"All right, then," snapped Val. "Take a look at these cancelled cheques, with endorsements from every player for tickets they've sold to me. I'm taking these straight to Red Watson, of the 'Herald.'" He walked to the door, leaving Dr. Hammond gasping. "If you think I'm bluffing, look at to-morrow's paper. You can read, can't you?"

He left the president hastily picking up his phone.

Meanwhile, Frances was having a stormy interview with her father.

"You tricked him deliberately," she cried, "and he thinks I helped you!"

"Now, baby," he said soothingly.

"You don't understand these things. We all know that college football is leaky at the seams; but as long as we're part of it we've got to play the game."

"A game that makes one man carry all the blame!" she flashed.

"That's just it." He was off his guard. "Webster wanted to be the whole show."

"So that's the reason you fired him," she snapped bitterly. "You knew all along he was selling tickets."

"As long as a man behaves on the field," he sighed, "we've got to keep blinkers over our eyes."

She rounded on him.

"And now you're blinding yourself to everything this means to me!"

"Why," he said surprisedly, "I didn't realise he meant that much to you. I might try—"

The 'phone bell interrupted him. Dr.

Hammond was ringing in a very excited state.

"Thomas, we must reconsider the Webster matter—"

"Strange," grunted the coach, "I was just thinking the same thing."

"He's going to stir up a hornets' nest," stammered the president. "Yes, yes. We've got to head him off before he gets to Red Watson."

Coach Thomas promised to be right over. Abstractedly he told the eager Frances that Val was to be reinstated. Starry-eyed, she rushed out at once to tell Val the good news.

Val was in the drug store, whose soda-fountain was much patronised by the Calton students. Burgeson had buttonholed him, hoping he was going to say nothing about his part in the ticket affair. Otherwise Val, who had been one of the most popular fellows in the school, found himself more or less in Coventry.

"Oh, don't worry," he told Burgeson irritably. "I threatened to expose the whole outfit, but you know I'm not the type."

Dubrowsky, who served there as a waiter to earn a bit extra, called him at that moment to the 'phone booth. Val found Red Watson on the wire.

"I just heard about your dismissal, kid. It's tough!"

Val smiled. Red Watson was a decent scout. They were good friends, despite their quarrels, which he had to admit were due mostly to his own flaring temper.

"Yeah," he said casually. "Say, Red, I've been meaning to apologise for slugging you. Guess I flew off the handle."

"Forget it! Now, what's this trouble you're in? If they've given you a raw deal, I'll bust them wide open—" Red stopped suddenly. Val could hear noises in his office. "Hold on a minute!"

He had thoughtfully held the 'phone up, and Val, to his astonishment, heard the rich tones of Dr. Hammond.

"Greetings, Professor Hammond," Red was saying. "Hallo, coach! Have a seat?" Red was evidently enjoying himself. He spoke to Val next. "Now, let's see, where were we, Webster?"

"Mr. Watson," said Dr. Hammond hastily, "I think we can tell you more about this than he can!"

Red ignored him. To Val's surprise, the sports writer was talking as if replying to some long conversation.

"Him! Go on. Yeah! Who was to blame?"

"Say, have you gone crazy?" howled Val.

"Crazy?" said Red. "They are, if you have the evidence to prove it." Val heard him continuing, speaking to somebody on the staff, promising them a good story if they'd hold the space on the front page.

"I didn't say anything of the kind!" roared Val in desperation. "Don't you print that!"

"Don't worry, kid," said Red kindly. "I'll handle this just the way you want it."

Val realised he was putting on a bluff for the benefit of his anxiously listening visitors. Hammond broke in, unable to contain himself any longer.

"Just a minute, Mr. Watson. That young scoundrel is lying. He was dismissed because he's guilty. He's out, and out for good!"

Val, who had heard all this very clearly for the simple reason that Red thoughtfully held the 'phone up towards Hammond as he spoke, thought this a little hard, since he hadn't said a word. The young footballer's eyes blazed, and he clenched his fists angrily. "You wouldn't want your paper involved in a libel suit?" continued Dr. Hammond wheedlingly.

"I wouldn't think of printing this story—" said Red.

"Thank you," exclaimed the president, rising.

"—until I have checked it thoroughly," added Red brutally. When they had gone, he turned to the 'phone again. "Don't let it worry you, Val. I'm going to get to the bottom of this, and I want your help."

"Not now, Red," said Val quietly. "But I'll get in touch with you. So-long."

He went out into the store just in time to meet Frances. She was flushed, and, he realised with a pang, looking very beautiful. She drew him aside into a high-backed seat.

"All right, let's have it," he sighed. "Daddy and Professor Hammond have been looking all over for you," she whispered excitedly.

"Oh, I see," he grinned mirthlessly. "They're heading the posse."

A little hurt by his attitude, she told him what she had heard when the president 'phoned her father.

"What's the idea of lying, Frances?" he said coldly, for the talk in Red Watson's office was still very clear in his mind. "Only a minute ago I heard Hammond tell Red Watson that I was out for good."

"It—it must be a mistake," she frowned, aghast. "I don't understand!"

"I do!" he growled. "You can go back and tell your father that his little scene worked, that I'm clearing out!"

"Please!" Frances jumped up as he rose. "What are you going to do, Val?"

"You'll find out soon enough!" he rapped, and, leaving her, barged angrily through the swing doors.

He had no doubt now what he was going to do. He was going to start his campaign against the whole corrupt system of sham-amateur football. Calton's next game was to be with Weston College, a small place that hadn't won against the stars for over twelve years.

To Weston Val went, knowing the president, Dr. Mitchell, to be a fair-minded man, with the good of the game at heart. He interviewed Val with his football coach, whose name was Banks. "I'll admit that technically I was in the wrong," Val concluded, after telling his story. "But not nearly as wrong as the system that preaches amateur football and plays professional!"

Baker, finishing his marvellous run, scored a last-second touchdown.

They were slightly hostile at first, suggesting Val was only trying to use them to get even with Hammond.

"That's not true," he declared. "I came to you because you're one of the few college presidents who's been quoted as having an honest viewpoint on this business. Dr. Mitchell, you have a chance to remake college football!"

For a long time he talked, outlining his plan, until they began to be impressed by his earnestness. He proposed making the game honest for the school—and for the players—by cutting out the hypocrisy.

Pay the players openly, give them the education they came to college for, and not drop them like hot potatoes when their usefulness was over, he continued, citing the tragedy of Ted Calkins.

Though convinced, Dr. Mitchell and Banks were doubtful about being able to do anything, for Weston was small and carried no weight with the big colleges. Swiftly Val suggested that if Weston could beat Calton in the forthcoming game, the others would be forced to listen.

He offered to help with the coaching, and at last Dr. Mitchell capitulated. Val suggested he get in touch with Red Watson, who would vouch for him any day.

The sports writer was at Calton, interviewing Dr. Hammond, when Dr. Mitchell at last got him on the phone. Red was standing right beside Hammond when he spoke to the Weston president.

"Mr. Watson," said Mitchell, "Val Webster wants to enter Weston. What can you tell me about him?"

"He's one of the finest boys I've ever met," said Red enthusiastically, with a sidelong glance at Hammond beside him, who was just congratulating himself on having persuaded Red to drop the Webster matter. "You can believe anything he tells you."

"Your recommendation," remarked Mitchell, "doesn't agree with a letter I got from President Hammond."

"That hypocrite!" exclaimed Red, enjoying himself; and Hammond, looking up, wondered what he was grinning at. "I wouldn't believe him any day!"

Mitchell was satisfied, and that very day Val Webster went to work with the Weston team, intent on their beating Calton so that the whole racket of college football could be ventilated.

Mind Over Matter

WHEN the day of the great game came around, Val had succeeded, with Coach Banks' backing, in knocking some of his ideas into the Weston team.

He had had a hectic time. He had enlisted Red's support, and almost lost it through knocking the sports writer down again in a burst of anger on learning that it was through Red's antics with the phone that he had broken with Frances.

He had become partly reconciled with the girl in Watson's office; then they had parted again in anger when she learned that in spite of his talk about keeping his temper and turning over a new leaf, he had just punched Red on the jaw. It struck him as being very silly, for they had both confessed that they loved one another.

But Val was concentrating all his energies on training the team. He had studied the players while watching them practising with Coach Banks. One, a dandified fellow named Baker, whose smart new football outfit brought gibes from his pals, had interested Val particularly.

This lad's temper seemed as fiery as his own. He was liable to blow up if anybody came near to tearing his garb. Also Val had met a queer veteran hanging round the field, Andy Jones by name. He called himself assistant coach, was dressed always in football clothes of twenty years ago, with a little cap perched ridiculously on his round head.

Andy had a colossal moustache curved like a ram's horns; he claimed that nobody could hope to play football unless they wore such a face adornment, which had been affected by the giants of the past.

Val had been inclined to smile at the old man until one day, when a call had come for a new ball out on the field, Andy had picked one up and hurled it out in an amazing throw. Val just gaped, while Andy smirked and twirled his moustache.

The quarter-back who had taken on the task of helping Weston to win had been very thoughtful. It seemed that Weston could never succeed by sheer good playing; but the application of a little simple psychology, as suggested to him by the characters of such fellows as Baker, might win if the right tactics could be evolved.

This was what he confided in Red Watson. And to his joy, Red did his part. The gist of his reports was that Weston hadn't a chance against the Calton team. The idea was to make the champions over-confident, to make them believe the game would be a walk-over for them, which was, on the face of it, the truth.

Red had been told why Val was so anxious for Weston to win, and having the good of the game at heart, the journalist was only too pleased to be of assistance.

Val had had a lot of trouble, cajoling and bullying the players—especially with the hot-headed Baker, who was inclined to flare up too easily. But Val, who knew all about hot temper, had cunningly worked on the lad. He was pinning a lot of his hopes on the dandified, though husky, young player.

On the Weston benches at the edge of the field, before the game started, Val drew his players around him and talked to them. They all knew by now that more than just winning this particular game depended on them. The whole future of college football was in the balance. If they won, they could force a change in the whole system.

"It's never been heard of before," Val explained, "but we're going to do it. We're going to let Calton make the first touchdown without opposition."

"Let them score purposely?" gasped Banks.

"Exactly," Val nodded. "I know those boys, and after an easy touchdown, they'll get over-confident and start loafing."

The team was enthusiastic, and as they went out Val drew Baker aside, and grinned:

"Oh, Baker, if you get your trousers dirty we'll buy new ones!"

Laughing, Baker went out with his team-mates for the start of the fateful game. Un in the press-box, with Red Watson, Frances was feeling glum; the game didn't seem the same without Val down there on the touchline. But Red handed her a pair of binoculars and told her to look at the Weston benches, and she started joyfully when she saw Val sitting there.

Red, enjoying her wonderment, wouldn't explain a thing. He just told her to sit tight and watch, for the game wouldn't be over till the last whistle.

It went as Val anticipated. Calton scored an easy touchdown, and converted it skilfully, much to the amusement of the vast crowd.

In the privileged seats, President Hammond, sitting next to his rival, Mitchell, was crowing loudly. Already the Calton man knew what hung on the game; but he wasn't anxious. He believed this tin-pot little Weston team hadn't a chance. He grew a little anxious, though, when Red Watson came in answer to a message from Dr. Mitchell.

"Mr. Watson," said the scholarly-looking Weston president, "we need the co-operation of the Press."

"I think I know what you mean," said Red, glancing at Hammond. "And you can count on me."

"We want to take the smell out of amateur football," declared Dr. Mitchell. "Will you phrase that for me in college president style?"

"Two hundred and fifty-eight papers carry my column," grinned Red. "They'll all do you proud!"

"You know what happened to Ted Calkins," Mitchell went on, "to Val Webster, and many others?"

Hammond broke it anxiously.

"I'll appreciate it if you don't mention that Webster matter!"

"Very well, sir," said Red evenly, "I'll just take a rap at the whole system."

"This has all been thrashed out before," argued Dr. Hammond. "It's up to the Universities to handle it individually!"

"They've been doing that for years," snapped Mitchell. "Nothing ever came of it. It's time somebody took the lead, and that's what Weston is going to do!"

"You won't get a college in America to play you next year," stormed Hammond.

"When we beat you to-day," retorted Mitchell sweetly. "We'll be the big team. There'll be hundreds of teams anxious to play us on our own terms!"

Hammond expostulated further, but he couldn't move Dr. Mitchell and the sports writer from their purpose. However, he still felt confident his college would win.

The game was fairly even. With a magnificent push Weston had scored a touchdown but failed to convert it. The score stood at seven to six, in Calton's favour. On the Calton benches, Doc Thomas was raging, seeing all his own favourite attacks ordered by Val.

The crowd, which had come expecting to see a walkover, was in a ferment now. So were the Calton team, who expended a lot of energy in passing remarks about Baker's clothes, till that young man got redder and redder and wilder and wilder.

Val watched, tense, as the teams lined up for a new throw-in. The minutes were ticking past. He groaned as he saw slight disturbance out on the field. The crowd fell silent, then a great roar went up as Baker, red of face, began to run out of the pack. At that moment, the whistle blew. It was too late for Baker to leave the field and get on to the benches.

Peterson, the Weston captain, to

(Continued on page 27)

A wagon train is held up and all the members are killed with the exception of two small boys. Years later they are destined to meet under strange circumstances in this thrilling super-Western, starring Gilbert Roland and Charles Bickford

"THUNDER TRAIL"

The Attack on the Wagon Train

OLD John Ames, driving at the head of the wagon train through the mountains, sang lustily, reckoning that he had every right to do so. For he and the little band of men with him had cleaned up a fortune in the Californian gold fields after long and weary struggles, and they were now on their way to their homes in Missouri, where they could sit back at last and enjoy the fruits of their labours.

So old John Ames, as he drove the wagon, sang for very content. Somewhere about forty thousand dollars was to be his share of his years of hard work.

A fresh, young boyish voice came from behind him in the wagon.

"Aw, dad, can't you quit singin' for a couple of miles? I'm all wore out listenin' to you."

The old man threw a glance over his shoulder, grinned as he did so. He saw his two boys there, Dick, aged fourteen, already half-way to sturdy manhood, Bob, aged eight. Both of them were chips off the old block, he told himself, and he was as proud of them as a man could be.

"Son," he retorted, "you're just like your ma was—no car for music. How's that cut of Bob's comin' along?"

Dick, busily engaged in washing a nasty wound on his younger brother's shoulder, grinned as he replied:

"Good as new, or nearly. I reckon it will teach Bob not to try and ride any more wild burros. That donkey sure put his brand on him when he kicked him."

"Brand?" queried the old man. "What does it read?"

"Looks more like an 'A' than anything else."

"Well, ain't our name Ames? What's the matter with that?"

"Where are we campin' to-night, dad?" asked the boy as he came to the end of his first-aid.

"There's water up yonder," replied the old man, pointing ahead. "Pine Lake, they call it. I reckon we'll make camp there."

"Gee, I'm hungry."

"Better take your gun," replied his father, "and see if you can get us some fresh meat for supper."

"All right."

He moved down to the end of the wagon where his horse was tied, and in a few minutes had the rope unfastened, was on the horse's back and away in search of game. Though one of the men shouted a parting warning to him as he rode off.

"Keep your eyes peeled for Indians, lad."

Dick waved a reassuring hand.

"Don't worry. I'll protect you," he retorted.

Resuming his singing, John Ames shook up the horses. He had no idea that for the last few miles of their journey they had been closely watched. Any more than he was aware of the fact that almost at that moment a rough-looking man on the mountainside who had been watching their progress through the valley was now setting spurs to his horse.

A few moments' hard riding brought the man to a camp beneath the trees where a dozen men were seated. The rider threw himself from his horse.

"Where's Tate?" he demanded.

"Over there, Jeff," answered one of the men pointing to where a short, thick-set man with a rather truculent jaw and a small bristling moustache sat on a rock sewing a saddle.

The man called Jeff addressed him laconically.

"Ames' wagons is comin' down through the valley," he said. "He's bringing a packet of gold back from California to Missouri."

The other nodded thoughtfully.

"They said he struck lucky."

"He sure did. Looks to me they're headin' for Pine Lake for water. Do we drop in on 'em?"

A slow smile came to the other's face, though it was certainly not a nice smile.

"I'll say we do," he answered. "Mighty foolish for anyone to roam round these parts with a packet of gold. Saddle up quick, boys."

In a minute the men around him were on their feet, examining their guns, saddling their horses. From the expressions on their faces it was easy to see that they meant business. But it was equally easy to see that it was evil business.

It certainly was evil business. The attack was swift and sudden, as the bandits meant it to be. There was gold to be had and they intended to have it. So, one minute Ames and his little band, utterly unsuspecting of the danger that was stalking them, were peacefully preparing their evening meal, and the next death was encircling them, swift, sharp death, and their men falling right and left from the bullets of an unseen enemy who had crept up among the rocks on the surrounding hills. Though, as the bandits came riding down, they—the besieged—knew at least that it was no Indians who attacked them.

Ames' first concern was for his younger son, whom he bundled hastily inside the wagon and covered with a tarpaulin.

"Keep you down, son—don't you dare to move!" he exclaimed sternly.

He crawled down beneath the wagon with another of his men, fierce fury in his heart. Bullets were rattling all round him, and already he knew that four of his men had been laid low and perhaps had been killed. He found himself as he kept on firing wondering vaguely where his elder son was. He wished that he could warn him. The shots would probably attract his attention, he told himself, and he would ride up in a moment to see what was happening. His heart went down as he thought what a ready mark he would make.

He heard a groan at his side, turned to see that his companion had dropped his gun and had rolled over—was lying motionless. With a muttered oath he snapped the trigger as two of the outlaws swept past not thirty yards away, firing as they went. A grim chuckle slid from his lips as he saw one of them sag and crash to the ground.

"That squares—" he exclaimed, but the next moment something crashed into his forehead and everything slipped away.

Lee Tate and his lieutenant, Jeff Graves, stood looking down on the dead body of John Ames and the other dead bodies that lay all around them.

"Well, that's that," said Tate laconically. "Let's hope it's worth it."

Two of his men who had been rummaging in the wagon came staggering along, bearing a heavy chest between them. Tate's eyes lighted up as he saw it.

"That looks good," he remarked. "It's locked."

But a couple of shots from Lee Tate's revolver finished with the lock, and when he lifted the lid of the box and saw the gold which filled it he smiled.

"Reckon this little trip's worth while," he said. "Get busy, boys."

While the outlaws were loading their saddle-bags with the gold Jeff spoke.

"Don't you think we might let the folks blame it on the Indians, same as last time?" he suggested.

"Sure thing," replied Tate. "Get going."

They did, and very quickly. And in a few moments all of the wagons were ablaze and burning fiercely. But Jeff, who was standing close to the wagon where the gold had been found, suddenly happened to see a movement inside, and in a second his gun came out.

But a grin spread over his face as he pulled back the tarpaulin to disclose Bob; though the grin changed to a snarl, for Bob, as Jeff tried to haul him out, buried his teeth in the outlaw's thumb.

His arm went up savagely. His gun was in his hand, and that moment might have been the boy's last had not Tate, who was standing near, caught his arm.

"Easy up, Jeff," he exclaimed.

"What for? The darned little coyote

Bob, however, had slipped to the ground and was rushing away. But both of the men were after him in a flash, though it was Tate who caught him.

"Lemme go—lemme go!" screamed the boy as he struggled and fought.

"Let you go?" snarled Jeff. "Look at that thumb of mine!"

Tate was grinning. Killing men was one thing, but some queer streak in him was making him feel almost sorry for this boy.

"Aw now, son," he queried, "what you want to do that for?"

May 7th, 1933.

"Lemme go—lemme go!" sobbed the boy. "I hate you!"

Tate was holding him, an amused smile on his face despite the fact that the boy was pommeling him with his small fists.

"Brave little cuss, ain't he?" he queried. "Not even scared of us." He addressed the boy, winking at Jeff.

"Why, son, what d'you want to hate us for? It was Jeff and me what drove the Indians off. Lucky for you we did or they'd have killed you."

He turned to Jeff.

"Take him back to the camp," he said.

"I'll take him, you bet," replied Jeff savagely.

A scowl came to Tate's face.

"And if you frighten him I'll feed you to the buzzards, and don't forget it!" he snapped.

Jeff stared at him in sheer amazement.

"Why, you don't mean to tell me—"

he began, but Tate cut him short.

"Shut up!" he exclaimed.

Jeff glared at him truculently.

"If you think I'm goin' to be a nursemaid to this yere kid—" he began, but the other's hand went to his gun.

"You do as I tell you," he rapped out. "Now get goin'."

But his hand still held his gun as he watched the other lead the now quietened boy away. From the expression on his face he had every intention of being obeyed.

He waited around after his men had gone, watching to see that the destruction of the wagons was complete. But as he heard the sound of a horse's hoofs he looked up quickly and his hand went to his gun.

But it came away, and he merely stood his ground, a smile on his lips.

Dick, for it was he, flung himself from his horse and strode up to Tate. His gun was in his hand and fury was in his young face. So David may have approached Goliath.

"What are you burning our wagons for? What have you done to my father?" he demanded.

Tate, smiling indulgently, merely shook his head. He could admire pluck when he saw it, and this handsome lad was already appealing to him.

"Wasn't me, son. I've only just ridden up. I should say it was the Indians."

Dick's eyes bored him fiercely.

"It was nothing of the kind. I saw you—I saw what you did."

Tate's eyes narrowed. He knew that if Dick had seen things he would be dangerous. But he tried once more.

"Now, look here, son—" he began in a conciliatory tone, but the other whirled in on him.

"Don't you lie to me! It was you and I saw it! You've killed my dad and you've killed my brother, and I'll

His gun came up in a flash, but Tate was quicker. In a second his arm had shot out catching Dick on the point of the jaw, and the lad staggered and crashed to the ground, striking his head as he did so against a heavy barrel.

Tate, with a scowl on his face, drew his revolver, though even as he aimed it he hesitated. Stooping down, he put his ear to the boy's heart. Then with a shrug of his shoulders he replaced his gun in its holster and walked slowly to his tethered horse.

Astride it he turned. The wagons were still blazing fiercely. And Dick Ames still lay stretched out on the ground with all the dreadful limpness of death.

In a quiet little valley with the trees all round him, his burro grazing quietly by his side and a fire blazing merrily before him, a man sat cooking his dinner and reading aloud from a well-thumbed little book.

He was a pleasant man to look at, obviously a Mexican, and he had a round cheerful face, a monstache which he kept constantly twirling, bright eyes, and a mouth that was always smiling.

He looked up from his book suddenly as the burro lifted its head and pricked up its ears.

"What's the matter, Fernando? You hear something?" he asked.

Evidently Fernando did. His ears remained erect. His eyes were staring at the bushes that lay ahead.

His master, too, was listening, and now he spoke again.

"I think you are right, my Fernando," he said. "We have a guest arriving."

He rose to his feet. But now there was a worried look on his face for the young man whom he saw approaching was looking far too weary and far too grave for a young man of his age.

But the Mexican hailed him with a smile.

"Buenos noces, señor. Please excuse my simple house. Maybe you will join me in my simple meal?"

As Dick threw himself on the ground without a word, the other took a plate and began to put food upon it. But though he continued to talk gaily his quick eyes had seen all sorts of things.

"You are young, if I may say so, señor," he said gently, "to be wandering all alone about a rough country like this. And you look very weary. But perhaps you have got the companion close by, is it not so?"

"No."

It was not a churlish "no"—it was not a "no" that suggested that Dick resented the question. It was just the negative of a young man who has lost all hope. And the Mexican looked sympathetic.

"No? You are all alone? Well, that's funny. Ain't you afraid your mother and father will worry?"

Dick's answer came slowly, miserably. "They killed my dad—they killed everybody."

"Oh, that's bad—very bad."

"He says it was the Indians," went on the boy between his clenched teeth, "but I know it wasn't."

He went on.

"He knocked me down—my head hit a barrel. I guess he thought I was dead and that's why he left me. I lay still a long time—everything was burned. And my dad—my little brother—I've got nobody now."

His head went down and sobs shook his body. The Mexican's arm went round him kindly.

"Please don't, chiquito," he said. "Sometimes the life is very cruel, and sometimes it is pretty good, too. I am what they call a prospector. I look for the gold over these mountains. One day I shall find it and get plenty rich. But there's one trouble. I need someone to help me. I have never been able to find nobody because I am very particular."

While he had been talking Dick had grown more composed, and the Mexican went on:

"Now, how would you like to be partners with old Lopez, the explorer? You are the first one I ever ask. And then maybe some day I can be your Mexicano papa, eh? Let me try, little fellow. I will try so hard."

But as Dick gripped his hand he knew what his answer was.

After Fifteen Years

THE scene was in a mine in the mountains with all the machinery and the noise and bustle incidental to a mine. A couple of wagons stood close to the rough track that led out to the road, and men were busy loading ore into them. From a shack nearby an elderly man emerged with a girl by his side—a pretty girl, too.

But both stopped as two horsemen came riding up the track towards them. An annoyed frown had come to the girl's face.

"Howdy, folks?" sung out the elder of the two riders.

"Howdy, Tate?"

"I hear you're earing a shipment across the hills, Morgan."

"Looks like it, don't it?"

Tate frowned. He was the big man in the town nearby, and was accustomed to get his own way in everything. Ever since the day when he and his men had wiped out John Ames' wagon train Lee Tate had forged steadily ahead.

But Jim Morgan had always been an obstacle from the start. And he was one now.

Yet he spoke quite smoothly, disguising the angry thoughts that were in him.

"I was kinda hoping you'd have decided to take me up, Morgan," he replied. "I made you a good offer for your mine, you know."

"Why?" demanded the other uncompromisingly.

"You know why. It touches my land, and I like room. Of course, it isn't none of my business, but earing ore over them mountains thirty miles ain't no joke."

"You're right, it isn't," put in the girl coldly. "But it wouldn't have been necessary if you had kept your promise, Mr. Tate. When you built your mill you said you'd handle our ore."

He knew it, too. He had only lately refused to do it because he fancied his refusal would make Morgan sell. And he coveted their mine. But he answered with an apologetic shrug of the shoulders.

"I've got my own ore to handle, Miss Amy. It ain't my fault if I'm too busy to handle yours."

Her lips curled slightly.

"A good excuse to make dad sell out, isn't it?"

"Aw, come now, Miss Amy, there ain't no need to get personal about it. I just can't handle your father's ore, that's all."

He turned to Morgan.

"I've made you a good offer, Morgan," he said. "You know what that low-grade stuff of yours runs."

"I do," answered the other quietly. "but it will run higher as we go deeper. You think you're a one-man town, Tate, but you just ain't one man enough. I ain't selling my mine to you or anyone."

He turned to his foreman who stood close by.

"Let's get goin'," he said.

As Tate and Jeff

rode away together Tate was scowling heavily. Then he laughed contemptuously.

"I guess I did the best I could," he said.

"Sure," answered the other cheerfully. "Nobody can't say you didn't try to stay peaceful."

"Better get going," said the other as they gazed at the dust of Morgan's two wagons which had just driven out of the yard.

"Right," replied Jeff as he put spurs to his horse.

Morgan and his man meanwhile drove their wagons steadily along, but Morgan was thinking deeply. He knew quite well that his final words had made a deadly enemy of Tate, but he wasn't worrying greatly about that. That Tate would make another move ore very long he was firmly convinced. Equally certain was he that it would be an underhand one, and at the moment he was racking his brains to think what it would be.

And then all of a sudden a shot rang out, and his startled horses leaped forward, tearing down the road, and he found himself tugging at the reins in his desperate efforts to check their fierce progress. Though the one quick glance he had made over his shoulder when the shot rang out, followed by several more which sang past his ears, had shown him that whereas he had escaped, his man following him had been shot and had pitched out into the road.

"Tate's men for a thousand," he muttered between his clenched teeth as he strained and pulled at his horses, vainly endeavouring to regain control of them. "And they've got Bill. But they've missed me, though, unless I can check these perishers—"

He knew he was in desperate straits now. He was nearing a long stretch of road among the mountains that wound and twisted badly. Here and there he knew were deep ravines at the side of the road. Unless he could stay the mad progress of his horses, death, and a horrible one, might be his, too. And then suddenly something from below seemed to hit him—actually it was a big bump in the road—and the next moment he was on his back in the wagon clutching madly at the sides to save himself from falling off. And it was at that moment that out of the corner of his eye he saw a rider spurring down the side of the hill that lay on his left.

What followed then was almost in the nature of a dream wherein he lay watching, too worn out and bruised to move, and wondering vaguely who his rescuer could be, and whether he would succeed or fail. For the wagon was rushing through a narrow gorge swaying from side to side, and Morgan knew that at the end of it was a sharp turning with a drop on one side of over a hundred feet. Would his rescuer reach him in time?

He tried to struggle to his hands and knees, sank down unable to do it. They were getting nearer and nearer to the end of the gorge, Morgan could see the bend of the road coming. But his rescuer was just behind, and was gaining every minute. On went the wagon at a break-neck speed. Thirty yards ahead where the road bent sharply Morgan could see the edge of the road, the valley below.

Twenty yards, ten yards, with still that horse and rider thundering behind! Morgan closed his eyes, but even as he did so he felt a strong hand reach down, lift him up—knew that he had been saved.

And then everything faded away into nothingness.

Arizona Takes a Hand

DOWN in the mining town a young man got off the stage coach as it pulled up at the saloon, and with a smile on his lips strode into the building and straight up to the bartender.

Bob examined the watch that Dick held out to him.

"Hallo, Jack!" he exclaimed.

He was a tall, good-looking, well-set-up youngster, and except for his name there was nothing now to identify him with the little boy who had fought and sobbed and struggled so strenuously with Lee Tate and Jeff Graves fifteen years earlier among the blazing wagons of his dead father's train.

The bartender put out an eager hand, and a smile irradiated his face.

"Am I looking right at a mining engineer, or am I wrong?" he exclaimed.

"Well, I've got my diploma here to prove it," laughed the young man. "Hallo, dad!"

As Lee Tate entered Bob went quickly across to him and gripped him by the hand. For Tate from the start had seen to it that his tale of the Indians, by repeated telling, had made an impression. And because he had taken a real fancy to the boy and had determined to adopt him he had soon won him over by kindness and generosity.

So by now the memory of what had taken place fifteen years before was only just a memory—nothing more. Bob Tate, as he was called, knew nothing of the dark side of his adopted father's character. All he knew was a man who had brought him up, who had taught him to call him father, who had lavished money over him and had now brought him back from college so that he could make him a partner in his business.

Little wonder that he was as glad to see Lee Tate as the latter was to see him.

Said his adopted father:

"You grewed just about a foot in the last year, my lad. If you get any bigger the girls will be staking claims on you."

The young man laughed.

"I've seen lots of 'em," he replied, "but they none of 'em look as good as Amy to me. How is she?"

A worried frown touched Tate's forehead.

"She's pretty good," he answered carelessly.

"How's that mine of theirs?"

"Not too good. I've just been advising Morgan to sell."

Jeff entered the saloon at that moment and came straight across to Tate; but as he caught sight of Bob he put out his hand with a grin.

"Well, if it ain't Bob—grewed to be man's size. Want to see you, boss"—addressing Tate.

"I'll leave you to it," said the boy. "See you later, dad."

As he went out their eyes followed him.

"He's sure coming along," said Jeff.

"He is. What's on your mind?"

Jeff took the drink that the bartender had poured out.

"Morgan should never have tried to take that ore over the hill," he said carelessly. "An accident caught up with him and all the ore fell over the hill."

The ghost of a smile flickered round the other man's lips.

"Anybody get hurt?" he asked.

"I think Morgan's driver got killed."

"And Morgan?"

Jeff grinned evilly.

"The last I saw of the poor old gentleman was as he disappeared round a turn in the mountains. His broncs had bolted and didn't look like stoppin'. There's some dangerous bits along that road. Hope nothing didn't happen to him."

Once more that ghost of a smile came to Tate's lips.

May 7th, 1938.

"Guess I'll walk round this evening and see if he's all right," he said.

"Don't want to butt in," exclaimed Jeff, "but it seems to me you're takin' a lot of trouble over that old mine."

Tate smiled slowly.

"Come into my office, Jeff, and I'll show you something," he said.

Jeff with outstretched hand let Tate pour the gold dust into it—whistled as he did so.

"Gee, that's mighty pretty!" he ejaculated. "Where did you get it?"

"Morgan's mine. I went there one night and cut out some samples. Run 'em through the mill and this is the result. Fifteen hundred dollars to the ton."

"We've got to get her!"

"That's what I aim to do."

"Morgan know anything about this?"

"Not a thing."

While this was going on Morgan was sitting propped up in bed at his house and Arizona was sitting by his side. For that young man and Lopez had brought him there after rescuing him. And Morgan, whose injuries were no more serious than a couple of broken ribs, had been relating the story of his mine and Tate's efforts to secure it.

"You may be better off than you think, if you do sell it, Mr. Morgan," said the young man. "Mr. Lopez, my adopted father has been discovering gold mines for years, but there's never been anything in them."

Lopez entered the room at that moment. He was a little older and a little greyer, but he still had the same smile.

"The senor is better?" he inquired courteously. "Is there nothing else we can do for you?"

"Nothing one can do for busted ribs," answered Morgan with a rueful smile, "except to let 'em set. But I owe my life to you both, and I shall never forget it."

They left him, and were saying goodbye to his daughter in the next room when Lee Tate came in.

"Evenin', Miss Amy. Heard your pa got hurt this afternoon, so came over to see him."

Had he been looking at Arizona he would have seen the instant recognition that leaped into the young man's eyes; and he would have seen the quick clenching of his hands. But he was busy with the girl, and when she introduced them Arizona merely bowed, despite the fury that was in him.

As Tate passed into the invalid's room he stood with his breath coming fast. For he knew Tate in a flash as the man who fifteen years before had killed his father and brother and the others. Through the window he could see Lopez outside with their horses, but now he wanted to stay. For in a second it had flashed in on him that this man Tate was not only a murderer, he was a swindler as well, and he was trying to swindle Morgan out of his mine.

Hearing his name suddenly spoken he turned, trying to control himself. He saw a tall, good-looking young man—heard Amy Morgan telling him that this was Mr. Tate junior.

Then he heard the girl rattling on, and sensed that she and this young man were something more to each other than just friends.

"Bob's just back from mining college, Mr. Lopez. He's been away for over a year."

"I'd better be getting along," Arizona managed to get out. He wanted to be alone now, to form some plan of campaign.

"No, don't you hurry—stay awhile," rejoined the other. "Amy and I have quite a lot to talk about."

They went out, leaving him alone. Through the open door that led to the next room he could hear Morgan's voice—a rather bitter voice, too.

"I guess you know without my telling you, Tate, that I've got to let the mine go."

He heard Tate's answer—smooth, silky.

"Well, I'm still ready to buy it. In fact, I'm willing to offer you a slightly better price for it now."

"Why?"

Arizona had heard the note of suspicion in Morgan's voice, but now he heard a kindly note in Tate's when he replied.

"My dear man, I'm sorry for you; and I ain't going to take advantage of a man who had his ore train stamped by a bunch of drunken fools."

"I reckon they was obeyin' orders," came Morgan's answer.

"That's a pretty big idea. Whose orders?"

Morgan's answer came dully. "I'm ready to sign," he said.

Arizona walked into the room just as Tate picked up the newly signed paper. But without a second's hesitation he plucked the paper from Tate's hand. And he addressed Morgan while Tate gasped with sheer fury.

"Mr. Morgan," he said, "you want someone to run your mine until you're right? My father and I are going to do it for you."

He turned to Tate without even waiting for a reply.

"We've changed our minds," he said and tore the paper into little pieces.

Tate, almost foaming at the mouth, found his voice at last.

"You've changed your mind?" he stormed. "Who are you and what's this got to do with you?"

Arizona's eyes bored him steadily. "I'm making this thing my business," was his rejoinder.

Tate swung back to Morgan, almost beside himself with rage.

"D'you mean to tell me you're letting this chap run your affairs for you, Morgan?" he demanded.

Morgan smiled. He had watched the scene with inward admiration. He was pretty certain that something lay behind all this.

"I think I am," he answered.

Tate's eyes narrowed as he glared at Arizona. He had lost, but he was telling himself that a day of reckoning would come.

"You're goin' to find, young fellow, that it don't pay to interfere with my affairs," he snarled as he flung out of the room.

The Two Brothers

IT was night-time a few days later, but a lot had happened during those few days. Morgan, acting on the advice of Lopez and Arizona, had cut the water supply to Tate's stamp mill, and Tate was breathing out threatenings and slaughter, openly stating that he would wipe them all out.

And now Arizona had slipped up quietly to Tate's office under cover of night. For he was determined to go through Tate's private papers in the hope of finding some definite proof that it was Tate who had killed his father.

He gained entry with the aid of a crowbar, and he was soon noiselessly rifling Tate's safe, which he smashed

(Continued on page 25.)

Death in many forms skulked amid the fastness of the African jungle, but no creature of the wilds was more ruthless a killer than the man known as Spider Webb, and it was against this man and his cut-throat gang that an intrepid youth and a beautiful girl pitted themselves. A serial drama of high adventure, starring Frankie Thomas

Read This First

The African river-boat Congo Queen, bound for Ambesi, is carrying a cargo of arms and ammunition destined for the Ivory Patrol, who police the hinterland of Panganyika. But that cargo never reaches Ambesi, for the ship is seized by a gang of cut-throats in the pay of Spider Webb, a notorious criminal.

Two people escape the massacre which attends the seizure of the craft. One is Tim Tyler, journeying up-country in the hope of tracing his scientist father, Professor Tyler, who has disappeared. The other is a girl who calls herself Lora Lacey, but whose real name is Graham, and who is out to bring Spider Webb to justice, knowing him to be the perpetrator of a diamond robbery for which her brother is unjustly serving a sentence.

Later, from the thickets to which they have taken, Lora and Tim see the crooks transfer the Congo Queen's cargo to a strange armoured car which the boy recognises as a "jungle cruiser" designed by his father.

Tim and Lora fall in with Sergeant Gates, of the Ivory Patrol, who escorts them to Ambesi. Later Gates and a detachment head north to investigate an attack on a white hunter named Conway, and, knowing that his father had been closely associated with Conway, Tim follows the troopers.

He meets a safari of natives led by Spencer, another hunter, and is talking to the latter when a shower of rocks are hurled at them by a group of savage apes. Spencer is knocked over a cliff, but clings to a shrub, and, while trying to rescue him, Tim and one of the natives are also sent headlong.

Now Read On.

The Jungle Cruiser Again

LINKED by the rope with which they had hoped to rescue Spencer, Tim and the negro plunged through space, and in a moment Tim was crashing into that same shrub which the hunter had managed to grasp.

As Spencer had done before him, Tim clutched desperately at the twigs and foliage of the tough bush and succeeded in arresting his fall, but as the thick clump of vegetation swayed wildly to the sudden wrench which it sustained, the man who was already clinging to it lost his precarious hold.

Down went Spencer, dropping like a plummet to the bed of the defile. Then, immediately afterwards, the body of the native who had aided Tim in the ill-fated attempt to reach the hunter, streaked past the shrub which the white boy had seized.

He thudded to earth fifty feet below Tim, and, rolling over and over, came to rest within a few paces of the spot where Spencer had landed. As for Tim, he hung on to the bush that had saved him from sharing the negro's fate, and, while he hung there, great stones flung by the gorillas away up near the summit of the cliff continued to pound the terrace-like track on which the safari had been gathered when the apes had first appeared above them.

Some of those rocks pitched off the ledge and tumbled into the defile, missing Tim by inches in their flight, and hitting the bed of the ravine close to the prone forms of Spencer and the native bearer. Presently, however, the rain of missiles ceased, and in the uncanny silence that ensued Tim contrived to detach the rope that was bound around his waist and make it fast to the shrub to which he was clinging.

By means of that rope he was able to lower himself to the base of the cliff, and as he touched ground he saw that the loose coils of the hempen line were still gripped tightly in the hands of the negro who had fallen from aloft. Yet the poor fellow had met his end, and it was in the grip of death that his fingers were locked. One glance at him sufficed to show that his neck had been broken.

Spencer had been luckier. Whereas the native had experienced a dead drop of a hundred feet and had landed head-foremost, the white hunter had fallen rather less than half that distance when he had ultimately lost his hold on the thick bush, and he had come to earth on his back. Moreover, he had alighted in a patch of stunted but dense scrub that was as springy as a mattress.

He was badly shaken nevertheless, and his right arm was still paralysed from the shoulder downwards as a result of the blow he had received when he had been knocked from the cliff-edge up above, and although he was conscious he seemed incapable of collecting his wits or uttering any sound when Tim stumbled over to him and knelt beside him. At any rate, he made no answer when the youngster anxiously questioned him regarding his injuries, and only stared at the boy dully.

EPISODE 3—

"Into the Lion's Den"

A small stream meandered through the defile, and after a moment Tim hurried over to it and filled his helmet with water. Then he returned to the prostrate hunter, who seemed to recover to some extent when a refreshing draught of the cool liquid had passed his lips.

"By gad!" Spencer whispered then. "This is—the first time—I've ever used Dead Man's Pass—and it'll be—the last. I wish I'd believed—the stories I'd heard about it—"

He stopped short, for at that moment a sound which was strangely out of keeping with the wilds of Tanganyika became audible to him. It was the sound of an internal combustion engine, and as he raised himself on one elbow he saw to his amazement that an armoured car was approaching the defile from the south.

His first impulse on perceiving that machine was to make an effort to struggle to his feet, but Tim Tyler had seen the vehicle as well, and suddenly the boy thrust the hunter down and flattened himself in the scrub alongside him. For he had recognised that armoured car as the "jungle cruiser" which had been designed by his father and which had somehow come into the possession of Spider Webb and his out-throat gang.

"Lie still, Mr. Spencer!" Tim jerked. "Keep under cover! The men in that contraption aren't to be trusted!"

He went on to tell the hunter what he knew of those men, and while he was describing their character the jungle cruiser halted at the mouth of the pass. Then out of it stepped Webb, Garry Drake and their associates, and a few seconds later the rogues were climbing that track on which Spencer's safari had been assailed.

The natives of that safari who had sought cover from the rocks aimed by the gorillas, were still cowering under the projecting bulge in the cliff-face, whither they had found shelter from the missiles of their bestial foes. Even though the apes had now vanished from the upper ledge, the blacks shrank from the thought of quitting their haven, and they had not stirred from there when Spider Webb and his gang reached the point where the attack had occurred.

A volley from the guns of Webb and his men dispersed the negroes, however, and sent them scurrying along the terrace-like trail. It was a volley which echoed and re-echoed through the defile, and, down on the bed of the ravine, Tim Tyler looked at Spencer significantly as he heard it.

Neither he nor the hunter could see what was happening up above on that trail from which the two of them had fallen, but if they had been able to command a view of the track they would have realised soon enough that Webb and his gang must have witnessed the plight of the Spencer safari from afar, and had made for Dead Man's Pass with the sole intention of securing any loot on which they could lay hands.

And there was loot in plenty for the outlaws. The equipment belonging to the safari was alone of considerable value, and there was a large quantity of ivory tusks as well—tusks accumulated by Spencer and his employees during a long sojourn in the northern wilds.

Equipment, stores, tusks—all had been abandoned by the bearers who had been so summarily dispersed, and Spider Webb and his minions lost no time in gathering up the spoils.

Unlike the safari, the crooks were not molested by the great apes who had lined the upper terrace a short time before. These did not reappear—perhaps keeping out of sight because of the shooting—and it was without incident that Webb and his party at length retraced their steps along the ledge-like track and descended to the jungle cruiser.

Only when the gangsters had regained the mouth of the defile did Tim and Spencer see them again, and something like an oath broke from the hunter's lips when he observed that the ruffians were heavily-laden with his possessions. Then, gritting his teeth, he watched them pile their plunder into the armoured car.

In the meanwhile, Tim was wondering whether the crooks were aware that he and Spencer were in the scrub, and intended to deal with them when they had stowed their loot aboard the "cruiser." But he was not destined to learn if that were the case, for all at once a band of horsemen hove into view some distance to the south of the defile, and at sight of them Webb and his accomplices made haste to scramble into the armoured car.

The oncoming horsemen wore the uniforms of the Ivory Patrol. They were the troopers commanded by Sergeant Gates, and with the non-com. at their head they charged towards the jungle cruiser.

The ponderous vehicle was soon on the move, however, and at a pace equal to that of a galloping pony it rolled into the defile and clattered past the patch of scrub in which Tim and Spencer were lying.

Shortly afterwards Gates and his detail swept by the covert that Tim and the hunter were sharing. Yet as on a previous occasion their pursuit of the armoured car was in vain, for, although the gorge seemed to be blocked at its northern end by a precipitous rock-face, there was a narrow "cut" leading off to the left and opening on to an extensive valley, and within a few seconds of the jungle cruiser negotiating this gap a shattering explosion brought about a cave-in that effectively stemmed the onrush of the troopers.

It was an explosion caused by the bursting of a grenade hurled from the armoured car, and the landslide that occurred as a result of it choked the fissure through which the vehicle had rumbled. As for Gates and his men, they were luckily short of the gap when the collapse took place, and, though baffled in their pursuit of the Webb gang, they might well have thanked their stars that they were not lying mangled under hundreds of tons of debris.

The troopers had no choice now but to turn in their tracks, and it was as they were coming back through the defile that Tim stood up and showed himself, noting as he did so the look of surprise that dawned on the face of Sergeant Gates when the latter recognised him.

"You!" the non-com. blurted, on drawing rein beside the patch of scrub. "What the blazes are you doing up in this territory?"

Tim answered him quietly, stating that he had set out from Ambesi for the north because he believed it was in these regions that his father had disappeared. Then he went on to describe all that had happened after he himself had encountered the Spencer safari.

"But where did you and your men spring from, anyhow, sergeant?" he asked, when he had finished his story.

"We were bivouacked not very far from here," was the reply, "and when we heard shots a little while back we took horse to find out what the trouble was."

Gates now turned his attention on Spencer, and, though he had soon satisfied himself that the hunter had not been seriously injured, it was obvious to him that he had suffered a severe shaking. Consequently, he decided to send him down through the jungle to Ambesi with an escort of two or three troopers, and, on the natives of Spencer's safari reappearing timorously on the track above, the sergeant summoned them down into the defile, motioned to a group of saplings that grew near the mouth of the gorge and instructed the blacks to fashion a litter for their master.

The saplings served that purpose admirably, the stems being broken off short at ground-level and lashed together to form a stretcher on which Spencer was laid. Then Gates addressed Tim.

"You're going back to Ambesi, too," he announced.

The youngster began to protest.

"I can't go back, sergeant," he said. "My father's up here somewhere, and I've got to find him. Listen, you may be able to help me find him, and, if you do, it's more than likely that he'll be in a position to put you on the trail of Spider Webb."

"What makes you think so?" Gates queried.

"Well, I've already told you that the armoured car Webb and his gang are using is the one that belonged to my dad," Tim reminded him.

"Yes, you did tell me that," Gates conceded. "But look here, kid, my job up here is to investigate the attack on Jim Conway's safari, and I've an idea that a tribe known as the Batwongas may have been responsible for it. They're a bad bunch, who are rumoured to take their orders from a renegade white man, and in dealing with them I'll have plenty on my hands without the added responsibility of seeing that you don't get into any mischief. So I'm sending you back to Ambesi, and that's final."

Again Tim tried to expostulate, but the sergeant interrupted him.

"You heard me, son," he declared, "and it's no use you arguing. This territory up here is no place for a kid like you."

Lora Graham's Proposition

BORNE on the improvised stretcher by the black boys of his safari.

Spencer was being conveyed along the trail that cleaved the jungle and linked the northern wilds with Ambesi, and behind him rode three Ivory Patrolmen and Tim, the youngster having been provided with a spare pony that had belonged to Sergeant Gates' detachment.

As for Gates and the rest of his detail, they had returned to the base camp they had established, and more than two hours had elapsed since the party bound for Ambesi had separated from them.

During those two hours, the troopers who were acting as escort to Spencer and his employees had kept a close watch on Tim lest he should attempt to give them the slip and head northward again in spite of the sergeant's commands. But the lad had given every indication of being resigned to the idea of going back to Ambesi, and now the three patrolmen had relaxed their vigilance, believing that the youngster had accepted his situation.

They were mistaken. For, as the dusk was gathering over the sky and the eternal gloom of the jungle was beginning to deepen under the approach of night, Tim contrived to draw his horse back a little, causing it to fall slightly to the rear so that a gap of a yard or two separated him from the troopers.

Gradually he increased that distance, till at last he felt it was safe to swing round and spur his mount towards the north. As for the patrolmen, they rode for several miles without being aware of Tim's defection. Indeed, the three of them had fallen into a drowse, letting their horses plod forward automatically at the heels of Spencer's bearers, and fully an hour must have gone by since Tim had parted company with them when one of the troopers suddenly awakened with a start—looked around him vaguely—then gave vent to a sharp ejaculation as he realised that the lad was missing.

His exclamation brought his comrades to their senses; and, the natives who were carrying Spencer having been ordered to halt, the khaki-clad police officers were soon galloping northward over the ground which had been covered.

They back-tracked for about a mile, after which they gave up their quest as futile, for they saw that they might search all night without coming across any trace of Tim. There were many paths branching off to right and left of the main trail, and for all they knew the youngster might have turned along any one of these to elude possible pursuit. They could not tell, for it was too dark to make out the imprints of hoofs in the soil and gain any indication of the route he may have taken.

Cursing the boy for his wilfulness, the three troopers returned to the spot where they had left Spencer and the blacks, and, deeming to press on towards Ambesi, they resumed the southerly march with the prostrate hunter and his bearers.

They were not destined to reach the settlement that night, however. The negroes commenced to show signs of fatigue before long, and there were frequent stoppages for rest, so that it was not until well on in the following day that the party eventually arrived at Ambesi.

By that time Spencer had developed a fever, brought on without a doubt by the shaking he had sustained, and he was placed at once in the charge of the doctor who had attended Jim Conway.

In the meanwhile Conway had made rapid progress under the care of the medical officer attached to the Patrol's headquarters, and twenty-four hours of expert treatment and attention had worked wonders on him, the more so as he was naturally of a strong constitution.

He had been wounded high up in the left arm, and had lost a good deal of blood, but when the doctor had succeeded in staunching the flow of that blood he had speedily recovered from the effects of the injury, and into the bargain the delirious condition of his mind had subsided, so that he had been able to give a clear account of the manner in which his safari had been wiped out.

Contrary to the belief expressed by Gates, natives had not been responsible for the attack on Conway's expedition—nor had the gorillas of Dead Man's Pass figured in the onset. According to Jim Conway, renegade whites had been the culprits, and their motive had been theft—the theft of a valuable quantity of ivory he had been bringing from the north.

It was a story that created a sensation in Ambesi when it went the round of the settlement, and, when it was succeeded by news of Spencer's arrival and the circumstances in which he, too, had lost all he possessed, the one topic of conversation along the waterfront was the brigandage which had cost the two hunters so dear.

Not long after the tidings concerning Spencer had become general knowledge, Lora Graham made her way to the depot of the Ivory Patrol. She had learned that Conway was on his feet again, and it had occurred to her that with his knowledge of the wilds he might be the very one to help her in the project which had brought her up-country. Therefore she sought out Captain Morgan, commanding officer of the Patrol, and through him she obtained an introduction to the hunter in question.

Her first impression on meeting him was more than favourable. Standing well over six feet, he was of powerful physique, and his ruggedly handsome countenance suggested candour and trustworthiness. He was, she felt sure, a man on whom she could depend.

"Mr. Conway," she said, as soon as they were alone, "I want to talk to you about these ivory thefts. It's impossible to believe, of course, that the men who robbed Spencer incited the gorillas of Dead Man's Pass to attack his safari, but I do think that those men intended to waylay him as they waylaid you, and were merely spared the necessity of using force by the chance onslaught of the apes. Also, Mr. Conway, I think I know a good deal about the leader of those men—Spider Webb."

Jim Conway looked at her thoughtfully. His left arm was wrapped in bandages that were concealed by his shirt-sleeve, but his wound had not altogether sapped the strength from it—a fact that was indicated by the manner in which he clenched his fist.

"Spider Webb," he mused. "Captain Morgan mentioned that name. Hub, I'd never heard of him until to-day, but if he's the rat who led the attack on my safari I'd give ten years of my life to get my hands on him."

"Look!" the hunter rapped out. "A horseman—and judging by the way he's riding he's in trouble!"

May 7th, 1938.

He was silent for a moment, and then he shrugged his broad shoulders.

"What's the use of talking, though?" he grunted. "I'm broke, I'm in no position to fit out another expedition and go looking for the man who robbed me, for every cent I had was sunk in that ivory I lost. I can only stay here in idleness and hope that some day the Patrol will catch up with him."

"You needn't stay here in idleness, Mr. Conway," Lora rejoined. "I think I have a proposition that may interest you. Listen, I came into the jungle ostensibly to hunt big game, but the game I'm really after is—Spider Webb. And, between us, you and I may land him, Mr. Conway. You know the country, and I hold a draft on the Ambesi Bank for an amount that should be sufficient to raise and equip a safari."

"There's just one thing," she added deliberately. "I'd like to make it clear that I want Webb taken alive."

Jim Conway was eyeing her curiously now.

"What do you want with this Spider Webb, anyway, Miss Lacey?" he asked her.

Lora hesitated for a few seconds, and then she looked him full in the face.

"I'll be frank with you," she said. "Mr. Conway, my name isn't really Lacey, but Graham, and my brother Donald is serving a ten-year sentence in the Territorial Prison down in Cape Province for a diamond robbery that he never committed. It was Spider Webb who committed that robbery, and the only chance I have of clearing my brother is to force a confession out of Webb."

She paused, then went on in an earnest tone:

"I'm moderately well off for money, thanks to a legacy I inherited from a relative," she continued, "and I'm prepared to spend every ha'penny of that inheritance in trying to establish my brother's innocence. After I succeed in doing that, I don't care what becomes of Webb. You can take out your own vengeance on him as you think fit."

"I see," Jim Conway murmured. "Well, if we catch up with Spider Webb I'll be satisfied with turning him over to the law and letting a judge and jury take care of him. When do we start, Miss—er—Lacey?"

"Then you accept my proposition," Lora said thankfully. "All right, Mr. Conway, we start just as soon as you feel up to it."

Conway nursed his injured arm.

"Doc claims I ought to give this 'wing' of mine a rest," he observed, "and he also suggests that I should give my whole constitution a chance to recuperate by taking things easy for a while. But I feel pretty okay, and as far as I'm concerned the sooner we get going the better I'll be pleased. I think I can get a safari together within twenty-four hours—picked natives at that—loyal, willing and, above all, reliable in a scrap."

He was true to his words, for when the sun rose the next morning he and Lora Graham were setting out for the north with a company of stalwart blacks, all of whom were in the prime of life except an elderly headman whose experience made up for his lack of physical qualities.

Hostile Bushmen

ON the afternoon of the day upon which Lora Graham and Jim Conway departed from Ambesi with their safari, Tim Tyler might have been seen wading in the shallows of a river that wound through the bush.

He had spent over forty-eight hours in the northern realms of the jungle, hoping to pick up some clue regarding the fate of his father, and during that time he had kept a close look-out for Sergeant Gates and his men, for he had no wish to be discovered by them and packed south to Patrol headquarters under a second and more vigilant escort.

His object was to remain in the deep wilds until he had learned what had become of the parent to whom he was devoted, and he was keenly alive to the possibility of obtaining some information concerning him if he could come across the Webb gang and keep track of their movements.

The task of providing himself with life's necessities had not worried him in the interval. The jungle abounded in fruits and edible plants, and there were shoals of fish in the river that meandered through the thickets. He also possessed a carbine which rested in a sheath suspended from the saddle of the pony that had been lent to him, though as yet he had not used the weapon for hunting game—first because he had feared that any shooting might bring Sergeant Gates and his troopers upon him—secondly, because he preferred to save his ammunition in case he was attacked by wild beasts.

At the moment he was bent on spearing a fish or two by means of a stick that he had lopped from a tree the previous day. With a knife that he owned he had whittled one end of this stick to a point, and, when he had sallied into the river with it the day before, his efforts had not been unattended by success.

To-day, however, he seemed to have lost his cunning, and he had yet to make a catch, when suddenly his attention was diverted by something that appeared to be floating towards him on the current of the stream—something which he at first took to be a log.

But it was not a log, as he suddenly realised, and it was travelling at a much swifter rate than the current. It was an evil crocodile, and it was gliding smoothly and rapidly in his direction with deadly intent.

Giving vent to an exclamation of alarm, Tim wheeled and started back through the shallows for the bank, but the water impeded him, and the mud of the river-bed clogged his feet, so that the reptile, changing its course to head him off, seemed almost bound to intercept him.

Panting, he struggled onward, and he managed to outstrip the loathsome creature and gain the bank, though only just in time, for as he scrambled on to dry ground he heard the jaws of the crocodile snap within inches of his heels. Then he blundered away from the river's edge, and was congratulating himself on having reached safety when his right ankle fouled a looped and trailing vine.

He tripped and fell his length, and as he twisted round he saw that the crocodile was dragging itself out of the water. Next instant he was making frantic efforts to release his ankle, but it had been snared by the vine in such a manner that it was difficult to disentangle it, and while he fought to set his foot free the saurian monster from the river moved towards him with awkward gait.

It could not cover ground at the speed with which it could travel through the water. Nevertheless Tim must have been seized by it if an unexpected diversion had not occurred—a diversion created by a jungle denizen who had already on one former occasion proved to be a friend in need.

Out of a clump of mangroves a leopard sprang. It was the leopard whose injured paw Tim had doctored a few days before, and, streaking to his rescue, it pounced on the crocodile with bared teeth and extended claws.

The scuffle that ensued was of brief duration, for the reptile that had crawled from the river was out of its element and no match for the agile panther which had attacked it. In thirty seconds, by which time Tim had succeeded in releasing his ankle, the saurian was beating a retreat into the water, and as it made off the boy who had so nearly fallen a prey to it stared breathlessly at the leopard to whom he owed his life.

"You again, boy!" he said in fervent accents. "That's twice you've got me out of a jam. Gee, you certainly know how to use those teeth of yours. I—I guess I'll call you Fang on account of them. Yeah, that's a good name for you, Fang."

The panther gazed at him steadfastly for a moment with its cat-like eyes. Then it turned and padded off into the jungle, and, after watching it until the thickets had swallowed it, Tim made his own way towards a small clearing where he had built a camp-fire and left his horse.

He had lost his taste for fish, and felt prepared to confine himself to a vegetarian diet. But as it happened he was destined to forgo a meal altogether, for as he came in view of the clearing where he had encamped he saw that his pony was no longer alone there.

A formidable band of aborigines were assembled in the glade—bushmen who were armed variously with assegais and clubs and whose brutal faces and half-nude bodies were hideously panted.

Had Tim been familiar with the north territory he would have recognised them from the markings on their features and chests as members of the dreaded Batwonga tribe—that race of blacks who resented the presence of strangers in their domain. As it was, he guessed intuitively from their sinister appearance that they were not likely to be well disposed, and he had the presence of mind to duck down amidst a patch of tangled undergrowth before they could desery him.

Obviously they had come upon his encampment by chance, and now they were displaying a lively interest in his horse. At the same time they were conversing in a barbarous tongue of which Tim could make nothing, but presently they began to scatter into the surrounding thickets, leaving two of their number beside Tim's pony, and it was clear to the boy that the savages had decided to make a search for the owner of the mount.

Several of the bushmen passed close to his covert, but failed to observe him and crept quietly on in the direction of the river. As for Tim, he waited until there was no sign of any of the warriors except the two who had remained in charge of his horse, and then, resolved to escape from the vicinity without delay, he worked round to the rear of those two individuals.

Once he had manoeuvred himself into such a position that their backs were towards him he made a sudden rush and leapt astride his pony, and before the pair of savages could grasp what was happening he had snatched the reins from their hands and clapped his heels to the horse's flanks.

The animal bounded off, Tim urging it down a track that led to the south, and the creature was thirty yards from the glade ere the blacks there recovered their wits and hurled their spears at the fugitive, raising an angry outcry as they did so.

The spears missed Tim, flashing harmlessly over his head, but the cries of the two warriors who had thrown them were answered from a myriad points in the jungle, and within a few seconds three or four of the aborigines sprang out on to the trail in front of the youthful horseman.

They lifted their assegais threateningly, but the white youngster bent low in the saddle and dug his heels the harder into his pony, and in another moment he was charging the bushmen down.

The warriors were hurled to the ground by the horse's onset, and one of them screamed out as an iron-shod hoof stove in his ribs where he lay. The others were luckier, and escaped serious injury, but by the time they had regained their feet Tim had swung out of sight round a bend in the jungle path.

It was as he turned that bend that he saw a group of figures some little distance ahead of him. They were approaching from the south, and had debouched on to a stretch of more or less open ground that was flanked on the west by a steep ascent whose lower slopes were strewn with rocks and matted with clumps of scrub.

To his relief Tim perceived that they were not members of the hostile band which had scattered through the bush in quest of him. They comprised a safari, and they were led by Jim Conway and Lora Graham, both of whom the youth recognised almost immediately.

As for Conway, Lora and the natives in their employ, they had been quick to desery Tim, and, halting abruptly, the first-named motioned to the fleeing boy.

"Look!" the hunter rapped out. "A horseman—and judging by the way he's riding he's in trouble!"

"Why, it's Tim Tyler!" the girl by his side ejaculated.

Conway directed a sharp glance at her.

"Tim Tyler?" he echoed. "Did you say—Tyler?"

Lora nodded, but did not remove her eyes from the oncoming form of the young horseman, and as the latter drew rein in front of her she spoke to him with a note of interrogation in her voice.

"Tim!" she exclaimed. "What are you doing here?"

The youth scrambled from the saddle. There was an expression of intense excitement on his clean-cut face.

"I'll tell you that later, Miss Lora," he jerked. "There's no time for explanations right now. Listen, you and Mr. Conway and these natives who are with you have got to get under cover, or you're liable to find yourselves in the middle of a hornets' nest!"

"Hornets' nest?" Jim Conway interposed. "What do you mean, son?"

Tim pointed in the direction whence he had come.

"The thickets there are full of savages!" he panted. "They came across my horse and started searching for me, but I managed to sneak up on the pony and make a dash for it. I

And then he stopped short, for at that instant a chorus of fiendish howls arose from the edge of the bushwood from which he had galloped only half a minute before, and a swarm of painted, half-nude bushmen leapt into full view from the tangled vegetation.

They were the blacks who had stumbled upon Tim's encampment, and they had speedily converged upon the line of his escape; and now, as they beheld the Conway safari, they raised their voices in a blood-curdling battle-cry and swept forward to the attack.

"Batwongas!" Jim Conway shouted. "The fiercest bunch of killers in Central Africa!"

He gripped Tim by the arm. "You were right," he said tersely. "We've got to get under cover! Those devils outnumbered us by five to one! See—that big cluster of rocks over there on the rise—we may be able to fight them off from there! Take Miss Lora up on your horse and make for those rocks! The rest of us will follow!"

Tim was prompt to obey. Helping Lora into the saddle, he climbed up behind her, and in another second he was urging his horse towards the tumbled boulders Conway had indicated, and as he and the girl rode off they heard the hunter call out instructions to the bearers of his safari in the native tongue.

Jim Conway had chosen his safari well. Without panic—indeed, with an orderliness that would have done credit to a squad of soldiery—the black boys from the settlement of Ambesi proceeded to retreat with the white hunter in the direction of the rising ground on the west, and as they retreated they volleyed the advancing Batwongas effectively with rifles that had been served out to them as an essential part of the expedition's equipment.

Unhurriedly they withdrew across the open terrain taking the same course as Lora and Tim, and sending the air with the blasts of their guns. And the Batwongas, raked with sleeted lead, were for the time being held in check as several of them bit the dust.

Meanwhile Tim and Lora were travelling at a fast clip, and soon they had reached the cluster of rocks to which Jim Conway had referred. Then, pulling his horse to a standstill and drawing his carbine from its sheath, Tim slid from the pony's back and helped his fair companion to dismount as well.

Together boy and girl now made their way through the boulders, Tim leading his mount by the rein, and it was as they penetrated the rocks that they observed the yawning mouth of a cave in a stiff acclivity behind the clutter of great stones.

Thinking of Lora's safety, Tim at once resolved to hurry the girl into the shelter of that aperture. Yet ere he could do so his horse suddenly strained back, tearing its rein out of his grasp and turning to gallop off through the boulders—and next moment the reason for its behaviour was made known, for out of the gloom of the cavern a bristly, tan-coloured form emerged.

It was the form of a powerful lion whose presence the pony must have sensed, and at sight of it a hoarse cry broke from Tim, a cry that blended with a half-stifled scream uttered by Lora. Then, quick to recover himself, the boy drew a bead on the animal with his carbine, but even as he carried the weapon to his shoulder a second tawny figure issued from the cave, to be followed by another and still another.

Tim Tyler and Lora Graham had stumbled upon the lair of a troop of lions, and in a flash the armed youngster realised that although his carbine might take toll of the first brute he could never defend himself and the girl against the others. And that soul-chilling thought was looming in his mind when the denizens of the cavern sprang snarling at the youth and his terrified companion!

(To be continued in another gripping episode next week. A New Universal Picture, controlled throughout the United Kingdom and Eire by General Film Distributors, Ltd., starring Frankie Thomas.)

"THUNDER TRAIL"

(Continued from page 20.)

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"RENFREW OF THE ROYAL MOUNTED."—Sergeant Renfrew, James Newill; Virginia Bronson, Carol Hughes; George Hollis, William Royle; Pierre, Thundercloud; Constable Laidlaw, William Austin; Joe Bronson, Herbert Corthell; Sergeant MacDonald, Donald Reed; Nolan, David Barclay; Tommy MacDonald, Dickie Jones; Duke, Robert Terry; Inspector Newcombe, William Gould, and "Lightning" the Dog.

"SATURDAY'S HEROES."—Tal Webster, Van Heflin; Frances Thomas, Marian Marsh; Red Watson, Richard Lane; Burgeson, Alan Bruce; Doo Thomas, Minor Watson; Dubrowsky, Frank Jenks; Coach Banks, Walter Miller; Baker, Crawford Weaver; President Hammond, George Irving; Ted Calkins, John Arledge; Andy Jones, Al St. John; President Mitchell, Charles Trowbridge.

"THUNDER TRAIL."—Dick Arizona, Ames, Gilbert Roland; Lee Tate, Charles Bickford; Amy Morgan, Marsha Hunt; Rafael Lopez, J. Carrol Naish; Bob Ames, James Craig; Jeff Graves, Monte Blue; Jim Morgan, Barlowe Borland; Bob Ames at 8, Billy Lee; Dick Ames at 14, Gene Reynolds; John Ames, William Duncan.

with a heavy mallet. And it was then that he found the watch; and in a flash he knew it to be his father's old one.

He stood staring at it, breathing heavily. Here at last was all the proof he needed to make his suspicions certain!

And then a hard voice behind him made him whirl round. In the doorway was Bob Tate regarding him through narrowed eyes.

"What are you doing here?"

Arizona's lip curled.

"What d'you think?"

"You're just what dad told me you were," retorted the other contemptuously. "Just a cheap thief."

"You ought to know something about thievin'—and murdering, too!" flung back Arizona. "It seems to run in your family."

He sprang at him in a second, but Bob was ready for him, and his fist crashed into Arizona's face, sending him staggering back. But he came again in a moment, though this time more cautiously.

For quite five minutes the fight lasted, and each saw murder in the other's eyes as they lashed out furiously, struggling with each other. But at last a fierce blow on the jaw from Arizona sent Bob staggering to the floor, and in a flash the other was on

(Continued on page 27.)

BRUCE CABOT
The M.-G.-M. Featured Player

"THUNDER TRAIL"

(Continued from page 25)

top of him. But even as he fell a gasp came from him, for Bob's shirt had been torn away in the struggle. And there, exposed to view, was a scar on his shoulder—and the scar took the form of an "A."

And then at last, amid the whirl of things, he managed to find his voice.

"Bob, Bob, you've got to listen to me. I'm—I'm your brother, Dick!" he gasped.

It was thus that Lopez found them ten minutes later. He had seen the fight through the window and had climbed up into the room. Bob was examining the watch that Dick was holding out to him, while he listened to the story that Dick was telling him with an expression of incredulity on his face.

Said Lopez with a puzzled expression on his face:

"But I do not understand. First you fight with the Senor Tate, amigo, and now you seem to be sorry."

"His name isn't Tate at all," replied Arizona quietly. "He's my brother. Now you both get out of here. I want to see Tate."

They had not been gone more than a few minutes when Tate came up into the office to find Arizona sitting there quite calmly with his father's watch in his hand.

Tate glared at him.

"What are you doing in my office?" he demanded.

Arizona got up coolly from his chair. He held out the watch and saw the start the other gave.

Then he spoke.

"You have an idea, Tate," he said, "about wiping out the Morgan family. But I don't think I'd try it if I were you. There was another nice old feller once who was heading back Missouri way with a packet of gold and a couple of kids. His name was John Ames, but he never reached Missouri."

He paused for a moment. He saw the fear in the other's eyes, but he went on relentlessly:

"You might remember, too, that if you start trying to wipe out the Morgan family, Bob Ames will be shootin' at you."

"What?"

The word came almost in a groan from Tate's lips, but Arizona only smiled.

"I put him wise to quite a lot," he replied, "only a few minutes ago. You see, he's my brother. My name's Dick Ames. You made a mistake, Tate, when you didn't kill all of us."

Tate stood there breathing heavily, swaying a little, too. He knew the game was up and the race was run, but now bitter rage was in his heart, blotting out everything else. All he wanted to do was to wipe out this man who had ruined all his plans.

Suddenly his hand flashed to his gun, but even as it was drawn clear of the holster, Dick's .45 spoke and Tate slid to the floor and lay very still.

And Arizona stood looking down on him, but there was no pity in his face—only a grim smile as he replaced his gun.

"I reckon that squares the account at last, dad," he said softly.

(By permission of Paramount Film Service, Ltd., starring Gilbert Roland and Charles Bickford.)

"RENFREW OF THE ROYAL MOUNTED"

(Continued from page 12)

Renfrew wrenched open the door, dragged the old man out, and then darted back to catch Virginia in his arms.

"Man—shot——" the girl gasped out, and managed to point her hand back at the refrigerating plant. "There—there!"

Once again Renfrew darted into the place, and the fumes made him choke and splutter. It was hard to see. By luck he stumbled over the body. His strong arms got the wretched engraver to his feet, and with his burden staggered to safety.

"He's alive—and that's all," said Renfrew.

"He tried to save us from Hollis," said Bronson.

In Hollis' office later Sergeant Renfrew heard the whole tale.

"Well, that's the end of the counterfeit smuggling ramp," he said with a satisfied grin. "Do you still dislike me, Virginia?"

"I never disliked you," Virginia flushed. "We owe our lives to you." She looked appealingly at Renfrew. "Will my father have to go back to prison?"

"Certainly not. The note lets him out and entitles him to some sort of reward," was the instant answer. "It was a brilliant bit of engraving. His message saying he was a prisoner at Pine Lodge and signed with his name was a masterpiece of skill. It brought me here post-haste."

"I think you're wonderful," murmured Virginia, when next day they walked arm-in-arm through the grounds.

"Maybe the admiration is mutual. Not often a girl would stick up for her father as you have done," Renfrew from his six feet grinned down at the girl. He pointed towards the dog, trotting on ahead. "Lightning thinks you're grand. I thought so the first time I saw you."

"When you hooked me?"

"It's the landing of the catch that's worrying me," boldly murmured Sergeant Renfrew.

(By permission of Associated British Film Distributors, Ltd., starring James Newill and Carol Hughes.)

"SATURDAY'S HEROES"

(Continued from page 18)

whom the ball shot out of the pack, saw his chance Baker suddenly leaped to action, all else forgotten, as the ball hurtled towards him. He caught it magnificently and began weaving through the startled Calton players.

Man after man leaped to drag him down; expertly, to the roaring crowd's delight, he warded them off and continued his lone, mad run, unconscious now of the fact that his clothes were in ribbons after their wild clutchings.

Val, with the crowd, was on his feet, cheering madly, beside himself with joy. Hammond was biting his nails, Mitchell smiling serenely, and just before the whistle ended the game, Baker, finishing his marvellous run, scored a last-second touchdown with two of the Calton men falling on top of him. Hats, sticks, coats and programmes soared into the air above the raving crowd.

Andy Jones, jumping like a jack-in-the-box, grabbed a mirror from a girl next to him, took out a pair of scissors and beamed all round him.

"Pardon me, I've waited years for this!" He trimmed the beautifully curling ends of his moustache, for he had sworn to nurture that moustache until Weston won a big game. As the ends fluttered to the ground, he veiled:

"I won't need these any more!"

During the excitement, Frances found Val on the bench, and they sat there, not caring who might be watching.

Val was cheerful at last; he had achieved his object. Weston had won, and the blow had been struck for the clearing up of the football system.

"I'll tell you the whole story," he said to the happily smiling girl. "You see, when I left here, I went over to Weston, and got to see Dr. Mitchell there—and Fran, that's the way it was!" Locked in a tight embrace, they sat there until the ground was almost empty. "Fran," he whispered, "you are the most adorable, delightful, delicious, er—er—"

A quaint figure popped up behind them. It was Andy, looking very strange with his short-cropped moustache.

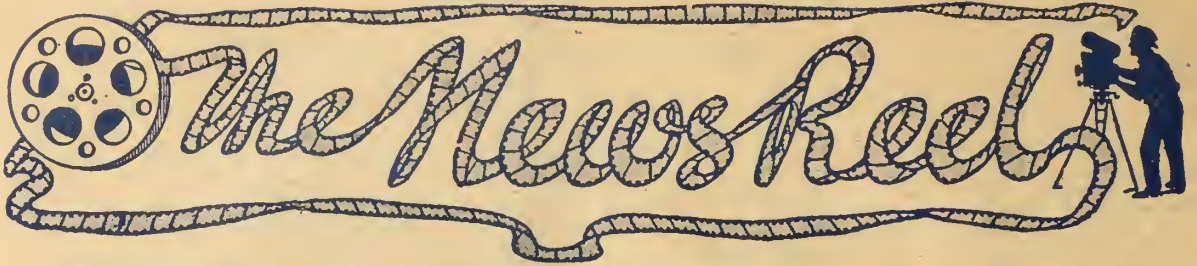

"D—lovely!" he exclaimed. "Now, don't you think we ought to go home?"

(By permission of Radio Pictures, Ltd., starring Van Heflin and Marian Marsh.)

CUT THEM OUT, LADS!

Here are eight more stamps for a collection. (See page 2).

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed to BOY'S CINEMA, Room 211, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Troublesome Sounds

Public Pests that create one of the biggest financial risks in motion picture production are usually the most minute things that could not disturb the tranquillity of a quiet home.

They are dangerous pests and anathema to all motion picture directors—particularly Clarence Brown, who directed Walter Huston, James Stewart, Beulah Bondi and a tremendous supporting cast in "Of Human Hearts" at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. They are as follows:

1.—The common house-fly can settle on a microphone and remain undetected until the film is developed and printed. It usually is not discovered until the scene is shown in a projection. The entire sequence has to be refilmed.

2.—An airplane that continues to hover over a studio holds up all actual shooting of scenes, causing a big loss.

3.—For a person to sneeze on the sound stage while the cameras are running means the scene must be retaken.

4.—Chirping sparrows often nestle in the high rafters of the sound stages. Production is always suspended while company employees scramble through the rafters to dislodge them.

5.—A stray cat frequently adopts a sound stage as its home and meows during the scenes, causing retakes. Cats have been known to have litters of kittens in dark places, making it difficult to find them.

6.—A squeaky shoe is magnified many times on the sound track. The company must shut down until the actor has made the long trek to the wardrobe department for squeakless shoes.

7.—Hammering off-stage is one of the more common worries. Work must be called off until the hammerer is located and a red-light signal system installed for him.

8.—Train whistles and motor-car horns, particularly on location, are nuisances to the director who is working against daylight and time. They cannot be controlled. The company must stand idle until they vanish.

9.—Quite often, studio visitors, ignoring the golden rule of silence on a sound stage, continue to whisper while a scene is being taken. The scene must be done over again.

10.—Forgetful studio workers occasionally read newspapers on the set while the scene is being filmed. When they fold or crumple the paper it is registered on the sound track like crackling thunder.

Travelling Hotel for Horses

Russell Hayden, the cowboy actor, is the proprietor of the world's most luxurious hotel of its kind, a travelling Ritz-Carlton for horses, which he designed for the use of his twelve trained motion picture mounts.

The equine hostelry provides the last word in comfort, having stall space for the dozen steeds and an automatic escalator for a gang-plank. The actor, who is featured in Producer Harry Sherman's "Hopalong Cassidy" series, conceived the idea of the horse hotel to relieve the cramped conditions of animals being transported.

Sauce from the Goose

Mother goose laid an egg. Not a golden one, to be sure, although the excitement caused by this act of Nature on the Walter Wanger set of "The Adventuress," made it appear for the moment that the golden phenomenon had actually happened.

During the filming of a dramatic train scene in which Leo Carrillo, as a Spanish soldier, and a group of peasants are travelling from one province to another, the excitement occurred. The faces of the passengers on the train were serious, befitting an atmosphere of war. Katherine de Mille, playing the part of a pretty peasant girl, clung to the last of her worldly possessions, a nice fat goose.

"Camera—ready—shoot," ordered Mr. Dieterle, directing "The Adventuress." The cameras began to grind. The faces of the people became grimmer. Leo Carrillo acted out his dramatic plea. Suddenly he laughed. And Miss de Mille's reactions certainly were not in keeping with the script.

"Cut!" shouted Dieterle. "What's going on here?"

Carrillo, still laughing, was unable to answer. But Miss de Mille meekly held up a nice fresh egg.

Mother goose had laid an egg and cooked the scene.

Doug Fairbanks, Junr., Aids Needy Extra

When elderly Henrietta Robbins, old-time extra in most of the silent pictures which starred Douglas Fairbanks, senr., heard that Doug had returned to Hollywood and that Irene Dunne, Fairbanks, and some two hundred extras were on location in San Fernando Valley for RKO Radio's, "The Joy of Living," she spent most of a hard-earned dollar for bus fare to the scene.

TUESDAY IS
"BOY'S CINEMA" DAY!

Doug would remember her, she knew, and so that she got some much-needed work. But upon arrival she learned that the Fairbanks in the picture was Doug Junr., and that all extra parts had been filled.

Henrietta got the job, however. When Doug Junr. heard of her presence, he induced the director to put on another extra, and paid her cheque himself.

"The Kid" is Back

Jackie Coogan has returned, as a man, to the movies that made him famous as a child.

For the first time since he was a youngster, "The Kid" has been before the cameras in an important picture. Instead of a wistful moppet, Coogan is now a suave, smiling orchestra leader. He is tall and broad-shouldered, in the true leading man tradition.

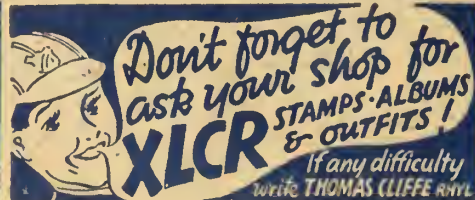

As he swings his baton at the orchestra he smiles at his bride, for Betty Grable appears with him in Paramount's "Swing, Teacher, Swing." She dances to the orchestra he conducts.

In playing the part of a band leader, the former child star does more than play a part. He puts into practice his vocation for the last three years. Jackie has had his own orchestra. He hopes to continue his career as an entertainer. "I don't know just what form it will take," he says, "but I want to continue at the business I have known all my life. I hope from time to time to make a picture. I am also interested in writing for the screen.

"Right now I'm trying to get together with Charlie Chaplin, and I am intrigued with the possibility of writing a screen play, and creating a character that will be a talking counterpart to 'The Kid' that I did with him."

Coogan is now twenty-two, and, with the exception of his appearance in a western three years ago, he has been away from pictures since he was fourteen.

In "Swing, Teacher, Swing" he appears with Burns and Allen, Martha Raye, Edward Everett Horton, Ben Blue and others.

Don't forget to ask your shop for XLCR STAMPS, ALBUMS & OUTFITS! If any difficulty write THOMAS CLIFFE ONLY

BE TALL

BLUSHING.

—FREE to all sufferers, particulars of a proved home treatment that quickly removes all embarrassment and permanently cures blushing and flushing of the face and neck. Enclose stamp to Mr. A. TEMPLE, Specialist, Palace House, 128, Shaftesbury Avenue (2nd Floor), London, W.1. Est. 35 years.

STAMPS

300 DIFFERENT, incl. Airmail, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Pictorials, Colonials. Price 6d. (Abroad 1/-).—WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BOY'S CINEMA

THE BEST PAPER FOR LONG COMPLETE
FILM DRAMAS!

No. 964. EVERY TUESDAY June 4th, 1938.

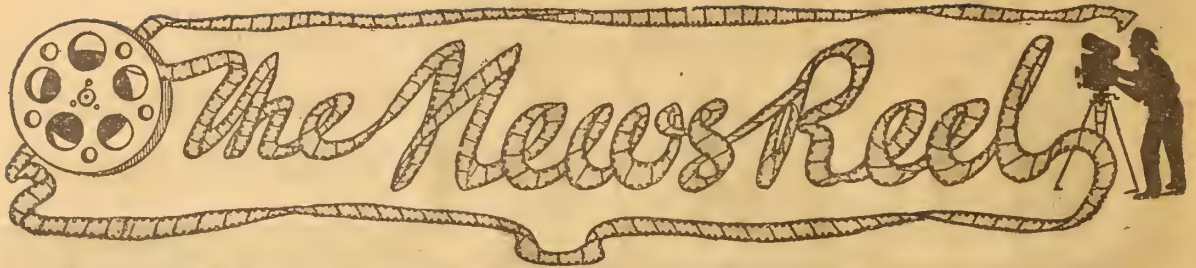

2 D

Starring
Dick PURCELL
and
John LITEL

"Missing Witnesses"

The Baffling Mystery of a MASTER
CROOK

The News Reel

All letters to the Editor should be addressed to BOY'S CINEMA, Room 211, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Confidence is a Great Thing!

Jack Holt, the perennially popular screen star, has often boasted to his intimates and fellow-players that when he trusts a man he will risk not only his pocket-book but his life on that confidence.

During the filming of Columbia's "Under Suspicion," in which Holt plays his 200th starring rôle, he had the opportunity to make good that boast—as far as risking his life was concerned.

A mystery story, the plot contains a scene in which a rifle bullet crashes through a window, whizzes past Holt's head, and buries itself in the wall behind him. The script called for a close-up of the action, and Director Lewis Collins, a stickler for realism, called for an expert marksman.

Eddie Mack, one-time circus and army sharpshooter who specialises in such hazardous jobs around Hollywood, was selected for the task. Before the scene was staged, Jack, who is no mean marksman himself with rifle and pistol, insisted that Mack give him a sample of his prowess. As a result of this rehearsal by shooting tiny targets at a hundred yards, and also knocking the spots out of playing cards, Holt expressed himself as satisfied with Mack's perfect aim.

The scene was photographed not once, but several times until deemed perfect. Each time Mack sent a .30-30 slug whizzing within an inch of Holt's head as he sat in a chair. Not once did Holt even wince to spoil the scene. Asked about his own steel nerves afterwards, he replied:

"I just had confidence in him. And when I have that I'll go the limit with any man."

Interruptions on "The Saint in New York" Set

It took eight men armed with shot-guns to keep R.K.O. ranch quiet enough to make motion pictures one night recently.

Filming night scenes for R.K.O. Radio's "The Saint in New York," the sound track was repeatedly ruined by the yelps of coyotes who had been driven down from the hills by the recent heavy rains.

Each time the siren was blown for absolute quiet, the beasts took up their howling, interrupting dialogue between Louis Hayward and Kay Sutton.

Director Ben Holmes solved the problem by having eight prop men armed with shotguns deploy in a circle, fire their guns into the air prior to making each scene. The coyotes would remain quiet for several minutes after each volley, whereupon Hayward and Miss Sutton would go into their scene without extraneous noises.

Dummy Insured for 5,000 Dollars

If Charlie McCarthy should get smashed up in a car, train or plane accident, burned, blown away in a tornado, buried in an earthquake or landslide, or otherwise wrecked, ruined, lost, stolen, strayed or kidnapped, Edgar Bergen would be reimbursed by an insurance company to the amount of $5,000.

"Charlie carries every kind of insurance imaginable," Edgar Bergen admits. "But the five thousand wouldn't begin to pay me for his loss. He's irreplaceable."

Charlie McCarthy, as everyone knows, is a wooden dummy. For eleven years Edgar Bergen has been trying to obtain a duplicate of Charlie, but has had no success. He has commissioned many wood-carvers to try to make replicas of Charlie's head, but the results were not satisfactory. Charlie, who is at present working with Edgar Bergen, Adolphe Menjou, Andrea Leeds and George Murphy in the Universal picture, "Letter of Introduction," has been presented with a chair of his own. The chair is half-size, but bears his name in full-sized letters across the back, and when Edgar Bergen made the presentation, Charlie McCarthy expressed his appreciation by saying "that's darned nice of you, Bergen."

Five Hours in a Trunk No Fun

Frances Drake spent five hours in a trunk one day making scenes for "Lone Wolf in Paris" at Columbia Studios.

The story called for the petite actress to hide in a large wardrobe trunk belonging to Francis Lederer, who is co-starred with her in the picture. She did it to escape the gendarmes who were on her trail in a Paris hotel following a jewel robbery.

According to the script, Miss Drake was supposed to hide in the trunk, closing it after she entered. Then she was to faint and be rescued in the nick of time by Lederer.

All morning they rehearsed the difficult scene, and during the early afternoon made the "shots."

The scene was photographed in long shots and close-ups, Lederer carrying the inert Miss Drake to a couch nearby to revive her.

On the last scene Director Al Rogell was particularly pleased.

"That was a lily!" shouted the director, using Hollywood's term for a perfect scene.

"She couldn't have been more realistic if she had fainted," the director continued as he rushed in to congratulate the players.

Miss Drake did not rise from the couch.

Lederer continued to wave spirits of ammonia under her nose.

"I'm glad you liked it," Lederer said, "because she has fainted!"

Luckily it was the last "take." When Miss Drake was revived she went home to try and forget about trunks.

Asbestos Costumes for Chorus

For a stirring "devil-dance" number in Irving Berlin's "Alexander's Ragtime Band," twelve beautiful Hollywood chorus-girls were forced to wear costumes made of asbestos.

The asbestos suits were not dictated by any fear of flames, but the danger of injury from dry ice!

The girls are supposed to disappear into a heavy shower of steam after sitting on the dance floor for four bars of music in a ballet routine.

Instead of real, live steam, 20th Century-Fox technicians devised a huge trough covered with grill work. The trough filled with a ton of dry ice, gives forth an enormous amount of steam-like substance when big fans blow air up through the dry ice.

But to protect the dancing girls from the fumes, which are capable of burning a person, Dance Director Seymour Felix had the wardrobe department make up black and red lace ballet costumes of asbestos.

(Continued on page 25)

NEXT WEEK'S GRAND FILM DRAMAS!

JACK HOLT

"TRAPPED BY G-MEN"

In order to track down a gang of crooks who seem to have vanished off the face of the earth, Martin Galloway—acc G-Man—poses as a notorious bank robber and contrives the escape from prison hospital of a wounded criminal, who takes him to the mysterious hideaway. But his colleagues search for him in vain. A drama of desperate venture.

"HERO OF PINE RIDGE"

Disowned by the people he loved, Gene Autry travels the lonesome road, until fate crosses his trail and sends him whirling back into the middle of a range war with blazing guns and flying fists.

Also

Another episode of the jungle adventure serial:

"TIM TYLER'S LUCK"

Starring Frankie Thomas.

Transferred to a department specially created to deal with a mob of dangerous racketeers, Detective Bull Regan makes a number of blunders, but eventually—with the help of a girl wanted for murder—runs to earth the head of the whole criminal organisation. A first-rate thriller, starring Dick Purcell, John Litel and Jean Dale

"MISSING WITNESSES"

Caught!

IN East Twenty-Seventh Street, just round the corner from Third Avenue, a large dark-blue saloon drew up outside Joseph Hartman's modest little restaurant and five men got down from it and straggled across the pavement.

The smallest of the five—a mean-faced shrimp of a fellow with blue eyes inclined to stare—led the way past two shrubs in tubs that stood like sentinels on either side of the entrance and pushed open the door.

Hartman, a narrow-shouldered man of no great stature, and baldheaded except for two tufts of brown hair that sprouted thickly above his ears, was standing behind a counter upon which cigars and cigarettes were displayed for sale. There were only two customers in the place, seated at separate tables, but his brown eyes widened beneath bushy brows and his jaw dropped beneath a ragged brown moustache as four of the newcomers advanced towards the counter and the fifth remained at the door as though on guard there.

"Hallo, Hartman," said the diminutive leader harshly. "How about it?"

"I couldn't get the money if I wanted to, Macey," the proprietor of the restaurant replied in a nervous voice. "I don't make that much."

"We gave you till to-night, didn't we?" rasped Macey, known to the underworld of New York City—and to the police—as "Little Joe" Macey.

"But that's impossible," protested Hartman. "You've taxed me to the limit already for that Protective Association, as you call it, and now you want to raise the price!"

"It's the boss' orders. So what's the answer?"

With courage born of despair Hartman defied his persecutors.

"I'm not gonna pay another dollar in graft to you, or to your boss either!" he blazed. "I'm through! Now get out!"

Macey waved a hand to his companions.

"All right, boys."

The man at the door promptly pulled up a blind over its glass panel and blinds over narrower glass panels to right and left of the door. Two other men let down Venetian blinds over the windows, and the interior of the restaurant became hidden from the street.

Macey, with a sweep of his arm, sent boxes of cigars and packets of cigarettes flying from the counter in all directions. The other ruffian, who had been leaning against the counter chewing gum, snatched up a chair and with it began to smash the glass doors of cabinets.

"Stop it!" howled Hartman above the noise. "Please don't do that! Stop it!"

He dived round the counter in a frantic effort to protect his property, but was sent floundering backwards against a door from a hurricane of blows.

"I know what this is!" exclaimed a horrified male customer, bounding up from his seat at a table in a far corner of the room. "Let me out!"

Nobody tried to stop him, and he rushed out from the place bareheaded.

The door was slammed behind him, and the work of destruction continued. Mirrors on the walls were shattered with the aid of bottles that broke and splashed their contents upon the wreckage. A big coffee urn was sent rolling across the floor in a cloud of fragrant steam, and Macey attacked the glass cover of a pin-table with the butt of a six-gun he took from his pocket.

"You're wrecking my business!" Hartman piteously complained and caught hold of the arm of the chewer of gum. "Please don't do that!"

The elbow of the arm sent him reeling against an ugly black-haired fellow who was attacking piled-up plates with a bottle, and the bottle smote him upon the forehead, just above the right eye, making a jagged wound there and knocking him down.

"Help!" he screamed. "Help!" The only remaining customer in the restaurant was a girl of about twenty who had been too horrified to move from a table at the back of the room. She saw a clear way to the door just as Hartman rose to his feet with blood streaming down his face, and she made a dash for it.

Out on the pavement of East Twenty-Seventh Street a young detective attached to the robbery detail approached Hartman's restaurant. His name was William Regan, but "Bill" had become "Bull" as a result of his strong arm methods with wrongdoers.

He was clean-shaven and quite good-looking, and in no way did he resemble the typical detective of fiction. A whimsical expression about his mouth, a pair of mild blue eyes, and an easy manner tended to deceive strangers, but he was an expert at ju-jitsu, he wielded a pair of formidable fists, and no crook in New York could beat him to the draw when it came to shooting.

The drawn blinds of the restaurant attracted his attention before the noise of destruction and the screams of Hartman reached his ears, and as he hastened his steps he blew upon an official whistle.

He was about to open the door when the door was opened and the girl rushed out almost into his arms. He glimpsed frightened blue eyes, set in a beautiful face.

"What's your hurry, sister?" he demanded.

"Excuse me!" she cried breathlessly; and he made no effort to stop her because at that moment two of the wreckers dived past her to the saloon at the kerb, hurled themselves into it, and were swept away along the street.

The black-haired ruffian, Heinie Dowds by name, emerged to find Bull in his way.

"Get goin', mug!" he shouted menacingly.

"Who're you shoving?" inquired Bull, and with a sudden and apparently simple movement of one arm he sent Heinie Dowds sprawling at the feet of a patrolman who had just arrived on the scene in response to the summons of the whistle.

The ugly chewer of gum burst out from the doorway with Little Joe Macey, and Macey shouted:

"Take 'im, Chiv!"

Chivvy Predo launched a blow at Bull that should have laid the detective low, but Bull side-stepped it like lightning, and it was his attacker who thudded to the pavement. Macey whipped out his gun, only to find himself covered by a smaller, yet equally deadly, weapon in Bull's left hand which seemed to have got there by magic.

"Hold it!" rapped Bull; and the little crook raised his hands instead of attempting to fire.

"Up on your feet, you!"

Chivvy Predo rose with marked reluctance.

"You, too, Tarzan!"

Heinie Dowds received rough assistance from the patrolman.

"Come on, line up! This is the law talking!"

The three stood in a row, and Bull appropriated Macey's shooting-iron.

"Little Joe Macey, eh?" he drawled. "I gotta permit to carry that gun, copper," snarled Macey.

"Well, your permit's just expired."

Hartman tottered out from the restaurant, battered and bleeding and crying for help.

"What's going on here, anyway?" asked Bull.

"Officer, these men," faltered Hartman, "they wrecked my place—and now look—look what they did to me. They're crooks! Arrest them! I'm gonna testify against 'em. I'm gonna tell everything about their rotten racket. I'm gonna send 'em to the penitentiary!"

The Result of the Trial

BULL'S three captives were taken off to the nearest precinct station and charged, and two days afterwards Joseph Hartman gave evidence against them before a Grand Jury, with the result that they were committed for trial on two counts—extortion and violence.

At the trial the Deputy District Attorney conducted the case against them, and he lost no time in calling Hartman to the witness-stand. But Hartman's courage began to ooze away from him the moment he became seated in the chair on the stand, for Macey and his companions were at their own attorney's table almost facing him, and the two men who had escaped capture were glowering at him from the body of the court.

"How many men were party to this assault?" asked the Deputy District Attorney.

"Th—there were five of them who did it," stammered the witness.

June 4th, 1933.

"Will you relate exactly what happened?"

Hartman, whose forehead was decorated with sticking-plaster, tried to moisten dry lips with a tongue that was equally dry.

"Well, sir—er—the—the gangsters who'd been bleedin' me—they came in and de-demanded more money—and I—I told 'em I couldn't pay 'em. Then they went to work on my restaurant, and—and they wrecked it. But when I tried to stop 'em, they—they beat me up."

"Thank you." The Deputy District Attorney waved a hand in no particular direction. "And now, Mr. Hartman, I'd like you to take a look around the court-room. Do you see anybody here who was present when this happened?"

Hartman looked across at the three crooks. Heinie Dowds was eating peanuts out of a paper bag as though in no way concerned with the trial.

"Yes," he murmured.

"Will you point them out to the jury?"

"Those three men there."

"What part, if any, did these three men have in the affair?"

"Well—er—when the thing started these men jumped up from their tables and tried to help me."

The two men who had not been captured grinned at one another.

"Tried to help you?" exploded the astonished Deputy District Attorney.

"Yes," nodded Hartman, "they—they actually tried to stop the gangsters, but they—er—they'd wrecked my restaurant and then run out. Those men left the place after the men who'd assaulted me had gone."

Bull Regan sprang up from a chair at the Deputy District Attorney's table.

"He's lying!" he shouted. "He said it was Macey's mob that gave him the beat-up! Say, are you tryin' to make a monkey out o' me?"

"Order!" commanded the bailiff of the court in a stentorian voice; and the judge banged on the bench with his gavel.

"Officer Regan," he said severely, "do you want me to fine you for contempt of court?"

"No, your honour," Bull replied. "My tongue slipped."

There was laughter in which the prisoners joined, and Bull sat down muttering and indubly:

"The white-livered liar!"

Heinie Dowds helped himself to another peanut and tossed its shell into his own bowler hat, which was standing upside down on the table before him.

"Do you mean to say that these defendants are not the men you identified?" thundered the Deputy District Attorney.

"No, they—they're friends of mine," Hartman replied.

The judge leaned towards him.

"Mr. Hartman," he said, "I want to caution you that if you repudiate your sworn testimony before the Grand Jury—"

"It's no use!" blurted the unhappy witness. "I can't say anything!"

"Do you realise we'll have to send you to prison on a charge of perjury?" asked the judge.

"Yes, I know. But I have a wife and family, Judge. I'm alive now, but—"

The Deputy District Attorney intervened.

"If your Honour pleases," he said, "the prosecuting witness has evidently received a threat of death. I feel that there's only one thing to do."

With a gesture of helplessness he returned to his table and sat down behind it. Bull gritted his teeth, and then the judge spoke again.

"This is a sad commentary on justice," he said bitterly. "Bailiff, have a warrant sworn out for the arrest of this witness on a charge of perjury. The case against Macey, Predo and Dowds is dismissed. The prisoners are discharged."

Hartman left the witness-stand only to be taken into custody by a policeman. Heinie Dowds emptied the peanut shells from his hat into the paper bag and rose with his companions and the attorney who had defended them. Bull, thoroughly disgusted with the result of the trial, was standing by the rail that divided the well of the court from the seats of the public when Little Joe Macey walked up to him with an insolent grin.

"So long, copper," he jeered.

"How would you like a bust in the nose?" snapped Bull.

The three moved past him to a side door, and he was glaring after them when he caught sight of the girl who had run out from the restaurant. She was looking back at him from a door on the other side of the rail, and he recognised her immediately.

He pushed open a gate in the rail and hurried after her, but many people were leaving the court, and she was out in a broad corridor by the time he had squeezed his way through the crowd at the door.

He saw her disappear into the cage of a lift, and he reached the lift just as the gate was being closed.

"Next cage, please!" said the attendant, and the gate was slammed in his face.

He raced down the stairs, but there were three flights of them, and the girl had disappeared by the time he had completed their descent.

Hartman's own case came up for hearing four days afterwards, and he had no one to defend him. The wound on his forehead was healed, but he looked utterly dejected.

"Hartman," said the judge gravely, "do you know of any reason why sentence should not be passed upon you?"

"No, sir," confessed the prisoner.

"I regret that it is necessary to do this, but the courts are powerless to check the spread of organised crime so long as people like you, who have been victimised by criminals, refuse to testify against them. Upon your own admission that you are guilty of perjury, I hereby sentence you to State's prison for a term of five years."

It was a severe sentence, and murmurs of surprise and of commiseration followed its utterance. Hartman closed his eyes, and his head was bowed when a policeman touched him on the shoulder and helped him to his feet.

The Grand Jury sat that day, and the foreman—who had been compelled to give evidence against the timorous restaurant proprietor—addressed his colleagues in these terms:

"The Hartman case is only one of many such instances of terrorism by racketeers who have a strangle-hold on our city's business. Present law enforcement agencies have shown themselves incapable of dealing with this appalling situation. We need a new department, devoted solely to the cleansing of this city of racketeering crime. I suggest we appeal to the Governor!"

The Governor of New York State was swift to act upon the appeal made to him by the Grand Jury. He created the new department, and placed in charge of it Detective-Inspector Robert Leonard Lane, a distinguished officer of the Homicide Bureau, with the title of "Special Prosecutor."

Lane, a tall and quiet-spoken man of about forty with a clean-shaven and intellectual face, lost no time in organising the new department at Police Headquarters, and one of the first things he did after he had got it into running order was to make a radio appeal to the general public from a studio of the American Broadcasting Corporation.

"This," he said, "is the first, and, I hope, the last time I shall make a public address during the career of this special criminal investigation. We are not embarking on a crusade against small-fry mobsters and hired thugs. We are out after the big fellows—the bosses of the underworld—and I need the co-operation of my fellow-citizens."

The newspapers had given considerable advance publicity to the broadcast, and Inspector Lane had a vast audience that evening. Joe Macey and nine or ten other men, including Dowds and Predo, listened to what he had to say in a room above a night club off Second Avenue.

"You'll need more than that, brother!" scoffed Dowds.

"There is to-day scarcely a business in this city," Lane's voice went on, "which does not somehow pay its tribute to the underworld—a tribute levied by force and collected by fear. I need the help of you business men who are being mulcted. Come to my offices. Tell us all you know."

A grey-haired grocer, in the living-room of his premises up in the Bronx, looked round from a radio set as his wife cried out excitedly:

"John, you can go down!"

"Not me!" he said with vehemence. "It's safer to pay off!"

"Without your co-operation," Inspector Lane continued, "this investigation will get nowhere. I want every citizen, high and low, rich or poor, who knows anything about this organised system of terrorism to come to my office and tell his story."

An Italian greengrocer in an East Side tenement, with his plump wife and his brood of children, flung up his hands.

"I'm a-go!" he cried, his brown eyes gleaming with excitement. "I'm a-tella how dey ruined my vegetable business!"

"No, Tony, no!" protested the wife, who was holding a baby in her arms. "No! The leetle ones! Our little bambinos!"

Lane had nearly finished.

"With the evidence we collect from you citizens who have been victimised," he stated, "we shall begin an investigation of underworld characters that will lead us eventually to the men in control. The place for you to report is my office at headquarters. My investigators will respect your confidence. They will protect you. We must have witnesses—hundreds of them—men and women who will testify against the racketeers."

Transferred

THE day after Inspector Lane's radio appeal to the public Bull Regan ascended to the floor upon which the new department functioned at headquarters, entered a big general office, and opened a swing gate in a low partition which kept callers away from the desks of members of the staff.

A man at a desk just inside the gate sprang up to stop him.

"I'm sorry," he said, "but you'll just have to wait. The inspector will only be a few minutes."

Bull thrust the clerk aside and strode towards a door that bore the inspector's name.

"You can't go in there!" cried the clerk, a chubby-faced young fellow named Harris.

"There's no harm in trying," retorted Bull, and recognised a former member of the Homicide Squad at a desk to the left of the door. "Hi-ya, Pete?"

Pete returned the greeting, and Bull burst into a panelled room in which Lane was seated behind a flat-topped desk.

"Humm!" The inspector looked up at the intruder. "Detective Bull Regan, I suppose?"

"That's right," nodded Bull, removing his hat because a pair of very keen hazel eyes seemed to have become focused on it. "That clerk you got outside didn't even know who I was."

"Would you like an apology?"

"Naw, that's all right, inspector. Skip it." Bull dismissed the matter with a flip of his left hand. "Well, how's the Pussyfoot Brigade coming along?"

"Pussyfoot?" Lane frowned. "Oh, I think we're going to do all right."

"Well, let me give you some advice. The trouble with you people around this place is you're all too soft. You act like those guys that come in here were doin' you a favour. You're up against hoodlums and gorillas in this department, the same as the rest of the force. Over in the robbery detail, when we get a bunch o' witnesses in, they talk!"

"Yes, I understand you're pretty good at that—or—sort of thing," said Lane with subtle sarcasm.

"I'm the best guy in the detail," Bull declared with no modesty whatever. "When they send me out after anybody, I bring 'em in."

"Congratulations."

Lane had been signing letters when Bull entered, and he went on signing them.

"They sent me over here to talk to you," said Bull after an interval of silence. "What've you got, a tough pick-up? I'm always willing to oblige."

"Thank you," Lane signed another letter and tossed it into a tray. "That's splendid."

"Well, what's the job?" Bull asked impatiently. "I'm working on a couple o' cases now, and I've gotta get back to the department."

"This is your department."

Bull blinked.

"You mean I've been—"

"Transferred." The last letter was signed and joined the others, and the brand-new Special Prosecutor looked up with a smile. "Yes, you're now on the Pussyfoot Brigade! Well, you don't seem very enthusiastic."

Bull made a grimace.

"I'm not," he declared. "I want action, not gab."

"Have you any idea why you were transferred to me?"

"I suppose it was on account o' the way I put the pinch on those 'hoods' at Hartman's."

Wagner's voice rang out, seemingly from his pictured self : " I know these three ! "

"For once you're right, Bull." Lane stood up and buttoned his double-breasted coat. "Now, I know that you don't scare easily. You're a hard-boiled, two-fisted cop."

"That's right."

"You're bull-headed and stupid. You know a lot about knocking a guy's teeth out and throwing him in the jug, but you don't know anything about using your brains."

Bull didn't like that at all.

"I tell you I've got the best record of arrests—" he began hotly.

"I know, I know," interrupted Lane. "More arrests than anybody else in the department, many of them unnecessary! A policeman's job is to protect the public, not to persecute it. Did anyone ever tell you that?"

"Yeah. Paragraph three, 'Instructions for Detectives.'"

"Oh, so you've read the book? That's splendid. Now, Bull, I'm going to give you a chance to use your head—and, if you don't, you'll probably end up as a night-watchman somewhere."

"Am I supposed to say 'thanks'?" snorted Bull.

"It would be better if you didn't say anything for once. Now, if we're going to work together, let's get a few things straight. Our job here is to find witnesses, to gain their confidence and persuade them to tell their stories. That doesn't call for strong-arm methods—it takes brains. Some of your best work will be done while you're sitting in a chair—thinking!"

"Desk job, eh?" growled Bull.

Lane leaned across the desk and pointed a finger at him.

"Another thing, Bull," he said sharply. "Remember that I'm the head of this department. I don't always tell all I know, and until you become the head man here I make the decisions."

"That's all right, inspector," returned Bull airily. "It won't take me long."

"What won't take you long?"

"To become head man here."

Lane grimaced, and a few minutes afterwards escorted his new assistant into the outer office and introduced him to the other members of the staff who were there.

"And this is Emmet White," he said, stopping at the last desk to be visited. "Detective Bull Regan."

Emmet White pushed back his chair and rose. He was a big, broad fellow, heavily built, a good two inches taller than Bull and rather pugilistic of appearance.

"How d'you do?" said Bull.

"Glad to know you," said Emmet White.

"Bull's just coming into the department, Whitey," said Lane as the two shook hands. "Look after him, will you?"

"Sure, chief."

"He'll show you how we do things around here," the inspector informed Bull, and then he went back to his own room.

"You'll get on to it easy," confided Emmet White. "It's just a matter of using your head."

Bull perched on a corner of the desk and lit a cigarette.

"Say, you're the copper who was in on that Hartman case, aren't you?" asked his new colleague.

"Sure. I had those hyenas all wrapped up and delivered, and then Hartman let me down."

Whitey rubbed his clean-shaven chin reflectively.

"You know there ought to have been somebody around that restaurant besides Hartman who had the dope on Little Joe Macey's mob," he remarked. "Yeah," said Bull. "I wish I could find that dame!"

"What dame?"

"The one that bumped into me comin' out of Hartman's that night. She acted like she knew something."

"Couldn't you locate her?"

"Naw, couldn't get a line on her anywhere." Bull puffed a cloud of smoke into the air. "Then she showed up at the trial."

Whitey's grey eyes widened.

"Well, why didn't you freeze on to her then?" he exclaimed.

"She saw me first."

"Too bad. If we could get a line on Joe Macey's outfit it might lead us to the higher-ups. That's what the chief wants."

Bull pursed his lips and thought.

"Say, there's another restaurant right around the corner from Hartman's," he said suddenly. "Wagner's Chop House. If the Macey mob were makin' Hartman cough up it's a cinch they were doin' the same with Wagner."

"That's right," agreed Whitey, "and maybe Wagner will talk."

"I'll make him talk!"

"I'll go with you."

Bull Makes a Blunder

WAGNER'S CHOP HOUSE was a double-fronted but comparatively small establishment in Third Avenue, less than three minutes' walk from Hartman's premises. Frank Wagner, its full-faced and full-bodied proprietor, was standing behind a long, glass-topped counter, and talking across it to his head-waiter, when a long, black, saloon car drew up at the kerb and Bull and Whitey got out from it.

The two detectives would not have been flattered if they could have heard what he said as he caught sight of them through a window as they advanced towards the door.

"Those guys look like some o' Little Joe Macey's mob!" he exclaimed. "I'm going out the back way—tell 'em I've gone and ain't comin' back."

The head-waiter was between the door and a cash register on the counter when Bull and Whitey entered.

"Are you Wagner?" asked Bull crisply.

"No," was the curt reply.

"Is he here?"

"No, he's gone home."

"Where does he live?"

"I don't know."

Several early customers looked round from their tables, and the head-waiter rather lost his head.

"Why don't you let the man alone?" he burst out. "You're driving him out of business with your Protective Association—bleedin' him until he'll have to close up!"

"That's just what I wanted to hear," said Bull, and he flipped back the lapel of his coat to display a metal badge beneath it. "We're here to help him."

The head-waiter looked at the badge and signed with relief.

"Oh, that's different," he said.

"He'll be glad to see you. He lives at one-twenty-five East Ninety-Fifth Street."

Bull repeated the address in order to memorise it, thanked the man for the information, and went out to the saloon with Whitey.

East Ninety-Fifth Street was reached and the two climbed the carpeted stairs of an apartment-house, walked along a corridor on the third floor and halted in front of a door.

"This is it," said Bull, who had checked a list of tenants in the hall below, and he banged on the door with his fist.

Wagner had entered the flat that was his home only a few minutes before, and was in the living-room with his wife, a fair-haired girl at least ten years his junior. He motioned to her, and she went over to the door but did not open it.

"Who's there?" she called out.

"Come on Wagner, open up!" shouted Bull.

She sped back to her husband, snatching up his hat from a chair on the way.

"Oh, don't let them find you!" she said agitatedly.

"What about you?" asked Wagner. Bull's fist assailed a panel of the door, and Bull's voice rang out impatiently: "Come on, Wagner, make it snappy!"

"They don't want me," said Wagner's wife, and she flung up the bottom sash of a window. "Hurry, Frank!"

Wagner, with the hat in his hand, scrambled out over the sill on to the iron rungs of a fire-escape, and she leaned out to watch him descend to an alleyway at the back of the building.

Bull glared at the closed door.

"They can't pull that stuff on me!" he raged, and tried vainly to burst open the door with his shoulder.

"Listen, Bull," urged Whitey, "go easy."

"Go easy?" scoffed Bull. "Say, what do you guys think you're running, a Sunday-school? You beat it down and cover the back way, Whitey—I'll handle this."

He backed across the corridor with the obvious intention of charging at the door, and Whitey tried to restrain him.

"Wait a minute," he cried. "You can't go burstin' in there like that!"

"There's no harm in tryin'," Bull retorted.

"Well, remember you're doin' it, but you're not raidin' a hop-joint."

Whitey ran off to the stairs, and Bull launched himself at the door. Twice his efforts were unavailing, but at the third attempt the lock gave way with such suddenness that he pitched headlong into the living-room and sprawled upon its carpet.

Mrs. Wagner faced him fiercely as he got to his feet.

"What do you mean by breaking in?" she stormed. "There's nothing here you want!"

"Where's Wagner?" he barked at her.

"I'm sure I don't know."

"Oh yes, you do!" He gripped a soft arm. "Come on, where did he go?"

"I don't know," she shrilled. "He hasn't been here since early this morning."

"Oh, he hasn't, eh?" Bull looked round the room and saw a half-smoked cigar smouldering on the edge of an ash-tray upon a low table. "Do you smoke cigars?"

"None of your business if I do!"

He let go of her arm to fling open the door of a bedroom which he invaded, and from the bedroom he darted across into a tiny kitchen. She was standing motionless where he had left her when he returned to the living-room and noticed the open window, but her hand went to her mouth as he thrust his head out over the sill.

"Oh, you got him out, did you?" he drawled, striding over to her. "You're not as dumb as you look. All right, sister, put your bonnet on!"

"Where are you taking me?" she challenged.

"Canoeing."
 "I won't go!"
 He gripped her arm again.

"Well, if you'd rather go without a hat—"

"Take your hand off me!" she shouted. "I'll call for the police!"

"Who d'you think I am, Kid Galahad?" With his free hand he displayed his badge, and her grey-green eyes widened at sight of it.

"This is a fine way for an officer of the law to act!" she said angrily. "I'll have you discharged for this!"

Bull marched her out from the flat. Other tenants had gathered in the corridor—mostly women—and they followed the detective and his fair captive to the stairs.

The long black saloon was where it had been left, at the kerb, but there was no sign of Whitey. Mrs. Wagner was bundled into the car, and Bull took the wheel beside her and drove off down-town to headquarters.

Whitey, however, had preceded him by a good five minutes, and Whitey was in Inspector Lane's room by the time he was ringing for the lift on the ground floor of the building. Frank Wagner, in a chair at the end of the inspector's desk, was explaining matters.

"I was badly scared, sir," he said. "I thought it was some of Macey's gangsters after me."

"I found him comin' out of the alley-way," Whitey supplemented. "He was scared all right, but I talked him into coming down with me in a taxi."

Lane picked up a pencil and stabbed his blotting-pad with its point.

"Now, Mr. Wagner," he said impressively, "if you can identify the crooks who've been collecting money from your restaurant men you'll be helping us to break up one of the worst rackets in the city."

The door from the outer office was flung wide, and Bull burst into the room with Mrs. Wagner.

"Here you are, chief!" he cried triumphantly.

Frank Wagner jumped up with a startled cry. Lane also rose—and Bull stared at Whitey.

"Oh, so you ran out on me, did you?" he exclaimed.

"You said you'd handle it," Whitey reminded him.

"What's this all about, Bull?" inquired Lane. "Why have you brought this young lady in here?"

"You said you wanted somebody to testify against Macey's mob, didn't you?" Bull pointed a thumb at the girl beside him. "Well, the guy you want is Wagner—and she knows where he is!"

Lane smiled pityingly at the bungler. "This is Mr. Wagner," he said, "right here."

"And this is my wife," said Wagner indignantly.

"It wasn't necessary to bring Mrs. Wagner here," rebuked Lane. "He's the one we wanted to see, not his wife. I'm very sorry this happened. Regan, I think you owe Mrs. Wagner an apology."

"Apology?" echoed Bull. "Me?"

"Certainly. You brought her here against her will."

"I'm sorry, chief. I thought—"

"You should have thought twice!"

Bull, a trifle crestfallen, turned to the girl.

"Sorry," he said. "I'll take you back in a cab."

"Not while I'm conseious you won't!" she blazed at him.

"I'll take you home, dear," said her husband, picking up his hat; but that did not suit Lane at all.

"I'd like to talk to you first, if you don't mind, Mr. Wagner," he said smoothly.

Wagner nodded.

"You go on, then, Gladys," he said. "I'll be home later."

She looked at him in a half-scared fashion, but he assured her that it would be all right, and she turned towards the door. Bull hastened to open it for her—and was rewarded with a look that ought to have killed him on the spot.

Lane moved round his desk to another door.

"Now will you come with me, please?" he said to Wagner. "Bull, that night-watchman job is getting closer every minute!"

Bull flung down a cigarette he had been about to light and ground it beneath his heel.

"An Unusual Exhibit"

WAGNER was conducted by Inspector Lane into a special rogues' gallery on the top floor of the building—a room with a glass roof and consequently brilliantly illuminated. Photographs of members of New York's underworld were attached to movable screens at one end of the room, and at the other there was a narrow opening in the wall.

"Do you recognise any of these faces?" inquired the inspector, as he and Wagner stood before one of the screens.

"I—I can't say anything, inspector," stammered the chop-house proprietor, losing courage as he stared at a picture of Little Joe Macey. "Look what happened to my competitor, Mr. Hartman!"

"If you don't talk," said Lane gravely, "these men will continue to terrorise you until you'll be forced to close up."

"I'm in that fix right now."

"Well, don't let them drive you out—you drive them out. With your help I'll be able to send them all to prison, and you can keep your business."

Wagner gulped and came to a decision.

"All right, Mr. Lane," he said hoarsely, "I'll do it!"

Behind the opening in the wall across the room a man's face appeared, and Lane raised a thumb. But Wagner had not noticed the opening in the wall, and he did not see the signal.

"Now, take a good look at these pictures," said the inspector; and the unwilling witness did so.

"I know these three," he stated after a while. "That's Chivvy Predo. That's Mary turned the pages of a loose-leaf ledger. "These aren't the books Jennings showed me!" she declared.

"She murdered Sturgis that night on the yacht," said the Inspector, "and pushed his body into the river."

"You bet I will. Now that I've made up my mind you don't need to worry about me going back on my story."

There was a burst of laughter in court at that last statement, and then the screen became a white blank, the current was switched off from the projector, and the blinds over the windows of the court-room were raised.

The three re-arrested prisoners scowled across the well of the court at Wagner, and his wife in a seat behind the rail clasped her hands and shivered. The attorney for the defence bounded to his feet.

"Your honour," he cried, "I object to this evidence as hearsay and ask that the jury be instructed to disregard it."

The District Attorney was swift to deal with his opponent.

"Your honour," he thundered, "the attorney for the defence should know that similar evidence has been passed as competent by a higher court."

"That is correct," confirmed the judge. "The evidence is admitted."

"You're marvellous!" Macey snarled at the defeated barrister.

The judge turned to the perjured witness.

"Mr. Wagner," he said, "in view of what you have just seen and heard do you still persist in your denial?"

Mrs. Wagner gnawed her lip while waiting for the answer that was almost inevitable.

"No, sir—I lied."

"Proceed with the witness," directed the judge.

The result of the trial, after that dramatic interlude, was a foregone conclusion, Macey and his two associates were sentenced to from two to five years' imprisonment, and—as one of the evening papers expressed it—"the State won its first victory in a drive to halt terrorists."

Wagner and his wife were rushed out of town by the police to avoid reprisals, and for more than a month no fresh cases of extortion with violence were brought to the notice of the authorities.

In the outer office of Inspector Lane's department one morning Bull sat motionless for nearly five minutes upon the desk of the clerk who dealt with callers, and the clerk, George Harris, began to wish him somewhere else.

"What are you doing?" he finally inquired.

"I'm working," Bull replied.

"Well, you don't look it."

"George," proclaimed Bull, bouncing off the desk, "I've just hit on a whale of an idea. I know somebody who'll put me wise to the head guy of all the rackets."

Harris looked sceptical.

"Who's that?"

"I figure that Little Joe Macey is pretty well fed up with the stretch in the 'pen', and if he figures I can do him some good up there he'll open up and tip me off as to who his bosses are."

"Good idea," approved the clerk. "I bet Lane went for it."

"Lane don't know anything about it," retorted Bull. "I'm gonna surprise him. I'm walking in here in the morning with a list that long of the higher-ups."

The list, according to his extended hands, was to be about a yard in length, but George Harris shook his head.

"I still think you ought to talk it over with the boss," he said.

"I'll talk it over with nobody till I crack these rackets wide open," declared Bull. "See you to-morrow."

Heinie Dowds. And that's Little Joe Macey—he's the leader."

Wagner got home before his wife because a squad car deposited him outside the apartment house, whereas she travelled by subway to the station at East Ninety-Sixth Street and walked the rest of the way.

As she approached the door of the flat a plain-clothes officer jumped up from a chair facing it.

"Just a minute, miss," he said gruffly. "Who did you want to see?"

"I'm Mrs. Wagner," she replied.

"Oh, excuse me. Go right in."

The lock had not yet been repaired. She pushed open the door and entered the living-room to find her husband there in his shirt-sleeves. She closed and bolted the door, and she said to him:

"Oh, Frank, I'm worried."

"Well, nothing can happen to me," he laughed. "They've got police all over the place."

"It isn't now that I'm worried about—it's after the trial."

"After the trial," he exulted, "Little Joe, Macey and his gangsters will be in the penitentiary."

"But there'll still be the heads of the mobs. They're the ones that keep 'phoning me every day, telling me that if—if you talk they'll kill you. Oh, for my sake, Frank, you mustn't testify against them. Promise me you won't!"

Partly as a result of her pleading and partly because he himself was afraid, when Wagner appeared in court to give evidence against the three men who had wrecked Hartman's restaurant and had extorted money from scores of tradesmen, he denied all knowledge of them.

"No," he declared vehemently, "I don't know anything, I tell you! I never identified anybody to Inspector Lane! I don't know who the men were!"

"I see," said the District Attorney, who was appearing in person for the prosecution, and he addressed the judge. "Your honour, this looks like a repetition of the Hartman case, but this time the State is better prepared to handle the situation. I would like to place in evidence now a rather unusual exhibit."

"Proceed," nodded the judge.

Heinie Dowds had come to court armed with peanuts, but he ceased to devour them, and Little Joe Macey and Chivvy Predo turned this way and that as a rolled-up screen, attached to a side wall, was adjusted by one attendant and blinds were drawn down over all the windows of the court by other attendants.

On the table at which the District Attorney had been sitting a portable projector was set up facing the screen, and an operator connected flexes to it. The screen suddenly became illuminated, and on to it came a picture of Lane and Wagner—a talking picture, taken without Wagner's knowledge when they had stood together in front of the portrait gallery of crooks.

Wagner leaned forward in the chair on the witness-stand with a little gasp of dismay as his own voice rang out, seemingly from his pictured self.

"I know these three. That's Chivvy Predo. That's Heinie Dowds. And that's Little Joe Macey—he's the leader."

"And who's Macey working for?" inquired Lane's voice.

"I can't tell you that," came the reply; "but there's a big organisation behind them. He's only the head of the strong-arm mob."

"Haven't you any information at all about this organisation?"

"Nothing. I only know that these three men are the ones who were bleeding Hartman and me."

"Can you prove it?"

"Certainly. I've got a record of every cent I paid out."

"Now, Mr. Wagner, just so there won't be a slip, are you willing to give this evidence before a jury in court?"

Another Blunder!

BULL caught a train from Grand Central Station to Ossining, which is the nearest station to Sing Sing Prison, and after an interview with the warden in the great grey penitentiary, Little Joe Macey was brought to him in a waiting-room by a guard who immediately retired.

Drab prison garb and a hideous peaked cap did not improve the appearance of the little crook.

"Hallo, Macey," said Bull pleasantly.

"What d'you want with me, Regan?" rasped the prisoner.

"Maybe I came up to give you that bust in the nose!"

"Yeah?" The possibility was dismissed with a snuff. "Well, what's on your mind?"

"How do you like this hotel?"

"Rotten!"

"Huh!" Bull tilted his head. "You look as if you've actually been working. Where've they got you?"

"Diggin' a ditch."

In a yard outside the room a convict was cleaning windows. He had seen Macey marched along a corridor past one at which he had been at work, and he had moved along the wall to deal with another. The barred window of the waiting-room was open, and quite a lot of the conversation that followed reached his attentive ears.

"That's pretty tough work on a guy as soft as you," said Bull. "You ought to be able to finagle a better job than that."

"Can you tell me how I can get one?" challenged Macey.

"Can you tell me a lot of things I'd like to know?" countered Bull.

"So that's it! You want me to sing, eh? Well, there's nothin' doing!"

"You know best." Bull fished a packet of cigarettes from his coat pocket. "Have a smoke?"

"Yeah." Macey helped himself greedily and growled his thanks. Bull supplied a light and lit a cigarette for himself.

"S'posin' I did tell you something?" questioned the convict.

"I'd say you were plenty smart. Who are these guys you've been working for?"

"Just like that, eh? D'you think I'm batty? Well, it ain't gonna be that easy, because I don't trust coppers."

"Oh, you don't trust coppers, eh? Well, how's your own mob been treating you since you've been up here? I'll bet you they haven't even sent you a packet of tobacco."

"Haven't even sent me a postcard," confessed Macey, and added bitterly: "The rats!"

"That proves you're a sucker—and it took a copper to wise you up." Bull turned as though to go. "Well, so long, master-mind. You'll learn."

"Wait a minute, Regan," Macey said hastily. "Give me a chance to get in touch with my mouthpiece. I'll see you after that."

"Now," said Bull, "you're talking sense."

He left the prison by no means dissatisfied with the result of the interview; but that night in the mess-hall, just before the whistle of a guard brought the convicts to their feet at the long tables after the time allowed for the evening meal had expired, the "trusty" who had listened outside the window of the waiting room tossed a piece of bread into a garbage can.

At a second blast of the whistle the convicts turned to face the steel gate of the mess-hall, and at a third blast they marched out into a yard. Several trusties remained behind to scrape the leavings from metal plates into garbage cans, and one of these surreptitiously retrieved the piece of bread, broke it open, and found inside it a little rolled-up scrap of paper.

He palmed the scrap of paper, and while scraping another plate over the can contrived to slip it into one of the supports of the galvanised iron handle.

That night the garbage can, in common with about nineteen others, was loaded on to a motor-truck belonging to the Acme Disposal Company, of Tarrytown, a firm that dealt with all the rubbish of the prison under contract.

On an unloading platform in the company's yard the foreman in charge thrust a pencil through the supports of the handles of all the garbage cans, and he found the scrap of paper and unrolled it. On its inner surface was written, in block letters:

"Macey is going to talk."

Next morning the managing director of the Acme Disposal Company, a man named Carl Heffner, travelled down to the city by car, and ascended to the fifteenth floor of an office building in Broadway.

He entered the general office of a stockbroker, and in it he greeted the girl who had rushed out from Hartman's restaurant. She was sitting at a desk with a typewriter in front of her.

"Hallo, Mary," he said. "Sturgis in?"

"Yes, Mr. Heffner," she nodded. "Go right in."

Heffner opened the door of an inner room labelled "Ward Sturgis, Private." At a big desk in the middle of the room the stockbroker was going through some accounts with his middle-aged book-keeper Jennings, and he looked up in surprise.

"Hallo, Carl!" he exclaimed. "What brings you down-town?"

Heffner closed the door and walked over to the desk.

"A note I got from a friend of ours up the Hud-on," he said, and handed over the scrap of paper. "What do you think we ought to do about it?"

Ward Sturgis, a long-necked man with rather a little face, a very little moustache, and a pair of piercing brown eyes, read the message and pocketed the scrap of paper on which it was written.

"I'll communicate with my branch up there," he said, "and they'll sell him out."

"You'll take care of it right away?" inquired Heffner.

"Right away."

"Thank you, Ward. See you at the club."

"Okay."

The visitor departed, and Ward Sturgis looked up at his book-keeper.

"Er—a friend of mine's over-extended in steel," he said, "and I'll have to sell him out. You needn't record the transaction, and I'll handle it personally."

"Don't let them take me!" Mary whispered imploringly. "Don't let them! I'll explain everything to you, Bull. Please!"

In the exercise yard at Sing Sing, in the afternoon of the following day, Little Joe Macey was lounging against a high wall, on the top of which an armed guard was stationed, when abruptly a fight broke out between several convicts within a few feet of him.

From all directions guards rushed towards the scene of combat, shouting to the offenders to "break it up," and hostilities ceased. But Little Joe Macey was lying on his face on the concrete, although he had taken no part in the affray, and the guard who stooped over him blew his whistle. The diminutive crook had been stabbed to death.

Bull, on arriving at police headquarters next morning, was summoned to Inspector Lane's room, and the inspector glared at him as he entered it. "You pulled a real boner this time!" he said scathingly. "I told you when you started to work for this department that I made the decisions. Didn't you realise that you'd be spotted, barging in like that to talk to Macey?"

"How was I to know they'd knock him over right in stir?" wailed Bull.

"No, I don't suppose you would think of such a possibility, but we did. We were going to do in a careful way what you've bungled. We'd have got to Macey without the underworld knowing it."

Bull sighed.

"I'm sorry, Chief," he muttered.

"All right," Lane stabbed a finger in his direction. "But remember, one more slip like this and you go out of here—and it won't be back to the robbery detail!"

Bull turned dejectedly to the door, but Lane called him back and held out a sheaf of papers.

"Think you can manage it?"

Bull took the papers, bit back a rejoinder he was tempted to make, and went out to the clerk.

On the other side of the low partition several people were waiting to see Lane, or one of his subordinates, and amongst them was the girl who had run out from Hartman's. But Bull flung the papers on George Harris's desk with his back to the partition.

"There you are," he growled.

"What's bunning you?" asked Harris.

"Aw, I work my shirt off around here, and all I get for it is a kick in the pants. That's gratitude for you!"

"How about takin' care of some of these customers?"

Bull did not even look round at the people who were waiting.

"Aw, they don't know anything," he scoffed. "I'll go out and dig up a witness who can tell us something. I'll show Lane!"

"Well, somebody has to talk to all these people here."

"There's only one person I want to talk to—and that's the girl that showed up at Hartman's trial."

He opened the little gate in the partition, and as he did so the girl of whom he had spoken touched him on the arm.

"May I speak to you for a moment, please?" she asked.

Bull did not seem to hear.

"I've got a hunch I could crack this case wide open," he said to Harris, "if I could find that name."

"I said I'd like to speak to you for a moment," insisted the girl at his side.

