they're swell. When you've dealt with Pierre take them to Barrow Creek."

Some twenty miles south of the lodge the two ruffians were driving the small van along a rough road through the pines towards a Mountie outpost, where they intended to make some casual inquiries of the constable in charge, when they sighted two riders. Duke instantly recognised the dark-hued figure as being Pierre. They pulled up the car a moment later and Duke jumped out.

"Where you been? Chief got anxious and sent us out to look for you," Duke cried, giving the girl an appraising glance.

"Mountie trail canoe," drawled Pierre. "Take girl prisoner. Mo escape. Night I go fetch her, and we get away on Mountie's horses."

Duke heard how the Mountie had trailed them, of the capsizing of the canoe, and the rescue by the Red-coat. He heard the story through to the end. May 7th, 1938.

"Why did he trail you?" "Maybe suspect me kill Sergeant MacDonald."

"Did you?"

"No kill anyone!" lied the Indian.

"Where's this Mountie now—still trailing you?"

"No. Take horses in stream. No seent," answered Pierre.

"Know his name?"

Pierre shok his head, then pointed to the girl.

"She know."

"We're friends of your father's," explained Duke, with a grin that was supposed to be friendly. "Pierre tells me you've been pestered by one of these Mountie fellows. Do you know his name?"

Virginia hesitated. There was something furtive about this man. Still, what harm in telling? It would probably make them all the more eager to get her quickly to her father.

"Renfrew—Sergeant Renfrew."

"Sergeant Renfrew!" Duke hissed the name, and his whole face darkened as he glowered at Pierre. "So you would go and tangle up with that mug. Better get on up to the lodge with the girl." He lowered his voice so that the girl could not hear. "Tell the chief that Renfrew was trailing you and that we've stopped behind to bump him off."

At dawn Sergeant Renfrew and his dog took up the trail, and the Mountie grinned as the trail ended at a small river.

"An old dodge, Lightning, but they've got to come out of the river some place. Come on, pal." He waded through the rushing water to the opposite bank. "You go upstream, Lightning, and I'll go down. Bark if you pick up the trail. I'll whistle if I get it."

The barking of Lightning was heard some ten minutes later. Renfrew hastened upstream and soon came to the dog. On the bank were clean-cut hoof-marks. They resumed the trail, but Renfrew did not try to cover too many miles. There was no sign of rain to wipe out this trail, and he was husbanding his strength. After a while the Mountie came to a larger trail, and but for the uncanny instincts of the dog he might have been baffled.

"This trail takes me past Laidlaw's outpost," thoughtfully muttered Renfrew, examining a map. "I wonder if that sleepy individual will have seen them."

This outpost was close to a large but orderly lumber camp. Laidlaw, who was sprawled in a chair listening to a radio broadcast of a murder drama, jumped up at sight of the sergeant and his dog.

"You seem busy, Laidlaw," he commented dryly.

"I'm sorry, sir," the tall, pleasant fellow grinned. He looked and was most unsuited for a Mountie. Somehow he had become a member of the force, and so he had been posted to this quiet and desolate spot. "You see, nothing ever happens here, sir," he added, waving towards the radio. "This is my only excitement."

"Seen anything of an Indian and a girl?"

"No, sir, they haven't called here."

"They wouldn't have done that," grinned Renfrew. "They were riding two of my horses."

"They stole them from you?" incredulously questioned the other.

"They thought they did, but I let them get away because I wanted to trail them. The trail's brought me here."

"To this shack?"

"No, no, Laidlaw, but to within a hundred yards." Renfrew answered with a shade of impatience. "I was hoping you might have seen them."

"No, sir. They were probably scared away by my radio," Laidlaw replied. "Can I do anything, sir? Follow this trail?"

"No, I think not. I don't think you'd fancy a knife in your back." The sergeant glanced at the radio. "Guess I'll get a report through to headquarters."

"Usually I go up to the lumber camp at this time," Laidlaw looked at his watch. "Could you carry on till I get back?"

"Sure—sure."

Laidlaw rode off towards the lumber camp. Renfrew sat down at the switch-board, but before making his connections paused to consider what he should say in his report. Lightning lay on the floor with his nose pointing towards the window.

Laidlaw had scarcely vanished among the trees when Duke and Tiny appeared. They knew that Laidlaw was a soft sort of sap, and they could gull him with some yarn about having important information to give to Sergeant Renfrew. Laidlaw would probably tell them why Renfrew was trailing Pierre and the trail Renfrew would most likely take; they would go to meet the sergeant, whom they would ambush, and that matter would be settled. Maybe they might come and bump off Laidlaw on their way back so that no one would know a thing about the shooting. They approached the shack quietly, just as Renfrew began to talk to headquarters: "Sergeant Renfrew reporting—"

Duke paused with his hand on the door-knob. He waved a hand to Tiny to stay stock-still. The crook heard enough to know that Renfrew was trailing Pierre, whom he suspected of the killing of Sergeant MacDonald, and that Renfrew thought the whole business was in some way linked up with the counterfeit note smuggling.

Duke tiptoed off the veranda to Tiny's side.

"Lucky we came along," he whispered. "Renfrew's inside. Pierre did kill this Sergeant MacDonald, and Renfrew is wise to it. Pierre's bluff didn't fool this Mountie, and he's on Pierre's trail. It'll lead him to the lodge if we don't stop him and quick. What's more the Mounties have been warned the notes are coming from Canada, and Renfrew is not only trailing Pierre but the girl as well."

"Why?"

"Because he knows she's Joe Bronson's daughter." Duke gripped the other's coat. "Listen, Tiny. I'm gonna walk right in and talk pretty to this sergeant. You get along to the open window and drill him. It's easy."

It might have succeeded but for the dog. Lightning showed no sign of having heard a thing, save that his eyes were half-closed and his ears pointed.

There was a rap at the door and Duke walked in. Renfrew thought it was some man from the lumber camp who had walked down to the post. The dog bared its teeth, and then the lean snout turned towards the window.

"Looked in to have a chat with Laidlaw," Duke remarked pleasantly. "Ain't he here any longer, sergeant?"

"Gone up to the lumber camp," Renfrew answered. "If you like to stick around he'll be back shortly." He saw the dog moving on its stomach towards the window. "What's wrong, Lightning?"

The dog suddenly sprang straight for the window, and a moment later there came a scream—Lightning's teeth had fastened round Tiny's gun-wrist. Renfrew's mind acted quickly, and he guessed what might have happened if Lightning hadn't acted, and he turned in time to see Duke sliding his hand to his hip. Wallop! One stride Renfrew took, and then he lifted Duke clean off the floor with a fierce right-handed uppercut.

Duke got to his feet and made another effort to get to his gun.

"No, you don't, rat!" shouted Renfrew, and landed a stinging left.

The gun was jerked from the crook's hand and cluttered to the floor. Snarling foul oaths, the man rushed at Renfrew. He thought he knew every method of unclean fighting, but his low blows and kicks did not win him the fight. Renfrew had expected this sort of action. Duke did land one lucky punch that caused the sergeant to stagger backwards, trip over a rug, and crash to the floor. Duke swung up a chair, but the Mountie rolled to one side and missed the chair as it hurtled at him. When Duke made another dive for his gun his shoulders were seized in an iron grip; he was jerked round and stopped a blow in the mouth that nearly knocked his head off his shoulders. Feebly he waved his hand, and Renfrew got in two punches to the ribs that caused him to gasp. He would have sunk to the floor if the Mountie had not pinned him to the wall.

"So your dirty game failed," the sergeant cried harshly. "Your buddy aimed to shoot me in the back whilst you did the talking. Well, thanks to Lightning, you came unstuck and now I'll see you don't do any further harm." He whipped out a pair of handcuffs and secured the crook's wrist. "And now to deal with your buddy."

Renfrew found Tiny prone on his back with the dog snarling and snapping at the terrified killer. A curt command and the dog stood back. Renfrew yanked the ruffian to his feet and slugged him once. Tiny might have been a boxer, but that punch was a knock-out. A few moments later the two crooks, handcuffed together, sat limply on a bench inside the shack and watched malevolently as Renfrew went through the contents of their pockets.

Laidlaw gasped when he entered his room and saw a broken chair. He stared at the two prisoners in amazement and alarm.

"Tried to drill me," explained Renfrew. "But Lightning was too cute for them. Got a magnifying glass?"

"No, I haven't. You want one?"

"Yeah. To look at these notes. They seem kinda new to me." Renfrew held one up to the light. "But if they're forgeries they're mighty clever. I found a thousand dollars on that dark-haired killer, and it's a mighty lot of money. Have you got some wire?"

"Sure I have."

Laidlaw watched Renfrew make a loop in the wire and then dab his fingers in a water jug. He looked so puzzled that the sergeant laughed.

"Another way of making a magnifying glass," chuckled Renfrew. "This drop of water fixed in this way makes it almost as powerful as a glass when used with the aid of a strong light. Fetch the lamp closer."

Very carefully Renfrew examined each note, and he gave no sign when he saw in one note small letters worked into the scroll. The message was quite clear.

At once he got through to head-

"So your dirty game failed!" the sergeant cried harshly.

quarters, and the crooks heard him charter a special aeroplane to come to the mountain post at once.

"Look after these notes and these prisoners," ordered Renfrew. "Headquarters are sending my men up here at once. They'll stand by for further orders."

Three hours later an aeroplane landed, and it was Renfrew who flew the machine away, and the pilot remained behind. The sergeant was a qualified air pilot. When he had gone Laidlaw picked up the piece of wire. He wanted to try this novel magnifying glass out for himself.

The Accident

RENFREW had donned the pilot's overalls. A survey map showed him the exact position of Pine Lodge. Headquarters had been amazed when the sergeant had asked that the pilot fly one of the oldest machines to the mountain post, and as they regarded the young man as one of their most brilliant servants no arguments were raised, not even when he informed them that the machine might be wrecked. It was Renfrew's intentions to get into Pine Lodge without rousing suspicions.

Within an hour Renfrew was within sight of Pine Lodge, and a grim chuckle escaped him as he stared down. Adjusting his parachute, he prepared himself for the entertainment that he was going to provide for the guests and staff of Pine Lodge.

The guests noted idly the aeroplane flying at several thousand feet. True, one did not see a machine in this part of Canada very often, but they were all too lazy, lying in the warm sun, to take much interest. When the machine suddenly swooped down a thousand feet they did blink their eyelids and sit up. Someone commented that it looked as if the pilot was in difficulties. This was confirmed when the machine began to turn over and over. It fluttered earthward like a bird with a broken wing.

Now the guests were on their feet and excitedly pointing skywards.