"Come back later," he growled without even a glance for her. "I got troubles of my own."

"But I've got to talk to somebody!"

"Well," said Harris, "who is it you want to speak to?"

Something vaguely familiar about the voice in which she had uttered those last almost frantic words caused Bull to turn, and his brows went up and his jaw dropped.

"Say, you're the baby I've been looking for!" he ejaculated, and he grabbed hold of her, pulled her inside the gate, and rushed her over to his own desk.

"Sit down!" He dumped her in his own chair. "Now, sister, just who are you?"

"My name's Mary Norton," she replied, "but—"

"Listen," he interrupted, "I saw you coming out of Hartman's restaurant the night they wrecked the joint, and the second time I saw you you were hanging around the trial. What's the connection? Come on, let's have it!"

"Why, there isn't any." She shook her head and her golden curls with it. "I just happened to be in the restaurant, that night, and I went to the trial because I wanted to see what they would do with those gangsters."

"Then why did you put that burst o' speed on when you saw me?"

"Well, I thought you might call me as a witness, and I didn't want to get involved. I was afraid."

"I see," he grinned. "Just another phoney lead. All right, beat it—I thought you knew something."

"I do know something," she returned quietly and without budging. "I know the man who's head of all the rackets in town."

His eyes bulged in their sockets and he gripped her arm in a fashion that hurt.

"Say that again!" he exploded.

"I said that I know the man who's head of all the rackets."

"Well, why didn't you say that in the first place?" He jerked her up from the chair and rushed her across to Lane's room.

Mary Explains

INSPECTOR LANE listened incredulously to Bull's blurted repetition of what Mary Norton so quietly had stated. He made a note of her name and address, and he studied her intently as Bull pushed her into a chair at the end of the desk and stood behind her.

"Is this true, Miss Norton?" he questioned.

"Yes," she assured him. "I know that there's just one man running all these rackets."

"Well, that's more than we know." He leaned towards her. "And you know who this man is?"

"Ward Sturgis," she replied.

He repeated the name and wrote it down upon a pad beneath her own name.

"He's a stockbroker," she said. "I didn't know till yesterday that that's just a front."

"How did you find that out?" asked Lane.

"I'm his secretary. He also had a bookkeeper named Jennings. A few days ago the bookkeeper was checking over some accounts with Mr. Sturgis when a man named Heffner came in and handed him a note. Sturgis read it and said to Heffner, 'I'll notify my branch up there and sell him out.'"

"Did either you or Jennings see that note?"

"Yes, Jennings got a glimpse of it while Sturgis was reading it. It wasn't about a transaction at all, but something about Macey."

The inspector's hazel eyes widened.

"Oh, so that's it!" he remarked grimly.

"Jennings didn't know anything more about it," Mary Norton continued, "until he saw it in the paper that Macey had been killed. Then he told me about Heffner delivering the note. The books at the office showed that Sturgis had been paying out thousands of dollars to this Heffner, and so the whole thing became clear to us."

"If what you've told us is true, Miss Norton," said Lane, "Ward Sturgis is the man we're looking for—the head of the whole system."

"And Heffner is his right-hand man," Bull added brightly.

"That's what Jennings and I thought," said Mary. "We knew Sturgis was planning to close the office and go to South America, and then we understood why. Your investigation was getting too hot for him."

"Why didn't Jennings come to us with that dope?" inquired Bull.

"He intended to—and I believe Sturgis suspected what he was going to do. Sturgis owns a yacht. He said he was going to sell it, and he asked Jennings and me to go aboard and take inventory. I was reluctant to do it, but Jennings thought we should—to avoid suspicion."

She paused to draw a long breath.

"I reached the yacht about an hour later than our appointment, and I found the cabin all upset as if there'd been a fight."

She opened a handbag that was on her lap and she took out from it a formidable automatic of blue steel.

"This pistol was lying on the table. I accused Sturgis of murdering Jennings, and he made a rush for me—said I'd never live to squawk to the police. I was terribly frightened, but I grabbed the gun and managed to hold him off with it and get ashore. I was so scared and excited that I hid out in an hotel till this morning."

The inspector motioned to her to lay the automatic on his desk.

"You say Sturgis intended to go to South America?"

"Yes," she confirmed. "He has interests down there. Maybe he's left already."

"I'll find out."

By means of a dietograph the inspector directed Harris to put an immediate check on all South American boat lines. "I want to pick up a man named Ward Sturgis," he said. "I'll have his description for you in a moment."

The description was provided, and Mary and Bull remained in the room while members of the staff outside it became busy telephoning to shipping offices, and to ships bound for South America which had already left New York Harbour.

Reports came in thick and fast, and in less than twenty minutes the inspector was able to say with confidence:

"Well, he hasn't pulled out yet!"

"That's swell!" exclaimed Bull. "Maybe I can grab him before he skips out o' town."

"Not you, Bull," barked Lane. "Send in Whitey."

"Oh, but Chief," protested Bull plaintively, "I've been in on this case from the beginning. I was the guy that first rounded up Macey. I dug up Wagner for you. And then, because I trip a couple o' times—"

Mary Norton turned her back on them and peered out at a window between the slats of a Venetian blind. The inspector caressed his chin and frowned.

"I don't know, Bull," he said. "I'm afraid I can't let you handle this."

"Aw, Chief, gimme a break," pleaded Bull. "If I flop this time you can kick me out as hard as you like—and I'll take it."

"All right," Lane waved a hand. "Take Miss Norton and see what you can find on that yacht."

"Okay, chief." Delightfully Bull

"What is this?" asked Sturgis in a strained voice. "Why did you call those men?"

slipped his arm through Mary's. "Come on, beautiful!"

"And when you get through," added the inspector, "meet me at Sturgis's office."

"I'll be there," promised the ecstatic young man, and he swept Mary out at the door.

The yacht was moored off a slipway on the East River, and within an hour the detective and the girl were in its main cabin. But the cabin was perfectly tidy, and Bull said disappointedly:

"Doesn't look like anybody's been on board for days!"

"Last night," declared Mary, "this cabin was a wreck. Sturgis was pulling papers out of that desk—and there's where the gun was lying."

Bull opened the door of a little cupboard set in the end of the desk and found glasses, a syphon, and a whisky bottle on the shelves. The glasses were clean, but the syphon was half-empty, and the bottle was not full.

"I rushed here to pick up the gun," she demonstrated.

Bull closed the door of the cupboard and stood gazing at her with appreciative eyes.

"Say, do you like spaghetti?" he asked all of a sudden.

"Yes," she replied, "but what's that got to do with it?"

"Just that you've got a dinner date with me to-night, after we get through at Sturgis's office. Come on, beautiful!"

They left the yacht, and from the waterfront they took a taxi-cab to the building on Broadway. A plain-clothes man was on guard in the corridor outside the stockbroker's office, and another plain-clothes man was sitting on the desk that had been Mary's. In the inner-room an official auditor was at Sturgis's desk, going through the books of the firm, and Inspector Lane was watching him.

Bull was motioned to silence, as he entered with Mary, and for a while the only sound in the room was the ticking of a clock. Then the auditor looked up at Lane.

"There's nothing wrong with these accounts, inspector," he said.

"Let me see those books." Mary turned the pages of a loose-leaf ledger with a gloved hand. "These aren't the ones Jennings showed me!" she declared.

"Dummies, eh?" suggested Bull.

"Are you sure?" demanded Lane.

"I'm positive!"

"All right, Harry," Lane said to the auditor, "skip it, and check the files in the outer office." He turned to Mary.

"Well, Miss Norton, it looks as though your employer hasn't left very much to work on."

"But what I told you was the truth, inspector," she averred.

"We'll get to the bottom of it some way. Meanwhile, keep in close touch with Detective Regan."

"I'll see to that," said Bull.

"Check the passenger lists of all planes leaving the Metropolitan area. Bull, and see that all the airports are covered."

Bull stared.

"Do you think he might grab a plane to-night?" he asked rather bleakly.

"He might. On the other hand, he might prefer to keep in hiding for a few days."

Bull slipped his arm through Mary's. "Come on, beautiful," he said. "We start haunting the airports."

He had reached the outer door with her when Lane called him back.

"I want you to keep close tabs on that girl," he said. "There's something queer about this set-up."

"Yeah, but she's on the level," returned Bull confidently.

"You seem to be taking rather a personal interest in this case," Lane said with a twinkle in his eyes. "Oh, well, I suppose I would, too, if I were twenty years younger."

"I'll ask her if she's got a grandmother!"

"Wanted for Murder!"

THE haunting of the airports proved a tedious business, but the tedium was lightened by intervals for meals between the departure of machines and after the last nocturnal flyer had soared into the darkness of the sky.

Each day Bull and Mary spent at a different airport, operatives from Lane's department covering the others, but the vigil was in vain, and after the last machine had taken off from the flying field at Newark on the third night Bull said disconsolately to his fair companion:

"Well, that's another blank! Three nights in a row, and what's it got us?"

"Nothing," replied Mary.

"Well, I wouldn't say nothing. D'you like onions?"

"I'm not hungry."

He offered his arm.

"Now, listen," he commanded. "I'm only trying to put some food into you. You're tired, and it'll make you feel better."

She accepted the arm, and they had supper together in a little restaurant before they returned to New York. He took her home to her furnished flat on the tenth floor of an apartment-house in East Sixty-Sixth Street, ascended with her in a self-working lift, and stood beside her while she opened the door of the flat.

"How about having breakfast with me in the morning?" he suggested.

"Aren't you tired of seeing me day after day?" she inquired.

"I'm standing it pretty well. How about you?"

"Oh, I'm doing all right," she laughed, "but I can't expect you to make a career out of me."

"Well, there's no harm in trying."

Having opened the door, she switched on the lights in a small but snug living-room and bade him good-night, but he followed her into the room.

"You know, Mary," he said, as she took off her hat and a light grey tweed coat, "if it wasn't for our professional pride in this case I'd hope we never find this guy Sturgis."

"Why?" she questioned.

"Cause when we do, the only time I'll be able to see you is when I'm off duty. Say, you're not tied up with any other guy, are you?"

"Why, no," she admitted, and he heaved a sigh of relief.

"That's all I need to know."

She went back to the door and held it wide.

"Bull, please," she said, "it's awfully late and you'd better go."

"Just to keep the records straight," said he, "we like each other, don't we?"

"Yes," she nodded.

"Well, there you are and here I am. What are we gonna do about it?"

"I don't know."

"Well, I do!" He took her into his arms and kissed her. "Good-night, Beautiful."

"Good-night," she murmured, and he went off whistling a gay little tune.

His happiness, however, was short-lived. Next morning, while he was having breakfast with her in a café, Inspector Lane entered the office of the Chief of Police in response to an urgent telephone message he had received.

The Chief of Police, a burly, middle-aged man named Elmer Davis, had another man with him—a shock-headed man with a ragged moustache, who was wearing a jacket over blue dungarees.

"Good-morning, chief," said Lane.

"Good-morning," returned Davis. "Well, your hunch was right, Lane—we recovered his body from the river this morning. The features are beyond recognition, but the marks on the clothing identify the dead man as Ward Sturgis. Mr. Casey, here, is the night watchman down at the slip. He's the one that reported hearing a shot and seeing a young woman running from the dock with a gun in her hand."

Lane produced from his breast-pocket a portrait of Mary which Emmet White had filched from her flat while she was at one of the airports with Bull.

"Mr. Casey," he said, exhibiting the portrait, "does this look anything like the young lady you saw?"

"Look like her!" exclaimed the night watchman. "It is her! I'd know her in the dark!"

The Chief of Police looked up at Lane.

"Have you the gun the Norton girl turned over to you?" he asked.

"Yes, here it is." Lane opened out a white handkerchief and inside it was the automatic.

"We'll take it to ballistics." The Chief of Police pushed back his chair and rose. "Mr. Casey, will you wait here? I'll want your sworn statement identifying the girl."

"Yes, sir," said the night watchman. "And you can have it."

The dragging of East River, in the region of the yacht, had not escaped the attention of newspaper men, and a special edition of the "Express" was on sale in the streets of the city before the ballistic expert at Police Headquarters had finished with the automatic and a bullet extracted from the head of the dead man.

June 4th, 1938.

"There's no doubt about it," was the expert's verdict, "the bullet that killed Ward Sturgis was fired from that gun!"

"And apparently," commented the Chief of Police, "Mary Norton is the girl who fired it."

"I'm afraid you're right," said Lane. "I'll send Regan over to Homicide and show them where to pick her up."

Bull had to report at headquarters every morning before proceeding to the airport of the day. Having lingered rather too long over breakfast with Mary, he left her outside the café and hurried off down-town—and he did not buy a newspaper.

He entered the big outer office of Lane's department to find the inspector at a tall desk in it, studying a handbill damp from the press.

"Good-morning, chief," he hailed, pushing open the gate in the partition and striding across the room.

"Good-morning," said Lane. "Have you seen this?"

Bull looked down at the handbill, and he gasped audibly as he saw on it a reproduction of Mary's portrait and above it the words: "WANTED FOR MURDER."

"Mary Norton!" he quavered.

"She murdered Sturgis that night on his yacht," said the inspector, "and pushed his body into the river."

Bull gazed at the picture with misty eyes.

"Aw, she couldn't do that!" he declared hoarsely.

"She couldn't? She did! I just got a report from ballistics. The bullet that killed Sturgis was fired from that gun she had. What're you going to do about it?"

Bull's eyes were still on the picture. "I don't know," he muttered.

"She was giving us the run-around, Bull. Everything indicates that Sturgis was a perfectly honest business man. So far as the racketeers are concerned, we're right back where we started from."

"Yeah."

"Well, I guess we'll have to pick her up."

Bull tried not to show too much emotion.

"Listen, inspector," he gulped, "do me a favour, will you? Can't we hold off on this until we're certain?"

Lane shook his head.

"I'm sorry, Bull, but it's out of our hands now. We'll have to turn our information over to the Homicide Squad."

"Oh, but there must be something wrong! How about that book-keeper Jennings? And who's the guy she's looking for if it isn't Sturgis?"

"Probably nobody at all. Turn everything you've got over to Homicide and let them worry about that. You'd better go along with them and show 'em where she is."

Bull gritted his teeth.

"Contact," he said miserably.

Tricked!

THE manager of the apartment-house in East Sixty-Sixth Street accompanied Bull and two plain-clothes men of the Homicide Squad to the front door of Mary's flat.

"Have you got a key?" demanded one of the detectives.

"Yes," said the manager, "but I—"

"Open it!"

The door was opened, and the four streamed into the little living-room. On the table lay a copy of the "Express" with its headlines concerning the discovery of Ward Sturgis' body in the river and the girl with a gun who had been seen by the night watchman; but there was no sign of Mary.

One of the detectives dived into the kitchenette, and one into the bathroom. Bull made straight for the bedroom, looked round it, looked under the bed, and opened the door of a wardrobe cupboard. Mary was crouching inside amongst her own garments, and he seized hold of her arm.

"Don't let them take me!" she whispered imploringly. "Don't let them! I'll explain everything to you, Bull. Please!"

Fear was in her eyes, but he could not read guilt there.

"I'll be back," he whispered; and he closed the door and went out from the bedroom just as the two plain-clothes men were about to invade it.

"Not in there!" he said.

"Well, it's a cinch she's not far away," growled the plain-clothes man who had searched the kitchenette. "I guess we'd better send out a general alarm."

"Yeah," said Bull, "let's get goin'."

The manager, who had remained in the kitchen, led the way along the corridor to the lift, and they all descended to the hallway on the ground floor.

"You two run back to headquarters and send out your alarm," said Bull. "I'm gonna hang around here for a while and try to get a line on her."

The plain-clothes men went off, the manager retreated to his office, and Bull streaked up the stairs because the cage of the lift had shot upwards out of sight.

He was scant of breath when he reached the tenth floor, but he raced along the corridor. The front door of the flat was not quite shut, and he flung it wide and went across the living-room into the bedroom.

"Come on out!" he commanded.

There was no response of any kind from the wardrobe cupboard, and he opened its door—to find nothing inside it but the garments that were hanging from a brass rail and hat-boxes and hats on a shelf.

Back in the living-room he opened the double doors of a pantry, and then he opened a window and looked down a fire-escape outside it. He plunged into the kitchenette and into the bathroom, but the flat was deserted except for himself. He glared at the copy of the "Express" on the table, and he screwed it up in his hands and flung it across the room in a temper.

Nobody in Lane's department saw him again till the following morning, when he walked into the inspector's room and dropped wearily into a chair.

"What's the matter, Bull?" asked the inspector. "You look kind of ragged this morning."

"Did you ever have a dame make a sucker out of you?" howled Bull.

"Believe me, I'll get that little crook! I've seen over a hundred and fifty suspects in the last twenty-four hours. I've been in every precinct in this town. I've seen all the serevy dames that I ever want to see in my life—all except one, Mary Norton! And when I catch up with that double-crossing, two-timing little twist, I'll—"

A telephone-bell broke in upon his fulmination, and he held his peace while Lane dealt with the call.

"Inspector Lane speaking. Where? All right, hold everything just as it is!"

The telephone was replaced, and Lane

(Continued on page 23)

We gotta get handy, too. Right away we see about putting some barbed wire round this joint, and a gate with a lock, and we'll have half a dozen strong-arm guards to keep an eye on us. We're taking no chances."

Doyle was right when he suspected that these crooks would try to make trouble. Ferrari and Nick saw Watson and Parke that night.

"That guy's dynamite," Ferrari rubbed his swollen jaw.

"You were a fool to have made that crack about his wife," Watson muttered savagely.

"Guess she's his weak spot," opined Nick. "But she's in Peru, and that letter—"

"She's his only weak spot," interrupted Watson. "Wait till she gets a load of some of these Press clippings." He picked up a wad from the desk. "Together with her kid's letter. Mus. Duke'll be back here on the double. We'll tie that Harvard Hurricane to an apron-string!"

Susan Makes Plenty of Trouble

A CLOSE watch was kept at the harbour by Ferrari and his gang, so that the moment Susan stepped off the liner she was under observation. She entered a taxi and Ferrari's car pulled out behind the taxi. Ferrari gave Nick a significant glance when the town was left behind and the road taken was in the direction of the hills.

Ferrari knew that Mrs. Foster was dead nuts against boxing, and he guessed that it must have been some sort of money jam that brought Duke back to the game, luckily they did not know the real reason. Evidently Foster had got his wife out to Peru because she would make trouble, but what Ferrari worried about was the effect it was going to have on the ex-champion. Fogs and a breakdown had delayed the liner several days, and the fight for the championship was that night. Time was precious. Just having a slight row with her husband was not going to get Bronski the fight. Ferrari had hoped to do some of his tricks round Lakeside, but the armed guard of ex-pugilists had squashed that idea.

Susan's taxi pulled up at the gate of Lakeside, and after some sort of conference Susan went inside, but the taxi waited. Ferrari decided to wait.

It was Mrs. Foster's passport that had proved to the guard her identity, and, not knowing quite what to do, they let her enter. She walked briskly up the drive, and there was a very determined look on her clear-cut features.

As it was the final day, Duke Foster was not doing too much—Pat did not believe in having a man over-trained. Duke was in a jubilant frame of mind. He was confident that he could win, and if he didn't it would be a grand fight—win or lose, it would be his last. Susan's father had been saved from prison, and had bought some stock or brought off a deal that would mean thousands, so he was all right. Pauline had secured a berth for him in the s.s. Peru that had docked that morning and was sailing the next day at midnight, so that, all being well, he should very soon be on the high seas, speeding to join his wife. Little did he know that his wife had landed from the s.s. Peru and that all she had heard and read about the last few days had concerned the struggle for the world's heavy-weight crown.

Susan arrived on the veranda and her expression was hard. For several years they had rented this beautiful bungalow, and what did it look like now? Nothing but pugs, boxing rings, outdoor gymnasiums and all the repellent things that go with fighting. A door opened and out came a grinning Barney, but that grin went like a flash at sight of Susan,

Susan was about to tell Barney a few things when a small voice called "Daddy," and she gave a gasp of horror at the sight of her son. Jimmy wore a pair of white shorts and boxing gloves. He had been having a scrap with Sammy, the son of the negro second, Snowflake. A lucky poke by Sammy had made Jimmy's nose bleed. To Susan it looked as if the child were bleeding to death.

"My darling!" gasped Susan. "Mommy!" Jimmy rushed into her arms.

"Sweetheart, you're hurt." "Aw, it don't hurt," growled Jimmy. "I just got a bust in the schnozzle, but you oughtta see Sammy, mommy."

What language! She whisked into the house, leaving Barney tongue-tied. "Run upstairs and get dressed!"

The boy heeded no second bidding, and went scampering up the stairs, yelling at the top of his voice:

"Mommy's home, daddy! Mommy's home—"

Pauline was discussing some matter of the publishing business when they heard Jimmy, and they looked at each other in startled amazement. The door of the study opened and there stood Susan.

"Well, I'm home." She tossed a package on to the table. "And here's Clara's novel—finished."

"Why—why, Susan," Duke stuttered, and then, realising it was his wife, held out his arms. "My darling, this is a surprise."

Susan accepted his kiss coldly, and her eyes seemed to bore into his.

"You're—you're going through with this fight, Duke?"

"Yes, dear; you see—"

"Regardless of the promises you made me?"

"You don't understand, Susan," he said as she drew away.

"I'm—I'm willing to," she whispered eagerly.

"I—I can't explain." Unhappily he shuffled his feet and looked away.

"You'll just have to believe me when I say I've got to go through with it."

"I didn't expect this, Duke." Her young face was white, but her eyes seemed to blaze. "You told me you were through with all this, and I believed you. I defended you when my father warned me that you wouldn't keep your promises. I was wrong."

"Don't you touch any of us, you big palooka!" defiantly cried Jimmy.

"You weren't wrong," desperately cried Duke. "I'll keep my promises, dear, after this one fight. It means more than you realise—"

"Well, if it means so much to you —if all this is what you want—you have it now; but you have it alone." Her mouth twisted in an ugly sneer. "You should be very proud of yourself. You have made me look ridiculous. You've gone your own merry way knowing it would wreck our happiness—"

"Susan!"

"You can have your broken-nosed companions, your common friends, your prizefighters, fight fans—"

"Go ahead, sis," encouraged Pauline. "Get it all off your chest. Then we'll sit down and tell you a little story."

"I've listened to all the little stories I'm going to!" Susan cried hysterically. "I'm taking my child and his poor, bloody, little nose out of this environment. Go ahead and have your fight—I hope the acclaim of a million blood-thirsty maniacs compensates you. I'm going back to my father!"

Jimmy, eager to get back to his mother, pulled on a sweater, and without even washing, raced off to find his mother. Susan whisked him up in her arms and dashed out of the house.

Duke made to run after his wife, but Pauline jumped up.

"Take it easy," she cautioned.

"But she's leaving me!" She—

"You couldn't think of anything else but that fight to-night, Duke," Pauline said. "In spite of what sis thinks, I want my brother-in-law to get back his crown. Let father deal with her—he got us all in this mess."

Al Ferrari and Nick saw Susan reappear with the boy. Their glances were full of meaning. There had been a row and Mrs. Foster had gone off with her son. They followed the taxi and they saw the palatial flats that the car stopped outside. Later they found out that Mrs. Foster had gone to 406, the apartments of Arnold Corbin, and that gave Ferrari an idea.

Peters, Arnold Corbin's immaculate butler, was startled when the bell rang and he admitted Mrs. Foster. Then her father came hastening out of a bedroom.

"Susan!"

"Oh, dad, I'm so miserable," sobbed his daughter. "I'm so confused I hardly know what to do."

Jimmy looked gravely up. He could not understand what all this fuss and bother was about. Why was mother in tears?

"You—you found out about Duke fighting?" questioned her father. "Is that why you're back so unexpectedly?"

"Yes, dad—he lied to me—made a fool of me. I—I've left him—I'm through!"

"Grandpa"—Jimmy tugged at his grandfather's sleeve—"can't you fix it so mommy'll stop crying. Did daddy do something wrong?"

"Certainly he didn't, son, because you—" He hesitated. "It is really all grandpa's fault."

It was then that Susan heard the real reason.

"So, you see, his fight to-night saved me from disgrace," added old Corbin. "I might have even gone to prison, Susan. What Duke has done was a great sacrifice for a foolish old man. He didn't want you to know, because he feared it would hurt you."

Peters appeared with a tray.

June 4th, 1933.

"Perhaps a cup of tea, madam?"

"Never mind the tea, Peters!" Susan was on her feet, her face radiant. "Never mind anything except helping me back into a cab with my luggage."

"Two to one we're going back to daddy!" cried Jimmy, still not understanding what all the trouble was about. "Are we, mummy?"

"Yes, darling! Now! As fast as we can get to him."

They were almost ready to leave when the bell rang and Peters answered it. Ferrari and Nick pushed into the room. They closed the door. Corbin paused in the act of putting on his hat to stare at these strangers.

"Never mind the lid," sneered Ferrari. "You ain't going nowhere."

"You've Signed His Death Warrant!"

MRS. FOSTER stared at these two strange men, and a little thrill of fear went through her because their faces were so hard, cold and callous. She knew it was to do with the fight when Ferrari drew out a gun.

"How dare you break into my home like this!" bravely cried Corbin.

"Take it easy, grandpappy," sneered Ferrari, as he pushed the old man into a chair. "You might bust a blood-vessel."

"What do you want?" demanded Susan. "Is this robbery?"

"No, it's a social call."

"Don't you touch any of us, you big palooka!" shrilled Jimmy.

"Jimmy!" Susan cautioned her son.

"We'll have to entertain you folks for a few hours." Ferrari dropped into a chair, whilst Nick lounged near the door. "Just stay put, and nobody'll get hurt."

Jimmy suddenly shot out an accusing finger at Nick.

"Mommy, he's the man who posted my letter to you."

"How ya, kid?" grinned Nick.

"And I remember now, mommy," went on the boy. "The other man's the big daddy punched. Boy, did he stop a beauty?"

"Shut up!" snarled Ferrari.

"You can't scare my dad and you can't scare me!" the boy shouted.

"Yeah, we found that out," Ferrari laughed. "That's why we dropped in on your mother."

"What do you want with me?" Susan asked, tight-lipped.

"Sit tight, lady. You'll find out in just a minute." Ferrari picked up the 'phone and dialed a number. There was an interval of breathless waiting.

"Let me talk to Duke Foster. That you, Foster? Now, get this straight! You're supposed to be a smart guy, so take a dive in the fifth round and make it look good. If you don't you'll find your wife and kid in the East river—on the bottom!"

Ferrari was laughing evilly when he hung up.

"That kinda got him," he gloated. "He may try to trace this call, but as it was a dial call he won't succeed."

A minute later the 'phone rang. Pauline had remembered that Susan had said she was going to her father. Peters made to go to the 'phone, but stopped at sight of Ferrari's gun.

"Answer it!" Ferrari ordered the butler. "But remember Corbin ain't here. Mrs. Foster was here, but she went to an hotel. Any funny answers and you get lead."

Pauline reported to Duke that Susan had been to see her father, but as he was out she had gone with the boy to an hotel. She told him not to worry, and promised to get linked up with every hotel in the city. Duke must go along to the stadium and she would ring him at his dressing-room. A harassed, anxious fighter went off with Doyle to the huge stadium and its terrific mob of fight fans.

Barney was already there, and he told the announcer that if he wanted to say anything it could be that Duke would flatten Bronski in the third round.

It was a strain for Ferrari, waiting for the fight, and after a while he ordered Corbin to switch on the radio.

"It won't be long before the championship fight is on," said an announcer. "It promises to be a real battle. Both men are in the pink of condition and confident of victory. I have here last-minute statements, lot from the dressing-rooms. Duke Foster says he'll flatten Bronski in the third round."

Angrily Ferrari ordered Corbin to switch off the radio. Actually at that moment Duke was begging Pat Doyle to call the fight off, and a triumphant Watson was saying that if he didn't fight the crowd would tear the place down. Pauline had not been able to trace Susan, and Duke was almost frantic. All right, he would go in and throw the fight. But Pat Doyle would have none of it. It was only some cheap chiseller's bluff.

Meantime the quick brain of Susan Foster was busy. She began to talk to Ferrari, and he did not mind telling her that the reason for this hold-up was because an interested party would lose a fortune if Duke won, but Bronski was going to win now.

"He'll go in there and take a hiding because he thinks you're on the spot."

"Duke would if he believed it. You can give orders to some fighters, but not Duke," argued Susan. "He's one of those clean-cut fighters that won't let his public down, and you can't make him. Did he win the championship because you let him? No! Did he give up the championship because you asked him? No! Duke takes orders from nobody but me. You heard the announcer say Duke was going to flatten Bronski in the third." She glared at Ferrari. "And he will!"

Ferrari shifted uncomfortably.

"I told you he wouldn't believe it," went on Susan. "I'm sorry he doesn't. I hate this fight racket. I'd like to see him take a beating—a real thrashing."

"Whatever for?" gasped Nick.

"If he wins that title again there'll be no living with him," Susan spoke viciously. "He wouldn't have dared signed up if I had been here. This victory will smash up everything. I'll not live with a brutal fighting gorilla. I only know that if I could send him into that ring to get beaten to a pulp that the public would kick him out and he'd retire permanently."

Corbin stared at his daughter in horror, whilst Jimmy set up a wail of anguish.

"Mummy, you wouldn't want daddy to lose."

"I do!" blazed Susan, and she looked intently at Ferrari. "I got back to find my son with a bloody nose. Fighting—disgusting! If I could get in touch with him now I'd send him in to take the most unmerciful beating a man ever took. I'd tell him we were never going back to him." She snorted with righteous fury. "I'd smash him!"

"Sister, you're talking sense!" decided Ferrari.

"What's the use of talking?" Susan seemed to go limp. "It's too late now.

(Continued on page 25).

Death in many forms skulked amid the fastness of the African jungle, but no creature of the wilds was more ruthless a killer than the man known as Spider Webb, and it was against this man and his cut-throat gang that an intrepid youth and a beautiful girl pitted themselves. A serial drama of high adventure, starring Frankie Thomas

Read This First

The African river-boat Congo Queen, bound for Ambesi, is carrying a cargo of arms and ammunition destined for the Ivory Patrol, who police the hinterland of Tanganyika. But that cargo never reaches Ambesi, for the ship is seized by a gang of cut-throats in the pay of Spider Webb, a notorious criminal.

Two people escape the massacre which attends the seizure of the craft. One is Tim Tyler, journeying up-country in the hope of tracing his scientist father, Professor Tyler, who has disappeared. The other is a girl who calls herself Lora Lacey, but whose real name is Graham, and who is out to bring Spider Webb to justice, knowing him to be the perpetrator of a diamond robbery for which her brother is unjustly serving a sentence.

Later, from the thickets to which they have taken, Lora and Tim see the crooks transfer the Congo Queen's cargo to a strange armoured car which the boy recognises as a "jungle cruiser" designed by his father.

Webb and his gang afterwards learn that the professor has discovered the whereabouts of a vast treasure of ivory, and the scientist is in their clutches when Lora makes contact with the rascal and pretends to throw in with them.

Actually, she plans to decoy them into an ambushade of Ivory patrolmen commanded by a sergeant named Gates.

Meanwhile, anxious as to the fate of Lora, Tim Tyler is roaming through the jungle in quest for her when he finds himself trapped between a lioness and a leopard. He leaps for the branch of a tree, but the lioness springs on him and brings him down.

Now Read On

The Patrol

EVER afterwards Tim was to carry in his mind a vivid recollection of his feelings as he lay writhing on the ground with that murderous lioness atop of him. Ever afterwards he was to be a prey to memories that would sometimes haunt him in the form of nightmares even while he slept.

A roaring filled his ears, the roaring of the brute which had dragged him down and which was now bent on devouring him. Its hot breath was upon his face and throat, and the slavering drips from its wide jaws fell clamantly upon his skin. In another moment, he believed, those jaws would fasten on his flesh and rend him cruelly, and, horror-stricken at the prospect of so ghastly a fate, he closed his eyes to shut out the sight of the jungle monster's bared teeth.

Yet Tim was not destined to die. Convinced he might be that his hour of doom was at hand, but he was mistaken. For ere his powerful antagonist could sink her fangs into him, she herself was attacked by the dappled, feline creature which had cut off Tim's retreat—the leopard which had issued so unexpectedly from the thickets.

It was through no desire to aid the boy that the leopard assailed the youngster's foe. Apparently the cat-like animal had been sneaking through the undergrowth with the object of seizing Tim itself, and seeing itself in danger of losing its human prey to the lioness, it was only too ready to fight for the spoils of the hunt.

Launching itself forward with the speed of an arrow in flight the leopard landed on its rival's back, and next second both brutes were rolling over and over in the loam of the jungle path, filling the air with the tumultuous quarrel of their snarling voices as they battled for the mastery.

As for Tim, he suddenly found himself in no immediate danger from claw or fang. The lioness was no longer astride him, but was matched in desperate conflict with a traditional enemy of the Bush—and he, Tim, the intended victim for whom the blood-thirsty monsters were waging their combat, was free to take advantage of the situation and make good his escape.

Tim never knew which one of those brutes won the day only to discover that the quarry had vanished. True, the leopard was uppermost when the boy struggled to his feet and beat a retreat, but the lioness appeared to be giving a good account of herself, and whatever the ultimate result of the fight, the clamour of it was audible to Tim for a considerable period as he hurried through the jungle.

He must have covered a mile or so, indeed, before the sounds of the conflict died completely away, and even then he was unable to tell whether the

EPISODE 7—

"The King of the Gorillas" grim tussle between lioness and leopard had ended, or whether he himself had merely travelled beyond ear-shot of it.

At any rate, he kept going forward at unabated pace, and he was turning a bend in the path when to his relief he saw in front of him the horse from which he had been thrown some time previously.

It had come to a halt, and hurrying towards it, Tim set foot in the stirrup and swung himself astride the pony's back. Then as he was settling himself in the saddle his glance fell upon the surface of the jungle track and he discerned the imprints of tyres once more.

They were identical to the imprints he had been examining when the lioness had scared his horse. They were without a doubt the imprints of the armoured car which was in the possession of Spider Webb and his gang, and he was instantly reminded of Lora Graham's disappearance from the camp established by the safari of Jim Conway, that hunter whose services the girl had engaged after her arrival at Ambesi.

It seemed clear to Tim that Lora had been carried off, hustled into the "jungle cruiser" and then driven to Webb's almost impregnable hide-out in the heart of the Ugambi Swamp, and the boy now decided to follow the tyre-marks in the hope that they would lead him to that point in the morass where the secondary trail through the quicksands began—the trail which the outlaws must now of necessity use, since the one formerly employed by them had been destroyed.

If he could find out where that second hidden trail commenced, Tim reflected, he could notify the Ivory Patrol. Then, a watch being kept on the locality, Gates and his detachment might succeed in rounding up the Webb gang the first time Spider and his hirelings came out of the swamp.

Such was the trend of Tim's thoughts as he proceeded to trace the tyre-marks down the moonlit pathway in the Bush, but an hour later his expectation received a severe setback, for he debouched on to a tract of country where the ground was of a sterile character and where the tangled vegetation of the jungle thinned out into meagre patches of scrub.

The imprints Tim had been following petered out on this stretch of terrain, the hard and crusty soil betraying no signs of the armoured car's passage across it. Nevertheless, the youngster started to scour the ground at random on the offchance of obtaining some indication of the route that the "cruiser" had taken after leaving the thickets of the Bush.

He searched far and wide without result, and another hour must have elapsed when he finally resolved to give up his vain quest. And then, even as he was on the point of turning back, he espied a column of khaki-clad horse-men wending their way over the sweep of more or less open country.

He recognised them as Gates and his detail, and he observed that a native was trotting alongside the sergeant's mount—the native who had been despatched by Jim Conway to inform the patrol that nothing was to be gained by lying in wait for Webb at Mafalla Falls.

Digging his heels into his pony's flanks, Jim rode towards the detachment, and a few seconds later he was confronting Gates, who looked at him in surprise.

"Hallo, kid," the sergeant greeted. June 4th, 1935.

"What are you doing away over in this strip? I thought you were in camp with Jim Conway, Lora Graham and that fellow Lazarre who deserted from the Webb gang."

"I was in camp with them," Tim answered. "But Miss Lora is in Spider's clutches by now, unless I'm mistaken."

Gates started at that.

"What do you mean?" he demanded.

"This native told us that Lora's scheme to contact Webb and lead him into our ambush at Mafalla Falls had failed. He gave us to understand that Webb hadn't answered the message that was sent out via the jungle drums."

"That's right," Tim rejoined. "But to-night somebody kidnapped Miss Lora, for one of the natives of the safari discovered that her tent was empty and that the back of it had been ripped wide open by a knife. And I might add that I came across the tracks of the armoured car a mile or two from the encampment. I followed them through the Bush, but I lost them hereabouts."

"If you ask me, sergeant," he added, "Spider Webb was too cunning to answer Lora's drum-message directly and take the risk of walking into a trap. But he had her picked up after nightfall—in his own time and his own way—and instead of coming to her he's had her brought to him."

There was a silence, and then Gates drew his brows together.

"Say," he declared, "if that's the case Lora may still be able to carry out her original plan and get your father to decoy the Webb gang to Mafalla Falls, on the pretext of revealing the whereabouts of the elephants' burial-ground. Why, at this very moment those outlaws may be headed for the Falls—and here's us riding away from them!"

Tim looked at him in a tense fashion. "Gee, I hadn't thought of that, sergeant," he exclaimed. "But you're right, and we've got to make for Mafalla Falls as fast as we can."

The sergeant nodded briskly, then glanced at the native runner who was by his side.

"You go back to Bwana Conway," he instructed. "Tell him we think maybe Spider and his men go to Mafalla Falls after all. You savvy?"

"I savvy," was the negro's response, and in another instant he was breaking into a trot and directing his steps towards the thickets of the jungle, Tim giving him a parting hail and bidding him keep a look-out for a leopard or a lioness.

At the same time Gates gave his men the order to wheel, and presently the troop was spurring over the ground they had already crossed; and Tim made haste to set out after them, intent now on being present at the ambushade in which he hoped that Webb and his hirelings would be captured at last.

Into the Gorilla Country

WHILE Tim Tyler and the men of the Ivory Patrol were galloping in the direction of Mafalla Falls, the jungle cruiser occupied by the Webb gang, Lora Graham and Professor Tyler was approaching that locality from another quarter.

The machine had left the swamp behind it and was in close proximity to the Falls. It was so close to them, indeed, that there was no prospect of the outlaws being ambushed there, since the patrolmen were as yet nowhere in sight.

Standing in the rear portion of the armoured car with Tim's father, Lora was a prey to misgivings on that very question of the ambushade. Knowing as she did that a runner had been sent to recall Sergeant Gates and his detail from the Falls, she had nevertheless anticipated that Webb and his party would make an early start from their lair in the Ugambi Swamp and reach the Mafalla cataract before the patrolmen had been withdrawn from that area. But unfortunately the jungle cruiser had developed engine trouble, and though repairs had been effected, the delay entailed had roused in the girl's mind the fear that her plan would go astray.

She had managed to communicate this fear to Professor Tyler, and thus when the armoured car arrived at the Falls and was brought to a halt there without Gates and his men instantly rushing from cover to surround it, neither Lora nor the scientist experienced any feeling of perplexity or surprise.

The stillness that reigned supreme over the locality only bore out the gloomy forebodings they had secretly shared. The patrol had departed, and the Webb gang was not fated to be taken in ambush.

The brooding thoughts of Tim's father and Lora Graham were interrupted all at once by the gruff voice of Spider Webb, who was grasping the jungle cruiser's steering-wheel, and whose crew of cut-throats were posted at the loopholes of the machine.

"Well, professor," Webb called out, "here we are at Mafalla Falls. Where do we make for now?"

Old man Tyler shot a swift glance at Lora. Then, after a moment's hesitation, he appeared to come to a sudden decision and advanced to where Spider Webb stood.

"Set your course for Kenya Pass," he muttered.

"Kenya Pass, eh?" Webb echoed. "Up in the gorilla country."

"Yes," Professor Tyler rejoined slowly. "Up in the gorilla country."

The gang-leader started the motor of the jungle cruiser again, and the vehicle pulled forward, and gathering speed it had soon left Mafalla Falls well to its rear and was no longer within sight or sound of that landmark when Tim and the stalwarts of the Ivory Patrol arrived there.

For all that, however, Gates was quick to realise that the armoured car had been in the vicinity, for his keen eyes detected traces of oil on the ground—oil which had dripped from some leaking sump or crankcase, he assumed, and which indicated the route taken by the jungle cruiser after its departure from the neighbourhood of the Falls.

With Tim by his side and the troopers behind him, Sergeant Gates proceeded to follow the trail left by that oil. Had he but known it, however, the armoured car was several miles ahead and was travelling at a speed which was equal to that of the fastest horse in his detachment, and it kept up that pace for hour after hour until it hove into view of Kenya Pass.

A sinister detile in a barrier of rocky hills, the pass reached northward, a link between the territories of Tanganyika and Kenya, yet a link which was seldom used because it held an ugly reputation. Men faring between Tanganyika and Kenya preferred to journey by other routes, and the natives in particular were chary of this darkly ominous ravine, for like that other mountain fissure known as Dead Man's Pass, it was said to be the haunt of giant and savage apes.

Spider Webb and his minions were well aware of this, and when they had learned that Kenya Pass was their destination the gang-leader's accomplices had betrayed a certain amount of apprehension, even Garry Drake fidgeting uncomfortably. But Webb himself had revealed no sign of alarm, and if he felt any it was far outweighed by the greed aroused in him as he conjured up a vision of the wealth which he hoped would soon be his.

There was nothing suggestive of nervousness in his manner now when he beheld the pass yawning before him and turned to Professor Tyler.

"Where do we park?" he inquired.

The diminutive scientist was peering through one of the windows of the jungle cruiser, his attention focused on the gap in the hills.

"Drive straight into the pass and keep close to the left-hand wall of it," he said. "I'll tell you when to stop."

Spider Webb obeyed him, and, bowling onward, the armoured car rumbled into the defile and described a somewhat zigzag course through the boulders that littered the bed of the kloof, the craggy cliffs on either hand echoing the throb of its motor.

Halfway along the ravine or kloof, a spring bubbled up amongst the rocks, and it was as the jungle cruiser came abreast of this that Professor Tyler laid a hand on Webb's sleeve.

"Pull up here," he instructed, and in prompt response the gang-leader drew on the brake of the vehicle.

"All right," the scientist remarked, when the machine had been brought to a standstill. "Now follow me."

He made for the door of the armoured car, and at an imperative gesture on the part of Webb one of the crooks opened it. Then, with the professor leading the way, the occupants of the jungle cruiser filed out into the moonlight, Webb's associates wearing an uneasy mien, and Lora seeming far from tranquil as well.

The vehicle had halted within a few yards of the scowling rock-face on the left-hand side of the kloof, and now Lora and the gangsters observed that a narrow ledge of a track wound up the precipice. This Professor Tyler started to ascend, and the other members of the party moved after him.

The track climbed steeply to a height of a hundred feet and then levelled out to a horizontal plane, running like a rough-hewn terrace along the façade of the cliff, and on to this terrace a number of sombre caves looked forth.

Before one of these caves the elderly zoologist paused.

"We go in here," he announced.

The statement caused Webb's hirelings to exchange anxious glances, and Webb himself hung back now, laying a restraining grip on the professor's arm.

"Wait a minute," he growled. "Why do we have to go in here?"

Old man Tyler regarded him calmly.

"It's the only entrance I know to the Burial-Ground of the Elephants," he replied in an even tone.

One of Spider's accomplices addressed the scientist in an inquiring manner. He was the individual known as Brent.

"You mean—the elephants come right up here and go through this cave when they know they're goin' to kick off?" he breathed.

"Yes," Tyler answered. "Some peculiar instinct must show them the way. As you probably know, no elephant that has died of natural causes has ever been found in the jungle. Throughout the ages, they've always come to the burial-ground to end their lives."

A covetous look dawned in the eyes of the man who answered to the name of Brent.

"By thunder," he said, "there must be millions of dollars' worth of ivory tusks in that graveyard then."

"There are," the professor affirmed simply, and then, turning to Webb: "Look out for gorillas," he continued. "They abound in these parts. In fact, the natives taboo Kenya Pass altogether because a lot of men have disappeared in it and have never been heard of again."

Webb inclined his head.

"I know that," he grunted, tugging a revolver from a holster on his hip. "But if we happen to meet up with any of those apes, don't you try an' make a break for it. If you do, my first bullet will drop you, professor. Get that, and get it straight."

The zoologist made no response. His gaze had wandered to the wall of cliff on the other side of the ravine, and suddenly he motioned in that direction; and as Spider Webb and the other members of the party swung round and stared across the defile they detected grotesque figures moving to and fro along a number of ledges on the opposite rock-face—the figures of monstrous gorillas.

"There are the denizens of the pass," Professor Tyler declared. "They appear to be concentrated in full force on the far wall of the kloof, and let's hope they remain there, for they are signally resentful of strangers. I know that from experience."

Webb and his men watched the apes in a kind of awe-struck fascination. So did Lora Graham, and she and the crooks were still peering across the defile at those formidable brutes when all at once she became aware that urgent fingers were plucking at her sleeve.

It was Professor Tyler who was pulling at her, and as she looked quickly at him he beckoned to her, indicating that he wished her to follow him into the cave.

Spider Webb and his associates were all gaping at the other side of the ravine, and it seemed to the professor that while they were thus concentrated upon the activities of the gorillas there he and Lora might well stage a bid for their freedom.

Warily he edged into the cavern in the mouth of which he had paused, and Lora imitated his example. Then, as black darkness closed over them both, the elderly zoologist clutched the girl's hand and broke into a run with her.

Almost in the same instant an outcry went up behind them—an outcry precipitated by Garry Drake, Webb's lieutenant.

"Spider!" Drake ejaculated. "Old Tyler's given us the slip—yeah, and the Lacey girl has beat it, too! I told you she wasn't to be trusted!"

Lora was being dragged sharply to the right by the professor as she heard those words, and, though she could see nothing, she soon guessed that the scientist was guiding her along a branch tunnel. Meanwhile, from the commotion that had succeeded Garry Drake's shouts, it was clear to her that Spider Webb and his gang were swarming into the cave, but it soon became equally evident that the rogues had not noticed the branch tunnel and were blundering straight on into the depths of the main gallery.

As for Professor Tyler, he continued to wend his way along the side tunnel with Lora for a distance of some thirty or forty paces, the speed at which he piloted the girl through the opaque gloom making it plain that he was thoroughly familiar with his surroundings. Then suddenly he drew up with his fair companion, and a moment afterwards Lora heard him strike a match.

The flame of that match disclosed a startling scene to her. In the first place she and the professor were standing in a kind of bottle-neck beyond which the cavern widened out into a roomy chamber equipped with several articles of furniture and a quantity of stores. It was a chamber that was also occupied by two massive boulders, one being situated near the spot where Lora and Tim Tyler's father had checked, the other close to a narrow passage that led off from the far side of the strange vault.

"Gorilla or no gorilla," Webb rasped, "you're headin' into that cave with me, you spineless little weasel."

But the object which caught and held Lora's attention was a huge cage in which a monstrous gorilla was a captive, a gorilla that moved up to the bars of its prison as the flame of the match in the professor's fingers burned brighter.

Old man Tyler smiled dryly as he saw the expression of bewilderment on Lora's face.

"This has been my home these many months," he volunteered. "Here I have lived, studying the ways of the great apes which inhabit these parts. Yes, and they have come to accept my presence in the neighbourhood, so that the natives whose kraals are within sight of these mountains call me the King of the Gorillas."

"You mean you've tamed the apes?" the girl asked incredulously.

The professor shook his head.

"I wouldn't say that," he answered. "They don't molest me, but the majority of them fight shy of me. There is only one that I can claim to have tamed, and he is the one that you see in that cage. He and I understand each other, though I fear he would make short work of a stranger. It is on account of him that the other apes leave me alone. He is my guardian now."

Lora stared at him in silence for a few seconds, and then she glanced back over her shoulder into the darkness of the tunnel along which she and Tim's father had made their way.

"Do you think we're safe here?" she faltered. "Safe from Spider Webb and his gang, I mean?"

"No," the professor told her. "The cave down which Webb and his men have gone is a blind alley. I was lying, of course, when I said it led to the Elephants' Burial-Ground. Those crooks will, therefore, retrace their steps, and without a doubt they'll find their way here. But don't worry, I know how to stop them."

While he had been speaking he had entered his den and had escorted the girl to a table on which a lamp was standing. He lit that lamp now, and, as its beams flooded the rocky vault, he pointed to the massive boulder that was planted near the bottle-neck by which they had entered the chamber.

"I'm going to block up the approach to this lair of mine with that great rock," he informed Lora. "It's a precaution I used to take every night, and by means of that other boulder over there I was in the habit of protecting myself against intrusion from the passage at the far side of the chamber as well. I didn't altogether trust the gorillas, you see, and I had no intention of being caught off my guard by any prowling ape who might take it into his head to attack me."

"We won't concern ourselves with that other boulder now, however," he added. "My purpose is to hold off Webb and his gang so that while they're trying to force their way in here we'll have ample time to make off down the opposite passage. It winds back to the cliff-trail, and we can descend from that trail to the jungle cruiser and effect our escape."

Lora stared at the enormous boulder with which he proposed to keep the Webb gang at bay.
June 4th, 1938.

"You're not trying to tell me that you can shift that huge rock!" she protested.

"Hardly," Professor Tyler said. "Otherwise Spider Webb and his cut-throats would soon heave it out of their path. No, young lady, the gorilla I have tamed and trained is the one who shifts it."

With the words he strode across to the cage in which the ape was lodged, and he was in the act of liberating the animal when Lora gave vent to a terrified exclamation.

"Wait!" she panted. "Isn't that brute liable to attack me?"

"Don't be afraid," the professor answered reassuringly. "He's completely under my control, and he won't attack anyone if I let him know that the person concerned is my friend."

In spite of that statement it was with acute dread that Lora watched him release the gorilla. Then she became aware that he was talking to it in a curious guttural fashion that was unlike any human dialect she had ever heard, and she wondered whether it were possible that this remarkable man whose name was a byword in zoological circles had actually learned how to converse with the apes.

It certainly seemed as if that were the case, for without so much as a glance at Lora the gorilla to whom the professor was speaking shambled over to the ponderous boulder that stood near the bottle-neck whence Tyler and the girl had gained admittance to the rocky vault.

At that same instant a medley of cries came echoing along that tunnel—a medley of cries which warned Lora and the professor that Spider Webb and his hirelings had located the side passage and were hurrying into it.

Old Tyler remained where he was. He was still talking to the gorilla he had tamed, and the immensely powerful creature was now setting its mighty hands upon the boulder. Then, summoning up its giant strength, it commenced to heave at the rock, and slowly but surely the massive stone was rolled into the bottle-neck, obstructing it completely.

It was in position, and Tyler and Lora were hastening from the rocky chamber via the other outlet, when Webb and his accomplices reached the obstacle that had been moved into their path; and as the crooks swarmed close to that obstacle they gained an impression of the fugitives quitting the lamplit vault—saw them momentarily through narrow chinks between the ragged edges of the boulder and the walls of the passage that it blocked.

"There they go!" roared Webb. "And, by thunder, it looks as if the professor has a tame gorilla with him! Come on, get this boulder out of the way!"

Two or three of the gang held burning matches in their hands, but they dropped these and joined the other men in striving to dislodge the huge stone. Yet the combined efforts of the outlaws were unavailing and failed to budge the obstruction, and presently Garry Drake addressed Webb in a breathless tone.

"It's no use, Spider!" he blurted. "Twenty men couldn't shift it!"

Webb gave utterance to a terse response.

"You're right, Garry," he jerked. "Listen, old man Tyler must know of another way out. Turn back and head for the cliff-trail. He may be figuring to work round to it, grab the armoured car and make his getaway. Quick, turn back!"

Thus was the professor's ruse divined by the gang-leader's intuition, and in helter-skelter style the desperadoes retraced their steps to the cliff-trail, where they looked down into the ravine to see the jungle cruiser standing a hundred feet below them—its motor silent, its door wide open as they had left it on filing from the interior of the machine.

"If you were right about Tyler figuring to work round to the cliff-trail, we've beaten him to it, Spider," said Drake. "But maybe you were wrong—just as wrong as you were in falling for that Lacey girl's story. I told you from the start that she was Lora Graham, the sister of that fellow who's doing time on your account down in—"

Webb interrupted him.

"Never mind about that," he snapped. "We're goin' to investigate these other caves that open out on to the trail. Come on, scatter and take a look around them—and if any of you meet up with the professor and the girl, bring down the ape that's with them before you do anything else."

He and his men proceeded to split up and examine the various fissures that yawned in the face of the precipice where the ledge-like trail ran parallel with the ravine-bed a hundred feet beneath, and it fell to the lot of a gangster named Becker to enter the farthest of those caverns—a cavern which was the very one that was linked up with Professor Tyler's strange den, and which provided him with an alternative outlet from his haven.

It was as Becker turned into that cave that he came face to face with Tyler and Lora, and in an instant he was covering them with a revolver, observing as he did so that there was no sign of the gorilla that Webb had seen in their company.

"Hold it!" Becker rapped out. "Stay where you are!"

Confronted by the armed ruffian, menaced by the six-shooter in his fist, the professor and the girl who was with him halted abruptly. Then, still keeping his gun trained upon them, Becker gave vent to a resounding hail.

"This way, Spider!" he shouted. "I've got 'em!"

His voice went echoing about the cliff—was still echoing when Tim's father took a desperate and ill-fated chance, flinging himself forward impetuously in an attempt to close with the outlaw.

Close with him the professor did, and he even managed to seize the scoundrel's wrist, but in that same moment the gun in Becker's hand belched flame and lead, and a bullet ripped into the older man's body.

Perhaps Becker had not intended to shoot, realising, as he must have done, that Webb did not want anything to happen to Tyler until the exact whereabouts of the graveyard of the elephants was revealed. Perhaps it was the sudden grip of the professor's hand on the gangster's that forced the latter's index finger against the trigger of the revolver. In any event the scientist staggered back with a hoarse cry of pain, and next second he was falling to the floor of the cave.

With the smoking six-gun in his grasp, Becker stared at the professor mutely for a brief space. Then he switched his attention on Lora, and it was as he did so that he detected a movement beyond the girl.

All at once, out of the dark depths of the cave, a gigantic form took shape. It was the form of the gorilla that the stricken scientist had tamed, and, its teeth bared in a malignant snarl, its eyes seeming to blaze out of its hirsute, brutish countenance, it bore down on Becker with its tremendous arms reaching out for him vengefully.

A half-stifled scream broke from the lips of the gangster. He tried to discharge his revolver at the oncoming animal, but before he could fire he was caught in the vice-like embrace of those hairy arms and swept off his feet—was lifted on high and carried on to the trail, then hurled far out, to plunge shrieking through mid-air and to crash to his death amid the rocks away below.

Further along the ledge from which he had been flung, Spider Webb and the rest of the gang were now issuing from the other caverns in response to the hail that Becker had raised and the gun-blast that had so closely succeeded it.

It was with feelings of stark horror that they saw their hickless comrade cast to his doom, but Spider for one was quick to recover from the unnerving effect of that spectacle, and he blazed at the gorilla with a Colt forty-five he was carrying.

He missed the ape by inches, and the brute wheeled swiftly and turned back into the cave, passing the cringing figure of Lora and vanishing into the gloom, though whether it penetrated far into the tunnel's interior or lingered just out of sight the girl could not tell. She did observe, however, that in shambling by her its foot came into contact with Becker's gun, which had dropped from that rogue's clasp when he had been seized by the animal.

Lora picked up that weapon, and, standing with her back to the craggy wall of the cave-mouth, she prepared to defend herself—either against Webb and his cut-throats, or against the gorilla if it should reappear and attempt to vent its wrath on her, in some mistaken impression that she had been a party to the wounding of its master.

Meanwhile, Spider Webb was addressing his hirelings.

"Come on," he was saying thickly. "Becker sang out that he'd cornered Tyler and the girl, and we're goin' along to that cave to grab 'em!"

His men wavered, and one of them spoke in a tremulous tone.

"Not me, Spider," he faltered. "Not me. I ain't goin' along there to get what Becker got. You saw what that ape did to him."

Gloating at his craven associate, Webb laid hold of his arm.

"Gorilla or no gorilla," he rasped, "you're headin' into that cave with me, you spineless little weasel. And that goes for the rest of you, too."

He added the last words to his other accomplices, but none of them looked as if they had a mind to obey him, and the situation might have ended in open rebellion on the part of the gangsters if an unexpected diversion had not come about. For at that moment Sergeant Gates and his detail hove into sight, with Tim Tyler riding hard in their midst.

No sooner had they perceived the troopers than Webb and his ruffians made tracks for the bed of the defile, and in a quarter of a minute they were piling into the jungle cruiser, a burst of gunplay from the approaching patrolmen harrying them as they scrambled through the doorway of the contraption.

The machine lurched forward as the last of the rogues entered it, and it rapidly gathered speed—was seventy yards farther down the ravine when the troopers swept over the spot where the crooks had boarded it—and then, as Tim Tyler and the mounted police officers were charging past the spring near which the armoured car had stood, they heard a voice calling to them from above.

They looked up and saw a girl on the cliff-trail from which Webb and his minions had descended, and Gates let out an exclamation.

"It's Miss Lora!" he said. "Hey, Tim, you get up there and see if she's all right. We'll keep after the jungle cruiser!"

Tim reined in, and, while the troopers forged on in pursuit of the armoured car, he slid from the saddle of his pony and started up the cliff-trail. Nor was it long before he had reached Lora, and as he joined her he caught her by the arm.

"What happened?" he demanded. "Are you okay?"

"Yes, Tim," she said faintly. "I'm—I'm okay. But your father—he's in that cave there—and he's—he's been shot."

The colour waned from the youngster's features, and, running past Lora, he dashed into the fissure she had indicated. A moment later he was beside

"Sneezy" game—and you'll like it!

... when you're playing SNOW WHITE, the grand new card game founded on Walt Disney's great film success.

By permission Walt Disney-Mickey Mouse Ltd.

Pepys Series

Every good Stationer and Store sells "SNOW WHITE."

SNOW WHITE AND THE SEVEN DWARFS

BUY YOUR PACK TODAY 1/6

his father, and as he stared at him, lying there in an inert heap, a wordless cry of anguish escaped him, for it seemed to him that the old man was dead.

Trembling with emotion, he began to sink to his knees, stretching out his hand to feel his father's heart as he knelt. Yet before he could lay a finger on the huddled body of the scientist a heavy, shuffling tread became audible to him, and all of a sudden a gigantic figure loomed out of the darkness of the cavern's interior.

It was the figure of the gorilla that had dashed Becker to his death, and with a deep-throated growl it fastened its great paws on Tim. Then, swinging the youth on high, it advanced towards the cliff-trail with him, intent on seiving him as it had served the professor's assassin!

(To be continued in another dramatic episode next week. A New Universal Picture, controlled throughout the United Kingdom and Eire by General Film Distributors, Ltd., starring Frankie Thomas.)

"MISSING WITNESSES"

(Continued from page 12)

looked at Bull with a callous expression on his face.

"This may be the answer, young fellow," he said. "They've just found some woman's clothing on one of the Hoboken ferries—a hat, coat and hand-bag."

Bull's jaw dropped and his face paled.

"You mean she's jumped in the river?" he gasped.

"Quite possibly. You'd better get up there right away." The inspector rose and snatched his hat from a peg. "Come on, I'll go with you."

A squad car conveyed them to the ferry office on the New York side of the Hudson River, and inside it Lane greeted a patrolman who had telephoned him and questioned the short and thick-set officer on whose ferry-boat a tweed coat, a black felt hat, and a black handbag had been found.

"Well, you see," said the officer. "I was comin' ashore last night after my last trip when I saw this stuff lyin' on the deck near the rail, and I—"

"Yes, yes," interrupted Lane. "but did anyone on the boat see the woman who wore these things?"

"Not that I know of," was the reply, "but—"

"They're Mary's, all right," intervened Bull, who had been examining the articles laid out on a desk. "I remember this bag—and this hat."

"Are you sure?" barked Lane.

"Absolutely!"

"All right," Lane turned to the patrolman. "Take charge of this stuff, will you, Ryan?"

On the way back in the car Bull was silent for quite a while.

"That dame's too smart to jump in the river!" he suddenly blurted. "Leavin' that coat and bag was just an act!"

Lane gazed at him sharply.

"You think so?"

"Sure! I've got a hunch she's not very far away, and I'll find her if you let me do what I want to."

"What's that?"

"Announce that we've captured Mary Norton."

"What?" The inspector looked puzzled.

"Yeah—so we can have a reception party at Grand Central Station. She's bound to turn up to see who we've got!"

Lane considered the idea and decided that it was worth trying, and next morning all the New York papers announced that Mary Norton had been captured and that the police were bringing her back from Buffalo to face a murder charge by the train that was due to arrive at Grand Central Station at ten o'clock.

Long before that hour a crowd of curious people—mostly females—thronged the station, and a plain-clothes man who hung about round the bookstall with Bull became annoyed because they kept getting in the way. "Saps!" he snorted. "I'll serve 'em right when they find they've come for nothin'!"

"Maybe we have, too," said Bull. "What time is it?"

The detective looked at his watch.

"Just after ten."

A few moments later the gates leading to Platform 22 were opened and the crowd surged towards them. Railway policemen forced a way for passengers from the Buffalo train, and presently a tall plain-clothes officer appeared with a girl in handcuffs—a girl who bore no resemblance whatever to Mary.

"Here comes our Mary Norton," said Bull excitedly. "Now watch close for the real one."

The crowd milled about the station trying to get a good look at the supposed prisoner as she was marched slowly towards an exit, and many times Bull's companion thrust people aside.

"'Fraid it's a cold scent," mourned Bull, after the "prisoner" had disappeared; and then suddenly over a woman's shoulder he caught sight of Mary herself in a check coat near the destination board.

"No, it worked!" he cried, and dodging round the woman he scurried across to Mary and seized her by the arm.

"Come on, you!" he roared.

"Bull!" she gasped.

Starting women began to gather round them and the plain-clothes man arrived.

"You beat it back and tell the inspector I've got her," directed Bull, propelling Mary towards a door marked "Private."

"Are you goin' now?" inquired the surprised officer.

"Not till I talk to this dame! There's a couple o' things I want to settle."

"Take it easy on the rough stuff, Bull," urged the detective.

"Beat it!"

Mary was bundled into a plainly furnished room to which defrauding passengers were sometimes conducted when caught, and Bull pushed her down into a chair and stood over her.

"You double-crossing little cheat!" he bellowed at her.

"No, I'm not," she protested. "Please believe me."

"Believe you, huh? Everything you told me I believed, and I'd have given you anything in the world. You know that!"

"Yes, Bull," she nodded. "I know."

"That night we were together you said you liked me—and the next day you let me risk my job to save you. Then you lammed out on me, leaving me holdin' the bag. What is it, a game? Come on, talk!"

She leaned back in the chair to look up into his face.

"You came to arrest me for a murder I didn't commit," she said quietly. "I didn't want you to turn me in while there was still a chance of proving it. That's why I ran away. Won't you believe me?"

"Why should I?" he retorted. "How about that gat you handed us? It's the one that did the job."

"It was Sturgis' own gun, I tell you. I never fired it. But someone saw me running across the dock with the gun in my hand the night Sturgis disappeared."

"Then if it wasn't you," challenged Bull, "who did murder Sturgis?"

"Sturgis isn't dead!"

"What?" he howled.

"The dead man they found was Jennings."

"Now listen, don't—"

"When I read the papers I realised what Sturgis had done. He killed Jennings, dressed the body in his own clothes, and threw it in the water."

"Say," exploded Bull scornfully, "have you been kickin' the Gong around?"

"You must believe me, Bull!" she cried. "You must! Don't you see?"

June 4th, 1935.

Sturgis made it appear he'd been murdered so that it would look like a closed case when the police finally got a line on him. He'd cut himself off from his underworld associates—probably double-crossed them. They'd think he was dead, and he could slip away to South America."

It sounded feasible, and Bull was impressed.

"Well," he said less fiercely, "why didn't you tell me that instead of runnin' out on me?"

"You wouldn't have believed me. I knew the only chance to clear myself was to find Sturgis and prove the body they found was not his. But I couldn't let another girl suffer for me."

"She isn't suffering any—that was a plant. Come on down to headquarters and tell it to the Homicide Squad."

She rose obediently, and he caught hold of her left wrist and tugged her towards the door.

The End of the Trail

WARD STURGIS, very much alive, had entered the booking-hall of Grand Central Station a few minutes before. He went to one of the windows and he said to the clerk behind it:

"Ticket and drawing-room on the next train to Miami."

"Yes, sir." The clerk provided the necessary slips of paper and received payment. "It leaves at three-forty this afternoon," he said as he supplied some change.

"I suppose I'm too late to see them bring in that—er—Mary Norton?" questioned the crook.

"Yes," the booking-clerk replied. "She was taken away several minutes ago."

"Oh, that's too bad." Sturgis walked out from the booking-hall into the station yard, where a porter summoned a taxicab for him.

He was waiting for it to arrive when Bull and Mary emerged from the building, and Mary caught sight of him.

"Look!" she shrieked. "That man!" Bull stared in the direction she indicated.

"What about him?"

"That's Ward Sturgis! Don't let him get away!"

"All right," said Bull, "but you're coming with me."

The taxicab had arrived and Sturgis had got into it. Bull rushed Mary across the yard to another one, heaved her up into it and flung himself down beside her.

"Tail that cab!" he shouted to the driver, pointing to the vehicle in which Sturgis was being swept out into Lexington Avenue.

The driver nodded, and a pursuit began which led west on Forty-Second Street and south on Fifth Avenue. Several times the leading cab was nearly lost to sight amongst the stream of traffic, and where Broadway crosses Fifth Avenue Bull was afraid his driver would not beat the lights.

"Come on, come on!" he bellowed. "Step on it, will you?"

The lights were beaten, the distance between the two cabs was lessened, and the driver braked hurriedly as the one in front swerved inwards to a kerb opposite a white-walled hotel.

Ward Sturgis alighted, paid his driver, and entered the building.

"Bull, be careful," said Mary agitatedly, as Bull opened the door on his right. "He's apt to start shootin'!"

"Don't worry about that," snapped

Bull. "Can I trust you to stay here and wait for me?"

"Yes," she replied.

"All right, you hold the cab." He jumped down on to the pavement. "Now be on the level with me for once."

There was no sign of Sturgis in the lobby or the lounge, so Bull made straight for the counter of the office.

"Where did that guy go that just came in here?" he demanded of the clerk. "Brown suit, black moustache, tall."

"You mean Mr. Hayes?" inquired the clerk.

"I don't know what his name is. Does he live here?"

"Well, yes." The clerk turned to a telephone switchboard. "Who's calling?"

"Never mind that stuff!" rapped Bull. "I'll announce myself. What's his number?"

"Two-o-nine, third floor."

Bull ran to the stairs, climbed them swiftly to the third floor, and reached a door numbered 209. He whipped out a gun, and with his left hand opened the door; and Ward Sturgis swung round from a bed upon which he was packing a suitcase.

"Don't reach for anything!" blared Bull. "I want to see you, mister!"

Sturgis scowled.

"This won't do you any good," he said. "I haven't any money."

"I'm not after dough," snapped Bull.

"Well, then, what do you want?"

"You'll find out when I get down to the Special Prosecutor's office!"

Sturgis picked up a folded shirt and placed it in the suitcase.

"I'm afraid you're making a mistake," he said. "Whom are you looking for?"

"A guy named Ward Sturgis."

"Well, aren't you a little late? I read about a man of that name being murdered."

"Yeah, but you can't believe everything you read."

Sturgis shrugged.

"Well, my friend," he said with an air of impatience, "my name isn't Sturgis. I'm a respectable citizen."

He turned towards a little bureau, but Bull promptly swung him round.

"Well, there's one way of finding out." Bull slipped the gun into his pocket and gripped the crook by the sleeve. "There's a girl downstairs who can identify you. Come on!"

Sturgis offered no resistance, but on the stairs he said warningly:

"You know I can collect damages for false arrest?"

"There's no harm in tryin'," retorted Bull.

The lobby was reached, and they stepped out from the hotel on to the pavement. Two taxi-cabs were at the kerb, but passengers were getting out from them, and the one Bull had left was there no longer. He stared blankly at the spot where it had been, and Sturgis did not fail to notice his consternation.

"Well, where's your girl?" he scoffed.

"That's what I'd like to know!" snorted Bull.

"Then perhaps you'll let me go about my business?"

"Yeah? Well, I'm gonna take you down anyway? Get in there!"

Sturgis protested, but he was made to enter a cab which was about to move away from the hotel, and Bull followed him.

"Police Headquarters," he said to the driver, displaying his badge, "and step on it!"

Half an hour after leaving the hotel behind, Bull marched his captive across the big outer office of Inspector Lane's department and into Lane's room.

The inspector looked up from his desk, but Bull had eyes only for the girl who was sitting in a chair to the left of it—for the girl was Mary.

"Why didn't you wait for me?" he blared at her.

"I thought you were in trouble," she replied, "so I took the cab to look for a policeman. When I came back you'd gone, so I came here."

Bull thrust his captive towards her.

"What about this guy?"

"He's Ward Sturgis!"

Sturgis turned to the inspector as though bewildered.

"Why was I brought here?" he asked.

"Who is this young woman?"

"You know very well who I am!" Mary blazed at him.

"I've never seen her before," Sturgis said to the inspector.

"I'm Mary Norton, if that means anything to you!"

"Mary Norton?" Sturgis looked at her again, his brows raised. "It seems to me I've read something about you, haven't I?"

"I presume you have," said Lane grimly.

"So you prefer to take the word of a murderess against mine?" fumed Sturgis. "Is that the way you do things here?"

"Not at all." The inspector stood up. "There's a possibility of mistaken identity. Just what is your name?"

"Rupert L. Hayes."

"Well, Mr. Hayes, I'm going to ask you to co-operate with us for the sake of justice. Won't you please sit down?"

Sturgis sank into a chair.

"Of course," said the inspector smoothly, "you can prove your statement?"

"Of course."

"We have reason to believe that you're the individual this Special Department was intended to reach—the man who's the head of organised crime in this city."

"That," laughed Sturgis, "is ridiculous. You can't hold me on a charge like that—without proof."

"Well, that's true," Lane admitted quite frankly. "We haven't enough evidence to hold you. However, I'm going to ask you to remain here a little while longer."

"All right," said Sturgis, rather stiffly, "I'll wait."

"Thank you." Lane sat down at his desk again, picked up a pencil, and wrote upon a pad. "Put these calls through right away, will you, Bull?"

He tore off the slip on which he had written, folded it, and gave it to Bull, who went off into the outer office and sat down at his own desk, imagining that he was going to do quite a lot of telephoning. When he opened out the slip, however, what he found on it was this message:

"Come back in ten minutes and say 'yes' to everything I ask you."

For ten minutes by the clock on the wall Bull prowled about the outer office, and then re-entered Lane's room. Sturgis was drumming nervously on the arms of his chair with his fingers; Mary was standing by a window.

"You contacted those parties all right, did you, Bull?" inquired the inspector.

"Yes, I got them," nodded Bull.

"Did you talk to Hefner?"

"Yes."

"The strong-arm boys?"

"Yes, I got them all."

"And they said they'd be on dock?"

"Sure," said Bull. "They said they'd be right down."

"What is this?" asked Sturgis in a strained voice. "Why did you call those men?"

Lane turned to face him.

"There's a rumour going through the underworld," he stated, "about the man who controls the rackets in this city. They say he's double-crossed his friends and pulled out with all the profits. Those calls were to some of his former associates."

Sturgis sprang to his feet, his mouth working.

"What kind of a game are you trying to play?" he cried. "What's all this got to do with me?"

"Nothing," Bull took it upon himself to reply, "except that I told 'em you'd be leaving here in a few minutes—and they're waitin' to see you."

"You told 'em that?" yelled Sturgis.

"Sure."

"If you're an honest business man, as you claim," purred Lane, "that shouldn't disturb you. Bull, show the gentleman to the elevator."

Bull took possession of the crook's arm, and the crook went all to pieces.

"No, no!" he almost screamed. "I can't go out there! Those men are killers! It'd be certain death, and you know it! You've got to keep me here!"

Inspector Lane spread his hands.

"I've got nothing to hold you on," he said. "So far as I'm concerned there's no evidence against you as a racketeer, and you don't know anything about Jennings' murder. No, it's no use."

"What if I admit my connection with Hefner and the others?" quavered Sturgis desperately. "Will you give me protection? I'll turn State's evidence—I'll help you round up the whole gang. Only keep me here!"

"Frankly," said Lane, and his voice was suddenly harsh, "I prefer to save the State the expense of your trial. Get out!"

"No, I can't go out there!" screamed the wretched man. "They'll kill me!"

"And I can't hold you. Bull, take him out!"

"No, wait a minute!" Sturgis wrenched his arm from Bull's grip. "I'll take my chance in court. I killed Jennings. Now—now lock me up where they can't reach me!"

Lane spoke to Harris through the dictograph.

"Send in Whitey," he directed; and Sturgis was huddled in a chair when Emmet White entered the room. "Oh, Whitey, Mr. Sturgis will dictate a confession and sign it; then take him over to the Tombs."

"Okay, chief." The detective helped the quivering prisoner to his feet.

"Come along!"

The door closed upon the pair, and Lane transferred his gaze to Mary.

"I want to thank you for all you've done, Miss Norton," he said appreciatively.

"You're going to be a very important witness for us. I think I'd better provide you with a bodyguard."

"Thank you, chief!" cried Bull, and caught hold of Mary's arm.

"Here we go, beautiful!"

(By permission of

First National Film

Distributors, Ltd.,

starring John Litel,

Dick Purcell, and Jean Dale.)

"THE CALL OF THE RING"

(Continued from page 18)

He'll go in there and knock Bronski out in the third as he said he would."

"Sister, I'm going to give you a chance, but no funny business," said Ferrari, and he dialed a number. "Hallo, National Stadium? Give me Duke Foster's dressing-room. Mrs. Foster calling."

Susan's heart beat as she heard her husband's voice, and she schooled herself to act calmly.

"Duke, I told you not to take this fight," she gritted out. "Now you've been told that if you go through with it that Jimmy and I would be harmed. But, dear, that's not true! We're safe! Go out there and win that fight!"

Ferrari wrenched the 'phone away, his eyes blazing with fury. Almost he shot Susan there and then, but his calculating brain told him that her death would not gain him anything. He pushed Susan on to the settee.

"Don't let 'em outa your sight!" Ferrari ordered, and dashed from the room.

Nick went and sprawled in a chair with a gun on his lap. He leered at Susan evilly.

"Lady, that smart trick just signed Duke's death warrant."

"Where's he going? To stop the fight?" questioned Susan.

"No, he's going to stop Duke!" Nick held up his gun.

"You couldn't! You wouldn't dare!" cried Susan. "Don't you see even then you wouldn't win?"

Nick smiled.

"No, but we don't lose."

Jimmy to the Rescue

SUSAN thought quickly. She had saved the fight, but got her husband and all of them into terrible danger. This crook did not look as clever as Ferrari—could she bluff him? She racked her brains, and suddenly she had a daring idea.

Susan got up and said that if Nick had no objection she would put her son to bed. Jimmy wanted to stop and hear about daddy knocking out Bronski, but Susan was insistent. Nick said he'd come along with them.

"There's only one way to enter this apartment—through the front door," Susan said contemptuously. "We can't escape even if we tried."

But as she went with her father and sonny she whispered to Peters to get Nick a drink. Brandy might dull the man's wits. She put Jimmy to bed, but is YOURS—ABSOLUTELY FREE!

(Continued on page 28)

THIS SUPER BOX CAMERA

WITH FILM AND FULL INSTRUCTIONS.

To popularise our 100% Sheffield "Double Life" 3-hole type double-edged razor blades we are giving absolutely FREE with every order for 15 blades for 1/6 post free, this Box Camera with good lens, accurate view-finder, simple time and instantaneous shutter, bratherette finish. Daylight loading. Also film and instructions. Money back if blades are not equal to any 4d. blade obtainable. Send P.O. 1/6 only (stamps not accepted) for blades and FREE Camera and film. Nothing more to pay.

AIRCRAFT PRODUCTS, LTD., Dept. A.P.F.C.I., 91, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.1.

Phone TEM. 6559

THE GREAT ARMAMENTS RACE

MORE Prize News for you, pals! We're all set for the second month's lap in our Stupendous Stamp-Collecting Race. There are still Ten More "Hercules" Bikes, and 4,000 other super Prizes to be won. They're FREE, too!

Every week in BOY'S CINEMA we are continuing to print free Armaments Stamps—BATTLESHIPS, SEARCHLIGHTS, GUNS, and so on. There are now six different kinds to be collected. Just cut them out and stick to as many others as you can get hold of. And remember, pals, all the stamps you collected last month (except Bombers and Submarines, which we called in) can be used for this month's contest as well.

There are twenty stamps in all on this page, while if you also read other popular boy's papers like "Champion" and "Triumph," you will find more of these stamps in them to help give you a big total.

At the end of June, we shall again ask you how many of one or more kinds of stamps you've collected. Which stamps we shall ask for will be a close secret until then.

So go all out to get as many of these stamps as you can. Get your pals to do it, too—swap stamps with them if you like to make the "race" more exciting for everybody.

At the end of June, another Five Bikes and up to 2,000 of the other tip-top prizes will be given away! The biggest collections of stamps called for will win—and readers will be asked to say which prizes they want, too!

No stamps to be sent in yet—we will tell you how and where when the time comes!

OVERSEAS READERS, TOO! Those of you far away—you're in this great scheme also, and special awards will be given for the best collections from overseas readers. There will be a special closing date for you as well, of course!

RULES: Five First Prizes of £4 7s. 6d. "Hercules" Cycles and up to 2,000 other prizes will be awarded in order of merit each month during the contest to the readers declaring and sending the largest collections of the stamps called for. Cash value of any of the first prizes may be divided in case of a tie or ties for such prizes. Ties for any other prizes will be decided by the Editor.

All claims for prizes to be sent on the proper coupon (given at the end of each month); no allowance made for any coupon or stamps mutilated or lost or delayed in the post or otherwise. No correspondence! No one connected with this paper may enter, and the Editor's decision will be final and legally binding throughout.

This offer also appears in "Sports Budget," "Magnet," "Gem," "Modern Boy," "Triumph," "Champion," "Thriller," and "Detective Weekly."

"THE CALL OF THE RING"

(Continued from page 25)

in his clothes, and then she whispered in her son's ear what she wanted him to do when the chance came. Jimmy understood.

Nick came into the bed-room with a glass in his hand and saw the boy in bed. He was satisfied and went back to his brandy. Then Susan asked her father to go and talk to Nick and to make him sit in a chair so that his back was towards the open door of the lounge, so that he could not see what was going on in the corridor. Arnold Corbin succeeded, and cautiously Susan open the bed-room door. With her son in her arms she darted into the kitchen, and opened the dumb-waiter.

"Jimmy, you know what to do when you get to the basement? Get help for daddy," Jimmy nodded, and she closed the doors. She pressed a button and the lift vanished.

The janitor had his radio switched on and was listening to the fight. An old boxer himself, he was revelling in the contest. Down came the dumb-waiter and he did not hear the doors open. He was sparring around, living again his old fistic combats, when Jimmy's arms went round his neck.

"Stop sparring, mister!" piped Jimmy. "We gotta get a policeman. A man is upstairs with a gun."

"Keep quiet!" roared the exasperated janitor.

"There goes the bell for the second round. They're in the centre of the ring. Duke leads a hard right and hooks on the champion's ribs as they are in close. They separate, and Bronski charges in, but Duke sets him back on his heels with a beautiful straight left. Duke is fighting as if he'd never been out of the ring. His timing is lovely to watch. They're sparring now—Duke looking for an opening. Bronski goes down before a straight left. The champ's up. They're standing toe to toe and slugging it out. What a battle!"

"I want a policeman!" persisted Jimmy. "I want a policeman!"

When the round ended the janitor was able to listen.

"And they're gonna shoot daddy so he won't fight!"

"Your daddy?"

"Yes, Duke Foster. Come on, do something!"

"They can't do that to me!" yelled the janitor, darting to the phone. "I've got ten bucks on him. Gunme police headquarters!"

Within minutes a police car was on the way to the Fifth Avenue apartment, and several other cars were on their way to the fight stadium. Nick was in a very soured condition when the janitor opened the door of the Corbin flat with a pass key, and he gaped as he saw the policeman.

It was at the end of the third round when Al Ferrari got to a reserved seat. Under a newspaper he had his gun ready, but he intended to use the gun only if Bronski were losing.

Ferrari eyed the combatants narrowly. The bull-like Bronski did not look in the best of shape, for one eye seemed to be closing, and there was a trickle of blood at the corner of his mouth. Duke Foster was dancing around and showed no signs of fatigue, nor did he seem to be marked. Bronski's fighting seemed to lack punch, and twice Duke landed heavy blows. Ferrari gradually brought up his gun. Police officers came into the stadium and walked down the gangway, their eyes alert for anyone behaving suspiciously. Big Bill Watson saw them, and wondered what was afoot, and his breath seemed to leave him when he saw Al Ferrari.

In the fifth round there was a flurry of punches, and when they broke away Bronski seemed to be sagging at the knees. He made a last wild rush, and stepping to one side Duke rammed home a blow that made that vast audience gasp. Everyone heard the thud of the glove. The champion spilled to the canvas and lay still.

An excited little man behind Ferrari stood up and looked over the gunman's shoulder. The paper had slipped and the gun was showing. Slowly Ferrari raised his arm.

"He's gotta gun!" screamed the little man. "Help, help!"

He was a brave little man because he grabbed hold of Ferrari's wrist, and by the time the gunman had got his hand free the police were on the spot. As the cursing killer was dragged away he heard the referee declaring Duke Foster the new Heavy-weight Champion of the World.

When the s.s. Peru sailed there were two very happy young people on board. Mr. and Mrs. Duke Foster were going on a second honeymoon.

(By permission of the British Lion Film Company, Ltd., starring Allan Lane as Duke Foster, Heather Angel as Susan and Genevieve Tobin as Pauline.)

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"MISSING WITNESSES."

Inspector Robert L. Lane, John Litel; Detective Bull Regan, Dick Purcell; Mary Norton, Jean Dale; Emmet White, William Haade; Little Joe Macey, Raymond Hatton; Heinie Dows, Louis Natheaux; Joseph Hartman, Michael Mark; Ward Sturgis, Harland Tucker; Frank Wagner, Ben Welden; Gladys Wagner, Sheila Bromley; George Harris, John Harron; Chivvy Predo, Earl Gunn.

"THE CALL OF THE RING."

Duke Foster, Allan Lane; Susan Foster, Heather Angel; Pauline Corbin, Genevieve Tobin; Jimmy Foster, John Russell; Pat Doyle, Joseph Crehan; Arnold Corbin, Frederick Burton; Barney, Ben Welden; Watson, Selmer Jackson; Parke, Clyde Dilsen; Al Ferrari, George Lynn; Nick, Victor Adams; Bronski, Art Lasky.

(Continued from page 2)

Robert Montgomery Can Take a Joke

Robert Montgomery recently proved that he has a sense of humour. He can laugh at himself.

The Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer star has made a collection of jokes, but most of the stories he tells present him as goat instead of hero. He revealed a few of them while resting between scenes.

"There was the time shortly after I had come to Hollywood when I had a day off from screen work. I awakened fairly early, saw the sun shining outside, decided to lay in bed and read a book.

"A knock came at the door and an urgent voice called to me. I told the voice to go away. A little later came another knock, slightly louder. Aroused, I shouted to the person to let me alone. Finally the telephone rang. I answered, and a voice informed me that the house was on fire. It didn't take me long to get up after that.

"On another occasion I was offered a chance of a good part in a motion picture if I could play polo. As I wanted the part, I assured the casting office that I was a five-goal man. They took me at my word, and I went to the polo field, rented horses, a teacher and a mallet. I took a terrible beating for a couple of weeks, skinned my knees and lost all dignity. I learned to play a good enough game to get the part and hold it."

Bob's funniest reminiscence concerns the veteran screen actor who worked with him in his first picture. The veteran kindly explained to the newcomer screen technique as compared to stage technique.

"If there hadn't been 'rushes' I would have been out of pictures before I fairly got started," chuckled Montgomery. "That chap stole every scene in which he appeared with me, made me look terrible. He had told me all the wrong things to do. When I taxed him with it on the set the next day, he informed me that what he had done was for my own good, that I would learn more quickly that way than any other."

Montgomery laughed loudest at jokes on himself.

Bing Crosby's Horses on the Screen

Bing Crosby's horses are to act in the movies.

That is the upshot of a deal closed between the star and Wesley Ruggles, the producer-director, who will use the Crosby stable in racing sequences, "Sing, You Sinners," in which Bing and Fred MacMurray head the cast.

According to the terms of the deal, Bing will put about twenty-five horses at Ruggles' disposal for scenes to be filmed at Santa Anita and the Pomona Fairgrounds, selecting one three-year-old for a "star part," that of "Uncle Dudley," the horse which saves the fortunes of Bing and his family in the picture.

BLUSHING. —FREE to all sufferers, particulars of a proved home treatment that quickly removes all embarrassment and permanently cures blushing and flushing of the face and neck. Enclose stamp to Mr. A. TEMPLE, Specialist, Palace House, 128, Shaftesbury Avenue (2nd Floor), London, W.1. Est. 25 years.

STAMPS

300 DIFFERENT, incl. Airmail, Beautiful, Uncommon Sets, Fictorials, Colonials. Price 6d. (Abroad 1/3).—WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

STAMMERING

Stuttering—Cured, or money back, 5/-, Details free, privately. —SPECIALIST, (A), 28, DEAN ROAD, N.W.2.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS

Printed in England and published every Tuesday by the Proprietors, THE AMALGAMATED PRESS, LTD., The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Advertisement Offices: The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad, 11/- per annum; 5/6 for six months. Sole Agents for Australia and New Zealand: Messrs. Gordon & Gotch, Ltd.; and for South Africa: Central June 4th, 1935. News Agency, Ltd. Registered for transmission to Canada at Magazine Rates. S.G.

Boy's CINEMA

2^D

EVERY TUESDAY
JULY 23rd 1938
N° 971

"MAKING the HEADLINES"

Starring JACK HOLT

A MYSTERY DRAMA OF A STOLEN NECKLACE
AND A HOUSE OF
STRANGE HAPPENINGS

Police-Captain Lewis Nagel is transferred to a little town in which nothing ever happens, and his newspaper reporter chum, Steve Withers, "steals" a girl's necklace in order to make a story. But the necklace is stolen from Steve—and two murders follow. A most unusual thriller, starring Jack Holt Promotion!

IT was evident that the headline across the front page of the "Morning Herald" was obnoxious to Alfred A. Kennedy, Chief of Police. He glared at it, stabbing it with his vision; he gritted his teeth, making a very ugly line of his mouth; and finally he hurled the offending paper from him across the desk at which he was seated.

"Nagel does it again!" he exploded.

The headline consisted only of five words—"Nagel Puts Heat on Gamblers"—and those five words did not seem to justify such violent wrath, especially as they reflected credit on the Police Department. But Lieutenant Lewis Nagel had a way of getting his name into print far too often.

Abruptly the door of the room was opened and McWade, the stocky little District Attorney, walked in at it, his hat upon his head and a half-smoked cigar in his hand. He looked down at the newspaper on the carpet, and he looked at the irate officer who had flung it there.

"About time you woke up, Kennedy," he said, "and called a halt on Nagel's publicity—or cut yourself in on some of it."

"Yeah," fumed the Chief of Police, "first thing I'll know Nagel will be wearing my badge and I'll be on the way out!"

"So would I," returned the District Attorney, "if I let my men worm their way on to every other front page. But not me! As long as I'm the boss I'll take the bows."

He planted a foot on the offending headline and took a puff at the cigar.

"What Nagel really needs," he went on with a twinkle in his grey eyes, "is July 23rd, 1935.

a larger field. One of the suburbs—Fairview, let's say. They've been having a lot of trouble with their goats over there. It seems to me that Nagel's just the man to keep them off the streets."

"It'd be a good move if I could swing it," growled Kennedy.

"That ought to be easy enough. Make him captain of the Fairview precinct."

Kennedy pursed his lips and shook his head.

"I doubt if he'd fall for it, Mac," he said with gloom. "No, I have a hunch he'd resign."

The District Attorney grinned. "What's wrong with a good resignation?" he inquired blandly.

The Chief of Police rubbed his chin, his somewhat heavy features relaxed, and his eyes almost sparkled. He turned to a dictograph and through it spoke to a sergeant in the outer office who acted as his secretary.

"Come in and bring your book right away," he said crisply.

A letter dictated to the sergeant was delivered to Lieutenant Lewis Nagel without any delay whatever, and its contents sent its recipient striding backwards and forwards across the floor of his own room at Headquarters, his lips compressed, his brown eyes frowning.

Lew, as his friends called him, was a man of action and looked it. He was a fine figure of a man, tall, strong, and a born fighter. Fearless himself, he was feared by wrongdoers. His dark brown hair was sleek and brushed well back from a high forehead; his dark brown eyes were almost disconcertingly keen; and as he prowled from desk to window and window back to desk, his mouth was set like a steel trap beneath a mere smear of a moustache.

In the course of his stridings a framed photograph on the wall facing the desk drew his attention and he went over to it. The photograph was of a younger man than himself, whose clean-shaven face suggested a well-developed sense of humour and high spirits—a whimsical face, crowned with wavy brown hair. It was signed "Steve."

Lew eyed the smiling face as though it were the face of an enemy instead of that of his best friend, and he took the frame from its nail, carried it over to the desk and put it away in a drawer.

As he resumed his efforts to wear out a perfectly good carpet, the door from the corridor was opened and Steve Withers, the original of the scorned portrait, stepped breezily into the room. He was a reporter on the "Herald" and he was responsible for the headline. Lew bestowed one swift and by no means cordial glance upon him and reached the window again.

Considerably puzzled by so aloof an attitude, Steve Withers plaintively exclaimed:

"Hi, Lew, give yourself a break and say 'Hallo' to me."

"How are you, Steve?" grunted Lew, mainly over his shoulder.

"Hi, what kind o' talk is that?" protested the visitor. "You know I'm not the kind of a guy who goes around telling people how I am. Say, what's up? Something on your mind?"

"Yeah, plenty!" Lew returned to the desk and snatched up the letter he had received from the Chief of Police. "How's that for a pain in the neck?"

Steve perched on a corner of the desk and proceeded to read the letter aloud:

"In pursuance of my established policy to reward distinguished service, I have, after careful consideration, decided to promote you to the rank of captain. This necessitates transferring you to Department Forty-one in the suburb of Fairview, said transfer to become effective on Wednesday, the twenty-first of this month."

Lew had gone back to the window, his thumbs in the armholes of his waistcoat, and he was glaring out through a pane at nothing in particular.

"Congratulations!" said Steve, dropping the letter.

"Yeah," snorted Lew.

"Boy, will I be waiting to see that first picture of you in a uniform? If there's one thing I really go for in a big way it's uniforms with brass buttons."

The note of raillery was not lost on Lew. He stalked back to his chair and dumped himself in it.

"Lay off!" he snapped. "Fairview! Nothing's happened in that burg since Washington stopped and looked at a potato patch!"

"Yeah," drawled Steve, "and he only stayed eight minutes."

Lew snote the back of one hand against the palm of the other, and his disgust was manifest.

"Last two men Kennedy transferred there," he said, "resigned in less than three months—and the one before that took to checkers and ended by talking to himself!"

"Well," shrugged Steve, "maybe some day you're going to learn to play dumb and keep your face out of the papers. Kennedy likes the front page, too."

"Who's been putting me on the front page?" challenged Lew sourly.

"You asked for it, sailor—I gave it to you. But that's all over now."

Once you hit Fairview you'll be out of the newspapers for the rest of your life."

"You're telling me? The last arrest they made there was a rooster who muscled in on the yard next door! But here's one for your notebook—if Kennedy thinks I'm gonna resign he's in for a long, long wait! One thing about the Nagels, they don't quit under fire!"

A little sigh followed this defiant statement, and in quite a different voice Lew said:

"It's going to be pretty tough leaving the old hang-out—and my friends."

Steve chuckled and folded his arms.

"I didn't ask for a laugh," he commented, "but that certainly is one. Friends! You'll find out how many you have now that you're on the skids!"

"Say, I never thought o' that," gritted Lew, on his feet again and considerably dismayed. "Maybe you're right."

"Sure I'm right." Steve slid off the desk and made for the door. "And I'm no different from all the rest," was his parting shot.

From Headquarters he went straight to the offices of the "Morning Herald," and on the fifteenth floor he invaded the news editor's den.

Hallen Middleton was the news editor's name, and he was a portly and middle-aged person whose temper was uncertain and whose habit of tearing at his hair whenever he lost it had so reduced his thatch that recently he had become alarmed at its scantiness and had taken to having his scalp massaged every morning by a female expert.

When Steve burst in upon him he was enveloped in a big spotted sheet and the woman was at work upon his hair with some soapy but tonic fluid, some of which was trickling down his fat face.

"Hi, sweet child," boomed the intruder, "something terrific's just happened. Kennedy's transferred Lew Nagel over to Fairview!"

"What?" howled Middleton, opening his eyes and closing them again in a hurry because the fluid stung.

"Know what that means, don't you? A bombshell all ready to burst wide open!"

The elderly massense wiped the fat face with a towel and stood aside. The owner of the fat face emitted a scornful noise.

"Nothing ever happens in Fairview but a Fourth of July parade!" he scoffed.

"Oh, yeah?" Steve moved nearer to the sheet-enveloped figure. "Then why is Kennedy sending his ace man over there? It's big, I tell you! Lew tipped me off. Now you put me on a drawing account, and I'll bring you a story that'll boost our circulation five thousand copies a day!"

Middleton had a sort of weakness for Steve, partly on account of his enterprise and efficiency, partly because he had more poise and a more engaging personality than most reporters. But the news editor was not easily to be deceived.

"If you're trying to treat yourself to a vacation," he rapped, "you're only wasting your time."

"All right, all right." Steve whisked up a telephone and stooped over Middleton with it. "If you won't take my word for it, call Kennedy yourself: ask him if he isn't sending Nagel to Fairview."

The news editor eyed the telephone, but his hands and arms were under the sheet.

"Any idea what it is?" he asked.

"Lew wouldn't tell me," fibbed the schemer. "He's bound to secrecy. Well, well, do I grab the scoop of the year, or do we let the opposition beat us to it?"

"Not while I have a hair on my head! Tell Bennett to fix up an expense account."

Steve replaced the telephone and sailed serenely towards the door.

"Sweet child," he said jubilantly, "you'll never know what you've done for me."

Steve made for the door. "And I'm no different from all the rest," was his parting shot.

"What?" bellowed the news editor. "For the newspaper," Steve turned to amend.

The elderly massense resumed her task as soon as the door was closed.

"Mr. Middleton," she said, "a few more treatments and you'll have a nice big crop of hair."

"Yeah," he retorted, "if I buy myself a wig!"

Thanks to Steve

THE town of Fairview, twenty-five miles from the city of Hartford, had its points as a residential district, but its inhabitants were far too law-abiding to provide the police with any real activity. Social functions were numerous enough, but crime did not exist.

The police-station was quite a nice building in Main Street; the charge-room was capable of holding fifty arrested persons simultaneously without any of them crowding against the high desk behind which Sergeant Handley passed most of his official time reading or dozing; the cells were lofty and clean, but untenanted; and Captain Lewis Nagel's own room was large, sunny, and quite well appointed.

Lew looked fine in his brand-new uniform, but after three weeks of almost complete idleness he began to feel that he would go crazy if something didn't happen. He had taken to playing checkers with Steve, and even at that game he was beaten.

One warm and pleasant morning he sent the board and such men as remained on it flying off the end of the desk with an angry sweep of his hand, and he said bitterly to his conqueror:

"Remember me? The name is Nagel—used to be an officer of the law—made an arrest occasionally. Now I can't even keep my king from being trapped! I'm going nuts!"

"Hi, hi!" rebuked Steve. "Why don't you give yourself a break and cool down? You don't hear me cheering about this burg, but even at that there's been something doing."

"Why, sure," scoffed Lew. "that riot call I answered yesterday for two lads stealing a water-melon!"

A little man in a striped suit, white-haired, and wearing pince-nez on a cord, had stepped into the charge-room from the street and approached the massive sergeant without being noticed because the massive sergeant was immersed in a magazine called "Soul Secrets."

"Morning, sergeant," said the little man. "Is Captain Nagel in?"

Sergeant Handley dropped the magazine as though ashamed of having been caught with it and sprang to his feet.

"Why, sure, just come right along," he said in a deep and booming voice; and he went over to Lew's room and rapped on the door.

"Mr. Keer to see you, captain," he announced, after he had been bidden to enter.

"Oh, come right in, Mr. Keer," exclaimed Steve; and then, as the little man swept off his hat and stood bowing in front of the desk: "Captain Nagel, I want you to meet Fairview's one and leading jeweller."

Sergeant Handley returned to his post of duty and his magazine.

"Pleased to meet you, captain," said the little jeweller.

"And you, Mr. Keer," nodded Lew. "About this diamond-studded badge our town is presenting to you. I'm downright sorry, but I'm afraid it won't be ready in time for—"

"Wait a minute, wait a minute!"

July 23rd, 1938.

Lew interrupted almost harshly. "What's this all about?"

Edgar Keer blinked over the top of his pince-nez and pinched his chin in a nervous fashion.

"Goodness," he exclaimed, turning to Steve, "I hope I haven't let the oyster out of its shell! I thought the captain knew all about this."

Lew scowled at Steve.

"Say, what are you trying to pull this time?" he rasped. "If this is another one of your—"

"Now, now, take it easy, Lew," implored the reporter. "I simply called a meeting of our leading citizens and suggested that they show their appreciation of Chief Kennedy's gift to their town—that's all."

Lew clamped his teeth together.

"There comes a time in a man's life," he hissed, "when killing is justified, and I think this is one of them." He summoned a wintry smile for the jeweller. "All right, Mr. Keer, I'll see you later."

"Anything you say, captain," murmured the embarrassed little man, and he was turning towards the door when there came a rap at it and Sergeant Handley reappeared.

"A lady to see you, sir."

The lady brushed past him into the room, elegantly dressed and with a floppy and semi-transparent hat upon her red-gold hair. She looked about forty-five and very self-possessed.

"Hallo, Edgar," she said brightly to the jeweller, "how well you're looking. Still on your milk diet?"

Without waiting for any reply she smiled at Steve.

"Oh, Mr. Withers! How very nice to find you here."

"Mrs. Wilder," said Steve, "I want you to know Captain Nagel."

Lew rose and bowed—and immediately became the target for a pair of admiring blue eyes.

"Oh, what is so awe-inspiring as a fine-looking man in uniform?" gushed their owner. "Would you believe it, captain, I—"

"Excuse me, Mrs. Wilder," Lew broke in rather stiffly, "but is there something I can do for you?"

Edgar Keer took his departure and the door was closed. But Mrs. Wilder in no way lost countenance.

"Oh, captain, I can tell you're as nervous as a witch," she tittered. "But you're not the only one. Every last member of the Ladies' Conversation and Get-Together Club is just living for next Thursday afternoon, counting off the minutes until you address them."

"When I do what?" gasped Lew.

"Oh, don't be so modest. When Mr. Withers told us you'd be happy to speak to us on crime every lady just bounced out of her seat and scrambled for the telephone. The beauty parlours have been working eighteen hours a day."

Steve looked at Lew, but Lew would not look at Steve.

"Listen, Mrs. Wilder," he said, re-seating himself at his desk and speaking quite coldly, though he felt hot enough about the collar, "just call the whole thing off. I'm an officer of the law, not a public speaker."

"Oh, but even an officer of the law can talk," cried Mrs. Wilder. "As a matter of fact, I've heard them."

"That's right," confirmed Steve, "so have I."

"There, you see?" Mrs. Wilder tilted her head and pointed a finger. "You haven't a leg to stand on. The question is—"

"Sorry, Mrs. Wilder, but I haven't a minute to spare. I know a man who is about to commit a murder."

"Oh, captain, how perfectly dreadful! You must tell me all about it on Thursday."

"I'll be very happy to."

That emphatic statement to Mrs. Wilder indicated surrender. She asked Lew if he would prefer larkspurs or delphiniums as a decoration for the speaker's table.

"Well, I don't care," he said gruffly, and remembered his manners. "I mean, anything that suits you will be all right with me."

"How perfectly splendid!" She offered her hand. "See you on Thursday at two o'clock sharp. Good-bye."

"Thursday at two," nodded Lew.

Steve shook hands in his turn, and he escorted Mrs. Wilder to the door. He leaned against it, after it was closed, and he laughed quite heartily.

"Anything for a laugh, eh?" Lew rapped at him. "Well, this one's on you."

"Now there's gratitude for you," complained the reporter. "After I work myself to the bone, trying to build you back up again you talk like that!"

"If I ever tore loose and told that bunch of hatchet-faced dames what I thought of their burg they'd die of shock. I hate every inch of it, and you know it."

"Oh, you'd better not tell 'em that," counselled Steve, "not after the swell badge they're giving you."

"I'm telling them nothing."

"Oh, yes, you are, Lew. You just can't let me down after all I've done for you."

"Oh, I can't, can't I?" Lew gave a tight-lipped grin. "Well, I've got a picture of myself talking to the like of Wilder and her gang. What kind of a sap do you take me for?"

A Slight Mistake

THURSDAY afternoon came and Steve went with Lew to the town hall. Lew was conducted by Mrs.

Wilder to a platform at the top of a long lecture-room on the first floor of the building and sat beside that lady at a table upon which a big pot of delphiniums stood conspicuously. Steve found a seat amongst a lot of assorted females, and aside from these two there was no other male in the room.

Mrs. Wilder, having introduced Lew to the assembled members of the Ladies' Conversation and Get-Together Club, sat down to listen to what he had to say. Steve nursed his hat and composed his features.

Lew's subject was supposed to be crime, but he began with a few remarks about his appointment.

"And speaking of Fairview," he said, "during my short stay here I have grown to like the town."

Steve began to gurgle inside him.

"I've grown to like every inch of it."

The gurgle erupted into laughter, and several females turned to stare at the offender.

"In fact," added Lew, "I might go farther and say I've grown to love it."

That was altogether too much for Steve. His laughter became uncontrollable, and he rose and went swiftly out from the room. In a broad corridor he leaned against the wall, holding his sides, and he did not notice a girl who emerged from an office at the top of the staircase until she spoke to him.

"Pardon me, but you're Mr. Withers, aren't you?" she asked.

"Eh?" Steve recovered and looked round. "Yes."

"I've got a call for you."

He followed her into the office and he spoke into a telephone she had deposited on a blotting-pad. The voice of Hallen Middleton smote upon his left ear-drum.

"Say, how long d'you think you're going to get away with blowing yourself to a vacation?" it roared.

"Oh, it's you again?" returned Steve placidly. "How are you, sweet child?"

"You 'phone in a story before to-morrow, or don't ever show your face around here again."

"Well, what do you want me to do," purred Steve, "go out and rob a bank?"

"That would be better than robbing us!" blared the news editor.

When Steve ventured back into the lecture-room Lew was finishing his very informal address with a promise that he would not rest until he had made Fairview a one hundred per cent law-abiding community.

There was considerable clapping after he had sat down, and when it was stilled Mrs. Wilder gushed inanities and brought the meeting to a close. Admiring females clustered round Lew, lavishing praise upon him as he descended from the platform. The room began to empty and Mrs. Wilder took possession of him.

"Oh, captain," she babbled, "some day soon you must address our class on psychic meditation and telepathy—you know, the study of how my thoughts leap right out of my brain and into yours. Why, captain, do you know—"

A particularly beautiful and bright-eyed girl, wearing a tweed jacket over a dark frock and an Alpine hat upon her golden head, was standing near the wide-open double doors, and Mrs. Wilder broke off to hail her.

"Oh, dear Jeane, come here, darling. I want you to meet Captain Nagel. Miss Jeane Sandford, my niece."

"How do you do, Miss Sandford?" murmured Lew.

"Awfully glad to know you, captain," said Jeane, and her voice was as attractive as her face. "I really enjoyed it."

They walked out into the corridor together, and there a little dark-haired slip of a girl was hovering. She looked no more than sixteen, but actually was turned twenty. Lew had seen her making notes of his address.

"Oh, Claire darling, you're just in time to meet the captain!" Mrs. Wilder cried. "This is my nephew's wife, Mrs. Ronald Sandford, Captain Nagel."

Lew endeavoured not to look astonished. Steve, in the background, was feasting his eyes upon Jeane.

"Captain," said the girl-wife, "the minute you opened your mouth something happened to me, and I said to myself, I said, 'There's the hero for my next play.'"

Steve blinked.

"You wouldn't think she was clever to look at her," said Mrs. Wilder, "but she is—clever as sin."

"You must meet my husband, captain," said the surprising little creature quite composedly. "He'd be such a help to you. He's clever, too—studying to be a criminologist."

Steve joined the group with an air of importance.

"I'm from the 'Morning Herald,'" he stated. "How about a copy of your speech?"

"Funny what some people will do for an introduction," growled Lew under his breath.

The introduction took place, and Steve stood very close to Jeane.

"Mr. Withers, may I ask you something?" Mrs. Wilder clasped her gloved hand. "You were a problem child, weren't you?"

Lek grinned delightedly, but Steve uttered an emphatic "No."

"Now don't tell me you weren't," rebuked Mrs. Wilder. "That horrible laugh of yours in there positively indicates that you were."

"But that wasn't a laugh, Mrs. Wilder," protested Steve. "It—it's a disturbance of the nervous system."

"Oh, you poor dear man! How horrible of me to have referred to it. Did you hear that, Jeane? Mr. Withers has a disturbance of his nervous system."

"Really?" said Jeane incredulously. "I'm so sorry, Mr. Withers."

The five descended the main staircase to the hall below and crossed the hall to the front steps, Mrs. Wilder walking with the diminutive Claire, Steve walking with Jeane, and Lew tagging along behind with his peaked cap in his hand.

"This is one for Ripley," remarked Steve on the way.

"What is?" asked Jeane.

"That I could spend three weeks in this town without spotting you."

"But I've been here only a few days," she laughed, "visiting my aunt."

"Tell me, how do you like Fairview?"

"Too quiet." She gave him a mocking glance. "In fact, I don't quite see what a newspaper reporter or a policeman can find to do here."

"Oh," said Steve airily, "that's only because you don't know this town. Say, I could tell you things that happen here that would make your hair stand on end."

"How very interesting! Of course, you can see I'm a bit grown-up for fairy tales, but if you have a good one—"

"Oh, you think I'm kidding you, eh? Say, why do you suppose the 'Herald' has its star reporter in this town?"

"I wouldn't know."

"And what do you suppose the chief of police told Captain Nagel when he appointed him over here? He said, 'Captain, I'm sending you to Fairview because you're the only man who can handle that hot spot.'"

They had reached the top of the steps and had paused there. Mrs. Wilder and Claire were down on the pavement; Lew was standing behind Steve.

"Well, maybe," said Jeane, "you two nice gentlemen can furnish a very bored girl with a little excitement. I've never seen a real criminal. Suppose you take me down to the goal and show me a couple of your worst ones?"

Lew shook his head and covertly jabbed a fist into Steve's back.

"I'm sorry, Miss Sandford."

"Yes, yes," said Steve glibly. "you see, we couldn't expose you to a lot of desperate gangsters and racketeers—there's no telling what might happen, even in goal. And don't think all the tough citizens of this community are behind bars, either. Why, the streets are full of them. Take that necklace you're wearing, for instance—"

He fingered the necklace that was round her smooth throat—a necklace of no intrinsic value, being composed of quartz and crystals.

"It wouldn't surprise me if some creature of the underworld yanked it right off your neck in broad daylight," he declared.

"Oh, Mr. Withers," she said with a very artificial sliver, "this is getting Steve joined Lew on the terrace, and Ronald and Claire followed; but there was no sign of anybody in the grounds.

more terrifying every minute. But it would make a marvellous headline, wouldn't it? 'Robbery by daring daylight bandit. Captain Nagel hot on trail of thief. Arrest expected any minute.'

She smiled at Lew.

"Of course, you wouldn't handle the case yourself, would you, captain? No, you'd probably give it to one of your subordinates—you'd be too busy with your gangsters and racketeers."

The smile was transferred to Steve.

"And naturally a star reporter would never cover a little story like mine, would he, Mr. Withers?"

"Jeane darling!" called Mrs. Wilder from the pavement.

"Coming!" Jeane waved a hand.

"Sorry to leave such amusing company, but I must get off these dangerous streets before dark."

"That's a good idea," said Steve.

"Oh, wait a minute! See that man over there?"

He pointed to a very tall and certainly not very pleasant-looking man of about forty-five who was walking slowly along the opposite pavement.

"Yes," said Jeane, "what about him?"

"One of the most desperate characters in this country."

"Really?"

Steve nodded.

"Just finished a five-year term for robbery," he informed her, "but that's only half of it. Before that he did a ten-year stretch for second-degree murder."

"Thanks so much for telling me," she said quite gravely. "That's my Uncle Edmund."

"Ye— What?" stammered Steve.

"Your—your—"

But Jeane was already fitting down the steps to her aunt.

"Well, brother," said Lew most unkindly. "You sure led with your chin that time."

A Fake Burglary

MRS. WILDER lived in a very stylish house, occupying fairly extensive grounds, in one of Fairview's nicest thoroughfares known as Maryland Drive, and her nephew Ronald Sandford and his little wife Claire lived there with her.

Having visited the house several times since his arrival in the town, Steve was acquainted with its general lay-out, but during the afternoon of that day he prowled in its vicinity, and he had the satisfaction of glimpsing Jeane at the casement window of a bed-room which opened on to a balcony above a side porch.

In the region of eleven o'clock at night, with only the moon in a cloudless sky to watch his movements, he stole across the grounds to the porch, limbed some trellis-work beside it on to the balcony and tiptoed to the window.

The window was open and he slipped in at it over a cushioned seat. The bed-room was bathed in moonlight, and Jeane was fast asleep in an elegant double bed, her head upon a pillow on its right and one shapely arm flung across the other pillow.

For several long moments he stood gazing at her, then looked all round the room and went to a dressing-table that matched the bed. The necklace was in the second drawer he opened, and it was in his hand when a movement behind his back caused him to swing round.

Jeane had stirred in her sleep and turned over.

He stood clutching the necklace till July 23rd, 1938.

he was sure she was not going to waken, then slipped it into his coat-pocket and opened other drawers in the dressing-table and disarranged their contents as a burglar might have done. Finally he blew a kiss in the direction of the bed and got out at the window as noiselessly as he had entered.

From the balcony he clambered down the trellis-work; but one piece of it gave way beneath his weight, and he fell about six feet into a flower-border. He rose and fled, alarmed by the noise he had made, and before he was out in the road and running swiftly along it, Jeane was sitting up in bed very wide awake.

Mrs. Wilder, a light sleeper, was almost instantly out of her bed and enveloped in a very elaborate wrap. She opened the door of her room, and in the wide upper hall outside it she saw her nephew, Ronald Sandford, an ugly young man with rather a foolish face and eyes that blinked at her like an owl's from behind the lenses of a pair of horn-rimmed spectacles.

Slippers were on his feet, and he was wearing a dressing-gown over striped pyjamas.

"Did you hear anything?" asked Mrs. Wilder shrilly.

"Uhuh," nodded her nephew. "And saw a man running away, too."

"Not a burglar, Ronald—not a real one?" she cried excitedly. "Oh, why couldn't he have waited a minute? I've never seen a burglar!"

"Don't worry about him, Aunt Muffin," said the young man. "I'll have the scoundrel's finger-prints before you can count ten."

Claire appeared in pyjamas of almost a military cut.

"Oh, darling, wouldn't it be just wonderful if this turned out to be the plot I've been searching for?" she breathed, addressing her spouse as he made for the stairs.

Mrs. Wilder ran to the door of Jeane's room and banged on one of its panels with her fist.

"Jeane! Jeane!" she shouted.

"Hurry, sweet, we've got a burglar!" She opened the door to find that Jeane was already out of bed and speaking into a telephone.

"Hallo, police!" she said, as her aunt stood gaping at her. "This is Jeane Sandford, two-one-seven, Maryland Drive. I've been robbed!"

Sergeant Handley, rudely wakened from a nap in the charge-room at the police station by the noise of a telephone bell, responded sleepily:

"You been what? That's what I thought you said, but— Yes, we'll send an officer right away."

Lew was in his own private sitting-room, on an upper floor of the police station, when a bell summoned him to a telephone there. He had been about to retire for the night and was half-dressed.

"Nagel speaking," he said into the instrument. "What? Do you know any more jokes? Did you say Sandford?"

"Uhuh!" boomed Sergeant Handley's voice in his ear.

"Send a couple of men over. I'll be there right away."

In less than ten minutes Lew was at the wheel of a squad car and had left Main Street behind. In one of the residential thoroughfares, not a great way from Maryland Drive, he caught sight of Steve walking briskly towards the heart of the town, and he ran the ear up to the kerb and hailed him.

"Hi, where d'you think you're going this time of night?" he demanded

"Taking myself for a walk," Steve replied. "The old insomnia's playing a return engagement. Something up?"

"A robbery."

"What?"

"Climb in!"

Steve climbed in beside his chum, and the car shot forward.

"Strangest thing I ever heard," said Steve. "Must be your imagination."

"I wonder," said Lew.

By this time all the lights were on in Jeane's bed-room and all the family were in it. Ronald, busy with a magnifying glass at the casement window, turned to remark:

"I'm pretty sure the scoundrel's left his finger-prints here."

Claire, with a notebook in one hand and a pencil in the other, burst out:

"Jeane darling, please tell me I'm not dreaming! Think of it, right out of nowhere a sure-fire plot leaps right in my lap and sits there!"

Sergeant Handley and two sleepy policemen converged upon the drive from various parts of the grounds as Lew stopped the squad car below the front porch of the house.

"See anything?" questioned Lew.

"Not a thing!" chorused the three.

"Take another look round. Not you, Handley—you come with me."

The two policemen went off to scour the grounds again, and Sergeant Handley ascended to the front door with Lew and Steve. Mrs. Wilder opened the door to them, fluttering with excitement, and led the way up to "the scene of the crime," as she called it.

"Oh, Captain Nagel," exclaimed Jeane as they entered the room, "how nice of you to come yourself! And Mr. Withers!"

"Only too glad to be of service," Lew assured her. "Look around, Handley. Has anything been touched?"

"No, not a thing," said Jeane; but Mrs. Wilder modified that statement.

"Of course my nephew's been pottering around," she said. "You see, he's been traipping to be a detective. Come, Ronald, I want you to meet Captain Nagel and Mr. Withers."

Ronald tore himself away from the window to be introduced.

"What are your ideas on this case, captain?" he asked.

"Well, first, I'll have to find out what's been stolen," said Lew.

"My necklace," said Jeane.

"Now that's what I call a real coincidence," remarked Steve. "There we were, only this afternoon, talking about—"

"Yes," she interrupted, "and my face is slightly red at this point, and you can very easily guess why. Really, I apologise for everything I said."

"Oh, well," shrugged Steve, "you know how it is with mistakes. I make them myself."

"It isn't a very valuable necklace, but I'd hate to lose it. It was a gift from my Uncle Mark."

Lew, who had been looking thoughtfully round the room, asked where she usually kept the necklace. She replied that she was not quite sure whether she had left it on the top of the dressing-table or in a drawer.

"We were all awakened by the most terrifying noise," Mrs. Wilder declared. "You'd have thought the very roof was falling over our heads. Really, I thought it was the end of the world."

Sergeant Handley was studying the window-frame beside Ronald. Claire pointed to the bed.

"Would your mind showing me just where you were lying?" she asked.

"What?" Jeane looked round. "Oh, no; of course not. I was right here like this." She flung herself on the left side of the bed.

"It was the other pillow," blurted Steve.

"So it was," said she, sitting up abruptly.

"How do you know so much about it?" rapped Lew.

"Only the other pillow had the impression of a head." Steve explained without the slightest hesitation.

Claire made a note of that in her book.

"Isn't it wonderful, Muffin," she said, "the powers of detection these newspaper men have. I'm going to put you in my play, Mr. Withers—and you know what else I'm going to do? I'm going to make my play a mystery. And when you come into the scene, you're going to say: 'Seems mighty strange that Jeane's necklace was stolen on the eve of her uncle's anniversary.'"

Lew fastened on that last word.

"Anniversary?" he echoed. "What anniversary?"

"Uncle Mark's," Claire replied. "He'll have been dead a year to-morrow."

Steve, who had not forgotten his conversation with the news editor, asked Jeane if he could use the telephone, and he sat down on the bed to use the one that stood on a little table there.

Ronald, at the window, had covered the framework of the casement with dusting-powder and had blown away the surplus, revealing unmistakable finger-prints.

"I told you I'd find them there, didn't I?" he said triumphantly to the massive sergeant.

"Listen, I'm handling this!" snapped that indignant officer, "and the best thing for you to do is to keep your nose out of it."

"Well, if you'd try being my equal instead of my superior," Ronald retorted, "we might solve this crime."

Steve had got through to the "Morning Herald," and despite the lateness of the hour Hallen Middleton was still at his desk.

"Hallo, sweet child!" Steve greeted him. "This is your favourite reporter. Sure I've got a story. Give me the re-write."

"I'll take it myself," Middleton informed him tartly. "Spill it!"

Steve dictated:

"While visiting Fairview, Miss Jeane Sandford was robbed of a valuable necklace by a daring bandit who broke into her bed-room while she was fast asleep. Local police on trail of thief!" He looked up at Jeane, who was standing beside him, and he went on: "It's too bad you have no picture of Miss Sandford—it would be worth a front-page spread. What? Oh, but you haven't seen her!"

A few minutes afterwards, Lew decided that there was no point in remaining any longer on the scene of the crime.

"Don't worry about your necklace, Miss Sandford," he said. "We'll take care of it. Coming, Steve?"

"Just a minute," Mrs. Wilder intervened, "let's all think—I mean help me to concentrate." She picked up the telephone and held it in front of her eyes with a curiously rapt expression on her face. "Now, everybody keep still and look at this telephone. Far more things are solved by concentration than science ever thought of. All together, now!"

Everybody stared at the telephone,

Lew was left alone with the prisoner and gave him a tight-lipped grin that was distinctly reassuring.

except Lew and Steve: Lew stared at its holder. Steve looked at Jeane.

"Oh, it's no use, captain!" Mrs. Wilder lamented after a while. "I can't get a thing from the telephone."

Lew moved towards the door, but she put down the telephone and followed him.

"Oh, captain, may I see you alone a minute?" she fluttered.

"Why, certainly," said Lew, and they went out together.

Steve produced a notebook and pencil and led Jeane away from the others.

"Tell me, Miss Sandford," he said fatuously, "married?"

"Miss," she reminded him.

"Oh, yes! Er—contemplate it?"

"Some day."

He made a note of that.

"Do you mind if I tell my readers what kind of men you prefer?"

"Well, Mr. Withers, I'm afraid you have me there. I've never been quite able to decide. What would you suggest?"

Steve screwed up one eye as though giving the matter earnest attention.

"I don't think you should marry a business man," he said. "No, I think I'd say a literary man would be more your type."

"Yes?" murmured Jeane.

"Yes. And he should be tall and strong, with a sense of humour and a smile—a man who thinks you're the most wonderful girl he ever met."

She gave him an arch little glance and a smile to match his own.

"Well, you make him sound very attractive I must say," she admitted.

She went out with him to the stairs, which Sergeant Handley had already descended. Lew was in the hall at the foot of them with Mrs. Wilder, and he was saying:

"But what makes you think there's more behind it?"

"Because Mark gave the necklace to Jeane, and he'll have been dead a year to-morrow," Mrs. Wilder somewhat cryptically replied. "Oh, captain, it was too bad you weren't here for his funeral. You'd have thought he was a gangster—more flowers than you could count!"

"But what has that got to—"

"That's just what I'm trying to tell you. To-morrow, at midnight, all the Sandfords are gathering at the house on the top of Jackson Hill."

"For what?" asked Lew in a very puzzled voice.

"To hear Mark's will. It's going to be read."

"At midnight?"

Mrs. Wilder nodded.

"Poor Mark was a little queer—and out crazy, some people say. The 'Auction Room' is what they call his house. Every inch of it cluttered with things from all over the world. You see, Mark was a skipper of the old school. But the question is—"

"The question is," Lew anticipated for her, "why should Mark's necklace be grabbed just before the reading of the will. Is that right?"

"Yes, I can't understand it," Mrs. Wilder turned to Steve as he and Jeane reached the bottom stair. "Oh, Mr. Withers, I want to see you, too! If you should say anything about me in your newspaper, please remember that my first name is Rosalind, not Muffin. Poor, dear mother, bless her, first time she saw me said: 'Oh, doctor, she's as round as a muffin!'" The explanation was accompanied by a titter. "A silly name, of course, but cute don't you think?"

"Good-night," said Lew. "You'll hear from me in the morning."

Steve said good-night to Jeane, and he and Lew took their departure. Ser-gent Handley was standing by the squad car with one of the policemen.

"Well?" barked Lew.

"Nothing doing, captain," reported the officer, whose name was Dilloway. "I searched the whole place and found nothing but a couple o' cats talkin' things over."

"Just what I expected. All right, boys."

Rendezvous at Midnight

INSTEAD of dropping Steve at the hotel in Grant Avenue, where he was living at the expense of the "Morning Herald," Lew drove him straight to the police station and marched him into his own room there. He closed the door and stood with his back to it, and then he said sharply:

"Well, where is it?"

"Eh?" Steve tried to look astonished. "Where's what?"

"The necklace?"

"Are you trying to insinuate that I—"

"Aw, quit your stalling!" thundered Lew. "What kind of a sap do you take me for?"

Slowly Steve put his hand in his coat-pocket, and slowly he brought out the necklace. He offered it to Lew with a sheepish grin, but Lew would not have it.

"Oh, you're not giving it to me!" he snorted. "I don't want any part of it. You know what I ought to do? I ought to lock you up!"

"Aw, come on, wipe that sour look off your face," urged Steve. "You know darn well I pulled this little stunt as much for you as for myself."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah. Laid my good reputation wide open to save you from going nuts. Besides, I didn't steal it—I only borrowed it. What's more—"

"Save your explanation for the little brown-eyed girl," barked Lew, and he turned and opened the door. "You're gonna hot-foot it right back with her necklace!"

"Eh?" Steve was horrified.

"Sure. That should boost your stock a hundred per cent! I've let you get away with a lot of stuff, but this is one time you've got yourself into a pretty mess."

"Listen," howled Steve, "do you think I'm going back there and say that I—"

"You're going back there and tell them that you stole it!" roared Lew. "That's exactly what you're gonna tell them!"

"Oh, now wait a minute, Lew. I don't feel so well to-night. Wait till to-morrow, anyway, till after I've had my oatmeal. Besides, they're all in bed!"

"That didn't worry you when you broke in," was the implacable rejoinder, "and I don't see why it should worry you now. Pull up anchor and shove off!"

"Doesn't it mean anything to you that we've been bosom pals for years?" wheedled Steve. "How do you expect me to look the world straight in the face again?"

"Are you going back by yourself," demanded Lew, "or do I have to take you?"

"All right, all right. I'm going." Steve dropped the necklace back in his pocket and went out across the charge-room into the night.

About forty minutes later, Lew was fast asleep in his own bed on the floor above, and the moon was shining right in his face, when a loud banging on the bed-room door shattered his dreams and caused him to sit bolt upright.

"Who is it?" he bellowed.

July 23rd, 1928.

"Steve!" called an anguished voice. "Open up!"

In his pyjamas Lew went to the door, and Steve was admitted.

"What are you doing back here?" Lew inquired harshly. "What happened?"

"Now, now, take it easy, Lew," implored Steve. "I'm standing right on the edge of a nervous breakdown."

"I don't care what you're standing on! Did you, or didn't you, return that necklace?"

"I did not."

Lew raised his fist as though to strike, and Steve shrank away from it.

"It was coaxed right out of my pocket," he mourned.

"If this is another of your stunts," threatened Lew, "you'll wish you never pulled it!"

"No, this is on the level," Steve sounded sincere. "I stepped in at Carroll's Bar on the way to pick up a double Scotch. Even you wouldn't expect me to face the Sandfords without a little inside help. And, so help me, Lew, when I felt for the necklace after I'd left the bar it was gone. I headed right back into the joint, but nothing doing—nobody knew anything about it."

"Is that straight?"

"So help me Hannah!" Steve held up his right hand.

"Did you know anybody in that bar besides the bartender?"

"No, there were a couple o' guys in there, but I don't know who they were."

Lew sat down on the edge of his bed and scratched the back of his neck.

"Well, maybe Muffin's not such a nitwit after all," he commented. "There may be more to this than we realise. You meet me downstairs, to-morrow night, at a quarter to twelve. We'll run up to that house, on the top of Jackson Hill."

Steve went off to his hotel, and he slept late into the next morning. The day passed uneventfully, so far as he and Lew were concerned, and at the appointed time the two set off for Jackson Hill in the squad car.

The house on the top of the hill was a large and rambling one, built mainly of stone, and silhouetted against the moonlit sky it had a mysterious and almost eerie appearance.

Neglected lawns surrounded it, and above its dark bulk a clock in a wooden tower was striking midnight as Lew parked the car just inside the drive and walked with Steve across the grass towards a terrace that stretched along the front wall.

Other cars upon the gravel below the front steps indicated clearly enough that the Sandfords had assembled in the house, and Lew led the way up to the terrace and along it to french windows through the glass panes of which a light shined.

There were curtains over the windows, but they were not drawn right across it, and Lew found that one of the doors was unfastened and managed to open it slightly without even a creak.

In what evidently was a spacious dining-room seven people were seated at a long table of polished oak, four on one side and three on the other. A chandelier hung from the ceiling, and cobwebs hung from the chandelier, but the light in the room came from two seven-branched candlesticks set upon the table.

Through a pillared and curtained opening at the end of the room part of the hall was visible, and as Lew and Steve watched a lean and elderly man with a long face, singularly thin about the jaws, crossed the hall into the room carrying a lighted candle in a silver candlestick.

He set the candlestick down upon the table and took a long envelope from his pocket—an envelope bearing several wax seals.

"As Mark Sandford's attorney," he said in almost a sepulchral voice, "I greet you all."

"Looks like the Sandford handicap's about to get under way," whispered Lew.

Ceremoniously the lawyer, Stuart Hackett by name, seated himself at the head of the table. Jeane was on his right, dressed in black with a queer little fur hat upon her head. Mrs. Wilder, next to her, was also in mourning. On Mrs. Wilder's right was Edmund Sandford, the man Steve had pointed out to Jeane as a desperate character. Ronald Sandford was on the other side of the table, facing Jeane, and Claire was next to him; then came a full-faced and thick-lipped member of the family whose name was Herbert and who seemed to be rather the worse for drink, and beside him was a bold-eyed blonde who was his wife Grace.

Herbert Sandford said thickly and facetiously across the table:

"Hi, Muffin, did you ever try to say alum—alum—aluminum when you were tight?"

"Please, Herbert, please!" admonished the lawyer. "At least, show a little respect for your brother's memory!"

With a little preliminary cough he adjusted a pair of spectacles on his nose, broke the seals of the envelope, and extracted a document which he opened out.

"I shall now read the will you have all been waiting to hear," he announced, and he began to do so. "I, Mark Sandford, of lawful age and sound mind and not acting under duress, menace, fraud, or undue influence of any person, do declare my last will and testament as follows:

"You, my family, are now looking upon my old home for the last time. After this will has been read my house shall be locked by my attorney for ever, to be my home in death as it was in life."

Hackett looked over his spectacles at Mrs. Wilder.

"To my sister Rosalind, sometimes known as Muffin," he read, "I leave—my sympathy. A gabby and constant chatterer like Rosalind deserves nothing more. We shared no bond in life, so why in death?"

Mrs. Wilder winced and turned her head to look up at an oil-painting on the wall over the mantelpiece—a portrait of an elderly man dressed as a sea-captain. There were tears in her eyes.

"As the horses go to the post," Lew whispered to Steve, "Lady Muffin is scratched."

"To my brother Edmund," pursued the lawyer, "I am leaving good advice. He should learn to think and act for himself. Had he done so he would never have put his trust in our brother Herbert, who—as a so-called stockbroker—succeeded in draining him of every dollar he had. I worked too hard to accumulate my fortune to have Edmund squander any part of it."

Edmund Sandford folded his arms and dropped his head. Herbert Sandford chuckled audibly; but his turn followed.

"To my brother Herbert I leave regrets—regrets that I had to have him for a brother. Always selfish and impossible, the only sympathy I ever had for him was when he was foolish enough to take Grace off a trapeze and marry her. However, if she leads him a wild fling it will not be on my money."

Herbert puffed out his lips and hicoughed. His wife made a grimace at him.

"That leaves two more at the post," whispered Lew.

"To my nephew Ronald," Stuart Hackett resumed, and his voice was like the voice of Fate. "I leave Claire. And to Claire I leave Ronald. As I myself leave both these fools, I feel that death has its compensations."

"That leaves one entry," Steve whispered to Lew. "Boy, what I'm going to learn about brown-eyes!"

The lawyer glanced at Jeane. "Now as to my niece Jeane," he read out. "Undoubtedly Jeane is the cream of the Sandfords, so I am leaving the disposal of my estate to her, in accordance with further instructions which she will find in the two centre stones of a necklace I have already given her."

Jeane gave a little gasp of dismay, and her hand went to her throat. She started to rise, but the lawyer motioned to her to remain seated.

"Please," he said, "there is still more. If, however, Jeane may have considered the necklace old-fashioned and did not think enough of me to have kept it throughout these years, she will find her pride to have been very costly. In such an event my attorney will open my sealed instructions and dispose of my estate, dividing it among such charities as he shall see fit to designate."

The will was folded and restored to its envelope.

"That is all," said its reader.

"But, Mr. Hackett," stammered Jeane. "I—I haven't the necklace."

"What?"

"It was stolen!"

Amid the excited chatter that followed, Lew whispered to Steve:

"You've sure made a mess of things this time!"

"Well, that changes everything," said Hackett with a frown. "Puts the burden of disposing of the estate right on my shoulders, doesn't it?" He produced another long sealed envelope from a pocket. "I have the instructions here. Naturally, I shall have to execute them right away."

The french windows swung wide, and eight startled faces were turned towards them as Lew burst into the room with Steve.

"Just a minute!" cried Lew, striding towards the lawyer.

"Captain Nagel!" exclaimed Mrs. Wilder. "What on earth—"

"I hope you'll pardon the intrusion, Mrs. Wilder," Lew interrupted, "but I felt sure we'd be needed." He addressed Hackett. "Miss Sandford reported the theft of her necklace to me last night," he said, "and as I can guarantee the return of it within forty-eight hours, I'd suggest that the instructions remain sealed until that time—if that meets with your approval."

"A very good idea, captain." The lawyer restored the envelope to his pocket. "Personally, I have no wish to assume so great a responsibility."

The Sandfords began to rise from the table.

"I'm so glad you were here, captain," said Jeane. "I don't know how to thank you."

"Don't try," returned Lew. "It's all in a day's work."

Herbert Sandford lurched over to the mantelpiece.

"Look, everybody," he guffawed.

"I'm darned if the wart on Mark's nose isn't getting bigger."

Everybody stared up at the painting. "A little bicarbonate of soda might shrink it a bit," said Grace, with a hard laugh.

"I don't think you're a bit funny, either of you," Jeane rebuked; and then Hackett suggested that as business was over they might as well all depart.

The Sandfords began to drift away across the hall. Jeane picked up a coat she had dropped on a chest there, and the lawyer blew out the candles in the seven-branched candlesticks and picked up the other one.

Steve walked down the front steps with Jeane, but Lew lingered on the pillared porch till Hackett emerged from the house and closed the heavy front door and locked it.

"Do you really think you'll recover the necklace in forty-eight hours?" inquired the lawyer, pocketing the key.

"Thinking has nothing to do with it, Mr. Hackett," replied Lew. "I'm positive."

Strange Happenings

LEW was at his desk in his own room at the police station, next morning, when Steve walked into it carrying a well-filled canvas bag almost large enough to be called a sack.

"You know, Lew," he said with a yawn, "I couldn't sleep all night for thinking about this thing."

"That makes two of us," said Lew.

"But suddenly I had a great hunch. The bag was deposited on the desk.

"So did I. Keer, the jeweller, is on his way over."

"What's Keer got to do with all this?" Steve blankly inquired.

"A lot," Lew raised his voice because he had heard a knock at the door. "Come in!"

The little jeweller entered, hat in hand.

"You sent for me, captain?" he asked.

"Yes, Mr. Keer," Lew responded briskly. "Could you make a necklace for me if I described it?"

"Oh, certainly!"

"You must understand this is a police matter, so not a word to anyone. This necklace must be made of large quartz, not expensive, each piece separated by a small crystal."

The little jeweller caressed his chin.

"Sounds like one I once made for poor old Mark Sandford," he said.

"He wanted it made just so."

"What?" Lew's brows went up.

"How well do you remember it?"

"Oh, perfectly! And, anyway, I still have the original design. In fact, I have a setting that's almost identical."

"What about the stones? Have you any of them?"

"Yes," was the reply, "but they're a lot cheaper than Mark's were."

"So much the better! Can you have that made for me by to-night?"

"If I rush it through."

"Well, then rush it, Mr. Keer."

The jeweller promised that he would do so and went off. Steve, who had been listening to the conversation with a puzzled expression on his face, burst out:

"Call me dumb, but I don't see what good another necklace is going to do you!"

"Give yourself time, and maybe you will," retorted Lew.

"All right," Steve helped himself to the telephone and rang up the "Morning Herald."

"We'll see how smart you are," he said. "Maybe I have a surprise up my sleeve, too."

Hallen Middleton was having his scalp massaged when the telephone-bell rang in his den, but he managed to answer the call and he recognised Steve's voice.

Steve held her because she seemed unable to stand alone, and Lew looked at her throat. "The necklace has gone!" he exclaimed.

"Say, what's got into you, calling me twice in the same week?" he blared with heavy sarcasm.

"Listen, sweet child," purred Steve, "this story oughta make your new hair leap right to your scalp. You ready? 'Organised thievery, which has been going on in Fairview for several months, has finally been traced to a ghost gang. This gang receive their name from the weird and mysterious way in which they work. More concrete evidence regarding them is expected within the next forty-eight hours; until then the police refuse to say anything for publication.' That's all."

The receiver was restored to the prongs of Lew's old-style telephone, and the reporter grinned at him.

"And that, my little chickadee, is only a sample," he said. "Do you know where you're going to find the headquarters of this ghost gang?"

"Sure," replied Lew, swinging to and fro in his swivel chair. "In Mark Sandford's deserted house. It doesn't take an overdose of brains to figure out that you're trying to put over a story—even though it doesn't make sense."

He reached a hand to the bag and rattled it, disturbing something inside that sounded like crockery.

"You're trying to sell me the idea of sneaking up to Mark's house to plant these fake activities for your phoney ghost gang."

"Right," confirmed Steve. "Beds that have been slept in—cards set for a table of bridge—"

"Dirty dishes in the sink," suggested Lew.

"Right again. A couple of current magazines scattered about."

"And then we pull a fake raid!"

"What a story, even though the gang have escaped! Fairview will be rid of them for ever."

"Stick around until to-night," said Lew, "and then you'll see things happen. Have a cigarette?"

Between half-past eight and nine o'clock, that evening, Lew and Steve mounted the front steps of the house on the top of Jackson Hill. The house was in darkness; the grounds were full of shadows because the moon was obscured by clouds.

Steve, who was carrying the canvas bag, was about to pass from the porch on to the terrace when Lew stopped him and tried the handle of the front door. He did not expect the door to be unlocked, but it was, and he opened it.

They stepped into the hall, and Lew took an electric torch from his pocket and switched on its light while Steve closed the door. For the better part of a minute they remained motionless, but not a sound reached their ears.

"We'll take the principal bed-room first," said Lew, "muss up the bed, and put the alarm clock beside it. Watch your step so you don't stumble and break those dishes."

They climbed the stairs the lawyer had descended the night before, and from the upper hall they passed into a front bed-room of considerable size. The beam of the torch picked out furniture that should have been under dust-covers, but was not. The sheets and blankets of a double bed were already in a state of disorder, as though someone had slept in it quite recently.

"Do you see what I see?" exploded Lew.

"Yeah." Steve picked up a newspaper from a chair. "Yesterday's 'Courier'!" he exclaimed.

July 23rd, 1928.

"If this is your idea of a joke," raged Lew, "you'd better head for the first exit."

"Are you trying to insinuate I'm responsible for this?" howled Steve. "Not me! All we need now is a deck of cards!"

The beam of the torch shifted from the bed to a table—and on the table cards were spread out as though someone had been playing Patience.

"And there they are!" said Lew.

With startling suddenness a nerve-racking din filled the room. It seemed to originate somewhere near the head of the bed, and Lew turned the light of the torch in that direction. Steve gasped at sight of a cheap alarm clock on a little table there.

"What's the matter, Handsome?" jeered Lew, as the din ceased. "You aren't frightened, are you?"

"That's a pretty feeble word for the way I feel," confessed Steve. "Let's get out of here!"

They went out from the room and down the stairs.

"You know I'm beginning to think there really is a ghost gang," said Steve.

"Maybe you're right," said Lew. "And whatever it is we haven't even scratched the surface."

They passed a bronze figure of a Japanese warrior, and came to one of the heavy curtains over the entrance to the dining-room in which the will had been read. Lew shone his torch into the room, and Steve looked over his shoulder.

It seemed at first that the room was empty, but just inside the entrance a body was lying on the floor—a man's body, face downwards. Lew knelt and rolled it over, and glassy eyes in a long, lean face stared upwards.

"It's the lawyer, Hackett!" he gulped. "And he's dead!"

Steve dropped on his knees beside his chum, and he saw that there was something in the dead lawyer's right hand.

"Part of the necklace!" he exclaimed.

Lew borrowed a handkerchief and with it secured the broken piece of necklace.

"It's not the right part," he said, after he had examined it. "Mark's instructions were in the centre stones." He rolled up the handkerchief and thrust it into a pocket. "Well, one thing is cleared up," he went on grimly as he got to his feet. "Hackett's the bird that took the necklace from you, and somebody caught him with it."

"And in their struggle," suggested Steve, "Hackett got the short end and a free ride to eternity."

"Whoever it was," growled Lew, "I hope he was dumb enough to leave his finger-prints."

He stooped to grope in the dead man's pockets, and Steve asked him what he was looking for.

"Mark's sealed instructions," Lew replied. "Well, they're gone, too! Get the coroner—I'll stay here."

"What's the rush?" objected Steve. "Once the coroner gets a whiff of this, every reporter in town will be in on the yarn."

"Will you forget about your paper for a minute?" rapped Lew.

At that moment there came a sound as of someone fumbling with the handle of the front door, and he streaked out across the hall and opened it. Sergeant Handley nearly fell in over the step, but recovered his balance, blinking owlishly in the light of the torch.

"Well, what are you doing here?" Lew demanded.

"I was just tryin' to help you, captain," Handley replied. "I saw a light and thought I'd better investigate."

"Well, now that you're here you can beat it right back to town and get the coroner! Don't stand there gaping at me—we've got a homicide on our hands! After you get the coroner, round up everyone of the Sandfords and take them to the police station. Get going, get going!"

"Just a minute, Handley!" Steve wrote in his notebook and tore out the page. "First chance you get 'phone that to the 'Herald' and tell them there'll be more to come."

Handley took the piece of paper and went off with it. Lew closed the door, and as he did so heard another door being opened somewhere at the back of the house. With Steve close behind him he dived down a passage into a big, bare kitchen—and Ronald Sandford and his diminutive wife Claire shrank back against a wall as the light of the torch blazed in their faces.

"Well, good-evening," he said curtly. "What are you doing here?"

Claire was holding a little notebook; Ronald was clutching a fingerprint outfit of modest dimensions.

"We saw a light in the house," muttered the amateur sleuth, "while we were out looking for—"

"Ronald!" cried his wife warningly. "Out looking for what?" rasped Lew.

"Atmosphere for my play," said Claire. "And we found it, too. This back door has been jimmed—isn't that what you call it, dear, jimmed?"

Lew examined the double back doors, and it was quite obvious that they had been forced. He opened them and descended half a dozen stone steps to a rear terrace beyond which were flower-borders and a lawn. The moon was clear of the clouds and it was almost as light as day out there. Steve joined him on the terrace, and Ronald and Claire followed, but there was no sign of anybody in the grounds.

"Look, darling, look, real footprints!" cried Claire, pointing down to a flower-bed. "The curtain of my first act staring me right in the face."

The footprints were plain enough to be seen. They were deeply impressed in the soft mould as though someone of considerable weight had jumped from the terrace into the bed, and in the middle of each of the heelmarks there was a star-shaped depression.

"Get back into the house," commanded Lew gruffly. "We're staying here until the coroner shows up."

"The coroner?" echoed Ronald.

"What's happened?" gasped Claire.

"Just an ordinary murder," said Steve.

"I'll have to warn you," barked Lew, "that anything you say will be used against you. I'm holding both of you on suspicion of having killed Hackett. As soon as I've finished with the coroner you'll go back to the police-station with me."

Tell-tale Fingerprints

SERGEANT HANDLEY was at his desk in the charge-room at the police-station when Lew entered it with Ronald and Claire about an hour and a half later. He ushered the two captives into his own room and went back to the desk.

"The Sandfords all here?" he asked. "Yes, sir," the sergeant replied. "I locked them up."

"You did what?"

"Well, you don't think I was taking any chances with that batty bunch, do you?"

"Well, sergeant," gritted Lew, "that's just dandy. You'll be promoted for this. Get your keys and let 'em out."

Followed by the sergeant and a bunch of keys he stalked off along a corridor into the gaol part of the building, and there were the rest of the Sandford tribe behind the bars of four adjoining cells.

"We've been waiting for you, captain," said Jeane unhappily.

"Holding us on suspicion for murder is absolutely ridiculous!" stormed Grace Sandford.

"I'm sorry," Lew apologised.

The doors were unlocked, the prisoners trooped out.

"Think nothing of it, captain," urged Mrs. Wilder brightly. "As a matter of fact, I was afraid this was an experience that had passed me by."

Herbert Sandford, swaying slightly on his feet, shouted wrathfully:

"It's a fine how-d'-you-do! A Sandford is locked up like a common criminal! I ought to sue you!"

"It's quite easy to understand how you feel, Mr. Sandford," said Lew, "but mistakes will happen. This way, please."

The prisoners were shepherded into his room, Edmund Sandford threatening to take the matter up with the District Attorney.

"Better be careful how you handle me, too!" shrieked Grace. "I come from a long line of fighters."

"All right, go and sit down!" barked Lew. "All of you sit down!"

They found seats about the room, and he stood facing them from behind his desk.

"Now, ladies and gentlemen," he said, "we're going to fit the pieces together till I find out which one of you killed Hackett."

"You can't implicate me in a thing like that and get away with it!" snapped Edmund Sandford.

"You're going to have a hard time not to implicate yourself," retorted Lew. "For a man with a clear conscience you seem to be quite a bit worried. When you found that Mark had left you without a cent you went back to the house to find what you could, didn't you?"

"Did I?" was the defiant challenge. "Well, that's for you to find out."

Steve, who had stopped at a drug-store to ring up the "Morning Herald," burst in upon the assembly with a broad grin on his face.

"Hi, Middleton told me to say 'Hallo' and give you all his love and kisses," he stated with humorous intent.

"Sit down!" rasped Lew, who was in no mood for levity. "Now I want to know what each one of you was doing at eight o'clock, and I want the truth. I'll start with you, Mrs. Wilder."

Mrs. Wilder declared that she was sitting in her room, reading up on basket-ball.

"You see," she explained, "several of the girls at the club are thinking of forming a team. I called out to Jeane to ask her how she thought I'd look in shorts. Oh, captain, I'm just dying to wear them!"

Lew strode over to Jeane, who was sitting beside her aunt.

"Is that right?" he asked.

"I don't know," she replied. "I wasn't there."

"Well, where were you at eight o'clock?"

Steve bounded up from his chair to protest, but Jeane said quickly:

"Thanks, Mr. Withers, but I'm per-

NEXT WEEK'S GRAND FILM DRAMAS!

BUCK JONES

—IN—

"HOLLYWOOD ROUND-UP."

As double for a conceited Western star, Buck Kennedy does all the dangerous stunts that are called for, but is fired as a result of the star's jealousy. He accepts an offer to take part in a bank hold-up for a picture, but the bank is really robbed, and Buck breaks gaol to establish his innocence. A novel back-stage drama

"JUNGLE ISLAND"

A strange story of a lovely castaway on a desert island, a pearling schooner, its fearless mate and its rascally crew, and an old captain who lives only for the chance to recover the jewels that he gambled away in his youth. Starring Hobart Bosworth and Dick Thane

Also

Another episode of the dramatic serial:

"THE PAINTED STALLION,"

Starring Ray Corrigan

fectly willing to answer. The theft of the necklace, together with Unele Mark's will, had rather upset me, so I decided to try and get my mind off things. I went over to the public library."

"That's easy to check," said Lew.

"No, I'm afraid it isn't. I'd forgotten it was a State holiday—the library was closed. It was about eighty-three when I got back home."

"Oh, eighty-three exactly," averred Mrs. Wilder. "I was just tuning in on my favourite radio programme, 'This side of Twenty.'"

Lew moved along to Herbert Sandford, who seemed to be half-asleep beside his blonde wife.

"And you? Are you sober enough to remember anything?"

"You've got nothing on us!" cried his wife. "We were at the movies."

"And we can prove it, too," said Herbert, sitting upright. "I've got the stubs right here."

He was fumbling in a waistcoat pocket when Lew happened to glance at Edmund Sandford, who was sitting in a low chair with his knees crossed. His right foot was extended, and on the rubber heel of his boot was a star. The glance became a fixed stare.

"What are you looking at?" asked the wearer of the boot.

"You!" snapped Lew. "Well, Edmund, it's all over but the hanging. You were at Mark's house to-night. You left your footprints outside the back door."

"Well, what if I did?" challenged the suspect, springing to his feet with a steely glint in his dark eyes. "That doesn't make me out a murderer. I might have gone to the house to find out—"

"To find out where Mark hid his money!"

"Yes, maybe."

Ronald Sandford rose importantly. "Perhaps I could clear this thing up for you, captain," he said. "I'd like to take a fingerprint impression of all the Sandfords including myself."

He opened the little leather-covered case he was carrying and stood waiting hopefully.

"Go on, Lew, give him a chance," laughed Steve.

Lew nodded, and the would-be detective went straight to Mrs. Wilder, held out an inked pad, and marched her over to the desk.

"Wet your fingers on this," he said.

"You know, Jeane," said his victim, as she contemplated the black stuff on her hand after it had come into contact with the pad, "I've always told you there's nothing like clean wholesome fun."

"Now press your fingers on this paper," directed her nephew.

Her fingerprints decorated the sheet of paper he had taken from the case, and she stared at them.

"Aren't they funny?" she giggled.

Jeane's turn came next, then Edmund's.

"You're next, honey," said Ronald to his own wife.

While handkerchiefs were being used vigorously by those who had submitted, he took Grace Sandford's fingerprints and then her husband's.

"To complete the Sandford record," drawled Herbert, "you ought to go up to Mark's house and take his fingerprints, too."

Ronald ignored the unpleasant pleasantry.

"Well, now that I've got all the others," he said, "I'll take my own."

While he was doing so Steve remarked to Lew:

"Be a laugh if it did prove anything, wouldn't it?"

"Wouldn't it?" chuckled Lew.

Ronald walked over to Steve.

"Would you mind holding these a minute?" he asked, and Steve received the pad, the sheet of paper, and a magnifying-glass. They were thrust upon him so clumsily that his fingers became inked on the pad, but Ronald did not seem to notice the circumstance.

"Now listen, folks," said Lew sharply, as chatter broke out all round the room. "we're going to stay right here until I find out what each one was doing at eight o'clock, and—"

"I thought so!" broke in an exultant voice, and Lew swung round to see Ronald at the desk, magnifying-glass in hand and studying the sheet of paper in conjunction with a card he had taken from his pocket. Steve was wiping his smudged fingers.

"You thought what?" barked Lew.

"It worked!"

"What worked?"

Quivering with excitement, Ronald handed over the magnifying-glass.

"On this card," he said, "is a transfer of the finger-prints I found on Jeane's window frame after her necklace was stolen. Mr. Withers was kind enough to oblige with his impression. It's exactly the same as that one."

Lew compared the two sets of prints.

"You're right," he said loudly and with a heavy frown.

"Oh, of all things!" shrieked Mrs. Wilder.

"I don't believe it!" stormed Jeane, her eyes on Steve's very red face.

Herbert Sandford rose unsteadily.

"It only goes to show you never can tell," he proclaimed, slurring his words.

The other rose, Edmund declaring that he wasn't at all surprised.

"What have you got to say, Mr. Withers?" demanded Lew ominously.

"Captain," stammered Steve, "I—I don't know what to say. I—er—I—"

"There's nothing you can say!" Ronald shouted at him. "I suspected you all along."

"Yeah?" murmured Steve.

"Indeed he did," asserted Claire, "and I'm going to make you the thief in my play, because Ronald was sure it was you he saw running away from the house the night the necklace was stolen."

"But I couldn't accuse you till I had proof," said Ronald.

"Oh, but you must be wrong!" protested Jeane. "It just doesn't make sense!"

"You're not the only one he hoodwinked behind all this reporter stuff," Ronald retorted. "He probably knows plenty about the murder, too. I demand that you lock him up, Captain Nagel."

"Tell him where he gets off!" howled Steve; but Lew glared at him.

"I'm telling you where you get off," he thundered. "Where's the necklace?"

"You're the detective?" returned Steve quite angrily, "you find it!"

"Oh, smart guy, eh? You're under arrest!"

"What?"

"Don't 'what' me! You're under arrest!"

"But, Lew—"

"I'll have to warn you—whatever you say will be held against you."

"Oh," said Steve bitterly, "so that's how it is, is it?"

"Yeah, that's how it is."

"Then hold this against me and get it straight, because I'm only gonna say it once. I could be strung up by the neck for what I'd like to do to you."

While the others looked on, some with horror, some with more or less satisfaction, Steve advanced with clenched fists upon his chum.

"Go ahead and poke me in the nose," he blared, "but I still think you're—"

"If you don't shut up I'm liable to do just that!" threatened Lew.

"You're a brave guy, you are!"

With a sudden sweep of his arm that caught him in the jaw Lew sent the infuriated reporter blundering backwards into a chair, then opened the door into the charge-room and bellowed for Handley.

The massive sergeant appeared with celerity.

"Lock him up!" snapped Lew, jerking his thumb in Steve's direction.

"Mr. Withers?" gasped the astounded sergeant.

"Yes, lock him up!"

"Nobody's going to lock me up!" defied Steve, adopting a fighting attitude, but the sergeant caught hold of him as though he were a mere child, pinioned his arms behind his back, and bundled him out from the room.

"Captain," taunted Edmund Sandford, as Lew slammed the door, "how does it feel to know that you were barking up the wrong tree?"

"We all make mistakes?" growled Lew.

"Well," said Mrs. Wilder, "now that the clouds have lifted I think I'll July 23rd, 1938.

go home and try to make a contact with Mark. He always said give a thought to your departed and they'll give a thought to you."

"Just a minute," Lew raised an imperious hand. "There's still some unfinished business."

He went to the telephone on the desk and he asked the operator at the local exchange to put him through to the sheriff's office. The others waited, staring at one another, and presently he said:

"Hallo, sheriff. Nagel of Fairview speaking. I want you to seal a house up for me in the morning—sealed so tight that nobody can get in. Yes."

He replaced the receiver.

"I just want you all to know," he said, "that I'm helping you keep faith with Mark Sandford. You may go."

The Sandfords went, most of them in haste to get out of the building. Jeane was the last to reach the door, and he called her back.

"I want to see you," he said gravely. "Won't you sit down?"

She nodded and walked over to a chair near a steel filing cabinet, and he closed the door.

The Man in the Room

IT was not till he had returned to the desk and dropped into his chair behind it that he looked at her beautiful face, and then he saw that she was crying.

"Why the tears?" he asked gruffly.

"Steve, eh?"

She nodded miserably, wiping her eyes with a very inadequate handkerchief.

"It was awfully easy to like him," she said. "I would have bet my last nickel he was head and shoulders above anything like this."

"If I were you," he returned with a smile, "I'd still give him the benefit of the doubt." He dived a hand into his coat-pocket and brought out an almost perfect copy of the necklace that had been lost. "Here, I want you to wear this."

"My necklace!" she exclaimed in amazement.

"No," he corrected, "just a cheap imitation, but I want you to pretend it's the real thing and wear it for the next twenty-four hours. Be sure that everybody sees it."

She took the necklace, staring at him. "But what will I say about it?" she asked. "They'll be sure to question me."

"That's what I'm banking on," said he. "When's your next birthday?"

"The eighteenth of this month," she replied wonderingly. "That'll be a week from Thursday."

"Fine! I want you to tell everybody that your uncle's entire fortune is hidden in the house, but that the will provides you're not to receive it until your birthday."

She fastened the necklace round her throat.

"Do you mind if I ask what you expect to happen?" she inquired.

"Plenty. The one who has the real necklace will know it's a cooked-up story. More than that, they'll know I'm turning on the heat. That's why I'm having the house sealed—to egg them on."

"You mean you think someone will go back to the house?"

"Just as soon as they hear your story."

Three reporters from the city of Hartford had entered the charge-room from the street, and they were asking for Lew when he emerged from his room with Jeane and recognised them.

"Hallo, boys! I'll see you in a minute."

He escorted the girl to the front steps and went back to deal with the reporters.

"Now how about a statement on the murder?" asked one.

"Sorry, boys," he replied. "I haven't a thing to say."

"Not even a few simple words, eh?" asked another disgustedly. "I suppose you gave it all to Withers?"

"Yeah, I gave it all to Withers," said Lew. "In fact, I gave him the business. Take a look!"

He opened the door that led to the cells, and two of them went to bait Steve in his cage. The third lingered to say:

"You don't deserve it, Nagel, but I've got a news story I think you'd appreciate. Kennedy's been boosted to Commissioner."

Lew compressed his lips.

"What's that got to do with me?" he barked.

"Oh, nothing. I just thought you'd like to know he's making good."

"Thanks."

The reporter followed his colleagues, and Lew went to the sergeant's desk.

"On your toes, Handley," he said urgently. "Take some of your men up to the Sandford house right away. Lie low up there, and let anyone in that wants to get in, but don't let anyone get out. Understand?"

"Right, captain," nodded the sergeant; and then Lew made for the cells.

Steve was informing his persecutors that anything he said would be unfit to print.

"All right, boys, scram!" commanded Lew. "I'll see you to-morrow."

The three reporters departed none too willingly, and Lew was left alone with the prisoner and gave him a tight-lipped grin that was distinctly reassuring.

"Congratulations," said Steve. "What a show you put on, boy! I wouldn't have believed you had it in you."

"You weren't so bad yourself," said Lew, "but were we in a spot, or were we in a spot?"

"You can quote me as saying we were."

Lew opened the door of the cell, and they shook hands.

"It worked like a charm," said Lew.

"With you under lock and key, the Sandfords think I'm through with them. I'll lay you odds I have the whole thing cleared up before midnight. Before I turned 'em loose I let them know that I was having Mark's house sealed in the morning."

"Oh!" Steve chuckled. "You figure that whichever one of them killed Hackett will sneak up there to-night and try to find out what he was after—right?"

"Right! And we'll sneak back to the house ourselves."

"I'll have to buzz old sour-puss first," decided Steve. "I'll meet you there, eh?"

"Okay. But be careful what you say for publication."

Steve went off to telephone the "Morning Herald," and Lew made for the garage of the police station.

Half an hour afterwards, the squad car was standing under some trees just inside the gateway of the house on Jackson Hill, and Lew had found Sergeant Handley behind a bush facing the front of the house without the slightest difficulty.

"Are you sure nobody came in or out?" he questioned.

(Continued on page 25)

The Three Mesquiteers lose a lot of cattle and think that bears from the nearby game reserve are to blame, but they discover the truth and become involved with the wardens and a gang of unscrupulous trappers. Starring Bob Livingston, Ray Corrigan and Max Terhune

"HEART of the ROCKIES"

Menaced by Bears

THE Three Mesquiteers were not their usual cheerful selves as they made a tour of their ranch. The three friends who had had so many adventures together had a ranch at the foot of the Rockies, and working hard they made it pay handsomely, but recently they had been losing cattle. Three or four head a week, and they had a suspicion it was rustlers.

It was the tall, broad-shouldered Tucson Smith who saw the ragged, unshaven figure that tried to scuttle away into the bush, and it was Stony Brooke, the virile, handsome Romeo of the band, who snaked a rope over the man's head, whilst Lullaby Joslin, the big fellow with the ready wit, played with a gun in case the prisoner should prove dangerous.

They recognised their captive as Enoch Dawson. He belonged to a nomad mountain clan, who lived not many miles from their ranch, and existed by trapping wild animals. A crafty, unsavoury bunch of squatters was Lullaby's definition of the Dawson clan, and the only redeeming feature to the minds of the Three Mesquiteers were Lorna and young Davy. It puzzled them how so pretty a girl as Lorna could ever have been bred of such stock, whilst her small brother Davy was a freckled, open-faced young rip. They were to find out later that they were foster children.

Enoch showed no sign of fight, but he eyed the Mesquiteers malevolently.

"Start talking," ordered Tucson. "What were you doing on our range land?"

"And why did you try to duck out when we spotted you?" added Stony.

"Well, I was sorta surprised when I seen you Three Mesquiteers," mumbled Enoch. He hesitated. "And—"

"And having a guilty conscience you decided to beat it?" prompted Stony.

"You boys have got me all wrong," Enoch shook his head. "I ain't never touched your cattle. I was laying my traps for wild cats on your range when you come along. It's the animals in the National Park what's been killing your stock."

The Three Mesquiteers glanced round instinctively. They could see clearly the strong, close-weaved wire fence that enclosed the National Park that bordered their property.

"I can prove it," added Enoch.

The trapper led them through the woods to a clearing and pointed to a badly mauled young calf that lay dead near some brush.

"Skull's been crushed by a heavy blow," called out Tucson, the first to vault down from his bronc.

"Only a bear kills that way," explained Enoch. "You'll see a lot of bear tracks around here."

The Mesquiteers knew bear tracks when they saw them.

"Enoch, we're sorry we suspected you," Stony gouted apologetically.

"Well, that's all right," Enoch half smiled, showing discoloured teeth. "After this, when I want to do any trapping on your land I'll ask ya."

After strapping the dead calf to a saddle the Three Mesquiteers rode off, and Enoch Dawson watched them with mocking derision in his dark eyes. The poor fools quite thought bears got their cattle and were planning to go bear-hunting.

The Mesquiteers decided to ride close to the fencing of the Blackstone National Park game preserve. They sighted a herd of deer that tossed up their heads as they got their scent, but made no attempt to scamper away.

"My, but they're tame," cried Lullaby. "Bet they never heard a shot fired in their lives."

"They're gonna hear one now," answered Tucson, whisking a rifle from a saddle holster. "See that wild cat stalking them?"

Tucson missed, but his shots went close enough to make that wildcat decide the neighbourhood was unhealthy. They rode on their way, but the shots had been heard by the game wardens, who watched over the park. Good-hearted fellows, but very suspicious. They had reason to suspect that men had entered the game preserves in recent months and that deer had been slaughtered. Hearing these shots they decided it was game rustlers.

The Mesquiteers had not ridden far when they sighted a small bear and it headed for the game preserve. Tucson's rifle barked, but his shooting was not accurate enough at that range. The bear went into the park and the Mesquiteers jumped a gate in the wire fence. They fired with the rifle and their revolvers, but the bear got to cover behind a rock, and they were making disgustedly for the boundary when Lullaby pointed.

"Game wardens," he cried. "If they catch us in the park with firearms we'll be fined."

The Three Mesquiteers beat it for safety with four wardens in close pursuit. These range wardens wore a uniform July 23rd, 1938.

form not unlike that of the Canadian Mounted Police, though the chief colour was blue. They would not have succeeded in catching the trespassers if Lullaby's horse hadn't tripped and flung him from the saddle. Of course, they had to go back to help him, and that enabled the wardens to surround them.

"You boys weren't in any hurry to get out of the park, were you?" The speaker was a middle-aged man, who glowered at them from beneath bushy eyebrows. The other wardens were young men.

"Well—or—now that you mention it, Captain Brady, we were in a bit of a hurry," admitted Tucson.

"Well, I don't have to tell you the park regulations," Brady barked out. "Hand over your guns."

"We trailed a calf-killing bear in here from our range," indignantly explained Stony. "And it's got to be destroyed."

"Nothing doing, Stony," Brady was a strict adherer to the law. He prided himself that nobody ever broke any of the regulations of this park and got away with it. A stubborn man was Brady, and the preservation of the game was an obsession. "You know the law absolutely forbids shooting anywhere within the park boundaries."

"But look at our side of it, Brady," Tucson argued. "Your mountain lions and bears, which are encouraged to thrive here, come out of the park and they kill off our stock. In the last four months we've lost thirty head of cattle and—"

"That's your look out," Brady was not sympathetic. "You look after your cattle and I'll look after my game."

Suddenly from behind a distant rock a huge bear appeared, stood on its hind legs and showed its teeth in an angry snarl.

"No moth-eaten bear is going to kill my cattle and then laugh at me," raged Stony, and whipped out his gun, but before he could fire Tucson knocked up his arm. Tucson knew one might be surrounded by bears, but one mustn't fire a gun in the park with Brady around. The gun exploded harmlessly.

If Tucson expected any thanks for what he had done he did not get it from Brady. The hard-faced warden had drawn his own gun.

"This is something I can't overlook," he said sourly. "Hand over your gun and make it quick."

There was nothing they could do but obey. How that bear must have laughed as it lumbered away up the mountain side.

"You can get your gun back at the ranger station by putting up the regulation fine," were Captain Brady's parting words.

The Three Mesquiteers were gloomy as they headed towards their ranch. It never rained but it poured.

"We've got to fight this thing to a finish or get out of the cattle business," Stony announced.

"There's more ways of killing a bear than shooting him in a game refuge," answered Tucson.

"What do you want to do—choke him to death with calf meat?" sneered Stony.

"Did it ever occur to you that Enoch Dawson and his mountain clan make a living trapping wild animals?" Tucson spoke meaningfully.

"I got it!" It was Lullaby who answered. "Let's pay 'em a visit."

The Dawson Clan

A QUEER youngster was Davy Dawson. Actually, he was a perfectly normal, healthy boy, but his queerness lay in the strange power that he seemed to possess with all animals. Perhaps it was his kindly nature and his sympathy for the wild creatures of the forests, but with small and large creatures alike he had the gift of making friends. The mountain lion and the big bear were too wild to be tamed, but given time and opportunity Davy might even have conquered them. This power was one of the reasons why the Dawson

Clan valued the boy's gift and made use of it.

This morning he was in the old barn that he was allowed to use for his pets. What a motley throng they comprised. Most of them very young and unable to look after themselves. Any animal or bird that had lost its parents, been injured or was starving was brought back to the old barn, and when fit and strong allowed to return to the wild. That morning he had freed two young coyotes, a young lion cub, several rabbits and a black maeaw. The latter he had found with a broken wing. One of his pets that he was not allowed to free was a large mountain bear. No one but Davy could go anywhere near the big fellow.

Davy's clothes were ragged remnants of Dawson's cast-off clothing, but in his small way he was content, though there were times when his eyes would fill with tears because the Dawson Clan could be cruel and very unkind. After releasing the bird he turned his head because his sharp hearing told him horsemen were approaching. Running to a mound of rubbish he scanned the valley and then saw the Mesquiteers approaching. His hands went to his mouth and the call of the coyote came from his throat.

The Mesquiteers heard and knew it was Davy. It was his special call signal to three of his best friends. Not often did they visit the Dawson Clan, but whenever they did they had a kindly word for Davy and his sister. They picked him up and tossed him playfully to each other when they had dismissed and Davy did not seem to mind.

"How's that new splint of yours for broken wings?" asked Lullaby.

"Gee, Lullaby, swell," the boy enthused. "You ought to see the bird I just cured. If I'd known you were coming I'd have kept him. Say, you ought to see all the patients I got in my hospital."

"Let's take a look at 'em," said Lullaby.

"You want to come, too?" Davy asked Tucson and Stony.

"No, thanks." The former shook his head and grinned. "Where's your father, Davy?"

"You mean my foster father, Big Ed Dawson?" said Davy, with a scowl. "You'll find him down at the pens, feeding the foxes."

The two Mesquiteers went off to find Big Ed Dawson whilst Lullaby followed the youngster into the barn, which was not unlike a miniature zoo.

Davy proudly displayed his patients. A cage with a badger that he had found badly shot, but was now recovering.

"You ought to be a doctor when you grow up," opined Lullaby.

"That's what I want to be," eagerly agreed Davy. "See that coon. I caught him in my trap line. Pa Dawson said I could keep him 'cause his fur wasn't prime, but I'm gonna let him go before it is."

"What about that mountain lion cub you raised last year?"

"Oh, I had to chase him back into the wilds before Pa decided to skin him—"

"You can get your gun back at the Ranger station by putting up the regulation fine," said Brady.

Stony stepped forward, took the trapper by the collar, and jerked him round.

sometimes he comes when he hears me give that coyote call. But I ain't shown you nothing yet." The boy fumbled in a hut, and brought out a baby fox. "Ain't he a pip?"

Big Ed Dawson was a heavy, coarse man with thick lips and large, blood-shot eyes. Their manner was almost furtive as they watched the two Mesquiteers, and when the latter grinned a greeting their manner changed. They listened covertly to their two visitors, and then Big Ed became quite unctious in his manner.

"Mighty nice of you to tell us about that mountain lion in Echo Canyon, boys," he said. "If we can get him it'll be a hundred dollars bounty you've thrown our way."

"Well, if you can get that lion you're welcome to it," answered Stony. "It leads up to what we came to see you about—the bounty on bears."

"There ain't no bounty on bears."

"We're paying that bounty, Ed," stated Stony. "Fifty dollars apiece for every bear hide you trappers can show us, and you keep the hides. It's the only way to save our cattle."

"I get ye," Ed Dawson gave Enoch a sly glance. "But you're gonna pay out a lotta money. Say, the whole Dawson family's over at the house this afternoon. Why don't you come over and tell 'em about it."

"That's a good idea," decided Tucson.

Enoch Dawson left the Mesquiteers talking with the head of the clan, because he wanted to find out what Lullaby might be doing. He guessed he would find Lullaby talking with Davy, and his beady eyes blazed when he entered the barn to find the two watching the antics of Nero, the big bear that had been caught in a trap. Owing to the fur being out of condition the animal would have been killed but for an idea of Big Ed Dawson's. Davy had been encouraged to tame the bear, and the experiment had been a most profitable success.

"Where's Tucson and Stony?" Lullaby asked directly he saw Enoch.

"Up at the house with Big Ed. You should join 'em."

Lullaby went out of the barn, and Davy would have gone with him if Enoch had not curtly ordered him to see that the bear was chained up. Enoch feared the bear because he sensed that the big brute hated him. When the bear was secured Enoch grabbed the boy by the coat collar and brutally slapped his face. The bear went nearly mad with rage as the youngster sprawled on the ground, holding his cheek.

"I thought I told you not to tell anybody about Nero," snarled Enoch. "Now stop yer snivelling and get into the house."

The pens were some distance from the old ramshackle ranch-house and its various outbuildings, and the Mesquiteers were strolling along chatting with Big Ed when the sound of music carried clearly. Big Ed grinned to himself as he saw their expressions. Though he was pretending friendship with the Mesquiteers he hated them, and if anyone liked the Mesquiteers then they earned his hatred. Davy was one such, but the boy was useful. Lorna was another, and he knew she was sweet on Stony. Well, he'd settled that little matter, and it was going to afford him much amusement watching their faces.

The Mesquiteers found that not only were all the Dawson Clan gathered in the big living-room but there were others present—trappers, hill folk and small settlers. The music was being provided by six or seven of these settlers whose chief instruments of sound were guitars and their voices. The room was decorated with streamers, and everyone seemed to be drinking and making merry.

"Who's getting married?" Stony demanded, because he knew that this was a wedding feast.

An Italian, swarthy of skin and dark of eye, came in rolling a hoghead of beer. Big Ed waved his hand towards him, and Stony's jaw stiffened. Charley Coe was a half-breed trapper who was linked up with the Dawson Clan, and Stony did not like the fellow, and he was not surprised when two giggling girls brought Lorna from the next room. The girl was very pale and very frightened, but she was trying not to reveal her fear. They had dolled her up in tawdry finery. A very waxy, frightened sort of old woman put a comforting arm round her and gazed nervously across at Big Ed—Mrs. Dawson was scared of her bully of a husband. Charley slung the cask on to a table, pulled out the stopper and rammed in the spout. He drew himself a glass. It was obvious that the man was very tipsy.

The Mesquiteers just stood and watched the dancers, but Stony's hands clenched when Charley reeled across the room and tried to embrace Lorna. He stepped forward, took the trapper by the collar and jerked him round. Crack! Stony's fist had landed on his jaw. Charley fell and whipped out a knife, but Lullaby stepped forward and trod full weight on his wrist.

"This monkey isn't going to marry Lorna!" Stony shouted at old Dawson. "She's only a child."

"She wants to marry Charley," answered Big Ed, and glowered at the girl. "Don't you, Lorna?"

The girl was terrified of her foster parent.

"Yes—I—I—guess so!" she stammered.

"Well, I'm not going to let her marry him, and neither would you if she were your daughter. Do you men all want to go to gaol?"

"What for?"

Tucson pushed forward.

"I've got you, Stony," he said, and his big frame towered over Big Ed. "You're forgetting that this State has a law protecting children. She can't marry until she's sixteen whether she wants to or not." The smile of relief on Lorna's face was sufficient answer.

"And I guess we won't stick around for the wedding," added Stony. "'Cause now there won't be one."

Charley would have made mischief if he had not seen the look on Big Ed's face. He feared Ed just as much as the others did.

"Thanks for warning us," Big Ed mumbled in fawning tones.

Looking disgusted, the Mesquiteers departed, and Big Ed stopped Charley from using a gun when Lorna ran out of a side door to thank her saviours.

"What's the idea? Are the Three Mesquiteers running this family now?" Charley snarled viciously.

"Listen, you, if we fight with them ranchers we can't make any more out of 'em, can we?"

"No," Charley mumbled grudgingly.

"And right now we've got 'em so darned well fooled they come here to offer us a bounty of fifty dollars apiece for bears!" He laughed hoarsely. "That surprises yuh, don't it? We sell their beef to the Park hotels and sell the Park bears to them. What's more they was right about Lorna. One of these snooping inspectors might get wise and make it mighty hot, and we don't wanna get the wrong side of the law. But there's plenty of time, Charley, and I'm her guardian."

Charlie nodded and grinned:

"When we going bear hunting?"

Davy's Accident

It was not long before the wardens of Blackstone National Park heard about the Mesquiteers and their activities:

"The Mesquiteers had threatened to clear out every bear in the park," Captain Brady told his men. "And they're living up to their reputation for keeping their word. If you run across any of them on Park property, armed, make an arrest."

The Dawson Clan knew the forests and every niche and cranny in the mountains. They knew exactly how many wardens were watching the game preserve and how best to avoid them. A number of bears had been killed and the money collected from the Mesquiteers.

"Not a ranger in sight," Big Ed said one morning. "We'll take one more bear, and then we'll quit."

"Yeah, we want some time to cover a little cattle rustling later on," retorted his son Enoch.

"Davy, you run the trap line," Big Ed looked down at the small boy. "And remember, if you get caught you're trapping for yourself."

Big Ed rode off with the half-dozen men that he had picked for the bear trapping, but Enoch lingered for a parting threat.

"And if I catch you turning any more fur loose, you'll get a worse hiding than you had 'last time."

Enoch rode off and left Davy the unpleasant job of scuttling through the undergrowth to see what spoils were in the traps that had been set during the night. Being small and clever with animals it minimised the danger of detection. The clan had other and larger traps just outside the boundary fence, and the trap line often drove animals from the Park—that and an occasional shot. There were few tricks that the Dawsons did not know.

In the first trap there was a lovely little baby fox caught by the foot. Davy raised his stick to kill the fox because the skin would be valuable, then hesitated and glanced round. He was not being spied on by Enoch. If the baby fox's leg was broken he would have to kill it because he would not be allowed to take it to his hospital, but if the leg were not broken he would let it go free. The leg was not broken, and the fox scampered away to freedom. The sound of horse hoofs came to his ears, timed to the least sound, and he dived into a bush. It was two of the hated wardens, and they reined in their horses close to his hiding-place.

July 23rd, 1938.

"No sign of the Mesquiteers!" announced Brady. "Well, keep your eyes open. They're working cattle around here somewhere."

Davy saw Brady, the head warden, take a trail towards the southern boundary, whilst his assistant vanished along an eastern trail. When the boy thought it was safe he ventured out of hiding, and when he came to the fourth trap gave an eager little cry—there was a lion cub imprisoned in a cleverly camouflaged cage. The little creature snapped at him.

"Don't be scared," whispered Davy. "I won't hurt you. I'll take you home to play with Nero." He put the cub down in order to close the trap, and when he looked round his capture was scampering away into the undergrowth. "Hey, come back here!"

Davy had quite a chase before he secured the cub. He had followed the cub out of the forest into a rocky clearing, and right on the edge of a cliff the boy made a successful sprint.

"What a cute pet you're gonna be!" chortled Davy.

The words were scarcely out of his mouth before part of the ledge on which he was kneeling gave way, but though he had very little idea of what was happening his hands did not release their grip of the cub. Zonk! Almost all the breath was knocked out of his body as he crashed on his back on to a hard flat rock. Whilst he lay there hugging the lion cub a veritable avalanche of stones slithered down, and when it was finished Davy found himself powerless to move. Was his leg broken? He managed to raise himself and saw that a huge flat stone had trapped him.

Meanwhile sounds of shooting had carried to the ears of Brady, who had decided to patrol a new sector of the Park, and he collected his wardens. Naturally, this small-minded official was certain that it was one of the Three Mesquiteers. Actually it was the Dawson gang killing another bear to sell for its hide and the fifty-dollar bounty.

The Mesquiteers were out rounding up their cattle. They were planning to keep the beasts as much as possible away from the Parkstone National Park. As they chased a refractory cow they did hear distant shooting, but did not pay much attention. The cow turned suddenly and went bounding along a track that they knew led to the river. They paused for breath as there was no further need to worry.

Then suddenly to their ears came the cry of a coyote.

Lullaby looked up from mopping his streaming face with a large bandanna.

"That was Davy calling," he stated definitely. "Maybe the kid's in trouble."

They waited, and the call came again. At once they set out along the boundary with the call getting clearer. Lullaby made a hoarse attempt to imitate it. They came to the wire fence, beyond which was the rocky clearing. Tucson took out some binoculars, and he gave a gasp as he realised why Davy had sent out his call. He could just see the boy lying on a ledge, apparently unable to move, and on another ledge only a yard or so above Davy was a huge puma. He took another look and saw the squirming object that crawled across Davy's chest.

"Davy's on a ledge. Must have fallen over." Tucson handed the glasses to Stony. "He's got a cub with him and a puma that looks like springing down on him." He drew out the rifle, which had been recovered on payment of the fine, and raised it carefully. "I've got to take a long chance."

Of course, Brady and one of his men must come charging up. They had got on the trail of the Mesquiteers, and thought they had caught them in the act.

"Hey, drop that gun!" ordered Brady.

"Take it easy, Brady!" rasped out Stony, dropping the binoculars and whipping out a gun. "One word from you and it'll be just too bad. Take your time, Tucson."

The puma jumped to a rock lower down the cliff face and was crouching to spring when Tucson fired. Tucson drilled the cat through the head with a magnificent shot.

Brady was speechless to think that the Mesquiteers could commit such a flagrant breach of the law, and then cap everything by holding him up. It shimmered through to his sluggish brain that perhaps there was more behind this than just the shooting of a puma. He saw Tucson and Lullaby clambering through the boundary fence and running through the trees.

"If you'll pick up those glasses I dropped or use your own you'll see something peculiar about that cliff face," Stony gritted out savagely. "You'll see where that stream has hollowed out a small canyon something lying on a ledge, and it ain't a bear or a lion cub. If I hadn't held you up, that something might have been as dead as that puma."

Tucson and Lullaby could only get to the boy from the top of the cliff. He had dropped about twenty feet, and the two ranchers could see no foothold that would bear their weight.

"You all right, Davy?"

"My leg's hurt, Lullaby!" Davy called up. "He held up the ball of fur. "But look what I got here."

"That kid's sure got a lot of nerve." Tucson murmured admiringly, as he uncoiled his rope. "I'd better let you down, Lullaby."

"Don't move, Davy," Lullaby ordered as he fixed the rope under his armpits. "I'll be right down and get you."

It says something for the strength and mighty muscles of Tucson that he lowered Lullaby Joslin, who was a good thirteen stone, without an effort, but it was not quite so easy to drag the big fellow back, especially as there was a small boy and a lion cub as extra weight. A scurrying of feet and he glanced round to see Stony and the two wardens. The new arrivals put their backs into it, and in a very few moments Lullaby, Davy and the lion cub were safely on the cliff top.

"Where're you hurt, Davy?" Stony asked, and the youngster, wincing with pain, pointed to his leg. Expert but gentle hands ran over the boy. Stony looked at Brady. "His leg's broken."

"We'll phone from the ranger station," gruffly stated the warden. "We'll get a doctor to Dawson's by the time you get him there."

"Thanks," Stony looked fixedly at Brady. "We'll be back to face any charges you may care to make."

"That won't be necessary." Brady was at once on his dignity. "I suppose you were justified, but remember that the next time you draw a gun on me you'd better look out."

"Whether I pull a gun on you or ain't is up to you!" angrily cried Stony. "I'm getting tired of your interference. Come on, Tucson, let's get busy cutting some poles."

"Well, I shall arrest you fellows if any of you dare come on to Park property with firearms," mumbled Brady, and, looking sourly at the other warden, jerked his head. "Come on!"

Bear Marks and Other Clues

NATURALLY, the Dawsons were furious to find that Davy had broken his leg, but wisely they kept their anger to themselves, and made no objection to a doctor being brought in to set the boy's leg.

The Three Mesquiteers were there, and it was Lullaby Joslin who had the clever notion of amusing Davy and keeping him distracted whilst the painful setting was carried out by bringing along Elmer. One of Lullaby's attributes was the art of ventriloquism, and Elmer was a talking doll. Kids for miles around loved to listen to Elmer, who was a shock-headed ruffian of a boy that sat on Lullaby's knee, and made them die with laughing with his stories and wisecracks. And though Davy's eyes often filled with tears and he gritted his teeth as the doctor worked he managed sometimes to laugh at all the funny things Elmer had to say. But at last the broken leg was set and put into splints, and the doctor and the Mesquiteers promised to come and see Davy every day. The doctor promised because Stony had whispered that the Mesquiteers would settle the account.

For a while the Mesquiteers lost very few of their cattle, and it was several weeks after Davy's accident that it started all over again. The three ranchers were annoyed because the Dawson Clan had killed a great number of bears and collected quite a lot of money.

One day they found a dead calf and near by were bear tracks, but on this occasion the quick eyes of Stony noticed a number of small holes. He examined them closely and then called Tucson. The big fellow looked at these holes and commented that each one was exactly the same size. He looked at Stony and read the look in the latter's eyes.

"When did you see Davy last, Lullaby?"

"A couple of days ago," was the answer. "And say, he gets about on that crutch I made him like nobody's business."

"What do you suppose punched all those little holes in the ground?" Stony asked.

Lullaby went down on his knees. "Looks like somebody's been using a pole."

"Or a crutch, maybe," Stony spoke with marked significance. "Davy's got a tame bear, too, hasn't he?"

"You're loco if you think that, Stony," Lullaby got the meaning at once. "Why, Davy wouldn't help rustle our cattle—"

"Well, he couldn't help himself if Big Ed or Enoch forced him," interrupted Tucson.

"Lullaby, when we get to Dawson's compare these bear tracks with Nero's, will you?" suggested Stony.

That afternoon the Three Mesquiteers headed for the hills and the valley where the Dawson Clan lived. They were leading two small horses. When within a mile of the barn where Davy kept his pets, Lullaby made the coyote call, and a few minutes afterwards the answer came back.

Only Lorna and Davy were at the barn. Lorna had not the same power as her brother, but she got on pretty well with most of his pets. She looked an attractive picture even in her rough, faded clothes as she stood by the barn door smiling a welcome at the Three Mesquiteers. She was busy feeding the lion cub from a bottle. Davy came limping out on his crutch and grinned from ear-to-ear at sight of his three heroes. He dragged them inside to see his new family of porcupines.

"Gee, I'm glad to see you," the boy cried. "Was I glad when I heard that coyote call. What's kept you away?"

"We're losing our cattle faster than ever," explained Stony. "But let's see how fast you're getting along." He picked the boy up in his strong arms. "We got a surprise for you."

Davy looked at Stony in surprise as the Mesquiteer carried him outside. He was still more surprised when he was placed in the saddle of a small pony.

"How is he, cowboy?" chuckled Lullaby.

"He's swell. I'd like to ride him some time."

"I'm glad you like him because he's yours," explained Lullaby, and pointed to the slightly larger pony. "And the other one is for Lorna."

"You're awfully good." There were tears in Lorna's pretty eyes. "But we're not worth it. I don't know what to say." Suddenly she burst into tears.

"What's the trouble, Lorna?" sympathetically demanded Stony, putting an arm round her. "Tell me, you're among friends. Is it Charley Coe?"

"Big Ed's planning to move farther back into the woods," Lorna said between sobs. "I guess that means I'll have to marry Charley."

The Mesquiteers glanced at each other.

"When does Big Ed plan on pulling out?" Stony asked.

"Two or three days—maw's packing now."

"Well, don't you worry, a lot of things can happen before then." Stony spoke jovially. "Here's your pony, young lady; see if the stirrups are okay."

Once Lorna was on the mettlesome pony she forgot all her worries. She stammered out her grateful thanks to the Three Mesquiteers.

A lumbering figure showed up and the small eyes were blazing. It was Charley Coe.

"Get down off that horse, Lorna," he shouted. "You ain't taking presents from nobody."

But when Charley attempted to drag Lorna from the saddle, the quick-tempered Stony took him by the shirt-collar and dragged him back. Charley lashed out and caught Stony very low, and that made the Mesquiteer see red. Wallop! He measured Charley with a right-handed punch that must have almost broken the trapper's jaw. He got to his feet and Lorna screamed because there was a knife in his hand. Stony just jumped and the two men rolled on the ground struggling for possession of the knife.

From nowhere materialised Big Ed, Enoch and several more of the Dawson Clan. Big Ed half drew a gun, but Tucson was quicker to the draw.

"Hold it!" he barked. "This is a two-man fight, so don't get any sudden ideas."

Charley was the bigger man of the two and a dirty fighter. He snarled like a wild cat as he strove to free his hand so he could drive the knife into Stony's ribs. A twist of his wiry body caused Stony to topple over and Charley for a moment gained the mastery. As he pinned Stony he tried to get his hand free. With an upward heave of his chest Stony rid himself of his enemy, and as Charley shot over his head a twist of the wrist caused the knife to fall. Stony flung the weapon into some bushes and waited for his man to rise.

Lullaby, Davy and the lion cub were hauled up the cliff to safety.

July 23rd, 1938.

The Dawson Clan were so intent on watching the fight and shouting hoarse encouragement to Charley that they did not notice Lullaby slowly edging towards the barn.

Charley was up and at Stony like a whirlwind. A wild punch caught Stony on the jaw and down went the Mesquiteer. Charley lashed out with his foot, but Stony's hands shot out and fastened round the mountaineer's leg. Down crashed Charley, and, locked in each other's arms, they rolled over and over—conveniently away from the barn towards some sort of storehouse. It enabled Lullaby to slip into the barn unobserved.

The men broke, staggered to their feet, and, when Charley rushed, Stony was able to land with a good left. Enoch slid out a gun.

"Get over there—get!" Tucson had seen. "Against that wall, all of you, and no tricks."

They exchanged furious punches, many of which missed. Already both men had landed with blows that would have clean knocked out most men, but these Westerners were tough. But Stony got in a bad way when, in falling, he crashed on to a stone and it seemed to paralyse his leg. He limped around trying to beat off Charley, who was quick to see the hated Mesquiteer was in trouble. A vicious uppercut caused Stony to drop, and, as he staggered up, Charley banged him in the face with both fists.

"Finish him, Charley, finish him up!" the mountaineers yelled.

Meantime Lullaby was busy in the barn. Being a frequent visitor, he was known to Nero, who recognised in this lunnan a man with a kindly nature. The bear snarled a little, but made no objection to Lullaby putting his foot on a piece of paper. Very carefully Lullaby took impressions and measurements. A sound made him glance round, and there was young Davy. The boy looked the picture of woe.

"I guess we won't be pals any more, Lullaby, now that you know I ain't been on the level with ya."

"It's not your fault, Davy, you couldn't help yourself," consoled Lullaby, tucking the paper inside his shirt. "Not a word about this, son. Just leave everything to your three pals."

Outside they found the fight still raging, and, if anything, in Charley's favour. Stony fell and lay still, and Charley stood over his fallen victim with his foot raised to stamp on his face. But Stony was only shamming, and those hands caught Charley's ankles and gave a violent jerk. The mountain trapper landed on the back of his head and got to his feet badly shaken. Tucson gave a sigh of relief when Stony began to wade into Charley with jabs and uppercuts. Soon Charley's face was sorely recognisable. Both eyes were closed, his lips were out and his nose streaming with blood.

Lullaby edged across to the fighters, and, as Stony backed away, giving his rival a chance to get up from the punch that had dropped him, Lullaby spoke out of the corner of his mouth.

"I got 'em!"

Stony made no sign that he had heard, but when Charley was on his feet, he hit the mountaineer all the harder, and finally ended the fight by tossing the almost unconscious ruffian over his shoulder like a bale of hay. Charley did not rise, but lay sprawled out, moaning feebly.

Stony dusted his hands and walked up to Big Ed Dawson.

"Listen, Ed, if you ever let Charley July 23rd, 1933.

Coe put a hand on Lorna again, I'll come back and finish what I started—see?"

"If Charley can't take care of himself, none of us is going to help him," muttered the treacherous trapper. "How about the bounty on them last three bears we ketches for ya?"

"We're heading back to the ranch for a few days, Ed," answered Tucson, pouching his gun. "We'll bring the money over to you when we get back."

"That's all right, Tucson; there ain't no hurry."

"You and your boys might keep an eye on our stock round these parts whilst we're gone," suggested Lullaby affably. "You'll be trapping on our range, anyhow."

"Be plumb glad to, Lullaby," Ed answered with a great grin.

Stony helped Lorna down from the horse. She had been too wrapt in the fight to think of moving.

"Don't you worry, Lorna," he whispered. "We'll be back."

When the Mesquiteers had gone, Big Ed, Enoch and the mountaineers went and stood over Charley. They laughed contemptuously.

"Do you think we can keep an eye on their cattle, boys?" Big Ed asked, as the mountaineers moved away without making an effort to help the fallen man. Their harsh laughter was heard by the Mesquiteers, who had paused to look at the impressions of Nero's foot.

A Range War

EARLY next morning Lorna and Davy sneaked off to the barn.

Time and again they came to the open door with pets in their arms. Davy sniffed when he let the porcupines go because he was frightened that the youngsters might not survive. Still Davy had to chance that because to stay here meant death. The Dawsons were leaving and Big Ed had ordered that all Davy's pets were to be killed with the exception of the bear.

"Is that all?" asked Lorna, freeing a squirrel.

"All except him and the lion cub," Davy pointed to the big bear.

"Maybe we could keep this one?" Lorna said, taking from a hutch the cub that had almost cost Davy his life.

"No, they all gotta go."

Davy took the cub from her arms and put it down outside the barn door. "Good-bye, little fellow," whispered the boy.

The cub was toddling away when a shot rang out and the cub dropped in its tracks and lay still. The two youngsters turned and there was Enoch, a smoking gun in his hands.

"I told you if you turned any more animals loose I'd give you a good hiding, and—" That was as far as Enoch got because of the hideous snarl that shook the barn. But for the rope the bear would have rushed at the trapper.

"All right, I'll let you off this time."

"Down, Nero, down!" ordered Davy.

"Untie him and bring him along," ordered Enoch. "But make sure he don't get close to me."

Some time later Big Ed Dawson came out of the hill bungalow and looked round to see if everything was as ordered. The women were busy loading up a prairie schooner and other carts, while a number of trappers and mountaineers were standing around with their horses or mounted. Lumbering up the slight grade came Davy and his bear.

"We'll be back by sundown, maw," Big Ed shouted to his wife. "Have everything packed and ready." With a cumbersome leap he managed to struggle into the saddle of his big horse. "All right, start riding."

Big Ed Dawson was determined to have a final clean-up of the cattle of the Mesquiteers in these ranges, and then to move off to some rocky caverns on higher ground, where one could be hidden and never be found. This district was getting played out.

Soon, they encountered some of the Mesquiteers' cattle, which they butchered. They left a lot of blood around and one lacerated carcass.

"Darned if that bear ain't got the hang of it!" Enoch said with a laugh as he watched Nero paddling round, making clean impressions on the soft ground.

"He's left enough signs round here to account for a dozen cattle," gloatingly exclaimed Charley, who still showed signs of his fight.

"This is one way of getting even," Big Ed grinned, as he saw a carcass being strapped to a pack horse. "There's three hundred dollars out of them Mesquiteers' pockets as soon as we deliver this beef of theirs to the Park Hotel."

"And they ain't got a thing on us," rejoiced a pock-marked mountaineer named Reese.

"Enoch, them Mesquiteers still owe us a hundred and fifty dollars bounty money," savagely exclaimed Big Ed. "I sure hate to pull out without getting paid—"

"You ain't gonna pull out without getting paid," a voice drawled. "Start reaching!"

How Big Ed and those other members of the Dawson Clan gasped when from behind a fallen tree-trunk appeared the Three Mesquiteers. Then they began to back away.

"Staud still!" Tucson rapped out. "Stick your hands up!"

Big Ed, Charley and the rest raised their hands. Davy, who had been watching the marks that were to deceive his friends, had been wondering if they would show up unexpectedly. Being clever, the boy decided that he must not look too elated because Enoch would be just as likely to suspect him.

The bear had been roped to a tree, so that Davy was not close to his ferocious pet. Suddenly Enoch grabbed up the boy and held him in front of him as a shield as he stumbled backwards for the shelter of the trees. His action inspired Big Ed and the others to make a sudden dive for cover. The guns of the Mesquiteers roared, and one of the mountaineers flung up his arms, but Big Ed and Charley got away, and so did Enoch, whom the ranchers dare not fire at for fear of hitting Davy.

The mountaineers began to shoot back at the Mesquiteers, who were forced to take cover behind the fallen tree.

Captain Brady, patrolling with four of his men, heard the shooting and set out in the direction of the sounds.

Big Ed crawled across to the tree where Enoch was crouched.

"This is some of that brat's doing," he spat out. "He musta tipped 'em off. We don't want any squealers round this outfit."

Enoch leered as he got the chief's meaning, and, taking out his gun, held it by the barrel. He was going to batter in Davy's head. Big Ed saw and shuffled away because he wanted to be no party to the killing of his foster-child.

Davy screamed as the gun-butt was raised, and Nero, who had been prowling round looking for his young master, jerked at the rope. The cry for help came again. The Mesquiteers did not

(Continued on page 23)

Ride the danger trail with the pioneers of the Old West in this pulsing epic of the days when fearless prairie scouts took up the challenge of savage Redskins and murderous desperadoes. To the beat of thundering hoofs and to the blast of flaming guns this vivid serial runs its thrill-a-minute course, with hot action in every smashing episode and Ray Corrigan in its starring rôle

THE PAINTED STALLION

Read This First

Backed by Dupray, a scheming Spaniard who is Governor of Santa Fe, but who has received news that he is to be deposed by the newly-established Mexican Republic, a band of renegades led by one, Zamora, is preying on the wagon-trains that ply to and fro across the Western wilds with rich merchandise under their awnings.

The activities of these renegades are hampered by a mystery rider on a painted stallion, who has sworn to defeat outlawry and who again and again warns the bandits' intended victims of their danger by means of whistling arrows.

The year is 1824, and in that year an American frontiersman known as Clark Stuart is detailed by the U.S. Government to negotiate a trade treaty with the Mexican authorities. It is a treaty which Dupray is anxious to prevent from being concluded, and at his instigation Zamora incites the Indians to attack a wagon-train led by a trader named Jamison—a wagon-train with which Clark is travelling, and whose personnel also includes Jim Bowie, famous as the inventor of the bowie knife, and Kit Carson, a boy later to become renowned as a Western scout.

Perceiving Indian smoke-signals, Clark rides into the hills to investigate and falls in with a band of hostile Redskins and a party of renegades headed by Zamora. These pursue him, and, galloping back to the wagon-train, Clark finds it has already been attacked, though a timely warning from the Rider of the Painted Stallion has enabled Jamison and his men to prepare for action.

Clark, discovering he is cut off from his friends, nevertheless attempts to get through to them. But a volley from his pursuers brings him down.

Now Read On

Paleface and Redskins

CLARK STUART himself had not been hit, but his horse had been struck dead, and in his plunge from the animal's back the scout had been dazed and badly shaken.

Lying there at the foot of the ridge, he was but vaguely conscious of the troop of Comanche Indians who were sweeping down the slope towards him, and as in a dream he heard the thunder of their mustangs' hoofs. Then the band of savages were all about him, a pack of hard-riding, shrill-howling demons—charging over the spot where he was huddled and careering onward to join those other Redskins who were already attacking the Jamison wagon-train.

The swarm of braves who had dashed down the ridge imagined Clark had been slain, and consequently none of them drew rein beside him, though in passing one of them took it into his head to discharge a musket at the frontiersman's prone body.

The blast of the firearm rang deafeningly in Clark's ears, punctuating the thud of the horses' feet, and the leaden ball from the weapon ripped into the ground an inch from his temple.

Meanwhile, the earth all about him was trembling under the impact of the cavalcade's hoofs, and as the fleet-moving shadows of ponies and riders surged over him he was powdered with the dust and dirt thrown up by the mounted warriors' onrush. Yet, miraculously it seemed, the clattering feet of the mustangs left him unscathed, no hoof trampling his prostrate form.

The Redskins forged past him, and, marvelling that he was still alive, Clark struggled to his knees. As he did so he gained a momentary impression of the group of renegades on the hilltop, but next instant his attention was diverted from them by the approach of a Comanche straggler who had failed to keep up with the rest of the Indian war-band.

The straggler had seen him rising, and flourishing a tomahawk, he bore down on Clark menacingly. In a second, however, the scout was upon his feet, and he side-stepped the brave's rush and then leapt up to clutch him about the waist.

He hauled the Indian from his mustang, brought him tumbling to the ground and drove his fist into the fellow's jaw with all his force. Then as the warrior became limp Clark straightened again and wheeled towards the Redskin's pony, which was

July 23rd, 1935.

EPISODE 2:—

"The Rider of the Stallion" slithering to a standstill a few yards away.

Swiftly the frontiersman resolved to carry out his former intention of bursting through the Indian cordon which was circling the Jamison wagon-coral, and a flying jump took him astride the mustang of the brave he had knocked senseless. At the same time he heard a faint outcry from the renegades on the crown of the ridge—an outcry that was succeeded by a blatter of gunplay as they opened fire on him with their forty-fives.

Bullets zipped around him, but none of them took effect, and, twisting round, he cut loose with his own heavy six-shooter in retaliation. Twice his "iron" blazed, and he saw a couple of the outlaws reel in their saddles—saw the other four rogues recoil in alarm at such deadly marksmanship. Then he kicked his borrowed mount into a gallop and made for the scene of the battle that was in progress between the Jamison outfit and the Redskins.

The Comanches who had swept over the spot where Clark had been lying a minute or so previously were now merging with the savages who were enveloping the barricade of prairie schooners, and Clark headed towards the Indian cordon at top speed, trusting that he would be able to pierce it ere any of the warriors were aware of his presence.

Fortune favoured him. Intent on harrying the defenders of the train, the circling braves had no eyes for him until he was actually through their formation, and even then he was half-way to the corral before any of the Redskins realised that the buckskin-clad figure which had penetrated their besieging ring was that of a hated paleface.

Bow-shafts and musket-shots were directed at him as he was identified as a white man, but seeming to bear a charmed life, he gained the barricade unharmed, and in an instant he had abandoned his Indian mustang and bounded across a wagon tongue into the enclosure whence his friends were pumping lead at the enemy.

From the instant when he had pierced the Redskin ring his daring ride had been watched by the defenders on that side of the corral which faced the north, and a hoarse cheer greeted his safe arrival. Indeed, several men pressed around him with earnest congratulations on their lips, but Clark brushed through them and hastened across the enclosure, for among those who were posted on the south side of it he saw Jim Bowie, Trader Jamison and young Kit Carson, the latter busily engaged in loading spare rifles and revolvers.

"Hey, Jamison!" he called. "Jamison!"

In spite of the din of battle his stentorian voice carried to the ears of the wagon-boss Jim Bowie and Kit, and all three of them turned, uttering exclamations of thankfulness at sight of him. Then all at once through a gap between a couple of prairie schooners behind which the trio had taken up positions, Clark Stuart saw the skulking figure of a dismounted Red man who had somehow contrived to sneak close to the corral through the prairie grass.

The Indian was armed with a club, and his attention was focused on Jamison. In the instant that Clark set eyes on him he was preparing to spring into the corral and brain the trader.

The Redskin jumped, clearing an intervening wagon tongue, murderous bludgeon raised on high, but simultaneously Clark's gun belched flame and death, and the scout's bullet took the warrior full in the chest.

The brave seemed to twist grotesquely in mid-air, then dropped lifeless to the ground. At the same time, however, half a dozen other warriors showed up, springing from a swathe of long grass which had enabled them, like their luckless predecessor, to steal within striking distance of the barricade.

Six-gun roaring, Clark went forward at the double. In the meantime, taking the alarm, Jamison and Bowie had spun around again and they promptly opened fire on the advancing Redskins, who were also volleyed now from other points in the wagon line.

That party of Indians were wiped out, and the last of them had fallen when Clark joined Bowie and Jamison and Kit.

"I'm glad you're here, Clark," said Jamison. "I was certainly worried about you."

"Yeah," young Kit Carson put in. "We thought you was gone for sure when the Injuns closed in on us without you showin' up."

"You were nearly right," the big frontiersman commented grimly. "But say, Jamison, you must've acted pretty smart to get the wagons corraled before the attack broke."

The trader briefly related how the column had been warned by the friendly but mysterious Redskin known as the Rider of the Painted Stallion. Then he glanced out beyond the sprawled bodies of the group of savages who had attempted to enter the wagon enclosure—out beyond those sprawled bodies to the swift-moving ring of braves who were encircling the corral on horseback.

"We're in a tough spot," he declared, "but I reckon we can hold these devils off—if they ain't reinforced."

He had scarcely spoken those words when Jim Bowie gripped his arm. The long, lean veteran of the plains was peering towards a dust cloud that had arisen in the distance, and presently a fresh band of Redskins became visible.

"Here's more o' the varmints a-headin' this way now, Jamison," he said, squirting a stream of tobacco juice from the corner of his mouth. "Yeah, an' they're powerful strong in numbers. It seems like every Injun east o' the Rockies was aimin' ter pay a call on us, if you ask me."

Clark Stuart bit his lip.

"You can take it from me that every brave in the Comanche nation is makin' for here, anyhow," he stated. "I learned that much when I went into the hills to investigate. Jamison, you said we're in a tough spot, but it's gonna be plenty tougher yet."

"An' talkin' about it won't make it any less tough," Bowie interposed dryly. "Come on, ef we're a-gwine to be massacred an' scalped we'll take a parcel o' these here Injun varmints ter perdition with us."

The guns of Clark, Jamison and Bowie were soon adding their bellowing reports again to the tumult of the rifles and the revolvers wielded by the other men of the wagon-train, and the fight wore on relentlessly, the clamour of it swelling as the attacking Comanches were joined by the band whose approach Jim Bowie had descried, and by further troops who came riding from all quarters of the compass.

Never had those prairie levels witnessed a combat so desperate, never had the stilly air of the wilderness rocked to such uproar as that which sounded now—uproar of demoniac Indian yells, of pounding hoofs, uproar of flashing fusillades that ripped from the barricades in answer to the bluster of Redskin muskets and the hiss of Redskin arrows.

Amid the confused din cries of stricken men rang out piercingly—the cries of paleface and Indian blending in the common union of death. Behind the wagons grim defenders saw comrades reeling back with barbed shaft or musket-ball lodged in their bodies, saw familiar faces that had grinned at them oftentimes over camp-fires distorted now with anguish, spattered with blood. And raging at the loss of friends and partners, the living fired the more rapidly to avenge their fall, many a Comanche warrior biting the dust as rifle-bullet or six-gun bullet hit home.

The casualties inflicted on the Redskins were heavy—far heavier than those sustained by the men of the Jamison column. Yet the odds against the whites were tremendous, with the warbands of countless villages whirling about the corral, and gallantly as the hard-pressed wagoners fought, it seemed inevitable that sooner or later the Indians would force their way into the enclosure and overwhelm the palefaces by sheer weight of numbers.

No man was more sure of that than a hawk-nosed Redskin who had taken up a position on a knoll just beyond gunshot range of the beleaguered prairie schooners. He was the headman of the Comanche nation, and about him were gathered a number of subordinate chiefs.

These prominent individuals of the tribe were watching the battle keenly, conferring upon it with the shrewdness of generals studying the manoeuvres of troops, and waiting until they deemed that the time was ripe to go forward in person and lead the circling warriors against the wagon barricades in a final storming rush. But that triumphal moment was never destined to come, for while they were still gazing upon the scene of conflict a curious, high-pitched whistling sound reached their ears above the pandemonium of the fight, and suddenly an arrow fired from some point behind them embedded itself in the knoll on which they were assembled.

It was a whistling arrow, symbolic of the Painted Stallion's presence, and startled, the Comanche head-chief and his counsellors wheeled round.

On the rim of a bluff some little distance away they beheld the silhouetted figure of the stallion and its rider, and the latter promptly waved an arm in a significant gesture on perceiving that the Redskins on the knoll had turned.

There was no mistaking the import of that gesture. It was a silent command to withdraw the Comanche warriors from the fight and send them back to their villages, leaving the white men to proceed westward unmolested.

And it was a command that impressed the companions of the head-chief, who were no less superstitious than the majority of their race and who shared in the belief that the Rider of the Painted Stallion was no mortal brave, but a god of the prairie whose will must be obeyed.

They looked askance at one another and then at the head-chief. He seemed irresolute—torn between superstition and the desire to bring the attack on the hated palefaces to a victorious conclusion—and after a mental struggle that was clearly written upon his red-bronze features he elected to defy the rider's bidding.

Staring at the bluff again he responded to the unknown's imperative gesture with a signal that implied negation. Then he half-turned towards the scene of combat, but scarcely had he done so when the Rider of the Painted Stallion discharged a second whistling arrow—an arrow which did not embed itself in the ground this time, but which tore through the ligaments of the head-chief's right shoulder.

That swift penalty of defiance dispelled the stubbornness from the Comanche head-chief's mind. Superstition becoming ascendant in him even as he writhed convulsively in pain, the shaft had no sooner been wrenched from his wound by one of his subordinates than he gasped out through trembling lips the order to call off the warriors.

Only a minute or two later the Red-skin bands who had encircled the wagon-train were drawing away, picking up their injured as they retired, and before very long the hills had swallowed the Comanches and not a living brave was in sight—unless it was the Rider of the Painted Stallion, who was still poised on the bluff.

Down in the corral of prairie schooners the men of the Jamison column gazed at that mysterious, silhouetted figure, realising that in some way or other the Rider had terminated the combat and delivered them from massacre.

They were not the only ones whose eyes were riveted upon the Rider of the Painted Stallion. Zamora and his renegade accomplices were also gazing in the Unknown's direction, though with feelings vastly different from those experienced by Jamison and his comrades.

The outlaws, grouped on the ridge where Clark Stuart had so nearly met his death, had watched the battle on the plain with an anticipation that had now given way to chagrin, and with black wrath stamped on their faces they continued to glower at the distant figure of the Rider until the latter wheeled and vanished from their view. Then Zamora turned to Macklin, Oldham and Smith, that rascally trio who had "horned in" with the wagon-train and who had quietly separated themselves from it prior to the Indian attack.

"Curse that Rider of the Painted Stallion," he snarled. "The Redskins would have slaughtered the Jamison outfit to the last man if he had not interfered."

"Yeah," grunted Smith, "an' it looks now as if our own gang will hafta cut out that train after all—somewhere near Santa Fe. It'll be a tough job, though, Zamora. Them hombres down there can fight."

The Dago's eyes narrowed.

"Si," he muttered, "and it may be that the train will get through in spite of us. But Clark Stuart will not get through. He must not!"

Macklin spoke.

"Stuart didn't recognise us," that bearded ruffian declared. "The nearest he got to us was when he hollered out that the Injuns was on the war-paih an' we'd best head for the wagon-train—and you'll recollect he hailed us as strangers, which proves he didn't identify me or Smith or Oldham."

"Meaning that you and Smith and Oldham can re-join the column, hein?" Zamora queried.

"Yeah," said Macklin. "See, dusk's beginnin' to fall, an' we slip back to the wagon-train without excitin' any attention as soon as it gets good an' dark. Nobody'll notice us—an' I'll bet nobody noticed we weren't around when the Injun attack broke, either. Anyway, Zamora, we'll find an opportunity o' dealin' with Clark Stuart. You can lay to that."

Zamora was silent for a moment. Then he looked shrewdly at Macklin.

"You'd better leave Clark Stuart to Smith," he observed. "Smith can decoy him from the train somehow and finish him, then make tracks for the hide-out. You and Oldham can stay with the column. So long as you can avoid arousing the suspicions of Jamison, you may be of more use to Dupray and me than you ever could be otherwise. In short, amigo, you and Oldham will continue to act as scouts for the column, so that you can inform us of any important moves Jamison may make in the course of his journey west."

Smith broke in on the conversation at this juncture.

"See here, Zamora," he protested, "if you think I'm gonna tackle Clark Stuart alone you'd better do some more figurin'. Stuart looks pretty much of a handful to me, an' I ain't makin' no play against him single-handed."

"You won't have to, my friend," the Dago replied. "You decoy him from the train, and three men will be waiting to help you account for him."

"What, yourself an' these here cripples?" scoffed Smith.

He indicated the gangsters who had ridden to the village of the Comanche head-chief with Zamora when the latter had persuaded the Redskin to assail the wagon-column. The two bandits in question had both been hit by the shots Clark had loosed off prior to his bold dash for the barricade of prairie schooners, and, although they had only been "winged" and were not seriously hurt, they were groaning with pain and looked as if they would be out of action for some little time to come.

"No," said Zamora in answer to Smith's derisive query. "Not myself and these 'cripples,' as you call them. I am going back to the hide-out with them. But I shall send four of the other men, and, if you can get Stuart to go with you to Boulder Notch on some pretext or other two days from now, you will find those men lying in wait there."

Boulder Notch

TWO days had elapsed, and, slow as was its progress, the Jamison column had proceeded many miles from the spot where the abortive Indian attack had taken place—and where, incidentally, Smith and Macklin and "Take it easy, feller!" Bull Smith snarled. "You ain't gonna get nowhere by makin' a scrap of it."

Oldham had re-joined the train "with-out exciting any attention."

It was during the afternoon of that second day that Bull Smith contrived to drop behind the wagon-train for a spell, lagging so far to the rear that he was out of view of it. Then, after a while, he clapped spurs to his pony's flanks and set out to overtake the column, his horse being somewhat blown when he at length drew up with the long line of prairie schooners and outriders.

He galloped to the head of the train and singled out Clark Stuart, who was centering in advance of the column with Bowie, Jamison and young Kit Carson.

"Hey, Stuart," Smith blurted, "I swung off a little while ago ter see if I could pick up the trail of any game that might come in handy for the chuck-wagon, an' I came across a hombra that was stranded with a prairie schooner. It appears he's a settler headed for Santa Fe, an' he sure is in a jam. The off-side front wheel o' his schooner has come adrift from the axle."

Clark frowned.

"A settler?" he reiterated. "And he's travellin' through these wilds alone?"

"Yeah," said Smith. "A durned fool, I reckon. Still, I hated to leave him in the lurch, an' I told him I'd bring help back for him. Maybe you'd ride with me an' give him a hand. It won't take the two of us long to hoist up that wagon o' his so he can fix the wheel agin."

"Okay," Clark rejoined. "Where's this settler at?"

Smith answered him glibly.

"A place that I know as Boulder Notch," he informed the scout. "It's back a-ways an' a piece to the north."

Clark and Bull Smith swung round and clattered off in a north-easterly direction, the gangster's horse slightly in the lead, and about half an hour later the two men were entering a system of rocky hills. Then all at once Smith drew rein in a narrow pass strewn with great snags of stone and hemmed-in by sheer cliffs.

"Well, here we are in Boulder Notch," he announced.

Clark looked about him.

"Yeah?" he said. "Well, where's that settler an' his broken-down wagon?"

"There ain't no settler, Stuart," came the quiet response. "An' there ain't no broken-down wagon neither."

Clark swivelled his eyes on Smith sharply, and as he did so he saw that the fellow had drawn a six-gun and was covering him. At the same time he detected movements among the huge rocks that cluttered the pass, and suddenly four horsemen of unsavoury mien issued forth.

Clark's handsome face became tense, and his steel-grey eyes hardened.

"What's the idea, Smith?" he demanded.

"The idea, Stuart," Bull Smith said in a sardonic voice, "the idea is that you ain't goin' to Santa Fe. In other words, Stuart, this is trail's end for you."

There was a moment's silence, during which Clark regarded Smith steadfastly—no hint of fear on his countenance, only a challenging grinnence. Then all at once he snaked out his left hand, seized Smith by the right wrist, forced the rogue's gun aside and compelled him to drop the weapon by applying a pressure that brought a cry of pain to the man's lips.

Next second, however, the individuals who had appeared from amongst the rocks were closing in on Clark, and, grappling with him, they dragged him out of the saddle, the big scout tumbling to the ground with his adversaries a-top of him.

He managed to wrench away from them, and, springing to his feet as they were likewise scrambling from the dust, he waded into them with his bunched knuckles, sending one outlaw sprawling with a terrific upper-cut and flooring a second with a full swing to the jaw.

But Smith's other two accomplices clinched with him, and were wrestling with him fiercely when those whom he had felled regained their feet and plucked out their forty-fives to level the weapons at him threateningly. Into the bargain Smith himself had slid from his bronc, and, running forward now, he snatched Clark's six-shooter from its holster and thrust the muzzle of the revolver against the scout's midriff.

"Take it easy, feller!" he snarled. "You ain't gonna get nowhere by makin' a scrap of it."

With that gun pressing into his stomach, with two of Smith's confederates grasping him by the arms and the other two covering him as well, Clark realised the futility of further resistance and resigned himself to his fate.

"All right," he said, "it looks like this is trail's end for me. But if you aim to blow a hole through me with that six-shooter I'd like to know why before you do it."

Bull Smith's eyes narrowed.

"Okay," he stated. "I'll tell you why. It don't—"

But the sentence was never finished, for at that instant he was interrupted by a noise that was all too familiar to him and his cronies. It was the strange, high wail of a whistling arrow, and even as Smith started at the sound his right wrist was pierced by the missile responsible for it.

Uttering an agonised howl the gangster let Clark's forty-five fall to the ground, and, staggering away, he looked up and saw the Rider of the Painted Stallion limned against the skyline above him on the western side of the Notch.

The other outlaws saw that figure, too, as did Clark Stuart. Then, in swift succession, three more arrows streaked from the Rider's bow, singing from aloft and rattling against the rocks amidst which the scout and his captors stood.

The two rogues who were holding Clark abandoned him and jumped for cover. So did the men who had been threatening the frontiersman with their guns. As for the scout, he was quick to take advantage of the diversion created by the Unknown Redskin, and, retrieving the forty-five that the anguished Smith had dropped, he vaulted astride his pony—a blaze-faced sorrel with which Jamison had supplied him to replace the mount he had lost two days before.

Next moment Clark was spurring from the Notch, and though a couple of belated shots were discharged at him by his foes both bullets went wide.

Before any other slugs could be sent in his direction he was clear of the pass and galloping through the hills, and, though he heard further shooting that told him the outlaws were now blazing at the Rider, he looked back and up to see that mysterious Indian retreating unharmed from the cliff-rim above the Notch.

The Unknown faced towards him and gave him a friendly wave, to which Clark responded. Then, the Rider wheeling and disappearing from his view, the scout pressed on at top speed, and was well nigh out of gunshot range when Smith and his confederates came charging out of the Notch on horseback to give chase to him.

They did not pursue him for long, for it soon became clear that Clark's sorrel had the legs of their broncs, and after a two-mile dash during which the frontiersman steadily increased his lead the renegades swung off towards the north in a disgruntled fashion, leaving their quarry to ride on through the hills.

Quitting those uplands a little later, Clark picked up the route that the Jamison column had been following, and some thirty minutes afterwards, just as the shadows of evening were beginning to gloom over the wilds, he overtook the wagon-train and cantered to the head of it.

Among the outriders whom he passed en route to the fore-end of the column were Macklin and Oldham, and perplexity and dismay were revealed on the bearded features of the crooks as they saw him, for they had noted his departure with Bull Smith and had never anticipated that he would return.

Unaware, however, that those two worthies were connected with Smith, Clark spared neither of them a glance as he went by, and failed to obtain any inkling of the effect his presence produced on them.

A few seconds afterwards he was abreast of Jamison, Bowie and Kit Carson, and briefly he informed them of all that had transpired at Boulder Notch, his listeners hearing him out in an amazed silence which was broken at length by the wagon-boss.

"Why do you suppose Smith wanted to stop you from gettin' to Santa Fe?" Jamison demanded.

"It may have something to do with the Government treaty I'm carryin'," Clark rejoined after a moment. "I can't think of any other reason why a bunch o' bandits should try to rub me out. Anyhow, Smith wasn't what he pretended to be, an' we're well rid of him."

He dismissed the subject with those words, and, silence falling upon the leaders of the column again, the wagon-train lumbered on while the darkness of the night deepened—an early darkness that had been hastened by the onset of a dense rack of storm-clouds which had spread over the sky from the north.

That storm broke ere the column had travelled another five miles, and it was a storm of fierce intensity, the heavens opening their flood-gates and launching a deluge of rain upon mountains and prairie, thunder pealing through the void and vivid flashes of lightning illuminating the landscape in fitful blasts.

Through that raging storm the wagon-train pushed onward, heading for a ford in the Cimarron river, which lay across its path. It was a ford known to Jamison, Bowie and Clark as one of the few points where the crossing of the Cimarron might be safely effected, yet on reaching it they discovered the water was unusually high.

The lightning revealed to them a swirling torrent, black as doom, potent with menace, a quarter of a mile in width and threatening to overflow its banks in its wild onrush—a spectacle that caused Jamison to scrow his brows together in an uneasy manner.

"Looks bad," he said laconically, lifting his voice above the clamour of the storm as he addressed Clark and Bowie. "The melted snows from the mountains have sure raised the level. I've never seen the Cimarron so high an' so turbulent."

"I reckon the wagons can make it, though," Clark opined. "It'll be tough goin', but, properly handled, the mule-teams will swim the schooners across. We'd better try it, Jamison. If we hold back, this rain is gonna swell the river a heap more, an' it may be impossible to cross over for weeks."

Jamison nodded.

"You're right, Clark," he declared, and then, by means of Bowie, he passed the word back along the column that the train was to go forward.

He himself led the way on horse-back, and wagon after wagon trundled into the river after him with accompanying outriders—ponies and mules losing their footing almost immediately, but swimming resolutely under the guidance of men who were expert in the handling of reins.

Amid peals of thunder, flare of lightning and cataracts of rain, the column struggled onward across the hazardous ford, and soon only one wagon and a handful of horsemen remained on the river's east bank—the horsemen including Clark Stuart, with whom young Kit Carson was waiting.

"Come on!" Clark sang out to the last wagon's driver, who seemed to be having some difficulty with his team.

"Get that outfit rolling!" The prairie schooner failed to move forward into the river, however, and in a burst of lightning Clark saw the driver signalling him agitatedly—and recognised the fellow as an individual named Elmer who was cursed with an innumerable stutter.

The scout spurred his pony towards the wagon, and the driver mouthed at him.

"C-C-Clark," he began, "I e-e-e can't g-g-gug-gug-get m-m-my—"

An outrider loomed up alongside Clark. He was known as Osear, was a cousin of the stuttering Elmer, and frequently acted as his interpreter.

"He's tryin' to tell yuh he can't git his team to budge, Clark," he explained.

The big frontiersman laughed. "Probably he can't say 'giddap' quick enough," he commented. "All right, Elmer, I'll take your schooner. You swim my horse across. And say, escort Kit Carson across with you. See that nothing happens to him."

He climbed aboard the wagon, and, gratefully, Elmer scrambled on to the blaze-faced sorrel the scout had been riding. Then, picking up ribbons and whip, Clark managed to urge the prairie schooner's team forward after a brief delay.

Meanwhile Elmer had joined Kit, and, gathering the rein of the boy's pony as well as the sorrel's, he headed into the river with the youngster.

Osear and the remaining outriders entered the swirling waters as well—all except two, and those two were Macklin and Oldham. The former had laid a hand on his associate's bridle, and, unobserved by Clark, was talking in an undertone to Oldham.

"Here's a chance to get rid o' Stuart," Macklin said, "a chance that's too good ter miss. Supposin' he was to git crowned over the skull out in mid-river. That team he's drivin' would be outa control, an' the wagon would be bound ter come to grief. It'd be the end o' him. Oldham, an', what's more, it'd seem like he'd been drowned by accident."

"By crackey, you're right, Mack," the other rogue jerked. "We can hang back—"

His accomplice interrupted him.

"No need fer the two of us to figure in this," he grunted. "I can handle Stuart alone. Maybe it would be better that way, anyhow. You go ahead. I'll hold up."

They separated, Oldham pushing into the torrent, Macklin swinging behind a clump of bushes—whence, in a flicker of lightning, he saw Clark drive forward into the river as well.

Macklin kicked his heels into his bronc's flanks and rode after the wagon, entered the water only a few yards in the rear of it and caught up with its tailboard. Then, hitching his pony's rein to the back of the prairie schooner, he climbed nimbly and silently into the vehicle's interior and crouched down among the bales of merchandise.

Clark handling the reins, the mule-team pushed farther and farther out into the surging flow of the river, fighting their way towards the west bank in the wake of the rest of the column and hauling their ponderous wagon after them. And inside the rocking, swaying prairie schooner Macklin waited sinistinely—waited until he judged the time was ripe for his murderous deed.

The wagon he had boarded was out in midstream before he bestirred himself, and, with Clark framed in front of him between the folds of the schooner's awning, the gangster drew a six-gun and slunk towards him, clubbing the revolver as he did so. Then he struck hard and true with the butt, and under the impact of that cowardly blow the frontiersman on the driving-seat threw up his arms and fell back senseless into the vehicle's interior.

The ribbons slid from his inert fingers as oblivion claimed him, and, instantly aware that masterful hands were no longer guiding them, the lead-mules began to plunge and struggle in their harness, thereby spreading confusion throughout the whole team.

Meanwhile Macklin was blundering to the tailboard, and in the space of a few seconds he had regained the saddle of his mount, unhitched its rein and steered the swimming bronc away from the wagon. And as he abandoned that wagon and its unconscious occupant to their fate, he saw the vehicle tipping crazily to the frenzied antics of its team—saw it break loose all at once from its base-frame—saw the drifting body of it start to roll over and submerge!

(To be continued in another gripping episode next week. By permission of British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Ray Corrigan.)

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"MAKING THE HEADLINES"

—Captain Lewis Nagel, Jack Holt; Jeanne Sandford, Beverly Roberts; Steve Withers, Craig Reynolds; Mrs. Wilder, Marjorie Gatenon; Claire Sandford, Dorothy Appleby; Edmund Sandford, Gilbert Emery; Sergeant Handley, Tom Kennedy; Ronald Sandford, Corbett Morris; Grace Sandford, Shiela Bromley; Herbert Sandford, John Wray; Edgar Keer, Maurice Cass; Stuart Hackett, Tully Marshall.

"HEART OF THE ROCKIES"

—Stony Brooke, Bob Livingston; Tucson Smith, Ray Corrigan; Lullaby Joslin, Max Terhune; Lorna Dawson, Lynn Roberts; Dacy Dawson, Sammy McKim; Big Ed Dawson, J. P. McGowan; Charley Coe, Yakima Canutt; Brady, Hal Taliaferro; Reese, Gay Wilkerson; Ma Dawson, Georgia Winslow.

"HEART OF THE ROCKIES"

(Continued from page 18)

hear it because of the roar of the guns, but Nero heard.

The bear parted the rope as if it had been twine.

Davy was trying to wriggle free when there came the hideous snarl of the bear and Enoch jerked round with a gasp of fear. Out came a mighty paw and clawed at his arm. He brought down the gun butt, but it only roused Nero to greater fury. Enoch was dragged down to the ground and began to scream hoarsely as Nero snarled over his victim. The trapper managed to free an arm and get the gun that had been wrenched from his hand. He fired once at the bear and that was all. Nero proceeded to hug Enoch till his ribs cracked and then to maul the poor wretch to death. Davy, hand to mouth, stood there watching the fearful scene. Though Enoch had been terribly cruel to him he would have tried to save him if he could, but the boy knew he could do nothing with Nero in this maddened condition.

The mountaineers were fighting and slowly retiring towards the copse where they had left their horses. Leaving two men to cover them they made a rush for their horses. Once in the saddle they spurred their horses and fled in all directions. The two men, who had expected Big Ed and the others to help them reach their horses, found themselves deserted. They dashed for their horses, but the Mesquiteers were not missing such easy targets.

It was Stony who found Davy. Nero was dead and lay sprawled across his victim. Even Stony shuddered as he looked at this gory spectacle.

"We'll be right back, Davy," he cried. "Stick around till we get back."

The Mesquiteers mounted their horses and went in pursuit of the Dawson Clan. Tucson and Lullaby went after two mountaineers, whilst Stony searched for Big Ed and Charley Coe and Reese.

Captain Brady Interferes to His Cost

THE Dawson Clan were scattered in all directions. Big Ed had ridden with Reese, and when they found that there was no one in sight reined in their exhausted horses.

"Let's get back to the cabin and start rolling," cried Big Ed.

Stony had sighted Charley Coe but had lost him in a valley. He was riding past a small clump of spruce when a shot rang out and a bullet whizzed past dangerously close. Turning, the Westerner saw Charley half hidden behind a tree. The rifle spoke again, and Stony rolled from his saddle but kept a grip on the pommel. It was an old trick and it bluffed Charley into thinking he had got his enemy. How the half-breed swore when he saw Stony draw himself back into the saddle when out of range.

Meantime, Captain Brady and his wardens had arrived in the vicinity. Scattered bursts of firing seemed to be coming in all directions.

"Must be the Mesquiteers," decided the captain. "Spread out, and this time we should get 'em."

Charley saw Stony vanish round a bend and knew that the Mesquiteer would double back along some other trail. He became panicky and rushed to his horse. He scrambled into the saddle and went racing off at a gallop towards the mountains. A sound made him look round, and he muttered a curse as he recognised the piebald stallion that Stony always rode. He reined back his horse and turned to take steady aim with his rifle, but Stony had seen his quarry halt and at once swerved his animal off the trail. When Charley had wasted all his ammunition he fled once more to the security of the hills, but every time it seemed that Stony was nearer. He tried the old trick of doubling back on his trail when he came to a shallow stream. It saved him for a while as Stony guessed the trick but did not know whether Charley had gone up or down stream. The water was clear, but when it began to come down cloudy it told Stony that his quarry had gone upstream.

Charley reached a wide track that would lead him towards the Dawson settlement. Maybe he would find refuge there. But Stony was relentless and better mounted than the man he was pursuing. Long since the half-breed had flung away the useless gun. He dug his heels into his tired animal, but it was in vain. Nearer and nearer drew Stony until at last they were riding almost neck and neck. Stony hurled himself out of the saddle and his arms went round Charley's neck. Both men hurtled to the ground, rolled over and over and then tumbled down a slight embankment. But when they staggered up it was Stony who had the advantage, for his gun was drawn.

Along the track cantered Brady. He had seen from a distance the two riders. He sent his horse down the embankment and then vaulted lightly from the saddle.

"Give me that gun, Stony, you're under arrest!" he ordered, with a triumphant smirk.

"What do you mean, I'm under arrest?" gasped the enraged Mesquiteer. "Here's the man you want. We caught him and that Dawson Clan rustling our cattle."

"All right, I'll take you both back to headquarters," decided Brady, and stepped between the two men. "Give me that gun."

"Now listen, Brady!" cried Stony. "I warned you about bringing firearms into the Park," sneered Brady, taking the gun.

Charley Coe looked at the gun in the warden's belt. He was a desperate man. Once taken into custody and he was lost. They would find out lots of things about his past and many aliases he had used. He was wanted for murder down in Montana. His hand slid forward, and like a snake the gun was whisked out of the warden's holster.

The half-breed did not order the officer to raise his hands, but just callously shot him in the back. Brady collapsed into Stony's arms.

The Mesquiteer was stunned by the violence of the crime and for once seemed bereft of the power to act. Charley had seen his horse grazing some way along the trail, and the killer was into the saddle and away before Stony quite realised what had happened.

Gently the Mesquiteer laid the warden down on the ground, and one look told him that the wound was mortal. Rage seized Stony, and recovering his gun he dashed up the embankment. A shrill whistle and his horse trotted towards him. A leap and he was in the saddle.

Two of the range wardens riding along this trail to link up with Brady heard the shot, and urging their horses to a gallop, were in time to see Stony Brooke riding away, but they observed Brady sprawled on the ground.

"He was shot in the back!" one of the rangers cried. "Stony did it. I was with Brady last time the Mesquiteers broke into the Park and I heard him use threatening remarks to the chief!"

Lorna Saves Stony

TUCSON and Lullaby, after securing the two mountaineers they had been after, rode back to the place where they had left Davy. The boy was there, leaning on his crutch, and without wasting time on explanations Tucson reached down and pulled the boy on to his knees.

"Where's Stony?"
"Dunno, Davy," answered Lullaby. "But we'll find him."

Big Ed and Reese got back to the big shack, and it was a relief to see none of the Mesquiteers there.

"We're pulling out right quick," he told his wife. "Everything ready?"
"We ain't quite loaded, Ed."

"Well, hurry up!" he shouted.

The hoarse voice of her foster-father brought Lorna out of the shack. She dumped an old case in the prairie schooner and then looked round.

"Where's Davy?"

"Oh, he'll be along directly," was the evasive answer. "Get busy."

A clatter of hoofs made him clutch his gun, but it was only Charley.

"Did you get rid of Stony?" Ed demanded.

"Yeah, but I had to plug a Park Range warden to do it."

"You dumb fool!" Ed gripped his arm savagely. "How did that happen?"

"I stuck around as you suggested, but I had no chance of shooting him," explained the half-breed. "We were fighting it out, when who should horn in but one of them rangers."

"Go on!" snarled Ed as the other hesitated.

"Stony had got a bead on me, but the warden stepped in between and ordered Stony to hand over his gun, which the big sap did, and it gave me the chance to get at Brady's—"

"So it was Brady!" Fury made Big Ed shake with rage. "So you got Brady's gun and shot him. Kinda thing ya would do, and then what?"

"Stony came after me, but this time I bided my time." Charley Coe grinned wolfishly. "And I know I hit him."

"Well, go grab an armful of stuff and help load those wagons," ordered Dawson.

Lorna had seen Charley Coe return and she had kept out of sight of the man she hated. She had seen him talking with Big Ed, and though she could not hear what they were saying she caught the name of "Stony" several times. He was wondering what had happened, when to her amazement a horseman came out of the woods. It was Stony and he was swaying in the saddle. Blood was streaming down his face and he looked a ghastly sight. Somehow he slid from the saddle and slumped the faithful animal so that it went cantering away into the woods. Reeling and staggering Stony made for the prairie schooner, and she watched him climb into the back of the wagon and vanish through the canvas curtains.

"Don't stand there," gruffly called out Big Ed. "Help yer mother or do something. This ain't no time for dreaming."

Lorna took a load from her foster-mother and went with it to the wagon. She parted the curtains and climbed inside, and at first she saw no signs of Stony. She found him lying unconscious behind some sacks, and she was bandaging his head when the sound of horsemen made her peep forth. They were rangers.

"We're trailing Stony Brooke. He killed Captain Brady a short while ago," one of them called out.

"Ain't seen a soul round here all day, officer," answered Big Ed, who had been holding a gun inside his pocket. "Suppose he should come around?"

"Don't take any chances," answered the range warden.

"Don't worry none about that," Charley Coe spoke now. "We don't like him any better than you do."

Lorna found that the bullet wound in the forehead was a bad crease and not as serious as she had imagined. She put an old mattress round Stony so that he would be completely hidden from the driver. Then she went back into the shack and helped with the loading, and she managed it so that no one else went into the schooner.

"Stony's gonna have a hard time shaking them rangers," jibed the half-breed.

"Get on them wagons and we'll start moving," ordered Big Ed.

"Where's Enoch? And where's young Davy?" demanded the woman. "I ain't moving without 'em."

"Get going!" raved Big Ed. "We're picking 'em both up on the trail."

There was a smaller wagon and several carts, so that no one wanted to ride in the schooner. The girl looked out and saw that Big Ed was still arguing with his wife—Charley Coe was with them.

"Lorna, Charley Coe killed Brady." The whisper made her jump.

"Yes, I heard him tell Big Ed about it." Lorna knelt down beside him. "How are you, Stony?"

"Better, thanks to you." He managed a grin. "I've been almost conscious ever since I got into this wagon."

"I'm scared for you to stay here," whispered Lorna. "We're quitting."

"Yeah, I know. I came after Charley when he shot me and I decided to hide in this wagon till I got my strength back. I heard how the killing of Brady had been fixed on me. Lorna, I've got to bring in Charley to clear myself. Slip out and try to get word to Tucson and Lullaby, will you?"

"All right."

Lorna climbed out of the wagon and moved across to the pony the Mesquiteers had given her. She mounted and waited. Big Ed settled his argument by hitting his wife, and the woman went crying to the smaller wagon. Charley laughed and climbed to the box seat of the schooner in which Stony was hiding. Big Ed and Reese riding ahead guided the party.

Lorna rode along for a little way in the rear. Everyone was so anxious to get away that not much attention was given to the girl. Besides, where they went she would have to go, or so they thought. A bend in the trail gave her the chance to slip away into the trees. She raced the pony back to the place which had been her home for so many unhappy years. She would start the trail from here. She must find Tucson and Lullaby quickly. She prayed that Davy would be with them. Luck favoured Lorna. Wisely the girl rode to the highest ground in the vicinity, and almost at once she saw a small procession passing across some grassland. She imitated the call of the coyote and galloped her pony madly towards them. She took bushes and ditches in her endeavour to get to them quickly. They waited for her.

"Stony came in wounded!" she panted out. "He followed Charley, who shot him in the forehead. But the wound isn't serious, though he's lost blood. Paw, Charley and Reese have hit the trail on a getaway and Stony is hiding in the largest of the wagons. He needs you urgently."

"Keep 'em covered, Davy." Tucson lowered the boy to the ground and tossed him a gun.

"Okay, Tucson," manfully answered Davy, pointing the gun at the two mountaineers. "They won't get away."

When Tucson and Lullaby urged their horses to a gallop it was Lorna who led them.

The Clean-up

WHEN Stony felt that his strength had returned he removed the mattress very cautiously and peered forth. His expression set in hard lines as he noted the back of Charley Coe. Like a cat he crept forward.

Charley must have heard some sound, because he looked round and saw Stony. He gaped in surprise and then fumbled for his gun, but Stony gave him no time to draw it. His fingers gripped the rascally fellow's wrists and he gave a tremendous twist. With a yell Charley let go of the gun, which clattered to the footboard and a moment later to the ground.

Stony dragged himself on to the driver's seat, and did his best to punch the wiry half-breed into oblivion. The horses, startled by all the noise and crashing, took fright and bolted. The schooner went rocketing past Big Ed Dawson and Reese, who gaped at sight of those two struggling figures. They charged after the wagon.

Then Stony and Charley, oblivious to their precarious position, fell from the driver's seat on to the crossbar, and the frightened animals went all the faster as the fighters bumped against their ribs whilst occasionally their punches landed on horseflesh.

Gradually Big Ed and Reese gained on the wagon, and they raised their rifles to try and get a shot at Stony.

Lorna, knowing the country even better than the Mesquiteers, took them by a short cut, and they topped the crest of a hill to look down on the trail. They could see the schooner swaying this way and that and completely out of control and the two men fighting, whilst close alongside rode Big Ed and Reese with rifles ready to shoot.

"You get Big Ed!" Tucson yelled at his friend. "I'll stop the wagon."

When Big Ed saw Tucson and Lullaby charging down the hillside he kicked his horse savagely and tore past the wagon. His only thought was his own skin. Reese saw him and wondered at the reason, and then he turned and saw the cursed Mesquiteers. He headed after his chief.

Tucson knew that the schooner could not continue for long at this mad pace, and if an axle broke or it overturned it might have disastrous results for Stony.

That intrepid fighter, heedless of his danger, tried to get his hands to Charley's throat. Charley by now was in almost as bad a way as when he had fought Stony on a previous occasion. Stony was now on top, and Charley, as one of the horses lurched, slid off the crossbar, made a wild grab and then fell. A hoof caught him a resounding blow on his skull, and that was all Charley Coe knew for a considerable time.

Tucson swept alongside, and with one mighty leap was on the back of one of the wagon horses. With his boot he kicked at a bolt that held the crossbar shackled to the wagon. Suddenly the bolt gave and the horses shot forward. By now Stony had slipped between the crossbar and was hanging by his hands but clinging on for dear life. Tucson gathered up the loose reins and pulled back till his muscles almost gave under the strain. There was a crash behind as the schooner hit a rut and overturned, but the horses were slowing knowing that they were now in the hands of a master.

Lullaby went after Big Ed like a rocket, and it was not long before he drew alongside. His great arms were outstretched as he flung himself from his horse. Big Ed and Lullaby rolled from their horses and hit the ground with a thud, but Lullaby had seen that Big Ed was undermost. When Big Ed staggered dazedly to his feet it was to find himself menaced by a gun.

Stony let go when the horses were pulled to a stop, and lay on the ground panting from exhaustion. The capable hands of Tucson drew him to his feet.

"Are you hurt badly, Stony?"

"Well, believe it or not, but I guess I'm all right." Stony managed a grin.

Then two of the Park rangers appeared on the scene, and threatened Stony with a gun.

"Up with you hands, Stony!" one of them ordered.

"Oh, you're wrong again!" Stony shook his head. "Charley—Charley Coe shot Brady."

"It's true." It was Lorna adding her evidence. "I heard Charley tell Ed about it."

They went back to where Charley lay prostrate on the ground, and they were forcing water between the wretch's bruised lips when Lullaby appeared with Big Ed.

"Here's the ringleader of this rustling racket!" Lullaby called out, and he jabbed the end of his gun hard in Big Ed's ribs. "He'll talk plenty."

And when everything had been cleared up Lorna and Davy were fixed up in a shack close to the ranch of the Three Mesquiteers. Maw Dawson, who was a kindly soul at heart and had done her best in spite of a tyrannical husband to befriend the children, was allowed to live with them. It was going to be a very long while before Big Ed Dawson was going to see the right side of prison walls. And after a while Lorna went off to college and Davy to a school, but they went on the condition that they could spend the holidays with their new guardians—the Three Mesquiteers.

(By permission of the British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Bob Livingstone as Stony Brooke, Ray Corrigan as Tucson Smith and Max Terhune as Lullaby Joslin.)

"MAKING THE HEADLINES"

(Continued from page 12)

"Quite sure," Handley declared. "You know nobody ever gets by me." "I wouldn't bet on that!" Lew glanced all about the grounds. "I wonder what's happened to Steve—he should be here by now."

Accompanied by the sergeant, he mounted the steps to the porch. The front door was on the latch, and they entered the hall and made for the stairs in the light of the torch Lew carried. The upper hall was reached, and Lew opened the door of the bed-room he and Steve had visited earlier in the evening.

The bag of oddments Steve had proposed to plant about the house was lying on the floor where it had been left, but as the beam of the torch travelled from it to the bed a rough and unshaven man scrambled out from the bed with a cry of alarm and stood with his hands above his head. He was wearing ragged trousers and a dirty shirt.

"Stay right where you are!" rasped Lew. "Well, who are you?"

"Pitts," replied the man shakily. "Bill Pitts."

"What are you doing here?"

"Well, I—I—"

"Come on, what are you doing here?"

"Well," mumbled the man, obviously a tramp. "I've been stoppin' here quite a while. You see, it—it's no nice and quiet, and—"

"Yeah," Lew cut in harshly, "so nice and quiet that it's a swell place for a murder!"

"Murder?" Bill Pitts' eyes started nearly out of his head, and his jaw dropped.

"Turn him over to one of the boys outside," directed Lew, turning to Sergeant Handley. "Book him on vagrancy."

The captive was hustled down the stairs.

Steve had entered the grounds just after Lew had entered the house. He was lighting a cigarette under the trees, close to the car, when Jeanie flitted in at the gateway, and she started violently as he walked out into the moonlight.

"Boo!" he said. "I remember you! What are you doing here?"

"Oh, you did make me jump!" she exclaimed. "I thought you were in—"

"Yes," he laughed, "but I'm not the first guy to break gaol for the sake of a lovely lady." He caught sight of the necklace and pointed to it. "Oho," he said, "where did this come from?"

"Captain Nagel," she replied, "but I'd rather you didn't ask me anything about it."

"Oh!"

"You'll think me awfully silly, I

ROYAL NAVY

Boys may now enter between the ages of 15 and 17½ years. Full particulars are contained in the illustrated booklet "The Royal Navy as a Career and How to Join It," which may be obtained on application to the Recruiting Staff Officer, R.N. and R.M. (N), 85, Whitehall, London, S.W.1, or at any Post Office.

guess," she went on, "but I came up here hoping I might find something that would help clear you."

She looked adorable to him in the moonlight.

"Did anyone ever tell you that you had very nice eyes?" he asked.

"No."

"Well, you have. Only trouble with them is they don't give enough attention to me. They look a little worried, too."

"They are," she confessed. "I haven't been able to locate Aunt Muffin for hours. Call it a lurch, if you like, but I think she's in that dreadful house."

"Let's go and see," suggested Steve; and they walked together up the drive.

The Secret of a Wart

LEW was in the hall, looking into a cupboard there, when Steve opened the front door. He whirled round and shone the light of the torch upon the two invaders.

"About time you showed up!" he growled at Steve. "But I didn't expect you, Miss Sandford. What's the idea?"

"Aunt Muffin," Jeane replied. "I haven't been able to find her since I got home from the station."

"Anything doing?" inquired Steve.

"Yes and no," Lew frowned at Jeane. "Now that you're here," he said, "I'm going to have to ask you to stay out of sight. I'm expecting some guests, and if they saw you their game would be off. How's your nerve? Think you can sit in there for a while?"

He pointed to the dining-room with the torch, and it looked a place of ghostly shadows; but Jeane said bravely:

"Yes, I think so. I'm not exactly the timid type."

"Good," said Lew. "Take her in, Steve."

Steve led her past one of the heavy curtains, holding her arm. But just inside the room she stumbled over something on the floor, nearly fell, and uttered a piercing scream.

Lew rushed in with his torch, and its beam shone down upon the body of Edgar Keer, lying on his back on the carpet, one arm outflung. His eyes were open and staring; his bowler hat was lying upside down as though it had fallen from his head.

"The jeweller!" exclaimed Lew.

Jeane was clinging to Steve and trembling all over, and Steve whisked her out to the stairs.

"Sit here," he said; and she sank down on to the third stair, her right shoulder against the banisters.

"And I said I wasn't the screaming kind," she murmured ruefully.

"One more corpse," said Steve. "and I think I'll do a little screaming myself. Now stay right here—I'll only be a second."

He went back into the dining-room, and Jeane was in the dark. Down the stairs behind her crept the shadowy figure of a man, and suddenly a handkerchief held by two gloved hands descended over her head and was fastened tightly round her mouth.

She tried to scream, but could make no sound, and then she was raised bodily and felt herself being pulled up the stairs.

In the dining-room, Lew had covered the body of Edgar Keer with a dust sheet from a chair.

"Well," he said grimly, "one by one the pieces are going together."

"You think Keer was one of them?" asked Steve.

"He must have been—they did away July 2nd, 1938.

with him. I'm going to call the coroner."

"Call him?" said Steve. "How can you?"

"I had the 'phone connected."

A scream rang out from somewhere above the stairs, and they rushed out into the hall. Jeane had disappeared, and Steve streaked upwards.

"Jeane! Jeane!" he cried frantically.

Lew followed; the light of his torch lit up the half-landing—and there was Jeane, pale as any ghost, sitting up against the wall.

Steve lifted her to her feet, and held her because she seemed unable to stand alone. Lew caught hold of one of her arms and looked at her throat.

"The necklace has gone!" he exclaimed.

A sound that Steve did not even notice reached his ears, and he raced up on the stairs and into one of the front bed-rooms. Edmund Sandford was at a window, opening one of its casements, but he dropped his hand and turned as the light of the torch blazed upon him. Lew's official six-shooter was out in an instant.

Call in the 'DOC'

Sold by every good Stationer and Store.
Published by Castell Bros., Ltd.,
London & Glasgow.

SNOW WHITE AND THE SEVEN DWARFS

"Get away from that window before I blow your brains out!" he roared.

Edmund Sandford obeyed, raising his hands.

"Oh, so it's you again, is it?" he said, trying to speak naturally. "You think you've got something on me, don't you? You haven't!"

"Is that so?" retorted Lew. "Well, you can tell that to the jury!"

He strode over to the tall and unpleasant man, tucked the torch under his left armpit, and plunged a hand into first one pocket and then another of the captive's coat.

"I only came up to look for Mark's money," said the captive, less belligerently, "and that's the truth."

"Yeah, every word of it's the truth," jeered Lew, and from the inner breast-pocket of the coat pulled out the necklace that had been made as a decoy. "Now where's that letter of instructions?"

"My good man," said Edmund Sandford, "I wish you'd tell me."

"Okay. Get on downstairs!"

Steve and Jeane were sitting side by side on the stairs, but they rose to give passage for Lew and his prisoner.

"Feel better?" asked Steve.

"Yes, I guess so," Jeane replied. "So it was Uncle Edmund who attacked me? I wish you'd take me away from here."

"All right," said Steve, and they went on down to the hall.

Lew was standing there with Edmund Sandford, and Steve was about to say that he was going to take Jeane home, when the front door swung wide, and Sergeant Handley bundled Ronald Sandford and his wife Claire in over the step.

"Captain, this is one you'll have to chalk up for me!" he boomed. "Caught 'em red-handed prowling around the garden!"

"That's not true!" cried Claire indignantly. "We were only looking for—"

"I know!" Lew broke in with scorn. "You were only looking for atmosphere for your new play."

"Yes," said she; "but the farther I get into it the less I like it."

Lew flipped a hand in the direction of the dining-room.

"Go in there and light the candles, Handley," he directed. "Inside, all the rest of you!"

While Handley lit the candles in the seven-branched candlesticks the others trooped into the room—and there was Mrs. Wilder, sitting in a chair she had turned away from the table and gazing fixedly up at the oil-painting over the mantelpiece.

"Muffin!" cried Jeane in surprise.

"Hash, child, be still!" rebuked her aunt. "Can't you see I'm concentrating?"

"Well, how long have you been here?" demanded Lew.

"I came straight here after you let me out of gaol, captain," was the reply. "I've been trying to communicate with Mark about this."

"Don't let her fool you, captain," said Edmund Sandford spitefully. "She's had her eye on that picture ever since Mark died."

"And why shouldn't I?" Mrs. Wilder bridled. "Everyone knows Mark said it was to be mine. Make no mistake. I intend to have it!"

"So far as I'm concerned, you can have it," snorted her brother. "I don't want Mark and his wart!"

Everybody looked up at the picture and at the excrecence on the painted features of the sea captain.

"Oh, it seems to me to be getting bigger all the time!" Mrs. Wilder exclaimed, and she rose and moved the chair to the fireplace and climbed upon its seat. "Why, it's not a wart, it's a button!" she cried, and she reached up a hand and pressed the button.

To everybody's amazement a hidden door in the panelling of the wall near the fireplace swung outwards. Claire Sandford shrieked; but Lew snatched out his gun and with it covered the opening in the wall because Herbert Sandford and his blonde wife Grace stood revealed behind it, apparently in a tiny room—and Herbert Sandford's right hand was on its way to a hip-pocket.

"Don't react for it!" roared Lew. "Come on out before I plug you!"

Slowly the two stepped out from their place of concealment, whereupon Sergeant Handley stalked over to them.

"Where's the necklace, and where are those instructions?" Lew asked sternly.

"What instructions?"

"Search him, Handley!"

(Continued on page 28)

GO on collecting all the Armaments Stamps you can—it's well worth your while! There are still Five More "Hercules" Bikes and at least 2,000 of the other grand prizes to be given away in the July contest, which will finish next week—for collecting the stamps BOY'S CINEMA is giving. There are five different kinds to be collected now—BATTLESHIPS, TANKS, DESTROYERS, and so on. Cut them out and try to get as many others as you can. All those you have collected so far (except Bombers, Submarines, and Searchlights, which have been called in) should be kept for this month's contest.

There are sixteen more stamps on this page. Add them to your collection right away, and remember there are more of these stamps to swell your total in other papers like "Champion" and "Triumph." And here's

✱ A GOOD CHANCE! This week's "Champion" contains FOUR BONUS TANK STAMPS in addition to sixteen others—making twenty in all.

Hurry up and collect all the stamps you can, because next week we shall be asking you how many of one or more kinds of stamps you have collected. Then the remaining Five Bikes and at least 2,000 of the other prizes will be awarded to those readers with the biggest collections of stamps called for. The rules governing the contest have already appeared and will be repeated next week, too.

OVERSEAS READERS are in this great scheme also, and special awards will be given for the best collections from overseas readers, for whom there will be a special closing date.

(N.B.—You can also collect or swap Armaments Stamps with readers of "Triumph," "Champion," "Magnet," "Gem," "Sports Budget," "Modern Boy," "Detective Weekly," and "Thriller." Stamps can be cut from all these papers, but no reader may win more than one first prize or share, of course.)

LOOK OUT FOR MORE STAMPS NEXT WEEK!

"MAKING THE HEADLINES"

(Continued from page 26)

The sergeant dealt expertly with Herbert Sandford's pockets, and from one of them he produced the missing part of the original necklace, and from the other the long envelope containing Mark Sandford's instructions.

Lew took the envelope, which had been torn open, and from it extracted a folded sheet of paper closely filled with a crabbed handwriting.

"Well, this'll be exhibit 'A' for the jury," he said, after he had scanned the written instructions.

"If it hadn't been for that puny little jeweller butting in—" Herbert exploded, and broke off abruptly as he realised that he was convicting himself.

"You wouldn't have got away with it," Lew informed him curtly. "I never fell for that drunken act. I'm holding you for the murders of Hackett and Keer."

"Oh, no, you don't!" blustered the accused man. "You've only got one charge against me, and that's of sneaking up here and trying to find Marks money."

"Yeah, and a fat chance he had with Hackett on the job!" cried Grace.

"Take your time, sister," said Lew, "your turn's coming."

"Listen, she had nothing to do with it!" shouted her husband.

"We'll leave that to the jury. So Hackett beat you to the hiding-place, eh?"

"Don't put words in my mouth. I don't want 'em! When I got here the wall was open and Hackett was in the vault."

"And in the tussle you got the instructions?"

"Supposing I did? That doesn't prove I killed him!"

"Finger-prints don't lie, Sandford, and you left yours on the part of the necklace that Hackett hung on to. Now, what about Keer?"

"He's told you all he knows!" stormed Grace.

"He hasn't started yet," Lew retorted.

Herbert Sandford's thick-lipped mouth was working.

"I had nothing to do with Keer," he said hoarsely.

"But you don't deny killing Hackett, do you?"

"I didn't kill him! I shot him in self defence!"

"And then you robbed him."

"All right, what of it? If I hadn't taken the necklace from Hackett, Keer would have done. He was in league with Hackett."

"And you made up your mind to do away with him, too."

"I'd like to see you prove that!" he bellowed.

"Well, you won't have to wait very long," said Lew. "Put the handcuffs on him, Handley. Better take her as well, for company's sake."

Two officers were summoned from the grounds with the aid of a police whistle, and the guilty man and his accomplice were taken away. Steve followed with Jane as far as the hall, and there he pounced on a telephone that was standing on a narrow table. He rang up the "Morning Herald" office and in course of time Hallen Middleton's voice sounded in his ear.

"Hallo, sweet child," said Steve. "Has the edition gone in yet? Not? Oh, that's swell! Ready? Police solve double murder and are holding—"

Lew bounded over from the open front door, where he had been watching the departure of the police with their prisoners.

"Wait a minute, wait a minute!" he commanded. "I'll do my own reporting this time!" He snatched away the telephone. "Hallo, Middleton! Nagel speaking. My name's not to be used, understand? What? Well, it goes something like this: 'Kennedy proves keen foresight. Kennedy anticipates crime by three weeks.'"

"Smear it on heavy, sailor," chirruped Steve. "That's the kind of stuff that will put you right back in town!"

"And that's where I'm heading," Lew declared. "Are you there, Middleton? 'Kennedy displays amazing judgment.' If Kennedy wants the front page, give him the whole paper! 'Kennedy transfers—'"

Mrs. Wilder had dashed out from the dining-room and was plucking at Lew's sleeve.

"Captain, captain," she cried, "I simply will not be trodden in the dust!"

"Hold on, Middleton," said Lew into the telephone; and then, to the indignant dame: "What are you talking about now?"

"Me!" she stormed. "Whatever this Kennedy man may have done, it was I who discovered that Mark's wart was a button and not a wart at all! At least give me credit for that!"

(By permission of Columbia Pictures Corporation, Ltd., starring Jack Holt.)

British Actor-Aviator Ordered to Stay on the Ground

Ray Milland, the young British actor who is one of the three leading players in Paramount's Technicolour cavalcade of the air, "Men With Wings," has been forbidden by Producer-director William A. Wellman to continue his flying until the completion of the picture.

Milland stirred Wellman's ire when he, with Dwight Peterson, transport pilot; Louise Campbell, leading lady in the film; and Marion Weldon, Paramount stock player, flew over the picture's kite-flying location and spoiled a "take."

Wellman had no idea who the offending aviator might be as the ship circled over the spot where he was making his man-sized kite flying scenes with Virginia Weidler, Donald O'Connor and Billy Cook. He got Joseph Youngerman, his assistant, to take the number of the ship and report it to the Bureau of Air Commerce.

"From now on," Wellman told Milland, "I want you to stay on the ground. That goes for Miss Campbell, too. We aren't going to have this aviation picture spoiled by an air crash of any kind."

Found on Their Own Doorstep

A movie company's search throughout the world for the royal decoration of the Hapsburg family, conferred only for the highest service to the crown, ended ironically in Hollywood recently.

After sending scouts to the principal museums of Europe in search of the decoration, of which there are not more than a dozen in existence, 20th Century-Fox found one within a few blocks of its Beverly Hills studio.

Count Rudolf von Stefenelli, who occasionally plays rôles in films, heard about the hunt and brought the Hapsburg award, a priceless emblem of gold, diamonds and pearls, to the studio. The Emperor Franz Joseph conferred the decoration a quarter of a century ago on Stefenelli's brother, who was commander of the emperor's bodyguard for twenty years.

The medal was needed for a scene in "Suez," in which the honour is conferred on Tyrone Power who plays Ferdinand de Lesseps, builder of the canal.

The studio insured the medal for $50,000 during such time as it is used on the set.

THE WEBLEY SERVICE AIR RIFLE MARK II

NO LICENSE REQUIRED TO PURCHASE OR USE AT HOME

WRITE FOR DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER

CALIBRE 22-177 With Leaf-sight and Peepsight
WEBLEY & SCOTT Ltd 197, WEANAM STREET, BIRMINGHAM, 4

Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness, Worry habit, Unreasonable fears, etc., cured or money back! Complete Course, 5/- Details—L. A. Stebbing (A), 28, Dean Rd., London, W.1.

BLUSHING,

HAVE YOU A RED NOSE?

Send a stamp, and you will learn how to rid yourself of such a terrible affliction free of charge. Address in confidence—T. J. Temple, Specialist, "Palace House," 128, Shaftesbury Avenue, LONDON, W.1. (Est. 37 years.)

Dynamo set complete 1/9 extra. Grose Spur LIGHT ROADSTER

Free art list of 100 models
GEORGE GROSE, LTD., LUDCATE CIRCUS, LONDON, E.C.4.

TALL STAMPS

300 DIFFERENT, incl. Airmail, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Postals, Colonials. Price 6d. (Abroad 1/-).—WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS

Printed in England and published every Tuesday by the Proprietors, THE AMALGAMATED PRESS, LTD., The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Advertisement Offices: The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad: 11/- per annum; 5/6 for six months. Sole Agents for Australia and New Zealand: Messrs. Gordon & Gotch, Ltd.; and for South Africa: Central July 23rd, 1938. News Agency, Ltd. Registered for transmission to Canada at Magazine Rates. S.G.

Boy's CINEMA

2^D

EVERY TUESDAY
SEP. 10th 1938
No 978

WHO KILLED

GAIL PRESTON?

THE BAFFLING MYSTERY OF A MURDERED CABARET STAR
Starring DON TERRY

In full view of the patrons of the Swing Swing Night Club, and with the spotlight on her, Gail Preston, a beautiful cabaret star, falls dead with a bullet in her heart—and Detective-Inspector Tom Kellogg is called upon to solve the biggest murder mystery of his career. A real thriller, starring Don Terry

"Who Killed Gail Preston"

The Way of a Star

CREEPING along an iron gallery to iron stairs set at an angle, three men in convict garb descended to an area of polished floor, and, under the watchful eyes of guards who paced up and down other galleries, sneaked furtively past a circular platform upon which seeming convicts were playing some sort of dance tune, and began to execute a quaint and elaborate variation of the old-fashioned "Lockstep."

Under the galleries were rows of cells, and many of the cells were occupied, but the "prisoners" were men and women in evening clothes, who sat at tables covered with striped cloths—and paid for the privilege. For those who preferred not to be behind bars there were tables in the open on the fringe of the dance floor.

For this was no prison, though it possessed some of the trappings and much of the atmosphere of one. It was the Swing Swing Club, a popular night resort in Forty-Second Street, New York City, whose patrons enjoyed the novelty of going to "gaol" to enjoy themselves. Even its name was reminiscent of Sing Sing, the big penitentiary up the Hudson River at Ossining.

The writers were dressed as warders, and their manners were to match.

"Come on, come on! Get in here!" one of them said gruffly, as he unlocked and opened the door of a cell for a party of four. "And if you don't behave yourselves you get thrown out!"

The iron door clanged upon the willing captives, presently to be reopened by another "guard," inconspicuously carrying a menu card instead of a club.

"The Lockstep" came to an end, and the three who had performed it backed away to the iron stairs with the sound of applause in their ears. As they disappeared from view a full-faced, youngish man, with very dark brows and fierce blue eyes, stalked on to the floor through a doorway into the floodlight of a lantern trained on him from a box high above one of the galleries. He was dressed as a head guard, but actually he was Master of Ceremonies. His name was Charles Waverly.

Removing his peaked cap, he raised it to impose silence.

"All right, all right, you mugs!" he said with exaggerated curtness. "Now, we're gonna give you our headline act, whether you like it or not, so just keep your seats and listen real hard while Gail Preston sings you a song."

He went off under a gallery as a beautiful girl in a low-cut gown of shimmering lamé appeared from the doorway, bowed to right and left, and stood near the leader of the band. Her hair was nearly black, her eyes were deep-set brown, and she had a very straight nose and a very determined little chin.

The song she sang was called, "You're the Greatest Attraction in the World." There was nothing particularly distinguished about the words, but the music was attractive and her voice was perfect. She had a style that had made her famous.

The leader of the band, a handsome young fellow, known professionally as "Swing" Traynor, though his real Christian name was Leonard, descended from his platform to make a duet of the last few lines of the song, and then the two bowed to prolonged applause, and he went back to pick up his baton while she made her exit.