Renfrew had perfect control of the old machine, and he rolled and side-slipped his craft in a manner that would have deceived the most experienced airman. The guests were convinced that nothing could save the machine, and that it was rushing to destruction. Naturally, some of the servants came out of the hotel to see what all the excitement was about, and they stared up at the plane. The engine must have cooked out and the machine got out of control. There were nasty air pockets over these mountains, and that was probably the cause of the trouble. How they gasped when they saw Renfrew at a thousand feet abandon his machine and jump.

A gasp of relief when the parachute opened and they could see the pilot floating slowly towards the ground. The machine, without Renfrew at the controls, went into a nose dive, but by some chance flattened out and skimmed over the tops of the pines. It crashed into the side of a hill, one wing crumpled up like matchwood and the machine stood drunkenly on its nose for some moments before collapsing.

The guests went rushing through the grounds in the direction of the parachute. They saw the airman hit the ground, saw him dragged for some distance until the parachute collapsed, but the airman made no attempt to rise. They thought he must be badly hurt, but Renfrew was only shamming.

They unfastened the parachute straps from his shoulders and lifted Renfrew to his feet, but he was limp in their arms and his eyes were closed. Six of the guests formed a human stretcher and hurried Renfrew to the lodge, where they dumped him on a settee.

Everyone crowded round to stare at the prostrate airman, and someone suggested loosening his clothing. Renfrew had hard work to suppress a grin when his overalls were opened at the neck and there came a general shout that it was a "Mountie."

Nolan was one of the staff gathered round that settee, and his face contorted into harsh lines as he saw that hated uniform. He rushed off to arouse Hollis, who was taking a rest.

"An aeroplane has crashed and the pilot jumped from his machine. His parachute filled out, but he was hurt badly on landing."

"Well, my friend, why look so excited," cried Hollis. "Haven't we got the reputation for being most considerate and kind. Give him the best room, get a doctor and see that he has everything."

"Yeah, but it's a Mountie."

"What?" That made Hollis sit up.

"Yeah, a Mountie!" cried Nolan. "They've brought him into the lounge, and I got the shock of my life when they opened his overalls and I saw his cursed uniform."

"What brings a Mountie to these parts?" pondered Hollis. "Guess I'd better look into this."

"He's coming round." A guest reported to the proprietor as Hollis appeared. "I think he was knocked unconscious when he landed. He's groaning, and I reckon he's hurt his back."

George Hollis pushed the people away and gave a start as he stared down at the groaning man.

"Renfrew!" he gasped.

Weakly Renfrew opened his eyes, gazed limply up at Hollis, made an effort to rise, and then with features twisted in pain slumped back.

"He is hurt bad." Hollis had remembered his rôle of French origin, and his words were accentuated. "Ze pauvre homme. I hope he is not too bad." He knelt beside the settee. "Renfrew, my friend, speak to me."

Renfrew opened his eyes and made a very good impersonation of a dazed man trying to focus his gaze. A slight smile appeared.

"My old pal, George," he mumbled. "What are you doing here?"

"I might ask ze same thing," cried Hollis. "You have crashed at Pine Lodge—my doorstep. Many times I ask you to come and see me, but never I expect you come thees way."

The dazed expression seemed to fade from Renfrew's face, but he gave a gasp of pain as he tried to sit up.

"Ah, my back!"

"Take it easy, my friend," begged Hollis.

"The old crate cracked up, George," weakly Renfrew explained. "First the engine started to miss, then an oil feed got jammed and I began to lose height. Saw your place and tried to make a forced landing, but she got out of control. I was warned against air pockets at about two thousand feet, and without an engine I was helpless. Bailed out at a thousand feet and here I am, though I seem to have hurt my back."

"Maybe you hit an old tree trunk," said Hollis. "Plenty trees I cut down to make clearing. Relax, my friend." The proprietor beamed round at his guests. "This is my very old friend, Sergeant Renfrew. Long time I know him. Only ze other day I have big contest with him at a Barbeque."

"A big contest, Mr. Hollis?" a woman guest murmured. "You mean a fight."

"Oui, oui, a big fight," laughed Hollis. "Who make ze best sauce, and I win easy." He beamed at Renfrew. "You stay here as my guest. I am ze happy man."

"I can't stay here." With face twisted, Renfrew stared up at the under-manager. "I gotta get to Saskatoon by nightfall."

"Why have you got to go to Saskatoon?"

May 7th, 1938.

toon so urgent?" the latter demanded suspiciously.

"An Indian ran amok and killed a storekeeper. The Indian got away, and I want to get on the trail before the rains come."

"That Indian lucky man." Hollis shook his head. "You not go to Saskatoon even if I had a hundred aeroplanes. You sick man—I fetch doctor."

A doctor staying in the hotel gingerly felt the airman, who winced when his back was touched. The doctor said that Renfrew had strained his back, and that no bones were broken. He ordered rest. Renfrew gave a resigned shrug of his shoulders, and was carried to one of the best rooms in the lodge.

"What you make of it, chief?" Nolan asked after they had got the Mountie to bed.

"I think it's a good thing," Hollis grinned. "Renfrew is a very smart man and the longer we can keep him here under our eye the better."

"You don't think it's a frame-up?"

"Impossible," was the emphatic answer. "Though I did not see the crash, I've heard all about it from those that did. No one could have faked such a crash, and the doc assures me that the back is badly strained. No, it is just a trick of Fate."

"I wish the mug had been killed," gritted out Nolan. "Having one of them Red-coats around gives me the shivers."

"Renfrew's my friend, and thinks I'm a devil of a fine fellow," laughed Hollis. "I would be the last person in the world he'd ever suspect. Any sign of Pierre and the girl?"

"No, and not a word from Duke," Nolan was scowling. "I hope you're right, chief, about Renfrew, but what with Pierre not getting here and Renfrew showing up I'm kinda uneasy."

"Forget it! How's Bronson doing?"

"Slow," savagely answered Nolan. "Keeps on complaining about his eyes. Says prison life weakened 'em. I reckon it's a gag, and I've threatened to beat the hide off him if he don't get busy on that engraving."

"Go steady on him, Nolan," Hollis ordered. "He's an old man, but too valuable to lose. He's turned out some good stuff already, and we don't want to flood Canada and the States with spurious money. When Pierre shows up with the girl, let me know. I've got to figure out my angle on this father and daughter business. Maybe we can use the girl to make the old boy work."

"You mean threaten to do her in?"

Hollis nodded.

"Fix up quarters for her in the annex, where we can keep her under lock and key."

"I don't trust Pierre."

"There I agree." Hollis lay down on his couch, and pulled an eiderdown over him. "Some while back he threatened to talk unless he got moro money. That's why I want to see Pierre directly he gets here," Hollis yawned. "Maybe I'll fix Pierre so that he causes no more trouble."

"That's the talk, chief," approved Nolan, as he moved to the door.

Sergeant Renfrew had sipped brandy and murmured his thanks weakly, and eventually had been left alone. Whereupon he had got out of bed and donned his clothes. He was pleased with the way he had got into Pine Lodge and into the enemy's stronghold.

A sound took him to the window, and a satisfied grin showed on his clean-cut features. Two riders had arrived at the lodge. It was Pierre and the girl. He saw a groom take their horses. The half-breed made for a side door, and it was obvious from the drooping manner of the girl that she was very tired.

From his pocket Renfrew took out the packet of pictures of wanted men. His lips curled in a sarcastic smile. What would some of the people in this place have thought if they could have seen them? Ah, hero was that smug-looking man, Nolan, who was supposed to be the under-manager. Renfrew read the man's record and whistled softly. A New York gangster, who had been in prison many times and was now wanted on a murder rap. He made a sketch of a dark, wavy wig, and fitted it on the picture of a sour, surly rascal, and it was something like Hollis. Being somewhat of an artist, Renfrew added a smile to the picture, and it was Hollis. The latter had many names and his record was mostly Continental. Last heard of in France and thought to be in the States, notorious as a forger and leader of crook organisations.

"George, eet ees too bad I find you out," chuckled Renfrew.

But his own position was precarious. Hollis would learn either from the girl or Pierre that they had been trailed by a Sergeant Renfrew, and then there would be trouble. He looked to his gun, opened the window, and slid down a pipe into the garden.

Gun Play

NOLAN brought Hollis the news that Pierre had brought the girl.

"I didn't ask for information, chief, but I did curse the half-breed for taking such a time getting the girl," he reported. "Also, one of the boys told me they came here on horses, and I spoke to Pierre. He mumbled something about plenty trouble with Mounties. I'm dead sure it was his knife that got MacDonald."

Hollis got off the bed.

"I'll see Pierre over in the annex and let two of the boys stand by—I may need 'em." Hollis gave a savage grin. "Take the girl into your office and keep her talking, but when I give you a call on the 'phone she is to be taken into my office. I shan't appear, because I'll be hiding in the big chair by the fire. Get her to talk about the trip up here. I will arrange for her father to show up when she's through with that tale, then you leave 'em alone as I want to hear what Bronson will have to say to his daughter."

Some time later the weary girl was taken by Nolan into his chief's office. Over the 'phone he had informed Nolan that his hunch was right about MacDonald. Pierre had knifed the man and done a lot of harm, but he would not cause any further trouble. After leaving Bronson and the girl alone he was to start dismantling the most valuable machinery—Renfrew's crash had been faked. Naturally, Nolan was far from comfortable as he sat in his chief's office, trying to appear at ease and encouraging the girl to talk, when the whole time his fingers itched to get at his gun, go up to Renfrew's room and drill the Mountie as he lay in bed.

Bronson appeared, and Nolan's lips curled as he saw father and daughter rush into each other's arms. Sentimental slop. Well, he did not care what the chief might think of doing, but he aimed to get that cursed Mountie disposed of, and he rushed up to Renfrew's room. How he cursed at sight of the empty bed and the open window. Now that Duke and Tiny were away there were only three outside members of the gang at Pine Lodge, and Nolan got one of them to keep a lookout for a Mountie prowling round the grounds.

The day was drawing to a close, and the light was going fast. Renfrew decided that he had better get through to Laidlaw and get help. In his clothing he had concealed parts of a field telephone with connections that would enable him to tap in on any line. He clambered up a telegraph pole and would not have felt like smiling if he had known that a bearded ruffian was peering along the barrel of a shot-gun about fifty yards away and endeavouring to draw a bead on the intrepid Mountie.

Perhaps the fact that he was in full view of the lodge, and that it was not usual for a Mountie to go clambering up telegraph poles made Renfrew keep a sharp look out for anyone who might take exception to his actions. A slight movement among the bushes attracted his attention as he was connecting up his telephone, and with a shock he realised that a double-barrelled gun was pointing in his direction. Renfrew decided that his position was precarious and let go his hold. A fraction of a second later the gun roared and a large dose of shot whistled dangerously close. Renfrew jerked out his gun, but there came no repetition by the murderous attacker. The gunman had fled.

Nolan heard the shot and trusted as he gave orders about the dismantling of the plant that Renfrew had got his. It irked him that the chief was wasting all this valuable time listening to the futile remarks of the Bronsons.