Charles Waverly promptly took the floor and waved his cap.

"All right, pipe down, pipe down!" he shouted. "I'm glad you know good warbling when you hear it! Well, that's the end of our show for the time being. You laughed while we danced, now you can dance yourselves!"

The doors of the cells were opened, and most of the patrons rose from their tables and made for the floor as the band began to play a lively fox-trot.

Waverly was in his own dressing-room a few minutes later, and had discarded his cap and jacket and put on a dressing-gown, when he heard a knock at the door and went to it.

Gail Preston was in the wide corridor out of which most of the dressing-rooms opened, and his eyes lit up at sight of her.

"Oh, hailo, Gail!" he exclaimed. "Come in!"

She stepped past him into the room, and he closed the door and smiled at her. But she did not return the smile; on the contrary, she gave him such a scowl that he asked plaintively:

"Why, what's the matter, Gail? What's wrong?"

"You know what's wrong, stupid!" she blazed.

"Cut the flattery, Gail," he said wryly. "What's on your mind?"

"I've told you ten times, at least, that I want a bigger build-up on my introduction, and I intend to get it! I still happen to be the featured attraction around here!"

"Sure you are," he responded soothingly. "I'm not trying to hurt you out there—as a matter of fact, I'd do anything to help you." He went to put his arms round her. "You see, I—"

"Cut that out!" she stormed, breaking away from him. "I didn't come in here to play a love scene with you! All you've got to do is to take care of your job, and giving me a proper introduction is part of that job. See that you do it!"

"I'm sure from now on you'll have no complaints," he said; and then, as she turned the handle of the door: "Gail, do I have to go on playing second fiddle?"

"Second fiddle?" she echoed, with a scornful toss of her head. "You're not even in the orchestra!"

She flounced out from the room, paused for a moment in the corridor, then opened a door on the other side of it. Her angry face instantly became more angry still, for she had expected to find her own elegantly furnished dressing-room untenanted, and Swing Traynor was in it with a pretty golden-haired girl.

"What are you two doing in here?" she asked sharply.

"We came in to settle this thing, Gail," the band leader replied.

"Settle what?" she demanded.

"Ann and I are going to be married."

"That's what you think!"

As though dismissing a subject she did not consider worthy of discussion she swept over to a dressing-table and seated herself in a chair facing a semi-circular mirror, in the frame of which sixteen opalescent electric lamps gleamed. But the girl followed her, and said with spirit:

"You've got to listen to me! You may be my sister, but every chance you've had you've tried to come between us!"

"A very pretty speech," jeered Gail. "but you wouldn't be so proud if you knew a few intimate details about your charming boy friend."

"Why, what do you mean?"

Gail Preston sprang to her feet and faced the band leader.

"Do you want to tell her, Swing," she challenged, "or shall I?"

"If you can tell the truth," gritted Swing, "go ahead."

"I think you should know," the temperamental star said scathingly to her sister, "that Swing falls in and out of love very easily. I don't suppose he's told you that he was once in love with me?"

"You're wrong there, Gail!" cried Swing. "I never loved you!"

She winced as though he had struck her, and he went on:

"That hurts your vanity, doesn't it? You will find it hard to realise that there is somebody you can't dominate. Well, it's time somebody told Ann the truth about us. I was a musician without a dime to my name, and the great Gail Preston took a fancy to me. Remember, Gail? You told me you'd put me on top of the heap—told me you'd get me an orchestra of my own. Well, you certainly did those things. You gave me a foothold; but I had to do my own climbing."

"Go on!" snapped Gail.

"I was grateful to you—still am. I'd like to repay you in any way I can. But I never could fall in love with you."

Ann clung to his arm, and that added fuel to the flame of Gail's jealous rage.

"Now, you listen to me, Swing!" she said fiercely. "I made you, and I can break you just as easily! Beginning tomorrow, there will be a new orchestra leader in this club, and I'll go out of my way to blackball you in every other spot in town! You won't be able to get a job—I'll see to that personally!"

She flung out a hand at her sister.

"And you'll have to starve with him!"

You had a promising career, Ann; you might have been one of this country's finest music arrangers. But you're spoiling it all by choosing Swing. From now on you can do your own worrying!"

"Okay, Gail!" said Swing. "But remember this—if you try to come between Ann and me, it'll be the last thing you ever do!"

She whirled past them to the door, and she sped along the corridor to the office of Patrick Fallon, the proprietor of the place, who looked up from a desk as she burst in upon him. He was a thick-chinned man of about forty, with sleek dark hair and sleek manners, and he was in evening clothes because he was in the habit of mingling with his more regular patrons.

"Patsy, I want you to fire Swing Traynor!" she exploded.

"What for?" Fallon inquired mildly.

"Why, he's the most popular band leader I've had in the club."

"Either you fire him to-night, or I quit cold!"

Fallon was accustomed to outbursts of temper on her part, and in the ordinary way he was pretty good at humouring her; but this sudden demand of hers seemed to him to be beyond all reason, and he said rather stiffly:

"Now don't forget, Gail, that I still happen to be the boss around here."

"Maybe you are," she retorted, folding her arms with an air of defiance, "but you'll do as I say!"

He rose from the desk and he flung out his hands.

"You've got to give me time," he protested. "I'll get rid of him. Give me a couple of days. Give me time to get a new man."

She shook her head.

"Be reasonable," he pleaded.

"I'll expect to see a new orchestra leader in here by to-morrow night!"

"All right Gail," he surrendered with a sigh. "Anything you say."

She went out as abruptly as she had entered, and he sat down at the desk again, compressed his lips, scratched the back of his neck, and spoke into a dictograph.

"Send Swing Traynor in right away," he said.

A Call to Headquarters

WHEN Gail returned to her dressing-room, Swing and Ann had gone, but a black-haired and rather sinister-looking man with a pock-marked face, dressed as a chauffeur, was sprawled in an armchair.

"Since when do you wait for me in my dressing-room?" she blazed at him.

"I like it here," he returned with cool insolence. "What are you gonna do about it?"

"I'm getting tired of this! I'm going to—"

"You're gonna keep your pretty little mouth shut," he broke in, getting to his feet. "Is that what you were gonna say? Take it easy, babe."

She bit her lip.

"All right, skip it," she said. "Go home and put some dinner clothes on, then come back as fast as possible."

"What for?" he inquired.

"I want you to sit at a table in the café every minute I'm on that floor."

"What's the idea?"

"I want someone near me who knows how to handle a gun."

"Okay, Miss Preston, I'll be there."

He picked up his chauffeur's cap from a chair and went out; and for a few moments after he had gone she stood motionless, staring at the door he had closed behind him. Then, slowly, she went into an adjoining room in which she sometimes rested, and from the drawer of a quaint little table there she took out an automatic of blue steel.

The gun was in her hand when she heard someone enter the dressing-room.

"Who's there?" she called out.

Ann ran over, sobbing, and Swing ran after her. Tom caught hold of her arm. "Now will you sit down?" he said gruffly.

There was no reply, and she went swiftly through the doorway, holding the automatic. An enormously fat nigger, who was carrying the skirt of a grey costume over her left arm and the coat of the costume in her right hand on a hanger, stopped short with a little gasp of alarm on her way to an inset wardrobe.

"Why do you go sneaking around like that?" stormed the star.

"Land snakes, Miss Preston!" gulped the black dresser. "That sho' is a powerful-lookin' piece of artillery."

"Answer my question!" insisted Gail.

"I jus' got these from the cleaners."

The coat and skirt were indicated with a nod.

"Oh, I just wasn't expecting you, that's all Sarah!"

"Sho' looks like you was expectin' somebody," said the nigger, eyeing the automatic. "Do you want me to hang these clo'es, or do you wanna look at 'em first?"

"Put them on a chair," directed Gail. "I'll look at them later."

The skirt was deposited upon the arm of a chair, the coat was hung from the back of it.

"Now, get out and leave me alone."

"Yes, ma'am."

Sarah made herself scarce, and Gail sat down at the dressing-table and laid the automatic on it.

At almost the same moment, Swing Traynor walked into Fallon's office, and, though he had a shrewd idea as to why he had been summoned, it was in quite a casual manner that he said:

"Hallo, Patsy, what's up?"

"Plenty," was the reply. "Gail was in here just now, yelling her head off."

"What about?"

"She wants me to fire you."

"Fire me?" Swing appeared to be astonished. "What reason did she give?"

"She's money in the bank for me, Swing. She doesn't have to give reasons."

"Does that mean I'm through?"

Fallon nodded, then rose and perched on the edge of his desk.

"Oh, you'll be able to get another job!" he said consolingly. "Plenty of clubs in town would be glad to have you."

"If I'm that good," growled Swing, "why don't you let Gail Preston go? I can sing, Patsy—I can do any number she can. Why don't you give a guy a break?"

"I'm sorry, Swing," Fallon shook his head. "Preston has the name, and you haven't. There's nothing I can do about it, but I'll see that you get a couple of weeks' pay, and that'll give you time to look around for something else."

"Okay, Patsy, but I'm not through with Preston. One of these days she's going to get what's coming to her!"

"Forget it, kid," urged Fallon. "You aren't the first guy that's been double-crossed by that dame."

"No," said Swing savagely, "but I might be the last!"

Gail Preston was still sitting at her dressing-table, biting a painted fingernail, when a knock at the door disturbed her meditations.

"Who is it?" she called nervously.

"Stevens," replied a deep voice.

"Come in."

Jules Stevens, the man who entered the room, was her manager. He was middle-aged, full-bodied, and apparently very sure of himself. His fat face was clean-shaven, his dark hair was thin above his rounded brow, and there was something shifty about his light blue eyes. He was in evening clothes that did credit to his tailor.

September 10th, 1933.

"Gail," he said, crossing the room and seating himself in a chair beside the table, "if anybody tells you that you haven't got the world's best manager, it'll be a libel. If I have to admit it myself, I'm tops."

"I suppose you receive fan mail, too?" she suggested dryly; but the sarcasm was wasted on him.

"I've arranged a new contract for you," he boomed. "You stay on here for another twelve weeks."

"That's fine," said she without the slightest enthusiasm, "but it's not what I wanted to see you about. There's a little matter of sixty thousand dollars you were supposed to handle for me during the past year. What happened to it?"

"Why, nothing happened to it," he replied. "Why?"

"Where's that statement of account I was supposed to get?"

"That takes time," he protested. "You can't arrange an accounting at a moment's notice."

"Maybe not," she said with a toss of her head, "but if I don't get those figures by to-morrow morning I'm going to the police."

He stared at her as though he could hardly believe his ears.

"Don't be silly, Gail," he expostulated. "My dealings with you have always been honest."

"I don't need a sales talk—" she began heatedly; and then a telephone bell rang in the other room and she pushed back her chair and rose. "Wait here!" she commanded. "I still want to talk to you."

She disappeared through the doorway, and Jules Stevens reached out a hand to the automatic he had noticed on the dressing-table and put it in his pocket.

Fallon was on the telephone. He had rung up to tell Gail that he had carried out her wishes in regard to Swing Traynor.

"When does he leave?" she asked. "Oh, that's fine! I knew you'd see it my way, Patsy—you're too smart to have me walk out of this place. I'll talk to you later about a new leader. I have a few ideas of my own."

She put down the instrument and went back to the dressing-room.

"Stevens—" she began. But Stevens was no longer there, and with frightened eyes she saw that the gun had gone too. She sped back to the telephone, and in an agitated voice she said to the girl who answered her call: "Police headquarters, quickly! I want to speak to Inspector Kellogg."

Detective-Inspector Tom Kellogg was sprawling in a swivel chair behind a desk in his room at headquarters, and his feet were on the desk and a soft felt hat was on his head. He was a capable detective, but by no means a typical one in appearance. When he was on his feet he towered above most people, for he stood six feet four inches in his socks. His shoulders were broad, his strength was tremendous, and his smoothly-shaven face was far more suggestive of a care-free young sportsman than of a successful sleuth.

Seated at the end of the desk and gazing intently into a crystal was Detective-Sergeant Clifford Connolly, a person of pugnacious aspect—with china-blue eyes that had a tendency to stare—and one not over endowed with brains. But Connolly had his uses, and Tom Kellogg tolerated him as an assistant, though there were times when the sergeant's now-fad of crystal-gazing got on his nerves.

Tom reached languidly for a telephone on the desk as its bell jangled.

"Hallo?" he said. "Yeah, this is Inspector Kellogg."

"This is Gail Preston, inspector," returned the voice of the cabaret singer. "I'd like you to come to the Swing Swing Club as soon as possible."

"Is that an invitation, Miss Preston, or is something really wrong?" Tom inquired.

"I'd rather not talk about it over the 'phone." Her voice sounded strained. "Will you come?"

"I have an appointment that'll keep me here for a while, but I'll be over as soon as I've finished."

"There'll be a table reserved for you, inspector," she informed him. "Good-bye."

Connolly looked up from his crystal as the telephone was replaced.

"Don't tell me who it was," he said brightly. "let me find it in this ball."

"I'll give you three guesses," jeered Tom.

Evidently the crystal failed, for after a while the sergeant ceased to stare into it.

"Gail Preston, the singer over at the Swing Swing Club," said Tom. "Must be looking for some free publicity."

"Aw, those dames think we got nothin' else to do but jump through hoops when they want us to. We got important work to do."

"Sure," yawned Tom.

With his hands to his forehead Connolly concentrated on the crystal again.

"Oh, there's an image!" he suddenly exclaimed. "It comes to me in the crystal ball—it's coming closer! I can see his head. It's George Washington. He wants to say something to me. What d'you want to say, George?"

Tom removed his feet from the desk and walked round it to see what all the fuss was about. An envelope was lying close to the crystal, and the crystal had enlarged the head of George Washington which was printed on a stamp that decorated the envelope.

"You sap!" exploded Tom. "It's a two-cent stamp!"

"Oh!" The disillusioned gazer blinked at the envelope that was thrust under his nose.

A Dive to Death!

FOR three-quarters of an hour the patrons of the Swing Swing Club were left in possession of the dance floor, and then the waiters dressed as guards ordered them back to their tables and Charles Waverly reappeared.

"Well, here we are back again, folks," he said in his gruff way. "The first number in the second part of our show to-night will be two well-known mugs that were sent up from Chicago for cheating audiences. Whether you like 'em or not, I give you Lolita and Ardo."

A Spaniard in white and a Spanish girl in black and white took the floor and provided a spectacular tango, followed by a whirlwind dance that looked far more dangerous than it was. While the tango was in progress the pock-marked Frank Daniels entered the café, transformed from a chauffeur into a seeming patron, and was conducted to an empty cell.

In another cell Fallon had joined two friends of his at a table, and evidently he had told them about Gail Preston's insistence upon Swing's dismissal, for one of them said indignantly:

"I wouldn't care how good that Preston dame was, Patsy, if I owned this club I'd throw her out on her ear."

She couldn't talk to me like that and get away with it."

"That's the difference between us, Shane," returned Fallon, lighting a cigar. "I own this place, and you don't. I run my business the way I want it."

"When that dame starts to yell," commented the other man, "it looks like she runs the business."

"I've got my reasons for having her around," said Fallon quietly. "When she gets too tough to handle I'll figure out my own way of getting rid of her."

The patrons clamoured for an encore of the whirlwind dance, but no encore was given. Lolita and Ardo bowed themselves off the floor, and Waverly stood in the middle of it to announce:

"The next number, ladies and gentlemen, needs no introduction. You all know Gail Preston, and those of you who haven't heard her sing don't know what they've missed. I'm just telling you that any one of you who doesn't applaud for at least ten minutes when she gets through with this next song will be given a parole and sent out of here. I'm warning you—you'll do it, or else!"

Abruptly the café was plunged into darkness and a spotlight from the electrician's box streaked down to envelop Gail as she emerged from the doorway at which she had been standing, a figure of shapely loveliness in a sheath-like gown of black satin.

"Here she comes now, folks," cried Waverly, "the sweetest and most beautiful little singer in the world—the human torch, Gail Preston."

He retreated round a corner of one of the end cells as the band struck up the introductory bars to a song about midnight and loneliness, and Gail moved forward in the beam of light.

Daniels sat alertly in his chair at the back of his cell, and his right hand closed round the butt of a gun in a shoulder-holster under his dinner-jacket.

Swing left the platform and stood waving his baton midway between the band and the temperamental star as she lifted up her voice. The door of one of the cells farthest from the beam of the spotlight was opened slowly, and a man in evening clothes moved furtively out past a "guard" whose attention was riveted on the singer.

As a big disc revolved in front of the limelight lantern the spotlight that shone upon Gail changed colour, and it was an amber light that illuminated her as she came to the last words of the song. Flinging out her arms in a tragic gesture she sang:

"...there'd be no hope in store,
If I knew I had to go through This midnight—this midnight once more."

There came a final crashing chord from the band and a burst of applause from the audience, and not many people heard three shots that were fired almost simultaneously, or noticed the jets of flame that accompanied them. But Gail Preston gave a piercing scream, and fell face downwards with a bullet in her heart.

Other women screamed, the lights of the café blazed again, and commotion followed. People sprang up from the tables round the floor; people streamed out from the cells. Two patrolmen burst into the club from Forty-Second Street to find a panic-stricken crowd trying to invade the cloak-rooms. One of the guards—a burly waiter in reality—made for the revolving front doors to close them and collided with Tom Kellogg who was just entering with Connolly.

"Hi, what's the rush, buddy?" demanded Tom.

"Gail Preston's just been shot!" was the breathless reply.

"Wait a minute!" Tom addressed the milling crowd. "Nobody gets out of here until I say so."

"Hold on, hold on!" exploded the make-believe guard. "Who are you?"

"Inspector Kellogg, from police headquarters." Tom flashed his badge. "Have a couple of your men guard the doors, and don't let anybody in or out."

"All right, sir." The waiter put his broad back to the exit and shouted for assistance, while Tom and Connolly made their way swiftly into the café past more frightened patrons and reached the dance floor.

Ann was there, sobbing in Swing's arms. Fallon was staring down at his murdered star, and Waverly was standing with bowed head a little way off. Tom knelt beside the still form, felt at a pulseless wrist, and looked up at his assistant.

"Notify headquarters," he directed crisply, "send for the coroner, then take the names and addresses of everybody in here."

Connolly went off with a waiter to the nearest telephone, and Tom got to his feet.

"All right," he said loudly, "everybody get back to your tables. Nobody leaves the premises. Who owes this place?"

"I do," said Fallon sourly. "Who are you?"

"Inspector Kellogg."

Fallon gulped.

"Inspector Kellogg? What—"

"Miss Preston 'phoned me this evening and asked me to come over. Do you know what she was worried about?"

"I haven't the slightest idea, inspector," the proprietor declared. "I was sitting at my table with a couple of friends. Miss Preston was singing, and the next thing we knew she was on the floor—dead."

The patrons of the place were being shepherded back to their tables by the waiters; but the man who had sneaked out from a cell while Gail was singing was still keeping out of sight.

"No sound of a shot?" asked Tom. "It was right at the end of her number," said Fallon, "and the applause was enough to have drowned the sound of a shot."

"Well, that'll help!" Tom took a step forward. "Who are you?"

Waverly, thus addressed, gave his name and added that he was Master of Cereponies.

"Where were you when she ended her number?"

"I was sitting over there in the wings by the band."

"Looks like anybody might have fired that shot." Tom glanced at Swing Traynor and at the weeping girl he was holding, then waved an imperious hand. "Sit down and make yourselves comfortable," he barked. "I have an idea we'll be here for a long time."

The members of the band resumed their seats on the platform. Swing led Ann over to a chair and Fallon returned to his friends. Time passed, and then Connolly reappeared with the coroner and his officer, and the coroner knelt beside Gail Preston.

"Shot," he said, without looking up. "We know that," said Tom.

Ann ran over, sobbing, and Swing ran after her. Tom caught hold of her arm.

"Now will you sit down?" he said gruffly.

Tom dropped on one knee to feel at the dead man's heart and wrist, and to study a pallid face.

"I think the bullet's in her heart," said the coroner.

With a sudden rush the man who had been hiding round a corner of the end cell made for a door that opened into an alleyway at the side of the premises, and he was brandishing a gun.

"Get away from that door!" he bellowed at the policeman who was stationed there.

Tom heard and raced after him, shouting:

"Hi, where are you going?"

The policeman was knocked aside with the gun, and the man got out at the door.

"Go out the front way and head him off in the alley!" cried Tom, and then he, too, was out in the alleyway, just in time to see the fugitive leap upwards on to the bottom rung of a vertical fire-escape attached to the wall.

The patrolmen came dashing on from the club as he started to climb, and they reached the foot of the fire-escape; but about fifteen feet from the paved way the fellow stopped and looked down, and the gun in his hand spat flame.

"Stand back!" shouted Tom.

A bullet struck the opposite wall and fell harmlessly near the feet of one of the patrolmen, and then Tom was on the bottom rung of the escape and mounting it swiftly. The fugitive scrambled upwards, dropping his gun, and reached a little landing beside a window that was shut and fastened.

He made no attempt to smash the window, but turned and stared wildly at the detective.

"Wait!" he cried in a voice that was almost a screech. "I did it! Sure I did it! I killed Gail Preston, and I'm not sorry!"

Tom was only a little way below him when he started climbing again, but without the gun to hamper his movements he seemed to have the agility of a cat, and the distance between him and his pursuer was increased.

Another window was passed, and the top of the fire-escape was reached. The self-confessed killer heaved himself off the top rung over a coping on to a flat roof, but as he stood upon the roof a policeman who had ascended to it from inside the club advanced towards him.

"You'll never get me alive!" he screamed.

"Wait!" yelled Tom, divining his intention, but with a shriek that was horrible to hear he hurled himself over the coping.

"Look out!" Tom's bellow warned the patrolmen, and they flattened themselves against a wall just in time to avoid being struck by the body that thudded to the concrete.

The detective scrambled down the fire-escape and dropped on one knee to feel at the dead man's heart and wrist, and to study a pallid face that bore unmistakable signs of dissipation during life, and while he was thus occupied, Gail Preston's coloured maid came along the alleyway, stopped short with a gasp of horror, and exclaimed:

"Why, it's Mr. Owens!"

"Who are you?" demanded Tom, springing to his feet.

"I'm Miss Preston's maid," replied the staid negress. "Wha-wah-what happened to Mr. Owens?"

"Owens?" Tom fastened on the name. "Who was he?"

"He—" Sarah became alarmed as her left arm was seized in a vice-like grip. "Whatta you gwine to do with me? I don' know nothin'! Honest I don'!"

September 10th 1938.

"Come on, sister," barked Tom, "spill it! Who was Owens?"

"I ain't sayin' nuthin'!"

"Okay," Tom turned to one of the patrolmen. "Take her to headquarters, Clancy. Maybe she'll talk there."

The Crumpled Note

TWO hours afterwards, Tom was in his own room at headquarters, and Connolly was sprawling in a chair with the stub of a cigar between his lips. Sarah was sitting on the very edge of another chair, sullenly protesting that she knew nothing.

"Why would Owens want to kill Gail Preston?" rapped Tom.

"I—I don't know," stammered the negress.

"Come on, sister, we're not playing games!"

"Well—well, w-what'll happen to me if I talk?"

"Nothing at all," Tom reassured her. "Tell me all about it."

Sarah endeavoured to lick her thick lips with a tongue that was drier than they were.

"All right," she surrendered, "I'll tell you. Mr. Owens was Miss Preston's husband, but she divorced him. He couldn't hold a job, and he was drinkin' all the time, and he kep' askin' Miss Preston for money. She supported him for a couple o' years after they was divorced, but I guess she got sick and tired o' givin' him money to buy liquor, and once they had a big argument and I heard Miss Preston say she wasn't gonna give him another cent."

"Well, thanks," Tom patted a very plump arm. "That clears everything up. You can go home now."

He crossed the room and opened a door; but Sarah seemed in no haste to depart now that she no longer was wanted.

"Ah hopes everything comes out all right," she said.

"Yeah, for you and us both," commented Connolly, and he bundled her forth into a corridor and closed the door.

"You know, Tom," he turned to remark, "that's what I call a considerate murder with no fancy trimmings. A chase—bang—bang!—and it's all over! Boy, we sure cleared that up in a hurry, didn't we?"

Tom nodded with considerable satisfaction; but at that moment another door was opened, and Curran, the little grey-haired ballistics expert attached to headquarters, stepped into the room in his shirt-sleeves.

"Hallo, Tom!" he said cheerfully. "I've got a little bad news for you."

"Bad news?" Tom frowned. "About what?"

"The bullet we took from Gail Preston's body was not fired from Owens' gun. He must have missed her entirely!"

From behind his back, where he had been holding it, the little expert produced a bullet to which a tab was attached by string.

"This is a thirty-two. Preston was killed with a thirty-eight."

"Hi!" howled Connolly. "You can't do that to us!"

"More than one bullet was fired from Owens' gun," Curran went on quite placidly, "but this isn't one of 'em. Someone else murdered Gail Preston."

With a sly grin for Connolly he went out again, taking the bullet with him, and Tom sat down at his desk to speak into a dictograph:

"Hallo, Standish?" he said. "Call the Licence Bureau first thing in the morning and have them slap a padlock on the Swing Swing Club."

"Aw, Tom," said Connolly dolefully, "does that mean we've got to start this investigation all over again?"

"It sure does," gritted Tom. "We're going over to Gail Preston's apartment for a little look around. Come on, Chandu!"

Gail Preston's apartment was situated on the tenth floor of a huge apartment-house in West Seventy-Sixth Street, not very far from Central Park. A uniformed attendant accompanied Tom and his assistant to its front door, where he produced a key.

"Anybody else been up to this apartment to-night?" questioned Tom.

"I don't know, sir," the attendant replied. "We've just changed shifts."

"Well, shift into high and get that door open. We're in a hurry!"

The door was opened, and the two detectives crossed a comparatively small hallway into a large and rather showily furnished sitting-room. After standing in the middle of this room and looking keenly about him, Tom pounced on a handbag which was lying on the seat of an armchair. It was made of black silk, and just below its zip-fastening were two initials, stamped in gilt, "A. B."

"What does 'A. B.' stand for?" he asked.

"First two letters in the alphabet," Connolly promptly replied.

"Nice going!" Tom opened the handbag, and from amongst a variety of feminine articles inside it he fished out a crumpled piece of paper upon which a note had been written. "Get a load of that!"

Connolly took the piece of paper and with wide eyes he read the note:

"Keep quiet—we'll get out of this all right.—SWING."

A tiny click reached Tom's ears, and he swung round in time to see a door across the room being opened slowly a few inches and then closed again. He whipped a six-shooter from a shoulder-holster under his left arm, and with it in his hand went to the door and flung it wide. A wardrobe cupboard was revealed, and in it, amongst garments suspended from a rail on hangers, Ann Bishop was trying to conceal herself.

"All right, come out of there!" he said harshly; and then, as she timidly emerged: "Who are you?"

"Ann Bishop," she replied. "You're Inspector Kellogg, aren't you?"

"Look," said he, "I'll ask the questions. What are you doing here?"

"I'll answer that when I get—"

She broke off at the sound of a key being turned in the lock of the front door; and Tom said hurriedly and in a whisper to Connolly:

"Take the girl in another room, and no squawks out of her."

Connolly whisked Ann off into an adjoining room, and Tom dived into the wardrobe cupboard, leaving the door ajar.

Almost immediately Fallon walked into the sitting-room, gazed thoughtfully all round it, and went to a little desk near one of the windows. He opened a drawer on the desk and searched it, then noticed the handbag on the chair to which Tom had restored it, picked it up, frowned at the initials it bore, and dropped it again.

A bookcase next engaged his attention, and he was about to open one of its doors when Tom stepped out from the cupboard and startled him by inquiring sharply:

"Looking for something?"

Fallon took from his pocket the monkey-wrench he had picked up from the floor and held it out to Tom.

Fallon swung round and his jaw dropped.

"What are you doing here?" he exclaimed blankly.

"Everybody asks me questions," snapped Tom, putting away his gun. "but you're going to be different. You're going to tell me what you're doing here!"

"I came to pay off a war debt."

Tom grabbed hold of him and pushed him down into a chair.

"Listen, Fallon," he warned, "you're wise-cracking yourself right into a spot!"

"Now, wait a minute, inspector," blustered the proprietor of the night club. "I'm not involved in this murder, and, what's more, I don't intend to be!"

"Stay where you are!" thundered Tom. "The moment that incident happened in your place you were involved!"

"I thought the case was solved?"

"I changed my mind. I didn't like the murderer we caught, so I'm looking for a new one. Now, what were you looking for here?"

The answer was almost too glib, and not in the least degree convincing.

"Gail borrowed a valuable first edition from me and never returned it, and I came here to get it."

"So you're looking for a book in this apartment at four in the morning?" derided Tom. "Why don't you save those sort of yarns for your after-dinner speeches?"

"You can't pin this on me!" Fallon started to rise, but was pushed back again. "I had nothing to do with the murder!"

"That's what you have to prove, and you'd better talk fast."

"I've got nothing to say."

"Listen, Fallon, I'm giving you a break. Talk!"

Fallon sat breathing heavily for several moments, avoiding Tom's eyes. Then, slowly and reluctantly, he said: "I met Gail Preston several years ago in London. I wanted to come to New York, and she helped me get a job. They let me in on a six-months' passport."

"And you overstayed your leave?"

Fallon nodded.

"The Immigration officers were after me," he confessed, "so I changed my name. Gail was the only one who knew it."

"What did you expect to find here?"

"She kept a diary, and my story's probably in it."

"Okay, Fallon. I'll believe you for the time being, but to-morrow morning you'd better see the Immigration Bureau. They may have something to say about your ease."

Fallon took out a handkerchief and wiped his brow with it.

"But I don't want to go back," he said hoarsely.

"Maybe you won't have to," retorted Tom grimly. "You have a good chance of landing in a real gaol! All right, beat it!"

Fallon rose and went out from the flat, looking considerably older than when he had entered it, and Tom went to the door of the living-room in which Connolly was waiting with Ann.

"Bring her in, Cliff," he said, and he eyed the girl with a frown as she appeared, took it for granted that she had been listening, and jeered:

"I suppose you collect first editions, too?"

"Practically," she responded quite calmly. "I was looking for that diary myself."

"Hi, that diary's beginnin' to look like the book of the month!" exploded Connolly. "It must be loaded with dynamite!"

"What are you afraid of in that diary?" asked Tom.

"Well, it had nothing to do with what happened to-night," Ann declared. "There are a lot of us who have personal affairs that are innocent enough, and we want them to remain personal."

"Maybe so," rapped Tom, "but housebreaking is still a prison offence."

"I have every right to be here!" she asserted.

"You and how many others?" he scoffed. "Fallon had a key."

"Well, I don't know anything about Mr. Fallon, but Gail Preston was my sister."

"Your sister?" He stared at her in astonishment. "Well, that's a new angle!"

"That diary doesn't have to be made public, does it?" she asked anxiously.

"Maybe, and maybe not. In any case, you hang around where I can get you if I want you. Someone has to do plenty of talking before this case is closed."

Gail Preston's Gun

ALTHOUGH neither Tom nor his assistant had many hours in bed that night they were at the Swing Swing Club by ten in the morning looking very little the worse for wear.

They made straight for the dressing-room that had been Gail Preston's, and found it untenanted; but they heard voices in the little room beyond it—and there they found Sarah packing garments in a big wardrobe trunk, and Daniels with her in his chauffeur's uniform.

Tom swept over to the negress.

"What are you going to do with Miss Preston's things?" he asked sternly.

"Miss Ann left word for them to be sent to Miss Preston's place," replied the enormous maid. "She wanted to look through them."

"Would you know if there was something missing?"

"Yes, sir."

"Did you see anything of her diary?"

The negress shook her head emphatically.

"Miss Preston never kept nothin' here but her clo'es."

"Is everything accounted for?"

"No, sir—there's somethin' missin'."

September 10th, 1934.

Her gun. She used to keep it in that drawer, but it's gone now."

Tom went to the little table and he looked into the drawer.

"When did you miss it?" he turned to inquire.

"A little while ago, when I came here to pack."

"What calibre was it?"

The negress looked puzzled.

"I don't know, sir," she said, "but it sure looked wicked."

"I can answer that," said Daniels,

"It was a thirty-eight."

"And who are you?" barked Tom.

"Her chauffeur," Daniels replied.

"My name's Frank Daniels."

"When was the last time you saw the gun?"

"Last night."

"Did Miss Preston have any visitors just before she was killed?"

Sarah answered that question.

"Mr. Stevens, her manager, was here," she said.

"Where does he live?"

"I don't know, sir."

"He keeps his car in the same garage as Miss Preston," Daniels stated, and suddenly his dark-brown eyes widened.

"Say, I saw him there this morning, and he told the attendant he was going to Canada on business—said he was leavin' this afternoon."

Tom pointed to the telephone that was on the little table.

"Cliff, get headquarters for me, will you?" he said, and turned again to the dusky maid. "What's Stevens' full name?"

"Jules Stevens," she replied.

"Age?"

"About forty, I think."

"That's right," confirmed Daniels.

"And he weighs about a hundred and eighty pounds."

"Connolly obtained headquarters on the telephone, and Tom took the instrument from him.

"Find out where Stevens' office is," he directed, "and pick up a couple of men and look over his books."

Connolly departed with an air of importance, and Tom asked to be put through to Captain Long, of the radio communications department.

While he was waiting for the connection he ascertained from Daniels that the theatrical manager's car was a yellow roadster, and that its number was 34-528, and within a very few minutes a message was being broadcast to all patrol cars:

"Watch for new yellow roadster. New York licence, thirty-four dash five two eight, believed headed for Canada. Arrest driver, Jules Stevens, full face, clean shaven, blue eyes, brown hair, weight, one hundred and eighty pounds."

Within an hour Stevens was stopped on a federal highway up in Albany, and he did not attempt to deny his identity.

"Okay," said one of the officers who had stopped him. "Turn around—you're going back to town."

"What does this mean?" demanded Stevens heatedly.

"I don't know, buddy," was the reply. "I'm just working here. Get going!"

Tom was back in his own room at headquarters, and was manicuring his nails at his desk when Stevens was brought in to him.

"I won't stand for this!" the captive blazed at him. "I have business in Canada, and you have no reason for dragging me back here like a criminal!"

Tom dropped the nail-file and dived round the desk to grip him by one of the lapels of his coat.

September 10th, 1938.

"Come on, Stevens, let your hair down!" he said fiercely. "What were you doing with Gail Preston's gun?"

The fat face paled a little, but an answer was almost immediately forthcoming.

"Well, the gun was too big for her, and she asked me to change it for a smaller one."

"I understand you had an argument with her last night."

"So what?" challenged Stevens.

"It was just a business disagreement."

"What was it about?"

The answer to that question was not so prompt.

"Preston gets a sudden idea that she wants to go to Europe, and asks me for an immediate accounting of her funds."

"Why the argument?"

"Well, you can't toss off an accounting at a few moments' notice. I told her she'd have to wait."

Tom's brown eyes bored into the shifty blue ones.

"For a man who claims innocence, Stevens," he said, "you're doing a lot of lying. Gail Preston had no intention of going to Europe, because she'd just signed a new contract with Fallon."

"Well, she signed the contract after she made up her mind to go to Europe."

"Sure!" scoffed Tom; and then Curran, the little ballistic expert, entered the room with the heavy automatic that had been found on Stevens and taken from him.

"What did you find?" Tom inquired.

"That thing hasn't been fired since it was bought," Curran replied, and laid the automatic on the desk.

"I told you that!" cried Stevens with a show of indignation. "Why don't you guys pick on the right man?"

"We do sometimes," said Tom.

Curran went out chuckling, and Stevens turned in the direction of the other door, obviously imagining that he was at liberty to depart. But Tom stopped him.

"There are still a few things I'd like to know," he said grimly.

"What, for instance?"

"We've just gone over your books, and there's a small matter of sixty thousand dollars that's bothering us. Sixty thousand that belonged to Gail Preston—and you'll have to account for every penny of it before we're through with you! All right, you can go. But you'd better not try to slip town again—you'll be tailed from the moment you walk out of this building!"

The mystery of Gail Preston's murder was as far off solution as ever three days later when Fallon walked into Tom's room and found him occupied with some papers he had taken from a folder.

"What do you want here?" rapped the detective.

"You guys have got me in a spot," Fallon complained. "You won't let me out of the country because of the murder, and I can't even open my club, because you've got it padlocked. You've got me going and coming!"

"Reopening your club is the least of my worries."

"But with the club closed I'm losing my shirt!"

Tom pointed a pencil at him.

"Listen, Fallon, you squawk too much," he said. "When Preston's murder is solved you can reopen the Swing Swing Club, but not before."

"Yeah, but I—"

"Wait a minute!" Tom had a sudden idea. "Do you have many reserved tables at your place?"

"Why, of course," Fallon answered in some surprise. "Most of them are. Why?"

"Then you have a chart for your table lay-out, haven't you?"

"Sure—that's how we make our reservations. Just mark the name of the customer down on the chart."

"Have you one for the night Preston was killed?"

"Probably."

"Good!" Tom rose from the desk and put his hat on his head. "We're going to your place to have a look at that chart. Come on, I want to find out who was sitting at the tables towards the rear of the café."

The Monkey-Wrench

THE front doors of the Swing Swing Club were padlocked, but an officer stationed outside the building admitted the proprietor and the detective, and they passed into the thickly carpeted vestibule, out of which the café and the cloak-rooms opened.

"The shot that killed Preston," said Tom, indicating a spot just above his heart, "hit her about here at a slight downward angle. It may have been caused by the way she was bowing."

"Wait a minute!" Fallon moved across the vestibule to a switch-box in the wall. "I'll put on the lights."

"Fine!" Tom looked through glass-panelled doors into the café, which was in comparative darkness. He heard several clicks from the direction of the switch-box, but the gloom in the café persisted. "Nothing happened!" he exclaimed. "Nothing happened!" he exclaimed.

"Something's wrong," muttered Fallon, and Tom went over to him.

"Did you have the current turned off when you closed the club?" he asked.

"No." Fallon made a grimace. "I didn't figure to be closed this long!"

"You'd better call your electrician to have him fix it. I'll go and wait in the café."

There was a telephone-box at one end of the vestibule, installed there for the benefit of patrons. Fallon disappeared into it, and Tom pushed open one of the glass-panelled doors and entered the café.

The place looked more like the interior of a prison than ever, in the dim light provided by two very small windows high up in opposite walls, as he made his way past chairs and tables to the dance floor. He reached the spot where Gail Preston had fallen, and from it he looked up in the direction from which he imagined the shot to have been fired.

His gaze shifted from a dark gallery upon which a make-believe guard had paced to and fro, to the electrician's box high above it. The front of the box projected from the wall, and above it was another box in which two spotlight lanterns were situated.

It seemed to him that the shot might have come from the gallery, or from either of the boxes, but suddenly his attention was drawn to an iron ladder, fixed to the wall, which led up to the lower of the two boxes. The bottom of the ladder was hidden by a cell in front of it, but the upper part was visible, and a dark figure was ascending it.

"Hi!" he shouted, cupping his hands in his mouth. "Hi!"

The figure disappeared, presumably into the box, and he ran across the floor and found the bottom of the ladder behind the cells. He climbed swiftly upwards, and he reached the lower box. It was empty, but a vertical ladder stretched up from it to the box above.

He started to climb this second ladder, but just as his head was on a level with a square opening in the floor of the upper box something struck him violently on the top of the head and he fell unconscious to the bottom of the ladder.

Fallon, having telephoned for the electrician, entered the café. He expected to find Tom on the dance floor, but as there was no sign of him there, or in any of the cells, he looked for him in the dressing-rooms and in his own office. The search occupied a considerable time, and the total disappearance of the detective puzzled him. He went back into the café, and as he roamed about it he shouted at intervals:

"Inspector! Inspector! Inspector Kellogg! Hi, where are you?"

He came to the foot of the ladder that led up to the electrician's box, and he was about to pass it when something fell to the floor almost at his feet. Wonderingly he stooped and picked up the object, and in the light of a match he found that it was a monkey-wrench. He dropped it in his coat-pocket and stepped back to stare up at the boxes.

He had informed the policeman outside the club that he had sent for the electrician, and as he stood there he heard the front door being opened. He ran to the glass-panelled doors and put his head into the vestibule.

"Who's out there?" he cried.

The electrician had made straight for the switch-box, but he turned about and said:

"Hallo, Mr. Fallon!"

Fallon went back to the ladder, and the electrician followed him.

"Something wrong?" he asked.

"There may be." The proprietor stared upwards again. "You'd better get up there and take a look round."

"Okay, as soon as I put on the lights." The electrician, a round-faced man named Mike Blake, returned to the vestibule.

"The main fuse is blown," he presently shouted into the café. "I can fix that in a minute."

Tom came to his senses, on the floor of the lower box, just as all the lights in the café blazed. In a dazed sort of fashion he pulled himself up into a sitting position with the aid of the ladder he had been in the act of climbing, and then slowly he got to his feet and leaned against the ladder.

His hat was still on his head, but his head was aching badly, and he was trying to collect scattered wits when Mike Blake found him there and exclaimed in astonishment:

"Hi, what's this?"

"Where did you come from?" asked Tom dully.

"Fallon 'phoned for me," said Mike. "I'm the electrician here. I was coming back to get my tools, anyway."

"Well, help me down below, will you?" said Tom. "That ladder looks like a picket fence!"

"What happened to you?"

"I don't know."

Tom stumbled towards the lower ladder, and the electrician helped him down it by crooking a hand under his arm and descending with him.

Fallon, on the floor of the café, held him round the waist as soon as he was within reach, and at the bottom of the ladder both men supported him. "What happened to you up there, inspector?" Fallon inquired.

"I don't know." Tom held his hands to his temples and tried to think. "I feel as though I'd been playing hide-and-seek with a ten-ton truck."

They were leading him towards a chair when Charles Waverly and Frank Daniels emerged from the doorway beyond which the dressing-rooms were situated, and Daniels was carrying a striped suitcase and Waverly was carrying a bag.

"We've got company," said Daniels.

"Look!"

"Yeah, something's wrong," decided his companion.

Tom, instead of sitting down, advanced to meet them.

"Well, this looks like home week," he said with sarcasm. "Where did you men come from?"

"I came back to pick up Miss Preston's bags," said Daniels.

"And I was picking up some of my own stuff," said Waverly. "What seems to be the trouble?"

Tom passed a hand over his forehead.

"You may know as much as I do about it," he growled. "When did you get here?"

"About half an hour ago," Waverly replied. "The cop let me in at the side door."

"I—I got here a couple o' minutes ago," said Daniels, rather hesitatingly.

Tom turned to the electrician.

"Say, where's that tool-box you were supposed to be looking for?" he questioned.

"I keep it in the men's cloak-room," was the reply.

"Do you keep a monkey-wrench in it?"

"Sure. Why?"

"We'd better take a look at that kit."

"What for?" Mike Blake looked aggrieved. "There ain't nothin' in it but tools."

Tom clapped a hand on his shoulder. He was beginning to feel like himself again.

"I agree with you, pal," he said,

Ann tottered over as Tom raised the limp form of the chauffeur-bodyguard. "Well, what could have happened?" she gasped.

"but there's nothing I want to see more than a lot of tools."

Fallon took from his pocket the monkey-wrench he had picked up from the floor and held it out.

"This must have dropped out of the electrician's box," he remarked. "I found it over by the ladder."

"Thanks." Tom took the wrench and made a face at it. "This may be the ten-ton truck I was talking about!"

He put it in his own pocket and went with Mike Blake to the men's cloak-room in the vestibule. Mike raised a flap in the counter across which hats and coats and sticks ordinarily were received by an attendant, and in the room of shelves and pegs behind the counter he took a small but evidently heavy toolbox from a corner and opened it.

"Well, there it is," he said. "What now?"

Tom stooped over the box—and suddenly brought out from it an ugly automatic.

"You got a permit to carry this?" he snapped.

"Sure I have," Mike replied quite calmly. "When you work in these cafes you don't get home till mighty late at night, and I always like to have a gun on me."

Tom laid the automatic on a shelf and turned over the tools in the box.

"Where's the wrench you said was in here?" he challenged.

"It oughta be there." Mike looked amongst the tools, but in vain, and he scratched the back of his head. "Who'd want to steal a monkey-wrench?"

"Maybe it wasn't stolen!" Tom held out the wrench Fallon had given him. "Is this it?"

The electrician turned the monkey-wrench over and over in his hands.

"It's mine," he frowned, "but how did it get where Fallon said he found it?"

"That's what I want to know!" barked Tom.

"What are you drivin' at?"

"Some day people won't ask me questions! How long have you been working here?"

"Oh, since the club opened—about three months."

"Where did you work before that?"

"I was head electrician at the Palace. Why?"

Tom ignored that question.

"How long did you work there?"

"Twelve years. I'd be there still, only—"

"Only what?" prompted Tom, as the electrician broke off with almost a frightened expression on his face.

"Say, what are you asking me these questions for?"

"Because I'm a crazy cop, that's why!" Tom's grin was not a pleasant one. "Let's have it!"

"Well," confessed Mike, "I was at the Palace when Gail Preston was doing a headline act there, and one night the mike went dead and spoiled her act. So she went to the manager and had me fired."

"You had good reason to hate her, then, eh?"

"Can you blame me, after being in one place for twelve years?"

"It wouldn't be enough reason to kill her, would it?"

"No, it wouldn't!"

"Do any of the other fellows know where you keep this box?"

"Well, they oughta know. I've never kept it a secret."

Mike Blake's face was not a particularly attractive one, but his manner was not that of a crook. Tom gave him a long, keen glance, then picked up the automatic.

"Okay," he said. "It's a lucky thing for you this is a thirty-two—Preston was killed with a thirty-eight." He handed back the gun. "Now beat it with your box—I won't need you any more this afternoon."

From the cloak-room Tom went back into the café, and a few minutes later he was sitting at Fallon's desk, in Fallon's office. Daniels was facing him across the desk, and Fallon and Waverly were on the other side of the room, Waverly sitting on a couch, Fallon leaning against a window-frame.

"How did you happen to get a job with Miss Preston, Daniels?" Tom inquired.

"Well," replied that pock-marked young man, "I blew into town when a lot of the big Broadway stars were being spotted for hold-ups, and an agency put me in touch with her. She hired me for her chauffeur and body-guard."

Tom put an elbow on the desk and rested his jaw against his hand.

"Why did she need a bodyguard?"

"She went out a lot to different parties every night," said Daniels. "She never wanted sleep."

"What was the matter?"

Daniels shrugged.

"Well, if you ask me, she had something on her mind. She'd get so low you couldn't talk to her, and then she'd sit down and write a lot o' junk in that diary of hers."

Tom raised his brows.

"What does that diary look like?"

"Oh, nothing much," Daniels seemed surprised at the question. "I only saw the outside of it. It was bound in black leather."

"Okay. Where can I reach you if I want you?"

"Well, I'll be around for a bit—Mr. Fallon said he'd try to get me a job. You've got my address."

"All right," Tom waved a hand in dismissal, and the chauffeur-bodyguard went out to collect the suitcase he had left in the café; and then Tom looked at the other two and asked if either of them knew that Gail Preston had a sister.

"Everybody knew that," said Waverly. "Ann Bishop's her real name. Gail Preston was a stage name."

"What's the tie-up between Swing Traynor and Ann Bishop?"

Waverly professed not to know, but Fallon said:

"Oh, I can answer that. He used to take her out pretty regularly. Maybe they were going to be married; I don't know. By the way, I forgot to tell you Gail came to me the night she was murdered—came to me in this office—and told me I had to fire Swing Traynor, or she'd quit me cold."

"She did, did she?" Tom drummed his fingers on the desk. "What reason did she give?"

"She didn't!" Fallon replied with an expressive gesture. "She just said do it, or else—"

"Maybe I'd better have a nice long talk with Mr. Swing Traynor," remarked Tom; and he pulled a telephone across the desk and dialed a number on it. "Police headquarters?" he said to the operator who responded to the call. "Give me Cliff Connolly."

A minute later, Connolly's voice sounded in his ear, and he said tersely:

"Cliff? This is Tom. Pick up Swing Traynor immediately, and hold him for questioning. Yeah, right away."

An Arrest—and Its Sequel

SWING TRAYNOR was in Tom's room, and Connolly was rebuking him for being impatient, when Tom himself walked in at the door. The band leader faced him angrily.

"What's the idea of dragging me down here?" he bust out.

Tom turned to his grinning assistant. "Where did you find him?" he asked.

"Up at his apartment."

"Hmm! Around the corner from the club, isn't it?"

"Sure," nodded Connolly, "in Ninth Avenue."

"Very interesting." Tom dismissed the plain-clothes men who had helped to bring in the unwilling captive, and the captive was commanded to sit down in a chair.

"You didn't get along very well with Gail Preston, did you?" Tom barked.

"What gives you that idea?" countered Swing sulkily.

"Quit stalling, Traynor! Why did she want you fired?"

"Apparently she wasn't satisfied with my work."

"Did she ever complain to you about anything?"

"Sure," admitted the good-looking young man, "but did you ever know a star that blamed herself when something went wrong?"

"Are you asking me, or telling me?" snapped Tom. "Listen, Traynor, we'll get along a lot better if we both come right to the point. Where does Ann Bishop fit into the picture?"

Swing flinched ever so slightly.

"How did her name get mixed up in this?" he demanded hoarsely.

"Miss Bishop is a nice girl," said Tom. "I'd protect her, too, if I were in your boots."

"I'm not trying to shield anybody!"

"No?" Tom produced the crumpled note he had found in Ann's handbag.

"Ever seen this before?"

"Sure," returned Swing in a defiant voice, "I wrote it. So what?"

"I found it in Miss Bishop's handbag when I searched it."

Swing bounded to his feet.

"You've got a lot o' nerve, Kellogg!" he blared.

"Just a minute." Tom pushed him back into the chair. "She's under suspicion the same as anyone else. If you don't tell me the truth about this I'll have to get it from her."

Swing drew a long breath.

"You leave her out of this," he said.

"I sent her that note because she and I—well, we were going to be married."

Tom put the note back in his pocket.

"Did she know that you didn't get along well with her sister?"

"Yes."

"You're under arrest, Traynor!"

"What for?" howled Swing. "You have no evidence!"

"What do you mean by no evidence?" Tom retorted. "You and Ann Bishop fall in love. You meet opposition from Preston, and she's going to have you fired. That would give you a black eye in the profession."

"I tell you I didn't do it!"

"I think you did!" Tom's face was within a few inches of Swing's and his eyes were accusing. "If I'm wrong you'll beat the rap. Ring the bell, Cliff!"

The two plain-clothes men reappeared, and Swing was marched away in custody and charged with the murder of Gail Preston. The news of his arrest made front-page headlines in the evening papers, and soon after six o'clock Connolly hurried in upon Tom full of excitement.

"Guess who's out there waiting to see you!" he cried.

"Who?" Tom, who was at his desk, looked up from a report concerning quite a different case.

"Ann Bishop!"

Tom rubbed his hands together.

"Well, my friend," he said with considerable satisfaction, "it looks like our plan is beginning to work. Now, if we can get her to talk we'll have her right where we want her."

"Where's that?" asked Connolly.

"You ought to know—look in the crystal!"

Connolly took him seriously and sat down at the end of the desk with the crystal before him. But before he could start peering into the thing his superior barked at him:

"Go and bring her in, you fool!"

Ann was ushered into the room, a pathetic little figure dressed all in black, except for her gloves. Her face was tear-stained beneath a filmy veil.

"Hallo, Miss Bishop!" said Tom, rising to conduct her to a chair.

"Why did you arrest Swing?" she stormed. "He didn't kill Gail!"

"You seem very certain about that," said Tom.

"I am! I know Swing Traynor."

"What makes you so positive?"

"Because I know more about this business than you do!"

"Everybody knows more than we do," grumbled Connolly.

"Miss Bishop," coaxed Tom, "if you'll sit down and tell me about it I may be able to help you."

She sat down in the chair to which he had led her, collected her thoughts, and began:

"Well, Gail was infatuated with Swing, but he and I fell in love with one another, and we made no bones about it. But when we told Gail that we intended to get married she threatened to drive Swing out of the business."

"It seems to me," said Tom gravely, "that you're giving me a very good reason why Swing Traynor should have killed Gail Preston."

"That's not so!" she cried. "Swing and I were married the very day she was killed!"

"Very interesting, but proves nothing."

"Proves nothing? Why, don't you see it's impossible to believe that he'd marry me knowing he was going to kill my sister the same day?"

"Perhaps," conceded Tom, "but all crimes aren't premeditated."

"This one was!" she declared fervently. "It was so well planned that you haven't found the murder weapon yet!"

"Right again," said Tom, "but until that diary is found Swing Traynor is guilty."

She sighed and rose.

"Well, I'll go right over to the apartment now," she decided, "and look for it. Will you meet me there?"

"I'll be there in half an hour," Tom promised, and he escorted her to the door.

Connolly looked brightly up at him from the crystal, after she had gone, and he said with an air of wisdom:

"You know, I think the dame's right. Swing wouldn't knock over Preston the same day he was gonna marry her sister. That wouldn't be—er—ethical."

"I'm inclined to agree with you," said Tom, folding his arms and frowning at some law books on a set of built-in shelves, "but in the meantime, keeping him in goal may do a lot of good. It might bring the real murderer out into the open."

NEXT WEEK'S GRAND COMPLETE FILM DRAMAS!

WARNER BAXTER

"KIDNAPPED"

The early days of the union between Scotland and England, when Alan Breck was the last rebel fighting for Scottish freedom. Don't miss the thrilling adventures of this stalwart fighter, a brave lassie, and a boy named David Balfour

"LAW OF THE UNDERWORLD"

A drama of gangster rule, and of a young man and a girl who were involved with a master criminal. Starring Chester Morris

"BULLDOG DRUMMOND'S PERIL"

The fearless Englishman risks his life in a dangerous mission. He is up against a mysterious enemy. A thriller, starring John Barrymore

"THE ADVENTURES OF MARCO POLO"

A fearless young man ventures into strange and hostile countries after a trade pact, and there attempts to rescue a princess and free a country of a tyrant. Starring Gary Cooper

Also
Another episode of the grand serial:
"THE PAINTED STALLION"
Starring Ray Corrigan

"Doggone it, I sure wish I could get my hands on that diary!"

"You—and five or six others!"

"Yeah," drawled Connolly. "Maybe we should start a club, eh?"

The Diary

A NN opened the front door of the apartment that had been her sister's with a key that was her own, crossed the little hallway into the sitting-room, and went straight to the mantelpiece. She laid her handbag on the shelf, and from the middle of the shelf removed a tall vase of flowers which she deposited on the tiled hearth.

The flowers had concealed a little square door in the chimney-breast, and this she opened. Another door was revealed—the circular door of a circular safe set in the wall. She twisted a milled knob this way and that till the tumblers of the combination lock had fallen into position, and then she pulled open the steel door.

Among some jewel-cases in the safe there was a book bound in black leather; and this was in her hands and she was reading it when suddenly a man's arm swept round her throat and she was pulled backwards. The book fell into the fireplace, but the scream she tried to utter was smothered by a hand that was clapped over her mouth.

Twenty-five minutes after she had entered the apartment, Tom and Connolly walked along the corridor from the elevator, and Connolly pressed the bell-button beside the front door.

There was no response of any kind from within, save the noise of the bell, and after an interval Connolly rang again.

"Thought that dame was gonna be waitin' for you?" he growled.

"The desk clerk said she came up twenty minutes ago," Tom held an ear to the keyhole. "There must be something wrong!"

He put a shoulder to the door, and his strength was such that the door flew open. He dived across the hallway into the sitting-room, and Connolly followed him.

Ann was lying on a rug in front of the fireplace with a handkerchief fastened tightly over her mouth, and her hands were tied together with a piece of rope. Her eyes were closed.

"Give me a hand with her," said Tom, and between them they carried her over to a chesterfield and freed her of her bonds.

Presently her eyelids flickered and she moaned. Her blue eyes opened, and she tried to sit up.

"Take it easy, kid," urged Tom gently. "What happened?"

"I—I don't know," she murmured; and then she stared across the room at the open safe, holding her hands to her head. "I—I'd just taken the diary out of that safe, but somebody must have seen me. An arm or something caught me round the throat, and something hit me on the head."

"Let's take a look at this place," said Tom. "You keep still, Miss Bishop. Cliff, you take the bed-room."

Connolly nodded and disappeared. Tom, remembering the wardrobe cupboard in which he himself had hidden on his previous visit to the apartment, went over to it and opened its door.

As he did so Frank Daniels fell out, flat on his back, and apparently unconscious. His arms were under him, a handkerchief was fastened round his mouth.

Ann started up from the chesterfield with a cry and tottered over as Tom raised the limp form of the chauffeur-bodyguard and yelled to Connolly to bring some water.

"Well, what could have happened?" she gasped.

"Looks like Daniels wanted to join Cliff's club," remarked Tom cryptically, and he dumped his burden into the nearest armchair and removed the gag.

He saw that Daniels' ankles were tied together with a piece of cord, and that his wrists were similarly united behind his back. He freed the ankles with a penknife, but the cord about the wrists was loosely fastened and easily undone.

Daniels opened his dark eyes as Tom whisked away the second cord.

"Hi, what's goin' on?" he mumbled, sprawling in the chair. But Tom turned to Ann, instead of answering.

"Did you see anything in that diary before it was taken?" he asked.

"Why, yes," she said, "seems to me I remember—why, it was about Daniels, about his being connected with some robberies."

Daniels seemed suddenly to recover full possession of his senses.

"I don't know what she's talking about!" he cried.

"What were you doing here?" Tom rapped at him.

"I met her outside on the pavement, and she said she was gonna send my back pay; but after I'd left her I remembered I hadn't given her any forwarding address, so I came up here."

"I can think of a better alibi than that, Daniels," said Tom sternly. "You came up here to swipe that diary."

"I'm tellin' you the truth," Daniels protested. "The door was open and I came in just as she was opening the safe. Then I was smacked on the head, and that's all I remember until I found myself in this chair and you unfastening me."

"There's only one thing wrong with that story, Daniels," thundered Tom. "It's a lie! You heard us ringing the bell and dodged into that cupboard. You did a pretty good job of tying everything but your hands. Now quit stalling. Where's that diary?"

Daniels' face became a mask.

"I don't know," he replied sullenly.

"Okay, pal, I'll let you have a talk with a couple of the boys down at headquarters. Cliff!"

Connolly appeared belatedly from a kitchenette he had found, and in his hand was a glass of water.

"He doesn't want any water now," said Tom.

"Can't I just even spill a little on him?" asked Connolly.

"Take him away!"

The glass of water was thrust upon Ann, who sipped at it, and the sergeant stood over Daniels.

"Oho, so you're gonna join my club, eh, palsy?" he jeered. "Come on, let's get going."

Daniels was jerked to his feet and propelled towards the door.

After he had gone, Tom searched the wardrobe cupboard thoroughly, and he found the missing diary in an otherwise empty suitcase. Much to Ann's delight he telephoned headquarters with instructions for Swing Traynor to be set at liberty forthwith, and on his way down-town in a taxicab he studied the diary.

Daniels had been subjected to third-degree methods, and was looking pretty much of a wreck by the time he was huddled into Tom's room and saw the diary lying open upon the detective's desk.

Connolly, who was still perspiring freely as a result of the part he had played in the browbeating of the prisoner under a blinding light, leaned against a wall and mopped his face. Daniels stalked about the room like a caged animal, his eyes wild and the muscles in his face working. Tom, in his swivel chair behind the desk, banged a hand on the diary and said imperiously:

"Stand still and start talking!"

Daniels stopped and turned.

"I've told all I know," he howled. "I wanted to sell the diary to the newspapers. I needed the money. I didn't kill Preston, and you guys can't pin the rap on me."

"How long were you working for her?" asked Tom.

"Three months."

"How much did she pay you?"

"Forty a week."

"Three months at forty dollars a week is about five hundred dollars. How do you account for the twenty thousand you had in the bank, every nickel of it deposited while you were working for Gail Preston? Where did you get it?"

Daniels gulped. Questions had been fired at him like bullets from a machine-gun in the room downstairs, September 10th, 1938.

but that question had not been amongst them.

"I don't have to account for the money I make," he cried.

"There aren't many ways you can make that much in three months, Daniels!" roared Tom, jumping to his feet and pounding the desk with a fist.

"How did you get it?"

Daniels gritted his teeth.

"Gambling," he said.

"Where?"

"Saratoga."

"When were you there?"

"About two weeks ago, over the week-end."

"That's a lot of money for a chauffeur to win at the races. I can think of other ways to make that money. Maybe you stole something—some jewellery?"

"That's a lie!" Daniels' eyes were on the open diary. "I had nothing to do with it."

"Stop kidding!" Tom put his hand on the diary. "The week-end you said you were at Saratoga Springs you were actually driving Miss Preston to a party at Connecticut Beach. You came back for her at seven-thirty next evening. During that afternoon some hold-up men knocked over the beach party and got away with ten thousand dollars' worth of jewellery."

"What's that gotta do with me?"

"She went to a lot of parties, and there were always some crooks around to pull a job." Tom flung out an accusing finger. "You tipped them off and gave them the layout of the places they were to knock over. Preston got suspicious. She kept tabs on you, and when she learned the truth she threatened to turn you over to the police if you didn't return all the stolen stuff. You had to get this diary, Daniels, if you could, because you knew those facts were in it."

"All right," blurted the cornered prisoner. "I was in on the robberies. But I didn't kill Preston."

"I didn't say you did," Tom dropped his voice to a conversational level. "Did any of those other crooks know that she was wise to their racket?"

"No, I didn't tell them a word about it."

"Okay." The detective dropped back into his chair. "Take him away, Cliff."

Daniels trembled as Connolly seized hold of his arm.

"What are you gonna do with me?" he faltered.

"What do you think?" retorted Tom. "Book you for robbery and suspicion of murder. And if you want to make it easier for yourself, you are going to disclose the names of those guys you worked with."

"But I didn't kill Preston, I tell you! Hold me on the robbery charges, okay, but you ain't gonna keep me here for killin' Preston?"

"No," drawled Connolly, dragging him towards the door, "we're only gonna keep you here because we like your face. Come on."

The Secret of the Spotlight

A LITTLE after ten o'clock that evening Mike Blake crossed the vestibule of the Swing Swing Club and entered the prison-like café. Most of the lights were on in it, for a thick-set and middle-aged watchman was making his rounds.

This watchman swung round at the sound of footsteps in the deserted place, but he waved a hand as he caught sight of the electrician.

"Oh, hallo, hallo, Bill!" hailed Mike.

"How are you?" returned the watchman. "What are you doin' here?"

"Oh, came over to get my overalls and clean up the joint," was the reply. "I've got a job—I'm goin' back to the Palace."

"That's fine," congratulated the watchman.

"You know, I'll be glad to get out o' this joint," Mike went on. "It gives me the willies."

Bill nodded.

"I'm used to it this way," he said. "Well, I'll be in Mr. Fallon's office if you want me."

He went off across the dance floor, and Mike climbed the ladder that led up to the limelight box. From the lower box he ascended to the upper one; but a very few minutes later he was down in the café again and making for the vestibule.

He dived into the telephone-box that was in the vestibule, and hurriedly inserting a nickel in the coin-box, dialled "O."

"Hallo!" he said to the operator. "Give me police headquarters quick! I want to speak to Inspector Kellogg!"

Tom was at his desk, studying the diary, when the call was put through to him.

"Inspector," said an agitated voice in his ear, "this is Mike Blake, the electrician over at the Swing Swing Club. I've just found out how Miss Preston was killed. Yeah, I was checking over the equipment, and one of the spotlights looked damaged. I started to fix it when—"

A shot rang out from somewhere in the vestibule, a shot that shattered the glass panel in the door of the telephone-box, and Mike slumped to his knees, dropping the receiver he had been holding; he clutched at a ledge on which a telephone directory was lying, and collapsed in a heap upon the cork-covered floor of the box.

Tom had heard the sound of the shot and the splintering glass without realising what it was.

"Hallo!" he said. "Hallo, Mike! Mike!"

There was dead silence on the line, and he replaced his own telephone and spoke into a dictograph.

"Get my car ready," he barked, "and have Cliff and Arnold meet me downstairs."

A squad car was standing at the kerb in Centre Street by the time he reached the pavement, and Connolly and another plain-clothes man were in the back of it, and the sergeant to whom he had spoken over the dictograph was at the wheel. He jumped in beside the sergeant and he said:

"Swing Swing Club as fast as you can make it!"

The night watchman was in the vestibule of the club when they entered it, and he stared at them.

"Say—" he began, but Tom thrust him aside and rushed to the telephone-box because he had caught sight of its broken panel. He tugged open the door and he stooped over the dead electrician.

"Shot in the back of the head while he was trying to call me!" he lamented. "Get the coroner, Arnold! Use this 'phone."

He backed out from the box, and he pounced on the watchman, who had sunk on to a divan set against the wall.

"I want to talk to you!" he rasped. "Has anyone else been here within the last hour?"

"No, sir," the watchman replied

(Continued on page 24)

For arresting a wayward, high-spirited heiress for smoking in prohibited areas a patrolman is rebuked by his captain, and in disgust hands in his badge. But he goes to the girl's rescue when he finds she is a cat's-paw for smugglers. Starring George O'Brien

"The BORDER

PATROLMAN"

The Wilful Heiress

THE Desert Springs Hotel was a fashionable resort on the American side of the Mexican border. Famous people—those with money—and those with indifferent health went there to take the waters or have a good time. The hotel was to play a big part in the lives of two people of very different stations.

One, at the beginning of this story, was riding across the barren wastes of the desert. A well-built, rugged, strong-jawed young fellow with a pleasant smile. He was a Border Patrolman, and his name was Bob Wallace. He rode up to a weather-beaten signpost, on which was painted "Mexican border, 3 miles, and Desert Springs Hotel, 1 mile." As he had his duty to perform and because he regarded the hotel as a place for the idle rich, he chose without hesitation the route to the border. There was a lot of smuggling going on, and he was out to catch the offenders.

At the hotel was Miss Patricia Huntley, who was very much one of the idle rich. She was fabulously wealthy, very good-looking, quite a star at tennis, riding and dancing, and had only one tie in the world—her grandfather. The old man tried hard to put a curb on the twenty-one-year-old heiress, but he found it an almost impossible task to guide or advise this grandchild of his. If she wanted to do a thing she did it.

On this day she played a guest a single at tennis, beat him hollow, and then, because she felt hot, dived straight into the swimming-pool, much to the horror of a number of respectable old ladies. Being the granddaughter of Jeremiah Huntley, she could do this sort of thing. She emerged from the pool, borrowed some old boy's dressing-gown, and hurried off to the hotel. She sighted a tall, swarthy man in riding kit, and she hailed him eagerly.

"Courtney! Courtney! I thought we were going to have some tennis."

Courtney Maybrook left the elderly man to whom he had been talking in undertones to hurry towards her.

"Oh, I'm sorry, Pat." He smiled, revealing flashing teeth. "But I have had to attend to some important business." He looked at her. "Have you fallen in the pool?"

"No. I jumped in." The girl laughed gaily. "Don't you get as bad as grandfather. I thought people came up here to get away from business."

"Business will follow me," he smiled back. "But I hope to be free for the rest of my stay here. Now you run along and change."

The girl had dripped water all over the carpet in the lounge, but the management knew better than to complain. Upstairs, in their big suite of rooms, was a white-haired, tall, aristocratic old man, who was horrified at her appearance and ordered her gruffly to go and change immediately. When she appeared in riding clothes the old man stared at her severely.

"I can't see why you always want to be around with that Maybrook fellow. He's just a male clothes-horse."

"Now don't get yourself in an uproar, Grumpy," teased Patricia. "Remember your blood pressure."

"A lot you care about my blood pressure," he stormed. "You just do things to annoy me. I tell you I don't like him."

"You will when you get to know him better." The girl picked up a 'phone. "Mister Maybrook, please."

The petulant, wilful young heiress scowled when she heard that Mr. Maybrook had gone out a few minutes before and would not be back for at least two hours.

Courtney Maybrook had some very urgent business. He rode to the Mexican border and to one of the loneliest spots. There was a wire fence with occasional openings, and there appeared to be not a soul in sight. He studied his wrist-watch and found he was ten minutes early. At four to the dot two horse-riders appeared round a sandstone cliff. A man and a woman, and they were coming from Mexico. Maybrook waited for them on his side of the boundary. The woman was a brunette, slight of build and attractive—she stared intently at Maybrook. The man was a sallow-faced, sneering type of fellow.

"Been waiting long?" asked the woman.

"Just a few minutes, Myra," answered Maybrook, and nodded to her companion. "Hallo, Frank."

The three people glanced round and then dismounted. The woman handed Maybrook her handbag. She pointed to the paste adornment just underneath the catch, and when Maybrook pressed it there was a click and it slid smoothly open to reveal a small cavity.

"Very neat," Maybrook said, and took out a small packet.

"Don't let Manning chisel you on this lot," commented the man called Frank. "They're worth fifty thousand if they're worth a nickel."

The woman came closer to Maybrook and slid her arm through his.

"Think you can stand my company for a few days, darling? Frank and I have decided to mutiny. We're tired of being buried alive in Mexico."

"Yeah! We thought we'd come back to our own country for the week-end," sneered Frank.

"But do you think that's wise?"

"Listen." Myra wrenched her arm away and her eyes were flashing. "I'm tired of being cooped up in that adobe shack."

"Oh, I know it hasn't been pleasant for you, dear," Maybrook murmured softly, and with sudden compassion put his arm round the woman. "You've been a good sport to put up with it as long as you have. Do you think it's been easy for me? I've missed you terribly. I'd like nothing better than that you stay at the hotel, but it would be a risk—"

"Nix! Nix!" hissed Frank. "Here comes the law."

Riding lazily towards them was Bob Wallace, of the Border Patrol.

Bob smiled regretfully.

"I'm afraid you folks are on the wrong side of the line," he announced.

"But we're Americans," answered the woman aggressively.

Maybrook gestured to Myra to be quiet. He knew the stubbornness of patrolmen, and bad temper would get them nowhere.

"They've been living in Mexico for a short while. Came over to spend a few days at the Desert Springs Hotel. Just for a little recreation," he explained in his pleasantest manner. "They heard I was there and made up their mind all in an instant. I got a message to say they had started and came out to meet them."

"Uh-huh." Wallace seemed satisfied. "Well, I hate to be a kill-joy, but they'll have to come through the regular port of entry."

"My name's Maybrook." The suave manner became more apparent. "I'm a guest at the Desert Springs. This lady and gentlemen are friends of mine. Couldn't I be responsible for them?"

"Sorry, Mister Maybrook."

"Couldn't you pretend you just didn't see us, officer?" Myra tried a dazzling smile.

Bob shook his head.

"Sorry."

"But that means going about ten miles out of our way," argued Frank, and intercepted a warning glance from Maybrook. "Well, I guess it's no good trying to go against these fool laws. If we have to go back, we have to go back. Come on, Myra."

Myra and Frank rode back across the border. Myra waved.

"I'll see you later, Courtney."

"I'll come over and see you," Maybrook called back.

The patrolman fingered his chin.

"I'm afraid I've offended your friends."

"Oh, I quite see your point," Maybrook answered, with a friendly smile. "I suppose if I were in your place I would have done the same." He held out a case. "Have a cigar?"

"No, thanks."

"Well, so long."

"Adios!" answered Wallace, and watched Maybrook till he vanished out of sight among the sandhills.

Courtney Maybrook hastened back to the hotel, and in the lounge was the same elderly individual. They retired to a corner, where Maybrook produced the small packet he had taken from Myra's handbag.

September 10th, 1933.

"Good stones!" Manning said after a glance through a glass at the gems. "Better than the ones you brought over last."

"I'm glad you like them," Maybrook answered, and laughed. "While I was getting them to-day from Myra and Frank one of those border cops spotted them cross the boundary and chased them back across the line."

"Did he—?" There was fear on Manning's face.

"No, he didn't get wise, but he certainly threw a scare into me."

"Well, maybe it's just as well," muttered the diamond fence viciously. "Make you a little more careful in future."

Smoking Prohibited

A BIG, fat, good-natured-looking simpleton was lolling about near the stables of the Desert Springs Hotel. What his exact position at the hotel was nobody knew, but he had been there a long time, lounging around and doing odd jobs. Everybody knew Chuck Owens. Also, he had a very reasonable voice and could twang a note on a guitar.

On the following afternoon he was busy studying a book on personality, as there was a Spanish lady whom he hoped to win by his manly conduct. She did not mind his singing, but when he became deadly serious she would laugh. He looked up at a chuckle to find Bob Wallace looking over his shoulder.

"Hallo, Chuck, I see you're studying to be a heartbreaker."

"Quit kidding, Bob. Don't you think I'm getting a strong personality?"

"You've got a personality all right." The patrolman glanced round. "But it smells a little too much of the stables."

"Yeah, but where else can I sleep—?" Chuck shook his head, then his beady eyes looked at Bob.

"What're you doing here?" "Captain Stevens put me on a new job. Which one of the guides in this hotel took a party over to the Grove yesterday?"

"Slim Martin, I think. Why?" "Captain Stevens wants me to read the riot act to him. Somebody went away and left something burning in the restricted area. It nearly started a brush fire."

"I bet I know who it was," eagerly cried Chuck. "Miss Huntley. She's always smoking, and she don't care where she throws 'em."

"Who's Miss Huntley?" "Miss Patricia Huntley from New York."

"Well, you better tip off Slim to keep her from smoking in restricted areas."

"You don't know Miss Huntley," Chuck grinned. "If she wants to smoke she's going to smoke."

"Is that so?" Out stuck Bob's chin. "Tell me some more about this dame."

Later Bob walked into the hotel and sought out Hendricks, the manager. The latter welcomed the patrolman with a friendly handshake—it was as well to be in with the law.

"What brings you here, Wallace?"

"I just want to tell Miss Huntley that it's against the law to smoke in restricted areas, that's all."

The manager's face became serious.

"Will you let me talk to her?" he asked. "You see, she's pretty quick on the trigger. You have to handle her very carefully."

"Yeah, I know. I've got a pretty good line on her from Chuck," Wallace grinned. "I've known her kind before. You can't handle them with kid gloves. You've got to tell 'em straight."

From Collins, Jeremiah Huntley's valet, Bob learned that at this hour Miss Huntley usually went out riding with Mister Maybrook. He hastened round to the front of the hotel, and found the two about to set off for a ride. He pulled up sharply. Surely this sweet-faced girl could not be the notorious Miss Huntley?

"Miss Huntley?"—he doffed his hat—"Miss Huntley."

Now the smile and laughter had gone. He found himself staring at a haughty beauty whose eyes were disdainful and mocking.

"Yes, what is it?"

"Miss Huntley, smoking is prohibited in closed areas," Bob said with a nervous grin. "I should be obliged if you would be a little more careful in future."

The girl's answer was to laugh derisively. Maybrook turned his horse and moved closer.

"What is it, Pat?" he asked.

"It seems this young man objects to smoking," replied Patricia, and her pretty face twisted into a nasty grin. "Come on, let's not waste time."

Bob was staring after them when Chuck appeared and grinned.

"She sure is a prize, ain't she?"

"Prize?" questioned Bob sharply.

"I'd hate to win her in a raffle!"

Wallace would have gone to his horse if Chuck had not stopped him.

"Say, Bob, have you got a minute?" he asked.

"What do you want?"

"Have you noticed anything?"

"No. What?"

"I put some cologne on me." Chuck beamed like a big kid. "How do I smell now?"

"Terrible," was the terse answer.

It had suited Maybrook's plans that Myra and Frank could not come to the hotel, which he was using as a centre for his smuggling activities, because Myra was becoming somewhat of a nuisance. He had been attracted by her and they were unofficially engaged, but when Maybrook had seen Patricia Huntley he had changed his ideas. Why not marry this girl with the money? It would be easy to get control of her fortune, and she would make a good foil in some of his swindles. Maybrook was one of those smooth, sleek and courteous men that appeal to many women, and Patricia had made up her mind that he was the nicest man she had ever met.

They rode out to one of the restricted areas, hitched their horses to a tree and went to sit down on a fallen log. Naturally, Patricia asked for a cigarette, though there was a notice on a nearby tree-trunk saying that smoking was forbidden.

"We've been together a great deal these last two weeks, Pat. Enough for me to know that I care more for you than anyone I've ever met. We like a great many of the same things, and there's no reason why—"

"Now be careful, Courtney," the girl interrupted. "Or I might take all this as a proposal. Now don't look peevish, Courtney. I know you like me, and I like you. But somehow I just can't be romantic in the sunlight. I need a poetic background. A beautiful moon and a little soft music."

Ardently Maybrook leaned forward and strove dramatically by gesture and a hoarseness of the voice to convince her of his devotion. Both were unaware that a horseman had entered the prohibited area and had stamped out one small fire caused by a cigarette.

"Supposing I arrange all these things, Patricia," Maybrook cried, his hand to his heart. "What would you say then?"

"Put out that cigarette, please," a voice interrupted.

Patricia was startled and yet glad of the interruption. She was having a grand time with Courtney, but getting engaged was another matter. She wanted time to think over the proposal. So she grinned at Patrolman Bob Wallace and puffed out a cloud of smoke.

"Well, if it isn't the little tin soldier again," she said rudely.

"See that sign?" Bob pointed to the tree and its notice. "This is a closed area."

"Aren't you taking your job a bit too seriously?" questioned Maybrook.

The patrolman ignored him and stood over the girl.

"Put that out!" he ordered, but she went on smoking. "I guess there's no use talking to you, is there? All right. There's only one way to handle you, young lady."

Out came a book, in which Bill wrote a few words before tearing out the page. This he handed to the girl.

"Why, what's this?" asked Patricia.

"A citation! After you've had a talk with Captain Stevens, maybe you'll take this thing a little more seriously."

The girl took the form between her slim fingers and ripped it across. She puffed at her cigarette and laughed at him.

"Oh, look"—she held up the two pieces—"it got all torn."

"Oh, is that so?"

"Are you going to give me another one?"

"No." He leaned forward and whisked the cigarette out of her mouth.

"This time, young lady, I'm going to personally escort you to headquarters."

"Now, look here!" shouted Maybrook. "You're going a bit too far."

"You keep out of this," Bob said without turning his head.

"Come on, get on your horse, Miss Huntley." She did not move.

"You heard what I said. Get on your horse."

"I'd like to see you make me," was her defiant answer.

Bob Wallace took one stride forward and out went his arms. He whisked the girl up as if she had been a feather.

Maybrook rushed forward and Wallace freed his arm for a second to give the crook a push that sent him sprawling into a bush.

The girl wriggled and twisted, but in that grip she was powerless. He swung her into the saddle of her horse.

"Now ride, and don't try any tricks," he warned. "Because I'm taking you in whether you like it or not."

Some hours later Bob Wallace, with Miss Patricia and Maybrook, were facing Captain Stevens.

The patrolman stated that he had found the girl smoking, and when she had refused to desist, he had been compelled to arrest her.

"Oh, captain, I've never been so humiliated in my life," retorted Patricia. "We simply went in there to rest. I was just lighting a cigarette when I looked up and saw the sign 'No smoking,' and, naturally, I didn't think of breaking any law. I was just about to put out this cigarette when this young man came in. I tried to explain, but he wouldn't listen. And the way he talked. Why, I never heard such language in all my life."

Bob Wallace stared at the girl in speechless amazement.

"I'm surprised at you, Wallace," rasped Captain Stevens.

"I'm just as surprised as you are, captain," Bob said.

"You should have seen the way he manhandled me," added Patricia.

"Wallace, this service does not approve of such high-handed methods," stated the captain. "You owe Miss Huntley an apology."

"Are you serious, captain?"

"Certainly I'm serious."

Bob turned to the girl, who was grinning triumphantly.

"Pardon me, Miss Huntley," he spoke in contrite tones, "I seem to have had a brain lapse. I can't quite recall using any abusive language or saying anything you could not repeat out loud. However, you say I did, and I'd be the last one to call a lady a liar. Therefore, I hope you'll forgive me." Then he faced his superior.

"Does that cover the situation, captain?"

"Yes."

Whereupon Bob ripped the star off his shirt and tossed it on the desk.

"I'm not in the habit of bringing false charges or using bad language. Because Miss Huntley is an heiress you take her word for mine. Okay, have it your own way." He pointed to the badge. "You can keep that—I'm through."

Maybrook rode back to the hotel with the girl, who for once had little to say. She was feeling very ashamed of herself, though she did think the patrolman had taken a very high-handed attitude. Her companion was silent, because his nimble brain was busy scheming.

Two days later he sought out his fellow-conspirator.

"You seem particularly pleased with yourself this morning," commented Manning.

"I am. I've just been across the line to see Frank and Myra."

"Bring anything back with you?"

"Yeah. A swell idea!" He put his mouth close to the other's ear. "How much is the Borloff necklace worth?"

"Are you kidding?"

"No. What'll it bring?"

"Bring you a lot of trouble if you try to lift it," muttered Manning un- easily. "You're not thinking of—"

"Why not?" cried Maybrook. "No more dangerous than the trinkets that we've been bringing over. Of course, if you're afraid to handle it I'll get somebody else."

"I didn't say I was afraid to handle it," viciously answered Manning.

"When do you think you'll get it here?"

"Well, I can't say positively, but within the next few days." The suave rascal got up from his chair. "So stick around. You'll excuse me—I must go and see Miss Huntley and inquire if she has missed me while I have been away."

The Bodyguard and Guardian

JEREMIAH HUNTLEY put down the telephone and faced his grandchild.

"Well, I've done all I can, my dear," he remarked resignedly. "It appears that Wallace can be obstinate. Captain

"Pardon me, Miss Huntley," Wallace said with an apologetic smile. "But I seem to have had a brain lapse."

Stevens has told me that he has made repeated overtures to him, but he won't listen. The captain seems pretty mad because this young man appears to have been the most reliable and capable patrolman under his command."

"Then why did Captain Stevens make him apologise?" demanded Patricia.

"Because he thought there was no other course with the wayward Miss Huntley," was the old man's terse reply. "He intended to pacify Wallace after you had gone, but the chance did not arise. Now you seem to have driven a very straight, honest young fellow out of a job. Wallace refuses to be reinstated."

"Well, what are you going to do about it?"

"What am I going to do about it?" angrily exploded Jeremiah Huntley.

"I'm not responsible, am I?"

"He may need a job."

"You should have thought of all that before you started all this fuss."

"Well, I didn't think he'd quit his job over it. But maybe, grandpa, if you spoke to Mr. Hendricks he might find him something to do."

"I'll do nothing of the sort. I—"

"Now, now, Grumpy," interrupted the wayward girl. "Don't scold. I know everything you'd like to say, and for once you're probably right, but you simply must do something. Well, I must fly."

"Going riding with Maybrook, I suppose," snorted Jeremiah. "Pah!"

But when the girl had gone he summoned Collins and told him to get Hendricks, the manager, on the phone. Chuck was busy looking after some pigs, to his disgust, when he looked up to see Wallace.

"Hallo, pal!" Then his eyes opened wide. "Where's your uniform?"

"I outgrew it. In other words, I quit."

"I did hear something about you quitting, but I wouldn't believe it. What're you going to do now?"

"Oh, I don't know. Hendricks just sent for me, but I don't know what he wants."

"Maybe he's going to give you a job," Chuck suggested.

"Well, I could use a job. See you later."

Hendricks was at the reception desk, and he smiled a welcome at the ex-patrolman.

"Hallo, Wallace! Made any plans for yourself yet?"

"Nothing definite. I thought, from your message, maybe you had something in mind."

"Yes, that is—in a way. One of the guests spoke to me about you. I think it might be to your advantage to have a talk with him. All I know is that he asked me to have you come here and see him. You'll find him in suite 212."

"Okay," Bob answered. "Thanks a lot."

Upstairs went Bob and he knocked at 212, and the door was opened by Collins.

"My name's Wallace. I was sent by Mister Hendricks."

"Oh, yes, Mr. Wallace. Come in." The valet opened the door wide. "I'll tell Mister Huntley."

Bob stalled like a stubborn mule. "Huntley!" he rapped out. "Guess I must be in the wrong place."

"No, you're not," called out a voice. "Come over here, young man."

Reluctantly Bob came into the comfortable lounge and eyed the old man suspiciously. "Sit down and wipe that scowl off your face," added Jeremiah Huntley. "I heard all about that run-in you had with my granddaughter."

September 10th, 1933.

"Oh, you're going to give it to me, too, eh?"

"No, I'm not. I want you to know that I sympathise with you entirely."

"You sympathise with me?"

"Yes. What did they pay you on that job?"

"Not enough to retire on," Bob answered with a grin. "Why?"

"Well, I think you've been done a grave injustice," answered grandpa.

"And it's only right that I should compensate you."

"That's out." Bob held up his hand with a decisive gesture. "I don't want any of your money, Mister Huntley."

"Why not?" was the spirited demand. "You deserve compensation. I don't want you to harbour any ill-feelings towards my granddaughter."

"I don't."

"You don't?"

"No. The girl is spoiled. She's a good example of bad bringing-up."

"Huh! Bad bringing-up!" wrathfully cried grandpa. "I raised her myself, young man. I'll admit she's a trifle headstrong and a bit wilful, but that was born in her."

"It's born in a horse, too, until you break him of it."

"Are you comparing my granddaughter to a horse?"

"I simply mean the method of handling is the same. Once you slap a horse, it's easy to guide."

"Once you slap a horse on a horse," Jeremiah said thoughtfully. "If one could snap a horse on Pat! By gad, it's an idea!"

Some time later Patricia came in from her ride with Maybrook and went up to the reception desk.

"Let me have twenty-five dollars," she said to the clerk. "Please put it on the bill."

"Certainly, Miss Huntley." The clerk handed her the money and a form. "Will you sign the receipt, please?"

"You sign it," airily said Patricia, and stalked off with the money. Near the lift she sighted a broad-shouldered figure. "Oh, Mister Wallace!"

Bob Wallace lounged towards her, smiling pleasantly.

"Oh, Mister Wallace. I can't imagine what you think of me," impulsively cried Patricia. "I'm terribly sorry, and I'd like to apologise."

"Don't mention it, Miss Huntley."

"I don't know what possessed me to act the way I did. You were an awfully good sport about it. I wish you'd believe me when I say that I never did a thing like that before."

"Sure I believe you." His eyes were smiling. "Does that make you feel any better?"

"Heaps, if you really mean it. I didn't realise that things would end the way they did. That you'd lose your job."

"Oh, that's all right. I have another one."

"You mean here at the hotel?" she questioned, and he nodded. "Oh, that's splendid. As a guide?"

His lips twisted into a smile as he nodded again.

"Oh, I am glad! Perhaps I could impose on you some time to show me some of the more interesting sights."

"Any time at all, Miss Huntley. It would be a pleasure."

Maybrook followed the girl into the lift.

"Surely that wasn't Wallace I saw you talking to."

"Yes, it was. I met him accidentally. He's going to work here."

"Oh, I see." Maybrook frowned, then smiled at the girl. "I'll change and meet you on the golf course in half an hour."

Maybrook was downstairs again in less than five minutes and he sought out Manning in the lounge.

"Did you see Pat talking to that man by the lift? You did. Well, that's the copper who stopped Frank and Myra at the border. He's going to work here. I don't like that."

"What're you worrying about?" asked Manning. "Didn't you say he was out of the service?"

"Yeah, but you know these guys. Once the service gets into their blood it never leaves them. Once a snooper, always a snooper."

"It does complicate things, doesn't it?" muttered the shifty, easy-scared Manning. "I think I'll run into Chicago. I have a little business to attend to, and when you're ready—you can send me a wire."

Patricia soon made use of Wallace's services to take her for a ride round the various ranches. She invited him to come in one night to dance, and found, to her surprise, that he did not step on her feet. Another evening she suggested a midnight bathe, and Bob was more than willing. The girl was pleased because Bob seemed to get on so well with grandpa. She found Bob better company than Maybrook.

One evening Patricia went off with Bob to the lounge for a soft drink, and Maybrook came after them.

"I looked for you after dinner."

"Oh, Bob showed me around the courals. It was very interesting. He's quite an expert on horseflesh."

"There's nothing strange about that, is there?" sneered Maybrook. "I imagine a great deal of Wallace's time has been spent around the stables. He should be able to pick out a good horse when he sees one, eh, Wallace?"

"Oh, sure," was the laughing reply. "Pick out a good jackass, too."

"We're not keeping you from any of your staff jobs, are we, Wallace?" angrily hinted the smuggler.

"Oh, no. They're all done." Bob made no attempt to go.

"The idea I'm trying to convey is that sometimes when two people wish to speak privately together—"

"Oh, you're not intruding at all. Mr. Maybrook," blandly interrupted Bob.

"Perhaps I don't make myself quite clear," Maybrook said angrily. "Do you suppose I could prevail on you to excuse yourself for a few minutes?"

"Oh, sure, I get it," Bob answered with feigned apology. "I'm sorry. I just remembered I had a date with your grandfather to play chess." He bowed to the girl and Maybrook.

"Hope you folks will pardon me for running away so abruptly. Good evening."

"Smart Aleek!" snarled Maybrook, as he stared after Wallace. Patricia giggled. "What's so funny?"

"You! Don't take him too seriously."

"Well, you seem to. Do you realise that I've hardly seen you at all this week. You've been with that copper all the time. Swimming together, eating together, riding together—you're together constantly, and I don't like it."

"That's too bad." Patricia's eyes gleamed. "You may as well understand, Courtney. I've never let anyone run my life, and I'm not going to begin now."

"You're about a week late with that decision, aren't you?"

"What do you mean?"

"Remember complaining about the high-diving board that was taken down from the swimming pool? Why do you think that was done?"

"It was being repaired."

"That's what they told you. But Mister Wallace thought that it was too dangerous for you so he had it removed."

"Wallace?" She was amazed.

"Yes. Why do you suppose you weren't able to get that black horse to ride yesterday?"

"He's gone lame."

"Nonsense. Chuck told me that Wallace left strict orders for you not to ride that horse. So, you see, Mister Wallace has been putting the brakes on you quite effectually."

"But why should he?" shrieked Patricia.

"You think he's hanging around because he's interested in you personally?" Maybrook shook his head. "I believe that he's being paid by your grandfather for these little attentions. Everybody around this hotel is wise to what's going on and they're getting a good laugh out of it."

"They are, are they!" exclaimed Patricia, and her pretty features became quite vicious. "Excuse me a moment."

"I think that has put paid to Master Wallace," softly Maybrook murmured, as he watched the flying feet as she made for the lift.

The Handbag

BOB was sitting with the old man and praising his grandchild when a whirlwind with blazing eyes tore into the room. She shot out an accusing finger at Bob.

"Is he working for you?"

"Why, what do you mean?" stammered the old man.

"You know what I mean!" raged Pat. "Did you hire him?"

"Why, er, I don't know," Jeremiah Huntley said miserably. "I—er—you wanted to get him a job, didn't you?"

"Yes, but not as my keeper!" She rounded on Bob. "You sneak. You pretended that you like to be with me because I was such good company, that I did everything so well, and all the time you were a hired man."

"Now, now, Pat, please!" cried Huntley. "It wasn't Bob's fault. You see, you—you kept constantly doing things that embarrassed me."

"Embarrassed you, eh?" She caught at the word. "You don't know what embarrassment means. I'll embarrass you. I'll—I'll get drunk, that's what I'll do."

"You wouldn't dare."

"I'll show you whether I dare or not!" shrieked the spoiled beauty. "I'll show you what it means to be embarrassed. I'll get plastered—I'll roll in the lobby. I'll swing from the chandelier. I'll slide down the banisters. You watch me."

"Good heavens!"

gasped the old man, when the door slammed after her. "What am I going to do now? She'll do it."

Bob jumped up.

"No, she won't!" And his jaw stuck out aggressively.

"If she says she will, she will."

"This time she won't," vowed Bob. Patricia went to the bar and ordered a cocktail, but when she ordered a second the barman shook his head.

"I'm sorry, Miss Huntley, but I've been ordered to limit you to one drink every three hours."

She clenched and unclenched her small hands when she found the order had come from Wallace. She decided to go into the nearby town, but to get plastered one needed money. The cashier of the hotel was sorry, but he could not give her any money unless she had a signed "Okay" from Mr. Wallace. Next she tried her car but it would not start—Mr. Wallace had ordered the gasoline to be drained out. She got out of the car and saw Bob grinning at her.

"It'll be a lovely evening," he teased. "Like to go for a ride?"

"Not with you!" She stormed and flounced off.

Patricia retired to bed defeated. She lay awake most of the night trying to plan out some way of getting revenge on Bob. She woke up and gasped to find it was past ten. Always she had her breakfast in bed at nine, and she called her maid, Polly.

"I'm sorry, Miss Patricia," muttered the darkie. "But Mister Wallace gave orders that you were to have no more breakfasts in bed."

So Patricia was forced to get up, bath and come down to a late breakfast. What a look she gave Bob Wallace as she passed him for the dining-room. Not a word, but by the door she glanced, and just for a second the hard glint in her eyes vanished. But only for a second, and Bob did not notice, because a visitor was registering at the office. Detective Riber of the Criminal Investigation was equally surprised to see Bob. They retired to a quiet corner.

"I didn't know the Border Patrol rated this kind of luxury."

"Oh, no. I resigned nearly two weeks ago. I've a private job now." Bob looked keenly at the older man. "What brings the sleuth to these parts?"

"A pity you hadn't stayed on with me—I could have used you," was the answer. "But that wandering spirit of yours cried for the great open spaces. Well, I can't say I blame you, for this is a grand spot." He smiled. "But you know very well I haven't come here for a holiday. I'm after the Borloff necklace. It was snatched in Mexico a short time ago, and the department thinks they may try to sneak it through here."

"Have you a lead or are you just working on a hunch?"

"We picked up a fellow named Manning in Chicago the other day," explained the 'tec. "A high-class fence. In going through his effects we found a receipted bill from this hotel and we figure he was hanging around here waiting for it when something probably scared him off. I want to see if I can pick up his trail from here. There's a twenty-five thousand dollar reward for the recovery of the necklace."

A pity the detective and this one-time assistant could not have overheard the conversation taking place in Room 183. It was Maybrook's room, and he was greeting Myra and Frank Adams.

"You're late. I expected you an hour ago."

"We're lucky to be here at all," growled Frank. "They've tightened up at the Customs Office. They're putting everybody through a wringer. Why,

"What did you do with that handbag?" Adams shouted at the girl.

they search you right down to the skin."

"They didn't find it on you, did they?" Maybrook demanded.

"Naw, I saw there was something wrong the minute we drove up there, so I sent Johnson back to the Hacienda with it."

"It's darned tough luck," complained Myra. "This one haul would have put us on Easy Street."

"And I ain't going to take any more chances coming through the fence again," stated Frank. "Shoot and ask questions afterwards is the orders I expect them Border Patrols have got."

"You two beat it back across the line right away," decided the leader.

"Fraid Miss Huntley will find out about me?" jealously cried Myra.

"Don't be silly, sweetheart. You're tops with me." He laughed, and rubbed his hands together. "I've been kidding that dame around because I've had a hunch that some time she was going to be a help to me." He picked up Myra's bag. "She's going to bring that necklace across the line for us. No Customs officer would suspect her, so you might take all you have out of this bag and make it look as new as possible."

Maybrook Tricks Patricia Into Mexico

THE wayward spoiled heiress found that she liked coming down for breakfast and that she did not mind being restricted to a drink every three hours. One moment she was livid with rage against Wallace and then she would have to admit a grudging admiration for the way he had outwitted her. But she was determined to prove the victor. She decided that some strong man must take up the cudgels in her cause—a real tough fellow. Chuck Owens looked just the right type.

Chuck was busy cleaning some harness and humming some tune about a family of frogs down on a farm when he heard sobbing. It was Patricia, in riding kit, and sobbing with her nose in her gauntleted hands for his benefit. Of course, the gallant lad wanted to know what was wrong.

"Oh, Chuck, I'm so unhappy. I can't stand it much longer. Oh, I suppose you think I'm a terrible baby, but if someone had been persecuting your sister or someone you cared for, what would you do?"

"I'd sock him in the nose."

"Oh, I bet you're awful strong," sighed the wheedler. "I bet you could sock a man a terrible blow."

"You said it, Miss Huntley. When I sock 'em they stay socked."

"I wish you liked me well enough to sock someone for me."

"It'd be a pleasure, Miss Huntley," cried Chuck, clenching his big hands.

"Would you do it to anybody, Chuck, no matter who it is?"

"You bet I would. Just lead me to him."

"Here he comes now. Remember what you promised." She lowered her voice. "Go get him."

Chuck swallowed when he saw it was the powerful Bob Wallace, but he remembered his promise and strode forward.

"Hey, you! I want to talk to you. You gotta cut out persecuting Miss Huntley. Or you'll have to answer to me."

"Say, you better get wise to yourself or I'll toss you over the wall," granted Bob.

"What are you waiting for?" demanded Patricia, as Chuck hesitated. September 10th, 1933.

"Why don't you sock him. You're scared, you big jellyfish!"

"Now don't take your spite out on him," warned Bob. "That's not being a good sport, you know."

"Don't talk to me, you big bully!" flamed the girl. "You can't make me do what I don't want to do, even if grandfather does pay you for it. And I'll get even with you for everything. How I hate you!"

"You don't hate me," Bob grinned mockingly. "You just dislike me a little."

"I'd like to slap your face."

"You do and I'll give you a good walloping," retorted Bob.

So Patricia reached out and slapped his face hard, and when he reached out to grab her she fled for her life. Every time she looked round he was behind her and gaining ground. She knew he would keep his word and give her a good hiding.

Maybrook had gone to the Huntleys' suite. He found everybody out except the valet. Mister Jeremiah was taking his daily constitutional walk, and Miss Patricia might be anywhere.

Then the door burst open and Patricia piled into the room. She flung herself into Maybrook's arms. The valet raised his eyebrows and discreetly vanished.

"What's the matter, Pat?"

"Wallace! He was going to beat me."

"He wouldn't dare to do a thing like that."

"You were right, Courtney." The girl freed herself. "It was all spite work on his part. He hates me, and would love to beat me. And to think that Grumpy Grandpa let him do these things to me."

"That roughneck must have hypnotised your grandfather." Maybrook was playing up to this tantrum.

"Well, I'm not going to let them treat me like this. I'll get back at them. I'll show them. I'll make them sorry they ever started anything like this." Patricia stamped her foot.

"That's the spirit," approved Maybrook. He picked up the packet he had put on a table. "Oh, I almost forgot what I came for. Like it?"

Some time later Bob went to the Huntley suite and found Jeremiah had just returned from his walk. He related the incident of the face-slapping and the old man looked worried.

"Maybe we've been going too strong on this thing, Bob. Pat's high-spirited."

"She has spirit all right."

"I suppose I'm an old fool. But I just can't bear to see her unhappy."

"Let's call the whole thing off," suggested Bob. "I guess it was a mistake to start this thing in the first place. Frankly, I like your granddaughter, Mr. Huntley, and maybe I hate to see her unhappy. Guess we're both a bit foolish." He held out his hand. "And I'm not keen to go on with it."

The old man said that Patricia had been so difficult since they had been trying to curb her activities that, for his own peace of mind, he agreed with Bob to let her go her own sweet, wilful way. He hoped that Bob would continue to look them up, but the ex-patrolman knew that for his own peace of mind he was going to give the Desert Springs Hotel a miss.

Downstairs he encountered Detective Riber.

"Bob, I've found out something." The detective drew him out of hearing of the guests. "Manning was very friendly with a visitor here by the name of Maybrook."

"Maybrook?"

That startled Bob.

"Yeah. Say, what do you know about this Huntley dame?"

"What do you mean?"

"She and this fellow Maybrook are pretty pally, aren't they?"

"Yes, but what are you getting at?"

"Well, I know that some dame, an American, good-looking, has been taking trips back and forth from this hotel to Mexico," the detective explained. "And she's a friend of Maybrook's. If that isn't Miss Huntley, who is it?"

"But it's impossible."

"She carries the stones over and Manning buys them."

"But she doesn't need the money," Bob argued. "Her grandfather's worth millions, and she has a lot of her own."

"It isn't the money she's after. It's the thrill," was the detective's verdict. "I've been getting a line on Miss Huntley, and she's just about as wild as anything. I'm just hoping they try to sneak that necklace over. It'll mean twenty-five thousand bucks for me, and a good long stretch in the Federal prison for them—and the old man's dough won't save her."

Now Bob was thoroughly alarmed. He remembered the incident at the frontier and those two people he had turned back. He must find Patricia. He went to the telephone operator, and found that Miss Huntley was nowhere in the hotel, so he rushed upstairs to see her grandfather. The old man was standing in the middle of the room, holding a letter and shaking from head to foot.

"Bob! Bob!" He turned eagerly. "Read this! Read this!"

"Have you seen Patricia?" Bob demanded.

"Read this. Read this, was all the old man could say. "I just found it in my bed-room."

"Dear grandfather.—If you really cared for me you wouldn't hire a bully like Bob Wallace to humiliate me. Courtney loves me, and we have gone to Mexico to be married."

"PATRICIA."

"Heaven knows how long they've been gone," quavered the old man. "It's all my fault. I've been a fool!"

"Can I take your car?" Bob rapped out.

"Certainly take my car. Take anything."

And Jeremiah Huntley had scarce finished when Bob Wallace flung himself out of the room.

A Race With Time

COURTNEY MAYBROOK talked so smoothly and cleverly to Pat that the foolish girl imagined that he was the only genuine friend she had in the world. Also that defiant, wayward spirit of hers urged her to do something desperate. The handbag just won the game for the schemer.

They had no trouble at the border, because the officials all knew the Miss Huntley. Maybrook had taken good care to see she brought the handbag with her. Not only was he going to get that necklace into the States, but he was going to marry an heiress. He was going to have no compunction about deceiving Myra. Across the border he motored to Jiminez, the biggest town in the district—it was twenty miles from the border. At a certain café he was expected. The proprietor assured him that his message had been received, and

(Continued on page 23.)

Ride the danger trail with the pioneers of the Old West in this pulsing epic of the days when fearless prairie scouts took up the challenge of savage Redskins and murderous desperadoes. To the beat of thundering hoofs and to the blast of flaming guns this vivid serial runs its thrill-a-minute course, with hot action in every smashing episode and Ray Corrigan in its starring rôle

THE PAINTED STALLION

Read This First

Backed by Dupray, a scheming Spaniard who is Governor of Santa Fe, but who has received news that he is to be deposed by the newly established Mexican Republic, a band of renegades led by one, Zamora, is preying on the wagon-trains that ply to and fro across the Western wilds with rich merchandise under their awnings.

The activities of these renegades are hampered by a mystery rider on a painted stallion, who has sworn to defeat outlawry and who again and again warns the bandits' intended victims of their danger by means of whistling arrows.

The year is 1824, and in that year an American frontiersman known as Clark Stuart is detained by the U.S. Government to negotiate a trade treaty with the Mexican authorities. It is a treaty which Dupray is anxious to prevent from being conceded, and at his instigation Zamora incites the Indians to attack a wagon-train led by a trader named Jamison—a wagon-train with which Clark is travelling and whose personnel also includes Jim Bowie, famous as the inventor of the Bowie knife, and Kit Carson, a boy later to become renowned as a Western scout.

The Rider of the Painted Stallion saves the train by calling off the Redskins, who regard that mysterious figure as a supernatural being, and later the Rider rescues Clark from the clutches of some of Zamora's henchmen.

After learning the Rider is in reality a white girl, Clark and his companions reach Santa Fe, where they discover Dupray's association with the outlaws. Dupray makes his getaway, but later Clark picks up the trail of Zamora, and shadows him to the gang's lair. The frontiersman is captured by the renegades, however, and though he staves a bid for freedom, he sets foot on a cunningly concealed trapdoor and plunges to apparent destruction.

Now Read On

Hemmed In

TUMBLING down the slope on to which he had been precipitated when the trapdoor had given way under him, Clark rolled headlong to the lip of the declivity. Then, where that steep gradient terminated abruptly in a sheer precipice which dropped to the bed of the gulch, the big frontiersman pitched wildly into space.

Luckily for Clark, however, there was a tough shrub growing just under the rim of the cliff at the point where he plunged into mid-air, and luckily for him he had the presence of mind to clutch it.

The bush held firm, and the scout's descent was arrested with a jerk. It was a jerk so violent that he felt as if his arms had been wrenched out of their sockets, and twin stabs of pain seemed to shoot through him from wrists to shoulders, but he hung on desperately, bobbing and swaying precariously, with the cliff-rim two or three feet above him, and the floor of the canyon hundreds of feet below.

For an interval of several seconds he continued to remain suspended in that hazardous and uncertain fashion. Then he focused his attention on the lip of the precipice for a brief spell, wondering if he could possibly regain it and climb out of this strange, abysmal fissure in the mountains—a fissure that was partially roofed in by beetling rock formation high overhead, so that an eternal gloom enshrouded it.

He speedily realised that although he was only two or three feet below the cliff-rim he could never hope to reach it. Into the bargain, he realised that even if he could have attained that slope down which he had rolled so helplessly he could never have negotiated the rocky projection that jutted out above the summit of the gradient like some monstrous porch.

He could only have made his way to the "chute" through which he had fallen, and would then have been faced with the task of clambering up through that dark hole which communicated with the lair of the Dupray Zamora gang.

Fingers locked amid the twigs and foliage of the shrub by which he had saved himself from destruction, Clark wondered grimly if he were doomed after all—wondered if he had merely delayed the inevitable end by clutching at that bush. It was certain, at any rate, that he could not hold on for long. Even if the tough clump of vegetation continued to bear the strain of his weight, his own strength would give out sooner or later and he would be forced to let go, falling disastrously to the depths of the gorge.

He looked down into the canyon, and a sensation of nausea swept over

EPISODE 9 :

"The Fatal Message"

him as he beheld the dim bed of it away beneath him, so that, his eyes recoiling from the spectacle, he averted his gaze. And then it was that he saw a ledge a little below him and somewhat to his right, a ledge that merged into a kind of track which seemed to slant steeply down the face of the rock to the very base of the cliff.

At sight of that ledge a feeling of hope was awakened in him, and he began to swing himself from side to side, pendulum-fashion, clinging tightly the while to the bush he had seized. Then all at once, when he judged that his body had gathered sufficient momentum, he released his grip on twigs and foliage as he was swaying towards the right.

He dropped on to the ledge that was his objective. It was perilously narrow, and for a breathless instant he was in danger of losing his balance and toppling into the void, but he flung himself down on the craggy shelf and managed somehow to prevent himself from rolling off it.

He lay there for several seconds, scarcely able to believe that he was safe. Presently, however, he braced himself with an effort, and, struggling to his feet, he commenced to wend his way down the track which sloped towards the base of the precipice.

That track was smooth and slippery, and in descending it he was in constant danger of losing his footing with fatal result. Yet he succeeded in gaining the bed of the canyon without mishap, and, arriving there, he turned after a moment's hesitation towards the left.

Stumbling along the gloomy gulch, he scanned the rock ramparts on each side of him and followed them upward with his eyes to their remote summits—upwards to beetling formations that permitted only a thin streak of moonlight to shine into the canyon. There was no means of ascending either of the precipices that hemmed him in, unless it were by the track which he had negotiated and which offered no escape from the fissure.

Then, after trudging vainly over a quarter of a mile of ground, he found his path blocked by a towering wall of cliff that checked further progress in the direction which he had taken.

He turned back and began to retrace his steps, walking in the wedge of moonlight that filtered into the gulch, and he was immediately below that high, remote shrub which had saved his life when he saw a man's boot protruding from a clutter of boulders near-by.

He moved over to those boulders and discovered the shattered, lifeless body of an individual whose dress indicated that he had been a Mexican of the educated class, and, looking at the wretch pityingly, Clark guessed correctly enough that he was Cordoba, the missing secretary of the new governor who had been despatched to Santa Fe to take the place of Escobedo Dupray.

Beyond a doubt the fellow had been sent to his doom through the trap-door which had been released under Clark's feet.

Thus reflected the big frontiersman, and shuddered to think that he himself might have been lying dead here as well if fortune had not favoured him—a mauled corpse like this luckless man who had been hurled to destruction hours before. Then a black rage took possession of the U.S. Government agent, and, in the throes of that emotion, he vowed to himself that if ever he escaped from these hills he would never rest until he had seen the Dupray-Zamora gang wiped out to the last man.

September 10th, 1933.

A little while later he was moving away from the huddled form of Cordoba and proceeding along the gulch, but he had not gone far before he was brought up short by another wall of rock that rose in his path.

The canyon was closed in at both ends. That much Clark's investigation had revealed, and, though the cliffs at this extremity of the fissure were no more than fifty feet in height, they were completely insurmountable, those on his right and left hand leaning so close towards each other that only a meagre vista of sky could be seen beyond their converging rims. In short, Clark was a prisoner in this sombre cleft of the mountains—with no prospect, it seemed, of ever gaining his freedom.

For all his courage, he groaned aloud as the full realisation of his plight was borne home to him. It would have been better to have shared the fate of Cordoba, he told himself, than to stand confronted by a situation such as this—a situation which must mean for him a slow, lingering death by the pangs of hunger and thirst.

Or had his foes perceived that he was still alive, he wondered, and would they appear above the canyon and open fire on him? If they did, he might expose himself resignedly to the doom's blast of their guns as a welcome alternative to a worse destiny.

But no, he thought. From the trap-door in the gang's lair only a small portion of the slope down which he had tumbled could possibly be visible. The renegades could not have seen him clutch that shrub a few feet below the cliff's brink and swing thence on to the track by which he had reached the bed of the cleft. They doubtless imagined that he had plunged to the rocks at the base of the precipice, and that the life had been smashed out of him.

Clark was right. Up in the cave from which he had fallen the trap-door had been re-set, and, convinced that the frontiersman was no more, Dupray and Zamora and their hirelings had returned to that inner compartment which was now the headquarters of the deposed Lieutenant Governor.

At the moment Dupray was seated at the table there, and, his accomplices gathered around him, he was thoughtfully examining the note which had been taken from Clark Stuart when the latter had been captured.

His scrutiny of that note had suggested a cunning scheme to Dupray, and presently he looked up at the rogues who were assembled about him.

"Stuart is dead," he remarked, fingering his smooth-shaven chin. "but no one knows that except ourselves—and I fancy, amigos, that we might make good use of his name."

Zamora eyed him in an inquiring manner.

"What do you mean, Excellency?" he asked.

Escobedo Dupray indicated the misgiving he had been studying.

"I refer to this note which Stuart wrote and which bears his signature," he announced. "It is a note requesting Jamison to muster his men, join forces with the garrison of the citadel and march from Santa Fe. It is a note in which Stuart declares that he will meet them three miles north of Tascosa Bend on the Rio Los Lunas, and then lead them to our hide-out."

He paused, then adopted a sly tone.

"We have every reason to believe that Stuart wanted the Rider of the Painted Stallion to deliver this note to Jamison," he went on. "According to Macklin and the men who captured Stuart, he seemed on the point of handing the note to the Rider when he was surprised."

"That's right," Macklin interposed. "I reckon the Rider don't speak English too good, or Stuart would've given the message by word o' mouth. Anyhow, I calculate we ain't got nothin' to worry about, even though the Rider got away. That note will never reach Jamison now—"

Dupray silenced him with a gesture. "On the contrary, Macklin," he said softly, "I think it might be a good idea if the note did reach Jamison."

His associates looked at him blankly. Then Zamora found his voice.

"Are you crazy?" he blurted. "That message will bring the Jamison party and the presidio garrison within a mile or two of our hide-away, and when Stuart fails to meet them they're bound to start a search for him—a search that may fetch them all too close to this lair of ours."

Dupray smiled.

"I agree, Zamora, that our hide-out would be in danger of becoming discovered," he observed, "if this note were delivered to Jamison without alteration. But it so happens that Stuart's handwriting is not of copper-plate pattern, and lends itself to such alteration. For instance, take this word 'north.'"

He beckoned Zamora closer, and, consulting the note, pointed out the sentence in which Clark had proposed meeting Jamison three miles north of Tascosa Bend on the Rio Los Lunas.

"With a stroke of two of a pencil," Dupray continued, "that word 'north' could very easily be transformed into the word 'south.' Look, I will demonstrate what I mean."

He took out a pencil and craftily changed the word in question so that it read 'south' instead of 'north.' Then he glanced at Zamora again.

"You see?" he commented. "If Jamison received this message now, he and his men and the troops from the presidio would head for a point three miles south of Tascosa Bend, and, if they commenced a search for Stuart, there would be little chance of them extending their quest as far up as this locality."

Zamora frowned.

"That's true," he muttered. "But why send this note at all? What would be your purpose in sending it?"

"To draw the Jamison party from their wagon-campment," was the swift response, "and the garrison from the fortress. Then, amigo, you and your bravos could bear down on Santa Fe, plunder the Jamison prairie schooners of their merchandise—and, into the bargain, force your way into the citadel and obtain that official seal which belongs to the new Governor and which would be of such value to us."

His heinchman's eyes gleamed at that, and the other members of the gang exchanged appreciative glances.

"Ah, I understand, Excellency," Zamora breathed. "But tell me, how is Stuart's note to be delivered?"

"By an arrow launched into the wagon-campment," Dupray answered, "a whistling arrow of the kind used by the Rider of the Painted Stallion. We have several specimens here in this hide-out—arrows discharged by that meddler in the course of frustrating some of his best-laid plans. One of your men, Zamora, will take one of those arrows and fasten Clark Stuart's message to it. That man must be within bow-shot of the Jamison encampment before dawn, and, the moment he has sent the shaft on its way, he must make himself scarce, leaving Stuart's friends to imagine that the Rider has been responsible for delivering the note."

"And what about the rest of us?" Zamora asked.

Escobedo Dupray leaned back in his chair. There was a complacent expression on his handsome, but sardonic, face.

"You and the remainder of the gang will be lying in wait and under cover," he said, "within a short distance* of Santa Fe. The messenger who delivers the note will join when he has played his part, and you will watch for the departure of the Jamison party and the garrison troops. You will then give them time to get well under way—well out of sight and sound of the town.

"When the hills have swallowed them," he added grimly, "you will close in on the wagon encampment and the presidio. Have I made myself clear?"

His henchman nodded.

"Perfectly, Excellency. Por dios! it is a clever scheme that you have thought out."

"S', a clever scheme," Dupray rejoined. "Take care that you do not bungle it."

Signal Fire

WHILE Dupray was outlining to his accomplices the plan that had occurred to him, Clark Stuart was brooding over the unenviable situation in which he himself had become involved.

Hemmed in between sheer walls of rock, banished as it were from the world of his fellow-men, he could see no likelihood of ever escaping from the rascally cleft wherein he was imprisoned, and he was trying to reconcile himself to the thought of long hours of suffering when all at once an idea flashed across his mind.

It suddenly dawned on him that there might be a chance of salvation after all—a chance of being rescued from his predicament by no less a personage than the Rider of the Painted Stallion!

He had forgotten that mysterious figure until this very moment—that white girl who wore the attire of a Redskin, who spoke the English language as if it were her native tongue but in a hesitant fashion which indicated it had ceased to be thoroughly familiar to her, and who was apparently bent on defeating the activities of outlaws and renegades.

She had fled when Zamora's men had surprised Clark, but when she had realized that the frontiersman had not made good his escape she may have finally turned back with the object of trying to find out how he would fare at the hands of the crooks. Even now she might be hovering in the locality where he had been taken prisoner, hoping to learn what had become of him, hoping to aid him in some way or other.

The possibility was one that induced him to make an attempt at sending forth a signal, on the off-chance that the Rider was in the vicinity and would perceive it, and suddenly he began to build a fire of sticks and twigs, of which there was no lack, for there was a considerable amount of scrub as well as rocks in the canyon.

He piled the brushwood on a patch of clear ground, and then by means of a couple of stones he managed to strike a spark and set light to the heap of scrub. Nor was it long before it was blazing fiercely and sending up coils of smoke—smoke that rose straight up into the windless, moonlit night, ascending from the cleft and billowing darkly above the cliff-rims that seemed almost to meet fifty feet above Clark's head.

Not anticipating that the signal-fire would produce any immediate result, even if the Rider did happen to be in the neighbourhood, Clark collected more fuel and added it to the beacon so as to keep it ablaze. Indeed, he continued to feed that fire at intervals of every ten or fifteen minutes for hours on end, clinging to the hope that sooner or later the smoke from it would be espied.

He was, of course, alive to the possibility that the smoke might be seen by some of the Dupray-Zamora gang, but he had to take that risk, and in any case was ready to meet swift extermination from their six-guns in preference to awaiting the ravages of thirst and starvation. Yet the night wore on without any inquisitive face appearing in the gap between the beetling cliff-edges up above, neither friend nor foe answering the summons of that ascending smoke.

At length the stars began to pale in that restricted section of sky which was visible to Clark, and the grey light of a new day crept slowly over the vault of the heavens. By that time the trapped frontiersman had resolved to let his fire die out and seek slumber, for his eyes were heavy with fatigue, and he was actually stretching himself out on the ground drearly when he heard a familiar sound coming from somewhere beyond the rim of the cliff on his left.

Unmistakably it was the sound of hoofs striking upon stony soil, and, his weariness forgotten, Clark sprang to his feet with feelings of mingled eagerness and uncertainty. Then, after a pause, a human head came into his view—a head adorned by a thick halo of eagle-plumes—the head of the girl who was known as the Rider of the Painted Stallion!

Clark saw her lovely face peering down at him through the smoke that still rose from his signal-fire. She had dismounted, and was obviously kneeling at the cliff-rim, and as she made out his figure she gave a start. Then, as he waved to her, she ducked back out of sight, and she did not reappear until another minute had elapsed.

She was now carrying a rawhide lariat in her hands, and she dropped the loose end of this within his reach; and it did not take him long to realise that the other end was made fast to the stallion she owned, for no sooner had he grasped the rope than the Rider turned and called out to the horse, and a moment later the big scout heard the animal move off and felt the rawhide line spring taut in his fingers.

He was pulled upward by that lariat, and in some fifteen or twenty seconds was hauled over the cliff's rim, whereupon he saw the Painted Stallion plodding doggedly away from him at a distance of about a score of paces.

The Rider had remained at the cliff-edge, and as Clark scrambled to his feet beside her she shouted to her steed and brought the creature to a halt at a single word of command. Then she faced towards the man she had rescued.

"All night I have searched for some trace of you," she said in her stilted mode of speech. "Then, chancing to pass this way, I saw the smoke of the fire you have made. It is well that I turned back last night when I—when I took courage, though I feared you had been killed."

Clark nodded slowly.

"If you hadn't found me, lady," he told her, "I reckon I'd never have got out of that cleft alive. It's not the first time I've been indebted to you for my life, either."

He went on to relate all that had happened after he had fallen into the hands of the Dupray-Zamora gang, and she listened to his story attentively, following the gist of it even if she did not comprehend it in detail. Then, when he had finished his narrative, she motioned to her horse.

"I will take you," she volunteered, "to Santa Fe. At least, I will take you within sight of your friends. But we must guard against meeting the outlaws. In the night, while I was trying to find out what had happened to you, I saw a strong party of those outlaws riding westward."

"Yes," the Rider said, pointing towards a defile in the hills. "The outlaws, they went that way—towards Santa Fe."

Clark glanced at her sharply. "Westward?" he reiterated. "You mean—in the direction of Santa Fe?"

The girl inclined her head. "Yes," she said, pointing towards a defile in the hills. "The outlaws, they went that way—towards Santa Fe."

"In that case we'll bear south," Clark stated. "We don't want to run foul of those hombres. Listen, you drop me near the wagon-encampment where my friends are located and I'll head back into the hills with 'em and see if we can account for that bunch of renegades once and for all. Anyhow, I know where their hide-out is now. It's not in view from here, but it's located on the far slope of that ridge behind us."

He jerked his thumb over his shoulder, indicating a ragged promontory on the other side of the cleft from which he had been rescued. Then, in company with the Rider, he walked forward to the Painted Stallion, and shortly afterwards man and girl were astride that magnificent horse.

They struck south, and some time later crossed a ford in the Rio Los Lunas, along the bank of which river they proceeded at a brisk pace, and they had been following the course of that waterway for about an hour when all at once they descried a formidable cavalcade approaching from the opposite direction.

As that cavalcade drew nearer Clark discovered to his surprise that it was composed of Jamison and his men and the troopers of Santa Fe's presidio or fortress. Then his attention was diverted to his fair companion, who had also identified the oncoming horsemen. "Your friends," the girl said to him. "I leave you now."

Realising that she was timid of meeting strangers, Clark dismounted in deference to her wish to make off, and in another moment she was riding away at the gallop, the frontiersman dwelling thoughtfully on the strange temperament of this girl in whom audacity was so curiously blended with a feminine shyness.

He was still gazing after her receding figure when the approaching cavalcade reached him. It was a cavalcade headed by Jamison, Davy Crockett and the captain of the presidio garrison, and the leaders drawing rein beside him, Clark addressed the first-named.

"Well, Jamison," he declared. "I didn't expect to see you out here. What brings you from Santa Fe, anyhow?"

The wagon-boss looked at him in bewilderment.

"What brings us from Santa Fe?" he echoed. "Why, your note, of course."

He produced the missive Clark had scrawled the night before, and, as he handed it over to the U.S. Government agent, the latter examined it dully.

"Say, where'd you get this?" he demanded.

"It was fastened to a whistlin' arrow that was shot into the encampment just afore dawn this mornin'," Jamison answered. "What's the matter, Clark? You wrote it, didn't you? You wrote it an' got the Rider to see that it reached me, didn't you?"

Clark's good-looking features had become tense.

"I wrote it," he jerked, "but I never had a chance to send it to you by the Rider. What's more, it's been altered. Jamison, it's a trick—a trick to get you away from Santa Fe and leave the way clear for some move that the Dupray-Zamora gang have planned. The Rider saw a big bunch of those renegades high-tailin' it west durin' the night!"

He reached up and gripped the other American by the wrist.

"Jamison, how many men are left at the wagon encampment?" he rapped out.

"Jim Bowie's there," was the hoarse response, "along with three more o' the boys an' little Kit Carson. The rest of the men are all here. And the presidio—that's been drained of practically the whole o' the garrison. There's only a handful of soldiers at the fort, actin' as bodyguard for Governor Alvarez. When I showed the governor your note, he figured like I did that as strong a force as possible had better be sent out to round up them bandits."

Clark laid a hand on the back of Jamison's saddle.

"Then Santa Fe's at the mercy of those outlaws," he grated, "and we've got to ride hard if we're gonna get there in time to checkmate whatever play they're aimin' to make. Slide forward, pardner. I'm sharin' your brone."

The Attack

THE quiet of early morning hung over the town of Santa Fe and the presidio that stood a little to the west of the old Spanish-American settlement.

In Santa Fe itself few citizens had as yet arisen from their beds. In the presidio, however, Governor Alvarez had already breakfasted, for after being awakened by Jamison when the latter had hurried over to the fortress with Clark Smart's note the representative of the Mexican Republic had not been disposed to resume his interrupted slumber.

At present he was in his study, poring over certain documents relating to affairs of State, and he was engrossed in the contemplation of these documents when suddenly a clatter of hoofs and an alarming outcry reached his ears through the open windows of his sanctum.

The commotion broke the silence of the morning startlingly, and, knitting his brows, Don Luis Alvarez rose from the chair at his desk and stepped quickly across the apartment which was his study and which had been Escobedo Dupray's in former days. A moment later he was at the windows, and, looking down into the courtyard, he saw a group of agitated figures near the gateway.

Half a dozen of them were soldiers,

COMING SHORTLY!

FREDDIE BARTHOLOMEW

AND MICKEY ROONEY

IN

"THE BOY FROM BARNADO'S"

all that remained to garrison the presidio. With these were four men and a boy whom Don Luis recognised as members of the Jamison wagon-train—one of the men being Jim Bowie, and the boy Kit Carson.

The Americans had arrived on horseback, but had dismounted and appeared to be motioning out through the presidio gateway in a concerned fashion. Then all at once three or four of the soldiers hurried forward and closed and barred the fortress gates, after which the whole party ran across the courtyard in the direction of the governor's quarters.

Don Luis heard them enter the hallway below and heard the clump of their feet on the stairs, and, hastening from his sanctum, he met them as they gained the landing.

He addressed himself to Jim Bowie, who was in the lead.

"Why are you and your friends here, senior?" he asked in fluent English. "Is anything wrong?"

The veteran Indian fighter answered him tensely. His long-barrelled rifle was gripped firm in his horny hands. He was chewing, as usual, on a wad of black, strong plug tobacco, but his jaws were working more rapidly than was their wont, and there was a grim expression on his leathery countenance.

"Plenty's wrong, y'ur Excellency," he ejaculated. "Them renegade varmints that are back of Dupray, they're here in full force. Me an' Kit Carson and my pardners seed 'em beavin' down on the wagon encampment, an', knowin' we could never make a stand against 'em there, we mounted up an' high-tailed it for the presidio. Prompt-like, they chased after us, an' they're headin' straight for the fort."

He slipped the wad of chewing tobacco to the side of his mouth so that his cheek bulked incongruously, and Don Luis heard him grind his teeth.

"It looks ter me like the skunks must've knowed most of our men an' most o' your men was away," the fur-capped scout added, "or they'd never've dared ter show up at Santa Fe, I reckon."

Meanwhile the governor's features had taken on a look of alarm.

"Dupray's whole gang is here?" he said huskily. "And Dupray, he is with them?"

"No, we didn't see no sign o' him, y'ur Excellency," Bowie rejoined. "But that outlaw Zamora what Dupray used ter call his secretary, he's ridin' well in the fore."

A confused din became audible at that moment, a din as of blows being rained on stout woodwork, and little Kit Carson caught Jim Bowie by the wrist.

"That's Zamora and his bunch at the gates now!" the lad breathed.

"I guess you're right, son," the veteran Indian fighter answered, "an' I figure it won't take 'em long to bust 'em open."

He turned to Don Luis again. "We're outnumbered, y'ur Excellency," he stated crisply, "but maybe we can hold 'em off an' keep 'em away from your quarters if we pump lead at 'em from the windows of one o' the upper rooms here. We'll have the advantage o' position, anyways."

The governor motioned to a room on his immediate right, and the entire party swarmed into it, Bowie lending Don Luis a spare six-shooter that he was carrying, preferring for his own use the long-barrelled rifle with which he had earned himself so deadly a reputation in many a battle against hostile Redskins. As for the other three men of the Jamison wagon-train, they were handling Colt forty-fives, while the half-dozen soldiers who had been left at the presidio were armed with carbines.

The defenders posted themselves at the windows of the room they had entered, Bowie ordering Kit Carson to crouch down on the floor well out of harm's way. In the meantime, at the other side of the patio which that upper chamber overlooked, the fortress gates were trembling under a resolute onslaught—an onslaught directed against them by Zamora and his accomplices, who had evidently dismounted and were hurling themselves in concert at the stout timbers.

The double gates flew wide within two or three minutes, and the attackers appeared in full view, whereupon the guns of the defenders blazed out a challenge, hot lead ripping into the thick of the outlaws and bringing down a couple of them, who fell dead in their tracks. Then the voice of Zamora was raised in shrill tones of command.

"Four of you stay outside," he called. "Keep clear of the gateway, and if any townspeople come from Santa Fe warn them off with a volley. The rest of you follow me."

Four of the crooks retreated and dodged out of the line of fire, taking charge of the gang's horses and focusing their attention on the settlement to the east. The others accompanied Zamora in helter-skelter fashion as the dago sprinted for a supply wagon that stood near a building on the left-hand side of the patio.

From behind the cover of that wagon and from behind a pile of stores that had been unloaded from it the gangsters discharged fusillade after fusillade at the windows of the room where Don Luis and his party were ensconced, and in response the defenders kept up a heavy fire on the position occupied by the renegades, the whole presidio echoing the blatter of the gunplay, and leaden slugs whistling to and fro on their missions of death. Then all at once, when the engagement had only been in progress a short time, there was an outbreak of shooting outside the fort.

The outlaws who had been left beyond the gateway were responsible for it, for, sure enough, a number of citizens had come out from Santa Fe and started across the open ground between town and military stronghold to ascertain the cause of the disturbance.

As Zamora had fancied, those citizens turned tail when the revolvers of the gang's "look-outs" belched at them threateningly, and they fled back to the settlement in disorder. Nor did they reappear—being content, it seemed, to leave well alone.

In the presidio, the stern gun duel wore on—without the crooks profiting by their advantage in numbers. True, they suffered only one more casualty—a gangster who exposed himself for a second too long in rising to take a shot at those upper windows, and who was drilled through the forehead by a bullet from Jim Bowie's gun. But the renegades inflicted no casualties on the governor's party, and, the latter apparently being well supplied with ammunition, Zamora began to fear that the combat might drag on for hours unless the defenders could be forced into the open, when the punier superiority of the outlaws must bring the fight to a speedy conclusion.