But in Hollis' mind it was not a waste of time. He had great confidence in his own abilities. From the time he was a young man he had been running gangs and organisations. Once or twice in those early days he had been in prison, but in recent years he had proved far too wily for any police. He had got out of worse jams than this before. He must act coolly and calmly. The question of Pierre had been solved by a bullet—the wretched half-breed was now at the bottom of an old mine-shaft, and the body would be shifted later. Though he knew about Renfrew he did not think the Mountie would start anything that night. First he must solve the problem of the Bronsons.

Lying snugly, he listened to the conversation of the Bronsons. Mostly it was inquiries from the daughter regarding her father's health.

"But if your eyes are bad you shouldn't be working," Virginia argued. "You need the air and the sunshine. Hollis has got no power to force you to work for him."

"You don't know that man's power," mumbled the old man. "He'd frame me some way, but he's promised to let me go very soon."

"You vowed you'd go straight, dad. Now you'll be caught and sent back to prison. Sergeant Renfrew never lets up on his man."

"But he'll not follow you here, my dear."

"I don't know so much." Virginia could see that tall, athletic figure rescuing her from the overturned canoe.

"I thought that Pierre and I got away surprisingly easy. The dog never woke even when I stepped on a dead stick and it broke with a loud snap. I think he knew that I would never intentionally lead him to you. Father, we must get away from here at once."

"Where could we go, Virginia? Besides, Hollis is a revengeful man and would follow us."

"Father, why did they want you back with them?"

"Because their engraver has lost his grip. They've scared him so much that his work is poor, and his notes wouldn't deceive a child." Joe Bronson grinned bitterly. "That's why they got me back."

George Hollis decided that the girl knew far too much. She must not be allowed to go among the hotel guests and must be kept a prisoner. He would keep the old man working by using the daughter as a menace. If they should have to take flight from Pine Lodge it might be necessary to kill both of them. He pressed a button in the arm of his chair. It was the signal. Joe was ordered to go back to his laboratory, whilst Virginia was asked to go to her room. The girl clung to her father's arm and refused to be parted from him.

Nolan, accompanied by the engraver who had lost his nerve, came into the chief's office. Hollis got up from his chair.

"Let her go down with the old man—it don't make any odds. If his daughter ain't with him he may refuse to work," muttered Hollis. "Any other developments? I thought I heard a shot once."

"That was Hansen shooting at that cursed Mountie. His door was locked, but he went out of the window," Nolan said. "Hansen saw him up a telegraph pole trying to tap in on a line. Hansen shot, and is not sure whether he hit Renfrew or not."

"That means he missed. I seem to be surrounded by fools," Hollis blazed. "Is all the apparatus dismantled?"

"Yes." The girl told Duke and Tiny that Renfrew was chasing them," Hollis went on. "And it seems that Duke went on planning to get Renfrew. How come Renfrew to be here and no sign of those two fools? I've a hunch that Renfrew beat them to it."

"Gee, chief, this sure looks like a jam. What we gonna do?"

"Get out and quick, and leave no evidence behind us," Hollis banged his desk. "We'll have to bump off the Bronsons to save our own necks."

"Kill the Bronsons?" The engraver whose nerves had gone was shaking from head to foot. "You can't kill the girl!"

"They know too much," barked Nolan. "The chief's right. It's the only way. How about Renfrew, chief?"

"He'll come snooping in here, and then I'll fix him!" gritted out Hollis. "We've got to wipe out all those who can split on us."

"Hallo, where's Snoopy gone?" Nolan turned to find the engraver had sneaked away. "He's gone to warn them."

Joe Bronson was sitting by an empty table when the engraver dashed into the room.

"You've got to get outa here!" the

"I can't stay here," said Renfrew weakly. "I gotta get to Saskatoon by nightfall."

fellow panted, his eyes twitching. "You're in grave danger. The chief plans to kill you both and—"

He got no further for Nolan had burst into the room.

"You squealing rat!" he shouted. "Get outa here! Scram!"

"Why should they die?" the man screamed. "They ain't done a thing." "Scram!" Nolan jerked out his gun.

The Bronsons clung to each other when Nolan had driven the man who had tried to save them away. They gasped as they heard the report of the gun. It was Nolan's way of settling any trouble. He had drilled the wretch through the back and flung the badly wounded man into the refrigerating plant.

"What are they going to do to us?" wailed Virginia.

"I led you into this," Joe Bronson was in despair. "We must get out before Hollis gets here."

The door opened and Hollis stood there, gun in hand.

"You've brought a hornets' nest about my ears!" he shouted to the girl. "And those that talk me pay the price."

"Spare her," begged old Bronson. "She'll never squawk."

"I'm not taking any chances." Hollis raised his gun and stepped nearer. His face was twisted with a fiendish leer.

Renfrew's Trick

SERGEANT RENFREW had found a part of the hotel that seemed cut off from the rest of the building. Things that went on here would not be heard by guests in the hotel. He forced a window and found himself in an empty gymnasium. A trapdoor revealed that there was a basement. Quietly he pulled up the trap and saw a floor about eight feet below him. He dropped down into a lighted passage. Hearing footsteps, he darted behind a pillar.

Nolan, driving a erring fellow before him, came into view. They vanished round a corner, and he heard the roar of a gun and a fall. He would have dashed out if Hollis had not appeared and burst into a room, leaving the door open.

Renfrew stepped closer and heard his threats. Hollis was about to shoot when a voice behind spoke curtly:

"Drop that gun!"