It was not long before Zamora had conceived a plan that was calculated to render the governor's quarters untenable; for the building near which the crooks were located was the storehouse

Say LISTEN HERE, fellas Gotta load of THIS!

This is straight talking. All you boys—and girls, too—will miss a whole heap if you don't see the latest edition of BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL. It sure is a hot number and it's packed with the sort of stories you like best in your favourite weekly—as well as grand art plates of your favourite movie stars—on account of its being all-photogravure. So don't you let anybody put you off. Your biggest treat of the year is gonna be—

There's one for you if you ask for it Now

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

Of all Newsagents and Booksellers 4/-

of the presidio, and Dupray's chief henchman knew it contained combustible materials that could be used to set fire to the abode in which Don Luis' party was besieged.

To smoke out the defenders! That was the plan Zamora resolved upon, and he was hoping that after the Alvarez party had been compelled to evacuate the burning dwelling he and his men would still be able to gain the interior of the residence and obtain the governor's official seal before the blaze reached unapproachable dimensions. Then, with that seal in their possession, they would head back for the Jamison encampment and plunder the prairie schooners there at their leisure.

Zamora's scheme was soon being put into operation, and, in place of six-gun bullets, improvised flambeaux smothered in naphtha oil were directed at Don Luis' quarters—not at the windows of the room in which the governor and his supporters were ensconced, but through the open windows of other rooms, at the veranda which ran along the base of the dwelling's frontage, at the roof as well—flambeaux that were thrown with reasonably accurate aim, flambeaux that ignited the structure at a dozen points.

Within the space of half an hour the governor's residence was burning fiercely and dense clouds of smoke were pouring from it at every outlet, and, though the blaze had not as yet enveloped the room wherein Don Luis and his companions were gathered, the fumes of the conflagration were finding their way into it in ever-increasing volume.

The smoke billowed up over the face of the house and swirled in through the bullet-shattered windows of the apartment. It came in through the fissures around the closed door, and it seeped upward through crevices in the floorboards, mingling with the acrid reek from the defenders' guns, filling the room until the little party of besieged men and the boy who was with them, were choking and choking violently. Then at last Jim Bowie staggered back from the windows.

"I'm gettin' outa here!" he coughed. "I'm a-headin' down into the patio ter shoot it out with them desperadoes, an' my name ain't Bowie if I don't take one or two of 'em ter perdition with me afore they fill me full o' lead. Whaddya say, friends? Are you with me? Are you goin' out there to die fightin', or are you gonna stay here an' die like rats in a trap?"

Hoarse voices answered him in unison, the voices of men who knew they were doomed and who were ready to meet death by the bullet rather than by the crueler element of a raging inferno; and next moment those men were blundering with Jim Bowie towards the door.

The door was plucked open by the veteran who was leading them, and into even thicker clouds of smoke they plunged, and as they charged forth a diminutive figure started after them—the figure of little Kit Carson, bent on sharing their fate.

But Kit was not destined to follow them. Half-way across the room they had evacuated the boy tripped over a fold in a rumpled carpet, and, hurtling forward, he struck his head against the edge of the open door—with an impact that scattered his wits and left him lying there insensible amid the weltering fumes.

(To be continued in another powerful episode next week. By permission of British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Ray Corrigan.)

September 10th, 1938.

"WHO KILLED GAIL PRESTON?"

(Continued from page 12)

shakily. "No one's been here since I came."

Tom turned to Connolly.

"You and I are going up to take a look at that spotlight box," he said. "That was the one thing Mike mentioned on the 'phone. Sergeant, you stay here and keep your eye on this guy."

"Okay, inspector." The sergeant seated himself beside the watchman, and Tom and Connolly went into the café and climbed into the lower of the two boxes.

There was nothing in it except a house telephone attached to one of the walls and two complicated-looking switches depending from its ceiling. Tom looked at the switches.

"These must operate the lights," he decided.

"Where do they lead to?" asked Connolly.

"Probably up to the box above," said Tom. "Let's take a look."

They mounted the vertical ladder into the upper box, and there were two lanterns, standing side by side and facing a long and narrow opening in the front of the box. Through this opening they had a complete view of the café, and Tom saw that both lanterns were tilted to cover the dance floor below.

"We'll examine these things thoroughly," he said. "You look at that one, Cliff."

Connolly moved all round the lantern on the left, peering at it as though he were short-sighted; but he hadn't the slightest notion how it worked. Tom, examining the other one with more understanding eyes, studied the big metal disc in front of its lens, a disc in which there were a number of circular openings fitted with coloured screens, and noticed a wire attached to its crank.

He turned the disc first one way and then the other, and he saw that there was a hole in one of the screens. He looked along the wire, and then he gave a startled exclamation that caused Connolly to join him beside the lantern.

"Look at that!" said Tom.

Connolly's eyes bulged. A heavy automatic was fastened to the right side of the lantern, its muzzle pointing downwards to the exact spot where Gail Preston had been standing before she fell. A wire round the trigger of the automatic passed round a leg of the tripod upon which the lantern stood, and the other end of it was fastened to the crank of the disc.

"See the idea?" inquired Tom. "This colour wheel acts as a motor. When it spins round it tightens up this wire until it pulls the trigger of this gun. Whoever is standing in the spot gets the bullet."

He revolved the disc to demonstrate his meaning, but was careful not to tighten the wire sufficiently to fire the automatic.

"It sure must have taken some guy a long time to figure that out!" breathed Connolly.

"This is the gun that killed Miss Preston," said Tom definitely. "Remember, she got shot at the end of her number when the band was playing September 10th, 1933.

ing its loudest and everybody was applauding. That's why the gun wasn't heard."

"But if that's the gun that shot her," objected Connolly, "the wire oughta be still tight, oughtn't it?"

"No." Tom shook his head. "This wheel works on a spring. It turns around so many times one way, then the spring releases it, and it operates in the other direction. The wire only becomes taut when the amber screen is opposite the lens, I should judge."

"How about trying it?" suggested Connolly.

"Not now. Get the finger-print man, and have him take every print off this gun, then get the ballistics man, and have him check the riflings of the gun against the bullet that killed Preston. Tell the officer on duty not to let anybody in here—and meet me at headquarters when you get through."

It was past one o'clock in the morning, and Tom was half-dozing in his chair in his room at headquarters when Curran, the little ballistic expert, walked in at the door with the automatic that had been taken from the spot-light lantern. Connolly looked up from the crystal into which he had been gazing, and Tom sat bolt upright with a jerk.

"You've got the right gun this time all right," announced Curran, placing the automatic on the desk. "It checks perfectly with the murder bullet."

"So when we find out whose finger-prints were on that gun—" began Connolly.

In at the open door stepped a gloomy-looking man whose life was associated almost entirely with finger-prints, and Tom silenced his assistant with a gesture.

"What did you find?" he asked eagerly.

"Sorry, inspector," the expert replied, "there wasn't a mark on the gun."

"That's fine!" groaned Tom. "Now we can start all over again!"

Curran and his colleague exchanged glances and departed without another word, closing the door behind them. Tom drooped in his chair, his lips compressed and his brows knitted. But Connolly suddenly had what he considered to be an inspiration.

"Hi, wait a minute, Tom!" he exclaimed. "That guy's been tryin' to get that gun ever since he put it up there! He was tryin' when you got soaked with that wrench! If he comes back again we'll nab him!"

"He might come back," said Tom, "and he might not. But I'm not going to sit around and wait for him. No, we'll have to make that murderer return to the scene of the crime."

"Make him?" echoed Connolly. "How'd you expect to do that?"

Tom picked up a paper-knife, stabbed the desk with it, and threw it down again.

"Cliff," he burst out, "for the benefit of the murderer we'll re-enact the crime!"

"What for?"

"We're going to catch the murderer with his own contraption. Only one person knows there's a gun in that colour-wheel spot-light. Instead of playing it on the singer we'll play it on every suspect in the audience, and when it hits the murderer he's going to break, because he knows the gun can go off again!"

"Might work," conceded Connolly.

"It must work! Listen, Cliff, get hold of Fallon and tell him I want that club open again to-morrow night, and I want everything just as it was the night Gail Preston was murdered. You'd better get your dinner-jacket pressed, too, because we're going to catch a murderer in style!"

Confession!

AT eight o'clock on the following evening the Swing Club was ablaze with lights; the waiters were in their places, dressed as guards; the band was on the circular platform at the back of the dance floor, and the people who had been present on the night of Gail Preston's murder had begun to arrive.

Connolly, in evening clothes he very seldom wore, checked off the names of the patrons in a little book as they entered the café, and a burly guard held a plan with the aid of which they were conducted to the tables they had occupied on the fatal occasion. They had been subpoenaed to attend, and some of them objected strongly to such compulsion.

"Why were we brought here?" one elaborately dressed female raged at Tom, never suspecting him to be a detective in his perfectly fitting dinner-jacket suit. "We had nothing to do with your silly old murder. We were going to the opera."

"Hi, listen, lady!" Connolly intervened. "You'll get all the uproar you want right here! Cell Three." He pointed with his pencil. "Now, get in there, and I don't want to hear a peep out o' you!"

Frank Daniels, brought to the club in custody, was shut in a make-believe cell, and seemed to find it little more attractive than the real one he had left behind for the time being. Fallon, in the cell he had used before, sat at a table with the same two friends.

At half-past eight, Tom went to Connolly, after satisfying himself that police officers were posted all over the building.

"Everybody here yet?" he inquired. "Yeah," was the reply. "Just checked off the last one."

"Fine!" Tom surveyed the setting for his reconstruction of the crime and was satisfied. "Well, I guess everything's all ready. Close the doors."

Waiters were standing about because they had nothing to serve; the guards on the galleries were pacing back and forth. Swing Traynor, in his striped suit as band leader, emerged from his dressing-room and joined Ann and Charles Waverly on the edge of the dance floor.

"Oh, I wish I knew what was going on!" Ann exclaimed nervously. "So does everybody else," growled Waverly.

"Kellogg certainly has something up his sleeve," commented Swing. Tom crossed the floor to them.

"I'm going to need your help to-night, Waverly," he said. "You know the routine of everything that took place the night Gail Preston was shot?"

"That's right," confirmed the Master of Ceremonies.

"I'd like to have you announce the show in exactly that order."

"I'll be glad to help you. It was in the second half of the cabaret show, and we started with the Spanish dancers."

"Well, they're here and ready," said Tom. "I'll just make an announcement."

He mounted the circular platform and turned his back on the band to address the people at the tables.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, "you are gathered here for one purpose to-night. As you have been notified, we are re-enacting the scene exactly as it took place the night Gail Preston was murdered. One of you here is the murderer—of that we are sure! Before this night is over we hope to arrest that person, and every other man and woman in this building will be instrumental in catching the guilty one. Start the show now, Waverly."

Waverly stood in the middle of the dance floor and raised the peaked cap he was wearing. Tom stepped off the platform and Swing took his place there. Ann shrank away under a gallery.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said Waverly without any of the gruffness previously associated with his rôle of tough guy, "our first number will be a speciality dance by Lolita and Ardo."

The band struck up a tango, and he drifted away to a corner as the two dancers appeared. The spectacular tango was followed by the whirlwind dance, and, in spite of the circumstances, spontaneous applause rang out at its conclusion.

The artistes went off the floor, and Waverly walked over to Tom.

"This is the spot where Gail Preston's supposed to sing," he stated.

"Well, someone will have to take her place," Tom beckoned to Ann, and there was a sudden and complete silence in the café as she moved towards him. "Will you sing your sister's song, Miss Bishop?" he asked.

"Why, yes," she replied, after a very momentary hesitation, "I'll be glad to."

Swing Traynor hounded across to them and caught hold of Ann.

"Why should she take that chance?" he cried.

"What chance?" challenged Tom.

"It's all right, Swing," said Ann bravely. "I'm not afraid."

But Swing shook his head.

"If you don't mind, inspector," he said hoarsely, "I'll do the singing."

"That's okay with me," said Tom. "Announce Swing Traynor."

"Right." Waverly raised his cap and addressed the waiting audience. "Our next number will be a song by our orchestra leader, Swing Traynor," he called out, then backed away to a table that was unoccupied and leaned against it.

Up in the control-box, beneath the one in which the lanterns were situated, two police officers were plainly visible on either side of an electrician from headquarters. Tom waved a hand to them, and immediately the café was plunged into darkness, and the spot-light enveloped Swing as he moved towards the middle of the floor.

The band played the introductory bars to the song about midnight and loneliness while he waved his baton, and then he began to sing. The spot-light changed colour, and as it did so the beam shifted. Swing was left singing in the dark, and a green light blazed full in the face of Jules Stevens, causing him to blink.

A moment later the spot-light had turned red and was shining upon Frank Daniels in his cell. Swing went on singing, but everybody in the place watched the narrow beam of light as it moved on again, wondering who would be the next to be picked out by its glare.

The light turned blue, and Fallon started violently as it lit up his face. His two companions laughed mirthlessly, and then the light swung away to the right, became violet as it rested upon the surprised features of Connolly, and dipped towards the table against which Waverly was leaning just as Swing reached the last words of the song.

There came a crash of chords from the band, the violet light turned amber, and Waverly's face became distorted with fear. Before anyone could guess at his intention he whipped out a gun and fired again and again at the lantern, screaming at the top of his voice:

"Put out that light! Put it out, I say!"

Confusion reigned in the café. People who had been seated at tables round the dance floor fell over one another in their efforts to get out of the way. But Tom rushed across the floor from one side, and Connolly from the other, and Waverly was struggling madly with both of them when the whole café became flooded with light and a number of policemen forced their way through the frightened crowd.

Tom jerked a fist under Waverly's jaw, and he and Connolly gripped Waverly's wrist so that the gun he held was pointed upwards. One of the officers wrenched away the gun, and then the frenzied man went all to pieces.

"All right. I did it!" he screamed. "I killed her! If I couldn't have her myself, no other man was going to have her!"

Tom seized his wrists and clapped a pair of handcuffs round them.

"Okay, boys," he said grimly, "take him away."

Raving hysterically Waverly was carried from the club and taken down to headquarters, while the witnesses of the amazing confession—now that the excitement was over—almost fell on Tim's neck to congratulate him, but, with a broad grin on his face, he waved them aside and strode out of the premises after his prisoner.

A few days afterwards, Swing and Ann paid a visit to Tom in his room at headquarters. Stevens and Daniels were in gaol, the one on a charge of misappropriation of funds, the other for robbery; but Tom had pulled strings at the Immigration Bureau, with the result that Fallon had been given permission to stay in the country indefinitely, and was planning a grand reopening of the Swing Swing Club.

"Inspector," said Ann, "you'll never know how grateful we are to you. A few days ago we were really in trouble, and now our future looks swell. Swing's still going to be band leader, and he's going to be starred."

"And what are you going to do?" asked Tom.

"I'm going to look after Swing," she replied happily.

"Well, bless you, my children," said Tom in a fatherly sort of fashion, though he was hardly any older than the band leader; and then he added thoughtfully: "You know, love's a funny thing—it seems to affect everyone in a different way. It's made you two happy, but it turned Waverly into a cold-blooded killer!"

(By permission of Columbia Pictures Corporation, Ltd., starring Don Terry, with Rita Hayworth, Wyn Cayhoun, and Robert Paige.)

SAVE UP Now FOR A 'SKY-HIGH' BUY!

Picture yourself buying armfuls of exciting new Brock's FIREWORKS for Guy Fawkes night—Rockets, Roman Candles, Catherine Wheels, Crackers! What scrumptious fun you'll have letting 'em off! And a few pennies a week put into a Brock's CLUB will get you this. Join now! Look for the nearest shop displaying Brock's CLUB notice. Give the shopman a penny or two and he'll enter it on your savings card. As the Fifth draws near, get Dad (and Uncle) to make it a real sky-high buy by adding a shilling or two.

Join

BROCK'S

'CRYSTAL PALACE'

FIREWORK CLUB

Now!

Get your Club Card today—

SHOW THIS TO DAD

Tell him you can get a Riley "Home" Billiard Table for only 8/- DOWN. Balance monthly, 7 days' free trial. Write now for Free Art List.

32 FREE Billiard Tables.
Send for details.

E. J. RILEY, LTD. Ensign Works, ACCRINGTON, or Dept. 36, 147, Aldersgate St., London, E.C.1.

"THE BORDER PATROLMAN"

(Continued from page 18.)

Judge Alvarez would be across in a very short while to perform the ceremony.

They sat at a table, and Maybrook ordered some red wine. He raised his glass.

"Here's to the future Mrs. Maybrook."

Patricia's smile was a little sickly. For once she was feeling foolish and rather frightened. She wished she was back at the Desert Springs Hotel, and would not have minded a beating from Bob.

Two men entered the café, and Maybrook feigned surprise at seeing them. It was Frank Adams and a burly individual named Johnson. Maybrook brought them over to the table, made them have a drink, and finally persuaded Johnson to act as best man, with Frank as a witness—that would make the marriage ceremony legal.

Meanwhile, Bob had reached the border, and learned from the officials that a young lady and gentleman had crossed in an open car about half an hour previously. Bob reached Jiminez, and, with his knowledge of the lingo, tried to trace his quarry, but without success. He had an idea, and asked a street vendor how one got married in this town. He learned that Judge Alvarez performed all the services that were not conducted in a church. Off went Bob to the judge's house, to find from his housekeeper that that worthy gentleman had gone to the cantina to perform a marriage ceremony.

There was dancing in the cantina, and Maybrook insisted that Patricia dance with him, and as he took the girl off he gave a significant glance at the handbag on the table. Johnson went off to look for the judge. Frank slid a package out of his pocket, pulled open the secret compartment in the handbag, and thrust inside the Borloff necklace.

When the dance concluded the happy couple returned to the table. Frank looked at the bag and gave a slight nod. Johnson appeared to say that Judge Alvarez had arrived.

"Take him to the private room I have engaged for the ceremony," instructed Maybrook. "You go with him, Frank. I will conduct my bride-to-be to the room in about five minutes, when everything should be ready."

"The dame don't look so joyous," Johnson said to Adams as they walked across the dance floor. "She has all the earmarks of a scared rabbit."

"I don't blame her," sneered Frank. With triumph so close at hand an obstacle arose. Patricia said she could not go through with the ceremony.

"But you've let me make all the arrangements," cried Maybrook, trying to control his temper. "It's too late to stop now."

"I tell you I can't do it!" cried Patricia agitatedly.

"Now, you understand this," As Maybrook spoke his dark eyes glowered at her compellingly. "I haven't come all the way here to let you make a clump of me. Come on."

Patricia was dragged to her feet, the handbag was forced into her hand, and one arm linked with Maybrook's. She was in a state of collapse from uncertainty. She did not want to marry Maybrook just yet. She wanted time to think it over. If only she were back at Desert Springs. Suddenly uncertainty vanished, and she knew she did not want to marry Maybrook now or at any time. By this time they had reached some stairs, and she began to struggle. With brute force the man drove her up the wooden stairs to the first floor.

"Pull yourself together, Pat."

Maybrook shook her violently.

"I'm not going to marry you!" Pat stormed as she tried to free her arm. "Let me go!"

Then up those stairs, three at a time, came Bob Wallace, and he did not hesitate. One twist of his fingers and he had freed the girl, then slap went his fist into Maybrook's face, and down went the man on his back.

"Have you married him?" cried Bob.

"No," answered the girl.

"Then we're getting out of here!" yelled Bob, and grabbed her wrist.

She was whisked down the stairs willingly.

Maybrook staggered to his feet as his two henchmen rushed out of one of the adjoining rooms.

"What happened?" demanded Adams.

"Wallace socked me." Maybrook nursed his aching jaw. "He's gone, and taken the girl with him."

"Where's the bag?" Frank asked.

"She's got it," Maybrook answered. "We've got to stop 'em."

A Fighter

WALLACE wasted no time. He started up the car and headed back for the line. It was a good car, luxurious, but not as speedy as Bob would have liked. On the way he explained why he had come after her and the nature of her intended husband's occupation.

"Of course I didn't know he was a smuggler," said Pat. "You know I wouldn't go in for anything like that."

"Then he must have intended planting the stones on you," decided Bob. "Did he give you anything to bring across the border?"

"No, he didn't have a chance."

"You don't know how lucky you are," Bob told her.

"I certainly got myself into a fine mess, didn't I?" She edged a trifle closer. "And it was all my fault." She glanced back suddenly. "There's a car following us. You don't think—"

Bob looked up into the mirror.

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"WHO KILLED GAIL PRESTON?"

Detective-Inspector

Tom Kellogg.....Don Terry

"Swing" Traynor.....Robert Paige

Ann Bishop.....Wyn Cayhoon

Gail Preston.....Rita Hayworth

Detective-Sergeant

Connolly.....Gene Morgan

Charles Waverly.....John Gallaudet

Patrick Fallon.....John Spaey

Frank Daniels.....Marc Lawrence

Jules Stevens.....Arthur Loft

Mike Blake.....Eddie Fetherston

Sarah.....Mildred Gover

"THE BORDER PATROLMAN"

Bob Wallace.....George O'Brien

Patricia Huntley...Polly Ann Young

Courtney Maybrook.....Roy Mason

Myra.....Mary Doran

Chuck Owens.....Smiley Burnette

Jeremiah Huntley William P. Carleton

Frank Adams.....Al Hill

Johnson.....Tom London

Riker.....George MacQuarrie

Hendricks.....Cyril Ring

Manning.....John St. Polis

"It's Maybrook all right and some of his friends."

"Why are they following us?"

"I don't know." Bob trod on the pedal. "But I'm not going to stop to find out."

Bob took bends in the rough road at speed, but he could not shake off the pursuers, who were in a more powerful vehicle. Maybrook gave orders for them to get within range and then shoot at the tyres.

It was barren, desolate country, and this border road was not used very frequently. Bob gritted his teeth, for there was a good ten miles yet to safety.

"I bet you're disgusted with me, aren't you?" shouted Patricia in Bob's ear.

"No." He forced a grin. "But I think you ought to have your head examined." There was the roar of a gun. "Nice guy you wanted to marry."

"I don't ever want to be reminded of him," cried the girl. "Besides, I didn't really want to marry him. I was just doing it for spite. I wouldn't have gone through with it. I don't suppose you would have even tried to stop me if it hadn't been for grandfather."

"We'll take that up at the next meeting," he said, swinging the car round a stony bend.

Wallace feared the crooks would shoot at the tyres. Suddenly there was a terrific explosion, a lurch, and a sickening, banging noise. A tyre had been hit.

Somehow he negotiated a bend, and then swung the car off the road. As it was a steep incline the other car was unable to stop, and went hurtling past, and that enabled Bob to drag the girl out of the car. It was his hope that they could lose their pursuers among these numerous sandhills.

"Think you can hold out?" asked Bob, after they had run about two or three hundred yards.

"Sure," she panted. "And I'll promise you one thing. You won't have any more trouble with me after to-day."

"You said a mouthful," he told her. "I won't be here after to-day. I'm going away."

"Why, where are you going?"

Patricia stopped.

"Now, don't start any of that business." He gripped her wrist.

"Let's get out of this jam first and have questions afterwards." He ducked as a bullet whined over their heads. "This is getting serious—it can't be just as they're after." Suddenly an idea occurred to him. "Here, let me have a look at that bag of yours for a minute."

"I threw it away soon after we got out of the car," the girl gasped out. "It was a present from Courtney."

"Oh, so he gave it to you. When?"

"At the hotel, just before we came over here."

Bob dragged her round a corner and into a narrow valley formed by winter floods.

"Pat, we've got to get that bag back." Bob jerked the girl to a stop.

"Now, you wait here and I'll go back and get it. If you crouch down by that ledge they should not see you."

"I'll go with you," spiritedly cried the girl.

The argument that would have followed was nipped in the bud, by the appearance of Maybrook and his two rascals. They had split up, and one of them, running along higher ground, had seen the two fugitives duck to cover. Bob was unarmed, so he could not do anything.

"Where do you think you're going?" sneered Maybrook, and laughed harshly.

(Concluded on page 28)

LINE UP HERE FOR FREE FOOTBALLS!

SHOOT!

for Scoring "Goals" with FOOTER-STAMPS

WHO wants to win a super Football? There are hundreds to be won free this month by "Footer-Stamp" collectors. "Footer-Stamps" are being printed every week in BOY'S CINEMA. They consist of pictures of six different actions on the football field, and the object of this great competition stamp-game is to score as many "goals" as possible by the end of September.

TO SCORE A "GOAL" you must collect a complete set of six stamps (they're numbered 1 to 6), made up of the following movements: KICK-OFF - DRIBBLE - TACKLE - HEADER - SHOT - GOAL.

The more stamps you collect the more "goals" you can score. (Note that the "goal" stamp by itself does NOT count as a "goal." You must get a set of the stamps 1 to 6 each time).

There are ten more stamps below, to add to your collection. Cut them out and try to score a "goal" with them, then keep all your stamps until you get some more goal-scoring stamps in next week's issue. If you have any odd stamps left over from the August competition they can be included, too.

If you want to score some other quick "goals" remember that "Footer-Stamps" are also appearing in "Sports Budget" and "Triumph." There are more "goals" waiting in those papers!

"Footer-Stamps" is all the rage—see that you're in it, so that we can send you a football very soon, maybe! Up to 300 more of the 1,000 Footballs offered are going to be awarded in the September competition for the readers scoring the highest number of "goals" with "Footer-Stamps" for the month.

Don't send any stamps yet. Wait until we tell you how and where at the end of the month. There's nothing to pay, remember!

RULES—Up to 300 Footballs will be awarded in the September contest to the readers declaring and sending in the largest number of "goals" scored with "Footer-Stamps." The Editor may extend or amend the prize list in case of too many ties.

Each "goal" must consist of a set of "Footer-Stamps," Nos. 1 to 6, inclusive—and all claims for prizes to be made on the proper coupon (to be given later). No allowance made for any coupon or stamps mutilated or lost or delayed in the post or otherwise. No correspondence! No one connected with this paper may enter, and the Editor's decision will be final and legally binding throughout.

(N.B.—"Footer-Stamps" may also be collected from the following papers: GEM, MAGNET, MODERN BOY, DETECTIVE WEEKLY, TRIUMPH, WILD WEST WEEKLY, THRILLER, SPORTS BUDGET and CHAMPION.)

Overseas Readers! You pals who are far away—you're in this great scheme also, and special awards will be given for the best scores from overseas readers. There will be a special closing date for you as well, of course.

Ten More
"Footer-Stamps"
To Save!

"THE BORDER PATROLMAN"

(Continued from page 26)

"You weren't in any hurry, were you? Give me that bag."

"I haven't got it," answered the girl. "Search Wallace," Maybrook ordered.

It was a big handbag and hard to conceal. It became obvious to Maybrook that the handbag was no longer in the possession of Wallace or Patricia, and yet he was certain she had taken it when she left the car. His deduction for this was the fact that the bag had not been found in the car.

"What did you do with that handbag?" Adams shouted at the girl.

"Tell 'em nothing!" cried Bob, his arms protecting the girl.

Whereupon Johnson and Adams, at a signal from Maybrook, dragged Wallace from Patricia and crashed their fists into his face. He fell backwards, appeared to hit his head against the cliff face, gave a groan, and went limp.

"You cowards!" Patricia shouted in horror.

"Pipe down, you!" Frank snarled at her. "Now, get this, sister. If you think anything of your friend, you'd better open up." He turned the gun towards the prostrate Wallace. "You tell us where that bag is, or we'll plug him."

"You wouldn't dare."

"Oh, wouldn't we?" Maybrook pointed his own gun. "I'm giving you about five seconds to make up your mind. One—"

"No, no, I'll tell you!" screamed Patricia.

"Now you're getting sensible, Pat. Where is it?"

"Will you promise not to hurt Bob?"

"Certainly. All we want is that bag," Maybrook spoke without a moment's hesitation. "You can have him, and welcome. Where's the bag?"

"I threw it away."

"Stalling won't save him," Maybrook gripped her wrist. "We mean business, and it won't do a bit of good to lie."

"I'm not!" Patricia answered, her eyes never wavering. "I tell you—I threw it away soon after leaving the car. Let me go, and I'll find it."

"I think she's telling the truth,"

Maybrook turned to his men. "You two had better stay here and keep your eye on Wallace. I'll see whether she's telling the truth or not. Come on, Pat."

The girl went willingly, and when she had vanished with Maybrook round a bend the burly Johnson touched Adams on the shoulder.

"I think we pulled a boner letting Maybrook go down there alone. Suppose he pulls a sneak."

"I was thinking the same thing," Adams answered. "Leaving us with nothing but a copper on our hands. Maybe we ought to trail after him."

The prostrate man was far from out. He had feigned to be unconscious, and as their backs were turned he sat up, making no sound. His hands picked up a lot of loose sand, grit, and small stones.

"What about this copper?" Johnson asked. "We don't want to lug him along."

"Bump him off," was Adams' callous decision.

DON'T FORGET YOUR

"BOY'S CINEMA"
ANNUAL

Now on Sale PRICE 4/-

As they turned Bob sprang to his feet, and the two rascals received a handful of sand and dusty grit in their faces. It went in their mouths, their ears, and their eyes, and they choked helplessly—they were momentarily blinded. Their guns were wrenched from their hands, and they stopped two punches that lifted them off their feet. When they did stagger up they found themselves covered with their own guns.

Wallace made them strip off their clothing and forced Adams to bind Johnson's arms behind his back. Then Bob did the same to Adams, put the two crooks back to back, removed their belts, and lashed them together. Then he went off to rescue Patricia.

The two rogues had not underestimated the crookedness of their chief. Finding the bag, he decided that he would abandon his companions. If he took Patricia with him he could use her as a hostage and perhaps he could get some padre to marry them.

"I won't go with you!" shouted the girl, as he dragged her towards the car. "I won't!"

"Now, you listen to me. I don't wanna get rough with you, Pat." Maybrook found it hard work dragging the girl towards the car. "But you're going with me whether you like it or not."

"They'll kill Bob if I don't go back!" screamed Patricia.

"Serve him right for meddling in my affairs," was the cold-blooded answer.

Bob was racing back the way they had come, and could see no sign of Maybrook and his prisoner. Then he heard a car being started, and guessed what it meant. Maybrook would not dare to head for the border, but would turn the car and race back to Jimenez. Bob remembered how the road was on a gradient, and there were steep banks on either side.

Maybrook turned the car, and was having all his work cut out trying to steer with Patricia struggling and clawing at his face, when a figure came hurtling from the top of some banking. Bob landed in the back seat, and he set about Maybrook with a will. The car did not crash because Patricia had the presence of mind to switch off the engine, and, when Bob had yanked Maybrook out of the driver's seat, to apply the hand-brake. To the girl's idea, it was the loveliest fight she had ever seen, and it amazed her that she should be so pleased to see the man she had almost married get such a hiding. When Bob finished the fight with an upper-cut she clapped her hands.

Bob dusted his hands, kissed Patricia and then went off for Adams and Johnson.

Some time later the three prisoners, securely bound, were in the back seat, and the car was heading for the border. Bob was driving, whilst Patricia grinned fiendishly at the three men and brandished a gun.

"Hey, you make me nervous," muttered the battered Maybrook. "You don't have to hold that gat on us."

Patricia beamed.

"Sorry, that's Mister Wallace's orders," she answered, and, bending forward, kissed the driver on the forehead.

(By permission of Associated British Film Distributors, Ltd., starring George O'Brien as Bob Wallace.)

ROYAL NAVY

Boys may now enter between the ages of 15 and 17½ years. Full particulars are contained in the illustrated booklet "The Royal Navy as a Career and How to Join It," which may be obtained on application to the Recruiting Staff Officer, R.N. and R.M. (N), 85, Whitehall, London, S.W.1, or at any Post Office.

BLUSHING

—FREE to all sufferers, particulars of a proved home treatment that quickly removes all embarrassment and permanently cures blushing and flushing of the face and neck. Enclose stamp to Mr. A. TEMPLE, Specialist, Palace House, 128 Shaftesbury Avenue (2nd Floor), London, W.1. Est. 37 years.

BE TALL

Your Height increased in 14 days or Money Back Complete Course, 5/-. Booklet free privately STEBBING SYSTEM (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

■ BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" ■ WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS

Printed in England and published every Tuesday by the Proprietors, THE AMALGAMATED PRESS, LTD., The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Advertisement Offices: The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad, 11/- per annum; 5/6 for six months. Sole Agents for Australia and New Zealand: Messrs. Gordon & Gotch, Ltd.; and for South Africa: Central September 10th, 1933. News Agency, Ltd. Registered for transmission to Canada at Magazine Rates. S.G.

BILLIARDS

Perfect Reproduction Full-size Tables. Leather Covered Pockets, Rubber Cushions, adjustable Feet. Complete with 2 Cues, 3 Balls, Marking Board, Rules, Level and Chalk.

Size.	Weekly	Cash	Snooker Balls.
3ft. 2ins. ...	20 @ 1/-	16/-	11 ... 12/-
3ft. 8ins. ...	20 @ 1/3	19/6	11 ... 12/6
4ft. 2ins. ...	20 @ 1/6	25/-	11 ... 15/-
4ft. 8ins. ...	20 @ 1/10	29/6	11 ... 17/-
5ft. 2ins. ...	24 @ 2/-	39/6	11 ... 22/6
6ft. 4ins. ...	32 @ 2/-	52/6	11 ... 24/6

Weekly

SEND FOR FREE ART ILLUS. LIST.

GEORGE GROSE LTD LUDGATE CIRCUS

NEW BRIDGE ST LONDON, E.C.4

BE STRONG

I promise you Robust Health, Doubled Strength, Stamina, and Dashing Energy in 30 days or money back! My amazing 4-in-1 Course adds 10-25 lbs. to your muscular development (with 2 ins. on Chest and 1 in. on Arms), also brings an Iron Will, Perfect Self-control, Virile Manhood, Personal Magnetism, Surprise your friends! Complete Course, 5/-. Details free privately.— STEBBING INSTITUTE (A), 28, Dean Rd., LONDON, N.W.2.

TALL

Your Height increased in 12 days or no cost. New discovery adds 2-5 ins. I gained 4 ins. Guaranteed safe. Full Course 5/-. Details: J. B. MORLEY, 17, Cheapside, London, E.C.2.

All applications for Advertisement Space in this publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "BOY'S CINEMA," The Fleetway House, Farringdon St., London, E.C.4.

Boy's CINEMA

2^D

EVERY TUESDAY
No 979
SEPT. 17, 1938

"KIDNAPPED"

Starring

WARNER BAXTER

& FREDDIE BARTHOLOMEW

A TALE OF A SCOTTISH REBEL

The early days of the union between Scotland and England, when Alan Breck was the last rebel fighting for Scottish freedom. A stirring story of this stalwart fighter, a brave lassie and a boy named David Balfour, portrayed by Warner Baxter, Arleen Whelan and Freddie Bartholomew

A Mysterious Past

SCOTLAND in 1747. The Highland clans had twice rebelled against English rule. The rebellions had been crushed in blood, but there was still one man who refused the British yoke. His name was Alan Breck. The notorious outlaw gathered together a small force and rode for Edinburgh, rousing all the clansmen on the way that was possible. It was his last gamble for justice.

The Duke of Argyll, Lord Justice General of Scotland, was urged to sign a warrant for Breck's arrest, but those Scottish chiefs who had agreed to the union with England warned the duke that the outlaw was the popular hero and that such an act might cause the whole of Scotland to rise.

"While he is alive the country will remain in a ferment, so that we have no choice but to fight and kill," was the final decision of the duke. "You say the people will make a martyr of him. It is better to deal with one martyr than a nation of martyrs."

As a result a reward of five hundred pounds was offered for the capture of the traitor, Alan Breck, in the name of his Majesty George II, King of Great Britain and Ireland.

In a small village many miles north of Edinburgh one of those reward notices reached Dominie Campbell, who was the law-abiding schoolmaster of a small class of boys ranging from six to fourteen years of age.

The schoolmaster brought the notice into the class-room and rapped on his desk for attention.

"There's trouble among us again. Rebels riding by night and the King's September 17th, 1758.

troopers along the highway. There's one man behind it all. You know his name—Alan Breck. That man is a traitor to our King. Have no truck with him or his men. They will come to your houses at night and whisper and beg of your father for food and guns for the cause—a lost cause—Scotland's freedom. You've all taken with me the oath of allegiance. If you are faithful to that oath, Alan Breck and his men are your enemies."

When the class was dismissed Dominie Campbell came across to young David Balfour and bade him come across to the house. Kindly mother Campbell bowed her head when she saw them and made herself busy with the fire. The schoolmaster, as if weary, seated himself at an old desk, and from a drawer produced a long envelope.

"This letter came to-day from Newfoundland."

"It's from my father?" was the eager question.

"No, David." The schoolmaster looked at him sorrowfully. "It says that your father is dead."

The boy went very white, then pulled himself together.

"That is sad news, sir," he said with no sign of tears.

"Yes, but not as sad as it might be, considering you never really knew your father. He died a brave death." The schoolmaster handed over the letter. "Here, read it for yourself."

"I'll take it back with me to the class-room."

"Wait, there's something else. Things are not going to be quite the same now. David. You'll be leaving us." He produced another letter, very old, faded. "When your father left you here as a child he gave me this—told me that if anything ever happened to him before he could come back for you I should send you to your uncle and to tell you to give him this letter."

The letter was addressed to Ebenezer Balfour at Edinburgh.

David was loath to go because Mr. and Mrs. Campbell had been like mother and father to him. Only vaguely could he remember the big man who was his father, and that for that reason the news of his death was not the terrible shock it might have been. But always David had been a dutiful lad and therefore he must obey the commands of this letter. Dominie Campbell knew little about this uncle except that he was reputed to be rich and lived in a castle.

So David's few possessions were put into a bundle. With this fastened to a stout stick the boy set out to trudge the two days journey to Edinburgh. He can be forgiven for having a quiet sniff on parting with the kindly Campbells. He promised to return and see them soon. And before the parting old Dominie prayed for the boy.

"Merciful Lord, let him go forth in righteousness, humble of heart, practical of mind, strict of purse, and let him honour God and King. Amen."

The Killing of Red Fox

IT was late in the afternoon of the second day that David entered a small village near Falkirk. It was his intention to push on for another five miles before seeking shelter in some cottage or a comfortable haystack.

The boy inquired from a portly, snuff-taking minister the way to Edinburgh, and had been shown the direction when a horseman dashed down the street vaulted from his horse and ran up to a post in the market square, where there was a large bell. The violent clanking brought everyone running out of their cottages.

"Hide your valuables!" yelled the ringer. "The King's tax collector is coming!" There was a gasp from the villagers. "I saw him come over the hill, the same that was here before, the one we call Red Fox."

The news seemed to strike consternation in everyone because the villagers rushed to their homes and in a few minutes appeared with some of their taxable possessions, such as pigs, fowls, sacks of corn, cloth that had been weaved and even things such as furniture and bedding. David watched all this in amazement. After dumping their possessions in the woods the villagers returned to their homes for more, but it was too late. Down the street came a magnificent coach, with an escort of mounted soldiers riding on both sides. Their scarlet uniforms made a blaze of colour. The coach pulled up in the square and a door was opened. Out stepped the person whom these people called Red Fox, and David thought the same name fitted.

"There's a royal welcome for you." David could hear every word the man spoke. "You'd think a plague had struck the place. Hiding their shillings, that's what they've been up to. Captain Frazer, order your men to rout them out and assemble them in the square. I want every snivelling one."

A tavern keeper emerged from his hostelry with a mug of ale, which Red Fox accepted, and then shouted to the man to fetch out ale for the soldiers. The frightened fellow scuttled back to obey the order. Never had he been so terrified because by ill chance his private parlour housed Alan Breck and a number of his outlaws. Breck was there for a purpose. He had known of the intended visit of the tax-collector, and he was planning a daring coup that would enable him to recover the wealth Red Fox had filched from his victims.

David was herded together with the rest of the villagers and he kept close to the portly minister. He had sworn the oath of allegiance, but the brutal methods of this tax-collector and his soldiers made his blood boil with indignation.

"MacDougall, ten shillings tax." Red Fox leered at the minister when the portly one said he had no money. "Search him," came the order. "Don't hurt him!" shrilled David. "He's a minister—he's a man of God!" "Get out of the way! Get out of the way!" shouted Captain Frazer, raising his hand to slap the impertinent youth.

At that precise moment a shot rang out and Red Fox slumped to the ground in a heap.

David had been puzzled by the strange behaviour of a horseman whom he had observed watching everything from the shelter of a hedge. A rough, fierce sort of fellow and he had a gun. David had wondered whether he should tell Red Fox, but decided it would be wisest not to interfere. Then before he could do anything the gun had been swung up and Red Fox had fallen.

The bailiff, the tax-collector's assistant, bent over the still form and in horrified accents announced that his master was dead. Captain Frazer ordered his men to surround the village, search everyone for firearms, and shoot any that tried to escape.

"Captain, did you see who fired the shot?" the bailiff questioned.

"No, the boy distracted my attention," answered the captain.

"He was here for that purpose—an accomplice," decided the bailiff. "Get him!"

David had been edging away all this while, but when the soldiers at Frazer's order moved towards him he took to his heels in panic. From a window of the tavern Alan Breck had witnessed the whole incident. He surmised that the soldiers were after the boy because he had seen the face of the man who had killed Red Fox.

The boy was thinking that it was futile to try and escape when hands reached out and seized him. Before he could cry out a hand was clapped over his mouth, but he was able to turn his head. His heart missed a beat for he knew that this was Alan Breck. Things happened fast and furious after that. They whisked him round the back of a building and he was bundled into a saddle, someone held him firmly and then followed a night-mare ride. There were shouts and shots came very close, but Alan Breck and his followers made good their escape. They rode towards high ground, and in the dim light of dusk soon threw off the pursuit. Before a cabin in a quiet dell the rebels drew rein, and inside David saw again the man who had slain Red Fox.

"You blundering idiot, I told you there was to be no bloodshed!" raged Alan Breck.

David gazed curiously at the famous outlaw and had to admit that he was a handsome fellow. He would not understand fear. The killer was a shifty-eyed individual.

"I aimed as you told me," he whined.

"You were told to frighten the horses and start a runaway so I'd have a chance to get the money bag."

"I know, but is it my fault if Red Fox crossed my line of fire. I didn't mean to kill."

"I don't believe you!" blazed Alan Breck. "It was a chance to settle your score with Red Fox and you took it. Well, it's just what the Duke of Argyle has been waiting for—a chance to swing a few of us from the gibbet."

"But they've no proof—not a soul saw me."

"There was one who saw you, Jamie. This boy." The outlaw looked at the youngster curiously. "What is your name?"

"David—David Balfour," the boy said defiantly. "I know who you are"

"You blundering idiot, I told you there was to be no bloodshed!" raged Alan Breck.

—you're Alan Breck, a fugitive from the law. These men are rebels in a lost cause."

"Well, you're no coward, I'll grant you that," Breck seemed impressed. "Why do you say a lost cause?"

"Dominie Campbell—that's my schoolmaster—says so. He says we'll be better off under English rule. He says we'll have more trade and more food. Order's order, he says, and law's the law."

"You see, Alan, what he is!" harshly interrupted Jamie. "He'd blab, so we must fix him."

"You would have me murder a child?"

"It's him or me."

"There's only one thing to do, and that's to get you clear of the country," decided Breck, looking at the other grim rebels as he spoke. "Take him to Glasgow and put him on the first boat sailing for America."

"No, Alan, you can't send me away to a strange land!" Jamie cried hoarsely. "Everything I have is here—my house and my sheep and the girl I'm going to marry. Scotland's my home."

A shrewd, wiry fellow with a heavy jaw and fiery blue eyes stepped forward. Ian Douglas drew his chief to one side. Jamie was a coward, and if caught would talk. He advised Breck to find this girl and then ship them both out of the country. Other rebels called into the consultation agreed, and so Alan Breck decided to go to Glencoe to fetch Jeannie MacDonald.

"Take Jamie away, and keep close watch over him," Breck said at the end to Douglas. "I'll meet you at Tam Dale's in Glasgow."

All this while David had been moving step at a time towards the door, but it was Alan Breck who went after him when he did a run for it.

"Where do you think you're off to?" he demanded, holding the boy.

"Well, I was going to Edinburgh."

"I'd like to whisk you there on a broomstick, but I've no choice but to take you with me so that law-abiding tongue of yours won't wag," Alan Breck grinned at the lad. "We've got a long, hard ride before us."

Three in Hiding

ON the journey to Glencoe, David learned to admire Alan Breck, though he told the rebel that he did not in any way agree with his ideas. True, the English were being hard task-masters, but rebellion against their rule would not lessen the oppression of the Scots. They had many an argument, but at last they reached Glencoe.

Jean MacDonald was a slim, bright-eyed lass, and she listened gravely to all that Alan had to say. Her parents agreed that it would be best for the girl to go with the rebel leader to Glasgow, though they knew that parting with their daughter would be hard. As the Redcoats were always searching for Alan it was decided that Jean should pretend to be Alan's wife, and David their son. MacDonald had a horse and cart, and Jean was told to keep her shawl round her young features, as soldiers might be suspicious of David being her son. David was enjoying the adventure.

Thus did the MacKenzie family start off for Glasgow. Once or twice they were stopped but they managed to deceive the English patrols. And though David could have betrayed them he aided and abetted, because by now he had a great liking for Alan Breck, though still disagreeing with his views and opinions. There was moisture in David's eyes when his new friends bade him good-bye at the nearest point for Edinburgh.

September 17th, 1938.

"We take the high road and you take the low," Alan shook the small hand warmly. "And sorry I am to be parting with you, lad."

"You may be sure, sir, that I'll hold my tongue," the boy said gravely.

"Yes, I know you will," the rebel smiled. "And good luck with your uncle, the laird."

In a little hostelry a drunken man would persist in drinking with the MacKenzies, but when no one was looking he beckoned Alan to bend near to his mouth. It was Douglas.

"They traced you to the MacDonalds. They know about the cart. They'll be searching here before long. When you leave you must try some new disguises. Get away alone. I'll take her to Jamie in Glasgow myself."

"I promised the MacDonalds I'd give her into Jamie's arms myself or they'd not have let her go," answered Alan. "So she goes with me, and with no one else. We'll beat across the west on foot to Invercraig and then take a boat to Glasgow."

That night soldiers came to the inn, but they kept up their pretence of being man and wife and as there was no boy with them managed to bluff the soldiers. In the morning they took to the hills and headed for Invercraig.

The Castle of Balfour

AT last David came in sight of Edinburgh. He was puzzled by the peculiar strange looks and queer remarks passed when he asked for the Castle of Balfour. One old woman quite scared him, for she was like a witch.

"Now you know where it is keep clear of the place!" she shrieked. "Blood built that place, and blood stopped the building of it. If you must go, tell the laird that all the decent folk about here call down a curse on him and his house. Black be their fall!"

"The Laird will never see you," another man told him.

"Well, I think he will," retorted David. "He's my uncle."

The track leading to the castle was nothing but stones and boulders. Horses and carriages could not come this way, and it puzzled David. It was well after dark one stormy, thundery night that a flash of lightning revealed the castle perched upon a crag. Dark and sinister it looked, but David was not daunted. It was beginning to rain and that made David hurry because he had no desire to get soaked. He crossed over a bridge, the parapet of which was broken, and up a twisty, weedy path towards the castle, which seemed to tower over him like some sinister giant. He came to a heavy door with a small wicket. There was a rusty chain that he pulled and he thought that a distant tinkle sounded. He waited, and was about to give a second tug when the wicket slid back and he saw a thin, wizened face, a mass of untidy white hair and two staring eyes.

"Go away! Get away from here!" this spectre cried. "Who is it?"

"I've come with a letter for Mr. Ebenezer Balfour."

"A letter!" A hand came through the grill. "Well, hand it to me and be off with you."

"I'll not!" stoutly answered David. "I'll deliver it as I was told—to my uncle."

"Your uncle?" How balefully those eyes gleamed. "Just a minute." The eyes vanished and the grill closed. Then came the sound of chains and bolts being removed. The door swung open. A flash of lightning revealed the bent figure of a man in a shabby dressing-gown. He beckoned David, who stepped into a cold, stone-flagged hall. A candle was raised, and the spectro cackled. "Well, it's plain to see whose son you are. You're the spitting image of Alexander."

"You're Uncle Ebenezer?"

"Aye. Welcome—welcome, David, to Balfour Castle."

"Dominie Campbell sent me here and told me to give you this letter."

Ebenezer peered at the letter.

"So your father's dead then. Do you know what this is about?"

"You can see for yourself, sir, that the seals are unbroken." David was indignant.

"Aye, well, come along, David." Ebenezer closed the door. "I was just having supper."

Over the worst meal that David had ever tasted he learnt that his uncle lived in this vast castle by himself. There was dust and cobwebs everywhere and much of the furniture was broken. A small fire burnt in an open grate, and the old man protested when David wanted to put some more peat on the fire. Peat was two shillings a cauldron and mighty dear. The porridge for supper was sour and cold and the ale well watered. It was dawning on David that his father's brother was a miser. After a while Ebenezer remembered the letter and perused it.

"If there's anything in it that concerns me I'm anxious to know what it is, sir."

"Oh, no. It's just a letter written by your father many years ago—entrusting you to me."

The prospect of living with a miser in these bare walls made David shiver. It was also very cold in this vast dining-room. His uncle became immersed in the letter and that gave David a chance to walk round and explore. He picked up a dusty Bible from a table and turned to the fly-leaf.

"To Ebenezer Balfour, on his Fifth Birthday, from his elder brother—Alexander Balfour."

David closed the book and came back to warm his cold hands by the fire. Ebenezer put away the letter and got to his feet.

"Well, it's getting late, Davie, and I was forgetting the long journey you've had. So off to bed with you. You must be weary. I've got a fine room for you in the stair tower."

David went with his uncle to a narrow stone stairway. His uncle told him to go to the very top and then turn to the right.

"It's dark up there, sir. I'd be obliged to you for a candle."

"Nonsense, it'd be burning good money. Candles are sixpence a pound. Why, a brave lad like you shouldn't fear the dark. Go ahead with you." He pointed a thin, veined hand. "To the very top, mind you, then to the right. Good-night, David."

"Good-night, uncle."

Except for occasional flashes of lightning there was no light in this gloomy tower. The boy gave a cry as something brushed by his face. It was a horrible bat. Up and up he climbed, and it was a testing climb, because there was no rail and if he had slipped might have rolled into a void. He paused for breath, and then as the lightning flashed stepped forward. His foot was on the edge of a void. A stone slithered beneath his foot, but David managed to fling himself backwards. Down those stairs raced David, and Ebenezer gave a cry at sight of him.

Alan Breck kept off the attack with his trusty blade.

"You sent me up there to—to kill me!" David accused.

"I said turn to the left."

"You said right. And there was nothing there—I'd have fallen."

"You're crazy, boy!" cried the old miser. "Why should I want to kill you?"

"To keep the estate—to stop me from getting it!" David accused. "My father was the elder, else he must have given you that prayer book and written it before he was even born. As the elder brother the estate was his, and so now it's mine, isn't it?" He held out his hand. "Give me that letter."

David was strong and Ebenezer but a wizened wreck of a man. The boy had to take the letter by force.

"Dear Brother Ebenezer.—The bearer of this is my son, David, heir to the lands and estates of Balfour. By our agreement you will take him to lawyer Rankeillor who has my last will and testament."

The miser sank into a chair and began to snivel over his story. David's father and himself had both loved the same girl, and they had quarrelled bitterly. To settle the dispute Alexander married the girl and Ebenezer had taken the castle, but should there be an heir Ebenezer had to relinquish his rights on the death of Alexander.

"I'm telling you all this so that you'll understand," whined the old rogue. "I want you to understand, so you won't be too hard on an old man and turn him out when you've got the right."

When David went to bed he chose a room on the ground floor and he bolted and barred the door. In the morning his uncle produced a much better breakfast and fawned over him in a manner that made the boy sick. He was ready to give up the castle. He had been a wicked old man, and his only wish was that David would forgive him. After breakfast they set out for the city, and the old rascal drove along the coast as he had some important business at Leith.

David was interested in the shipping. His uncle left him to find a Captain Hoseason regarding a shipment of tobacco. An innocent-looking lad named Ransome invited David to come aboard one of the brigs and see what it was like below. David should not have been so trusting. He was flung into a locker room and the ship at once set sail. When the ship had been some hours at sea the captain, a burly, brutal, demon of a man, dragged David from the evil-smelling place.

"You'll keep your mouth shut. Davie, unless you wish to feed the fishes," threatened the captain. "Behave yourself and you shall be a cabin-boy." He cuffed David's ears. "Stand up and be a man. Better hurry up and get your sea-legs."

Thus was David kidnapped aboard the boat of one of the most rascally skippers of those restless times. A man who smuggled men and women, cut-throats and thieves and those whom the law sought. A pretty penny he charged them for passage money. Uncle Ebenezer had had to dip his hands in his money bags to rid himself of his cursed nephew.

The Escape from the Brig

DAVID BALFOUR was forced to do menial jobs about the brig. It was unwise to disobey because Captain Hoseason was a bully of the worst type and would flog a person on the least provocation. By curious chance this ship was in port when the two fugitives reached Invercraig.

Captain Hoseason tried to charge them sixty pounds for passage money, but this extortionate amount Alan got reduced to sixteen. This angered the rascally captain and he instructed his mate, Riach, to keep a sharp eye on the pair. His suspicions were increased when he entertained Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie to some hot rums in the saloon. It was David who served the drinks, and the rogue did not miss the look of amazement that passed between the boy and the two voyagers.

"I can't believe it of David," Alan said to Jean, when they had gone to their cabin. "Telling us those tall stories about his rich uncle the laird and that castle at Edinburgh, and all the time he's a cabin-boy on this foul brig."

"I'm sure he won't give you away," Jean answered. "He's foud of you, Alan."

"Well, I must be going. Jeannie," Alan said huskily.

"The great adventure is nearly over."

"It's just beginning. Glasgow—Jamie—and America."

"Beginning! To me it's the end," the girl cried. "I never promised Jamie really, and—well, I hadn't met you, Alan."

"Jamie's my clansman and I'm his leader," Alan spoke sternly. "I know I promised to take you to him in Glasgow, and that's what I'm doing. And I wish to heaven you were there now and married to him." Alan hastened out of the cabin.

Jean felt so worried about this tiff with Alan that after a few minutes she left her cabin and was making her way to the deck when she heard the captain's voice.

"Now, Davie lad, let's understand one another—man to man. If you don't tell me who that man is that calls himself MacKenzie I'll whack your head off. His name!" Silence, and then the sound of a blow. "Now you'll tell or you'll get it again."

Jean sped up to the deck. When a woman loves she can be unscrupulous. "We've got to get away, Alan," she cried, when she had found the outlaw. "Can't we take a skiff and make for the mainland? They know who you are."

(Continued on page 22)

September 17th, 1938.

A fearless young man ventures into a strange and hostile county after a trade pact, and there attempts to rescue a princess and free a country of a tyrant. Starring Gary Cooper

The Emperor's Daughter

IN the year 1274 the firm of Polo Brothers was the most important in Venice. Other merchants and importers envied their trade, but in this year the Polo Brothers came to a momentous decision. They had secured all the trade of the surrounding countries and realised that unless they opened up new channels the business would begin to go downhill. For this purpose Maffeo and Nicolo Polo detailed Mareo, Nicolo's son, to go as an Ambassador to China.

Marco was a tall, handsome young man, whom a great number of people regarded as a gambler and a waster, but he had been responsible for a great deal of the prosperity of his father's and uncle's firm. He had been sent on many such missions before and all had resulted in excellent trade pacts. It was arranged that he should be accompanied by Binguccio, an elderly, portly servant, who held up his hands in despair when he heard they were to travel across the world to China.

"The Orientals are a curious people, they do not trade as we do," Nicolo informed his son. "I want you back with agreements that will enable us to send our ships into the China seas. Now I have two things for you." He held up a sealed envelope. "One, a letter to Kublai Khan, the mightiest emperor on earth. That is where your journey ends—in his incomparable city of Peking. The other is more valuable." This time he held up a small bag. "Once I went away. My father gave this to me. He said—and I say to you—fill it with what you see on your way."

"But it will hold nothing but the smallest things," argued Marco.

"The smallest things have changed the world," Nicolo pointed to a map on an ebony table. "Here is your route. You sail first for the Port of Acre—a fortified city on the coast of Asia, now held by the Crusaders—from Acre, you go overland by caravan across the Arabian Desert into Persia—to Samarkand—over the boundless plains of Tartary, and so into the great Land of Cathay. To the incomparable city of Peking, where lives Kublai Khan, ruler of the earth and the sun, the moon and the stars." He held out his hands. "Farewell, my son, Marco Polo. God's benison go with you."

Many moons were to pass and many were their adventures before the day came when they sighted in the distance the gleaming walls of Peking. Many hundreds of miles had been travelled on foot and they were footsore and weary. Binguccio so tired that part of the way his master had to carry him on his back. So they drew nearer to Peking and they were quite unaware that from the towers above the gates the approach of the two strangers had been noted.

Marco had keen eyes for the procession of people heading for Peking, and he smiled when he learned that most of them came from the warm south with silks, spices, gold and jade, from India with precious stones, and from the north with sables and ermine. There was a wonderful lot of loot in China. They came to the city wall and paused to rest close to a house that had been built into the outer wall.

A little meek, wise and aged Chinaman sat before the door of this house reading to two small children, a boy and a girl.

"Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are the merciful—"

"For they shall obtain mercy," Marco spoke in eager tones. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God—"

"You know those words?" questioned the amazed Chinaman.

"Yes, I know them. Are you a Christian?"

"No, but I want my children to learn the truths of all the philosophers."

Thus did Marco meet Chen Tsu and make his first friend. The Chinaman courteously invited the two travellers to step across his threshold and share their inadequate meal. That brought life back to Binguccio, though he found the food and the instruments used to consume it a problem. The food was spaghetti and the instruments chopsticks. They met Chen Tsu's tired wife and his reverend mother. One strand of spaghetti Marco placed in the small bag his father had given him.

Marco explained his mission, and the Chinaman looked grave.

"I advise you to be very careful when you enter the palace, Marco Polo. Kublai Khan is a good man and a just man. But he is surrounded by advisers who have little respect for the sanctity of human life. There have been rumours—" He paused nervously.

"Of what, Chen Tsu?"

"We have a proverb here: 'Too much gossip is the surest form of suicide.' So when you meet the emperor's Minister of State, a Saracen, named Ahmed, make every effort to convince him that you are no more than a friendly gentleman who wishes to see the world without treading on anyone's toes."

Suddenly there was a loud bang, and with a cry Binguccio leapt in the air. The children screamed delightedly. For the first time Marco Polo heard about a fire-cracker. Marco inquired about this strange invention and was taken into a back room that was not unlike a modern laboratory.

Chen Tsu explained that in his humble way he was a chemist. A combination of carbon and saltpetre, when touched with fire, puffed up harmlessly, but when contained in a case so that the vapours could not easily escape, it would burst with great violence. He was able to eke out his humble existence by making these fire-crackers for illumination of holidays and festivals. Often the emperor commissioned him to make thousands of boxes for ceremonial occasions.

"I should think it might be a valuable weapon of war," Marco said thoughtfully.

They bade farewell to the kindly Chinaman and promised to return. At the city gates they were stopped by the guards, but when they heard it was Marco Polo, of Venice, the way was open at once. They had heard of his remarkable progress. Messengers bring immediate news of any stranger who sets foot in China, and Marco was surprised when the guard pointed upwards at an eagle. A canister was attached to the eagle's stomach. An officer appeared and ordered that Marco Polo and Binguccio be conducted to their quarters and their every wish gratified.

A bath, new clothes and a night's rest made a new man of Marco, though Binguccio complained bitterly of his blistered feet. In the morning Marco, eager to see everything, went for a stroll round the palace. Marco noted the splendid uniforms of the soldiers, the marvellous carvings, the marble statues and the general air of wealth. Eventually he found his way into the palace grounds.

In the throne-room the emperor was enjoying a game of soldiers. A huge mosaic map of the Tartar Empire had been built into the floor, and model Chinese soldiers, like hundreds of chessmen, were occupying strategic points. A gold rake helped to move and control pieces. The emperor was very fat and very jovial, and he stroked his chin and his long whiskers as he watched his Minister of State. Ahmed was tall, sleek, dark of skin and his eyes had a strange way of half-closing. He was demonstrating that with ten thousand ships and a million soldiers the conquest of Japan should be finished in a few weeks. But the emperor shook his head. That would mean taking all the armies from the West, and they were necessary there for the rebellion in Kaidu's province.

"We need no army to deal with Kaidu," answered the crafty adviser. "His Tartar barbarians can out-fight our best generals." His eyes half closed and his lips became a thin line. "No! The greatest weapon we can use against him is—deception. Subtle poison!"

Tiring of the game, the emperor asked querulously who wished to see him to-day. A bevy of young and beautiful women to be chosen as attendants at his court; the Persian Ambassador and a stranger from the City of Venice in the Empire of Rome. He decided to see the ambassador first and the young women last. The ambassador, after much bowing and scraping, announced that his royal master wished to know when the emperor would dispatch to him the lady of his choice, his affianced bride, his future queen—the Princess Kukachin, the emperor's beautiful daughter.

Kublai Khan loved his daughter and he looked miserably at his Minister.

"The time has come when she must fulfil the marriage contract negotiated when—"

"Yes, I remember," interrupted the emperor. "But I hadn't noticed the passage of years and that she had ceased to be a child." He turned to the ambassador. "You may send word to your royal master that the Princess Kukachin will embark for Persia at the seventh moon."

But when messengers were sent to find Marco Polo they found that the Venetian was missing. Binguccio was informed that his master must be found at once. His master was talking with Princess Kukachin.

It had happened this way. Marco Polo had rested against a tree to admire the scenery and the beautiful gardens. The princess, with her charming hand-maiden, Visakha, was practising archery. Only such people as the emperor and the Minister were allowed in these grounds, so that Kukachin may be forgiven for shooting off arrows at random. Marco ducked behind a tree, and it was as well he did, for the arrow would have pierced his head. When the Princess tried to pull the arrow out of the tree a strong hand assisted her. She stared into the bold, admiring eyes of the Venetian. He did not grovel at her feet or mumble words of praise, but just held her hand till she snatched it away and demanded to know who he was.

"Marco Polo, from Venice."

"Venice? Is that one of our provinces?" asked the girl, whom Marco thought the loveliest creature he had ever known—and he had known a good many.

"No, it's a long way off. The journey took me years. It was a terrible journey, too; full of perils and hardships that would have defeated any but the bravest, strongest man."

"You think you're rather splendid, don't you?"

"Oh, no, that isn't my thought," he laughed lightly. "It's just what I've been told."

An amazed Chamberlain appeared to stammer out that his presence was sought after by the Great Khan. Marco smiled at the princess and raised his hand in a farewell salutation. He promised to try to see her again. The princess was speechless at this impertinence.

Marco Polo went to the throne and knelt before the emperor and was bade to rise. He explained that he had come to Cathay because he had heard of the wonders of the country. It was merely a trip—for educational purposes. Marco could see that nothing would be gained by mentioning a trade pact with this hawk-eyed Ahmed having the emperor's ear. It was a shock to him when the beautiful girl he had met swept graciously into the throne-room and was introduced by the emperor as his only daughter, the Princess Kukachin.

Maffeo and Nicolo Polo detailed Marco, Nicolo's son, to go as an Ambassador to China

"Marco Polo comes to us from Venice," stated the emperor.

"Yes, I know all about Marco Polo," answered the princess. "He has told me everything about himself."

The eyes of Ahmed narrowed. The emperor asked Marco to help him choose the most beautiful attendants for his court, and Marco did this by asking all the girls, "How many teeth has a snapping turtle?" Those who made wild guesses and those that answered "None" Marco rejected, but those who said they did not know he chose because, to his way of thinking, it proved them both honest and reasonable. The emperor was so grateful that he asked Marco if any lady of his court captured his fancy. Marco could not help glancing at the princess, and Ahmed's hand went to his sword.

"Ahmed," haughtily spoke the Daughter of Heaven, "have you any traitors or spies on hand for punishment? If you have, I suggest you take this Venetian and let him see how you dispose of them."

It was a task that gave Ahmed great pleasure. Marco Polo and Binguccio saw sights that day that made them shudder—sights that even the haughty princess knew little about. Ahmed had a portion of the palace set aside for his own use. He conducted them to a door, which, when it swung open, revealed a fifty-foot void. Ahmed struck a gong and immediately a covered drawbridge was lowered from the nearby building. They entered that part of the palace owned by Ahmed. They saw vultures in cages and saw skeletons that had once been prisoners, whom they had stripped of all flesh. They saw wild and ferocious animals, and eventually two of Ahmed's servants, a scared ruffian named Toctai and an ugly fellow named Bayan, brought in a wretched fellow who was an officer in the army of Kaidu, the rebel. He had been caught in the palace as a spy. Marco could not suppress a shudder as the man was thrown to the wild beasts.

"You are very observant, Marco Polo," sneered Ahmed. "That is an admirable quality. It will save you from the danger of casting your eyes in the wrong direction."

"And just what does that refer to?" Marco demanded.

"I leave that to your intelligence," mocked this sinister rogue.

Treachery that Failed

AT a suitable moment Marco Polo discreetly mentioned to the emperor that a trade pact with the firm of Polo Brothers might be a good thing for both countries. The emperor promised to consider the matter, and in the meantime Marco was to make himself at home in the palace. Marco saw the princess one day from his window. She was sitting by an ornamental pond, feeding the carp, and she was rather pleased when the Venetian appeared.

"Strangers are not supposed to come into these gardens uninvited," she informed him.

Marco just smiled and, somehow, the princess smiled back. And so they met every day in the gardens. He learned that when in her cradle she had become engaged to the King of Persia. She was pleased at the idea of marrying such a great man and becoming Queen of Persia. He heard the happy event was to take place at the seventh moon. She showed him a white stone image and told him it was the shrine of the Moon Goddess. All maidens prayed to her that they would find a lover who is faithful, gallant and strong."

"And you're going to marry the King of Persia. You don't love him."

"He will put love in my heart."

Marco decided that he must give up seeing the princess because he was falling in love with her, so one day he explained his feelings as best he could and asked as a favour that he might say farewell with a kiss. But kissing was not an Eastern practice—they rubbed noses. Marco Polo had to teach Kukachin the Western practice of kissing, and after that the princess was quite sure she did not want to be the Queen of Persia.

Ahmed was seated in his quarters discussing with Toctai the rebellion in Kaidu's province. It must be put a stop to before the emperor learnt the truth about the taxes Ahmed had been collecting extortionately. For that purpose Toctai and Bayan must disguise themselves as Tartar tribesmen, join Kaidu's army and spread discontent in the army by making the soldiers believe that Kaidu was the one stealing their tax money. Later they were to kill Kaidu. The rebellion would be broken because his army would break up into warring factions. Bayan entered the room to report that he had seen the princess in the arms of the Venetian, and that made Ahmed draw Marco Polo into this plot.

The Minister told the emperor that Marco Polo was seeing too much of the princess, and that as his Majesty was going on an expedition to Japan it would be as well if Marco Polo were elsewhere. Why not send this clever young man into Kaidu's camp? He would be above suspicion and might even gain Kaidu's friendship. Then he could work with the secret agents and plot Kaidu's downfall. The emperor agreed and sent for Marco Polo. The latter did not at all relish the task.

"It is very possible that, upon your return, you will be very much nearer your coveted trade agreements," hinted the emperor.

"When would I start?" Marco asked.

"At once!" cried Ahmed, his eyes gleaming balefully. "You will be escorted by some of our most reliable men."

Marco returned to his quarters and ordered Binguccio to pack their few possessions, then in the dusk the Venetian wandered into the gardens where he had first met Kukachin. An arrow quivered in the same tree, and there was a silken cord attached to it. He followed that cord and it led to the princess' apartments. She was on the terrace to greet him and she was so frightened.

"You must not go to the West, to Kaidu's province." She clung to him. "Ahmed is trying to get rid of you. He'll never let you come back alive. No one will ever know what became of you."

"He could do it here as easily as anywhere else," answered Marco, and held her close. "But if I go on this expedition, and be of some value to the emperor, then—"

"Then what, Marco?"

"Then perhaps the Moon Goddess might tell you that you don't have to travel all the way to Persia to find a husband."

"She doesn't have to tell me—I know."

"My humblest apologies, daughter of Heaven, for this intrusion," came the smooth tones of Ahmed, as he appeared on the terrace. "But I have come to tell Marco Polo horses are ready and it is advisable for him to start out with all possible speed."

"Your Highness, we may never meet again, so I beg leave to say farewell in the fashion of my native land." Marco pressed his lips gallantly to those of the princess and then said in a whisper that only Kukachin heard: "Send word if you need me."

In the narrow pass of Nung Po the cavalcade halted. There were horsemen in front of Marco and Binguccio and horsemen in the rear. At a signal from the lieutenant in command the horsemen drew their swords and rushed towards the two Venetians. Marco and Binguccio managed to drive their horses up an incline and over a ridge, but the little fat man was flung from his horse as it reared up in the air. The horsemen paid no heed but went after Marco. The Venetian slid down the other side, could not stop, and horse and rider slid over a precipice.

Binguccio had darted among the rocks when the horsemen returned and they did not bother to look for him—the chief man was dead, or so they thought. Marco landed on a ledge, rolled off it, and then over and over down a steep incline. Much battered, he came to rest in a bush by a narrow stream. It took Marco an hour or more to climb the cliff face and get back to the trail. There was no sign of the horsemen or his companion.

While way back in Pekin Princess Kukachin said good-bye to her father. Ahmed smiled. The China Sea was a powerful adversary, and one good typhoon might end the glorious reign of Kublai Khan. The princess was afraid because she saw the strange gleam in Ahmed's eyes and wondered if he were plotting treachery against her father.

Kaidu, the Rebel

MARCO bought a horse from a farmer for a gold piece, and after a vain search for Binguccio, went on his way. What luck when he sighted a staggering figure ahead. The servant was so frightened when he heard someone shout that he ran for dear life, toppled over a ledge and landed on his face in a muddy pond.

Very much the worse for wear, the two continued on their way. Marco now decided to return to Pekin to have a few words with Ahmed, but this plan was upset some days later by an encounter with a Tartar outpost. These long-haired, bearded men captured the two weary men, who were unable to make any sort of fight, and they were conducted to the camp of Kaidu, the rebel.

Kaidu was a powerfully built man, whose face was not as ruthless as one might have expected, but the big jaw was stubborn. He was a much worried man. There was much discontent among his men, the forces of Kublai Khan seemed to have vanished, so there was no one to fight, and he was cursed with a wife. Nazama was very beautiful, very loving, very jealous and very dictatorial. She was the one person of whom Kaidu was thoroughly scared. An officer had just reported another thousand desertions, a mutiny in the seventh corps, and, worse still, food was falling short.

"Kill the dirty spies! Death to Kublai Khan! Death to Ahmed! Death of a thousand cuts to these spies."

These shouts brought Kaidu out of his tent—Marco and Binguccio, with a

(Continued on page 25)

A drama of gangster rule, and of a young man and a girl who were involved with a criminal. Starring Chester Morris

"LAW OF THE UNDERWORLD"

Hold-up

PACING the dark paths of Central Park, completely oblivious to her surroundings, Annabelle Porter squeezed her tall young fiancé's arm. "Mrs. Brown," she murmured happily. "Mrs. Thomas Brown—" Her poorly paid work in a huge department store hadn't taken the freshness and sweetness from Annabelle's face.

Tommy Brown thought she looked particularly beautiful in the dimness, with her eyes shining like stars.

"Eleven hours and twenty-three minutes, then you won't be Annabelle Porter any more."

Suddenly she stopped.

"Tommy, I just thought, maybe when you took out your handkerchief on the subway—"

He grinned, taking a roll of bills from his pocket.

"One hundred and thirty-six dollars. We spent four at Coney—" His voice changed as two dark, menacing figures stood in their path. "What do you want?"

The older man, with a pale, lined face and glittering, snake-like eyes, said in a harsh voice:

"Could you spare a poor man a hundred and thirty-six bucks for a cup of coffee?"

Tommy looked down. The man's hand was in his overcoat pocket; something jutted significantly. The other man, round of face, similarly menaced the young people.

"Tommy," cried Annabelle, "call a policeman!"

"Good," grated Rocky Mosby, "he can call for your ambulance."

"Oh, give us a break," Tommy pleaded, "we're getting married on that money!"

"Maybe the girl is marrying you for the dough," Rocky sneered. "Now you can find out."

Tommy's face flamed, then whitened. There was something horrible about the glare of the hold-up man—ruthlessness and cold ferocity were in it.

A policeman passed, swinging his stick, eyeing them curiously. Tommy's mouth opened, then shut, as Rocky made a movement with his hidden hand. "I'll be lighting a cigarette in case he looks back," the crook muttered. "Get the dough."

"Say, if the boss ever finds out about this—" grunted his friend Bill.

"He won't," said Rocky coldly.

Bill's hands went to Tommy's pocket. The young man glared helplessly at the evil-faced Rocky.

"Hey, wait a minute. I know you! I've seen you around the apartment house where I work!"

Rocky started, then whispered:

"Listen, kid, maybe you do know me—but you wouldn't want to be a widower before you got married."

"Why don't you fight like a man?" snarled Tommy.

"How?" murmured Bill. "Like this?" His fist came up with shattering force. Tommy, unprepared for the blow, went back, thudding on the hard pathway, and before he could get up the two hold-up men melted away in the darkness.

Gene Fillmore's clean-cut, hawk-like face bore a slight smile as he was led into the apartment where his gang had gathered. He greeted Batsy, the quaint, somewhat dull-witted crook who opened the door, and his eyes shot to the paper they had been reading.

A front-page splash announced the appointment of Warren Rogers as the new District Attorney, who intended to wipe the city clean of racketeers. They had been chortling over it, bandying witticisms about the young lawyer.

Affectionately the gang-leader greeted "Dot" Palmer, the blonde night-club singer to whom he was engaged. He was unconscious of the hate in Rocky Mosby's eyes, for he had no suspicion that Dorothy really loved Rocky and was just playing a double game with him for all she could get out of him.

"What's this I hear about a new D.A.?" demanded Rocky, his heavy lids masking his glittering eyes.

"I just left him," grinned Gene calmly.

"What—what? Say that again," chorused the amazed gangsters round the table.

"I just left Warren Rogers' apartment," said Gene coolly, seating himself at the head of the table. He had just dined with Rogers, for they were friends in the social round, where Gene posed as a good-natured playboy. Over a game of billiards he had heard Warren announcing his plans. Gene had even been asked to give up his polo and chase crooks instead. But since he happened to be one of the hidden men at the top of the gangs whom his unsuspecting friend was out to catch, he had declined politely.

The gang jeered derisively at the simplicity of Warren Rogers.

"Well, you're wrong, boys," said Gene crisply. "He's plenty smart, and plenty tough. But we're going to be just a little tougher. If we make our wrong move—"

"Is that all you wanted to tell us?" drawled a sleek-haired young gangster.

"Why, no, Frankie. As a matter of fact, I asked the boys to meet me here to see if you could dispose of a hundred and fifty thousand dollars' worth of jewellery."

Rocky lit a cigarette.

"I know a warehouse we can knock over, with a million bucks in furs."

"Rocky, our next job will be Morto us Fifth Avenue jewellery store!" snapped Gene Fillmore.

"But I've got this fur thing all lined up! Get rid of the watchman and the whole place is ours."

"Rocky, we're not doing any jobs requiring butchering. I'm running this like a big business, with a minimum of risk. You're not thugs any more—you're gentlemen."

Everybody sensed the undercurrent of hostility between the pair. Gene believed in planning, pitting his wits against the forces of Law and Order. Rocky, jealous of him both as Dot's fiancé and leader of the gang, was a killer. He believed in force, the rule of the gun. Harshly he sneered: "Gene, you'd look real nice in a scout suit."

"That'll be enough from you!" snapped Gene. "We'll meet day after to-morrow and make all the arrangements."

"All right," Rocky growled. "You're the boss. But why do you have to mix with a cocktail and polo crowd all night long? Ain't we boys good enough for you?"

"Well, I'll tell you what we'll do, Rocky," said Gene sarcastically. "I'll loaf around here all night, and you can mingle in Society and find out where the big money is. The best people will welcome you with open handcuffs."

Rocky's eyes flickered murder as Gene bade them all good-night. He was having a final word with Dot when the door crashed open. Tommy and Annabelle burst in. Tommy's face was tense, frowning; hers slightly apprehensive.

"Stick 'em up, all of you!" he snapped, his hand gripping something in his coat pocket.

"All right, boys," smiled Gene, raising his hands. "Put 'em up—no rough stuff."

"Up on your feet! Line up here!" growled Tommy. "Now turn around." To Annabelle: "Frick 'em!"

"What's that?" she stammered.

"Go through their rear pockets and look for guns!"

Not knowing whether to laugh or groan, the gangsters allowed Annabelle to take their artillery. She shrank a little when she came to Rocky.

"Side pocket," he grinned.

"All right," growled Tommy. "Take his money and give me a hundred and thirty-six dollars."

Gene's eyebrows rose.

"You'll pardon me for butting into a private affair, but why a hundred and thirty-six dollars?"

"Well, you see," said Annabelle breathlessly, "we were going to be married to-morrow, and these two men held us up and took it all. That's how much it was."

"Stop talking," said Tommy brusquely. "Give me the money."

Then the lights snapped out as Gene took advantage of the lad's temporary slackening of watchfulness. Gene grabbed Annabelle. Rocky pinioned the struggling Tommy, and when the lights went up again the discomfited pair found themselves surrounded by gangsters. Frank exclaimed:

"Why, I know this boy! He works here."

"Call the police," snarled Rocky Mosby.

"Wait a minute, Frankie," snapped Gene.

"You can turn me in," muttered Tommy, "but let her go. She didn't have anything to do with it."

"I did!" Annabelle exclaimed. "If you turn him over to the police, I go, too!"

"Give me the money, kid," said Gene, not unkindly. "You know, you've both committed a serious offence. Why, you can get fifteen years in prison for this! You'd be old when you got out. Of course, it's my duty to turn you over—" He tailed off thoughtfully, and Annabelle shuddered. Fifteen years in prison!

"We're not criminals," Tommy snapped. "We're just trying to get our own money back!"

Annabelle looked accusingly at the sneering Rocky.

"That man said he'd kill us if we told the police!"

Bill, shuffling his feet, growled uneasily:

"Aw, chief, let's turn 'em over to the cops."

"I'll handle this," grated Gene Fillmore. "Right now, I want to hear more about that stick-up."

"Chief, you ain't gonna believe those kids, are you? We never stuck up nobody!"

Rocky shouldered forward, came close to Gene and stared into his eyes.

"Wait a minute! I'm not afraid of you, Gene. Sure we stuck up the kids. You've got this bunch buffaloed into letting you keep all the dough, and give us coffee and cake money. Well, I needed more, and the kids were handy."

Gene eyed him coldly.

"I keep you all on an allowance so you won't splurge all over town and give yourselves away. How many times have I told you to lay off small fry? Why take the chance for a couple of bucks?"

"Chances are in my line," growled Rocky.

"You're all a lot of crooks!" Tommy burst out.

"He's positively psychic," drawled Dorothy.

"Well, never mind what we are, young fellow," said Gene easily. "You've just stuck up a private apartment."

"Yeah," nodded Batsy wisely, "they got laws against that."

Gene grinned.

"But maybe you can help me. Do you want to do me a little favour, or would you rather go to gaol? It's up to you, kid."

Tommy and Annabelle, now thoroughly scared by the enormity of their act, exchanged glances.

"We'll do anything," muttered Tommy, "if you'll let us go."

Gene looked at the girl; wide-eyed, she nodded miserably.

"All right, it's a deal! We'll talk about the favour later, but remember, if you break your word, it's gaol for both of you."

Miserably they nodded before his stern gaze. Followed by the good-humoured jeers of the mohsmen, Gene took them to his own home to stay. He intended to give them a good time, gain their confidence, for he had an idea they would fit in with his plans.

Gunplay

THOUGH Tommy was still suspicious of Gene's intentions, Annabelle, overwhelmed by the luxury of the gang-leader's apartment, set out to enjoy herself. Despite his antagonism, the young man began to like the racketeer, who was of a different stamp from his gang.

When Gene took them to the Club Sultan, in which he had an interest, Annabelle forgot her troubles, for the night-club life was new and fascinating to her. Gene left them at a privileged table while he went to an inner office for a gang meeting, and got down to business.

"Here is an enlargement of a candid camera shot of Morton's store. I want you to memorise every detail of it. This is Edward Larkin, the salesman. Morton is an old man, you won't have any trouble with him. But keep an eye on Larkin. The store opens at nine in the morning, but they seldom have any customers before nine-ten. If anybody should come in—you know, line them up against the back wall."

That was Gene's way—scientific, with every detail planned out in advance for a minimum of risk—but Rocky was impatient.

"We're wasting time," he sneered. "I can get in, and I can get out."

"Sure you can, Rocky. We all know that. But my way, you see, nobody gets hurt. Personally I prefer gaol for robbery rather than the chair for murder. How about you boys?"

They nodded agreement. Rocky's lips curled as Gene continued.

"Now, you all know what to do, and the exact time. Memorise your instructions and then destroy them."

He told them that at two minutes after nine Johnny and Bill were to start a fight outside the store—a real one. He made them all set their watches by his, so that there would be no hitch in the timetable.

"How about protection?" asked Rocky. "Who's carrying the machine-guns?"

"There won't be any machine-guns. If you pull a trigger on this job, Rocky, you won't rate a cent out of it."

"That's easy to say. Nobody will be shooting at you. I'm the one that's pulling this job. All you do is sit behind a desk."

"And give the orders," smiled Gene. "Maybe to those kids!" snarled Rocky. "But not to me!"

"Rocky, you're getting annoying!" Gene laughed coldly. "Speaking of those kids, go and get them."

Rocky turned to one of the others.

"Call the kids."

"I said you get them!" snapped Gene.

For a moment there was an eclectic silence as Rocky's pale face glared murder. Then he swaggered to the door. Everybody relaxed. Gene was the coolest man there.

Tommy and the girl were nervous when they came to the office. Gene tried to put them at their ease.

"It's all right, Annabelle, relax. Now I asked you kids to do me a little favour, you remember? That's why I bought you some new clothes so you could go into an expensive jewellery shop to-morrow and not look out of place."

"We're not going to do anything crooked!" declared Tommy.

"Now wait a minute, Tommy, wait a minute. All I want you to do is to ask to see some diamond rings. You won't like anything you see, and the salesman will put several trays on the counter."

"What for?" demanded Tommy suspiciously.

"The two thousand dollars I promised you," said Gene easily.

"Yeah, but we don't—"

Gene's voice hardened.

"And to keep you both from going to gaol for sticking us up at Frank's place." He turned his back on them. Tommy's arm went round Annabelle's slim shoulders. Misery was written on their faces, for despite Gene's friendliness, there was no doubt that they were caught in the toils of gangsterdom.

They had no means of knowing that it was Gene's intention only to use them for this simple job—then they could go their ways, for he didn't want them to get mixed up with the gang. There was no danger to them as he had worked it out. But next morning they were so nervous when they entered the jewellery store at the appointed time—nine o'clock—that they thought Larkin would see something was wrong. However, he put their nervousness down to shyness, and brought out tray after tray of rings, laying them on the counter.

Annabelle was admiring some expensive rings when an uproar started outside. Loud voices quarrelled discordantly, then came the thud of blows. Quickly a crowd collected outside the windows as Billy and Johnny slammed away at each other. The rest of the gang mixed with the spectators.

While Larkin's attention was distracted, Tommy and Annabelle seized the opportunity to hurry out. They edged round the milling crowd as a policeman forced his way through. Larkin was just putting the rings away when a cold voice snapped:

"Reach!"

Covering him was Rocky, with Batsy and Eddie, grim-faced, behind him. Old Morton, standing near his salesman, glared in horror. A hold-up! While the policeman was still struggling to get to the fighters, the crack of a shot sounded from inside. Rocky, Batsy and Eddie dashed out, hurling startled people aside. They leaped into their car. Out rushed Larkin, yelling distractedly:

"Help, stop those men! They shot Mr. Morton!"

Another shot barked as the car screamed away from the sidewalk. Larkin staggered, clasping his shoulder, and collapsed against the doorway as another policeman came running to his assistance.

At nine-seven Gene Fillmore grinned as he looked at his watch. All over by now, and without any trouble. He grinned at Dorothy, who was still recovering from the surprise he had given her when he announced his intention of making this the last job and arranging for their marriage right away. She hadn't expected this, and wondered what the jealous Rocky would have to say.

Then the radio announcer's voice began barking a news flash.

"Armed bandits broke in Morton's Fifth Avenue store and escaped with over a hundred thousand dollars' worth of jewellery. When Mr. Morton lowered his hands slightly one of the bandits shot him in cold blood. Edward Larkin, the salesman, ran out to summon aid and was also shot at by the escaping thugs. His condition is reported critical."

Savagely Gene's voice ripped through the sudden silence.

"Rocky! Wait here for me, Dorothy.

We may have to move fast!"

Tommy and Annabelle had been waiting outside the Club Sultan in a panic for a long time when Gene's roadster screeched to a standstill beside them. Annabelle gripped his arm imploringly.

"We never wanted to get mixed up in this robbery and killing."

"All right," Gene snapped. "Come on inside. I'll attend to you later."

He raced into the deserted café, a place of dim shadows, with chairs piled on tables after the cleaners. With the youngsters behind him he came to a full stop as a soft voice drawled:

"Hallo, Gene!"

Sitting at one of the tables in the shadows with a gun resting before him, was Rocky Mosby. The killer had been tipped off by Dorothy that Gene was on the warpath. He had come prepared for a show-down in the only way he understood—with a gun in his hand.

With the bar at their backs they faced him as he rose, smiling mirthlessly.

"Get out of the way, kids! You're in the business now, like the rest of us. So you can watch me elect a new boss."

"Still ambitious, Rocky?" said Gene mockingly.

"Yeah, I like to tell people what to do. I hate to be told. I tried to tell you you needed a gun in this business. People respect you more." All the time he was watching Gene like a snake, ignoring the others.

"All right," grunted Gene. "Go ahead and shoot. Get it over with."

Rocky smiled.

"I like to see you squirm first. I've got something to say that might make you wriggle a little."

Gene grinned offensively.

"Been stealing cheese out of my ice-box, Rocky?"

"Funny guy, ain't you? Well, have a good laugh. While you were mixing with the best people I was taking out Dorothy. I suspect she loves me."

Only by a narrowing of his eyes did Gene Fillmore show his amazement.

"You're a liar!"

"You can check on us," snarled Rocky, raising his gun. "when you come back to haunt me!"

His hand contracted on the trigger, but with one amazing leap Tommy came at him, swung a lusty arm and sent the gun flying from the killer's hand. Snarling, Rocky bent swiftly to pick it up. Gene was on him instantly, smashing a blow to the jaw that sent him flying in a heap and picking up the gun himself.

"Thanks, kid," he drawled. "All right, stay where you are, Rocky."

Warily, Rocky began to rise.

"All right, boss, now it's your chance to shoot. But you won't. I ain't afraid of you. You never scared me. That's why I took your girl away. That's why the gang wants me to tell them what to do!"

Unwavering, Gene covered him with his own gun and snapped:

"Tommy, take Annabelle into the back room."

"Stick around, kids," Rocky invited. "I'm going to take that gun away from him in a minute."

"Rocky," Gene drawled, "you've

"Stick 'em up, all of you!" he snapped, his hand gripping something in his coat pocket.

been getting out of line lately. You're becoming a liability to the gang. I got a letter from Mrs. Winters this morning."

"So what?" grated Rocky, crouching watchfully.

"She called us a bunch of yellow rats," came Gene's cold, measured tones. "When her husband went to prison we promised to keep her going and send her money. She never got a cent. What did you do with the money, Rocky? The boys would like to know about that."

"Yeah?" scowled Rocky. "But you ain't gonna tell them. You ain't gonna tell them nothing. Why don't you shoot, you big shot?" He started towards Gene.

"Stay where you are, Rocky."

"You don't know how to fire a gun, do you, Gene?" the killer jeered.

"Well, I'll show you."

Like a striking snake his hand flashed to a shoulder-holster. The weapon was half out when Gene's gun crashed. Face contorted, Rocky coughed and crumpled to the floor. A killer even in death, he fired spasmodically as he rolled in agony, his automatic ripping shots at Gene. Bottles smashed to the floor, their contents splashing over Gene as he ducked. In a haze of gun-smoke he stared down at Rocky as the twitching body gradually became still.

Gang Law

"GENE, we're going to give you a fair trial. If the boys decide against you, I guess you know what that means."

A grim gathering faced Gene Fillmore that night. Dorothy Palmer sat alone, her eyes smouldering with hate. It was the singer who had come first on the scene of the shooting, and knelt, sobbing, by the body of Rocky Mosby.

"He was a rat," said Gene coldly when she accused him of shooting the killer in cold blood. "He tried to kill me."

Venomously she stared at him.

"The boys will get you for this."

Dazedly he stared at her.

"Then everything he said about you two was true, huh?"

"Figure it out for yourself!" she snarled, and when the gang came rushing to the scene she accused him point-blank in the face of the evidence of Tommy and Annabelle, whom nobody would believe.

Gene stared round at the grim faces of the men who were to try him. The law of the underworld decreed that a man accused of killing a fellow gang member should himself be the object of gang vengeance. It was obvious that although one or two were trying to be fair-minded, the general opinion was hostile to him. Dorothy had worked well on their minds.

Knowing his life depended on a hair-trigger, Gene had tried to square things with Tommy and Annabelle. They wouldn't accept the two thousand dollars he offered them, wishing only to be free of this atmosphere of robbery and murder. Annabelle, who admired his many good qualities, was still dazed at the discovery that he, too, could be a killer. Uncomfortable before her wonderment, he gave them their hundred and thirty-six dollars.

"Now beat it while you're still carrying it. You don't belong around this place."

As Tommy pulled her away, Annabelle exclaimed:

"But couldn't you run away before they try you?"

Gene laughed grimly.

"Sure, I'll tell you what I'll do."

September 17th, 1938.

I'll hide in my attic. That'll fool them. Go on, get out, will you, and stop worrying about me."

Now alone—for Batsy, who was on his side, was out on an errand—he faced his accusers and claimed the right to talk.

"What for?" snapped Dorothy. "You killed him, didn't you?"

"Look at yourselves, boys," said Gene. "What were you before I took over? Just a bunch of petty thieves. Do you fellows realise that this past year our receipts were over a million dollars?"

"All I got was fifteen grand," Johnny complained.

"Well, you're not the whole organisation. You're simply a wheel in the machinery."

"Yeah? Well, I'm a pretty big wheel."

"Besides that," said Gene, "I pay out a lot of money for your protection."

"May I inquire, Mr. Fillmore," said Dorothy acidly, "what all this has got to do with your shooting of Rocky?"

"It has this to do with it," he said curtly. "Under my leadership you've all kept out of trouble. If I was right in one thing, I've been right in another. Rocky disobeyed my orders, and he ended up by pulling a gun on me. Fortunately, I beat him to it."

"I was there," said Dorothy implacably. "He shot Rocky down cold. Didn't give him a chance."

NEXT WEEK'S COMPLETE FILM DRAMAS!

DON TERRY

"SQUADRON OF HONOUR"

As the result of a diabolical frame-up the National Commander of the American Legion is arrested for murder; and Dan Blaine, a young District Attorney, sets out to establish his innocence—and enlists the aid of a hundred thousand Legionnaires to capture the actual killer. A novel drama

"SWISS MISS"

Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy go to Switzerland to sell mousetraps, but from the lack of ready cash are compelled to take jobs as waiters, and, through a famous composer and his mischievous wife, are drawn into an hilarious adventure

Also

Another episode of the fighting serial:

"THE PAINTED STALLION"

Starring Ray Corrigan

Bill glanced at Eddie and rose. "Well, that's enough for me, boys. Let's get going." And Gene knew that the verdict was against him.

Johnny protested. "Why can't we just kick him out of the gang and let it go at that?"

"He didn't give Rocky a chance!" snapped Dorothy.

"Well, frankly," grinned Gene, "I'm against it. But I guess I'm outvoted." With a bitter sting in his voice he added: "Well, gentlemen, after looking over this gang, all I can say is that New York is reasonably safe to-night. I'm not going to crawl. It is clear to me that I am the difference here between a well-regulated business organisation and a gang of thugs."

"We got along all right before you came," snarled Bill, and Dorothy Palmer smiled evilly: "And we'll get along all right after you're gone, won't we, boys?"

Johnny, Frankie, Eddie and Larry nodded grimly, and Gene read his doom in their faces. He shrugged, and they were preparing to leave when Batsy burst in cheerfully with the money from the Morton jewels.

"Hi ya, guys, I brought the treasury! Well, what's the matter, did I miss something?"

"Well, you missed all the speeches," drawled Gene, "but you're in time for the fireworks."

"Is that so? I brought along a few friends to see some fun. I didn't have any subpoenas, but I rounded up some witnesses!" And Batsy brought in Annabelle and Tommy, with a pale-faced woman in a dark costume who had once been pretty. Now she looked a very sick woman.

"I thought I told you kids to stay away from here!" Gene growled with more emotion than he had shown hitherto.

"Yeah, but Batsy here said it would help if we told about Rocky trying to shoot you!"

"You coached them swell, Batsy," sneered Dorothy. "Is that Gene's poor old mother?"

"Oh, I forgot to introduce you," said Batsy airily. "Fellows, this is Mrs. Winters."

The gang stared unbelievably. "Billy's wife?"

"Yeah," said the pale woman drearily. "I'm Mrs. Billy Winters. I guess I look a lot different than when Billy and me was running around together. When you ain't eating regular—" She broke off, coughing spasmodically. "Billy was in the wrong business, but he didn't realise that when he went to prison, I'd be left behind like this!"

"But how could that be?" gasped Bill. "We been sending dough regular!"

"By way of Rocky," drawled Batsy. "He was a nice boy."

"He kept the money for himself?" said Larry incredulously.

"Don't believe her!" snapped Dorothy, her eyes showing her fear that Gene would go free. "It's a frame-up!"

Bill swung on Gene. "Did you know about this?"

Batsy answered sardonically: "He showed me a letter from her, but he didn't think you guys would care about a thing like that."

Bill shrugged, staring at Gene. "The trip's off."

"That's what you think!" screamed Dorothy Palmer, her face twisted with hate, and she suddenly flashed a small automatic out of her handbag. Gene

(Continued on page 23)

The fearless Englishman, up against a mysterious enemy, risks his life in a dangerous mission. Starring John Barrymore and John Howard

A Theft and a Murder

IT was quite a merry little party assembled at Phyllis Clavering's villa in Switzerland, and Phyllis was happier than she had been for a long while. For it was on the eve of her marriage to Captain Hugh Drummond, and as he had promised faithfully that he had abandoned all his crime work and was really intending to settle down at last, his fiancée for once was content. For though she loved Drummond dearly and was secretly proud of his many daring exploits she had no fancy for being married to a man who was continually risking his life in the discovery of crime.

The time was just before dinner, and in the lounge-room were Drummond and his fiancée, their Aunt Blanche, and Sir Raymond Blantyre, millionaire, and head of the world famous Metropolitan Diamond Syndicate.

The door opened suddenly and Tenny, Drummond's impassive "man," entered the room. On a salver lay a small package which he presented to Drummond.

"Just arrived, sir."

Drummond glanced at it.

"More loot, darling," he said with a smile in the direction of his fiancée.

"Valuable, too, from the look of it. Hugh. Why, look at all the insurance stamps!"

She went on surprisedly as Drummond opened it.

"It's from Gwen and Algy! Why on earth didn't they bring it themselves? They'll be here any moment now."

She opened the letter and read as follows.

"Dear Hugh and Phyllis,—Look what daddy has just made in his lab! This is our wedding gift to you, but don't tell anyone as it's a secret."

She looked up with a smile. "Don't suppose it matters much," she said, "as we're all friends. But isn't it rather wonderful? It really looks real, doesn't it, Sir Raymond? You're an expert on these things."

It certainly did look real. It was a large diamond about the size of a small nut. As it lay on its velvet bed it winked and glittered at them.

Blantyre took it and studied it with a slight frown on his face.

"You say this lady's father made this?" he asked incredulously.

"Oh, yes," replied the girl readily. "He's Professor Goodman, the famous chemist. He's been working on this for years—it's his hobby. It's rather a beautiful bit of glass, isn't it, Sir Raymond? For, of course, as it isn't real it can't be of any value, can it?"

He handed it back to her. Drummond was watching him with a slightly perplexed look on his face.

"Oh, no," answered the millionaire carelessly. "It isn't of any value, of course. But it's interesting all the same."

It was not until dinner was over and Blantyre had left that the subject came up again, for Algy and Gwen had turned up, and after the usual greetings had been exchanged Drummond turned to Gwen.

"Thanks for your present, Gwen," he said. "But might I ask the reason of all the insurance stamps?"

"Well, diamonds are worth it, aren't they, Hugh?"

"Diamonds are, old lady—but not manufactured bits of glass."

Her smile was a shade pitying.

"That's a real diamond, Hugh."

He stared at her.

"But you said your old man made it?" he queried.

"So he did. He's been working on the process for nearly twenty years, and this is the first real result. He showed it to an expert, without telling him he'd made it, and the expert offered to give him twenty thousand pounds for it straight off."

Drummond sat up in his chair.

"D'you mean that, Gwen?" he demanded.

"I most certainly do. And he says he can make all he wants to. He's as pleased as a dog with two tails."

"I'll say he is," replied Drummond emphatically. "He can make all the money he wants."

"Oh, that doesn't interest daddy in the slightest," answered the girl. "He won't try and make money out of it. All he's interested in is the fact that he can now do what he's been trying to do for years."

A worried frown came to Drummond's face as he got up from his chair.

"That sounds all good, my dear, but if this gets out—"

As he paused, Gwen broke in.

"It had better not, Hugh. Father doesn't want it known yet."

"I'm! Sorry about that. Sir Raymond Blantyre seemed a bit interested in it. He was here when your letter came, and he examined that diamond at some length."

Aunt Blanche, however, broke in here.

"My dear Hugh, don't be so ridiculous," she said. "Sir Raymond is a gentleman and one of the best known men in the whole of London. I'll tell him when I see him to-morrow that you don't want this thing talked about yet. Now bring Gwen and Algy and let them see your presents."

"Let's hope they're all safe," chimed in Longworth. "If the jolly old burglars were to get to work—"

"Nonsense," interrupted Aunt Blanche, "we've got a special detective guarding them day and night."

They went into the room where all the presents were laid out.

"Hallo?" exclaimed Drummond as he glanced round the room. "Where's our sleuth?"

"Popped out to have one," suggested Longworth facetiously.

"I must talk to him about—" began the other, but he swung round in a moment as a little scream came from his fiancée.

"Hugh, it's gone!"

"What's gone?"

"The diamond—the diamond that Gwen and Algy gave us. The case is here, but it's empty."

They stood together gazing at the empty case. Drummond's face was grave. But they swung round in a moment at a startled cry from Algy Longworth, who had been searching about in a corner of the room.

"And here's your 'tee, Hugh," he said as he pointed grimly to a figure that lay sprawled out inertly on the floor.

Drummond was across the room in a flash. Aunt Blanche had given a scream and collapsed into a chair. Gwen and Phyllis were clutching each other and their faces were white.

Drummond, down on his knees beside the unfortunate detective, spoke at last. "Ring up the police, Algy," he said. "This man's been murdered."

A Caller for Professor Goodman

PROFESSOR GOODMAN, elderly, dreamy-eyed, benevolent, was in his library when a maid entered.

"Two gentlemen to see you, sir," she said. "Sir Raymond Blantyre and his secretary."

The professor tapped his head thoughtfully.

"Ah, yes," he murmured, "I remember now. They made an appointment. Show them up, Mrs. Weevens."

Blantyre came into the room, a big, florid-faced man.

"My name is Blantyre, professor," he said. "This is my secretary, Mr. Roberts. As I told you on the 'phone, being the head of the greatest diamond syndicate in the world I am naturally curious about this new process of yours."

"Naturally, naturally," replied the other with a bland smile. "I suppose you are inclined to look upon me as a serious rival, Sir Raymond, but you needn't worry a lot. My interest is in my experiments. I shan't flood the world with my results for the purpose of making money."

A frown crossed the millionaire's face. "Forgive me for saying so," he replied, "but you have not yet convinced me that you can make diamonds."

The professor beamed on him. "No, my friend," he answered, "but I very soon shall. Now watch me closely."

No two people could have watched him more closely than did those two for the next twenty minutes. They saw him busy himself with queer evil smelling liquids which he mixed in front of them with exceeding great care; they saw him empty the result into a empty metal cup, and the cup itself enclosed in a cylinder which in turn was screwed tightly into a complicated machine. Then they saw him pull a switch and the sparks begin to fly.

They stood watching in dead silence. The noise of the machinery was deafening, the sparks were blinding. Presently flames began to shoot out and they stepped back in slight alarm, but the professor merely shook his head as though telling them there was no need for fear.

Finally, he pulled a succession of levers and at last came silence.

"Gentlemen," he said impressively, "you have witnessed the birth of a diamond."

Said Sir Raymond with a frown: "Let's have a look at the diamond, professor."

The latter, with a pair of tongs, unscrewed the cylinder and removed from it a round black ball which he dropped into a vat of liquid which spurted up a cloud of steam.

Presently he lifted the black ball out. "There is your diamond, gentlemen," he said.

"That's not a diamond," said Roberts sneeringly.

"You don't think so?" asked the professor with a smile. "Let us see."

He picked up a small hammer, gave a few gentle blows to the black ball which shivered and broke. And there lay a glittering diamond!

"I can make those at a cost of a few shillings apiece," he said modestly.

Sir Raymond picked it up, examined it closely; studied it through his glass.

"Perfect," he pronounced. "Small, admittedly, but—"

"Ah, I shall do better later on. Sir Raymond. If I had an equipment like Dr. Botulian's—"

"And who's he?"

"You've never heard of him? Why, he's the great American scientist, now over here. Incidentally"—with a smile—"he is my rival."

Blantyre, who had been listening with the closest attention, now spoke.

"Professor," he said, "I will pay you fifty thousand pounds for this secret of yours."

The professor regarded them coldly.

"I'm afraid I'm not interested, gentlemen," he said.

"Name your figure then. I'll pay you anything in reason."

A slightly angry look appeared on the professor's benevolent face.

"As I have already told you, Sir Raymond, my invention is not for sale."

"But, professor, surely you can see—" began the other when Goodman cut him short.

"You're wasting your time and mine, sir," he said sharply. "I have been pleased to show you my invention. I have now the honour to wish you good-morning."

As Blantyre and Roberts came down the staircase together the millionaire was scowling.

"I wish to goodness you hadn't killed that detective," he said.

One hour later Drummond was interviewing Colonel Neilson, of Scotland Yard, though the latter's opening remark as Drummond entered the room was hardly encouraging.

"I never see you come into this room, Drummond, without wishing you a million miles away," he said crossly.

"Thanks for the kind thought," replied the big man cheerfully. "But you've got to listen to this one."

He proceeded to relate exactly what had taken place in the villa at Switzerland, Blantyre's hurried departure, the theft of the diamond and the murder of the detective.

"I've just come from Professor Goodman's," he went on, "and Blantyre's been there trying to get him to sell his process, and practically threatening him with things if he doesn't do so. Now give me the answer to that one."

Neilson was silent. He was never inclined to encourage Drummond too much because he was always a little nervous of what he would do. But he could see there was something grave at the back of it.

"Sir Raymond is a most respectable man," he said abruptly.

"So's every criminal till he turns crook," retorted Drummond. "But it's pretty plain to me that he murdered that 'tee, and the next murder you'll hear of will be Professor Goodman. And if you won't be around to see it, I shall. Good-morning."

He went out raging. Neilson, with a smile, rang his bell and one of his clerks came in.

"Put a plain-clothes man on to Drummond," he said, "as he may get into trouble, and we've got to be there to help him out. And have two men watching Professor Goodman's house."

Sir Raymond Lays His Plans

BLANTYRE and Roberts called on Dr. Botulian that afternoon, for Professor Goodman's chance remark had put an idea into the millionaire's head.

He began with an encouraging smile after he had stated who he was and the experiment that he had recently witnessed, for he had seen other things than mere interest show in the doctor's eyes during his recital.

"You and the professor are rivals, aren't you, doctor?" he asked blandly.

"We've both of us experimented along similar lines, if that's what you mean," replied the other guardedly.

"And you've failed where Goodman seems to have succeeded?"

The other stroked his small beard. There was a frown on his face which did not escape Blantyre.

"At present—yes."

"We are very interested in the Goodman process," said Roberts smoothly, "and we have made him a very handsome offer, but he declines to sell."

"I have an appointment with him this evening," murmured Botulian thoughtfully. "I'm taking him some of my equipment at nine o'clock."

Blantyre and Roberts exchanged glances. This was news, and interesting news.

"Supposing that—er—we kept your appointment for you?" suggested Blantyre ingratiatingly.

Botulian looked thoughtful, and Blantyre went on.

"We should be charmed to pay you five thousand pounds to keep the appointment."

Botulian's eyes narrowed.

"But I might hit upon the process myself later?" he murmured thoughtfully.

"When we should be delighted to buy you out at a high figure," replied the millionaire.

Botulian sat nodding thoughtfully.

"Exactly what have I got to do?" he demanded at length.

"Receive a cheque for five thousand pounds," answered the millionaire smoothly, "and remain here so that you have a perfect alibi."

"One of you gentlemen, I take it, intends to go as me?"

Sir Raymond rose to his feet with a smile.

"Let's say, doctor," he answered, "that whatever risk we take will be our own."

For some time after they had gone Botulian sat thinking deeply. Then at last he summoned his assistant.

"Well?" demanded the latter.

"You heard the suggestion?"

"I did. So you aren't keeping your appointment to-night?"

A smile spread over the doctor's face.

"That's where you're wrong, my dear fellow," he replied blandly. "I am keeping it—but it will be well before nine o'clock. Poof, I can see their game! They're going to destroy his laboratory. All right—they shall. But we'll be well in front of them and we'll get Goodman away. And I fancy then that Blantyre will be ready to pay fifty thousand pounds instead of a paltry five."

Drummond had already had in the course of years too many rebuffs from the Yard to be inclined to take them seriously, so after his fruitless interview with Colonel Neilson he went straight back to Professor Goodman's house, where he, too, learned that he had got an appointment that night with Dr. Botulian. Though when later in the day the faithful Tenny who had followed Blantyre and Roberts after they had left Goodman's house, apprised him of the fact that these two had both called upon Dr. Botulian and had come away obviously pleased with themselves, his fears all leaped up again. For he was quite sure that something sinister had been planned, though he was entirely at a loss to understand what it could be.

All the same he had no idea of abandoning his investigations. He was firmly convinced in his own mind that Blantyre was planning something desperate, and he was determined to find out what it could be. So that evening soon after eight o'clock he was loitering round Goodman's house, dodging backwards and forwards about the shrubbery in his efforts to avoid the two constables who were patrolling the house. And it was while he was crouching down behind one of the laurel bushes that the faithful Tenny joined him.

"Dr. Botulian, sir, has just entered the house," he whispered. "The police stopped him, but he said who he was and he was allowed to go in."

"Funny," mused Drummond. "His appointment was for nine, and it's not half-past eight. Tenny, you must slip away from here and try and draw off the police. I've got to get into the house and see what's going on."

He heard his man slip away and waited, listening. He was quite convinced now that something queer was on foot, and in a few minutes' time when no sound came to him he slipped from the shrubbery and was soon busy on one of the lower windows. But he swung round in a flash as a voice came from his elbow.

"Good-evening, Captain Drummond."

Drummond cursed him under his breath. Two stalwart constables were standing before him.

"It won't do, sir," went on one of them calmly. "We have special instructions from Colonel Neilson, sir, to take you off if we found you trying to get into this house. It would be wiser to come quietly."

Drummond swore softly but volubly. "You mean you're going to arrest me?"

"Afraid we've got to follow orders, sir. If you won't come quietly—"

But here Drummond interrupted them with a weary shrug of the shoulders.

"Oh, what's the use?" he exclaimed bitterly. "I'll come."

Neilson regarded him sternly as they brought him into his room.

"So you were still at it, were you?" he queried. "I've been looking for an excuse for some time to lock you up, Drummond, and now you've furnished it. You were trying to batter your way into that house—"

"To prevent a murder being committed."

"Oh, I've heard that tale before!"

He turned to the attendant constables.

"Take him away and lock him up," he said.

"But, colonel!" exclaimed Drummond desperately. "Even if you do lock me up, will you send someone up immediately to Goodman's house? I tell you—"

"I don't care what you tell me!" stormed the other. "I tell you that there's nothing wrong with Goodman's house and—"

But at that moment the telephone-bell shrilled out, and he picked up the receiver, though even as he listened the expression of his face changed.

"What? There's been an explosion—the house has been wrecked—Goodman's house?"

He banged down the receiver, glared at Drummond, who was whistling softly under his breath.

"My car—quick!" exclaimed Neilson. "And you come along, too, Drummond!"

As they pulled up outside the house where the constable was holding back the crowd they saw only too clearly that there had been a serious explosion, for almost half the house was in ruins.

But even as they alighted from the car a slight, bearded man came forward in an obvious state of agitation.

"I'm Dr. Botulian," he said. "I'm looking for Professor Goodman's house. I have an appointment with him."

Neilson glared at him.

"What time?"

"Nine o'clock. I'm a bit late, I'm afraid, but—"

But at that moment Mrs. Weevens pushed her way forward and threw out an accusing finger at the doctor.

"There he is!" she exclaimed. "There's the blackguard who called on my master over an hour ago."

"Oh, but that's impossible!" exclaimed the doctor. "I have never even approached this house until now."

"Oh, you did. I saw you!" replied Mrs. Weevens.

"I can prove I didn't."

Neilson was rubbing his chin.

"I'm afraid, doctor, that this is a case for a magistrate to decide," he said.

"But you can't possibly arrest me," answered the other excitedly; but Neilson came in angrily.

"Can't I?" he retorted. "You evidently don't know—"

Drummond stepped back, his sword above his head. . . .

But a quiet voice came from his elbow.

"I shouldn't if I were you," it said. Neilson wheeled round furiously. Drummond was standing there holding out something.

"Take a squint at that which I found just now inside the house, colonel," he suggested, and there was a smile on his face.

The other snatched it from him, glared at it, and then glared back at Drummond, who went on quietly:

"That's why I say you mustn't arrest the doctor," he said. "That's a piece of a false beard or a false wig the same colour as Dr. Botulian's, so it looks very much as though—"

"Someone's been impersonating him? Great heavens!" exclaimed Neilson.

He swung round on one of the constables.

"Did you see anyone like Dr. Botulian arrive?" he flung out.

"Well, sir, a gentleman arrived, like this gentleman, who said he was Dr. Botulian, and he drove up with a big packing-case—"

"Which was probably filled with high-explosives," finished Neilson, now thoroughly angry. "Oh, you make me tired, the whole lot of you!"

The Trapping of Bulldog Drummond

IT was two days later, and Bulldog Drummond sat at his breakfast with the imperturbable Tenny motionless behind him.

"You are not getting on with your breakfast, sir," suggested the latter mildly.

"I'm not, Tenny. Things aren't going right, and I can't make it out. I've got a strong feeling in my bones that Goodman was never killed in that explosion. Yet if he wasn't—"

He left the sentence unfinished as he stared gloomily at his plate. At that moment the electric bell in the hall whirred out.

"Go and see who that is, Tenny," he said.

A few moments later the man appeared, ushering in Dr. Botulian.

"How are you, doctor?" asked Drummond smoothly. "What can I do for you?"

"The late Professor Goodman seems to have had a premonition that something was going to happen to him," replied the doctor as he sat down. "A week ago he sent me a letter requesting me in the event of his death to carry on his diamond experiments."

"I see. But may I ask how this affects me?"

"Merely that Goodman gave his notes to you for their safe keeping."

Drummond frowned.

"On the contrary, doctor, I begged him to do so and he refused."

Dr. Botulian, without a word, produced a letter which he handed to Drummond.

"Read that," he said laconically.

Drummond glanced at it. It read thus:

"Dear Drummond.—In the event of anything happening to me will you please turn over my notes to my old friend and colleague, Dr. Botulian?—"
"BERNARD GOODMAN."

Drummond looked up. There was a smile on his face.

"I naturally wanted to be quite sure," he said. "I admit that he did give me the notes. They're at the bank in my safe deposit. Perhaps if you will come back here this afternoon at four—"

"I could come with you now?" broke September 17th, 1938.

in the other eagerly; but Drummond merely shook his head.

"I'm not doubting you, doctor," he replied, "but out of fairness to my old friend I must verify his signature. If it's O.K., as no doubt it is, you shall have the notes at four this afternoon."

The other rose from his chair. "Thank you, captain. I'll be here at four," he said.

After he had gone Drummond sat fingering the letter and examining it closely. His eyes were narrowed. Tenny was watching him.

"Now this is highly interesting, Tenny," murmured Drummond. "I want a long envelope and half a dozen sheets of paper. I think I can most certainly say now that Professor Goodman isn't dead, after all."

One hour later he was seated in Colonel Neilson's room, and the latter was studying the letter which Botulian had given him.

"I suppose you're telling me that this letter is a forgery?" he queried at length.

"On the contrary, Gwen has identified it as her father's handwriting."

"Then why can't you give Botulian the notes?"

"Simply because Goodman never gave them to me."

Neilson stared at him.

"Then if Goodman never gave them to you—" he began, and then stopped. Drummond came in with a smile.

"Exactly."

"But that means—what exactly does it mean, Drummond?"

"One of two things, colonel. Now listen."

By the time he rose to go, Neilson was nodding grim approval.

At four o'clock Botulian entered the room and Drummond rose to meet him. But his greeting was strange, for he suddenly grasped the doctor's beard and gave it a violent tug.

"What the devil—what the—" spluttered the other; but Drummond came in with a smile.

"Forgive me, doctor. I must apologise, but a man obviously impersonating you came here this morning with this letter. Do you recognise it?"

He handed the other the letter which the latter himself had brought, and Botulian stared at it for some moments as if undecided as to what to say.

"This letter," he said at length, "was stolen from my house last night. I didn't report it to the police as it would make it public."

"And I merely pulled your beard just now, sir," replied Drummond airily, "to make sure you are the real Dr. Botulian. Tenny, give the doctor those notes."

Drummond stood chuckling after Botulian had left.

"My hat and revolver, quick, Tenny," he said. "I think he'll lead me all right now to Professor Goodman."

It was a long pursuit, but Drummond had been accustomed to long pursuits, and he knew furthermore now that the Yard men were joining in the chase and would follow him wherever he went. And that was quite good enough for him when eventually he tracked Botulian down to a little village in the Midlands. And so sure was he of those whom he believed to be following him that he went boldly up to the house and knocked at the door, which was opened by the doctor himself.

"Ah, come in, Drummond!" he exclaimed genially. "Do you know I had a sort of fancy that you'd be coming along."

Drummond's hand was in his pocket on his gun, and he pushed it forward a shade ostentatiously.

"I shouldn't try any tricks, doctor," he said quietly. "I hold you covered."

"My dear fellow, I can see that. I'll go first and you can follow me if you like. Though I don't understand quite what this means."

"I most certainly should like," answered Drummond grimly. "But don't please let me see your hands go to your pockets. I'm horribly quick on the trigger."

He followed the other into a comfortably furnished hall, but he saw in a glance that it was empty.

"I want to see Professor Goodman," he said briefly.

Botulian smiled.

"My dear man, I'm not a medium. I can't bring the dead to life."

"Ah, but Goodman isn't dead, doctor. That letter you gave me was written within the last twenty-four hours. I know; the ink has been tested."

A dangerous light shone for a moment in the other's eyes, but he turned it away with a laugh.

"Well, we all make mistakes sometimes," he said. "Even Captain Drummond. Look out behind you."

But Drummond, smiling, shook his head.

"I'm not falling for that one, thank you, doctor," he answered. "It's a bit too old. I'll trouble you to—"

And then something crashed on his head from behind, and as he slid inertly to the floor he knew that he had fallen into a cleverly laid trap.

The Last Round

WHEN Drummond came to his senses it was to find himself in a small attic the windows of which were closely barred. And Professor Goodman was bending over him. In a few moments Drummond explained all that had occurred, but even while he was talking they heard the sound of bolts being drawn, and in another moment Botulian entered the room.

"Well gentlemen," he said as he surveyed them with an evil smile, "isn't it time we came to an understanding? I don't want blank sheets of paper, Drummond, such as you put into that envelope—I want the notes."

Said Goodman, after a pause:

"They're in my laboratory."
"Unfortunately your laboratory has been blown to bits, professor. But what you've done once you can do again."

"It will take a long time."

Botulian shrugged his shoulders. "With an able assistant like Captain Drummond?" he queried. "Surely not."

Drummond spoke then:

"And if we refuse?" he asked grimly. Botulian smiled.

"The consequences, I'm afraid, will be most unpleasant for both of you," he said. "Think it over."

While this was taking place Colonel Neilson was sitting in his room with an exceedingly worried expression on his face. Opposite him was Sir Raymond Blantyre, no less worried; but from an entirely different cause had Neilson but known it.

"And you can't give us any idea of what's been going on?" asked Neilson at length.

Blantyre threw out his hands. His plans had miscarried very badly, and he had a shrewd suspicion that Botulian had in some way double-crossed him. But he wasn't telling Neilson so.

"I know no more than you do," he protested. "I want to find my man

(Continued on page 23.)

Ride the danger trail with the pioneers of the Old West in this pulsing epic of the days when fearless prairie scouts took up the challenge of savage Redskins and murderous desperadoes. To the beat of thundering hoofs and to the blast of flaming guns this vivid serial runs its thrill-a-minute course, with hot action in every smashing episode and Ray Corrigan in its starring rôle

THE PAINTED STALLION

Read This First

Backed by Dupray, a scheming Spaniard who is Governor of Santa Fe, but who has received news that he is to be deposed by the newly established Mexican Republic, a band of renegades led by one, Zamora, is preying on the wagon-trains that ply to and fro across the Western wilds with rich merchandise under their awnings.

The activities of these renegades are hampered by a mystery rider on a painted stallion, who has sworn to defeat outlawry and who again and again warns the bandits' intended victims of their danger by means of whistling arrows.

The year is 1824, and in that year an American frontiersman known as Clark Stuart is detained by the U.S. Government to negotiate a trade treaty with the Mexican authorities. It is a treaty which Dupray is anxious to prevent from being conceded, and at his instigation Zamora incites the Indians to attack a wagon-train led by a trader named Jamison—a wagon-train with which Clark is travelling and whose personnel also includes Jim Bowie, famous as the inventor of the Bowie knife, and Kit Carson, a boy later to become renowned as a Western scout.

The Rider of the Painted Stallion saves the train by calling off the Redskins, who regard that mysterious figure as a supernatural being, and later the Rider rescues Clark from the clutches of some of Zamora's henchmen.

After learning the Rider is in reality a white girl, Clark and his companions reach Santa Fe, where they discover Dupray's association with the outlaws.

Dupray escapes, and by a trick decoys the Jamison party and Santa Fe's garrison into the hills. Then his men attack the residence of a new governor who has arrived at the citadel.

Together with Kit Carson and Jim Bowie, three of Jamison's men and half a dozen soldiers have been left behind. These rally round the new governor and engage the outlaws, but the residence being set on fire, the heroic defenders rush forth to die fighting.

Kit, attempting to follow, trips and strikes his head against a door, losing consciousness.

Now Read On

To the Rescue

JIM BOWIE, Don Luis Alvarez and their companions were unaware of the accident that had befallen Kit, but even had they known that he was lying insensible in that room which they had evacuated they might well have considered it an act of mercy to leave him there.

The chances were that he would remain mercifully oblivious and that death would steal upon him painlessly. And what alternative could Bowie, Don Luis and their party have offered the boy if they had realised his plight and turned back to revive him? They could only have shepherded him out of the burning residence to meet his end by a bullet, for Zamora and his blood-thirsty satellites were not of the breed to show mercy to anyone—not even to a lovable little fellow like Kit Carson.

As it was Kit seemed destined to die of suffocation, and not by a slug from a six-gun.

Down the stairs that led to the ground floor of the house went Jim Bowie, long-barrelled rifle clutched in his horny, calloused hands, weather-beaten face grim-determined in its expression. After him, revolver in fist, came Don Luis Alvarez, Governor of Santa Fe and representative of the newly-established Mexican Republic, and hunched in the rear of that elderly Hidalgo were Bowie's three comrades of the Jamison wagon-train and the half-dozen soldiers who had been detailed to remain at the presidio or fortress when the rest of the garrison had departed.

Through weltering smoke luridly coloured here and there with tongues of fire those eleven men fought their way to the front door of the dwelling. Then they charged out on to the veranda and out into the courtyard of the presidio, and as they appeared there in full view the air seemed to rock with a bellowing volley of gunplay that came from the position occupied by Zamora and the besieging outlaws.

Lead missiles ripped across the patio, dealing murder. One of Jim Bowie's fellow Americans buckled at the knees and sank riddled to the dust. Three of the Mexican troopers pitched headlong, lifeless. The survivors, unseathed, gave swift response to the

September 17th, 1938.

EPISODE 10:—

"Ambush"

fusillade—the other three soldiers, the governor and Bowie's remaining compatriots standing in front of the burning residence and shooting at the renegades, who had issued exultantly from cover.

Jim Bowie on his part was not content to stand still and trade lead with the outlaws across an intervening area that measured some forty or fifty yards. A wild light of battle had kindled in his eyes, vivid as the tongues of flame that were threatening to raze Don Luis' quarters, and his teeth were bared so that they lent an expression of indescribable ferocity and mad courage to his features. Indeed, he might have been likened in that moment to some Viking of old—berserk in the determination to slay before he himself was slain.

Savagely he rushed towards the muster of gangsters, and, rifle held low, firing from the hip as he ran, he accounted for two of his enemies. Then suddenly realising the weapon in his grasp was empty, he clubbed it in mid-stride and charged on.

It seemed miraculous that he had not already fallen dead, struck by an outlaw bullet, for the crooks had not been slow to concentrate their gunplay on him when he had dashed forward. Yet perhaps because there was something unnerving in the spectacle of his frenzied figure hurtling to the attack, the aim of the renegades was singularly inaccurate, and he was within twenty paces of them before a bullet tumbled him to the ground.

Even as he fell, Zamora and his accomplices became aware of a commotion outside the fort, and all at once the four gangsters who had been left on the watch beyond the gateway scuttled into the courtyard with loud cries of alarm.

"Beat it, fellers! The Jamison crowd an' the garrison—they're high-tailin' it straight for the fort! They're comin' up at full stretch, and it looks like Clark Stuart is with 'em!"

Such were the shouts raised by the men who had been posted outside the presidio, and Zamora and the other outlaws could scarcely believe their ears on hearing them. Then panic seizing the rogues, a general rush was made for the gateway—a rush which Zamora made no attempt to stem. Indeed, the dago would have led that precipitate flight if he had not been restrained for a moment by Macklin.

"Wait!" the latter jerked. "We ain't got what we came for, but we'll take somethin' away with us."

He pointed to the figure of Jim Bowie. The veteran scout was struggling to his knees in a dazed fashion, and was fumbling vaguely for his rifle, which had slipped from his fingers and was lying a yard or so in front of him. There was blood in his hair, but the bullet that had dropped him had not injured him seriously—had merely creased him.

"That hombre is Bowie," Macklin panted to Zamora, as he indicated the bemused frontiersman, "an' he's about as close to Stuart an' Jamison as a brother. We might find him a useful hostage if we took him along with us. Quick, let's pick him up!"

Anxious as he was to escape from the presidio, Zamora blundered towards Jim Bowie with Macklin, and the pair of them laid hold of the veteran, who made an attempt to resist but who was speedily struck senseless by a blow from the butt of Macklin's forty-five.

In another instant Bowie was being dragged towards the gateway, and though his captors were harried by a burst of shooting from Don Luis and the other survivors of the party which had defended the governor's residence, the smoke that was swirling over the patio tended to spoil the aim of the unconscious scout's friends.

Unharmed, Macklin and Zamora hauled their prisoner out of the fort. Meanwhile, their accomplices were making off at top speed, and the Jamison crowd and the troopers who were riding stirrup to stirrup with the Americans from Independence were approaching the scene rapidly. But the newcomers were still some little distance away when Zamora and Macklin flung Bowie over the back of a spare mount which had belonged to one of the renegades killed in the attack on the presidio, the frontiersman's captors then springing astride their own broncs.

Macklin seized the rein of the pony across which Jim Bowie had been thrown, and, Zamora by his side, struck off at full pelt in the direction which the rest of the gang were taking. As for the cavalcade headed by Jamison, Clark and the captain of the Santa Fe garrison, they separated into two bodies, one giving chase to the bandits and pumping lead at the ruffians' fleeing forms, the other pushing onward for the fortress.

Clark and Jamison were among those who bore down on the presidio, neither of them having recognised the unconscious man who was in the hands of Zamora and Macklin. They had both been under the impression, in fact, that the figure which had been hoisted athwart the spare bronc had been that of a wounded outlaw.

Jamison's horse, carrying Clark as well as the wagon boss, was the first to enter the courtyard of the fort, and a few seconds afterwards the pair of them were confronting Don Luis Alvarez and the remnants of the little party which had held out against the renegades' onslaught.

Dismounting, Clark and Jamison glanced at the huddled bodies of the men who had been shot down by the outlaws. Then the wagon boss addressed himself to the Governor.

"I reckon none of you would 've been left alive, Don Luis," he said, "if Clark Stuart here hadn't met up with us out in the hills. We mighty soon found out from him we'd been tricked into leavin' Santa Fe, an' we turned back pronto. But where's Jim Bowie? I don't see him around."

"Your friend Bowie was carried off by two of those renegades," the Governor answered sombrely, at which piece of news Jamison and Clark looked at each other in dismay.

Then the U.S. Government agent found his voice.

"And Kit Carson?" he rapped out. "Have those coyotes carried him off as well?"

At that one of the two surviving Americans in Don Luis' party gave vent to an exclamation.

"Kit Carson!" he blurted. "Why, no, Clark, the outlaws didn't get him. He must still be inside the Governor's quarters—up in that room there."

He indicated the windows of the apartment which the little group of defenders had been forced to evacuate a short time previously, and Clark waited to hear no more. With a hoarse cry on his lips he bounded to the veranda of the burning building, and, hurling himself across the threshold of the residence, he fought his way through the dense clouds of smoke and ascended the staircase leading to the upper floor, where it did not take him long to find the room in which Kit lay.

Stumbling upon the boy's prone body, Clark gathered the lad in his powerful arms and then retraced his steps down to the hallway and the front door, choking and retching as the fumes of the conflagration assailed his throat and lungs with ever-increasing effect. Indeed, he was almost at the last gasp by the time he gained the courtyard, where Jamison and the Governor took charge of the rescued youngster and set themselves to the task of reviving him.

In the meantime the courtyard had become crowded with those men of the returned cavalcade who had followed Clark and the wagon boss to the presidio, and efforts were being made to quench the fire that had broken out in Don Luis' quarters. Nor were those efforts unsuccessful, although more than an hour elapsed before the flames were completely extinguished.

By then young Kit Carson had been restored to his senses and was more or less himself again, and he was assuring Clark, Jamison and Governor Alvarez that he was none the worse of his experience when the men who had spurred in pursuit of the outlaws were seen cantering towards the fort.

They brought with them the disappointing intelligence that the bandits had made a clean getaway, owing to the fact that their horses had been considerably fresher than the ponies ridden by the supporters of law and order. The crooks, it seemed, had turned east after entering the hill-country to the north, and although the outdistanced pursuers had done their utmost to stick to the fugitives' trail, they had lost the scent utterly amid the barren mountains.

On learning this Don Luis Alvarez looked at Clark Stuart gloomily enough.

"My friend," he said, "the events of this morning have compelled me to make up my mind on the question of your mission to Santa Fe. I know that we have not had a chance to discuss that mission thoroughly as yet, but under the circumstances it is impossible for me to negotiate any trade treaty with your government on behalf of the Mexican Republic while this province remains exposed to the depredations of these outlaws.

"I understand there is a clause in that proposed treaty which refers to a guarantee of adequate protection for American wagon-trains," he said. "And, placed as I am, I cannot take it upon myself to guarantee any such protection in this territory until Dupray and his associates have been stamped out."

Clark nodded gravely.