Hollis spun round. The Bronsons could hardly believe that in the very nick of time they had been saved.

"I can explain," Hollis bluffed to gain time.

"You'll do a lot of explaining later," retorted Renfrew. "I'm wise to your game; in fact, I've had my suspicions about you for some time."

"Look out!" Virginia suddenly screamed a warning.

Renfrew was just in time to fling himself sideways as a gun spat lead—Nolan had returned. The crook had followed Renfrew, but he got no chance of a second shot. The gun was wrenched from his hand and a fierce punch dropped him to the floor.

Hollis knew that he was cornered and that his only chance was to get Renfrew. No time to pick up the gun he had dropped. He rushed, and as the sergeant turned got in a fierce blow. Renfrew was hurled back against the wall and the gun clattered to the floor as his knuckles were bruised by the hard stone.

The two men fought fiercely all round the room.

"Let's get out of here and hide," Joe Bronson gripped his daughter's arm. "Maybe we can slip away."

May 7th, 1938.

Dazed and bewildered, the girl allowed her father to push her out of the room. Seeing the door of the refrigerating plant open they rushed inside, and Virginia screamed as she saw the body lying there.

Renfrew landed a punch that broke two of Hollis' teeth, and the man had had enough. He dived straight at a window and crashed through the glass. Renfrew picked up his gun and gave chase. As he scrambled up a banking he saw Hollis pelting for the house.

Nolan, who had been lying almost out on the floor, got dazedly to his feet. He was in time to see the Bronsons rush into the refrigerating plant. With a mad laugh he staggered forward and slammed the door and locked it.

Sergeant Renfrew made to follow his man when a gun spat and a bullet whined close. So Hollis had another gun.

From behind trees, in the half light, the two engaged in a firing duel. Naturally, the shooting out in the grounds had roused the whole lodge, and people were running about the corridors demanding to know what was happening. Their only answer was the roar of the guns outside. Some ventured to the windows and reported that they could see red stabs of flame.

Shot for shot the two men exchanged, and though bullets went close neither man was hurt. Renfrew darted from cover and got to another tree before Hollis could fire. Using some bushes the crook leader managed to get out of range. Renfrew then came after him, sparing his fire.

Renfrew worked his way to within twenty yards of Hollis, who was hiding behind a big tree.

"Come out!"

"You'll never get me!" taunted Hollis, and blazed a shot at Renfrew.

An almost maniacal expression of delight appeared on his flushed features as he saw Renfrew's gun misfire. The sergeant's gun-hand appeared round a tree, and again the weapon did not beheld lead. The chambers were empty. Now Hollis had the Mountie at his mercy.

Hollis fired once again, and when there came no response boldly stepped out of cover. Slowly and malevolently he walked towards Renfrew. The sergeant stepped out, with his gun lowered.

"And so, my friend, I settle your snoco for good!" chuckled Hollis. "It will give me great pleasure to kill you. Just one shot and all will be over."

Suddenly up came Renfrew's gun. There was a roar, and with a screech of agony Hollis dropped his gun—a bullet had smashed his wrist.

"An old trick, and you fell for it!" mocked the sergeant.

"You dirty double-crosser!" babbled the angry Hollis. "You tricked me."

"I not only had a second gun, but I also carry plenty of ammunition. Fancy you falling for that gag!" Renfrew produced handcuffs. "I think these bracelets will keep you from doing any further harm."

Renfrew snapped them over Hollis' wrists, and it gave him a certain amount of satisfaction when the man screamed with the pain. The sergeant glanced round as a huge car screeched to a stop and half a dozen Mounties, together with Lightning, piled out.

"What brings you boys here?"

"I read the message on that bank-note," cried Laidlaw. "It took me a long time before I got the drop of water fixed. Then I saw what Bronson had engraved on the note. We had had no message from you, so I talked it over with the boys, when they showed up, and we reckoned it best to come without orders."

"Good for you, Laidlaw," the sergeant answered. "Some of you boys surround this lodge, and one of you go inside and pacify the guests. Don't let any servants or officials try a walk-out. If you come across a rat named Nolan drill him on sight—he's a killer. Put Hollis in the car and watch him."

Renfrew darted back to the broken window. The place seemed strangely quiet. Was Nolan lurking somewhere? He jerked open the door, saw Nolan, and whipped back in time as the man fired. But the next shot came from Renfrew. The sergeant flashed back into the corridor before Nolan, who was still feeling the effect of the punch he had stopped, could act. Hollis' evil confederate staggered forward a few steps, the gun slid from his hands and he crashed in a heap.

Thump, thump, thump! What was that noise? It guided him to the refrigerating plant. He saw an old man beating feebly against the glass and choking horribly. The place seemed full of steam. Nolan had turned on the gas.

(Continued on page 27)

NEXT WEEK'S LONG COMPLETE FILM DRAMAS!

RONALD REAGAN

IN

"THE RADIO MURDER MYSTERY"

As a radio commentator Andy McClaine denounces the crooked politicians of Westville, whereupon one of them threatens to withdraw his sponsorship of an important programme—and Andy is transferred to the Kiddies' Hour. After the mysterious disappearance of a prominent business man, however, "Uncle Andy" stumbles upon a clue that leads thrillingly to the rounding-up of a gang of murderous crooks. An absorbing comedy drama.