"I appreciate all that, your Excellency," he rejoined. "On the other hand, it may not be long before the Dupray-Zamora outfit are brought to justice. You see, I know where their hide-out is situated now, and although it's liable to prove a difficult place to storm, I reckon our combined forces ought to be able to take it."

The Governor bit his lip.

"Our combined forces, eh?" he murmured. "Senior, I cannot afford to send my garrison into the hills again. I cannot afford to take that chance, leaving the presidio open to further attack by those outlaws—indeed, leaving the whole town at their mercy. For you can be sure that if the renegades learned Santa Fe had been left practically undefended again they would circle round and repeat the onset they made to-day, and perhaps with more success. No, senior, from now on the troops under my control will be kept close to home."

"It was a decision from which he would not budge, not even when Clark reminded him of Bowie's capture and appealed to him to lend aid in attempting the rescue of the veteran scout.

"I deeply regret the kidnapping of your friend," Don Luis said. "But I would be neglecting my duty to an entire community if I allowed myself to be swayed by considerations for the welfare of one man."

They were his final words on the subject—words that boded ill for Jim Bowie, who at that very moment was being conveyed through the mountains by the rogues who had taken him prisoner.

Still lying insensible over the pony across whose back he had been flung, Bowie was oblivious of his surroundings and of the band of ruffians who were galloping eastward with him, Macklin and Zamora having caught up with the rest of the fugitives by now. Nor had the captive recovered consciousness when the crooks reached their destination—that lofty cavern with its inner compartment wherein Escobedo Dupray had now taken up his abode.

Dupray was sitting alone in that inner chamber when his hirelings entered with the prisoner, and when he heard how the attack on the presidio had been frustrated he broke out into a torrent of abuse, concentrating his wrath upon Zamora so that the latter fairly squirmed under the deposed lieutenant governor's venomous upbraiding.

"I send you and your men to Santa Fe to plunder the Jamison wagons and to obtain for me the official seal of the new governor—and what do you bring me? News of failure—news that five of the gang have been killed—news that you have accomplished nothing! Por Dios, are you and your compadres a pack of spineless fools, Zamora? Are you completely without courage and initiative?"

Such was the sum total of Dupray's angry remarks, and in response to them Zamora could only protest that they were unreasonable, and that the ineffectiveness of the attack was due to one factor alone.

"Clark Stuart was responsible for halting us," he declared. "We believed he was dead, but we were wrong, and he must have fallen in with his friends and the troopers of the garrison and turned them back from the hills."

"That may be," snarled Dupray, "but it sounds to me as if you were an unexcusable time in driving the few defenders of the Governor's residence out into the open. You ought to have finished what you set out to do long before Stuart and his crowd showed up with the troopers!"

He paused, then directed an ugly glance at Jim Bowie, who had been thrown unceremoniously on to a rude couch.

"And what's the idea of bringing that fellow here, anyway?" he demanded. "Of what use is he to us?"

Macklin answered him.

"Twas me as had the notion ter bring him along," the gangster stated. "Either Clark Stuart or Jamison would give their right arms for him, an' I figured he'd make a good hostage. You know, Stuart found out where this hide-away is, an' we might have a little trouble here with the Jamison outfit an' the troopers before long. All right, we can tell Stuart an' the Jamison mob to sheer off or we'll rub out this pal o' theirs. That'll mean we'll only have the troopers ter worry about, an' I reckon we can hold out against them."

Dupray was silent for a while, and, his wrath appearing to abate somewhat, he lapsed into a thoughtful mood. Then all at once he looked at Bowie again, and, noting that he was still insensible, slid his eyes upon Macklin.

"I think I've got a better idea regarding this prisoner of yours," he observed. "Supposing, when he comes round—supposing we let him overhear us talking about the Rider of the Painted Stallion. Supposing I make out I've discovered that the Rider is encamped up in—Lost Canyada, shall we say? And supposing I mention that I intend to send three of you there to deal with that pest?"

"Well?" queried Macklin.

Dupray smiled craftily.

"If this prisoner of yours were then permitted to escape," he remarked, "I'll wager he'd carry word of what he'd heard straight to Clark Stuart, and, considering the friendship between Stuart and the Rider, there isn't much doubt in my mind that the U.S. Government agent would take the trail to Lost Canyada immediately—probably with Jamison and one or two others, but certainly not with the whole personnel of the wagon-train, since he'd only expect to meet three of our gang."

He leaned back in his chair, an evil glint playing in his deep-set eyes.

"Instead," he went on, "all of you would be there, lying in ambush. It would be the end of Stuart, and anyone who happened to be with him—the end, at any rate, of a man who has proved a stumbling-block to us at every turn. Yes, it would be the end of Clark Stuart, and somehow I feel that with him out of the way our luck might change."

"If Jamison were with him it would be so much the better," put in Zamora. "The Americans of the wagon-train would be leaderless then, and it is my belief that if we can get rid of those two men—Stuart and Jamison—things will be a lot healthier for us. We—"

He was interrupted by a movement on the part of Jim Bowie, a movement which the veteran accompanied with a half-stifled groan.

"The prisoner is coming round, Dupray," Zamora hissed then. "Better get ready to pull that bluff about the Rider."

In Lost Canyada

IT was early afternoon, and at the wagon encampment near Santa Fe a conference was in progress, a conference attended by the entire personnel of the Jamison column, a conference at which Clark had done most of the talking.

"Well, I've put the facts before you, boys," he was saying now. "Don Luis won't take the risk of sending his troops into the hills, and it's not for us to try and tell him how to deal with the situation in his province. But, outside of the fact that Jim Bowie is in the hands of those renegades, every wagon team that tries to get from Independence to Santa Fe an' back is gonna be in constant danger as long as the Dupray-Zamora gang are operatin' in the wilderness."

"Clark's right, men," Jamison interposed. "All of us here know that their outlaws are a bigger menace by far than hostile Redskins, and, unless I'm mistaken, Clark wants us to make a drive against 'em—not only for Jim Bowie's sake, but also for our own sakes, but for the sake of every outfit that uses the trail between here and Independence."

The U.S. Government agent nodded in assent.

"I couldn't put it in cleverer words," he stated, "but I want to make it plain to everybody that we'll be up against a tough proposition if we do move in on these renegades. Their hide-outs is mighty well situated to withstand attack, and, even if we manage to storm it, the chances are that a lot of us will be put out of action in the process. I'd like all of you to realise that—before you thing of volunteerin' for this enterprise."

Jamison stepped forward and laid a hand on his shoulder.

"Well, Clark," he declared, "whatever my men decide on, you've got one volunteer in me."

"An' here's another," struck in Davy Crockett, renowned frontiersman. "I don't belong in this outfit, but I'd follow you all to Hades, Clark—if Jim Bowie is in trouble there."

A spontaneous chorus now arose from the wagoners and outriders of the Jamison column, every single man pronouncing himself ready and eager to accompany Clark to the mountain lair of the desperadoes, and it was while those voices were resounding about the U.S. Government agent that the big fellow suddenly perceived a diminutive figure struggling towards him through the assemblage.

It was the figure of Kit Carson, and, reaching Clark, the boy spoke to him excitedly:

5 MORE BIKES! And Over 2,000 Other Prizes Won in the July "Armaments" Race!

Here's more winning news for thousands of "Armaments" Stamp collectors. The July entries have now been checked and every one of the 2,004 readers who sent in 323 or more Battleship and Tank Stamps has won the prize of his choice, while the following five collectors whose totals were the largest received, win the FIVE £4 7s. 6d. "HERCULES" BIKES:

E. RICHARDSON, 145a, Hammersmith Grove, London, W.6.

A. MAISEY, 19, Colthrop Cottages, Thatham, Berks.

ARTHUR HYDE, Crundalls Farm, Wribbenhall, Bewdley.

R. SCARGILL, 20, Ivy Street, York Road, Leeds, 9.

H. TURNER, 5, Lentmead Road, Downham, Bromley.

All prizes have now been despatched, and if you have not been successful, remember there's another prize opportunity in our Latest Collecting Scheme—FOOTER-STAMPS—on page 27. You must be in that, too!

"Jim Bowie's safe!" he panted. "Clark, Jim Bowie's safe! He's a-headin' into the encampment now!"

He was right. Astride a lathered bronc, the veteran frontiersman was bearing down on the scene from an easterly direction, and within another thirty seconds was drawing rein amidst his comrades of the wagon-train, who pressed around him with exclamations of thankfulness and congratulation.

Bowie interrupted them, however, calling for silence. Then he addressed himself to Clark.

"Listen," he rapped out, "the Rider o' the Painted Stallion is in danger. I heard that hombre Dupray tellin' his men that he'd seen her camped up in a gulch called Lost Canyada, an' I heard him say that three o' the gang had better start out and get her. Him an' his pack o' cut-throats seemed so hot-up over the prospect of finishin' her off at last that I managed to make my getaway an' grab myself a bronc, and here I am."

Clark Stuart's features had become tense.

"Lost Canyada!" he reiterated. "Where's that?"

"As far as I could make out from what Dupray said," Bowie rejoined, "it's about four miles north of Red Ridge, on the—"

"I know Lost Canyada," Davy Crockett broke in. "Clark, I'll trail along with you an' Bowie an' show you the way."

"Yeah, an' you can count me in on this, too," said Jamison. "Hey, listen, I reckon this needn't interfere with our drive against the gang's hide-out. While you and I an' Davy an' Bowie are makin' for Lost Canyada, Clark, the rest o' the boys can start for Dupray's headquarters. After we've horned-in on this attempt to wipe out the Rider, we can swing south and join up with 'em somewhere near Tascosa Bend."

Clark acquiesced in this suggestion, and, after bidding Kit Carson remain at the encampment, he and Jamison and Davy Crockett took horse and spurred in a north-easterly direction with Bowie, leaving the other members of the wagon-train to set forth at a more leisurely pace for Tascosa Bend, on the River Los Lunas.

The hoofs of their ponies drumming on the unbaked ground, Clark and his three companions galloped onward into the hills, little dreaming that they were following a course that was to lead them into a death-trap. Not for a moment did any of them suspect that they were the intended victims of a cunning plot whose motive was murder—and least of all did Jim Bowie suspect that he had been made the chief instrument of that plot, the innocent bearer of false tidings.

With Davy Crockett acting as guide, the quartet pressed on through the hills, and an hour after leaving the wagon encampment outside Santa Fe they might have been seen approaching a craggy, rock-strewn ravine that was hemmed in amongst the remote, barren mountains.

"That's Lost Canyada right ahead," announced Davy Crockett.

The four of them eased up, and, their brones travelling at a walk, moved forward into the gulch, unaware as they passed between the sloping walls of it that sinister eyes were watching them from above—the eyes of gunmen who lurked amid groups of boulders that littered the rims of the two acclivities.

Zamora and his cronies were in position, and well concealed, and there was not one of the dago's confederates whose trigger-finger was not itching to send a bullet speeding towards the quartet who had entered the canyada. But Zamora had been insistent that the victims should be allowed to proceed well into the ravine before a shot was fired, and the outlaws held themselves in restraint.

Zamora himself would give the signal to rain death upon those four men below, and the signal would take the form of a bullet discharged by him and directed at Clark Stuart. Thus had it been arranged when Clark and his comrades had been seen approaching from afar.

Slowly the U.S. Government agent and his friends advanced along the rock-strewn floor of the canyada, scanning it in anticipation of spying the Rider or her stallion, never casting so much as a glance in the direction of the twin ridges from which their hidden foes were looking down on them. And yet, oddly enough, each one of the four began to feel conscious of a sense of misgiving, a nameless apprehension, a vague uneasiness that stole upon them as they penetrated deeper into the defile.

It has been said that men who live cheek-by-jowl with danger sometimes develop a curious instinct, a sixth sense, which tends to warn them of an enemy's presence before that enemy has revealed himself to the eye. Such might have been the case now as far as Clark, Davy Crockett, Jamison and Bowie were concerned, for there was not one of them whose career had not been fraught with hairbreadth escapes and desperate situations. On the other hand, it may have been the deathly silence which reigned over the gulch that communicated to them a feeling of tension and nervousness.

At any rate, none of them gave any audible indication of foreboding, each trying to dismiss the premonition from his mind as something that was unfounded.

"It's mighty quiet, an' if the Rider's around she ain't keepin' much of a look-out," Bowie said presently, "or she'd have spotted us by now an' showed herself."

Clark fidgeted in his saddle. "Maybe we got here too late," he muttered anxiously. "Maybe those outlaws have been and gone. Maybe she's—"

He checked all at once, for his keen eyes had detected imprints on the ground ahead—the imprints of hoofs which led from the eastern end of the defile and then split up, one set of tracks turning off up the canyada's left-hand slope, the other swinging across to the slope on the right.

"Say," he ejaculated, "a whole bunch of horsemen seem to have been here pretty recently, unless I'm mistaken. Take a look at these."

He dismounted to examine the imprints more closely, and his companions followed suit. Then, having scrutinised those tracks, Clark raised his glance towards the summits of the acclivities on each side of the defile, and it was as he was conning the ridge on the right that he espied a man's head lift into view above a craggy boulder.

He recognised the face that was disclosed. It was the face of Macklin, and at sight of that ruffian the big frontiersman gave vent to an exclamation and whipped his six-gun from its holster.

Realising he had been spotted, Macklin ducked. In the same instant Clark's revolver belched flame and lead, the smashing report of the shot splitting the silence of the canyada startlingly, the bullet clipping splinters from the boulder behind which Macklin had crouched down again.

And then pandemonium broke loose in that remote ravine of the northern hills. From all points along the rims of the twin promontories that overlooked the defile the forty-fives of Zamora and his satellites gave grim response to the missile discharged by Clark, puffs of gun-smoke issuing from the gangsters' coverts, deadly slugs zipping viciously around the ambushed quartet in the canyada and kicking up spurts of dust and stones.

The ravine echoed and re-echoed the blatter of the fusillade, and the tumult of the shooting and the ugly whew of lead struck terror into the mounts of Clark Stuart and his friends, the animals plunging and eavorting wildly. Indeed, those belonging to Jamison, Crockett and Bowie tore their reins free from their masters' hands, and suddenly the brones were wheeling to stampe out of the canyada in panic-flight.

Headless of their owners' stentorian cries, the ponies dashed from the defile, leaving Crockett and Jamison and Bowie without the slightest prospect of escaping from the death-trap—for, if there had been some slender chance of each of the four ambuscaded pioneers beating a retreat on horseback and regaining open ground to show the outlaws a clean pair of heels, there was certainly no hope of any of them except Clark accomplishing such a project now.

Clark alone had retained control of his horse. Yet he had no impulse to swing himself astride the creature and seek safety by galloping out of the canyada and abandoning his comrades to their fate. Instead he yelled to the other three men to burrow down amongst a cluster of rocks hard by, and as they made for those rocks he accompanied them in a blundering fashion, dragging his scared sorrel after him.

As on many another occasion, the gun-play of Zamora and his rascally crew was not characterised by any outstanding degree of accuracy, or Clark and his friends would have been struck down by the opening salvo. As it was, they reached the nearby rocks without so much as a scratch being inflicted on them, and from the shelter of these natural breastworks of granite they began to pump retaliatory bullets at their foes.

Clark plied his six-gun resolutely with his right hand, the while he maintained a grip on his bronc's rein with his left. Jamison and Davy Crockett likewise handled revolvers, blazing away at the canyada's rims. As for Bowie, he added the whip-like crack of his long-barrelled rifle to the booming detonations of his partners' forty-fives and the reverberating volleys of the Zamora gang's "irons," and of the first dozen shots loosed off by the four men on the ravine's bed three hit home.

"I reckon we've got the best 'vantage-point we could've found on the floor o' this here canyada," Jamison presently vouchsafed, as he was reloading the chambers of his six-shooter. "An' if we can keep pickin' off them coyotes on the slopes we may come outa this ambuscade alive yet."

Davy Crockett glanced at him. "You're sort of forgettin' that our ammunition may run out long afore all them bandits have emptied their cartridge belts, Jamison, ain't you?" he rejoined.

There was a brief silence, and then Clark spoke.

"Davy's right, old timer," he said to the wagon boss. "Their ammunition is liable to outlast ours. In any case, if we're still here at nightfall they'll be able to sneak down on us in the dark an' jump us, and if they come to grips with us it will mean our finish. They're six to one against us."

He paused, and laid a hand on Jamison's arm.

"There's just one chance for us," he stated. "If I can get out of here with my sorrel I can ride south, contact the boys and bring 'em here leather-to-split. I hate to leave you, but none of us will see another sunrise if the four of us stay where we are."

The wagon boss compressed his lips.

"If you could get outa here," he breathed, "I reckon Davy an' Bowie an' I could hold these outlaws off until you showed up with the boys. But I doubt if you'd ever win your way clear o' the canyada, Clark."

"I'm gom' to try, anyhow," the younger man declared. "You and Jim Bowie and Davy Crockett do your best to keep me covered while I'm makin' my break."

Without another word he spun round towards his horse and set foot in stirrup. Then, throwing himself lithely into the saddle, he spurred for the western end of the ravine.

Immediately the fire from both sides of the canyada was redoubled, rascally desperadoes starting up from their covets to concentrate their attention on the U.S. Government agent's flying figure. Yet those ruffians who had shown themselves so spontaneously were soon flinging themselves down again, being subjected in turn to sharp shots from the rocks amid which the departing frontiersman's comrades were ensconced.

Thanks to the gun-play of Jamison, Bowie and Crockett, the gangsters on the rims of the canyada failed to keep up the furious fusillade with which they had challenged Clark's bid to escape, and, though a bullet ripped through a fold in his buckskin tunic and another seared across his left wrist, the big scout swept forth from the ravine at top speed without serious hurt and veered off to the south.

"He made it!" Jamison cried exultantly, as Clark disappeared from sight. "He made it!"

Bowie offered a curt retort. His steel-grey eyes were fastened on the south slope of the defile.

"Yeah, Clark made it all right," he barked. "But unless I miss my guess, there go three or four o' the Zamora gang for pick up hosses an' set out after him."

He motioned to a group of handits who had straightened up and who were turning to vacate their posts, and, perceiving all at once that Macklin was one of them, Bowie fell a prey to the impetuosity which was at times so characteristic of him.

"There's that treacherous varmint what joined your wagon train at Independence, Jamison!" he shouted. "I'll get him—if it's the last thing I do!"

Rifle clutched in his hands, he blundered from the rocks to obtain a better view of Macklin, but his two companions laid hold of him.

"Don't be a fool, Bowie!" Jamison panted, his fingers locked on the veteran's arm. "Come back under cover!"

With Davy's aid he dragged the old Indian fighter into the shelter of the rocks before any harm could befall him, and, Bowie putting a curb on his own

Say LISTEN HERE, fellas Getta load of THIS!

This is straight talking. All you boys—and girls, too—will miss a whole heap if you don't see the latest edition of BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL. It sure is a hot number and it's packed with the sort of stories you like best in your favourite weekly—as well as grand art plates of your favourite movie stars—on account of its being all-photogravure. So don't you let anybody put you off. Your biggest treat of the year is gonna be—

There's one for you if you ask for it Now

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

Of all Newsagents and Booksellers 4/- recklessness, the three friends settled down to a prolonged gun duel with the outlaws who still manned the canyada's slopes.

In the meantime Macklin and those who had detached themselves from the party on the south rim had vanished beyond the scope of the ambuscaded trio's vision. As Bowie had guessed, they were hurrying towards their broncs, which were concealed some little distance away, and soon they had mounted up and were giving chase to Clark Stuart.

By then Clark was a hundred yards from the mouth of the canyada whence he had escaped, and he was travelling at full pelt over the route by which he and his friends had approached the defile. Their gaze riveted on him, Macklin and his cronies gouged the flanks of their horses with their spurs and swarmed down a long gradient that slanted towards a stretch of level terrain their quarry was crossing, and for a spell it seemed as if they might head him off. But, becoming aware of their headlong rush in his direction, the frontiersman bore away to the right.

Frustrated in their hopes of intercepting him, Macklin and his confederates reached level ground and pressed after him, blazing at him as they rode—failing, however, to bring him down.

Onward to the tattoo of drumming hoofs sped the U.S. Government agent and his pursuers, and before long it was apparent that Clark's sorrel had the legs of the gangsters' broncs. Yet, even as the frontiersman was congratulating himself on possessing a mount that was more than a match for those of his enemies—even as he was telling himself that he would continue to push westward until he had outstripped the crooks and could safely swerve on to his original course again—he beheld in front of him a dark, ragged cleft that seemed to extend north and south as far as the eye could see.

It was a sinister chasm that cut clear across his path, and as he gained the edge of it he discovered that it was fully two hundred feet in depth and of a width that no pony could have spanned at a jump. His escape, in fact, was completely balked by that fearsome abyss—nor was there any chance of eluding his foes by turning to right or left, for they were bound to head him off if he did so and drive him over the cleft's brink to his doom.

There was nothing for it but to stand his ground and shoot it out with the pursuers, and, wheeling to face them, he raised his six-gun. As he drew trigger, however, the hammer of the weapon fell with a harmless click, and, realising that the revolver was empty, he fumbled at his cartridge belt in desperate haste.

Meanwhile the group of outlaws headed by Macklin were coming up fast, but all at once the rogue who had once been a member of the Jamison wagon train seemed to divine Clark's plight, and, calling a halt on the instant, he brought up his forty-five and took aim at the frontiersman as the latter was still endeavouring to reload.

Deliberately he sighted his gun on the figure of the U.S. Government agent, assuring himself as he "drew a bead" on Clark that at this close range he could not miss, and deliberately he curled his finger around the trigger.

(To be continued in another thrill-packed episode next week. By permission of British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Ray Corrigan.)
September 17th, 1938.

"KIDNAPPED"

(Continued from page 5.)

"Who knows?" he demanded.

"The captain—I heard them in the roundhouse. I went to look for you and they were saying that they were going to turn you in at Glasgow and get the reward."

"So that's how the wind sets—it's that lad, David. He must have told."

"Quick, Alan, get the skiff!" cried Jean, and she did not tell the truth.

David Balfour gritted his teeth and glared defiantly at his tormentor. What with the bullying of the captain, Ransoine, the other cabin-boy, Riach, the mate, and fed on filthy food, he had just about had enough, and when the captain raised his belt for a second time the boy acted. He picked up a heavy ornament from a table and it caught the captain right in the stomach. The boy was out of the roundhouse and racing for the deck—he would rather drown than stay another moment on this brig. He came upon Alan and Jean prepared to launch a skiff.

The rebel half drew his sword.

"You little sneak!" he hissed. "I thought I could trust you, but you told who I am."

"No."

"You did—you're the only one aboard who knew—you told them that I was Alan Breck."

The mate had been stealthily creeping along the deck to see what was going on, and when he heard the name of Alan Breck he rushed below to tell his master. David saw that flying figure, but there was no time for words now as a number of the crew led by Captain Hoseason had appeared on deck. The boy helped Jean with the boat while Alan Breck kept off the attack with his trusty blade. How the boy's eyes gleamed as he had glimpses of the wonderful swordsmanship of the rebel. He saw the point catch the mate under the heart. At last the boat was lowered and Jean slid down a rope.

The ropes were cast off and a shout from Jean told Alan that the boat was away. He dived from the poop and was helped into the skiff. Vigorous rowing soon brought them to an island, and as there was a thick mist Alan decided to stay there till the dawn. It was then that he learned from Jean that she had made it up about the captain knowing he was Alan Breck. She had done it because she did not want to go with Janie.

"David, I've misjudged you," the rebel cried. "But if you didn't tell them I was Alan Breck, who did?"

"You did yourself, you big blunderhead," retorted the lad with spirit. "On the deck when you called me a sneak and shouted out your own name."

"I'm sorry, lad," Alan held out his hand. "Shall we be friends from now on? True friends that trust and help each other always?"

"True friends it is, sir, but I still wish you weren't a rebel."

Condemned to Death

EBENEZER BALFOUR was invited to the offices of Mr. Angus Rankeillor, the lawyer, and there he met a Mr. and Mrs. MacKenzie, who pretended that whilst collecting driftwood by their cottage on a lonely island they had rescued a half-drowned boy. They expected Ebenezer to do right by then for tending him. "Not a shilling,"

September 17th, 1938.

was the miser's answer, but they persisted and asked for the same amount that he had paid Captain Hoseason for the kidnapping.

"The lad claims he's the rightful heir of Balfour," stated Alan Breck, "and you paid Hoseason to get him out of the way. We can keep our mouths shut, but you'll pay us the sum you paid Hoseason—two hundred pounds."

"Twenty pounds was the bargain," screamed the miser.

The door opened and in walked the lawyer, David, and one of the clerks. Ebenezer realised he had been tricked into a betrayal, and he railed and cursed, but when he went he knew that Balfour Castle was his home no longer.

Rankeillor had been a willing accessory to this trickery. He had always loathed Ebenezer Balfour, and although a lawyer and not a soldier he had admired the pluck and perseverance of Alan Breck in a lost cause.

Jean was all smiles because, when they had reached Glasgow, it was to find that the cowardly Jamie had taken the first boat to Newfoundland. She stated firmly that she was not going back to Glencoe and that she was never leaving Alan. They were discussing the possibilities of getting married when a commotion in the street took them to the windows.

Of all the bad luck Ebenezer must bump into Captain Hoseason. The rogue had come to Edinburgh because at the docks in Glasgow he had heard something that told him his quarry had flown, and the covetous rogue was after the reward. Ebenezer howled that he had contracted for the captain to take the lad to the Carolinas, and instead he had been flung off near the Isle of Mull. David had escaped drowning, and now he was a pauper. At once Hoseason guessed the identity of the two people who had tricked Ebenezer, and as the result soldiers rushed to surround the lawyer's office. Alan Breck tried to get away down a drain pipe and down an alleyway, but it was too late. They arrested him for the murder of the King's tax collector.

The only satisfaction that David had was that lawyer Rankeillor was able to have Ebenezer and Hoseason arrested for kidnapping, which was a crime punishable by hanging.

If only they could have got hold of Janie a confession might have been secured. Jean would even have married Jamie to save Alan's life. The court sentenced Breck to be hung and his body to swing in chains at a gibbet. The prisoner was asked if he had anything to say.

"You can hang me for hanging's sake, but not for murder," his voice rang through the court-room. "Of that I stand innocent. Nor can you hang me for treason, for how can a man be traitor to King or country that he has never called his own."

The Duke of Argyll was alarmed. The erection of the scaffold seemed to have thrown the whole of Scotland into a ferment. This man Alan Breck was even more of a national hero than his Grace had imagined. Deputations of clansmen called on him and begged him not to hang Alan Breck.

"Grant us his life," one clansman cried, "and we swear to submit to English rule."

"Your offer's absurd. Alan Breck would never be loyal to King George. With that man alive there can never be peace between England and Scotland. Alan Breck must hang."

The duke granted the last request of the condemned man. Jean and Alan were married. They dragged him back to his cell after the ceremony. David Balfour would not despair, and in desperation he resolved to see the duke, and he managed to get into the duke's palace.

The duke was pacing his room. Every langman selected for the task had either turned tail or had been abducted by the clansmen. He was wondering if he should get another company of Grenadier Guards from Berwick when he realised he was not alone. A slim lad.

"Who the devil are you?"

"Please, your Grace, please let Alan Breck go free. You musn't hang him. He's innocent. I know the man who killed Red Fox. I saw him—it's a man they call Jamie. I'm no rebel, sir, but Alan Breck is my friend and we're pledged to help each other always. And if you'll be so good as to pardon him, sir, I can keep him out of Scotland. You see, I'm the Laird of Balfour."

"And what makes you think he'll stay there?" chuckled the duke.

"There is a lass who has a way with him, sir. If you'll only spare his life, sir."

"No, his fate's decided," rasped the duke. "I cannot change it."

But the duke was so impressed by young David that he visited the rebel in his cell, and after talking with the rebel knew that this frank-eyed man could never be a murderer. He gulled Alan Breck into talking of the cause for which he fought and his reasons. The duke offered a bargain to the condemned man. He would guarantee to do all the reforms that Alan sought, if Alan for his part would beg the mob gathered together for the hanging to disperse.

"Tell them to return to their homes in peace—for the sake of the country we both love," suggested the duke, and Alan Breck promised.

There was a vast crowd to see the hanging of Alan Breck, and when the rebel appeared on a balcony of the court house the crowd surged forward shouting his name. It would take but a spark for these dour Scotsmen to charge through the soldiers. Alan raised his arms.

"Scotsmen, my people! The duke and I have bargained. He has promised to lift the burden of our taxes. In return I have pledged you to peace. Let there be no rioting, revolt or bloodshed."

"What about you, Alan Breck?" they cried.

"Alan Breck has asked naught for himself!" The duke stepped forward. "Yet, because of him, we are a people united for the first time—united, God willing, for all time. In the face of such service to the Scotland he loves more than life itself, I feel it my bounden duty to alter the sentence of hanging to exile."

The departure of Alan Breck and his wife was almost in the same category as one given to a prince. The clansmen were there to bid him farewell, and they vowed to see that the Duke of Argyll fulfilled his promises.

"Why don't you come along with us, David," Jean said shyly to our young hero.

"I'd like to, but I've business to attend to," was the simple, frank answer.

"After all, I am the Laird of Balfour, and I must grow up to be a good Scotsman."

"That's right, David, your place is here," Alan Breck cried as he bade the boy farewell. "Scotland for ever!"

(By permission of 20th Century Fox, Ltd., starring Warner Baxter as Alan Breck and Freddie Bartholomew as David.)

"LAW OF THE UNDERWORLD"

(Continued from page 12)

grabbed her before she could fire, wrenching the weapon from her hand.

"No you don't, Dorothy! Give me that. You know how I hate guns. Beat it!"

Her eyes blazing, the woman snarled sneeringly past the group of silent gangsters, and without another word, left the office.

"Sweet kid, that one," grinned Batsy. Late that night, the singer, spurred on by the desire for revenge which filled her whole being, phoned Warren Rogers and gave him the tip that if he raided the Club Sultan he would pick up the whole mob concerned in the Morton Store affair. Surprised as he was, the District Attorney promised to attend to it at once, and come round to her apartment with police protection, for now that she had taken the plunge, Dorothy Palmer was a creature of nerves, fearing the vengeance which would fall on a squealer.

But the only people the squad of twenty police picked up when they raided the club were Annabelle and Tommy. Gene and Batsy, who had been having a late meal with them after the ordinary patrons left, had doused the lights and ducked out the back way when they heard the thunderous knocking on the door that announced the police swoop.

Annabelle and Tommy, hiding under a table, were spotted by the eagle eyes of Captain Gargan and ordered sternly to come out.

"We didn't do anything," panted Tommy, helping the girl to her feet.

"Honest," cried Annabelle, "we were just sitting here, eating, and you burst in, and—"

Gargan grinned at her.

"Yes, sure, the place has been closed for an hour, and you're just sitting here eating! We'll take those kids in, anyway!"

Meanwhile, out in the back alley by which they had escaped, Gene turned to Batsy.

"I can't let the kids take the rap for this! We can thank Dorothy."

"Don't you worry about her," said Batsy grimly. "I'll take care of her!"

Third Degree

"YOU'RE sure the raid went off all right?" Dorothy Palmer looked nervously at Warren Rogers and his assistant, Barton, a lean-faced man with pince-nez glasses. "Then your boys will have a little surprise for you when you get back to the station. An old friend of yours, named Gene Fillmore, will be there!"

Warren Rogers' brow clouded. "Fillmore—Gene Fillmore? What's he got to do with it?"

The woman enjoyed the annoyance in his tone.

"He's what the newspapers mean when they talk about a crime wave. How much protection are you going to give me?"

"All that's necessary." Warren's tone was brusque, for in spite of the fact that she was giving him valuable information, the District Attorney found the whole thing distasteful. He took the phone as the station rang, then turned to her again. "All they picked up in that raid was a couple of kids. Now what's all this about Gene Fillmore?"

"I tell you it's true! He's the man you want. He hired those two kids for the Morton robbery."

"Let's check on that, Warren," suggested Barton.

"We'll see you later," said Rogers to the woman.

They had just shut the door when a shot cracked from the window. Dorothy Palmer gave a little sigh and crumpled. When the lawyers and the two policemen with them dashed back, they caught a glimpse of Batsy's face just disappearing from the window.

Hastily he began clattering down the fire-escape. But a patrolling policeman who had heard the shot spotted him. The cop's revolver roared. Batsy threw up his arms, swayed, and toppled from the escape, to land with a dreadful thud on the concrete fifty feet below. The trail of death started by Rocky Mosby had ended with the shooting of Dorothy Palmer and the death of her executioner.

Warren Rogers could see that the woman had died instantly.

"I can't believe Gene had anything to do with this," he muttered, kneeling by her body. "The more I think of it, the more preposterous it seems. What could I possibly accuse him of?"

"Maybe this is Exhibit A!" Barton began going through an ornate bureau. He handed Warren Rogers a cheque. It was made out to Dorothy Palmer for one thousand dollars, and signed by Gene Fillmore.

"That's Gene's signature all right," said Rogers grimly. "I want to talk to those two kids. You boys wait for the coroner."

But Annabelle and Tommy, scared as they were, yielded nothing on cross-examination. They denied knowing anybody by the name of Gene Fillmore, and said Dorothy Palmer must have been lying when she linked their names with the crime.

"We never heard of any Gene Fillmore," said Tommy. "If he's the man you're after, why don't you arrest him and leave us alone?"

"Because if we arrest him now, we'll never be able to make it stick. That's why I want you two. I want to build up a case against Fillmore so that no jury on earth will fail to put him in the electric chair."

Warren Rogers' determination hardened when he took the pair to the hospital, and Edward Larkin, still weak and ill, positively identified them as the people who had caused him to lay all the trays on the counter. He couldn't understand the motives of Annabelle and Tommy, but he intended to knock the truth out of them for their own sakes.

Leaving Annabelle in his office, he took Tommy into a grim, darkened room, where the only light was a strong spotlight which shone directly on the prisoner's face. Here Rogers, Barton and Captain Gargan fired questions at Tommy till his brain reeled. Nervously he toiled at his collar, his face streaming with sweat. But still he wouldn't admit anything.

"Tommy," said Rogers sternly, "I've given you every chance, but you're making it tougher and tougher for yourself. You have a fine sense of loyalty, but it's misguided. You've got to look to the law to help you now."

"Kid, we call this the singing-room," Gargan grated. "Because sooner or later everybody sings in here."

Warren Rogers allowed Tommy to see Annabelle for a moment in the hope they would say something. Outside, he listened with Gargan.

"They're listening to every word we say," Tommy whispered, holding Annabelle close. "No matter what they do, we can't talk. If we talk, they've got us."

"But Mr. Larkin identified us!"

"They can't prove any connection with the gang unless we talk!"

Rogers came in expectantly. Their expressions decided him.

"You don't leave us any choice," he said. "The rest is up to you."

He gave the sobbing girl a chair in his office. She was racked with anxiety. What was happening to Tommy in the hands of those hard-faced men? Calm-faced, Rogers pretended to read a book, while the girl fidgeted. The clock ticked slowly on. No sound came from the inner-room.

It wasn't until Gargan looked in that she broke.

"He hasn't broken yet," he snapped. "But he will."

Jim's got a first-class football-FREE!

It's from Cadbury's! Jim's collected 61 cocoa coupons, and look at this fine full-size football Cadbury's have sent him! Ask your mother to get you Bournville Cocoa. Save the coupons and you can have a football too. Lots of other gifts besides. Post the form below for the Bournville Cocoa Gift Book.

BOURNVILLE COCOA 6d. per 1/4 lb.

POST COUPON FOR YOUR FREE COPY

To 'NEW GIFTS,' Dept. A 178, CADBURY, BOURNVILLE. Please send me the 44-page Book of Gifts with free coupon. (Please write in BLOCK LETTERS).

NAME:

ADDRESS:

A 178 17, 9/38. Post in unsealed envelope (postage 3d.). This offer applies to Great Britain and Northern Ireland only.

"All right, don't let up. Keep pounding those questions."

"Don't!" shrieked the girl. "Don't beat him any more, please! I'll tell you! We were hired to go into Morton's and we were part of the gang!"

Warren Rogers smiled with satisfaction as she buried her face in her hands, but when Tommy was brought in they still wouldn't implicate Gene Fillmore.

"I'm asking you to testify that Gene Fillmore hired you!" snapped Rogers.

"We don't know any Gene Fillmore. It was—it was Rocky who hired us!" Tommy glanced round frantically. "Rocky did!"

"Take them back to their cells," said Rogers wearily. To Barton he added: "They've got courage. Too bad it's wasted."

The only thing left was a bluff, and to carry it out the young lawyer went to call on Gene Fillmore, and noted with grim amusement that he was giving a party before sailing for Europe. Smiling aside Gene's chaff, he brought up the subject of Dorothy Palmer.

"You know her pretty well, don't you?"

"I've heard of her," said Gene lightly. "She's a night club singer. Has a good voice."

"You know her better than that," said Warren grimly. "You gave her a cheque for a thousand dollars."

Gene laughed.

"Well, why the mystery, Warren? Of course I gave her a cheque!"

"She was killed last night," said Rogers quietly, "and you're involved."

"Really? Well, what d'you want me to do?"

"I think you'd better come down to my office."

"It won't take long, Warren? Remember, I don't want to miss my boat."

"I hope you don't," said Rogers meaningly as Gene excused himself to his guests.

Captain Gargan met them directly they entered Warren's office.

"Mr. Rogers, Tommy and Annabelle have just signed a confession admitting that Gene Fillmore is the head of the gang!"

Tommy jumped up furiously.

"We did not! We never said a word about you!"

"If you didn't know Gene," put in Rogers swiftly, "how did you pick him out so quickly?"

Dismayed, Tommy turned away. Gene smiled his appreciation of the clever trap.

"Frankly, I don't know what this is all about. Who are these children—yours?"

"Take them into the next room," Warren ordered. "No use stalling, Gene. We've got you."

"Got me? On what grounds?"

"I'm afraid you're headed for the chair. You were back of the Morton job."

"Really? What makes you think so?"

"Perhaps this sounds flattering, but it was such an ingenious job that it would take a mind like yours to conceive it."

"Why, I'm surprised at you, Warren! The courts call that imagination, not evidence."

"Gene, I wasn't even sure myself until those kids picked you out. Dorothy Palmer told us about them and Rocky and the Morton job. It all fits in with your European trip."

"It's the testimony of a dead woman against mine," said Gene coldly. "and you know, Warren, frankly I'm conceited enough to think I'll be believed."

"Who are you after?"

"You'll never get me," smiled Gene.

"Gene," said Warren earnestly, "let's forget for a minute which side of the fence we're on. The real tragedy of this is not Dorothy Palmer, or the Morton Store—it's those two youngsters in there. Those two kids are just as guilty of murder as the gunman who did the actual shooting."

Gene's lips curled scornfully. He was

"We've also got this," said Warren sombrely. "a sworn confession from those kids, saying that they were part of the gang."

"You mean those kids confessed to murder?"

"Read it!"

Gene laughed softly as he read.

"Well, this doesn't involve me at all. That's a very cheap trick, Warren."

The attorney shook his head.

"No, I'm just being honest with you. I'll admit we could have pushed those kids a lot further, but they would never have willingly implicated you. But it's just a question of time."

"Who are you after?"

"You."

"You'll never get me," smiled Gene.

"Gene," said Warren earnestly, "let's forget for a minute which side of the fence we're on. The real tragedy of this is not Dorothy Palmer, or the Morton Store—it's those two youngsters in there. Those two kids are just as guilty of murder as the gunman who did the actual shooting."

Gene's lips curled scornfully. He was convinced a jury would never convict the youngsters, and he held to his belief. When an assistant wanted to speak to Rogers alone, and was asked to go into the next room, Gene found them sitting there in a strained silence.

But Tommy jumped up angrily.

"Look, you got us into this, now get us out of it!"

"I'm sorry, kids," muttered Gene.

"You're sorry. Words don't help any. Get us out of this." Tommy was frantic by now, his nerve breaking.

"D'you want us to die?" Gene shook his head grimly. "Well, then, tell them you sent us. Tell them you made us go!"

"Gene," Annabelle pleaded, "if you'd only tell them you sent us to the jewellery store we could go free."

"Stop it, will you?" rasped the gangster. "Why should I worry about your problems? I've got plenty of my own!"

"You've got to help us out. We don't want to die!" Tommy's voice broke.

"Neither do I. Maybe if I can get out I can hire lawyers to fight for you."

Then Warren came in, carrying some papers.

"Gene, in case you've changed your mind, here's a confession all ready to sign."

"Why should I, Warren? Do you think I'm crazy?"

"I've got these kids," said Warren grimly. "They haven't a chance."

"Well, how would my signing help them?"

"I might go easy," Rogers shrugged, staring into his eyes.

"That isn't enough," snapped Gene Fillmore. "I want the unconditional release of Tommy and Annabelle!"

Tense silence gripped them all as the attorney stared at the gangster. Then he handed a foolscap sheet of Gene.

"Here are the two confessions. Sign yours and you can tear up theirs."

With tears in her eyes, Annabelle stared at Gene. His face had whitened, the jaw muscles standing out like cords. He was fighting an inward battle. The desire for life was strong. But he couldn't see these innocent youngsters suffer for the crime that had really been Rocky's. Firmly he gripped the pen and wrote his signature. Without a word he handed his confession to Warren Rogers, and took the confession of Tommy and Annabelle.

"Gene, it's too bad a man with your brains went wrong. You'd have been a big shot in legitimate business."

When he left the trio alone for a moment there was silence. Then Annabelle said haltingly:

"Is there anything we can do for you?"

"No, thank you, Annabelle," he said with a return of his former grim humour. "Mr. Rogers will make me very comfortable." He tore up the confession and gave the pieces to the girl. "There's a little present from me to you. Now get out of here, both of you, and don't ever come back!"

When they left, after Annabelle had planted a sly kiss on his cheek, Gene Fillmore lit a cigarette with steady fingers and strolled to the window. Warren Rogers gripped his arm.

"Come on, Gene."

"Oh, just a minute!" said Gene, without turning, "I want to watch the kids go out."

(By permission of Radio Pictures, Ltd., starring Chester Morris and Anne Shirley.)

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"KIDNAPPED"

Alan Breck Warner Baxter
David Balfour Freddie Bartholomew
Jean MacDonald Arleen Whelan
Duke of Argyll C. Aubrey Smith
Captain Hoseason Reginald Owen
Ebenezer Balfour Miles Mander
Jamie Ralph Forbes
Ranke'ller H. B. Warner
Riach Arthur Hohl
Minister MacDougall E. E. Clive
Dominie Campbell Halliwell Hobbes
Ransome Donald Haines
Douglas Maroni Olsen
Red Fox Leonard Mudie

"THE ADVENTURES OF MARCO POLO"

Marco Polo Gary Cooper
Princess Kukulchin Sigrid Gurie
Ahmed Basil Rathbone
Binguccio Ernest Truex
Kaidu Alan Hale
Kublai Khan George Barbier
Nazama Binnie Barnes
Chen Tsu H. B. Warner
Bayan Stanley Fields
Toctai Harold Huber

"LAW OF THE UNDERWORLD"

Gene Fillmore Chester Morris
Annabelle Porter Anne Shirley
Rocky Mosby Eduardo Ciannelli
Warren Rogers Walter Abel
Tommy Brown Richard Bond
Dorothy Palmer Lee Patrick
Batsy Paul Guilfoyle
Captain Gargan Frank M. Thomas
Bill Eddie Acuff
Eddie Jack Arnold
Johnny Jack Carson
Barton Paul Stanton
Frank George Skegley
Larry Anthony Ward

"BULLDOG DRUMMOND'S PERIL"

Colonel Neilson John Barrymore
Captain Hugh Drummond John Howard
Phyllis Clavering Louise Campbell
Algy Longworth Reginald Denny
Tenny E. E. Clive
Doctor Botulian Porter Hall
Aunt Blanche Elizabeth Patterson
Green Longworth Nydia Westman
Professor Goodman Halliwell Hobbes
Sir Raymond Blantyre Matthew Boulton
Mrs. Weevens Zeffie Tilbury
Roberts Austin Freeman

"THE ADVENTURES OF MARCO POLO"

(Continued from page 8)

number of other prisoners, were the cause of the uproar. Kaidu went to the throne-room in the big tent to pass judgment, and he had scarce sat down when he was joined by Nazama. He scowled fiercely and ordered the first case to be brought before him.

Soon Chung, captain of the second corps, had wilfully and brutally put to death eight of his men without giving them benefit of trial. The witnesses against Soon Chung were the men of his own command, and they demanded the death of this murderer.

"All right, Lord Kaidu, put me to death," cried the officer. "But if you do you'll find that no soldier in this army will obey any command from any officer—including you."

"I'll have to think this over and make a decision later," announced Kaidu. "Next case." He turned to whisper to Nazama. "That Soon Chung is one of the worst brutes in the army, I'd like to kill him with my own hands, but I daren't punish him publicly." He looked up and saw Marco and Binguccio. "Who is this?"

"My troop was camped last night in the Meiji Pass and we caught these two men spying on us," was the report.

"My name is Marco Polo, Lord Kaidu," spoke the prisoner. "I am a representative of Polo Brothers, honourable merchants, and this is my servant. We come from Venice." He decided on a daring experiment. "I could tell you how to settle the case you have just heard."

Kaidu gasped at such effrontery and was going to have the prisoners immersed in boiling oil, but Nazama stayed him. She liked the build of this tall, handsome stranger. Let him first speak. Marco was ordered to step forward, and he spoke his suggestion very softly. Kaidu listened and smiled.

"Soon Chung, I acquit you of the charges against you and set you free," Kaidu called out, and the officer was freed. Then the rebel turned to the soldiers of Chung's command, who were also under arrest. "And I will also set free any man who kills him."

Soon Chung gave a cry and ran with his soldiers chasing after him. His death was not very pleasant. Thus ended the life of one of Ahmed's treacherous agents. Kaidu was so delighted that he set Marco and Binguccio free. He noted the interest in Nazama's eyes and that made him even more happy—this stranger should keep his jealous wife intrigued whilst he flirted with one of her serving wenches.

By his quick wit Marco had saved their lives, but he was very much a prisoner though he was given fine raiment and a special tent. In the days that followed he had to talk much about Venice and his people, and to pay especial attention to Nazama. It was a relief to find that kissing was not known among the Tartars, but he got rather tired of rubbing noses with the rebel's lovely but dangerous wife. In this camp Marco found one more treasure for his little bag—it was a lump of coal. It was found in the valleys and used for fuel. All the while Marco was thinking how to get back to Peking.

Marco feared that all was not well in Peking, and he was right. News came to Ahmed that the emperor's mighty army had been swept away in a typhoon, and only a handful had reached the shore in safety. The same day as this news arrived the Persian ambassador put in another appearance. He brought a jewelled casket, in which was a necklace for Princess Kukachin. Ahmed's eyes glistened. He had the ambassador cast to the vultures, and he took the casket to the princess. She was not pleased to see him in her apartments. She refused to accept the necklace, and said that her father would punish him for daring to come to her unannounced.

"Disaster has overtaken your father and his army!" Ahmed cried, his eyes triumphant. "I have decided, princess, that you will not have to undertake the long and tiresome journey to Persia, for I have decided on the seventh moon you will be my wife. You will share my throne and my glory as sovereign of the greatest empire the world has ever known."

"You inhuman beast!" she cried in horror. "You don't at the moment think me qualified to be your husband," Ahmed smiled mockingly. "But time will convince you of your error. I have had seventy-eight wives already, and I have profited by experience."

When alone the princess summoned her maid Visakha and told her the dire news that her father was probably dead and most of the mighty army destroyed. She must

You can have all these wonderful Brock's Firework novelties—and lots more on Guy Fawkes night, if you join our Club now. Somewhere near you is a shop displaying BROCK'S CLUB notice. Go to that shop—give the shopman a penny or so; he'll enter it on your savings card—and you're off. Add a copper or two each week, and as the Fifth gets near no doubt Dad will swell your savings with a shilling or two. Then you'll have the thrill of selecting Brock's latest firework surprises without dipping into your pocket specially.

Join
BROCK'S
CRYSTAL PALACE
FIREWORK CLUB Now!
Get your Club Card today -

ROYAL NAVY Boys may now enter between the ages of 15 and 17½ years. Full particulars are contained in the illustrated booklet "The Royal Navy as a Career and How to Join It," which may be obtained on application to the Recruiting Staff Officer, R.N. and R.M. (N), 85, Whitehall, London, S.W.1, or at any Post Office.

HAVE YOU GOT YOURS?

Write for Catalogue of Riley "Home" Billiard Tables NOW! Also full details of 32 Billiard Tables being GIVEN AWAY.

E. J. RILEY, LTD., Ensign Works, ACCRINGTON, and Dept. 36, 147, Aldersgate St., London, E.C.1. QP go to the Tower of Eagles and dispatch one of these birds with a message.

All applications for Advertisement Space in this Publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "BOY'S CINEMA," The Fleetway House, Farringdon St., London, E.C.4.

"How far would he have gone?"
"He would be in Chingtien by now," thought the maid. "If he travelled fast."

"He would travel fast!" cried the princess. "Send the eagle to Chingtien."

That eagle was sighted by some of Kaidu's men on outpost duty, and it was shot down and the message was brought to Kaidu's tent. The rebel handed the message to his prisoner.

"Tell Marco Polo that I need him," Kukachin had written, and she had drawn a small arrow.

"You're quite a lady's man," mocked Kaidu. "What's your secret?"

"Kaidu! Let me go back!" desperately pleaded Marco. "She is in danger. I must help her."

But Kaidu had found a companion for his wife and he refused. He warned Marco not to try to escape. Marco went off to his tent in a rage. He paced up and down, and then went outside to try to think. It was then that he saw Toctai, and recognised him by the scar.

The rogue had managed to get into the Tartar camp, and Marco soon found out the man had bribed his way to the position of night guard to Kaidu's tent. Now Toctai did not know that his master had planned to destroy Marco, and when the Venetian beckoned him to his tent he thought that Marco had just acted up to Ahmed's instructions. Suspecting nothing, he told Marco much news of importance. He had heard from Ahmed. The princess was a prisoner and would soon be Ahmed's wife. Very soon Ahmed would rule the whole of Cathay—directly Kaidu was dead.

To Binguccio's amazement his master aided and abetted the scheme to kill Kaidu, but when Toctai did rush in to pierce the sleeping Kaidu with his lance it was the shield held by Marco that deflected the blow.

"That is one of Ahmed's men!" Marco cried as the guard rushed in. "Seize him!"

"Traitor! Traitor!" the wretch screamed as they dragged him away.

"You saved my life!" gasped the grateful rebel.

"It was nothing personal, Kaidu," blandly answered Marco. "It's just that I'd do anything to annoy Ahmed."

After that the two men had a heart-to-heart talk, and Kaidu explained why he was in revolt against the emperor.

"Because my people have been taxed to the point of starvation. I don't mind paying proper tax to Kublai Khan, but I won't pay taxes to Ahmed for his private treasury. I and my people would rather die fighting."

"Ahmed!" Marco snapped his fingers. "So he's the cause of your rebellion. I don't blame you. There is one more thing you ought to know."

"What?"
"You must take your army to Pekin, storm the palace—"

"My army against all the forces of Kublai Khan."

"Kublai Khan and his forces have gone to war against Japan, and Ahmed is in command at the palace. That's what the message from the princess meant. Ahmed is going to marry her and make himself emperor."

"Ahmed! Emperor of China!" shouted Kaidu. "Better the Black Plague."

"You're the only one to prevent it. The road to Pekin is open to you. No one can stop you."

September 17th, 1938.

"But the palace walls. I have no siege machinery."

"You'll have to leave it to me to get you through the walls," Marco said with confident assurance.

The Siege of Pekin

AHMED was preparing for his wedding when Bayan appeared to report that the emperor was returning.

"With the whole army?" Ahmed asked in alarm.

"No, only his bodyguard—a few hundred men. We could kill them all before they reach the palace gates."

"Let them come in," decided Ahmed. "Welcome his Majesty with the usual ceremony. Do as I say!" he cried as the man hesitated. "And bring the princess here at once."

A weary, sorrowful Kublai Khan was surprised to find so much gaiety in Pekin. Why all these flags and banners? He found it was in preparation for a wedding. In his own throne-room he learnt from the mocking lips of Ahmed the name of the bridegroom. Ahmed placed a document before the frightened old man.

"It is necessary for you to sign this at once. It is merely formal acknowledgement that when I am married to your daughter and you are dead, I am recognised as the rightful heir to your throne."

"You black-livered traitor!" cried the emperor, and called for his guards in vain. He refused to sign until Ahmed whipped back some curtains to reveal Kukachin gagged and bound tightly to a post close to a cage full of hungry vultures, who were straining at their chains to get at her. The emperor signed the fatal document.

Ahmed clapped his hands.

"Release the princess!" he ordered of his slaves. "And see that she dresses for the marriage ceremony."

It was a surprise to Chen Tsu to see Marco Polo again. The Venetian had no time to waste on philosophies. He wanted all the fire powder that the little chemist possessed, and it was for Ahmed's wedding festival. Also Chen Tsu must help him get into the palace, and the little Chinaman made him strip, then he painted his body a rich brown and garbed him in the scanty attire of a Malay. Finally, Marco wound a turban round his head and gave instructions about the destination of the fire-boxes he had ordered.

Kukachin had been dressed by Visikha for the ceremony, but the unhappy princess was contemplating committing suicide by throwing herself from her balcony when a strange, brown-skinned man appeared. What a cry of delight when she recognised Marco, but he had no time for kissing. He told her to delay the marriage ceremony as long as she could. A cry from the walls brought him out on the balcony. He rushed back to his princess.

"It's Kaidu at last!" he cried. "I must go and open the gates to him. I will return, beloved."

From the citadel tower Ahmed saw Kaidu's approach, and he gave orders that all the gates to the city be closed but the west gate and the gate to the palace. As Kaidu charged into Pekin followed by his soldiers the palace gate closed in his face. Then the west gate closed, and Kaidu's army looked as if it were trapped. Arrows began to pour down from the walls and ramparts on the Tartar soldiers.

But by the palace gate there was an innocent-looking horse and cart. It had bolted up the street, and from one of its numerous boxes gunpowder had streamed. Chen Tsu had done his work well. The horse was freed and the trail of gunpowder fired.

Those gates went up in a sheet of flame, and then the Tartars charged into the palace in a surprise attack.

Meanwhile, in the palace the princess had done everything possible to delay the ceremony, but at last she had been forced to stand before the priest. Yet when she had to make her vows she prolonged them.

"I, Kukachin, of the house and blood of Genghis Khan through my father, Kublai, the Khan of Khans, and my royal mother Tofar, who was the daughter of Ildabar, who was the daughter of Queen Dir-See—" It was at that precise moment that the palace gate went up in the air.

Ahmed shouted to the girl to go on, and she was starting all over again from the beginning when the doors of the chapel burst open and there was a wild-eyed man holding a knife and sword. Then the villainous schemer recognised his enemy and drew his sword.

Ahmed fought with desperate fury, but before this young giant he had to give way. His sword broke. Marco seized the man in his arms, and it was on the edge of the void that separated Ahmed's quarters that they struggled. The emperor held his daughter close as the two men fought like furies. Marco broke his enemy's hold, pushed him over the void, and held him for a moment.

"I shall be going through Damascus soon, Ahmed!" cried Marco. "I'll tell your seventy-eight wives what has happened to you." He shook off the clinging fingers and Ahmed crashed to his doom.

Not many minutes later Marco brought Kaidu into the presence of the emperor. The rebel was surprised because he thought Kublai Khan was away fighting Japan.

"We beg to welcome you, our honoured cousin, Lord Kaidu!" cried the emperor, with something of his old pomp. "We understand that you and your people have been victims of injustice. The cause of that has been removed. It will never be repeated. I have assembled the most beautiful maidens of our court, and I beg leave to present them to you as a slight token of my high regard. You will take them with you, as your wives."

Everybody laughed, and everybody seemed happy. Marco whispered to Binguccio that now was the time to secure the trade agreements. Meanwhile he would go with Princess Kukachin into the gardens and feed the fish. The Oriental moon smiled down upon them. The two young people sighed happily, for it was the seventh moon.

"You should go across the sea to become the Queen of Persia."

"Yes."

"It's a perilous journey, but we Venetians are the world's best sailors as well as the world's best business men." He put his arm round her slim shoulders. "I think you should ask your father to appoint me as your protector on the voyage."

"I'll ask him, Marco Polo—and he'll agree." She snuggled closer. "How long does it take to get from here to Persia?"

"Oh, years and years." He kissed her. "I might even lose my way and find myself in Venice."

(By permission of United Artists Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Gary Cooper as Marco Polo, Sigrid Gurie as Princess Kukachin, and Basil Rathbone as Ahmed.)

ARE YOU IN OUR GRAND COLLECTING SCHEME?

ARE you collecting FOOTER-STAMPS? They're all the rage, and you really must be in this wonderful scheme! This is what to do: Every week in BOY'S CINEMA we are giving "Footer-Stamps"—pictures of six different actions on the football field. The object of this great stamp-game being to score as many "goals" as possible in time for the second prize-giving next week, when up to 300 footballs are to be awarded.

TO SCORE A "GOAL" you must collect a complete set of six stamps (they're numbered 1 to 6), made up of the following movements: KICK-OFF—DRIBBLE—TACKLE—HEADER—SHOT—GOAL.

Easy, isn't it? The more stamps you collect the more "goals" you can score. (Note that the "goal" stamp by itself does NOT count as a "goal"—you must get a set of the stamps 1 to 6 each time.)

We give ten more stamps this week. Cut them out and try to score a "goal" with them; then keep all your stamps until you get some more in our next issue.

If you want to score some other quick "goals" to swell your total, remember that "Footer-Stamps" are also appearing in "Sports Budget" and "Triumph."

Keep at it, pals, because the September contest will close next week, and we shall then ask you how many "goals" you have scored. Up to 300 of the FREE Footballs are going to be awarded then—for readers scoring the highest number of "goals" with "Footer-Stamps" for the month. More footballs will be given in the next month.

Don't send any stamps until we tell you how and where next week, when the closing date will be announced. RULES: Up to 300 Footballs will be awarded in the September contest to the readers declaring and sending in the largest number of "goals" scored with "Footer-Stamps." The Editor may extend or amend the prize list in case of too many ties.

Each "goal" must consist of a set of "Footer-Stamps" Nos. 1 to 6, inclusive—all claims for prizes to be made on the proper coupon (to be given next week). No allowance made for any coupon or stamps mutilated or lost or delayed in the post or otherwise. No correspondence! No one connected with this paper may enter, and the Editor's decision will be final and legally binding throughout.

(N.B.—"Footer-Stamps" may also be collected from the following papers: "GEM," "MAGNET," "MODERN BOY," "DETECTIVE WEEKLY," "TRIUMPH," "WILD WEST WEEKLY," "THRILLER," "SPORTS BUDGET" and "CHAMPION.")

OVERSEAS READERS! You pals who are far away—you're in this great scheme also, and special awards will be given for the best scores from overseas readers. There will be a special closing date for you as well, of course!

Ten More
"Footer-Stamps"
To Save!

"BULLDOG DRUMMOND'S PERIL"

(Continued from page 16.)

Roberts. Why he should disappear is a mystery to me."

"Mystery?" ejaculated Neilson. "It's all a mystery. Goodman blown to bits, Botulian gone, Roberts gone, and now Drummond gone."

"And you've no idea where Drummond can be?"

"They've found his car abandoned in a village called Market Rutherford."

"Not very helpful," replied the millionaire as he got up from his chair. "Well, I hope you'll find him and clear this thing up."

The moment he had gone Neilson picked up the telephone and spoke into it.

"Blantyre's just leaving the building. Have him closely followed. I fancy he knows something," he said.

Actually there were others besides Colonel Neilson who had had the idea of scouring Market Rutherford in search of Drummond, for Longworth, his wife, and Phyllis Clavering having heard from Neilson that Drummond's car had been found in the village had immediately rushed down there post-haste, and the trio were doing a house-to-house visitation in the hope of learning something about the missing man. And chance brought Phyllis after many failures to the house where he had been made prisoner.

Botulian, who opened the door himself to the girl, was only able to repress a start with difficulty when she told him her errand. But his smile was disarming as he invited her into the house, for he was anxious to know exactly what was going on.

She in her turn suspected no trap. He had given his name readily enough to her, and she had recognised it in a moment. And as he expressed surprise at her fiancé's disappearance and she had no idea of the part he had been playing, she told him all she knew readily enough. Finally she rose to go, but here he spoke, and now her heart missed a beat at the expression on his face.

"Sorry to have to disagree with you, my dear young lady," he said, "but I shall have to keep you here for a bit."

She stared at him. Fear had suddenly leaped into her heart.

"What d'you mean?" she managed to get out; but she had already guessed.

"Just what I said, my dear. You see, Captain Drummond happens to be here, and my prisoner; and you know far—"

But she never heard the rest of the sentence. She made a wild rush for the door, but Botulian was on her and another man had appeared suddenly. And despite her frantic struggles her hands were quickly bound behind her and she was flung on to the sofa.

Botulian addressed the man. "That will do," he said. "She won't give us any more trouble now, I think."

The man slouched away, and the girl heard a door slam in the distance. Botulian spoke quietly but venomously. "If you're thinking of screaming, I shouldn't," he said. "Because you will be gagged then, and it won't be comfortable."

"What d'you want with me?" she demanded.

A pitying smile came to his lips. "Actually I didn't want you at all," he replied. "But as you were silly enough to butt into my affairs I'm sorry to have to say that like your fiancé—"

He shrugged his shoulders. "Seems a pity, I admit, having to kill both of you, but what am I to do? It's your own fault."

Her eyes half closed. A deadly fear was surging over her, but as she opened Drummond leaped into the hall, snatching a sword from the wall as he did so. But Botulian had emerged from his hiding-place, and now the girl saw with horror as he slashed at Drummond with the whip that he evidently was well accustomed to handle. And it seemed to her as he went on slashing at her lover furiously, holding him well at bay, that there could be only one possible end to this dreadful contest.

She was struggling furiously all the time as the two men circled the hall. Botulian was lashing fiercely, savagely, and raw weals were showing on Drummond's arms. Then suddenly an extra savage lash from the whip snapped Drummond's sword in two, but in a flash Drummond had snatched down another from the wall. And this time he hurled himself at Botulian regardless of the whip, pinning his arm against the wall.

It was a scene she never forgot. Botulian's other hand had gone up over his head and his eyes were terror-stricken. Drummond had stepped back and his sword was above his head. He seemed to be gloating over his success.

"Like it, Botulian?" he jeered. "Don't—don't!" screamed the other. And then a quiet voice came from behind.

"Drop that sword, Drummond, you're covered. By Jove, Roberts, your disguise is perfect!"

Drummond spoke then. "This isn't Roberts, Sir Raymond, it's Botulian himself."

He heard a startled exclamation from Blantyre, but his voice was level when he spoke again.

"Afraid it won't matter a lot to you either way, Drummond," he said. "I've got the whip hand now and—"

But the words died in his throat as another voice broke in, and Drummond realised in a flash that it was Neilson.

"I think not, Blantyre," he said, and in a moment the room was filled with policemen, and both Blantyre and Botulian were in handcuffs and Phyllis was in her lover's arms.

Neilson was studying Botulian closely. "So you're Dr. Botulian, after all?" he queried. "But I'd like to know—"

"Oh, that's easy, colonel," interrupted Drummond. "Sir Raymond here can put you wise if only he'll talk. Eh, Sir Raymond?"

And then as the other merely scowled, Drummond went on easily:

"Goodman wouldn't sell, and Sir Raymond here tried Botulian, and the good doctor agreed to make an appointment with the professor and let Roberts take his place. That was to be his alibi. However, a better idea occurred to him, and he turned up an hour earlier and—oh, well, I'll fill in all the blanks later if you want 'em."

Neilson elucked grimly. "We'll make a detective of you yet, Hugh," he said.

(By permission of Paramount Pictures, Ltd., starring John Barrymore and John Howard.)

DON'T FORGET YOUR COPY OF

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

NOW ON SALE

PRICE 4/-

them again a wild thrill surged across her, for at that moment on the staircase behind Botulian she saw a shirt-sleeved figure creeping stealthily down—a figure that even as she saw him lay a finger on his lips. Drummond!

But Botulian had seen the hope leap into her eyes. And in a flash he had slipped behind the thick curtains.

For a few seconds there was deathly silence. Drummond came creeping stealthily down the stairs, and Phyllis saw that there was a gun in his hand. She guessed that he had failed to see where Botulian was hiding, and she was signalling him frantically with her eyes.

Lower and lower came Drummond, his gun in his hand sweeping circles. He had failed to see Botulian, who now had a whip in his hand. And then suddenly the girl gave a scream as a long, sinuous tongue leaped out swiftly from behind the curtains and Drummond's gun clattered to the floor.

WEBLEY AIR PISTOLS

Marvellously accurate for target practice.

No licence required to purchase or use at home.

Senior 45/-, Mark I 32/6,
Junior 21/-, Webley Air Rifle 95/-
Write for List WEBLEY & SCOTT LTD.
197, Weaman Street Birmingham, England.

STAMPS

300 DIFFERENT, incl. Airmail, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Fictorials, Colonials. Price 6d. (Abroad 1/-).—WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BLUSHING,

Shyness, Nerves, Self-consciousness. Worry habit. Unreasonable fears, etc., cured or money back! Complete Course, 5/-. Details—L. A. Stebbing (A), 28, Dean Rd., London, N.W.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS

Boy's CINEMA

2^D

EVERY TUESDAY
No 980
SEPT. 24. 1938

"SQUADRON OF HONOUR"

Starring DON TERRY

A hundred thousand Men on the Trail of a Cold-blooded Killer

As the result of a diabolical frame-up the National Commander of the American Legion is arrested for murder, and Dan Blaine, a young District Attorney, sets out to establish his innocence—and enlists the aid of a hundred thousand Legionnaires to capture the actual killer. A novel drama, starring Don Terry with Mary Russell, Marc Lawrence and Thurston Hall

The Way of a Schemer

SOME little trouble had been experienced in getting the horses lined up for the Thompson Handicap, the sixth race on the day's card at the Imperial Racetrack, Claremont, but the three-year-olds were off, at last, to a perfect start.

Green Bay, the favourite, took the lead almost immediately, and held it for more than three-quarters of a mile; but a horse that makes all the running in the early stages of a mile and a half race seldom wins, and long before the straight was reached Green Bay had fallen back, and Apple Pie was in front.

"Come on, Round Robin!" shouted Norman Craig, a thick-lipped and rather ugly fellow of about thirty-six, who was seated between two other men in Box 8 on the grand stand.

The horse he had named was lying seventh, and had not been mentioned by the commentator whose voice issued at intervals from loudspeakers in every enclosure.

"Attaboy, Skyrocket!" bellowed the man on Craig's right, whose name was Steve Lawlor, and who might have been good-looking—in a sinister sort of way—but for the fact that his face was heavily pock-marked.

Skyrocket had not been mentioned up to then, and Craig bestowed a scornful grin upon its supporter.

"Come on, Round Robin!" shrieked Eve Rogers, a beautiful girl next to the third man, and her sea-green eyes glistened with excitement.

The third man, John Blair Kimball, an arms magnate who owned horses, remained silently intent upon the race, and the voice of the commentator rang out:

September 24th, 1933.

"Apple Pie is still leading by a length. Round Robin is now second, and Skyrocket is in third position. Green Bay and Firebird have faded, and it looks like they'll finish out of the money. They're rounding the last turn—and here they come into the straight."

"Come on, Round Robin!" cried Eve Rogers.

Five furlongs from the judge's box, Round Robin, Skyrocket, and Apple Pie were running head and head.

"They're running so close together," boomed the voice from the loudspeakers, "it's anybody's race! It looks like a blanket finish!"

The three horses swept past the winning-post apparently in a dead line, and Craig exclaimed:

"Not a whisker between them!"

Eve Rogers, who was Kimball's secretary, asked eagerly which won.

"Too close for the naked eye," Lawlor declared.

"Oh, chief," Craig began, "did you ever see anything like that? I—"

Kimball silenced him with a jerk of his arm which was followed by a jerk of his head.

"That man's the reason for our being in this town," he said in an undertone.

Craig looked round over his shoulder and saw a heavily built man, of distinguished appearance, descending the steps of the grand stand in company with a broad-shouldered young giant whose clean-shaven face suggested strength of purpose.

"Who is he?" Craig inquired.

"Robert Metcalf," was the reply.

"National Commander of the American Legion."

"Who's the young fellow?"

"I don't know."

The "young fellow" was Dan Blaine, and he was District Attorney—and not at the race meeting for pleasure.

"There's another bookie," he said to Robert Metcalf, and the man he had indicated whispered hurriedly to a client who had been about to make a bet:

"Nix—there comes the D.A. See you later."

Bookmakers are not allowed by law on the race-tracks of California. Dan turned to an attendant who was standing on one of the steps.

"Can you tell me where Mr. Tanner's office is?"

"Right down this aisle," was the reply, "and then take the first stairway to your right."

Dan and his companion went off along a gangway between the rows of open boxes; and just then the voice of the commentator was heard again:

"Result of the sixth race. Round Robin first, Skyrocket second, and Apple Pie third."

"I win ten dollars!" rejoiced Eve Rogers. "Thanks for your tip, Mr. Kimball."

Kimball smiled indulgently.

The amplified voice of the commentator arrested the progress of people who were making their way to the totalisator building which was situated at the back of the stand:

"One moment, ladies and gentlemen.

May I have your attention, please? Mr. Lou Tanner, operating director of this track, has asked me to announce that the current meeting has been granted a ten-day extension by the State Racing Association. New stable entries and a schedule of important handicaps will be offered for your pleasure. Thank you."

Kimball rubbed his smoothly shaven chin.

"Very convenient," he remarked. "Boys, how would you like to see the Kimball colours entered on this track?"

"You're not serious?" Craig turned to stare. "They pay off in peanuts here!"

"I'm not interested in the pay-off," returned Kimball. "With my horses entered, they'll think I'm in town merely for the races." He rose to his feet. "I'll see you two at the hotel later. Miss Rogers and I are going to call on Mr. Tanner."

Dan Blaine and Robert Metcalf were in Lou Tanner's office by this time, and the full-faced and somewhat flashily dressed operating director was scowling at the young District Attorney.

"Look here, Blaine," he exploded; "the mere fact that you're D.A. doesn't give you the right to tell me how to run my race-track!"

"Just a minute, Tanner." Dan's voice was stern. "Long before you got this extension you came to an understanding with the commander. What we thought was a gentleman's agreement."

He emphasised the word "thought," and Metcalf said:

"You gave us your word that this meeting would positively end as of to-day, with the result that we set the date of our Convention so that the track would close before the legionnaires came to town."

Tanner shifted uncomfortably in his chair behind a littered desk.

"Well, I took it up with the board," he growled, "but I was overruled."

"Don't alibi, Tanner!" rapped Dan. "You're the board at this track. You lay down the rules."

Tanner became defiant.

"All right, so what?" he challenged. "Convention or no Convention, this track stays open. And you can't stop me, because it's a licensed and legitimate business."

"There are some things about it that are neither licensed nor legitimate," retorted Dan. "Under-cover bookies, for instance!"

"Aw, now you're just jumping to conclusions."

"Maybe he is," Metcalf thundered, "but here's one conclusion you can bank on—a hundred thousand legionnaires are not coming to town for your personal benefit. These boys have better uses for their bard-earped cash."

Tanner spread his hands.

"I'm doing them a favour by keeping the track open," he asserted. "The boys'll be out for a good time, and I'll give 'em—"

"A good rooking!" Dan scornfully completed.

A telephone-bell rang, and Tanner answered the call. His secretary in the outer office informed him that Mr. Kimball wished to see him about a stable entry.

"I'll see him right away," Tanner responded. "I'm practically through with these gentlemen." He put down the telephone and rose to his feet. "The track stays open, and that's final."

"All right, Tanner," said Dan grimly, "but remember I'll have a squad of men watching this place like hawks. And if we pick up one under-cover bookie around here, be prepared to take what's coming to you."

Kimball was waiting with Eve in the outer office, and as Dan and Metcalf emerged from Tanner's room the arms magnate advanced towards them.

"Mr. Metcalf, I believe?" he said in well-assumed surprise.

"Yes," nodded Metcalf.

"My name is Kimball. I think we've met before—in Washington."

"Of course," Metcalf recalled, "at the Gridiron dinner."

"Correct. This is Miss Rogers, my secretary."

Metcalf bowed and introduced Dan, who gazed at Eve with open admiration.

"Mr. Tanner will see you now," said the secretary; and Kimball explained that he was about to enter some horses for the following week's races.

"We'd rather hear you were withdrawing them," said Dan.

"Why, is there anything wrong?" asked Eve.

"Well, that's not the point," said Metcalf. "It's just that the extension period clashes with our American Legion Convention."

"It might prove somewhat distracting to the boys," added Dan.

"And to their pocket-books," suggested Eve with a smile.

"I see," said Kimball gravely. "May I offer a suggestion?"

"Why, certainly," welcomed Metcalf.

"There's an old saying, 'In a multiplicity of counsellors there is wisdom.' Why don't you gentlemen have dinner with us this evening, and we could talk the thing over?"

"Well, thank you," murmured Metcalf, "but we don't want to trouble you with our problems."

"It would be a privilege, I assure you."

"That's very kind of you," said Dan, his eyes on Eve; and Kimball promptly assumed that the invitation was accepted.

"At the Union Hotel, then, at eight," he said.

"We'll be there," promised Metcalf.

The secretary opened the door of Tanner's room, and as Kimball and Eve walked in at it Dan and Metcalf went out at the other door. The grand stand was empty; the enclosures were emptying.

"Who is this Kimball?" inquired Dan curiously, on the way to the ear park.

Finley took out a handkerchief and with it picked up the gun. "A silencer, eh?" he barked. "One shot fired. Whose gun is this?"

"One of the most dangerous men in America," Metcalf replied.

"What?" Dan stopped short in astonishment.

"He represents the arms and munitions industry."

"Why should he want to do us a favour?"

"We'll find that out to-night," said Metcalf, "at dinner."

Dan Makes an Appointment

THE Union Hotel was the largest and most expensive of all the hotels in Claremont. It towered above other buildings in Franklin Avenue, and its dining-room was a magnificent pillared apartment.

The table at which Dan and Metcalf sat opposite Eve and Kimball that evening was close to one of the gilded pillars and just sufficiently remote from the orchestra that provided a musical accompaniment to a well-chosen meal.

Eve looked exquisite in a gown that set off her slim shapeliness, and Dan found her all the more attractive because she had brains as well as beauty. Over coffee and liqueurs Kimball informed his two guests that he had not entered any of his horses in view of what had been said.

"Incidentally, commander," he went on, "I talked with several stable-owners this afternoon about withdrawing theirs."

"Yes?" Metcalf raised his brows slightly.

"I don't think it would be difficult to kill that racing extension," Kimball waved a half-consumed cigar. "After all, you can't have a horse race without horses."

"Poor Mr. Tanner!" laughed Eve. "None of you see it from his standpoint. And, you know, there are two sides to the issue."

"Sure," said Dan, "our side and the wrong side!"

"I'm afraid," said Kimball, "we older folks don't view things quite the same as you younger ones." He winked at Eve. "I feel sure you'd prefer the attractions of the roof-garden."

Eve was quite ready to act upon the hint.

"I might, if I could find a trustworthy guide," she murmured.

"You've found one!" Dan instantly declared. "Will you excuse us?"

"Of course," encouraged Kimball.

Dan and Eve crossed the room in the direction of the lounge and the elevators, and Kimball followed them with his eyes.

"They make an attractive couple, don't they?"

Metcalf ignored the question. He had accepted a cigar, but the cigar was still unlighted in his hand.

"Let's not beat about the bush, Kimball," he said almost brusquely. "You asked me to come here because you wanted something. What is it?"

"I'll get right to the point," Kimball struck a match and held it across the table so that Metcalf had practically no option but to accept a light and smoke the cigar. "There's a statute before Congress called the 'Arms Control Bill.' Are you familiar with it?"

"Thoroughly."

"Then you know that it prohibits the sale of arms to private individuals." Kimball extinguished the match and dropped it into an ashtray. "A very unfortunate piece of legislation."

"For the arms manufacturers, you mean," said Metcalf pointedly.

Kimball smiled, but not as though he were amused.

"Now I'll get right down to cases, September 24th, 1938.

commander," he said with an air of bluntness. "At the moment Congress is about evenly divided on the Bill. But I feel certain that if the American Legion were to go on record as being opposed to it—"

"Just a moment," Metcalf interrupted sharply. "Your idea of the American Legion is not entirely correct. To begin with, we're not a political organisation."

"Of course not," purred Kimball, "but as mere citizens the Legion is entitled to express its opinion, and the opinion of any two million citizens is bound to have a potent effect on Congress."

"Granted. But there's one little point you're overlooking."

"What's that?"

Metcalf spoke slowly but with warmth.

"We're not interested in the defeat of the Arms Control Bill," he stated.

"In fact, we'd like to see it pass."

"Why?"

"Because the unchecked traffic in firearms is responsible for the wholesale arming of criminals."

"But what about the law-abiding citizen?" countered Kimball. "This Bill would render him defenceless against armed criminals."

"Step the supply of firearms at the source and you'll have no armed criminals. In fact, crime would take a nose-dive. There's nothing so yellow as an underworld rat without his gun."

"Well, I guess that's all in the way you look at it. You see it one way, I see it another." Kimball leaned across the table. "I could offer you great incentive, commander, to see it my way."

"I'm afraid you couldn't," said Metcalf.

The roof-garden of the Union Hotel formed a perfect setting for romance, under the stars of a June night, as Dan and Eve leaned together against a parapet high above Franklin Avenue. It was not really dark, but it was dark enough for the city spread beneath them to be invested with an almost fairy-like charm.

"How long are you going to be in town?" Dan inquired.

"About a week," Eve replied.

"A week? That's rather short, but I think I can arrange it."

"Arrange what?"

"To show you some of the high-spots of the city."

She tilted her head at him.

"Won't you be rather busy with your convention?"

"Oh, I'll manage," he assured her.

"How does it happen that a busy District Attorney finds time to bother with the Legion?"

"It does crowd me a bit," admitted Dan, "but it's worth it. The Legion is a great organisation."

"Oh, yes, of course," she nodded, and added slyly: "It's good politics, isn't that it? Helps to further your career."

If a man had dared to say such a thing to him he would have been furious; but he could not be furious with her.

"For a young lady who's old enough to vote," he rebuked, "you show very poor judgment. Some people do things for unselfish reasons—or hadn't you heard? Maybe it's the business you're in that—"

"What's wrong with our business?" she interrupted. "It's legitimate, like any other."

"I have a conclusive argument against that."

"Let's have it."

"It's down at the Legion Post." He pointed northwards over the parapet.

"Come there to-morrow, and I'll show you around."

"It's a date," said she.

They descended to the dining-room soon afterwards, and Kimball and Metcalf rose from their table as they approached it.

"Well, how was the roof?" asked Kimball.

"Very illuminating," Eve replied.

"We'd better run along, Dan," said Robert Metcalf. "Busy day to-morrow."

After the arms magnate and his secretary had been bidden good-night, Dan turned again to Eve.

"Don't forget that appointment to-morrow," he said.

"Don't worry, I'll be there."

Craig Takes a Look Round

NEXT morning, members of the American Legion poured into Claremont from all parts of the country. They arrived by train and car and motor-coach; men who had served in the Great War and now were part of a great peace army in uniforms of navy blue.

The barracks at the Legion Post, in Harrison Avenue, had engulfed more than five hundred of them by the time Dan entered the hall of the main building, and there were thousands still to come.

In one corner of the hall more than a score of legionnaires had gathered round four comrades who were professional singers and who were rendering an old army song as a quartette. Near the foot of the stairs that led up to the executive offices a clever mimic, named Sid Hinkle, was entertaining another little crowd with one of his stories, and Dan paused to listen to the variety of voices in which the story was told.

He himself was dressed in a lounge suit and a soft felt hat, but he was recognised by men from as far away as Texas and Oklahoma.

"Good work, Sid," he said when the story was finished. "Tell 'em another."

"Okay, Dan."

The mimic embarked upon some more impersonations, and Dan ascended the stairs and passed through a large ante-room into an office where Robert Metcalf was seated at a massive desk, an imposing figure in his uniform as National Commander, with three other officers around him.

"Good-morning, gentlemen."

Dan saluted and walked over to the desk.

"Chief, the race-track extension is practically a bust," he said. "Most of the stable-owners have withdrawn their entries."

"Splendid!" boomed Metcalf. "That will settle Tanner's hash!"

"You don't seem to like this Tanner," commented one of the officers, a bulky State Commander named Denton.

"I should say not," returned Metcalf emphatically, "and I'm not particular who knows it either."

An orderly entered the room to announce:

"Mr. Tanner to see you, sir."

"Speak of the devil!" exclaimed Metcalf. "You'd better see him, Dan. I might be tempted to break his neck."

Dan nodded and went out into the ante-room, where the race-track director was waiting.

"Hallo, Tanner!" he said. "How's business?"

Tanner glared at him.

"I want to see Metcalf!" he snapped.

"He's busy," said Dan. "Very busy."

"You guys think you've put something over on me, don't you?"

"Gobel?" Dan exclaimed. "Why, that's the man who was reported missing three days ago!"

"It looks that way."
 "All right, you win." Tanner changed his tone. "But if Metcalf'll only meet me halfway, I'll give the Legion a break."
 "You'll give the Legion a break?" echoed Dan incredulously.
 "Sure—if you'll get the stable-owners to re-enter their horses, I'll put on a Legion Derby."
 "It's out!" Dan flipped a hand contemptuously.
 "But I'll give the Legion half the take."
 "It's still out!"
 "What do you know about it?" demanded Tanner, losing his temper. "I'll take it up with Metcalf."
 "I told you he's busy."
 "Well, I'll find out for myself!"
 He turned towards the door Dan had closed behind him, but was promptly pulled away from it.
 "Wait a minute, Tanner," said Dan firmly. "I'll give the commander a memo of your proposition. You're going out!" He beckoned to the orderly. "Show this man the door!"
 Tanner was practically bundled out to the stairs.
 About half an hour afterwards Dan was mingling with some of his old war-time comrades in the grounds of the Post, and Robert Metcalf was still in conference when John Blair Kimball entered the ante-room with Craig and asked the orderly to tell the commander that he had called to see him.
 The orderly disappeared into the office, and Kimball said in a low voice to Craig.
 "Study the lay-out carefully. Make a mental photograph of it."
 Craig nodded; and then the State Commander with Metcalf came out from his room, followed by the orderly, who said:

"This way, please."
 Kimball and Craig passed in at the double doors.
 "How are you, commander?" said Kimball. "My associate, Norman Craig."
 Metcalf bowed behind his desk.
 "How are you, Mr. Craig?" he said. "I'm glad you came, Kimball. I want to thank you for killing that racing extension."
 "Oh, that's quite all right!" returned Kimball affably. "If there is anything else I can do for you, just call on me."
 "Same terms?" asked Metcalf with a smile. "No strings?"
 "No strings."
 Craig had been taking stock of the room.
 "Do you mind if I look round?" he inquired.
 "Of course not," Metcalf replied. "Help yourself." He pointed to double-doors in the wall on his right. "Take a look at the museum."
 Craig thanked him and went off into the adjoining room, in which all manner of war trophies were arranged upon baize-covered boards, and flags decorated the walls. He opened another door and looked out into a wide corridor that led to the stairs and the hall.
 Kimball said to Metcalf:
 "You know, commander, I haven't given up hope that you may change your mind on that Arms Control Bill."
 "Not a chance!" Metcalf's face hardened, and his voice had an edge to it.
 "You could write your own ticket with our industry—an important executive post, if you like, with financial security for life. Or we'll back you in a political career. Just name your preference."

 "You're barking up the wrong tree, Kimball! I'm for that Bill heart and soul. In fact, I'm going to ask the Convention to go on record in its favour!"
 "Well," said Kimball, in no way abashed, "I guess I'm wasting my time."
 "And mine!" was the sharp rejoinder.
 Craig reappeared from the museum, and he and Kimball departed together. A big black saloon was waiting for them outside the Post, and in it they returned to the Union Hotel, where they ascended to the sitting-room of the suite Kimball had booked on his arrival in Claremont.
 A desk had been installed in the sitting-room at his request, and he sat down at it.
 "Get me the classified telephone directory," he said; and Craig found the desired volume and handed it to him.
 He turned the pages till he came to one headed "Costumes," and Craig looked over his shoulder as he exclaimed:
 "Here's the very thing! Gobel's 'Costumes and uniforms rented and repaired. Theatrical make-up a speciality.'" He tore out the sheet and handed it over. "Go down there and arrange everything for to-morrow morning. And mind it's all finished before the parade starts."
 "Right," said Craig, and he folded the sheet and put it in his pocket.
 Eve arrived at the Post about an hour after her employer had left it, and Dan, informed of her presence, hastened across the hall to meet her.
 "I'm glad you kept your promise," he said. "Come on, and I'll start you
 September 24th, 1935.

right on your sight-seeing tour with Exhibit 'A.'"

He led her to the stairs, and up the stairs and along the wide corridor to the door Craig had opened.

"Post Museum," she read, and crinkled her brows at him. "Museum for what?"

"A special collection of war trophies," he replied. "The commander's pet hobby."

They entered the big room, and she gazed with interest at the guns and swords and bayonets, and other army weapons displayed upon the baize-covered boards.

"Well, your organisation and ours show the same line of goods," she remarked mockingly.

"We show them for quite a different purpose," said Dan, grave as any judge. "Some of those guns were carried into battle by our boys—and all that came back were the guns."

She had not paid any attention to the flags about the room, some of them in tatters, but he marched her over to one of them.

"This flag," he said, represents the outfit that went through Chateau Thierry. That one, the boys who made the big push at the Marne."

"That's very impressive," she murmured.

"The whole story of the Legion is impressive," he assured her. "It's a story of marching men. During the war they marched to take trenches and to kill. When the war was over they marched the city pavements, trying to find a new meaning and place in life. Do you remember those days?"

She shook her head.

"I was rather young then," she said. "So was I," said he, "but not too young to realise that we'd returned to a world that had to be made all over again—made to an ideal of peace."

"Was that the sole purpose of the Legion?" she questioned.

"Not entirely. The Legion was formed to help us take up life where we'd left off before the war. We had difficult adjustments to make. We needed direction, encouragement, a sense of unity. We finally got it from men like Commander Metcalf."

She looked up into his earnest face.

"Frankly, I never saw it in that light," she confessed. "To me the Legion was a sort of Lodge of grown-up Boy Scouts, waving flags and making a lot of noise. But, after your eloquent address, I'd say it has its points."

The Crime of Jerry Johnson

THE streets of the city were gay with streamers and banners when Norman Craig alighted from a taxicab at the corner of Bryson Avenue, shortly before eight o'clock next morning, and made his way on foot down that thoroughfare to the semi-underground establishment of Hans Gobel, theatrical costumier and make-up specialist.

Descending worn steps into an area, he opened the door of a shop which seemed—at first sight—to be crowded with historical characters, because costumes of various periods were displayed on dummies. A glass-fronted case behind a long counter was full of wigs and masks.

The opening of the door set a bell jangling in a room at the back of the shop, and Hans Gobel appeared. He was a tall and elderly man with a pronounced stoop, obviously German of origin, and he eyed his visitor with surprise.

"Ah, good-morning, Mr. Johnson," September 24th, 1938.

he said. "Why, you've got here a lot earlier than I expected."

"Well," said Craig, "I want to be out of here before the parade starts."

"That will be easy," Gobel consulted a watch. "It's only eight o'clock. I think I will have you fixed up in considerably less than an hour so that your best friends won't know you."

"Okay," said Craig, "let's get started."

He was conducted into a room not unlike a hairdresser's saloon in appearance, and he became seated in a chair in front of a large mirror.

At five minutes past eight Kimball rang up the Legion Post.

"Hallo!" he said to the orderly who answered the call. "Can you tell me at what time Commander Metcalf will be in his office this morning?"

"The commander will be here at nine-thirty," was the reply, "for a few minutes before the parade."

"Nine-thirty? Thank you." Kimball hung up his own instrument, then removed it again to dial another number—and a bell rang in the hall of Lou Tanner's house, which was situated not very far from the racecourse.

A lean-faced butler answered that call.

"Mr. Tanner's residence," he said.

"I'm calling for Commander Metcalf," lied Kimball in a voice as little like his own as he could make it. "He'd like to have Mr. Tanner come to the Legion Post at nine-twenty this morning."

"But Mr. Tanner is still asleep," protested the butler.

"This is a matter of great importance to Mr. Tanner," insisted Kimball, "and nine-twenty is the only time the commander can see him."

"Very well," surrendered the butler, "I'll waken him immediately."

"Thank you," said Kimball. "Oh, and will you please tell Mr. Tanner to go right through to the commander's office?"

The butler ascended to his master's bed-room, but Tanner was sleeping heavily because he had gone to bed none too sober, and it was not till after he had been shaken by the shoulder that he wakened and sat up, blinking owlishly.

"Sorry, sir," apologised the butler, "but Commander Metcalf wants to see you at his office in the Legion Post promptly at nine-twenty."

"Nine-twenty?" echoed Tanner.

"The party said it was extremely important, sir."

Tanner became wide awake and jubilant.

"Important!" he exclaimed, flinging back the bedclothes. "It must be about the Legion Derby—I knew that'd get him! Got any clothes ready for me?"

At twenty minutes to nine Norman Craig stood in front of a mirror in Gobel's make-up room. He was dressed as a legionnaire from Kansas, and he bore no resemblance whatever to his own ugly self.

His hair and his eyebrows had become grey, and a grey moustache had been attached with skill to his clean-shaven upper lip. Grease-paint had aged his face, a black shade was over his left eye, and he was wearing steel-rimmed spectacles.

"There, how do you like it?" inquired Gobel, rubbing his hands with the satisfaction of an artist.

"Looks all right," said Craig.

"What a laugh you'll have on your friends when you pass them like a perfect stranger."

"You've made a good job of it, Mr.

Gobel." Craig paid twenty dollars as a deposit on the hire of the uniform. "I'll see that you're well taken care of," he said, and went out through the shop.

On the pavement at the top of the steps Steve Lawlor was waiting with his hands in his pockets. He looked at Craig, and Craig nodded, then walked briskly away. Lawlor descended the steps and entered the shop.

"Good-morning, sir," said Gobel, walking out from the back room as the bell rang. "What can I do for you?"

Lawlor did not reply, but slowly he took his right hand from his coat pocket, and Gobel backed away in alarm from an automatic that was pointed at him.

"What do you want?" he gasped. "Don't do that! Don't do that!"

Lawlor fired. There was a silencer on the automatic, so that no shot was heard by passers-by, or by anybody in the upper part of the building. But Gobel fell against a dummy dressed as a pirate, and the dummy fell with him to the floor.

At the corner of Bryson Avenue and Fifth Street, Craig beckoned to the driver of a passing taxicab, and in the cab he was conveyed to the Legion Post. Scores of legionnaires were gathered round the front of the main building; many more were talking in groups upon the steps, and he passed unnoticed up the steps and lurked behind a stone column at the top of them, waiting and watching for Tanner.

At nineteen minutes past nine a dark grey saloon drew up at the foot of the steps and the race-track director got out from it. A man who was selling poppies promptly pounced on him.

"Poppy, mister?"

Tanner bought a poppy and put it in his buttonhole. Craig entered the hall, mounted the stairs at the top of it, and slipped into the museum. Tanner, in accordance with the instructions given to his butler, made straight for the ante-room of Metcalf's office.

"Good-morning," he said to the orderly on duty there. "Is Mr. Metcalf in yet?"

"Why, no," was the reply, "but he'll be here for a few minutes at nine-thirty."

Tanner said he would wait.

"Is he expecting you?" asked the orderly.

"Yes," said Tanner. "He told me to go right into his office and wait."

The orderly opened one of the double doors, and Tanner walked into the deserted office and sat down in a hide-covered chair. Craig, in the museum, had put on gloves. He took a six-shooter from a pocket of his tunic, wiped it carefully with a handkerchief, then opened the door at which he had been listening and stepped into Metcalf's office, holding the gun behind his back.

Tanner looked round at him and rose.

"Oh, hallo, buddy," he said. "You want to see the commander, too? My name is—"

The gun spat fire without any report, and clutching at his chest he made a gasping sound in his throat and fell face downwards upon the carpet.

Craig put away the gun, stooped over him to make sure that he was dead, then raised him up and put him back in the chair in a sitting position. He looked round the room, saw a periodical on another chair, and snatched it up to close two limp hands upon its edges.

Having done this he went swiftly back into the museum and closed the door. He heard a sound as of marching feet and ran to a window that overlooked the parade-ground. Hundreds of legionnaires were marching out to join comrades already lined up in the roadway.

He went out from the museum to the top of the stairs, and he was standing there with the gun in his gloved hands, when Robert Metcalf mounted the stairs to reach his office and caught sight of him.

"Well, soldier," said Metcalf, "you ought to be with your outfit. The parade's almost ready to start."

"I only wanted to see you for a minute, commander," said Craig, speaking with the accent of the State from which he was supposed to hail. And he held out the gun by its barrel.

"What's this?" Metcalf stared at the weapon.

"Well, you see, sir, the boys back at our post wanted to make you a little present, and we heard about your collection of war tools, so we all clipped in and got you this."

Metcalf took the gun and examined it with pleased eyes.

"Well, that's very kind of you," he murmured. "It's a neat little job, isn't it? Silencer built right into the gun."

"Yeah," said Craig, "one of the boys is a gunsmith. He made it up special."

"What post did you say?"

Craig hadn't mentioned any particular post, but he responded glibly enough:

"Smithfield, Kansas."

"What's your name?"

"Jerry Johnson, sir."

"Well, you tell the boys I'm very grateful, Johnson. Drop in and see me again when I'm not in such a hurry, will you?"

Craig shook the hand that was offered, and then Metcalf entered the ante-room, and Jerry Johnson disappeared never to be seen again.

In his own office Metcalf stared at the figure in the chair.

"Hallo, Mr. Tanner," he said rather gruffly, "what can I do for you to-day? Going to see the big parade?"

He went to the desk and laid the gun on it; and then, surprised at receiving no answer, he went back to the huddled figure.

"I say, Tanner—"

As his hand touched the dead man's shoulder the periodical fell to the carpet, and the dead man pitched forward on his face and lay still. For a few moments Metcalf was too horrified to do anything but stare down at the body; and he was as breathless as if he had been running when he opened one of the doors into the ante-room and shouted to the orderly there:

"Get the Chief of Police—and get Dan Blaine! They're at the start of the line of march!"

The Grand Parade

THE news of Tanner's murder reached the ears of reporters who were on the spot to write up the parade almost as soon as Dan and tall, thin, and sharp-featured Chief of Police Finley were informed of it. The start of the parade was delayed, and reporters were already in Metcalf's office, plying him with questions he could not answer, when Dan and an elderly State commander entered it in company with Finley and two patrolmen.

All the reporters were driven forth, save the diminutive representative of the "Star," and they promptly monopolized telephones in the rest of the building.

"Yeah," one of them stated excitedly to his news editor, "Lou Tanner stretched out stiff in Metcalf's office with a slug in him! Motive? Well, I figure Tanner's been gunning for Metcalf ever since he queered his track meeting. He finally cornered him in his office, and Metcalf beat him to the draw. Yeah, okay, I'll stick around and get some more for the first edition."

Metcalf, standing behind his desk with Dan on one side of him in uniform and Colonel Forsythe—the elderly State commander—on the other, said hoarsely to the Chief of Police, who was kneeling beside the body on the floor:

"I can't understand it!"

"You and Tanner never liked each other, did you?" challenged the "Star" man.

Metcalf did not answer and Finley got to his feet.

"Where's the gun?" he asked.

"Here it is," said Metcalf.

Finley took out a handkerchief and with it picked up the gun.

"A silencer, eh?" he barked. "One shot fired. Whose gun is this?"

"Mine," Metcalf replied. "It was just given me for the post collection."

"Who gave it to you?"

"A legionnaire."

"You know him?"

"Well, not exactly. I just met him a few minutes ago. He said his name was Jerry Johnson, Smithfield Post, Kansas."

Finley wrapped the gun in the handkerchief and put the handkerchief in his pocket.

"Tell us what happened, commander," he said brusquely; and one of the patrolmen, who had been making notes in a book, licked the point of his pencil because it needed sharpening.

"Well," Metcalf began, "I dropped in here to see if there were any last-minute messages before the parade started. The legionnaire who gave me the gun was standing at the top of the stairs out there."

He detailed what had taken place, repeating his conversation with Craig almost word for word. He described how he had found Tanner, apparently reading in the chair.

The Chief of Police asked him what Jerry Johnson was like, and his description was so complete that everybody in the room felt that they would recognise such a man if they were to see him.

"Well," said Finley, "if such a man exists we'll find him. Meanwhile, Bob, this is the most disagreeable duty I've ever had to perform, but I'll have to take you into custody."

Metcalf was aghast. Dan burst out indignantly:

"You don't believe the commander had anything to do with it?"

"It's not what I believe," Finley replied unhappily. "You know the law as well as I do, Bob. Tanner, a known enemy of yours, is murdered in your office. You're found with the body and a gun on your desk with one shot fired."

Metcalf bowed his head.

"I'll go along with you, Henry," he said.

"But what about the parade?" expostulated Forsythe. "The commander has to review it. A hundred thousand legionnaires are out there waiting for him!"

"Yes," said Dan. "Look, Finley, if you have to take the commander why can't you do it after the parade? The reviewing stand will be surrounded by a police escort. He won't be out of your sight for a minute. What's more, the parade will be a big show-up for the police—a chance to look for Jerry Johnson."

Finley gnawed his underlip. He hated to arrest an old friend, and Dan's argument seemed to him a sound one.

"Okay." He turned to the officer

Gripping Lawlor by the shoulder and the front of his coat, Dan said fiercely: "If you don't come clean I won't answer for the consequences!"

who had been making notes. "Phone headquarters. I want a hundred more men detailed to the line of march—they'll get their orders later." He offered his hand to Metcalf, who clasped it appreciatively. "We'll do everything we can to find Jerry Johnson."

But Jerry Johnson had ceased to exist. Craig, in his make-up and borrowed uniform, had entered the Union Hotel and sneaked up the stairs to a bed-room on the fifth floor, and he was his own normal self again when he strolled into the sitting-room of Kimball's suite.

Kimball was pacing the carpet, a cigar between his lips that had long since gone out. He stopped and turned to view his accomplice with manifest relief.

"No hitch?" he asked anxiously. "No hitch." Craig dropped into a chair. "What do you want me to do with the uniform—burn it?"

"I should say not." Kimball was emphatic. "Put it away for safe keeping."

Craig's heavy-lidded blue eyes widened.

"But why?" he asked blankly.

"In my negotiations with Metcalf I may have to produce Jerry Johnson."

"How?"

"Gobel's body, dressed in that uniform, may do very well. Yes?"

The "yes" was in response to a knock at the door. Lawlor was in the corridor with a parcel under his arm which contained all the clothes Craig had been wearing when he had entered Gobel's shop.

"Lawlor!" he called back.

"Come in!"

Lawlor entered the room and he tossed the parcel to Craig.

"Well?" barked Kimball.

"Everything went off according to schedule."

"Excellent!" Kimball moved to the desk and dropped the half-consumed cigar into an ash-tray. "Now about that uniform. We may need it, but we don't want to keep it here. Pack it in a bag, Lawlor, and leave it in the cloak-room at the Union Station without delay."

There came another knock at the door, and Kimball pointed to an adjoining room.

"In there, quick!"

Craig and Lawlor made themselves scarce, and Kimball went to the door and opened it. Eve was in the corridor, wearing a costume and a little hat that went well with her golden-brown hair.

"Don't you want to see the parade, Mr. Kimball?" she asked eagerly. "It's already started."

"I'll be right along," he nodded. "You get out on the balcony."

She went off along the corridor to a balcony in the front of the hotel, and he stepped back into the room and opened the door of the one that adjoined it.

"Lawlor," he said, "bring the ticket for that bag back to me."

"Right!" said Lawlor.

In column of fours the men of the American Legion were marching along Franklin Avenue, when Kimball joined Eve on the flag-decked balcony. A band had passed, but the drums were still rolling, and the sight was a most impressive one in the Juno sunlight. Army trucks followed the men on foot, and the trucks were full of legionnaires in khaki and steel helmets. State commanders marched with their own contingents.

"Isn't it thrilling?" cried Eve.

"I didn't know you were responsive September 24th, 1938.

to parades," said Kimball dryly, glancing at her flushed face and very bright eyes.

"Oh, it's not the parade," she averred, "it's what it stands for. Those boys are a part of American history."

The pavements were thronged with people waving flags or handkerchiefs; faces were at every window that overlooked the roadway. At the top of the Avenue, on the fringe of Franklin Park, a stand had been erected and draped with bunting. The mayor and other important members of the community were seated on the stand, and Kimball and Dan were there with the Chief of Police and a uniformed sergeant.

Kimball was looking down upon the marching men without any very great interest when he noticed that police officers were diving in and out amongst the columns. They were looking for a legionnaire answering to the description of Jerry Johnson.

"I wonder what the police are up to?" he muttered involuntarily.

The people on the stand rose to take the salute as the men of the Legion began to pass beneath them. A perspiring police-sergeant reached the back of the stand by way of one of the paths in the park, climbed the ladder-like steps at the back of it, and approached the Chief of Police.

"Report on Jerry Johnson, sir," he said breathlessly, and handed over a telegram.

"Okay." Finley glanced at the telegram, then crumpled it and stowed it in a pocket.

The long procession passed; the mayor replaced his silk hat on his head and turned to Metcalf.

"Well, commander," he said with enthusiasm, "that was the most inspiring spectacle I've ever witnessed!"

Some way about the park, the legionnaires had turned into Market Street, and out of Market Street they turned again, headed for Harrison Avenue and the Legion Post. The sound of the drums died away in the distance, and the people on the stand began to disperse. Dan, who had seen the sergeant approach Finley, asked the question that had been on his lips for more than ten minutes:

"Did your men find out anything?"

"Plenty!" Finley turned to the commander who had borne himself so well. "There's no Smithfield Post record of Jerry Johnson."

His words were a bombshell. Kimball compressed his lips.

"Let's go, then," he said hoarsely.

By the time the legionnaires were back at the Post, newsboys were outside it with papers they had no difficulty in selling. In the barracks and all over the parade ground men discussed the murder mystery, and were flamingly indignant about the arrest of their National Commander.

"The papers are just trying to boil up a story!" was the verdict of one.

"Yellow journalism, that's what it is!" exploded another.

"Listen to this, boys!" cried a man on the front steps of the main building, and he read aloud from the "Star":

"The commander described Jerry Johnson as an elderly legionnaire, dressed in his parade uniform, with a patch over his left eye and wearing glasses. Unless Johnson is located, Metcalf will speedily be indicted for murder."

"Murder!" echoed a man from Ohio. "We've gotta do something about this, and do it quick!"

"A Hundred Thousand Detectives!"

EARLY in the afternoon, Kimball was at his desk in the sitting-room of his suite at the Union Hotel, talking to Craig and Lawlor, when the house telephone-bell rang. Craig answered the call, because he was nearest to the instrument attached to a wall.

"Okay, thanks," he said, and turned to Kimball after he had hung up. "Dan Blaine is on his way from below."

"I want to see him alone," Kimball stated, and Craig and Lawlor were in the adjoining living-room when Dan knocked at the door and was admitted.

"Oh, come right in, Mr. Blaine," said Kimball. "Sit down."

Dan dropped into an armchair and was offered a cigarette, which he declined.

"You sent word that you had something vital concerning Commander Metcalf," he said.

"Oh, yes—yes, of course." Kimball rubbed his chin. "Metcalf seems to be in a pretty tight spot."

"We know that," snapped Dan.

"It would be worth a lot if he could be cleared of this charge, wouldn't it, Blaine?"

"Naturally."

"I may be in a position to do just that."

Dan sprang to his feet.

"Well, what are you waiting for, if you can do anything?" he cried.

"All in good time." Kimball waved the cigarette he himself was smoking. "Please remain seated."

Dan sank back into the chair.

"Now understand," said Kimball impressively, "anything I may say is in strictest confidence—can't go beyond these walls. Otherwise I shall have to say this meeting never took place."

"Very well," agreed Dan.

"If I were to produce Jerry Johnson, the Commander might be exonerated. Right?"

"Right."

"And, speaking modestly, he'd be somewhat indebted to me."

"Of course."

"Then if I should produce Jerry Johnson, all I ask is the commander's pledge."

"What pledge?"

Kimball blew a smoke-ring.

"That he will ask the Legion to go on record as being opposed to the Arms Control Bill," he replied slowly.

Dan bounded to his feet again.

"I'm just beginning to understand you, Kimball," he blazed. "You'd let him go to the chair, knowing him to be innocent!"

"I know nothing of his innocence," declared Kimball, spreading his hands palms upwards. "So far as I know, he did kill Tanner."

"I could take you to headquarters and have you questioned until you told us what you do know!"

It was a threat, but it seemed merely to amuse the arms magnate.

"I'm afraid you'd waste your time," he said mildly. "I haven't said I know anything. I'm simply in a position to offer you a bargain."

"We don't want any of your bargains, Kimball! We'll take our chance with the jury."

Kimball raised his dark brows.

"Why not let Metcalf decide that?" he purred. "After all, it's his life that's at stake, not yours."

"All right," growled Dan. "I'll tell him. But you can have his answer right now. It's 'No!'"

He thundered the word, and he strode out from the room. But on his way to the city gaol he thought over what Kimball had said, and when he joined Metcalf in a gloomy cell he actually pleaded with him to accept Kimball's offer.

"Listen to reason, Chief," he urged. "It's your last resort. Unless you agree to Kimball's terms, this murder charge is going to stick."

"Then let it stick," said Metcalf doggedly. "I'm not doing business with Kimball."

"But he says he can exonerate you." "In return for which I'm to agree to have the American Legion oppose the Arms Control Bill. No, Dan, I'm not trading my self-respect for my freedom."

"I knew you'd say that," exulted Dan, "and I told Kimball so."

"Good boy!" Metcalf clapped an approving hand on his shoulder.

"Yes, but we've got to beat this case, in spite of Kimball." Dan frowned at the little barred window high up in the wall at the back of the cell. "I'd give a good deal to find out what he knows about it."

"So would I," said the prisoner. "Do you think he could have framed you?"

"Perhaps. But I don't see how." "I don't, either, but it's an angle."

After a visit to his own office, Dan went to the Post and called a meeting of all the State Commanders for eight o'clock that evening. The meeting took place in a concert-hall there, and every commander was present. Dan addressed them from the platform Sid Hinkle and other entertainers had occupied during the afternoon.

"I've called this meeting," he said, "to consider a grave situation. You all know that our National Commander is facing a charge of murder. What you don't know is that powerful interests have guaranteed him his liberty if the Legion opposes the Arms Control Bill! I'm telling you this because I feel that you should have the privilege of deciding for yourselves whether or not the commander's personal jeopardy should affect your action on the Bill."

It speedily appeared that opinions were divided. After the first shock of surprise caused by Dan's statement, voices rang out from various parts of the hall:

"Forget the Bill—let's get our commander freed!"

"We oughta support the Bill, no matter what happens!"

The voices became a babel, and Dan turned to Colonel Forsythe, probably the oldest commander present.

"Ask the chairman for the floor," he said.

Forsythe did so, and Dan managed with difficulty to obtain silence.

"State Commander Forsythe," he announced.

The elderly colonel, standing up in the body of the hall, expressed his views in his own downright fashion.

"I realise that a human life is at stake," he said, "but on the other hand there is a great principle involved—one that affects the well-being of millions of citizens. The American Legion, like the American Constitution, is committed to support the greatest good for the greatest number. Therefore I say we should support the Bill, regardless of the consequences to our commander."

"What?" howled a commander from Pennsylvania. "That's heartless!"

"What's the idea?" challenged another officer. "You out for the chief's job?"

No one who knew Forsythe and his record would have dreamed of making any such suggestion, and the speaker was booed. Once more Dan restored order, and then Comander Denton asked to be heard.

"I move," he said loudly, "that we take an active hand in clearing the commander. His vindication is our vindication."

There was a burst of cheering, and then a State Commander named Mason obtained a hearing.

"You called this meeting," he said to Dan, "to deal with a serious problem. Have you any solution in mind?"

"Yes, I have," Dan promptly replied. "Boys, I want you to face this problem as we faced problems during the war. In those days we took trenches—we took machine-guns—we took whole towns. Now, somewhere in this city, there is one man who is a menace to law and order. Why can't we take him?"

"Who says we can't?" shouted a commander at the back of the hall, and others chimed in with: "Just turn our men loose!" "What are we waiting for?"

"Colonel Forsythe," said Dan, "will you make a motion that this convention stay in session until we take this man?"

Forsythe, on his feet, raised a hand. "I so move!" he cried.

The motion was seconded and carried unanimously.

"But we can't take the law into our own hands," said Dan. "We'll form a committee to work with the police."

A committee of five, including Dan himself, was appointed then and there, and they were all in Dan's office at the City Hall, next morning, when the Chief of Police called there to report.

"We've combed the town and found nothing," he lamented. "I'd like to put more men on the case, but the force has its hands full with all these visitors in town. As it is I've got a dozen detectives on the job."

"How many?" asked Todd, a State Commander with the face of a comedian, who quite often was thought to be joking when he was in deadly earnest.

"A dozen," Finley repeated. "I wish I could spare a hundred."

"Chief," said Dan, "how would you like to have a hundred thousand?"

"Eh?" Finley looked startled.

Dan said sternly, as Craig turned his head to scowl: "This is the beginning of your last mile!"

"A hundred thousand," repeated Dan.

"You say the police need more men," Colonel Forsythe chimed in. "We'll give you an army mobilised for action!"

"That's right," confirmed Todd. "A hundred thousand men who believe their commander is innocent."

"A hundred thousand detectives at your beck and call," said Dan. "All you have to do is deputise them."

"What can they do?" asked Finley. "They'll spread a dragnet even a fly couldn't creep through!"

"It's kind of irregular."

"It's a man-hunt on the side of law and order," said Forsythe.

"They won't rest until their commander is exonerated," added Dan.

"It might work at that," decided Finley. "But remember your men are not the police—only special deputies acting under the police authority. All right, then. Captain Riley will supervise your operations."

Dan shook hands with him. "Fine, chief!" he said warmly. "With a set-up like this we'll have our man in no time!"

He addressed the four commanders in turn.

"Haynes, you take charge of messages and reports. Todd, since you own the largest fleet of taxi-cabs in town, you direct transportation. Denton, you cover all city outlets—railway-stations, airports, bus terminals, and so on. Colonel Forsythe, you work with me on the Kimball angle. I want the shadow of a legionnaire to cross the paths of Kimball and his crowd at every turn. Wherever they are, wherever they go, just keep at them till we break them down."

Eve Finds Two Clues

WITHIN an hour the Union Hotel was surrounded by members of the Legion and invaded by them. Some loitered in the lounge; others posted themselves upon the staircases, and a dozen of them patrolled the corridors of the fifth floor.

When Kimball, or Craig, or Lawlor went out from the hotel, legionnaires closed in upon them and went wherever they went. Taxi-cabs belonging to Commander Todd were always at hand, so that not even a car could get away without being followed.

Eve remained in the suite all morning, but she was not left in peace. At frequent intervals legionnaires rang the bell and brought her to the door on one pretext or another. By one o'clock she had answered the bell at least twenty times, and she viewed the twenty-first caller with angry eyes.

"Can I interest you in a copy of the 'American Legion Magazine,' lady?" he asked politely.

"I said 'No' when you were here half an hour ago!" she stormed.

"Not me," said the legionnaire. "Maybe one of the other boys."

"Well, this is for all of you!" And she slammed the door in his face.

The calls continued, and she hung a card on the door upon which she had written, "Do not disturb." But the card made no difference whatever.

During the afternoon Craig walked out from his own room with an unlighted cigarette between his lips, and instantly a legionnaire was standing before him with a flaming lighter in his hand. Lawlor had his shoes cleaned by a negro in Franklin Avenue, and two legionnaires had theirs cleaned on either side of him.

All through the day this sort of thing continued, and the vigil was not relaxed September 24th, 1935.

at night. Eve endured more calls next morning, but by the afternoon she had made up her mind to go and complain to Dan about what seemed to her to be a pointless persecution.

Legionnaires followed her as she went out from the hotel. She dropped her handbag on the pavement, and before she could stoop to pick it up a legionnaire was offering it to her. She snatched at it and made for a taxi-cab at the kerb, and immediately a legionnaire opened the door of the cab for her.

"Drive me to the Legion Post," she said.

"Right," said the driver, looking round from his seat; and he, too, was a legionnaire.

Dan was standing behind a desk in an office at the Post when she was conducted into his presence by an orderly. He had a smile for her, but she had no smile for him.

"What's the meaning of this nuisance campaign?" she blazed. "You've called out the army, the G-men, and the riot squad to annoy me, and I have a right to know what it's all about!"

"And, of course, you haven't the slightest idea?" he said.

"No! That's why I'm here!"

He walked round the desk and pointed to a chair.

"All right, sit down, please," he said. "I'll explain."

She seated herself in the chair, but did not lean back in it. Her green eyes seemed to emit sparks.

"Just what do you know about the man you're working for?" asked Dan, standing in front of her with folded arms.

"Not very much," she admitted. "He's a considerate employer, the work isn't hard, and he pays me well. I couldn't possibly ask for anything more."

Dan unfolded his arms to point a finger at her.

"Suppose I were to tell you that he's in a position to clear the commander of that murder charge, but won't do so unless we meet his terms?"

"That's absurd!" she cried. "What could Mr. Kimball know about that murder?"

"That's what we'd like to know!"

"Oh, I see—and you figured you'd find out through me! Well, let me tell you, Mr. District Attorney, your trick won't work!" She jumped up from the chair and tossed her golden-brown head. "In the first place I don't believe you!"

Dan caught hold of her arm. He thought she looked beautiful, even in a temper, but he wanted co-operation not defiance.

"Will you please forget that I'm the District Attorney?" he asked earnestly.

"This isn't just another murder case to me; it's a deeply personal matter. Won't you sit down and talk it over?"

She sat down in the chair again, less stiffly this time, and she nodded.

"Of course, Metcalf is your friend," she said in a very much milder tone, "and it's hard for you to believe that he's guilty."

"I know he isn't guilty," returned Dan emphatically. "I ought to know the man he is—I've been close to him ever since I ran away to war. I was fifteen years old, and if ever I needed help it was then! I got it from my Company captain—Bob Metcalf. And during the years that followed I got a lot of other things from him—things that count the most in the making of a man. He's the best friend I ever had, and as innocent of this murder as you are!"

All trace of resentment had disappeared from her face while he was speaking.

"I can understand how you feel about it," she said, "but why are you telling me this? What can I do?"

"A lot," he replied gravely, "despite what you think. I believe Kimball holds the answer to the whole thing. If you'd only co-operate with us—"

"How?" she interrupted.

"You're close to Kimball. By keeping your eyes and ears open you might learn something that would help us. You might search his rooms, his clothes, or his desk. I don't know just what you might discover, but it might quite possibly be something that would give us a clue to work on. You're the only one that can help us." He flung out his hands. "Will you do it?"

She frowned at him and rose.

"I'll think it over," she said slowly.

"I'm counting on you," said Dan.

No legionnaires troubled her any more that day, but they haunted Kimball and Craig and Lawlor as assiduously as ever. Some hours after breakfast on the following morning, Craig went to the window of the living-room of the suite at the hotel and stood glaring down at the legionnaires in the street below.

"It's getting under my skin, Kimball," he turned to complain bitterly. "Everywhere I go I find a soldier on my trail! If you don't believe it, look out here!"

Kimball did not move from the chair in which he was reading a morning paper. Lawlor joined Craig at the window.

"It gives me the willies!" he exploded.

"Let's get out of town," urged Craig. Kimball flung down the newspaper.

"What's there to be afraid of?" he scoffed. "There isn't a thing they can pin on us. I want you two to go out more than ever—act as though it doesn't affect you. When Dan Blaine learns that this amateur sleuthing gets him nowhere, he'll be glad to listen to my terms."

The door between the living-room and the sitting-room was ajar, and Eve had crossed the sitting-room from her bedroom in time to hear that last remark.

"What terms?" she asked, appearing suddenly in the doorway.

Kimball sprang to his feet and glared at her.

"Since when do you enter without knocking?" he demanded harshly.

"I'm sorry," she said, "the door was open. Mr. Kimball, there's something I'd like to ask you."

"Miss Rogers," snapped Kimball, "you're paid to be my secretary, not to ask questions!"

"But—" she began.

"That'll be all!"

She drew back into the sitting-room, and she closed the door; but she had heard enough to convince her that Dan was right, and she listened at the key-hole.

"Come on out with me," she heard Kimball say, "and I'll give you an object lesson in how to out-stare Mr. Blaine's tin soldiers. We'll have lunch at the Ambassador's, after we've jaunted round the city, and see if they'll dare to sit at our table there."

The three went out, not very long afterwards, and then Eve began a systematic search of the suite. She went through all the drawers of the desk in the sitting-room, but found nothing that could be of any possible use to Dan. She searched the sideboard in the living-room, the dressing-table and a tallboy in Kimball's bedroom, and even his clothes in a wardrobe.

Failing to find anything there she invaded first Lawlor's bedroom, and then Craig's; and in a pocket of one of Craig's coats she discovered the crumpled page torn from the classified telephone directory.

Colonel Forsythe and Commander Todd were with Dan when she arrived at the Post in a taxicab and was shown into the office. She told Dan of the conversations she had overheard; she told him of her search; and she gave him the torn-out page.

"Gobel!" he exclaimed, fastening on the advertisement of that costumier and make-up expert. "Gobel? Why that's the man who was reported missing three days ago! Did you find anything else?"

"No," Eve replied, "except that I did notice, while going through one of the cupboards, that Lawlor's bag was missing."

"Bag?" said Dan. "What kind of a bag?"

"A black gladstone, with the initials 'J.L.' on it."

"Boys," boomed Dan excitedly, "we've got some checking-up to do! Now you go back to the hotel, Miss Rogers, and act as though nothing had happened. You've been simply grand, and I can't tell you how grateful I am."

In the Hands of the Legion

WHILE a hundred legionnaires were visiting the cloak-rooms of railway stations and airports, and the offices of hotels in quest of the missing bag, Dan and Colonel Forsythe paid a visit to Gobel's establishment, where they interviewed Mrs. Gobel, a fat but most unhappy-looking woman.

She produced her husband's day-book at Dan's request, and the very last entry in it was one dated June 21st: "American Legion uniform, rented to Jerry Johnson. Deposit paid, twenty dollars."

"The last entry Gobel ever made!" Dan commented; and Forsythe, looking over his shoulder at the book, drew in his breath with almost a hissing noise.

"And that's the date of the parade," he said, "and the date Tanner was murdered."

"I've got a feeling my husband was murdered, too," grieved the woman. "He just seems to have vanished off the face of the earth. And he never was away from home before without letting me know he was going."

"He may be just held somewhere," soothed Dan, though he doubted it. "Have you got that uniform in the shop?"

"No," she replied, wiping her eyes, "it hasn't been returned."

"Well," Dan said to his companion, "this is beginning to mean something. A legion uniform is missing and a black gladstone bag. We've got to find that bag!"

The bag was located before many hours had elapsed in the cloak-room at the Union Pacific Railroad station where Lawlor had left it.

"Here's one with 'J. L.' on it," said the clerk who produced it. "But I can't give it to you without the ticket—or police authority."

The legionnaire who had located the bag dived into the nearest telephone-box and rang up the Chief of Police, and burly Captain Riley set out for the station. The black bag was taken from the cloak-room to the Post, and in Dan's office it was opened. Inside it was the uniform Craig had worn in the character of Jerry Johnson.

"It fits Metcalf's description of Jerry Johnson's outfit perfectly," said Todd. "So now," said Forsythe, "all we have to do is to pinch Lawlor."

"Not yet," objected Dan. "We still have no actual proof that he did it."

"Quite enough to warrant an arrest," contended Captain Riley.

"And spoil everything," said Dan. "Well, what are you going to do?"

inquired Denton. "Get me Sid Hinkle," Dan said to Todd; and then to Captain Riley: "Get Chief Finley to come over here."

The mimic arrived ten minutes before the Chief of Police; but it was not until the Chief of Police had arrived that Dan explained what was in his mind.

"It's a long chance," he wound up, "but it's worth taking."

"Well, you're the District Attorney," growled Finley, "and maybe your idea is a good one, but all you've got is a theory, and if it doesn't work out you put yourself and the police in an awful spot."

"I know," agreed Dan, "but it's our only chance to crack this case. I'll take the responsibility. Sid will come through all right."

Finley contemplated the mimic with very dubious eyes.

"Is he that good?" he questioned.

"Show him," directed Dan; and Sid Hinkle slid off the arm of a chair on which he had been perched and said calmly:

"Chief, did you ever hear yourself talking back to yourself?"

"What d'you mean?" asked Finley blankly.

"Go ahead, Sid," said Dan. "Maybe your idea is a good one," mimicked Sid, so perfectly that it might have been Finley himself speaking, "but all you've got is a theory, and if it doesn't work out you put yourself and the police in an awful spot."

Finley was amazed.

"All right, then," he surrendered, "go ahead and try it. And good luck."

"Right!" Dan walked over to the mimic and caught hold of his arm.

"Sid, we're calling on Kimball. I want you to study his voice—catch every inflexion. Get it?"

"Sure," drawled Sid, "that's easy."

Kimball was in, when they reached the hotel, and he received them in the sitting-room of the suite—after he had sent Craig and Lawlor out from it. He appeared to be very busy at the desk when they entered, but he pushed some papers aside and invited them to be seated.

"Well, gentlemen," he said smoothly, "I presume you've come to tell me that the Legion has decided to oppose the Arms Control Bill? I'm very glad the commander has seen fit to change his mind."

Dan took full advantage of the opportunity thus presented to mislead the crook without actual falsehood.

"The commander doesn't know anything," he returned. "We're doing this on our own."

"Oh!" said Kimball a trifle sharply. "Well, in that case I shall do nothing about Metcalf until the convention passes the resolution."

"That's all right," Sid Hinkle assured him. "Just leave it to Dan—he'll get it passed."

"Then it's a deal, gentlemen," Kimball made no attempt to conceal his satisfaction. "If you'll deliver, I'll deliver."

Sid Hinkle fished some tickets from his pocket.

"And now that the Legion's supporting you," he chirruped, "it's only right that you support the Legion. Ten dollars, please!"

He offered the tickets with his right

NEXT WEEK'S GRAND PROGRAMME!

FREDDIE BARTHOLOMEW and MICKEY ROONEY

—IN—

"THE BOY FROM BARNARDO'S"

A young snob, posing as a Lord, is arrested when a valuable necklace is stolen. The Magistrate finds that he is a foil of clever thieves and decides to give the boy a last chance, and he is sent to the famous school for waifs and strays. A gripping story of the making of a man.

"DOUBLE DANGER"

The famous Konjer diamonds are stolen and Police-Commissioner Theron is sure that it is the work of "The Gentleman," a notorious and mysterious crook. He narrows the search down to two people, invites both to his home for the week-end, and lays a trap to catch the crook—with startling results. Starring Preston Foster and Whitney Bourne

"THE DEVIL'S PARTY"

Four boys and a girl grow up in the toughest district of New York, and when their plans to rob a fruit depot go wrong it is Marty Malone who takes the rap and is sent to a reform school. Years later Marty becomes the boss of a big gambling joint, the girl, Helen, a beautiful cabaret star, Joe and Mike are policemen and Jerry is a priest, and yet in spite of their varied careers they still stick together—until an unscrupulous strong man, Jim Diamond, starts a series of murders. Starring Victor McLaglen, William Gargan and Paul Kelly.

Also

The concluding chapters of:
"THE PAINTED STALLION"
Starring Ray Corrigan.

hand, and held out his left hand for the money.

"Cut it out, Sid!" rapped Dan.

"None of that!"

But Sid persisted, and Kimball produced a well-filled wallet.

"What are they?" he inquired.

"Fight tickets for to-night's Legion bouts at the Stadium," was the reply.

The tickets changed hands and were paid for.

"Sid never misses a chance to sell something for the Legion," said Dan, as though thoroughly disapproving of the transaction.

"Oh, it's quite all right," laughed Kimball, "I guess I can stand it. I'll give them to the boys. I'm sure they'll be glad to go."

"Don't you like prize-fights?" asked Sid innocently.

"Well, they're a bit too brutal for my simple tastes."

It was not till they were in the elevator, on the way down to the street, that they dared to chuckle at that statement.

By a quarter to eight that evening the Legion Stadium was crowded with legionnaires and townspeople, and the band that had led the parade was providing music pending the first event. Dan, in the vestibule beside Colonel Forsythe, was beginning to wonder whether Craig and Lawlor would make use of the tickets when he caught sight of them descending from a taxicab at the foot of the steps.

Two other taxicabs were close behind, and they disgorged legionnaires who followed the pair.

"Here they come!" exclaimed Dan. "Don't let them out of your sight. When they come out, bring them over to the Post. Let me know when they're on their way."

"All right," said the colonel; and he signalled to some of his men who were waiting in the vestibule.

Craig and Lawlor entered the building, gave up their tickets, and were conducted to two seats quite close to the ring. A legionnaire was on either side of them; legionnaires were behind them, and in front of them; but after the reassuring news they had received from Kimball it did not occur to them that there could be any significance in the circumstance.

A battle in the ring between two light-weights, one from Oregon and the other from Nebraska, provided the audience with plenty of amusement, but came to an inglorious end in the sixth round with both contestants on the mat. Other minor events followed, and then came the main event of the evening—a fifteen-round contest between two well-matched heavy-weights, both members of the Legion, which lasted till close on midnight and resulted in a knock-out for the challenger.

As the crowd streamed out from the stadium, Craig and Lawlor became separated by legionnaires who thrust their way between them, and by the time the concrete at the foot of the front steps was reached each crook was surrounded so closely by determined men that neither of them could get away.

They were hustled towards the main building of the Post, Colonel Forsythe leading the way with one group, Commander Todd with the other.

"Say, what is this?" howled Lawlor, trying in vain to break loose.

"Silence in the ranks!" shouted Todd.

Craig used his elbows to no purpose. "Keep your hands off me!" he roared.

"We haven't touched you yet, buddy," said one of the legionnaires.

September 24th, 1938.

Both men were compelled to move with those who moved around them.

"Where're you taking me?" demanded Lawlor furiously; but no one answered the question.

Sid Hinkle ran on to the main building and joined Dan at the entrance to the hall.

"The boys are on the way over with Lawlor and Craig," he reported.

"Good," said Dan. "Forsythe will grill Craig in the museum, and I'll handle Lawlor downstairs."

Tricked!

AT one o'clock in the morning Eve rang up the Legion Stadium and was answered by a legionnaire in charge of the cleaners. On Kimball's instructions she asked at what time the bouts would be over.

"They were over an hour ago," was the reply.

Kimball received this information with more concern than he cared to show.

"There's something wrong," he decided. "Craig and Lawlor were to come right back here. Get me the Chief of Police."

For the better part of an hour Craig had been subjected to third-degree methods in the museum at the Post, while Lawlor was being badgered and roughly handled in an underground room with a powerful light immediately above his head; but neither captive, as yet, had shown any signs of breaking down.

Dan, gripping Lawlor by the shoulder with one hand and twisting the front of his coat with the other, so that it was tight about his throat, said fiercely:

"If you don't come clean I won't answer for the consequences!"

"I've come clean," Lawlor declared, perspiration streaming down his pock-marked face. "I—I don't know a thing about that uniform."

"Come on, Lawlor," thundered Dan. "You admit the bag is yours."

"Suppose it is?" was the defiant retort. "You've had it in your possession long enough for anybody to have put a uniform in it, and I wouldn't know a thing about it. It's been done, you know."

In the museum, Colonel Forsythe had taken Denton's place to interrogate Craig.

"What happened to Gobel?" he rapped.

"Never heard of him," Craig replied, just as he had replied many times before to the same question.

"You might as well come through. We've got Lawlor's bag with the uniform in it!"

"Well, that's Lawlor's funeral, not mine!"

At twenty minutes past one, a legionnaire put his head into the museum to announce that Colonel Forsythe was wanted for a moment, and Forsythe left Haynes in control and went out from the room. Captain Riley was in the corridor.

"How's Craig?" he asked. "Is he spilling?"

"Not yet," the colonel replied.

"You'll have to release him."

"What?"

"Finley's orders. Tell Craig he's free."