"MERRILY WE LIVE"

A young man, quite famous, loved nothing better than to roam the countryside in the dirtiest of clothes and the oldest of cars. The car goes over a precipice, and while seeking aid a wealthy but eccentric lady persists in thinking him a tramp, with hilarious results. Starring Constance Bennett, Brian Aherne and Billie Burke.

Also

Another episode of the grand serial of jungle adventure:

"TIM TYLER'S LUCK"

Starring Frankie Thomas.

A brilliant, but hard-up footballer sells two complimentary tickets for a game and is fired from the College team. Mad because the College are making thousands of dollars at the stadium, he decides to clean up the football game. A thrilling yarn, starring Van Heflin and Marian Marsh

"SATURDAY'S HEROES"

The Game That Kills

IN the train coming back from the game against Raymond Technical, Val Webster, star quarterback for Calton University, wasn't feeling very pleased with himself.

He was worried. There wasn't the slightest doubt he was going off his game. Not only he himself, but others had noticed it, too. Red Watson, ace sports writer, had been castigating him in his column, and had recently been heard to say:

"That kid's been around a pigskin so long he's beginning to act like a ham!"

Val had lost the eager keenness with which, as a youngster, he had approached football at High school. His eyes had been opened lately. He saw clearly that he was caught up in a huge racket, under the guise of sport.

He and his fellow players received so-called "presents," while the colleges got big and profitable gates for these exciting games that attracted thousands—and they called it amateur football.

Val was heartily sick of the whole slightly unsavoury business. Owing to the attitude of the colleges, the game he loved was deteriorating into a colossal money-making business.

He was aroused from his black thoughts by the loud laughter of his team-mates, directed at that ruggid, but comical clown, Dubrowsky—a lion on the field, but a good-natured butt off it.

"Lay off, you guys," Dubrowsky complained. "I'm tired after the gaff we took from the doc!"

That set them off on a new tack. Doc Thomas, their trainer, criticised them on every opportunity, believing this line of action made them exert themselves all the more on the football field.

"Why, he was nice and gentle," said one. "Like a rubber in a turkish bath."

"Yeah, with brass knuckles," snarled Dubrowsky.

Burgeson, a tall, grinning lad, got up on a seat and, to the amusement of his pals, began parodying the trainer's exhortations.

"Never in my five years as coach have I seen such a demonstration of High school grand-standing! And here comes the worst offender, that one-man football team, Four Star Webster!"

Griming, Val pulled him down and took his place.

"Is that the best you can do? Watch an expert, boy," he cried amid laughter. "Why, you're not football players, you're a bunch of stage-struck ballet dancers! And Webster, if I want any advice from you, I'll ask for it! As long as I'm coach, I'll give the orders and you'll follow them!"

Everybody recalled his recent brush with the coach. The game against Raymond Technical had been won solely because Val used his own initiative and improved on the play ordered by the coach. They all turned guiltily at the sound of hearty clapping to find Doc Thomas, cigar in mouth.

"Always the actor!" he said sarcastically. "Well, maybe you'd like to know how your performance went over this afternoon. Here, see what Red Watson has to say about it!"

Handing the paper to Val, he swung away, leaving them to crowd round the quarter-back. One excitedly pointed out a headline as Val sought the sports page:

"Ted Calkins, Union College captain, dropped from team—accused of being a ringer!"

All knew what that meant. Ted Calkins had exceeded his time as an amateur, playing five years instead of four.

"He's a friend of yours, isn't he?" asked one of Val's team-mates.

"My best," said Val grimly. "We played in the same High school team."

"That washes him up—he should have known you can't get away with that!"

"Union College knew all about it when they sent for him," said Val angrily. "And when somebody else found out, they left him holding the bag!"

Furiously he handed the paper to young Birdwell, who read Watson's report.

"After all the build-up, Val Webster turned out to be just another fumble-artist. This boy is suffering from a severe case of cerebellum magnum." To the obtuse Dubrowsky, chewing his gum like a cow chewing the cud, he added: "Big head, to you!"

"That guy!" exclaimed Dubrowsky. "I'm surprised he's got the nerve to ride on the same train with us!"

"Which reminds me," said Burgeson to Val. "Didn't you promise somebody a sock on the jaw?"

He was referring to a recent angry scene between the hot-headed young footballer and the sardonic journalist.

Val believed the man's comments were unfair, and had angrily promised to knock his block off if he printed any more like them.

"Yeah!" he growled, and went in search of Red Watson. His pals scuttled after him; this was going to be too good to miss.

Red Watson, having a quiet card game with some cronies, was just rising, saying:

"Well, let's call it even. I think I'll go and lie down for a while."

"That's right!" snorted Val, coming into the car at that moment.

His fist plunked on Red Watson's jaw. The sports writer sagged and collapsed in the aisle.

"Wow! What a sock!" muttered Dubrowsky, goggling.

"Hey, Red," exclaimed Val, kneeling down beside the man he had knocked out. "Red!"

"Go 'way," muttered Red dreamily. "I like it down here!"

Feeling a bit better, Val went to the observation car at the rear of the train, and was there buttonholed by the somewhat sheepish Burgeson, who wanted a loan.

"Twenty-five bucks be enough?" asked Val.

"Thanks," grunted Burgeson. "I'll pay you back in a couple of weeks."

"You don't have to wait that long," said Val. "I'll take your complimentary tickets for next week's game, and we'll call it square."

Burgeson agreed to this, and rose to leave as a charming, fair-haired girl came on to the platform. Frances Thomas, the coach's daughter, was by way of being a mascot for the team. She was the only reason why Val put up with the grumpy coach.