The colonel gritted his teeth.

"Where is Finley?" he asked rebelliously.

"He's down in the basement with Dan Blaine." Riley turned towards the door of the museum. "Come on! Are you setting Craig free, or am I?"

Craig was set at liberty, and he went off without troubling his head about Lawlor. Forsythe descended to the basement, and he found Dan arguing with the Chief of Police outside the room in which ten legionnaires were looking after Lawlor.

"Well, Craig's gone," said the colonel bitterly.

"What's the idea of turning him loose?" Dan snapped at Finley.

"We can't keep him here indefinitely," was the reply. "Kimball's smelt a rat, and he's threatening to phone the Governor. You'd better let Lawlor go, too."

"A few more minutes can't make much difference," objected Dan. "I've got to break him down before Craig spills the news to Kimball."

"All right," Finley agreed reluctantly, "but if he doesn't crack in ten minutes we'll have to let him go."

"Okay," Dan turned to Forsythe. "Get Sid and the others."

Ironically enough, Craig travelled back to the Union Hotel in one of Denton's taxi-cabs. Eve had retired to her room, but not to bed; Kimball was alone in the sitting-room when Craig entered it.

"What happened?" rasped Kimball, jumping up from the desk.

"The Legion ganged up on us at the fights," Craig replied, "and tried to make us talk."

"Where's Lawlor?"

"He's still there. I don't know what he's told them, but they've dug up his bag and that uniform!"

Kimball's jaw dropped.

"We'd better start packing," he said gruffly.

By this time Dan was back in the underground room, standing over Lawlor with clenched fists, and Sid Hinkle was outside the room with Finley, Colonel Forsythe, and other members of the Legion. Captain Riley was leading against a wall.

"It may interest you to know," Dan blared at Lawlor, "that we've got Kimball upstairs, and he's not doing so well!"

"Very interesting," sneered the incredulous captive.

"It's funny how these master minds crack even sooner than mugs like you. That's because they'll do anything to save their own skins."

"Isn't that too bad?"

Dan's left fist hovered within a few inches of scornful lips, and his right arm jerked Lawlor's chin upwards.

"Better spill it, Lawlor," he hissed, "before we drag it out of you. The boys are getting mighty impatient!"

The door was opened, and a tall legionnaire burst into the room.

"Mr. Blaine," he cried, "Kimball's confessed!"

Dan whirled round on the intruder. "I thought I left word I wasn't to be interrupted?" he roared.

"I'm sorry," said the legionnaire. "I thought you wanted him in here."

"Hold him out there until I've finished with Lawlor. Meanwhile, suppose you get Kimball's statement for the record."

"Sure." The legionnaire went out, leaving the door slightly open, and the sound of marching feet was heard, because Sid Hinkle had given a pre-arranged signal, and legionnaires who had been waiting for it had begun to advance along a stone-flagged passage.

But Lawlor believed it was all a trick to make him confess, and he said derisively:

"Who d'you think you're kidding? I wasn't born yesterday."

Outside the door, Sid Hinkle winked at the Chief of Police, and the Chief of Police said sternly:

(Continued on page 25)

Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy go to Switzerland to sell mouse-traps, but from the lack of ready cash are compelled to take jobs on as waiters, and, through a famous composer and his mischievous wife, are drawn into an hilarious adventure

Mouse-Traps

THE Alpen Hotel naturally was situated in Switzerland. It was quiet and select, very well run, and three thousand feet above sea level. The business was quiet, and Luigi, the manager, rubbed his hands together when he heard that Mr. Victor Albert, the greatest operatic composer living, was honouring his hotel with a visit.

Edward, the composer's secretary and adviser, had come on ahead to arrange all details. Expense did not matter as long as certain wishes of his master were carried out. Luigi agreed and asked these conditions. First of all, every room in the hotel would be rented so that there would be no strangers in the place. That was a condition that delighted Luigi. All the staff must wear Tyrolean costumes, which Edward had brought with him—even the manager must wear one. The idea being that the composer could have the right atmosphere to work on his latest masterpiece. Luigi agreed to this wish of the famous maestro, though he did not fancy himself in Tyrolean costume. The date and length of the stay was arranged, and then Luigi asked if Mr. Albert's wife was coming as well.

"No, no!" Edward waved his hands in horror. "Absolutely no! The maestro is to be alone."

Victor Albert drove out in ordinary clothes to Pontresina, and hero he changed into Tyrolean costume. Then in a mule-drawn cart the great composer continued his journey up the mountain to the Alpen Hotel, which was two kilometres distant. The chauffeur looked after his dark-skinned attractive master and thought him a little mad.

All the staff, the manager, and Edward were there to greet Victor Albert when his mule eventually completed the journey and he was given a right royal welcome. The composer beamed with delight. Free at last. His wife had no idea where he had gone, and Edward and the chauffeur were sworn to secrecy. Now he could compose his great Tyrolean opera in perfect surroundings.

But he reckoned without his wife and Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy.

Some little way from the hotel was a small alpine village, and as Victor Albert came up the mountain road in his mule-cart the two adventurers were not far behind in their antiquated sleigh.

The villagers were puzzled by the advent of these two strangers. They were all wrapped up in furs as if travelling to the North Pole, and it was summer in Switzerland. Their absurd bowler hats made their attire look even more ridiculous. They cast aside several moth-eaten rugs, and Stan endeavoured to ring a large bell. He had forgotten that he had stuffed it up with paper to stop it jangling. At any rate he got it working at last, and the people all turned out thinking there was a landslide or a fire.

"Mouse-traps!" Ollie bellowed.

When the people realised what the two friends were trying to sell they laughed and went back into their houses. Nothing daunted they unloaded a number of small traps and a trap that would have caged a lion, and approached the first house. Stan dropped the huge case on Ollie's foot, and that caused the fat fellow to yell.

He gave his thin friend a look and banged on the knocker.

"Good-morning, madam." Ollie doffed his bowler gallantly. "Could we interest you in a nice mouse-trap. We have the latest inventions."

Before the woman could answer her husband appeared in the doorway. He bit savagely on his large pipe and scowled.

"We don't want any mouse-traps." "Oh, let's look at one, anyway," begged the wife.

"We don't want to look at any."

The woman put her hands on her hips.

"If I want to look at a mouse-trap, I'll look at a mouse-trap."

"I said no!" shouted the man.

"I said yes!"

"I said no!"

Whereupon the woman slapped her husband's face, and to Ollie's horror the husband slapped his wife back. The woman slapped her man, and he slapped her again. They did this several times until Ollie thought it was time to do the gallant act, so he reached forward and slapped the man. Whereupon the woman glowered at Ollie, produced a frying-pan and banged Ollie on the head.

"Don't you dare hit my husband!"

"Oh, mama, that was nice of you!" The husband kissed his wife. "Now I think it over, if you want to look at a mouse-trap, look at one."

"No, papa, mama change her mind." She drew her husband inside. "We don't want to look at no mouse-traps." The door slammed.

Ollie sighed and Stan sighed, and then they put on their bowler hats. They put back the mouse-traps and they re-entered the sleigh. Ollie looked severely at his friend.

With a flourish Ollie held out a bank-note.

"This is your idea. Coming all the way from America to Switzerland to sell mouse-traps. What ever gave you that idea?"

"Well, I thought there'd be more mice here than anywhere." Stan looked as if he were going to cry.

"Why, may I ask?"

"Don't they make more cheese here?"

"Oh!" Ollie spoke impatiently. "Do you realise we've been here for two weeks and we haven't sold a single mouse-trap and we're flat broke?"

"Does that mean we haven't any money?"

"Idiot!"

"I don't think we're going to the right places," Stan said hurriedly. "Suppose you were a mouse and you wanted something to eat—where would you go?"

"Well, I'd go where there was cheese, of course."

Stan beamed with pleasure. "Where there's more cheese there's more mice," he announced. "Why don't we go to the cheese factories and sell them?"

"Let me give that a little thought," retorted Ollie, digging a finger into his second chin.

There was one factory in the village, so they went to it. They took their strange-looking packages into the showroom of the owner. Emil was a portly, crafty little man. They did not make a good impression because Ollie, who had carried the smallest packages, placed them on the floor whilst he mopped his brow, and Stan, carrying the large mouse-trap, proceeded to trip over them, but Ollie with the large trap, and send the fat fellow flying. Ollie hit the counter, lurched into a stand containing a hundred and one kinds of cheeses. Ollie sank to the floor, and the cheeses, mostly round like cannon balls, rolled on to Ollie's head.

"What are you trying to do—wreck my place of business?" rared Emil, and then proceeded to call Ollie all the rudest things he knew in the German language.

"Just a moment. Just a moment. Pardon this odd intrusion!" cried Ollie when Emil stopped for breath. "We really mean no harm. Don't get yourself a-flutter, there's no need for alarm. We're selling something that you need, so won't you listen, please?"

"We'll rid your place of all the mice, and we'll also save your cheese!" added Stan.

"Save my cheese?" questioned Emil. They proceeded to carry out a demonstration by drilling mouse-holes in the floor and getting out their best mouse-traps. Unfortunately Stan drilled a hole in a gas-pipe, and then lit a match to find the curious smell. A jet shot up through the floor that singed Ollie's pants. They had to plug all the holes they had bored. Fortunately Emil was not present at this firework display, and he did not find it out till after they had gone, and by the time the fire was out his cheeses weren't as good as they had been. Serve him right because he played a dirty trick on our two friends.

Emil had some no-good Bovanian francs. True there were big denominations on the notes, but they were quite worthless. Also Emil had acquired this Bovanian money, when Bovania was not out of liquidation, in a manner that was somewhat shady. The money was worthless but dangerous. Therefore he bought all the mouse-traps and gave the two Americans what they thought was a small fortune. Ollie was so pleased that he presented Emil with the mule and sleigh. They went off to the nearest hotel to celebrate and spend some of their five thousand francs on a really magnificent spread. They would go to the Alpen Hotel, which had a restaurant that catered for casual travellers—a pity Victor Albert had not insisted upon renting that as well.

What a banquet they had, and Ollie, after studying the menu, beckoned a waiter.

"Bring me a large slice of apple-pie and a demi-tasse."

"Yes, sir." The waiter bowed and turned to Stan. "And you, sir?"

"I think I'll try some of that demi-tasse," mumbled Stan. "Oh, and—er—bring me a cup of coffee."

The waiter gasped, and went and ordered a coffee for Oliver and two for Stan. Then Luigi, still rubbing his hands, approached their table.

"I hope everything is to your satisfaction?"

Everything was until the waiter showed up and reported there was no apple-pie. Luigi said he could have any other kind of pie, but that would not do for Ollie. He would have apple-pie or nothing. The manager sent for the chef.

The chef was swarthy, had a hooked nose like an eagle, very fiery eyes, and looked like a gipsy. He had fierce Romany blood in his veins. He was sorry, but he had no apple-pie; and Ollie told the chef just what he thought of him. Luigi vowed that the chef should go unless he produced this apple-pie for these customers.

"Make a hundred apple-pies!" stormed Ollie.

"Yeah, and make me an apple-dumpling!" cried Stan.

But it could not be done because there were no apples in the hotel.

"I am sorry to cause you this inconvenience," murmured Luigi, almost bent double with apologising. "I promise you it will never occur again."

Ollie puffed at his cigar.

"Well, just skip it. Bring me the bill!" He lolled or sagged back in his chair. Luigi called, and the waiter appeared with the bill. Ollie hardly glanced at it, and with a flourish handed Luigi a banknote. "Take it out of that and bring me the change in American currency."

"This is a funny joke!" Luigi cried, and shook with laughter. "You Americans give always to me a sense of humour." Ollie looked blankly at Stan, and very politely they joined in the laughter. That Luigi did not like. "Now, stop the monkey business and give-a me some real money so I can pay the bill."

Then they learnt to their horror that this money was only good in Bovania, and when they suggested going to Bovania, heard that there was no such place. Luigi's remarks when he heard they had no other form of money out-rivalled Emil's.

"Don't drink that coffee!" As Stan tried to gulp the demi-tasse. "You come with me."

They were escorted into the kitchen, where the chef showed his teeth in a nasty smile.

"They come here to-day with great pretence, and they haven't any money in their pockets," Luigi announced. "What-a you think of that, Franzlhuber? After so much fuss about the apple-pie they cannot pay the bill, so-a I put them-a to work. You will tell-a them what to do."

The chef picked up a carving-knife and looked at it in a manner that made the two victims shiver, and when he smiled and flashed his eyes they shook at the knees.

"And if they break any dishes—for every dishes they break they work another day!" finally decreed Luigi.

The chef nodded, and Luigi departed.

"You remember what the boss said?" The chef picked up a plate. "For every dish you break you work another day. Hold this!" He tossed it to Ollie, and, of course, the fat fellow dropped it. Then the chef began to toss plates at them, and when about twenty lay broken on the floor he stalked up to a blackboard and put twenty strokes on it.

"By the time you leave this place the grey hairs of your beard will be trailing on this kitchen floor." And laughing most horribly the chef left them to their unhappy thoughts.

Anna

STAN and Ollie were very depressed, especially when they looked at the blackboard. Every time they managed to get those wretched cross marks wiped off the slate somebody would barge into them and crash would go several plates, so that they looked like spending the rest of their days at the Alpen Hotel. The chef was a tyrant.

After they had been there about a week, came a day when everything went wrong for everybody. Stan came bursting into the kitchen, and Ollie was carrying quite twenty plates. Not only did all those plates crash, but the fat fellow also knocked over a dresser. By the time the chef had finished with the slate, it was nothing but ticks.

The great Victor was enjoying his holiday and doing some grand work on his opera, when his studio door was flung open and a most ravishing beauty rushed into the room.

"My darling!" Victor jumped to his feet and swept the girl into his arms. He kissed her once, then pushed her away. His smile of joy gave place to a scowl. "What are you doing here, Anna?"

"Aren't you happy to see me?"

"Why did you follow me?"

"But, darling, I am your wife!" She glanced across at the composer's obvious upset manager. "Edward, I think he's forgotten who I am. Will you please introduce me to my husband."

"Certainly, Miss Hoefel."

"Edward!" spoke Victor Albert severely.

"Why did you run away from me and"—Anna pointed to his Tyrolecan shorts—"why the disguise?"

"This is not a disguise," her husband answered angrily. "This costume is to get me into the mood to write my greatest operetta."

"But, Victor darling, I don't understand. You've always written your greatest music with me, and the critics have all acclaimed you."

"The critics have acclaimed me?" he sported. "Ha, ha! That's good! The critics have acclaimed me!" He picked up a paper. "Just listen to what this Vienna journal says: 'Anna Hoefel's singing is divine.' Is my music mentioned? No!" He picked up another paper. "'Anna Hoefel's new operetta is a sensation.' In small print at the end: 'Victor Albert is the composer.' You're a success. I'm just a P.S. But that's all over now. This is one time the critics will not be blinded to the merits of my music by your lovely voice. You're—you're going home and—" He paused for effect. "And you're going to stay there."

"My home is with you."

"Please try to understand." Victor spoke with the air of a martyr. "With you beside me I could never, never, never compose music about a simple, unsophisticated girl that a peasant could fall in love with."

"You think a peasant wouldn't fall in love with me?" demanded the beautiful Anna.

"A peasant fall in love with you?" Victor held his sides with mirth. "Imagine a peasant falling in love with the prima donna of the Albert Theatre. Why he'd be scared to death of you. Now, darling, will you please go and leave me in this peaceful atmosphere where I can compose undisturbed."

"All right, I'll go back to Vienna." Anna's eyes flashed. "You go ahead with your foolishness, but don't come crying to me at the last moment to sing your masterpiece."

Anna stalked downstairs in a fine fury, and she sat down in the empty lounge to regain her composure. Enter Stan and Ollie. Stan fell over a sweeper, upset a vase of flowers, and knocked Anna's handbag off the table. Ollie picked it up and with a simper handed the girl the bag, whilst Stan grinned sheepishly.

"Thank you."

"The pleasure's all mine, madam." Gallantly spoke Ollie, raising the bowler that never seemed to leave his large head.

"At least the help around here is courteous." Anna was amused.

"Well, we can't help being helpful." Ollie sighed. "You see, we're a couple of American gentlemen temporarily embarrassed."

"Yeah," whispered Stan. "We wash dishes."

Anna was easily able to persuade the two friends to tell the tale of their dire distress.

"Do you mean to say you had to stay here in this hotel because you couldn't pay for your dinner?"

"Absolutely!" Ollie nodded his head.

"Thank you, boys." Anna smiled in Stan was so confused that instead of pulling the piano he was pushing it.

her friendliest fashion. "You've given me an idea."

So Anna went to the restaurant, and no one in the hotel except her husband and Edward knew that this was the great Anna Hoefel. So she sat down and ordered all the most expensive things on the menu, and when they presented the bill she found she had mislaid her purse.

Stan and Ollie had been sworn to secrecy and Ollie was all of a flutter. He felt certain he was in love. Anna had told them she wanted to stay in the hotel, but she had only told them her stage name, and made no mention of the fact she was married to Victor Albert. They thought she was some little chorus girl wanting a free holiday. They were quite excited until they reached the kitchen, and Stan succeeded in tripping over a mop and knocked some plates off the kitchen table. The chef's language was a trifle harsh, because this breaking gag was getting rather expensive. He tossed Stan a couple of white chickens and told him to pluck out the feathers.

Stan felt quite depressed as he sat outside in a box and plucked at a chicken. Ollie appeared carrying some pails of water and had to sit down for a rest. A St. Bernard dog, with a Red Cross satchel on its back and a little barrel lashed to the collar, ambled into the scene and proceeded to go to sleep in the sun.

"How often do they fill those barrels?" Stan asked.

"Every time they become empty." Ollie gave Stan a suspicious look.

"What's on your mind?"

"Nothing."

Ollie wagged a fat finger. "That brandy is put there for a humane purpose, and anyone that would stoop so low as to touch it without just cause should be shot."

"He certainly should," mumbled Stan, his eyes on the barrel. "Do they save people in the summer-time?"

"No, only when it snows."

Ollie went off hurriedly because the chef had appeared. Stan leered at the dog and it came closer, but when his hand crept round to the barrel there came a deep growl. He tried several times, but the dog wasn't having any. Stan stared unhappily before him and plucked the chickens aimlessly; a white feather fluttered to the ground, like a snowflake. Stan plucked out a whole handful of feathers and tossed them up and they made a small snowstorm. Stan began to get busy on those chickens, and when he threw up handfuls of feathers and then lay on the ground moaning, the St. Bernard crept to his side and did not growl when Stan removed the small barrel.

Meanwhile, Victor was busy with his operetta, pleased that he had got rid of the wife of whom he was at most times so fond. He would not have been so pleased if he could have seen the pretty new chambermaid. She came slyly into the room and began to flick a duster around, but Victor was too busy to notice. He wondered whether he might compose a similar tune to "Mine to Love," which had proved so successful. He would run over the tune and see if it could be altered. He began to sing as he played and his singing was nearly as good as his playing. Anna listened spellbound by the lilt of the tune.

"I only know you're mine to love, you—"

"You gave a new design to love," trilled Anna.

"Be still, my heart, be still."

"We haven't lived until this moment,"

September 24th, 1933.

with its thrill of—" Anna ceased abruptly because Victor had realised at last he was not alone.

He stalked up to her. "Take off that silly costume and get out of this hotel!" he ordered.

"I think the costume is charming," mocked Anna. "And, besides, the manager insisted I should wear it. Don't you think I make a pretty chambermaid?"

"I won't have you interfering with my work," shouted Victor, when she had told him of the trick she had played. "Edward!"

Edward rushed in and pulled up at sight of the girl.

"Why, Miss Hoefel, how charming!" he cried. "You look just like the girl for our new operetta!"

"You idiot!" stormed Victor. "Can't you see this is one of her tricks." Scowling fiercely he turned on his wife. "This hotel isn't big enough for the two of us. I shall ask Edward to fetch the manager and have him get rid of you at once."

"What a tasty morsel for the Vienna newspapers," snapped Anna. "I can see the headlines, 'Famous composer has wife thrown out of hotel.'"

"You wouldn't dare!"

"You leave me no alternative." She flicked the duster under his nose. "I'm sorry, sir, but I can't stay here arguing. I must finish my duties."

"Edward, this is all your fault," raged the maestro when the door had closed. "Get me a place where I can be alone and work in peace away from everybody."

Edward returned in a few minutes and led his master to the open window. He pointed proudly.

"A nice quiet place, sir, where you can work and nobody can disturb you."

"A tree house!" Victor smiled, as he looked up at the small house constructed in the branches of a lofty pine. There was a swinging wooden bridge from the tree house to a steep path on the convenient adjacent mountain. "That's perfect," he approved. "Have my piano sent up there at once."

A Piano and a Gorilla

LUIGI sent for Oliver and informed him that he and Stanley were to take a small upright piano to the tree house. The fat fellow went off to find his friend, and found him lying in a heap of feathers, snoring lustily, with the St. Bernard close to his side. Oliver sniffed, then he went closer and sniffed again, and lastly he saw the barrel. He picked it up and shook it—it was empty. Stanley opened one eye, grinned from ear to ear, and murmured hoarsely:

"I ought to be shot!"

Oliver managed to get Stanley to his feet. The sinner swayed dizzily and grinned inanely all the time his friend was telling him just what he thought of this act. After which he took Stanley firmly by the arm and marched him up to the rooms of Victor Albert to get the piano.

Stan was very uncertain on his feet and gave a start, upsetting a dish of fruit on the piano. Ollie was furious when Stan picked up an apple and held it out to him—he knocked it out of his hand. Stan's eyebrows went up in bewilderment and he grovelled on the floor till he found the apple. He felt very happy, so he proceeded to bounce the apple on Ollie's head as if it were a tennis ball. Ollie was getting ready to pulverise his friend when Anna appeared. Ollie lowered his head and gave her a coy look.

"Are you afraid of me?"

"Why, no, ma'am."

"Do you like me?"

"Well, yes, ma'am!" gasped Ollie.

"I like you and your sister," mumbled Stan, and became quiet when Oliver gave him such a look.

"Is your friend all right?" Anna asked Ollie. "He seems a little unsteady."

"He has a knack of getting us into trouble," explained the fat fellow. "And as fast as I get him out of a mess the deeper he manages to get me."

"We'll have to help each other," Anna said, with a dazzling look at her latest conquest. "Better get busy with that piano, because here comes this composer fellow and he has such a horrible temper."

They got the piano out of the room on to a landing. Ollie had had his shins barked because Stan's pushing was somewhat erratic. He was so angry that he gave his friend a push and, roused at last, Stan pushed back. Now, Ollie was not standing for such rebellion and gave Stan a very hard push, and the smaller man catapulted back against the piano, which was at the top of the stairs. The piano did a beautiful toboggan slide down those stairs and did not stop when it got to the bottom because it had casters.

The piano went into a tea lounge, scattered a number of visitors, upset several tables, caused a waiter to drop a tray full of cups and saucers, across a terrace and down some stone steps into the courtyard. Ollie went running after it, Stan had fallen down the stairs, and just as the piano was thinking of sliding down the road Ollie got to it. Then Stan appeared and they clutched at the piano.

From the sounds inside the hotel all was not well, and Ollie gave his friend an agry push and pointed to the hill. They managed to hoist the piano on to a dolly, and then they started to push the piano which, though small, was no light weight. They had not gone far when a small dog-drawn cart appeared. The dog was a St. Bernard and it had a barrel round its neck. Stan felt drawn towards it. Ollie gave a snort of anger and went after the offender and grabbed him, whereupon the piano ran backwards and gave them such a nasty wallop in the stern.

Back to the job of getting that piano up a mountain-path that got steeper and steeper and narrower and narrower. To those born and bred in the mountains it was a gentle slope, but to these two it seemed about a one in three gradient. They puffed and pushed, and several times Ollie looked towards the edge of the precipice. It was only a thousand foot drop. Stan was still a bit fuddled and several times would walk on the very edge of this narrow track, and then, when the two exhausted fellows were within thirty yards of the swing-bridge, the piano would not budge. They pushed and pushed, but it had no effect.

"See what it is," ordered Ollie.

Stan managed to edge round the piano with his feet so close to the edge that Ollie kept on swallowing with nervous excitement. Stan opened one eye and shut the other and then found that the cause of the trouble was a large stone. This with much struggling, he succeeded in uprooting and staggered with it to the edge, but when he tried to throw it nearly threw himself as well. Finally he put the rock down, kicked it violently, and gave a yell because it hurt his too. The rock slid over the precipice. When Stan had recovered he got a grip on the piano, but was so confused that instead of pulling he was pushing. A yell from Ollie as the piano began to move backwards awoke Stan and he desisted.

Ollie managed to get him back to his old place, and once more they started to push the piano to the top of the incline. Here they were able to rest. The view may have been wonderful, but Ollie felt he was perched on the edge of a cloud. A hasty glance at this wooden bridge with its rope rails had done nothing to quieten his nerves. He pushed Stan towards the bridge.

"See if it's safe."

"Huh?" questioned Stan.

"See if it's strong enough to hold us."

"Well, if it's not I'll let you know," said Stan and charged on to the bridge as if it was the widest and safest of structures. He reached the tree house, hopped on to the veranda, waved to Ollie and then darted back on to the bridge, which swayed alarmingly. None of them saw a long, hairy arm that came out of the doorway of the tree house and then vanished. It happened that a performing gorilla had escaped from the village and had picked out the tree house as a hide-away.

Stan got back to the mountain path.

"Say, I'm not going across that bridge."

"You just went across it," shouted Ollie.

"Did I?" That seemed to floor Stan.

After some arguing they decided to try to get the piano across, and they got on to the bridge. Stan pulled and Ollie pushed. They got well out when a wheel of the dolly caught in a crack in the boarding, so they lifted the piano forward. Ollie forgot the dolly, put his foot on it, and it slid from under him, and Ollie did a beautiful somersault. He crashed head-first through the bridge, but was caught by his large feet.

"Oh! Oh! Oh!" he yelled "Stan, help me! Stan! Stan!"

Stan looked all round and wondered where his pal had gone.

"Come and get me!" yelled Ollie.

"I'm slipping! Come and get me!"

Stan looked over the piano and gave a squeak at sight of the feet and Ollie hanging head-first. He reached down and caught his chum's hands, and after much struggling a white and shaken Ollie was back on the bridge.

"I'm going to see if the rest of these slats are safe," said Ollie when he had recovered from his fright, and he pushed past Stan and the piano. He reached the house platform. "Everything's okay," he called back. "From now on it's going to be easy sailing."

Oliver returned to the back of the piano, and the two men got it back on to the dolly, which by some miracle had not gone shooting down into the valley. They did not know that they had an interested spectator. The large gorilla had shuffled out on to the platform and was watching them with keen interest.

They moved it several yards and then rested. Stan, now pushing, blinked his eyes and gaped.

"I see a monkey."

"It doesn't surprise me a bit," cried his friend. "If you don't quit drinking brandy you'll be seeing pink elephants. Now, get on that piano. Come on!"

So they strained once more over the piano, and the gorilla shuffled on to the bridge. A hairy hand scratched Ollie's leg and he looked suspiciously at Stan. He bent once more over the piano, and then someone raised his bowler hat and put it back again.

"Everything ain't just all right," Ollie said, half glancing round. He did not see the gorilla, who was huddled down close behind him. "Come on, before I get jittery."

Then the gorilla smote him hard in the back.

"Oh!" gasped the fat man

Then Ollie did look right behind him and he let out a yell of terror. Stan saw and jumped backwards and half fell through the hole in the bridge. The gorilla gave a snort of fury and waved his hairy hands. Ollie scrambled over the piano.

Stan dragged himself to safety and sprinted up those slats to the safety of the mountain path.

"Oh, oh, oh, oh, oh!" Ollie was yelling.

The gorilla braced his feet, gripped the ropes and began to sway the bridge by sudden jerks of his huge body. Ollie was unable to move, and clung to the rope rail.

"Oh, oh, oh!" he kept on moaning.

The bridge was not used to this sort of treatment, and the ropes began to fray as they rubbed against the slats. The swaying of the bridge seemed to delight the creature because he swung all the harder, and the heavy piano added its efforts. Ollie expected to be tossed off that bridge at any moment. One strand went and then another. A crack like a pistol-shot and that bridge went in the centre.

The piano went hurtling downwards into the valley and the gorilla went spinning over and over after it. The piano hit a shelving ledge and smashed into splinters, and the gorilla hit a tree and then went over and over down a steep incline.

Stan had reached safety, but Ollie went hurtling towards the mountain face. His stomach acted as a buffer, and he hung there completely winded. Faint moans came from him as he hung on with the tenacity of desperation. The bridge was now hanging like a rope ladder. Stan went down this ladder and had to make matters worse by stepping on his pal's head.

"Get your feet off my head!" Ollie yelled.

"That money is sufficient to get you both out of Switzerland, and I suggest that you go quickly because I am a very jealous man," said Albert.

Stan removed himself and slowly and painfully Ollie drew himself upward. Stan reached out and was nearly dragged off the ledge, but at last two exhausted men lay puffing and blowing on that narrow road. Some time later they staggered back to the Alpen Hotel to report the loss of the piano. Victor Albert almost tore out his hair.

The Alpenfest

HAVING captured the affections of Stan and Ollie, the beautiful Anna was out to get some more scalps. She'd show her husband that she could play the part of a Tyrolean maid and vamp the whole hotel if she wanted to. She had done some smiling at the chef.

"Do you like me?"

"Like you? I love you." The chef clapped his hands to his heart. "Ever since I see you in this hotel my heart goes bumpety-bump."

"Oh, you're so sweet!" coyly cried Anna, and long eyelashes concealed the mischief in her eyes.

Meanwhile Victor was pacing up and down his room, and giving Edward a poor time.

"You're the biggest idiot in creation. Now that you're arranged everything in your usual fine fashion and the piano is ruined, what am I going to do?"

"I have everything under control, sir, as usual," smoothly replied Edward. "There will be another piano in here in a week."

"A week?" screamed Victor.

"In the meantime, sir, why not use the organ in the lobby?"

Now Stan and Ollie were working in the lobby. The plate-breaking business was more than Luigi could stand. They couldn't break the organ. No, but they did their best to put it out of action. Stan was working at scrubbing some stairs that went up to the floor above, and the pipes of the organ were against these stairs. Ollie had a bucketful of soap and water, and this bucket was a queer affair because it had a cork stopper in the side, and Stan dipped his brush so vigorously into the bucket that he knocked out the bung. Out poured the soapy water, and it went down one of the pipes.

Anna appeared, and that stopped them working.

"I've never thanked you boys properly for helping me get into this hotel."

"Well, it was a mere nothing combined with a terrific pleasure!" cried the love-lorn Oliver.

"Will you tell me something?"

"Certainly." Ollie wiped his hands and hid the mop behind him.

"If you really didn't know me would you think I was really a peasant girl?"

"I'll say I would!" cried Ollie. "The prettiest peasant girl I've ever seen."

"Oh, you sweet thing!" Anna cried, and ran off laughing.

Oliver sat down on the floor and looked about him in a dumb, confused sort of way.

"What's the matter?" Stan asked anxiously.

"I don't know."

"I know," Stan nodded his head.

"You're in love."

"How can you tell?"

"It's easy. Look at the silly, sloppy look on your face. Do you mind if I tell you something?"

Oliver was in such a state that he did not mind anything.

"She's in love with you, too."

"How do you know?"

"Any dumbbell can tell that. If you play your cards right you've got her right in the hollow of your hand."

September 24th, 1938.

"Tell me some more, Stanley."

"There's nothing to tell!" cried the wise man. "All you've got to do is to go and let her know. Why don't you do it like the gay Caviars in the olden days?"

"The Caviars? What did they do?"

"Well, when they were in love they used to go by the light of the moon and serenade their lady fair."

"But suppose she's in love with someone else?" argued Oliver.

"Faint heart never won fair lady."

They had no chance to discuss the matter further as Victor Albert came striding into the lobby, and seated himself before the organ. Beautiful music came from the organ, and the two adventurers listened until a strange gurgling intervened. Large bubbles came out of the organ stops and floated round the room.

Victor did not see them, but he was annoyed with the organ and worked savagely with his feet. A whole lot more bubbles and then music again. The two watchers imagined they must have been dreaming, until the organ again gave forth awful grunts and gurgles and bubbles poured out of the pipes.

A bubble floated towards Oliver, and Stan poked at it with his finger, broke the bubble and poked Oliver in the nose. Victor went on playing, and after a while got used to the bubbles which floated all round the lobby. One seemed to vanish into Ollie's ear, and Stan blew so hard to get it out that he nearly broke his pal's ear-drum.

That night, when the hotel had gone to rest, Oliver, accompanied by his squire, set out to serenade his lady. Ollie had some poetry and a bouquet of flowers, whilst Stanley was armed with a musical instrument of the trumpet species known as a tuba.

Outside Anna's window they stopped, and Ollie nudged his friend. Stan took a deep breath, and a raucous sound shattered the night. Stan took another breath and tried one of the stops, and that produced a shrill sereech. But after a while he got better and managed a sort of bugle call. A window opened and there was Anna.

"What are you doing here?"

Ollie giggled and held out the flowers. "Thank you."

"He's got something to tell you, too. Haven't you?" encouraged Stan, as Ollie seemed tongue-tied.

"If you love me like I love you, I'd love you better than Irish stew," read Ollie from his piece of paper.

"Thank you. Your poetry is most touching," Anna giggled.

"I wonder if you'd give me a—a—" Ollie flookered.

"Yes?" encouraged Anna.

"A chance to take you to the Alpenfest to-morrow."

"The Alpenfest?"

"It's going to be a big holiday," explained Stan.

"Yeah, and all the countryside gathers here for merry-making," Ollie added. "There'll be gipsy fortune-telling, dancing and singing."

"It gives me an idea!" cried Anna. "Will you help me?"

"I'd do anything in the world for you," promised Ollie.

"Then meet me here to-morrow morning at sunrise and I'll tell you my plan." She blew a kiss to them both. "Good-night."

When the window had closed Stan nudged his love-struck friend.

"We forgot to serenade her."

"Let's do it now."

Stan blew on the tuba valiantly, and Ollie managed some words of a song called "Let me call you sweetheart." Now the chef had the bed-room above Anna's, and this noise woke him up. He looked out, saw the serenaders, and dumped their enthusiasm by pouring a pitcher of water over them.

"You dumbbells!" he snarled at them. "What are you playing music for at this hour?"

"Why, we're serenading," Stan explained in his simple way.

"Serenading who?" the chef demanded.

"His sweetheart," said Stan. "You know, Anna, the new chambermaid. He's in love with her. Look at the silly, sloppy look on his face."

"Well, let me tell you something." The chef shook the pitcher in a threatening manner. "I want you to know that you're wasting your time as Anna is in love with me. She's my girl. If I catch either of you two talking to her again I'll skin you both alive!"

Damply they gazed upwards at his fierce face.

"Anna isn't your girl," began Ollie. "Why—"

"Get out!" raged the chef. "If you haven't gone in two seconds I'll come out after you."

Stan and Ollie decided that it would be better if they got back to their quarters, which was the attic over a disused stable.

On the morrow the Alpenfest was held in the courtyard of the hotel, and everybody in the locality was there to sing and make merry. Our two friends had risen at the crack of dawn, and the chef who had come to inform them that if they imagined it was a holiday for them they were mistaken was livid to find their beds empty. He informed Luigi, who said he hoped he never saw those two again because everything seemed to be going wrong since they had shown up. His bill for crockery was going to be enormous.

They had met Anna at the appointed place, and they had sneaked off to the village. The girl had made all her plans. They were surprised that this chambermaid should have so much money—they had thought she was almost as poor as themselves. She got some picturesque gipsy outfits for her two cavaliers and would not let them wear their dreadful bowlers. They bought false moustaches to complete the disguise. Anna was dressed up as a fortune-teller, and she kept a thin gauze veil over her face. They hired the best caravan.

Stan and Ollie were on the driver's seat, and Anna stood in a little doorway behind them. She looked all mysterious. Her escort fingered their moustaches and kept an eye open for the chef.

"Do you think they'll recognise us?" whispered Stan.

"Why even your own brother wouldn't know you."

"But I haven't got a brother."

Ollie frowned.

"Well, the brother that you haven't got wouldn't even know you."

"Don't worry, boys," Anna told them. "And if you are discovered they can't do anything to you."

"Certainly not," agreed Ollie.

"Remember what the chef said," mumbled Stan. "He threatened to skin us alive."

"Stop worrying, boys!" cried Anna. "Please go ahead."

The caravan proceeded slowly up the hill, and arrived at the courtyard just after a spectacular flag dance. The crowd of people made way for the mysterious caravan. Ollie reined in the horse, and solemnly raised his arms.

(Continued on page 23)

He joined up with them, and as he drew rein before the foremost horseman in the cavalcade he saw that the boy Kit Carson was present among them.

"What's this?" he demanded. "I thought I made it clear that Kit was to stay in the encampment near Santa Fe."

A sturdy individual by the name of Kendrick answered him.

"Yeah, we know that, Clark," the latter said ruefully, "an' we left him at the encampment all right. But it seems he up an' trailed us, for soon after we stopped here at Tascosa Bend accordin' to plan, he comes trottin' along on his pony as cool as yuh like. I figure the only way to make that little maverick stay outa trouble would be to hog-tie him."

"That's what you should've done," Clark grunted, with a reproachful glance at Kit. "But since he's here he may as well stick with us. Come on, we're hittin' the breeze for Lost Canyada, and we've no time to lose."

Kendrick looked at the big frontiersman sharply.

"You sound like somethin' was wrong," he said. "Where's Jamison, Bowie an' Davy Crockett, anyhow?"

"They're ambushed up there," was Clark's terse reply. "It's pretty clear to me now that Dupray made a dupe outa Jim Bowie. The Rider wasn't trapped in Lost Canyada at all. Instead, Dupray's men were lynin' in wait for the four of us, and they opened up on us as we were walkin' our horses down the ravine. Jamison, Bowie and Crockett lost their mounts, but I managed to keep ahold of mine, and after we'd traded lead with those renegades for a spell I made a dash for it and got out into the clear."

"It was a chance in a thousand," he added, "but it came off, and if we hurry we may be in time to save Bowie and the others. They're well under cover among a bunch of rocks, and so long as their ammunition holds out they ought to be able to keep Dupray's gang at bay."

He made no reference to his encounter with the Rider of the Painted Stallion, for in his anxiety to return to the scene of the ambushade he was averse to launching into any detailed narrative. Thus it was without further delay that he and the men of the Jamison wagon-train set out for the north, turning their backs on Tascosa Bend.

Kit Carson was in their midst at the outset, but ere long the youngster was left well to the rear, for his diminutive pony could not keep up with Clark's sorrel and the brones of the other men. Nevertheless, the boy spurred after the rescue-party doggedly and succeeded in keeping them in view throughout that headlong gallop towards Lost Canyada, where murderous foes had snared Jamison and his two comrades.

As for Clark Stuart, he rode well to the fore, leading the cavalcade over the sterile terrain of the forbidding mountain country, through ragged gulches, across stone-strewn ridges, through tracts of dry, tangled scrub that gained some poor nourishment from a soil parched by the blistering sun of the great South-West. Then at last the band of hard-riding pioneers drew within earshot of Lost Canyada, and realising that a brooding silence hung upon the locality, the U.S. Government agent became a prey to a sense of dread and misgiving.

Had his dash for help been in vain? Had he and his companions arrived too late to be of any aid to Jamison, Bowie and Davy Crockett? Were those three redoubtable stalwarts of the frontier lying dead among the clutter of rocks where he had left them—slain by the ruthless outlaws who owed fealty to Escobedo Dupray?

Such were the dark thoughts that oppressed Clark's mind as his sorrel bore him nearer and ever nearer to the mouth of Lost Canyada with the men of the Jamison column strung out behind him, and they were thoughts that persisted until the lie was given to them by the muffled blast of a shot somewhere in the ravine.

It was answered by a desultory volley, and Clark knew that at least one of his friends was still alive.

Was it too much to hope that all three of them were in the land of the living?

He pressed on at the head of the rescuers, and inside another minute he and the men of the wagon-train were surging into Lost Canyada amid a thunder of hoofs and a smother of dust.

Instantly they beheld groups of sinister figures edging down the rocky slopes of the ravine—the figures of Dupray's hirelings. These were tentatively descending towards the bed of the defile as if to converge upon a knot of boulders there, and they were blazing away at those boulders, from amongst which bullets were being discharged at them in response.

The crooks, it seemed, had finally plucked up courage to close in on their prey, but they were never destined to make the "kill," for Clark and the rescue-party took in the situation at a glance, and next moment their guns were roaring a challenge to the renegades.

The slopes of the Canyada echoed and re-echoed the tumult of the newcomers' opening salvo, and the very air seemed to tremble with the concerted outburst of that fusillade.

Pandemonium broke loose in the defile, a pandemonium dominated by the resounding blatter of firearms and punctuated by the whine of lead and the cries of stricken men, with the beat of hoofs forming a sullen undertone to the din. Not for long did the clamour prevail, however, for although Dupray's men stood their ground for some thirty seconds half of them were wiped out by the gunplay of Clark and his party by the time the rescuers had penetrated to the depths of the Canyada.

The desperadoes on the left-hand slope suddenly gave way and, turning tail, scrambled up to the rim of the acclivity, whereupon those on the right-hand slope followed suit, and harried by shots from the revolvers and rifles of the Jamison faction, the survivors of the Dupray gang had soon picked up their horses and thrown themselves astride their saddles.

They made off in an easterly direction along the twin summits of the ridges that framed the defile, and they dipped down on to a level expanse of prairie beyond it, joining forces there and sweeping onward in full flight. Meanwhile, the men of the wagon-train had shown an eagerness to give chase, and would have pushed after the fugitives if Clark Stuart had not restrained them.

"Our mounts are plenty blown and lathered, boys," he told them, "and we'd never catch up with them coyotes. We know where their hide-out is, anyway, and we can afford to take things easy, I reckon. Besides, our first concern is to find out if Jamison and Bowie and Davy Crockett are all right."

He had hardly spoken the words when the wagon-boss and Jim Bowie were seen to emerge from the bunch of rocks where they and Crockett had been ensconced, and cantering over to them with the men of the column, Clark addressed Jamison and the veteran Indian fighter in an anxious voice.

"I'm glad you two fellows are okay," he said. "But what about Davy? They—they didn't get him, did they?"

It was Bowie who answered him.

"Don't you worry none about Davy, Clark," he stated, taking out a stick of black tobacco and biting off a wad of it. "He got clipped by a slug just afore you showed up. It took away his fur cap an' put a crease in his skull—shook him up a li'l, but he'll be right as rain in a minute or two. He's a-settin' among the rocks back there collectin' his wits."

Clark dismounted and accompanied Jamison and Bowie into the midst of the boulders, where he discovered Davy Crockett seated on a flat slab of stone. Sure enough Davy was little the worse for the injury he had received, and within the space of some sixty seconds was in full possession of his faculties again.

Jamison turned to Clark then.

"Well," he announced, "you an' the boys got here just about in time. We'd run pretty low in ammunition, an' I guess them outlaws realised it, for, as you saw, they'd begun to sneak down on us in preparation for a final rush that would've meant the end of us. But what's the next move, Clark?"

The younger man squared his powerful shoulders.

"The next move is to make tracks for Dupray's hide-away, Jamison," he said. "We're gonna do what we planned to do when we left Santa Fe—attack that hide-away and shoot it out with the rats who are holdin' up the Trade Treaty between Mexico and the United States. And we stand a better chance of success now than we did before, Jamison, for we inflicted heavy casualties on those outlaws just now, and didn't lose a single man ourselves."

With that he moved clear of the rocks, and Jamison and Bowie and Crockett following him, the four of them rejoined the men of the wagon-train and found that little Kit Carson had arrived in the defile.

"Hallo," exclaimed Jamison at sight of the lad, "what's Kit doin' here?"

"He trailed the boys to Tascosa Bend," Clark interposed. "Wouldn't stay at the encampment near town. I've a mind to send him back there under an escort, only we'll need every man for this attack on the renegade hide-out."

Kit, looking at his benefactor, observing the expression of indecision on his handsome, weather-beaten face, made haste to launch an appeal.

"Aw, Clark, don't send me back," he begged. "Don't even think of it. I wanna be in at the finish—I wanna see you an' the boys fix them outlaws once an' for all."

The U.S. Government agent eyed him sternly for a moment. Then he smiled in spite of himself.

"Okay, you little scamp," he assented. "You win. But get this and get it straight. You keep well to the rear of the column, and when we draw within range of that renegade hide-out see that you stay out of harm's way, understand?"

"I understand, Clark," the lad murmured.

Clark moved now towards his sorrel and swung himself astride the animal. As for Jamison, Bowie and Davy Crockett, they shared mounts with three of the cavalcade of horsemen whom the U.S. Government agent had led to their rescue, and a few seconds later the whole troop was riding eastward through Lost Canyada at a steady clip.

The Hide-out

PUSHING through the hills at the best pace their somewhat wearied broncs could maintain, Clark and his comrades made fair enough progress, and the late afternoon found them only a few miles from their objective.

In the interim the journey had been uneventful—a journey through realms that seemed devoid of any living thing save themselves and their horses. But now, as they were wending their way through a pass in the mountains, they suddenly perceived a figure on the crown of a slope that rose upon their left.

It was a figure in Redskin garb, wearing the feathered head-dress generally associated with a personage of some importance among the Indians. It was a figure mounted on a black and white steed, and by this circumstance Clark immediately identified the individual.

"The Rider of the Painted Stallion!" he ejaculated, involuntarily pulling his sorrel to a standstill.

The other members of the column likewise reined in, and from the saddle of a bronc which he was sharing with a sturdy freighter Jim Bowie addressed the U.S. Government agent.

"You're right, Clark," he said. "That's the little lady what's been a friend to us more'n once, sure enough, an' it appears to me she's makin' signals."

Clark inclined his head, recalling how the girl had intimated during their last meeting that she had certain information to impart concerning Dupray's lair.

"I reckon she wants to have a word with me," he commented. "Listen, Jim, you know the exact whereabouts of the outlaw hide-out. You take the boys there and close in on the renegades. I'll follow up after I've heard what the Rider has to say. And, by the way, see that young Kit Carson doesn't get in the way of any lead."

In another moment he was separating himself from the cavalcade and spurring towards the slope on the left, and after a laborious climb that tested his horse severely he gained the point where the Rider of the Stallion was awaiting him.

He saluted her, looking at her inquiringly as he did so, and after returning his greeting with a movement of her hand she spoke to him solemnly.

"When I saw you earlier to-day," she began, "I told you I had found out something about the hide-out of Dupray. I knew you would like to crush that villain and the men who work for him, and I believe I can show you how. Come with me, and I will guide you to a tunnel which seems to link up with the cave that he and his gang have made their headquarters."

Clark's eyes gleamed with interest. "You mean you've discovered a back way into Dupray's lair?" he queried.

"I think so," was the answer, "although I am not sure."

Clark turned his head and gazed in the direction of the band of horsemen from whom he had detached himself. They were trotting eastward steadfastly, bent on exterminating the rogues who had rendered the trails so hazardous for merchant wagon-trains such as the one they had manned. Already they were out of hail, though they kept glancing back towards the promontory on which their comrade had joined the Rider.

Clark reflected that if there were indeed a back way into Dupray's lair, then there would be every prospect of hemming in the treacherous Spaniard and his minions and bringing the imminent battle to a swift and victorious conclusion. The Jamison faction could be split up into two forces, one making a direct frontal assault against the crooks' stronghold, the other executing a detour that would have for its climax a surprise onset from the rear.

At any rate, the information tendered by the Rider of the Painted Stallion was worth investigating.

"Lead on," the big frontiersman said to the girl. "I'll follow you."

The Rider wheeled, and Clark moved after her as she set out in a somewhat northerly direction. A few seconds afterwards the two of them were descending into a barren valley, the men of the Jamison column being lost to their view, and there then ensued a rapid journey through the heart of the mountains.

Before long the Rider veered eastward, and in another half-hour she was halting beside a sombre aperture in the face of a towering ridge.

As Clark drew abreast of her she indicated that dark fissure.

"There is the tunnel I spoke of," she told him. "The cave which Dupray and his men have made their headquarters is on the other side of the ridge."

"And what makes you think this tunnel might be connected with the renegades' hide-out?" he asked.

"I have seen some of the Dupray gang using it," she explained.

Clark was silent for a brief interval. Then he slipped his feet from his stirrups and swung himself to the ground lithely.

"You wait here, young lady," he instructed, addressing himself to the girl who was known as the Rider. "I'm going in there to make certain your hunch is right. If it is, then I figure we've got Dupray and his scum where we want 'em."

The girl leaned down and placed a slender hand on his arm.

"Be careful," she warned him, with a touching expression of concern on her beautiful countenance.

He pressed her fingers reassuringly, then plucked his six-gun from its holster and advanced into the tunnel, and before he had taken a dozen steps he was enveloped in a gloom so opaque that he could not have seen his own hand before his face.

He felt his way through the darkness, presently becoming aware that the floor of the tunnel was sloping upwards, and he judged that he had covered a distance of about three hundred yards when all at once he saw daylight ahead of him.

A few paces more and he found himself in surroundings that were familiar to him. He was in the cave to which he had once been conveyed as a prisoner—the remote mountain cave that was the lair of Escobedo Dupray and the latter's band of cut-throats.

None of the rogues were visible, but near the right-hand wall was a bunch of horses, saddled and ready for riding, their reins tied to an iron ring that was bolted to the rock, and in the left-hand wall was that crude door opening on to the compartment that had been furnished with table, chairs and bunks so as to accommodate the outlaw gang in some degree of comfort.

The door of that improvised room was ajar, and the gleam of the naphtha lamp that stood on the table shone forth into the main cavern and merged with the daylight that slanted through the mouth of the hide-away. No sound came from the apartment, however, and when he approached the open door on tip-toe and cautiously peered round the corner of it, Clark discovered that the room was untenanted.

"You sure helped me out of a tight corner, young lady," he declared. "I reckon it would've been all up with me if you hadn't appeared on the scene."

He calculated that Dupray and his confederates must be out on the steep declivity which fell away into the gulch that the cave's principal entrance overlooked, and hardly had he formed this conclusion when he heard a voice ring out in a tone of command somewhere beyond the mouth of the cavern—a harsh, malevolent voice which he instantly identified as that of Santa Fe's deposed Lieutenant-Governor.

"All right!" that voice grated. "Let them have it!"

Hard upon the words there came a smashing blatter of gunfire. It was a volley whose echoes mingled with a second belching fusillade, which was answered by an outburst of shooting from a point more remote, and then the uproar of battle developed into a confused medley of reports as the firing became hotter and more ragged.

In the half-light of the gang's stronghold Clark took a tighter grip on his revolver and edged towards the cave-mouth. He had satisfied himself that the Rider's suspicions regarding the tunnel on the north side of the ridge had been correct, and he fully intended to turn back and circle round so as to rejoin the Jamison crowd and then lead a storming-party to the cavern via the communicating tunnel. Yet he was tempted to take stock first of all of the position occupied by the crooks, and with that project in mind he crept forward until he was on the very threshold of the cave's main entrance.

He immediately perceived Dupray and his minions to the right of the cavern mouth. They were on the boulder-strewn ledge that ran across the face of the hillside on which their hide-out was located, and they were blazing furiously at the men of the Jamison column, who had entered the gulch below and who had dismounted to seek such cover as was available at the foot of the slope.

From innumerable clumps of scrub or clusters of rocks the freighters who had crossed the Western wilderness in defiance of the renegades' villainous activities were pumping lead at the Dupray gang in response to the outlaws' gun-play, and even as Clark swept the scene with his eyes his attention was attracted to the figure of Zamora, the deposed Lieutenant-Governor's henchman-in-chief.

The lynx-eyed dago had ducked aside from a boulder behind which he had been crouching and had scuttled towards Dupray, who was standing in the shadow of a massive rock with three or four other members of the gang.

"Wo'd better get out of here by the back way," Zamora blurted, and in spite of the din of the shooting Clark heard his high-pitched words distinctly. "We're not strong enough in numbers to be sure of keeping those hombres down there at bay. Don't forget that half of our men were wiped out over at Lost Canyon to-day."

Dupray answered him in a curt tone. "I know that," he snapped, "and we are getting out of here. But we are not going without the loot we have amassed in the last two years, and we are not going until I have made certain that Jamison and his compadres cannot pursue us. I mean to see that we have a long start and plenty of leisure to find new headquarters."

"You mean we are going to fetch the loot from the cache farther along the hillside, then retreat through the cave after setting a time-fuse that will blow up the entrance to the stronghold and prevent anyone following us, just as we always planned to do if we were ever in a corner?"

Dupray nodded. "Something like that," he replied. "Only it has occurred to me that Jamison and his men are bound to guess there is a back way out of our lair, and if they were to ride round to the north side of the mountain they might succeed in intercepting us. I intend to make certain that they do not ride round to the north side of the mountain."

Zamora looked at him keenly. "And how do you propose to do that, amigo?" he demanded.

Dupray motioned to the enormous rock by which they were standing. Poised on the ledge like some huge, craggy watch-tower, it was balanced precariously over the mouth of the gorge, and that mouth was a narrow bottle-neck between two sheer, scowling walls of cliff. Only in the inner depths of the ravine did the sides yawn wider in slopes that were possible of ascent, though they took on a steep character again where the eastern end of the gap was boxed in by a transverse precipice.

Indeed, the bottle-neck was the only means of entering or leaving the gorge except by way of the cave that had been the headquarters of the Dupray gang, for towards their summits the north and south walls of that pocket in the mountains steepened sharply and became insurmountable ramparts over their entire length.

And all this Escobedo Dupray was taking into account as he indicated the mighty erag in whose shadow he and Zamora stood.

"If this rock were dislodged and tumbled into the gorge," he said, "it would completely block the entrance to the ravine, and no amount of effort on the part of Jamison and his compadres could shift so massive an obstacle. In other words, they would be shut in."

"They could climb over the rock," Zamora argued.

"Yes, I grant you that they could climb over the rock—on foot. But their horses could never negotiate it, and there would be no prospect of Jamison and his crowd pursuing us. Now do you understand?"

Without waiting for any rejoinder from his second-in-command, he turned towards the knot of gangsters who were hovering near at hand and barked an order to them.

"Heave this rock over the cliff," he instructed. "Come on, get to work. It should be easy enough to topple it to the bed of the gorge, poised as it is on the very brink of the ledge."

The rogues to whom he had spoken prepared to exert themselves, and with one accord they set their shoulders against the huge erag. But before they could send the rock hurtling into space Clark intervened.

He had heard enough to realise that Dupray and his accomplices would bid fair to make a clean get-away if the plan conceived by Santa Fe's former Lieutenant-Governor were put into execution. As for Clark's design to bring a storming-party round to the rear of the renegades' line of defence, via the tunnel in the north side of the mountain, such a move was no longer to be considered. He was faced with a situation in which he must act alone and act fast.

Gun tight-clenched in his bronzed fingers, he stepped out on to the broad, split ledge that overlooked the gorge. Before him some half-dozen of Dupray's hirelings were kneeling among the smaller boulders that littered the terrace, and were firing into the ravine. Ho would have to keep an eye on them, he told himself, while at the same time he held in subjection Dupray, Zamora and the ruffians who were about to heave yonder massive erag to the depths.

"Tell your men to leave that rock alone, Dupray!"

The big frontiersman's voice cut sharply across the uproar of the gun-play that was sounding about the terrace and spread sudden confusion amongst the outlaws. Those who had been trading lead with the Jamison faction twisted round with startled expressions on their rascally countenances and gaped at Clark in awe. Dupray, Zamora and the group who had set their shoulders against the erag above the ravine's mouth likewise wheeled and stared at Clark blankly.

There was no need for the U.S. Government agent to repeat his stern command. With Clark's revolver trained on him, Dupray lifted his hands in a seared fashion and slid an anxious glance at the men whom he had detailed to dislodge the massive erag.

"You heard the Americano," he jerked huskily. "Leave that rock alone."

The crooks he had addressed raised their arms submissively in accordance with his bidding. So did Zamora, letting fall a pearl-handled six-shooter that he had been holding in his fist. But out of the corner of his eye Clark detected a suspicious movement on the part of one of the gangsters who had been engaged in the gun duel with the men of the Jamison column.

The outlaw in question was none other than Macklin, apparently little the worse for the injury that he had received earlier in the day when he had been winged by an arrow from the bow of the Painted Stallion's Rider.

Macklin tried to "draw a bead" on Clark, but with a lightning-like gesture the latter switched his revolver upon the bearded renegade and almost simultaneously a leaden slug burst from the big frontiersman's long-barrelled Colt with a racketing smash.

He did not aim to kill the bandit, but merely to disarm him, and his bullet shattered Macklin's right wrist. Yet the hour of final reckoning had come for that treacherous rogue who had once ridden as a scout for the Jamison wagon-train, for dropping his forty-five with a yelp of pain, the scoundrel tottered backwards between a couple of boulders and staggered to the very edge of the terrace—staggered into full view of the pioneers who had left Santa Fe to do battle with the Dupray gang, and whose fire had subsided when the gun-play of the outlaws had ceased so abruptly.

The lull that had occurred in the general engagement was broken as Macklin's reeling figure appeared on the rim of the ledge. From the gorge below a medley of reports rang out, and a swathe of bullets ripped upwards in the gangster's direction.

The man was riddled by those missiles. A dozen of them pierced him and, his eyes glazing, his body distorted in the agonies of death, he plunged from the terrace and went rolling towards the bed of the ravine in a smother of dust, for at the point where he had fallen the ground sloped away in a long, oblique gradient.

Meanwhile, Clark had riveted his attention on the other gunmen who had been blazing at the Jamison party prior to the diversion he himself had created.

"Drop your hardware," he told them grimly, "and get over beside Dupray and the rest of the gang. Come on, do as I say and make it snappy."

The renegades obeyed him and discharging their "irons," moved sullenly along the terrace to the huge crag by which their leader and the other members of the outlaw band were standing. Then, keeping his prisoners covered, Clark edged in the direction of the slope down which the ill-fated Macklin had tumbled.

He did not immediately show himself to his friends below, however, lest they might mistake him for an enemy and open fire on him with disastrous result. Instead, he lifted his voice to make known his presence to them before stepping out into the scope of their vision.

"All right, boys," he sang out, "you can come up now. Nobody is gonna try to stop you, for I've got Dupray and his mob herded here in a bunch with their hands in the air."

There was a silence, a silence terminated all at once by a faint hail from the bed of the gorge, and the frontiersman recognised the unmistakable accents of the veteran Indian fighter, Jim Bowie.

"Well, I'll be durned! Pardners, 'twas Clark Stuart that spoke that 'eece or I'm a Dutchman!"

Clark saw fit now to reveal himself to his friends of the wagon-train. Passing between two of the boulders that had sheltered Dupray's gunmen, he exposed himself to the view of the pioneers in the ravine below, and on the instant more than a score of figures started up from scrub and clustering rocks—the familiar figures of his comrades of the trail, with Jamison and Bowie and Davy Crockett well to the fore. And at the same time little Kit Carson appeared in the mouth of the box-canyon on his diminutive pony, entering the gap from some point just beyond it where he had seemingly been ordered to remain out of harm's way.

Down in the ravine all eyes were raised towards Clark, and suddenly Jamison called to him.

"Where in tarnation did you spring from?" the wagon-boss shouted. "How'd you find your way up there?" "Never mind that," Clark answered. "Come on up and take these rats off my hands."

His words met with prompt response. Hurrying forward, the men below started to ascend the slope.

In the meantime Clark had concentrated his whole attention on his prisoners again, but he was unaware that a sinister form was stealing towards him through the boulders that dotted about the ledge—the form of a mission-bred Navajo Indian whom he might have identified as Topek, that retainer who had served Dupray when the Spaniard had held the post of Lieutenant-Governor of Santa Fe.

Inexperienced in the use of firearms, Topek had taken no part in the gun-fight which had been in progress when Clark had advanced from the cave, and had been lying low amongst a group of rocks to the left, inactive and concerned only with the object of keeping under cover. That was why Clark had not observed him, and he failed to detect his presence now as the Redskin crept up behind him with a chunk of stone clutched in his hand.

Nearer and nearer Topek drew to the unsuspecting white man. Then all at once he straightened up and leaped on Clark, bringing down that stone on the frontiersman's head with full force.

(To be concluded in another stirring episode next week. By permission of British Lion Film Corporation, Ltd., starring Ray Corrigan.)

"SWISS MISS"

(Continued from page 18)

"Ladies and gentlemen!" he cried. "With your kind permission we will introduce the greatest prima donna that ever thrilled a cantata. Romany Rose."

Victor was on a balcony with Edward, and he stared intently at the veiled singer as she was assisted down from the caravan. A number of musicians stepped forward. Anna had arranged what they should play by giving them a very generous money gift. It was a gipsy song.

"If you should read within my eyes, but one desire could you say 'no' to me? And if my breath upon your lips should fan the fire, could you say 'no' to me?"

There were a lot more words like these, but it was not the words that mattered—it was the beautiful voice of the singer. Then she twirled a tambourine, and Ollie gasped to see such graceful, amazing dancing.

"Edward," Victor turned to his manager. "Go down and bring that gipsy up to my room. Tell her I want to sign her to a contract."

Edward hesitated. "How about Miss Anna, sir?" he said, twisting his hands together. "I don't think she's going to like this very much, sir."

Victor laughed heartily. "You mug, don't you recognise her?" he cried. "That is Anna!"

Some time later Ollie informed Stan that it was their duty to find out what had become of Anna. She had been gone too long. So with some misgiving they entered the Alpen Hotel and walked up the stairs. They knew she was with Victor Albert, but outside his door was a notice suspended to the handle: "DO NOT DISTURB."

"Well, can you beat that?" gasped Stan.

"I suppose we had better go downstairs," murmured Ollie. "I shall speak most severely to Anna—" He broke off to nudge Stan. They were not alone.

"What are you two doing up here?" demanded the chef.

"Who?" asked Stan. "You!" The chef laughed unpleasantly and came nearer. "I could pick you two out in a million."

Stan and Ollie decided that the best thing they could do was go, and they flew down the stairs. The chef went after them, bellowing all kinds of threats.

"I'll skin you alive!" They were dodging about behind the desk when the phone rang and Stan took off the receiver.

"It's for you. Important!" He held out the receiver.

The chef snatched it, and, of course, the call wasn't for him at all.

By now the two pals were desperate, and Stan picked up a large vase. It was a wild throw, but the chef ran right into it, and it smashed to pieces on his head. He crashed to the floor, and when he staggered to his feet it was in time to see his two enemies vanish into the kitchen.

"Now I've got them," thought the chef.

The chef was not in a very good temper. He had witnessed a meeting between the new chambermaid and Victor Albert. They had embraced, and the chef in jealous anger had rushed off to report the matter to Luigi. That worthy was getting rather tired of the chef—the broken plates had been the latter's idea. Luigi had gone off to interview Mr. Victor Albert and had grovelled to the ground when he found out that Anna, the chambermaid, was the great opera star and wife of the composer. He vowed that the chef should find some other hotel to ruin with his ideas.

Meanwhile the chef combined with the two friends was doing some wrecking down in the kitchen. All the staff were out at the Alpenfest, and they had the place to themselves. They dodged round tables and rushed from one room to another. There were a series of kitchens and pantries, and one could leave the main kitchen, charge through two pantries, into a smaller kitchen, into a dish-washing scullery.

"Give Me Your Measure AND I'LL PROVE IN THE FIRST 7 DAYS YOU CAN HAVE A BODY LIKE MINE!"

by Charles Atlas
 Holder of the title: "The World's Most Perfectly Developed Man."

I'LL give you PROOF in 7 days that I can make you a NEW MAN. Right in the first week you will see and feel the improvement. Then as my weekly lessons arrive in your home I continue to rebuild, renew and "overhaul" your body. Soon you are the proud owner of a powerful build like mine. People will notice the radiant glow of health in your face, the sparkle in your clear eyes, and your broad shoulders. You will be the fellow who will walk off with the prettiest girl and the best job while others wonder how you did it!

NO APPARATUS
 I haven't any need for apparatus that may strain your heart and other vital organs. I don't dose or doctor you. DYNAMIC TENSION is all I need. Are you underweight? I'll add pounds where needed! Are you fat in spots? I'll pare you down to fighting trim! And I'll also give you the rugged health that banishes constipation, pimples, bad breath and similar conditions that rob you of the good things of life.

48-Page Book FREE
 Just write your name and address on the coupon below, post it to me, at once, and I'll send you absolutely free of charge a copy of my big new book, "Everlasting Health & Strength" and information how you can try my Dynamic Tension course for 7 days. Address me personally: CHARLES ATLAS (Dept. 61/J), 2, Dean Street, London, W.1.

CHARLES ATLAS (Dept. 61/J), 2, Dean Street, London, W.1.
 I want the proof that your system of Dynamic Tension will make me a New Man. Send me your book, "Everlasting Health & Strength" FREE and details of your amazing 7-DAY TRIAL OFFER.

Name.....
 (please print or write plainly)

Address.....

September 24th, 1935.

two more pantries and back into the main kitchen. It was like running round a tree, except that the chef might have won this marathon by locking a few doors and thus destroying the chances of Stan and Ollie of escaping, but he was so blinded with rage and jealousy that it never entered his head. And strange to relate it was Stan who first showed any glimmering of intelligence.

Ollie had become exhausted and was panting after Stan, with the chef not far behind and armed with a carving knife. Ollie made a spurt, and, knowing he must have a breather, had flung one of the pantry doors shut in the chef's face and leaned his bulk against it. The chef huddled himself futilely at the door. Stan, sprinting, completed the circle and gave a gasp when he came to the pantry. Luckily, the chef was making so much noise banging and charging the door and using bad language that he did not hear Stan. Stan darted out of the pantry and then had the brainwave. Why not lock the chef in and make him a prisoner?

This Stan did, and then rushed off to tell Ollie. The two conspirators then bolted the other side, and Ollie beamed as if the whole victory was due entirely to his own cleverness. There were holes in the pantry doors for ventilation, and the arms of the chef came through fumbling for the lock.

They seized his arms, and with dishcloths bound the chef's wrists together. "Let me go! Free my hands!" screamed the chef. "If you don't I will cut you up into small pieces!"

"We don't trust you, my friend!" Ollie shouted back, as he made the dishcloths more secure with some string. "A man who could be so low as to make us break plates in order to keep us prisoners in this hotel is capable of anything."

"If we'd got some pay it wouldn't have been so bad," added Stan. "Why, we didn't even get any tips."

"You're right, Stan!" Ollie stood back and stared at the squirming hands of the chef. "I think that should hold him for a while. I feel quite exhausted."

"But we're not finished yet, Ollie!" gasped Stan. "You've got to rescue Anna."

"Let's go and fud her." Ollie hurried towards the kitchen door. "Come on!"

They went back up the stairs, and still the notice about not to disturb was on the door.

"Why don't you try the handle?" Stan suggested.

Ollie tried and the door was open. They entered, and did they gasp. Anna with her arms round Victor Albert's neck.

"What's the meaning of this intrusion?" cried the composer, who was a nice fellow, but so easily got bad-tempered. "Can't my wife and I have a little privacy?"

Edward, who had been detailed to see that his master was not disturbed, rushed in from the landing to throw out the two intruders, but Anna motioned to him to keep in the background.

Anna explained in her nicest manner why she had pretended she was a poor chorus-girl, and had deceived them. Everything was all right now between her husband and herself. She was to take the star part in Victor Albert's new operetta.

Ollie looked caustically at his friend. "I thought you said I had her in the hollow of my hand," he hissed.

"Well, you did have, but you couldn't have played your cards right." Stan

*Why!
if it isn't our old pal*

Joe E. Brown—and this somewhat original portrait of your cavernous-mouthed favourite comes from the latest number of BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL. This grand book is printed throughout in PHOTOGRAVURE, with splendid pictures of the stars, long complete film stories and pictorial articles. Be sure you get a copy.

BOY'S CINEMA ANNUAL

Of all Newsagents and Booksellers 4/-

scratched his head. "Perhaps it's for the best."

"Get out!" Ollie looked fierce. All this while Anna had been whispering to her husband. Already she had told him about the two kindly, foolish fellows who had helped her and how they were like prisoners at the hotel because of an unpaid bill. Now she whispered was his chance to help them.

"Boys, one moment," Victor Albert cried, with a somewhat theatrical gesture. "My wife tells me that you have rendered her a service. Also, I have heard of your temporary embarrassment and that you wish to end your days in good old America." He tossed over a packet of notes. "That money is sufficient to get you both out of Switzerland, and I suggest that you go quickly because I am a very jealous man."

"Stupid!" cried Anna, kissing her husband on the forehead. She shook hands with the two amazed-at-their-own-luck friends. They must write when they got back to the States, and if they ever ventured away from their native land there was always two seats for any show in which she might be starring.

They collected their fur coats and they took one last look into the kitchen. The chef had half-kicked down the door, and when they bade him farewell his snarls were almost inhuman. So they left the Alpen Hotel and doffed their bowlers in farewell.

"That chef really annoyed me." Ollie linked arms with Stan. "He was almost as unpleasant as that gorilla."

"Gorilla! Gorilla!" Stan beamed. "Oh, I remember the gorilla. What happened to it?"

"When the bridge broke it fell a thousand feet into the valley below."

"I shouldn't have liked that. Poor fellow! Do you think he was hurt?"

"Do I think!" Ollie turned on his friend in disgust. "If you fell a thousand feet would you be hurt? You would not only be hurt but you wouldn't know you had been hurt, because you would be dead. That gorilla is dead, and, without wishing to seem heartless, I can't say I am overburdened with regret. That beast nearly deprived me—" He broke off to stare at Stan. "What is it? What are you nudging me for?"

"I see a monkey." "So you remarked once before," reproved Ollie. "And I wondered after the brandy it wasn't pink elephants."

"But I did see a monkey, didn't I, Ollie?" miserably questioned Stan. "And as I haven't had any brandy I suppose that means I can't be seeing a monkey. This one's on crutches."

"Crutches!" exclaimed the startled Oliver. "Where?"

"Hobbling along after us," said Stan. Oliver stared intently and gave a gasp. The bandaged gorilla, who was limping after them at a surprising speed was none other than their old friend, and when they quickened their pace the gorilla let out growls that made their hair stand on end. They ran, and for a while the gorilla kept close to their heels, but he was not in the best of training for a race. With a snarl of baffled rage he halted, whirled his crutch round his head and hurled it with all his might.

Bong! It was a bullseye. Stan and Ollie sat down suddenly, and then slid down the mountain in a miniature avalanche.

(By permission of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Ltd., starring the world-famous comedians, Stan Laurel and Oliver Hardy.)

"SQUADRON OF HONOUR"

(Continued from page 12)

"Okay, Kimball, start talking!" Sid spoke, but it was in Kimball's voice.

"I was told I'd be accorded a measure of clemency," he said.

"That's right," confirmed Finley, "if you give us the names of all others implicated. Who killed Tanner?"

"Craig," Sid replied; and Lawlor, in his chair under the powerful light, caught at his breath.

"How was he dressed at the time?"

"He wore a legionnaire's uniform," said Sid, and Kimball himself might have been speaking. "He rented it from a theatrical costumier. The name of the costumier was Gobel."

"Go on," rapped Finley. "What happened to Gobel?"

"Lawlor killed him, to make sure he couldn't talk."

Inside the room, Lawlor bounded up from his chair in a fury.

"The yellow rat!" he yelled, struggling with the legionnaires who caught hold of him. "That won't get you anything; you'll burn anyway!" His voice rose to a screech. "He planned both killings! He made Craig shoot Tanner to frame the commander, then he forced me to plug Gobel and dump him!"

Dan knocked him back into the chair. "All right," he said grimly; "that's all we wanted to know."

He went out to Finley.

"Well, you heard it."

"Let Riley have him," said Finley. "We'll pick up Kimball right away."

Flight!

KIMBALL was in his bed-room at the hotel, fastening the straps of a bag, when Craig walked into it carrying a suitcase.

"Have my car brought to the rear entrance immediately," Kimball directed. "Better take Miss Rogers along with us."

"What for?" asked Craig disapprovingly.

"She may prove useful if things get too hot."

Craig went to a house telephone attached to the wall; Kimball went out through the sitting-room to Eve's bedroom and knocked on the door.

"Get your coat," he said curtly, as she opened the door and appeared fully dressed. "You're coming with us."

"Where?" she faltered.

"Never mind where!"

"But what for, at this time of night?"

"Don't ask me questions! Start moving!"

She went to a wardrobe and got her coat, and he waited in the doorway while she put it on; but her hat was still in her hand when he grabbed hold of her arm and whisked her out across the sitting-room into the corridor.

Craig was already at an automatic elevator, and had pushed the button that actuated the cage. Eve put on her hat while the cage was ascending, and then she was bundled inside, and the three descended into the basement of the hotel.

"Go on, go on!" commanded Kimball roughly, as they stepped forth into a bare corridor with a concreted floor, and Craig led the way to stone steps that led up to the rear entrance of the building.

A man from the hotel garage was standing beside a black seven-seater saloon parked in a narrow roadway there.

"All right," said Kimball, and he dismissed the man with a ten-dollar note and opened the front door of the car. "I'll drive. You sit in front with me, my dear. Craig, you get in the back."

The luggage was stowed in the back of the car, and Craig got in with it. Kimball helped Eve up into the front seat and took the wheel, and the car shot off along the narrow roadway, turned a corner into an off-shoot of Franklin Avenue, swung right into Inman Street, and became headed north.

The city had been left behind, and it was speeding along a deserted federal highway, by the time several taxicabs drew up outside the front of the hotel, accompanied by a squad car containing the Chief of Police and Captain Riley. Dan and Todd and Denton alighted from one of the taxicabs; legionnaires sprang down from the others.

"Cover all exits!" directed Dan, and he and Finley and Riley entered the hotel and ascended to the deserted suite on the fifth floor.

The open door of the sitting-room suggested flight, but every part of the suite was searched, Dan hoping against hope to find Eve—possibly bound hand and foot and shut in a cupboard. Riley returned from Craig's room to Finley and Dan in the sitting-room.

"What did you find?" Dan asked anxiously.

"Nothing," was the reply.

"The girl's clothes are in her room," said Finley, "but they seem to have taken the girl with them."

Dan leaned over the desk to dial a number on the telephone there.

"Legion Headquarters?" he said. "Blaine talking. General order for mobilisation. Contact sheriff's office and have him block all roads leading out of the city. Look for car containing Kimball, Craig, and Miss Rogers. I'll be right over."

He left the telephone in the hands of the Chief of Police to dash off downstairs and give instructions to Denton and Todd, then drove back to the Post

SAVE YOUR PENNIES
—and make this dream come true!

Don't just dream about a "glorious Fifth"—make it come true by joining BROCK'S FIREWORK CLUB—now! Look out for the nearest shop displaying Brock's CLUB notice. Give the shopman a penny or whatever you can spare to start your savings. He'll enter it on your card and add what you can give him each week. You'll be surprised how it mounts up. When the "Great Night" arrives you'll be able to give your chums a real "Crystal Palace" firework display. Don't forget to "tap" Dad for a bob or two to help swell your savings.

Join
BROCK'S
CRYSTAL PALACE
FIREWORK CLUB Now!

Get your Club Card today-

QUICK ON THE DRAW BOYS?
VERY POWERFUL AIR PISTOL.

Accurate shot from any angle. Supply of Slugs, Darts and Targets free. Get 5/6 Dad to send to-day for yours. Great favourite with Colonial lads. Extra slugs 1/6 per 1,000 Overseas postage 1/6.
BOYS' OWN GUN STORES,
154, Whippendell Road, Watford, Herts.

BE A BILLIARD CHAMPION!

Learn to play like a real "crack" on your OWN table. Send for catalogue of Riley "Home" Billiard Tables and details of 32 Billiard Tables being GIVEN AWAY.

E. J. RILEY, LTD., Ensign Works, ACCRINGTON, and Dept. 36, 147 Aldersgate Street, London, E.C.1.
September 24th, 1938.

to superintend the rounding up of all the members of the Legion.

Todd telephoned to the manager in charge of his own extensive garage and told him to provide twenty-five more taxi-cabs at once. Denton telephoned orders for all the men under his command to get out on to every road leading from the city.

Within a very few minutes a dispatcher in the radio room at Police Headquarters was sending out a message:

"Calling all cars! Calling all cars! Stop and hold a black seven-passenger saloon, District of Columbia licence G-two-two-three. Two men wanted on murder charge. They may be armed."

Over and over again the message was repeated, and it was picked up by patrol cars on every highway. Dan, having done all that could be done at the Post, joined Finley in the radio transmitter-room at Police Headquarters and stood beside the switch-board there. A quarter of an hour dragged by, with only the monotonous drone of the dispatcher to break the silence, and then the operator looked round to say:

"A patrolman on Bridge Road reports a car answering description passed five minutes ago, heading north."

"Call every town north of here, and order the roads blocked," urged Dan, and Finley nodded approval and barked orders at other operators.

Five minutes afterward word came through that a black saloon, heading north, had been seen on highway 63. A fresh message was sent out by radio:

"Calling all cars. Car heading north on highway sixty-eight—sixty-eight. Get up there!"

It was time for action. Dan telephoned to Colonel Forsythe at the Post, and cars and taxi-cabs filled with legionnaires set off for the highway. Legionnaires already on other roads were diverted to that one as soon as they reported their whereabouts. Outside Police Headquarters Dan scrambled into a squad car beside Riley, who took the wheel, and Finley and two other officers occupied the back seat.

Twenty miles out of the city, on a highway that led to the town of Westville, Dan shouted urgently:

"Take that dirt road—it's a short cut to sixty-eight."

The squad car was travelling at nearly seventy miles an hour, but Captain Riley achieved the sharp bend into the minor road with nothing worse than a sideways skid in the dust of it, and the car raced onwards.

Ninety miles north of Claremont a barricade of packing-cases and barrels had been built in haste across highway 63, and police-officers with cars and motor-cycles were waiting at a safe distance behind it.

The barricade had been completed only a few minutes when the black saloon approached it at a speed of sixty miles an hour, and the headlights shone upon the boxes and the barrels.

Craig cried out in alarm; Eve caught at her breath and slid to the floor; but Kimball did not even remove his foot from the accelerator. Straight at the barricade he charged, and broken woodwork flew in all directions as the saloon crashed through it.

Startled officers fired at the tyres as it whizzed past them, but their aim was none too good, and the saloon held on its way.

"Well, we made that one all right," gulped Craig, mopping his face with a handkerchief.

September 24th, 1933.

"Calling all cars! Calling all cars!" droned the voice of the dispatcher from loud-speakers in patrol cars behind and ahead. "Car is still on highway sixty-eight. Passed first barricade. Heading for the second one."

The second barricade, five miles north of the broken one, was a more formidable affair of poles on trestles as well as packing-cases. A police sergeant who had been superintending its construction heard the wireless message as he leaned against the side of his car, and he shouted a warning:

"He's liable to be along here any minute now!"

He looked over the barricade, and presently he saw the glare of headlights some distance away in the darkness of the road.

"Here he comes now!" he bellowed. "Come on, everybody, get out of here!"

Men heaved themselves over fences, scrambled through hedges. Cars shot off with officers on their running-boards to pull up a hundred yards or more from the obstruction.

The black saloon swept onwards towards that obstruction, Kimball crouched over its steering-wheel, the speedometer registering seventy miles an hour. Eve slid to the floor again and covered her eyes with her hands. Craig yelled frantically from the back seat:

"The road's blocked! We're trapped! Stop, chief, it's suicide!"

But Kimball did not even slacken speed. Just as he had charged at the first barricade so he charged at this second and more formidable one. There followed a crashing and a rending; boxes and poles went up into the air; but, as by a miracle, the saloon cut its way through with an empty orange-box perched grotesquely upon its bonnet.

A barrel rolled the full length of the car's roof and collapsed upon the concrete as it fell; shots rang out from both sides of the highway, but without effect. But though the saloon sped onwards it had not escaped damage. Its fender had been broken, and its front wings crumpled so that one of them scraped against a tyre. One of the headlights had been smashed; the engine laboured, and water was streaming down from the broken radiator.

The needle of the speedometer fell away from seventy to sixty, from sixty to thirty-five. Police cars from behind the first barricade were following one another through the gap in the second barricade, and police cars from behind the second barricade were in pursuit.

Far away along the highway, to the south, the squad car driven by Riley was tearing along at nearly eighty miles an hour, and in the rear of the squad car raced a whole procession of taxicabs and cars of every description, all of them filled with legionnaires.

Twenty miles north of the second barricade, where the broad highway dipped towards a wood on the left and a deep ravine on the right, Craig looked back through the rear window of the saloon because a light was shining through it.

"We're being followed!" he cried. "Step on it!"

The saloon gathered speed on the downward slope, but Kimball was afraid that the tyre scraped by the wing might blow out at any moment, and he gripped the steering-wheel with all his might. A bend was passed, the open woodland was reached, and momentarily the lights of the pursuing cars were lost.

Eve, down on her knees on the floor, had noticed that the ignition key was in its slot. She put a hand on the dashboard as though about to rise, and she switched off the ignition.

"What are you doing there?" Kimball rasped at her; but the key was withdrawn, and she hurled it through the broken window beside her.

The saloon slowed to a standstill, and Kimball struck her violently in the face, knocking her backwards against the seat and the door, then turned to Craig.

"Come on!" he shouted. "Into the woods! It's our only chance!"

The two scrambled out from the car and dived in amongst the trees, knee-deep in bracken.

"They wouldn't find us under this stuff," panted Craig, after they had covered a quarter of a mile.

"They would!" snapped Kimball. "There'll be thousands of them here directly! We can't get too far from the road!"

They stumbled on, and the bracken was left behind; but in the denser part of the wood brambles impeded their progress, and many times they stumbled over rabbit-holes and fell over sprawling roots.

Eve had been knocked half-unconscious by Kimball's brutal blow, and it was only in a dazed sort of fashion that she heard the grinding of many brakes and the shouts of many voices. She tried to rise, but sank back upon the seat; and she was huddled there when Dan opened the door beside her and the light of an electric torch was in her face.

"Eve!" he exclaimed, and put away the torch to hold her hands. "Are you all right, Eve?"

His voice, using her Christian name, acted like a restorative.

"Yes," she murmured faintly, "I'm all right."

Finley looked in at the other door.

"Which way did they go?" he demanded.

"They—they went into the woods," Eve remembered with an effort.

The Chief of Police rushed off to give orders to the assembled officers. Dan instructed two legionnaires to stay with Eve and look after her, then consulted with Haynes, Todd, Denton, and Colonel Forsythe. More than a hundred vehicles of one sort or another had become parked at the side of the highway, and more than a thousand legionnaires were waiting for the word of command.

They were lined up in columns of fours, and Dan addressed them.

(Continued on page 23)

THIS WEEK'S CASTS "SQUADRON OF HONOUR"

Dan Blaine Don Terry
Eve Rogers Mary Russell
Robert Metcalf Thurston Hall
Lou Tanner Arthur Loft
Steve Lawlor Marc Lawrence
John Blair Kimball Robert Warwick
Norman Craig Dick Curtis
Commander Todd George McKay
Commander Denton

Eddie Featherstone
Colonel Forsythe Ed Lo Saint
Chief of Police Finley Ivan Miller
Captain Riley Harry Strang
Sid Hinkle Jimmy Hollywood

"SWISS MISS"

Stan Laurel Himself
Oliver Hardy Himself
Anna Albert Della Lind
Victor Albert Walter Woolf King
Edward Eric Blore
Chef Adia Kuznetzoff
Luigi Ludovico Tomarchio
Cheese Factory Proprietor

Charles Judels

SECOND PRIZE-GIVING THIS WEEK! CLAIM NOW!

SHOOT!

HUNDREDS OF FREE FOOTBALLS

for Scoring "Goals" with FOOTER-STAMPS

THIS WEEK'S "FOOTER-STAMPS"

STOP! This is the end of the September "Footer-Stamps" Competition and up to 300 more of the Free Footballs are now going to be given away to the readers who have scored the highest number of "goals" with "Footer-Stamps" so far.

First of all, there are ten more stamps here depicting six different actions on the football field. Cut them out and try to score another "goal" with them, or use the stamps to finish off any partly completed "goals" you may have.

TO SCORE A "GOAL," remember you only have to collect a complete set of the six stamps (numbered 1 to 6), made up of the following movements: KICK-OFF—DRIBBLE—TACKLE—HEADER—SHOT—GOAL. (Note that the "goal" stamp by itself does not count as a "goal.")

If you want to score some other quick "goals" to swell your total, remember that "Footer-Stamps" are also appearing in "Sports Budget" and "Triumph" each week.

Now when you have scored as many complete "goals" as possible with the stamps you have collected, write your total ("goals," NOT separate stamps) in the space provided on the coupon below.

Add your name and address to the coupon also, then cut it out whole and attach your sets of goal-scoring stamps only to it. Post in a properly stamped envelope to:

"BOY'S CINEMA," Footer-Stamps" (September),
1, Tallis House, London, E.C.4. (Comp.)

so as to reach there not later than FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 30th, 1933.

OVERSEAS READERS—you are in this scheme also and special prizes are to be awarded for the best scores from pals outside the British Isles. In more case, send in as directed above, but note that the closing date is extended to MONDAY, JANUARY 2nd, 1934.

Now when you have sent in your September "goals," keep any old stamps you have in readiness for the October competition, which starts next week. More "Footer-Stamps" will be given, and still more of our Prize Footballs will be offered.

RULES—Up to 300 Footballs will be awarded in the September contest to the readers declaring and sending in the largest number of "goals" scored with "Footer-Stamps." The Editor may extend or amend the prize list in case of too many ties.

Each "goal" must consist of a set of "Footer-Stamps" Nos. 1 to 6, inclusive—all claims for prizes to be made on the proper coupon given this week. No allowance made for any coupon or stamps mutilated or lost or delayed in the post or otherwise. No correspondence! No one connected with this paper may enter, and the Editor's decision will be final and legally binding throughout.

(N.B.—"Footer-Stamps" may also be collected from the following papers: GEM, MAGNET, MODERN BOY, THRILLER, DETECTIVE WEEKLY, TRIUMPH, WILD WEST WEEKLY, SPORTS BUDGET and CHAMPION.)

..... "BOY'S CINEMA"

"Footer-Stamps" (September)

Write in bold figures the number of "goals" you have scored with "Footer-Stamps" and attach your sets of "goal-scoring" stamps to this coupon.

I agree to accept the Editor's decision as final and binding.

Name.....

Address.....

N.B.—No responsibility taken for incorrect totals.

"SQUADRON OF HONOUR"

(Continued from page 26)

"Attention!" he shouted. "When I give the word, advance in skirmishes around this clump of woods. When you have completed a circle round it, close in towards the centre and keep a sharp look out. Any other men of the Legion you meet will join you. Detail fours, left march!"

The whole wood was encompassed, and when the circuit was complete the closing-in began. It was a slow process, and dawn was breaking long before the heart of the wood was reached.

Kimball was the first of the two fugitives to hear the sound of voices in the distance, and he caught at Craig's arm.

"Wait!" he said breathlessly, and raised a hand. "Listen, there's someone on our trail!"

Craig listened, and he heard a rustling in the undergrowth that suggested the movement not of one man but of an army.

"Better climb a tree," he suggested in a panic.

"And he caught like a couple of 'possums?" scoffed Kimball. "No, come on!"

They plunged further into the depths of the wood, never dreaming that their pursuers were all round them. Daylight succeeded dawn and strengthened, the first rays of the rising sun made glorious a sky flecked with white clouds. The legionnaires and the police had become united and were advancing together; but some of the legionnaires near Dan became impatient and wanted to dive across a sudden clearing.

"No!" Dan roared at them. "Keep closing in towards dead centre, otherwise we might give them an opening!"

The advance continued; the circle of men became smaller and smaller, till it was six deep, seven deep, eight deep.

The very heart of the wood was reached, and Captain Riley was beside Dan behind the forked trunk of a tree when he flung out a hand and cried:

"There they are!"

Kimball and Craig had stopped short on a grassy knoll because their way was barred on every side. Breathing heavily they stood side by side with raised hands, weary and beaten, and the legionnaires and the police closed right in on them. Dan, striding forward, gripped them both by a shoulder. "Frisk 'em, boys!" he directed; and then, as Craig turned his head to scowl at him, he said sternly: "This is the beginning of your last mile!"

The prisoners were hustled rather roughly by the legionnaires back to the cars, where they formed into a revengeful procession to escort the crooks back to the scene of their crimes.

Eve sat happily beside Dan in a box at the Legion Stadium on the last day of the convention. Kimball, Craig, and Lawlor were in gaol awaiting their trial; the Legion had passed a resolution in support of the Arms Control Bill and forwarded it to Washington; and Robert Metcalf, a free man and an honoured one, was standing in the middle of the ring—now draped with flags—in his uniform as State Commander.

Every seat in the vast building was occupied. The Mayor of Claremont had said a few appropriate words, and now Metcalf had risen to address the assembly.

"And so, fellow legionnaires," he said in his deep and pleasant voice, "we are bringing this convention to a close. Your personal devotion to me has been most gratifying, but far more gratifying to me has been your loyalty to the principles for which the American Legion stands.

"From the inception of this organisation our policy has been to render service to the community in all emergencies, but actually our real work begins where emergencies end. The American Legion was born as a consequence of the Great Emergency of nineteen-eighteen. Since then we have devoted ourselves to the building of good citizenship and to the safeguarding of our national institution. Let us continue, by active example, to reaffirm our faith in peace and in the aims of democracy."

While the legionnaires were shouting themselves hoarse with approval, Dan took Eve into his arms and kissed her.

(By permission of Columbia Pictures Corporation, Ltd., starring Don Terry, with Mary Russell, Marc Lawrence, and Thurston Hall.)

Star Learns Language of the Studios

Hollywood has a language all its own. This is what Francisca Gaal, the Hungarian actress, is learning between scenes of Paramount's "Paris Honey-moon"—her second American picture—from Bing Crosby, Shirley Ross, and others of the east and crew of the new Continental romance.

A "tea-cart," for instance, is not a four o'clock fancy. That is Hollywood jargon for the sound mixer's apparatus resembling a tea wagon.

A "federal job" is a command from the front office or a complicated order.

A "free ride" is a lunch "on the company," or an offer to dine out.

"Spauk the baby" is a slang demand from the electrician to his assistants. He wants a small spotlight lowered a few notches.

Here are some more expressions from Hollywood's dictionary:

"Fishpole"—a sound engineer's handloom for putting the microphone into close quarters on the set.

"Mike"—the microphone.

"Playback"—amplifying a recording just made.

"Wax"—a gramophone record.

"New deal"—the director is satisfied with the scene and is ready to start shooting another. After this order the camera equipment is moved for the next "shot."

"Gaffer"—electrician.

"Best boy"—assistant to the head electrician.

"Scoop"—arc light resembling a shovel.

"Jockey wall"—removable background.

"It's a lily"—the scene is satisfactory.

"In the can"—the scene has been satisfactorily taken and the sound recording perfect.

"Gobo"—black cardboard that goes between lights and subject to cut off part of beam.

"Broad"—a wide lamp reflector.

"Barrell"—a long, round lamp.

"Bloop"—a light marking the film for synchronisation purposes.

"Cut"—a command from the director to stop cameras.

ROYAL NAVY

Boys may now enter between the ages of 15 and 17½ years. Full particulars are contained in the illustrated booklet "The Royal Navy as a Career and How to Join It," which may be obtained on application to the Recruiting Staff Officer, R.N. and R.M. (N), 85, Whitehall, London, S.W.1, or at any Post Office.

TALL STAMPS

Your Height increased in 12 days or no cost. New discovery adds 2-5 ins. I gained 4 ins. Guaranteed safe. Full Course 5/- Details J. B. MORLEY, 17, Cheapside, London, E.C.2.

300 DIFFERENT, incl. Airmail, Beautiful Uncommon Sets, Victorials, Colonials. Price 6d. (Abroad 1/-). WHITE, ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BILLIARDS

Perfect Reproduction Full-size Tables. Leather Covered Pockets, Rubber Cushions, adjustable Feet. Complete with 2 Cues, 5 Balls, Marking Board, Rules, Level and Chalk.

Size	Weekly	Cash	Snooker Balls	Complete with Triangle
3ft. 2ins. ...	20 @ 1/-	16/-	14 ...	12/-
3ft. 8ins. ...	20 @ 1/3	19/6	14 ...	12/6
4ft. 2ins. ...	20 @ 1/6	25/-	14 ...	15/-
4ft. 8ins. ...	20 @ 1/10	29/6	14 ...	17/-
5ft. 2ins. ...	24 @ 2/-	39/6	14 ...	22/6
6ft. 4ins. ...	32 @ 2/-	52/6	14 ...	24/6

Weekly

SEND FOR FREE ART ILLUS. LIST.

GEORGE GROSE LTD LUDGATE CIRCUS

NEW BRIDGE ST LONDON, E.C.4

Australia seeks Boys (14-18 years) for farm work. Training in England. Outfits Provided. Assisted Passages. Particulars: Emigration Secretary, Salvation Army, 103, Queen Victoria Street, London, E.C.4, or 203, Hope Street, Glasgow.

All applications for Advertisement Space in this publication should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, "BOY'S CINEMA," The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Printed in England and published every Tuesday by the Proprietors, THE AMALGAMATED PRESS, LTD., The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Advertisement Offices: The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad: 11/- per annum · 5/6 for six months. Sole Agents for Australia and New Zealand: Messrs. Gordon & Gotch, Ltd.; and for South Africa: Central News Agency, Ltd. Registered for transmission to Canada at Magazine Rates. September 24th, 1938. S.G.

Boy's CINEMA

2^D
EVERY TUESDAY
No 1002
FEB. 25th. 1939

an ALL BRITISH Comedy Thriller

GEORGE
FORMBY IN "IT'S IN

THE AIR"

THESE MAGNIFICENT PHOTO CARDS

FREE
Inside

If you asked George to turn to the right he turned to the left—everything he tried to do he made a muddle of it. His great ambition was to get into the Air Force—and when he did get in he found himself up to his neck in trouble. A splendid British comedy thriller, starring George Formby

The Bungler

AT Frogley, on the outskirts of London, they held a mock air raid. R.A.F. machines would come over and drop flour bombs, and the inhabitants had to imagine that some of these bombs contained gas. Territorial units were combining with members of the local A.R.P., and those of the latter who excelled themselves were to be chosen as wardens.

Maroons went off to signal the approach of enemy aircraft, and everybody rushed for trenches, cellars and bomb-proof shelters, and donned their gas-masks. Lorries with anti-aircraft guns and searchlights got busy. The town hall had been made into a casualty clearing station, with nurses and orderlies in attendance, not forgetting the mayor, who was wearing his chain of office, and ready to hand out diplomas to those people who did their jobs thoroughly.

Officers and orderlies kept on dashing in and reporting certain streets fully darkened and all people in refuges wearing gas-masks.

"Now there's only the report on Frogley Row and we're complete," stated an officer. "If I may say so, Mr. Mayor, this is by far the most efficient bunch of candidates examined in any district."

The prospective wardens were lined up and wearing gas-masks when there was a crash outside. Someone had knocked down a fire bucket, then swing-doors opened to admit a young man who stood there with a sheepish grin on his face. He was a clean-shaven, pleasant fellow, but his countenance was not that of a high intellectual—he was holding a large suitcase, and February 25th, 1939.

was followed by a large sheep dog. The dog was wearing a gas-mask.

The mayor gaped, and so did every one.

"Frogley Row okeoke!" reported the newcomer.

"Where the devil's your gas-mask?" the officer demanded.

"There it is," grinned the fellow, pointing to the dog.

The officer gave him one look and then shouted to an orderly to sound the "All clear," and for a message to be passed to aircraft that the exercise was complete. After which he asked the candidates to parade before the mayor, who would hand them their certificates, after which they would be supplied with uniforms.

The fellow with the sheepish grin shuffled forward, but stopped by the officer.

"I shan't need you."

"What?"

"Not the right type."

"You mean I don't get a uniform?"

"Certainly not."

"But I've brought my suitcase to take it home."

"I'm sorry, but you've failed," the officer informed him.

George Brown realised he had been rejected, and disconsolately he wandered through the swing-doors. An electric light illuminated a poster advising all young men to join the Air Force. He shook his head sadly.

"Come on, Sernifly."

Followed by his dog, George wandered down a corridor, and his head was bowed.

"Hallo, Bluebottle! Hallo, Bluebottle—Microbe calling Bluebottle."

That startled George. What an extraordinary conversation! He realised the voice was coming from a room whose door was slightly ajar, and being curious, he peeped inside. Never had George seen so many gadgets, bulbs and wires. A soldier was seated before a mass of gadgets and speaking into a funny little thing.

"Air raid precaution exercises completed," stated the soldier. "Over to you."

Whereupon a voice from the ceiling boomed out:

"Your message received okay. Will remain on transmission to you while aircraft return to base."

George's mouth gaped open as he realised the voice came from a loud-speaker.

Then the soldier turned and saw him.

"Hallo, who are you?" he asked.

"George Brown." George shuffled forward. "Grand set you've got. Suppose you can get most stations with that?"

"If I wanted to," answered the operator. "But at the moment I'm only interested in keeping in touch with aircraft." He pointed across the room. "Mind breaking the left of those two big switches for me?"

"I don't want to break anything."

"I mean pull the lever."

"Me?" questioned George, and when the operator nodded, moved over to a big switchboard and eyed the two levers nervously.

"The left switch."

George's hand went out, and the operator pushed back his chair. He rushed forward and jerked George to one side.

"If you had touched that one it would have fused the whole outfit." He pulled the lever.

"Sorry, it's my right and left," answered George with a fatuous grin. "Always getting them muddled—daft, isn't it?"

"Just going in to report." The operator moved over to the door. "Do you mind stopping here a few minutes?"

"Me? No, of course not."

"If any messages come through, let me know at once. And don't touch any of the switches."

George sat down on the vacated chair, with his large suitcase beside him. Scrufty curled up on the floor. George proceeded to examine the various dials with great interest, and he had an awful desire to twiddle some of these knobs. Suddenly the loud-speaker became alive.

"Hallo, Microbe. We're at 8,000 feet. It's perishing cold, and I'm bored stiff. What about putting on a hot gramophone record to cheer me up?"

George half got up to go and look for the operator, when he saw a switch marked transmit. He pushed it over and then waited—he had expected the whole place to blow up. Then he looked round and saw the funny little thing into which the operator had been speaking.

"Hallo, Bluebottle. Microbe at the mike."

"Hurry up with that music, Microbe."

"Microbe will now give you some hot music," George promised, and opening the large suitcase, brought out a ukelele.

George had a pleasant voice, and he certainly knew how to use a ukelele. His fingers seemed to writhe over those strings, and it was a rollicking ditty that he sang.

"Did you enjoy that, Bluebottle?" he asked anxiously, when he had concluded the fourth verse.

"That's a swell record," answered Bluebottle, whose real identity was Corporal Craig. "I must get it. What's its number?"

George decided he had better switch off quickly. He walked over to the panel with its two levers. Had the operator said the left or the right lever, and if the left, which was the left? Of course, he had to pull down the right.

Woof! The room went up in smoke, and George went flying through the air. Scrufty crouched low and managed to get his nose back in the gas-mask before looking for his master. George, much singed, was hanging precariously from a gas bracket. He had lost the seat of his pants and his face was like a nigger's.

The Dispatch

GEORGE BROWN was in the garden of the small cottage that he shared with his sister Anne. The cottage was their own, and they found that after pooling their small allowance they could manage quite comfortably.

Occasionally George did some work, driving lorries, temporary chauffeur, gardening—a sort of odd-job man. He was a little worried about Anne because she was getting married soon, and that meant he would be on his own. "You're a nice sort of brother, I must say."

George looked round guiltily at his sister, whose pretty homely features were marred by a frown of disapproval. Following the direction of her gaze, he looked at the rose tree he had pulled up. As usual, it was the wrong one.

A motor-bike came clattering along the quiet road, and as Anne was engaged to a young fellow in the Air Force, and he came to see them more often than not on a motor-bike, it was natural that she should run to the gate.

"Why, it's Bob!" came her glad, surprised cry.

George grinned from ear to ear. Bob Bullock was a real smart young fellow, and he thought his sister a lucky girl. He wished he could be sharp and alert like this promising young Air Force boy. He nodded his approval as Anne and Bob embraced—he wished he had a girl.

"What are you doing here, Bob?"

"Just been delivering some letters to Sir Philip Bargrave," Bob explained, and held out a hand as the brother shuffled forward. "Hallo, George."

"Turned out nice again," greeted George, and looked over the low wicket garden gate. "That's a fine bike you've got."

"And moves. I'd back myself against any other dispatch rider in the Air Force," Bob laughed. "Do you mind putting it in the shed?"

George was delighted at such trust.

"Ee, I will an' all."

"Listen, Anne, can I change my clothes here and leave them for a day or two?" Bob asked, as he walked up the path with his arm round his girl.

"Of course, but why?"

"I've got three days' leave before joining Glenbridge Aerodrome for a week's training, and I'll be able to pop over and see you every evening."

He looked at his wrist-watch. "But I must step on it. I'm catching the bus from the end of your road in half an hour, and that just enables me to

"Where the devil's your gas-mask?" the officer demanded. "There it is!" grinned George, pointing to the dog.

ated a jolly good through train from Frogley Junction to Cornwall."

"Oh!" Anne was disappointed. "Anne, I must. I haven't seen the old people for nearly a year, and it's the last chance before we get married."

George got the motor-bike away in the shed after getting the handlebars all mixed up with his braces, and then he came inside to learn from Anne what all the bustle was about. The sister packed him upstairs to see if he could help Bob. That young man handed over his service clothes to George whilst he got into a comfortable lounge suit.

"Smart, aren't they?" George looked at the tunic. "I wish I had a smart uniform like that."

"Easy. Join up!"

"I've tried, but they won't have me."

"Chest?"

"Hands." George showed them. "I always get muddled with my right and left."

Anne called out that Bob had better hurry, so the dispatch rider ran his hands over his clothes, took a few odd things out of his pockets and raced downstairs. George went with him to the end of the road, and when he got back his sister ordered him to put Bob's clothes away so that they wouldn't get creased. It was then that George found the package in the inside pocket of the tunic. The letters "O.H.M.S." were startling enough, but the address was more so: "Sir Philip Bargrave, Bargrave Manor," and at the bottom "By dispatch rider."

George rushed down to his sister and showed her the dispatch. Bob had had a lot of these things to deliver, and this was one he must have overlooked. He feared Bob would get into trouble.

"We'd better post it," suggested Anne.

But George argued that that would be fatal, as "By dispatch rider" was written on the envelope. Anne said she would go over in the next bus, and George would not agree.

"You'd have to say Bob forgot it, and you can't forget important letters like that in the Air Force," stated George. "Bob'd get shot at dawn. I know. Leave this to me."

Some short while later the motor-bike was once more outside the cottage. Then George appeared, all resplendent in Bob's uniform, with Scruffy barking and leaping around—anticipating a ride.

"George, I don't like it," said Anne. "I'm sure there's a better way."

George climbed on to the motor-bike.

"Ee, I feel grand in these." He held himself very erect.

"But it's a serious crime to wear a uniform you're not entitled to."

"Not so serious as Bob forgetting the letter. You wouldn't like him in trouble, would you?" George waved his dog away. "No, Scruffy, dispatch riders don't have mascots. Stay with Anne like a good dog."

With a roar the motor-bike woke to life, and George fairly shot down the road. He had been used to riding a very second-hand two and three-quarter horse power, single cylinder, and this was six horse power, and twin cylinder.

Scruffy was most indignant. His master never went out without taking him, and with a wriggle he broke free from Anne's restraining grip. The dog went pounding down the street after George, who was steering a somewhat erratic course. He found the sidecar hard to control, and the added horse power was thrilling, but disconcerting.

February 25th, 1939.

George's generous idea of saving his sister's sweetheart was going to cause a terrific sensation. He was heading straight for trouble, and it started because Fate decreed that at the moment he was heading in a somewhat precarious manner for the residence of Sir Philip Bargrave that an important interview was going on between the politician and Wing Commander Hill, of Glenbridge Air Station. Sir Philip knew little about flying, but as a member of the Cabinet he had been detailed to send in a report on the "Fighter," which had been undergoing secret tests at Glenbridge Air Station, which was only a few miles from his residence. He promised the C.O. that he would visit the station on the next Thursday.

"She'll outclimb any aircraft in the world," enthusiastically stated the C.O. "I'll have the new fighter flown down by ten o'clock, sir."

There was a roar outside in the drive, and the commanding officer went to the window to see if it were his car. His driver had gone off to get a gasket repaired. The C.O. saw a motor-bike come dashing up at a great speed, saw a gardener just miss being run over and the machine halt before the door. A moment later a smart parlourmaid entered the study.

"A dispatch rider has just brought this, sir."

"Thanks." Sir Philip was more interested in his glass of sherry.

"Would you mind, sir, if I asked your dispatch rider to drop me at the aerodrome?" requested the C.O., who was itching to get away.

"Of course not," Sir Philip answered. "I'll see you next Thursday, about ten."

Now, if George had not paused to apologise to the gardener and smile at the housemaid, he might have got safely away, but George was enjoying himself in this fine uniform. Made him feel a man. Then the C.O. appeared.

"You're going to drop me at Glenbridge Aerodrome."

"But I don't know the way, sir," cried George, trying to stand to attention as he had seen soldiers do on parade.

"I'll show you." Whereupon the C.O. finished the argument by getting into the sidecar. "Quick, I'm in a hurry."

"Yessir," meekly answered George. His heart was beating fast and his mind was in a whirl. He managed to start the machine, and was so upset that he let the clutch in so suddenly that the powerful machine shot forward.

The C.O.'s eyes bulged as they charged a flower-bed, but in the nick of time George swung back to the drive. At a good forty miles an hour the machine sped through the gates.

"Left."

Naturally, George, in his panic, swung the machine to the right.

"I said left!"

"Sorry, sir," gabbled George, and proceeded to turn at the same pace. The C.O. found himself right in the air, and thought the machine was going to overturn, but by some miracle George managed to turn, and the sidecar wheel bumped back on to the road. George nearly went wrong at the cross-roads, but a glorious skid, the missing of a signpost by inches, and the race went on. A race because the motor-bike was going so fast that all the C.O. could do was hang on for dear life. They cornered on one wheel.

"Don't mind me!" bellowed the C.O.

"Very good, sir!" shouted back George, and took the next corner at an even faster speed.

The journey was uneventful for at least half a mile, until George dared to take a sideways glance at the officer just to see if he were looking at him suspiciously. That gentleman was too intent on the road.

"Look out!" yelled the C.O. "Left, man—left!"

George went to the right, charged through an open gate, slithered through a muddy yard, charged through a flock of chickens, did a marvellous skid and whistled through another gate, back on to the road.

The commanding officer removed a chicken from his lap. Suddenly he held up an egg.

"Look what you've done now!"

"Not me, sir," grinned George.

"The hen!"

Five minutes later there came a warning sign denoting road repairs, and then where widening was being done a board with four words: "ROAD CLOSED — KEEP RIGHT." Of course, George went to the left, charged straight through a wooden barrier, with bits of wood going in all directions, slithered over some unmade road full of pot-holes, climbed a heap of stones, and slithered down to the real track.

"Shorter this way, sir," brightly remarked George.

At last Glenbridge Air Station was sighted, and never had the C.O. felt more relieved. He was supposed to be a man who did not know the meaning of the word "Fear," but the last twenty minutes he was going to remember for the rest of his life. George flashed through the gates before the sentry quite knew what was happening, and with all brakes screeching, the motor-bike and side-car pulled up exactly before the orderly-room.

Noticing the C.O. making a gesture, George had enough sense to get out of the saddle and open the side-car door. Two chickens fluttered out with much squawking. George touched his cap and stepped back, with the idea of getting on the machine and beating it. "One minute," snapped the C.O. "I've got some letters for headquarters. You might as well take them. It may be quicker than by post."

"But it may not be, sir," spluttered George.

"If you take 'em half as fast as you brought me, they'll be there before I've written them." The C.O. felt jocular now that his feet were on terra firma. "I'll have them ready in about half an hour."

The sergeant of the guard appeared as soon as the commanding officer had vanished.

"Put your motor-cycle outside the garage."

"But—but—"

"Hurry up. Put a jerk into it!" roared the sergeant.

"Jerk into it? Yes, sir," George let in the clutch so suddenly that one wheel missed the sergeant by inches; desperately George grabbed the handlebars, and skidded round in a circle and went roaring over some gravel to where he saw a number of cars. By some miracle it was the garage.

In the Air Force

GEORGE parked his machine, and hands in pockets sauntered round looking at things. The thrill of being at an aerodrome had banished his fear for the moment. He approached timidly a small machine, and looked at it keenly, but backed away when a mechanic bobbed up from the cockpit. He returned to the garage, and was wondering what he should do next when there came a familiar twang. Someone had a ukelele or banjo, and at once his inquisitive nature was roused, and he could not resist the temptation to go and investigate. He came to a building, and now the sound was louder. He frowned a little, because the person handling the ukelele did not seem to know much about it. He peered through an open window.

They all yelled with laughter as a mixture of partly water and whitewash squirted out over George's face.

An elderly man was seated at a table, and before him was a propped-up ukelele-teacher; now and again the man would peer intently at the book and then grasp the ukelele as if it were something that would explode. Twang! George's sensitive ears twined at these discords, and he decided that it was his duty to render some help. He found an open door and a corridor, and at the end another door, slightly ajar. George never noticed the white letters that proclaimed that this room was the office of the sergeant-major and the order "Knock before entering."

The sergeant-major was so engrossed, trying to master the ukelele, that he did not hear George. The young fellow shuddered when two more discords irritated his ear-drums.

"If you bend the middle finger a little more—and keep the thumb up—"

That was as far as George got, because the sergeant-major thrust the instrument into a drawer as if it were vermin and spun round.

"Why the blazes don't you knock before coming in? Can't you read?"

"I—I just thought—"

"You've no right to think."

"But I'm only trying to help, sir." George should have known better than to answer back a sergeant-major. "If you take it by the neck—"

"I'll take you by the neck!" bellowed the N.C.O., his large neck swelling and the eyes under the bushy eyebrows almost sticking out of his head "Get out!"

George decided it was wisest to leave, and the pleasant smell of food drew him towards the canteen.

A burst of laughter made him move over the tarmac to see what was causing the merriment. He grinned as he saw a canteen trolley, around which a number of airmen were gathered, and George surmised that the tea, coffee, and food were not the only attractions—he had caught a glimpse of two girls wearing serviceable overalls and white chef's hats.

But George did not know the cause of the merriment. There was a smug, self-satisfied, cocky young corporal, by the name of Craig, and he loved practical jokes. He had put a trick bun on a companion's plate, and when the victim had pressed the bun he had been squirted by some sort of white liquid. Corporal Craig was the aircraft radio operator, who had requested Microbe to let him have some hot music, but George did not know his identity then, or he might have given him a wide berth.

The airman who had got the liquid in his eye took it in good part.

"You wait, Craig," he cried, "I'll get even with you!"

"Have to get up mighty early," chortled Craig in his arrogant, boastful manner. "Hallo, who's that?"

"Dispatch rider from headquarters," answered the airman. "I saw him arrive just now with the C.O."

"Headquarters, eh?" Craig was interested. Like most of the men at the aerodrome he had a hearty contempt for anyone on "The Staff." He picked up the trick bun and handed it to one of his cronies. "Here, fill that up. This is where we have some fun." He cupped his hands. "Hallo, there!"

George stopped dead.

"Me?" He tapped his chest.

Craig nodded, all smiles.

"What about a coffee?" he shouted.

George thought a coffee was a mighty fine idea and he shuffled forward. He grinned at the two girls. He had no great time for girls, mainly because he was shy of them, but he did think the fair-haired girl with the laughing, merry blue eyes was rather nice. It was this girl Peggy who handed him his coffee.

"From headquarters, aren't you?" asked Craig.

"Yes, that's right—headquarters."

"Have a bun?"

"No, thanks."

"Oh, go on!" Craig cried persuasively. "I bet it's as good as anything you get at headquarters." He indicated Peggy. "Made by her own sweet hands."

"Well, in that case," answered the polite George, and took the bun and tried to bite it.

How they all yelled with mirth as a mixture, partly water and whitewash, squirted out. It was some moments before George realised what had happened, then he grinned in a sickly, apologetic manner that somehow made Peggy feel rather ashamed.

"I was going to wash my face, anyway," said George.

"Must have our little joke, you know," chuckled Craig.

"Ee, you're welcome," answered the good-natured George.

Meanwhile, what about Scruffy? That dog was not in the least like a whippet, but he had persistence. He had reached the residence of Sir Philip Bargrave just as George went roaring off to the aerodrome. Scruffy sat down for a rest and then went off on the trail, and in the end reached the aerodrome. It was the sergeant of the guard who caught the tired dog and read on the collar. "Yew Tree Cottage, Frogley." He ordered one of the men to put the dog into an empty guard-room.

George could have done with Scruffy's care and attention, because the practical jokers were having a great time. Whilst George drank his coffee, Craig managed to get hold of his handkerchief, liberally sprinkle it with pepper, and push it back into the victim's pocket. A bugle sounded recalling the airmen to work, so that George was left alone at the trolley with the two girls.

Corporal Craig swaggered off with a heavily built airman, whom everybody addressed as "Nobby."

"How you getting on with our sergeant-major's daughter?" he asked.

"Oh, Peggy!" Craig laughed smugly. "She's all over me."

George was a little embarrassed at being left alone with these two girls, though they were not paying him any attention, being busy discussing a sale they had visited.

"Perhaps I'd better be getting back to headquarters."

Peggy, who up till then had been a little sorry for this stupid fellow, was at once against him when he mentioned headquarters. She gave him a look of contempt, and then turned her back.

"Funny how being at headquarters turns some people's heads," she remarked to her friend.

George decided that he was not wanted and, what's more, it must be time the C.O. had finished those letters. He came round the corner of a hangar and pulled up sharply. Two or three sandbags lay on the ground, and across one was resting a gun and the end of this gun seemed to be resting on a tripod. A number of airmen were crouching down, whilst one fellow was coddling the gun.

"Load!" shouted the N.C.O. in charge of the class.

"On aim, sir," reported the man at the gun.

"Open fire!"

George realising that he was very close to the line of fire jumped back behind the hangar. Whilst the gun was doing its rat-tat-tat he was standing with his fingers in his ears. Then something interfered with his vision. George gaped his horror. It was the pretty girl Peggy, she was carrying a basket and evidently going on a shopping expedition. She must cross the line of fire.

George peered round the hangar, but everyone seemed too busy to pay him any attention, and the noise was deafening. He kept on pointing and waving his hands, but it had no effect, so there was only one thing for it. George rushed towards the girl, and before she had time to resist had flung her to the ground.

Nobby and Corporal Craig were working inside the hangar, and it was Nobby who drew the N.C.O.'s attention.

Peggy struggled vainly to rise, but George was holding her down. The machine-gun class saw the incident and the firing ceased, so George let the girl go. She struggled to her feet, and her print dress was badly soiled.

"You've got a nerve!" Peggy cried, hardly able to control herself.

"Oh, no, it's nothing really," modestly answered the hero. "Any time you—"

"Thought that was a funny way of getting even, didn't you?"

"No, no, no!" George was completely taken aback.

"If that's your idea of a joke, it's not mine."

"But it wasn't a joke. You see—" George turned and pointed at the machine-gun crew. His eyes opened wide. "They're laughing!" gasped the amazed George.

"And here's something else for them to laugh at!" shouted Peggy, and she handed George a beautiful clip across the cheek. Then she grabbed up her basket and stalked off, head held high. George saw that the men seemed more amused than ever, and it puzzled and bewildered him.

"That'll teach you to get fresh!" the N.C.O. called out.

"It's nothing to laugh at!" George went up to him and spoke indignantly. "You might have killed her."

"Now don't try to kid me you didn't know they were blanks."

"Blanks?" gasped George, as the truth dawned on him.

He decided to get away from the laughter of these airmen, and he went towards Hangar D, where Corporal Craig and Nobby were working. Needless to say, the corporal had taken a very poor view of the incident.

"Hey, here a minute!" he called out harshly.

Nobby, hands on hips, had been watching. A touch on his shoulder made him look round. It was one of the new bunch of recruits.

February 25th, 1939.

"Could you give me a hand with this boot?" requested the recruit. "I've got a nail in it. Perhaps you could knock it out on that bench."

"Let's have a look," said Nobby, who held the recruit's rifle and handed it to Craig, who took it very unwillingly.

The recruit rested a hand on Nobby's shoulder as the airman first of all examined the recruit's boot to find out whereabouts the nail was situated. Craig moved forward to meet George.

"That girl happens to be a friend of mine," gritted out Corporal Craig.

"Well, it was like this," began George. "You see, I—"

A flight sergeant came into the hangar and walked up to the corporal.

"Flight commander wants your log-book," he stated.

"Okay!" answered the corporal, and handed the rifle to George. "Hold that."

George accepted it obediently. Craig went over to a shelf to collect his log-book when he noticed through glass windows a squad of recruits near the orderly-room. He saw the sergeant-major numbering off the squad, and the corporal's cunning, wicked eyes lit up when the S.M. began ragnie because there were fifteen in the squad, and it should be sixteen. Craig glanced round and saw that Nobby was still busy on the recruit's boot—what a chance for putting this headquarters fellow in his place. He dashed back to George.

"Better take that outside."

"Me?" George was foxed.

"Very strict in the regulations here," solemnly stated Craig. "Rifles near petrol-tanks and all that." He stepped back as George tried to hand him the rifle. "Sorry. Flight commander wants me." Then he jumped forward and gripped George by the arm. "Look out! There's an officer coming." He pushed the bewildered George towards the other side of the hangar. "Quick! Through that door!"

There were a lot of questions George wanted to ask about these regulations and why the gun could not be handed to its rightful owner, but before he could get any words out he was through a small door, which slammed behind him.

The sergeant-major looked round and saw what he imagined was the missing recruit.

"Where the devil have you been?" he thundered.

"Me?"

"Yes, you! Don't hurry, though. We'll wait." The S.M. had his head lowered like a bull and his eyes were glaring.

"But—"

"Fall in at the double!" the S.M. almost foamed.

Somehow George found himself one of a line of recruits, who were all trying not to grin.

"I'll teach you to burst into my office," hissed the S.M. "And trail arms when you come on parade next time."

"But I'm not—"

"When you address me—say 'Sir.'"

"Sir?" questioned George.

"Yes—sir!"

"Well, sir—"

"Silence in the ranks!" This time the S.M. went and breathed on George from a very close range, and his moustache seemed to twitch as he added: "One more word from you and I'll have you up before the C.O."

"Yes, sir," meekly cried George.

The sergeant-major then stepped back, squared his shoulders and spoke sharply: "For inspection—port arms."

George thought it would be best to try to do what the others were doing, but his efforts at copying were not good.

"Pull back the bolt," whispered the recruit on George's right.

George pulled back the bolt and somehow got it right out. He tried to get it back, but it would not fit, so he stuffed it into his pocket. The manner in which he clutched the rifle made the S.M. scowl when he at last reached him. The S.M. pushed and shoved at George until the latter was holding the rifle correctly.

"Put your thumb over the bolt!" cried the S.M. as he grasped the muzzle of the rifle with the intention of looking down the barrel. As the recruit seemed such a fool he thought it best to put one hand on the barrel—otherwise the butt might land on his toe. "Filthy! Can't see a thing!"

"Can't you, sir?" helpfully spoke George. "Let's have a look."

The sergeant-major almost expired when he found that the recruit was not at the other end of the gun, and had stepped out of the ranks.

"What the devil do you think you're doing? I told you to keep your thumb on the bolt."

George produced the bolt.

"I did my best, sir, but it's come unstick."

"Get back into the ranks." The S.M. was livid. "I'll teach you who's in charge here."

George, the bolt back in the rifle, found himself back in the ranks and conscious that for some reason all these men were laughing at him.

"I will now demonstrate the slope arms," stated the S.M., and executed the movements. "One—two—three. Don't be afraid of your rifle. Slap it into your shoulder—it won't hurt you. Don't forget to throw your rifle up." He did the movement several times. "Now let's see you do it. Don't forget—throw your rifle up. Squad, 'shun—slope arms!'"

George determined that he must try his best and jerked up his rifle so swiftly that he failed to get a proper grip on it; it sailed through the air and landed on the sergeant-major's foot.

Corporal Craig, watching from the window, was almost doubled up with mirth. He turned and saw that the recruit had got the nail out of his boot.

"I wouldn't go out on the parade ground just yet," Craig advised. "Better wait until you can slip out unnoticed."

The sergeant-major, after telling George that he ought to be in a home, stood the awkward squad at ease whilst he demonstrated the "Ground arms." George was so hot and exhausted that he took out his handkerchief, mopped his brow and wiped his nose. The sergeant-major was just showing how the rifle should be laid on the ground parallel to the right foot when George sneezed. The S.M. leaped to an upright position with obvious anxiety for the seat of his breeches. He saw the smirks.

"I'll teach you to laugh on parade!" he shouted and glared at George. "And as for you, you'll laugh on the wrong side of your face before the day's out!"

Once more he demonstrated the movement, and again George used the handkerchief. George's sneeze was just like tearing cloth, and once again the S.M. jerked upright. He was busy telling George a few things when the commanding officer appeared. At once the S.M. called the squad to attention and stepped smartly up to his officer to salute.

George looked desperately round, and at that moment Craig pushed the recruit through the doorway. George slipped out of the back row, where he had got to by mistake. The recruit stepped across the short space, grabbed the rifle, and took his place in the ranks.

"How are the new recruits, sergeant-major?"

"Speaking for fifteen of them, sir, I've seen worse," was the report. "But the sixteenth is the worst I've seen in thirty years' service."

The commanding officer decided to inspect the squad and asked the S.M. to point out the bad recruit. Of course, the wretched George could not be found. The S.M. had sixteen men, and yet the smirking idiot had vanished. When he reported this the C.O. looked at him suspiciously, and asked if he were seeing double. George had hidden behind a sentry-box, but when he tried to tiptoe towards the protection of a hangar the S.M. saw him.

"There he is, sir!" the S.M. shouted and pointed. "Come back here, you!" The C.O.'s eyes opened wide.

"But he's no recruit," he said. "He's a dispatch rider from headquarters."

"A who, sir?" The S.M. was staggered.

"Drove me here only a few minutes ago." The C.O. gave his sergeant-major a nasty look. "I'll see you in my office later." Then he looked at George. "The letters are not ready yet."

The squad was dismissed, but the S.M. ordered George to remain behind.

"Get back to your headquarters and never let me see you again."

"But those letters—"

The S.M. had stalked off—he just could not talk to George. George scratched his head and wondered what he should do. A kindly disposed airman told him to wait in the guard-room. There was a telephone there, and when the guard was called out it was his chance to make a call. He got through to Frogley 214 and spoke to his sister. What should he do? She told him that he must wait for the letters. If he didn't they might find out about Bob, who would be court-martialled. He hung up hurriedly as the sergeant of the guard appeared.

"Who was it?"

"Wrong number," George answered quickly. "I wish they'd hurry up with those letters."

"I'll let you know when they're ready," gruffly stated the sergeant. "Best go along to the canteen."

Seruffy had bitten through the rope that had held him prisoner some time before George came into the guard-house. He got out through a window.

Craig Gets More Laughs

GEORGE wandered off towards the canteen. It was now almost dark, and the idea of driving that powerful motor-bike was a problem; still, if he could only get away from this place it would be something, even if it meant pushing Bob's machine all the way to Frogley.

The canteen was full of airmen off duty. They were playing cards, billiards, chess, reading papers, chatting and generally relaxing. Behind the long counter Peggy was on duty, and nearby lounged Corporal Craig and Nobby.

"Look, he's still here." Nobby nudged his friend.

"Hey, Romeo!" called Craig, and when George paused in front of him asked: "Have a bun?"

"I want to speak to the young lady I met this afternoon," stolidly stated George.

Craig turned so that George could see that the girl behind the counter was Peggy. Then the corporal called her name and pointed to George.

"Look who's here."

"Why, if it's not Mr. Headquarters!" cried Peggy, with a nasty laugh. "Their pet practical joker."

"I'm sorry about messing up your dress," humbly spoke George. "I'm afraid I sort of lost my head."

"You certainly did."

"Won't you let me apologise?"

"Fraid I'm rather busy," was her haughty answer.

This caused Craig considerable amusement. Peggy filled a tray and went off to see to the wants of the various customers, whilst George stared unhappily after her.

Somebody began to bang out a tune at the piano, and an N.C.O. came up to Craig and asked him to sing one of his comic songs.

"I'm not in the mood," he answered, and pointed at George. "Ask him. He's full of gags."

"What can he do?"

"Everything I expect—sing—dance—play any musical instrument."

"I can play the uke a little," stated George.

Naturally, Corporal Craig did not believe this for a moment. He knew the S.M. had a ukelele in his room, so he whispered into Nobby's ear to go get it. George's eyes glistened when Nobby pushed the instrument into his hands, and Craig chuckled because he felt certain that he was about to witness the further humiliation of a person to whom he had taken a distinct aversion. The corporal shouted for silence, and then said with a sneering grin that one of the big shots from headquarters wanted to sing to them. This was greeted with ironical cheers. Peggy looked at Craig, and there was an angry glint in her eyes. One could take practical joking too far. It was time that Craig ceased up on this poor mug from headquarters. Then George twanged the ukelele lovingly, perched himself on the edge of a table and began to sing. The laughter died away and soon everyone was crowding round—no need to tell these boys that here was a musician.

The smirk on Craig's face vanished because he realised that fact as well. Some of the words of the song were very funny, and it made the corporal furious to hear the laughter and to see Peggy was smiling.

"Pretty good, I must say," was his condescending comment at the end.

"And I wrote it myself," George said with pride.

"You did?" Now there was almost hero-worship in the eyes of the sergeant-major's daughter.

The boys shouted for another tune, and George sang them the same ditty that he had broadcast at the request of Bluebottle. It was not very long before Corporal Craig recognised the tune and the voice.

"Funny thing, but when I was night flying I heard that very song relayed from Frogley," the corporal stated sharply, when the applause was at an end. "What's more, the voice was the dead spit of yours."

George realised this unfortunate coincidence might mean his unmasking, and he stared hopelessly at the corporal. Luckily, the latter had to take a back seat as there was a yell from the appreciative audience for more. The only tune that George could think of that would appeal was about a sergeant-major, and so he sang it.

It was a comedy number with numerous sallies at the expense of all sergeant-majors. As most of the men went in fear and trembling of this mighty personage they were at first apprehensive, and then gave full vent to the laughter. Most unfortunate that the sergeant-major should hear the twanging of the ukelele and enter the canteen to find out who was playing it so perfectly. The S.M. listened to one chorus and then, like a madman, he intervened and informed George that his next place of abode would be the guard-room.

The poor, unfortunate George was pushed into a room, and at once a shaggy form bounded forward—it was

The bucket flopped over the sergeant-major's head with a clang.

Scruffy. The S.M. came in to question the prisoner and was amazed.

"Is that your dog?" he asked suspiciously—everything about this young fellow aroused his suspicions.

"Yes."

"But I thought you'd just come from headquarters?"

"Yes, yes—I have——" stuttered George.

"Followed you down, I suppose," was the sarcastic comment.

"Well, he used to be my dog," lied George. "But I gave him to someone who lives near here," he added as a bright after-thought. "He must have heard that I was down for the day."

Peggy went with Corporal Craig to find out what had happened to the unfortunate ukelele player, and they heard from the sergeant about the dog, and the girl was allowed to see the dog after George had been taken away to have an unpleasant five minutes with the C.O.—the S.M. hoped it would be unpleasant.

When Craig saw the address, "Yew Tree Cottage, Frogley," he jumped to the truth that George was not from headquarters.

"Obviously a fraud—probably not in the Air Force at all. I'd better let the sergeant-in-charge know."

"Dave, if he's not in the Air Force," Peggy paused, "he might have thought those were real bullets."

After a certain amount of persuasion Peggy convinced Craig that it would be best that nothing be said that night. She would take the dog back in the morning and find out.

The S.M. came out of the orderly-room to inform George that defaulters would be seen by the C.O. in the morning, and that he would spend the night in Number 4 barracks.

"But the letters?" argued George.

"They'll be posted."

The unscrupulous Corporal Craig saw George searching for Number 4 barracks, and with the idea of more fun pretended to be very sorry for his little jokes. Naturally, George told him about having to stay the night in barracks, and at once Craig's eyes glinted. He offered to show George the way, and he showed the unfortunate young man into the S.M.'s quarters.

George was amazed to find such a comfortable place with proper rooms, beds and everything. He was such a guileless person that he never suspected further trickery. Craig covered himself by saying that there had been a lot of improvements lately, and it was a new idea of the authorities to give fellows rooms just like home.

"Ee, it's champion," cried George.

Corporal Craig departed, and nearly died of mirth once he got out of the building. George took a bath in the fine bath-room, and as he could not find the bed-room switch he put out the light by the simple method of taking out the bulb. There were two beds, and he chose the one on the right, and being dogged tired was soon asleep.

The S.M. came in a long time later, cussed when the light would not work, undressed, took a bath, and had his usual snooze. Peggy always came and kissed her father good-night, and George was almost under the bedclothes, except for a bit of forehead. She kissed his forehead and tiptoed out of the room. Some five minutes later the S.M. woke up, tried the lights, remembered they would not act, muttered and got into the empty bed.

Peggy was up early, and took Scruffy over to Frogley in one of the lorries going that way. She saw Anne and learned all about the subterfuge of Anne's brother. Anne begged Peggy to help George, because he had only done it to save Bob.

February 25th, 1939.

"Don't worry. I'll see he gets away all right," Peggy promised, and patted Scruffy. "Your master will soon be home, Scruffy."

Peggy returned to camp, and now her opinion of George had undergone a big change. He was a sort of martyred hero.

Meanwhile, George was in even worse trouble. An orderly had brought the S.M. his usual early morning tea and found two occupants in the room, and, naturally, imagined it was a friend. He fetched another cup of tea, and both men sat up in bed to enjoy it. George gave a yell when he saw his room mate, and most of the hot tea went over the sergeant-major. George was the first case that morning before the C.O.

The S.M.'s chief complaint was about a song, which was both insubordinate and insulting. There were further incidents, but the C.O. said he would deal with one at a time—he wished to hear the song. The S.M. had to confess that he possessed a ukelele, and squirmed at the amused gleam in his superior's eyes. An orderly was sent for the instrument.

Meantime George had been thinking hard, and trying to scheme out some fresh words. It was a shock for the S.M. when George trilled out a doggerel all about the most wonderful S.M. the Air Force had ever known, how the men idolised him and what he did for them.

"Can you see anything very wrong in that?" the C.O. asked of the adjutant when the song had ended.

"Sounded very complimentary to me, sir."

"But the words are different, sir," the S.M. almost bellowed.

"Words often sound different at 10 o'clock at night," the C.O. answered, knowing that his S.M. did not disapprove of alcoholic refreshment. "Case dismissed."

"Do you mean I can go, sir?" cried George, and beamed. "Thank you, sir."

"Give Aircraftsman Bullock his papers," ordered the C.O. When George had been marched from the room he looked at his chief N.C.O. "I'm surprised, sergeant-major. A man from headquarters. This is the sort of thing that gives a station a bad name."

"But last night, sir——"

"What happened the night before often appears different in the morning," snapped the C.O. "Don't forget fire drill at 9.30."

The S.M. went out red in the face—he had almost forgotten to salute. His big hands shook as he scowled at the papers in his hands. Then he noticed that A/e Bullock had been posted from the Air Ministry to Glenbridge Air Station for the annual week's training.

George was on his machine and almost on his way when the sergeant-major stopped him. He was Aircraftsman Bullock 2814—had he forgotten that he had been posted here for a week's training? George would have argued, but he capitulated when the S.M. threatened to put him under arrest.

"Number 4 Barracks," ordered the S.M. "Don't make any mistake about it this time. Report to me on the parade ground in half an hour."

Learning to Serve His Country

GEORGE found Number 4 Barracks all right, and someone told him when it was time to fall in for the fire-parade. He was ambling across the parade ground about 9.20 when Peggy darted out of a hangar and gripped his arm.

"I've seen your sister this morning."

"What?" George almost jumped out of his skin.

"She told me the whole story, and I'm going to help you get away."

"It's very good of you," George managed a grin of gratitude. "But I'm afraid it's too late."

"Why too late?"

"They've found out that Bob's coming here for this week's training, so they won't let me go."

"But you can't impersonate Bob for a whole week."

"I'll save him from being court-martialled, anyway."

"But it's a serious crime wearing a uniform you aren't entitled to."

"It'll be just as serious for Bob if they catch him over that letter."

"Well, I think it's jolly sporting of you," Peggy said admiringly, for she was touched by his devotion.

"If it wasn't for that lop-eared, red-nosed-lah-di-dah-sergeant-major——"

"Look out!" hissed Peggy.

He saw the dreaded man approaching, and stiffened to attention.

"Hallo, daddy," she cried, and George just gaped vacantly.

"Why the devil aren't you on fire drill?" raved the S.M.

"I'm just going, sir," George answered, and beat it at the double.

Peggy had had to explain all that she had found out about George to Corporal Craig, and that worthy was by now sick of the sight of a person who was rapidly becoming a rival. After some argument he had agreed to say nothing, but hinted that it was only for Peggy's sake that he would keep his mouth shut. At the fire drill he whispered in George's ear that he knew the truth and was now on his side. Actually, he was planning more humiliation for the unfortunate George.

"Do exactly as I tell you and you can't go wrong," Craig whispered.

"Grab a bucket of sand and follow me up that ladder."

A ladder had been run up to a window of the barracks and the idea was to put the fire out with sand. George was not good at clambering up ladders, especially when carrying a heavy bucket of sand. The sergeant-major came along to see if the drill was being carried out to schedule, and paused almost underneath the ladder. George rested on the ladder, and his left hand held the bucket. Craig looked down and saw this hand touch the side of the ladder and promptly stepped down a rung on to George's fingers. The sand went all over the S.M. and the bucket flopped over his head with a clang. George was horrified, and he knew that Craig had stepped on his hand on purpose.

Craig and George scrambled up the ladder and through the window. The S.M., livid with fury, removed the bucket in time to guess who had inflicted this injury to his dignity. He went up the ladder after him, but by that time George had reached the ground through an escape chute. Nobby had witnessed the incident, and he was not so friendly with Craig.

"Now's your chance to get even," he said out of the corner of his mouth, handing George the nozzle of a fire hose. "Belt him over the head as he comes down the chute."

But Craig at the window above had seen and heard. When the S.M. demanded where Bullock was, he told him that George had gone and suggested that the S.M. if he wanted to get down quickly should use the chute. The idea was distasteful to the big man, but to use the stairs when all the other airmen had heard Craig's suggestion, was out of the question. He went down the chute, George thought it was Craig, and gave him a good wallop with the fire nozzle.

"What the devil do you think you're doing?" yelled the S.M., when he had got free.

George gave one horrified gasp and staggered back in terror. He cannoned into a T-spanner of a fire-hydrant, causing it to swing round. The hose filled rapidly, and then out shot a column of water. The S.M. was bowled over, so were a number of the men, and George could not hold the squirming thing. The nozzle went up in the air and Craig, laughing up at the window, got it right in the face.

That evening Peggy came into her father's study to find him practising on the ukelele. Rather unwisely she suggested that Bullock should give him some help.

"Bullock! Never mention that man to me again," he flared. "I'll teach him to hit me on the head."

"Don't be too hard on him, daddy."

"He's on extra sentry-go now. I'll learn him."

"Perhaps if you were a bit kinder to him and helped him with his drill"—Peggy slipped an arm round her father's neck—"he might help you with your uke."

"Bah!" snorted the S.M.

There was a discreet knock, and it was Corporal Craig.

"Good-evening, sir," said the N.C.O. with a smirk. "Peggy asked me to take her over to the canteen."

Peggy was getting a little tired of the attentions of the corporal, but she made no comment in front of her father.

"I never asked you to take me to the canteen," she said, when they were outside.

"No, I took your wish for granted."

"You've got a nerve."

"And you've promised me a lot of good marks for keeping my mouth shut." Craig was unperturbed by her indignation.

They went across to the canteen, and Corporal Craig got a good laugh out of poor George, who was pacing solemnly up and down with a rifle that seemed like a ton weight. His amusement made the girl look at him with indignation. At one time she had thought herself in love with Craig, now she knew it was the reverse.

The canteen was full of men because there was to be a concert in a few days, and the talented ones were having a practice.

George was standing at ease outside his sentry-box when the S.M. appeared. George hurriedly shouldered arms and tried to look like a statue. Peggy's words had had their effect. After several brisk remarks the tone of the S.M. became quieter, and he begged George to try to do his duty properly instead of driving him off his head. After which he coughed and asked how George used his fingers on a ukelele.

"You must bend the middle finger more at the second joint, then it's free of the fingers on the outside," eagerly explained George.

The S.M. was quite pleasant until he realised that George had handed him his rifle to hold whilst he did a demonstration. The S.M. handed it back sharply, blew out his cheeks, and went off spluttering, but he did not forget about the middle finger.

Corporal Craig was incensed because Peggy was all sympathy for George and was most indignant when he made disparaging remarks about the bogus airman. It roused his evil nature, and he went across to the stage where some of the men were decorating it with paper streamers and balloons. Some of the latter had faces painted on them, and Craig managed to borrow one. Cautiously he made his way to a window just above the sentry-box. He clucked because the bayonet of George's rifle was level with the window. With great difficulty he suppressed his laughter as he fixed the balloon to the bayonet.

The pilot waited while George clambered into the forward cockpit . . .

The S.M. went to his office, got out his ukelele, and found to his joy that this middle finger tip was a great help. He felt so pleased that he decided to be more lenient with Bullock. Perhaps the fellow would respond to kindness. He came out on to the parade ground, and George was standing smartly to attention. The balloon contained gas, so that the S.M. did not observe it in the half light.

"That's more like it. Now you look something like a sentry." The S.M. actually smiled. "Any moment the C.O. will be passing on his rounds, and I want you to 'Present Arms' smartly."

The C.O. and adjutant appeared, and the S.M. gave the order to "Present Arms." Horror of horrors. The S.M. saw the balloon, and so did George. George did the only thing possible, he prodded the balloon with his bayonet. Bang! It did not sound so loud thirty yards away, and all the C.O. saw was the S.M. stagger because George had prodded the balloon almost in his face.

"Was that a hiccup, sergeant-major?" asked the C.O. "Did I see you stagger?"

"No, sir, you see—"

"In future kindly take more water with it," the C.O. interrupted, and went on his way.

The S.M. waited till the officers were out of hearing, and then he thrust his angry visage within inches of George's twitching features.

"Get out of my sight and never let me see you again."

George beat a hasty retreat, glad to escape with his skin.

From Vi, another canteen girl, Peggy heard all about a sentry with a balloon tied to his bayonet. It was the funny fellow from headquarters, and then Peggy gave Corporal Craig such a dirty look. She lifted the flap of the canteen.

"Where are you off to?" Craig asked. "To stop him before he gets into more trouble," was her retort. "I think it's a shame playing tricks on him like that."

The swing doors of the canteen opened and a dejected George entered and seated himself moodily at a small table.

Craig was thinking what devilment he could get up to when an orderly touched him on the shoulder. The C.O. wanted him—he had been detailed as radio operator for to-morrow's test of the new fighter.

"Be back soon, Peggy." Craig stuck out his chest. "The C.O. just can't get on without me."

Peggy did not answer, because she was not listening. All her thoughts were with George. She went over to his table.

"What's the matter?"

"Oh, nothing."

"Yes, there is."

"I was just thinking how right they were never to have let me join the Air Force."

"What d'you mean?"

"I'm no good—every time I try to be smart, something goes wrong."

"Is this anything to do with the balloon?" Peggy asked.

"Craig, wasn't it?" He looked at her and she nodded. "Nothing to do with me, I know, but it beats me why you're so fond of him."

"Who said I was?" the girl said sharply. "Has it ever occurred to you that I may have to play up to him to keep his mouth shut about you?"

"You mean—you do it for me?" He was incredulous.

"In a way—yes."

That brightened George up a lot. She whispered that they could not talk there, and he followed her behind the counter into the small pantry beyond. In the privacy of this room Peggy said how sorry she was about smacking his face, and now that she knew why he had collared her, she had a very different opinion of him

It ended by them telling each other that they liked each other a lot. Then Peggy pulled back a cloth and revealed her father's ukelele—she did not explain that she had purloined it when his back was turned.

"From now on you're going to show everyone what you're made of," Peggy spoke determinedly. "The boys liked your playing the other day. Now's the chance to give them another treat—make yourself popular."

"I'll show 'em!" exulted George, and grasped the uke as if it were a machine-gun. "You leave it to me."

When Craig got back from his interview with the C.O. it was to find George and Peggy perched on a table, George playing, Peggy singing, and all the lads joining in the choruses. Corporal Craig literally gritted his teeth.

Escape

At nine the next morning most of the men of the aerodrome were on parade. George, wearing overalls, had been detailed to "D" flight. A flight sergeant dressed the squad, inspected them and reported "All correct." The chief fly in George's ointment was the fact that Corporal Craig was next to him, and that individual kept giving him murderous glances. Then the flight commander spoke a few words.

"As reception flight, we shall have everyone's eyes on us, so mind you put on a good show. Corporal Craig, have everything ready for a complete test of her radio as soon as she lands."

"Yes, sir."

"She's to be flown with full war-load, so have bombs and ammunition loaded immediately. That's all."

"Flight dismiss!" hoarsely shouted the sergeant. "Get up bombs and ammunition."

George found himself holding a torpedo-shaped thing that weighed to his mind a ton, and he was scared pink he'd drop it—he nearly did when he saw Peggy standing at the side of a hangar and beckoning him urgently. He got the bomb to the dump, and then managed to join the girl.

"Quick!" she gasped out, "Anne's just arrived and says Bob is reporting at the orderly-room."

"What? He can't do that."

"He's just back from leave and is furious with you for trying to take his place."

"But they'll find out about the letter."

"That's his funeral. The point is that he's reporting. Then they'll arrest you and you'll be given six months for wearing that uniform."

"Six months?" George was horrified.

"You must escape before they find you out." The girl pointed. "You see the farm there? If you can slip across to it when nobody's looking, there's a lane which leads down to the Frogley road. It's your only hope."

Corporal Craig missed George and looked round suspiciously. He spotted them whispering together, and came across—his face a thundercloud.

"Look here, I've had about enough of this," he shouted angrily. "I said I'd keep my mouth shut on conditions. And they were not that you should spend your time fussing over this little squirt."

"Who said I was a squirt?" George clenched his fists.

Peggy intervened.

"He's worth a hundred of you," she said, her eyes blazing.

"Oh, is he?" Craig grinned unpleasantly. "That settles it. I've kept my mouth shut long enough."

February 25th, 1939.

"No, please," begged Peggy, regretting her hasty words. "You mustn't tell them."

"And I hope they give him nine months," Craig said, and left them.

"I'll see what I can do." Peggy clutched George's arm. "But get away quick. It's more important than ever now."

"Oh, mother!" murmured the unhappy George.

"Good luck!" cried Peggy, and rushed off in pursuit of Craig.

George dithered. How could he charge, walk or sneak across the flying-field without being spotted?

There was a roar overhead, and everyone gazed skywards. The new fighter had arrived. The flight sergeant bellowed to his squad.

"Harris! Wilson! Look after the chocks and see they're tight under the wheels. Charge, starboard wing-tip." He saw George. "Come here, you. Stand by the port wing-tip."

The unlucky George found himself a virtual prisoner. He became resigned to his fate. He heard Nobby telling someone that he had never seen such a perfect landing, only an ace pilot could get her down without crashing. George was not interested.

Peggy arrived breathless outside the S.M.'s office, and then Craig appeared.

"Have you told him?"

"Of course. Now look here, Peggy, do be reasonable—" But Craig was pushed to one side.

The flight commander went out with the pilot to look at the new fighter. As Sir Philip was expected any moment, it was decided to keep the engine ticking over. Then Corporal Craig was called up and introduced.

"I'll just check over the gear, sir, and perhaps you'll run her up for a ground test."

"Okay," agreed the pilot. "Give me a shout when you're ready."

Meanwhile Peggy was pleading in vain with her father to spare George. Certainly not! Would she have her father neglect his duty?

"I wouldn't even if I liked him."

"But I love him."

"What! Him?"

"Yes."

"Nonsense!" the S.M. cried. "You're just putting this on to try to save him."

"No, no, I'm not." There were tears in Peggy's eyes. "Honestly I'm not."

The sergeant-major was in a quandary, but he was saved from the awkward situation by an orderly, who reported that Sir Philip's car was arriving. The S.M. rushed out to receive the great man.

Sir Philip got out of his car, shook hands with Wing Commander Hill, and stated that before he saw the new fighter go through a test he would like to inspect the airmen in their barracks. The S.M. grabbed an orderly, told him to tell the sergeants to get every man into barracks, and heaven help anybody if they were not spotless.

George had to leave his post by the aeroplane and join the airmen dashing towards barracks. George decided it was his chance. He dodged behind a door, waited till all the men had gone, and then crept back into a hangar. He was thinking of making a rush for it when round the corner came an airman.

"Didn't you get my message?"

Bob recoiled.

"Yes."

"Then what are you doing here?"

"You might ask yourself that."

"Me?"

"Coming back and spoiling everything," argued George. "Both of us'll get it in the neck now."

"I've done nothing."

"But they'll find out about you not delivering the letter."

"It was never meant to be delivered," said Bob. "It was a duplicate—for reference only."

"You mean I—"

"Look here, George, I know you were only trying to be helpful and I'm grateful. So now I'm trying to help you. Don't you realise that every day you wear that uniform makes the crime worse? You've probably earned about twelve months already."

"Six—nine—twelve," George looked round desperately. "I'll be in for life if I don't hurry."

"Now's your chance," urged Bob.

"I've got to go and report."

George crept out of the hangar. Nobody about anywhere. He went stealthily across the tarmac towards the farmhouse.

The pilot and Corporal Craig, naturally, had stayed with the machine. The pilot asked if there were a telephone, and Craig said there was one at the far side of the hangar.

"I'm all ready for ground test, sir."

"Good. I'll run her up after I've telephoned."

"If there's anything wrong, sir, that won't give me much time to make it good."

"Oh, all right," grumpily agreed the pilot, and was walking towards the hangar when he spotted George.

(Continued on page 24)

NEXT WEEK'S LONG COMPLETE FILM DRAMAS!

PATRIC KNOWLES

—IN—

"STORM OVER BENGAL"

Stirred up by an Indian Rajah, who hates the British, the natives rise in revolt, and a punitive expeditionary force head straight for a trap set by the Rajah. There is only one way those soldiers can be saved, and a young officer sacrifices his all to do so. A stirring drama of the North-West Frontier

"TWO GUN LAW"

Believing his bandit foster-father to have been killed in a gun battle with the forces of law and order, Bob Larson starts life afresh under a new surname; but no sooner has he begun to make good than the past catches up with him. A bullet-sprayed drama of the West, starring Charles Starrett

Also

Another episode of the smashing serial:

"HIDDEN TREASURE"

Starring Don Terry and Gwen Gaze

A crook sells what he imagines is a barren mine to a rancher, and then finds that the mine holds valuable deposits of tungsten. A girl also has an interest in that mine and goes into partnership with the rancher, and the crook tries every foul trick to regain possession of the mine. Starring George O'Brien

The

PAINTED DESERT

The Banning Claim

BIG, smiling Bob McVey was quite willing to allow Carol Banning and her grandfather to stake out a mining claim on his ranchland. Directly he met her, Bob had grown fond of Carol, who was pretty and high-spirited.

Privately he was of the opinion that the mine was useless. But when Hugh Fawcett, a mining promoter who had tried many times to get all mineral rights on Bob's land, took a hand in the game, Bob began to sit up and take notice.

From a note he found in the shack near the workings, when the occupants were away, Bob discovered that Fawcett was reporting to old Mr. Banning that samples only showed slight traces of tungsten.

Grim-faced, Bob rode into Dry Creek with Placer Bill, his burly, good-humoured assistant, taking with him another sample for assay. Leaving Bill to await the report, he called on Hugh Fawcett, a big, hard-faced fellow with little of the business man in his appearance, but a whole lot of the toughness of the mining camps.

"I've been expecting you to drop in," Fawcett grinned.

"Fawcett, just how much did you have to do with Banning's staking that claim out on my range-land?" Bob demanded.

He knew the Fawcett method very well. The promoter promised small prospectors to back them with expenses, then when they had slaved to find out the possibilities of the mine, forced them to sell to him for a song.

"It might be your range-land," Fawcett growled, "but you don't own the mineral rights."

"As long as I run cattle on that land, I won't have any mines cluttering it up, especially," Bob added offensively, "any that you're interested in."

"I'm not only interested in the Banning claim, but I also own the mine," Fawcett grinned, and held up a quit-claim deed on which Bob could plainly see Banning's signature.

"How'd you get hold of this quit-claim deed?" Bob growled.

"Banning came in to see me one day. He was in a spot and needed money. Through sympathy I took the claim off his hands for three thousand dollars."

Bob was unaware that Banning had only left the office just before he arrived. The old man, faced with Fawcett's refusal to advance him the promised money to repay his outgoings on equipment, had been bullied into accepting not three thousand, but five hundred dollars in return for his signing over the mine to the crook.

At that moment Banning was over at Yukon Kate's saloon, and one of Fawcett's men, sent by the promoter, was getting back the whole five hundred in a poker game.

Bob didn't know all this, but he knew Fawcett.

"You never did anything out of sympathy in your life. You probably gyped Banning out of his mine, figuring I'd pay off to keep from being annoyed."

"Maybe you're right, and maybe you're wrong," Fawcett drawled.

"However, I intend to start developing the Banning claim immediately."

"Then you have another think coming, Fawcett! You may own the Banning claim, but you'll never work it, because I won't let you or any of your men cross my land."

Bob's tone was very forceful, but Fawcett still smiled.

"You can't bluff me. I've been in the mining business too long. I know my rights."

"And I've been around crooks like you long enough to know where I stand. I can throw you into a lawsuit that will keep you from crossing my land for the next ten years."

"You've got me all wrong," said Fawcett mildly. "I bought the Banning claim so that he could take his granddaughter back East where they belong. Of course, if you want to make me an offer, it would save trouble. Lawsuits cost money."

Bob laughed.

"All right, I'll make you a deal. I'll give you two thousand dollars if you'll endorse that quit-claim deed over to me, and sign an agreement never to engage in any mining ventures on any land that I own or lease. What do you say?"

"Well," Fawcett grinned, "anything to avoid trouble."

The deal was carried through when Placer Bill came in whistling and carrying a sheet of paper.

"What are you up to now, Bob?" he grunted.

"I just bought a mine," Bob smiled.

"Here's the assay report on those ore samples," Bill chuckled, his bright little eyes twinkling.

Bob read it, and slowly a grin spread over his face, while Fawcett looked uneasy.

"Listen to this," he said: "'Two-tenths copper, trace of gold, point one-six silver, and seventy-five per cent tungsten.'" Fawcett gasped, and his face purpled as Bob read a footnote from the assayer: "Bob, this is the highest grade stuff I ever saw. Shoot the works!"

Roaring with laughter, Bob and Placer Bill left Fawcett sitting blankly in his office, and rode out of town to have another look at the claim.

For once, the crook had been beaten. He had signed away for two thousand dollars a claim that might be worth a fortune.

All unaware of the moves that had been made, Carol Banning rode into town a little later, her pretty face worried as she looked for her grandfather.

There sounded the crash of a shot from Yukon Kate's, and Carol began running along the boardwalk, a vague dread gripping her.

She burst into the saloon, which was in a ferment, with the acrid tang of cordite hanging on the air.

Her grandfather was crumpled on the floor and as she knelt by him, her face white as paper, it needed no expert knowledge to see that he was dead.

The man who had done it—a hard-faced scoundrel in wideawake hat and black frockcoat—was standing above him with a smoking gun still in his hand. Banning had accused him of cheating in the poker game—and it suited Fawcett's purpose well to have the old man out of the way.

Stricken dumb, Carol knelt by her grandfather, tears blinding her. Yukon Kate herself, a bulky woman who had pioneered in the Klondike, and had been wooed unsuccessfully by Placer Bill for the past twenty years, came striding over with a gun in her hand.

"I ought to blow you in two, Bart," she snarled.

"He did it in self-defence," growled one of Bart's friends. "I saw it!"

"Get out," said Kate tensely, "and don't ever show your ugly mug in my place again. Go on, you two—get out!"

She watched them slink out, then turned to the girl, taking her by the shoulders.

"He's dead Kate," Carol muttered brokenly.

"I know, honey," Kate murmured, and, half-supporting the grief-stricken girl, took her into her own sitting room.

Fawcett's Trickery

A FORTNIGHT later a new firm started work on the Painted Desert. The Banning-McVey Mining Company came into being. It was Bob's idea, when he learned with a bit of a shock that Carol still believed she owned the claim.

The girl had been staying under Kate's wing, recovering from the shock of her grandfather's murder. Kate herself, finding the mining fever gripping her once more, had been analysing samples brought by Carol, and had discovered the high content of tungsten.

Excitedly she mortgaged the saloon for every dollar she could get and joined up with Carol. But when they reached the claim, they found Bob and Placer Bill, helped by the ranch foreman, Steve, already blasting to discover the best means of driving the galleries.

Bob, who had fallen badly for Carol, didn't want to hurt the girl, even though she was far from polite, and declared she hated the sight of him. He offered a partnership, with himself putting up the money for equipment.

"What are you up to, anyway?" Placer Bill whispered hoarsely, when Carol and Kate had gone a short distance away to talk over the offer. "Why don't you tell that hot-headed young filly that you own this mine? Show her the deed!"

"Now look," said Bob seriously, "she doesn't even know her grandfather sold the deed. In trying to get me over a barrel, Fawcett gypped her out of a good mine."

Yukon Kate was busy trying to win over the girl.

"Well, he can't keep me from working this claim," snapped Carol, staring angrily across at the young rancher. "I know enough laws to know that any mining tenant holds the rights to cross any leased land."

"Suppose he didn't like what you were doing," Kate argued. "He could cause you plenty of trouble."

"Oh, how I hate him!" Carol stamped her foot.

"Well, that's okay by me," Kate grinned, "but don't let your hatred interfere with the mine. He's got money, and that's something we haven't got!"

Carol turned on her in surprise.

"What about that money you raised on the saloon?"

"Oh, that little dab isn't enough to get us started. Besides, we need somebody like Bob McVey. He's a fighter, and I never heard of a mine yet that didn't start a fight."

Realising that she was behaving foolishly, Carol gave in. The contract was signed that night at Bob's ranch, while Steve and the men provided a background of music and cowboy songs, arranged by Bob, to try to get Carol to like him a little better.

With his usual energy, Bob started ordering machinery and hiring skilled labour. News of this caused Fawcett to make another move. Already he had offered Bob fifty thousand dollars for a half-share in the mine; not even the fact that he had increased this to a hundred thousand could persuade Bob to let him in.

"Listen, Fawcett," he had growled; "get it through your head—I don't want any business dealings with you whatsoever!"

In a tearing rage Fawcett rode back to Dry Creek. Now he was laying plans to drive out Bob and Carol. The young rancher had borrowed money from the bank on a ninety-day note—which meant that if he didn't pay up within that time, the bank would foreclose and move in on his property.

As it happened, Heist, the banker, had already made his own arrangements with Fawcett. The mining promoter bought the note from him.

"Well, good enough, Heist," he grinned. "I'll take these off your hands right away, but don't loan McVey any more money." He snarled the last words, for his rebuke was still rankling.

"I understand, Mr. Fawcett," said the banker smoothly. "And when you make out your cheque in payment for these notes, don't forget to add the full interest for the ninety days."

"Fair enough," said Fawcett. "Keep this under your hat."

He called in two brutal-looking toughs who were lounging outside, and gave them instructions.

"Bob McVey has just borrowed fifty thousand dollars from the bank to develop the Banning claim. Now, you two are the best hard-rock miners in the district." Burke and Kincaid smirked at one another. "You won't have any trouble going to work for him. When that money is spent for buildings and equipment, and McVey finds out he can't borrow any more money, I want things to begin happening that'll keep him from delivering any ore!"

So Burke and Kincaid went to work for the Banning McVey Company. Things were moving fast. Huge quantities of timber had been delivered, tunnels were being bored and engine and milling sheds were going up.

In the cabin which served as an office, Carol and Kate did most of the office work, while Bob worked like a Trojan keeping things running smoothly. He came in one day waving a sheet of paper.

"There's the contract, folks! North-Western Steel has agreed to take our entire output, and they'll pay on delivery at the railroad at Dry Creek."

"That's swell!" beamed Placer Bill. "Look, this is the first stuff to come out of the mill. Within a week we'll be running full blast."

But Kate pointed out that they had only twelve days left before the note became due at the bank, and Carol, who was still distant with Bob, reported that cash was running low. Bob wasn't worrying very much about the cash, although he agreed with Kate that Heist, the banker, couldn't be trusted any farther than she could throw one of the mine buildings. There was a chance that Heist might not renew the note.

"Bill," the young rancher ordered, "get the wagons and mules together as fast as you can. As soon as the concentrates come out of the mill, we'll haul them into town."

Bill was hurrying out when Steve came in with anxious news.

"It's about the timbering in tunnel No. 3," he reported, "I just came through there, and it looks like the whole drift's about to cave in."

Bob whistled.

"All right, Steve, we'll go and have a look at it. I'll be back, Kate." He grinned at Carol, who turned away, and strode out of the shack.

Yukon Kate went over to the girl.

"Why don't you come off your high horse, Carol, and act a little more human round Bob?"

"I don't like him," said Carol coldly.

"Now you're talking like a spoiled child! You know very well Bob has put every penny he could get hold of into this mine, and he has worked day and night to get it into running order."

Carol looked down, then she suddenly smiled, and a slow flush spread over her face.

"I guess I have acted like a fool," she confessed. "I don't really dislike him."

"I know, honey," said Kate softly, patting her arm. "I feel the same way about Bill, even if he ain't worth the powder to blow him up!"

Meanwhile, carrying lights, Bob and Steve had gone deep into one of the tunnels. Grimly Steve pointed out one of the roof beams. It was badly cracked, and sagging dangerously in the middle.

Bob reached up and tapped it gently with the butt of his gun. "I feel the same way again, harder and then he and Steve leaped backwards as an ominous creaking sounded.

With a tearing noise the timbering gave. Bob and Steve pressed themselves against the wall of the tunnel as many yards of the roof came down with a rush and a roar, filling the narrow space with choking dust.

Luckily other beams had held, but the tunnel at that point was partly blocked by a waist-high barrier of rocks and rubble.

Seething with anger, Bob ordered miners in that sector to stay out of it for a while.

"Who supervised this timbering?"

"Tom Burke," he was told. "He's foreman of the night shift."

Fighting mad, Bob went in search of Tom Burke.

A Beating for Burke

FAWCETT'S henchman was washing in the bunkhouse when Bob strode in. Scenting trouble, miners off duty blocked the open doorway. Burke looked round when Bob came in.

"What is it, boss?"

"Pack up your things and get out of here," Bob snapped. "You're through."

"I don't get you," said Burke, his little eyes gleaming angrily.

"The timbering you put in No. 3 just caved in. Luckily no one was hurt."

Burke was a big man, bulkier than Bob. Calmly he took a towel and started drying his face.

"Why blame me? Accidents are bound to happen sometimes."

"Well, this was no accident," Bob rasped.

"If you think I'm going to take that kind of talk, you're all wrong!" snarled Burke. Suddenly flinging the towel aside he lashed out a swinging blow that took Bob by surprise.

The blow caught him on the jaw with terrific force, hurling him to the floor. Sprawling there, he rolled over, and leaped to his feet as Burke came at him again.

There was an exchange of blows at close quarters, then Bob hurled Burke right back against the bunks with a mighty hook to the jaw.

Blood was trickling from his own mouth. He gave Burke no mercy, going after him and battering him fiercely.

Burke wilted and grunted with pain as Bob drove short-arm blows to his stomach, then clicked his teeth together with swings to the jaw when his guard dropped.

Kate and Carol had joined the crowd at the doorway. Burke was too far gone to notice anything except that merciless rain of blows. He was half-blinded, puffing hard and bleeding from the nose and mouth. Head down, he came at Bob desperately, arms flailing.

Coolly Bob avoided his wild swings, measured him up, and sent in a crashing right to the chin that hurled the crook back over a table. It splintered under him, and he ended up in a corner, all the fight knocked out of him.

"When I said you were fired," Bob panted, "I meant it! Now get out of here."

Sullenly Burke nodded, holding his aching jaw.

Bob turned to Steve as his foreman handed him his hat.

"Thanks, Steve. It'll take us about a week to clean out that tunnel. Which means we've got to have more money for the payroll. Put every available man to work on that cave-in and run three shifts. I'm going into town."

Outside the bunkhouse, he found Carol waiting with Kate.

"Here," said the girl softly, coming close to him, "you'd better let me clean up that for you."

Surprised, Bob glanced at Kate, who grinned and nodded meaningly. He smiled into Carol's bright eyes as she wiped the blood from his mouth.

"Thanks," he said calmly, and left the two women smiling at each other.

His call on Banker Heist with Placer Bill was fruitless. Heist talked glibly about bad business conditions making it impossible for him to advance a further ten thousand dollars. His real reason became plain when he remarked that Bob would have to see Fawcett about renewing his notes.

"Fawcett? What's he got to do with it?"

"I needed some ready money a few weeks ago," Heist said, avoiding Bob's eyes, "so I sold the notes to him."

"Oh, I understand!" growled Bob. "Thanks."

He and Placer Bill went out gloomily. It was clear Fawcett had got them into a nasty position. They had spent every cent, and couldn't even redeem the notes.

"If we don't get back there and ship enough ore," Bob pointed out, "he'll be in the mining business instead of us."

"Well, I don't see how, you're going to do it," Bill groaned, scratching his stubbly chin. "The men haven't been paid for the last couple of weeks, and, unless we can kick in some dinero next pay-day, we're gonna have to shut down."

"Well, we're not going to shut down," said Bob forcefully. "We're going right back to that mine get hold of the boys and round up all the cattle on my ranch—and that'll meet the payroll!"

But arriving back at the mine they found more trouble. Kate and Carol had been attracted from the office by a sudden silence which meant the stoppage of the machinery. The men poured from the workings, and gathered Desperately they fought, the tang of the burning fuse in their nostrils, and in their minds the knowledge that any of the other charges might explode at any moment, in an angry group about Kincaid, Burke's friend, who was making a heated speech.

"Men, are you with us?" he roared. "We're tired of this—two weeks without pay!"

"Now, you all listen to me," Kate shouted. "You'll all get your money as soon as the ore is delivered."

Jeers greeted her.

"We're all fools to work for a bunch of crooks that won't pay us!" snarled Kincaid. "How do you know we're going to get our money? I'm in favour of going right now. Are you with me?" There were yells of agreement. "An' if we don't get what's coming to us, we'll wreck the place!"

Then Bob, his face black as thunder, strode in amongst them roughly, and hurled Kincaid aside.

"Get out of here! Now, listen to me, fellows. I know you haven't been paid and I know you've all worked hard up to now. And you'd still be working if it wasn't for Kincaid riling you up with a pack of lies!" There were dissatisfied murmurs. He raised his voice, drowning them. "All right, all right! You'll get your money. I'm shipping my entire herd of cattle to market immediately. Now I'll promise you time and a half for playing ball, if you go back to work. Isn't that fair enough? What'd you say?"

The temper of the crowd changed at once. The men began streaming back to work, and Carol and Kate sighed with relief. They had felt powerless until Bob came on the scene. Carol was even more glad that she hadn't attempted to work the mine by herself. Kate was right when she said a fighter was needed.

Kincaid, like Burke, was turned off the workings. But sprawling on the ground where Bob had hurled him, he had heard enough. And that night, when Steve and Placer Bill, with Bob's cowboys, were driving the herd to Dry Creek, Fawcett and a gang of roughs awaited them in a narrow canyon.

The cattle were moving slowly and peacefully, until Fawcett's men, yelling and firing, charged down on the fringes of the herd, taking Bob's cowboys by surprise.

Bellcwing, the cattle started to run, streaming helter-skelter down the canyon. Furiously Placer Bill and his pals exchanged shots with raiders, but the damage was done. The cattle were in a hopeless, thundering stampede.

The rumble of their flight drowned the yells and the reports of the guns. Their work done, Fawcett's men melted away into the darkness. Placer Bill and his men formed an angry group, watching the cattle stream away down the canyon and spread out over the open country beyond.

"Well, there's one thing in our favour, Bill," Steve growled. "They're heading towards town."

"Yeah, but I reckon we'll lose half of them before we get them rounded up again."

"Well, come on, let's get it done," Steve sighed.

As it happened, they didn't lose as many as they thought. After terrific labours they arrived, tired but triumphant, at the railroad depot. And the cheque from the meat-packing company was large enough to pay off all the back wages and leave some over.

Once more the mine started producing with a certain smoothness. But Bob and the others knew it would be a race against time.

Runaway Wagons

THE sun was setting when Fawcett and Kincaid and another man sat their horses at the top of a slope and watched the wagons leaving the mine. There were two mule-trains of a score of animals, each train drawing two wagons.
February 25th, 1939.

An old-time driver took the reins of the first team, while Bob himself took the second, perched on the wagon, which was piled high with sacks of ore. An armed guard accompanied each driver.

"Looks like they're getting off to a good start," remarked Kincaid, as the sound of cheering and the crunch of wagon wheels rose to the watchers.

"They'll never get that ore to town if I can help it," Fawcett gritted. "And I think I know how to stop them. Let's go over to the canyon."

They wheeled their horses and galloped away into the gathering darkness, while the two wagon teams lumbered on their long journey. Bob had left Placer Bill in charge at the mine, expecting to be back the day after to-morrow. The mule-wagons were slow, but he believed they would do the job all right.

On they plodded, until some hours later they left the fairly open desert and took the trail that dived down between the walls of a huge canyon.

Fawcett, watching from a high point, grinned with satisfaction as he saw the wagons appear, their big wheels grinding slowly over the rocky ground.

"It's mostly down-grade to the canyon," he growled. "And if we can get them rolling fast enough, they won't be able to make that bad turn at the edge of the rim—two thousand feet to the bottom!" He pointed away to where the dark abyss yawned, with the narrow trail skirting the top of the terrifying precipice.

"Now get down there and stampede those mules! Clark, you take that lead outfit. Kincaid, you take McVey!"

The three scoundrels rode carefully amongst the rocks, getting nearer to the wagons. Clark was the first to attack. Yelling and firing, he swept suddenly down a short slope as the driver of the leading team was preparing to edge his animals down the increasing slope of the trail.

The guard fired and missed. Clark emptied the chambers of his revolver, then, still yelling, dashed away.

His work was done. Snorting, the mules had started to gallop. Ordinarily they could never have done it, pulling the heavy wagons. But the slope, and fright, helped them, and once started on the down-grade they couldn't stop.

The plod-plod of their hoofs rose to a thunderous beat; the scrunch of the wagon wheels became a menacing rumble. The leading team was stampeded!

Down they rushed, gaining speed every moment, nearing the dangerous bend every second, the driver straining every muscle, trying to pull them to a stop. Sweat broke out on his forehead as he realised the impossibility of doing so—all he could do was hope to steer them round the bend.

The guard was pulling on the rope which connected the brakes of the two wagons. A smell of burning rose. The brakes could not hold that great hurtling weight.

Bob stared in horror as he saw the leading team tearing away from him. But he had little time to think about that—for, hardly had the first attacker disappeared, when Kincaid dashed from behind a heap of rocks and swerved up alongside Bob's team before his guard could fire.

Crack! Kincaid's revolver flared. He slashed the mules with his whip and dashed away again, pursued by a stream of bullets from Bob's guard. He turned as he neared the rocks and snapped back a shot.

It was a lucky one. The guard groaned and fell back, clapping his shoulder.

Bob flashed him one glance to see whether he was safe on top of the pile of sacks, then had to devote all his attention to the mules. Despite his great strength, he couldn't drag them out of their mad stampede.

Bob was in an even more terrible position than the leading driver, for his guard was helpless and could do nothing to assist by straining on the brakes. Faster and faster the team raced, gathering momentum down the slope.

Clear above the grinding of the wheels and the pounding of the hoofs, he heard a scream of metal as the leading team took the bend. He heard a vague shout from ahead, saw a wheel go over the edge of the bend.

With amazing quickness it was all over. The leading wagons toppled over, remained poised for a minute right on the edge of the precipice, then began the long, crashing drop to the bottom of the chasm.

The mules tore on, for the driver had cut their traces before leaping at the very last moment with the guard. Faintly the sound of the great crash rose up as the wagons hit the bottom and were shattered to a thousand pieces.

Bob's teeth were gritted as he strained back on the reins. His brain was racing in tune with the mad hoofbeats of the mules. One wagon lost! Half the results of their labours gone to ruin in one terrible minute!

He must save the second load!

"Look out!" his guard yelled, leaning dangerously over the edge of the wagon, hanging right out over the colossal drop. "We'll go over the rim!"

"Hold on!" Bob shouted. "I'm going to try to make it!"

There was one second of fierce straining, with the grinding of the wheels in his ears as they swerved right round on the very edge of the trail, sending rocks and dirt showering into the abyss.

Then they were round, past the danger point, and rushing along a level section of the trail. Lying right back, Bob at last managed to slow the mules and, by terrible exertions drag them to a standstill. Trembling, the mules stood there, while Bob, panting and sweating, dropped the reins and leaped down to meet the driver of the other wagon as he came running along the trail.

"I'm sorry I lost the wagon, Bob," the old-timer muttered, "but—"

"You couldn't help it, Jim," said Bob, patting his arm. "So forget about it. I want you to take this outfit on into town and get Hank to a doctor. Here's your bill of lading. I'm going back to the mine and try to bring another shipment of ore through."

He borrowed the horse and gun of a rider who had been following the wagons, but had been unable to keep up with them when the mad stampede down the slope started.

"Stick with it, Jim?" he called as he rode away. "Do your best to get through!"

Back along the trail he tore.

Crack! The report of a gun sounded from the shelter of some rocks, where Clark was still watching. The bullet hummed wide, and Bob tore onwards, turning in his saddle to send shots winging back.

Clark got on his trail, determined to stop him from getting back to the mine. Furiously Bob rode on, carrying on a running gunfight with the crook. Then, at a bend in the trail.

(Continued on page 23)

A Cossack racketeer is enraged when a son he has not seen for twenty years comes under his charge, but the son proves even tougher than himself. The father falls into the hands of the law and is sentenced to prison for a long stretch, and the son joins a cavalry regiment that is guarding the prison to try to help his father escape. Starring Akim Tamiroff, Leif Erikson and Frances Farmer

The Coming of Johnny

MIKE BALAN stood scowling in the doorway at the woman who sat facing him. And when Mike Balan scowled his men said that things usually happened. For Mike was a tremendous man, with massive shoulders and arms and hands as strong as a gorilla's, and almost as ruthless. And he had a temper to match. Originally a Cossack, with all their most savage traits, he had drifted over to America. There he had fought his way up by his fists and guns and was now head of the biggest meat racket in the country, and feared by everyone of the organisation he controlled.

Yet there was no fear in the eyes of the woman who sat so quietly gazing at him as he stood in the doorway. She was an elderly woman, and though her face was strong and steadfast there lay a shadow behind her eyes.

"What do you want?" Her answer came quietly.

"You haven't changed a bit, Mykola." He laughed harshly as he lowered his big bulk into a chair. This woman had been his wife, but twenty years had elapsed since he had last seen her, and he was ready to make short shrift with her.

"You have," he retorted. "I wouldn't marry you now."

"You wouldn't have the chance. I've been married to a good and honourable man for many years."

His eyes narrowed.

"What d'you want from me?" he demanded. "Money? You get no more money from me."

She smiled, but it was a scornful smile.

"I want nothing from you. I came here to give you something."

He was curious at once, but he affected indifference.

"It must be something very special fine," he jeered.

"It is. It's your precious son."

He sat up in his chair in a moment. Memory stirred in him swiftly, but he beat it down. He laughed contemptuously.

"I don't want him," he said as he lay back again in his chair. "I won't take him. When you left me you made big fight for our son. You made me promise never to see him again. Well, I keep my promise. Besides, what can I do with a little boy, hey?"

"You crazy Cossack," she retorted "D'you think time has stood still for your son? He's over twenty."

There was another pause. Memory was stirring again. The man picked up a bottle that was by his hand, poured himself out half a tumblerful of neat whisky, and tossed it off.

"What d'you call him?" he growled.

"Montgomery. I sent him to one of the best schools in the country. I had tutors for him—"

"And raised a pet. I know."

"A pet?" Her voice was shrill as was the laugh that followed it. "He went to the best military schools. He broke all the rules, he got into fights. He ran away. D'you know what he said when I told him I was going to ask you to send for him?"

"What did he say?" he asked curiously. For a son who fought, broke rules, and ran away from school was beginning to appeal to him.

"He said, 'Don't bother, mother. I'll look in on the old man and size him up.'"

Balan was up out of his chair in a flash, his big moustache bristling.

"That fresh kid said that about me—me his father?" he roared. "Don't you ever let him come near me."

But all she did was to laugh as she moved to the door.

"He's out at your house now," she said calmly. "The only reason I took the trouble to come and see you at all was to warn you not to send him back to me because he was too much for you to handle."

For five full minutes after she had gone Mike Balan stormed up and down his office raging and swearing. Then presently he threw himself into a chair, yelling for one of his men.

"Glinka," he exclaimed when the man appeared. "Go up to my house where you will find my son waiting. Kick him out into the street."

But he stopped the man before he had gained the door.

"Wait a minute! He said he would size me up, did he? Well, I will size him up. I will go and kick him out myself."

Montgomery, in the meanwhile, was sitting in Balan's house in a room furnished with almost barbaric splendour. Round him stood five men eyeing him curiously and suspiciously. From their faces and appearances it seemed to Montgomery that they were hardly likely to be engaged in legitimate enterprises.

They in their turn were a little puzzled at this good-looking, strapping young fellow with the jolly, smiling face who was regarding them so coolly, yet so absolutely indifferently.

"Say," he demanded presently, "are you five cut-throats really my father's home team?"

One of them answered him with a scowl.

"I cannot believe you are his son. You don't look like him and he never told me he had a son."

The young man laughed.

"Well, they never told me I had a father, so we're quits. Is he anything like you birds?"

"He don't resemble me none," growled one of the others.

"Let him stay," snapped the man who had spoken first, but he spoke with a grim relish. "Mike will hauld him when he comes."

Montgomery's eyebrows lifted.

"Oh, I see, just a bunch of good pals, eh?"

An angry retort was on the other's lips, but at that moment Balan stood in the doorway. And a hush fell on the room like the hush in a forest that precedes the coming of a storm. Balan stood glaring at his son. Montgomery regarded his father with slightly knitted brows.

"What the devil are you doing in my room? Didn't they tell you that no one can come into my room?"

"They did."

"Then what do you come in for?"

"Because I wanted to see it."

"You wanted to see it, eh? You think already my house belongs to you, eh?"

"I don't want your house," replied Montgomery contemptuously.

Balan took a step forward, taunting him.

"So my house is not good enough for you, eh?"

"I never said that," answered the young man quietly.

Balan turned, appealing to the others.

"D'you know what his name is? Montgomery! Isn't that a pretty name?"

He roared with laughter, but the young man spoke.

"Stop laughing!"

Balan did stop, too. But he seemed almost dumb with amazement.

"You tell me—to stop—laughing?" he managed to get out at length.

"I do. And if you don't I'll sock you."

Balan literally gasped.

"You'll sock—me?"

In a moment he had whipped off his coat. Montgomery was removing his in leisurely fashion and rolling up his sleeves. Balan was regarding him almost incredulously.

"You mean—you want to—fight me with your fists?" he demanded.

"Of course I do. Don't talk so much. Come on."

It was an amazing fight to those who looked on, for if they expected to see Balan knock the young man senseless at the beginning—and they were accustomed to see it with most men he fought—they met with a surprise. For they soon saw that this young man was not only capable of taking punishment, but he was also capable of giving it. And within the first few minutes he had landed Balan a blow that sent him staggering back against the bookcase.

Yet perhaps what surprised them most was the Cossack's attitude. For all he did was to grin appreciation of the blow, and the next minute was on top of Montgomery bearing him to the ground by sheer force of weight. But they saw Montgomery wriggle from his grip and once more Balan staggered back from a tremendous punch.

"Glinka," gasped Balan, "it's a good thing you didn't try to kick him out."

But the next minute they were at it once more, pounding and punneling each other for all they were worth until once again Balan was on top of Montgomery. But as the young man with a tremendous effort hurled him backwards on to the floor, Balan held up his hand. He was laughing.

"Welcome, lad, welcome! You can fight—indeed, you can fight as my son ought to fight!"

He leaped at him, flinging his arms round him like a great bear, hugging him, and kissing him on both cheeks.

"Ostap!" he shouted. "Get us a fine big lunch and we will welcome my son. Borscht, pirochky, and a pail of caviare. This is my son, and I'm going to call him Johnny."

"Goes with me, Mike," rejoined the young man.

Balan roared with delighted laughter. "Calls his old father 'Mike,' " he shouted. "What a son! What a son!"

Mike Balan Decides to Quit

THE friendship that had started so strangely grew rapidly every day.

For Montgomery, or Johnny as he was now called, very soon showed his father that fighting was not the only thing he could do. Though as soon as Balan saw that he was a horseman equal to himself his delight was boundless. To a true Cossack no man is worthy of the name of man until he is one with his horse.

Yet Johnny, who found his new life vastly entertaining, had found something else of intrigue. That was Trina, the pretty, fair-haired niece of Mike Balan's steward. Though this only served to add to Balan's delight. Trina, he declared, was a good girl and a fine girl. They would make a splendid pair.

But as the months slipped away Mike Balan gradually began to get more thoughtful. He knew that he was living chiefly now for this wonderful son of his, and it was worrying him quite a lot to think that that same son had no idea of the nature of the business in which he was engaged.

He faced the problem squarely. Things had been getting a little dangerous lately. He decided that he would take a long trip abroad and take his son with him. He had plenty of money with which to do it. Trouble might happen if he stayed too long, and Johnny mustn't be mixed up in trouble. He was too good for that.

He approached him on the subject that evening. They had been bathing together and were drying themselves.

"And you like the idea of a trip, Johnny? We go round the world together, eh?"

"Swell, Mike."

"And we will put all the past in the bath and wash it away and forget it all."

"But how about the business, Mike? I thought I was to come into that with you?"

The other spoke gravely after a pause. "Johnny," he said, "I must tell you something. My business is what they call a racket."

It was out now, and he waited. But much to his relief the young man's answer came indifferently.

"I don't care what your business is, Mike."

"Ah, but you don't understand, Johnny. I have many gangs working for me in this country. They go out and raid cattle for me."

The young man laughed.

"They've hanged men for that, Mike," he said.

"I see you don't believe me. But it is true. I am a cattle thief. That is why you cannot come into my business. You are my son."

It was some moments before the young man spoke.

"I thought you were kidding, Mike," he said.

"It makes a difference, eh?" asked the other quickly.

It did, and Johnny knew it, but he wasn't going to admit it.

"Not with you and me," he replied. "It's not for me to tell you what to do. Whatever you do goes with me. What boat do we take?"

Balan laid his arm affectionately on the young man's shoulders.

"We'll take the first boat," he said. "We will start out fresh and clean, you and I, Johnny, and stay so. Now let's go and get a rest, for we leave—"

He had risen from his seat while he was speaking, but the sentence was never completed. For the words died in his throat. In the open doorway stood three men whom he knew in a moment to be Federal agents.

And Mike Balan's dreams faded away into nothingness.

"Come on out, Balan," said one of the three men. "We want you."

Balan spoke quietly.

"Who are you?"

"Federal Bureau of Investigation."

"What is the reason of your visit?"

"There are about a dozen reasons," retorted the other. "Get your clothes on quick."

Balan addressed Johnny who was just behind him.

"Johnny, fetch me my clothes," he said.

"Stay here!" snapped the agent.

"Who are you, anyway?"

"I'll show you who I am," exclaimed the young man as he launched himself at him. But Balan caught him in his arms and held him back.

"Johnny, Johnny, don't!" He forced Johnny back. "Johnny, if ever you want to see me again you'll do as I tell you now," he whispered. "You can help me."

For a few moments the young man was silent. Then at last he spoke.

"Whatever you say goes, Mike."

"Come on now, quit stalling and get into your clothes, both of you," said the agent.

"Of course we will," replied Balan with surprising politeness. "Do not think that either of us have any intention of disturbing the peace. All we want is—"

He had been playing with his bath towel while he had been talking. From the corners of his eyes he had seen that the other two Federal agents had gone into the adjoining room. In a flash he had the towel over the head of the man to whom he had been talking.

"Quick, Johnny, quick!" he exclaimed. "Make your getaway while the gin's good. You promised, you know."

When the other two men came running in finally to overpower Balan and haul him away there was no sign of Johnny.

In Leavenworth Prison

MIKE BALAN walked dully along the prison corridor with the warden at his heels. For a month in solitary confinement, and he had just been released from that, will freeze the soul of any man.

Hope had very nearly died within him now. Only resentment remained and a recklessness that would risk anything for freedom. For the Federal authorities had made no mistake. The evidence produced at his trial was overwhelming and he had been sentenced to a long term of imprisonment.

Yet he had taken it calmly enough. He had his son and a hundred powerful friends. For a time he would have to accustom himself to the loss of his freedom and all that it meant to him, but he had never a doubt that Johnny would come to his rescue and set him free.

Now, however, he had nearly abandoned all hope. For a year had passed away and never a word of any sort had come from his son, and he knew that it should have done if Johnny still remembered him. For even the strictest surveillance of prisoners has never succeeded in keeping them entirely out of touch with the doings of the outside world. Time after time news filters through in strange and mysterious ways and the strictest vigilance on the part of the authorities has never altogether succeeded in stopping it.

The guard swung open the door of his cell, shoved him in, locked and double locked the door. The man who shared his cell with him hardly glanced at him as he sat down on the bed with his head resting wearily on his hands. But a whisper from outside brought Balan's head up. He was up on his feet in a second.

He stood there, clutching the bars. The convict who was sweeping the corridor spoke in low tones with his eyes on the passage.

"This got passed down the line while you were in solitary, Balan. Your kid's done a sneak. Not even his momma knows where he is."

He moved away as swiftly as he had come. Balan's companion, who had been listening to the conversation, spoke.

"That ain't no news to you. Everyone in this joint knows by now that you've got a son who took a run-out powder on his old man."

But Balan hardly seemed to hear him. It seemed to him the final blow to all his hopes as he stood holding the bars of his cell.

"I must get out of here," he muttered. "I must get out of here!"

One hour later he stood in the presence of the warden, and the latter was regarding him with a worried frown on his face. For he was by no means a harsh man, and he tried to temper justice with mercy as far as he could.

"Sit down, Balan," he said. "You're out of punishment again. What are you going to do about it? You can't win out here, you know, by trying to be tough."

Balan nodded without a word. And the warden was just about to address him again when the squealing of a dog outside brought him to his feet. He strode across to the window. Outside he saw a couple of small boys who were fastening a large tin can to a dog who was squealing piteously.

"Stop that!" he called out. "Get off at once and leave that dog alone or I'll have you spanked."

He came slowly back to his table. He failed to notice that a sudden new light had dawned in Balan's eyes.

"It burns me up to see anyone ill-treating an animal," he said. "Ah, I see it does the same to you. Well, to get back to your affairs. What are you going to do, Balan?"

The other's answer came readily enough.

"I shall play the game in future," he said.

The warden nodded briefly. He knew the genuine when he saw it. He pressed a button on his table and his secretary appeared.

"Notify the deputy and assign this man to work to-day," he said.

An hour or so later Balan with others was marched out to the prison cemetery with picks and shovels. But Balan, out in the open air once more, was momentarily happy. For in an adjoining field a squad of mounted government troopers were going through their riding exercises, and every now and then Balan would pause in his work to watch their riding and dream once more of the days when he and Johnny rode together, indulging in all those daring exercises of horsemanship so dear to the heart of every Cossack.

"Get on with your digging!" snapped the guard, and Balan with a sigh resumed his work once more. But in a few moments the guard's voice snapped out another, sharper command.

"Cease work! Look out there!" They scattered quickly. They saw that there was need of it. For they suddenly saw that the horse of one of the troopers, evidently out of control, was bearing desperately down upon them. And as it hurtled over the fence which separated them from the parade ground it was only by a superhuman effort of the rider that the horse was guided clear of the half-finished grave and came to a halt on the very edge.

But simultaneously Mike and another man had run forward and grabbed at the horse's bridle and were holding it as the rider dropped from the saddle. Though Mike Balan's heart was thumping furiously as he realised the rider was no other than his son!

Johnny, however, was patting his horse coolly.

"What's the matter with you, old feller? What's got into you? Oh, I see, your stirrup buckle's gouging you." He slipped a note swiftly into Balan's hand, speaking under his breath.

"Couldn't manage it before."

As the guard came up he addressed him with a smile.

"Sorry if I disturbed any of your old customers."

The other grinned.

"It relieves the monotony a bit," he replied grimly.

In his cell later on Mike Balan and his fellow prisoner read the note together.

All it said was:

"Get assigned to Farm 2."

All the happiness and trust in the world were in Balan's face.

"What d'you say to my Johnny now?" he demanded.

"Pretty good for a start. But he doesn't tell us how to get to this Farm 2."

But Mike Balan was laughing softly, happily.

"We will get there somehow," he said. "They keep horses on Number 2 Farm. Maybe soon we will get there."

One of the guards grabbed Balan by the shoulders and pulled him back.

Farm Two

OPPORTUNITY, it is said, knocks at every man's door, but he is not always quick enough to hear it and take advantage of it. Balan was working on one of the prison roads one day a week later when happening to look up from his work he saw one of the convicts who had just loaded a cart full of rubbish start belabouring the mule who was unable to draw the heavy load.

A scowl came over his face. At any other time and in any other place he would, with his love of animals, have handled the situation quickly and summarily. But for the first time he was hesitating. His promise of good behaviour had earned him work. A bad mark against him now for unruly conduct would send him back to solitary confinement with little hopes of realising Johnny's schemes for his freedom. With a sigh he turned back to his shovel.

And then suddenly he saw the warden coming round the corner and an idea surged into his brain. The convict was still belabouring the mule, and in a second Balan had reached him. With one huge hand he hauled him from the cart. With the other he sent him crashing into a heap of stones.

Two of the guards rushed forward, and one of them grabbed Balan by the shoulders and pulled him back.

He stood before the warden ten minutes later. The deputy warden sat watching.

The warden spoke coldly.

"Well, Balan, what have you got to say for yourself? I really had hopes that our last talk had done you some good. Yet now in front of my eyes you get into a fight with another inmate."

"Mr. Warden, I couldn't help it. I tried hard not to touch him, but I see him hitting that mule, and when I see anyone hurting an animal something rises up in me, because I cannot see a man hurt an animal. Even my cell-mate, he couldn't—"

He let his voice trail away. He could see that the warden had begun to smile strangely. There was a moment's silence, and then the warden looked up.

"I think I understand, Balan," he said quietly. "Do you understand anything about horses?"

For the first time since he had been in prison Balan really smiled.

"But everything!" he replied. "I am a Cossack, Mr. Warden."

"You know we have horses at No. 2 Farm?"

Balan nodded gravely. He certainly did.

"Men who work there," went on the warden, "are put on their honour. Do you know why we can afford to do that, Balan?"

"Because no one would take advantage of the warden's kindness," replied the Cossack smoothly.

But the warden spoke gravely, ignoring the remark.

"Because you're in a Federal Institution," he said. "Jump your time here, and a local force will chase you. But do so on Farm 2, Balan, and the entire power, machinery and authority of the United States Government will hunt you down and bring you back. Or leave you where you're caught."

He turned to his deputy.

"Arrange for this man to work at Farm 2," he said. "And see that his cell-mate, 83478, goes too."

When Mike Balan had been sentenced first of all and assigned to Leavenworth Prison, Johnny's first act had been to join the Army under the name of Johnny Simpkins. For he knew that he would ultimately be assigned to the February 25th, 1939.

cavalry school, whose headquarters were close to the prison. Actually, during the first twelve months he was merely watching and waiting, and having no thought at all but the release of Mike, he set himself out to earn promotion by hard work and good conduct.

His unfailing good humour, his skillful horsemanship and ready courage won him popularity quickly. It was not long before he attracted the attention of Sergeant Flynn, and any trooper who found favour in the eyes of that hard-bitten man was destined eventually to climb the ladder.

So by the time that Balan was transferred to Farm 2 Johnny had been made a corporal, and though there were times when his conscience pricked him for the double game he was playing, he gritted his teeth and strove to push out uncomfortable thoughts from his mind. For it was uncomfortable to have to think that not only was he, a sworn loyal member of the Army, secretly planning for the escape of a prisoner, but that to succeed in it was meaning that he himself would have to desert as well.

One evening while on leave he slipped quietly and by devious ways down to an old wharf, where he found Trina waiting for him. For she had come to the town also trying to plan for Balan's escape, and the two, meeting, had joined forces in a moment.

She greeted him eagerly.

"I've got word through to Glinka," she said. "I've told him I'm in touch with you, and he's coming along to meet us to-night. He's tried to see Mike, but they wouldn't let him."

"He'll be seeing him soon," said Johnny hopefully.

She moved a little closer to him.

"Johnny, I'm afraid for you. If anything happens to you—"

"Nothing's goin' to happen to me," he replied almost roughly. "I've got every detail of the getaway set. It's as quick and simple as daylight—even to my going over the hill."

A puzzled frown came over her face.

"Over the hill?" she queried.

His laugh was harsh.

"It sounds prettier than 'desert,'" he replied. "I think I hear Glinka coming."

The other came up like a shadow. He spoke in low tones.

"They wouldn't let me see him, but I'm going to be allowed to see him tomorrow."

"Then get this down pat," Johnny replied. "Tell Mike to make his break on Friday night. Tell him to hide out in the silo until I pick him up on Sunday afternoon. And tell him that I'll have the horses and uniforms for him."

Johnny Rides Out

SERGEANT FLYNN was sitting in his office with his feet on the table, smoking and reading, when a man came in.

"Good-evening, sergeant."

Flynn studied him with some disapproval. He saw a small, rather furtive-looking little man. And he had a strong dislike to small furtive-looking little men.

"What is it?" he asked uncompromisingly.

The other cleared his throat and endeavoured to appear at ease.

"I've got to see someone in charge."

"I'm in charge," replied Flynn curtly.

"What's the trouble?"

"I was assaulted downtown the other night by a soldier. I've found out his name."

"What is it?"

"Simpkins. Johnny Simpkins."

Flynn's eyebrows lifted in mild surprise.

"You don't say!"

"And I've found out something else, sergeant," went on the other, annoyed that he had made so little impression. "He's the son of a Federal prisoner in the penitentiary and—"

But he stopped suddenly. Flynn had risen from his chair.

"You dirty, snooping little scavenger," he exclaimed. "You get out of here quick, before I lay my hands on you."

He took a step forward, but the other was out of the door in a flash.

Flynn stood deep in thought. There was a frown on his forehead. All sorts of uncomfortable thoughts were beginning to drift into his mind. A couple of uniforms and a couple of horses had unaccountably disappeared only recently and the colonel was angry about it. And if what this man had just said to him was true—

He looked up as Johnny entered the room.

"Colonel wants to see us both, sergeant," he said laconically.

They stood before the colonel, but Johnny had already guessed what the trouble was.

"Corporal, what do you know about those two O.D. uniforms checked out of troop supply?" asked the colonel.

Johnny knew a lot, but he wasn't saying it.

"Copied them as per list, sir."

"Where did you get the list?"

"I gave it to him, sir," replied Flynn.

"Were there two horses on the list, too?"

"I—I think so, sir."

An angry frown came to the other's face. He spoke coldly.

"Sergeant," he said, "it is not the custom in the Army for a man to make out a list and not even know what's on it, or to sign without reading what you sign. Until these uniforms and horses are found, I'm relegating you to Duty Sergeant. That's all."

They went out silently together. Johnny's conscience stabbed him furiously. This man who had just been reduced was his friend. Through him he had gained promotion.

"I say, sergeant—" he began, but the other interrupted coolly.

"Quite all right, son," he said. "I know it wasn't your fault. I can rely on you, I know, not to let me down."

Johnny was sitting moodily that night in the mess-room listening to the radio, yet scarcely hearing anything. For the knowledge of the temporary disgrace that he had brought to the man who had befriended him was still weighing heavily on him.

But he started suddenly as the music faded away and a voice spoke:

"We interrupt our programme for a special news flash. All in the vicinity of Leavenworth are asked to pay particular attention. Two convicts escaped from the Federal prison about an hour ago and are still at large. They are believed to be dressed in army uniforms and to be riding army horses."

The voice died away and the music began again. But Johnny didn't hear it. Resolution had come to him at last, and his mind was made up. A little pale, but with his head held high he strode across the room just as Flynn came in. Johnny spoke quietly.

"Sergeant, I've come to tell—" he began, but the other interrupted him quickly.

"Colonel's orders. You're to take a squad of men at once, to go to Number

(Continued on page 26)

A ruthless tyrant held sway on Treasure Island, a man who was prepared to go to any lengths to accomplish his life's ambition. It was against this malign scoundrel that a young man and a girl pitted their courage and resourcefulness. Read how they fared in this thrill-packed serial of high adventure and stark drama, starring Don Terry and Gwen Gaze

Read This First

Treasure Island, down in the Caribbean Sea, is owned by an unscrupulous American known as Carter Collins, alias the "Shark." It is towards this island that pretty Toni Morrell journeys for the dual purpose of learning the identity of her missing father and seeking pirate booty which is said to be buried there.

Larry Kent, friend of Toni Morrell and star reporter of the San Pablo "Courier," a Florida newspaper belonging to a publisher named Westmore, is also headed for Treasure Island. His object is to investigate the mysterious disappearance of another Pressman, Thorndyke, who had been despatched to the island to check up on sinister rumours that have reached the outer world concerning Carter Collins' domain.

Together Larry and Toni reach the island in a launch picked up by a liner on which they were travelling to Cortez, nearest port of call to Collins' sea-girt retreat. Once ashore on Treasure Island, however, they are attacked by guards in the Shark's pay, and while Larry fights those guards Toni obtains refuge in a hut some distance away.

She falls through a trap-door in the floor of that hut, and finds herself in a dark tunnel peopled by hooded men who close in on her!

Now Read On

Captain Cuttle

HER eyes becoming accustomed to the darkness that had descended upon the tunnel as the trap-door above her had swung back into position. Toni Morrell again perceived the hooded forms of the men into whose presence she had fallen—perceived them dimly as they continued to advance upon her.

She was not lacking in courage. Her determination to journey to this isle of ill-repute, the subject of so many ugly rumours, had in itself been proof enough of her fortitude. Yet she could not have denied now that she was mortally afraid, and she screamed piercingly in her terror, her shrieks ringing the more loudly through the subterranean passage as she felt a hand grasp her by the wrist.

"Quiet!" a voice commanded. "Quiet!"

There was a gruffness in the speaker's tone, but despite this the voice was not menacing, and, stilling her cries, peering at the owner of that voice in the gloom, Toni made him out to be an individual of hulking physique. At the same time she sensed somehow that his attitude towards her savoured more of the inquisitive than the threatening.

"Who—who are you?" she faltered. "Who are you, and who are these men with you?"

"My name's Dreer, if that means anything to you," came the reply, "and these men with me are diggers that work for Carter Collins. I'm their foreman, and I have to see that they stick to their job. But who are you? Another of the Shark's victims?"

Toni covered at mention of that evil-sounding name.

"The Shark?" she echoed fearfully.

"Yeah—otherwise Carter Collins, the owner o' this island. A fiend who has gone mad in his search for the buccaneer treasure that's supposed to have been buried here centuries ago."

He had scarcely spoken those words when the trap-door above swung open again, and immediately afterwards the ray of a torch shone through the aperture. In the bright glow of that light which fell from aloft Toni saw that the man who had addressed her and who was gripping her wrist was carrying a whip, and that he and the "diggers" to whom he had referred were clad in sackcloth—like the unfortunate wretch who had died aboard the steamer Dolphin after being picked up in the drifting launch.

Hardly had she observed their garb when Dreer's subordinates recoiled with a medley of exclamations, covering their faces as they raised that outcry. Dreer himself also drew back, releasing Toni and blinking up at the light which shone through the opening above.

"Tako away that torch, will you?" he shouted. "Put it out! Put it out! The men's eyes can't stand it after weeks in these accursed tunnels! I can barely stand it meself, in spite o' bein' allowed to go up in the open air every, so often!"

He was answered by a cackling voice. "Ho, you lubbers down there don't like the light, don't ye? All right, get back to your diggin', ye human moles that Carter Collins has enticed on to his island. Get back to your job of delvin' amongst the tunnels. Go on, get back to your work, Mole Men! Dreer, take that whip o' yours and make 'em step lively!"

Dreer did not wield the whip. Even had he been minded to do so it would not have been necessary, for with the brilliant ray of the torch playing on them the diggers stumbled off along the tunnel piteously, like men temporarily blinded.

EPISODE 2:—

"Revolt of the Mole Men"

Dreer followed them, and as he and his subordinates departed, the man with the torch began to descend from the trap-door via a steep ladder which Toni now described, the girl also observing that the trap-door did not close as it had formerly done, having apparently been wedged open.

A second or two later the man with the torch was beside her, and she saw then that he was the individual who had stared in at her through the window of the hut up above. She saw, too, that he had the appearance of a seafaring man, and that in place of his right hand a villainous-looking iron hook protruded from under his sleeve. Yet his face did not strike her as being nearly so frightening as when she had first set eyes on it a few minutes previously, though there was an expression of singular craftiness upon it.

"I'm Cap'n Cuttle," he said sharply, on reaching her side. "And you? Who are you, young woman?"

The girl answered him in tremulous accents.

"Toni," she rejoined. "Toni Morrell."

He stared at that, as if the name was familiar to him. Then he bent a penetrating gaze upon her.

"Morrell?" he jerked. "Did you say Morrell? By thunder, if ye're lyin' to me—"

"I'm not lying to you," Toni protested. "I'm telling you the truth. What does my name mean to you, anyway?"

He made no response to that question, but turned his head in the direction which Dreer and the diggers had taken, as if wishing to satisfy himself that they were out of earshot. Then he leaned towards the girl with a secretive air.

"Keep quiet an' do as ye're told," he muttered. "Maybe ye've found a friend. Maybe I'll be that friend, even though it suits me to cruise along o' Carter Collins—an' I might mention that a friend can come in mighty handy for people as find their way to this island uninvited. Now turn around an' walk down that tunnel. Go on, turn around an' walk—and keep walkin'."

He directed the ray of the torch past her shoulder, and, glancing round, she noticed that another tunnel branched off from the one into which she had fallen. She hesitated to enter it, however, and was looking at it askance when Captain Cuttle repeated his instructions imperatively—so that, resolving to put her faith in the hint of friendship that he had given her, she moved towards the other passage and advanced into it as he had commanded.

Captain Cuttle watched her until she had disappeared from view. Then he wheeled and climbed nimbly up the steps that led to the hut above, the torch held in his left hand, the iron hook that served him in place of his missing right hand clawing raspily on the ladder's rungs.

Once in the hut he hastened to the door of the dwelling, and, opening it, he stood on the threshold and listened in an attentive manner, his head cocked on one side.

To his ears came the sounds of strife—sounds that issued from among the rocks not far from the hut—sounds that indicated Larry Kent was still battling with the guards in Carter Collins' pay.

Larry, in fact, was fighting like a madman, and, although the two rogues who had pounced on him had been reinforced by three other look-outs and by Collins' agent, Grindley, the strength of the opposition only seemed to inspire the young reporter to herculean efforts.

Again and again his bunched fists battered home against the villainous faces of his swarming foes. Grindley he laid low with a flashing upper-cut that stretched the fellow senseless. The shore-guards, in their striped jerseys and bell-bottomed slacks, he knocked down in swift succession, as if they had been skittles in a bowling-alley, and notwithstanding that they scrambled up time after time to renew the combat, he finally broke away from them and sprinted like a hare in the direction he had seen Toni Morrell take earlier on.

Running through the rocks as his enemies were mustering for pursuit, he came upon the clearing occupied by the stone hut where Toni had sought refuge, and as he espied Captain Cuttle standing on the threshold of that hut, he made straight for him, bundled him back into the interior of the dwelling and stepped in after him, slamming the door behind him as he entered.

Recoiling before the newspaper man, Cuttle glowered at him.

"Take it easy, young feller," he bit out. "Ye're on dangerous ground."

"You're telling me!" Larry retorted fiercely. "Listen, I don't know who you are, but have you seen anything of a girl around here? Come on, answer me—and talk fast!"

Captain Cuttle nodded towards the open trap-door.

"If you mean the Morrell girl, she went down there," he grunted.

Without pausing to launch any further questions, Larry bounded to the trap-door and started to climb down the ladder that reached to the underground realms below. As he gained the foot of that ladder Cuttle descended the rungs as well, shutting the trap-door in the process, and, joining the newspaper man, the skipper shone his torch towards the passage along which Toni had vanished.

"Go down there an' keep goin'," he said to Larry. "You'll eventually find the girl ye're lookin' for. She's on her way to a big house that stands a mile east o' the point where ye beached your launch."

Larry glanced at the tunnel Captain Cuttle had indicated, then switched his eyes on the old sea-dog again.

"Say, who are you, anyway?" he queried.

"Captain Cuttle's the name," was the reply. "Cap'n Cuttle, what's been on this island longer than any livin' man, and what has his quarters in a cabin aboard an old frigate that's set high an' dry among the rocks not far from Carter Collins' home. But ye were askin' after the Morrell girl, an' I've told ye where ye may find her."

Larry stared at him in silence for a spell. Then without another word he turned and made his way into the passage Toni had entered some time before, and presently the gloom of that passage swallowed him as it had swallowed the girl.

Captain Cuttle remained by the ladder, a thoughtful expression on his face, and a quarter of an hour must have elapsed ere the strange little seafaring man bestirred himself and shuffled over to a rock ledge on which a graven image in the form of a large frog was standing.

With a queer smile playing about his lips the skipper pressed one of the button-like eyes in that graven image, and at once the mouth of the sculptured frog yawned open, whereupon Cuttle spoke into it.

"Callin' Mr. Collins," he intoned. "Callin' the Shark!"

The words were transmitted to the lounge of Carter Collins' sombre residence, and Collins was in that lounge, receiving a report from Grindley, who had joined the owner of Treasure Island only a minute or so previously, and whose swollen jaw testified to the punishment he had recently received at the hands of Larry Kent.

Cuttle's voice interrupting the story Grindley was retailing Carter Collins turned sharply towards the basinet helmet which adorned the sideboard that stood against one wall of the room, for it was through the visor of the helmet in question that the old sea-dog's call had reached the apartment.

"Yes, captain, what is it?" Collins interrogated, bending towards the microphone that was concealed behind the visor.

"Your lady visitor is headed your way through the tunnel that leads from the hut near Crossbones Cape," came the response, "an' her gentleman friend is a-followin' her. That makes two more to divide the treasure with, hey?"

A raucous laugh in the skipper's voice succeeded that last comment—a comment which the Shark chose to ignore, but which seemed to irritate Grindley.

"Why don't you get rid of that old fool?" the latter snarled. "You ought to have thrown him off the island when you bought it. He gets on my nerves."

"If you had as much brains as Cuttle we'd probably have the treasure by now," Collins retorted, at which Grindley's upper lip curled derisively.

"Brains!" he scoffed. "He's as nutty as a fruit cake."

The Shark's eyes narrowed.

"You think so? Well, I don't, Grindley. But go on with your report."

"There's not much more to tell," his henchman growled. "I stowed away in that launch just before Kent and the Morrell girl li-jaeked it, and I was mixed up in the fight that your guards started when they tried to grab that smart-aleck reporter. Say, how did one of your Mole Men manage to make a break, anyhow?"

"Through carelessness on the part of Dreer. Don't worry, Dreer won't be so lax again. I've told him what will happen to him if any of the other diggers stage a getaway. H'm, I'm glad to hear, anyhow, that one of the shots we took at the Mole Man you refer to was effective—and that he died before he could say too much."

There was a silence, and then Grindley spoke again.

"What do you intend to do about Kent and Toni Morrell?" he asked. "I've found out that Kent is a pal of Thorndyke's, and as for the girl—well, I'm pretty sure Faxton gave her his half of the treasure map."

"But she may not have that half of the map on her," the other countered. "She may have memorised it. In any event, I'm going to give her a pretty free hand for the present—and her friend Kent, too. We'll see that they don't get off the island, but otherwise we'll treat them well enough for the time being and simply keep watch on them. If the girl thinks she and Kent have nothing to fear, she may get careless and give us some kind of a lead on that buried hoard of untold wealth I've been trying to find for years."

He paused, and a baleful glint showed in his eyes.

"Yes, she may get careless," he repeated, "and give us some kind of a lead that I can link up with my half of the map. Then with the treasure in my grasp—well, it will be curtains for her and Kent."

The Mine

ON leaving Captain Cuttle and entering the tunnel along which Toni had preceded him a little while earlier, Larry Kent felt his way forward through gloom that was at first almost opaque, but after blundering round a bend in the passage he saw a dim gleam of light ahead of him.

It proved to be the light of a lamp riveted to the rock wall of the tunnel, and in his onward progress he encountered several more of those lamps—all of them so shaded that they were calculated to be easy on the eyes of men who were doomed to spend most of their working hours in darkness.

Larry also came upon other passages that forked out of the one he was following and indicated to him that there was a perfect maze of subterranean corridors under the crust of the volcanic island. These other passages he ignored, however, keeping to that along which Captain Cuttle had despatched him, and at long last he turned a corner and discerned a small, wizened, white-haired customer standing beside a sort of dresser whose shelves were laden with bottles of wine.

The individual by the dresser was attired in the livery of a manservant, and he came forward to greet Larry as the young reporter put in an appearance.

"Ah, Mr. Kent, my master is expecting you," he said with a civility that did not ring true in Larry's ears. "I have already conducted Miss Morrell to him. She seemed greatly troubled on the score of your safety, and my master had some difficulty in setting her mind at rest."

Larry eyed him with suspicion.

"And who is your master?" he asked.

"Mr. Collins, of course. Some call him the Shark, and me the Pilot Fish, because I am generally to be found by his side. But my right name is Hawkins. Er, will you come this way, Mr. Kent?"

Larry followed him dubiously, holding himself in readiness for any eventuality, and a little later he was accompanying Collins' butler up a flight of stone steps. These terminated before a rock wall, but as Hawkins set his puny shoulder against that wall a section of it swung aside, and in another moment he and Larry were stepping through into the actual confines of the Shark's magnificent yet strangely oppressive residence—a residence of bleak stone, richly furnished, but in an antique style that had no semblance of real comfort—a house whose gloomy adornments repelled rather than attracted.

Larry and his guide had issued on to a wide staircase that dipped towards a spacious hall, and the panel by which they had gained admittance to Collins' home closing with a thud behind him, the newspaperman glanced uneasily over his shoulder. Then he looked at Hawkins, but next instant his eyes travelled past the butler and down to the centre of the hallway below.

There at a table laden with choice foodstuffs and agleam with silver cutlery and sparkling crystal sat Carter Collins, Toni Morrell, Grindley, and two other men and a woman whom Larry was later to know as Doctor X, Professor Gault and Zanya, that trio whose presence on the island the Shark considered necessary and who had been forced into his service.

At sight of Toni among that company of diners the reporter hurried down the stairs with Hawkins at his heels, and as he reached the table Toni started up from her chair to greet him fervently.

"Larry!" she gasped. "Thank heavens you're safe! I—I was worried about you!"

She was interrupted by Collins, who had also risen.

"And I have been doing my best to reassure her, Mr. Kent," the owner of Treasure Island observed smoothly. "I'm afraid I must apologise for the reception that was accorded you when you landed, but my guards have orders to check up on all strangers, and they are sometimes a little too enthusiastic. I shall reproach them, as I have already reproached Grindley here for taking it upon himself to employ tactics of which I disapprove."

He motioned to the rogue who had felt the weight of Larry's knuckles, and who now avoided Larry's eyes as the newspaperman directed a cursory glance at him. Then the reporter looked at the Shark again—uncertainly, not knowing what to make of his demeanour.

"You're Carter Collins," he said. "I recognise you from pictures I've seen of you."

"Yes, I am Carter Collins," was the reply. "But permit me to introduce my friends here."

He presented Zanya, Doctor X and Professor Gault, then invited Larry to take a vacant chair beside Toni, and when the representative of the San Pablo "Courier" had done so, spoke again in that same smooth tone.

"And now may I ask why you have honoured me with a visit to my humble home?" he inquired.

Larry's rugged face wore a grim expression. He was eyeing Collins narrowly. He did not trust the man, in view of all that had happened, and he sensed that his air of courtesy was a sham—a veneer that hid a character ruthless and despotic. Yet when he answered Collins' interrogation his voice was quiet, for he felt it was advisable under the circumstances to keep his temper in check.

"I work for a newspaper in Florida," he stated. "One of our men—a chap named Thorudye—was sent down here

In the bright glow of that light which fell from aloft Toni saw that the man who had addressed her and who was gripping her wrist was carrying a whip. *

to write a feature story on that volcano which dominates this island, and not having heard from him for several weeks my chief assigned me to the job of finding out what had happened to him."

"Thorndyke?" Carter Collins reiterated. "H'm, I can't recall anyone by the name of Thorndyke ever having visited this island. Can any of you?"

He looked round the table at Grindley, Professor Gault, Doctor X and Zanya, and they shook their heads, the last three with an uneasy mien that Larry was quick to notice.

"I'm afraid you're down here on a wild goose chase, Mr. Kent," Collins murmured then.

Larry did not think so. He was convinced that Carter Collins had lied, and that the others had backed him up in a denial that they knew to be false. He made no comment, however, and a brief silence ensued—a silence that Treasure Island's owner was the first to break.

"Miss Morrell," he remarked, turning his attention on Toni. "before Mr. Kent arrived on the scene you were telling us why you were here. If I remember rightly you mentioned that you had reason to believe your name was not really Morrell, and that your father, whom you have never seen, was down on this island. May I ask what makes you think he is here?"

"An old friend of his—a Captain Tom Faxton—gave me to understand that this is where I might locate him," the girl rejoined.

The Shark slid a glance towards Grindley, and then assumed a meditative expression.

"Faxton?" he mused. "Captain Tom Faxton? No. I don't believe I ever heard of him. Er, did he by any chance ever refer to treasure being buried here?"

Toni regarded him impassively.

"Yes, he did refer to treasure," she said. "But he merely touched on the subject, repeating the rumours that one usually hears about this place. I—"

And then she stopped, for at that instant there came a startling interruption, an interruption in the form of a muffled explosion which seemed to take place deep below ground and somewhere to the west of the house, the floor of the hall trembling slightly to the prolonged reverberations of it.

The company around the table looked at one another sharply. Then Grindley spoke, shrugging his shoulders.

"The Ghost is talkin' again," he announced.

"The Ghost?" Toni Morrell echoed dully.

"Grindley is referring to the volcano," Professor Gault interposed. "The old-time buccaneers who once made this island their headquarters used to call it Ghost Mountain, on account of their leader's method of dealing with any of his followers who incurred his displeasure. Known as the Black Pirate, that leader removed rebellious members of his enthrone band by having them taken up to the crater of the volcano and thrown into the molten lava. His men came to believe that the peak was haunted at nights by the spirits of his victims. Hence the name 'Ghost Mountain.'"

"We just call it the 'Ghost,'" he added. "And when it is a little more active than usual we often say the 'Ghost is talking again.' But there is no cause for alarm. There hasn't been a violent eruption here for two centuries, and in my opinion—"

Carter Collins cut him short. The owner of Treasure Island had risen from his chair.

February 25th, 1939.

"I'm not interested in your opinion, professor," he rapped out, "nor in your talk of Ghost Mountain. For that explosion we heard didn't come from the crater of the volcano as Grindley and you seem to imagine. It came from under the ground, and, unless I miss my guess, from the tunnels with which Nature has honeycombed this island."

He had scarcely spoken when a voice was heard issuing from the lounge adjoining the hall. Transmitted to the house via the microphone in the basinet helmet or the sideboard in that lounge, it was a voice which was couched in urgent accents, and a voice which Collins immediately recognised as Dreer's.

The Shark turned and hurried into the lounge, closing the door after him, and in a few seconds he was in conversation with the foreman in charge of his diggers.

"Yes, Dreer?" he barked. "What is it?"

"I'm callin' from the tunnels, Mr. Collins,—I was the response. "That explosion—I guess you heard it—it was caused by some o' the Mole Men. They got hold of that last depth bomb the professor manufactured to guard the approach to the island. They got hold of it and fixed a detonatin' cable to it. They planned to blow up the house, an' you with it, but luckily for you they misjudged the location of your home."

Carter Collins gritted his teeth.

"Dreer," he rasped, "your job is to keep watch on the Mole Men. You made one slip to-day when you let one of them stage a getaway. Now you let some of them make an attempt on my life—"

"I didn't know what they were up to," Dreer's voice broke in protestingly. "I hadn't any idea of what was goin' on until I came across them, heard 'em talkin', saw one of 'em ram down the plunger of the detonator and then heard the blast away along a side tunnel that they'd mistaken for the main one. Listen, Mr. Collins, you can't blame me for this. I can't keep a check on the movements of all of these men. Besides, you don't realise the mood they're in. They were tricked by you into comin' here, and they're plenty sore at the raw deal they're gettin'."

Collins spoke tersely.

"They'll know what a raw deal is if I set my guards on them," he said.

"By thunder, if I could spare any of the guards for spells of duty in the tunnels they'd make sure those Mole Men didn't get up to any mischief, but the island's shores have got to be watched for meddlesome interlopers. Anyway, I'll see that an example is made of the diggers responsible for letting off that mine. Meanwhile, you get back to your post, Dreer."

With that the Shark retraced his steps to the hall, and rejoining the group at the table there, he glanced at Larry and Toni.

"You may consider yourselves guests in my house," he said, "but I have just received news that compels me to shelve for the time being my duties as a host, and I suggest you retire for the night. Mr. Grindley will show you to your rooms."

Larry and Toni frowned, but thought it best to conform to his wishes, and neither of them having much appetite for the food on the table, they rose with Grindley and accompanied the latter up the staircase that ascended from the hall.

Reaching the head of that staircase, Grindley conducted them down a long corridor, finally halting between two doors situated on opposite sides of the passage.

"This is your room, Miss Morrell," he announced, indicating the door on the right. "And yours is on the left, Kent."

Bidding each other "good-night," Larry and Toni entered the apartments to which they had been conveyed. Larry discovering his to be furnished in a style similar to that which characterised the hall, a ponderous four-poster bed with a heavy canopy being the principal object in the room.

The young reporter paid little heed to that bed, however. He had no intention of retiring yet, and after waiting a minute or two he quietly opened the door of the apartment and looked out into the corridor.

Grindley had departed, and, having satisfied himself on that score, Larry stepped across the passage, knocked on the door of Toni's room, and called to her in a low voice.

She admitted him at once, and he entered to find her in an apartment almost identical to the one which had been placed at his disposal.

"Larry," she said, "I knew you'd want to have a talk with me. What are we going to do? I—I'm afraid of that man Collins. There's something about him that scares me, and in spite of his manner I'm sure he means us harm."

"I don't trust him any more than you do, Toni. I'm sure glad you didn't tell him about Faxton giving you his half of the map. You've still got it, haven't you?"

She nodded.

"Yes. It's in the haft of the dagger, and I've got the dagger on me. I half-expected Collins would have me searched, for he must have a good idea I know something about the chart. Grindley is in his pay, and Grindley was after that half of the map when he forced his way into my cabin aboard the steamer Dolphin. And Collins is out to find the treasure, Larry. I know that."

She told him of her encounter with Dreer and the Mole Men, and when she had mentioned Dreer's reference to the Shark's quest for the spoil of the buccaneers Larry was silent for a moment. Then he addressed her earnestly:

"I don't know why Collins didn't have you searched, Toni," he said, "unless it was because he isn't sure that you have your half of the map with you, and wants to give you plenty of freedom in the hope that you'll inadvertently guide him to the long-lost hoard. Anyhow, our best plan is to wait and see what happens, and trust to luck. One thing I feel certain of—he won't let us off the island if he can help it."

Toni bit her lip.

"I don't want to leave the island," she declared, "until I've learned the identity of my father. In any case, I think I may have found a friend in Captain Cattle."

"You mean that old seafaring man with the hook."

"Yes," Toni answered. "If he was on the level—"

She broke off all at once, and caught at the reporter's sleeve.

"Larry," she exclaimed, "perhaps he's my father! He's been on this island longer than anyone else, and when I told him my name it seemed to startle him. Perhaps he's my father, but for some reason best known to himself didn't admit it to me."

Larry considered that possibility—was still considering it when suddenly a sound like a clap of thunder smote the air. It was a sound that resembled the explosion which had occurred in the

(Continued on page 23)

"THE PAINTED DESERT"

(Continued from page 14)

he suddenly pulled his horse to a standstill and, taking steady aim, fired at the pursuer.

Clark was taken by surprise. He reeled in his saddle as the heavy six-gallon bullet tore into his shoulder. Bob galloped on, disappearing into the darkness, while Clark, clutching his shoulder, joined Fawcett and Kincaid.

"We got one of the outfits, but the other one got through," Kincaid was just reporting to his chief.

"What about McVey?"

"He got through," mumbled Clark. "He turned his outfit over to the other and headed for the mine on the guard's horse. He beat me to it."

"That means but one thing," Fawcett grunted angrily. "He'll load a couple more wagons and start out again, and this time he'll have plenty of armed men."

"There's only one way to stop him, and that's to wreck the mine! Clark, you beat it into town and tell Burke to come out here. Kincaid and I'll meet him at the mine!"

Unaware of his enemy's new plan, Bob reached the mine, his horse in a lather of sweat. Carol and Yukon Kate came running out, and a crowd of miners joined them.

"No time for questions, folks," Bob rapped. "We've got to get ten tons of ore milled and loaded to-night. Can we do it?"

"Yes!" A mighty shout.

Bob told them how the wagons had been stampered.

"I bet Fawcett had something to do with it!" Kate snapped.

"So do I," growled Placer Bill, his big fists clenching.

"You're probably both right," said Bob. "but there's no way we can prove it. Now listen"—he turned to the men—"there's a thousand dollars bonus for the bunch that gets the first wagon loaded. Go to it!"

Full of enthusiasm, the men rushed away to the workings. Carol and Kate busied themselves preparing coffee and sandwiches. Bob himself rolled up his sleeves and joined the miners, despite his previous exertions. As he had told Carol:

"If we can't get two wagon loads full of ore into town to-morrow, we're going to be out of the mining business!"

Feverishly the work went on all through the night, the mills pounding away, crushing the crude ore brought from the galleries by small trucks. By the time dawn broke over the hills, the second wagon was pulled up under the loading platform and relays of men were hurling sacks of the tungsten ore into it.

Gulping a cup of coffee, Bob supervised the hitching up of his mule-team, with Carol standing beside him. Steve and all the boys from the ranch were to accompany the wagons this time, and Placer Bill was already perched on Bob's wagon behind the driver's seat, rifle in his hand.

"We're all set, Bob! Ready to go!" he called.

"Good! See that everything's clear," Bob replied.

He climbed to his seat, waved to Carol and Yukon Kate, and they were off again. Slowly the two wagons began to move.

"Kate, I'm afraid," murmured Carol. "Suppose something happens to him?"

"You love him, don't you?" said

Kate. "Well, in that case you might as well know something you're bound to find out sooner or later."

"What d'you mean, Kate?" Carol's eyes were wide.

"Well, Bill told me you never did really own this mine."

Carol's hand went to her mouth as she stared after the slowly retreating wagons. Then she and Kate whirled round as there came the wail of a siren from the direction of the workings, repeated at regular intervals.

Everybody stood stock-still, eyes wide with speculation.

"It's the emergency signal!" roared Bob, pulling his team to a standstill. "Come on, Bill!"

Followed by Bill at a slower speed, he raced back to the workings, where a crowd of men had already collected.

"What's the trouble? Who set that signal off?"

"I did, Mr. McVey," said a grey-haired man in a miner's helmet. "I just found a big charge of dynamite in tunnel No. 3 that didn't belong there, so I thought I'd better get the men out and find out what's going on!"

"Nice work!" rapped Bob, clenching his fists. "Take the women down by the wagons, quick! Come on, Bill!"

A tense silence fell as Bob and Bill raced to the nearest entrance. If there were more charges in there the whole mine might go up at any moment!

Dynamite

WHILE attention was concentrated on the mills and loading platform, Fawcett and his two assistants had found it easy to enter the workings. With the knowledge gained by Burke and Kincaid while they were working there, the crooks were able to place dynamite charges at the points where it would do most damage.

Fawcett and Burke were working on the large charge when Kincaid joined them.

"I got the two upper drifts and the big charge on top all set," he announced.

"All right," grunted Fawcett. "Soon as we get this set, we'll light them up."

They had already lit one or two of the remoter charges when, faint and far away, the regular wails of the siren were heard.

They speeded up, gradually working through the tunnels towards the biggest and final charge.

There Bob and Placer Bill, rushing round a corner with lights in their hands, found them as they set off the last fuse. Fawcett whirled round, pulling his gun.

Bob came on him like a cyclone, smashing a furious punch to his chin that sent him hurtling into a corner.

Placer Bill took on Kincaid, and Bob mixed it with Burke. Desperately they bashed away at each other, the tang of the burning fuse in their nostrils, and in their minds the knowledge that any of the other charges might explode at any moment.

Bob and Placer

Bill smashed their opponents down, and Bob dragged Kincaid to his feet, while Fawcett was just shaking his head and recovering.

Then, far away, they heard a dull boom, and Kincaid's face turned paper white. To the watchers outside that first explosion made a startling sight. A great slab of the mountainside seemed to be hurled outwards in a cloud of dust, followed by a gout of yellow, dirty smoke.

Carol hid her eyes, not daring to think what might be happening to the man she loved in those dark tunnels.

The explosion was far enough away to leave the men in the tunnel in momentary safety. But Kincaid was now cowering in Bob's grasp.

"We got to get out of here," he whimpered. "The whole mine will go up at any minute!"

"Shut up, you!" snarled Burke, and got a blow across the mouth from Bill for his pains.

"What d'you mean?" snapped Bob.

"It was Fawcett's idea! He had Banning killed, and now he's trying to wreck the mine so he can take it away from you."

Bob turned to Bill while the regular monotonous wails of the siren, softened by distance, broke the silence. He heard a scuffle, and was just in time to see Fawcett scramble to his feet and dash away round a bend in the tunnel. The game was up!

"You take these fellows out of here!" Bob ordered Bill. "I'm going after Fawcett!"

Burke and Kincaid were only too glad to rush away ahead of Placer Bill, making for the open. They knew better than Bob what was likely to happen at any moment, for they had laid and lit the charges.

Bob swung round and started to run along the tunnel in the direction taken by the fleeing mines promoter.

He had gone only a few steps when a terrific roar sounded ahead, round a bend. Bob was hurled backwards, staggering before a mighty blast of hot air. The roof ahead of him caved in with a crash. Dirt and flying stones rained on him, stinging his head and face, so that he had to fling his arms up to protect his eyes.

Is Your Future in the FLEET AIR ARM?

Intelligent young men required for training as Air Mechanics (no experience required) for the FLEET AIR ARM, age limits 17½ to 25. Interesting, progressive career. Good pay, excellent food, pleasant companions, free uniform.

CONTINUOUS SERVICE—12 years from age of 18 or date of entry if older, with prospect of re-engagement for a further ten years to qualify for a pension, or SPECIAL SERVICE—7 years in the Fleet and 5 years in the Reserve, with possibility of transfer, if selected, to continuous service.

A LEAFLET, giving full particulars of pay and prospects, is obtainable from any Recruiting Office, address of which will be found in the Booklet, "The Royal Navy as a Career and How to Join It" free on demand at any Post Office or Recruiting Station.

LONDON: 85 Whitehall, S.W. 1. DEVONPORT: New Passage Hill. BRISTOL: 121 Victoria St. BIRMINGHAM: 5-6 Edgbaston St. MANCHESTER: Lords House, Albert Sq. LEEDS: 21 New Station St. NEWCASTLE: 184 Westmorland Rd. GLASGOW: 303 Bath St. EDINBURGH: 22 Haddington Place, Leith St. ABERDEEN: 52 Market St.

or write to: Recruiting Staff Officer (F.A.A./N), 85, Whitehall, London, S.W. 1.

THE ROYAL NAVY

When the dust cleared, he saw that the tunnel was completely blocked. Fawcett must have been right on top of that charge when it exploded. There was no hope for him.

Bob turned, and was not ashamed to run like a hare back along the dark passages, running a grim race with death. When the next charge went off, he might not be so lucky. The horrible fate that had overtaken the crook might be his, too.

He dashed out into the open, waving away the men who were still waiting at the tunnel mouths. Down the slope he dashed, yelling for everybody to run for their lives.

Men came racing after him, tripping over, rolling over and over down the loose slope in their mad dash.

Placer Bill, gripping the trembling arms of Burke and Kincaid, was standing by the wagons with Carol and Kate, watching tensely, when Bob and the mob with him cleared the buildings. Out across the open ground they streamed—then Carol gasped as two more charges exploded with mighty concussions, shaking the ground they were standing on.

The whole of the mountainside seemed to collapse, falling with surprising slowness. A great shower of rocks, small stones and yellow dust mushroomed outwards and crashed on the loading platforms and the mills.

Bob and his men had got clear just in time. Even so they were pounded by flying stones as they ran, and by the time Bob joined his friends he was covered with dust.

White-faced, Carol ran to him and flung her arms around him. With an arm round her waist, Bob stood staring glumly at the wreckage. Rumbling crashes still sounded as rocks, loosened by the explosions, careered down the slopes. The wooden buildings had been pounded to matchwood, and as the noise died down, thin streamers of smoke rose on all sides.

"Fawcett planned that," Bob said quietly, "and got caught in his own trap. These two fellows confessed everything. All right, boys, tie them up and turn them over to the sheriff."

Bob watched Burke and Kincaid being escorted away on horseback, with their hands tied behind them. Then he helped Carol up on to the leading wagon. With Kate and Placer Bill sitting behind them, he took the reins and once more the wagon-loads of ore got on the move.

"Well, Carol, I guess we'll have to start all over again. But as soon as we deliver this ore, we'll have enough money to start rebuilding."

"You're the one that'll have to start rebuilding, Bob. I know now that you own the mine."

Bob glanced at her averted face, and grinned. "You mean you don't want us to be partners?"

"Yes, but—" She stopped, blushing.

Bob's muscular arm went round her as Steve and the other riders started surging.

"Well, couldn't we start a new partnership—for life?" he chuckled.

(By permission of RKO Radio Pictures, Ltd., starring George O'Brien and Laraine Johnson.)

DON'T FORGET YOUR FREE GIFTS NEXT WEEK. FULL DETAILS
ON PAGE 27.

February 25th, 1939.

"IT'S IN THE AIR"

(Continued from page 10)

"Hey, you!" he called out. "Come over here."

George shrugged his shoulders. It was fate.

"Run up the engine while I telephone."

"Run it up, sir?"

"Yes, they want to test the radio"

"Please, sir, couldn't you get someone else, sir?" cried George. "I—"

"Don't be silly," interrupted the pilot, who had a girl he had to telephone. "She's just like any other machine. The clocks are in position, so you're quite safe. Go on—don't dither."

"Very good, sir."

"You'll find the throttle on this side

—and be careful how you hold the joystick."

"Careful, sir?"

"You might press one of the machine-gun triggers."

"And that'd be wrong, sir, wouldn't it?"

"Very," the pilot laughed. "Particularly as they're loaded with ammunition."

George approached the machine nervously. Before climbing in he looked round for a last hope of being able to make a dash for it. The pilot pointed towards the machine, and

George realised there was no alternative. The pilot waited whilst George clambered into the forward cockpit.

Craig, deep down in the observer's cockpit, was busy examining the radio.

The noise of the engine drowned all sound.

Peggy and Anne turned the corner of the hangar. Anne had come down with Bob, and she had brought Scruffy.

The two girls were talking about the fate that threatened poor George, but the watchful eyes of Scruffy recognised the overalled figure clambering into the machine, and with a woof he was off to greet his lost master.

Scruffy barked furiously round the machine to attract George's attention, but the engine drowned the sound.

George thought he had better do things properly, so fitted on the pilot's helmet and then looked round nervously.

Craig's head appeared over the rear cockpit, and he could only see the back of the pilot's helmet.

"All ready, sir!" he shouted.

George heard a distant voice, and did not realise it was Craig. He was looking round for the throttle, and he found it as Scruffy observed the rope attached to one of the choeks. The dog gripped it in his teeth, and away came the choek.

The aeroplane hesitated for a moment on the remaining choek, then swung round, slipped over a corner of the choek, and careered madly across the aerodrome.

What a Pilot!

GEORGE had hurt a finger, and

Peggy had put a bandage on it.

Just a minute scratch, but it would decide to come undone and get all mixed up in the throttle and the quadrant, thus preventing him pulling back the throttle.

Suddenly he glanced ahead and saw some trees hurtling towards him. Suddenly the loop of the bandage broke.

He grabbed at the joy-stick, which he thought was some kind of brake, and next moment George was staring at the sky. Corks! He was off the ground and soaring towards the clouds. He managed to glance over the side, and suffered an acute attack of vertigo when he realised the distance he was from the earth.

All this while Craig thought it was the real pilot who had taken off. He spoke into a mike.

"Apparently no time for ground test. We're already in the air. Hope you can hear O.K."

Now it chanced that the C.O. and Sir Philip were in the radio-room, and the latter was being instructed how one could keep in touch with craft in the air, when Craig's message blared forth on the loudspeaker.

"Hallo, sir," gasped the C.O. "She's taken off."

"Why?" demanded Sir Philip.

"Must have been some misunderstanding."

"Never mind. I'm quite ready."

The two men hastened outside in time to witness the machine soaring upwards. What they did not see was the frantic efforts of the pilot to get out of the telephone-booth. A lorry had pulled up outside the door, so close that he could not open the door. The pilot was frantic, because he could see the fighter in the air.

George pushed the joy-stick forward, and next moment he was diving straight for a hangar at two hundred miles an hour.

"Being a bit reckless, isn't he?" questioned the C.O.

"Well, I expect the fact that I'm watching, you know," smugly murmured Sir Philip. "Better pass him a message saying that I'm watching and ready to see what she can do."

The C.O. entered the radio hut, whilst the adjutant stood by Sir Philip to answer any questions.

George grabbed the joy-stick as he saw the earth approaching. Just in time. The machine whistled over the top of a hangar. The ambulance, with its stretcher-bearers, thought they were going to have work to do. The machine zoomed upwards, and somehow, at the top of the zoom, George got into a loop. It was about the quickest loop on record, so both men had no chance of falling out. Needless to say, Craig was strapped in. George, out of the loop, and gasping like a stranded fish, decided that that stunt might happen again, so he fixed the straps so badly that he got into an awful mess. He got free in time to prevent the machine removing the roof of "D" barracks.

Craig bobbed up.

"Message from Sir Philip!" he called out. "Show him all you know."

"I don't know anything!" cried the frantic George.

Craig leaned forward, and did his eyes bulge at sight of George. He tried to grip George as if it might restore his reason. That made George push the joy-stick forward, and once more the machine was hurtling earthwards.

"Pull the stick back!" the corporal screamed.

But George did not hear, and the machine dived towards two of the hangars. All the airmen flung themselves flat, and by some lucky chance George had enough sense to pull back the stick. The machine flattened out, roared between the two hangars, zoomed upwards, skimmed over some trees and began to climb.

"What a pilot!" acclaimed Sir Philip. "Brilliant!"

At the top of the climb the machine stalled, and then started a spin that made George feel like a top.

The pilot had at last gained the attention of the lorry driver, and on getting free he rushed off to find the C.O. He found this officer in the radio hut.

"Who the devil are you?" demanded the C.O.

"The pilot of that machine!" he raved. "That's one of your mechanics up there. Took off while I was telephoning."

"Mechanic? Which one?"

"I don't know. Face like a horse and a row of teeth like a graveyard."

"But this is awful!" muttered the C.O., as he realised the full purport of the pilot's statement.

"Who's at the controls?" the radio operator asked.

"That half-witted uke player," came Craig's answer.

"Uke player?" The C.O. looked at his sergeant-major.

"I might have guessed it."

"Guessed what?"

"It's a man who's been masquerading in Air Force uniform, sir," explained the S.M. "I was just going to report him, sir."

"Just going to! What the devil's the use of that?" raved the C.O. "If Sir Philip finds out, it'll mean court-martial for me and everyone on the station. What the devil are we going to do?"

"Pass instructions and hope for the best, sir," suggested the pilot.

"Then for heaven's sake get busy!" cried the frantic C.O. "Somehow or other that fighter must be got down and the man arrested without Sir Philip knowing."

"Now listen carefully." The pilot took over the microphone. "I'm going to pass instructions for landing—"

"If you think I'm going to sit here while he tries to land, you're all darned well mistaken!" came the frantic bellow from the loudspeaker.

Corporal Craig took off his helmet and pushed it into George's cockpit.

"Those are your friends wishing you luck!" Craig shouted, as he fiddled with his parachute. "Sorry I can't stop, but I've got an urgent appointment."

Whereupon Corporal Craig jumped, and George looked round and was in time to see him drop. The parachute opened and floated gracefully earthwards.

George had staggered out of that spin about five hundred feet from the ground. How he did it was a miracle that took him many months of training to find out.

It was the operator who suggested to his C.O. that if Corporal Craig had left his helmet with the ear-phones attached, the pilot might be able to hear the messages.

"If you can hear me, push the stick to one side and lower the wing!" the pilot called out.

George heard, but, of course, he overdid the instructions, and the fighter tilted over dangerously, and proceeded to execute a series of barrel rolls. Those below watched in horror.

"There's no doubt he can hear all right," the pilot said with bitter sarcasm.

"Brilliant! Brilliant!" Sir Philip was rubbing his hands. "But who told the operator to jump out?"

"I expect he's had about enough, sir," the adjutant said with feeling.

"Enough?" Sir Philip was most indignant. "He should consider it a privilege to fly with such a pilot. Go and find out the name of the pilot. I wish to be the first to congratulate him on landing."

Meanwhile, the pilot was trying to advise George.

"Pull back that lever to the left."

Of course, George pulled the one on the right, and as a result the under-carriage retracted under the fuselage.

The adjutant appeared.

"Sir Philip's delighted, sir," he reported. "And wants to know the name of the pilot."

At that moment George, trying to adjust Craig's helmet so that he could hear, stood up to get some more cable, and his foot pushed against the joystick. The machine went into a steep dive. It was hurtling earthwards vertically. The stretcher-bearers got out their stretcher and rubbed their hands—a job at last.

"This is the end!" cried the C.O., staring upwards from the window of the radio hut.

The machine hurtled towards the tarmacs, came out of the dive at the critical moment, and whistled through the open door of a hangar. Everyone waited for the crash, but George had got used to guiding the machine, and he whistled through the open doors at the other end of the hangar. He zoomed upwards.

Feeling frantically round, George saw a red knob and decided to press it. Two bombs hurtled earthwards, and an old barn went up in smoke. Sir Philip thought it was a marvellous shot.

Peggy came into the radio hut and saw the looks on the faces of all there.

"What's the matter, dad?" she asked.

"Matter?" snarled the S.M. "That half-wit of yours is at the controls."

"It's hopeless." The pilot turned to the C.O. "He can't even understand right and left."

"I think I could make him understand." Boldly Peggy stepped forward.

"May I try?"

"I don't care who tries!" hopelessly cried the C.O. "Let the whole world try."

George was a speck in the heavens. He had got over his nerves. He had learnt how to keep this whizzing greyhound of the air flying a fairly even course. It was rather fun banking, but he could not stay up here all day.

"George, it's Peggy speaking. Listen carefully."

"Tell him to press forward the lever on his left," whispered the pilot.

"Press forward the lever on the side of your bandaged finger," was the way Peggy gave her instructions.

"It's worked! It's worked!" shouted the C.O., as the retracted under-carriage came down to landing position. "But he's bound to crash when he lands."

The C.O. decided that Sir Philip must not be a witness. He instructed the adjutant to take Sir Philip into the mess, and to prevent him seeing this madman land.

"Wind back the wheel on the no-

Get these Gifts FREE! Here's how . . .

DARTS BOARD
12" diameter cork-faced, with three loaded, feather-end darts.
87 Coupons and Free Voucher.

WATCH Nickel-plated Crown Maxim Keyless lever—a good time-keeper.
168 Coupons and Free Voucher.

BOX OF PAINTS
Full range of colours in tubes and blocks, complete with brush.
45 Coupons and Free Voucher.

BLOW FOOT-BALL GAME
Something to make you laugh. Get it!
33 Coupons and Free Voucher.

MODEL AEROPLANE Wind elastic, and it flies like a bird! 17" x 19".
84 Coupons and Free Voucher.

DON'T just wish you had these nice things. Thousands of boys and girls got them free—so can you! Just ask Mother to buy Rowntree's Cocoa. In every tin are Free Gift Coupons—3 in the 4-lb. size. Start collecting now! Then exchange the coupons for the gift you want. (Rowntree's Table Jellies have coupons too!)

SHOW THIS TO YOUR MOTHER
Rowntree's Cocoa is made by a special "pre-digestive" process, so that, besides being more digestible itself, it actually aids digestion. It helps children to get more body-building nourishment out of all their other food as well.

★ Hundreds of other Free Gifts to choose from. For the complete list of boys' and girls' gifts, send a postcard (postage 1d.) to Dept. PC60, Rowntree & Co. Ltd., The Cocoa Works, York. You will also receive a Free Voucher, value three coupons, to help on your collection.

BE A BILLIARD CHAMPION!

Learn to play like a real "crack" on your OWN table. Send for catalogue of Rileys "Home" Billiard Tables.

E. J. RILEY, LTD., Ensign Works, ACCRINGTON, or Dept. 36, 46-47, Newgate St., LONDON, E.C.1.

INCREASED HEIGHT means Popularity and Success

Added inches are important to-day and they are easily attained with one box of Challoner's Famous Formula and easy system. Well tried and safe. No strenuous exercises or old-fashioned appliances. If one box is insufficient we guarantee to supply a further box FREE. A. L. (Wilts), writes: "Since I started your Treatment I have gained 3 inches in height." Act now! Full particulars 1/6d. Sample 7/6d. Book on height improvement 3/6d., stamps or P.O. only. Sent under plain sealed cover.

H. T. N. TABLETS

THE CHALLONER CO. (late Bond Street), Dept. V.38, Laboratory and Works: Hyde Heath, Amersham, Bucks
February 25th, 1939.

BE SURE TO MENTION "BOY'S CINEMA" WHEN COMMUNICATING WITH ADVERTISERS

bandage side," instructed Peggy, prompted by the pilot. "Pull back the throttle, bandage side. Ease the stick back—not too much—not too much," as the nose of the machine went up in the air.

"Press left foot forward," cried the pilot.

"Press foot forward—bandage side," cried Peggy.

George had a perilously close shave with a tree, then he skinned a hedge, but he was now only a short distance from the ground. Could he make it?

"Well done, George," cried Peggy. "Keep everything where it is and hold tight."

George closed his eyes in anticipation of the crash, gripped the joystick firmly as he had been told, and by a fluke made a very fair landing.

"It's all right," cried Peggy. "You're down!"

No one had bothered about Corporal Craig, but it might be of interest to some that he alighted right in the middle of a sewage farm!

The sergeant-major was all for going out and arresting George, and the C.O. would have agreed if the adjutant had not appeared.

"Sir Philip's finished a whole bottle of sherry," he stated. "And is now phoning headquarters recommending the pilot for promotion."

"But how can he get promotion if he's not even in the Air Force?" wildly demanded the C.O.

The S.M. had left the radio hut and was hurrying across the tarmac. There was a crowd round the machine. The S.M. gripped George by the shoulder. It was then that the C.O., who seldom ran, came panting into the picture.

"What the devil are you doing with that airman?"

"He's not an airman, sir, he's—"

"Of course he's an airman," the C.O. spoke loudly for all the men to hear, then he jerked the sergeant-major close to him. "Or, if he's not by to-morrow morning, the Air Force will be short of a sergeant-major."

"You mean I can join the Air Force and learn to fly, sir?" cried George.

"Of course you can," cried the C.O., and did a most astonishing thing—shook George's hand.

Then Craig, not very pretty and not smelling too sweet, staggered forward.

"I can tell you something about him, sir," he shouted vindictively.

"You keep your mouth shut!" the C.O. shouted at him. "You're under arrest for deserting your machine."

And at the concert the biggest hit of the evening was Corporal George Brown when he sang his famous ditty, "It's In The Air."

"It's in the air,
This funny feeling ev'rywhere
That makes me sing without a care to-day

As I go on my way,
It's in the air,
It's in the air,
There's great excitement here and there,

The sun is shining ev'rywhere
And Spring makes ev'rybody sing.
It's in the air,
Zoom, zoom, zoom, zoom,
High and low
Zoom, zoom, zoom, zoom.

Here we go,
It's in the air
I feel so smart and debouair
I must warn each lady fair,
Beware, look out and have a care,
It's in the air,
It's in the air!"

(By permission of Associated British Film Distributors, Ltd., starring George Formby.)

February 25th, 1933.

"ESCAPE FROM YESTERDAY"

(Continued from page 18)

Two prison farm, and to follow those two men who have escaped. You are to bring them back alive or dead."

For some moments Johnny stood still; Flynn was watching him.

Then at last he spoke almost mechanically.

"Yes, sergeant."

Flynn laid his hand on his shoulder. "I rely on you. Corporal Simpkins," he said quietly. "You're in the army, remember."

"Yes, sergeant."

Twenty minutes later Johnny and his squad rode out. The men confided in each other that they had never seen him looking so stern.

The Last Round-up

HIGH up in the old disused silo, with the darkness closing up around them, two men stood in the shadows. Desperate, hunted-looking men they were with guns in their hands. When they addressed each other, after gazing steadily out of the opening before them at a horseman who had just ridden up and dismounted, it was in low, puzzled tones.

"It's Johnny."

"Something's up. He wasn't due until day after to-morrow."

Balan peered over.

"What's up, Johnny?" he said softly.

The man below answered slowly and with dreadful reluctance in his weary voice.

"I've come to take you back, Mike," he said.

It came as a thunderbolt to Balan. It struck him momentarily dumb, depriving him of all senses. He scarcely even saw his companion lift his gun. It was not till he heard the shot that he leaped to the opening just in time to see Johnny stagger and fall.

"You've killed—my—son!" he said.

Then he swung round, and his gun spoke twice in quick succession. As the other crumpled up he knelt by his side.

THIS WEEK'S CASTS

"IT'S IN THE AIR"

George Brown.....George Formby
Peggy.....Polly Ward
Commanding Officer....Garry Marsh
Sergeant Major.....Julien Mitchell
Corporal Craig.....Jack Hobbs
Sir Philip Bargrave C. Denier Warren
Adjutant.....Michael Shepley
Nobby.....Hal Gordon
Anne Brown.....Ilena Sylva
Bob Bullock.....Frank Leighton

"THE PAINTED DESERT"

Bob McVey.....George O'Brien
Carol Banning....Laraine Jolunson
Steve.....Ray Whitley
Placer Bill.....Stanley Fields
Hugh Fawcett.....Fred Kohler
Kincaid.....Max Wagner
Burke.....Harry Cording
Yukon Kate.....Maude Allen
Heist.....William V. Mong

"ESCAPE FROM YESTERDAY"

Mike Balan.....Akim Tamiroff
Johnny Simpkins.....Leif Erikson
Trina.....Frances Farmer
Oklahoma.....Lynne Overman
Colonel Stuart.....John Miljan
Sergeant Flynn.....J. M. Kerrigan
Glinka.....Vladimir Sokoloff

"I had to do it! I had to do it! He was my son and if you've killed him—"

He stopped. From without came the sound of laborious, dragging footsteps. The dying man smiled.

"He ain't no quitter that son of yours," he said. "I reckon I only winged him. Say, Mike, let's do this every day. It relieves the monotony and—"

Balan stood staring down at him. He heard Johnny's voice behind him.

"Who's that?"

"My friend—Oklahoma," replied his father.

"Dead?"

"Yes. Are you hurt, Johnny?"

"It's nothing. I've come to take you back, Mike."

Silence for a moment, with the dead man lying between them. Balan spoke slowly, just like his old self.

"It's too bad we couldn't see more of each other, Johnny. But I don't think in a hundred years I would know you better."

"I've come to take you back, Mike," repeated the boy dully. "Oh, why didn't he shoot straighter?"

He had lowered his gun miserably. Balan laid his hand on his shoulder.

"Because it is your fate to be a good man, Johnny," he replied with his old smile, "and nobody can avoid his fate. I find now I can't wash the dirt off as I thought I could. It sticks, and sticks. So we have to say good-bye, Johnny, because it is your duty to bring me in and—"

The next moment his fist had caught the younger man under the jaw, and he saw him stagger back and slide to the floor. For one brief second he stood there gazing sadly down on him.

"Good-bye, Johnny," he murmured, and in a few moments was down the stairs. Outside stood Johnny's horse, on to which he leaped and spurred away.

Actually he had no idea of where he was going, and it was not until he came to the swollen, flooded river barring his way that he drew rein. But even as he turned his horse he heard sounds of galloping hoofs, and a troop of horsemen came in sight, shouting to him to surrender.

"Good-bye, Johnny!" he whispered once more, and set his horse to the stream.

The troopers pulled up their horses on the bank. They had been in time to see horse and rider whirled on to the jagged rocks; they had been in time to see Balan wave farewell to them before the turbid waters swallowed him up.

(By permission of Paramount Pictures, Ltd., starring Akim Tamiroff and Leif Erikson.)

"OUR SERGEANT MAJOR"

Sung by GEORGE FORMBY

"He sticks out his chest,
Two pillows in his vest,
A bolster under his rotunda
Our Sergeant Major,
His medals break our hearts,
He won them playing darts,
And while competing who was cheating?"

Our Sergeant Major!
He's far away the worst friend we've ever had,

When he's far away we'll be mighty glad,

In the canteen bar,
You know what sergeants are!
When we've past out, who's the last out?

Our Sergeant Major!"

All letters to the Editor should be addressed to BOY'S CINEMA, Room 194, The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4.

Miss He Must

A visitor stared in awed silence as he watched Marksman Ben Southland, high-powered rifle at his shoulder, spray leaden slugs into the swamp water, inches from the moving body of Peter Lorre. It was for a scene in 20th Century-Fox's new picture, "Mr. Moto in Porto Rico."

After the scene had been made the visitor was introduced to Lorre, who plays the title rôle.

"Aren't you afraid you'll be hit?" he queried.

"Of course not," Lorre replied soberly. "If Mr. Southland hits me he loses his job."

Film Stars of To-day are Tough

To-day's generation of film stars is the hardest working, most earnest and by far the most versatile in all the history of films. Stars of yesteryear were cream-puffs by comparison.

So declares Tully Marshall, prominent screen actor since 1916, who has seen them all come and go, and knows the difference between pictures past and present from his own experience. Marshall, whose latest rôle is in David O. Selznick's "Made for Each Other," co-starring Carole Lombard and James Stewart, says:

"You hear a lot of talk about how hard actors worked in the good old days, but don't believe it for a moment. Why, when I was in such pictures as 'Intolerance,' 'He Who Gets Slapped,' and a lot of the other silents, it wasn't half as tough as it is now.

"Admittedly, we used to handle our own make-up, and we had no doubles for dangerous scenes in those days, but we didn't have to go home nights to memorise and practice dialogue, we had no microphone dangling over our heads on the sets, and our production schedules, compared to present ones, were virtually 'quickies.' It was even possible for an actor to walk on the set unprepared, for the director could talk to him while shooting was in progress, and guide his actions. Now it's study, study, and more study, between scenes, at meal times and on Sundays. For a soft touch, I'll take the old silents."

Marshall, who was on the stage for twenty-three years before he entered films, starting before the invention of the first movie camera, plays a dual rôle in "Made for Each Other." He is the Higgins twins, and talks to himself on the screen.

Hollywood Stars at Play

There's never a dull moment at a Hollywood party.

Whenever entertainment begins to lag, various guests are called upon to delve into their respective bags of tricks with results that would undoubtedly amaze their "fans."

Joan Crawford, who recently completed her first dancing rôle in five years in the production, "The Shining Hour," is generally the target of all who desire to learn the last word in ball-room dances. Joan has them all at the tips of her toes, and holds informal classes whenever requested during an evening of fun.

Music lovers are always happy to corner the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer actor, Melvyn Douglas. Although few know it, Douglas is a pianist and composer of real merit, and hours of evening get-togethers are spent about the piano over which Douglas presides, performing request numbers for the crowd.

Whenever the party is in need of laughs, Mickey Rooney is called on the carpet. As a tiny lad, Mickey excelled in impersonations, and he has lost none of his talent. They are all good-natured caricatures which never fail to provoke gales of laughter from the guests.

The parties and gatherings numbering Jeanette MacDonald among the guest list are never complete without a song from the star. Her favourite stunt is to sing a duet with a recording. Nelson Eddy is another song specialist, and Virginia Bruce is an ardent exponent of the community song spirit, playing accom-

MORE FREE GIFTS NEXT WEEK!

Clark Gable, Myrna Loy

Lorna Grey, Paul Kelly

These 2 PHOTO-CARDS FREE in Boy's CINEMA NEXT WEEK!

payments for the group on the piano. Then there are Maureen O'Sullivan and husband, John Villiers Farrow, who never fail to baffle guests with a clever mind-reading stunt, and Judy Garland, who can get a hard-boiled egg down through the neck of a milk bottle in some amazing way that no one so far has found out.

As far as Frank Morgan is concerned, well, give Morgan a pack of cards and he can keep any number of guests amused for hours. His selection of tricks runs into the hundreds.

Thus, the entertainment problem in Hollywood solves itself. The custom for informal "get-togethers" has developed talents in the stars that even they, themselves, didn't know they possessed.

"Wild Bill Hickok's" Guns Bark Again

The guns which Gary Cooper carried as Wild Bill Hickok in "The Plainsman" will bark again in "Union Pacific."

Owned by Cecil B. DeMille, they were recently taken down from the peg in his office where they have hung for two years, and buckled on Joel McCrea.

Brilliantly nickel-plated, with horn handles and mounted in slim black holsters, they are supposed to be exact copies of Wild Bill Hickok's own guns. McCrea uses them in the rôle of a "trouble-shooter" assigned to keep peace along the right of way as the Union Pacific, the first transcontinental railway, is being laid across the States.

He Learned About Muscles From Vic

Standing among the many Arab extras working in "Chasing Danger" at 20th Century-Fox, is one fellow who doesn't have to depend on movies with a desert background for his bread and butter.

He is known simply as Abdullah, and his story is worth noting.

During the war, when Victor McLaglen was Provost-Marshal of Baghdad, Abdullah was a ten-year-old youngster—member of a band of Arabs who roamed that sector. McLaglen ran across him one day on the desert and brought him to Baghdad, making a home for the young fellow. During the next few years Abdullah learned about boxing and the English language under Victor's tutelage. He finally went to America with McLaglen eighteen years ago. Since then Abdullah has fought professionally in America and other countries. During this period he made a careful study of the human body's nerves and muscles, and to-day he is recognised as one of Hollywood's leading masseurs.

Among those he helps keep fit are Culbert Olsen, the Governor of California; such stars as McLaglen, Ronald Colman, Marlene Dietrich, Walter Connolly, the Ritz Brothers, the Marx Brothers and Warner Baxter, and many lawn tennis stars, including Ellsworth Vines, Fred Perry and Donald Budge.

Abdullah, who maintains his offices at the Beverly Hills Tennis Club, is at present conditioning Director Ricardo Cortez, Preston Foster, Lynn Bari, Wally Vernon, Henry Wilcoxon, Harold Huber and Joan Woodbury during production of "Chasing Danger."

Do You Know?

Hollywood duplicates Jack Frost's sparkling touch on windows with stale beer and Epsom salts.

His Adventures on the Radio Thrill You . . .

Are you listening each Thursday to the gripping new radio-serial, "Enter Sexton Blake"? It's the thrill of the week! Get to know Sexton Blake—and Tinker—better. Read any of the marvellous yarns about Sexton Blake listed below. Then you'll enjoy the broadcasts even more!

BOOK-LENGTH YARNS FOR 4d.
 No. 657: THE MYSTERY OF THE GREEN BOTTLE
 No. 658: THE RIDDLE OF "UGLY FACE"
 No. 659: THE PHANTOM OF THE MILL
 No. 660: THE CASE OF THE MISSING MUSICIAN

SEXTON BLAKE LIBRARY

Now on sale at all Newsagents 4^d each

"HIDDEN TREASURE"

(Continued from page 22)

tunnels, but it did not issue from those subterranean realms below Treasure Island's surface. It came from the direction of the volcano known as Ghost Mountain, and it was followed by a second, a third and a fourth report.

At the same time the windows of Toni Morrell's room were illuminated by lurid gleams of preternatural fire, and, wheeling towards those windows, she and Larry gained an impression of the volcanic peak that dominated the island—a peak that was capped now by a welter of flame amidst which showers of debris were seen to be hurtling on high.

Whether the explosion in the tunnels had affected the volcano, or whether the activity of the crater was due to causes which were in no way connected with the attempt to destroy Collins' house, Larry and Toni did not know. But it was plain that Ghost Mountain was threatening an eruption such as Treasure Island had probably never experienced since the outbreak that had scattered its buccaneer inhabitants two centuries before.

As Toni Morrell and Larry Kent gazed through the windows another thunderous blast resounded over the island, and, awe-stricken, they beheld a fresh cloud of debris fly aloft from the mountain peak. Almost simultaneously a tremor seemed to run through the sinister home of Carter Collins, alias the Shark, and the walls, floor and ceiling of Toni's room quivered violently.

"Larry!" the girl cried out in horror. "Larry, we're caught in an earthquake! Larry, the house is shaking! It's going to collapse! It's going to collapse!"

(Is Captain Cuttle the long-lost father of Toni Morrell? Will she discover the secret of her identity, and the whereabouts of the pirate hoard that lies buried on Treasure Island? What will happen to Toni Morrell and Larry Kent, hemmed in as they are by stark perils? Don't miss next week's sensational episode of this gripping serial, published by kind permission of Columbia Pictures Corporation, Ltd., starring Don Terry and Gwen Gaze.)

—made by MARS
 Everybody's BAR-gain

ROYAL NAVY

No previous experience required.

An opportunity occurs for men between the ages of 17½ and 22 to enter as Seamen for Special Service, for 7 years Service in the Fleet and 5 years in the Reserve, from age of 18 or date of entry if above that age.

Good Food. Good Pay. Good Friends.

A chance to see the world.

Ask at the Post Office for a copy of "The Royal Navy as a Career and How to Join it," which gives full particulars and address of nearest Recruiting Office, or write to the Recruiting Staff Officer, R.N. and R.M., (N), 85, Whitehall, London, S.W.1.

B.C.2.

Printed in England and published every Tuesday by the Proprietors, THE AMALGAMATED PRESS, LTD., The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Advertisement Offices: The Fleetway House, Farringdon Street, London, E.C.4. Subscription Rates: Inland and Abroad: 11/- per annum; 5/6 for six months. Sole Agents for Australia and New Zealand: Messrs. Gordon & Gotch, Ltd.; and for South Africa: Central News Agency, Ltd. Registered February 25th, 1939. for transmission to Canada at Magazine Rates. S.G.

TALL STAMPS

Your Height increased in 12 days or no cost. New discovery adds 2-5 ins. I gained 4 ins. Guaranteed sale. Full Course 5-. Details: J. B. MORLEY, 17, Cheapside, London, E.C.2.

300 DIFFERENT, including Airmail, Beautiful Uncoloured Sets, Victorials, Colonials, Price 6d. (Abroad 1/-).—WHITE (B). ENGINE LANE, LYE, WORCS.

BLUSHING, TIMIDITY, SHYNESS, completely cured by reliable, pleasant treatment. No drugs or difficult exercises. Full particulars free. F. RATSON (A), Briarwood, Dicketts Lane, Latham, Lanes.

BE TALL

Your Height increased in 14 days or Money Back. Complete Course, 5-. Booklet free privately. STEBBING SYSTEM (A), 28, Dean Road, LONDON, N.W.2.

BOYS! MAKE THESE FINE FLYING scale model aeroplanes! 16 in. wing span. Incl. Mullan, Fokker, Curtiss Hawk, Ryan, Curtiss Robin, Percival Gull, Waco, etc. Easy to build. Complete kits 1.3 each. Elite Model Supplies 14, Bury New Road, Manchester, 8.