"What's this I hear about your taking punches at the Press?" she demanded, sitting down beside him.

"I had to do it," Val growled uncomfortably.

"I suppose you have to scalp tickets, too," she said coldly, referring to the fact that Val would sell Burgeson's tickets before the game. "You know it's wrong!"

Although he knew the whole business was a racket anyway, he found it hard to justify himself to this girl. Chaps like himself weren't proper students; they were kept at the college mainly for their football prowess, trained to attract big gates, then flung aside like Ted Calkins. But he found it hard to put his point of view.

"Well, I've got to live," he said lamely.

"Is ticket scalping the only way?" she said quietly.

"No," flared Val. "This football racket is fair to everybody but the players! They dug me up at High school, promised me the world on a gold chain, and what do I get? Board and room and a lot of kicking around!"

"And me?" she said demurely.

His face cleared. He took her in his arms.

"That's right," he laughed. "And I got the best of the bargain, too!" He kissed her. Neither noticed the brakeman who had come on to the platform, and was grinning down at them. "Fran, you are the most adorable, delightful, delicious, cr—er—"

"D-lovely?" suggested the delighted brakeman, and, in confusion, they escaped into the car.

That night, when dining with his team-mates in their special quarters, Val Webster was called to the door, and in the hall found a visitor—Ted Calkins, haggard of face.

May 7th, 1933.

Val gripped his shoulders wonderingly.

"How are you, Ted?"

"I suppose you heard about my bad luck, Val?" said Calkins nervously.

"I did," Val nodded. "Tough, boy."

"I don't know where to turn," said Ted awkwardly. "I can't go home, with things the way they are."

"Stop worrying," Val urged. "What if you did play football five years instead of four? I bet your school knew about it all the time?"

"They did," said Ted grimly.

"Then why hold the bag?" exclaimed Val angrily. "Blow the whole thing wide open!"

"That would involve a dozen others," said Ted miserably. "I couldn't do it."

"The dirty hypocrites!" Val raged. "They'll let you take the rap for them every time. All they care about is big gates and publicity!"

They were interrupted by another caller for Val. Ted watched as Val sold him the tickets he had taken from Burgeson.

"Say, you're flirting with the legion of the lost yourself, selling those tickets!" he exclaimed when the man had gone.

"If I tried to live on the Athletic Board allowance I'd be too weak to lift a ball," shrugged Val. "Say, Ted, how are you fixed?"

"Well, I'm off the payroll," sighed the sacked football player. "I don't know where to go to look for a job. Nobody'll talk to me. You'd think I had leprosy!"

"Oh, well, don't worry," smiled Val. "I've got enough until you're set. Come and have some chow."

Ted hedged. He didn't feel like facing the other fellows. Val persuaded him to go and sit at the table.

But his fears were justified. As he sat there nervously, a player named Clemens began to make veiled remarks about ringers.

"Nix on the wisecracks!" said Val dangerously, glancing at Ted's white face.

"But I meant it," snapped Clemens. "If there's anything lower than a ringer—"

He said no more. In a blazing fury Val was on him, and sent him hurtling into a corner with a pile-driver to the jaw.

"Anybody else feel the same way?" he demanded, fighting down his rage.

Nobody did. The rest of the dinner passed off peacefully. But that night Val was awakened from his sleep and received new resolution to do something about this racket that had broken his friend.

Two detectives wanted to see him. They asked questions about Ted Calkins, and when Val wanted to know why, they told him tersely:

"Ted Calkins is dead. Suicide! Can you give us any reason why—"

"That wasn't suicide," roared Val to their amazement. "That was murder! When Ted was thrown off that team, the school was just as guilty as he was. He couldn't take it. He was a sensitive chap. You may call it suicide, but Calkins was murdered—by amateur football!"

Starting the Ball Rolling

NEXT day Val Webster left college football. It all happened with startling suddenness. Leaving a lecture on Cretan pottery with his classmates, he was stopped by the president, Dr. Hammond. With the head of the university was the coach, and Meggs, the man Val had sold the tickets to the previous night.

As soon as he saw Meggs he knew what was coming, knew that he had been trapped by a spy. Before his classmates, Val admitted he had sold the tickets to Meggs and speculated similarly on other occasions. The president was sorry, but there was no option but to ask for his resignation.

In a blazing temper, Val gave it. He couldn't but think it was Frances, standing wide-eyed nearby, who had told her father of his transaction with Burgeson.

"Don't be sorry, doctor—anything but sorry," he growled. "Let me congratulate you—you and your spies!"

Frances followed him as he strode from the room, and caught him up out on the campus.

"Val, you don't really believe I had anything to do with—"

"Oh, no!" he said mockingly.

"I know what's in your mind," she retorted. "But you've got to listen to me."

"Oh, I get it," snapped Val, staring at her. "You wanted to reform me. Well, that was a pretty cute trick, telling your old man about the tickets!"

In his anger he was not responsible for what he said; she realised that and tried to calm him.

"I didn't tell him anything. You can't lose your head like this, Val!"

"Oh, they had me floored for a minute," he said bitterly. "But I'll show them they're not going to do to me what they did to Calkins. I'll turn this campus upside down. And don't think I won't!"

He left her then, and went straight to Dr. Hammond.

"I'll come straight to the point, Dr. Hammond," he gritted. "I make sixteen dollars on a game, and the school makes a quarter of a million. We're both racketeers, only I'm doing it in a small way."

"Your attitude only confirms the wisdom of our decision," said the president coldly, but his eyes were uneasy.

